

1 of 492 DOCUMENTS

New Straits Times (Malaysia)

September 11, 2012 Tuesday

Underclared millionaires (HL)

BYLINE: Farrah Naz Karim; Alang Bendahara

SECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 1

LENGTH: 459 words

KAMUNTING: For years, they brazenly smuggled migrants in and out of this country, fuelling a billion-ringgit "business".

After painstaking investigations involving countless hours of surveillance, intelligence-gathering and agents going deep undercover, the Special Branch smashed the operations of five human-smuggling syndicates, but not before they had smuggled close to 1.2 million people in and out of Malaysia.

Bosses of seven other human smuggling syndicates are behind bars at the Kamunting detention camp.

Authorities believe there are at least 16 more active syndicates, and the number is rising.

Syndicate members, whom the New Straits Times spoke to on condition of anonymity, agreed with the assessment.

Dossiers on them, mostly three inches thick, also showed that the smugglers had wide transborder networks, using air, land and sea to move migrants in and out of the country.

These syndicates used Malaysia as a transit point to smuggle migrants - particularly from China, Sri Lanka, India, Pakistan, Iran, Iraq, Afghanistan and Myanmar - to Australia, the United States, Canada and countries in Europe.

Their case files showed that the push-off points to third countries included the coastlines of Johor, Selangor, Perak, Kedah, Negri Sembilan and Malacca, as well as via land, through the Malaysia-Thai border.

The journey to these countries would take 18 weeks and included stopovers in Indonesia to refuel and take on fresh water.

The boats they used for sea transfers included fishing vessels and motorboats (bot panchung), fitted with three 250hp outboard engines that could outrun enforcement pursuit boats.

One active illegal jetty used by human-smuggling syndicates as a pick-up point is located a few kilometres from a marine police base in Lumut. "No, no, too dangerous," was the response from a Special Branch officer accompanying us when we wanted to take a closer look.

The NST yesterday exposed that human smugglers currently detained under the Internal Security Act at the Kamunting detention camp were counting the days to their release as they were all set to resume their multi-million ringgit business.

Authorities had expressed concern that these syndicates, with solid foreign networking, were even looking at breaking into new markets, like New Zealand and Canada.

The NST learnt that the Special Branch began using the Internal Security Act against human smugglers in 2009.

This resulted in the United States' Department of State revising Malaysia's ranking up one notch to Tier Two in the Trafficking in Persons Report watch list.

A Special Branch report said the move to deal decisively with human smugglers had also helped in the decision by the British government to refrain from imposing a visa requirement on Malaysians.

(END)

LOAD-DATE: September 10, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 New Straits Times Press (Malaysia) Berhad
All Rights Reserved

2 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Philippines Daily Inquirer

August 30, 2012 Thursday

Hellooo?!? DOJ hotline manned by clueless call center; Loren fumes

BYLINE: Cathy C. Yamsuan

LENGTH: 605 words

A HOTLINE of the government's antihuman trafficking program manned by a clueless call center agent left Sen. Loren Legarda fuming.

To find out whether the hotline was working, Legarda called 1343 and was surprised to be answered by an agent who simply asked her to leave her name and number.

The anonymous female call taker told Legarda pointblank that the number she called was not the hotline of the Inter-Agency Council Against Trafficking (Iacat).

Red-faced officials of the Department of Justice (DOJ), meanwhile, listened with bated breath to Legarda's end of the conversation during a Senate hearing on their 2013 budget yesterday.

The DOJ is seeking a budget of P10.8 billion for next year. From this total, P100 million is intended to finance the department's participation in the global agency's efforts against the trafficking of women and children.

"Is this the Iacat hotline?" Legarda asked the receiver after DOJ officials provided her the number.

"No, it's not? This is a wrong number? How did that happen? They said this is the number to call when you have information or you have to report about trafficking," she told the person at the other end.

"This is different from Iacat? So, this is not a hotline? So how would you help me," Legarda went on.

Angry, frustrated

The senator eventually put the phone down and told Ruby Ramores, Iacat's executive director in the Philippines, that she gave Ramores' name and phone number when the call center agent asked.

The experience left the senator angry and frustrated. Legarda intentionally made the call in front of justice officials to test the government's sincerity in combating trafficking. Justice Secretary Leila de Lima called in sick and did not attend the hearing.

Antitrafficking law author

The senator is the principal author of the 10-year-old Anti-Trafficking Law that is up for amendments in Congress. "She sounded articulate but not competent," Legarda said of the one who took her "hotline" call.

"I think I caught her off-guard because she suddenly added that she would help and just refer me to the (Commission on Filipinos Overseas). Obviously, she's just a call center operator," she told no one in particular.

Still, Legarda lamented that had she been a caller with a legitimate tip against a trafficker, she would have simply been given the runaround despite her good intentions.

Tier 2 ruling

"You must have people who are competent and who know the law and have a direct link to authorities. I'm sorry to test the hotline but I had to see (if it) works," she told the fidgety officials.

Ramores and company could not provide an explanation to Legarda.

The senator's decision to call 1343 was apparently spurred by her disappointment at the Tier 2 ranking that Iacat gave the Philippines.

Tier 2 means the country has not yet satisfied the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking but is making headway in efforts to achieve this.

Legarda wants the DOJ to be more "proactive" in antitrafficking efforts, noting that Cambodia and Laos have signs in public places warning of strict penalties against the crime.

The senator told the Inquirer after the hearing that call center agents were more appropriate in cases of business-oriented inquiries.

Helloo!

"Hello! Iacat is not a credit card company or a mall," she fumed. The DOJ said the proposed P100-million budget for Iacat would be used for operational funds for the rescue of trafficking victims, surveillance of suspected traffickers' activities, administrative costs and allowances of employees involved in the operations. Congress gave the DOJ P50 million for Iacat-related activities this year.

LOAD-DATE: August 30, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

3 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

August 28, 2012 Tuesday

ICT and Telecom; Using Modern Technology to Combat Modern Slavery

BYLINE: MediaGlobal (New York)

LENGTH: 1195 words

Sofia's childhood was stolen at the age of 9, when she was raped by a 48-year-old man in her hometown of Welcome, in Free State province of South Africa. Five years later, she lost the last traces of her childhood when her mother died. Sent to live with an abusive uncle, Sofia ran away. Instead of freedom, she found slavery. Kidnapped and raped yet again, Sofia became a commodity. Human traffickers bought and forced her into prostitution.

Changed for her privacy, Sofia's name is made-up, but her story is not. Stories like hers are a daily occurrence in Africa's wealthiest country. Yet, little is known of lives like Sofia's. Even when helped in shelters, victims of human trafficking often find it difficult to open up, either because of language barriers or because they have been threatened by their exploiters. Also, the significant decrease of awareness since the 2010 FIFA World Cup - when many campaigns were deployed to halt the expected expansion in trafficking linked to the sport event - has kept this crime in the dark corners of South Africa.

Not For Sale, a California-based non-profit-organization, wants to bring again public attention to this issue.

In partnership with Mxit, Africa's largest social networking service, it has created a platform for use on mobile phones. Basically, it works as a quiz and aims to gather data on three subjects: what people know about human trafficking, which trends of trafficking are taking place in various regions, and how to detect and support victims.

"An initiative such as this will not only provide valuable information for key stakeholders and decision makers, but also motivate community efforts to raise awareness of the problem, support law enforcement and possibly identify victims," declared Carol Allais, professor at the Department of Sociology at the University of South Africa.

When people log on to Mxit using their mobile phones, the Not For Sale logo appears along with an advertisement inviting to take the survey. If users click on it, the survey starts in a format of 11 "yes" or "no" questions.

Here are two examples: "In South Africa, are only young local females at risk for being trafficked?" or "A young boy from the Eastern Cape needs money to help his family buy food. An uncle tells him of a job in Cape Town where he can make enough money to send some home to his mother and sisters. He boards a taxi van with other young boys thinking he is going to Cape Town, but instead he is taken to a farm where he is forced to work long hours with no pay. If he tries to escape, he is beaten. Is this human trafficking?"

By offering free air-time and other credits to its 40 million users, Mxit - and so does Not for Sale - hopes to achieve 150,000 responses to the survey over a two months period.

By collecting data, Not for Sale hopes to better understand people's general perception of human trafficking, one of the world's fastest-growing criminal industries, generating more than $32 billion per year.

Not For Sale will also identify areas where it is needed to implement anti-trafficking initiatives.

Another outcome, no less important, is an increase in the culture of reporting human trafficking incidences. Mxit's users are encouraged to report cases of people affected by trafficking. For this purpose, a toll-free number is provided.

Though too early to draw conclusions from the new findings, what is already known is that South Africa remains a main source, destination, and transit country for men, women, and children trafficked for forced labor, sexual exploitation, and organ harvesting.

In spite of its overall growth - the country's GDP is expected to increase by 2.8 per cent in 2012, outperforming the US and the EuroZone - South Africa's urban and rural poverty is the most evident cause of trafficking in humans.

"Local South Africans from the rural areas are tricked into taking jobs in the cities and then are exploited both sexually and domestically," Christina Bacino, Not For Sale's South Africa coordinator, told MediaGlobal.

This trend is confirmed by Myriam Danam, founder of S-Cape Home, a project launched by the counter-trafficking network Justice ACTs, that provides a safe environment and a holistic restoration process for young exploited women. "Mainly the girls we've been helping come from rural or suburban provinces of South Africa," said Danam. "They usually go to the cities by themselves and from these cities they're trafficked by Nigerian rings that bring them to Cape Town."

Both Not for Sale and Justice ACTs' experiences on the field are corroborated by the latest results described in the Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report released by the US Department of State.

The US State Department uses a 3-tier scale regarding human trafficking where 3s are the worst offenders. South Africa ranks as a Tier 2 country in the TIP report, meaning that its government, like many others including the ones of Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, and Brazil "do not fully comply with the Trafficking Victims Protection Act's (TVPA) minimum standards, but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards."

Currently, South Africa's laws do not prohibit all forms of human trafficking. Moreover, law enforcement efforts are focused on sex trafficking, with little attention to forced labor. The US State Department recommends that South Africa compile national statistics, as the current lack of data inhibits effective response. "I've had a meeting with the South African Department of Social Development; what I've heard is that they [the government] don't have enough reports and statistics to believe human trafficking is a reality," Danam stated.

Experts agree much needs to be done in the realms of prosecution, protection, and prevention. The Parliament's justice committee has recently adopted the long-awaited Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill, drafting of which began in 2003. The legislation, under discussion in Parliament for the past five years, still needs to be enacted.

Despite the South African government's slowness, the civil society has proven ready to act. Social networks can be the new frontier for all the stakeholders to do an even better job in fighting this modern form of slavery.

Thanks to social networks potential victims can better understand the dynamics of human trafficking, recognize and avoid it. Also, a real-time reporting of such crimes can induce real-time responses by authorities. Trafficking detection can also be managed through social networking sites like Twitter as shown in Mark Latonero's study "Human Trafficking Online."

"Raising awareness and gathering opinions are important parts of the anti-trafficking movement," Latonero, Research Director at Annenberg Center on Communication Leadership & Policy at the University of Southern California, told MediaGlobal. "At the same time, social media and mobile phones are used to facilitate human trafficking, for example, to recruit, control, and advertise victims. We need to find innovative ways to detect both victims and exploiters on these digital networks and provide real-time information to those who are able to help."

LOAD-DATE: August 30, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

HERE 4 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Business Wire

August 22, 2012 Wednesday 10:17 PM GMT

Demonstration at the Netherlands Embassy; Alleged Victims Accuse Joris Demmink of Pedophilia And Call for his Arrest

LENGTH: 372 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

Shared Hope International , The Rebecca Project and The Protection Project at Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies are demonstrating to raise awareness on Thursday, August 23, 2012 from 1-2pm at the Netherlands Embassy located at 4200 Linnean Avenue NW, Washington, D.C. 20008.

The non-profit organizations are calling for an investigation of Joris Demmink, Secretary-General of the Dutch Ministry of Security and Justice in the Netherlands, who has been accused of child rape, sex tourism, and child sex trafficking. Read more: <http://arrestdemmink.com/>

Victims within the Netherlands and Turkey allege that Demmink raped them when they were boys and that he was part of a group of pedophiles committing these crimes. Demmink has been accused of using his power to obstruct justice efforts by eluding investigation and prosecution. Demmink stands accused of child sex tourism, a form of child sex trafficking.

The allegations against this high ranking government official are not reported in the 2012 Trafficking in Persons Report by the U.S. Department of State, Office to Combat and Monitor Trafficking in Persons, which gives the Netherlands a Tier 1 ranking - the highest ranking available indicating compliance with the standards to combat trafficking. These allegations have not spurred the European Union to take action, raising serious concern as to the level of seriousness with which governments are responding to human trafficking. Reporters, law enforcement agents, prosecutors, and victims in the Netherlands report that they fear grave personal danger in exposing these crimes.

Who: Shared Hope International, The Rebecca Project, The Protection Project, and advocates
Where: Netherlands Embassy
 4200 Linnean Avenue NW
 Washington, D.C. 20008
When: Thursday, August 23, 2012 1:00-2:00pm

Contact Janet Fallon at O: 703.469.3766, M: 703.625.2532, or proptionsdc@gmail.com, for interviews with: Shared Hope International Linda Smith (U.S. Congress 1995-99), Founder and President and Samantha Vardaman, Senior Director The Rebecca Project for Human Rights Imani Walker, Executive Director and Kwame Fosu, Policy Director

CONTACT: for Shared Hope International
 Janet Fallon, 703-469-3766
 Mobile: 703-625-2532
proptionsdc@gmail.com

URL: <http://www.businesswire.com>LOAD-DATE: August 23, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DISTRIBUTION: International News Desks; National Desks; Criminal Justice Writers; Government Writers

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Business Wire, Inc.

5 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Gulf Daily News

August 21, 2012

Vice trap probe

BYLINE: SANDEEP SINGH GREWAL

LENGTH: 322 words

THAI authorities are investigating claims that a group of 10 women could be forced into prostitution in Bahrain.

Members of the Thai police have already contacted government ministries here in an attempt to seek more information and plan a potential rescue.

It comes after they received a call from a distressed Thai woman who claimed she and nine others were being detained in Bahrain with the intention of being forced into prostitution.

"The woman said they would be forced into prostitution at the end of Ramadan and called for an emergency rescue," Police Colonel Sanpisit Yaemkesorn told Bangkok daily paper The Nation.

He revealed the woman, who called last Friday, claimed she was being detained at an apartment opposite the French Embassy.

Col Yaemkesorn said an investigation was launched after a check on the woman's identity showed she was genuine.

He said she also alleged that diplomats in Bahrain had been involved in trafficking the group and expressed fears that they would soon be shifted to another location.

According to this year's US State Department Trafficking in Persons report, non-governmental organisations (NGOs) in Bahrain reported 128 victims of human trafficking, some of whom were referred by the government.

The government reportedly investigated 18 cases, five of which resulted in convictions of those found guilty.

"Bahrain is a destination country for men and women subjected to forced labour and sex trafficking," said the report.

It placed Bahrain on the Tier 2 watch list for countries where the absolute number of victims of severe forms of trafficking was significant or increasing and there was failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons from the previous year.

The report stated Bahrain "does not" fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, but said it was making significant efforts to do so.

sandy@gdn.com.bh

LOAD-DATE: August 21, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: 5

Copyright 2012 Gulf Daily News - Hilal Publishing and Marketing Group.
Provided by Syndigate.info, an Albawaba.com company
All Rights Reserved

6 of 492 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

August 21, 2012 Tuesday

MARRIAGE CONDITIONS TIGHTENED

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 713 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, DC

The following information was released by Radio Free Asia:

Laos moves to close a loophole in marriages exploited by human trafficking syndicates.

AFP

Laotian girls throw buckets of water on colleagues during the water festival celebrations in Vientiane, April 13, 2012.

The Lao government is tightening conditions under which foreigners marry local women in a bid to combat human trafficking, according to officials.

Under new rules introduced recently, foreigners wanting to marry local women should be a resident in Laos for at least three consecutive months and have to provide a variety of personal documents for the government to conduct background checks, the officials said.

The stringent conditions are aimed at plugging the marriage loophole that foreign human trafficking syndicates have been using to smuggle Lao women out of the country.

The foreigners quickly get married with local women in Laos and then take them to their countries where the women are forced into prostitution and other illicit activities, the officials said.

"The government has just issued a new law that basically states that if a foreigner wants to marry a Lao girl, he must stay in Laos for three months to obtain proper documents, not just obtain documents and then leave," a Lao anti-human trafficking officer told RFA's Lao service.

"Many women have been missing and sold," the officer said, without giving details on the foreign human trafficking syndicates that are linked to such marriages and smuggling Lao women.

The officer said that under the new rule, a foreigner who wants to marry a Laotian has to submit documents of "his nationality, background and other necessary information to Lao authorities."

"The authorities will investigate and the investigation will take at least three months. If the foreigner is trustworthy, he will be allowed to marry [much] faster; but if [the application is] in doubt, the marriage will be delayed or never permitted."

Smuggling rings

In recent months, officials have exposed foreign sex rings smuggling Lao women to China, Thailand, and Malaysia.

In May, the government reported that hundreds of girls have been trafficked into China from the northern provinces of Laos.

One official had said that over the past two years, hundreds of families from provinces bordering China had approached the government requesting help in locating their missing daughters.

The girls, many of them from the ethnic Khmu minority, were lured with the prospect of work, or had married Chinese nationals.

Human trafficking rings are also increasingly using Thailand as a transit country to send Lao girls to Malaysia where they are sold into prostitution, according to a Lao official, also in May.

Based on statistics provided by the immigration bureau of Thailand's Songkla province, which borders Malaysia to the north, 48,000 Laotians crossed into Malaysia in 2011, but only 46,000 returned.

Some 35 percent of Lao nationals trafficked to Thailand end up in prostitution, U.N. figures have shown.

Across the border

Earlier this month, a Thai official claimed that more than 500 underage Lao girls are working as sex slaves in eastern Thailand, saying that authorities in both countries need to step up the fight against human trafficking.

Chuvit Kamolvisit, a Thai member of parliament and advocate for social issues, said that the girls, aged 13 to 18 years, were discovered in a karaoke bar in the Chachoengsao district of Chachoengsao province.

But Thai Deputy Prime Minister Chalerm Yubamrung denied Chuvit's claims in a statement to the Thai media, saying no such karaoke bar existed.

He called on Lao officials to take measures which included more scrutiny of Lao girls traveling to Thailand to look for work and targeting officials who have assisted traffickers.

A Lao draft law on human trafficking is currently under review and is likely to be put into law by 2014, officials have said.

The U.S. State Department maintained Laos at "Tier 2" in its annual report on human trafficking in June, saying it does not fully comply with minimum standards for protecting trafficking victims, but that it is making significant efforts to comply with those standards.

Reported by Sidney Khotpaya for RFA's Lao service. Translated by Max Avary. Written in English by Parameswaran Ponnudurai.

LOAD-DATE: August 21, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

7 of 492 DOCUMENTS

August 14, 2012 Tuesday

61 misconduct cases awaiting action

BYLINE: Farah Adilla

SECTION: C - CENTRAL; Pg. 4

LENGTH: 351 words

A total of 61 cases of misconduct by the Comprehensive Legalisation Programme for Illegal Immigrants (6P) agent, Akhwan Group of Companies, has been reported to Tenaganita, according to executive director Dr Irene Fernandez (picture).

She said out of the 61 cases, Tenaganita and various migrant workers have filed 12 police reports against the manpower agency and its chief executive officer Sirajul Amin Rumel for various alleged misconduct.

In June, Tenaganita filed a case with the commercial crime division at Bukit Aman and the Immigration Department in Putrajaya against the Akhwan Group. She told reporters in Petaling Jaya yesterday that Tenaganita has yet to receive updates on the police reports.

Tenaganita is a Malaysian-based non-governmental organisation which protects and promotes the rights of women, migrants and refugees.

The 6P, which was launched in October 2011, aims to help the government settle issues regarding illegal immigrants and foreign workers in Malaysia.

The 6P stands for pendaftaran (registration), pemutihan (neutralise), pengampunan (amnesty), pemantauan (monitoring), penguatkuasaan (authorisation) and pengusiran (expulsion).

Meanwhile, Malaysia was placed on the Tier 2 Watch List for a third consecutive year, according to a US State Department release of its latest trafficking in persons watchlist.

The report said the government of Malaysia "does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking."

"Malaysia's anti-trafficking law does not include adequate provisions for the protection of victims, and the government did not take steps to amend its laws to allow certified victims to reside outside government facilities.

"The government took steps to ameliorate the poor conditions faced by officially certified trafficking victims - such as granting three-year work permits to one group of 32 male victims of forced labour - but it did not take the more meaningful steps of structurally reforming the unnecessarily complex victim identification and protection regime that likely causes further harm to victims," the report said.

LOAD-DATE: August 13, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 Syed Hussain Publications Sdn Bhd
All Rights Reserved

8 of 492 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

August 14, 2012 Tuesday

IOM HELPS TEENAGE KENYAN TRAFFICKING VICTIMS RETURN HOME FROM SOUTH SUDAN

BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 501 wordsDATELINE: South Sudan

The following information was released by International Organization for Migration (IOM):

IOM, working with UNICEF, has helped two teenage Kenyan victims of human trafficking to return home from South Sudan.

In the first case of its kind handled by IOM South Sudan, the teenagers, who were recruited in a rural Kenyan community for domestic servitude and later forced marriage, escaped and were referred to IOM and UNICEF by the Kenyan community.

Following IOM screening, they were referred to a safe house in the South Sudanese capital, Juba. IOM has since returned them to Kenya, where they will receive shelter, counselling, education and reintegration support to restart their lives.

Human trafficking has been identified as a growing problem in South Sudan, with evidence that trafficking for forced labour and the sex industry are particularly prevalent in the countrys urban centres.

Young girls from rural areas and women who are internally displaced are particularly vulnerable to trafficking for forced labour as domestic servants.

The US State Departments 2012 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report placed South Sudan on its Tier 2 Watch List, citing the countrys failure to convict and prosecute those involved in human trafficking. Tier 2 indicates that South Sudan does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, but is making significant efforts to do so.

According to South Sudans Ministry of Justice, the country has drafted an Anti-Trafficking Bill. But there are currently no existing policies or processes in place to combat the trade and prosecute traffickers.

IOM is working closely with the Ministries for Interior, Justice and Foreign Affairs and has trained over 170 immigration and police personnel in the past 18 months. Border guards, immigration officers and members of the South Sudan Police Service have attended IOM training workshops on identifying and assisting trafficking victims and prosecuting traffickers.

In the absence of legislation, IOM alerted border officials and police officers to the range of crimes traffickers commit during the act of deceiving, transporting and exploiting victims.

IOM has called on the international community to intensify efforts to address the issue and has appealed for funding to conduct an initial base-line assessment to determine the extent of human trafficking both across the border into South Sudan from neighbouring countries, and internally between rural areas and urban centers.

The Government of South Sudan also needs technical assistance to increase its capacity to identify and assist victims of human trafficking, and to prevent the crime and effectively prosecute traffickers. Public awareness campaigns are also needed to inform the public about the issue and to inform victims about the resources available to help them.

IOM works to combat human trafficking in 94 countries. Its counter trafficking activities target prevention of the crime, protection of victims and prosecution of traffickers.

LOAD-DATE: August 26, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 States News Service

9 of 492 DOCUMENTS

CNN Wire

August 10, 2012 Friday 10:10 PM EST

U.S. states of play in anti-trafficking laws

BYLINE: By Sugam Pokharel, CNN

LENGTH: 482 words

DATELINE: (CNN)

(CNN) -- The state of Massachusetts was named among the most improved in the U.S. in 2012 after it passed wide-ranging anti-human trafficking laws.

A report published by Polaris Project, one of the leading organizations in the global fight against human trafficking and modern-day slavery, rated and placed all 50 states plus the District of Columbia in one of four tiers based on the human trafficking laws in the state.

South Carolina, West Virginia and Ohio were also rated 'most improved' for taking concrete steps to address human trafficking. Of those states, Massachusetts was singled out for particular praise as it is now also ranked in the top four states having the strongest legal framework.

Washington tops the list, with Minnesota third and Texas fourth.

The Polaris Project, which published its "2012 State Ratings on Human Trafficking Laws" on Tuesday, believes it is critical that state trafficking laws exist to punish the criminals in the global trade and support the survivors.

"Since 2004, Polaris Project has been tracking state laws," said Mary Ellison, Polaris Project's Director of Policy. "In 2004, only four states had human trafficking laws. But in 2012, we are happy to report that 49 states plus District of Columbia have some type of human trafficking laws. In fact, over the past year, 28 states, or 55% of the states, have passed new human trafficking laws."

After enacting a comprehensive human trafficking law in November 2011, Massachusetts moved from the bottom tier in 2011 to the top tier in 2012, and earned the 'most improved' distinction.

"Massachusetts has taken major steps to combat the egregious crime of human trafficking, and we are pleased that this report recognizes those efforts," Massachusetts Attorney General Martha Coakley said.

"We continue to work towards a successful implementation of the new law through investigations, prosecutions, and policy change and look forward to working with stakeholders to end the exploitation of people in our commonwealth."

Meanwhile, Wyoming, Arkansas, Montana and South Dakota were included in the bottom tier, or as the report calls them - the Faltering Four - for what Polaris says was a minimal effort to enact human trafficking legislation.

Wyoming, according to the report, is the only state that has failed to pass any robust laws against human trafficking at the state level.

"Passing strong state laws is a critical step to increasing prosecutions of traffickers and providing local support for survivors," said Ellison.

"It is exciting to see so many state policy makers actively seeking ways to stop human trafficking, but using these new laws to save lives and hold traffickers accountable is what we are ultimately striving for. While states like Washington and Massachusetts are clearly at the top of the pack in our ratings, every state can and should do more to improve and implement their laws."

LOAD-DATE: August 11, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Cable News Network
All Rights Reserved

10 of 492 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

August 10, 2012 Friday

IOM TRAINS NAMIBIAN IMMIGRATION OFFICERS IN MIGRATION MANAGEMENT

BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 321 wordsDATELINE: Namibia

The following information was released by International Organization for Migration (IOM):

Nine Senior Namibian immigration officers have completed a two-week training of trainers course in the Namibian capital, Windhoek, focusing on migration management, counter-trafficking and passport examination procedures.

The nine officers who come from four immigration zones will help to train 225 of their colleagues after completing the course.

Based on Namibia's Immigration Standard Operational Procedures Manual, the training, which was funded by the IOM Development Fund and ends today ((10/8), was organized by IOM at the request of Namibia's Home Affairs and Immigration Ministry.

It was designed to help the officers to better understand migration management and human trafficking in a Namibian context, to enable them to identify victims and refer them to appropriate agencies. Participants are expected to subsequently train other immigration and police officers in these fields.

A vast country with porous borders, Namibia is an important transit country for migrants heading to South Africa and is also a final destination for migrants from neighbouring countries.

As a result, its immigration services are overstretched and need capacity building, particularly in the areas of border control, migration management and counter-trafficking.

The US State Department's 2012 annual report on Trafficking in Persons placed Namibia on its Tier 2 watch list, citing the country's failure to convict and prosecute those involved in human trafficking. Tier 2 indicates that Namibia does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, but is making significant efforts to do so.

The report identified various forms of trafficking in the country, including exploitation of children from Angola, Zambia and Zimbabwe for forced labour in agriculture, cattle herding, fishing, domestic servitude and prostitution.

LOAD-DATE: August 26, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

11 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

August 8, 2012 Wednesday

Nigeria; Kogi Deputy Governor Fingered in the Hasty Release of 267 Children, Traffickers

BYLINE: This Day (Lagos)

LENGTH: 868 words

At a time the crusade against child trafficking is supposed to be intensified, given the poor rating of Nigeria in the international circle, the controversy over who ordered the release of some rescued 267 children as well as those suspected to be trading with them, has cast a shadow over government's sincerity in tackling the incident. Many stakeholders have questioned government's sincerity since the traffickers were released when they were supposed to be arraigned.

But the National Agency for the Prohibition of Trafficking in Persons (NAPTIP) has absolved itself from blame in the release of the victims and their traffickers who were apprehended at various times by the Joint Task Force of the Kogi State Army Command on July 28.

According to the agency' spokesman, Mr. Orakwue Arinze, the children, their traffickers and the 13 vehicles which they were travelling in were reportedly released on the orders of Kogi State Deputy Governor, Mr. Yomi Awoniyi, on humanitarian grounds.

The agency said this is in response to statements credited to the Deputy Commissioner of Police (DCP) in charge of operations in Kogi, claiming that the agency failed to heed its invitation to take possession of the victims and suspects, and it had therefore approached Awoniyi for directive.

This allegation has given rise to speculations that the agency may have connived with influential Nigerians to release the victims and suspects so as to ensure that their sponsors do not face prosecution.

Arinze, who is Assistant Director of Press and Public Relations of the agency, briefed journalists in Abuja yesterday and presented what he called facts of the matter.

According to him, the agency received news of the interception on July 2 and immediately contacted the Kogi State DCP, Operations to take over the victims and the suspects into custody. He added that the DCP expressed concern at the challenge of logistics being faced by the command to take care of such a huge number of people.

Arinze added that the agency activated its evacuation and reception mechanism in its shelters owned by some of its partners.

"The agency then requested the DCP Operations to formally forward an official communication to it to enable us to take over the matter since NAPTIP does not have an office in Kogi State. Another call was placed to the DCP Operations to follow up on the matter at 1700 hrs same Saturday and he informed the agency that the Kogi State Government had intervened and provided minimal refreshment to the victims who according to him, were at that time kept at the Kogi State township stadium," he said.

He added that the agency was told to stay action and wait until July 30 for the handover. However, on the day, the agency's Director, Investigation and Monitoring, Mr. Ezekiel Kaura, was told to hold on as the deputy governor was meeting with senior officials of the police command over the matter, Arinze added.

"As at Wednesday, August 1, 2012 when we did not get any information, it became necessary for the agency to move to Lokoja to evacuate the 267 persons to Abuja. On Thursday, August 2, 2012 our officers visited the DCP Operations who now informed us that the 267 persons victims and suspects and 13 vehicles handed over to them by JTF had since been released on Sunday, July 29, 2012 on the orders of the Deputy Governor of Kogi State," Arinze said.

Fielding questions from reporters, Arinze said the agency is already working to ensure that the suspects are re-apprehended and charged to court.

"We will not let the matter go, we will formally protest to the relevant authorities," he said.

Many, however, have wondered why it took NAPTIP as long as six days to get to the spot where the victims were supposedly kept, given the short distance between Abuja and Lokoja.

Even then, questions are being asked whether the deputy governor, as claimed by the police, has the powers to order the release of both the victims and their traffickers. Or was the state forced to order the release because of the cost implication of both hosting and feeding the arrested persons?

And was NAPTIP consulted before the release was made? Given the notoriety of the police in such matters, many believe that the haste in releasing both the suspects and the victims cannot be unconnected with "settlement efforts" by the parties involved in the illegal racket.

THISDAY gathered that the suspects were apprehended on different days by the JTF, which initially kept them in the barracks. It later raised the alarm and paraded them as it became evident that the number of victims was increasing and subsequently handed the victims and their traffickers over to the police.

At least 103 of the victims were children ranging from ages seven to 15. The victims are from Benue, Kogi and Cross River States and their parents had received N5,000 for each child. They were being taken to work in some states of the South-west such as Lagos, Ogun, Oyo and Ondo.

It is recalled that Nigeria was recently downgraded from Tier 1 status to Tier 2 by the US Department of State on the anti-human trafficking index due to its inability to ensure the persecution of traffickers on a rate proportionate to the level of the scourge in Nigeria.

LOAD-DATE: August 8, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

12 of 492 DOCUMENTS

This Day (Lagos)

August 08, 2012

Kogi Deputy Governor Fingering in the Hasty Release of 267 Children, Traffickers

BYLINE: Damilola Oyedele

LENGTH: 868 words

At a time the crusade against child trafficking is supposed to be intensified, given the poor rating of Nigeria in the international circle, the controversy over who ordered the release of some rescued 267 children as well as those suspected to be trading with them, has cast a shadow over government's sincerity in tackling the incident. Many stakeholders have questioned government's sincerity since the traffickers were released when they were supposed to be arraigned.

But the National Agency for the Prohibition of Trafficking in Persons (NAPTIP) has absolved itself from blame in the release of the victims and their traffickers who were apprehended at various times by the Joint Task Force of the Kogi State Army Command on July 28.

According to the agency' spokesman, Mr. Orakwue Arinze, the children, their traffickers and the 13 vehicles which they were travelling in were reportedly released on the orders of Kogi State Deputy Governor, Mr. Yomi Awoniyi, on humanitarian grounds.

The agency said this is in response to statements credited to the Deputy Commissioner of Police (DCP) in charge of operations in Kogi, claiming that the agency failed to heed its invitation to take possession of the victims and suspects, and it had therefore approached Awoniyi for directive.

This allegation has given rise to speculations that the agency may have connived with influential Nigerians to release the victims and suspects so as to ensure that their sponsors do not face prosecution.

Arinze, who is Assistant Director of Press and Public Relations of the agency, briefed journalists in Abuja yesterday and presented what he called facts of the matter.

According to him, the agency received news of the interception on July 2 and immediately contacted the Kogi State DCP, Operations to take over the victims and the suspects into custody. He added that the DCP expressed concern at the challenge of logistics being faced by the command to take care of such a huge number of people.

Arinze added that the agency activated its evacuation and reception mechanism in its shelters owned by some of its partners.

"The agency then requested the DCP Operations to formally forward an official communication to it to enable us to take over the matter since NAPTIP does not have an office in Kogi State. Another call was placed to the DCP Operations to follow up on the matter at 1700 hrs same Saturday and he informed the agency that the Kogi State Government had intervened and provided minimal refreshment to the victims who according to him, were at that time kept at the Kogi State township stadium," he said.

He added that the agency was told to stay action and wait until July 30 for the handover. However, on the day, the agency's Director, Investigation and Monitoring, Mr. Ezekiel Kaura, was told to hold on as the deputy governor was meeting with senior officials of the police command over the matter, Arinze added.

"As at Wednesday, August 1, 2012 when we did not get any information, it became necessary for the agency to move to Lokoja to evacuate the 267 persons to Abuja. On Thursday, August 2, 2012 our officers visited the DCP Operations who now informed us that the 267 persons victims and suspects and 13 vehicles handed over to them by JTF had since been released on Sunday, July 29, 2012 on the orders of the Deputy Governor of Kogi State," Arinze said.

Fielding questions from reporters, Arinze said the agency is already working to ensure that the suspects are re-apprehended and charged to court.

"We will not let the matter go, we will formally protest to the relevant authorities," he said.

Many, however, have wondered why it took NAPTIP as long as six days to get to the spot where the victims were supposedly kept, given the short distance between Abuja and Lokoja.

Even then, questions are being asked whether the deputy governor, as claimed by the police, has the powers to order the release of both the victims and their traffickers. Or was the state forced to order the release because of the cost implication of both hosting and feeding the arrested persons?

And was NAPTIP consulted before the release was made? Given the notoriety of the police in such matters, many believe that the haste in releasing both the suspects and the victims cannot be unconnected with "settlement efforts" by the parties involved in the illegal racket.

THISDAY gathered that the suspects were apprehended on different days by the JTF, which initially kept them in the barracks. It later raised the alarm and paraded them as it became evident that the number of victims was increasing and subsequently handed the victims and their traffickers over to the police.

At least 103 of the victims were children ranging from ages seven to 15. The victims are from Benue, Kogi and Cross River States and their parents had received N5,000 for each child. They were being taken to work in some states of the South-west such as Lagos, Ogun, Oyo and Ondo.

It is recalled that Nigeria was recently downgraded from Tier 1 status to Tier 2 by the US Department of State on the anti-human trafficking index due to its inability to ensure the persecution of traffickers on a rate proportionate to the level of the scourge in Nigeria.

LOAD-DATE: August 8, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

13 of 492 DOCUMENTS

The Nation (Thailand)

August 8, 2012 Wednesday

PLAN TO ALLOW REFUGEES TO LIVE IN CAMPS ON BORDER Most of the 100,000 will be Karen, Karenni and Mon

BYLINE: The Nation

LENGTH: 454 words

Eleven Media

Yangon

Myanmar is mapping out a plan to allow more than 100,000 refugees who fled from conflict at home to now live in camps along the Thai border for a long time, officials from Myanmar's Ministry of Social Welfare and Resettlement said.

The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) and Myanmar's Ministry of Immigration will take part in the plan to call back the refugees, who are mostly Karen, Karenni and Mon nationalities.

According to the plan, the refugees will receive aid for their cost of living and career opportunities.

"Initially, we will work on accepting those in Thailand who want to come back to Myanmar, after being scrutinised," said U Than Htut Swe, director-general of the Ministry of Social Welfare and Resettlement. "This matter is a national issue. Our department cannot do it on our own. We are trying to carry this out after it was submitted to the president's office. The president has also highlighted the issues about the refugees and migrant workers during his recent trip to Thailand," he said.

A senior official at the Thai Foreign Ministry said Thailand also has a clear policy to repatriate Myanmar refugees in nine camps in four border provinces when the situation in their home country is safe enough. Authorities in Nay Pyi Taw are now in the process of having peace agreements with armed ethnic minorities who took up weapons against the regime for more than half a century.

Human rights defenders often urge the two governments to ensure safety of the refugees as they really wanted to bring them back.

There are about 95,000 registered refugees and some 9,000 asylum seekers in Thailand.

Most refugees are ethnic minorities from Myanmar, mainly Karen and Karenni.

The Thai government runs all camps, with most assistance provided by non-governmental organisations, while the UNHCR basically provided protection and programmes to ensure their safe living.

However, refugees are just a part of more than 1 million Myanmar citizens in Thailand. Most of the Myanmar people in Thailand are migrant workers. There are also dissidents, exiled political activists in Thailand. A certificate of identity will be issued to any Myanmar migrant worker from Thailand who wants to return home for good. An absconder in a criminal case must be ready to face the law.

Thailand has appeared on the US State Department's Tier Two Watch List for Human Trafficking this year because it still has many routes for human trafficking. Most of the trafficked women from Myanmar work as prostitutes and housemaids while men are forced into hard labour or to work on fishing boats.

The authorities in Nay Pyi Taw want them to return home and bring their skills to help develop the country but they are afraid of being persecuted.

LOAD-DATE: August 7, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 Nation Multimedia Group
All Rights Reserved

14 of 492 DOCUMENTS

OrangeChat

August 8, 2012 Wednesday 10:19 PM EST

BLOG: OrangeChat: UPDATE: North Carolina toughens laws against human traffickingBYLINE: Mark SchultzLENGTH: 259 words

Aug. 08--<http://media.chapelhillnews.com/smedia/2012/07/27/15/28/80DZ.Em.34.jpeg>
[<http://media.chapelhillnews.com/smedia/2012/07/27/15/28/80DZ.Em.34.jpeg>]Reader Donna Bickford, who wrote us a guest column [<http://www.chapelhillnews.com/2012/07/28/72276/help-stop-human-trafficking.html>] after correspondent Amanda Keener's recent stories [<http://www.chapelhillnews.com/2012/07/17/72130/triangle-groups-tackle-human-trafficking.html>] on human trafficking, emailed us today that the Polaris Project [<http://www.polarisproject.org/what-we-do/policy-advocacy/current-laws>] has upgraded North Carolina from Tier 2 to Tier 1 status among the 50 states based on legislation to combat the problem.

There are an estimated 18,000 to 20,000 trafficking victims -- essentially modern-day slaves -- in the United States, and North Carolina is among the top 10 states where trafficking has been reported, according to agencies that work on the problem.

The Washington-based Polaris Project began tracking anti-trafficking laws in 2007 when only 28 states had anti-trafficking criminal statutes. As of July 31, the number of states with anti-trafficking criminal statutes, including the District of Columbia, has grown to 48 with sex trafficking offenses and 50 with labor trafficking offenses.

As of July 31, 2012, 21 states are now rated in Tier 1, up from 11 states in 2011. Tier 1 states have passed "significant laws" against trafficking. Twenty-eight states (55 percent) passed new laws to fight human trafficking in the past year, according to the Polaris Project.

LOAD-DATE: August 08, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Web BlogJOURNAL-CODE: CX-113781

Copyright 2012 Newstex LLC
All Rights Reserved

15 of 492 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

August 7, 2012 TuesdayMASSACHUSETTS NAMED MOST IMPROVED STATE IN POLARIS PROJECT RATINGS ON HUMAN TRAFFICKING LAWS MASSACHUSETTS CATAPULTS FROM THE WORST TIER TO THE BEST*BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 268 wordsDATELINE: BOSTON, MA

The following information was released by the office of the Massachusetts Attorney General:

Polaris Project named Massachusetts the most improved state in their annual ratings on state human trafficking laws, Attorney General Martha Coakley announced today.

In a conference call today, Polaris Project announced its 2012 Annual Ratings Map on state human trafficking laws. Massachusetts was recognized for passing a comprehensive human trafficking law in November. In just one year, Massachusetts catapulted from the worst tier to the best in the ratings.

Polaris Project rated all 50 states and the District of Columbia based on ten categories of laws that are critical to a basic legal framework that combats human trafficking, punishes traffickers and supports survivors.

The following is a statement from Massachusetts Attorney General Martha Coakley on the Polaris Project Report:

"Massachusetts has taken major steps to combat the egregious crime of human trafficking, and we are pleased that this report recognizes those efforts. We are proud to be recognized as the most improved state by Polaris Project. The recent passage of a human trafficking law in Massachusetts recognizes that these crimes are happening in our own communities, and gives us the tools to combat those crimes and offer critical services to victims. We continue to work towards a successful implementation of that law through investigations, prosecutions, and policy change as recommended by the Interagency Human Trafficking Task Force. We look forward to working with stakeholders to end the exploitation of people in our Commonwealth."

LOAD-DATE: August 7, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 States News Service

16 of 492 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring South Asia - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

August 3, 2012 Friday

US concerned over rising religious "radicalization" in Maldives

LENGTH: 1388 words

Text of report headlined "US challenges Maldives' prosecution of terror suspects, among concerns over rising radicalization" published by Maldivian newspaper Minivan News website on 2 August; subheadings as carried

The US State Department has reported there were no successful prosecutions of suspected terror suspects during 2011 in the Maldives, and raised wider concerns about the potential radicalization of young people from the country in foreign madrassas [religious schools].

According to the US government's recently published "Country reports on terrorism 2011", the Maldives was viewed to have "severely limited" legislation to prosecute alleged cases of terrorism and extremism in the country's courts.

While the Maldives government said it was presently looking to address several security and terrorist threats, such as piracy and organized crime, through existing legislation and proposed legal amendments, it moved to deny any truth in claims Maldivian citizens were being radicalized at Pakistan-based madrassas.

President's Office Spokesperson Abbas Adil Riza said that the government was presently collecting information in regards to the issue of radicalization in the country. He stressed active steps had been taken against permitting clearance for local students to study in any madrassas in the country.

"No Maldivians right now are being trained in Pakistani madrassas. Steps are being taken to ensure this with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and authorities in Pakistan," he said. "We will not issue visas to go there in this regard. So to say that such a threat exists is definitely not true."

Key threats

In addressing other key threats to the nation, Abbas claimed that the incursion of pirates from Somalia into the Maldives' territories on two reported occasions, as well as human trafficking resulting from organized crime were seen as "particular dangers".

"The threat we currently face from pirates and traffickers is being dealt with via existing legislation, as well as some new amendments that have presently been proposed in parliament," he said.

Abbas said the new government had not opted to make any drastic changes to existing counter-terror policy enacted under former President Mohamed Nasheed's administration.

"We will not be making a 180 degree reversal on the last government's stance," he said, adding that a focus on further legislation would be sought under President Dr Mohamed Waheed Hassan.

US State Department view

According to the US State Department, the American government was partnering with Maldivian counterparts in attempts to "strengthen" law enforcement in the Indian Ocean nation. The US was also said to back establishing community outreach schemes based around countering terrorist ideologies, as the state department stressed alleged radicalism remained a concern in the Maldives.

"The government believes that hundreds of young Maldivians attended madrassas in Pakistan and Saudi Arabia, and was concerned that these students were bringing home radical ideology," stated the report. Two Maldivians, in separate instances in March and October, were arrested in Sri Lanka on charges linked to terrorism. Their cases were pending at year's end."

One of the suspects, Mohamed Ameen, was released from police custody in May this year by the criminal court after it did not issue an extension to his detention period.

Local media reported that the suspect was released by the court "on the condition that he not get involved in any further terrorist activities, and not leave the country."

Beyond legislation, the report also pointed to the signing of an agreement signed with Malaysia-based IT group Nexbis to install a new border control system with an integrated database in an effort to try and combat human trafficking into the country.

"However, alleged corruption concerns and subsequent legal proceedings made it unclear when the system would be installed," the report stated.

The Maldives was last month included on the US State Department's Tier Two Watch List for Human Trafficking for a third year in a row.

The US State Department added that the Maldives, during 2011, had become a partner in its Antiterrorism Assistance programme focused on training in areas such as "counterterrorism leadership", as well as regional cooperation with other authorities.

The report also noted the Maldives inclusion in the regional Asia/Pacific Group on Money Laundering, where it had been submitting annual updates on its work.

"Maldives underwent a mutual evaluation conducted by the International Monetary Fund (IMF), and the final evaluation report was adopted by the members in July 2011. Maldivian law does not criminalize money laundering apart from a small provision in the Drugs Act. The Maldives Financial Intelligence Unit took the lead in drafting an Anti-Money Laundering and Combating Financing of Terrorism act with assistance from the IMF," the report stated.

"The draft bill was sent to the Attorney General's Office in July 2010 and was sent back to the Maldives Police Services and the prosecutor general for review and comment. In July 2011, Maldives Financial Transactions Reporting came into effect, which aims to safeguard Maldives financial and payment systems from being used to promote acts of terrorism and money laundering, and to protect financial services and products from being used to conceal the proceeds of crime."

According to the state department, the UN 1267/1989 and 1988 consolidated lists detailing individuals or entities with associations to the Taleban and Al-Qa'idah had also been sent to the Maldives Monetary Authority (MMA) through the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The MMA was said to have instructed banks creditors to then take action on the matter with a set time frame, according to the report.

As part of the US State Department's findings during 2011, recognition was also given to efforts made by the Maldives government to pursue initiatives and mechanisms designed to counter "violent extremism".

"The Ministry of Islamic Affairs implemented a programme designed to mobilize religious and social leaders to work against all forms of violence in society, including religious extremism that leads to violence," stated the report. "The Ministry conducted over 15 seminars and workshops for religious leaders, educators, and local government officials. Several of these workshops included participants from across the country.

"Ideological problems"

Islamic Affairs Minister Sheikh Mohamed Shaheem Ali Saeed said in June that he was seeking to counter the "ideological problems" of extremism in the country.

Shaheem claimed that the threat of home-grown terrorism was a key issue needing to be addressed in the Maldives - something he alleged the previous government under former President Nasheed had neglected to assist with through funding.

"The previous government did not give us the budget we needed to run programmes to address these issues," he said at the time. "There are problems here with extremism and terrorism, these are ideological problems that need to be targeted through religious awareness campaigns."

Shaheem himself previously served under the Nasheed government as Islamic State Minister before resigning in December 2010 over differences of opinion with the administration over issues such as claims it was strengthening links with Israel.

However, the now opposition Maldivian Democratic Party (MDP) - to which Nasheed remains the current presidential candidate - was sceptical of the commitments of religious figures attached to the Waheed administration. It contends the government came to power on 7 February in a "coup d'etat".

Party Spokesperson and MP [Member of Parliament] Hamid Abdul Ghafoor claimed that with the MDP failing to recognize the legitimacy of the current government, the same was true for ministerial appointments like Sheikh Shaheem.

Ghafoor also alleged that issues such as Islamic fundamentalism were a well established tool used during the 30 year rule of former President Maumoon Abdul Gayoom to pit different factions in the country against each other, something he believed was once again happening with the present government.

"I see Shaheem as a just a little cog inserted into the larger machine of Gayoom's political control," he said.

Source: Minivan News website, Male, in English 02 Aug 12

LOAD-DATE: August 3, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2012 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

17 of 492 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

August 1, 2012 Wednesday

LAO SEX RING EXPOSED

BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 1024 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, DC

The following information was released by Radio Free Asia:

In a screen grab from a YouTube video, Chuvit Kamolvisit discloses the discovery of the Lao girls, July 29, 2012.

A Thai official has claimed that more than 500 underage Lao girls are working as sex slaves in eastern Thailand, saying that authorities in both countries need to step up the fight against human trafficking.

Chuvit Kamolvisit, a Thai member of parliament and advocate for social issues, said that the girls, aged 13 to 18 years, were discovered in a karaoke bar in the Chachoengsao district of Chachoengsao province.

"A total of more than 500 Lao child prostitutes were found in the area of Chachoengsao, with the youngest only 13 years old," he said.

"The place they were held in was a one-floor building set up as a karaoke bar, with a restaurant as a front business."

Chuvit said he had video footage to back his claims. It was recorded on a hidden camera that was taken into the karaoke bar as part of an effort to compel concerned officials and police to tackle the problem of human trafficking.

A local television station broadcast Chuvit disclosing information about the Lao girls and showing the undated video footage on Sunday.

It is believed that the girls are still working in the karaoke bar.

But Thai Deputy Prime Minister Chalerm Yubamrung denied Chuvit's claims in a statement to the Thai media, saying no such karaoke bar existed.

The police chief in Chachoengsao province also denied existence of any such place but acknowledged that in the past there had been karaoke restaurants with Lao girls working as waitresses and involved in prostitution.

The police had cracked down on the activities, detaining several suspects about a month ago and closing down many restaurants, he said.

The Lao Embassy in Bangkok said it had not received any official confirmation of the report from Thai authorities, though a staffer acknowledged having heard the claims on a television news broadcast.

An official with the Lao Internal Security department contacted by RFA refused to comment on Chuvit's claims.

MP Chuvit said that some 50 karaoke bars exist in Chachoengsao, with each bar holding about 30 Lao girls, most of whom are in possession of a passport issued by their home country.

He said that the girls usually travel to Chachoengsao from Louang Prabang and Vientiane provinces in Laos, entering Thailand legally on a tourist visa, which allows them to stay in the country for 30 days.

Chuvit was a former businessman who became wealthy through the massage parlor industry in Thailand before becoming a politician based on his advocacy work on social issues, including illicit gambling and prostitution.

The member of parliament claimed that human trafficking had grown in his country due to the complicity of Thai authorities, who he said often look the other way or have a hand in the large profits that can be reaped from sex slavery.

"Human trafficking has expanded because some officials in the police immigration department and local police have an interest in the trade," he said.

Chuvit said he was concerned by the ease with which Lao girls can enter the country and become victims of human trafficking, and called on the authorities of both countries to work together in solving the problem.

Word of mouth

A Lao expert on human trafficking and women issues said that regardless of who smoothes the path for these girls to enter Thailand, one of the biggest problems to address was their lack of education about the dangers of human trafficking.

The expert said that Lao girls are often lured to Thailand with the promise of work through their social contacts and by word of mouth.

"These are people that they trust, which makes them easy to follow without doing any research into what really is going on," the expert said.

"These young girls have no idea what their arrival in Thailand holds in store for them, and most of them have never been to Thailand, so when they get there they have no choice but to listen to the people who brought them there."

And an official from a Thai nongovernmental organization that focuses on human trafficking said that while the Lao government has made efforts to combat the problem, it has not produced laws that are far-reaching enough to make a real difference.

He said that an anti-trafficking law which is being drafted in Laos will help limit the activities of traffickers in some ways, but falls short because it will not include more restrictions on the ability of Laotians to travel to Thailand.

"If the draft law is adopted as it stands, it will only address domestic issues," he said.

"I don't believe the law will reduce human trafficking because most people from Laos can still enter Thailand easily."

He called on Lao officials to take measures which included more scrutiny of Lao girls traveling to Thailand to look for work and targeting officials who have assisted traffickers.

The Lao draft law on human trafficking is currently under review and is likely to be put into law by 2014.

Trafficking report

In June, the U.S. State Department maintained Laos at "Tier 2" in its annual report on human trafficking. The department says governments of countries in that group do not fully comply with minimum standards for protecting trafficking victims, but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards.

Laos has stepped up efforts to investigate trafficking offenses and to prosecute and punish traffickers, the report said.

It said inefficiencies within the Lao bureaucracy delayed approvals for nongovernmental organizations to implement anti-trafficking projects and that the prime minister has yet to approve a final draft of the anti-trafficking national plan of action.

The United Nations has said human trafficking remains the second largest illegal trade next to drugs, with traffickers earning tens of billions of U.S. dollars annually. It also estimated that 2.5 million trafficked people worldwide come from the Asia-Pacific region.

Reported by Nontarat and Apichart for RFA's Lao service. Translated by Somnet Inthapannha and Bounchanh Mouangkham. Written in English by Joshua Lipis.

LOAD-DATE: August 1, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 States News Service

18 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Malaysia General News

July 30, 2012 Monday

SINGAPOREAN'S JAIL SENTENCE FOR SMUGGLING BOY UPHELD

LENGTH: 482 words

DATELINE: PUTRAJAYA July 30

A Singaporean taxi driver was sent to prison to serve a four-year term for smuggling an 11-year-old boy of a Chinese national to Germany, via the Kuala Lumpur International Airport (KLIA).

Describing human trafficking as a grave offence, Court of Appeal president Tan Sri Raus Md Shariff, chairing a three-man bench, unanimously dismissed Ng Gim Teck's final appeal to set aside a decision of the Shah Alam High Court which enhanced his jail term from six months to four years.

He was sentenced to six months' jail and fined RM20,000 in default six months jail, by the Sepang Sessions Court when he pleaded guilty to the charge of smuggling Zhang Xu at the Immigration Counter, Departure Hall, level 4, KLIA, Sepang, Selangor at 7pm on Sept 29, last year.

However, his jail sentence was enhanced to four years by the Shah Alam High Court on Nov 11, last year, upon revision by the prosecution over the inadequacy of the jail sentence. The RM20,000 fine imposed by the Sessions Court was maintained.

Ng paid the fine. However, he brought the matter up for appeal to the Appeals Court over the enhancement of his jail term.

The other two judges presiding on the panel were Datuk K. N. Segara and Datuk Azhar Ma'ah.

Deputy Public Prosecutor Farah Ezlin Yusop Khan told the court that investigations showed that Ng intended to smuggle the boy to Germany via KLIA.

He was caught by immigration department officials as he had in his possession, the boy's fake Singaporean passport.

She said there was no record to show his purpose of smuggling the boy but usually, it was for sexual purposes.

When Azhar asked his purpose of smuggling the boy, Ng replied he was asked to do so, by a friend.

Farah Ezlin said, according to the 12th Annual Trafficking In Persons Report, Malaysia was currently in the Tier 2 Watch List for the third year after getting a waiver.

"We were able to come up with a plan to combat human trafficking. This would be the third year that our country is placed at the Tier 2 Watch List," she added.

Farah Ezlin said the High Court judge was correct in enhancing the jail term after taking into consideration that the image of the country was tarnished as Malaysia was currently ranked in the Tier 2 Watch List.

"We are seen by the western world as not being serious in combatting this matter at hand. Therefore, it is our contention that the High Court enhancing the imprisonment period, is one way of showing to the world how serious we are in curbing this matter.

"It is pertinent for our country to portray a strict implementation of the law. By giving a heavier sentence, it would operate as a deterrent sentence which is not only as a lesson to the appellant (Ng) but also to those offenders or potential offenders at large," she said.

She said the offence committed by Ng was a serious one.

Ng, who was unrepresented, pleaded to the court to reduce his jail term, saying he had a sick mother.

LOAD-DATE: July 30, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Pertubuhan Berita Nasional Malaysia
All Rights Reserved

19 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Himalayan Times

July 27, 2012 Friday

Report paints gloomy picture

BYLINE: HIMALAYAN NEWS SERVICE

LENGTH: 406 words

KATHMANDU: Trafficking in women and children continues unabated despite the public awareness campaign and police crackdown on traffickers.

According to Maiti Nepal, a non-government organisation working for girls and women, the total number of trafficking deaths in 2011 was 25.

Till the end of June in 2012, trafficking has already claimed 21 lives. With the average half yearly calculation of both years, trafficking cases have increased 42 per cent.

The half-yearly data of Maiti Nepal also indicate the increase in domestic violence in the country.

The total cases of domestic violence reported in 2011 were 843, while till the end of June in 2012, there were 470 such cases. On an average, domestic violence in 2012 has increased 11 per cent.

The data also paint a gloomy picture of rape. The total number of reported rape cases in 2011 was 25, whereas in 2012 till the end of June, the number is 14.

If the trend continues, the rape case is expected to increase 14 per cent in 2012.

Although violence against women existed in the past, most cases would go unreported due to deep-rooted patriarchy, social values and culture, and fear of stigma and discrimination, Bishwo Khadka, director of the organisation, said. "However, awareness and empowerment programmes have encouraged women to become alert and concerned about their rights. More cases are reported these days."

A recent Trafficking in Person (TIP) report published by the US Department of State has placed Nepal in TIER 2. It described Nepal mainly as a source of country for men, women and children, who are subjected to forced labour and sex trafficking. According to the report, Nepali men are subjected to forced labour, most often in the Middle East and, to a lesser extent, within the country. Nepali women and girls are subjected to sex trafficking in Nepal, India and the Middle East, and are also subjected to forced labour in Nepal and India as domestic servants. They are subjected to sex trafficking in other Asian destinations as well.

The report also indicated the increasing number of Nepali minor girls being trafficked to Gulf countries with fake documents in recent times.

Maiti Nepal said they have reported many cases in which girls below the age of 15 are presented as 22-year-olds in legal documents.

The Central Investigation Bureau of Nepal Police had intercepted as many as nine underage girls at the Tribhuvan International Airport in the past one year.

LOAD-DATE: July 28, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 Himalayan Times, distributed by Contify.com
All Rights Reserved

20 of 492 DOCUMENTS

BusinessWorld

July 25, 2012 Wednesday

Binay commits to enhanced service

BYLINE: Noemi M. Gonzales

SECTION: Pg. S1/11

LENGTH: 575 words

EFFORTS TO assist Overseas Filipino Workers (OFWs), intensify the crackdown against human trafficking and address the housing backlog will be continued as Vice-President Jejomar C. Binay yesterday outlined his accomplishments for the past two years.

In his report released to media, Mr. Binay said he has secured the repatriation of thousands of OFWs from Saudi Arabia, many of whom have overstayed.

As presidential adviser on OFW concerns, the Vice-President said a technical working group had finalized the guidelines on blood money or diyah which is paid as compensation for the private aspect of murder, homicide and manslaughter committed by Filipinos in Arab nations.

The guidelines are awaiting approval of President Benigno S. C. Aquino III.

The Philippines, he added, retained its Tier 2 status in the 2012 Global Trafficking in Persons Report of the United States Department of State as a result of efforts by the Inter Agency Council Against Trafficking (IACAT) and the Presidential Task Force Against Illegal Recruitment. He chairs both groups.

The IACAT, as lead entity against human trafficking, coordinated and monitored the trafficking cases filed in court. By 2012, the IACAT secured 44 convictions for trafficking-related cases with a total of 58 persons convicted, Mr. Binay said.

"This shows that our government is serious and sincere in its efforts to protect our kababayans and bring to justice those who try to take advantage of them," he said in the report.

In the housing sector, Mr. Binay, as chairman of the Housing and Land Use Regulatory Board (HLURB), vowed to address the 3.6 million housing backlog within 10 years.

To achieve this, the Vice-President said partnerships with local government units (LGUs) and various organizations have been forged, in particular with agencies involved in home financing such as the Home Development Mutual Fund (Pag-IBIG) and the Government Service Insurance System.

HLURB also introduced a cluster approach to fast-track the preparation or updating of Comprehensive Land Use Plans (CLUP) and Zoning Ordinances (ZO) of LGUs.

"The CLUP and the ZO identify land areas for residential-particularly socialized housing-agricultural, industrial, commercial and institutional purposes. They also incorporate measures for climate-change adaptation, and disaster risk reduction and mitigation," the report said.

From July 2010 to May 2012, HLURB assisted 977 LGUs with their CLUP and ZO. The agency exceeded the target of 665 for the same period and aims to reach zero backlog by 2013, the report said.

Other achievements cited by Mr. Binay in his report were:

- . * the revival of the au pair program, a scheme whereby Filipinos perform housework and child care and receive monetary allowance with their host families, with the passage of new guidelines on the departure of au pairs in February 2012 that provide "safety nets for their protection without restricting their rights to self-improvement," added to this is the recommendation to Malacanang to exempt these workers from paying travel tax and airport terminal fee;
- . * a scholarship grant-in-aid program for students in state colleges and universities;
- . * financial assistance for the construction and repair of senior citizen centers nationwide; and
- . * cleansing the housing sector of graft and corruption with the filing of syndicated estafa charges against property developer Globe Asiatique, including owner Delfin Lee who has a standing arrest warrant.

LOAD-DATE: July 24, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 BusinessWorld Publishing Corporation
All Rights Reserved

21 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

July 13, 2012 Friday

Uganda; Fighting Human Trafficking

BYLINE: New Vision (Kampala)

LENGTH: 305 words

Questions such as, can you find human trafficking in Uganda or is it a myth, causes of human trafficking, and how do traffickers make money will be debated, argued and dissected during the 'Capacity Building Workshop for the National Task Force' and other government officials involved in fighting human trafficking.

The program manager of the American Bar Association's Rule of Law Initiative (ABA ROLI), Dorah Caroline said Kampala will also focus on what is the human traffickers business model and how government can combat human trafficking.

She said in a statement on Wednesday that 2012 has seen Uganda make significant strides in her efforts to combat trafficking in persons.

In February this year, the internal affairs ministry designated the prevention of Trafficking in Persons (TIP) office.

Two months later in April, the National Task Force and Steering and Policy Committees were inaugurated.

"Setting up a three-tier governmental structure to address TIP issues and implement the Prevention of Trafficking In Persons Act of 2009 (PTIP Act) are some of the big strides government has made," Mafabi said.

Even with such developments, she cautioned that the mechanisms and structures will only be effective and efficient if government is equipped technically and logistically to combat human trafficking.

Government officials should be armed with knowledge to fight the vice.

ABA ROLI is a non-profit program founded on the belief that rule of law promotion is the most effective long-term antidote to the most pressing problems facing the world today.

Among the problems the program looks at are poverty, conflict, endemic corruption and disregard for human rights.

It implements legal reform programs in over 50 countries in Africa, Asia, Europe and Eurasia, Latin America and the Caribbean, and the Middle East and North Africa.

LOAD-DATE: July 13, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

22 of 492 DOCUMENTS

New Vision (Kampala)

July 13, 2012

Fighting Human Trafficking

BYLINE: Darius Magara

LENGTH: 305 words

Questions such as, can you find human trafficking in Uganda or is it a myth, causes of human trafficking, and how do traffickers make money will be debated, argued and dissected during the 'Capacity Building Workshop for the National Task Force' and other government officials involved in fighting human trafficking.

The program manager of the American Bar Association's Rule of Law Initiative (ABA ROLI), Dorah Caroline said Kampala will also focus on what is the human traffickers business model and how government can combat human trafficking.

She said in a statement on Wednesday that 2012 has seen Uganda make significant strides in her efforts to combat trafficking in persons.

In February this year, the internal affairs ministry designated the prevention of Trafficking in Persons (TIP) office.

Two months later in April, the National Task Force and Steering and Policy Committees were inaugurated.

"Setting up a three-tier governmental structure to address TIP issues and implement the Prevention of Trafficking In Persons Act of 2009 (PTIP Act) are some of the big strides government has made," Mafabi said.

Even with such developments, she cautioned that the mechanisms and structures will only be effective and efficient if government is equipped technically and logistically to combat human trafficking.

Government officials should be armed with knowledge to fight the vice.

ABA ROLI is a non-profit program founded on the belief that rule of law promotion is the most effective long-term antidote to the most pressing problems facing the world today.

Among the problems the program looks at are poverty, conflict, endemic corruption and disregard for human rights.

It implements legal reform programs in over 50 countries in Africa, Asia, Europe and Eurasia, Latin America and the Caribbean, and the Middle East and North Africa.

LOAD-DATE: July 13, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

23 of 492 DOCUMENTS

South China Morning Post

July 9, 2012 Monday

Trafficking cloud hovers over HK

SECTION: NEWS; Editorial; Pg. 12

LENGTH: 343 words

The Security Bureau has taken issue with a closely watched annual report on human trafficking by the US State Department, which says Hong Kong has failed to make any discernible progress in enforcement of the law against sex trafficking or labour trafficking. "Over the years, there was no difference ... in the trend of human trafficking," said a Security Bureau spokesman, although he confirmed that police had recently broken up two trafficking syndicates. Since it is difficult to reconcile those two statements let us assume that the truth, as usual, lies somewhere in between. As a result, the State Department dropped the city from tier one to tier two on a three-tier scale of performance in combating human trafficking, placing it in the company of Russia, Ukraine, Iran, Congo, Indonesia and Cambodia. That is not good for the reputation of a city that prides itself on upholding the rule of law and human rights.

The report also said that fees gouged from foreign domestic helpers in return for job placement in Hong Kong can lead to debt bondage and their unknowing involvement in trafficking by their employers and immigration offences. Solicitor Mike Vidler, who has represented helpers caught in this trap, says the emphasis is on charging them with immigration offences rather than the crime of human trafficking.

No one has an accurate idea of the extent of trafficking, mostly of women and children for prostitution and forced labour. It is not long since the State Department praised Hong Kong for its efforts - despite concerns about organised gangs bringing women here from Southeast Asian countries for prostitution. On the face of it, it is difficult to dismiss suspicions that some unsavoury and unscrupulous people are profiting from involvement in sex tourism to Hong Kong and exploitation of helpers saddled with crushing debt. If the State Department report serves any practical purpose, it might be to spur governments generally to do better in targeting legislation at a form of slavery in a 21st century setting and enforcing it.

LOAD-DATE: July 9, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

24 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

July 6, 2012 Friday

Eritrea; Foreign Affairs Statement on U.S. Lobby at UN

BYLINE: Shabait.com (Asmara)

LENGTH: 1346 words

1. The current UN Human Rights Session in Geneva was virtually turned into a venue for intensive lobbying by US State Department officials in their dogged attempts to sully Eritrea's image and to ram through a "resolution" to condemn it for numerous, fabricated, allegations of "gross violation of human rights". This new ploy originates from the desire to open a "new front" so as to tighten, or at least maintain, the unwarranted UN Security Council Resolutions (1907 and 2023) that the US had managed to impose against Eritrea in the past three years. The timing is deliberately calibrated to coincide with the pending review of these resolutions by the UN Security Council in July or August.
2. Earlier in the preceding weeks, the US mission to New York employed heavy-handed means to compel the UN Secretary General's Office to withdraw the Report on Eritrea that was issued on 8 June last month. Operative Paragraph 19 of Resolution 2023 requests the Secretary General "to report within 180 days on Eritrea's compliance with the provisions" of these resolutions. The Report under consideration was issued formally on that date in accordance with this directive and after it went through the usual consultation processes. Yet the US Representative to the UN reportedly resorted to unorthodox tactics to pressurize the Secretary General's Office to remove the Report from the UN website and to meekly inform UNSC members that a "revised report" will be resubmitted in early July. Several members of the Security Council questioned the "rationale and wisdom of the embarrassing act", warned that the "unhelpful precedence would entail undesirable ramifications", and urged for the case to be handled with "transparency, neutrality and objectivity".
3. On June 26, the "Somalia Eritrea Monitoring Group" submitted its report to the UN Sanctions Committee. As it will be recalled, Eritrea had requested for the replacement of this body as it was found wanting in the minimum standards of neutrality, objectivity, professionalism and credibility. But this is not the point here. As long as the "Monitoring Group" is authorized to submit its lopsided reports, Eritrea has the right and should at any time have unfettered access to these reports. This is a matter of principle and law. Established procedures and the principle of "equality of arms" indeed dictate that Eritrea receive, in real time, copies of any accusations leveled against it. However, pressure from the same US officials prevented the Chair of the UN Sanctions Committee from observing this rudimentary right and to ignore, with profuse regrets, Eritrea's express requests.
4. In the same vein, US Secretary of State falsely blamed Eritrea on June 16th for "human trafficking" including it in its blacklist of 16 other countries. Leaving aside whether the United States has the moral or legal prerogatives to categorize sovereign countries for whatever "misdeeds" it chooses to pick out, its accusations of Eritrea for "human trafficking" is baffling at best. The fact is Washington has been openly pursuing, in the past years, a hostile policy of enticing Eritrean youth to seek asylum in the United States. The US Bureau for Refugee Affairs allocates, on an annual basis, around 10,000 slots for "Eritrean potential applicants who dodge military draft" for asylum in the United States. US Embassies in Khartoum and Nairobi routinely issue entry visas for Eritreans without verifying whether they have exit visas from their home country in contravention of normative consular practices. It is thus the United States which is culpable for an elaborate programme of "human trafficking" to advance its sinister objectives in Eritrea and the region.
5. On July 3, the UN Sanctions Committee included the personal details of two Eritrean military officials in its new list of persons allegedly "associated with terrorist activities" in Somalia. The circulated document does not indicate who the plaintiffs are. Nor does it establish the veracity of the allegations. It merely tries to ensure, through what is known as a "silent motion", to validate the accusations "unless there is an objection from a member State of the Sanctions Committee within 48 hours". Again, the game plan and sinister ploys are transparent. The Eritrean military officials are targeted not because there is a shred of truth or material evidence to the false accusations heaped upon them, but mainly because it evokes the message and impression, at least in outward appearances, of a "tightening" sanctions regime.

6. Furthermore, US spiraling hostilities have gone beyond defamatory media and diplomatic campaigns. In the past few months, Washington has incessantly encouraged the regime in Ethiopia to launch publicized and reckless military intrusions and assaults on sovereign Eritrean territories. The primary purpose behind these provocative acts of aggression is to create an environment of confrontation and instability, and thereby dilute in the fog of war, Ethiopia's legal culpability for its continued occupation of sovereign Eritrean territories in contravention of the UN Charter and international law. But in addition, the audacious publicity of these acts, which were often accompanied by subtle US diplomatic cover-ups, is aimed at legitimizing and depicting these blatant acts of aggression as "proportionate and lawful measures of self-defense".

The hostile acts enumerated above are part and parcel of the persistent policy of the United States to destabilize Eritrea and to undermine its sovereignty and territorial integrity in pursuit of its misguided regional objectives and strategies. As we have underlined in several of our previous communications, sovereign Eritrean territories, including the town of Badme, remain occupied by the Ethiopian regime in contravention of international law. The flagrant acts of occupation and aggression by the regime in Ethiopia would have long solicited appropriate punitive action by the Security Council in accordance with the provisions of applicable articles of the UN Charter and the Algiers Peace Agreement. This did not occur principally because in reality the main culprits were, and remain, successive US Administrations who have long decided to compromise and undermine international law and the fundamental rights of a UN member State in pursuit of their narrow regional interests and objectives.

As we have explained extensively by Eritrea in its previous communications, it is indeed a travesty of justice when the very victim of aggression and occupation is falsely framed for "acts of regional destabilization" to become a target of punitive sanctions that have no basis in law and fact. But that is precisely what has transpired in the last three years when the Security Council imposed

Resolutions 1907 and 2023 on Eritrea on account of overbearing US diplomatic and political clout.

The litany of these ongoing US-inspired accusations and vitriolic diplomatic campaigns against Eritrea constitute a continuation and escalation of these well trodden ploys and patterns. They are singularly aimed at fabricating new cases and opening new platforms, such as the UN Human Rights Council, for entangling Eritrea in a web of unlawful sanctions and agonizing environments. If these ploys are tolerated with impunity, the ultimate casualty will be international justice and the rule of law

In the event, the Government of Eritrea urges all Governments to use their influences to:

1. Ensure the respect of international law and compel Ethiopia to withdraw from the occupied territories; respect the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Eritrea and desist from all provocative acts of aggression and military intrusion;
2. Lift the unfair sanctions that have been imposed against Eritrea as a result of the US-engineered Resolutions 1907 and 2023.

3. Ensure that the UN Security Council and other UN institutions are not inappropriately and unlawfully instrumentalised by the United States to advance its misguided policies against Eritrea.

Ministry of Foreign Affairs

Asmara, 6 July 2012

LOAD-DATE: July 9, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

Copyright 2012 AllAfrica, Inc.

25 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

July 6, 2012 Friday 10:04 AM GMT

Thai pregnant migrant worker plan slammed

LENGTH: 338 words

DATELINE: BANGKOK, July 6 2012

Thai government proposals to deport pregnant migrant workers will heighten discrimination rather than boost the fight against human trafficking, Human Rights Watch said Friday.

Thailand's Labour Ministry recently proposed expelling migrant workers, believing they will receive better care in their own countries.

The rights group said the measure was floated in response to the US State Department's recent classification of Thailand in "Tier 2" of its watch list, a status for countries demonstrating poor efforts to stamp out human trafficking.

"It's an idea to send them back home because they can receive better care while they are pregnant so that mothers will not have health problems," Somkiat Chayasriwong, permanent secretary to the Labour Ministry, told AFP.

"We have set up committee to study in detail how to take care pregnant migrant workers at this stage," he added.

But the proposal has provoked fury among rights groups who decry the scheme's potential to worsen the lot of migrants, while simultaneously failing to tackle the root causes of people trafficking.

"The labour minister's plan has nothing to do with stopping human trafficking but will cause further discrimination against women migrant workers," said Brad Adams, Asia director at Human Rights Watch.

"Prime Minister Yingluck should immediately direct the Labor Ministry to drop this unlawful and thoroughly bad idea."

If it is sincere about tackling the trafficking scourge, Thailand should ensure the children of migrants go to school while cracking down on government officials and labour recruiters who hire victims, he added.

Last month's State Department report criticised Thailand for failing to respond to trafficking -- mostly from neighbouring countries -- into work as forced prostitutes, beggars and labourers in fishing industry and factories.

The report highlighted Thailand's failure to identify and protect victims adding "the government has not shown evidence of increasing efforts to address human trafficking" compared to 2011.

ask-abd/apj/emb

LOAD-DATE: July 7, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

26 of 492 DOCUMENTS

The Nation (Thailand)

July 6, 2012 Friday

ministry's proposed plan for pregnant migrant workers misguided: cRITICSBYLINE: The NationLENGTH: 390 words

Henry Lewis

The Nation

Non-governmental organisations and the academia spoke up against the Labour Ministry's plan to deport migrant workers who get pregnant while in Thailand, at a discussion yesterday.

The ministry initiated this policy as a response to Thailand's inclusion, for the third consecutive year, in the United States' Tier 2 watch-list for countries with human-trafficking issues in its annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report.

The three speakers at the forum all agreed that the ministry's plan would not provide a long-term solution. The speakers were Tatiya Likitwong, coordinator of the Foundation for Child Development; Kritaya Archavanitkul, professor for the Institute for Population and Social Research at Mahidol University; and Tatsanai Kantayaporn, representative of the Programmes for Appropriate Technology in Health (PATH).

The discussion was held yesterday at the Thai Journalist Association Headquarters.

"This law splits up families, forcing stable couples in Thailand to stay apart for at least six months," Tatiya said. "Then, if the children are left behind with relatives in their home countries, they grow up without proper resources and end up causing more problems in the future by either getting trafficked or working as traffickers.

"This policy is championed as an effective way to fight child labour, but there are much better ways than this one, like the Education Ministry's recently drafted plan allowing any child, regardless of their citizenship or legal status, to go to school."

Kritaya, meanwhile, talked about the danger of making more migrants cross Thai borders, even if it is to their own home country.

"This policy promotes the crossing of the border, so pregnant mothers will return to Thailand after delivering their baby at home. Research shows that people crossing the border have a lot to do with human trafficking. Hence, when a young woman crosses the border with a baby, claiming it is hers, it is very difficult to verify if she is really the mother."

Tatsanai also questioned the plan's appropriateness as a response to the TIP report. "Responding to the report is important because there are economic and political ramifications for a nation to be considered a human-trafficking centre, but ,[#x20ac]" as far as I can remember ,[#x20ac]" there is only one mention of child-labour in the report."

LOAD-DATE: July 5, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

27 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Shabait.com (Asmara)

July 06, 2012

Press Release

LENGTH: 1346 words

1. The current UN Human Rights Session in Geneva was virtually turned into a venue for intensive lobbying by US State Department officials in their dogged attempts to sully Eritrea's image and to ram through a "resolution" to condemn it for numerous, fabricated, allegations of "gross violation of human rights". This new ploy originates from the desire to open a "new front" so as to tighten, or at least maintain, the unwarranted UN Security Council Resolutions (1907 and 2023) that the US had managed to impose against Eritrea in the past three years. The timing is deliberately calibrated to coincide with the pending review of these resolutions by the UN Security Council in July or August.

2. Earlier in the preceding weeks, the US mission to New York employed heavy-handed means to compel the UN Secretary General's Office to withdraw the Report on Eritrea that was issued on 8 June last month. Operative Paragraph 19 of Resolution 2023 requests the Secretary General "to report within 180 days on Eritrea's compliance with the provisions" of these resolutions. The Report under consideration was issued formally on that date in accordance with this directive and after it went through the usual consultation processes. Yet the US Representative to the UN reportedly resorted to unorthodox tactics to pressurize the Secretary General's Office to remove the Report from the UN website and to meekly inform UNSC members that a "revised report" will be resubmitted in early July. Several members of the Security Council questioned the "rationale and wisdom of the embarrassing act", warned that the "unhelpful precedence would entail undesirable ramifications", and urged for the case to be handled with "transparency, neutrality and objectivity".

3. On June 26, the "Somalia Eritrea Monitoring Group" submitted its report to the UN Sanctions Committee. As it will be recalled, Eritrea had requested for the replacement of this body as it was found wanting in the minimum standards of neutrality, objectivity, professionalism and credibility. But this is not the point here. As long as the "Monitoring Group" is authorized to submit its lopsided reports, Eritrea has the right and should at any time have unfettered access to these reports. This is a matter of principle and law. Established procedures and the principle of "equality of arms" indeed dictate that Eritrea receive, in real time, copies of any accusations leveled against it. However, pressure from the same US officials prevented the Chair of the UN Sanctions Committee from observing this rudimentary right and to ignore, with profuse regrets, Eritrea's express requests.

4. In the same vein, US Secretary of State falsely blamed Eritrea on June 16th for "human trafficking" including it in its blacklist of 16 other countries. Leaving aside whether the United States has the moral or legal prerogatives to categorize sovereign countries for whatever "misdeeds" it chooses to pick out, its accusations of Eritrea for "human trafficking" is baffling at best. The fact is Washington has been openly pursuing, in the past years, a hostile policy of enticing Eritrean youth to seek asylum in the United States. The US Bureau for Refugee Affairs allocates, on an annual basis, around 10,000 slots for "Eritrean potential applicants who dodge military draft" for asylum in the United States. US Embassies in Khartoum and Nairobi routinely issue visas for Eritreans without verifying whether they have exit visas from their home country in contravention of normative consular practices. It is thus the United States which is culpable for an elaborate programme of "human trafficking" to advance its sinister objectives in Eritrea and the region.

5. On July 3, the UN Sanctions Committee included the personal details of two Eritrean military officials in its new list of persons allegedly "associated with terrorist activities" in Somalia. The circulated document does not indicate who the plaintiffs are. Nor does it establish the veracity of the allegations. It merely tries to ensure, through what is known as a "silent motion", to validate the accusations "unless there is an objection from a member State of the Sanctions Committee within 48 hours". Again, the game plan and sinister ploys are transparent. The Eritrean military officials are targeted not because there is a shred of truth or material evidence to the false accusations heaped upon them, but mainly because it evokes the message and impression, at least in outward appearances, of a "tightening" sanctions regime.

6. Furthermore, US spiraling hostilities have gone beyond defamatory media and diplomatic campaigns. In the past few months, Washington has incessantly encouraged the regime in Ethiopia to launch publicized and reckless military intrusions and assaults on sovereign Eritrean territories. The primary purpose behind these provocative acts of aggression is to create an environment of confrontation and instability, and thereby dilute in the fog of war, Ethiopia's legal culpability for its continued occupation of sovereign Eritrean territories in contravention of the UN Charter and international law. But in addition, the audacious publicity of these acts, which were often accompanied by subtle US diplomatic cover-ups, is aimed at legitimizing and depicting these blatant acts of aggression as "proportionate and lawful measures of self-defense".

The hostile acts enumerated above are part and parcel of the persistent policy of the United States to destabilize Eritrea and to undermine its sovereignty and territorial integrity in pursuit of its misguided regional objectives and strategies. As we have underlined in several of our previous communications, sovereign Eritrean territories, including the town of Badme, remain occupied by the Ethiopian regime in contravention of international law. The flagrant acts of occupation and aggression by the regime in Ethiopia would have long solicited appropriate punitive action by the Security Council in accordance with the provisions of applicable articles of the UN Charter and the Algiers Peace Agreement. This did not occur principally because in reality the main culprits were, and remain, successive US Administrations who have long decided to compromise and undermine international law and the fundamental rights of a UN member State in pursuit of their narrow regional interests and objectives.

As we have explained extensively by Eritrea in its previous communications, it is indeed a travesty of justice when the very victim of aggression and occupation is falsely framed for "acts of regional destabilization" to become a target of punitive sanctions that have no basis in law and fact. But that is precisely what has transpired in the last three years when the Security Council imposed

Resolutions 1907 and 2023 on Eritrea on account of overbearing US diplomatic and political clout.

The litany of these ongoing US-inspired accusations and vitriolic diplomatic campaigns against Eritrea constitute a continuation and escalation of these well trodden ploys and patterns. They are singularly aimed at fabricating new cases and opening new platforms, such as the UN Human Rights Council, for entangling Eritrea in a web of unlawful sanctions and agonizing environments. If these ploys are tolerated with impunity, the ultimate casualty will be international justice and the rule of law

In the event, the Government of Eritrea urges all Governments to use their influences to:

1. Ensure the respect of international law and compel Ethiopia to withdraw from the occupied territories; respect the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Eritrea and desist from all provocative acts of aggression and military intrusion;

2. Lift the unfair sanctions that have been imposed against Eritrea as a result of the US-engineered Resolutions 1907 and 2023.

3. Ensure that the UN Security Council and other UN institutions are not inappropriately and unlawfully instrumentalised by the United States to advance its misguided policies against Eritrea.

Ministry of Foreign Affairs

Asmara, 6 July 2012

LOAD-DATE: July 9, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

All Rights Reserved

28 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Mizzima

July 5, 2012 Thursday

Movie star to fight child trafficking

LENGTH: 619 words

Action movie star Jackie Chan will meet Burmese officials in Rangoon and Mandalay this week to support children who are recovering from human trafficking experiences, says UNICEF.

Chan will visit a vocational training centre for trafficked children who need special care and support. He will also travel to UNICEF-supported projects assisting children at risk of being trafficked, including those without parental care and children who are living and working on the street.

A UNICEF ambassador, Chan will meet officials at the Ministry of Social Welfare, Relief and Resettlement and members of Burma's Police Anti-Trafficking Task Force in Mandalay.

Chan said: "Trafficking and exploiting children are horrific crimes. They leave lifelong scars and rob children of their childhoods. Children are not for sale. For the sake the world's children, we must work hard to stamp out these damaging and criminal practices."

Trafficking exposes children to physical violence, sexual abuse, and grave emotional distress. In East and Southeast Asia the trafficking industry is fueled by demand for cheap or exploitable labour, commercial sex with children, adoption outside legal channels, and forcing women or girls into exploitative marriages, said a UNICEF statement.

Trafficking is also closely linked to migration. Tens of millions of people migrate for work within their own countries and across borders in the region. When they are far away from their homes and support systems, families - and especially children - face an increased risk of being trafficked.

Chan plans to deliver messages about self-protection to young people in Myanmar during his visit.

"It is very important that young people know how to protect themselves," said Chan. "Simple things, like knowing not to trust anyone who promises you a dream job in another country; never going to an unknown place alone; knowing your parents' and your own full name and age; and being able to explain where you live, help children guard against traffickers."

Chan has been a UNICEF Goodwill ambassador since 2004, using his fame as a vehicle to promote humanitarian progress for the most disadvantaged children.

In late June, the U.S. removed Burma from the bottom tier of countries for its efforts to stop human trafficking during the past year, according to a State Department report.

One of the world's worst offenders of human trafficking laws in the past, Burma was urged to continue with its "unprecedented steps" over the past year.

Luis CdeBaca, the U.S. ambassador-at-large for human trafficking issues, said Burma was upgraded after the Parliament repealed an antiquated law that had been used to justify forced labor and replaced it with a law expressly forbidding the practice.

The government also made progress identifying and helping trafficking victims, and a national trafficking hotline introduced in September has led to the rescue of 57 victims. Much of its recent efforts have been undertaken with the cooperation of the International Labour Organization.

However, the report said many Burmese men, women and children who travel abroad for work are subjected to forced labor or sex trafficking, as trafficking by both private individuals and government officials "continues to be a significant problem."

The country is taking steps to alleviate Burma's chronic underdevelopment and lack of jobs, said the report, but trafficking within Burma by both government officials and private actors continues, including involvement by military personnel and militant ethnic groups.

The Burmese government does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, the State Department said, but "it is making significant steps to do so."

LOAD-DATE: August 17, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Mizzima
All Rights Reserved

29 of 492 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

July 5, 2012 Thursday

THAILAND: DON'T DEPORT PREGNANT MIGRANT WORKERSBYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 952 wordsDATELINE: NEW YORK, N.Y.

The following information was released by Human Rights Watch:

Brad Adams, Asia director

Thailand's government should scrap the labor ministers proposed regulation to deport migrant workers who become pregnant, Human Rights Watch said today. The proposal discriminates against women workers and would not advance the government of Prime Minister Yingluck Shinawatra's stated aim of reducing human trafficking.

On June 26, 2012, Labor Minister Padermchai Sasomsap announced a plan to send home migrant workers who authorities learn are three to four months pregnant. He stated that this would curb the use of migrant child labor by reducing the number of migrant children in Thailand. He maintained this measure would help respond to the US State Department's recent classification of Thailand in the Tier 2 Watch List as a country making consistently poor efforts to eliminate human trafficking.

The labor ministers plan has nothing to do with stopping human trafficking but will cause further discrimination against women migrant workers, said Brad Adams, Asia director at Human Rights Watch. Prime Minister Yingluck should immediately direct the Labor Ministry to drop this unlawful and thoroughly bad idea.

On June 19, the US State Department released its annual report on human trafficking, which criticized Thailand for its failure to prevent and respond to trafficking into forced prostitution, forced begging, and forced labor, especially in the fishing industry, domestic work, and factories. The report highlighted Thailand's failure to identify and protect victims and concluded that the country's migrant labor policies continued to create vulnerabilities to trafficking and disincentives to victims to communicate with authorities.

Human Rights Watch's 2010 report From the Tiger to the Crocodile: Abuse of Migrant Workers in Thailand found that undocumented migrants are particularly vulnerable to trafficking due to unregistered, unscrupulous brokers, lack of valid travel documents, fear of authorities, and limited information about their rights and where to get help.

Thailand has a long list of actions to take if it really wants to stop trafficking, such as ensuring that migrant children can go to school, cracking down on abusive government officials and labor recruiters, and providing better protection for trafficking victims, Adams said. Adopting such measures, rather than deporting pregnant migrant workers, would be the best way forward.

While the labor ministers proposal does not bar pregnant migrants from working, it penalizes them by forcing them to stop work for several months and return to their home countries to give birth. This deprives migrant women, often from poor backgrounds, of equal work opportunities and income. They may also face uncertainty regarding the ability to reclaim their job upon return and additional expenses related to travel and recruitment fees.

Padermchai's plan has reportedly created panic among pregnant migrant workers, the vast majority of whom come from neighboring countries of Burma, Cambodia, and Laos. Many fear they will lose their jobs and be deported, Human Rights Watch said. Service providers are concerned that some migrant women may risk unsafe abortions as their only option to stay employed. Women migrant workers in Thailand often lack access to adequate reproductive health services, including contraception.

Thai law criminalizes abortion in most circumstances except in cases of rape or to protect the mothers health. Unsafe abortion can cause serious injury, disability, and in some cases death among migrant women workers. According to the Thai Public Health Ministry, nearly 1,000 women die each year from fatal infections caused by incomplete abortions.

Governments are obligated under international human rights law to ensure that women have the same employment opportunities as men and cannot be dismissed from jobs because of pregnancy. These standards are established by the Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), ratified by Thailand in 1985, and core labor standards of the International Labor Organization (ILO). The committee of independent experts overseeing CEDAW stated in its General Recommendation No. 26 that governments should ensure that women migrant workers have the same rights and protections extended to all workers in the country and should lift bans prohibiting migrant workers from getting pregnant.

The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, which Thailand ratified in 1996, provides that citizens and non-citizens both benefit from the general requirement of non-discrimination. The Human Rights Committee, the international expert body that monitors compliance with the Covenant, stated in its General Comment No. 15 that while states are entitled to admit or deny entry of persons, in certain circumstances an alien may enjoy the protection of the Covenant even in relation to entry or residence when considerations of non-discrimination, prohibition of inhuman treatment and respect for family life arise. Depriving pregnant migrant women of their employment and separating them from their families by deporting them, meets that threshold.

A working group under the Labor Ministrys Department of Labor Protection and Welfare has two months to draft regulations for the implementation of this proposal. Human Rights Watch called upon foreign embassies and UN agencies in Bangkok to urge the Thai government to rescind the proposal.

Forcing pregnant migrant workers to leave their jobs flies in the face of Thailand's international legal obligations, Adams said. Adoption of this plan would further tarnish Thailand's poor record in protecting migrant workers rights.

Share

LOAD-DATE: July 6, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

30 of 492 DOCUMENTS

BusinessWorld

July 3, 2012 Tuesday

Drive vs human trafficking obtains budgetary support

BYLINE: Aubrey E. Barrameda

SECTION: Pg. S1/11

LENGTH: 552 words

THE GOVERNMENT'S drive against human trafficking has obtained a higher budgetary support next year through the agency tasked to lead in the campaign.

The Inter-Agency Council Against Trafficking (IACAT), an attached agency to the Justice department, said in a statement yesterday that its proposed P100-million budget for 2013 has been approved by the Budget department, doubling the current outlay of P50 million.

Director Tina Rose Marie L. Canda of the Department of Budget and Management (DBM) confirmed that the proposed higher funding for IACAT was included in the proposed P2.006-trillion national budget for 2013 that was approved by President Benigno S. C. Aquino III on Friday.

The budget will be submitted to Congress a day after it resumes session on July 23.

The DBM approval "will further increase the capability of government agencies and its private sector partners in tracking down and prosecuting criminal elements and organized syndicates involved in human trafficking," said IACAT head and Justice Undersecretary Jose Vicente B. Salazar in the statement.

The budget increase "will also go a long way in helping the IACAT in its victim and rehabilitation efforts," he added.

Approval of the IACAT budget proposal, said Mr. Salazar, is consistent with recommendations of the Global Annual Trafficking in Persons Report 2012 released by the US State Department last June 19. The report, which covered the year 2011, retained the Philippines in its Tier 2 status, citing increased funding as among other efforts to support the campaign. The IACAT's budget last year was P64 million.

For his part, Jan Chavez-Arceo, executive officer of the IACAT's Public Information and Communications Division, said the IACAT has a projected budget of P150 million in its Second Strategic Action Plan, which lays out the council's strategies until 2016.

The higher funding for next year will be spent to address the plan's key result areas, namely, advocacy and prevention; protection, recovery, rehabilitation and reintegration; prosecution and law enforcement; and partnership and networking.

The plan has yet to be finalized, the council said.

Aside from the budget increase, the report also recommended that the government sustain its intensified efforts to investigate and convict labor and sex traffickers; develop mechanisms to track and monitor trafficking cases at the Department of Justice and in the courts; increase victim processing centers and shelter resources to improve identification of victims and allow them to be safely processed and assisted after rescue operations; and implement programs to reduce demand for commercial sex acts.

A country is placed under Tier 1 if it fully complies with the minimum standards in combating human trafficking based on the US' 2000 Trafficking Victims Protection Act and in Tier 2, if it shows significant efforts to meet those standards.

If it does not show significant anti-trafficking efforts and its recorded number of trafficking victims significantly increases, the country is placed under Tier 2 Watch List.

If, on the other hand, the country does not fully comply with the minimum standards and does not show any significant effort to lessen human trafficking incidents, it is liable to be downgraded to Tier 3, which will mean less financial support from the US.

LOAD-DATE: July 2, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 BusinessWorld Publishing Corporation
All Rights Reserved

31 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

July 3, 2012 Tuesday 10:35 PM EST

Reform Movement Praises Israel's Human Trafficking Record

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 518 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The Union for Reform Judaism's Religious Action Center issued the following news release:

In response to the release of the State Department's 2012 Trafficking in Persons Report, Rabbi David Saperstein, Director of the Religious Action Center of Reform Judaism, issued the following statement:

"The release of the State Department's 2012 Trafficking in Persons Report highlights the importance of stringent accountability and monitoring of human trafficking. The scourge of human trafficking violates the inherent dignity of every human being. Around the world, year in and year out, hundreds of thousands of women, men, and children are victimized by those who enslave them using deception and often outright force. This report remains a critical tool for ensuring that human trafficking is no longer allowed to occur in the shadows as governments turn a blind eye. We are proud of the role our Religious Action Center played in the drafting and passage of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act.

While we take this time to express our disappointment with the countries that have not worked hard enough to eradicate human trafficking within their borders, we are greatly encouraged by the 29 countries that were upgraded from a lower tier to a higher one. We are especially pleased by the fact that Israel has been categorized as a "Tier One" country for the first time, after years of consistent efforts to eliminate human trafficking. Having moved from Tier Three in the original report to Tier One in this year's report signifies the tremendous progress that the Israeli government has made, including the legislation passed by the Knesset to prohibit the purchase of sexual services, and to provide comprehensive crucial services for victims of human trafficking, and can be a model for other nations across the globe on the progress in addressing this moral tragedy that is possible.

We are also encouraged to see the steady advances that the Canadian government has made in its efforts to combat human trafficking, earning it an eighth Tier 1 ranking on the TIP Report. Particularly, we welcome Prime Minister Stephen Harper's plans to launch the National Action Plan to Combat Human Trafficking and the Canadian government's continuing efforts to prevent trafficking and to improve victim services. We commend our synagogues in Canada, many of whom have been outspoken and have helped spur public support on this issue.

We are proud of the global efforts to decrease the incidence of trafficking and improve the lives of victims of human trafficking, but we know there is still much more work to be done in Israel, Canada, the United States, and around the world. Jewish tradition teaches that there is no greater mitzvah than redeeming the captives - those who are hungry, thirsty, oppressed, abused and whose lives are in danger. We will continue to work to bring about an end to human trafficking and ensure that no woman, man or child knows the experience of functional captivity."

Contact: Sean Thibault, 202/387-2800, news@rac.org

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS MT93 120704-3939428 61MarlizTagarum

LOAD-DATE: July 4, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Targeted News Service LLC
All Rights Reserved

32 of 492 DOCUMENTS

South China Morning Post

July 1, 2012 Sunday

HK laws 'fail to combat human trafficking'; Annual US report says the city's failure to get appropriate legislation in place to combat the problem puts it on a par with Cambodia and Congo

BYLINE: John Carney john.carney@scmp.com

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 07

LENGTH: 500 words

A US State Department report has delivered a scathing assessment of Hong Kong's laws against human trafficking, comparing the city's record on combating the problem to that of Cambodia, the Democratic Republic of Congo and Serbia.

The Trafficking in Persons Report 2012 sets out the city's failure to meet minimum international standards and highlights a lack of progress in getting appropriate legislation in place. It also confirms that Hong Kong that has dropped down a tier in international rankings for efforts to combat human trafficking.

In a three-tier system of rankings, Hong Kong's position has dropped from tier one in 2008 to tier two today.

The report says Hong Kong "does not fully comply with minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking" and "authorities have made no discernable progress over previous years in law enforcement efforts against sex trafficking or forced labour [labour trafficking]".

The city's ranking is now on a par not only with that of Congo, Serbia and Cambodia, but also with that of Ukraine, Iran, Indonesia and Sri Lanka.

"Due to Hong Kong's failure to fully comply with minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and the lack of discernable progress over previous years in law enforcement efforts against sex trafficking or forced labour [its ranking has been dropped down a tier]," the report says.

It also says that foreign domestic helpers face notable indebtedness assumed in their countries as part of the terms of job placements, which has the potential to plunge them into debt bondage.

This is prevalent in Hong Kong, where Filipino and Indonesian domestic helpers are brought to the city under false pretences to work and are unknowingly involved in trafficking by their employers. Some of these domestic helpers have been imprisoned for immigration offences, while those trafficking them have not been prosecuted.

Solicitor Mike Vidler has represented Filipino and Indonesian domestic helpers who have been caught up in this situation and was critical of how these cases are handled. "The emphasis is always on the domestic helpers being charged with immigration offences rather than the much more serious crime of human trafficking," he said.

The report also says that Hong Kong secured only six sex-trafficking convictions and no forced labour convictions, which gave the false impression that there was no problem. "To say that only six prosecutions have been made defies belief. It's just because there is no system in place to identify what the real problem is," Vidler said.

A Security Bureau spokesman refuted the report's findings. "Over the years, there was no difference, certainly no deterioration, in the trend of human trafficking and the effectiveness of our law enforcement in terms of number of arrest, prosecutions or convictions," the spokesman said.

"Hong Kong's legislation already provides a solid framework for the law enforcement agencies to prevent and combat human-trafficking activities," the spokesman said.

LOAD-DATE: July 1, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 South China Morning Post Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

33 of 492 DOCUMENTS

South China Morning Post

July 1, 2012 Sunday

HK laws 'fail to combat human trafficking'; Annual US report says the city's failure to get appropriate legislation in place to combat the problem puts it on a par with Cambodia and Congo

BYLINE: John Carney john.carney@scmp.com

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 07

LENGTH: 500 words

A US State Department report has delivered a scathing assessment of Hong Kong's laws against human trafficking, comparing the city's record on combating the problem to that of Cambodia, the Democratic Republic of Congo and Serbia.

The Trafficking in Persons Report 2012 sets out the city's failure to meet minimum international standards and highlights a lack of progress in getting appropriate legislation in place. It also confirms that Hong Kong that has dropped down a tier in international rankings for efforts to combat human trafficking.

In a three-tier system of rankings, Hong Kong's position has dropped from tier one in 2008 to tier two today.

The report says Hong Kong "does not fully comply with minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking" and "authorities have made no discernable progress over previous years in law enforcement efforts against sex trafficking or forced labour [labour trafficking]".

The city's ranking is now on a par not only with that of Congo, Serbia and Cambodia, but also with that of Ukraine, Iran, Indonesia and Sri Lanka.

"Due to Hong Kong's failure to fully comply with minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and the lack of discernable progress over previous years in law enforcement efforts against sex trafficking or forced labour [its ranking has been dropped down a tier]," the report says.

It also says that foreign domestic helpers face notable indebtedness assumed in their countries as part of the terms of job placements, which has the potential to plunge them into debt bondage.

This is prevalent in Hong Kong, where Filipino and Indonesian domestic helpers are brought to the city under false pretences to work and are unknowingly involved in trafficking by their employers. Some of these domestic helpers have been imprisoned for immigration offences, while those trafficking them have not been prosecuted.

Solicitor Mike Vidler has represented Filipino and Indonesian domestic helpers who have been caught up in this situation and was critical of how these cases are handled. "The emphasis is always on the domestic helpers being charged with immigration offences rather than the much more serious crime of human trafficking," he said.

The report also says that Hong Kong secured only six sex-trafficking convictions and no forced labour convictions, which gave the false impression that there was no problem. "To say that only six prosecutions have been made defies belief. It's just because there is no system in place to identify what the real problem is," Vidler said.

A Security Bureau spokesman refuted the report's findings. "Over the years, there was no difference, certainly no deterioration, in the trend of human trafficking and the effectiveness of our law enforcement in terms of number of arrest, prosecutions or convictions," the spokesman said.

"Hong Kong's legislation already provides a solid framework for the law enforcement agencies to prevent and combat human-trafficking activities," the spokesman said.

LOAD-DATE: July 8, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 South China Morning Post Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

34 of 492 DOCUMENTS

The Nation (Thailand)

June 30, 2012 Saturday

The Ministry of Labour is drafting legislation that will allow pregnant migrant women to return to their country of origin from the time when they are three to four months pregnant. After giving birth, they will be able to come back to Thailand to start working again. The idea, according to the government, is to prevent the trafficking of children. The policy was enacted following the recent release of the US State Department's 2012 "Trafficking in Persons" report, which has again placed Thailand on the watch list of Tier 2.

BYLINE: The Nation

LENGTH: 600 words

The ministry may say it has the best interests of migrant women in mind, but in real terms this is nothing less than deportation. It could also mean forced abortions, given the economic reality of these migrant workers from neighbouring countries, who are employed here only because their labour costs Thai companies less than employing Thai workers.

The official explanation is that by refusing migrant workers the opportunity to give birth in this country, it will bring down the use of child migrant workers. This is absurd.

The migrant workers have reason to be concerned. Beside the fact that many have their families here in Thailand already, they should also be worried about not having the money to pay the traffickers and other bloodsuckers who organise their journeys to Thailand. They should also be worried that they will not be able to bring their new child back here with them.

It would not be a big surprise, given the circumstances, if many women in this position opted for abortion. There are obvious risks involved in such a decision. Too often we read about how abortions performed by quacks in backstreet clinics end in either the injury or death of the woman.

According to the Public Health Ministry, nearly 10,000 women die each year from infections caused after unsafe abortions. But instead of supporting safe services to end unplanned pregnancies, we still live with the fact that our official policy pushes many women to their death.

Perhaps we are asking too much from our policy-makers. If they can easily turn a blind eye to unsafe abortions, why should they even care about the predicament of pregnant migrant women?

It should be noted that Thailand's reputation regarding treatment of migrant workers is not good. To call them second-class citizens is a gross understatement. Moreover, how this new policy will improve Thailand's poor record in the area of human trafficking is still not known.

This year's US State Department report on trafficking places Thailand once again in Tier 2. If there is no real improvement soon, we could drop to Tier 3, which would subject the country to a number of boycotts by the United States.

But instead of going after the bloodsucking traffickers and the police and immigration officials who cooperate with them, our government thinks it better to take it out on the migrant workers.

Perhaps if our Labour Ministry could put on a human face, it would reconsider this plan. But if the recent past is any indication, regardless of political parties, such a heartless and short-sighted policy will certainly go ahead regardless.

Why? Because we do not see migrant workers as people who deserve to be treated with respect. We see them as machines that are expendable, and we believe that the supply of these workers will continue forever. And to criminalise them and subject them to absurd rules and regulations is easier than a more thoughtful policy that takes into consideration certain values such as compassion, justice and equality.

The quality of a society should not be measured by its material wealth and economic might (which, by the way, is made possible by migrant workers), but by a sense of fairness and a sense of justice.

Our leaders often talk about how the countries of Southeast Asia are uniting to become one integrated economic region. But in order to achieve this ideal oneness, we have to be equal in the eyes of each other. At the human level is where it counts, not on some negotiated text sanctioned by Asean government officials and diplomats who are unable to consider people's real lives when they make their policy decisions.

LOAD-DATE: June 30, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 Nation Multimedia Group
All Rights Reserved

35 of 492 DOCUMENTS

The Nation (Thailand)

June 30, 2012 Saturday

The Ministry of Labour is drafting legislation that will allow pregnant migrant women to return to their country of origin from the time when they are three to four months pregnant. After giving birth, they will be able to come back to Thailand to start working again. The idea, according to the government, is to prevent the trafficking of children. The policy was enacted following the recent release of the US State Department's 2012 "Trafficking in Persons" report, which has again placed Thailand on the watch list of Tier 2.

BYLINE: The Nation

LENGTH: 600 words

The ministry may say it has the best interests of migrant women in mind, but in real terms this is nothing less than deportation. It could also mean forced abortions, given the economic reality of these migrant workers from neighbouring countries, who are employed here only because their labour costs Thai companies less than employing Thai workers.

The official explanation is that by refusing migrant workers the opportunity to give birth in this country, it will bring down the use of child migrant workers. This is absurd.

The migrant workers have reason to be concerned. Beside the fact that many have their families here in Thailand already, they should also be worried about not having the money to pay the traffickers and other bloodsuckers who organise their journeys to Thailand. They should also be worried that they will not be able to bring their new child back here with them.

It would not be a big surprise, given the circumstances, if many women in this position opted for abortion. There are obvious risks involved in such a decision. Too often we read about how abortions performed by quacks in backstreet clinics end in either the injury or death of the woman.

According to the Public Health Ministry, nearly 10,000 women die each year from infections caused after unsafe abortions. But instead of supporting safe services to end unplanned pregnancies, we still live with the fact that our official policy pushes many women to their death.

Perhaps we are asking too much from our policy-makers. If they can easily turn a blind eye to unsafe abortions, why should they even care about the predicament of pregnant migrant women?

It should be noted that Thailand's reputation regarding treatment of migrant workers is not good. To call them second-class citizens is a gross understatement. Moreover, how this new policy will improve Thailand's poor record in the area of human trafficking is still not known.

This year's US State Department report on trafficking places Thailand once again in Tier 2. If there is no real improvement soon, we could drop to Tier 3, which would subject the country to a number of boycotts by the United States.

But instead of going after the bloodsucking traffickers and the police and immigration officials who cooperate with them, our government thinks it better to take it out on the migrant workers.

Perhaps if our Labour Ministry could put on a human face, it would reconsider this plan. But if the recent past is any indication, regardless of political parties, such a heartless and short-sighted policy will certainly go ahead regardless.

Why? Because we do not see migrant workers as people who deserve to be treated with respect. We see them as machines that are expendable, and we believe that the supply of these workers will continue forever. And to criminalise them and subject them to absurd rules and regulations is easier than a more thoughtful policy that takes into consideration certain values such as compassion, justice and equality.

The quality of a society should not be measured by its material wealth and economic might (which, by the way, is made possible by migrant workers), but by a sense of fairness and a sense of justice.

Our leaders often talk about how the countries of Southeast Asia are uniting to become one integrated economic region. But in order to achieve this ideal oneness, we have to be equal in the eyes of each other. At the human level is where it counts, not on some negotiated text sanctioned by Asean government officials and diplomats who are unable to consider people's real lives when they make their policy decisions.

LOAD-DATE: June 30, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 Nation Multimedia Group
All Rights Reserved

36 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 29, 2012 Friday

Nigeria; Nigerian Girls Serve As Sex Slaves in Asia, Europe, Africa

BYLINE: This Day (Lagos)

LENGTH: 1096 words

Tokunbo Adedjoja in New York

Despite the huge effort by Mrs. Eki Igbinedion, wife of former Edo State governor, Lucky Igbinedon, in combating female trafficking in Edo State, a new report released by the United States government has detailed how Nigerian women and girls were trafficked to Asia, Europe and other parts of Africa to be used as sex slaves and for forced labour. Edo State was identified as one of the largest exporters of sex workers to parts of Europe, especially Italy.

Mrs. Igbinedion had founded Idia Renaissance, a platform she used in battling the malaise of female trafficking in the state. She mounted strong re-orientation programmes which not only exposed the antics of the dealers, but also equipped rescued erstwhile sex workers with the skills and enterprise to start life anew in other vocations. She left office when the tenure of her husband expired in 2007.

The recently released report titled, '2012 Trafficking in Persons Report', further added that Europol (European Police Office) has identified Nigerian organised crime as one of the largest law enforcement challenges to European governments.

The report indicated, "Nigerian women and girls, primarily from Benin City in Edo State, are subjected to forced prostitution in Italy, while Nigerian women and girls from other states are subjected to forced prostitution in Spain, Scotland, the Netherlands, Germany, Turkey, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Sweden, Switzerland, Norway, Ireland, Slovakia, the Czech Republic, Greece, and Russia."

It specifically noted that Nigerian women trafficked to Malaysia are not only forced into prostitution, they were also made to work as drug mules for their traffickers.

Noting that Nigerian women and children are recruited and transported to destinations in North Africa, the Middle East, and Central Asia, where they were held captive in the sex trade or in forced labour, the report observed some are trafficked to other West and Central African countries, as well as South Africa, where they were exploited for the same purposes.

According to the report, Nigerian traffickers rely on threats of voodoo to compel their victims into prostitution often with an understanding on how to repay their "madams or masters". Most of the dealers who recruit their victims from the rural communities often paint bright prospects to the parents of the victims, especially when they are promised regular remittances of foreign currency from their children or wards who are "working in Oyinbo land". The victims on their part are excited about the prospect of "travelling abroad" and earning a living in foreign currency, without knowing that the "work in Oyinbo land" is a smokescreen for prostitution and servitude.

While noting that Nigerian government does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, it observed that during the reporting period, Nigerian government has not demonstrated sufficient progress in its anti-trafficking law enforcement efforts. "Roughly, a third of convicted traffickers received fines in lieu of prison time," adding, "despite identifying 386 labour trafficking victims, the government prosecuted only two forced labour cases."

The report also states that despite documentation on a staggering number of Nigerian trafficking victims identified in countries around the world, the government has inconsistently employed measures to provide services to repatriated victims. It noted that in one particular case and for unknown reasons, Nigerian officials did not assist prosecutors, representing a Nigerian victim in a foreign country, in locating a Nigerian trafficker who was in Nigeria during the case proceedings.

The report also indicted Nigerian diplomats in a neighbouring West African country for referring most of the Nigerian trafficking victims identified in that country to local NGOs rather than arranging for their repatriation to National Agency for the Prohibition of Traffic in Persons and Other Related Matters (NAPTIP) shelters in Nigeria. "Despite the growing number of Nigerian trafficking victims identified abroad, the government is yet to implement formal procedures for the repatriation and reintegration of Nigerian victims," it stated.

In the report, Nigeria was described as a source, transit and destination country for women and children subjected to forced labour and sex trafficking. The report observed that trafficked Nigerians are recruited from rural areas, and to a lesser extent urban areas, within the country.

While women and girls were used for domestic servitude and sex trafficking, it indicated that boys are used for forced labour in street vending, domestic service, mining, stone quarries, agriculture, and begging.

In this year's report, which analysed countries from around the world by looking at what the governments are doing to tackle modern slavery, Nigeria slid down the ranking scale from Tier 1 to Tier 2. The annual report grouped countries into four tiers using the 3P paradigm of Prevention, Protection and Prosecution. Tier 1 consists of countries which comply with the minimum standards to combat trafficking in persons, Tier 2, consists of countries that are not yet compliant but are making efforts in that direction.

There is also the Tier 2 Watch List, which consists of countries that are in danger of falling down to Tier 3. Countries under Tier 3 are those that do not comply with any of the minimum standards and are not working towards attaining them.

For Nigeria to tackle these challenges, the report recommended that NAPTIP, established to coordinate and facilitate government's anti-trafficking agenda, be sufficiently funded to be able to prosecute trafficking offenders and provide adequate care for victims.

It further recommended increased investigations, prosecutions, convictions and punishments of labour trafficking offences; training of police and immigration officials to identify trafficking victims among vulnerable populations; development of a formal system to track the number of victims repatriated from abroad; and taking proactive measures to investigate and prosecute government officials suspected of trafficking.

Speaking while unveiling the report at the Benjamin Franklin Room, State Department in Washington DC, Secretary of State, Hilary Clinton, said an estimated 27 million people around the world were victims of modern slavery. She said the report "gives a clear and honest assessment of where all of us are making progress on our commitments and where we are either standing still or even sliding backwards."

LOAD-DATE: June 29, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

37 of 492 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Latin America - Political
 Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 29, 2012 Friday

Guyana dismisses US human trafficking report

LENGTH: 578 words

Text of report by Caribbean Media Corporation news agency website

GEORGETOWN, Guyana, Jun 29, CMC - Guyana has once again dismissed a United States report critical of the country's efforts on human trafficking to combat trafficking in persons.

A government appointed Ministerial Task Force established to tackle human trafficking here said that the US State Department's assessment in its 2012 report is "a difficult pill to swallow" and that Washington failed to establish a single fact.

"The Task Force notes several inaccuracies and misrepresentations in the Report that must be addressed. What is clear is that the architects of this Report have not made significant progress in improving the veracity, coherence and validity of their annual assessments" it said, noting that the report comprises unsubstantiated generalisations and repetitive uncorroborated claims.

"The Task Force strongly recommends that the US State Department seek to improve its methodology, establish proper baselines to guide comparisons, avoid use of anecdotal claims and develop a consistent, understandable, transparent and logical tier ranking system if countries are to benefit from these rituals. "The plethora of uncorroborated claims made in the Report can only result in a distorted view of the Guyanese reality as regards the national trafficking in persons' situation" the statement said.

Guyana said it considered the report "an affront" to its members, frontline government staff and over 100 citizens who have been trained to identify and report trafficking in persons and have been doing so along with several non-government organizations.

"While we were encouraged by what we felt at the time was meaningful dialogue between the Ministerial Task Force and US Embassy Officials, this Report raises significant concerns over the efficacy of these engagements" the statement said.

It said that a perusal of the report reveals "two inescapable inferences; one, the architects had already decided what they wanted to put in the Report and two, the architects gave little or no credence to the information presented by government in partnership with NGOs. Consequently, those two factors begs the question of the usefulness of such engagements in future.

"The danger of these unfounded claims and anecdotes that are replete in the US Report is that even though they are not the product of systematic research nor critical analysis they have never-the-less been published in the local media thus influencing public opinion" it added.

The Task Force said that the "US Report's misrepresentation and scaremongering must be refuted because of its impact on the country's image and the perpetuation of stereotypes and fears. Worst yet, it can lead to a waste of resources and energy, and a reduction in traditional opportunities for personal economic development and educational advancement".

The US State Department report released last week took the Guyana government to task for its failure to prosecute and convict human traffickers. It said Guyana, while there was some progress, there was a lack of political will and negligence on part of the state for not adequately addressing the human trafficking.

Guyana again was placed on tier two of the US Human Trafficking watch list for more than five years in succession. Georgetown has always dismissed the report as being inaccurate.

Source: Caribbean Media Corporation news agency website, Bridgetown, in English 1200 gmt 29 Jun 12

LOAD-DATE: June 29, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2012 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

38 of 492 DOCUMENTS

CANA News

June 29, 2012 Friday

GUYANA-RIGHTS-Guyana dismisses US Human trafficking report

LENGTH: 543 words

Guyana has once again dismissed a United States report critical of the country's efforts on human trafficking to combat trafficking in persons.

A government appointed Ministerial Task Force established to tackle human trafficking here said that the US State Department's assessment in its 2012 report is "a difficult pill to swallow" and that Washington failed to establish a single fact.

"The Task Force notes several inaccuracies and misrepresentations in the Report that must be addressed. What is clear is that the architects of this Report have not made significant progress in improving the veracity, coherence and validity of their annual assessments" it said, noting that the report comprises unsubstantiated generalisations and repetitive uncorroborated claims.

"The Task Force strongly recommends that the US State Department seek to improve its methodology, establish proper baselines to guide comparisons, avoid use of anecdotal claims and develop a consistent, understandable, transparent and logical tier ranking system if countries are to benefit from these rituals. "The plethora of uncorroborated claims made in the Report can only result in a distorted view of the Guyanese reality as regards the national trafficking in persons' situation" the statement said.

Guyana said it considered the report "an affront" to its members, frontline government staff and over 100 citizens who have been trained to identify and report trafficking in persons and have been doing so along with several non-government organisations.

"While we were encouraged by what we felt at the time was meaningful dialogue between the Ministerial Task Force and US Embassy Officials, this Report raises significant concerns over the efficacy of these engagements" the statement said.

It said that a perusal of the report reveals "two inescapable inferences; one, the architects had already decided what they wanted to put in the Report and two, the architects gave little or no credence to the information presented by government in partnership with NGOs. Consequently, those two factors begs the question of the usefulness of such engagements in future.

"The danger of these unfounded claims and anecdotes that are replete in the US Report is that even though they are not the product of systematic research nor critical analysis they have never-the-less been published in the local media thus influencing public opinion" it added.

The Task Force said that the "US Report's misrepresentation and scaremongering must be refuted because of its impact on the country's image and the perpetuation of stereotypes and fears. Worst yet, it can lead to a waste of resources and energy, and a reduction in traditional opportunities for personal economic development and educational advancement".

The US State Department report released last week took the Guyana government to task for its failure to prosecute and convict human traffickers.

It said Guyana, while there was some progress, there was a lack of political will and negligence on part of the state for not adequately addressing the human trafficking.

Guyana again was placed on tier two of the US Human Trafficking watch list for more than five years in succession. Georgetown has always dismissed the report as being inaccurate.

LOAD-DATE: August 17, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 CANA News
All Rights Reserved

39 of 492 DOCUMENTS

This Day (Lagos)

June 29, 2012 Friday

Nigerian Girls Serve As Sex Slaves in Asia, Europe, Africa

LENGTH: 1096 words

Tokunbo Adedoja in New York

Despite the huge effort by Mrs. Eki Igbinedion, wife of former Edo State governor, Lucky Igbinedon, in combating female trafficking in Edo State, a new report released by the United States government has detailed how Nigerian women and girls were trafficked to Asia, Europe and other parts of Africa to be used as sex slaves and for forced labour. Edo State was identified as one of the largest exporters of sex workers to parts of Europe, especially Italy.

Mrs. Igbinedion had founded Idia Renaissance, a platform she used in battling the malaise of female trafficking in the state. She mounted strong re-orientation programmes which not only exposed the antics of the dealers, but also equipped rescued erstwhile sex workers with the skills and enterprise to start life anew in other vocations. She left office when the tenure of her husband expired in 2007.

The recently released report titled, '2012 Trafficking in Persons Report', further added that Europol (European Police Office) has identified Nigerian organised crime as one of the largest law enforcement challenges to European governments.

The report indicated, "Nigerian women and girls, primarily from Benin City in Edo State, are subjected to forced prostitution in Italy, while Nigerian women and girls from other states are subjected to forced prostitution in Spain, Scotland, the Netherlands, Germany, Turkey, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Sweden, Switzerland, Norway, Ireland, Slovakia, the Czech Republic, Greece, and Russia."

It specifically noted that Nigerian women trafficked to Malaysia are not only forced into prostitution, they were also made to work as drug mules for their traffickers.

Noting that Nigerian women and children are recruited and transported to destinations in North Africa, the Middle East, and Central Asia, where they were held captive in the sex trade or in forced labour, the report observed some are trafficked to other West and Central African countries, as well as South Africa, where they were exploited for the same purposes.

According to the report, Nigerian traffickers rely on threats of voodoo to compel their victims into prostitution often with an understanding on how to repay their "madams or masters". Most of the dealers who recruit their victims from the rural communities often paint bright prospects to the parents of the victims, especially when they are promised regular remittances of foreign currency from their children or wards who are "working in Oyinbo land". The victims on their part are excited about the prospect of "travelling abroad" and earning a living in foreign currency, without knowing that the "work in Oyinbo land" is a smokescreen for prostitution and servitude.

While noting that Nigerian government does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, it observed that during the reporting period, Nigerian government has not demonstrated sufficient progress in its anti-trafficking law enforcement efforts. "Roughly, a third of convicted traffickers received fines in lieu of prison time," adding, "despite identifying 386 labour trafficking victims, the government prosecuted only two forced labour cases."

The report also states that despite documentation on a staggering number of Nigerian trafficking victims identified in countries around the world, the government has inconsistently employed measures to provide services to repatriated victims. It noted that in one particular case and for unknown reasons, Nigerian officials did not assist prosecutors, representing a Nigerian victim in a foreign country, in locating a Nigerian trafficker who was in Nigeria during the case proceedings.

The report also indicted Nigerian diplomats in a neighbouring West African country for referring most of the Nigerian trafficking victims identified in that country to local NGOs rather than arranging for their repatriation to National Agency for the Prohibition of Traffic in Persons and Other Related Matters (NAPTIP) shelters in Nigeria. "Despite the growing number of Nigerian trafficking victims identified abroad, the government is yet to implement formal procedures for the repatriation and reintegration of Nigerian victims," it stated.

In the report, Nigeria was described as a source, transit and destination country for women and children subjected to forced labour and sex trafficking. The report observed that trafficked Nigerians are recruited from rural areas, and to a lesser extent urban areas, within the country.

While women and girls were used for domestic servitude and sex trafficking, it indicated that boys are used for forced labour in street vending, domestic service, mining, stone quarries, agriculture, and begging.

In this year's report, which analysed countries from around the world by looking at what the governments are doing to tackle modern slavery, Nigeria slid down the ranking scale from Tier 1 to Tier 2. The annual report grouped countries into four tiers using the 3P paradigm of Prevention, Protection and Prosecution. Tier 1 consists of countries which comply with the minimum standards to combat trafficking in persons, Tier 2, consists of countries that are not yet compliant but are making efforts in that direction.

There is also the Tier 2 Watch List, which consists of countries that are in danger of falling down to Tier 3. Countries under Tier 3 are those that do not comply with any of the minimum standards and are not working towards attaining them.

For Nigeria to tackle these challenges, the report recommended that NAPTIP, established to coordinate and facilitate government's anti-trafficking agenda, be sufficiently funded to be able to prosecute trafficking offenders and provide adequate care for victims.

It further recommended increased investigations, prosecutions, convictions and punishments of labour trafficking offences; training of police and immigration officials to identify trafficking victims among vulnerable populations; development of a formal system to track the number of victims repatriated from abroad; and taking proactive measures to investigate and prosecute government officials suspected of trafficking.

Speaking while unveiling the report at the Benjamin Franklin Room, State Department in Washington DC, Secretary of State, Hilary Clinton, said an estimated 27 million people around the world were victims of modern slavery. She said the report "gives a clear and honest assessment of where all of us are making progress on our commitments and where we are either standing still or even sliding backwards."

LOAD-DATE: June 29, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

40 of 492 DOCUMENTS

THE KOREA HERALD

June 29, 2012 Friday

Korean victims of sex trafficking in Japan receive renewed attention

LENGTH: 335 words

Yonhap Photo

"I've lost so much blood, I feel dizzy. It's debt. They won't listen."

A Korean female victim sent an urgent text message for help to an anti-trafficking group. The group revealed sex trafficking stories of the victim and others at a press conference in Tokyo Wednesday.

The unnamed victim was malnourished and suffering from abdominal inflammation when she sent the distressed message to Polaris Project Japan's hotline.

The woman, who is in her twenties, had been forced into prostitution after she had arrived in Japan with false hopes of making money as a bar hostess to pay off her debt.

She had gotten the idea from her female employer at a Seoul bar, who had recommended that she move to Japan to quickly make money.

But her nightmares began when she met the broker in Tokyo. She was taken to an apartment in the Ueno district, where she was under constant monitoring with surveillance cameras in her room and corridor. The broker took away her passport. All of the money she made working as a prostitute went to the pimp.

The victim recalled that she had been too afraid to call the police, as she was a foreigner unprotected by the law. After she came across the hotline for women, she took actions.

About 30 percent of S.O.S calls made to the hotline since 2005 were by Koreans, making them the most targeted foreign victims, according to the PPJ.

Filipino and Thai women came in second and third, taking up 11 percent and 7 percent of the calls, respectively. Thirty-six percent of the calls were from Japanese women.

The group disclosed other detailed stories of sex trafficking cases in Japan, including that of a Korean student who started out working in the kitchen of a hostess bar and ended up being forced into prostitution due to debt.

According to the annual Trafficking in Persons Report published Tuesday by the U.S. State Department, Japan was categorized as a Tier 2 country whose government "does not fully comply with minimum standards."

By Sim Guk-by

Intern Reporter

(simgukby@heraldm.com)

LOAD-DATE: June 30, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

All Rights Reserved

41 of 492 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 29, 2012 Friday

CAMBODIA TO REPATRIATE TRAFFICKING VICTIMS

BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 686 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, DC

The following information was released by Radio Free Asia:

Cambodia will bring home four men who were sold as slaves to a South African fishing company.

RFA

Police officers speak to a group of girls after they were rescued from a human trafficking ring, Oct. 11, 2011.

Cambodia is working with the South African government to repatriate four Cambodian men who worked as slaves for years after being sold to a fishing company, highlighting the plight of impoverished Southeast Asians who commonly fall prey to human traffickers while seeking work abroad.

Cambodian Ministry of Foreign Affairs spokesman Kuy Kong said in a statement Friday that the four men were rescued from South African firm Giant Ocean International Fishery Co. Ltd., where they had worked for "several years."

The group included Seng Sokha, 25, from Kampot province, Phan Chanden, 34, from Kompong Cham province, Chea Nara, 24, also from Kompong Cham, and Chap Sinath, 21, from Siem Reap province.

"The Cambodian Embassy in Bangkok is working with the South African government to provide the men with temporarily shelters until they are repatriated to Cambodia," the statement read.

The ministry did not provide any details about how the four Cambodians ended up in South Africa, their current state of health, or the abuses they faced while held captive by the fishing company.

Maids in Malaysia

News of the trafficking victims' rescue came as anti-human trafficking group CARAM-Cambodia urged women who have been abused while working in Malaysia as maids to work with their organization to prosecute their former employers.

CARAM-Cambodia Executive Director Ya Navuth made the appeal Friday after announcing the successful prosecution of a Malaysian employer who had withheld the salary of a Cambodian maid for more than two years.

Ya Navuth said that the 30-year-old maid, whose name was withheld for reasons of privacy, was awarded U.S. $1,400 for her two years of salary through an appeals court in Malaysia.

"Winning this case in Malaysia has set a precedent for those who endure abuse from their employers," he said.

"The victims must inform the Cambodian Embassy and the nongovernmental organizations that are working against human trafficking of their situations. When we have information, we can help."

Ya Navuth said that the victim will be repatriated to Cambodia soon.

Little recourse

Maids are common in middle-class households in Malaysia due to a large migrant labor population who total up to 2 million people or 21 percent of the country's workforce.

Women's rights groups say there are no accurate statistics of how many Cambodian women are currently working in Malaysia, though some estimates put the number at around 50,000.

They say that these young women typically have little recourse against abuse through local law enforcement because they do not speak the local language or have entered the country illegally.

In addition, labor firms that recruit them in Cambodia rarely provide support once the women are employed.

Earlier this month, a 28-year-old maid was admitted to a hospital in the Malaysian capital Kuala Lumpur after suffering a broken jaw and being tortured by the couple that hired her to clean their home.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs also announced in June that the Cambodian Embassy rescued eight fishing boat workers and four maids who had been trafficked to Malaysia where they had been forced to work for several years.

And in March, a Malaysian couple was charged with killing domestic worker Mey Sichan, 24, who was allegedly subjected to repeated physical abuse and starved.

Cambodia imposed a freeze on sending domestic workers in October last year after activists exposed dozens of cases of sexual abuse, overwork, and exploitation among Cambodian maids in Malaysian homes.

The U.S. State Department ranked Cambodia a Tier 2 country in its 2012 Trafficking in Persons report, saying the government had failed to make progress in prosecuting human traffickers and protecting trafficking victims.

Reported by Samean Yun and Ouk Savborey for RFA's Khmer service. Translated by Samean Yun. Written in English by Joshua Lipes.

LOAD-DATE: June 30, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

42 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 28, 2012 Thursday

Lesotho; Traffickers Prey On Desperate Job Seekers

BYLINE: UN Integrated Regional Information Networks (Nairobi)

LENGTH: 1188 words

At the age of 15 and with no money for school shoes or a uniform, Linda* was forced to accept that her education was over and it was time to look for a job. In Lesotho's southern Quthing District, where she lived, it is accepted wisdom that finding a job means crossing the border into South Africa, which completely surrounds this mountainous kingdom of 1.8 million people and dwarfs its tiny economy.

Linda's own mother made the move five years ago and never returned. "I don't know where she is," said Linda, whose sister also lives in South Africa.

In May 2011, Linda was approached by a woman she knew from her village who had a business about 50km across the border in the town of Sterkspruit. "She invited me to come and stay with her and work for her as a shop assistant," recalled Linda.

She did not question why she and her new employer had to cross a freezing river to enter South Africa instead of using the nearest border post, and for the first three months she was treated well enough and received a small salary. But when her employer abruptly left, putting a relative in charge of the shop, no more pay was forthcoming and Linda embarked on a relationship with the night watchman. By the time her sister arrived in December to bring her home, she was pregnant.

"I feel so sorry and angry," said the girl, now eight-months pregnant and living with her ailing grandmother.

Four months after recruiting Linda, her employer returned to the village and met Mahleki*, another 15-year-old school dropout and orphan. This time she offered to help the girl attend school in South Africa.

"I didn't really believe her," said Mahleki, "but my brother forced me to go because he couldn't look after me."

After another river crossing, Mahleki was put on a bus to Rustenberg, a mining town in the country's North West Province, and then taken to a tavern where she worked from 7am until midnight for the next seven months. In return she received two meals a day and a one-off payment of R350 ($42) to buy clothes.

In April of this year Maggie Monongoaha, a member of the Lesotho Mounted Police Service's Child and Gender Protection Unit (CGPU) who happened to live in the same village as Mahleki and Linda, made a phone call to their recruiter demanding she send Mahleki home. The woman complied but remained in Rustenberg where she faces no legal charges.

What happened to Linda and Mahleki is not unusual in Lesotho but until recently, it is unlikely that anyone in their community or even local authorities would have identified them as victims of human trafficking, which the UN's 2000 Palermo Protocol defines as: "the recruitment, transfer, harbouring or receipt of persons, by means of the threat or use of force or other forms of coercion, of abduction, of fraud, of deception... for the purpose of exploitation".

Human trafficking survey

In 2010, the Ministry of Home Affairs together with the UN Development Programme (UNDP) commissioned a rapid assessment of human trafficking in Lesotho to try to gauge the magnitude of the problem. The findings did not provide much in the way of hard data, but did highlight some of the conditions that have made the country particularly vulnerable to trafficking both internally from rural to urban areas and transnationally. These include Lesotho's high levels of poverty and unemployment, the large number of children orphaned by HIV/AIDS, and its porous borders and long tradition of migration to South Africa which began with Basotho men going to work in the mines.

The report noted that men, women and children are trafficked not only for sexual exploitation, but also for forced labour on farms, for cattle herding, construction work and domestic work.

In January 2011, the Lesotho government passed anti-trafficking legislation under pressure from the USA, an important donor which had placed Lesotho on its Tier 2 Watch List for countries not showing sufficient progress in combating human trafficking.

"It's common knowledge that it was rushed through," said Sonya Martinez, director of the Beautiful Dream Society (BDS), a faith-based US NGO which runs a shelter and transition programme for victims of human trafficking in Maseru, the capital. "The move to pass the law was very good, but training and infrastructure are lacking."

Although the CPGU has been tasked with investigating trafficking cases, no budget has been allocated and training of its officers has so far been limited to Maseru. Of 40 cases reported in 2011, only one conviction was made under the new law and the offender was later released from a 15-year prison sentence after successfully appealing the verdict.

The recently released US State Department's 2012 Trafficking in Persons Report notes that the government has yet to complete a national action plan on human trafficking which would guide implementation of the new law, and that NGOs are the sole providers of protective services to victims.

NGO helps victims

Since opening its shelter in April 2011, BDS has helped 21 trafficking victims with trauma counselling, skills training and legal assistance, about half of them Basotho nationals and the rest Ethiopians, Zimbabweans and one Chinese. Martinez noted that the foreign victims were often more visible and tended to be perceived as more serious than the cases involving locals. "I believe there are many more local cases," she said, adding that orphans and young people with a history of abuse or who were the sole breadwinners for their family were particularly vulnerable.

Martinez said the greatest barrier to prosecuting more traffickers is the lack of resources for the CPGU to travel to South Africa to investigate suspected cases and bring victims home. "Often nothing ever happens to the perpetrators in South Africa," she told IRIN. "We've helped out with funding for rescues on a couple of occasions; the government hasn't budgeted any funds for this."

Senior Superintendent and Head of the CGPU Mamojela Letsie said her unit relied on a good working relationship with the South African Police Service for tip-offs which had resulted in the rescue of several men from Quthing who were promised jobs in a factory but ended up "sold" to remote cattle posts.

However, a CPGU officer based in Mohale's Hoek, about 50km north of Quthing, said that although his office sometimes received reports of locals promised employment in South Africa who ended up being exploited, it was difficult for them to follow up.

"For us at district level, it's not yet clear how we can investigate cross-border cases," he said.

At the level of prevention and awareness-raising, both the CPGU and the Ministry of Home Affairs are conducting campaigns in areas identified as high risk. NGOs including BDS, Lesotho Save the Children and World Vision are also targeting schoolchildren, border officials and radio listeners with information about the threat of human trafficking.

But Letsie admitted that most Basotho still do not know what human trafficking is. "Once people know, we think there'll be many more cases," she said.

*Not their real names

[This report does not necessarily reflect the views of the United Nations]

LOAD-DATE: June 28, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

Copyright 2012 AllAfrica, Inc.

43 of 492 DOCUMENTS

The Nation (Thailand)

June 28, 2012 Thursday

Improved protection or just opportunism?

BYLINE: The Nation

LENGTH: 521 words

On June 25 the MCOT reported that the minister of Labour is drafting legislation to allow pregnant migrant women to return to their country of origin when they are three to four months pregnant. After giving birth, they can come back to Thailand to start working again.

This policy is being enacted following the release of the US State Department's 2012 "Trafficking in Persons" report, which placed Thailand on the Tier 2 watch-list for the third consecutive year.

According to the MCOT, the minister thought this policy would prevent trafficking of children.

The Mekong Migration Network congratulates the Thai government for extending the length of paid maternity leave for migrant women. We assume that migrant women will be entitled to nine months' paid maternity leave since they'll be required to take maternity leave from the fourth month of pregnancy until three months after giving birth. We also expect the government to provide free appropriate transportation to their home and back to work in Thailand.

Or is it possible that Thailand is so desperate to appease the anti-trafficking lobbyists that it is sacrificing women's fundamental rights by deporting pregnant women?

Reiko Harima

Bangkok

Ignoring all the #124warning signs

Re: "Meeting to plot euro-zone crisis reaction", News, June 27.

Escalating concerns over the debt crisis in the euro zone seem to have caused the Thai government to be terribly fearful.

PM Yingluck and the Pheu Thai Party, under the guidance of Thaksin Shinawatra, won by a landslide in the 2011 election because they promised to spend more on populist programmes than their competitors. As a result, two big problems have emerged:

First, Thailand has a very large stock of rice in hand, maintained at a very high cost as a result of the government's rice-price support scheme. Second, Thai products have become more expensive since another Pheu Thai populist scheme started the raising of the minimum wage to Bt300 a day nationwide.

Hence, if ever the problem in the euro zone escalates to the point that Thailand suffers severely, could it be said to have been because of the recklessness of these people?

Vint Chavala

Lamphun

Diplomacy and #124cyberwar

Re: "Cyberwars loom over mankind, and they'll be cheap and nasty", Opinion, June 23.

Jonathan Eyal is right in asserting that it's largely immaterial that, so far, cyber warfare has killed no one and inflicted little damage. However, his conclusion, according to which new treaties to govern the use of cyberspace can be adopted only after bloody confrontations, seems too pessimistic.

Within the framework of preventive diplomacy, it is high time the United Nations Security Council seriously dealt with the dangerous consequences of potential cyber warfare. It must prove that, indeed, it respects its own role, clearly reflected in the UN Charter, as the principal organ having primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security.

The 193 UN members are expected to avoid the marginalising of the world organisation during an era of global vulnerabilities with cyberwars threatening humankind.

Ioan Voicu

Bangkok

LOAD-DATE: June 27, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 Nation Multimedia Group
All Rights Reserved

44 of 492 DOCUMENTS

The Nation (Thailand)

June 28, 2012 Thursday

thailand remains

BYLINE: The Nation

LENGTH: 653 words

major centre for human trafficking Several border provinces in the North and Northeast are starting points; the problem is getting more serious in the South

Chaiyakorn Bai-ngern,

Thachayan Waharak

Special to The Nation

Many locals and job-seekers from neighbouring countries continue to be ensnared in the sex industry or trapped in slave labour despite the enactment of the Anti-Human-Trafficking Act in 2008,

"Thailand is still a source, transit and destination in human trade," Yanee Lertkrai, inspector-general of the Social Development and Human Security Ministry, said yesterday.

Several border provinces in the North and Northeast are the starting points.

"The victims are sent from there to other provinces in Thailand and often to a third country," she said.

Today, the victims also come from nearby countries such as Laos, Myanmar and even China.

Nukool Chinfuk of Hat Yai University's Political Science Faculty has conducted research on the problem and found that it is getting very serious in the South.

"Some gangs have brought Myanmar people to Ranong, from where some are sent to Samut Sakhon, while some others are sent to Thailand's lower Southern region, Malaysia and Singapore," he said.

More than 120 establishments are offering sex services in Songkhla's Sadao district alone, he said. Most of the sex workers there come from Thailand's northern and northeastern regions as well as China and Laos.

"The longer the problem persists, the younger the victims become," he said.

Many sources put the ages of the youngest victims of prostitution at 11-15. They enter the flesh trade in the hope of providing financial support to their impoverished families.

Pol Lt-Colonel Jatuporn Arunrerkthawin from the Department of Special Investigation said Chinese-speaking women were now much in demand among customers of brothels in the South.

"Those places serve many Chinese-Malaysians," he said. "Women from countries north of Thailand have nice skin and good #124figures."

Pol Captain Yin Yin Ae, head of anti-human-trafficking in Myanmar's Tachilek, said late last year that joint operations with Thai officials had rescued 36 Myanmar girls younger than 18 from a human-smuggling gang.

"These girls left their home towns without knowing that they would be forced into prostitution," he said. "After they crossed the border, they were sold to a Thai agent who locked them up and beat them in a bid to force them into the flesh trade."

Another source said many Myanmar girls were brought into Thailand via Tak's Mae Sot district or Chiang Rai and sent to a holding centre for training in sex services. "The good-looking ones will be taken to Bangkok and the rest to the southern border provinces," the source said.

Since Thailand clearly has many human-trafficking routes, it still appeared in Tier 2 of the Watch List of the US State Department's report on human trafficking this year.

Boys and men are not exempt, because many of them are forced into backbreaking work on fishing trawlers.

Yanee said her ministry was trying hard to suppress human trafficking and urged anyone with a tip-off to call her ministry's 1300 hotline.

Pol Lt-General Pongpat Chayaphan, commissioner of the Central Investigation Bureau, said he hoped that the upcoming Asean Economic Community in 2015 would make it easier to stamp out human traffickers.

"The loopholes in the different regulations and laws used by each country will be reduced," he said. When the databases of various countries are linked, prevention of human trafficking will also get a big boost.

"Cooperation will help a lot. We have to do our best," he said.

The bureau has compiled criminal records and continues to try out new techniques and procedures to raise efficiency in its operations.

"We have sent some staff to Britain and Canada to improve our investigations. We have also worked with the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime in trying to solve the problem," he said.

LOAD-DATE: June 27, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

45 of 492 DOCUMENTS

UN Integrated Regional Information Networks (Nairobi)

June 28, 2012 Thursday

Traffickers Prey On Desperate Job Seekers

LENGTH: 1181 words

DATELINE: Quthing

At the age of 15 and with no money for school shoes or a uniform, Linda* was forced to accept that her education was over and it was time to look for a job. In Lesotho's southern Quthing District, where she lived, it is accepted wisdom that finding a job means crossing the border into South Africa, which completely surrounds this mountainous kingdom of 1.8 million people and dwarfs its tiny economy.

Linda's own mother made the move five years ago and never returned. "I don't know where she is," said Linda, whose sister also lives in South Africa.

In May 2011, Linda was approached by a woman she knew from her village who had a business about 50km across the border in the town of Sterkspruit. "She invited me to come and stay with her and work for her as a shop assistant," recalled Linda.

She did not question why she and her new employer had to cross a freezing river to enter South Africa instead of using the nearest border post, and for the first three months she was treated well enough and received a small salary. But when her employer abruptly left, putting a relative in charge of the shop, no more pay was forthcoming and Linda embarked on a relationship with the night watchman. By the time her sister arrived in December to bring her home, she was pregnant.

"I feel so sorry and angry," said the girl, now eight-months pregnant and living with her ailing grandmother.

Four months after recruiting Linda, her employer returned to the village and met Mahleki*, another 15-year-old school dropout and orphan. This time she offered to help the girl attend school in South Africa.

"I didn't really believe her," said Mahleki, "but my brother forced me to go because he couldn't look after me."

After another river crossing, Mahleki was put on a bus to Rustenberg, a mining town in the country's North West Province, and then taken to a tavern where she worked from 7am until midnight for the next seven months. In return she received two meals a day and a one-off payment of R350 ($42) to buy clothes.

In April of this year Maggie Monongoaha, a member of the Lesotho Mounted Police Service's Child and Gender Protection Unit (CGPU) who happened to live in the same village as Mahleki and Linda, made a phone call to their recruiter demanding she send Mahleki home. The woman complied but remained in Rustenberg where she faces no legal charges.

What happened to Linda and Mahleki is not unusual in Lesotho but until recently, it is unlikely that anyone in their community or even local authorities would have identified them as victims of human trafficking, which the UN's 2000 Palermo Protocol defines as: "the recruitment, transfer, harbouring or receipt of persons, by means of the threat or use of force or other forms of coercion, of abduction, of fraud, of deception... for the purpose of exploitation".

In 2010, the Ministry of Home Affairs together with the UN Development Programme (UNDP) commissioned a rapid assessment of human trafficking in Lesotho to try to gauge the magnitude of the problem. The findings did not provide much in the way of hard data, but did highlight some of the conditions that have made the country particularly vulnerable to trafficking both internally from rural to urban areas and transnationally. These include Lesotho's high levels of poverty and unemployment, the large number of children orphaned by HIV/AIDS, and its porous borders and long tradition of migration to South Africa which began with Basotho men going to work in the mines.

The report noted that men, women and children are trafficked not only for sexual exploitation, but also for forced labour on farms, for cattle herding, construction work and domestic work.

In January 2011, the Lesotho government passed anti-trafficking legislation under pressure from the USA, an important donor which had placed Lesotho on its Tier 2 Watch List for countries not showing sufficient progress in combating human trafficking.

"It's common knowledge that it was rushed through," said Sonya Martinez, director of the Beautiful Dream Society (BDS), a faith-based US NGO which runs a shelter and transition programme for victims of human trafficking in Maseru, the capital. "The move to pass the law was very good, but training and infrastructure are lacking."

Although the CPGU has been tasked with investigating trafficking cases, no budget has been allocated and training of its officers has so far been limited to Maseru. Of 40 cases reported in 2011, only one conviction was made under the new law and the offender was later released from a 15-year prison sentence after successfully appealing the verdict.

The recently released US State Department's 2012 Trafficking in Persons Report notes that the government has yet to complete a national action plan on human trafficking which would guide implementation of the new law, and that NGOs are the sole providers of protective services to victims.

Since opening its shelter in April 2011, BDS has helped 21 trafficking victims with trauma counselling, skills training and legal assistance, about half of them Basotho nationals and the rest Ethiopians, Zimbabweans and one Chinese. Martinez noted that the foreign victims were often more visible and tended to be perceived as more serious than the cases involving locals. "I believe there are many more local cases," she said, adding that orphans and young people with a history of abuse or who were the sole breadwinners for their family were particularly vulnerable.

Martinez said the greatest barrier to prosecuting more traffickers is the lack of resources for the CPGU to travel to South Africa to investigate suspected cases and bring victims home. "Often nothing ever happens to the perpetrators in South Africa," she told IRIN. "We've helped out with funding for rescues on a couple of occasions; the government hasn't budgeted any funds for this."

Senior Superintendent and Head of the CGPU Mamojela Letsie said her unit relied on a good working relationship with the South African Police Service for tip-offs which had resulted in the rescue of several men from Quthing who were promised jobs in a factory but ended up "sold" to remote cattle posts.

However, a CPGU officer based in Mohale's Hoek, about 50km north of Quthing, said that although his office sometimes received reports of locals promised employment in South Africa who ended up being exploited, it was difficult for them to follow up.

"For us at district level, it's not yet clear how we can investigate cross-border cases," he said.

At the level of prevention and awareness-raising, both the CPGU and the Ministry of Home Affairs are conducting campaigns in areas identified as high risk. NGOs including BDS, Lesotho Save the Children and World Vision are also targeting schoolchildren, border officials and radio listeners with information about the threat of human trafficking.

But Letsie admitted that most Basotho still do not know what human trafficking is. "Once people know, we think there'll be many more cases," she said.

*Not their real names

[This report does not necessarily reflect the views of the United Nations]

LOAD-DATE: June 28, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

46 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Azeri-Press news agency (APA)

June 26, 2012 Tuesday

U.S. 'Worst Human Trafficker' - Russian Diplomat

LENGTH: 350 words

The United States, which has accused Russia of insufficient effort in combating human trafficking, is itself the world's biggest importer of trafficked humans, a Russian diplomat said on Monday, APA reports quoting Ria Novosti. Russia was marked a Tier 2 Watch List country in the Trafficking in Persons Report 2012 by the U.S. State Department.

Up to 1 million people in Russia could qualify for victims of human trafficking, according to the report, which was released last week. But the report was heavily biased for political reasons, Foreign Ministry spokesman Alexander Lukashevich said in a statement on the ministry's website.

The report paints the United States and its allies as "straight-A students" on fighting human trafficking while criticizing their geopolitical opponents such as Cuba, Iran, North Korea, Sudan, Zimbabwe and Syria, a new addition to the Tier 3 list of worst offenders, Lukashevich said.

Meanwhile, between 100,000 and 500,000 illegal migrants arriving in the United States each year are victims of human trafficking, Lukashevich said, citing unspecified rights activists.

Up to 100,000 minors a year become involved with the illegal child sex industry in the U.S., and there are reports of sex slaves supplied to U.S. military forces outside the country, the diplomat said.

At the same time, Russia does not deny the serious situation with human trafficking within the country and is putting every effort into combating this illegal transnational business, Lukashevich said. The State Department has not commented on Lukashevich's statement as of Monday evening.

The United States has been increasingly criticizing Russia for various human rights violations since President Vladimir Putin first came to power in 2000.

The criticism has been eliciting an increasingly vehement reaction from Russian officials, culminating in the creation in 2011 of the office of a special ombudsman with the Russian Foreign Ministry.

The ombudsman's office presented in December a global report on human rights which featured extensive criticism of the United States and other Western countries.

LOAD-DATE: August 17, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

47 of 492 DOCUMENTS

June 26, 2012 Tuesday

Government criticised for trafficking failures

SECTION: IRELAND

LENGTH: 454 words

As with last year, the US state department's Trafficking in Persons Report 2012 keeps Ireland in the top tier of countries because it "fully complies with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking".

However, it says Ireland is a "destination, source, and transit country for women, men, and children subjected to sex trafficking and forced labour", with children subjected to prostitution "in various cities in Ireland, including Kilkenny, Cork, and Dublin".

It finds Ireland has yet to fully prosecute and convict any trafficking offenders, as defined by international standards using the 2008 anti-trafficking law, in spite of sex trafficking victims having been found in this country from "Eastern Europe and African countries including Nigeria, South America, and Asia".

"According to an NGO review of the national action plan in Jun 2011, the low number of prosecutions for trafficking contributes to an under-estimation of the severity of the trafficking problem in the country," the report states.

Its authors point out that although the Government reported four trafficking convictions in 2011, only one conviction involved a human trafficking offence consistent with international standards.

"In the trafficking case, a Nigerian woman who subjected a 16-year old girl to exploitation in prostitution received a sentence of four years' imprisonment, with two of the years suspended.

"The other cases reported by the Government involved sexual assault without commercial exploitation, organised prostitution of adults without force, fraud, or coercion, or solicitation of pornographic images of children without a commercial sex act."

It calls for the Government to make a greater effort to implement the 2008 anti-trafficking law.

The report also says the authorities should ensure proactive screening for trafficking during asylum intake interviews and ensure all potential trafficking victims, regardless of immigration status, are given an official "recovery and reflection period" during which they can decide whether to assist authorities with prosecuting their traffickers.

Last Friday, the Government announced a four-month-long consultation on the "future direction of prostitution legislation".

It listed four possible approaches that may be taken:

- * Complete criminalisation of all aspects of the trade;
- * Partial criminalisation, which could adopt the Swedish model of targeting penalties at people paying for sex rather than those working as prostitutes;
- * Legalisation to remove any involvement of the State in policing it and accept it is a part of society;

* Legalisation, but regulation of prostitution to ensure that prostitutes benefit from health checks, are protected, and brothels are registered.

LOAD-DATE: June 26, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 Thomas Crosbie Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

48 of 492 DOCUMENTS

The Nation (Thailand)

June 26, 2012 Tuesday

move to bar pregnant workers

BYLINE: The Nation

LENGTH: 261 words

Thanongsak Muennoo

The Nation

Labour Minister Phadarmchai Sasomsap is mulling a plan to bar migrant workers who are more than three months' pregnant from the country. The aim of the initiative is to discourage migrant workers from having babies in this country in order to end a misunderstanding that Thailand exploits child labour.

"Children of migrant workers have in fact stayed around factories and sometimes help with their parents' work, because if they stay at home, they are completely on their own. But some non-governmental organisations have misinterpreted their presence [at work sites] as exploitation," he said.

Phadarmchai said that to protect the image of Thailand, he was seriously considering the plan to require pregnant alien workers to leave.

"I have already asked the Labour Protection and Welfare Department to draft the regulation," he said. "I will then present the draft to relevant agencies as well as neighbouring countries for consultation."

The labour minister insisted this was not a violation of human rights.

"The migrant workers can return after they deliver their babies," he said.

Phadarmchai said the presence of migrant workers' children at factories was one of the reasons that Thailand was still on the United States' Tier 2 Human Trafficking Watch List.

He said some non-governmental organisations (NGOs) had reported sightings of migrant workers' children shelling shrimp in Samut Sakhon.

"I would like to ask the NGOs to allow us to explain before reporting these misunderstandings to the International Labour Organisation," he said.

LOAD-DATE: June 25, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

49 of 492 DOCUMENTS

The South Asian Times

June 26, 2012 Tuesday

US worst human trafficker: Russia

LENGTH: 298 wordsDATELINE: Moscow

oscow, June 26 -- Russia has accused the US of being the world's biggest importer of trafficked humans

The Russian foreign ministry said Monday that the US which has accused Russia of insufficient effort in combating human trafficking is itself the world's biggest importer of trafficked humans.

Russia has been marked a Tier 2 Watch List country in the Trafficking in Persons Report 2012 by the US State Department. According to the report released last week, up to one million people in Russia could qualify for victims of human trafficking.

The report was heavily biased for political reasons, said Foreign Ministry spokesman Alexander Lukashevich in a statement on the ministry's website.

The report paints the US and its allies as "straight-A students" on fighting human trafficking while criticising their geopolitical opponents such as Cuba, Iran, North Korea, Sudan, Zimbabwe and Syria, a new addition to the Tier 3 list of worst offenders, he added.

Meanwhile, between 100,000 and 500,000 illegal migrants arriving in the US each year are victims of human trafficking, said Lukashevich citing unspecified rights activists.

Up to 100,000 minors a year become involved with the illegal child sex industry in the US and there are reports of sex slaves supplied to US military forces outside the country, he added.

At the same time, Russia does not deny the serious situation with human trafficking within the country and is putting every effort into combating this illegal transnational business, Lukashevich said.

The US State Department was yet to comment on Lukashevich's statement. Published by HT Syndication with permission from The South Asian Times. For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: July 1, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

50 of 492 DOCUMENTS

The Business Insider

June 25, 2012 Monday 6:00 PM EST

The Russians Just Tweeted An Epic Diatribe Against The State Department's New Human Trafficking Report

LENGTH: 130 words

The Russian government's use of Twitter is legendarily melodramatic and far more enthralling than most of what the U.S. government puts out.

So the Russians did not disappoint when earlier today they responded to the State Department's new report, which labels them a "Tier-2 Watch List" violator of international human trafficking standards the second worst level of offense.

Alexander Lukashovich, the spokesman for Russia's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, launched into an enraged, 7-tweet response accusing the U.S. of hypocrisy and ulterior motives.

Check out the rant below.

Meanwhile, the State Department's account continues to Tweet links to read-outs of official statements...

Unfollowed.

Please follow Politics on Twitter and Facebook.

Join the conversation about this story ^a

LOAD-DATE: June 25, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Web BlogJOURNAL-CODE: BZIN-5352

Copyright 2012 Newstex LLC
All Rights Reserved
Newstex Web Blogs
Copyright 2012 The Business Insider

51 of 492 DOCUMENTS

BusinessWorld

June 25, 2012 Monday

106 trafficking victims rescued in June

BYLINE: Noemi M. Gonzales

SECTION: Pg. S1/11

LENGTH: 233 words

AT LEAST 106 persons were rescued from being smuggled in June as the government intensifies efforts against human trafficking, the Vice- President said yesterday.

In a statement, Vice-President Jejomar C. Binay said the Inter-Agency Council Against Trafficking (IACAT) rescued 85 victims on board the M/L Kadrina at the boundary of Zamboanga and Pilas Islands on June 4, while the other 21 were rescued in other separate operations this month.

"This is one of the biggest hauls we had this year," Mr. Binay said. "What is worse was that the lives of the legitimate passengers were also put at risk because the boat was overloaded," he added, referring to the ship that was intercepted in Zamboanga.

Ten persons intercepted at the Ninoy Aquino International Airport on June 12 claimed an illegal recruiter promised work in the US. Others were rescued at the Diosdado Macapagal International Airport. Suspected traffickers will be charged with violating Republic Act No. 9208 or the Anti-Trafficking Act of 2003.

The US Department of State had released the 2012 Global Trafficking in Persons Report which maintained the Tier 2 status of the Philippines. The category groups countries that do not meet the minimum requirements prescribed in the US Trafficking Victims Protections Act, but are doing significant efforts to do so.

Mr. Binay said he will convene the IACAT next month to discuss reform programs.

LOAD-DATE: June 24, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

52 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Independent.ie

Irish Independent

June 25, 2012 Monday

Gangs use voodoo to force women into prostitution

SECTION: NATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 458 words

CRIMINAL gangs are using voodoo rituals to traffic young African women into the country to be exploited as prostitutes.

The "black magic" hoodwinks the women into believing their families will suffer if they don't agree to travel here.

Gardai encountered the practice during a wide-ranging investigation into human trafficking.

The women are targeted by local 'witch doctors' who are hired by gangs to act as recruitment agents in areas where voodoo rituals are part of the culture.

The victims are then forced into prostitution and put to work in brothels, earning huge profits for the gang controlling the racket.

Now gardai are satisfied they have identified the organisers of the biggest prostitution and human-trafficking ring to operate here for several years.

An investigation discovered evidence to show it was the first prostitution racket run jointly by Irish and Nigerian criminals.

As a result of their inquiries, gardai have rescued 12 trafficking victims and the young women are being given an opportunity to rebuild their lives.

The gang is being targeted under Operation Mast, which is led by the human-trafficking investigation and co-ordination unit within the Garda National Immigration Bureau and has been under way for the past three-and-a-half years.

Complex

Mast has concentrated, in particular, on the gang's activities in counties Sligo, Longford, Monaghan and Limerick.

Officers have sent a complex file on a dozen Irish and Nigerian suspects to the Director of Public Prosecutions -- and this is currently under consideration by lawyers.

Apart from the voodoo ploy, other Nigerian women have become victims of debt bondage. They owe sums of between EUR2,000 and EUR5,000 to the traffickers, who arranged for them to come here on the basis of finding legitimate jobs as nannies and domestic employees.

When they arrived here, they were forced into brothels set up around the country.

Gardai made a breakthrough when they found a woman who had been working as a prostitute from a house in an estate in Sligo town.

Gardai raided the house after it was noted some Nigerian women were living there without making themselves known to the relevant authorities.

One woman claimed she had earned EUR44,300 working as a prostitute by that stage and had given half of that directly to her controller, while the rest went on rent and bills.

A large chunk of the profits was then wired back to Nigeria through Western Union.

Meanwhile, a review by the US State Department has placed Ireland in the top tier of countries deemed to be meeting their obligations in tackling human trafficking.

This is the third year in a row for Ireland to be included in Tier One.

Gardai rescued 69 trafficking victims in 2009, 78 in 2010 and 57 last year.

LOAD-DATE: June 25, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 Independent News and Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

53 of 492 DOCUMENTS

CANA News

June 24, 2012 Sunday

CMCFeature: Caribbean countries still not doing enough against human trafficking - US report

BYLINE: Nelson KingLENGTH: 253 words

Despite the adoption of treaties and laws prohibiting the return to slavery that formally ended in the Caribbean two centuries ago, the United States says more than a dozen Caribbean countries participate in human trafficking in which many men, women, and children continue to live in modern-day slavery.

In its Trafficking in Persons Report 2012, the US Department of State has identified English and Spanish-speaking Caribbean nations as not making the minimum effort to fight the scourge, ranking them according to their alleged violations as Tier 2, Tier 2 Watch List and the worst offenders, Tier 3.

It places in "Tier 1" those governments that fully comply with the US Trafficking Victims Protection Act's (TVPA) minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. No Caribbean countries are on this list.

But those countries which, while not fully complying with the TVPA's minimum standards, are making "significant efforts" to comply with those standards are placed on "Tier 2": Antigua and Barbuda, Belize, Dominican Republic, Guyana, St. Lucia, St. Vincent and the Grenadines, and Trinidad and Tobago.

Beyond Tier 2 is the Tier 2 Watch List, where the State Department places the Bahamas, Barbados, Haiti, Jamaica and Suriname. It is in these countries where the absolute number of victims of severe forms of trafficking is very significant or is significantly increasing. The US says these governments do not fully comply with the TVPA's minimum standards but are making significant efforts towards compliance.

LOAD-DATE: August 17, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 CANA News
All Rights Reserved

54 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Gulf Daily News

June 22, 2012

128 trafficking cases last year

BYLINE: Sandeep SINGH Grewal

LENGTH: 704 words

NEARLY 130 cases of human trafficking were recorded in Bahrain last year.

The US State Department Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report said around 70,000 domestic workers in Bahrain were also considered to be "highly vulnerable" to forced labour and sexual exploitation because they were not protected by the country's labour laws.

Non-governmental organisations (NGOs) in Bahrain reported 128 victims of human trafficking, some of whom were referred by the government, according to the publication, which was released yesterday.

"Abuse and sexual assault of domestic workers are significant problems in Bahrain, however, strict confinement to the household and intimidation by employers prevent these workers from reporting abuse," said the report, quoting government and NGO officials.

The government reportedly investigated 18 cases, five of which resulted in the conviction of those found guilty.

The TIP report, released by Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, gives a detailed account of trafficking, slavery and the testimonies of victims, including forced labour, for 186 countries.

Bahrain was placed on the Tier 2 watch list, the same ranking it had last year, for countries where the absolute number of victims of severe forms of trafficking was significant or increasing and there was failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons from the previous year.

Standards

The report stated Bahrain "does not" fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, however, it is making significant efforts to do so.

"The government continued to investigate and prosecute a few trafficking offences during the reporting period," the report said.

Among the other GCC countries, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait were placed in Tier 3 - for nations which do not comply with the minimum standards - while Oman, Qatar and the UAE were also in Tier 2.

The report is prepared by US diplomatic posts and domestic agencies and is based on meetings a wide variety of government officials, local and international NGOs, journalists and academics.

"NGOs report that Bangladeshi unskilled workers are in particularly high demand in Bahrain and are considered exploitable since they do not typically protest difficult work conditions or low pay," it said.

Quoting a Labour Market Regulatory Authority study, the report said 65 per cent of migrant workers had not seen their employment contract and 89pc were unaware of their employment terms upon arrival in Bahrain.

It also stated 70pc of foreign workers borrowed money or sold property in their home countries to secure a job in Bahrain.

The TIP report praised the Interior Ministry for operating a freephone hotline for trafficking victims, but noted a significant drop in the number of calls it received in 2011.

However, it criticised the government for failing to follow up and ensure prosecution of people involved in human trafficking and those guilty of negligence in incidents involving injury or death of expatriates.

"It is not known how many of these convictions, if any, involved human trafficking offences," it said.

"The media reported possibly negligent deaths of foreign workers in labour camps due to carbon monoxide poisoning and electrical fires; it is unclear whether the government investigated these deaths."

The report recommends Bahrain enforce the 2008 anti-trafficking law and significantly increase investigation and prosecution of trafficking offences - particularly those involving forced labour.

It also urged authorities to expand the government-run shelter to have qualified staff who are able to communicate in different languages.

Bahrain has also been asked to identify victims among vulnerable groups, such as migrant domestic workers who have left their employers or women arrested for prostitution.

"Bahrain is a destination country for men and women subjected to forced labour and sex trafficking," said the report.

"Men and women from India, Pakistan, Nepal, Sri Lanka, Bangladesh, Indonesia, Thailand, the Philippines, Ethiopia, and Eritrea migrate voluntarily to Bahrain to work as domestic workers or as unskilled labourers in the construction and service industries," the report added.

sandy@gdn.com.bh

LOAD-DATE: June 24, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: 5

55 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Korea Times

June 22, 2012 FridayNK worst in combating human trafficking: US report*BYLINE: By Kim Eun-jiLENGTH: 219 words

The two Koreas showed a stark difference in the U.S. annual report on human trafficking, released on June 19, which covers 185 countries.

North Korea was placed in Tier 3, the worst and last of the four grades, against South Korea's Tier 1. The placing was determined on the 'extent of government action to combat trafficking rather than the size of the problem,' according to the report.

The 33 nations in Tier 1 have acknowledged the existence of human trafficking and made efforts to address the problem, the report said.

North Korea does not fully comply with the U.S. Trafficking Victims Protection Act's minimum standards and is not making significant efforts to do so.

The report also pointed out Korean sailors abused Indonesian migrant laborers under the section Exploiting the World's Oceans.

'[The laborers'] alleged physical and psychological abuses as well as severe underpayment or nonpayment of wages by Korean fishing vessels operating under contract to New Zealand companies,' said the report.

'This year's report tells us that we are making a lot of progress. Twenty-nine countries were upgraded from a lower tier to a higher one,' said U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton.

Clinton noted, however, that an estimation of 27 million 'modern slaves' are still suffering as victims of human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: June 22, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 The Korea Times
All Rights Reserved

56 of 492 DOCUMENTS

THE KOREA HERALD

June 22, 2012 Friday

Korean victims of sex trafficking in Japan receive renewed attention

LENGTH: 335 words

Yonhap Photo

"I've lost so much blood, I feel dizzy. It's debt. They won't listen."

A Korean female victim sent an urgent text message for help to an anti-trafficking group. The group revealed sex trafficking stories of the victim and others at a press conference in Tokyo Wednesday.

The unnamed victim was malnourished and suffering from abdominal inflammation when she sent the distressed message to Polaris Project Japan's hotline.

The woman, who is in her twenties, had been forced into prostitution after she had arrived in Japan with false hopes of making money as a bar hostess to pay off her debt.

She had gotten the idea from her female employer at a Seoul bar, who had recommended that she move to Japan to quickly make money.

But her nightmares began when she met the broker in Tokyo. She was taken to an apartment in the Ueno district, where she was under constant monitoring with surveillance cameras in her room and corridor. The broker took away her passport. All of the money she made working as a prostitute went to the pimp.

The victim recalled that she had been too afraid to call the police, as she was a foreigner unprotected by the law. After she came across the hotline for women, she took actions.

About 30 percent of S.O.S calls made to the hotline since 2005 were by Koreans, making them the most targeted foreign victims, according to the PPJ.

Filipino and Thai women came in second and third, taking up 11 percent and 7 percent of the calls, respectively. Thirty-six percent of the calls were from Japanese women.

The group disclosed other detailed stories of sex trafficking cases in Japan, including that of a Korean student who started out working in the kitchen of a hostess bar and ended up being forced into prostitution due to debt.

According to the annual Trafficking in Persons Report published Tuesday by the U.S. State Department, Japan was categorized as a Tier 2 country whose government "does not fully comply with minimum standards."

By Sim Guk-by

Intern Reporter

(simgukby@heraldm.com)

LOAD-DATE: June 22, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

All Rights Reserved

57 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Northwest Voices: Letters to the Editor

June 22, 2012 Friday 11:43 PM EST

Human-trafficking legislation

LENGTH: 171 words

Rid the world of slavery

On Tuesday, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton released the 2012 Trafficking in Persons Report [U.S. adds Syria to human-trafficking blacklist, seattletimes.com, June 19], which ranks 184 countries on their efforts to combat human trafficking, including the United States.

While the U.S. has long been a global leader in the fight against modern-day slavery, this Congress has thus far failed to pass a critical piece of anti-trafficking legislation: The Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act.

This bill renews the landmark TVPA of 2000, which made human trafficking a federal crime and established the Trafficking in Persons Office to combat trafficking internationally.

Fighting slavery has always been a rare point of bipartisan cooperation in Washington. As we approach the anniversary of our nation's founding—a nation conceived in liberty, in the words of President Lincoln, Congress should come together again to rid the world of slavery, once and for all.

Ruthanne McPhaden, Seattle

LOAD-DATE: June 25, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Web BlogJOURNAL-CODE: SE-3860

Copyright 2012 Newstex LLC
All Rights Reserved
Newstex Web Blogs
Copyright 2012 Northwest Voices: Letters to the Editor

58 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Singapore Government News

June 22, 2012 Friday 6:30 AM EST

Government of Singapore: Response to the 2012 US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report

LENGTH: 753 words

Singapore, June 22 -- The Singapore Inter-agency Taskforce on Trafficking in Persons (TIP) notes that Singapore has maintained its Tier 2 position in the US Department of State's TIP Report 2012. While the Taskforce notes some inaccuracies and misrepresentations in the report, it is a balanced report.

2. In the past year, the Singapore Inter-agency Taskforce on TIP, co-chaired by the Ministry of Home Affairs (MHA) and the Ministry of Manpower (MOM), and consisting of representatives from the Singapore Police Force (SPF), Immigration & Checkpoints Authority (ICA), Ministry of Community Development, Youth & Sports (MCYS), Ministry of Health (MOH), the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MFA) and the Attorney-General's Chambers (AGC), have stepped up efforts to respond proactively to TIP on our shores (see Annex A for Taskforce efforts in 2011). The Taskforce recognises Singapore's allure as a potential destination for human trafficking syndicates, and the need for a robust response involving coordination between government agencies and partnerships with other governments and non-governmental stakeholders.

3. Singapore's response to TIP is based on our 4 Ps strategy (Prevention, Prosecution, Protection and Partnership).

a. Prevention: To reduce the incidence of TIP through early detection and reporting of potential cases and the raising of awareness of TIP amongst key stakeholders not limiting to government officials, employers, workers and the general public.

b. Prosecution: To enhance the effectiveness of investigation and prosecution of TIP cases, and pursue commensurate criminal penalties and deterrent sentencing against perpetrators in serious cases, consistent with local laws.

c. Protection: To enhance the management of victims through proactive identification of victims and the setting up of a protection and care system supportive of victims' needs.

d. Partnership: To create strong partnerships with foreign governments, businesses, media, academia and civil society so as to maximise resources in combating TIP.

4. In 2011, the Taskforce started work on a National Plan of Action (NPA) based on these 4 Ps, which would serve as our holistic strategy to respond to TIP threats. The NPA was crafted after intensive consultation with stakeholders, and launched on 21 March this year by Mr Tan Chuan-Jin, Minister of State for National Development and Manpower (his speech can be found at <http://www.mom.gov.sg/newsroom/Pages/SpeechesDetail.aspx?listid=375>). The NPA contains 31 initiatives and is a roadmap for concerted action from 2012 to 2015. It will strengthen current policies and systems, as well as develop new ones to address current gaps.

5. The Taskforce's current focus is to implement the deliverables set out in the NPA, including reviewing the adequacy of existing legislation in tackling TIP crimes. One immediate task is to build victim identification capabilities in government agencies so that our frontline officers are able to identify potential trafficking victims and that our processes are able to appropriately handle these cases. Another challenge is that the concept of 'human trafficking' is not widely understood, or misunderstood, in Singapore. For a case to be classified as sex or labour trafficking, it must involve the act, the means and be clearly for the purpose of exploitation. While certain elements of a case (e.g. incurring high levels of debt) may be indicative of trafficking in persons, it may not be sufficient. We will also continue to work with interested stakeholders to raise public awareness of TIP to businesses and the general public so that more people can play a part in fighting this crime.

6. Singapore has shown that it takes a serious view of TIP and its related crimes, first with the setting up of the Inter-agency Taskforce in 2010, and then with the launch of our first NPA in March 2012. We look forward to continued co-operation with NGOs, embassies, academia, the private sector and the general public as we implement our NPA initiatives.

7. As a final point, while we welcome the United States' efforts to produce an annual report to highlight this important global issue, we remain of the view that the United States needs to adopt a more objective methodology in future editions of its TIP Report. This will ensure that a consistent, transparent, and measurable standard is applied to all countries and a better understanding of the different legal structures and domestic contexts of countries ranked in the report is taken into account.

LOAD-DATE: June 23, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

59 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE

Singapore Government News

June 22, 2012 Friday 6:30 AM EST

Ministry of Manpower: Singapore Inter-Agency Taskforce's Official Statement in Response to the 2012 US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report

LENGTH: 743 words

Singapore, June 22 -- 1. The Singapore Inter-agency Taskforce on Trafficking in Persons (TIP) notes that Singapore has maintained its Tier 2 position in the US Department of State's TIP Report 2012. While the taskforce notes some inaccuracies and misrepresentations in the report, it is a balanced report.

2. In the past year, the Singapore Inter-agency Taskforce on TIP, co-chaired by the Ministry of Home Affairs (MHA) and the Ministry of Manpower (MOM), and consisting of representatives from the Singapore Police Force (SPF), Immigrations & Checkpoints Authority (ICA), Ministry of Community Development, Youth & Sports (MCYS), Ministry of Health (MOH), the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MFA) and the Attorney-General's Chambers (AGC), have stepped up efforts to respond proactively to TIP on our shores (see Annex for Taskforce efforts in 2011). The Taskforce recognises Singapore's allure as a potential destination for human trafficking syndicates, and the need for a robust response involving coordination between government agencies and partnerships with other governments and non-governmental stakeholders.

3. Singapore's response to TIP is based on our 4 Ps strategy (Prevention, Prosecution, Protection and Partnership).

a. Prevention: To reduce the incidence of TIP through early detection and reporting of potential cases and the raising of awareness of TIP amongst key stakeholders not limiting to government officials, employers, workers and the general public.

b. Prosecution: To enhance the effectiveness of investigation and prosecution of TIP cases, and pursue commensurate criminal penalties and deterrent sentencing against perpetrators in serious cases, consistent with local laws.

c. Protection: To enhance the management of victims through proactive identification of victims and the setting up of a protection and care system supportive of victims' needs.

d. Partnership: To create strong partnerships with foreign governments, businesses, media, academia and civil society so as to maximise resources in combating TIP.

4. In 2011, the Taskforce started work on a National Plan of Action (NPA) based on these 4 Ps, which would serve as our holistic strategy to respond to TIP threats. The NPA was crafted after intensive consultation with stakeholders, and launched on 21 March this year by Mr Tan Chuan-Jin, Minister of State for National Development and Manpower (his speech can be found at here). The NPA contains 31 initiatives and is a roadmap for concerted action from 2012 to 2015. It will strengthen current policies and systems, as well as develop new ones to address current gaps.

5. The Taskforce's current focus is to implement the deliverables set out in the NPA, including reviewing the adequacy of existing legislation in tackling TIP crimes. One immediate task is to build victim identification capabilities in government agencies so that our frontline officers are able to identify potential trafficking victims and that our processes are able to appropriately handle these cases. Another challenge is that the concept of 'human trafficking' is not widely understood, or misunderstood, in Singapore. For a case to be classified as sex or labour trafficking, it must involve the act, the means and be clearly for the purpose of exploitation. While certain elements of a case (e.g. incurring high levels of debt) may be indicative of trafficking in persons, it may not be sufficient. We will also continue to work with interested stakeholders to raise public awareness of TIP to businesses and the general public so that more people can play a part in fighting this crime.

6. Singapore has shown that it takes a serious view of TIP and its related crimes, first with the setting up of the Inter-agency Taskforce in 2010, and then with the launch of our first NPA in March 2012. We look forward to continued cooperation with NGOs, embassies, academia, the private sector and the general public as we implement our NPA initiatives.

7. As a final point, while we welcome the United States' efforts to produce an annual report to highlight this important global issue, we remain of the view that the United States needs to adopt a more objective methodology in future editions of its TIP Report. This will ensure that a consistent, transparent, and measurable framework is applied to all countries and a better understanding of the different legal structures and domestic contexts of countries ranked in the report is taken into account.

LOAD-DATE: June 23, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

60 of 492 DOCUMENTS

The Advertiser (Australia)

June 21, 2012 Thursday
1 - State Edition

Millions living in slavery Report outlines modern state of global people trafficking

SECTION: FOREIGN; Pg. 53

LENGTH: 354 words

WASHINGTON: Up to 27 million people are living in slavery around the world, US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton says.

At the launch of an annual report into human trafficking yesterday, she said: "The end of legal slavery in the US and in other countries around the world has not, unfortunately, meant the end of slavery.

"It is estimated as many as 27 million people around the world are victims of modern slavery, what we sometimes call trafficking in persons.

"Those victims . . . remind us of the kind of inhumane treatment we are capable of as human beings," said Mrs Clinton.

The report, however, showed that as governments became more aware of the issue, progress was being made in wiping out what it called the "scourge of trafficking".

Out of the 185 countries included in the 2012 report, only 33 complied fully with laws in place to end human trafficking - putting them at the top of a four-tier ranking system.

But five countries had moved up from the bottom black list known as tier 3, including Burma and Venezuela, to be included among the 42 countries now on what is known as a tier 2 watchlist.

Syria, however, fell on to the black list for the first time.

"The government of Syria does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to do so," the 2012 Trafficking in Persons report said.

Among the 16 other countries on the blacklist were Algeria, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Libya, North Korea and Saudi Arabia.

Kenya slipped down on to the watchlist for the first time in five years.

Nigeria lost its place on tier 1 - moving down a notch as the report outlined how in Nigeria in recent times, women and children had been forced into labour and sex trafficking.

However, Mrs Clinton hailed the fact that a total of 29 countries had been upgraded to a higher ranking, "which means that their governments are taking the right steps".

They included Bangladesh, which was bumped up to tier 2 for making significant efforts to comply with minimum standards, including passing "a comprehensive anti-trafficking law" in December.

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: ADV

Copyright 2012 Nationwide News Pty Limited
All Rights Reserved

61 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
The Advocate (Burnie)June 21, 2012 Thursday27 million living in slavery: Clinton*SECTION: Pg. 21LENGTH: 165 words

WASHINGTON (AFP) _ Up to 27 million people are living in slavery around the world, US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton says.

At the launch of an annual report into human trafficking on Tuesday, she said: "The end of legal slavery in the United States and in other countries around the world has not, unfortunately, meant the end of slavery.

"Today it is estimated as many as 27 million people around the world are victims of modern slavery, what we sometimes call trafficking in persons.

"Those victims ... remind us of the kind of inhumane treatment we are capable of as human beings," Ms Clinton said.

The report, however, showed that as governments became more aware of the issue progress was being made in wiping out what it called the "scourge of trafficking".

Out of the 185 countries included in the 2012 report, only 33 complied fully with laws in place to end human trafficking, putting them at the top of a four- tier ranking system.

Syria fell onto the blacklist for the first time.

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

62 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
Bendigo Advertiser

June 21, 2012 Thursday

WASHINGTON Up to 27 million people are living inSECTION: EARLY GENERAL NEWS; Pg. 14LENGTH: 218 words

WASHINGTON Up to 27 million people are living in slavery around the world, US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton says.

At the launch of an annual report into human trafficking on Tuesday, she said: "The end of legal slavery in the United States and in other countries around the world has not, unfortunately, meant the end of slavery.

"Today it is estimated as many as 27 million people around the world are victims of modern slavery, what we sometimes call trafficking in persons.

"Those victims ... remind us of the kind of inhumane treatment we are capable of as human beings," said Clinton.

The report, however, showed that as governments became more aware of the issue progress was being made in wiping out what it called the "scourge of trafficking".

Out of the 185 countries included in the 2012 report, only 33 complied fully with laws in place to end human trafficking, putting them at the top of a four-tier ranking system.

But five countries had moved up from the bottom blacklist known as tier 3, including Burma and Venezuela, to be included among the 42 countries now on what is known as a tier 2 watchlist.

Syria, however, fell onto the blacklist for the first time.

Among the 16 other countries on the blacklist were Algeria, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Libya, North Korea and Saudi Arabia. AFP

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

63 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
Bendigo Advertiser

June 21, 2012 Thursday

WASHINGTON Up to 27 million people are living inSECTION: EARLY GENERAL NEWS; Pg. 14LENGTH: 218 words

WASHINGTON Up to 27 million people are living in slavery around the world, US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton says.

At the launch of an annual report into human trafficking on Tuesday, she said: "The end of legal slavery in the United States and in other countries around the world has not, unfortunately, meant the end of slavery.

"Today it is estimated as many as 27 million people around the world are victims of modern slavery, what we sometimes call trafficking in persons.

"Those victims ... remind us of the kind of inhumane treatment we are capable of as human beings," said Clinton.

The report, however, showed that as governments became more aware of the issue progress was being made in wiping out what it called the "scourge of trafficking".

Out of the 185 countries included in the 2012 report, only 33 complied fully with laws in place to end human trafficking, putting them at the top of a four-tier ranking system.

But five countries had moved up from the bottom blacklist known as tier 3, including Burma and Venezuela, to be included among the 42 countries now on what is known as a tier 2 watchlist.

Syria, however, fell onto the blacklist for the first time.

Among the 16 other countries on the blacklist were Algeria, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Libya, North Korea and Saudi Arabia. AFP

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

64 of 492 DOCUMENTS

BusinessWorld

June 21, 2012 Thursday

Manila's trafficking grade maintained (... as US cites added funding to boost campaign)

BYLINE: Aubrey E. Barrameda

SECTION: Pg. S1/11

LENGTH: 916 words

THE PHILIPPINES has maintained its Tier 2 status in the 2012 Global Trafficking in Persons (GTIP) report of the US government, an indication that the country is making significant efforts in curbing the crime.

"The government of the Philippines does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so," stated the report released yesterday.

The Philippines was cited for a higher budget given to the Inter- Agency Council Against Trafficking (IACAT) to $1.5 million in 2011 from $230,000 in 2010. IACAT leads in the campaign against human trafficking.

Others were:

- . * prosecution and conviction of trafficking offenders and implementation of a new program to protect and rehabilitate victims;
- . * addressing trafficking-related corruption as well as the filing of criminal cases against 18 officials since last year;
- . * coordination with other countries to protect the rights of overseas Filipino workers;
- . * training of officials; and
- . * strengthening and expanding structures to screen for trafficking indicators before Filipino migrant workers' departure overseas.

Under the US Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000, Tier 2 countries are those whose governments are making significant efforts to bring themselves at par with those standards.

The Philippines, for its part, welcomed the report.

"The report recognized our government's increased funding for its efforts in curbing the problem through its primary anti-human trafficking outfit, the Inter-Agency Council Against Trafficking," IACAT chairman and Justice Secretary Leila M. de Lima said in a statement.

"We hope to sustain this consistency and improve upon our efforts to curb trafficking in persons in the country," Vice-President Jejomar C. Binay, who is chairman emeritus of the IACAT, was quoted as saying in a separate statement.

Despite Philippine achievements in combating human trafficking, however, the GTIP report also noted areas where the country needs improvement.

"The government, however, did not make progress on efforts to criminally prosecute labor recruitment companies involved in the trafficking of migrant workers abroad," it said.

It added that "overall victim identification and protection efforts remained inadequate" and that "rampant corruption at all levels continues to enable traffickers and undermines efforts to combat trafficking."

It also mentioned that "although the DoJ (Department of Justice) continued to encourage courts' expedited processing of trafficking cases, inefficiencies in the judicial system continue to pose serious challenges to the successful prosecution of some trafficking cases."

The GTIP noted that there are over 680 pending trafficking cases in courts and 129 other cases pending at the DoJ.

The "no progress" areas could be attributed to lack of funding, said Jan Chavez-Arceo, executive officer of the IACAT's Public Information and Communications Division.

"In terms of what we need to do, the efforts are unrelenting...but there are limitations," she said, explaining that though there were direct instructions from the Justice secretary and from President Benigno S. C. Aquino III to pursue the prosecution of human trafficking perpetrators, the resources to facilitate anti-trafficking operations remain inadequate.

"Yes, the budget increased, but... the entire operation requires more than that," she said.

Aside from recommending that the government sustain its intensified efforts to investigate and convict labor and sex traffickers, the GTIP report also recommended to increase the funding for anti-trafficking programs as well as for the DoJ's witness and victim protection programs.

The report also suggested, among others, the development of mechanisms to track and monitor trafficking cases at the DoJ and in the courts; the increase in victim processing centers and shelter resources to improve identification of victims and allow them to be safely processed and assisted after rescue operations; and the implementation of programs to reduce demand for commercial sex acts.

Ms. Arceo said IACAT is requesting a P100-million budget next year but the Department of Budget and Management, in a meeting yesterday, set the amount at P40 million

The current budget of P50 million, she added, is even lower than last year's P65 million.

The Philippines risks being downgraded to Tier 2 Watch List category in the next GTIP Report if the budget for IACAT is increased, Ms. Arceo further said.

Mr. Binay, meanwhile, said that they "have taken note of the recommendations of the US State Department and will act on these at the soonest possible time."

Countries ranked under Tier 1 are those whose governments fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of severe forms of trafficking.

This is the highest ranking a country may receive, according to the Justice department.

Tier 2 Watch List countries, on the other hand, are those which the absolute number of victims of severe forms of trafficking is very significant or is significantly increasing with no evidence of increasing efforts to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons from the previous year.

This was the status of the Philippines before its was upgraded to Tier 2 last year.

Lastly, Tier 3 ranking is given to countries whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so, and will be subject to the withholding of non-humanitarian and non-trade assistance from the US.

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

65 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Daily News (Sri Lanka)

June 21, 2012 Thursday

Human trafficking prevention: US hails Lanka

LENGTH: 109 words

DATELINE: Sri Lanka

Sri Lanka, June 21 -- The Sri Lankan government made significant progress in its efforts to prevent human trafficking last year, the US annual report on global human trafficking said. The 2012 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report released on Tuesday by the US State Department placed Sri Lanka among Tier 2 countries.

The 2012 Trafficking in Persons Report analyzed 186 countries by looking at what the governments are doing against human trafficking. Published by HT Syndication with permission from Daily News Sri Lanka. For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 The Associated Newspapers of Ceylon Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

66 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Geelong Advertiser (Australia)

June 21, 2012 Thursday
1 - First Edition Edition

IN BRIEF

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 10

LENGTH: 398 words

Melbourne's HIV test hope

A CRUCIAL new low-cost blood test for HIV sufferers in developing countries that could help 33 million people worldwide may be available later this year. The simple test, developed by researchers at Melbourne's Burnet Institute, shows how much damage the HIV virus has done to the immune system and whether lifesaving antiretroviral drugs are required. The finger-prick blood test would ideally target developing African and Asian countries in which laboratories and expensive equipment normally needed to carry out the tests were scarce, said the co-head of Burnet's Centre for Virology, Professor Suzanne Crowe.

Australian slave verdict

SMALL but sophisticated organised crime networks built around family and business connections are responsible for most labour slavery in Australia, the US Government says. The annual US State Department Trafficking in Persons Report ranks Australia in the top tier of countries fighting human trafficking and slavery. But that does not mean Australia has no trafficking problem, the report says. "Australia is primarily a destination country for women subjected to forced prostitution and to a lesser extent, women and men subjected to forced labor," the report says.

Baden-Clay in court

ALLEGED murderer Gerard Baden-Clay's application for bail is expected to be heard in Brisbane today, eight days after he was charged with killing his wife. Lawyers have lodged an application in the Queensland Supreme Court indicating the 41-year-old will seek conditional release while he awaits trial. The real estate agent is charged with murdering his wife, Allison, and interfering with her body. He remains in custody in the medical wing of the Arthur Gorrie Correctional Centre at Wacol, west of Brisbane.

PM warning on stumbles

PRIME Minister Julia Gillard has warned of "further stumbles" in the global economy, but says Group of 20 leaders have made good progress toward restoring growth and stabilising European banks. Ms Gillard was speaking ahead of her departure to Rio de Janeiro for United Nations environmental talks after two days of economic debate at a G20 summit in the Mexican resort city of Los Cabos. "There will continue to be, no doubt, further problems and potentially further stumbles on the road to global recovery," she said. "But throughout all of that, Australia, with its strong economy, will stand tall."

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: GAT

Copyright 2012 Nationwide News Pty Limited
All Rights Reserved

67 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
The Gold Coast Bulletin (Australia)June 21, 2012 Thursday
B - Main EditionSlavery rife around world*SECTION: WORLD; Pg. 17LENGTH: 178 words

WASHINGTON: Up to 27 million people are living in slavery around the world, US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton says.

At the launch of an annual report into human trafficking yesterday, she said: "The end of legal slavery in the United States and in other countries around the world has not, unfortunately, meant the end of slavery.

"Today it is estimated as many as 27 million people around the world are victims of modern slavery, what we sometimes call trafficking in persons," said Clinton (pictured).

"Those victims . . . remind us of the kind of inhumane treatment we are capable of as human beings."

But the report showed progress was being made in wiping out what it called the "scourge of trafficking".

Out of the 185 countries in the 2012 report, only 33 complied fully with laws in place to end human trafficking, putting them at the top of a four-tier ranking system.

But five countries had moved up from the bottom blacklist known as tier 3, including Burma and Venezuela, to be included among the 42 countries now on what is known as a tier 2 watchlist.

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: NewspaperJOURNAL-CODE: GCB

68 of 492 DOCUMENTS

June 21, 2012 Thursday

Stop sending workers to countries where their lives are at risk, Manila says

BYLINE: Gilbert P. Felongco Correspondent

LENGTH: 580 words

Manila:

Recruitment agencies have been warned by the government against recruiting and sending Filipinos to jobs in countries where their lives are placed at risk.

In an advisory, Philippine Overseas and Employment Agency (POEA) Administrator Hans Leo Cacdac warned placement agencies to stop recruiting workers for Syria and other countries declared by the government as dangerous to Filipinos. Likewise, the agency asked job applicants not to accept job offers to these countries.

"These recruiters are heartless, sending their recruits to actual war zones and other destinations with hostile and hazardous working conditions," Cacdac said in obvious reference to dozens of workers who accepted job offers in strife-torn countries such as Syria.

The Philippines had been bearing the cost and trouble of repatriating Filipinos from Syria despite a 2009 order banning Filipinos from taking up jobs in the Middle East country.

According to the Department of Foreign Affairs, as of June 18, a total of 1,643 Filipinos have been repatriated since December 2011 when violence flared up in Syria as a result of political unrest.

Cacdac said the POEA is filing charges immediately against licensed recruitment agencies found to have sent workers to countries with existing restrictions.

Other countries

Aside from Syria, the POEA chief noted that other countries where restrictions on recruiting and deploying Filipino workers is observed include Afghanistan, Iraq, Jordan and Yemen.

In the case of Afghanistan, only Filipino rehires working inside American military camps and facilities with existing employment contracts are allowed.

In Iraq, Filipinos are banned from working in the country except in Kurdistan region.

Returning workers who were processed prior to June 18, 2007 and returning to the same employer are allowed in Lebanon.

In Jordan, newly hired household service workers are not allowed.

As for Yemen, only workers returning to existing employers are allowed.

Cacdac believes that some recruiters are circumventing the ban by using another country.

"The deployment of OFWs [Overseas Filipino Workers] to prohibited destinations cannot proceed without those illegal recruiters who continue to circumvent the ban by sending Filipino workers to their destinations through a third country," he said.

He added that the POEA has already filed charges against nine recruitment agencies for deploying household service workers to Syria early this year.

Trafficking report

In a related development, the Philippines has retained its Tier 2 status in the latest Global Trafficking in Persons (GTIP) Report of the United States Department of State.

Vice-President Jejomar Binay, in a statement in his Office of the Vice-President website, reportedly announced the development during an event in Jeddah, Saudi Arabia.

"As Chairman Emeritus of the Inter-Agency Council Against Trafficking (IACAT), I am pleased to announce that the Philippines has retained its Tier 2 status in the US State Department's Global Trafficking in Persons Report for 2012," Binay said.

"Being in Tier 2 status means that we are making significant efforts to comply with the requirements of the US Trafficking Victims Protection Act [TVPA]," he said. "We were in Tier 2 Watch List status during the previous administration, in danger of being placed under Tier 3, which means being included in the list of countries that do not cooperate in the fight against trafficking and subjected to US foreign assistance sanctions," he added

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: 57

Copyright 2012 Gulf News - Al Nisr Publishing LLC.
Syndigate.info, Al bawaba.com
All Rights Reserved

69 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
Hobart Mercury (Australia)June 21, 2012 Thursday
1 - Edition

Slavery blacklist

SECTION: WORLD; Pg. 29LENGTH: 220 words

UP to 27 million people are living in slavery around the world, US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton says.

At the launch of an annual report into human trafficking yesterday, she said: "The end of legal slavery in the United States and in other countries around the world has not, unfortunately, meant the end of slavery.

"Today it is estimated as many as 27 million people around the world are victims of modern slavery, what we sometimes call trafficking in persons.

"Those victims remind us of the kind of inhumane treatment we are capable of as human beings." The report, however, showed as governments became more aware of the issue progress was being made in wiping out what it called the "scourge of trafficking".

Out of the 185 countries included in the 2012 report, only 33 complied fully with laws in place to end human trafficking, putting them at the top of a four-tier ranking system.

But five countries had moved up from the bottom blacklist known as tier 3, including Burma and Venezuela, to be included in the 42 countries on what is known as a tier 2 watchlist.

Syria fell onto the blacklist for the first time.

"The government of Syria does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to do so," the 2012 Trafficking in Persons report said.

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: NewspaperJOURNAL-CODE: MER

70 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Jerusalem Post

June 21, 2012 Thursday

Israel ranks high in US annual report on fight against human trafficking. State Department calls nun working with Physicians for Human Rights-Israel 'anti-trafficking hero'

BYLINE: HILARY LEILA KRIEGER in Washington and RUTH EGLASH from Jerusalem.

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 8

LENGTH: 1218 words

Israel scored two significant successes with the release of this year's US State Department report on human trafficking, as the country moved up to the top tier recognizing government efforts to end trafficking, and a nun working in Israel was singled out for her work in the field.

Azezet Habtezghi Kidane, who is Eritrean but lives with her order in Jerusalem and volunteers with Physicians for Human Rights-Israel, was one of just 10 individuals from around the world whom the State Department recognized Tuesday as an anti-trafficking "hero."

She received the honor for her work recording and raising awareness regarding the plight of African migrants who have been tortured, raped and held for ransom by Beduin tribes in Sinai who smuggle them across Egypt to reach Israel.

Israel has provided medical care for those migrants who do cross the border, and Kidane praised the government for the treatment it gave those who made it into the country. But she said the government should do more to help these people after they were healthy, rather than "leaving them alone" as it does now.

Still, Israel has worked hard in the past five years to be more aggressive in stopping human trafficking, increasing enforcement and sentencing for perpetrators. Those efforts helped move Israel up one level to the report's highest tier for the first time, for taking adequate steps to combat the phenomenon.

From the legislative level down to non-profit organizations working with victims of sex and labor trafficking to Israel, the annual report commended the country's efforts to tackle the problem, including prevention and treatment for the victims.

"The Government of Israel fully complies with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking," noted the 2012 report, released Tuesday afternoon. "The Israeli government sustained strong law enforcement actions against sex trafficking and strong overall prevention efforts during the year."

Luis CdeBaca, the US ambassador-at-large for monitoring and combating trafficking in persons, praised Israel's improvements and even called one of its policies a model that other countries should emulate.

"We've seen a lot of progress," he told The Jerusalem Post, pointing to increased laws and enforcement. He especially highlighted a Justice Ministry program seeking restitution for victims of trafficking.

"That's something that we very much see as being on the leading edge," he said. "That's a best practice that we think other countries need to learn from."

But he said there remained areas in which Israel could do better.

"We're calling upon the government of Israel to look at their own situation. There's been some cases in the last few years where you've had Israeli citizens as well as foreign nationals that have been abused," he said.

Indeed, despite the commendations, the report highlighted some of the country's weak points, including the lack of adequate places in treatment shelters for victims, and pointed out that the authorities relied too heavily on reports from NGOs instead of initiating its own investigations.

CdeBaca also said that when it came to how Israel dealt with the cases of African migrants whom Kidane identified in the Sinai and who then entered the country, "we want to make sure that there's increasing improvement to identify victims of forced labor and of internal sex trafficking."

He said the "zone of impunity" that had developed in the Sinai had led to some of the world's worst crimes against trafficked people.

He described the past year as "challenging" for Egypt, but did note that the government had passed laws against human trafficking and that police and prosecutors had undergone training to combat the practice even as the country underwent tremendous upheaval.

Kidane said she hoped receiving the award Tuesday would help draw attention and international effort to combating what was happening in the Sinai. She said that first and foremost, the Egyptian government needed to take steps to end the abuse, but she also said the international community must pressure Egypt to do what was needed.

Her order assigned her to Israel a little over two years ago, and she wanted to use her ability to speak several African languages to help the migrants. In conversations with them, she began to hear horrific stories of torture and sexual abuse.

She was told that many migrants, who had scraped together a few thousand dollars to pay traffickers to help them reach Israel or European destinations, would be held captive in the Sinai and tortured and abused unless friends and relatives paid sums often 10 times as much as the original price.

"We heard things that we didn't want to hear, that we didn't want to know," she said.

Kidane said she was accepting the award on behalf of these victims.

"I am celebrating for them more than for me," she said, adding, "We need to stop what's happening. People are suffering. People are dying. People are slaves."

The TIP report is the most comprehensive worldwide study on the efforts of governments to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons, and its assessments are based on material collected from local government and non-government organizations.

It was first compiled in 2000, when Israel was placed in the lowest category. Since then, Israel's status has improved due to increased legislation and the willingness of the authorities to recognize the problem.

While it spent one year, 2006, on the Tier 2 Watch List level, it has been ranked at Tier 2 since then for its continuing efforts to eliminate this form of modern-day slavery.

Guy Rothkopf, director-general of the Justice Ministry, which coordinates the country's anti-trafficking efforts, said Wednesday that he was delighted that the government's work was finally bearing fruit.

"First and foremost, we have brought a positive change in terms of trafficking prevention and also in providing assistance to the victims," he said, commending the joint efforts of the Prime Ministers Office, the Knesset and NGOs.

Rothkopf also paid tribute to the country's national coordinator for combating human trafficking, Rachel Gershuni, who has been the driving force behind many legislative and practical changes.

MK Orit Zuaretz (Kadima), chairwoman of the Knesset Sub-Committee on Human Trafficking, recognized that there was still more work to do in fighting against trafficking, but she welcomed Israel's upgrade and the recognition from the State Department.

"Determination to combat this despicable phenomenon and improve enforcement activities has led to unprecedented results," said the MK, who held a session in the Knesset Wednesday morning to discuss the report. "For many years, Israel was ranked in second place, despite efforts that we have made here especially to develop the cooperation between government agencies and human rights groups working the field. All of this has led to a noticeable change in the national assessment of the situation, detection and treatment of victims."

Zuaretz has been active in recent months in preparing legislation that would make utilizing the services of a prostitute a criminal act. She believes that cutting off the demand for such services would also stem the supply of human trafficking victims into Israel and within Israel. The bill is currently making its way through parliament.

LOAD-DATE: June 25, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Photo: Azezet Habtezghi Kidane (Credit: US State Department)

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 The Jerusalem Post
All Rights Reserved

71 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Korea Times

June 21, 2012 Thursday

US criticizes N. Korea's forced labor

BYLINE: By Kim Young-jin

LENGTH: 464 words

The United States ranked North Korea among the world's worst human trafficking countries, Wednesday, highlighting its practice of forced labor among other abuses.

In its annual Trafficking in Persons report, the State Department again designated the North as a 'Tier 3' state along with 16 others with the poorest record of combating trafficking.

The North 'is a source country for men, women and children who are subjected to forced labor, forced marriage and sex trafficking'(and) made no discernible law enforcement efforts to combat trafficking in persons during the reporting period,' it said.

In addition to reiterating concerns of trafficking of North Korean women across the Chinese border, this year's report emphasized Pyongyang's practice of forced labor both in and out of the country.

The North sends workers abroad to Russia, Africa, Southeast Asia and elsewhere under bilateral contracts in what analysts say is a bid to earn hard currency for the regime. The laborers are said to have severely restricted movement and be under constant surveillance.

There were 'credible reports that these workers faced threats of government reprisals against them or their relatives in North Korea if they attempted to escape or complain to outside parties,' it said.

'Workers' salaries are deposited into accounts controlled by the North Korean government, which keeps most of the money, claiming fees for various 'voluntary' contributions to government endeavors.'

The report said Pyongyang worked harder to place North Korean workers in Russia especially in the Far East, where it estimated there were between 10,000 and 15,000 North Korean workers employed in logging camps. Such workers reportedly have only two days of rest per year, it said.

Within its borders, the North is known to use forced labor as part of a system of repression that maintains power for its ruling Kim dynasty, now led by young leader Kim Jong-un. Pyongyang is said to hold up to 200,000 political prisoners in a sprawling gulag system.

It pointed out that some North Korean women who escape to China 'are lured, drugged, or kidnapped by traffickers upon arrival' and compelled into forced marriages with Chinese men. They are also often forced into prostitution or jobs as hostesses in nightclubs and karaoke bars.

U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton recently called on Kim to improve the country's human rights situation, calling on the 'young man' thought to be 29 to be a transformative figure. This week Pyongyang shot back, referring to Clinton as 'Hillary' in state media and slamming her "reckless" assessment of the situation.

Meanwhile, Seoul ranked as a Tier 1 country in line with international prevention norms. But it called on the South to implement clear laws prohibiting all forms of trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 The Korea Times
All Rights Reserved

72 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Korea Times

June 21, 2012 Thursday

N. Korea on US list of worst-human trafficking nations for 10th year

LENGTH: 290 words

WASHINGTON (Yonhap) -- North Korea remains on an annual U.S. list of the nations that could face sanctions for making little effort to combat human trafficking for a 10th consecutive year, according to the State Department's report Wednesday.

In its annual Trafficking in Persons report, the State Department ranked North Korea once again in "Tier 3" for countries with the poorest record of fighting human trafficking. A total of 17 nations were included in the 2012 list with Syria newly added.

North Korea is a "source country for men, women and children who are subject to forced labor, forced marriage and sex trafficking," the report said.

Since 2003, North Korea has been on the list of the Tier 3 countries that may "be subject to certain sanctions, whereby the U.S. government may withhold or withdraw non-humanitarian, no-trade-related foreign assistance," according to the department.

Ambassador Luis CdeBaca, the director of the department's office to combat human trafficking, said, "One of the things that we've seen with North Korea repeatedly over the years is, again, this notion of state-supported forced labor.

"And we are, of course, concerned not just about forced labor within the country, but also in recent years more and more labor exporting of North Korean, often, men, whether it's into the Middle East, whether it's into especially Russia and other places," CdeBaca told reporters.

North Korea sends workers overseas along with its police officers, who keep the workers under surveillance and retaliate against them if they try to fight for their rights or if they try to leave, the ambassador said.

"So, we continue to see the situation of forced labor and human trafficking in North Korea as very grave," CdeBaca said.

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

73 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
THE KOREA HERALD

June 21, 2012 Thursday

Korean victims of sex trafficking in Japan receive renewed attention

LENGTH: 333 words

"I've lost so much blood, I feel dizzy. It's debt. They won't listen."

A Korean female victim sent an urgent text message for help to an anti-trafficking group. The group revealed sex trafficking stories of the victim and others at a press conference in Tokyo Wednesday.

The unnamed victim was malnourished and suffering from abdominal inflammation when she sent the distressed message to Polaris Project Japan's hotline.

The woman, who is in her twenties, had been forced into prostitution after she had arrived in Japan with false hopes of making money as a bar hostess to pay off her debt.

She had gotten the idea from her female employer at a Seoul bar, who had recommended that she move to Japan to quickly make money.

But her nightmares began when she met the broker in Tokyo. She was taken to an apartment in the Ueno district, where she was under constant monitoring with surveillance cameras in her room and corridor. The broker took away her passport. All of the money she made working as a prostitute went to the pimp.

The victim recalled that she had been too afraid to call the police, as she was a foreigner unprotected by the law. After she came across the hotline for women, she took actions.

About 30 percent of S.O.S calls made to the hotline since 2005 were by Koreans, making them the most targeted foreign victims, according to the PPJ.

Filipino and Thai women came in second and third, taking up 11 percent and 7 percent of the calls, respectively. Thirty-six percent of the calls were from Japanese women.

The group disclosed other detailed stories of sex trafficking cases in Japan, including that of a Korean student who started out working in the kitchen of a hostess bar and ended up being forced into prostitution due to debt.

According to the annual Trafficking in Persons Report published Tuesday by the U.S. State Department, Japan was categorized as a Tier 2 country whose government "does not fully comply with minimum standards."

By Sim Guk-by

Intern Reporter

(simgukby@heraldm.com)

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

74 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
North West StarJune 21, 2012 ThursdayUP to 27 million people are living in slavery around*BYLINE: AMANDA WRIGHTSECTION: EGN; Pg. 8LENGTH: 193 words

UP to 27 million people are living in slavery around the world, US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton says.

At the launch of an annual report into human trafficking on Tuesday, she said: "The end of legal slavery in the United States and in other countries around the world has not, unfortunately, meant the end of slavery.

"Today it is estimated as many as 27 million people around the world are victims of modern slavery, what we sometimes call trafficking in persons.

"Those victims ... remind us of the kind of inhumane treatment we are capable of as human beings," said Clinton.

The report, however, showed that as governments became more aware of the issue progress was being made in wiping out what it called the "scourge of trafficking".

Out of the 185 countries included in the 2012 report, only 33 complied fully with laws in place to end human trafficking, putting them at the top of a four-tier ranking system.

But five countries had moved up from the bottom blacklist known as tier 3, including Burma and Venezuela, to be included among the 42 countries now on what is known as a tier 2 watchlist.

Syria, however, fell onto the blacklist for the first time.

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

75 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Pakistan Today (Newstex Blog)

June 21, 2012 Thursday 6:32 AM EST

Up to 27 million people living in slavery: US

LENGTH: 515 words

0

28 mins ago |

WASHINGTON - Up to 27 million people are living in slavery around the world, US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton estimated Tuesday as the US unveiled its annual report into human trafficking.

But the report showed that as governments become more aware of the issue, instigating tough new laws and programs to help victims, progress is being made in wiping out what it called the scourge of trafficking. The end of legal slavery in the United States and in other countries around the world has not, unfortunately, meant the end of slavery, said Clinton.

Today it is estimated as many as 27 million people around the world are victims of modern slavery, what we sometimes call trafficking in persons, she said at the unveiling of the report at the State Department. Those victims of modern slavery are women and men, girls and boys, and their stories remind us of the kind of inhumane treatment we are capable of as human beings, said Clinton. Whatever their background, they are the living, breathing reminders that the work to eradicate slavery remains unfinished.

As America prepares to mark the 150th anniversary of the proclamation of the emancipation of US slaves, people must reflect on how much further we have to go to free all these 27 million victims, Clinton added. Out of the 185 countries included in the 2012 report, only 33 complied fully with laws in place to end human trafficking, putting them at the top of a four-tier ranking system. But five countries had moved up from the bottom blacklist known as tier 3, including Myanmar and Venezuela, to be included among the 42 countries now on what is known as a tier 2 watchlist.

Myanmar was removed from the blacklist because the government took a number of unprecedented steps to address forced labor and the conscription of child soldiers; these steps amount to a credible commitment to undertake anti-trafficking reforms over the coming year, the report said. Syria however fell onto the blacklist for the first time, in a move which could cut off any US aid and make it harder to get US backing for funds from organizations like the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. The government of Syria does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to do so, the 2012 Trafficking in Persons report said.

Among the 16 other countries on the blacklist were Algeria, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Libya, North Korea and Saudi Arabia. Kenya slipped down onto the watchlist for the first time in five years, while Nigeria lost its place on tier 1, moving down a notch as the report highlighted that women and children were forced into labor and sex trafficking. But Clinton hailed the fact that a total of 29 countries had been upgraded to a higher ranking, which means that their governments are taking the right steps. They included Bangladesh, which was bumped up to tier two for making significant efforts to comply with minimum standards, including passing a comprehensive anti-trafficking law in December.

LOAD-DATE: June 25, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Web BlogJOURNAL-CODE: APAK-111350

Copyright 2012 Newstex LLC
All Rights Reserved
Newstex Web Blogs
Copyright 2012 Pakistan Today

76 of 492 DOCUMENTS

The Phnom Penh Post

June 21, 2012 Thursday 11:36 AM EST

No movement for Thailand, Malaysia in human trafficking report

LENGTH: 690 words

Trafficked fishermen who were made to work in appalling conditions on Thai fishing boats are repatriated to Cambodia this month. Photograph: Heng Chivoan/Phnom Penh Post

Both Malaysia and Thailand, the major destination countries for Cambodian migrant workers, narrowly escaped being downgraded in the US's annual Trafficking in Persons report, released yesterday, despite being found to have made no increased efforts to address the problem.

The report from the US State Department found that both countries would have been placed at the bottom of the TIP index, Tier 3, had they not been granted a waiver because they had submitted plans to meet minimum standards to eliminate human trafficking.

But no specific outlines of these plans were given and inquiries for more details from relevant embassies were not responded to yesterday.

Endemic police corruption, including the direct involvement in and facilitation of human trafficking by law enforcement officials was one of a litany of criticisms levelled against the Thai government, which remained on the Tier 2 Watch List.

The government has not shown evidence of increasing efforts to address human trafficking compared to the previous year; therefore, Thailand is placed on Tier 2 Watch List for a third consecutive year, the report states.

Despite conducting 1,000 inspections and searches of fishing boats for which Cambodian and other migrant men have become a notorious source of slave labour the Royal Thai Navy did not identify a single case of suspected trafficking.

Citing findings from the United Nations Inter Agency Project on Human Trafficking, the report states that 23,000 Cambodian trafficking victims are deported from Thailand every year, and separately concluded that 100 victims had been repatriated from fishing boats.

Phil Robertson, deputy Asia director of Human Rights Watch, said that the game of which tier a country landed in was largely immaterial to the fundamental problem of the entrenched corruption in Cambodia, Thailand and Malaysia that enabled trafficking.

The real situation that is most worrisome is that you have these tie-ups between Cambodia and Thailand and Cambodia and Malaysia that ensure that the people who go through these recruitment centres do so with insurmountable debts.

The central point is, I don't see any systematic changes happening in the core factors that allow trafficking to continue.

Malaysia, long favoured by Cambodian recruitment firms as a destination country for domestic workers until a temporary ban on sending them there was put in place by the government last year, was found to prosecute sex traffickers but often failed to acknowledge victims of labour trafficking.

NGOs reported that police and Labor Department officials often failed to investigate complaints of confiscation of passports and travel documents or withholding of wages especially involving domestic workers as possible trafficking offences, the report found.

Raja Saifull Ridzuwan, deputy chief of mission at the Malaysian embassy, said he would not be able to comment until tomorrow as he had yet to read the report.

But Muhammad Sha Ani Bin Abdullah, commissioner at the independent Human Rights Commission of Malaysia, said the waiver was an opportunity for Malaysian officials and police to mend their ways.

Police are not adequately equipped with the knowledge to handle trafficking victims. Often, they treat trafficking victims as criminals, he said.

Cambodia, which remained at Tier 2, is making significant efforts to comply with minimum standards to eliminate human trafficking, according to the TIP report, but these are undermined by endemic corruption at all levels.

In particular, the pardoning of three pedophiles, among them notorious Russian sex offender Alexander Trofimov, had undermined the credibility of Cambodian efforts to combat child sex tourism .

Officials from the Cambodian Ministry of Interior and Department of Anti-Human Trafficking and Juvenile Protection could not be reached for comment yesterday.

To contact the reporter on this story: David Boyle at david.boyle@phnompenhpost.com

LOAD-DATE: June 25, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Blog

JOURNAL-CODE: PHPP-6919

Copyright 2012 Newstex LLC
All Rights Reserved
Newstex Web Blogs
Copyright 2012 The Phnom Penh Post

77 of 492 DOCUMENTS

The South Asian Times

June 21, 2012 Thursday

27 mn living in a world of slavery, bonded labour continues in India

LENGTH: 899 words

DATELINE: New York

New York, June 21 -- Up to 27 million people are living in slavery around the world, US secretary of state Hillary Clinton estimated as the US unveiled its annual report into human trafficking.

But the report showed that as governments become more aware of the issue, instigating tough new laws and programs to help victims, progress is being made in wiping out what it called the "scourge of trafficking."

"The end of legal slavery in the United States and in other countries around the world has not, unfortunately, meant the end of slavery," said Clinton.

"Today it is estimated as many as 27 million people around the world are victims of modern slavery, what we sometimes call trafficking in persons," she said at the unveiling of the report at the state department.

"Those victims of modern slavery are women and men, girls and boys, and their stories remind us of the kind of inhumane treatment we are capable of as human beings," said Clinton.

"Whatever their background, they are the living, breathing reminders that the work to eradicate slavery remains unfinished."

Out of the 185 countries included in the 2012 report, only 33 complied fully with laws in place to end human trafficking, putting them at the top of a four-tier ranking system.

On India, the report states that the country is a source, destination, and transit country for men, women, and children subjected to forced labour and sex trafficking.

India, however, has maintained its position at tier 2, which it climbed to in 2011. Tier 2 is defined as a country whose government does not fully comply with the TVPA's (Trafficking Victims Protection Act) minimum standards, but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards.

"The forced labor of millions of its citizens constitutes India's largest trafficking problem; men, women, and children in debt bondage are forced to work in industries such as brick kilns, rice mills, agriculture, and embroidery factories. A common characteristic of bonded labor is the use of physical and sexual violence as coercive tools," it says.

According to the report, 90% of trafficking in India is internal, and those from India's most disadvantaged social strata, including the lowest castes, are most vulnerable. It also states that children are subjected to forced labour as factory workers, domestic servants, beggars, agricultural workers, and to a lesser extent, in some areas of rural Uttar Pradesh as carpet weavers.

"There were new reports about the continued forced labor of children in hybrid cottonseed plots in Gujarat, and reports that forced labor may be present in the Sumangali scheme in Tamil Nadu, in which employers pay young women a lump sum to be used for a dowry at the end of a three-year term."

The report also recommends that India develops a comprehensive anti-trafficking law or amend anti-trafficking legislation to be in line with the 2000 UN TIP Protocol, with adequate penalties prescribed by the UN Transnational Organized Crime Convention. It also suggests that India increase prosecutions and convictions on all forms of trafficking, including bonded labour.

Prosecution of officials allegedly complicit in trafficking, and convict and punish officials complicit in trafficking; encourage states to establish special anti-trafficking courts and improvement in distribution of state and central government rehabilitation funds to victims under the Bonded Labour (System) Abolition Act (BLSA), improve protections for trafficking victims who testify against their traffickers, encourage AHTUs to address both sex and labour trafficking of adults and children as well as encourage state and district governments to file bonded labour cases under appropriate criminal statutes are some of the suggestions.

Five countries had moved up from the bottom blacklist known as tier 3, including Myanmar and Venezuela, to be included among the 42 countries now on what is known as a tier 2 watchlist.

Among the 16 other countries on the blacklist were Algeria, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Libya, North Korea and Saudi Arabia.

Kenya slipped down onto the watchlist for the first time in five years, while Nigeria lost its place on tier 1, moving down a notch as the report highlighted that women and children were forced into labor and sex trafficking.

But Clinton hailed the fact that a total of 29 countries had been upgraded to a higher ranking, "which means that their governments are taking the right steps."

They included Bangladesh, which was bumped up to tier two for making significant efforts to comply with minimum standards, including passing "a comprehensive anti-trafficking law" in December.

Ambassador Luis CdeBaca, director of the office to combat trafficking in persons, said while the number of people officially identified as victims of trafficking and slavery had gone up by 28% since last year to 42,291, the numbers of prosecutions in 2012 had also increased by 10% to 3,969.

So while countries "still have a little ways to go" there was "the beginnings, I think, of a real trend," he said.

This year's report focuses on how to better protect the victims, and urges governments to meet the challenge head-on. Published by HT Syndication with permission from The South Asian Times. For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 24, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

78 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Sri Lankan Government News

June 21, 2012 Thursday 5:06 PM EST

SRI LANKAN GOVERNMENT MAKES SIGNIFICANT TO ELIMINATE HUMAN TRAFFICKING AND TAKES STRONG PREVENTIVE MEASURES

LENGTH: 384 words

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka, June 21 -- Policy Research & Information Unit of the Presidential Secretariat of Sri Lanka issued the following news:

The Sri Lankan government is making significant to eliminate human trafficking and took strong preventive measures last year, the United States said in a report on global human trafficking.

The 2012 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report released Tuesday by the U.S. Secretary of State Hilary Clinton placed Sri Lanka among Tier 2 countries. The 2012 Trafficking in Persons Report analyzed 186 countries by looking at what the governments are doing against human trafficking which is defined as modern day slavery.

Tier 2 countries are the countries whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards.

The report said Sri Lanka is primarily a source for men, women, and children subjected to forced labor and sex trafficking and Internally-displaced persons, war widows, and unregistered female migrants remained particularly vulnerable to human trafficking.

The report noted that the government convicted two labor recruitment agents who committed fraudulent recruitment offenses, and enhanced inter-ministerial coordination through monthly meetings.

According to the 2012 TIP Report the government's law enforcement response to human trafficking offenses was minimal during the reporting period. Although the government agencies including National Child Protection Authority and Criminal Investigation Department (CID) investigated 44 cases of trafficking in 2011, the government has not convicted any human trafficking offenders in the reporting period.

However, the report recognized that government made progress in its efforts to prevent trafficking during the last year.

The government has worked on several awareness-raising initiatives with the International Labor Organization (ILO) such as developing a handbook for migrants bound for Saudi Arabia and Kuwait including information on the relevant labor laws, descriptions of forced labor and trafficking, and contact information. For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

79 of 492 DOCUMENTS

The Straits Times (Singapore)

June 21, 2012 Thursday

Human trafficking report: US keeps S'pore in Tier 2; But report notes Republic's significant efforts to improve

BYLINE: AMELIA TANSECTION: SINGAPORELENGTH: 428 words

SINGAPORE still falls short of international standards to fight human trafficking, going by an annual US State Department report.

It has again been put in 'Tier 2' in the report's ranking system - like last year - alongside countries such as Cambodia and Bangladesh.

Tier 2 countries are those which do not fully comply with minimum international standards of protecting migrant workers from forced labour or other forms of trafficking in people, even if they are making 'significant efforts' to do so.

Since the US State Department began publishing the Trafficking In Persons (TIP) Report in 2001, Singapore has mostly been in Tier 2.

The exception was in 2010, when it slipped one category into the 'Tier 2 Watchlist'.

This tier is for countries such as Malaysia and Thailand, which have fallen short of minimum standards, have a significant number of victims of trafficking and have failed to show increasing efforts to combat the situation.

Tier 1 countries, which fully comply with international standards, include the United States and Australia.

Tier 3, the bottom category, includes countries such as Algeria and Zimbabwe, which are deemed to have fallen far short of standards and are not making significant efforts to redress the situation.

All in, 186 countries were rated for this year's report, based on research done from March last year to February.

The report acknowledged Singapore's 'significant efforts' to eliminate trafficking, notably through its National Plan of Action unveiled in March. The plan, put together by an inter-agency task force formed in 2010, aims to prevent trafficking, protect the victims and bring the perpetrators to justice.

The TIP report noted that four sex-trafficking offenders were convicted in the year, but no labour-trafficking offenders were prosecuted.

The Government's inter-agency task force said the report is balanced but noted 'some inaccuracies and misrepresentations'. It said one of its immediate tasks is to help government frontline officers better identify trafficking victims and develop the processes to handle these cases.

Migrant worker rights group Transient Workers Count Too executive committee member John Gee said the TIP report recognised 'the steps forward' Singapore has made, but urged the Government to ratify the United Nations' Palermo Protocol on human trafficking.

He said: 'The Palermo Protocol will put in place a strong tool for recognising trafficked people and enhance the capability of the police and other authorities.'

ameltan@sph.com.sg

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 Singapore Press Holdings Limited
All Rights Reserved

80 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
Targeted News Service

June 21, 2012 Thursday 4:40 AM EST

SL Making Significant Efforts to Eliminate Human Trafficking - US ReportBYLINE: Targeted News ServiceLENGTH: 363 wordsDATELINE: COLOMBO, Sri Lanka

The government of Sri Lanka issued the following news release:

The Sri Lankan government is making significant to eliminate human trafficking and took strong preventive measures last year, the United States said in a report on global human trafficking.

The 2012 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report released Tuesday by the U.S. Secretary of State Hilary Clinton placed Sri Lanka among Tier 2 countries. The 2012 Trafficking in Persons Report analyzed 186 countries by looking at what the governments are doing against human trafficking which is defined as modern day slavery.

Tier 2 countries are the countries whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards.

The report said Sri Lanka is primarily a source for men, women, and children subjected to forced labor and sex trafficking and Internally-displaced persons, war widows, and unregistered female migrants remained particularly vulnerable to human trafficking.

The report noted that the government convicted two labor recruitment agents who committed fraudulent recruitment offenses, and enhanced inter-ministerial coordination through monthly meetings.

According to the 2012 TIP Report the government's law enforcement response to human trafficking offenses was minimal during the reporting period. Although the government agencies including National Child Protection Authority and Criminal Investigation Department (CID) investigated 44 cases of trafficking in 2011, the government has not convicted any human trafficking offenders in the reporting period.

However, the report recognized that government made progress in its efforts to prevent trafficking during the last year.

The government has worked on several awareness-raising initiatives with the International Labor Organization (ILO) such as developing a handbook for migrants bound for Saudi Arabia and Kuwait including information on the relevant labor laws, descriptions of forced labor and trafficking, and contact information.

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS C-PrabMal9 120630-mt93-3935218 61MarlizTagarum

LOAD-DATE: July 1, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

All Rights Reserved

81 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Xinhua General News Service

June 21, 2012 Thursday 5:25 AM EST

Philippine gov't vows to address human trafficking

SECTION: WORLD NEWS; EconomicLENGTH: 208 wordsDATELINE: MANILA June 21

The Philippine government on Thursday pledged to work harder to combat human trafficking as it seeks to be removed from a list of countries that do not comply with international anti-trafficking standards.

Presidential spokesperson Edwin Lacierda said the Philippines will aim for its removal from Tier 2 ranking as indicated in the U.S. State Department Trafficking in Persons Report 2012.

"We would like to be taken out of the Tier 2 (rank) and that's certainly a goal that we are looking forward to," said Lacierda said in a news briefing.

While the US State Department recognized the progress that the Philippines has made in addressing human trafficking, it noted that Manila did not fully comply with international anti-trafficking standards.

The report said the Philippines needs to improve the investigation, prosecution, and conviction of both labor and sex trafficking offenders; bolster the anti-trafficking training for police recruits, front-line officers, and police investigators; and increase funding for anti-trafficking programs.

Washington, however, recognized the efforts of the Philippine government to protect its workers abroad and for training public officials to fight human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: June 22, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Xinhua News Agency

82 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
Xinhua General News ServiceJune 21, 2012 Thursday 1:15 AM ESTPhilippine gov't vows to address human trafficking*SECTION: WORLD NEWS; EconomicLENGTH: 208 wordsDATELINE: MANILA June 21

The Philippine government on Thursday pledged to work harder to combat human trafficking as it seeks to be removed from a list of countries that do not comply with international anti-trafficking standards.

Presidential spokesperson Edwin Lacierda said the Philippines will aim for its removal from Tier 2 ranking as indicated in the U.S. State Department Trafficking in Persons Report 2012.

"We would like to be taken out of the Tier 2 (rank) and that's certainly a goal that we are looking forward to," said Lacierda said in a news briefing.

While the US State Department recognized the progress that the Philippines has made in addressing human trafficking, it noted that Manila did not fully comply with international anti-trafficking standards.

The report said the Philippines needs to improve the investigation, prosecution, and conviction of both labor and sex trafficking offenders; bolster the anti-trafficking training for police recruits, front-line officers, and police investigators; and increase funding for anti-trafficking programs.

Washington, however, recognized the efforts of the Philippine government to protect its workers abroad and for training public officials to fight human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: June 23, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

83 of 492 DOCUMENTS

AAP Newsfeed

June 20, 2012 Wednesday 2:45 PM AEST

FED:Australia ranks high in anti-slavery fightBYLINE: Adam GartrellSECTION: DOMESTIC NEWSLENGTH: 357 wordsDATELINE: CANBERRA June 20

Small but sophisticated organised crime networks built around family and business connections are responsible for most labour slavery in Australia, the US government says.

The annual US State Department Trafficking in Persons Report ranks Australia in the top tier of countries fighting human trafficking and slavery.

But that does not mean Australia has no trafficking problem, the report says.

"Australia is primarily a destination country for women subjected to forced prostitution and to a lesser extent, women and men subjected to forced labor," the report says, adding that some child sex trafficking also occurs.

Women from Thailand, Malaysia, South Korea, China and to a lesser extent India, Vietnam, Eastern Europe and Africa are the most common trafficking victims.

They are sometimes held in captivity, subjected to physical and sexual violence, drugged and forced to pay off massive debts to their captors.

Men and women from the Pacific Islands and Asia also are being subjected by unscrupulous employers and labor agencies to forced work in agriculture, construction, cleaning, hospitality and manufacturing.

"Most often, traffickers are part of small but highly sophisticated organised crime networks that frequently involve family and business connections between Australians and overseas contacts," the report says.

The report says Australia fully complies with the minimum standards for eliminating trafficking, but also makes some recommendations for improvement.

It says the government should finalise draft amendments to Australia's criminal code to ensure all forms of trafficking are prohibited.

"Existing criminal laws do not adequately prohibit deceptive recruitment for labor services and offences related to receiving and harbouring trafficking victims," the report notes.

The government should also expand efforts to identify, prosecute, convict and stringently sentence labour trafficking offenders, it says.

It should also improve efforts to coordinate case information between government agencies.

But Australia remains a regional leader in combating human trafficking, the report says.

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Australian Associated Press Pty. Ltd.

84 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

Agence France Presse -- English

June 20, 2012 Wednesday 4:16 AM GMT

Up to 27 million people living in slavery: US

LENGTH: 729 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 20 2012

Up to 27 million people are living in slavery around the world, US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton estimated Tuesday as the US unveiled its annual report into human trafficking.

But the report showed that as governments become more aware of the issue, instigating tough new laws and programs to help victims, progress is being made in wiping out what it called the "scourge of trafficking."

"The end of legal slavery in the United States and in other countries around the world has not, unfortunately, meant the end of slavery," said Clinton.

"Today it is estimated as many as 27 million people around the world are victims of modern slavery, what we sometimes call trafficking in persons," she said at the unveiling of the report at the State Department.

"Those victims of modern slavery are women and men, girls and boys, and their stories remind us of the kind of inhumane treatment we are capable of as human beings," said Clinton.

"Whatever their background, they are the living, breathing reminders that the work to eradicate slavery remains unfinished."

As America prepares to mark the 150th anniversary of the proclamation of the emancipation of US slaves, people must reflect on "how much further we have to go to free all these 27 million victims," Clinton added.

Out of the 185 countries included in the 2012 report, only 33 complied fully with laws in place to end human trafficking, putting them at the top of a four-tier ranking system.

But five countries had moved up from the bottom blacklist known as tier 3, including Myanmar and Venezuela, to be included among the 42 countries now on what is known as a tier 2 watchlist.

Myanmar was removed from the blacklist because the government "took a number of unprecedented steps to address forced labor and the conscription of child soldiers; these steps amount to a credible commitment to undertake anti-trafficking reforms over the coming year," the report said.

Syria however fell onto the blacklist for the first time, in a move which could cut off any US aid and make it harder to get US backing for funds from organizations like the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund.

"The government of Syria does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to do so," the 2012 Trafficking in Persons report said.

Among the 16 other countries on the blacklist were Algeria, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Libya, North Korea and Saudi Arabia.

Kenya slipped down onto the watchlist for the first time in five years, while Nigeria lost its place on tier 1, moving down a notch as the report highlighted that women and children were forced into labor and sex trafficking.

But Clinton hailed the fact that a total of 29 countries had been upgraded to a higher ranking, "which means that their governments are taking the right steps."

They included Bangladesh, which was bumped up to tier two for making significant efforts to comply with minimum standards, including passing "a comprehensive anti-trafficking law" in December.

Ambassador Luis CdeBaca, director of the office to combat trafficking in persons, said while the number of people officially identified as victims of trafficking and slavery had gone up by 28 percent since last year to 42,291, the numbers of prosecutions in 2012 had also increased by 10 percent to 3,969.

So while countries "still have a little ways to go" there was "the beginnings, I think, of a real trend," he said.

This year's report focuses on how to better protect the victims, and urges governments to meet the challenge head-on.

"Traffickers are criminals. Governments -- which alone have the power to punish criminals and provide legal recourse to survivors -- cannot waver in their efforts to confront modern slavery," the report says.

But it also argues that human trafficking takes many guises and it is not just about moving people across borders to trap them in prostitution.

"The United States government, and increasingly, the international community, view 'trafficking in persons' as the term through which all forms of modern slavery are criminalized," it says.

"The essence of the trafficking experience is the denial of freedom, including the freedom to choose where and how you live, the freedom to work or choose not to work, the freedom from threats, and the freedom of bodily integrity," the report says.

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

85 of 492 DOCUMENTS

June 20, 2012 Wednesday 7:57 AM EET

US upgrades Estonia's rating in human trafficking report

LENGTH: 265 words

US upgrades Estonia's rating in human trafficking report

TALLINN, Jun 20, BNS - The US State Department moved Estonia from the human trafficking tier 2 watch list to tier 2.

On the basis of the annual US State Department report Estonia is still a prostitution transit and target country. The report says that Estonian women are objects of sex trade in the Netherlands, the United Kingdom, Germany, Spain, France, Cyprus Portugal, Cyprus, Ireland and Italy.

The Estonian government does not fully meet the minimum standards in the elimination of human trafficking, while the government is making considerable efforts to meet these requirements.

The report gives to Estonia the recommendation to vigorously apply the act against human trafficking that was passed recently and to bring up efforts in order to open investigation with respect to persons engaged in human trafficking, charging and punishing them.

Last year the United States added Estonian into the human trafficking tier 2 watch list, because the country had not achieved sufficient success in the prevention of prostitution and slave labor. "Estonia is both a source and transit and target country for women who are forced to practise prostitution and for men and women who work in conditions comparable with forced labor in several European countries," the report said.

Countries are assessed in four different categories (tier 1, tier 2, tier 2 watch list, tier 3). In the recent years Estonia has belonged into the so called second grade, or tier 2 group countries.

Tallinn newsroom, +372 610 8810, sise@bns.ee

Baltic News Service

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH; ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Wire

86 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Bangladesh Business News (BBN)

June 20, 2012 Wednesday

US releases 2012 TIP Report, Bangladesh position upgraded

LENGTH: 409 words

DATELINE: Bangladesh

Bangladesh, June 20 -- The U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton announced the release of the 2012 Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP Report) on Tuesday in Washington, DC, a US embassy press statement said.

This year's TIP Report theme is "The Promise of Freedom." The theme encourages every government, including the United States, to commit to fulfilling the promise of freedom from slavery embodied in modern anti-trafficking laws and international protocols by punishing traffickers, providing services and legal recourse to victims and preventing the crime of trafficking from occurring.

As required by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA), the TIP Report assesses governments around the world on their efforts to combat modern slavery. The 12th installment, this year's Report includes narratives of 186 countries and territories. The United States is among the countries and territories.

Bangladesh was upgraded to "Tier 2" in the 2012 TIP Report in recognition of the Government of Bangladesh's important accomplishments in the past year, including enactment of the landmark Human Trafficking Deterrence and Suppression Act, which the President of Bangladesh put into effect as an ordinance in December 2011 and the Bangladesh Parliament passed as law in February 2012, as well as the launch of a National Plan of Action for Combating Human Trafficking in May 2012.

These steps ensure Bangladesh has a comprehensive, multi-stakeholder legal framework to address all forms of trafficking, including labor trafficking and trafficking of men.

Bangladesh's immediate challenge and opportunity will be to ensure effective implementation and enforcement of the new law and plan of action to develop an effective regime of prevention, protection and prosecution.

The U.S. Government strongly supports the Government of Bangladesh's efforts to address trafficking and will continue its support through the U.S. Agency for International Development's program Actions for Combating Trafficking in Persons (ACT).

ACT works with NGO partners such as Winrock International and with the Ministry of Home Affairs to develop a comprehensive approach to the prosecution of traffickers, protection of victims and prevention of the crime of trafficking. Published by HT Syndication with permission from Bangladesh Business News. For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

87 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

June 20, 2012 Wednesday 1:02 PM TST

U.S. gives Taiwan Tier 1 ranking in anti-human trafficking efforts

BYLINE: Nancy Liu

LENGTH: 361 words

DATELINE: Taipei, June 20

Taiwan maintained its Tier 1 ranking in an annual human trafficking report published by the United States Department of State, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs said Wednesday.

Taiwan was listed as a Tier 1 country in the report for the third year in a row, indicating that "(its) achievements in preventing and combating human trafficking have been highly recognized by the international community," the ministry said in a statement.

The rankings of countries in the "2012 Trafficking in Persons Report," are classified into three-tiers based on the governments' counter-human trafficking measures.

Taiwan was one of only two East Asian countries, along with South Korea, to be given the highest ranking possible in the report.

In its statement, the Foreign Ministry pledged that Taiwan will continue to enhance protection of victims of human trafficking and strive to bring perpetrators to justice.

American Institute in Taiwan (AIT) Deputy Director Eric Madison delivered the report to the National Immigration Agency Tuesday and congratulated Taiwan for its achievements in the area, AIT spokesman Christopher Kavanagh told CNA.

The AIT represents U.S. interests in Taiwan in the absence of diplomatic ties.

The report, released Tuesday, found that most trafficking victims in Taiwan are migrant workers from Vietnam, Thailand, Indonesia, China, Cambodia, the Philippines, Bangladesh and India.

Women and girls from various Asian countries are also lured to Taiwan through "fraudulent marriages and deceptive employment offers for purposes of sex trafficking and forced labor," the report said.

Although Taiwanese authorities continued to punish trafficking offenses, the report suggested that the country "improve (its) efforts to investigate, prosecute and convict trafficking offenders using the anti-trafficking law enacted in June 2009."

It also recommended that Taiwan continue to fund foreign language translators for shelters and hotline staff and make greater efforts to increase public awareness about all forms of trafficking.

In 2011, Taiwan identified 319 trafficking victims, 56 of whom fell prey to sex trafficking and 263 to labor trafficking, the report noted.

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Central News Agency
All Rights Reserved

88 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

June 20, 2012 Wednesday 12:03 PM TST

Taiwanese diplomat included in U.S. human-trafficking report

BYLINE: Nancy Liu

LENGTH: 357 words

DATELINE: Taipei, June 20

A Taiwanese diplomat who pleaded guilty in the United States to labor fraud was highlighted in a human trafficking report released by the U.S. Department of State Tuesday, but it did not affect the country's overall ranking.

Jacqueline Liu, former director of the Taipei Economic and Cultural Office in Kansas City, pleaded guilty to "subjecting her two domestic workers to conditions of forced labor, including withholding their passports and paying inadequate wages," according to the 2012 Trafficking in Persons Report.

The 64-year-old diplomat was deported in mid-February after the court approved a plea agreement that sentenced her to time served following her arrest and detention on Nov. 10, 2011 and required her to pay US$80,044 in restitution to the two Filipino housekeepers she abused.

Although Liu spent about four months in U.S. prison before being deported to Taiwan, "she has not yet been sentenced (in Taiwan) as the investigation against her in Taiwan remained ongoing as of April 2012," at the close of the reporting period, the report said.

In May, however, the Taipei District Prosecutors Office decided against indicting Liu on criminal charges because it did not find evidence that a crime had been committed.

Steve Hsia, the Foreign Ministry's deputy spokesman, said that Liu's case was a "single case" that "did not influence the U.S.' recognition of Taiwan's ongoing efforts in combating human trafficking."

Taiwan was given a Tier 1 ranking in this year's anti-human trafficking report, the only East Asian country along with South Korea to receive the report's highest rating, which is given to "countries whose governments fully comply with the Trafficking Victims Protection Act's (TVPA) minimum standards."

Taiwan moved to Tier 1 in 2010 and has kept its status for three consecutive years.

China, Thailand, Malaysia and Myanmar were placed on the Tier 2 watch list, the second-to-lowest rating, while only North Korea among East Asian countries was placed in the lowest Tier 3 category, given to "countries whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so."

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

89 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Channel NewsAsia

June 20, 2012 Wednesday 5:58 AM GMT

Singapore at Tier 2 in US Trafficking in Persons ReportSECTION: SINGAPORE NEWSLENGTH: 219 words

SINGAPORE: The recent court cases of men allegedly having paid sex with an underage girl have made their way into the Trafficking in Persons Report 2012 released by the US State Department.

The report alleges that child sex trafficking occurred in Singapore.

In the 2012 Report, Singapore has been classified under Tier 2 of countries reported upon and this refers to countries where governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards, but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards.

The US report noted that the Singapore government has increased its efforts to prevent trafficking in persons during the year.

In March 2012, the Inter-Agency Task Force on Human Trafficking launched Singapore's first National Plan of Action to coordinate the government's anti-trafficking activities.

The government has also increased efforts to educate the public through television and print media campaigns about the dangers of trafficking.

It put up posters at a fishing port providing information for exploited workers to contact the government for assistance.

During the year, the task force produced a newsletter and brochure for work permit holders, which provides a checklist for workers about situations in which they should approach the Ministry of Manpower for assistance.

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

90 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Indo-Asian News Service

June 20, 2012 Wednesday

US asks India to make strong anti-trafficking law

LENGTH: 410 wordsDATELINE: Washington

Washington, June 20 -- A US report accusing India of being a source, destination, and transit country for forced labour and sex trafficking, has asked New Delhi to develop a comprehensive anti-trafficking law.

The annual Trafficking in Persons Report released by Secretary of State Hillary Clinton Tuesday places India for the second year among Tier 2 countries whose governments do not fully comply with minimum standards but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance.

The forced labour of millions of India's citizens constitutes India's largest trafficking problem, the report said noting men, women, and children in debt bondage are forced to work in industries such as brick kilns, rice mills, agriculture, and embroidery factories.

A common characteristic of bonded labour is the use of physical and sexual violence as coercive tools, it said.

Ninety percent of trafficking in India is internal, and those from India's most disadvantaged social strata, including the lowest castes, are most vulnerable, the report said.

Some Indians who migrate willingly every year for work as domestic servants and low-skilled labourers find themselves in forced labour in the Middle East and, to a lesser extent, Southeast Asia, the United States, Europe, Southern Africa, the Caribbean, and other countries, it said.

The report noted that In March 2012, a US court entered a default judgment of $1.5 million in favour of an Indian domestic worker who sued a former Indian consular officer who had employed her while assigned to duty in the United States

No appeal was filed in the case, the report said. The domestic worker had accused the Indian diplomat of forcing her to work without adequate compensation for three years and subjecting her to physical and mental abuse.

Noting that the India was making significant efforts to fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, the report recommended that India develop a comprehensive anti-trafficking law or amend anti-trafficking legislation to be in line with the 2000 UN TIP Protocol.

It also asked India to increase prosecutions and convictions on all forms of trafficking, including bonded labour and encourage states to establish special anti-trafficking courts. Published by HT Syndication with permission from Indo-Asian News Service. For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

91 of 492 DOCUMENTS

THE JORDAN TIMES

The Jordan Times

June 20, 2012 Wednesday

Jordan a transit, destination country for forced labour - report

LENGTH: 701 words

by Hani Hazaimeh | Jun 20, 2012 | 19:49 AMMAN - Jordan is a destination and transit country for adults and children subjected to forced labour and, to a lesser extent, commercial sexual exploitation, according to a US State Department report. However, the report showed that Jordan has kept its classification at Tier 2 for the fourth year in a row. . Issued annually to measure countries' efforts in combating trafficking in persons, the Trafficking in Persons Report said some of the domestic helpers who voluntarily migrate to the Kingdom for employment are subjected to conditions of forced labour after arrival. The report cited practices such as unlawful withholding of passports, restrictions on movement, non-payment of wages, threats of imprisonment and physical or sexual abuse. Referring to migrant workers in the Qualifying Industrial Zones, the report said "some of these workers encounter conditions indicative of forced labour, including unlawful withholding of passports, delayed payment of wages, forced overtime, and verbal and physical abuse; female factory workers are also vulnerable to sexual harassment". With regards to the thousands of Syrian refugees who poured into the Kingdom since the Syrian crisis started in March 2011, the US State Department said "some of these migrants" could include trafficking victims. They may also "be further susceptible to situations of forced labour or forced prostitution in Jordan", the report said. "Moroccan, Tunisian and East European women are subjected to forced prostitution after migrating to Jordan to work in restaurants and nightclubs," it added.

The report said although the government does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, it is making significant efforts to do so. "During the year, the government sustained law enforcement efforts against trafficking offenders and police continued to refer trafficking victims to shelter services." "The government's anti-trafficking efforts, however, continued to be hindered by several government reshuffles, limited capacity in key ministries, and a general lack of inter-ministerial coordination and cooperation," said the report. The US study recommended that the government take serious measures to address loopholes in the efforts to eliminate trafficking in persons, such as using the anti-trafficking statute, increase efforts to investigate, prosecute, convict and sentence trafficking offences. Furthermore, the report suggested strengthening efforts to proactively identify victims of forced labour and prostitution and to increase penalties for forced labour offences. Other suggestions included implementing an awareness campaign to educate the general public and foreign migrant workers in all sectors on human trafficking, particularly forced labour and the proper treatment of domestic workers under Jordanian law. Citing the 2008 Anti-Human Trafficking Law, the report said the law prohibits all forms of trafficking and prescribes penalties of six months to 10 years imprisonment for forced prostitution, child trafficking, and trafficking of women and girls, adding that these penalties are sufficiently stringent, but not commensurate with those for other serious crimes, such as rape. With regards to protection efforts, the report said the government made minimal efforts to protect victims of trafficking during the reporting period and did not provide any specialised services to trafficking victims. "It did, however, identify and refer trafficking victims to shelter services, and it took initial steps to identify victims of trafficking sheltered within foreign embassies." "The police reportedly referred 26 potential female trafficking victims to a local NGO-operated shelter, a noted improvement compared with the previous reporting period when the government did not refer any victims," the report argued. Earlier this month, the labour ministry and the Public Security Department signed an agreement to coordinate efforts to combat human trafficking in the Kingdom. Labour Minister Atef Odeibat said at the signing ceremony that trafficking in Jordan "is not a big issue and does not qualify as organised crime".

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Magazine

JOURNAL-CODE: 62

Copyright 2012 The Jordan Times.
Syndigate.info, Al bawaba.com
All Rights Reserved

92 of 492 DOCUMENTS

M2 PressWIRE

June 20, 2012 Wednesday

Press Releases: Briefing on 2012 Trafficking in Persons Report

LENGTH: 4068 words

June 19, 2012

Luis CdeBaca

Ambassador-at-Large Via Teleconference

Washington, DC

MR. VENTRELL: Hi. And good afternoon everyone, and thank you for joining us. I'm pleased to introduce Ambassador Luis CdeBaca who is our Ambassador-At-Large and Director of our Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. Today's conference call is on the record. He's going to discuss the release of this year's Trafficking in Persons Report, which the Secretary will introduce at 4:00 p.m. Having said that, this call and all of its contents are embargoed until the Secretary finishes speaking at approximately 4:30 p.m. But this will give a chance for Ambassador CdeBaca to give you a preview and answer some of your questions. So without further ado, over to you, Mr. Ambassador.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you, and welcome, everyone. This afternoon, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and Under Secretary of State Maria Otero and I will be unveiling the 2012 Trafficking in Persons Report. This is a statutorily mandated report that comes out of the Victims of Trafficking Protections Act of the year 2000, which was the Clinton Administration's signature antislavery achievement continued and intensified by the Bush Administration and now taken to the next level by the Obama Administration.

We see the trafficking in persons issue and the bipartisan consensus against human trafficking to be something that is in keeping with the core United States values, both as far as how we conceive of ourselves as a nation and how we do our foreign policy and in -- very much in keeping with the -- this year's 150th anniversary of the Emancipation Proclamation. On September 22nd of this year, we will observe the 150th anniversary of President Lincoln declaring to the world that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall exist. And while that was not self-executing -- there was still a war to fight and win -- it resulted in the ending of legalized slavery in the United States.

But this promise of freedom, the notion of the universal right to be free, the notion of a universal -- a requirement to fight against human trafficking and modern day slavery continues into the modern era, and it is that call that we answer today. This is very much -- while we call it human trafficking, it's kind of the new and modern term for an old evil. This is truly what President Obama has called the intolerable yoke of modern slavery.

The annual Trafficking in Persons Report analyzes countries from around the world by looking at what the governments are doing against modern slavery. It does so through the 3P paradigm, in which we look at prevention, protection, and prosecution alike, not simply looking at this as a development issue or a public awareness issue, but also an issue of rehabilitation of victims and bringing the traffickers to justice. This is, as the report says this year, a crime first and foremost.

Now, this particular type of crime, a human rights crime or a civil rights crime as it were, is a crime that more countries and more governments are addressing. The report this year notes that the number of convictions globally reported is up from 3,619 last year to 3,969, and those are convictions of traffickers. That is not, however, a large number when one compares that to the global estimates of the victim population. A study released two weeks ago by the International Labor Organization estimates at least 21 million people held in bondage worldwide, and other estimates show it up to 27 million.

Human trafficking, just very quickly, a definitional point: This is not a crime of movement across borders for prostitution, although that is often how people see it. Both under the United States Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 and under the United Nations Palermo Protocol, the protocol to monitor and combat trafficking in persons from the year 2000, under both of those instruments, trafficking is defined as slavery. It doesn't matter if someone is in their own country; it doesn't matter if they're in sex or if they're in labor. If the person is not free to leave, if the person is unable to go get another position and is being held through some type of coercive force, that person is considered a trafficking victim, and that person is entitled to the protections that we look to governments to provide.

Now, having said that, we've seen the number of victims identified around the world has increased by almost a third. And this is, again, a very heartening piece of data, because it shows that governments are stepping up and are meeting their obligations, and we are very happy to see that 42,291 trafficking victims were identified and helped in the last year.

The issue, of course, continues to be, as I mentioned earlier, that we're looking at that within the context of almost 27 million people who are enslaved in the world. So there's a long way to go. And this report this year, looking at the problems of freedom and what we can do to deliver on it, is very much a challenge for all countries, the United States included, to address this and to intensify our efforts.

Now, one of the things that the report does each year that you may be familiar with is that it arranges countries onto four tiers. Counter-intuitively, those tiers are Tiers 1 through 3. But that is the magic of the congressional action on this. It is Tier 1 which is a country that is complying with the minimum standards to combat trafficking in persons; Tier 2, a country that is not yet compliant but is taking great strides; Tier 2 Watch List, which is basically a country that is in danger of falling down to Tier 3; and Tier 3, which is a country that is not complying with any of the minimum standards and is not working towards that.

We see this year on Tier 3, 17 countries; on Tier 2 Watch List, 42 countries; on Tier 2, 93 countries; and on Tier 1, 33 countries; 186 countries total appear in the report; 185 of them received rankings under the minimum standards. One of them did not, and that is Somalia, which does not have a functioning government such that we could include it in the report.

I would note, however, that even in Somalia, there are heroes of the anti-trafficking fight, particularly a recent prosecution that was brought in Puntland, shows that even in countries where there is not a functioning government, the legal system and others can work together to bring traffickers to justice. Heroes, much like that prosecutor in Somalia, we see that in this global and modern abolitionist fight, there are people whose commitment and whose excellence and whose innovation leaves them to be singled out as heroes of the fight.

And Secretary Clinton will honor 10 such heroes today, those people from countries around the world, from Argentina, to the United States, from Mauritania to Israel, from Greece to the Republic of the Congo. We see people who have done the cutting-edge legal work; we've seen the people who -- within government who have brought their government colleagues together to uncover human trafficking cases, to take a stand against official complicity. We also see people who are on the frontlines.

One of the honorees today is a nun who works with human trafficking victims in the Sinai. Another of the heroes that we honor today is a young man who was enslaved for three years on the fishing fleet in Southeast Asia and now, through his art and other activities, is raising awareness of the fact of labor exploitation in the fishing industry. All of these people are heroes, most notably the hero from Mauritania, a woman who was the first female lawyer in that country, and in the last five years has been able to obtain legislation for the first time outlawing slavery in Mauritania.

And I think that that brings us to the conclusion of my remarks. With that, I think, chilling notion that there are countries in the world where the abolition of slavery, the official, legal outlawing of this practice is not something for the history books, it's something within the living memory of the people in those countries. And I think it is a particular challenge as we address this in the modern era.

I will pitch you one thing before I get off and take questions, and that is so much of what is happening on the fight against modern slavery is dependent upon good and solid reporting, and I want to make sure that you know that my office is ready and willing to help you with that. This is an area that actually lends itself well to long-form or investigative reporting, and I think that we've seen with both the longer work and the commitment over the course of a year now that we've seen from CNN International that it's also something that the viewers or the readers very much will respond to. And so we think there's room for everybody, and we are certainly here and will support any of your work as you report on these stories. We're hoping that this isn't just today's news, but something that we can support going forward.

And I will also challenge everybody by saying that one thing that we hear from people in countries around the world is young journalists who want to work on this who look to the American media and others as a resource that can help them learn how to address this and how to investigate this. So we may be calling upon you for more than just press conferences.

Anyway, I'll turn it over for questions at this point. I've got, I think, about 15 minutes where I can answer some questions.

OPERATOR: Thank you. At this time, we will begin the question-and-answer session. If you would like to ask a question, please press *1 on your touchtone phone. Please unmute your phone and record your name clearly at the prompt. Once again, please press *1 if you would like to ask a question.

Our first question today is from Joshua Lipes. Your line is open.

QUESTION: Hi. Ambassador CdeBaca, thank you for your introduction. I was wondering if you could comment a little bit on how -- what changes in Burma brought about the increase in the rank from Tier 3 to Tier 2 Watch List this year.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: One of things that we have been very concerned about over the last few years was not simply the human trafficking that we see in Burma of say, for instance, going up to China for sex trafficking or over to Thailand for the labor trafficking as well as sex trafficking, but also the notion of state -- basically state-sponsored forced labor that arises from and is -- was supported by the 1907 Villages and Towns Act that was being used to justify the forced impressment of villagers and rural folks. And it has everything from porters for the military to working on construction projects and what have you.

And what we've seen over the last year is that the government in Burma has taken a number of significant and frankly unprecedented steps in advancing these reforms. There is a good inter-ministerial working group that had been limited by the Burmese Government's inability to work with other governments around the world, but they -- and they've been in existence for several years -- had worked within that constraint to actually try to bring on some best practices.

As a result, we've seen improved victim protection measures for victims who've come back from other countries. We've seen the inauguration of a new hotline, which has led to the rescue of 57 victims. And most importantly, this notion of repealing that antiquated law so there's no longer state-sponsored forced labor that is legal in Burma. This is something that not only the United States has worked with the Government of Burma on, but also the International Labor Organization, and I think you may be familiar with some announcements that the ILO made last week as far as that was concerned.

I'll tell you one last thing on Burma, and that is that one of the things I think that many people report on as far as Burma is the longstanding and heroic work that Aung San Suu Kyi has done for democracy building in that country, but people often tend to forget her activism on the issue of human trafficking, on her issue -- the issues of forced labor.

The first place that she went outside of Burma when she was able to travel again was to the areas in Thailand where hoards of Burmese migrant workers are exploited and abused in the Thai fish processing plants, and she addressed their abuse. The next place that she went when she went to Europe was to address the ILO. This is a woman who even she was under house arrest sent some of the money from her Nobel Prize to Thailand to be able to care for, shelter, and feed Burmese trafficking victims.

So this is a woman who we -- most of us know as a democracy activist, but many of us who work on human trafficking also know her as a good friend and colleague, and frankly, an expert in the field of human trafficking. And I think that her ability to take part in the governance of her own country will bode well for the fight against human trafficking in Burma.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. Luis Alonso, your line is open.

QUESTION: Yes. Hi. Good afternoon. Many thanks for taking this call, Mr. Ambassador. I would like to ask you about Latin America. I see that five countries in the region have improved their tier, and I would like to hear from you whether there is a trend in the region to better fight the traffic of persons. And also, if you could please confirm me whether it's the first time that Nicaragua is placed in Tier 1. Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Of course. I think that there is a trend in Latin America that is improving its efforts. Part of this perhaps comes out of the last few years. There's the action plan now with the Organization of American States, and I think that that has been a very positive framework in which countries can find a way forward.

But I think we've also seen political will. The upgrade recently in the country of Honduras -- that was legislation that had been stuck for several years. It wasn't that anyone opposed it; it just never really was going anywhere. We worked with the Honduran Government and were able to come up with a way forward on bipartisan legislation that everyone agreed on for the protection of Hondurans and the protection of others who may in Honduras from labor trafficking and sex trafficking.

So, too, with the Dominican Republic, we saw the Government of the Dominican Republic take on a number of concerns that at first they were a little bit defensive and didn't know what to think about some of these issues and then rolled up their sleeves, got to work, and through political will started putting together the structures in place. And so as a result, we've seen convictions for not only trafficking -- excuse me -- but also the first labor trafficking convictions in the Dominican Republic, a conviction of two people who forced children into begging rings.

Now, you're correct that this is the first year in which Nicaragua has been on Tier 1 in the Trafficking in Persons Report, and we see this as an improvement over previous years. This year, the Government of Nicaragua convicted nine traffickers. Just look back to 2009, when only two traffickers were brought to justice. This last year, they opened a dedicated shelter for adult human trafficking victims. And I think that's specifically interesting in Central America because so much of the shelter opportunities in Central America are limited to children and are often donor-funded, whether it's American or other religious groups that are taking care of children in Central America. The fact that the Nicaraguan Government stepped up and is putting together services for adult victims was, we think, a very positive step on the part of the Government of Nicaragua.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. Lucia Leal, your line is open.

QUESTION: Hi. Yes. I wanted to ask about the decision to remove Venezuela from the Tier 3 part of the report, if you could describe what kind of progress has led to that, and also the removal of Haiti from the category of special cases, please. Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Of course. Tell me your name again. I didn't hear it very well.

QUESTION: Yes. It's Lucia Leal from Ese.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Oh, okay. Hi, Lucia.

QUESTION: Hi.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I think that what we saw with Venezuela this year was the notion of on the one hand increased public awareness, the public information campaigns, trainings of government officials on human trafficking. Those typically will have an impact. And I think that that's what we saw in Venezuela, is that by committing to doing those trainings and by actually being out and doing those trainings we saw that happening.

What were some of the things we saw? Well, one of the main things that we saw was that there were a couple of traffickers convicted, but more importantly 38 trafficking victims were identified and were helped. And of course, as you know, for us, that's one of the most important things is, is a government helping the victims that they find, whether those are Venezuelan nationals or whether those are foreigners who are in Venezuela.

The other thing that we thought was very notable this year -- and again, the minimum standards that we apply, Tier 3 is a country that is not meeting the minimum standards and is not trying to do so. And this is the year we saw the national assembly adopting a reform, a -- that's looking at this. This is actually a form of the organized crime law, but one of the things we've seen is that they were working with civil society organizations to try to make sure that that law could be brought into place and strengthened the legal reform and legal framework against trafficking.

So we think that that was a very positive step on the part of the national assembly, and I think that that's -- that plus the 24-hour hotline and a few of those other things, we looked at. And when we did the analysis came to the conclusion that this was not a Tier 3 country this year.

As far as Haiti is concerned, Haiti has been on the special case category for several years. And one of the things that we saw over the last year is that the -- now the governance situation in Haiti is stable and largely peaceful. President Martelly and his government came to power in the first peaceful transition from an elected administration to the opposition, and the reconstruction efforts and development efforts continue to progress.

So in looking at that, we always look to see what's the situation on the ground. Is there political stability? Are the courts functioning? While there are still some remaining issues as far as parliament and the government and the prime minister and things like this, we see a functioning government now in Haiti at a level that we feel justified bringing them into the report as a ranked country as opposed to on the special case category.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. And the next question is from Hee Jung Yang. Your line is open.

QUESTION: Yes. I would like to ask what was the particular different situation regarding North Korea in terms of human trafficking. And also, I would like to ask whether there has been any cases that U.S. Government prohibited North Korea from getting any loan from the IMF and World Bank because it was recorded as the Third Tier in terms of human trafficking by the State Department's report.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, one of the things that we've seen with North Korea repeatedly over the years is, again, this notion of state-supported forced labor. And we are, of course, concerned not just about forced labor within the country, but also in recent years more and more labor exporting of North Korean, often, men, whether it's into the Middle East, whether it's into especially Russia and other places. And of course, with most countries, when they send workers overseas, it's between the workers, the recruiters, the employers. When the North Koreans send workers overseas, they send the police with them and keep them under surveillance and retaliate against them if they try to fight for their rights or if they try to leave.

So we continue to see the situation of forced labor/human trafficking in North Korea as very grave. The United States is required to vote no in the international financial institutions when countries are on Tier 3 of the trafficking report. That's something, frankly, that the Treasury Department and some others work on, and I don't have an immediate answer for you on that notion of were there votes this year in which the United States voted no on this basis. But it's something that we can look at and we can circle back.

QUESTION: Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. The next question is from Indira Lakshmanan. Your line is open.

QUESTION: Thank you, Ambassador. I wanted to ask -- and I apologize if you addressed this at the very top of the briefing because I missed it -- but have you gained or lost ground over the last year in the fight on human trafficking? And could --

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: That's a wonderful question, and --

QUESTION: Could you give numbers --

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I did address it a little bit, but I think it's something I want to address again, because --

QUESTION: Okay. Can I just ask specifically -- can you tell us how many countries were upgraded, how many were downgraded, and how many people are in slavery right now while you answer that question?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I can totally do that. I will do that again, and like I said, I'm glad to do it, because I think that these are concepts that we really need to make sure people are hearing.

So the number of identified victims around the world -- excuse me -- these are victims identified by governments in the last year -- has increased by 28 percent. In 2011, it was 33,113. In 2012, the number of identified victims by governments was 42,291. That is a 28 percent increase. Convictions are also up by 10 percent from 3,619 to 3,969. Now, conviction numbers typically lag one or two years behind victim identification and investigation numbers because of how long it takes for cases to go through the pipeline.

This last year we saw 7,909 prosecutions initiated as opposed to the year before, which was 6,017 prosecutions initiated. So we do think that we're seeing some real positive movement as far as those numbers are concerned, but those numbers have to be placed in the context of the overarching number of people who are in modern slavery in the world, and that is, per the ILO, at least 21 million people worldwide. There are other researchers that put that number as high as 27 million.

So I think that's the numbers case. I think the upgrade and downgrade question you had asked, this year there are 186 countries on the report; 185 of them were ranked; Somalia was not. This year, Tier 1 of the report, which says that countries are meeting the minimum standards -- and I'd caution that that's not saying that countries are doing a great job on this; it's simply that they're meeting the minimum.

QUESTION: I actually got those numbers, because you had read them out, the four tiers, but did you have a number of how many were upgraded and how many were downgraded among the categories?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I don't really count that way.

QUESTION: Okay.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: So it's not something that --as far as kind of what the raw up and down number is, I know -- I can tell you how big each of the tiers are compared to how they have been. Tier 2 has gotten a little bit bigger with 93 as opposed to 85 last year. Tiers 1 and Tiers 2 Watch List are basically the same -- 33, Tier 1, last year it was 32; Tier 2 Watch List is 42, last year was 41. And Tier 3 is smaller this year by five countries. Last year it was 23, this year is 17.

So there is a little bit of movement up into Tier 2, which means that countries are passing laws. It means that countries are starting to address the situation. They still have a little ways to go, but that's, I think, some -- the beginnings, I think, of a real trend. And we also see a number of countries that have prosecuted cases for the first time this year. And so I think that that is also -- excuse me -- that's something that when you see countries taking that first step, like we saw in Brunei, for instance, like we've seen in Somalia, that is, I think, a very positive step.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. That is the final question for today's call.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you all.

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

JOURNAL-CODE: M2PW

93 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Malaysia General News

June 20, 2012 Wednesday

SINGAPORE AT TIER 2 IN US TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORTLENGTH: 177 wordsDATELINE: SINGAPORE June 20

The recent court cases of men allegedly having paid sex with an underaged girl have made their way into the Trafficking in Persons Report 2012 released by the United States State Department.

The report alleges that child sex trafficking occurred in Singapore, reported local television Channel NewsAsia (CNA). CNA said in the 2012 Report, Singapore had been classified under Tier 2 of countries reported upon and this referred to countries where governments did not fully comply with the minimum standards, but were making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards.

It said the US report noted that the Singapore government has increased its efforts to prevent trafficking in persons during the year.

In March 2012, CNA said the Inter-Agency Task Force on Human Trafficking launched Singapore's first National Plan of Action to coordinate the government's anti-trafficking activities.

The government has also increased efforts to educate the public through television and print media campaigns about the dangers of trafficking, CNA said.

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

94 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
Malaysia General News

June 20, 2012 Wednesday

SINGAPORE AT TIER 2 IN US TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORTLENGTH: 177 wordsDATELINE: SINGAPORE June 20

The recent court cases of men allegedly having paid sex with an underaged girl have made their way into the Trafficking in Persons Report 2012 released by the United States State Department.

The report alleges that child sex trafficking occurred in Singapore, reported local television Channel NewsAsia (CNA). CNA said in the 2012 Report, Singapore had been classified under Tier 2 of countries reported upon and this referred to countries where governments did not fully comply with the minimum standards, but were making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards.

It said the US report noted that the Singapore government has increased its efforts to prevent trafficking in persons during the year.

In March 2012, CNA said the Inter-Agency Task Force on Human Trafficking launched Singapore's first National Plan of Action to coordinate the government's anti-trafficking activities.

The government has also increased efforts to educate the public through television and print media campaigns about the dangers of trafficking, CNA said.

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

95 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Mizzima

June 20, 2012 Wednesday

Burma takes 'unprecedented steps' to fight human trafficking: U.S.

LENGTH: 1003 words

Burma was moved one notch higher for its efforts to stop human trafficking during the past year, a new report by the U.S. State Department showed on Tuesday.

Burma moved from Tier 3, which it had occupied since 2001, to Tier 2, because of positive efforts to combat human trafficking and arrest and prosecute offenders, including members of the military.

One of the world's worst offenders of human trafficking laws in the past, Burma was urged to continue with its "unprecedented steps" over the past year.

Luis CdeBaca, the U.S. ambassador-at-large for human trafficking issues, said Burma was upgraded after the government repealed an antiquated law that had been used to justify forced labor and replaced it with a law expressly forbidding the practice.

The government also made progress identifying and helping victims, and a national trafficking hotline introduced in September has led to the rescue of 57 victims. Much of its recent efforts have been undertaken with the cooperation of the International Labour Organization (ILO).

However, the report said many Burmese men, women and children who travel abroad for work are subjected to forced labor or sex trafficking, as trafficking by both private individuals and government officials "continues to be a significant problem."

The Burmese military still conscripts child soldiers and is the leading perpetrator of forced labor within the country, particularly in conflict-prone ethnic areas, said the report.

The country is taking steps to alleviate Burma's chronic underdevelopment and lack of jobs, said he report, but trafficking within Burma by both government officials and private actors continues, including military personnel and militant ethnic insurgents.

"The climate of impunity and repression and the government's lack of accountability in forced labor and the recruitment of child soldiers represent the top casual factors for Burma's significant trafficking problem," the report said.

The Burmese government does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, the State Department said, but "it is making significant steps to do so."

CdeBaca praised the work of pro-democracy leader Aung San Suu Kyi in combating human trafficking and forced labor in the country.

CdeBaca said that the State Department had been particularly concerned in recent years by "state-sponsored forced labor" in Burma which had been allowed to continue under the 1907 Villages and Towns Acts.

The law has been repealed by the newly formed Parliament.

Since the dissolution of a cease-fire with the Kachin Independence Army in June 2011, fighting has displaced an estimated 60,000 Kachin residents, who are highly vulnerable to forced labor and sex trafficking, said the report.

An NGO study published in 2010 found an acute problem in Chin State, where a survey of over 600 households indicated that over 92 percent experienced at least one instance of a household member subjected to forced labor, it said. The Burmese military reportedly imposed two-thirds of these forced labor demands. Because authorities refuse to recognize members of certain ethnic minority groups (including the Rohingyas) as citizens and do not provide them with identification documentation, members of these communities are more vulnerable to trafficking.

"The Kachin ethnic minority is particularly vulnerable to trafficking due to an ongoing conflict between the Burma Army and the Kachin Independence Army. Military and civilian officials subject men, women, and children to forced labor, and men and boys as young as 11 years old are forced through intimidation, coercion, threats, and violence to serve in the Burma Army as well as the armed wings of ethnic minority groups," said the report.

"The Government of Burma does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so," it said. "The Burmese government took a number of unprecedented steps to address forced labor and the conscription of child soldiers; these steps amount to a credible commitment to undertake anti-trafficking reforms over the coming year."

The report called for the implementation of the terms of the ILO action plan for the elimination of forced labor offenses perpetrated by government employees, particularly military personnel.

It said that 26 Anti-Trafficking Task Forces operated in key cities and at international border crossings, and the police continued to identify and investigate trafficking offenses and to arrest suspected trafficking offenders. The government reported investigating 136 cases of trafficking, and prosecuting 231 offenders in 2011 - 160 of whom were female - compared to 234 convicted in 2010, but it said the statistics are based on a lack of transparency and hard to verify.

During the year, it said the government showed unprecedented cooperation with the ILO and other international partners in discussing remedies for the long-standing problems of forced labor and child soldier conscription committed by members of the military or civilian administrators.

The ILO continued to receive and investigate forced labor complaints; 324 were received in 2011, of which 236 involved alleged conscription of children for military service. The ILO submitted 145 cases to the Burmese government for action in 2011. The government resolved 80 cases; 65 cases are pending resolution by the government and six cases were closed with an "unsatisfactory outcome," according to the ILO.

For the first time in several years, the Ministry of Defense provided data on military personnel disciplined for forced labor offenses: four officers and 37 enlisted personnel were punished for "improper recruitment," though none of these offenders were imprisoned. The four officers received official reprimands and, of the 37 enlisted personnel, 22 received reprimands, nine were suspended without pay for seven days, five were suspended without pay for 14 days, and one was reduced in rank, said the report.

LOAD-DATE: August 17, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

96 of 492 DOCUMENTS

The Pioneer (India)

June 20, 2012 Wednesday

US raps India for human trafficking record

LENGTH: 457 words

DATELINE: Washington

Washington, June 20 -- The US has come up with a damning report on the poor record of India and many others in dealing with forced labour and sex trafficking. It wants New Delhi to enact a comprehensive anti-trafficking law and step up enforcement to ensure increased prosecutions and convictions.

Placing India on a Tier 2 list for the second consecutive year, the India segment of the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report 2012 says, "India is a source, destination and transit for men, women and children subjected to forced labour and sex trafficking. The forced labour of millions of its citizens constitutes India's largest trafficking problem."

Tier 2 represents governments which do not fully comply with the minimum standards of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act.

"The Government of India does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so," the report says, noting the Home Ministry's establishment of Anti-Human Trafficking Units and the CBI's launch of anti-trafficking unit.

The report calls upon India to develop a comprehensive anti-trafficking law or amend legislation to be in line with the 2000 UN TIP Protocol, with adequate penalties prescribed by the UN Transnational Organized Crime Convention.

"Challenges remain regarding overall law enforcement efforts against bonded labour and the alleged complicity of public officials in human trafficking," it says, noting that 90 per cent of trafficking in India is internal, with those from India's most disadvantaged social strata, including lowest castes, being most vulnerable.

Dealing with sex trafficking, the report speaks of an increasing number of job placement agencies luring adults and children for forced labour or sex trafficking under false promises of employment.

"Women and girls are trafficked within the country for the purposes of forced prostitution," it says, noting: "Religious pilgrimage centers and cities popular for tourism continue to be vulnerable to child sex tourism. Women and girls from Nepal and Bangladesh, and an increasing number of females from Uzbekistan, Ukraine, and Russia, are also subjected to sex trafficking in India."

"There were increasing reports of females from northeastern states and Odisha subjected to servile marriages in states with low female-to-male child sex ratios, including Haryana and Punjab, and also reports of girls subjected to transactional sexual exploitation in the Middle East under the guise of temporary marriages," it says. Published by HT Syndication with permission from Pioneer. For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 CMYK Printech Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

97 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Registan.net

June 20, 2012 Wednesday 1:16 AM EST

Written Plan Saves Uzbekistan on Trafficking Report

LENGTH: 427 words

The State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons report has been released and Uzbekistan pulled a Tier 2 Watchlist ranking again. Here's the key passage from the report on why Uzbekistan gets to stay at Tier 2 Watchlist for the fifth consecutive year rather than dropping down to Tier 3:

The Government of Uzbekistan does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. The government has not shown evidence of increasing efforts to address human trafficking over the previous year; therefore, Uzbekistan is placed on Tier 2 Watch List for a fifth consecutive year. Uzbekistan was granted a waiver of an otherwise required downgrade to Tier 3 because its government has a written plan that, if implemented, would constitute making significant efforts to meet the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is devoting sufficient resources to implement that plan.

The report methodology explains that a 2008 amendment to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) requires downgrades for countries who fail to progress from Tier 2 Watchlist to Tier 2 in a two consecutive year period. That requirement went into effect last year, and the Secretary of State can waive the downgrade twice, meaning this should be Uzbekistan's last free downgrade.

The big issue for Uzbekistan is cotton. A couple months ago, I wrote that it is hard to tell what Uzbekistan has done this year that it did not do last year. The Trafficking in Persons determinations have a lot to do with momentum. The situation can quantitatively be the same year-over-year in a country, but still lead to a fall to a lower tier for a lack of government effort. In 2011, Uzbekistan declared its intent to police itself to reduce forced child labor. In 2012, Uzbekistan has declared its intent to police itself to reduce forced child labor. It is hard to identify anything in State's narrative for Uzbekistan that illustrates how Tashkent is devoting sufficient resources to implementing its written plan. Sure, UNICEF poked around, but even they say Uzbekistan's government will not change. And some say they are going to probably be worse this year.

Of course, we all know this has entirely to do with avoiding angering Uzbekistan's government and preventing headaches on the NDN, all the more important with US-Pakistan relations on the rocks. That said, it is unfortunate that there cannot be some real keeping in explaining the decision.

Here is how the rest of Central Asia fared:

Kazakhstan: 2

Kyrgyzstan: 2

Tajikistan: 2

Turkmenistan: 2 watch list

LOAD-DATE: June 25, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Blog

JOURNAL-CODE: REGI-0001

Copyright 2012 Newstex LLC
All Rights Reserved
Newstex Web Blogs
Copyright 2012 Registan.net

98 of 492 DOCUMENTS

RTT News (United States)

June 20, 2012 Wednesday

Trafficking In Persons Report Finds Progress In Myanmar, Latin American Nations

LENGTH: 901 words

(RTTNews) - The United States' Trafficking in Persons Report 2012 shows that Myanmar and Latin American countries are making progress in the fight against what it calls "the modern form of slavery."

The report was released in Washington on Tuesday by Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, Under Secretary of State Maria Otero, and Luis CdeBaca, Ambassador-at-Large, Office To Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

At a special briefing after releasing the report, CdeBaca said that the number of victims identified around the world had increased by almost a third, which showed that governments were stepping up and were meeting their obligations. As many as 42,291 trafficking victims were identified and helped last year.

Myanmar was considered as a country of state-sponsored forced labor, and its people going up to China for sex trafficking or to Thailand for sex trafficking and labor trafficking.

CdeBaca said that over the last year, the government in Myanmar had taken a number of significant and unprecedented steps in advancing reforms in fighting human trafficking.

"As a result, we've seen improved protection measures for victims who've come back from other countries," she told reporters. A law was repealed, so there was no longer state-sponsored forced labor that was legal in Myanmar.

Five countries in Latin America have improved their ranking, and there is a trend in the region to better fight the traffic of persons. And for the first time Nicaragua is placed in Tier 1 of the report. This year, the Government of Nicaragua convicted nine traffickers. Venezuela was removed from the Tier 3 part of the report, while Haiti was removed from the category of special cases.

The report lists countries onto four tiers: Tier 1 is a level of a country that is complying with the minimum standards to combat trafficking in persons; Tier 2 lists countries that are not yet compliant but is taking great strides; Tier 2 Watch List comprises countries that are in danger of falling down to Tier 3; and Tier 3 is a grouping of countries that are not complying with any of the minimum standards and is not working towards that.

This year's report has 17 countries on Tier 3, 42 on Tier 2 Watch List, 93 on Tier 2, and 33 on Tier 1.

The report expressed concern over state-supported forced labor in North Korea, as well as increased labor exporting of North Koreans to regions such as the Middle East and Russia. When the North Koreans send workers overseas, they send the police with them and keep them under surveillance and retaliate against them if they try to fight for their rights or if they try to leave, the report noted.

The report says the United States continues to see the situation of forced labor/human trafficking in North Korea as very grave. The United States is required to vote no in the international financial institutions when countries are on Tier 3 of the trafficking report.

CdeBaca said the number of victims identified by governments last year had increased by 28 percent -- from 33,113 in 2011 to 42,291 in 2012. Convictions are up by 10 percent - from 3,619 to 3,969.

Last year saw 7,909 prosecutions initiated as opposed to the year before, which was 6,017 prosecutions initiated. As per the ILO, the number of people who are in modern slavery in the world is estimated at at least 21 million. There are other researchers that put the number as high as 27 million.

This year, Tier 2 has got bigger with 93 as opposed to 85 last year, which means that countries are passing laws.

A total of 186 countries that appear in the report received rankings under the minimum standards, except Somalia, which does not have a functioning government.

But CdeBaca noted that even in Somalia, there are heroes of the anti-trafficking fight, particularly a recent prosecution that was brought in Puntland, shows that even in countries where there is not a functioning government, the legal system and others can work together to bring traffickers to justice.

At a ceremony held at the State Department, Clinton honored ten heroes of the anti-trafficking fight from different parts of the world, from Argentina to the United States, from Mauritania to Israel, from Greece to the Republic of the Congo.

The honorees included a nun who works with human trafficking victims in the Sinai, a young man who was enslaved for three years on the fishing fleet in Southeast Asia and now raising awareness of labor exploitation in the fishing industry, and a woman who was the first female lawyer in Mauritania, and in the last five years has been able to obtain legislation for the first time outlawing slavery in that country.

Speaking on the occasion, Clinton said the report gives "a clear and honest assessment of where all of us are making progress on our commitments and where we are either standing still or even sliding backwards" in fighting this modern form of slavery.

Clinton recollected that during her visit to the eastern Indian city of Kolkata, she met several young women from the United States who had been working with organizations, NGOs, and the faith community, trying to help protect victims of human trafficking in the city.

Both under the United States Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 and under the United Nations Palermo Protocol, human trafficking is defined as slavery.

For comments and feedback: contact editorial@rttnews.com

Copyright(c) 2012 RTTNews.com. All Rights Reserved

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

99 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

June 20, 2012 Wednesday 11:41 PM EST

Obama Admin. AGAIN Refuses to Hold China Accountable for Rampant Human Trafficking

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 677 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J. (4th CD), issued the following news release:

The Obama Administration's failure to hold China accountable for its atrocious human trafficking violations in this year's annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report was called "shameful" and a "dereliction of duty" by Chris Smith, the lawmaker who wrote the first-ever U.S. law to combat trafficking in 2000 and whose law created the annual report with its tier ranking system (Public Law 106-386).

Rep. Chris Smith (NJ-04), author of the landmark the Trafficking Victims and Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA) as well as subsequent laws to adapt and strengthen the TVPA, said he was "appalled" that China was given a political waiver despite its rampant and growing problem of human trafficking, particularly sex-trafficking of women and girls.

"China has remained on the 'Watch List' for eight years now, evading a downgrade to Tier 3--and sanctions--by stringing this President along with empty promises," said Smith, who chairs the House subcommittee that oversees human rights and co-chairs the Congressional Human Trafficking Caucus. "Congress could not have been more clear that the Tier 2 Watch List was not meant to be a sanctuary for countries that fail to address--or themselves commit--the atrocious human rights abuses of human trafficking."

The report contains the litany of trafficking crimes perpetrated in China including forced labor of children and of the disabled in brick kilns, repatriation of North Korean trafficking victims, the trafficking of women and children from surrounding countries for sexual exploitation, and the trafficking magnet effect of China's one-child policy, which, coupled with a cultural preference for sons, creates a skewed sex ratio in China. According to the report, the one-child policy is a key cause of trafficking of foreign women as brides for Chinese men and for forced prostitution. China's own statistics show a substantial increase in the number of women trafficked to China in 2011.

"China was granted a waiver last year because its government allegedly had a 'written plan that, if implemented, would constitute a significant effort to bring itself into compliance with the minimum standards' and it was allegedly 'devoting sufficient resources to implement that plan'-- it is the exact same story this year, except for that we still do not know the contents of the plan and its release has been postponed yet again," Smith said. "Where are the results? When will the Administration say that enough is enough?"

In the most recent reauthorization of the TVPA, Congress decided that no country should be allowed to skirt sanctions on the Tier 2 Watch List for more than two years. This year, 2012, represents the second year that the limit was put to the test.

"Our obligation is to the victims of trafficking, not the dictatorship, as I have stressed in the past," Smith said.

The report showed good news in other parts of the world, with an overall increase for 2011 in the number of traffickers convicted (3,969) and the number of victims identified (42,291) (Click Here to Read the 2012 Report).

This year's report evaluated 186 countries, 28 of which were upgraded in the tier rankings. Fourteen countries were downgraded this year--including three previous Tier 1 countries. Bosnia Herzegovina, Nigeria, and Portugal were downgraded to Tier 2 this year, underscoring the importance of consistent implementation of anti-trafficking laws.

"It is not enough to have good laws on the books here or anywhere else," said Smith. "They must be funded and implemented in order to meet the minimum standards of combating human trafficking."

Notably, only one additional country was downgraded to Tier 3 this year.

In addition to the original 2000 law which provided for the annual reports, Smith wrote two subsequent anti-trafficking laws (PL 108-193 and PL 109-164) increasing resources for crime prevention and expanding treatment assistance for victims.

Contact: Jeff Sagnip, 202/225-3765

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS MJ88-120620-3918156 StaffFurigay

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Targeted News Service LLC
All Rights Reserved

100 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

June 20, 2012 Wednesday 3:49 AM EST

Uzbekistan: US Report Fails Child Labor Victims

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 915 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Human Rights Watch issued the following news release:

The United States (<http://www.hrw.org/united-states>) government's decision not to cite Uzbekistan (<http://www.hrw.org/europecentral-asia/uzbekistan>) for its widespread practice of forced and child labor in the country's cotton sector sends the wrong message to the Uzbek government, a broad coalition of groups said in a letter (<http://www.hrw.org/news/2012/06/19/uzbekistan-joint-letter-regarding-us-failure-downgrade-uzbekistans-tip-tier-status>) to US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton on June 19, 2012. The coalition called on US officials to press the Uzbek government to invite the International Labour Organization (ILO) to monitor the 2012 cotton harvest.

The letter followed the US government's release on June 19 of its annual Global Trafficking in Persons (GTIP) report (<http://www.state.gov/j/tip/rls/tiprpt/2012/index.htm>). The report fails to cite Uzbekistan as a country that does not comply with minimal standards to combat forced and child labor, or a "Tier III country," the groups said. Under the US Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act (TVPRA), the Uzbek government should have demonstrated that it was making "significant efforts" to eliminate forced labor to avoid a downgrade to Tier III, which would carry the threat of sanctions.

"Forced labor of adults and children is human trafficking under US law," said Steve Swerdlow (<http://www.hrw.org/bios/steve-swerdlow>), Central Asia Researcher at Human Rights Watch. "The failure to classify Uzbekistan properly for the fifth straight year is wholly inconsistent with the well-documented evidence of its systematic abuses. The US effectively sent a message to Uzbek authorities that enslaving children for profit in abusive conditions is cost-free."

The coalition consists of human rights, trade union, apparel industry, retail, investor, and other nongovernmental organizations, including groups from Uzbekistan.

Uzbek authorities use a cotton production system that in practice relies on the use of forced labor, while consistently denying that forced labor is used and cracking down on rights activists who try to monitor it. Reports (<http://www.eurasianet.org/node/64362>) about the 2011 harvest by local monitoring groups and academic studies highlighted the coercion of children as young as 10 and adults to pick cotton and to fulfill government quotas.

The State Department report identifies the Uzbek government's state quota system for cotton production as a root cause of the practice of forced labor. However, even though Tashkent has clearly made no progress in addressing the issue, the State Department waived the threat of sanctions, as it did last year.

The global trafficking report acknowledges that during the cotton harvest, working conditions include long hours, insufficient food and water, exposure to harmful pesticides, verbal abuse, and inadequate shelter. The report also noted that the use of forced labor and child labor was higher than in the previous years.

The relentless crackdown on the independent civil society activists who attempt to monitor the cotton sector abuses is a further indication of the Uzbek government's lack of political will to address this issue, the groups said. In 2011, Uzbek authorities arbitrarily detained at least three prominent rights activists - Elena Urlaeva, Gulshan Karaeva, and Nodir Akhatov -while they were photographing and interviewing Uzbek school children forced to pick cotton. Karaeva was recently violently attacked for her human rights activism in an event that appeared to be orchestrated by authorities.

In addition, school officials in Jizzakh in 2011 fired a teacher, Ziyadullo Rizzakov, after he protested the mobilization of his students into the cotton fields. Later, local prosecutors threatened him with a criminal investigation if he persisted in his human rights work.

International nongovernmental organizations and foreign media outlets are prevented from operating in Uzbekistan, making it difficult to report on forced and child labor or other human rights abuses. For years the Uzbek government has refused to allow the ILO to send independent experts to the country to monitor forced and child labor during the fall cotton harvest.

"We are concerned that with quotas set so high for this fall, according to all reports, the Uzbek government will demand even more from the children and adults forced to grow and harvest cotton," said Brian Campbell, policy director at the International Labor Rights Forum. "Only the ILO has the technical expertise and experience to properly monitor this practice, and it should have unfettered access throughout the cotton harvest and the ability to fully engage Uzbek civil society."

This appeal follows a letter (http://www.cottoncampaign.org/wp-content/uploads/2012/04/CottonCampaignLetter_to_Sec_Clinton_April2012_final.pdf) from the coalition to Clinton in April, urging the US government to downgrade Uzbekistan in the 2012 Trafficking in Persons report.

"The practice of forced labor in Uzbekistan has persisted for far too long and should be urgently ended," said Nate Herman, vice president of international trade for the American Apparel & Footwear Association (AAFA), which said it will continue speaking out about Uzbekistan until forced and child labor are eradicated. "This year's report missed a crucial opportunity to end this abominable practice sooner."

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS gv51gv 120621-3919092 61GemaViana

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Targeted News Service LLC
All Rights Reserved

101 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

June 20, 2012 Wednesday 2:35 AM EST

Secretary Clinton Releases 2012 Trafficking in Persons Report

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 204 words

DATELINE: YAOUNDE, Cameroon

The U.S. Embassy issued the following news release:

Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton unveiled on June 19 the 2012 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report at a ceremony at the United States Department of State. As required by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA), the TIP Report assesses governments around the world on their efforts to combat modern slavery. This year's Report is the 12th installment and includes narratives of 186 countries and territories.

This year, Cameroon has been moved up from the Watch list onto the Tier 2 list. This improvement is partly a result of Cameroon's new Trafficking in Persons law, which extends protections to adults as well as children.

At the event, Secretary Clinton also honored the 2012 TIP Heroes, ten men and women whose personal efforts have made an extraordinary difference in the global fight against modern slavery. The event will also be attended by members of the diplomatic corps, nongovernmental and international organization representatives, and anti-trafficking activists.

The 2012 Trafficking in Persons Report on Cameroon can be found on the U.S Embassy website at www.yaounde.usembassy.gov

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS MJ88-120622-3920518 StaffFurigay

LOAD-DATE: June 22, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Targeted News Service LLC
All Rights Reserved

The Telegraph

telegraph.co.uk

June 20, 2012 Wednesday 7:27 AM GMT

Hillary Clinton: up to 27 million living in slavery; Up to 27 million people are living in slavery around the world, US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton estimated on Tuesday as the US unveiled its annual report into human trafficking.

SECTION: NEWS

LENGTH: 709 words

But the report showed that as governments become more aware of the issue, instigating tough new laws and programs to help victims, progress is being made in wiping out what it called the "scourge of trafficking."

"The end of legal slavery in the United States and in other countries around the world has not, unfortunately, meant the end of slavery," said Mrs Clinton.

"Today it is estimated as many as 27 million people around the world are victims of modern slavery, what we sometimes call trafficking in persons," she said at the unveiling of the report at the State Department.

"Those victims of modern slavery are women and men, girls and boys, and their stories remind us of the kind of inhumane treatment we are capable of as human beings," said Mrs Clinton.

"Whatever their background, they are the living, breathing reminders that the work to eradicate slavery remains unfinished."

As America prepares to mark the 150th anniversary of the proclamation of the emancipation of US slaves, people must reflect on "how much further we have to go to free all these 27 million victims," Clinton added.

Out of the 185 countries included in the 2012 report, only 33 complied fully with laws in place to end human trafficking, putting them at the top of a four-tier ranking system.

But five countries had moved up from the bottom blacklist known as tier 3, including Burma and Venezuela, to be included among the 42 countries now on what is known as a tier 2 watchlist.

Burma was removed from the blacklist because the government "took a number of unprecedented steps to address forced labour and the conscription of child soldiers; these steps amount to a credible commitment to undertake anti-trafficking reforms over the coming year," the report said.

Syria however fell onto the blacklist for the first time, in a move which could cut off any US aid and make it harder to get US backing for funds from organisations like the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund.

"The government of Syria does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to do so," the 2012 Trafficking in Persons report said.

Among the 16 other countries on the blacklist were Algeria, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Libya, North Korea and Saudi Arabia.

Kenya slipped down onto the watchlist for the first time in five years, while Nigeria lost its place on tier 1, moving down a notch as the report highlighted that women and children were forced into labour and sex trafficking.

But Mrs Clinton hailed the fact that a total of 29 countries had been upgraded to a higher ranking, "which means that their governments are taking the right steps."

They included Bangladesh, which was bumped up to tier two for making significant efforts to comply with minimum standards, including passing "a comprehensive anti-trafficking law" in December.

Ambassador Luis CdeBaca, director of the office to combat trafficking in persons, said while the number of people officially identified as victims of trafficking and slavery had gone up by 28 per cent since last year to 42,291, the numbers of prosecutions in 2012 had also increased by 10 per cent to 3,969.

So while countries "still have a little ways to go" there was "the beginnings, I think, of a real trend," he said.

This year's report focuses on how to better protect the victims, and urges governments to meet the challenge head-on.

"Traffickers are criminals. Governments - which alone have the power to punish criminals and provide legal recourse to survivors - cannot waver in their efforts to confront modern slavery," the report says.

But it also argues that human trafficking takes many guises and it is not just about moving people across borders to trap them in prostitution.

"The United States government, and increasingly, the international community, view 'trafficking in persons' as the term through which all forms of modern slavery are criminalised," it says.

"The essence of the trafficking experience is the denial of freedom, including the freedom to choose where and how you live, the freedom to work or choose not to work, the freedom from threats, and the freedom of bodily integrity," the report says.

Source: agencies

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

JOURNAL-CODE: WEBDTNS

103 of 492 DOCUMENTS

United News of Bangladesh

June 20, 2012 Wednesday

Bangladesh upgraded to Tier 2 in US TIP report

BYLINE: UNB Connect

LENGTH: 338 words

Bangladesh was upgraded to "Tier 2" in the Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report, 2012 released by US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton in Washington on Tuesday.

The report says Bangladesh was upgraded to "Tier 2" in recognition of the Bangladesh government's important accomplishments in the past year, including enactment of the landmark Human Trafficking Deterrence and Suppression Act.

The Parliament passed the law in February this year. The government also launched a National Plan of Action for Combating Human Trafficking in May.

The report says these steps ensure Bangladesh has a comprehensive, multi-stakeholder legal framework to address all forms of trafficking, including labor trafficking and trafficking of men.

TIP report observes Bangladesh's immediate challenge and opportunity will be to ensure effective implementation and enforcement of the new law and plan of action to develop an effective regime of prevention, protection and prosecution.

It says the U.S. Government strongly supports the Bangladesh government's efforts to address trafficking and will continue its support through the U.S. Agency for International Development's program Actions for Combating Trafficking in Persons (ACT).

ACT works with NGO partners such as Winrock International and with the Ministry of Home Affairs to develop a comprehensive approach to the prosecution of traffickers, protection of victims and prevention of the crime of trafficking. A release of the US embassy in Dhaka said this year's TIP Report theme is "The Promise of Freedom."

It says the theme encourages every government, including the United States, to commit to fulfilling the promise of freedom from slavery embodied in modern anti-trafficking laws and international protocols by punishing traffickers, providing services and legal recourse to victims and preventing the crime of trafficking from occurring.

As required by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, the TIP Report assesses governments around the world on their efforts to combat modern slavery.

LOAD-DATE: August 17, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

104 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Xinhua General News Service

June 20, 2012 Wednesday 6:40 PM EST

U.S. human trafficking cases slipping through cracks: report

SECTION: WORLD NEWS; Political

LENGTH: 633 words

DATELINE: by Matthew Rusling WASHINGTON June 20

Cases of human trafficking are rarely prosecuted in the U.S. despite a recent surge of federal and state laws aimed at combating modern day slavery, a report released Wednesday found.

Researchers from the Urban Institute's Justice Policy Center and Northeastern University's Institute on Race and Justice found that police, prosecutors, judges, juries, and government officials lack awareness of human trafficking law and do not consider such cases a priority.

As a result, many cases are overlooked by state and federal legal systems.

"Our study showed that our legal systems are further concealing the nature and prevalence of these crimes," said the Urban Institute's Colleen Owens, adding that law enforcement and prosecutors "unintentionally reinforce the idea that human trafficking is not a problem in the United States."

The researchers analyzed data from 140 closed human trafficking cases in 12 counties nationwide, reviewed 530 incident reports of related crimes and interviewed 166 law enforcement officials, prosecutors and service providers.

They found that only 7 percent of cases resulted in a state or federal sex trafficking charge, 9 percent in a sex trafficking of a minor charge, and 2 percent in a labor trafficking charge.

The study also found that high rates of trafficking victims are being arrested, including minors, and illegal migrant victims are being deported, despite federal legal protections.

The study also found that local law enforcement have trouble identifying and investigating cases for a number of reasons, including insufficient resources and lack of specialized units to look into labor trafficking cases. They often lack language skills and cultural knowledge to communicate with immigrant communities.

They also lack victim support services, such as safe housing, and in some instances police harbored negative views of victims, the study found.

State prosecutors have difficulty pursuing trafficking cases because they lack legal precedent and because there are no incentives to pursue trafficking cases.

In some cases, they are unaware of their states' anti-trafficking laws, and often believe victims lack credibility because they are undocumented migrants or runaways.

Prosecutors also have a hard time getting victims to cooperate due to fear, intimidation, or trauma and lack training in using their states' laws to litigate and investigate cases.

Owens said the findings are not nationally representative, "so we can't project those findings on the entire country."

The report comes a day after the U.S. State Department released its annual Trafficking in Persons report, which gives nations worldwide a ranking -- tier 1 is the best and tier 3 is the worst -- for their efforts in combating trafficking.

While it received a tier 1 rating -- the highest possible -- activist groups said the U.S. often fails to protect victims of human trafficking, defined as coercion into sex work or labor.

And while the State Department report focuses on the federal government's anti-trafficking efforts, a number of U.S. states fail to provide victims -- both children and adults -- with the full legal protection that activists say they need.

According to the anti-trafficking group Polaris Project, 42 states lack "safe harbor" laws, which recognize that minors trafficked into commercial sex are victims and prevent them from being prosecuted for prostitution.

Activist groups are also pushing more states to implement "vacating conviction" laws -- the majority of states have not yet done so -- which ensure that sex trafficking victims are not treated as criminals and that prostitution convictions be expunged from their records.

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Xinhua News Agency

105 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Xinhua General News Service

June 20, 2012 Wednesday 2:10 AM EST

News Analysis: Despite good marks, human trafficking remains a problem in U.S.

SECTION: WORLD NEWS; Political

LENGTH: 839 words

DATELINE: by Matthew Rusling WASHINGTON June 19

Despite giving itself good marks for efforts to combat human trafficking in a State Department report released Tuesday, the United States still has a problem with modern day slavery.

While it received a tier 1 rating - the highest possible - the U.S. often fails to protect victims of human trafficking, defined as coercion into sex work or labor.

The annual Trafficking in Persons report, which rates anti-trafficking efforts of countries worldwide with a tier 1 to tier 3 ranking, said the U.S. complies with the minimum standards for eliminating human trafficking, but that improvements are needed.

"Trafficking in persons can occur in many licit and illicit industries or markets, including in brothels, massage parlors, street prostitution, hotel services, hospitality, agriculture, manufacturing, janitorial services, construction, health and elder care, and domestic service, among others," the report said.

While the U.S. does more than many other countries to combat human trafficking, Bangkok-based EPCAT International published a report in March saying the U.S. is only making "some progress" in protecting children from sex trafficking.

And while the State Department report focuses on the federal government's anti-trafficking efforts, a number of U.S. states fail to provide victims -- both children and adults -- with the full legal protection that activists say they need.

According to the anti-trafficking group Polaris Project, 42 states lack "safe harbor" laws, which recognize that minors trafficked into commercial sex are victims and prevent them from being prosecuted for prostitution.

Activist groups are also pushing more states to implement "vacating conviction" laws - the majority of states have not yet done so -- which ensure that sex trafficking victims are not treated as criminals and that prostitution convictions be expunged from their records.

"Trafficked persons are rarely recognized as victims by the police and prosecutors, and are thus pressured into pleading guilty and/or do not understand the consequences of the charges," according to the website of the Sex Workers Project at the Urban Justice Center.

Multiple arrests, incarceration, police violence, deportation and social stigma are just a few of the barriers faced by those who have been forced into prostitution, the site said.

Crystal DeBoise, co-director of the Sex Workers Project, said criminalizing sex work, which is punishable by incarceration in the U.S., spurs it to go underground, and argued that the more secret the location, the less access health workers and others will be able to help potential trafficking victims.

Others say that stopping demand for commercial sex is the key to halting trafficking.

The report also noted allegations last year, brought to light in a New Yorker article that made international waves, that tens of thousands of workers from Fiji and elsewhere recruited by U.S. government subcontractors were tricked into working in war zones in Iraq and Afghanistan. They were forced to live in squalid conditions resembling indentured servitude while working on U.S. bases, according to U.S. media reports.

And in another horrific case that came to light last year, authorities charged two Ukrainian brothers with smuggling young Ukrainian men and women to the U.S. and forcing the illegal immigrants to work long hours for little or no pay. The brothers used threats and force, including rape, to keep them from fleeing.

The report added that non-governmental organizations noted "increasing reports" of children recruited into criminal activity at the U.S.-Mexico border, as well as traveling sales crews peddling rings that used forced labor.

In another shortcoming, state and federal funding for victim services decreased since last year, the report said.

The report made a number of recommendations for the U.S. including improving data collection and analysis on human trafficking, offering comprehensive victim services to all victims and increasing outreach to local, federal and state law enforcement.

Some experts contend that the U.S. is the only developed country in which its own citizens comprise a disproportionately large chunk of victims, although precise figures on the number of victims are difficult to nail down.

Also notable in this year's report is that Thailand, which was placed on the tier 2 watch list for the last two years, escaped a downgrade to tier three, as U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton granted the Southeast Asian nation a waiver on grounds that it has penned a new anti-trafficking plan and is "devoting sufficient resources to implement that plan."

Meanwhile, neighboring Myanmar, which previously held a tier 3 ranking, the lowest possible, was upgraded to tier 2 watch list. While the government has failed to meet the minimum standards, it is making "significant efforts" to comply, the report said.

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

106 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

Xinhua General News Service

June 20, 2012 Wednesday 1:17 AM EST

U.S. human trafficking cases slipping through cracks: report

SECTION: WORLD NEWS; Political

LENGTH: 633 words

DATELINE: by Matthew Rusling WASHINGTON June 20

Cases of human trafficking are rarely prosecuted in the U.S. despite a recent surge of federal and state laws aimed at combating modern day slavery, a report released Wednesday found.

Researchers from the Urban Institute's Justice Policy Center and Northeastern University's Institute on Race and Justice found that police, prosecutors, judges, juries, and government officials lack awareness of human trafficking law and do not consider such cases a priority.

As a result, many cases are overlooked by state and federal legal systems.

"Our study showed that our legal systems are further concealing the nature and prevalence of these crimes," said the Urban Institute's Colleen Owens, adding that law enforcement and prosecutors "unintentionally reinforce the idea that human trafficking is not a problem in the United States."

The researchers analyzed data from 140 closed human trafficking cases in 12 counties nationwide, reviewed 530 incident reports of related crimes and interviewed 166 law enforcement officials, prosecutors and service providers.

They found that only 7 percent of cases resulted in a state or federal sex trafficking charge, 9 percent in a sex trafficking of a minor charge, and 2 percent in a labor trafficking charge.

The study also found that high rates of trafficking victims are being arrested, including minors, and illegal migrant victims are being deported, despite federal legal protections.

The study also found that local law enforcement have trouble identifying and investigating cases for a number of reasons, including insufficient resources and lack of specialized units to look into labor trafficking cases. They often lack language skills and cultural knowledge to communicate with immigrant communities.

They also lack victim support services, such as safe housing, and in some instances police harbored negative views of victims, the study found.

State prosecutors have difficulty pursuing trafficking cases because they lack legal precedent and because there are no incentives to pursue trafficking cases.

In some cases, they are unaware of their states' anti-trafficking laws, and often believe victims lack credibility because they are undocumented migrants or runaways.

Prosecutors also have a hard time getting victims to cooperate due to fear, intimidation, or trauma and lack training in using their states' laws to litigate and investigate cases.

Owens said the findings are not nationally representative, "so we can't project those findings on the entire country."

The report comes a day after the U.S. State Department released its annual Trafficking in Persons report, which gives nations worldwide a ranking -- tier 1 is the best and tier 3 is the worst -- for their efforts in combating trafficking.

While it received a tier 1 rating -- the highest possible -- activist groups said the U.S. often fails to protect victims of human trafficking, defined as coercion into sex work or labor.

And while the State Department report focuses on the federal government's anti-trafficking efforts, a number of U.S. states fail to provide victims -- both children and adults -- with the full legal protection that activists say they need.

According to the anti-trafficking group Polaris Project, 42 states lack "safe harbor" laws, which recognize that minors trafficked into commercial sex are victims and prevent them from being prosecuted for prostitution.

Activist groups are also pushing more states to implement "vacating conviction" laws -- the majority of states have not yet done so -- which ensure that sex trafficking victims are not treated as criminals and that prostitution convictions be expunged from their records.

LOAD-DATE: June 22, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Xinhua News Agency

107 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

Xinhua General News Service

June 20, 2012 Wednesday 1:17 AM EST

News Analysis: Despite good marks, human trafficking remains a problem in U.S.

SECTION: WORLD NEWS; Political

LENGTH: 839 words

DATELINE: by Matthew Rusling WASHINGTON June 19

Despite giving itself good marks for efforts to combat human trafficking in a State Department report released Tuesday, the United States still has a problem with modern day slavery.

While it received a tier 1 rating - the highest possible - the U.S. often fails to protect victims of human trafficking, defined as coercion into sex work or labor.

The annual Trafficking in Persons report, which rates anti-trafficking efforts of countries worldwide with a tier 1 to tier 3 ranking, said the U.S. complies with the minimum standards for eliminating human trafficking, but that improvements are needed.

"Trafficking in persons can occur in many licit and illicit industries or markets, including in brothels, massage parlors, street prostitution, hotel services, hospitality, agriculture, manufacturing, janitorial services, construction, health and elder care, and domestic service, among others," the report said.

While the U.S. does more than many other countries to combat human trafficking, Bangkok-based EPCAT International published a report in March saying the U.S. is only making "some progress" in protecting children from sex trafficking.

And while the State Department report focuses on the federal government's anti-trafficking efforts, a number of U.S. states fail to provide victims -- both children and adults -- with the full legal protection that activists say they need.

According to the anti-trafficking group Polaris Project, 42 states lack "safe harbor" laws, which recognize that minors trafficked into commercial sex are victims and prevent them from being prosecuted for prostitution.

Activist groups are also pushing more states to implement "vacating conviction" laws - the majority of states have not yet done so -- which ensure that sex trafficking victims are not treated as criminals and that prostitution convictions be expunged from their records.

"Trafficked persons are rarely recognized as victims by the police and prosecutors, and are thus pressured into pleading guilty and/or do not understand the consequences of the charges," according to the website of the Sex Workers Project at the Urban Justice Center.

Multiple arrests, incarceration, police violence, deportation and social stigma are just a few of the barriers faced by those who have been forced into prostitution, the site said.

Crystal DeBoise, co-director of the Sex Workers Project, said criminalizing sex work, which is punishable by incarceration in the U.S., spurs it to go underground, and argued that the more secret the location, the less access health workers and others will be able to help potential trafficking victims.

Others say that stopping demand for commercial sex is the key to halting trafficking.

The report also noted allegations last year, brought to light in a New Yorker article that made international waves, that tens of thousands of workers from Fiji and elsewhere recruited by U.S. government subcontractors were tricked into working in war zones in Iraq and Afghanistan. They were forced to live in squalid conditions resembling indentured servitude while working on U.S. bases, according to U.S. media reports.

And in another horrific case that came to light last year, authorities charged two Ukrainian brothers with smuggling young Ukrainian men and women to the U.S. and forcing the illegal immigrants to work long hours for little or no pay. The brothers used threats and force, including rape, to keep them from fleeing.

The report added that non-governmental organizations noted "increasing reports" of children recruited into criminal activity at the U.S.-Mexico border, as well as traveling sales crews peddling rings that used forced labor.

In another shortcoming, state and federal funding for victim services decreased since last year, the report said.

The report made a number of recommendations for the U.S. including improving data collection and analysis on human trafficking, offering comprehensive victim services to all victims and increasing outreach to local, federal and state law enforcement.

Some experts contend that the U.S. is the only developed country in which its own citizens comprise a disproportionately large chunk of victims, although precise figures on the number of victims are difficult to nail down.

Also notable in this year's report is that Thailand, which was placed on the tier 2 watch list for the last two years, escaped a downgrade to tier three, as U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton granted the Southeast Asian nation a waiver on grounds that it has penned a new anti-trafficking plan and is "devoting sufficient resources to implement that plan."

Meanwhile, neighboring Myanmar, which previously held a tier 3 ranking, the lowest possible, was upgraded to tier 2 watch list. While the government has failed to meet the minimum standards, it is making "significant efforts" to comply, the report said.

LOAD-DATE: June 22, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

108 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

Africa News

June 19, 2012 Tuesday

United States, Canada and Africa; Amb. Cdebaca On 2012 Trafficking in Persons Report

BYLINE: United States Department of State (Washington, DC)

LENGTH: 4048 words

MR. VENTRELL: Hi. And good afternoon everyone, and thank you for joining us. I'm pleased to introduce Ambassador Luis CdeBaca who is our Ambassador-At-Large and Director of our Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. Today's conference call is on the record. He's going to discuss the release of this year's Trafficking in Persons Report, which the Secretary will introduce at 4:00 p.m. Having said that, this call and all of its contents are embargoed until the Secretary finishes speaking at approximately 4:30 p.m. But this will give a chance for Ambassador CdeBaca to give you a preview and answer some of your questions. So without further ado, over to you, Mr. Ambassador.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you, and welcome, everyone. This afternoon, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and Under Secretary of State Maria Otero and I will be unveiling the 2012 Trafficking in Persons Report. This is a statutorily mandated report that comes out of the Victims of Trafficking Protections Act of the year 2000, which was the Clinton Administration's signature antislavery achievement continued and intensified by the Bush Administration and now taken to the next level by the Obama Administration.

We see the trafficking in persons issue and the bipartisan consensus against human trafficking to be something that is in keeping with the core United States values, both as far as how we conceive of ourselves as a nation and how we do our foreign policy and in - very much in keeping with the - this year's 150th anniversary of the Emancipation Proclamation. On September 22nd of this year, we will observe the 150th anniversary of President Lincoln declaring to the world that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall exist. And while that was not self-executing - there was still a war to fight and win - it resulted in the ending of legalized slavery in the United States.

But this promise of freedom, the notion of the universal right to be free, the notion of a universal - a requirement to fight against human trafficking and modern day slavery continues into the modern era, and it is that call that we answer today. This is very much - while we call it human trafficking, it's kind of the new and modern term for an old evil. This is truly what President Obama has called the intolerable yoke of modern slavery.

The annual Trafficking in Persons Report analyzes countries from around the world by looking at what the governments are doing against modern slavery. It does so through the 3P paradigm, in which we look at prevention, protection, and prosecution alike, not simply looking at this as a development issue or a public awareness issue, but also an issue of rehabilitation of victims and bringing the traffickers to justice. This is, as the report says this year, a crime first and foremost.

Now, this particular type of crime, a human rights crime or a civil rights crime as it were, is a crime that more countries and more governments are addressing. The report this year notes that the number of convictions globally reported is up from 3,619 last year to 3,969, and those are convictions of traffickers. That is not, however, a large number when one compares that to the global estimates of the victim population. A study released two weeks ago by the International Labor Organization estimates at least 21 million people held in bondage worldwide, and other estimates show it up to 27 million.

Human trafficking, just very quickly, a definitional point: This is not a crime of movement across borders for prostitution, although that is often how people see it. Both under the United States Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 and under the United Nations Palermo Protocol, the protocol to monitor and combat trafficking in persons from the year 2000, under both of those instruments, trafficking is defined as slavery. It doesn't matter if someone is in their own country; it doesn't matter if they're in sex or if they're in labor. If the person is not free to leave, if the person is unable to go get another position and is being held through some type of coercive force, that person is considered a trafficking victim, and that person is entitled to the protections that we look to governments to provide.

Now, having said that, we've seen the number of victims identified around the world has increased by almost a third. And this is, again, a very heartening piece of data, because it shows that governments are stepping up and are meeting their obligations, and we are very happy to see that 42,291 trafficking victims were identified and helped in the last year.

The issue, of course, continues to be, as I mentioned earlier, that we're looking at that within the context of almost 27 million people who are enslaved in the world. So there's a long way to go. And this report this year, looking at the problems of freedom and what we can do to deliver on it, is very much a challenge for all countries, the United States included, to address this and to intensify our efforts.

Now, one of the things that the report does each year that you may be familiar with is that it arranges countries onto four tiers. Counter-intuitively, those tiers are Tiers 1 through 3. But that is the magic of the congressional action on this. It is Tier 1 which is a country that is complying with the minimum standards to combat trafficking in persons; Tier 2, a country that is not yet compliant but is taking great strides; Tier 2 Watch List, which is basically a country that is in danger of falling down to Tier 3; and Tier 3, which is a country that is not complying with any of the minimum standards and is not working towards that.

We see this year on Tier 3, 17 countries; on Tier 2 Watch List, 42 countries; on Tier 2, 93 countries; and on Tier 1, 33 countries; 186 countries total appear in the report; 185 of them received rankings under the minimum standards. One of them did not, and that is Somalia, which does not have a functioning government such that we could include it in the report.

I would note, however, that even in Somalia, there are heroes of the anti-trafficking fight, particularly a recent prosecution that was brought in Puntland, shows that even in countries where there is not a functioning government, the legal system and others can work together to bring traffickers to justice. Heroes, much like that prosecutor in Somalia, we see that in this global and modern abolitionist fight, there are people whose commitment and whose excellence and whose innovation leaves them to be singled out as heroes of the fight.

And Secretary Clinton will honor 10 such heroes today, those people from countries around the world, from Argentina, to the United States, from Mauritania to Israel, from Greece to the Republic of the Congo. We see people who have done the cutting-edge legal work; we've seen the people who - within government who have brought their government colleagues together to uncover human trafficking cases, to take a stand against official complicity. We also see people who are on the frontlines.

One of the honorees today is a nun who works with human trafficking victims in the Sinai. Another of the heroes that we honor today is a young man who was enslaved for three years on the fishing fleet in Southeast Asia and now, through his art and other activities, is raising awareness of the fact of labor exploitation in the fishing industry. All of these people are heroes, most notably the hero from Mauritania, a woman who was the first female lawyer in that country, and in the last five years has been able to obtain legislation for the first time outlawing slavery in Mauritania.

And I think that that brings us to the conclusion of my remarks. With that, I think, chilling notion that there are countries in the world where the abolition of slavery, the official, legal outlawing of this practice is not something for the history books, it's something within the living memory of the people in those countries. And I think it is a particular challenge as we address this in the modern era.

I will pitch you one thing before I get off and take questions, and that is so much of what is happening on the fight against modern slavery is dependent upon good and solid reporting, and I want to make sure that you know that my office is ready and willing to help you with that. This is an area that actually lends itself well to long-form or investigative reporting, and I think that we've seen with both the longer work and the commitment over the course of a year now that we've seen from CNN International that it's also something that the viewers or the readers very much will respond to. And so we think there's room for everybody, and we are certainly here and will support any of your work as you report on these stories. We're hoping that this isn't just today's news, but something that we can support going forward.

And I will also challenge everybody by saying that one thing that we hear from people in countries around the world is young journalists who want to work on this who look to the American media and others as a resource that can help them learn how to address this and how to investigate this. So we may be calling upon you for more than just press conferences.

Anyway, I'll turn it over for questions at this point. I've got, I think, about 15 minutes where I can answer some questions.

OPERATOR: Thank you. At this time, we will begin the question-and-answer session. If you would like to ask a question, please press *1 on your touchtone phone. Please unmute your phone and record your name clearly at the prompt. Once again, please press *1 if you would like to ask a question.

Our first question today is from Joshua Lipes. Your line is open.

QUESTION: Hi. Ambassador CdeBaca, thank you for your introduction. I was wondering if you could comment a little bit on how - what changes in Burma brought about the increase in the rank from Tier 3 to Tier 2 Watch List this year.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: One of things that we have been very concerned about over the last few years was not simply the human trafficking that we see in Burma of say, for instance, going up to China for sex trafficking or over to Thailand for the labor trafficking as well as sex trafficking, but also the notion of state - basically state-sponsored forced labor that arises from and is - was supported by the 1907 Villages and Towns Act that was being used to justify the forced impressment of villagers and rural folks. And it has everything from porters for the military to working on construction projects and what have you.

And what we've seen over the last year is that the government in Burma has taken a number of significant and frankly unprecedented steps in advancing these reforms. There is a good inter-ministerial working group that had been limited by the Burmese Government's inability to work with other governments around the world, but they - and they've been in existence for several years - had worked within that constraint to actually try to bring on some best practices.

As a result, we've seen improved victim protection measures for victims who've come back from other countries. We've seen the inauguration of a new hotline, which has led to the rescue of 57 victims. And most importantly, this notion of repealing that antiquated law so there's no longer state-sponsored forced labor that is legal in Burma. This is something that not only the United States has worked with the Government of Burma on, but also the International Labor Organization, and I think you may be familiar with some announcements that the ILO made last week as far as that was concerned.

I'll tell you one last thing on Burma, and that is that one of the things I think that many people report on as far as Burma is the longstanding and heroic work that Aung San Suu Kyi has done for democracy building in that country, but people often tend to forget her activism on the issue of human trafficking, on her issue - the issues of forced labor.

The first place that she went outside of Burma when she was able to travel again was to the areas in Thailand where hoards of Burmese migrant workers are exploited and abused in the Thai fish processing plants, and she addressed their abuse. The next place that she went when she went to Europe was to address the ILO. This is a woman who even she was under house arrest sent some of the money from her Nobel Prize to Thailand to be able to care for, shelter, and feed Burmese trafficking victims.

So this is a woman who we - most of us know as a democracy activist, but many of us who work on human trafficking also know her as a good friend and colleague, and frankly, an expert in the field of human trafficking. And I think that her ability to take part in the governance of her own country will bode well for the fight against human trafficking in Burma.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. Luis Alonso, your line is open.

QUESTION: Yes. Hi. Good afternoon. Many thanks for taking this call, Mr. Ambassador. I would like to ask you about Latin America. I see that five countries in the region have improved their tier, and I would like to hear from you whether there is a trend in the region to better fight the traffic of persons. And also, if you could please confirm me whether it's the first time that Nicaragua is placed in Tier 1. Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Of course. I think that there is a trend in Latin America that is improving its efforts. Part of this perhaps comes out of the last few years. There's the action plan now with the Organization of American States, and I think that that has been a very positive framework in which countries can find a way forward.

But I think we've also seen political will. The upgrade recently in the country of Honduras - that was legislation that had been stuck for several years. It wasn't that anyone opposed it; it just never really was going anywhere. We worked with the Honduran Government and were able to come up with a way forward on bipartisan legislation that everyone agreed on for the protection of Hondurans and the protection of others who may in Honduras from labor trafficking and sex trafficking.

So, too, with the Dominican Republic, we saw the Government of the Dominican Republic take on a number of concerns that at first they were a little bit defensive and didn't know what to think about some of these issues and then rolled up their sleeves, got to work, and through political will started putting together the structures in place. And so as a result, we've seen convictions for not only trafficking - excuse me - but also the first labor trafficking convictions in the Dominican Republic, a conviction of two people who forced children into begging rings.

Now, you're correct that this is the first year in which Nicaragua has been on Tier 1 in the Trafficking in Persons Report, and we see this as an improvement over previous years. This year, the Government of Nicaragua convicted nine traffickers. Just look back to 2009, when only two traffickers were brought to justice. This last year, they opened a dedicated shelter for adult human trafficking victims. And I think that's specifically interesting in Central America because so much of the shelter opportunities in Central America are limited to children and are often donor-funded, whether it's American or other religious groups that are taking care of children in Central America. The fact that the Nicaraguan Government stepped up and is putting together services for adult victims was, we think, a very positive step on the part of the Government of Nicaragua.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. Lucia Leal, your line is open.

QUESTION: Hi. Yes. I wanted to ask about the decision to remove Venezuela from the Tier 3 part of the report, if you could describe what kind of progress has led to that, and also the removal of Haiti from the category of special cases, please. Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Of course. Tell me your name again. I didn't hear it very well.

QUESTION: Yes. It's Lucia Leal from Ese.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Oh, okay. Hi, Lucia.

QUESTION: Hi.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I think that what we saw with Venezuela this year was the notion of on the one hand increased public awareness, the public information campaigns, trainings of government officials on human trafficking. Those typically will have an impact. And I think that that's what we saw in Venezuela, is that by committing to doing those trainings and by actually being out and doing those trainings we saw that happening.

What were some of the things we saw? Well, one of the main things that we saw was that there were a couple of traffickers convicted, but more importantly 38 trafficking victims were identified and were helped. And of course, as you know, for us, that's one of the most important things is, is a government helping the victims that they find, whether those are Venezuelan nationals or whether those are foreigners who are in Venezuela.

The other thing that we thought was very notable this year - and again, the minimum standards that we apply, Tier 3 is a country that is not meeting the minimum standards and is not trying to do so. And this is the year we saw the national assembly adopting a reform, a - that's looking at this. This is actually a form of the organized crime law, but one of the things we've seen is that they were working with civil society organizations to try to make sure that that law could be brought into place and strengthened the legal reform and legal framework against trafficking.

So we think that that was a very positive step on the part of the national assembly, and I think that that's - that plus the 24-hour hotline and a few of those other things, we looked at. And when we did the analysis came to the conclusion that this was not a Tier 3 country this year.

As far as Haiti is concerned, Haiti has been on the special case category for several years. And one of the things that we saw over the last year is that the - now the governance situation in Haiti is stable and largely peaceful. President Martelly and his government came to power in the first peaceful transition from an elected administration to the opposition, and the reconstruction efforts and development efforts continue to progress.

So in looking at that, we always look to see what's the situation on the ground. Is there political stability? Are the courts functioning? While there are still some remaining issues as far as parliament and the government and the prime minister and things like this, we see a functioning government now in Haiti at a level that we feel justified bringing them into the report as a ranked country as opposed to on the special case category.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. And the next question is from Hee Jung Yang. Your line is open.

QUESTION: Yes. I would like to ask what was the particular different situation regarding North Korea in terms of human trafficking. And also, I would like to ask whether there has been any cases that U.S. Government prohibited North Korea from getting any loan from the IMF and World Bank because it was recorded as the Third Tier in terms of human trafficking by the State Department's report.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, one of the things that we've seen with North Korea repeatedly over the years is, again, this notion of state-supported forced labor. And we are, of course, concerned not just about forced labor within the country, but also in recent years more and more labor exporting of North Korean, often, men, whether it's into the Middle East, whether it's into especially Russia and other places. And of course, with most countries, when they send workers overseas, it's between the workers, the recruiters, the employers. When the North Koreans send workers overseas, they send the police with them and keep them under surveillance and retaliate against them if they try to fight for their rights or if they try to leave.

So we continue to see the situation of forced labor/human trafficking in North Korea as very grave. The United States is required to vote no in the international financial institutions when countries are on Tier 3 of the trafficking report. That's something, frankly, that the Treasury Department and some others work on, and I don't have an immediate answer for you on that notion of were there votes this year in which the United States voted no on this basis. But it's something that we can look at and we can circle back.

QUESTION: Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. The next question is from Indira Lakshmanan. Your line is open.

QUESTION: Thank you, Ambassador. I wanted to ask - and I apologize if you addressed this at the very top of the briefing because I missed it - but have you gained or lost ground over the last year in the fight on human trafficking? And could -

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: That's a wonderful question, and -

QUESTION: Could you give numbers -

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I did address it a little bit, but I think it's something I want to address again, because -

QUESTION: Okay. Can I just ask specifically - can you tell us how many countries were upgraded, how many were downgraded, and how many people are in slavery right now while you answer that question?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I can totally do that. I will do that again, and like I said, I'm glad to do it, because I think that these are concepts that we really need to make sure people are hearing.

So the number of identified victims around the world - excuse me - these are victims identified by governments in the last year - has increased by 28 percent. In 2011, it was 33,113. In 2012, the number of identified victims by governments was 42,291. That is a 28 percent increase. Convictions are also up by 10 percent from 3,619 to 3,969. Now, conviction numbers typically lag one or two years behind victim identification and investigation numbers because of how long it takes for cases to go through the pipeline.

This last year we saw 7,909 prosecutions initiated as opposed to the year before, which was 6,017 prosecutions initiated. So we do think that we're seeing some real positive movement as far as those numbers are concerned, but those numbers have to be placed in the context of the overarching number of people who are in modern slavery in the world, and that is, per the ILO, at least 21 million people worldwide. There are other researchers that put that number as high as 27 million.

So I think that's the numbers case. I think the upgrade and downgrade question you had asked, this year there are 186 countries on the report; 185 of them were ranked; Somalia was not. This year, Tier 1 of the report, which says that countries are meeting the minimum standards - and I'd caution that that's not saying that countries are doing a great job on this; it's simply that they're meeting the minimum.

QUESTION: I actually got those numbers, because you had read them out, the four tiers, but did you have a number of how many were upgraded and how many were downgraded among the categories?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I don't really count that way.

QUESTION: Okay.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: So it's not something that -as far as kind of what the raw up and down number is, I know - I can tell you how big each of the tiers are compared to how they have been. Tier 2 has gotten a little bit bigger with 93 as opposed to 85 last year. Tiers 1 and Tiers 2 Watch List are basically the same - 33, Tier 1, last year it was 32; Tier 2 Watch List is 42, last year was 41. And Tier 3 is smaller this year by five countries. Last year it was 23, this year is 17.

So there is a little bit of movement up into Tier 2, which means that countries are passing laws. It means that countries are starting to address the situation. They still have a little ways to go, but that's, I think, some - the beginnings, I think, of a real trend. And we also see a number of countries that have prosecuted cases for the first time this year. And so I think that that is also - excuse me - that's something that when you see countries taking that first step, like we saw in Brunei, for instance, like we've seen in Somalia, that is, I think, a very positive step.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. That is the final question for today's call.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you all.

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

109 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 19, 2012 Tuesday 10:22 PM GMT

Syria added to US trafficking blacklist

LENGTH: 269 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 19 2012

The United States on Tuesday added Syria to a blacklist of countries failing to abide by conventions barring human trafficking and slavery, a move which leads to sanctions and cuts in US aid.

"The government of Syria does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to do so," the 2012 Trafficking in Persons report said.

It voiced particular concerns about Filipina maids being sent to Syria via Dubai who were vulnerable to "conditions of forced labor" and to allegations reported by the United Nations that the Syrian opposition was using child soldiers.

US officials had not been able to fully assess the situation on the ground due to fierce fighting in the 15-month conflict, as the opposition seeks to oust President Bashar al-Assad, the report said.

But some 95 Filipina domestic workers were believed to have been trapped in the cities of Homs and Hama which have come under attack from the regime forces, and the government made no effort to help their embassy free them.

"Anecdotal evidence suggests that some economically desperate Syrian children are subjected to conditions of forced labor within the country, particularly by organized street begging rings," the report added.

While some Syrian women and girls were being forced into prostitution in neighboring Lebanon, it said.

Syria's designation on tier 3, the bottom of the ranking system, means the US administration could withhold non-humanitarian aid from October 1 and Syria could face US opposition to aid from bodies such as the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund.

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Agence France Presse
All Rights Reserved

110 of 492 DOCUMENTS

The Associated Press

June 19, 2012 Tuesday 08:45 PM GMT

US adds Syria to human trafficking blacklist

BYLINE: By BRADLEY KLAPPER, Associated Press

SECTION: WASHINGTON DATELINE

LENGTH: 684 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The Obama administration on Tuesday added Syria to the list of countries that could face U.S. sanctions for not doing enough to combat trafficking. Sixteen other nations were included among those not even making significant efforts to meet minimum standards, while Venezuela and Myanmar were among those removed from the group of worst offenders.

In its annual Trafficking in Persons report, the State Department said that Syrian President Bashar Assad's regime fails to investigate and punish offenses or offer protective services to victims. It says thousands of women, from countries such as Indonesia, the Philippines and Somalia, have been trafficked into forced labor and prostitution in Syria after being falsely recruited by employment agencies as domestic servants.

Traffickers in Syria particularly prey on Syria's large Iraqi refugee population, said the report, which analyzed conditions in more than 180 nations, including the United States, and ranked them in terms of their effectiveness in fighting what many term modern-day slavery. The State Department says up to 27 million men, women and children may live in such bondage around the world.

"These victims of modern slavery are women and men, girls and boys, and their stories remind us of what kind of inhumane treatment we are still capable of as human beings," Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton said. "Some are lured to another country with false promises of a good job or opportunities for their families. Others can be exploited right where they grew up, where they now live."

Seventeen countries in all were included in the worst-offending group of countries not reaching minimum international standards to fight the scourge, which claims mainly women and children as victims, and not making any significant effort to do so. That's down from 23 last year. More than 40 other nations were placed on a watch list that could lead to sanctions unless their records improve.

Venezuela still doesn't fully comply with minimum standards to eliminate trafficking, but is now making an important effort, the report said. President Hugo Chavez's government has clashed repeatedly with Washington over the last decade, but it was commended it for strengthening anti-trafficking laws, undertaking public information campaigns and training law enforcement and borders personnel in prevention.

"However, prosecution and conviction efforts appeared to remain weak, and specialized victim services were lacking," said the report, which included Venezuela on the U.S. watch list. The efforts of Nicaragua, another Latin America country with a leftist government that has been at odds with the U.S., also were recognized. It joined the list of countries in full compliance.

Myanmar, also known as Burma, was urged to continue with its "unprecedented steps" to address trafficking after long being considered among the world's worst respector of labor rights.

Luis CdeBaca, U.S. ambassador-at-large for human trafficking issues, said Burma's status was upgraded after the government repealed an antiquated law that had been used to justify forced labor and replaced it with a law expressly forbidding the practice. The government made progress identifying and helping victims, and a national trafficking hotline introduced in September has led to the rescue of 57 victims.

Nevertheless, the report said many Burmese men, women and children traveling abroad for work are subjected to forced labor or sex trafficking, as trafficking by both private individuals and government officials "continues to be a significant problem." The military conscripts child soldiers and is the leading perpetrator of forced labor within the country, particularly in conflict-prone ethnic areas.

Beyond Syria, the blacklist includes Algeria, Central African Republic, Congo, Cuba, Equatorial Guinea, Eritrea, Iran, North Korea, Kuwait, Libya, Madagascar, Papua New Guinea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Yemen and Zimbabwe.

U.S. NATO ally Portugal was dropped from the top tier into the list of countries not quite reaching minimum standards, while Israel was promoted to the top group.

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Associated Press
All Rights Reserved

111 of 492 DOCUMENTS

CNN Wire

June 19, 2012 Tuesday 9:04 PM EST

Trafficking report spotlights slavery efforts

BYLINE: By Simon Rushton, CNN

LENGTH: 672 words

DATELINE: (CNN)

(CNN) -- The annual Trafficking in Persons Report -- the world's most comprehensive resource of governmental anti-human trafficking efforts -- was published Tuesday by the U.S. State Department.

It identifies countries that the U.S. says meet minimum standards of anti-trafficking efforts, countries working towards them and countries that appear to be doing little to stop trafficking.

The report is compiled with the help of U.S. embassies, non-governmental organizations, aid groups and individuals around the world.

Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said: "Ultimately, this report reminds us of the human cost of this crime. Traffickers prey on the hopes and dreams of those seeking a better life and our goal should be to put those hopes and dreams back within reach, whether it's getting a good job to send money home, to support a family, trying to get an education for one's self or for one's children or simply pursuing new opportunities that might lead to a better life.

"We need to ensure that all survivors have that opportunity to move past what they endured and to make the most of their potential."

Each country is put into one of four grades - Tier 1, Tier 2, Tier Two Watch and Tier Three. Tier 1 is achieved by reaching minimum anti-trafficking standards and it does not highlight countries doing above and beyond the minimum.

For the first time in 11 years Myanmar has been promoted from Tier 3 to Tier 2 Watch. The report says Myanmar is primarily a source country for trafficking to other Asia countries, but there are still significant domestic trafficking problems and children can be conscripted into the national army.

It recommends Myanmar demobilizes child soldiers and focuses more attention on domestic sex trafficking of women and children.

The Czech Republic -the only country last year to slip out of the top-ranked countries - regained its Tier 1 status having introduced a series of anti-trafficking laws and securing successful trafficking convictions.

Iceland, Israel and Nicaragua were also promoted to Tier 1.

Portugal, however, was downgraded to Tier 2 because while new laws and initiatives were introduced, there was no evidence it was leading to prison sentences for the majority of convicted traffickers.

Nigeria and Bosnia-Herzegovina also fell out of the top-ranked countries.

Kenya was downgraded to Tier 2 Watch because it did not show evidence of increasing efforts to combat human trafficking.

Syria -- with its ongoing violent conflict -- was the only country relegated into Tier 3. The report said the lack of security made it difficult to check anti-trafficking measures.

Before the unrest Syria was primarily a destination country for trafficked women and children. The report found the unrest had put more people at risk from traffickers, particularly vulnerable segments of the population like Iraqi refugees.

The Tip Report's ranking system is largely dependent on the amount of work being done by the national government rather than non-government or international organizations.

It includes counting known cases of human trafficking in more than 175 countries, whether for commercial sex, bonded labor, child labor, involuntary domestic servitude or child soldiers. And it tracks new legislation, prosecutions and convictions.

Tier 1 ranking indicates a government has acknowledged the existence of human trafficking, has made efforts to address the problem, and meets minimum standards.

Tier 2 is countries whose governments do not fully comply with minimum standards but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance.

Tier 2 watch is countries where governments do not fully meet minimum standards, and although they may be making significant efforts the country has a particularly large number of victims, or is not providing evidence of its efforts.

Tier 3 is countries that do not fully comply with minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so.

Tier 3 countries face the possibility of US sanctions because of their poor human trafficking record.

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

NOTES: DO NOT DRESS OR INDEX FOR DOTCOM. STORY IS ALSO PUBLISHING ON FREEDOM PROJECT BLOG SR: 5p ET Updated with Clinto quotes at graf 4-5

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

112 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

Copyright 2012 CQ Transcriptions, LLC
All Rights Reserved
CQ Transcriptions

All materials herein are protected by United States copyright law and may not be reproduced, distributed, transmitted, displayed, published or broadcast without the prior written permission of CQ Transcriptions. You may not alter or remove any trademark, copyright or other notice from copies of the content.

LUIS CDEBACA, AMBASSADOR-AT-LARGE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS, HOLDS A STATE DEPARTMENT NEWS BRIEFING
VIA TELECONFERENCE ON THE 2012 TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT

June 19, 2012 Tuesday

EVENT DATE: June 19, 2012

TYPE: NEWS BRIEFING

LOCATION: WASHINGTON, D.C.

SPEAKER: LUIS CDEBACA, AMBASSADOR-AT-LARGE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS,

WITNESSES:

AMBASSADOR-AT-LARGE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS PATRICK VENTRELL, STATE DEPARTMENT SPOKESMAN

TEXT:

VENTRELL: Hi. And good afternoon everyone, and thank you for joining us. I'm pleased to introduce Ambassador Luis CdeBaca who is our Ambassador-At-Large and Director of our Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. Today's conference call is on the record. He's going to discuss the release of this year's Trafficking in Persons Report, which the Secretary will introduce at 4:00 p.m. Having said that, this call and all of its contents are embargoed until the Secretary finishes speaking at approximately 4:30 p.m. But this will give a chance for Ambassador CdeBaca to give you a preview and answer some of your questions. So without further ado, over to you, Mr. Ambassador.

CDEBACA: Thank you, and welcome, everyone. This afternoon, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and Under Secretary of State Maria Otero and I will be unveiling the 2012 Trafficking in Persons Report. This is a statutorily mandated report that comes out of the Victims of Trafficking Protections Act of the year 2000, which was the Clinton Administration's signature antislavery achievement continued and intensified by the Bush Administration and now taken to the next level by the Obama Administration.

We see the trafficking in persons issue and the bipartisan consensus against human trafficking to be something that is in keeping with the core United States values, both as far as how we conceive of ourselves as a nation and how we do our foreign policy and in -- very much in keeping with the -- this year's 150th anniversary of the Emancipation Proclamation. On September 22nd of this year, we will observe the 150th anniversary of President Lincoln declaring to the world that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall exist. And while that was not self-executing -- there was still a war to fight and win -- it resulted in the ending of legalized slavery in the United States.

But this promise of freedom, the notion of the universal right to be free, the notion of a universal -- a requirement to fight against human trafficking and modern day slavery continues into the modern era, and it is that call that we answer today. This is very much -- while we call it human trafficking, it's kind of the new and modern term for an old evil. This is truly what President Obama has called the intolerable yoke of modern slavery.

The annual Trafficking in Persons Report analyzes countries from around the world by looking at what the governments are doing against modern slavery. It does so through the 3P paradigm, in which we look at prevention, protection, and prosecution alike, not simply looking at this as a development issue or a public awareness issue, but also an issue of rehabilitation of victims and bringing the traffickers to justice. This is, as the report says this year, a crime first and foremost.

Now, this particular type of crime, a human rights crime or a civil rights crime as it were, is a crime that more countries and more governments are addressing. The report this year notes that the number of convictions globally reported is up from 3,619 last year to 3,969, and those are convictions of traffickers. That is not, however, a large number when one compares that to the global estimates of the victim population. A study released two weeks ago by the International Labor Organization estimates at least 21 million people held in bondage worldwide, and other estimates show it up to 27 million.

Human trafficking, just very quickly, a definitional point: This is not a crime of movement across borders for prostitution, although that is often how people see it. Both under the United States Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 and under the United Nations Palermo Protocol, the protocol to monitor and combat trafficking in persons from the year 2000, under both of those instruments, trafficking is defined as slavery. It doesn't matter if someone is in their own country; it doesn't matter if they're in sex or if they're in labor. If the person is not free to leave, if the person is unable to go get another position and is being held through some type of coercive force, that person is considered a trafficking victim, and that person is entitled to the protections that we look to governments to provide.

Now, having said that, we've seen the number of victims identified around the world has increased by almost a third. And this is, again, a very heartening piece of data, because it shows that governments are stepping up and are meeting their obligations, and we are very happy to see that 42,291 trafficking victims were identified and helped in the last year.

The issue, of course, continues to be, as I mentioned earlier, that we're looking at that within the context of almost 27 million people who are enslaved in the world. So there's a long way to go. And this report this year, looking at the problems of freedom and what we can do to deliver on it, is very much a challenge for all countries, the United States included, to address this and to intensify our efforts.

Now, one of the things that the report does each year that you may be familiar with is that it arranges countries onto four tiers. Counter-intuitively, those tiers are Tiers 1 through 3. But that is the magic of the congressional action on this. It is Tier 1 which is a country that is complying with the minimum standards to combat trafficking in persons; Tier 2, a country that is not yet compliant but is taking great strides; Tier 2 Watch List, which is basically a country that is in danger of falling down to Tier 3; and Tier 3, which is a country that is not complying with any of the minimum standards and is not working towards that.

We see this year on Tier 3, 17 countries; on Tier 2 Watch List, 42 countries; on Tier 2, 93 countries; and on Tier 1, 33 countries; 186 countries total appear in the report; 185 of them received rankings under the minimum standards. One of them did not, and that is Somalia, which does not have a functioning government such that we could include it in the report.

I would note, however, that even in Somalia, there are heroes of the anti-trafficking fight, particularly a recent prosecution that was brought in Puntland, shows that even in countries where there is not a functioning government, the legal system and others can work together to bring traffickers to justice. Heroes, much like that prosecutor in Somalia, we see that in this global and modern abolitionist fight, there are people whose commitment and whose excellence and whose innovation leaves them to be singled out as heroes of the fight.

And Secretary Clinton will honor 10 such heroes today, those people from countries around the world, from Argentina, to the United States, from Mauritania to Israel, from Greece to the Republic of the Congo. We see people who have done the cutting-edge legal work; we've seen the people who -- within government who have brought their government colleagues together to uncover human trafficking cases, to take a stand against official complicity. We also see people who are on the front lines.

One of the honorees today is a nun who works with human trafficking victims in the Sinai. Another of the heroes that we honor today is a young man who was enslaved for three years on the fishing fleet in Southeast Asia and now, through his art and other activities, is raising awareness of the fact of labor exploitation in the fishing industry. All of these people are heroes, most notably the hero from Mauritania, a woman who was the first female lawyer in that country, and in the last five years has been able to obtain legislation for the first time outlawing slavery in Mauritania.

And I think that that brings us to the conclusion of my remarks. With that, I think, chilling notion that there are countries in the world where the abolition of slavery, the official, legal outlawing of this practice is not something for the history books, it's something within the living memory of the people in those countries. And I think it is a particular challenge as we address this in the modern era.

I will pitch you one thing before I get off and take questions, and that is so much of what is happening on the fight against modern slavery is dependent upon good and solid reporting, and I want to make sure that you know that my office is ready and willing to help you with that. This is an area that actually lends itself well to long- form or investigative reporting, and I think that we've seen with both the longer work and the commitment over the course of a year now that we've seen from CNN International that it's also something that the viewers or the readers very much will respond to. And so we think there's room for everybody, and we are certainly here and will support any of your work as you report on these stories. We're hoping that this isn't just today's news, but something that we can support going forward.

And I will also challenge everybody by saying that one thing that we hear from people in countries around the world is young journalists who want to work on this who look to the American media and others as a resource that can help them learn how to address this and how to investigate this. So we may be calling upon you for more than just press conferences.

Anyway, I'll turn it over for questions at this point. I've got, I think, about 15 minutes where I can answer some questions.

OPERATOR: Thank you. At this time, we will begin the question- and-answer session. If you would like to ask a question, please press *1 on your touchtone phone. Please unmute your phone and record your name clearly at the prompt. Once again, please press *1 if you would like to ask a question.

Our first question today is from Joshua Lipes. Your line is open.

QUESTION: Hi. Ambassador CdeBaca, thank you for your introduction. I was wondering if you could comment a little bit on how -- what changes in Burma brought about the increase in the rank from Tier 3 to Tier 2 Watch List this year.

CDEBACA: One of things that we have been very concerned about over the last few years was not simply the human trafficking that we see in Burma of say, for instance, going up to China for sex trafficking or over to Thailand for the labor trafficking as well as sex trafficking, but also the notion of state -- basically state- sponsored forced labor that arises from and is -- was supported by the 1907 Villages and Towns Act that was being used to justify the forced impressment of villagers and rural folks. And it has everything from porters for the military to working on construction projects and what have you.

And what we've seen over the last year is that the government in Burma has taken a number of significant and frankly unprecedented steps in advancing these reforms. There is a good inter-ministerial working group that had been limited by the Burmese Government's inability to work with other governments around the world, but they -- and they've been in existence for several years -- had worked within that constraint to actually try to bring on some best practices.

As a result, we've seen improved victim protection measures for victims who've come back from other countries. We've seen the inauguration of a new hotline, which has led to the rescue of 57 victims. And most importantly, this notion of repealing that antiquated law so there's no longer state-sponsored forced labor that is legal in Burma. This is something that not only the United States has worked with the Government of Burma on, but also the International Labor Organization, and I think you may be familiar with some announcements that the ILO made last week as far as that was concerned.

I'll tell you one last thing on Burma, and that is that one of the things I think that many people report on as far as Burma is the longstanding and heroic work that Aung San Suu Kyi has done for democracy building in that country, but people often tend to forget her activism on the issue of human trafficking, on her issue -- the issues of forced labor.

The first place that she went outside of Burma when she was able to travel again was to the areas in Thailand where hoards of Burmese migrant workers are exploited and abused in the Thai fish processing plants, and she addressed their abuse. The next place that she went when she went to Europe was to address the ILO. This is a woman who even she was under house arrest sent some of the money from her Nobel Prize to Thailand to be able to care for, shelter, and feed Burmese trafficking victims.

So this is a woman who we -- most of us know as a democracy activist, but many of us who work on human trafficking also know her as a good friend and colleague, and frankly, an expert in the field of human trafficking. And I think that her ability to take part in the governance of her own country will bode well for the fight against human trafficking in Burma.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. Luis Alonso, your line is open.

QUESTION: Yes. Hi. Good afternoon. Many thanks for taking this call, Mr. Ambassador. I would like to ask you about Latin America. I see that five countries in the region have improved their tier, and I would like to hear from you whether there is a trend in the region to better fight the traffic of persons. And also, if you could please confirm me whether it's the first time that Nicaragua is placed in Tier 1. Thank you.

CDEBACA: Of course. I think that there is a trend in Latin America that is improving its efforts. Part of this perhaps comes out of the last few years. There's the action plan now with the Organization of American States, and I think that that has been a very positive framework in which countries can find a way forward.

But I think we've also seen political will. The upgrade recently in the country of Honduras -- that was legislation that had been stuck for several years. It wasn't that anyone opposed it; it just never really was going anywhere. We worked with the Honduran Government and were able to come up with a way forward on bipartisan legislation that everyone agreed on for the protection of Hondurans and the protection of others who may in Honduras from labor trafficking and sex trafficking.

So, too, with the Dominican Republic, we saw the Government of the Dominican Republic take on a number of concerns that at first they were a little bit defensive and didn't know what to think about some of these issues and then rolled up their sleeves, got to work, and through political will started putting together the structures in place. And so as a result, we've seen convictions for not only trafficking -- excuse me -- but also the first labor trafficking convictions in the Dominican Republic, a conviction of two people who forced children into begging rings.

Now, you're correct that this is the first year in which Nicaragua has been on Tier 1 in the Trafficking in Persons Report, and we see this as an improvement over previous years. This year, the Government of Nicaragua convicted nine traffickers. Just look back to 2009, when only two traffickers were brought to justice. This last year, they opened a dedicated shelter for adult human trafficking victims. And I think that's specifically interesting in Central America because so much of the shelter opportunities in Central America are limited to children and are often donor-funded, whether it's American or other religious groups that are taking care of children in Central America. The fact that the Nicaraguan Government stepped up and is putting together services for adult victims was, we think, a very positive step on the part of the Government of Nicaragua.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. Lucia Leal, your line is open.

QUESTION: Hi. Yes. I wanted to ask about the decision to remove Venezuela from the Tier 3 part of the report, if you could describe what kind of progress has led to that, and also the removal of Haiti from the category of special cases, please. Thank you.

CDEBACA: Of course. Tell me your name again. I didn't hear it very well.

QUESTION: Yes. It's Lucia Leal from Ese.

CDEBACA: Oh, OK. Hi, Lucia.

QUESTION: Hi.

CDEBACA: I think that what we saw with Venezuela this year was the notion of on the one hand increased public awareness, the public information campaigns, trainings of government officials on human trafficking. Those typically will have an impact. And I think that that's what we saw in Venezuela, is that by committing to doing those trainings and by actually being out and doing those trainings we saw that happening.

What were some of the things we saw? Well, one of the main things that we saw was that there were a couple of traffickers convicted, but more importantly 38 trafficking victims were identified and were helped. And of course, as you know, for us, that's one of the most important things is, is a government helping the victims that they find, whether those are Venezuelan nationals or whether those are foreigners who are in Venezuela.

The other thing that we thought was very notable this year -- and again, the minimum standards that we apply, Tier 3 is a country that is not meeting the minimum standards and is not trying to do so. And this is the year we saw the national assembly adopting a reform, a -- that's looking at this. This is actually a form of the organized crime law, but one of the things we've seen is that they were working with civil society organizations to try to make sure that that law could be brought into place and strengthened the legal reform and legal framework against trafficking.

So we think that that was a very positive step on the part of the national assembly, and I think that that's -- that plus the 24-hour hotline and a few of those other things, we looked at. And when we did the analysis came to the conclusion that this was not a Tier 3 country this year.

As far as Haiti is concerned, Haiti has been on the special case category for several years. And one of the things that we saw over the last year is that the -- now the governance situation in Haiti is stable and largely peaceful. President Martelly and his government came to power in the first peaceful transition from an elected administration to the opposition, and the reconstruction efforts and development efforts continue to progress.

So in looking at that, we always look to see what's the situation on the ground. Is there political stability? Are the courts functioning? While there are still some remaining issues as far as parliament and the government and the prime minister and things like this, we see a functioning government now in Haiti at a level that we feel justified bringing them into the report as a ranked country as opposed to on the special case category.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. And the next question is from Hee Jung Yang. Your line is open.

QUESTION: Yes. I would like to ask what was the particular different situation regarding North Korea in terms of human trafficking. And also, I would like to ask whether there has been any cases that U.S. Government prohibited North Korea from getting any loan from the IMF and World Bank because it was recorded as the Third Tier in terms of human trafficking by the State Department's report.

CDEBACA: Well, one of the things that we've seen with North Korea repeatedly over the years is, again, this notion of state-supported forced labor. And we are, of course, concerned not just about forced labor within the country, but also in recent years more and more labor exporting of North Korean, often, men, whether it's into the Middle East, whether it's into especially Russia and other places. And of course, with most countries, when they send workers overseas, it's between the workers, the recruiters, the employers. When the North Koreans send workers overseas, they send the police with them and keep them under surveillance and retaliate against them if they try to fight for their rights or if they try to leave.

So we continue to see the situation of forced labor/human trafficking in North Korea as very grave. The United States is required to vote no in the international financial institutions when countries are on Tier 3 of the trafficking report. That's something, frankly, that the Treasury Department and some others work on, and I don't have an immediate answer for you on that notion of were there votes this year in which the United States voted no on this basis. But it's something that we can look at and we can circle back.

QUESTION: Thank you.

CDEBACA: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. The next question is from Indira Lakshmanan. Your line is open.

QUESTION: Thank you, Ambassador. I wanted to ask -- and I apologize if you addressed this at the very top of the briefing because I missed it -- but have you gained or lost ground over the last year in the fight on human trafficking? And could...

CDEBACA: That's a wonderful question, and...

QUESTION: Could you give numbers...

CDEBACA: I did address it a little bit, but I think it's something I want to address again, because...

QUESTION: Okay. Can I just ask specifically -- can you tell us how many countries were upgraded, how many were downgraded, and how many people are in slavery right now while you answer that question?

CDEBACA: I can totally do that. I will do that again, and like I said, I'm glad to do it, because I think that these are concepts that we really need to make sure people are hearing.

So the number of identified victims around the world -- excuse me -- these are victims identified by governments in the last year -- has increased by 28 percent. In 2011, it was 33,113. In 2012, the number of identified victims by governments was 42,291. That is a 28 percent increase. Convictions are also up by 10 percent from 3,619 to 3,969. Now, conviction numbers typically lag one or two years behind victim identification and investigation numbers because of how long it takes for cases to go through the pipeline.

This last year we saw 7,909 prosecutions initiated as opposed to the year before, which was 6,017 prosecutions initiated. So we do think that we're seeing some real positive movement as far as those numbers are concerned, but those numbers have to be placed in the context of the overarching number of people who are in modern slavery in the world, and that is, per the ILO, at least 21 million people worldwide. There are other researchers that put that number as high as 27 million.

So I think that's the numbers case. I think the upgrade and downgrade question you had asked, this year there are 186 countries on the report; 185 of them were ranked; Somalia was not. This year, Tier 1 of the report, which says that countries are meeting the minimum standards -- and I'd caution that that's not saying that countries are doing a great job on this; it's simply that they're meeting the minimum.

QUESTION: I actually got those numbers, because you had read them out, the four tiers, but did you have a number of how many were upgraded and how many were downgraded among the categories?

CDEBACA: I don't really count that way.

QUESTION: Okay.

CDEBACA: So it's not something that -- as far as kind of what the raw up and down number is, I know -- I can tell you how big each of the tiers are compared to how they have been. Tier 2 has gotten a little bit bigger with 93 as opposed to 85 last year. Tiers 1 and Tiers 2 Watch List are basically the same -- 33, Tier 1, last year it was 32; Tier 2 Watch List is 42, last year was 41. And Tier 3 is smaller this year by five countries. Last year it was 23, this year is 17.

So there is a little bit of movement up into Tier 2, which means that countries are passing laws. It means that countries are starting to address the situation. They still have a little ways to go, but that's, I think, some -- the beginnings, I think, of a real trend. And we also see a number of countries that have prosecuted cases for the first time this year. And so I think that that is also -- excuse me -- that's something that when you see countries taking that first step, like we saw in Brunei, for instance, like we've seen in Somalia, that is, I think, a very positive step.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. That is the final question for today's call.

CDEBACA: Thank you all.

END

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012

113 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

Federal News Service

June 19, 2012 Tuesday

State Department Conference Call Subject: Trafficking in Persons Report Briefer: Ambassador Luis CdeBaca, Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, State Department Moderator: Patrick Ventrell, Spokesperson, State Department Time: 3:04 p.m. EDT Date: Tuesday, June 19, 2012

SECTION: STATE DEPARTMENT BRIEFING

LENGTH: 4133 words

State Department Conference Call Subject: Trafficking in Persons Report Briefer: Ambassador Luis CdeBaca, Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, State Department Moderator: Patrick Ventrell, Spokesperson, State Department Time: 3:04 p.m. EDT Date: Tuesday, June 19, 2012

PATRICK VENTRELL: Hi and good afternoon, everyone, and thank you for joining us. I'm pleased to introduce Ambassador Luis CdeBaca, who is our ambassador-at-large and director of our Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

Today's conference call is on the record. He's going to discuss the release of this year's Trafficking in Persons Report, which the secretary will introduce at 4:00 p.m.

Having said that, this call and all of its contents are embargoed until the secretary finishes speaking at approximately 4:30 p.m. But this will give a chance for Ambassador CdeBaca to give you a preview and answer some of your questions.

So without further ado, over to Mr. Ambassador.

AMBASSADOR LUIS CDEBACA: Thank you. And welcome, everyone.

This afternoon Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and Undersecretary of State Maria Otero and I will be unveiling the 2012 Trafficking in Persons Report. This is a statutorily mandated report that comes out of the Victims of Trafficking Protection Act of the year 2000, which was the Clinton administration's signature anti-slavery achievement, continued and intensified by the Bush administration, and now taken to the next level by the Obama administration.

We see the trafficking-in-persons issue and the bipartisan consensus against human trafficking to be something that is in keeping with the core United States values, both as far as how we conceive of ourselves as a nation and how we do our foreign policy, and in -- very much in keeping with the -- this year's 150th anniversary of the Emancipation Proclamation. On September 22nd of this year, we will observe the 150th anniversary of President Lincoln declaring to the world that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall exist. And while that was not self-executing, there was still a war to fight and win, it resulted in the ending of legalized slavery in the United States.

But this promise of freedom, the notion of the universal right to be free, the notion of a universal requirement to fight against human trafficking and modern-day slavery, continues into the modern era, and it is that call that we answer today.

This is very much -- while we call it human trafficking, it's kind of the new and modern term for an old evil. This is truly what President Obama has called the intolerable yoke of modern slavery.

The annual Trafficking in Persons Report analyzes countries from around the world by looking at what the governments are doing against modern slavery. It does so through the three-P paradigm, in which we look at the prevention, protection and prosecution alike, not simply looking at this as a development issue or a public awareness issue, but also an issue of rehabilitation of victims and bringing the traffickers to justice. This is, as the report says this year, a crime first and foremost.

Now, this particular type of crime, a human rights crime, or a civil rights crime, as it were, is a crime that more countries and more governments are addressing. The report this year notes that the number of convictions globally reported is up from 3,619 last year to 3,969, and those are convictions of traffickers. That is not, however, a large number when one compares that to the global estimates of the victim population. A study released two weeks ago by the International Labor Organization estimates at least 21 million people held in bondage worldwide, and other estimates show up to 27 million.

Human trafficking, just very quickly a definitional point: This is not a crime of movement across borders for prostitution, although that is often how people see it. Both under the United States Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 and under the United Nations Palermo Protocol, the protocol to monitor and combat trafficking in persons from the year 2000, under both of those instruments, trafficking is defined as slavery. It doesn't matter if someone is in their own country, it doesn't matter if they're in sex or if they're in labor; if the person is not free to leave, if the person is unable to go get another position and is being held through some type of coercive force, that person is considered a trafficking victim and that person is entitled to the protections that we look to governments to provide.

Now, having said that, we've seen the number of victims identified around the world has increased by almost a third. And this is, again, a very heartening piece of data because it shows that governments are stepping up and are meeting their obligations. And we are very happy to see that 42,291 trafficking victims were identified and helped in the last year.

The issue, of course, continues to be, as I mentioned earlier, that we are looking at that within the context of almost 27 million people who are enslaved in the world. So there's a long way to go, and this report this year, looking at the promise of freedom and what we can do to deliver on it, is very much a challenge for all countries, the United States included, to address this and to intensify our efforts.

Now, one of the things that the report does each year that you may be familiar with is that it arranges countries onto four tiers. Counterintuitively, those tiers are tiers one through three, but that is the magic of the congressional action on this. It is tier one which is a country that is complying with the minimum standards to combat trafficking in persons; tier two, a country that is not yet compliant, but is taking great strides; tier two watch list, which is basically a country that is in danger of falling down to tier three; and tier three, which is a country that is not complying with any of the minimum standards and is not working towards that.

We see this year on tier three 17 countries; on tier two watch list, 42 countries; on tier two, 93 countries; and on tier one, 33 countries. A hundred and eighty-six countries total appear in the report; 185 of them received rankings under the minimum standards. One of them did not, and that is Somalia, which does not have a functioning government such that we could include it in the report.

I would note, however, that even in Somalia, there are heroes of the anti-trafficking fight. Particularly, a recent prosecution that was brought in Puntland shows that even in countries where there is not a functioning government, the legal system and others can work together to bring traffickers to justice.

Heroes. Much like that prosecutor in Somalia, we see that in this global and modern abolitionist fight, there are people whose commitment and whose excellence and whose innovation leads them to be singled out as heroes of the fight. And Secretary Clinton will honor 10 such heroes today, those people from countries around the world, from Argentina to the United States, from Mauritania to Israel, from Greece to the Republic of the Congo. We see people who have done the cutting-edge legal work. We've seen the people who -- within government who have brought their government colleagues together to uncover human trafficking cases, to take a stand against official complicity.

We also see people who are on the front lines. One of the honorees today is a nun who works with human trafficking victims in the Sinai. Another of the heroes that we honor today is a young man who was enslaved for three years on the fishing fleet in Southeast Asia and now, through his art and other activities, is raising awareness of the fact of labor exploitation in the fishing industry.

All of these people are heroes, most notably the hero from Mauritania, a woman who was the first female lawyer in that country and in the last five years has been able to obtain legislation for the first time outlawing slavery in Mauritania.

And I think that that brings us to the conclusion of my remarks, with that, I think, chilling notion that there are countries in the world where the abolition of slavery, the official legal outlawing of this practice, is not something for the history books; it's something within the living memory of the people in those countries.

And I think that it is a particular challenge as we address this in the modern era.

I will pitch you one thing before I get off and take questions, and that is, so much of what is happening on the fight against modern slavery is dependent upon good and solid reporting, and I want to make sure that you know that my office is ready and willing to help you with that. This is an area that actually lends itself well to long- form or investigative reporting, and I think that we've seen, with the longer work and the commitment over the course of a year now that we've seen from CNN International, that it's also something that the viewers or the readers very much will respond to. And so we think there's room for everybody, and we are certainly here and will support any of your work as you report on these stories. We're hoping that this isn't just today's news but something that we can support going forward.

And I will also challenge everybody by saying that one thing that we hear from people in countries around the world is young journalists who want to work on this, who look to the American media and others as a resource that can help them learn how to address this and how to investigate this. So we may be calling up on you for more than just press conferences.

Anyway, I'll turn it over for questions at this point. I've got, I think, about 15 minutes where I can answer some questions.

OPERATOR: Thank you. At this time we will begin the question- and-answer session. (Gives queuing instructions.)

Our first question today is from Joshua Leipps (sp). Your line is open.

Q: Hi, Ambassador CdeBaca. Thank you for your introduction. I was wondering if you could comment a little bit on how -- what changes in Burma brought about the increase in the rank from Tier 3 to Tier 2 watch list this year.

AMB. CDEBACA: You know, one of the things that we have been very concerned about over the last few years was not simply the human trafficking that we see within Burma of, say, for instance, going up to China for sex trafficking or over to Thailand for the labor trafficking as well as sex trafficking, but also the notion of state -- basically state-sponsored forced labor that arises from and is -- was supported by the 1907 Villages and Towns Act that was being used to justify the forced impressment of villagers and rural folks in -- as everything from porters for the military to, you know, working on construction projects and what have you.

And what we've seen over the last year is that the government in Burma has taken a number of significant and frankly unprecedented steps in advancing these reforms. There's a good interministerial working group that had been limited by the Burmese government's inability to work with other governments around the world. But they -- and they've been in existence for several years -- had worked within that constraints to actually try to bring on some best practices.

As a result, we've seen improved victim protection measures for victims who've come back from other countries. We've seen the inauguration of a new hotline, which has led to the rescue of 57 victims, and most importantly, this notion of repealing that antiquated law, so there's no longer state-sponsored forced labor that is legal in Burma. This is something that not only the United States has worked with the government of Burma on but also the International Labor Organization, and I think you may be familiar with some announcements that the ILO made last week as far as that was concerned.

I'll say one last thing on Burma, and that is that one of the things I think that many people report on as far as Burma is the long- standing and heroic work that Aung San Suu Kyi has done for democracy- building in that country, but people often tend to forget her activism on the issue of human trafficking, on her issue -- the issues of forced labor. The first place that she went outside of Burma when she was able to travel again was to the areas in Thailand where hordes of Burmese migrant workers are exploited and abused in the Thai fish processing plants, and she addressed their abuse.

The next place that she went, when she went to Europe, was to address the ILO.

This is a woman who, even when she was under house arrest, sent some of the money from her Nobel Prize to Thailand to be able to care for, shelter and feed Burmese trafficking victims.

So this is a woman who we -- most of us know as a democracy activist. But many of us who work on human trafficking also know her as a good friend and colleague and, frankly, an expert in the field of human trafficking. And I think that her ability to take part in the governance of her own country will bode well for the fight against human trafficking in Burma.

Q: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you.

Luis Cilanzo (ph), your line is open.

Q: Yes, hi, good afternoon, many thanks for taking this call, Mr. Ambassador. I would like to ask you with -- about Latin America. I see that five countries in the region have improved their tier, and I would like to hear from you whether there is a trend in the region to better fight the traffic of persons. And also, if you could please confirm the -- whether it's the first time that Nicaragua is placed in tier 1. Thank you.

AMB. CDEBACA: Of course. You know, I think that there is a trend in Latin America that it's improving its efforts. Part of this, perhaps, comes out of the last few years. There's the action plan now with the Organization of American States, and I think that that has been a very positive framework in which countries can find a way forward. But I think we've also seen political will.

The upgrade recently in the country of Honduras -- that was legislation that had been stuck for several years. It wasn't that anyone opposed it; it just never really was going anywhere. We worked with the Honduran government and were able to come up with a way forward on bipartisan legislation that everyone agreed on for the protection of Hondurans and the protection of others who may be in Honduras from labor trafficking and sex trafficking.

So, too, with the Dominican Republic. We saw the government of the Dominican Republic take on a number of concerns that in -- at first, they were a little bit defensive and didn't know what to think about some of these issues, and then rolled up their sleeves, got to work and, through political will, started putting together the structures in place. And so, as a result, we've seen convictions for not only -- (inaudible, audio interference) -- trafficking -- (coughs) -- excuse me -- but also the first labor trafficking convictions in the Dominican Republic: the conviction of two people who forced children into begging rings.

Now, you're correct that this is the first year in which Nicaragua has been on tier 1 in the "Trafficking in Persons Report," and we see this as a improvement over previous years. This year the government of Nicaragua convicted nine traffickers. You know, just look back to 2009 when only two traffickers were brought to justice. This last year they opened a dedicated shelter for adult human trafficking victims, and I think that's specifically interesting in Central America because so much of the shelter opportunities in Central America are limited to children and are often donor-funded, whether it's American or other religious groups that are taking care of children in Central America. The fact that the Nicaraguan government stepped up and is putting together services for adult victims was, we think, a very positive step on the part of the government of Nicaragua.

Q: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you.

Luciene Eliel (ph), your line is open.

Q: Hi, yes, I wanted to ask about the decision to remove Venezuela from the tier 3 part of the report, if you could describe what kind of progress has led to that. And also, about the removal of Haiti from the category of special cases, please. Thank you.

AMB. CDEBACA: Of course. Tell me your name again; I didn't hear it very well.

Q: Yes, it's Luciene Eliel (ph) from SA.

AMB. CDEBACA: Oh, OK, hi, Luciene (ph). You know, I think that what we saw with Venezuela this year was the notion of, on the one hand, increased public awareness: you know, the public information campaigns, trainings of government officials on human trafficking. You know, those typically, you know, will have an impact.

And I think that that's what we saw in Venezuela, is that by committing to doing those trainings and by actually being out and doing those trainings, we saw that happening.

What were some of the things we saw? Well, one of the main things that we saw was that there were a couple of traffickers convicted, but more importantly, 38 trafficking victims were identified and were helped. And of course, as you know, for us that's one of the most important things, is, is a government helping the victims that they find, whether those are Venezuelan nationals or whether those are foreigners who are in Venezuela.

The other thing that we thought was very notable this year -- and again, the minimum standards that we apply, Tier 3 is a country that is not meeting the minimum standards and is not trying to do so, and this year we saw the National Assembly adopting a reform, you know, that's looking at this. This is actually a reform of the organized crime law, but one of the things that we've seen is that they were working with civil society organizations to try to make sure that that law could be brought into place and strengthen the legal reform and legal framework against trafficking.

So we think that that was a very positive step on the part of the National Assembly, and I think that that's -- you know, that plus the 24-hour hotline and a few of those other things we looked at and, when we did the analysis, came to the conclusion that this was not a Tier 3 country this year.

As far as Haiti is concerned, Haiti has been on the special-case category for several years. And one of the things that we saw over the last year is that the -- now the governance situation in Haiti is stable and largely peaceful. President Martelly and his government came to power in the first peaceful transition from (an elected ?) administration to the opposition, and the reconstruction efforts and development efforts continue to progress.

So, you know, in looking at that, we always look to see, you know, what's the situation on the ground; is there political stability, are the courts functioning? While there are still some, you know, remaining issues as far as parliament and the government and the prime minister and things like this, you know, we see a functioning government now in Haiti at a level that we feel justified bringing them into the report as a ranked country as opposed to on the special-case category.

OPERATOR: Thank you. And the next question is from Hijung Ying (ph). Your line is open.

Q: Yes. I would like to ask what was the particularly different situation regarding North Korea in terms of human trafficking. And also I would like to ask whether there has been any cases that U.S. government prohibited North Korea from getting any loan from the IMF and World Bank because it was recorded as the third tier in terms of human trafficking by the State Department's report.

AMB. CDEBACA: Well, you know, one of the things that we've seen with North Korea repeatedly over the years is again this notion of state-supported forced labor. And we are, of course, concerned not just about forced labor within the country, but also in recent years more and more labor exporting of North Korean -- often men, whether it's into the Middle East, whether it's into especially Russia and other places.

And of course, you know, with most countries when they send workers overseas, it's between the workers, the recruiters, the employers. When the North Koreans send workers overseas, they send the police with them and keep them under surveillance and retaliate against them if they try to fight for their rights or if they try to leave. So we continue to see the situation of forced labor human trafficking in North Korea as very grave.

The United States is required to vote no in the international financial institutions when countries are on Tier 3 of the trafficking report.

That's something, frankly, that the Treasury Department and some others work on, and I don't have an immediate answer for you on that notion of, you know, were there votes this year in which the United States voted no on this basis, but it's something that we can look at and we can circle back.

Q: Thank you.

AMB. CDEBACA: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. the next question is from Indira Lachsman (ph). Your line is open.

Q: Thank you, Ambassador. I wanted to ask -- and I apologize if you addressed at the very top of the briefing, because I missed it, but have you gained or lost ground over the last year in the fight on human trafficking? And can you give a number --

AMB. CDEBACA: That's a wonderful question. And I did address it a little bit, but I think it's something I want to address again because --

Q: OK. Can I just ask, specifically can you tell us how many countries were upgraded, how many were downgraded, and how many people are in slavery right now, while you answer that question?

AMB. CDEBACA: I can totally do that. I will do that again. And like I said, I'm glad to do it, because I think that these are concepts that we really need to make sure people are hearing.

So the number of identified victims around the world -- (clearing his throat) -- excuse me -- these are victims identified by governments in the last year -- have increased by 28 percent. In 2011 it was 33,113; in 2012, the number of identified victims by governments was 42,291. That is a 28-percent increase.

Convictions are also up by 10 percent, from 3,619 to 3,969. Now, conviction numbers typically lag one or two years behind victim identification and investigation numbers because of how long it takes for cases to go through the pipeline. This last year we saw 7,909 prosecutions initiated, as opposed to the year before, which was 6,017 prosecutions initiated.

So we do think that we're seeing some real positive movement as far as those numbers are concerned, but those numbers have to be placed in the context of the overarching number of people who are in modern slavery in the world, and that is, per the ILO, at least 21 million people worldwide. There are other researchers that put that number as high as 27 million.

So I think that's the numbers -- (audio break).

I think the upgrade and downgrade question you had asked?

Q: Mmm hmm. (Affirmative.)

AMB. CDEBACA: This year there are 186 countries on the report; 185 of them were ranked. Somalia was not. This year Tier 1 of the report, which says that countries are meeting the minimum standards -- and I'd caution you that that's not saying the countries are doing a great job on this. It's simply that they're meeting the minimum.

Q: I actually got those numbers, because you had read them out --

AMB. CDEBACA: Right.

Q: -- when you said the four tiers, but did you have a number of how many were upgraded and how many were downgraded among the categories?

AMB. CDEBACA: You know, I don't really count that way. So, you know, it's not something that, you know -- as far as kind of what the raw up and down number is. I can tell you how big each of the tiers are compared to how they had been.

Q: OK.

AMB. CDEBACA: You know, Tier 2 has gotten a little bit bigger, with 93 as opposed to 85 last year. Tier 1 and Tier 2 watch lists are basically the same, 33 in Tier 1, last year was 32; Tier 2 watch list is 42, last year was 41; and Tier 3 is smaller this year by five countries. Last year it was 23; this year it's 17. So there's a little bit of movement up into Tier 2, which means that countries are passing laws, it means that countries are starting to address the situation. They still have a little ways to go, but that's, I think -- you know, the beginnings, I think, of a real trend.

And we also see a number of countries that have prosecuted cases for the first time this year. And so I think that that is also -- that's something that when you see countries taking that first step, like we saw in Brunei, for instance, like we've seen in Somalia, you know, that is, I think, a very positive step.

Q: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. That is the final question for today's call.

AMB. CDEBACA: Thank you all.

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2012 Federal News Service, Inc.
All Rights Reserved

114 of 492 DOCUMENTS

My Republica

June 19, 2012 Tuesday

Ministry urges proper implementation of human trafficking laws

LENGTH: 215 words

DATELINE: KATHMANDU

KATHMANDU, June 19 -- The government has urged one and all to cooperate from their respective capacities for the enforcement of rules and policies related to public awareness and social reform programs against trafficking in persons.

Organizing a press conference in the capital on Tuesday, the Ministry of Women, Children and Social Welfare has requested all the bodies concerned for the help to implement the National Action Plan -2068 against Trafficking in Women and Children.

Ministry's Secretary Balananda Poudel stressed the need of all-side support and cooperation to combat the human trafficking.

According to information shared by Secretary Poudel, Nepal is in the forefront regarding the human trafficking cases.

Implementation of available laws and acts against the human trafficking was not effective, he said, expressing commitments to provide care and protection to the victims of human trafficking.

A report Tier -2 on trafficking in persons published from the US also reflects that implementation of rules and policies against human trafficking in Nepal was not satisfactory, he added. Published by HT Syndication with permission from Republica. For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 19, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

115 of 492 DOCUMENTS

NewsLook Videos
AP

June 19, 2012 Tuesday

US Adds Syria to Human Trafficking Blacklist

LENGTH: 66 words

Click to view video. <http://www.newslook.com/lexisnexis/bbc/videos/454562-us-adds-syria-to-human-trafficking-blacklist>

The Obama administration added Syria to the list of countries that could face U.S. sanctions for not doing enough to combat trafficking. 16 other nations were included among those not even making significant efforts to meet minimum standards. (June 19) Powered by www.newslook.com

LOAD-DATE: June 19, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

MEDIA-TYPE: VIDEO

All Rights Reserved

116 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

States News Service

June 19, 2012 Tuesday

2012 TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 4059 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. Department of State:

Special Briefing

Luis CdeBaca

Ambassador-at-Large , Office To Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons

Via Teleconference

Washington, DC

June 19, 2012

MR. VENTRELL: Hi. And good afternoon everyone, and thank you for joining us. Im pleased to introduce Ambassador Luis CdeBaca who is our Ambassador-At-Large and Director of our Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. Todays conference call is on the record. Hes going to discuss the release of this years Trafficking in Persons Report, which the Secretary will introduce at 4:00 p.m. Having said that, this call and all of its contents are embargoed until the Secretary finishes speaking at approximately 4:30 p.m. But this will give a chance for Ambassador CdeBaca to give you a preview and answer some of your questions. So without further ado, over to you, Mr. Ambassador.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you, and welcome, everyone. This afternoon, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and Under Secretary of State Maria Otero and I will be unveiling the 2012 Trafficking in Persons Report. This is a statutorily mandated report that comes out of the Victims of Trafficking Protections Act of the year 2000, which was the Clinton Administrations signature antislavery achievement continued and intensified by the Bush Administration and now taken to the next level by the Obama Administration.

We see the trafficking in persons issue and the bipartisan consensus against human trafficking to be something that is in keeping with the core United States values, both as far as how we conceive of ourselves as a nation and how we do our foreign policy and in very much in keeping with the this years 150th anniversary of the Emancipation Proclamation. On September 22nd of this year, we will observe the 150th anniversary of President Lincoln declaring to the world that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall exist. And while that was not self-executing there was still a war to fight and win it resulted in the ending of legalized slavery in the United States.

But this promise of freedom, the notion of the universal right to be free, the notion of a universal a requirement to fight against human trafficking and modern day slavery continues into the modern era, and it is that call that we answer today. This is very much while we call it human trafficking, its kind of the new and modern term for an old evil. This is truly what President Obama has called the intolerable yoke of modern slavery.

The annual Trafficking in Persons Report analyzes countries from around the world by looking at what the governments are doing against modern slavery. It does so through the 3P paradigm, in which we look at prevention, protection, and prosecution alike, not simply looking at this as a development issue or a public awareness issue, but also an issue of rehabilitation of victims and bringing the traffickers to justice. This is, as the report says this year, a crime first and foremost.

Now, this particular type of crime, a human rights crime or a civil rights crime as it were, is a crime that more countries and more governments are addressing. The report this year notes that the number of convictions globally reported is up from 3,619 last year to 3,969, and those are convictions of traffickers. That is not, however, a large number when one compares that to the global estimates of the victim population. A study released two weeks ago by the International Labor Organization estimates at least 21 million people held in bondage worldwide, and other estimates show it up to 27 million.

Human trafficking, just very quickly, a definitional point: This is not a crime of movement across borders for prostitution, although that is often how people see it. Both under the United States Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 and under the United Nations Palermo Protocol, the protocol to monitor and combat trafficking in persons from the year 2000, under both of those instruments, trafficking is defined as slavery. It doesn't matter if someone is in their own country; it doesn't matter if they're in sex or if they're in labor. If the person is not free to leave, if the person is unable to go get another position and is being held through some type of coercive force, that person is considered a trafficking victim, and that person is entitled to the protections that we look to governments to provide.

Now, having said that, we've seen the number of victims identified around the world has increased by almost a third. And this is, again, a very heartening piece of data, because it shows that governments are stepping up and are meeting their obligations, and we are very happy to see that 42,291 trafficking victims were identified and helped in the last year.

The issue, of course, continues to be, as I mentioned earlier, that we're looking at that within the context of almost 27 million people who are enslaved in the world. So there's a long way to go. And this report this year, looking at the problems of freedom and what we can do to deliver on it, is very much a challenge for all countries, the United States included, to address this and to intensify our efforts.

Now, one of the things that the report does each year that you may be familiar with is that it arranges countries onto four tiers. Counter-intuitively, those tiers are Tiers 1 through 3. But that is the magic of the congressional action on this. It is Tier 1 which is a country that is complying with the minimum standards to combat trafficking in persons; Tier 2, a country that is not yet compliant but is taking great strides; Tier 2 Watch List, which is basically a country that is in danger of falling down to Tier 3; and Tier 3, which is a country that is not complying with any of the minimum standards and is not working towards that.

We see this year on Tier 3, 17 countries; on Tier 2 Watch List, 42 countries; on Tier 2, 93 countries; and on Tier 1, 33 countries; 186 countries total appear in the report; 185 of them received rankings under the minimum standards. One of them did not, and that is Somalia, which does not have a functioning government such that we could include it in the report.

I would note, however, that even in Somalia, there are heroes of the anti-trafficking fight, particularly a recent prosecution that was brought in Puntland, shows that even in countries where there is not a functioning government, the legal system and others can work together to bring traffickers to justice. Heroes, much like that prosecutor in Somalia, we see that in this global and modern abolitionist fight, there are people whose commitment and whose excellence and whose innovation leaves them to be singled out as heroes of the fight.

And Secretary Clinton will honor 10 such heroes today, those people from countries around the world, from Argentina, to the United States, from Mauritania to Israel, from Greece to the Republic of the Congo. We see people who have done the cutting-edge legal work; we've seen the people who within government who have brought their government colleagues together to uncover human trafficking cases, to take a stand against official complicity. We also see people who are on the frontlines.

One of the honorees today is a nun who works with human trafficking victims in the Sinai. Another of the heroes that we honor today is a young man who was enslaved for three years on the fishing fleet in Southeast Asia and now, through his art and other activities, is raising awareness of the fact of labor exploitation in the fishing industry. All of these people are heroes, most notably the hero from Mauritania, a woman who was the first female lawyer in that country, and in the last five years has been able to obtain legislation for the first time outlawing slavery in Mauritania.

And I think that that brings us to the conclusion of my remarks. With that, I think, chilling notion that there are countries in the world where the abolition of slavery, the official, legal outlawing of this practice is not something for the history books, it's something within the living memory of the people in those countries. And I think it is a particular challenge as we address this in the modern era.

I will pitch you one thing before I get off and take questions, and that is so much of what is happening on the fight against modern slavery is dependent upon good and solid reporting, and I want to make sure that you know that my office is ready and willing to help you with that. This is an area that actually lends itself well to long-form or investigative reporting, and I think that we've seen with both the longer work and the commitment over the course of a year now that we've seen from CNN International that it's also something that the viewers or the readers very much will respond to. And so we think there's room for everybody, and we are certainly here and will support any of your work as you report on these stories. We're hoping that this isn't just today's news, but something that we can support going forward.

And I will also challenge everybody by saying that one thing that we hear from people in countries around the world is young journalists who want to work on this who look to the American media and others as a resource that can help them learn how to address this and how to investigate this. So we may be calling upon you for more than just press conferences.

Anyway, I'll turn it over for questions at this point. I've got, I think, about 15 minutes where I can answer some questions.

OPERATOR: Thank you. At this time, we will begin the question-and-answer session. If you would like to ask a question, please press *1 on your touchtone phone. Please unmute your phone and record your name clearly at the prompt. Once again, please press *1 if you would like to ask a question.

Our first question today is from Joshua Lipes. Your line is open.

QUESTION: Hi. Ambassador CdeBaca, thank you for your introduction. I was wondering if you could comment a little bit on how what changes in Burma brought about the increase in the rank from Tier 3 to Tier 2 Watch List this year.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: One of things that we have been very concerned about over the last few years was not simply the human trafficking that we see in Burma of say, for instance, going up to China for sex trafficking or over to Thailand for the labor trafficking as well as sex trafficking, but also the notion of state basically state-sponsored forced labor that arises from and is supported by the 1907 Villages and Towns Act that was being used to justify the forced impressment of villagers and rural folks. And it has everything from porters for the military to working on construction projects and what have you.

And what we've seen over the last year is that the government in Burma has taken a number of significant and frankly unprecedented steps in advancing these reforms. There is a good inter-ministerial working group that had been limited by the Burmese Government's inability to work with other governments around the world, but they and they've been in existence for several years had worked within that constraint to actually try to bring on some best practices.

As a result, we've seen improved victim protection measures for victims who've come back from other countries. We've seen the inauguration of a new hotline, which has led to the rescue of 57 victims. And most importantly, this notion of repealing that antiquated law so there's no longer state-sponsored forced labor that is legal in Burma. This is something that not only the United States has worked with the Government of Burma on, but also the International Labor Organization, and I think you may be familiar with some announcements that the ILO made last week as far as that was concerned.

I'll tell you one last thing on Burma, and that is that one of the things I think that many people report on as far as Burma is the longstanding and heroic work that Aung San Suu Kyi has done for democracy building in that country, but people often tend to forget her activism on the issue of human trafficking, on her issue the issues of forced labor.

The first place that she went outside of Burma when she was able to travel again was to the areas in Thailand where hoards of Burmese migrant workers are exploited and abused in the Thai fish processing plants, and she addressed their abuse. The next place that she went when she went to Europe was to address the ILO. This is a woman who even she was under house arrest sent some of the money from her Nobel Prize to Thailand to be able to care for, shelter, and feed Burmese trafficking victims.

So this is a woman who we most of us know as a democracy activist, but many of us who work on human trafficking also know her as a good friend and colleague, and frankly, an expert in the field of human trafficking. And I think that her ability to take part in the governance of her own country will bode well for the fight against human trafficking in Burma.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. Luis Alonso, your line is open.

QUESTION: Yes. Hi. Good afternoon. Many thanks for taking this call, Mr. Ambassador. I would like to ask you about Latin America. I see that five countries in the region have improved their tier, and I would like to hear from you whether there is a trend in the region to better fight the traffic of persons. And also, if you could please confirm me whether its the first time that Nicaragua is placed in Tier 1. Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Of course. I think that there is a trend in Latin America that is improving its efforts. Part of this perhaps comes out of the last few years. There's the action plan now with the Organization of American States, and I think that that has been a very positive framework in which countries can find a way forward.

But I think we've also seen political will. The upgrade recently in the country of Honduras that was legislation that had been stuck for several years. It wasn't that anyone opposed it; it just never really was going anywhere. We worked with the Honduran Government and were able to come up with a way forward on bipartisan legislation that everyone agreed on for the protection of Hondurans and the protection of others who may in Honduras from labor trafficking and sex trafficking.

So, too, with the Dominican Republic, we saw the Government of the Dominican Republic take on a number of concerns that at first they were a little bit defensive and didn't know what to think about some of these issues and then rolled up their sleeves, got to work, and through political will started putting together the structures in place. And so as a result, we've seen convictions for not only trafficking excuse me but also the first labor trafficking convictions in the Dominican Republic, a conviction of two people who forced children into begging rings.

Now, you're correct that this is the first year in which Nicaragua has been on Tier 1 in the Trafficking in Persons Report, and we see this as an improvement over previous years. This year, the Government of Nicaragua convicted nine traffickers. Just look back to 2009, when only two traffickers were brought to justice. This last year, they opened a dedicated shelter for adult human trafficking victims. And I think that's specifically interesting in Central America because so much of the shelter opportunities in Central America are limited to children and are often donor-funded, whether its American or other religious groups that are taking care of children in Central America. The fact that the Nicaraguan Government stepped up and is putting together services for adult victims was, we think, a very positive step on the part of the Government of Nicaragua.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. Lucia Leal, your line is open.

QUESTION: Hi. Yes. I wanted to ask about the decision to remove Venezuela from the Tier 3 part of the report, if you could describe what kind of progress has led to that, and also the removal of Haiti from the category of special cases, please. Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Of course. Tell me your name again. I didn't hear it very well.

QUESTION: Yes. It's Lucia Leal from Ese.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Oh, okay. Hi, Lucia.

QUESTION: Hi.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I think that what we saw with Venezuela this year was the notion of on the one hand increased public awareness, the public information campaigns, trainings of government officials on human trafficking. Those typically will have an impact. And I think that that's what we saw in Venezuela, is that by committing to doing those trainings and by actually being out and doing those trainings we saw that happening.

What were some of the things we saw? Well, one of the main things that we saw was that there were a couple of traffickers convicted, but more importantly 38 trafficking victims were identified and were helped. And of course, as you know, for us, that's one of the most important things is, is a government helping the victims that they find, whether those are Venezuelan nationals or whether those are foreigners who are in Venezuela.

The other thing that we thought was very notable this year and again, the minimum standards that we apply, Tier 3 is a country that is not meeting the minimum standards and is not trying to do so. And this is the year we saw the national assembly adopting a reform, that's looking at this. This is actually a form of the organized crime law, but one of the things we've seen is that they were working with civil society organizations to try to make sure that that law could be brought into place and strengthened the legal reform and legal framework against trafficking.

So we think that that was a very positive step on the part of the national assembly, and I think that that plus the 24-hour hotline and a few of those other things, we looked at. And when we did the analysis came to the conclusion that this was not a Tier 3 country this year.

As far as Haiti is concerned, Haiti has been on the special case category for several years. And one of the things that we saw over the last year is that the now the governance situation in Haiti is stable and largely peaceful. President Martelly and his government came to power in the first peaceful transition from an elected administration to the opposition, and the reconstruction efforts and development efforts continue to progress.

So in looking at that, we always look to see what's the situation on the ground. Is there political stability? Are the courts functioning? While there are still some remaining issues as far as parliament and the government and the prime minister and things like this, we see a functioning government now in Haiti at a level that we feel justified bringing them into the report as a ranked country as opposed to on the special case category.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. And the next question is from Hee Jung Yang. Your line is open.

QUESTION: Yes. I would like to ask what was the particular different situation regarding North Korea in terms of human trafficking. And also, I would like to ask whether there has been any cases that U.S. Government prohibited North Korea from getting any loan from the IMF and World Bank because it was recorded as the Third Tier in terms of human trafficking by the State Department's report.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, one of the things that we've seen with North Korea repeatedly over the years is, again, this notion of state-supported forced labor. And we are, of course, concerned not just about forced labor within the country, but also in recent years more and more labor exporting of North Korean, often, men, whether it's into the Middle East, whether it's into especially Russia and other places. And of course, with most countries, when they send workers overseas, it's between the workers, the recruiters, the employers. When the North Koreans send workers overseas, they send the police with them and keep them under surveillance and retaliate against them if they try to fight for their rights or if they try to leave.

So we continue to see the situation of forced labor/human trafficking in North Korea as very grave. The United States is required to vote no in the international financial institutions when countries are on Tier 3 of the trafficking report. That's something, frankly, that the Treasury Department and some others work on, and I don't have an immediate answer for you on that notion of were there votes this year in which the United States voted no on this basis. But it's something that we can look at and we can circle back.

QUESTION: Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. The next question is from Indira Lakshmanan. Your line is open.

QUESTION: Thank you, Ambassador. I wanted to ask and I apologize if you addressed this at the very top of the briefing because I missed it but have you gained or lost ground over the last year in the fight on human trafficking? And could

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: That's a wonderful question, and

QUESTION: Could you give numbers

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I did address it a little bit, but I think it's something I want to address again, because

QUESTION: Okay. Can I just ask specifically can you tell us how many countries were upgraded, how many were downgraded, and how many people are in slavery right now while you answer that question?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I can totally do that. I will do that again, and like I said, I'm glad to do it, because I think that these are concepts that we really need to make sure people are hearing.

So the number of identified victims around the world excuse me these are victims identified by governments in the last year has increased by 28 percent. In 2011, it was 33,113. In 2012, the number of identified victims by governments was 42,291. That is a 28 percent increase. Convictions are also up by 10 percent from 3,619 to 3,969. Now, conviction numbers typically lag one or two years behind victim identification and investigation numbers because of how long it takes for cases to go through the pipeline.

This last year we saw 7,909 prosecutions initiated as opposed to the year before, which was 6,017 prosecutions initiated. So we do think that were seeing some real positive movement as far as those numbers are concerned, but those numbers have to be placed in the context of the overarching number of people who are in modern slavery in the world, and that is, per the ILO, at least 21 million people worldwide. There are other researchers that put that number as high as 27 million.

So I think that's the numbers case. I think the upgrade and downgrade question you had asked, this year there are 186 countries on the report; 185 of them were ranked; Somalia was not. This year, Tier 1 of the report, which says that countries are meeting the minimum standards and I'd caution that that's not saying that countries are doing a great job on this; it's simply that they're meeting the minimum.

QUESTION: I actually got those numbers, because you had read them out, the four tiers, but did you have a number of how many were upgraded and how many were downgraded among the categories?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I don't really count that way.

QUESTION: Okay.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: So it's not something that as far as kind of what the raw up and down number is, I know I can tell you how big each of the tiers are compared to how they have been. Tier 2 has gotten a little bit bigger with 93 as opposed to 85 last year. Tiers 1 and Tiers 2 Watch List are basically the same 33, Tier 1, last year it was 32; Tier 2 Watch List is 42, last year was 41. And Tier 3 is smaller this year by five countries. Last year it was 23, this year is 17.

So there is a little bit of movement up into Tier 2, which means that countries are passing laws. It means that countries are starting to address the situation. They still have a little ways to go, but that's, I think, some the beginnings, I think, of a real trend. And we also see a number of countries that have prosecuted cases for the first time this year. And so I think that that is also excuse me that's something that when you see countries taking that first step, like we saw in Brunei, for instance, like we've seen in Somalia, that is, I think, a very positive step.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. That is the final question for today's call.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you all.

LOAD-DATE: June 19, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

117 of 492 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 19, 2012 Tuesday

BURMA, VIETNAM IMPROVE ON TRAFFICKING

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 1404 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, DC

The following information was released by Radio Free Asia:

New laws aid the countries' anti-trafficking efforts, according to a new U.S. report.

Courtesy of U.S. State Department

In an undated photo, a Cambodian policeman escorts 30 trafficked fishermen returning from Indonesia after being freed.

Burma and Vietnam have been upgraded from their low rankings in an annual U.S. report on human trafficking as the two countries were highlighted Tuesday for taking effective steps to check the scourge.

Burma was cited for repealing an antiquated law used to justify forced labor and replacing it with a legislation expressly forbidding the practice while Vietnam received praise for introducing a sweeping law to check human smuggling.

North Korea continued to languish in a blacklist for its forced labor and human trafficking, with the situation in the impoverished and nuclear-armed nation described as "very grave."

China remained on the so-called Tier 2 watchlist, for countries in danger of falling down to the Tier 3 blacklist. Tier 3 countries do not comply with any of the minimum standards required to contain the human trafficking problem and are not working towards that goal.

Burma

Burma this year improved to the Tier 2 watchlist, after being ranked Tier 3 since the report was first compiled in 2001, due to steps taken by the new nominally civilian government to keep citizens away from human trafficking syndicates abroad.

U.S. Ambassador-at-Large to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons Luis CdeBaca said that the State Department had been particularly concerned in recent years by "state-sponsored forced labor" in Burma which had been allowed to continue under the 1907 Villages and Towns Acts.

"What we've seen over the last year is that the government in Burma has taken a number of significant and, frankly, unprecedented steps in advancing these reforms," he said.

"We've seen improved victim protection measures for victims who have come back from other countries, we've seen the inauguration of a new hotline which has led to the rescue of 57 victims, and most important, this notion of repealing that antiquated law so there is no longer state-sponsored forced labor that is legal in Burma."

The report also applauded the government for beginning to address the "systemic political and economic factors" that cause many Burmese to seek employment through both legal and illegal means in neighboring countries, where some become victims of trafficking.

But trafficking within Burma by both government officials and private actors continues to be a problem, it said, and military personnel and militant insurgents conscripting children are the leading perpetrators of forced labor in the country.

"The climate of impunity and repression and the government's lack of accountability in forced labor and the recruitment of child soldiers represent the top casual factors for Burma's significant trafficking problem," the report said.

The Burmese government does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, the State Department said, but "it is making significant steps to do so."

CdeBaca also praised the work of pro-democracy leader Aung San Suu Kyi in combating human trafficking and forced labor in the country, noting that after travel restrictions were lifted against her, the Nobel Laureate first went to Thailand to address abuse against Burmese migrant workers housed in camps across the border.

Vietnam

Vietnam's upgrade to Tier 2 from the Tier 2 watchlist last year was based on the country's new "comprehensive" anti-trafficking law, which was adopted in March 2011 and took effect in January this year.

In 2011, the government finalized and disseminated a five-year national action plan on human trafficking, which covers all forms of trafficking and coordinates the government's anti-trafficking responses through a national steering committee.

The report noted that trafficking-related corruption appeared to continue at the local level in Vietnam, where officials at border crossings and checkpoints took bribes from traffickers and, at times, opted not to intervene on victims' behalf when family relationships existed between traffickers and victims.

A lack of financial resources, trained personnel, poorly coordinated enforcement, and an obsolete legal structure all remain obstacles to greater progress in the country's anti-trafficking efforts, it said.

China

China remained on the Tier 2 watchlist for the eighth consecutive year in the report, which cited forced prison labor, abduction of children for forced begging and thievery, and involuntary servitude of children, migrant workers, and abductees.

"The Chinese government made minimal efforts to prevent trafficking in persons during the reporting period," the report said.

China was "granted a waiver of an otherwise required downgrade to Tier 3," it said, because its government has a written plan that would demonstrate a significant effort to comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, if implemented.

The report said trafficking is most pronounced among China's internal migrant population, which is estimated to exceed 221 million people.

"Forced labor remains a problem, including in brick kilns, coal mines, and factories, some of which operate illegally and take advantage of lax labor supervision," it said.

Cambodia

Cambodia, meanwhile, remained a Tier 2 country, based on what the report described as a lack of government progress in prosecuting human traffickers and protecting trafficking victims.

"Endemic corruption at all levels continued to impede anti-trafficking endeavors and local observers believe it to be the cause of impunity afforded to firms engaging in illegal recruitment practices that contribute to trafficking," the report said.

It also noted that the country's "weak and corrupt" judicial and law enforcement systems, lengthy legal processes, credible fears of retaliation, and the lack of witness protection and access to resources continued to hinder victims' willingness to cooperate in cases.

But the State Department acknowledged "significant progress" in the government's efforts to combat the transnational labor trafficking of Cambodians.

North Korea

The report kept North Korea at the lowest ranking, citing estimates that as many of 70 percent of the thousands of undocumented North Korean refugees in China are females, many of whom are trafficking victims.

Pyongyang also uses forced labor and recruits citizens to work abroad for North Korean entities, often withholding their wages until they return home.

Most commonly, women and girls from one of North Korea's poorest border areas cross into China and are then sold and re-sold as "brides."

North Korea's government does not acknowledge the existence of human trafficking either within its own borders or trans-nationally and actively punishes trafficking victims for acts they commit as a direct result of being trafficked, the report said.

CdeBaca said that the U.S. continues to see the situation of forced labor and human trafficking in North Korea as "very grave."

"With most countries, when they send workers overseas, it's between the workers, the recruiters, and the employers," he said.

"When North Korea sends workers overseas, they send the police with them and keep them under surveillance and retaliate against them if they try to fight for their rights or if they try to leave."

Laos

The TIP report maintained Laos at Tier 2, citing "significant" efforts by the government to fully comply with minimum standards to eliminate trafficking.

Laos stepped up efforts to investigate trafficking offenses and to prosecute and punish traffickers, it said.

But trafficking laws do not fully protect all victims, the report said, adding that neither proactive identification measures nor systematic monitoring efforts were implemented during the current year.

It said inefficiencies within the Lao bureaucracy delayed approvals for nongovernmental organizations to implement anti-trafficking projects and that the prime minister has yet to approve a final draft of the anti-trafficking national plan of action.

The United Nations has said human trafficking remains the second largest illegal trade next to drugs, with traffickers earning tens of billions of U.S. dollars annually. It also estimated that 2.5 million trafficked people worldwide come from the Asia-Pacific region.

Reported by Joshua Lipen.

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

118 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
States News Service

June 19, 2012 Tuesday

OBAMA ADMIN. AGAIN REFUSES TO HOLD CHINA ACCOUNTABLE FOR RAMPANT HUMAN TRAFFICKINGBYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 661 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of New Jersey Rep. Chris Smith:

The Obama Administration's failure to hold China accountable for its atrocious human trafficking violations in this year's annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report was called "shameful" and a "dereliction of duty" by Chris Smith, the lawmaker who wrote the first-ever U.S. law to combat trafficking in 2000 and whose law created the annual report with its tier ranking system (Public Law 106-386).

Rep. Chris Smith (NJ-04), author of the landmark the Trafficking Victims and Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA) as well as subsequent laws to adapt and strengthen the TVPA, said he was "appalled" that China was given a political waiver despite its rampant and growing problem of human trafficking, particularly sex-trafficking of women and girls.

"China has remained on the 'Watch List' for eight years now, evading a downgrade to Tier 3-and sanctions-by stringing this President along with empty promises," said Smith, who chairs the House subcommittee that oversees human rights and co-chairs the Congressional Human Trafficking Caucus. "Congress could not have been more clear that the Tier 2 Watch List was not meant to be a sanctuary for countries that fail to address-or themselves commit-the atrocious human rights abuses of human trafficking."

The report contains the litany of trafficking crimes perpetrated in China including forced labor of children and of the disabled in brick kilns, repatriation of North Korean trafficking victims, the trafficking of women and children from surrounding countries for sexual exploitation, and the trafficking magnet effect of China's one-child policy, which, coupled with a cultural preference for sons, creates a skewed sex ratio in China. According to the report, the one-child policy is a key cause of trafficking of foreign women as brides for Chinese men and for forced prostitution. China's own statistics show a substantial increase in the number of women trafficked to China in 2011.

"China was granted a waiver last year because its government allegedly had a 'written plan that, if implemented, would constitute a significant effort to bring itself into compliance with the minimum standards' and it was allegedly 'devoting sufficient resources to implement that plan'- it is the exact same story this year, except for that we still do not know the contents of the plan and its release has been postponed yet again," Smith said. "Where are the results? When will the Administration say that enough is enough?"

In the most recent reauthorization of the TVPA, Congress decided that no country should be allowed to skirt sanctions on the Tier 2 Watch List for more than two years. This year, 2012, represents the second year that the limit was put to the test.

"Our obligation is to the victims of trafficking, not the dictatorship, as I have stressed in the past," Smith said.

The report showed good news in other parts of the world, with an overall increase for 2011 in the number of traffickers convicted (3,969) and the number of victims identified (42,291) (Click Here to Read the 2012 Report).

This year's report evaluated 186 countries, 28 of which were upgraded in the tier rankings. Fourteen countries were downgraded this year-including three previous Tier 1 countries. Bosnia Herzegovina, Nigeria, and Portugal were downgraded to Tier 2 this year, underscoring the importance of consistent implementation of anti-trafficking laws.

"It is not enough to have good laws on the books here or anywhere else," said Smith. "They must be funded and implemented in order to meet the minimum standards of combating human trafficking."

Notably, no additional countries were downgraded to Tier 3 this year.

In addition to the original 2000 law which provided for the annual reports, Smith wrote two subsequent anti-trafficking laws (PL 108-193 and PL 109-164) increasing resources for crime prevention and expanding treatment assistance for victims.

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 States News Service

119 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

State Department Documents and Publications

June 19, 2012

Briefing on 2012 Trafficking in Persons Report

SECTION: PUBLIC AFFAIRS DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 4086 words

2012 Trafficking in Persons Report

Special Briefing

Luis CdeBaca

Ambassador-at-Large, Office To Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons

Via Teleconference

Washington, DC

June 19, 2012

MR. VENTRELL: Hi. And good afternoon everyone, and thank you for joining us. I'm pleased to introduce Ambassador Luis CdeBaca who is our Ambassador-At-Large and Director of our Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. Today's conference call is on the record. He's going to discuss the release of this year's Trafficking in Persons Report, which the Secretary will introduce at 4:00 p.m. Having said that, this call and all of its contents are embargoed until the Secretary finishes speaking at approximately 4:30 p.m. But this will give a chance for Ambassador CdeBaca to give you a preview and answer some of your questions. So without further ado, over to you, Mr. Ambassador.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you, and welcome, everyone. This afternoon, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and Under Secretary of State Maria Otero and I will be unveiling the 2012 Trafficking in Persons Report. This is a statutorily mandated report that comes out of the Victims of Trafficking Protections Act of the year 2000, which was the Clinton Administration's signature antislavery achievement continued and intensified by the Bush Administration and now taken to the next level by the Obama Administration.

We see the trafficking in persons issue and the bipartisan consensus against human trafficking to be something that is in keeping with the core United States values, both as far as how we conceive of ourselves as a nation and how we do our foreign policy and in -- very much in keeping with the -- this year's 150th anniversary of the Emancipation Proclamation. On September 22nd of this year, we will observe the 150th anniversary of President Lincoln declaring to the world that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall exist. And while that was not self-executing -- there was still a war to fight and win -- it resulted in the ending of legalized slavery in the United States.

But this promise of freedom, the notion of the universal right to be free, the notion of a universal -- a requirement to fight against human trafficking and modern day slavery continues into the modern era, and it is that call that we answer today. This is very much -- while we call it human trafficking, it's kind of the new and modern term for an old evil. This is truly what President Obama has called the intolerable yoke of modern slavery.

The annual Trafficking in Persons Report analyzes countries from around the world by looking at what the governments are doing against modern slavery. It does so through the 3P paradigm, in which we look at prevention, protection, and prosecution alike, not simply looking at this as a development issue or a public awareness issue, but also an issue of rehabilitation of victims and bringing the traffickers to justice. This is, as the report says this year, a crime first and foremost.

Now, this particular type of crime, a human rights crime or a civil rights crime as it were, is a crime that more countries and more governments are addressing. The report this year notes that the number of convictions globally reported is up from 3,619 last year to 3,969, and those are convictions of traffickers. That is not, however, a large number when one compares that to the global estimates of the victim population. A study released two weeks ago by the International Labor Organization estimates at least 21 million people held in bondage worldwide, and other estimates show it up to 27 million.

Human trafficking, just very quickly, a definitional point: This is not a crime of movement across borders for prostitution, although that is often how people see it. Both under the United States Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 and under the United Nations Palermo Protocol, the protocol to monitor and combat trafficking in persons from the year 2000, under both of those instruments, trafficking is defined as slavery. It doesn't matter if someone is in their own country; it doesn't matter if they're in sex or if they're in labor. If the person is not free to leave, if the person is unable to go get another position and is being held through some type of coercive force, that person is considered a trafficking victim, and that person is entitled to the protections that we look to governments to provide.

Now, having said that, we've seen the number of victims identified around the world has increased by almost a third. And this is, again, a very heartening piece of data, because it shows that governments are stepping up and are meeting their obligations, and we are very happy to see that 42,291 trafficking victims were identified and helped in the last year.

The issue, of course, continues to be, as I mentioned earlier, that we're looking at that within the context of almost 27 million people who are enslaved in the world. So there's a long way to go. And this report this year, looking at the problems of freedom and what we can do to deliver on it, is very much a challenge for all countries, the United States included, to address this and to intensify our efforts.

Now, one of the things that the report does each year that you may be familiar with is that it arranges countries onto four tiers. Counter-intuitively, those tiers are Tiers 1 through 3. But that is the magic of the congressional action on this. It is Tier 1 which is a country that is complying with the minimum standards to combat trafficking in persons; Tier 2, a country that is not yet compliant but is taking great strides; Tier 2 Watch List, which is basically a country that is in danger of falling down to Tier 3; and Tier 3, which is a country that is not complying with any of the minimum standards and is not working towards that.

We see this year on Tier 3, 17 countries; on Tier 2 Watch List, 42 countries; on Tier 2, 93 countries; and on Tier 1, 33 countries; 186 countries total appear in the report; 185 of them received rankings under the minimum standards. One of them did not, and that is Somalia, which does not have a functioning government such that we could include it in the report.

I would note, however, that even in Somalia, there are heroes of the anti-trafficking fight, particularly a recent prosecution that was brought in Puntland, shows that even in countries where there is not a functioning government, the legal system and others can work together to bring traffickers to justice. Heroes, much like that prosecutor in Somalia, we see that in this global and modern abolitionist fight, there are people whose commitment and whose excellence and whose innovation leaves them to be singled out as heroes of the fight.

And Secretary Clinton will honor 10 such heroes today, those people from countries around the world, from Argentina, to the United States, from Mauritania to Israel, from Greece to the Republic of the Congo. We see people who have done the cutting-edge legal work; we've seen the people who -- within government who have brought their government colleagues together to uncover human trafficking cases, to take a stand against official complicity. We also see people who are on the frontlines.

One of the honorees today is a nun who works with human trafficking victims in the Sinai. Another of the heroes that we honor today is a young man who was enslaved for three years on the fishing fleet in Southeast Asia and now, through his art and other activities, is raising awareness of the fact of labor exploitation in the fishing industry. All of these people are heroes, most notably the hero from Mauritania, a woman who was the first female lawyer in that country, and in the last five years has been able to obtain legislation for the first time outlawing slavery in Mauritania.

And I think that that brings us to the conclusion of my remarks. With that, I think, chilling notion that there are countries in the world where the abolition of slavery, the official, legal outlawing of this practice is not something for the history books, it's something within the living memory of the people in those countries. And I think it is a particular challenge as we address this in the modern era.

I will pitch you one thing before I get off and take questions, and that is so much of what is happening on the fight against modern slavery is dependent upon good and solid reporting, and I want to make sure that you know that my office is ready and willing to help you with that. This is an area that actually lends itself well to long-form or investigative reporting, and I think that we've seen with both the longer work and the commitment over the course of a year now that we've seen from CNN International that it's also something that the viewers or the readers very much will respond to. And so we think there's room for everybody, and we are certainly here and will support any of your work as you report on these stories. We're hoping that this isn't just today's news, but something that we can support going forward.

And I will also challenge everybody by saying that one thing that we hear from people in countries around the world is young journalists who want to work on this who look to the American media and others as a resource that can help them learn how to address this and how to investigate this. So we may be calling upon you for more than just press conferences.

Anyway, I'll turn it over for questions at this point. I've got, I think, about 15 minutes where I can answer some questions.

OPERATOR: Thank you. At this time, we will begin the question-and-answer session. If you would like to ask a question, please press *1 on your touchtone phone. Please unmute your phone and record your name clearly at the prompt. Once again, please press *1 if you would like to ask a question.

Our first question today is from Joshua Lipes. Your line is open.

QUESTION: Hi. Ambassador CdeBaca, thank you for your introduction. I was wondering if you could comment a little bit on how -- what changes in Burma brought about the increase in the rank from Tier 3 to Tier 2 Watch List this year.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: One of things that we have been very concerned about over the last few years was not simply the human trafficking that we see in Burma of say, for instance, going up to China for sex trafficking or over to Thailand for the labor trafficking as well as sex trafficking, but also the notion of state -- basically state-sponsored forced labor that arises from and is -- was supported by the 1907 Villages and Towns Act that was being used to justify the forced impressment of villagers and rural folks. And it has everything from porters for the military to working on construction projects and what have you.

And what we've seen over the last year is that the government in Burma has taken a number of significant and frankly unprecedented steps in advancing these reforms. There is a good inter-ministerial working group that had been limited by the Burmese Government's inability to work with other governments around the world, but they -- and they've been in existence for several years -- had worked within that constraint to actually try to bring on some best practices.

As a result, we've seen improved victim protection measures for victims who've come back from other countries. We've seen the inauguration of a new hotline, which has led to the rescue of 57 victims. And most importantly, this notion of repealing that antiquated law so there's no longer state-sponsored forced labor that is legal in Burma. This is something that not only the United States has worked with the Government of Burma on, but also the International Labor Organization, and I think you may be familiar with some announcements that the ILO made last week as far as that was concerned.

I'll tell you one last thing on Burma, and that is that one of the things I think that many people report on as far as Burma is the longstanding and heroic work that Aung San Suu Kyi has done for democracy building in that country, but people often tend to forget her activism on the issue of human trafficking, on her issue -- the issues of forced labor.

The first place that she went outside of Burma when she was able to travel again was to the areas in Thailand where hoards of Burmese migrant workers are exploited and abused in the Thai fish processing plants, and she addressed their abuse. The next place that she went when she went to Europe was to address the ILO. This is a woman who even she was under house arrest sent some of the money from her Nobel Prize to Thailand to be able to care for, shelter, and feed Burmese trafficking victims.

So this is a woman who we -- most of us know as a democracy activist, but many of us who work on human trafficking also know her as a good friend and colleague, and frankly, an expert in the field of human trafficking. And I think that her ability to take part in the governance of her own country will bode well for the fight against human trafficking in Burma.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. Luis Alonso, your line is open.

QUESTION: Yes. Hi. Good afternoon. Many thanks for taking this call, Mr. Ambassador. I would like to ask you about Latin America. I see that five countries in the region have improved their tier, and I would like to hear from you whether there is a trend in the region to better fight the traffic of persons. And also, if you could please confirm me whether it's the first time that Nicaragua is placed in Tier 1. Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Of course. I think that there is a trend in Latin America that is improving its efforts. Part of this perhaps comes out of the last few years. There's the action plan now with the Organization of American States, and I think that that has been a very positive framework in which countries can find a way forward.

But I think we've also seen political will. The upgrade recently in the country of Honduras -- that was legislation that had been stuck for several years. It wasn't that anyone opposed it; it just never really was going anywhere. We worked with the Honduran Government and were able to come up with a way forward on bipartisan legislation that everyone agreed on for the protection of Hondurans and the protection of others who may in Honduras from labor trafficking and sex trafficking.

So, too, with the Dominican Republic, we saw the Government of the Dominican Republic take on a number of concerns that at first they were a little bit defensive and didn't know what to think about some of these issues and then rolled up their sleeves, got to work, and through political will started putting together the structures in place. And so as a result, we've seen convictions for not only trafficking -- excuse me -- but also the first labor trafficking convictions in the Dominican Republic, a conviction of two people who forced children into begging rings.

Now, you're correct that this is the first year in which Nicaragua has been on Tier 1 in the Trafficking in Persons Report, and we see this as an improvement over previous years. This year, the Government of Nicaragua convicted nine traffickers. Just look back to 2009, when only two traffickers were brought to justice. This last year, they opened a dedicated shelter for adult human trafficking victims. And I think that's specifically interesting in Central America because so much of the shelter opportunities in Central America are limited to children and are often donor-funded, whether it's American or other religious groups that are taking care of children in Central America. The fact that the Nicaraguan Government stepped up and is putting together services for adult victims was, we think, a very positive step on the part of the Government of Nicaragua.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. Lucia Leal, your line is open.

QUESTION: Hi. Yes. I wanted to ask about the decision to remove Venezuela from the Tier 3 part of the report, if you could describe what kind of progress has led to that, and also the removal of Haiti from the category of special cases, please. Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Of course. Tell me your name again. I didn't hear it very well.

QUESTION: Yes. It's Lucia Leal from Ese.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Oh, okay. Hi, Lucia.

QUESTION: Hi.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I think that what we saw with Venezuela this year was the notion of on the one hand increased public awareness, the public information campaigns, trainings of government officials on human trafficking. Those typically will have an impact. And I think that that's what we saw in Venezuela, is that by committing to doing those trainings and by actually being out and doing those trainings we saw that happening.

What were some of the things we saw? Well, one of the main things that we saw was that there were a couple of traffickers convicted, but more importantly 38 trafficking victims were identified and were helped. And of course, as you know, for us, that's one of the most important things is, is a government helping the victims that they find, whether those are Venezuelan nationals or whether those are foreigners who are in Venezuela.

The other thing that we thought was very notable this year -- and again, the minimum standards that we apply, Tier 3 is a country that is not meeting the minimum standards and is not trying to do so. And this is the year we saw the national assembly adopting a reform, a -- that's looking at this. This is actually a form of the organized crime law, but one of the things we've seen is that they were working with civil society organizations to try to make sure that that law could be brought into place and strengthened the legal reform and legal framework against trafficking.

So we think that that was a very positive step on the part of the national assembly, and I think that that's -- that plus the 24-hour hotline and a few of those other things, we looked at. And when we did the analysis came to the conclusion that this was not a Tier 3 country this year.

As far as Haiti is concerned, Haiti has been on the special case category for several years. And one of the things that we saw over the last year is that the -- now the governance situation in Haiti is stable and largely peaceful. President Martelly and his government came to power in the first peaceful transition from an elected administration to the opposition, and the reconstruction efforts and development efforts continue to progress.

So in looking at that, we always look to see what's the situation on the ground. Is there political stability? Are the courts functioning? While there are still some remaining issues as far as parliament and the government and the prime minister and things like this, we see a functioning government now in Haiti at a level that we feel justified bringing them into the report as a ranked country as opposed to on the special case category.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. And the next question is from Hee Jung Yang. Your line is open.

QUESTION: Yes. I would like to ask what was the particular different situation regarding North Korea in terms of human trafficking. And also, I would like to ask whether there has been any cases that U.S. Government prohibited North Korea from getting any loan from the IMF and World Bank because it was recorded as the Third Tier in terms of human trafficking by the State Department's report.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, one of the things that we've seen with North Korea repeatedly over the years is, again, this notion of state-supported forced labor. And we are, of course, concerned not just about forced labor within the country, but also in recent years more and more labor exporting of North Korean, often, men, whether it's into the Middle East, whether it's into especially Russia and other places. And of course, with most countries, when they send workers overseas, it's between the workers, the recruiters, the employers. When the North Koreans send workers overseas, they send the police with them and keep them under surveillance and retaliate against them if they try to fight for their rights or if they try to leave.

So we continue to see the situation of forced labor/human trafficking in North Korea as very grave. The United States is required to vote no in the international financial institutions when countries are on Tier 3 of the trafficking report. That's something, frankly, that the Treasury Department and some others work on, and I don't have an immediate answer for you on that notion of were there votes this year in which the United States voted no on this basis. But it's something that we can look at and we can circle back.

QUESTION: Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. The next question is from Indira Lakshmanan. Your line is open.

QUESTION: Thank you, Ambassador. I wanted to ask -- and I apologize if you addressed this at the very top of the briefing because I missed it -- but have you gained or lost ground over the last year in the fight on human trafficking? And could --

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: That's a wonderful question, and --

QUESTION: Could you give numbers --

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I did address it a little bit, but I think it's something I want to address again, because --

QUESTION: Okay. Can I just ask specifically -- can you tell us how many countries were upgraded, how many were downgraded, and how many people are in slavery right now while you answer that question?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I can totally do that. I will do that again, and like I said, I'm glad to do it, because I think that these are concepts that we really need to make sure people are hearing.

So the number of identified victims around the world -- excuse me -- these are victims identified by governments in the last year -- has increased by 28 percent. In 2011, it was 33,113. In 2012, the number of identified victims by governments was 42,291. That is a 28 percent increase. Convictions are also up by 10 percent from 3,619 to 3,969. Now, conviction numbers typically lag one or two years behind victim identification and investigation numbers because of how long it takes for cases to go through the pipeline.

This last year we saw 7,909 prosecutions initiated as opposed to the year before, which was 6,017 prosecutions initiated. So we do think that we're seeing some real positive movement as far as those numbers are concerned, but those numbers have to be placed in the context of the overarching number of people who are in modern slavery in the world, and that is, per the ILO, at least 21 million people worldwide. There are other researchers that put that number as high as 27 million.

So I think that's the numbers case. I think the upgrade and downgrade question you had asked, this year there are 186 countries on the report; 185 of them were ranked; Somalia was not. This year, Tier 1 of the report, which says that countries are meeting the minimum standards -- and I'd caution that that's not saying that countries are doing a great job on this; it's simply that they're meeting the minimum.

QUESTION: I actually got those numbers, because you had read them out, the four tiers, but did you have a number of how many were upgraded and how many were downgraded among the categories?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I don't really count that way.

QUESTION: Okay.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: So it's not something that -- as far as kind of what the raw up and down number is, I know -- I can tell you how big each of the tiers are compared to how they have been. Tier 2 has gotten a little bit bigger with 93 as opposed to 85 last year. Tiers 1 and Tiers 2 Watch List are basically the same -- 33, Tier 1, last year it was 32; Tier 2 Watch List is 42, last year was 41. And Tier 3 is smaller this year by five countries. Last year it was 23, this year is 17.

So there is a little bit of movement up into Tier 2, which means that countries are passing laws. It means that countries are starting to address the situation. They still have a little ways to go, but that's, I think, some -- the beginnings, I think, of a real trend. And we also see a number of countries that have prosecuted cases for the first time this year. And so I think that that is also -- excuse me -- that's something that when you see countries taking that first step, like we saw in Brunei, for instance, like we've seen in Somalia, that is, I think, a very positive step.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. That is the final question for today's call.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you all.

PRN: 2012/1012

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: SDB

120 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

State Department Documents and Publications

June 19, 2012

Briefing on 2012 Trafficking in Persons Report

SECTION: PUBLIC AFFAIRS DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 4086 words

2012 Trafficking in Persons Report

Special Briefing

Luis CdeBaca

Ambassador-at-Large, Office To Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons

Via Teleconference

Washington, DC

June 19, 2012

MR. VENTRELL: Hi. And good afternoon everyone, and thank you for joining us. I'm pleased to introduce Ambassador Luis CdeBaca who is our Ambassador-At-Large and Director of our Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. Today's conference call is on the record. He's going to discuss the release of this year's Trafficking in Persons Report, which the Secretary will introduce at 4:00 p.m. Having said that, this call and all of its contents are embargoed until the Secretary finishes speaking at approximately 4:30 p.m. But this will give a chance for Ambassador CdeBaca to give you a preview and answer some of your questions. So without further ado, over to you, Mr. Ambassador.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you, and welcome, everyone. This afternoon, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and Under Secretary of State Maria Otero and I will be unveiling the 2012 Trafficking in Persons Report. This is a statutorily mandated report that comes out of the Victims of Trafficking Protections Act of the year 2000, which was the Clinton Administration's signature antislavery achievement continued and intensified by the Bush Administration and now taken to the next level by the Obama Administration.

We see the trafficking in persons issue and the bipartisan consensus against human trafficking to be something that is in keeping with the core United States values, both as far as how we conceive of ourselves as a nation and how we do our foreign policy and in -- very much in keeping with the -- this year's 150th anniversary of the Emancipation Proclamation. On September 22nd of this year, we will observe the 150th anniversary of President Lincoln declaring to the world that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall exist. And while that was not self-executing -- there was still a war to fight and win -- it resulted in the ending of legalized slavery in the United States.

But this promise of freedom, the notion of the universal right to be free, the notion of a universal -- a requirement to fight against human trafficking and modern day slavery continues into the modern era, and it is that call that we answer today. This is very much -- while we call it human trafficking, it's kind of the new and modern term for an old evil. This is truly what President Obama has called the intolerable yoke of modern slavery.

The annual Trafficking in Persons Report analyzes countries from around the world by looking at what the governments are doing against modern slavery. It does so through the 3P paradigm, in which we look at prevention, protection, and prosecution alike, not simply looking at this as a development issue or a public awareness issue, but also an issue of rehabilitation of victims and bringing the traffickers to justice. This is, as the report says this year, a crime first and foremost.

Now, this particular type of crime, a human rights crime or a civil rights crime as it were, is a crime that more countries and more governments are addressing. The report this year notes that the number of convictions globally reported is up from 3,619 last year to 3,969, and those are convictions of traffickers. That is not, however, a large number when one compares that to the global estimates of the victim population. A study released two weeks ago by the International Labor Organization estimates at least 21 million people held in bondage worldwide, and other estimates show it up to 27 million.

Human trafficking, just very quickly, a definitional point: This is not a crime of movement across borders for prostitution, although that is often how people see it. Both under the United States Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 and under the United Nations Palermo Protocol, the protocol to monitor and combat trafficking in persons from the year 2000, under both of those instruments, trafficking is defined as slavery. It doesn't matter if someone is in their own country; it doesn't matter if they're in sex or if they're in labor. If the person is not free to leave, if the person is unable to go get another position and is being held through some type of coercive force, that person is considered a trafficking victim, and that person is entitled to the protections that we look to governments to provide.

Now, having said that, we've seen the number of victims identified around the world has increased by almost a third. And this is, again, a very heartening piece of data, because it shows that governments are stepping up and are meeting their obligations, and we are very happy to see that 42,291 trafficking victims were identified and helped in the last year.

The issue, of course, continues to be, as I mentioned earlier, that we're looking at that within the context of almost 27 million people who are enslaved in the world. So there's a long way to go. And this report this year, looking at the problems of freedom and what we can do to deliver on it, is very much a challenge for all countries, the United States included, to address this and to intensify our efforts.

Now, one of the things that the report does each year that you may be familiar with is that it arranges countries onto four tiers. Counter-intuitively, those tiers are Tiers 1 through 3. But that is the magic of the congressional action on this. It is Tier 1 which is a country that is complying with the minimum standards to combat trafficking in persons; Tier 2, a country that is not yet compliant but is taking great strides; Tier 2 Watch List, which is basically a country that is in danger of falling down to Tier 3; and Tier 3, which is a country that is not complying with any of the minimum standards and is not working towards that.

We see this year on Tier 3, 17 countries; on Tier 2 Watch List, 42 countries; on Tier 2, 93 countries; and on Tier 1, 33 countries; 186 countries total appear in the report; 185 of them received rankings under the minimum standards. One of them did not, and that is Somalia, which does not have a functioning government such that we could include it in the report.

I would note, however, that even in Somalia, there are heroes of the anti-trafficking fight, particularly a recent prosecution that was brought in Puntland, shows that even in countries where there is not a functioning government, the legal system and others can work together to bring traffickers to justice. Heroes, much like that prosecutor in Somalia, we see that in this global and modern abolitionist fight, there are people whose commitment and whose excellence and whose innovation leaves them to be singled out as heroes of the fight.

And Secretary Clinton will honor 10 such heroes today, those people from countries around the world, from Argentina, to the United States, from Mauritania to Israel, from Greece to the Republic of the Congo. We see people who have done the cutting-edge legal work; we've seen the people who -- within government who have brought their government colleagues together to uncover human trafficking cases, to take a stand against official complicity. We also see people who are on the frontlines.

One of the honorees today is a nun who works with human trafficking victims in the Sinai. Another of the heroes that we honor today is a young man who was enslaved for three years on the fishing fleet in Southeast Asia and now, through his art and other activities, is raising awareness of the fact of labor exploitation in the fishing industry. All of these people are heroes, most notably the hero from Mauritania, a woman who was the first female lawyer in that country, and in the last five years has been able to obtain legislation for the first time outlawing slavery in Mauritania.

And I think that that brings us to the conclusion of my remarks. With that, I think, chilling notion that there are countries in the world where the abolition of slavery, the official, legal outlawing of this practice is not something for the history books, it's something within the living memory of the people in those countries. And I think it is a particular challenge as we address this in the modern era.

I will pitch you one thing before I get off and take questions, and that is so much of what is happening on the fight against modern slavery is dependent upon good and solid reporting, and I want to make sure that you know that my office is ready and willing to help you with that. This is an area that actually lends itself well to long-form or investigative reporting, and I think that we've seen with both the longer work and the commitment over the course of a year now that we've seen from CNN International that it's also something that the viewers or the readers very much will respond to. And so we think there's room for everybody, and we are certainly here and will support any of your work as you report on these stories. We're hoping that this isn't just today's news, but something that we can support going forward.

And I will also challenge everybody by saying that one thing that we hear from people in countries around the world is young journalists who want to work on this who look to the American media and others as a resource that can help them learn how to address this and how to investigate this. So we may be calling upon you for more than just press conferences.

Anyway, I'll turn it over for questions at this point. I've got, I think, about 15 minutes where I can answer some questions.

OPERATOR: Thank you. At this time, we will begin the question-and-answer session. If you would like to ask a question, please press *1 on your touchtone phone. Please unmute your phone and record your name clearly at the prompt. Once again, please press *1 if you would like to ask a question.

Our first question today is from Joshua Lipes. Your line is open.

QUESTION: Hi. Ambassador CdeBaca, thank you for your introduction. I was wondering if you could comment a little bit on how -- what changes in Burma brought about the increase in the rank from Tier 3 to Tier 2 Watch List this year.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: One of things that we have been very concerned about over the last few years was not simply the human trafficking that we see in Burma of say, for instance, going up to China for sex trafficking or over to Thailand for the labor trafficking as well as sex trafficking, but also the notion of state -- basically state-sponsored forced labor that arises from and is -- was supported by the 1907 Villages and Towns Act that was being used to justify the forced impressment of villagers and rural folks. And it has everything from porters for the military to working on construction projects and what have you.

And what we've seen over the last year is that the government in Burma has taken a number of significant and frankly unprecedented steps in advancing these reforms. There is a good inter-ministerial working group that had been limited by the Burmese Government's inability to work with other governments around the world, but they -- and they've been in existence for several years -- had worked within that constraint to actually try to bring on some best practices.

As a result, we've seen improved victim protection measures for victims who've come back from other countries. We've seen the inauguration of a new hotline, which has led to the rescue of 57 victims. And most importantly, this notion of repealing that antiquated law so there's no longer state-sponsored forced labor that is legal in Burma. This is something that not only the United States has worked with the Government of Burma on, but also the International Labor Organization, and I think you may be familiar with some announcements that the ILO made last week as far as that was concerned.

I'll tell you one last thing on Burma, and that is that one of the things I think that many people report on as far as Burma is the longstanding and heroic work that Aung San Suu Kyi has done for democracy building in that country, but people often tend to forget her activism on the issue of human trafficking, on her issue -- the issues of forced labor.

The first place that she went outside of Burma when she was able to travel again was to the areas in Thailand where hoards of Burmese migrant workers are exploited and abused in the Thai fish processing plants, and she addressed their abuse. The next place that she went when she went to Europe was to address the ILO. This is a woman who even she was under house arrest sent some of the money from her Nobel Prize to Thailand to be able to care for, shelter, and feed Burmese trafficking victims.

So this is a woman who we -- most of us know as a democracy activist, but many of us who work on human trafficking also know her as a good friend and colleague, and frankly, an expert in the field of human trafficking. And I think that her ability to take part in the governance of her own country will bode well for the fight against human trafficking in Burma.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. Luis Alonso, your line is open.

QUESTION: Yes. Hi. Good afternoon. Many thanks for taking this call, Mr. Ambassador. I would like to ask you about Latin America. I see that five countries in the region have improved their tier, and I would like to hear from you whether there is a trend in the region to better fight the traffic of persons. And also, if you could please confirm me whether it's the first time that Nicaragua is placed in Tier 1. Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Of course. I think that there is a trend in Latin America that is improving its efforts. Part of this perhaps comes out of the last few years. There's the action plan now with the Organization of American States, and I think that that has been a very positive framework in which countries can find a way forward.

But I think we've also seen political will. The upgrade recently in the country of Honduras -- that was legislation that had been stuck for several years. It wasn't that anyone opposed it; it just never really was going anywhere. We worked with the Honduran Government and were able to come up with a way forward on bipartisan legislation that everyone agreed on for the protection of Hondurans and the protection of others who may in Honduras from labor trafficking and sex trafficking.

So, too, with the Dominican Republic, we saw the Government of the Dominican Republic take on a number of concerns that at first they were a little bit defensive and didn't know what to think about some of these issues and then rolled up their sleeves, got to work, and through political will started putting together the structures in place. And so as a result, we've seen convictions for not only trafficking -- excuse me -- but also the first labor trafficking convictions in the Dominican Republic, a conviction of two people who forced children into begging rings.

Now, you're correct that this is the first year in which Nicaragua has been on Tier 1 in the Trafficking in Persons Report, and we see this as an improvement over previous years. This year, the Government of Nicaragua convicted nine traffickers. Just look back to 2009, when only two traffickers were brought to justice. This last year, they opened a dedicated shelter for adult human trafficking victims. And I think that's specifically interesting in Central America because so much of the shelter opportunities in Central America are limited to children and are often donor-funded, whether it's American or other religious groups that are taking care of children in Central America. The fact that the Nicaraguan Government stepped up and is putting together services for adult victims was, we think, a very positive step on the part of the Government of Nicaragua.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. Lucia Leal, your line is open.

QUESTION: Hi. Yes. I wanted to ask about the decision to remove Venezuela from the Tier 3 part of the report, if you could describe what kind of progress has led to that, and also the removal of Haiti from the category of special cases, please. Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Of course. Tell me your name again. I didn't hear it very well.

QUESTION: Yes. It's Lucia Leal from Ese.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Oh, okay. Hi, Lucia.

QUESTION: Hi.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I think that what we saw with Venezuela this year was the notion of on the one hand increased public awareness, the public information campaigns, trainings of government officials on human trafficking. Those typically will have an impact. And I think that that's what we saw in Venezuela, is that by committing to doing those trainings and by actually being out and doing those trainings we saw that happening.

What were some of the things we saw? Well, one of the main things that we saw was that there were a couple of traffickers convicted, but more importantly 38 trafficking victims were identified and were helped. And of course, as you know, for us, that's one of the most important things is, is a government helping the victims that they find, whether those are Venezuelan nationals or whether those are foreigners who are in Venezuela.

The other thing that we thought was very notable this year -- and again, the minimum standards that we apply, Tier 3 is a country that is not meeting the minimum standards and is not trying to do so. And this is the year we saw the national assembly adopting a reform, a -- that's looking at this. This is actually a form of the organized crime law, but one of the things we've seen is that they were working with civil society organizations to try to make sure that that law could be brought into place and strengthened the legal reform and legal framework against trafficking.

So we think that that was a very positive step on the part of the national assembly, and I think that that's -- that plus the 24-hour hotline and a few of those other things, we looked at. And when we did the analysis came to the conclusion that this was not a Tier 3 country this year.

As far as Haiti is concerned, Haiti has been on the special case category for several years. And one of the things that we saw over the last year is that the -- now the governance situation in Haiti is stable and largely peaceful. President Martelly and his government came to power in the first peaceful transition from an elected administration to the opposition, and the reconstruction efforts and development efforts continue to progress.

So in looking at that, we always look to see what's the situation on the ground. Is there political stability? Are the courts functioning? While there are still some remaining issues as far as parliament and the government and the prime minister and things like this, we see a functioning government now in Haiti at a level that we feel justified bringing them into the report as a ranked country as opposed to on the special case category.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. And the next question is from Hee Jung Yang. Your line is open.

QUESTION: Yes. I would like to ask what was the particular different situation regarding North Korea in terms of human trafficking. And also, I would like to ask whether there has been any cases that U.S. Government prohibited North Korea from getting any loan from the IMF and World Bank because it was recorded as the Third Tier in terms of human trafficking by the State Department's report.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, one of the things that we've seen with North Korea repeatedly over the years is, again, this notion of state-supported forced labor. And we are, of course, concerned not just about forced labor within the country, but also in recent years more and more labor exporting of North Korean, often, men, whether it's into the Middle East, whether it's into especially Russia and other places. And of course, with most countries, when they send workers overseas, it's between the workers, the recruiters, the employers. When the North Koreans send workers overseas, they send the police with them and keep them under surveillance and retaliate against them if they try to fight for their rights or if they try to leave.

So we continue to see the situation of forced labor/human trafficking in North Korea as very grave. The United States is required to vote no in the international financial institutions when countries are on Tier 3 of the trafficking report. That's something, frankly, that the Treasury Department and some others work on, and I don't have an immediate answer for you on that notion of were there votes this year in which the United States voted no on this basis. But it's something that we can look at and we can circle back.

QUESTION: Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. The next question is from Indira Lakshmanan. Your line is open.

QUESTION: Thank you, Ambassador. I wanted to ask -- and I apologize if you addressed this at the very top of the briefing because I missed it -- but have you gained or lost ground over the last year in the fight on human trafficking? And could --

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: That's a wonderful question, and --

QUESTION: Could you give numbers --

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I did address it a little bit, but I think it's something I want to address again, because --

QUESTION: Okay. Can I just ask specifically -- can you tell us how many countries were upgraded, how many were downgraded, and how many people are in slavery right now while you answer that question?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I can totally do that. I will do that again, and like I said, I'm glad to do it, because I think that these are concepts that we really need to make sure people are hearing.

So the number of identified victims around the world -- excuse me -- these are victims identified by governments in the last year -- has increased by 28 percent. In 2011, it was 33,113. In 2012, the number of identified victims by governments was 42,291. That is a 28 percent increase. Convictions are also up by 10 percent from 3,619 to 3,969. Now, conviction numbers typically lag one or two years behind victim identification and investigation numbers because of how long it takes for cases to go through the pipeline.

This last year we saw 7,909 prosecutions initiated as opposed to the year before, which was 6,017 prosecutions initiated. So we do think that we're seeing some real positive movement as far as those numbers are concerned, but those numbers have to be placed in the context of the overarching number of people who are in modern slavery in the world, and that is, per the ILO, at least 21 million people worldwide. There are other researchers that put that number as high as 27 million.

So I think that's the numbers case. I think the upgrade and downgrade question you had asked, this year there are 186 countries on the report; 185 of them were ranked; Somalia was not. This year, Tier 1 of the report, which says that countries are meeting the minimum standards -- and I'd caution that that's not saying that countries are doing a great job on this; it's simply that they're meeting the minimum.

QUESTION: I actually got those numbers, because you had read them out, the four tiers, but did you have a number of how many were upgraded and how many were downgraded among the categories?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I don't really count that way.

QUESTION: Okay.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: So it's not something that -- as far as kind of what the raw up and down number is, I know -- I can tell you how big each of the tiers are compared to how they have been. Tier 2 has gotten a little bit bigger with 93 as opposed to 85 last year. Tiers 1 and Tiers 2 Watch List are basically the same -- 33, Tier 1, last year it was 32; Tier 2 Watch List is 42, last year was 41. And Tier 3 is smaller this year by five countries. Last year it was 23, this year is 17.

So there is a little bit of movement up into Tier 2, which means that countries are passing laws. It means that countries are starting to address the situation. They still have a little ways to go, but that's, I think, some -- the beginnings, I think, of a real trend. And we also see a number of countries that have prosecuted cases for the first time this year. And so I think that that is also -- excuse me -- that's something that when you see countries taking that first step, like we saw in Brunei, for instance, like we've seen in Somalia, that is, I think, a very positive step.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. That is the final question for today's call.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you all.

PRN: 2012/1012

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: SDB

121 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

Targeted News Service

June 19, 2012 Tuesday 6:07 AM EST

2012 Trafficking in Persons Report

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 4072 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State issued the following text of a special briefing:

MR. VENTRELL: Hi. And good afternoon everyone, and thank you for joining us. I'm pleased to introduce Ambassador Luis CdeBaca who is our Ambassador-At-Large and Director of our Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. Today's conference call is on the record. He's going to discuss the release of this year's Trafficking in Persons Report, which the Secretary will introduce at 4:00 p.m. Having said that, this call and all of its contents are embargoed until the Secretary finishes speaking at approximately 4:30 p.m. But this will give a chance for Ambassador CdeBaca to give you a preview and answer some of your questions. So without further ado, over to you, Mr. Ambassador.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you, and welcome, everyone. This afternoon, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and Under Secretary of State Maria Otero and I will be unveiling the 2012 Trafficking in Persons Report. This is a statutorily mandated report that comes out of the Victims of Trafficking Protections Act of the year 2000, which was the Clinton Administration's signature antislavery achievement continued and intensified by the Bush Administration and now taken to the next level by the Obama Administration.

We see the trafficking in persons issue and the bipartisan consensus against human trafficking to be something that is in keeping with the core United States values, both as far as how we conceive of ourselves as a nation and how we do our foreign policy and in - very much in keeping with the - this year's 150th anniversary of the Emancipation Proclamation. On September 22nd of this year, we will observe the 150th anniversary of President Lincoln declaring to the world that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall exist. And while that was not self-executing - there was still a war to fight and win - it resulted in the ending of legalized slavery in the United States.

But this promise of freedom, the notion of the universal right to be free, the notion of a universal - a requirement to fight against human trafficking and modern day slavery continues into the modern era, and it is that call that we answer today. This is very much - while we call it human trafficking, it's kind of the new and modern term for an old evil. This is truly what President Obama has called the intolerable yoke of modern slavery.

The annual Trafficking in Persons Report analyzes countries from around the world by looking at what the governments are doing against modern slavery. It does so through the 3P paradigm, in which we look at prevention, protection, and prosecution alike, not simply looking at this as a development issue or a public awareness issue, but also an issue of rehabilitation of victims and bringing the traffickers to justice. This is, as the report says this year, a crime first and foremost.

Now, this particular type of crime, a human rights crime or a civil rights crime as it were, is a crime that more countries and more governments are addressing. The report this year notes that the number of convictions globally reported is up from 3,619 last year to 3,969, and those are convictions of traffickers. That is not, however, a large number when one compares that to the global estimates of the victim population. A study released two weeks ago by the International Labor Organization estimates at least 21 million people held in bondage worldwide, and other estimates show it up to 27 million.

Human trafficking, just very quickly, a definitional point: This is not a crime of movement across borders for prostitution, although that is often how people see it. Both under the United States Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 and under the United Nations Palermo Protocol, the protocol to monitor and combat trafficking in persons from the year 2000, under both of those instruments, trafficking is defined as slavery. It doesn't matter if someone is in their own country; it doesn't matter if they're in sex or if they're in labor. If the person is not free to leave, if the person is unable to go get another position and is being held through some type of coercive force, that person is considered a trafficking victim, and that person is entitled to the protections that we look to governments to provide.

Now, having said that, we've seen the number of victims identified around the world has increased by almost a third. And this is, again, a very heartening piece of data, because it shows that governments are stepping up and are meeting their obligations, and we are very happy to see that 42,291 trafficking victims were identified and helped in the last year.

The issue, of course, continues to be, as I mentioned earlier, that we're looking at that within the context of almost 27 million people who are enslaved in the world. So there's a long way to go. And this report this year, looking at the problems of freedom and what we can do to deliver on it, is very much a challenge for all countries, the United States included, to address this and to intensify our efforts.

Now, one of the things that the report does each year that you may be familiar with is that it arranges countries onto four tiers. Counter-intuitively, those tiers are Tiers 1 through 3. But that is the magic of the congressional action on this. It is Tier 1 which is a country that is complying with the minimum standards to combat trafficking in persons; Tier 2, a country that is not yet compliant but is taking great strides; Tier 2 Watch List, which is basically a country that is in danger of falling down to Tier 3; and Tier 3, which is a country that is not complying with any of the minimum standards and is not working towards that.

We see this year on Tier 3, 17 countries; on Tier 2 Watch List, 42 countries; on Tier 2, 93 countries; and on Tier 1, 33 countries; 186 countries total appear in the report; 185 of them received rankings under the minimum standards. One of them did not, and that is Somalia, which does not have a functioning government such that we could include it in the report.

I would note, however, that even in Somalia, there are heroes of the anti-trafficking fight, particularly a recent prosecution that was brought in Puntland, shows that even in countries where there is not a functioning government, the legal system and others can work together to bring traffickers to justice. Heroes, much like that prosecutor in Somalia, we see that in this global and modern abolitionist fight, there are people whose commitment and whose excellence and whose innovation leaves them to be singled out as heroes of the fight.

And Secretary Clinton will honor 10 such heroes today, those people from countries around the world, from Argentina, to the United States, from Mauritania to Israel, from Greece to the Republic of the Congo. We see people who have done the cutting-edge legal work; we've seen the people who - within government who have brought their government colleagues together to uncover human trafficking cases, to take a stand against official complicity. We also see people who are on the frontlines.

One of the honorees today is a nun who works with human trafficking victims in the Sinai. Another of the heroes that we honor today is a young man who was enslaved for three years on the fishing fleet in Southeast Asia and now, through his art and other activities, is raising awareness of the fact of labor exploitation in the fishing industry. All of these people are heroes, most notably the hero from Mauritania, a woman who was the first female lawyer in that country, and in the last five years has been able to obtain legislation for the first time outlawing slavery in Mauritania.

And I think that that brings us to the conclusion of my remarks. With that, I think, chilling notion that there are countries in the world where the abolition of slavery, the official, legal outlawing of this practice is not something for the history books, it's something within the living memory of the people in those countries. And I think it is a particular challenge as we address this in the modern era.

I will pitch you one thing before I get off and take questions, and that is so much of what is happening on the fight against modern slavery is dependent upon good and solid reporting, and I want to make sure that you know that my office is ready and willing to help you with that. This is an area that actually lends itself well to long-form or investigative reporting, and I think that we've seen with both the longer work and the commitment over the course of a year now that we've seen from CNN International that it's also something that the viewers or the readers very much will respond to. And so we think there's room for everybody, and we are certainly here and will support any of your work as you report on these stories. We're hoping that this isn't just today's news, but something that we can support going forward.

And I will also challenge everybody by saying that one thing that we hear from people in countries around the world is young journalists who want to work on this who look to the American media and others as a resource that can help them learn how to address this and how to investigate this. So we may be calling upon you for more than just press conferences.

Anyway, I'll turn it over for questions at this point. I've got, I think, about 15 minutes where I can answer some questions.

OPERATOR: Thank you. At this time, we will begin the question-and-answer session. If you would like to ask a question, please press *1 on your touchtone phone. Please unmute your phone and record your name clearly at the prompt. Once again, please press *1 if you would like to ask a question.

Our first question today is from Joshua Lipes. Your line is open.

QUESTION: Hi. Ambassador CdeBaca, thank you for your introduction. I was wondering if you could comment a little bit on how - what changes in Burma brought about the increase in the rank from Tier 3 to Tier 2 Watch List this year.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: One of things that we have been very concerned about over the last few years was not simply the human trafficking that we see in Burma of say, for instance, going up to China for sex trafficking or over to Thailand for the labor trafficking as well as sex trafficking, but also the notion of state - basically state-sponsored forced labor that arises from and is - was supported by the 1907 Villages and Towns Act that was being used to justify the forced impressment of villagers and rural folks. And it has everything from porters for the military to working on construction projects and what have you.

And what we've seen over the last year is that the government in Burma has taken a number of significant and frankly unprecedented steps in advancing these reforms. There is a good inter-ministerial working group that had been limited by the Burmese Government's inability to work with other governments around the world, but they - and they've been in existence for several years - had worked within that constraint to actually try to bring on some best practices.

As a result, we've seen improved victim protection measures for victims who've come back from other countries. We've seen the inauguration of a new hotline, which has led to the rescue of 57 victims. And most importantly, this notion of repealing that antiquated law so there's no longer state-sponsored forced labor that is legal in Burma. This is something that not only the United States has worked with the Government of Burma on, but also the International Labor Organization, and I think you may be familiar with some announcements that the ILO made last week as far as that was concerned.

I'll tell you one last thing on Burma, and that is that one of the things I think that many people report on as far as Burma is the longstanding and heroic work that Aung San Suu Kyi has done for democracy building in that country, but people often tend to forget her activism on the issue of human trafficking, on her issue - the issues of forced labor.

The first place that she went outside of Burma when she was able to travel again was to the areas in Thailand where hoards of Burmese migrant workers are exploited and abused in the Thai fish processing plants, and she addressed their abuse. The next place that she went when she went to Europe was to address the ILO. This is a woman who even she was under house arrest sent some of the money from her Nobel Prize to Thailand to be able to care for, shelter, and feed Burmese trafficking victims.

So this is a woman who we - most of us know as a democracy activist, but many of us who work on human trafficking also know her as a good friend and colleague, and frankly, an expert in the field of human trafficking. And I think that her ability to take part in the governance of her own country will bode well for the fight against human trafficking in Burma.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. Luis Alonso, your line is open.

QUESTION: Yes. Hi. Good afternoon. Many thanks for taking this call, Mr. Ambassador. I would like to ask you about Latin America. I see that five countries in the region have improved their tier, and I would like to hear from you whether there is a trend in the region to better fight the traffic of persons. And also, if you could please confirm me whether it's the first time that Nicaragua is placed in Tier 1. Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Of course. I think that there is a trend in Latin America that is improving its efforts. Part of this perhaps comes out of the last few years. There's the action plan now with the Organization of American States, and I think that that has been a very positive framework in which countries can find a way forward.

But I think we've also seen political will. The upgrade recently in the country of Honduras - that was legislation that had been stuck for several years. It wasn't that anyone opposed it; it just never really was going anywhere. We worked with the Honduran Government and were able to come up with a way forward on bipartisan legislation that everyone agreed on for the protection of Hondurans and the protection of others who may in Honduras from labor trafficking and sex trafficking.

So, too, with the Dominican Republic, we saw the Government of the Dominican Republic take on a number of concerns that at first they were a little bit defensive and didn't know what to think about some of these issues and then rolled up their sleeves, got to work, and through political will started putting together the structures in place. And so as a result, we've seen convictions for not only trafficking - excuse me - but also the first labor trafficking convictions in the Dominican Republic, a conviction of two people who forced children into begging rings.

Now, you're correct that this is the first year in which Nicaragua has been on Tier 1 in the Trafficking in Persons Report, and we see this as an improvement over previous years. This year, the Government of Nicaragua convicted nine traffickers. Just look back to 2009, when only two traffickers were brought to justice. This last year, they opened a dedicated shelter for adult human trafficking victims. And I think that's specifically interesting in Central America because so much of the shelter opportunities in Central America are limited to children and are often donor-funded, whether it's American or other religious groups that are taking care of children in Central America. The fact that the Nicaraguan Government stepped up and is putting together services for adult victims was, we think, a very positive step on the part of the Government of Nicaragua.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. Lucia Leal, your line is open.

QUESTION: Hi. Yes. I wanted to ask about the decision to remove Venezuela from the Tier 3 part of the report, if you could describe what kind of progress has led to that, and also the removal of Haiti from the category of special cases, please. Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Of course. Tell me your name again. I didn't hear it very well.

QUESTION: Yes. It's Lucia Leal from Ese.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Oh, okay. Hi, Lucia.

QUESTION: Hi.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I think that what we saw with Venezuela this year was the notion of on the one hand increased public awareness, the public information campaigns, trainings of government officials on human trafficking. Those typically will have an impact. And I think that that's what we saw in Venezuela, is that by committing to doing those trainings and by actually being out and doing those trainings we saw that happening.

What were some of the things we saw? Well, one of the main things that we saw was that there were a couple of traffickers convicted, but more importantly 38 trafficking victims were identified and were helped. And of course, as you know, for us, that's one of the most important things is, is a government helping the victims that they find, whether those are Venezuelan nationals or whether those are foreigners who are in Venezuela.

The other thing that we thought was very notable this year - and again, the minimum standards that we apply, Tier 3 is a country that is not meeting the minimum standards and is not trying to do so. And this is the year we saw the national assembly adopting a reform, a - that's looking at this. This is actually a form of the organized crime law, but one of the things we've seen is that they were working with civil society organizations to try to make sure that that law could be brought into place and strengthened the legal reform and legal framework against trafficking.

So we think that that was a very positive step on the part of the national assembly, and I think that that's - that plus the 24-hour hotline and a few of those other things, we looked at. And when we did the analysis came to the conclusion that this was not a Tier 3 country this year.

As far as Haiti is concerned, Haiti has been on the special case category for several years. And one of the things that we saw over the last year is that the - now the governance situation in Haiti is stable and largely peaceful. President Martelly and his government came to power in the first peaceful transition from an elected administration to the opposition, and the reconstruction efforts and development efforts continue to progress.

So in looking at that, we always look to see what's the situation on the ground. Is there political stability? Are the courts functioning? While there are still some remaining issues as far as parliament and the government and the prime minister and things like this, we see a functioning government now in Haiti at a level that we feel justified bringing them into the report as a ranked country as opposed to on the special case category.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. And the next question is from Hee Jung Yang. Your line is open.

QUESTION: Yes. I would like to ask what was the particular different situation regarding North Korea in terms of human trafficking. And also, I would like to ask whether there has been any cases that U.S. Government prohibited North Korea from getting any loan from the IMF and World Bank because it was recorded as the Third Tier in terms of human trafficking by the State Department's report.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, one of the things that we've seen with North Korea repeatedly over the years is, again, this notion of state-supported forced labor. And we are, of course, concerned not just about forced labor within the country, but also in recent years more and more labor exporting of North Korean, often, men, whether it's into the Middle East, whether it's into especially Russia and other places. And of course, with most countries, when they send workers overseas, it's between the workers, the recruiters, the employers. When the North Koreans send workers overseas, they send the police with them and keep them under surveillance and retaliate against them if they try to fight for their rights or if they try to leave.

So we continue to see the situation of forced labor/human trafficking in North Korea as very grave. The United States is required to vote no in the international financial institutions when countries are on Tier 3 of the trafficking report. That's something, frankly, that the Treasury Department and some others work on, and I don't have an immediate answer for you on that notion of were there votes this year in which the United States voted no on this basis. But it's something that we can look at and we can circle back.

QUESTION: Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. The next question is from Indira Lakshmanan. Your line is open.

QUESTION: Thank you, Ambassador. I wanted to ask - and I apologize if you addressed this at the very top of the briefing because I missed it - but have you gained or lost ground over the last year in the fight on human trafficking? And could -

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: That's a wonderful question, and -

QUESTION: Could you give numbers -

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I did address it a little bit, but I think it's something I want to address again, because -

QUESTION: Okay. Can I just ask specifically - can you tell us how many countries were upgraded, how many were downgraded, and how many people are in slavery right now while you answer that question?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I can totally do that. I will do that again, and like I said, I'm glad to do it, because I think that these are concepts that we really need to make sure people are hearing.

So the number of identified victims around the world - excuse me - these are victims identified by governments in the last year - has increased by 28 percent. In 2011, it was 33,113. In 2012, the number of identified victims by governments was 42,291. That is a 28 percent increase. Convictions are also up by 10 percent from 3,619 to 3,969. Now, conviction numbers typically lag one or two years behind victim identification and investigation numbers because of how long it takes for cases to go through the pipeline.

This last year we saw 7,909 prosecutions initiated as opposed to the year before, which was 6,017 prosecutions initiated. So we do think that we're seeing some real positive movement as far as those numbers are concerned, but those numbers have to be placed in the context of the overarching number of people who are in modern slavery in the world, and that is, per the ILO, at least 21 million people worldwide. There are other researchers that put that number as high as 27 million.

So I think that's the numbers case. I think the upgrade and downgrade question you had asked, this year there are 186 countries on the report; 185 of them were ranked; Somalia was not. This year, Tier 1 of the report, which says that countries are meeting the minimum standards - and I'd caution that that's not saying that countries are doing a great job on this; it's simply that they're meeting the minimum.

QUESTION: I actually got those numbers, because you had read them out, the four tiers, but did you have a number of how many were upgraded and how many were downgraded among the categories?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I don't really count that way.

QUESTION: Okay.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: So it's not something that - as far as kind of what the raw up and down number is, I know - I can tell you how big each of the tiers are compared to how they have been. Tier 2 has gotten a little bit bigger with 93 as opposed to 85 last year. Tiers 1 and Tiers 2 Watch List are basically the same - 33, Tier 1, last year it was 32; Tier 2 Watch List is 42, last year was 41. And Tier 3 is smaller this year by five countries. Last year it was 23, this year is 17.

So there is a little bit of movement up into Tier 2, which means that countries are passing laws. It means that countries are starting to address the situation. They still have a little ways to go, but that's, I think, some - the beginnings, I think, of a real trend. And we also see a number of countries that have prosecuted cases for the first time this year. And so I think that that is also - excuse me - that's something that when you see countries taking that first step, like we saw in Brunei, for instance, like we've seen in Somalia, that is, I think, a very positive step.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. That is the final question for today's call.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you all.

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS MJ88-120620-3917687 StaffFurigay

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

122 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

June 19, 2012 Tuesday 2:36 AM EST

2012 U.S. Department Of State's Trafficking In Persons Report Released

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 543 words

DATELINE: ABUJA, Nigeria

The U.S. Diplomatic Mission issued the following news release:

On June 19, 2012 U.S. Secretary of State, Hillary Rodham Clinton released the Department of State's annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report in a public event in Washington, D.C. In the 2012 TIP Report, Nigeria was downgraded from Tier 1 to Tier 2 status because the Government of Nigeria does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. While the National Agency for Prevention of Trafficking in Persons (NAPTIP) is doing well, it cannot be done without increased support and resources from the Nigerian government. The U.S. continues to support the work of NAPTIP and Nigeria's return to Tier 1 status through continued collaboration and joint training programs.

The Nigerian government has been urged among other remedial measures to ensure the activities of NAPTIP are funded sufficiently, particularly for prosecuting trafficking offenders and providing adequate care for victims; increase investigations and prosecutions of labor trafficking offenses, and convictions and punishments of labor trafficking offenses; and impose adequate sentences on convicted trafficking offenders, including imprisonment when appropriate.

TIP Report Background: The U.S. Congress, through its passage of the 2000 Trafficking Victims Protection Act, as amended (TVPA), requires the Secretary of State to submit an annual Report to Congress. The goal of this Report is to stimulate action and create partnerships around the world in the fight against modern-day slavery. The United States Government approach to combating human trafficking follows the TVPA and the standards set forth in the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, supplementing the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime (commonly known as the "Palermo Protocol"). The TVPA and the Palermo Protocol recognize that the crime of human trafficking includes obtaining or maintaining victims' labor or services (including in the "sex industry") through force, fraud, or coercion, whether overt or through psychological manipulation. Both the TVPA and the Palermo Protocol focus on the exploitation of the victim, and do not require that the victim be moved to be considered trafficked.

Countries determined to be a country of origin, transit, or destination for at least two victims of severe forms of trafficking are included in the Report and assigned to one of three tiers. Countries assessed as fully complying with the "minimum standards for the elimination of severe forms of trafficking" set forth in the TVPA are classified as Tier 1. Countries assessed as not fully complying with the minimum standards, but making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those minimum standards are classified as Tier 2. Countries assessed as neither complying with the minimum standards nor making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance are classified as Tier 3. The TVPA Minimum Standards are generally consistent with the UN TIP Protocol.

The report can be read in full at the U.S. Embassy's website: <http://nigeria.usembassy.gov>

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS MJ88-120622-3920520 StaffFurigay

LOAD-DATE: June 22, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Targeted News Service LLC
All Rights Reserved

123 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
US Fed News

June 19, 2012 Tuesday 12:10 PM EST

2012 TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT

LENGTH: 4091 words

WASHINGTON, June 19 -- The U.S. Department of State issued the following transcript of remarks by the U.S. Secretary of State:

MR. VENTRELL: Hi. And good afternoon everyone, and thank you for joining us. I'm pleased to introduce Ambassador Luis CdeBaca who is our Ambassador-At-Large and Director of our Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. Today's conference call is on the record. He's going to discuss the release of this year's Trafficking in Persons Report, which the Secretary will introduce at 4:00 p.m. Having said that, this call and all of its contents are embargoed until the Secretary finishes speaking at approximately 4:30 p.m. But this will give a chance for Ambassador CdeBaca to give you a preview and answer some of your questions. So without further ado, over to you, Mr. Ambassador.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you, and welcome, everyone. This afternoon, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and Under Secretary of State Maria Otero and I will be unveiling the 2012 Trafficking in Persons Report. This is a statutorily mandated report that comes out of the Victims of Trafficking Protections Act of the year 2000, which was the Clinton Administration's signature antislavery achievement continued and intensified by the Bush Administration and now taken to the next level by the Obama Administration.

We see the trafficking in persons issue and the bipartisan consensus against human trafficking to be something that is in keeping with the core United States values, both as far as how we conceive of ourselves as a nation and how we do our foreign policy and in - very much in keeping with the - this year's 150th anniversary of the Emancipation Proclamation. On September 22nd of this year, we will observe the 150th anniversary of President Lincoln declaring to the world that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall exist. And while that was not self-executing - there was still a war to fight and win - it resulted in the ending of legalized slavery in the United States.

But this promise of freedom, the notion of the universal right to be free, the notion of a universal - a requirement to fight against human trafficking and modern day slavery continues into the modern era, and it is that call that we answer today. This is very much - while we call it human trafficking, it's kind of the new and modern term for an old evil. This is truly what President Obama has called the intolerable yoke of modern slavery.

The annual Trafficking in Persons Report analyzes countries from around the world by looking at what the governments are doing against modern slavery. It does so through the 3P paradigm, in which we look at prevention, protection, and prosecution alike, not simply looking at this as a development issue or a public awareness issue, but also an issue of rehabilitation of victims and bringing the traffickers to justice. This is, as the report says this year, a crime first and foremost.

Now, this particular type of crime, a human rights crime or a civil rights crime as it were, is a crime that more countries and more governments are addressing. The report this year notes that the number of convictions globally reported is up from 3,619 last year to 3,969, and those are convictions of traffickers. That is not, however, a large number when one compares that to the global estimates of the victim population. A study released two weeks ago by the International Labor Organization estimates at least 21 million people held in bondage worldwide, and other estimates show it up to 27 million.

Human trafficking, just very quickly, a definitional point: This is not a crime of movement across borders for prostitution, although that is often how people see it. Both under the United States Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 and under the United Nations Palermo Protocol, the protocol to monitor and combat trafficking in persons from the year 2000, under both of those instruments, trafficking is defined as slavery. It doesn't matter if someone is in their own country; it doesn't matter if they're in sex or if they're in labor. If the person is not free to leave, if the person is unable to go get another position and is being held through some type of coercive force, that person is considered a trafficking victim, and that person is entitled to the protections that we look to governments to provide.

Now, having said that, we've seen the number of victims identified around the world has increased by almost a third. And this is, again, a very heartening piece of data, because it shows that governments are stepping up and are meeting their obligations, and we are very happy to see that 42,291 trafficking victims were identified and helped in the last year.

The issue, of course, continues to be, as I mentioned earlier, that we're looking at that within the context of almost 27 million people who are enslaved in the world. So there's a long way to go. And this report this year, looking at the problems of freedom and what we can do to deliver on it, is very much a challenge for all countries, the United States included, to address this and to intensify our efforts.

Now, one of the things that the report does each year that you may be familiar with is that it arranges countries onto four tiers. Counter-intuitively, those tiers are Tiers 1 through 3. But that is the magic of the congressional action on this. It is Tier 1 which is a country that is complying with the minimum standards to combat trafficking in persons; Tier 2, a country that is not yet compliant but is taking great strides; Tier 2 Watch List, which is basically a country that is in danger of falling down to Tier 3; and Tier 3, which is a country that is not complying with any of the minimum standards and is not working towards that.

We see this year on Tier 3, 17 countries; on Tier 2 Watch List, 42 countries; on Tier 2, 93 countries; and on Tier 1, 33 countries; 186 countries total appear in the report; 185 of them received rankings under the minimum standards. One of them did not, and that is Somalia, which does not have a functioning government such that we could include it in the report.

I would note, however, that even in Somalia, there are heroes of the anti-trafficking fight, particularly a recent prosecution that was brought in Puntland, shows that even in countries where there is not a functioning government, the legal system and others can work together to bring traffickers to justice. Heroes, much like that prosecutor in Somalia, we see that in this global and modern abolitionist fight, there are people whose commitment and whose excellence and whose innovation leaves them to be singled out as heroes of the fight.

And Secretary Clinton will honor 10 such heroes today, those people from countries around the world, from Argentina, to the United States, from Mauritania to Israel, from Greece to the Republic of the Congo. We see people who have done the cutting-edge legal work; we've seen the people who - within government who have brought their government colleagues together to uncover human trafficking cases, to take a stand against official complicity. We also see people who are on the frontlines.

One of the honorees today is a nun who works with human trafficking victims in the Sinai. Another of the heroes that we honor today is a young man who was enslaved for three years on the fishing fleet in Southeast Asia and now, through his art and other activities, is raising awareness of the fact of labor exploitation in the fishing industry. All of these people are heroes, most notably the hero from Mauritania, a woman who was the first female lawyer in that country, and in the last five years has been able to obtain legislation for the first time outlawing slavery in Mauritania.

And I think that that brings us to the conclusion of my remarks. With that, I think, chilling notion that there are countries in the world where the abolition of slavery, the official, legal outlawing of this practice is not something for the history books, it's something within the living memory of the people in those countries. And I think it is a particular challenge as we address this in the modern era.

I will pitch you one thing before I get off and take questions, and that is so much of what is happening on the fight against modern slavery is dependent upon good and solid reporting, and I want to make sure that you know that my office is ready and willing to help you with that. This is an area that actually lends itself well to long-form or investigative reporting, and I think that we've seen with both the longer work and the commitment over the course of a year now that we've seen from CNN International that it's also something that the viewers or the readers very much will respond to. And so we think there's room for everybody, and we are certainly here and will support any of your work as you report on these stories. We're hoping that this isn't just today's news, but something that we can support going forward.

And I will also challenge everybody by saying that one thing that we hear from people in countries around the world is young journalists who want to work on this who look to the American media and others as a resource that can help them learn how to address this and how to investigate this. So we may be calling upon you for more than just press conferences.

Anyway, I'll turn it over for questions at this point. I've got, I think, about 15 minutes where I can answer some questions.

OPERATOR: Thank you. At this time, we will begin the question-and-answer session. If you would like to ask a question, please press *1 on your touchtone phone. Please unmute your phone and record your name clearly at the prompt. Once again, please press *1 if you would like to ask a question.

Our first question today is from Joshua Lipes. Your line is open.

QUESTION: Hi. Ambassador CdeBaca, thank you for your introduction. I was wondering if you could comment a little bit on how - what changes in Burma brought about the increase in the rank from Tier 3 to Tier 2 Watch List this year.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: One of things that we have been very concerned about over the last few years was not simply the human trafficking that we see in Burma of say, for instance, going up to China for sex trafficking or over to Thailand for the labor trafficking as well as sex trafficking, but also the notion of state - basically state-sponsored forced labor that arises from and is - was supported by the 1907 Villages and Towns Act that was being used to justify the forced impressment of villagers and rural folks. And it has everything from porters for the military to working on construction projects and what have you.

And what we've seen over the last year is that the government in Burma has taken a number of significant and frankly unprecedented steps in advancing these reforms. There is a good inter-ministerial working group that had been limited by the Burmese Government's inability to work with other governments around the world, but they - and they've been in existence for several years - had worked within that constraint to actually try to bring on some best practices.

As a result, we've seen improved victim protection measures for victims who've come back from other countries. We've seen the inauguration of a new hotline, which has led to the rescue of 57 victims. And most importantly, this notion of repealing that antiquated law so there's no longer state-sponsored forced labor that is legal in Burma. This is something that not only the United States has worked with the Government of Burma on, but also the International Labor Organization, and I think you may be familiar with some announcements that the ILO made last week as far as that was concerned.

I'll tell you one last thing on Burma, and that is that one of the things I think that many people report on as far as Burma is the longstanding and heroic work that Aung San Suu Kyi has done for democracy building in that country, but people often tend to forget her activism on the issue of human trafficking, on her issue - the issues of forced labor.

The first place that she went outside of Burma when she was able to travel again was to the areas in Thailand where hoards of Burmese migrant workers are exploited and abused in the Thai fish processing plants, and she addressed their abuse. The next place that she went when she went to Europe was to address the ILO. This is a woman who even she was under house arrest sent some of the money from her Nobel Prize to Thailand to be able to care for, shelter, and feed Burmese trafficking victims.

So this is a woman who we - most of us know as a democracy activist, but many of us who work on human trafficking also know her as a good friend and colleague, and frankly, an expert in the field of human trafficking. And I think that her ability to take part in the governance of her own country will bode well for the fight against human trafficking in Burma.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. Luis Alonso, your line is open.

QUESTION: Yes. Hi. Good afternoon. Many thanks for taking this call, Mr. Ambassador. I would like to ask you about Latin America. I see that five countries in the region have improved their tier, and I would like to hear from you whether there is a trend in the region to better fight the traffic of persons. And also, if you could please confirm me whether it's the first time that Nicaragua is placed in Tier 1. Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Of course. I think that there is a trend in Latin America that is improving its efforts. Part of this perhaps comes out of the last few years. There's the action plan now with the Organization of American States, and I think that that has been a very positive framework in which countries can find a way forward.

But I think we've also seen political will. The upgrade recently in the country of Honduras - that was legislation that had been stuck for several years. It wasn't that anyone opposed it; it just never really was going anywhere. We worked with the Honduran Government and were able to come up with a way forward on bipartisan legislation that everyone agreed on for the protection of Hondurans and the protection of others who may in Honduras from labor trafficking and sex trafficking.

So, too, with the Dominican Republic, we saw the Government of the Dominican Republic take on a number of concerns that at first they were a little bit defensive and didn't know what to think about some of these issues and then rolled up their sleeves, got to work, and through political will started putting together the structures in place. And so as a result, we've seen convictions for not only trafficking - excuse me - but also the first labor trafficking convictions in the Dominican Republic, a conviction of two people who forced children into begging rings.

Now, you're correct that this is the first year in which Nicaragua has been on Tier 1 in the Trafficking in Persons Report, and we see this as an improvement over previous years. This year, the Government of Nicaragua convicted nine traffickers. Just look back to 2009, when only two traffickers were brought to justice. This last year, they opened a dedicated shelter for adult human trafficking victims. And I think that's specifically interesting in Central America because so much of the shelter opportunities in Central America are limited to children and are often donor-funded, whether it's American or other religious groups that are taking care of children in Central America. The fact that the Nicaraguan Government stepped up and is putting together services for adult victims was, we think, a very positive step on the part of the Government of Nicaragua.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. Lucia Leal, your line is open.

QUESTION: Hi. Yes. I wanted to ask about the decision to remove Venezuela from the Tier 3 part of the report, if you could describe what kind of progress has led to that, and also the removal of Haiti from the category of special cases, please. Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Of course. Tell me your name again. I didn't hear it very well.

QUESTION: Yes. It's Lucia Leal from Ese.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Oh, okay. Hi, Lucia.

QUESTION: Hi.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I think that what we saw with Venezuela this year was the notion of on the one hand increased public awareness, the public information campaigns, trainings of government officials on human trafficking. Those typically will have an impact. And I think that that's what we saw in Venezuela, is that by committing to doing those trainings and by actually being out and doing those trainings we saw that happening.

What were some of the things we saw? Well, one of the main things that we saw was that there were a couple of traffickers convicted, but more importantly 38 trafficking victims were identified and were helped. And of course, as you know, for us, that's one of the most important things is, is a government helping the victims that they find, whether those are Venezuelan nationals or whether those are foreigners who are in Venezuela.

The other thing that we thought was very notable this year - and again, the minimum standards that we apply, Tier 3 is a country that is not meeting the minimum standards and is not trying to do so. And this is the year we saw the national assembly adopting a reform, a - that's looking at this. This is actually a form of the organized crime law, but one of the things we've seen is that they were working with civil society organizations to try to make sure that that law could be brought into place and strengthened the legal reform and legal framework against trafficking.

So we think that that was a very positive step on the part of the national assembly, and I think that that's - that plus the 24-hour hotline and a few of those other things, we looked at. And when we did the analysis came to the conclusion that this was not a Tier 3 country this year.

As far as Haiti is concerned, Haiti has been on the special case category for several years. And one of the things that we saw over the last year is that the - now the governance situation in Haiti is stable and largely peaceful. President Martelly and his government came to power in the first peaceful transition from an elected administration to the opposition, and the reconstruction efforts and development efforts continue to progress.

So in looking at that, we always look to see what's the situation on the ground. Is there political stability? Are the courts functioning? While there are still some remaining issues as far as parliament and the government and the prime minister and things like this, we see a functioning government now in Haiti at a level that we feel justified bringing them into the report as a ranked country as opposed to on the special case category.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. And the next question is from Hee Jung Yang. Your line is open.

QUESTION: Yes. I would like to ask what was the particular different situation regarding North Korea in terms of human trafficking. And also, I would like to ask whether there has been any cases that U.S. Government prohibited North Korea from getting any loan from the IMF and World Bank because it was recorded as the Third Tier in terms of human trafficking by the State Department's report.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, one of the things that we've seen with North Korea repeatedly over the years is, again, this notion of state-supported forced labor. And we are, of course, concerned not just about forced labor within the country, but also in recent years more and more labor exporting of North Korean, often, men, whether it's into the Middle East, whether it's into especially Russia and other places. And of course, with most countries, when they send workers overseas, it's between the workers, the recruiters, the employers. When the North Koreans send workers overseas, they send the police with them and keep them under surveillance and retaliate against them if they try to fight for their rights or if they try to leave.

So we continue to see the situation of forced labor/human trafficking in North Korea as very grave. The United States is required to vote no in the international financial institutions when countries are on Tier 3 of the trafficking report. That's something, frankly, that the Treasury Department and some others work on, and I don't have an immediate answer for you on that notion of were there votes this year in which the United States voted no on this basis. But it's something that we can look at and we can circle back.

QUESTION: Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. The next question is from Indira Lakshmanan. Your line is open.

QUESTION: Thank you, Ambassador. I wanted to ask - and I apologize if you addressed this at the very top of the briefing because I missed it - but have you gained or lost ground over the last year in the fight on human trafficking? And could -

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: That's a wonderful question, and -

QUESTION: Could you give numbers -

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I did address it a little bit, but I think it's something I want to address again, because -

QUESTION: Okay. Can I just ask specifically - can you tell us how many countries were upgraded, how many were downgraded, and how many people are in slavery right now while you answer that question?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I can totally do that. I will do that again, and like I said, I'm glad to do it, because I think that these are concepts that we really need to make sure people are hearing.

So the number of identified victims around the world - excuse me - these are victims identified by governments in the last year - has increased by 28 percent. In 2011, it was 33,113. In 2012, the number of identified victims by governments was 42,291. That is a 28 percent increase. Convictions are also up by 10 percent from 3,619 to 3,969. Now, conviction numbers typically lag one or two years behind victim identification and investigation numbers because of how long it takes for cases to go through the pipeline.

This last year we saw 7,909 prosecutions initiated as opposed to the year before, which was 6,017 prosecutions initiated. So we do think that we're seeing some real positive movement as far as those numbers are concerned, but those numbers have to be placed in the context of the overarching number of people who are in modern slavery in the world, and that is, per the ILO, at least 21 million people worldwide. There are other researchers that put that number as high as 27 million.

So I think that's the numbers case. I think the upgrade and downgrade question you had asked, this year there are 186 countries on the report; 185 of them were ranked; Somalia was not. This year, Tier 1 of the report, which says that countries are meeting the minimum standards - and I'd caution that that's not saying that countries are doing a great job on this; it's simply that they're meeting the minimum.

QUESTION: I actually got those numbers, because you had read them out, the four tiers, but did you have a number of how many were upgraded and how many were downgraded among the categories?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I don't really count that way.

QUESTION: Okay.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: So it's not something that -as far as kind of what the raw up and down number is, I know - I can tell you how big each of the tiers are compared to how they have been. Tier 2 has gotten a little bit bigger with 93 as opposed to 85 last year. Tiers 1 and Tiers 2 Watch List are basically the same - 33, Tier 1, last year it was 32; Tier 2 Watch List is 42, last year was 41. And Tier 3 is smaller this year by five countries. Last year it was 23, this year is 17.

So there is a little bit of movement up into Tier 2, which means that countries are passing laws. It means that countries are starting to address the situation. They still have a little ways to go, but that's, I think, some - the beginnings, I think, of a real trend. And we also see a number of countries that have prosecuted cases for the first time this year. And so I think that that is also - excuse me - that's something that when you see countries taking that first step, like we saw in Brunei, for instance, like we've seen in Somalia, that is, I think, a very positive step.

QUESTION: Thank you.

OPERATOR: Thank you. That is the final question for today's call.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you all. For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

124 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Online

June 19, 2012 Tuesday 8:45 PM GMT

US adds Syria to human trafficking blacklist

BYLINE: By BRADLEY KLAPPER, Associated Press

SECTION: WASHINGTON DATELINE

LENGTH: 684 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The Obama administration on Tuesday added Syria to the list of countries that could face U.S. sanctions for not doing enough to combat trafficking. Sixteen other nations were included among those not even making significant efforts to meet minimum standards, while Venezuela and Myanmar were among those removed from the group of worst offenders.

In its annual Trafficking in Persons report, the State Department said that Syrian President Bashar Assad's regime fails to investigate and punish offenses or offer protective services to victims. It says thousands of women, from countries such as Indonesia, the Philippines and Somalia, have been trafficked into forced labor and prostitution in Syria after being falsely recruited by employment agencies as domestic servants.

Traffickers in Syria particularly prey on Syria's large Iraqi refugee population, said the report, which analyzed conditions in more than 180 nations, including the United States, and ranked them in terms of their effectiveness in fighting what many term modern-day slavery. The State Department says up to 27 million men, women and children may live in such bondage around the world.

"These victims of modern slavery are women and men, girls and boys, and their stories remind us of what kind of inhumane treatment we are still capable of as human beings," Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton said. "Some are lured to another country with false promises of a good job or opportunities for their families. Others can be exploited right where they grew up, where they now live."

Seventeen countries in all were included in the worst-offending group of countries not reaching minimum international standards to fight the scourge, which claims mainly women and children as victims, and not making any significant effort to do so. That's down from 23 last year. More than 40 other nations were placed on a watch list that could lead to sanctions unless their records improve.

Venezuela still doesn't fully comply with minimum standards to eliminate trafficking, but is now making an important effort, the report said. President Hugo Chavez's government has clashed repeatedly with Washington over the last decade, but it was commended it for strengthening anti-trafficking laws, undertaking public information campaigns and training law enforcement and borders personnel in prevention.

"However, prosecution and conviction efforts appeared to remain weak, and specialized victim services were lacking," said the report, which included Venezuela on the U.S. watch list. The efforts of Nicaragua, another Latin America country with a leftist government that has been at odds with the U.S., also were recognized. It joined the list of countries in full compliance.

Myanmar, also known as Burma, was urged to continue with its "unprecedented steps" to address trafficking after long being considered among the world's worst respector of labor rights.

Luis CdeBaca, U.S. ambassador-at-large for human trafficking issues, said Burma's status was upgraded after the government repealed an antiquated law that had been used to justify forced labor and replaced it with a law expressly forbidding the practice. The government made progress identifying and helping victims, and a national trafficking hotline introduced in September has led to the rescue of 57 victims.

Nevertheless, the report said many Burmese men, women and children traveling abroad for work are subjected to forced labor or sex trafficking, as trafficking by both private individuals and government officials "continues to be a significant problem." The military conscripts child soldiers and is the leading perpetrator of forced labor within the country, particularly in conflict-prone ethnic areas.

Beyond Syria, the blacklist includes Algeria, Central African Republic, Congo, Cuba, Equatorial Guinea, Eritrea, Iran, North Korea, Kuwait, Libya, Madagascar, Papua New Guinea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Yemen and Zimbabwe.

U.S. NATO ally Portugal was dropped from the top tier into the list of countries not quite reaching minimum standards, while Israel was promoted to the top group.

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Associated Press
All Rights Reserved

125 of 492 DOCUMENTS

The Nation (Thailand)

June 15, 2012 Friday

Thailand, Myanmar fight human trafficking

BYLINE: The NationLENGTH: 453 words

Thanapat Kitjakosol

The Nation

Chiang Rai

Thailand and Myanmar continue trying to fight human trafficking, with the latter establishing more centres along border towns such as Myawaddy and Koh Song to tackle the problem. However, the situation in Thailand continues to worsen, with more young people becoming victims.

Despite the implementation of the 2008 Prevention and Suppression of Human Trafficking Act, Thailand was included in the United States' "Tier 2 Watch List" in 2010 and 2011, with the number of cases getting particularly severe in the North.

The crime includes forcing women to become surrogate mothers, luring them into hard labour or prostitution abroad via marriage to foreigners, and luring men to become forced labourers on fishing boats. The victims include women and children from Uzbekistan and Vietnam as well as minorities from China.

Pol Captain Yin Yin Aye, chief of the Thai-Myanmar border coordination centre against human trafficking in Tachilek township, said the centre had dealt with 11 major cases since it was set up in 2006. She said most of the victims were women, and the centre had rehabilitated them before returning them to their families.

Cooperation in running anti-trafficking centres continues on both sides of the border, with Thailand having set one up in Chiang Rai's Mae Sai district.

Mae Sai immigration police inspector Pat Pantanapon said Chiang Rai was known as the starting point for transnational human-trafficking gangs.

Social Development and Human Security permanent secretary Wichien Chawalit said his office had also taken many measures to control human trafficking. He urged members of the public to participate by keeping an eye out and providing information via the 1300 hotline.

Department of Special Investigation inspector Pol Major Jatuporn Arunreukthawil said his anti-trafficking centre would take up cases that were more complicated or tied up with other countries.

He said cases within the human-trafficking frame included gangs smuggling workers over the border, luring women into prostitution, forcing women to become surrogate mothers and buying children from their parents and forcing them to beg on the street. He said some children refused to return home as their parents had sold them at least four times.

Saying that human-trafficking cases in the upper North had been rising every year, the manager of the Foundation of Child Understanding, Duan Wongsas, said 13-to-18-year-old Thais fell victim to prostitution gangs, but these cases received less attention than those involving foreigners.

The comments and data were presented at the Social Development and Human Security Ministry's workshop attended by 50 media members on May 18 and 19 in Chiang Rai.

LOAD-DATE: June 14, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 Nation Multimedia Group
All Rights Reserved

126 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Cape Times (South Africa)

June 06, 2012 Wednesday
E1 Edition

'Revolutionary' trafficking bill gets go-ahead

BYLINE: Deon de Lange Political Bureau

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 5

LENGTH: 763 words

EFFORTS to stamp out human trafficking received a boost yesterday when Parliament's justice committee adopted the long-awaited Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill.

Once enacted, the new law will provide a co-ordinated response to all forms of human trafficking, set out the social services that victims will be entitled to, and will prescribe punishments for those found guilty of trafficking offences - including the possibility of life behind bars and fines of up to R100 million.

The bill was to have been completed in time for the World Cup after civil society groups warned the event would attract dealing in people - primarily sex workers.

However, once the scale of the task became clear, lawmakers abandoned this deadline and opted for a single, comprehensive law instead of a piecemeal approach.

The US first placed SA on its human trafficking watchlist in 2004. In a follow-up report in 2008, the US State Department noted that SA did not have any laws specifically aimed at combating trafficking and did not "fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking", despite being a signatory to UN protocols against trafficking.

"South African girls are trafficked within their country for the purposes of commercial sexual exploitation and domestic servitude, while boys are trafficked for use in street vending, food service and agriculture," the report stated.

It said women from elsewhere on the continent were brought to SA, while locals were duped or sold into domestic servitude in Ireland, the Middle East and the US.

Existing laws - the Prevention of Organised Crime Act, the Sexual Offences Act and the Children's Act - have been used to combat certain aspects of human trafficking.

The proposed law includes a legal definition for "slavery" - nearly 200 years after abolitionist William Wilberforce's campaign to end slavery in the British Empire culminated in the passing of the Slavery Abolition Act in 1833. Slavery is defined as "reducing a person by any means to a state of submitting to the control of another person as if that other person were the owner of that person".

The new law will enable authorities to seize property used during or for the commission of a trafficking offence. It will also punish landlords who allow their buildings to be used if they knew or "ought reasonably to have known or suspected" they would be used for this purpose.

Crucially, any person who benefits from the services or labour of a victim will be guilty of an offence.

Electronic communications service providers, such as internet service providers and cellphone network providers, who become aware of any of their services being used to facilitate trafficking and who fail to report this, will be guilty of an offence.

While the bill stops short of requiring them to monitor their networks for such information, they will have to hand over customer information at the request of the police if such activities are brought to light. The bill indemnifies such companies from any loss sustained or damage caused by the release of this otherwise confidential information, provided this was done in good faith to reveal trafficking offences. The law will punish the parents or guardians of minors who consent to their exploitation.

The extra-territorial scope of the bill will grant SA courts jurisdiction to try cases involving trafficking offences committed anywhere in the world if such acts would have constituted an offence under the new law in SA.

The bill establishes mechanisms by which undocumented foreigners living in SA could be temporarily spared deportation if they can contribute to the investigation or prosecution of a trafficking offence. Victims in the country without documentation will be assisted to obtain residency if they risk harm by assisting local authorities or face harm if repatriated to their country of origin.

In what one MP described as a "revolutionary" approach, victims will not have to go to the civil courts to claim compensation. The law will grant courts jurisdiction to order a person convicted of a trafficking offence to pay his or her victims compensation as part of the criminal trial.

Compensation could be claimed for damage to or the loss or destruction of property (including monetary loss); physical or psychological injuries; becoming infected with a life-threatening disease; or the loss of income or support. In another first, carriers will be held liable if a court finds that they knowingly or ought reasonably to have known or even suspected that they were transporting trafficked people.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: CT

127 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

The Mercury (South Africa)

June 06, 2012 Wednesday
E2 Edition

Parliament moves to stamp out human trafficking

BYLINE: Deon de Lange Political Bureau

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 2

LENGTH: 483 words

EFFORTS to stamp out human trafficking received a boost yesterday when Parliament's justice committee adopted the long-awaited Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill.

Once enacted, the new law will provide a co-ordinated response to all forms of human trafficking, set out the social services that victims will be entitled to, and will prescribe punishments for those found guilty of trafficking offences - including the possibility of life behind bars and fines of up to R100 million.

The bill was to have been completed in time for the 2010 World Cup after civil society groups warned the event would attract dealing in people - primarily sex workers.

However, once the scale of the task became clear, lawmakers abandoned this deadline and opted for a single, comprehensive law instead of a piecemeal approach to the problem.

The US first placed SA on its human trafficking watchlist in 2004. In a follow-up report in 2008, the US State Department noted that SA did not have any laws specifically aimed at combating trafficking and did not "fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking", despite being a signatory to UN protocols against trafficking.

"South African girls are trafficked within their country for the purposes of commercial sexual exploitation and domestic servitude, while boys are trafficked internally for use in street vending, food services and agriculture," the report stated.

It said women from elsewhere on the continent were brought to SA, while locals were duped or sold into domestic servitude in Ireland, the Middle East and the US.

Existing laws - the Prevention of Organised Crime Act, the Sexual Offences Act and the Children's Act - have been used to combat certain aspects of human trafficking.

The proposed law includes a legal definition of "slavery" - nearly 200 years after abolitionist William Wilberforce's campaign to end slavery in the British Empire culminated in the passing of the Slavery Abolition Act in 1833.

Slavery is defined as "reducing a person by any means to a state of submitting to the control of another person as if that other person were the owner of that person".

Punish

To attack the nexus of human trafficking and organised crime, the new law will enable authorities to seize property used during or for the commission of a trafficking offence.

It will also punish landlords who allow their buildings to be used if they knew or "ought reasonably to have known or suspected" they would be used for this purpose.

Crucially, any person who benefits from the services or labour of a victim will be guilty of an offence.

Electronic communications service providers who become aware that their services are being used to facilitate trafficking and who fail to report this, will be guilty of an offence.

The law will also punish the parents or guardians of minors who consent to their children's exploitation.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: NM

Copyright 2012 Independent News and Media Ltd
All Rights Reserved

128 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

The Star (South Africa)

June 06, 2012 Wednesday
E2 Edition

Tough legislation meant to stamp out all forms of human trafficking

BYLINE: Deon de Lange

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 6

LENGTH: 488 words

EFFORTS to stamp out human trafficking received a boost yesterday when Parliament's justice committee adopted the long-awaited Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill.

Once enacted, the new law will provide a co-ordinated response to all forms of human trafficking, set out the social services that victims will be entitled to, and prescribe punishments for those guilty of trafficking offences - including possible life behind bars and fines of up to R100 million.

The bill was to have been completed in time for the 2010 Fifa World Cup after civil society groups warned the event would attract dealing in people, primarily sex workers.

However, once the scale of the task became clear, lawmakers abandoned this deadline and opted for a single, comprehensive law instead of a piecemeal approach to the problem.

The US first placed SA on its human trafficking watchlist in 2004. In a follow-up report in 2008, the US State Department noted that SA did not have any laws specifically aimed at combating trafficking and did not "fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking", despite being a signatory to UN protocols against trafficking.

"South African girls are trafficked within their country for the purposes of commercial sexual exploitation and domestic servitude, while boys are trafficked internally for use in street vending, food service and agriculture," the report stated.

It said women from elsewhere on the continent were brought to SA, while locals were duped or sold into domestic servitude in Ireland, the Middle East and the US.

To attack the nexus of human trafficking and organised crime, the new law will enable authorities to seize property used during or for the commission of a trafficking offence. It will also punish landlords who allow their buildings to be used if they knew or "ought reasonably to have known or suspected" they would be used for this purpose.

Crucially, any person who benefits from the services or labour of a victim will be guilty of an offence.

Electronic communications service providers, such as internet service providers and cellphone network providers, aware of any of their services being used to facilitate trafficking and who fail to report this will be guilty of an offence.

While the bill stops short of requiring them to monitor their networks for such information, they will have to hand over customer information at the request of the police if such activities are brought to light.

The law will punish parents or guardians of minors who consent to their exploitation.

Also, the extra-territorial scope of the bill will grant SA courts jurisdiction to try cases involving trafficking offences committed anywhere in the world if such acts would have been an offence in SA.

The bill, which enjoys cross-party support, will now go to the National Assembly for a debate and a vote, before being referred to the National Council of Provinces.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: SW

Copyright 2012 Independent News and Media Ltd
All Rights Reserved

129 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

May 31, 2012 Thursday 5:05 PM TST

Taiwan holds Asian forum on human trafficking

BYLINE: Christie Chen

LENGTH: 601 words

DATELINE: Taipei, May 31

An Asian forum on human trafficking was held Thursday in Taipei to facilitate international cooperation in the fight against human trafficking in the region, the National Immigration Agency said that day.

The forum, the first of its kind held in Taiwan, was attended by 33 government officials, scholars and NGO workers from 12 Asian-Pacific countries, including Cambodia, Vietnam, Thailand and Indonesia, as well as foreign dignitaries based in Taiwan.

At the event, representatives from Taiwan's immigration, labor and NGO sectors gave speeches on the prevention of the crime, implementation of anti-human trafficking policies and protection measures for victims in Taiwan.

Joe Parker, assistant regional security officer from the American Institute in Taiwan, also shared the U.S. experience in fighting human trafficking.

At the forum, foreign delegates also asked questions ranging from Taiwan's measures to protect undocumented foreign workers and its benefits for pregnant foreign workers to how the country ensures that workers entering the country are above the legal working age.

Hsieh Li-kung, director-general of the agency, told CNA that his agency organized this forum because it hopes to play a "more active" role in clamping down on human trafficking in the region.

"Many of the human trafficking victims in Taiwan come from Asian countries, so the most practical way (to combat the crime) would be to first cooperate with our neighbors," Hsieh said.

"We hope that not only Taiwan, but all Asian countries can eventually be listed as a "tier 1 country," Hsieh said, stressing the importance of transnational efforts to crack down on human trafficking.

Taiwan was listed as a "tier 1 country" in the U.S. State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report in 2010 and 2011, meaning that Taiwan has complied fully with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking.

The only other Asian country to receive the ranking is South Korea.

Meanwhile, Interior Minister Lee Hong-yuan said at the opening of the forum that he hopes the forum can help Taiwan establish partnerships with Asian countries and "facilitate an international network."

Hsieh said his agency is currently holding talks with a number of Southeast Asian countries to sign memorandums of understanding that would allow Taiwan and these countries to hold joint training sessions and share intelligence on trafficking crimes.

Mary Ann C. Velasco, supervisor of the Travel Control Enforcement Unit of the Philippines' Bureau of Immigration, told CNA "it's about time" for Taiwan and the Philippines to sign such an agreement, given the large number of Filipino workers in Taiwan.

Many Filipino workers who have received permits to work in Taiwan often leave the Philippines on tourist visas for speedier exits, making it hard for the Philippines to accurately track the number of its nationals working in Taiwan.

She said it would greatly help the prevention of human trafficking if the two sides could cooperate on a reporting mechanism that gave details of Filipino workers entering Taiwan.

"The forum gave us much practical information about Taiwan's anti-human trafficking measures," said Samarn Laodamrongchai, a researcher at the Asian Research Center for Migration at Thailand's Chulalongkorn University.

Laodamrongchai, who specializes in issues involving Thai workers in Taiwan, urged a government-level agreement between the two countries, saying that it would offer more legal protection for victims of human trafficking or labor exploitation.

Thailand is one of the countries with which Taiwan is seeking to sign such agreements.

LOAD-DATE: May 31, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Central News Agency
All Rights Reserved

130 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

STAR

May 30, 2012 Wednesday 5:34 PM TST

Participants in human trafficking forum visit immigrant call center

BYLINE: Johnson Sun and Kendra Lin

LENGTH: 340 words

DATELINE: Taipei, May 30

Immigration officials from 12 Asian countries and non-government organizations who are attending a forum in Taiwan on the fight against human trafficking visited a call center for a 24-hour protection hotline for immigrant workers Wednesday.

On the second day of the forum being hosted for the first time by Taiwan to discuss cooperation on fighting human trafficking in Asia, 33 officials, NGO representatives and eight diplomats were introduced to the counseling service run by the National Immigration Agency (NIA).

The 1955 hotline, launched in 2009, has recruited foreign spouses from Asian countries such as the Philippines, Indonesia and Vietnam as call receivers as part of efforts to provide better services to new immigrants, many of whom come from Southeast Asia.

The new immigrants, as well as their employers, can use the hotline to seek legal counseling, register complaints or obtain protection services.

Human trafficking cases are often cross-border crimes, said NIA Director-General Hsieh Li-kung, who added that some of the more complicated human trafficking crimes need further cooperation among nations to combat them.

Taiwan, ranked Tier 1 in the 2010 and 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report released by U.S. Department of State, will share its experience in fighting human trafficking with the other participating countries, which include Japan, South Korea, Singapore, Thailand and Australia.

Tier 1 countries consist of those that comply fully with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking as set forth by the U.S. Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000.

In addition to the forum, Taiwan is also continuing to seek memorandums of understanding on the prevention of human trafficking with other countries, Hsieh added.

The forum, which runs through June 1, will be highlighted Thursday by three workshops on various aspects of the issue.

The representatives will also visit two facilities in Taipei and Nantou, central Taiwan that provide shelter for human trafficking victims, according to the agency.

LOAD-DATE: May 30, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

131 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Pakistan Observer Blog

May 22, 2012 Tuesday 8:39 AM EST

LEAs capture 6,835 human traffickers

LENGTH: 322 words

Islamabad: Law Enforcement Agencies (LEAs) in the country have arrested more than 6,835 persons allegedly involved in illegal human trafficking during the last four years. As per data, 1642 smugglers or traffickers were arrested in 2008, 1775 in 2009, 1779 in 2010 and 1639 were apprehended during 2011. In addition, 1,842 Proclaimed Offenders (POs) were also nabbed during the period with 376 arrests in 2008, 441 in 2009, 522 in 2010 and 503 POs in 2011.

An official source on Friday said 507 Court Absconders (COs) were also arrested during the last four years with year wise details of 77 in 2008, 54 in 2009, 200 in 2010 and 176 in 2011. He said thanks to steps taken by Ministry of Interior and introduction of different methods that Pakistan got upgraded from Tier-II Watch List to Tier-II in Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP Report) published by US State Department and maintained the same status during 2011 whereby 188 countries around the global were categorized. This report has direct impact on US and UN financial aid.

He said the Agency was giving priority to control the illegal human trafficking in the country and in this regard it had successfully launched Integrated Border Management System (IBMS) at Islamabad and Peshawar airports. The other measures were installation of Edison System at major airports through Australian High Commission, creation of Immigration Intelligence Unit (IIU) in collaboration with UK, creation of Transnational Crime Unit (TCU) with collaboration of Australia.

He said all these measures have helped drastic reduction in number of Deportees on Fake Documents (DFDs). The official said traffic handled at airports during the last four years was 34.5 million, of which 7.8 million in 2008, 8.2 million in 2009, 8.7 million in 2010 and 9.8 million traffic was handled during 2011.

During the period, 2114 persons were Off-loaded On Fake Documents (OFDs) with details including 572 in 2008.

LOAD-DATE: May 22, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Blog

JOURNAL-CODE: APAK-115001

Copyright 2012 Newstex LLC
All Rights Reserved
Newstex Web Blogs
Copyright 2012 Pakistan Observer

132 of 492 DOCUMENTS

The Edge Malaysia

May 21, 2012

My Say: We can, t stay blind to migrant workers, rights

BYLINE: R B Bhattacharjee

LENGTH: 1044 words

Issues relating to migrants have been in the news since the 1970s, when the country, s economic development created a growing demand for workers, which began to attract plane- and ferry-loads of people from neighbouring countries looking for a better life on our shores.

Today, the migrant population in Malaysia is around two million documented and 1.9 million undocumented workers, according to the US State Department, s Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report 2011. This report is described on the State Department, s website as , the world, s most comprehensive resource of governmental anti-human trafficking efforts, . The 2011 Report surveys 184 countries, including the US.

In the report, the State Department places each country in one of three tiers based on the extent of their governments, efforts to comply with the , minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, as described in the US, Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA). For the second consecutive year, Malaysia was placed in the Tier 2 Watch List, facing a possible downgrade to Tier 3, the category for countries that do not fully comply with the minimum standards under the TVPA and are not making significant efforts to do so.

On two occasions, in 2007 and 2009, Malaysia was placed in Tier 3. However, it enacted the Anti-Trafficking in Persons and Anti-Smuggling of Migrants Act 2007 and opened shelters for victims of human trafficking. This resulted in the country, s elevation to the Tier 2 Watch List in 2008. However, in 2009, Malaysia fell again to Tier 3, leading the government to draft a national plan of action to address human trafficking.

The 2011 report notes that the government still does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, but is making significant efforts to do so.

Human trafficking covers a range of activities in which one person holds another in forced service, the report states. These include forced labour, sex trafficking, bonded labour, debt bondage, involuntary domestic servitude and forced child labour. In truth, these are various forms of modern day slavery.

Anyone who needs confirmation that significant numbers of victims of human trafficking exist in Malaysia can read the current TIP Report or a range of other documents available online that discuss the problem.

The crux of the matter is the unpalatable truth that too few Malaysians are concerned enough to make their feelings known that many migrants are being denied their human rights. If more people would do so, our leaders would surely take notice and press for better protection for these workers.

It is as simple as that. The TIP Report would then have far less reason to make statements like these:

, Many migrant workers in plantations, construction sites, textile factories and employed as domestic workers throughout Malaysia are subject to practices indicative of trafficking such as restrictions on movement, deceit and fraud in wages, passport confiscation or debt bondage at the hands of agents or employers. Passport confiscation is widespread, and there were reports that employers also opened joint bank accounts as a form of control on workers.,

If Malaysians do not tolerate such treatment from their employers, by what rationale do we allow migrant workers to be subject to such conditions? This is a question that we as a society need to ask ourselves. The answer would partly explain why neighbouring countries have repeatedly banned their citizens from coming to work in Malaysia.

Sadly, the situations described so far are somewhat milder than some of the abuses that migrant workers are subjected to. To quote the TIP Report:

, Many Malaysian labour outsourcing companies recruit excess workers from Bangladesh, Vietnam and other countries, who are then often held in warehouses or other locations and handed over to unscrupulous employers, who subject them to conditions of forced labour.,

Exploitation comes in various forms. Some employers reportedly did not pay their foreign domestic workers three to six months' wages in order to recoup recruitment agency fees and other debt-bonds charged to employers, the report states. In some cases, employers illegally withheld employee wages in escrow until completion of the contract, forcing workers to continue working for fear of not receiving their pay if they stop.

Unfortunately, it gets much worse for others, sometimes involving public institutions. During the report period, the RELA volunteer corps continued to conduct raids targeting illegal migrant communities and detained refugees, asylum seekers and trafficking victims along with allegedly illegal migrants, though this practice had reportedly decreased compared to previous years.

The report notes further that while the number of convictions under the Anti-Trafficking in Persons and Anti-Smuggling of Migrants Act increased and public awareness efforts on trafficking continued, the government did not effectively investigate and prosecute labour trafficking cases, and failed to address its own complicity in trafficking as well as the lack of effective victim care and counselling by authorities. Many serious concerns remained regarding trafficking in Malaysia, including the detention of trafficking victims in government facilities, it said.

Moreover, while the network involved in the trafficking of Myanmar nationals to Thailand was believed to be substantial, this was not reflected in the record of prosecutions. The acquittal rate of alleged trafficking offenders was high, which observers attributed to the lack of adequate victim-witness protection and poor judicial training on human trafficking.

These issues are merely one part of the complicated web of human trafficking that has merged into the fabric of Malaysian society. The misery that it causes for the most vulnerable victims of this underground economic activity is nothing short of harrowing. It has also been documented well enough to satisfy the most sceptical of critics.

The thought that large numbers of migrant workers in our midst are subject to such oppression ought to move us to change the way they are treated. At the very least, it should be robbing us of our sleep.

R B Bhattacharjee is associate editor at The Edge

LOAD-DATE: May 21, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

133 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
The Balochistan Times (AsiaNet)

May 19, 2012 Saturday

LEAs capture 6,835 illegal human traffickers in four years

SECTION: Vol. XXXVI No. 139

LENGTH: 473 words

Law Enforcement Agencies (LEAs) in the country have arrested more than 6,835 persons allegedly involved in illegal human trafficking during the last four years.

As per data, 1642 smugglers or traffickers were arrested in 2008, 1775 in 2009, 1779 in 2010 and 1639 were apprehended during 2011. In addition, 1,842 Proclaimed Offenders (POs) were also nabbed during the period with 376 arrests in 2008, 441 in 2009, 522 in 2010 and 503 POs in 2011.

An official source on Friday said 507 Court Absconders (COs) were also arrested during the last four years with year wise details of 77 in 2008, 54 in 2009, 200 in 2010 and 176 in 2011.

He said thanks to steps taken by Ministry of Interior and introduction of different methods that Pakistan got upgraded from Tier-II Watch List to Tier-II in Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP Report) published by US State Department and maintained the same status during 2011 whereby 188 countries around the global were categorized. This report has direct impact on US and UN financial aid.

He said the Agency was giving priority to control the illegal human trafficking in the country and in this regard it had successfully launched Integrated Border Management System (IBMS) at Islamabad and Peshawar airports.

The other measures were installation of Edison System at major airports through Australian High Commission, creation of Immigration Intelligence Unit (IIU) in collaboration with UK, creation of Transnational Crime Unit (TCU) with collaboration of Australia.

He said all these measures have helped drastic reduction in number of Deportees on Fake Documents (DFDs).

The official said traffic handled at airports during the last four years was 34.5 million, of which 7.8 million in 2008, 8.2 million in 2009, 8.7 million in 2010 and 9.8 million traffic was handled during 2011.

During the period, 2114 persons were Off-loaded On Fake Documents (OFDs) with details including 572 in 2008, 669 in 2009, 504 in 2010 and 369 in 2011 while the number of Deportees on Fake Documents (DFDs-A Category) was 56 in 2008, 31 in 2009, 37 in 2010 and 15 in 2011. The number of Deportees on Fake Documents during the period in Category B was 52 in 2008, 43 in 2009, 42 in 2010 and 20 in 2011.

Giving further details, the official said 15,213 persons were convicted with details including 4641 persons in 2008, 4396 in 2009, 3115 in 2010 and 2861 persons were convicted during 2011.

He said Human Trafficking Information System (HUTIS) is very much beneficial since its establishment at main Anti Human Trafficking Circles (AHTCs) for entering detail of Human Traffickers.

As per information provided by the HUTIS at FIA, Headquarters, 1793 Human Traffickers have been included with details.

Furthermore, he said, Zonal Offices are also being asked to update the system and enter detail of all the agents/human traffickers.

LOAD-DATE: May 21, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 The Balochistan Times
All Rights Reserved

134 of 492 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring South Asia - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

May 19, 2012 Saturday

US envoy urges Bangladesh to take "strong steps" to stop human trafficking

LENGTH: 346 words

Text of report headlined "Human trafficking: US envoy urges govt to take strong action" published by Bangladesh newspaper The Daily Star website on 18 May Expressing concern over the present situation of human trafficking from Bangladesh, US Ambassador Dan W Mozena urged the government to take strong steps against the offence, a gross human rights violation.

Expatriates' Welfare and Overseas Employment Minister Khandker Mosharraf Hossain conveyed the concern of the ambassador to reporters after Mozena called on the minister at the ministry yesterday.

"We are not saying that human trafficking is not happening. But we are already working to check it. The home ministry enacted an anti-human trafficking act recently," said Khandker.

For the last two years, Bangladesh has been ranked at Tier 2 watch list by the Trafficking in Persons report, annually published by the US.

Khandker, however, said there is no link between human trafficking and labour migration.

Traffickers allure both men and women into going abroad using tourist visas. Moreover, cross border trafficking occurs as Bangladesh has a long land border, he said.

Khandker, also the labour and employment minister, said to have sought US help in tackling the problem.

He said Mozena also voiced his concern over the killing of labour rights activist Aminul Islam, whose body was found near Ghatail Police Station on April 5.

"I told him that we are no less concerned about it." The government came to know that Aminul was neither involved in instigating labour unrest nor had any conflict of interest with anyone, he said.

The facts will finally be known once the investigation into the killing is complete. "We are giving it the utmost importance," he noted.

Khandker said Mozena was pleased about the overall labour situation in the readymade garment sector.

"However, I requested him to take measures so that buyers increase the prices of the garment products they buy from Bangladesh," he said, adding that as a result, workers here will get better salaries.

Source: The Daily Star website, Dhaka, in English 18 May 12

LOAD-DATE: May 19, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

135 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
Daily Regional Times

May 19, 2012 Saturday

LEAs capture 6,835 illegal human traffickers in four years

SECTION: Vol. VII No. 271LENGTH: 474 words

Law Enforcement Agencies (LEAs) in the country have arrested more than 6,835 persons allegedly involved in illegal human trafficking during the last four years. As per data, 1642 smugglers or traffickers were arrested in 2008, 1775 in 2009, 1779 in 2010 and 1639 were apprehended during 2011. In addition, 1,842 Proclaimed Offenders (POs) were also nabbed during the period with 376 arrests in 2008, 441 in 2009, 522 in 2010 and 503 POs in 2011.

An official source on Friday said 507 Court Absconders (COs) were also arrested during the last four years with year wise details of 77 in 2008, 54 in 2009, 200 in 2010 and 176 in 2011. He said thanks to steps taken by Ministry of Interior and introduction of different methods that Pakistan got upgraded from Tier-II Watch List to Tier-II in Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP Report) published by US State Department and maintained the same status during 2011 where by 188 countries around the globe were categorized. This report has direct impact on US and UN financial aid. He said the Agency was giving priority to control the illegal human trafficking in the country and in this regard it had successfully launched Integrated Border Management System (IBMS) at Islamabad and Peshawar airports.

The other measures were installation of Edison System at major airports through Australian High Commission, creation of Immigration Intelligence Unit (IIU) in collaboration with UK, creation of Transnational Crime Unit (TCU) with collaboration of Australia. He said all these measures have helped drastic reduction in number of Deportees on Fake Documents (DFDs).

The official said traffic handled at airports during the last four years was 34.5 million, of which 7.8 million in 2008, 8.2 million in 2009, 8.7 million in 2010 and 9.8 million traffic was handled during 2011. During the period, 2114 persons were Off-loaded On Fake Documents (OFDs) with details including 572 in 2008, 669 in 2009, 504 in 2010 and 369 in 2011 while the number of Deportees on Fake Documents (DFDs-A Category) was 56 in 2008, 31 in 2009, 37 in 2010 and 15 in 2011.

The number of Deportees on Fake Documents during the period in Category B was 52 in 2008, 43 in 2009, 42 in 2010 and 20 in 2011. Giving further details, the official said 15,213 persons were convicted with details including 4641 persons in 2008, 4396 in 2009, 3115 in 2010 and 2861 persons were convicted during 2011. He said Human Trafficking Information System (HUTIS) is very much beneficial since its establishment at main Anti Human Trafficking Circles (AHTCs) for entering detail of Human Traffickers.

As per information provided by the HUTIS at FIA, Headquarters, 1793 Human Traffickers have been included with details. Further more, he said, Zonal Offices are also being asked to update the system and enter detail of all the agents/human traffickers.

LOAD-DATE: May 21, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

136 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

Pakistan Observer

May 19, 2012 Saturday

LEAs capture 6,835 human traffickers

SECTION: Vol. XXIII No. 193

LENGTH: 321 words

Law Enforcement Agencies (LEAs) in the country have arrested more than 6,835 persons allegedly involved in illegal human trafficking during the last four years. As per data, 1642 smugglers or traffickers were arrested in 2008, 1775 in 2009, 1779 in 2010 and 1639 were apprehended during 2011. In addition, 1,842 Proclaimed Offenders (POs) were also nabbed during the period with 376 arrests in 2008, 441 in 2009, 522 in 2010 and 503 POs in 2011.

An official source on Friday said 507 Court Absconders (COs) were also arrested during the last four years with year wise details of 77 in 2008, 54 in 2009, 200 in 2010 and 176 in 2011. He said thanks to steps taken by Ministry of Interior and introduction of different methods that Pakistan got upgraded from Tier-II Watch List to Tier-II in Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP Report) published by US State Department and maintained the same status during 2011 whereby 188 countries around the global were categorized. This report has direct impact on US and UN financial aid.

He said the Agency was giving priority to control the illegal human trafficking in the country and in this regard it had successfully launched Integrated Border Management System (IBMS) at Islamabad and Peshawar airports. The other measures were installation of Edison System at major airports through Australian High Commission, creation of Immigration Intelligence Unit (IIU) in collaboration with UK, creation of Transnational Crime Unit (TCU) with collaboration of Australia.

He said all these measures have helped drastic reduction in number of Deportees on Fake Documents (DFDs). The official said traffic handled at airports during the last four years was 34.5 million, of which 7.8 million in 2008, 8.2 million in 2009, 8.7 million in 2010 and 9.8 million traffic was handled during 2011.

During the period, 2114 persons were Off-loaded On Fake Documents (OFDs) with details including 572 in 2008.

LOAD-DATE: May 21, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

137 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
Right Vision News

May 19, 2012 Saturday

Pakistan: LEAs capture 6,835 illegal human traffickers in four years

LENGTH: 486 words

DATELINE: ISLAMABAD

ISLAMABAD, May 19 -- Law Enforcement Agencies (LEAs) in the country have arrested more than 6,835 persons allegedly involved in illegal human trafficking during the last four years.

As per data, 1642 smugglers or traffickers were arrested in 2008, 1775 in 2009, 1779 in 2010 and 1639 were apprehended during 2011. In addition, 1,842 Proclaimed Offenders (POs) were also nabbed during the period with 376 arrests in 2008, 441 in 2009, 522 in 2010 and 503 POs in 2011.

An official source on Friday said 507 Court Absconders (COs) were also arrested during the last four years with year wise details of 77 in 2008, 54 in 2009, 200 in 2010 and 176 in 2011.

He said thanks to steps taken by Ministry of Interior and introduction of different methods that Pakistan got upgraded from Tier-II Watch List to Tier-II in Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP Report) published by US State Department and maintained the same status during 2011 whereby 188 countries around the global were categorized. This report has direct impact on US and UN financial aid.

He said the Agency was giving priority to control the illegal human trafficking in the country and in this regard it had successfully launched Integrated Border Management System (IBMS) at Islamabad and Peshawar airports.

The other measures were installation of Edison System at major airports through Australian High Commission, creation of Immigration Intelligence Unit (IIU) in collaboration with UK, creation of Transnational Crime Unit (TCU) with collaboration of Australia.

He said all these measures have helped drastic reduction in number of Deportees on Fake Documents (DFDs).

The official said traffic handled at airports during the last four years was 34.5 million, of which 7.8 million in 2008, 8.2 million in 2009, 8.7 million in 2010 and 9.8 million traffic was handled during 2011.

During the period, 2114 persons were Off-loaded On Fake Documents (OFDs) with details including 572 in 2008, 669 in 2009, 504 in 2010 and 369 in 2011 while the number of Deportees on Fake Documents (DFDs-A Category) was 56 in 2008, 31 in 2009, 37 in 2010 and 15 in 2011. The number of Deportees on Fake Documents during the period in Category B was 52 in 2008, 43 in 2009, 42 in 2010 and 20 in 2011.

Giving further details, the official said 15,213 persons were convicted with details including 4641 persons in 2008, 4396 in 2009, 3115 in 2010 and 2861 persons were convicted during 2011.

He said Human Trafficking Information System (HUTIS) is very much beneficial since its establishment at main Anti Human Trafficking Circles (AHTCs) for entering detail of Human Traffickers.

As per information provided by the HUTIS at FIA, Headquarters, 1793 Human Traffickers have been included with details.

Further more, he said, Zonal Offices are also being asked to update the system and enter detail of all the agents/human traffickers Published by HT Syndication with permission from Right Vision News.

For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 Right Vision News
All Rights Reserved

138 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
The Balochistan Times (AsiaNet)

May 14, 2012 Monday

FIA nabbed 6,835 human traffickers in four yearsSECTION: Vol. XXXVI No. 134LENGTH: 468 words

The Federal Investigation Agency (FIA) has nabbed 6,835 persons for human trafficking during the last four years. Giving year-wise details about the arrests, an official source on Sunday said 1642 smugglers or traffickers were arrested in 2008, 1775 in 2009, 1779 in 2010 and 1639 in 2011. In addition, the Agency also nabbed 1,842 proclaimed offenders (POs) during the period with 376 in 2008, 441 in 2009, 522 in 2010 and 503 in 2011. The official said 507 court absconders (COs) were also arrested during the last four years with year-wise details of 77 in 2008, 54 in 2009, 200 in 2010 and 176 in 2011.

The official said thanks to the steps taken by the Ministry of Interior and introducing different methods that Pakistan got upgraded from Tier-II Watch List to Tier-II in Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP Report) published by the US State Department and maintained the same status during 2011 whereby 188 countries around the global were categorized. This report has direct impact on the US and UN financial aid.

He said the Agency was giving priority to control the human trafficking in the country and in this regard it had successfully launched Integrated Border Management System (IBMS) at Islamabad and Peshawar airports. The other measures were installation of Edison System at major airports through Australian High Commission, creation of Immigration Intelligence Unit (IIU) in collaboration with UK, creation of Transnational Crime Unit (TCU) with collaboration of Australia.

He said all these measures helped drastic reduction in the number of Deportees on Fake Documents (DFDs). The official said traffic handled at airports during the last four years was 34.5 million with 7.8 million in 2008, 8.2 million in 2009, 8.7 million in 2010 and 9.8 million in 2011.

During the period, 2114 persons were Off-loaded On Fake Documents (OFDs) with details including 572 in 2008, 669 in 2009, 504 in 2010 and 369 in 2011 while the number of Deportees on Fake Documents (DFDs-A Category) was 56 in 2008, 31 in 2009, 37 in 2010 and 15 in 2011. The number of Deportees on Fake Documents during the period in Category B was 52 in 2008, 43 in 2009, 42 in 2010 and 20 in 2011.

Giving further details, the official said 15,213 persons were convicted with details including 4641 persons in 2008, 4396 in 2009, 3115 in 2010 and 2861 persons were convicted during 2011.

He said Human Trafficking Information System (HUTIS) is very much beneficial since its establishment at main Anti Human Trafficking Circles (AHTCs) for entering detail of Human Traffickers.

As per information provided by the HUTIS at FIA, Headquarters, 1793 Human Traffickers have been included with details.

Furthermore, he said, Zonal Offices are also being asked to update the system and enter detail of all the agents/human traffickers.

LOAD-DATE: May 14, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 The Balochistan Times
All Rights Reserved

139 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
Daily Regional Times

May 14, 2012 Monday

FIA nabbed 6,835 human traffickers nabbed in four yearsSECTION: Vol. VII No. 266LENGTH: 468 words

The Federal Investigation Agency (FIA) has nabbed 6,835 persons for human trafficking during the last four years. Giving year-wise details about the arrests, an official source on Sunday said 1642 smugglers or traffickers were arrested in 2008, 1775 in 2009, 1779 in 2010 and 1639 in 2011. In addition, the Agency also nabbed 1,842 proclaimed offenders (POs) during the period with 376 in 2008, 441 in 2009, 522 in 2010 and 503 in 2011. The official said 507 court absconders (COs) were also arrested during the last four years with year-wise details of 77 in 2008, 54 in 2009, 200 in 2010 and 176 in 2011.

The official said thanks to the steps taken by the Ministry of Interior and introducing different methods that Pakistan got upgraded from Tier-II Watch List to Tier-II in Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP Report) published by the US State Department and maintained the same status during 2011 whereby 188 countries around the globe were categorized. This report has direct impact on the US and UN financial aid. He said the Agency was giving priority to control the human trafficking in the country and in this regard it had successfully launched Integrated Border Management System (IBMS) at Islamabad and Peshawar airports.

The other measures were installation of Edison System at major airports through Australian High Commission, creation of Immigration Intelligence Unit (IIU) in collaboration with UK, creation of Transnational Crime Unit (TCU) with collaboration of Australia. He said all these measures helped drastic reduction in the number of Deportees on Fake Documents (DFDs). The official said traffic handled at airports during the last four years was 34.5 million with 7.8 million in 2008, 8.2 million in 2009, 8.7 million in 2010 and 9.8 million in 2011. During the period, 2114 persons were Off-loaded On Fake Documents (OFDs) with details including 572 in 2008, 669 in 2009, 504 in 2010 and 369 in 2011 while the number of Deportees on Fake Documents (DFDs-A Category) was 56 in 2008, 31 in 2009, 37 in 2010 and 15 in 2011.

The number of Deportees on Fake Documents during the period in Category B was 52 in 2008, 43 in 2009, 42 in 2010 and 20 in 2011. Giving further details, the official said 15,213 persons were convicted with details including 4641 persons in 2008, 4396 in 2009, 3115 in 2010 and 2861 persons were convicted during 2011. He said Human Trafficking Information System (HUTIS) is very much beneficial since its establishment at main Anti Human Trafficking Circles (AHTCs) for entering detail of Human Traffickers. As per information provided by the HUTIS at FIA, Headquarters, 1793 Human Traffickers have been included with details. Further more, he said, Zonal Offices are also being asked to update the system and enter detail of all the agents/human traffickers.

LOAD-DATE: May 14, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

140 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

Pakistan Today (Newstex Blog)

May 14, 2012 Monday 11:49 AM EST

FIA nabbed 6,835 human trafficker nabbed in 4 years

LENGTH: 473 words

0

33 mins ago |

ISLAMABAD - The Federal Investigation Agency (FIA) has nabbed 6,835 persons for human trafficking during the last four years.

Giving year-wise details about the arrests, an official source on Sunday said 1642 smugglers or traffickers were arrested in 2008, 1775 in 2009, 1779 in 2010 and 1639 in 2011.

In addition, the agency also nabbed 1,842 proclaimed offenders (POs) during the period with 376 in 2008, 441 in 2009, 522 in 2010 and 503 in 2011. The official said 507 court absconders (COs) were also arrested during the last four years with year-wise details of 77 in 2008, 54 in 2009, 200 in 2010 and 176 in 2011.

The official said thanks to the steps taken by the Ministry of Interior and introducing different methods that Pakistan got upgraded from Tier-II Watch List to Tier-II in Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP Report) published by the US State Department and maintained the same status during 2011 whereby 188 countries around the global were categorised. This report has direct impact on the US and UN financial aid.

He said the Agency was giving priority to control the human trafficking in the country and in this regard it had successfully launched Integrated Border Management System (IBMS) at Islamabad and Peshawar airports.

The other measures were installation of Edison System at major airports through Australian High Commission, creation of Immigration Intelligence Unit (IIU) in collaboration with UK, creation of Transnational Crime Unit (TCU) with collaboration of Australia. He said all these measures helped drastic reduction in the number of Deportees on Fake Documents (DFDs).

The official said traffic handled at airports during the last four years was 34.5 million with 7.8 million in 2008, 8.2 million in 2009, 8.7 million in 2010 and 9.8 million in 2011. During the period, 2114 persons were Off-loaded On Fake Documents (OFDs) with details including 572 in 2008, 669 in 2009, 504 in 2010 and 369 in 2011 while the number of Deportees on Fake Documents (DFDs-A Category) was 56 in 2008, 31 in 2009, 37 in 2010 and 15 in 2011. The number of Deportees on Fake Documents during the period in Category B was 52 in 2008, 43 in 2009, 42 in 2010 and 20 in 2011. Giving further details, the official said 15,213 persons were convicted with details including 4641 persons in 2008, 4396 in 2009, 3115 in 2010 and 2861 persons were convicted during 2011. He said Human Trafficking Information System (HUTIS) is very much beneficial since its establishment at main Anti Human Trafficking Circles (AHTCs) for entering detail of human traffickers. As per information provided by the HUTIS at FIA, Headquarters, 1793 human traffickers have been included with details. Further more, he said, Zonal Offices are also being asked to update the system and enter detail of all the agents/human traffickers.

LOAD-DATE: May 14, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Blog

JOURNAL-CODE: APAK-111350

Copyright 2012 Newstex LLC
All Rights Reserved
Newstex Web Blogs
Copyright 2012 Pakistan Today

141 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

Right Vision News

May 14, 2012 Monday

Pakistan: FIA nabbed 6,835 human trafficker nabbed in four years

LENGTH: 479 words

DATELINE: ISLAMABAD

ISLAMABAD, May 14 -- The Federal Investigation Agency

(FIA) has nabbed 6,835 persons for human trafficking during the last four years.

Giving year-wise details about the arrests, an official source on Sunday said 1642 smugglers or traffickers were arrested in 2008,

1775 in 2009, 1779 in 2010 and 1639 in 2011.

In addition, the Agency also nabbed 1,842 proclaimed offenders (POs) during the period with 376 in 2008, 441 in 2009, 522 in 2010 and 503 in 2011.

The official said 507 court absconders (COs) were also arrested during the last four years with year-wise details of 77 in 2008, 54 in 2009, 200 in 2010 and 176 in 2011.

The official said thanks to the steps taken by the Ministry of Interior and introducing different methods that Pakistan got upgraded from Tier-II Watch List to Tier-II in Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP Report) published by the US State Department and maintained the same status during 2011 whereby 188 countries around the global were categorized.

This report has direct impact on the US and UN financial aid.

He said the Agency was giving priority to control the human trafficking in the country and in this regard it had successfully launched Integrated Border Management System (IBMS) at Islamabad and Peshawar airports.

The other measures were installation of Edison System at major airports through Australian High Commission, creation of Immigration Intelligence Unit (IIU) in collaboration with UK, creation of Transnational Crime Unit (TCU) with collaboration of Australia.

He said all these measures helped drastic reduction in the number of Deportees on Fake Documents (DFDs).

The official said traffic handled at airports during the last four years was 34.5 million with 7.8 million in 2008, 8.2 million in 2009, 8.7 million in 2010 and 9.8 million in 2011.

During the period, 2114 persons were Off-loaded On Fake Documents (OFDs) with details including 572 in 2008, 669 in 2009, 504 in 2010 and 369 in 2011 while the number of Deportees on Fake Documents (DFDs-A Category) was 56 in 2008, 31 in 2009, 37 in 2010 and 15 in 2011. The number of Deportees on Fake Documents during the period in Category B was 52 in 2008, 43 in 2009, 42 in 2010 and 20 in 2011.

Giving further details, the official said 15,213 persons were convicted with details including 4641 persons in 2008, 4396 in 2009, 3115 in 2010 and 2861 persons were convicted during 2011.

He said Human Trafficking Information System (HUTIS) is very much beneficial since its establishment at main Anti Human Trafficking Circles (AHTCs) for entering detail of Human Traffickers.

As per information provided by the HUTIS at FIA, Headquarters, 1793 Human Traffickers have been included with details.

Further more, he said, Zonal Offices are also being asked to update the system and enter detail of all the agents/human traffickers Published by HT Syndication with permission from Right Vision News.

For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: May 13, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 Right Vision News
All Rights Reserved

142 of 492 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring South Asia - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

May 13, 2012 Sunday

Maldivian police arrest 47 unregistered Bangladeshi migrants

LENGTH: 905 words

Text of report by Neil Merrett headlined "Police arrest 47 Bangladeshi nationals after raid on unregistered security firm" by Maldivian newspaper Minivan News website on 9 May

A total of 47 Bangladeshi nationals working for a local security firm were seized on Thursday by the Department of Immigration as part of a wider crackdown on unregistered migrant workers.

The detention of the expatriate workers comes after police late last year reported a "day-by-day" increase in human trafficking in the Maldives. The Maldives Police Service's claims were based on a surge in the numbers of illegal expatriate workers found in the country.

Assistant Controller of the Immigration Department Ibrahim Ashraf told Minivan News that the 47 Bangladesh nationals were all apprehended following a raid of a company providing security guards that was not registered to employ foreigners.

Ashraf claimed that the company the men had been working for had been in operation for 10 -12 years, yet no information could be found on its operations.

"During the raid, we found 47 Bangladeshi nationals all wearing security uniforms along with equipment like walkie talkies and badges," he said. "They were not registered for this work and we could not find any records linked to the company."

While the Department of Immigration has said that it was not cracking down specifically on security firms employing expatriate workers, Ashraf added that concerns remained about ensuring the industry had correctly licensed its foreign staff.

"Until recently, the Ministry of Human Resources did not provide [expatriate] work quotas to security firms," he said. "There has been a growing demand among local businesses to hire security services. The Ministry of Human Resources has therefore begun issuing quotas for hiring expatriates in security services."

Ashraf added that the Immigration Department's concerns were not focused just on security firms, but instead on companies from various industries that had failed to obtain and then correctly register staff.

"Right now we are looking for expatriate workers on the run. We have received a lot of reports from employers about staff going missing," he said. "This is especially true in the outer atolls, where we are getting complaints about unregistered employees travelling between islands."

Ashraf claimed that the 47 Bangladeshi nationals who had been detained Thursday would not necessarily be deported if a sponsor could be found to provide employment and accommodation for them.

"We will try and give the employees the opportunity to stay here and work if a sponsor is willing to regularise them," he said.

High Commission

The High Commission of Bangladesh in Male' said it had been made aware of the 47 detained workers, who had been seized for not having proper documentation.

The commission said it was often notified regarding such cases, and was presently awaiting travel documentation for the detained expatriates before considering possible deportation.

The High Commissioner of Bangladesh, Rear Admiral Abu Saeed Mohamed Abdul Awal, said today that he believed workers from the country were regularly being brought to the Maldives to perform unskilled work, usually in the construction industry. Awal alleged that upon arriving, expatriates from Bangladesh were suffering from the practices of "bad employers".

"This is a real problem that is happening here, there have been many raids over the last year on unskilled [expatriate] workers who are suffering because of the companies employing them. They are not being given proper salaries and are paying the price for some of these employers," he said.

Rear Admiral Awal added that it was the responsibility of employers to ensure expatriate staff had the proper documentation and suitable living standards.

Concerns about the treatment of expatriates from across the South Asia region were also shared by Indian High Commissioner Dynaneshwar Mulay. Speaking to Minivan News last month, Mulay raised concerns over the general treatment of Indian expatriates in the Maldives, particularly by the country's police and judiciary.

Mulay claimed that alongside concerns about the treatment of some Indian expatriates in relation to the law, there were significant issues relating to "basic human rights" that needed to be addressed concerning expatriates from countries including Sri Lanka and Bangladesh.

Mulay's comments were made following an alleged attack on a Indian resort worker, who was reported to have been struck with a hammer and mugged while staying in a hotel in Male'. The attack was allegedly committed by a former employee of the same resort.

Big business

Beyond concerns about the basic human rights of foreign employees in the country, labour trafficking is also believed to represent a significant national economic issue.

An ongoing police investigation into labour trafficking in the Maldives last year uncovered an industry worth an estimated US$123 million, eclipsing fishing (US$46 million in 2007) as the second greatest contributor of foreign currency to the Maldivian economy after tourism.

The authorities' findings echo concerns first raised by former Bangladeshi High Commissioner Dr Selina Muhsin, reported by Minivan News in August 2010. The comments by Muhsin were made shortly after the country was placed on the US State Department's Tier 2 watchlist for human trafficking.

Source: Minivan News website, Male, in English 09 May 12

LOAD-DATE: May 13, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

143 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
Pakistan Observer BlogMay 8, 2012 Tuesday 7:24 AM EST6,835 involved in human trafficking nabbed in 4 yrs: FIA*LENGTH: 172 words

By: Staff Reporter

Islamabad: Federal Investigation Agency (FIA) has nabbed 6,835 persons involved in illegal human trafficking in the country during the last four years. Giving year-wise details about the arrests, an official source on Friday said in 2008, 1642 smugglers or traffickers were arrested, 1775 in 2008, 1779 in 2010 and 1639 were apprehended during 2011. In addition, the Agency also nabbed 1,842 Proclaimed Offenders (POs) during the period with 376 arrests in 2008, 441 in 2009, 522 in 2010 and 503 POs in 2011.

The official said 507 Court Absconders (COs) were also arrested during the last four years with year wise details of 77 in 2008, 54 in 2009, 200 in 2010 and 176 in 2011. The official said thanks to steps taken by Ministry of Interior and introducing different methods that Pakistan got upgraded from Tier-II Watch List to Tier-II in Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP Report) published by US State Department and maintained the same status during 2011 whereby 188 countries around the global were categorized.

LOAD-DATE: May 09, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Web BlogJOURNAL-CODE: APAK-115001Copyright 2012 Newstex LLC
All Rights Reserved
Newstex Web Blogs
Copyright 2012 Pakistan Observer

144 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Hindustan Times

May 7, 2012 Monday

Trafficking tops Hillary agenda

LENGTH: 413 wordsDATELINE: Kolkata

Kolkata, May 7 -- More than politics or the need for reforms, US secretary of state Hillary Clinton chose, on the first day of her visit to Kolkata, to focus on the tragic reality of West Bengal topping the country in the illegal trafficking of young women and girls.

Not only did Clinton express concern and alarm over the issue, but also committed to raising it on the international stage, apart from at her meeting with chief minister Mamata Banerjee on Monday.

On Sunday, she spent an hour at the Indian Council for Cultural Relations (ICCR), where she met and promised to help women rescued from human traffickers in Kolkata and participated in a closed-door discussion with NGOS and other social-welfare organisations on the rampant trafficking of girls and women in India. The talks focused on the problems of prevention, rescue and repatriation of victims in India, as well as neighbouring Nepal and Bangladesh.

Interestingly, India was dropped from the US government's watch list on human trafficking in 2011 for making "significant efforts" towards combating the menace.

"Clinton expressed concern that human trafficking was rampant in India at a time when the country was witnessing an economic boom," said Manab Roy, deputy programme director of Save the Children India, who participated in her meeting with NGOS. "She told us it was part of her India agenda, and that she would raise the issue at high forums," he added.

Clinton will stay in the city for two days before flying to New Delhi for talks with Prime Minister Manmohan Singh.

The US secretary of state was greeted by a welcome dance at ICCR'S Rabindranath Tagore Centre by seven women rescued from human traffickers. She clapped enthusiastically during the four-minute show on the power of womanhood, and took time to ask detailed questions about the significance of the performance. Clinton is scheduled to meet the chief minister on Monday, before heading to New Delhi. Apart from various issues, such as the political scenario in India and FDI in retail, the trafficking issue will also be raised.

"She has worked personally with the issue for years. Various NGOS have told her about their research and findings. The focus is on prevention and how to go about it. She reacted to everyone's statements and stressed that all agencies in the government should work together for prevention," said Amitava Bhattacharya, founder-director of banglanatok.com. Published by HT Syndication with permission from HT Kolkata.

For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: May 7, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

All Rights Reserved

145 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

The Balochistan Times (AsiaNet)

May 5, 2012 Saturday

6,835 involved in illegal human trafficking nabbed in four years

SECTION: Vol. XXXVI No. 125

LENGTH: 479 words

Federal Investigation Agency (FIA) has nabbed 6,835 persons involved in illegal human trafficking in the country during the last four years.

Giving year-wise details about the arrests, an official source on Friday said in 2008, 1642 smugglers or traffickers were arrested, 1775 in 2008, 1779 in 2010 and 1639 were apprehended during 2011.

In addition, the Agency also nabbed 1,842 Proclaimed Offenders (POs) during the period with 376 arrests in 2008, 441 in 2009, 522 in 2010 and 503 POs in 2011.

The official said 507 Court Absconders (COs) were also arrested during the last four years with year wise details of 77 in 2008, 54 in 2009, 200 in 2010 and 176 in 2011.

The official said thanks to steps taken by Ministry of Interior and introducing different methods that Pakistan got upgraded from Tier-II Watch List to Tier-II in Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP Report) published by US State Department and maintained the same status during 2011 whereby 188 countries around the global were categorized. This report has direct impact on US and UN financial aid.

He said the Agency was giving priority to control the illegal human trafficking in the country and in this regard it had successfully launched Integrated Border Management System (IBMS) at Islamabad and Peshawar airports.

The other measures were installation of Edison System at major airports through Australian High Commission, creation of Immigration Intelligence Unit (IIU) in collaboration with UK, creation of Transnational Crime Unit (TCU) with collaboration of Australia.

He said all these measures have helped drastic reduction in number of Deportees on Fake Documents (DFDs).

The official said traffic handled at airports during the last four years was 34.5 million, of which 7.8 million in 2008, 8.2 million in 2009, 8.7 million in 2010 and 9.8 million traffic was handled during 2011.

During the period, 2114 persons were Off-loaded On Fake Documents (OFDs) with details including 572 in 2008, 669 in 2009, 504 in 2010 and 369 in 2011 while the number of Deportees on Fake Documents (DFDs-A Category) was 56 in 2008, 31 in 2009, 37 in 2010 and 15 in 2011. The number of Deportees on Fake Documents during the period in Category B was 52 in 2008, 43 in 2009, 42 in 2010 and 20 in 2011.

Giving further details, the official said 15,213 persons were convicted with details including 4641 persons in 2008, 4396 in 2009, 3115 in 2010 and 2861 persons were convicted during 2011.

He said Human Trafficking Information System (HUTIS) is very much beneficial since its establishment at main Anti Human Trafficking Circles (AHTCs) for entering detail of Human Traffickers.

As per information provided by the HUTIS at FIA, Headquarters, 1793 Human Traffickers have been included with details.

Furthermore, he said, Zonal Offices are also being asked to update the system and enter detail of all the agents/human traffickers.

LOAD-DATE: May 5, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 The Balochistan Times
All Rights Reserved

146 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

The Balochistan Times (AsiaNet)

May 5, 2012 Saturday

6,835 involved in illegal human trafficking nabbed in four years

SECTION: Vol. XXXVI No. 125

LENGTH: 479 words

Federal Investigation Agency (FIA) has nabbed 6,835 persons involved in illegal human trafficking in the country during the last four years.

Giving year-wise details about the arrests, an official source on Friday said in 2008, 1642 smugglers or traffickers were arrested, 1775 in 2008, 1779 in 2010 and 1639 were apprehended during 2011.

In addition, the Agency also nabbed 1,842 Proclaimed Offenders (POs) during the period with 376 arrests in 2008, 441 in 2009, 522 in 2010 and 503 POs in 2011.

The official said 507 Court Absconders (COs) were also arrested during the last four years with year wise details of 77 in 2008, 54 in 2009, 200 in 2010 and 176 in 2011.

The official said thanks to steps taken by Ministry of Interior and introducing different methods that Pakistan got upgraded from Tier-II Watch List to Tier-II in Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP Report) published by US State Department and maintained the same status during 2011 whereby 188 countries around the global were categorized. This report has direct impact on US and UN financial aid.

He said the Agency was giving priority to control the illegal human trafficking in the country and in this regard it had successfully launched Integrated Border Management System (IBMS) at Islamabad and Peshawar airports.

The other measures were installation of Edison System at major airports through Australian High Commission, creation of Immigration Intelligence Unit (IIU) in collaboration with UK, creation of Transnational Crime Unit (TCU) with collaboration of Australia.

He said all these measures have helped drastic reduction in number of Deportees on Fake Documents (DFDs).

The official said traffic handled at airports during the last four years was 34.5 million, of which 7.8 million in 2008, 8.2 million in 2009, 8.7 million in 2010 and 9.8 million traffic was handled during 2011.

During the period, 2114 persons were Off-loaded On Fake Documents (OFDs) with details including 572 in 2008, 669 in 2009, 504 in 2010 and 369 in 2011 while the number of Deportees on Fake Documents (DFDs-A Category) was 56 in 2008, 31 in 2009, 37 in 2010 and 15 in 2011. The number of Deportees on Fake Documents during the period in Category B was 52 in 2008, 43 in 2009, 42 in 2010 and 20 in 2011.

Giving further details, the official said 15,213 persons were convicted with details including 4641 persons in 2008, 4396 in 2009, 3115 in 2010 and 2861 persons were convicted during 2011.

He said Human Trafficking Information System (HUTIS) is very much beneficial since its establishment at main Anti Human Trafficking Circles (AHTCs) for entering detail of Human Traffickers.

As per information provided by the HUTIS at FIA, Headquarters, 1793 Human Traffickers have been included with details.

Furthermore, he said, Zonal Offices are also being asked to update the system and enter detail of all the agents/human traffickers.

LOAD-DATE: May 7, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 The Balochistan Times
All Rights Reserved

147 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

Pakistan Observer

May 5, 2012 Saturday

6,835 involved in human trafficking nabbed in 4 yrs: FIA

BYLINE: Staff Reporter

SECTION: Vol. XXIII No. 179

LENGTH: 167 words

Federal Investigation Agency (FIA) has nabbed 6,835 persons involved in illegal human trafficking in the country during the last four years. Giving year-wise details about the arrests, an official source on Friday said in 2008, 1642 smugglers or traffickers were arrested, 1775 in 2008, 1779 in 2010 and 1639 were apprehended during 2011. In addition, the Agency also nabbed 1,842 Proclaimed Offenders (POs) during the period with 376 arrests in 2008, 441 in 2009, 522 in 2010 and 503 POs in 2011.

The official said 507 Court Absconders (COs) were also arrested during the last four years with year wise details of 77 in 2008, 54 in 2009, 200 in 2010 and 176 in 2011. The official said thanks to steps taken by Ministry of Interior and introducing different methods that Pakistan got upgraded from Tier-II Watch List to Tier-II in Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP Report) published by US State Department and maintained the same status during 2011 whereby 188 countries around the global were categorized.

LOAD-DATE: May 5, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 Hurmat Group
All Rights Reserved

148 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
Pakistan ObserverMay 5, 2012 Saturday6,835 involved in human trafficking nabbed in 4 yrs: FIA*BYLINE: Staff ReporterSECTION: Vol. XXIII No. 179LENGTH: 167 words

Federal Investigation Agency (FIA) has nabbed 6,835 persons involved in illegal human trafficking in the country during the last four years. Giving year-wise details about the arrests, an official source on Friday said in 2008, 1642 smugglers or traffickers were arrested, 1775 in 2008, 1779 in 2010 and 1639 were apprehended during 2011. In addition, the Agency also nabbed 1,842 Proclaimed Offenders (POs) during the period with 376 arrests in 2008, 441 in 2009, 522 in 2010 and 503 POs in 2011.

The official said 507 Court Absconders (COs) were also arrested during the last four years with year wise details of 77 in 2008, 54 in 2009, 200 in 2010 and 176 in 2011. The official said thanks to steps taken by Ministry of Interior and introducing different methods that Pakistan got upgraded from Tier-II Watch List to Tier-II in Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP Report) published by US State Department and maintained the same status during 2011 whereby 188 countries around the global were categorized.

LOAD-DATE: May 7, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: NewspaperCopyright 2012 Hurmat Group
All Rights Reserved

149 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Right Vision News

May 3, 2012 Thursday

Pakistan: Some 137405 Pakistanis deported in three years.LENGTH: 543 wordsDATELINE: Islamabad

Islamabad, May 3 -- Almost 137405 Pakistanis have been deported from various countries on different charges during last three years.

Mainly Pakistani expatriates have been deported over visa violations and their alleged involvement in drugs/ narcotics trafficking related crimes as well as illegal human trafficking.

Well placed sources privy to Interior Ministry, Tuesday, revealed to 'Right Vision News' that 42435 Pakistanis were deported in 2009 and 43854 in 2010 and 51120 Pakistanis were sent back to home in 2011 by different governments.

Sources said that Federal Investigation Authority (FIA) had taken stern action against human traffickers/smugglers/facilitators and sub agents to control human trafficking from the country.

According to sources close to FIA, Inter Agency Task Force (IATF) was established and promulgation of prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance (PACHTO) 2002.

Moreover Anti Trafficking Units at Provincial Police HQs for combating internal human trafficking was also established and special campaigns for the arrest of Proclaimed Offenders (POs) and Court Absconders (CAs) had also been launched to eradicate this menace:

Furthermore, FIA Anti Trafficking Sub-Circle, Gujrat was established and declared as Police Station on 15th January, 2009.

Similarly, Personal Identification Secure Comparison and Evaluation System (PISCE) was replaced with Integrated Border Management System (IBMS) as well as Machine Readable Passports (MRP) introduced.

Sources said that human traffickers had been black listed as well as Immigration Liaison Office in Muscat, Oman was set up. Furthermore, Human Trafficking Information System (HUTIS) placed as well as Case Monitoring System had been installed.

Moreover, coordination with Provincial Police via establishing Provincial Anti Trafficking Units (ATU) as well as effective coordination with NGOs/IGOs for public awareness campaign, through electronic/print media, by conducting meetings, seminars, documentary, walks, pamphlets, theater in rural/urban areas launched.

To avert human trafficking bids for capacity building of immigration check-posts/immigration staff in coordination with international community were carried out along with installation of Immigration Intelligence Unit at FIA HQ, Islamabad with the help of British High Commission and Australia. Moreover, proposal for establishment of Border Liaison Office (BLO) was underway through UNODC.

Sources close to Interior Ministry said that FIA had successfully launched IBMS (integrated Border Management System) at Islamabad and Peshawar Airports and installed Edison System at Major airports through Australian High Commission Islamabad.

Moreover, Immigration Intelligence Unit (IIU) had been created in collaboration with UK. while Transnational Crime Unit (TCU) with the collaboration of Australia set up, consequently, number of deportees on fake documents (DFDs) had reduced drastically.

Sources said that Pakistan got upgraded from Tier-II Watch List to Tier-II in Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP Report 2010) published by US State Department and maintained the same status during 2011 where, by 188 countries around the global were categorized Published by HT Syndication with permission from Right Vision News.

For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: May 3, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 Right Vision News
All Rights Reserved

150 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
The Balochistan Times (AsiaNet)

May 2, 2012 Wednesday

Some 137405 Pakistanis deported in three years.

SECTION: Vol. XXXVI No. 122

LENGTH: 524 words

Almost 137405 Pakistanis have been deported from various countries on different charges during last three years. Mainly Pakistani expatriates have been deported over visa violations and their alleged involvement in drugs/ narcotics trafficking related crimes as well as illegal human trafficking.

Well placed sources privy to Interior Ministry, Tuesday that 42435 Pakistanis were deported in 2009 and 43854 in 2010 and 51120 Pakistanis were sent back to home in 2011 by different governments.

Sources said that Federal Investigation Authority (FIA) had taken stern action against human traffickers/smugglers/facilitators and sub agents to control human trafficking from the country.

According to sources close to FIA, Inter Agency Task Force (IATF) was established and promulgation of prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance (PACHTO) 2002.

Moreover Anti Trafficking Units at Provincial Police HQs for combating internal human trafficking was also established and special campaigns for the arrest of Proclaimed Offenders (POs) and Court Absconders (CAs) had also been launched to eradicate this menace:

Furthermore, FIA Anti Trafficking Sub-Circle, Gujrat was established and declared as Police Station on 15th January, 2009.

Similarly, Personal Identification Secure Comparison and Evaluation System (PISCE) was replaced with Integrated Border Management System (IBMS) as well as Machine Readable Passports (MRP) introduced.

Sources said that human traffickers had been black listed as well as Immigration Liaison Office in Muscat, Oman was set up. Furthermore, Human Trafficking Information System (HUTIS) placed as well as Case Monitoring System had been installed.

Moreover, coordination with Provincial Police via establishing Provincial Anti Trafficking Units (ATU) as well as effective coordination with NGOs/IGOs for public awareness campaign, through electronic/print media, by conducting meetings, seminars, documentary, walks, pamphlets, theater in rural/urban areas launched.

To avert human trafficking bids for capacity building of immigration check-posts/immigration staff in coordination with international community were carried out along with installation of Immigration Intelligence Unit at FIA HQ, Islamabad with the help of British High Commission and Australia. Moreover, proposal for establishment of Border Liaison Office (BLO) was underway through UNODC.

Sources close to Interior Ministry said that FIA had successfully launched IBMS (integrated Border Management System) at Islamabad and Peshawar Airports and installed Edison System at Major airports through Australian High Commission Islamabad.

Moreover, Immigration Intelligence Unit (IIU) had been created in collaboration with UK. while Transnational Crime Unit (TCU) with the collaboration of Australia set up, consequently, number of deportees on fake documents (DFDs) had reduced drastically.

Sources said that Pakistan got upgraded from Tier-II Watch List to Tier-II in Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP Report 2010) published by US State Department and maintained the same status during 2011 where, by 188 countries around the global were categorized.

LOAD-DATE: May 2, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 The Balochistan Times
All Rights Reserved

151 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

Daily Regional Times

May 2, 2012 Wednesday

Some 137405 Pakistanis deported in three years

SECTION: Vol. VII No. 254

LENGTH: 529 words

Almost 137405 Pakistanis have been deported from various countries on different charges during last three years. Mainly Pakistani expatriates have been deported over visa violations and their alleged involvement in drugs/ narcotics trafficking related crimes as well as illegal human trafficking. Well placed sources privy to Interior Ministry, Tuesday, revealed to 'ONLINE' that 42435 Pakistanis were deported in 2009 and 43854 in 2010 and 51120 Pakistanis were sent back to home in 2011 by different governments. Sources said that Federal Investigation Authority (FIA) had taken stern action against human traffickers/smugglers/facilitators and sub agents to control human trafficking from the country.

According to sources close to FIA, Inter Agency Task Force (IATF) was established and promulgation of prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance (PACHTO) 2002. Moreover Anti Trafficking Units at Provincial Police HQs for combating internal human trafficking was also established and special campaigns for the arrest of Proclaimed Offenders (POs) and Court Absconders (CAs) had also been launched to eradicate this menace: Furthermore, FIA Anti Trafficking Sub-Circle, Gujrat was established and declared as Police Station on 15th January, 2009. Similarly, Personal Identification Secure Comparison and Evaluation System (PISCE) was replaced with Integrated Border Management System (IBMS) as well as Machine Readable Passports (MRP) introduced. Sources said that human traffickers had been black listed as well as Immigration Liaison Office in Muscat, Oman was set up. Furthermore, Human Trafficking Information System (HUTIS) placed as well as Case Monitoring System had been installed. Moreover, coordination with Provincial Police via establishing Provincial Anti Trafficking Units (ATU) as well as effective coordination with NGOs/IGOs for public awareness campaign, through electronic/print media, by conducting meetings, seminars, documentary, walks, pamphlets, theater in rural/urban areas launched. To avert human trafficking bids for capacity building of immigration check-posts/immigration staff in coordination with international community were carried out along with installation of Immigration Intelligence Unit at FIA HQ, Islamabad with the help of British High Commission and Australia.

Moreover , proposal for establishment of Border Liaison Office (BLO) was underway through UNODC. Sources close to Interior Ministry said that FIA had successfully launched IBMS (integrated Border Management System) at Islamabad and Peshawar Airports and installed Edison System at Major airports through Australian High Commission Islamabad. Moreover, Immigration Intelligence Unit (IIU) had been created in collaboration with UK. while Transnational Crime Unit (TCU) with the collaboration of Australia set up, consequently, number of deportees on fake documents (DFDs) had reduced drastically. Sources said that Pakistan got upgraded from Tier-II Watch List to Tier-II in Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP Report 2010) published by US State Department and maintained the same status during 2011 where, by 188 countries around the global were categorized.

LOAD-DATE: May 2, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

152 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

The Frontier Star

May 2, 2012 Wednesday

Some 137405 Pakistanis deported in three years.

SECTION: Vol. 17 No. 122

LENGTH: 525 words

Almost 137405 Pakistanis have been deported from various countries on different charges during last three years.

Mainly Pakistani expatriates have been deported over visa violations and their alleged involvement in drugs/ narcotics trafficking related crimes as well as illegal human trafficking.

Well placed sources privy to Interior Ministry, Tuesday that 42435 Pakistanis were deported in 2009 and 43854 in 2010 and 51120 Pakistanis were sent back to home in 2011 by different governments.

Sources said that Federal Investigation Authority (FIA) had taken stern action against human traffickers/smugglers/facilitators and sub agents to control human trafficking from the country.

According to sources close to FIA, Inter Agency Task Force (IATF) was established and promulgation of prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance (PACHTO) 2002.

Moreover Anti Trafficking Units at Provincial Police HQs for combating internal human trafficking was also established and special campaigns for the arrest of Proclaimed Offenders (POs) and Court Absconders (CAs) had also been launched to eradicate this menace:

Furthermore, FIA Anti Trafficking Sub-Circle, Gujrat was established and declared as Police Station on 15th January, 2009.

Similarly, Personal Identification Secure Comparison and Evaluation System (PISCE) was replaced with Integrated Border Management System (IBMS) as well as Machine Readable Passports (MRP) introduced.

Sources said that human traffickers had been black listed as well as Immigration Liaison Office in Muscat, Oman was set up. Furthermore, Human Trafficking Information System (HUTIS) placed as well as Case Monitoring System had been installed.

Moreover, coordination with Provincial Police via establishing Provincial Anti Trafficking Units (ATU) as well as effective coordination with NGOs/IGOs for public awareness campaign, through electronic/print media, by conducting meetings, seminars, documentary, walks, pamphlets, theater in rural/urban areas launched.

To avert human trafficking bids for capacity building of immigration check-posts/immigration staff in coordination with international community were carried out along with installation of Immigration Intelligence Unit at FIA HQ, Islamabad with the help of British High Commission and Australia. Moreover, proposal for establishment of Border Liaison Office (BLO) was underway through UNODC.

Sources close to Interior Ministry said that FIA had successfully launched IBMS (integrated Border Management System) at Islamabad and Peshawar Airports and installed Edison System at Major airports through Australian High Commission Islamabad.

Moreover, Immigration Intelligence Unit (IIU) had been created in collaboration with UK. while Transnational Crime Unit (TCU) with the collaboration of Australia set up, consequently, number of deportees on fake documents (DFDs) had reduced drastically.

Sources said that Pakistan got upgraded from Tier-II Watch List to Tier-II in Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP Report 2010) published by US State Department and maintained the same status during 2011 where, by 188 countries around the global were categorized.

LOAD-DATE: May 2, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 The Frontier Star
All Rights Reserved

153 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
Patriot, The

May 2, 2012 Wednesday

Some 137405 Pakistanis deported in three years.SECTION: Vol. 11 No. 121LENGTH: 525 words

Almost 137405 Pakistanis have been deported from various countries on different charges during last three years.

Mainly Pakistani expatriates have been deported over visa violations and their alleged involvement in drugs/ narcotics trafficking related crimes as well as illegal human trafficking.

Well placed sources privy to Interior Ministry, Tuesday that 42435 Pakistanis were deported in 2009 and 43854 in 2010 and 51120 Pakistanis were sent back to home in 2011 by different governments.

Sources said that Federal Investigation Authority (FIA) had taken stern action against human traffickers/smugglers/facilitators and sub agents to control human trafficking from the country.

According to sources close to FIA, Inter Agency Task Force (IATF) was established and promulgation of prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance (PACHTO) 2002.

Moreover Anti Trafficking Units at Provincial Police HQs for combating internal human trafficking was also established and special campaigns for the arrest of Proclaimed Offenders (POs) and Court Absconders (CAs) had also been launched to eradicate this menace:

Furthermore, FIA Anti Trafficking Sub-Circle, Gujrat was established and declared as Police Station on 15th January, 2009.

Similarly, Personal Identification Secure Comparison and Evaluation System (PISCE) was replaced with Integrated Border Management System (IBMS) as well as Machine Readable Passports (MRP) introduced.

Sources said that human traffickers had been black listed as well as Immigration Liaison Office in Muscat, Oman was set up. Furthermore, Human Trafficking Information System (HUTIS) placed as well as Case Monitoring System had been installed.

Moreover, coordination with Provincial Police via establishing Provincial Anti Trafficking Units (ATU) as well as effective coordination with NGOs/IGOs for public awareness campaign, through electronic/print media, by conducting meetings, seminars, documentary, walks, pamphlets, theater in rural/urban areas launched.

To avert human trafficking bids for capacity building of immigration check-posts/immigration staff in coordination with international community were carried out along with installation of Immigration Intelligence Unit at FIA HQ, Islamabad with the help of British High Commission and Australia. Moreover, proposal for establishment of Border Liaison Office (BLO) was underway through UNODC.

Sources close to Interior Ministry said that FIA had successfully launched IBMS (integrated Border Management System) at Islamabad and Peshawar Airports and installed Edison System at Major airports through Australian High Commission Islamabad.

Moreover, Immigration Intelligence Unit (IIU) had been created in collaboration with UK. while Transnational Crime Unit (TCU) with the collaboration of Australia set up, consequently, number of deportees on fake documents (DFDs) had reduced drastically.

Sources said that Pakistan got upgraded from Tier-II Watch List to Tier-II in Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP Report 2010) published by US State Department and maintained the same status during 2011 where, by 188 countries around the global were categorized.

LOAD-DATE: May 2, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 The Patriot
All Rights Reserved

154 of 492 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

STAR April 27, 2012 Friday

SECRETARY CLINTON: URGE UZBEKISTAN TO FIGHT FORCED CHILD LABOR

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 147 words

DATELINE: NEW YORK, N.Y.

The following information was released by the Open Society Institute:

The Open Society Foundations and partner organizations have written to Secretary of State Clinton asking her to urge the Uzbek government to take meaningful steps to come into compliance with its international obligations to fight forced labor, particularly during the annual cotton harvest.

This request comes on the eve of an Uzbekistan-sponsored convening of the United Nations Children Fund, the International Labour Organization (ILO) Moscow Office, and the European Commission in Tashkent to discuss Uzbekistan's compliance with its ILO commitments. The letter urged the State Department not to waive downgrading Uzbekistan to tier three (the lowest status) in this year's Trafficking in Persons report unless the Uzbek authorities allow ILO representatives unfettered monitoring of this fall's cotton harvest.

LOAD-DATE: May 30, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 States News Service

155 of 492 DOCUMENTS

ArabianBusiness.com

ArabianBusiness.com

April 18, 2012 Wednesday

Human trafficking cases down 37%, says UAE gov t

BYLINE: Shane McGinleyLENGTH: 398 words

The number of workers illegally trafficked into the UAE dropped by 37 percent last year, according to a report by the state news agency. While the WAM report did not give exact figures for the number of people trafficked into the Gulf state, it said tackling the subject was a major priority for the government. "For the majority of trafficked people, it is only when they arrive in the UAE that they realise that the work they were promised does not exist and they are forced instead to get employed in jobs or conditions to which they did not give their consent. Since the criminal activity begins from source countries, creating partnerships with both source and transit countries is now of paramount importance to the national strategy of the UAE," the government's report on the issue read. The investigation, compiled by the National Committee to Combat Human Trafficking, added that ?

the implementation of the UAE's legal and social support mechanisms during the last five years of its concerted fight against human trafficking has been recognised by the international community". Despite the positive results in the UAE, a US State Department report last year said the fight against human trafficking, from abuses of migrant workers to organised prostitution networks, has lost ground in the past year. The number of countries failing to comply with international standards to prevent human trafficking almost doubled to 23, according to US State Department's 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report released in June. "The problem of modern trafficking may be entrenched, and it may seem like there is no end in sight," Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said in a statement accompanying the report. "But if we act on the laws that have been passed and the commitments that have been made, it is solvable." As many as 27m people are "living in a state of modern slavery," she said. Eleven countries have dropped into so-called Tier 3, those with the poorest record of fighting trafficking, joining 12 nations previously listed in that category under guidelines set by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act. The 11 countries are: Lebanon, Yemen, Algeria, Libya, Central African Republic, Equatorial Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Madagascar, Micronesia, Turkmenistan and Venezuela. They join nations such as Iran and Saudi Arabia with the poorest records on taking action to prevent human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: April 18, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Web PublicationJOURNAL-CODE: 167

156 of 492 DOCUMENTS

AAP Newsfeed

April 11, 2012 Wednesday 1:34 PM AEST

ASIA: Rally against Vietnam child traffickingBYLINE: Helen ClarkSECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 432 wordsDATELINE: HANOI April 11

An Australian-organised motorbike rally that crosses Vietnam to raise money for children's charity Blue Dragon started on Wednesday with almost double the number of participants from last year.

A dinner for participants was held in Hanoi on Tuesday night with the Australian ambassador to Vietnam Allaster Cox and Blue Dragon founder Michael Brosowski from Sydney.

Brosowski said riders started the ride with breakfast at the charity's headquarters before heading to Hue in central Vietnam via the Ho Chi Minh Trail, an old wartime supply route.

"All money is going to our anti-trafficking (work)," he said.

"We are expanding our scope to include kids from ethnic minority villages in Dien Bien Phu province and also girls taken to China."

Blue Dragon assists street kids and other underprivileged children in Vietnam and also works against traffickers who often hire young children from Vietnam's poorest areas to work in garment factories in Ho Chi Minh City.

The charity has worked with local authorities to secure the release of 23 children, some as young as 12, from garment factories in Ho Chi Minh City. They had been taken over a period of two years from their families from a small hamlet in remote northern Dien Bien Phu province.

Vietnam is rated as a Tier 2 Watch List nation in a worldwide report on human trafficking released by the US State Department last year.

Glenn Philips, one of three Australian organisers, who has flown back to Vietnam from the UK, says that some $50,000 has so far been raised up from $40,000 last year.

Philips says that given close to double the number of riders are attending the second Rally Indochina, the event is being divided into two groups.

The mostly Australian group -- though participants also hail from New Zealand, Canada, the Netherlands and Azerbaijan -- will ride on 650cc Urals, some in side cars. Though the bikes are still made today, the Indochina fleet are from the 1970s.

Many older models of motorbike in communist Vietnam were manufactured in various Soviet republics through the once strong friendship between Hanoi and the USSR during the Cold War.

'Minsk' motorcycles long popular with farmers and expats are now fashionable with sections of Hanoi's youth.

"Personally, I am very excited to be involved in the second Rally Indochina and to see it grow from the previous year," Phillips said.

"I have relocated to the UK but have come back to Vietnam to be involved in the rally -- and I'm also looking forward to getting out on the road again in Vietnam for a great ride and a great cause."

LOAD-DATE: April 11, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Australian Associated Press Pty. Ltd.

157 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

AAP Newsfeed

April 10, 2012 Tuesday 10:31 PM AEST

VIC:Aussies kick off Rally Indochina

BYLINE: Helen Clark

SECTION: DOMESTIC NEWS

LENGTH: 318 words

DATELINE: MELBOURNE April 10

The Australian-organised motorbike rally that crosses Vietnam to raise money for children's charity Blue Dragon will set off again with almost double the number of participants from last year.

A dinner for participants was held in capital Hanoi on Tuesday night, with the Australian ambassador to Vietnam Allaster Cox attending. The rally begins on Wednesday.

Blue Dragon founder Michael Brosowski, from Sydney, also attended. He said riders will drop in at the charity's headquarters on Wednesday for breakfast. They'll then drive to Hue in central Vietnam via the Ho Chi Minh Trail, an old wartime supply route, before flying on to Ho Chi Minh City.

"All money is going to our anti-trafficking (work). We are expanding our scope to include kids from ethnic minority villages in Dien Bien Phu province and also girls taken to China," he told AAP via email on Tuesday.

Blue Dragon assists street kids and other underprivileged children in Vietnam and also works against traffickers who often hire young children from Vietnam's poorest areas to work in garment factories in Ho Chi Minh City.

Last year, AAP reported the charity had worked with local authorities to secure the release of 23 children, some as young as 12, from garment factories in HCMC. They had been taken over a period of two years from their families from a small hamlet in remote northern Dien Bien Phu province.

Vietnam is rated as a Tier 2 Watch List nation in a worldwide report on human trafficking released by the US State Department last year.

Glenn Philips, one of three Australian organisers, says about $50,000 has been raised so far.

Each of the 25 participants paid a $3990 fee, $1600 of which goes direct to the charity.

Last year, riders handed over a cheque for $40,000.

"Personally, I am very excited to be involved in the second Rally Indochina and to see it grow from the previous year," Mr Philips said.

LOAD-DATE: April 11, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Australian Associated Press Pty. Ltd.

158 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Los Angeles Times

April 8, 2012 Sunday
Home Edition

Coming for work, arriving at misery; African migrants lured by Libya's relative wealth find abuse, detention and worse.

BYLINE: Glen JohnsonSECTION: MAIN NEWS; Foreign Desk; Part A; Pg. 6LENGTH: 1227 wordsDATELINE: TRIPOLI, LIBYA

Ahmed Mostafa and his friends paid thousands of dollars among them to get to Libya recently, traveling with gangs of smugglers through Western Africa. It was to be their escape from the sprawling slums of Ghana's capital city, Accra.

Mostafa had heard rumors of arbitrary arrests and Libyan lynch mobs during the war last year in which longtime Libyan leader Moammar Kadafi was ousted and killed. But he was counting on luck: "It was not something I really thought about," he said. "I thought I would come and secure some work. Then send some money to my family."

Instead, he and his 10 friends wound up in a government-run prison, Twoshi Detention Center, sleeping on small foam mattresses, dozens to a room. A militia had spied them two weeks earlier walking along a dusty road in the country's north and detained them. They remain in the prison, uncharged and without legal representation.

In Libya, illegal migration is once again picking up, conducted through two primary trafficking corridors in the east and west of the country. A stream of Africans -- Somalis, Eritreans, Nigerians, Sudanese, Malians -- dreaming of a new life have made the perilous trip to Libya. But as turmoil continues to reign through much of the country, many of these migrants are being rounded up and detained, in some cases, to be exploited as forced laborers.

"The going rate for a migrant is anywhere from 260 to 800 Libyan dinars," or about $210 to $645, said Jeremy Haslam, chief of the Libya mission for the International Organization for Migration. "One of the problems is that many detention facilities are not currently under state control, instead administered by local councils and even private parties. The latter may involve organized crime, running human trafficking operations -- modern-day slavery."

At some detention facilities, staff members lease out black African detainees to employers, who make a contribution to the jails to help cover costs. Other migrants are said to be sold outright to employers.

"In some circumstances, it can appear like a legitimate transaction but is essentially exploitative," Haslam said. "And it's widespread."

Migrants often "work off" the debt of their sale, Haslam said, and have no chance to negotiate hours or rates or the kind of work they do.

"With no status in the country, the cycle can continue indefinitely, with the migrant re-traded once the employer no longer needs their services," he said.

Libya's borders have long been haunted by smuggling rings that ferry drugs, arms and migrants through an intricate web of clandestine trading routes. The country's relative wealth, gleaned mainly from its oil industry -- providing an annual per capita income of $12,000, the highest in Africa -- has ensured its place as a destination for illegal immigrants.

Cleaner. Builder. Farmhand. Prostitute. Domestic servant. Libya's migrant workers, at least 1.5 million strong at the outbreak of last year's warfare, were all of these things, and the country depended heavily on them. Yet they were always viewed as outsiders, necessary for filling jobs that Libyans would not do.

Some, meanwhile, were reviled as drug dealers and participants in a dark underworld of gang violence.

In the end, they stood as exemplars of how Kadafi's focus on sub-Saharan Africa -- after numerous scuttled attempts to fit into the Middle East and North Africa -- came at the expense of his own people. And resentment grew.

Libya has no legislative framework to protect migrants from abuse and exploitation. In its 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report, the U.S. State Department ranked Libya in the bottom tier, reserved for countries that "do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts" to eliminate human trafficking.

Racially motivated and xenophobic attacks, which occurred frequently before the insurgency, increased vastly over the last year as the country descended into chaos. Rumors swirled throughout Libya -- wildly embellished, according to Amnesty International -- that Kadafi was flying in mercenaries en masse, with terrifying consequences for black migrant workers.

Recently released undated video shows black Africans held in a cage, surrounded by a mob. They sit, feet tied and hands bound behind their backs. All have the green former Libyan flag stuffed into their mouths. Men shout "dogs" and "God is great" and force them to gnaw on the flags.

The slide of a pistol is pulled back and a gunshot rings out. The men stand up and hop, like an act from a demented circus, in front of their tormentors. Another shot rings out. The video cuts.

"I want to tell the guards that I am not a mercenary," said Mostafa, standing in a courtyard outside his cell. "But I cannot speak Arabic. I cannot express myself to them."

Nearby, other migrants set to weeding a patch of grass, under the eyes of prison guards.

No one really knows how many detention centers -- increasingly notorious for human rights abuses, including torture and rape of inmates -- are operating in Libya or how many people are being held.

The United Nations estimates that at least 7,000 people are locked up -- including migrants, Kadafi loyalists and criminals -- and has advocated for the issuance of temporary documentation to illegal migrants to offer some protection.

According to Haslam, about 90% of illegal migrants have no valid identification, which complicates the process of repatriation, prolongs their detention and leaves them vulnerable to arbitrary arrest and exploitation.

"They should give them all visas," said Mohammed Khoja, who supervises a team of four Nigerian street cleaners who are illegal immigrants. "We need them."

His workers sift through the accumulated junk in their patch of the city long into the night. It chokes the edges of streets and comes in waves down alleyways. Three years now they have toiled, his four workers, amid Tripoli's waste.

Wraith-like and filthy, they flit between stalls and parked cars, clutching brooms. Emaciated forms stooped in the night. A deathly odor -- rotten fruit, chicken feces and slaughtered animals -- clogs the air.

Some people see the four of them as no better than the trash they collect or the pavement they clean, says one of the men, Abdallah.

They bought cheap portable CD players to block out the abuse. Bob Marley and Rihanna accompany them long into the night, when family and friends back in Nigeria's slums drift into their thoughts.

They were smuggled into Libya. They say the trip was simple brutality as they were juggled between ruthless gangs of traffickers and corrupt, profiteering officials, mostly from Chad and Libya. "Everything you can imagine happened. Rape. Theft. Beatings," Abdallah said.

Clashes in the remote southern town of Kufra, a staging post for traffickers, have escalated over the last few months. Rumors quickly spread that Chadian mercenaries were seeking to destabilize Libya. In fact, rival gangs of traffickers, many of them Libyan nationals, were battling for control over migration routes.

The rumors fed into a cycle of discrimination in which anyone with black skin was subject to arrest and imprisonment.

Like Mostafa.

He is unsure what will happen to him. But he knows his dream of a world outside Ghana's slums is over.

"I want to tell my family to come and rescue me," he says. "I want to go home."

--

Johnson is a special correspondent.

LOAD-DATE: April 8, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: PHOTO: IMMIGRANTS FILL a makeshift detention center in Gharyan, Libya. Many migrants are held without charge; some enter forced labor. PHOTOGRAPHER:Mahmud Turkia AFP/Getty Images PHOTO: IN LIBYA'S eastern city of Benghazi, Somali immigrants gather at a detention facility. Attacks on immigrants have sharply increased in Libya in the last year. PHOTOGRAPHER:Abdullah Doma AFP/Getty Images

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 Los Angeles Times
All Rights Reserved

159 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Congressional Documents and Publications

March 27, 2012

House Oversight and Government Reform Subcommittee on Technology, Informational Policy, Intergovernmental Relations and Procurement Reform Hearing;
"Labor Abuses, Human Trafficking, and Government Contracts: Is the Government Doing Enough to Protect Vulnerable Workers?";
Testimony by Richard Ginman, Director, Defense Procurement and Acquisition Policy, U.S. Department of Defense

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 2311 words

Chairman Lankford, Ranking Member Connolly, and members of the Subcommittee, thank you for the opportunity to appear before you today to discuss our efforts to combat trafficking in persons.

I am Richard Ginman, the Director of Defense Procurement and Acquisition Policy (DPAP) in the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics (USD(ATandL)), where I am responsible for Department-wide contracting policy and functional leadership. I am a Career Civil Servant, with more than 40 years experience in government and commercial business in the fields of contracting, acquisition, and financial management. Before returning to DPAP duties in October 2006, I held several private sector positions including Vice President of General Dynamics Maritime Information Systems and Director of Contracts for Digital System Resources. I served in the United States Navy for 30 years, retiring as a Rear Admiral, Supply Corps. In addition to three tours afloat, I served in a variety of contracting and acquisition positions that included Commander, Navy Exchange Service Command; Deputy for Acquisition and Business Management in the office of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Research Development and Acquisition; and Deputy Commander for Contracts, Naval Sea Systems Command.

I work closely within the Office of the Secretary of Defense to ensure that DoD policies for other functional areas which affect contractors are properly implemented into the Defense Federal Acquisition Regulation Supplement to provide guidance to contracting officers and contractors for executing DoD contracts. With regards to Combating Trafficking in Persons (CTIP), my top priority is to support the Federal Government and Defense Department's zero tolerance policy. We support the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness in their efforts to manage the DoD Trafficking in Persons Program required by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 and subsequent Reauthorizations.

We promulgate contracting guidance to DoD's contracting community primarily through policies and the Defense Federal Acquisition Regulation Supplement (DFARS). The purpose of the DFARS is to provide the roadmap for the acquisition workforce to acquire the goods and services DoD requires to ensure America's warfighters continued worldwide success. At the Federal level, we participate in the Federal Acquisition Regulatory Council and work with the Office of Management and Budget's Office of Federal Procurement Policy, the General Services Administration, and National Aeronautics and Space Administration to manage the Federal Acquisition Regulation (FAR). The FAR provides uniform policies and procedures for acquisition by all Executive agencies.

The DoD CTIP program implements requirements of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 and subsequent Reauthorizations in DoD Instruction 2200.01 Combating Trafficking in Persons (CTIP) Series (latest version September 2010). The Department of Defense policy has evolved over time. In 2004, the Secretary of Defense put forth his zero tolerance policy on Combating Trafficking in Persons, which was addressed to all DoD members - military, government civilian and contractor civilian. This was followed in 2007 by Department of Defense Instruction 2200.01, "Combating Trafficking in Persons," which requires the incorporation of provisions in overseas contracts that: a) prohibit any activities on the part of contractor employees that support or promote trafficking in persons and b) impose suitable penalties on contractors that fail to monitor the conduct of their employees. Due to the interagency nature of the policy, a Federal Acquisition Regulation prescription and clause was developed and implemented as an interim rule in April 2006 and as a final rule in August 2007. Subsequently, the Federal Acquisition Regulation CTIP requirements were updated in 2009. The Defense Federal Acquisition Regulation Supplement at subpart 222.17 provides DoD contracting guidance to implement CTIP in DoD solicitations and contracts. This includes: 1) key policy references; 2) basic contract requirements; 3) Quality Assurance Surveillance Plans requirements; 4) information on where to find Geographic Combatant Commander related CTIP guidance when incorporating such requirements into the contract; 5) notification that the FAR clause cannot be deleted if its use is prescribed; and 6) actions the contracting officer must take when notified of a violation of the clause.

For Iraq and Afghanistan, US Central Command, through the Joint Contracting Command (Iraq/Afghanistan) and subsequently, its successor, the Joint Theater Support Contracting Command, has required that all services and construction contracts which require performance in Iraq and Afghanistan, incorporate into the associated solicitations and contracts, a local clause "Prohibition Against Human Trafficking, Inhumane Living Conditions, and Withholding of Employee Passports." This clause provides additional requirements that contractors must follow to protect its employees and subcontractors at all tiers. This includes:

(a) Reminding contractors of the prohibition contained in Title 18, United States Code, Section 1592, against knowingly destroying, concealing, removing, confiscating, or possessing any actual or purported passport or other immigration document, or any other actual or purported government identification document, of another person, to prevent or restrict or to attempt to prevent or restrict, without lawful authority, the person's liberty to move or travel, in order to maintain the labor or services of that person.

(b) Requiring contractors to comply with the following provisions: 1) Hold employee passports and other identification documents discussed above only for the shortest period of time reasonable for administrative processing purposes; 2) Provide all employees with a signed copy of their employment contract, in English as well as the employee's native language that defines the terms of their employment/compensation; 3) Do not utilize unlicensed recruiting firms, or firms that charge illegal recruiting fees; 4) Provide adequate living conditions (sanitation, health, safety, living space) for their employees. Fifty square feet is the minimum acceptable square footage of personal living space per employee. Upon contractor's written request, contracting officers may grant a waiver in writing in cases where the existing square footage is within 20% of the minimum, and the overall conditions are determined by the contracting officer to be acceptable. A copy of the waiver approval shall be maintained at the respective life support area; 5) Incorporate checks of life support areas to ensure compliance with the requirements of this Trafficking in Persons Prohibition into their Quality Control program, which will be reviewed within the Government's Quality Assurance process; and 6) Comply with International and Host Nation laws regarding transit/exit/entry procedures, and the requirements for visas and work permits.

(c) Advising the Contracting Officer if they learn of their employees violating the human trafficking and inhumane living conditions provisions contained herein. Put on notice that contracting officers and/or their representatives will conduct random checks to ensure contractors and subcontractors at all tiers are adhering to the law on human trafficking, humane living conditions and withholding of passports.

(d) Requiring incorporation of the substance of this clause, including this paragraph, in all subcontracts under this contract.

More recently, DPAP, in coordination with the CTIP Program Manager, has taken additional actions to improve awareness and the effectiveness of DoD's CTIP Program as applies to contracting and contractors. A brief chronology and description of these efforts follows:

* DECEMBER 2007 - The Defense Contingency Contracting Officer's Guide initially published. It has been updated twice (last update in June, 2010) and exists in both print and electronic versions. Interim updates are published electronically. These guides have all included CTIP content.

* JUNE 2010 - The Defense Contingency Contracting Officers Representative (COR) Guide initially published electronically on the DPAP website, followed by a print version in December 2010. Includes CTIP content.

* FEBRUARY 2011 - DCMA Afghanistan created and published a more robust stand-alone CTIP Examination checklist used by CORs, Quality Assurance Representatives (QARs) and Government Product Representatives (GTPRs) on contracts delegated to DCMA for administration. Similar requirements for Iraq and Kuwait.

* AUGUST 2011 - DPAP released CTIP Brochure "Fair Treatment for All Workers: Supporting U.S. Installations Abroad." Printed copies shipped to C-JTSCC in Iraq and Afghanistan. Electronic copy posted to DPAP and CENTCOM Contracting Webpage.

* AUGUST 2011 - CTIP related guidance for contracting officers approved for addition to DFARS PGI at 207.1(b)(20)(C)(10) (planning guidance) and 222.170 (updated guidance and references).

* NOVEMBER 2011 - Pocket sized CTIP reference card produced, translated into 7 languages: Pashtu, Malay, Urdu, Thai, Tagalog, Arabic and Dari. Printed copies shipped to C-JTSCC in Iraq and Afghanistan. Electronic copy posted to DPAP and CENTCOM Contracting Webpage.

* NOVEMBER 2011 - The DoD amended DFARS PGI 222.1703 to update the link to the DoD CTIP webpage and also update the policy guidance to reflect the 2010 version of DoDI 2200.01 .

* DECEMBER 2011 - Added a CTIP Topic Section to the DPAP Contingency Contracting Webpage

* FEBRUARY 2012 - New contract administration function (S-73) for administering TIP added to DFARS 242.302. Associated language at DFARS 222.1703.

* MARCH 2012 - DoD publishes in Federal Register a proposed DFARS Rule "Alleged Crimes By or Against Contractor Personnel (DFARS Case 2012-D006)." Proposes to expand existing DFARS coverage currently applicable only to DoD contracts performed in Iraq and Afghanistan and make it applicable worldwide for contractors supporting contingency operations, humanitarian or peacekeeping operations, or other military operations or military exercises, when designated by the Combatant Commander. Expanding the coverage worldwide will provide contractors the guidance they need to take actions should alleged offenses by or against contractor personnel occur.

DPAP will continue to work aggressively with the CTIP Program to support their efforts to improve visibility of and compliance with the Federal and Department of Defense CTIP Program among contracting officers and contractors worldwide. Two of my staff are members of the DoD CTIP Program Manager's Task Force. We participated in the development of the Department's CTIP Plan of Action and Milestones.

Contractors are paramount to the success of DoD's missions. Our efforts include initiatives for their compliance with DoD's CTIP policy. In October 2006, DoD published an anti-trafficking interim rule clause within the DFARS for contracts performed outside the United States. The clause required contractors to establish an awareness program to inform employees regarding TIP. The clause also required contractors to develop policy and procedures that prohibit any activities on the part of contractor employees to establish an awareness program to inform employees regarding TIP.

The Federal Acquisition Regulation was amended to include a TIP clause in 2009 that required the contractor to notify its employees of the US Government's zero tolerance policy toward TIP and to take appropriate action against employees or subcontractors that violate the policy. It did not require contractors to establish an awareness program for their employees. When the FAR rule was published, the DFARS Procedures, Guidance, and Information (PGI) Part 222, was modified to add a clause for contractors regarding DoD's zero tolerance policy and CTIP training program. A DFARS requirement, published in February 2012 the Federal Register, adds additional contract administration duties to maintain surveillance over contractor compliance with Trafficking in Persons requirements for all DoD contracts, as specified in the FAR clause 52.222-50 on TIP.

At the end of the 90's our nation implemented a deliberate strategy to reduce reliance on organic forces for combat and combat service support in favor of contracted support. However, during OIF/OEF, the rate of growth of contracted support challenged DoD's ability to put in place the overarching framework necessary to properly manage and control contractors in forward areas, including aspects related to management of their personnel on the battlefield. The growth of contracted service support resulted in a huge expansion of contractor personnel working and residing on forward operating bases, including many personnel from third country nations and local nationals. While traditionally contractors are responsible for the logistics support of their personnel stateside, the hostile environment in Iraq and Afghanistan dictated that DoD rapidly grow its capability to manage and control the masses of contractor personnel who now lived and worked on forward operating bases. DoD policies and doctrine associated with managing these contractor personnel continue to evolve. The Department takes seriously the responsibilities associated with countering Trafficking in Persons and the need to ensure we properly manage and oversee all contractor personnel authorized to accompany the force, regardless of origin.

I thank you for the opportunity to speak about the DoD's CTIP program and some of our DPAP initiatives to combat trafficking in persons.

Read this original document at: <http://oversight.house.gov/wp-content/uploads/2012/03/3-27-12-TechIP-Ginman.pdf>

LOAD-DATE: March 28, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: COSHC

Copyright 2012 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

160 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

Congressional Documents and Publications

March 27, 2012

House Oversight and Government Reform Subcommittee on Technology, Informational Policy, Intergovernmental Relations and Procurement Reform Hearing;
"Labor Abuses, Human Trafficking, and Government Contracts: Is the Government Doing Enough to Protect Vulnerable Workers?";
Testimony by Kenneth Moorefield, Deputy Inspector General for Special Plans and Operations, U.S. Department of Defense

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 2906 words

Chairman Lankford, Ranking Member Connolly, and distinguished members of the Subcommittee on Technology, Information Policy, Intergovernmental Relations and Procurement Reform:

Thank you for this opportunity to discuss past and ongoing efforts by the Department of Defense (DoD) Office of Inspector General (DoD IG) in the area of combating trafficking in persons (CTIP). The DoD IG previously presented testimony on oversight efforts concerning the topic of human trafficking in 2004, 2006, and before your subcommittee on November 2, 2011.

Completed DoD IG Efforts

DoD IG initiated its first assessment of DoD CTIP as a result of a May 31, 2002 request made by thirteen Members of Congress to the Secretary of Defense seeking a "thorough, global and extensive" investigation into the publicized allegation that U.S. military leadership in Korea had been implicitly condoning sex slavery at the hands of traffickers.

In response to those Congressional concerns, the DoD IG initiated an assessment project to assess efforts to combat human trafficking within the United States Forces-Korea. In addition, DoD criminal investigations of DoD contractors underway during this period led the DoD IG to expand its assessment focus to incorporate DoD and DoD contractor activities in the European theater of operations, in particular, in n1 The two assessments recommended that the Secretary of Defense issue a policy statement that clearly and unambiguously set forth DoD opposition to any activities promoting, supporting, or sanctioning human trafficking. Bosnia-Herzegovina and Kosovo.

Subsequently, on January 30, 2004, the Deputy Secretary of Defense issued a memorandum, "Combating Trafficking in Persons in the Department of Defense," that stated "It is the policy of the DoD that trafficking in persons will not be facilitated in any way by the activities of our Service members, civilian employees, indirect hires or DoD contract personnel." In addition, DoD established annual CTIP awareness training for all DoD Service members and civilians, which has been in effect since 2004. With respect to the trafficking in persons (TIP) issues raised concerning Korea, the Command has taken multiple actions to prohibit and prevent DoD military, civilian, and contractor personnel from patronizing establishments it had declared off-limits.

In 2005, the DoD IG initiated an evaluation of CTIP efforts across DoD in further response to the 2002 request from Members of Congress. The resulting report, issued in November 2006, recommended that the Office of the Secretary of Defense, the Military Services and Combatant Commands develop CTIP policy and program guidance, and that the military commands evaluate the effectiveness of their CTIP awareness training. In response to the report, in 2007, the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness issued DoD Instruction 2200.01, "Combating Trafficking in Persons," that established policy and assigned CTIP program responsibilities across the Department. The Under Secretary also created and filled the position of DoD CTIP Program Manager within that office. Additionally, the CTIP Program Officer for each DoD Component is required to report annually to the DoD CTIP Program Manager on CTIP training metrics and effectiveness.

The most recent oversight efforts conducted by the DoD IG were in response to Public Law 110-457, the "William Wilberforce Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2008," signed on December 23, 2008. Section 232 of the Act required the Inspectors General of DoD, State and USAID to "...investigate a sample of ... contracts, or subcontracts at any tier, under which there is a heightened risk that a contractor may engage, knowingly or unknowingly, in acts related to trafficking in persons...." The Act also required the respective Inspectors General to submit a report to Congress, no later than January 15, for three consecutive years beginning in 2010.

The DoD IG consulted with the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons and selected for assessment four Combatant Commands with overseas responsibilities and contracting presence: U.S. Pacific, U.S. Central, and U.S. European, and Africa Commands issued January 17, 2012, n2 The reports primarily focused on whether the contracts sampled were in compliance with Federal Acquisition Regulation (FAR) requirements.

The contract sample in each assessment included all construction and service contracts within the respective combatant command's area of responsibility, with a place of performance outside the United States, a period of performance in FY 2009 or later, and with a total contract value of $5 million or greater. This provided a reasonable data set which particularly focused on labor-intensive contracts.

The U.S. Pacific Command CTIP report, issued on January 15, 2010, was based on a sample of 99 contracts with places of performance in the Republic of Korea, Japan, and the Territory of Guam. We found FAR clause 52.222-50, "Combating Trafficking in Persons," present in 93 percent of the contracts we reviewed. However, 42 percent of those clauses were added shortly before the site visit. Further, the team found that the Command's contract quality assurance reviews did not specifically include reviews of contractor TIP compliance and/or violations.

The DoD IG also recommended in that report that the Director, Defense Procurement and Acquisition Policy modify widely-used contract writing software to ensure that the FAR CTIP clause was automatically included in contracts or solicitations. We also recommended that the Defense Federal Acquisition Regulation Supplement guidance be updated to require CTIP oversight in contract quality assurance plans. The Director, Defense Procurement, and Acquisition Policy, initiated the software modification and, in January 2011, revised the relevant guidance.

In addition, the DoD IG team determined that contracting offices did not have access to an effective DoD process for obtaining TIP violation information from DoD criminal investigative organizations once their cases were closed, which would then provide the option of administrative contract remedial action. To address this issue, DoD updated DoD Instruction 2200.01, "Combating Trafficking in Persons (CTIP)", September 15, 2010, requiring the Secretaries of the Military Departments and Commanders of the Combatant Commands to "provide information on all known TIP cases to the USD (PandR) DoD Program Manager." However, providing timely, publicly releasable information on TIP-related criminal indictments and convictions to DoD contracting organizations remains a challenge.

The report on U.S. Central Command, issued January 18, 2011, was based on a sample of 369 DoD contracts performed in the Republic of Iraq, the State of Kuwait, the State of Qatar, and the Kingdom of Bahrain. We determined that a CTIP clause was present in 79 percent of the contracts reviewed.

The team also found that the U.S. Central Command Contracting Command had published its own supplement for inclusion in all service and construction contracts within the Command's area of responsibility to strengthen the FAR CTIP clause. This was in response to allegations received by the Command that some DoD contractors were providing poor living conditions or withholding employee passports.

However, the DoD IG team also identified a significant number of contracts where the Command supplement was mistakenly used to replace the required pre-existing FAR clause. The team recommended that the Commander, U.S. Central Command Contracting Command modify the guidance to clarify proper usage of both the FAR and Command supplement CTIP clauses. The Commander concurred and issued modified guidance in September 2011.

The team also identified examples of proactive action taken by two DoD contracting commands in Kuwait, both of which had implemented a requirement to include CTIP compliance in contract quality assurance reviews. Further, Army Contracting Command-Kuwait had developed and implemented a CTIP questionnaire, translated into five common employee languages, as part of quality assurance audits.

In addition, the Defense Contract Management Agency (DCMA) in Kuwait had included CTIP-focused questions into a Theater Quality Plan for quality assurance contract audits reviewing contractor knowledge and understanding of CTIP clause requirements. DCMA representatives also provided reports based on periodic health and sanitation inspections they had conducted of employee camps in Iraq. In 2010, the DoD IG team visited several employee camps run by sub-contractors in Iraq; the employees interviewed verified that DCMA personnel checked conditions on a regular basis. The team did not observe any living conditions in the camps that would constitute a violation of CTIP statutes or regulations.

The DoD IG report on the U.S. European Command and U.S. Africa Command n3, issued January 17, 2012, was based on a sample of 267 contracts executed in the Federal Republic of Germany, the Italian Republic, and the United Kingdom.

We found some form of a CTIP clause present in 70 percent of the contracts reviewed; however, only half had the current required FAR clause. We recommended the Military Departments correct the contracts identified as deficient in our review. The team also determined that three DoD contracting organizations specifically discussed the FAR CTIP clause during post-award orientations with contractors to increase awareness of CTIP programs.

In neither Combatant Command did the team find or have reported to it TIP violation incidents.

DoD IG TIP Investigations

There have been systemic obstacles which have hindered successful TIP criminal investigations, including jurisdiction limitations, foreign law enforcement capabilities, command investigative standards of evidence, and the challenges of evidence collection in contingency operation contracting environments.

In spite of these difficulties, since 2006 the Defense Criminal Investigative Service of the DoD Office of Inspector General has investigated 21 TIP-related allegations worldwide, resulting in five cases being referred to the Department of Justice, of which one was accepted for prosecution. The violation in the accepted case was determined to be centered more on fraud against immigrants than on human trafficking, and, in any case, did not have a DoD nexus. Therefore, the Defense Criminal Investigative Service closed its investigation. The case was pursued by local law enforcement organizations and the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement of the Department of Homeland Security.

DoD Non-Appropriated Fund Organizations

During the DoD IG CTIP assessment of the U.S. Pacific Command in 2009, the team noted that non-appropriated fund entities were not required to include the FAR CTIP clause in their contracts. Therefore, we included an assessment of the Navy Exchange (NEX), and Army and Air Force Exchange Service (AAFES) CTIP policy and procedures within the reviews of the U.S. Central Command and the U.S. European and Africa Commands.

The DoD Resale Activities and Non-appropriated Fund Policy office within the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness has issued guidance to DoD Non-appropriated fund organizations reinforcing the application of trafficking in persons statutory requirements to their contracting activities.

The review of AAFES Europe identified that the Commander had issued a Manpower Associate "Bill of Rights," available in English and eight other languages, that subordinate organizations were directed to post on employee bulletin boards for easy access. The Commander also had established an employee passport possession policy to ensure that "contractors do not withhold the passports of TCNs [Third Country Nationals] working in our facilities."

In Kuwait during the 2010 field assessment, the DoD IG team observed AAFES passport checks and employee interviews first-hand while accompanying a contracting officer representative to several facilities. No CTIP violations were observed. The team also received a detailed briefing from the AAFES legal counsel outlining several additional TIP-related incidents and the contract remedies applied.

Ongoing DoD IG Assessments

A DoD IG team evaluating the DoD CTIP program in Afghanistan completed fieldwork in February 2012. The draft report will be provided to the Department for management comments within the next few weeks, and the final report is expected to be issued in May 2012.

The team examined 240 contracts administered by Army, Navy, and Air Force commands, as well as Defense Agencies in Afghanistan, and visited nine separate installations throughout Afghanistan. It conducted over 110 interviews with military commanders and contracting personnel, interviewed representatives from 10 U.S. and foreign contractors, and met with 145 contractor employees (Afghan and third-country nationals).

It is worth noting is that the mandatory CTIP clause was included in 93 percent (224 of 240) of the contracts reviewed, a significant improvement from previous Combatant Command assessments, including for the rest of U.S. Central Command.

During our fieldwork, the DoD IG team was made aware of an investigation recently conducted by the NATO International Military Police that had identified an Afghan company as involved in TIP violations. The case had been subsequently referred to the contracting officer, who took action recommending debarment. Additionally, the team was informed by third country nationals at one U.S. base that they were living in what could be adverse living conditions. We referred this complaint to the prime contractor, the U.S. contracting organization responsible for the administrative oversight of the contract, and the base commander/commandant, who initiated an immediate investigation.

In addition to and concurrent with the multi-year review of contracts required by PL 110-457, the DoD IG has self-initiated an assessment of DoD Component CTIP program compliance and performance. As of this date, we have reviewed CTIP policies, procedures, awareness, and implementation in over 70 DoD organizations, including responsible officials in the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness, and headquarters and major subordinate commands of the Military Services, Defense Agencies, and Combatant Commands. At each location, the team interviewed:

- . commanders and staff responsible for the CTIP program,
- . law enforcement personnel and legal counsel,
- . contracting officers, specialists, and quality assurance specialists, contracting officer representatives, and
- . representatives of contracting firms, and when possible, their employees.

This report is scheduled for final release in the summer of 2012.

November 2, 2011 HOCR Hearing

During the November 2 hearing before this subcommittee, the Deputy Inspector General for Special Plans and Operations was asked to provide recommendations for improving CTIP compliance and enforcement. Our response, dated January 31, 2012, included suggestions designed to strengthen DoD TIP-related oversight, compliance, enforcement, and data availability and accuracy, to include:

- . DoD Component Commanders and their Component Inspectors General could make CTIP a special interest item in Command inspections, assessments, or program reviews. Further, these special interest item inspections should include non-appropriated fund activities conducted by any DoD Component. Regular comprehensive reviews by DoD Components oversight agencies would increase Command awareness, improve policies, ensure the inclusion of required CTIP language in contracts, and verify contractor and subcontractor compliance.
- . DoD could assess and centralize its TIP-related data collection with respect to: identification of the number of third country nationals supporting DoD contingency operations; consolidating contractual remedies applied in cases of TIP allegations; and identifying instances of criminal violations and sanctions.

Conclusion

The DoD IG remains committed to providing oversight support of the U.S. Government's "zero tolerance policy" against trafficking in persons. We will continue to evaluate the related DoD programs for compliance with relevant statutes, policies and regulations.

I thank you again for this opportunity to update you on DoD IG oversight of DoD actions to combat trafficking in persons.

n1 "Assessment of DoD Efforts to Combat Trafficking in Persons, Phase I - United States Forces Korea," July 2003, www.dodig.mil/fo/Foia/H03L88433128PhaseI.pdf, and "Assessment of DoD Efforts to Combat Trafficking in Persons, Phase II - Bosnia-Herzegovina and Kosovo," December 2003, www.dodig.mil/fo/Foia/HT-Phase_II.pdf.

n2 IE-2010-001, "Evaluation of DoD Contracts Regarding Combating Trafficking in Persons," January 15, 2010; SPO-2011-002, "Evaluation of DoD Contracts regarding Combating Trafficking in Persons: U.S. Central Command," January 18, 2011; DODIG-2012-041, "Evaluation of DoD Contracts Regarding Combating Trafficking in Persons: U.S. European Command and U.S. Africa Command," January 17, 2012. For copies of the reports see <http://www.dodig.mil/Inspections/IE/Reports.htm>.

n3 U.S. Africa Command is headquartered in Stuttgart, Germany.

Read this original document at: <http://oversight.house.gov/wp-content/uploads/2012/03/3-27-12-TechIP-Moorefield.pdf>

LOAD-DATE: March 28, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: COSHC

Copyright 2012 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

161 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
CQ Congressional TestimonyMarch 27, 2012 TuesdayGOVERNMENT PROTECTIONS OF VULNERABLE WORKERS;
COMMITTEE: HOUSE OVERSIGHT AND GOVERNMENT REFORM;
SUBCOMMITTEE: TECHNOLOGY, INFORMATION POLICY, INTER-
GOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS AND PROCUREMENT REFORM

SECTION: CAPITOL HILL HEARING TESTIMONY

LENGTH: 2356 words

TESTIMONY-BY: MR. RICHARD T. GINMAN, DIRECTOR

AFFILIATION: U.S. DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

Statement of Mr. Richard T. Ginman Director, Defense Procurement And Acquisition Policy U.S. Department of Defense

Committee on House Oversight and Government Reform Subcommittee on Technology, Information Policy, Intergovernmental Relations and Procurement Reform

March 27, 2012

Chairman Lankford, Ranking Member Connolly, and members of the Subcommittee, thank you for the opportunity to appear before you today to discuss our efforts to combat trafficking in persons.

I am Richard Ginman, the Director of Defense Procurement and Acquisition Policy (DPAP) in the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, Technology, and Logistics (USD(AT&L)), where I am responsible for Department-wide contracting policy and functional leadership. I am a Career Civil Servant, with more than 40 years experience in government and commercial business in the fields of contracting, acquisition, and financial management. Before returning to DPAP duties in October 2006, I held several private sector positions including Vice President of General Dynamics Maritime Information Systems and Director of Contracts for Digital System Resources. I served in the United States Navy for 30 years, retiring as a Rear Admiral, Supply Corps. In addition to three tours afloat, I served in a variety of contracting and acquisition positions that included Commander, Navy Exchange Service Command; Deputy for Acquisition and Business Management in the office of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Research Development and Acquisition; and Deputy Commander for Contracts, Naval Sea Systems Command.

I work closely within the Office of the Secretary of Defense to ensure that DoD policies for other functional areas which affect contractors are properly implemented into the Defense Federal Acquisition Regulation Supplement to provide guidance to contracting officers and contractors for executing DoD contracts. With regards to Combating Trafficking in Persons (CTIP), my top priority is to support the Federal Government and Defense Department's zero tolerance policy. We support the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness in their efforts to manage the DoD Trafficking in Persons Program required by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 and subsequent Reauthorizations.

We promulgate contracting guidance to DoD's contracting community primarily through policies and the Defense Federal Acquisition Regulation Supplement (DFARS). The purpose of the DFARS is to provide the roadmap for the acquisition workforce to acquire the goods and services DoD requires to ensure America's warfighters continued worldwide success. At the Federal level, we participate in the Federal Acquisition Regulatory Council and work with the Office of Management and Budget's Office of Federal Procurement Policy, the General Services Administration, and National Aeronautics and Space Administration to manage the Federal Acquisition Regulation (FAR). The FAR provides uniform policies and procedures for acquisition by all Executive agencies.

The DoD CTIP program implements requirements of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 and subsequent Reauthorizations in DoD Instruction 2200.01 Combating Trafficking in Persons (CTIP) Series (latest version September 2010). The Department of Defense policy has evolved over time. In 2004, the Secretary of Defense put forth his zero tolerance policy on Combating Trafficking in Persons, which was addressed to all DoD members - military, government civilian and contractor civilian. This was followed in 2007 by Department of Defense Instruction 2200.01, "Combating Trafficking in Persons," which requires the incorporation of provisions in overseas contracts that: a) prohibit any activities on the part of contractor employees that support or promote trafficking in persons and b) impose suitable penalties on contractors that fail to monitor the conduct of their employees. Due to the interagency nature of the policy, a Federal Acquisition Regulation prescription and clause was developed and implemented as an interim rule in April 2006 and as a final rule in August 2007. Subsequently, the Federal Acquisition Regulation CTIP requirements were updated in 2009. The Defense Federal Acquisition Regulation Supplement at subpart 222.17 provides DoD contracting guidance to implement CTIP in DoD solicitations and contracts.

This includes: 1) key policy references; 2) basic contract requirements; 3) Quality Assurance Surveillance Plans requirements; 4) information on where to find Geographic Combatant Commander related CTIP guidance when incorporating such requirements into the contract; 5) notification that the FAR clause cannot be deleted if its use is prescribed; and 6) actions the contracting officer must take when notified of a violation of the clause.

For Iraq and Afghanistan, US Central Command, through the Joint Contracting Command (Iraq/Afghanistan) and subsequently, its successor, the Joint Theater Support Contracting Command, has required that all services and construction contracts which require performance in Iraq and Afghanistan, incorporate into the associated solicitations and contracts, a local clause "Prohibition Against Human Trafficking, Inhumane Living Conditions, and Withholding of Employee Passports." This clause provides additional requirements that contractors must follow to protect its employees and subcontractors at all tiers.

This includes:

(a) Reminding contractors of the prohibition contained in Title 18, United States Code, Section 1592, against knowingly destroying, concealing, removing, confiscating, or possessing any actual or purported passport or other immigration document, or any other actual or purported government identification document, of another person, to prevent or restrict or to attempt to prevent or restrict, without lawful authority, the person's liberty to move or travel, in order to maintain the labor or services of that person.

(b) Requiring contractors to comply with the following provisions: 1) Hold employee passports and other identification documents discussed above only for the shortest period of time reasonable for administrative processing purposes; 2) Provide all employees with a signed copy of their employment contract, in English as well as the employee's native language that defines the terms of their employment/compensation; 3) Do not utilize unlicensed recruiting firms, or firms that charge illegal recruiting fees; 4) Provide adequate living conditions (sanitation, health, safety, living space) for their employees. Fifty square feet is the minimum acceptable square footage of personal living space per employee. Upon contractor's written request, contracting officers may grant a waiver in writing in cases where the existing square footage is within 20% of the minimum, and the overall conditions are determined by the contracting officer to be acceptable. A copy of the waiver approval shall be maintained at the respective life support area; 5) Incorporate checks of life support areas to ensure compliance with the requirements of this Trafficking in Persons Prohibition into their Quality Control program, which will be reviewed within the Government's Quality Assurance process; and 6) Comply with International and Host Nation laws regarding transit/exit/entry procedures, and the requirements for visas and work permits. Page 5 of 10

(c) Advising the Contracting Officer if they learn of their employees violating the human trafficking and inhumane living conditions provisions contained herein. Put on notice that contracting officers and/or their representatives will conduct random checks to ensure contractors and subcontractors at all tiers are adhering to the law on human trafficking, humane living conditions and withholding of passports.

(d) Requiring incorporation of the substance of this clause, including this paragraph, in all subcontracts under this contract.

More recently, DPAP, in coordination with the CTIP Program Manager, has taken additional actions to improve awareness and the effectiveness of DoD's CTIP Program as applies to contracting and contractors. A brief chronology and description of these efforts follows:

-- DECEMBER 2007 - The Defense Contingency Contracting Officer's Guide initially published. It has been updated twice (last update in June, 2010) and exists in both print and electronic versions. Interim updates are published electronically. These guides have all included CTIP content.

-- JUNE 2010 - The Defense Contingency Contracting Officers Representative (COR) Guide initially published electronically on the DPAP website, followed by a print version in December 2010. Includes CTIP content.

-- FEBRUARY 2011 - DCMA Afghanistan created and published a more robust stand-alone CTIP Examination checklist used by CORs, Quality Assurance Representatives (QARs) and Government Product Representatives (GTPRs) on contracts delegated to DCMA for administration. Similar requirements for Iraq and Kuwait.

-- AUGUST 2011 - DPAP released CTIP Brochure "Fair Treatment for All Workers: Supporting U.S. Installations Abroad." Printed copies shipped to C-JTSCC in Iraq and Afghanistan. Electronic copy posted to DPAP and CENTCOM Contracting Webpage.

-- AUGUST 2011 - CTIP related guidance for contracting officers approved for addition to DFARS PGI at 207.1(b)(20)(C)(10) (planning guidance) and 222.170 (updated guidance and references).

-- NOVEMBER 2011 - Pocket sized CTIP reference card produced, translated into 7 languages: Pashtu, Malay, Urdu, Thai, Tagalog, Arabic and Dari. Printed copies shipped to C-JTSCC in Iraq and Afghanistan. Electronic copy posted to DPAP and CENTCOM Contracting Webpage.

-- NOVEMBER 2011 - The DoD amended DFARS PGI 222.1703 to update the link to the DoD CTIP webpage and also update the policy guidance to reflect the 2010 version of DoDI 2200.01 .

-- DECEMBER 2011 - Added a CTIP Topic Section to the DPAP Contingency Contracting Webpage

-- FEBRUARY 2012 - New contract administration function (S-73) for administering TIP added to DFARS 242.302. Associated language at DFARS 222.1703.

-- MARCH 2012 - DoD publishes in Federal Register a proposed DFARS Rule "Alleged Crimes By or Against Contractor Personnel (DFARS Case 2012-D006)." Proposes to expand existing DFARS coverage currently applicable only to DoD contracts performed in Iraq and Afghanistan and make it applicable worldwide for contractors supporting contingency operations, humanitarian or peacekeeping operations, or other military operations or military exercises, when designated by the Combatant Commander. Expanding the coverage worldwide will provide contractors the guidance they need to take actions should alleged offenses by or against contractor personnel occur.

DPAP will continue to work aggressively with the CTIP Program to support their efforts to improve visibility of and compliance with the Federal and Department of Defense CTIP Program among contracting officers and contractors worldwide. Two of my staff are members of the DoD CTIP Program Manager's Task Force. We participated in the development of the Department's CTIP Plan of Action and Milestones.

Contractors are paramount to the success of DoD's missions. Our efforts include initiatives for their compliance with DoD's CTIP policy. In October 2006, DoD published an anti-trafficking interim rule clause within the DFARS for contracts performed outside the United States. The clause required contractors to establish an awareness program to inform employees regarding TIP. The clause also required contractors to develop policy and procedures that prohibit any activities on the part of contractor employees to establish an awareness program to inform employees regarding TIP.

The Federal Acquisition Regulation was amended to include a TIP clause in 2009 that required the contractor to notify its employees of the US Government's zero tolerance policy toward TIP and to take appropriate action against employees or subcontractors that violate the policy. It did not require contractors to establish an awareness program for their employees. When the FAR rule was published, the DFARS Procedures, Guidance, and Information (PGI) Part 222, was modified to add a clause for contractors regarding DoD's zero tolerance policy and CTIP training program. A DFARS requirement, published in February 2012 the Federal Register, adds additional contract administration duties to maintain surveillance over contractor compliance with Trafficking in Persons requirements for all DoD contracts, as specified in the FAR clause 52.222-50 on TIP.

At the end of the 90's our nation implemented a deliberate strategy to reduce reliance on organic forces for combat and combat service support in favor of contracted support. However, during OIF/OEF, the rate of growth of contracted support challenged DoD's ability to put in place the overarching framework necessary to properly manage and control contractors in forward areas, including aspects related to management of their personnel on the battlefield. The growth of contracted service support resulted in a huge expansion of contractor personnel working and residing on forward operating bases, including many personnel from third country nations and local nationals. While traditionally contractors are responsible for the logistics support of their personnel stateside, the hostile environment in Iraq and Afghanistan dictated that DoD rapidly grow its capability to manage and control the masses of contractor personnel who now lived and worked on forward operating bases. DoD policies and doctrine associated with managing these contractor personnel continue to evolve. The Department takes seriously the responsibilities associated with countering Trafficking in Persons and the need to ensure we properly manage and oversee all contractor personnel authorized to accompany the force, regardless of origin.

I thank you for the opportunity to speak about the DoD's CTIP program and some of our DPAP initiatives to combat trafficking in persons.

LOAD-DATE: March 28, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Congressional Testimony

Copyright 2012 Congressional Quarterly, Inc.
All Rights Reserved.

162 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
CQ Congressional TestimonyMarch 27, 2012 TuesdayGOVERNMENT PROTECTIONS OF VULNERABLE WORKERS;
COMMITTEE: HOUSE OVERSIGHT AND GOVERNMENT REFORM;
SUBCOMMITTEE: TECHNOLOGY, INFORMATION POLICY, INTER-
GOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS AND PROCUREMENT REFORM*SECTION: CAPITOL HILL HEARING TESTIMONYLENGTH: 2827 words

TESTIMONY-BY: KENNETH P. MOOREFIELD, DEPUTY INSPECTOR GENERAL

AFFILIATION: DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

Statement of Kenneth P. Moorefield Deputy Inspector General for Special Plans and Operations Department of Defense
Committee on House Oversight and Government Reform Subcommittee on Technology, Information Policy, Intergovernmental Relations and Procurement Reform

March 27, 2012

Chairman Lankford, Ranking Member Connolly, and distinguished members of the Subcommittee on Technology, Information Policy, Intergovernmental Relations and Procurement Reform:

Thank you for this opportunity to discuss past and ongoing efforts by the Department of Defense (DoD) Office of Inspector General (DoD IG) in the area of combating trafficking in persons (CTIP). The DoD IG previously presented testimony on oversight efforts concerning the topic of human trafficking in 2004, 2006, and before your subcommittee on November 2, 2011.

Completed DoD IG Efforts

DoD IG initiated its first assessment of DoD CTIP as a result of a May 31, 2002 request made by thirteen Members of Congress to the Secretary of Defense seeking a "thorough, global and extensive" investigation into the publicized allegation that U.S. military leadership in Korea had been implicitly condoning sex slavery at the hands of traffickers.

In response to those Congressional concerns, the DoD IG initiated an assessment project to assess efforts to combat human trafficking within the United States Forces- Korea. In addition, DoD criminal investigations of DoD contractors underway during this period led the DoD IG to expand its assessment focus to incorporate DoD and DoD contractor activities in the European Command theater of operations, in particular, in Bosnia- Herzegovina and Kosovo.¹ The two assessments recommended that the Secretary of Defense issue a policy statement that clearly and unambiguously set forth DoD opposition to any activities promoting, supporting, or sanctioning human trafficking.

Subsequently, on January 30, 2004, the Deputy Secretary of Defense issued a memorandum, "Combating Trafficking in Persons in the Department of Defense," that stated "It is the policy of the DoD that trafficking in persons will not be facilitated in any way by the activities of our Service members, civilian employees, indirect hires or DoD contract personnel." In addition, DoD established annual CTIP awareness training for all DoD Service members and civilians, which has been in effect since 2004. With respect to the trafficking in persons (TIP) issues raised concerning Korea, the Command has taken multiple actions to prohibit and prevent DoD military, civilian, and contractor personnel from patronizing establishments it had declared off- limits.

In 2005, the DoD IG initiated an evaluation of CTIP efforts across DoD in further response to the 2002 request from Members of Congress. The resulting report, issued in November 2006, recommended that the Office of the Secretary of Defense, the Military Services and Combatant Commands develop CTIP policy and program guidance, and that the military commands evaluate the effectiveness of their CTIP awareness training. In response to the report, in 2007, the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness issued DoD Instruction 2200.01, "Combating Trafficking in Persons," that established policy and assigned CTIP program responsibilities across the Department.

The Under Secretary also created and filled the position of DoD CTIP Program Manager within that office. Additionally, the CTIP Program Officer for each DoD Component is required to report annually to the DoD CTIP Program Manager on CTIP training metrics and effectiveness. The most recent oversight efforts conducted by the DoD IG were in response to Public Law 110-457, the "William Wilberforce Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2008," signed on December 23, 2008. Section 232 of the Act required the Inspectors General of DoD, State and USAID to ". . .investigate a sample of . . . contracts, or subcontracts at any tier, under which there is a heightened risk that a contractor may engage, knowingly or unknowingly, in acts related to trafficking in persons. . ." The Act also required the respective Inspectors General to submit a report to Congress, no later than January 15, for three consecutive years beginning in 2010.

The DoD IG consulted with the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons and selected for assessment four Combatant Commands with overseas responsibilities and contracting presence: U.S. Pacific, U.S. Central, and U.S. European, and Africa Commands, in that order. To date, the DoD IG has issued all three annual reports assessing these commands, the final one on January 17, 2012.² The reports primarily focused on whether the contracts sampled were in compliance with Federal Acquisition Regulation (FAR) requirements.

The contract sample in each assessment included all construction and service contracts within the respective combatant command's area of responsibility, with a place of performance outside the United States, a period of performance in FY 2009 or later, and with a total contract value of $5 million or greater. This provided a reasonable data set which particularly focused on labor-intensive contracts.

The U.S. Pacific Command CTIP report, issued on January 15, 2010, was based on a sample of 99 contracts with places of performance in the Republic of Korea, Japan, and the Territory of Guam. We found FAR clause 52.222-50, "Combating Trafficking in Persons," present in 93 percent of the contracts we reviewed. However, 42 percent of those clauses were added shortly before the site visit. Further, the team found that the Command's contract quality assurance reviews did not specifically include reviews of contractor TIP compliance and/or violations.

The DoD IG also recommended in that report that the Director, Defense Procurement and Acquisition Policy modify widely-used contract writing software to ensure that the FAR CTIP clause was automatically included in contracts or solicitations. We also recommended that the Defense Federal Acquisition Regulation Supplement guidance be updated to require CTIP oversight in contract quality assurance plans.

The Director, Defense Procurement, and Acquisition Policy, initiated the software modification and, in January 2011, revised the relevant guidance. In addition, the DoD IG team determined that contracting offices did not have access to an effective DoD process for obtaining TIP violation information from DoD criminal investigative organizations once their cases were closed, which would then provide the option of administrative contract remedial action. To address this issue, DoD updated DoD Instruction 2200.01, "Combating Trafficking in Persons (CTIP)", September 15, 2010, requiring the Secretaries of the Military Departments and Commanders of the Combatant Commands to "provide information on all known TIP cases to the USD (P&R) DoD Program Manager." However, providing timely, publicly releasable information on TIP-related criminal indictments and convictions to DoD contracting organizations remains a challenge.

The report on U.S. Central Command, issued January 18, 2011, was based on a sample of 369 DoD contracts performed in the Republic of Iraq, the State of Kuwait, the State of Qatar, and the Kingdom of Bahrain. We determined that a CTIP clause was present in 79 percent of the contracts reviewed. The team also found that the U.S. Central Command Contracting Command had published its own supplement for inclusion in all service and construction contracts within the Command's area of responsibility to strengthen the FAR CTIP clause.

This was in response to allegations received by the Command that some DoD contractors were providing poor living conditions or withholding employee passports.

However, the DoD IG team also identified a significant number of contracts where the Command supplement was mistakenly used to replace the required pre-existing FAR clause. The team recommended that the Commander, U.S. Central Command Contracting Command modify the guidance to clarify proper usage of both the FAR and Command supplement CTIP clauses. The Commander concurred and issued modified guidance in September 2011.

The team also identified examples of proactive action taken by two DoD contracting commands in Kuwait, both of which had implemented a requirement to include CTIP compliance in contract quality assurance reviews. Further, Army Contracting Command- Kuwait had developed and implemented a CTIP questionnaire, translated into five common employee languages, as part of quality assurance audits. In addition, the Defense Contract Management Agency (DCMA) in Kuwait had included CTIP-focused questions into a Theater Quality Plan for quality assurance contract audits reviewing contractor knowledge and understanding of CTIP clause requirements. DCMA representatives also provided reports based on periodic health and sanitation inspections they had conducted of employee camps in Iraq.

In 2010, the DoD IG team visited several employee camps run by subcontractors in Iraq; the employees interviewed verified that DCMA personnel checked conditions on a regular basis. The team did not observe any living conditions in the camps that would constitute a violation of CTIP statutes or regulations.

The DoD IG report on the U.S. European Command and U.S. Africa Command³, issued January 17, 2012, was based on a sample of 267 contracts executed in the Federal Republic of Germany, the Italian Republic, and the United Kingdom.

We found some form of a CTIP clause present in 70 percent of the contracts reviewed; however, only half had the current required FAR clause. We recommended the Military Departments correct the contracts identified as deficient in our review. The team also determined that three DoD contracting organizations specifically discussed the FAR CTIP clause during post-award orientations with contractors to increase awareness of CTIP programs. In neither Combatant Command did the team find or have reported to it TIP violation incidents.

DoD IG TIP Investigations

There have been systemic obstacles which have hindered successful TIP criminal investigations, including jurisdiction limitations, foreign law enforcement capabilities, command investigative standards of evidence, and the challenges of evidence collection in contingency operation contracting environments.

In spite of these difficulties, since 2006 the Defense Criminal Investigative Service of the DoD Office of Inspector General has investigated 21 TIP-related allegations worldwide, resulting in five cases being referred to the Department of Justice, of which one was accepted for prosecution. The violation in the accepted case was determined to be centered more on fraud against immigrants than on human trafficking, and, in any case, did not have a DoD nexus. Therefore, the Defense Criminal Investigative Service closed its investigation. The case was pursued by local law enforcement organizations and the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement of the Department of Homeland Security.

DoD Non-Appropriated Fund Organizations

During the DoD IG CTIP assessment of the U.S. Pacific Command in 2009, the team noted that non-appropriated fund entities were not required to include the FAR CTIP clause in their contracts. Therefore, we included an assessment of the Navy Exchange (NEX), and Army and Air Force Exchange Service (AAFES) CTIP policy and procedures within the reviews of the U.S. Central Command and the U.S. European and Africa Commands.

The DoD Resale Activities & Non-appropriated Fund Policy office within the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness has issued guidance to DoD Non-appropriated fund organizations reinforcing the application of trafficking in persons statutory requirements to their contracting activities. The review of AAFES Europe identified that the Commander had issued a Manpower Associate "Bill of Rights," available in English and eight other languages, that subordinate organizations were directed to post on employee bulletin boards for easy access. The Commander also had established an employee passport possession policy to ensure that "contractors do not withhold the passports of TCNs [Third Country Nationals] working in our facilities."

In Kuwait during the 2010 field assessment, the DoD IG team observed AAFES passport checks and employee interviews first-hand while accompanying a contracting officer representative to several facilities. No CTIP violations were observed. The team also received a detailed briefing from the AAFES legal counsel outlining several additional TIP-related incidents and the contract remedies applied.

Ongoing DoD IG Assessments

A DoD IG team evaluating the DoD CTIP program in Afghanistan completed fieldwork in February 2012. The draft report will be provided to the Department for management comments within the next few weeks, and the final report is expected to be issued in May 2012.

The team examined 240 contracts administered by Army, Navy, and Air Force commands, as well as Defense Agencies in Afghanistan, and visited nine separate installations throughout Afghanistan. It conducted over 110 interviews with military commanders and contracting personnel, interviewed representatives from 10 U.S. and foreign contractors, and met with 145 contractor employees (Afghan and third-country nationals).

It is worth noting is that the mandatory CTIP clause was included in 93 percent (224 of 240) of the contracts reviewed, a significant improvement from previous Combatant Command assessments, including for the rest of U.S. Central Command. During our fieldwork, the DoD IG team was made aware of an investigation recently conducted by the NATO International Military Police that had identified an Afghan company as involved in TIP violations. The case had been subsequently referred to the contracting officer, who took action recommending debarment.

Additionally, the team was informed by third country nationals at one U.S. base that they were living in what could be adverse living conditions. We referred this complaint to the prime contractor, the U.S. contracting organization responsible for the administrative oversight of the contract, and the base commander/commandant, who initiated an immediate investigation.

In addition to and concurrent with the multi-year review of contracts required by PL 110-457, the DoD IG has self-initiated an assessment of DoD Component CTIP program compliance and performance. As of this date, we have reviewed CTIP policies, procedures, awareness, and implementation in over 70 DoD organizations, including responsible officials in the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness, and headquarters and major subordinate commands of the Military Services, Defense Agencies, and Combatant Commands. At each location, the team interviewed:

- . commanders and staff responsible for the CTIP program,
- . law enforcement personnel and legal counsel,
- . contracting officers, specialists, and quality assurance specialists, contracting officer representatives, and
- . representatives of contracting firms, and when possible, their employees. This report is scheduled for final release in the summer of 2012.

November 2, 2011 HOCR Hearing

During the November 2 hearing before this subcommittee, the Deputy Inspector General for Special Plans and Operations was asked to provide recommendations for improving CTIP compliance and enforcement. Our response, dated January 31, 2012, included suggestions designed to strengthen DoD TIP-related oversight, compliance, enforcement, and data availability and accuracy, to include:

- . DoD Component Commanders and their Component Inspectors General could make CTIP a special interest item in Command inspections, assessments, or program reviews. Further, these special interest item inspections should include non-appropriated fund activities conducted by any DoD Component. Regular comprehensive reviews by DoD Components oversight agencies would increase Command awareness, improve policies, ensure the inclusion of required CTIP language in contracts, and verify contractor and subcontractor compliance.
- . DoD could assess and centralize its TIP-related data collection with respect to: identification of the number of third country nationals supporting DoD contingency operations; consolidating contractual remedies applied in cases of TIP allegations; and identifying instances of criminal violations and sanctions.

Conclusion

The DoD IG remains committed to providing oversight support of the U.S. Government's "zero tolerance policy" against trafficking in persons. We will continue to evaluate the related DoD programs for compliance with relevant statutes, policies and regulations. I thank you again for this opportunity to update you on DoD IG oversight of DoD actions to combat trafficking in persons.

LOAD-DATE: March 28, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Congressional Testimony

Copyright 2012 Congressional Quarterly, Inc.
All Rights Reserved.

STAR 163 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Daily Times (Asianet-Pakistan)

March 24, 2012 Saturday 1:41 PM EST

More steps required to counter human trafficking: media experts

LENGTH: 566 words

By: Staff Report

ISLAMABAD: Human trafficking is a very serious social issue and has brought Pakistan in the limelight, but there is not much focus in the media on this critical issue, media experts concurred during a consultation held on Thursday.

The consultation was a critical part of a project of International Organisation for Migration (IOM) and was arranged and conducted by PINFO, an info-knowledge and communication management organisation. The IOM at present is working to create 'Counter Human Trafficking District Taskforce's in districts of Pakistan where human trafficking is endemic.

Human trafficking cannot be seen in vacuum, the participants said and shared that the countries where this issue was rampant were usually politically unstable and economically challenged. "The people of these countries only wish to leave and go to greener pastures, no matter what," a participant said and added that the situation in Pakistan was also challenging. There was a consensus among the participants that Pakistan's society must appreciate the actuality of the problem and should not fall prey to the fallacious promises that human traffickers usually made. It is to be noted that Pakistan is a source, transition and destination of the human trafficking phenomenon.

Human trafficking expert, Aarish Khan, said that Pakistan's biggest problem was its internal human trafficking that both the government and people did not regard as a form of trafficking.

"Considering that human trafficking means only crossing border into another country is erroneous, internal trafficking for child sex trade, bonded labour and other forms of modern human slavery are intertwined issues with state of Pakistan's political and economic affairs." Adding to the subject, he mentioned that Pakistan had been categorised as a 'Tier-II' country in the US State Department's recent 'Trafficking In Person' report, released earlier this month. This means that the issue exists and the government is doing something to counter the problem, he said.

Journalists from various media organisations took part in the consultation along with researchers and experts on the subject. It was emphasised that media organisations must start treating human rights issues as a 'beat' and under that beat, this issue could be covered.

Furthermore, the participants criticised the model of awareness raising of the international development organisations and said that such activities must not be driven by the availability of the funds. "There should be a permanent forum, organisation or a think tank that should keep providing valuable information to the media professionals that they could utilise in their routine assignments," a print media journalist said.

The participants of the consultation agreed that the government was taking steps in the right direction but should make these efforts coherent to achieve the maximum impact. In his concluding remarks, Mubashir Akram, the chair, encouraged the media to focus on the real humanitarian and socially realistic issues also. "Not everything news worthy has to be grand politically or economically, these human issues must be given priority and preference by the media professionals," he mentioned.

The participants appreciated the IOM for holding a constructive consultation and hoped that more events of this kind would become a routine and media professionals would be engaged.

LOAD-DATE: March 24, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Blog

JOURNAL-CODE: APAK-115063

Copyright 2012 Newstex LLC
All Rights Reserved
Newstex Web Blogs
Copyright 2012 Daily Times

164 of 492 DOCUMENTS

The Nation (AsiaNet)

March 24, 2012 Saturday

Call for highlighting human trafficking

BYLINE: OUR STAFF REPORTERSECTION: Vol. XXVI No. 33LENGTH: 429 words

Human trafficking is a very serious social issue and has brought Pakistan in the limelight with a humanitarian focus but there is no much focus in the media on this critical human rights issue, media experts concurred during a consultation.

The consultation was a critical part of a project of International Organisation for Migration (IOM) and was arranged and conducted by PINFO, an info-knowledge and communication management organisation. The IOM at present is working to create "Counter Human Trafficking District Taskforces" in districts of Pakistan where human trafficking is endemic.

The human trafficking cannot be seen in vacuum, the participants noted and shared that the countries where this issue is rampant are usually political unstable and economically challenged. "The people of these countries only wish to leave there and go to greener pastures no matter what," a participant noted and added that situation in Pakistan is also challenging.

There was a consensus among the participants that Pakistan's society must appreciate the actuality of the problem and should not fall prey to the fallacious promises that the human traffickers usually make. It is to be noted that Pakistan is a source, transition and destination of the human trafficking phenomenon.

Human trafficking expert, Aarish Khan, in his presentation said that Pakistan's biggest problem is its internal human trafficking that both the government and people do not regard as a form of trafficking. Adding to the subject, he mentioned that Pakistan been categorized as the "Tier-II" country in State Department's recent Trafficking In Person's report, released earlier this month.

This means that the issue exists and the government is doing something about it to countering the problem, he said.

It was emphasised that media organisations must start treating the Human Rights issues as a "beat" and under that beat, this issue could be covered.

Furthermore, the participants, while appreciating the occasion, criticized the model of awareness raising of the international development organizations and said that such activities must not be driven by the availability of the funds.

"There should be a permanent forum, organization or a think tank that should keep providing valuable input/information to the media professionals for their information that they could utilized in their routine assignments," a participant noted.

The participants of the consultation agreed that the government was taking steps in the right direction but should make these efforts coherent to achieve the maximum impact.

LOAD-DATE: March 25, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 Nawai Waqt Group of Newspapers
All Rights Reserved

165 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

The Nation (AsiaNet)

March 24, 2012 Saturday

Call for highlighting human trafficking

BYLINE: OUR STAFF REPORTER

SECTION: Vol. XXVI No. 33

LENGTH: 429 words

Human trafficking is a very serious social issue and has brought Pakistan in the limelight with a humanitarian focus but there is no much focus in the media on this critical human rights issue, media experts concurred during a consultation.

The consultation was a critical part of a project of International Organisation for Migration (IOM) and was arranged and conducted by PINFO, an info-knowledge and communication management organisation. The IOM at present is working to create "Counter Human Trafficking District Taskforces" in districts of Pakistan where human trafficking is endemic.

The human trafficking cannot be seen in vacuum, the participants noted and shared that the countries where this issue is rampant are usually political unstable and economically challenged. "The people of these countries only wish to leave there and go to greener pastures no matter what," a participant noted and added that situation in Pakistan is also challenging.

There was a consensus among the participants that Pakistan's society must appreciate the actuality of the problem and should not fall prey to the fallacious promises that the human traffickers usually make. It is to be noted that Pakistan is a source, transition and destination of the human trafficking phenomenon.

Human trafficking expert, Aarish Khan, in his presentation said that Pakistan's biggest problem is its internal human trafficking that both the government and people do not regard as a form of trafficking. Adding to the subject, he mentioned that Pakistan been categorized as the "Tier-II" country in State Department's recent Trafficking In Person's report, released earlier this month.

This means that the issue exists and the government is doing something about it to countering the problem, he said.

It was emphasised that media organisations must start treating the Human Rights issues as a "beat" and under that beat, this issue could be covered.

Furthermore, the participants, while appreciating the occasion, criticized the model of awareness raising of the international development organizations and said that such activities must not be driven by the availability of the funds.

"There should be a permanent forum, organization or a think tank that should keep providing valuable input/information to the media professionals for their information that they could utilized in their routine assignments," a participant noted.

The participants of the consultation agreed that the government was taking steps in the right direction but should make these efforts coherent to achieve the maximum impact.

LOAD-DATE: March 26, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 Nawai Waqt Group of Newspapers
All Rights Reserved

166 of 492 DOCUMENTS

The Straits Times (Singapore)

March 24, 2012 Saturday

Thai fishing trade under fire for human trafficking

BYLINE: Nirmal Ghosh, Thailand Correspondent

SECTION: ASIA; South-east Asia

LENGTH: 555 words

BANGKOK: Thailand's fishing industry has come under increasing scrutiny for human trafficking as desperate Cambodians continue to jump off Thai fishing boats to escape life-threatening conditions with no pay.

The country now risks being downgraded to Tier 3 on the United States' annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report due out in June.

A Tier 3 listing can trigger sanctions and suspension of some bilateral programmes. The looming downgrade comes as Thailand does little to address the structural issues that make trafficking possible, activists say, despite a warning last August from a United Nations rapporteur.

Mr Eaklak Loomchomkhae, who heads Thai non-government organisation (NGO) Mirror Foundation's anti-trafficking efforts, estimates that there is a labour shortage of 70,000 in Thailand's fishing industry.

Migrant labour from poorer neighbours, especially Cambodia, helps fill the gap. But poor migrants often fall prey to illegal brokers.

'The fishing industry is substandard, dirty and dangerous, and the pay is low,' Mr Eaklak said. In many cases, workers are virtually used as slave labour and not paid.

Trafficking is rampant across the region, with trafficking for the sex trade, often involving children, making headline news.

But the International Labour Organisation (ILO) estimated that this group comprised less than 10 per cent of the 9.5 million victims of human trafficking in Asia in 2005.

Over the past three months, about 30 Cambodians have been rescued after jumping overboard from Thai fishing vessels.

Last year, Tenaganita, a Malaysian NGO, helped in the rescue and repatriation of some 100 Cambodians. Many had swum ashore at Tanjung Manis, Sarawak's largest harbour.

Activists want not only a Thai crackdown on trafficking, but also an Asean-wide agreement and mechanism to tackle the issue.

'There has to be a regional approach to this,' Ms Irene Fernandez, director of Tenaganita, said in a telephone interview.

Cambodians have told harrowing tales of being promised decent jobs in Thailand only to find themselves put on fishing boats to work long hours without pay far out at sea. Those who fall sick get a few anti-fever tablets. Some of those deemed too ill to work are simply thrown overboard, they claim.

The ILO's 2005 report concluded that 10 per cent of young men who worked on fishing boats in South-east Asia did not return from their trips.

The adoption of a law on human trafficking in 2008 has brought little or no change.

Speaking at the end of her visit to Thailand last August, Ms Joy Ngozi Ezeilo, the UN Special Rapporteur on Trafficking in Persons, cited 'weak and fragmented' implementation of the 2008 law, due partly to corruption among low-level law enforcement officials.

The Thai government has objected to what it calls Washington's 'unilateralism' and the use of the TIP report as 'an effective foreign policy tool'. But a senior Thai official has also acknowledged that the TIP report 'does help focus' on the problem.

Mr Chutintorn Sam Gongsakdi, deputy director-general of the Thai Foreign Ministry's Department of International Organisations, told a forum on trafficking in the fishing industry recently: 'There will be a significant improvement in two to three years. Maybe not enough for the TIP report this year.'

LOAD-DATE: March 23, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 Singapore Press Holdings Limited
All Rights Reserved

167 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Daily Times (PK)

March 23, 2012 Friday

More steps required to counter human trafficking: media experts

LENGTH: 576 wordsDATELINE: ISLAMABAD

ISLAMABAD, March 23 -- Human trafficking is a very serious social issue and has brought Pakistan in the limelight, but there is not much focus in the media on this critical issue, media experts concurred during a consultation held on Thursday.

The consultation was a critical part of a project of International Organisation for Migration (IOM) and was arranged and conducted by PINFO, an info-knowledge and communication management organisation. The IOM at present is working to create 'Counter Human Trafficking District Taskforces' in districts of Pakistan where human trafficking is endemic.

Human trafficking cannot be seen in vacuum, the participants said and shared that the countries where this issue was rampant were usually politically unstable and economically challenged. "The people of these countries only wish to leave and go to greener pastures, no matter what," a participant said and added that the situation in Pakistan was also challenging. There was a consensus among the participants that Pakistan's society must appreciate the actuality of the problem and should not fall prey to the fallacious promises that human traffickers usually made. It is to be noted that Pakistan is a source, transition and destination of the human trafficking phenomenon.

Human trafficking expert, Aarish Khan, said that Pakistan's biggest problem was its internal human trafficking that both the government and people did not regard as a form of trafficking.

"Considering that human trafficking means only crossing border into another country is erroneous, internal trafficking for child sex trade, bonded labour and other forms of modern human slavery are intertwined issues with state of Pakistan's political and economic affairs." Adding to the subject, he mentioned that Pakistan had been categorised as a 'Tier-II' country in the US State Department's recent 'Trafficking In Person' report, released earlier this month. This means that the issue exists and the government is doing something to counter the problem, he said.

Journalists from various media organisations took part in the consultation along with researchers and experts on the subject. It was emphasised that media organisations must start treating human rights issues as a 'beat' and under that beat, this issue could be covered.

Furthermore, the participants criticised the model of awareness raising of the international development organisations and said that such activities must not be driven by the availability of the funds. "There should be a permanent forum, organisation or a think tank that should keep providing valuable information to the media professionals that they could utilise in their routine assignments," a print media journalist said.

The participants of the consultation agreed that the government was taking steps in the right direction but should make these efforts coherent to achieve the maximum impact. In his concluding remarks, Mubashir Akram, the chair, encouraged the media to focus on the real humanitarian and socially realistic issues also. "Not everything news worthy has to be grand politically or economically, these human issues must be given priority and preference by the media professionals," he mentioned.

The participants appreciated the IOM for holding a constructive consultation and hoped that more events of this kind would become a routine and media professionals would be engaged. Published by HT Syndication with permission from Daily Times.

For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: March 22, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 Right Vision News
All Rights Reserved

168 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
Daily Times

March 23, 2012 Friday

More steps required to counter human trafficking: media experts

BYLINE: Staff Report

SECTION: Vol. VIII No. 74

LENGTH: 562 words

Human trafficking is a very serious social issue and has brought Pakistan in the limelight, but there is not much focus in the media on this critical issue, media experts concurred during a consultation held on Thursday.

The consultation was a critical part of a project of International Organisation for Migration (IOM) and was arranged and conducted by PINFO, an info-knowledge and communication management organisation. The IOM at present is working to create 'Counter Human Trafficking District Taskforce's in districts of Pakistan where human trafficking is endemic.

Human trafficking cannot be seen in vacuum, the participants said and shared that the countries where this issue was rampant were usually politically unstable and economically challenged. "The people of these countries only wish to leave and go to greener pastures, no matter what," a participant said and added that the situation in Pakistan was also challenging. There was a consensus among the participants that Pakistan's society must appreciate the actuality of the problem and should not fall prey to the fallacious promises that human traffickers usually made. It is to be noted that Pakistan is a source, transition and destination of the human trafficking phenomenon.

Human trafficking expert, Aarish Khan, said that Pakistan's biggest problem was its internal human trafficking that both the government and people did not regard as a form of trafficking.

"Considering that human trafficking means only crossing border into another country is erroneous, internal trafficking for child sex trade, bonded labour and other forms of modern human slavery are intertwined issues with state of Pakistan's political and economic affairs." Adding to the subject, he mentioned that Pakistan had been categorised as a 'Tier-II' country in the US State Department's recent 'Trafficking In Person' report, released earlier this month. This means that the issue exists and the government is doing something to counter the problem, he said.

Journalists from various media organisations took part in the consultation along with researchers and experts on the subject. It was emphasised that media organisations must start treating human rights issues as a 'beat' and under that beat, this issue could be covered.

Furthermore, the participants criticised the model of awareness raising of the international development organisations and said that such activities must not be driven by the availability of the funds. "There should be a permanent forum, organisation or a think tank that should keep providing valuable information to the media professionals that they could utilise in their routine assignments," a print media journalist said.

The participants of the consultation agreed that the government was taking steps in the right direction but should make these efforts coherent to achieve the maximum impact. In his concluding remarks, Mubashir Akram, the chair, encouraged the media to focus on the real humanitarian and socially realistic issues also. "Not everything news worthy has to be grand politically or economically, these human issues must be given priority and preference by the media professionals," he mentioned.

The participants appreciated the IOM for holding a constructive consultation and hoped that more events of this kind would become a routine and media professionals would be engaged.

LOAD-DATE: March 24, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 Daily Times
All Rights Reserved

169 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
Daily Times

March 23, 2012 Friday

More steps required to counter human trafficking: media experts

BYLINE: Staff Report

SECTION: Vol. VIII No. 74

LENGTH: 562 words

Human trafficking is a very serious social issue and has brought Pakistan in the limelight, but there is not much focus in the media on this critical issue, media experts concurred during a consultation held on Thursday.

The consultation was a critical part of a project of International Organisation for Migration (IOM) and was arranged and conducted by PINFO, an info-knowledge and communication management organisation. The IOM at present is working to create 'Counter Human Trafficking District Taskforce's in districts of Pakistan where human trafficking is endemic.

Human trafficking cannot be seen in vacuum, the participants said and shared that the countries where this issue was rampant were usually politically unstable and economically challenged. "The people of these countries only wish to leave and go to greener pastures, no matter what," a participant said and added that the situation in Pakistan was also challenging. There was a consensus among the participants that Pakistan's society must appreciate the actuality of the problem and should not fall prey to the fallacious promises that human traffickers usually made. It is to be noted that Pakistan is a source, transition and destination of the human trafficking phenomenon.

Human trafficking expert, Aarish Khan, said that Pakistan's biggest problem was its internal human trafficking that both the government and people did not regard as a form of trafficking.

"Considering that human trafficking means only crossing border into another country is erroneous, internal trafficking for child sex trade, bonded labour and other forms of modern human slavery are intertwined issues with state of Pakistan's political and economic affairs." Adding to the subject, he mentioned that Pakistan had been categorised as a 'Tier-II' country in the US State Department's recent 'Trafficking In Person' report, released earlier this month. This means that the issue exists and the government is doing something to counter the problem, he said.

Journalists from various media organisations took part in the consultation along with researchers and experts on the subject. It was emphasised that media organisations must start treating human rights issues as a 'beat' and under that beat, this issue could be covered.

Furthermore, the participants criticised the model of awareness raising of the international development organisations and said that such activities must not be driven by the availability of the funds. "There should be a permanent forum, organisation or a think tank that should keep providing valuable information to the media professionals that they could utilise in their routine assignments," a print media journalist said.

The participants of the consultation agreed that the government was taking steps in the right direction but should make these efforts coherent to achieve the maximum impact. In his concluding remarks, Mubashir Akram, the chair, encouraged the media to focus on the real humanitarian and socially realistic issues also. "Not everything news worthy has to be grand politically or economically, these human issues must be given priority and preference by the media professionals," he mentioned.

The participants appreciated the IOM for holding a constructive consultation and hoped that more events of this kind would become a routine and media professionals would be engaged.

LOAD-DATE: March 26, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 Daily Times
All Rights Reserved

170 of 492 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

March 23, 2012 FridayFIRST FSM/US PRELIMINARY JOINT BUDGET CONSULTATIONS HELD IN POHNPEI*BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 393 wordsDATELINE: POHNPEI, FM

The following information was released by the National Government of the Federated States of Micronesia:

Officials from the US Department of Interior's Office of Insular Affairs and five governments of the FSM recently met in Pohnpei for Amended Compact Preliminary Joint Budget Consultations. Under the terms of the Amended Compact, Annual Budget Consultations between the US and FSM are meant to ascertain consistency with the funding requirements of the Amended Compact as well as the appropriateness of performance objectives and the adequacy of expenditures in achieving stated purposes. Since early years of the Amended Compact, budget consultations have typically occurred in late May to early June, utilizing draft implementation plans and proposed budgets, prior to finalized versions being consolidated by the FSM National Government and submitted to OIA by the required deadline of July 1st. In the three most recent budget development cycles, suggestions were made to SBOC's Division of Compact Management to hold advanced consultations, prior to Executive Budget Review Committee hearing sessions and budgets being finalized for submission to Congress and the four respective State Legislatures.

This year, to better assist with Compact budget formulation, particularly on those issues that have been directed by JEMCO, the Offices of SBOC and Insular Affairs scheduled the first ever preliminary joint budget consultations from February 13-15, 2012, followed by an FSM internal Budget Meeting on February 16th. In a Presidential letter to the four FSM State Governors inviting their respective State Budget Officer, Directors of Health and Education and other key representatives relevant to Compact budgeting, the purpose of the preliminary consultations was noted as being primarily focused on guidelines, utilization and implementation of the seven Compact Sector grants.

Among the issues discussed were effects of cuts made by JEMCO to Scholarships and the College of Micronesia-FSM's operational budget. Other priority concerns addressed ranged from infrastructure development and the FSM's allocation distribution formula, to Compact Impact and the FSM's undesirable tier 3 standing on the US Trafficking in Persons Report. The PJBC was also meant as a precursor to the upcoming Midyear JEMCO Meeting, scheduled for March 23, 2012 in Pohnpei.

LOAD-DATE: May 14, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

171 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Tulsa World (Oklahoma)

March 22, 2012 Thursday
Final Edition

News briefs

BYLINE: Wire reports

SECTION: News; Pg. A6

LENGTH: 747 words

Havana : Amnesty International blasts Cuba detentions Amnesty International on Wednesday placed four jailed Cubans on its global list of prisoners of conscience, the only inmates on the island to have such a designation, and denounced the Communist-run government for what it called a campaign of intimidation and short-term detentions targeting the opposition. The report, released just days ahead of a visit to Cuba by Pope Benedict XVI, said the human rights situation on the island "has further deteriorated" with thousands of express detentions meant to cow the small dissident community. It said detainees are threatened and sometimes beaten before release. "Criticism of the government is not tolerated in Cuba and it is routinely punished," Amnesty wrote.

There was no immediate reaction from the government. Tallinn, Estonia: Estonian legislators vote to ban human trafficking Estonia's Parliament passed legislation on Wednesday banning human trafficking and making the Baltic nation the last EU country to enact such laws. The lawmakers voted 91-0 in favor, with 10 members absent. President Toomas Hendrik Ilves is expected to make the bill law by approving it in the coming weeks. Estonia had been under pressure from the United States to adopt such legislation and thereby avoid being kept on a watchlist the U.S. State Department keeps of countries it regards as lax in fighting human trafficking. The list has included Belarus and Russia and EU members Cyprus and Malta. Bamako, Mali: Soldiers in Mali mutiny, cut off broadcasts Disgruntled soldiers in Mali on Wednesday mutinied at two military bases and cut off broadcasts at state TV and radio, but the president insisted that the country was not facing a coup attempt. The sounds of heavy weaponry range out into the night in Bamako, where recruits had earlier mutinied at a military base, shooting volleys in the air. Other soldiers stormed the state broadcaster, witness said. The mutiny spread to a military base in Gao, a strategic northern town, where troops captured a half-dozen senior officers and were holding them, according to a military student at the base who requested anonymity because he feared for his safety. A Twitter message from the account of Malian President Amadou Toumani Toure insisted Wednesday: "There is no coup in Mali. There's just a mutiny." Berlin: Israel to buy another German submarine Israel has signed a contract in Berlin for a Dolphin-type submarine from Germany, Israeli Defense Minister Ehud Barak's office said Wednesday. Germany's Parliament approved the purchase in November and agreed to pay $180 million or about one-third of the cost. Israel already has three Dolphin submarines from Germany and two more are under construction. Beijing: China requiring lawyers' allegiance to communism The Chinese government said Wednesday that lawyers are now required to swear allegiance to the Communist Party, a move criticized by prominent human rights lawyers who have defended the authoritarian government's critics. The Ministry of Justice said in a notice posted on its website that first-time applicants or lawyers requesting renewals of professional legal licenses must take an oath of loyalty to the country, the Communist Party and the people. The oath is intended to raise the political, moral and professional quality of the country's lawyers, the notice said. London: Prince William returns home from deployment Prince William has returned to Britain after his deployment to the Falkland Islands, St. James' Palace said Wednesday. William has been stationed on the Falklands since February. Flight Lt. Wales, as he's known in the Royal Air Force, was one of several pilots on call for search and rescue missions in the archipelago of 704 islands. William's tour angered Argentina, which claims the islands 290 miles off its coast and refers to them as Las Malvinas. His deployment added to growing tension in the run-up to the 30th anniversary of Argentina's April 1982 invasion. Brussels: Belgium holds memorial for bus-crash dead King Albert II and thousands of mourners at a memorial service on Wednesday remembered the 28 victims of last week's bus crash in a Swiss tunnel. The victims included 22 schoolchildren. The students were from two schools in northern Belgium that shared a bus for a traditional "snow class" vacation in Switzerland. The bus, carrying 52 people, slammed into a tunnel wall on March 13. In addition to the dead, 24 children were injured.

LOAD-DATE: March 23, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 The Tulsa World

172 of 492 DOCUMENTS

The Associated Press

March 21, 2012 Wednesday 04:51 PM GMT

Estonia makes human trafficking illegal

BYLINE: By JARI TANNER, Associated PressSECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 423 wordsDATELINE: TALLINN, Estonia

Estonia's Parliament passed legislation on Wednesday banning human trafficking and making the Baltic nation the last EU country to enact such laws.

The lawmakers voted 91-0 in favor, with 10 members absent. President Toomas Hendrik Ilves is expected to make the bill law by approving it in the coming weeks.

Estonia had been under pressure from the United States to adopt such legislation and thereby avoid being kept on a watchlist the U.S. State Department keeps of countries it regards as lax in fighting human trafficking. The list has included Belarus and Russia and EU members Cyprus and Malta.

Such criticism embarrassed Estonia, a small country that considers the U.S. a key ally and has long been sensitive to its image overseas.

Andres Anvelt, of Estonia's opposition Social Democratic Party, called the bill passed Wednesday "a breakthrough" for the nation of 1.3 million people. "This is the first step forward in fighting human trafficking," Anvelt said in Parliament as lawmakers prepared to vote.

The U.S. Embassy in Tallinn also praised Estonia's government.

The new law "is a testament to the commitment both of Estonian lawmakers and of the NGOs who have worked tirelessly to secure justice for the victims of human trafficking and ensure substantial punishment" for perpetrators of the crime, embassy spokeswoman Michelle Schohn said in an email to The Associated Press.

The measure, fast-tracked by Estonia's Justice Ministry, makes human trafficking punishable by a maximum 15-year prison sentence. It also criminalizes sexual exploitation, including forcing minors to work as prostitutes or to appear in pornographic films and erotic performances.

Existing laws had ignored human trafficking issues such as the recruiting, transporting and exploiting victims, and allowed perpetrators to get away with short jail sentences or fines.

The last U.S. watchlist report said Estonia was not sufficiently fighting forced labor and forced prostitution.

"Estonia is a source, transit, and destination country for women subjected to forced prostitution" that report had said, noting that women, particularly from rural areas, were at risk of being forced into prostitution in the capital, Tallinn. They also risked being taken abroad to work as prostitutes in countries such as Finland, Britain, Germany, Italy, and the Netherlands, the report said.

Estonian support groups for victims say typical cases involved women who were lured to work in striptease clubs as dancers but ended up being forced to offer sexual services to club clients.

LOAD-DATE: March 22, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Associated Press
All Rights Reserved

173 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
Associated Press OnlineMarch 21, 2012 Wednesday 4:51 PM GMT

Estonia makes human trafficking illegal

BYLINE: By JARI TANNER, Associated PressSECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 423 wordsDATELINE: TALLINN Estonia

Estonia's Parliament passed legislation on Wednesday banning human trafficking and making the Baltic nation the last EU country to enact such laws.

The lawmakers voted 91-0 in favor, with 10 members absent. President Toomas Hendrik Ilves is expected to make the bill law by approving it in the coming weeks.

Estonia had been under pressure from the United States to adopt such legislation and thereby avoid being kept on a watchlist the U.S. State Department keeps of countries it regards as lax in fighting human trafficking. The list has included Belarus and Russia and EU members Cyprus and Malta.

Such criticism embarrassed Estonia, a small country that considers the U.S. a key ally and has long been sensitive to its image overseas.

Andres Anvelt, of Estonia's opposition Social Democratic Party, called the bill passed Wednesday "a breakthrough" for the nation of 1.3 million people. "This is the first step forward in fighting human trafficking," Anvelt said in Parliament as lawmakers prepared to vote.

The U.S. Embassy in Tallinn also praised Estonia's government.

The new law "is a testament to the commitment both of Estonian lawmakers and of the NGOs who have worked tirelessly to secure justice for the victims of human trafficking and ensure substantial punishment" for perpetrators of the crime, embassy spokeswoman Michelle Schohn said in an email to The Associated Press.

The measure, fast-tracked by Estonia's Justice Ministry, makes human trafficking punishable by a maximum 15-year prison sentence. It also criminalizes sexual exploitation, including forcing minors to work as prostitutes or to appear in pornographic films and erotic performances.

Existing laws had ignored human trafficking issues such as the recruiting, transporting and exploiting victims, and allowed perpetrators to get away with short jail sentences or fines.

The last U.S. watchlist report said Estonia was not sufficiently fighting forced labor and forced prostitution.

"Estonia is a source, transit, and destination country for women subjected to forced prostitution" that report had said, noting that women, particularly from rural areas, were at risk of being forced into prostitution in the capital, Tallinn. They also risked being taken abroad to work as prostitutes in countries such as Finland, Britain, Germany, Italy, and the Netherlands, the report said.

Estonian support groups for victims say typical cases involved women who were lured to work in striptease clubs as dancers but ended up being forced to offer sexual services to club clients.

LOAD-DATE: March 22, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Associated Press
All Rights Reserved

174 of 492 DOCUMENTS

ABC Premium News (Australia)

March 17, 2012 Saturday

Baby's death shines spotlight on human trafficking

BYLINE: By Monique Ross

LENGTH: 868 words

The death of a battered two-year-old girl in India has thrust human trafficking in the country into the spotlight.

The girl, dubbed Falak by doctors, was taken to a New Delhi hospital in January by a 14-year-old girl who claimed to be her mother.

Doctors say Falak had severe head injuries, broken arms, branded cheeks, and bite marks covering her body when she was admitted.

For two months Indians followed the story as she underwent multiple surgeries. But on Thursday she suffered a cardiac arrest - the third in her short life - and died.

The case made headlines across the country, but it was just the beginning of a much darker story.

Once police began looking into the case, they uncovered a suspected human trafficking ring.

'Slave trade'

According to reports, the teenage girl who took Falak to hospital had been sold into a brothel. She began living with Rajkumar, a man she met through the brothel.

One day, he allegedly brought home baby Falak.

The woman believed to actually be Falak's biological mother, 22-year-old Munni, was tracked down in Rajasthan.

Munni had been sold by her first husband to another man.

She was reportedly forced to leave the baby with the teenager when she was sold. She also left behind her two other children.

The Indian home ministry says it is a case of human trafficking.

"This has turned out to be one of the biggest sex rackets involving minors and child prostitution and sale of women for marriage," Raaj Mangal Prasad, the head of India's Child Welfare Committee, told CNN.

"This shows this is a classic case where the magnitude of trafficking has come to light."

The girl is now in a juvenile home and Rajkumar has been detained by police - one of a handful of people arrested.

Shocking statistics

The case has reignited debate about human trafficking in India, a country with a population of 1.2 billion people.

The UN defines human trafficking as "the acquisition of people by improper means such as force, fraud or deception, with the aim of exploiting them".

It notes it is difficult to get a clear number of the amount of people affected because it is an underground crime.

However, the UN estimates that at any one time 2.5 million people are victims of trafficking across the globe, and the most common form is sexual exploitation.

In a 2011 report the US State Department ranked India as a tier 2 country in terms of human trafficking, meaning it does not do enough to eliminate trafficking but is taking steps to curb the problem.

"Ninety per cent of trafficking in India is internal, and those from India's most disadvantaged social economic strata including the lowest castes are particularly vulnerable to forced or bonded labour and sex trafficking," the report said.

"Women and girls are trafficked within the country for the purposes of forced prostitution ... cities popular for tourism continue to be vulnerable to child sex tourism. Indian nationals engage in child sex tourism within the country and, to a lesser extent, in other countries."

In a 2003 report the National Human Rights Commission of India estimated that nearly 40,000 children are abducted in India each year, with around 11,000 of those never being found.

The NHRC estimates that almost half of the children trafficked within India are between the ages of 11 and 14.

Stolen and sold

But not all the trafficking cases in India are internal.

In 2009, the ABC's Sally Sara investigated the trade of children in India, looking into cases of children being stolen and trafficked to Australia under the guise of adoptions.

Australia has several laws and bodies aimed at halting the trade in people.

Officials say the number of cases in Australia is relatively low, but they also admit the extent of the problem remains unclear.

According to the Australian Federal Police, nearly 200 people in Australia have been rescued from people-trafficking arrangements.

Australia's student visa program has also been hit by allegations that women entering Australia on student visas are being forced into the sex industry.

The AFP has recently held a series of forums to raise awareness of the problem, and last year it backed a campaign aimed at dismantling stereotypes of human trafficking:

What next?

According to the US State Department, the Indian government "does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking ... [but] it is making significant efforts to do so".

Last year India ratified the protocol to prevent people trafficking and it also prohibits some forms of trafficking - including for sexual exploitation and forced labour - in its local laws.

But critics say the laws are not effectively enforced and a clear definition of trafficking is not provided.

Delhi-based writer Namita Bhandare says there is plenty more that can be done to stop cases like this happening again.

But she argues that the "biggest stumbling block" is a lack of willpower to bring about concrete change.

Online, meanwhile, people are taking to social media sites like Twitter in a bid to keep the case of baby Falak in the spotlight.

"She came to reveal the sad story of human trafficking and many women of other India, now when she has done it ... she is gone RIP Baby Falak," tweeted one user, @deceive_gambhir.

LOAD-DATE: March 17, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Australian Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

175 of 492 DOCUMENTS

ABC Premium News (Australia)

March 17, 2012 Saturday
DUPLICATE

Baby's death shines spotlight on human trafficking

BYLINE: By Monique Ross

LENGTH: 868 words

The death of a battered two-year-old girl in India has thrust human trafficking in the country into the spotlight.

The girl, dubbed Falak by doctors, was taken to a New Delhi hospital in January by a 14-year-old girl who claimed to be her mother.

Doctors say Falak had severe head injuries, broken arms, branded cheeks, and bite marks covering her body when she was admitted.

For two months Indians followed the story as she underwent multiple surgeries. But on Thursday she suffered a cardiac arrest - the third in her short life - and died.

The case made headlines across the country, but it was just the beginning of a much darker story.

Once police began looking into the case, they uncovered a suspected human trafficking ring.

'Slave trade'

According to reports, the teenage girl who took Falak to hospital had been sold into a brothel. She began living with Rajkumar, a man she met through the brothel.

One day, he allegedly brought home baby Falak.

The woman believed to actually be Falak's biological mother, 22-year-old Munni, was tracked down in Rajasthan.

Munni had been sold by her first husband to another man.

She was reportedly forced to leave the baby with the teenager when she was sold. She also left behind her two other children.

The Indian home ministry says it is a case of human trafficking.

"This has turned out to be one of the biggest sex rackets involving minors and child prostitution and sale of women for marriage," Raaj Mangal Prasad, the head of India's Child Welfare Committee, told CNN.

"This shows this is a classic case where the magnitude of trafficking has come to light."

The girl is now in a juvenile home and Rajkumar has been detained by police - one of a handful of people arrested.

Shocking statistics

The case has reignited debate about human trafficking in India, a country with a population of 1.2 billion people.

The UN defines human trafficking as "the acquisition of people by improper means such as force, fraud or deception, with the aim of exploiting them".

It notes it is difficult to get a clear number of the amount of people affected because it is an underground crime.

However, the UN estimates that at any one time 2.5 million people are victims of trafficking across the globe, and the most common form is sexual exploitation.

In a 2011 report the US State Department ranked India as a tier 2 country in terms of human trafficking, meaning it does not do enough to eliminate trafficking but is taking steps to curb the problem.

"Ninety per cent of trafficking in India is internal, and those from India's most disadvantaged social economic strata including the lowest castes are particularly vulnerable to forced or bonded labour and sex trafficking," the report said.

"Women and girls are trafficked within the country for the purposes of forced prostitution ... cities popular for tourism continue to be vulnerable to child sex tourism. Indian nationals engage in child sex tourism within the country and, to a lesser extent, in other countries."

In a 2003 report the National Human Rights Commission of India estimated that nearly 40,000 children are abducted in India each year, with around 11,000 of those never being found.

The NHRC estimates that almost half of the children trafficked within India are between the ages of 11 and 14.

Stolen and sold

But not all the trafficking cases in India are internal.

In 2009, the ABC's Sally Sara investigated the trade of children in India, looking into cases of children being stolen and trafficked to Australia under the guise of adoptions.

Australia has several laws and bodies aimed at halting the trade in people.

Officials say the number of cases in Australia is relatively low, but they also admit the extent of the problem remains unclear.

According to the Australian Federal Police, nearly 200 people in Australia have been rescued from people-trafficking arrangements.

Australia's student visa program has also been hit by allegations that women entering Australia on student visas are being forced into the sex industry.

The AFP has recently held a series of forums to raise awareness of the problem, and last year it backed a campaign aimed at dismantling stereotypes of human trafficking:

What next?

According to the US State Department, the Indian government "does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking ... [but] it is making significant efforts to do so".

Last year India ratified the protocol to prevent people trafficking and it also prohibits some forms of trafficking - including for sexual exploitation and forced labour - in its local laws.

But critics say the laws are not effectively enforced and a clear definition of trafficking is not provided.

Delhi-based writer Namita Bhandare says there is plenty more that can be done to stop cases like this happening again.

But she argues that the "biggest stumbling block" is a lack of willpower to bring about concrete change.

Online, meanwhile, people are taking to social media sites like Twitter in a bid to keep the case of baby Falak in the spotlight.

"She came to reveal the sad story of human trafficking and many women of other India, now when she has done it ... she is gone RIP Baby Falak," tweeted one user, @deceive_gambhir.

LOAD-DATE: March 19, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Australian Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

176 of 492 DOCUMENTS

ABC Premium News (Australia)

March 17, 2012 Saturday
DUPLICATE

Baby's death shines spotlight on human trafficking

BYLINE: By Monique Ross

LENGTH: 886 words

The death of a battered two-year-old girl in India has thrust human trafficking in the country into the spotlight.

The girl, dubbed Falak by doctors, was taken to a New Delhi hospital in January by a 14-year-old girl who claimed to be her mother.

Doctors say Falak had severe head injuries, broken arms, branded cheeks, and bite marks covering her body when she was admitted.

For two months Indians followed the story as she underwent multiple surgeries. But on Thursday she suffered a cardiac arrest - the third in her short life - and died.

The case made headlines across the country, but it was just the beginning of a much darker story.

Once police began looking into the case, they uncovered a suspected human trafficking ring.

'Slave trade'

According to reports, the teenage girl who took Falak to hospital had been sold into a brothel. She began living with Rajkumar, a man she met through the brothel.

One day, he allegedly brought home baby Falak.

The woman believed to actually be Falak's biological mother, 22-year-old Munni, was tracked down in Rajasthan.

Munni had been sold by her first husband to another man.

She was reportedly forced to leave the baby with the teenager when she was sold. She also left behind her two other children.

The Indian home ministry says it is a case of human trafficking.

"This has turned out to be one of the biggest sex rackets involving minors and child prostitution and sale of women for marriage," Raaj Mangal Prasad, the head of India's Child Welfare Committee, told CNN.

"This shows this is a classic case where the magnitude of trafficking has come to light."

The girl is now in a juvenile home and Rajkumar has been detained by police - one of a handful of people arrested.

Shocking statistics

The case has reignited debate about human trafficking in India, a country with a population of 1.2 billion people.

And while the story of baby Falak is a tragic tale, statistics suggest there may be many similar stories.

The UN defines human trafficking as "the acquisition of people by improper means such as force, fraud or deception, with the aim of exploiting them".

It notes it is difficult to get a clear number of the amount of people affected because it is an underground crime.

However, the UN estimates that at any one time 2.5 million people are victims of trafficking across the globe, and the most common form is sexual exploitation.

In a 2011 report the US State Department ranked India as a tier 2 country in terms of human trafficking, meaning it does not do enough to eliminate trafficking but is taking steps to curb the problem.

"Ninety per cent of trafficking in India is internal, and those from India's most disadvantaged social economic strata including the lowest castes are particularly vulnerable to forced or bonded labour and sex trafficking," the report said.

"Women and girls are trafficked within the country for the purposes of forced prostitution ... cities popular for tourism continue to be vulnerable to child sex tourism. Indian nationals engage in child sex tourism within the country and, to a lesser extent, in other countries."

In a 2003 report the National Human Rights Commission of India estimated that nearly 40,000 children are abducted in India each year, with around 11,000 of those never being found.

The NHRC estimates that almost half of the children trafficked within India are between the ages of 11 and 14.

Stolen and sold

But not all the trafficking cases in India are internal.

In 2009, the ABC's Sally Sara investigated the trade of children in India, looking into cases of children being stolen and trafficked to Australia under the guise of adoptions.

Australia has several laws and bodies aimed at halting the trade in people.

Officials say the number of cases in Australia is relatively low, but they also admit the extent of the problem remains unclear.

According to the Australian Federal Police, nearly 200 people in Australia have been rescued from people-trafficking arrangements.

Australia's student visa program has also been hit by allegations that women entering Australia on student visas are being forced into the sex industry.

The AFP has recently held a series of forums to raise awareness of the problem, and last year it backed a campaign aimed at dismantling stereotypes of human trafficking:

What next?

According to the US State Department, the Indian government "does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking ... [but] it is making significant efforts to do so".

Last year India ratified the protocol to prevent people trafficking and it also prohibits some forms of trafficking - including for sexual exploitation and forced labour - in its local laws.

But critics say the laws are not effectively enforced and a clear definition of trafficking is not provided.

Delhi-based writer Namita Bhandare says there is plenty more that can be done to stop cases like this happening again.

But she argues that the "biggest stumbling block" is a lack of willpower to bring about concrete change.

Online, meanwhile, people are taking to social media sites like Twitter in a bid to keep the case of baby Falak in the spotlight.

"She came to reveal the sad story of human trafficking and many women of other India, now when she has done it ... she is gone RIP Baby Falak," tweeted one user, @deceive_gambhir.

LOAD-DATE: March 27, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Australian Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

177 of 492 DOCUMENTS

M2 PressWIRE

March 16, 2012 Friday

Press Releases: Annual Meeting of the President's Interagency Task Force To Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons

LENGTH: 11803 words

March 15, 2012

Hillary Rodham Clinton

Secretary of State Eisenhower Executive Office Building

Washington, DC

MS. JARRETT: Thank you. Welcome. Good morning, everyone. We want to welcome you to the White House for our annual President's Task Force to Combat and Monitor Trafficking of Persons. We're delighted to have it here hosted at the White House. It's indicative of the President's commitment to this issue, and we want to thank all of the members of the agencies who have joined us this morning for this meeting.

In 2008, the President spoke at Pastor Rick Warren's Saddleback Church, and he called human trafficking the modern-day enslavement of men, women, and children for sex or labor, and he referred to it as a debasement of our common humanity, which I think sums it up perfectly. As chair of the White House Council on Women and Girls, this issue is of particular importance to me as a leader but also to our council, which is represented by all of the agencies in the federal government as well. And it's why we're pleased to have you all here today.

We are confident with the Administration working together, with civil society, with not-for-profits, with the private sector, we can actually tackle this issue head on and conquer it. And we're delighted to have here Secretary Clinton, who has chaired this task force, and I'll turn it over to her in a second. But I wanted to, by way of introduction, mention that yesterday we were at the State Department for a luncheon with Prime Minister Cameron, and he said about Secretary Clinton that she has been a strong advocate who is committed to the emancipation and empowerment of women. And I thought that that was a perfect way to describe one of her many roles and one that is particularly germane to the topic of this morning.

So with that, again I want to welcome everyone here and tell you how committed the President is to making sure that we are all collaborating and sharing information together and intending to conquer this issue head on. So with that, I'll turn it over to Secretary Clinton. Thank you.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you. Well, thank you very much Valerie. And thank you for hosting us here at the White House. This annual event is a good opportunity to hear about the progress that our government is making to combat modern slavery and to talk about our goals going forward. And so I very much appreciate the President's commitment to this work and the collaboration that has been accomplished throughout the United States Government. So with that, I'm delighted to call this meeting to order.

I want to thank Ambassador CdeBaca and his staff not only for the work they put into staffing the task force, but for the zeal with which they lead this fight around the world. Of course, if this issue doesn't demand zealous advocacy, it's hard to figure out what does.

This September marks the 150th anniversary of the Preliminary Emancipation Proclamation. And it's a good time for us to recommit ourselves, not only to the promise of freedom, but to the work against ending modern slavery.

Around the world, as many as 27 million men, women, and children toil in bondage. This crime undermines economies and the rule of law. It shatters families and communities. It is an affront to our most fundamental values.

This issue is very near and dear to my heart, since the time I was first lady. And we began a full-hearted effort by our government -- both the executive branch and Congress -- to address this issue. And I've had the experience of meeting with survivors here at home and around the world. I've seen firsthand what a horrible toll this takes, and so I'm delighted that we have such a dedicated group of members.

This is a priority in the Obama Administration, starting with the President, as Valerie said. And the first time we convened the task force under this Administration, we laid out a set of commitments -- a call to action. And in answering that call, we've tried to elevate the fight against trafficking to the highest levels of policymaking.

This goes hand in hand. This is not an individual, one-off effort. This goes hand in hand with other work that we've been doing on behalf of women and girls and other marginalized people. The White House recently issued a National Action Plan on Women, Peace, and Security to ensure that women are full partners and participants in our efforts to reduce conflict and promote peace and prosperity around the world, because after all, modern slavery disproportionately affects women and girls. And as it does so, it disrupts family networks, and it undermines the foundation of stable economies and societies. So the Action Plan on Women, Peace, and Security contains specific steps to prevent human trafficking of women and children as a result of conflict and to provide assistance to victims.

The State Department has made the struggle against modern slavery an important part of our diplomatic engagement. Our annual Trafficking in Persons Report is the most comprehensive assessment of how well governments are doing to address this crime. The TIP Office's foreign assistance grants are making a difference in 37 countries, supporting programs that provide crucial assistance to survivors and help governments build their capacity to fight this crime. And thanks to our leadership, the international community is getting behind the effort. Nearly 140 countries have enacted modern anti-trafficking laws, and nearly 150 are party to the UN Trafficking in Persons Protocol.

And we've taken action here at home. For instance, we learned that survivors were being made to pay taxes on restitution payments from their abusers. And, well, some of the people in this room as well as colleagues from the Treasury Department who are not with us today saw the problem and said, "This isn't right; we're going to do something about it." So now the Treasury Department has made clear that victims are not liable to pay taxes on the wages of slavery.

Another example: We thought it was unfair for diplomats who victimized their own domestic workers were, because of diplomatic immunity, virtually untouchable. So now, we're making sure that diplomats coming to this country understand their obligations and responsibilities, and we're taking action when we have evidence that they are not.

We're trying to ensure that resources and support are available to victims wherever we find them, and one of those resources is the Department of Health and Human Services National Human Trafficking Resource Center. Its operations have been expanded. It now fields an unprecedented number of calls. And it is really making a difference in reaching out to survivors and helping us prosecute abusers.

Other agencies led by the Department of Homeland Security recently held a public listening session to hear from stakeholders about new ideas for victim services, federal government engagement with local communities, outreach to at-risk groups, and NGO private sector initiatives. Now, we've also tried to streamline how we approach cases. And instead of a muddle of agencies claiming or rejecting different responsibilities, thanks to the Departments of Justice, Labor, and Homeland Security, we have in place in the Obama Administration efficient, coordinated, anti-trafficking teams, and they're making investigations and prosecutions more effective and helping victims.

To help gauge our responses, I've included a tier ranking for the United States in the annual Trafficking In Persons Report. I thought it was important, if we were going to be judging other countries, we judged ourselves. And so we hold ourselves to the same standards we apply to others. It's not only the fair thing to do; it's turned out also to be the smart thing as well, because including us in the report made it more credible and effective as a diplomatic tool. It shows we're all in this fight together, that we have a problem, which we are continuing to address, and it's not just a document that names and shames, but instead it serves as a guide to what practices are working, and more importantly, what every government, including our own, needs to do better, and I greatly appreciate everyone's efforts on this. This latest publication from the President's Interagency Task Force Progress in Combating Trafficking in Persons really summarizes a lot of the progress we've made in the Obama Administration over the last three-plus years.

Finally, we know that the future of this struggle will depend on innovative solutions, so we are partnering with thinkers whose bold ideas are already helping to make a difference. We now have online tools like the Slavery Footprint so that people can understand the ways in which this crime affects them. It doesn't just happen to somebody far away, but it does have ripples of criminality that come across the globe.

We have new ways of looking at supply chains and policies, so that can help us cut off the demand that traffickers cruelly exploit. That's particularly important when you think about the buying power of the federal government. So I think that we meet at a time when we have a lot to be grateful for in terms of the enhanced efforts that we've made, the results that we're getting, but I think this task force is really focused on the challenge and the way ahead.

So let me now turn to Ambassador CdeBaca, who will say a few words about why we consider this such a high priority in our government.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you, Madam Secretary. It's this Administration's priority to give voice to the survivors of modern slavery whether in court or in our foreign policy, but those voices have been calling for justice for more than 150 years. A letter from the National Archives recently surfaced, a letter written in September of 1864 by Spotswood Rice to Katherine Diggs, his former master. He wrote from the lines of the Union Army as he and his new comrades marched back to Missouri, back towards the plantation where he had been held. Among those still enslaved was his daughter, Mary. His strength and righteous anger rings out through the years. And I quote:

"I want you to understand that mary is my Child and she is a God given rite of my own. And you may hold on to hear as long as you can, but I want you to remember this one thing -- the longor you keep my Child from me, the longor you will have to burn...and the qwicer youll get their..."

"I want you now to just hold on to hear if you want to iff your conchosence tells thats the road go that road and what it will brig you to kittey diggs I have no fears about geting mary out of your hands the whole Government gives chear to me and you cannot help your self."

We know from the oral histories that once freed, that little girl lived a long and prosperous life. And in 1937, an aged Mary told a WPA historian: "I love army men. My father, brother, husband, and son were all army men. I love a man who fights for his rights and any person who wants to be someone."

Slavery and the ways that we fight it have changed so much since Spotswood Rice and those other survivors marched with that terrible, swift sword. But as you said last year, Madam Secretary, when we take up this burden at home and abroad, we do it because fighting slavery is part of our national identity. It's who we are.

Together, we can and we must rise to meet Spotswood Rice's challenge to go back for everyone's daughters and sons who remain in servitude. Together, we can give cheer to those who answer the call and march with today's survivors on their road to freedom.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you so much, Lou. And one of the things that Lou has done over his professional life of commitment to this issue is to continually link it to larger struggles for human freedom, including our own.

I want to turn now to the Attorney General, because the Attorney General and the Justice Department have been great partners in our efforts to combat this scourge. And I want to thank Attorney General Holder.

ATTORNEY GENERAL HOLDER: Well, thank you, Secretary Clinton. And also let me start by thanking President Obama for hosting us and for his extraordinary leadership in this global fight against human trafficking, and also thanks to my good friend Valerie Jarrett for bringing us together today and for her attention to this issue.

It's really an honor for me to join with my colleagues and partners to discuss the progress that we have made over the past year, but also to identify ways in which we can continue the momentum that we have built up over the past year and make sure that all that we have pledged to do in this Administration actually does occur.

One of the things I would point out is that one of the four priorities that I've identified for the Justice Department is that we protect the most vulnerable among us. And this fits right into one of those four core priorities for the United States Department of Justice. For Justice, our commitment to preventing human trafficking, bringing traffickers to justice, and assisting victims has really never been stronger, and our approach, I don't think, has ever been more effective. Our work has sent a clear and critical message that in this country and under this Administration, human trafficking crimes will simply not be tolerated.

I'm proud to report that in the past year we charged a record number of people with human trafficking offenses, and over the last three years we have achieved significant increases in human trafficking prosecutions, including the rise of more than 30 percent in the number of forced labor and adult sex trafficking prosecutions.

Now, this work is really more than statistics. It has saved lives. It has ensured freedom. It has restored dignity to women, to men, to children, in virtually every corner of this country. We have liberated scores of victims. We have secured long prison sentences against individual traffickers. But we've also dismantled really large transnational organized crime enterprises. As many of you will recall, last February the Justice Department launched a human trafficking enhanced enforcement initiative in order to take our counter-trafficking enforcement levels -- efforts to a new level.

Now, as part of this commitment, I announced the Anti-Trafficking Coordination Team, or ACT Team, initiative that's an interagency collaboration among the Departments of Justice, Homeland Security, and Labor, aimed at streamlining federal criminal investigations and prosecutions of human trafficking offenses. And following a very rigorous and competitive interagency selection process, we launched six Phase One Pilot ACT Teams around the country. And they are located in Atlanta, El Paso, Kansas City, Los Angeles, Memphis, and Miami, and today these teams are fully operational. And by bringing federal investigative agencies and federal prosecutors together, they are allowing us to develop and to advance high-impact human trafficking prosecutions.

And let me just share some examples with you. Over the last year we have dismantled a large transnational organized crime enterprise that held Ukrainian victims in forced labor in Philadelphia. We have brought freedom and dignity to undocumented Central American women and convicted the traffickers who, with threats of violence and abuse, compelled them into forced labor and prostitution in restaurants and bars on Long Island in New York. We have restored freedom to undocumented Eastern European women and convicted the traffickers who brutally exploited them in massage parlors in Chicago and even branded them with tattoos to claim them as their own property. We have secured a life sentence against a gang member in the Eastern District of Virginia, just across the river here, for sex trafficking of victims as young as 12 years old.

By providing grant funding to our state and local law enforcement partners and to victims service organizations really across the country, the Justice Department is also supporting proactive efforts to stop traffickers and to help victims heal and to rebuild their lives.

And for the entire anti-trafficking community, we are continuing to provide training and technical assistance as well. And over the last year these efforts have included hosting three regional training forums that have focused on improving collaboration as well as the development of a training curriculum to help state prosecutors and state judges better understand human trafficking crimes. This is something that has to be done at the state and local level as well as at the federal level.

We're also taking steps to forge and strengthen partnerships across international borders, understanding that this is not simply an American problem. And we have seen that this effort is really essential. Over the last year, by working with our Mexican law enforcement partners, we have dismantled sex trafficking networks that operate on both sides of the U.S.-Mexico border and have brought freedom to victims and secured really landmark convictions and substantial sentences against the traffickers in these high-impact bilateral cases. We've had good cooperation with our Mexican counterparts.

So I think we can all be encouraged by our recent achievements in the fight against human trafficking, but I think we would all agree that we have still more to do and that far too many people remain in desperate need for the help that we can provide. And that's why I think that our joint efforts and our outstanding efforts really must continue. I am committed to this. The Justice Department is committed to this. This group that meets today is obviously committed to this. This Administration has identified this as a priority.

So I look forward to our discussions as to where we will go from here and how we can keep working in partnership to increase the impact of these very critical efforts. Thank you.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you very much, Attorney General. Now I'd like to invite Secretary Hilda Solis to share the Labor Department's update. And I want to thank Hilda for making this a high priority within the Labor Department.

SECRETARY SOLIS: Thank you very much, Madam Secretary, and also to our colleagues. I want to also congratulate President Obama and Valerie Jarrett for having this meeting convened here. This is a topic that obviously is very controversial and one that some of us in this room we know take very seriously and, of course, feel that we need to do as much as we can to make sure that every effort, especially at the Department of Labor, is focused in on combating this terrible error that occurs not just in our shores but also abroad.

I want to applaud President Obama. He's been very clear in his vision for an America built to last, one where everyone has a fair shot at success and where everyone plays by the same rules. Our actions to end the exploitation of workers are critical to achieving that vision. That's why the Department of Labor is here.

The Department of Labor's efforts to combat human trafficking have been broad and varied and can be broken down into two -- three main categories. The first is detection and law enforcement. Our investigators are on the front lines of trafficking, identifying potential cases and providing critical support such as translation services during investigations.

We've revamped the integrity and enforcement actions of our guest worker program to ensure a fair process for employers who use temporary foreign workers and to enforce protections for all of our workers. We've now announced new protocols to begin certifying new visas. That's allowed us to help immigrant victims of trafficking assist in investigation of those crimes.

The second category involves transnational engagement and research. We've signed currently declarations with Mexico, Guatemala, Nicaragua, El Salvador, Costa Rica, and DR to ensure that foreign workers, often the most vulnerable, are informed of their labor rights here in the U.S. This is very important as well because, in many cases, folks come here thinking that there are no serious protections available to them, there is no one that's going to listen to them, so it's a course of trying to reeducate people over and over again that there are different laws here, and there is a responsibility and accountability process.

The funding that we have included in these programs includes technical assistance projects and research that we're doing across the board on child and forced labor across the globe. And since 1995, the Department of Labor has been funding projects to combat the worst forms of child labor. And as a result, hundreds of thousands of children have been prevented from being trafficked.

The third and final category in our efforts to combat trafficking victims is services -- services that must be provided, a full restitution for the labor that they have performed. So we are very excited to be working with our friends in Department of Justice and our other sister agencies on these issues. Alongside our agency partners, we've been proud to assist these victims by computing the back wages that they are rightfully owed. So that's a big message, I think, to the overall community that it's time to speak up and not be afraid to speak out.

Another critical part of helping trafficking victims is to make sure that they have the support they need to get back on their feet, so we're proud to offer employment and training services to victims of severe forms of trafficking through our network of one-stop career centers so they can enter and get information and, hopefully, get on their feet again. And of course, we're aiming to support workers.

We're also aiming to support employers in helping us combat trafficking, so that's another big part of our effort. Our enforcement officers are working both to ensure a level playing field of law-abiding businesses, because we don't agree that unscrupulous businesses should get away with this crime, and to protect the rights of workers to deter unscrupulous employers that continue to exploit workers.

Looking ahead, we continue to remain committed to further these efforts. Soon, we'll be providing awareness training to our national field staff so that even more prepared individuals will know about this issue. We'll also be announcing a new joint declaration with the following -- the Philippines, Ecuador, and Peru -- to make sure that their vulnerable workers here in our country know of their rights and protections available.

Additionally, we'll do more to engage with our stakeholders in this critical issue by hosting listening sessions, roundtables, and making sure that our fact sheets and reports are also equally translated in those various languages that are much needed as well.

Finally, I look forward to partnering with all of you in fulfilling the Promise campaign, which is critical to our collective action on the issue.

I want to thank everyone. I'm incredibly proud of the work that all of you and all of us have been able to accomplish under your leadership in this Administration. Thank you.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you so much, Hilda, and let me now turn to Secretary Sebelius. Obviously the Department of Health and Human Services is an absolutely essential partner in everything we do.

Kathleen.

SECRETARY SEBELIUS: Well, thank you, Secretary, for your leadership on this task force. And Valerie, I hope that you convey to the President how important we all think it is that he has provided the kind of vision and leadership that brings us all here today, because this collaborative effort is incredibly important.

On this issue, the Department of Health and Human Services is motivated by the collaboration across federal agencies to raise public awareness and make the most of our resources. And we're especially motivated to continue the important role in reaching and helping human trafficking victims every day. So over the past year, we have really deployed a lot of assets to our regional offices, 10 of them around the country, who have expanded their efforts to develop staff capacity through multiple trainings and meetings to monitor and combat human trafficking. We substantially expanded our outreach efforts through the Rescue and Restore Victims of Human Trafficking campaign, which includes now an online posting of the Look Beneath the Surface training video that is both available in English and Spanish.

During the last fiscal year, we built on our anti-trafficking efforts by providing services and resources on human trafficking through the Runaway and Homeless Youth Training and Technical Assistance Center. Going forward, the President's Fiscal Year 2013 budget includes a new $ 5 million proposal to award competitive grants focused on reducing the exploitation of children in the form of domestic sex trafficking. HHS also, as Secretary Clinton has referred, funds the National Human Trafficking Resource Center, which is a nationwide resource for potential victims and the public who may encounter a trafficking situation.

We maintain a national toll-free hotline that operates 24 hours a day, seven days a week, every day of the year. And last year, the hotline received over 16,000 calls, a 43 percent increase in the last fiscal year, which I think is both an indication of the depth of the problem, but also an indication that people now are aware that there's someplace to go for help. Of this total, we have close to 800 cases resulting in direct report to law enforcement, which is a 51 percent increase, so that connecting the hotline with actual action on the ground, thanks to our partners in the Department of Justice, has been a really important initiative.

Through a recently established interdepartmental working group, HHS and other agencies are discussing better coordination of the federal anti-trafficking efforts when dealing with victims and attendant services training and technical assistance. And as a group, we've identified the need for two types of call lines -- a central hotline for calls regarding victims and investigative tip lines. We've also agreed to explore additional opportunities to appropriately highlight and differentiate between the resource center and the investigation hotlines.

So I feel confident that our efforts at HHS, hand in hand with our federal partners here at the table, continue to move us closer to our ultimate goal of freedom for all by bringing an end to this inexcusable human rights abuse.

And again, thank you, Madam Secretary, for convening this critical meeting, for the report that you're doing, and we look forward to continuing this critical work together.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you very much, Kathleen.

Now let me turn to the Department of Homeland Security's update. Certainly, DHS personnel are on the front lines not only here at home but literally around the world, and we greatly appreciate Secretary Napolitano's leadership.

SECRETARY NAPOLITANO: And thank you, Secretary Clinton. I also appreciate the leadership you've shown on this issue and the leadership of the President. It's a social issue, it's an economic issue, it's a law enforcement issue, it's a moral issue, and I think that joins us all around the table. We have also been working through partnerships of various types under an umbrella we call the Blue Campaign at DHS. It is leading directly to more tips, more investigations, improved services for victims, and I think will help us serve our ultimate goal of finally getting some deterrence to this issue.

We have partnered with the Department of State to develop two online trainings, one for the federal acquisition workforce. Our contractors have a zero-tolerance clause built into every federal contract, so we're now training them and also training for the general public. CBP has worked with the Department of Transportation to launch something called the Blue Lightning Initiative, teaching airline employees the signs of trafficking and how to notify law enforcement. We're working with the firefighter and EMS communities to create training for first responders who may come into contact with victims, and we are in the process of putting the finishing touches on a one-week interdisciplinary training course at the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center, FLETC, which will bring together teams representing victim services, investigations, prosecutions, a first of its kind type of training in this area. And we expect it to be available no later than this summer.

We've worked to increase public awareness of human trafficking through targeted video messages and public service announcements, including CBP's No Te Enganes campaign, Don't Be Fooled, and ICE's Hidden in Plain Sight campaign, which reached an estimated 5 million people.

We've worked to address and recognize the needs and unique challenges of trafficking victims. We have now put 39 specially trained human trafficking experts in each of our ICE field offices, and we've doubled the number of forensic interview specialists. CIS has developed a one-pager for law enforcement on options for victims, including the T and the U visa programs.

The efforts are succeeding. We are finding more investigations with a nexus to human trafficking. Last year, we initiated 722, we obtained 271 convictions. Eric, working with your folks, seized assets worth well over $ 2 million. We also have seen a steady increase in the number of reports to the tip line, up 69 percent between FY2010 and 2011, and I think looking at the '12 numbers, there will be another record, unfortunately, in a way.

This year, we plan to do even more. We are requiring all of our contracting professionals to take training on combating trafficking in persons, and we have already trained 600 acquisition personnel on how to use that clause in the standard federal contract. We're working to assure that age-appropriate care and services are provided to unaccompanied minor children encountered by us typically through the immigration system. We had a roundtable discussion here at the White House with retail, hotel, and airline industry leaders, and also with state, local, tribal, and territorial law enforcement agencies and associations discussing ways we could work together to raise awareness. We are continuing to deploy ideas from those sessions.

And we are expanding the reach and scope of our free, interactive computer-based training system for local law enforcement partners. We work extensively with Justice, with Labor on the ACT teams that the Attorney General referenced, because those teams, I think, hold great promise in actually dealing with this problem. So we will continue to listen, we will continue to work, and like everyone else around the table, we intend to, if anything, increase our commitment. Thank you.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Great. Thank you very much, Janet. Now let me turn to Cecilia Munoz, the assistant to the President and Domestic Policy Council Director.

Cecilia.

MS. MUNOZ: Thank you very much, Madam Secretary. It's a real honor to be part of this gathering today. This is obviously incredibly important work and it falls to me to talk a little bit about the work of the Domestic Policy Council on the domestic side of this issue.

As everyone in this room knows, two years ago, the President forcefully articulated his personal commitment to fighting modern slavery and human trafficking, described it as a shared responsibility. And as we're hearing today, the -- since the President made that commitment two years ago, we've been making progress through investigations and prosecutions, the victims assistance programs, we've been hearing about technical assistance for states and localities. I mean, it's a good list and it's a long list, but it doesn't involve only the work of government. The conscience of the country was really awakened by the President's remarks. And we have churches, we have businesses and communities across the country heeding the President's call to action, finding ways to combat trafficking, and to serve those who have been victimized by it.

The Domestic Policy Council has partnered with many of you in this important work, and the President has really reiterated just this morning in a statement his commitment to these issues. He's instructed his Cabinet, all of us, to find ways to strengthen the good work that we're already doing, and to expand our partnerships with civil society and the private sector so that we can bring more resources to bear on this terrible problem.

As the President announced in his statement, in the coming weeks, the White House will build on this gathering on behalf of human dignity. This is an issue that the President understands the way that your agencies do -- as a crime, as a violation of universal human rights -- and it's a policy priority on both the domestic and international fronts. We are committed to maximizing our efforts in every way possible, and we're confident that working together, we can -- collectively, we can strengthen the efforts of both the federal government and civil society in ending the scourge of modern slavery.

So our direction is clear. We intend to continue to work in partnership with all of you and your teams. The White House intends to redouble its efforts and build on this already strong record of accomplishment, and we're going to reach out to our partners outside of government in the hope that, together, we can really make an unprecedented push to raise awareness and have further real and sustained results. We don't have any illusions about this task being easy. If it -- this were an easy issue with simple solutions, we wouldn't need to be here having this gathering today. But we are persuaded that by working with each other effectively and working with our partners around the country and around the world, we can really bring positive change to this issue.

So we will be working with you to expand the resources, to leverage our efforts and our coordinated -- coordinating capacity. And so I look forward to working with all of you to do that. I look forward to playing a role in helping lift up the work that you're already doing and helping to coordinate it as strongly as possible. And we're convinced that with this partnership within government and partnerships outside of government, we can make an enormous difference on this issue, and we're honored to be part of it.

Thank you, Madam Secretary.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you so much, Cecilia. Now I will turn to someone I work with practically every day on a wide variety of security issues around the world, and I'm delighted that he would be here for this meeting.

So, Assistant to the President, Deputy National Security Advisor Denis McDonough.

MR. MCDONOUGH: Madam Secretary, thank you very much, and allow me to join Cecilia in thanking all of your teams who we get to work with every day on this matter. Let me just take a minute too to highlight our team -- Rob Berschinski, Quintan Wiktorowicz, and most especially, Samantha Power, who, on behalf of the National Security staff, have really made this a priority and have been working with your teams to push this through.

Human trafficking is just one of those topics that doesn't make it in the paper every day. But I think what we see in this year's report and in each of the reports that are coming from the agencies now is that the work that all the agencies are doing is actually having a very profound, life-changing impact on Americans and non-Americans, men, women, and children all around the world. So it's something about which I think we should feel quite good, recognizing, of course, as everybody said, that there's an awful lot of work to be done.

The fact is that the -- when the United States Government, when our people, are understood to be an international leader on this issue, it speaks to something at the heart of the President's National Security Strategy, which he put out in 2010 -- one, that we're strengthened by the power of our example, and that we're strongest when we're working to advance the dignity of individuals all around the world. So for us at the National Security staff, this is a national security issue.

It is -- human trafficking is at the nexus of organized crimes, is a source for funding for international terrorist groups, is a source for funding for transnational criminal groups. It fundamentally endangers international security. And so while we're trying to create an international economy in which everyone can choose and be paid for for their work, it, by lifting this up, will strengthen our ability to be a leader in the global marketplace as well.

Now I know Ash, Raj, and Maria have not had a chance to brief out their results yet, so I'm not going to steal their thunder. But I do want to highlight a couple of things that I see from my position in terms of coordinating the interagency's work on this effort.

First, as I said above, when we lead by example, we're standing as a model for other governments in how we train our people, hold them to the highest ethical standards when it comes to trafficking, and makes it able for us to walk the walk as well as talk the talk. As Raj will no doubt highlight, USAID has been at the forefront of this effort through the standards it's applying to all its employees -- contractors, subcontractors, and grantees. We recognize that across the government, there's still an awful lot to do to improve on this in terms of procurement of goods and labor, and the President is demanding that we do more in exactly this area as the report pulls forward.

As Secretary Clinton said, being a model also means we're willing to place ourselves to the same level of scrutiny that we're applying to others, which is why he was so appreciative of the report including the United States on the list of countries that are graded in this and State's annual Trafficking in Persons Report this year.

Second, let me emphasize that when it comes to trafficking, one thing that we do know is that we don't know enough. In addition to what Cecilia has mentioned, in his statement today, the President spoke of trafficking as a form of exploitation that hides both in the dark corners of our world and in plain sight in our own towns and country -- towns and cities. We know in certain areas we don't have great data on the scope of the problem. And in terms of our programming, we may know what works and what doesn't, but we're still learning precise causal relationships. That's why the President's demanding that we keep the focus on learning and improving on our interventions.

Lastly, and perhaps most importantly, we would urge that on topics like our anti-trafficking work, we maintain laser-like focus on mainstreaming what we're doing in all our day-to-day operations. Whether in your internal strategy development or in policy papers you bring to the interagency coordination arena, if the majority of your staff are diplomats, are development experts, are service members, see efforts to counter trafficking as a silo, as a job of only people in the Trafficking Office, rather than as a core component of their job then we will not have lifted this up the way the President, Secretary, all of you are demanding that we do.

So I'll leave it at that. I'm looking forward to hearing more about the tremendous work that all of your teams have -- are underway. And obviously, as each have highlighted, I think we're here to be commended here -- on the work done heretofore. And just to echo Cecilia on the President's direction today, our team is looking forward to working with each of you and your teams on the months to come to build on all the good work that we already have in place.

So, Madam Secretary, thank you very much.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you very much, Denis. We really appreciate that overview. Now let me turn to the director of National Intelligence, Lieutenant General Jim Clapper.

LIEUTENANT GENERAL CLAPPER: Thank you, Madam Secretary. And again, I join colleagues in praising you for -- commending you for your leadership, and it's an honor to be here. I thought I'd discuss very briefly the intelligence community's role in combating transnational organized crime, and in particular, the understanding and combating trafficking in persons. My priority in this job is to integrate collection analysis across the intelligence community in line with policy-maker needs.

Now after last year's meeting of this group, I rededicated some internal assets to stand up our own transnational organized crime team on my staff, and we never had -- in the history of the DNI, never had a single office for that sort of focus. And in line with the theme of leveraging across the government, we've become very engaged with the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Office, and are experiencing Lou's zeal. (Laughter.)

I've only been active for a short time, but we are seeing an increase, however modest -- and I anticipate this will gain momentum through our channels, and I just -- I think this is the beginning. We expect bigger results in the future as we continue to strengthen partnerships with key NI human trafficking advocates. And as others have eluded on this issue, partnerships are absolutely crucial to success.

And just to underline a point that Denis just made -- certainly we in the intelligence community recognize this --that trafficking in persons is a national security issue in addition to be a social, economic, and law enforcement issue. And so we're committed to doing our part to defeat it.

Our efforts across the intelligence community to integrate collection analysis and work with state, local, and tribal law enforcement will improve our ability to combat this appalling crime, and we can and must do more.

In October, my team attended the Trafficking in Persons Reporting Conference hosted by the State Department, Miami; made sure that different agencies within the intelligence community attended. This was the first time the IC has ever integrated with the State Department on this mission of ensuring that trafficking in persons reporting is accurate.

In November, our team hosted our own transnational organized crime event at my headquarters via video teleconference, and it was a global thing throughout the IC to many interested members of the intelligence community. And this was, I think, part of my responsibility to ensure awareness within the intelligence community. And a special presentation by the State Department's Trafficking in Persons team was the highlight -- had a huge impact, feedback I got.

We also coordinate extensively to have attendees who represent the nations we refer to as our Five Eyes allies. Those are the commonwealth countries with whom we have the closest, most intimate intelligence relationships. So I refer specifically to the UK's Serious Organized Crime Agency, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Australian Federal Police, and the New Zealand Customs agency. We're starting -- we're working towards the goal of a better understanding of the role that trafficking plays in persons in national instability, corruption, and crime around the globe. I think it's our job to shine a light on those dark corners.

So I'll just say that we are committed to this and we do recognize that it is a national security issue. Thank you, Madam Chairman.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thanks so much, Jim. Now I'd like to invite Acting Director Zients to share OMB's update. Jeff?

MR. ZIENTS: Thank you. Now given the fiscal situation -- everybody knows that budgets are very tight, difficult budget environment; many agencies are experiencing actually lower budget. In this environment, it's OMB's job to make sure every dollar's well spent and importantly, that the most important priorities of the Administration, of the President, are well funded, and that we allocate dollars accordingly. Preventing human trafficking is a clear priority for the President and the Administration, so we are committed to working with each agency to make sure that we have the appropriate resources to fund these important efforts. I think we have good working relationships with each agency and your teams, but we will make sure that adequate resources are allocated to these efforts. We also stand ready to help -- in any way to help manage cross-agency processes to ensure that we continue to make significant progress. Thank you.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you very much. We like hearing that. (Laughter.) I hope everybody really (inaudible.)

PARTICIPANT : It was the shortest --

SECRETARY CLINTON: Yeah. We should meet at the White House more often. (Laughter.) Now let me turn to Deputy Secretary Ash Carter to give the Department of Defense's update.

DEPUTY SECRETARY CARTER: Thank you, Secretary Clinton. The President's determination to combat trafficking is reflected in each of the three ways that we, the Department of Defense, touch this problem. Namely, through our own people, uniformed and civilian and their conduct. Second, through our contractors. And the third, in our foreign military training programs. So let me just take each of those in turn.

First of all, for our own folks, both uniformed and civilian, they are required to receive training. I've reviewed the curriculum. It's very good, it's incisive. It basically has two parts: Don't do it and learn to recognize it. So let me take the don't do it part first.

The don't do it part -- you may not know this, I was a little surprised myself, but it has only been recently that patronizing a prostitute became an offense under the Uniform Code of Military Justice. It is, and that's something that we need to begin to and continue and increase our enforcement of that provision. Because in the neighborhood around bases here or abroad, obviously, there's an opportunity for that. So don't do it.

And the second part of the training is recognize it. And that -- for that, it's part of the annual training. We also have public service announcements on Armed Forces Network and that kind of thing. If you're in a gym somewhere around the world or in Afghanistan, you'll frequently see them to increase awareness and to give the tell-tale signs of it to our people. We do some specific things regionally in PACOM, USFK -- U.S. Forces Korea -- where we've had -- historically had an issue there. So wherever we detect it, we try to follow up. And there have been some cases recently, which we have aggressively followed up in the law enforcement sense.

Contractors. You know that for every soldier, sailor, airman, and marine deployed, there's at least one contractor that ends up in theater at the same time. They're all employed by us. Secretary Napolitano already made it clear. It's part of the Federal Acquisition Regulation and it's Defense Federal Acquisition Supplement that contracts are to have a provision forbidding trafficking as in any connection with the country. Now, it's one thing to write it into the contract and you say, "How do you make sure you get it done?" We're going to make it training for the contractors mandatory, even as it is for our own people, civilian and military -- number one.

Number two, contracting officer representatives, a COR. What is a COR? COR is the person who makes sure that the contract is executed. So there's somebody who follows around the contractor and makes sure it gets done. Those people are now trained, which they didn't used to be, in recognizing trafficking. So they can see if an association with one of our contracting activities -- this has gone on, very important. And we have our inspector general now tracking to make sure that those contract clauses are all there and the contracting officer representatives are, in fact, monitoring compliance with those. Very important, because contractors is a huge part of what we do.

Last piece is our foreign military training engagements. All of our programs, be they 1206, be they IMET, JSET, our training of UN peacekeepers and so forth, it is a required part of that curriculum. If we offer it as a department to another military that it include training for those foreign military members in trafficking, both don't do it and recognize it. So for example, just to give you one example, in the Democratic Republic of Congo, AFRICOM, our African Command, works through DIILS -- the Defense Institute for International Legal Studies -- maybe some of you may be familiar with -- to train justice professionals in the prosecution of trafficking crimes and Congolese military commanders in how to prevent their troops from engaging in this. It's very important in all of our training. So those are our training activities.

So in those three arenas where we might touch this problem and do touch this problem, we're trying to make sure that we're reflecting the President's fight.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thanks very much, Ash. Now, Deputy Secretary Porcari, would you please report from the Department of Transportation?

DEPUTY SECRETARY PORCARI: Thank you, Secretary Clinton, and we appreciate your leadership on this. And Valerie, we very much appreciate the clear and consistent direction the President has given us on this. It's energized all of us.

We want to make sure, first and foremost, that the transportation system is not inadvertently an enabler of human trafficking. We're very committed across land, sea, and air to making sure that's not the case. Marlise Streitmatter, our deputy chief of staff, has been our lead person on this and will continue to be, but we're using all of our resources across borders and agencies to make sure that we can positively impact this problem.

For example, working with Secretary Napolitano in Customs and Border Protection, the Blue Lightning Initiative provides an in-flight procedure to report human trafficking events, law enforcement, as well as awareness for the flight crews. We've gotten very positive response from our airlines on this; they're very interested in moving forward on this. Likewise, on the highways, we want to make sure they're free of human trafficking. If a commercial truck or bus driver commits a felony, we can take them off the road -- and obviously, human trafficking is a felony. This gives us an opportunity to remove the bad actors.

We're also pursuing opportunities with Amtrak and the motor coach industry to develop a public awareness campaign and specialized training for our inspectors that are out in the field all across the country to recognize the warning signs of human trafficking. We're also collaborating with our Mexican and Canadian partners to increase awareness, and we look forward to expanding on those partnerships.

There are also some less conventional partnerships that can be very effective. Working, for example, with our local and state departments of motor vehicles, as well as truck stops, to build public awareness, and give people that are literally on the front lines of this fight the tools to recognize and report suspicious activities.

And finally, this really starts at home, and we're working internally within our Department of Transportation, across all the transportation modes, to make sure that we educate our team on identifying human trafficking, and we're building, essentially, on the DHS program that's out there.

So we're dedicated to moving forward with this. This is an unconscionable and unacceptable activity, and we are looking forward on building the -- on the progress to date. Thank you.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you very much. Now I'd like to invite from the State Department, Under Secretary of State for Civilian Security, Democracy, and Human Rights, Maria Otero, to go into a little more detail about what we're doing at the State Department.

UNDER SECRETARY OTERO: Thank you very much, Madam Secretary. And I also want to express appreciation for the leadership that our President is giving us on this issue, and Valerie, convening us here, and of course, express the importance for us to be able to work with every department across the board under the commitment and leadership of Secretary Clinton, who has really enabled our Department to push forward in this area.

Over the last year, the TIP Office, under the leadership of Ambassador CdeBaca, but working in partnership with our regional bureaus and with all of the other colleagues across the Department, we've made advances in several areas that I think are important to highlight in addressing the State Department's response to modern slavery. And let me just touch on a couple of them, as Secretary Clinton has also talked about some of them.

First, the Department -- as other departments have stated here -- is in the process of developing a training program that is going to be applicable for all of our direct hires. And this is with the purpose of helping all of our employees understand the nature of this crime better. And not only be able to understand it but to be able to recognize it when it happens and to be able to see the warning signs before it is happening and also take action if that is necessary. So this is in the process of being developed, and we anticipate through it that the degree of understanding of this issue will increase by all of those that are working at the Department.

Second, Secretary Clinton, last year at this task force, announced the establishment of a new trafficking investigation unit that would be set up by our Diplomatic Security Bureau. And I'm very pleased to say that, indeed, that was not only set up, but that in fact it has been operating this last year. And it is very exciting that it has already carried out a number of investigations that have led to indictments. And that for us is a real sign of being able to move this forward. The unit's Victims' Resource Advocacy Program is also equipped to fully support the victims themselves that are discovered in the course of any of these investigations. So we are applauding our Diplomatic Security Bureau for how quickly they've put together this team, and not only set forth its parameters, but also how its work is already showing results.

Third, we're working to protect the visa holders who come to the United States as domestic servants of diplomats. Thanks to the works of one of our working groups, which is headed by our chief of protocol, we are working closely with the diplomatic community to raise their awareness of this issue and to make sure the diplomats that bring domestic workers to the United States now follow a set of requirements that are in place that will prevent those workers from being abused.

Finally -- and Secretary Clinton mentioned this briefly -- the TIP Office has partnered with an NGO to develop a tool that allows anybody and everybody to go online, to take a survey, and then to see how many victims of human trafficking it takes to sustain their lifestyle. This is called the Slavery Footprint, and it is the kind of innovation that is helping create change and also create awareness not only of the existence of this crime but also of the challenges that we face in addressing it, and it is bringing people to this issue.

We know that more than three million people from more than 200 countries have logged on to this site, and we're confident that tools such as this one are going to be some that are going to help make a difference in engaging those around the world in addressing this issue in the years ahead. Thank you.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you, Maria. Since we are being broadcast here, perhaps, Lou, you could give the website for the Slavery Footprint, because it's had a remarkable impact, and we want to encourage everybody everywhere to sign on.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Certainly. Thank you, Madam Secretary. It's pretty intuitive. It's the slaveryfootprint.org -- not dot com -- slaveryfootprint.org.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Right. So we invite everyone to log on.

Now let me turn to Dr. Raj Shah, the USAID administrator, who is such a great partner in this and so much of the work that we do.

ADMINISTRATOR SHAH: Thank you, Madam Secretary, for your focus and direction on these issues, and to President Obama for elevating the attention and the resources that we will hope to invest against results in this space.

In the past year, our agency has made significant progress trying to live up to commitments we've made around this table for each of the past two years as part of this task force. We are implementing a more results-oriented approach to counter-trafficking efforts around the world, which starts, as Denis mentioned, with the adoption of a strict, new code of conduct for ourselves, our partners abroad, our contractors, and in particular, our security contractors that often operate in high-risk conflict environments. The code of conduct, much as Ash Carter described, will make sure that more people serve as eyes and ears in the search for those at risk or those enslaved. And we have intensified procurement actions and implementation of that code of conduct so that those terms are written into our contracts and enforced through our contracts' officers and reviewers.

We've also launched a new counter-trafficking policy developed in close partnership with many agencies represented around the table. This policy requires every USAID mission in a high-risk country to conduct baseline surveys on trafficking and develop clear metrics to assess progress against prevention for our efforts and efforts of others in the international community. It also directs us to create more multi-country databases so victims can be tracked across countries and supported in their efforts as they -- as that is such a critical barrier, having that data be accessible in a number of different environments. And it prioritizes investments in technologies, like mapping platforms, mobile applications, and other innovations.

We also believe that the -- one of the challenges is getting the word out and making sure that people who are in a difficult situation have the capacity to seek help. In that effort, we have expanded a highly successful partnership with MTV EXIT into Russia for the very first time, but it is a global program that has had some real successes, especially in Asia. Through the partnership with MTV EXIT, they have created public service advertisements, music videos, and other efforts to create awareness about trafficking and provide hotlines so that people can access resources to fight back. We believe it has reached more than 300 million households in Asia over the last seven years.

And just to share one story that we heard about just a few weeks ago, that for more than three years a young Cambodian boy and his three friends had been essentially enslaved on a Thai fishing boat. Just a few weeks ago, their boat docked at a port in Thailand, and they happened to see on television one of the MTV EXIT advertisements about trafficking. The video flashed a free hotline number in both Thai and Cambodian so the kids could read it and respond. They did. Immigration authorities responded immediately, and they were freed. We seek many, many more stories like this and believe our expanded efforts are helping to get us there.

We also know, as the President mentioned in his statement today, that we want to work more effectively with partners throughout our own country in the private sector, on universities and campuses, and in faith-based communities. I recently visited Bethel University, a Christian college outside of Minneapolis, and I met with about 100 students the day after we had released our counter-trafficking policy, actually, in this room. And sometimes it takes in the federal government -- as everyone here knows -- some time for these policies to be read by our teams and really inform changes and action and behavior. I know we all address that. Every one of the 100 kids that I met with had already read our policy online, and they had ideas, they had things they wanted to contribute.

So today, we're thrilled to announce that we will launch a college -- a campus challenge to combat trafficking, and we'll seek to partner with the most innovative, creative ideas in the realm of prevention and protection. And we'll match our campus challenge champions, the winners of our awards, with our missions in the field, so students have access to many of our partners who are on the frontlines of trying to help victims or help communities that are in high risk. We look forward to working with the next generation of American students to craft the next generation of solutions to this critical challenge.

And thank you for the chance to be here.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you so much, Raj. That's very exciting news. Let me now ask Deputy Director Sean Joyce of the FBI to share the FBI's update.

MR. JOYCE: Thank you, Madam Secretary. And thank you to the White House for hosting this event today. And I'd like to take this opportunity to thank all the people on the street that work this issue each and every day and many of the folks in this room in some of the chairs behind us that work tirelessly every day on some of the policy issues regarding this issue.

The FBI continues its commitment to fighting human trafficking and child exploitation in coordination with our federal, state, and local partners. Over the last year, we've increased our resources approximately 66 percent dedicated to this issue, especially against instances of coerced or forced adult labor, in addition to our agency placing a tremendous significance on ensuring child victims are safe, secure, and away from those who would prey on their innocence.

I can tell you I've been personally involved in rescuing some child victims, and as a father and a special agent, it is both emotional and rewarding, but devastating for the victims. The FBI recognizes these investigations require specialized resources, and thus we commit 80 victim specialists from our Office of Victim Assistance to our human trafficking efforts. To facilitate our fight against human trafficking and child exploitation, we participate in 77 task forces in 47 working groups across the country.

One highlight is our Innocent Lost National Initiative we started in 2003. This initiative addresses the tragic challenge of children recruited into prostitution. It is supported by the Department of Justice, Child Exploitation/Obscenity Section, and the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. To date, the initiative has resulted in 1,961 children being rescued. There have been nearly 1,500 investigations initiated, resulting in 927 convictions, to include seven life sentences and several ranging in length from 25 to 45 years.

Recognizing this is also an international problem. The FBI continues to build capacity through a number of training efforts, and in conjunction with our partners in the Department of State, we recently administered a two-week human trafficking course for law enforcement officials from El Salvador, Guatemala, Nicaragua, and Panama. The FBI looks forward to the continued collaboration with our law enforcement partners, both at home and abroad, to ensure that child exploitation and/or forced or coerced adult labor is met with swift justice.

Thank you, Madam Secretary, for this opportunity.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you very much, Deputy Director and Special Agent. That was a very stirring rendition of the great work you're doing, and I appreciate it.

Let me now turn to Assistant Secretary Russlynn Ali to share the Department of Education's update.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY ALI: Thank you, Madam Secretary, Ms. Jarrett, and to all of you for your commitment on this issue. Secretary Duncan shares in that commitment and this sense of urgency.

Over the past year, we have set about using all of the tools within our disposal to really launch an awareness through -- prevention through awareness efforts in our schools, through technical assistance and supports and training for educators that need it so that they can spot the warning signals. We know that these signals, whether they be absenteeism or signs of abuse or behavioral problems, they prevent children from learning. They not only affect the victim and those at prey of traffickers but the entire school community. And schools have a responsibility and need help and support.

So it is about identifying where those problem areas exist, working with so many of you to target our solutions and our efforts, to answer the calls of educators and school districts around the country that are dealing with these problems in ways that they have never before, helping them with language and talking to school-age children about very difficult and grown-up issues. And how they do that with sincerity and the education they need to help their children be safe is something that is hugely important as well.

We are also doing the kind of technical assistance through web-based tools on what services are available, what supports are available. We've brought together, just last summer, over 2,000 educators to deal with issues of climate and safety in their schools writ large and highlighted and focused on issues of trafficking and ways to help. Finding those places that are also doing great things to eradicate trafficking where in exist -- a school district in San Diego, for example, Grossmont Union High School, we've worked with them to create a training video, which we will disseminate to all school districts that need it as we find those places that are eradicating this and work to take their lessons to scale.

We've also worked closely with the Office of Violence Against Women, our colleagues at the Department of Justice, and elsewhere to ensure that we bring best practices to bear and outreach with as many groups as possible and interested on this issue. In the future, we will continue to work with our sister agencies in finding the places that need the help most, understanding the data better, learning about those solutions and bringing them to scale.

We look forward to sharing those tools, like the Slavery Footprint, to working with Raj and others on things like the campus challenge while we do climate checks and climate schools in our schools, making sure that we hear from students themselves on both problems and solutions, and working with our colleagues and our school resource officers and our colleagues in the Department of Homeland Security on training for law enforcement officers on how they, too, can help change the school environment. We will use all of the tools in our disposal to help you and help our schools deal with this tragic problem. Thank you.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you very much. And now let me invite our final speaker, U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission Chair Jacqueline Berrien.

MS. BERRIEN: Thank you so much to President Obama for his leadership and commitment to end human trafficking, and thank you, Secretary Clinton, for your leadership and the opportunity to participate in this very important discussion.

On behalf of the United States Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, I am privileged to report on the EEOC's work to identify and remedy the trafficking of workers. EEOC staff across the country work diligently to protect one of the most fundamental human and civil rights -- the right to work without being harassed, intimidated, or mistreated on account of race, color, religion, national origin, sex, age, or disability. The EEOC plays an important role in helping to make victims of trafficking whole. We seek and obtain civil remedies, such as back pay and monetary relief, for the harm caused by employment discrimination as well as punitive damages and equitable relief to deter and prevent future discriminatory conduct.

Since the last meeting of this task force, EEOC has worked with enforcement partners at the federal, state, and local levels to improve outreach to vulnerable populations, including victims of trafficking. For example, we trained representatives from state and local fair employment practice agencies to identify and remedy trafficking. EEOC also certified new visas last year to ensure that victims of sex harassment and other discriminatory treatment at work could participate fully in related law enforcement efforts without fear of deportation.

Building on the successful resolution of anti-trafficking cases against J.J. Pickle and Trans Bay Steel, the EEOC is challenging discriminatory working conditions and terms of employment in two recently filed cases. In one case, the EEOC alleges that more than 200 Thai men were subjected to a pattern or practice of national origin and race discrimination, harassment, abuse, and retaliation on farms in Hawaii and Washington. The second case alleges that hundreds of Indian employees were recruited to work as welders, pipe fitters, and ship fitters in Mississippi and Texas, but after arriving in the United States as guest workers, they were subjected to abuse based on their national origin and race and encountered other forms of discriminatory treatment, including segregated and substandard housing. Both of these cases are pending now, and we're seeking not only relief for the affected workers, but also injunctive relief to prevent future occurrences.

Last January, the commission conducted a public meeting on human trafficking, and with the insights provided by Ambassador CdeBaca and other witnesses, we have redoubled our efforts to identify and remedy trafficking. In the past year, my colleague, Commissioner Stuart Ishimaru, launched the EEOC's immigrant worker team to improve the commission's outreach to immigrant workers, strengthen enforcement of laws prohibiting national origin discrimination, and increased collaboration with other agencies addressing human trafficking and related issues affecting immigrant workers. The immigrant worker team of the EEOC will continue to address these issues in 2012.

Once again, thank you for convening us, Madam Secretary. My EEOC colleagues and I look forward to continuing to work with all of the members of this task force towards the goal of ending the scourge of human trafficking.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you so much. And again, thanks to everyone, not just for being here today for this meeting, but for the work that everyone has done since our last meeting. I think it does help to focus our attention that we do have an annual meeting where we come together and share the results of our efforts. I think it's especially meaningful to be meeting here in the White House, because, after all, this is a national priority, it's a priority of the President's, and we do have to do more to reach out to have partnerships with the private sector, with NGOs, state governments, local governments, and the like.

So again, Valerie, thank you for hosting us, and we appreciate the emphasis that the White House has put on this program.

MS. JARRETT: Thank you. Thank you all for being here.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you.

LOAD-DATE: March 16, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

JOURNAL-CODE: M2PW

Copyright 2012 Normans Media Limited
All Rights Reserved

178 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

Federal News Service

March 15, 2012 Thursday

Remarks by Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton at the Annual Meeting of the President's Interagency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons Moderator: Valerie Jarrett, Senior Adviser to the President Location: The White House, Washington, D.C. Time: 10:34 a.m. EDT Date: Thursday, March 15, 2012

SECTION: STATE DEPARTMENT BRIEFING

LENGTH: 1279 words

Remarks by Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton at the Annual Meeting of the President's Interagency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons Moderator: Valerie Jarrett, Senior Adviser to the President Location: The White House, Washington, D.C. Time: 10:34 a.m. EDT Date: Thursday, March 15, 2012

VALERIE JARRETT: So with that, I'll turn it over to Secretary Clinton. Thank you.

SECRETARY HILLARY CLINTON: Well, thank you very much, Valerie, and thank you for hosting us here at the White House. This annual event is a good opportunity to hear about the progress that our government is making to combat modern slavery and to talk about our goals going forward. And so I very much appreciate the president's commitment to this work and the collaboration that has been accomplished throughout the United States government.

So with that, I'm delighted to call this meeting to order. I want to thank Ambassador CdeBaca and his staff, not only for the work they put into staffing the task force but for the zeal with which they lead this fight around the world. Of course if this issue doesn't demand zealous advocacy, it's hard to figure out what does.

This September marks the 150th anniversary of the preliminary Emancipation Proclamation, and it's a good time for us to recommit ourselves not only to the promise of freedom but to the work against/ending modern slavery.

Around the world, as many as 27 million men, women and children toil in bondage. This crime undermines economies and the rule of law. It shatters families and communities. It is an affront to our most fundamental values.

This issue is very near and dear to my heart, since the time I was first lady and we began a full -- a full-hearted effort by our government, both the executive branch and Congress, to address this issue. And I've had the experience of meeting with survivors here at home and around the world. I've seen firsthand what a horrible toll this takes. And so I'm delighted that we have such a dedicated group of members.

This is a priority in the Obama administration, starting with the president, as Valerie said.

And the first time we convened the task force under this administration, we laid out a set of commitments, a call to action. And in answering that call, we've tried to elevate the fight against trafficking to the highest levels of policymaking. This goes hand in hand -- this is not an individual, one-off effort; this goes hand in hand with other work that we've been doing on behalf of women and girls and other marginalized people.

The White House recently issued a National Action Plan on Women, Peace and Security to ensure that women are full partners and participants in our efforts to reduce conflict and promote peace and prosperity around the world, because after all, modern slavery disproportionately affects women and girls. And as it does so, it disrupts family networks and it undermines the foundation of stable economies and societies. So the Action Plan on Women, Peace and Security contains specific steps to prevent human trafficking of women and children as a result of conflict and to provide assistance to victims.

The State Department has made the struggle against modern slavery an important part of our diplomatic engagement. Our annual Trafficking in Persons Report is the most comprehensive assessment of how well governments are doing to address this crime. The TIP office's foreign assistance grants are making a difference in 37 countries, supporting programs that provide crucial assistance to survivors and help the governments build their capacity to fight this crime. And thanks to our leadership, the international community is getting behind the effort. Nearly 140 countries have now enacted modern anti-trafficking laws, and nearly 150 are party to the U.N. Trafficking in Persons Protocol.

And we've taken action here at home.

For instance, we learned that survivors were being made to pay taxes on restitution payments from their abusers. And -- well, some of the people in this room, as well as colleagues from the Treasury Department, who are not with us today, saw the problem and said, you know, this isn't right, we're going to do something about it. So now the Treasury department has made clear that victims are not liable to pay taxes on the wages of slavery.

Another example: We thought it was unfair for diplomats who victimized their own domestic workers -- were, because of diplomatic immunity, virtually untouchable. So now we're making sure that diplomats coming to this country understand their obligations and responsibilities, and we're taking action when we have evidence that they are not.

We're trying to ensure that resources and support are available to victims wherever we find them. And one of those resources is the Department of Health and Human Services National Human Trafficking Resource Center. Its operations have been expanded. It now fields an unprecedented number of calls, and it is really making a difference in reaching out to survivors and helping us prosecute abusers.

Other agencies, led by the Department of Homeland Security, recently held a public listening session to hear from stakeholders about new ideas for victim services, federal government engagement with local communities, outreach to at-risk groups, and NGO private sector initiatives.

Now, we've also tried to streamline how we approach cases, and instead of a muddle of agencies claiming or rejecting different responsibilities, thanks to the Departments of Justice, Labor and Homeland Security, we have in place in the Obama administration efficient, coordinated anti-trafficking teams. And they're making investigations more effective and helping victims.

To help gauge our responses, I've included a tier ranking for the United States in the annual Trafficking in Persons Report. I thought it was important, if we were going to be judging other countries, we judged ourselves.

And so we hold ourselves to the same standards we apply to others.

It's not only the fair thing to do. It's turned out also to be the smart thing as well. Because including us in the report made it more credible and effective as a diplomatic tool. It shows we're all in this fight together, that we have a problem which we are continuing to address.

And it's not just a document that names and shames, but instead it serves as a guide to what practices are working and, more importantly, what every government including our own needs to do better, and I greatly appreciate everyone's efforts on this. This latest publication from the president's interagency task force, "Progress in Combatting Trafficking in Persons," really summarizes a lot of the progress we've made in the Obama administration over the last three-plus years.

Finally we know that the future of this struggle will depend on innovative solutions. So we are partnering with thinkers whose bold ideas are already helping to make a difference. We now have online tools, like the Slavery Footprint, so that people can understand the ways in which this crime affects them. It doesn't just happen to somebody far away, but it does have ripples of criminality that come across the globe. We have new ways of looking at supply chains and policies. So that can help us cut off the demand that traffickers truly exploit. That's particularly important when you think about the buying power of the federal government.

So I think that we meet at a time when we have a lot to be grateful for, in terms of the enhanced efforts that we've made, the results that we're getting, but I think this task force is really focused on the challenge and the way ahead.

LOAD-DATE: March 16, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2012 Federal News Service, Inc.
All Rights Reserved

179 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
Federal News ServiceMarch 15, 2012 Thursday

Annual Meeting of the President's Interagency Task Force To Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons (As Released by the State Department) Speakers: Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton; Ambassador-at-Large Luis CdeBaca; Attorney General Eric Holder; Labor Secretary Hilda Solis; Secretary of Health and Human Services Kathleen Sebelius; Secretary of Homeland Security Janet Napolitano; Domestic Policy Council Director Cecilia Munoz; Deputy National Security Advisor Denis McDonough; Lieutenant General James Clapper; Acting Director Jeffrey Zients, Office of Management and Budget; Deputy Secretary of State Ashton Carter; Deputy Transportation Secretary John Porcari; Undersecretary of State Maria Otero, Civilian Security, Democracy, and Human Rights; USAID Administrator Rajiv Shah; FBI Deputy Director Sean Joyce; Assistant Secretary of Education Russlynn Ali; U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission Chair Jacqueline Berrien Moderator: Valerie Jarrett, Senior White House Adviser Location: Eisenhower Executive Office Building, Washington, D.C. Date: Thursday, March 15, 2012

SECTION: STATE DEPARTMENT BRIEFING

LENGTH: 11950 words

Annual Meeting of the President's Interagency Task Force To Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons (As Released by the State Department) Speakers: Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton; Ambassador-at-Large Luis CdeBaca; Attorney General Eric Holder; Labor Secretary Hilda Solis; Secretary of Health and Human Services Kathleen Sebelius; Secretary of Homeland Security Janet Napolitano; Domestic Policy Council Director Cecilia Munoz; Deputy National Security Advisor Denis McDonough; Lieutenant General James Clapper; Acting Director Jeffrey Zients, Office of Management and Budget; Deputy Secretary of State Ashton Carter; Deputy Transportation Secretary John Porcari; Undersecretary of State Maria Otero, Civilian Security, Democracy, and Human Rights; USAID Administrator Rajiv Shah; FBI Deputy Director Sean Joyce; Assistant Secretary of Education Russlynn Ali; U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission Chair Jacqueline Berrien Moderator: Valerie Jarrett, Senior White House Adviser Location: Eisenhower Executive Office Building, Washington, D.C. Date: Thursday, March 15, 2012

VALERIE JARRETT: Thank you. Welcome. Good morning, everyone. We want to welcome you to the White House for our annual President's Task Force to Combat and Monitor Trafficking of Persons. We're delighted to have it here hosted at the White House. It's indicative of the President's commitment to this issue, and we want to thank all of the members of the agencies who have joined us this morning for this meeting.

In 2008, the President spoke at Pastor Rick Warren's Saddleback Church, and he called human trafficking the modern-day enslavement of men, women, and children for sex or labor, and he referred to it as a debasement of our common humanity, which I think sums it up perfectly. As chair of the White House Council on Women and Girls, this issue is of particular importance to me as a leader but also to our council, which is represented by all of the agencies in the federal government as well. And it's why we're pleased to have you all here today.

We are confident with the Administration working together, with civil society, with not-for-profits, with the private sector, we can actually tackle this issue head on and conquer it. And we're delighted to have here Secretary Clinton, who has chaired this task force, and I'll turn it over to her in a second. But I wanted to, by way of introduction, mention that yesterday we were at the State Department for a luncheon with Prime Minister Cameron, and he said about Secretary Clinton that she has been a strong advocate who is committed to the emancipation and empowerment of women. And I thought that that was a perfect way to describe one of her many roles and one that is particularly germane to the topic of this morning.

So with that, again I want to welcome everyone here and tell you how committed the President is to making sure that we are all collaborating and sharing information together and intending to conquer this issue head on. So with that, I'll turn it over to Secretary Clinton. Thank you.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you. Well, thank you very much Valerie. And thank you for hosting us here at the White House. This annual event is a good opportunity to hear about the progress that our government is making to combat modern slavery and to talk about our goals going forward. And so I very much appreciate the President's commitment to this work and the collaboration that has been accomplished throughout the United States Government. So with that, I'm delighted to call this meeting to order.

I want to thank Ambassador CdeBaca and his staff not only for the work they put into staffing the task force, but for the zeal with which they lead this fight around the world. Of course, if this issue doesn't demand zealous advocacy, it's hard to figure out what does.

This September marks the 150th anniversary of the Preliminary Emancipation Proclamation. And it's a good time for us to recommit ourselves, not only to the promise of freedom, but to the work against ending modern slavery.

Around the world, as many as 27 million men, women, and children toil in bondage. This crime undermines economies and the rule of law. It shatters families and communities. It is an affront to our most fundamental values.

This issue is very near and dear to my heart, since the time I was first lady. And we began a full-hearted effort by our government -- both the executive branch and Congress -- to address this issue. And I've had the experience of meeting with survivors here at home and around the world. I've seen firsthand what a horrible toll this takes, and so I'm delighted that we have such a dedicated group of members.

This is a priority in the Obama Administration, starting with the President, as Valerie said. And the first time we convened the task force under this Administration, we laid out a set of commitments -- a call to action. And in answering that call, we've tried to elevate the fight against trafficking to the highest levels of policymaking.

This goes hand in hand. This is not an individual, one-off effort. This goes hand in hand with other work that we've been doing on behalf of women and girls and other marginalized people. The White House recently issued a National Action Plan on Women, Peace, and Security to ensure that women are full partners and participants in our efforts to reduce conflict and promote peace and prosperity around the world, because after all, modern slavery disproportionately affects women and girls. And as it does so, it disrupts family networks, and it undermines the foundation of stable economies and societies. So the Action Plan on Women, Peace, and Security contains specific steps to prevent human trafficking of women and children as a result of conflict and to provide assistance to victims.

The State Department has made the struggle against modern slavery an important part of our diplomatic engagement. Our annual Trafficking in Persons Report is the most comprehensive assessment of how well governments are doing to address this crime. The TIP Office's foreign assistance grants are making a difference in 37 countries, supporting programs that provide crucial assistance to survivors and help governments build their capacity to fight this crime. And thanks to our leadership, the international community is getting behind the effort. Nearly 140 countries have enacted modern anti-trafficking laws, and nearly 150 are party to the UN Trafficking in Persons Protocol.

And we've taken action here at home. For instance, we learned that survivors were being made to pay taxes on restitution payments from their abusers. And, well, some of the people in this room as well as colleagues from the Treasury Department who are not with us today saw the problem and said, "This isn't right; we're going to do something about it." So now the Treasury Department has made clear that victims are not liable to pay taxes on the wages of slavery.

Another example: We thought it was unfair for diplomats who victimized their own domestic workers were, because of diplomatic immunity, virtually untouchable.

So now, we're making sure that diplomats coming to this country understand their obligations and responsibilities, and we're taking action when we have evidence that they are not.

We're trying to ensure that resources and support are available to victims wherever we find them, and one of those resources is the Department of Health and Human Services National Human Trafficking Resource Center. Its operations have been expanded. It now fields an unprecedented number of calls. And it is really making a difference in reaching out to survivors and helping us prosecute abusers.

Other agencies led by the Department of Homeland Security recently held a public listening session to hear from stakeholders about new ideas for victim services, federal government engagement with local communities, outreach to at-risk groups, and NGO private sector initiatives. Now, we've also tried to streamline how we approach cases. And instead of a muddle of agencies claiming or rejecting different responsibilities, thanks to the Departments of Justice, Labor, and Homeland Security, we have in place in the Obama Administration efficient, coordinated, anti-trafficking teams, and they're making investigations and prosecutions more effective and helping victims.

To help gauge our responses, I've included a tier ranking for the United States in the annual Trafficking In Persons Report. I thought it was important, if we were going to be judging other countries, we judged ourselves. And so we hold ourselves to the same standards we apply to others. It's not only the fair thing to do; it's turned out also to be the smart thing as well, because including us in the report made it more credible and effective as a diplomatic tool. It shows we're all in this fight together, that we have a problem, which we are continuing to address, and it's not just a document that names and shames, but instead it serves as a guide to what practices are working, and more importantly, what every government, including our own, needs to do better, and I greatly appreciate everyone's efforts on this. This latest publication from the President's Interagency Task Force Progress in Combating Trafficking in Persons really summarizes a lot of the progress we've made in the Obama Administration over the last three-plus years.

Finally, we know that the future of this struggle will depend on innovative solutions, so we are partnering with thinkers whose bold ideas are already helping to make a difference. We now have online tools like the Slavery Footprint so that people can understand the ways in which this crime affects them. It doesn't just happen to somebody far away, but it does have ripples of criminality that come across the globe.

We have new ways of looking at supply chains and policies, so that can help us cut off the demand that traffickers cruelly exploit. That's particularly important when you think about the buying power of the federal government. So I think that we meet at a time when we have a lot to be grateful for in terms of the enhanced efforts that we've made, the results that we're getting, but I think this task force is really focused on the challenge and the way ahead.

So let me now turn to Ambassador CdeBaca, who will say a few words about why we consider this such a high priority in our government.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you, Madam Secretary. It's this Administration's priority to give voice to the survivors of modern slavery whether in court or in our foreign policy, but those voices have been calling for justice for more than 150 years. A letter from the National Archives recently surfaced, a letter written in September of 1864 by Spotswood Rice to Katherine Diggs, his former master. He wrote from the lines of the Union Army as he and his new comrades marched back to Missouri, back towards the plantation where he had been held. Among those still enslaved was his daughter, Mary. His strength and righteous anger rings out through the years. And I quote:

"I want you to understand that mary is my Child and she is a God given rite of my own. And you may hold on to hear as long as you can, but I want you to remember this one thing -- the longor you keep my Child from me, the longor you will have to burn -- and the qwicer youll get their --

"I want you now to just hold on to hear if you want to iff your conchosome tells thats the road go that road and what it will brig you to kittey diggs I have no fears about geting mary out of your hands the whole Government gives chear to me and you cannot help your self."

We know from the oral histories that once freed, that little girl lived a long and prosperous life. And in 1937, an aged Mary told a WPA historian: "I love army men. My father, brother, husband, and son were all army men. I love a man who fights for his rights and any person who wants to be someone."

Slavery and the ways that we fight it have changed so much since Spotswood Rice and those other survivors marched with that terrible, swift sword. But as you said last year, Madam Secretary, when we take up this burden at home and abroad, we do it because fighting slavery is part of our national identity. It's who we are.

Together, we can and we must rise to meet Spotswood Rice's challenge to go back for everyone's daughters and sons who remain in servitude. Together, we can give cheer to those who answer the call and march with today's survivors on their road to freedom.

SEC. CLINTON: Thank you so much, Lou. And one of the things that Lou has done over his professional life of commitment to this issue is to continually link it to larger struggles for human freedom, including our own.

I want to turn now to the Attorney General, because the Attorney General and the Justice Department have been great partners in our efforts to combat this scourge. And I want to thank Attorney General Holder.

ATTORNEY GENERAL HOLDER: Well, thank you, Secretary Clinton. And also let me start by thanking President Obama for hosting us and for his extraordinary leadership in this global fight against human trafficking, and also thanks to my good friend Valerie Jarrett for bringing us together today and for her attention to this issue.

It's really an honor for me to join with my colleagues and partners to discuss the progress that we have made over the past year, but also to identify ways in which we can continue the momentum that we have built up over the past year and make sure that all that we have pledged to do in this Administration actually does occur.

One of the things I would point out is that one of the four priorities that I've identified for the Justice Department is that we protect the most vulnerable among us. And this fits right into one of those four core priorities for the United States Department of Justice. For Justice, our commitment to preventing human trafficking, bringing traffickers to justice, and assisting victims has really never been stronger, and our approach, I don't think, has ever been more effective. Our work has sent a clear and critical message that in this country and under this Administration, human trafficking crimes will simply not be tolerated.

I'm proud to report that in the past year we charged a record number of people with human trafficking offenses, and over the last three years we have achieved significant increases in human trafficking prosecutions, including the rise of more than 30 percent in the number of forced labor and adult sex trafficking prosecutions.

Now, this work is really more than statistics. It has saved lives. It has ensured freedom. It has restored dignity to women, to men, to children, in virtually every corner of this country. We have liberated scores of victims. We have secured long prison sentences against individual traffickers. But we've also dismantled really large transnational organized crime enterprises. As many of you will recall, last February the Justice Department launched a human trafficking enhanced enforcement initiative in order to take our counter-trafficking enforcement levels -- efforts to a new level.

Now, as part of this commitment, I announced the Anti-Trafficking Coordination Team, or ACT Team, initiative that's an interagency collaboration among the Departments of Justice, Homeland Security, and Labor, aimed at streamlining federal criminal investigations and prosecutions of human trafficking offenses. And following a very rigorous and competitive interagency selection process, we launched six Phase One Pilot ACT Teams around the country. And they are located in Atlanta, El Paso, Kansas City, Los Angeles, Memphis, and Miami, and today these teams are fully operational. And by bringing federal investigative agencies and federal prosecutors together, they are allowing us to develop and to advance high-impact human trafficking prosecutions.

And let me just share some examples with you. Over the last year we have dismantled a large transnational organized crime enterprise that held Ukrainian victims in forced labor in Philadelphia. We have brought freedom and dignity to undocumented Central American women and convicted the traffickers who, with threats of violence and abuse, compelled them into forced labor and prostitution in restaurants and bars on Long Island in New York. We have restored freedom to undocumented Eastern European women and convicted the traffickers who brutally exploited them in massage parlors in Chicago and even branded them with tattoos to claim them as their own property. We have secured a life sentence against a gang member in the Eastern District of Virginia, just across the river here, for sex trafficking of victims as young as 12 years old.

By providing grant funding to our state and local law enforcement partners and to victims service organizations really across the country, the Justice Department is also supporting proactive efforts to stop traffickers and to help victims heal and to rebuild their lives.

And for the entire anti-trafficking community, we are continuing to provide training and technical assistance as well. And over the last year these efforts have included hosting three regional training forums that have focused on improving collaboration as well as the development of a training curriculum to help state prosecutors and state judges better understand human trafficking crimes. This is something that has to be done at the state and local level as well as at the federal level.

We're also taking steps to forge and strengthen partnerships across international borders, understanding that this is not simply an American problem. And we have seen that this effort is really essential. Over the last year, by working with our Mexican law enforcement partners, we have dismantled sex trafficking networks that operate on both sides of the U.S.-Mexico border and have brought freedom to victims and secured really landmark convictions and substantial sentences against the traffickers in these high-impact bilateral cases. We've had good cooperation with our Mexican counterparts.

So I think we can all be encouraged by our recent achievements in the fight against human trafficking, but I think we would all agree that we have still more to do and that far too many people remain in desperate need for the help that we can provide. And that's why I think that our joint efforts and our outstanding efforts really must continue. I am committed to this. The Justice Department is committed to this. This group that meets today is obviously committed to this. This Administration has identified this as a priority.

So I look forward to our discussions as to where we will go from here and how we can keep working in partnership to increase the impact of these very critical efforts. Thank you.

SEC. CLINTON: Thank you very much, Attorney General. Now I'd like to invite Secretary Hilda Solis to share the Labor Department's update. And I want to thank Hilda for making this a high priority within the Labor Department.

SECRETARY SOLIS: Thank you very much, Madam Secretary, and also to our colleagues. I want to also congratulate President Obama and Valerie Jarrett for having this meeting convened here. This is a topic that obviously is very controversial and one that some of us in this room we know take very seriously and, of course, feel that we need to do as much as we can to make sure that every effort, especially at the Department of Labor, is focused in on combating this terrible error that occurs not just in our shores but also abroad.

I want to applaud President Obama. He's been very clear in his vision for an America built to last, one where everyone has a fair shot at success and where everyone plays by the same rules. Our actions to end the exploitation of workers are critical to achieving that vision. That's why the Department of Labor is here.

The Department of Labor's efforts to combat human trafficking have been broad and varied and can be broken down into two -- three main categories. The first is detection and law enforcement. Our investigators are on the front lines of trafficking, identifying potential cases and providing critical support such as translation services during investigations.

We've revamped the integrity and enforcement actions of our guest worker program to ensure a fair process for employers who use temporary foreign workers and to enforce protections for all of our workers. We've now announced new protocols to begin certifying new visas. That's allowed us to help immigrant victims of trafficking assist in investigation of those crimes.

The second category involves transnational engagement and research. We've signed currently declarations with Mexico, Guatemala, Nicaragua, El Salvador, Costa Rica, and DR to ensure that foreign workers, often the most vulnerable, are informed of their labor rights here in the U.S. This is very important as well because, in many cases, folks come here thinking that there are no serious protections available to them, there is no one that's going to listen to them, so it's a course of trying to reeducate people over and over again that there are different laws here, and there is a responsibility and accountability process.

The funding that we have included in these programs includes technical assistance projects and research that we're doing across the board on child and forced labor across the globe. And since 1995, the Department of Labor has been funding projects to combat the worst forms of child labor. And as a result, hundreds of thousands of children have been prevented from being trafficked.

The third and final category in our efforts to combat trafficking victims is services -- services that must be provided, a full restitution for the labor that they have performed. So we are very excited to be working with our friends in Department of Justice and our other sister agencies on these issues. Alongside our agency partners, we've been proud to assist these victims by computing the back wages that they are rightfully owed. So that's a big message, I think, to the overall community that it's time to speak up and not be afraid to speak out.

Another critical part of helping trafficking victims is to make sure that they have the support they need to get back on their feet, so we're proud to offer employment and training services to victims of severe forms of trafficking through our network of one-stop career centers so they can enter and get information and, hopefully, get on their feet again. And of course, we're aiming to support workers.

We're also aiming to support employers in helping us combat trafficking, so that's another big part of our effort. Our enforcement officers are working both to ensure a level playing field of law-abiding businesses, because we don't agree that unscrupulous businesses should get away with this crime, and to protect the rights of workers to deter unscrupulous employers that continue to exploit workers.

Looking ahead, we continue to remain committed to further these efforts. Soon, we'll be providing awareness training to our national field staff so that even more prepared individuals will know about this issue. We'll also be announcing a new joint declaration with the following -- the Philippines, Ecuador, and Peru -- to make sure that their vulnerable workers here in our country know of their rights and protections available.

Additionally, we'll do more to engage with our stakeholders in this critical issue by hosting listening sessions, roundtables, and making sure that our fact sheets and reports are also equally translated in those various languages that are much needed as well.

Finally, I look forward to partnering with all of you in fulfilling the Promise campaign, which is critical to our collective action on the issue.

I want to thank everyone. I'm incredibly proud of the work that all of you and all of us have been able to accomplish under your leadership in this Administration. Thank you.

SEC. CLINTON: Thank you so much, Hilda, and let me now turn to Secretary Sebelius. Obviously the Department of Health and Human Services is an absolutely essential partner in everything we do.

Kathleen.

SECRETARY SEBELIUS: Well, thank you, Secretary, for your leadership on this task force. And Valerie, I hope that you convey to the President how important we all think it is that he has provided the kind of vision and leadership that brings us all here today, because this collaborative effort is incredibly important.

On this issue, the Department of Health and Human Services is motivated by the collaboration across federal agencies to raise public awareness and make the most of our resources. And we're especially motivated to continue the important role in reaching and helping human trafficking victims every day. So over the past year, we have really deployed a lot of assets to our regional offices, 10 of them around the country, who have expanded their efforts to develop staff capacity through multiple trainings and meetings to monitor and combat human trafficking. We substantially expanded our outreach efforts through the Rescue and Restore Victims of Human Trafficking campaign, which includes now an online posting of the Look Beneath the Surface training video that is both available in English and Spanish.

During the last fiscal year, we built on our anti-trafficking efforts by providing services and resources on human trafficking through the Runaway and Homeless Youth Training and Technical Assistance Center. Going forward, the President's Fiscal Year 2013 budget includes a new $5 million proposal to award competitive grants focused on reducing the exploitation of children in the form of domestic sex trafficking. HHS also, as Secretary Clinton has referred, funds the National Human Trafficking Resource Center, which is a nationwide resource for potential victims and the public who may encounter a trafficking situation.

We maintain a national toll-free hotline that operates 24 hours a day, seven days a week, every day of the year. And last year, the hotline received over 16,000 calls, a 43 percent increase in the last fiscal year, which I think is both an indication of the depth of the problem, but also an indication that people now are aware that there's someplace to go for help. Of this total, we have close to 800 cases resulting in direct report to law enforcement, which is a 51 percent increase, so that connecting the hotline with actual action on the ground, thanks to our partners in the Department of Justice, has been a really important initiative.

Through a recently established interdepartmental working group, HHS and other agencies are discussing better coordination of the federal anti-trafficking efforts when dealing with victims and attendant services training and technical assistance. And as a group, we've identified the need for two types of call lines -- a central hotline for calls regarding victims and investigative tip lines. We've also agreed to explore additional opportunities to appropriately highlight and differentiate between the resource center and the investigation hotlines.

So I feel confident that our efforts at HHS, hand in hand with our federal partners here at the table, continue to move us closer to our ultimate goal of freedom for all by bringing an end to this inexcusable human rights abuse.

And again, thank you, Madam Secretary, for convening this critical meeting, for the report that you're doing, and we look forward to continuing this critical work together.

SEC. CLINTON: Thank you very much, Kathleen.

Now let me turn to the Department of Homeland Security's update. Certainly, DHS personnel are on the front lines not only here at home but literally around the world, and we greatly appreciate Secretary Napolitano's leadership.

SECRETARY NAPOLITANO: And thank you, Secretary Clinton. I also appreciate the leadership you've shown on this issue and the leadership of the President. It's a social issue, it's an economic issue, it's a law enforcement issue, it's a moral issue, and I think that joins us all around the table. We have also been working through partnerships of various types under an umbrella we call the Blue Campaign at DHS. It is leading directly to more tips, more investigations, improved services for victims, and I think will help us serve our ultimate goal of finally getting some deterrence to this issue.

We have partnered with the Department of State to develop two online trainings, one for the federal acquisition workforce. Our contractors have a zero-tolerance clause built into every federal contract, so we're now training them and also training for the general public. CBP has worked with the Department of Transportation to launch something called the Blue Lightning Initiative, teaching airline employees the signs of trafficking and how to notify law enforcement. We're working with the firefighter and EMS communities to create training for first responders who may come into contact with victims, and we are in the process of putting the finishing touches on a one-week interdisciplinary training course at the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center, FLETC, which will bring together teams representing victim services, investigations, prosecutions, a first of its kind type of training in this area. And we expect it to be available no later than this summer.

We've worked to increase public awareness of human trafficking through targeted video messages and public service announcements, including CBP's No Te Enganes campaign, Don't Be Fooled, and ICE's Hidden in Plain Sight campaign, which reached an estimated 5 million people.

We've worked to address and recognize the needs and unique challenges of trafficking victims. We have now put 39 specially trained human trafficking experts in each of our ICE field offices, and we've doubled the number of forensic interview specialists. CIS has developed a one-pager for law enforcement on options for victims, including the T and the U visa programs.

The efforts are succeeding. We are finding more investigations with a nexus to human trafficking. Last year, we initiated 722, we obtained 271 convictions. Eric, working with your folks, seized assets worth well over $2 million. We also have seen a steady increase in the number of reports to the tip line, up 69 percent between FY2010 and 2011, and I think looking at the '12 numbers, there will be another record, unfortunately, in a way.

This year, we plan to do even more. We are requiring all of our contracting professionals to take training on combating trafficking in persons, and we have already trained 600 acquisition personnel on how to use that clause in the standard federal contract. We're working to assure that age-appropriate care and services are provided to unaccompanied minor children encountered by us typically through the immigration system. We had a roundtable discussion here at the White House with retail, hotel, and airline industry leaders, and also with state, local, tribal, and territorial law enforcement agencies and associations discussing ways we could work together to raise awareness. We are continuing to deploy ideas from those sessions.

And we are expanding the reach and scope of our free, interactive computer-based training system for local law enforcement partners. We work extensively with Justice, with Labor on the ACT teams that the Attorney General referenced, because those teams, I think, hold great promise in actually dealing with this problem. So we will continue to listen, we will continue to work, and like everyone else around the table, we intend to, if anything, increase our commitment. Thank you.

SEC. CLINTON: Great. Thank you very much, Janet. Now let me turn to Cecilia Munoz, the assistant to the President and Domestic Policy Council Director.

Cecilia.

MS. MUNOZ: Thank you very much, Madam Secretary. It's a real honor to be part of this gathering today. This is obviously incredibly important work and it falls to me to talk a little bit about the work of the Domestic Policy Council on the domestic side of this issue.

As everyone in this room knows, two years ago, the President forcefully articulated his personal commitment to fighting modern slavery and human trafficking, described it as a shared responsibility. And as we're hearing today, the -- since the President made that commitment two years ago, we've been making progress through investigations and prosecutions, the victims assistance programs, we've been hearing about technical assistance for states and localities. I mean, it's a good list and it's a long list, but it doesn't involve only the work of government. The conscience of the country was really awakened by the President's remarks.

And we have churches, we have businesses and communities across the country heeding the President's call to action, finding ways to combat trafficking, and to serve those who have been victimized by it.

The Domestic Policy Council has partnered with many of you in this important work, and the President has really reiterated just this morning in a statement his commitment to these issues. He's instructed his Cabinet, all of us, to find ways to strengthen the good work that we're already doing, and to expand our partnerships with civil society and the private sector so that we can bring more resources to bear on this terrible problem.

As the President announced in his statement, in the coming weeks, the White House will build on this gathering on behalf of human dignity. This is an issue that the President understands the way that your agencies do -- as a crime, as a violation of universal human rights -- and it's a policy priority on both the domestic and international fronts. We are committed to maximizing our efforts in every way possible, and we're confident that working together, we can -- collectively, we can strengthen the efforts of both the federal government and civil society in ending the scourge of modern slavery.

So our direction is clear. We intend to continue to work in partnership with all of you and your teams. The White House intends to redouble its efforts and build on this already strong record of accomplishment, and we're going to reach out to our partners outside of government in the hope that, together, we can really make an unprecedented push to raise awareness and have further real and sustained results. We don't have any illusions about this task being easy. If it -- this were an easy issue with simple solutions, we wouldn't need to be here having this gathering today. But we are persuaded that by working with each other effectively and working with our partners around the country and around the world, we can really bring positive change to this issue.

So we will be working with you to expand the resources, to leverage our efforts and our coordinated -- coordinating capacity. And so I look forward to working with all of you to do that. I look forward to playing a role in helping lift up the work that you're already doing and helping to coordinate it as strongly as possible. And we're convinced that with this partnership within government and partnerships outside of government, we can make an enormous difference on this issue, and we're honored to be part of it.

Thank you, Madam Secretary.

SEC. CLINTON: Thank you so much, Cecilia. Now I will turn to someone I work with practically every day on a wide variety of security issues around the world, and I'm delighted that he would be here for this meeting.

So, Assistant to the President, Deputy National Security Advisor Denis McDonough.

MR. MCDONOUGH: Madam Secretary, thank you very much, and allow me to join Cecilia in thanking all of your teams who we get to work with every day on this matter. Let me just take a minute too to highlight our team -- Rob Berschinski, Quintan Wiktorowicz, and most especially, Samantha Power, who, on behalf of the National Security staff, have really made this a priority and have been working with your teams to push this through.

Human trafficking is just one of those topics that doesn't make it in the paper every day. But I think what we see in this year's report and in each of the reports that are coming from the agencies now is that the work that all the agencies are doing is actually having a very profound, life-changing impact on Americans and non-Americans, men, women, and children all around the world. So it's something about which I think we should feel quite good, recognizing, of course, as everybody said, that there's an awful lot of work to be done.

The fact is that the -- when the United States Government, when our people, are understood to be an international leader on this issue, it speaks to something at the heart of the President's National Security Strategy, which he put out in 2010 -

- one, that we're strengthened by the power of our example, and that we're strongest when we're working to advance the dignity of individuals all around the world. So for us at the National Security staff, this is a national security issue.

It is -- human trafficking is at the nexus of organized crimes, is a source for funding for international terrorist groups, is a source for funding for transnational criminal groups. It fundamentally endangers international security. And so while we're trying to create an international economy in which everyone can choose and be paid for for their work, it, by lifting this up, will strengthen our ability to be a leader in the global marketplace as well.

Now I know Ash, Raj, and Maria have not had a chance to brief out their results yet, so I'm not going to steal their thunder. But I do want to highlight a couple of things that I see from my position in terms of coordinating the interagency's work on this effort.

First, as I said above, when we lead by example, we're standing as a model for other governments in how we train our people, hold them to the highest ethical standards when it comes to trafficking, and makes it able for us to walk the walk as well as talk the talk. As Raj will no doubt highlight, USAID has been at the forefront of this effort through the standards it's applying to all its employees -- contractors, subcontractors, and grantees. We recognize that across the government, there's still an awful lot to do to improve on this in terms of procurement of goods and labor, and the President is demanding that we do more in exactly this area as the report pulls forward.

As Secretary Clinton said, being a model also means we're willing to place ourselves to the same level of scrutiny that we're applying to others, which is why he was so appreciative of the report including the United States on the list of countries that are graded in this and State's annual Trafficking in Persons Report this year.

Second, let me emphasize that when it comes to trafficking, one thing that we do know is that we don't know enough. In addition to what Cecilia has mentioned, in his statement today, the President spoke of trafficking as a form of exploitation that hides both in the dark corners of our world and in plain sight in our own towns and country -- towns and cities. We know in certain areas we don't have great data on the scope of the problem. And in terms of our programming, we may know what works and what doesn't, but we're still learning precise causal relationships. That's why the President's demanding that we keep the focus on learning and improving on our interventions.

Lastly, and perhaps most importantly, we would urge that on topics like our anti-trafficking work, we maintain laser-like focus on mainstreaming what we're doing in all our day-to-day operations. Whether in your internal strategy development or in policy papers you bring to the interagency coordination arena, if the majority of your staff are diplomats, are development experts, are service members, see efforts to counter trafficking as a silo, as a job of only people in the Trafficking Office, rather than as a core component of their job then we will not have lifted this up the way the President, Secretary, all of you are demanding that we do.

So I'll leave it at that. I'm looking forward to hearing more about the tremendous work that all of your teams have -- are underway. And obviously, as each have highlighted, I think we're here to be commended here -- on the work done heretofore. And just to echo Cecilia on the President's direction today, our team is looking forward to working with each of you and your teams on the months to come to build on all the good work that we already have in place.

So, Madam Secretary, thank you very much.

SEC. CLINTON: Thank you very much, Denis. We really appreciate that overview. Now let me turn to the director of National Intelligence, Lieutenant General Jim Clapper.

LIEUTENANT GENERAL CLAPPER: Thank you, Madam Secretary. And again, I join colleagues in praising you for -- commending you for your leadership, and it's an honor to be here. I thought I'd discuss very briefly the intelligence community's role in combating transnational organized crime, and in particular, the understanding and combating trafficking in persons. My priority in this job is to integrate collection analysis across the intelligence community in line with policy-maker needs.

Now after last year's meeting of this group, I rededicated some internal assets to stand up our own transnational organized crime team on my staff, and we never had -- in the history of the DNI, never had a single office for that sort of focus. And in line with the theme of leveraging across the government, we've become very engaged with the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Office, and are experiencing Lou's zeal. (Laughter.)

I've only been active for a short time, but we are seeing an increase, however modest -- and I anticipate this will gain momentum through our channels, and I just -- I think this is the beginning. We expect bigger results in the future as we continue to strengthen partnerships with key NI human trafficking advocates. And as others have eluded on this issue, partnerships are absolutely crucial to success.

And just to underline a point that Denis just made -- certainly we in the intelligence community recognize this --that trafficking in persons is a national security issue in addition to be a social, economic, and law enforcement issue. And so we're committed to doing our part to defeat it.

Our efforts across the intelligence community to integrate collection analysis and work with state, local, and tribal law enforcement will improve our ability to combat this appalling crime, and we can and must do more.

In October, my team attended the Trafficking in Persons Reporting Conference hosted by the State Department, Miami; made sure that different agencies within the intelligence community attended. This was the first time the IC has ever integrated with the State Department on this mission of ensuring that trafficking in persons reporting is accurate.

In November, our team hosted our own transnational organized crime event at my headquarters via video teleconference, and it was a global thing throughout the IC to many interested members of the intelligence community. And this was, I think, part of my responsibility to ensure awareness within the intelligence community. And a special presentation by the State Department's Trafficking in Persons team was the highlight -- had a huge impact, feedback I got.

We also coordinate extensively to have attendees who represent the nations we refer to as our Five Eyes allies. Those are the commonwealth countries with whom we have the closest, most intimate intelligence relationships. So I refer specifically to the UK's Serious Organized Crime Agency, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Australian Federal Police, and the New Zealand Customs agency. We're starting -- we're working towards the goal of a better understanding of the role that trafficking plays in persons in national instability, corruption, and crime around the globe. I think it's our job to shine a light on those dark corners.

So I'll just say that we are committed to this and we do recognize that it is a national security issue. Thank you, Madam Chairman.

SEC. CLINTON: Thanks so much, Jim. Now I'd like to invite Acting Director Zients to share OMB's update. Jeff?

MR. ZIENTS: Thank you. Now given the fiscal situation -- everybody knows that budgets are very tight, difficult budget environment; many agencies are experiencing actually lower budget. In this environment, it's OMB's job to make sure every dollar's well spent and importantly, that the most important priorities of the Administration, of the President, are well funded, and that we allocate dollars accordingly. Preventing human trafficking is a clear priority for the President and the Administration, so we are committed to working with each agency to make sure that we have the appropriate resources to fund these important efforts. I think we have good working relationships with each agency and your teams, but we will make sure that adequate resources are allocated to these efforts. We also stand ready to help -- in any way to help manage cross-agency processes to ensure that we continue to make significant progress. Thank you.

SEC. CLINTON: Thank you very much. We like hearing that. (Laughter.) I hope everybody really (inaudible.)

PARTICIPANT: It was the shortest --

SEC. CLINTON: Yeah. We should meet at the White House more often. (Laughter.) Now let me turn to Deputy Secretary Ash Carter to give the Department of Defense's update.

DEPUTY SECRETARY CARTER: Thank you, Secretary Clinton. The President's determination to combat trafficking is reflected in each of the three ways that we, the Department of Defense, touch this problem. Namely, through our own people, uniformed and civilian and their conduct. Second, through our contractors. And the third, in our foreign military training programs. So let me just take each of those in turn.

First of all, for our own folks, both uniformed and civilian, they are required to receive training. I've reviewed the curriculum. It's very good, it's incisive. It basically has two parts: Don't do it and learn to recognize it. So let me take the don't do it part first.

The don't do it part -- you may not know this, I was a little surprised myself, but it has only been recently that patronizing a prostitute became an offense under the Uniform Code of Military Justice. It is, and that's something that we need to begin to and continue and increase our enforcement of that provision. Because in the neighborhood around bases here or abroad, obviously, there's an opportunity for that. So don't do it.

And the second part of the training is recognize it. And that -- for that, it's part of the annual training. We also have public service announcements on Armed Forces Network and that kind of thing. If you're in a gym somewhere around the world or in Afghanistan, you'll frequently see them to increase awareness and to give the tell-tale signs of it to our people. We do some specific things regionally in PACOM, USFK -- U.S. Forces Korea -- where we've had -- historically had an issue there. So wherever we detect it, we try to follow up. And there have been some cases recently, which we have aggressively followed up in the law enforcement sense.

Contractors. You know that for every soldier, sailor, airman, and marine deployed, there's at least one contractor that ends up in theater at the same time. They're all employed by us. Secretary Napolitano already made it clear. It's part of the Federal Acquisition Regulation and it's Defense Federal Acquisition Supplement that contracts are to have a provision forbidding trafficking as in any connection with the country. Now, it's one thing to write it into the contract and you say, "How do you make sure you get it done?" We're going to make it training for the contractors mandatory, even as it is for our own people, civilian and military -- number one.

Number two, contracting officer representatives, a COR. What is a COR? COR is the person who makes sure that the contract is executed. So there's somebody who follows around the contractor and makes sure it gets done. Those people are now trained, which they didn't used to be, in recognizing trafficking. So they can see if an association with one of our contracting activities -- this has gone on, very important. And we have our inspector general now tracking to make sure that those contract clauses are all there and the contracting officer representatives are, in fact, monitoring compliance with those. Very important, because contractors is a huge part of what we do.

Last piece is our foreign military training engagements. All of our programs, be they 1206, be they IMET, JSET, our training of UN peacekeepers and so forth, it is a required part of that curriculum. If we offer it as a department to another military that it include training for those foreign military members in trafficking, both don't do it and recognize it. So for example, just to give you one example, in the Democratic Republic of Congo, AFRICOM, our African Command, works through DIILS -- the Defense Institute for International Legal Studies -- maybe some of you may be familiar with -- to train justice professionals in the prosecution of trafficking crimes and Congolese military commanders in how to prevent their troops from engaging in this. It's very important in all of our training. So those are our training activities.

So in those three arenas where we might touch this problem and do touch this problem, we're trying to make sure that we're reflecting the President's fight.

SEC. CLINTON: Thanks very much, Ash. Now, Deputy Secretary Porcari, would you please report from the Department of Transportation?

DEPUTY SECRETARY PORCARI: Thank you, Secretary Clinton, and we appreciate your leadership on this. And Valerie, we very much appreciate the clear and consistent direction the President has given us on this. It's energized all of us.

We want to make sure, first and foremost, that the transportation system is not inadvertently an enabler of human trafficking. We're very committed across land, sea, and air to making sure that's not the case. Marlise Streitmatter, our deputy chief of staff, has been our lead person on this and will continue to be, but we're using all of our resources across borders and agencies to make sure that we can positively impact this problem.

For example, working with Secretary Napolitano in Customs and Border Protection, the Blue Lightning Initiative provides an in-flight procedure to report human trafficking events, law enforcement, as well as awareness for the flight crews. We've gotten very positive response from our airlines on this; they're very interested in moving forward on this. Likewise, on the highways, we want to make sure they're free of human trafficking. If a commercial truck or bus driver commits a felony, we can take them off the road -- and obviously, human trafficking is a felony. This gives us an opportunity to remove the bad actors.

We're also pursuing opportunities with Amtrak and the motor coach industry to develop a public awareness campaign and specialized training for our inspectors that are out in the field all across the country to recognize the warning signs of human trafficking. We're also collaborating with our Mexican and Canadian partners to increase awareness, and we look forward to expanding on those partnerships.

There are also some less conventional partnerships that can be very effective. Working, for example, with our local and state departments of motor vehicles, as well as truck stops, to build public awareness, and give people that are literally on the front lines of this fight the tools to recognize and report suspicious activities.

And finally, this really starts at home, and we're working internally within our Department of Transportation, across all the transportation modes, to make sure that we educate our team on identifying human trafficking, and we're building, essentially, on the DHS program that's out there.

So we're dedicated to moving forward with this. This is an unconscionable and unacceptable activity, and we are looking forward on building the -- on the progress to date. Thank you.

SEC. CLINTON: Thank you very much. Now I'd like to invite from the State Department, Under Secretary of State for Civilian Security, Democracy, and Human Rights, Maria Otero, to go into a little more detail about what we're doing at the State Department.

UNDER SECRETARY OTERO: Thank you very much, Madam Secretary. And I also want to express appreciation for the leadership that our President is giving us on this issue, and Valerie, convening us here, and of course, express the importance for us to be able to work with every department across the board under the commitment and leadership of Secretary Clinton, who has really enabled our Department to push forward in this area.

Over the last year, the TIP Office, under the leadership of Ambassador CdeBaca, but working in partnership with our regional bureaus and with all of the other colleagues across the Department, we've made advances in several areas that I think are important to highlight in addressing the State Department's response to modern slavery. And let me just touch on a couple of them, as Secretary Clinton has also talked about some of them.

First, the Department -- as other departments have stated here -- is in the process of developing a training program that is going to be applicable for all of our direct hires. And this is with the purpose of helping all of our employees understand the nature of this crime better. And not only be able to understand it but to be able to recognize it when it happens and to be able to see the warning signs before it is happening and also take action if that is necessary. So this is in the process of being developed, and we anticipate through it that the degree of understanding of this issue will increase by all of those that are working at the Department.

Second, Secretary Clinton, last year at this task force, announced the establishment of a new trafficking investigation unit that would be set up by our Diplomatic Security Bureau. And I'm very pleased to say that, indeed, that was not only set up, but that in fact it has been operating this last year. And it is very exciting that it has already carried out a number of investigations that have led to indictments. And that for us is a real sign of being able to move this forward. The unit's Victims' Resource Advocacy Program is also equipped to fully support the victims themselves that are discovered in the course of any of these investigations. So we are applauding our Diplomatic Security Bureau for how quickly they've put together this team, and not only set forth its parameters, but also how its work is already showing results.

Third, we're working to protect the visa holders who come to the United States as domestic servants of diplomats. Thanks to the works of one of our working groups, which is headed by our chief of protocol, we are working closely with the diplomatic community to raise their awareness of this issue and to make sure the diplomats that bring domestic workers to the United States now follow a set of requirements that are in place that will prevent those workers from being abused.

Finally -- and Secretary Clinton mentioned this briefly -- the TIP Office has partnered with an NGO to develop a tool that allows anybody and everybody to go online, to take a survey, and then to see how many victims of human trafficking it takes to sustain their lifestyle. This is called the Slavery Footprint, and it is the kind of innovation that is helping create change and also create awareness not only of the existence of this crime but also of the challenges that we face in addressing it, and it is bringing people to this issue.

We know that more than three million people from more than 200 countries have logged on to this site, and we're confident that tools such as this one are going to be some that are going to help make a difference in engaging those around the world in addressing this issue in the years ahead. Thank you.

SEC. CLINTON: Thank you, Maria. Since we are being broadcast here, perhaps, Lou, you could give the website for the Slavery Footprint, because it's had a remarkable impact, and we want to encourage everybody everywhere to sign on.

AMB. CDEBACA: Certainly. Thank you, Madam Secretary. It's pretty intuitive. It's the slaveryfootprint.org -- not dot com -- slaveryfootprint.org.

SEC. CLINTON: Right. So we invite everyone to log on.

Now let me turn to Dr. Raj Shah, the USAID administrator, who is such a great partner in this and so much of the work that we do.

ADMINISTRATOR SHAH: Thank you, Madam Secretary, for your focus and direction on these issues, and to President Obama for elevating the attention and the resources that we will hope to invest against results in this space.

In the past year, our agency has made significant progress trying to live up to commitments we've made around this table for each of the past two years as part of this task force. We are implementing a more results-oriented approach to counter-trafficking efforts around the world, which starts, as Denis mentioned, with the adoption of a strict, new code of conduct for ourselves, our partners abroad, our contractors, and in particular, our security contractors that often operate in high-risk conflict environments. The code of conduct, much as Ash Carter described, will make sure that more people serve as eyes and ears in the search for those at risk or those enslaved. And we have intensified procurement actions and implementation of that code of conduct so that those terms are written into our contracts and enforced through our contracts' officers and reviewers.

We've also launched a new counter-trafficking policy developed in close partnership with many agencies represented around the table.

This policy requires every USAID mission in a high-risk country to conduct baseline surveys on trafficking and develop clear metrics to assess progress against prevention for our efforts and efforts of others in the international community. It also directs us to create more multi-country databases so victims can be tracked across countries and supported in their efforts as they -- as that is such a critical barrier, having that data be accessible in a number of different environments. And it prioritizes investments in technologies, like mapping platforms, mobile applications, and other innovations.

We also believe that the -- one of the challenges is getting the word out and making sure that people who are in a difficult situation have the capacity to seek help. In that effort, we have expanded a highly successful partnership with MTV EXIT into Russia for the very first time, but it is a global program that has had some real successes, especially in Asia. Through the partnership with MTV EXIT, they have created public service advertisements, music videos, and other efforts to create awareness about trafficking and provide hotlines so that people can access resources to fight back. We believe it has reached more than 300 million households in Asia over the last seven years.

And just to share one story that we heard about just a few weeks ago, that for more than three years a young Cambodian boy and his three friends had been essentially enslaved on a Thai fishing boat. Just a few weeks ago, their boat docked at a port in Thailand, and they happened to see on television one of the MTV EXIT advertisements about trafficking. The video flashed a free hotline number in both Thai and Cambodian so the kids could read it and respond. They did. Immigration authorities responded immediately, and they were freed. We seek many, many more stories like this and believe our expanded efforts are helping to get us there.

We also know, as the President mentioned in his statement today, that we want to work more effectively with partners throughout our own country in the private sector, on universities and campuses, and in faith-based communities. I recently visited Bethel University, a Christian college outside of Minneapolis, and I met with about 100 students the day after we had released our counter-trafficking policy, actually, in this room. And sometimes it takes in the federal government -- as everyone here knows -- some time for these policies to be read by our teams and really inform changes and action and behavior. I know we all address that. Every one of the 100 kids that I met with had already read our policy online, and they had ideas, they had things they wanted to contribute.

So today, we're thrilled to announce that we will launch a college -- a campus challenge to combat trafficking, and we'll seek to partner with the most innovative, creative ideas in the realm of prevention and protection. And we'll match our campus challenge champions, the winners of our awards, with our missions in the field, so students have access to many of our partners who are on the frontlines of trying to help victims or help communities that are in high risk. We look forward to working with the next generation of American students to craft the next generation of solutions to this critical challenge.

And thank you for the chance to be here.

SEC. CLINTON: Thank you so much, Raj. That's very exciting news. Let me now ask Deputy Director Sean Joyce of the FBI to share the FBI's update.

MR. JOYCE: Thank you, Madam Secretary. And thank you to the White House for hosting this event today. And I'd like to take this opportunity to thank all the people on the street that work this issue each and every day and many of the folks in this room in some of the chairs behind us that work tirelessly every day on some of the policy issues regarding this issue. The FBI continues its commitment to fighting human trafficking and child exploitation in coordination with our federal, state, and local partners. Over the last year, we've increased our resources approximately 66 percent dedicated to this issue, especially against instances of coerced or forced adult labor, in addition to our agency placing a tremendous significance on ensuring child victims are safe, secure, and away from those who would prey on their innocence.

I can tell you I've been personally involved in rescuing some child victims, and as a father and a special agent, it is both emotional and rewarding, but devastating for the victims. The FBI recognizes these investigations require specialized resources, and thus we commit 80 victim specialists from our Office of Victim Assistance to our human trafficking efforts. To facilitate our fight against human trafficking and child exploitation, we participate in 77 task forces in 47 working groups across the country.

One highlight is our Innocent Lost National Initiative we started in 2003. This initiative addresses the tragic challenge of children recruited into prostitution. It is supported by the Department of Justice, Child Exploitation/Obscenity Section, and the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. To date, the initiative has resulted in 1,961 children being rescued. There have been nearly 1,500 investigations initiated, resulting in 927 convictions, to include seven life sentences and several ranging in length from 25 to 45 years.

Recognizing this is also an international problem. The FBI continues to build capacity through a number of training efforts, and in conjunction with our partners in the Department of State, we recently administered a two-week human trafficking course for law enforcement officials from El Salvador, Guatemala, Nicaragua, and Panama. The FBI looks forward to the continued collaboration with our law enforcement partners, both at home and abroad, to ensure that child exploitation and/or forced or coerced adult labor is met with swift justice.

Thank you, Madam Secretary, for this opportunity.

SEC. CLINTON: Thank you very much, Deputy Director and Special Agent. That was a very stirring rendition of the great work you're doing, and I appreciate it.

Let me now turn to Assistant Secretary Russlynn Ali to share the Department of Education's update.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY ALI: Thank you, Madam Secretary, Ms. Jarrett, and to all of you for your commitment on this issue. Secretary Duncan shares in that commitment and this sense of urgency.

Over the past year, we have set about using all of the tools within our disposal to really launch an awareness through -- prevention through awareness efforts in our schools, through technical assistance and supports and training for educators that need it so that they can spot the warning signals. We know that these signals, whether they be absenteeism or signs of abuse or behavioral problems, they prevent children from learning. They not only affect the victim and those at prey of traffickers but the entire school community. And schools have a responsibility and need help and support.

So it is about identifying where those problem areas exist, working with so many of you to target our solutions and our efforts, to answer the calls of educators and school districts around the country that are dealing with these problems in ways that they have never before, helping them with language and talking to school-age children about very difficult and grown-up issues. And how they do that with sincerity and the education they need to help their children be safe is something that is hugely important as well.

We are also doing the kind of technical assistance through web-based tools on what services are available, what supports are available. We've brought together, just last summer, over 2,000 educators to deal with issues of climate and safety in their schools writ large and highlighted and focused on issues of trafficking and ways to help. Finding those places that are also doing great things to eradicate trafficking where in exist -- a school district in San Diego, for example, Grossmont Union High School, we've worked with them to create a training video, which we will disseminate to all school districts that need it as we find those places that are eradicating this and work to take their lessons to scale.

We've also worked closely with the Office of Violence Against Women, our colleagues at the Department of Justice, and elsewhere to ensure that we bring best practices to bear and outreach with as many groups as possible and interested on this issue. In the future, we will continue to work with our sister agencies in finding the places that need the help most, understanding the data better, learning about those solutions and bringing them to scale.

We look forward to sharing those tools, like the Slavery Footprint, to working with Raj and others on things like the campus challenge while we do climate checks and climate schools in our schools, making sure that we hear from students themselves on both problems and solutions, and working with our colleagues and our school resource officers and our colleagues in the Department of Homeland Security on training for law enforcement officers on how they, too, can help change the school environment. We will use all of the tools in our disposal to help you and help our schools deal with this tragic problem. Thank you.

SEC. CLINTON: Thank you very much. And now let me invite our final speaker, U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission Chair Jacqueline Berrien.

MS. BERRIEN: Thank you so much to President Obama for his leadership and commitment to end human trafficking, and thank you, Secretary Clinton, for your leadership and the opportunity to participate in this very important discussion.

On behalf of the United States Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, I am privileged to report on the EEOC's work to identify and remedy the trafficking of workers. EEOC staff across the country work diligently to protect one of the most fundamental human and civil rights -- the right to work without being harassed, intimidated, or mistreated on account of race, color, religion, national origin, sex, age, or disability. The EEOC plays an important role in helping to make victims of trafficking whole. We seek and obtain civil remedies, such as back pay and monetary relief, for the harm caused by employment discrimination as well as punitive damages and equitable relief to deter and prevent future discriminatory conduct.

Since the last meeting of this task force, EEOC has worked with enforcement partners at the federal, state, and local levels to improve outreach to vulnerable populations, including victims of trafficking. For example, we trained representatives from state and local fair employment practice agencies to identify and remedy trafficking. EEOC also certified new visas last year to ensure that victims of sex harassment and other discriminatory treatment at work could participate fully in related law enforcement efforts without fear of deportation.

Building on the successful resolution of anti-trafficking cases against J.J. Pickle and Trans Bay Steel, the EEOC is challenging discriminatory working conditions and terms of employment in two recently filed cases. In one case, the EEOC alleges that more than 200 Thai men were subjected to a pattern or practice of national origin and race discrimination, harassment, abuse, and retaliation on farms in Hawaii and Washington. The second case alleges that hundreds of Indian employees were recruited to work as welders, pipe fitters, and ship fitters in Mississippi and Texas, but after arriving in the United States as guest workers, they were subjected to abuse based on their national origin and race and encountered other forms of discriminatory treatment, including segregated and substandard housing. Both of these cases are pending now, and we're seeking not only relief for the affected workers, but also injunctive relief to prevent future occurrences.

Last January, the commission conducted a public meeting on human trafficking, and with the insights provided by Ambassador CdeBaca and other witnesses, we have redoubled our efforts to identify and remedy trafficking. In the past year, my colleague, Commissioner Stuart Ishimaru, launched the EEOC's immigrant worker team to improve the commission's outreach to immigrant workers, strengthen enforcement of laws prohibiting national origin discrimination, and increased collaboration with other agencies addressing human trafficking and related issues affecting immigrant workers. The immigrant worker team of the EEOC will continue to address these issues in 2012.

Once again, thank you for convening us, Madam Secretary. My EEOC colleagues and I look forward to continuing to work with all of the members of this task force towards the goal of ending the scourge of human trafficking.

SEC. CLINTON: Thank you so much. And again, thanks to everyone, not just for being here today for this meeting, but for the work that everyone has done since our last meeting. I think it does help to focus our attention that we do have an annual meeting where we come together and share the results of our efforts. I think it's especially meaningful to be meeting here in the White House, because, after all, this is a national priority, it's a priority of the President's, and we do have to do more to reach out to have partnerships with the private sector, with NGOs, state governments, local governments, and the like.

So again, Valerie, thank you for hosting us, and we appreciate the emphasis that the White House has put on this program.

MS. JARRETT: Thank you. Thank you all for being here.

SEC. CLINTON: Thank you.

LOAD-DATE: March 17, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2012 Federal News Service, Inc.
All Rights Reserved

180 of 492 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

March 15, 2012 Thursday

OBAMA ADMINISTRATION ACCOMPLISHMENTS ON COMBATING TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS AS OF FEBRUARY 2012

BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 20060 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. Department of State:

Office To Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons

March 15, 2012

Presidents Interagency Task Force and Senior Policy Operating Group

On February 1, 2011, National Freedom Day, Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton chaired the Obama Administrations second meeting of the Presidents Interagency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons (PITF). Agencies discussed a broad range of issues including the ongoing need for increased victim identification and assistance, collaboration across law enforcement agencies to dismantle human trafficking networks and bring traffickers to justice, and leveraging resources by expanding anti-trafficking work into broader agency efforts.

The Senior Policy Operating Group (SPOG) met four times in 2011 in January, April, July, and October and coordinated implementation of strategies and programs related to federal efforts to combat human trafficking. Building on advancements made in previous years, the SPOG sustained these efforts through standing committees, as well as new ad hoc working groups formed to address victim services and legislative matters.

The Department of Homeland Security (DHS) and the Department of State (DOS) led a SPOG working group that developed and deployed an online, interactive training for the entire federal acquisitions workforce on combating human trafficking, and its contributing factors like the demand for commercial sex, using the pertinent provisions of the Federal Acquisition Regulation (FAR). The 35-minute module outlines the definition of human trafficking and describes vulnerable populations, indicators, and relevant legislation. It articulates specific remedies for use if contractors engage in human trafficking, including suspension or debarment. Personnel in more than 10 federal agencies have already taken the training.

Prompted by interagency efforts to address the issue of victim identification and assistance, relevant SPOG agencies participated in a public listening session hosted and organized by DHS, which was designed to allow stakeholders to share ideas on victim services, federal government engagement with local communities, outreach to at-risk groups, and non-governmental organization (NGO) and private sector initiatives and resources.

In 2011, the SPOG Chair invited the Department of Transportation (DOT) to participate in the policy group. DOTs participation has helped to expand federal coordination, particularly in increased victim identification and assistance in locating common routes used for trafficking within and into the United States. DOT joins the Department of Agriculture (USDA), the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC), and the Department of the Interior (DOI), which were first invited to participate in the PITF and SPOG in 2010.

A SPOG working group on legislative matters facilitated the consolidation of agency comments into an Administration response to the House version of the bill reauthorizing the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) of 2000, as amended.

Three standing committees continued to advance substantive areas of the SPOGs work: Research and Data focused on statistics and data collection, Grantmaking generated a series of promising practices for successful grants, and Public Affairs revitalized its members to coordinate government-wide messaging.

With participation of SPOG agencies, the 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP Report) included for the second year a ranking and full country narrative for the United States. The U.S. narrative and ranking incorporated the input of civil society through a call for information in the Federal Register. It generated significant press, foreign government interest, and praise from the NGO community, advancing U.S. diplomatic efforts on human trafficking worldwide.

DOS, the Department of Defense (DOD), the Department of Justice (DOJ), DHS, the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID), the Department of the Treasury (Treasury), and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention collaborated with the White House in the National Action Plan on Women, Peace, and Security. The National Action Plans goal is to empower women as partners in preventing conflict and building peace in countries threatened and affected by war, violence, and insecurity. With interagency input, one of the plans objectives is to strengthen U.S. efforts to prevent and protect women and children from trafficking in persons in addition to other harms. Each agency will develop specific plans for implementing the National Action Plan in the first half of 2012.

DOS's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons (TIP Office) created a shared intranet site to serve as a central clearinghouse of information that all PITF agencies can use to share resources, training, and information vital to their work.

SPOG agencies continued to share information on matters relating to grants, grant policies, and other significant actions regarding the international trafficking of persons to inform funding decisions and ensure they are not duplicative, but strategic and smart.

DOS and DOJ have signed a one-year Interagency Agreement creating an Advanced Human Trafficking Investigator course at the FBI Training Academy at Quantico for Central American law enforcement officers. The first pilot session, scheduled for February 27-March 9, 2012, will train a total of 20 investigators from El Salvador, Guatemala, Nicaragua, and Panama. An additional session for 30 more investigators is anticipated in late 2012. If the pilot is successful, the training may be expanded to other regions pending additional resources.

DOS, DOJ, and DHS have signed a one-year Interagency Agreement for INTERPOL Washington to replicate a successful capacity building program previously implemented in Africa to enhance the capacity of customs officials, immigration officials, border security officers, police officers and prosecutors in states with shared borders to enhance a regional response. This program will be implemented in three targeted countries with shared borders in the Central America region. It will culminate in a joint human trafficking law enforcement operation that will seek to reinforce the knowledge and skills learned during the training portion of the program and provide the nexus to allow ongoing activities of this type in the future.

Department of State

On June 27, Secretary Clinton released the 2011 TIP Report covering 184 countries and territories, including the U.S. ranking and narrative. Since 2000, the Report has encouraged the enactment of anti-trafficking laws in over 120 countries, increased the numbers of victims identified and traffickers facing justice, and prodded recalcitrant governments to take their first significant anti-trafficking steps, planting the seeds for sustained political commitment to protection, prevention, and prosecution.

The TIP Office conducted fair, transparent, and competitive grant reviews to support grassroots prevention, prosecution, and protection projects worldwide. During Fiscal Year (FY) 2011, the TIP Office awarded $24 million to 69 projects in 37 countries, including $4.5 million in FY 2010 funds specifically appropriated for anti-trafficking projects in Haiti, and approximately $3 million in FY 2010 funds allocated primarily for projects in India and Afghanistan. Together, these projects address both sex and labor trafficking and support efforts focused on child sex tourism, demand reduction, debt bondage, and forced child labor, among other things. As of January 2012, the TIP Office has 156 open and active projects in 66 countries totaling $60.2 million. The TIP Offices foreign assistance budget was reduced from $21 million in FY 2010, to $16 million in FY 2011.

In 2011, the TIP Office supported both rigorous program evaluations and evidence-based research to identify trends, close knowledge gaps on TIP, and inform policy and practice. With TIP Office funding, the International Organization for Migration (IOM) published a comprehensive report in June 2011 on trafficking within Southeast Asia. The TIP Of-

Office also funded IOM to further expand its Global Human Trafficking Database, which contains primary data on more than 16,500 registered TIP victims in more than 100 source and destination countries.

The TIP Office is currently funding ongoing research projects including a case study assessing approaches to the investigation and prosecution of TIP cases and the protection of victims in three Tier 1 countries; a research study in a Middle Eastern country comparing a shelter for labor TIP victims and a shelter for sex TIP victims focusing on how each shelter is operated, similarities and differences between the victims, and the current rehabilitation methodologies being employed; and evaluability assessments, two of which were finalized in 2010 leading to the identification of two programs for full scale outcome evaluations, which are currently underway.

Through a grant from the TIP Office, the Fairtrade Fund developed the Slavery Footprint (www.slaveryfootprint.org), a web- and mobile-based application that allows users to understand how their lives may intersect with modern slavery. Nearly three million users in over 200 countries have visited the site. This self-assessment tool is a unique effort to expand consumers understanding of how their own actions can drive markets for human trafficking, in particular the demand for slave labor in supply chains, and call them to action to change those habits.

DOS is in the process of a fundamental reform of the J-1 visa Summer Work and Travel Program that will greatly reduce participants vulnerabilities to trafficking. The proposed new regulations represent the most significant reform of the program in its 48-year history. In 2011, a cap was placed on the number of participants and a moratorium was placed on new sponsor designations in order to focus on increased oversight by both sponsors and DOS. DOS consulted with a broad range of stakeholders including civil society, advocates, and local and federal government officials. Additional reforms are planned throughout 2012.

DOS augmented its ongoing work to help protect foreign domestic workers of foreign diplomats in the United States and hold diplomatic missions accountable for their personnel's treatment of their workers, including by implementing a system to track allegations of abuse and establishing additional requirements pertaining to the treatment of foreign domestic workers, including with regard to the payment of their wages. In early 2012, DOS will conduct briefings both for senior foreign mission personnel and for domestic workers on these matters. DOS has also met with foreign government officials and NGOs to learn about and consider additional protections.

DOS collaborated with DHS to create a 15-minute online, interactive general awareness training on human trafficking, which is available on both DOS's and DHS's Internet sites.

DOS issued a cable to embassies and consulates worldwide urging all contracting officers and contracting officers representatives to take the newly-developed FAR training for acquisitions personnel at the first opportunity.

In an effort to address potential vulnerabilities for human trafficking in DOS procurement, DOS released a Procurement Information Bulletin (PIB) applicable to all DOS domestic and overseas contracting activities and Regional Procurement Support Offices which gives guidance to personnel on how to monitor contracts for counter-trafficking compliance.

DOS's Bureau of Diplomatic Security (DS) established its Human Trafficking Unit at its headquarters to support its field offices, increase participation in task forces, centralize case referrals, and offer training, particularly on interviewing and supporting victims of human trafficking. The unit will also assist other domestic law enforcement agencies in overseas investigation activities. DS also has a Victims Resource Advocacy Program that is designed to fully support any victims, including trafficking victims, discovered during the course of DS investigations.

The newly formed DS Human Trafficking Unit was the lead investigative agency in a case that led to the indictment of a former foreign United Arab Emirates embassy employee Mervat Mohamed Fawzy Saleh Tolan, 52, and her husband Nabil Abdel Khalek Talaat, 55, both Egyptian citizens and formerly of Vienna, VA, by a federal grand jury on November 23 for forcing two Indonesian women to work long hours at well-below minimum wage as domestic servants in the defendants residence. The charges included forced labor, visa fraud, alien harboring, making false statements, and more. The victims alleged repeated sexual abuse and restrictions of their freedom over the course of their employment.

DOS collaborated with several partners including the Business for Social Responsibility, Interfaith Center for Corporate Responsibility, Christian Brothers Investment Service, and Rabbis for Human Rights-North America to develop two webinars promoting the importance of corporate social accountability in combating modern slavery and sharing information on resources, tools, and training. DOS also elevated trafficking awareness through a well-attended conference in Rome, Building Bridges of Freedom: Public-Private Partnerships to End Modern Day Slavery, which focused on sharing anti-trafficking promising practices from the faith-based, corporate, and civil society sectors.

DOS further engaged the hospitality, travel, and tourism sector in their efforts to develop training on human trafficking and raise awareness of the penalties associated with child sex tourism.

DOS provided support to the International Business Leaders Forums pilot project to provide job- and life-skills training to trafficking survivors in at least 13 hotel sites in three pilot countries.

In FY 2011, DOSs Bureau of Population, Refugees, and Migration (PRM) contributed $258,000 to the IOM for the Return, Reintegration, and Family Reunification Program for Victims of Trafficking in the United States. With the support of the TIP Office, PRM contributed an additional amount to enable IOM to clear a backlog of cases. Through the program, IOM helps trafficking victims who have been granted a T-visa status by providing financial and logistical support to family members who are eligible for T-visas so that they can join the victim in the United States. For trafficking victims who wish to return home, the program provides travel assistance, as well as help reintegrating into the home community to reduce the likelihood of re-trafficking. In 2011, the program helped 69 family members to join trafficking survivors in the United States, and made progress on dozens of ongoing cases.

DOSs Bureau of Consular Affairs (CA) and TIP Office, and DHSs U.S. Citizenship Immigration Services (USCIS) work together to resolve recurring T- and U-visa processing delays. The group collaborates regularly to expedite time-sensitive cases to ensure victims families reunite before the children age out, and shares documents that are needed for stranded victims and their immediate family to get visas to return to the United States.

DOSs CA distributes at all visa-issuing posts a know your rights brochure developed by the Department of State in consultation with DHS, DOJ, the Department of Labor (DOL), and NGOs to recipients of visas in certain visa classes vulnerable to trafficking. The brochure has generated nearly 2,000 calls to the National Human Trafficking Resource Center (NHTRC) hotline.

DOSs Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor (DRL) awards grants on a fair and competitive basis to support organizations promoting internationally recognized labor standards, as laid out in the eight International Labor Organization (ILO) core conventions. One portion of DRLs labor programming targets forced labor directly and engages stakeholders to address underlying conditions that can lead to forced labor.

DRL also participated in the roundtable launch of the USDOL-funded ILO guidelines to estimate forced labor of adults and children. The roundtable brought together United States Government (USG) and civil society actors to discuss the guidelines, in particular their usefulness to researchers and policymakers. The survey questions, which aim to identify involuntariness and coercion, can be streamlined into other surveys and tailored on a country-by-country basis to provide a more accurate measure of forced labor.

DOS successfully advanced multilateral policy, including drafting and negotiating the text of an OSCE Ministerial Declaration on Combating all Forms of Human Trafficking, adopted on December 7, 2011. Additionally, DOS provided expert input for the new ILO Convention adopted on June 16, 2011 on Decent Work for Domestic Workers (C189) and its Recommendation (R201), which include provisions to help prevent domestic servitude.

DOS supports International Law Enforcement Academies (ILEAs) overseas that deliver instructions to foreign law enforcement officials to address and help counter international crimes including trafficking in persons. In calendar year 2011, the ILEAs trained over 500 international law enforcement officials on counter-human trafficking topics.

Department of Defense

DOD produced new Public Service Announcements on combating trafficking in persons for the America Forces Network (AFN). The announcements seek to combat both sex and labor trafficking and are aired on the Pentagon station, as well as on AFN television and radio at overseas locations.

DOD enhanced individualized training by converting the latest version of the Trafficking in Persons General Awareness training course for delivery on mobile devices. The training is currently running on iPhone, iPod touch, iPad Androids, and Blackberry devices. A full course conversion, as well as a streamlined version, will run on any Internet accessible device.

The Department of the Army revamped its contract monitoring procedures by adding a new reason code on the Excluded Parties List System, which identifies if a firm has been suspended/debarred for violations of the FAR prohibitions of trafficking in persons. In this way, firms and debarments can be more easily tracked.

(<https://www.epls.gov/epls/jsp/CTCodes.jsp?type=recip>)

Senior Contracting Officials in Iraq and Afghanistan have awareness brochures for companies employing third-country nationals to alert them to the severe penalties for human trafficking. The brochure is also published on the CENTCOM Contracting Command Contracting Office webpage (<http://www2.centcom.mil/sites/contracts/Pages/GCO.aspx>) and on the OSD DPAP Contingency Contracting webpage (<http://www.acq.osd.mil/dpap/pacc/cc/index.html>).

DOD created a wallet-sized card, translated into the seven languages most commonly spoken by workers in Iraq and Afghanistan that spells out their worker rights and provides hotline information to report suspected violations.

The Defense FAR Supplement added a requirement, published in the Federal Register in November 2011, mandating additional contract administration duties to maintain surveillance over contractor compliance for all DOD contracts.

DOD held a Combating Trafficking in Persons (CTIP) workshop with presenters from other federal organizations and nongovernment organizations that provided DOD representatives with the latest TIP laws, regulations, and tools to improve the DOD CTIP program.

U.S. Pacific Command (USPACOM) convened an interagency forum to address the problems of and to increase awareness of human trafficking within the USPACOM area of responsibility. Representatives attended from DOS, USAID, and the Office of the Secretary of Defense.

The United States Forces in Korea (USFK) held meetings with bar owners, the Philippine Embassy, and Philippine women working as bar staff concerning Korean Immigration Law and the confiscation of employee passports. USFK Law Enforcement, DOD, and the Philippine Embassys efforts to identify possible trafficking victims have resulted in a noticeable reduction in the number of Philippine women working in bars outside USFK installations.

DOD provided information on its work to raise awareness of human trafficking and anti-trafficking training modules to foreign government representatives under the International Visitor Leadership Program sponsored by DOS.

The Army and the Corps of Engineers developed a requirement to perform reviews and assess contracts for trafficking indicators and report risk assessments and reviews, along with actions taken/remedies, when a problem is identified. The first data collection was completed on December 31, 2011.

The DOD Inspector General submitted a report to Congress on January 18, 2011 on its CTIP contracting efforts, and continues to conduct evaluations of DODs overall efforts regarding trafficking in persons:

The third of a three part series of evaluations regarding DOD contracts within U.S. European Command and U.S. Africa Command was completed in December 2011. The report was published in January 2012.

Fieldwork for an evaluation of DOD contracts performed in the Islamic Republic of Afghanistan commenced in January 2012.

A report on an evaluation of DOD Component CTIP programs is planned for April 2012.

Department of Justice

Prosecutions

DOJs Civil Rights Division and the U.S. Attorneys offices (USAOs) together brought 41 forced labor and adult sex trafficking prosecutions in 2011, charged 117 defendants, and secured 65 convictions.

Regarding forced labor and adult sex trafficking cases:

DOJ secured a 12-year sentence against the lead defendant in a ground-breaking human trafficking and organized crime prosecution that dismantled a multi-national, organized criminal enterprise that exploited guest workers from multiple countries for forced labor in 14 states. Ten defendants were convicted in this prosecution in United States v. Askarkhodjaev.

In another organized crime and forced labor prosecution, United States v. Botsvynyuk, DOJ secured the convictions of two defendants after trial for their roles in a scheme to hold Ukrainian victims in forced labor. Two additional defendants charged in connection with the scheme are pending extradition.

DOJ secured life sentences against domestic and international sex traffickers in four separate cases.

DOJ secured a 40-year sentence against the lead defendant in the sex trafficking case of United States v. Cortes-Meza following trial on charges of victimizing young Mexican women and girls in the Atlanta area.

Regarding child sex trafficking:

In 2006, DOJ initiated Project Safe Childhood (PSC), which focuses on the effective prevention, investigation, and prosecution of technology-facilitated child sexual exploitation crimes. In May 2011, the Deputy Attorney General expanded PSC to cover all federal child sexual exploitation crimes, including the prostitution of children here in the United States. As a result, U.S. Attorneys are conducting a threat assessment of the harm posed in their districts by crimes involving the commercial sexual exploitation of children.

The Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys, in conjunction with the Criminal Divisions Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section (CEOS), conducted training July 12-15, 2011 at the National Advocacy Center for prosecutors and investigators of cases involving the commercial sexual exploitation of children. The training included segments on trial preparation, how to obtain victim services, and unique issues related to these cases. Participants heard from attorneys, investigators, and service providers experienced in working with this population.

Selected Child Sex Trafficking Cases brought by CEOS and USAOs:

U.S. v. Mozie, et al. (S.D. Fla.) DOJ secured the conviction of three defendants on charges relating to their sex trafficking of minors. Two of the defendants, a common-law husband and wife, acted as pimps and prostituted adults and minors out of a house near Ft. Lauderdale, Florida, at which the third defendant provided security. Defendant Mozie would initiate the minor victims by engaging in sexual intercourse with them. At least four minor girls between the ages of 13-17 were identified as victims. Defendant Laschell Shelly Harris was sentenced to 13 years in prison. Defendant Willie David Rice, who provided security, was sentenced to four years in prison. Sentencing for Mozie is scheduled for 2012.

U.S. v. Sullivan (N.D. Cal.) DOJ secured the conviction of Edward Lee Sullivan for producing and possessing child pornography. In 2008, Sullivan trained a 14-year-old girl to work for him as a prostitute and produced numerous photographs and videos of the minor engaging in sex acts. The photos and videos documented the steps Sullivan took to prepare the minor for acts of prostitution. Sullivan is scheduled to be sentenced in 2012 and faces a maximum sentence of up to life in prison and a fine of $250,000.

U.S. v. Sanderson (D. Conn.) DOJ secured a sentence of over 25 years imprisonment for Jarell Sanderson of New Britain, Connecticut on child sex trafficking charges. Sanderson and his co-defendant Hassanah Delia of East Hartford, Connecticut recruited two 14-year-old girls to engage in prostitution in hotels in Connecticut. The defendants provided the minors with alcohol in order to dull their fears and threatened them on several occasions, including by telling the minors that Sanderson had a gun. Defendant Delia was sentenced to 110 months in prison.

Coordination

DOJ initiated a Human Trafficking Enhanced Enforcement Initiative to strengthen coordination within DOJ and among federal law enforcement agencies.

DOJ implemented a directive within the Department to enhance coordination on issues related to human trafficking among USAOs, the Executive Office for United States Attorneys, CEOS, and the Civil Rights Divisions Human Trafficking Prosecution Unit (HTPU).

DOJ collaborated with DHS and DOL through the Federal Enforcement Working Group (FEWG) to conduct competitive nationwide selection process and launch six Pilot Anti-Trafficking Coordination Teams (ACTeams) to implement coordinated interagency strategy to develop high-impact human trafficking investigations and prosecutions in collaboration with national human trafficking subject matter experts, including DOJ prosecutors and experts at DHSs U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), FBI, and DOL headquarters. Developed and disseminated interagency ACTeams Operations Guide.

DOJ advanced the U.S.-Mexico Human Trafficking Bilateral Enforcement Initiative, in collaboration with DHS and Mexican law enforcement counterparts, to develop high-impact bilateral investigations and prosecutions to dismantle international human trafficking networks, resulting in landmark convictions in coordinated prosecutions under both U.S. and Mexican law.

Based on this collaboration, on September 3, 2011, Mexican authorities secured convictions and sentences of 37½ years each against two defendants and 28½ years against a third defendant in a bilateral sex trafficking case arising out of United States v. Rugerio in Atlanta, Georgia.

In a second bilateral case, on June 28, 2011, Mexican authorities secured sentences of 16½ years against three sex traffickers and a sentence of 18 years against a fourth co-defendant in connection with a case arising out of Miami, Florida. Three members of the same sex trafficking ring were each sentenced to 15 years in Miami on November 16, 2011, in United States v. Cortes-Castro.

Throughout 2011, DOJ's anti-trafficking grant programs and training and technical assistance initiatives continued to support communities in building capacity to combat human trafficking and assist victims:

DOJ's Bureau of Justice Assistance (BJA) and Office for Victims of Crime (OVC) added six new enhanced model task forces to support a comprehensive, victim-centered approach to combating all forms of trafficking sex trafficking and labor trafficking of foreign nationals and U.S. citizens (male and female, adults and minors). BJA made six awards to support law enforcement agencies (one in each task force site) to coordinate the goals, objectives, and activities of the entire task force in close collaboration with the local U.S. Attorney's Office and victim service provider partner. OVC made six awards to support a victim service organization (one in each task force site) to coordinate the provision of a comprehensive array of culturally and linguistically appropriate services to all trafficking victims identified within the geographic area covered by the task force.

DOJ's BJA and OVC hosted three regional training forums across the United States to bring together active task forces with investigative and victim service functions. The forums facilitated an opportunity for tailored, peer-to-peer training focused on region-specific, skills-building, and intelligence-sharing for law enforcement, victim service providers, and other professionals engaged in combating human trafficking. The trainings took place as follows:

Western Regional Forum: Tampa, Florida, January 11-12, 2011

Northeastern Regional Forum: Hartford, Connecticut, March 23-24, 2011

Midwestern Regional Forum: Chicago, Illinois, June 29-30, 2011

DOJ's BJA and OVC publicly released an online technical assistance tool on National Human Trafficking Awareness Day on January 11, 2011. The e-Guide is a comprehensive online resource to assist anti-trafficking task forces in establishing, strengthening, and operating multidisciplinary response teams to identify and assist trafficking victims across the country. The e-Guide can be found here: <https://www.ovcttac.gov/TaskForce/8204/Guide/EGuide/Default.aspx>

Ongoing Training and Technical Assistance Initiatives

DOJ's BJA-funded law enforcement agencies and OVC-funded victim services organizations conducted professional training with community stakeholders within their geographic regions in an effort to build capacity and improve the community's response to human trafficking.

DOJ's OVC supported requests from the mainstream victim services field for training focused on understanding the needs of human trafficking victims and incorporating appropriate services into their existing client service model.

DOJ's BJA and OVC supported technical assistance requests from non-DOJ funded anti-trafficking task forces to support their efforts to incorporate best practices into their task force structure.

DOJ's BJA supported the development of three skill-based trainings for law enforcement agencies, including: 1) Human Trafficking Training for State Prosecutors; 2) Human Trafficking Training for State Judges; and 3) Advanced Human Trafficking Investigation Training.

DOJ's Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention (OJJDP) provided training and technical assistance to Mexican prosecutors, law enforcement and emergency responders through its AMBER Alert Training and Technical Assistance program. The purpose of this assistance is to prevent and combat cross-border child abductions and human trafficking in the U.S. and Mexico. These efforts were conducted in coordination with DOJ's OPDAT and the U.S. Embassy in Mexico City with the full support of the Attorney General of Mexico and will continue in 2012. As a result of these efforts, Mexico has adopted Alerta AMBER México, a system similar to the U.S. AMBER Alert program.

DOJ's Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance, and Training (OPDAT) conducted 69 trafficking in persons programs in FY 2011 to build prosecutorial capacity in 16 countries (Albania, Bangladesh, Djibouti, Ghana, Indonesia, Iraq, Kyrgyzstan, Mexico, Nigeria, Philippines, Russia, Serbia, Taiwan, Tanzania, Thailand, and Ukraine), and organized programs for over 278 foreign visitors to participate in training programs with DOJ's human trafficking experts.

Below are three examples of achievements facilitated by OPDAT:

On December 23, 2011, the Government of Bangladesh (GOB) enacted a long-awaited comprehensive anti-trafficking law. The new law criminalizes all forms of trafficking, including the trafficking of male migrant laborers who comprise the majority of Bangladeshi trafficking in persons victims. This anti-TIP ordinance, a major milestone in Bangladesh's efforts to combat trafficking, is the result of years of sustained efforts by the OPDAT Resident Legal Advisor to Bangladesh, as well as other DOJ and USG officials, to work with champions of the issue within the GOB. The Prime Minister's personal involvement in pushing through the ordinance reflects GOB commitment at the highest levels to addressing this key human rights issue.

The OPDAT Resident Legal Advisor to Russia spearheaded a successful Russian-American Trafficking in Persons Forum in Moscow on November 8-9, 2011. U.S. Ambassador to Russia John Beyrle and U.S. Ambassador-at-Large to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons Luis CdeBaca joined Russia's Presidential Administration Representative on Human Rights Vladimir Lukin and representatives from the International Organization for Migration and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe to discuss human trafficking in Russia. Participants included approximately 70 international and Russian experts from the government, academia, law enforcement, religious organizations, and nongovernmental organizations, including two leading NGO experts from the US. The Forum resulted in the recommendation of several concrete steps for progress, including the formation of a network of TIP NGOs and religious organizations, and the re-establishment of a Russian-American law enforcement working group on TIP.

On September 22, 2011, the OPDAT Resident Legal Advisor to the Philippines helped organize a judicial roundtable with the Philippine Judicial Academy focused on common appellate issues in TIP cases. The Philippines has struggled with trafficking in persons, but in the past year has made substantial progress, reflected in an upgrade to Tier 2 from the Tier 2 Watch List in the most recent annual TIP Report by the State Department. A major reason for the improvement has been the increase in successful TIP convictions, which was brought about in part by the prior assistance work of the OPDAT TIP Intermittent Legal Advisor. With the increase in convictions, the focus is now turning to the courts of appeals, and this TIP roundtable included 42 appellate court judges, more than half of all appellate judges in the Philippines.

The National Institute of Justice (NIJ) at DOJ continued to expand its research portfolio on trafficking in FY 2011. NIJ sponsored three new research projects. The first is a detailed examination of traffickers and those that facilitate trafficking, focusing on who they are, why they engage in trafficking and how they organize. The second is a detailed evaluation of an intake form for trafficking victims with an eye towards developing a common intake form for the United States. The last project focuses on labor trafficking and tries to ascertain the reasons for under-reporting of this crime in the United States.

DOJs OJJDP funded the Institute of Medicine and the Division of Behavioral and Social Sciences and Education of the National Research Council to study the commercial sexual exploitation and sex trafficking of minors in the United States. The study will be conducted by a committee of independent experts who will review relevant research and practice-based literatures and make policy recommendations. The committee will examine, through a comprehensive literature search, workshops, and site visits: the scope and severity of commercial sexual exploitation of children (CSEC) and sex trafficking of U.S. citizens or lawful permanent residents who are under the age of 18; causes and consequences for CSEC and sex trafficking victims and offenders, including the role of the child welfare and juvenile justice systems; evidence on efforts in human services, health care, and law enforcement to prevent CSEC and sex trafficking and to intervene with victims and offenders; lessons from international, national, state, and local advocacy efforts that contribute to successful intervention and prevention strategies; and the adequacy of current state and federal laws for addressing the CSEC and sex trafficking of domestic minors. The committee will recommend: strategies to respond to CSEC and sex trafficking of domestic minors; new legislative approaches, if necessary; and a research agenda to guide future studies in this field.

DOJs International Criminal Investigative Training Assistance Program (ICITAP) supported the international anti-human trafficking effort through program activities in seven countries on three continents. ICITAP also graduated 350 students from anti-trafficking training programs in Nigeria, the Philippines, and Tanzania.

Anti-trafficking international diplomacy:

The Total Information Management System, developed by ICITAP and enabled with real-time checks against INTERPOL databases, was instrumental in the Albanian Border Polices arrest of Serbian national Hektor Kelmendi, wanted on human trafficking charges in the U.S.

ICITAP partnered with OPDAT and U.S. Embassy Belgrade to organize an anti-trafficking study trip for a Serbian delegation from the ministries of Interior and Justice, including visits to the Human Smuggling and Trafficking Center (HSTC) in Washington, D.C., the State of Ohio Attorney Generals Office, and the FBI Innocence Lost Task Force in Toledo.

ICITAP partnered with OPDAT and U.S. Embassy Belgrade to arrange for an FBI task force supervisor, an FBI victim specialist, and an Assistant U.S. Attorney from Ohio to travel to Serbia for a series of presentations and discussions about trafficking with police, prosecutors, judges, social workers, NGOs, and academics.

USG-funded international anti-trafficking programs:

ICITAP provided assistance to the USAID mission in Cambodia in the design of a new anti-trafficking program.

ICITAP served as a panel member at the U.S. Pacific Commands first interagency symposium on CTIP.

ICITAP gave trafficking presentations to 500 students at Kosovo high schools in support of the governments Anti-Trafficking-in-Persons Awareness Campaign, with the goal to help prevent Kosovos youth from becoming easy prey for human traffickers and recruiters.

Victim Assistance

Through its Services for Victims of Human Trafficking Program, DOJ's OVC made grant awards to 11 victim service organizations with a demonstrated history of providing trauma-informed, culturally competent services to male and female victims of sex trafficking and labor trafficking. Funding under this program supports either a comprehensive array of services for trafficking victims in specific geographic areas, or specialized mental health or legal services over larger geographic areas. Funding also supports efforts to increase the capacity of communities to respond to victims through the development of interagency partnerships and public outreach and awareness campaigns. These 11 grant awards were made in addition to the 6 awards made by OVC in partnership with BJA under the enhanced task force model program. In total, OVC made 17 grant awards to support services for victims of human trafficking. A link to these victim service organizations can be found at <http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/#8204;/ovc/grants/traffickingmatrix.html>.

Department of the Interior

Within the Department of Interior, the Federal Ombudsman (Ombudsman) provides assistance to the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands' 30,000 plus nonresident workers with labor and immigration complaints. The Federal Labor Ombudsman participated in the Pacific Regional Conference sponsored by the DOJ, National Districts Attorneys Association, and DOS entitled, "Strategies for Justice: A Pacific Vision in January 2011. The agenda for the conference focused on trafficking in persons, child sexual exploitation, and technology facilitated crimes. Over 400 participants gathered in Guam representing law enforcement, educators, health care providers, and social service providers from around the Pacific Region.

In May 2011, the Ombudsman, along with other members of the Human Trafficking Intervention Coalition (HTIC) for the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands (CNMI), sponsored an educational conference entitled "Human Trafficking Regional Training Conference." The HTIC is a coalition of law enforcement and social service organizations dedicated to fighting trafficking in humans in the CNMI as well as to provide immediate social welfare services to victims of trafficking. It was established in 2006 and has received numerous federal grants to continue its work. On September 14, 2011, the Ombudsman was elected the chairman of the CNMI HTIC. The Conference was the first regional training in the CNMI exclusively devoted to trafficking in persons issues and brought speakers from around the United States including AUSAs from South Carolina and victim shelter and rehabilitation directors from Cambodia. The Conference was attended by more than 250 participants from faith based organizations, law enforcement officials, services providers, and health care professionals from around the Pacific Region.

Also in May 2011, Assistant Secretary for Insular Affairs Anthony Babauta expanded the geographic scope of the Ombudsman's work to include the entire Marianas. Since the announcement of the expansion of her region of responsibilities, the Ombudsman has made several trips to Guam to conduct out-reach to the community representatives from both faith-based and ethnic-based communities to begin to develop the mutual trust and partnerships necessary to combat trafficking of persons in the territory. She has also met extensively with Guam governmental officials, both executive and legislative, which is necessary for effective prevention and prosecution of this crime. Developing a federal and local partnership also helps to leverage the resources available for the protection of victims.

On August 9, 2011, the Ombudsman participated as a presenter during the American Samoa Multi-Disciplinary Team Against Family Violence, in collaboration with the U.S. National District Attorney Association's (NDAA) National Center for Prosecution of Child Abuse, hosted a conference entitled, "Weaving the Pacific to End Child Abuse." The focus of the Ombudsman's presentation was the experiences of establishing the Ombudsman office in the CNMI and its role in combating trafficking in persons. The presentation focused on the goal of establishing a regional approach to this effort.

During the course of 2011 calendar year, 10 more victims of human trafficking sought assistance from the Ombudsman. Of these, based on extensive interviews and documentary evidence, it was determined that nine of these aliens had credible claims of victimization under the TVPA. The Ombudsman also assisted in the successful completion of federal law enforcement investigations of complaints involving 13 victims of trafficking or labor fraud. These investigations were referred to the U.S. Attorney for the Districts of Guam and the Northern Mariana Islands and prosecutions are either underway or awaiting sentencing. The office continues to actively assist approximately 72 victims of trafficking or labor fraud whose complaints were referred in 2009 and 2010 to Federal law enforcement agencies with these on-going investigations as well as humanitarian relief.

The Ombudsman is working collaboratively with USAOs, FBI, and DHS in identifying and investigating claims of human trafficking.

Throughout the year, the Ombudsman office has worked cooperatively with the legal community, lead law enforcement agencies, and Guma Esperanza with regard to victims seeking immigration benefits. The Ombudsman is aware of ten individuals who have received continued presence, and three victims as well as their derivative family members who have received T nonimmigrant status.

In 2011, the Bureau of Indian Affairs began discussions with DOSs TIP Office in regards to possibly updating the training at the Indian Police Academy for new officers. On December 1, 2011, U.S. Park Police (USPP) units responded to a reported domestic situation on the Baltimore-Washington Parkway in Laurel, Maryland. As a result of that response, USPP officers subsequently conducted an interview of an 18-year old female involved in the incident. Ultimately, it was discovered that the female was the victim of a kidnapping in August 2011 in North Carolina and was forced into providing sexual acts for money and moved state to state against her will. The U.S. Attorney's Office in Greenbelt, Maryland was notified and the victim was remanded to the FBI Human Trafficking Group for further follow-up.

Plans are also being developed to provide human trafficking training to USPP personnel in the near future.

Department of Agriculture

On April 12, 2011 USDA published a Federal Register Notice (FRN) to inform the public and seek comments on Guidelines for Eliminating Child and Forced Labor in Agricultural Supply Chains (Guidelines). These Guidelines were based on the December 21, 2010 recommendations of the Consultative Group to Eliminate the Use of Child Labor and Forced Labor in Imported Agricultural Products (Consultative Group) and contained a key list of practices that should be considered by those who want to adopt a program to reduce child and forced labor in their supply chains. The Notice and all public comments submitted in response to it are available on USDA's website (http://www.fas.usda.gov/info/Child_labor/Childlabor.asp).

Having carried out the activities provided for in its authorizing statute, the Consultative Group agreed that a new phase of activities should be undertaken to explore whether there is a lasting role for the Guidelines in the larger discussion about how to address child and forced labor in international agricultural supply chains. USDA is in discussions with DOL and DOS, which have ongoing mandates and significant expertise to address these issues. An important element of this effort will be the identification of and engagement with additional stakeholders. USDA can continue to provide data and expertise on agricultural trade patterns that may be helpful as the group continues its work.

Department of Labor

Detection and Law Enforcement

DOLs Wage and Hour Division (WHD) and Office of the Inspector General (OIG) have continued participating in the Federal Enforcement Working Group (FEWG) and are actively working alongside law enforcement partners in the six pilot ACTeams located in Atlanta, El Paso, Kansas City, Los Angeles, Memphis, and Miami. The WHD plays a key role, calculating restitution for victims, providing translation services where necessary during the course of anti-trafficking investigations, and helping to identify potential cases in the course of regular Wage and Hour inspections.

The OIG investigates fraud and abuse related to DOLs Foreign Labor Certification (FLC) Programs (PERM, H-2A, H-1B, H-2B, etc.), as well as non-traditional organized crime threats that may jeopardize the integrity of these FLC programs.

The WHD is also participating in 26 BJA/OVC-funded task forces that are operating in 13 states, the District of Columbia, and the Northern Marianas. These task forces, composed of both federal law enforcement agencies and NGOs, are working to strengthen domestic trafficking investigations and prosecutions. Additionally, the WHD is participating in 12 non-BJA/OVC funded task forces, located in nine states. These task forces are comprised of federal, state, and local government agencies, along with a number of non-governmental organizations who have come together for a common purpose to combat human trafficking and to provide assistance to victims within the capabilities of the individual organizations.

Some examples of interagency investigations involving DOL include:

United States v. Sabhani: In January 2011, the Supreme Court declined to review lower court judgments in the case involving two domestic servants and a Muttontown, NY couple that ran an international perfume enterprise. A federal human trafficking criminal trial occurred in 2007 that included Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA) civil violations. Prosecution by DOJ resulted in a 2007 conviction on all 12 charges of a federal indictment that included forced labor, conspiracy, peonage, document servitude, and harboring aliens. The two defendants were convicted, and then sentenced in June 2008 to prison terms of 11 years and 40 months respectively. The criminal prosecution incorporated back wage restitution under the FLSA, consistent with restitution provision in Section 1593 of the TVPA. WHD and the NY Solicitor of Labor Regional Office coordinated with DOJ prosecutors, including development of the WHD issues and federal district court trial testimony by WHDs regional staff. The criminal case and judgment incorporated FLSA back wage restitution of $679,866.98. The Supreme Courts denial of certiorari effectively ends any further legal action on the case. There were sufficient assets seized from the defendants and deposited with the Clerk of the Court to pay the damages awarded.

United States v. Akouavi Kpade Afolabi: In October 2010, Akouavi Kpade Afolabi was sentenced in the U.S. District Court in Newark, New Jersey to 27 years in prison for running a human trafficking ring that smuggled African girls into the United States and put them to work for no pay in hair-braiding salons in the Newark area. The smuggled girls worked 14 hours or more a day in the salons for no wages at all. Ms. Afolabis husband, Lassissi, previously pled guilty and was sentenced to 24 years in prison. Afolabi's son, Derek Hounakey, was sentenced to 4 1/2 years. The WHD Northern New Jersey District Office provided assistance in the case, computing $1,974,570.40 in minimum wage and overtime due 24 victims. The judge, struck by the egregious nature of the violations, doubled the amount, awarding the victims over $3.9 million in restitution.

United States v. Liu: A complaint was referred to the United States Attorney and the FBI by the WHD Kansas City District Office regarding a domestic servant who had contacted the WHD. The victim stated that she was a native of the Philippines brought to the United States in early March 2011 on a B1 visa. She was brought into the United States by Hsien Hsien Jacqueline Liu, Director General for Taipei Economic and Cultural Office, after signing a contract in the Philippines agreeing to work for $1,240 per month. She resided with Ms. Liu at her private residence and worked as a maid, gardener, and cook. The victim indicated that upon her arrival, Ms. Liu took her passport and visa information, and indicated that the victim did not need her papers while she was in the house. The victim also indicated that once she arrived, Ms. Liu told her she would be paid $450 in cash per month, and that if she complained, she would have the victim deported. The victim stated that she worked six days per week, totaling approximately 84 hours per week. Information provided by the WHD resulted in an investigation of Ms. Liu that ultimately led to her arrest and guilty plea, in November 2011. During the course of the investigation, a second domestic servant who had worked for Ms. Liu was discovered and located in the Philippines. Working with the Kansas City AUSA, $80,000 in FLSA back wages were computed and collected for the two women. Ms. Liu is awaiting sentencing, and will be deported immediately afterwards.

United States v. Askarkhodjaev: DOLs OIG was involved an interagency investigation that led to the government seeking over $6 million in fraudulent profits via asset forfeiture. The investigation disclosed a Eurasian organized criminal enterprise that conspired and filed fraudulent labor applications that permitted over 1,150 foreigners to enter the United States on questionable work visas. The exploitation and intimidation of these foreign workers through fear, threats of deportation, and other adverse immigration consequences subjected them to conditions of servitude. In May 2011, Uzbek foreign national Abrorkhodjaev Askarkhodjaev was sentenced to 12 years in prison and three years of supervised release for his role as the leader of the criminal enterprise. Askarkhodjaev was also ordered to pay over $1 million in criminal restitution to victims in the following amounts: $172,000 to the foreign worker fraud and forced labor victims, $12,000 to an extortion victim, $191,000 to insurance companies, and $632,000 to the Internal Revenue Service. In April 2011, Kristin L. Dougherty was sentenced to 60 months in prison, followed by three years probation for his role in the conspiracy. Dougherty was the second highest ranking member of the criminal enterprise, and controlled the St. Louis based operation through several service companies that filed thousands of H-2B visas for foreign workers. In February 2011, Uzbek foreign national Ilkham Fazilov was sentenced to 41 months in prison for his role in the conspiracy. Fazilov fraudulently received certification for 87 H-2B workers from the DOL FLC program for his company, Five Star Cleaning. Five Star administered payroll for undocumented and H-2B workers it provided to Giant Labor Solutions.

The Department has taken steps to protect temporary foreign workers, a group at particular risk for trafficking, and U.S. workers performing the same work for their employers. Following the promulgation in March 2010 of a final rule regarding the Temporary Agricultural Employment of H-2A aliens in the United States, the WHD and the Employment and Training Administration's Office of Foreign Labor Certification, have stepped up both program integrity and enforcement actions to ensure a fair and reliable process for employers with a legitimate need for temporary foreign agriculture workers, while enforcing the necessary protections for all workers in the United States. DOL has also taken robust enforcement actions under the H-2B program for temporary non-agricultural employment since DHS delegated enforcement authority to the WHD in 2009. The WHD enforces broad federal minimum wage and overtime protections for other workers as well, including those who participate in the J visa program.

The Department published a final rule on January 19, 2011, regarding prevailing wages for the H-2B program (scheduled to take effect on October 1, 2012), and a final rule on February 21, 2012 (effective April 23, 2012), regarding other aspects of the H-2B visa program, both of which enhance worker protections and may impact labor-related aspects of trafficking in persons.

Examples of recent Wage and Hour Division H-2A and H-2B enforcement actions include:

The WHD obtained a judgment requiring Los Angeles based Global Horizons, Inc. and its president Mordechai Orian to pay $153,000 in back wages to 88 temporary agricultural workers from Thailand employed in Hawaii, plus $194,000 in civil money penalties for committing significant violations of the federal H-2A program. The defendants failed to pay employees for all hours worked and to pay the correct hourly wage rate, impermissibly withheld federal income tax and made illegal deductions from workers wages for meals and other basic living expenses. Defendants also failed to maintain required payroll records and produce them upon the Divisions request, and illegally solicited agreements from workers to waive their rights and decrease their wages. The defendants were found jointly and severally liable for 11 categories of violations, warranting back wage payments, penalty assessments, and a mandatory three-year debarment from participation in the H-2A program.

Kona Coffee Grounds LLC has paid $25,290 in back wages to 24 employees from Michoacán, Mexico, after an investigation by the WHD determined that the Holualoa, Hawaii-based company violated provisions of the H-2A visa program for temporary agricultural workers. The firm has also paid $21,000 in civil money penalties after DOL determined that the company procured signed statements from workers in an attempt to make them waive their rights under the H-2A program, which is prohibited under the programs regulations. The firm had promised employees a set piece rate for each pound of picked coffee beans, with a minimum hourly rate guaranteed by H-2A program requirements; however, when the crop was light and their piece rate earnings were low, the employees were paid fewer wages than those to which they were entitled. The investigation also revealed that the company failed to pay workers an amount equal to at least three-fourths of the hours guaranteed in the work contract, as is required.

Vanderbilt Landscaping Inc., of Smyrna, Tennessee has agreed to pay $18,496 to 42 workers after an investigation by the WHD found that the company violated the FLSA. The company did not compensate workers for visa and transportation costs, which reduced their wages to less than the federal minimum wage. The company also failed to compensate workers for all hours spent conducting job duties, resulting in employees not receiving premium pay when they worked more than 40 hours during a week. In addition to back wages, the company agreed to pay $18,000 in penalties based on WHDs findings that the company had willfully violated the H-2B visa rules governing the employment of nonimmigrant temporary workers, and it has also agreed not to participate in DOLs foreign labor certification H-2B program for a period of three years. Investigators found that the company willfully violated certain provisions of the rules, including placement of workers outside the area of intended employment, not conducting required recruitment of U.S. citizens, and misrepresenting the reason for its temporary need to hire H-2B workers.

In April 2011, WHD announced new protocols for the certification of the Form I-918 Supplement B in U nonimmigrant visa applications for those immigrants who are victims of crimes and who are willing to assist in the investigation or prosecution of those crimes. The function of certifying Form I-918 Supplement B has been delegated to the WHDs five Regional Administrators. The WHD is in the process of hiring permanent U visa coordinators in each of its five regional offices; until then, the Regional Administrators are actively considering requests for certification with the advice of interim coordinators.

On March 22-23, 2011, as part of the annual National Monitor Advocate training conference, the State Monitor Advocates received training from DOLs National Monitor Advocate and from a DOJ investigator on the Job Service Complaint System, and on human trafficking, respectively. The objective of these two sessions was to provide the State Monitor Advocates information on how and where to refer complaints filed by migrant and seasonal farm workers alleging human trafficking violations.

DOL is finalizing plans to provide basic awareness training to key enforcement field staff throughout the country in an effort to enhance the capability to detect and refer cases of trafficking in persons.

Transnational Engagement, Monitoring, and Research

On August 29, 2011, DOL finalized the signing of Joint Declarations with the governments of Costa Rica, Nicaragua, and the Dominican Republic, and the Letters of Agreement with all three, as well as with El Salvador. The Declarations aim to ensure that foreign workers in the United States are informed of their labor rights through information sharing, outreach, education, training, and the exchange of best practices. Such information can assist vulnerable workers, including those who may have been trafficked. The Declarations also represent a step towards enhancing coordination and cooperation with these governments on labor related issues.

According to grantee performance reporting, approximately 100,000 children have been prevented from being trafficked or have been withdrawn from trafficking and provided educational/training services as a result of DOL-funded technical assistance projects overseas since 1995.

In October of 2011, DOLs Bureau of International Labor Affairs (ILAB) released updates to three reports on child labor and forced labor: 1) the 2010 Findings on the Worst Forms of Child Labor (TDA Report); 2) the List of Goods Produced by Child Labor or Forced Labor per the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2005 (TVPRA List); and 3) the Executive Order 13126 List of Products Produced by Forced or Indentured Child Labor (Executive Order List). ILAB updated the TVPRA List to add two new goods and one new country for a total of 130 goods from 71 countries. ILAB also published in the Federal Register a new initial determination proposing to add two new products and two new countries to the Executive Order List. These reports continue to serve as important resources for DOL to assess future technical assistance and research priorities as it seeks to combat child labor around the world.

Pursuant to mandates under the TVPRA, ILAB continues to provide funding for research related to child labor and forced labor in violation of international standards. In December 2011, the ILO published a study funded by ILAB, along with the governments of the United Kingdom and Ireland, titled, Hard to See, Harder to Count: Survey Guidelines to Estimate forced labor of adults and children. This guidance provides a comprehensive approach to operationalizing what constitutes forced labor through a set of forced labor indicators; step-by-step guidance to survey implementation; sampling techniques; core questions that must be asked to discern forced labor; data analysis techniques; and ethical considerations. Although the guidelines are explicitly designed for quantitative data collection, they are also applicable to qualitative research design and implementation.

Victim Services

DOLs Employment and Training Administrations network of approximately 2,900 One-Stop Career Centers and its Job Corps Program continue to offer employment and training services to victims of severe forms of trafficking, as provided under the TVPRA. Updated guidance to the Workforce system and the Job Corps Program is underway, including a revised Training and Employment Guidance Letter and a webinar training for One-Stop staff.

Victims of convicted traffickers must be provided full restitution for the labor they performed. DOLs Wage and Hour Division assists such victims in computing back wages as part of its interagency collaboration with law enforcement partners.

Department of Health and Human Services

HHS Certifications and Eligibility Letters completed in Fiscal Year FY 2011:

Certifications: 463

Eligibility Letters: 101

During FY 2011, HHS funds administered by the Office of Refugee Resettlement (HHS/ORR) supported/assisted:

Case management services to 729 foreign trafficking victims and their family members through 107 agencies in 124 locations.

HHS distributed 772,328 Rescue and Restore Victims of Human Trafficking public awareness campaign materials (posters, brochures, etc.) and posted online, in English and Spanish, its Rescue and Restore training video Look Beneath the Surface. See (<http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=bqyzW84I3Dc>) for English version.

An example of HHS support for increased sustainability is that at least 20 anti-trafficking coalitions have remained affiliated with ORR's Rescue and Restore Victims of Human Trafficking public awareness campaign after ORR funding ended. The coalitions continue to support the public awareness campaign by distributing Rescue and Restore materials during outreach activities. ORR lists the coalitions' contact information on its website and the coalitions participate in HHS WebEx trainings.

HHS-funded NHTRC received 16,244 calls and 733 emails and provided 227 trainings to 15,260 people.

Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2008 (TVPRA):

Unaccompanied Alien Children:

HHS continues full implementation of Section 212(a)(2) of the TVPRA, which requires the HHS Secretary to promptly determine if an alien child in the United States who may be a victim of trafficking is eligible for interim assistance. The HHS Secretary delegated authority to implement this provision to the Assistant Secretary for Children and Families (ACF) who further delegated it to the Director of ORR.

The ORR Division of Unaccompanied Alien Children screened approximately 7,476 unaccompanied alien children during FY 2011 for trafficking.

Anti-Trafficking in Persons:

HHS/ACFs Anti-Trafficking in Persons Division in ORR has two Child Protection Specialists dedicated to reviewing requests and facilitating the prompt delivery of assistance to eligible children. In FY 2011, ATIP Child Protection Specialists have conducted training and outreach activities regarding services for foreign child trafficking victims including:

HHS conducted training at DHSs ICE headquarters for new ICE Victim Assistance Coordinators working with foreign born minors who are victims of trafficking. HHS presented on federal benefits available to potential foreign national child victims of trafficking and the process for requesting eligibility of children for these benefits and care options.

HHS attended a conference on child slavery hosted by a Minnesota-based anti-trafficking NGO. HHS presented on identifying foreign-born minor victims of trafficking. Approximately 100 service providers attended.

HHS Office on Womens Health in ACF Region VII hosted a Kansas City Human Trafficking Training focused on "Responding to Foreign Child Victims of Trafficking."

HHS presented at the National Symposium on Child Abuse, hosted by the National Childrens Advocacy Center. HHS presented on screening and identifying foreign national child victims of trafficking, referring them for federal benefits and HHS placement options for unaccompanied alien children.

HHS conducted trainings for ICE and FBI agents, and a non-profit that frequently refers minor victim cases to HHS.

HHS participated in a conference on child trafficking hosted by the Michigan State Refugee Coordinators office. HHS participated on a panel with an Assistant U.S. Attorney, FBI and ICE agents, and legal service providers who regularly work with victims of trafficking. Approximately 150 people attended the conference.

HHS partnered with DHSs USCIS to conduct five WebEx trainings on T and U visas, the Trauma Resiliency Model, first offender prostitution program, engaging volunteers in anti-trafficking outreach, and how to assist American Indian trafficking victims. Participants included social service providers, federal and local law enforcement, academic researchers, state officials, and representatives from international entities.

During FY 2011, the HHS/ACF Family Violence Prevention and Services Program supported anti-trafficking efforts by:

Partnering with DHSs USCIS to provide training for staff from domestic violence programs on immigration relief for vulnerable populations including victims of human trafficking, domestic violence, and other crimes. In FY 2011, these webinar-based and in-person trainings have reached over 200 domestic violence victim advocates and State Domestic Violence Coalition staff.

Providing human trafficking training and technical assistance to domestic violence advocates through the Programs Culturally Specific Special Issue Resource Center the Asian and Pacific Islander Institute on Domestic Violence (APIIDV). APPIDV developed a brief on the health issues, trauma, and oppression impacting people who are trafficked, and a technical assistance brief for domestic violence programs to navigate the implications of serving trafficked women and adapt their policies and procedures accordingly. This technical assistance brief can be downloaded from www.apiidv.org

Supporting over 1,700 local domestic violence programs and State Domestic Violence Coalitions in each State and Territory. Several Coalitions are conducting state-level training and coordinating services and advocacy for both domestic and foreign victims of trafficking who come in contact with domestic violence programs. For example:

In response to state anti-trafficking legislation, State Domestic Violence Coalitions in Georgia and Vermont will offer specialized training to domestic violence programs to build their capacity to respond to the very specific needs of trafficking victims, and work on a public awareness campaign.

Coalitions in Nebraska, Idaho, and Wisconsin facilitate state-wide Task Forces or networks to coordinate anti-trafficking efforts. Several other State Coalitions participate in such initiatives.

During 2011, the HHS/ACF Family and Youth Services Bureau continued to support anti-trafficking efforts by:

Providing 13 resource articles regarding Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children to Runaway and Homeless Youth Training and Technical Assistance Centers (RHYTTAC) website (<http://rhyttac.ou.edu/topic-specific-resources>).

Meeting with the FBI Crimes Against Children Unit to discuss the FBI's Innocence Lost National Initiative. An outcome of the initial meeting has been continued discussion on how HHS, the FBI Crimes Against Children Unit, and the Office of Victims Assistance can work collaboratively in the provision of safe and effective services for children and youth who have been identified as a victim of commercial sexual exploitation (trafficked).

Partnering with the FBI to bring together four HHS community-based runaway and homeless youth programs that currently work with the FBI as pilot programs to accomplish mutually agreed upon objectives and outcomes in the provision of services to trafficked children and youth.

Offering specialized services specifically geared towards sexually exploited youth through federal programs, such as FBI's Innocence Lost or OJJDP Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force, to several HHS Runaway and Homeless Youth Grantees.

During 2011, the HHS continued to support anti-trafficking efforts by awarding grants:

On July 1, 2011, HHS awarded $3 million in grants to 11 organizations for the Rescue and Restore Victims of Human Trafficking Regional Program. The central purpose of these grants is to increase the identification and protection of human trafficking victims in the United States and to increase public awareness about human trafficking. The grantees are responsible for leading or participating in an anti-human trafficking coalition, conducting public awareness activities, and providing training and technical assistance on human trafficking issues to local organizations. Each grantee must sub-award at least 60 percent of grant funds received to local organizations that can identify and/or work with victims of human trafficking.

On September 27, 2011, HHS awarded $4.7 million in grants to three organizations for its National Human Trafficking Victim Assistance Program. The central purpose of these grants is to provide comprehensive case management services on a per capita basis to foreign victims and potential victims of trafficking seeking HHS certification in any location in the United States.

On September 29, 2011, HHS awarded $799,333 for a second-year continuation grant to Polaris Project, a D.C.-based anti-trafficking organization, to operate the NHTRC. The NHTRC is a dedicated, toll-free, U.S. national telephone hotline (1-888-3737-888) that provides emergency assistance 24 hours a day, seven days a week, every day of the year. Polaris Project has been operating the hotline since December 2007. The NHTRC provides service referrals for victims, passes on tips to law enforcement agents, and provides information and training on human trafficking. In FY 2011, Polaris Project created nine online trainings that are available on its website (<http://www.traffickingresourcecenter.org>), and it sent 12 monthly newsletters on trafficking issues to its listserv of 5,522 members. Polaris Project added a feature to the NHTRC website that allows web users to report possible tips of trafficking cases to the NHTRC via an online reporting form. Polaris passes on many of these tips to law enforcement.

During 2011, the HHS/ACF Regions continued to support anti-trafficking efforts by:

Identifying points of contact for each HHS/ACF Regional Office to coordinate with the ACF Anti-Trafficking in Persons Division, sharing information regarding anti-human trafficking training opportunities and developing the network of resources available to those serving trafficking victims.

HHS/ACF Regional Offices also hosted anti-trafficking trainings or meetings including the following:

ACF Region II (New York; New Jersey; New York; Puerto Rico; the Virgin Islands): On December 16, 2011, ACF Region II hosted the first of an HHS-sponsored conference call series for ACF regions to explore issues and approaches to working with underserved populations. This particular session focused on Responding to the Issue of Domestic Violence Awareness among Service Providers Working with Refugees and Immigrants with presentations by stakeholder organizations such as the Asian and Pacific Islander Institute on Domestic Violence; Casa de Esperanza; the National Resource Center on Domestic Violence; and the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society. Upcoming 2012 sessions include Anti-Trafficking 101, and Human Trafficking and Native Americans.

ACF Region IV (Atlanta; Alabama; Florida; Georgia; Kentucky; Mississippi; North Carolina; South Carolina; Tennessee): In September 2011, the ACF Region IV office hosted a Strengthening Families State Forum in Columbia, South Carolina during which a DOJ attorney presented on human trafficking to approximately 70 community and faith based organizations, including Head Start.

ACF Region V (Chicago; Illinois; Indiana; Michigan; Minnesota; Ohio; Wisconsin): ACF Region V Office and the Illinois Rescue and Restore hosted its first in a series of Lunch and Learns on anti-trafficking in persons on April 25, 2011. Basic information on human trafficking, including how to identify victims, was provided. ACF Region V hosted Illinois Rescue and Restore Coalition meetings. At these meetings, Illinois Department of Human Services staff and ACF Regional staff facilitated meetings with discussion on local efforts to enhance statewide anti-trafficking strategies, including the current efforts of the coalition's Prevention and Intervention Action Teams and training opportunities for coalition members. The ACF Region V Office and the Illinois Department of Human Services Rescue and Restore Coalition hosted the Chicago Alliance Against Sexual Exploitation (CAASE) a train-the-trainer seminar on a youth prevention curriculum, Empowering Young Men to End Sexual Exploitation the first curriculum in the country that directly addresses demand deterrence for commercial sexual exploitation and human trafficking with young men. The three educational goals of the curriculum are: 1) raising awareness among high school age students about the harms of the sex trade; 2) helping young men understand how our culture pressures them to support and engage in sexually exploitive acts; and 3) empowering young men to identify tangible actions they can take to help eliminate sexual exploitation in their school, community, and city. Regional staff and coalition members were trained on becoming facilitators of this curriculum in schools and youth settings.

ACF Region VI (Dallas; Arkansas; Louisiana; New Mexico; Oklahoma; Texas): The ACF Region VI Federal Partners Collaboration Workgroup hosted an information sharing/training meeting on adult human trafficking. Presenters included the Region VI Regional Directors office, the HHS/HRSA Rural Health/Border Director, the Dallas Police Vice Unit/Strategic Deployment, and Mosaic Family Services.

ACF Region VII (Kansas City; Iowa; Kansas; Missouri; Nebraska): The ACF Region VII Office facilitated a panel discussion on human trafficking during the Region V and VII TANF Directors Technical Assistance meeting. The office also co-hosted a Region VII Human Trafficking Workshop in collaboration with HHS Office on Womens Health, and DOLs Womens Bureau in Kansas City, Kansas. They hosted visitors from China through the International Visitors Council of Greater Kansas City and provided an overview of Human Trafficking Victim services and support in the metropolitan Kansas City Area.

ACF Region VIII (Denver; Colorado; Montana; North Dakota; South Dakota; Utah; Wyoming): On June 2-3, 2011, the ACF Region VIII office conducted two classes for its staff on human trafficking.

ACF Region IX (San Francisco; Arizona; California; Hawaii; Nevada; American Samoa; Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands; Federated States of Micronesia; Guam; Marshall Islands; Republic of Palau): With representatives from Congresswoman Nancy Pelosi's office, ACF Region IX met with a Human Trafficking Delegation from South Korea on July 28, 2011, in San Francisco. The Delegation was visiting as part of DOS's International Visitor Leadership Program. Participants discussed trafficking programs and services, cultural factors, practices that prevent victims from accessing assistance, and laws regarding protection.

On December 16, 2011, ACF Region IX staff met with the Asian and Pacific Islander Institute on Domestic Violence (San Francisco) to discuss and begin to explore sexual exploitation and trafficking of youth to the Bay Area, including convening meetings with refugee, domestic violence, trafficking, and AAPI organizations.

ACF Region X (Seattle: Alaska; Idaho; Oregon; Washington): ACF Region X Office collaborated with the Director of the Human Services Department for the City of Seattle on their strategic plan, and continues to provide the federal perspective on the steering committee for the city's projects, which serve local commercially- and sexually-exploited youth. Region X staff participates in local community fairs, along with DOJ and non-profits, to outreach to community members on the Rescue and Restore Campaign, and provides Rescue and Restore campaign materials. Region X staff support the efforts of Washington Engage, a local non-profit group, to develop a Code of Conduct for small to medium sized businesses, to raise awareness in the business community and to provide a standard for good businesses. The code will provide a zero-tolerance trafficking policy standard. The hope is that peer-to-peer influence will shift current practices in the local business community so that trafficking will be reported, remediated, and prevented more readily. The Code provides a means for the business community to communicate standards of practice for employees, suppliers, customers, and peers. Regional Office staff networked with the Anti-Human Trafficking Coalition in Anchorage, Alaska. Catholic Social Services (an ORR grantee) partners with the Anchorage Police Department and the FBI to identify and provide services to victims of human trafficking due to increased incidents of trafficking of Alaska Native girls who come to Anchorage from Alaska Native villages.

During FY 2011, HHS staff conducted trainings on human trafficking in several anti-trafficking conferences including:

The 2011 Office of Womens Health Conference, held in Alexandria on June 27-28. HHS presented at a poster session during the conference and hosted an information table to provide ATIPs public awareness materials. Multiple HHS program staff, HHS Regional Office staff, and state and local representatives indicated that they either have been using ATIPs Rescue and Restore information or plan to greatly expand the use of the materials and information, including for state-wide trafficking training for all state government employees in Georgia and Mississippi.

HHS spoke on accessing federal benefits and services for trafficking victims at an anti-human trafficking conference in Austin, TX. Attendees at the conference included law enforcement officers, prosecutors, service providers, state legislators, and other policy experts.

HHS discussed Federal benefits and services for trafficking victims and participated on the panel with staff from DOJ HTPU and OVC, FBI, and ICE at the National Center for Victims of Crimes annual conference held in Washington, D.C.

Department of Transportation

During this past year, the Department of Transportation formed an interdepartmental team to explore ways through which DOT can raise awareness and be helpful in addressing the role of transportation in human trafficking. The Secretary of Transportation Ray LaHood is concerned that the perpetrators of this crime are using our transportation system as their means to achieve harmful and unlawful ends. This issue was brought to the Department's attention by some of our stakeholders, representing a range of transportation modes.

Over a number of months, DOT partnered with the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) and Customs and Border Protection (CBP) in the Blue Lightning campaign. Specifically, DOT's Federal Aviation Administration worked with DHS and CBP to establish in-flight advanced reporting procedures via flight deck communications that will reduce the response time for law enforcement. This voluntary, advance reporting allows CBP to research and formulate an appropriate response, including coordination with other federal agencies as needed. Airline personnel may report suspected human trafficking via DHS's ICE Homeland Security Investigations (HSI) toll-free tip line, the online tip form, an internationally available tip line number, or through flight deck communications. In addition to the Blue Lighting Initiative, DOT is now reviewing how it can provide training for DOT employees, and is working with all of our modes of transportation - surface, air and sea - on other potential initiatives.

Department of Education

The Department of Education (ED) remains an active participant in a number of groups addressing the exploitation and abuse of youth. One immediate goal is to provide school districts with expanded services to address the issue of trafficking in youth.

The Office of Safe and Healthy Students (OSHS, previously the Office of Safe and Drug-Free Schools) was reorganized under the Office of Elementary and Secondary Education at ED. However, the program office is continuing its strategy to consolidate and augment its existing work around child safety to build a more comprehensive program to educate school districts about human trafficking and the commercial sexual exploitation of children. Over the past year, ED accomplished the following on the topic of human trafficking:

OSHS developed web pages under the heading: The Prostitution of Children and Forced Child Labor or Human Trafficking. The web pages are presented on the Readiness and Emergency Management for Schools (REMS) Technical Assistance Center website. The web pages include in-depth information describing human trafficking, the extent to which it is an issue across the nation, its impact on schools, and strategies for addressing it in a school setting (i.e. identification and reporting). The web pages include interactive links and information regarding federal agencies and organizations involved with human trafficking issues, available resources, and related publications and reports. The pages are accessible at http://rems.ed.gov/index.php?page=resources_Additionalion=1i1.

A National Conference sponsored by OSHS was held in the Washington, D.C. area, August 8-10, 2011. The conference was attended by nearly 2,000 professionals carrying out educational program activities in school districts across the country and in postsecondary institutions. Program areas included: school improvement, support, and safety; bullying, harassment, and violence prevention; health, mental health, physical education, and counseling in schools; alcohol and drug prevention; and readiness and emergency management for schools. The conference agenda included larger institutes and smaller workshops to elevate public awareness about trafficking and to highlight the positive impacts of domestic anti-trafficking programs. Targeted topics on trafficking included the commercial sexual exploitation of children and ways that schools can join the fight to end modern day slavery.

Grossmont Union High School District (San Diego, CA), with assistance from OSHS, the program office, developed a 90-minute training video to instruct school staff on how to identify commercial sexually exploited children and what to do when they are identified. The REMS Technical Assistance Center plans to assist in the distribution of these training materials.

Staff worked closely with the Office on Violence Against Women on issues related to sexual abuse and assault and, through several mechanisms including webinars and listserv articles, introduced and addressed trafficking in persons.

Announcements about training opportunities, reports, and other publications about trafficking in persons were included in program office publications, including the Safe and Supportive Schools Newsletter and the Prevention Newsletter. The newsletters are distributed through a very large and active listserv that is used as a mechanism to notify individuals about training opportunities, on-going research, new publications, and grant opportunities. The announcements included information about the issuance of a letter and fact sheet on trafficking; and the release and sharing of information about other agencies anti-trafficking in persons materials, conferences, trainings, and funding opportunities (i.e., HHS opportunities for national human trafficking victim assistance program, DHS online training through the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center, etc.).

OSHS staff actively participate in the Missing and Exploited Children Federal Working Group sponsored by the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention; the Senior Policy Operating Group sponsored by the Department of State; the Department of Justice External Strategy Working Group; the Teen Dating Violence Interagency Working Group sponsored by the National Institute of Justice; among others.

ED continues to make progress on several endeavors previously reported:

Dissemination of fact sheet that describes how human trafficking affects schools, the signs that school staff should be aware of, and how to report incidents of trafficking (<http://www2.ed.gov/about/offices/list/osdfs/factsheet.html>).

Ensuring that materials on ED web pages is accurate and up-to-date and includes information and consolidated resources relevant to child trafficking http://rems.ed.gov/index.php?page=resources_Additionalion=1i1.

Identifying what school districts are doing that is effective in addressing the trafficking problem, including the use of OSHS listserv to solicit ideas about what is working.

Planning a webinar series created in collaboration with grantees already working on issues of child trafficking.

In addition to the accomplishments listed, ED will continue to focus on the following: providing outreach to schools to inform school leaders, staff, students, and parents about the issue of human trafficking; helping schools understand how the issue is related to teaching and learning and why it is important for schools to address; providing school security and police with information, additional assistance, and resources; and assisting other federal agencies in the dissemination of information about their efforts.

Department of Homeland Security

DHS increased its capacity to combat human trafficking through the strengthening of the DHS Blue Campaign, an initiative to coordinate and enhance departmental efforts to address human trafficking. Seventeen components collaborated on an integrated DHS strategy to combat human trafficking focusing on prevention of the crime, protection of victims, assistance in the prosecution of perpetrators and partnering with other law enforcement agencies and the public.

Training

DHS, in collaboration with DOS and with input from the interagency, developed an unprecedented interactive online training for the general public. The 15-minute training provides an overview of human trafficking, describes common indicators, and explains how to report tips to law enforcement. The training is available at (www.dhs.gov/humantrafficking).

DHS, in collaboration with DOS and with input from other agencies, produced an online training for the federal acquisition workforce on combating human trafficking using the pertinent provisions of the FAR. In addition to other remedies available to the government, the FAR articulates specific remedies for use if contractors engage in human trafficking, to include suspension or debarment. The training is accessible to the federal acquisition workforce on the Federal Acquisition Institute Training Application System at (<https://www.atrs.army.mil/faitas/>).

U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP) worked with DOT to launch the Blue Lightning Initiative, an in-flight protocol and a training program to educate airline employees on how to identify human trafficking in airports or during flights and how to notify law enforcement. This voluntary, advanced reporting allows CBP to research and formulate an appropriate response, including coordination with other federal agencies as needed. Airline personnel may report suspected human trafficking via the ICE Homeland Security Investigations (HSI) toll-free tip line, the online tip form, an internationally available tip line number, or through flight deck communications.

DHS developed a computer-based training for DHS personnel who might encounter human trafficking within their scope of work. The online course trains employees in their anti-trafficking roles and responsibilities and familiarizes them with the roles and responsibilities of their colleagues throughout DHS. The Department also developed computer-based training for all DHS personnel on the statutory confidentiality provisions related to applicants for certain immigration benefits who are victims of trafficking, domestic violence, and other crimes.

The Federal Law Enforcement Training Center (FLETC) conducted numerous in-person trainings on identifying indicators of human trafficking, case-studies of trafficking cases and immigration relief available to trafficked victims as part of its State and Local Law Enforcement Training Symposiums. FLETC has trained over 500 officers who attended these symposiums in Laredo, Texas; Gulf Shores, Alabama; Traverse City, Michigan; Virginia Beach, VA; and Maui, HI.

USCIS conducted numerous in-person and web-based trainings and presentations on combating human trafficking and on immigration benefits for victims, including to federal, state, and local law enforcement, immigration advocates and attorneys, judges, and more. Personnel traveled and conducted in-person trainings in cities across the United States, including in Boston, Chicago, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Dallas, Phoenix, Flagstaff, Atlanta, Miami, Seattle, Portland, Philadelphia, Oklahoma City, Tulsa, and Washington, D.C.

USCIS conducted regular bimonthly WebEx trainings for federal, state and local law enforcement specific to law enforcement focused on concerns and issues unique to law enforcements role, rights, and responsibilities in the T and U visa programs, while also highlighting the certification process on the I-914B and I-918B law enforcement certification forms.

USCIS personnel conducted training in Asylum field offices on identifying trafficking victims in the context of affirmative asylum adjudications. All eight asylum offices have received this training. Training was also conducted on the asylum-related provisions of the William Wilberforce Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2008 (TVPRA). Finally, USCIS personnel presented a module on trafficking issues at the Asylum Officer Basic Training Course, which is taken by all newly hired asylum officers. Each asylum office has designated a trafficking point of contact, and these points of contact have established communication with their local ICE SAC trafficking points of contact and local ICE Victim Assistance Coordinators to establish referral and information-sharing mechanisms on trafficking-related cases.

ICE conducted trainings and distributed materials throughout the United States and around the world to raise awareness among law enforcement and the public about how to identify human trafficking and provide tips to law enforcement. In FY 2011, ICE trained or provided anti-human trafficking materials to over 47,000 people.

ICE provided international training and outreach on international forced child labor, trafficking in persons, and child sex tourism to over 1,000 foreign officials in Bahamas, Barbados, Cambodia, Chile, Costa Rica, Egypt, El Salvador, Guatemala, Hungary, Kosovo, Peru, the Philippines, Singapore, and Thailand. ICE collaborated with foreign Cabinet-level officials in the respective host countries to engage appropriate and specialized law enforcement entities to participate in these prosecution, prevention, and protection efforts. This collaboration led to several joint or ICE-assisted foreign investigations.

Working jointly with the Regional Conference on Migration (RCM), ICE conducted an advanced and interactive training in Costa Rica regarding Trafficking in Persons, Forced Child Labor, and Child Sex Tourism Investigations to law enforcement and prosecutors from 10 different countries in this multilateral forum.

Working jointly with the International Organization for Migration (IOM) and Cabinet-level officials from seven Central American countries, ICE conducted advanced training in Costa Rica regarding Trafficking in Persons, Forced Child Labor, and Child Sex Tourism Investigations. The training to foreign law enforcement and prosecutors focused on investigative efforts, victim identification and protection, as well as multilateral efforts within the region.

Public Awareness and Engagement

DHS conducted a stakeholder meeting in January 2012. During the meeting, representatives from DOS, DOJ, DOL, HHS, DOT, and DHS made announcements and/or participated in a listening session on issues related to victim services and ongoing efforts to prevent and combat human trafficking.

DHS held a roundtable discussion with Secretary Napolitano on human trafficking at the White House in January of 2012. Representatives from the retail, hotel and airline industries, state, local and tribal law enforcement and NGOs discussed ways they could work to raise awareness and training on human trafficking.

This year, CBP released the Dont Be Fooled public awareness campaign in the United States. As part of DHS's continued efforts to engage a broader audience in efforts to combat human trafficking, "Dont Be Fooled" utilized award-winning public service announcements (PSAs) to educate the public on human trafficking in targeted communities throughout the country. The PSAs aired in Florida, Georgia, and the Washington, D.C. area.

CBP developed a public awareness video message that was played on the CNN Airport Network in airports throughout the country for the duration of the year. CBP also posted anti-human trafficking public awareness materials in ports of entry around the United States.

ICE produced advertisements for the 2010 and 2011 Hidden In Plain Sight campaign, which was featured in 64 different newspapers in languages including English, Chinese, Korean, Spanish, and Thai. The campaign reached an estimated five million people. The goal of the campaign was to alert the public about the existence of human trafficking in communities nationwide and to prompt a call to action for individuals who encounter possible victims.

DHS provides a suite of materials to enhance public awareness and explain the types of services and resources that are available to victims of human trafficking. These materials are disseminated across the United States, are available for order, and are regularly distributed to domestic embassies by DOS.

USCIS developed a concise document for a law enforcement audience about immigration options for victims of crime, highlighting the law enforcement role, rights and responsibilities in the T and U visa programs and addressing frequently asked questions. This product was developed in response to requests by stakeholders for USCIS to address some misconceptions and spread awareness among law enforcement agencies.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), U.S. Fire Administration (USFA), and the Office of Health Affairs (OHA) created a video for first responders that explains what indicators of human trafficking they might encounter and what they can do to direct victims to services. This video was developed as a result of feedback from stakeholders.

CBP created indicator cards for the Blue Lightning Initiative, featuring human trafficking indicators that may be seen in airports or on airplanes.

FEMA, USFA, and OHA tailored indicator cards to include health-related human trafficking indicators that first responders, such as firefighters and EMTs, may notice.

The DHS Office of Faith Based and Neighborhood Partnerships produced an informational pamphlet on combating human trafficking geared toward the specific needs and interests of faith-based constituencies.

DHS created a one-page fact sheet for any business or community organization to provide a brief 3-5 minute training.

USCIS developed a video for the public about the immigration options available to victims of crime, including human trafficking. DHS also created a training video for first responders that explains what indicators of human trafficking they might encounter and what they can do to help victims. The videos are available online.

DHS continues to meet with its federal partners, nongovernmental and community organizations, and private sector partners to receive stakeholder feedback, individually, on its anti-trafficking programs and to help shape future initiatives. The semi-annual stakeholder meetings facilitate targeted outreach efforts, including engagement with emergency management and medical professionals.

DHS has also performed outreach to private companies to increase their awareness of human trafficking. In January of 2012, the DHS U.S. Fire Administration distributed human trafficking training materials to approximately 18,000 hotel and motel properties.

USCIS and ICE participated in an MSNBC-TV story about the experience of victims of human trafficking, adjudication of the T visa, and perpetrator justice. USCIS allowed the reporter to interview personnel at the Vermont Service Center, which adjudicates all T and U visa relief. This is the first time the broadcast media has been allowed to record video inside the Vermont Service Center. MSNBC broadcasted the segment as part of its series, Enslaved in America. DHS continues to raise awareness and engage a larger audience through use of social media. The Blue Campaign Facebook Page has reached over 1,200 likes and regularly posts human trafficking indicators, tips on how to report suspected human trafficking, and the latest news on Blue Campaign initiatives.

Victim Assistance and Perpetrator Justice

Together with Attorney General Eric Holder and DOL Secretary Hilda Solis, DHS Secretary Janet Napolitano announced the initiation of ACTeams in six districts around the country. These specialized teams of representatives from DHS, DOJ, and DOL receive support from foremost technical experts on human trafficking investigations, prosecutions, and victim assistance.

ICE has expanded its Homeland Security Investigations Tip Line to include an online submission form. Individuals around the world can report suspicious criminal activity, including human trafficking, through a phone line or online form 24 hours a day, seven days a week. Highly trained specialists take reports from both the public and law enforcement agencies on possible violations of more than 400 laws enforced by ICE. Report at (866) 347-2423 or www.ice.gov/tips.

ICE conducted more investigations containing a nexus to human trafficking this year than ever before, resulting in 722 initiated cases, 271 convictions, and seized assets of over $2,000,000. In recognition of the needs and unique challenges of interviewing trafficked minors and other child and special needs victims, ICE doubled the number of Forensic Interview Specialists available to support ICE-led investigations.

ICE HSI amended and re-issued the Continued Presence Protocol, which included guidance to law enforcement agencies on victims of human trafficking who have filed a civil action and significant public benefit parole for family members of human trafficking victims who have received Continued Presence.

For the second year in a row, USCIS reached the annual statutory cap for U visas (10,000), which provide relief for victims who cooperate in the investigation or prosecution of certain crimes, including human trafficking and domestic violence. USCIS also saw an increase in T visa applications, which are set aside specifically for victims of human trafficking.

USCIS implemented greater confidentiality protections for victims with pending or approved applications for immigration relief. The Central Index System database now has a specific code that alerts DHS personnel when an individual is covered by the confidentiality provisions associated with Violence Against Women Act self-petitions or T or U nonimmigrant status petitions.

As part of the ICE Victim Assistance Program, two full-time Forensic Interview Specialists are available to conduct developmentally-appropriate, legally-defensible, victim- and culturally-sensitive forensic interviews for all ICE investigations, domestically and internationally. Interviews can be conducted in English and Spanish, or in any language through an interpreter.

ICE has designated 39 specially trained human trafficking subject matter experts at least one in every ICE Special Agent in Charge office. These individuals are trained to handle human trafficking leads, address urgent victim needs appropriately, and serve as designated points of contact for local officers and leads.

DHS stood up a cross-component working group in July 2011 to proactively address concerns and ensure that age-appropriate care and services are provided to unaccompanied alien children encountered by DHS personnel. The working group contains subcommittees tasked with addressing three primary areas for improvement in the management of unaccompanied alien children: screening and training, including on child-trafficking victims; short-term care and custody; and external coordination.

The US Coast Guard Intelligence Coordination Center, in cooperation with the Human Smuggling and Trafficking Center (HSTC), co-hosted the seventh Maritime Migration and Human Smuggling and Trafficking Conference at the National Maritime Intelligence Center in Suitland, Maryland. The three-day conference attracted over 80 representatives from 18 U.S. and nine Canadian government law enforcement and intelligence community agencies. The Conference addressed Intelligence Community (IC) Migration and Human and Smuggling Trafficking issues. The conference also provided a forum for analyst and operator dialogue, discussion of best practices, and IC/law enforcement networking.

ICE continues to play a leading role in the HSTC, which was established to achieve greater integration and overall effectiveness in the U.S. government's efforts to combat human smuggling, trafficking in persons, and clandestine terrorist travel. The HSTC coordinates activities to ensure that efforts are addressed globally. It also brings together federal agency subject matter experts from the policy, law enforcement, intelligence, and diplomatic arenas to work together and leverage all participating agencies' expertise and authorities to address the global threat of illicit travel.

Office of the Director of National Intelligence

The Office of the Director of National Intelligence (ODNI) took steps to raise the profile on human trafficking activities across the Intelligence Community, which included efforts to link policy makers with members of the Intelligence Community.

ODNI and DOSs INR and TIP Office held a small targeted seminar on human trafficking and intelligence. Members of the intelligence community and DOS officers gathered to discuss trafficking-related intelligence, with the goal of raising the intelligence community's awareness about this issue.

U.S. Agency for International Development

On February 23, 2012, USAID launched the new Counter-Trafficking in Persons Policy. The policy enables the Agency to be a catalytic partner in C-TIP, reinvigorating and focusing our efforts on concrete, measurable principles and objectives. These include integrating counter-trafficking activities across development sectors, improving program design to capture lessons learned and best practices; enhancing institutional accountability within USAID to address trafficking through training and coordination; increasing investments in countries with global strategic importance and significant trafficking problems, as well as in conflict and crisis-affected areas; leveraging innovation and technology and partnering with the private sector. The policy, led by the Bureau for Democracy, Conflict, and Humanitarian Assistance (DCHA), in partnership with the Bureau for Policy, Planning, and Learning, reflects the Agency's renewed commitment to being a leader in this field.

USAID's new policy builds on the Counter-Trafficking Code of Conduct that the Agency launched in February 2011 in commemoration of National Freedom Day. The Code holds all employees to the same high ethical standard with respect to human trafficking that the Agency requires of its contractors and grantees through its application of the FAR and TVPA clauses. The Code prohibits employees from engaging in actions fostering trafficking and requires them to report suspected cases. In the Code, the Agency pledges to educate personnel and designate Counter-Trafficking Coordinators in Missions.

In 2011, USAID moved forward to train Agency personnel about trafficking, with a particular focus on the Agency's Counter Trafficking Code of Conduct. In February 2011, USAID conducted a two and a half day regional Latin America and Caribbean counter-trafficking training in Guatemala attended by participants representing four USAID missions, two U.S. embassies, Immigration and Customs Enforcement, implementing partner organizations, and the Government of Guatemala.

In 2011, DCHA, working in collaboration with Regional Bureau TIP Advisors, the General Counsel's office and the Bureau for Human Resources, incorporated trafficking into agency-wide ethics training and the Agency's mandatory New Employee Orientation training for civil servants. Additionally, DCHA is currently supporting the development of an online counter-trafficking training module for Agency personnel that will be launched later in 2012 and revising the two and a half day TIP training to incorporate the principles and objectives of the new C-TIP Policy.

DCHA is developing a Counter-Trafficking Field Guide that will be published later in 2012. The Guide will be distributed to USAID Missions and Washington operating units, as well as to implementing and donor partners, to aid in designing and monitoring effective counter-trafficking programs that are consistent with the principles and objectives of the C-TIP Policy.

In the field, USAID invested in innovation and technology to combat trafficking. For example, in June 2011, DCHA launched the Stop Trafficking App Challenge, completing phase I of the Using Technology to Combat Trafficking in Persons in Russia project that began in September 2010. Under the Agency's Global Broadband and Innovations Alliance, DCHA, NetHope, and the Demi and Ashton Foundation have partnered to support a mobile app to combat trafficking in Russia. The App will be piloted in Moscow in 2012.

USAID continued to leverage private sector partnerships to combat trafficking. The Agency continues to support a multimedia trafficking awareness campaign across Asia through a public private partnership with MTV Exit. This $8 million USAID investment has leveraged $100 million in contributions from other donors. Impact assessments of the campaign, which has reached millions of households through short videos, documentaries, and online content and over 650,000 youth through concerts, revealed that individuals exposed to the campaign had a substantially greater understanding of the dangers of trafficking than those not exposed. In Cambodia, USAID is investing in additional MTV Exit awareness activities in 2012. DCHA and the Europe and Eurasia Bureau (EandE) are currently expanding the MTV Exit campaign to Russia.

USAID remained committed to strengthening regional approaches to most effectively combat cross-border trafficking. In South Eastern Europe, for example, EandE supported a comprehensive cross-border referral mechanism for trafficking victims in ten countries. The referral guidelines and protocols helped shape local laws, including several National Action Plans to Combat Trafficking.

USAID supported programs to strengthen local and host government partnerships and to build local capacity to combat trafficking, for example:

In the Democratic Republic of Congo, USAID trained Congolese researchers to collect data to assess the country's complex human trafficking situation. Their findings will be released in a 2012 report to inform Congolese government and stakeholders and guide U.S. programming decisions moving forward.

In Mexico, USAID provided technical support to the Puebla State Congress for the drafting and approval of reforms to trafficking in persons legislation initially passed in 2010. This reform was the first of its kind in Mexico, consolidating several issues related to C-TIP into a single legislative package. This groundbreaking legislation provides a clear, unified legal framework for the prosecution and punishment of traffickers and also provides for prevention, protection, and victims assistance programs.

In Cambodia, USAID supported extensive counter-trafficking training, including: 1) the training of 130 members of the National Committee and Provincial Committee on Trafficking in Persons, who were trained on safe migration and National Minimum Standards for the Protection of the Rights of Victims of Trafficking; 2) the training of 485 government and 75 NGO social workers on the National Minimum Standards for the Protection of the Rights of Victims of Trafficking; 3) 100 people, either victims of trafficking or those vulnerable to trafficking, received vocational training assistance; 4) the training of 119 police officers from the Criminal Investigation Department and Anti-Human Trafficking Department on the Trafficking in Persons law, investigation techniques, and victim protection; and 5) the production of two training films for frontline service providers, one focusing on post-rescue victim rehabilitation and the other on safe migration practices.

USAID/Ghana, with technical assistance from DCHA, is incorporating counter-trafficking language into its solicitations for Feed the Future projects. The language will require all Feed the Future project implementers to conduct a TIP assessment in the sector in which they will work (fishing, rice, soya, etc.) prior to starting project activities. If TIP is a problem in their sector, implementers will be required to integrate C-TIP activities into their Feed the Future programs.

Equal Employment Opportunity Commission

The EEOC is responsible for enforcing federal laws that make it illegal to discriminate against a job applicant or an employee because of the person's race, color, religion, sex (including sexual harassment and pregnancy), national origin, age (40 or older), disability, or genetic information. It is also illegal to discriminate against a person because the person complained about discrimination, filed a charge of discrimination, or participated in an employment discrimination investigation or lawsuit. Most employers with at least 15 employees are covered by EEOC-enforced laws (20 employees in age discrimination cases). Most labor unions and employment agencies are also covered. The laws apply to all types of work situations, including hiring, firing, promotions, harassment, training, wages, and benefits.

Because its core mission is to protect people from unlawful employment discrimination, the EEOC is well situated to partner with its sister agencies in combating trafficking. What first presents itself as sexual harassment, for example, may reveal through investigation a situation of coerced labor. Thus, the EEOC staff needs to be well-versed in trafficking indicators. They can insure that attorneys representing clients before the Commission have access to training, that the resources of state and local fair employment agencies are brought to bear, and that those offices around the country can participate in the federally-funded trafficking task forces. With these knowledge bases and proper resources, the Commission and its partners in civil enforcement could dramatically increase the number of trafficking victims identified and the remedies obtained for those victims. Whether or not a criminal trafficking prosecution is pursued in a particular case, civil enforcement and litigation of anti-discrimination laws can be important to vindicating the federal interest and obtaining civil remedies, as has been the case in workplaces as diverse as egg farms, welding yards, and garment factories.

Public Meeting of the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission

In January 2011, designated by President Obama as National Slavery and Human Trafficking Prevention Month, the EEOC held a meeting designed to educate and inform the public about the problem of labor trafficking and the EEOCs role in combating the problem. It provided a public forum for participants to discuss the current state of the problem, challenges, opportunities, and recommendations to EEOC Commissioners and staff for how to improve its work in this area. The meeting opened with testimony by the Ambassador-at-Large in the Department of States Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. DOJ's Hilary Axam provided additional testimony concerning the federal governments role in ending human trafficking. EEOC Regional Attorney Anna Park and Sathaporn Pronsririrak, one of more than 48 workers victimized by modern slavery whose claims were litigated by EEOC in EEOC v. Trans Bay Steel, also testified. Finally, Panida Rzonca, Program Associate from the Thai Community Development Center, testified about her organizations work on the Trans Bay Steel case and Ana Vallejo, Supervising Attorney from the Florida Immigrant Advocacy Center, testified about the subject of trafficking in persons in the context of the agricultural industry. A transcript of the meeting and the full text of the witnesses written testimony may be accessed at (<http://eeoc.gov/eeoc/meetings/1-19-11/index.cfm>).

Related Litigation and Enforcement Activities

EEOC v. Global Horizons

In April 2011, the EEOC filed suits in federal district courts in Hawaii (Civ. No. CV-11-00257-DAE-RLP) and Washington (Civ No. 2:11-cv-03045-EFS) against Global Horizons (a farm labor contractor) and eight farms on behalf of 249 Thai male Charging Parties and a class of similarly situated Thai workers. The EEOC has alleged that Global Horizons and the farms violated Title VII by subjecting workers to a pattern or practice of discrimination based on national origin (Thai) and race (Asian), including harassment, setting different terms and conditions of employment including pay and constructive discharge. EEOC also alleged that the employers retaliated against the Thai workers by threatening them with or subjecting them to suspension from work, deportation, and physical harm.

EEOC v. Signal International

In April 2011, the EEOC filed suit in federal district court in Mississippi (Civ. No. 11-cv-00179) charging that Signal International, a marine services company with facilities along the Gulf Coast, subjected at least 500 Indian welders and pipe-fitters at its Mississippi and Texas locations to segregated facilities and discriminatory terms and conditions of employment in violation of Title VII. The EEOCs suit alleges that these workers, brought into the country by a separate entity not part of the lawsuit, were required to live in segregated man camps enclosed by fences; were charged an inordinate amount for substandard housing and unwholesome food; were demeaned by being referred to by numbers instead of their names; and, in some cases, were subjected to unlawful retaliation for complaining about the substandard conditions and discrimination.

Public Education, Outreach, and Training

EEOCs Office of Communications and Public Affairs informed media outlets across the country about the January Commission meeting and the litigation against Global Horizons and Signal International.

<http://www.eeoc.gov//eeoc/newsroom/release/4-20-11b.cfm><http://www.eeoc.gov//eeoc/newsroom/release/4-20-11a.cfm>

Commissioner Stuart J. Ishimaru is leading EEOCs Immigrant Worker Team (IWT), a new nationwide convening designed to strengthen enforcement of Title VII's prohibitions against national origin discrimination and develop and implement a coordinated effort to combat discriminatory employment practices affecting immigrant workers, including human trafficking. IWT will assess the Commissions outreach to immigrant workers, and related training, data collection, and enforcement activities.

An EEOC delegation, led by Commissioner Ishimaru, attended the Freedom Networks Conference on Human Trafficking in March 2011. The Conference presenters and materials helped to inform the work of the IWT, expanded participants understanding of human trafficking issues, and allowed EEOC leadership and staff to network with representatives from other agencies and NGOs combating trafficking.

The EEOCs New Investigator Training was expanded to include information about the unique aspects of human trafficking cases. This training was conducted in March 2011 for 60 newly hired EEOC Investigators.

EEOC also trained representatives of state and local Fair Employment Practice Agencies (FEPAs) and Tribal Employee Rights Organizations (TEROs) in the identification, investigation and eradication of human trafficking (FEPAs and TEROs partner with the EEOC to remedy employment discrimination). A plenary session of the EEOCs National Fair Employment Practices Agencies Training Conference focused on human trafficking issues and was attended by approximately 120 of its enforcement partners from state and local anti-discrimination agencies.

EEOCs emphasis on the identification and investigation of human trafficking violations was presented to all EEOC District Directors and Regional Attorneys at the District Directors/Regional Attorneys meeting held in July 2011. The panel included Commissioner Stuart Ishimaru, General Counsel P. David Lopez, and Jennifer Sultan from DOJ's Office of Special Counsel.

To ensure the proper identification and tracking of human trafficking charges, EEOC is in the process of making changes to its charge data system, which will allow it to follow easily and in a timely manner human trafficking charges throughout the investigative and litigation process.

EEOC field offices have become members of external human trafficking task forces in their respective states, which comprise NGOs that assist trafficking victims and law enforcement agencies.

Outreach has been conducted nationwide by field offices to Hispanic rights groups, federal/state/local governmental agencies, educational associations, womens rights groups, and Asian American/Pacific Islander groups, on human trafficking issues. During 2011, EEOC representatives conducted 36 events conducted in communities impacted by human trafficking or reaching organizations that focus on trafficking issues. More than 1,100 people participated in these programs in 2011.

LOAD-DATE: March 15, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

181 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
States News ServiceMarch 15, 2012 ThursdaySECRETARY CLINTON: ANNUAL MEETING OF THE PRESIDENT'S INTERAGENCY TASK FORCE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS*BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 11737 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. Department of State:

Remarks

Hillary Rodham Clinton

Secretary of State

Eisenhower Executive Office Building

MS. JARRETT: Thank you. Welcome. Good morning, everyone. We want to welcome you to the White House for our annual Presidents Task Force to Combat and Monitor Trafficking of Persons. Were delighted to have it here hosted at the White House. Its indicative of the Presidents commitment to this issue, and we want to thank all of the members of the agencies who have joined us this morning for this meeting.

In 2008, the President spoke at Pastor Rick Warrens Saddleback Church, and he called human trafficking the modern-day enslavement of men, women, and children for sex or labor, and he referred to it as a debasement of our common humanity, which I think sums it up perfectly. As chair of the White House Council on Women and Girls, this issue is of particular importance to me as a leader but also to our council, which is represented by all of the agencies in the federal government as well. And its why were pleased to have you all here today.

We are confident with the Administration working together, with civil society, with not-for-profits, with the private sector, we can actually tackle this issue head on and conquer it. And were delighted to have here Secretary Clinton, who has chaired this task force, and Ill turn it over to her in a second. But I wanted to, by way of introduction, mention that yesterday we were at the State Department for a luncheon with Prime Minister Cameron, and he said about Secretary Clinton that she has been a strong advocate who is committed to the emancipation and empowerment of women. And I thought that that was a perfect way to describe one of her many roles and one that is particularly germane to the topic of this morning.

So with that, again I want to welcome everyone here and tell you how committed the President is to making sure that we are all collaborating and sharing information together and intending to conquer this issue head on. So with that, Ill turn it over to Secretary Clinton. Thank you.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you. Well, thank you very much Valerie. And thank you for hosting us here at the White House. This annual event is a good opportunity to hear about the progress that our government is making to combat modern slavery and to talk about our goals going forward. And so I very much appreciate the Presidents commitment to this work and the collaboration that has been accomplished throughout the United States Government. So with that, Im delighted to call this meeting to order.

I want to thank Ambassador CdeBaca and his staff not only for the work they put into staffing the task force, but for the zeal with which they lead this fight around the world. Of course, if this issue doesn't demand zealous advocacy, it's hard to figure out what does.

This September marks the 150th anniversary of the Preliminary Emancipation Proclamation. And it's a good time for us to recommit ourselves, not only to the promise of freedom, but to the work against ending modern slavery.

Around the world, as many as 27 million men, women, and children toil in bondage. This crime undermines economies and the rule of law. It shatters families and communities. It is an affront to our most fundamental values.

This issue is very near and dear to my heart, since the time I was first lady. And we began a full-hearted effort by our government both the executive branch and Congress to address this issue. And I've had the experience of meeting with survivors here at home and around the world. I've seen firsthand what a horrible toll this takes, and so I'm delighted that we have such a dedicated group of members.

This is a priority in the Obama Administration, starting with the President, as Valerie said. And the first time we convened the task force under this Administration, we laid out a set of commitments a call to action. And in answering that call, we've tried to elevate the fight against trafficking to the highest levels of policymaking.

This goes hand in hand. This is not an individual, one-off effort. This goes hand in hand with other work that we've been doing on behalf of women and girls and other marginalized people. The White House recently issued a National Action Plan on Women, Peace, and Security to ensure that women are full partners and participants in our efforts to reduce conflict and promote peace and prosperity around the world, because after all, modern slavery disproportionately affects women and girls. And as it does so, it disrupts family networks, and it undermines the foundation of stable economies and societies. So the Action Plan on Women, Peace, and Security contains specific steps to prevent human trafficking of women and children as a result of conflict and to provide assistance to victims.

The State Department has made the struggle against modern slavery an important part of our diplomatic engagement. Our annual Trafficking in Persons Report is the most comprehensive assessment of how well governments are doing to address this crime. The TIP Offices foreign assistance grants are making a difference in 37 countries, supporting programs that provide crucial assistance to survivors and help governments build their capacity to fight this crime. And thanks to our leadership, the international community is getting behind the effort. Nearly 140 countries have enacted modern anti-trafficking laws, and nearly 150 are party to the UN Trafficking in Persons Protocol.

And we've taken action here at home. For instance, we learned that survivors were being made to pay taxes on restitution payments from their abusers. And, well, some of the people in this room as well as colleagues from the Treasury Department who are not with us today saw the problem and said, This isn't right; we're going to do something about it. So now the Treasury Department has made clear that victims are not liable to pay taxes on the wages of slavery.

Another example: We thought it was unfair for diplomats who victimized their own domestic workers were, because of diplomatic immunity, virtually untouchable. So now, we're making sure that diplomats coming to this country understand their obligations and responsibilities, and we're taking action when we have evidence that they are not.

We're trying to ensure that resources and support are available to victims wherever we find them, and one of those resources is the Department of Health and Human Services National Human Trafficking Resource Center. Its operations have been expanded. It now fields an unprecedented number of calls. And it is really making a difference in reaching out to survivors and helping us prosecute abusers.

Other agencies led by the Department of Homeland Security recently held a public listening session to hear from stakeholders about new ideas for victim services, federal government engagement with local communities, outreach to at-risk groups, and NGO private sector initiatives. Now, we've also tried to streamline how we approach cases. And instead of a muddle of agencies claiming or rejecting different responsibilities, thanks to the Departments of Justice, Labor, and Homeland Security, we have in place in the Obama Administration efficient, coordinated, anti-trafficking teams, and they're making investigations and prosecutions more effective and helping victims.

To help gauge our responses, I've included a tier ranking for the United States in the annual Trafficking In Persons Report. I thought it was important, if we were going to be judging other countries, we judged ourselves. And so we hold ourselves to the same standards we apply to others. It's not only the fair thing to do; it's turned out also to be the smart thing as well, because including us in the report made it more credible and effective as a diplomatic tool. It shows we're all in this fight together, that we have a problem, which we are continuing to address, and it's not just a document that names and shames, but instead it serves as a guide to what practices are working, and more importantly, what every government, including our own, needs to do better, and I greatly appreciate everyones efforts on this. This latest publication from the Presidents Interagency Task Force Progress in Combating Trafficking in Persons really summarizes a lot of the progress weve made in the Obama Administration over the last three-plus years.

Finally, we know that the future of this struggle will depend on innovative solutions, so we are partnering with thinkers whose bold ideas are already helping to make a difference. We now have online tools like the Slavery Footprint so that people can understand the ways in which this crime affects them. It doesnt just happen to somebody far away, but it does have ripples of criminality that come across the globe.

We have new ways of looking at supply chains and policies, so that can help us cut off the demand that traffickers cruelly exploit. Thats particularly important when you think about the buying power of the federal government. So I think that we meet at a time when we have a lot to be grateful for in terms of the enhanced efforts that weve made, the results that were getting, but I think this task force is really focused on the challenge and the way ahead.

So let me now turn to Ambassador CdeBaca, who will say a few words about why we consider this such a high priority in our government.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you, Madam Secretary. Its this Administrations priority to give voice to the survivors of modern slavery whether in court or in our foreign policy, but those voices have been calling for justice for more than 150 years. A letter from the National Archives recently surfaced, a letter written in September of 1864 by Spotswood Rice to Katherine Diggs, his former master. He wrote from the lines of the Union Army as he and his new comrades marched back to Missouri, back towards the plantation where he had been held. Among those still enslaved was his daughter, Mary. His strength and righteous anger rings out through the years. And I quote:

I want you to understand that mary is my Child and she is a God given rite of my own. And you may hold on to hear as long as you can, but I want you to remembor this one thing the longor you keep my Child from me, the longor you will have to burnand the qwicer youll get their

I want you now to just hold on to hear if you want to iff your conchosence tells thats the road go that road and what it will brig you to kittey diggs I have no fears about geting mary out of your hands the whole Government gives chear to me and you cannot help your self.

We know from the oral histories that once freed, that little girl lived a long and prosperous life. And in 1937, an aged Mary told a WPA historian: I love army men. My father, brother, husband, and son were all army men. I love a man who fights for his rights and any person who wants to be someone.

Slavery and the ways that we fight it have changed so much since Spotswood Rice and those other survivors marched with that terrible, swift sword. But as you said last year, Madam Secretary, when we take up this burden at home and abroad, we do it because fighting slavery is part of our national identity. Its who we are.

Together, we can and we must rise to meet Spotswood Rices challenge to go back for everyones daughters and sons who remain in servitude. Together, we can give cheer to those who answer the call and march with todays survivors on their road to freedom.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you so much, Lou. And one of the things that Lou has done over his professional life of commitment to this issue is to continually link it to larger struggles for human freedom, including our own.

I want to turn now to the Attorney General, because the Attorney General and the Justice Department have been great partners in our efforts to combat this scourge. And I want to thank Attorney General Holder.

ATTORNEY GENERAL HOLDER: Well, thank you, Secretary Clinton. And also let me start by thanking President Obama for hosting us and for his extraordinary leadership in this global fight against human trafficking, and also thanks to my good friend Valerie Jarrett for bringing us together today and for her attention to this issue.

Its really an honor for me to join with my colleagues and partners to discuss the progress that we have made over the past year, but also to identify ways in which we can continue the momentum that we have built up over the past year and make sure that all that we have pledged to do in this Administration actually does occur.

One of the things I would point out is that one of the four priorities that Ive identified for the Justice Department is that we protect the most vulnerable among us. And this fits right into one of those four core priorities for the United States Department of Justice. For Justice, our commitment to preventing human trafficking, bringing traffickers to justice, and assisting victims has really never been stronger, and our approach, I don't think, has ever been more effective. Our work has sent a clear and critical message that in this country and under this Administration, human trafficking crimes will simply not be tolerated.

I'm proud to report that in the past year we charged a record number of people with human trafficking offenses, and over the last three years we have achieved significant increases in human trafficking prosecutions, including the rise of more than 30 percent in the number of forced labor and adult sex trafficking prosecutions.

Now, this work is really more than statistics. It has saved lives. It has ensured freedom. It has restored dignity to women, to men, to children, in virtually every corner of this country. We have liberated scores of victims. We have secured long prison sentences against individual traffickers. But we've also dismantled really large transnational organized crime enterprises. As many of you will recall, last February the Justice Department launched a human trafficking enhanced enforcement initiative in order to take our counter-trafficking enforcement levels efforts to a new level.

Now, as part of this commitment, I announced the Anti-Trafficking Coordination Team, or ACT Team, initiative that's an interagency collaboration among the Departments of Justice, Homeland Security, and Labor, aimed at streamlining federal criminal investigations and prosecutions of human trafficking offenses. And following a very rigorous and competitive interagency selection process, we launched six Phase One Pilot ACT Teams around the country. And they are located in Atlanta, El Paso, Kansas City, Los Angeles, Memphis, and Miami, and today these teams are fully operational. And by bringing federal investigative agencies and federal prosecutors together, they are allowing us to develop and to advance high-impact human trafficking prosecutions.

And let me just share some examples with you. Over the last year we have dismantled a large transnational organized crime enterprise that held Ukrainian victims in forced labor in Philadelphia. We have brought freedom and dignity to undocumented Central American women and convicted the traffickers who, with threats of violence and abuse, compelled them into forced labor and prostitution in restaurants and bars on Long Island in New York. We have restored freedom to undocumented Eastern European women and convicted the traffickers who brutally exploited them in massage parlors in Chicago and even branded them with tattoos to claim them as their own property. We have secured a life sentence against a gang member in the Eastern District of Virginia, just across the river here, for sex trafficking of victims as young as 12 years old.

By providing grant funding to our state and local law enforcement partners and to victims service organizations really across the country, the Justice Department is also supporting proactive efforts to stop traffickers and to help victims heal and to rebuild their lives.

And for the entire anti-trafficking community, we are continuing to provide training and technical assistance as well. And over the last year these efforts have included hosting three regional training forums that have focused on improving collaboration as well as the development of a training curriculum to help state prosecutors and state judges better understand human trafficking crimes. This is something that has to be done at the state and local level as well as at the federal level.

We're also taking steps to forge and strengthen partnerships across international borders, understanding that this is not simply an American problem. And we have seen that this effort is really essential. Over the last year, by working with our Mexican law enforcement partners, we have dismantled sex trafficking networks that operate on both sides of the U.S.-Mexico border and have brought freedom to victims and secured really landmark convictions and substantial sentences against the traffickers in these high-impact bilateral cases. We've had good cooperation with our Mexican counterparts.

So I think we can all be encouraged by our recent achievements in the fight against human trafficking, but I think we would all agree that we have still more to do and that far too many people remain in desperate need for the help that we can provide. And that's why I think that our joint efforts and our outstanding efforts really must continue. I am committed to this. The Justice Department is committed to this. This group that meets today is obviously committed to this. This Administration has identified this as a priority.

So I look forward to our discussions as to where we will go from here and how we can keep working in partnership to increase the impact of these very critical efforts. Thank you.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you very much, Attorney General. Now I'd like to invite Secretary Hilda Solis to share the Labor Department's update. And I want to thank Hilda for making this a high priority within the Labor Department.

SECRETARY SOLIS: Thank you very much, Madam Secretary, and also to our colleagues. I want to also congratulate President Obama and Valerie Jarrett for having this meeting convened here. This is a topic that obviously is very controversial and one that some of us in this room we know take very seriously and, of course, feel that we need to do as much as we can to make sure that every effort, especially at the Department of Labor, is focused in on combating this terrible error that occurs not just in our shores but also abroad.

I want to applaud President Obama. He's been very clear in his vision for an America built to last, one where everyone has a fair shot at success and where everyone plays by the same rules. Our actions to end the exploitation of workers are critical to achieving that vision. That's why the Department of Labor is here.

The Department of Labor's efforts to combat human trafficking have been broad and varied and can be broken down into two three main categories. The first is detection and law enforcement. Our investigators are on the front lines of trafficking, identifying potential cases and providing critical support such as translation services during investigations.

We've revamped the integrity and enforcement actions of our guest worker program to ensure a fair process for employers who use temporary foreign workers and to enforce protections for all of our workers. We've now announced new protocols to begin certifying new visas. That's allowed us to help immigrant victims of trafficking assist in investigation of those crimes.

The second category involves transnational engagement and research. We've signed currently declarations with Mexico, Guatemala, Nicaragua, El Salvador, Costa Rica, and DR to ensure that foreign workers, often the most vulnerable, are informed of their labor rights here in the U.S. This is very important as well because, in many cases, folks come here thinking that there are no serious protections available to them, there is no one that's going to listen to them, so it's a course of trying to reeducate people over and over again that there are different laws here, and there is a responsibility and accountability process.

The funding that we have included in these programs includes technical assistance projects and research that we're doing across the board on child and forced labor across the globe. And since 1995, the Department of Labor has been funding projects to combat the worst forms of child labor. And as a result, hundreds of thousands of children have been prevented from being trafficked.

The third and final category in our efforts to combat trafficking victims is services services that must be provided, a full restitution for the labor that they have performed. So we are very excited to be working with our friends in Department of Justice and our other sister agencies on these issues. Alongside our agency partners, we've been proud to assist these victims by computing the back wages that they are rightfully owed. So that's a big message, I think, to the overall community that it's time to speak up and not be afraid to speak out.

Another critical part of helping trafficking victims is to make sure that they have the support they need to get back on their feet, so we're proud to offer employment and training services to victims of severe forms of trafficking through our network of one-stop career centers so they can enter and get information and, hopefully, get on their feet again. And of course, we're aiming to support workers.

We're also aiming to support employers in helping us combat trafficking, so that's another big part of our effort. Our enforcement officers are working both to ensure a level playing field of law-abiding businesses, because we don't agree that unscrupulous businesses should get away with this crime, and to protect the rights of workers to deter unscrupulous employers that continue to exploit workers.

Looking ahead, we continue to remain committed to further these efforts. Soon, we'll be providing awareness training to our national field staff so that even more prepared individuals will know about this issue. We'll also be announcing a new joint declaration with the following the Philippines, Ecuador, and Peru to make sure that their vulnerable workers here in our country know of their rights and protections available.

Additionally, we'll do more to engage with our stakeholders in this critical issue by hosting listening sessions, roundtables, and making sure that our fact sheets and reports are also equally translated in those various languages that are much needed as well.

Finally, I look forward to partnering with all of you in fulfilling the Promise campaign, which is critical to our collective action on the issue.

I want to thank everyone. I'm incredibly proud of the work that all of you and all of us have been able to accomplish under your leadership in this Administration. Thank you.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you so much, Hilda, and let me now turn to Secretary Sebelius. Obviously the Department of Health and Human Services is an absolutely essential partner in everything we do.

Kathleen.

SECRETARY SEBELIUS: Well, thank you, Secretary, for your leadership on this task force. And Valerie, I hope that you convey to the President how important we all think it is that he has provided the kind of vision and leadership that brings us all here today, because this collaborative effort is incredibly important.

On this issue, the Department of Health and Human Services is motivated by the collaboration across federal agencies to raise public awareness and make the most of our resources. And were especially motivated to continue the important role in reaching and helping human trafficking victims every day. So over the past year, we have really deployed a lot of assets to our regional offices, 10 of them around the country, who have expanded their efforts to develop staff capacity through multiple trainings and meetings to monitor and combat human trafficking. We substantially expanded our outreach efforts through the Rescue and Restore Victims of Human Trafficking campaign, which includes now an online posting of the Look Beneath the Surface training video that is both available in English and Spanish.

During the last fiscal year, we built on our anti-trafficking efforts by providing services and resources on human trafficking through the Runaway and Homeless Youth Training and Technical Assistance Center. Going forward, the Presidents Fiscal Year 2013 budget includes a new $5 million proposal to award competitive grants focused on reducing the exploitation of children in the form of domestic sex trafficking. HHS also, as Secretary Clinton has referred, funds the National Human Trafficking Resource Center, which is a nationwide resource for potential victims and the public who may encounter a trafficking situation.

We maintain a national toll-free hotline that operates 24 hours a day, seven days a week, every day of the year. And last year, the hotline received over 16,000 calls, a 43 percent increase in the last fiscal year, which I think is both an indication of the depth of the problem, but also an indication that people now are aware that theres someplace to go for help. Of this total, we have close to 800 cases resulting in direct report to law enforcement, which is a 51 percent increase, so that connecting the hotline with actual action on the ground, thanks to our partners in the Department of Justice, has been a really important initiative.

Through a recently established interdepartmental working group, HHS and other agencies are discussing better coordination of the federal anti-trafficking efforts when dealing with victims and attendant services training and technical assistance. And as a group, weve identified the need for two types of call lines a central hotline for calls regarding victims and investigative tip lines. Weve also agreed to explore additional opportunities to appropriately highlight and differentiate between the resource center and the investigation hotlines.

So I feel confident that our efforts at HHS, hand in hand with our federal partners here at the table, continue to move us closer to our ultimate goal of freedom for all by bringing an end to this inexcusable human rights abuse.

And again, thank you, Madam Secretary, for convening this critical meeting, for the report that youre doing, and we look forward to continuing this critical work together.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you very much, Kathleen.

Now let me turn to the Department of Homeland Securitys update. Certainly, DHS personnel are on the front lines not only here at home but literally around the world, and we greatly appreciate Secretary Napolitanos leadership.

SECRETARY NAPOLITANO: And thank you, Secretary Clinton. I also appreciate the leadership youve shown on this issue and the leadership of the President. Its a social issue, its an economic issue, its a law enforcement issue, its a moral issue, and I think that joins us all around the table. We have also been working through partnerships of various types under an umbrella we call the Blue Campaign at DHS. It is leading directly to more tips, more investigations, improved services for victims, and I think will help us serve our ultimate goal of finally getting some deterrence to this issue.

We have partnered with the Department of State to develop two online trainings, one for the federal acquisition workforce. Our contractors have a zero-tolerance clause built into every federal contract, so were now training them and also training for the general public. CBP has worked with the Department of Transportation to launch something called the Blue Lightning Initiative, teaching airline employees the signs of trafficking and how to notify law enforcement. Were working with the firefighter and EMS communities to create training for first responders who may come into contact with victims, and we are in the process of putting the finishing touches on a one-week interdisciplinary training course at the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center, FLETC, which will bring together teams representing victim services, investigations, prosecutions, a first of its kind type of training in this area. And we expect it to be available no later than this summer.

We've worked to increase public awareness of human trafficking through targeted video messages and public service announcements, including CBPs No Te Enganes campaign, Dont Be Fooled, and ICEs Hidden in Plain Sight campaign, which reached an estimated 5 million people.

We've worked to address and recognize the needs and unique challenges of trafficking victims. We have now put 39 specially trained human trafficking experts in each of our ICE field offices, and we've doubled the number of forensic interview specialists. CIS has developed a one-pager for law enforcement on options for victims, including the T and the U visa programs.

The efforts are succeeding. We are finding more investigations with a nexus to human trafficking. Last year, we initiated 722, we obtained 271 convictions. Eric, working with your folks, seized assets worth well over $2 million. We also have seen a steady increase in the number of reports to the tip line, up 69 percent between FY2010 and 2011, and I think looking at the 12 numbers, there will be another record, unfortunately, in a way.

This year, we plan to do even more. We are requiring all of our contracting professionals to take training on combating trafficking in persons, and we have already trained 600 acquisition personnel on how to use that clause in the standard federal contract. We're working to assure that age-appropriate care and services are provided to unaccompanied minor children encountered by us typically through the immigration system. We had a roundtable discussion here at the White House with retail, hotel, and airline industry leaders, and also with state, local, tribal, and territorial law enforcement agencies and associations discussing ways we could work together to raise awareness. We are continuing to deploy ideas from those sessions.

And we are expanding the reach and scope of our free, interactive computer-based training system for local law enforcement partners. We work extensively with Justice, with Labor on the ACT teams that the Attorney General referenced, because those teams, I think, hold great promise in actually dealing with this problem. So we will continue to listen, we will continue to work, and like everyone else around the table, we intend to, if anything, increase our commitment. Thank you.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Great. Thank you very much, Janet. Now let me turn to Cecilia Munoz, the assistant to the President and Domestic Policy Council Director.

Cecilia.

MS. MUNOZ: Thank you very much, Madam Secretary. Its a real honor to be part of this gathering today. This is obviously incredibly important work and it falls to me to talk a little bit about the work of the Domestic Policy Council on the domestic side of this issue.

As everyone in this room knows, two years ago, the President forcefully articulated his personal commitment to fighting modern slavery and human trafficking, described it as a shared responsibility. And as we're hearing today, the since the President made that commitment two years ago, we've been making progress through investigations and prosecutions, the victims assistance programs, we've been hearing about technical assistance for states and localities. I mean, its a good list and its a long list, but it doesnt involve only the work of government. The conscience of the country was really awakened by the Presidents remarks. And we have churches, we have businesses and communities across the country heeding the Presidents call to action, finding ways to combat trafficking, and to serve those who have been victimized by it.

The Domestic Policy Council has partnered with many of you in this important work, and the President has really reiterated just this morning in a statement his commitment to these issues. Hes instructed his Cabinet, all of us, to find ways to strengthen the good work that were already doing, and to expand our partnerships with civil society and the private sector so that we can bring more resources to bear on this terrible problem.

As the President announced in his statement, in the coming weeks, the White House will build on this gathering on behalf of human dignity. This is an issue that the President understands the way that your agencies do as a crime, as a violation of universal human rights and its a policy priority on both the domestic and international fronts. We are committed to maximizing our efforts in every way possible, and were confident that working together, we can collectively, we can strengthen the efforts of both the federal government and civil society in ending the scourge of modern slavery.

So our direction is clear. We intend to continue to work in partnership with all of you and your teams. The White House intends to redouble its efforts and build on this already strong record of accomplishment, and were going to reach out to our partners outside of government in the hope that, together, we can really make an unprecedented push to raise awareness and have further real and sustained results. We dont have any illusions about this task being easy. If it this were an easy issue with simple solutions, we wouldnt need to be here having this gathering today. But we are persuaded that by working with each other effectively and working with our partners around the country and around the world, we can really bring positive change to this issue.

So we will be working with you to expand the resources, to leverage our efforts and our coordinated coordinating capacity. And so I look forward to working with all of you to do that. I look forward to playing a role in helping lift up the work that youre already doing and helping to coordinate it as strongly as possible. And were convinced that with this partnership within government and partnerships outside of government, we can make an enormous difference on this issue, and were honored to be part of it.

Thank you, Madam Secretary.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you so much, Cecilia. Now I will turn to someone I work with practically every day on a wide variety of security issues around the world, and Im delighted that he would be here for this meeting.

So, Assistant to the President, Deputy National Security Advisor Denis McDonough.

MR. MCDONOUGH: Madam Secretary, thank you very much, and allow me to join Cecilia in thanking all of your teams who we get to work with every day on this matter. Let me just take a minute too to highlight our team Rob Berschinski, Quintan Wiktorowicz, and most especially, Samantha Power, who, on behalf of the National Security staff, have really made this a priority and have been working with your teams to push this through.

Human trafficking is just one of those topics that doesnt make it in the paper every day. But I think what we see in this years report and in each of the reports that are coming from the agencies now is that the work that all the agencies are doing is actually having a very profound, life-changing impact on Americans and non-Americans, men, women, and children all around the world. So its something about which I think we should feel quite good, recognizing, of course, as everybody said, that theres an awful lot of work to be done.

The fact is that the when the United States Government, when our people, are understood to be an international leader on this issue, it speaks to something at the heart of the Presidents National Security Strategy, which he put out in 2010 one, that were strengthened by the power of our example, and that were strongest when were working to advance the dignity of individuals all around the world. So for us at the National Security staff, this is a national security issue.

It is human trafficking is at the nexus of organized crimes, is a source for funding for international terrorist groups, is a source for funding for transnational criminal groups. It fundamentally endangers international security. And so while were trying to create an international economy in which everyone can choose and be paid for for their work, it, by lifting this up, will strengthen our ability to be a leader in the global marketplace as well.

Now I know Ash, Raj, and Maria have not had a chance to brief out their results yet, so Im not going to steal their thunder. But I do want to highlight a couple of things that I see from my position in terms of coordinating the interagency work on this effort.

First, as I said above, when we lead by example, were standing as a model for other governments in how we train our people, hold them to the highest ethical standards when it comes to trafficking, and makes it able for us to walk the walk as well as talk the talk. As Raj will no doubt highlight, USAID has been at the forefront of this effort through the standards its applying to all its employees contractors, subcontractors, and grantees. We recognize that across the government, theres still an awful lot to do to improve on this in terms of procurement of goods and labor, and the President is demanding that we do more in exactly this area as the report pulls forward.

As Secretary Clinton said, being a model also means were willing to place ourselves to the same level of scrutiny that were applying to others, which is why he was so appreciative of the report including the United States on the list of countries that are graded in this and States annual Trafficking in Persons Report this year.

Second, let me emphasize that when it comes to trafficking, one thing that we do know is that we dont know enough. In addition to what Cecilia has mentioned, in his statement today, the President spoke of trafficking as a form of exploitation that hides both in the dark corners of our world and in plain sight in our own towns and country towns and cities. We know in certain areas we dont have great data on the scope of the problem. And in terms of our programming, we may know what works and what doesn't, but were still learning precise causal relationships. That's why the Presidents demanding that we keep the focus on learning and improving on our interventions.

Lastly, and perhaps most importantly, we would urge that on topics like our anti-trafficking work, we maintain laser-like focus on mainstreaming what we're doing in all our day-to-day operations. Whether in your internal strategy development or in policy papers you bring to the interagency coordination arena, if the majority of your staff are diplomats, are development experts, are service members, see efforts to counter trafficking as a silo, as a job of only people in the Trafficking Office, rather than as a core component of their job then we will not have lifted this up the way the President, Secretary, all of you are demanding that we do.

So I'll leave it at that. I'm looking forward to hearing more about the tremendous work that all of your teams have are underway. And obviously, as each have highlighted, I think we're here to be commended here on the work done heretofore. And just to echo Cecilia on the Presidents direction today, our team is looking forward to working with each of you and your teams on the months to come to build on all the good work that we already have in place.

So, Madam Secretary, thank you very much.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you very much, Denis. We really appreciate that overview. Now let me turn to the director of National Intelligence, Lieutenant General Jim Clapper.

LIEUTENANT GENERAL CLAPPER: Thank you, Madam Secretary. And again, I join colleagues in praising you for commending you for your leadership, and it's an honor to be here. I thought I'd discuss very briefly the intelligence community's role in combating transnational organized crime, and in particular, the understanding and combating trafficking in persons. My priority in this job is to integrate collection analysis across the intelligence community in line with policy-maker needs.

Now after last year's meeting of this group, I rededicated some internal assets to stand up our own transnational organized crime team on my staff, and we never had -- in the history of the DNI, never had a single office for that sort of focus. And in line with the theme of leveraging across the government, we've become very engaged with the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Office, and are experiencing Louis' zeal. (Laughter.)

I've only been active for a short time, but we are seeing an increase, however modest and I anticipate this will gain momentum through our channels, and I just I think this is the beginning. We expect bigger results in the future as we continue to strengthen partnerships with key NI human trafficking advocates. And as others have eluded on this issue, partnerships are absolutely crucial to success.

And just to underline a point that Denis just made -- certainly we in the intelligence community recognize this -- that trafficking in persons is a national security issue in addition to being a social, economic, and law enforcement issue. And so we were committed to doing our part to defeat it.

Our efforts across the intelligence community to integrate collection analysis and work with state, local, and tribal law enforcement will improve our ability to combat this appalling crime, and we can and must do more.

In October, my team attended the Trafficking in Persons Reporting Conference hosted by the State Department, Miami; made sure that different agencies within the intelligence community attended. This was the first time the IC has ever integrated with the State Department on this mission of ensuring that trafficking in persons reporting is accurate.

In November, our team hosted our own transnational organized crime event at my headquarters via video teleconference, and it was a global thing throughout the IC to many interested members of the intelligence community. And this was, I think, part of my responsibility to ensure awareness within the intelligence community. And a special presentation by the State Department's Trafficking in Persons team was the highlight had a huge impact, feedback I got.

We also coordinate extensively to have attendees who represent the nations we refer to as our Five Eyes allies. Those are the commonwealth countries with whom we have the closest, most intimate intelligence relationships. So I refer specifically to the UK's Serious Organized Crime Agency, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Australian Federal Police, and the New Zealand Customs agency. Where starting were working towards the goal of a better understanding of the role that trafficking plays in persons in national instability, corruption, and crime around the globe. I think it's our job to shine a light on those dark corners.

So I'll just say that we are committed to this and we do recognize that it is a national security issue. Thank you, Madam Chairman.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thanks so much, Jim. Now I'd like to invite Acting Director Zients to share OMB's update. Jeff?

MR. ZIENTS: Thank you. Now given the fiscal situation everybody knows that budgets are very tight, difficult budget environment; many agencies are experiencing actually lower budget. In this environment, it's OMB's job to make sure every dollar is well spent and importantly, that the most important priorities of the Administration, of the President, are well funded, and that we allocate dollars accordingly. Preventing human trafficking is a clear priority for the President and the Administration, so we are committed to working with each agency to make sure that we have the appropriate resources to fund these important efforts. I think we have good working relationships with each agency and your teams, but we will make sure that adequate resources are allocated to these efforts. We also stand ready to help in any way to help manage cross-agency processes to ensure that we continue to make significant progress. Thank you.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you very much. We like hearing that. (Laughter.) I hope everybody really (inaudible.)

PARTICIPANT : It was the shortest --

SECRETARY CLINTON: Yeah. We should meet at the White House more often. (Laughter.) Now let me turn to Deputy Secretary Ash Carter to give the Department of Defense update.

DEPUTY SECRETARY CARTER: Thank you, Secretary Clinton. The President's determination to combat trafficking is reflected in each of the three ways that we, the Department of Defense, touch this problem. Namely, through our own people, uniformed and civilian and their conduct. Second, through our contractors. And the third, in our foreign military training programs. So let me just take each of those in turn.

First of all, for our own folks, both uniformed and civilian, they are required to receive training. I've reviewed the curriculum. It's very good, it's incisive. It basically has two parts: Don't do it and learn to recognize it. So let me take the don't do it part first.

The don't do it part you may not know this, I was a little surprised myself, but it has only been recently that patronizing a prostitute became an offense under the Uniform Code of Military Justice. It is, and that's something that we need to begin to and continue and increase our enforcement of that provision. Because in the neighborhood around bases here or abroad, obviously, there's an opportunity for that. So don't do it.

And the second part of the training is recognize it. And that for that, it's part of the annual training. We also have public service announcements on Armed Forces Network and that kind of thing. If you're in a gym somewhere around the world or in Afghanistan, you'll frequently see them to increase awareness and to give the tell-tale signs of it to our people. We do some specific things regionally in PACOM, USFK -- U.S. Forces Korea -- where we've had historically had an issue there. So wherever we detect it, we try to follow up. And there have been some cases recently, which we have aggressively followed up in the law enforcement sense.

Contractors. You know that for every soldier, sailor, airman, and marine deployed, there's at least one contractor that ends up in theater at the same time. They're all employed by us. Secretary Napolitano already made it clear. It's part of the Federal Acquisition Regulation and its Defense Federal Acquisition Supplement that contracts are to have a provision forbidding trafficking as in any connection with the country. Now, it's one thing to write it into the contract and you say, How do you make sure you get it done? We're going to make it training for the contractors mandatory, even as it is for our own people, civilian and military number one.

Number two, contracting officer representatives, a COR. What is a COR? COR is the person who makes sure that the contract is executed. So there's somebody who follows around the contractor and makes sure it gets done. Those people are now trained, which they didn't used to be, in recognizing trafficking. So they can see if an association with one of our contracting activities this has gone on, very important. And we have our inspector general now tracking to make sure that those contract clauses are all there and the contracting officer representatives are, in fact, monitoring compliance with those. Very important, because contractors is a huge part of what we do.

Last piece is our foreign military training engagements. All of our programs, be they 1206, be they IMET, JSET, our training of UN peacekeepers and so forth, it is a required part of that curriculum. If we offer it as a department to another military that it include training for those foreign military members in trafficking, both don't do it and recognize it. So for example, just to give you one example, in the Democratic Republic of Congo, AFRICOM, our African Command, works through DIILS the Defense Institute for International Legal Studies maybe some of you may be familiar with to train justice professionals in the prosecution of trafficking crimes and Congolese military commanders in how to prevent their troops from engaging in this. Its very important in all of our training. So those are our training activities.

So in those three arenas where we might touch this problem and do touch this problem, were trying to make sure that were reflecting the Presidents fight.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thanks very much, Ash. Now, Deputy Secretary Porcari, would you please report from the Department of Transportation?

DEPUTY SECRETARY PORCARI: Thank you, Secretary Clinton, and we appreciate your leadership on this. And Valerie, we very much appreciate the clear and consistent direction the President has given us on this. Its energized all of us.

We want to make sure, first and foremost, that the transportation system is not inadvertently an enabler of human trafficking. Were very committed across land, sea, and air to making sure thats not the case. Marlise Streitmatter, our deputy chief of staff, has been our lead person on this and will continue to be, but were using all of our resources across borders and agencies to make sure that we can positively impact this problem.

For example, working with Secretary Napolitano in Customs and Border Protection, the Blue Lightning Initiative provides an in-flight procedure to report human trafficking events, law enforcement, as well as awareness for the flight crews. Weve gotten very positive response from our airlines on this; theyre very interested in moving forward on this. Likewise, on the highways, we want to make sure theyre free of human trafficking. If a commercial truck or bus driver commits a felony, we can take them off the road and obviously, human trafficking is a felony. This gives us an opportunity to remove the bad actors.

Were also pursuing opportunities with Amtrak and the motor coach industry to develop a public awareness campaign and specialized training for our inspectors that are out in the field all across the country to recognize the warning signs of human trafficking. Were also collaborating with our Mexican and Canadian partners to increase awareness, and we look forward to expanding on those partnerships.

There are also some less conventional partnerships that can be very effective. Working, for example, with our local and state departments of motor vehicles, as well as truck stops, to build public awareness, and give people that are literally on the front lines of this fight the tools to recognize and report suspicious activities.

And finally, this really starts at home, and were working internally within our Department of Transportation, across all the transportation modes, to make sure that we educate our team on identifying human trafficking, and were building, essentially, on the DHS program thats out there.

So were dedicated to moving forward with this. This is an unconscionable and unacceptable activity, and we are looking forward on building the on the progress to date. Thank you.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you very much. Now Id like to invite from the State Department, Under Secretary of State for Civilian Security, Democracy, and Human Rights, Maria Otero, to go into a little more detail about what were doing at the State Department.

UNDER SECRETARY OTERO: Thank you very much, Madam Secretary. And I also want to express appreciation for the leadership that our President is giving us on this issue, and Valerie, convening us here, and of course, express the importance for us to be able to work with every department across the board under the commitment and leadership of Secretary Clinton, who has really enabled our Department to push forward in this area.

Over the last year, the TIP Office, under the leadership of Ambassador CdeBaca, but working in partnership with our regional bureaus and with all of the other colleagues across the Department, weve made advances in several areas that I think are important to highlight in addressing the State Departments response to modern slavery. And let me just touch on a couple of them, as Secretary Clinton has also talked about some of them.

First, the Department as other departments have stated here is in the process of developing a training program that is going to be applicable for all of our direct hires. And this is with the purpose of helping all of our employees understand the nature of this crime better. And not only be able to understand it but to be able to recognize it when it happens and to be able to see the warning signs before it is happening and also take action if that is necessary. So this is in the process of being developed, and we anticipate through it that the degree of understanding of this issue will increase by all of those that are working at the Department.

Second, Secretary Clinton, last year at this task force, announced the establishment of a new trafficking investigation unit that would be set up by our Diplomatic Security Bureau. And I'm very pleased to say that, indeed, that was not only set up, but that in fact it has been operating this last year. And it is very exciting that it has already carried out a number of investigations that have led to indictments. And that for us is a real sign of being able to move this forward. The units Victims Resource Advocacy Program is also equipped to fully support the victims themselves that are discovered in the course of any of these investigations. So we are applauding our Diplomatic Security Bureau for how quickly they've put together this team, and not only set forth its parameters, but also how its work is already showing results.

Third, we're working to protect the visa holders who come to the United States as domestic servants of diplomats. Thanks to the works of one of our working groups, which is headed by our chief of protocol, we are working closely with the diplomatic community to raise their awareness of this issue and to make sure the diplomats that bring domestic workers to the United States now follow a set of requirements that are in place that will prevent those workers from being abused.

Finally, Secretary Clinton mentioned this briefly the TIP Office has partnered with an NGO to develop a tool that allows anybody and everybody to go online, to take a survey, and then to see how many victims of human trafficking it takes to sustain their lifestyle. This is called the Slavery Footprint, and it is the kind of innovation that is helping create change and also create awareness not only of the existence of this crime but also of the challenges that we face in addressing it, and it is bringing people to this issue.

We know that more than three million people from more than 200 countries have logged on to this site, and we're confident that tools such as this one are going to be some that are going to help make a difference in engaging those around the world in addressing this issue in the years ahead. Thank you.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you, Maria. Since we are being broadcast here, perhaps, Lou, you could give the website for the Slavery Footprint, because it's had a remarkable impact, and we want to encourage everybody everywhere to sign on.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Certainly. Thank you, Madam Secretary. It's pretty intuitive. It's the slaveryfootprint.org not dot com slaveryfootprint.org.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Right. So we invite everyone to log on.

Now let me turn to Dr. Raj Shah, the USAID administrator, who is such a great partner in this and so much of the work that we do.

ADMINISTRATOR SHAH: Thank you, Madam Secretary, for your focus and direction on these issues, and to President Obama for elevating the attention and the resources that we will hope to invest against results in this space.

In the past year, our agency has made significant progress trying to live up to commitments we've made around this table for each of the past two years as part of this task force. We are implementing a more results-oriented approach to counter-trafficking efforts around the world, which starts, as Denis mentioned, with the adoption of a strict, new code of conduct for ourselves, our partners abroad, our contractors, and in particular, our security contractors that often operate in high-risk conflict environments. The code of conduct, much as Ash Carter described, will make sure that more people serve as eyes and ears in the search for those at risk or those enslaved. And we have intensified procurement actions and implementation of that code of conduct so that those terms are written into our contracts and enforced through our contracts officers and reviewers.

We've also launched a new counter-trafficking policy developed in close partnership with many agencies represented around the table. This policy requires every USAID mission in a high-risk country to conduct baseline surveys on trafficking and develop clear metrics to assess progress against prevention for our efforts and efforts of others in the international community. It also directs us to create more multi-country databases so victims can be tracked across countries and supported in their efforts as they as that is such a critical barrier, having that data be accessible in a number of different environments. And it prioritizes investments in technologies, like mapping platforms, mobile applications, and other innovations.

We also believe that the one of the challenges is getting the word out and making sure that people who are in a difficult situation have the capacity to seek help. In that effort, we have expanded a highly successful partnership with MTV EXIT into Russia for the very first time, but it is a global program that has had some real successes, especially in Asia. Through the partnership with MTV EXIT, they have created public service advertisements, music videos, and other efforts to create awareness about trafficking and provide hotlines so that people can access resources to fight back. We believe it has reached more than 300 million households in Asia over the last seven years.

And just to share one story that we heard about just a few weeks ago, that for more than three years a young Cambodian boy and his three friends had been essentially enslaved on a Thai fishing boat. Just a few weeks ago, their boat docked at a port in Thailand, and they happened to see on television one of the MTV EXIT advertisements about trafficking. The video flashed a free hotline number in both Thai and Cambodian so the kids could read it and respond. They did. Immigration authorities responded immediately, and they were freed. We seek many, many more stories like this and believe our expanded efforts are helping to get us there.

We also know, as the President mentioned in his statement today, that we want to work more effectively with partners throughout our own country in the private sector, on universities and campuses, and in faith-based communities. I recently visited Bethel University, a Christian college outside of Minneapolis, and I met with about 100 students the day after we had released our counter-trafficking policy, actually, in this room. And sometimes it takes in the federal government as everyone here knows some time for these policies to be read by our teams and really inform changes and action and behavior. I know we all address that. Every one of the 100 kids that I met with had already read our policy online, and they had ideas, they had things they wanted to contribute.

So today, were thrilled to announce that we will launch a college a campus challenge to combat trafficking, and well seek to partner with the most innovative, creative ideas in the realm of prevention and protection. And well match our campus challenge champions, the winners of our awards, with our missions in the field, so students have access to many of our partners who are on the frontlines of trying to help victims or help communities that are in high risk. We look forward to working with the next generation of American students to craft the next generation of solutions to this critical challenge.

And thank you for the chance to be here.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you so much, Raj. Thats very exciting news. Let me now ask Deputy Director Sean Joyce of the FBI to share the FBI's update.

MR. JOYCE: Thank you, Madam Secretary. And thank you to the White House for hosting this event today. And Id like to take this opportunity to thank all the people on the street that work this issue each and every day and many of the folks in this room in some of the chairs behind us that work tirelessly every day on some of the policy issues regarding this issue.

The FBI continues its commitment to fighting human trafficking and child exploitation in coordination with our federal, state, and local partners. Over the last year, we've increased our resources approximately 66 percent dedicated to this issue, especially against instances of coerced or forced adult labor, in addition to our agency placing a tremendous significance on ensuring child victims are safe, secure, and away from those who would prey on their innocence.

I can tell you Ive been personally involved in rescuing some child victims, and as a father and a special agent, it is both emotional and rewarding, but devastating for the victims. The FBI recognizes these investigations require specialized resources, and thus we commit 80 victim specialists from our Office of Victim Assistance to our human trafficking efforts. To facilitate our fight against human trafficking and child exploitation, we participate in 77 task forces in 47 working groups across the country.

One highlight is our Innocent Lost National Initiative we started in 2003. This initiative addresses the tragic challenge of children recruited into prostitution. It is supported by the Department of Justice, Child Exploitation/Obscenity Section, and the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. To date, the initiative has resulted in 1,961 children being rescued. There have been nearly 1,500 investigations initiated, resulting in 927 convictions, to include seven life sentences and several ranging in length from 25 to 45 years.

Recognizing this is also an international problem. The FBI continues to build capacity through a number of training efforts, and in conjunction with our partners in the Department of State, we recently administered a two-week human trafficking course for law enforcement officials from El Salvador, Guatemala, Nicaragua, and Panama. The FBI looks forward to the continued collaboration with our law enforcement partners, both at home and abroad, to ensure that child exploitation and/or forced or coerced adult labor is met with swift justice.

Thank you, Madam Secretary, for this opportunity.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you very much, Deputy Director and Special Agent. That was a very stirring rendition of the great work you're doing, and I appreciate it.

Let me now turn to Assistant Secretary Russlynn Ali to share the Department of Education's update.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY ALI: Thank you, Madam Secretary, Ms. Jarrett, and to all of you for your commitment on this issue. Secretary Duncan shares in that commitment and this sense of urgency.

Over the past year, we have set about using all of the tools within our disposal to really launch an awareness through prevention through awareness efforts in our schools, through technical assistance and supports and training for educators that need it so that they can spot the warning signals. We know that these signals, whether they be absenteeism or signs of abuse or behavioral problems, they prevent children from learning. They not only affect the victim and those at prey of traffickers but the entire school community. And schools have a responsibility and need help and support.

So it is about identifying where those problem areas exist, working with so many of you to target our solutions and our efforts, to answer the calls of educators and school districts around the country that are dealing with these problems in ways that they have never before, helping them with language and talking to school-age children about very difficult and grown-up issues. And how they do that with sincerity and the education they need to help their children be safe is something that is hugely important as well.

We are also doing the kind of technical assistance through web-based tools on what services are available, what supports are available. We've brought together, just last summer, over 2,000 educators to deal with issues of climate and safety in their schools with large and highlighted and focused on issues of trafficking and ways to help. Finding those places that are also doing great things to eradicate trafficking where they exist a school district in San Diego, for example, Grossmont Union High School, we've worked with them to create a training video, which we will disseminate to all school districts that need it as we find those places that are eradicating this and work to take their lessons to scale.

We've also worked closely with the Office of Violence Against Women, our colleagues at the Department of Justice, and elsewhere to ensure that we bring best practices to bear and outreach with as many groups as possible and interested on this issue. In the future, we will continue to work with our sister agencies in finding the places that need the help most, understanding the data better, learning about those solutions and bringing them to scale.

We look forward to sharing those tools, like the Slavery Footprint, to working with Raj and others on things like the campus challenge while we do climate checks and climate schools in our schools, making sure that we hear from students themselves on both problems and solutions, and working with our colleagues and our school resource officers and our colleagues in the Department of Homeland Security on training for law enforcement officers on how they, too, can help change the school environment. We will use all of the tools in our disposal to help you and help our schools deal with this tragic problem. Thank you.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you very much. And now let me invite our final speaker, U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission Chair Jacqueline Berrien.

MS. BERRIEN: Thank you so much to President Obama for his leadership and commitment to end human trafficking, and thank you, Secretary Clinton, for your leadership and the opportunity to participate in this very important discussion.

On behalf of the United States Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, I am privileged to report on the EEOC's work to identify and remedy the trafficking of workers. EEOC staff across the country work diligently to protect one of the most fundamental human and civil rights the right to work without being harassed, intimidated, or mistreated on account of race, color, religion, national origin, sex, age, or disability. The EEOC plays an important role in helping to make victims of trafficking whole. We seek and obtain civil remedies, such as back pay and monetary relief, for the harm caused by employment discrimination as well as punitive damages and equitable relief to deter and prevent future discriminatory conduct.

Since the last meeting of this task force, EEOC has worked with enforcement partners at the federal, state, and local levels to improve outreach to vulnerable populations, including victims of trafficking. For example, we trained representatives from state and local fair employment practice agencies to identify and remedy trafficking. EEOC also certified new visas last year to ensure that victims of sex harassment and other discriminatory treatment at work could participate fully in related law enforcement efforts without fear of deportation.

Building on the successful resolution of anti-trafficking cases against J.J. Pickle and Trans Bay Steel, the EEOC is challenging discriminatory working conditions and terms of employment in two recently filed cases. In one case, the EEOC alleges that more than 200 Thai men were subjected to a pattern or practice of national origin and race discrimination, harassment, abuse, and retaliation on farms in Hawaii and Washington. The second case alleges that hundreds of Indian employees were recruited to work as welders, pipe fitters, and ship fitters in Mississippi and Texas, but after arriving in the United States as guest workers, they were subjected to abuse based on their national origin and race and encountered other forms of discriminatory treatment, including segregated and substandard housing. Both of these cases are pending now, and were seeking not only relief for the affected workers, but also injunctive relief to prevent future occurrences.

Last January, the commission conducted a public meeting on human trafficking, and with the insights provided by Ambassador CdeBaca and other witnesses, we have redoubled our efforts to identify and remedy trafficking. In the past year, my colleague, Commissioner Stuart Ishimaru, launched the EEOCs immigrant worker team to improve the commissions outreach to immigrant workers, strengthen enforcement of laws prohibiting national origin discrimination, and increased collaboration with other agencies addressing human trafficking and related issues affecting immigrant workers. The immigrant worker team of the EEOC will continue to address these issues in 2012.

Once again, thank you for convening us, Madam Secretary. My EEOC colleagues and I look forward to continuing to work with all of the members of this task force towards the goal of ending the scourge of human trafficking.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you so much. And again, thanks to everyone, not just for being here today for this meeting, but for the work that everyone has done since our last meeting. I think it does help to focus our attention that we do have an annual meeting where we come together and share the results of our efforts. I think its especially meaningful to be meeting here in the White House, because, after all, this is a national priority, its a priority of the Presidents, and we do have to do more to reach out to have partnerships with the private sector, with NGOs, state governments, local governments, and the like.

So again, Valerie, thank you for hosting us, and we appreciate the emphasis that the White House has put on this program.

MS. JARRETT: Thank you. Thank you all for being here.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you.

LOAD-DATE: March 16, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

182 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
Targeted News Service

March 15, 2012 Thursday 3:13 AM EST

Hillary Rodham Clinton, Secretary of State Speaks on Annual Meeting of the President's Interagency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 10824 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons issued the text of the following remarks by Hillary Rodham Clinton, Secretary of State:

MS. JARRETT: Thank you. Welcome. Good morning, everyone. We want to welcome you to the White House for our annual President's Task Force to Combat and Monitor Trafficking of Persons. We're delighted to have it here hosted at the White House. It's indicative of the President's commitment to this issue, and we want to thank all of the members of the agencies who have joined us this morning for this meeting.

In 2008, the President spoke at Pastor Rick Warren's Saddleback Church, and he called human trafficking the modern-day enslavement of men, women, and children for sex or labor, and he referred to it as a debasement of our common humanity, which I think sums it up perfectly. As chair of the White House Council on Women and Girls, this issue is of particular importance to me as a leader but also to our council, which is represented by all of the agencies in the federal government as well. And it's why we're pleased to have you all here today.

We are confident with the Administration working together, with civil society, with not-for-profits, with the private sector, we can actually tackle this issue head on and conquer it. And we're delighted to have here Secretary Clinton, who has chaired this task force, and I'll turn it over to her in a second. But I wanted to, by way of introduction, mention that yesterday we were at the State Department for a luncheon with Prime Minister Cameron, and he said about Secretary Clinton that she has been a strong advocate who is committed to the emancipation and empowerment of women. And I thought that that was a perfect way to describe one of her many roles and one that is particularly germane to the topic of this morning.

So with that, again I want to welcome everyone here and tell you how committed the President is to making sure that we are all collaborating and sharing information together and intending to conquer this issue head on. So with that, I'll turn it over to Secretary Clinton. Thank you.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you. Well, thank you very much Valerie. And thank you for hosting us here at the White House. This annual event is a good opportunity to hear about the progress that our government is making to combat modern slavery and to talk about our goals going forward. And so I very much appreciate the President's commitment to this work and the collaboration that has been accomplished throughout the United States Government. So with that, I'm delighted to call this meeting to order.

I want to thank Ambassador CdeBaca and his staff not only for the work they put into staffing the task force, but for the zeal with which they lead this fight around the world. Of course, if this issue doesn't demand zealous advocacy, it's hard to figure out what does.

This September marks the 150th anniversary of the Preliminary Emancipation Proclamation. And it's a good time for us to recommit ourselves, not only to the promise of freedom, but to the work against ending modern slavery.

Around the world, as many as 27 million men, women, and children toil in bondage. This crime undermines economies and the rule of law. It shatters families and communities. It is an affront to our most fundamental values.

This issue is very near and dear to my heart, since the time I was first lady. And we began a full-hearted effort by our government - both the executive branch and Congress - to address this issue. And I've had the experience of meeting with survivors here at home and around the world. I've seen firsthand what a horrible toll this takes, and so I'm delighted that we have such a dedicated group of members.

This is a priority in the Obama Administration, starting with the President, as Valerie said. And the first time we convened the task force under this Administration, we laid out a set of commitments - a call to action. And in answering that call, we've tried to elevate the fight against trafficking to the highest levels of policymaking.

This goes hand in hand. This is not an individual, one-off effort. This goes hand in hand with other work that we've been doing on behalf of women and girls and other marginalized people. The White House recently issued a National Action Plan on Women, Peace, and Security to ensure that women are full partners and participants in our efforts to reduce conflict and promote peace and prosperity around the world, because after all, modern slavery disproportionately affects women and girls. And as it does so, it disrupts family networks, and it undermines the foundation of stable economies and societies. So the Action Plan on Women, Peace, and Security contains specific steps to prevent human trafficking of women and children as a result of conflict and to provide assistance to victims.

The State Department has made the struggle against modern slavery an important part of our diplomatic engagement. Our annual Trafficking in Persons Report is the most comprehensive assessment of how well governments are doing to address this crime. The TIP Office's foreign assistance grants are making a difference in 37 countries, supporting programs that provide crucial assistance to survivors and help governments build their capacity to fight this crime. And thanks to our leadership, the international community is getting behind the effort. Nearly 140 countries have enacted modern anti-trafficking laws, and nearly 150 are party to the UN Trafficking in Persons Protocol.

And we've taken action here at home. For instance, we learned that survivors were being made to pay taxes on restitution payments from their abusers. And, well, some of the people in this room as well as colleagues from the Treasury Department who are not with us today saw the problem and said, "This isn't right; we're going to do something about it." So now the Treasury Department has made clear that victims are not liable to pay taxes on the wages of slavery.

Another example: We thought it was unfair for diplomats who victimized their own domestic workers were, because of diplomatic immunity, virtually untouchable. So now, we're making sure that diplomats coming to this country understand their obligations and responsibilities, and we're taking action when we have evidence that they are not.

We're trying to ensure that resources and support are available to victims wherever we find them, and one of those resources is the Department of Health and Human Services National Human Trafficking Resource Center. Its operations have been expanded. It now fields an unprecedented number of calls. And it is really making a difference in reaching out to survivors and helping us prosecute abusers.

Other agencies led by the Department of Homeland Security recently held a public listening session to hear from stakeholders about new ideas for victim services, federal government engagement with local communities, outreach to at-risk groups, and NGO private sector initiatives. Now, we've also tried to streamline how we approach cases. And instead of a muddle of agencies claiming or rejecting different responsibilities, thanks to the Departments of Justice, Labor, and Homeland Security, we have in place in the Obama Administration efficient, coordinated, anti-trafficking teams, and they're making investigations and prosecutions more effective and helping victims.

To help gauge our responses, I've included a tier ranking for the United States in the annual Trafficking In Persons Report. I thought it was important, if we were going to be judging other countries, we judged ourselves. And so we hold ourselves to the same standards we apply to others. It's not only the fair thing to do; it's turned out also to be the smart thing as well, because including us in the report made it more credible and effective as a diplomatic tool. It shows we're all in this fight together, that we have a problem, which we are continuing to address, and it's not just a document that names and shames, but instead it serves as a guide to what practices are working, and more importantly, what every government, including our own, needs to do better, and I greatly appreciate everyone's efforts on this. This latest publication from the President's Interagency Task Force Progress in Combating Trafficking in Persons really summarizes a lot of the progress we've made in the Obama Administration over the last three-plus years.

Finally, we know that the future of this struggle will depend on innovative solutions, so we are partnering with thinkers whose bold ideas are already helping to make a difference. We now have online tools like the Slavery Footprint so that people can understand the ways in which this crime affects them. It doesn't just happen to somebody far away, but it does have ripples of criminality that come across the globe.

We have new ways of looking at supply chains and policies, so that can help us cut off the demand that traffickers cruelly exploit. That's particularly important when you think about the buying power of the federal government. So I think that we meet at a time when we have a lot to be grateful for in terms of the enhanced efforts that we've made, the results that we're getting, but I think this task force is really focused on the challenge and the way ahead.

So let me now turn to Ambassador CdeBaca, who will say a few words about why we consider this such a high priority in our government.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you, Madam Secretary. It's this Administration's priority to give voice to the survivors of modern slavery whether in court or in our foreign policy, but those voices have been calling for justice for more than 150 years. A letter from the National Archives recently surfaced, a letter written in September of 1864 by Spotswood Rice to Katherine Diggs, his former master. He wrote from the lines of the Union Army as he and his new comrades marched back to Missouri, back towards the plantation where he had been held. Among those still enslaved was his daughter, Mary. His strength and righteous anger rings out through the years. And I quote:

"I want you to understand that mary is my Child and she is a God given rite of my own. And you may hold on to hear as long as you can, but I want you to remember this one thing -- the longor you keep my Child from me, the longor you will have to burndz?and the qwicer youll get theirdz?

"I want you now to just hold on to hear if you want to iff your conchosence tells thats the road go that road and what it will brig you to kittey diggs I have no fears about geting mary out of your hands the whole Government gives cheer to me and you cannot help your self."

We know from the oral histories that once freed, that little girl lived a long and prosperous life. And in 1937, an aged Mary told a WPA historian: "I love army men. My father, brother, husband, and son were all army men. I love a man who fights for his rights and any person who wants to be someone."

Slavery and the ways that we fight it have changed so much since Spotswood Rice and those other survivors marched with that terrible, swift sword. But as you said last year, Madam Secretary, when we take up this burden at home and abroad, we do it because fighting slavery is part of our national identity. It's who we are.

Together, we can and we must rise to meet Spotswood Rice's challenge to go back for everyone's daughters and sons who remain in servitude. Together, we can give cheer to those who answer the call and march with today's survivors on their road to freedom.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you so much, Lou. And one of the things that Lou has done over his professional life of commitment to this issue is to continually link it to larger struggles for human freedom, including our own.

I want to turn now to the Attorney General, because the Attorney General and the Justice Department have been great partners in our efforts to combat this scourge. And I want to thank Attorney General Holder.

ATTORNEY GENERAL HOLDER: Well, thank you, Secretary Clinton. And also let me start by thanking President Obama for hosting us and for his extraordinary leadership in this global fight against human trafficking, and also thanks to my good friend Valerie Jarrett for bringing us together today and for her attention to this issue.

It's really an honor for me to join with my colleagues and partners to discuss the progress that we have made over the past year, but also to identify ways in which we can continue the momentum that we have built up over the past year and make sure that all that we have pledged to do in this Administration actually does occur.

One of the things I would point out is that one of the four priorities that I've identified for the Justice Department is that we protect the most vulnerable among us. And this fits right into one of those four core priorities for the United States Department of Justice. For Justice, our commitment to preventing human trafficking, bringing traffickers to justice, and assisting victims has really never been stronger, and our approach, I don't think, has ever been more effective. Our work has sent a clear and critical message that in this country and under this Administration, human trafficking crimes will simply not be tolerated.

I'm proud to report that in the past year we charged a record number of people with human trafficking offenses, and over the last three years we have achieved significant increases in human trafficking prosecutions, including the rise of more than 30 percent in the number of forced labor and adult sex trafficking prosecutions.

Now, this work is really more than statistics. It has saved lives. It has ensured freedom. It has restored dignity to women, to men, to children, in virtually every corner of this country. We have liberated scores of victims. We have secured long prison sentences against individual traffickers. But we've also dismantled really large transnational organized crime enterprises. As many of you will recall, last February the Justice Department launched a human trafficking enhanced enforcement initiative in order to take our counter-trafficking enforcement levels - efforts to a new level.

Now, as part of this commitment, I announced the Anti-Trafficking Coordination Team, or ACT Team, initiative that's an interagency collaboration among the Departments of Justice, Homeland Security, and Labor, aimed at streamlining federal criminal investigations and prosecutions of human trafficking offenses. And following a very rigorous and competitive interagency selection process, we launched six Phase One Pilot ACT Teams around the country. And they are located in Atlanta, El Paso, Kansas City, Los Angeles, Memphis, and Miami, and today these teams are fully operational. And by bringing federal investigative agencies and federal prosecutors together, they are allowing us to develop and to advance high-impact human trafficking prosecutions.

And let me just share some examples with you. Over the last year we have dismantled a large transnational organized crime enterprise that held Ukrainian victims in forced labor in Philadelphia. We have brought freedom and dignity to undocumented Central American women and convicted the traffickers who, with threats of violence and abuse, compelled them into forced labor and prostitution in restaurants and bars on Long Island in New York. We have restored freedom to undocumented Eastern European women and convicted the traffickers who brutally exploited them in massage parlors in Chicago and even branded them with tattoos to claim them as their own property. We have secured a life sentence against a gang member in the Eastern District of Virginia, just across the river here, for sex trafficking of victims as young as 12 years old.

By providing grant funding to our state and local law enforcement partners and to victims service organizations really across the country, the Justice Department is also supporting proactive efforts to stop traffickers and to help victims heal and to rebuild their lives.

And for the entire anti-trafficking community, we are continuing to provide training and technical assistance as well. And over the last year these efforts have included hosting three regional training forums that have focused on improving collaboration as well as the development of a training curriculum to help state prosecutors and state judges better understand human trafficking crimes. This is something that has to be done at the state and local level as well as at the federal level.

We're also taking steps to forge and strengthen partnerships across international borders, understanding that this is not simply an American problem. And we have seen that this effort is really essential. Over the last year, by working with our Mexican law enforcement partners, we have dismantled sex trafficking networks that operate on both sides of the U.S.-Mexico border and have brought freedom to victims and secured really landmark convictions and substantial sentences against the traffickers in these high-impact bilateral cases. We've had good cooperation with our Mexican counterparts.

So I think we can all be encouraged by our recent achievements in the fight against human trafficking, but I think we would all agree that we have still more to do and that far too many people remain in desperate need for the help that we can provide. And that's why I think that our joint efforts and our outstanding efforts really must continue. I am committed to this. The Justice Department is committed to this. This group that meets today is obviously committed to this. This Administration has identified this as a priority.

So I look forward to our discussions as to where we will go from here and how we can keep working in partnership to increase the impact of these very critical efforts. Thank you.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you very much, Attorney General. Now I'd like to invite Secretary Hilda Solis to share the Labor Department's update. And I want to thank Hilda for making this a high priority within the Labor Department.

SECRETARY SOLIS: Thank you very much, Madam Secretary, and also to our colleagues. I want to also congratulate President Obama and Valerie Jarrett for having this meeting convened here. This is a topic that obviously is very controversial and one that some of us in this room we know take very seriously and, of course, feel that we need to do as much as we can to make sure that every effort, especially at the Department of Labor, is focused in on combating this terrible error that occurs not just in our shores but also abroad.

I want to applaud President Obama. He's been very clear in his vision for an America built to last, one where everyone has a fair shot at success and where everyone plays by the same rules. Our actions to end the exploitation of workers are critical to achieving that vision. That's why the Department of Labor is here.

The Department of Labor's efforts to combat human trafficking have been broad and varied and can be broken down into two - three main categories. The first is detection and law enforcement. Our investigators are on the front lines of trafficking, identifying potential cases and providing critical support such as translation services during investigations.

We've revamped the integrity and enforcement actions of our guest worker program to ensure a fair process for employers who use temporary foreign workers and to enforce protections for all of our workers. We've now announced new protocols to begin certifying new visas. That's allowed us to help immigrant victims of trafficking assist in investigation of those crimes.

The second category involves transnational engagement and research. We've signed currently declarations with Mexico, Guatemala, Nicaragua, El Salvador, Costa Rica, and DR to ensure that foreign workers, often the most vulnerable, are informed of their labor rights here in the U.S. This is very important as well because, in many cases, folks come here thinking that there are no serious protections available to them, there is no one that's going to listen to them, so it's a course of trying to reeducate people over and over again that there are different laws here, and there is a responsibility and accountability process.

The funding that we have included in these programs includes technical assistance projects and research that we're doing across the board on child and forced labor across the globe. And since 1995, the Department of Labor has been funding projects to combat the worst forms of child labor. And as a result, hundreds of thousands of children have been prevented from being trafficked.

The third and final category in our efforts to combat trafficking victims is services - services that must be provided, a full restitution for the labor that they have performed. So we are very excited to be working with our friends in Department of Justice and our other sister agencies on these issues. Alongside our agency partners, we've been proud to assist these victims by computing the back wages that they are rightfully owed. So that's a big message, I think, to the overall community that it's time to speak up and not be afraid to speak out.

Another critical part of helping trafficking victims is to make sure that they have the support they need to get back on their feet, so we're proud to offer employment and training services to victims of severe forms of trafficking through our network of one-stop career centers so they can enter and get information and, hopefully, get on their feet again. And of course, we're aiming to support workers.

We're also aiming to support employers in helping us combat trafficking, so that's another big part of our effort. Our enforcement officers are working both to ensure a level playing field of law-abiding businesses, because we don't agree that unscrupulous businesses should get away with this crime, and to protect the rights of workers to deter unscrupulous employers that continue to exploit workers.

Looking ahead, we continue to remain committed to further these efforts. Soon, we'll be providing awareness training to our national field staff so that even more prepared individuals will know about this issue. We'll also be announcing a new joint declaration with the following - the Philippines, Ecuador, and Peru - to make sure that their vulnerable workers here in our country know of their rights and protections available.

Additionally, we'll do more to engage with our stakeholders in this critical issue by hosting listening sessions, roundtables, and making sure that our fact sheets and reports are also equally translated in those various languages that are much needed as well.

Finally, I look forward to partnering with all of you in fulfilling the Promise campaign, which is critical to our collective action on the issue.

I want to thank everyone. I'm incredibly proud of the work that all of you and all of us have been able to accomplish under your leadership in this Administration. Thank you.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you so much, Hilda, and let me now turn to Secretary Sebelius. Obviously the Department of Health and Human Services is an absolutely essential partner in everything we do.

Kathleen.

SECRETARY SEBELIUS: Well, thank you, Secretary, for your leadership on this task force. And Valerie, I hope that you convey to the President how important we all think it is that he has provided the kind of vision and leadership that brings us all here today, because this collaborative effort is incredibly important.

On this issue, the Department of Health and Human Services is motivated by the collaboration across federal agencies to raise public awareness and make the most of our resources. And we're especially motivated to continue the important role in reaching and helping human trafficking victims every day. So over the past year, we have really deployed a lot of assets to our regional offices, 10 of them around the country, who have expanded their efforts to develop staff capacity through multiple trainings and meetings to monitor and combat human trafficking. We substantially expanded our outreach efforts through the Rescue and Restore Victims of Human Trafficking campaign, which includes now an online posting of the Look Beneath the Surface training video that is both available in English and Spanish.

During the last fiscal year, we built on our anti-trafficking efforts by providing services and resources on human trafficking through the Runaway and Homeless Youth Training and Technical Assistance Center. Going forward, the President's Fiscal Year 2013 budget includes a new $5 million proposal to award competitive grants focused on reducing the exploitation of children in the form of domestic sex trafficking. HHS also, as Secretary Clinton has referred, funds the National Human Trafficking Resource Center, which is a nationwide resource for potential victims and the public who may encounter a trafficking situation.

We maintain a national toll-free hotline that operates 24 hours a day, seven days a week, every day of the year. And last year, the hotline received over 16,000 calls, a 43 percent increase in the last fiscal year, which I think is both an indication of the depth of the problem, but also an indication that people now are aware that there's someplace to go for help. Of this total, we have close to 800 cases resulting in direct report to law enforcement, which is a 51 percent increase, so that connecting the hotline with actual action on the ground, thanks to our partners in the Department of Justice, has been a really important initiative.

Through a recently established interdepartmental working group, HHS and other agencies are discussing better coordination of the federal anti-trafficking efforts when dealing with victims and attendant services training and technical assistance. And as a group, we've identified the need for two types of call lines - a central hotline for calls regarding victims and investigative tip lines. We've also agreed to explore additional opportunities to appropriately highlight and differentiate between the resource center and the investigation hotlines.

So I feel confident that our efforts at HHS, hand in hand with our federal partners here at the table, continue to move us closer to our ultimate goal of freedom for all by bringing an end to this inexcusable human rights abuse.

And again, thank you, Madam Secretary, for convening this critical meeting, for the report that you're doing, and we look forward to continuing this critical work together.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you very much, Kathleen.

Now let me turn to the Department of Homeland Security's update. Certainly, DHS personnel are on the front lines not only here at home but literally around the world, and we greatly appreciate Secretary Napolitano's leadership.

SECRETARY NAPOLITANO: And thank you, Secretary Clinton. I also appreciate the leadership you've shown on this issue and the leadership of the President. It's a social issue, it's an economic issue, it's a law enforcement issue, it's a moral issue, and I think that joins us all around the table. We have also been working through partnerships of various types under an umbrella we call the Blue Campaign at DHS. It is leading directly to more tips, more investigations, improved services for victims, and I think will help us serve our ultimate goal of finally getting some deterrence to this issue.

We have partnered with the Department of State to develop two online trainings, one for the federal acquisition workforce. Our contractors have a zero-tolerance clause built into every federal contract, so we're now training them and also training for the general public. CBP has worked with the Department of Transportation to launch something called the Blue Lightning Initiative, teaching airline employees the signs of trafficking and how to notify law enforcement. We're working with the firefighter and EMS communities to create training for first responders who may come into contact with victims, and we are in the process of putting the finishing touches on a one-week interdisciplinary training course at the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center, FLETC, which will bring together teams representing victim services, investigations, prosecutions, a first of its kind type of training in this area. And we expect it to be available no later than this summer.

We've worked to increase public awareness of human trafficking through targeted video messages and public service announcements, including CBP's No Te Enganes campaign, Don't Be Fooled, and ICE's Hidden in Plain Sight campaign, which reached an estimated 5 million people.

We've worked to address and recognize the needs and unique challenges of trafficking victims. We have now put 39 specially trained human trafficking experts in each of our ICE field offices, and we've doubled the number of forensic interview specialists. CIS has developed a one-pager for law enforcement on options for victims, including the T and the U visa programs.

The efforts are succeeding. We are finding more investigations with a nexus to human trafficking. Last year, we initiated 722, we obtained 271 convictions. Eric, working with your folks, seized assets worth well over $2 million. We also have seen a steady increase in the number of reports to the tip line, up 69 percent between FY2010 and 2011, and I think looking at the '12 numbers, there will be another record, unfortunately, in a way.

This year, we plan to do even more. We are requiring all of our contracting professionals to take training on combating trafficking in persons, and we have already trained 600 acquisition personnel on how to use that clause in the standard federal contract. We're working to assure that age-appropriate care and services are provided to unaccompanied minor children encountered by us typically through the immigration system. We had a roundtable discussion here at the White House with retail, hotel, and airline industry leaders, and also with state, local, tribal, and territorial law enforcement agencies and associations discussing ways we could work together to raise awareness. We are continuing to deploy ideas from those sessions.

And we are expanding the reach and scope of our free, interactive computer-based training system for local law enforcement partners. We work extensively with Justice, with Labor on the ACT teams that the Attorney General referenced, because those teams, I think, hold great promise in actually dealing with this problem. So we will continue to listen, we will continue to work, and like everyone else around the table, we intend to, if anything, increase our commitment. Thank you.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Great. Thank you very much, Janet. Now let me turn to Cecilia Munoz, the assistant to the President and Domestic Policy Council Director.

Cecilia.

MS. MUNOZ: Thank you very much, Madam Secretary. It's a real honor to be part of this gathering today. This is obviously incredibly important work and it falls to me to talk a little bit about the work of the Domestic Policy Council on the domestic side of this issue.

As everyone in this room knows, two years ago, the President forcefully articulated his personal commitment to fighting modern slavery and human trafficking, described it as a shared responsibility. And as we're hearing today, the - since the President made that commitment two years ago, we've been making progress through investigations and prosecutions, the victims assistance programs, we've been hearing about technical assistance for states and localities. I mean, it's a good list and it's a long list, but it doesn't involve only the work of government. The conscience of the country was really awakened by the President's remarks. And we have churches, we have businesses and communities across the country heeding the President's call to action, finding ways to combat trafficking, and to serve those who have been victimized by it.

The Domestic Policy Council has partnered with many of you in this important work, and the President has really reiterated just this morning in a statement his commitment to these issues. He's instructed his Cabinet, all of us, to find ways to strengthen the good work that we're already doing, and to expand our partnerships with civil society and the private sector so that we can bring more resources to bear on this terrible problem.

As the President announced in his statement, in the coming weeks, the White House will build on this gathering on behalf of human dignity. This is an issue that the President understands the way that your agencies do - as a crime, as a violation of universal human rights - and it's a policy priority on both the domestic and international fronts. We are committed to maximizing our efforts in every way possible, and we're confident that working together, we can - collectively, we can strengthen the efforts of both the federal government and civil society in ending the scourge of modern slavery.

So our direction is clear. We intend to continue to work in partnership with all of you and your teams. The White House intends to redouble its efforts and build on this already strong record of accomplishment, and we're going to reach out to our partners outside of government in the hope that, together, we can really make an unprecedented push to raise awareness and have further real and sustained results. We don't have any illusions about this task being easy. If it - this were an easy issue with simple solutions, we wouldn't need to be here having this gathering today. But we are persuaded that by working with each other effectively and working with our partners around the country and around the world, we can really bring positive change to this issue.

So we will be working with you to expand the resources, to leverage our efforts and our coordinated - coordinating capacity. And so I look forward to working with all of you to do that. I look forward to playing a role in helping lift up the work that you're already doing and helping to coordinate it as strongly as possible. And we're convinced that with this partnership within government and partnerships outside of government, we can make an enormous difference on this issue, and we're honored to be part of it.

Thank you, Madam Secretary.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you so much, Cecilia. Now I will turn to someone I work with practically every day on a wide variety of security issues around the world, and I'm delighted that he would be here for this meeting.

So, Assistant to the President, Deputy National Security Advisor Denis McDonough.

MR. MCDONOUGH: Madam Secretary, thank you very much, and allow me to join Cecilia in thanking all of your teams who we get to work with every day on this matter. Let me just take a minute too to highlight our team - Rob Berschinski, Quintan Wiktorowicz, and most especially, Samantha Power, who, on behalf of the National Security staff, have really made this a priority and have been working with your teams to push this through.

Human trafficking is just one of those topics that doesn't make it in the paper every day. But I think what we see in this year's report and in each of the reports that are coming from the agencies now is that the work that all the agencies are doing is actually having a very profound, life-changing impact on Americans and non-Americans, men, women, and children all around the world. So it's something about which I think we should feel quite good, recognizing, of course, as everybody said, that there's an awful lot of work to be done.

The fact is that the - when the United States Government, when our people, are understood to be an international leader on this issue, it speaks to something at the heart of the President's National Security Strategy, which he put out in 2010 - one, that we're strengthened by the power of our example, and that we're strongest when we're working to advance the dignity of individuals all around the world. So for us at the National Security staff, this is a national security issue.

It is - human trafficking is at the nexus of organized crimes, is a source for funding for international terrorist groups, is a source for funding for transnational criminal groups. It fundamentally endangers international security. And so while we're trying to create an international economy in which everyone can choose and be paid for for their work, it, by lifting this up, will strengthen our ability to be a leader in the global marketplace as well.

Now I know Ash, Raj, and Maria have not had a chance to brief out their results yet, so I'm not going to steal their thunder. But I do want to highlight a couple of things that I see from my position in terms of coordinating the interagency's work on this effort.

First, as I said above, when we lead by example, we're standing as a model for other governments in how we train our people, hold them to the highest ethical standards when it comes to trafficking, and makes it able for us to walk the walk as well as talk the talk. As Raj will no doubt highlight, USAID has been at the forefront of this effort through the standards it's applying to all its employees - contractors, subcontractors, and grantees. We recognize that across the government, there's still an awful lot to do to improve on this in terms of procurement of goods and labor, and the President is demanding that we do more in exactly this area as the report pulls forward.

As Secretary Clinton said, being a model also means we're willing to place ourselves to the same level of scrutiny that we're applying to others, which is why he was so appreciative of the report including the United States on the list of countries that are graded in this and State's annual Trafficking in Persons Report this year.

Second, let me emphasize that when it comes to trafficking, one thing that we do know is that we don't know enough. In addition to what Cecilia has mentioned, in his statement today, the President spoke of trafficking as a form of exploitation that hides both in the dark corners of our world and in plain sight in our own towns and country - towns and cities. We know in certain areas we don't have great data on the scope of the problem. And in terms of our programming, we may know what works and what doesn't, but we're still learning precise causal relationships. That's why the President's demanding that we keep the focus on learning and improving on our interventions.

Lastly, and perhaps most importantly, we would urge that on topics like our anti-trafficking work, we maintain laser-like focus on mainstreaming what we're doing in all our day-to-day operations. Whether in your internal strategy development or in policy papers you bring to the interagency coordination arena, if the majority of your staff are diplomats, are development experts, are service members, see efforts to counter trafficking as a silo, as a job of only people in the Trafficking Office, rather than as a core component of their job then we will not have lifted this up the way the President, Secretary, all of you are demanding that we do.

So I'll leave it at that. I'm looking forward to hearing more about the tremendous work that all of your teams have - are underway. And obviously, as each have highlighted, I think we're here to be commended here - on the work done heretofore. And just to echo Cecilia on the President's direction today, our team is looking forward to working with each of you and your teams on the months to come to build on all the good work that we already have in place.

So, Madam Secretary, thank you very much.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you very much, Denis. We really appreciate that overview. Now let me turn to the director of National Intelligence, Lieutenant General Jim Clapper.

LIEUTENANT GENERAL CLAPPER: Thank you, Madam Secretary. And again, I join colleagues in praising you for - commending you for your leadership, and it's an honor to be here. I thought I'd discuss very briefly the intelligence community's role in combating transnational organized crime, and in particular, the understanding and combating trafficking in persons. My priority in this job is to integrate collection analysis across the intelligence community in line with policy-maker needs.

Now after last year's meeting of this group, I rededicated some internal assets to stand up our own transnational organized crime team on my staff, and we never had -- in the history of the DNI, never had a single office for that sort of focus. And in line with the theme of leveraging across the government, we've become very engaged with the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Office, and are experiencing Lou's zeal. (Laughter.)

I've only been active for a short time, but we are seeing an increase, however modest - and I anticipate this will gain momentum through our channels, and I just - I think this is the beginning. We expect bigger results in the future as we continue to strengthen partnerships with key NI human trafficking advocates. And as others have eluded on this issue, partnerships are absolutely crucial to success.

And just to underline a point that Denis just made -- certainly we in the intelligence community recognize this --that trafficking in persons is a national security issue in addition to be a social, economic, and law enforcement issue. And so we're committed to doing our part to defeat it.

Our efforts across the intelligence community to integrate collection analysis and work with state, local, and tribal law enforcement will improve our ability to combat this appalling crime, and we can and must do more.

In October, my team attended the Trafficking in Persons Reporting Conference hosted by the State Department, Miami; made sure that different agencies within the intelligence community attended. This was the first time the IC has ever integrated with the State Department on this mission of ensuring that trafficking in persons reporting is accurate.

In November, our team hosted our own transnational organized crime event at my headquarters via video teleconference, and it was a global thing throughout the IC to many interested members of the intelligence community. And this was, I think, part of my responsibility to ensure awareness within the intelligence community. And a special presentation by the State Department's Trafficking in Persons team was the highlight - had a huge impact, feedback I got.

We also coordinate extensively to have attendees who represent the nations we refer to as our Five Eyes allies. Those are the commonwealth countries with whom we have the closest, most intimate intelligence relationships. So I refer specifically to the UK's Serious Organized Crime Agency, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Australian Federal Police, and the New Zealand Customs agency. We're starting - we're working towards the goal of a better understanding of the role that trafficking plays in persons in national instability, corruption, and crime around the globe. I think it's our job to shine a light on those dark corners.

So I'll just say that we are committed to this and we do recognize that it is a national security issue. Thank you, Madam Chairman.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thanks so much, Jim. Now I'd like to invite Acting Director Zients to share OMB's update. Jeff?

MR. ZIENTS: Thank you. Now given the fiscal situation - everybody knows that budgets are very tight, difficult budget environment; many agencies are experiencing actually lower budget. In this environment, it's OMB's job to make sure every dollar's well spent and importantly, that the most important priorities of the Administration, of the President, are well funded, and that we allocate dollars accordingly. Preventing human trafficking is a clear priority for the President and the Administration, so we are committed to working with each agency to make sure that we have the appropriate resources to fund these important efforts. I think we have good working relationships with each agency and your teams, but we will make sure that adequate resources are allocated to these efforts. We also stand ready to help - in any way to help manage cross-agency processes to ensure that we continue to make significant progress. Thank you.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you very much. We like hearing that. (Laughter.) I hope everybody really (inaudible.)

PARTICIPANT: It was the shortest --

SECRETARY CLINTON: Yeah. We should meet at the White House more often. (Laughter.) Now let me turn to Deputy Secretary Ash Carter to give the Department of Defense's update.

DEPUTY SECRETARY CARTER: Thank you, Secretary Clinton. The President's determination to combat trafficking is reflected in each of the three ways that we, the Department of Defense, touch this problem. Namely, through our own people, uniformed and civilian and their conduct. Second, through our contractors. And the third, in our foreign military training programs. So let me just take each of those in turn.

First of all, for our own folks, both uniformed and civilian, they are required to receive training. I've reviewed the curriculum. It's very good, it's incisive. It basically has two parts: Don't do it and learn to recognize it. So let me take the don't do it part first.

The don't do it part - you may not know this, I was a little surprised myself, but it has only been recently that patronizing a prostitute became an offense under the Uniform Code of Military Justice. It is, and that's something that we need to begin to and continue and increase our enforcement of that provision. Because in the neighborhood around bases here or abroad, obviously, there's an opportunity for that. So don't do it.

And the second part of the training is recognize it. And that - for that, it's part of the annual training. We also have public service announcements on Armed Forces Network and that kind of thing. If you're in a gym somewhere around the world or in Afghanistan, you'll frequently see them to increase awareness and to give the tell-tale signs of it to our people. We do some specific things regionally in PACOM, USFK -- U.S. Forces Korea -- where we've had - historically had an issue there. So wherever we detect it, we try to follow up. And there have been some cases recently, which we have aggressively followed up in the law enforcement sense.

Contractors. You know that for every soldier, sailor, airman, and marine deployed, there's at least one contractor that ends up in theater at the same time. They're all employed by us. Secretary Napolitano already made it clear. It's part of the Federal Acquisition Regulation and it's Defense Federal Acquisition Supplement that contracts are to have a provision forbidding trafficking as in any connection with the country. Now, it's one thing to write it into the contract and you say, "How do you make sure you get it done?" We're going to make it training for the contractors mandatory, even as it is for our own people, civilian and military - number one.

Number two, contracting officer representatives, a COR. What is a COR? COR is the person who makes sure that the contract is executed. So there's somebody who follows around the contractor and makes sure it gets done. Those people are now trained, which they didn't used to be, in recognizing trafficking. So they can see if an association with one of our contracting activities - this has gone on, very important. And we have our inspector general now tracking to make sure that those contract clauses are all there and the contracting officer representatives are, in fact, monitoring compliance with those. Very important, because contractors is a huge part of what we do.

Last piece is our foreign military training engagements. All of our programs, be they 1206, be they IMET, JSET, our training of UN peacekeepers and so forth, it is a required part of that curriculum. If we offer it as a department to another military that it include training for those foreign military members in trafficking, both don't do it and recognize it. So for example, just to give you one example, in the Democratic Republic of Congo, AFRICOM, our African Command, works through DIILS - the Defense Institute for International Legal Studies - maybe some of you may be familiar with - to train justice professionals in the prosecution of trafficking crimes and Congolese military commanders in how to prevent their troops from engaging in this. It's very important in all of our training. So those are our training activities.

So in those three arenas where we might touch this problem and do touch this problem, we're trying to make sure that we're reflecting the President's fight.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thanks very much, Ash. Now, Deputy Secretary Porcari, would you please report from the Department of Transportation?

DEPUTY SECRETARY PORCARI: Thank you, Secretary Clinton, and we appreciate your leadership on this. And Valerie, we very much appreciate the clear and consistent direction the President has given us on this. It's energized all of us.

We want to make sure, first and foremost, that the transportation system is not inadvertently an enabler of human trafficking. We're very committed across land, sea, and air to making sure that's not the case. Marlise Streitmatter, our deputy chief of staff, has been our lead person on this and will continue to be, but we're using all of our resources across borders and agencies to make sure that we can positively impact this problem.

For example, working with Secretary Napolitano in Customs and Border Protection, the Blue Lightning Initiative provides an in-flight procedure to report human trafficking events, law enforcement, as well as awareness for the flight crews. We've gotten very positive response from our airlines on this; they're very interested in moving forward on this. Likewise, on the highways, we want to make sure they're free of human trafficking. If a commercial truck or bus driver commits a felony, we can take them off the road - and obviously, human trafficking is a felony. This gives us an opportunity to remove the bad actors.

We're also pursuing opportunities with Amtrak and the motor coach industry to develop a public awareness campaign and specialized training for our inspectors that are out in the field all across the country to recognize the warning signs of human trafficking. We're also collaborating with our Mexican and Canadian partners to increase awareness, and we look forward to expanding on those partnerships.

There are also some less conventional partnerships that can be very effective. Working, for example, with our local and state departments of motor vehicles, as well as truck stops, to build public awareness, and give people that are literally on the front lines of this fight the tools to recognize and report suspicious activities.

And finally, this really starts at home, and we're working internally within our Department of Transportation, across all the transportation modes, to make sure that we educate our team on identifying human trafficking, and we're building, essentially, on the DHS program that's out there.

So we're dedicated to moving forward with this. This is an unconscionable and unacceptable activity, and we are looking forward on building the - on the progress to date. Thank you.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you very much. Now I'd like to invite from the State Department, Under Secretary of State for Civilian Security, Democracy, and Human Rights, Maria Otero, to go into a little more detail about what we're doing at the State Department.

UNDER SECRETARY OTERO: Thank you very much, Madam Secretary. And I also want to express appreciation for the leadership that our President is giving us on this issue, and Valerie, convening us here, and of course, express the importance for us to be able to work with every department across the board under the commitment and leadership of Secretary Clinton, who has really enabled our Department to push forward in this area.

Over the last year, the TIP Office, under the leadership of Ambassador CdeBaca, but working in partnership with our regional bureaus and with all of the other colleagues across the Department, we've made advances in several areas that I think are important to highlight in addressing the State Department's response to modern slavery. And let me just touch on a couple of them, as Secretary Clinton has also talked about some of them.

First, the Department - as other departments have stated here - is in the process of developing a training program that is going to be applicable for all of our direct hires. And this is with the purpose of helping all of our employees understand the nature of this crime better. And not only be able to understand it but to be able to recognize it when it happens and to be able to see the warning signs before it is happening and also take action if that is necessary. So this is in the process of being developed, and we anticipate through it that the degree of understanding of this issue will increase by all of those that are working at the Department.

Second, Secretary Clinton, last year at this task force, announced the establishment of a new trafficking investigation unit that would be set up by our Diplomatic Security Bureau. And I'm very pleased to say that, indeed, that was not only set up, but that in fact it has been operating this last year. And it is very exciting that it has already carried out a number of investigations that have led to indictments. And that for us is a real sign of being able to move this forward. The unit's Victims' Resource Advocacy Program is also equipped to fully support the victims themselves that are discovered in the course of any of these investigations. So we are applauding our Diplomatic Security Bureau for how quickly they've put together this team, and not only set forth its parameters, but also how its work is already showing results.

Third, we're working to protect the visa holders who come to the United States as domestic servants of diplomats. Thanks to the works of one of our working groups, which is headed by our chief of protocol, we are working closely with the diplomatic community to raise their awareness of this issue and to make sure the diplomats that bring domestic workers to the United States now follow a set of requirements that are in place that will prevent those workers from being abused.

Finally - and Secretary Clinton mentioned this briefly - the TIP Office has partnered with an NGO to develop a tool that allows anybody and everybody to go online, to take a survey, and then to see how many victims of human trafficking it takes to sustain their lifestyle. This is called the Slavery Footprint, and it is the kind of innovation that is helping create change and also create awareness not only of the existence of this crime but also of the challenges that we face in addressing it, and it is bringing people to this issue.

We know that more than three million people from more than 200 countries have logged on to this site, and we're confident that tools such as this one are going to be some that are going to help make a difference in engaging those around the world in addressing this issue in the years ahead. Thank you.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you, Maria. Since we are being broadcast here, perhaps, Lou, you could give the website for the Slavery Footprint, because it's had a remarkable impact, and we want to encourage everybody everywhere to sign on.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Certainly. Thank you, Madam Secretary. It's pretty intuitive. It's the slaveryfootprint.org - not dot com - slaveryfootprint.org.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Right. So we invite everyone to log on.

Now let me turn to Dr. Raj Shah, the USAID administrator, who is such a great partner in this and so much of the work that we do.

ADMINISTRATOR SHAH: Thank you, Madam Secretary, for your focus and direction on these issues, and to President Obama for elevating the attention and the resources that we will hope to invest against results in this space.

In the past year, our agency has made significant progress trying to live up to commitments we've made around this table for each of the past two years as part of this task force. We are implementing a more results-oriented approach to counter-trafficking efforts around the world, which starts, as Denis mentioned, with the adoption of a strict, new code of conduct for ourselves, our partners abroad, our contractors, and in particular, our security contractors that often operate in high-risk conflict environments. The code of conduct, much as Ash Carter described, will make sure that more people serve as eyes and ears in the search for those at risk or those enslaved. And we have intensified procurement actions and implementation of that code of conduct so that those terms are written into our contracts and enforced through our contracts' officers and reviewers.

We've also launched a new counter-trafficking policy developed in close partnership with many agencies represented around the table. This policy requires every USAID mission in a high-risk country to conduct baseline surveys on trafficking and develop clear metrics to assess progress against prevention for our efforts and efforts of others in the international community. It also directs us to create more multi-country databases so victims can be tracked across countries and supported in their efforts as they - as that is such a critical barrier, having that data be accessible in a number of different environments. And it prioritizes investments in technologies, like mapping platforms, mobile applications, and other innovations.

We also believe that the - one of the challenges is getting the word out and making sure that people who are in a difficult situation have the capacity to seek help. In that effort, we have expanded a highly successful partnership with MTV EXIT into Russia for the very first time, but it is a global program that has had some real successes, especially in Asia. Through the partnership with MTV EXIT, they have created public service advertisements, music videos, and other efforts to create awareness about trafficking and provide hotlines so that people can access resources to fight back. We believe it has reached more than 300 million households in Asia over the last seven years.

And just to share one story that we heard about just a few weeks ago, that for more than three years a young Cambodian boy and his three friends had been essentially enslaved on a Thai fishing boat. Just a few weeks ago, their boat docked at a port in Thailand, and they happened to see on television one of the MTV EXIT advertisements about trafficking. The video flashed a free hotline number in both Thai and Cambodian so the kids could read it and respond. They did. Immigration authorities responded immediately, and they were freed. We seek many, many more stories like this and believe our expanded efforts are helping to get us there.

We also know, as the President mentioned in his statement today, that we want to work more effectively with partners throughout our own country in the private sector, on universities and campuses, and in faith-based communities. I recently visited Bethel University, a Christian college outside of Minneapolis, and I met with about 100 students the day after we had released our counter-trafficking policy, actually, in this room. And sometimes it takes in the federal government - as everyone here knows - some time for these policies to be read by our teams and really inform changes and action and behavior. I know we all address that. Every one of the 100 kids that I met with had already read our policy online, and they had ideas, they had things they wanted to contribute.

So today, we're thrilled to announce that we will launch a college - a campus challenge to combat trafficking, and we'll seek to partner with the most innovative, creative ideas in the realm of prevention and protection. And we'll match our campus challenge champions, the winners of our awards, with our missions in the field, so students have access to many of our partners who are on the frontlines of trying to help victims or help communities that are in high risk. We look forward to working with the next generation of American students to craft the next generation of solutions to this critical challenge.

And thank you for the chance to be here.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you so much, Raj. That's very exciting news. Let me now ask Deputy Director Sean Joyce of the FBI to share the FBI's update.

MR. JOYCE: Thank you, Madam Secretary. And thank you to the White House for hosting this event today. And I'd like to take this opportunity to thank all the people on the street that work this issue each and every day and many of the folks in this room in some of the chairs behind us that work tirelessly every day on some of the policy issues regarding this issue.

The FBI continues its commitment to fighting human trafficking and child exploitation in coordination with our federal, state, and local partners. Over the last year, we've increased our resources approximately 66 percent dedicated to this issue, especially against instances of coerced or forced adult labor, in addition to our agency placing a tremendous significance on ensuring child victims are safe, secure, and away from those who would prey on their innocence.

I can tell you I've been personally involved in rescuing some child victims, and as a father and a special agent, it is both emotional and rewarding, but devastating for the victims. The FBI recognizes these investigations require specialized resources, and thus we commit 80 victim specialists from our Office of Victim Assistance to our human trafficking efforts. To facilitate our fight against human trafficking and child exploitation, we participate in 77 task forces in 47 working groups across the country.

One highlight is our Innocent Lost National Initiative we started in 2003. This initiative addresses the tragic challenge of children recruited into prostitution. It is supported by the Department of Justice, Child Exploitation/Obscenity Section, and the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. To date, the initiative has resulted in 1,961 children being rescued. There have been nearly 1,500 investigations initiated, resulting in 927 convictions, to include seven life sentences and several ranging in length from 25 to 45 years.

Recognizing this is also an international problem. The FBI continues to build capacity through a number of training efforts, and in conjunction with our partners in the Department of State, we recently administered a two-week human trafficking course for law enforcement officials from El Salvador, Guatemala, Nicaragua, and Panama. The FBI looks forward to the continued collaboration with our law enforcement partners, both at home and abroad, to ensure that child exploitation and/or forced or coerced adult labor is met with swift justice.

Thank you, Madam Secretary, for this opportunity.

SECRETARY CLINTON: Thank you very much, Deputy Director and Special Agent. That was a very stirring rendition of the great work you're doing, and I appreciate it.

Let me now turn to Assistant Secretary Russlynn Ali to share the Department of Education's update.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY ALI: Thank you, Madam Secretary, Ms. Jarrett, and to all of you for your commitment on this issue. Secretary Duncan shares in that commitment and this sense of urgency.

Over the past year, we have set about using all of the tools within our disposal to really launch an awareness through - prevention through awareness efforts in our schools, through technical assistance and supports and training for educators that need it so that they can spot the warning signals. We know that these signals, whether they be absenteeism or signs of abuse or behavioral problems, they prevent children from learning. They not only affect the victim and those at prey of traffickers but the entire school community. And schools have a responsibility and need help and support.

So it is about identifying where those problem areas exist, working with so many of you to target our solutions and our efforts, to answer the calls of educators and school districts around the country that are dealing with these problems in ways that they have never before, helping them with language and talking to school-age children about very difficult and grown-up issues. And how they do that with sincerity and the education they need to help their children be safe is something that is hugely important as well.

We are also doing the kind of technical assistance through web-based tools on what services are available, what supports are available. We've brought together, just last summer, over 2,

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS hc11-120317-3809874 StaffFurigay

LOAD-DATE: March 17, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Targeted News Service LLC
All Rights Reserved

183 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Voice of America News

March 14, 2012

Thailand Human Trafficking Problems Continue to Draw Scrutiny

BYLINE: Luke Hunt

SECTION: VOA ENGLISH SERVICE

LENGTH: 583 words

Thai authorities are bracing themselves for a possible downgrade on the U.S. State Department's watch list of countries with the worst records in combating human trafficking.

Thailand was initially classified as a Tier Two country on the Trafficking in Persons list in 2010 for not complying with minimum standards required to address the trafficking of people. If a country shows no sign of improvement after two years at that level it automatically drops into the bottom, or Tier Three, list alongside North Korea, Cuba and Burma.

This can potentially trigger non-humanitarian sanctions.

Groups like Human Rights Watch and the Mirror Foundation say Thailand has experienced an increase in trafficking, in particular young girls, in recent years, putting it in jeopardy of joining the world's worst offenders.

Human Rights Watch Asia Deputy Director Phil Robertson told a panel discussion at the Foreign Correspondents' Club of Thailand that authorities have passed laws that should be sufficient to stem the tide of human trafficking, but there has been a reluctance to defend the rights of victims.

"Human trafficking has to be understood in the context of the migration of as many as two- to three-million migrant workers from Laos, Cambodia, and Burma who are in Thailand, many without documents and have no access to any sort of system that works for them," Robertson said.

Robertson says even those charged with breaking up trafficking rings are complicit in abuses against illegal workers. "The police themselves are frankly predatory. They see migrant workers as an opportunity to extort, abuse," he explained. "We have stories of instances where police have been involved in human-trafficking issues."

Criticism has been particularly harsh after a preliminary report was released last year by the U.N. Special Rapporteur for Trafficking in Persons. It criticized Thailand for a weak and fragmented legal framework on trafficking, deep rooted corruption among law enforcement officers, and poor victim identification.

The report was backed by Eaklak Loomchomkhae from the Mirror Foundation.

He told the panel through an interpreter that there has been an increase in girls between age 11 and 15 being trafficked into prostitution. Because they are underage, they are not being forced to work out of brothels or karaoke bars and instead they are being ferried directly to the homes of clients.

He says this has made it difficult to detect the true extent of the problem. "These children's clients, many of them are government servants or are well known people in their local area, so it is very difficult, hard, to follow them or do anything to them," Loomchomkhae stated.

Thailand Ministry for Foreign Affairs Deputy Director General for International Organizations Chutintorn Gongsakdi defends the government's anti-trafficking efforts, while facing a broad range of challenges in recent years.

"We are an upper middle-income country, according to the members of the committee on the rights of the child, and with that status comes greater expectation and we are finding it is not so easy to live up to those expectations," Gongskadi said. "But we have a willingness, we know we have those responsibilities."

Gongskadi added his government has also accepted more than 130 recommendations from the U.N. report by the Special Rapporteur. But analysts say those steps may not be sufficient to sway the U.S. State Department from relegating Thailand to Tier Three status in its 2012 report, expected in June.

LOAD-DATE: March 14, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Journal

JOURNAL-CODE: VAV

Copyright 2012 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

184 of 492 DOCUMENTS

The New Zealand Herald

March 2, 2012 Friday

David Farrar: Slavery on our seas

SECTION: NEWS; GeneralLENGTH: 695 words

This week the Government received the report of the Ministerial Inquiry into the use of and operation of foreign charter vessels.

These vessels fish in our exclusive economic zone, on behalf of NZ companies that have quota allocations in different fish stocks. Some foreign charter vessels seem to operate with few problems - those under Ukrainian, Japanese and Dominican flags seem to operate in compliance with New Zealand laws. But the reported abuses on some of the Korean flagged vessels are horrific.

A failure to pay minimum wages under NZ law (which the FCVs have agreed to do) is the least of the abuses. They get told they will lose the little pay they do get unless they lie to the NZ authorities about how much they are paid. Any complaints can see them lose bonds worth more than their earnings. They are forced to work long and dangerous hours with no regard for safety.

But even worse than there, there are several documented cases of physical violence, sexual abuse and even rape of the (mainly Indonesian) staff who work on these vessels. They are basically treated as slaves during their incarceration on the vessels. Actually many slaves in the Roman republic were treated better, than what has happened to these workers in our territorial waters.

These abuses have gone on for far too long. New Zealand has even ended up on the watch list of the US State Department whose annual Trafficking in Persons Report mentions fishing in New Zealand as a problem area.

New Zealand law and policies require staff on board FCVs to be paid the at least $2 an hour over the New Zealand minimum wage, or $2,700 a month gross for a 42 hour week. But in reality many of the Indonesian fishers get paid little more than $150 a month or less than $1 an hour. They get told they must sign two employment contracts - one for the NZ authorities, and the real one which details a much lower rate of pay.

The Ministerial inquiry has not recommended phasing out the use of FCVs. The main reason for this is it seems there is not enough capacity in New Zealand to fish all of our quota ourselves. This surprises me with so many people unemployed, but I guess not many people want to be out at sea for weeks or months at a time. There are also issues of capital and specialist equipment.

A number of Iwi hold fishing quota. They say they would like to fish it themselves but don't have the resources to buy or lease a boat, and staff it. That is a pity, as part of the rationale for the fisheries treaty settlement of 20 years ago, was to build capacity and jobs amongst Maori in their traditional activity of fishing. It seems it is easier to just on-sell the quota (which to be fair does provide income for the Iwi to provide health and social services).

The Ministerial Inquiry has recommended that MAF place an observer on all FCVs which is something I have advocated previously. They are also recommending that the burden of proof around wage compliance be changed so that FCVs must prove they are paying the correct wages, by requiring them to go into a NZ bank account which can be audited. Further it is proposed that the NZ charter party must be the legal employer with crew having an enforceable NZ employment agreement.

There are a number of other recommendations also. The Government has already agreed to some of the recommendations, but is considering others in more detail. I believe it is important to keep the pressure on the Government to do everything they can to stop these abuses.

The problem is that its ability to act is limited, while the FCVs are flagged under the flags of other countries. This means that, for example, any rapes on board the ships are a matter for the flag state, not New Zealand, unless they are in New Zealand territorial waters (up to 12 miles out) rather than the New Zealand Exclusive Economic Zone (up to 200 miles out). This means that even these changes may prove ineffective, and the eventual solution may have to be require all vessels fishing in our EEZ to be New Zealand flagged ships. This would have adverse economic consequences, but we can't allow these abuses to continue in our waters, by ships fishing New Zealand quota.

LOAD-DATE: March 2, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 The New Zealand Herald
All Rights Reserved

185 of 492 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

February 29, 2012 Wednesday

IDLO SUPPORTS THE NATIONAL RESPONSE TO HUMAN TRAFFICKING IN PARAGUAY

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 375 words

DATELINE: ASUNCION, Paraguay

The following information was released by the International Development Law Organization (IDLO):

IDLO, in partnership with the Inter-institutional Committee against Human Trafficking in Paraguay, is hosting three national and international meetings to strengthen the capacity of public officials engaged in the investigation and prosecution of human trafficking cases.

These conferences are part of IDLO and the Office of the Public Prosecutor's efforts to combat human trafficking in the country.

"Effective investigation, prosecution and punishment are fundamental to protecting victims of trafficking and ensuring their access to justice" said IDLO Director-General Irene Khan. "Human trafficking remains a major problem in this region, which is why continued efforts by the government are crucial to tackling this problem."

"IDLO's work is extremely timely as we embark on a five-year Strategic Plan," said Dr. Teresa Martinez, Prosecutor of Human Trafficking and Child Sexual Exploitation, "the government is ready to play a pivotal role to address human trafficking in Paraguay."

Background information Paraguay (Tier 2 Watch List) is recognized as a point of origin for victims of human trafficking for both sexual and labor exploitation. Women, children, and indigenous people are particularly at risk of being trafficked. The Government of Paraguay is making significant efforts to comply with minimum standards to eliminate trafficking; greater public awareness and the ability to recognize human trafficking cases will be fundamental in this process.

IDLO's 15-month project "Strengthening Access to Justice and Prosecuting the Crime of Human Trafficking" is supported by the Dutch government. The Project aims at strengthening the ability to investigate and prosecute cases at the national and regional levels by providing technical assistance to: (i) review current procedural and criminal law related to human trafficking and its harmonization with international standards; (ii) train public officials involved in investigating and prosecuting trafficking cases; (iii) exchange intra-regional practices related to the investigation, prosecution and criminal sanction of human trafficking with officials from Argentina, Brazil, Chile and Colombia.

LOAD-DATE: February 28, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

186 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

February 21, 2012 Tuesday 3:00 PM TSTTaiwan, Thailand discuss possible anti-trafficking deal*BYLINE: Christie ChenLENGTH: 366 wordsDATELINE: Taipei, Feb. 21

Taiwan and Thailand have discussed the possibility of signing an agreement to jointly combat human trafficking, the National Immigration Agency said Tuesday at the conclusion of a visit to Thailand by its director-general Hsieh Li-kung.

In a meeting between Hsieh and Thailand's Immigration Bureau Commissioner Wiboon Bangthamai, it was agreed that their two agencies should move in the direction of such a pact, but no details were discussed, the agency said.

Taiwan signed a memorandum of understanding with Mongolia last August that allows the two countries to hold joint training sessions and share intelligence on trafficking crimes.

A similar agreement with Thailand would provide an institutional basis for mutual legal assistance in the fight against human trafficking, Hsieh said last week.

He was on five-day visit to Thailand to update officials there on Taiwan's efforts against human trafficking and terrorism.

In his meeting with Bangthamai, Hsieh mentioned a security system that was launched in Taiwan last year to allow immigration officers to screen passenger information in advance and thus help prevent terrorist attacks.

Hsieh also said one of the ways to prevent human trafficking is to develop policies that would require coordination among labor brokers, workers and employers.

Some Thai workers in Taiwan who were recruited by labor brokers have become victims of human trafficking because of poor coordination among the three sides, he said.

Hsieh also visited Thailand's National Anti-Corruption Commission and the Thailand office of Transparency International, a global anti-corruption organization.

He suggested that governments join forces with non-government organizations and civic groups to fight corruption and improve education at the primary and secondary school level on anti-corruption issues.

Taiwan was listed as a "tier 1 country" in the U.S. State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report in both 2010 and 2011, becoming the only country in Asia besides South Korea to obtain that ranking.

As of the end of 2011, there were 67,803 Thai workers and 8,262 Thai spouses in Taiwan. The number of trips in and out of the country by Thai nationals last year was 177,773.

LOAD-DATE: February 21, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Central News Agency
All Rights Reserved

187 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

February 15, 2012 Wednesday

Uganda; 600 Girls Victims of Human Trafficking in Malaysia

BYLINE: The Monitor (Kampala)

LENGTH: 533 words

At least 600 Ugandan girls have been forced into Malaysia's sex trade in what has become a human trafficking epidemic, a foreign diplomat has said.

Hajah Noraihan, the Malaysian consul to Uganda, said despite an early warning to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in 2008 when the number of trafficked girls stood at 30, the constant flow of victims has not slowed.

She says Malaysian intelligence indicates 10 girls continue to fall through the cracks of Uganda's immigration and labour systems daily.

"Nothing was done and this is what happened," Ms Noraihan said.

Malaysia, a country known for its poor human trafficking record although it has traditionally been within the Asian region, is currently on a US state department watch list for not having shown adequate evidence of its efforts to combat the scourge.

However, it has been working to curb the illegal practice after a raid last October in which 21 Ugandan girls were freed from forced prostitution.

Only five of these have since returned to Uganda, while the rest are being held in a Malaysian detention centre, Ms Noraihan said.

A total of 60 girls are being held on fraudulent visa charges as a result of an ongoing immigration sweep.

The line between girls who are "caught" or "saved" as Ms Noraihan terms them, is often a matter of technicality. A victim's silence or shame can see them face criminal charges instead of being brought back to Uganda, she said.

Coming home

The International Organisation of Migration (IOM) says it has successfully returned 14 girls to Uganda from Malaysia, but that they are only able to move victims who have been clearly identified and volunteer to come home.

Director of Interpol Asan Kasingye, who confirmed the figure of more than 600, said young, poor and vulnerable girls are targeted by recruiters after being lured overseas with the promise of legitimate high-paying jobs.

He said many more may be trapped in an unknown location, or are intimidated into silence by their captors.

According to Ms Noraihan, three Ugandan women have been killed in Malaysia since 2010 for trying to escape.

Mr James Mugume, the permanent secretary of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, said he was unaware of the staggering figures the consul presented. However, he said an Internal Affairs committee made up of Interpol, Immigration and Ministry of Labour representatives has been tasked with identifying recruiters and addressing lax immigration procedures.

The return trips for the 60 girls still in Malaysian prisons will have to be funded by their families or the IOM, Mr Mugume said.

"The biggest issue is we have to stop the traffic from here," Mr Mugume said. "You have to focus on the root causes - who is recruiting these people?"

Mr Kasingye said he could not discuss the details of the case, but that "some" people have been arrested and charged in Uganda.

He added that it has been difficult to bring suspects to justice with so few witnesses available in the country, as most are still in Malaysia.

However, Mr Kasingye said the findings of an ongoing investigation into a number of registered security companies suspected of involvement in fraudulent employment practices will be presented before Parliament this month.

LOAD-DATE: February 15, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

Copyright 2012 AllAfrica, Inc.

188 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

Africa News

February 15, 2012 Wednesday

Uganda; Sex Traffickers Victimize Hundreds of Girls

BYLINE: The Monitor (Kampala)

LENGTH: 533 words

At least 600 Ugandan girls have been forced into Malaysia's sex trade in what has become a human trafficking epidemic, a foreign diplomat has said.

Hajah Noraihan, the Malaysian consul to Uganda, said despite an early warning to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in 2008 when the number of trafficked girls stood at 30, the constant flow of victims has not slowed.

She says Malaysian intelligence indicates 10 girls continue to fall through the cracks of Uganda's immigration and labour systems daily.

"Nothing was done and this is what happened," Ms Noraihan said.

Malaysia, a country known for its poor human trafficking record although it has traditionally been within the Asian region, is currently on a US state department watch list for not having shown adequate evidence of its efforts to combat the scourge.

However, it has been working to curb the illegal practice after a raid last October in which 21 Ugandan girls were freed from forced prostitution.

Only five of these have since returned to Uganda, while the rest are being held in a Malaysian detention centre, Ms Noraihan said.

A total of 60 girls are being held on fraudulent visa charges as a result of an ongoing immigration sweep.

The line between girls who are "caught" or "saved" as Ms Noraihan terms them, is often a matter of technicality. A victim's silence or shame can see them face criminal charges instead of being brought back to Uganda, she said.

Coming home

The International Organisation of Migration (IOM) says it has successfully returned 14 girls to Uganda from Malaysia, but that they are only able to move victims who have been clearly identified and volunteer to come home.

Director of Interpol Asan Kasingye, who confirmed the figure of more than 600, said young, poor and vulnerable girls are targeted by recruiters after being lured overseas with the promise of legitimate high-paying jobs.

He said many more may be trapped in an unknown location, or are intimidated into silence by their captors.

According to Ms Noraihan, three Ugandan women have been killed in Malaysia since 2010 for trying to escape.

Mr James Mugume, the permanent secretary of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, said he was unaware of the staggering figures the consul presented. However, he said an Internal Affairs committee made up of Interpol, Immigration and Ministry of Labour representatives has been tasked with identifying recruiters and addressing lax immigration procedures.

The return trips for the 60 girls still in Malaysian prisons will have to be funded by their families or the IOM, Mr Mugume said.

"The biggest issue is we have to stop the traffic from here," Mr Mugume said. "You have to focus on the root causes - who is recruiting these people?"

Mr Kasingye said he could not discuss the details of the case, but that "some" people have been arrested and charged in Uganda.

He added that it has been difficult to bring suspects to justice with so few witnesses available in the country, as most are still in Malaysia.

However, Mr Kasingye said the findings of an ongoing investigation into a number of registered security companies suspected of involvement in fraudulent employment practices will be presented before Parliament this month.

LOAD-DATE: February 16, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

Copyright 2012 AllAfrica, Inc.

189 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
Africa News

February 15, 2012 Wednesday

Uganda; Sex Traffickers Victimize Hundreds of Girls

BYLINE: The Monitor (Kampala)

LENGTH: 533 words

At least 600 Ugandan girls have been forced into Malaysia's sex trade in what has become a human trafficking epidemic, a foreign diplomat has said.

Hajah Noraihan, the Malaysian consul to Uganda, said despite an early warning to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in 2008 when the number of trafficked girls stood at 30, the constant flow of victims has not slowed.

She says Malaysian intelligence indicates 10 girls continue to fall through the cracks of Uganda's immigration and labour systems daily.

"Nothing was done and this is what happened," Ms Noraihan said.

Malaysia, a country known for its poor human trafficking record although it has traditionally been within the Asian region, is currently on a US state department watch list for not having shown adequate evidence of its efforts to combat the scourge.

However, it has been working to curb the illegal practice after a raid last October in which 21 Ugandan girls were freed from forced prostitution.

Only five of these have since returned to Uganda, while the rest are being held in a Malaysian detention centre, Ms Noraihan said.

A total of 60 girls are being held on fraudulent visa charges as a result of an ongoing immigration sweep.

The line between girls who are "caught" or "saved" as Ms Noraihan terms them, is often a matter of technicality. A victim's silence or shame can see them face criminal charges instead of being brought back to Uganda, she said.

Coming home

The International Organisation of Migration (IOM) says it has successfully returned 14 girls to Uganda from Malaysia, but that they are only able to move victims who have been clearly identified and volunteer to come home.

Director of Interpol Asan Kasingye, who confirmed the figure of more than 600, said young, poor and vulnerable girls are targeted by recruiters after being lured overseas with the promise of legitimate high-paying jobs.

He said many more may be trapped in an unknown location, or are intimidated into silence by their captors.

According to Ms Noraihan, three Ugandan women have been killed in Malaysia since 2010 for trying to escape.

Mr James Mugume, the permanent secretary of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, said he was unaware of the staggering figures the consul presented. However, he said an Internal Affairs committee made up of Interpol, Immigration and Ministry of Labour representatives has been tasked with identifying recruiters and addressing lax immigration procedures.

The return trips for the 60 girls still in Malaysian prisons will have to be funded by their families or the IOM, Mr Mugume said.

"The biggest issue is we have to stop the traffic from here," Mr Mugume said. "You have to focus on the root causes - who is recruiting these people?"

Mr Kasingye said he could not discuss the details of the case, but that "some" people have been arrested and charged in Uganda.

He added that it has been difficult to bring suspects to justice with so few witnesses available in the country, as most are still in Malaysia.

However, Mr Kasingye said the findings of an ongoing investigation into a number of registered security companies suspected of involvement in fraudulent employment practices will be presented before Parliament this month.

LOAD-DATE: February 16, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

Copyright 2012 AllAfrica, Inc.

190 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

The Monitor (Kampala)

February 15, 2012 Wednesday

600 Girls Victims of Human Trafficking in Malaysia

BYLINE: Philippa Croome

LENGTH: 531 words

At least 600 Ugandan girls have been forced into Malaysia's sex trade in what has become a human trafficking epidemic, a foreign diplomat has said.

Hajah Noraihan, the Malaysian consul to Uganda, said despite an early warning to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in 2008 when the number of trafficked girls stood at 30, the constant flow of victims has not slowed.

She says Malaysian intelligence indicates 10 girls continue to fall through the cracks of Uganda's immigration and labour systems daily.

"Nothing was done and this is what happened," Ms Noraihan said.

Malaysia, a country known for its poor human trafficking record although it has traditionally been within the Asian region, is currently on a US state department watch list for not having shown adequate evidence of its efforts to combat the scourge.

However, it has been working to curb the illegal practice after a raid last October in which 21 Ugandan girls were freed from forced prostitution.

Only five of these have since returned to Uganda, while the rest are being held in a Malaysian detention centre, Ms Noraihan said.

A total of 60 girls are being held on fraudulent visa charges as a result of an ongoing immigration sweep.

The line between girls who are "caught" or "saved" as Ms Noraihan terms them, is often a matter of technicality. A victim's silence or shame can see them face criminal charges instead of being brought back to Uganda, she said.

The International Organisation of Migration (IOM) says it has successfully returned 14 girls to Uganda from Malaysia, but that they are only able to move victims who have been clearly identified and volunteer to come home.

Director of Interpol Asan Kasingye, who confirmed the figure of more than 600, said young, poor and vulnerable girls are targeted by recruiters after being lured overseas with the promise of legitimate high-paying jobs.

He said many more may be trapped in an unknown location, or are intimidated into silence by their captors.

According to Ms Noraihan, three Ugandan women have been killed in Malaysia since 2010 for trying to escape.

Mr James Mugume, the permanent secretary of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, said he was unaware of the staggering figures the consul presented. However, he said an Internal Affairs committee made up of Interpol, Immigration and Ministry of Labour representatives has been tasked with identifying recruiters and addressing lax immigration procedures.

The return trips for the 60 girls still in Malaysian prisons will have to be funded by their families or the IOM, Mr Mugume said.

"The biggest issue is we have to stop the traffic from here," Mr Mugume said. "You have to focus on the root causes - who is recruiting these people?"

Mr Kasingye said he could not discuss the details of the case, but that "some" people have been arrested and charged in Uganda.

He added that it has been difficult to bring suspects to justice with so few witnesses available in the country, as most are still in Malaysia.

However, Mr Kasingye said the findings of an ongoing investigation into a number of registered security companies suspected of involvement in fraudulent employment practices will be presented before Parliament this month.

LOAD-DATE: February 16, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 AllAfrica Global Media.
All Rights Reserved

191 of 492 DOCUMENTS
NOT ABOUT REPORT

ENP Newswire

February 14, 2012 Tuesday

-POSCO Cheongam Award Winners Announced

LENGTH: 534 words

ENP Newswire - 14 February 2012

Release date- 10022012 - POSCO Cheongam Foundation held the board of directors on February 2 and appointed chairman Chung Joonyang the chairman of the board of the Foundation and also selected prof. Chun Jinwoo, department of chemistry, Yonsei University, Kwak Jongmoon, principal of Hangeore Middle & High School and Somaly Mam from Cambodia, president of Somaly Mam Foundation as the winners of POSCO Cheongam Awards 2012.

The foundation also re-appointed Lee Baeyong, president of the Presidential Council on National Branding, Lee Chae-wook, president of Incheon International Airport, and prof. Kim Byeonghyeon, professor of POSTECH, as directors, and appointed Park Seongbin, CEO of Translink Capital, and An Gyeongtae, chairman of Samil PricewaterhouseCoopers, as a new director and a new auditor, respectively.

On this day, chairman Chung said, 'With the 7th anniversary this year, the core business areas of POSCO Cheongam Foundation have been systematically established and now the foundation is contributing to enhancing the images of POSCO and Korea.' 'I will make all-out efforts for the development of this foundation, following the sublime nation view and patriotism and talent development philosophy of the Honorary Chairman.'

Prof. Chun Jinwoo, who was selected the winner of Cheongam Science Award, is a great scholar who pioneered and established nanomedicine, the new convergence area combining nano science and medicine, raising it to a world level. In particular, the top-tier nano thermotherapy he developed last year is expected to bring innovative advances in the treatment of brain cancer or pancreas cancer in the future.

The winner of Cheongam Education Award, Kwak Jongmoon, principal of Hangeore Middle & High School, suggested a new paradigm in education through night school and alternative education for adolescents from neglected families. Yongsansungji High School, the nation's first alternative school he founded, was selected the world's excellent school by OECD in 2001 and was introduced to many countries including the U.S., Japan and Germany.

Somaly Mam, president of Somaly Mam Foundation, who was selected the winner of Cheonam Service Award, is a women's rights activist. She was born into a poor family in Cambodia and overcoming the painful experience of becoming a victim of human trafficking when she was 16, she has conducted relief work for women in need. She established AFESIP, an NGO, in Phnom Penh, the capital city of Cambodia, in 1996, and has provided job training programs to teach victimized women sewing and beauty treatment skills systematically since then.

POSCO Cheongam Award was established in 2006 to commemorate the achievements of the late Honorary Chairman Park Taejoon, who made POSCO the world's top-tier company and diffuse POSCO's founding ideas: Creation, Talent Development, Sacrifice and Service Spirit. The ceremony for the awards will be held at POSCO Center on March 28, and each winner will be granted the prize money 0.2 billion won.

Contact:

Email: Yoon Seunggyu ysk1212@posco.com

Investor Relations

Email: ir@posco.com

[Editorial queries for this story should be sent to newswire@enpublishing.co.uk]

LOAD-DATE: February 14, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

JOURNAL-CODE: ENPN

Copyright 2012 Normans Media Limited
All Rights Reserved

192 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Tendersinfo News

February 11, 2012 Saturday 6:30 AM ESTBAHAMAS : Bahamas And US Hold Talks On The Trafficking In Persons*LENGTH: 352 words

NASSAU, The Bahamas - Officials from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the Ministry of National Security met with United States Assistant Attorney Barbara Martinez to discuss ongoing cooperation between both governments relating to counter efforts in the trafficking in persons.

The meetings were held Monday, February 6 to Friday, February 9, the period in which The Bahamas Committee on Trafficking in Persons (TIP Committee) and the United States representative exchanged information and ideas on training and capacity building requirements.

The Bahamas has identified areas of law enforcement and criminal justice. The specific focus of the meetings dealt with how the US Government may assist in meeting The Bahamas requirements, so as to ensure that the country can effectively tackle any manifestations of trafficking in persons, a crime under The Bahamas 2008 Trafficking in Persons (Prevention and Suppression) Act.

Following Miss Martinez's visit, a schedule of training and capacity building initiatives will be proposed for United State Government's assistance and cooperation.

The activities proposed will have in view, meet The Bahamas obligations under the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children Supplementing the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organised Crime.

They will also seek to address issues raised in the United States 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report, in which The Bahamas was included in the low, Tier 2 Watch List rank.

Consistent with the Protocol, trafficking in persons is defined in the Act as, the recruitment, transportation, transfer, harbouring of, or receipt of a person by means of threat or use of force or other means of coercion, or by abduction fraud, deception, abuse of power or a position of vulnerability, or the giving or receiving of payment or benefits to achieve the consent of a person having control over another person for the purposes of exploitation .

LOAD-DATE: February 11, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

193 of 492 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

February 9, 2012 Thursday

100 ESCAPE FROM TRAFFICKERS

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 872 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, DC

The following information was released by Radio Free Asia:

NGOs are concerned by the growing numbers of Cambodians enslaved on Thai fishing boats.

RFA

At least 100 Cambodians have been rescued from Thai fishing boats in Indonesia over the last year.

At least 100 Cambodians have escaped from forced labor conditions on Thai fishing boats over the past year, according to rights groups, highlighting an increasing and dangerous trend in human trafficking in the Southeast Asian region.

All of them were found in Indonesia, where the boats linked to Thai human trafficking syndicates usually anchor at a fishing port on eastern Ambon island.

Ninety-three of the Cambodians have been repatriated home.

Mom Sok Char of Cambodia-based nongovernmental organization Legal Support for Children and Women (LSCW) said that his organization had received a number of telephone calls over the last year from Cambodian nationals seeking help in Indonesia after escaping from the fishing vessels.

"Since [the beginning of] 2011 there have been at least 100 victims rescued from Thai fishing boats," he said.

Some of them had swam to shore in Ambon after jumping from their boats under the cover of darkness while others were rescued in raids on the high seas by Indonesian naval vessels on the lookout for boats involved in illegal fishing.

Mom Sok Char said that Thai boats fishing legally and illegally off Indonesian waters commonly unload their catch for processing at Ambon island, though they rarely dock at the island in order to prevent forced laborers from escaping. Vessels from the shore meet the boats at sea to ferry the fish back to land.

"This is a vicious cycle-each time the previous victims escape, the captors receive new victims," he said, adding that not only Cambodians, but Lao and Burmese nationals had also fallen prey to human traffickers who operate the boats.

Group of 14

Mom Sok Char said that LSCW's representative in Indonesia had been contacted by the most recent group of 14 victims who had escaped between December 2011 and January 2012.

His organization provided the funding to repatriate seven of them to Cambodia on Tuesday and plans to send the remaining seven men home next week.

The repatriated seven are now back with their families, while LSCW is seeking the trafficking ring leaders who had lured the men to Thailand with the promise of work before selling them to boat captains.

"The victims said some of them had worked in the boats for between one and six years. They said they were forced to work 24 hours non-stop without pay," Mom Sok char said. "This is modern slavery."

He said that some of the victims told him when the workers were sick their captors had simply dumped them into the sea.

Trafficking practices

Chris Lom, spokesman for the Geneva-based International Organization for Migration (IOM) told RFA in an interview that the organization's Indonesian office repatriated 63 victims trafficked for work on Thai fishing boats in December 2011.

The group had escaped from their Thai captors when their boats were forced to dock on Ambon island.

Lom said that slavery in Thailand is on the rise and is cause for concern.

"What happens is they sign on to Thai fishing boats and then find themselves in very exploitative situations. Frequently, an agent will sell them to a Thai captain," he said.

He added that the men are most frequently trafficked while aboard a vessel on the Andaman Sea off Thailand's southern Ranong province, or on the Gulf of Thailand.

"Once they are on the boats, it is very difficult for them to escape. They frequently go unpaid and are often abused by the Thai captains," he said.

"They can also remain at sea for a very long time-even several years-because Thai fishing boats commonly fish throughout the region."

Lom said the fishing boats transfer and receive supplies from other boats, making it difficult for trafficking victims to escape.

Navy intercept

Sometimes the victims are lucky enough to be rescued by the Indonesian navy as they intercept boats fishing illegally in Indonesian waters, leading to a confiscation of the vessel.

"In these circumstances, if the crews can contact the IOM or local NGOs to alert them that they were exploited in a trafficking situation, then we can sometimes help to repatriate them," he said.

He said a very large number of young and uneducated Cambodian men end up on Thai fishing boats after becoming the victims of human trafficking and called on the Cambodian government to raise awareness of the issue.

The U.S. State Department last year ranked Cambodia a Tier 2 country in its 2011 Trafficking in Persons report, saying the government had failed to make progress in prosecuting human traffickers and protecting trafficking victims.

"Corruption at all levels continued to impede progress in combating trafficking and fostering an enabling environment for trafficking," the report said.

About 200,000 to 450,000 people are trafficked annually in the Greater Mekong sub-region, which includes southern China, Laos, Burma, Thailand, Cambodia, and Vietnam, the countries joined by the Mekong River, according to the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime.

Reported by RFA's Khmer service. Translated by Samean Yun. Written in English by Joshua Lipos.

LOAD-DATE: February 10, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

194 of 492 DOCUMENTS

The Phnom Penh Post

February 8, 2012 Wednesday 7:31 AM EST

11 years on, a mother still hopes

LENGTH: 710 words

Chea Mon cried at the arrival terminal yesterday when she saw that her son, who disappeared 11 years ago, was not among the seven rescued Cambodian trafficking victims stepping through the exit gate at Phnom Penh International Airport.

Heng Chivoan/Phnom Penh Post

Chea Mon, whose son has been missing for the past 11 years after going abroad to work on fishing boats, speaks to the Post yesterday at Phnom Penh International Airport.

As had been the case many times before when she had travelled to the airport, seizing on news that victims rescued from Thai fishing boats would return, she was sorely disappointed.

"I ran out of hope when I didn't see my son among the seven fishermen who arrived back in their homeland today after I heard that migrant workers had been sent back," she said.

Chea Mon told reporters that in the 11 years her son had been gone, she had received only one phone call from 38-year-old Soy Sros, who left Kampong Speu for Thailand, lured by the bait of rumoured high salaries.

"I don't know if he is alive or dead. I did not agree with him going, but in my village there are so many people who went," she said.

Those who did arrive yesterday, alive, if not well, are among a group of 14 rescued last week during a co-ordinated effort by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the International Organisation for Migration and Indonesian authorities, after desperate phone calls from the victims.

Seven others remain in Indonesia awaiting repatriation, while on Monday, families in Kampong Chhnang filed a complaint to provincial police seeking help to find relatives they say are stranded in Malaysia and Africa after escaping fishing boats.

Ben Channa, an official at the Ministry of Interior's anti-human trafficking and juvenile protection department, said police are now searching for the brokers who sent the men to Thailand.

More than 100 Cambodian men have been repatriated from abroad since December after escaping or being rescued from slave labour conditions on Thai fishing boats.

One of them, 23-year-old Eng Ros from Kampot province, recounted the familiar dilemma of those caught in a migrant labour trade where reports have surfaced for years of forced labour, beatings, shootings, drugging and murder.

"Once I was on the boat, I knew that I had been trafficked, but I could not do anything because it is a big sea," he said.

The Gulf of Thailand and surrounding waters such as the South China Sea are the trawling grounds for the tens of thousands of boats operating in the highly unregulated Thai fishing industry, which sells billions of dollars worth of fish each year primarily to foreign markets.

Andy Hall, foreign expert at Mahidol University's Institute of Population and Social Research in Bangkok, said it was "about time that the international governments that are buying these products start taking the issue seriously".

"The whole industry is reliant on trafficking, they can't get people onto the boats without deceiving them, and all we get is a denial from the fishing industry that there is a problem," he said.

"The fishing industry is connected to huge multinational companies across the world, and I think that what you have to remember is that governments like to take the easy options, so they give money to UN agencies."

Instead, real economic pressure needed to be applied to Thailand, which also should be downgraded to Tier 3 in the next US State Department Trafficking in Persons report for its failure to take any serious action on the matter, he said.

Somkiat Chayasriwong, permanent secretary at Thailand's Ministry of Labour, said his government had taken steps to address trafficking in the industry, setting up offices to respond to the issue in every Thai province in December last year.

"However, right now, we haven't caught or arrested anybody," he said.

Phil Robertson, deputy Asia director for Human Rights Watch, said real action would not come until consumers were made aware through the media of the conditions under which their fish were caught.

"It's going to be a battle of attrition to get these fishing associations to confess to the fact that they are systematically using forced labour and trafficked labour and that their economic model is based on human misery," he said.

LOAD-DATE: February 08, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Blog

JOURNAL-CODE: PHPP-6919

Copyright 2012 Newstex LLC
All Rights Reserved
Newstex Web Blogs
Copyright 2012 The Phnom Penh Post

195 of 492 DOCUMENTS

The Associated Press

February 7, 2012 Tuesday 03:04 AM GMT

US to issue sanctions waiver for Myanmar

BYLINE: By MATTHEW PENNINGTON, Associated Press

SECTION: WASHINGTON DATELINE

LENGTH: 613 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The United States on Monday eased one of its many sanctions against Myanmar as a reward for political reforms after five decades of direct military rule.

The step is very limited, and most of the tough U.S. economic, trade and political restrictions will remain in place.

But it should make it easier for Myanmar, also known as Burma, to secure help from the World Bank and other international financial institutions by lifting U.S. opposition to them conducting assessments.

Under anti-human trafficking legislation, the U.S. had to oppose these bodies using their funds to help Myanmar. Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton signed the waiver Monday.

President Barack Obama authorized the move Friday.

Other U.S. sanctions, including the 2003 Burmese Freedom and Democracy Act, still require the U.S. to prevent the institutions from giving loans or technical assistance to the country. Years of mismanagement, isolation and internal conflict have turned what was once one of Southeast Asia's most prosperous countries into its least-developed.

The waiver follows Clinton's landmark visit to Myanmar in December, the first by a U.S. secretary of state in 56 years, when she expressed willingness to allow World Bank assessment missions. She said that was supported by Myanmar democracy leader Aung San Suu Kyi.

A State Department statement Monday said such assessments would enable greater understanding of Myanmar's economic situation, particularly its "severe poverty alleviation needs."

"The United States remains committed to supporting and partnering with the Burmese government along the path of reform," it said.

But administration officials and U.S. lawmakers, who have been instrumental in imposing myriad and overlapping sanctions on Myanmar since 1988, say more progress on democracy and human rights is needed before other sanctions can be lifted.

Conducting free and fair by-elections that Suu Kyi and her party will contest April 1 are seen as a key test of that. There is also concern over ethnic violence and Myanmar's ties to North Korea.

The waiver, effective through September, applies to some but not all of the restrictions that apply to Myanmar under the 2000 Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act. Myanmar received a "Tier 3" rating under its annual State Department assessment, meaning it has failed to comply with minimum standards for elimination of human trafficking.

The ambassador-at-large on human trafficking issues, Luis CdeBaca, who visited Myanmar in January, said Monday the waiver was rewarding Myanmar for its political reforms, including prisoner releases, the dialogue it has begun with Suu Kyi and cease-fires with ethnic minority armed groups.

But he said it also reflected the government's encouraging steps in improving its treatment of human trafficking victims, particularly those repatriated from other countries, although the U.S. remains concerned over authorities' use of forced labor and child soldiers.

"We have seen several decent things happen on the human trafficking front," CdeBaca said in an interview. "They (Myanmar) are not out of the woods by any means. But just as with democracy and electoral reforms, we also see the beginning of a positive trend."

The Obama administration has reversed a longstanding U.S. policy of isolating Myanmar, and in January announced it would restore full diplomatic relations after 20 years without an ambassador in Myanmar.

That step was supported by key Republican senators, but the administration still must tread cautiously in lifting other restrictions or face criticism for moving too fast to win friends in the country, where the strings of power largely remain in military hands.

LOAD-DATE: February 7, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Associated Press
All Rights Reserved

196 of 492 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

February 7, 2012 Tuesday

TRAFFICKING VICTIMS ESCAPE AFTER ORDEALBYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 859 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, DC

The following information was released by Radio Free Asia:

Forced Cambodian laborers on Thai fishing vessels manage to flee to Indonesia.

RFA

Victims of forced labor on Thai fishing boats talk to reporters upon their return to Cambodia, Feb. 7, 2012.

Fourteen Cambodians forced by human trafficking syndicates in Thailand to work as fishermen in the deep sea have escaped from their captors under the cover of darkness, ending years of ordeal, officials said Tuesday.

Trapped on fishing vessels in the Gulf of Thailand and forced to work without pay, sometimes for years, the 14 men jumped off their boats and swam to neighboring Indonesia, where they were held by local authorities before the intervention of international maritime authorities.

Seven of them had returned to Cambodia while arrangements are being made by the Cambodian authorities and rights groups to fly home the others as well, the officials said.

Anti-human trafficking and rights group officials are working closely with the men to track down those behind the trafficking scam amid reports that many Cambodians have fallen prey to human smuggling syndicates.

The seven men who had returned home this week were all trafficked from Siem Reap and Kampot provinces in Cambodia.

Non-stop labor

Eng Rong, 23, from Kampot province, said his captors worked the boat crew mercilessly.

"They didn't torture me, but they forced me to work day and night without stopping," he said.

And Chhut Doeum, a 33-year-old victim from Siem Reap, said he had worked on a fishing boat for two years before escaping.

"I escaped from a boat but they got me back. They took me back to work," he said.

"I worked in the boat, fishing day and night. We went fishing every day."

Mom Sokcha, program director for rights group Legal Aid of Cambodia, said efforts to return the men home were launched after he received a phone call from one of them who was held by Indonesian authorities.

He demanded that Cambodian authorities find the trafficking suspects and bring them to justice.

"Inside Cambodia there are fewer job opportunities, so the victims migrate to work overseas," he said.

Pen Channa, an official with Cambodia's anti-human trafficking and juvenile protection section of the national police commission, said police are working to apprehend the suspects.

Family members of missing Cambodian workers in Kompong Chhnang, Feb. 7, 2012.

Workers missing

Meanwhile, a number of families from Cambodia's Kompong Chhnang province have filed requests with local authorities and rights groups for help to locate their loved ones who went missing after being recruited by a fishing company to work in Taiwan.

At least 23 complaints have been received of Cambodians missing at sea after being taken by trafficking syndicates.

Ky Thai, 48, said her 24-year-old son was recruited by Giant Ocean International Fishery to work in Taiwan, but had not been heard from since early 2011.

She said she had gone to the Giant Ocean International's recruiting office recently only to find that the company had closed down.

"The company has already stopped operating, so I don't have any information from my son. I am worried and I want him to return, so I filed a complaint with a rights group," she said.

Sum Chankea, an official with local rights group Adhoc, said he had already received nine complaints against the company from villagers whose children went missing.

And Prak Saony, deputy director of the anti-human trafficking and juvenile protection department in Kompong Chhnang province, said police had received 14 complaints from villagers whose children went to work in the fishing sector in a number of different countries through Giant Ocean International.

"We are searching for the [human trafficking] ring leaders. Our initial investigation has revealed three ring leaders," Prak Saony told RFA.

"We are requesting permission from the police commissioner to question them."

Abused labor laws

An official from Cambodia's Ministry of Interior said Giant Ocean International had been ordered to cease operations after the company was found to have abused Cambodian labor laws.

"The company was legally licensed, but they abused the law. After we received complaints from villagers, we filed complaints to the court to proceed with the case according to the law."

Officials have asked the missing workers' families to file complaints with police if their children were recruited by Giant Ocean International.

The U.S. State Department last year ranked Cambodia a Tier 2 country in its 2011 Trafficking in Persons report, saying the government had failed to make progress in prosecuting human traffickers and protecting trafficking victims.

"Corruption at all levels continued to impede progress in combating trafficking and fostering an enabling environment for trafficking," the report said.

About 200,000 to 450,000 people are trafficked annually in the Greater Mekong sub-region, which includes southern China, Laos, Burma, Thailand, Cambodia, and Vietnam, the countries joined by the Mekong River, according to the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime.

Reported by RFA's Khmer service. Translated by Samean Yun. Written in English by Joshua Lipes.

LOAD-DATE: February 8, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

197 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
Associated Press Online

February 7, 2012 Tuesday 3:04 AM GMT

US to issue sanctions waiver for Myanmar

BYLINE: By MATTHEW PENNINGTON, Associated Press

SECTION: WASHINGTON DATELINE

LENGTH: 613 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The United States on Monday eased one of its many sanctions against Myanmar as a reward for political reforms after five decades of direct military rule.

The step is very limited, and most of the tough U.S. economic, trade and political restrictions will remain in place.

But it should make it easier for Myanmar, also known as Burma, to secure help from the World Bank and other international financial institutions by lifting U.S. opposition to them conducting assessments.

Under anti-human trafficking legislation, the U.S. had to oppose these bodies using their funds to help Myanmar. Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton signed the waiver Monday.

President Barack Obama authorized the move Friday.

Other U.S. sanctions, including the 2003 Burmese Freedom and Democracy Act, still require the U.S. to prevent the institutions from giving loans or technical assistance to the country. Years of mismanagement, isolation and internal conflict have turned what was once one of Southeast Asia's most prosperous countries into its least-developed.

The waiver follows Clinton's landmark visit to Myanmar in December, the first by a U.S. secretary of state in 56 years, when she expressed willingness to allow World Bank assessment missions. She said that was supported by Myanmar democracy leader Aung San Suu Kyi.

A State Department statement Monday said such assessments would enable greater understanding of Myanmar's economic situation, particularly its "severe poverty alleviation needs."

"The United States remains committed to supporting and partnering with the Burmese government along the path of reform," it said.

But administration officials and U.S. lawmakers, who have been instrumental in imposing myriad and overlapping sanctions on Myanmar since 1988, say more progress on democracy and human rights is needed before other sanctions can be lifted.

Conducting free and fair by-elections that Suu Kyi and her party will contest April 1 are seen as a key test of that. There is also concern over ethnic violence and Myanmar's ties to North Korea.

The waiver, effective through September, applies to some but not all of the restrictions that apply to Myanmar under the 2000 Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act. Myanmar received a "Tier 3" rating under its annual State Department assessment, meaning it has failed to comply with minimum standards for elimination of human trafficking.

The ambassador-at-large on human trafficking issues, Luis CdeBaca, who visited Myanmar in January, said Monday the waiver was rewarding Myanmar for its political reforms, including prisoner releases, the dialogue it has begun with Suu Kyi and cease-fires with ethnic minority armed groups.

But he said it also reflected the government's encouraging steps in improving its treatment of human trafficking victims, particularly those repatriated from other countries, although the U.S. remains concerned over authorities' use of forced labor and child soldiers.

"We have seen several decent things happen on the human trafficking front," CdeBaca said in an interview. "They (Myanmar) are not out of the woods by any means. But just as with democracy and electoral reforms, we also see the beginning of a positive trend."

The Obama administration has reversed a longstanding U.S. policy of isolating Myanmar, and in January announced it would restore full diplomatic relations after 20 years without an ambassador in Myanmar.

That step was supported by key Republican senators, but the administration still must tread cautiously in lifting other restrictions or face criticism for moving too fast to win friends in the country, where the strings of power largely remain in military hands.

LOAD-DATE: February 7, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Associated Press
All Rights Reserved

198 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

February 6, 2012 Monday 8:18 AM GMT

Laos probes sale of babies to foreigners: report

LENGTH: 342 wordsDATELINE: HANOI, Feb 6 2012

Laos is investigating a retired justice ministry official for allegedly selling adopted babies to Americans, Canadians and Australians for thousands of dollars each, a report said.

The official is accused of seeking out unwanted babies in poor, rural areas, obtaining adoption papers and selling the infants, all aged between one and two years, on to foreigners for up to $5,000 each, according to Radio Free Asia.

He has been taken in for questioning and the adoption process for children thought to be caught up in the scam has been suspended pending the results of the investigation, RFA reported.

Mike Pryor, press officer at the US Embassy in Laos, told AFP that Laos "suspended foreign adoptions on January 9" but did not offer any specific reason for the move.

"Adopting a child for sale... is a crime related to human trafficking, no question about it," a government official told RFA.

The justice ministry is probing how the scam worked, including whether the birth parents sold their infants, which can constitute a human trafficking offence punishable by a three-to-five-year jail term, the official said.

It was not clear how many children were involved in the alleged adoption ring.

The retired official was "familiar" with most of the justice ministry's employees and had often applied for adoption and naturalisation papers, the report said.

Laos is listed as Tier 2 -- out of three -- in the US State Department's 2011 anti human trafficking report, which praises the government's "significant efforts" to combat the problem.

The US however said the government had "never administratively or criminally punished any public official for complicity in trafficking in persons".

It said endemic corruption, a weak and ineffective judiciary and a failure to investigate or prosecute local-level officials suspected of involvement in trafficking were also key problems.

The Lao National Assembly approved a National Plan of Action on human trafficking in 2007 but it has not been endorsed by the prime minister's office, the state department report adds.

LOAD-DATE: February 7, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Agence France Presse
All Rights Reserved

199 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

February 6, 2012 Monday 4:00 AM EST

Determination and Memorandum of Justification With Respect to Foreign Governments' Efforts Regarding Trafficking in Persons - Burma

BYLINE: Targeted News ServiceLENGTH: 1052 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons issued the following news release:

Pursuant to section 110 of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (Division A, Public Law 106-386), as amended (the "Act"), and the Presidential memorandum of delegation signed on February 3, 2012, I hereby determine, consistent with sections 110(d)(4) and 110(f) of the Act, that provision to the Government of Burma of all programs, projects, or activities of assistance described in sections 110(d)(1)(B) of the Act would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States.

This determination shall be published in the Federal Register, and copies shall be transmitted to the appropriate committees in Congress.

2-06-2012 (signed)

Date Hillary Rodham Clinton

Secretary of State

MEMORANDUM OF JUSTIFICATION CONSISTENT WITH THE TRAFFICKING VICTIMS PROTECTION ACT OF 2000, REGARDING DETERMINATIONS WITH RESPECT TO BURMA

Pursuant to sections 110(d) and (f) of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (Div. A, P.L. 106-386), as amended (the "Act"), and the Presidential memorandum of delegation signed on February 3, 2012, the Secretary has made an additional determination regarding Burma, one of the 23 countries placed in Tier 3 in the Department of State's 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report. The Secretary has determined, consistent with the Act's waiver authority, that the ability to provide the multilateral assistance referred to in section 110(d)(1)(B) to Burma would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States.

Explanation of the Secretary's Determination

As assessed in 2011, the Government of Burma does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to do so. Trafficking within Burma continues to be a significant problem, as elements of the armed forces engage in the unlawful conscription of child soldiers and continue to be the main perpetrators of forced labor inside the country. Burmese military authorities' use of forced or compulsory labor remains a widespread and serious problem, particularly targeting members of ethnic minority groups.

The Secretary has determined, consistent with the provisions of the Act, that provision of all programs, projects and activities described in section 110(d)(1)(B) would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States. This amends the President's determination, with respect to Burma, of September 22, 2011.

Justification: The Secretary's determination with respect to Burma, consistent with the Act's waiver authority, is in the national interest because it will allow U.S. support for certain assistance by international financial institutions (IFIs) to support Burma's reform efforts.

Since formation of the new Burmese government in April 2011 under President Thein Sein, there has been a nascent political and economic opening in the country. Authorities have taken a series of steps to address longstanding concerns of the United States and the international community, including, but not limited to, releasing more than 500 political prisoners, relaxing media controls, approving new laws to protect workers' rights, allow for broader political participation, legalizing the freedom of assembly, facilitating humanitarian access to several conflict zones, and engaging in substantive dialogue with pro-democracy icon Aung San Suu Kyi.

Impact of Restrictions: The U.S. executive directors of IFIs currently are required to oppose and make best efforts to deny any loan or other utilization of funds to Burma, with certain limited exceptions and consistent with the Act's restrictions. In accordance with U.S. law, the U.S. executive directors have sought to prevent the IMF and multilateral development banks from undertaking any type of discretionary engagement with Burma, including technical assistance or assessment missions. This waiver enables the United States to support international financial institution (IFI) assessment missions and appropriate technical assistance that do not require a vote from an IFI board.

It is in the national interest of the U.S. government to support such technical assistance and assessments of Burma in order to promote reform, to respond to Aung San Suu Kyi's appeal for such assessments, and to pursue a more comprehensive poverty alleviation effort in Burma - the poorest country in Southeast Asia, with a GDP half that of Laos and Bangladesh. The United States will not actively oppose IFI assessments and appropriate technical assistance by IFIs such as the World Bank, the IMF, and the Asian Development Bank. Such needs assessments are critical to Burma's economic and political reform efforts, as the country has been isolated for over two decades and its capacity has significantly eroded. Such assessments will identify pressing needs and key impediments to poverty alleviation and democratic transition, and could provide a framework for future IFI technical assistance. The assessments and technical assistance will help support the effort to reduce poverty in Burma and promote reconciliation by enabling authorities and Burma's civil society groups to prioritize and properly sequence programs. The Burmese government and Burmese civil society leaders believe IFI assessments are crucial to provide independent and credible information and analysis, and requested the United States to support IFI needs assessments as soon as possible.

A number of legislative mandates remain in place that direct the U.S. executive directors in the IFIs to vote against any IFI loans or financial assistance before their respective boards for approval. There are a number of separate restrictions as well, including on new investment, imports, and exports of financial services, and restrictions on bilateral assistance and arms sales. Additionally, travel restrictions and financial sanctions have been imposed against senior Burmese government and military officials and their immediate relatives, a number of state-owned enterprises, and other individuals and entities affiliated with the regime.

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS hc11-120211-JF78-3772209 StaffFurigay

LOAD-DATE: February 12, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

200 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Sri Lankan Government News

February 3, 2012 Friday 1:24 PM EST

SRI LANKA AMBASSADOR TO US WICKRAMASURIYA HOSTS RECEPTION FOR GROUP OF FOREIGN CORRESPONDENTS

LENGTH: 674 words

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka, Feb. 3 -- Policy Research & Information Unit of the Presidential Secretariat of Sri Lanka issued the following news:

Sri Lanka Ambassador to the US, Jaliya Wickramasuriya hosted a reception for a group of foreign correspondents recently at his residence, prompting a discussion of events in Sri Lanka since the end of the conflict against terrorism nearly three years ago.

The reception was the first in 2012 of the National Press Club's Foreign International Correspondents Committee's "Embassy Nights," a series of meetings with ambassadors in Washington to discuss pressing international issues. It included correspondents from Al Jazeera, The Press Trust of India, Kyodo News, Reuters, Bloomberg and Mainichi Shimbun of Japan, and Voice of America, among others, as well as several travel and environmental writers.

Focusing on how Sri Lanka has pursued reconciliation and economic redevelopment following its decades long and ultimately successful conflict against terrorism, Ambassador Wickramasuriya outlined how the LTTE violated Sri Lankans' human rights by cutting off water to Eastern Sri Lanka. President Mahinda Rajapaksa, he noted, then decided to end the long-running conflict with the LTTE.

That victory over the terrorist group LTTE created opportunities in Sri Lanka to revive regions damaged by the conflict, he said, as well as new economic opportunities.

"Since then, there have been no terrorist incidents in Sri Lanka, not one," Ambassador Wickramasuriya said. "We are spending about $1 billion a year to rebuild the North, and we have launched an ambitious reconciliation program to right any past wrongs and to achieve a new dialogue and understanding among all our people. All Sri Lankans agree that we do not want terrorism to return.

"Today we have a strong economy and the future looks bright for all Sri Lankans. We have held successful parliamentary and regional elections, and parts of the North that haven't had elected representatives for 26 years now have them. We believe that such a political solution will be the key to stability in the future, especially when combined with reconciliation and economic development."

The correspondents asked about a variety issues that post-conflict Sri Lanka has experienced, including a question about President Mahinda Rajapaksa's political popularity.

"The president was always for the people," Ambassador Wickramasuriya said. "That is why he has remained so popular. He reaches out to people. He is with them."

In that light, Sri Lanka is working to provide solutions to post-conflict issues, he said, including reconciliation and redevelopment.

"We will find a home-grown solution for ethnic concerns," Ambassador Wickramasuriya said. "We will provide the solutions required by our countrymen."

The correspondents also asked about human trafficking, press freedom and Sri Lanka's strategic importance in the Indian Ocean and South Asia.

"Sri Lanka has dozens of media organizations, including newspapers, radio and television stations and internet new outlets," the ambassador replied, "and you will find that they look critically at all issues. We enforce our human traffick- ing laws, and our position in the State Department's annual trafficking report has improved to an upper tier that puts us above some other countries in our region and on same level as countries like Japan, Singapore and India.

We are working with other countries to help them and to help our citizens. Of course we are mindful of our place along vital ocean shipping lanes. We are a small country, and so we don't have any enemies. We are non-aligned."

Ambassador Wickramasuriya extended an open invitation to the correspondents to visit Sri Lanka and "see for yourself," the progress that has been made since the May 2009 end of the LTTE conflict.

"Seeing is believing," the ambassador said. "When people go to Sri Lanka they are amazed at what they find." For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: February 3, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 HT Media Limited.
All Rights Reserved

201 of 492 DOCUMENTS

The Statesman (AsiaNet)

February 3, 2012 Friday44 most wanted human traffickers nabbed during last 30 months*SECTION: Vol. 12 No. 217LENGTH: 211 words

Federal Investigation Agency (FIA) took stern action against human smugglers, facilitators and sub-agents and arrested 44 Most Wanted Traffickers (MWTs) during last two and half years. As per data, 26 MWTs were arrested in 2009, 16 in 2010 and 02 were nabbed till June during 2011. An official source while mentioning the steps undertaken to bring illegal migration at zero level, said establishment of Anti Trafficking Units at Provincial Police HQs and Inter Agency Task Force (IATF) had helped to combat internal human trafficking.

Around 10703 illegal migrants were intercepted in 2008, 5601 in 2009 and 3434 in 2010. The Agency also arrested 4,334 human traffickers during last two and half years which included 1755 human traffickers during 2009, 1779 in 2010 and up to June, 800 human traffickers were arrested.

He said due to these measures Pakistan's position was upgraded from Tier-2 Watch List to Tier-2 in US State Department's Trafficking In Persons (TIP) Report-2010 and the same position was maintained in TIP Report-2011. The number of deportation has gradually decreased which is done with the international cooperation. Bilateral Joint Working Groups were also established such as Pakistan- Oman, Pakistan-UK, Pakistan-Turkey and Pakistan-Australia.

LOAD-DATE: February 3, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 Mashriq Group of Newspapers
All Rights Reserved

202 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

February 1, 2012 Wednesday 8:28 PM EST

USG Grant Supports Zambia's Anti-Human Trafficking Plan

BYLINE: Targeted News ServiceLENGTH: 399 wordsDATELINE: LUSAKA, Zambia

The U.S. Embassy issued the following news release:

The U.S. Department of State supports the Zambian government's National Plan of Action to Combat Trafficking in Persons with a $500,000 two-year grant to the International Organization for Migration (IOM). Zambia's selection for the competitive grant award recognizes the government's concerted efforts to combat modern-day slavery.

With U.S. support, three government shelters for trafficking victims will be upgraded, staff will be trained to support trafficking victims, and direct assistance will be provided by IOM to trafficking victims. Funds will enable training to help 100 Zambian law enforcement representatives implement Zambia's 2008 Anti-Human Trafficking Act and to help 100 prosecutors identify trafficking victims and prosecute traffickers and people who profit from the crime. This grant award is in addition to a previous $400,000 grant to IOM to assist the Zambian government with implementation of anti-human trafficking legislation.

Reporting Officer Desiree Suo of the Department of State Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons visited Zambia January 25 through February 1. She observed a government-led Break the Chain anti-human trafficking awareness program in Lusaka's Chaisa Compound, participated in IOM-conducted training for Zambian law enforcement, and met with anti-human trafficking stakeholders. Suo said, "Human trafficking is a global scourge. We support Zambia's efforts to address human trafficking because effective partnerships with committed governments, NGOs, and international organizations are essential to disrupting criminal trafficking networks."

Trafficking in persons, often dubbed "modern day slavery," comprises crimes involved in forced labor, sex trafficking, bonded labor, and involuntary domestic servitude. Zambia is a source, destination and transit country for human trafficking and was ranked "Tier 2" in the 2011 Department of State Trafficking in Persons Report (www.state.gov/g/tip). Tier 2 ranking means Zambia is making efforts to eliminate trafficking but does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. The U.S. grant advances the Zambian government's efforts to comply with international standards to prosecute offenders, protect victims, and prevent the crime.

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS cp -120215-JF78-3774903 StaffFurigay

LOAD-DATE: February 19, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

203 of 492 DOCUMENTS

CQ Congressional Testimony

January 24, 2012 Tuesday

HUMAN RIGHTS IN VIETNAM; COMMITTEE: HOUSE FOREIGN AFFAIRS;
SUBCOMMITTEE: AFRICA, GLOBAL HEALTH, AND HUMAN RIGHTS

SECTION: CAPITOL HILL HEARING TESTIMONY

LENGTH: 4707 words

TESTIMONY-BY: NGUYEN DINH THANG, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

AFFILIATION: BPSOS

Statement of Nguyen Dinh Thang, PhD Executive Director BPSOS

Committee on House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Africa, Global Health, and Human Rights

January 24, 2012

Mr. Chairman, the Ranking Member, and distinguished Subcommittee members, As the Vietnam Human Rights Act recognizes, human rights violations in Vietnam come in many categories and have many kinds of victims. I would like to focus today on three specific areas of human rights violations that have not yet been given appropriate recognition and emphasis by United States Government entities and others charged with monitoring and combating human rights violations in Vietnam:

(1) Systematic and widespread slavery-like conditions in Vietnamese government programs including the labor export program, drug rehabilitation centers, and prisons.

(2) The widespread use of torture and the increased frequency of police brutality against dissidents, intellectuals, bloggers, reporters, labor union organizers, social justice advocates, religious leaders and people of faith.

(3) Persecution of members of religions not recognized by the government and in some cases of members of recognized religions whose religious activities are perceived as a threat to the interests of the government or of the Communist Party.

For over two decades, my organization and I myself have monitored the country conditions in Vietnam. We have received information directly from the victims, their family members, or from witnesses. We have operations in different neighboring countries, where our staff and volunteers interviews asylum seekers who just arrived from Vietnam. In fact, I just returned from an extended trip to the region, where I talked to close to a hundred witnesses.

I. SLAVERY-LIKE CONDITIONS IN GOVERNMENT-RUN AND GOVERNMENTSANCTIONED PROGRAMS

Vietnam's new anti-trafficking in persons (TIP) law became effective a few weeks ago, on Jan 1 of this year. Unfortunately, however, it is unlikely that this new law will result in any significant change in the government's current practices and policies. The new law does not address either of Vietnam's two most serious modern-day slavery problems: trafficking within the government's own labor export program, and forced labor in rehabilitation centers and prisons.

These egregious forms of modern-day slavery take cover under Vietnam's national policies, involve billions of dollars, and are fiercely protected by well-placed stakeholders in the government. The government of Vietnam has not investigated, let alone prosecuted, a single case of human trafficking within its labor export program. In 2008 my organization, BPSOS, co-founded the Coalition to Abolish Modern-day Slavery in Asia (CAMSA). Over the past 3.5 years we have rescued over three thousand Vietnamese migrant workers subjected to slavery-like conditions and to debt bondage in a number of countries around the world. One of these victims testifies today.

Through interviews with the rescued victims, we have identified 35 Vietnamese labor export companies that were involved in human trafficking, engaged in fraudulent recruitment practices, and/or committed serious violations of Vietnam's own labor export laws. We have communicated these findings to the Vietnamese authorities by various means and at multiple levels. Instead of investigating these labor export companies, many of which are state-owned, the police interrogate and threaten the victims who spoke out against slavery. Almost routinely, the Vietnamese government has sent officials from Ha Noi to silence the victims, take the side of the traffickers, and impede justice. On multiple occasions we have had to deal with such delegations in places including American Samoa, Jordan, Malaysia, and even Houston.

In February of last year, the Ministry of Labor, War Invalids and Social Affairs (MOLISA) issued a circular, accusing CAMSA, our partners, and religious organizations of "taking advantage of our worker's ignorance" to sabotage Vietnam's labor export program and requesting Vietnamese labor export companies to "post personnel in countries hosting large numbers of Vietnamese workers so that those representatives may monitor, detect early, and take timely action when such issues first arise." (Circular dated February 15, 2011)

To completely disempower migrant workers from defending themselves, the Vietnamese government bars all Vietnamese migrant workers from joining local trade unions. For example, the Vietnamese embassy in Kuala Lumpur has issued a sample contract that Malaysian employers must use when hiring Vietnamese workers. This sample contract stipulates that Vietnamese workers "shall not strike or being [sic] involved in any strike or industrial actions as well as any political activities and activities of those related with Trade Union in Malaysia, or instigate others to commit such acts," even though the law in Malaysia allows migrant workers to join trade unions.

Actual contracts are even more restrictive, prohibiting Vietnamese workers from entering into romantic relationship with the locals, getting married to the locals, or, for female workers, becoming pregnant. In my recent trip to Thailand I met four victims of labor trafficking, all Montagnards from Vietnam's Central Highlands, who in 2008 came to our newly opened office in Penang, Malaysia to seek help. They were not only exploited; the two female victims were sexually abused by their employers. Before we could act, some Malaysian Catholic sisters had already helped them return to Vietnam by land.

Upon return to their villages, they were immediately summoned by the police, detained and interrogated for two days; their interrogators beat them up and threatened that "whoever opens mouth about Malaysia will be killed." They were ordered to pay the labor export companies double the already exorbitantly large amount of service fees they owed these companies. Knowing that they would never be able to pay back that larger debt, they escaped to Thailand. (Unfortunately, all four of them have been denied refugee status by the UNHCR.)

Vietnam's TIP law, passed in March of 2011, is disappointing. The definition of human trafficking in its earlier drafts mirrored the one from the Palermo Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons. However, the actual law did away with that definition and practically excludes Vietnamese labor export companies from being incriminated for their being at the very source of the human trafficking chain.

I would also like to touch briefly on the issue of drug rehabilitation centers, which are also run by MOLISA. Human Rights Watch's report "The Rehab Archipelago" has pointed out that inmates are subjected to various forms of forced labor including producing cashews, sewing garments, and manufacturing other items. Through our interviews with asylum seekers in Thailand BPSOS has discovered that many individuals imprisoned because of their political opinions or because of their faith have also been subjected to exactly the same type of forced labor.

One Montagnard, jailed from 2002 through 2009, had to do this for 7 years. His hands were eaten by the acid from the cashew nuts because he was not allowed to use gloves. Another Montagnard jailed from 2005 until 2009 at Dai Binh Prison in Lam Dong described prisoners being divided into production teams (cashew production, farming, vegetation, packaging fish for exporting). Those failing to meet quota were beaten with a whip and kicked. A Vietnamese dissident sentenced to 2.5 years in prison for promoting democracy over the internet and for distributing leaflets was required to break cashew shells during his incarceration at the Z 30A Xuan Loc prison. His quota was about 22 kilograms per day.

Human Rights Lawyer Nguyen Van Dai, a recently released prisoner of conscience, also reported the wide use of forced labor in prison to manufacture products that were then exported to Western countries. Some people or agencies may report improvements in the fight against human trafficking in Vietnam. Such a finding is possible only if the analysis is limited to the forms of human trafficking that the government of Vietnam has recognized and made illegal, including the sex trafficking of women and children to neighboring countries and the internal trafficking for child labor.

The government of Vietnam has played up its efforts to fight these forms of human trafficking, which usually involve only small-time criminals and perhaps low-ranking cadres. The government even invites international NGOs into Vietnam to fight human trafficking, but is careful to limit these invitations to these "privatized" forms of human trafficking. We are not aware of any NGOs, including those funded by US government programs, working to document and eliminate slavery in the labor export program, in rehab centers, or in prisons.

Vietnam has deftly deceived many of its international interlocutors by showcasing its efforts to fight the kinds of human trafficking it has chosen to make illegal while covering up the far more pervasive forms of modern-day slavery that are sanctioned by the government and whose perpetrators therefore enjoy impunity.

Recommendations:

(1) To the US government:

- a. Vietnam belongs in Tier 3 on the annual United States report on trafficking in persons - the tier reserved for countries whose governments "do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so", and must be ranked as such.
- b. Our government, especially the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons (G/TIP) and Office of Population, Refugees and Migration (PRM), and USAID, should fund projects that devote at least as much attention to the government-sanctioned forms of human trafficking as to those the government has made illegal.
- c. The State Department's Office of Democracy, Human Rights and Labor (DRL) should interview former political prisoners, and should make diligent efforts to interview current political prisoners, about the practice of forced labor in prison and include the findings in its annual country conditions report.
- d. G/TIP should use the following benchmarks, among others, in its ranking of Vietnam in its annual report:
 - i. Elimination of contract provisions that prohibit migrant workers from joining labor unions in destination countries.
 - ii. Statistics on and outcomes of the Vietnamese government's investigation and prosecution efforts relating to human trafficking under the labor export program, including cases already featured in past annual TIP reports.
 - iii. An end to the use of forced labor in rehab centers and in prisons.

(2) To the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR):

- a. Refugee status determination should take into consideration the risks faced by those who expose modern-day slavery in the Vietnamese government's labor export program.

II. TORTURE AND POLICE BRUTALITY

Since late 2006 we have observed significant increase in the use of violence and torture by the police, both in uniform and plainclothes, which coincided with the government crackdown against political dissidents and nonconformist churches. This crackdown has continued to this day.

In late 2010, at a meeting with US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton in Ha Noi, Vietnam's Prime Minister Nguyen Tan Dung requested US assistance in preparing Vietnam to ratify the UN Convention Against Torture. While we applaud the Prime Minister's expressed intention, we are troubled by the on-going widespread use of torture at the police stations, in detention centers, and in prisons. In recent interviews with asylum seekers who fled Vietnam to Thailand and Malaysia, I have collected vivid details on the use of torture against political dissidents, people of faith, Montagnards, Hmong, Khmer Krom, bloggers, artists. . . Forms of torture include:

- Lining up the victim against the wall and beating him in the chest, sides and legs.
- Handcuffing the victim to the upper rim of the window, causing him to stand on his toes, while beating him with batons and electric rods.
- Stripping the victim naked and flogging him with a belt.
- Kicking the victims in the chest, thighs, stomach with military boots.

- Punching the victim on the head and temples.
- Locking victim up in solitary confinement in a pitch dark and filthy place.
- Using a small knife to cut into the victim's flesh.
- Hitting the victim's ankles with a wooden stick.
- Standing the victim in water and electro-shocking him.
- Drawing a large amount of blood from the victim.
- Applying electric shocks to the victim's private parts.

Following are sample testimonies from the victims that we have interviewed:

"The police hung me to the ceiling beam of the investigation room. They stripped me naked and took turn to beat me on my chest and my stomach. They then applied electric shocks to my vagina until I went unconscious." Ms. Tran Thi The, September 2011. "They took a wooden stick, the size of my arm, and hit me nonstop. They hit me at the waist. They took out a pair of metal handcuffs, made me spread out my 10 fingers on the table, and smashed them with the handcuffs. Then they told me, 'We haven't applied to you the ways of the [criminal] underworld yet, otherwise in the next 3 days, your fingernails will fall off.' At that moment, I was so much in pain that I passed out." Ms. Phan Thi Nhan, September 2011.

We have learned that at least in Tay Ninh, the police operates a torture chamber separate from the police station. For example, in the vicinity of the B4 prison in Tay Ninh, there is a torture chamber known as BC14. Victims who are deemed by the prison interrogators as "recalcitrant" are sent to BC14 in the dead of the night (usually 1pm - 5pm). At BC14 there are special torture instruments, such as a special chair where the victim is put in, and the tendons behind his knees would be crushed between a metal bar and a torturer standing on the victim's knees.

The torturers at BC14 are big, muscular and much more vicious than the prison interrogators. We are compiling a report of our recent interviews with survivors of torture. We have also compiled cases of police brutality, which has been on the rise in recent years. We will gladly share both documents with this Subcommittee and our State Department.

Recommendations:

(1) To the US Government:

- a. The State Department's annual Human Rights Report on Vietnam should give a focus on torture and police brutality. At the very least DRL should verify the evidence that we have already compiled and report it if confirmed. Furthermore, the State Department should ask the officers in charge of human rights issues at our embassies in Thailand and Malaysia to interview the witnesses directly - we will help with the arrangements.
- b. As our State Department is engaging the Vietnamese government on issues relating the rights of the disabled, the dialogue should include those disabled by torture committed by the police.

(2) To the Vietnamese Government:

- a. Prime Minister Nguyen Tan Dung should immediately issue a decree outlawing torture, order the immediate investigation of reported incidents of torture, and prosecute all perpetrators. This step is simple enough that Vietnam does not have to wait for US technical or financial assistance.

III. RELIGIOUS PERSECUTION

Overall, Vietnam's human rights practices have slid backward since early 1998 - the year that practically marked the end of the Renovation era launched by Nguyen Van Linh as Vietnamese Communist Party (VCP) Secretary General in 1986 and continued by Vietnam's Prime Minister Vo Van Kiet till late 1997. The new team, led by VCP Secretary General Le Kha Phieu and Prime Minister Phan Van Khai, reversed course. This reversal was probably prompted by the VCP's observation of what had happened to the Communist regimes in the Warsaw Bloc. There was a genuine belief of an international scheme led by the US government to systematically undermine the VCP's monopoly on authority. They dubbed this scheme "peaceful evolution."

The reversal manifested itself in a number of key developments:

(1) Brutal suppression of the Montagnard Protestant house churches in 2001-2004. Practically all four thousand house churches in the Central Highlands were closed down, some burnt and destroyed. Hundreds of pastors and lay leaders were arrested, tortured, sentenced and imprisoned. Many of them remain in prison to this day. The Vietnamese government views the rapid expansion of Protestantism as part of the peaceful evolution and called Protestantism the "American religion." We have compiled a list of over 300 Montagnard prisoners.

(2) Faced with the strong international reaction, especially from the United States, which designated Vietnam as a country of particular concern (CPC), the Vietnamese government made a temporary retreat during the years 2005 - 2006. It promulgated the Ordinance on Belief and Religion and registered hundreds of house churches - but only those willing to collaborate with the government.

At the same time, the government cultivated sympathizers and appointed them to leadership roles in the registered churches. The Unified Buddhist Church of Vietnam (UBCV), even though it was still outlawed, was able to do certain charity work. Taking advantage of this lull, many pro-democracy groups emerged, including some that were supported and even funded by overseas groups. The dissidents started using the internet to organize, inform, and mobilize the public. There were some budding efforts to form independent labor unions and a growing movement of common citizens demanding social justice - mainly over land and anti- corruption issues.

The foreign embassies publicly interacted with members of the pro- democracy movement. On April 8, 2006 a number of the disparate groups came together and formed Bloc 8406. Although a number of political and religious activists were arrested and imprisoned during this period, we observed a significant decrease in police brutality and few arrests.

(3) In August 2006, the government started to clamp down on this movement, at first discreetly so. For instance, the police placed key dissidents under surveillance, hindering their coming together; there was increased harassment against Christian pastors and UBCV leaders.

This relatively discreet approach was probably calculated, since the government was working hard on hosting the APEC Summit (Nov 16-19, 2006), earning the Permanent Normal Trade Relations status with the US (Dec 12, 2006), and gaining accession to the WTO (Jan 11, 2007). In my opinion, it appears that the VCP truly believes this home-grown movement to be part of the international conspiracy to bring about "peaceful evolution", especially because it sometimes received financial and technical support from overseas groups, both Vietnamese and non- Vietnamese.

(4) In March 2007, with all of the above objectives achieved, the Vietnamese authorities launched a mass crackdown, the most brutal one since the mid-1980s, against all actors deemed to be seeds of dissension and of challenge to the VCP's monopoly on power. The government targeted the Khmer Krom in the South, Montagnards in the Central Highlands, Hmong in the Northwest Mountainous Region, members of UBCV, the Hoa Hao Buddhists, and elements of the Catholic Church. Bloc 8406 members and bloggers were arrested. We have compiled a list of over a hundred political and religious activists who were arrested and imprisoned; others went into hiding; some managed to flee the country.

Probably to pre-empt criticism from the international community, the charges were often nonpolitical or non-religious, such as "resisting on-duty officials" or "causing public disorder", although in some cases the dissidents were charged with overtly political crimes such as "injuring the national unity" or "propaganda against the state." There were also many incidents of arrest and detention without charges. The leadership of the pro-democracy movement was decimated. We have documented the return of police brutality and the pervasive use of torture at the police stations, at detention centers, and in prisons.

(5) In April 2007, the government indefinitely suspended its review of registration applications submitted by Hmong house churches in the Northwest Mountainous Region, all affiliated with the Evangelical Church of Vietnam North (ECVN-North). The governments in the three Northern provinces of Son Lai, Lai Chau and Dien Bien have been most ruthless in pursuing their policies to root out Christianity. There is practically not a single Christian church in these three provinces. We have obtained reports, from the victims or from eye-witnesses, of the following measures targeting the Hmong Christians:

- Arrests and detention of men, resulting in Hmong villages with few male adults
- Public transportation denied to Hmong Christians to block them from attending mass in near-by towns
- Prohibiting clergy members from visiting Hmong villages
- Confiscation of farm land

- Destruction of homes
- Forced renunciation of their faith
- Forced abortion

Some Hmong had to leave their villages and migrate to other areas, including in the South. Even so, they continued to be targeted by the local authorities with arbitrary confiscation of farm land, disruption of religious activities, pressure to renounce their faith, and different forms of discrimination. This policy apparently did not come from the local authorities but from the central government. In a leaked document issued in 2007 (TL2007), the Central Bureau of Religious Affairs called for "resolutely overcom[ing] the abnormal and spontaneous growth of Protestantism" and "propagandiz[ing] and mobiliz[ing] the people to safeguard and promote good traditional beliefs of ethnic minorities" (page 32, TL2007) - a euphemism for forced renunciation of their Christian faith.

(6) The implementation of this policy has led to the mass demonstration of Hmong Christians in Muong Nhe, Dien Bien Province, in May 2011. The immediate cause of this demonstration was the government's destruction of an entire Hmong village. On January 28, 2011, the government sent military troops with order to raze all the homes and confiscate all the farm land in the Hmong village of Xa Na Khua, Ban Nam Nhu, Huyen Muong Nhe, Dien Bien Province. The village is home to over a hundred households, all Protestant. The authorities told the villagers that Protestantism was an American religion and since they refused to renounce their faith, they had no place in Vietnam: "You should go to America to till America's land and follow America's religion."

The villagers decided to hold a demonstration to ask for an end to religious persecution and the confiscation of their homes and land. Words got out to Hmong populations living in other provinces, where they too suffered severe forms of religious persecution, including forced renunciation and confiscation of land. On May 1, 2011 thousands of Hmong, including men, women and children, gathered in a location near Huoi Khon Village in Muong Nhe, some coming from as far as Dak Lak and Binh Phuoc in the South. On May 5, hundreds of troops from the military and the mobile police encircled the demonstrators. The troops, carrying batons, electric rods and guns, suddenly attacked and beat up the demonstrators. According to eye-witnesses, many were killed. We have compiled a partial list of people killed, with confirmation from relatives or eye-witnesses.

The government arrested many demonstrators and taken them into custody. Those who escaped arrest were tracked down by the police. Reportedly hundreds of demonstrators hid themselves in the jungle. Many have since been captured while a number successfully made it to Thailand after months of trekking through Laos. Van Xin No, a resident of Ban Bong Phong, Xa Cu Pui, Huyen Kalabon, Dak Lak Province who participated in the May demonstration, was reportedly shot dead on December 12, 2011 when he ran away as the police was about to arrest him. Enclosed is a list of Hmong arrested and detained with confirmation from their relatives.

Independent religious organizations were targeted for particularly harsh treatment because they are correctly perceived as the most important focuses of moral authority and popular devotion outside the State and the Party, and therefore the only entities in Vietnam with the potential to organize the public to challenge the monopoly on power of the VCP. The government has made use of a wide range of repressive techniques: confiscation of church properties, forcing out non-conformist religious and lay leaders and replacing them with government sympathizers, using thugs to beat up religious and lay leaders, staging traffic accidents, threatening the livelihood of active church members, using school administrations to curb or prohibit students from engaging in religious activities, cutting off their phones, discrediting them in the government-controlled media, punishing a few key individuals to teach a lesson to others. There is a consistent pattern of the use of these techniques throughout the country in recent years.

Regardless of such aggravating human rights abuses in Vietnam, the UNHCR has routinely denied refugee status to Montagnards seeking refugee protection in Thailand. The UNHCR in Thailand has even denied many Montagnards the right to register for refugee protection, essentially excluding them from the 1951 UN Convention on the Status of Refugees.

The UNHCR has apparently relied on erroneous information to the effect that only "high profile" Montagnards face a risk of persecution. In recent months three Montagnard asylum seekers, including two whose applications had been denied by UNHCR in Bangkok, have been arrested upon their return to Viet Nam. Government-run news services have proudly reported the arrests of these "reactionaries" and have accused them of consorting with anti-government organizations.

Another UNHCR-rejected asylum seeker, a member of the Khmer Krom ethnic minority who face persecution similar to that inflicted on Montagnards, was arrested a few hours after returning to Viet Nam and has been convicted and sentenced for having organized peaceful demonstrations prior to his departure in 2008.

Recommendations:

(1) To the US Government:

- a. The Administration should re-designate Vietnam as a Country of Particular Concern.
- b. Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for Viet Nam should accurately reflect the continuing and severe repression of politically and religiously active Montagnards and Hmong; DRL should conduct interviews with Montagnard and Hmong asylum applicants and refugees both in Southeast Asia and in the United States to supplement its inadequate information on the human rights situation in the Central Highlands.
- c. DRL should verify the list of Montagnard prisoners compiled by human rights organizations and include its findings in the State Department's Human Rights Report. In some cases we have even provided the contact information of the prisoner's family members.
- d. The State Department's Office of International Religious Freedom should verify the status of the registration of 671 Hmong House Churches that we have compiled and report its findings in its annual report on international religious freedom.

(2) To the UNHCR:

- a. UNHCR should allow all Montagnard asylum seekers to register for protection, and should discard its "high-profile" standard and recognize refugee status on a case-by-case basis to Montagnard applicants who have come to the attention of the authorities, or who are likely to do so, because of their political and/or religious activism, even if these applicants are not currently well-known outside their local areas.

In conclusion, I would like to thank the Subcommittee again for the opportunity to bring to light gross human rights violations that have become more brutal and more widespread in recent years in Vietnam. I would like to reiterate my strong support for the Vietnam Human Rights Act and other legislative efforts to stop the Vietnamese government's escalation of its exploitation, oppression and violence against its own citizens.

LOAD-DATE: January 25, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Congressional Testimony

204 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Federal News Service

January 24, 2012 Tuesday

Hearing of the Africa, Global Health and Human Rights Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee Subject: "Examining Ongoing Human Rights Abuses in Vietnam" Chaired by: Representative Chris Smith (R-NJ) Witnesses: Anh "Joseph" Cao, Former Member of Congress; Nguyen Dinh Thang, Ph.D., Executive Director, Boat People SOS; Rong Nay, Executive Director, Montagnard Human Rights Organization; Phuong-Anh Vu, Victim of Human Trafficking; John Sifton, Advocacy Director for Asia, Human Rights Watch Location: 2200 Rayburn House Office Building, Washington, D.C. Time: 2:00 p.m. EST Date: Tuesday, January 24, 2012

SECTION: PRESS CONFERENCE OR SPEECH

LENGTH: 17943 words

earing of the Africa, Global Health and Human Rights Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee Subject: "Examining Ongoing Human Rights Abuses in Vietnam" Chaired by: Representative Chris Smith (R-NJ) Witnesses: Anh "Joseph" Cao, Former Member of Congress; Nguyen Dinh Thang, Ph.D., Executive Director, Boat People SOS; Rong Nay, Executive Director, Montagnard Human Rights Organization; Phuong-Anh Vu, Victim of Human Trafficking; John Sifton, Advocacy Director for Asia, Human Rights Watch Location: 2200 Rayburn House Office Building, Washington, D.C. Time: 2:00 p.m. EST Date: Tuesday, January 24, 2012

REPRESENTATIVE CHRIS SMITH (R-NJ): (Sounds gavel.) The subcommittee will come to order, and I want to welcome all of you to our hearing on human rights in Vietnam. And I want to thank you for joining us at this very important hearing.

And before I introduce all the witnesses, I do want to say a very special thanks to a Anh Cao, who is a good friend, the first Vietnamese-American ever to be elected to the U.S. House of Representatives and a man who has spoke out bravely and repeatedly for human rights all over the world but with a particular emphasis and with a great deal of knowledge in depth on Vietnam.

So Anh, welcome back to the Congress, and it's great to see you again.

The Vietnamese government continues to be an egregious violator of a broad array of human rights. Our distinguished witnesses who are joining us here today will provide a detailed account. And I would like to highlight just a few areas of grave concerns.

Despite the State Department's decision in 2006 to remove Vietnam from the list of Countries of Particular Concern, as designed pursuant to the International Religious Freedom Act, Vietnam in fact continues to be among the worst violators of religious freedom in the world. According to the United States Commission for (sic/on) International Religious Freedom 2011 annual report, quote, "The government of Vietnam continues to control religious communities, severely restricts and penalizes "independent religious practice, and brutally" represses "individuals and groups viewed as challenging its authority.

I agree with the commission's conclusion where they have asked that Vietnam again be designated as a country of particular concern.

The State Department's designation of Vietnam as a Tier 2 watch list country with respect to the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking also needs to be critically examined. The department's 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report states not only that Vietnamese women and children are being sexually exploited but that there are severe labor abuses occurring as well, with the government's complicity. The report acknowledges that state affiliate labor export companies charge illegal fees for overseas employment, and recruitment companies engage in other trafficking-related violations.

There are also documented cases of recruited companies -- recruitment companies ignoring pleas for help from workers in exploitative situations.

As a sponsor of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, I am deeply concerned that the tier rankings are not being better utilized by our State Department to pressure Vietnam to correct the trafficking abuses occurring within its government, and not to mention those in the private sector.

We are particularly privileged to have today Ms. Phuong-Anh Vu, and she will testify about the horrific suffering she endured when she was trafficked from Vietnam to Jordan. It is also troubling to hear about the abuse that she and others have had to endure at the Vietnamese government, even after their escape from the traffickers.

Ms. Vu, I greatly admire your courage, and the subcommittee is most appreciative of your presence, as well as your testimony.

I meet other courageous individuals -- I met other courageous individuals during my last trip to Vietnam who were struggling for fundamental human rights in their country. Unfortunately, many of them continue to be persecuted by the government. Father Ly is in prison and is suffering from very poor health, and Attorney Nguyen Van Dai remains under house arrest.

Despite this dismal status for human rights in Vietnam, there are new opportunities for the United States to exert pressure on the government to cease these abuses.

H.R. 1410, the Vietnam Human Rights Act, which I introduced last year and which passed the House on two occasions but mostly recently in 2007, would provide significant motivation to the government of Vietnam to respect its international human rights obligations. It would prohibit any annual increase in the amount of non-humanitarian assistance that the United States provides to Vietnam, unless there is an equal or greater increase in the amount of assistance for human rights and democracy promotion and programming in Vietnam.

An increase in non-humanitarian assistance would also be prohibited unless Vietnam satisfies certain requirements, including substantial progress towards respect for the freedom of religion and freedom of expression and assembly; respect for ethnic and minority rights; and allowing Vietnamese nationals free and open access to United States refugee programs.

The government would also have to end its complicity in severe forms of human trafficking. In addition, this legislation would reaffirm the United States' commitment to overcoming the jamming of Radio Free Asia by the Vietnamese government, to engaging in cultural exchanges in a manner that promotes freedom and democracy in Vietnam, and to offer refugee resettlement to Vietnamese nationals who have been deemed ineligible solely due to administrative errors or for reasons beyond their control.

Again, I want to thank our distinguished witnesses for being here and look forward to their testimony. And I'd like to yield to my friend and colleague Ranking Member Don Payne.

REPRESENTATIVE DONALD PAYNE (D-NJ): Thank you -- thank you very much.

Excuse my voice, but -- became hoarse.

Let me start by commending my colleague Chris Smith for calling this very important hearing. I would especially like to thank our witnesses, a very distinguished group, for agreeing to testify here today.

Following the Vietnam War, relations between Vietnam and the United States were minimal until the mid-1990s. Since then, economic and security interests have resulted in increased partnership.

I became very involved in the humanitarian side of the Vietnam War and was in Vietnam during the -- after even the withdrawal of American troops and was working with -- helping to try to build cities up by the north, where the desire was to strengthen the community and to resist the North and VC from coming down. And so I -- up in Quang Tri province, in cities in that area spent time working with various community development programs for a while. So I have a very strong interest and concern in Vietnam, as many of us have.

Since the 1990s, when we started to have some attention paid, economic security interests has (sic) increased, and there have been increased partnership. In 2001, the U.S. established normal trade relations with Vietnam. And in 2010, bilateral trade amounted to over $15 billion. Vietnam has joined the U.S. as one of the nine countries negotiating the Trans-Pacific Strategic Economic Partnership free trade agreement, which the administration intends to have in place no later than November of this year. However, as Secretary Clinton noted last November, the United States has made it clear to Vietnam that if the two countries are to develop a strategic partnership, Vietnam must do more to respect and protect the civilian rights under the rule of the Vietnamese Communist Party, the VCP. The Vietnamese people have faced oppression in a number of areas, including religious persecution, wrongful detainment, and suppression of expression, assembly and association. Political dissidents are routinely targeted, and ethnic minorities face repression and discrimination.

2004 Religious Freedom Report, the State Department designated Vietnam a Country of Particular Concern, CPC, principally because of reports of worsening harassment of certain ethnic minorities, Protestants and Buddhists. 2006, Hanoi promised to improve conditions and release some of the dissidents. The Bush administration subsequently removed Vietnam from the CPC list. However, according to numerous accounts, since at least early 2007, the Vietnamese government suppression of dissidents have intensified, and its tolerance for criticism have even lessened, markedly.

Beginning in 2009, the government began increasing the -- targeting bloggers, as well as lawyers who represent human rights and religious freedom groups, particularly those who are linked to a network of pro-democracy activists. Human Rights Watch and others rights groups have reported an increase in incidents of forced labor, torture and prison deaths. According to numerous accounts, the government suppressed -- suppression increased in 2010, 2011. In 2011 alone, 21 people died in police custody. This is a very troubling trend.

I will have to leave following the witnesses' testimony because of some special obligations with the State of the Union address, but I would ask unanimous consent that Congressman Al Green from Houston, who represents a great number of Vietnamese, be allowed to sit in.

Thank you.

REP. SMITH: Thank you, Mr. Payne.

I'd like to now yield to Mr. Royce for his time, as he may consume.

REPRESENTATIVE ED ROYCE (R-CA): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And I really want to thank all of our witnesses, who have been so engaged on human rights, for being here today, and especially our former colleague Joseph Cao.

It's good to have you with us on an issue, which I think really, really touches all of us.

Earlier this month, the chairman and myself, along with Chairwoman Ros-Lehtinen, who is the -- and also the ranking member, Howard Berman -- we sent a letter to the State Department. And in that letter, we detailed the ongoing human rights abuses in Vietnam and how little things have changed. In this hearing, we intend -- and I appreciate the chairman holding this hearing -- we intend this to put that needed spotlight on a situation that is very dire for -- especially for activists and many young people in Vietnam. And I hope the administration is listening to this hearing.

I think one of the cases brought to our attention speaks to all of us, the case of Viet Khang, who is a songwriter in Vietnam. And he sits in a Vietnamese jail for simply writing songs and posting songs on the Internet. One song he wrote was entitled "Who Are You?" questioning the conscience of those police who brutally assaulted and arrested demonstrators who were peacefully protesting. And he, like so many political prisoners in Vietnam, should be free today.

Recently, I think we've seen a change in pattern. Instead of the show trials that we're used to, they're just skipping the show trials, the government of Vietnam, and they're going -- they're sending dissidents straight to administrative detention.

Just the other day, The Wall Street Journal editorialized against this new practice in Vietnam. But as one witness notes, here is how the editorial looked as -- to readers in Saigon. Here's The Wall Street Journal; they obviously went through a lot of magic markers in order to individually censor the Asia edition of The Wall Street Journal that was distributed in Saigon.

So you've got many brave Vietnamese men and women who are standing up for their rights, for the right to free speech, for the right to some measure of freedom. And they deserve our support. And what we're talking about today is not some isolated cases. We're talking about the norm in that society today. And we'll hear today that the situation, especially for young bloggers, young writers, young songwriters, for the youth, it's deteriorating in terms of the measure of freedom in Vietnam.

I have legislation that calls for Vietnam to be placed back on the CPC list with respect to religious freedom. I also have legislation that Joseph Cao and I worked on that would identify and sanction those individuals in the Vietnamese government committing those human rights abuses. It is the least we should do. We must do at least this and we should move these bills. And I thank the chairman for holding this hearing.

REP. SMITH: Thank you very much, Mr. Royce.

Mr. Green?

REPRESENTATIVE AL GREEN (D-TX): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And I thank you for allowing me as an inter-loper to be a part of the committee. I'd like to thank Ranking Member Payne for making the request and for all that he has done through the many, many years that I have known him to curtail human rights violations around the world. He's one of the preeminent spokespersons for human rights in the Congress of the United States of America. And I'm grateful to each of these men for giving me this opportunity to be a part of this committee temporarily.

I want to thank the witnesses, and I must especially thank Ms. Vu.

It does take great courage to come before a committee of Congress and make your statements known to the world. We appreciate you for what you are doing to help others. It means a lot to have someone who has empirical evidence, firsthand knowledge of what's going on presented.

I thank Member Cao for returning and being a part of this committee, but finally, SOS Boat People (sic/Boat People SOS), known to us in Houston quite well. We appreciate what you've done across the length and breadth of our city.

I am very concerned about human trafficking. And one of my concerns, quite candidly, when properly distilled becomes simply, is "human trafficking" a euphemism for involuntary servitude, which is a euphemism for slavery. Are people being detained against their will and forced to do things that we find unpleasant?

I'm eager to hear from the witnesses. I can -- I can tell you that I've heard enough anecdotal evidence from members of my district. I have a very large Vietnamese population in my district. The ballot is printed in Vietnamese, and that population and I have a kinship. And I am told quite regularly that things are in need of some attention. So I'm honored to have this opportunity to acquire some additional evidence of things that hopefully I can be of assistance with.

Thank you again, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, Mr. Ranking Member.

I yield back.

REP. SMITH: Thank you, Mr. Green.

Mr. Turner?

REPRESENTATIVE BOB TURNER (R-NY): OK, thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I'm interested in hearing what the witnesses have to say. (Off mic) -- I'm hoping that by shining the light on problems -- (off mic) -- improve the living conditions, the -- and the rights conditions in Vietnam. (Off mic) -- thank you. I yield back.

REP. SMITH: Thank you, Mr. Turner.

Let me introduce our distinguished panel, beginning with former Congressman Anh Cao, who was born in Vietnam, and at the age of eight was able to escape to the United States with his siblings. With the downfall in Saigon, he left without his parents. It was a -- it is an epic journey but one that he engaged in, and certainly he flourished. After learning English, he did well in school, went on to earn his undergraduate and master's degrees before teaching philosophy and ethics in New Orleans.

Congressman Cao became an attorney and worked for Boat People SOS, and that's how I first met him, when he was advocating on behalf of those who took to the seas, many of whom ended up in so-called refugee camps dotted throughout Southeast Asia and in the region. And he was a great, great advocate for those people who had been so disadvantaged by the invasion from the North.

He has assisted Vietnamese and other minorities ever since and he lost his home and his office in Hurricane Katrina but helped lead his community as it started to rebuild. He represented Louisiana's 2nd Congressional District in the 111th Congress, and as I said earlier, was a stalwart on behalf of human rights.

We'll then hear from Dr. Nguyen Dinh Thang, who came to the United States a refugee from Vietnam in 1979. After earning his Ph.D. from Virginia Tech, he began volunteering with Boat People SOS in 1988. Now serving as the executive director of Boat People SOS, Dr. Thang has worked for the past two decades to resettle tens of thousands of Vietnamese boat people and other refugees to the United States, and has assisted more than 4,000 victims of human trafficking, modern-day slavery.

He has received numerous awards for his extensive human rights work. Dr. Thang travels to Asia frequently, where he documents ongoing abuses and strives to rescue victims. I would note parenthetically that it was Dr. Thang in the 1990s who came to this committee -- and I chaired the committee at the time -- with alarming information about how the -- there were many refugees in places like Hai (ph) Island and all throughout Asia -- boat people, some 40,000 -- and his estimation was that at least half of those, maybe more, had been improperly screened out from refugee status and were being involuntarily repatriated to Vietnam, where they were facing a very, very bleak future, if not re-education camps and incarceration.

He brought that to the committee. As a direct result of his intervention, my committee held four hearings. I offered legislation on the floor that passed by approximately a hundred votes, bipartisan amendment, that said no U.S. money will be used to involuntarily repatriate these individuals -- and Dr. Thang at each of those four hearings, including one closed hearing, where we desperately tried to get the administration to realize that these people were refugees and they were being sent back improperly in contravention of international law and U.S. law.

As a direct result, a program called Rover was established, because there were friends in the administration at the time who saw it as we did, and that program resulted in the rescreening of so many, and approximately 20,000 people made their way to the United States. And I say this with great admiration: Dr. Thang was the one who brought it, kept us very well informed, and I will be forever indebted for what he provided this committee, my -- me and my staff in terms of actionable information.

We'll then hear from Mr. Rong Nay, who has worked for over 30 years to improve the lives of the Montagnard people both in Vietnam and in the United States. After coming to the U.S., Mr. Nay was part of numerous groups working to help Montagnard people, including the Montagnard Human Rights Organization, which was founded in 1998, where he is currently serving as the executive director. He works on issues such as family reunification, refugee resettlement, cultural preservation and cultural challenges that the Montagnard refugees encounter when they come to the U.S. And of course, we all have been deeply distressed over recent events concerning the Montagnard and we look forward to hearing more on that, as well as the ongoing persecution of people of faith that we know is ongoing and totally repressive.

We'll then hear from Ms. Phuong-Anh Vu, who was trafficked by a Vietnamese labor export company to Jordan in 2008, where she and 260 fellow Vietnamese were exploited in slavery conditions. They went on strike and were beaten by guards and police. Ms. Vu quickly rose to become the de facto leader of the victims. She sought outside help and subsequently became the target of the Vietnamese government. And she -- as she was being returned to Vietnam for punishment, she managed to escape and took refuge in Thailand. She eventually resettled in Houston as a refugee and Ms. Vu continues to fight to end the trafficking of Vietnamese migrant workers -- a true hero.

We'll then hear from Mr. John Sifton, who is the advocacy director for Asia at Human Rights Watch -- no stranger, nor is Human Rights Watch, to this committee -- where he focuses on South and Southeast Asia. He was previously director of One World Research, the public-interest research and investigation firm that specializes in international human rights cases. Mr. Sifton traveled to Hanoi and Saigon late last year and has been actively raising the Vietnamese human rights record with various diplomats, trade representatives, officials, international financial institutions and journalists in the context of emerging Trans-Pacific Partnership.

Mr. Sifton, thank you for being here as well.

Congressman Cao, please proceed as you like.

Congressman Cao, if you could just suspend for one minute, I -- the vice chair of the subcommittee, Mr. Fortenberry, has arrived, and he's recognized for such time that he may consume.

REPRESENTATIVE JEFF FORTENBERRY (R-NE): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I apologize for running a little bit behind, but I'll give a brief opening statement, then turn to our former colleague, Congressman Cao.

Thank you for holding this important hearing as we work to develop effective, bilateral relationships with Vietnam. This hearing is of special interest to the Vietnamese Diaspora, particularly those in my home state of Nebraska. Many people of Vietnamese descent have chosen to make Lincoln, Nebraska their home and build their American dream there. They contribute immensely to the vitality of our community and have voiced agonized worry about the human rights situation of the Vietnamese government, as the Vietnamese government continues to repress groups viewed as challenging political authority, specifically, as was mentioned, country dwellers and minority ethnic groups in Vietnam such as the Hmong and Montagnard, who live far from the eyes of the foreign news agencies.

The persecution also extends to religious minorities. In May of last year, the village of Con Dau Catholic Parish faced government retribution in the form of three lost lives and hundreds of injuries in a funeral procession, of all things. Their offense? They were exercising earlier their right of protest against when the government decided to sell their land to build a resort, it's my understanding.

Simply being a woman or a child in Vietnam can be fraught with danger as well. According to the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report, Vietnam is both a source and destination country for both sex and labor trafficking of women and of children. With China facing a shortage of women, Vietnamese women are recruited into servitude through fraudulent marriages. The Vietnamese government estimates that approximately 10 percent of women entering into arranged marriages may become trafficking victims.

Women who are fortunate enough to enter into legitimate marriages, with few exceptions, are subject to a one- or two-child policy, with tragic consequences.

Vietnamese women and their families suffered as many as 45 abortions per 100 live births, compared to 25 abortions in the United States in the last decade. It was also reported that this abortion practice counted for 11.5 percent of maternal deaths in Vietnam in 2002.

I note that Vietnam was removed as a, quote, "Country of Particular Concern" in 2006 by the State Department, despite lingering concerns whether that change in status made good sense. While economic development and market reforms have spurred a relative improvement in the living standards of many Vietnamese people, the welfare of the most vulnerable continues to be in jeopardy.

Thank you again, Mr. Chairman, for holding this hearing, and I welcome our witnesses and look forward to your further comments on what I have raised and any other issues that we feel, that you feel are necessary that we may need to know. Thank you.

REP. SMITH: Thank you very much, Mr. Vice Chairman.

The Honorable Anh Cao.

ANH CAO: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Smith, Ranking Member Payne, and distinguished members of the Subcommittee on Africa, Global Health, and Human Rights, I would like to thank you for holding this important hearing on the human rights condition in Vietnam.

The struggle for religious freedom and the promotion of justice and democracy in Vietnam remain in the hearts and minds of the 1.5 million Vietnamese-Americans presently living in the United States. Therefore, your dedication and support of these issues will be deeply appreciated and remembered by those who continue to struggle and fight for these righteous causes.

Mr. Chairman and members of the subcommittee, all human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. These rights include the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion, which encompasses the freedom to change a person's religion or belief and freedom either alone or in a community with others and in public or private to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance. These words are expressed in Articles 1 and 18 of the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights respectively. Vietnam, a member of the United Nations, has systematically violated this right and has no intention of keeping the promise that it made to the U.S. Congress in 2006 to steadily improve its human rights record as a condition for the Congress' support of Vietnam's entry into the World Trade Organization.

Sadly, instead of improving its human rights record, the government of Vietnam has increased its repression of the centrist and religious leaders. To continue its imposition of an iron will on the people of Vietnam, the government detains, imprisons, places under house arrest and convicts individuals for their peaceful expression of dissenting political or religious views, including but not limited to democracy and human rights activists, independent trade union leaders, non-state-sanctioned publishers, journalists, bloggers, members of ethnic minorities and unsanctioned religious groups. The government of Vietnam especially continues to limit freedom of religion, pressure all religious groups to come under the control of government and party-controlled management boards, and restrict the operation of independent religious organizations. Religious leaders who do not conform to the government's demands are often harassed, arrested, imprisoned or put under house arrest.

As noted in the October 2009 report of the United States Commission on International Religious Freedom, quote: "There continue to be far too many serious abuses and restrictions of religious freedom in the country. Individuals continue to be imprisoned or detained for reasons related to their religious activity or religious-freedom advocacy. Police and government officials are not held fully accountable for abuses, independent religious activity remains illegal, and legal protection for government-approved religion organizations are both vague and subject to arbitrary or discriminatory interpretations based on political factors. Moreover, property disputes between the government and the Catholic Church in Hanoi led to detention, threats, harassment and violence by contract thugs against peaceful prayer vigils and religious leaders."

A case that succinctly paints and substantiates the words of the Commission on International Religious Freedom is the case of Thai Ha Parish, a Catholic parish in Hanoi. The parish was founded by the Redemptorist Order in 1935 with the intention of providing educational and medical services to the region. Soon after the Communist government took over Hanoi in 1954, it confiscated schools that the parish had established, leaving only the facilities to house the Redemptorist Brothers, the church building, the community center and a few small structures around the church. But that was not enough for the Communist government. It subsequently seized all the land belonging to the parish around Thai Ha and underhandedly proceeded to take control of the remaining buildings that it did not want to confiscate in 1954.

For example, in 1959, the government forced the Redemptorists to loan one of the two buildings housing the brothers so that the government could turn it into a school. Because it was for a good cause, the order complied. In 1972, the government, without due process, seized the remaining building and converted most buildings used to house the brothers into a hospital. Subsequently, the government borrowed the community center and set up a wool-knitting factory. Then it borrowed the auxiliary building at the front of the church and turned it into a Red Cross station. Finally, it borrowed the last structure belonging to the church and turned it into a machine shop to initiate the -- (inaudible) -- Cooperative.

In 2008, during peaceful prayer vigils calling for the return of government-confiscated church properties, contract thugs harassed and dispersed the protesters and destroyed church properties. In this final act of usurpation, the government then decided only four months ago to construct a waste-treatment plant on or near parish grounds to effectively seize the rights of ownership and stewardship after they forcibly took over the right of use. Again, the parishioners protested, and again, the government sent in their thugs.

Father Nguyen Van Khai described what happened: "For a number of days, starting on October 2nd, 2011, high-powered loudspeakers belonging to the -- (inaudible) -- administrative area beamed towards Thai Ha church the government's plan to build a wastewater treatment plant for Dong Da hospital on the 2,000-square-meter lot belonging to the church. Later events took place over a number of days. First, representatives of Dong Da hospital came to the church to deliver the message. Subsequently, the -- (inaudible) -- people's committee requested a representative of Thai Ha Church to come to its offices to hear the message. In response, Thai Ha Parish promptly submitted a request to the appropriate government units to, one, stop all activities under the wastewater treatment project and, two, return the parish the land and buildings that the government borrowed. Furthermore, the parish used an electronic sign to display its legitimate demand."

"Concurrently, the government-owned media launched a serious campaign of libel, slander, false accusations and threats against parishioners, brothers and priests in Thai Ha. Following this, the government resorted to its familiar tactics. Its employees and police mustered a number of strangers, i.e., outside thugs, who came to the church to threaten, harass and terrorize priests, monks and parishioners. On November 8, 2011, a government agent came to Mr. Yoong's (ph) house and formed (sic) a heated discussion. The police used this as an excuse to arrest Mr. Yoong" (ph).

"The underlying reality is that, like so many other Vietnamese, Thai Ha parishioners are being victimized by a corrupt regime that only cares about its own privileges. The regime frequently makes arbitrary decisions and backs them up by force instead of following the law. The government-owned media is trying to paint us as putting roadblocks to stop a humanitarian project that will yield public benefits. However, nothing is further from the truth. We followed the law, even as the government violates the law through its total disregard of its citizens' rights, the rights that the government is supposed to respect and protect," close quote.

Similar incidents occurred at both -- (inaudible). But religious repression is not limited to Catholics. The Unified Buddhist Church of Vietnam suffers persecution as the government of Vietnam continues to restrict contacts and movement of senior clergies for refusing to join state-sponsored Buddhist organizations. The Bat Nha Buddhist Monastery at Lam Dong province was attacked by the government thugs in October 2009, and about 400 monks and nuns were physically abused and forcibly evicted from the monastery. Members of the Cao Dai, Hoa Hao, Mennonites and Montagnard Christians suffered detention and imprisonment.

Faced with these atrocities, the Obama administration's approach to the human rights conditions in Vietnam is to stand by and watch. Although administration officials expressed concerns, they continually push aside Vietnam's human rights abuses to further the interests of the administration. This approach stands in stark contrast to the intents of the Founding Fathers of this great nation, who built the foundation of this country on principles of religious freedom and tolerance. The United States has to be more assertive in forcing Vietnam to adhere to the promises that it made to the U.S. Congress in 2006, and this requires the passing and enforcing of the Vietnam Human Rights Act.

Again, I would like to thank Chairman Smith and members of this subcommittee for your commitment and support for the people of Vietnam. I know that if we persevere in this fight, Vietnam will one day be a free and democratic country. Thank you.

REP. SMITH: Congressman Cao, thank you so very much for that testimony.

Dr. Thang.

NGUYEN DINH THANG: Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Payne, Congressman Royce, Vice Chairman Fortenberry, and Congressman Al Green, and Mr. Turner, first of all, I'd like to take this opportunity to send you our best wishes for Tet, that is our Lunar New Year that was yesterday. And then also would like to point out that we truly appreciate the fact that Congressman Al Green and Congressman Royce have been working very closely with our offices in Houston and in Orange County on different issues relating to the local communities and also relating to human rights issues in Vietnam.

And I'd like to point out one fact, very little-known fact about Congressman Payne.

You stood tall and strong beside us in the darkest moment when the international community and countries in the region pushed back the boat people. And thank you very much, Congressman Payne.

First of all, I'd like to express our strong support for the Vietnam Human Rights Act. I also support the call for our administration to place Vietnam on Tier 3 in its upcoming TIP reports. I also strongly support the re-designation of Vietnam as a country of particular concern. And I would also like to call on our own State Department to do a better job at reporting the violations of human rights, the gross abuses committed by the police, the widespread use of torture, atrocious forms of torture by the police, and the attacks on the ethnic minorities in Vietnam. These crimes and violations have been under-reported by our own State Department.

Today, I would like to focus on three specific areas of human rights violations that have not been given appropriate recognition so far. First of all is the systematic and widespread modern-day slavery, not just with the government's complicity, but the government in Vietnam was behind it. The Vietnamese government operates those programs.

Second, I'd like to touch on the widespread use of torture against political dissidents, people of faith, religious leaders and also the increased frequency of police brutality. And we have some pictures that I'd like to request the permission of the chairman later on after all the testimonies to show as illustration of the true face of brutality committed by the police.

And finally, I'd like to talk about religious persecution, focusing on the Hmong Christians. There has been very little news that could get out of Vietnam since last May. There was a massacre of Hmong Christians in the northwestern region of Vietnam. But we obtained never-seen-before footage and pictures that I show to the members of this subcommittee, very important.

So, first of all, let me talk about slavery-like conditions in government-run programs. It is very critical to make a distinction between two different categories of human trafficking in Vietnam. One would involve national policies, national programs run by the government, sanctioned by the government, operated by government, and protected and defended by the government, such as human trafficking under the cover of Vietnam's national policy of labor exports. Two, the forced labor inflicted on not only in the rehab centers, as reported by Human Rights Watch, but also subjected -- a lot of political dissidents have been subjected to those forms, similar forms of forced repatriation.

I just returned from an extended trip to Southeast Asia, and I talked to about over 100 victims, and what I found out was that in prison camps inside Vietnam right now, dissidents are being used through forced labor to produce goods for export overseas. So those are the forms, the most egregious forms of modern-day slavery that the Vietnamese government doesn't want anyone to talk about.

The Vietnamese government in recent days did invite a number of organizations to go into Vietnam to fight the other form of trafficking, the privatized form of trafficking that usually involves only small fish, small-time criminals, and some low-ranking police officers, and those sex trafficking of women and children to Cambodia and other countries. We don't condone that, but that is much smaller problem compared to the labor trafficking in Vietnam. And also, there's an issue of child-labor trafficking within Vietnam as well.

So I just came back from Southeast Asia and I talked with a lot of people there, and we monitor things constantly, the conditions in Vietnam. Just last year, the Vietnamese parliament, National Assembly passed the first law against trafficking. For the first time, they did mention labor trafficking. However, it was very disappointing as a document because, one, it doesn't include the standard definition of human trafficking. Initially, in its initial draft, there was a definition, but then they pulled that out in the law that got passed and that just became effective a few weeks ago, on January 1st. So the law that got passed essentially excludes all labor-export companies in Vietnam from being incriminated as the source of the trafficking chain from Vietnam to other countries. And also, there was no penalties prescribed against the traffickers.

Every year, Vietnam exported about 80,000 to 100,000 migrant workers. That is a $2.2 billion industry -- very well protected by the government of Vietnam. And time and again, we had to deal with the Vietnamese government sending its delegations not from the embassy but from all the way from Hanoi to the American Samoa, to Jordan, to Malaysia, even to Houston, to silence the voice of those few courageous victims who came forth to expose the involvement of the government of Vietnam in trafficking them.

And over the past three and a half years, we have rescued thousands of victims. And we did thorough research, through interviews of victims, and we identified over 35 labor-export companies from Vietnam who are involved, completely involved in human trafficking, and we brought them to the attention of Vietnamese government for the past several years. To this day, not a single case investigated, not a single case prosecuted. But instead, the victims themselves had been persecuted and threatened. So that is the state of human trafficking, the side of against human trafficking in Vietnam.

Now I would like to mention very quickly about the Vietnamese ploy to play up its fight against the other form of human trafficking, the privatized form of human trafficking, just trying to cover up the bigger problem of labor trafficking. So please, do pay attention to the latter problem.

Now, of torture: There has been widespread use of torture from our own, my direct interview with the victims. In late 2010, communists in -- (inaudible) -- asked Secretary Clinton, Hillary Clinton, when she visited Vietnam, Hanoi, for assistance to help Vietnam prepare itself to ratify the U.N. Convention Against Torture. It should be very simple; there's no need for (her assistance ?). Just give, issue a decree to stop the use of torture.

We have observed a significant increase in the use of torture. Forms of torture would include: beating up the victims in the chest and the sides and legs; handcuffing the victim up (in the?) window and then beating him up with batons and electric rods; stripping the victim naked, including women, and flogging him or her with a belt; hanging the victim to the ceiling beam and punching in the stomach; drawing a large amount of blood every week to debilitate the victim; standing the victim in water, electro-shocking him or her; applying electric shocks to the victim's private parts, genitals for men and vagina for women -- horrendous forms of torture.

And what we've found out is even more troubling. The police in Vietnam maintains special torture chambers outside of the prison. For instance, I talked with -- (inaudible) -- who returned to Vietnam after being rejected by the -- (inaudible) -- and they were told, you'll be fine; just go back to Vietnam; you'll be safe. So they went back to Vietnam and they got arrested in Tay Ninh. And the police in Tay Ninh put them in prison, tortured them every day.

And for those few who was considered stubborn, in the dead of the night, at 1 a.m., that person be pulled out, taken to special place called BC-14, just outside the prison. And that's where the police operates special torture chamber with all the special instruments and equipment. And the guys are very big, muscular, vicious, and well- trained, specially trained to inflict torture on the victims. And most people had to admit to crimes that they never committed. And they were brought back to prison at around 5 a.m. And we have (companion ?) report of all those interviews, and I'd like to the subcommittee at another time. And we also have pictures of police brutality inflicted against people of faith that I'd like to show afterwards.

And finally, about the Hmong Christians: January of last year, the police came into a Hmong village of -- (inaudible) -- in Muong Nhe district and that Hmong village of about over 100 households all converted to Protestantism, and all the government was to raze flat the entire village. The order was this, the explanation was this: Either you renounce your faith or you have no place here. Protestantism is an American religion. If you stick to your religion, go to America, to America's land. Go to America to follow American's religion. And then, on January 28th, they proceeded to demolish the homes. So they completed demolition of 13 homes and they stopped because of Lunar New Year, and 15th of March of last year, they came back. The government came back with the military and workers to break down all the remaining homes.

And therefore, in May, on May 1st, these Hmong villagers, they gathered in Muong Nhe, a small village in Muong Nhe district, and other Hmong across the country who suffered the same atrocities got -- (inaudible) -- so they came to the same place from across the country, and there were about 4,000 to 5,000 of them. And the police moving, mobile police, and the riot police, and the military move in with guns, batons, electric rods, and assaulted these Hmong Christians. And their only demand was, one, don't destroy our home, don't take our land; two, allow us to be Christian. And you know that in the three provinces of Son La, Lai Chau, and Dien Bien in the northern part of Vietnam, there is not a single church. There is none. None allowed by the government. And that's their peaceful demonstration; that's very simple demands. And the troops attacked them. And a lot of people died, and some got buried alive. And we got a list that I'm going to submit for the record of 14 who got killed, just a partial list, and these 14 we (only ?) verified by talking either with eyewitnesses or the relatives of the deceased.

And according to a few who made it to Thailand, hundreds are still in hiding to this day in the jungle. And one by one, they're being hunted down by the police. Just last month, one of them got shot dead when he tried to escape as the police approached. So that is the degree of religious persecution. We're not talking about harassment. This egregious -- and with your permission, I'd like to show later on some of those footages. You can see with your own eyes the atrocities committed by the government of Vietnam against people of faith.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

REP. SMITH: Thank you very much, Dr. Thang.

Mr. Nay. And at the end of the testimonies, we will show those pictures, your pictures.

RONG NAY: Mr. Chairman --

REP. SMITH: Push the button please.

MR. NAY: -- the Montagnard Human Rights Organization. I represent the Montagnard people, both in U.S. and in Central Highland of Vietnam. I would like to thank you, Mr. Chairman and member, for the honor and opportunity to share our feeling and experience about ongoing human rights abuse in Vietnam.

I had honor to testify first at the U.S. congressional hearing about the Montagnard sponsored by the former U.S. Senator Jesse Helms in 1998. I am very sad to report that the human right for the Montagnard condition in the Vietnam have got much worse for the Montagnard in the past decade. My testimony is a summary from my written statement for focus this area.

The religious persecution -- after U.S. normalization with the Vietnam, the government of the Vietnam said there was the freedom of religion in Vietnam. But it's not reality. It is not true. Vietnam -- freedom of religious (sic) is to only to allow the worship in the government-sponsored churches, not in the house churches.

The Montagnard pastor continued to be arrest (sic), tortured and persecuted. The Human Rights Watch had published a detailed report in 2011 on continuing religious persecution on the Montagnard in Central Highland. We call on the U.S. government -- reinstate to Vietnam destination as a country of particular concern for extreme violations of religious freedom, prisoner abuse. The Montagnard Christians are forced to renounce their faith. There have been many put in jail, suffered long and terrible (jailed ?) in the prisons without enough food, medicine, even family visit. Many suffer solitary confinement, tortures. The Vietnam government continue arrests and torture and jail the Montagnard Christians. There are currently 390 of the Montagnard Christians in the prison for their religious or political beliefs up to (16 year with the sermon ?). We recommend that the release of all the Montagnard prisoners (and negotiate ?) and their release -- (inaudible) -- before anymore U.S. government (defense ?) or trade treaty with the Vietnam go forward.

(Inaudible) -- include in the record.

REP. SMITH: Without objection, it will be made a part of the -- (off mic).

MR. NAY: The Montagnard refugees protection -- UNHCR -- (inaudible) -- has been closed in February 2011. The Montagnard asylum seekers have no place to feel safe and -- (inaudible). Asylum seekers have -- fled to the Thailand have been arrest (sic) and put into detention. We have the report of the Montagnard hiding in the jungle in the Vietnam right now because they have no place for safe to hide. They are desperate.

There are -- the hundred of the Montagnard who fled persecution in the Vietnam were hunt (sic) down by the police, beaten and put in the jail. We urgently recommend that the U.S. State Department, in cooperate (sic) with the UNHCR, create a process and a place at the U.S. consulate in Ho Chi Minh City or another country, which allows the Montagnard asylum seekers to have a fair interview by the UNHCR or U.S. officials, taking into account the conditions of the ethnic discrimination persecution that the many Montagnard face in the Vietnam.

We ask the U.S. State Department to reopen its refugees program in the Vietnam because there are the many -- (inaudible) -- persecutions within -- in the Vietnam. Why are the Montagnard claims of persecution being ignored by the U.S. government?

We also have the propose (sic) that the U.S. satellite consular office be established in the Central Highland of Vietnam. Such an office would be beneficial -- (inaudible) -- and the refugees claim -- (inaudible) -- immigrant visa processing. This satellite office could also be utilized for humanitarian and development assistance programs focused on the Montagnard in Central Highland. The United States Department of Defense had shown interest in establishing the humanitarian aid program in the Central Highland.

Vietnam ethnic cleaning policy -- the Montagnard indigenous people have cried out to keep our ancestor land, our language, our culture, as we ask from help from the U.S. and United Nations and the world community to help us. And so many of our ancestral lands have been (stealed ?) by the (companies ?) of Vietnam for (river ?) or coffee plantation. The government of the Vietnam accused the Montagnard people for causing trouble.

But we want only to keep our land for farm, for habitat and (survive ?).

Need for development assistance -- the United Nations, European Union and the State Department have all acknowledged that the rate of the poverty for the Montagnard indigenous people is much higher than majority (to ?) Vietnamese population. We ask to recommend that the U.N. and U.S. put more emphasis on development assistance, scholarship and boarding school, Montagnard education in the Central Highland.

The Montagnard do not have the same opportunity in education development as the Vietnamese. For example, over 15,000 the Vietnamese students sent to the United States for education, but not a single -- the Montagnard (colleague ?) -- (inaudible) -- to allow to have a scholarship in the U.S.

The abuse of free immigration -- the government of the Vietnam continue to break agreement of free immigration that was outlined (in the ?) U.S. -- (inaudible) -- the U.S. and Vietnam trade agreement in the past year.

Mr. Chairman, it is our privilege to come here today and to tell you the truth about the Montagnard human rights abuse in -- abuse that the Montagnard indigenous people face now in the Vietnam Central Highland. We are -- the Montagnard treat like enemy in our homeland. A hundred of the prisoners in Ha Nam (ph) prison are suffering terrible abuse, (isolate ?) and other the Montagnard men and women and children quietly and suffer -- (inaudible) -- under constant fear and police surveillance. We hope that the committee today and the U.S. government and the world will hear our pray (sic) and plea for help.

Thank you very much for the opportunity to serve the plight of the Montagnard in the Central Highland of Vietnam, and our recommendation how to help.

Thank you, sir.

REP. SMITH: Mr. Nay, thank you so very much for your testimony and very practical recommendations.

I'd like to now recognize Ms. Vu for such time as she would like to use.

HANG SAN (ph): My name is Hang San (ph). I'm going to be translating for Ms. Vu.

PHUONG-ANH VU: (In Vietnamese.)

MS. SAN (ph): She would like to say thank you for the opportunity to be here, and she's wishing you're family a happy Lunar New Year.

MS. VU: (Through interpreter.) I grew up in a -- in poverty in the province called Lao Cai in Vietnam. My family is Catholic, so we have difficulties living there under the Vietnamese government policy of persecuting Christian -- I mean, Christian people.

MS. SAN (ph): Yeah, she restated that the government has the policy of persecuting Christian Hmong people and anyone that believes in Christianity.

MS. VU: (Through interpreter.) My family only have the two of us, my sister and I. And my father died when I was 11 -- I'm sorry, one years (sic) old.

When I turned 16, my sister was kidnapped, and she's been missing since then. Heeding to the Vietnamese government call for citizens' participation in their labor export program in --

MS. SAN (ph): I'm sorry, what? 2008?

MS. VU: 2008.

MS. SAN (ph): 2008.

MS. VU: (Through interpreter.) And I was transferred to Jordan and working at a sewing factory for a Taiwanese contractor. I was among 276 women, and we were promised to only work eight hours a day and that we would have -- earn $300 a month.

That is an enormous amount of money for myself and along with the people that came with me. Myself, along with all of my friends, each of us have to pretty much mortgage our home and borrow money, $2,000, to participate in this program.

We never were given any contract to sign, and it wasn't until we got on a plane where they gave us the contract. When we got to Jordan, it turns out that nothing was to the -- to what was promised to us. When we arrived, immediately the -- they took all of our paperwork, all our passports, and immediately put us to work.

Then starting the next day, we had to work, and the shift was 16 hours a day.

MS. SAN (ph): She worked for 10 days. And I mean --

MS. VU: (Through interpreter.) I worked for 10 days and I received $10.

MS. SAN (ph): She was very upset and surprised so she asked the employer. And the employer response was that she needed to talk to her -- the people that brought her here, which were the Vietnamese government.

She went on strike, along with some of her friends and -- to demand the payment for what was promised.

MS. VU: (Through interpreter.) We stopped working, and the owner would -- for 10 days.

MS. SAN (ph): And the owner gave her an ultimatum --

MS. VU: (Through interpreter.) Gave us an ultimatum after that. They withheld food, electricity and water from us.

A lot of us -- or some of us were afraid, so they returned to work. But then 176 of us remained on strike. A woman named Vo Tu Ha (ph), she's a representative of the labor export company. She led a group of people to take our rooms and start torturing us.

All the women there are like me, very small and tiny, and we had been weakened by not having food and so forth. So they were beaten. I was beaten along with -- they took -- (inaudible) -- our friends, hit them, smashed their head on the floor. You know, so it was really brutal.

I witnessed myself that some of my friends were, you know, really weak and they're not able to defend themselves. And they were pulled -- hair were pulled and -- like an animal. And it's very heartbreaking.

And they continued to beat us, and I didn't know what to do. So I took a cell phone to try to record what was happening. So they started beating me, and the bruise is still there on my head. And it's -- you know, it's still there.

MS. SAN (ph): She's heartbroken to see -- you know, for herself along with all the women that -- having to suffer through this.

MS. VU: (Through interpreter.) What I don't understand is that after the owner of the company witnessed us all being beaten, and -- that he did not do anything. And then afterward, they all were shaking hands.

MS. SAN (ph): So she doesn't understand why that was happening.

MS. VU: (Through interpreter.) We were all isolated and confined in a room so we tried to get help and, you know, scream through the windows. Nobody came. The Jordanian police were there, but they were there to help beat us rather than helping us.

A lot of my friends were vomiting blood and they were obviously seriously injured. I tried to call for help, and no one came to help us. So I didn't know what to do so I have to gather everything that we have and even the tampons for women to sell to get money to buy noodles for my friends.

I'm sorry, but it gets very emotional for me.

And then one day the Vietnamese -- the one delegation came. I was happy because I thought they would be there to help us. But it turned out when they came, the -- it was very disappointing because not only they did not help us but they also threatened me. The reason they threatened me: Because I was the one that contacted the newspaper in Vietnam, and they did an article. And the article got to Dr. Thang. That's how he knew about it. Dr. Thang sent us money, and that's why they came to threaten me.

I used the money that was given -- Dr. Thang for -- to get medicine for my friends and -- but the government accused me of collaborating with NGOs for my own benefit. I asked Dr. Thang to help my friends because all of them were very sick from the -- being beaten. And Dr. Thang arranged to have some physicians from IOM to come and help them.

After the IOM delegation came and left, we were confined, isolated again and were not allowed to leave. And then we were able to return to Vietnam and we -- I learned that it was thanks to the congressman and Dr. Thang.

The two gentlemen named Jeung San Than (ph) and Nguyen Ve Tu (ph) announced that I was returning home, and there were threats that I would be imprisoned when I returned home. Dr. Thang helped me escape. And when I got to Thailand, I was able to escape from the government.

The journey of my escape was very long, so -- you know, the time is limited, so I won't be able to explain all that right now. While I was in Thailand, I was threatened by the Vietnamese Embassy. And they said that they would cut me into thousands of pieces.

MS. SAN (ph): And she had that recorded, that conversation.

MS. VU: (Through interpreter.) While I was living in Thailand for three years, I -- there was a lot of suffering, you know, including my mom. And it was very emotional for me while I was staying there.

The most heartbroken (sic) for me was my three-years-old (sic) daughter was electrocuted and died. And I was not -- she was not allowed to be buried unless I am home. I mean, they wanted me to go home before they can allow her to be buried.

I was ready to go home to at least bury my daughter, but I learned that the police -- Vietnamese police were, you know, surrounding my home. One of my friends who was beaten has died because of the injury.

I don't know what else to say. I just want to send my gratitude to Dr. Thang and Congressman Smith and the panel and the U.S. government for allowing this hearing, and I hope to help my people. I know that there's going to be a lot of (uncertainties ?) and threats for me participating in this hearing. However, I chose to do it because I don't want a second woman like myself and I'd like to be able to prevent this from happening to other people.

I wish that everyone on the panel along with everyone here in the -- in the room -- now that you hear my testimony that you would raise a voice and do something to help the Vietnamese women from suffering from human trafficking.

REP. SMITH: Ms. Vu, thank you so very much for that extraordinarily moving testimony. It moves this committee, it moves, I'm sure, the members of this committee to do even more to combat human trafficking so that there are no victims -- hopefully fewer and then no victims. So your testimony will be pivotal, so thank you so very much for sharing it.

If there is retaliation against you, your friends, your family, or any way, please let us know about that. We will also alert the administration as to that retaliation, and I know in a bipartisan way, we will do everything we can to ensure that that does not happen, because again, coming here was an act of bravery, especially knowing -- I mean, when an embassy person tells you they will cut you to pieces, I mean -- and after hearing Dr. Thang and others explain the widespread use of torture, which includes cutting, it is a threat that cannot be taken lightly, and it brings nothing but dishonor to the Vietnamese government.

Mr. Sifton.

MS. SAN (ph): If I may translate that to her.

JOHN SIFTON: Thank you also for the invitation to testify today, and I'd echo what other witnesses said. And all of us at Human Rights Watch appreciate the committee's interest in the human rights situation in Vietnam and welcome the efforts today to address it. The other witnesses today and the members of the committee themselves already provided a lot of information about many of the human rights issues in Vietnam today, including the crackdowns on religious activity, the problems facing ethnic minorities, the increased attacks on political dissidents, migrant and trafficking issues, and the worsening crackdown on free expression generally.

I will add from the written version of my testimony, there are some issues with land rights and land confiscation which need a little bit more attention paid to them and some continuing problems with torture and police brutality, which I highlighted in the written version of my testimony. There's also these worrying new facts about forced labor camps, administrative detention centers, and we don't have time to run through each of these points now again, but again, I've provided details in each of the points in my written version of the testimony.

In terms of the overall picture, I can sum it all up in a simple sentence: The state of human rights in Vietnam is very poor and it's growing worse. As the other witnesses have noted, in the last year the government has actually intensified its repression of activists and dissidents, bloggers, writers, human rights defenders, land-rights activists, anti-corruption campaigners, religious and democracy advocates, advocates for minorities. All of these folks from all across Vietnamese society are being subjected to harassment and intimidation and arrest and imprisonment and torture.

And I'm not even mentioning fully the issues of Internet restrictions, a topic on which you could easily have an entire hearing unto itself. But suffice it to say, we're seeing increased evidence on that front of government filtering of Internet content, blogs blocked by local Internet service providers, comments critical of the government being removed from news postings; Facebook is blocked intermittently in many areas. And indeed the only reason it's not being blocked everywhere appears to be the government hasn't completely figured out how to do that. The government's growing increasingly sophisticated in its filtering. It's not easy to block the Internet because of its design and its setup, but as China has shown, it's possible, and it's looking increasingly like Vietnam is following the China model.

I'd also repeat what the other witnesses have said, including Congressman Cao, which is that land rights issues, land confiscation issues, both for ethnic minorities and religious groups and just for Vietnamese citizens across the country, is an area of increasing concern. And again, police brutality, torture -- absolutely it's another issue I flagged in my written version of my testimony, which Dr. Thang mentioned.

Another issue, though, just to flag right now very quickly, is administrative detention. The report we issued last September, the Rehab Archipelago, Human Rights Watch documented a lot of abuses in the administrative detention centers, and that report, I'd, you know, love to submit for the record of this hearing. The details are all in there. But I just want to note now that administrative detention is not just for drug users. Drug users were what we talked about in that report, but it was also reported to us of Vietnamese citizens placed in administrative detention for being homeless, for engaging in prostitution. There's even a recent case of authorities using administrative detention camps for dissidents.

And last week, a people's committee -- end of last November, excuse me -- a people's committee in Hanoi ordered police to send a prominent land-rights activist to administrative detention center for 24 months. It's that news article that Congressman Royce referred to that result in this Wall Street Journal article being written, which then was blocked out in the editions that were delivered in Saigon, at least.

I think the image speaks for itself.

I can also offer the committee the actual text of the article that was blocked out, in case you actually would like to --

REP. SMITH: Without objection, we'll put both the blocked as well as the full.

MR. SIFTON: I'd echo and repeat Dr. Thang's point about products produced in forced labor entering the supply chain, including possibly into the United States. A good example of a product like that is cashews. Members of the committee may want to think about that, you know, the next time you're offered some cashews, for instance. Cashew nuts don't have certificates of origin like diamonds do, so you can't, you know, you can't prove that a specific cashew nut comes from a particular country, let alone a particular forced labor camp. But it's a fact that Vietnam is a leading exporter of cashews in the world, and the United States is its biggest importer of cashew nuts in the world. So if you perhaps eat 100 cashews over the year, there's a chance that some of them were shelled in a forced-labor camp in Vietnam. And I'd note, you know, that food writers now coined the term "blood cashews" to refer to Vietnamese cashews. This is perhaps the first report where I ever engaged in advocacy not just with the State Department and the White House and PEPFAR, but with food writers. I even corresponded with celebrity food writers like Anthony Bourdain about this issue.

So I raise these issues in order to make a point. There's a growing global awareness today that Vietnam is a country that has a very problematic human rights record. It's getting more attention, it's in the public consciousness, and this provides us a really great opportunity to talk about what can be done and how U.S. power can be leveraged to effect serious improvements on human rights in Vietnam. And that's really how I'd like to end.

There are several possible approaches I want to offer.

The State Department, as you referred to in your opening statements, is negotiating a strategic partnership with the Vietnamese government, U.S. trade representatives negotiating with Vietnam in the context of the Trans-Pacific free trade agreement. And so obviously, the administration has a lot of leverage to pull and push with Vietnam. Our understanding is that the State Department and the U.S. trade representative are pulling and pushing those levers. Michael Posner, the chief of the State Department's Democracy, Human Rights and Labor Section, has been a very vocal critic. During the recent U.S.-Vietnam Human Rights Dialogue, he didn't pull any punches. He arranged to have the Vietnamese government delegation sit down directly with us, at Human Rights Watch, and we gave them all kinds of criticism. Secretary Clinton was very vocal during her trip with President Obama through Hawaii and onto Bali during the East Asia Summit last November. She made clear Vietnam's human rights problems are an impediment to reaching better diplomatic relations with Vietnam. And other U.S. officials have made the same point; including members of Congress very recently have said the same thing.

But it's vitally important not to let up the pressure, and that's what I really want to say today, is the test will not come now but will come at the 11th hour, sometime in the next few years when the State Department is finalizing a strategic partnership, military-to-military relationships, the Pentagon will be involved, and the U.S. trade representative will be completing its agreement with the TPP nations, including Vietnam.

Let me say, as an aside, I very much doubt that the TPP negotiations will be finalized this year, despite what the U.S. trade representative says, but whenever it happens, U.S. resolve on human rights in Vietnam has to remain steady and strong.

So this committee, as well as the Vietnam caucus, another important player, are really important actors in clarifying and conveying those concerns to the administration. This is what we think, and I think this is what the administration thinks; I hope it's what you think. The U.S. has an agenda for change here. The idea is to encourage Vietnam to improve its human rights practices, and that will, you know, enable better international relations, increase military-to-military engagement, better trade engagement. But there can't be a last-minute change in heart. You can't have the administration suddenly leaping to a different idea, suddenly offering a new doctrine, suddenly making some claim, you know, based on faith that Vietnam's going to change gradually, organically, that it will take time, that the change will be more likely when the United States engages with Vietnam, that we should engage with Vietnam because that will bring about change. Those are the cliched theories of change that were offered with China in 1994 when the most favored nation status was up, and we can see how well that worked out.

So our request to you is simple: Don't let up. The administration may come later and offer the theory that I just articulated, and I imagine you'll hear it from the U.S. trade representative's office first, and I'm saying please don't accept it, don't take that bill of goods. Vietnam needs major reforms, and if they don't make them, Congress should just tell the administration, whatever administration it is, that it doesn't support broader agreements. Vietnam needs the United States more for its strategic objectives than the United States needs Vietnam, and that's leverage that just can't be wasted.

So we greatly appreciate your consideration and our recommendations, and as the other witnesses said, thank you for allowing me to testify.

REP. SMITH: Mr. Sifton, thank you very much for your testimony. Your report we'd like to make a part of the record, so if you could submit that, that would be very helpful. And your final words from the witnesses certainly was an indictment of the Vietnamese government. I mean, very poor -- the deterioration, worsening crackdown of free expression, worrying new facts about forced labor camps, crackdown -- ongoing crackdowns on religious freedom, and problems facing ethnic minorities, and then how you elaborated in your testimony just finishes what all of our distinguished witnesses laid out for us today -- an egregiously deteriorating situation in Vietnam. It was bad, but getting worse. And I think the pivot was right after the bilateral agreement was signed and all the false hope, perhaps well meaning, but unwittingly people said it will get better if we only trade a little more. That has not been the case.

And your point about MFN with China -- I remember that day, because I had gone over to Beijing midway through the review period, brought a letter signed by 100 members of the House and Senate, from Nancy Pelosi to so many members on the conservative side, Henry Hyde, many others. And I gave it to the foreign ministry, not the top guy but number two, who met with me, and he laughed. He laughed. He said, we're going to get MFN, and sure enough, on May 26th, 1994, and if you go to C-SPAN, you can watch, because I had a press conference, David Bonior did, and Nancy Pelosi did. President Clinton ripped up the executive order that linked human rights with trade, and that was a absolute pivot point for deterioration in China. Likewise, and in an almost identical parallel way, right after the bilateral trade agreement with no linkage to human rights, things have deteriorated massively.

So thank you, each and every one of you, for your testimonies. I would ask our panelists -- in a way you have touched on it in many ways. Ambassador John Hanford, our former ambassador-at-large for religious freedom, when he recommended, as did others in the administration, of the Bush administration, that CPC status, Country of Particular Concern, be rescinded for Vietnam, it was all based on promise. John Hanford would say there are "deliverables" that they are willing to engage in to stop the forced renunciation of the Montagnard, for example. And all of these other repression, you know, of Catholics, the Unified Buddhist Church and all the others, all these promises, promises, promises -- CPC was lifted, the bilateral agreement was agreed to, MFN conferred, and then a massive retaliation against religious believers, Bloc 8406, all leading to say, why wasn't CPC put back last year?

Well, the administration has the opportunity right now. I held all the hearings on the International Religious Freedom Act, Congressmen Frank Wolf's bill. I know exactly how the bill works. They could do it today. They could say, the record warrants it. So I would ask our distinguished panelists if they might want to talk about CPC and why it is critical that it be re-imposed right now with all 18 potential acts of -- what do you call it -- penalty that could be imposed on the government of Vietnam.

Secondly, on the issue of trafficking -- that's the bill I wrote. And I can tell you, when we did those minimum standards and then redid them in '03 and '05, because I wrote those bills as well, and then the final bill was done, the -- (inaudible) -- bill which further tweaked those standards.

It couldn't be more clear that both on labor and sex, but especially labor trafficking, Vietnam absolutely warrants a Tier 3 ranking, which carries with it penalties as well. And for reasons that are absolutely beyond me, the administration has failed to impose what is the facts on the ground, because those designations aren't about what you do with those facts, with that designation. You could do nothing with CPC or nothing with Tier 3, you know, if you think you're making progress. But it gives the opportunity to impose, you know, two sets of sanctions on the government of Vietnam for trafficking reasons.

Dr. Thang, if you might want to start, and I'll move to very big issues.

MR. THANG: Yes, chairman. Mr. Chairman, I just asked (Mark Cooney ?) to try to upload the video. If it doesn't work, then I can show it on my laptop here.

But about the CPC, in 2006, before the CPC designation for Vietnam was rescinded, we provided a list of 671 Hmong house churches in the northwestern highland of Vietnam, and they all tried to register themselves -- it's on the table right there, yes -- according to the new ordinance. And in 2007, the Vietnamese government decided to indefinitely suspend any review of those applications, in April 2007. So none of them got registered. And during the U.S.-Vietnam Human Rights Dialogue in 2010, to the credit of our own State Department, they presented this list again to the Vietnamese government. That is four years later. And I had personally, and Congressman Cao was there too, a meeting with Congressman Howard Berman. And his staff delivered the good news. The Vietnamese government declared right at the moment that this will be our top priority when we go back to Vietnam. We'll revisit, review this list to make sure they get registered.

A few months later, what happened? That massacre in Muong Nhe just a few months later, after the promise from the Vietnamese delegation attending the U.S.-Vietnam Human Rights Dialogue. And when I look back at this list here, and I promise to provide this for the record, the village that got razed flat by the Vietnamese government was on the list. They try for so many years to register according to the Ordinance on Belief and Religion issued in 2004. And instead of reviewing, the government of Vietnam destroyed an entire village because they were all Protestants. And that's what happens to the CPC. So there's no improvement since ('07 ?). It's getting worse and worse.

Regarding trafficking, I would propose to our government to do a simple thing. Year after year after year, the Trafficking in Persons Report, annual report, the TIP reports, list the cases of trafficking from Vietnam to other countries in Malaysia, Jordan, Taiwan, et cetera. All we need to do is to go back to the Vietnamese government and ask them, what has happened to these victims? And what has happened to these export companies that were involved in these cases? We need to follow up. And it would be very clear that nothing had been done to investigate the culprits, the perpetrators, and a lot had been done to silence and threaten and persecute the victims. That's a very simple task. Just go back for the past five years through their own TIP reports and report that back to Congress and, based on that, make recommendations on ranking Vietnam, either Tier 2 Watch List or Tier 3. I believe it should belong to Tier 3 squarely. Thank you.

MR. CAO: Mr. Chairman, I just want to reiterate the words of Dr. Thang, and again, I just want to look at this issue from the standpoint of the leverage that we have to use against Vietnam in order to promote change. We have seen in the last two years, what at least I have seen in the last two years, is that our approach, the administration approach to Vietnam has all been about lip service. We say a lot of things, we might condemn publicly the actions of Vietnam, but behind the scenes other things occur. We increase trade relations, we increase military operations, so on and so forth, without putting very concrete steps that would require Vietnam to follow through with the promises that they made to the U.S. Congress.

So my plea to the U.S. Congress is, if the administration does not act, the U.S. Congress must act. And our action will put Vietnam on notice that we are paying attention to what they're doing, that their actions cannot escape unnoticed. Their actions cannot escape without ramifications. So again, my plea to the U.S. Congress is that the Congress must act. And I hope that the Congress will pass the Vietnam human rights bill, put Vietnam back on the list of Country of Particular Concern, passing the Vietnam sanctions bill being pushed forward by Congressman Royce, and other legislations that will force Vietnam to pay close attention to what they've been doing to their people.

REP. SMITH: I'd say to my good friend Anh Cao that we are scheduling a markup for the Vietnam Human Rights Act, and whoever seeks to block it -- because it twice passed the House and a third time we actually had it readied as an amendment to an appropriations bill, and it was blocked, all three, over on the Senate side. I will absolutely call out, as I have in the past, but more so now, given the fact that we have seen gross deterioration of the human rights situation in Vietnam -- I don't care who's in the White House. I will say this to someone who, when Bush, under George Bush, there was a relaxation of, or elimination of the CPC status, which was done purely on faith, and not, as I said, deliverables. Within months of seeing that things further deteriorated vis-a-vis religious freedom, I and so many others were speaking out, because I don't care who's in the White House. When you're getting abused, you don't say it's a Republican or Democrat, there's somebody trying to protect their man who happens to be at the White House or at the State Department -- not so, this chairman. So if that bill is blocked, because we will mark it up in a week or two in subcommittee, I will call them out and call them out every day of the week.

Yes, Mr. Sifton.

MR. SIFTON: A couple of low-hanging fruit about pushing these issues forward. I think that trafficking in persons Tier 3 designation would be wonderful, CPC would be wonderful. We really welcomed a letter to Secretary Clinton about the human rights report coming up. We're pushing the U.S. Committee on International Religious Freedom to strengthen its language. But a few words about some other players on the stage.

I can't overemphasize how important the U.S. trade representative is right now as an interlocutor on these issues. I mean, they'll say good things about how they are listening and they want to use congressional leverage to pressure Vietnam, but I feel like the whole situation is kind of in a state of unreality. The U.S. trade representative is insisting the negotiations are done quickly, and yet it seems inconceivable that Vietnam would make the kind of reforms that would be the precursor for it being a party to the TPP. So either they're planning to just throw Vietnam out of the TPP at the last minute, which is one way of getting the TPP finalized, or they're going to just give up on getting the reforms that they say they want to get. So some -- they need to be brought up here to explain exactly what the agenda is. Of course, it's difficult to get them to talk about their negotiating strategy, but there needs to be some accountability on the USTR.

Another thing is, I just, you know, it kind of galls me as the Asia director for advocacy that there's this big bank out of Manila, the Asian Development Bank, which gets an enormous amount of money from the United States government, and gives an enormous amount of that money to Vietnam. The World Bank does too, but I mean, the Asian Development Bank is a pretty big player, and they give a lot of money to Vietnam. And you know, we're a voting member. We're the second biggest shareholder in the bank out in Manila after Japan, and we ought to use that leverage at the bank, and we don't. If you go out to Manila and visit the ADB today, it's like walking into the World Bank 25 years ago. I don't speak from personal experience, but from what I've heard. Human rights is not on the agenda. It's just, you know, give out money. So again, if you can exercise the oversight over the Asian Development Bank and its funding for programs in Vietnam, that would certainly be great. World Bank too, but of course, you're at a little bit better on that.

And then lastly, the Pentagon: What exactly is on the table with the strategic partnership? What exactly is Ambassador Shear negotiating? I have, you know, full faith in Ambassador Shear in Hanoi. He's very serious about pushing these issues. I mean, they have pushed these issues. They've been helpful on a number of particular cases and they've raised general issues as well. But what exactly is being negotiated with the Pentagon, and how crucial is Vietnam to our naval posture in the Pacific? I mean, I'm not a naval strategist, but you don't have to be, you know, Admiral Nimitz to appreciate that there's more than one way to posture the fleet in the Pacific. And they have to be prepared that if Vietnam doesn't reform, then, you know, the strategic partnership isn't going to go forward.

REP. SMITH: Excellent points, Mr. Sifton. We were planning and are planning on inviting Ambassador or Assistant Secretary Michael Posner to testify and others within the State Department. But I think your point about USTR is a great one, and we will invite them to come and testify, so thank you for that recommendation.

In terms of the bank, I think it is time for some oversight and perhaps a letter that we could do jointly to them and follow up on that issue as well. So a very well-taken point.

My final question before going to Mr. Green, I just want to ask with regards to your point, Dr. Thang, about the Vietnamese law on human trafficking conveniently sidestepping the Palermo Protocol, which is the boilerplate language used all around the world, and if you weaken that, you absolutely will get a weakened version of any kind of trafficking. And the issue of torture, which you laid out in frankly nauseating detail, which it has to be, it has always been my observation that when a dictatorship is doing something hideous like torturing and doing it in a very pervasive way, they often talk about signing a U.N. convention or some other kind of convention which distracts and gets the eye to look askance as to what's happening on the ground. And you know, my sense, I mean, China perfected that art form when they continually announced upon coming here with a high-level delegation that they were going to sign the International Covenant for Civil and Political Rights, and they milked that one for years. And then there's no enforcement mechanism to any of these, including torture, besides important reporting, and it's not to be discounted how important that is. But the torture issue, I don't think gets enough focus from Congress or from any one of us. So I thank you especially for bringing attention to that.

MR. THANG: Mr. Chairman, may I also suggest very quickly that now there are so many asylum seekers that have successfully fled to Thailand. They are the witnesses of the crime of modern-day slavery against them, of the crime of torture against them, of detention, of religious persecution against them. It's very simple for our own State Department to ask our own officer work on human rights issues. In Thailand, in Bangkok, they chose to make a visit to them and (talk with them for economic formation?). That could not have otherwise been collected inside Vietnam.

REP. GREEN: Again, I thank all of the witnesses for testifying, and I again will focus on Ms. Vu for your testimony.

As the chairman indicated, it was quite moving, compelling and candidly overwhelming. I'm very concerned about you. You're living in -- I'm not sure that I should say where you live, but I'm concerned about you, and my hope is that you will take to heart what the chairman said about any concerns that you might have being called to his attention, our attention through him, because I have to be concerned given what I have heard. I am concerned about persons who were left behind.

Doctor, you were helpful. How many people are still in that circumstance that she was extricated from? Do you have any guesstimate?

MS. SAN (ph): Her last knowledge was about 70 people remaining in Jordan.

REP. GREEN: And Doctor, from your intelligence, is this just one of multiple venues in Jordan, or is this the sole venue that we have intelligence on that's in this country, in Jordan?

MR. THANG: There's only two sweatshops operating with Vietnamese in Jordan that we are aware of. And the one that we (work on ?) was one of the two. There might be more. Vietnam is sending more and more workers to the Middle East these days. There are three major markets for Vietnamese labor export. One is the -- (inaudible) -- Malaysia, the second one would be Taiwan and the third one is now the Middle East.

But let me add one thing here, right on the spot, when you talk about safety, because right after this subcommittee announced the hearing with her name, she got a threatening call from the place that she's living. And I had to call someone who has security to protect her.

REP. SMITH: You've got to pass that on to the FBI immediately.

MR. THANG: Yes. I'd also like to add that this spokesperson of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Vietnam, back in 2010, that held a press conference denouncing her is now the general consul of Vietnam in Houston. And the one, Mr. Jun Sun Tang (ph), who came to join in the threaten her and try to deport her to Vietnam for punishment, he's now the general consul of Vietnam in Frankfurt, Germany. They all got promoted.

REP. GREEN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and I thank you for pointing out that the FBI can be of assistance. Thank you for that.

Just an aside, if I may, the Vietnamese community in Houston did its part in protesting that consulate coming to Houston, and more specifically, we really took a hard stand on it coming into my district in Houston. There is concern. There is concern, and the Vietnamese people have raised these concerns

Let me ask Mr. Sifton: You mentioned the blood cashews and you spoke quite well. And my suspicion is that while I can't impact the policy of the United States, I can impact the policy of my congressional office. And I'm not as fond of cashews as I used to be. My suspicion is that we won't have a lot of cashews in my office.

But are there some other products that you can call to our attention that you have been able to trace back to involuntary servitude?

MR. SIFTON: Yeah. Let me start by saying it's very, very, very difficult, especially with Vietnam in particular. There are some textile products and some other camping-type mosquito nets and some other things that we identified in our report. And the companies that we identified took quite responsible actions when it was brought to their attention, cut off subcontractors. So we haven't had a problem sort of on the corporate side.

Rather, you know, the real issue is in Vietnam. What we have is the Ministry of Labor overseeing what is essentially a health issue, drug dependency. Why is the Ministry of Labor running detention camps for drug users? It really belongs in the health ministry. I mean, the real problem is there's a profit motive to the prison wardens who control these facilities.

So at the end of the day, it's a question of the United States, the European Union, which just engaged in a EU-Vietnam Human Rights Dialogue, just after Michael Posner had his, other interested nations, like Norway and Canada, all making it very clear, these drug treatment centers have got to close. You've got funding for HIV intervention into these centers. PEPFAR knew this. There was some HIV intervention in the U.N. Office of Drugs and Crime. Funding goes to Vietnam for these centers. It's just got to stop. It's great to have drug treatment centers. People who have drug problems need to get treatment. But forced labor is not an effective form of drug treatment. And tell Vietnam, shut these facilities down.

David Shear in Hanoi agrees. He's said it. I think he should say it a little bit more vocally, but he's said it. I mean, that's what would end this, rather than going after the companies one by one, which we've done. The most effective thing would be for the trading partners to say enough is enough, close down the centers.

One word about Jordan, though; you mentioned Jordan. I'd just say, you know, Human Rights Watch globally has a huge number of problems with forced labor, not just from Vietnam into Jordan, but from India, Sri Lanka, Nepal. There's an active case in federal court right now against a company in Jordan for trafficking of people from Nepal, for instance. So it's a big problem just with Jordan, in particular, as a target country.

REP. SMITH: Let me just add, Mr. Sifton, before we go -- oh, I'm sorry. Were you done?

REP. GREEN: No, I will yield to the chair, of course. Yes, sir. I will yield.

REP. SMITH: I didn't mean to cut you off.

REP. GREEN: No, I'm fine. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you for your testimony.

REP. SMITH: Mr. Sifton, if I could ask you, you know, PEPFAR is a focus country and they get hundreds of millions of dollars under PEPFAR. I've raised repeatedly that faith-based organizations are precluded participation by the Vietnamese government, which is contrary to Bush's vision of what PEPFAR was all about. And it has worked very well all over Africa and everywhere else where there's a PEPFAR country. But has our embassy or do you know of anyone within the U.S. government, have they investigated, as you called it, labor therapy, where PEPFAR money might be comingling and being used in such a terrible way?

MR. SIFTON: Yeah, I would be glad forward -- I mean, rather than take up a lot of time now, I'd be glad to forward you the correspondence we had with USAID and PEPFAR on this issue. The bottom line is a lot of money goes to Vietnam under PEPFAR, and not a lot of it goes into the drug treatment centers, but some does.

And the money that does go in goes for lifesaving antivirals for a very small number of HIV-positive people in the forced labor camps. So it's kind of difficult morally to say pull out and these prisoners suddenly have no HIV/AIDS antivirals. So it's a little difficult, but with that said, there's a lot of leverage that Ambassador Shear can exercise and I think he has exercised.

But again, to go back to my testimony, it's a question of keeping up the pressure and not letting it flag. That's our biggest fear is that at the 11th hour, when the agreements are finally ready to be signed, the administration will fall down and agree to all kinds of concessions and not continue to make these demands, and we will have squandered this amazing opportunity that is only going to present itself once to offer all these good things to Vietnam. I don't think they should be offered, but I'm not in charge of the foreign policy of the United States. But if they are going to be offered, it's an opportunity that can't be wasted.

MS. SAN (ph): Mr. Chairman, if I may translate a comment? Ms. Vu, she said: "I'm very concerned about my safety. I was recently involved in a hit-and-run car accident." So she just wanted to raise that and maybe seek for --

REP. SMITH: When was that?

MS. VU: (Through interpreter.) Five days ago.

REP. SMITH: (Off mic.)

MS. VU: (Through interpreter.) She was exiting a highway and there was a white car without any license plate, just hit her and then ran off.

REP. GREEN: Mr. Chairman, if I may, just one liberty, please. It is of concern because I know that there are people who want to see us doing business with Vietnam. And so we're not necessarily talking about somebody doing something dastardly under the color of state protection. It could be someone totally disconnected from a state, but there are people who are interested in a business relationship. So I am concerned and I'll be amenable to working with you, Mr. Chairman, to do what we can to make sure that the proper authorities are notified.

REP. SMITH: Thank you, Mr. Green.

REP. GREEN: Thank you.

REP. SMITH: Mr. Royce?

REP. ROYCE: Just one question and I'll ask this of Mr. Cao. The case I talked about, Viet Khang, was the songwriter. He wrote that song appealing to the conscience of those who were brutalizing protesters. The protest in question was one protesting China's territorial ambitions.

And along the same lines, you had the situation of the editorial that I showed that had been blocked out, where painstakingly, with a marker, they had marked out on every page of The Wall Street Journal that was distributed -- they had marked out this comment about the case of a woman who'd organized protests of China's aggression in maritime territorial disputes. This topic really seems to get under the skin of the current government of Vietnam. I'd just ask you, what does that Vietnamese songwriter, Viet Khang, what does he mean to the Vietnamese people, and what do you make of the way the government is reacting to these protests of maritime aggression?

MR. CAO: Thank you for your question, Congressman Royce. With respect to the songwriters (in here), I would like to, again, bring attention to the many other activists who are involved in the promotion of democracy in Vietnam.

Obviously, any democracy activist, any persons who are involved in promoting freedom and religious freedom in Vietnam, they are all considered, at least by us here in the United States, as people of great importance. But they are seen by the Vietnamese government as enemies of the state, so that -- and the records show very clearly that many of these people are routinely beaten, imprisoned, arrested, falsely accused for actions that they deem to be illegal under state law.

But behind the scenes, obviously, their intention is all about intimidation. Their intention is about cracking down on democracy activism, on religious freedom activism. And this is something that we, as a Congress, you all, as members of Congress, must continue to pay close attention to, because freedom and democracy is not only confined to the United States. It should be an ideal that must be spread worldwide.

And we saw the significance of the activists in the Middle East, the Arab Spring. And I hope that something similar might occur in Southeast Asia. Call it the Asian Spring or what have you. But at least the goals and the aspirations of a people fighting for freedom would be fulfilled.

REPRESENTATIVE DANA ROHRBACHER (R-CA): Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. And first of all, I'd like to thank you on behalf of many of my own constituents, and Mr. Royce's constituents as well, for having this hearing today. Loretta Sanchez and Mr. Royce and myself represent large numbers of Vietnamese-Americans and we are very proud to do so and we are very grateful for the leadership that you've provided over the years, to make sure that their loved ones left back in Vietnam are not suffering horrible brutality from the regime that continues to oppress them.

I can't help but notice that when I go to a clothing store, more and more I'm finding clothing that says "Made in Vietnam." And that's very disturbing to me, because I realize that what we have here is American businessmen going into a dictatorship in order to make a bigger profit from repressed people, who are not permitted to form unions and go on strikes and demand better working conditions. And if American businessmen are going to be investing someplace, it should be in countries that are governed by democratic institutions.

I mean, we have people that are struggling now in Asia to create more democratic countries, like in the Philippines, for example. And we should not -- the United States should have, as our policy, that any export-import bank or any of the Pacific banks or whatever we're talking about, the international financial structure that we are subsidizing, that that money should not be going to dictatorships. And we should have that as the American policy and that would, and should, leave out Vietnam as it is today.

And unfortunately, even some of the businessmen that have gone to Vietnam have realized that the dictatorship -- that under such dictatorships, they're not going to treat foreign investors and foreign businessmen any more fairly or honestly than they treat their own population. And there are many businessmen that have gone there and lost their investment through swindles by the government, by out and out theft by government agents.

And why would we, as American citizens, as free people, want to subsidize through these investment banks that we have, these international banks, people who are taking the risk of going into Vietnam or other dictatorships? We should not. And if a businessman wants to go over there, let them take the risk, knowing that there's no free court system or judicial system in which these type of things can be taken up.

So none of that -- in fact, what we've heard today, and I will be -- I'm sorry, I was at another hearing, but I will be going through the transcripts. But I'm sure that you have underscored that the actually (sic) lack of freedom in Vietnam has gotten worse and not better and during the time period when people are investing money there.

And yet, we've been told over and over again, the more American interaction economically, the more investment, the more there will be reform. That has never worked in China. It hasn't worked elsewhere. It's not working in Vietnam.

And I appreciate you drawing attention to that through this hearing today. So I would just stand in solidarity with you. And I will be reading your testimony. I'm sorry, I had a -- you know, we have hearings at the same time here. We have to run back and forth.

But I believe that, one last note, we now have, I believe, an opportunity that we have leverage on the Communist Chinese government of Vietnam. And that is they feel threatened by another dictatorship. How about that, two dictatorships, two gangsters fighting over territory? We've had that happen in our own country. And when you've got the government of Communist China engaged in military action against the government of Vietnam over certain territories, it is now the moment for the United States to use that as leverage to make sure they concede points on human rights and democracy before we go in and help them.

But if they're willing to do that, maybe we should help them, because I do perceive that it is the Chinese who are being the aggressor. But let's use this as leverage to get some reform in Vietnam and then, before we proceed with helping that dictatorship. Thank you very much.

REP. SMITH: I want to thank Chairman Rohrabacher for his very eloquent summation of what this hearing has been all about. And I know Dr. Thang wants to show it -- I do hope the members will stay a moment -- that video. But I would like Congressman Cao or any of the -- you know, we had a hearing, and you remember it very well, about Wen Nam (ph), when he was murdered by the Vietnamese thugs, and you did mention, of course, Cung Dao (ph) earlier.

And it seems to be a pattern. You know, you want certain property owned by the church, regardless, or by one of the religious denominations? You take it. You call it eminent domain or some facsimile of that and then you beat the people to death, as they did there.

Your thoughts on that update on Cung Dao (ph)? And then please show that video. Very quickly --

MR. CAO: And again, the issue of land disputes is not an issue that is under any color of law. It's an issue of pure greed. Many of these land disputes are promoted by greedy officials who have some kind of business dealings that would lead them to make a lot of money. So again, do not listen to what is coming out of Vietnam, but pay attention to the intentions and the stories that are being told by the citizens who are repressed and who are being arrested and tortured by the Vietnamese government.

MR. THANG: (Off mic) -- anti-riot police who are armed to the teeth. How plausible was that? And regarding the death of Mr. Nam (ph), the reporter said that there's disagreement among the family members of Mr. Nam (ph), whether he died of a natural cause or because the beating. You can go back to the report and read that.

Clearly, there are some members of the family that have been approached by the police before our team from the U.S. Embassy met with the (leader ?) in Vietnam to investigate and they were told, "If you say anything, you will face the same fate as Mr. Nam (ph)." Of course they would say, "Yeah, he died of natural cause." Why didn't we, at the State Department, just present the facts: that he got beat up, he got tortured, he was poked through the ears with a sharp wooden stick, and he suffered injuries, internal bleeding, and he died a few hours later. Why did we have to go with -- be so speculating, whether he died of natural cause, and not just present the facts?

So it's very troubling, because after the UNHCR recognized 49 of those parishioners as refugees, the next six were excluded or denied refugee status, after that report came out. So we talked to Ambassador Posner and begged him to review that and please do talk to him, to revise that piece of the report.

Now, regarding making the case for CPC re-designation, right after we rescinded the CPC designation in late 2006, the central bureau of religious affairs, that is the counterpart that Mr. John Hanford had been dealing with, issued a document that was leaked out in 2007, saying that we should resolutely overcome the abnormal and spontaneous growth of (partisan season ?) and the propagandizing and mobilizing the people to safeguard and promote good, traditional beliefs of ethnic minorities. That is euphemism for fostering renunciation of the Christian faith. They are being pushed to go back to their traditional beliefs and stay away from -- (inaudible).

And here are a few pictures. In 2008, this is what happened to Pastor Nguyen Com Ching (ph), when he tried to help the Montagnard in the Central Highlands but got beaten up -- (inaudible). This was what happened in 2009 to a prominent member of the Unified Buddhist Church when he tried to deliver relief to the poor people in Vietnam, low-income people in Vietnam.

And this what happened in 2009 or so to Father Motabing (ph), who just led a delegation to hold a prayer of solidarity with the parish of Tangtua (ph) that was under threat of being taken away by the government of Vietnam. This is what happened to a parishioner in Dong Chium (ph), where the government of Vietnam blew up the cross, the crucifix with explosives.

This what happened to Father Nguyen Bon Thang (ph) of the Redemptorist Order, who came to Dong Chium (ph) to express solidarity with the parishioners in Dong Chium (ph). They're all beaten up by the police. This is what happened to a member of the Redemptorist Church here in Hanoi in 2010. This is college student and he protested the instructors from defaming his faith in class.

And this is -- you already saw this picture of Mr. Nam in Kungzhao (ph) in 2010, July. And this is what happened to a member of the Baptist Church in Guanghai (ph) just last year, October. The police broke in, disrupted the prayer and beat him up. And this just happened in December, that's last month, in Thai Ha, in an incident that Congressman Cao did mention. So this is parishioner that tried to peacefully put back church property.

So this is just a few examples of police brutality against religious leaders and people of faith.

And now your permission, very quickly, just three minutes, I'd like to show the video of -- (inaudible) -- of what happened in Mongyair (ph) village.

REP. SMITH: Lower the lights, please? Thank you. As soon as he gets it on.

MR. : Let me know when you're ready.

MR. THANG: So on January 28th -- yes.

MR. : (Off mic.)

MR. THANG: Oh, sure, afterwards.

REP. SMITH: (Off mic.)

MR. THANG: Oh, that's fine. Sure. Thank you, sir. So you can see here the military were moving in to demolish the entire Hmong Christian village of Sanapour (ph) in Mongyair (ph). And you see here the government workers, the cadres, the military sitting here. And you can see, soon, the workers breaking down the roof here. This is the homes. This is the homes, here.

And these are the Hmong Christians. This is what's left of the homes. Nothing left. You see all these -- (inaudible) -- here. And then, in mid-March, the government came back, after a temporary suspension due to the Lunar New Year, and they demolished the rest of the village. You see all the roofs here. And these people now have become homeless, these Christians.

And then May 1st, these Hmong religious (sic), they have no other choice but to come together peacefully to request for an end to religious persecution and an end to demolition of their homes and confiscation of their land, about 3,000 to 5,000, estimate. All these -- you can see the women, the children -- they all came peacefully, just begging the government to let them live. But then the government moved troops in, hundreds of them, surrounding, encircling the demonstrators with guns, live ammunition.

REP. SMITH: How did you get this video?

MR. THANG: From the Hmong themselves --

REP. SMITH: That's a big risk.

MR. THANG: -- at a very high risk to themselves.

You see batons here and electric rods. And these are the mobile anti-riot police coming in. And now they're being beaten up here. They're running away, escaping. And there's a total blockage of news reporters coming in or news getting out from Mongyair (ph) since.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

REP. SMITH: Thank you, very much. Without objection, if there's any final statement our distinguished panel would like to say before we adjourn, we do have to make our way over to a vote. We're almost out of time.

MR. THANG: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And please do keep the attention on the issue.

REP. SMITH: This is -- there will be a series of hearings here. And, like I said, Michael Posner and USTR will all be --

REP. GREEN: Mr. Chairman?

REP. SMITH: Yes?

REP. GREEN: I don't know whether it's in the record, but without objection, if there is none, I would ask that a copy of that be placed in the record officially.

REP. SMITH: Without objection, so ordered. Thank you.

And as soon as any final statement is made, the hearing will be adjourned, without objection. OK.

LOAD-DATE: January 26, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

205 of 492 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring South Asia - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

January 22, 2012 Sunday

Pakistan senators express concern over foreign spy network in country

LENGTH: 468 words

Text of report by Ijaz Kakakhel headlined "Senators concerned over foreign spy network in country" published by Pakistani newspaper Daily Times website on 21 January

Islamabad: The senators on Friday [20 January] expressed concern over the existence of a foreign intelligence network in Pakistan.

Senator Raza Rabbani, on a point of order, said that it is reported that Norway has established its intelligence network in Pakistan, adding that the disclosure has resulted in the resignation of a Norwegian minister. "Who has allowed the foreign country (s) to establish such networks in Pakistan? Did the Norwegian agency take permission from the government of Pakistan? Is there any reciprocal arrangement and does Pakistan have also an intelligence network in Norway," the senator asked. He termed such activities on the Pakistani soil "not a good sign".

Replying to Rabbani's queries, Interior Minister Rehman Malik said the existence of a foreign intelligence network in Pakistan is a serious issue, which should be discussed with the prime minister. He said he would be able to brief the Senate on the issue after having a consultation the prime minister.

The minister also requested Rabbani to provide details of his claim so that complete information might be provided to the Senate. Malik, however, made it clear that only the ISI and IB are allowed to carry out intelligence activities in the country, adding they are answerable to the prime minister.

The minister told the Upper House of parliament that some foreigners had been arrested in Balochistan for having fake ID cards.

He also said some foreigners were carrying out unlawful activities in Balochistan, adding, "From now on, every foreigner will have to explain his/her purpose of visit before entering the province." Earlier, during the question hour, Malik said human smuggling in the country was ongoing for the last several decades. He said a large number of people had been arrested for illegally sending Pakistanis to Turkey, Greece and other European countries. The minister said the number of human traffickers arrested during 2009 was 1,755, 1,779 in 2010 and up to 800 until June 2011. He said the majority of human traffickers were arrested from Gujrat.

The minister said Pakistan has been upgraded from Tier-2 Watch List to Tier-2 in the Annual Trafficking in Person Report (TIP) 2010, published by the State Department of USA.

"Similarly, FIA takes stern action against human traffickers/smugglers/facilitators and sub agents. As such FIA has arrested Most Wanted Traffickers (MWTs) 26 in 2009, 16 in 2010 and two in 2011."

The government has also established Inter-agency Task Force (IATF). Some 10,703 illegal migrants were intercepted in 2008, 5,601 in 2009 and 3,434 in 2010.

Source: Daily Times website, Lahore, in English 21 Jan 12

LOAD-DATE: January 22, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2012 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

206 of 492 DOCUMENTS

New Straits Times (Malaysia)

January 22, 2012 Sunday

Stepping up human trafficking war

SECTION: Pg. 25LENGTH: 148 words

PUTRAJAYA: Malaysia will take a leaf out of the success of its neighbouring countries such as the Philippines, Singapore and Thailand in combating human trafficking.

Home Ministry secretary-general Tan Sri Mahmood Adam told the New Sunday Times that these countries were previously high on the United States' watch list for human trafficking activities, but had now improved their standing after stepping up their war against human trafficking.

He said for a start, Malaysia would soon sign a Memorandum of Understanding with the US embassy and the High Commissions of Australia, the United Kingdom and Canada to step up the fight against human trafficking.

Malaysia, which is on the US watch list for human trafficking activities, has bilateral agreements with these countries to fight transborder crimes and terrorism. It is now extending this co-operation to fight human trafficking.

(END)

LOAD-DATE: January 24, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

207 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Right Vision News

January 22, 2012 SundayPakistan: FIA arrest 4334 human traffickers during last three years: Malik*LENGTH: 218 wordsDATELINE: ISLAMABAD

ISLAMABAD, Jan. 22 -- Minister for Interior Senator A. Rehman Malik on Friday told the Senate that the Federal Investigation Agency (FIA) has arrested 4,334 human traffickers during last three years.

In a written reply to a question during Question Hour, Rehman Malik said that FIA has taken concrete steps to control Human Trafficking and added that up-gradation from Tier-2 watch list of Trafficking in Person (TIP) report of 2009 to Tier-2 of TIP report 2010 and subsequently 2011 was a testimony to it.

He said that 1755 human traffickers were arrested in the year 2009, in 2010 a total of 1779 human traffickers were arrested and up to June 2011, 800 human traffickers have been arrested.

He said that Pakistan has been upgraded from Tier-2 watch list to Tier-2 in the Annual Trafficking in Person Report (TIP) 2010, published by State Department of USA and this year Pakistan have maintained the same status due to active follow up by FIA.

Malik said that FIA took stern action against human traffickers, smugglers, facilitators, sub agents and FIA had arrested 44 Most Wanted Traffickers (MWTs) in last two years and further special campaign for arrest of Proclaimed Offenders (Pos) and court Absconders is also frequently launched to eradicate the menace Published by HT Syndication with permission from Right Vision News.

For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: April 18, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 Right Vision News
All Rights Reserved

208 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

Daily Times (PK)

January 21, 2012 Saturday

Senators concerned over foreign spy network in country

LENGTH: 461 words

DATELINE: ISLAMABAD

ISLAMABAD, Jan. 21 -- The senators on Friday expressed concern over the existence of a foreign intelligence network in Pakistan.

Senator Raza Rabbani, on a point of order, said that it is reported that Norway has established its intelligence network in Pakistan, adding that the disclosure has resulted in the resignation of a Norwegian minister. "Who has allowed the foreign country (s) to establish such networks in Pakistan? Did the Norwegian take permission from the government of Pakistan? Is there any reciprocal arrangement and does Pakistan have also an intelligence network in Norway," the senator asked. He termed such activities on the Pakistani soil "not a good sign".

Replying to Rabbani's queries, Interior Minister Rehman Malik said the existence of a foreign intelligence network in Pakistan is a serious issue, which should be discussed with the prime minister. He said he would be able to brief the Senate on the issue after having a consultation the prime minister.

The minister also requested Rabbani to provide details of his claim so that complete information might be provided to the Senate. Malik, however, made it clear that only the ISI and IB are allowed to carry out intelligence activities in the country, adding they are answerable to the prime minister. The minister told the Upper House of parliament that some foreigners had been arrested in Balochistan for having fake ID cards. He also said some foreigners were carrying out unlawful activities in Balochistan, adding, "From now on, every foreigner will have to explain his/her purpose of visit before entering the province." Earlier, during the question hour, Malik said human smuggling in the country was ongoing for the last several decades. He said a large number of people had been arrested for illegally sending Pakistanis to Turkey, Greece and other European countries. The minister said the number of human traffickers arrested during 2009 was 1,755, 1,779 in 2010 and up to 800 until June 2011. He said the majority of human traffickers were arrested from Gujrat.

The minister said Pakistan has been upgraded from Tier-2 Watch List to Tier-2 in the Annual Trafficking in Person Report (TIP) 2010, published by the State Department of USA.

"Similarly, FIA takes stern action against human traffickers/smugglers/facilitators and sub agents. As such FIA has arrested Most Wanted Traffickers (MWTs) 26 in 2009, 16 in 2010 and two in 2011."

The government has also established Inter- Task Force (IATF). Some 10,703 illegal migrants were intercepted in 2008, 5,601 in 2009 and 3,434 in 2010. Published by HT Syndication with permission from Daily Times. For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: January 20, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

209 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

Daily Times

January 21, 2012 Saturday

Senators concerned over foreign spy network in country

BYLINE: Ijaz Kakakhel

SECTION: Vol. VIII No. 13

LENGTH: 427 words

The senators on Friday expressed concern over the existence of a foreign intelligence network in Pakistan.

Senator Raza Rabbani, on a point of order, said that it is reported that Norway has established its intelligence network in Pakistan, adding that the disclosure has resulted in the resignation of a Norwegian minister. "Who has allowed the foreign country (s) to establish such networks in Pakistan? Did the Norwegian agency take permission from the government of Pakistan? Is there any reciprocal arrangement and does Pakistan have also an intelligence network in Norway," the senator asked. He termed such activities on the Pakistani soil "not a good sign".

Replying to Rabbani's queries, Interior Minister Rehman Malik said the existence of a foreign intelligence network in Pakistan is a serious issue, which should be discussed with the prime minister. He said he would be able to brief the Senate on the issue after having a consultation the prime minister.

The minister also requested Rabbani to provide details of his claim so that complete information might be provided to the Senate. Malik, however, made it clear that only the ISI and IB are allowed to carry out intelligence activities in the country, adding they are answerable to the prime minister. The minister told the Upper House of parliament that some foreigners had been arrested in Balochistan for having fake ID cards. He also said some foreigners were carrying out unlawful activities in Balochistan, adding, "From now on, every foreigner will have to explain his/her purpose of visit before entering the province." Earlier, during the question hour, Malik said human smuggling in the country was ongoing for the last several decades. He said a large number of people had been arrested for illegally sending Pakistanis to Turkey, Greece and other European countries. The minister said the number of human traffickers arrested during 2009 was 1,755, 1,779 in 2010 and up to 800 until June 2011. He said the majority of human traffickers were arrested from Gujrat.

The minister said Pakistan has been upgraded from Tier-2 Watch List to Tier-2 in the Annual Trafficking in Person Report (TIP) 2010, published by the State Department of USA.

"Similarly, FIA takes stern action against human traffickers/smugglers/facilitators and sub agents. As such FIA has arrested Most Wanted Traffickers (MWTs) 26 in 2009, 16 in 2010 and two in 2011."

The government has also established Inter-agency Task Force (IATF). Some 10,703 illegal migrants were intercepted in 2008, 5,601 in 2009 and 3,434 in 2010.

LOAD-DATE: January 23, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

210 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

The Messenger

January 21, 2012 Saturday

4334 human traffickers arrested during last three years: Malik

SECTION: Vol. IV No. 21

LENGTH: 204 words

Minister for Interior Senator A. Rehman Malik on Friday told the Senate that the Federal Investigation Agency FIA has arrested 4,334 human traffickers during last three years.

In a written reply to a question during Question Hour, Rehman Malik said that FIA has taken concrete steps to control Human Trafficking and added that up-gradation from Tier-2 watch list of Trafficking in Person TIP report of 2009 to Tier-2 of TIP report 2010 and subsequently 2011 was a testimony to it.

He said that 1755 human traffickers were arrested in the year 2009, in 2010 a total of 1779 human traffickers were arrested and up to June 2011, 800 human traffickers have been arrested.

He said that Pakistan has been upgraded from Tier-2 watch list to Tier-2 in the Annual Trafficking in Person Report TIP 2010, published by State Department of USA and this year Pakistan have maintained the same status due to active follow up by FIA.

Malik said that FIA took stern action against human traffickers, smugglers, facilitators, sub agents and FIA had arrested 44 Most Wanted Traffickers MWTs in last two years and further special campaign for arrest of Proclaimed Offenders Pos and court Absconders is also frequently launched to eradicate the menace.

LOAD-DATE: January 23, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

211 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
Pakistan Press InternationalJanuary 20, 2012 Friday4334 human traffickers arrested during last three years: Malik*LENGTH: 206 words

Minister for Interior Senator A. Rehman Malik on Friday told the Senate that the Federal Investigation Agency FIA has arrested 4,334 human traffickers during last three years.

In a written reply to a question during Question Hour, Rehman Malik said that FIA has taken concrete steps to control Human Trafficking and added that up-gradation from Tier-2 watch list of Trafficking in Person TIP report of 2009 to Tier-2 of TIP report 2010 and subsequently 2011 was a testimony to it.

He said that 1755 human traffickers were arrested in the year 2009, in 2010 a total of 1779 human traffickers were arrested and up to June 2011, 800 human traffickers have been arrested.

He said that Pakistan has been upgraded from Tier-2 watch list to Tier-2 in the Annual Trafficking in Person Report TIP 2010, published by State Department of USA and this year Pakistan have maintained the same status due to active follow up by FIA.

Malik said that FIA took stern action against human traffickers, smugglers, facilitators, sub agents and FIA had arrested 44 Most Wanted Traffickers MWTs in last two years and further special campaign for arrest of Proclaimed Offenders Pos and court Absconders is also frequently launched to eradicate the menace.

LOAD-DATE: January 23, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

STARRED MAYBE 212 of 492 DOCUMENTS

The Tico Times (San Jose, Costa Rica)

Distributed by McClatchy-Tribune Business News

January 20, 2012 Friday

Quepos Residents: No more abuse

BYLINE: Clayton R. Norman, The Tico Times, San Jose, Costa Rica

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 1649 words

Jan. 20--The week after police arrested the mayor of Aguirre for the second time in less than a month on charges that he used public cash to make sex videos with underage girls, members of the central Pacific beach community of Quepos and Manuel Antonio gathered to demonstrate against the effects of sexual violence and exploitation.

The Forum Against Violence Aguirre 2012 included a forum cataloguing the long-term effects on victims of violence and abuse and the communities they inhabit. The Rahab Foundation, a nongovernmental organization dedicated to helping victims of sex trafficking, moderated the forum, which was sponsored by the Association for Prevention, Security and Peace in the Aguirre Canton (COPAZA).

A march followed, and some 300 participants, many dressed in white, filed through the street and stopped by the National Police office.

"The issue now isn't so much what happens with the mayor," said Boris Marchegiani, president of the COPAZA board of directors, referring to erstwhile Aguirre Mayor Lutgardo Bolanos, a National Liberation Party (PLN) politician who became mayor in February 2011. "The big problem here is getting together to fight against violence and sexual abuse," Marchegiani said.

Statistics provided by COPAZA show that three out of 10 children in Aguirre are abused at home. The grim result of that, Marchegiani said, is that 70 percent of those abused kids end up with serious alcohol and drug addiction problems later in life.

The Mayor Police

Judicial Investigation Police (OIJ) agents first arrested Bolanos on Dec. 21, when raids of his office and home turned up hundreds of CDs containing pornographic videos depicting sex acts with underage girls, and according to the OIJ reports that outlined the raids, similar videos were discovered on his personal computer. Bolanos' driver was also arrested that day.

OIJ reports indicated the men were being charged with child pornography and embezzlement after allegedly touring the country in municipal cars and using municipal cash to hire young girls to perform in pornographic films.

The men bonded out of jail the next day, but OIJ agents re-arrested them on Jan. 12 after, according to a second OIJ report, agents talked to three new alleged victims between the ages of 14 and 15. Three other suspects also were arrested at that time, including Jimmy Acuna, a bar owner, Vilma Campos, a woman accused of recruiting girls for the films, and Reymundo Herrera, a municipal employee, according to an OIJ spokeswoman. The OIJ report accompanying those arrests describes the suspects as "a band organized for the goal of human trafficking."

The next day, the suspects walked out of jail on "preventive measures," according to court officials in Aguirre and Parrita. Preventive measures mean that members of the alleged human-trafficking gang are free to roam the streets, but may not approach their alleged victims or leave the country, and they must register with the court every two weeks.

Human Trafficking

The United Nations estimates conservatively that there are about 2.5 million victims of human trafficking across the globe at any given time. In 79 percent of human trafficking cases the motive is sexual exploitation -- forced prostitution or rape -- with women and girls making up the bulk of victims.

In 2011, the U.S. State Department added Costa Rica to its human trafficking tier-2 watch list. Criteria for being included in the tier-2 watch list is lack of an overall increase in effort on the part of Costa Rican authorities to stop human trafficking. Other countries on the tier-2 watch list include Kosovo, Gabon, Afghanistan, Kazakhstan, Moldova and the six other Central American countries.

In Costa Rica's case, a U.S. Embassy source explained, there has been a failure to condemn or prosecute human traffickers and to maintain specialized services or shelter for trafficking victims, as well as only limited efforts to raise public awareness of the issue.

The Pacific province of Puntarenas -- home to Quepos, where Bolanos was mayor, and Costa Rica's famous Manuel Antonio National Park -- is specifically mentioned as a destination for national and international child sex tourism in the State Department's 2011 report on Costa Rica.

Being on the tier-2 watch list, as opposed to the third tier, indicates that in the eyes of the U.S., a country is at least attempting to conform to the minimum requirements of the U.S. Congress' Trafficking Victim Protection Act, which requires the U.S. Secretary of State to report to Congress annually on countries' efforts to stamp out the crime. Countries on the tier-3 watch list are viewed as making little or no efforts to fight trafficking and can face restrictions in the receipt of aid from the United States.

Countries that remain on the tier-2 watch list for two or more consecutive years may be automatically downgraded to the tier-3 list.

In order for Costa Rica to move off the tier-2 list, it must strengthen efforts to investigate, prosecute, convict and punish trafficking offenders, according to the State Department report.

In November 2011, the U.S. government donated $200,000 to the Rahab Foundation to help the victims of human trafficking. Anne S. Andrew, U.S. ambassador to Costa Rica, called human trafficking "a grave violation of human rights" when she presented the donation.

A bill that would strengthen prosecutorial ability and bolster punishments in cases of human trafficking was presented to the Costa Rican Legislative Assembly in 2011 and will likely be debated sometime this year.

Exploitation

"Above all, with commercial sexual exploitation, which is a form of sexual abuse because there are economic factors, unfortunately there is a very high level of tolerance from [victims'] families and from society toward abusers, [and] often blame is placed on the victim," Eugenia Salazar, Costa Rica prosecutor for sex crimes and domestic abuse, told The Tico Times.

Salazar said victims of commercial sexual exploitation seem to fit that category and are often viewed as participating willingly in forced prostitution or other forms of exploitation because society assumes they "like that life or they like the easy way."

"In terms of sexual tourism by foreigners, there are also domestic tourists who look for minors to abuse in that context, as well as foreigners who come in search of that," she said.

The OIJ report issued the day of Bolanos' first arrest on Dec. 21 states that Bolanos "allegedly rented cars for supposed tours where it seems he recruited girls in vulnerable locations like Los Guido, Pavas, La Carpio, Desamparados, Coronado, Perez Zeledon, Quepos and Golfito," areas of Costa Rica known to have high rates of poverty.

Salazar touched on a similar theme in her interview with The Tico Times, saying, "The abuser knows where weaknesses are and has mechanisms to get close to victims. How many underage girls prostitute themselves to buy a cellphone or to have brand-name things, [or] to buy a pair of jeans that are the latest fashion?"

Accusations, Resolutions and Lingering Effects

"I stayed 36 years with pain inside me," said Marchegiani, a hotel manager, sexual abuse survivor and recovering drug and alcohol addict. "When I came into a recovery program, which I've been in for 13 years, I found my answer. ... Very few of us have been lucky enough to be able to get away from the anger, the fear, the lack of self-esteem and self-worth that abuse causes."

You don't have to look far to see the effects of abuse in Aguirre, Marchegiani said.

"The results are very simple," he said. "When you walk down the street, you see people living on the street and you wonder why they dropped out of society. The effects are very dramatic, people who can't trust their family or the people around them drop out. That's where the desire to continue abusing others comes from, to abuse drugs or alcohol, theft, murder; it goes all the way up the scale."

The mayor's case will work its way through the Costa Rica courts, but in the meantime Marchegiani said he hopes to form a committee, with support from the U.N. and other foreign and domestic agencies, to try and address issues of abuse and human trafficking and their effects on individuals.

Some business and hotel owners in the Quepos and Manuel Antonio area, which hosts a thriving tourism industry, have called on the PLN for Bolanos' ouster.

Alvaro Emilio Castro is the president of the PLN's ethics tribunal. He said that until court proceedings take their course in this case, there's little the tribunal can do, unless someone presents evidence to the tribunal on which it can make a decision about Bolanos' ethics.

"There are two situations in which the tribunal can act," Castro said. "One, if he is accused and the courts arrive at a conviction. The other is for someone, maybe a hotel owner or resident of the area, to present themselves at the tribunal and say 'I will serve as a witness' and present us evidence. In that case, we don't have to wait for a resolution in the courts to start our own proceedings."

Castro reiterated that no verdict has been rendered in Bolanos' case.

"We can't do anything without proof," he said. "If someone presents us with evidence that this man is a good Liberacionista or a bad Liberacionista, then we can make a decision that corresponds to the evidence."

If Bolanos is found guilty in a court of law, or if the PLN ethics tribunal rules against him based on evidence presented to them, he could face suspensions of up to eight years from the party or life-long expulsion.

The acting mayor of Aguirre, Isabel Leon, was scheduled to attend Wednesday night's community meeting, but did not arrive. At press time her office did not respond to phone calls from The Tico Times for comment.

___ (c)2012 The Tico Times (San Jos√©, CRI) Visit The Tico Times (San Jos√©, CRI) at www.ticotimes.net Distributed by MCT Information Services

LOAD-DATE: January 20, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

ACC-NO: 20120120-1TT-Quepos-Residents-No-more-abuse-0120-20120120

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: 1TT

213 of 492 DOCUMENTS

CQ Congressional Testimony

January 18, 2012 Wednesday

NATO AND WESTERN BALKANS RELATIONS; COMMITTEE: SENATE COMMISSION ON SECURITY AND COOPERATION IN EUROPE

SECTION: CAPITOL HILL HEARING TESTIMONYLENGTH: 488 wordsTESTIMONY-BY: BENJAMIN L. CARDIN, CO-CHAIRMANAFFILIATION: COMMISSION ON SECURITY AND COOPERATION IN EUROPE

Statement of Benjamin L. Cardin Co-Chairman Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe

Committee on Senate Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe

January 18, 2012

Welcome and good afternoon to everyone. Today we will review the aspirations and preparedness of Bosnia, Macedonia, Serbia, Montenegro and Kosovo to join or deepen engagement with the NATO alliance - an important step for us and for them, and quite timely in the run-up to the next NATO summit, which will take place in Chicago on May 20-21.

In the past I, and other commission Chairmen and Co-Chairmen, have been strong supporters of NATO enlargement. It has been a very good thing, for our country and for the new democracies in East-Central Europe that have joined the alliance since 1998. Not only did enlargement stabilize Central Europe, but countries that formerly threatened us, with militaries were integrated into the Soviet-dominated Warsaw Pact, have become some of our closest allies. They have shouldered real responsibilities, and some of their soldiers have made the ultimate sacrifice in defending liberty, particularly in Afghanistan and Iraq, Today I believe further NATO engagement or enlargement can do likewise - stabilize the western Balkans, and provide our country with responsible allies.

Yet of course countries that seek to join NATO have to meet military standards, and human rights standards. In these respects Bosnia, Macedonia, Serbia, Montenegro and Kosovo will have different challenges, and they will probably not be ready to join the alliance at the same time.

In respect of human rights, many countries in the Western Balkans have made great progress in combating human trafficking, especially given the blatant and widespread trafficking of young women into the sex trade the region experienced only a decade ago. In 2011, Bosnia and Macedonia joined NATO-member Croatia on Tier 1 in the State Department's report on Trafficking in Persons. Kosovo, Montenegro and Serbia are at Tier 2, as is NATO- member Albania. As the author of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, which mandates the tier rankings, I want to strongly urge all these countries take the action necessary to reach Tier 1 this year; nothing less should be expected from friends and possible NATO allies than to protect people from being sold into modern-day slavery.

Other issues before the alliance - Afghanistan, missile defense, Libya, the Eurozone crisis - should not cause us to forget the long-term imperative of bringing the countries of the Western Balkans into NATO. American soldiers have done duty there in Bosnia and Kosovo -we don't want that to happen again - the issue of stability remains - and NATO membership is key to the solution. This means we have to encourage their NATO aspirations, and move their applications forward.

LOAD-DATE: January 20, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Congressional Testimony

Copyright 2012 Congressional Quarterly, Inc.
All Rights Reserved.

214 of 492 DOCUMENTS

State Department Documents and Publications

January 18, 2012Remarks to the Media at the U.S. Embassy in Rangoon, Burma

SECTION: PUBLIC AFFAIRS DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 2417 words

Remarks to the Media at the U.S. Embassy in Rangoon, Burma

Press Availability

Luis CdeBaca

Ambassador-at-Large, Office To Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons

Rangoon, Burma

January 11, 2012

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Good afternoon, everyone. As Secretary Clinton noted during her visit to Burma, if the Government of Burma keeps moving in the right direction, the US is prepared to be a partner in the reform process.

One of the areas of reform that was raised in Secretary Clinton's meetings was trafficking in persons. As we examine potential new avenues for engagement, one possibility is fighting this scourge in concert.

No country is immune from modern slavery, and both the United States and Burma are affected with victims in our own countries and abroad. There are concerns with victim identification, investigation and prosecution of traffickers, and victims' access to justice and rehabilitation. Here, forced labor, whether by governmental actors or unscrupulous employers, is an ongoing problem, as is sex trafficking. Additionally, there continue to be problems with the recruitment of child soldiers and the use of villagers by municipal or military authorities for forced labor or forced portering.

All of these aspects of the trafficking problem were discussed in a series of frank and open exchanges in the last two days in Naypyitaw and Rangoon. Challenges of course remain, given the unfortunate record on this issue, but we saw in these discussions a recognition of the problem and an openness to act.

While this is a country endowed with many natural resources, the most precious is its people, and they deserve freedom from modern slavery whether here or abroad. I'm happy to take any questions.

QUESTION: You've met relevant ministers, including the Home Minister. I'm sure you must have discussed a range of issues regarding human trafficking. Are you now convinced that the Burmese Government is doing enough? Are they committed to eliminating human trafficking, forced labor, child conscription? As far as I remember, Myanmar was in Tier 3 of the annual report. What do you think Myanmar's status will be this year?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: The country was in Tier 3 of the annual report, this being the annual report [showing the report in his hand]. What we have seen in the annual report is an analysis of what governments are doing under 11 minimum standards set forth by the Congress on the elimination of trafficking in persons. And that ranges everything from victim identification to the laws that are in place. But most importantly, are the laws being enforced. And so one of the things that we discussed in the meetings, not just with the Ministers, but also with the inter-Ministerial working group (CBTIP) on this was what are some of the things that are happening out in the field?

And there are some things that we've seen in the last few months that are encouraging. For instance, no longer requiring that victims who come home are then kept involuntarily for two weeks in a shelter which -- what we've been hearing from many of the victims -- the returning victims felt that that was more like jail. The Government has issued a decree stopping that practice, which we welcome. We're hoping that we'll see more such reforms and more such policies on the part of the Government going forward that would be able to be taken into account as we look at the ranking in the coming year. We don't presuppose a ranking. We still have three months left in the year that we look at. And there's plenty of time for the Government to continue to do positive steps towards compliance with these minimum standards. And we would certainly encourage them as we did in the meetings over the last couple of days.

QUESTION: Did you discuss with government officials anything about Burmese women being sold to China as brides? Do you have any concerns about that?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: This is one of the facets of human trafficking that we discussed, both at the Ministerial level, and also with CBTIP, this issue of the women being sold as brides in China. And it's something that I have raised as well when I have travelled to China. It's an issue that can only be dealt with both the sending and the receiving countries. But what we very much feel is that there not only needs to be education of women so that they know that promises of a better life in China could be hiding exploitation and abuse, so that they have the information when the men come and try to take them north, but also then that there are opportunities for the women if they come back home; to make sure that they are not rejected by their family; to make sure that they have rehabilitation services. And so we spoke with the Ministry of Labor and Social Welfare about that issue of when people are coming home how they can best be served, how can they get the services that a trafficking victim requires. But it's something that's very much on our radar as we look at the problem of human trafficking.

QUESTION: Human trafficking most of the time is across borders. How do you see the cooperation between Burma and its neighbors on this issue? The second question is, how about the United States in helping combat this issue.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, first of all, much of the attention that's been paid here, and that the actors in Naypyitaw are looking at you're correct that there's more attention paid to the cross-border aspect of human trafficking. And the reality of course is that the migrants are more vulnerable to exploitation. They're more vulnerable to enslavement when they're in another country, when they're afraid of the immigration services, when they don't speak the language. But the United Nations' definition of human trafficking, the international standards, are very much about this is not about movement, this is a problem of enslavement and exploitation. And so we've seen cases where people have been held in modern slavery here at home without ever being taken across a border.

Having said that, we think it's very important for there to be regional focus on this because we recognize that a sending country has limited capacity to prosecute the factory owner who may be enslaving their people somewhere else. China, Thailand these are the places that I think many people think of when they think of the human trafficking problem here.

One of the things we've started doing in the United States is, in working with our Mexican counterparts on cross-border trafficking, is doing the cases simultaneously. So we will share our evidence with the Mexicans so that they can prosecute the recruiter in the village and we can prosecute the employer in the United States at the same time. And that's the type of model of cross-border cooperation that we think would be effective in the Greater Mekong Sub-Region as well. And it's the type of thing we think that ASEAN and the other regional entities would be good at helping foster. But we certainly have raised the issue of Burmese migrants when we talk to Thailand because those are so often the people who are being exploited, whether in prostitution, whether in factories, whether in the shrimp and fishing industries. So often when you see the exploitation and you meet the victims they are from here, and that needs to stop.

QUESTION: Can you elaborate on what sort of recommendations you have made to the Government authorities so that Myanmar will be upgraded from its present tier, or scrapped from the blacklist?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Again I'll repeat that we don't presuppose the ranking until we have the evidence each year. But there are a number of recommendations that we made both in the report when it came out last year and again in the conversations in the last few days. And we discussed those recommendations frankly and with a spirit of openness. And we felt like there was a good discussion of those recommendations. Not from a place of accusation. It was not received with defensiveness, but rather a good dialogue between us and our counterparts in the Ministries.

But those recommendations and I would certainly refer you to the trafficking report itself include ceasing the use of forced labor by military and civilian authorities, increasing investigations, increasing the victim care, working to end the involuntary detention of the adult victims in the shelters (which they did do), releasing and moving away from charges against some of the political prisoners who were in prison because of their activism on labor rights against forced labor. At the end of the day, I think one of the biggest recommendations is the need to focus more on the internal trafficking of victims. Not solely thinking that this is a problem that happens in Thailand. Not just thinking of this is being a Chinese problem, but recognizing that this is happening in Yangon; that this is happening in Mandalay. It's happening up at the lake. It's happening in so many areas, not just in the tourist areas. Not just in sex, but on farms, in little factories and things like that. And once that recognition flows, we think that that will make a very positive step forward, as far as the ranking is concerned.

Hillary Clinton said a couple of years ago when the rankings come out that countries come to her and they express dismay about their ranking. And she tells them that the best way to improve their ranking is to get results. And results are very easy. It's: traffickers go to jail, and victims get helped. And so we are very much looking forward to a situation where, through cooperation, through regional efforts, but at the end of the day, through political will on the part of the Government, we see more traffickers in jail, and more victims helped.

QUESTION: So far, what do you think are the biggest obstacles that you are facing now to improve the situation?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: One of the biggest obstacles to improving the situation here seems to be the archaic legal structure, especially in the villages and towns act, which allows the civilian authorities to conscript labor for building projects or other things like that. So that it basically says that it is legal for the municipal government or the military to use forced labor. And even though there are positive things happening with transnational sex trafficking, and those types of trafficking, as long as it's still legal for the Government to use forced labor in that manner, it will be very hard for there to be improvement under these international standards. And so in some ways, it's not just an issue of resources or better training or political will to fight the criminal traffickers. It's changing the law to make it clear that the Government cannot actually hold its own people in forced labor. That's probably the biggest challenge that we see. But it's also a challenge that could be solved very easily if Government and Parliament took steps to end that practice.

QUESTION: Just a follow-up to the previous question. So what is the role of the U.S. Government and you in assisting this Government to solve this problem? What kind of offer have you made in Naypyitaw?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well we didn't make an offer on this trip. I think what we see in this trip is an opportunity to engage with our counterparts in the spirit of the last few months, as we look at these new avenues for potential collaboration. What we do in countries around the world ranges from supporting shelters, supporting police training, supporting the training of judges and other members of the Governmental response, but also making those linkages between civil society and Government. We have some limited funds that we spend each year in countries around the world. But we also have technical assistance, and we work within the international bodies. So, for instance, with ASEAN, the United States participated in a training that was held in Singapore last year under the auspices of ASEAN in which our counterparts from the Burmese prosecutors' offices were able to come and receive best practices from a host of prosecutors from around the world. Those are some of the types of things that we could see going forward, but much of the trip was to assess the situation, to see what the possibilities are, and to begin a conversation with our counterparts here. So we don't have an announcement for you about a particular pledge, or an amount, or anything like that. But when we do have an announcement if we do have an announcement we'll certainly let you know.

QUESTION: When you went to Naypyitaw, did the authorities mention the role of the local media in combating trafficking because in Burma we are still under heavy censorship.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: This is not something that we saw in these particular discussions, but I think it's something we will take under advisement for future discussions because one of the things that we've seen is that the role of the media in uncovering these situations and calling it to people's attention is critical. We talked earlier today to a number of the non-governmental and international organizations that are working on this, and they certainly raised this as being very helpful to their work in the last six months or so, as more news stories have come out about the human trafficking. And so we would certainly encourage all of you to continue to report on this issue and to intensify your reporting. It's not just for the print media either. Any of you who've seen the work being done on CNN International and otherwise, there are some very interesting ways to do reporting on this issue of modern slavery in series type of work. So not just reporting on one particular case, but reporting on the phenomenon of the women going to China, reporting on what's happening to the men who are on those Thai fishing boats, or even if there are people going on the Western borders into Bangladesh or India and being abused. Probably the most important is calling attention to the problems right here at home. But it is something that we'll want to continue to take on board and in fact it's something that, at the Embassy, press freedom is something we care about very deeply and if you have instances that you'd like to call to our attention, it's something that our Embassy staff would love to hear from you if there are impediments to your reporting on this issue. It's something that we not only can raise with Government, but something we would be very interested in raising if there are situations where you feel your coverage of this is being impeded.

LOAD-DATE: January 18, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: SDB

Copyright 2012 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

215 of 492 DOCUMENTS

The Baluchistan Times

January 17, 2012 Tuesday

Five million illegal immigrants residing in Pakistan

SECTION: Vol. XXXVI No. 17LENGTH: 373 words

Around five million illegal immigrants have been residing in different cities of Pakistan for more than three decades. The illegal immigrants, around two million Bangladeshis, 2.5 million Afghans and 0.5 million other nationals including Africans, Iranians, Iraqis and Myanmar, are living at present in Quetta, Peshawar, Lahore, Islamabad, Rawalpindi and other cities, an official said on Monday.

Regarding steps taken to control flow of illegal immigration in the country, the official said Anti-Trafficking Units at Provincial Police Headquarters have been established to combat internal human trafficking while Inter Agency Task Force (IATF) has also been established.

He said the other measures are replacement of Personal Identification Secure Comparison Evaluation System (PISCES) by Integrated Border Management System (IBMS), having biometric facility, introduction of Machine Readable Passports (MRPs), black-listing of traffickers and installation of Human Trafficking Information System (HUTIS).

Establishment of Immigration Check-post at zero point-250 in Balochistan, promulgation of Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance (PACHTO) 2002, effective coordination with NGOs/IGOs for public awareness campaign through electronic and print media, installation of Immigration Intelligence Unit at FIA Headquarters with help of British High Commission were the other steps taken to control illegal immigrants.

Moreover, he said seminars, documentary, walks are being conducted regularly while pamphlets are distributed in different cities of the country as part of campaign to control those immigrants.

He said due to such efforts, Pakistan has been upgraded from Tier-II Watch List to Tier-II in the annual Trafficking in Person Report (TIP) 2010 published by State Department of United States and this year the country has maintained the same status of Tier-II in TIP Report 2011.

About the reasons, the official said partition of Pakistan in 1971, cold war in Afghanistan in 1980s, poor law and order situation in Iraq, deteriorated economic and social conditions in these countries and friendly policies and international obligations on Pakistan to accommodate Afghan refugees resulted in surge of immigrants number.

LOAD-DATE: January 17, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

216 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

Daily Regional Times

January 17, 2012 Tuesday

Five million illegal immigrants residing in Pakistan

SECTION: Vol. VII No. 149

LENGTH: 377 words

Around five million illegal immigrants have been residing in different cities of Pakistan for more than three decades. The illegal immigrants, around two million Bangladeshis, 2.5 million Afghans and 0.5 million other nationals including Africans, Iranians, Iraqis and Myanmar, are currently living in Quetta, Peshawar, Lahore, Islamabad, Rawalpindi and other cities, an official said on Monday.

Regarding steps taken to control the flow of illegal immigration in the country, the official said that the Anti-Trafficking Units at Provincial Police Headquarters have been established to combat internal human trafficking while Inter Agency Task Force (IATF) has also been established.

He said the other measures are replacement of Personal Identification Secure Comparison Evaluation System (PISCES) by Integrated Border Management System (IBMS), having biometric facility, introduction of Machine Readable Passports (MRPs), black-listing of traffickers and installation of Human Trafficking Information System (HUTIS).

Establishment of Immigration check-post at zero point-250 in Balochistan, promulgation of Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance (PACHTO) 2002, effective coordination with NGOs/IGOs for public awareness campaign through electronic and print media, installation of Immigration Intelligence Unit at FIA Headquarters with help of British High Commission were the other steps taken to control illegal immigrants.

Moreover, he said, seminars, documentaries, walks are being conducted regularly while pamphlets are distributed in different cities of the country as part of campaign to control those immigrants. He said due to such efforts, Pakistan has been upgraded from Tier-II Watch List to Tier-II in the annual Trafficking in Person Report (TIP) 2010 published by State Department of United States and this year the country has maintained the same status of Tier-II in TIP Report 2011.

About the reasons, the official said the partition of Pakistan in 1971, cold war in Afghanistan in 1980s, poor law and order situation in Iraq, deteriorating economic and social conditions in these countries and friendly policies and international obligations on Pakistan to accommodate Afghan refugees resulted in the surge of immigrants number.

LOAD-DATE: January 17, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

217 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
Pakistan ObserverJanuary 17, 2012 Tuesday

Five million illegal immigrants residing in Pak

BYLINE: Staff ReporterSECTION: Vol. XXIII No. 71LENGTH: 373 words

Around five million illegal immigrants have been residing in different cities of Pakistan for more than three decades. The illegal immigrants, around two million Bangladeshis, 2.5 million Afghans and 0.5 million other nationals including Africans, Iranians, Iraqis and Myanmar, are living at present in Quetta, Peshawar, Lahore, Islamabad, Rawalpindi and other cities, an official said on Monday.

Regarding steps taken to control flow of illegal immigration in the country, the official said Anti-Trafficking Units at Provincial Police Headquarters have been established to combat internal human trafficking while Inter Agency Task Force (IATF) has also been established.

He said the other measures are replacement of Personal Identification Secure Comparison Evaluation System (PISCES) by Integrated Border Management System (IBMS), having biometric facility, introduction of Machine Readable Passports (MRPs), black-listing of traffickers and installation of Human Trafficking Information System (HUTIS).

Establishment of Immigration Check-post at zero point-250 in Balochistan, promulgation of Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance (PACHTO) 2002, effective coordination with NGOs/IGOs for public awareness campaign through electronic and print media, installation of Immigration Intelligence Unit at FIA Headquarters with help of British High Commission were the other steps taken to control illegal immigrants.

Moreover, he said seminars, documentary, walks are being conducted regularly while pamphlets are distributed in different cities of the country as part of campaign to control those immigrants.

He said due to such efforts, Pakistan has been upgraded from Tier-II Watch List to Tier-II in the annual Trafficking in Person Report (TIP) 2010 published by State Department of United States and this year the country has maintained the same status of Tier-II in TIP Report 2011.

About the reasons, the official said partition of Pakistan in 1971, cold war in Afghanistan in 1980s, poor law and order situation in Iraq, deteriorated economic and social conditions in these countries and friendly policies and international obligations on Pakistan to accommodate Afghan refugees resulted in surge of immigrants number.

LOAD-DATE: January 17, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

STARRED 218 of 492 DOCUMENTS

The Associated Press

January 11, 2012 Wednesday 04:46 PM GMTUS envoy: Myanmar weak against human trafficking*SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 399 wordsDATELINE: YANGON, Myanmar

Myanmar's archaic laws that allow conscription of workers for public projects are the biggest obstacle impeding its fight against human trafficking, a top U.S. diplomat said Wednesday.

"As long as it is still legal for the governments to use forced labor, it will be very hard for there to be improvement" on meeting international standards, visiting U.S. ambassador for human trafficking Luis CdeBaca told reporters.

Forced labor, by local governments or unscrupulous employers, child labor and sex trafficking were also cited by CdeBaca as problems Myanmar needed to tackle better.

CdeBaca said those topics were discussed frankly and openly in his talks this week with Myanmar Home Minister Lt. Gen. Ko Ko and Foreign Minister Wunna Maung Lwin.

"Challenges, of course, remain, given the unfortunate record on these issues, but we saw these initial discussions a recognition of a problem and an openness to act," he said.

An annual U.S. report on trafficking grouped Myanmar in the third, or worst, tier of countries last year for failure to comply with the minimum standards or make serious efforts to curb human trafficking. Others among the two dozen worst were North Korea, Venezuela and Iran.

CdeBaca, who arrived Monday along with U.S. special envoy and policy coordinator for Myanmar Derek Mitchell, acknowledged the country's efforts to combat human trafficking and welcomed its recent decision to stop detaining female trafficking victims involuntarily in a shelter.

Washington long shunned Myanmar under its repressive military government, but the Obama administration reversed policy to try to engage the Southeast Asian country's rulers.

The military-backed but elected government in office since March has made some mild reforms and promised more, and the pace of U.S. engagement has quickened, highlighted by Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton's visit in December. Several influential members of Congress are slated to visit in the next few weeks.

Myanmar seeks better relations so the United States and other nations ease economic and political sanctions holding back its development.

"We hope there will be more reforms that would be able to be taken into account as we look at the ranking in the coming year. We still have three months left. There is plenty of time for the government to continue to do positive steps towards compliance with these minimum standards," CdeBaca said.

LOAD-DATE: January 12, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Associated Press
All Rights Reserved

STARRED 219 of 492 DOCUMENTS

FARS News Agency

January 11, 2012 Wednesday

Saudi Man Auctions His Boy on Facebook

LENGTH: 240 words

TEHRAN (FNA)- A Saudi man is trying to sell his son on Facebook for around $20million to avoid 'living in poverty' after his illegal business was shut down.

Saud bin Nasser Al Shahry claims trafficking his son is the only option to continue providing for his wife and daughter.

He says he is willing to go to court to complete the sale, the only condition of which is to know which city the buyer lives in.

Saud bin Nasser Al Shahry is seeking that amount - or 73 million UAE Dirhams - in exchange for his son because a local court recently shuttered his illegal debt-collection business, VentureBeat.com reports, citing a report by Al Sharq, a news outlet based in Qatar.

Al Shahry reportedly resorted to child trafficking so that he, his wife and daughter could avoid "living in poverty". His only stipulation, according to reports, is that he knows the city in which the buyer resides.

The sale of children is illegal in Saudi Arabia, but the Saudi government does little to stop it, according to the US Department of State. It has been designated as a Tier 3 country for human trafficking, indicating that the government doesn't meet minimum international standards of human trafficking or seek to uphold them.

Al Shahry is now ready to go to court to complete the "sale procedures," Al Sharq reports.

Russia Today, however, suggests the sale is merely a public stunt aimed to attract a rich investor to save Al Shahry from his financial troubles.

LOAD-DATE: January 11, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: NewswireJOURNAL-CODE: 363

220 of 492 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

January 11, 2012 WednesdayREMARKS TO THE MEDIA AT THE U.S. EMBASSY IN RANGOON, BURMA - LUIS CDEBACA AMBASSADOR-AT-LARGE , OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS*BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 2419 wordsDATELINE: RANGOON, Burma

The following information was released by the U.S. Department of State:

Press Availability

Luis CdeBaca

Ambassador-at-Large , Office To Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons

Rangoon, Burma

January 11, 2012

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Good afternoon, everyone. As Secretary Clinton noted during her visit to Burma, if the Government of Burma keeps moving in the right direction, the U.S. is prepared to be a partner in the reform process.

One of the areas of reform that was raised in Secretary Clinton's meetings was trafficking in persons. As we examine potential new avenues for engagement, one possibility is fighting this scourge in concert.

No country is immune from modern slavery, and both the United States and Burma are affected with victims in our own countries and abroad. There are concerns with victim identification, investigation and prosecution of traffickers, and victims' access to justice and rehabilitation. Here, forced labor, whether by governmental actors or unscrupulous employers, is an ongoing problem, as is sex trafficking. Additionally, there continue to be problems with the recruitment of child soldiers and the use of villagers by municipal or military authorities for forced labor or forced portering.

All of these aspects of the trafficking problem were discussed in a series of frank and open exchanges in the last two days in Naypyitaw and Rangoon. Challenges of course remain, given the unfortunate record on this issue, but we saw in these discussions a recognition of the problem and an openness to act.

While this is a country endowed with many natural resources, the most precious is its people, and they deserve freedom from modern slavery whether here or abroad. I'm happy to take any questions.

QUESTION: You've met relevant ministers, including the Home Minister. I'm sure you must have discussed a range of issues regarding human trafficking. Are you now convinced that the Burmese Government is doing enough? Are they committed to eliminating human trafficking, forced labor, child conscription? As far as I remember, Myanmar was in Tier 3 of the annual report. What do you think Myanmar's status will be this year?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: The country was in Tier 3 of the annual report, this being the annual report [showing the report in his hand]. What we have seen in the annual report is an analysis of what governments are doing under 11 minimum standards set forth by the Congress on the elimination of trafficking in persons. And that ranges everything from victim identification to the laws that are in place. But most importantly, are the laws being enforced. And so one of the things that we discussed in the meetings, not just with the Ministers, but also with the inter-Ministerial working group (CBTIP) on this was what are some of the things that are happening out in the field?

And there are some things that we've seen in the last few months that are encouraging. For instance, no longer requiring that victims who come home are then kept involuntarily for two weeks in a shelter which what we've been hearing from many of the victims the returning victims felt that that was more like jail. The Government has issued a decree stopping that practice, which we welcome. We're hoping that we'll see more such reforms and more such policies on the part of the Government going forward that would be able to be taken into account as we look at the ranking in the coming year. We don't presuppose a ranking. We still have three months left in the year that we look at. And there's plenty of time for the Government to continue to do positive steps towards compliance with these minimum standards. And we would certainly encourage them as we did in the meetings over the last couple of days.

QUESTION: Did you discuss with government officials anything about Burmese women being sold to China as brides? Do you have any concerns about that?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: This is one of the facets of human trafficking that we discussed, both at the Ministerial level, and also with CBTIP, this issue of the women being sold as brides in China. And it's something that I have raised as well when I have travelled to China. It's an issue that can only be dealt with both the sending and the receiving countries. But what we very much feel is that there not only needs to be education of women so that they know that promises of a better life in China could be hiding exploitation and abuse, so that they have the information when the men come and try to take them north, but also then that there are opportunities for the women if they come back home; to make sure that they are not rejected by their family; to make sure that they have rehabilitation services. And so we spoke with the Ministry of Labor and Social Welfare about that issue of when people are coming home how they can best be served, how can they get the services that a trafficking victim requires. But it's something that's very much on our radar as we look at the problem of human trafficking.

QUESTION: Human trafficking most of the time is across borders. How do you see the cooperation between Burma and its neighbors on this issue? The second question is, how about the United States in helping combat this issue.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, first of all, much of the attention that's been paid here, and that the actors in Naypyitaw are looking at you're correct that there's more attention paid to the cross-border aspect of human trafficking. And the reality of course is that the migrants are more vulnerable to exploitation. They're more vulnerable to enslavement when they're in another country, when they're afraid of the immigration services, when they don't speak the language. But the United Nations' definition of human trafficking, the international standards, are very much about this is not about movement, this is a problem of enslavement and exploitation. And so we've seen cases where people have been held in modern slavery here at home without ever being taken across a border.

Having said that, we think it's very important for there to be regional focus on this because we recognize that a sending country has limited capacity to prosecute the factory owner who may be enslaving their people somewhere else. China, Thailand these are the places that I think many people think of when they think of the human trafficking problem here.

One of the things we've started doing in the United States is, in working with our Mexican counterparts on cross-border trafficking, is doing the cases simultaneously. So we will share our evidence with the Mexicans so that they can prosecute the recruiter in the village and we can prosecute the employer in the United States at the same time. And that's the type of model of cross-border cooperation that we think would be effective in the Greater Mekong Sub-Region as well. And it's the type of thing we think that ASEAN and the other regional entities would be good at helping foster. But we certainly have raised the issue of Burmese migrants when we talk to Thailand because those are so often the people who are being exploited, whether in prostitution, whether in factories, whether in the shrimp and fishing industries. So often when you see the exploitation and you meet the victims they are from here, and that needs to stop.

QUESTION: Can you elaborate on what sort of recommendations you have made to the Government authorities so that Myanmar will be upgraded from its present tier, or scrapped from the blacklist?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Again I'll repeat that we don't presuppose the ranking until we have the evidence each year. But there are a number of recommendations that we made both in the report when it came out last year and again in the conversations in the last few days. And we discussed those recommendations frankly and with a spirit of openness. And we felt like there was a good discussion of those recommendations. Not from a place of accusation. It was not received with defensiveness, but rather a good dialogue between us and our counterparts in the Ministries.

But those recommendations and I would certainly refer you to the trafficking report itself include ceasing the use of forced labor by military and civilian authorities, increasing investigations, increasing the victim care, working to end the involuntary detention of the adult victims in the shelters (which they did do), releasing and moving away from charges against some of the political prisoners who were in prison because of their activism on labor rights against forced labor. At the end of the day, I think one of the biggest recommendations is the need to focus more on the internal trafficking of victims. Not solely thinking that this is a problem that happens in Thailand. Not just thinking of this is being a Chinese problem, but recognizing that this is happening in Yangon; that this is happening in Mandalay. It's happening up at the lake. It's happening in so many areas, not just in the tourist areas. Not just in sex, but on farms, in little factories and things like that. And once that recognition flows, we think that that will make a very positive step forward, as far as the ranking is concerned.

Hillary Clinton said a couple of years ago when the rankings come out that countries come to her and they express dismay about their ranking. And she tells them that the best way to improve their ranking is to get results. And results are very easy. It's: traffickers go to jail, and victims get helped. And so we are very much looking forward to a situation where, through cooperation, through regional efforts, but at the end of the day, through political will on the part of the Government, we see more traffickers in jail, and more victims helped.

QUESTION: So far, what do you think are the biggest obstacles that you are facing now to improve the situation?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: One of the biggest obstacles to improving the situation here seems to be the archaic legal structure, especially in the villages and towns act, which allows the civilian authorities to conscript labor for building projects or other things like that. So that it basically says that it is legal for the municipal government or the military to use forced labor. And even though there are positive things happening with transnational sex trafficking, and those types of trafficking, as long as it's still legal for the Government to use forced labor in that manner, it will be very hard for there to be improvement under these international standards. And so in some ways, it's not just an issue of resources or better training or political will to fight the criminal traffickers. It's changing the law to make it clear that the Government cannot actually hold its own people in forced labor. That's probably the biggest challenge that we see. But it's also a challenge that could be solved very easily if Government and Parliament took steps to end that practice.

QUESTION: Just a follow-up to the previous question. So what is the role of the U.S. Government and you in assisting this Government to solve this problem? What kind of offer have you made in Naypyitaw?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well we didn't make an offer on this trip. I think what we see in this trip is an opportunity to engage with our counterparts in the spirit of the last few months, as we look at these new avenues for potential collaboration. What we do in countries around the world ranges from supporting shelters, supporting police training, supporting the training of judges and other members of the Governmental response, but also making those linkages between civil society and Government. We have some limited funds that we spend each year in countries around the world. But we also have technical assistance, and we work within the international bodies. So, for instance, with ASEAN, the United States participated in a training that was held in Singapore last year under the auspices of ASEAN in which our counterparts from the Burmese prosecutors' offices were able to come and receive best practices from a host of prosecutors from around the world. Those are some of the types of things that we could see going forward, but much of the trip was to assess the situation, to see what the possibilities are, and to begin a conversation with our counterparts here. So we don't have an announcement for you about a particular pledge, or an amount, or anything like that. But when we do have an announcement if we do have an announcement we'll certainly let you know.

QUESTION: When you went to Naypyitaw, did the authorities mention the role of the local media in combating trafficking because in Burma we are still under heavy censorship.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: This is not something that we saw in these particular discussions, but I think it's something we will take under advisement for future discussions because one of the things that we've seen is that the role of the media in uncovering these situations and calling it to people's attention is critical. We talked earlier today to a number of the non-governmental and international organizations that are working on this, and they certainly raised this as being very helpful to their work in the last six months or so, as more news stories have come out about the human trafficking. And so we would certainly encourage all of you to continue to report on this issue and to intensify your reporting. It's not just for the print media either. Any of you who've seen the work being done on CNN International and otherwise, there are some very interesting ways to do reporting on this issue of modern slavery in series type of work. So not just reporting on one particular case, but reporting on the phenomenon of the women going to China, reporting on what's happening to the men who are on those Thai fishing boats, or even if there are people going on the Western borders into Bangladesh or India and being abused. Probably the most important is calling attention to the problems right here at home. But it is something that we'll want to continue to take on board and in fact it's something that, at the Embassy, press freedom is something we care about very deeply and if you have instances that you'd like to call to our attention, it's something that our Embassy staff would love to hear from you if there are impediments to your reporting on this issue. It's something that we not only can raise with Government, but something we would be very interested in raising if there are situations where you feel your coverage of this is being impeded.

LOAD-DATE: January 18, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 States News Service

221 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

Associated Press Online

January 11, 2012 Wednesday 4:46 PM GMT

US envoy: Myanmar weak against human trafficking

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 399 words

DATELINE: YANGON Myanmar

Myanmar's archaic laws that allow conscription of workers for public projects are the biggest obstacle impeding its fight against human trafficking, a top U.S. diplomat said Wednesday.

"As long as it is still legal for the governments to use forced labor, it will be very hard for there to be improvement" on meeting international standards, visiting U.S. ambassador for human trafficking Luis CdeBaca told reporters.

Forced labor, by local governments or unscrupulous employers, child labor and sex trafficking were also cited by CdeBaca as problems Myanmar needed to tackle better.

CdeBaca said those topics were discussed frankly and openly in his talks this week with Myanmar Home Minister Lt. Gen. Ko Ko and Foreign Minister Wunna Maung Lwin.

"Challenges, of course, remain, given the unfortunate record on these issues, but we saw these initial discussions a recognition of a problem and an openness to act," he said.

An annual U.S. report on trafficking grouped Myanmar in the third, or worst, tier of countries last year for failure to comply with the minimum standards or make serious efforts to curb human trafficking. Others among the two dozen worst were North Korea, Venezuela and Iran.

CdeBaca, who arrived Monday along with U.S. special envoy and policy coordinator for Myanmar Derek Mitchell, acknowledged the country's efforts to combat human trafficking and welcomed its recent decision to stop detaining female trafficking victims involuntarily in a shelter.

Washington long shunned Myanmar under its repressive military government, but the Obama administration reversed policy to try to engage the Southeast Asian country's rulers.

The military-backed but elected government in office since March has made some mild reforms and promised more, and the pace of U.S. engagement has quickened, highlighted by Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton's visit in December. Several influential members of Congress are slated to visit in the next few weeks.

Myanmar seeks better relations so the United States and other nations ease economic and political sanctions holding back its development.

"We hope there will be more reforms that would be able to be taken into account as we look at the ranking in the coming year. We still have three months left. There is plenty of time for the government to continue to do positive steps towards compliance with these minimum standards," CdeBaca said.

LOAD-DATE: January 12, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2012 Associated Press
All Rights Reserved

222 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Daily Times (PK)

January 7, 2012 Saturday

5 million illegal immigrants residing in Pakistan, NA told

LENGTH: 527 words

DATELINE: ISLAMABAD

ISLAMABAD, Jan. 7 -- * 9,590 multiple passport holders blacklisted, legal action underway

The National Assembly was told on Friday that about five million illegal immigrants were residing in different parts of the country due to local and regional disturbances.

In a written statement, the Ministry of Interior told the NA that out of the five million illegal immigrants, approximately two million were Bangladeshis, 2.5 million were Afghans, and 0.5 million other nationals, including Africans, Iranians, Iraqis and Myanmarese, who had been living in the country for more than three decades.

The main reasons for these illegal immigrants was said to be partition of Pakistan in 1971, Cold War in Afghanistan in 1980's, poor law and order situation in Iraq, and the availability of safe havens in Pakistan. The Interior Ministry said that the friendly policies and international obligations of Pakistan to accommodate Afghan refugees was another reason for illegal immigrants in the country.

The NA was told that the government had taken a number of measures to discourage the inflow of illegal immigrants, including establishment of Anti-Trafficking Units at provincial police headquarters for combating internal human trafficking. For reducing illegal foreigner inflow the government has replaced Personal Identification Secure Comparison Evaluation System (PISCES) with Integrated Border Management System (IBMS) having biometric facility.

The Upper House was informed that the Interior Ministry has blacklisted traffickers, introduced Machine Readable Passports (MRP), established an immigration check-post at zero point-250 in Balochistan. The government has also promulgated Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance (PACHTO) 2002.

Due to such efforts, Pakistan has been upgraded from Tier-II Watch List to Tier-II in the annual Trafficking in Person Report (TIP) 2010, published by the State Department of the United States. This year Pakistan maintained its Tier-II status.

The NA was told that to further strengthen the immigration system, particulars of all passengers with multiple passports and multiple CNICs are placed on the "Stop Person's List" in PISCES, which is installed at Exit and Entry checkpoints of the Federal Investigation Authority (FIA) at airports.

This helps in detaining illegal immigrants, who are then handed over to the FIA and Anti-Human Trafficking Circles (AHTC) for legal action in accordance with the relevant laws.

The Interior Ministry said that 9,590 cases of multiples passports had been blocked in the system and legal action was underway.

The ministry said that the government had given general amnesty to such persons to surrender their multiple CNICs and passports voluntarily. However, 3,110 applications had been received for cancellation of one extra passport, out of which 1,720 passports had been cancelled, while 1,390 cases were pending for want of verification by security agencies or deposit of requisite fee. Published by HT Syndication with permission from Daily Times. For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: January 21, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 Right Vision News
All Rights Reserved

223 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

Daily Times

January 7, 2012 Saturday

5 million illegal immigrants residing in Pakistan, NA told

BYLINE: Ijaz Kakakhel

SECTION: Vol. VII No. 366

LENGTH: 479 words

The National Assembly was told on Friday that about five million illegal immigrants were residing in different parts of the country due to local and regional disturbances.

In a written statement, the Ministry of Interior told the NA that out of the five million illegal immigrants, approximately two million were Bangladeshis, 2.5 million were Afghans, and 0.5 million other nationals, including Africans, Iranians, Iraqis and Myanmarese, who had been living in the country for more than three decades.

The main reasons for these illegal immigrants was said to be partition of Pakistan in 1971, Cold War in Afghanistan in 1980's, poor law and order situation in Iraq, and the availability of safe havens in Pakistan. The Interior Ministry said that the friendly policies and international obligations of Pakistan to accommodate Afghan refugees was another reason for illegal immigrants in the country.

The NA was told that the government had taken a number of measures to discourage the inflow of illegal immigrants, including establishment of Anti-Trafficking Units at provincial police headquarters for combating internal human trafficking. For reducing illegal foreigner inflow the government has replaced Personal Identification Secure Comparison Evaluation System (PISCES) with Integrated Border Management System (IBMS) having biometric facility.

The Upper House was informed that the Interior Ministry has blacklisted traffickers, introduced Machine Readable Passports (MRP), established an immigration check-post at zero point-250 in Balochistan. The government has also promulgated Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance (PACHTO) 2002.

Due to such efforts, Pakistan has been upgraded from Tier-II Watch List to Tier-II in the annual Trafficking in Person Report (TIP) 2010, published by the State Department of the United States. This year Pakistan maintained its Tier-II status.

The NA was told that to further strengthen the immigration system, particulars of all passengers with multiple passports and multiple CNICs are placed on the "Stop Person's List" in PISCES, which is installed at Exit and Entry checkpoints of the Federal Investigation Authority (FIA) at airports.

This helps in detaining illegal immigrants, who are then handed over to the FIA and Anti-Human Trafficking Circles (AHTC) for legal action in accordance with the relevant laws.

The Interior Ministry said that 9,590 cases of multiples passports had been blocked in the system and legal action was underway.

The ministry said that the government had given general amnesty to such persons to surrender their multiple CNICs and passports voluntarily. However, 3,110 applications had been received for cancellation of one extra passport, out of which 1,720 passports had been cancelled, while 1,390 cases were pending for want of verification by security agencies or deposit of requisite fee.

LOAD-DATE: January 9, 2012

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2012 Daily Times
All Rights Reserved

224 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Right Vision News

December 31, 2011 Saturday

Pakistan: Pakistan no more on human-trafficking watch list: MalikLENGTH: 383 wordsDATELINE: ISLAMABAD

ISLAMABAD, Dec. 31 -- Federal Interior Minister Rehman Malik Thursday told the parliament that name of Pakistan was removed from the international watch list in connection with human trafficking due to efforts of FIA.

Responding to queries during National Assembly session, he said that was on watch list but now due to FIA efforts human trafficking was discouraged.

On its role in addressing corruption, the minister said that so far FIA has recovered Rs. 808 million money lost in corruption.

To a question, he said that Transparency International is a small institution therefore its report is not final and it should be noted that corruption in Pakistan can never measured on the same tools as that in Europe.

To a question about small number of police in proportion to population in the country, Malik said that number of police personnel is being enhanced some more people were recruited and more would be recruited.

On situation in Bajur he said that law and order was improved in the tribal agency and number of decreasing check posts in the area is under consideration.

When he was asked about efficiency of NADRA, he said that 94 percent people were registered and the remaining would on roll soon. About fake NIC of Afghans, he said that 90,000 such NIC were cancelled and action was being taken against the responsible officers.

Meanwhile, to the question regarding relief and rehabilitation in the flood-hit areas he said that about 3 lac families or 60-70 lacs of people were affected and now only 300 are homeless who never want to return. He blamed NGOs for bribing them to not return for their own interest.

This government, he said, faced natural calamities including flood of 2010, the situation in Swat, floods of 2011 and so on. "I say that this government was efficient enough in tackling the flood affected areas," he said, adding that rehabilitation of so a large population was not an easy task.

Earlier, at the start of the session under Chairmanship of Deputy Speaker Faisal Karim Kundi, Suriya Jatao, the new member of the national assembly on reserved seat, took oath as a member Published by HT Syndication with permission from Right Vision News. For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: December 30, 2011LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

225 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

Baluchistan Express

December 30, 2011 Friday

Pakistan no more on human-trafficking watch list: Malik

LENGTH: 348 words

Federal Interior Minister Rehman Malik Thursday told the parliament that name of Pakistan was removed from the international watch list in connection with human trafficking due to efforts of FIA.

Responding to queries during National Assembly session, he said that was on watch list but now due to FIA efforts human trafficking was discouraged. On its role in addressing corruption, the minister said that so far FIA has recovered Rs. 808 million money lost in corruption.

To a question, he said that Transparency International is a small institution therefore its report is not final and it should be noted that corruption in Pakistan can never measured on the same tools as that in Europe. To a question about small number of police in proportion to population in the country, Malik said that number of police personnel is being enhanced some more people were recruited and more would be recruited.

On situation in Bajaur he said that law and order was improved in the tribal agency and number of decreasing check posts in the area is under consideration. When he was asked about efficiency of NADRA, he said that 94 percent people were registered and the remaining would on roll soon. About fake NIC of Afghans, he said that 90,000 such NIC were cancelled and action was being taken against the responsible officers.

Meanwhile, to the question regarding relief and rehabilitation in the flood-hit areas he said that about 3 lac families or 60-70 lacs of people were affected and now only 300 are homeless who never want to return. He blamed NGOs for bribing them to not return for their own interest.

This government, he said, faced natural calamities including flood of 2010, the situation in Swat, floods of 2011 and so on. "I say that this government was efficient enough in tackling the flood affected areas," he said, adding that rehabilitation of so a large population was not an easy task.

Earlier, at the start of the session under Chairmanship of Deputy Speaker Faisal Karim Kundi, Surriya Jatao, the new member of the national assembly on reserved seat, took oath as a member.

LOAD-DATE: December 30, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

226 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
The Frontier Star

December 30, 2011 Friday

Pakistan no more on human-trafficking watch list: MalikSECTION: Vol. 16 No. 359LENGTH: 349 words

Federal Interior Minister Rehman Malik Thursday told the parliament that name of Pakistan was removed from the international watch list in connection with human trafficking due to efforts of FIA.

Responding to queries during National Assembly session, he said that was on watch list but now due to FIA efforts human trafficking was discouraged. On its role in addressing corruption, the minister said that so far FIA has recovered Rs. 808 million money lost in corruption.

To a question, he said that Transparency International is a small institution therefore its report is not final and it should be noted that corruption in Pakistan can never measured on the same tools as that in Europe. To a question about small number of police in proportion to population in the country, Malik said that number of police personnel is being enhanced some more people were recruited and more would be recruited.

On situation in Bajaur he said that law and order was improved in the tribal agency and number of decreasing check posts in the area is under consideration. When he was asked about efficiency of NADRA, he said that 94 percent people were registered and the remaining would on roll soon. About fake NIC of Afghans, he said that 90,000 such NIC were cancelled and action was being taken against the responsible officers.

Meanwhile, to the question regarding relief and rehabilitation in the flood-hit areas he said that about 3 lac families or 60-70 lacs of people were affected and now only 300 are homeless who never want to return. He blamed NGOs for bribing them to not return for their own interest.

This government, he said, faced natural calamities including flood of 2010, the situation in Swat, floods of 2011 and so on. "I say that this government was efficient enough in tackling the flood affected areas," he said, adding that rehabilitation of so a large population was not an easy task.

Earlier, at the start of the session under Chairmanship of Deputy Speaker Faisal Karim Kundi, Surriya Jatao, the new member of the national assembly on reserved seat, took oath as a member.

LOAD-DATE: December 30, 2011LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

227 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Malaysia General News

December 30, 2011 Friday

MALAYSIA HOPES FOR FAIR U.S. EVALUATION OF ANTI-HUMAN TRAFFICKING RECORD

LENGTH: 242 wordsDATELINE: PUTRAJAYA Dec 30

Malaysia is confident of a fair and transparent assessment by the United States on its anti-human trafficking efforts, said Home Ministry secretary-general Tan Sri Mahmood Adam.

Mahmood said Malaysia had always taken seriously the comments and suggestions made by the US to improve measures to stem the crime.

"In 2011, Malaysia was placed on Tier 2 of the Watch List. It is the hope of Malaysia and the Anti-Human Trafficking Council (Mapo) that in 2012, Malaysia will be placed on a better tier."

"We have cooperated with them 100 per cent and they guided and trained us. Let us know what else we can do," he told a news conference after a Media Appreciation reception for helping make the Anti-Human Trafficking and Anti-Migrant Smuggling Campaign a success, here, today.

He said Malaysia was still finding it hard to deal with this new crime effectively.

Mahmood said in regard to this, Malaysia would be hosting a 'Bali Ministerial Process on People Smuggling, Trafficking in Persons and Related Transnational Crime on Victim Protection' workshop on Jan 12 and 13.

The workshop, organised with the cooperation of the International Organisation for Migrants (IOM), will involve the ministry and agencies under the Anti-Human Trafficking Council (Mapo) and about 50 representatives from the Bali Process member countries.

"The workshop will discuss issues related to victim protection, identification and assistance, and international cooperation," he said.

LOAD-DATE: January 3, 2012LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

228 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

Pakistan Today (Newstex Blog)

December 29, 2011 Thursday 7:42 PM EST

Pakistan no more on human-trafficking watch list: Malik

LENGTH: 299 words

Online | 33 mins ago

0

ISLAMABAD - Interior Minister Rehman Malik told the parliament on Thursday that name of Pakistan was removed from the international watch list in connection with human trafficking due to efforts of FIA.

Responding to queries during National Assembly session, he said that Pakistan was on the watch list but now, due to FIA efforts, human trafficking was discouraged.

On its role in addressing corruption, the minister said that so far FIA has recovered Rs 808 million lost in corruption.

He said the Transparency International was a small institution therefore its report was not final and it should be noted that corruption in Pakistan could never be measured on the same tools as that in Europe.

He added that number of police personnel was being enhanced as some people were recruited and more would be recruited.

He said law and order was improved in the tribal agency and decreasing the number of check posts in the area was under consideration.

He said further that 94 percent people were registered with NADRA and the remaining would be on the roll soon. About fake NIC of Afghans, he said that 90,000 such NIC were cancelled and action was being taken against the responsible officers.

Meanwhile, to the question regarding relief and rehabilitation in the flood-hit areas, he said that about 3 lac families or 60-70 lacs of people were affected and now only 300 were homeless who never wanted to return. He blamed NGOs for bribing them to not to return for their own interest.

This government, he said, faced natural calamities including flood of 2010, the situation in Swat, floods of 2011 and so on. "I say that this government was efficient enough in tackling the flood affected areas," he said, adding that rehabilitation of such a large population was not an easy task.

LOAD-DATE: December 29, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Blog

JOURNAL-CODE: APAK-111350

Copyright 2011 Newstex LLC
All Rights Reserved
Newstex Web Blogs
Copyright 2011 Pakistan Today

229 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Sunday Observer (Sri Lanka)

December 25, 2011 Sunday

Lanka's anti-trafficking measures commended

LENGTH: 385 wordsDATELINE: Sri Lanka

Sri Lanka, Dec. 25 -- The 2011 Report on Trafficking in Persons prepared by the US State Department has upgraded Sri Lanka from Tier 2 Watch List to Tier 2 in recognition of efforts made by the Lankan Government to address human trafficking. Commending on the progress made by the Government, Political Officer of the US Embassy in Colombo Jacob Chriqui said Sri Lanka has made significant progress to reduce trafficking, both internally and externally.

"The Sri Lankan Government has increased public awareness about human trafficking, improved law enforcement efforts, and increased budgets for anti-trafficking activities. This year we saw the first convictions for trafficking offences under Sri Lanka's Anti-Trafficking Laws", he said. "In our report each country is placed in one of three tiers. This placement is based more on the extent of government action to combat trafficking than on the size of the problem, although the latter is also an important factor.

"While Tier 1 is the highest ranking, it does not mean that a country has no human trafficking problem. Rather, a Tier 1 ranking indicates that a government has acknowledged the existence of human trafficking and has made efforts that meet the standards of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act to address the problem.

Tier 2 countries are where governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards, but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards.

Tier 3 countries' governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so. Sri Lanka was upgraded in 2011 from the Tier 2 Watch List, between Tier 2 and Tier 3, to Tier 2", he said.

Chriqui said the program's aim to increase the capacity of Sri Lankan law enforcement officials, prosecutors and the judiciary so that they will have the training and tools to combat trafficking. Our Embassy also meets regularly with the Sri Lankan Government and law enforcement officials working in counter-trafficking, and their dedication and the services they provide have been remarkable," he said. Published by HT Syndication with permission from Sunday Observer (Sri Lanka). For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: December 27, 2011LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

230 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Daily News (Sri Lanka)

December 24, 2011 Saturday

SL curbs human trafficking

LENGTH: 307 wordsDATELINE: Sri Lanka

Sri Lanka, Dec. 24 -- Drops to tier two:

Sri Lanka has been upgraded to tier two in the Annual Global Trafficking in Persons Report 2011 as a result of increased efforts by the government in addressing the concerns, and the successful prosecution of offenders, ILO Country Director for Sri Lanka and the Maldives, Donglin Li said. He was addressing the media at a Media Workshop on Human Trafficking and Forced Labour at JAIC Hilton on Thursday.

He said that Sri Lanka has made significant progress towards combating human trafficking, following the establishment of the National Task Force of Trafficking subsequent to the amendment to the penal law in 2006 and the Justice Ministry National Steering Committee on human trafficking in May 2010 under the Chairmanship of Secretary of Justice.

Li said the ILO has extended its support to the government by carrying out several initiatives together with national stakeholders to support in combating trafficking.

It will continue to support Sri Lanka in strengthening efforts to combat human trafficking and forced labour through its wealth of experience.

According to ILO estimates , there are at least 2.4 million traffickers at any given point in time, yet only a few thousand convictions of traffickers every year.

Most of the victims are not identified and consequently , never receive justice for the damage inflicted upon them. Li said despite growing awareness and more effective law enforcement responses, trafficking remains a low-risk criminal enterprise with high returns. He said according to ILO estimates, annual profit generated from human trafficking is as high as USD 32 billion. Published by HT Syndication with permission from Daily News Sri Lanka. For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: December 23, 2011LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

231 of 492 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Latin America - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

December 2, 2011 Friday

Bahamian inter-ministerial committee to examine US report on human trafficking

LENGTH: 344 words

Text of report by Caribbean Media Corporation news agency website

Nassau, Bahamas: The inter-ministerial committee appointed to review the United States 2011 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report on The Bahamas and to make recommendations on these matters to Cabinet has held its first meeting.

A government statement said that in order to carry out its mandate, the committee will hold consultations with Bahamian non-governmental organizations concerned with issues of trafficking in persons. It will report to Cabinet ahead of the February interim assessment report to the United States Congress and preparation for the 2012 Report. The statement said that the committee comprises various stakeholders including senior officials of ministries and agencies concerned with trafficking in persons, many of whom have been following such matters in regional and international forums.

According to the US Department of State, the objective of the report is to raise global awareness regarding trafficking in persons, to spur countries to take effective action to counter this trafficking and to give guidance to Governments to understand what is required to fight trafficking in persons. A release from the Ministry of National Security noted that in producing the report, Washington is seeking to encourage compliance with obligations arising from the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, Supplementing the United Nations Convention on Transnational Organized Crime.

The Bahamas was ranked as Tier 2 Watch List. The US report uses a three Tier system to rank the efforts of countries worldwide including those of the United States in countering trafficking in persons. The release states that this ranking is given to countries not fully in step with the minimum standards outlined in the United States Government's 2000 Trafficking Victims Protection Act, as amended, but that are making significant efforts to do so.

Source: Caribbean Media Corporation news agency website, Bridgetown, in English 1640 gmt 2 Dec 11

LOAD-DATE: December 2, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

232 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Statesman

November 19, 2011 Saturday

4,334 human traffickers nabbed in last 30 months

SECTION: Vol. 12 No. 142LENGTH: 444 words

Federal Investigation Agency (FIA) has arrested 4,334 human traffickers during last two and half years and adopted numerous measures to eradicate this menace from the society.

The Agency nabbed 1755 human traffickers during 2009, 1779 in 2010 and up to June 2011, 800 human traffickers have been arrested.

According to data available with APP here on Thursday, due to these measures Pakistan's position was upgraded from Tier-2 Watch List to Tier-2 in US State Department's Trafficking In Persons (TIP) Report-2010 and the same position was maintained in TIP Report-2011. The number of deportation has gradually decreased which is done with the international cooperation.

The FIA is taking stern action against human traffickers/smugglers/facilitators and sub agents. As such it has arrested Most Wanted Traffickers (MWTs) in last three years and their number was 26 in 2009, 16 in 2010 and 2 MWTs were nabbed till June 2011.

Moreover, special campaign for the arrest of Proclaimed Offenders (POs) and Court Absconders (CAs) was also launched to eradicate this menace.

Meanwhile, official sources said measures have also been adopted to bring illegal migration at zero level. FIA's Anti Trafficking Sub-Circle, Gujrat has been established and declared as Police Station.

The other steps are establishment of Anti Trafficking Units at Provincial Police HQs for combating internal human trafficking and establishment of Inter Agency Task Force (IATF). Around 10703 illegal migrants were intercepted in 2008, 5601 in 2009 and 3434 in 2010.

Bilateral Joint Working Groups were also established such as Pakistan- Oman, Pakistan-UK, Pakistan-Turkey and Pakistan-Australia. The Trilateral Group were Pakistan-Iran-Turkey and Pakistan-Turkey- Greece while Quadrilateral Group were Pakistan-Iran-Turkey- Greece and Pakistan-Afghanistan-Iran-Turkey.

The authorities also replaced Personal identification Secure Comparison Evaluation System (PISCES) by Integrated Border Management System (IBMS) and black-listing of traffickers.

The FIA has vigorously pursued the cases of human smuggling in the courts. Immigration Liaison Office in Muscat has been established while the authorities also installed Human Trafficking Information System (HUTIS) and Case Monitoring System (CMS). Public awareness campaign was also launched in collaboration with NGOs/IGOs, through electronic and print media, by conducting meetings, seminars, documentary, walks, pamphlets, theater in rural and urban areas.

Proposal for establishment of Border Liaison Office (BLO) is underway through SAARC and Dubai Process at Durand line. FIA has also launched its website www.fia.org.pk to entertain complaints etc.

LOAD-DATE: November 19, 2011LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2011 Mashriq Group of Newspapers
All Rights Reserved

233 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

Daily Regional Times

November 18, 2011 Friday

4,334 human traffickers nabbed in last 30 months

SECTION: Vol. IV No. 377

LENGTH: 445 words

Federal Investigation Agency (FIA) has arrested 4,334 human traffickers during last two and half years and adopted numerous measures to eradicate this menace from the society.

The Agency nabbed 1755 human traffickers during 2009, 1779 in 2010 and up to June 2011, 800 human traffickers have been arrested.

According to data available with APP here on Thursday, due to these measures Pakistan's position was upgraded from Tier-2 Watch List to Tier-2 in US State Department's Trafficking In Persons (TIP) Report-2010 and the same position was maintained in TIP Report-2011. The number of deportation has gradually decreased which is done with the international cooperation.

The FIA is taking stern action against human traffickers/smugglers/facilitators and sub agents. As such it has arrested Most Wanted Traffickers (MWTs) in last three years and their number was 26 in 2009, 16 in 2010 and 2 MWTs were nabbed till June 2011.

Moreover, special campaign for the arrest of Proclaimed Offenders (POs) and Court Absconders (CAs) was also launched to eradicate this menace.

Meanwhile, official sources said measures have also been adopted to bring illegal migration at zero level. FIA's Anti Trafficking Sub-Circle, Gujrat has been established and declared as Police Station.

The other steps are establishment of Anti Trafficking Units at Provincial Police HQs for combating internal human trafficking and establishment of Inter Agency Task Force (IATF). Around 10703 illegal migrants were intercepted in 2008, 5601 in 2009 and 3434 in 2010.

Bilateral Joint Working Groups were also established such as Pakistan- Oman, Pakistan-UK, Pakistan-Turkey and Pakistan-Australia. The Trilateral Group were Pakistan-Iran-Turkey and Pakistan-Turkey- Greece while Quadrilateral Group were Pakistan-Iran-Turkey- Greece and Pakistan-Afghanistan-Iran-Turkey.

The authorities also replaced Personal identification Secure Comparison Evaluation System (PISCES) by Integrated Border Management System (IBMS) and black-listing of traffickers.

The FIA has vigorously pursued the cases of human smuggling in the courts. Immigration Liaison Office in Muscat has been established while the authorities also installed Human Trafficking Information System (HUTIS) and Case Monitoring System (CMS). Public awareness campaign was also launched in collaboration with NGOs/IGOs, through electronic and print media, by conducting meetings, seminars, documentary, walks, pamphlets, theater in rural and urban areas.

Proposal for establishment of Border Liaison Office (BLO) is underway through SAARC and Dubai Process at Durand line.

FIA has also launched its website www.fia.org.pk to entertain complaints etc.-Agency

LOAD-DATE: November 21, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2011 Regional Times
All Rights Reserved

234 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

Right Vision News

November 18, 2011 Friday

Pakistan: 4,334 human traffickers nabbed in last 30 months

LENGTH: 477 words

DATELINE: ISLAMABAD

ISLAMABAD, Nov. 18 -- Federal Investigation Agency (FIA) has arrested 4,334 human traffickers during last two and half years and adopted numerous measures to eradicate this menace from the society.

The Agency nabbed 1755 human traffickers during 2009, 1779 in 2010 and up to June 2011, 800 human traffickers have been arrested. According to data available with Right Vision News here on Thursday, due to these measures Pakistan's position was upgraded from Tier-2 Watch List to Tier-2 in US State Department's Trafficking In Persons (TIP) Report-2010 and the same position was maintained in TIP Report-2011. The number of deportation has gradually decreased which is done with the international cooperation.

The FIA is taking stern action against human traffickers/smugglers/facilitators and sub agents. As such it has arrested Most Wanted Traffickers (MWTs) in last three years and their number was 26 in 2009, 16 in 2010 and 2 MWTs were nabbed till June 2011.

Moreover, special campaign for the arrest of Proclaimed Offenders (POs) and Court Absconders (CAs) was also launched to eradicate this menace.

Meanwhile, official sources said measures have also been adopted to bring illegal migration at zero level. FIA's Anti Trafficking Sub-Circle, Gujrat has been established and declared as Police Station.

The other steps are establishment of Anti Trafficking Units at Provincial Police HQs for combating internal human trafficking and establishment of Inter Agency Task Force (IATF). Around 10703 illegal migrants were intercepted in 2008, 5601 in 2009 and 3434 in 2010.

Bilateral Joint Working Groups were also established such as Pakistan- Oman, Pakistan-UK, Pakistan-Turkey and Pakistan-Australia. The Trilateral Group were Pakistan-Iran-Turkey and Pakistan-Turkey-Greece while Quadrilateral Group were Pakistan-Iran-Turkey- Greece and Pakistan-Afghanistan-Iran-Turkey.

The authorities also replaced Personal identification Secure Comparison Evaluation System (PISCES) by Integrated Border Management System (IBMS) and black-listing of traffickers.

The FIA has vigorously pursued the cases of human smuggling in the courts. Immigration Liaison Office in Muscat has been established while the authorities also installed Human Trafficking Information System (HUTIS) and Case Monitoring System (CMS). Public awareness campaign was also launched in collaboration with NGOs/IGOs, through electronic and print media, by conducting meetings, seminars, documentary, walks, pamphlets, theater in rural and urban areas.

Proposal for establishment of Border Liaison Office (BLO) is underway through SAARC and Dubai Process at Durand line.

FIA has also launched its website www.fia.org.pk to entertain complaints etc Published by HT Syndication with permission from Right Vision News. For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: November 18, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

235 of 492 DOCUMENTS

DUPLICATE
The Statesman (Pakistan)

November 18, 2011 Friday

4,334 human traffickers nabbed in last 30 months

LENGTH: 480 words

DATELINE: ISLAMABAD

ISLAMABAD, Nov. 18 -- Federal Investigation Agency (FIA) has arrested 4,334 human traffickers during last two and half years and adopted numerous measures to eradicate this menace from the society.

The Agency nabbed 1755 human traffickers during 2009, 1779 in 2010 and up to June 2011, 800 human traffickers have been arrested.

According to data available with here on Thursday, due to these measures Pakistan's position was upgraded from Tier-2 Watch List to Tier-2 in US State Department's Trafficking In Persons (TIP) Report-2010 and the same position was maintained in TIP Report-2011. The number of deportation has gradually decreased which is done with the international cooperation.

The FIA is taking stern action against human traffickers/smugglers/facilitators and sub agents. As such it has arrested Most Wanted Traffickers (MWTs) in last three years and their number was 26 in 2009, 16 in 2010 and 2 MWTs were nabbed till June 2011.

Moreover, special campaign for the arrest of Proclaimed Offenders (POs) and Court Absconders (CAs) was also launched to eradicate this menace.

Meanwhile, official sources said measures have also been adopted to bring illegal migration at zero level. FIA's Anti Trafficking Sub-Circle, Gujrat has been established and declared as Police Station.

The other steps are establishment of Anti Trafficking Units at Provincial Police HQs for combating internal human trafficking and establishment of Inter Agency Task Force (IATF). Around 10703 illegal migrants were intercepted in 2008, 5601 in 2009 and 3434 in 2010.

Bilateral Joint Working Groups were also established such as Pakistan- Oman, Pakistan-UK, Pakistan-Turkey and Pakistan-Australia. The Trilateral Group were Pakistan-Iran-Turkey and Pakistan-Turkey- Greece while Quadrilateral Group were Pakistan-Iran-Turkey- Greece and Pakistan-Afghanistan-Iran-Turkey.

The authorities also replaced Personal identification Secure Comparison Evaluation System (PISCES) by Integrated Border Management System (IBMS) and black-listing of traffickers.

The FIA has vigorously pursued the cases of human smuggling in the courts. Immigration Liaison Office in Muscat has been established while the authorities also installed Human Trafficking Information System (HUTIS) and Case Monitoring System (CMS). Public awareness campaign was also launched in collaboration with NGOs/IGOs, through electronic and print media, by conducting meetings, seminars, documentary, walks, pamphlets, theater in rural and urban areas.

Proposal for establishment of Border Liaison Office (BLO) is underway through SAARC and Dubai Process at Durand line. FIA has also launched its website www.fia.org.pk to entertain complaints etc. Published by HT Syndication with permission from The Statesman. For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: November 18, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2011 MASHRIQ GROUP OF NEWSPAPERS
All Rights Reserved

236 of 492 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

November 10, 2011 ThursdayRUBIO INTRODUCES UNITED NATIONS REFORM BILL*BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 575 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by Florida Senator Marco Rubio:

U.S. Senator Marco Rubio, a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, today introduced legislation to encourage comprehensive and long-lasting reforms at the United Nations. In introducing this bill, Rubio issued the following statement:

The United Nations was created with the specific objective of maintaining the peace that followed the end of World War II. More than six decades later, we still need a U.N. with resolve, a U.N. that acts with effectiveness and purpose. Sadly, the U.N.'s persistent ethics and accountability problems are limiting its role. Until the organization addresses these important issues, the stature of the organization will continue to suffer in the eyes of the world.

Examples of this troubling situation abound, from the ongoing efforts to circumvent direct negotiations to end the Israeli-Arab conflict, to the discredited Human Rights Council led by the world's most notorious tyrants and human rights violators, to the proliferation of mandates that have clouded the organization's mission and effectiveness. It is imperative for the UN to modernize along a post-Cold War consensus based on transparency, effective promotion of human rights, free enterprise and non-proliferation.

The UN needs fundamental reform, and America is the best-suited and greatest hope to accomplish all that is needed to help the organization live up to its founding charter. I believe these measures should guide us in improving this institution.

If enacted, Rubios legislation, which is a companion bill to Congresswoman Ileana Ros-Lehtinen's House proposal, would accomplish the following:

Allow the U.S. to fund only UN agencies and programs that advance U.S. interests and values, resulting in greater competition among UN entities for funding that would increase transparency and effectiveness.

Authorize the Government Accountability Office (GAO) to investigate and audit the use of U.S. contributions to the UN.

Prohibit U.S. contributions to the UN from being used for any purpose other than the specific purposes for which it was made available by Congress.

Firmly establish U.S. policy on various issues relating to the UN, including transparency, reform, Security Council expansion, terrorism, anti-Semitism and the unfair treatment of Israel.

Withholds U.S. contributions from any UN agency or program that upgrades the status of the Palestinian observer mission outside a negotiated settlement with Israel.

Conditions U.S. membership on and funding of the UN Human Rights Council on the Council's adoption of reforms barring membership of countries subject to Security Council sanctions, under Security Council-mandated human rights investigations, states sponsors of terrorism, countries of particular concern for religious freedom violations, or that have been designated as Tier 3 for human trafficking violations.

Makes it U.S. policy to lead a high-level diplomatic campaign to revoke and repudiate the Goldstone Report and its follow-on measures by the UN General Assembly.

Withholds U.S. funding from any part of the UNs flawed Durban process, which has been hijacked by rogue regimes and used to advance an anti-Israel, anti-Semitic, anti-Western, anti-freedom agenda.

Conditions U.S. funding to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA) providing assistance to Palestinians refugees until UNRWA meets certain safeguards against terrorist links.

LOAD-DATE: November 10, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2011 States News Service

STARRED 237 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Asian News International (ANI)

November 6, 2011 Sunday

Human trafficking needs to be stopped

BYLINE: ANI

LENGTH: 882 words

New Delhi, Nov. 6 (ANI): Sajda Khatoon was 15 years old when she went missing from her home in Jaitpura, a small village in Uttar Pradesh's Varanasi District. That was four years ago. The child had left no trace.

Today, her mother Momina waits clueless, looking for reasons that may have led to her disappearance. What she is fairly certain of is that her daughter was kidnapped.

In that frantic moment, Momina reflects, the police was the only help she could think of turning to. Then, she had been optimistic. Opinions changed rapidly when she approached them for lodging the First Information Report.

Adding insult to injury, the officer in charge had asked her if Sajda had run away from home willingly. "It took us three months to convince the police that my daughter had not gone missing of her own volition," says Momina. The first 48-hour window, crucial for recovering missing persons, especially children, had been lost.

Around that time, though searching for clues in and around her village, Momina stumbled upon important evidence 1200 km. away. The police had rescued a thirteen-year-old girl, a native of a neighbouring district, from a brothel in Mumbai and brought her back home. She narrated her kidnapping, identifying a local woman as the kidnapper. The child was taken to Mumbai and forced into the flesh trade. Crucially for Momina, the girl also claimed that she had seen a drugged Sajda in her kidnapper's house.

Hoping to trace their daughter with this one clue, the family acted spontaneously and contacted their Mumbai-based relatives who walked through the so-called red light district of the city hoping against hope to spot Sajda. Where police was supposed to be at the fore, Sajda's under resourced family, with their faith already shaken up by the uniform bearers, took the charge of the investigation. Why Varanasi Police did not use the substantially resourced Mumbai Police to help in following up the lead remains a moot point.

Momina's case is not an eye opener, or even unusual. Despite its clandestine nature, trafficking has a stronghold in our country, proof of which is its shameful inclusion in the Tier II list of the United Nations, which includes countries unsuccessful in combating human trafficking. Forced labour, prostitution or domestic work become the working arena for adolescents who dreamt of studying, enjoying, living their dreams. The parents go through the same torment.

Besides abduction, there are other roads that lead to child trafficking. Often lured by promises of a better employment, children and their families fall into the trap and agree to migrate to places far from their homeland, the consequences of which are still to be realised by the government and the policy makers.

"These children cater to the demands of labour for a number of industries like agriculture, domestic work, child marriage and prostitution. Often, runaway children become victims of organised begging, pick-pocketing and drug peddling rackets," said Yogita Verma Saigal, Director, CRY (Child Rights and You).

A report released by the US Department of State in 2010 defines India as the "World Hub" in human trafficking related to prostitution and forced labour. Over 1.2 million children in India are trapped in human trafficking as child prostitutes.

But these statistics would seem to be modest compared to the figures of those involved in this horrendous business - 100 million people in India contribute to the trafficking-related activities. With 90 percent of trafficking transpiring is "intra-country", Orissa, Jharkhand, Chhattisgarh and Madhya Pradesh are the worst affected.

The cases are more severe in flood-affected states like Bihar. Studies show a spurt in human trafficking in the aftermath of a disaster as traffickers prey on defenceless children.

There are no easy solutions. The first, and easier to execute, step is prevention. As a society, we need to be more vigilant. Tracing and reporting incidences of child labour, especially in the metros that are the destination points for major child trafficking routes, go a long way. Coupled with prompt registration and investigation processes by the police bring benefits during the first 48-hour window, crucial for rescue operations to be successful. An FIR ensures the case is brought before a court bench.

Traffickers are systematic and planned; no wonder it is called an organized crime. The Government needs to be aware of what they are up against to combat trafficking. The national electronic database needs to be harnessed so that missing children can be traced across states.

The recovery from a kidnapping is a long and arduous journey for the child. Yet, the rehabilitation process leaves much to be desired, especially medical and psycho-social aid for rescued children. The family too needs to be counselled so that the child doesn't fall into the trap of the traffickers again.

The Charkha Communication Development network feels that India needs to recognize the seriousness of the issue of missing children. Collectively demands for adequate human, material and financial resources can lead to establishing a streamlined system for tracing missing children. For mothers like Momina, still waiting for her child to return home, it is the least a nation can do. By Priya Zutshi (ANI)

LOAD-DATE: November 15, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: 239

238 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Congressional Documents and Publications

November 2, 2011

House Oversight and Government Reform Subcommittee on Technology, Inter-government Relations and Procurement Reform Hearing;
"Are Government Contractors Exploiting Workers Overseas?";
Testimony by Kenneth Moorefield, Deputy Inspector General for Special Plans and Operations U.S. Department of Defense

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 2264 words

Chairman Lankford, Ranking Member Connolly, and distinguished members of the Subcommittee on Technology, Information Policy, Intergovernmental Relations and Procurement Reform:

Thank you for this opportunity to discuss past and ongoing efforts by the Department of Defense (DoD) Office of Inspector General (DoD IG) in the area of combating trafficking in persons (CTIP). The DoD IG previously presented testimony on oversight efforts concerning the topic of human trafficking in 2004 and again in 2006.

Completed DoD IG Efforts

DoD IG initiated its first assessment of DoD CTIP as a result of a May 31, 2002, request made by thirteen Members of Congress to the Secretary of Defense seeking a "thorough, global and extensive" investigation into the publicized allegation that U.S. military leadership in Korea had been implicitly condoning sex slavery at the hands of traffickers.

In response to those Congressional concerns, the DoD IG initiated an assessment project to assess efforts to combat human trafficking within the United States Forces-Korea. In addition, DoD criminal investigations of DoD contractors underway during this period led to an expanded assessment focus incorporating the European Command theater of operations, specifically its activities in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Kosovo.¹ The two assessments recommended that the Secretary of Defense issue a policy statement that clearly and unambiguously set forth DoD opposition to any activities promoting, supporting, or sanctioning human trafficking, which the Undersecretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness subsequently did. In addition, DoD established annual CTIP awareness training for all Service members and DoD civilians, which has been in effect since 2004. With respect to the TIP issues raised concerning Korea, the Command took multiple actions to prohibit and prevent US military, DoD civilian, and DoD contractor personnel from patronizing establishments it had declared off-limits due to reports of forced labor or commercial sex.

In 2005, the DoD IG initiated an evaluation of CTIP efforts across DoD in further response to the 2002 request from Members of Congress. The resulting report, issued in November 2006, recommended that the Office of the Secretary of Defense, the Military Services and Combatant Commands develop CTIP policy and program guidance, and that the military commands evaluate the effectiveness of their CTIP awareness training. In response to the report, in 2007, the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness issued DoD Instruction 2200.01, "Combating Trafficking in Persons," that established policy and assigned CTIP program responsibilities across the Department.

The Under Secretary also created and filled the position of DoD CTIP Program Manager within that office. Additionally, the CTIP program officer for each DoD Component reports on CTIP training metrics and effectiveness to the DoD CTIP Program Manager within the office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness.

The most recent oversight efforts conducted by the DoD IG were in response to Public Law 110-457, the "William Wilberforce Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2008," signed on December 23, 2008. Section 232 of the Act required the Inspectors General of DoD, State and USAID to "...investigate a sample of ... contracts, or subcontracts at any tier, under which there is a heightened risk that a contractor may engage, knowingly or unknowingly, in acts related to trafficking in persons...." The Act also required the respective Inspectors General to submit a report to Congress, no later than January 15, for three consecutive years beginning in 2010.

The DoD IG consulted with the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons and selected for assessment four Combatant Commands with overseas responsibilities and contracting presence: U.S. Pacific, U.S. Central, and U.S. European and Africa Commands, in that order. To date, the DoD IG has issued two annual reports - covering the Pacific and Central Commands - and completed fieldwork for a third report on the European and Africa Commands, which will be issued in January 2012.ⁿ² The contract sample in each case included all construction and service contracts with a place of performance outside the United States, a period of performance in FY 2009 or later, and with a total contract value of $5 million or greater. This provided a reasonable data set which particularly focused on labor-intensive contracts.

The U.S. Pacific Command CTIP report, issued on January 15, 2010, was based on a sample of 99 contracts which had a place of performance in the Republic of Korea, Japan, and the Territory of Guam. We found Federal Acquisition Regulation (FAR) clause 52.222-50, "Combating Trafficking in Persons," present in 93 percent of the contracts we reviewed. However, 42 percent of those clauses were added shortly before the site visit. Further, the team found that the Command's contract quality assurance reviews did not specifically include reviews of contractor TIP compliance and/or violations, and that contracting offices did not have access to an effective DoD process for obtaining TIP violation information from DoD criminal investigative organizations.

The DoD IG recommended that the Director, Defense Procurement, and Acquisition Policy modify widely-used contract writing software to ensure that the FAR CTIP clause was automatically included in contracts or solicitations. Also recommended was that the Defense Federal Acquisition Regulations System (DFARS) guidance be updated to require CTIP oversight in contract quality assurance plans. The Director initiated the modification and had it distributed in 2010. And, in January 2011, the Director also revised the relevant DFARS guidance.

The DoD IG team also determined that contracting officers lacked the benefit of an effective process for obtaining information concerning TIP-related violations. DoD Instruction 2200.01, "Combating Trafficking in Persons (CTIP)", September 15, 2010, requires the Secretaries of the Military Departments and Commanders of the Combatant Commands to "provide information on all known TIP cases to the USD (PandR), DoD Program Manager." However, providing timely communication of substantiated and publicly releasable TIP-related indictment and conviction information to DoD contracting organizations remains a systemic challenge.

The report on U.S. Central Command, issued January 15, 2011, was based on a sample of 369 contracts with place of performance in the Republic of Iraq, the State of Kuwait, the State of Qatar, and the Kingdom of Bahrain. A CTIP clause was present in 79 percent of the contracts reviewed.

The team also found that the U.S. Central Command Contracting Command had published a supplement for inclusion in all service and construction contracts within the Command's area of responsibility to strengthen the FAR CTIP clause. This was in response to allegations that some DoD contractors were providing poor living conditions or withholding employee passports.

However, the DoD IG team also identified a significant number of contracts where the Command supplement had actually replaced the required pre-existing FAR clause. To correct this, the team recommended that the Commander, U.S. Central Command Contracting Command modify their guidance to clarify proper usage of both the FAR and Command supplement CTIP clauses. The Commander concurred and issued modified guidance in September 2011.

The team also identified examples of proactive action taken by two U.S. contracting commands in Kuwait, both of which had incorporated a requirement to include CTIP compliance in contract quality assurance reviews. Additionally, Army Contracting Command-Kuwait had developed and implemented a CTIP questionnaire, translated into five common employee languages, as part of quality assurance audits.

In addition, the Defense Contract Management Agency (DCMA) in Kuwait had included CTIP-focused questions into their Theater Quality Plan quality assurance contract audits which reviewed contractor knowledge and understanding of CTIP clause requirements. DCMA representatives also provided reports based on periodic health and sanitation inspections they had conducted of employee camps in Iraq. In 2010, the DoD IG team visited several employee camps run by subcontractors in Iraq; the employees interviewed verified that DCMA personnel checked conditions on a regular basis. The team did not observe any conditions in the camps that would constitute a CTIP violation. The DoD IG team was unable to review conditions in Afghanistan in time to meet the January 15, 2011, publication date for the report of the assessment of U.S. Central Command. However, we are planning to conduct this evaluation in FY 2012.

In 2009, 2010, and 2011, the team requested that DoD criminal investigative organizations provide TIP-related criminal investigative summary data for each of these years. To date, these requests have resulted in reports of only two alleged TIP incidents. In both cases, the contractor had dismissed the offending employee.

Ongoing Assessments

The next DoD IG CTIP report, in compliance with Public Law 110-457, will be issued in January 2012. It will be based on a sample of approximately 250 contracts with place of performance in the U.S. European and Africa Commands. In September 2011, the team conducted CTIP field evaluations of the Commands' headquarters and military installations in Germany and Italy for this assessment.

In addition to and concurrent with the multi-year review of contracts required by PL 110-457, the DoD IG has self-initiated an assessment of DoD Component CTIP program compliance and performance. As of this date, we have reviewed CTIP policies, procedures, awareness, and implementation in over 70 DoD organizations, including responsible officials in the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness, and headquarters and major subordinate commands of Military Services, Defense Agencies and Combatant Commands. At each location, the team interviewed:

- . commanders and staff responsible for the CTIP program;
- . law enforcement personnel and legal counsels;
- . contracting officers, specialists, and quality assurance specialists, contracting officer representatives; and
- . representatives of contracting firms, and when possible, their employees.

In addition, at each location visited, the DoD IG team interviewed contracting officials, none of whom reported that they were aware of any TIP-related offense that had been brought to the attention of a DoD contracting office.

DoD Non-Appropriated Fund Organizations

During the DoD IG CTIP assessment of the U.S. Pacific Command, in 2009, the team noted that non-appropriated fund entities were not required to include the FAR CTIP clause in their contracts. Therefore, we included an assessment of the Navy Exchange (NEX) and Army and Air Force Exchange Service (AAFES) CTIP policy and procedures within the reviews of the U.S. Central Command and the U.S. European and Africa Commands.

The review of the NEX operation in the Kingdom of Bahrain determined that the Command had required all managers, associates, and vendors to take CTIP training.

Further, in December 2010, NEX Command headquarters in Virginia reported having submitted recommended changes to a proposed update of DoD Instruction 4105.71, "Nonappropriated Fund (NAF) Procurement Procedure," which would require inclusion of a CTIP clause in all non-appropriated fund contracts. As of October 2011, the revision process was still ongoing.

The review of AAFES Europe identified that the Commander had issued a Manpower Associate "Bill of Rights," available in English and eight other languages, that subordinate organizations were directed to post on employee bulletin boards for easy access. The Commander also had established an employee passport possession policy to ensure that "contractors do not withhold the passports of TCNs [Third Country Nationals] working in our facilities."

In Kuwait, the DoD IG team observed AAFES passport checks and employee interviews first-hand while accompanying a contracting officer representative to several facilities. No CTIP violations were observed. The team also received a detailed briefing from the AAFES legal counsel outlining several additional TIP-related incidents and the contract remedies applied including show cause notices and cure letters.

Conclusion

The DoD IG remains committed to providing oversight support of the U.S. Government's "zero tolerance policy" against trafficking in persons. We will continue to evaluate the related DoD programs for compliance.

I thank you again for this opportunity to update you on DoD IG oversight of DoD actions to combat trafficking in persons.

n1 "Assessment of DoD Efforts to Combat Trafficking in Persons, Phase I - United States Forces Korea," July 2003, www.dodig.mil/fo/Foia/H03L88433128PhaseI.pdf, and "Assessment of DoD Efforts to Combat Trafficking in Persons, Phase II - Bosnia-Herzegovina and Kosovo," December 2003, www.dodig.mil/fo/Foia/HT-Phase_II.pdf.

n2 IE-2010-001, "Evaluation of DoD Contracts Regarding Combating Trafficking in Persons," January 15, 2010, and SPO-2011-002, "Evaluation of DoD Contracts regarding Combating Trafficking in Persons: U.S. Central Command," January 18, 2011. For copies of the reports see <http://www.dodig.mil/Inspections/IE/Reports.htm>.

Read this original document at: http://oversight.house.gov/images/stories/Testimony/11-2-11_Moorefield_TechIP_Tesitmony.pdf

LOAD-DATE: November 4, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: COSHCB

Copyright 2011 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

239 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

CQ Congressional Testimony

November 2, 2011 Wednesday

OVERSEAS WORKER EXPLOITATION;
COMMITTEE: HOUSE OVERSIGHT AND GOVERNMENT REFORM;
SUBCOMMITTEE: TECHNOLOGY, INFORMATION POLICY, INTER-
GOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS AND PROCUREMENT REFORM

SECTION: CAPITOL HILL HEARING TESTIMONY

LENGTH: 2204 words

TESTIMONY-BY: KENNETH P. MOOREFIELD, DEPUTY INSPECTOR GENERAL

AFFILIATION: DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE INSPECTOR GENERAL

Statement of Kenneth P. Moorefield Deputy Inspector General, Special Plans and Operations Department of Defense Inspector General

Committee on House Oversight and Government Reform Subcommittee on Technology, Information Policy, Intergovernmental Relations and Procurement Reform,

November 2, 2011

Chairman Lankford, Ranking Member Connolly, and distinguished members of the Subcommittee on Technology, Information Policy, Intergovernmental Relations and Procurement Reform:

Thank you for this opportunity to discuss past and ongoing efforts by the Department of Defense (DoD) Office of Inspector General (DoD IG) in the area of combating trafficking in persons (CTIP). The DoD IG previously presented testimony on oversight efforts concerning the topic of human trafficking in 2004 and again in 2006.

Completed DoD IG Efforts

DoD IG initiated its first assessment of DoD CTIP as a result of a May 31, 2002, request made by thirteen Members of Congress to the Secretary of Defense seeking a "thorough, global and extensive" investigation into the publicized allegation that U.S. military leadership in Korea had been implicitly condoning sex slavery at the hands of traffickers.

In response to those Congressional concerns, the DoD IG initiated an assessment project to assess efforts to combat human trafficking within the United States Forces-Korea. In addition, DoD criminal investigations of DoD contractors underway during this period led to an expanded assessment focus incorporating the European Command theater of operations, specifically its activities in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Kosovo.¹ The two assessments recommended that the Secretary of Defense issue a policy statement that clearly and unambiguously set forth DoD opposition to any activities promoting, supporting, or sanctioning human trafficking, which the Undersecretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness subsequently did. In addition, DoD established annual CTIP awareness training for all Service members and DoD civilians, which has been in effect since 2004. With respect to the TIP issues raised concerning Korea, the Command took multiple actions to prohibit and prevent US military, DoD civilian, and DoD contractor personnel from patronizing establishments it had declared off-limits due to reports of forced labor or commercial sex.

In 2005, the DoD IG initiated an evaluation of CTIP efforts across DoD in further response to the 2002 request from Members of Congress. The resulting report, issued in November 2006, recommended that the Office of the Secretary of Defense, the Military Services and Combatant Commands develop CTIP policy and program guidance, and that the military commands evaluate the effectiveness of their CTIP awareness training. In response to the report, in 2007, the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness issued DoD Instruction 2200.01, "Combating Trafficking in Persons," that established policy and assigned CTIP program responsibilities across the Department.

The Under Secretary also created and filled the position of DoD CTIP Program Manager within that office. Additionally, the CTIP program officer for each DoD Component reports on CTIP training metrics and effectiveness to the DoD CTIP Program Manager within the office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness.

The most recent oversight efforts conducted by the DoD IG were in response to Public Law 110-457, the "William Wilberforce Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2008," signed on December 23, 2008. Section 232 of the Act required the Inspectors General of DoD, State and USAID to "...investigate a sample of ... contracts, or subcontracts at any tier, under which there is a heightened risk that a contractor may engage, knowingly or unknowingly, in acts related to trafficking in persons..." The Act also required the respective Inspectors General to submit a report to Congress, no later than January 15, for three consecutive years beginning in 2010.

The DoD IG consulted with the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons and selected for assessment four Combatant Commands with overseas responsibilities and contracting presence: U.S. Pacific, U.S. Central, and U.S. European and Africa Commands, in that order. To date, the DoD IG has issued two annual reports - covering the Pacific and Central Commands - and completed fieldwork for a third report on the European and Africa Commands, which will be issued in January 2012. The contract sample in each case included all construction and service contracts with a place of performance outside the United States, a period of performance in FY 2009 or later, and with a total contract value of $5 million or greater. This provided a reasonable data set which particularly focused on labor-intensive contracts.

The U.S. Pacific Command CTIP report, issued on January 15, 2010, was based on a sample of 99 contracts which had a place of performance in the Republic of Korea, Japan, and the Territory of Guam. We found Federal Acquisition Regulation (FAR) clause 52.222- 50, "Combating Trafficking in Persons," present in 93 percent of the contracts we reviewed. However, 42 percent of those clauses were added shortly before the site visit. Further, the team found that the Command's contract quality assurance reviews did not specifically include reviews of contractor TIP compliance and/or violations, and that contracting offices did not have access to an effective DoD process for obtaining TIP violation information from DoD criminal investigative organizations.

The DoD IG recommended that the Director, Defense Procurement, and Acquisition Policy modify widely-used contract writing software to ensure that the FAR CTIP clause was automatically included in contracts or solicitations. Also recommended was that the Defense Federal Acquisition Regulations System (DFARS) guidance be updated to require CTIP oversight in contract quality assurance plans. The Director initiated the modification and had it distributed in 2010. And, in January 2011, the Director also revised the relevant DFARS guidance.

The DoD IG team also determined that contracting officers lacked the benefit of an effective process for obtaining information concerning TIP-related violations. DoD Instruction 2200.01, "Combating Trafficking in Persons (CTIP)", September 15, 2010, requires the Secretaries of the Military Departments and Commanders of the Combatant Commands to "provide information on all known TIP cases to the USD (P&R), DoD Program Manager." However, providing timely communication of substantiated and publicly releasable TIP-related indictment and conviction information to DoD contracting organizations remains a systemic challenge.

The report on U.S. Central Command, issued January 15, 2011, was based on a sample of 369 contracts with place of performance in the Republic of Iraq, the State of Kuwait, the State of Qatar, and the Kingdom of Bahrain. A CTIP clause was present in 79 percent of the contracts reviewed.

The team also found that the U.S. Central Command Contracting Command had published a supplement for inclusion in all service and construction contracts within the Command's area of responsibility to strengthen the FAR CTIP clause. This was in response to allegations that some DoD contractors were providing poor living conditions or withholding employee passports.

However, the DoD IG team also identified a significant number of contracts where the Command supplement had actually replaced the required pre-existing FAR clause. To correct this, the team recommended that the Commander, U.S. Central Command Contracting Command modify their guidance to clarify proper usage of both the FAR and Command supplement CTIP clauses. The Commander concurred and issued modified guidance in September 2011.

The team also identified examples of proactive action taken by two U.S. contracting commands in Kuwait, both of which had incorporated a requirement to include CTIP compliance in contract quality assurance reviews. Additionally,

Army Contracting Command- Kuwait had developed and implemented a CTIP questionnaire, translated into five common employee languages, as part of quality assurance audits.

In addition, the Defense Contract Management Agency (DCMA) in Kuwait had included CTIP-focused questions into their Theater Quality Plan quality assurance contract audits which reviewed contractor knowledge and understanding of CTIP clause requirements. DCMA representatives also provided reports based on periodic health and sanitation inspections they had conducted of employee camps in Iraq. In 2010, the DoD IG team visited several employee camps run by subcontractors in Iraq; the employees interviewed verified that DCMA personnel checked conditions on a regular basis. The team did not observe any conditions in the camps that would constitute a CTIP violation.

The DoD IG team was unable to review conditions in Afghanistan in time to meet the January 15, 2011, publication date for the report of the assessment of U.S. Central Command. However, we are planning to conduct this evaluation in FY 2012.

In 2009, 2010, and 2011, the team requested that DoD criminal investigative organizations provide TIP-related criminal investigative summary data for each of these years. To date, these requests have resulted in reports of only two alleged TIP incidents. In both cases, the contractor had dismissed the offending employee.

Ongoing Assessments

The next DoD IG CTIP report, in compliance with Public Law 110- 457, will be issued in January 2012. It will be based on a sample of approximately 250 contracts with place of performance in the U.S. European and Africa Commands. In September 2011, the team conducted CTIP field evaluations of the Commands' headquarters and military installations in Germany and Italy for this assessment.

In addition to and concurrent with the multi-year review of contracts required by PL 110-457, the DoD IG has self-initiated an assessment of DoD Component CTIP program compliance and performance. As of this date, we have reviewed CTIP policies, procedures, awareness, and implementation in over 70 DoD organizations, including responsible officials in the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness, and headquarters and major subordinate commands of Military Services, Defense Agencies and Combatant Commands. At each location, the team interviewed:

commanders and staff responsible for the CTIP program;

law enforcement personnel and legal counsels;

contracting officers, specialists, and quality assurance specialists, contracting officer representatives; and representatives of contracting firms, and when possible, their employees. In addition, at each location visited, the DoD IG team interviewed contracting officials, none of whom reported that they were aware of any TIP-related offense that had been brought to the attention of a DoD contracting office.

DoD Non-Appropriated Fund Organizations

During the DoD IG CTIP assessment of the U.S. Pacific Command, in 2009, the team noted that non-appropriated fund entities were not required to include the FAR CTIP clause in their contracts. Therefore, we included an assessment of the Navy Exchange (NEX) and Army and Air Force Exchange Service (AAFES) CTIP policy and procedures within the reviews of the U.S. Central Command and the U.S. European and Africa Commands.

The review of the NEX operation in the Kingdom of Bahrain determined that the Command had required all managers, associates, and vendors to take CTIP training.

Further, in December 2010, NEX Command headquarters in Virginia reported having submitted recommended changes to a proposed update of DoD Instruction 4105.71, "Nonappropriated Fund (NAF) Procurement Procedure," which would require inclusion of a CTIP clause in all non-appropriated fund contracts. As of October 2011, the revision process was still ongoing.

The review of AAFES Europe identified that the Commander had issued a Manpower Associate "Bill of Rights," available in English and eight other languages, that subordinate organizations were directed to post on employee bulletin boards for easy access. The Commander also had established an employee passport possession policy to ensure that "contractors do not withhold the passports of TCNs [Third Country Nationals] working in our facilities."

In Kuwait, the DoD IG team observed AAFES passport checks and employee interviews first-hand while accompanying a contracting officer representative to several facilities. No CTIP violations were observed. The team also received a detailed briefing from the AAFES legal counsel outlining several additional TIP-related incidents and the contract remedies applied including show cause notices and cure letters.

Conclusion

The DoD IG remains committed to providing oversight support of the U.S. Government's "zero tolerance policy" against trafficking in persons. We will continue to evaluate the related DoD programs for compliance.

I thank you again for this opportunity to update you on DoD IG oversight of DoD actions to combat trafficking in persons.

LOAD-DATE: November 2, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Congressional Testimony

Copyright 2011 Congressional Quarterly, Inc.
All Rights Reserved.

240 of 492 DOCUMENTS

The National

November 2, 2011 Wednesday

UAE winning battle against sex trafficking

LENGTH: 622 words

But country is criticised for sometimes sending victims to jail or deporting them

DUBAI // The UAE has made "dramatic" strides against sex trafficking, but needs to do more to curb labour abuses, a top US state department official has said.

It followed a call in his department's annual report for the country to be more active in investigating and prosecuting unscrupulous recruitment agents and abusive employers.

For its part, the UAE says it is implementing a plan to combat forced labour and human trafficking, and is in the process of amending its anti-trafficking laws.

Luis CdeBaca, the ambassador-at-large from the US Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, praised the country's "very positive and dramatic approach to sex trafficking in the last couple of years", noting the number of prosecutions had jumped from 20 to 60 in a couple of years as "a result of political will and good structures".

"We encouraged there be increased police and prosecution attention paid to the problem of labour trafficking," he said after an official visit to the UAE where he met with the foreign, labour and interior officials.

"We think that's a journey the UAE would be good to take ... we would hate to see that all of the resources are so focused on prostitution that someone who is being abused in a different sector goes unprotected."

He said domestic and construction workers were most vulnerable to labour abuse.

The annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report ranks 184 countries in different tiers based on their anti-trafficking efforts.

This year's report, issued in June, again put the UAE in the second tier, denoting that it does not fully meet America's anti-trafficking standards.

Two years ago the UAE was upgraded from the tier two watch list - denoting potential demotion to tier three - in recognition of the progress it had made.

The report noted that Dubai had set up a special court to hear human trafficking cases, and opened two new shelters for victims.

However, it criticised the government's inability to recognise people forced into labour as trafficked victims. It also found victims of trafficking may have been jailed, fined or deported from the Emirates.

The UAE needed to do more to prevent sex tourism by Emiratis, saying it was important for the country to "police its citizens" no matter where they travel, he said. The report criticised the country for failing to reduce the demand for prostitution within its borders, or to curb child sex tourism by UAE nationals.

He also called for legal reforms and an overhaul of the sponsorship system.

Government officials, however, said they were committed to dealing with all forms of exploitation, including labour trafficking.

Dr Saeed Al Ghufli, the coordinator of the National Committee to Combat Human Trafficking, said protection and assistance for victims was improving each year, and that the UAE was making "steady progress" on the issue.

The Ministry of Labour had "approved a work plan to combat forced labour and human trafficking", he said.

An amendment to its anti-trafficking law that would "emphasise the protection and repatriation of victims, thus bringing the law more in line with the Palermo Protocol" is with the Government for consideration.

"The UAE welcomes direct discussion and collaboration with other countries and international organisations that share the vision of stemming the tide of human trafficking," he added.

The Indian mission said that even as the UAE was taking steps to protect workers, India had also, as a labour-supplying nation, tightened its laws and clamped down on recruitment agents.

As a result, said MK Lokesh, the Indian ambassador, the number of complaints from Indian workers had fallen.

pkannan@thenational.ae

LOAD-DATE: November 11, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: 818

Copyright 2011 Abu Dhabi Media Company
Syndigate.info, Al bawaba.com
All Rights Reserved

241 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Trend Daily News (Azerbaijan)

November 1, 2011 Tuesday 2:54 PM GMT +4

Tajikistan and Kazakhstan commended for progress against trafficking in persons

SECTION: KAZAKHSTANLENGTH: 535 words

Tajikistan and Kazakhstan have made progress in their efforts to combat illegal human trafficking and both countries were upgraded by the U.S. Department of State from Tier 2 Watch List to Tier 2 in the annual 2011 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report, according to the U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for South and Central Asia Robert Blake, CA-NEWS reported referring to Silk Road Newline.

In the TIP Report that currently ranks 184 countries, the U.S. Department of State places each country onto one of three tiers based on the extent of their governments' efforts to comply with the "minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking". Tier 1 is the highest ranking, Tier 2 is the second highest followed by Tier 2 Watch List and Tier 3.

This year, Tajikistan and Kazakhstan were placed in the same Tier 2 category as Japan, Switzerland, Singapore, Greece, Israel, Turkey, Hungary, Iceland and Bahrain and other countries that are "making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance" with anti-trafficking standards. Countries like China and Russia remained in the Tier 2 Watch List category among "countries whose governments do not fully comply" with these standards.

"Tajikistan is another country that has made commendable progress against trafficking and Secretary Clinton noted that on her last trip there last weekend," Blake told U.S. lawmakers last week speaking at a congressional hearing held by the House Subcommittee on Africa, Global Health and Human Rights.

"In 2011, Tajikistan was upgraded to Tier 2 for addressing the use of forced labor in its annual cotton harvest through efforts such as accrediting and assisting NGOs to monitor the harvest. They also prosecuted and convicted the first trafficking offenders under the new anti-trafficking provision," Blake said.

"Kazakhstan also was elevated to Tier 2 this year. The Kazakh government increased law enforcement efforts against human trafficking," he said. "It passed a law strengthening penalties for convicted child sex trafficking offenders, and the Ministry of Internal Affairs has drafted a law that allows trafficking victims to have a legal advocate that expands the scope of trafficking-related crimes and increases legal protections for minors subject to forced labor."

According to Rep. Chris Smith (R-NJ), Chairman of the House Subcommittee on Africa, Global Health and Human Rights and the author of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 that mandated the annual human trafficking report, the TIP Report "has been an incredibly effective diplomatic tool" and "essential to the ongoing successes by the United States Government in combating modern day slavery both at home and abroad."

"However, the battle is far from over. According to the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Human Trafficking - created by the TPVA - more than 12 million people worldwide are trafficking victims," Rep. Smith said. "Other estimates put the number of victims as high as 27 million. Today we know that human trafficking is the third most lucrative criminal activity in the world. According to the International Labor Organization (ILO), human traffickers make profits in excess of $31 billion a year."

LOAD-DATE: November 1, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

Copyright 2011 Trend News Agency
All Rights Reserved

242 of 492 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

October 28, 2011 Friday

Taiwan hosts anti-trafficking workshop

LENGTH: 453 words

Text of unattributed article from the "Taiwan" page headlined "Human Trafficking Forum Urges Int'l Partnerships" published by Taiwan newspaper The China Post website on 27 October

The China Post--Experts from around the globe gathered and exchanged tactics and logistics on battling crimes against human rights yesterday, at the 2011 International Workshop on Strategies for Combating Human Trafficking, in Taipei.

Taiwan held its fifth annual anti-human trafficking workshop at the Taipei Howard International House yesterday, this time aiming to strengthen international cooperation on the basis of the four Ps -- prosecution, protection, prevention, and partnership -- with the focus laid on the last P.

Human trafficking is a crime that crosses national borders and has long been of global concern. As defined by the U.S. Department of Homeland Security, such actions are exploitation-based, and always involve actions induced by force, fraud, or coercion. In the case of commercial sex acts, "sex trafficking;" for the purpose of subjection to involuntary servitude or slavery, "forced labor."

Cracking human trafficking rings is highly challenging without international collaboration. For one, victims often fear cooperating with authorities and in many cases would simply prefer to return to their home countries. If a victim is willing to speak up, in addition to the language and cultural barriers, the necessary asylum, psychological and health treatments all need to be taken care of. Comprehensive global partnerships are vital to mitigate such challenges.

Taiwan has also seen cases of human trafficking, Premier Wu Den-yih pointed out at the closing ceremony. Wu pointed out that "In the olden days, families would sell their daughters for prostitution in times of economic struggles."

The nation has long been striving to counter attack. Beginning from November 2006 when the "Human Trafficking Prevention Action Plan" was approved by the Executive Yuan, a series of measures have been taken against the crime, and in June 2009 the "Human Trafficking Prevention Act" was finally authorized.

Institution and implementation of the act has led Taiwan to leap from the 2006 Tier 2 ranking on the Trafficking in Persons Report (the TIP report), as announced by the U.S. Department of State, to Tier 1 in 2010 and 2011.

While only 32 countries across the globe were ranked as Tier 1, Taiwan and South Korea are the only Asian countries so recognized, Wu said. The government will continue to fight human trafficking through establishing international contracts on the matter, and also through joining forces with domestic non-governmental organizations.

Source: The China Post website, Taipei, in English 1815gmt 27 Oct 11

LOAD-DATE: October 28, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

243 of 492 DOCUMENTS

State Department Documents and Publications

October 28, 2011

The Trafficking in Persons Report 2011: Truth, Trends, and Tier Rankings

SECTION: PUBLIC AFFAIRS DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 2406 words

The Trafficking in Persons Report 2011: Truth, Trends, and Tier Rankings

Testimony

Luis CdeBaca

Ambassador-at-Large, Office To Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons

Statement Before the Subcommittee on Africa, Global Health, and Human Rights of the House Foreign Affairs Committee

Washington, DC

October 27, 2011

Thank you Mr. Chairman, Congressman Payne, and all the members of this committee for the opportunity to testify today. As Congress continues to deliberate this year's reauthorization of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, hearings such as this one are helpful opportunities to discuss the global fight against human trafficking, and in particular one of our government's most important tools in moving that fight forward, the annual Trafficking in Persons Report.

The TIP Report assesses government action around the world against trafficking in persons-that is, all of the activities involved in reducing someone to, or holding them in, a condition of compelled service. The core of this Report is the set of Congressionally-established minimum standards set forth in the TVPA. These standards reflect the definitions and framework to combat trafficking in persons outlined in the United Nations Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, especially Women and Children, known also as the Palermo Protocol.

Following Congress's mandate, the Department of State ranks governments around the world according to these standards and determines a tier ranking based on a government's progress in meeting those standards. The Report comprises those rankings as well as individual country narratives that further explain both the TIP situation on the ground and governmental efforts according to the criteria laid out by Congress. The methodology is sound and transparent-the facts are applied to the law. Any country, whether in Asia or elsewhere, that wants to test this methodology need only assess their efforts against these minimum standards.

Thorough and honest assessments are the benchmark of the TIP Report. Our narratives take into account information from civil society groups, foreign governments, and our own State Department reporting officers who conduct on-the-ground research throughout the year. The review process involves numerous DOS offices so that the final product represents a Department-wide consensus on how well various governments are handling this problem. Beginning last year, a United States country ranking was also included in the Report, because, as Secretary Clinton has said, we should hold ourselves to the same standards as we hold everyone else. Accurate reporting is essential to the effectiveness of the TIP Report as a diplomatic tool, and indeed governments repeatedly cite it as a factor prompting stronger action in response to modern slavery. Sometimes that happens in public-more often in private. And sometimes a government that criticizes the Report and even perhaps mobilizes others against it quietly takes steps to work with us to begin meeting these standards.

What the Report tells us is that no country is immune to this scourge, and that no government is doing a perfect job combating it. The two regions we are addressing today-East Asia and the Pacific, and South and Central Asia-are hit particularly hard by this crime. I'm pleased to be joined today by Assistant Secretary Robert Blake, who leads the Department's South and Central Asian Affairs Bureau, and Joseph Yun, Deputy Assistant Secretary in the Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs. We always say the fight against modern slavery takes political will, and Bob Blake and EAP Assistant Secretary Kurt Campbell are showing that both individually and within their chains of command. My colleagues will discuss in greater detail the progress in these areas and what governments are doing about it, but I'd like to highlight a few of the problems in trends that were discussed in the 2011 TIP Report and continue to be areas of concern.

*Sex trafficking of women and children has not abated and may in fact be increasing in places such as India. Additionally, our findings continue to show that it is local populations, more than Western "sex tourists," that fuel the demand for sex trafficking, and law enforcement needs to address both sectors for prevention to be truly successful. Widening gender gaps in China and India are fueling the demand for young girls as forced brides or for commercial sexual exploitation.

*We know that around the world, forced labor is highly prevalent among migrant populations, and that Asia has the world's largest share of labor migration. Migrants from both the East Asia and Pacific and South and Central Asia regions are subjected to forced labor in recognized destination countries such as Malaysia, Singapore, and the Persian Gulf. More troubling still, much of this abuse takes place under the guise of legal, contractual and temporary work.

*In recent months, concerns over forced labor on fishing fleets have garnered increased attention. Our own research suggests that this is a problem with massive geographic scope, spanning fisheries from Indonesia to New Zealand. And Asian boats are ranging from the Cape of Good Hope to Central America.

*The enslavement of domestic workers from South and East Asia is a significant problem, whether Sri Lankans abused in the Gulf or Indonesians exploited in Malaysia. The International Labor Organization's (ILO) new Convention on Domestic Workers aims at addressing the unique vulnerabilities of this group; we hope that the increased attention on this challenge will lead to governments addressing the needs for justice and services for these victims.

*Definitional confusion among governments in the EAP and SCA regions continues to lead to the conflation of people smuggling and human trafficking. This lack of clarity hinders efforts to find and help victims. When it comes to trafficking, we continue to urge destination governments to shift their focus away from the legality of a migrant. As we know, modern slavery need not involve movement or cross borders.

*Additionally, we continue to push governments to acknowledge that human trafficking is a crime that can involve sex and labor. For instance, the definition of trafficking in the 2005 South Asia Association for Regional Cooperation (SAARC) Convention is not consistent with how the term is defined and addressed in many other prominent international instruments on trafficking in persons from groups such as the Council of Europe and the Organization of American States, and with the primary international treaty on trafficking, the Palermo Protocol. The Convention continues to focus on the concept of trafficking as the movement of women and children for prostitution and fails to address the trafficking of adults or forced labor. We hope that as the region's leaders gather for the SAARC Summit in Male in November, they will work toward bringing the region's conceptual notion of trafficking into conformity with the UN and other regional frameworks.

*We continue to advocate for comprehensive victim care, rather than the "Detain and Deport" model that we too often see in these regions. Protection should not mean inappropriate confinement for victims preparatory to deportation. Indeed, they need to be empowered through the opportunity for economic self-sustainability as well as aftercare and alternatives to deportation.

*We encourage governments of sending and receiving states to explicitly address modern slavery in labor-related memoranda of understanding (MOUs) and to enforce those provisions in an open and transparent manner.

My staff and I, collaborating closely with regional bureaus, will continue to engage governments in these regions in order to bring these issues to their attention, and we will urge them to take positive action in advance of next year's TIP Report.

In addition to the country narratives, the TIP Report includes an introduction that provides a conceptual framework to the struggle against modern slavery. In this year's Report, we show that the first 10 years of the modern anti-trafficking movement have been a decade of development: in countries all over the world, legal structures have been enacted and protection mechanisms have been put in place. However, the number of successful prosecutions seems to have leveled off, services for survivors continue to be inadequate, and victim identification remains a challenge. That's why the 2011

TIP Report described the need for a "decade of delivery," in which governments must be held accountable for delivering on the promises made in recent years. Because structures and results are not the same thing.

The difference between the passage of a law and the effective implementation of a law is political will. We have seen political will succeed. We have seen it in the Philippines, where the Aquino Administration is prioritizing trafficking cases in the court system and pushing through the backlog, delivering on a set of processes and promises that had been moribund at best. We have seen it in other regions; the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) this summer invited Nigerian prosecutors to come to Singapore and share the secrets of their success, providing a unique opportunity for ASEAN members to learn from an African country.

But the reality is that there are places where that political will is weak or nonexistent, and there, victims are most at risk. As the Report shows, some governments merely go through the motions when it comes to fighting modern slavery, and some governments don't do anything at all. A key source of hope for victims and survivors is the work of civil society-non-governmental organizations, international organizations, the faith community, and advocacy groups.

These organizations are made up of people working every day to make the decade of delivery a reality despite the fact that many governments are doing little or nothing at all. These groups are running shelters on dollars a day. They are freeing victims from the most horrific abuse imaginable. They are the women and men on the front line of this fight. But as is often the case in places where poverty and corruption hinder the good intentions of committed people, a lack of resources and capacity are insurmountable roadblocks to those seeking to save victims from exploitation and bring their traffickers to justice.

In addition to our robust diplomatic efforts, this is another area where the Trafficking in Persons Office is making a difference, though our International Programs foreign assistance funds. In the last two years, my office received 998 applications for assistance from 546 organizations requesting a total of $547 million. We know that it will never be possible to give every organization the help they want. And we know that we have a responsibility to be responsible custodians of taxpayer dollars. That's why our office has implemented a rigorous and transparent review process to ensure that every cent of our foreign assistance appropriation is spent responsibly and is put to the use where it will do the most good.

To answer the requests for $547 million which we received through funding applications-the vast majority of which described projects of tremendous merit- our office administered a foreign assistance budget for the last two years of $39.1 million. Based on an estimate that there are up to 27 million victims of trafficking worldwide, that funding total provides a little more than 72 cents per victim per year. This year's solicitation is out, and we hope to receive innovative and impactful proposals.

The country-specific tier rankings and diagnostic assessments included in the TIP Report help us determine where we should be allocating these funds. To maximize the impact of our efforts, we identify priority countries for programming. We generally target our foreign assistance to Tier 3, Tier 2 Watch List, and, in some cases, Tier 2 countries. This linkage demonstrates that the Report isn't just an exercise in finger-pointing at countries that aren't doing a good job, but is an important tool for determining where our foreign assistance dollars can be used most effectively.

These are not places where a wealth of resources is available to fight human trafficking. If we were to suddenly pull the plug on the projects we support, there wouldn't be another organization waiting in the wings to take over the provision of victim services. There wouldn't be another source of funding to keep training prosecutors and police officers. In many countries, if the little funding we are able to give were to disappear, those programs would simply cease to exist. In those places, there would be no place for victims and survivors to go.

It was four months ago today that we released the 2011 TIP Report and that Secretary Clinton called for a decade of delivery. If the Trafficking in Persons Office is no longer able to stand with those organizations making a difference on the ground, the decade of delivery is already in danger of failing. If the antitrafficking movement loses the fight in Washington, in the halls of Congress, we could lose that fight everywhere else as well.

We cannot balance the budget on the backs of trafficking victims. If we try to do so, from some misplaced sense of proportion with across-the-board cuts to an already tiny budget, we put at risk all the progress made over the last decade. This crime continues to present a monumental challenge. But there's still much reason for hope. We want the 2012 Trafficking in Persons Report to be a report about more and more success stories. We want it to tell about governments living up to their responsibilities. We want it to describe effective partnerships with robust civil society. We want this Report to show the struggle against modern slavery moving in the right direction. Because this Report is not merely a reflection of what foreign governments are doing to combat this heinous crime. It is a reflection of American leadership around the world.

Human trafficking is a threat to our security and an offense to our most important values. But more importantly, as Secretary Clinton has said, "fighting slavery is part of who we are as a nation." We have a responsibility to act against this crime. We must not-will not-shrink from that responsibility.

Thank you, and I look forward to answering any questions you have.

LOAD-DATE: October 28, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: SDBA

Copyright 2011 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

244 of 492 DOCUMENTS

The Washington Daybook

October 27, 2011

House Foreign Affairs Committee

COMMITTEE: House Foreign Affairs Committee

SUB-COMMITTEE: Africa, Global Health, and Human Rights Subcommittee

Africa, Global Health, and Human Rights Subcommittee hearing on "The Trafficking in Persons Report 2011: Truth, Trends, and Tier Rankings."

TIME: 2 p.m.

LOCATION: 2200 Rayburn House Office Building

CONTACT: 202-225-5021 <http://foreignaffairs.house.gov>

PARTICIPANTS: Luis CdeBaca, ambassador-at-large in the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons; Assistant Secretary of State Robert Blake of the Bureau of South and Central Asian Affairs; and Principal deputy Assistant Secretary of State Joseph Yun, of the Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs, testify

LOAD-DATE: October 20, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

TYPE: Hearing

245 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

October 27, 2011 Thursday 9:27 PM GMT

US lawmaker seeks more scrutiny on India trafficking

LENGTH: 379 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, Oct 27 2011

A US lawmaker Thursday urged more scrutiny of India's record on human trafficking as the State Department insisted that the emerging Asian power was taking significant strides against the problem.

In its latest annual report on human trafficking, the State Department took India off a watchlist and credited the democracy's independent judiciary and civil society with spurring action to rescue women and children.

But Republican Chris Smith, author of the law that requires the trafficking report, queried the upgrade, citing sex-selective abortion and infanticide against girls in India, which has warming ties with the United States.

"The most dangerous three words in that part of the world is, 'It's a girl.' If it's a girl, she may be dead, or if she gets a little bit older, she may be exploited through trafficking," said Smith, who represents New Jersey.

Smith, chairing a hearing with senior administration officials, asked the State Department to look carefully next year at whether India is making "an all-out effort to eradicate slavery" or only trying to appease criticism.

Robert Blake, the assistant secretary of state for South Asia, defended the administration's assessment. He said India had traffickers in their crosshairs, while until recently authorities would arrest the victimized women and girls.

"I think we've come a long way," Blake said. "This year India was upgraded because they're making some pretty significant efforts."

Blake credited India for setting up 80 anti-trafficking units under the home ministry and for tackling bonded labor. "Back in 2003 and 2006, this wasn't even on their radar," he said.

Luis CdeBaca, the US ambassador-at-large on human trafficking, also supported the upgrade but said in his prepared testimony: "Sex trafficking of women and children has not abated and may in fact be increasing in places such as India."

The annual report frequently raises controversy among US allies when they come under criticism. The law paves the way for economic sanctions against countries if they are judged to be making no efforts against major problems.

Smith also voiced concern that the United States in the report had not given the rock-bottom ranking to China due to an array of concerns including trafficking of North Korean refugees.

LOAD-DATE: October 28, 2011LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

All Rights Reserved

246 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Congressional Documents and Publications

October 27, 2011

Hearing Examines State Dept.'s Human Trafficking Waivers and Ratings on China, India, other Countries; Rep. Chris Smith (R-NJ) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 812 words

Washington, Oct 27 - The Obama Administration's decision to grant China a political waiver and India an upgrade in this year's annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report issued by the State Department were questioned by the lawmaker who wrote the first-ever U.S. law to combat trafficking in 2000--the same law which also created the annual report and its ranking system (Public Law 106-386).

A hearing held by Congressman Chris Smith (NJ-04), author of the landmark Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA) as well as subsequent laws to make further strengthen and adapt TVPA, focused on what Smith believes were politicized rankings for India and China--despite the ongoing and expanding problem of human trafficking, particularly sex-trafficking of women and girls, in these countries. In the 2008 reauthorization of the TVPA, Congress decided that no country should be allowed to skirt sanctions on the Tier 2 Watch List for more than two years before being downgraded to Tier 3. This year, 2011, represents the first year that the limit was put to the test.

"It is with concern that I note the President has determined 12 countries need yet another year on the Tier 2 Watch List," said Smith, who chairs the House subcommittee that oversees human rights and co-chairs the Congressional Human Trafficking Caucus. "Some of these countries--China and Russia--have been on the Watch List for 7 and 8 years, respectively. I would like to know exactly why the Administration is convinced these countries need yet another year to get their acts together. Those who work on the front lines of human trafficking know all too well that a law is useless unless faithfully implemented." Click here <http://bcove.me/xcz9swwt> to read Smith's statement.

The hearing the committee heard testimony from top State Department officials (click on their name to read their testimony): Asst. Secretary of State Robert Blake, head of Bureau of South and Central Asian Affairs; Principal Deputy Asst. Secretary of State Joseph Yun, East Asian and Pacific Affairs; Leading U.S. official tasked with combating trafficking, Luis CdeBaca, Ambassador-at-Large and head of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

Smith fears in the case of China, the Obama Administration has politicized human rights with the granting of a political waiver and a refusal to downgrade China from the Tier 2 Watch List. China has become a magnet for trafficking as a result of its brutal one child per couple population control policy and the resulting severe shortage of girls. Experts indicate that the region is missing about 100 million women.

Smith also expressed concern about the Administration's decision to upgrade India from the Tier 2 Watch List to a Tier 2 country.

"India was upgraded to a Tier 2 country in this report despite the fact that it has one of the largest populations of enslaved laborers in the world, and has only prosecuted and convicted a small handful of labor traffickers," he said.

Smith is the author of the landmark legislation the Trafficking Victims and Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA), which mandated the annual reports, as well as increased penalties for traffickers and provided assistance for victims. Smith wrote two subsequent anti-trafficking laws (PL 108-193 and PL 109-164) increasing resources for crime prevention and expanding treatment assistance for victims. Smith has legislation to reauthorize TVPA which the Foreign Affairs Committee passed earlier this month.

"The TIP Report has been an incredibly effective diplomatic tool," Smith said. "The Report has been a catalyst for improvement --often dramatic improvements--in the efforts of governments to address human trafficking within their borders and regions. With a combination of encouragement, persuasion and sustained pressure via sanctions imposed by the United States, countries around the world have created or amended over 120 laws to combat human trafficking, and, in the past three years alone, an estimated 113,000 victims have been identified and assisted worldwide." Click here <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/tiprpt/2011/index.htm> to read the 2011 TIP report.

Smith said that according to the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Human Trafficking--created by the TPVA--more than 12 million people worldwide are trafficking victims. Other estimates put the number of victims as high as 27 million. Today human trafficking is the third most lucrative criminal activity in the world. According to the International Labor Organization (ILO), human traffickers make profits in excess of $31 billion a year.

To watch a webcast of the event, click here <http://bcove.me/xcz9swwt> (Note: the broadcast begins at the 15 minute mark- advance player to that time.)

Read this original document at: <http://chrissmith.house.gov/News/DocumentSingle.aspx?DocumentID=266668>

LOAD-DATE: October 28, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: COSHMA

247 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Congressional Documents and Publications

October 27, 2011

House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Africa, Global Health, and Human Rights Hearing;
"The Trafficking in Persons Report 2011: Truth, Trends, and Tier Rankings.";
Testimony by Robert Blake, Assistant Secretary of State, Bureau of South and Central Asian Affairs, U.S. Department of State

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 2299 words

Chairman Smith, members of the committee: Thank you for inviting me, I welcome the opportunity today to speak with you regarding trafficking in South and Central Asia. I'm honored to do so in the company of my colleagues, Ambassador Louis CdeBaca and EAP PDAS Joseph Yun.

I will briefly address some of the underlying issues contributing to trafficking I have seen in the region, discuss our efforts and outline our successes and challenges.

Underlying Issues Contributing to Trafficking

The SCA region faces numerous challenges that give rise or contribute to TIP problems. Some of the countries in the region are among the poorest in the world and their people are vulnerable because of weak rule of law, underdeveloped institutional capacity, corruption, caste discrimination, and the understandable propensity of the poor to migrate in search of economic opportunities elsewhere that make them vulnerable to exploitation. Despite these challenges, Ambassador CdeBaca and I have worked together closely on TIP issues in all SCA countries and have made progress. I am committed to advancing our human rights agenda and I have engaged personally on TIP issues in all of my bilateral meetings; including all of the Annual Bilateral Consultations we hold with Central Asian countries. These conversations are not always easy, but our partners in Government and in the NGO community in SCA countries know that we are here to partner with them. We use the TIP Report as a tool to focus our efforts on areas that require improvement. I believe these efforts have contributed to an overall positive trend in the region towards legislation that is compliant with the minimum standards and an increased awareness of forced labor as part of the TIP problem that must be addressed.

In addition to these broader trends, as requested by the committee, I would like to outline the progress we have seen and the challenges that remain in SCA countries of particular note beginning with South Asia and moving on to Central Asian countries.

South Asia

India

The Department was able to upgrade India for the first time to Tier 2, from the Tier 2 WatchList, where it has stayed since 2004 when I was still the Deputy Chief of Mission in Delhi working on these matters. India is today one of our most important partners, and a large and complex democracy that is increasingly committed to stopping exploitation of vulnerable people. The Government of India and State governments have taken significant steps in their anti-TIP efforts, responding both to international attention to TIP issues and India's own robust civil society that seeks social justice and reform.

The Department upgraded India to Tier 2 in the 2011 TIP Report because of the government's greater resolve combating its trafficking problem, particularly bonded labor. The Government of India increased law enforcement efforts through the establishment of over 80 Anti-Human Trafficking Units, ratified the UN TIP Protocol, achieved landmark convictions against bonded labor traffickers with punishments of significant prison sentences, and increased rescue and rehabilitation efforts of thousands of trafficking victims in many parts of India.

India's anti-TIP efforts have continued since the publication of the 2011 TIP Report. At the federal level we have seen efforts by the Ministry of Labor, which called for all state labor secretaries to appoint nodal officers to tackle forced child labor and bonded labor. The Ministry of Home affairs has also been instrumental in broadly recognizing the anti-TIP contributions of one judge of the Mumbai court (who has taken over and cleared hundreds of sex trafficking cases and issued rehabilitation orders for 1,200 rescued women and girls) and has asked Judge Swati Chauhan to share her anti-trafficking court model widely across India. Bonded labor remains a persistent and difficult challenge in India's anti-trafficking agenda in all jurisdictions but in August, the National Commission for the Protection of Child Rights announced a new cell to focus government efforts on the elimination of bonded labor.

At the State level, West Bengal set up missing persons bureaus in every police district and within the railway police in part to curb trafficking. In Karnataka, police collaborated across state borders with the Tamil Nadu police to rescue bonded laborers from Karnataka.

Although this progress is clear, our hard work continues. Our embassy and consulates are intensively engaged with national, regional and local counterparts to combat TIP. We look for additional opportunities to partner with the Government of India to continue progress and offer our assistance to those in need through G/TIP-funded programming. Our staff works closely with G/TIP and implementing agencies to craft programs that meet the needs of the most vulnerable and address the "three P" paradigm of Protection, Prevention and Prosecution.

Bangladesh

I also wanted to briefly discuss Bangladesh as the Secretary specifically noted in her remarks introducing the 2011 TIP Report the legislative work Bangladesh has engaged in to combat trafficking. Historically, Bangladesh has been one of our most supportive partners, and I'm happy to report the Government has drafted a comprehensive anti-trafficking law that, if passed, will increase legal protections for trafficking victims, especially male laborers who have heretofore not been covered under legislation. Bangladesh has also enacted the "Vigilance Task Force" which has had some success shutting down and provisionally suspending the operations of several recruiting organizations involved in trafficking.

Difficult problems that contribute to trafficking remain, including scarce resources, corruption and economic dependence on remittances from foreign laborers. Bangladesh lacks funds to effectively protect its population from being exploited by human traffickers, but actively encourages countries to accept more Bangladeshi workers. Because of this dependence, the Government of Bangladesh is often reluctant to damage its relations with destination countries by calling for greater protections for its citizens. More recently, Bangladesh chaired a meeting on "the Colombo Process" which is an effort by labor-sending countries to improve conditions for their workers through a dialogue with labor-receiving countries. We see this as positive sign that although the Government of Bangladesh is heavily reliant on remittances; it is taking steps to ensure the conditions for Bangladeshi workers abroad. Until the draft law is passed, the lack of statutory provisions that protect male laborers from exploitative recruiting practices will remain a significant weakness in worker protections.

The Maldives

The Maldives also has serious TIP issues and is in danger of an automatic downgrade to Tier 3 in 2012. But, senior officials from President Nasheed to Foreign Minister Naseem have uniformly expressed to me and others their desire to work with us to bring TIP under Maldivian law. This is consistent with the leadership in international forums such as the UN Human Rights Council to address international human rights issues. To that end, a new anti-trafficking law has been drafted and is ready to be submitted to parliament. This will be an important step. But there will be more to do to, for example, create a referral mechanism and shelters for trafficking victims.

Nepal

Nepal has been another country that has taken serious measures to address TIP. During the past five years Nepal has gone from being a country that only recognized the trafficking of young women to brothels in India to a country that in 2007 passed a fairly comprehensive anti-trafficking law, the Human Trafficking Transportation Control Act (HTTCA), which is closely in-line with the Palermo Protocol. This law, for the first time, recognized that domestic trafficking and non-sex industry exploitation could also be defined as trafficking. The HTTCA, along with foreign employment law and children's rights laws, work together to address most forms of trafficking and have moved Nepal closer toward compliance with the minimum standards. Nepal also established, in 2009, a national coordinating body, the National Committee to Combat Human Trafficking (NCCHT). The NCCHT includes members of civil society, government, and trafficking survivors.

Challenges remain as Nepalis themselves acknowledge. Rule of law is still weak in Nepal, due in part to corruption, limited resources, and lack of public awareness about citizens' rights. Greater protections for witnesses and victims in TIP cases would go a long way to helping see that justice is served in a timely fashion. The law enforcement community in Nepal is still learning how to implement the HTTCA.

Increased collaboration and coordination is being improved by USAID's Combating Trafficking in Persons (CTIP) project, which has provided a Senior Technical advisor to the NCCHT. Furthermore, the USAID project has helped develop national minimum standards for rehabilitation centers and the investigation and adjudication of trafficking cases, for which the lead government ministry is taking ownership.

This year G/TIP selected NCCHT member Charimaya Tamang, herself a trafficking survivor, as one of ten world-wide TIP Report Heroes for her work on the NCCHT and on protecting trafficking survivors through her organization Shakti Samuha. Secretary Clinton met Mrs. Tamang during the 2011 TIP Report rollout, a moment celebrated by the government, media, and public in Nepal.

Central Asia

Kyrgyzstan

Over the past ten years, the government of Kyrgyzstan has made significant strides in the fight against trafficking in persons, from a point of almost no cooperation with NGOs, to the present, when there is an environment of open cooperation with NGOs, as well as a legal framework that provides for investigating and prosecuting trafficking in persons. The government provides the real estate for three shelters for trafficked persons. It also provides a well known three-digit hotline to report trafficking. More recently, the Kyrgyz government amended the current national law against trafficking in persons to increase the maximum punishment to five years imprisonment.

Tajikistan

Tajikistan is another historically challenging state that has made commendable progress against trafficking. In 2011, Tajikistan was upgraded to Tier 2 for addressing the use of forced labor in its annual cotton harvest. This was an important step forward. Specific efforts included accrediting and assisting NGOs to monitor the cotton harvest and meeting with local government and school officials along with the International Organization for Migration and Tajik NGO representatives to reiterate the government's prohibition against forced child labor. The new level of commitment was evidenced by the government's success in prosecuting and convicting the first trafficking offenders under the new anti-trafficking provision and instituting quarterly meetings to coordinate anti-trafficking activities with government partners. These gatherings highlighted the greater focus that this issue is receiving from senior levels of the government.

While Tajikistan has made significant progress; there is still room for improvement. Out of a population of nearly seven million, an estimated one million labor migrants voluntarily migrate, most frequently to Russia and Kazakhstan, where some are subjected to forced labor conditions. The 2011 TIP Report recommends the Government of Tajikistan develop a formal victim identification and referral mechanism as well as victim sensitivity training for border guard and law enforcement authorities to directly address the vulnerabilities of migrant laborers. As with the majority of Central Asian states, there remain instances of forced or child labor in the annual cotton harvest, but the Government of Tajikistan has begun to effectively enforce the prohibition against forced labor by monitoring schools and inspecting cotton fields during the harvest.

Turkmenistan

Turkmenistan is SCA's only country on Tier 3, but has made some recent efforts that I would like to share with the sub-committee. I have new reporting from our Embassy in Ashgabat that three people were prosecuted for trafficking offenses under Article 1291 in August, which is a significant development. The government registered a shelter for victims of trafficking in September and approved a United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC) project to draft legislation protecting victims' rights, train law enforcement in the identification of TIP cases, and develop a partnership plan for the government and NGOs. UNODC's Executive Director will visit in November, at which time he will press for an action plan.

Uzbekistan

Uzbekistan is a mixed picture. The government has made good progress in combating sex trafficking, but has been slow to address the use of forced labor, particularly in the annual cotton harvest. In March of 2011, the Government of Uzbekistan created an Interagency Working Group tasked with ensuring compliance with all 13 ILO conventions to which Uzbekistan is a party. Our Embassy in Tashkent will be monitoring the Government of Uzbekistan's actions to uphold these commitments and I will continue to engage the Government to make progress on this important priority.

In summary, the South and Central Asian region as a whole is moving closer to being compliant with internationally-recognized anti-TIP standards, but there is much more work to do. This will continue to be a personal priority for me and a priority for my bureau. Thank you again for the opportunity to address this subcommittee. I look forward to your questions.

Read this original document at: <http://foreignaffairs.house.gov/112/bla102711.pdf>

LOAD-DATE: October 28, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: COSHCA

248 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Congressional Documents and Publications

October 27, 2011

House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Africa, Global Health, and Human Rights Hearing;
"The Trafficking in Persons Report 2011: Truth, Trends, and Tier Rankings.";
Testimony by Joseph Yun, Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of State, Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs, U.S. Department of State

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 4137 words

Chairman Smith, Ranking Member Payne, and distinguished Members of the Subcommittee, thank you for the opportunity to appear before you today to testify on trafficking in persons (TIP) in East Asia and the Pacific. I would also like to thank the Committee for its leadership on advancing dialogue on this important issue.

The scourge of human trafficking and modern slavery reaches into every corner of the globe, but perhaps nowhere more so than in East Asia and the Pacific. According to the International Labor Organization, the incidence of forced labor and sex trafficking is higher in the Asia-Pacific region than anywhere else in the world. And according to the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC), victims from Asia are trafficked to the widest range of destinations around the globe. In addition to being trafficked overseas, many victims are trafficked within their own countries. In fact, the UNODC reports that most trafficking is national (not international) and is carried out by traffickers whose nationality is the same as their victims' and within national borders.

The most commonly identified form of human trafficking is sex trafficking, defined as the act of coercing, forcing, or deceiving a person into prostitution, or keeping a person in prostitution through coercion. Inducing a child into prostitution is also defined as sex trafficking under the UN Protocol to Prevent, Suppress, and Punish Trafficking in Persons, even when coercion, force, or deception is not involved. Sex trafficking can also be the result of debt bondage, where women and girls are forced to stay in prostitution until they are able to pay off the unlawful debts they have supposedly incurred through their transportation or recruitment. The ILO estimates that 79 percent of identified trafficking victims are women or girls. In most countries in the Asia-Pacific region, the trafficking of women and children for sex is a widely recognized problem, and the laws and regulations are targeted to these particular groups of victims. Other, less-recognized forms of trafficking, such as the trafficking of men and forced laborers, may be under-reported because current laws do not readily facilitate the identification of victims of these forms of trafficking or allow for the prosecution of their traffickers.

Countries should strive to combat all forms of trafficking using the three "P" approach: punishment, prevention, and protection. To that end, with regard to sex trafficking, there are many examples of governments in the Asia-Pacific region taking steps to combat trafficking using this approach.

In Indonesia, for example, the government has shown progress in punishing traffickers. At a two-day seminar on child sex trafficking held in Manado, Indonesia in October 2011, the head of the Police Women and Children's Unit delivered a powerful presentation outlining the work her unit had accomplished on TIP, graphically demonstrating that despite limited resources, she was able to investigate and refer for prosecution dozens of cases, rescuing more than 100 TIP victims. From 2007 to 2010, her unit had worked on more than 66 cases involving 71 adult and 80 child victims, leading to the arrest of 96 offenders and the prosecution of more than 21 trafficking cases. Each year, the number of cases under investigation and the number of victims rescued has grown. On the prevention front, Japan has made great strides. At the peak of Japan's trafficking problem in the middle of the last decade, entertainer visas provided the main means of entry for trafficking victims. The government's TIP-cognizant screening procedures have vastly diminished the entertainer visa program; while about 135,000 entertainer visas were issued in 2004 alone, there were fewer than 11,000 foreigners in Japan on this type of visa in 2009.

In the area of victim protection, recent raids by Thai police have rescued sex trafficking victims from neighboring countries and Central Asia. And in Malaysia, the government recently allowed an independent assessment of its shelters for sex trafficking victims. As part of a regional program funded by the Department of State's Bureau of Population Refugees and Migration to assess the needs of vulnerable migrants, the International Organization for Migration conducted a study of five government and NGO-run shelters and made recommendations to the Malaysian government. As part of this study, a local NGO also conducted a mental health assessment of trafficking victims in shelters. Although the studies found much room for improvement in caring for victims, the fact that the government allowed this independent assessment and formulation of recommendations is an important step towards confronting a crucial area of needed improvement with regards to victims' care and protection.

It is important for countries in the Asia-Pacific region to not only continue to fight the already widely-recognized problem of sex trafficking - and as I have just laid out, we have seen great progress in this fight in the region - but also to identify other forms of trafficking and ensure that there are laws in place to combat them. Countries should strive to prevent all form of trafficking, punish the traffickers, and protect the victims. The current trafficking trends we are seeing in the region - outside the realm of sex trafficking - especially involve forced labor in the fishing industry and for domestic workers.

Although countries in the East Asia-Pacific region continue to suffer from these abuses of human liberty and dignity, we must acknowledge the real progress that countries in the region have made in a relatively short amount of time to combat human trafficking. Since the UN Protocol to Prevent, Suppress, and Punish Trafficking in Persons, especially Women and Children, also known as the Palermo Protocol, entered into force in 2003, the number of countries in the region to implement its provisions has more than doubled. Most anti-trafficking legislation in the region is recent, reflecting a newly understood need to adopt such legislation. According to a 2009 study from UNODC on human trafficking, 23 of the 27 Asian and Pacific countries that contributed information to the report had adopted anti-trafficking legislation, and 10 of those countries had passed new legislation or modified old provisions between 2005 and 2008, demonstrating the progress many countries in the region have made in the last few years. For example, Vietnam passed its Anti-Human Trafficking Law in March 2011 and is currently in the process of drafting decrees and circulars to direct implementation of the new law. In addition, earlier this year, Vietnam allocated $13.5 million for the implementation of its five-year National Plan of Action for Trafficking. Allocation of funds from the state budget for anti-TIP activities demonstrates a clear willingness to accept ownership of the issue.

The UNODC report also indicated that the number of convictions against human traffickers is increasing in East Asian and Pacific countries, probably as a result of these new and updated laws. Let me give you some examples. In recent years, the Royal Government of Cambodia has given increased priority to TIP-related cases within its judicial system. The Phnom Penh Municipal Court (PPMC) reportedly tried 118 TIP cases in the first nine months of 2011, compared to 116 in all of 2010. In addition, Cambodia's first case against an official accused of TIP-related corruption, Eam Rattana, is currently underway, with the trial expected to begin by the end of November. The ongoing case against a second official accused of TIP-related corruption is still under investigation.

The Government of Laos reported that during the 2011 TIP Report assessment cycle it investigated 20 trafficking cases and convicted 33 trafficking offenders. These results represent a dramatic increase from zero convictions.

In Thailand, the Department of Special Investigations is currently expanding its Anti-Human Trafficking Unit from 10 to 70 persons and is seeking to better address local-level corruption, which continues to affect efforts to successfully arrest and convict TIP perpetrators.

In Malaysia, police continue to rescue victims from traffickers, with over a hundred rescued since January. Most recently, police broke up a trafficking ring that brought women from Uganda under the pretense of work or study opportunities and then forced them into prostitution; on October 14, 2011, police rescued 21 women from this ring and arrested the suspected traffickers.

In Indonesia, Surabaya Metro Police arrested Afif Muslichin and Endry Margarini in January 2011 and charged them with trafficking underage girls via social networking connections. In July, the Surabaya State Court sentenced Afif and Endry to 3.5 years in prison for employing underage sex workers. At the same time, NGOs provided assistance to victims, including counseling, witness protection, and other services, and also persuaded the victims to return to school.

Surabaya's government showed commitment in response to this case; the mayor regularly visited the victims and provided them financial and psychological support.

In Burma, as the UN Special Rapporteur on the Human Rights Situation in Burma Tomas Ojea Quintana noted following his August 2011 visit, the government is undertaking a number of activities to combat human trafficking. In 2011, the Burmese Government extended its five year antihuman trafficking program up until 2016, increased anti-trafficking units in 22 to 26, and established a national telephone hotline.

And finally, the Government of Brunei announced plans in April 2011 to form an anti-TIP police unit and the completion of judicial proceedings in its first prosecution.

Now I would like to discuss some of the trends in human trafficking in the East Asian and Pacific region. Asian-Pacific governments across the region are working to combat these trends, and the Department of State and our embassies and consulates abroad are helping to support their efforts.

Let me begin with forced labor. Forced labor refers to work or service that is undertaken involuntarily by use or threat of force or serious harm. Such harm is generally either physical or financial, involving sexual or physical violence or restraint, but in some circumstances can also be economic such as non-payment of wages or debt bondage schemes. There can be many indicators of forced labor, including the withholding of workers' passports, implied threats of deportation, or threats of exclusion from community or future employment.

In recent years, many countries in East Asia and the Pacific that already had a strong infrastructure to fight sex trafficking have taken steps to recognize the problem of labor trafficking and to combat it. In Malaysia, for example, government officials have spoken recently in the press about the need to focus more on labor trafficking. On September 10 of this year, a senior Home Ministry official spoke to a leading daily about the fact that many cases of trafficking in Malaysia involve forced labor, not only commercial sexual exploitation, and about the need to address these cases.

The Malaysian government also recently launched a program to register migrants, one aim of which is to help the government curb worker exploitation by gathering information on how many workers are employed in which sector and by whom.

In Taiwan, the Council on Labor Affairs (CLA) continued to operate 25 Foreign Worker Service Stations and International Airport Service Counters to assist migrant workers and educate them on their rights. Authorities also distributed handbooks detailing relevant laws and regulations on foreign workers to more than 190,000 employers and aired television commercials highlighting the rights of migrant workers. Officials also funded TV, radio, and newspaper advertisements and education programs raising awareness of the perils of trafficking.

In Vietnam, the government has increased efforts to sanction labor recruiting companies that engage in illegal practices and to provide predeparture training for overseas workers to educate them about their legal rights, employment contracts, language and cultural information for the destination country, and contact information in the event a worker encounters problems.

Also in Japan, a government order regarding the Industrial Trainee and Technical Intern Program that entered into force in July 2011 banned the practices of requiring deposits from applicants to the program and imposing fines for "misbehavior" or early termination. The new rules require increased oversight of receiving companies and extend the protections of the Labor Standards Office to all participants in the program. There have not been reports, however, of the government's prosecution of forced labor offenses committed with the trainee and intern program.

Also in the realm of labor trafficking, we are seeing more and more the need to protect domestic workers from abuses at the hand of their employers. There are millions of women who have entered or departed Asian-Pacific countries to work as domestic workers overseas. Because most countries exclude domestic workers from provisions in their labor laws protecting workers, domestic workers are very vulnerable to trafficking and have few remedies against exploitative work conditions. According to Human Rights Watch, domestic workers are also at increased risk of abuse because of many countries' restrictive visa-sponsorship regulations that link their visas to their employers, giving employers control over workers' immigration status and ability to change jobs if they face abuse.

Many countries in East Asia and the Pacific are working to expand protections to domestic workers. For example, on October 15 Cambodia suspended all new recruitment due to reports of labor recruiting companies engaging in illegal practices amounting to trafficking in persons in Cambodia, and over concerns over abuse of domestic workers in Malaysia. Active investigations into recruiting agencies for illegal trafficking are underway in Cambodia several arrests have been made, and there has been one prosecution. On September 21, the Phnom Penh Municipal Court sentenced a recruiting company employee to four years in prison for abduction and confinement of trainees. Furthermore, the Ministry of Labor has made assurances that migration for domestic work will not be reinstated until better mechanisms for control are in place. Ministry of Labor officials are currently working with international organizations and NGOs - and seeking assistance from the U.S. government - to write the regulations related to Cambodia's new sub-decree on Migrant Labor. The Ministry of Labor hopes to use this suspension of new recruitment as leverage to convince Malaysia to sign a proposed Memorandum of Understanding with Cambodia.

In Indonesia, according to the Anti-Trafficking Task Force at the Attorney General's Office, the District Court of Dompu, West Nusa Tenggara is adjudicating a high-profile case of trafficking involving a domestic worker who was sent to Saudi Arabia and abused by her employer. The director and an employee of the recruitment agency were charged with document and age-falsification under Indonesia's anti-trafficking law. Prosecutors are seeking a six-year prison sentence.

East Asian and Pacific countries also face serious human trafficking problems within the fishing industries, where allegations of forced labor and abuses aboard commercial fishing vessels are frequent. In a 2009 survey from the United Nations Inter-Agency Project on Human Trafficking (UNIAP), more than half of the surveyed Cambodian migrants trafficked onto Thai boats said they had seen their captains killing one of their coworker.

Most trafficked fishermen are placed on boats going to foreign waters, as it is easier to traffic workers who will be out to sea for longer periods of time. There have been recent reports of Burmese and Cambodian men being trafficked onto Thai fishing vessels. During her visit to Thailand in August 2011 at the invitation of the Thai government, the UN Special Rapporteur on Human Trafficking, Joy Ezeilo, recounted the growing evidence of increased trafficking in the fishing industry in Thailand and stated that Thailand has long been a hub for human trafficking for the sex industry and forced labor.

Thailand has taken steps to address these problems, including passing an Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act in 2008, and establishing teams in every province in the country to fight trafficking. Sirirat Ayuathana of the Thai Ministry of Social Development and Human Security, which is in charge of preventing trafficking within Thailand, has publicly announced that authorities are aware of and concerned about the problem and plan to set up a commission to work on registering all fishing boats and crew members. The Special Rapporteur acknowledged that Thailand had safeguards in place, but must implement them effectively.

There were also recent allegations of abuse from crew members of two South Korean-flagged foreign commercial vessels in New Zealand waters. The workers alleged they were forced to work under slave-like conditions and their wages were withheld. In response to these allegations, the Government of New Zealand acted swiftly, and launched a Ministerial inquiry in July 2011 to investigate the allegations and is expected to make its final report at the end of February 2012.

One of the keys to fighting trafficking in persons not just in Asia, but around the world, is increased international cooperation. As the traffickers globalize their operations and learn to cooperate with each other to increase their profits and stay ahead of their would-be prosecutors, governments must also work together and with civil society to fight trafficking. The Department of State recognizes the importance of working with host governments to support their efforts to fight TIP. Our embassies and consulates abroad coordinate with host governments and non-governmental organizations in a number of ways, from organizing conferences and training programs, to inviting experts and speakers to speak publicly to audiences, to sponsoring the exchange of information through the International Visitor Leadership Program and awarding grants to fund anti-TIP programs or campaigns. I would like to mention a few examples of our coordination with governments in the region to combat TIP.

In Singapore in August of this year, in conjunction with the Singapore Police Force, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement Homeland Security Investigations (ICE HSI) sponsored a Trafficking in Persons and Child Exploitation Workshop. Trainers for the event came from ICE HSI, U.S. Department of Justice, U.S. Department of State, Australian Federal Police, and Singapore's Attorney General's Chambers and included an academic consultant, Dr. Sallie Yea. There were over 50 attendees at the three-day training session, which included participants from the Singapore Police Force, the Trafficking-in-Persons Inter-Agency Taskforce, Immigration and Checkpoints Authority, the Ministry of Manpower, and the Ministry of Community Development, Youth and Sports. In addition to the government training, ICE HSI provided a three hour workshop for local nongovernmental organizations that engage in anti-trafficking activities. Thirty attendees from three NGOs attended training focused on trafficking victim care and assistance.

In Thailand, a public-private partnership between USAID and MTV helped to raise awareness about human trafficking among nearly five million Thais using a June documentary titled "Enslaved"; establishing a creative youth forum, and holding a concert in Chiang Mai featuring some of Asia's most popular performers.

The ICE HSI Office of International Affairs Attache Office in Thailand works closely with police, local NGOs, and victims, to investigate and prosecute American citizens involved in trafficking, including for child sex tourism. In addition, the U.S. government funds programs implemented by NGOs and international organizations targeting trafficking prevention, protection, prosecution, and policy advocacy. The programs assist with capacity building, public awareness campaigns, protection and legal assistance for victims, creating alternative occupations for victims, operation of emergency shelters for victims, providing return and reintegration assistance, supporting the International Visitor Programs, and conducting research into labor recruitment, forced labor, and victim screening.

Our embassy in Kuala Lumpur recently co-sponsored a trafficking-in-persons reporting conference for journalists in Sabah, a critical area of Malaysia prone to trafficking. This successful training opportunity for journalists highlighted U.S. steps against trafficking and our support to Malaysian anti-TIP efforts. The embassy estimates that at least one million Malaysians viewed coverage of the conference in a variety of media outlets. The involvement of both Malaysian and U.S. officials in the training sessions also demonstrated our continuing commitment to partnering with the Malaysian government in its efforts. The conference provided information and resources to increase journalists' capacity for more accurate and ethical reporting of TIP cases, emphasizing the role of the media and raising the level of public awareness surrounding these issues. Malaysian prosecution and investigation officials also highlighted such advances in anti-TIP efforts such as increased interaction and joint training with NGOs as well as interagency guidelines for enforcement, prosecution and protection officers.

China's ratification of the "Palermo Protocol" in November 2009 was a positive sign, although China has not yet completed all of the requirements, such as amending domestic law and legal definitions, it needs to meet its obligations under the Palermo Protocol. The government has created an overarching body, the Inter-Ministerial Office Against Human Trafficking, to better coordinate government strategy. Non-government organizations working on anti-trafficking in China report that the number of training programs for front-line law enforcement and those who work with victims is increasing. According to Chinese government statistics, prosecutions for human trafficking increased in 2010, as did the number of sentences of five years or more for trafficking-related offenses. China's law enforcement agencies are also expanding cooperation with other countries on cases involving foreign nationals in China and Chinese nationals abroad. United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) officials reported that the Chinese government had "fundamentally changed its considerations" by recognizing the full range of needs for children victimized by, or at increased risk of victimization from, human trafficking. Also, UNICEF officials spoke positively of the efforts by the Ministry of Civil Affairs, under its current model of victim care, to provide services to exploited children. The Chinese will publish their next five-year National Plan of Action next year that we hope will clarify their priorities and strategy for combating trafficking in persons.

Finally, at the fourth U.S.-ASEAN Senior Official's Dialogue on Transnational Crime on July 28 in Singapore, ASEAN officials reiterated their interest in collaborating on joint U.S.-ASEAN projects. I specifically mention ASEAN cooperation because I believe multilateral efforts to combat TIP are as important as bilateral efforts. We intend to continue working with ASEAN in the future to better combat this problem in the region.

In addition to ASEAN, we also see countries within Asia coordinating among themselves to fight TIP. For example, in March 2011, a delegation from the Japanese Inter-Ministerial Liaison Committee on Trafficking In Persons visited Thailand and Cambodia, and established a Japan-Thailand Joint Taskforce on Countering Trafficking in Persons. A bilateral procedure on identification and repatriation of Thai TIP victims, the result of three years of discussions, was established and discussions of a mutual legal assistance treaty were furthered.

As you can see, the scourge of human trafficking is a problem affecting many countries in the East Asia-Pacific region, but steps are being taken through the region to combat all forms of trafficking in persons. We continue to work closely with our partners both in government and civil society to support efforts to eradicate this modern day form of slavery.

Thank you for giving me the opportunity to testify before you today. I am pleased to answer your questions.

Read this original document at: <http://foreignaffairs.house.gov/112/yun102711.pdf>

LOAD-DATE: October 28, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: COSHCA

Copyright 2011 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

249 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Congressional Documents and Publications

October 27, 2011

House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Africa, Global Health, and Human Rights Hearing;
"The Trafficking in Persons Report 2011: Truth, Trends, and Tier Rankings.";
Testimony by Luis CdeBaca, Ambassador-at-Large, Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, U.S. Department of State

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 2370 words

Thank you Mr. Chairman, Congressman Payne, and all the members of this committee for the opportunity to testify today. As Congress continues to deliberate this year's reauthorization of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, hearings such as this one are helpful opportunities to discuss the global fight against human trafficking, and in particular one of our government's most important tools in moving that fight forward, the annual Trafficking in Persons Report.

The TIP Report assesses government action around the world against trafficking in persons--that is, all of the activities involved in reducing someone to, or holding them in, a condition of compelled service. The core of this Report is the set of Congressionally-established minimum standards set forth in the TVPA. These standards reflect the definitions and framework to combat trafficking in persons outlined in the United Nations Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, especially Women and Children, known also as the Palermo Protocol.

Following Congress's mandate, the Department of State ranks governments around the world according to these standards and determines a tier ranking based on a government's progress in meeting those standards. The Report comprises those rankings as well as individual country narratives that further explain both the TIP situation on the ground and governmental efforts according to the criteria laid out by Congress. The methodology is sound and transparent--the facts are applied to the law. Any country, whether in Asia or elsewhere, that wants to test this methodology need only assess their efforts against these minimum standards.

Thorough and honest assessments are the benchmark of the TIP Report. Our narratives take into account information from civil society groups, foreign governments, and our own State Department reporting officers who conduct on-the-ground research throughout the year. The review process involves numerous DOS offices so that the final product represents a Department-wide consensus on how well various governments are handling this problem. Beginning last year, a United States country ranking was also included in the Report, because, as Secretary Clinton has said, we should hold ourselves to the same standards as we hold everyone else. Accurate reporting is essential to the effectiveness of the TIP Report as a diplomatic tool, and indeed governments repeatedly cite it as a factor prompting stronger action in response to modern slavery. Sometimes that happens in public--more often in private. And sometimes a government that criticizes the Report and even perhaps mobilizes others against it quietly takes steps to work with us to begin meeting these standards.

What the Report tells us is that no country is immune to this scourge, and that no government is doing a perfect job combating it. The two regions we are addressing today--East Asia and the Pacific, and South and Central Asia--are hit particularly hard by this crime. I'm pleased to be joined today by Assistant Secretary Robert Blake, who leads the Department's South and Central Asian Affairs Bureau, and Joseph Yun, Deputy Assistant Secretary in the Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs. We always say the fight against modern slavery takes political will, and Bob Blake and EAP Assistant Secretary Kurt Campbell are showing that both individually and within their chains of command. My colleagues will discuss in greater detail the progress in these areas and what governments are doing about it, but I'd like to highlight a few of the problems in trends that were discussed in the 2011 TIP Report and continue to be areas of concern.

* Sex trafficking of women and children has not abated and may in fact be increasing in places such as India. Additionally, our findings continue to show that it is local populations, more than Western "sex tourists," that fuel the demand for sex trafficking, and law enforcement needs to address both sectors for prevention to be truly successful. Widening gender gaps in China and India are fueling the demand for young girls as forced brides or for commercial sexual exploitation.

* We know that around the world, forced labor is highly prevalent among migrant populations, and that Asia has the world's largest share of labor migration. Migrants from both the East Asia and Pacific and South and Central Asia regions are subjected to forced labor in recognized destination countries such as Malaysia, Singapore, and the Persian Gulf. More troubling still, much of this abuse takes place under the guise of legal, contractual and temporary work.

* In recent months, concerns over forced labor on fishing fleets have garnered increased attention. Our own research suggests that this is a problem with massive geographic scope, spanning fisheries from Indonesia to New Zealand. And Asian boats are ranging from the Cape of Good Hope to Central America.

* The enslavement of domestic workers from South and East Asia is a significant problem, whether Sri Lankans abused in the Gulf or Indonesians exploited in Malaysia. The International Labor Organization's (ILO) new Convention on Domestic Workers aims at addressing the unique vulnerabilities of this group; we hope that the increased attention on this challenge will lead to governments addressing the needs for justice and services for these victims.

* Definitional confusion among governments in the EAP and SCA regions continues to lead to the conflation of people smuggling and human trafficking. This lack of clarity hinders efforts to find and help victims. When it comes to trafficking, we continue to urge destination governments to shift their focus away from the legality of a migrant. As we know, modern slavery need not involve movement or cross borders.

* Additionally, we continue to push governments to acknowledge that human trafficking is a crime that can involve sex and labor. For instance, the definition of trafficking in the 2005 South Asia Association for Regional Cooperation (SAARC) Convention is not consistent with how the term is defined and addressed in many other prominent international instruments on trafficking in persons from groups such as the Council of Europe and the Organization of American States, and with the primary international treaty on trafficking, the Palermo Protocol. The Convention continues to focus on the concept of trafficking as the movement of women and children for prostitution and fails to address the trafficking of adults or forced labor. We hope that as the region's leaders gather for the SAARC Summit in Male in November, they will work toward bringing the region's conceptual notion of trafficking into conformity with the UN and other regional frameworks.

* We continue to advocate for comprehensive victim care, rather than the "Detain and Deport" model that we too often see in these regions. Protection should not mean inappropriate confinement for victims preparatory to deportation. Indeed, they need to be empowered through the opportunity for economic self-sustainability as well as aftercare and alternatives to deportation.

* We encourage governments of sending and receiving states to explicitly address modern slavery in labor-related memoranda of understanding (MOUs) and to enforce those provisions in an open and transparent manner.

My staff and I, collaborating closely with regional bureaus, will continue to engage governments in these regions in order to bring these issues to their attention, and we will urge them to take positive action in advance of next year's TIP Report.

In addition to the country narratives, the TIP Report includes an introduction that provides a conceptual framework to the struggle against modern slavery. In this year's Report, we show that the first 10 years of the modern anti-trafficking movement have been a decade of development: in countries all over the world, legal structures have been enacted and protection mechanisms have been put in place. However, the number of successful prosecutions seems to have leveled off, services for survivors continue to be inadequate, and victim identification remains a challenge. That's why the 2011 TIP Report described the need for a "decade of delivery," in which governments must be held accountable for delivering on the promises made in recent years. Because structures and results are not the same thing.

The difference between the passage of a law and the effective implementation of a law is political will. We have seen political will succeed. We have seen it in the Philippines, where the Aquino Administration is prioritizing trafficking cases in the court system and pushing through the backlog, delivering on a set of processes and promises that had been moribund at best. We have seen it in other regions; the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) this summer invited Nigerian prosecutors to come to Singapore and share the secrets of their success, providing a unique opportunity for ASEAN members to learn from an African country.

But the reality is that there are places where that political will is weak or nonexistent, and there, victims are most at risk. As the Report shows, some governments merely go through the motions when it comes to fighting modern slavery, and some governments don't do anything at all. A key source of hope for victims and survivors is the work of civil society--non-governmental organizations, international organizations, the faith community, and advocacy groups.

These organizations are made up of people working every day to make the decade of delivery a reality despite the fact that many governments are doing little or nothing at all. These groups are running shelters on dollars a day. They are freeing victims from the most horrific abuse imaginable. They are the women and men on the front line of this fight. But as is often the case in places where poverty and corruption hinder the good intentions of committed people, a lack of resources and capacity are insurmountable roadblocks to those seeking to save victims from exploitation and bring their traffickers to justice.

In addition to our robust diplomatic efforts, this is another area where the Trafficking in Persons Office is making a difference, through our International Programs foreign assistance funds. In the last two years, my office received 998 applications for assistance from 546 organizations requesting a total of $547 million. We know that it will never be possible to give every organization the help they want. And we know that we have a responsibility to be responsible custodians of taxpayer dollars. That's why our office has implemented a rigorous and transparent review process to ensure that every cent of our foreign assistance appropriation is spent responsibly and is put to the use where it will do the most good.

To answer the requests for $547 million which we received through funding applications--the vast majority of which described projects of tremendous merit-- our office administered a foreign assistance budget for the last two years of $39.1 million. Based on an estimate that there are up to 27 million victims of trafficking worldwide, that funding total provides a little more than 72 cents per victim per year. This year's solicitation is out, and we hope to receive innovative and impactful proposals.

The country-specific tier rankings and diagnostic assessments included in the TIP Report help us determine where we should be allocating these funds. To maximize the impact of our efforts, we identify priority countries for programming. We generally target our foreign assistance to Tier 3, Tier 2 Watch List, and, in some cases, Tier 2 countries. This linkage demonstrates that the Report isn't just an exercise in finger-pointing at countries that aren't doing a good job, but is an important tool for determining where our foreign assistance dollars can be used most effectively.

These are not places where a wealth of resources is available to fight human trafficking. If we were to suddenly pull the plug on the projects we support, there wouldn't be another organization waiting in the wings to take over the provision of victim services. There wouldn't be another source of funding to keep training prosecutors and police officers. In many countries, if the little funding we are able to give were to disappear, those programs would simply cease to exist. In those places, there would be no place for victims and survivors to go.

It was four months ago today that we released the 2011 TIP Report and that Secretary Clinton called for a decade of delivery. If the Trafficking in Persons Office is no longer able to stand with those organizations making a difference on the ground, the decade of delivery is already in danger of failing. If the anti-trafficking movement loses the fight in Washington, in the halls of Congress, we could lose that fight everywhere else as well.

We cannot balance the budget on the backs of trafficking victims. If we try to do so, from some misplaced sense of proportion with across-the-board cuts to an already tiny budget, we put at risk all the progress made over the last decade.

This crime continues to present a monumental challenge. But there's still much reason for hope. We want the 2012 Trafficking in Persons Report to be a report about more and more success stories. We want it to tell about governments living up to their responsibilities. We want it to describe effective partnerships with robust civil society. We want this Report to show the struggle against modern slavery moving in the right direction. Because this Report is not merely a reflection of what foreign governments are doing to combat this heinous crime. It is a reflection of American leadership around the world.

Human trafficking is a threat to our security and an offense to our most important values. But more importantly, as Secretary Clinton has said, "fighting slavery is part of who we are as a nation." We have a responsibility to act against this crime. We must not--will not--shrink from that responsibility.

Thank you, and I look forward to answering any questions you have.

Read this original document at: <http://foreignaffairs.house.gov/112/cde102711.pdf>

LOAD-DATE: October 28, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: COSHCA

Copyright 2011 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

250 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Copyright 2011 CQ Transcriptions, LLC
 All Rights Reserved
 CQ Transcriptions

All materials herein are protected by United States copyright law and may not be reproduced, distributed, transmitted, displayed, published or broadcast without the prior written permission of CQ Transcriptions. You may not alter or remove any trademark, copyright or other notice from copies of the content.

REP. CHRISTOPHER H. SMITH HOLDS A HEARING ON TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT

October 27, 2011 Thursday

EVENT DATE: October 27, 2011

TYPE: COMMITTEE HEARING

LOCATION: WASHINGTON, D.C.

COMMITTEE: HOUSE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS, SUBCOMMITTEE ON AFRICA, GLOBAL HEALTH, AND HUMAN RIGHTS

SPEAKER: REP. CHRISTOPHER H. SMITH, CHAIRMAN

WITNESSES:

REP. CHRISTOPHER H. SMITH, R-N.J. CHAIRMAN REP. JEFF FORTENBERRY, R-NEB. REP. TIM GRIFFIN, R-ARK. REP. TOM MARINO, R-PA. REP. ANN MARIE BUERKLE, R-N.Y. REP. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN, R-FLA. EX OFFICIO

REP. DONALD M. PAYNE, D-N.J. RANKING MEMBER REP. KAREN BASS, D-CALIF. REP. RUSS CARNAHAN, D-MO. REP. HOWARD L. BERMAN, D-CALIF. EX OFFICIO

WITNESSES: LUIS CDEBACA, AMBASSADOR-AT-LARGE, STATE DEPARTMENT'S OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE ROBERT BLAKE, BUREAU OF SOUTH AND CENTRAL ASIAN AFFAIRS

PRINCIPAL DEPUTY ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE JOSEPH YUN, BUREAU OF EAST ASIAN AND PACIFIC AFFAIRS

TEXT:

SMITH: The subcommittee will come to order.

Good afternoon to everybody. Welcome to this hearing to examine the State Department's 2011 Trafficking in Person's Report. This report to Congress was first mandated by legislation that I sponsored known as Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000.

In 1998, and I don't see that people are very well aware of this - when I first introduced the bill, the legislation was met with a wall of skepticism and opposition, although we did have some friends like the ambassador. Table vote inside of government and out flipped the issue of human trafficking was merely a solution in search of a problem. For most people at that time, the term trafficking applied almost exclusively to illegal drugs or weapons. Reports of vulnerable people especially women and children being reduced to commodities for sale are often met with surprising indifference. One major objection to the bill especially from the Clinton administration was the naming and ranking of countries based on compliance with the establishment of common sense minimum standards, clearly articulated prevention, protection, and prosecution benchmarks enforced by sanctions and penalties against violators.

Fortunately, reality won out over ignorance. Although it took two years to overcome opponents and most of the votes were passage, the Trafficking Victims Protection Act was finally signed at the law with strong bipartisan support. The support was from both sides of the aisle. It has continued through subsequent reauthorizations. It has been essential in the ongoing successes by the US government in combating modern day slavery both at home and abroad. However, the battle is far from over. According to the state department's office to monitor and combat human trafficking, created by TVPA, more than 12 million worldwide are trafficking victims. Other estimates put the number of victims as high as 27 million. Today, we know that human trafficking is the third most lucrative criminal activity in the world. According to the International Labor Organization, human traffickers may profits in excess of 31 billion dollars a year.

We are fortunate to have with us today three distinguished state department witnesses to examine both the substance and diplomatic activity that is behind the trafficking in person's report. The report which is written by the TIP office headed by Ambassador Luis CdeBaca summarizes the ranking and performance of each country and provides detailed recommendations as to how each country can improve its efforts. But more than a source of concise knowledge about the fight against human trafficking around the world, the TIP report has been an incredibly effective diplomatic tool. The report has been a catalyst for improvement, often dramatic improvements, and efforts of governments to address human trafficking within their borders and regions with a combination of encouragement, persuasion and sustained pressure via sanctions or the threat of sanctions imposed by the US.

Countries around the world have created and amended over 120 laws to combat human trafficking and in the past three years alone, an estimated 113,000 victims have been identified and assisted worldwide. Individuals within each country can use the report to assess their government's commitment and to lobby their government to take specific measures. The G-TIP office also coordinates technical assistance and aide for many of the countries wishing to improve their anti- trafficking response. The result has been a worldwide anti- trafficking surge largely depending on the credibility and accuracy and faithful implementation of the report including the tier framework.

This afternoon, we will return our attention to ensuring this report will contain these essential attributes and to assess whether or not it is fulfilling its purpose. In 2003, Congress added a special watch list to the tier rankings to allow countries an opportunity to address their shortcomings in their anti-trafficking efforts before being placed in tier 3 and subject to sanctions. When it became apparent that this tier 2 watch list was becoming a permanent parking lot for some countries, Congress added to the requirement to the 2008 reauthorization that the president either downgrade or upgrade any country that has been on tier 2 watch list for two consecutive years. Obviously, the direction which the country has moved is based on whether requisite measures were taken to meet the minimum standards. The president can waive the requirements to move a country off of the tier 2 watch list for up to two years if the country has a plan to bring itself into compliance with minimum standards and designate sufficient resources to carry it down. But this waiver should only be applied to the most extreme cases as countries have had since 2009 to undertake this effort. Consequently, it is with concern that I note that the president has determined 12 countries need yet another year on tier 2 watch list. Some of these countries, notably China and Russia, have been on the watch list for seven and eight years respectively. Uzbekistan has been on the list for four years.

I look forward to hearing discussing with our witnesses today exactly why the administration is convinced these countries need yet another year to get their acts together. I also look forward to a serious discussion about the application of sanctions. Reports show that of the 23 countries on tier 3, the full sanctions envisioned by TVPA will be applied to only 3 countries: Eritrea, Madagascar, and North Korea. Partial sanctions will be imposed on 7 countries and 13 countries which have no trafficking sanctions imposed whatsoever. Some may argue that being on tier 3 is punishment enough, the Congress envisioned tangible repercussion for countries on tier 3. Those who work on the frontline of human trafficking know all too well that law is useless and diminished at best - for the very least as you'd say unless faithfully implemented.

I look forward to discussing with our distinguished witnesses today the accuracy of the tier rankings and the importance of substantial follow-up action. I would like to now yield to my friend and colleague, Mr. Payne, for any opening comments he might have.

PAYNE: Thank you. Let me start by commending Congressman Smith for calling this important hearing, the 2011 Trafficking in Person's Report. I want to thank all witnesses for agreeing to testify before us today.

On June 27, the State Department issued its 11th annual report on human trafficking in person's TIP report, as mandated by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act. Overall, the 2011 report presents a sovereign view of the state of US and international campaigns against human trafficking. It describes the most common severe forms of human trafficking and identified key emerging issues and trends. Unfortunately, global progress has been mixed. For example, in the past two years, the average number of prosecutions of human trafficking offenders has increased; however, if we look back further, we see that the total number of prosecutions has declined.

I look forward to hearing from our witnesses today about ways the international community can help developing countries - judiciary systems to better respond to this and other criminal justice issues. The report also reveals that we are failing to adequately target each subset of TIP particularly forced labor, which is the most common crime - actually occurs much more than sex trafficking, but only represents 10 percent of all prosecutions. I am looking forward to hearing the panel's thoughts on how to better address this challenging of trafficking in the workforce. I also hope the witnesses can highlight the unique challenges facing many African and conflict- stricken countries in addressing the issue of human trafficking.

According to the report, only two nations, Nigeria and Mauritius, are fully complying with the minimum standards for combating human trafficking. Therefore, qualifying them as tier 1. Ten African countries fell within tier 3 which makes them subject to aide restrictions. In Africa, these potential aide restrictions are caused for concern. Many countries on the continent have been burdened by debilitating conflicts. Africa's conflicts have displaced citizens, traumatized local communities and often children who are particularly vulnerable to exploitation. In these conflict areas where government control is often limited, they may abduct women and children for slavery - sexual slavery, and also often recruit children for their rags. Running opportunities and conflict zones also contribute to these problems. Exploitation thrives under these conditions, although burden governments, poor judicial systems, and widespread poverty prevent adequate country response to human trafficking cases in many of the countries that I am referring to. Yet, some African nations are making progress on this front, the UN Secretary General stated in his most recent global report on children and on conflict, that despite several challenges, considerable progress was made by the Sudanese People's Liberation Army or the SPLA in implementing a plan to remove child soldiers from its ranks.

According to the 2011 report, Chad reportedly ended all child conscription into its national army and continues to engage efforts to demobilize remaining child soldiers from rebel forces. Earlier this month, President Obama certified that Chad had taken necessary steps to allow for its reinstatement of barred assistance. While I agree that the United States and the international community must hold states responsible for implementing robust anti-trafficking initiatives, I am concerned about the impact that withholding aide can have on innocent civilians. It is important that in our efforts to end human trafficking and persuade nations to fully engage in the global cause, we do not inadvertently harm those who intend to protect and help.

I commend President Obama for his thoughtful understanding of this very complex issue and for granting waivers where appropriate. As we move forward with our discussion today, let us not forget the conditions that allow the horrific crimes of human trafficking to exist. We should focus on ways to ensure that our aide programs have strengthened the capacity of developing countries to adequately protect their civilians and citizens.

Thank you again to our witnesses and I look forward to hearing your testimonies. I yield back down for my time.

SMITH: Thank you very much, Ranking Member. We are joined by Mr. Turner and thank you for being here.

TURNER: Thank you.

SMITH: We will put all of the extensive resumes of our distinguished witnesses in the record and just very quickly summarize.

First, introducing Ambassador Luis CdeBaca, who is no stranger to this subcommittee, who is appointed in 2009 as a Director of the State Department's Office to combat - to monitor and combat trafficking in persons which assess global trends, provides training and technical assistance and advocates for the end of modern day slavery. Ambassador CdeBaca formerly served as chief counsel to the House Committee on judiciary whose portfolio included modern slavery issues among many other things. He also served as a federal prosecutor for the Department of Justice where convicted dozens of abusive pimps and players, and helped to liberate hundreds of victims from servitude. A very distinguished record.

We will then hear from Ambassador Robert Blake, currently serves as the Assistant Secretary of State in the Bureau of South and Central Asian Affairs, a position he has held since May of 2009. He entered Foreign Service in 1985 and served at the American Embassy in Tunisia, Algeria, Nigeria, and Egypt. He served as the Deputy Chief of Mission at the US Mission in New Delhi, India from 2003 to 2006. And Ambassador Blake was our ambassador to Sri Lanka and Maldives from 2006 to 2009. He also held a number of positions at the department of - right here in Washington.

We will then hear from Mr. Joseph Yun, who is currently Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary in the Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs, a position he has held since August of 2010. In his role, he is responsible for relations with Southeast Asia and ASEAN affairs. He joined the Foreign Service in 1985 and has served in numerous positions abroad including in South Korea, Thailand, France, Indonesia, and Hong Kong.

Ambassador CdeBaca, the floor is yours.

CDEBACA: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Congressman Payne and Congressman Turner. Thank you to the subcommittee for the opportunity to testify today.

I have a more wholesome statement that I would offer for the record, but before we start, I would like to take a step back, if I may, to recognize what you and your cosponsors of the original Traffic Victims Protection Act achieved in bringing that initial skepticism perhaps that you have mentioned to consensus, 11 years ago this afternoon in fact. On a similarly rainy day in October, President Clinton reported his radio address to be broadcast on the morning of October 28, 2000, the day that he signed that groundbreaking legislation into law to fight what the president described that day as slavery, pure and simple.

As President Clinton pointed out, the TVPA was groundbreaking in providing new tools both here at home and abroad, increasing our assistance to other countries to help them detect and punish this pernicious practice. I would like to simply quote President Clinton because his words that evening are applicable now as they were then. He said, "I work hard for these provisions. They build on what we have been doing at home and abroad to address this problem. "We see in the success of this landmark legislation once again, that there is no real secret to getting things done in Washington. When we put progress over progress, we get results. When we work together, we get results. Working hard and working together, across three presidencies and various changes in Congress, together committed ending modern slavery.

As we continue to liberate this year's reauthorization of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, hearing such as this one are helpful opportunities to discuss the global fight and rededicate to work together with you to get those types of results that President Clinton mentioned. This week is also the 10th anniversary of the establishment of the Traffic in Person's office at the State Department. On October 22, 2001, the office opened for business and has never flagged of its results. A decade of leadership by my predecessors like John Miller and Mark Lagon - but the fight is really the result of the expertise of the G-TIP career staff, civil servants, Foreign Service, and contractors, and their partners in main state and at post. Two of those experts, Amy O'Neill Richard and Carla Minarez Berry (ph), have been in the office since the beginning and those women are globally recognized leaders in the modern struggle and I would like to note that we owe them all a debt of gratitude for their decade in service in this fight against modern slavery.

The most visible part of our work is the annual trafficking person's report. The thorough and honest assessments are the benchmarks of the TIP report. We take into account the information from civil society groups, foreign governments, and our own reporting officers at post who conduct on the ground research throughout the year. The review process involves numerous state department officers, so that the final product represents the department like consensus on how well their governments are doing to handle this problem. Accurate reporting is essential to the effectiveness of the Traffic in Person's report as a diplomatic tool and indeed governments often sight it as a factor prompting stronger action and response to modern slavery. Sometimes, those conversations happen in public, more often in private. And sometimes, a government that criticizes the report and even mobilizes others in the regions or around the world quietly nonetheless take the steps to address the standards that were set forth by Congress.

Regardless of the public's response, we are going to work hard with our counterparts to get results just as what was done in the Clinton administration and just as was done in the Bush administration. What the reports tell us is that no country including the United States is immune to this scourge, and that no government including the United States is doing a perfect job in combating it. The two regions that we address today, East Asia and the Pacific and the South and Central Asia, are hit particularly hard by this crime. We always say that the fight against modern slavery takes political will and not just on the part of government overseas. Assistant Secretary Bob Blake and Kurt Campbell are showing that political will both individually and within their chains of command. As a result, we have seen a real institutionalizing of the anti-trafficking fight in these regions and are coming together around the sense of mission. That means year round engagement, not just the preparation of the annual report. And for that, I am personally grateful to the leaderships of Assistant Secretaries Campbell and Blake.

Year round engagement, partnership, and hard work are necessary to move past this last decade of development in which laws and structures have slowly come online and to move into what Secretary Clinton calls a decade of delivery. Because the number of successful prosecutions seems to have leveled off a bit, because services for survivors continue to be inadequate and victim identification remains a challenge because structures and results are not the same thing. The difference between the passage of a law and the effective implementation of that law is political will. The reality is that there are places where that political will is weak and non-existent and in those places, victims are most at risk. As the report shows, some governments merely go through the motions when it comes to fighting modern slavery. In some governments, the tier 3 countries typically do not do anything at all. Every day, non-governmental actors around the world make up for that despite the fact that these governments are little or nothing. We support such groups through international programs and foreign assistance funds. We know it will never be possible to give every organization the help that they want, but even the current funding levels only average out to a little more than 72 cents per victim per year, given the 27 million estimated worldwide.

In many countries, if that little bit of American funding that we are able to give were to disappear, those programs would simply cease to exist. There would be no place for victims and survivors to go. It has been 149 years and 1 month since President Lincoln made the promise of emancipation. It was four months ago, that we released the TIP report and that Secretary Clinton called for a decade of delivery to make good on President Lincoln's promise around the world.

If U.S. government is not able to stand with motivated governments and the nongovernmentals that make a difference on the ground providing (inaudible) services, training prosecutors and police officers. The decade of delivery is already in danger. If the anti- trafficking movement was steamed (ph) Washington in the House of Congress, we could lose that fight everywhere else as well.

We cannot try to balance the budget on the box of trafficking victims, and if we do so or try do so with cuts to an already tiny amount of money, we put at risk all of the progress made over the last decade. Human trafficking is a threat to our country and an offense to our most important values, but more importantly as Secretary Clinton has said. "Fighting slavery is part of who we are as a nation," 449 years we have not only had a responsibility to act against this crime. We have pledged ourselves to that responsibility. We must not and will not shirk from that task.

Thank you.

SMITH: Thank you very much, Mr. Ambassador.

Ambassador Blake?

BLAKE: Mr. Chairman, Representative Payne and Representative Turner, I welcome the opportunity to speak with you today regarding trafficking in South and Central Asia. I'm honored to do so in the company of my colleagues Ambassador CdeBaca and Joe Yun. I have a longer statement that I'll submit for the record.

SMITH: Without objection, it will be made part of the record.

BLAKE: Mr. Chairman, first of all, let me say how much I appreciate your leadership, the work of the subcommittee and the focus that you bring to the issues of trafficking in persons.

I have made it a personal priority to address trafficking of persons in the SCA region in close partnership with Ambassador CdeBaca. I have done so through direct advocacy with governments but also by visiting with the many fine NGOs on the ground doing good work to combat trafficking and frequently recording short video interviews with them that my staff post on YouTube to publicize their work and the scope of the challenges that they are dealing with.

Mr. Chairman, I'm proud to say that our engagement has produced dividends and progress but significant challenges still remain. The department upgraded four SCA countries this year from tier 2 watch list to tier 2, India, Sri Lanka, Kazakhstan and Tajikistan. There remain on the watch list, but were making progress in all three, Bangladesh, Maldives and Uzbekistan, and only one country is on tier 3 Turkmenistan.

I'd like to briefly touch on the situation in some of the key countries where I've been personally engaged.

First, India. Mr. Chairman, I know you share our interest in seeing continued progress in India on anti-trafficking efforts. The department upgraded India to tier 2 this year was based on the government's increased efforts to address the trafficking problem particularly bonded labor. Specifically, the government increased law enforcement efforts through the establishment over 80 anti-human trafficking units get ratified the U.N. TIP protocol. It achieved landmark convictions against bonded labor, traffickers with punishments of significant prison sentences and increased rescue and rehabilitation efforts of thousands of trafficking victims in many parts of India. This good work continues at both the state and federal levels.

Tajikistan is another country that has made commendable progress against trafficking, and Secretary Clinton noted that on her recent trip there last weekend. In 2011, Tajikistan was upgraded to tier 2 for addressing the use of forced labor in its annual cotton harvest through efforts such as accrediting and assisting NGOs to monitor the harvest. They also prosecuted and convicted the first trafficking offenders under their new anti-trafficking provision.

Kazakhstan also was elevated to tier 2 this year. The Kazakh government increased law enforcement efforts against human trafficking had passed a law strengthening penalties for convicted child-sex trafficking offenders and the Ministry of External -- of Internal Affairs -- excuse me -- has drafted a law that allows trafficking victims to have a leave -- legal advocate that expands the scope of trafficking-related crimes and increases legal protections for minors subject to forced labors.

Mr. Chairman, you asked about Uzbekistan. It presents a mixed picture. The government has made good progress in combating sex trafficking but has been slow to address the use of forced labor particularly in the annual cotton harvest. In March of 2011, the government of Uzbekistan created an interagency working group task with ensuring compliance with all 13 ILO conventions to which Uzbekistan is a party. Our embassy in Tashkent will be monitoring the government Uzbekistan's actions to uphold these commitments, and I will continue to engage the government to make progress on this important priority.

Mr. Chairman, the trafficking report has been an emphasis for this change in all of our region, but it is only of the tools that we have at our disposal to influence the anti-trafficking efforts of other countries. Reports from international NGOs have sometimes been instrumental in informing and compelling action on TIP. My bureau and Ambassador CdeBaca's team greatly value such input, and we've tried hard to foster a cooperative relationship with this institutions. We influence them, and they influence us by information and sharing to make sure that our efforts are complementary and that we make the most impact on the ground.

Governments remain extremely interested to know where they will be ranked in the report when it comes out in June. But I think that the work that we do to consistently engage and influence people at every level of society is significant. For example, the exchange programs and workshops that we sponsor to train government officials in implementation are critical to realizing the potential of the new laws being passed. The training programs of police officers or border guards to sensitize them about potential trafficking of persons, victims are also vital.

So, I want to assure that we value the resources that we are entrusted with by Congress, and we work very closely with Ambassador CdeBaca and his staff to implement the programs to make a positive and lasting impact.

In summary, Mr. Chairman, the SCA region is moving closer to being compliant with internationally-recognized anti-TIP standards, but there's much more work to be done. This will continue to be a personal priority for me and a priority for my bureau.

So, again, I thank you for this opportunity to address this subcommittee, and I look forward to your questions.

SMITH: Ambassador Blake, thank you very much.

Mr. Yun?

YUN: Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Payne --Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Payne and Representative Turner, thank your for the opportunity to appear before you today to testify on trafficking in persons in East Asia and the Pacific Region.

I've submitted a statement for the record. With your permission, I would like to make a few summary remarks.

First of all, I regret to convey that from Assistant Secretary Campbell, he wanted to be here, but he had to be on a travel in the last minute. So, in fact, as was speaking he's landing in Dallas.

Human trafficking in modern slavery reaches into every corner of the globe, but perhaps, no where (ph) more so than -- than in East Asia and the Pacific. According the International Labor Organization, the incidence of forced labor and sex trafficking is higher in the Asia Pacific region than anywhere else in the world, and according to United Nations Office on Drugs and Crimes, victims from Asia traffic the widest range of destinations around the globe.

In addition to the being trafficked to overseas, many victims are trafficked within their own countries. In fact, the UNODC reports that most trafficking is national not international, and this is carried by traffickers whose nationality is the same as their victims and within national borders.

While human trafficking remains widespread and serious, we do believe that TVPA or TIP report and its associated activities have been effective in fighting trafficking in persons in the East Asia and the Pacific.

There are several success stories I would like to share with you. Taiwan is one example of how information in the TIP report has led to real reform in many aspects of fighting TIP, including implementation of stronger anti-trafficking laws, better protection for victims and increased prosecutions. In 2006, Taiwan was ranked in TIP report as tier 2 watch list was upgraded to tier 2 in 2007 and in 2010 was upgraded again to tier 1 where it remained this year.

The Philippines also has potential to serve as a model in the region for its recent efforts to combat TIP. After two consecutive years as tier 2 watch list and facing an automatic downgrade, the Philippines was upgraded to tier 2 in 2011. The number of prosecutions of traffickers in the Philippines increased greatly in the last reporting cycle and the government has increased the resources it devotes to combat trafficking and has begun to identify and punish corrupt officials linked to trafficking. The government has acknowledged these efforts while linked to the threat of a downgrade to tier 3 in the TIP report.

Singapore is another example in our region that has -- that has potential moving up from tier 2 watch list to tier 2 in 2011. Singapore has shown a markedly increased awareness of TIP issues in the last year and the government has formed an interagency taskforce to address the issue. In 2011, Singapore hosted a workshop for the Asian region on criminal justice responses to trafficking in persons which was attended by Ambassador CdeBaca, as well as other members of my bureau, and in April 2011, six members of Singapore 20 percent interagency taskforce on TIP travel to D.C. to meet myself, Assistant Secretary Campbell, and my colleagues in Ambassador CdeBaca's office.

I'll stressed (ph) that it is not the report alone that results in progress but also the enormous amount of hours spent in country by staff, from our embassies and consulates abroad who engage year round with the whole of government. Our advocacy in Washington with those countries, ambassadors and embassy teams has also made a difference.

Mr. Chairman, we are only too well aware the problem remains. We have worked very closely with Ambassador CdeBaca who has made number of trips over the last few months to our region, and we remained committed to working with G-TIP office, as well as other international organizations fighting human trafficking.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I look forward to answering any questions you might have.

SMITH: Thank you very much for your testimony.

Let me first begin with the -- with the general question -- I guess Ambassador CdeBaca you'll be the one who might wanna answer this. What diplomatic efforts do the department make or undertake to ensure that countries knew that they would not on the watch list for two more years as per the trafficking reauthorization of '08? And what was the reaction, I mean, that each of those that were currently on watch contacted and fully apprise of their potential downgrading?

CDEBACA: OK, we did a number of steps both internally within the department through old Acts (ph) and -- and messages out to the field but then also with that as a task or for a type of that direct type of engagement, and we saw on the part of a number of countries a recognition that this was kind of long overdue that countries had gotten perhaps little comfortable on there.

We saw a recognition on some other countries especially those who such as (inaudible) or the Philippines or others who are MCC countries, a recognition of what the prospect of a tier 3 downgrade might mean not just reputationally, but as far as, sanctions and as far as some of the other assistance and aid and work in the international monetary for might have on those countries. It was a bit of a wake-up call for some of our partners, and we think that we've seen as a result of -- of the watch list designation some real movement.

There was a good percentage of the tier 2 watch list countries moved up to tier 2 on the merits. The waiver issue was never even something that was had to be faced because of the work that they had done, and this was not one year work. This is work that they had undertaken across those two years.

We felt that it was important to kick it in after two years because of the notion that the almost and ex post facto type of situation even though this isn't the domestic criminal law, but the notion that country should have fair warning that tier -- two years on the -- the watch list would have that result.

We also made it very clear what countries would need to do to get waivers. It wasn't the choice. It wasn't saying, "You know, you should choose the lesser of two evils." But with the recognition that not every country would necessarily be able to get up to tier 2 on the merits as you and other had recognized in putting the waiver provision in. So, there was certainly increased diplomacy that was done at the bilateral level by our ambassadors, by me at G-TIP but also specific engagement on the part of then Undersecretary for Political Affairs Burns now Deputy Burns and others who look at those 37 countries as countries that needed very specific interventions, and we saw that from the willingness of Deputy Steinberg, the willingness of Undersecretary Burns to have those conversations was very important we thought in having these countries move up and off the watch list.

SMITH: Thank you. May I ask you with regard to South Korea? You may recall we initiated an effort back in early 2002 to try to get a zero-tolerance policy and to do an investigation among our military to see whether or not there was complicity (ph) with regard to our deployments in South Korea and -- and certainly for -- in the former Yugoslavia and the IG's report from the Department of Defense was very, very damning, and it did lead to Bush's zero-tolerance policy.

I and others have raised repeatedly the issue of the -- of the "juicy bars" in South Korea. I'm just wondering if why that seems to have been left out of the narrative for this year's report. Have they disappeared? Has the issue largely been mitigated? Or are those still a problem? As you recall, many of the women who were being exploited there were Filipino women, and I know the Filipino government took some very aggressive action. I'm wondering if that has been sustained.

YUN: Yeah, I think this issue, as you know, has been an ongoing concern and USFK in South Korea has made zero-tolerance policy very effective, and my recollection is that I don't think we can say "juicy bars" have disappeared 100 percent, but the incidence of abuse that went on is -- is much way down. If you like, Mr. Chairman, we can get more background on the -- on the statistics or data we have on that.

SMITH: I appreciate that because it does seem to reemerge, you know, do you think that I know the stars and stripes (inaudible) has done some very, very fine reporting on that as of others, but as soon as you think you have it in hand all of a sudden a new spate (ph) of this kind of exploitation emergence. Did you want to touch on that?

CDEBACA: Yes, I was in South Korea couple of months ago and in fact went to USFK and -- and we went through some of these issues directly. One of the things that I was struck with personally was the adjusted (ph) position of those images that we are all familiar with from the undercover reporting that was done by some U.S. reporters of not just our servicemen in active (inaudible), active strip clubs not even the euphemism or the juicy bar but then also the shore patrol type of folks who were supposed to be there making sure that there wasn't anything untoward going on telling how - telling undercover reporters how easy it was to -- to go with prostitutes.

Those same street corners, those same neighborhoods that were in that undercover reporting are now nonsexually-related businesses partially because of the zero-tolerance policy partially because of the fact that there are more families being posted that area of Korea and not as many young men by themselves take all of it together things are picture of towns where there're used to be nothing but red light to streets, and now there are places where you can take your kids and -- and can get chicken fingers on the menu.

I think that has a big effect and -- and it's something that happens because USFK -- because our embassy in Seoul and all of us are not taking our eyes off the ball. But that notion that it could come back if we do take our eyes off the ball is well taken.

SMITH: Thank you.

As you know, according to Section 110 in the TVPA China and any other country they will remain on the watch list if it has a written plan to begin making significant effort because it brings itself with the compliance with the minimum standards and that the plan is implementing would constitute making significant efforts in the country is devoting sufficient resources to implement that plan.

I'm wondering with regards to China, what is China's plan? If you could elaborate on what it is that they said they are willing to do, are they doing it? As you know, and I've raised this before, we just had a hearing as you may know in this committee hearing room just a few weeks ago, we heard from survivors women including Chi-Ling (ph) all of whom have suffered to the gross exploitation of a forced abortion and the direct consequence of the one-child-per-couple policy has been the missing girls and some estimates put it as high as a 100 million. Nobody knows the exact number.

It's generally accepted that by 2020, 40) and maybe as many as 50 million is the newest number we've heard. Men will not be able find wives because they have been subjected to a sex-related abortion. So, the magnet for human trafficking is in ascendancy in China, and I hope any plan that they have submitted or suggested that they will follow pursuant to our (ph) and not putting them on tier 3 which is where they belong in my opinion.

You know, really has to take into -- into account the horrific consequences of the missing daughters, the missing girls in China. In the report before this one, there as more attention I thought paid to the component of -- and -- and the contributing actions of the one-child-per-couple policy to trafficking. I think we're gonna see bright selling (ph) and -- and -- and frankly kidnapping, and certainly forced fraud and coercion used in a variety of ways do bring women into China because of this huge gender disparity. Of course India has one as well which is egregious, but China is the direct result of a government policy.

So, I'm wondering if -- if that is fully understood. Is it being conveyed to the Chinese? How concerned we are about this terrible and cruel experiment called, the one-child-per-couple policy that has rendered brothers and sisters illegal but it has made sisters scarce.

CDEBACA: I think I will address Mr. Smith the waiver issue as far as the plan was concerned. What are the things that we saw from the Chinese just last year is that the of course there is the -- the written action plan that they have but perhaps more so there are a number of other instruments that came out in the ranking period which we thought were very interesting and -- and in fact we're -- we're having an impact in a way that we'd never seen before from China.

For instance, there were the guidelines that were issued by the Ministry of Public Security and the Supreme People's Court on sentencing issues. This is, again, something that we had seen in the report over the previous years where we've been criticizing the low sentences and a number of -- of guidelines going out to the court saying we need to bring up the sentencing on this.

The idea of better law enforcement, the commitments made for guidelines, for shelter staff for protocols for working on trafficking victims on relief and reintegration and perhaps most importantly, a directive to the field that women who were encountered in prostitution should not simply be seen as criminals but instead should be assumed to be victims of trafficking at the outside of the investigation. That shifting the burden away from the -- the victim assuming that there is somebody who needs help was a very positive step. It would be a positive step no matter what country it was in but in -- in -- especially in the Chinese context we thought that that was something that was worth noting.

We look forward to working with the Chinese government over coming months as they look to bring themselves into compliance with the Palermo protocol standards. As you know, we've been consistently raising the problem of their trafficking definition which is so focused on child abduction does not necessarily tracked the Palermo protocol.

In our conversations with the Chinese government, it appears that their academics and their legal technographs (ph) are doing the kind of work that's necessary to start tending up legislative changes, and also to -- to put together a new plan going forward a new five-year plan. I think Mr. Yun is gonna address some of other concerns, but I will certainly say that as far as the family issues that you raised, one of the things that I raised when I'm in China and -- and will continue to do so is this concern that the population planning policies of the Chinese government is having that contributory effect that you've mentioned, and it is twice mentioned in the report. We are not backing off on that issue.

YUN: Mr. Chairman, if I can just expand a little on Ambassador CdeBaca's remarks. The administration considers China's coercive birth limitation policies a great violation of human right and has routinely expressed opposition to those policies both publicly and privately. The White House issued a statement on August 23rd, articulating the administration's strong opposition to all aspects of China's coercive birth limitation policies including forced abortion and sterilization.

And as we, at the department, continue to monitor developments concerning this very important issue. Promoting greater respect for human rights including reproductive rights is one of our key foreign policy objectives in China, and we will continue to urge the Chinese government to treat its people in accordance with established international norms (ph).

SMITH: Thank you, Mr. Yun.

Two final questions, I yield to my colleagues, and I have a few additional if you would allow. Let me just -- Deborah Cundy you might recall Ambassador CdeBaca testified about "Best Practices." We met her -- you and I at a -- at a conference in Rome which I saw her -- her testimony when she appeared here was extraordinary that best practices that her hotel chain has undertaken, but there have been many (ph) reports that indicate that American chain hotels in China, as well as in Mexico have been the locations of sex trafficking and name (ph) that we're talking about the Hilton Hotel chains.

And I'm wondering what you are doing specifically to work with hotel chains including Hilton to ensure that they are not complicit in human trafficking or they are working with law enforcement for example to ensure trafficking laws against complicit hotels. Are we taking a harder line on those that are part of the problem?

CDEBACA: Well, there are several things that we're doing on the hospitality front. First of all, that it is in the context of the overarching business approach where we through projects such as the slaveryfootprint.org website where everyone can go and -- and after taking a 15 to 20-minute survey on what they own and what they buy, can get an at least a rough idea of how many people who are held in modern slavery are impacting their lives.

I took it, and I'm ashamed to say that even though I do this for living and have for a while that according to the economist at Berkeley (ph) and the others who did the algorithms that support that - that application that at the minimum I got 84 people held in forced labor around the world who are contributing to my lifestyle just on the basis of what I buy, what I do, et cetera. And that's as I said, you know, not only somebody who doesn't use commercial sex but also fights slavery for a living and that's my slavery footprint.

We can only think about what people who aren't asking these questions might be. Hotel has a slavery footprint as well and I think that we've seen that leadership from the Carlson Companies, certainly through their property's Radisson and Country Inn & Suites, et cetera, but also we're seeing leadership in some other ways from hotels. Marriott made the decision. Evidently, they have a policy that they don't sign on to codes of conduct, put up general, company-wide.

So when they look at it, they - they said, you know, what we think we can best do with our properties is not only think about how to have an exploitation-free hotel environment but also to harness the power of the trafficking victims and the survivors. And so, we're happy to say that the first projects in the Marriott family and I think Starwood is participating as well, to actually bring trafficking survivors into the training programs there, in Brazil, in Mexico, in Vietnam.

We think that the best victim protection is a job, a good job, a safe job and hotels can be the agents of that. Hilton in the wake of those scandals, unfortunately had often takes a scandal to wake up a country or a company as to the fact that they need to deal with this in their own supply chains. In the wake of that scandal, has been all signed unto the code of conduct for the traveling and tourism industry. And we made it very clear to Hilton that one of the reasons why we selected the Hilton in Downtown Miami for our recent western hemisphere reporting officers conference, when we had a choice of a number of properties to toss that in, was in recognition of the fact that they had done so.

We don't see this is necessarily tied to the federal acquisitions register or to our contracting in general. We don't have a rule that says that this is something that - that we always have to do but what we're certainly looking at is if there's a Radisson, if there's a Hilton, if there's somebody that's put their money where their mouth is as far as human trafficking. And we as consumers, individually, but also (inaudible) as an office, we should reward that type of behavior. So, that's the plug if you see a T.G.I. Friday's, that's Marilyn Carlson Nelson's company does that, we can't tell you where to eat but you should know that they're doing their best to fight slavery.

(CROSSTALK)

SMITH: I appreciate that. Thank you, just one question before I yield to Mr. Payne. With regards to Cuba, a Tier 3 country, which was granted waiver on September 30th for cultural and educational exchanges, my question is how does granting that waiver actually promote democracy, rule of law in respect for human rights? And I would note parenthetically that I tried, me, personally to get a visa to go to Cuba, primarily to go to the prisons and to try if possible to meet with the political prisoners there, to meet with Fidel Castro to raise directly or his brother Raul the issue of human rights and particularly the mistreatment, the torture, the degradation that is suffered by political prisoners in Cuba and there are still hundreds of them.

Some were recently let out including Dr. Oscar Biscet who I frankly nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize. He is an unbelievable man, a tremendous man. He's still under what we call house arrest but at least he's out of solitary. He is not being torture per se and I was denied. I tried to go with the cultural exchange group because if you're getting to the Cuba, you need to be going with some group. You can't just show up on your own and I couldn't get a visa - still can't get a visa to go to Cuba and yet a waiver was granted and Frank Wolf joined me in that; we - he and I are trying still.

We -we had been in prisons in China, the Soviet Union, Romania, East-bloc countries. I met with Xanana Gusmao when - when he was in - in - in a - from East Timor who then obviously went on to become president in - in Indonesia but we can't get into Cuba's prisons. And is - is very troubling, especially since that is what is permitted or exempted in terms of sanctions. So, member of Congress, chairman of the Human Rights Committee for Congress can't get into Cuba and yet that's waived. So if you could speak for that, I appreciate it.

CDEBACA: Well, you're correct that it's waived. It is the only thing that's waived for - for Cuba. We feel that Cuba doesn't have a - a comprehensive strategy to address this. It has little if no discernible anti-trafficking law enforcement that can care trafficking prevent measures. You know, most other countries even in you know, that end up being Tier 3, at least generally admit that there might be some trafficking going on. We feel as though going to trafficking specific that just as we had been able to establish a dialogue with the government of Cuba on migration issues, that we need to be in there trying to talk to them.

Trying to talk to them can be frustrating in not getting a visa at times. We - we don't based our rankings of countries on whether members of Congress or even me or my staff can get a visa there to go talk to them. There's been other countries, other than Cuba where we haven't had a - the - the luck of getting our visa issued as we would desire. But I think at the end of the day, the calibration that this administration has on Cuba is very much that if we can get not only the formal dialogues with the government through, especially on the migration dialogue but also that notion of some people to people were getting the Cuban people to be able to see what freedom looks like to be able to see what that example does. It will achieve great change on the island.

And so within the context of this particular sanctions which are just some of many against the regime and doing business Cuba, we felt that exempting out these cultural and educational exchange programs was a way to continue those types of relationships. As you said, even during the depths of the Cold War, that notion of educational exchange programs was one of the ways that we were able to: A) keep the dialogue going but B) Raise up an entire generation of leaders who in the late '80s and early '90s finally were able to achieve change behind the iron curtain. And we want to continue to be able to do that with Cuba.

SMITH: Mr. Payne?

PAYNE: Thank you very much. I just wondered if anyone of you would take on the question and the answer. Human trafficking is a broad term that encapsulates a diverse group of crimes from debt- bondage to child sex trafficking. In your opinion, anyone of you could try to answer this, what are the main push and pull factors driving international human trafficking? What do you - how do they differ in your opinion by region and by type of trafficking and to what extent do you - that do current anti-trafficking programs address such underlying factors or vulnerabilities? Do you see a big difference as it relates around the world? Do you think there's any sort of cartel that communicates with each other in different regions of the world. I just wonder if anyone would like to take that general question.

CDEBACA: I think I might teed (ph) up but I know but I know that my colleagues have thoughts on this because we have talked about this over the last couple of years. You know, we're talking about a - two regions of the world that are both source and destination regions. I sometimes have mentioned that to Secretary Blake that I'm going to see some of his clients when I'm going to the Gulf states because there's so many people from South and Central Asia who are there, who are vulnerable and often exploited.

On the other hand, there are people within South Asia who are going from one country to another within South Asia who are enslaved in their own countries. Same I think is true in - in East Asia where we have a lot of interregional trafficking that happens. At the end of the day poverty is very much a driver of this but it's not necessarily the most abject poverty, perhaps is the one step up on the development rung. The person that actually sees an opportunity to having gone to school now, having no opportunity to get a job in their home village or their hometown, says will - that I'm gonna have to go off somewhere else.

All too often the person who can help them do that is not a - honest labor broker, it's somebody who is gonna charge a usurious recruiting fee and enforced that through force, threats of force and threats of coercion. And so one of the things that we very much look at is the idea that development could do something to stem the flow while recognizing that there's some research out there now that's showing that this is definitely a crime of opportunity. The victims want opportunity. They're willing to - to put themselves in harm's way to some degree and the traffickers see the opportunity to take advantage of them.

It manifests itself very differently in a number of these different countries though. Even in different parts of the same country, you'll have mainly sex trafficking in one part and another part mainly agricultural trafficking, which is why I think that the work that we do at the embassies is so important. We have to apply these minimum standards to the regions and to the world but we have to do it in a context of each one of these countries. The difference between a Senegal and a South Korea are very different based on where they are and what they need. And we have to be able to tell the difference as we're applying these minimum standards that you've given us.

BLAKE: Let me - let me jump it, just to add to what Ambassador CdeBaca said. You know, I think in the SCA region you see both the combination of push and pull factors as you said Mr. Payne. You know in places like India and Nepal, trafficking is often a function of poverty and poor education where particularly young women but also young children are very vulnerable to seductive pitches from traffickers who promised a better life in the city and find themselves enslaved once they get there and in debt, bondage of some sort, which they'll never get out of. So, they're very, very vulnerable to those kind of pitches.

It's also a function of weak governmental institutions and weak rule of law that is unable to deal with these kind of challenges. Frequently, you find trafficking in countries where there's a - a, you know, poor level or low level of economic growth. Places like Tajikistan where, you know, one-seventh of the country is working outside of Tajikistan in Russia and in Kazakhstan because there's no economic opportunity for them. So, those migrant workers are often very vulnerable in - in the countries in which they work. As Ambassador CdeBaca said, not just in the Gulf but in Russia and elsewhere.

Another serious problem almost throughout my region is corruption where again those weak government institutions and often are really paid. Officials are very susceptible to corruption, particularly by these organized criminal gangs and networks and so that is a very difficult problem for us to try to deal with. So, you know, our challenge is to try shine a light on these practices as I - as I think this report does but also work with the many capable NGOs on the ground who are doing terrific work. And then finally to - to engage the governments directly, not only in terms of advocacy but in terms of the many important programs that your committee helps to fund.

YUN: Mr. Chairman of course I agree with everything that's been said but an interesting aspect in my view is clearly it is tied to poverty and economy. Having said that, it is also clear that in some cases country and countries can make enormous progress in very, very short time. And in my region, I would highlight South Korea and Taiwan. So you need to ask, why is it that some countries can make enormous progress in a very short time. Obviously, strengthen of institution is one and I would say what I would loosely call freedom index is another one.

That is the media as a watchdog, civil society, and of course the willingness of law makers to look at the legislation, to look at the laws and see what they can learn from elsewhere and what will work with them. So it is entirely possible in my view that in many countries, things can improve quite rapidly, given opportunities.

PAYNE: Thank you, kind of a similar question in that vein because - I just wonder how - how does the problem in your opinion of human trafficking compare to other socioeconomic challenges facing governments that are not fully compliant with the U.S. minimum requirements. Do you find that when human trafficking is - is a problem there - there are other similar problems? And - and secondly, where those sort of state corruption come in, officials? In many instances, you have to work with - with policing and I think policing around the world, even sometimes in our country we see policing problems.

Sometimes peaceful demonstrations are disrupted and - and they become actually a police riot. I mean we - there's some question about just what happen in San Diego a night or so ago where people are relatively peaceful (inaudible) might have been thrown but the reaction of - of - of a police force here in (inaudible). I'll try to just use that as - as an example that policing is - is so important, so with the law enforcement agencies in countries where the socioeconomic issues in some instances these law enforcement people aren't even paid, not that's an excuse for them to - to therefore be corrupt but are low paid and poorly trained. How does that whole thing fit in?

CDEBACA: Again, I think I'll - I'll let my colleagues discuss the particular ways that, that manifests in - in those regions but I think on the overarching, I think we learned that lesson in the United States prior to 1947. We may have forgotten it frankly. You know, one of the things that, that was the major civil rights achievement of the Roosevelt administration, working with the NAACP litigators and others, was to break the backs (ph) of the bondage in sharecropping system in the South and that didn't happen until 1947. Allowing the space then to move on from 13th amendment (inaudible) burdens to 14th and 15th civil rights, housing, voting.

All of the things that we're familiar with from the '50s and '60s but at the end of the day it was the sheriffs and it was the local justices of peace that were enforcing debt bondage in the American South for three generations after slavery was officially illegal. That's corruption writ large and then it was systemic corruption. And we see some places where that type of corruption still exists but we then - we also see the individual corruption of a police officer or their family who actually owns the brothels. It's not just that the cops are going to these brothels as kind of the boys will be boys tolerance which we need to root out but then it's also that they're individually profiting or we see countries where the, you know, the large landed interest don't want to clean up some of the problems with deforestation or extractive industries because it's the senator's brothers or cousins, or whoever that own those plantation.

So, we have to keep unpacking this corruption problem because I think that the easy corruption problem is to say it's the fault of some low level guy that's taking a bribe. We have to not only look at that level, we have to go up that other step, not blaming the deputy. You have to go after the sheriff themselves.

PAYNE: Yes, that's excellent. Yes.

BLAKE: Mr. Payne, I - I would say to answer your first question, I think we do often see problems like cracking a person's drug trafficking and others, coexisting with each other. And again, there are function of - of the fact that these organized criminal groups are often involved in these activities and find them very, very profitable but I think corruption is also very, very, very significant problem and, you know, corruption often exists where you have as I said poorly paid officials, poorly developed institutions but also it's a function of a lack of democracy and independent democracy institutions like a free press, like free NGO such as Transparency International that can bring to life some of these things without fear of retribution.

It's a function of often lack of opposition parties in many of these countries who again have an interest in bringing these kind of things to light. So, it's a whole series of things and often we try to see these in a - in a holistic way as well and try to again not only address the - the problem itself but in my mind the most critical things we can do in many of these countries is to work on rule of law because that underlies everything else. And if you have a strong, independent judiciary, you can get to the root of many of these problems quite quickly.

PAYNE: It's great. I - I couldn't agree with you more. The - and I do - I listen to my colleague. I - I was fortunate enough to get into Cuba a number of years ago and I - I thought it was, you know, my responsibility to raise issues with Mr. Castro. Fidel Castro at that time was the leader there and I raised issues about, as a matter of fact, the inequity of - of blacks in Cuba. Much of it is - that was of course the cross of remittance is coming from the U.S. and other places. And the ones who left were not the blacks.

They were left behind and so there is a growing inequity among the races and so very little we can do about that but I also raised a question about with some investments starting in hotels, starting at their - started to become a - a prostitution question. It wasn't gigantic but it was starting to raise its ugly head and raised a question that once again the poor people are going to be the ones. The minorities would end up in the position by virtue of their lack of - of equality financially and that there needs to be attention given to this. And that this was not in the right direction and even raised the question of - of prisoners and - and - and as a matter of fact another group went down after that and instructed them to not only raise the question but as well to talk to them about the fact that there should be - you need to reconsider people who are in prison that should not be there and have not had a fair trial which was raised by some members - some people.

And - and that seemed to have had some positive impact because we have seen - people shouldn't been in prison in the first place but there has been some or at least alive and wanted to try to feel that there's need to be dialogue. I recently came back from - I went to Bahrain a couple of weeks ago and although there was only interest in me, you know, seeing the - the employment and things that were going on well, I wanted to meet the 25 medical people who are sentenced.

And government had all 25 - 25 of them, doctors and - and medical people who had been charged with the crime at a hospital which is unheard of but they had now have to - there will be another trial. It's a military trial. I think the pressure, my going with the - of other members push them to reconsider. So, these - all of the folks will be retried, so I think it's a step in a right direction. They have a committee of inquiry that we hope - that they will come out with, and they're from - not from that country but from outside the country but people still have not been put back to work.

They were fired before protesting and we said that this is wrong. People should not be turned in a - labor unions had been discriminated against but, you know, I think that when you get opportunity to go, we made it very clear that these - and met with these - these in different groups which are not on regular program. We insisted before we went. We had to meet with them and we have to make ourselves clear that these are things that have to be turned around and that we insist that there be a - that this injustice in that kingdom ends. So, I do find some, I guess the point is that I find some value of going and having conversations with some of the people that we don't necessarily don't want to go to dinner with necessarily but to try to convince them that policies need to be changed. Thank you.

CDEBACA: Mr. Payne if - if I could, the - I think that what we've seen is that if its simply the trafficking ambassador that goes out and raises this and then you know comes back and works on their report, that those governments - the ones who are friendly and want to fight on this with us, they would have done that without a visit from me. The ones who are not interested in working on human trafficking without some cajoling, it's not just me going, it's - when they hear it from Bob Blake, when they hear it from Joe Yun and Kurt Campbell, when they hear it from you all, when you were out on the - on the road in the (inaudible), when your staff has been out, when I was in the Judiciary Committee staff, I was able to - to go to a shelter in Cambodia with Sheri Rickert from the Foreign Affairs Committee staff and some others.

And, you know, being able to see the victim practices there but also having to have the Cambodians know that Congress cared. It's a very different message than simply, you know, a guy from a small office in a State Department raising the issue of slavery in a modern era. So, we, you know, joined you in that notion that there is value and we wanted to support whether it's (inaudible) traveling with us. We'll (inaudible) I think we were out on the road but knowing that you're raising it as well makes a big difference.

SMITH: I'll just ask a couple of followup or final questions. The first I'm sure all three of you saw the New York Times article, "The Other India: Where are the Children?" on October 12th, just a couple of weeks ago - couple - a week ago and it makes a very disturbing statement that between January of 2008 and October 2010, 13,570 children were missing in Delhi alone. It says that some of the children were eventually found and spoke of being taken by force or being enticed with promises of food and clothes but they were then sold into various forms of slavery including domestic labor, beggary, agriculture labor, or commercial sex work.

And the article also notes that a provisional Indian census reported in 2010 that an estimated 1 in 10 workers in India are children and experts say that these numbers are conservative. I guess Ambassador Blake this might be to you as well as to all three of you really. The downgrading or the upgrading I should say of India off the watch list not to Tier 3 but rather Tier 2, I listen very carefully, I read it very carefully in - in the report but there's still I think some very disconcerting and unanswered questions.

You're saying in your testimony, Ambassador CdeBaca that sex trafficking in women and children has not abated and may in fact be increasing in places such as India. So, it would appear according to your testimony that at least as bad and possibly getting worse. About 10 years ago, I had a hearing and - I had several hearings on trafficking. And you hear it from the International Justice Mission, IJM, and the testimony was focused on India and Gary Haugen actually brought a video and showed all of these young, some of them are not even teenagers.

They were so young, little girls that were in a cellar who - when police came and the - and the traffickers were tip off by the police and they went to some - some - some charade. Afterwards, the little girls were brought out of the - the - the hiding place. Their eyes were all dark because it was all - were - were, you know they're squinted and you could see that these were tiny, little at risk little girls who were in - who are being trafficked. And one of these that Gary Haugen made very clearly was in his testimony, a point made clearly was it's the police.

And I have noticed, you know, if we're going to have a problem anywhere, it's not often the president, the prime minister, it's that point of contact at the police level which obviously is part of government and therefore subjected or subjective in minimum standards. This report, other reports that I've read on India point out that law enforcement still maybe lacks, still maybe the Achilles heel in India. I was actually in Nigeria, in Abuja in the hotel after a full day working on trafficking.

When I turn on CNN and there was a - a very, very fine report about how is International CNN in India and again the police were tipped off. They went through the charade of walking into brother and - and the kids, some of them didn't get out quick enough ran out the street. And he said by the next day, they're all back being sold and - and exploited and the police were laughing about it. And I'm wondering if that's still a problem, especially since you pointed out Ambassador CdeBaca that sex trafficking in women and children may not have abated and may in fact be increasing in places such as India.

You know, are we just holding our breath with some hope here? That India will get its act together and - and I add into that the singular problem but not apparently government sponsored like China where the one-child-per-couple policy, a major push towards the elimination of the girl child but we had a press conference again, right? In this room, very recently and it was focused on India and China and the - the bias against and prejudice against the birth of and the - the lives of little girls.

And again, most of the girls are eliminated, destroyed by sex- selection abortions but many others, particularly in India are killed after they're born, their gender discovered and they are suffocated or killed in some other way. As a matter of fact, one of our - one of our people at their testimony said, the most dangerous three words in that part of the world is, it's a girl. It's a girl, she may be dead or if she gets to be a little bit older, she may be exploited through trafficking. And I'm, again, with deep respect to Ambassador Blake and to all of you, I would hope that unless there's - my hope is next time around, India, if they have not made truly significant progress, you know when you say there's 80 units of trafficking units. That's 1 out of every 14 million people.

You know, is that just something that's been put together to appease or to a local, political constituency or an international one? Or is this really an all out effort to eradicate slavery? Because as Ambassador CdeBaca said it's either abated, has not abated, it may even getting worse?

BLAKE: Mr. Chairman, that's a big question about a big country, so let me - let me try to tackle it and then I'll ask Lou to - to chime in. First of all, let me say that I personally had been working on - on this issue about Trafficking in Persons in India for the last eight years. I started out as the deputy chief of mission in 2003 and spent three years there. One of my most important task then as chief deputy of mission who work on Trafficking in Persons, I led our working group inside the embassy working on this because I felt it was such an important priority.

And you're right, I remembered going to train stations and seeing traffickers waiting for young kids to get off the trains from rural areas because they were so poor and so desperate and these - these guys were predators, waiting to - to basically bring them into slavery. And I was there with - with really dedicated NGOs who are there to stop those guys and had in fact found partners in the police to help them stop. So there were are - there were even at that time, there were some quite good efforts that we were supporting to stop those kind of practices.

At that time too Mr. Chairman, I think, you know, India often even refuse to admit these kind of things even existed, and - and certainly didn't want to acknowledge the scope and scale of problem. I - I think we've - we've come a long way since there, Mr. Chairman with due respect. You know, this year India was upgraded because they're making some pretty significant efforts. I mentioned that the 80 Anti-Human Trafficking units, what's significant about that is that now those are under the authority of the very powerful Ministry of Home Affairs which is their chief law enforcement branch that's responsible for this.

And the minister himself has taken direct responsibility for this issue which is very significant. Before it was, the Ministry of Women and Child Affairs and things like that but the Ministry of Home Affairs was not that directly involved. So, this I think is quite significant. Secondly, they say they had ratified the - the protocol and most importantly of all as you said Mr. Chairman is working with the police, is working with courts because that's where the real action, is gonna be to stop these guys who are engage in the trafficking itself.

In the past, India often used to arrest the victims. They go into a brothel and they arrest all the - all the girls and the people who had been trafficked, not the people who were behind it. And again, I think that's really changing now and I - I could just give you a few examples if I could. You know, we - we've been working a lot in Mumbai. Mumbai is just a - is a real center for the trafficking industry and people come from as far away as Bangladesh and Nepal and they're trafficked into Mumbai.

There's a real - there's a judge there by the name of Judge Swati Chauhan, who's really done some terrific, terrific work and she, you know, literally her court has taken over and cleared hundreds of sex trafficking cases. And, you know, issued rehabilitation orders for roughly 1200 rescued women. And what's important about this, that the Ministry of Home Affairs has not only taken note of her efforts but has said, we need - that they need to publicize those efforts and duplicate those efforts all over India. So, they're actually organizing very soon a - a seminar of all these (inaudible) units all around India to come and hear about how she has done this and how she has tackled this. And I think they're gonna - they're gonna try to resource this in appropriate way.

They're also going to expand these - these anti-human trafficking units. They've got 80 of them now but I think they have intentions over time to - to establish them in all 600 districts of India which, you know, is a big deal. You know and again I wanted to say at the state level, there's a huge disparity in India between some states are doing a lot very well and then others that aren't doing so well. And I think in - in a lot of the states now where you do see quite significant trafficking like West Bengal, like Maharashtra which I mentioned, Karnataka, the police are actively working, not only in sex trafficking side but increasingly on the bond of labor side.

And as Lou will remember, back in 2003 to 2006, this wasn't even on their radar and now it's not only that they're dealing with it, they're dealing on law enforcement side and bringing these into court systems and prosecuting people. So, you know, does the problem settles ...

(CROSSTALK)

SMITH: Does that also include police who are complicit by the (inaudible) for prosecutor.

BLAKE: You know, I can't tell - I can't tell you for sure.

(CROSSTALK)

SMITH: If you could get that, I'll be very happy ...

(CROSSTALK)

BLAKE: Yes, I will.

(CROSSTALK)

SMITH: It will show whether or not ...

(CROSSTALK)

BLAKE: Well, that's a very good question but - but the point I wanna make is, does - do the problem still exist? Of course they do but I think what's really different now is that there's a political will on the part, not only with the federal government but the state government and most importantly the law enforcement. And what - what - to get back to Mr. Payne's question, you know, I - I talked about the rule of law. And what India does have going forward is an independent rule of law, particularly a very strong supreme court.

And you know, I think that is the backbone of a lot of what - what happens in India and for that reason you do have very strong NGOs. You have very strong opposition parties. All of them were more than happy to - to highlight these problems and - and try to get them addressed. So, you know, there's still a lot of problems to be dealt with but I do believe that India is making progress in the right direction.

SMITH: Mr. Ambassador?

CDEBACA: I second that. I think that one of the things that it was notable over the last couple of years is that we've seen from the supreme court is, that it has began to do these inquiries into the different aspects of the anti-trafficking fight. Not just on the sex trafficking or that the sex trafficking of children but looking at things as diverse as the circus performers who are being enslaved. We had a briefing from the (inaudible)Project the other about the HHS funded hotline that they run here in the United States.

And one of the trends that they saw was that they've gotten, I think, 29 or 30 calls from people who are in carnivals here in the United States who are - who are trying to get help because they'd been harmed or trapped or something. The civil rights division actually prosecuted cases of that (inaudible) in the 1970s to suddenly see that the supreme court of India was having hearing on the exploitation of these people in this - this transient (inaudible) circuses. I think it shows that there's kind of a level of sophistication that's coming in to some of these institutions in India that we frankly have not seen, six or eight years ago. Obviously, we do have a very large problem of human trafficking in India.

No one, the Indian or the American or anybody else from the looks of it would say otherwise. I think that one of the concerns that we have and we've mentioned this in the report last year, as far as the changing nature of sex trafficking in India that has as you mentioned that's in our testimony, is this notion that there are - seems to be a move from the red light districts to roadside prostitutions, small hotels and private apartments. That is problematic for a whole host of reasons in no small part because it becomes the - the law enforcement challenge as law enforcement becomes more serious about doing these cases. The law enforcement challenge goes up very steeply when you don't have access to the people here you're trying to save, the people you're trying to rescue.

So, we're looking at this, we're gonna be - continuing to be raising that with our Indian counterparts but there are definitely things happening in India that I think anyone looking at India circa 2002, 2003, it would be mind boggling to think that they're actually liberating people from (inaudible), putting bonded labor bosses in jail. We need to take that now, work in partnership with Indians as the two largest common law, not just large democracies but common law countries and really take it to the next level. Driving it out to the states is as important as it is in India, as it is here in the United States, that's when law enforcement gets done and we wanna work with our counterparts there to make sure that, that happens.

SMITH: I appreciate that. Two final questions and thank you for that explanation. The first is with regards to Vietnam and Ambassador CdeBaca, we've talked about that many times and I've raised it as have others many times at - at hearings. The labor trafficking issue, your view as to whether or not there really is progress being made, especially since so many of the - the allegations are against companies that are really state-run companies, the (inaudible) case, still no payment as far as I know of the $3.5 million and I know you're involved in that prosecution, the very first one, pursuant to the TPVA.

And then the second question, if you could maybe speak to a good news issue and that would be, you know, Nigeria is now Tier 1 country. I have visited there. I mentioned that a moment ago, met with their (inaudible) leaders and went to Lagos where trafficking obviously is a problem. Many of those women, young girls who trafficked right into Europe, with Italy and I would just tell a very, very quick story about a - a woman named Elizabeth that I met in Rome, who actually became pregnant as a direct result of - of being trafficked and abused sexually. And she made a statement, I'll never forget, she goes, this child, this little 3-year-old who's running around at the shelter in Rome and she had been trafficked for about five years, a terrible ordeal.

I would hope she writes a book someday because it's a testimony to faith and courage but this young Nigerian woman said, "the child saved my life," and said "if it wasn't for this child, I'll probably more (ph) than just statistic," so you know, suicide or something along those lines. And you know here, that kind of heroic love for a child, you know, all that often at least explain like that but she told how she went through the route out of Nigeria into - into - into Italy. So, the question is Nigeria, they're Tier 1, it's a good news story I think. They certainly have tried very hard and maybe you want to elaborate on that for the record as well as the Vietnam question.

CDEBACA: Well, I'll take the Vietnam and then I think that Mr. Yun can set us a scene for us on - on Vietnam. Nigeria is - is an interesting case because, of course, Nigeria has not necessarily thought of on - on many law enforcement issues as being on the cutting edge. It's not a country unlike what we'd been testifying too today as far as transparency (inaudible) or - or corruption in the (inaudible) things that always comes out on top. And yet, we've seen some very innovative anti-trafficking efforts there that, as you say, you know when we look at over the last two years the - the application of the facts and the minimum standards has come out as a Tier 1.

You know, we don't go into these with a predetermined tier ranking. We put the facts into the laws like we have a big machine, (inaudible) law go together and we turn the crank and suddenly Nigeria comes out the other side with a Tier 1 label on it, and I think surprised a lot of people frankly. And maybe even surprise the Nigerians themselves but, you know, at the end of the day what they did was very innovative. Taking police, prosecutors, and social workers and putting them in the - in the same not just chain of command but putting them in the same office., assigning them to cases simultaneously. So that they knew that they were going to be working throughout, that's very different than what most countries do.

Here in the United States, we have prosecutors assigned to cases early on and we have victim/witness coordinators in most of our law enforcement entities but, you know, there's very prosecutors that are older than me that came up in that system. And thank God as I age, most of the good prosecutors younger than me, don't even know that there was a time when there wasn't a victim/witness coordinator in that prosecutor's office, fighting for the rights of the victim. Nigeria seems to have taken that ethos and taken it to a new level.

I think that was perhaps one of the reasons why we saw at the ASEAN Prosecutors Conference in Singapore this summer that, that cutting edge prosecutors that were invited to share their best practices with their ASEAN counterparts. ASEAN looks to a couple of places that may be people wouldn't be surprised about, Sweden and the United States but then they also look to Nigeria and so to the degree that we're seeing African leadership that can be tapped into around the globe. These are very, very positive thing for this fight against human trafficking.

Now each year, we're gonna look at Nigeria - we - Tier 1 is responsibility, not a reprieved and we hope that Nigeria will continue to sharpen and to continue to improve because like India, it is a country that has a big trafficking problem, even when they were doing well or they're doing a good job of having these structures or having good results, there's still a big, big, trafficking problem with Nigerians. As we saw in some of the Tunisian refugee camps in Libya and other places, pimps who, you know, who suddenly were in the camps with the women, that they had been trying to get across into Europe.

So, this is a - it's a problem that continues to be one but seeing that ASEAN region prosecutors react to their Nigerian counterparts and seeing African leadership that way, to me showed that we really are, after this decade of development, we're on the precipice I think of some real change here.

YUN: Thank you. Vietnam is a case with expended great deal of efforts. Secretary Clinton was there twice over the past 18 months and I was with her in both occasions. And in both meetings, the items that seated very prominently were human rights and trafficking. They're of course challenged on both accounts as well as freedom of religion, though that remains an issue. Vietnam is designated as Tier 2 watch list but I do believe they are undergoing changes, both in the government and in society, where we're being - we're seeing signs.

Some - some concrete sigs that they're making some progress. No. 1 is that they now do have a law, anti-trafficking law and the question remains how is it going to be implemented. The law was only passed I think maybe about nine months ago, so we're keeping a very close eye on that and also there are - are -there has been number of criminal prosecutions and convictions of sex traffickers, so we are encouraged by that. There is still, as you mentioned, labor trafficking remains an issue and again, we are somewhat happy that they now have a pre-departure training for overseas workers.

So, it's - it's - is changing and we do hope it will change more rapidly and we have - we are expending great deal of bilateral efforts. In fact, in - in about two weeks, we're gonna hold annual human rights dialogue. On our side, it will be led by Assistant Secretary Posner and the Vietnamese will be here this year and so next year we'll go over there. So, these dialogues and high-level meetings have helped but I understand your concerns.

SMITH: I appreciate that. Just before I yield to Mr. Payne, earlier today Secretary of State, Hillary Clinton testified before the full Foreign Affairs Committee. And I was focused on Afghanistan and Pakistan and my and everyone else's questions were primarily focused on that. I did ask her if she would pick up the phone and call the foreign minister of China to inquire as to whether or not Chen Guangcheng is dead or alive or - or perhaps even dying. There had been numerous reports. We don't know if they're true.

He has been beaten savagely by the - the Chinese police, first in prison and then under house arrest and his crime, as we all know, is that he - he pushed human rights. He is the blind activist lawyer and actually raised the case of forced abortion in Linyi and - and took the winning side and for that he was singled out for excessively brutality. Again, knowing that, that issue of human rights abuse leads directly into our reason for being here this afternoon, human trafficking and exacerbates it significantly.

If you could that back, she didn't answer the question, pretty much ran out of time but didn't go back to it later but I think a phone call - I will be convening an emergency hearing of the China Commission next week and I hope Ambassador Campbell can make it as one of the members of the Executive Branch who was on that. I am chairman of that commission and there will be an emergency meeting focus on Chen and his wife. Where are they? And whether or not they are dead or alive and - and what they're doing, what the rest is doing, and what any country that cares about human rights is doing? This would be Beijing to raise his - his case because we think he may actually be dead or bleeding as released. Please take that back. Mr. Payne?

PAYNE: Just a quick question, two more at (inaudible) Nigeria and I - I just was going to - when I said I have a couple of other questions, I didn't know he was going to raise it but I wanted to know what, if anyone, with you Ambassador CdeBaca might tell us what African countries have made the most progress outside of Nigeria in confronting human trafficking and learning best practices that can replicate it and the other part of the question is that there are regional groups, as you know, in Africa, the SADC in the South and EGAD in the East and ECOWAS in the West. Had there - did you find it an advantage, the AU in general, Africa Union to work with the regional groups, sort of see if the best practices that there were some that noted, could then be introduced there.

CDEBACA: Well exempting Nigeria from the question, makes it a little tougher but - because that is such an innovative practice. You know, I think - let me say one last thing about Nigeria because there was something that was done, that the Netherlands and Nigeria cooperated on and that was bringing up some traditional healers. So, that the victims in the case in the Netherlands would be able to in effect have a counter put unto - the juju that they'd put on, then put on them before they left home which was as powerful of a form of coercion to them based on their religious and cultural practices.

As were the threats of force, then the beatings that they were undergoing at the hands of their traffickers. And that notion of - that innovation of bringing in a traditional healer in order to - to have a counter ceremony for those - those women was I think very forward thinking. And it's the kind of thing that, you only get if you have those relationships between the governments on these issues. We certainly seen on the part of Mauritius but a - meeting the minimum standards but as far as the tiers are concerned, that's really what we see in - in the Africa region. We'd like to see more on the mainland itself.

There are some, I think, hunger on the part of a number of governments to - to work on this. We've seen whether it's in Malawi or in Benin, programs that are out there working with, especially the child victims. Much of the victim re-ponds in Africa has been on child victims and we wanted to encourage that to continue but then also make sure that our African partners recognized male victims and the female victims who are adults, not just the children. Perhaps some of that is because of the good work that we've seen from UNICEF in the area. It's so dominant then that a lot of countries respond on child issues first.

A success story of sorts is the rapid movement that we've seen in Swaziland over the last two years. Swaziland Tier 3 on the report in 2009. Since then, having raised up to Tier 2, maybe because there were so late coming to the game and they came in as a Tier 3 country that denied there was trafficking, didn't want to do anything on it, et cetera. When the wake-up call happened, they, together and their ministerial working group that had NGOs on the working group. We don't even have that at the United States.

So when they meet and under the auspices of the prime minister himself, when they meet, the NGOs and that the folks from the government are together in the room, what we've seen is that it's got a level of respect for each other that has been slow coming in many other African countries. The NGOs feel like they can get fair shake from their government counterparts and the government counterparts don't just look at that NGO as potential rivals for power or someone who could be a problem for them. And that's something, again, that we - we really like to see.

Swaziland obviously has a very specific governing structure and, you know, in other countries that don't have a monarchy, that don't - that have different types of - of governments, perhaps that couldn't happen quite as quickly but we have seen that as a - as a real positive. I think that at the end of the day what we've really seen is that notion of political will. In Senegal, when the government started focusing on child begging and realizing that Qur'anic teacher were not a religious institution but were cowards hiding behind the Koran as a way to lure the children in, so that they could do their begging all of the time.

Taking advantage not only of the - the trust that the parents had of these supposed religious figures but also taking advantage of the - the admonishment that the Koran has as far as alms giving and as far as the - the support that should be have for such school. Preventing (ph) that in a way that is right out of Dickens. This begging - child begging rings have been plaguing that part of Africa for quite a while and to start to see the government in that part of Africa recognized that it's not cultural. It's not just something that's always going to happen but it's criminals who were taking advantage of children.

I think that's the best practice in of itself. The recognition and then the political will to do something about it. It would - you know, that's not just an African begging. We've seen this in the UK, just in the recent months, calibration of Eastern European children from begging rings. Obviously, we see this in - in New Delhi and - and any major city I think in the region, and we see it here in the United States. So this notion of - of the beggars is something that we all share but I think in Africa, the countries rising up against it as we are starting to see happening. That's a - that's a great thing to see.

PAYNE: That's great, just finally, we - we had a hearing with the committee and there was a young man who was blind. He was a slave I think right from South Sudan and we know that's been a problem in (inaudible) children and other children, especially during the conflicts, was encouraged by the government of the North. And I wonder if the - some of the conflicts where abduction is still happening and of course people are brought into indentured servitude, have you seen in that, start to eliminate it soon. Can you give a short statement on that?

CDEBACA: Well, sadly the conflict because it is the enemy of - of rule of laws, it creates the ultimate zone impunity of where the traffickers operate. Conflict does seem to be followed very closely by this, especially in Africa. And unfortunately, it's not only that the slavery that comes in its wake, whether it's the villages being emptied out for - to men to work as - as porters with the - the - as the army moves around, for the women to cook, clean, and - and be used as frankly sex slaves but also for the children to work in artisanal mines, whether it's gold or - or the rare metals that we used on our cell phones and other things. But also that notion of conscripting, flat out stealing frankly, combatants.

And so this notion of the child soldiers being in effect both victim and perpetrator at the same time I think is one of the - the tragedies of the region. What we have seen is that a number of countries have taken steps. With the - the good work of UNICEF and the work that we've been doing and others, we've seen a difference in Chad for instance as far demobilization of - of child soldiers. What we'd like to see more in - in countries around the world is not simply demobilization and giving some type of safety to the child soldiers who you captured from the people that are fighting against you but then also countries looking at their own troops and making sure that they're scrubbing them accordingly.

So while that the trend seems to be improving a bit, we need to keep our eye on the ball as far as the child soldier issues. And while my office is not the lead on child soldiers in the State Department, that's the Bureau of Democracy Rights and Labor. We've certainly looked at each year in the trafficking report because we know that slavery, whether it's those - the women that were held as sex slaves in - during the Balkan conflict in Europe, whether it's the - the folks who are currently held in Africa who are in other parts of the world, this follows conflict wherever it goes.

PAYNE: Thank you very much. I yield back.

SMITH: (inaudible) a followup in terms of things looking into. On July 22nd, I chaired a hearing of the Helsinki Commission on the egregious practice in Egypt of abducted, kidnapping young Catholic Christian girls, apparently by the thousand, each thousand is each year, who are then held and forced into Islam and then given at age 18 to a man and now they are Islamic. The woman who testified and several, three people testified, was Michele Clark who both Ambassador CdeBaca, you and I know very well as No. 2 for trafficking at the Organization for Security and Co-Operation in Europe.

A very reputable, she is a professor at George Washington University and she said it's not a matter of allegations anymore. She has actually done the reporting herself and will be doing more reporting on this but it seems to be a human rights and I would say a trafficking issue, certainly something that rises to the level of. It needs to be combated very aggressively and I'm wondering, you know, if - if something that you have looked into. We gave the information to our new ambassador who before she was deployed to Cairo and the hope is that she will really raised it.

But I can't imagine what it must be like for a parent, especially for the young girl but for a parent and her entire family to have first the child abducted and then put into a situation of bondage, if you will, and then perhaps abused in numerous ways and that the appropriate age, age 18, given as some kind of gift, like chattel slavery to someone as a wife. And again, Michele Clark has, her strength, has true credentials in - in the human trafficking area and she says, we are missing it. So, if you could speak to that, No. 1.

The second Uzbekistan, again putting on my Helsinki hat, every year the cotton crop is picked by large numbers of young children who are brought out of school and - and it is child labor at its worse and yet for four years Uzbekistan has been on the Tier 2 watch list. It seems to me they should have dropped to Tier 3, your views?

CDEBACA: I think I'll - to Egypt and then maybe we can go to northeast with Assistant Secretary Blake who is fresh off the plane from Uzbekistan. Mr. Smith, we'll look into the new allegations that you mentioned. We certainly look through the earlier report that ICI did that I think that Professor Clark had been involved with but it sounds like there maybe some new information. We'd very much like to look at that. This is a - an area that we looked at. We also, of course, looked at Muslim girls being put into, sold for marriage and other things, whether it's through the temporary marriages to what basically can only be described as sex tourist.

(CROSSTALK)

SMITH: But as Michele Clark said, if I may interrupt you briefly, from certain jaundiced view on the part of some, they get two things out of it. They get a wife who then they gave out like she's some kind of property or commodity. And secondly, they Islamized the woman and - and to me that, that is, you know, if somebody decides to be Muslim, Christian, whatever their faith maybe and that's what freedom of conscience is all about. But to do it through coercion, is - is a horrific, given her rights (inaudible), sorry to interrupt.

CDEBACA: No, I was just saying that we would very much look forward to seeing, you know, the - the results of any new reporting any new evidence. It's something that we take seriously and we also continue to take seriously the promises of the new government in Egypt that has assured us that they will enforce and continue to implement the national plan of action for combating trafficking-in-persons, which was announced in December of last year which was a few weeks before the events of the Arab spring happened.

Despite the fact that there had been a lot of leadership by then First Lady Suzanne Mubarak on getting that national plan of action in placed and equally obviously that the Mubarak family is no longer in the position they were. We've heard from the current government that this is something that they want to continue because they realized that this protects Egyptians, whether Egyptian children or Egyptian adults. And so as we continue to work with them on how they're going to implement that action plan, how they're gonna bring it to life, we wanna make sure that all of these allegations about a forced marriage, whether or Muslim or - or Christians are addressed. And we'll continue to - to look at this and like I said we'd be happy to look at the - the whatever new evidence that Michele or others might have.

BLAKE: On Uzbekistan Mr. Chairman, again this another country I worked hard on and to answer your questions, you know, we - we granted a waiver and kept Uzbekistan on the watch list this year because in March of this year, they decided to create an interagency working group to - that was tasked when ensuring compliance with all 13 of the ILO Conventions to which Uzbekistan is a party. That working group in turn has created an action plan to - to again ensure compliance.

This year the government permitted UNICEF to assess child labor in all 12 regions of Uzbekistan and, you know just as importantly I think. Uzbek officials tell us now that they're making a real effort for the first time to try to end the use of children under the age of 16 in the harvest and would actually punish those who are violating the law. So, the harvest is ongoing right now, Mr. Chairman as you probably know. But from initial reports that we received from independent sources and from our own embassy, they tell us that in fact there has been a reduced incidence this year of forced child labor in Uzbekistan.

And fewer schools had been closed as a result of that but this forced adult labor continues and in fact may be will be increasing to compensate for the - the child labor part of it. So, you know, obviously, we're gonna have to withhold judgment until the end of the season and see how it goes but, you know, I think we have the government's attention. And you know, they are now committed to this where they have an action plan. They submitted something on paper and you know this year we're really gonna seek I say three things.

First, we're gonna try to seek action to end the use of forced adult and child labor, full stop. Secondly, we're gonna try to urge them to investigate and prosecute officials who are suspected of being complicity in trafficking. Again, I think there's no stronger signal than putting people like that in jail and that's gonna serve as powerful deterrent to others. And then third, we wanna focus on China, encourage them to allow forced labor experts, particularly in the ILO in there.

UNICEF is doing these assessments now but it's really not their job and they themselves is the first to say that they encourage the government to - to do this. So, we're gonna be working both with the ILO and with the government to try to bring them together and achieve not only implementation of these conventions but also ILO presence on the ground to kind of verify that so.

SMITH: I appreciate that. Thank you, is there anything and I appreciate your work and, you know, with jet lag and all.

(LAUGHTER)

Let me just - is there anything else you - any of you would like to add before conclude the hearing? Any country you'd like to highlight that perhaps, Mr. Payne, Mr. Turner, and I have not brought out? Well, I wanna thank you so much but we will have some written questions. We won't keep you any longer and I do very much appreciate your work, we all do. The subcommittee respects the hard work that you expend everyday on behalf of the victims. So thank you so very much. The hearing is adjourned.

END

LOAD-DATE: October 28, 2011

251 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

Federal News Service

October 27, 2011 Thursday

Hearing of the Africa, Global Health, and Human Rights Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee Subject: The Trafficking in Persons Report 2011: Truth, Trends, and Tier Rankings Chaired by: Representative Christopher H. Smith (R-NJ) Witnesses: Luis CdeBaca, Ambassador-at-Large, State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons; Assistant Secretary of State Robert Blake of the Bureau of South and Central Asian Affairs; Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of State Joseph Yun of the Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs Location: 2200 Rayburn House Office Building, Washington, D.C. Time: 2:00 p.m. EDT Date: Thursday, October 27, 2011

SECTION: PRESS CONFERENCE OR SPEECH

LENGTH: 17316 words

Hearing of the Africa, Global Health, and Human Rights Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee Subject: The Trafficking in Persons Report 2011: Truth, Trends, and Tier Rankings Chaired by: Representative Christopher H. Smith (R-NJ) Witnesses: Luis CdeBaca, Ambassador-at-Large, State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons; Assistant Secretary of State Robert Blake of the Bureau of South and Central Asian Affairs; Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of State Joseph Yun of the Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs Location: 2200 Rayburn House Office Building, Washington, D.C. Time: 2:00 p.m. EDT Date: Thursday, October 27, 2011

REPRESENTATIVE CHRISTOPHER H. SMITH (R-NJ): The subcommittee will come to order. And good afternoon to everybody.

Welcome to this hearing to examine the State Department's 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report. This annual report to Congress was first mandated by legislation that I sponsored, known as the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000.

In 1998 -- and I know Ambassador CdeBaca is very well-aware of this -- when I first introduced the bill, the legislation was met with a wall of skepticism and opposition, although we did have some friends like the ambassador. People both inside of government and out thought the issue of human trafficking was merely a solution in search of a problem.

For most people at that time, the term "trafficking" applied almost exclusively to illegal drugs or weapons. Reports of vulnerable persons, especially women and children, being reduced to commodities for sale were often met with surprising credulity or indifference.

One major objection to the bill, especially from the Clinton administration, was the naming and ranking of countries based on compliance with the establishment of common-sense, minimum standards, clearly articulated prevention, protection and prosecution benchmarks, enforced by sanctions and penalties against egregious violators.

Fortunately, reality won out over ignorance. Although it took two years to overcome opponents and muster the votes for passage, the Trafficking Victims Protection Act was finally signed into law with strong bipartisan support. This support from both sides of the aisle has continued through subsequent reauthorizations and has been essential in the ongoing successes by the U.S. government in combating modern-day slavery both at home and abroad.

However, the battle is far from over. According to the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Human Trafficking, created by the TVPA, more than 12 million people worldwide are trafficking victims. Other estimates put the number of victims as high as 27 million.

Today we know that human trafficking is the third-most-lucrative criminal activity in the world. According to the International Labor Organization, human traffickers make profits in excess of $31 billion a year.

We are fortunate to have with us today three distinguished State Department witnesses to examine both the substance and the diplomatic activity that is behind the Trafficking in Persons Report.

The report, which is written by the TIP Office, headed by Ambassador Luis CdeBaca, summarizes the rankings and performance of each country and provides detailed recommendations as to how each country can improve its efforts.

But more than a source of comprehensive, concise knowledge about the fight against human trafficking around the world, the TIP report has been an incredibly effective diplomatic tool. The report has been a catalyst for improvement, often dramatic improvements, in efforts of governments to address human trafficking within their borders and regions.

With a combination of encouragement, persuasion and sustained pressure via sanctions or the threat of sanctions imposed by the U.S., countries around the world have created or amended over 120 laws to combat human trafficking, and in the past three years alone, an estimated 113,000 victims have been identified and assisted worldwide.

Individuals within each country can use the report to assess their government's commitment and to lobby their government to take specific measures.

The GTIP Office also coordinates technical assistance and aid for many of the countries wishing to improve their anti-trafficking response.

The result has been a worldwide anti-trafficking surge, largely dependent on the credibility, the accuracy and faithful implementation of the report, including the tier framework. This afternoon, we'll turn our attention to ensuring that the report retains these essential attributes and to assess whether or not it's fulfilling its purpose.

In 2003, Congress added a special watch list to the tier rankings to allow countries an opportunity to address serious shortcomings in their anti-trafficking efforts before being placed in tier three and subject to sanctions. When it became apparent that this tier-two watch list was becoming a permanent parking lot for some countries, Congress added a requirement to the 2008 reauthorization that the president either downgrade or upgrade any country that has been on tier-two watch lists for two consecutive years.

Obviously, the direction in which the country has moved is based on whether requisite measures were taken to meet the minimum standards. The president can waive the requirements to move a country off of the tier-two watch list for up to two years if the country has a plan to bring itself into compliance with minimum standards and designates sufficient resources to carry it out.

But this waiver should only be applied in the most extreme cases, as countries have had, since 2009, to undertake this effort. Consequently, it is with concern that I note the president has determined 12 countries need yet another year on tier-two watch lists.

Some of these countries, notably China and Russia, have been on the watch lists for seven and eight years, respectively. Uzbekistan has been on the list for four years.

I look forward to discussing with our witnesses today exactly why the administration is convinced these countries need yet another year to get their acts together.

I also look forward to a serious discussion about the application of sanctions.

The report shows that, of the 23 countries on tier three, the full sanctions envisioned by the TVPA will be applied to only three countries: Eritrea, Madagascar and North Korea. Partial sanctions will be imposed on seven countries, and 13 countries will have no trafficking sanctions imposed whatsoever.

Some may argue that being on tier three is punishment enough. But Congress envisioned tangible repercussion for countries on tier three. Those who work on the front lines of human trafficking know all too well that a law is useless and diminished at the very least unless faithfully implemented.

I look forward to discussing with our distinguished witnesses today the accuracy of the tier rankings and the importance of substantial follow-up action.

I'd like to now yield to my friend and colleague Mr. Payne for any opening comments he might have.

REPRESENTATIVE DONALD M. PAYNE (D-NJ): Thank you.

Let me start by commending Congressman Smith for calling this important hearing on the 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report.

I want to thank our witnesses for agreeing to testify before us today.

On June 27th, the State Department issued its 11th annual report on human trafficking, trafficking in persons, TIP, report, as mandated by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act.

Overall, the 2011 report presents a sobering view of the state of U.S. and international campaigns against human trafficking. It describes the most-common, severe forms of human trafficking and identifies key, emerging issues and trends.

Unfortunately, global progress has been mixed. For example, in the past two years, the average number of prosecutions of human- trafficking offenders has increased. However, if we look back further, we see that the total number of prosecutions have declined.

I look forward to hearing from our witnesses today about ways the international community can help developing countries (sharpen ?) their judicial systems to better respond to this and other criminal justice issues.

The report also reveals that we are failing to adequately target each subset of TIP, particularly forced labor, which the most common -- it's more than a common crime, it actually occurs much more than sex trafficking, but only represents 10 percent of all prosecutions. And I'm looking forward to hearing the panel's thoughts on how to better address this challenge of trafficking in the workforce.

I also hope the witnesses can highlight the unique challenges facing many African and conflict-stricken countries in addressing the issue of human trafficking.

According to the report, only two African nations, Nigeria and Mauritius, are fully complying with the minimum standards for combating human trafficking, therefore qualifying them as tier one. Ten African countries fall within tier three, which makes them subject to aid restrictions. In Africa, these potential aid restrictions are cause for concern. Many countries on the continent have been burdened by debilitating conflicts and strife.

Africa's conflicts have displaced citizens, traumatized local communities and orphaned children, who are particularly vulnerable to exploitation. In these conflict areas where government control is often limited, armed groups may abduct women and children for slavery, sexual slavery, and also often recruit children for their ranks.

Limited income-earning opportunities in conflict zones also contribute to these problems. Exploitation thrives under these conditions. Overburdened governments, poor judicial systems and widespread poverty prevent adequate country response to human trafficking cases in many of the countries that I'm referring to.

Yet some African nations are making progress on this front. The U.N. secretary general stated in his most recent Global Report on Children and Armed Conflict that despite several challenges, considerable progress was made by the Sudanese Peoples Liberation Army, the SPLA, in implementing a plan to remove child soldiers from its ranks.

According to the 2011 report, Chad reportedly ended all child conscription into its national army and continued to engage in efforts to demobilize remaining child soldiers from rebel forces. Earlier this month, President Obama certified that Chad had taken necessary steps to allow for its reinstatement of barred assistance.

While I agree that the United States and the international community must hold states responsible for implementing robust, anti- trafficking initiatives, I am concerned about the impact that withholding aid can have on innocent civilians.

It is important that in our effort to end human trafficking and persuade nations to fully engage in the global cause, we do not inadvertently harm those we intend to protect and help.

I commend President Obama for his thoughtful understanding of this very complex issue and for granting waivers where appropriate. As we move forward with our discussion today, let us not forget the conditions that allow the horrific crimes of human trafficking to exist. We should focus on ways to ensure that our aid programs help strengthen the capacity of developing countries to adequately protect their civilians and citizens.

Thank you again, our witnesses, and I look forward to hearing your testimony.

And I yield back the balance of my time.

REP. SMITH: Thank you very much, Ranking Member.

We're joined by Mr. Turner, and thank you for being here.

I will put all of the extensive resumes of our distinguished witnesses, in the record and just very quickly summarize.

First, introducing Ambassador Luise CdeBaca, who is no stranger to this subcommittee, who was appointed in 2009 as the director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, which assesses global trends, provides training and technical assistance and advocates for an end to modern-day slavery. Ambassador CdeBaca formerly served as chief counsel to the House Committee on the Judiciary where his portfolio included modern slavery issues, among many other things. He also served as a federal prosecutor with the Department of Justice where he convicted dozens of abusive pimps and employers and helped to liberate hundreds of victims from servitude. A very distinguished record.

We'll then hear from Ambassador Robert Blake, currently serves as the assistant secretary of state in the Bureau of South and Central Asian Affairs, a position he has held since May of 2009. He entered the Foreign Service in 1985 and served at the American embassies in Tunisia, Algeria, Nigeria and Egypt. He served as the deputy chief of mission at the U.S. mission in New Delhi, India from '03 to 2006. And Ambassador Blake was our ambassador to Sri Lanka and Maldives from 2006 to 2009. He also held a number of positions at the department right here in Washington.

Then we'll hear from Mr. Joseph Yun, who is currently principal deputy assistant secretary in the Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs, a position he has held since August of 2010. In this role, he is responsible for relations with South-east Asia and ASEAN affairs. He joined the Foreign Service in 1985 and has served in numerous positions abroad, including in South Korea, Thailand, France, Indonesia and Hong Kong.

Ambassador CdeBaca, the floor is yours.

LUIS CDEBACA: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Congressman Payne, Congressman Turner. Thank you to the subcommittee for the opportunity to testify today.

I have a more fulsome statement that I'd offer for the record.

But before we start, I'd like to take a step back, if I may, to recognize what you and your cosponsors of the original Trafficking Victims Protection Act achieved in bringing that initial skepticism perhaps, that you have mentioned, to consensus.

Eleven years ago this afternoon in fact, on a similarly rainy day in October, President Clinton recorded his radio address to be broadcast on the morning of October 28th, 2000, the day that he signed that groundbreaking legislation into law, to fight what the president described that day as slavery, pure and simple.

As President Clinton pointed out, the TVPA was groundbreaking in providing new tools, both here at home and abroad in increasing our assistance to other countries to help them detect and punish this pernicious practice.

I'd like to simply quote President Clinton because his words that evening are as applicable now as they were then. He said, and I quote, "I worked hard for these provisions. They build on what we've been doing at home and abroad to address this problem. We see in the success of this landmark legislation once again that there is no real secret to getting things done in Washington. When we put progress over partisanship, we get results. When we work together, we get results."

Working hard, working together, across three presidencies and various changes in Congress, together committed to ending modern slavery. As you continue to deliberate this year's reauthorization of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, hearings such as this one are helpful opportunities to discuss the global fight. And we're dedicated to work together with you to get those types of results that President Clinton mentioned.

This week is also the 10th anniversary of the establishment of the Trafficking in Persons Office at the State Department. On October 22nd, 2001 the office opened for business and has never lagged in its resolve. A decade of leadership by my predecessors, Ambassadors Nancy Ely-Raphel, John Miller, Mark Lagon, but the fight is really the result of the expertise of the GTIP career staff, the civil servants, Foreign Service and contractors and their partners at main state and at post.

Two of those experts, Amy O'Neill Richard and Carla Menares Bury, have been in the office since the beginning. And those women are globally recognized leaders in the modern-abolitionist struggle. And I would like to note that we owe them all a debt of gratitude for their decade in service in this fight against modern slavery.

The most-visible part of our work is the annual Trafficking in Persons Report, and thorough and honest assessments are the benchmark of the TIP report. We take into account information from civil society groups, foreign governments and our own reporting officers at post, who conduct on-the-ground research throughout the year.

The review process involves numerous State Department offices so that the final product represents a department-wide consensus on how well various governments are doing to handle this problem. Accurate reporting is essential to the effectiveness of the Trafficking in Persons Report as a diplomatic tool. And indeed, governments often cite it as a factor prompting stronger action in response to modern slavery.

Sometimes those conversations happen in public, more often in private. And sometimes a government that criticizes the report and perhaps even mobilizes others in the regions or around the world against it, quietly nonetheless take steps to address the standards that were set forth by Congress.

Regardless of the public response, we are going to work hard with our counterparts to get results, just as what was done in the Clinton administration, just as was done in the Bush administration.

What the report tells us is that no country, including the United States, is immune to this scourge, and that no government, including the United States, is doing a perfect job in combating it. The two regions that we address today -- East Asia and the Pacific and South and Central Asia -- are hit particularly hard by this crime.

We always say that the fight against modern slavery takes political will, and not just on the part of governments overseas. Assistant Secretaries Bob Blake and Kurt Campbell are showing that political will both individually and within their chains of command. As a result, we've seen a real institutionalizing of the anti-trafficking fight in these regions and a coming together around a sense of mission. That means year-round engagement, not just the preparation of the annual report. And for that, I am personally grateful for the leadership of Assistant Secretaries Campbell and Blake.

Year-round engagement, partnership and hard work, necessary to move past this last decade of development in which laws and structures have slowly come online, and to move into what Secretary Clinton calls a decade of delivery, because the number of successful prosecutions seems to have leveled off a bit, because services for survivors continue to be inadequate, and victim identification remains a challenge, because structures and results are not the same thing.

The different between a passage of a law and the effective implementation of that law is political will. But the reality is that there are places where that political will is weak or nonexistent. And in those places, victims are most at risk.

As the report shows, some governments merely go through the motions when it comes to fighting modern slavery, and some governments, the tier-three countries typically, do not do anything at all. Every day, nongovernmental actors around the world work to make up for that, despite the fact that these governments are doing little or nothing.

We support such groups through our international programs and foreign-assistance funds. We know that it will never be possible to give every organization the help that they want, but even the current funding levels only average out to a little more than 72 cents per victim, per year, given the 27 million estimate worldwide.

And in many countries, if that little bit of American funding that we are able to give were to disappear, those programs would simply cease to exist. There would be no place for victims and survivors to go.

It has been 149 years and one month since President Lincoln made the promise of emancipation. It was four months ago that we released the TIP report and that Secretary Clinton called for a decade of delivery to make good on President Lincoln's promise, around the world.

If the U.S. government is not able to stand with motivated governments and the nongovernmentals that make a difference on the ground, providing victim services, training prosecutors and police officers, the decade of delivery is already in danger. If the anti-trafficking movement loses steam in Washington in the halls of Congress, we could lose that fight everywhere else as well.

We cannot try to balance the budget on the backs of trafficking victims. And if we do so or try to do so with cuts to an already-tiny amount of money, we put at risk all of the progress made over the last decade.

Human trafficking is a threat to our country and an offense to our most-important values. But more importantly, as Secretary Clinton has said, fighting slavery is part of who we are as a nation. For 149 years, we have not only had a responsibility to act against this crime, we have pledged ourselves to that responsibility. We must not and will not shirk from that task.

Thank you.

REP. SMITH: Thank you very much, Mr. Ambassador.

Ambassador Blake?

ROBERT BLAKE: Mr. Chairman, Representative Payne, Representative Turner, I welcome the opportunity to speak with you today regarding trafficking in South and Central Asia. I'm honored to do so in the company of my colleagues, Ambassador CdeBaca and Joe Yun.

I have a longer statement that I'll submit for the record.

REP. SMITH: Without objection, it will be made a part of the record.

MR. BLAKE: Mr. Chairman, first of all, let me say how much I appreciate your leadership, the work of this subcommittee and the focus that you bring to the issue of trafficking in persons. I have made it a personal priority to address trafficking in persons in the SCA region, in close partnership with Ambassador CdeBaca.

I've done so through direct advocacy with governments, but also by visiting with the many fine NGOs on the ground doing good work to combat trafficking, and frequently recording short video interviews with them that my staff posts on YouTube, to publicize their work and the scope of the challenges that they are dealing with.

Mr. Chairman, I am proud to say that our engagement has produced dividends and progress, but significant challenges still remain. The department upgraded four SCA countries this year from tier two watch list to tier two: India, Sri Lanka, Kazakhstan and Tajikistan. Three remain on the watch list, but we're making progress in all three: Bangladesh, Maldives and Uzbekistan. And only one country is on tier three, Turkmenistan.

I'd like to briefly touch on the situation in some of the key countries where I've been personally engaged; first, India. Mr. Chairman, I know you share our interest in seeing continued progress in India on anti-trafficking efforts. The department's upgrade of India to tier two this year was based on the government's increased efforts to address its trafficking problem particularly bonded labor. Specifically, the government increased law enforcement efforts through the establishment of over 80 anti-human-trafficking units. It ratified the U.N. TIP protocol. It achieved landmark convictions against bonded-labor traffickers, with punishments of significant prison sentences, and increased rescue and rehabilitation efforts of thousands of trafficking victims in many parts of India. This good work continues at both the state and federal levels.

Tajikistan is another country that has made commendable progress against trafficking, and Secretary Clinton noted that on her recent trip there last weekend. In 2011, Tajikistan was upgraded to tier two for addressing the use of forced labor in its annual cotton harvest through efforts such as the crediting and assisting NGOs to monitor the harvest. They also prosecuted and convicted the first-trafficking offenders under their new anti-trafficking revision.

Kazakhstan also was elevated to tier two this year. The Kazakh government increased law enforcement efforts against human trafficking, it passed a law strengthening penalties for convicted child-sex-trafficking offenders and the Ministry of Internal Affairs has drafted a law that allows trafficking victims to have a legal advocate, that expands the scope of trafficking related crimes, and increases legal protections for minors subject to forced labors.

Mr. Chairman, you asked about Uzbekistan. It presents a mixed picture. The government has made good progress in combating sex trafficking, but has been slow to address the use of forced labor, particularly in the annual cotton harvest. In March of 2011, the government of Uzbekistan created an interagency working group tasked with ensuring compliance with all 13 ILO conventions to which Uzbekistan is a party. Our embassy in Tashkent will be monitoring the government of Uzbekistan's actions to uphold these commitments, and I will continue to engage the government to make progress on this important priority.

Mr. Chairman, the trafficking report has been an impetus for this change in all of our region, but is only one of the tools that we have at our disposal to influence the anti-trafficking efforts of other countries. Reports from international NGOs have sometimes been instrumental in informing and compelling action on TIP. My bureau and Ambassador CdeBaca's team greatly values such input, and we've tried hard to foster a cooperative relationship with these institutions. We influence them and they influence us by information and sharing to make sure our efforts are complimentary and that we make the most impact on the ground.

Governments remain extremely interested to know where they will be ranked in the report when it comes out in June. But I think that the work that we do to consistently engage and influence people at every level of society is equally significant. For example, the exchange programs and workshops that we sponsor to train government officials in implementation are critical to realizing the potential of the new laws being passed.

The training programs of the police officers or border guards to sensitize them about potential trafficking of persons, victims are also vital. So I want to assure you that we value the resources that we are entrusted with by Congress, and we work very closely with Ambassador CdeBaca and his staff to implement the programs to make a positive and lasting impact.

In summary Mr. Chairman, the SCA region is moving closer to being compliant with internationally recognized anti-TIP standards, but there's much more work to be done. This will continue to be a personal priority for me and a priority for my bureau. So again, I thank you for this opportunity to address this subcommittee, and I look forward to your questions.

REP. SMITH: Ambassador Blake, thank you very much.

Mr. Yun.

JOSEPH YUN: Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Payne, Representative Turner, thank you for the opportunity to appear before you today to testify on trafficking in persons in East Asia and the Pacific region. I have submitted a statement for the record, with your permission I would like to make a few summary remarks.

First of all, regrets to convey from Assistant Secretary Campbell, he wanted to be here, but he had to be on a traveling the last minute. So I think in fact as we're speaking, he's landing in Dulles.

Human trafficking and modern slavery reaches into every corner of the globe, but perhaps nowhere more so than in East Asia and the Pacific. According to the International Labor Organization, the incidence of forced labor and sex trafficking is higher in the Asia-Pacific region than anywhere else in the world. And according to the United Nations Office of Drugs and Crimes, victims from Asia are trafficked to the widest range of destinations around the globe. In addition to being trafficked overseas, many victims are trafficked within their own countries. In fact the UNODC reports that most trafficking is national, not international and is carried out by traffickers whose nationality is the same as their victims and within national borders.

While human trafficking remains widespread and serious, we do believe the TVPA, our TIP report and its associated activities have been effective in fighting trafficking in portions in East Asia and the Pacific. There are several success stories I would like to share with you.

Taiwan is one example of how information in the TIP report has lead to real reform in many aspects of fighting TIP, including implementation of stronger anti-trafficking laws, better protection for victims, and increased prosecutions. In 2006, Taiwan was ranked in TIP report at tier-two watch list, was upgraded to tier two in 2007, and in 2010 was upgraded again to tier one where it remained this year.

The Philippines also has potential to serve as a model in the region for its recent efforts to combat TIP. After two consecutive years as tier-two watch list and facing an automatic downgrade, the Philippines was upgraded to tier two in 2011. The number of prosecutions of traffickers in the Philippines increased greatly in last reporting cycle, and the government has increased the resources it devotes to combat trafficking and has begun to identify and punish corrupt officials linked to trafficking. The government has acknowledged these efforts were linked to the threat of a downgrade to tier three in the TIP report.

Singapore is another example of a country in our region that has potential, moving up from tier-two watch list to tier two in 2011. Singapore has shown a markedly increased awareness of TIP issues in the last year, and the government has formed an interagency task force to address the issue. In 2011, Singapore hosted a workshop for the ASEAN region on criminal justice responses to trafficking in persons, which was attended by Ambassador CdeBaca as well as other members of my bureau.

And in April 2011, six members of Singapore's 20-person interagency task force on TIP traveled to D.C. to meet myself, Assistant Secretary Campbell, and my colleagues in Ambassador CdeBaca's office.

I'll stress that it is not the report alone that results in progress, but also the enormous amount of hours spent in country by staff from our embassies and consulates abroad who engage year round with the whole of government. Our advocacy in Washington with those countries' ambassadors and embassy teams has also made a difference.

Mr. Chairman, we're only too well aware the problem remains. We have worked very closely with Ambassador CdeBaca, who has made a number of trips over the last few months to our region, and we remain committed to working with GTIP office as well as other international organizations fighting human trafficking.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, I look forward to answering any questions you might have.

REP. SMITH: Thank you very much for your testimony.

Let me first begin with a general question -- I guess Ambassador CdeBaca you'd be the one that might want to answer this -- what diplomatic efforts did the department make or undertake to ensure the countries knew that they would not remain on the watch list for two more years as per the trafficking reauthorization of '08? And what was the reaction? I mean, did each of those that were currently on watch contacted and fully apprised of their potential downgrading?

MR. CDEBACA: Indeed, we did a number of steps, both internally within the department through ALLDACs and messages out to the field, but then also with that as a (tasker ?) for that direct type of engagement. And we saw, on the part of a number of countries, a recognition that this was kind of long overdue, that countries had gotten perhaps a little comfortable on there.

We saw recognition on some other countries, especially those who -- such as Senegal or the Philippines or others who are MCC countries, a recognition of what the prospect of a tier-three downgrade might mean, not just reputationally, but as far as sanctions and as far as some of the other assistance and aid and work in the international monetary fora might have on those countries.

It was a bit of a wake-up call for some of our partners, and we think that we've seen as a result of the watch-list designation some real movement. There were a good percentage of the tier-two watch list countries moved up to tier two on the merits. The waiver issue was never even something that had to be faced because of the work that they had done. And this was not one-year work. This is work that they had undertaken across those two years.

We felt that it was important to kick it in after two years because of the notion that it was almost an ex post facto type of situation, even though this isn't a domestic criminal law, but the notion that countries should have fair warning that two years on the watch list would have that result.

We also made it very clear what countries would need to do to get waivers. It wasn't a choice, it wasn't saying, you know, you should choose the lesser of two evils, but with the recognition that not every country would necessarily be able to get up to tier two on their merits, as you and others had recognized, in putting the waiver provision in.

So there was certainly increased diplomacy that was done at the bilateral level by our ambassadors, by me at GTIP, but also specific engagement on the part of then Undersecretary for Political Affairs Burns, now Deputy Burns, and others who looked at those 37 countries as countries that needed very specific interventions. And we saw that from the willingness of Deputy Steinberg, the willingness of Undersecretary Burns to have those conversations was very important, we thought, in having these countries move up and off the watch list.

REP. SMITH: Thank you. Let me ask you in regards to South Korea. You might recall that we initiated an effort back in early 2002 to try to get a zero-tolerance policy to do an investigation among our military to see whether or not there was complicity with regards to our deployments in South Korea and certainly in the former Yugoslavia. And the IG's report from the Department of Defense was very, very damning, and it did lead to Bush's zero-tolerance policy.

I and others have raised repeatedly the issue of the juicy bars in South Korea. I'm just wondering why that seems to have been left out of the narrative for this year's report. Have they disappeared? Has the issue largely been mitigated? Or are those still a problem? As you recall, many of the women who were being exploited there were Filipino women, and I know the Filipino government took some very aggressive action. I wonder if that has been sustained.

MR. YUN: I think this issue, as you know, has been an ongoing concern and USFK in South Korea has made zero-tolerance policy very effective. And my recollection is that I don't think we can say juicy bars have disappeared 100 percent. But the incidence of abuse that went on is much way down. If you like, Mr. Chairman, we can get more background on the statistics or data we have on that.

REP. SMITH: I appreciate that, because it does seem to reemerge. You know, you think that -- I know the Stars and Stripes has done some very, very fine reporting on that, as have others -- but as soon as you think you have it in hand, all of a sudden a new spate of this kind of exploitation emerges. Did you want to touch on that?

MR. CDEBACA: Mr. Smith, I was in South Korea a couple of months ago, in fact went to USFK and we went through some of these issues directly. One of the things I was struck with personally was the juxtaposition of those images that we are all familiar with from the undercover reporting that was done by some U.S. reporters of not just our servicemen in active brothels, active strip clubs, not even the euphemism of the juicy bar, but that also the shore patrol type of folks who were supposed to be there making sure that there wasn't anything untoward going on telling the undercover reporters how easy it was to go with prostitutes.

Those same street corners, those same neighborhoods that were in that undercover reporting are now non-sexually-related businesses, partially because of the zero-tolerance policy, partially because of the fact there are more families being posted to that area of Korea and not as many young men by themselves. I think all of it together paints a picture of towns where there used to be nothing but red-light districts, and now there are places where you can take your kids and get chicken fingers on the menu.

I think that has a big effect, and it's something that happens because USFK, because our embassy in Seoul and all of us are not taking our eyes off the ball. But that notion that it could come back if we do take our eyes off the ball is well taken.

REP. SMITH: Thank you. As you know, according to Section 110 of the TVPA, China and any other country can only remain on the watch list if it has a written plan to begin making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance with the minimum standards and that the plan, if implemented, would constitute making significant efforts and the country is devoting sufficient resources to implement that plan.

I wonder with regards to China, what is China's plan? If you could elaborate on what it is they said they are willing to do. Are they doing it? As you know -- and I've raised this before -- we just had a hearing -- as you may know -- in this committee hearing room just a few weeks ago, we heard from survivors, women, including Chai Ling, all of whom have suffered gross exploitation of a forced abortion, and the direct consequence of one-child-per-couple policy has been the missing girls. And some estimates put it as high as 100 million. Nobody knows the exact number. It's generally accepted that by 2020, 40 (million) and maybe many as 50 million is the newest number we've heard, men will not be able to find wives because they have been subjected to a sex-selection abortion.

So the magnet for human trafficking is in ascendancy in China, and I hope any plan that they have submitted or suggested that they will follow pursuant to our not putting them on tier three, which is where they belong in my opinion, you know, really has to take into account the horrific consequences of the missing daughters, the missing girls in China.

In the report before this one, there was more attention, I thought, paid to the component of and the contributing action of the one-child-per-couple policy to trafficking. I think we're going to see bride selling and frankly kidnapping and certainly forced fraud and coercion used in a variety of ways to bring women into China because of this huge gender disparity.

Of course, India has one as well, which is egregious, but China is a direct result of a government policy.

So I'm wondering if that is fully understood. Is it being conveyed to the Chinese how concerned about how this terrible and cruel experiment called the one-child-per-couple policy that has rendered brothers and sisters illegal, but it has made sisters scarce? If you could --

MR. CDEBACA: I think I will address, Mr. Smith, the waiver issue as far as the plan was concerned. One of the things that we saw from the Chinese this last year is that the -- of course, there is the written action plan that they have, but perhaps more so, there are a number of other instruments that came out in the ranking period, which we thought were very interesting and in fact were having an impact in a way that we'd never seen before from China.

For instance, there was the guidelines that were issued by the Ministry of Public Security and the Supreme People's Court on sentencing issues. This is again something that we had seen in the report over the previous years where we'd been criticizing the low sentences, and a number of guidelines going out to the court saying we need to bring up the sentencing on this. The idea of better law enforcement.

The commitments made for guidelines for shelter staff, for protocols for working on trafficking victims on relief and reintegration. And perhaps most importantly a directive to the field that women who were encountered in prostitution should not simply be seen as criminals, but instead should be assumed to be victims of trafficking at the outset of the investigation. That shifting the burden away from the victim and assuming that they are somebody who needs help was a very positive step. It would be a positive step no matter what country it was in, but especially in the Chinese context we thought that that was something that was worth noting.

We look forward to working with the Chinese government over the coming months as they look to bring themselves into compliance with the Palermo protocol's standards.

As you know, we've been consistently raising the problem of their trafficking definition which is so focused on child abduction, doesn't necessarily track the Palermo protocol. In our conversations with the Chinese government, it appears that their academics and their legal technocrats are doing the kind of work that's necessary to start teeing up legislative changes and also to put together a new plan going forward, a new five-year plan.

I think Mr. Yun is going to address some of the other concerns, but I will certainly say that, as far as the family issues that you raised, one of the things that I raise when I'm in China and will continue to do so is this concern that the population-planning policies of the Chinese government is having that contributory effect that you mentioned. And it is twice mentioned in the report. We are not backing off on that issue.

MR. YUN: Mr. Chairman, if I could just expand a little on Ambassador CdeBaca's remarks. The administration considers China's coercive birth-limitation policies a grave violation of human rights, and has routinely expressed opposition to those policies, both publicly and privately.

The White House issued a statement on August 23rd articulating the administration's strong opposition to all aspects of China's coercive birth-limitation policies, including forced abortion and sterilization. And we at the department continue to monitor developments concerning this very important issue.

Promoting greater respect for human rights, including reproductive rights, is one of our key foreign-policy objectives in China, and we will continue to urge the Chinese government to treat its people in accordance with established international norms. Thank you.

REP. SMITH: Thank you, Mr. Yun.

Two final questions. I'll yield to my colleagues, and then I have a few additional if you would allow. Let me just -- Deborah Cundy, you might recall Ambassador CdeBaca, testified about best practices. We met her, you and I at a conference in Rome, which I thought her testimony when she appeared here was extraordinary about best practices that her hotel chain has undertaken.

But there have been media reports that indicate that American- chain hotels in China as well as in Mexico have been the locations of sex trafficking, and namely we're talking about the Hilton hotel chain. And I'm wondering what you are doing specifically to work with hotel chains, including Hilton, to ensure that they're not complicit in human trafficking. Are they working with law enforcement, for example, to ensure trafficking laws against complicit hotels? I mean, are we taking a harder line on those that are part of the problem?

MR. CDEBACA: Well, there's several things that we're doing on the hospitality front. First of all, it is in the context of the overarching business approach where we, through projects such as the slaveryfootprint.org website where everyone can go and after taking a 15 to 20-minute survey on what they own and what they buy can get at least a rough idea of how many people who are held in modern slavery are impacting their lives. I took it, and I'm ashamed to say that even though I do this for a living and have for a while, that according to the economists at Berkeley and the others who did the algorithms that support that application, that at a minimum I've got 84 people held in forced labor around the world who are contributing to my lifestyle just on the basis of what I buy, what I do, et cetera.

And that's, as I said, you know, not only somebody who doesn't use commercial sex, but also fights slavery for a living. And if that's my slavery footprint, we can only think about what people who aren't asking these questions might be.

A hotel has a slavery footprint as well, and I think that we've seen that leadership from the Carlson Company certainly through their properties Radisson, Country Inn and Suites, et cetera. But also we're seeing leadership in some other ways from hotels. Marriott made the decision -- evidently they have a policy that they don't sign on to codes of conduct, kind of general company wide. So when they looked at it, they said, you know what, we think that we can best do with our properties is not only think about how to have an exploitation-free hotel environment, but also to harness the power of the trafficking victims and the survivors. And so we're happy to say that the first projects in the Marriott family -- and I think Starwood is participating as well -- to actually bring trafficking survivors into the training programs there in Brazil, in Mexico, in Vietnam.

We think that the best victim protection is a job, a good job, a safe job. And hotels can be the agents of that. Hilton, in the wake of those scandals -- unfortunately it often takes a scandal to wake up a country or a company as to the fact that they need to deal with this in their own supply chains -- in the wake of that scandal has now signed on to the code of conduct for the travel and tourism industry.

And we made it very clear to Hilton that one of the reasons why we selected the Hilton in downtown Miami for our recent Western Hemispheric Reporting Officers Conference when we had a choice of a number of properties to host that in was in recognition of the fact that they had done so.

We don't see this as necessarily tied to the Federal Acquisitions Register or to our contracting in general. We don't have a rule that says that this is something that we always have to do. But what we're certainly looking at is, if that if there's a Radisson, if there's a Hilton, if there's somebody that's put their money where their mouth is as far as human trafficking, then we as consumers individually, but also GTIP as an office, that we should reward that type of behavior.

So, that's the plug. If you see a TGI Friday's, that's Marilyn Carlson Nelson's company does that. We can't tell you where to eat, but you should know that they're doing their best to fight slavery.

REP. SMITH: Thank you. Just one question before I yield to Mr. Payne.

With regards to Cuba, a tier-three country which was granted a waiver on September the 30th for cultural and educational exchanges, my question is, how does granting that waiver actually promote democracy, rule of law, respect for human rights?

And I would note parenthetically that I've tried, me, personally to get a visa to go to Cuba, primarily to go to the prisons and to try if possible to meet with the political prisoners there, to meet with Fidel Castro to raise directly -- or his brother Raul -- the issue of human rights and particularly the mistreatment, the torture, the degradation that is suffered by political prisoners in Cuba -- and there are still hundreds of them. Some were recently let out, including Dr. Oscar Bisset, who I frankly nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize. He is an unbelievable man, a tremendous man. He's still under what we would call house arrest, but at least he's out of solitary and he's not being tortured, per se. And I was denied.

I tried to go with a cultural-exchange group, because to get into Cuba you need to be going with some group. You can't just show up on your own. And I couldn't get a visa, still can't get a visa to go to Cuba. And yet, a waiver was granted and Frank Wolf joined me in that. He and I are trying still. We have been in prisons in China, the Soviet Union, Romania, East Bloc countries. I met with Xanana Gusmao when he was in -- from East Timor, who then obviously went on to become president in Indonesia.

We can't get into Cuba's prisons. And it's very troubling, especially since that is what is permitted or exempted in terms of sanctions. So a member of Congress, chairman of the Human Rights Committee for Congress can't get into Cuba, and yet that's waived. So, if you could speak to that I'd appreciate it.

MR. CDEBACA: Well, you are correct that it's waived. It is the only thing that's waived for Cuba. We feel that Cuba doesn't have a comprehensive strategy to address this. It has little if no discernible anti-trafficking law enforcement victim-care trafficking- prevention measures. You know, most other countries even, you know, that end up being on tier three at least generally admit that there might be some trafficking going on.

We feel as though, on the trafficking specific, that just as we have been able to establish a dialogue with the government of Cuba on migration issues, that we need to be in there trying to talk to them. Trying to talk to them can be frustrating. It could mean not getting a visa at times.

We don't base our rankings of countries on whether members of Congress or even me or my staff can get a visa to go talk to them. There's been other countries other than Cuba where we haven't had the luck of getting that visa issued as we would desire. But I think at the end of the day, the calibration that this administration has on Cuba is very much that, if we can get not only the formal dialogues with the government, through especially on the migration dialogue, but also that notion of some people-to-people work, getting the Cuban people to be able to see what freedom looks like, to be able to see what that example does, it'll achieve great change on the island.

And so, within the context of these particular sanctions, which are just some of many against the regime and doing business in Cuba, we felt that exempting out these cultural and educational-exchange programs was a way to continue those types of relationships. As you said, even during the depths of the Cold War, that notion of educational-exchange programs was one of the ways that we were able to, a, keep the dialogue going, but b, raise up an entire generation of leaders who, in the late '80s and early '90s, finally were able to achieve change behind the iron curtain. And we want to continue to be able to do that with Cuba.

REP. SMITH: OK. Mr. Payne.

REP. PAYNE: Thank you very much.

I just wonder if anyone of you would take on the question and answer. "Human trafficking" is a broad term that encapsulates a diverse group of crimes, from debt bondage to child-sex trafficking. In your opinion, anyone of you could try to answer this, one of the main push-and-pull factors driving into national human trafficking, what do you -- how do they differ, in your opinion, by region and by type of trafficking? And to what extent do you -- do current anti- trafficking programs address such underlying factors or vulnerabilities? Do you see a big difference as it relates around the world? Do you think there is any sort of cartel that communicates with each other in different regions of the world? I just wonder if anyone would like to take that general question.

MR. CDEBACA: Well, I think I might tee it up, but I know that my colleagues have thoughts on this because we've talked about this over the last couple of years. You know, we're talking about two regions of the world that are both source and destination regions.

I sometimes have mentioned to Secretary Blake that I'm going to see some of his clients when I'm going to the Gulf states, because there's so many people from South and Central Asia who are there, who are vulnerable and often exploited.

On the other hand, there are people within South Asia who are going from one country to another within South Asia or who are enslaved in their own countries. Same, I think, is true in East Asia where we have a lot of interregional trafficking that happens.

At the end of the day, poverty is very much a driver of this, but it's not necessarily the most abject of poverty. It perhaps is the one step up on the development rung. The person that actually sees an opportunity to having gone to school now, having no opportunity to get a job in their home village or their hometown says, well, then I'm going to have to go off somewhere else.

All too often, the person who could help them do that is not a honest labor broker. It's somebody who is going to charge a usurious recruiting fee and enforce that through force, threats of force and threats of coercion. And so one of the things that we very much look at is the idea that development could do something to stem the flow, while recognizing that there's some research out there now that's showing that this is definitely a crime of opportunity. The victims want opportunity. They're willing to put themselves in harm's way to some degree, and the traffickers see the opportunity to take advantage of them.

It manifests itself very differently in a number of these different countries, though. Even in different parts of the same country, you'll have mainly sex trafficking in one part, and in another part mainly agricultural trafficking, which is why I think that the work that we do at the embassies is so important. We have to apply these minimum standards to the regions and to the world, but we have to do it in the context of each one of these countries.

The difference between a Senegal and a South Korea are very different based on where they are and what they need, and we have to be able to tell the difference as we're applying these minimum standards that you've given us.

MR. BLAKE: Let me just jump in and just add to what Ambassador CdeBaca said. Now, in taking the SCA region you see both a combination of push-and-pull factors, as you said, Mr. Payne. You know, in places like India and Nepal, trafficking is often a function of poverty and poor education, where particularly young women, but also young children are very vulnerable to seductive pitches from traffickers who promise a better life in the city, and then find themselves enslaved once they get there and in debt bondage of some sort, which they'll never get out of. So they're very, very vulnerable to those kind of pitches.

It's also a function of weak governmental institutions and weak rule of law that is unable to deal with these kind of challenges. Frequently, you find trafficking in countries where there's a, you know, poor level or low level of economic growth, places like Tajikistan where, you know, one-seventh of the country is working outside of Tajikistan in Russia and in Kazakhstan because there's no economic opportunity for them.

So those migrant workers are often very vulnerable in the countries in which they work, as Ambassador CdeBaca said, not just in the Gulf, but in Russia and elsewhere.

Another serious problem almost throughout my region is corruption where, again, those weak government institutions and often poorly paid officials are very susceptible to corruption, particularly by these organized criminal gangs and networks, and so that is a very difficult problem for us to try to deal with.

So, you know, our challenge is to both try to shine a light on these practices, as I think this report does, but also to work with the many capable NGOs on the ground who are doing terrific work, and then finally to engage the governments directly, not only in terms of advocacy, but in terms of the many important programs that your committee helps to fund.

MR. YUN: Mr. Chairman, of course, I agree with everything that's being said, but an interesting aspect, in my view, is clearly it is tied to poverty and economy. Having said that, it is also clear that, in some cases, country and countries can make enormous progress in very, very short time. And in my region, I would highlight South Korea and Taiwan. So you need to ask, why is it that some countries can make enormous progress in very short time? Obviously, strength of institution is one, and I would say what I would loosely call freedom index is another one. That is the media as a watchdog, civil society and, of course, the willingness of lawmakers to look at their legislation, to look at their laws and see what they can learn from elsewhere and what will work for them.

So it is entirely possible, in my view, that in many countries things can improve quite rapidly given opportunities.

REP. PAYNE: Thank you. It's kind of -- a similar question in vain, because I just wonder, how does the problem of, in your opinion, of human trafficking compare to other socioeconomic challenges facing governments that are not fully compliant with the U.S. minimum requirements? Do you find that when human trafficking is a problem there are other similar problems?

And secondly, where does, sort of, state corruption come in? Officials, in many instances, you have to work with policing, and I think policing around the world, even sometimes in our country, we see policing problems. Sometimes peaceful demonstrations are disrupted and they become actually a police riot. I mean, we -- you know, some questions about what just happened in San Diego a night or so ago where people were relatively peaceful, a bottle or two might have been thrown.

But the reaction of a police force here, even in our country, I just use that as an example, that policing is so important. So with the law-enforcement agencies in countries where the socioeconomic issues, in some instances, these law-enforcement people aren't even paid, not that that's an excuse for them to therefore be corrupt, but are low paid and poorly trained. How does that whole thing fit in?

MR. CDEBACA: Again, I think I'll let my colleagues discuss the particular ways that that manifests in those regions. But I think overarching, I think we learn that lesson in the United States prior to 1947. We may have forgotten it, frankly.

You know, one of the things that was the major civil rights achievement of the Roosevelt administration, working with the NAACP litigators and others, was to break the backs of the peonage and share-cropping system in the South and that didn't happen until 1947, allowing the space then to move on from 13th Amendment jurisprudence to 14th and 15th Amendment civil rights, housing, voting, all of the things that we're familiar with from the '50s and '60s.

But at the end of the day, it was the sheriffs and it was the local justices of peace that were enforcing debt bondage in the American South for three generations after slavery was officially illegal. That's corruption writ large and it was systemic corruption.

And we see some places where that type of corruption still exists, but then we also see the individual corruption of a police officer or their family who actually owns the brothels. It's not just that the cops are going to these brothels as kind of a boys-will-be-boys tolerance, which we need to root out, but then it's also that they're individually profiting.

Or we see countries where the, you know, the large (landed ?) interests don't want to cleanup some of the problems with forestation or extractive industries because it's the senators' brothers or cousins or whoever that own those plantations.

So we have to keep unpacking this corruption problem, because I think that the easy corruption problem is to say it's the fault of some low-level guy that's taking a bribe. We have to not only look at that level, we have to go up that other step, not blame the deputy, you have to go after the sheriff themselves.

REP. PAYNE: That's excellent. Yes.

MR. CDEBACA: Mr. Payne, I would say, to answer your first question, I think we do often see problems like trafficking in persons, drug trafficking and others coexisting with each other. And again, I think they're a function of the fact that these organized criminal groups are often involved in these activities, find them very, very profitable. But I think corruption is also a very, very significant problem.

And you know, corruption often exists where you have, as I said, poorly paid officials, poorly developed institutions, but also it's a function of a lack of democracy and independent democratic institutions, like a free press, like free NGOs, such as Transparency International, that can bring to light some of these things without fear of retribution. It's a function of often lack of opposition parties in many of these countries, who, again, have an interest in bringing these kind of things to light.

So there's a whole series of things, and often we try to see these in a holistic way as well and try to, again, not only address the problem itself, but in my mind, the most critical thing that we can do in many of these countries is to work on rule of law because that underlies everything else. And if you have a strong, independent judiciary, you can get to the root of many of these problems quite quickly.

REP. PAYNE: That's great, and I couldn't agree with you more. And I do -- I listened to my colleague. I was fortunate enough to get into Cuba a number of years ago, and I thought it was, you know, my responsibility to raise issues with Mr. Castro. Fidel Castro at that time was the leader there, and I raised issues about, as a matter of fact, the inequity of the blacks in Cuba. Much of it he said was, of course, because of remitting to coming from the U.S. and other places, and the ones who left were not the blacks, they were left behind, and so there was a group growing inequity among the races -- (inaudible) -- could do about that.

But I also raised the question about with some investment starting and hotels starting that there has started to become a prostitution question. It wasn't gigantic, but it was starting to raise its ugly head. And I raised the question that, once again, the poor people are going to be the ones, the minorities would end up in the position, by virtue of their lack of equality financially, and that there needs to be attention given to this, and that this was not in the right direction. And even raised the question of prisoners.

And as a matter of fact, another group went down after that, and I instructed them to not only raise the question, but sort of talk to them about the fact that there should be -- you need to reconsider the people who are in prison that should not be there, who have not a fair trial, which was raised by some members, some people. And it's seen to have had some positive impact, because we have seen that people shouldn't have been in prison in the first place, but there has been some released. So I've been one that tried to feel that there needs to be dialogue.

I recently came back from -- I went to Bahrain a couple of weeks ago and, you know, there was (all the ?) interest in me, you know, seeing the employment and things that were going well. I wanted to meet the 25 medical people who were sentenced, and the government had all 25 of them, doctors and medical people, who have been charged with a crime at a hospital, which is unheard of. But they now have to -- there will be another trial. It was a military trial. I think the pressure of my going with a couple of the members push them to reconsider, so all these folks will be retried. So I think it's a step in the right direction to have a committee of inquiry that will come out with, and they're not from that country, but from outside the country.

But people still have not been put back to work. They were fired for protesting, and we said that this is wrong. People should not be -- and labor unions have been discriminated against.

But you know, I think that when you get an opportunity to go, we made it pretty clear that these -- and met with these -- in different groups, which is not on the regular program, but we insisted before we went we had to meet with them and we had to make ourselves clear that these are things that have to be turned around, and that we insist that there be a -- that this injustice in their kingdom end.

So I do find some -- I guess my whole point is that I find some value of going and having conversations with some of the people that we don't necessarily don't want to go to dinner with necessarily, but to try to convince them that policies need to be changed. Thank you.

MR. CDEBACA: Mr. Payne, if I could, the -- I think that what we've seen is that if it's simply the trafficking ambassador that goes out and raises this and then, you know, comes back and works on the report, that those governments, the ones who are friendly and want to fight on this with us, they would have done that without a visit from me. The ones who are not interested in working on human trafficking, without some cajoling, it's not just me going, it's when they hear it from Bob Blake, when they hear it from Joe Yun and Kurt Campbell, when they hear it from you all when you were out on the road in the CODELs or when your staff has been out.

When I was on the Judiciary Committee staff, I was able to go to a shelter in Cambodia with Sheri Rickert from the Foreign Affairs Committee staff, and some others and, you know, being able to see the victim practices there, but also having to have the Cambodians know that Congress cared. It's a very different message than simply, you know, a guy from a small office in the State Department raising the issue of slavery in the modern era.

So we join you in that notion that there is value, and we want to support, whether it's CODELs, STAFFDELS traveling with us, we'll raise it, I think, when we're out on the road, but knowing that you're raising it as well makes a big difference.

REP. SMITH: Let me just ask a couple of final questions. First, I'm sure all three of you saw The New York Times article "The Other India: Where are the Children?" on October 12th, just a couple of weeks ago, a week ago. And it makes the very disturbing statement that between January of 2008 and October 2010, 13,570 children were missing in Delhi alone. It says that some of the children were eventually found, supposedly taken by force or being enticed with promises of food and clothes, but they were then sold into various forms of slavery, including domestic labor, beggary, agricultural labor or commercial sex work.

And the article also notes that a provisional Indian census reported in 2010 that an estimated one in 10 workers in India are children, and experts say that these numbers are conservative.

I guess, Ambassador Blake, this might be to you as well as to all three of you, really. The downgrading, or the upgrading I should say, of India off the watch list not to tier three, but rather to tier two, I've listened very carefully, I read it very carefully in the report, but there's still, I think, some very disconcerting and unanswered questions.

You say in your testimony, Ambassador CdeBaca, that sex trafficking women and children has not abated and may in fact be increasing in places such as India. So it would appear, according to your testimony, that it's at least as bad and possibly getting worse.

About 10 years ago, I had a hearing, and I had several hearings on trafficking, and we heard from the International Justice Mission, IJM, and the testimony was focused on India. And Gary Haugen actually brought a video and showed all of these young, some of them were not even teenagers they were so young, little girls that were in a cellar, who, when the police came and the traffickers were tipped off by the police and they went through some charade, afterward the little girls were brought out of the hiding place. Their eyes were all dark because it was all dark, you know, they were squinted. And you could see that these were tiny, little, at-risk little girls who were being trafficked.

And one of these Gary Haugen made very clearly was, in his testimony, a point made clearly was it's the police. And I have noticed, you know, if we're going to have a problem anywhere, it's not often the president, the prime minister. It's that point of contact at the police level, which obviously is part of government, and therefore subject to the minimum standards.

This report, other reports that I have read on India point out that law enforcement may be lax, still may be the Achilles heel in India.

I was actually in Nigeria in Abuja, in the hotel after a full day working on trafficking, when I turned on CNN and there was a very, very fine report about how -- it was International CNN -- in India, and again, the police were tipped off, they went through the charade of walking into the brothel, and the kids, some of them didn't get out quick enough, ran out in the street. And he said, by the next day they were all back being sold and exploited, and the police were laughing about it.

And I'm wondering if that's still a problem, especially since, as you pointed out, Ambassador CdeBaca, that sex trafficking of women and children may not have abated and may in fact be increasing in places such as India.

You know, are we just holding our breath with some hope here that India will get its act together? And I add into that the singular problem, but not apparently government sponsored like China with the one-child-per-couple policy as a major push to the elimination of the girl child, but we had a press conference, again, right in this room very recently, and it was focused on India and China, and the bias against and prejudice against the birth of and the lives of little girls.

And again, most of the girls are eliminated, destroyed by sex-selection abortions, but many others, particularly in India, are killed as they're born. Their gender discovered, and they are suffocated or killed in some other way.

As a matter of fact, one of our people at that testimony said the most dangerous three words in that part of the world is, "it's a girl." If it's a girl, she may be dead. Or if she gets to be a little bit older, she may be exploited through trafficking.

And again, with deep respect to Ambassador Blake and to all of you, I would hope that, unless there's -- my hope is, next time around, India, if they have not made truly significant progress, you know, when you say there's 80 units of trafficking units, that's one out of every 14 million people, you know, is that just something that's been put together to appease to a local political constituency or an international one? Or is this really an all-out effort to eradicate slavery? Because as Ambassador CdeBaca said, it's either abated -- it has not abated and may even be getting worse.

MR. CDEBACA: Mr. Chairman, that's a big question about a big country. So, let me try to tackle it and I'll ask Lu to chime in.

First of all, let me say that I personally have been working on this issue about trafficking persons in India for the last eight years. I started out as deputy chief of mission in 2003 and spent three years there.

And one of my most important tasks then as chief deputy, chief of mission was the work on trafficking persons. I led our working group inside the embassy working on this because I felt it was such an important priority. And you're right, I remember going to train stations and seeing traffickers waiting for young kids to get off the trains from rural areas, because they were so poor and so desperate and these guys who are predators waiting to basically bring them into slavery.

And I was there with really dedicated NGOs who were there to stop those guys and had in fact found partners in the police to help them stop. So there were -- even at that time, there were some quite good efforts that we were supporting to stop those kind of practices.

At that time, too, Mr. Chairman, I think, you know, India often even refused to admit these kind of things even existed and certainly didn't want to acknowledge the scope and the scale of the problem. I think we've come a long way since there, Mr. Chairman, with due respect.

You know, this year India was upgraded because they're making some pretty significant efforts. I mentioned the 80 anti-human-trafficking units.

What's significant about that is that now those are under the authority of the very powerful Ministry of Home Affairs, which is their chief of law-enforcement branch that's responsible for this, and the minister himself has taken direct responsibility for this issue, which is very significant. Before it was the Ministry of Women and Child Affairs and things like that. But the Ministry of Home Affairs was not that directly involved. So this is, I think, quite significant.

Secondly, they say they have ratified the protocol. And most importantly, as you've said, Mr. Chairman, it's working with the police and it's working with the courts, because that's where the real action's going to be the stop of these guys who are engaged in the trafficking itself.

And in the past, India often used to arrest the victims. They'd go into a brothel and they'd arrest all the girls and the people who'd been trafficked, not the people who were behind it. And again, I think that's really changing now.

And I can just give you a few examples, if I could. You know, we've been working a lot in Mumbai. Mumbai is a real center for the trafficking industry. And people come from as far away as Bangladesh and Nepal and are trafficked into Mumbai.

There's a real -- there's a judge there by the name of Judge Swati Chauhan, who's really done some terrific, terrific work. She, you know -- literally, her court has taken over and cleared hundreds of sex-trafficking cases and, you know, issued rehabilitation orders for roughly 1,200 rescued women.

And what's important about this is that the Ministry of Home Affairs has not only taken note of her efforts, but has said, we need -- that they need to publicize those efforts and duplicate those efforts all over India. So they're actually organizing very soon a seminar of all the nodal units all around India to come and hear about how she has done this and how she has tackled this. And I think they're going to try and resource this in an appropriate way.

They're also going to expand these anti-human-trafficking units. They've got 80 of them now, but I think they have intentions over time to establish them in all 600 districts of India, which is, you know, it's a big deal.

And again, I want to say, at the state level, you know, there's a huge disparity in India between some states that are doing a lot and very well and then others that aren't doing so well. And I think in a lot of the states now where you do see quite significant trafficking, like West Bengal, like Maharashtra, which I mentioned, Karnataka, the police are actively working, not only on the sex-trafficking side, but increasingly on the bonded-labor side.

And as Lu will remember, back in 2003 to 2006, this was not even on their radar. And now, not only are they dealing with it, they're dealing on the law-enforcement side and bringing these into the court systems and prosecuting people. So --

REP. SMITH: Does that also include police who are complicit -- (inaudible) -- where the police were prosecuted?

MR. BLAKE: You know I can't tell you for sure.

REP. SMITH: If you could check that, that would be very helpful to show whether or not --

MR. BLAKE: Yeah, I will. I will. That's a very good question.

But the point I want to make is, do the problems still exist? Of course, they do. But I think what's really different now is that there is a political will on the part, not only of the federal government, but the state government, and most importantly the law enforcement.

And what -- to get back to Mr. Payne's question, you know, I talked about the rule of law, and what India does have going for it is an independent rule of law, particularly a very strong supreme court. And you know, I think that is the backbone of a lot of what happens in India. And for that reason, you do have very strong NGOs, you have very strong opposition parties, all of whom are more than happy to highlight these problems, and try to get them addressed.

So you know, there are still a lot of problems to be dealt with. But I do believe that India is making progress in the right direction.

REP. SMITH: Mr. Ambassador?

MR. CDEBACA: I'd second that. I think that one of the things that was notable over the last couple of years that we've seen from the Supreme Court is that it's begun to do these inquiries into different aspects of the anti-trafficking fight, not just on the sex trafficking or the sex trafficking of children, but looking at things as diverse as the circus performers who are being enslaved.

We had a briefing from the Polaris Project the other day about the HHS-funded hotline that they run here in the United States. And one of the trends that they saw was that they've gotten, I think, 29 or 30 calls from people who are in carnivals here in the United States, who are trying to get help because they have been harmed or trapped or stuff. And the Civil Rights Division actually prosecuted cases of the ilk back in the 1970s.

To suddenly see the supreme court of India was having hearings on the exploitation of these people, in these transient or itinerant circuses, I think it shows that there is a kind of level of sophistication that's coming into some of these institutions in India that we frankly had not seen six or eight years ago.

Obviously, we do have a very large problem of human trafficking in India. No one, the Indians or the Americans or anybody else that looks at it would say otherwise. I think that one of the concerns that we have and we mentioned this in the report last year, as far as the changing nature of sex trafficking in India that, as you mentioned, that's in our testimony, is this notion that there seems to be a move from the red-light districts to roadside prostitution, small hotels and private apartments. That is problematic for a whole host of reasons, in no small part because it becomes the law-enforcement challenge as law enforcement becomes more serious about doing these cases.

The law-enforcement challenge goes up very steeply, when you don't have access to the people who you are trying to save, people you are trying to rescue. So we're looking at this, we're going to continue to be raising that with our Indian counterparts.

But there are definitely things happening in India, that, I think, anyone looking at India circa 2002, 2003 it would be mind-boggling to think that they're actually liberating people from brick kilns, putting bonded-labor bosses in jail. We need to take that now, work in partnership with Indians, as the two largest common law, not just large democracies, but common-law countries, and really take it to the next level.

Driving it out to the states is as important as it is in India, as it is here in the United States. That's where law enforcement gets done. And we want to work with our counterparts there to make sure that that happens.

REP. SMITH: Appreciate that. Two final questions. And thank you for that explanation.

The first is with regard to Vietnam, and, Ambassador CdeBaca we've talked about that many times. And I've raised it, as have others, many times at hearings. The labor-trafficking issue, your view as to whether or not there really is progress being made, especially since so many of the allegations are against companies that aren't really state-run companies. The Daewoosa case, still no payment as far as I know, of the $3 million. And I know you were involved in that prosecution, the very first one, pursuant to the TVPA.

And then the second question, if you could maybe speak to a good-news issue, and that would be, you know, Nigeria is now a tier-one country. I have visited there, I mentioned a moment ago, met with their TIP leaders, and went to Lagos where trafficking obviously was a problem. Many of those women, young girls are trafficked right into Europe, into Italy.

And I would just tell a very, very quick story about a woman named Elizabeth that I met in Rome, who actually became pregnant as a direct result of being trafficked and abused sexually. And she made a statement that I'll never forget. She goes, this child, this little 3-year old was running around at the shelter, in Rome, and she had been trafficked for about five years. A terrible ordeal. I hope she writes a book some day because it's a testimony to faith and courage.

But this young Nigerian woman said, the child saved my life, and said, if it wasn't for this child, I probably would have been a statistic. You know, suicide or something along those lines. And you don't hear that kind of heroic love for a child, you know, all that often, at least explained like that. But she told how she went through the roof, out of Nigeria into Italy.

So the question is, Nigeria, they're tier one, it's a good-news story. I think they certainly have tried very hard, and maybe you want to elaborate on that for the record, as well as the Vietnam question.

MR. CDEBACA: Well, I'll take to Vietnam and then I think that Mr. Yun can set the scene for us on Vietnam. Nigeria is an interesting case because, of course, Nigeria is not necessarily thought of on many law-enforcement issues as being on the cutting edge. It's not a country, unlike what we've been testifying to today, as far as transparency indices or corruption indices or things that always come out on top.

And yet we've seen some very innovative anti-trafficking efforts there that, as you say, you know, when we've looked at, over the last two years the application of the facts and the minimum standards, has come out as a tier one.

You know, we don't go into these with a predetermined tier ranking. We put the facts into the (lots ?), like we have a big machine, the facts and the law go together, and we turn the crank, and suddenly a Nigeria comes out the other side, with a tier-one label on it, and I think surprised a lot of people, frankly. It maybe even surprised the Nigerians themselves.

But you know, at the end of the day, what they did was very innovative. Taking police, prosecutors and social workers and putting them in the same, not just chain of command, but putting them in the same office, assigning them to cases simultaneously so that they knew that they were going to be working together throughout. That's very different than what most countries do.

Here in the United States, we have prosecutors assigned to cases early on, and we have victim/witness coordinators in most of our law-enforcement entities. But you know, there's very few prosecutors that are older than me that came up in that system. And thank God, as I age, most of the prosecutors younger than me don't even know that there was a time when there wasn't a victim/witness coordinator in that prosecutor's office, fighting for the rights of the victim.

Nigeria seems to have taken that ethos and taken it to a new level. And I think that that was perhaps one of the reasons why we saw at the ASEAN prosecutors conference in Singapore this summer, that the cutting-edge prosecutors that were invited to share their best practices with their ASEAN counterparts, ASEAN looks to a couple of places that maybe people wouldn't be surprised about, Sweden and the United States.

But then they also looked to Nigeria. And so to the degree that we're seeing African leadership that can be tapped into around the globe, I think is a very, very positive thing, for this fight against human trafficking.

Now, each year we're going to look at Nigeria; and tier one responsibility, not a reprieve. And we hope that Nigeria will continue to sharpen and to continue to improve. Because like India, it is a country that has a big trafficking problem. And even when they're doing well or they're doing a good job of having these structures, they are having good results, there's still a big, big trafficking problem with Nigerians.

As we saw in some of the Tunisian refugee camps and Libya and other places, pimps who, you know, suddenly were in the camps with the women they had been trying to get across into Europe. So this is a -- it's a problem, it continues to be one. But seeing the ASEAN region prosecutors reacts to their Nigerian counterparts, and seeing African leadership that way, to me, showed that we really are, after this decade of development, we're on the precipice, I think, of some real change here.

MR YUN: Thank you. Vietnam is a case where we've expended a great deal of efforts. Secretary Clinton was there twice over the past 18 months. And I was with her on both occasions. And in both meetings, the items that featured very prominently were human rights and trafficking. They are, of course, challenged on both accounts, as well as freedom of religion, that remains an issue.

Vietnam is designated as tier-two watch list. But I do believe they are undergoing changes, both in the government and in society, where we're seeing signs, some concrete signs, that they're making some progress.

Number one is that they now do have a law, anti-trafficking law, and the question remains, how is it going to be implemented? The law was only passed, I think, maybe about nine months ago, so we're keeping a very close eye on that.

And also there are -- there have been a number of criminal prosecutions and convictions of sex traffickers, so we are encouraged by that.

There is still, as you mentioned, labor trafficking remains an issue. And again, we are somewhat happy that they now have a pre-departure training for overseas workers. So it's changing, and we do hope it will change more rapidly. And we are expending a great deal of bilateral efforts. In fact, in about two weeks we are going to hold annual human rights dialogue. On our side, it will be led by Assistant Secretary Posner, and the Vietnamese will be here this year. And so next year we'll go over there.

So these dialogues and high-level meetings have helped. But I understand your concerns.

REP. SMITH: I appreciate that.

Just before I yield to Mr. Payne -- earlier today, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton testified before the full Foreign Affairs Committee. And while it was focused on Afghanistan and Pakistan, and my and everyone else's questions were primarily focused on that, I did ask her if she would pick up the phone and call the foreign minister of China to inquire as to whether or not Chen Guangcheng is dead or alive or perhaps even dying.

There have been rumors, reports. We don't if they're true. He has been beaten savagely by the Chinese police, first in prison and then under house arrest. And his crime, as we all know, is that he pushed human rights, he's the blind activist lawyer, and actually raised the case of forced abortion in -- (inaudible) -- and took the women's side. And for that, he was singled out for excessive brutality.

Again, knowing that that issue of human-rights abuse leads directly into our reason for being here this afternoon, human trafficking, it exacerbates it significantly. If you could take that back, she didn't answer the question, pretty much ran out of time, but didn't go back to it later. But I think a phone call.

I will be convening an emergency hearing of the China Commission next week. And I hope Ambassador Kim can make it as one of the members of the executive branch who is on that. I am chairman of that commission.

And it will be an emergency meeting focused on Chen and his wife. Where are they? And whether or not they are dead or alive and what we are doing, what the West is doing, what any country that cares about human rights is doing vis-a-vis Beijing to raise his case. Because we think he may actually be dead or bleeding as we meet.

Please take that back.

Mr. Payne?

REP. PAYNE: Just a quick question or two more. The chairman raised Nigeria, and I just was going to, when I said I had a couple of other questions, I didn't know he was going to raise that, but I wanted to know, what -- if anyone, maybe you, Ambassador CdeBaca, might tell us, what African countries have made the most progress outside of Nigeria in confronting human trafficking? And are there any best practices that can be replicated?

And the other part of the question is that there are regional groups, as you know, in Africa -- the -- (inaudible) -- in the south and (IGAD ?) in the east and ECOWAS in the west. And had there -- did you find it an advantage, the AU, in general, African Union, to work with the regional groups to sort of see if the best practices, if there are some that you noted could then be introduced?

MR. CDEBACA: Well, exempting Nigeria from the question makes it a little tougher, because that is such an innovative practice. You know, I think -- let me say one last thing about Nigeria, because there was something that was done that the Netherlands and Nigeria cooperated on, and that was bringing up some traditional healers so that the victims in a case in the Netherlands would be able to, in effect, have a counter put on to the juju that had been put on them before they left home. Which was as powerful of a form of coercion to them, based on their religious and cultural practices, as were the threats of force and the beatings that they were undergoing at the hands of their traffickers.

And that notion of that innovation of bringing in a traditional healer in order to have a counter ceremony for those women was, I think, very forward thinking. And it's the kind of thing that you only get if you have those relationships between the governments on these issues.

We've certainly seen, on the part of Mauritius, but a meeting the minimum standards. But as far as the tiers are concerned, that's really what we see in the Africa region. We'd like to see more on the mainland itself.

There is some, I think, hunger on the part of a number of governments to work on this. We've seen, whether it's in Malawi or in Benin, programs that are out there working with especially the child victims. Much of the victim response in Africa has been on child victims, and we want to encourage that to continue, but then also make sure that our African partners recognize male victims and female victims who are adults, not just the children.

Perhaps some of that is because of the good work that we've seen from UNICEF in the area. It's so dominant then that a lot of countries respond on child issues first.

A success story of sorts is the rapid movement that we've seen in Swaziland over the last two years, Swaziland, tier three on the report in 2009. Since then, having raised up to tier two. Maybe because they were so late coming to the game and they came in as a tier-three country that denied there was trafficking, didn't want to do anything on it, et cetera, when the wake-up call happened, they put together an inter-ministerial working group that had NGOs on the working group. We don't even have that in the United States.

So when they meet and under the auspices of the prime minister himself, when they meet, the NGOs and the folks from the government are together in the room. From what we've seen is that it's got a level of respect for each other that has been slow coming in many other African countries. The NGOs feel like they can get a fair shake from their government counterparts, and the government counterparts don't just look at the NGOs as potential rivals for power or someone who could be a problem for them.

And that's something, again, that we'd really like to see. Swaziland obviously has a very specific governing structure. And you know, in other countries that don't have a monarchy, that have different types of governments, perhaps that couldn't happen quite as quickly. But we have seen that as a real positive.

I think that, at the end of the day, what we've really seen is it's that notion of political will. In Senegal, when the government started focusing on child begging and realizing that Koranic teachers were not a religious institution, but were cowards hiding behind the Koran as a way to lure the children in so that they could do their begging all of the time, taking advantage not only of the trust that the parents had of these supposed religious figures, but also taking advantage of the admonishment that the Koran has as far as alms giving and as far as the support that should be had for such schools, perverting that in a way that is right out of Dickens.

These child-begging rings have been plaguing that part of Africa for quite a while. And to start to see the governments in that part of Africa recognize that it's not cultural, it's not just something that's always going to happen, but it's criminals who are taking advantage of children, I think that's a best practice in and of itself, the recognition and then the political will to do something about it.

You know, it's not just in Africa today. We've seen this in the U.K. just in the recent months, the liberation of Eastern European children from begging rings. Obviously, we see this in New Delhi and any major city, I think, in the region. And we see it here in the United States. So this notion of the beggars is something that we all share.

But I think in Africa, the country's rising up against it, as we are starting to see happening, that's a great thing to see.

REP. PAYNE: That's great. Just finally, we had a hearing the other week with our committee. And there was a young man who was blind. He was a slave, I think right from South Sudan. And we know that that's been a problem with Inca children and Nuba children, especially during the conflicts, was encouraged by the government of the north.

And I wonder if some of the conflicts where abductions still are happening and, of course, people are brought into indentured servitude, have you seen that start to eliminate itself? Maybe you could put a short statement on that.

MR. CDEBACA: Well, sadly, the conflict, because it is the enemy of rule of law, it creates the ultimate zone of impunity where the traffickers operate. Conflict does seem to be followed very closely by this, especially in Africa. And unfortunately, it's not only the slavery that comes in its wake, whether it's the villages being emptied out for the men to work as porters as the army moves around, for the women to cook, clean and be used as frankly sex slaves, but also for the children to work in artisanal mines, whether it's gold or the rare minerals that we use in our cell phones and other things.

But also, that notion of conscripting, flat-out stealing frankly, combatants. And so this notion of the child soldiers being, in effect, both victim and perpetrator at the same time, I think, is one of the tragedies of the region.

What we have seen is that a number of countries have taken steps. With the good work of UNICEF and work that we've been doing and others, we've seen a difference in Chad, for instance, as far as the demobilization of child soldiers.

What we'd like to see more in countries around the world is not simply demobilization and giving some type of safety to the child soldiers who you capture from the people that are fighting against you, but then also countries looking at their own troops and making sure that they're scrubbing them accordingly.

So while the trend seems to be improving a bit, we need to keep our eye on the ball as far as the child-soldier issues.

And while my office is not the lead on child soldiers in the State Department, that's the Bureau of Democracy, Rights and Labor, we certainly look at it each year in the trafficking report because we know that slavery, whether it's the women that were held as sex slaves during the Balkan conflict in Europe, whether it's the folks who are currently held in Africa or in other parts of the world, this follows conflict wherever it goes.

REP. PAYNE: Thank you very much.

And I yield back.

REP. SMITH: You know, I will, in follow up, in terms of things looking into -- on July 22nd, I chaired a hearing of the Helsinki Commission on the egregious practice in Egypt of abducting, kidnapping young, Coptic, Christian girls, apparently by the thousands each year, who are then held and forced into Islam, and then given at age 18 to a man, and now they are Islamic.

The woman who testified -- we had several, three people testified -- was Michele Clark, who both, Ambassador CdeBaca, you and I know very well as number two for trafficking at the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe. Very reputable. She is a professor at George Washington University. And she said, it's not a matter of allegations anymore. She has actually done the reporting herself and will be doing more reporting on this. But it seems to be a human rights and, I would say, a trafficking issue, certainly something that rises to the level of it needs to be combated very aggressively.

And I'm wondering, you know, if it's something you have looked into. We gave the information to our new ambassador before she was deployed to Cairo. And the hope is that she will really raise it. But I can't imagine what it must be like for a parent, especially for the young girl, but for a parent and her entire family to have, first, the child abducted, and then put into a situation of bondage, if you will, and then perhaps abused in numerous ways, and at the appropriate age, age 18, given as some kind of gift, like shadow slavery, to someone, as a wife.

And again, Michele Clark has her -- has true credentials in the human-trafficking area. And she says we are missing it. So if you could speak to that, number one.

And secondly, on Uzbekistan. Again, putting on my Helsinki hat, every year the cotton crop is picked by large numbers of young children who are brought out of school. And it is child labor at its worst. And yet for four years, Uzbekistan has been on the tier-two watch list. It seems to me they should have dropped to tier three. Your views?

MR. CDEBACA: I think I'll do Egypt, and then maybe we can go to the northeast with Assistant Secretary Blake, who is fresh off the plane from Uzbekistan.

Mr. Smith, we'll definitely look into the new allegations that you mentioned. We certainly looked through the earlier report that ICI did that I think that Professor Clark had been involved with. But it sounds like there may be some new information. And we'd very much like to look at that.

This is an area that we look at. We also, of course, look at Muslim girls being put into -- sold for marriage and other things, whether it's through the temporary marriages, to what basically can only be described as sex tourists.

REP. SMITH: But as Michele Clark said -- and I'm interrupting you briefly -- from certain jaundiced view on the part of some, they get two things out of it: They get a wife, who they then give out like she's some kind of property or commodity; and secondly, they Islamacize the (woman ?). And to me, that is -- you know, if someone decides to be Muslim, Christian, whatever their faith may be, and that's what freedom of conscience is all about, but to do it through coercion is a horrific human-rights abuse. Sorry to interrupt.

MR. CDEBACA: No. I was just saying that we would very much look forward to seeing, you know, the results of any new reporting, any new evidence. It's something that we take seriously.

We also continue to take seriously the promises of the new government in Egypt, that has assured us that they will enforce and continue to implement the national plan of action for combating trafficking in persons, which was announced in December of last year, with just a few weeks before the events of the Arab Spring happened.

Despite the fact that there had been a lot of leadership by then First Lady Suzanne Mubarak on getting that national plan of action in place, and equally, obviously, that the Mubarak family is no longer in the position that they were, we've heard from the current government that this is something that they want to continue because they realize that this protects Egyptians, whether Egyptian children or Egyptian adults.

And so as we continue to work with them on how they are going to implement that action plan, how they're going to bring it to life, we will want to make sure that all of these allegation about forced marriage, whether of Muslim or Christians, are addressed. And we'll continue to look at this.

And like I said, we'd be happy to look at whatever new evidence that Michele or others might have.

MR. BLAKE: On Uzbekistan, Mr. Chairman, again, this is another country I've worked hard on. And to answer your question, you know, we granted a waiver and kept Uzbekistan on the watch list this year, because in March of this year they decided to create an interagency working group that was tasked with ensuring compliance with all 13 of the ILO conventions, to which Uzbekistan is a party.

That working group, in turn, has created an action plan to, again, ensure compliance. This year, the government permitted UNICEF to assess child labor in all 12 regions of Uzbekistan. And you know, just as importantly, I think, Uzbek officials tell us now that they're making a real effort for the first time to try to end the use of children under the age of 16 in the harvest, and it will actually punish those who are violating the law.

So the harvest is ongoing right now, Mr. Chairman, as you probably know. But from initial reports that we've received from independent sources and from our own embassy, they tell us that in fact there has been a reduced incidence this year of forced child labor in Uzbekistan, and fewer schools have been closed as a result of that.

But the forced adult labor continues, and in fact may even be increasing to compensate for the child-labor part of it.

So you know, obviously, we're going to have to withhold judgment until the end of the season and see how it goes. But you know, I think we have the government's attention. And you know, they are now committed to this, where they have an action plan, they've submitted something on paper.

And you know, this year we're really going to seek, I'd say, three things. First, we're going to try to seek action to end the use of forced adult and child labor, full stop. Secondly, we're going to try to urge them to investigate and prosecute officials who are suspected of being complicit in trafficking. Again, I think there's no stronger signal than putting people like that in jail. And that's going to serve as a powerful deterrent to others. And then third, we want to focus on China and encourage them to allow forced-labor experts, particularly the ILO, in there. UNICEF is doing these assessments now, but it's really not their job. And they themselves are the first to say that they encourage the government to do this.

So we're going to be working both with the ILO and with the government to try to bring them together and achieve, not only implementation of these conventions, but also ILO presence on the ground to kind of verify that.

REP. SMITH: Appreciate that. Thank you. Is there anything -- and I appreciate your work. And you don't look jet-lagged at all. (Laughter.)

Let me just -- is there anything else any of you would like to add before we conclude the hearing, any country you'd like to highlight that perhaps, Mr. Payne, Mr. Turner and I have not brought up?

Well, I want to thank you so much. We will have some written questions. We won't keep you any longer. And I do very much appreciate your work, we all do.

The subcommittee respects the hard work that you expend every day on behalf of the victims. So thank you so very much.

The hearing is adjourned.

LOAD-DATE: October 29, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

252 of 492 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

October 27, 2011 Thursday

HEARING EXAMINES STATE DEPT.'S HUMAN TRAFFICKING WAIVERS AND RATINGS ON CHINA, INDIA, OTHER COUNTRIES

BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 767 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of New Jersey Rep. Chris Smith:

The Obama Administration's decision to grant China a political waiver and India an upgrade in this year's annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report issued by the State Department were questioned by the lawmaker who wrote the first-ever U.S. law to combat trafficking in 2000-the same law which also created the annual report and its ranking system (Public Law 106-386).

A hearing held by Congressman Chris Smith (NJ-04), author of the landmark Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA) as well as subsequent laws to make further strengthen and adapt TVPA, focused on what Smith believes were politicized rankings for India and China-despite the ongoing and expanding problem of human trafficking, particularly sex-trafficking of women and girls, in these countries. In the 2008 reauthorization of the TVPA, Congress decided that no country should be allowed to skirt sanctions on the Tier 2 Watch List for more than two years before being downgraded to Tier 3. This year, 2011, represents the first year that the limit was put to the test.

"It is with concern that I note the President has determined 12 countries need yet another year on the Tier 2 Watch List," said Smith, who chairs the House subcommittee that oversees human rights and co-chairs the Congressional Human Trafficking Caucus. Some of these countries-China and Russia-have been on the Watch List for 7 and 8 years, respectively. I would like to know exactly why the Administration is convinced these countries need yet another year to get their acts together. Those who work on the front lines of human trafficking know all too well that a law is useless unless faithfully implemented." Click here to read Smith's statement.

The hearing the committee heard testimony from top State Department officials (click on their name to read their testimony): Asst. Secretary of State Robert Blake, head of Bureau of South and Central Asian Affairs; Principal Deputy Asst. Secretary of State Joseph Yun, East Asian and Pacific Affairs; Leading U.S. official tasked with combating trafficking, Luis CdeBaca, Ambassador-at-Large and head of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

Smith fears in the case of China, the Obama Administration has politicized human rights with the granting of a political waiver and a refusal to downgrade China from the Tier 2 Watch List. China has become a magnet for trafficking as a result of its brutal one child per couple population control policy and the resulting severe shortage of girls. Experts indicate that the region is missing about 100 million women.

Smith also expressed concern about the Administration's decision to upgrade India from the Tier 2 Watch List to a Tier 2 country.

" India was upgraded to a Tier 2 country in this report despite the fact that it has one of the largest populations of enslaved laborers in the world, and has only prosecuted and convicted a small handful of labor traffickers ," he said.

Smith is the author of the landmark legislation the Trafficking Victims and Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA), which mandated the annual reports, as well as increased penalties for traffickers and provided assistance for victims. Smith wrote two subsequent anti-trafficking laws (PL 108-193 and PL 109-164) increasing resources for crime prevention and expanding treatment assistance for victims. Smith has legislation to reauthorize TVPA which the Foreign Affairs Committee passed earlier this month.

" The TIP Report has been an incredibly effective diplomatic tool ," Smith said. The Report has been a catalyst for improvement -often dramatic improvements-in the efforts of governments to address human trafficking within their borders and regions. With a combination of encouragement, persuasion and sustained pressure via sanctions imposed by the United States, countries around the world have created or amended over 120 laws to combat human trafficking, and, in the past three years alone, an estimated 113,000 victims have been identified and assisted worldwide ." Click here to read the 2011 TIP report.

Smith said that according to the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Human Trafficking-created by the TPVA-more than 12 million people worldwide are trafficking victims. Other estimates put the number of victims as high as 27 million. Today human trafficking is the third most lucrative criminal activity in the world. According to the International Labor Organization (ILO), human traffickers make profits in excess of $31 billion a year.

LOAD-DATE: October 27, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2011 States News Service

253 of 492 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

October 27, 2011 ThursdaySTATEMENT BEFORE THE HOUSE FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE:
SUBCOMMITTEE ON AFRICA, GLOBAL HEALTH AND HUMAN RIGHTS*BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 889 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. Department of State:

Chairman Smith, members of the committee: I welcome the opportunity today to speak with you regarding trafficking in South and Central Asia. I'm honored to do so in the company of my colleagues, Ambassador CdeBaca and Principle Deputy Assistant Secretary Joseph Yun. I have a longer statement that I shall submit for the record.

Mr. Chairman, first let me say how much I appreciate your leadership, the work of this subcommittee and the focus it brings to the issue of Trafficking in Persons. I have made it a personal priority to address trafficking in persons in the SCA region in close partnership with Ambassador C. DeBaca. I have done so through direct advocacy with governments, but also by visiting NGOs doing good work to combat trafficking and recording short video interviews with them that my staff posts on You Tube to publicize their work and the scope of the challenges.

Our engagement has produced dividends and progress, but significant challenges remain. The Department upgraded four SCA countries this year from Tier 2 WL to Tier 2: India, Sri Lanka, Kazakhstan and Tajikistan. Three remained on the Watch List but we are making progress in all three: Bangladesh, Maldives and Uzbekistan; and only one country is on Tier 3 Turkmenistan.

I'd like to briefly review some of the situation in some of the key countries where I have been personally engaged.

India . Mr. Chairman, I know you share our interest in seeing continued progress in India on anti-TIP efforts. The Department's upgrade of India to Tier 2 was based on the government's increased efforts to address its trafficking problem, particularly bonded labor. Specifically, the GOI increased law enforcement efforts through the establishment of over 80 Anti-Human Trafficking Units, ratified the UN TIP Protocol, achieved landmark convictions against bonded labor traffickers with punishments of significant prison sentences, and increased rescue and rehabilitation efforts of thousands of trafficking victims in many parts of India. This good work continues at both the state and federal levels.

Tajikistan is another country that has made commendable progress against trafficking. In 2011, Tajikistan was upgraded to Tier 2 for addressing the use of forced labor in its annual cotton harvest through efforts such as accrediting and assisting NGOs to monitor the harvest. They also prosecuted and convicted the first trafficking offenders under the new anti-trafficking provision.

Kazakhstan too was elevated to Tier 2 this year. The government increased law enforcement efforts against human trafficking, passed a law strengthening penalties for convicted child sex trafficking offenders, and increased victim identification. The Ministry of Internal Affairs has drafted a law that allows trafficking victims to have a legal advocate at all stages of criminal proceedings and expands the scope of trafficking-related crimes to include pimping and the organization and maintenance of brothels increases legal protections for minors subject to forced labor.

Uzbekistan presents a mixed picture. The government has made good progress in combating sex trafficking, but has been slow to address the use of forced labor, particularly in the annual cotton harvest. In March of 2011, the Government of Uzbekistan created an Interagency Working Group tasked with ensuring compliance with all 13 ILO conventions to which Uzbekistan is a party. Our Embassy in Tashkent will be monitoring the GOU's actions to uphold these commitments and I will continue to engage the Government to make progress on this important priority.

Tools to influence change . The Trafficking Report has been an impetus for this change but it is only one of the tools we have at our disposal to influence the anti-trafficking efforts of other countries.

Reports from international NGOs have sometimes been instrumental in informing and compelling action on TIP. My bureau and Ambassador C. DeBacas team greatly value such input and have tried to foster a cooperative relationship with these institutions. We influence them and they influence us by mutual sharing of information to make sure our efforts are complimentary and we make the most impact on the ground.

Governments are extremely interested to know where they will be ranked in the Report when it comes out in June. But I think that the work we do to consistently engage to influence people at every level of society is equally significant. For example, the exchange programs or workshops we sponsor to train government officials in implementation are critical to realizing the potential of the new laws being passed. The training programs with police officers or border guards to sensitize them towards potential TIP victims are also vital.

I want to assure you that we value the resources we are entrusted with by Congress and we work very closely with Ambassador C. DeBacas and his staff to implement programs that make a positive and lasting impact.

In summary, the SCA region is moving closer to being compliant with internationally-recognized anti-TIP standards, but there is much more work to do. This will continue to be a personal priority for me and a priority for my bureau. Thank you again for the opportunity to address this subcommittee. I look forward to your questions.

LOAD-DATE: October 28, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

254 of 492 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

October 27, 2011 Thursday

THE TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT 2011: TRUTH, TRENDS, AND TIER RANKINGS

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 2358 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. Department of State:

Thank you Mr. Chairman, Congressman Payne, and all the members of this committee for the opportunity to testify today. As Congress continues to deliberate this years reauthorization of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, hearings such as this one are helpful opportunities to discuss the global fight against human trafficking, and in particular one of our governments most important tools in moving that fight forward, the annual Trafficking in Persons Report.

The TIP Report assesses government action around the world against trafficking in personsthat is, all of the activities involved in reducing someone to, or holding them in, a condition of compelled service. The core of this Report is the set of Congressionally-established minimum standards set forth in the TVPA. These standards reflect the definitions and framework to combat trafficking in persons outlined in the United Nations Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, especially Women and Children, known also as the Palermo Protocol.

Following Congress mandate, the Department of State ranks governments around the world according to these standards and determines a tier ranking based on a governments progress in meeting those standards. The Report comprises those rankings as well as individual country narratives that further explain both the TIP situation on the ground and governmental efforts according to the criteria laid out by Congress. The methodology is sound and transparentthe facts are applied to the law. Any country, whether in Asia or elsewhere, that wants to test this methodology need only assess their efforts against these minimum standards.

Thorough and honest assessments are the benchmark of the TIP Report. Our narratives take into account information from civil society groups, foreign governments, and our own State Department reporting officers who conduct on-the-ground research throughout the year. The review process involves numerous DOS offices so that the final product represents a Department-wide consensus on how well various governments are handling this problem. Beginning last year, a United States country ranking was also included in the Report, because, as Secretary Clinton has said, we should hold ourselves to the same standards as we hold everyone else. Accurate reporting is essential to the effectiveness of the TIP Report as a diplomatic tool, and indeed governments repeatedly cite it as a factor prompting stronger action in response to modern slavery. Sometimes that happens in publicmore often in private. And sometimes a government that criticizes the Report and even perhaps mobilizes others against it quietly takes steps to work with us to begin meeting these standards.

What the Report tells us is that no country is immune to this scourge, and that no government is doing a perfect job combating it. The two regions we are addressing todayEast Asia and the Pacific, and South and Central Asiaare hit particularly hard by this crime. Im pleased to be joined today by Assistant Secretary Robert Blake, who leads the Departments South and Central Asian Affairs Bureau, and Joseph Yun, Deputy Assistant Secretary in the Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs. We always say the fight against modern slavery takes political will, and Bob Blake and EAP Assistant Secretary Kurt Campbell are showing that both individually and within their chains of command. My colleagues will discuss in greater detail the progress in these areas and what governments are doing about it, but Id like to highlight a few of the problems in trends that were discussed in the 2011 TIP Report and continue to be areas of concern.

Sex trafficking of women and children has not abated and may in fact be increasing in places such as India. Additionally, our findings continue to show that it is local populations, more than Western sex tourists, that fuel the demand for sex trafficking, and law enforcement needs to address both sectors for prevention to be truly successful. Widening gender gaps in China and India are fueling the demand for young girls as forced brides or for commercial sexual exploitation.

We know that around the world, forced labor is highly prevalent among migrant populations, and that Asia has the world's largest share of labor migration. Migrants from both the East Asia and Pacific and South and Central Asia regions are subjected to forced labor in recognized destination countries such as Malaysia, Singapore, and the Persian Gulf. More troubling still, much of this abuse takes place under the guise of legal, contractual and temporary work.

In recent months, concerns over forced labor on fishing fleets have garnered increased attention. Our own research suggests that this is a problem with massive geographic scope, spanning fisheries from Indonesia to New Zealand. And Asian boats are ranging from the Cape of Good Hope to Central America.

The enslavement of domestic workers from South and East Asia is a significant problem, whether Sri Lankans abused in the Gulf or Indonesians exploited in Malaysia. The International Labor Organization's (ILO) new Convention on Domestic Workers aims at addressing the unique vulnerabilities of this group; we hope that the increased attention on this challenge will lead to governments addressing the needs for justice and services for these victims.

Definitional confusion among governments in the EAP and SCA regions continues to lead to the conflation of people smuggling and human trafficking. This lack of clarity hinders efforts to find and help victims. When it comes to trafficking, we continue to urge destination governments to shift their focus away from the legality of a migrant. As we know, modern slavery need not involve movement or cross borders.

Additionally, we continue to push governments to acknowledge that human trafficking is a crime that can involve sex and labor. For instance, the definition of trafficking in the 2005 South Asia Association for Regional Cooperation (SAARC) Convention is not consistent with how the term is defined and addressed in many other prominent international instruments on trafficking in persons from groups such as the Council of Europe and the Organization of American States, and with the primary international treaty on trafficking, the Palermo Protocol. The Convention continues to focus on the concept of trafficking as the movement of women and children for prostitution and fails to address the trafficking of adults or forced labor. We hope that as the regions' leaders gather for the SAARC Summit in Male in November, they will work toward bringing the regions' conceptual notion of trafficking into conformity with the UN and other regional frameworks.

We continue to advocate for comprehensive victim care, rather than the Detain and Deport model that we too often see in these regions. Protection should not mean inappropriate confinement for victims preparatory to deportation. Indeed, they need to be empowered through the opportunity for economic self-sustainability as well as aftercare and alternatives to deportation.

We encourage governments of sending and receiving states to explicitly address modern slavery in labor-related memoranda of understanding (MOUs) and to enforce those provisions in an open and transparent manner.

My staff and I, collaborating closely with regional bureaus, will continue to engage governments in these regions in order to bring these issues to their attention, and we will urge them to take positive action in advance of next year's TIP Report.

In addition to the country narratives, the TIP Report includes an introduction that provides a conceptual framework to the struggle against modern slavery. In this year's Report, we show that the first 10 years of the modern anti-trafficking movement have been a decade of development: in countries all over the world, legal structures have been enacted and protection mechanisms have been put in place. However, the number of successful prosecutions seems to have leveled off, services for survivors continue to be inadequate, and victim identification remains a challenge. That's why the 2011 TIP Report described the need for a decade of delivery, in which governments must be held accountable for delivering on the promises made in recent years. Because structures and results are not the same thing.

The difference between the passage of a law and the effective implementation of a law is political will. We have seen political will succeed. We have seen it in the Philippines, where the Aquino Administration is prioritizing trafficking cases in the court system and pushing through the backlog, delivering on a set of processes and promises that had been moribund at best. We have seen it in other regions; the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) this summer invited Nigerian prosecutors to come to Singapore and share the secrets of their success, providing a unique opportunity for ASEAN members to learn from an African country.

But the reality is that there are places where that political will is weak or nonexistent, and there, victims are most at risk. As the Report shows, some governments merely go through the motions when it comes to fighting modern slavery, and some governments don't do anything at all. A key source of hope for victims and survivors is the work of civil society-non-governmental organizations, international organizations, the faith community, and advocacy groups.

These organizations are made up of people working every day to make the decade of delivery a reality despite the fact that many governments are doing little or nothing at all. These groups are running shelters on dollars a day. They are freeing victims from the most horrific abuse imaginable. They are the women and men on the front line of this fight. But as is often the case in places where poverty and corruption hinder the good intentions of committed people, a lack of resources and capacity are insurmountable roadblocks to those seeking to save victims from exploitation and bring their traffickers to justice.

In addition to our robust diplomatic efforts, this is another area where the Trafficking in Persons Office is making a difference, through our International Programs foreign assistance funds. In the last two years, my office received 998 applications for assistance from 546 organizations requesting a total of $547 million. We know that it will never be possible to give every organization the help they want. And we know that we have a responsibility to be responsible custodians of taxpayer dollars. That's why our office has implemented a rigorous and transparent review process to ensure that every cent of our foreign assistance appropriation is spent responsibly and is put to the use where it will do the most good.

To answer the requests for $547 million which we received through funding applications—the vast majority of which described projects of tremendous merit—our office administered a foreign assistance budget for the last two years of $39.1 million. Based on an estimate that there are up to 27 million victims of trafficking worldwide, that funding total provides a little more than 72 cents per victim per year. This year's solicitation is out, and we hope to receive innovative and impactful proposals.

The country-specific tier rankings and diagnostic assessments included in the TIP Report help us determine where we should be allocating these funds. To maximize the impact of our efforts, we identify priority countries for programming. We generally target our foreign assistance to Tier 3, Tier 2 Watch List, and, in some cases, Tier 2 countries. This linkage demonstrates that the Report isn't just an exercise in finger-pointing at countries that aren't doing a good job, but is an important tool for determining where our foreign assistance dollars can be used most effectively.

These are not places where a wealth of resources is available to fight human trafficking. If we were to suddenly pull the plug on the projects we support, there wouldn't be another organization waiting in the wings to take over the provision of victim services. There wouldn't be another source of funding to keep training prosecutors and police officers. In many countries, if the little funding we are able to give were to disappear, those programs would simply cease to exist. In those places, there would be no place for victims and survivors to go.

It was four months ago today that we released the 2011 TIP Report and that Secretary Clinton called for a decade of delivery. If the Trafficking in Persons Office is no longer able to stand with those organizations making a difference on the ground, the decade of delivery is already in danger of failing. If the antitrafficking movement loses the fight in Washington, in the halls of Congress, we could lose that fight everywhere else as well.

We cannot balance the budget on the backs of trafficking victims. If we try to do so, from some misplaced sense of proportion with across-the-board cuts to an already tiny budget, we put at risk all the progress made over the last decade. This crime continues to present a monumental challenge. But there's still much reason for hope. We want the 2012 Trafficking in Persons Report to be a report about more and more success stories. We want it to tell about governments living up to their responsibilities. We want it to describe effective partnerships with robust civil society. We want this Report to show the struggle against modern slavery moving in the right direction. Because this Report is not merely a reflection of what foreign governments are doing to combat this heinous crime. It is a reflection of American leadership around the world.

Human trafficking is a threat to our security and an offense to our most important values. But more importantly, as Secretary Clinton has said, fighting slavery is part of who we are as a nation. We have a responsibility to act against this crime. We must not will not shrink from that responsibility.

Thank you, and I look forward to answering any questions you have.

LOAD-DATE: October 28, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2011 States News Service

255 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

Targeted News Service

October 27, 2011 Thursday 3:14 AM EST

Hearing Examines State Dept.'s Human Trafficking Waivers & Ratings on China, India, Other Countries

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 824 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J. (4th CD), issued the following news release:

The Obama Administration's decision to grant China a political waiver and India an upgrade in this year's annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report issued by the State Department were questioned by the lawmaker who wrote the first-ever U.S. law to combat trafficking in 2000--the same law which also created the annual report and its ranking system (Public Law 106-386).

A hearing held by Congressman Chris Smith (NJ-04), author of the landmark Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA) as well as subsequent laws to make further strengthen and adapt TVPA, focused on what Smith believes were politicized rankings for India and China--despite the ongoing and expanding problem of human trafficking, particularly sex-trafficking of women and girls, in these countries. In the 2008 reauthorization of the TVPA, Congress decided that no country should be allowed to skirt sanctions on the Tier 2 Watch List for more than two years before being downgraded to Tier 3. This year, 2011, represents the first year that the limit was put to the test.

"It is with concern that I note the President has determined 12 countries need yet another year on the Tier 2 Watch List," said Smith, who chairs the House subcommittee that oversees human rights and co-chairs the Congressional Human Trafficking Caucus. "Some of these countries--China and Russia--have been on the Watch List for 7 and 8 years, respectively. I would like to know exactly why the Administration is convinced these countries need yet another year to get their acts together. Those who work on the front lines of human trafficking know all too well that a law is useless unless faithfully implemented." Click here to read Smith's statement.http://chrissmith.house.gov/UploadedFiles/2011_10_27_TIP_Report_Hearing_Statement.pdf

The hearing the committee heard testimony from top State Department officials (click on their name to read their testimony): Asst. Secretary of State Robert Blake, head of Bureau of South and Central Asian Affairs; Principal Deputy Asst. Secretary of State Joseph Yun, East Asian & Pacific Affairs; Leading U.S. official tasked with combating trafficking, Luis CdeBaca, Ambassador-at-Large and head of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

Smith fears in the case of China, the Obama Administration has politicized human rights with the granting of a political waiver and a refusal to downgrade China from the Tier 2 Watch List. China has become a magnet for trafficking as a result of its brutal one child per couple population control policy and the resulting severe shortage of girls. Experts indicate that the region is missing about 100 million women.

Smith also expressed concern about the Administration's decision to upgrade India from the Tier 2 Watch List to a Tier 2 country.

"India was upgraded to a Tier 2 country in this report despite the fact that it has one of the largest populations of enslaved laborers in the world, and has only prosecuted and convicted a small handful of labor traffickers," he said.

Smith is the author of the landmark legislation the Trafficking Victims and Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA), which mandated the annual reports, as well as increased penalties for traffickers and provided assistance for victims. Smith wrote two subsequent anti-trafficking laws (PL 108-193 and PL 109-164) increasing resources for crime prevention and expanding treatment assistance for victims. Smith has legislation to reauthorize TVPA which the Foreign Affairs Committee passed earlier this month.

"The TIP Report has been an incredibly effective diplomatic tool," Smith said. "The Report has been a catalyst for improvement --often dramatic improvements--in the efforts of governments to address human trafficking within their borders and regions. With a combination of encouragement, persuasion and sustained pressure via sanctions imposed by the United States, countries around the world have created or amended over 120 laws to combat human trafficking, and, in the past three years alone, an estimated 113,000 victims have been identified and assisted worldwide." Click here to read the 2011 TIP report.<http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/tiprpt/2011/index.htm>

Smith said that according to the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Human Trafficking--created by the TPVA--more than 12 million people worldwide are trafficking victims. Other estimates put the number of victims as high as 27 million. Today human trafficking is the third most lucrative criminal activity in the world. According to the International Labor Organization (ILO), human traffickers make profits in excess of $31 billion a year.

To watch a webcast of the event, click here. (Note: the broadcast begins at the 15 minute mark- advance player to that time.) <http://bcove.me/xcz9swwt>

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS MJ88-111027-3652806 StaffFurigay

LOAD-DATE: October 28, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2011 Targeted News Service LLC
All Rights Reserved

256 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

October 26, 2011 Wednesday 12:58 PM GMT

Clinton to make quick visit to Philippines

LENGTH: 216 wordsDATELINE: Manila, Oct 26 2011

US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton is to make a brief visit to the Philippines next month on her way to a summit of Southeast Asian leaders in Indonesia, the foreign department said Wednesday.

Clinton will call on President Benigno Aquino during the November 15 trip to Manila, Filipino Foreign Secretary Albert del Rosario told reporters.

"It (the Clinton-Aquino meeting) will be in terms of bilateral and multilateral issues. We are looking for a discussion on many areas of cooperation," del Rosario said.

The official said he expected human trafficking to be on the agenda but would not give further details.

The United States in June removed the Philippines from a human trafficking watchlist and put it on so-called Tier 2, for countries that do not fully meet standards on human trafficking but are making efforts to do so.

The State Department annual report on trafficking cited an "intensified effort" by the Philippines, which it said had convicted 25 trafficking offenders over the year, compared with nine in the previous 12 months.

Some of the recent cases include the country's first-ever convictions for forced labour, it added.

About a million people leave the Philippines every year in search of work, with about nine million currently living abroad, according to official estimates.

LOAD-DATE: October 27, 2011LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2011 Agence France Presse
All Rights Reserved

257 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

October 25, 2011 Tuesday 8:24 PM TSTSingapore delegation studying Taiwan's anti-trafficking efforts*BYLINE: Christie ChenLENGTH: 178 wordsDATELINE: Taipei, Oct. 25

A government delegation from Singapore is making an Oct. 23-28 visit to Taiwan to learn from the country's experience in combating human trafficking, the National Immigration Agency (NIA) said Tuesday.

The seven-member delegation is studying how Taiwan has brought its public and private sectors together to clamp down on human trafficking, how it provides protection services to the victims of trafficking, how it has raised public awareness of the issue, and how it investigates and prosecutes human trafficking crimes, said the NIA.

The delegation will attend an Oct. 27 international workshop on strategies for combating human trafficking organized by the NIA.

Taiwan was listed as a "tier 1 country" in the U.S. State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report in both 2010 and 2011, meaning that it has made efforts to address the problem and has complied with the minimum standards of the U.S. Trafficking and Violence Protection Act, said the NIA.

Taiwan and South Korea are the only two countries in Asia to have been given the highest ranking, NIA officials said.

LOAD-DATE: November 17, 2011LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2011 Central News Agency
All Rights Reserved

258 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

October 23, 2011 Sunday

East Africa; New Form of Child Trafficking in Tanzania

BYLINE: The East African (Nairobi)LENGTH: 721 words

Orphans in secondary schools are now in danger of being exploited by child traffickers who lure them out of school with promises of training them in Europe, but instead exploit them for money, it has been revealed.

The government of Tanzania is conducting a rigorous screening of visa applications, especially those for children, to check the practice.

According to the Ministry of Health and Social Welfare Assistant Commissioner Jeanne Ndyetabura, they have so far halted some visa applications in order to investigate whether the submissions were genuine.

"The problem was brought to our attention by teachers who were concerned about the number of students, especially orphans, who were being taken out of school with promises of being trained outside the country," said Ms Ndyetabura.

Ms Ndyetabura said after following up on the lead, they discovered that instead, the children were being exploited through working for "charity" organisations outside the country that required them to sing on the streets for money.

Ms Ndyetabura revealed this when launching a book on children's rights and a council for children during a national children's conference organised by Save the Children in Tanzania.

"We are working round the clock to deal with this serious issue, including taking to task the perpetrators as the problem is a national concern," said Ms Ndyetabula.

According to the 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report (Tanzania) by the United States Department of State, Tanzania is a source, transit, and destination country for men, women, and children who are subjected to forced labour and sex trafficking.

Internal

The incidence of internal trafficking is higher than that of transnational trafficking, and is usually facilitated by family members', friends', and intermediaries' offers of assistance with education or finding lucrative employment in urban areas.

It further states that the use of young girls for forced domestic service continues to be Tanzania's largest human trafficking problem. "Girls from rural areas are taken to urban centres and Zanzibar for domestic service," the report says.

In the Arusha region, unscrupulous agricultural subcontractors reportedly trafficked women and men to work on coffee plantations. Smaller numbers of Tanzanian children and adults are subjected to conditions of forced domestic service and sex trafficking in surrounding countries, South Africa, Saudi Arabia, the United Kingdom, France, and possibly other European countries.

"The government of Tanzania does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so," the report says.

Despite these significant efforts, particularly the conviction of three trafficking offenders during the reporting period, the government did not demonstrate overall increasing efforts to address human trafficking over the previous reporting period; therefore, Tanzania is placed on Tier 2 Watch List for a second consecutive year.

The government made limited progress towards implementation of its Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act, in part due to poor inter-ministerial co-ordination and lack of understanding of what constitutes human trafficking; most government officials remain unfamiliar with the Act's provisions or their responsibility to address trafficking under it.

Moreover, the ministries involved in anti-trafficking efforts had no budgetary resources allocated to combating the crime.

The Tanzanian government made modest anti-trafficking law enforcement efforts during the reporting period, achieving its first three prosecutions and convictions under the country's anti-trafficking statute.

The Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act of 2008, which came into effect in February 2009, outlaws all forms of trafficking and prescribes punishments of one to 10 years' imprisonment, punishments that are sufficiently stringent, but not commensurate with those prescribed for other serious crimes, such as rape.

The Tanzanian government's efforts to protect victims of trafficking during the reporting period were modest and suffered from a lack of resources.

The government continued to rely on NGOs to provide care for victims of trafficking; however, NGO facilities for shelter and specialised services were limited to urban areas.

Additional reporting by Joseph Mwamunyange

LOAD-DATE: October 24, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

259 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Digital Journal

October 21, 2011 Friday 2:40 AM EST

Malaysia police bust human trafficking ring

LENGTH: 285 words

On Tuesday, Malaysian police uncovered a human trafficking ring consisting of Ugandan women who had been forced into sexual slavery.

RTT News reports that a woman who had escaped the prostitution ring notified authorities of the apartment where the other women were being kept. The apartment, located just outside of Kuala Lumpur, was put under police surveillance.

Police then conducted a sting operation. One man and two women have been arrested in connection with the prostitution ring.

Different reports state that there were between 19 and 21 women who were rescued in the process. They ranged in age between 18 and 42.

BBC News reports that the women were promised lucrative jobs overseas, and were transported into Malaysia after spending time in China.

The women were forced to perform sexual services with clients and were required to work 10 hours a day nonstop for the past 3 months, according to Asia One. They faced abuse if they refused to work.

The rescued women have now been transported to a welfare home and are expected to be deported back to their homeland once the investigation has concluded.

Human trafficking and forced prostitution are common problems in Malaysia. Many of the victims are foreigners from impoverished nations who have been brought into the country and promised lucrative work opportunities, only to be forced into human trafficking rings.

The Malaysian government is improving their efforts in trying to eliminate the problem, but they have a reputation for not being fully compliant in dealing with this issue. The country has been placed on a Tier 2 Watch List over concerns that widespread human trafficking is still allowed to continue largely unenforced within its borders.

LOAD-DATE: October 21, 2011LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Web BlogJOURNAL-CODE: DIJO-0001

Copyright 2011 Newstex LLC
All Rights Reserved
Newstex Web Blogs
Copyright 2011 Digital Journal

260 of 492 DOCUMENTS

RTT News (United States)

October 18, 2011 Tuesday

Malaysia Busts Human Trafficking Ring, Frees 21 Ugandan Women

LENGTH: 279 words

(RTTNews) - Police in Malaysia said Tuesday they have busted a human trafficking ring and rescued some 21 Ugandan women who were forced into prostitution by ring members.

The Ugandan women, aged between 19 and 42, were rescued from an apartment block near Kuala Lumpur in a sting operation, which also led to the arrest of one male and two female members of the trafficking ring.

The apartment block was put under police surveillance after one of the Ugandan women managed to escape and sought police help. The rescued women have been transferred to a welfare home and are expected to be deported later.

Police said the women, who were promised well-paying hotel jobs in Malaysia by "recruitment agents" in their home country, were brought into Malaysia via China. But they were later forced to have sex with African men residing in Malaysia by the ring members.

The women were beaten up and locked in rooms by the ring members if they refused to have sex with the customers in exchange for money or attempt to escape. The detained ring members now face up to 15 years in prison if convicted on human trafficking charges.

Malaysia has been criticized in the past for not enforcing laws against human trafficking. The South Asian country has been on the US government's human trafficking watch list since last year.

Previously, Malaysia also figured in the US list of nations with worst human trafficking records for three years. The upgraded status was prompted by the Malaysian government's stepped up efforts to curb sexual exploitation of women and children in the country.

For comments and feedback: contact editorial@rttnews.com

Copyright(c) 2011 RTTNews.com. All Rights Reserved

LOAD-DATE: October 19, 2011LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

261 of 492 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Middle East - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

October 14, 2011 Friday

USA grants waiver to continue aid to Lebanon

LENGTH: 250 words

Text of report in English by privately-owned Lebanese newspaper The Daily Star website on 12 October
["US Grants Waiver To Continue Aid To Lebanon"]

Beirut: President Barack Obama granted Lebanon a waiver earlier this month to allow the continuation of US assistance to Lebanon, the American embassy said in a statement Tuesday [12 October].

The statement added that US aid to the country was at risk of being blocked due to Lebanon's Tier Three ranking in the 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report.

"The United States appreciates the seriousness with which the [Prime Minister Najib] Mikati government and Lebanese civil society has addressed issues related to combating trafficking in persons," the statement said.

On Aug. 4, Lebanon's Parliament endorsed a law that introduced penalties for human trafficking with a more stringent interpretation of trafficking when minors are involved. According the law, the exploitation of minors through recruitment and transferring, without the use of force or threats, will be considered human trafficking. Some amendments were also introduced regarding trial procedures.

"Ambassador [Maura] Connelly welcomed the initial steps taken by the government of Lebanon and pledged to continue collaboration on protecting victims of trafficking, prosecuting perpetrators, and preventing the spread of trafficking," the embassy's statement said, adding that Connelly had informed Mikati of Obama's decision on Oct. 4.

Source: The Daily Star website, Beirut, in English 12 Oct 11

LOAD-DATE: October 14, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2011 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

262 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Herald (Goa) (India)

October 14, 2011 FridayHuman trafficking breach of law: Adv Thakker*LENGTH: 350 wordsDATELINE: PANJIM

PANJIM, Oct. 14 -- Human trafficking is a legal problem, not a social one, noted lawyer and anti- trafficking activist Nandini Thakker said.

Speaking during a round table discussion on trafficking in persons at the International Centre Dona Paula, Thakker stressed that human trafficking was first and foremost a serious and grave breach of law, whose reasons were however social.

" Crime in human trafficking are the second largest in the world and India lies at Tier 2 on the United Nations list. She however cautioned that for seven long years India lay at the Tier 2 watch list categor of the United National categorisation of countries based on efforts governments take to prevent trafficking," Thakker said adding that Tier 2 watch list was the second worst rating the country could have got.

In her discussion, she highlighted that it was improper implementation of law, lack of fear of law besides lack of awareness that was the cause of widespread human trafficking in India.

" People do not realise that it is easy to get trafficked just as easy as it is for your house to be robbed and that precautions should be taken," Thakker said adding that it is not only the children of poor families who are liable to trafficking and child abuse and that there have even been cases where children of celebrities were kidnapped for trafficking and abused.

She hit out at those who advocate the need for more laws and stressed that the existing laws are strong enough with Immoral Trafficking prevention Act providing for a minimal 7 years imprisonment if convicted which could go up to a life term for serious cases.

She sought to bring to the notice of the public that licence of a hotel is liable to be cancelled forever if it is proved that the premises are being used for prostitution.

Crime in human trafficking are the second largest in the world and India lies at Tier 2 on the United Nations list. Published by HT Syndication with permission from Herald Goa. For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: October 14, 2011LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

263 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

The Daily Star (Lebanon)

October 12, 2011 Wednesday

U.S. grants waiver to continue aid to Lebanon

LENGTH: 235 words

President Barack Obama granted Lebanon a waiver earlier this month to allow the continuation of U.S. assistance to Lebanon, the American Embassy in Beirut said in a statement Tuesday.

BEIRUT: President Barack Obama granted Lebanon a waiver earlier this month to allow the continuation of U.S. assistance to Lebanon, the American Embassy in Beirut said in a statement Tuesday.

The statement added that U.S. aid to the country was at risk of being blocked due to Lebanon's Tier Three ranking in the 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report.

"The United States appreciates the seriousness with which the [Prime Minister Najib] Mikati government and Lebanese civil society has addressed issues related to combating trafficking in persons," the statement said.

On Aug. 4, Lebanon's Parliament endorsed a law that introduced penalties for human trafficking with a more stringent interpretation of trafficking when minors are involved. According to the law, the exploitation of minors through recruitment and transferring, without the use of force or threats, will be considered human trafficking. Some amendments were also introduced regarding trial procedures.

"Ambassador [Maura] Connelly welcomed the initial steps taken by the government of Lebanon and pledged to continue collaboration on protecting victims of trafficking, prosecuting perpetrators, and preventing the spread of trafficking," the embassy's statement said.

LOAD-DATE: October 17, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: 23

Copyright 2011 The Daily Star - The Daily Star FZ LLC.
Syndigate.info, Al bawaba.com
All Rights Reserved

264 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

Targeted News Service

October 10, 2011 Monday 12:15 AM EST

President Obama Issues Waiver on TIP Sanctions for Lebanon

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 140 words

DATELINE: BEIRUT

The U.S. Embassy issued the following news release:

President Barack Obama granted Lebanon a waiver to allow the continuation of U.S. assistance to Lebanon, which was at risk of being blocked due to Lebanon's Tier Three ranking in the 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report.

Ambassador Maura Connelly informed Prime Minister Najib Mikati of President Obama's decision on October 4. The United States appreciates the seriousness with which the Mikati government and Lebanese civil society has addressed issues related to combating trafficking in persons. Ambassador Connelly welcomed the initial steps taken by the Government of Lebanon and pledged to continue collaboration on protecting victims of trafficking, prosecuting perpetrators, and preventing the spread of trafficking.

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS sm92 111013-sm92-3628047 71SibanaM

LOAD-DATE: October 13, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2011 Targeted News Service LLC
All Rights Reserved

265 of 492 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

October 8, 2011 Saturday

Philippine official says US envoy expresses "regret" over sex tourism remarks

LENGTH: 744 words

Text of report by Pia Lee-Brago headlined "US Envoy Apologizes for Sex Tourism Story" published by Philippine newspaper The Philippine Star's news portal Philstar.com on 8 October

Manila, Philippines - US Ambassador Harry Thomas Jr. has apologized for his remarks that 40 per cent of male tourists visiting the Philippines come only for sex tourism, Foreign Affairs Secretary Albert del Rosario said yesterday.

Del Rosario said he received a text message from Thomas who expressed regret over his statement at a forum last month that should not have been made without supporting data.

"I am sending you a response expressing regret for my comments. I should not have used the 40 percent statistics without the ability to back it up," Thomas said. "I regret any harm that I may have caused."

Del Rosario received the message in Hanoi while attending the 7th Joint Commission on Bilateral Cooperation between the Philippines and Vietnam.

He said Thomas has been working closely with the Philippine government in addressing the challenge of human trafficking in the country.

Lawmakers challenged the data on sex tourism cited by Thomas and said the American envoy should back up his statement with solid proof.

Thomas' statements were challenged by various sectors that included Malacanang and the Department of Tourism.

Thomas, however, earlier said he would not apologize over his remark about prostitution in the country and stressed he was only telling the truth when he cited the statistics.

Thomas challenged critics to show what they should have done and their efforts in stopping child prostitution and human trafficking in the country.

US embassy Press Attache Bettina Malone on Sept. 28 said Thomas' statements reflected US government estimates, based on the work of US officials working with Philippine authorities to close clubs that cater to paedophiles.

Sources told The STAR that Thomas indicated the Philippine government was well aware of the estimates and report but was "turning a blind eye."

Thomas said on Sept. 22 during a roundtable discussion on human trafficking organized by the Supreme Court, the Philippine Judicial Academy in partnership with the Court of Appeals and US Department of Justice Criminal Division, that an estimated 40 percent of foreign men, including American nationals, visit the country for sexual tourism.

Thomas said the US request is for the Philippines to refine and strengthen the anti-trafficking law for more convictions and prosecute foreigners, including Americans, involved.

Thomas said he asked President Aquino and Justice Secretary Leila de Lima to prosecute foreigners and Americans engaged in the illicit activity and cybersex to the fullest extent of the law.

Although the US acknowledged an increased rate to 25 convictions in human trafficking cases, Thomas said "I hope the law will be refined and strengthened."

According to Thomas, the US provided over $6.6 million to the Philippines for training in anti-human trafficking programs.

Thomas noted corruption allows those involved in human trafficking to continue with impunity.

The Philippines welcomed the country's removal from the Tier 2 Watchlist in the 2011 State Department Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report released by the US government last June.

The report released by US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said the Philippines moved to Tier Two status, indicating progress has been made by the Philippine government.

A Tier Two status removes the immediate threat of sanctions but does indicate work needs to continue on this global challenge.

The report recognized the significant efforts taken by the Philippine government to combat trafficking in persons, such as the almost 200-percent increase in convictions of traffickers, including convictions for labour trafficking.

The measures that the Philippines has implemented this year include increasing efforts to identify trafficking victims in destination countries and pursuing criminal investigation and prosecution of their traffickers, increasing victim shelter resources to be able to assist more victims of human trafficking, and continued assessment and improving methods to address domestic and international labour trafficking.

The report also cited the notable efforts by the Philippine government to address trafficking-related corruption, and the numerous measures and policies to improve institutional responses to human trafficking.

Source: The Philippine Star website, Manila, in English 08 Oct 11

LOAD-DATE: October 8, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

266 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Cape Times (South Africa)

October 07, 2011 Friday
E1 Edition

Delegates shine light on sexual crimes

BYLINE: Zara NicholsonSECTION: NEWS; Pg. 7LENGTH: 475 words

SOUTH Africa is seen as the "best destination" for human trafficking.

At the Global Partnership to End Violence Against Women conference, held in Cape Town this week, delegates from South Africa, DRC, Liberia and the US shared best practices and ideas on how to overcome the obstacles facing African countries in terms of sexual crimes.

As a signatory to the UN Palermo Protocol, South Africa must pass domestic legislation that prevents and combats trafficking in persons.

However, according to the global organisation Vital Voices, the country is rated as a Tier Two country in a US Trafficking in Persons report, which meant it does not comply with UN standards for protecting victims.

The US trafficking report rated 184 countries between tiers one, two and three. Tier One meant a country complied fully with the UN Palermo Protocol. Tier Two meant a country was not compliant, but was making strides in fighting the crime.

Tier Three meant a country was not making any effort to combat the crime.

Tier One countries included Portugal and Poland while Tier Two countries included South Africa, Peru, Paraguay and Romania. Tier Three countries included DRC, Sudan, Zimbabwe, North Korea and Saudi Arabia.

Cindy Dyer, the deputy head of human rights at Vital Voices and a former US prosecutor, said: "South Africa's Tier Two ranking is largely due to the failure of the law being passed and this makes the country a passage for the crime, but there are huge strides being made to fight the crime with the task teams that tackle prostitution.

"South Africa has prosecuted (cases) and there are plenty of countries that have never prosecuted a case."

Dyer said women from Eastern Europe and Asia were being lured to South Africa because it was seen as the wealthiest and best destination in Africa.

Women were easily assured that they would be employed in South Africa as waitresses or nannies, but, when they arrived, they were trapped in the sex trade.

Dyer said the three-day conference had proved very valuable as all countries were able to exchange tips on how to improve their response to sexual violence.

"The three African |countries were chosen because all (were) developing their |ability to work on sexual |violence. South Africa has shown us the Thuthuzela Care Centres model, which I think |is not only the absolute |best model for the rest of Africa, but the world," Dyer said.

"Liberia has forensic nurses who are seen as experts for sexual violence and have made good progress with gathering evidence for prosecution."

Thoko Majokweni, head of the sexual offences and community affairs unit at the National Prosecuting Authority, who was representing South Africa, said: "One of the things that is clear coming out of the conference is that post-conflict countries have a huge job ahead of them with gender-based violence."

zara.nicholson@inl.co.za

LOAD-DATE: October 8, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: CT

Copyright 2011 Independent News and Media Ltd
All Rights Reserved

267 of 492 DOCUMENTS

Congressional Documents and Publications

October 5, 2011

Royce Amendment Condemns Cambodia's Human Trafficking Record; Rep. Ed Royce (R-CA) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTSLENGTH: 336 words

Washington, Oct 5 -

During today's House Foreign Affairs Committee markup reauthorizing the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000, Rep. Ed Royce (R-CA), an active participant in the Tom Lantos Human Rights Commission, successfully offered a bipartisan amendment calling for the Kingdom of Cambodia to be designated as a Tier 3 country for its egregious human trafficking record.

"The government of Cambodia insufficiently addressed their human trafficking problem and rampant corruption has exacerbated this form of modern day slavery," Royce said.

According to the State Department's 2011 Trafficking in Persons report, Cambodia has made no improvements to identify or protect trafficking victims. News sources describe Cambodia as a "magnet" for those who sexually prey on the young. Additionally, Human Rights Watch describes Cambodia as being "plagued not only by widespread abuses committed by officials, but impunity for perpetrators."

Countries placed in Tier 3, the worst category, "do not fully comply with the Trafficking Victims Protection Act's minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so." Tier 3 countries are subject to a U.S. aid cutoff. Cambodia is currently designated as a Tier 2 country.

"The 2011 report cites that Cambodian 'entertainment establishments' may exploit up to 200 women and children on a single night. Cambodian police have been unwilling to pursue certain trafficking investigations because they were thought to involve high-ranking officials," Royce said.

"By cataloging these vile practices, the State Department's report allows us to spotlight human trafficking. But when we don't follow the facts to a Tier 3 designation for countries like Cambodia, we do a disservice to the victims of these gross human rights abuses," Royce said.

Rep. Royce is a senior member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, and is a member of the Subcommittee on Asia and the Pacific.

Read this original document at: <http://royce.house.gov/News/DocumentSingle.aspx?DocumentID=263099>

LOAD-DATE: October 6, 2011LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: ReportJOURNAL-CODE: COSHMA

268 of 492 DOCUMENTS
DUPLICATE

Congressional Documents and Publications

October 5, 2011

Royce Amendment Condemns Cambodia's Human Trafficking Record; House Foreign Affairs Committee News Release

