Countries on the list are subject to possible sanctions for not doing enough to stop the yearly flow of some 800,000 people, 80 percent of them female and more than half of them children, across international borders for the sex trade and other forms of forced and indentured labor.

Among U.S. friends getting a failing grade were Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman and Qatar, which along with Algeria, Equatorial Guinea and Malaysia joined for the first time perennial offenders like Myanmar (Burma), Cuba, Iran, North Korea and Syria in the State Department's annual "Trafficking in Persons Report."

Sixteen states in all four more than in 2006 were given so-called "Tier 3" status in the 236-page survey of global efforts to combat trafficking in people, many of whom are seeking to escape poverty in Eastern Europe, South and Southeast Asia and are sold into the commercial sex trade, manual labor or mistreated as domestics.

Despite the additions, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said "more and more countries are coming to see human trafficking for what it is a modern-day form of slavery that devastates families and communities around the world."

"We hope this report encourages responsible nations across the globe to stand together, to speak with one voice and to say that freedom and security are nonnegotiable demands of human dignity, and to say ... 'No one is fit to be a master and no one deserves to be a slave,'" she told reporters.

Countries with "Tier 3" ranking "do not fully comply with the minimum standards (to fight trafficking) and are not making significant efforts to do so," which makes them eligible for U.S. economic sanctions.

Three countries that had been placed on "Tier 3" in 2006 Belize, Laos and Zimbabwe were promoted to "Tier 2" this year for improving their records, according to the report. "Tier 2" countries are those that do not fully comply with minimum standards but are making significant efforts to do so.

The recognition is rare U.S. praise for Zimbabwe, long singled out by Washington for harsh criticism on its overall human rights record, a point noted by Rice's pointman on the trafficking issue, Mark Lagon.

"Our relationship with the government is in a very critical state on other grounds but the facts are that through our leveraging and through our prodding, Zimbabwe has actually taken some tangible steps," he said.

Still, such lobbying has had far from a universal effect.

The seven newcomers to "Tier 3" were all demoted from "Tier 2 watchlist" status, which now covers 32 countries, including India, Mexico and Russia, that have been cited for poor anti-trafficking records for numerous consecutive years.

"The 'Tier 2 watchlist' is not supposed to become a parking lot for governments lacking the will or interest to stop exploitation and enslavement on their soil," Lagon said, describing India as "the world's largest democracy (with) the world's largest problem."

Most of this year's additions to "Tier 3" are Muslim or predominantly Muslim nations, many of which have the means to enforce foreign workers' rights and anti-trafficking laws.

"It is especially disappointing that so many wealthy countries in the Near East ... are on 'Tier 3'," Lagon said.

Bahrain, the Persian Gulf home to the U.S. Fifth Fleet, was cited for failing to crack down on human traffickers who are bringing in men, women and children for forced labor or commercial sex work, the report says.

"Bahrain made no discernible progress in preventing trafficking this year," it said, noting that laws aimed at protecting foreign workers, largely from South and Southeast Asia, are not enforced and that authorities are not seriously investigating alleged widespread abuse.

Oil-rich Kuwait "made modest progress in preventing trafficking in persons this year," the report said, but added that "Kuwaiti efforts to improve its protection of victims of human trafficking had little effect."

Oman was cited for not applying and enforcing existing laws against human trafficking as well failing to distribute pamphlets aimed at educating foreign workers about their rights, it said.

Qatar, long accused by the United States of ignoring the plight of child camel jockeys, was demoted to "Tier 3" for not enacting legislation to outlaw all forms of human trafficking and for producing only two convictions among numerous cases of alleged abuse of domestic servants, according to the report.

The complete list of "Tier 3" countries in this year's report is: Algeria, Bahrain, Cuba, Equatorial Guinea, Iran, Kuwait, Malaysia, Myanmar, North Korea, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan and Venezuela.

Cuba, Iran, Myanmar, North Korea, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan and Venezuela are regularly accused by Washington of failing to protect human rights and are often cited in State Department reports for their lack of respect for press and religious freedoms.

But Malaysia made its first appearance on "Tier 3" for its failure to protect and identify victims of trafficking, many of them Indonesian domestics.

"The Malaysian government needs to demonstrate stronger political will to tackle Malaysia's significant forced labor and sex trafficking problems," the report said.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

265 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Online

June 12, 2007 Tuesday 8:08 PM GMT

Seven Nations Added to Trafficking List

BYLINE: By MATTHEW LEE, Associated Press Writer

SECTION: WASHINGTON DATELINE

LENGTH: 970 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The Bush administration on Tuesday added seven nations, including several key U.S. allies in the Middle East, to its human trafficking blacklist for failing to halt what it called the scourge of "modern-day slavery."

Countries on the list are subject to sanctions for not doing enough to stop the yearly flow of some 800,000 people, 80 percent of them female and up to half of them children, across international borders for the sex trade and other forms of forced and indentured labor.

Among U.S. friends getting a failing grade were Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman and Qatar, which along with Algeria, Equatorial Guinea and Malaysia joined for the first time perennial offenders like Myanmar (Burma), Cuba, Iran, North Korea and Syria in the State Department's annual "Trafficking in Persons Report."

Sixteen states in all four more than in 2006 were given so-called "Tier 3" status in the 236-page survey of global efforts to combat trafficking in people, many of whom are seeking to escape poverty in Eastern Europe, South and Southeast Asia and are sold into the commercial sex trade, manual labor or mistreated as domestics.

Despite the additions, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said "more and more countries are coming to see human trafficking for what it is a modern-day form of slavery that devastates families and communities around the world."

"We hope this report encourages responsible nations across the globe to stand together, to speak with one voice and to say that freedom and security are nonnegotiable demands of human dignity, and to say ... 'No one is fit to be a master and no one deserves to be a slave,'" she told reporters.

Countries with "Tier 3" ranking "do not fully comply with the minimum standards (to fight trafficking) and are not making significant efforts to do so," which makes them eligible for U.S. economic sanctions.

Three countries that had been placed on "Tier 3" in 2006 Belize, Laos and Zimbabwe were promoted to "Tier 2" this year for improving their records, according to the report. "Tier 2" countries are those that do not fully comply with minimum standards but are making significant efforts to do so.

The recognition is rare U.S. praise for Zimbabwe, long singled out by Washington for harsh criticism on its overall human rights record, a point noted by Rice's pointman on the trafficking issue, Mark Lagon.

"Our relationship with the government is in a very critical state on other grounds but the facts are that through our leveraging and through our prodding, Zimbabwe has actually taken some tangible steps," he said.

Still, such lobbying has had far from a universal effect.

The seven newcomers to "Tier 3" were all demoted from "Tier 2 watchlist" status, which now covers 32 countries, including India, Mexico and Russia, that have been cited for poor anti-trafficking records for numerous consecutive years.

Some in Congress lamented that some nations on the watchlist have not been demoted to "Tier 3."

"What jumps off the pages of this report is that there is a growing tendency a creeping complacency to park offending countries in the watchlist rather than identify them as egregious Tier 3 offenders in need of immediate and massive reforms," said New Jersey Republican Rep. Chris Smith.

But Lagon denied the charge.

"The 'Tier 2 watchlist' is not supposed to become a parking lot for governments lacking the will or interest to stop exploitation and enslavement on their soil," Lagon said, describing India as "the world's largest democracy (with) the world's largest problem."

Most of this year's additions to "Tier 3" are Muslim or predominantly Muslim nations, many of which have the means to enforce foreign workers' rights and anti-trafficking laws.

"It is especially disappointing that so many wealthy countries in the Near East ... are on 'Tier 3'," Lagon said.

Bahrain, the Persian Gulf home to the U.S. Fifth Fleet, was cited for failing to crack down on human traffickers who are bringing in men, women and children for forced labor or commercial sex work, the report says.

"Bahrain made no discernible progress in preventing trafficking this year," it said, noting that laws aimed at protecting foreign workers, largely from South and Southeast Asia, are not enforced and that authorities are not seriously investigating alleged widespread abuse.

Oil-rich Kuwait "made modest progress in preventing trafficking in persons this year," the report said, but added that "Kuwaiti efforts to improve its protection of victims of human trafficking had little effect."

Oman was cited for not applying and enforcing existing laws against human trafficking as well failing to distribute pamphlets aimed at educating foreign workers about their rights, it said.

Qatar, long accused by the United States of ignoring the plight of child camel jockeys, was demoted to "Tier 3" for not enacting legislation to outlaw all forms of human trafficking and for producing only two convictions among numerous cases of alleged abuse of domestic servants, according to the report.

The complete list of "Tier 3" countries in this year's report: Algeria, Bahrain, Cuba, Equatorial Guinea, Iran, Kuwait, Malaysia, Myanmar, North Korea, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan and Venezuela.

Cuba, Iran, Myanmar, North Korea, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan and Venezuela are regularly accused by Washington of failing to protect human rights and are often cited in State Department reports for their lack of respect for press and religious freedoms.

But Malaysia made its first appearance on "Tier 3" for its failure to protect and identify victims of trafficking, many of them Indonesian domestics.

The report noted with approval Vietnam's high-profile arrest, prosecution and conviction last year of British glam rock star Gary Glitter on charges of committing sexual acts with two underage girls.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

266 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Online

June 12, 2007 Tuesday 8:12 PM GMT

7 Nations Added to Trafficking Blacklist

BYLINE: By MATTHEW LEE, Associated Press Writer

SECTION: WASHINGTON DATELINE

LENGTH: 970 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The Bush administration on Tuesday added seven nations, including several key U.S. allies in the Middle East, to its human trafficking blacklist for failing to halt what it called the scourge of "modern-day slavery."

Countries on the list are subject to sanctions for not doing enough to stop the yearly flow of some 800,000 people, 80 percent of them female and up to half of them children, across international borders for the sex trade and other forms of forced and indentured labor.

Among U.S. friends getting a failing grade were Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman and Qatar, which along with Algeria, Equatorial Guinea and Malaysia joined for the first time perennial offenders like Myanmar (Burma), Cuba, Iran, North Korea and Syria in the State Department's annual "Trafficking in Persons Report."

Sixteen states in all four more than in 2006 were given so-called "Tier 3" status in the 236-page survey of global efforts to combat trafficking in people, many of whom are seeking to escape poverty in Eastern Europe, South and Southeast Asia and are sold into the commercial sex trade, manual labor or mistreated as domestics.

Despite the additions, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said "more and more countries are coming to see human trafficking for what it is a modern-day form of slavery that devastates families and communities around the world."

"We hope this report encourages responsible nations across the globe to stand together, to speak with one voice and to say that freedom and security are nonnegotiable demands of human dignity, and to say ... 'No one is fit to be a master and no one deserves to be a slave,'" she told reporters.

Countries with "Tier 3" ranking "do not fully comply with the minimum standards (to fight trafficking) and are not making significant efforts to do so," which makes them eligible for U.S. economic sanctions.

Three countries that had been placed on "Tier 3" in 2006 Belize, Laos and Zimbabwe were promoted to "Tier 2" this year for improving their records, according to the report. "Tier 2" countries are those that do not fully comply with minimum standards but are making significant efforts to do so.

The recognition is rare U.S. praise for Zimbabwe, long singled out by Washington for harsh criticism on its overall human rights record, a point noted by Rice's pointman on the trafficking issue, Mark Lagon.

"Our relationship with the government is in a very critical state on other grounds but the facts are that through our leveraging and through our prodding, Zimbabwe has actually taken some tangible steps," he said.

Still, such lobbying has had far from a universal effect.

The seven newcomers to "Tier 3" were all demoted from "Tier 2 watchlist" status, which now covers 32 countries, including India, Mexico and Russia, that have been cited for poor anti-trafficking records for numerous consecutive years.

Some in Congress lamented that some nations on the watchlist have not been demoted to "Tier 3."

"What jumps off the pages of this report is that there is a growing tendency a creeping complacency to park offending countries in the watchlist rather than identify them as egregious Tier 3 offenders in need of immediate and massive reforms," said New Jersey Republican Rep. Chris Smith.

But Lagon denied the charge.

"The 'Tier 2 watchlist' is not supposed to become a parking lot for governments lacking the will or interest to stop exploitation and enslavement on their soil," Lagon said, describing India as "the world's largest democracy (with) the world's largest problem."

Most of this year's additions to "Tier 3" are Muslim or predominantly Muslim nations, many of which have the means to enforce foreign workers' rights and anti-trafficking laws.

"It is especially disappointing that so many wealthy countries in the Near East ... are on 'Tier 3'," Lagon said.

Bahrain, the Persian Gulf home to the U.S. Fifth Fleet, was cited for failing to crack down on human traffickers who are bringing in men, women and children for forced labor or commercial sex work, the report says.

"Bahrain made no discernible progress in preventing trafficking this year," it said, noting that laws aimed at protecting foreign workers, largely from South and Southeast Asia, are not enforced and that authorities are not seriously investigating alleged widespread abuse.

Oil-rich Kuwait "made modest progress in preventing trafficking in persons this year," the report said, but added that "Kuwaiti efforts to improve its protection of victims of human trafficking had little effect."

Oman was cited for not applying and enforcing existing laws against human trafficking as well failing to distribute pamphlets aimed at educating foreign workers about their rights, it said.

Qatar, long accused by the United States of ignoring the plight of child camel jockeys, was demoted to "Tier 3" for not enacting legislation to outlaw all forms of human trafficking and for producing only two convictions among numerous cases of alleged abuse of domestic servants, according to the report.

The complete list of "Tier 3" countries in this year's report: Algeria, Bahrain, Cuba, Equatorial Guinea, Iran, Kuwait, Malaysia, Myanmar, North Korea, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan and Venezuela.

Cuba, Iran, Myanmar, North Korea, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan and Venezuela are regularly accused by Washington of failing to protect human rights and are often cited in State Department reports for their lack of respect for press and religious freedoms.

But Malaysia made its first appearance on "Tier 3" for its failure to protect and identify victims of trafficking, many of them Indonesian domestics.

The report noted with approval Vietnam's high-profile arrest, prosecution and conviction last year of British glam rock star Gary Glitter on charges of committing sexual acts with two underage girls.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

267 of 445 DOCUMENTS

CQ Transcriptions

"All materials herein are protected by United States copyright law and may not be reproduced, distributed, transmitted, displayed, published or broadcast without the prior written permission of CQ Transcriptions. You may not alter or remove any trademark, copyright or other notice from copies of the content."

June 12, 2007 Tuesday

AMBASSADOR MARK P. LAGON HOLDS A STATE DEPARTMENT NEWS BRIEFING ON THE ANNUAL TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT

LENGTH: 5031 wordsSPEAKER:

AMBASSADOR MARK P. LAGON

LOCATION: WASHINGTON, D.C.

AMBASSADOR LAGON HOLDS A STATE DEPARTMENT NEWS BRIEFING ON THE ANNUAL TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT, AS RELEASED BY THE STATE DEPARTMENT

JUNE 12, 2007

SPEAKER: AMBASSADOR MARK P. LAGON, SECRETARY RICE'S SENIOR ADVISER ON TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS

LAGON: It's a pleasure to be here. Thank you, Secretary Rice, and good morning. I'd like to offer an overview of what's in the report and then after a few minutes, welcome your questions. It's an honor to succeed Ambassador John Miller as director of an extraordinary office dedicated to ending a deeply dehumanizing form of exploitation. Human trafficking or trafficking in persons is modern-day slavery.

At the heart of U.S. efforts to end human trafficking is a commitment to human dignity. Every day, all over the world, people are coerced into bonded labor, bought and sold in prostitution, exploited in domestic servitude, enslaved in agricultural work and in factories, and captured to serve unlawfully as child soldiers. Estimates of the number vary widely. According to U.S. Government estimates, approximately 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders each year and about 80 percent of them are female. Up to half are minors.

And these figures do not include millions who are trafficked into labor and sexual slavery within national borders. Stomach-wrenching individual stories, however, tell more than the aggregate numbers and these are the people who motivate everyone active in the movement to abolish human trafficking.

Let me tell you about one victim. At age 22, Ko Maung left Burma with his new bride to find work in a neighboring country. He took a job on a fishing boat for two years because he was promised good money, $70 per month. But that boat stayed at sea for three years and the workers were fed only fish and rice. Not getting enough vitamins, they began to starve. They were denied medical care or passage home. The good job turned out to be a floating death camp. One by one, the men began to perish, including Ko Maung. His body was dumped overboard. So were the exhausted, malnourished bodies of 29 other modern-day slaves.

60 fishermen who survived weren't paid at all. Police refused to prosecute the employer since there are no bodies to prove a crime. In a climate of official indifference with forced labor violations typically not criminalized, desperate, migrant laborers are especially vulnerable to forced fraud and coercion, the fundamental markers of human trafficking. This seventh annual Trafficking In Persons report is dedicated to Ko Maung and to his grieving family.

The structure of the report and the purpose are focused largely on drawing the world's attention on the existence of modern-day slavery and the desperate need to eliminate it in the same way that the world ended the African slave trade more than a century ago. Human trafficking plagues every country in one way or another, including the United States. The report covers 164 countries and territories, comprising some 85 percent of the world. It ranks 151 countries and territories where there have been some 100 cases of human trafficking that were documented. It spells out what countries are doing on prosecution, prevention and protection and what more can be done together between the United States and other countries on all three fronts.

The U.S. Government is committed to taking action in cooperation with other nations. The process of diplomatic engagement bilaterally to mitigate the problems documented in the report goes on throughout the year, not just in this season that I'm talking to you now. Our sources of information for this report include U.S. Embassies, NGOs worldwide, brave activists fighting human trafficking, foreign law enforcement officers and staff visits. Extensive analysis based on criteria laid out by Congress in the law goes into the assignment of countries into Tier 1, Tier 2, Tier 2 Watch List and Tier 3.

A country falls into Tier 3 if its government is not making a significant effort to combat human trafficking. A Tier 3 country can be sanctioned if it doesn't take seriously antislavery action in the next 90 days. Sadly, this year the list of countries on Tier 3 has grown to -- due to a lack of effort by these governments to combat this serious transnational crime. There are a total of 16 countries on Tier 3, seven of which dropped down to Tier 3 this year: Algeria, Bahrain, Equatorial Guinea, Kuwait, Malaysia, Oman and Qatar.

It's especially disappointing that so many wealthy countries in the Near East that aren't lacking adequate resources to make significant progress are on Tier 3. For instance, Saudi Arabia is on Tier 3 for the third year. These are countries in that region that rely extensively on foreign migrant laborers. Practices such as sponsorship laws create conditions that make guest workers especially vulnerable to trafficking in the region.

Sponsorship laws give employers extensive personal authority over workers, allowing them to control movement and legal status. These -- there are cases of workers escaping abuse in private homes or work sites. They flee to local police. But if their sponsor denies them an exit permit to leave the country, the exploited workers are effectively held hostage in a shelter or a police detention center, sometimes for years. The power given to sponsors over foreign workers should be limited and counterbalanced with rights for workers to seek legal redress and governments in destination countries should be more active in protecting workers.

Now 32 countries are on the Tier 2 Watch List, the same number as last year. The Tier 2 Watch List should be a warning. Unfortunately, too many major countries on the Tier 2 Watch List have ignored this warning year after year. India, Mexico, and Russia are on the Tier 2 Watch List for the fourth consecutive year. Armenia, China, and South Africa are on Tier 2 Watch List for a third consecutive year. For all Tier 3 and Tier 2 Watch List countries, the United States outlines a short-term action plan through which to spur bilateral commitment and specific steps to improve the situation. Tier 2 Watch List is not supposed to become a parking lot for governments lacking the will or interest to stop exploitation and enslavement on their soil. We stand ready to cooperate with these nations and support any efforts they make to end this travesty within their borders.

On a positive note, 10 governments ranked on Tier 2 Watch List last September when the President made final determinations on tier status moved up to Tier 2 on this report: Bolivia, Brazil, Indonesia, Israel, Taiwan, Peru, Jamaica, they're among these moving up to Tier 2 based on significant new efforts. Belize moved up from Tier 3 to Tier 2 in one year. The Government of Brazil renewed its commitment to confronting slave labor in the Amazon with a number of new measures. The Government of Indonesia enacted a sweeping counter-trafficking law providing protection for all victims including migrant laborers who are fraudulently recruited from overseas work, but fall into trafficking as a trap.

Last week, a raid in Taiwan, a real success story, demonstrated a welcome new attitude. Working closely with U.S. law enforcement, Taiwan broke up a cross-border trafficking ring, arresting 12 people suspected of trafficking women to the United States and other countries where they were exploited in prostitution and pornography. Countries that have established credentials in good governments and rule of law are more likely to move quickly in protecting victims of trafficking and handing down justice to exploiters.

For example, while China resisted joining the international community in upholding universal anti-trafficking standards, given a lack of rule of law, Taiwan's vibrant civil society and democratic character have helped it adopt significant reforms over the past year. On Tier 1, three countries appear for the first time this year: Georgia, Hungary, and Slovenia. Georgia's performance is particularly notable, considering it's the only Tier 1 country in a region struggling to strengthen rule of law. Georgia has shown an admirable political commitment to confronting human trafficking. Its improvement includes efforts to prevent girls and women from being lured into the global sex trade, where exploiters turn women and girls into mere commodities with their bodies for sale.

Young girls and unsuspecting women are often lured or kidnapped or sold into an omnivorous sex industry. The length between prostitution and sex trafficking is indisputable. That's why we must move with more creativity and commitment to deal with the demand for victims. Prostitution is not a victimless crime. It ruins lives from Mexico to Malta, from Tel Aviv to Tokyo, from Albany, New York to Abuja, Nigeria. Sexual servitude is particularly grotesque in human trafficking. The report is interspersed with stories of survivors who have been aided by U.S. programs that demonstrate our commitment to rescue and rehabilitate innocent victims.

Let me tell you briefly about some trends that we see highlighted in the 2007 report. Use of debt, first of all, as a tool of coercion and secondly, stalled progress in strengthening rule of law. First, in both labor and sexual exploitation, illegal or illegitimate debt is increasingly used to keep people in servitude. This debt is used by traffickers as an instrument of coercion. How does this work? People are enticed into fraudulent offers of work abroad that require a steep payment up front for the services of a labor agency arranging the job or a payment that goes straight to the future employer.

To pay the fee, workers often borrow money from relatives and friends or they mortgage property. Sometimes, additional debt is added at the place of employment: inflated fees for supposed costs of room and board or equipment. Sometimes, new, unexpected transportation fees are added. The debt becomes exorbitant on purpose, yet workers are trapped into trying to pay it off for years. This debt is as effective as overt force in keeping them in bondage, yet it's invisible and often overlooked by criminal investigators. In trafficking for prostitution, we're increasingly aware of debt being used to coerce and control victims. Daily fees charged by brothel owners for rent, food, drugs, even condoms create an inescapable financial burden that amounts to debt bondage, a form of human trafficking.

A second trend, second theme; the 2007 TIP report reflects our overall sense that progress on the critical front of rule of law appears to have stalled. Democracy and rule of law are crucial to fighting human trafficking. And fighting trafficking conversely is crucial to the future of democracy worldwide, since trafficking is one of the most brutal ways to silence women, half of humankind worldwide. This lack of progress on rule of law can be traced to official corruption and complicity on the one hand and indifference on the other. These passive and active factors perpetuate abuse despite increased public awareness and despite extraordinary bravery on the part of activists and NGOs around the world.

It hurts my heart to share with you this very recent example that typifies the confluence of officials' complicity in trafficking and indifference in the face of heroism to end modern-day slavery. One of the heroes highlighted in this year's report, Kailash Satyarthi of the Indian NGO Bachpan Bachao Andolan or BBA, prompted the rescue of 92 Bengali children enslaved in goldsmith and jewelry factories in India's capital city of New Delhi. The children were forced to eat, sleep, and labor in workshops, 10 to a room. Dangerous chemicals were used for making gold ornaments in the same rooms that they were kept 24 hours a day. Most of the children were under the age of 14. According to the children, many were physically and sexually abused.

Just days after this rescue which didn't result in any arrests in India, the factory owners, managers, and their thugs showed up at BBA's shelter with iron rods, sticks, and bricks. They tried to recapture the children. Shelter staff were injured. When police finally responded, no one was arrested. The connections and clout of these traffickers were enough, apparently, to thwart justice. India has the world's largest labor trafficking problem with hundreds of thousands of sex trafficking victims and millions of bonded laborers including forced child laborers. In India, there is no national anti-trafficking effort, no recognition of bonded labor on an official level, and poor efforts against sex trafficking. The world's largest democracy has the world's largest problem of human trafficking.

The goal of this report is not to punish. It's to stimulate government action in concert with the United States to end modern-day slavery and to celebrate the heroism of those who are working to help spare victims from pain. The report identifies anti-trafficking heroes from around the world and commendable practices. Individuals and local initiatives can make a difference in leading path-breaking efforts to protect victims, increase global awareness, and protect and prosecute criminals. On pages 38-41 of the report, you see some of these inspirational examples, and I'd urge you to read that part of the report carefully.

The United States is deeply committed to fulfilling its responsibilities and to fight against trafficking in persons within our own borders as well. We have a problem at home which we're confronting forcefully, and we're working to be a partner to those abroad, including through substantial and frankly compassionate funding. In fiscal year 2006, we contributed more than $74 million abroad, funding 154 international projects in 70 countries. Since fiscal year 2001, the United States Government has funded more than $448 million to fight human trafficking.

This report is not just an assessment and a judgment about nations, but a blueprint about the sorts of things the United States can help other countries do programmatically. Modern slavery has met with a powerful movement, seeking its abolition in the 21st century, assuming the mantles of William Wilberforce and Josephine Butler.

I want to thank you for your support. Thank you for joining us here; taking the time. By broadcasting this tragic but true story of trafficking in persons, you help prevent a widespread crime against human dignity and help give victims hope for escape. I welcome your questions and I'd ask you when you ask a question, to identify yourself and your media organization.

QUESTION: Anne Gearan from the Associated Press. You mentioned repeat offenders, Saudi Arabia and India, also strategic U.S. allies. Do you think those countries regard their positions with the United States as inviolable, and thus they don't have to take you seriously?

LAGON: They shouldn't. We make clear in our high-level dialogues with them that this isn't a tertiary or secondary issue. I was just speaking with the Secretary this morning about how we talked to some of these important partners of ours on some fronts and make sure that we engage in them in diplomacy so that there isn't just a burst of activity after this report comes out on my part, but in fact a regular dialogue through the year with those countries.

Of course, in the case of some that you mention, the problem of trafficking in persons is part of a larger problem of rule of law and a pattern of certain ethnic groups and foreign workers being seen as less than human. This is the crux of the human trafficking problem. When someone -- a woman, a child, someone from another ethnic group or cast -- is seen as not worthy of concern -- they're only a foreign worker, they're only a woman -- that's a horrifying situation. And as part of a larger effort with these countries, we're trying to affect change.

Elise.

QUESTION: Elise Labott with CNN. Just to follow-up on the case of India that's been on the Tier 2 Watch List for four years, could you talk about the decision not to put India on the list this year? It's a quite extensive description of the problem, and you yourself just detailed horrible conditions for up to 65 million bonded laborers in India.

LAGON: Like many countries that are on the Tier 2 Watch List, there is a very severe problem with human trafficking in India. The more time we spend on this report in modesty, the more we learn about problems of labor trafficking, of bonded labor. And in this report we see reflected more and more detail about an endemic problem in India. We need to engage in a very serious dialogue with India, with them having the sense that they will be reassessed about their tier level and how their record is changing, like all Tier 2 Watch List countries. That includes an offer of partnership because two serious democracies who have a developing alliance. The relationship, the level of communication between our two governments is such that it can stand some serious frank talk about a problem like bonded labor or sex trafficking. And we're going to lay out working with them, a kind of action plan for steps forward on this before the reassessment.

QUESTION: If I can just follow up.

LAGON: Sure.

QUESTION: Haven't you already done that in the case of India? I mean, haven't you already had an action plan for them and --

LAGON: We have. And what's required is that in the context of our overall diplomacy with them, talking about all sorts of serious issues, great power of politics, counterterrorism, civilian nuclear cooperation and so on, that this has to have high level emphasis as well as a serious problem, but in modesty. You know, the United States is not only in a position to point fingers. We need to say we had our legacy of slavery, we had our legacy of segregation, we had our legacy of discrimination. Serious democracies have evolved, but we need to ramp up that effort. With a serious sense on the part of the Indian Government that, you know, reassessment is a distinct possibility.

QUESTION: It's not something that was a political determination.

LAGON: No. Look, there are many different variables that are taken into account in everything we do at the State Department. I would be perpetuating a fraud to say that we don't look at multiple factors in our relationship with countries any time we take a step on a particular issue like human trafficking. But look at the report -- Zimbabwe, it has a situation on political opposition being repressed and our relationship with the government in a very critical state on other grounds. But the facts are that through our leveraging and through our prodding Zimbabwe has taken some tangible steps and it's actually moved up from Tier 3 to Tier 2. So there are, you know, efforts, very strong efforts to make an objective assessment based on criteria laid out in the law and I played a small part in the passage of the law in the year 2000 and so I know a little bit about those criteria.

QUESTION: Arshad Mohammed with Reuters. You've pointed out that a number of the new countries in Tier 3 are relatively wealthy near eastern countries, significant oil exporters that do not lack for resources. There are also a number of them U.S. allies -- Kuwait, Oman, Bahrain, Qatar, Algeria. What, to your mind, explains the fact that these countries which were not previously in this lowest category of not even meeting the minimal standards should have slid down this year? And secondly, on Saudi Arabia, it is clearly not very sensitive to the kinds of sanctions that could be imposed in terms of the withholding of certain U.S. assistance or withholding of U.S. support in the international financial institutions. And given that it's been in the lowest category for three years in a row, it's not been too sensitive to the shame factor of being exposed through the report.

Do you wish you had -- and I know you've only been at this a little while, but do you wish you had stronger statutory tools to try to influence behavior, one; and two, can you think of anything else you can do to try to get countries that have been serially in the lowest category to do more?

LAGON: That's a great question. I'd say on balance that the tools provided by the Trafficking and Victims Protection Act and our friends on Capitol Hill are quite good. This is a unique example of the human rights reports that we have in different areas generally on countries, the ones on religious freedom and so on, because the tier ranking is much more refined. It's associated with producing action plans for the two lowest rungs for steps that need to be taken, potential sanctions, grace periods for nations to take steps so that they might be either boosted up the scale of tiers or find themselves sliding down. So on balance, it's actually one of the more refined tools that's been given to us in terms of sanctions and reports.

In fact, now for the third time the legislation is going to be reauthorized this year, and I think Capitol Hill will think about refinements, you know, of such things, including, you know, how long states can stay on the Tier Two Watch List among other things.

As far as the region, what we found as a general pattern in this report is an endemic problem of the way foreign workers are treated in the Persian Gulf, in Middle Eastern states. There is a recruitment pattern of people, unsuspecting people who are offered jobs as secretaries, as maids; they end up being sex slaves or put into domestic servitude in an involuntary way. That's seen throughout the region and it seems to be an increasingly acute problem.

Sir.

QUESTION: Yes. Charlie Wolfson from CBS. You mentioned the figure of 800,000 worldwide as an estimate. Do you have an estimate of the number of people trafficked across the U.S. border?

LAGON: Well, an estimate that we work off is approximately 14,500 to 17,500 per year. I'll say something about statistics. We wish we had better statistics. It would be helpful to know how much of a dent in the problem we're making. But I do think that with the resources that we have to fight the traffickers, to help the victims, we want to make sure that we don't spend a great deal of money on the statistical study when some of those resources could be used to build a victims shelter or to train law enforcement officers in other countries or figure out how to prevent officials in other countries from deciding to get their palms greased in corruption and allow trafficking to occur.

QUESTION: Hi. I'm Libby Leist from NBC. I wanted to ask about Iraq and can you talk a little bit about why it's designated a special case? And also how concerned are you about forced labor inside that country, including at facilities run by the U.S. or projects being built by the United States?

LAGON: A serious question and one that we're very seized with. I mean, there are a number of cases in the report that are designated as special cases. They tend to be either a case in which the requisite number of cases of trafficking, 100 cases, haven't been easy to document. And so the government in question isn't rated or it's a case of a government that is facing enormous turbulence, like Liberia last year, Haiti at times. And you know, let's speak the truth about Iraq, there is a very turbulent situation with strife among ethnic groups and caused by terrorists.

While we're pleased that democratic elections have taken place and that rule of law is being slowly rooted into place, you know, it's the conclusion of the U.S. Government that it's -- you know, it should be a special case in terms of rating it. We however are very serious about talking about the problem of trafficking in Iraq.

In a situation in which there is a conflict, open-armed conflict, this is a place where people can be vulnerable. And so when you talk about the actual possibility of trafficking in persons, I'd like to say that, you know, my office has a role I think vested in it by Congress of being a kind of conscience in the U.S. Government about trafficking in persons so that we don't look aside when we have strategic purposes and not look at trafficking in persons.

There were media reports in October of 2005 about questionable labor practices by defense subcontractors. There appeared to be cases of foreign workers who had their passports withheld and were not getting the kind of pay that they'd been promised quickly in February of 2006. And the Defense Department did a study on the ground -- inspector general study -- and shortly thereafter in May 2006 rules were put in place so that only licensed recruiting companies could be used by subcontractors, passports couldn't be taken away and that all workers would be given a signed contract in their own native language and in English.

More recently, there have been allegations about a Kuwaiti company involved in the construction site of the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad. Our office received a number of credible reports in late 2006 and we insisted on the State Department launching through its Office of the Inspector General an examination of this. And we didn't -- rightly didn't play a part in the writing of that report since the Inspector General is independent. With the help of Defense Department investigators, they've looked into indicators of trafficking, we will continue at the office I lead to ask questions about that.

QUESTION: Is that OIG report --

LAGON: I'm sorry.

QUESTION: Is that OIG report public?

LAGON: It is. Yeah, it's on the Web site.

Sir.

QUESTION: Lambros Papantoniou, Greek correspondent. Ambassador Lagon, what Greece and Cyprus should be done ready to transfer to Watch List number 1 like the United Kingdom, Poland, Czech Republic, Georgia, Canada, Australia and some other countries of your choice?

LAGON: I'm sorry. What?

QUESTION: What Greece and Cyprus should be done to transfer from the list, number two to one?

LAGON: What needs to be done?

QUESTION: Mm-hmm.

LAGON: The -- in the cases of Greece and Cyprus, they're clearly governments that have substantial rule of law and substantial resources, unlike developing countries. And we intend to continue working with both of them on how to move forward.

As far as Greece goes, its anti-trafficking laws are adequate, but it's -- in particular, its identification of victims of trafficking are rather weak. Shelters are underused. So what we need to do is work on going further and helping Greece actually hold traffickers to account and convict them, and to more systematically identify victims because what we found here at home is that having a victim-centered approach -- so that people are not treated like illegal aliens or criminals, but in fact victims with rights -- as essential.

As far as Cyprus goes, again, there's a pretty strong case that there's capacity on the part of the Government of Cyprus. But there is a big problem of Cyprus being a destination for sex trafficking of Eastern European women. There is a tilt in the anti-trafficking law towards -- focused on sex trafficking but not on death bondage. One thing in the sex trafficking area that would be very helpful is if Cyprus abolished the so-called artiste visa where people come, lured into being dancers -- exotic dancers and you know what that ends up being.

QUESTION: In which category you are placing the United States of America since you told us earlier that is included in this process?

LAGON: The United States of America is not perfect, and we haven't assigned it a tier rating. But unlike some other human rights reports, it's actually addressed here. You'll find a summary of the U.S. record along the same lines of what it's doing on protecting victims, preventing trafficking through public awareness and prosecution. Also, annually, the Department of Justice puts out a report on everything that's being done by the United States Government on trafficking in persons. And we in our office try and make sure that the world sees that report.

It is very important that the United States be seen as a partner and that we have a problem at home. We are not just standing with our arms folded, judging others, because this is a transnational problem. There's serious trafficking in persons into the United States from East Asia, from Latin America, from Europe, and there's trafficking within the United States. And we're ready to be judged because we offer our hand as a partner to try and solve this problem of modern-day slavery.

MODERATOR: OK, this will be the last question.

LAGON: OK.

QUESTION: Kirit Radia with ABC News. I had a question about Syria, to follow up on the Iraq question that Libby asked. Your report talks about sexual exploitation of Iraqis in Syria. How many of those does your office believe are refugees?

LAGON: I don't know off the top of my head what the number is. I could get back to you on that. We take seriously the problem of Iraqi refugees and the vulnerability that they have. That's one of the reasons why Under Secretary Dobriansky has led an effort and -- Department of State to deal with Iraqi refugees in concert with the UN High Commissioner for Refugees. But it is indeed possible that those who have fled from Iraq are vulnerable, and it's the responsibility of not just the United States but the international community to deal with that in Syria. The problem in Syria though is that you have some of these endemic issues of how foreign workers are treated and mistreated, plus a particularly closed and insensitive government.

After this session, let me say that Mark Taylor, who heads the section of our office that prepares this report, and Eleanor Gaetan, who is our Senior Coordinator for Public Affairs, will be on hand to provide background on the report; the level of detail if you want to go into it further afterward. And I'd welcome hearing from you over the next few days and weeks because I'm here to help promote public awareness, not just engage in diplomacy.

Thank you for taking the time with me.

END

LOAD-DATE: June 12, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

TYPE: NEWS BRIEFING

NOTES:

[????] - Indicates Speaker Unknown

[--] - Indicates could not make out what was being said.[off mike] - Indicates could not make out what was being said.

268 of 445 DOCUMENTS

June 12, 2007 Tuesday 2:21 AM EST

India escapes U.S. list of worst human traffickers

SECTION: U.S.

LENGTH: 698 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

India, which advocacy groups say may have as many as 65 million forced laborers, was spared the worst ranking on the State Department's new list of nations where humans are bought and sold.

Countries not doing enough to combat human trafficking could face sanctions if they don't take steps to improve.

The annual Trafficking in Persons report, released Tuesday, says that as many as 800,000 people -- largely women and children -- are trafficked across borders each year. Many are forced into prostitution, sweatshops, domestic labor, farming and child armies.

U.S. officials told CNN the question of India's ranking caused a heated debate between Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Deputy Secretary of State John Negroponte.

Negroponte wanted India listed as a Tier 3 country, or worst offender. Rice overruled him out of concern about alienating the Indian government. India is on the Tier 2 watch list.

Rice agreed to undertake a special evaluation of India in six months, and then take action if India does not make improvements.

Mark Lagon, ambassador at large for the State Department's Trafficking in Persons office, said Tuesday that "many different variables" played into the decision.

"I would be perpetuating a fraud to say that we don't look at multiple factors in our relationship with countries any time we take a step on a particular issue like human trafficking," he said.

Worst offenders could face penalties

The United States added Kuwait, Malaysia, Qatar and Bahrain to Tier 3 as countries that are destinations for trafficking victims who are exposed to sexual exploitation and forced labor.

Saudi Arabia, a nation considered friendly toward the United States, also is a Tier 3 country.

The State Department also lists Burma, Cuba, Equatorial Guinea, Iran, North Korea, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan and Venezuela as Tier 3 countries, defined as those "whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards" set by American law and "are not making significant efforts to do so."

These countries have 90 days to take additional steps to combat trafficking or face penalties. Penalties could take the form of sanctions, including withholding of non-humanitarian and non-trade-related U.S. assistance and U.S. opposition to assistance through international financial institutions.

President Bush can waive sanctions if he deems it in the United States' interest.

The Bush administration has increased attention to the trafficking problem in recent years as a part of its focus on promoting democracy and human rights as the cornerstone of Bush's foreign policy agenda, specifically in the Middle East.

The United States, however, is not immune to the problem. The State Department estimates 14,500 to 17,500 people are trafficked into the United States each year.

Trafficking victims rescued in the United States are eligible for a special visa and help getting their passports back from their traffickers.

Other countries on the watch list

The United States put several countries on notice that they risk being put on the Tier 3 list if they fail to take adequate steps to combat human trafficking. China, the Dominican Republic, Egypt, Mexico, the Philippines and Russia were among 32 on a Tier 2 watch list, and under U.S. law will receive special scrutiny and be subject to an interim assessment before next year's report.

India was put on the watch list for the fourth year in a row "for its failure to show increasing efforts to tackle India's large and multidimensional problem," according to the report.

The report found while the Indian government was making significant efforts to combat trafficking, it "did not recognize the country's huge population of bonded laborers," which advocacy groups estimate to range from 20 million to 65 million.

The report also found efforts by Indian law enforcement agencies to punish traffickers "uneven and largely inadequate."

Rahul Chhabra, spokesman for the Indian Embassy in Washington, told CNN that the Indian government is reviewing the report.

The U.S. Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 mandated the State Department report as a way of combating human trafficking around the world and punishing those responsible.

LOAD-DATE: June 14, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

269 of 445 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 11, 2007 Monday

Taiwan minister praises police crackdown on human trafficking

LENGTH: 323 words

Text of report in English by Taiwanese Central News Agency website

[By Deborah Kuo]

Taipei, June 11 (CNA) - Anti-human trafficking police have done commendable jobs over the past few months in cracking down on human smuggling rings, Minister of the Interior Lee Yi-yang said Monday.

Following a China Times daily report earlier that day that Taiwan has been on a global human trafficking blacklist since the beginning of this year, Lee said law enforcement agencies, including the National Police Administration, have cracked down on 80 human trafficking cases involving 626 "snakeheads" or smugglers, ring operators and illegal brokers in the first five months of this year.

The figure represents a 16-fold increase over the figure posted for the same period of 2006, Lee said, describing the China Times report as "groundless." In a written statement, Lee said the Ministry of the Interior (MOI) has maintained coordination operations with local governments of the 24 cities and counties around the country with regard to anti-human trafficking efforts.

So far, 11 victims from outside Taiwan have been given temporary accommodation in shelters operated by private organizations with the assistance of local governments, Lee said.

Meanwhile, he added, a total of 1,585 foreign workers who have fallen victim to illegal labour brokers have been put up at 13 foreign laborers' halfway homes around the country.

Lee said the MOI has been overseeing the implementation of 52 measures to prevent human trafficking, track down traffickers and protect victims since Nov. 8, 2006, when the administration announced a supra-ministerial anti-human trafficking plan.

He added that in its 2007 global human trafficking report released in January, the US State Department also confirmed that the Taiwan authorities have made some progress in efforts to crack down on human trafficking.

Source: Central News Agency website, Taipei, in English 1224 gmt 11 Jun 07

LOAD-DATE: June 11, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

270 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

June 11, 2007 Monday 8:17 PM TSTPOLICE EFFICIENT IN CRACKING DOWN ON HUMAN TRAFFICKING:
MOI*BYLINE: Deborah KuoLENGTH: 293 wordsDATELINE: Taipei, June 11

Anti-human trafficking police have done commendable jobs over the past few months in cracking down on human smuggling rings, Minister of the Interior Lee Yi-yang said Monday.

Following a China Times daily report earlier that day that Taiwan has been on a global human trafficking blacklist since the beginning of this year, Lee said law enforcement agencies, including the National Police Administration, have cracked down on 80 human trafficking cases involving 626 "snakeheads" or smugglers, ring operators and illegal brokers in the first five months of this year.

The figure represents a 16-fold increase over the figure posted for the same period of 2006, Lee said, describing the China Times report as "groundless."

In a written statement, Lee said the Ministry of the Interior (MOI) has maintained coordination operations with local governments of the 24 cities and counties around the country with regard to anti-human trafficking efforts.

So far, 11 victims from outside Taiwan have been given temporary accommodation in shelters operated by private organizations with the assistance of local governments, Lee said.

Meanwhile, he added, a total of 1,585 foreign workers who have fallen victim to illegal labor brokers have been put up at 13 foreign laborers' halfway homes around the country.

Lee said the MOI has been overseeing the implementation of 52 measures to prevent human trafficking, track down traffickers and protect victims since Nov. 8, 2006, when the administration announced a supra-ministerial anti-human trafficking plan.

He added that in its 2007 global human trafficking report released in January, the U.S. State Department also confirmed that the Taiwan authorities have made some progress in efforts to crack down on human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: June 11, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

271 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Times (London)

May 19, 2007, Saturday

Gangbusters identify 1,600 crime bosses

BYLINE: Stewart Tandler Crime Correspondent

SECTION: HOME NEWS; Pg. 8

LENGTH: 629 words

* £ 5.3bn laundered yearly, says report

* Agency fails on recovery targets

Britain's gangbusters have identified a top tier of 1,600 underworld bosses at the core of a multibillion-pound black economy fuelled by drugs, human trafficking and fraud.

Senior officers in the new Serious Organised Crime Agency say that the majority are Britons and many still operate in Britain rather than working from bases abroad. They include members of the Adams family in London and Turkish drug clans.

As Soca issued its first annual report yesterday, investigators said that 160 crime bosses were already at the centre of operations, that arrests had been made and more investigations would begin. The report shows that the bosses head an underworld in which contract killings and kidnaps to settle debts are regular occurrences. Soca officers and police prevented 35 murders last year and worked on 335 abductions.

The crime bosses are getting rich. According to the report, the Home Office estimates that more than £ 5.3 billion a year is being laundered from crime and that £ 3.3 billion of the total is being smuggled out of the country.

Soca is currently working on Operation Snowblade with investigators in the United Arab Emirates, Italy, Spain, Australia and the United States to attack a laundering network moving millions in drugs money. There have already been 40 arrests, including 22 in Britain, and there are 15 investigations under way.

Investigators have also seized 151 guns and one operation with Dutch police yielded rocket-propelled grenades and automatic rifles in the Netherlands.

Sir Stephen Lander, the former Director-General of MI5 and now the chairman of Soca, said that intelligence analysts had begun with 80,000 crime-boss files passed on by units merged into the agency. They found a great deal of duplication and suspects who were dead or already in prison. The number was whittled down to 29,000 and then sifted.

Sir Stephen said that the 1,600 were a starting point and not likely to be the final total. They include significant figures who have worked from the shadows in the past and have never been identified as main players.

Bill Hughes, the director-general of Soca, said that many of the kidnappings were "bad on bad", where criminals had tried to settle bad debts by kidnapping the debtor and demanding the cash from friends or family.

Last year there were 395 cases, compared with 334 in 2005 and just 23 in 1996. The numbers rose slowly in the 1990s and have escalated since 2000.

The agency was formed after Tony Blair grew increasingly concerned at the rise of the drug trade and the inability of the police to tackle it.

Soca officers said yesterday that the agency's operations last year had led to the seizure of 73 tonnes of cocaine, worth £ 3 billion, bound for Britain and the rest of Europe. The drugs equal a fifth of the European market and many of the seizures were made by the Royal Navy.

Soca, which has a budget of £ 400 million and 4,400 staff, has been criticised for being secretive, for unhappiness among staff and having few targets. The report shows that Soca failed to reach any of five targets on asset recovery, the only numerical targets it is set, but the report also said that the cases had been inherited from the National Crime Squad.

Defending the agency, Sir Stephen said that it incorporated four national units and its performance was based not on ordinary targets but a drive towards harm-reduction. He said that the agency did not want to set itself in competition with other units, and that the agency was involved in a marathon, not a sprint.

Mr Hughes said that the creation of the agency had been complicated, but that the first annual staff turnover of 3.9 per cent was good for the public service, and that morale was high.

LOAD-DATE: May 19, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Times Newspapers Limited
All Rights Reserved

272 of 445 DOCUMENTS

New Straits Times (Malaysia)

May 10, 2007 Thursday

Human trafficking bill to exclude whipping

BYLINE: V. Vasudevan; Anis Ibrahim

SECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 16

LENGTH: 405 words

PROPOSALS that those involved in the trafficking of women and children should be whipped will not be written into the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Bill.

Minister in the Prime Minister's Department Datuk Seri Nazri Abdul Aziz said whipping was inconsistent with the United Nations protocol on human trafficking.

"The Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, which supplements the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organised Crime (Untoc), does not recognise whipping as a penalty against traffickers," he said.

"Whipping is also inconsistent with the current worldwide trend against corporal punishment."

Earlier, MPs including Tan Ah Eng (BN-Gelang Patah) and Datuk Mohd Said Yusof (BN-Jasin) had recommended that whipping be included as a punishment for human traffickers on the ground that a jail term and a fine were not deterrent enough.

Dr Tan Seng Giaw (DAP-Kepong) also suggested that traffickers be jailed for life, in addition to whipping.

Nazri said penalties stipulated in the bill were sufficient.

"Other countries with anti-trafficking laws only have prison sentences and fines, and such laws are considered adequate by the United Nations.

"Jail terms for Western anti-trafficking laws range from two to 10 years," he added.

The bill, which came up for its second reading yesterday, provides for prison sentences ranging from three to 20 years with either an alternative or additional penalty of a fine of between RM50,000 and RM500,000.

In his opening speech, Nazri said a report by Amnesty International in 2004 revealed that about 700,000 people were trafficked every year while the United States' Department of State estimated that about 600,000 to 800,000 individuals were victims of cross-border trafficking every year.

"Most of those trafficked are women and children. Human trafficking is estimated to rake in as much as $10US billion (RM34.03 billion) every year.

"On the annual report on human trafficking released on June 5, 2006, by the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, of the US Department of State, Malaysia is listed on the 'Tier-2 Watch List'," he said.

The listing was because Malaysia was seen as not serious in its efforts to combat human trafficking, particularly because there were no specific and comprehensive domestic laws.

"With the bill, the government is confident Malaysia is ready to deal with the problem," he added.

LOAD-DATE: May 10, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Dewan Rakyat

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 New Straits Times Press (Malaysia) Berhad
All Rights Reserved

273 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Federal News Service

May 9, 2007 Wednesday

HEARING OF THE SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE; SUBJECT: NOMINATION OF LT. GENERAL DELL L. DAILEY, USA, TO BE COORDINATOR FOR COUNTERTERRORISM; AND THE NOMINA-
TION OF MARK P. LOGAN TO BE DIRECTOR OF THE OFFICE TO MON-ITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS;
CHAired BY: SENATOR BILL NELSON (D-FL);
LOCATION: 419 DIRKSEN SENATE OFFICE BUILDING WASHINGTON, D.C.

SECTION: CAPITOL HILL HEARING

LENGTH: 8091 words

HEARING OF THE SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE SUBJECT: NOMINATION OF LT. GEN-ERAL DELL L. DAILEY, USA, TO BE COORDINATOR FOR COUNTERTERRORISM; AND THE NOMINA-TION OF MARK P. LOGAN TO BE DIRECTOR OF THE OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING
IN PERSONS CHAIRED BY: SENATOR BILL NELSON (D-FL) LOCATION: 419 DIRKSEN SENATE OFFICE
BUILDING WASHINGTON, D.C. TIME: 2:49 P.M. EDT DATE: WEDNESDAY, MAY 9, 2007

SEN. NELSON: Good afternoon. We have an important nomination hearing for two key positions of ambassadorial rank: General Dell Dailey to serve as coordinator for counterterrorism, and Mark Lagon to direct the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

And I want to welcome both of you.

Senator Brownback had planned to be with us to introduce Dr. Lagon, but, as you can imagine, he is in Kansas right now with the president. And he has given a statement and we will put that in the record. And Senator Lugar also has a statement which will be placed in the record. And Senator Reed is on his way, and when he gets here, we'll have him make his statement.

The National Counterterrorism Center has reported an estimated 14,338 incidents of terrorism global-wide in '06. The incidents were up 91 percent in Iraq, and in Afghanistan up 53 percent last year.

General Dailey, you have agreed to serve in a critically important post. Your 36-year Army career, most recently as the director of Special Operations at MacDill, qualifies you uniquely to address what has been called a global counterinsurgency. Your efforts will be essential as we seek to combat what has become transnational crime, terrorist financing, and many other threats to our national security. Your diplomatic challenge will be to win over partners in this fight.

In the National Strategy for Combating Terrorism, which was released by the White House last fall, the long-term solution for winning the war on terror is the advancement of human freedom and human dignity through effective democracy. So you're going to have your hands full to marshal all the resources at your disposal to protect, secure, and win the support of at-risk populations, in addition to targeting violent extremist networks, as well as individual terrorists. And I would recommend that along the way you talk to a former commander of Central Command -- well, there have been a bunch of those former commanders of Central Command, each of which has expertise, that you might want to talk to, in addition to the commanders that you have now served under: General Abizaid as well as also the present new commander. Now who -- did you serve under the new commander? He just took over. Or have you been at the Special Operations Command?

GEN. DAILEY: Sir, I've been in the Special Operations Command throughout that time period.

SEN. NELSON: Okay, you've been with General Brown.

GEN. DAILEY: Yes, sir.

SEN. NELSON: Okay. Well, you've had some good mentoring there, and so you've got a lot of that good background.

Now, Mark Lagon has been asked to manage an unwieldy but critically important effort to fight modern-day slavery. The State Department estimates that somewhere between 600,000 and 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders each year. Of all the trafficking victims, 80 percent are women and girls. Minor children make up as much as 50 percent of those that are forced, coerced and defrauded into indentured servitude and the worst kinds of sexual exploitation.

And so in monitoring and reporting on human trafficking worldwide, the United States needs to advocate for those whose voices are often voiceless. And with your background in international organizations and your knowledge of the opportunities of leveraging multilateral diplomacy, you will have a good perspective to bring to our efforts to assist people who have been trafficked and to work to try to lessen this threat to human rights worldwide.

I -- just on a personal note, I can tell you that I get a lecture from my wife about once a week about trying to use my position to try to help, and so I'm bringing you some intense personal -- (laughter) -- admonition as well as encouragement.

We look forward to a thorough discussion on your plans, so let me just turn it over to you, General. And we will take a time-out when Senator Reed gets here and let him go ahead and make his statement. But if you will, General.

GEN. DAILEY: Thank you, sir.

Mr. Chairman and distinguished members of this committee present and absent, it's a pleasure to come before you as --

SEN. NELSON: Let me stop you right here, because he just walked in.

SEN. JACK REED (D-RI): Excuse me. (Laughter.)

SEN. NELSON: Okay, Senator. We've just gone through the preliminaries, and the general was just literally starting his first sentence.

SEN. REED: Well, Mr. Chairman, it is a privilege to be here today and to have an opportunity to introduce Lieutenant General Dell Dailey. We were both fortunate to be members of the class of 1971 at West Point, and we're joined by many of our classmates here today.

And Dell has outshined all of us in his dedication and his service to the country. He's an extraordinary leader. He has commanded at every level of the Army.

And he's just completed extraordinarily important responsibilities in the Special Operations Command. But he's more than a commander, he is a soldier's soldier, and I get that information from my classmates who have served with them and everyone who's known him. This nation owes a great debt to him personally and to those soldiers and Marines and Air Force and Navy personnel that he's lead.

He is superbly suited for this task. He is anything but a theoretician when it comes to the war on terror. He is readily engaged and involved. And also, he brings not only competence, but he brings great character to this task. He and his wife have raised a wonderful family. He's joined today by his sister who's here, and he has those values which are the heart and soul of this country.

But a final point I'd like to make is that I think he has a rare insight into what we all do and should do because he appreciates, more than many people I know, that ultimately our decisions here in Washington are played out by countless soldiers and sailors and Marines and air men across the globe. And ultimately, I believe that they'll work so hard and so effectively because he wants to match their courage with wisdom, and I'm just honored to be here and to recommend Lieutenant General Dell Dailey to this committee.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

SEN. NELSON: Thank you, Senator Reed. That's quite a testimony, and it's a special club that you have coming from the military academy. And I'll just tell you a little success story.

You know, each of us get one slot for each of the academies -- West Point, Annapolis, the Air Force and the Marines. For some reason I ended up getting two slots this year. We nominate on the basis of merit, not politics, and that's because we have an academy selection committee made up of prominent Floridians, some of whom are graduates of the academies, that go through and go through all the nominations, go through all of the applications, interview them and make the selections; so that when I nominate 10 for one slot, the remaining nine are so good that the academy will usually go around and try to figure out how to get the other nine in.

For some reason this year I had two slots instead of one slot.

I ended up getting 19 out of 20 into West Point this year.

SEN. REED: Mr. Chairman, that's a testimony to your talent and -- (laughter) --

SEN. NELSON: No, it's testimony to the talent of that academy selection committee!

SEN. REED: My only hope is that they played football in Florida. (Laughter.)

SEN. NELSON: No, between the Florida Gators -- the Florida State Seminoles and the Miami Hurricanes, they already got all that talent.

SEN. REED: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and please excuse me. Thanks.

SEN. NELSON: All right.

General Dailey, thank you.

GEN. DAILEY: Mr. Chairman, distinguished members of the committee, it's a pleasure to come before you as the president's nominee as the coordinator for counterterrorism, and to work on the greatest challenge the United States has before it: international terrorism.

I'd like to thank the president and Secretary Rice for the confidence they have shown in me by nominating me for this important position.

SEN. NELSON: Is your family with you?

GEN. DAILEY: Unfortunately, my family cannot be present today.

SEN. NELSON: Okay.

GEN. DAILEY: My oldest boy, Dell Jr., is a second lieutenant at Fort Benning, Georgia. My other two boys, David and Drey (sp), are going through their final exams at the University of Florida. My two daughters, Allison (sp) and Natalie, are with my wife, Mary, at MacDill Air Force Base, Tampa, and they, too, are tied up with end-of-the-year school activities.

However, in their stead I have chosen four close friends who I've known upwards of 40 years. They are Mr. Tom Mantle (sp), Mr. Mike Mahaffey (sp), Mr. Phil Delivoir (sp) and Mr. Wes Walters.

SEN. NELSON: Why don't you all stand? Thank you for coming.

GEN. DAILEY: All are retired senior officers from the United States Army.

My sister, Denise, and my brother-in-law, Mr. Rick Bruns (sp), are here today also.

SEN. NELSON: Please stand. Thank you for coming.

GEN. DAILEY: Mr. Chairman, terrorism is a plague with roots reaching back hundreds maybe thousands of years. Globalization and the rapid advances in international communications have allowed terrorists to achieve a level of sophistication and maturity far beyond anything we've seen in the past. As a result, the use of terrorism or terrorist threats has become a tool of disaffected peoples who see it as an effective means to bring worldwide attention to the sources of their grievances.

Aside from the wanton destruction it inflicts on civilians, the threat from terrorism is threefold. First, terrorists use sophisticated modern technology, mainly the Internet, to enhance propaganda, recruiting and fundraising, amongst other things. Second, the ideology used by terrorist leaders, such as bin Laden and Zawahiri, is uncompromising. It seeks to replace resolution of differences through dialogue with destruction, and the use of violence against civilians to impose political ends. Faced with this extreme threat, we ourselves cannot compromise. Finally, there's an increasing threat that foreign terrorist organizations are actively working to acquire weapons of mass destruction and the materials required to develop them. We have no reason to believe that they would be reluctant to use such weapons if they succeed in acquiring them. This is the greatest threat facing our security today.

The strategy to tackle the terrorist threat can be divided into short term and long term. Over the short term, we must continue our efforts to protect the homeland; to capture, detain and kill terrorist leaders. We must eliminate the safe havens where terrorists recruit, organize, plan, train, coalesce, rest, propagandize, and claim turf as a symbol of legitimacy. The Departments of Defense, Homeland Security and Justice and members of the intelligence community lead us in these efforts.

However, over the long term, we will only win the war on terror if we eliminate the underlying conditions that terrorists exploit. The State Department, with support from the other interagencies, leads in this effort.

To eliminate the terrorist enemy, we must use all elements of statecraft -- diplomacy, economic power, intelligence, law enforcement and the military. Working to build capacity with our partner nations, who have the political will but lack resources or know-how, is vital to this effort. We also must work with our many partners around the world to build and sustain democratic, well-governed states that respond to the needs of their people and conduct themselves responsibly in the international system.

Most importantly our interagency team must organize itself for a long, well-resourced and well-planned effort. Our short-term efforts merely buy us time to accomplish our long-term, long-standing goal. This is not a vision that can be attained rapidly or in an on-again, off-again manner. It will require ongoing interagency, international activity led by the United States.

However, time is on our side. We've had five years of aggressive activity in the kinetic, lethal or short-term area. Through cooperation and sharing information with our allies, the international community has killed or captured many terrorists. Cooperative international efforts have produced genuine security improvements, particularly in securing borders and transportation, enhancing document security, disrupting terrorist financing and restricting the movement of terrorists. While we continue these efforts and adapt our efforts to change we have forced al Qaeda to make, we will also be increasing focus in this second phase of our vision, using all the elements of statecraft to undermine and erode popular support for the terrorists.

Additionally we will continue to enhance the Regional Strategic Initiative started by my predecessor, Ambassador Crumpton. We will examine additional regions that can benefit from the RSI approach, which allows us to work with ambassadors and interagency representatives in key regions of terrorist activity to assess the threat and devise collaborative strategies, action plans and policy. Secretary Rice's innovative transformational diplomacy program will also help us to meet our needs, particularly in positioning our people and creating synergy within the department.

Tying all this together will require an aggressive communications outreach to both domestic and foreign audiences. This will include significant interaction with media and non-governmental organizations. The challenge for the coordinator for Counterterrorism is great but not insurmountable. With the talented people in all of our government agencies, the strength of this great nation and aggressive interaction with our partner nations, we will bring this scourge or international terrorism to ultimate defeat.

Sir, I thank you for the opportunity for this hearing, and look forward to the question-and-answer session to follow.

SEN. NELSON: And if you would, introduce members of your family or friends that are here.

MR. LAGON: Happily. I have with me my mother, Zofi Lagon (sp), my wife, Susan Lagon (sp) and my daughter, Elena Lagon (sp).

SEN. NELSON: We are glad to have you. Thanks for coming.

MR. LAGON: I ask, Mr. Chairman, that my prepared testimony be submitted for the record while I make briefer remarks now.

SEN. NELSON: It is.

MR. LAGON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for holding this hearing, and members of the committee. And I'd also like to thank Chairman Biden for considering my nomination. I had the pleasure of working with Senator Biden while on the Foreign Relations Committee staff, and the partnership on the Helms-Biden legislation on the U.N. was a memorable experience.

I appreciate the confidence President Bush and Secretary Rice have placed in me through this nomination to lead the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

A year ago in The New York Times Nicholas Kristof wrote, "This is for my money one of the most effective units in the U.S. government." Former Ambassador John Miller played a large part in that success. Throughout my own career, I've sought opportunities to promote human rights. As the son of two immigrants who fled Poland at the outset of World War II, I recognized that having such opportunities to work on human rights rights are a blessing. One of those immigrants, my mother, is here today.

Around the world people are coerced into bonded labor, bought and sold into prostitution, captured to serve as child soldiers. The United States has emerged as the global leader calling attention to the ongoing existence of this slavery, thanks to the bipartisan support of Congress and tools it provided through the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, which I played a small part in crafting as a committee staffer. Over the last two years, the State Department has placed special emphasis on trafficking for labor exploitation -- foreign guest workers who end up in conditions of involuntary servitude, dehumanized domestic servants, victims trafficked within their own country.

Intelligence estimates found that about two-thirds of transnational trafficking is for commercial sexual exploitation. One of the most horrifying realities is the young age of so many victims of sex trafficking. In India, the average age of girls entering the commercial sex trade is 14. Prostitution is an inexorable magnet for trafficking. That's why the President's Interagency Task Force, chaired by the secretary of State, urges a focus on reducing demand.

Programmatically, the Trafficking in Persons Office currently manages 124 open grants totaling nearly $23 million. An additional 80 grants totaling $16.5 million are expected to be awarded by the end of the fiscal year. Examples include creation of village vigilance groups in Benin to prevent child trafficking, support for victim shelters for at-risk street young in Nicaragua, and training police, judges and prosecutors in Indonesia.

The office's seventh annual Trafficking in Persons Report is scheduled for release in June, and it will include ratings of 151 foreign governments. The goal of the report is not to push, but to stimulate action. In every Tier 1 or Tier 2 watch list case, the United States outlines a mini-action plan to spur bilateral commitment working together on behalf of victims.

Let me share three areas in which I'd be proactive if I'm confirmed. As U.N. specialist, I hope to use my comparative advantage to work multilaterally, as you referred to, Mr. Chairman, from steering an emerging U.N. initiative on anti-trafficking, to making sure that peacekeepers don't add to human suffering by enabling trafficking.

Secondly, I currently work with Undersecretary Karen Hughes as the public diplomacy deputy assistant secretary of my bureau.

I think there's a huge opportunity for public diplomacy on this issue to convince other governments to cooperate with us, to raise public awareness, but moreover, to highlight U.S. leadership and compassion. That's a message that needs to be better delivered today.

Finally, the ambassador-at-large chairs the interagency's senior policy operating group. I hope to work with domestic agencies to show other nations that we're not just hectoring them to change, but we're deeply committed to change ourselves.

Trafficking in persons is nothing less than modern-day slavery. It must be abolished. The exploited need to be treated -- should be treated as victims to be helped, not criminals. The exploiters must be stigmatized and prosecuted and the criminal networks eliminated. A broad movement of faith-based groups, feminists, brave individuals and NGOs have closed ranks to do so, and it would be a great honor to work with them, if I were confirmed.

And I'd welcome your questions.

SEN. NELSON: And by the way, Dr. Lagon, I would recommend to you that you study the life of British Parliamentarian William Wilberforce in the late 1700s and early 1800s, who if there's ever been an example of one person taking on the economic established order of the day, it was like he took on today's Fortune 500, and it took him 20 years as a member of Parliament, 20 years, but he finally abolished the English slave trade. And he's an example of what one person that is determined can do, and what he did was he changed the course of history of the world.

Senator Casey.

SEN. ROBERT CASEY (D-PA): Thank you very much. Senator Nelson, we appreciate you calling this hearing, and I have to say, I'm appreciative at three levels. One is that we're dealing with such important matters today, grave matters to human life. Secondly and much less importantly, we don't have enough subcommittee hearings in the Senate, and I'm grateful for this opportunity. And thirdly, because I was relatively on time, I was able to jump ahead of Senator Feingold. (Laughter.) He outranks me by several years, and the way it works in Foreign Relations is you go to your seat and you wait until your number comes up, but I jumped ahead. So as long as Senator Feingold doesn't mind and as long as Senator Nelson won't tell anyone, we'll keep it a big secret. (Laughter.)

No, I'm grateful. And, General and Doctor, thank you for your testimony today but in the larger sense for your service to date but for your future service. We can't -- it's hard to come up with two more important topics than stopping terrorism or mitigating the effects of it as best we can and stopping human trafficking, so you're both doing very noble -- and it's not an overstatement to say heroic work, and we appreciate that.

I guess I want to just direct my first question to you, General. And I was, like a lot of us, when we're tracking the developments in the news about the war in Iraq and in a broader sense the more global war that we have against terrorists -- and I was struck, as we all were, by the 2006 country reports on terrorism, the numbers going up obviously. But according to the last number, in 2006, more than 14,000 incidents of terrorism occurred, a rise of more than 3,000 attacks over 2005. You know this data better than I do.

I'm just curious -- because you've been looking at this for a long time and you've got direct experience -- how helpful do you find that kind of annual report -- helpful or not? And then if it is, I want to follow up on it.

GEN. DAILEY: It is mandated by law, Mr. Senator, for us to render that report, and it allows us to take a very, very specific look. The parameters of the definition of terrorism is also defined by Congress. So it allows a(n) objective, finite look over the year timeframe with a specific definition.

Unfortunately, it doesn't cover all the other things that may be taking place in counterterrorism. It just looks at the final end of number of instances and number of fatalities. There's a lot of other activities that take place that affect terrorism that can give you a more holistic approach.

Benjamin Disraeli, the prime minister from the United Kingdom, had said that you've got "lies, darn lies and statistics." We have to be careful that these statistics don't end up forming too much of our opinion taken solely as numbers.

So we think it's helpful. It's a good start. It allows us to define at least trends that are taking place. But specificity -- we probably should stay away from it.

We have baselined it from '05 to '06. We think that's the right direction to go. And in the scheme of things, it's a tool, but it's not the only tool.

SEN. CASEY: Anything you can draw from today -- from this year's totals, meaning -- the reports from this year, meaning 2006 totals?

GEN. DAILEY: A 25 percent increase in incidents with a 40 percent increase in fatalities, a majority of those being in the Middle East area tied to Afghanistan or Iraq. Unfortunately, that might skew our numbers.

It's tough to discern sectarian, it's tough to get raw counterterrorism.

I think what we do need to understand is that terrorism is still a problem. It's not getting better, although we're doing as much as we can with both international and our own team. And we probably need to use that as probably the single baseline of where we're at.

SEN. CASEY: If you exclude from that total, just for purposes of discussion, not for any other purpose, but if you take out the data that pertains to Iraq and Afghanistan, anything just above that part of that data that you can -- anything that's significant in terms of the rise of the intensity or the scope or anything you can draw from that?

GEN. DAILEY: Senator, I was not prepared to discuss that report in too much detail. I would have to get back to you with a --

SEN. CASEY: Yeah, if you're able to submit something for the record, that would be great.

GEN. DAILEY: Okay.

SEN. CASEY: And I'm only half kidding when I say that you have a lot -- you're demonstrating a lot of valor just by taking, upon confirmation, the title of "coordinator," which means, by definition, you have to work with other governmental agencies, which is in Washington pretty risky business. But I'm sure you can handle it.

What do you see in terms of that part of your assignment, upon confirmation, that -- do you think that's going to be particularly difficult? Or do you think there's already a system in place for agencies to cooperate and to integrate their responsibilities with regard to counterterrorism?

GEN. DAILEY: If confirmed, the essence of this position is coordination. It's a low-budget organization, it is a low-number organization. I have the pleasure of working directly with -- to the secretary as my immediate boss. So coordination is the key to the position, and we focus that coordination with established processes already in place, coordination inside our own department -- State; inside the interagency, in concert with the National Center for Counterterrorism, and also the National Security System. But then also internationally through multinational organizations and bilateral organizations. The last aspect, international, is probably the one that's least structured, more personal-based versus process-based, and the one that will probably take the most of my focus.

SEN. CASEY: Well, I want to conclude -- and I have a question for the Doctor as well. But I want to conclude just with a statement on page three of your testimony, to commend you for this statement, among others, but the one that jumped out at me was the sentence which reads, quote, "To eliminate the terrorist enemy, we must use all elements of statecraft -- diplomacy, economic power, intelligence, law enforcement, and military."

And unfortunately, I think in too many discussions in this town it's only the military aspect or use of force aspect that people focus on. So I appreciate the breadth of your understanding of this.

I'm short on time. But, Doctor, I wanted to ask you a question as it pertains to the difficult job that you're seeking. And we really appreciate you pursuing this.

(Audio break) -- based upon your experience -- and I know you've worked before with the United Nations -- if you could outline for us any and all concrete steps that the United Nations, particularly the Department of Peacekeeping Operations, have undertaken to stem this, to stem sexual exploitation by peacekeeping forces in the U.N., as horrific and as contradictory as that sounds.

MR. LAGON: That's a tremendous question. I think it's one of the most horrifying things I've seen on the job at the International Organization Bureau -- that, you know, peacekeepers, whose job should be to diminish harm to other people, would actually extend suffering.

The revelations about the mission in the Congo were devastating.

The -- under Secretary-General Annan, steps were taken, and they're being continued under the new secretary-general, Ban Ki-Moon, to -- at the headquarters, at the mother ship, put in place policies in the Department of Peacekeeping Operations that establish that there -- you know, that there have to be standards for peacekeepers and that if peacekeepers are found to be engaging in sexual abuse, they need to be sent back to the troop-contributing nation.

But the problem is impunity at home. When there continues to be a logic that "boys will be boys," soldiers will go to prostitutes, and this phenomenon of a magnet for trafficking being created by troops persists, it has to be addressed by the troop-contributing nations. At some point, the member states in the U.N. must insist that there be some sort of consequence, that a nation must discipline its own soldiers. And that's the trick.

If confirmed, I would begin by talking to the officials in the U.N. to continue the course that they have begun to input reforms. But you do need to talk to the governments where the troops are deployed and, most importantly, to the governments that send those troops, to change that attitude.

SEN. CASEY: Well, I thank you for that. And I think it's critically important for this committee -- I mean, the committee -- the Foreign Relations Committee overall -- to keep an eye on this, and I hope you'll upon confirmation be assisting us in doing that. It's a tremendous and disturbing contradiction, and I think it's important that we keep an eye on it, along with -- of course, along with the administration.

Thank you.

MR. LAGON: Pledge to do that.

SEN. CASEY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

SEN. NELSON: Senator Feingold.

SEN. RUSSELL FEINGOLD (D-WI): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And Senator Casey, I want you to know I'm so delighted that you're in the Senate and particularly on this committee, that you're more than welcome to occasionally bump me. (Laughter.)

It's good to have you here.

SEN. CASEY: Thank you.

SEN. FEINGOLD: I congratulate each of you in your nominations. Each of you have committed your lives to serving in government and to advancing and coordinating American foreign and counterterrorism policies during some very difficult times. So thank you to both you. Thanks to both of you for your service.

You both have very impressive credentials, and while this committee hearing is not long enough to delve into each of your backgrounds in detail, I wanted to note how valuable each of your contributions is to America's foreign policy, both at home and abroad.

General Dailey, thank you for coming to see me last week. I enjoyed talking with you. I'm glad that we have a chance to hear from both you and how you'll approach your new assignments, including coordination with international organizations, regional partners and the interagency process. If you are confirmed, I look forward to working closely with you. I hope you will look to the Senate as a resource and to this committee as a source of support and guidance during your tenure.

Dr. Lagon, just a question for you. There have been several global initiatives to address the issue of human trafficking and slavery, including the recently launched global initiative to fight human trafficking, coordinated by the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime, as well as Humanity United's newly formed coalition involving many NGOs. Those global initiatives attempt to raise public awareness by -- while advancing policy and legislation globally.

Can you share with me your thoughts on where these initiatives have been most effective?

MR. LAGON: This issue was born of a coalition of people on left and right working together to raise awareness, because the first step for attacking the problem of human trafficking has been for elites and publics to understand that it's there. That was true back in 2000 when the original Trafficking Victims Protection Act came out, and Senator Brownback and Senator Wellstone, representing, you know, a broad array of views on the part of activists, came together. And so too internationally the idea that this problem really represents modern-day form of slavery has taken root.

Director General Costa of the U.N. Office of Drugs and Crime has recognized that the very idea that Chairman Nelson has raised about William Wilberforce and the need to launch an effort to abolish this problem is very relevant. In fact, they're going to try and use the 200th anniversary of Wilberforce's effort to abolish slavery to do that.

We need to make sure that in fact that U.N. effort does the most to advance the cause. I think it's an interesting idea to create a trust fund, as that U.N. office has proposed, where private partners could involve themselves in the project in funding it. It should not only be governments. There have been very interesting opportunities for private actors to involve themselves, whether it be people in the airline or tourism industry who have worked as partners with the Office of Trafficking in Persons to deal with child sex tourism, or efforts emerging of Microsoft working in India, with the massive problems of forced labor and sex trafficking that are there.

NGO efforts, though, I'd say even more than U.N. efforts, are where the great energy lies. That's one of the reasons why, for instance, the Trafficking in Persons Office funds NGOs that are involved in such efforts -- for instance, the Free the Slaves NGO in India in efforts to try and combat child labor.

SEN. FEINGOLD: Thank you, Doctor.

General, the United States has been working with African Union, AU, member states in regional focal points for counterterrorism, including the AU's African Center for Studying Research on Terrorism, which was inaugurated in October 2004, and the Committee on Intelligence and Security Services in Africa, which was established at the January 2006 AU summit. These are important regional hubs to help guide strategic cross-border counterterrorism efforts on the African continent. Do you believe they are receiving the funding and support and attention that they need to thrive? And if confirmed, what future collaboration do you envision between the United States government and these regional counterterrorism think tanks, such as the two that I just mentioned.

GEN. DAILEY: Senator, thanks for that question. It's a very good one.

I think the president's budget, as broken down for the State Department and State CT, was very helpful in resourcing activity focused on those two coordination centers. But for State CT and the coordinator, myself, I see a very aggressive program for multilateral organizations and then functional counterterrorism centers, like the two you just mentioned, to thrive and work with together. We want to combine them into our Regional Strategic Initiative, where we can couple connection with the international population and connection with our respective embassies in the Regional Security Initiative groups. I think they're essential. I think they're a key network with the leaders of those respective partner nations, and would work very diligently to increase our contact with them and make them as successful as we can.

SEN. FEINGOLD: Thank you, General.

I've long been concerned that our counterterrorism efforts, with specific regard to the safe haven in Somalia, have not been effective, because we lack a comprehensive long-term interagency strategy. What is the role of the State CT in developing this strategy and its implementation? And if you're confirmed, how would State Counterterrorism go about developing a long-term vision for a stable, terrorist-free Somalia? And how would you translate that vision into short and long-term policies?

GEN. DAILEY: Sir, I think the focus on Somalia, as previously an ungoverned area, comes out of our State Department with a policy that is threefold.

First of all, using the transitional federal government and internationally identified and supported government, we'd like them to go through some steps or some means to reconcile with their population in an attempt to put into place a stable government that fits the needs of all the people in Somalia.

The second thing that's important is making sure that there is security and stability in the area, which includes combating terrorism.

And then the third is addressing the humanitarian needs and responding to that.

Those three steps are all the policy of State Department and I believe the U.S. government at this point, and we will use those inside the coordinator's office to be our guidelines.

Somalia is watched by Ethiopia. It's watched by Kenya. It's -- countries right there -- they want to see Somalia succeed, so right off from the very beginning, we're going to have bilateral support for success.

And then with -- inside the African Union, like you said, and other multilateral organizations, capitalizing on their focus on Somalia will be another step that we will use.

SEN. FEINGOLD: Well, I agree with you, that Kenya and Ethiopia have a strong interest in this. But we have to be heavily involved ourselves. It's very important to us, as you obviously understand.

Finally, what points of collaboration do you see for the relative roles of U.S. military action, military assistance and nonmilitary assistance in the war against international terrorism? And what does this mean for the interagency process you'll be coordinating?

GEN. DAILEY: The military has a huge source of nonlethal, nonkinetic resources that Department of State and the other agencies, I think, can rely on to be successful in that portion of the war on terror that gets to the hearts and minds of the people. Civil affairs operations, public diplomacy -- right now the Special Operations organizations have about 15 or 20 teams that help in public diplomacy that work specifically for the ambassadors in the embassies. That's just a small snapshot of what the military can bring to the table.

I think, because of my experience with the military, I'm in a unique position to capture some of those resources for State Department or other agency missions or goals and make it appear and actually be a team interagency effort, which might have gone uncaptured without someone knowing the capability of the military.

SEN. FEINGOLD: Thank you very much, General.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

SEN. NELSON: Thank you, Senator Feingold.

General, you face a daunting task, because of the human tendency to build up walls between each of these agencies. There are innumerable agencies of the federal government and departments that are involved in counterterrorism.

How do you have the entree to be able to chip away at those walls so that you can be a coordinator?

GEN. DAILEY: Senator, thanks for that question also, because it does go to the heart of the previous question of the coordinator's position. First of all, I'm a personal friend of many of them -- Mike Diandria (ph) CIA, Fran Townsend at the National Security Council, and Juan Zarate at the Counterterrorism Security Group. So I have a little bit of a professional and personal connection with some of the team leaders of the stovepipes you just mentioned.

But there's a heck of a strong team in the coordinator's office, approximately 80 folks being well led right now, well educated, and darn good staffers. And they can out-staff a lot of organizations by speed and knowledge. I intend to use that skill, that capability they have to allow us to come to the table well-informed and with speed to attempt to get the positions of the foreign policy raised to a higher level of importance.

So my staff, the personal relationship, and also just the understanding of how the stovepipes have to be attacked on a regular basis, with congeniality and teamwork and with the goal of the success of the United States government in counterterrorism.

SEN. NELSON: In addition to the walls between agencies -- as you have described it, the stovepipes -- there's the human problem of communication at different levels of the federal, the state and the local governments, information that should be shared up and down but of which there is enormous frustration at the state and local level on the sharing of information from the federal level. Talk to us about that.

GEN. DAILEY: Sir, as you know, in my role I'll be doing the majority of my efforts on the international basis except for several selected things. We would work with DHS, a brand-new department in the executive branch, for them to go through their internal counterterrorism-type efforts. We will assist them. We'll provide technical information, knowledge of the threat, tactics, techniques, procedures, foreign financing of the threat. Our position would be that we would work as best we could with DHS as it worked within the continental United States. We would also provide appropriate guidance for the Department of Justice and other departments that have a counterterrorism needed flavor for their dealings with the state and local governments.

SEN. NELSON: Understandably you are dealing in the international arena, but it's incumbent upon us who are in touch with our people back home to let you know that a terrorist strike in Somalia is one thing, but a terrorist strike here is another.

And so often the eyes and ears that will first get some indication, unless the FBI has infiltrated a particular group, may well be that local law enforcement agency. And there needs to be that communication.

So I want to share that frustration on the part of state and local government with you because you're going to be running in these councils where you're going to be interacting with the FBI from time to time, and the DEA, and the secretary of Homeland Security, and so forth, the head of Northern Command -- you're going to be interfacing with all of these people, and that's a message that constantly needs to be made.

Tell me, no doubt you have been familiar with some of the writings of General Zinni, former commander of Central Command, about how we ought to approach the issue of terrorism and what we should approach -- how should we approach it. I'd love to have you make some comment about General Zinni's ideas.

GEN. DAILEY: Sir, I haven't read any of his most recent products or his public statements. I do know that he had great frustration when we engaged into the Iraq war. His war plans were far more robust than General Franks' were, and he articulated that in a public forum.

Although I have a relationship with him, a personal relationship with him, and have spoken with him probably two or three times a year on accidental encounters, I am not familiar with any of his recent writings. I suspect, though, that he focuses very strongly on the indirect, non-lethal, non-kinetic; go after those things that allow the terrorists to exploit, and try and resolve those: political injustice, economic deprivation, crime and corruption -- all those underlying causes that allow a terrorist organization, particularly al Qaeda, to fester and grow from a regional to a global. He is that open-minded and that divisionary, so I assume that's what he's talking about. But specifically, I can't get any further than that, sir.

SEN. NELSON: Well, that's exactly what he says. What do you think about that?

GEN. DAILEY: It's the absolute solution. Our kinetic, lethal solutions are just there to buy us time, and it's been, frankly, pretty good over the past four or five years. Just in the past 12 months, I've seen 60-plus individuals captured or detained or killed around the world who are taking away the leadership from the enemy. That is buying us time to organize the rest of the world, either through the U.N. Security Council Resolutions 1373 or 1267, or any of the other 13 Geneva Conventions and protocols that allow us to organize the world in counterterrorism. It allows us to buy time for our multilateral organizations -- the G-8, NATO, OAS, APEC, ASEAN -- to also focus on counterterrorism, to build tools to prevent people from moving from one country to another, to shut down their finances.

Those five years have been invaluable to us to actually go after the system to prevent them from exploiting those terrorist desires. I think we're going in the right direction, and I think General Zinni would, to some extent, say the same thing.

SEN. NELSON: Doctor, what countries do you think are the worst offenders of human trafficking?

MR. LAGON: Well, the Office of Trafficking in Persons, given a mandate of Congress, has to come up with that answer every year by identifying the countries that are in Tier 3. And there are also countries that are in danger of spilling into Tier 3, which are identified as the Tier 2 Watch List.

There are different countries of different sizes. You can say that the problem of trafficking is substantial in a country because of its population, both because of population and because of the substantive character of what's going on.

India is particularly an issue we need to focus on. We need to use this time that the United States has developed a partnership with India on strategic issues to use those more and more robust lines of communication to have a frank discussion with them about both sex trafficking and forced labor, things that are ground in parts of their culture, including caste. We, ourselves, had to work on our legacy of slavery and segregation and building civil rights. And we should have a civil but firm dialogue with our partner about that.

But there are countries around the world, some of whom we think of as the category of rogue states and acute human rights abusers -- the Cubas, the Irans -- who have serious trafficking problems. There are other countries that have had partial sanctions placed on them that are not the most hardened human rights abusers -- Cambodia, for instance. And we try and identify, as the U.S. government, which are the most acute.

The job of the office I hope to head, if confirmed, is every year to create a blueprint in the form of this annual report, to indicate those countries that are the priorities. And that shows where we should channel resources, so that in the inter-agency role of this office, we can make sure that grants that are going from the Department of State, AID, rule of law training programs from the Department of Justice, and so on, are focused on where it's needed.

The touchstones are to see where the need is greatest to grapple with the human trafficking problem and that the will is there on the part of the government, but the capacity is missing.

SEN. NELSON: Well, take, for example -- you mentioned Cambodia. Now, what can the United States government do with the government of Cambodia in order for them to take positive action against this kind of trafficking?

MR. LAGON: Well, let me answer it in a couple of ways on Cambodia.

One, you use the annual rating system as a way to incentivize. You know, when I used to work at the Senate Foreign Relations Committee for Senator Helms, one of the things I worked on was economic sanctions. And economic sanctions can be a blunt instrument at times. But one thing that we've learned from the legislation giving tools to the executive branch is that the threat of sanctions focuses the mind of other governments. And through the Tier 2 watch lists and through a grace period given by governments to work on an action plan with the United States, they can avert sanctions by working with us. That's one avenue.

Another avenue is seen by programs that have been pursued by AID. Both in Cambodia and, as it happens, in Ecuador, AID is creating pilot programs for shelters for victims. And that's one thing we can do, is not only talk with the government about how to improve their law enforcement or improve their law, but we need to have a victim-centered approach. That's something we're trying to do at home as well.

SEN. NELSON: The grouping Tier 3, the worst -- do you expect that group to get larger?

MR. LAGON: Well, the U.S. government takes very seriously trying to use objective standards and consistency. There are problems in the world. As I understand it, as the current annual report is being prepared for release next month, while its results are embargoed and still, you know, at the finalizing stage, there have been some trends that have appeared. And we see that there has been some real effort by governments to focus on victim assistance and to work with NGOs.

But we see a trend of declining prosecutions and convictions, and a real rule-of-law problem: corruption, officials in governments complicit in trafficking, allowing it to happen, allowing the migration part to happen and allowing the exploitation part to happen. And that trend may produce a number of new Tier 3 nations on the list.

SEN. NELSON: Well, the two of you will have two exceptionally important positions in the government of the United States, and I wish you well. What we will try to do is to speed this confirmation process so that you all can get on with it. I don't know of any hang-ups and I don't anticipate any, and we will try to get it done just as quickly as possible, so that you all can get to your post.

We're going to continue to leave the record open for a few days -- I would say until the close of business on Friday -- for anyone who wants to submit information with regard to these two nominations. Thank you all for your public service, and thank you for your continued public service. The meeting is adjourned.

LOAD-DATE: May 10, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2007 Federal News Service, Inc.
All Rights Reserved

274 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Malaysia General News

May 9, 2007 WednesdayM'SIA A POTENTIAL HOTSPOT FOR HUMAN TRAFFICKING*LENGTH: 210 wordsDATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR May 9

Malaysia has the potential to become a hotspot for human trafficking in view of its robust economy, and for this reason, it needs a specific and comprehensive law to keep the problem in check.

Minister in the Prime Minister's Department Datuk Seri Mohamed Nazri Aziz said the government felt that such a law would complement existing ones on anti-trafficking in humans.

He said this when tabling the Anti-Trafficking in Persons 2007 Bill at the Dewan Rakyat here today.

Mohamed Nazri said if the bill was passed, those who committed the crime could be jailed up to 20 years and fined.

The United States, he said, had placed Malaysia in its Tier-2 Watch List because the country was seen as not having comprehensive laws to combat human trafficking.

However, he said the move was inappropriate as Malaysia had taken many proactive steps to address the problem.

A government report from the United States showed that between 600,000 to 800,000 people, most of them women and children, had been sold across borders with the syndicates involved raking in $10US billion a year.

Mohamed Nazri said police statistics showed that 6,484 foreign prostitutes were arrested in 2005 while 3,245 foreigners were arrested until July last year.

The Dewan Rakyat sitting resumes tomorrow.

LOAD-DATE: May 10, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

275 of 445 DOCUMENTS

International Law Update

May 2007United States adds new Middle East nations to human trafficking blacklist*SECTION: Vol. 13, No. 5LENGTH: 232 words

The U.S. Department of State (DOS) has newly placed four Middle East allies on its blacklist of countries that have not tried hard enough to prevent trafficking in people. Listed nations are subject to sanctions for not doing enough to stop the yearly flow of 800,000 human beings, across international borders for the commercial sex trade and other types of coerced and indentured labor. Of these unfortunates, 8 out of 10 are female and almost 5 out of 10 are children. Many of these victims are trying to escape poverty in either Eastern Europe or in South and Southeast Asia. Among U.S. friends getting a failing grade in the latest listing, were Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman and Qatar. For the first time, Algeria, Equatorial Guinea and Malaysia joined regular offenders such as Burma (Myanmar), Cuba, Iran, North Korea and Syria in the DOS's 236 page document called the "Trafficking in Persons Report" (TPR), published annually. The TPR downgraded 16 states in all 33% more than in 2006 into so called "Tier 3" status. Despite the new additions, Secretary of State Rice said "more and more countries are coming to see human trafficking for what it is a modern day form of slavery that devastates families and communities around the world." Citation: The Associated Press (online), Washington, D.C., Wednesday, June 13, 2007 at 00:55:01Z (byline of Matthew Lee, AP Writer).

LOAD-DATE: June 27, 2007

Copyright 2007 Transnational Law Associates, LLC

276 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Straits Times (Singapore)

April 17, 2007 Tuesday

Manila's war on human trafficking faces hurdles

BYLINE: Alastair McIndoe, Philippines Correspondent

LENGTH: 1110 words

A NEIGHBOUR introduced 25-year-old Maricel Matubis from the small town of San Pedro near Manila to a recruiter offering work in Malaysia as an entertainer in a karaoke bar.

Her husband, a jeepney driver, was reluctant to let her go at first. Mrs Matubis was waiting for her work permit to come through for a shop assistant's job in Kuwait.

But lured by a salary of 25,000 pesos ($800S) a month - no mean wage here - and promises that she would only be entertaining customers, she accepted the offer.

Twelve days later, Mrs Matubis and four other hard-up young women hired by the same recruiter boarded a ferry in the southern port of Zamboanga for Sandakan, the second largest city in Sabah.

About 20 women, mostly Filipinos, worked at the VIP Pub in Sandakan. To Mrs Matubis, it seemed a decent enough place, though she had to hand over her passport to the owner, known to the staff as 'Boss Michael'.

The next morning, she was brought to a room in the bar. There she faced a man in his late 30s, waiting to have sex with her.

'You start work,' she was told by one of the Malaysian bar workers.

For the next six weeks, fearing a beating or worse unless she complied, Mrs Matubis had sex with at least one customer a day, and sometimes as many as three.

She was paid no wages, and was on 24-hour call.

It is not clear how the Malaysian authorities intervened, but Mrs Matubis and the four women trafficked with her were deported back to the Philippines.

Hundreds of young women from impoverished rural villages and shanty towns across the Philippines are tricked every year into prostitution here and abroad by criminal syndicates promising respectable, well-paid jobs.

Mrs Matubis and the four other women were sent to Sandakan nearly two years ago. What makes their case so unusual is that they had the satisfaction of seeing their Filipino recruiter hauled to trial in Zamboanga.

On March 27, Rosie Ociel was sentenced to life imprisonment - a minimum 20 years here - and given a hefty fine. Court records revealed the extent of Mrs Matubis' ordeal.

Ociel, 34, is one of a handful of criminals convicted under a 2003 anti-trafficking law.

Campaigners and concerned governments want to see more traffickers behind bars to discourage a rampant trade of persons here.

'The Philippines was the first country in Asean to pass a law against the trafficking in persons patterned on the United Nations' (UN) law on transnational crime,' said Mr Severino Gana, the head of the Justice Department's Task Force on the Trafficking in Persons.

'We're doing a lot of prevention projects, like training prosecutors and educating law enforcers.'

But he acknowledges that the international community wants to see more trafficking convictions here.

There have been only eight under the 2003 law, most involving sexual exploitation. There was one conviction in 2004, then six in 2005, but none last year despite 26 cases being filed in court. Ociel was 2007's first conviction.

The Philippines was put on the United States' trafficking watch list in 2005 for failing to convict more traffickers.

It came off that list last year, and is now ranked a Tier 2 country in the US State Department's 'Trafficking In Persons' report. This means the Philippines does not fully comply with minimum standards, but is making significant efforts to do so.

The main thrust of efforts is in improving the evidence-gathering skills of the police investigating trafficking cases.

'A lot (of cases) are dismissed by our prosecutors because of insufficient evidence filed by law enforcers,' said Mr Gana.

After starting with only 15 prosecutors specialising in anti-trafficking cases, there are now nearly 100 working in courts across the archipelago.

Getting practically any case through the legal meatgrinder is tough. There is a huge backlog in the lower courts - around 800,000 cases in 2004; and a third of courts in rural areas have no judges, a legacy of poor pay.

'Trafficking cases are filed but getting to court is another matter,' said Ms Dolores Alforte, executive director for the Philippines of Ecpat, which campaigns against the sexual exploitation of children.

'Threats and offers of money are regularly used by the trafficking syndicates to get victims to drop charges.'

For Father Shay Cullen, a Catholic missionary from Ireland who has spent over 20 years tracking down paedophiles in the Philippines, efforts to stop all forms of trafficking are retarded by institutional obstacles and public indifference.

'Prosecutors of the highest quality are needed, who won't throw a case for a bribe,' he said.

'People need to be educated on the rights of women to change attitudes in this macho society - and more women need to work in anti-trafficking enforcement.'

Modern-day slavery has many guises in the Philippines, not just sexual exploitation

Through illegal debt bondage, entire families are forced to work as farm labourers, shackled to loans that are almost impossible to repay.

In the cities, girls from impoverished families toil as maids to pay off family debts - and are easy prey for syndicates seeking 'entertainers' to work overseas.

Coming up with an estimate of how many people are trafficked in the Philippines is next to impossible, given the underground nature of the crime.

Across Asia, the International Labour Organization reckons 1.4 million people are victims of trafficking.

According to official estimates, over 600,000 Filipinos are working in Asia without proper papers, and about half of them are in Malaysia.

Sabah shares a highly porous border with the southern Philippines, and Zamboanga has long been the 'backdoor' out of the Philippines.

In the three years to 2006, Philippine authorities handled 1,149 victims of trafficking in various forms. Over 80 per cent were women, two-thirds of the total were aged under 17.

Like other non-governmental organisation workers helping trafficking victims, Virlanie Foundation founder Dominique Lemay believes many poor families suspect that the recruiter's offer of a decent job is a charade.

'I feel the most important things for these families is money, and then they close their eyes,' said Mr Lemay, who runs 13 shelters in Manila for street children.

The government plans to step up information campaigns to make vulnerable individuals aware that the honeyed offer of illegal recruiters can end in disaster, as it did for Mrs Matubis.

She was promised no recruitment fees, free air tickets and assurances of a work permit in Malaysia.

Said Mr Gana: 'Once the victims are transported, most are sold to prostitution dens and they begin to incur sky-rocketing debts, leaving them no choice but to go out and render sexual services.'

amcindoe@yahoo.com

LOAD-DATE: April 16, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Singapore Press Holdings Limited
All Rights Reserved

277 of 445 DOCUMENTS

CQ Congressional Testimony

March 26, 2007 Monday

STOPPING HUMAN TRAFFICKING

SECTION: CAPITOL HILL HEARING TESTIMONYLENGTH: 4477 words

Statement of Martina E. Vandenberg Attorney Jenner & Block LLP

Committee on Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Human Rights and the Law

March 26, 2007

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Subcommittee:

It is an honor to testify before you today on a grave violation of human rights, trafficking in persons.

My name is Martina Vandenberg, and I am an attorney in private practice with the firm of Jenner & Block. I am the author of two reports on trafficking in persons: Hopes Betrayed: Trafficking in Women and Girls to Post-Conflict Bosnia and Herzegovina for Forced Prostitution, published by Human Rights Watch, and Trafficking of Women to Israel for Forced Prostitution, published by the Israel Women's Network. I also represent trafficking victims pro bono in civil suits against their traffickers here in the United States.

I would like to thank Senator Durbin and the members of the Subcommittee for convening this hearing. The panel today provides a rare opportunity to identify gaps in the United States government's implementation of international human rights norms in the area of trafficking in persons.

Traffickers often flourish because they operate in zones of lawlessness and impunity. Over the past decade, Congress, the executive branch, and non-governmental organizations have worked together to develop innovative criminal and civil remedies to assist victims and bring traffickers to justice. But gaps do still exist, and traffickers continue to operate with impunity within these lacunae.

I would like to focus this afternoon on three concrete trafficking cases that illustrate these gaps. I will begin with the human rights norms -- the substantive international law on trafficking. I will then turn to the case studies: one in Iraq, one in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and one right here in the Washington, D.C. suburbs.

I. International Law

Trafficking in persons is a gruesome human rights violation, which traps men, women, and children in debt bondage, forced labor, and forced prostitution. Article 3(a) of the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, defines trafficking as the recruitment, transportation, transfer, harboring or receipt of persons, by the threat or use of force or any other means, for the purpose of exploitation.¹ The Protocol, while fundamentally an international crime control cooperation treaty, nevertheless includes protections for victims of trafficking. The inclusion of these provisions merely reflects that states have a duty to protect and provide remedies to victims who have suffered violations of their most fundamental human rights. Specifically, the Protocol presses states to provide appropriate shelter for victims; counseling and information in a language the victim can understand; medical, psychological, and material assistance; witness protection; and the possibility of obtaining compensation.

Research by Human Rights Watch and other human rights organizations has shown that historically, states have treated victims of trafficking as illegal migrants, criminals, or both, often detaining them, prosecuting them, and then summarily deporting them. Protection of victims, and the creation of visa regimes to permit victims to remain legally in countries of destination, is a fairly recent phenomenon. And while the model adopted by the international community has tended to focus largely on law enforcement measures, some countries, including the United States, have opted for a victim-centered approach. It would be too far a stretch to characterize this as a "rights-based" approach, unfortunately.

Obtaining a special trafficking victim visa, or T-visa, in the United States still requires cooperation with law enforcement. But the steps that have been taken do go some distance toward eliminating what Ann Jordan, director of the Global Rights Initiative Against Trafficking in Persons and one of the leading experts on trafficking in persons, once dubbed "the disposable witness syndrome." Victims cannot be used, and then abandoned. Victims must be viewed as individuals with human rights, and not as mere tools for states to obtain trafficking convictions in order to avoid landing on the State Department Trafficking In Persons report's tier III. At a minimum, victims must have witness protection, without which they cannot safely testify against those who perpetrated these crimes. This is particularly true in light of the crucial role played by official corruption, both in countries of origin and countries of destination. Without protections and services for victims, impunity for traffickers will remain the rule.

I offer these case studies to illustrate the gaps in the United States' own legal regime, in the hope that these gaps can be plugged with legislation or enhanced political will.

II. Impunity for Trafficking of Persons into Iraq for Forced Labor

On August 19, 2004, insurgents kidnapped twelve Nepalese men traveling on the road from Amman to Baghdad. All twelve were executed on August 31, 2004. An intrepid Chicago Tribune reporter, Cam Simpson, launched an investigation into the events leading up to their abduction and deaths. The Chicago Tribune series, "Pipeline to Peril," uncovered a trafficking network stretching from the remote mountains of Katmandu to U.S. military bases in Iraq. The chain began with recruiters in the men's villages, who promised the workers lucrative jobs in five-star hotels in Jordan. In exchange for facilitating these job opportunities, the recruiters demanded upfront payments amounting to nearly one year's wages for an average Nepali. The Nepalese men's families borrowed heavily to advance the funds, in some cases mortgaging the family farm.

The recruiters delivered the men to a Jordanian company in Amman, which demanded additional payment for placement services. The company held the men in apartments and did not provide the promised jobs in Jordanian luxury hotels. Instead, the Nepalese workers found themselves transferred into the hands of yet another Jordanian company, which provided their transportation into Iraq in an unguarded convoy. Upon arrival in Iraq, the traffickers intended to hand the workers off to a third Jordanian company, a subcontractor to Kellogg, Brown, & Root (KBR). Insurgents killed the Nepalese workers before they began their employment with the KBR subcontractor.

The meticulously researched Chicago Tribune series did not constitute the first allegation of trafficking for forced labor in U.S. military bases in Iraq. Indeed, at a joint issues forum cohosted by the House Armed Services Committee and the Helsinki Commission in September 2004, Senator Clinton questioned the Department of Defense Inspector General about a story in The Washington Post reporting labor violations against third country nationals in Iraq.

In the wake of the Chicago Tribune series, the Department of Defense (DoD) Office of the Inspector General launched an investigation. On April 14, 2006, in a memorandum to the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness, Thomas Gimble, the Principal Deputy DoD Inspector General, reported that he "found no reason to question the sequence or accuracy of events outlined in the Chicago Tribune articles published October 9 and 10, 2005." The memorandum also confirmed that "[s]ome of the Nepalese [men] clearly felt they had been deceived about their place of employment (Iraq versus Jordan)."

But, troublingly, the memorandum concluded that "while it would appear that some foreign-based companies are using false pretenses to provide laborers to KBR/Halliburton subcontractors in Iraq, we must note that none of the allegations in the Chicago Tribune articles are against U.S. persons or U.S. contractors." There is no indication that the DoD Inspector General delved into the issue of criminal complicity by U.S. persons or contractors. Indeed, there is no hint of any investigation whatsoever into involvement by U.S. contractors in a criminal conspiracy. Instead, the DoD conflated criminal and civil law principles, finding that "[t]here are no privities of contract between DoD and the foreign companies allegedly guilty of these trafficking practices; therefore, the U.S. has no jurisdiction over the persons or the offenses."

This statement is simply incorrect as a matter of law. Under the Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act of 2000, the United States does have criminal jurisdiction over felonies committed abroad by U.S. DoD contractors. Congressman John McHugh questioned Gimble on precisely this issue in a joint hearing convened by the House Armed Services Committee Subcommittee on Military Personnel in June 2006.⁸ Gimble's responses point to a level of superficiality in both the DoD Inspector General's analysis and investigation. Responding to Congressman McHugh's question on why the U.S. government did not attempt a criminal prosecution under the Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act of 2000 (MEJA), Gimble stated:

[T]here [were] no clauses in the contract, and these were not U.S. contracts. So we didn't think we had the authority to go down into those. So far as prosecution, that probably should go back into the local -- the Iraqi government should be the one prosecuting the murders on that.

The issue, however, was not the prosecution of the killings, but the criminal prosecution of the underlying trafficking offenses. And on that issue, the DoD Inspector General's analysis was inadequate for two reasons. First, while these twelve Nepalese workers did not make it to the U.S. base in Iraq, between 35,000 and 48,000 third country nationals did. It is clear that some fraction of that work force suffered the same trafficking abuses as the twelve Nepalese men who died. Colonel Boyles, formerly of Joint Contracting Command Iraq, testified at the June 2006 hearing that he had to force contractors to comply with General Casey's order to return passports to third country nationals by May 1, 2006. Boyles told the members of Congress present at the joint hearing that gaining compliance from contractors withholding third country nationals' passports was "like pulling teeth." And while the DoD Inspector General apparently interviewed 850 third country nationals in Iraq, no one from the Department of Defense at the joint hearing answered a fundamental question posed by Congressman Chris Smith. Congressman Smith asked, "the real question is, was there any knowledge that American contractors or members of the military had knowledge of the trafficking that was taking place by the sub-contractors?" That question, the key to a criminal prosecution, remains unanswered.

The lack of an investigation into that question reflects a problem identified by Dr. Sarah Mendelson of the Center for Strategic and International Studies in her report, Barracks and Brothels. Dr. Mendelson observed the Inspector General's formal investigation in 2003 into complicity of DoD personnel in the Balkans, and concluded that the investigation was "superficial and pro forma." She wrote: "Had DoD personnel followed the leads they were given, they would have found evidence of civilian contractor complicity in human trafficking."

They did not pursue those leads, nor did they meet with non- governmental organizations or trafficking victims.

And even if the IG had asked the right questions and pursued all available leads in 2003, that institutional memory is gone. All of the IG staff members who have conducted trafficking investigations, save one, have left the office.

So what is the bottom line? Impunity. After an expose in a major U.S. newspaper, a DoD Inspector General investigation confirming the trafficking allegations, and a congressional hearing, not a single contractor has been terminated, and not a single criminal prosecution is underway. Indeed, it appears that many of the subcontractors implicated in the scandal continue to enjoy DoD subcontracts in Iraq. The U.S. military, after the issuance of General Casey's order, seems to have declared victory. I see no evidence that would support such a claim.

So let me tell you, in the inimitable words of Paul Harvey, the rest of the story. Through the efforts of the Chicago Tribune reporter, Cam Simpson, the families of the murdered Nepalese trafficking victims found pro bono counsel in the United States. The attorneys filed for a death benefit under the Defense Base Act, which requires all contractors and subcontractors to carry insurance for their employees who perform work overseas. The Department of Labor processed the claims quickly, and attempted to facilitate the insurer's payment of death benefits to the families in Nepal. The insurer, however, has refused to pay the families. Three years after the trafficking and brutal murders of these workers, their families have yet to receive any compensation whatsoever from the United States.

In January 2006, Ambassador Miller of the State Department Trafficking in Persons Office told the Chicago Tribune "Our view is that the U.S. contractor has to take responsibility." But three years later, no one has taken responsibility. Three years later, the victims' families remain strapped by the original debts they incurred to send their relatives abroad.

This impunity is just business as usual for the Department of Defense on trafficking issues.

Take the case of Bosnia & Herzegovina.

III. Impunity for Contractors and Trafficking in Women and Girls to Post-Conflict Bosnia and Herzegovina for Forced Prostitution.

The case of trafficking into post-conflict Bosnia & Herzegovina is the poster child for impunity for U.S. defense contractors. Deputy Principal Inspector General Thomas Gimble, testifying in June 2006 about the lack of prosecutions in Iraq, stated: It's kind of the same thing, as you recall, back in the Bosnia issue where they had the prostitution ring back in 2002 that we had reported. . . . We referred that back to the local jurisdictions over there, and I'm not sure whether they ever investigated or prosecuted or not. . . ."

There was neither an investigation, nor a single prosecution. Nor was this a simple "prostitution ring." In a three-year investigation I conducted for Human Rights Watch, researchers uncovered at least eight cases of U.S. personnel who allegedly bought trafficked women and girls. Despite these purchases of human beings as chattel, no prosecutions occurred in Bosnia or the United States. In four of the cases, the individuals were State Department contractors, and beyond the reach of MEJA. In the other four cases, the contractors were whisked out of the country before local Bosnian law enforcement could intervene. Even if the local authorities had wanted to prosecute the Americans, which they did not, it would have been impossible to do so. The alleged perpetrators had fled.

The allegations came to light after two whistleblowers, one a State Department contractor serving as an International Police Task Force officer with the United Nations Mission in Bosnia & Herzegovina, and the second a DoD contractor serving at Eagle Base, came forward. Both whistleblowers were then fired by their employer, DynCorp.

In all, Ben Johnston, the DoD whistleblower, identified eight DynCorp employees who allegedly admitted to him that they had purchased women and girls from brothels in 1999 and 2000. Some had used the women for sexual services and as domestic servants in their local housing units. A U.S. Army Criminal Investigation Command investigation confirmed some of the allegations, and several DynCorp employees were repatriated as a result of the investigation.

Kathryn Bolkovac, the Department of State contractor who raised public allegations of trafficking, did so after one of her fellow American police officers confessed that he had purchased a woman and her passport from a local brothel. In testimony before Congress in 2002, Robert Gifford of the State Department Bureau for International Narcotics and Law Enforcement Affairs testified that six U.S. police officers had been sent home from Bosnia and Herzegovina for "sexual misconduct."

In separate lawsuits for wrongful termination, the two whistleblowers accused the company of retaliating against them for reporting that their colleagues had purchased women and girls from brothels and nightclubs. The alleged purchasers confessed and returned to the United States. They were not prosecuted.

The trafficking victims in Bosnia & Herzegovina, most of whom hailed from Ukraine, Romania, and Moldova, never anticipated that they would be forced into prostitution in Bosnia & Herzegovina. Promised lucrative jobs in Europe in the entertainment, service, or sex industries, the women and girls instead found themselves trapped in debt bondage, stripped of their passports, and forced to provide sexual services to truck drivers, local police officers, and peacekeepers alike. Corrupt Bosnian police officers colluded with traffickers and brothel owners to prevent the women's escape.

Again, as in Iraq, the DoD Inspector General confirmed that the allegations of trafficking were credible. In a report on Bosnia and Kosovo, published in December 2003, the IG concluded that the information the inspectors were able to collect in the field "suggests that DoD contractor employees may have more than a limited role in human trafficking. We were unable to gather more evidence of it precisely because there are no requirements and no procedures in place compelling contractors to gather such information regarding their employees or to report it to U.S. military authorities."

This lack of transparency, which continues four years later, guarantees impunity for contractors who engage in trafficking.

IV. Civil Remedies for Trafficking Victims, Including Domestic Workers Trafficked into the United States by Diplomats.

On January 18, 2007, the ACLU Women's Rights Project filed a complaint in federal court in the District of Columbia. Three Indian women plaintiffs brought the suit against a Kuwaiti military attache and the Embassy of Kuwait in Washington, D.C. for trafficking the women into forced labor in violation of 18 U.S.C. S. 1590. The plaintiffs, who had been "forced to work as domestic employees and childcare providers against their will," rooted their complaint in part on the civil remedies authorized under the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2003 (TVPRA), 18 U.S.C. S. 1595. They brought additional claims for relief under the Thirteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution, the Fair Labor Standards Act, contract theory, fraud, false imprisonment, assault, and battery. According to the complaint, the plaintiffs toiled seven days a week, sixteen to nineteen hours per day, and received less than fifty cents per hour. Until they escaped by running to a neighbor's house, the women alleged, the diplomat and his wife threatened them, refused to allow them to leave the house, subjected them to slavery-like conditions, and physically abused one of the women on numerous occasions.

I raise this case for three reasons. First, it is likely that the defendants will raise a defense of diplomatic immunity, as numerous defendants have done in the past in the face of similar suits by domestic workers. Should that immunity be allowed to shield the defendants from these allegations of slavery-like practices, they will enjoy complete impunity. The federal district court, should defendants prevail on an immunity claim, would dismiss the civil suit, leaving these victims without any remedy.

Second, these victims, counter-intuitively, are among the lucky ones: they have lawyers. Most do not. The need for legal services for trafficking victims in the United States is revealed by the dearth of civil trafficking cases brought in U.S. federal courts since the creation of the civil right of action in the TVPRA (2003). The Attorney General reported to Congress that between 2001 and the end of 2005 the U.S. government charged 248 defendants with trafficking offenses and convicted 140.22 And although 841 victims have received trafficking victim certifications and letters of eligibility from the Department of Health and Human Services in the same time period, trafficking victims brought fewer than twenty civil trafficking suits under 18 U.S.C. S. 1595. And although the U.S. government has achieved restitution for victims in criminal cases under the mandatory restitution provision, 18 U.S.C. S. 1593, it is unclear how often victims actually receive any of those funds.

Finally, I raise this case because those trafficked into domestic servitude in the United States, and particularly those trafficked by diplomats, are among the most invisible trafficking victims in our country. And yet, as Colbert King pointed out in an op ed published in The Washington Post, enslavement of domestic workers by diplomats occurs within just a few miles of the White House.

And, more often than not, the diplomats enjoy impunity.

V. CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

In the eternal words of the philosopher Nikolai G. Chernyshevsky, "what is to be done?" On the Department of Defense contractor front, I would propose the following concrete reforms:

-- Conduct thorough investigations and, where appropriate, bring indictments for trafficking into forced labor or forced prostitution by contractors and military personnel serving abroad. The Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act has been used only twice to bring prosecutions in the United States. Neither of those cases has involved allegations of trafficking. Without investigations by trained personnel, and without protections for victims, contractors will continue to enjoy impunity in the face of credible trafficking allegations. With zero prosecutions, zero tolerance has zero credibility.

-- Create an extension of the T-visa regime to permit victims trafficked by contractors or military personnel abroad to come to the United States to testify, and to remain in the United States as holders of T-visas. At the present time, victims trafficked by a U.S. contractor or military personnel abroad cannot enter the United States to testify and obtain benefits as trafficking victims. If the U.S. is to attempt prosecutions in such cases, the victims of these crimes must be brought into the United States and afforded the same protections and benefits as victims trafficked into the United States.

-- Amend the UCMJ to explicitly criminalize trafficking in persons. The 2005 amendment to the Manual for Courts-Martial only criminalizes "patronizing a prostitute." It is necessary to add a provision explicitly criminalizing all forms of trafficking, particularly trafficking for forced labor.

-- Mandate that the Attorney General's Report on U.S. Government Activities to Combat Trafficking in Persons include a report card on Department of Defense Activities. The Department of Defense has been woefully absent from this annual report card. The DoD's implementation of the zero tolerance policy must be held up to public scrutiny. The report should include the amount of funding budgeted for trafficking in persons activities. The DoD budget currently has no line item dedicated to combating human trafficking. In addition, the report to Congress should include data on debarments, terminations, and other adverse contracting outcomes related to trafficking, as authorized under the Federal Acquisition Regulations (FAR) and Defense Federal Acquisition Regulations Supplement (DFARS) anti-trafficking provisions.

-- Train Military criminal investigators and prosecutors to use existing provisions in the Uniform Code of Military Justice, the Manual for Courts-Martial, and the Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act to identify and prosecute human trafficking cases. The House Armed Services Committee Report for the FY07 DOD Authorization Act (H.R. 5122; Report 109-452, pp. 316-317) mandates that the Department of Defense carry out this training.

-- Ensure that the Department of Defense focuses on all forms of human trafficking, and not just trafficking for forced prostitution. The Department of Defense has evidenced a tendency to conflate prostitution with trafficking. Training modules designed for dissemination among soldiers focus almost entirely on reducing demand for sexual services, ignoring the need to provide training on trafficking for forced labor. This myopic approach is particularly problematic in light of the allegations raised in the Chicago Tribune series.

-- Investigate the lack of compensation for the executed Nepalese victims of trafficking under the Defense Base Act.

On the civil remedies front, I would recommend the following:

-- Request a GAO study into the incidence and prevalence of trafficking by diplomats in the United States. Such a study would include interviews with trafficking victims, their civil attorneys and case workers, and the relevant Department of State and Department of Justice personnel. Questions would include how many cases have been registered by the Department of State, and how many investigations launched by the Department of Justice.

-- Increase funding for legal services to trafficking victims to pursue civil remedies and enforce criminal restitution orders. Despite efforts by the private bar to train civil attorneys to undertake these cases on a pro bono basis, service providers form the core of legal representation for victims. Even when service provider staff attorneys farm cases out for pro bono representation, they must still monitor and supervise the cases. Increasing funding to support staff attorney positions is vital.

-- Mandate that the Attorney General's Report on U.S. Government Activities to Combat Trafficking in Persons include a report card on trafficking victims' access to civil remedies, as well as the U.S. government response to trafficking by diplomats. The current report makes absolutely no mention of trafficking by diplomats. Nor does the report currently track the use of 18 U.S.C. S. 1595 or collection rates under the mandatory restitution provisions of S. 1593. These items should be added to the report to Congress.

In closing, I can only point to the theme running through my remarks today: impunity. Ultimately, holding traffickers accountable for these horrible human rights violations can only be done when their victims are safe, secure, and able to rebuild their lives. By focusing on the human rights and fundamental needs of the victims, we can close off the zones of impunity in which the traffickers thrive.

Again, thank you for inviting me to testify today. I would be happy to answer any questions that you might have concerning the issues raised here today.

LOAD-DATE: March 27, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

COMMITTEE: SENATE JUDICIARY

SUBCOMMITTEE: HUMAN RIGHTS AND THE LAW

H.R. 5122 Retrieve Bill Tracking Report
 Retrieve Full Text of Bill

TESTIMONY-BY: MARTINA E. VANDENBERG, ATTORNEY

AFFILIATION: JENNER & BLOCK LLP

278 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

March 26, 2007 Monday 6:42 AM EST

JENNER & BLOCK ATTORNEY VANDENBERG TESTIFIES ON LEGAL OPTIONS TO STOP HUMAN TRAFFICKING

BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 5450 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The Senate Judiciary Committee issued the following testimony:

Prepared Statement of Martina E. Vandenberg, J.D. Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Human Rights "Legal Options to Stop Human Trafficking"

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Subcommittee:

It is an honor to testify before you today on a grave violation of human rights, trafficking in persons. My name is Martina Vandenberg, and I am an attorney in private practice with the firm of Jenner & Block. I am the author of two reports on trafficking in persons: Hopes Betrayed: Trafficking in Women and Girls to Post-Conflict Bosnia and Herzegovina for Forced Prostitution, published by Human Rights Watch, and Trafficking of Women to Israel for Forced Prostitution, published by the Israel Women's Network. I also represent trafficking victims pro bono in civil suits against their traffickers here in the United States.

I would like to thank Senator Durbin and the members of the Subcommittee for convening this hearing. The panel today provides a rare opportunity to identify gaps in the United States government's implementation of international human rights norms in the area of trafficking in persons.

Traffickers often flourish because they operate in zones of lawlessness and impunity. Over the past decade, Congress, the executive branch, and non-governmental organizations have worked together to develop innovative criminal and civil remedies to assist victims and bring traffickers to justice. But gaps do still exist, and traffickers continue to operate with impunity within these lacunae.

I would like to focus this afternoon on three concrete trafficking cases that illustrate these gaps. I will begin with the human rights norms -- the substantive international law on trafficking. I will then turn to the case studies: one in Iraq, one in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and one right here in the Washington, D.C. suburbs.

I. International Law

Trafficking in persons is a gruesome human rights violation, which traps men, women, and children in debt bondage, forced labor, and forced prostitution. Article 3(a) of the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, defines trafficking as the recruitment, transportation, transfer, harboring or receipt of persons, by the threat or use of force or any other means, for the purpose of exploitation.¹ The Protocol, while fundamentally an international crime control cooperation treaty, nevertheless includes protections for victims of trafficking. The inclusion of these provisions merely reflects that states have a duty to protect and provide remedies to victims who have suffered violations of their most fundamental human rights.² Specifically, the Protocol presses states to provide appropriate shelter for victims; counseling and information in a language the victim can understand; medical, psychological, and material assistance; witness protection; and the possibility of obtaining compensation.³

Research by Human Rights Watch and other human rights organizations has shown that historically, states have treated victims of trafficking as illegal migrants, criminals, or both, often detaining them, prosecuting them, and then summarily deporting them. Protection of victims, and the creation of visa regimes to permit victims to remain legally in countries of destination, is a fairly recent phenomenon. And while the model adopted by the international community has tended to focus largely on law enforcement measures, some countries, including the United States, have opted for a victim-centered approach. It would be too far a stretch to characterize this as a "rights-based" approach, unfortunately.

Obtaining a special trafficking victim visa, or T-visa, in the United States still requires cooperation with law enforcement. But the steps that have been taken do go some distance toward eliminating what Ann Jordan, director of the Global Rights Initiative Against Trafficking in Persons and one of the leading experts on trafficking in persons, once dubbed "the disposable witness syndrome." Victims cannot be used, and then abandoned. Victims must be viewed as individuals with human rights, and not as mere tools for states to obtain trafficking convictions in order to avoid landing on the State Department Trafficking In Persons report's tier III. At a minimum, victims must have witness protection, without which they cannot safely testify against those who perpetrated these crimes. This is particularly true in light of the crucial role played by official corruption, both in countries of origin and countries of destination. Without protections and services for victims, impunity for traffickers will remain the rule.

I offer these case studies to illustrate the gaps in the United States' own legal regime, in the hope that these gaps can be plugged with legislation or enhanced political will.

II. Impunity for Trafficking of Persons into Iraq for Forced Labor

On August 19, 2004, insurgents kidnapped twelve Nepalese men traveling on the road from Amman to Baghdad. All twelve were executed on August 31, 2004. An intrepid Chicago Tribune reporter, Cam Simpson, launched an investigation into the events leading up to their abduction and deaths. The Chicago Tribune series, "Pipeline to Peril," uncovered a trafficking network stretching from the remote mountains of Katmandu to U.S. military bases in Iraq.⁴ The chain began with recruiters in the men's villages, who promised the workers lucrative jobs in five-star hotels in Jordan. In exchange for facilitating these job opportunities, the recruiters demanded upfront payments amounting to nearly one year's wages for an average Nepali. The Nepalese men's families borrowed heavily to advance the funds, in some cases mortgaging the family farm.

The recruiters delivered the men to a Jordanian company in Amman, which demanded additional payment for placement services. The company held the men in apartments and did not provide the promised jobs in Jordanian luxury hotels. Instead, the Nepalese workers found themselves transferred into the hands of yet another Jordanian company, which provided their transportation into Iraq in an unguarded convoy. Upon arrival in Iraq, the traffickers intended to hand the workers off to a third Jordanian company, a subcontractor to Kellogg, Brown, & Root (KBR). Insurgents killed the Nepalese workers before they began their employment with the KBR subcontractor.

The meticulously researched Chicago Tribune series did not constitute the first allegation of trafficking for forced labor in U.S. military bases in Iraq. Indeed, at a joint issues forum cohosted by the House Armed Services Committee and the Helsinki Commission in September 2004, Senator Clinton questioned the Department of Defense Inspector General about a story in The Washington Post reporting labor violations against third country nationals in Iraq.⁵

In the wake of the Chicago Tribune series, the Department of Defense (DoD) Office of the Inspector General launched an investigation. On April 14, 2006, in a memorandum to the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness, Thomas Gimble, the Principal Deputy DoD Inspector General, reported that he "found no reason to question the sequence or accuracy of events outlined in the Chicago Tribune articles published October 9 and 10, 2005." The memorandum also confirmed that "[s]ome of the Nepalese [men] clearly felt they had been deceived about their place of employment (Iraq versus Jordan)."⁶

But, troublingly, the memorandum concluded that "while it would appear that some foreign-based companies are using false pretenses to provide laborers to KBR/Halliburton subcontractors in Iraq, we must note that none of the allegations in the Chicago Tribune articles are against U.S. persons or U.S. contractors." There is no indication that the DoD Inspector General delved into the issue of criminal complicity by U.S. persons or contractors. Indeed, there is no hint of any investigation whatsoever into involvement by U.S. contractors in a criminal conspiracy. Instead, the DoD conflated criminal and civil law principles, finding that "[t]here are no privities of contract between DoD and the foreign companies allegedly guilty of these trafficking practices; therefore, the U.S. has no jurisdiction over the persons or the offenses."⁷

This statement is simply incorrect as a matter of law. Under the Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act of 2000, the United States does have criminal jurisdiction over felonies committed abroad by U.S. DoD contractors. Congressman John McHugh questioned Gimble on precisely this issue in a joint hearing convened by the House Armed Services

Committee Subcommittee on Military Personnel in June 2006.⁸ Gimble's responses point to a level of superficiality in both the DoD Inspector General's analysis and investigation. Responding to Congressman McHugh's question on why the U.S. government did not attempt a criminal prosecution under the Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act of 2000 (MEJA), Gimble stated:

[T]here [were] no clauses in the contract, and these were not U.S. contracts. So we didn't think we had the authority to go down into those. So far as prosecution, that probably should go back into the local - the Iraqi government should be the one prosecuting the murders on that.⁹

The issue, however, was not the prosecution of the killings, but the criminal prosecution of the underlying trafficking offenses. And on that issue, the DoD Inspector General's analysis was inadequate for two reasons. First, while these twelve Nepalese workers did not make it to the U.S. base in Iraq, between 35,000 and 48,000 third country nationals did. It is clear that some fraction of that work force suffered the same trafficking abuses as the twelve Nepalese men who died. Colonel Boyles, formerly of Joint Contracting Command Iraq, testified at the June 2006 hearing that he had to force contractors to comply with General Casey's order to return passports to third country nationals by May 1, 2006.¹⁰ Boyles told the members of Congress present at the joint hearing that gaining compliance from contractors withholding third country nationals' passports was "like pulling teeth."¹¹ And while the DoD Inspector General apparently interviewed 850 third country nationals in Iraq, no one from the Department of Defense at the joint hearing answered a fundamental question posed by Congressman Chris Smith. Congressman Smith asked, "the real question is, was there any knowledge that American contractors or members of the military had knowledge of the trafficking that was taking place by the subcontractors?"¹² That question, the key to a criminal prosecution, remains unanswered.

The lack of an investigation into that question reflects a problem identified by Dr. Sarah Mendelson of the Center for Strategic and International Studies in her report, Barracks and Brothels. Dr. Mendelson observed the Inspector General's formal investigation in 2003 into complicity of DoD personnel in the Balkans, and concluded that the investigation was "superficial and pro forma." She wrote: "Had DoD personnel followed the leads they were given, they would have found evidence of civilian contractor complicity in human trafficking." They did not pursue those leads, nor did they meet with non-governmental organizations or trafficking victims.¹³

And even if the IG had asked the right questions and pursued all available leads in 2003, that institutional memory is gone. All of the IG staff members who have conducted trafficking investigations, save one, have left the office.

So what is the bottom line? Impunity. After an exposé in a major U.S. newspaper, a DoD Inspector General investigation confirming the trafficking allegations, and a congressional hearing, not a single contractor has been terminated, and not a single criminal prosecution is underway. Indeed, it appears that many of the subcontractors implicated in the scandal continue to enjoy DoD subcontracts in Iraq. The U.S. military, after the issuance of General Casey's order, seems to have declared victory. I see no evidence that would support such a claim.

So let me tell you, in the inimitable words of Paul Harvey, the rest of the story. Through the efforts of the Chicago Tribune reporter, Cam Simpson, the families of the murdered Nepalese trafficking victims found pro bono counsel in the United States. The attorneys filed for a death benefit under the Defense Base Act, which requires all contractors and subcontractors to carry insurance for their employees who perform work overseas. The Department of Labor processed the claims quickly, and attempted to facilitate the insurer's payment of death benefits to the families in Nepal. The insurer, however, has refused to pay the families. Three years after the trafficking and brutal murders of these workers, their families have yet to receive any compensation whatsoever from the United States.¹⁴

In January 2006, Ambassador Miller of the State Department Trafficking in Persons Office told the Chicago Tribune "Our view is that the U.S. contractor has to take responsibility."¹⁵ But three years later, no one has taken responsibility. Three years later, the victims' families remain strapped by the original debts they incurred to send their relatives abroad.

This impunity is just business as usual for the Department of Defense on trafficking issues.

Take the case of Bosnia & Herzegovina.

III. Impunity for Contractors and Trafficking in Women and Girls to Post-Conflict

Bosnia and Herzegovina for Forced Prostitution.

The case of trafficking into post-conflict Bosnia & Herzegovina is the poster child for impunity for U.S. defense contractors. Deputy Principal Inspector General Thomas Gimble, testifying in June 2006 about the lack of prosecutions in Iraq, stated: It's kind of the same thing, as you recall, back in the Bosnia issue where they had the prostitution ring back in 2002 that we had reported?. We referred that back to the local jurisdictions over there, and I'm not sure whether they ever investigated or prosecuted or not?"

There was neither an investigation, nor a single prosecution. Nor was this a simple "prostitution ring." In a three-year investigation I conducted for Human Rights Watch, researchers uncovered at least eight cases of U.S. personnel who allegedly bought trafficked women and girls.¹⁶ Despite these purchases of human beings as chattel, no prosecutions occurred in Bosnia or the United States. In four of the cases, the individuals were State Department contractors, and beyond the reach of MEJA. In the other four cases, the contractors were whisked out of the country before local Bosnian law enforcement could intervene. Even if the local authorities had wanted to prosecute the Americans, which they did not, it would have been impossible to do so. The alleged perpetrators had fled.¹⁷

The allegations came to light after two whistleblowers, one a State Department contractor serving as an International Police Task Force officer with the United Nations Mission in Bosnia & Herzegovina, and the second a DoD contractor serving at Eagle Base, came forward. Both whistleblowers were then fired by their employer, DynCorp.

In all, Ben Johnston, the DoD whistleblower, identified eight DynCorp employees who allegedly admitted to him that they had purchased women and girls from brothels in 1999 and 2000. ¹⁸ Some had used the women for sexual services and as domestic servants in their local housing units. A U.S. Army Criminal Investigation Command investigation confirmed some of the allegations, and several DynCorp employees were repatriated as a result of the investigation.

Kathryn Bolkovac, the Department of State contractor who raised public allegations of trafficking, did so after one of her fellow American police officers confessed that he had purchased a woman and her passport from a local brothel. In testimony before Congress in 2002, Robert Gifford of the State Department Bureau for International Narcotics and Law Enforcement Affairs testified that six U.S. police officers had been sent home from Bosnia and Herzegovina for "sexual misconduct."¹⁹

In separate lawsuits for wrongful termination, the two whistleblowers accused the company of retaliating against them for reporting that their colleagues had purchased women and girls from brothels and nightclubs. The alleged purchasers confessed and returned to the United States. They were not prosecuted.

The trafficking victims in Bosnia & Herzegovina, most of whom hailed from Ukraine, Romania, and Moldova, never anticipated that they would be forced into prostitution in Bosnia & Herzegovina. Promised lucrative jobs in Europe in the entertainment, service, or sex industries, the women and girls instead found themselves trapped in debt bondage, stripped of their passports, and forced to provide sexual services to truck drivers, local police officers, and peacekeepers alike. Corrupt Bosnian police officers colluded with traffickers and brothel owners to prevent the women's escape.

Again, as in Iraq, the DoD Inspector General confirmed that the allegations of trafficking were credible. In a report on Bosnia and Kosovo, published in December 2003, the IG concluded that the information the inspectors were able to collect in the field "suggests that DoD contractor employees may have more than a limited role in human trafficking. We were unable to gather more evidence of it precisely because there are no requirements and no procedures in place compelling contractors to gather such information regarding their employees or to report it to U.S. military authorities."²⁰

This lack of transparency, which continues four years later, guarantees impunity for contractors who engage in trafficking.

IV. Civil Remedies for Trafficking Victims, Including Domestic Workers Trafficked into the United States by Diplomats.

On January 18, 2007, the ACLU Women's Rights Project filed a complaint in federal court in the District of Columbia.²¹ Three Indian women plaintiffs brought the suit against a Kuwaiti military attaché and the Embassy of Kuwait in Washington, D.C. for trafficking the women into forced labor in violation of 18 U.S.C. ? 1590. The plaintiffs, who had been "forced to work as domestic employees and childcare providers against their will," rooted their complaint in part on the civil remedies authorized under the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2003 (TVPRA), 18 U.S.C. ? 1595. They brought additional claims for relief under the Thirteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution, the Fair Labor Standards Act, contract theory, fraud, false imprisonment, assault, and battery. According to the complaint, the plaintiffs toiled seven days a week, sixteen to nineteen hours per day, and received less than fifty cents per hour. Until they escaped by running to a neighbor's house, the women alleged, the diplomat and his wife threatened them, refused to allow them to leave the house, subjected them to slavery-like conditions, and physically abused one of the women on numerous occasions.

I raise this case for three reasons. First, it is likely that the defendants will raise a defense of diplomatic immunity, as numerous defendants have done in the past in the face of similar suits by domestic workers. Should that immunity be allowed to shield the defendants from these allegations of slavery-like practices, they will enjoy complete impunity. The federal district court, should defendants prevail on an immunity claim, would dismiss the civil suit, leaving these victims without any remedy.

Second, these victims, counter-intuitively, are among the lucky ones: they have lawyers. Most do not. The need for legal services for trafficking victims in the United States is revealed by the dearth of civil trafficking cases brought in U.S. federal courts since the creation of the civil right of action in the TVPRA (2003). The Attorney General reported to Congress that between 2001 and the end of 2005 the U.S. government charged 248 defendants with trafficking offenses and convicted 140.²² And although 841 victims have received trafficking victim certifications and letters of eligibility from the Department of Health and Human Services in the same time period, 23 trafficking victims brought fewer than twenty civil trafficking suits under 18 U.S.C. ? 1595.²⁴ And although the U.S. government has achieved restitution for victims in criminal cases under the mandatory restitution provision, 18 U.S.C. ? 1593, it is unclear how often victims actually receive any of those funds.

Finally, I raise this case because those trafficked into domestic servitude in the United States, and particularly those trafficked by diplomats, are among the most invisible trafficking victims in our country. And yet, as Colbert King pointed out in an op ed published in The Washington Post, enslavement of domestic workers by diplomats occurs within just a few miles of the White House.²⁵

And, more often than not, the diplomats enjoy impunity.²⁶

V. CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

In the eternal words of the philosopher Nikolai G. Chernyshevsky, "what is to be done?" On the Department of Defense contractor front, I would propose the following concrete reforms:

*Conduct thorough investigations and, where appropriate, bring indictments for trafficking into forced labor or forced prostitution by contractors and military personnel serving abroad. The Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act has been used only twice to bring prosecutions in the United States. Neither of those cases has involved allegations of trafficking. Without investigations by trained personnel, and without protections for victims, contractors will continue to enjoy impunity in the face of credible trafficking allegations. With zero prosecutions, zero tolerance has zero credibility.

*Create an extension of the T-visa regime to permit victims trafficked by contractors or military personnel abroad to come to the United States to testify, and to remain in the United States as holders of T-visas. At the present time, victims trafficked by a U.S. contractor or military personnel abroad cannot enter the United States to testify and obtain benefits as trafficking victims. If the U.S. is to attempt prosecutions in such cases, the victims of these crimes must be brought into the United States and afforded the same protections and benefits as victims trafficked into the United States.

*Amend the UCMJ to explicitly criminalize trafficking in persons. The 2005 amendment to the Manual for Courts-Martial only criminalizes "patronizing a prostitute."²⁷ It is necessary to add a provision explicitly criminalizing all forms of trafficking, particularly trafficking for forced labor.²⁸

*Mandate that the Attorney General's Report on U.S. Government Activities to Combat Trafficking in Persons include a report card on Department of Defense Activities. The Department of Defense has been woefully absent from this annual report card. The DoD's implementation of the zero tolerance policy must be held up to public scrutiny. The report should include the amount of funding budgeted for trafficking in persons activities. The DoD budget currently has no line item dedicated to combating human trafficking. In addition, the report to Congress should include data on debarments, terminations, and other adverse contracting outcomes related to trafficking, as authorized under the Federal Acquisition Regulations (FAR) and Defense Federal Acquisition Regulations Supplement (DFARS) anti-trafficking provisions.²⁹

*Train Military criminal investigators and prosecutors to use existing provisions in the Uniform Code of Military Justice, the Manual for Courts-Martial, and the Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act to identify and prosecute human trafficking cases. The House Armed Services Committee Report for the FY07 DOD Authorization Act (H.R. 5122; Report 109-452, pp. 316-317) mandates that the Department of Defense carry out this training.

*Ensure that the Department of Defense focuses on all forms of human trafficking, and not just trafficking for forced prostitution. The Department of Defense has evidenced a tendency to conflate prostitution with trafficking. Training modules designed for dissemination among soldiers focus almost entirely on reducing demand for sexual services, ignoring the need to provide training on trafficking for forced labor. This myopic approach is particularly problematic in light of the allegations raised in the Chicago Tribune series.

*Investigate the lack of compensation for the executed Nepalese victims of trafficking under the Defense Base Act.

On the civil remedies front, I would recommend the following:

*Request a GAO study into the incidence and prevalence of trafficking by diplomats in the United States. Such a study would include interviews with trafficking victims, their civil attorneys and case workers, and the relevant Department of State and Department of Justice personnel. Questions would include how many cases have been registered by the Department of State, and how many investigations launched by the Department of Justice.

*Increase funding for legal services to trafficking victims to pursue civil remedies and enforce criminal restitution orders. Despite efforts by the private bar to train civil attorneys to undertake these cases on a pro bono basis, service providers form the core of legal representation for victims. Even when service provider staff attorneys farm cases out for pro bono representation, they must still monitor and supervise the cases. Increasing funding to support staff attorney positions is vital.

*Mandate that the Attorney General's Report on U.S. Government Activities to Combat Trafficking in Persons include a report card on trafficking victims' access to civil remedies, as well as the U.S. government response to trafficking by diplomats. The current report makes absolutely no mention of trafficking by diplomats. Nor does the report currently track the use of 18 U.S.C. § 1595 or collection rates under the mandatory restitution provisions of § 1593. These items should be added to the report to Congress.

In closing, I can only point to the theme running through my remarks today: impunity. Ultimately, holding traffickers accountable for these horrible human rights violations can only be done when their victims are safe, secure, and able to rebuild their lives. By focusing on the human rights and fundamental needs of the victims, we can close off the zones of impunity in which the traffickers thrive.

Again, thank you for inviting me to testify today. I would be happy to answer any questions that you might have concerning the issues raised here today.

1 Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, G.A. Res. 55/25, annex II, U.N. Doc. A/RES/55/25 (November 2, 2000) [also referred to as the Palermo Protocol]. The Trafficking Protocol supplements the United Nations Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime, G.A. Res. 55/25, annex I, U.N. Doc. A/RES/55/25 (November 2, 2000). The Trafficking Protocol, to which the United States became a state party on December 3, 2005, entered into force on December 25, 2003.

2 For a full discussion of the Protocol and trafficking prevention generally, see Janie Chuang, "Beyond a Snapshot: Preventing Human Trafficking in the Global Economy," Indiana Journal of Global Legal Studies, Vol. 13, Issue 1 (Winter 2006). See also Global Rights, The Complete Annotated Guide to the U.N. Trafficking Protocol, available at http://www.globalrights.org/site/DocServer/Annotated_Protocol.pdf?docID=2723 (accessed March 22, 2007).

3 Trafficking Protocol, Article 6.

4 Cam Simpson, "Pipeline to Peril," The Chicago Tribune, October 9-10, 2005, available at http://www.chicagotribune.com/news/specials/chi-nepal-specialpackage,1,3634847.special?coll=chi_newsspecialshed (accessed March 22, 2007)

5 Ariana Eunjung Cha, "Iraq: Many Foreign Laborers Receive Inferior Pay, Food and Shelter," The Washington Post, July 1, 2004. At a joint issue forum held on September 21, 2004, Senator Clinton asked, "[T]his past July and August, there were press reports indicating that subcontractors on DoD subcontracts may have kept Indian laborers in debt bondage?to the Inspector General, will you be considering labor trafficking and debt bondage issues as well as sex trafficking in your inspection process?" "Enforcing U.S. Policies Against Trafficking in Persons: How is the Military Doing?" 108th Congress, 2nd Session, Issue Forum Jointly Convened by the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe and the House Armed Services Committee, September 21, 2004, p. 20.

6 Memorandum to the Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness from Thomas Gimble, Principal Deputy DoD Inspector General, April 14, 2006.

7 Id.

8 "Implementation of Zero-Tolerance for Human Trafficking," 109th Congress, Second Session, House of Representatives Armed Services Committee, Military Personnel Subcommittee Joint Hearing with the House International Relations Committee, Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations Subcommittee on Human Trafficking, June 21, 2006.

9 Id. at 18.

10 MNF-I FRAGO 06-188 (April 2006).

11 Id. at 23.

12 Id. at 36.

13 Sarah E. Mendelson, Barracks & Brothels: Peacekeepers and Human Trafficking in the Balkans, CSIS, February 2005, p. ix.

14 According to the Chicago Tribune, each family received approximately $14,000 from the Nepalese government. Cam Simpson, "Into a War Zone, on a Deadly Road," Chicago Tribune, October 10, 2005.

15 Cam Simpson, "U.S. to Probe Claims of Human Trafficking: Tribune Series on Iraq Abuses Sparked Action," The Chicago Tribune, January 19, 2006.

16 Human Rights Watch documented these cases through Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) requests to the Department of State, interviews with U.N. and U.S. government personnel, review of U.S. Army Criminal Investigation Command incident reports from Bosnia & Herzegovina, and interviews with two U.S. contractor whistleblowers.

17 For a full account of the trafficking allegations in Bosnia & Herzegovina, see Human Rights Watch, Hopes Betrayed: Trafficking in Women and Girls to Post-Conflict Bosnia and Herzegovina for Forced Prostitution, Vol. 14, No. 9(D), p. 66 (November 2002) (available at <http://www.hrw.org/reports/2002/bosnia/>).

18 Testimony of Ben Johnston, "The U.N. and the Sex Slave Trade in Bosnia; Isolated Case or Larger Problem in the U.N. System?" Hearing before the Subcommittee on International Operations and Human Rights of the Committee on International Relations of the House of Representatives, 107th Congress, April 24, 2002, Serial no. 107 85, available at http://commdocs.house.gov/committees/intlrel/hfa78948.000/hfa78948_of.htm.

19 Testimony of Robert Gifford, "The U.N. and the Sex Slave Trade in Bosnia; Isolated Case or Larger Problem in the U.N. System?"

20 Office of the Inspector General, "Assessment of DoD Efforts to Combat Trafficking in Persons: Phase II Bosnia-Herzegovina and Kosovo," December 8, 2003, p. 25.

21 Sabbithi v. Al Saleh, No. 07-cv-00115 (D.D.C. January 18, 2007).

22 Attorney General's Annual Report to Congress on U.S. Government Activities to Combat Trafficking in Persons, Fiscal Year 2005, June 2006, at 16.

23 Id. at 6.

24 Author interview with Daniel Werner, Legal Director, Workers' Rights Law Center of New York, Inc., March 22, 2007. Jennifer Nam, a Columbia Law School student, has compiled a list of fourteen cases filed between December 2004 and January 2007.

25 Colbert I. King, The Slaves in Our Midst, December 23, 2006, available at http://www.washingtonpost.com/wpdyn/content/article/2006/12/22/AR2006122201019.html?nav=rss_opinion/columns (accessed March 22, 2007).

26 See Tabion v. Mufti, 73 F.3d 535 (4th Cir. 1996) (holding that the Vienna Convention barred suit by live in domestic employee against a diplomat and his wife). See also Human Rights Watch, Hidden in the Home: Abuse of Domestic Workers with Special Visas, Vol. 13, No. 2 (G), June 2001, available at <http://www.hrw.org/reports/2001/usadom/> (accessed March 22, 2007).

27 E.O. 13387, signed October 14, 2005.

28 Legal guidance is also required for application of the UCMJ to civilians and contractors in contingency operations, as mandated in the Defense Authorization Act of 2007. PL 109-364.

29 DFARS Case 2004-D017 (October 26, 2006); FAR Case 2005-012 (April 19, 2006).

LOAD-DATE: October 14, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

279 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Washington Times

March 14, 2007 WednesdayBYLINE: By James Morrison, THE WASHINGTON TIMESSECTION: WORLD; EMBASSY ROW; A17LENGTH: 653 words

Modern slavery

The global market for human beings for cheap labor or sex slaves is one of the top money-making rackets for organized crime, Greece's foreign minister told a congressional hearing yesterday.

"Few of us are aware of the shocking reality that human trafficking is the third largest source of revenue for organized crime after arms trade and drug trafficking," Dora Bakoyannis said in a message read to the Congressional Human Trafficking Caucus.

"Indeed, human trafficking is a global problem growing at alarming rates. .. Simply stated, it constitutes a threat to the basic principles and values of our society. .. It is an egregious abuse of human life which cannot be tolerated by any person or government."

Mrs. Bakoyannis, whose message was read by Greek Ambassador Alexandros P. Mallias, said her government has worked with other countries in efforts to protect the victims of human trafficking and provide them with assistance.

"We are proud to note that this has yielded noteworthy results," she said. "Yet more remains to be done. We have a common duty to prevent those who view others as a commodity which can be easily sold to the highest bidder."

The Greek Embassy and Johns Hopkins University's Paul H. Nitze School of Advanced International Studies co-sponsored the briefing, chaired by Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney, New York Democrat and co-chairman of the caucus.

The caucus also heard a report on Greece's efforts to fight the black market in modern slavery from Panagiotis Panouris, secretary-general of the Greek Justice Ministry and chairman of the Hellenic Inter-Ministerial Committee on Trafficking in Persons.

In the State Department's latest report on human trafficking, Greece is listed as a "Tier 2" country, a category that includes nations that are working to bring their laws into compliance with the U.S. Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000.

The worst offenders, the "Tier 3" nations, include: Burma, Cuba, Iran, North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria, Venezuela and Zimbabwe.

Lobby envy

As the Rev. Jesse Jackson says, they throw stones only at the trees with fruit in them. The powerful American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) thinks it knows why it has been the focus of a slew of such attacks in recent days: jealousy.

Correspondent David R. Sands reports that, at the annual Washington policy conference this week, AIPAC Executive Director Howard Kohr told more than 6,000 delegates that critics of the pro-Israel lobby are reviving "old libels our ancestors heard in different lands, at different times" about the loyalties of America's Jews.

A pair of top researchers from Harvard and the University of Chicago issued a scathing report on AIPAC's malign influence on U.S. foreign policy, and former President Jimmy Carter was no less critical in his new Middle East book accusing Israel of pursuing a policy of "apartheid" against the Palestinians.

With turmoil in Iraq and Iran, a summer war with Lebanon and continuing problems with the Palestinians, Mr. Kohr conceded it was a "dangerous moment" for Israel and her supporters. But he said the new criticisms of AIPAC's influence are, in fact, the "voice of frustration."

"Frustration because we are winning the war of ideas," he said. "Frustration because American friends of Israel have the will, resolve and strength to be heard. Frustration because the relationship between America and Israel is strong and growing stronger."

He added, "Our detractors are frustrated by our success, and the only response to them must be continued success."

The slings and arrows aimed at AIPAC did not discourage Washington's power elite from turning out once again for the group's annual get-together. Vice President Dick Cheney, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni all addressed the gathering.

* Call Embassy Row at 202/636-3297, fax 202/832-7278 or e-mail jmorrison@washingtontimes.com.

LOAD-DATE: March 14, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 The Washington Times LLC
All Rights Reserved

280 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Indo-Asian News Service

March 7, 2007 Wednesday 1:44 PM EST

The stark reality of human trafficking in Philippines

BYLINE: Indo-Asian News ServiceLENGTH: 747 wordsDATELINE: Manila

Manila, March 7 -- The modus operandi is almost always the same: sweet-talking recruiters entice parents to allow their young daughters to leave the provinces and work in Manila as domestic helps with promises of huge salaries.

Once the girls arrive in Manila, the story turns sour with many of them ending up as prostitutes. Worse, they are "trained" for "export" to other countries as far as the Middle East.

"Trafficking in the Philippines has two faces - one is for local consumption and the other for abroad," said Cecilia Flores Oebanda, president of Visayan Forum Foundation, an NGO working for the welfare of migrants.

"Women are first recruited to Manila. They are taught how to undress, they are bleached, beautified, then initiated into the sex trade with foreigners as their first customers.

"That's what they call on-the-job training while their papers are fixed for travel abroad," said Oebanda.

As the government and NGOs step up the fight against human trafficking, the lure of a better life, abject poverty and the government's labour export policy still fuel the modern-day slavery. It leads to tens of thousands of Filipinos, mostly women and children, being trafficked every year.

Due to its continued notoriety as a source, transit and destination country for trafficked persons, the Philippines has remained on the US State Department's Tier 2 list of countries that do not fully comply with international standards against human trafficking but are making significant progress to fight the problem.

Oebanda said the Philippine government's continued deployment of Filipino workers as domestic helps around the world exposed women and children to the dangers of trafficking.

She noted that even Filipinos with overseas work permits could end up being trafficked.

"Some of them secure work permits, but is their job really the work that they asked the permit for?" she asked. "We are worried and alarmed that our major source of income is people that we send out as migrants. We lack protective mechanisms and this adds to the vulnerability of people."

Oebanda said recruiters often prey on young women - usually school dropouts looking for jobs.

Gladys, 19, left her home province of Surigao del Norte in the southern Philippines for the central city of Cebu in the hopes of finding a job to help her poor family.

She was recruited by a relative to work as a domestic help but ended up as a waitress in a nightclub frequented by foreign tourists in a red-light district in Cebu.

"I wanted to experience life in a city and how it is like to have a job. I also thought it would be a great help to my parents," said Gladys.

Dressed in skimpy attires every night, she often received indecent proposals from customers who grabbed and touched her without her consent while serving drinks or food.

For three months, the advances escalated, and she feared she would end up like other girls in the bar who not only worked as waitresses but also danced half-naked and offered sexual services.

Unable to stand the exploitation, she approached Visayan Forum and asked for help. She is now undergoing computer training to help her achieve her goal of becoming a teacher.

Other girls are not as lucky as Gladys. In some cases, Visayan Forum has rescued young women locked up in rooms and forced to have sex with as many as 20 men every night.

Even women working as domestic helps also sometimes face sexual abuse from their male bosses.

Elena was only 15 when her parents traded her for 500 pesos ($10) to a recruitment agency in the southern province of Misamis Oriental.

In one of her jobs as domestic helper, Elena was raped repeatedly by her male employer when his wife went on vacation to the US. The abuse continued until she was let go by the couple and returned to the recruitment agency.

"When I asked for help from my recruiter, I was merely told that since I was no longer a virgin, I might as well become a sex worker," she told Visayan Forum. "I was so furious, I escaped, not knowing where I'd end up."

While most of those rescued were grateful for the help, Oebanda said some of the victims had been so hardened by their ordeal that they got angry at social workers like her.

"They see us as getting in their way, that we're taking away their jobs and opportunities," she said. "Some of them even vandalise our shelters. But eventually they appreciate it."

Published by HT Syndication with permission from Indo-Asian News Service.

LOAD-DATE: March 7, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

281 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Frontier Star

February 23, 2007 FridaySOME GROUPS INVOLVED IN SUICIDE ATTACKS TRACED OUT: INTERIOR SECRETARY*LENGTH: 161 words

ISLAMABAD, February 23: Home secretary Syed Kamal Shah has said certain groups involved in suicide attacks in the country have been traced out and government is planning to initiate action against them. He said this while addressing inaugural session of 4-day workshop on human trafficking and later talking to the journalists here Friday.

He announced that red alert will be kept in place following the suicide attacks as the information have been received that more incidents of suicide bombing can take place.

He reiterated government was taking measures on top priority basis to improve law and order situation in the country to avert any untoward incident in the future. Human trafficking has scaled down due to effective steps taken by the government, he said adding country's name has been deleted from Tear to watch list too. Government has devised strategy to curb human trafficking, he told. Interagency task force has been set up in FIA, he added.

LOAD-DATE: May 17, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHDOCUMENT-TYPE: Acts of TerrorPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 The Frontier Star
All Rights Reserved

282 of 445 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Latin America - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

February 21, 2007 Wednesday

Jamaica cabinet approves contract for passenger processing system

LENGTH: 362 words

Text of report by Caribbean Media Corporation news agency website

KINGSTON, Jamaica, CMC - The Jamaica government has approved a US$4.5m contract for the supply and implementation of a common user Passenger Processing System (PPS) for the Norman Manley International Airport. Information and Development Minister, Donald Buchanan said that the system would be supplied by SETA, an international provider of communications and information technology solutions to the transport industry. "The system will provide the means for the Norman Manley International Airport to operate on a new model, which will have a 100 per cent shared system environment, using airport owned and maintained common user passenger processing system, and a common use distribution information network.

"This contrasts with the traditional preparatory airport tenant operating relations, which have existed up to now and which will be discontinued," he added. Buchanan said that the system has been benchmarked against international standards, and would greatly facilitate passengers and other users of the Airport. Meanwhile, Cabinet has received a report from the Human Resource Council on the United Nations Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, especially women and children. Buchanan, speaking to reporters at the end of the weekly Cabinet meeting, said the report would be submitted to the United Nations and the United States Congress for study and action. "One of the anticipated outcomes of the filing of this report with the United States Congress, is that Jamaica, which is now placed in Tier Two in terms of the compliance with the US minimum standards in this area of trafficking in persons, will be changed to Tier One, which is when you are in compliance with all of the minimum standards of the United States," Buchanan said. Recently, both the Senate and the House of Representatives passed the Trafficking in Persons Bill, which provide for the prevention of human trafficking, especially of women and girls, and punish those involved in such acts.

Source: Caribbean Media Corporation news agency website, Bridgetown, in English 2010 gmt 20 Feb 07

LOAD-DATE: February 21, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2007 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

283 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

February 9, 2007 Friday

Ghana; Ghana's Human Trafficking Record Worsens

BYLINE: Public Agenda

LENGTH: 878 words

Ghana has slumped to Tier 2 of the State Department of America's rating of countries with respect to their efforts at combating Trafficking in Persons (TIPs), despite promulgating the Human Trafficking Law (Act 694) in 2005.

Indications are that, in the 2006/2007 edition which is expected to be released in the middle of the year, the State Department will still rate Ghana in Tier 2; regardless of the ongoing sensitization of the Ghanaian populace on the provisions of Act 694, the building of institutional structures and the various capacity building workshops being organized for security personnel.

The development sharply contrasts with what used to pertain in 2004 when, even without a legal framework for combating TIP, except for a bill before the Legislature, Ghana featured prominently in Tier 1 of the State Department's rating.

Reasons to be advanced for Ghana's Tier 2 rating, Public Agenda has learnt, will include the lack of enforcement of the law - there is indeed a law but no prosecution or conviction has taken place.

The matter came to light at the just ended series of workshops organized in Accra by the Legal Resources Centre (LRC) in collaboration with the International Labour Organisation (ILO) for Security Agencies, Policymakers, Judiciary/Legal groups and members of the general public.

What dropping from Tier 1 to Tier 2 simply means is that Ghana is not doing enough to combat human trafficking. Thus, the country's reputation in international circles as a source, transit and destination country for human trafficking has been reaffirmed, some analysts have pointed out in various interviews with this paper.

According to many of them, the situation is not good for the country's image, at least in the eyes of the United States of America, which itself, is conspicuously missing from the rating.

"Placing Ghana in Tier 2 will not be fair to our efforts," an analyst observed.

Like his colleagues, this analyst argued that until 2000, the issue of TIPs was fairly new to Ghanaians in view of our cultural and traditional practices. However, since then things have changed with the promulgation of the law against human trafficking, as well as, many other regulations, all aimed at enhancing human rights standards.

Speaking to Public Agenda on Tuesday on the issue, the National Programme Coordinator of the International Labour Organisation (ILO), Mr. Matthew Dally, noted that prosecutions are hindered by people's unwillingness to give evidence because most of the time cases involve relations. He said TIPs in Ghana is a complex crime, which involves a lot of individuals and groups all through the chain - supply to exploitation.

Mr. Dally explained that many of these cases involve closely related individuals in the sense that, under our cultural and traditional practices, a family may have genuinely given away their children to another family that is well-to-do to assist in catering for them, but sometimes the latter may abuse that goodwill. In such a case it would be difficult for the first family to testify against the latter one.

He therefore called for close attention to be paid to the matter, stressing that it is imperative "to distinguish between fosterage and TIPs."

TIP is ranked as the third most profitable organized crime in the world, after drugs and arms. In West Africa, TIPs is considered as a severe problem in a third of the sub-region, while in Eastern, Central and Southern Africa, it is recognized as a problem in roughly one in three countries, the 2003 UNICEF report says.

It is also estimated that in West Africa, between 200,000 and 800,000 people are trafficked each year. In Ghana, statistics are inconclusive. But the Ghana Statistical Service (GSS) Survey report of 2003 estimated that 20% of Ghanaian children were engaged in child labour and that most child labour situations are linked to internal trafficking.

Various reports have suggested that recruitments are mainly carried out in the northern part of the country, from where victims are transported to the south to work on cocoa farms, small-scale mining and as domestic servants. Other reports, suggest that almost all of the people, especially children who are trafficked to Yeji and other fishing communities along the Volta Lake are recruited from the Central and Western regions.

The Ministry of Women and Children Affairs (MOWAC), which has been tasked to lead the implementation of Act 694 acknowledges the enormity of the problem, and says "the crime is especially pernicious, in that it preys primarily on the most vulnerable - women, children, the poorest and the least educated."

In a statement delivered on her behalf at the LRC - ILO series, the sector Minister, Hon Hajia Alima Mahama catalogued a number of initiatives being undertaken to tackle the menace. "A comprehensive programme for the dissemination of the Human Trafficking Law 2005 is also ongoing. This includes the dissemination of the Law to identified 'sending' and 'receiving' communities in the country. The target groups include the security agencies, chiefs, queen mothers, District Assemblies and opinion leaders in communities concerned."

The Minister however, decried the less than favourable responsiveness from community members, and the general public at large.

LOAD-DATE: February 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

284 of 445 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Latin America - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

January 27, 2007 Saturday

Jamaica senate passes bill to punish persons involved in human trafficking

LENGTH: 290 words

Text of report by Caribbean Media Corporation news agency website

KINGSTON, Jamaica, CMC - Jamaica's Senate on Friday passed a bill aimed at punishing persons involved in human trafficking.

The Trafficking in Persons Act has a novel provision which allows for convicted persons to be ordered by the court to provide restitution to the victims of their crime.

Leader of Government Business in the Senate and Justice Minister A.J. Nicholson boasted that this was the first time in Jamaica that restitution was being introduced under the criminal law.

He said he wanted this to become a trend, noting that those who violate the law should be forced to make some financial contribution to their victims.

Under the bill, which is set to go before the House, parents or guardians who surrender custody of their children for exploitation or for payment or benefit could be charged with an offence.

The passage of the legislation comes even as Jamaica remained on the United States' Special Watch List for trafficking in persons.

With the passage of the bill the Government is hoping that the country's status on human trafficking would be improved when the US State Department's annual report on human trafficking is published in June.

Trafficking in persons contains three components, including the activity itself; travel or movement from one place to another; and the exploitation of the trafficked individual.

Exploitation includes prostitution of a person; compelling or causing a person to provide forced labour; keeping a person in a state of slavery or servitude; engaging the person in any form of sexual exploitation; and the illicit removal of organs.

Source: Caribbean Media Corporation news agency website, Bridgetown, in English 1630 gmt 27 Jan 07

LOAD-DATE: January 27, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

285 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Bangor Daily News (Maine)

January 25, 2007 Thursday
All Editions

Human trafficking a family business?; Wife of current suspect was jailed in '05

BYLINE: JUDY HARRISON OF THE NEWS STAFFSECTION: Pg. B1LENGTH: 306 words

One of the three Canadian men arrested Sunday near the Maine border with two Guyanese nationals and charged with human trafficking has been in court before - when his wife was sentenced for a similar crime in federal court in Bangor.

Byron Murray, 56, John Wayne Richardson, 47, and his son John Jason Richardson, 20, all of St. Stephen, New Brunswick, were arrested Sunday night near a train trestle that crosses the St. Croix River from Monhannes, New Brunswick, to Baileyville, Maine.

Murray stood behind his wife in October 2005 in U.S. District Court in Bangor when she was sentenced to 132 days in jail, or time served, for alien smuggling.

At the sentencing of Savita Singh-Murray, 40, of St. Stephen, New Brunswick, U.S. District Judge John Woodcock raised the question of whether the woman had been involved in human trafficking when she tried to smuggle three illegal aliens from her former homeland, Guyana, into the U.S. at the Calais border crossing in the summer of 2005.

Guyana is a former British colony on the northern coast of South America bordered by Venezuela to the west, Brazil to the south, and Suriname to the east.

The judge sternly admonished Singh-Murray for her involvement with what he suspected was a plot to bring young women into the country to be forced to work as prostitutes. Woodcock said that Guyana is on an international human trafficking watch list.

Fifteen months later, her husband and two other men have been charged with attempting to smuggle two people into the U.S. The three were released on bail Tuesday after an appearance in Provincial Court in St. Stephen, New Brunswick.

The men face maximum sentences of 10 years in prison.

The two Guyanese nationals, Deoranie Ramkissoon and a 17-year-old boy, believed to be the woman's son, were being held Wednesday by the Canada Border Services Agency.

LOAD-DATE: January 25, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

286 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Indo-Asian News Service

January 23, 2007 Tuesday 1:59 PM EST

India on US 'special watch list' for human trafficking

BYLINE: Indo-Asian News ServiceLENGTH: 722 wordsDATELINE: Washington

Washington, Jan 23 -- India figures among 39 countries placed on a US "special watch list" of nations deemed to warrant special scrutiny of their anti-trafficking efforts under a 2003 US law.

The government of India has made some progress in combating its significant problem of human trafficking since the release of a Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report for 2006, the state department said while releasing an interim assessment of these countries for 2007.

However, the government still needs to go further in designating and empowering a national agency or office, specifically tasked with carrying out an effective law enforcement response to trafficking crimes committed throughout India, it said.

Some of these countries could be downgraded to the lowest "Tier 3" - countries whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards under US Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act (TVPRA) of 2003 - in the upcoming June 2007 TIP report if their anti-trafficking efforts this year are determined to be inadequate, it warned.

Besides India, the 2007 interim assessment covers Algeria, Argentina, Armenia, Bahrain, Belize, Bolivia, Brazil, Cambodia, Central African Republic, China, Cyprus, Djibouti, Ecuador, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Finland, Indonesia, Israel, Jamaica, Kenya, Kuwait, Laos, Libya, Macau, Malawi, Malaysia, Mauritania, Mexico, Oman, Peru, Qatar, Russia, Singapore, South Africa, Switzerland, Taiwan, Togo, and the United Arab Emirates.

On India, the interim assessment said that despite estimates of a significant debt bondage situation in the country, New Delhi reported no arrests, prosecutions, or convictions of employers using bonded labour. Similarly, it did not provide evidence of any rescues of bonded labour victims.

India, however, did make moderate progress on addressing child labour between September and November. Delhi Police rescued 140 children working in zari factories and rice mills, but it is unclear how these children have been rehabilitated.

In October, the government also enacted a ban on the employment of children in domestic work or the hospitality industry with penalties including three months to two years incarceration and the possibility of fines, it noted.

Referring to India's anti-trafficking efforts, the interim report said that in September 2006, the Indian government responded to the need for a central anti-trafficking law enforcement effort by creating a two-person federal "nodal cell" responsible for collecting and analysing data of state-level law enforcement efforts.

The cell is responsible for identifying problem areas and analysing the circumstances creating these areas and monitoring action taken by state governments for combating trafficking in these areas. It is also to organise coordination meetings with nodal police officers of the states.

The government has provided significant in-kind contributions to a two-year programme by the US government funded United Nations Office of Drugs and Crime (UNODC) in Maharashtra, Goa, West Bengal, and Andhra Pradesh. The programme focuses on raising the awareness of police and prosecutors on the problem of trafficking and to build their capacity to investigate and prosecute people involved with trafficking, it said.

But law enforcement activity to combat human trafficking remains confined to the state level and continues to be relatively low in comparison to the estimated extent of the situation.

However, in June, two former state ministers in Jammu and Kashmir were arrested for trafficking in minor girls for commercial sexual exploitation, along with other senior government officials. Two traffickers in Delhi were also convicted and sentenced to three and seven years in prison, and another was arrested in August, it said.

In November 2006, the parliamentary committee returned the amendments to the Immoral Trafficking Prevention Act to the ministry of women and child development for revision.

The committee asked the ministry to clarify language, provide a clearer delineation between criminals and victims, prioritise programmes and resources for expanded rehabilitation and reintegration efforts, and recommended passage of the bill with those changes, the interim report noted.

Published by HT Syndication with permission from Indo-Asian News Service.

LOAD-DATE: January 23, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

287 of 445 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Latin America - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

January 22, 2007 Monday

Jamaica and Belize remain on US people-trafficking list

LENGTH: 618 words

Text of report by Caribbean Media Corporation news agency website on 22 January

Washington: Jamaica and Belize are two Caribbean Community (Caricom) countries still included in the United States "Special Watch List" for trafficking in persons for 2007.

The US State Department in its interim assessment of 39 countries worldwide say the two Caricom states warrant special scrutiny of their anti-trafficking efforts, as required by the US Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act (TVPRA) of 2003.

The "Special Watch List" includes countries that have a very significant human trafficking problem, have not shown increased efforts over the last year, or were upgraded in the most recent annual report, the State Department said in a statement released over the weekend.

The State Department said while the Jamaica government has shown "modest progress" in combating trafficking in persons since the release of the 2006 Report, it is yet to demonstrate "concrete" improvements in the areas of prosecuting and convicting trafficking crimes and protecting victims.

"Since April 2006, Jamaican police have raided 27 nightclubs for evidence of trafficking, resulting in the rescue of nine trafficking victims, three of which were between the ages of 13 and 17," the report said.

"Victim protection efforts, however, remain ad hoc and the government has yet to develop or implement a formalised referral system to increase victim identification and prevent the inadvertent prosecution or deportation of victims," it added.

The report said in October 2006, Jamaica established a special committee to review procedures for the granting of work permits, and suspended the granting of work permits for nightclub dancers, which have been used to facilitate some trafficking, but pointed out that requests for dancer permits submitted by hotels, however, are still being granted.

"Despite recent law enforcement progress, Jamaica still has much work to undertake to fully combat trafficking, including vigorously prosecuting and convicting," it said.

The report, however, said Belize, while still on the list, has made "significant progress" in addressing the problem.

It said the government has, since the release of the 2006 Report, increased its law enforcement efforts and arrested two traffickers, advanced "nascent initiatives" to provide care to victims, and continued public awareness efforts.

"In addition, the government Anti-Trafficking in Persons Committee conducted trafficking training for key police officers," the report said.

"With support from the Government of Belize, the tourism industry and End Child Prostitution, Child Pornography, and Trafficking of Children for Sexual Purposes (ECPAT) launched a code of conduct against trafficking for the industry," it said, noting that as of late August 2006, 25 tourism businesses had signed onto the code.

"In addition, the government submitted a proposal to the Inter-American Development Bank for funding to develop and strengthen victim protection protocols," the report added, revealing that the bank has approved the funding, and the Belizean government expects that programming will begin in early 2007.

Besides Jamaica and Belize, the 2007 Interim Assessment covers Algeria, Argentina, Armenia, Bahrain, Bolivia, Brazil, Cambodia, Central African Republic, China, Cyprus, Djibouti, Ecuador, Egypt and Equatorial Guinea.

Others are Finland, India, Indonesia, Israel, Kenya, Kuwait, Laos, Libya, Macau, Malawi, Malaysia, Mauritania, Mexico, Oman, Peru, Qatar, Russia, Singapore, South Africa, Switzerland, Taiwan, Togo, and the United Arab Emirates.

Source: Caribbean Media Corporation news agency website, Bridgetown, in English 1430 gmt 22 Jan 07

LOAD-DATE: January 22, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2007 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

288 of 445 DOCUMENTS

M2 Presswire

January 22, 2007

US DEPT OF STATE: Trafficking in Persons: Interim Assessments

LENGTH: 380 words

M2 PRESSWIRE-JANUARY 22, 2007-US DEPT OF STATE: Trafficking in Persons: Interim Assessments ©1994-2007 M2 COMMUNICATIONS LTD

Today, the State Department released the Interim Assessment of 39 countries on the "Special Watch List" for the current year.

The "Special Watch List" consists of countries deemed to warrant special scrutiny of their anti-trafficking efforts, as required by the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act (TVPRA) of 2003. The "Special Watch List" includes countries that have a very significant human trafficking problem, have not shown increased efforts over the last year, or were upgraded in the most recent annual report.

Some countries on the "Special Watch List" could be downgraded to Tier 3 in the upcoming June 2007 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report if their anti-trafficking efforts this year are determined to be inadequate. The Interim Assessment looks at the efforts of these foreign governments to combat human trafficking and provides guidance on how to avoid a Tier 3 ranking. The Interim Assessment is posted on the State Department's Web site:
<http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/rpt/78948.htm>.

The 2007 Interim Assessment covers: Algeria, Argentina, Armenia, Bahrain, Belize, Bolivia, Brazil, Cambodia, Central African Republic, China (PRC), Cyprus, Djibouti, Ecuador, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Finland, India, Indonesia, Israel, Jamaica, Kenya, Kuwait, Laos, Libya, Macau, Malawi, Malaysia, Mauritania, Mexico, Oman, Peru, Qatar, Russia, Singapore, South Africa, Switzerland, Taiwan, Togo, and the United Arab Emirates.

Seven countries are included because they moved up one tier in 2006. Belize and Laos moved from the Tier 3 to the Tier 2 Watch List in September as the result of a Presidential Determination. Ecuador moved up from Tier 3 in the 2005 TIP Report to Tier 2 in the 2006 TIP Report. Finland, Malawi, Singapore, and Switzerland moved up from Tier 2 to Tier 1 in the same period. The remaining 32 countries were placed in the Tier 2 Watch List in the 2006 TIP Report.

(M2 Communications Ltd disclaims all liability for information provided within M2 PressWIRE. Data supplied by named party/parties. Further information on M2 PressWIRE can be obtained at <http://www.presswire.net> on the world wide web. Inquiries to info@m2.com).

LOAD-DATE: January 22, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: NEWSWIRE

Copyright 2007 M2 Communications Ltd
All rights reserved

289 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

January 22, 2007 Monday

U.S. STATE DEPARTMENT REVIEWS NATIONS' ANTI-TRAFFICKING PROGRESS

BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 648 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. Department of State:

Many countries have made progress in implementing anti-trafficking goals cited in the U.S. State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons report, but some nations need to make greater efforts, according to the department's assessment of 39 countries' anti-trafficking programs.

The State Department January 19 released its Trafficking in Persons Interim Assessment of nations on the department's special watch list. That list includes countries deemed to warrant special scrutiny of their anti-trafficking efforts, as required by the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act (TVPRA) of 2003.

On the list are countries that have significant human-trafficking problems, have not increased efforts over the last year to stop trafficking, or whose efforts were judged as declining in the most recent State Department report. The interim assessment reviews progress made by these countries between May and November 2006.

Among the 39 countries in the interim assessment, Algeria was reported as having not made any progress, while Djibouti, Mauritania, Togo, Malaysia, Egypt, Libya, Qatar, Argentina, Brazil and Peru were reported to have made modest, limited, inadequate or minimal improvements in combating trafficking in persons.

Improved performance was reported for Cambodia, China, Israel, Belize and Bolivia.

THE TIER SYSTEM

Legally mandated to be compiled annually, the June 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report reviewed anti-trafficking efforts in 149 countries and concluded that about 800,000 persons were coerced into human-trafficking schemes over the last year.

The report placed nations in one of four categories based on their efforts to control human trafficking, prosecute those involved and support and assist victims of these crimes. Countries doing the best job are in Tier 1. Tier 2 comprises countries that are demonstrating commitment to address their problems but have not yet achieved international standards.

The Tier 2 Watch List includes countries that show signs of digressing to Tier 3, which is the lowest level. Governments that are not complying with minimum anti-trafficking standards and are not making significant efforts to do so receive a Tier 3 ranking. (See related article.)

The 39 countries on the special watch list are countries that either had moved to a higher tier in the 2006 report, were ranked on Tier 2 in the 2006 report but had failed to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking from the previous year, were placed on Tier 2 because of commitments to carry out additional future actions over the coming year, or had a significant or significantly increased number of trafficking victims.

The interim assessment gauges anti-trafficking progresses, particularly of countries that might be in danger of becoming Tier 3 nations in the June 2007 report. The assessment provides guidance on how to avoid this ranking.

MOTIVATING CHANGE

The assessment said many countries continue to make improvements, even the Tier 1 nations. In Malawi, the government continued to prosecute traffickers and conducted training for police officers to learn how to help prevent and stop trafficking. New legislation in Switzerland is helping provide more assistance to trafficking victims. In Singapore, the government implemented new measures aimed at addressing abuses of foreign domestic workers.

However, the assessment said, some countries' efforts to fight trafficking have been inadequate. Even though the government of Djibouti has taken a few steps, like shutting down bars where child prostitution may have occurred, more work is needed. In Malaysia, a 2004 commitment to opening a shelter for trafficking victims remains unfulfilled. Peru also has made some progress, but has shown little effort to implement the recommendations in the 2006 State Department report.

LOAD-DATE: January 23, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 States News Service

290 of 445 DOCUMENTS

State Department Documents and Publications

January 22, 2007

U.S. State Department Reviews Nations' Anti-trafficking Progress; Assessment of 39 nations shows some countries need to do more

BYLINE: Michelle Austein, USINFO Staff Writer

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 678 words

Washington -- Many countries have made progress in implementing anti-trafficking goals cited in the U.S. State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons report, but some nations need to make greater efforts, according to the department's assessment of 39 countries' anti-trafficking programs.

The State Department January 19 released its Trafficking in Persons Interim Assessment of nations on the department's special watch list. That list includes countries deemed to warrant special scrutiny of their anti-trafficking efforts, as required by the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act (TVPRA) of 2003.

On the list are countries that have significant human-trafficking problems, have not increased efforts over the last year to stop trafficking, or whose efforts were judged as declining in the most recent State Department report. The interim assessment reviews progress made by these countries between May and November 2006.

Among the 39 countries in the interim assessment, Algeria was reported as having not made any progress, while Djibouti, Mauritania, Togo, Malaysia, Egypt, Libya, Qatar, Argentina, Brazil and Peru were reported to have made "modest," "limited," "inadequate" or "minimal" improvements in combating trafficking in persons.

Improved performance was reported for Cambodia, China, Israel, Belize and Bolivia.

THE TIER SYSTEM

Legally mandated to be compiled annually, the June 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report reviewed anti-trafficking efforts in 149 countries and concluded that about 800,000 persons were coerced into human-trafficking schemes over the last year.

The report placed nations in one of four categories based on their efforts to control human trafficking, prosecute those involved and support and assist victims of these crimes. Countries doing the best job are in Tier 1. Tier 2 comprises countries that are demonstrating commitment to address their problems but have not yet achieved international standards.

The Tier 2 "Watch List" includes countries that show signs of digressing to Tier 3, which is the lowest level. Governments that are not complying with minimum anti-trafficking standards and are not making significant efforts to do so receive a Tier 3 ranking. (See related article.)

The 39 countries on the special watch list are countries that either had moved to a higher tier in the 2006 report, were ranked on Tier 2 in the 2006 report but had failed to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking from the previous year, were placed on Tier 2 because of commitments to carry out additional future actions over the coming year, or had a significant or significantly increased number of trafficking victims.

The interim assessment gauges anti-trafficking progresses, particularly of countries that might be in danger of becoming Tier 3 nations in the June 2007 report. The assessment provides guidance on how to avoid this ranking.

MOTIVATING CHANGE

The assessment said many countries continue to make improvements, even the Tier 1 nations. In Malawi, the government continued to prosecute traffickers and conducted training for police officers to learn how to help prevent and stop trafficking. New legislation in Switzerland is helping provide more assistance to trafficking victims. In Singapore, the government implemented new measures aimed at addressing abuses of foreign domestic workers.

However, the assessment said, some countries' efforts to fight trafficking have been inadequate. Even though the government of Djibouti has taken a few steps, like shutting down bars where child prostitution may have occurred, more work is needed. In Malaysia, a 2004 commitment to opening a shelter for trafficking victims remains unfulfilled. Peru also has made some progress, but has shown little effort to implement the recommendations in the 2006 State Department report.

The full text of the interim assessment is available on the State Department Web site.

For more information, see Human Trafficking.

(USINFO is produced by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: January 23, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

291 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

January 22, 2007 Monday 9:17 PM EST

STATE DEPT.: STATE DEPARTMENT REVIEWS NATIONS' ANTI-TRAFFICKING PROGRESS

BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 709 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's International Information Programs issued the following press release:

By Michelle Austein

USINFO Staff Writer

Many countries have made progress in implementing anti-trafficking goals cited in the U.S. State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons report, but some nations need to make greater efforts, according to the department's assessment of 39 countries' anti-trafficking programs.

The State Department January 19 released its Trafficking in Persons Interim Assessment of nations on the department's special watch list. That list includes countries deemed to warrant special scrutiny of their anti-trafficking efforts, as required by the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act (TVPRA) of 2003.

On the list are countries that have significant human-trafficking problems, have not increased efforts over the last year to stop trafficking, or whose efforts were judged as declining in the most recent State Department report. The interim assessment reviews progress made by these countries between May and November 2006.

Among the 39 countries in the interim assessment, Algeria was reported as having not made any progress, while Djibouti, Mauritania, Togo, Malaysia, Egypt, Libya, Qatar, Argentina, Brazil and Peru were reported to have made "modest," "limited," "inadequate" or "minimal" improvements in combating trafficking in persons.

Improved performance was reported for Cambodia, China, Israel, Belize and Bolivia.

THE TIER SYSTEM

Legally mandated to be compiled annually, the June 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report reviewed anti-trafficking efforts in 149 countries and concluded that about 800,000 persons were coerced into human-trafficking schemes over the last year.

The report placed nations in one of four categories based on their efforts to control human trafficking, prosecute those involved and support and assist victims of these crimes. Countries doing the best job are in Tier 1. Tier 2 comprises countries that are demonstrating commitment to address -their problems but have not yet achieved international standards.

The Tier 2 "Watch List" includes countries that show signs of digressing to Tier 3, which is the lowest level. Governments that are not complying with minimum anti-trafficking standards and are not making significant efforts to do so receive a Tier 3 ranking. (See related article: <http://usinfo.state.gov/gi/Archive/2006/Jun/05-20237.html>.)

The 39 countries on the special watch list are countries that either had moved to a higher tier in the 2006 report, were ranked on Tier 2 in the 2006 report but had failed to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking from the previous year, were placed on Tier 2 because of commitments to carry out additional future actions over the coming year, or had a significant or significantly increased number of trafficking victims.

The interim assessment gauges anti-trafficking progresses, particularly of countries that might be in danger of becoming Tier 3 nations in the June 2007 report. The assessment provides guidance on how to avoid this ranking.

MOTIVATING CHANGE

The assessment said many countries continue to make improvements, even the Tier 1 nations. In Malawi, the government continued to prosecute traffickers and conducted training for police officers to learn how to help prevent and stop trafficking. New legislation in Switzerland is helping provide more assistance to trafficking victims. In Singapore, the government implemented new measures aimed at addressing abuses of foreign domestic workers.

However, the assessment said, some countries' efforts to fight trafficking have been inadequate. Even though the government of Djibouti has taken a few steps, like shutting down bars where child prostitution may have occurred, more work is needed. In Malaysia, a 2004 commitment to opening a shelter for trafficking victims remains unfulfilled. Peru also has made some progress, but has shown little effort to implement the recommendations in the 2006 State Department report.

The full text of the interim assessment is available on the State Department Web site.

For more information, see Human Trafficking: http://usinfo.state.gov/gi/global_issues/human_trafficking.html.

LOAD-DATE: January 23, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

292 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

January 20, 2007 Saturday 5:51 PM TST

TAIWAN MAKES 'MODERATE PROGRESS' IN FIGHTING HUMAN TRAFFICKING: U.S.

BYLINE: Jorge Liu and Y.F. Low

LENGTH: 457 words

DATELINE: Washington, Jan. 20

Taiwan has made "moderate progress" in combating human trafficking over the past six months since it was put on the Special Watch List for the problem, according to an interim assessment released Friday by the U.S. State Department.

The interim assessment evaluates the performance of 39 countries placed on the Special Watch List in the department's 2006 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report published last June.

The department said some of the countries could be further downgraded in the 2007 TIP Report to be published in June if their anti-trafficking efforts this year are determined to be inadequate.

In the 2006 report, Taiwan was placed on the "Tier 2 Watch List" for its failure to show evidence of increasing efforts over the past year to address human trafficking, particularly the serious level of forced labor and sexual servitude among legally migrating Southeast Asian contract workers and brides.

According to the 2007 Interim Assessment, the Taiwan authorities failed to prosecute any offenses of trafficking for forced labor or domestic servitude, despite evidence of a significant trafficking problem among the 350,000 Thai, Indonesian, Vietnamese and Filipino workers in Taiwan.

Also, it said the Taiwan authorities failed to make progress in developing a system to identify and protect foreign workers who have been subjected to conditions of forced labor or involuntary servitude.

However, it mentioned significant improvements made by the Council of Labor Affairs (CLA) in its policies and regulations governing the terms and conditions of work for foreign laborers in Taiwan.

These include bilateral agreements reached with Indonesia, the Philippines, Thailand and Vietnam to allow foreign domestic workers to apply directly to the CLA for work instead of going through Taiwan labor brokerage agencies that are known for exploitative practices, the report said.

Meanwhile, in an effort to prevent trafficking of Southeast Asian women through fraudulent marriages, the Interior Ministry banned the registration of new international marriage firms based in Taiwan and strengthened regulations and monitoring of existing firms, while the Ministry of Foreign Affairs tightened the screening of Southeast Asian women applying for visas as "brides" of Taiwan men, the report said.

Besides Taiwan, the other 38 countries evaluated in the interim assessment are Algeria, Argentina, Armenia, Bahrain, Belize, Bolivia, Brazil, Cambodia, Central African Republic, China, Cyprus, Djibouti, Ecuador, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Finland, India, Indonesia, Israel, Jamaica, Kenya, Kuwait, Laos, Libya, Macau, Malawi, Malaysia, Mauritania, Mexico, Oman, Peru, Qatar, Russia, Singapore, South Africa, Switzerland, Togo, and the United Arab Emirates.

LOAD-DATE: January 20, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 Central News Agency
All Rights Reserved

293 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

January 19, 2007 FridayTRAFFICKING IN PERSONS: INTERIM ASSESSMENTS*BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 328 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. Department of State:

Today, the State Department released the Interim Assessment of 39 countries on the "Special Watch List" for the current year. The "Special Watch List" consists of countries deemed to warrant special scrutiny of their anti-trafficking efforts, as required by the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act (TVPA) of 2003. The "Special Watch List" includes countries that have a very significant human trafficking problem, have not shown increased efforts over the last year, or were upgraded in the most recent annual report.

Some countries on the "Special Watch List" could be downgraded to Tier 3 in the upcoming June 2007 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report if their anti-trafficking efforts this year are determined to be inadequate. The Interim Assessment looks at the efforts of these foreign governments to combat human trafficking and provides guidance on how to avoid a Tier 3 ranking. The Interim Assessment is posted on the State Department's Web site: <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/rpt/78948.htm>.

The 2007 Interim Assessment covers: Algeria, Argentina, Armenia, Bahrain, Belize, Bolivia, Brazil, Cambodia, Central African Republic, China (PRC), Cyprus, Djibouti, Ecuador, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Finland, India, Indonesia, Israel, Jamaica, Kenya, Kuwait, Laos, Libya, Macau, Malawi, Malaysia, Mauritania, Mexico, Oman, Peru, Qatar, Russia, Singapore, South Africa, Switzerland, Taiwan, Togo, and the United Arab Emirates.

Seven countries are included because they moved up one tier in 2006. Belize and Laos moved from the Tier 3 to the Tier 2 Watch List in September as the result of a Presidential Determination. Ecuador moved up from Tier 3 in the 2005 TIP Report to Tier 2 in the 2006 TIP Report. Finland, Malawi, Singapore, and Switzerland moved up from Tier 2 to Tier 1 in the same period. The remaining 32 countries were placed in the Tier 2 Watch List in the 2006 TIP Report.

LOAD-DATE: January 24, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 States News Service

294 of 445 DOCUMENTS

State Department Documents and Publications

January 19, 2007Trafficking in Persons: Interim Assessments*SECTION: STATE DEPARTMENT PRESS RELEASESLENGTH: 340 words

Media Note

Office of the Spokesman

Washington, DC

January 19, 2007

Trafficking in Persons: Interim Assessments

Today, the State Department released the Interim Assessment of 39 countries on the "Special Watch List" for the current year. The "Special Watch List" consists of countries deemed to warrant special scrutiny of their anti-trafficking efforts, as required by the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act (TVPRA) of 2003. The "Special Watch List" includes countries that have a very significant human trafficking problem, have not shown increased efforts over the last year, or were upgraded in the most recent annual report.

Some countries on the "Special Watch List" could be downgraded to Tier 3 in the upcoming June 2007 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report if their anti-trafficking efforts this year are determined to be inadequate. The Interim Assessment looks at the efforts of these foreign governments to combat human trafficking and provides guidance on how to avoid a Tier 3 ranking. The Interim Assessment is posted on the State Department's Web site:
<http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/rpt/78948.htm>.

The 2007 Interim Assessment covers: Algeria, Argentina, Armenia, Bahrain, Belize, Bolivia, Brazil, Cambodia, Central African Republic, China (PRC), Cyprus, Djibouti, Ecuador, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Finland, India, Indonesia, Israel, Jamaica, Kenya, Kuwait, Laos, Libya, Macau, Malawi, Malaysia, Mauritania, Mexico, Oman, Peru, Qatar, Russia, Singapore, South Africa, Switzerland, Taiwan, Togo, and the United Arab Emirates.

Seven countries are included because they moved up one tier in 2006. Belize and Laos moved from the Tier 3 to the Tier 2 Watch List in September as the result of a Presidential Determination. Ecuador moved up from Tier 3 in the 2005 TIP Report to Tier 2 in the 2006 TIP Report. Finland, Malawi, Singapore, and Switzerland moved up from Tier 2 to Tier 1 in the same period. The remaining 32 countries were placed in the Tier 2 Watch List in the 2006 TIP Report.

2007/042

Released on January 19, 2007

LOAD-DATE: January 22, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

295 of 445 DOCUMENTS

State Department Documents and Publications

January 19, 2007Trafficking in Persons: Interim Assessments*SECTION: STATE DEPARTMENT PRESS RELEASESLENGTH: 340 words

Media Note

Office of the Spokesman

Washington, DC

January 19, 2007

Trafficking in Persons: Interim Assessments

Today, the State Department released the Interim Assessment of 39 countries on the "Special Watch List" for the current year. The "Special Watch List" consists of countries deemed to warrant special scrutiny of their anti-trafficking efforts, as required by the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act (TVPRA) of 2003. The "Special Watch List" includes countries that have a very significant human trafficking problem, have not shown increased efforts over the last year, or were upgraded in the most recent annual report.

Some countries on the "Special Watch List" could be downgraded to Tier 3 in the upcoming June 2007 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report if their anti-trafficking efforts this year are determined to be inadequate. The Interim Assessment looks at the efforts of these foreign governments to combat human trafficking and provides guidance on how to avoid a Tier 3 ranking. The Interim Assessment is posted on the State Department's Web site:
<http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/rpt/78948.htm>.

The 2007 Interim Assessment covers: Algeria, Argentina, Armenia, Bahrain, Belize, Bolivia, Brazil, Cambodia, Central African Republic, China (PRC), Cyprus, Djibouti, Ecuador, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Finland, India, Indonesia, Israel, Jamaica, Kenya, Kuwait, Laos, Libya, Macau, Malawi, Malaysia, Mauritania, Mexico, Oman, Peru, Qatar, Russia, Singapore, South Africa, Switzerland, Taiwan, Togo, and the United Arab Emirates.

Seven countries are included because they moved up one tier in 2006. Belize and Laos moved from the Tier 3 to the Tier 2 Watch List in September as the result of a Presidential Determination. Ecuador moved up from Tier 3 in the 2005 TIP Report to Tier 2 in the 2006 TIP Report. Finland, Malawi, Singapore, and Switzerland moved up from Tier 2 to Tier 1 in the same period. The remaining 32 countries were placed in the Tier 2 Watch List in the 2006 TIP Report.

2007/042

Released on January 19, 2007

LOAD-DATE: January 23, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

296 of 445 DOCUMENTS

State Department Documents and Publications

January 19, 2007Trafficking in Persons: Interim Assessments*SECTION: STATE DEPARTMENT PRESS RELEASESLENGTH: 340 words

Media Note

Office of the Spokesman

Washington, DC

January 19, 2007

Trafficking in Persons: Interim Assessments

Today, the State Department released the Interim Assessment of 39 countries on the "Special Watch List" for the current year. The "Special Watch List" consists of countries deemed to warrant special scrutiny of their anti-trafficking efforts, as required by the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act (TVPRA) of 2003. The "Special Watch List" includes countries that have a very significant human trafficking problem, have not shown increased efforts over the last year, or were upgraded in the most recent annual report.

Some countries on the "Special Watch List" could be downgraded to Tier 3 in the upcoming June 2007 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report if their anti-trafficking efforts this year are determined to be inadequate. The Interim Assessment looks at the efforts of these foreign governments to combat human trafficking and provides guidance on how to avoid a Tier 3 ranking. The Interim Assessment is posted on the State Department's Web site:
<http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/rpt/78948.htm>.

The 2007 Interim Assessment covers: Algeria, Argentina, Armenia, Bahrain, Belize, Bolivia, Brazil, Cambodia, Central African Republic, China (PRC), Cyprus, Djibouti, Ecuador, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Finland, India, Indonesia, Israel, Jamaica, Kenya, Kuwait, Laos, Libya, Macau, Malawi, Malaysia, Mauritania, Mexico, Oman, Peru, Qatar, Russia, Singapore, South Africa, Switzerland, Taiwan, Togo, and the United Arab Emirates.

Seven countries are included because they moved up one tier in 2006. Belize and Laos moved from the Tier 3 to the Tier 2 Watch List in September as the result of a Presidential Determination. Ecuador moved up from Tier 3 in the 2005 TIP Report to Tier 2 in the 2006 TIP Report. Finland, Malawi, Singapore, and Switzerland moved up from Tier 2 to Tier 1 in the same period. The remaining 32 countries were placed in the Tier 2 Watch List in the 2006 TIP Report.

2007/042

Released on January 19, 2007

LOAD-DATE: January 23, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

297 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

January 19, 2007 Friday 8:53 PM ESTSTATE DEPARTMENT RELEASES INTERIM ASSESSMENT OF 39 COUNTRIES ON 'SPECIAL WATCH LIST'*BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 329 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State issued the following press release:

Today, the State Department released the Interim Assessment of 39 countries on the "Special Watch List" for the current year. The "Special Watch List" consists of countries deemed to warrant special scrutiny of their anti-trafficking efforts, as required by the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act (TVPRA) of 2003. The "Special Watch List" includes countries that have a very significant human trafficking problem, have not shown increased efforts over the last year, or were upgraded in the most recent annual report.

Some countries on the "Special Watch List" could be downgraded to Tier 3 in the upcoming June 2007 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report if their anti-trafficking efforts this year are determined to be inadequate. The Interim Assessment looks at the efforts of these foreign governments to combat human trafficking and provides guidance on how to avoid a Tier 3 ranking. The Interim Assessment is posted on the State Department's Web site: <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/rpt/78948.htm>.

The 2007 Interim Assessment covers: Algeria, Argentina, Armenia, Bahrain, Belize, Bolivia, Brazil, Cambodia, Central African Republic, China (PRC), Cyprus, Djibouti, Ecuador, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Finland, India, Indonesia, Israel, Jamaica, Kenya, Kuwait, Laos, Libya, Macau, Malawi, Malaysia, Mauritania, Mexico, Oman, Peru, Qatar, Russia, Singapore, South Africa, Switzerland, Taiwan, Togo, and the United Arab Emirates.

Seven countries are included because they moved up one tier in 2006. Belize and Laos moved from the Tier 3 to the Tier 2 Watch List in September as the result of a Presidential Determination. Ecuador moved up from Tier 3 in the 2005 TIP Report to Tier 2 in the 2006 TIP Report. Finland, Malawi, Singapore, and Switzerland moved up from Tier 2 to Tier 1 in the same period. The remaining 32 countries were placed in the Tier 2 Watch List in the 2006 TIP Report.

LOAD-DATE: January 20, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

298 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

January 19, 2007 Friday 4:49 AM EST

TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS INTERIM ASSESSMENT

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 10869 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons issued the following report:

The Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act, passed by the Congress and signed into law by the President in December 2003, requires the Department of State to submit to the Congress an Interim Assessment of the progress made in combating trafficking in persons (TIP) by those countries placed on the Special Watch List in September 2006. The evaluation period covers the six months since the release of the June 2006 annual report.

This year, 39 countries are on the Special Watch List. These countries either (1) had moved up a tier in the 2006 TIP Report over the last year's Report, or (2) were ranked on Tier 2 in the 2006 TIP Report, but (a) had failed to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat TIP from the previous year, (b) were placed on Tier 2 because of commitments to carry out additional future actions over the coming year, or (c) had a significant or significantly increasing number of trafficking victims. Thirty-four of the 39 countries on the Special Watch List are in the second category-ranked as Tier 2 Watch List-including two countries initially ranked as Tier 3 in the June 2006 TIP Report, but reassessed as Tier 2 Watch List countries by the State Department in September 2006 (Belize and Laos). Attached to this Interim Assessment is an overview of the tier process.

In most cases, the Interim Assessment is intended to serve as a tool by which to gauge the anti trafficking progress of countries which may be in danger of slipping a tier in the upcoming June 2007 TIP Report and to give them guidance on how to avoid a Tier 3 ranking. It is a tightly focused progress report, assessing the concrete actions a government has taken to address the key deficiencies highlighted in the June 2006 TIP Report. The Interim Assessment covers actions undertaken between the beginning of May-the cutoff for data covered in the June TIP Report-and November. Readers are requested to refer back to the annual TIP Report for an analysis of large scale efforts and a description of the trafficking problem in each particular country.

Tier Process

The Department placed each of the countries included on the 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report into one of the three lists, described here as tiers, mandated by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, as amended (TVPA). This placement reflects an evaluation of a government's actions to combat trafficking. The Department first evaluates whether the government fully complies with the TVPRA's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. Countries whose governments do so are placed in Tier 1. For other countries, the Department considers whether their governments made significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance. Countries whose governments are making significant efforts to meet the minimum standards are placed in Tier 2. Those countries whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so are placed in Tier 3. Finally, the Special Watch List criteria are considered and, if applicable, Tier 2 countries are placed on the Tier 2 Special Watch List.

The Tiers

Tier 1: Countries whose governments fully comply with the Act's minimum standards.

Tier 2: Countries whose governments do not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards.

Tier 2 Special Watch List: Countries whose governments do not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards, and:

- a) The absolute number of victims of severe forms of trafficking is very significant or is increasing significantly; or
- b) There is a failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons from the previous year; or
- c) The determination that a country is making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with minimum standards was based on commitments by the country to take additional future steps over the next year.

Tier 3: Countries whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so.

As required by the TVPA, in making tier determinations between Tiers 2 and 3, the Department considers the overall extent of human trafficking in the country; the extent of government noncompliance with the minimum standards, particularly the extent to which government officials have participated in, facilitated, condoned, or are otherwise complicit in trafficking; and what reasonable measures the government would have to take to come into compliance with the minimum standards within the government's resources and capabilities.

AFRICA

Central African Republic

The Government of the Central African Republic (CAR) has begun to make modest progress toward combating trafficking in persons since the release of the 2006 Report. The government has drafted anti-trafficking legislation, established liaisons with NGOs with the capacity to care for trafficking victims, and developed plans to increase public awareness of trafficking and establish a government focal point to address the problem.

The government plans to submit to the National Assembly in early December 2006 draft legislation prohibiting all forms of trafficking in persons. Also related to law enforcement efforts, the government entered into a multilateral regional accord against trafficking in July 2006 and a bilateral agreement with Cameroon to combat transnational crime, including trafficking in persons, in August 2006.

Awareness of trafficking in persons problems among government officials and the public is minimal and there are no NGOs that provide services specifically to trafficking victims. However, the government has provided training to some NGOs providing care to street children and other children in distress, many or some of whom are likely trafficking victims. Some of these organizations are also part of an NGO network coordinated by the Ministry of Social Affairs.

The Ministries of Social Affairs and Justice have pledged to take steps to increase public awareness of trafficking by early 2007. These two ministries plan on establishing a national inter-ministerial committee to combat TIP by the end of February 2007. The CAR also has developed a plan of action to combat child sexual exploitation and abuse, including child sex trafficking.

Djibouti

The Government of Djibouti took initial but inadequate steps to begin combating human trafficking after the release of the 2006 Report. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Djibouti's designated focal point on human trafficking, appointed the Director of its Legal Department to be responsible for coordinating the Djiboutian government's anti-trafficking response. The Police Vice Squad reportedly continued to close bars where child prostitution may have been occurring; specifics regarding these closures or resulting prosecutions are not known. The Ministry of Communications requested U.S. assistance in acquiring appropriate articles or other awareness raising materials on human trafficking to publish in local newspapers.

Equatorial Guinea

The Government of Equatorial Guinea made some modest progress in combating trafficking in persons since the release of the 2006 Report. Although the government investigated and resolved at least nine trafficking cases, educated law enforcement officials, and referred foreign victims to diplomatic officials, it once again failed to arrest, prosecute, or convict traffickers under its 2004 law or under other TIP-related criminal statutes.

The government conducted at least 6 anti-trafficking sensitization workshops for police, prosecutors, and judges and immigration officials. In addition, Equatorial Guinea (EG) initiated meetings with the international community to request technical assistance to develop a trafficking training program for Equato-Guinean law enforcement officials. In July 2006, EG also adopted the regional West and Central African Multilateral Agreement and Plan of Action to Combat Trafficking in Persons.

The government referred foreign child trafficking victims it discovered to diplomatic missions of the victim's country in at least nine instances over the last six months. Beyond these referrals, the government did not provide direct care to trafficking victims or coordinate with NGOs or international organizations to provide such care.

The government collaborated with UNICEF, Cameroon, and Gabon to conduct an assessment of transnational trafficking. The government also launched an information campaign about trafficking by placing UNICEF-financed posters in the streets of Malabo about the national action plan against trafficking in persons.

Kenya

The Government of Kenya made some progress in its efforts to combat trafficking in persons since the release of the 2006 Report, but more needs to be done. A lack of awareness of human trafficking issues among law enforcement officials continued to undermine the ability of police to properly identify and track trafficking cases. In August 2006, two police officers in Trans-Nzoia were suspended from duty for allegedly helping a suspected member of a child trafficking syndicate escape from custody. However, the officers subsequently were reinstated to active duty pending disciplinary action from Police Headquarters, which has yet to be meted out. The suspect subsequently was re-arrested trying to transport an allegedly abducted Kenyan child to Uganda.

Police reportedly also investigated trafficking cases in the coastal and Rift Valley regions; no further information regarding resulting arrests or prosecutions was made available. The Kenya Police Service was unable to report a single concrete action taken by the Human Trafficking Unit in the past year. However, in June 2006, the Tourism Minister personally led police and other government officials on a raid of a Mombasa resort hotel suspected of hosting children in prostitution; two young girls were removed from the premises. In November 2006, the Mombasa District Commissioner provided participants at a trafficking awareness seminar with a telephone hotline number to use to report suspected cases of trafficking.

A draft comprehensive anti-trafficking bill was presented by NGOs to the Attorney General's Office in May 2006. It is anticipated that the bill will be submitted during the next session of Parliament, which is expected to begin in March 2007. The Vice President presided over the December 19 launch of a research report on child sex tourism and commercial sexual exploitation of children on the coast conducted by Children's Affairs and a UNICEF-selected international expert. The launch may encourage smaller hotels and other tourism sector firms to join hotels in other parts of the coast that have already signed on to implement the industry code to prevent child sex tourism. The launch also should serve to increase awareness of the problem of human trafficking on the coast. In response to the study's findings, steps to address human trafficking were incorporated into the Ministry's annual work plan.

In early December, relevant government ministries, including the Office of the President, Home Affairs, Foreign Affairs, Education, Labor, Gender and Youth, the Attorney General, Culture and Tourism, and Immigration, took up the issue of TIP and agreed that Home Affairs would lead a TIP policy steering committee and a task force to draft a National TIP Action Plan. As a result of the increased availability of training opportunities, the Kenyan media, especially the government-owned Kenya Broadcasting Corporation, noticeably improved the quantity and quality of its coverage of suspected human trafficking cases, contributing to greater awareness of the problem of human trafficking throughout the country.

Malawi

Since achieving Tier 1 status in the 2006 Report, the Government of Malawi has continued to make progress in combating human trafficking. The government prosecuted and convicted 10 traffickers since April 2006 using relevant labor and kidnapping laws; the majority of these cases involved trafficking of children for agricultural labor and cattle herding. In October, a Malawian court sentenced a Mozambican national to six years imprisonment after he pled guilty to attempting to sell two youths to businessmen. Other traffickers were required to pay fines; however, some who claimed ignorance of the law were merely warned and released. In August 2006, the Malawi Police Service conducted a two-day child protection orientation for district police commanders and a two-week training of trainers for 16 child protection officers from the police community.

The Ministry of Labor continued to inspect and monitor labor practices on both tobacco and tea estates, as well as in other sectors. It conducted six sensitization workshops for tobacco and tea estate owners on Malawi's labor code, emphasizing child labor prohibitions. Forty additional labor inspectors were hired, and 18 more are currently being recruited. In August, the ministry conducted a workshop for district labor officers to educate them on the roles of the judiciary, NGOs, police, and labor officers in addressing child trafficking.

A recently opened government-operated drop-in center in Lilongwe is providing approximately 50 victims of trafficking and sexual violence with counseling, medical care, legal assistance, shelter, food, and vocational training. Additional centers planned for the southern and northern regions of the country have not opened due to supply shortages.

Mauritania

The Government of Mauritania has made insufficient progress in combating trafficking in persons since the release of the 2006 Report. The government has failed to arrest, prosecute, or convict trafficking offenders or individuals subjecting others to traditional slavery or related practices. Mauritania also neglected to provide care to two child domestic servants who were part of a high-profile criminal investigation in 2005. However, the government has taken limited steps to protect children from prostitution and harmful labor practices, and it has provided anti-poverty programs to former female slaves and domestic workers.

Although Mauritania has never enforced its anti-slavery or anti-trafficking laws, the government is in the process of establishing a Children's Police Brigade to enforce a January 2006 ordinance against child prostitution and harmful child labor practices. In June, August, and September 2006, the government trained law enforcement officials in three cities to enforce the ordinance.

With financing from the African Development Bank, the government provided six months of literacy training to 5,000 women in a program targeting former female slaves, many of whom are likely domestic workers. In collaboration with a private bank and UNICEF, the government continued to conduct micro-credit programs for domestic workers and former female slaves. Although the government continues to operate care centers for "talibe" boys, reports indicate that the centers operate below capacity despite apparent need.

In September 2006, the government organized a workshop for civil society and law enforcement officials on combating trafficking. The government also produced an anti-trafficking action plan in October 2006.

South Africa

The Government of South Africa made some progress in addressing anti-trafficking concerns since the release of the 2006 Report. In June 2006, President Mbeki signed the Children's Act, which specifically criminalizes child trafficking. The Department of Social Development is expected to release the necessary implementing regulations for the law to be enforced in early 2007. The government's growing anti-trafficking commitment was constrained in some cases by the requirements of its own processes, particularly in the area of enacting new laws. To elicit further feedback on its draft comprehensive anti-trafficking bill, the South African Law Reform Commission conducted six workshops throughout the country for investigators, prosecutors, and civic organizations; the bill is slated for submission to the Minister of Justice in mid-2007. In November, the Sexual Offenses Bill, which would prohibit the trafficking of women for sexual exploitation, was sent from the parliamentary committee to Parliament for consideration.

In November, the trial of the "Ranch Club" sex trafficking case resumed after months of attempts by the alleged trafficker to have the charges dismissed. Despite anecdotal information in the press, data on judicial proceedings against additional suspected traffickers remained unavailable. In August 2006, the National Prosecuting Authority (NPA) sponsored a two-day seminar on prosecuting human trafficking cases in the South African context for provincial prosecutors and chief prosecutors from other African countries. This seminar resulted in agreement to a number of short-term actions, including the subsequent formation of a new NPA Rapid TIP Response Team, which has focused its initial efforts on identifying priority cases in the country for prosecution. Thirty-one members of the South African Police Service's Organized Crime Unit in Gauteng Province received training from International Organization for Migration (IOM) on the role of organized criminal groups in the trafficking of women and children. IOM subsequently received requests from the Scorpions, the Department of Home Affairs, and the Cape Town and Johannesburg airport authorities to receive this training.

In October, police officers from South Africa, Mozambique, and Swaziland met to discuss cross-border trafficking, including trafficking in persons, and agreed that more must be done in this area. According to an August 2006 press release from the Department of Labor, the Governments of South Africa and Zimbabwe agreed in January to issue legal work permits for cross-border agricultural laborers, believing that the regularization of transient agricultural workers between the two countries will minimize the use of children for such activities.

Government efforts to raise public awareness remained sporadic while civil society and private sector efforts increased. In August, the Women's Parliament conducted a two-day meeting focusing on human trafficking. The Department of Labor funded a national radio campaign on child labor that ran during the annual "16 days of activism against violence to women and children" campaign.

Togo

The Government of Togo has made insufficient progress in combating trafficking in persons since the release of the 2006 Report. Overall law enforcement efforts remained weak, though the government took some increased steps to provide care to trafficking victims.

The government reported that Togolese police arrested some traffickers over the last six months; however, officials have not provided data on the number of such arrests. Moreover, the government has not commenced legal proceedings against 16 traffickers arrested in 2005. Togo's draft Child Code of Laws, with strengthened provisions against child trafficking, remains at the National Assembly with no fixed date for a vote. Although the government has not provided officials with training about trafficking, Togolese police and gendarme have participated in training offered by international organizations and NGOs.

Police worked with Ministry of Social Welfare representatives in providing care to trafficking victims identified at Lome's airport and at Togo's borders. In addition, representatives of the National Committee for the Rehabilitation and Social Reinsertion of Trafficking Victims in each of Togo's prefectures continued to work with local civil society leaders in educating communities about trafficking and in caring for victims. Government officials assisted International Labor Organization (ILO) representatives in establishing a network of over 300 local rural anti-trafficking committees.

EUROPE

Armenia

The Government of Armenia made some progress in its efforts to combat trafficking in persons since the release of the 2006 Report; however, key deficiencies in the government's anti-trafficking response have yet to be addressed. In July 2006 the government enacted a statute to clarify its trafficking law and strengthen the accompanying penalties, and NGO-run shelters assisted more trafficking victims during the last six months. The government, however, neither developed nor implemented a national referral policy. It also did not aggressively sentence traffickers under its trafficking statute and it failed to investigate vigorously ongoing allegations of corruption and prosecute officials for complicity in trafficking.

The Government of Armenia took some steps to increase awareness on victim identification by assisting in the publication of an IOM manual for Armenian consular officers stationed abroad, and it worked with a local NGO to publish a manual for its health and social workers. While the number of victims assisted by NGO shelters in Armenia almost doubled over the previous year, the rate of law enforcement referrals to these shelters remains low; out of 23 victims assisted since March 1, 2006, about one-third were referred by the government. In July 2006, the government enacted a new statute to ensure that traffickers in Armenia are convicted under trafficking statutes rather than less serious pimping statutes, which carry lower penalties. Since March 2006, the government investigated 14 trafficking cases, resulting in six convictions. All six traffickers received sentences between four and five years; the government utilized its old trafficking statute, which carries penalties lighter than those in the new trafficking statute, under a grandfathering clause because the crimes occurred before enactment of the new statute. Although the government has yet to prosecute any acts of trafficking-related complicity, in December 2006 it restructured its anti-trafficking unit in response to ongoing allegations of high-level corruption.

Cyprus

The Government of Cyprus has shown some progress in combating trafficking in persons since the release of the 2006 Report, but efforts in key areas remain inadequate. It has yet to implement critical anti-trafficking reforms it pledged to undertake in May 2005. Although the government recently demonstrated a strong willingness to increase its efforts, this has yet to translate into significant, concrete improvements in victim protection, adequate punishment for traffickers, and raising public awareness about trafficking in Cyprus.

The Government of Cyprus increased prosecutions and convictions under anti-trafficking statutes. Police statistics show that 40 cases were being prosecuted as of mid-December 2006, with an additional 17 cases being investigated for possible prosecution. Of the 40 prosecutions, three resulted in acquittals, two resulted in suspended sentences, and four concluded in convictions with prison sentences ranging from four to nine months. Thirty-one are still being tried. Additionally, Cypriot police have assisted 12 Interpol and 10 Europol international trafficking investigations.

The government has yet to enact the new anti-trafficking law, promised for some time, though a draft bill has been forwarded to the Attorney General for final review. This draft bill does not abolish "artiste"-specific classifications for granting visas into Cyprus. Moreover, the government has yet to open a long-promised anti-trafficking shelter, though the Council of Ministers has approved the use of a specific building and the hiring of staff.

To raise internal awareness about trafficking, Cypriot police, in November 2006, conducted two seminars to educate law enforcement officers. Also, the police prepared anti-trafficking fliers aimed at tackling local demand, which will be distributed during community policing activities. The 2007 police budget specifically includes funding for this printing. The government has not yet developed or conducted a large-scale demand reduction campaign, promised since May 2005.

The Council of Ministers approved but has yet to finalize and implement an internal government handbook to help identify victims and direct the actions of ministries and services in dealing with trafficking cases.

Finland

The Government of Finland continued to make progress in its efforts to combat trafficking in persons since the release of the 2006 Report. The government successfully prosecuted its first case under Finland's new anti-trafficking statute. It also increased efforts to identify and combat labor trafficking, provided temporary residency to all identified suspected trafficking victims, demonstrated considerable regional leadership in connection with Finland's EU Presidency, and passed a law criminalizing the intentional purchase of sexual services from trafficking victims.

The Finnish government's anti-trafficking law enforcement efforts showed progress as the government successfully prosecuted one case involving eight Finnish and Estonian sex traffickers under the 2005 anti-trafficking statute. Each trafficker was sentenced to a prison term of 27 months to five years - penalties substantially higher than those prescribed under laws used to prosecute sex trafficking crimes before 2005. Finnish authorities also increased efforts to target labor trafficking during the reporting period. A report commissioned by the Labor Ministry and released in May 2006 determined that labor trafficking was present in the construction, restaurant, and hospitality industries. In September and October, authorities arrested suspects in several cases involving the use of forced labor in various Asian restaurants. Additional investigations are underway.

The government sustained its efforts to assist foreign trafficking victims and, by early 2006, the previous practice of deporting possible trafficking victims was suspended. Currently, all persons identified as suspected victims are allowed to remain in the country for up to one year on a temporary residency permit. Victims may apply for subsequent extensions.

Finland assumed the EU Presidency on July 1 and has made combating trafficking in persons a high priority for the EU. During Finland's EU Presidency, it hosted in October 2006 a conference on child victim identification and interview issues, bringing together more than 100 working-level law enforcement, social worker, and NGO personnel throughout the EU.

In June, Parliament passed legislation that criminalizes the purchase of all sexual services from trafficking victims. The government views this as a positive step toward demand reduction.

Russia

The Government of Russia made some progress in its efforts to combat trafficking in persons since the release of the 2006 Report. The federal government publicly announced it will provide some funding to three anti-trafficking NGOs beginning in early 2007 and regional and local governments provided in kind and financial support to some anti-trafficking NGOs; however, it appears the majority of aid to NGOs providing victim assistance, public awareness efforts, and government training was provided by international donors. Law enforcement officials and prosecutors participated in victim referral and anti-trafficking training, and cooperation between local government officials and NGOs appeared to improve. The Primorskiy Krai government in August began discussing the creation of two much-needed trafficking shelters in Vladivostok, although substantive measures to allocate funding and establish the shelters have not yet been taken. Russian law enforcement continues to investigate and prosecute human trafficking and demonstrated progress on collecting trafficking investigation statistics. Comprehensive data on prosecutions, convictions, and efforts to prosecute trafficking-related complicity and official corruption were not available.

The Russian government demonstrated mixed progress in its efforts to provide victim assistance. It reached agreements with NGOs governing cooperation with law enforcement to address human trafficking victim assistance in two cities; formal agreements between police and NGOs concerning victim assistance and protection now exist in four cities. While the majority of NGOs do not yet receive funding from the government, several local and regional governments did provide some financial and in-kind support to anti-trafficking NGOs for rehabilitation and outreach services. The governor of the Primorskiy Krai region funded and sponsored an international anti-trafficking conference in August 2006. The government reports that it has now fully implemented and funded a witness protection program, although some local authorities report they have not yet received financial assistance for witness protection from the national government. While Russia's witness protection program was used to protect and assist some trafficking victims, the vast majority of trafficking victims have not yet been assisted by the program.

Switzerland

Since its upgrade to Tier One in the 2006 Report, the Government of Switzerland has made some progress in combating trafficking in persons. Key victim assistance legislation was approved and now awaits enactment and some progress was made to collect nationwide anti-trafficking data. Data for 2006 on the number of convicted traffickers serving time in prison was unavailable at the time this assessment was published. Efforts to enact a domestic demand-reduction public awareness campaign were limited.

On September 24, the new Federal Law on Foreigners was approved in a national referendum vote and will be fully implemented by January 1, 2008. The new law improves the process of granting potential trafficking victims a stay of deportation and provides for residency status or the assisted return of victims and witnesses to their countries of origin.

In 2005, seventy-three percent of convicted traffickers received suspended sentences and thus served no time in prison. Data for 2006 on the number of convicted traffickers who received suspended sentences and those who served time in prison was not yet available; thus it is unknown whether there has been any improvement in the adequacy of Swiss punishment for trafficking crimes.

Domestic prevention efforts remained limited and the government has yet to conduct a widespread domestic public awareness or demand-reduction campaign. There has been increased discussion at both the national and local level about potential awareness campaigns during the 2008 European Soccer Cup. Although government plans for a 2008 Euro Cup awareness campaign have not yet been formalized, a government funded NGO has begun its preparations. The government financially supported a comic strip project of the Council of Europe to raise awareness among students. The government also published an anti-trafficking teaching manual. The comic strip and manual are available on the Council of Europe website.

The new Federal Law on Foreigners will require the Federal Office of Migration to record at the national level the number of temporary residency permits granted to trafficking victims. In April 2006, the National Conference of Cantonal Justice Ministers appointed a project team with a mandate to gather and harmonize national law enforcement statistics, including statistics on human trafficking by 2010.

EAST ASIA AND PACIFIC

Cambodia

The Government of Cambodia made significant progress in combating trafficking in persons problem since the release of the 2006 Report. The National Police reported that as of September 2006, 58 traffickers and pimps had been turned over to the judiciary for prosecution. At least 34 convictions were handed down, with sentences ranging from 3 to 24 years. A comprehensive draft anti-trafficking bill was found to be incompatible with the draft penal code in late 2006 and is being modified. Police statistics indicate that as of October 2006, 32 establishments offering trafficking victims for sale have been closed.

Cambodia has modestly increased efforts to combat trafficking-related corruption, although punishment of offenders with appropriate prison sentences remains uneven. In August 2006, three police officers of the Ministry of Interior's Anti-Trafficking in Persons Department were convicted of trafficking-related corruption. However, only one of the three was imprisoned, one officer remains at large, and the other remains in his position. The National Police reported three additional arrests of low-ranking military officers for trafficking-related crimes during 2006.

China

The Government of China increased efforts to combat trafficking in persons since the release of the 2006 Report. Since June, China's law enforcement bodies undertook numerous actions throughout the country that resulted in the reported rescue of at least 234 trafficked women and children, the arrest of five suspected traffickers, and the conviction of six traffickers.

The Ministry of Public Security (MPS) reports that trafficking victims returning from abroad are not punished or fined, but acknowledges that border officials are not able to systematically identify trafficking victims from among Chinese citizens who travel abroad illegally. The All China Women's Federation (ACWF), a government-affiliated organization, has on occasion successfully coordinated with Chinese immigration authorities to cancel the "illegal immigration" fines of up to $250 and 15-day detentions imposed on Chinese victims returning from abroad, but can only do so on an ad hoc basis. The ACWF continued a program launched in 2005 to train border officials to identify signs of trafficking; additional training will take place in early 2007.

In September, the government signed an agreement with the International Organization for Migration to set up an office in Beijing to work on migration issues, including labor and other trafficking. Chinese authorities, including border police, the Public Security Bureau's (PSB) Entry/Exit Division, and the Labor Bureau, received training on trafficking issues affecting areas along China's borders with Vietnam and Burma.

The ACWF and several NGOs provide hotline and legal services to victims throughout the country. Additional shelters dedicated to victims of trafficking have been opened since June 2006: in December, the ACWF, in partnership with local and provincial government authorities and the ILO, opened a shelter for trafficked women and children in Mingguang City, the first such shelter in Anhui Province. In November, authorities in Zhejiang, Jiangsu Province opened a shelter for victims of labor trafficking. The project, coordinated with the ILO, not only provides a shelter, but offers education, training, and legal and employment assistance. In Wuxi, another region of Jiangsu, the United Nations provided assistance in the October/November opening of a "Home for Migrant Women," a shelter that provides anti-trafficking training, as well as opportunities for women to learn about local labor law and take classes to improve work skills. In Guangxi, the ACWF worked with UNICEF to improve services provided in a shelter for Chinese and foreign victims of trafficking that opened in February.

China's anti-trafficking laws do not yet fully conform with international standards. The current definition of trafficking is limited to the abducting, kidnapping, buying, fetching, sending, or transferring of a woman or child for the purpose of selling that victim, and does not cover the broad range of forms, methods, and purposes of trafficking found in the definition of the United Nations Protocol to Prevent, Suppress, and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children (Protocol). While trafficking of children under the age of 18 is a crime, penalties for trafficking children between the ages of 14 and 18 are not as severe as for trafficking children under the age of 14. Moreover, Chinese law does not automatically consider anyone under 18 years old involved in commercial sexual exploitation to be a victim of trafficking, despite international standards that establish this definition. Victims of labor trafficking also remain unprotected by China's current definition of trafficking, although many victims do have recourse under other legislation, such as the Labor Law and various provisions of the Criminal Code.

To address continuing deficiencies, China has prepared an anti-trafficking National Plan of Action. The Plan will be rolled out as part of China's commitment to the Greater Mekong Ministerial Initiative against Trafficking, which China will host next spring. The government, through its state-controlled media, gave wide coverage to training sessions in Beijing, Nanning, and Kunming that were designed to highlight trafficking issues and encourage print and broadcast journalists to cover stories from a victims' perspective. Other public outreach programs include a campaign by the Sichuan PSB targeting major labor markets, with informational posters, public service announcements on large television screens in the markets, and the distribution of pamphlets explaining legal protections, resource information, and hotline numbers.

Indonesia

The Government of Indonesia has made modest progress in combating trafficking in persons since the release of the 2006 Report. The National Police trafficking unit reported that as of October 2006, 90 suspects in 24 cases were under investigation for trafficking crimes involving 437 victims; this is an increase from the 82 suspects in 12 cases investigated for trafficking crimes involving 143 victims in all of 2005. Police submitted 23 trafficking cases for prosecution through October 2006. The Attorney General's Office is currently prosecuting 24 cases. As of November 2006 there were 18 convictions handed down by courts in 2006, with an average sentence of 4 years imprisonment.

The Ministry of Manpower has done little to enforce existing labor laws that would protect workers against internal and external trafficking, allowing some employment agencies to traffic workers for debt bondage. There is a lack of awareness about the trafficking problems associated with Indonesian girls and women who migrate abroad and are subjected to domestic servitude or Indonesian children employed as domestic workers within Indonesia. An agreement signed between the Indonesian and Malaysian governments in May 2006 governing the employment of Indonesian domestic workers in Malaysia contains provisions inconsistent with international anti-trafficking standards, such as lack of protection of the right of a migrant worker to keep custody of his or her passport.

Indonesia increased efforts to combat trafficking-related corruption. In September 2006 the Anti-Corruption Court sentenced a former Indonesian consul general in Malaysia to 20 months in jail for charging illegal fees to process immigration documents. A local government official was arrested by police and remains in custody for issuing false documents used by traffickers. A number of investigations of suspected complicit senior officials were started since May 2006, but precise data is not available.

Laos

The Government of Laos made modest progress in combating trafficking in persons since the release of the 2006 Report. The Lao Women's Union (LWU), with the assistance of UNICEF, disseminated information on the law throughout the country among citizens and government officials. The Lao Women's Union in mid-2006 conducted trafficking-related training for governors, vice governors, prosecutors, police commanders, presidents, and vice presidents of provincial courts across the country. In addition, the LWU held separate seminars for police officers on trafficking legislation and victim protection in several provinces. The government in July 2006 provided immigration officers with training intended to end the practice of fining, taxing, or otherwise confiscating money from returning migrants and trafficking victims.

The Lao Anti-People's Trafficking Unit arrested a woman in August 2006 and charged her with trafficking, and in late October authorities arrested a group of three people that were subsequently charged with human trafficking. Laos did not provide any information regarding efforts to combat trafficking-related corruption through increased criminal investigations or prosecution of officials involved in trafficking.

Macau

The authorities in Macau showed slight progress in combating trafficking in persons since the release of the 2006 Report. The authorities have yet to recognize the serious problem of trafficking for commercial sexual exploitation found within the territory's substantial international sex trade; this is reflected in a lack of significant steps taken to prosecute trafficking crimes and to find and protect victims of trafficking. However, the government recently reported ten cases of trafficking in persons, involving 17 women brought to Macau under false pretenses and four cases of abuse of prostitutes during the first half of 2006.

Macau authorities have not yet recognized, nor taken steps to draft legislation to address certain important gaps in the territory's laws related to trafficking. The Macau government, however, has recognized deficiencies in the laws relating to the welfare of women and children and is now reviewing applicable laws and covenants with an aim toward revising them in a coherent way. Moreover, there were no reports of authorities using laws that criminalize activities related to trafficking to prosecute traffickers and their accomplices, despite press, NGO, and foreign government reports of organized crime and human trafficking in Macau.

Macau continued to lack any significant protections for victims of trafficking. There remains no shelter or counseling resources dedicated to trafficking victims and local authorities made no discernable moves to address this deficiency. Macau law enforcement officials, despite some training on trafficking in persons, did not show any significant efforts to identify victims of trafficking among the foreign women in prostitution arrested for immigration violations or other violations.

Efforts to raise public awareness of the threat of trafficking in persons were absent, and the authorities of the Macau Special Administrative Region did not initiate any policy discussions that would lead to a policy and action plan for dealing with trafficking in the territory.

Malaysia

The Government of Malaysia has made minimal progress in combating trafficking in persons since the release of the 2006 Report. A commitment made in 2004 to open a shelter for trafficking victims remains unfulfilled. The government has yet to produce a clear policy or structure for dealing with trafficking; it has not acted on a draft anti-trafficking plan of action developed late in 2004 by Malaysia's Human Rights Commission with USG-funded technical assistance. Individual ministries within the government appear committed to taking steps to address trafficking but they lack the direction or political leadership necessary for a coordinated and effective approach.

The Malaysian government announced in December that it is drafting a comprehensive anti-trafficking bill with plans to submit the bill to parliament in March 2007. There have been few efforts to use Malaysia's existing laws to prosecute trafficking in persons crimes. Police and immigration officials at the working level showed recognition of the trafficking problem and a desire to address it, yet they remained stymied by a lack of high-level Malaysian government political commitment and concomitant devotion of resources towards the problem.

The Malaysian government undertook no significant steps to improve the treatment of foreign trafficking victims in Malaysia. Most of these victims continued to be treated as violators of immigration laws and were incarcerated in jails or immigration detention centers pending removal. Others were allowed to seek refuge in a shelter run by their home government's embassy or consulate in Malaysia while they awaited deportation. The government continued to round up migrant workers who had run away from their Malaysian employers and deported them as violators of Malaysian immigration law without screening them to identify and provide care for victims of trafficking. A commitment by Malaysian government officials to support a shelter with services for trafficking victims remained unfulfilled.

Singapore

Since its upgrade to Tier One in the 2006 Report, the Government of Singapore has made further progress in combating trafficking in persons.

The Ministry of Manpower instituted a number of new measures aimed at addressing working conditions and abuses of foreign domestic workers. In September 2006, employment agencies' accreditation bodies introduced a new standard contract for employers of foreign domestics that guarantees at least one day off per month or additional pay. In October 2006, the Ministry ordered that foreign domestics may demand direct deposit of their salaries into their bank accounts. Also in October, the Ministry started a newsletter that is mailed directly to foreign domestic workers. The newsletter, provided in several languages, includes information on their rights and responsibilities, as well as on the importance of workplace safety. The government continued to prosecute abusive employers of foreign domestics. In October 2006, an employer was sentenced to 9 months in prison for scolding her maid and beating her.

The Government of Singapore continued to work with NGOs and foreign embassies to ensure that victims of sexual exploitation are provided shelter, counseling, health care, and physical security. Responding to the recent news and public outcry over Vietnamese brides being brought to Singapore to find husbands, an inter-agency working group on marriage brokers set up in early 2006 continues to consult with broker agencies, but has yet to issue recommendations to improve the way they conduct business and prevent potential trafficking.

The Ministry of Manpower launched a new program of randomly interviewing foreign domestic workers to evaluate their working conditions, including possible forced labor or involuntary servitude, and to reinforce knowledge of their rights, responsibilities, and safety. The Singapore government, however, has yet to implement a systematic screening of at-risk populations such as migrant workers and foreign women in prostitution in order to identify and care for victims of trafficking.

Taiwan

Taiwan authorities have made modest progress in combating trafficking in persons since the release of the 2006 Report. In November, Taiwan authorities issued an Action Plan that opens a dialogue with civil society and created a multi-agency task force to be headed by a specially appointed cabinet-level minister. The Taiwan authorities reported an increased number of cases submitted for prosecution in 2006 that are related to trafficking in persons, though it is not known how many involve actual trafficking crimes. Prosecutions and convictions through October 2006 for child sexual abuse, including trafficking offenses, decreased to 98 from 150 during the same timeframe in 2005, but conviction rates increased by twelve percent. Taiwan authorities, however, failed to prosecute any offenses of trafficking for forced labor or domestic servitude despite evidence of a significant trafficking problem among the 350,000 Thai, Indonesian, Vietnamese, and Filipino workers in Taiwan.

Taiwan authorities did not make progress in developing a system to identify and protect foreign workers who have been subjected to conditions of forced labor or involuntary servitude. A few NGOs are the only source of protection and legal aid for foreign victims of trafficking who have fled from abusive Taiwan employers. Taiwan labor brokers reportedly continued to deport involuntarily foreign workers who complained about abusive conditions, preventing any opportunity for the worker to press criminal charges of forced labor. Nevertheless, the Council for Labor Affairs made significant improvements in its policies and regulations governing the terms and conditions of work for foreign laborers in Taiwan, including bilateral agreements reached with Indonesia, the Philippines, Thailand, and Vietnam, to allow foreign domestic workers to apply directly to the Taiwan Council for Labor Affairs for work, rather than going through Taiwan labor brokerage agencies that are known for exploitative practices. To encourage foreign workers to cooperate with time-consuming trafficking investigations and prosecutions, Taiwan authorities ceased the practice of deducting the time required to complete a trafficking case from the authorized work period in Taiwan. Punishment for employers who exploit foreign laborers and use forced labor, however, remain administrative (fines), and thus inadequate to deter additional trafficking crimes.

To prevent trafficking of Southeast Asian women through fraudulent marriages - which has become a significant problem in Taiwan - the Ministry of Interior banned the registration of new international marriage firms based in Taiwan and strengthened regulations and monitoring of existing firms. Steps taken by the Taiwan Ministry of Foreign Affairs to tighten the screening of Southeast Asian women applying for visas as "brides" of Taiwan men has led to a marked decrease in the number of spousal visas issued.

NEAR EAST

Algeria

The Government of Algeria has not reported progress in combating trafficking in persons since the release of the 2006 Report. The government did not develop or implement a national plan of action to combat trafficking in persons. It continues to treat trafficking victims as illegal migrants. The government operates three centers for illegal migrants and victims of trafficking, but does not have a formal mechanism to identify trafficking victims systematically and refer them to protective services. As such, trafficking victims risk detention and deportation.

Algerian law includes anti-trafficking in persons punishments of fines ranging between $414-$1,414 or prison sentences of 2 to 6 months. Media and NGO reports indicate that investigations and arrests have occurred, but the government has not provided information about them. The Gendarmerie Nationale established an institute of criminology in early 2006 to improve coordination of law enforcement activities against trafficking in persons.

The Government of Algeria has not instituted a public awareness campaign highlighting the rights and obligations of expatriate workers, and the consequences of abusing such workers. The government has not reported any steps to combat trafficking for commercial sexual exploitation to or through Algeria.

Bahrain

The Government of Bahrain made uneven progress in combating trafficking in persons since the release of the 2006 Report. In November, the government opened a shelter capable of accommodating 60-80 trafficking victims, and offering medical, psychological, and legal care. Victims have access to library and recreational facilities, as well as skills training while they await repatriation. Victims can only enter the shelter by police referral, and for reasons of security, they are only permitted to leave the premises for official business purposes. The shelter receives only female victims of trafficking.

Bahrain has yet to pass or enact comprehensive anti-trafficking draft legislation that was written in March 2006, but the newly elected parliament is expected to take it up in the new legislative session. Bahrain reports using other statutes to prosecute trafficking crimes, but it is unclear how many of these cases actually involve trafficking. Current legislation is inadequate to prosecute trafficking crimes, particularly those committed against domestic workers and laborers in the construction industry who face conditions of involuntary servitude.

The Government of Bahrain has not formalized victim identification procedures to distinguish trafficking victims from prostitutes and illegal migrants. Currently, victims of trafficking are arrested for prostitution or for violating immigration laws and are jailed or detained until prosecuted or deported, without being offered victim protection services. Victims are still expected to identify themselves as victims of trafficking to the police before receiving entry to the new government-sponsored shelter, but they are often discouraged from doing so for fear of arrest and/or deportation.

Egypt

The Government of Egypt has made minimal progress in combating trafficking in persons since the release of the 2006 Report. In October, Egypt took steps to form an inter-ministerial committee to coordinate the government's anti-trafficking operations, but the committee has not yet been formally established.

Since the release of the June 2006 Report, the Government of Egypt has not provided evidence of new criminal investigations or prosecutions of trafficking offenses under existing statutes. Egypt similarly failed to improve its system of formal identification of trafficking victims. Border officials interdict foreigners who are illegally traveling to Israel and turn them over to their embassies for repatriation rather than jailing them, but the government still has not given any indication that it interviews them for evidence of trafficking, thereby undermining potential victims' ability to participate in criminal investigations or trials against their traffickers. The Government of Egypt also has not assessed the level of trafficking of children for household and agricultural work, nor has it instituted a public awareness campaign to educate employers on the consequences of participating in trafficking of children for this purpose.

Israel

The Government of Israel made noticeable progress in combating trafficking in persons since the release of the 2006 Report. In October, the government amended its existing anti-trafficking statute that criminalizes trafficking in persons. The amendment expanded the previous definition of trafficking that had been limited to trafficking for commercial sexual exploitation to include forced labor and slavery, among other offenses. Penalties under this law include imprisonment of up to 16 years for most trafficking offenses, which can be increased to 20 years in jail if the crime was committed against a minor. Notably, the amendment also permits the government to confiscate traffickers' assets to fund a victim compensation program.

The Government of Israel did not report any prosecutions for trafficking for the purpose of labor exploitation under existing laws, including bans on related activities such as withholding workers' passports and charging recruitment fees, practices local NGOs report are common. The government, however, continued its prosecution of cases of trafficking for commercial sexual exploitation; since June 2006, it reportedly brought 27 new trafficking cases to court.

Expanding on previous legal aid services provided to victims of trafficking for commercial sexual exploitation, the Government of Israel launched a two-year pilot program to offer legal aid to all victims of trafficking. Under this program, victims of labor trafficking have access to legal resources and victims in general do not have to meet economic criteria to receive this assistance. In addition, courts are now authorized to hear cases in closed courtrooms to prevent publication of details identifying the victims, thereby protecting them from retribution from their traffickers and ensuring their privacy.

In May 2006, the Government officially appointed a national coordinator from the Ministry of Justice to manage Israel's anti-trafficking strategy and inter-ministerial cooperation.

Kuwait

The Government of Kuwait has made limited progress in combating trafficking in persons since the release of the 2006 Report. Although the government ratified the UN Protocol on combating TIP last year, giving the protocol the force of law in Kuwait, it still has not passed a national law providing implementation guidelines for the Protocol's provisions. Therefore, it is not clear what penalties traffickers would receive if prosecuted in Kuwaiti courts using the Protocol. Though there is high-level interest in combating TIP, the Government does not have a national plan of action to combat trafficking in persons. Although the government provided some statistics for prosecutions and convictions of offenses related to trafficking, it is unclear how many, if any, involve trafficking.

There have been increased local media reports of women forced into commercial sexual exploitation. The Government asserts that it screens those arrested for prostitution to identify victims who have been coerced into the commercial sex trade, but it has provided no evidence of a systematic victim identification procedure in place in police stations or detention centers where arrested prostitutes are detained. Similarly, Kuwait lacks a system to identify trafficking victims among foreign workers arrested and deported for running away from their employers. Subsequently, it is believed that many victims of involuntary servitude are deported before having the opportunity to file a complaint against their employer. The Government of Kuwait also has not improved physical protection services to trafficking victims; a shelter was proposed by the interagency committee on expatriate worker affairs, but so far no shelter has been established to protect victims and provide them with medical, psychological, and other rehabilitative services.

In October 2006, the Government of Kuwait implemented a standardized contract for domestic workers outlining their rights, including work hours, wages, and their right to retain their passports. The government claims that foreign workers will not be issued a visa to enter Kuwait for domestic work until the Kuwaiti embassy in their country validates this standardized contract. It remains unclear, however, how the terms of the contract will be enforced once workers are in Kuwait.

Since July 2006, the Ministry of Awqaf and Islamic Affairs has prepared to implement the Government of Kuwait's National Awareness Raising Project for Domestic Workers. The ministry conducted surveys to assess the needs of domestic workers, as well as the concerns of employers and manpower agencies. The Government of Kuwait plans to officially launch a public awareness project in January to educate workers and employers on their rights and obligations.

Libya

The Government of Libya has made minimal progress in combating trafficking in persons since the release of the 2006 Report. In April, the Government of Libya formally permitted the opening of a Tripoli office of the IOM, which will work on trafficking issues. With financial assistance from the Governments of Italy and Libya, IOM in September 2006 conducted a technical workshop for 70 police officials and representatives from the Ministry of Justice and the Prime Minister's office. Although the workshop focused primarily on international immigration law, some attention was given to issues of migrants' rights and best practices related to the repatriation and reintegration of stranded migrants, many of whom fall victim to trafficking.

Nonetheless, the Government of Libya took no steps to institute a formal mechanism to identify trafficking victims, particularly among foreigners detained and deported for illegal migration and those arrested for prostitution. Libya also did not improve its protection services for identified victims. The government has not taken steps to develop a national plan of action on trafficking in persons, which would focus Libya's anti-trafficking strategy.

Libya has similarly failed to report any criminal investigations or prosecutions of suspected traffickers despite reports of widespread confiscation of workers' passports and non-payment of wages for long periods of time, indicators of potential trafficking. Although corruption among customs and border officials is believed to be widespread and possibly used to facilitate trafficking, the Government of Libya has provided no evidence of efforts to combat this problem. In addition, no public awareness program exists to highlight the rights and obligations of employers and workers or to raise general awareness about trafficking in persons.

Oman

The Government of Oman has taken some steps to combat trafficking in persons but made minimal progress since the release of the 2006 report. In July, the Sultan issued Royal Decree 74/2006 prohibiting the use of forced labor and establishing prison terms and fines as possible penalties for violations. However, the law stipulates that the prison sentences available under this decree are not mandatory and cannot exceed one month and thus provide inadequate protection to workers. The Minister of Manpower issued an administrative circular in November 2006 that prohibits employers from withholding workers' passports without consent. Although this administrative measure is legally enforceable, the Ministry failed to articulate how this regulation would be enforced and what criminal penalties violators might receive.

Oman, however, has provided no evidence that it has developed a national plan of action to combat trafficking, or a system of protective services for victims. Similarly, the government did not offer statistics on the number of investigations or prosecutions of trafficking offenses. The Government also did not supply evidence of steps to institute a formal procedure to identify trafficking victims from among the thousands of individuals deported every year.

Qatar

The Government of Qatar made limited progress in combating trafficking in persons since the release of the 2006 Report. Although the government provided information on 24 prosecutions purportedly related to trafficking for commercial sexual exploitation, the traffickers were charged under anti-prostitution statutes. Two Qataris were convicted of abusing a foreign domestic worker and sentenced to 5 years in prison. Similarly, the Government of Qatar has not instituted a formal mechanism to identify trafficking victims, particularly among the population of foreign workers detained and deported for running away from their sponsors.

The Government of Qatar has drafted, but not passed, amendments to its sponsorship regulations to protect the rights of foreign workers. Current regulations have the effect of restricting workers' movements and facilitating the detention and deportation of foreign workers, some of whom may be victims of involuntary servitude. Absent effective procedures for victim identification, it is believed that many victims of trafficking are deported without access to criminal justice and employers subsequently remain unpunished.

The Qatari government has drafted an anti-trafficking law that is being circulated to relevant agencies for comment. The government expects the draft law's review to be completed by the end of 2006, but it is unclear when the law will be enacted. The director of the Supreme Council for Family Affairs also noted that a new law specifically addressing domestic workers is also being drafted; however, domestic workers remain unprotected by general labor laws.

Restrictions on trafficking victims' access to a shelter opened by the government last year have been removed; police or government agency referral is no longer required. Victims may refer themselves via the government-run hotline or in person. The government has widely publicized the existence of the shelter and the hotlines in local newspapers, on TV (local and regional), and via brochures, posters, and leaflets. Although victims may still fear arrest and deportation if they contact police, the shelter has accommodated 20 cases attributed to trafficking in persons. The National Trafficking in Persons Office has assisted victims by providing: work, transfer of sponsorship, health care, financial support, lodging, legal assistance, and repatriation. The Government of Qatar has not provided statistics on how many additional victims may have contacted the government-run hotlines and how their cases were resolved.

Trafficking in persons training has been incorporated into basic training at the police academy and the National Trafficking in Persons Office conducted a five-day workshop for law enforcement and security officers in August. Representatives also trained immigration officers during the opening of the Doha Asian Games to assist them in identifying potential trafficking victims as they entered the country.

The rest of the document can be viewed at <http://>

LOAD-DATE: January 23, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

299 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

January 17, 2007 Wednesday

Gambia; Gambia Makes More Progress in Monitoring Human Trafficking

BYLINE: The Daily ObserverLENGTH: 232 words

The Gambia government has positively stepped up its activities in the monitoring and combating of human trafficking, thus resulting in the reassessment in 2006 to a higher level of Tier 2 from Tier 2 watch list by the United States Department of State Office to monitor and combat trafficking in persons, a Department of State official with direct knowledge to monitor and combat trafficking in persons, told this reporter.

The Gambia was reassessed and taken from the watch list. It could be recalled that the government passed, in 2005, a child trafficking act and started to draft a comprehensive trafficking law that prohibits trafficking in adults.

The government did even better in opening a shelter in Banjul that can accommodate 48 persons and establish a hotline. They also established a hotline for reporting trafficking crimes and information centre for victims.

Cracking down on nine cases of trafficking in persons, the government with Child Protection Alliance (CPA-an NGO umbrella group) conducted sensitisation programmes.

Prior to the reassessment, The Gambia has a weak law enforcement and victim's protection efforts towards trafficking in persons that resulted in the placement to Tier 2 watch list-a designation of ranking for countries that are in danger of slipping down to the third Tier, a position that can lead to non-trade and non-humanitarian sanctions on a country.

LOAD-DATE: January 18, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

300 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

January 4, 2007 Thursday

Nigeria; 32 Foreigners On Immigration Watch List

BYLINE: VanguardLENGTH: 266 words

Thirty-Two foreigners are on the watch list of the Nigerian Immigration Service (NIS) over suspicion of involvement in acts of terrorism, human trafficking, among others.

A document obtained from the Nigerian Immigration Service also revealed that 31 other foreigners who were earlier repatriated or deported from Nigeria would no longer be welcome in the country.

Another document from the Department of Citizenship and Business in the Ministry of Internal Affairs further revealed that 908 expatriates were stopped from working in Nigeria in 2006.

"The total number of foreigners stop listed or watch listed stands at 31 and 32 respectively. On the other hand, 12 Nigerian youths were intercepted at exit points, attempting to leave the country and were handed over to NAPTIP for necessary action," the document said, adding: "During the period under review, a number of cases were investigated, illegal aliens that constitute security risk were deported or repatriated while apprehended passport and visa racketeers were charged to court.

An informed source told Vanguard of the likelihood of the 32 foreigners being on the watch list of all relevant agencies, which may be involved in the investigation of the activities of the affected foreigners.

The Department of Citizenship and Business on the other hand said it revoked 908 working permits of expatriates, out of 7,807 in Nigeria.

It said 2,652 expatriate quotas were approved last years, which fetched N26.38 million in revenue, while the total revenue earned from expatriate quota administration and enforcement stood at N136.41 million in 2006.

LOAD-DATE: January 4, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

301 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Mercury News

Found on BayArea.com
San Jose Mercury News (California)

December 12, 2006 Tuesday

Taiwan shelter helps abused Vietnamese workers; MOSTLY FUNDED BY VIETNAMESE IN CALIFORNIA

BYLINE: K. Oanh Ha, Mercury News

SECTION: A; Pg. 1

LENGTH: 1187 words

Ta Thi Giam, a Vietnamese mother and wife, was lured by the promise to make $500 a month. She left her home in a poor village outside Hanoi to toil in a Taiwan nursing home, hoping to use the income to send her children to school.

Instead, Ta said, she was virtually enslaved by her Taiwanese employer, who beat her, deprived her of food and forced her to work until she collapsed.

"They treat you like a beast, not a human being," Ta, 36, said. "They do it because they know you have nowhere, nobody to run to."

Ta fled, after a grueling 18-hour shift in which her fingers curled toward her palms and locked. She found help at a shelter near Taipei run by two Catholic priests and funded mostly by donations from Vietnamese-Americans in California.

Ta's predicament illustrates the growing abuse of migrant workers in Taiwan. Vietnamese workers at the shelter have been raped, beaten, sexually trafficked, coerced into forced labor and cheated out of their wages. The problems are endemic in a flourishing industry in which brokers in both countries profit by duping workers. Abusive employers are complicit, and lax Taiwanese labor laws criminalize workers who flee.

Taiwan officials acknowledge the problem, but critics say they're not doing enough to stem it.

"This is a big, big problem -- trafficking of Vietnamese workers and labor slavery," said Father Nguyen Van Hung, who runs the Vietnamese Migrant Workers & Brides Office outside Taipei in a gated compound that houses a small Catholic church and preschool. "But nobody wants responsibility to protect them, not the Vietnamese or Taiwanese governments."

The office has dealt with 2,500 cases of victimized Vietnamese since it opened in spring 2004. Several hundred are sheltered each year.

The plight of the laborers has alarmed the Vietnamese-American community in California, which covers most of the shelter's operating costs. Bay Area community groups raised $15,000 at a fundraising dinner for the shelter Friday. Nguyen flew from Taiwan for the event, and was given a standing ovation by nearly 300 in attendance.

"This is a pain shared by everyone in our community," Le Van Hai, a dinner organizer, told the crowd. "We must all do our part to ease the tragedy in Taiwan."

The problem is so widespread that the U.S. State Department upgraded Taiwan to a "watch list" in its 2006 Trafficking in Persons report, a step away from being among the worst in human trafficking.

According to the report, "a significant share of (Taiwan's 340,000) foreign workers -- primarily from Vietnam, Thailand and the Philippines -- are recruited legally for low-skilled jobs . . . and are subjected to forced labor or involuntary servitude by labor agencies or employers upon arrival in Taiwan."

The vast majority work as domestic servants and caregivers in private homes where they are not protected by Taiwanese labor laws, while others are in construction or manufacturing industries.

Although Taiwan enacted new regulations this year to protect workers, most abusive employers face only fines rather than prosecution, according to the State Department report.

"The government is concerned about the workers and . . . is working on policies to protect them," said spokesman David Wang of Taiwan's Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

Taiwan began importing workers from Vietnam in 1999 to address labor shortages. At present, 71,000 Vietnamese workers are in Taiwan, in addition to 10,000 "runaway" workers who have illegally left their jobs, according to the island's government.

A Catholic missionary stationed in Taiwan the past 19 years, Nguyen opened the shelter after encountering abused Vietnamese with nowhere to turn. Most find him through word of mouth. During a recent two-hour period, Nguyen received four phone calls from workers pleading for help. One call came from South Africa where Vietnamese working on a boat were beaten for five days by the Taiwanese ship owner who had smuggled them out of Vietnam.

Many of the "runaway" workers are fleeing situations such as Ta's. She left her abusive employer in the dead of night. A friend gave her the priest's number. Ta fled with no money, cell phone or identity papers because her employer had confiscated them. "They want you to just be blind and mute," said Ta. "They want to control you."

Most workers deplete family savings and assume debt to pay broker's fees, ranging from several thousand to $8,000, to legally immigrate to Taiwan. Most, however, receive a tiny portion of their wages, the rest going to the broker or to kickbacks for the employer. Often, employers refuse to pay.

Many are controlled by abusive employers with threats they will be sent back to Vietnam empty-handed if they make trouble. Laborers keep more of their earnings during the second year of their contract -- but employers and brokers often plot to send workers home by then.

Faced with abuse or threats of repatriation, many workers run away. But once they leave their employers, they're subject to deportation or lock-up in detention centers. "Taiwan's laws criminalize workers rather than protect them," said Father Nguyen Cuong, who also helps run the shelter. "The workers are very vulnerable and easily exploited."

The priest, who hails from San Jose, rails that the Taiwanese government condones the abuses by not clamping down hard enough on the broker business.

Though Vietnam's government has a representative and office in Taipei, the priests and workers say Vietnamese officials have not responded to pleas for help.

Instead, the priests serve as legal advisers, psychologists and friends to those who seek the shelter. They help laborers sue in civil court for wages owed, and have helped press criminal charges in some cases.

The office is a stark, narrow space on the second floor of a one-room preschool. Hanging on the wood-paneled walls are a cross and an embroidery of a Vietnamese pastoral scene, similar to the rural provinces from which most workers came.

During the day, the office serves as a legal center, classroom and dining hall, with tables and chairs routinely moved around. The 25 migrants now at the shelter, mostly poor women from rural villages, are housed in nearby apartments. They spend most of their day at the shelter, learning computer skills, English, Mandarin and karate.

About half have been raped or sexually assaulted by their employers. A few are abused Vietnamese brides who married Taiwanese men as part of a financial arrangement.

Many don't dare tell family members in Vietnam the truth. The 34-year-old alleged rape victim is married with two children and worries her husband in Vietnam will leave her. She went to Taiwan over his protests.

Despite the possibility she could be abused again by another employer, she, like most victims, wants to stay in Taiwan to work. She paid a Vietnamese broker $2,000 for her visa.

"I left my family without a dollar," she said through tears. "My life is destroyed. I can't go back to Vietnam with nothing. I have to take my chances and stay."

IF YOU'RE INTERESTED www.taiwanact.net

Contact K. Oanh Ha at kha@mercurynews.com or (408) 278-3457.

LOAD-DATE: December 12, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2006 San Jose Mercury News
All Rights Reserved

302 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Mercury News

Found on BayArea.com
San Jose Mercury News (California)

December 12, 2006 Tuesday

Taiwan shelter helps abused Vietnamese workers; MOSTLY FUNDED BY VIETNAMESE IN CALIFORNIA

BYLINE: K. Oanh Ha, Mercury News

SECTION: A; Pg. 1

LENGTH: 1187 words

Ta Thi Giam, a Vietnamese mother and wife, was lured by the promise to make $500 a month. She left her home in a poor village outside Hanoi to toil in a Taiwan nursing home, hoping to use the income to send her children to school.

Instead, Ta said, she was virtually enslaved by her Taiwanese employer, who beat her, deprived her of food and forced her to work until she collapsed.

"They treat you like a beast, not a human being," Ta, 36, said. "They do it because they know you have nowhere, nobody to run to."

Ta fled, after a grueling 18-hour shift in which her fingers curled toward her palms and locked. She found help at a shelter near Taipei run by two Catholic priests and funded mostly by donations from Vietnamese-Americans in California.

Ta's predicament illustrates the growing abuse of migrant workers in Taiwan. Vietnamese workers at the shelter have been raped, beaten, sexually trafficked, coerced into forced labor and cheated out of their wages. The problems are endemic in a flourishing industry in which brokers in both countries profit by duping workers. Abusive employers are complicit, and lax Taiwanese labor laws criminalize workers who flee.

Taiwan officials acknowledge the problem, but critics say they're not doing enough to stem it.

"This is a big, big problem -- trafficking of Vietnamese workers and labor slavery," said Father Nguyen Van Hung, who runs the Vietnamese Migrant Workers & Brides Office outside Taipei in a gated compound that houses a small Catholic church and preschool. "But nobody wants responsibility to protect them, not the Vietnamese or Taiwanese governments."

The office has dealt with 2,500 cases of victimized Vietnamese since it opened in spring 2004. Several hundred are sheltered each year.

The plight of the laborers has alarmed the Vietnamese-American community in California, which covers most of the shelter's operating costs. Bay Area community groups raised $15,000 at a fundraising dinner for the shelter Friday. Nguyen flew from Taiwan for the event, and was given a standing ovation by nearly 300 in attendance.

"This is a pain shared by everyone in our community," Le Van Hai, a dinner organizer, told the crowd. "We must all do our part to ease the tragedy in Taiwan."

The problem is so widespread that the U.S. State Department upgraded Taiwan to a "watch list" in its 2006 Trafficking in Persons report, a step away from being among the worst in human trafficking.

According to the report, "a significant share of (Taiwan's 340,000) foreign workers -- primarily from Vietnam, Thailand and the Philippines -- are recruited legally for low-skilled jobs . . . and are subjected to forced labor or involuntary servitude by labor agencies or employers upon arrival in Taiwan."

The vast majority work as domestic servants and caregivers in private homes where they are not protected by Taiwanese labor laws, while others are in construction or manufacturing industries.

Although Taiwan enacted new regulations this year to protect workers, most abusive employers face only fines rather than prosecution, according to the State Department report.

"The government is concerned about the workers and . . . is working on policies to protect them," said spokesman David Wang of Taiwan's Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

Taiwan began importing workers from Vietnam in 1999 to address labor shortages. At present, 71,000 Vietnamese workers are in Taiwan, in addition to 10,000 "runaway" workers who have illegally left their jobs, according to the island's government.

A Catholic missionary stationed in Taiwan the past 19 years, Nguyen opened the shelter after encountering abused Vietnamese with nowhere to turn. Most find him through word of mouth. During a recent two-hour period, Nguyen received four phone calls from workers pleading for help. One call came from South Africa where Vietnamese working on a boat were beaten for five days by the Taiwanese ship owner who had smuggled them out of Vietnam.

Many of the "runaway" workers are fleeing situations such as Ta's. She left her abusive employer in the dead of night. A friend gave her the priest's number. Ta fled with no money, cell phone or identity papers because her employer had confiscated them. "They want you to just be blind and mute," said Ta. "They want to control you."

Most workers deplete family savings and assume debt to pay broker's fees, ranging from several thousand to $8,000, to legally immigrate to Taiwan. Most, however, receive a tiny portion of their wages, the rest going to the broker or to kickbacks for the employer. Often, employers refuse to pay.

Many are controlled by abusive employers with threats they will be sent back to Vietnam empty-handed if they make trouble. Laborers keep more of their earnings during the second year of their contract -- but employers and brokers often plot to send workers home by then.

Faced with abuse or threats of repatriation, many workers run away. But once they leave their employers, they're subject to deportation or lock-up in detention centers. "Taiwan's laws criminalize workers rather than protect them," said Father Nguyen Cuong, who also helps run the shelter. "The workers are very vulnerable and easily exploited."

The priest, who hails from San Jose, rails that the Taiwanese government condones the abuses by not clamping down hard enough on the broker business.

Though Vietnam's government has a representative and office in Taipei, the priests and workers say Vietnamese officials have not responded to pleas for help.

Instead, the priests serve as legal advisers, psychologists and friends to those who seek the shelter. They help laborers sue in civil court for wages owed, and have helped press criminal charges in some cases.

The office is a stark, narrow space on the second floor of a one-room preschool. Hanging on the wood-paneled walls are a cross and an embroidery of a Vietnamese pastoral scene, similar to the rural provinces from which most workers came.

During the day, the office serves as a legal center, classroom and dining hall, with tables and chairs routinely moved around. The 25 migrants now at the shelter, mostly poor women from rural villages, are housed in nearby apartments. They spend most of their day at the shelter, learning computer skills, English, Mandarin and karate.

About half have been raped or sexually assaulted by their employers. A few are abused Vietnamese brides who married Taiwanese men as part of a financial arrangement.

Many don't dare tell family members in Vietnam the truth. The 34-year-old alleged rape victim is married with two children and worries her husband in Vietnam will leave her. She went to Taiwan over his protests.

Despite the possibility she could be abused again by another employer, she, like most victims, wants to stay in Taiwan to work. She paid a Vietnamese broker $2,000 for her visa.

"I left my family without a dollar," she said through tears. "My life is destroyed. I can't go back to Vietnam with nothing. I have to take my chances and stay."

IF YOU'RE INTERESTED www.taiwanact.net

Contact K. Oanh Ha at kha@mercurynews.com or (408) 278-3457.

LOAD-DATE: December 12, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2006 San Jose Mercury News
All Rights Reserved

303 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

December 8, 2006 Friday 9:14 PM TST

LEGISLATION CRITICAL TO STOP TAIWAN'S HUMAN TRAFFICKING: U.S.

BYLINE: Chris WangLENGTH: 360 wordsDATELINE: Taipei, Dec. 8

Anti-trafficking legislation is desperately needed if Taiwan is to prevent its human trafficking problem from worsening, Taiwan and U.S. officials said Friday in a video conference.

Taiwan was listed on the Tier 2 Watch List in the 2006 U.S. Trafficking in People Report published in June, primarily because it failed to show increased efforts in fighting trafficking during the past year, said James Husky, chief of the political section at the American Institute in Taiwan Taipei Office.

Human trafficking is seen as the modern-day slavery, which is very different from slavery in the past, said Washington-based John Miller, Director of U.S. State Department's Office of Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons (G/TIP), in the conference that gathered public prosecutors, officials and law enforcers from Taipei and Kaohsiung.

About 800,000 people are trafficked across national borders each year, which does not count millions trafficked within their own countries, said Miller, whose office coordinates the U.S. efforts in the global fight against modern-day slavery, including forced labor and sex exploitation.

Being listed on the Tier 2 Watch List means Taiwan does not comply with the minimum standards and requires special scrutiny because of a high or significantly increasing number of victims and a failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat human trafficking.

Miller said the "Three Ps" principle -- prevention, protection and prosecution -- should be used when dealing with trafficking issues.

The national action plan to fight trafficking, which was initiated by the Executive Yuan, was a great first step for Taiwan, said Mark Taylor, Senior Coordinator for Reports of G/TIP.

Legislation makes sure the traffickers will be punished, but the implementation of the law is equally important as well, Taylor noted.

Public prosecutors and officials from Taipei and Kaohsiung mentioned the difficulties under the current system to define trafficking cases and identify victims.

"If a person ends up losing his freedom, it's a trafficking case," Miller said, adding that government agencies should also work with non-government organizations.

LOAD-DATE: December 8, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 Central News Agency
All Rights Reserved

304 of 445 DOCUMENTS

November 24, 2006 Friday

Stepping down: John Miller looks over papers at the airport in Seattle in June 2005. Miller has traveled the world and met thousands of survivors of ...

BYLINE: Les Blumenthal, McClatchy NewspapersSECTION: C; Pg. 2LENGTH: 1347 words

Stepping down: John Miller looks over papers at the airport in Seattle in June 2005. Miller has traveled the world and met thousands of survivors of 21st-century slavery since becoming head of the U.S. State Department's office dealing with human trafficking in 2002. He is now stepping down from that role.

Battle against human trafficking to continue

He met her in a Starbucks in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia. While the story she told was gut-wrenching, it wasn't unlike those he'd heard countless times over the past four years.

Nour Miyati, an Indonesian woman in her 20s, had come to Saudi Arabia to work as a domestic servant. But her dream of supporting her family back home turned into a nightmare. Her employers abused and tortured her. She lost fingers and toes to gangrene when the wounds from her beatings went untreated and festered. When she finally escaped and sought justice in a Saudi court, she was sentenced to 79 lashes.

"It was heart-rending," John Miller said of his meeting with Miyati.

A tall, lanky former congressman from Washington state, Miller has traveled the world as the head of the State Department's office to monitor and combat human trafficking. But after visiting 50 countries since 2002, pleading his case with crown princes and prime ministers and meeting, by his count, more than 1,000 survivors of 21st-century slavery, Miller is moving on.

"It's been rewarding and I think we have made a difference," Miller said in an interview. "But I'm worn down, and after four years it is time for a change."

As he leaves to take a job as a professor at George Washington University, Miller said the human trafficking problem can be overwhelming. There are no easy answers or quick fixes, and even the blunt threats of diplomacy, such as withholding aid or imposing sanctions, can be ineffective.

Mostly female: Every year, an estimated 600,000 to 800,000 men, women and children are trafficked across international borders, according to the State Department. About 80 percent of them are women and girls. Up to half are minors. Most of them are victims of sex trafficking, winding up as prostitutes in countries ranging from the Dominican Republic to the Netherlands to Japan. Others are forced to become beggars, child soldiers or camel jockeys. Still others are forced to work in sweatshops 20 hours a day or are trapped in involuntary servitude as construction or domestic workers.

After four years of listening to victims' heart-rending stories, Miller is hard to shock.

He recalled meeting an 11-year-old who worked in an embroidery factory in Southeast Asia whose owner poured acid on her and shot her. He met a man in India who was an indentured servant at a brick mill because his grandfather had borrowed 20 or 30 rupees years ago and the family had been unable to repay the debt. In Amsterdam, he met a Czech woman who was forced into prostitution after being told she'd never see her 2-year-old daughter again if she didn't cooperate.

"Intellectually you know this has been with us since the pharaohs," Miller said. "But when you see it, when you meet with the survivors, it hits you - it's human greed that leads to this type of abuse."

No country unaffected: When it comes to human trafficking, no country is clean, including the United States. Every year, about 17,500 people are smuggled across U.S. borders into slavery, Miller said.

"Are we doing enough?" Miller said. "No. No country is doing enough."

Each year, the State Department is required to submit a report to Congress on what other countries are doing to eliminate human trafficking. This year, the report assessed the efforts of 149 countries. Twelve of them, including Saudi Arabia, Iran, Venezuela and Zimbabwe, were identified as Tier 3 countries that don't comply with minimum standards and aren't making significant steps to comply. Another 32 countries were on a watch list.

Under U.S. law, the federal government can withhold non-humanitarian aid from the worst offenders. In addition, these countries can face U.S. opposition to assistance from such international financial institutions as the World Bank. But such steps are rarely taken and, in most cases, the threats are toothless. Most Tier 3 countries don't receive U.S. aid or international financial assistance.

Signs of progress: Though there's no way to know whether the number of human trafficking victims has peaked, Miller said there are signs of progress. More than 80 countries have passed anti-trafficking laws in the past two years. This year, there'll be an estimated 4,700 convictions in trafficking cases. Two or three years ago, there were several hundred. The number of shelters for victims is growing, as is public awareness.

But even as the international community is struggling to control current levels of human trafficking, a new threat is looming - the worldwide migration of an estimated 120 million workers spurred on by globalization and the proliferation of free-trade agreements. It's an area ripe for worker abuse.

The State Department called it the latest "trafficking phenomenon" as migrant workers are flooding rapidly developing countries in Asia and the Near East, attracted by low-skilled construction, manufacturing, agriculture and domestic jobs.

Critics say the proliferation of free-trade agreements has helped fuel this mass migration of workers as businesses in such countries as Jordan try to cash in on trade with the United States.

The National Labor Committee, which investigates labor abuses around the world, said in a recent report that the number of textile factories in Jordan has increased rapidly since the United States signed a free-trade agreement with that country. The report found substandard conditions in 25 of Jordan's roughly 100 textile manufacturing sites. The migrant workers at these factories, many from Bangladesh, face abusive conditions, the report said.

"It's clear there is a huge amount of trafficking all over the world, and we suspect a lot of them (migrant workers) are headed to countries with which we have or may eventually have free-trade agreements," said Charles Kernaghan of the National Labor Committee.

Kernaghan and others say Congress should refuse to approve a pending free-trade agreement with Oman unless strict labor protections are added. Oman is on the State Department's human trafficking watch list.

Kernaghan said when he met with Miller to discuss the situation in Jordan he expected to find an office filled with "political hacks" toeing the free-trade line.

"But they took it seriously," he said. "Miller struck me as a person of integrity and goodwill. He struck me as the real thing, and it's too bad he is leaving."

Miller said that when he raised the issue with the Jordanians, they promised changes.

"They don't want to lose the free-trade agreement," he said.

Miller, a one-time television commentator in Seattle, said when he took the State Department post he knew human trafficking was a major problem. He was a member of the House International Relations Committee while serving in Congress from 1985 to 1993.

"But I didn't know the personal side," he said.

Stories like those of Nour Miyati trouble him, especially the sentence she received. The Saudi court ordered no punishment for her male owner, 35 lashes for her female owner and 79 lashes for Miyati because of disloyalty, he said.

Miller said he raised Miyati's case in a meeting with the Saudi crown prince, and her sentence was reversed. Though Miyati plans to return home to Indonesia eventually, she remains in Saudi Arabia pursuing her case.

"She's still fighting," Miller said. "She is an amazing and courageous person."

Here is a list of Tier 3 countries, or those with the worst records on human trafficking, as compiled by the State Department:

Belize

Burma

Cuba

Iran

Laos

North Korea

Saudi Arabia

Sudan

Syria

Uzbekistan

Venezuela

Zimbabwe

The complete State Department report on human trafficking can be found at:

<http://www.state.gov/g/tip/>

--

PHOTOS (from MCT Photo Service, 202-383-6099): SLAVERY

BC-SLAVERY:WA

Les Blumenthal

McClatchyNewspapers

© 2006, McClatchy-Tribune Information Services.

LOAD-DATE: November 24, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

305 of 445 DOCUMENTS

CONTRA COSTA TIMESFound on BayArea.com
Contra Costa Times (California)November 24, 2006 FridayTackling human trafficking can be overwhelming; Former congressman is moving on after serving as head of State Department office that monitors crisis*BYLINE: Les Blumenthal, McCLATCHY WASHINGTON BUREAUSECTION: Pg. F4LENGTH: 960 words

He met her in a Starbucks in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia. While the story she told was gut-wrenching, it wasn't unlike those he had heard countless times over the past four years.

Nour Miyati, an Indonesian woman in her 20s, had come to Saudi Arabia to work as a domestic servant. But her dream of supporting her family back home turned into a nightmare. Her employers abused and tortured her. She lost fingers and toes to gangrene when the wounds from her beatings went untreated and festered. When she finally escaped and sought justice in a Saudi court, she was sentenced to 79 lashes.

"It was heart-rending," John Miller said of his meeting with Miyati.

A tall, lanky, former congressman from Washington state, Miller has traveled the world as the head of the State Department's office to monitor and combat human trafficking. But after visiting 50 countries since 2002, pleading his case with crown princes and prime ministers and meeting, by his count, more than 1,000 survivors of 21st-century slavery, Miller is moving on.

"It's been rewarding and I think we have made a difference," Miller said. "But I'm worn down, and after four years it is time for a change."

As he leaves to take a job as a professor at George Washington University, Miller said the human trafficking problem can be overwhelming. There are no easy answers or quick fixes, and even the blunt threats of diplomacy, such as withholding aid or imposing sanctions, can be ineffective.

Every year, an estimated 600,000 to 800,000 men, women and children are trafficked across international borders, according to the State Department. About 80 percent of them are women and girls. Up to half are minors. Most of them are victims of sex trafficking, winding up as prostitutes in countries ranging from the Dominican Republic to the Netherlands to Japan. Others are forced to become beggars, child soldiers or camel jockeys. Still others are forced to work in sweatshops 20 hours a day or are trapped in involuntary servitude as construction or domestic workers.

After four years of listening to victims' heart-rending stories, Miller is hard to shock.

He recalled meeting an 11-year-old who worked in an embroidery factory in Southeast Asia whose owner poured acid on her and shot her. He met a man in India who was an indentured servant at a brick mill because his grandfather had borrowed 20 or 30 rupees years ago and the family had been unable to repay the debt. In Amsterdam, he met a Czech woman who was forced into prostitution after being told she would never see her 2-year-old daughter again if she did not cooperate.

"Intellectually you know this has been with us since the pharaohs," Miller said. "But when you see it, when you meet with the survivors, it hits you -- it's human greed that leads to this type of abuse."

When it come to human trafficking, no country is clean, including the United States. Every year, about 17,500 people are smuggled across U.S. borders into slavery, Miller said.

"Are we doing enough?" Miller said. "No. No country is doing enough."

Each year, the State Department is required to submit a report to Congress on what other countries are doing to eliminate human trafficking. This year, the report assessed the efforts of 149 countries. Twelve of them, including Saudi Arabia, Iran, Venezuela and Zimbabwe, were identified as Tier 3 countries, which do not comply with minimum standards and are not making significant steps to comply. Another 32 countries were on a watch list.

Under U.S. law, the federal government can withhold nonhumanitarian aid from the worst offenders. In addition, these countries can face U.S. opposition to assistance from such international financial institutions as the World Bank. But such steps are rarely taken and, in most cases, the threats are toothless. Most Tier 3 countries do not receive U.S. aid or international financial assistance.

Though there is no way to know whether the number of human trafficking victims has peaked, Miller said there are signs of progress. More than 80 countries have passed anti-trafficking laws in the past two years. This year, there will be an estimated 4,700 convictions in trafficking cases. Two or three years ago, there were several hundred. The number of shelters for victims is growing, as is public awareness.

But even as the international community is struggling to control current levels of human trafficking, a new threat is looming -- the worldwide migration of an estimated 120 million workers spurred on by globalization and the proliferation of free-trade agreements. It's an area ripe for worker abuse.

The State Department called it the latest "trafficking phenomenon" as migrant workers are flooding rapidly development countries in Asia and the Near East, attracted by low-skilled construction, manufacturing, agriculture and domestic jobs.

Critics say the proliferation of free-trade agreements has helped fuel this mass migration of workers as businesses in such countries as Jordan try to cash in on trade with the United States.

The National Labor Committee, which investigates labor abuses around the world, said in a recent report that the number of textile factories in Jordan has increased rapidly since the United States signed a free-trade agreement with that country. The report found substandard conditions in 25 of Jordan's roughly 100 textile manufacturing sites. The migrant workers at these factories, many from Bangladesh, face abusive conditions, the report said.

The complete State Department report on human trafficking can be found at:www.state.gov/g/tip/

Here is a list of Tier 3 countries, or those with the worst records on human trafficking, as compiled by the State Department: Belize Burma Cuba Iran Laos North Korea Saudi Arabia Sudan Syria Uzbekistan Venezuela Zimbabwe

LOAD-DATE: November 24, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

306 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Herald News (Passaic County, NJ)

November 24, 2006 Friday
All Editions

Slavery still around; Most victims women and girls

BYLINE: By LES BLUMENTHAL, McClatchy Newspapers, Wire ServicesSECTION: NEWS; Pg. A04LENGTH: 1238 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

WASHINGTON -- He met her in a Starbucks in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia. While the story she told was gut-wrenching, it wasn't unlike those he'd heard countless times over the past four years.

Nour Miyati, an Indonesian woman in her 20s, had come to Saudi Arabia to work as a domestic servant. But her dream of supporting her family back home turned into a nightmare. Her employers abused and tortured her. She lost fingers and toes to gangrene when the wounds from her beatings went untreated and festered. When she finally escaped and sought justice in a Saudi court, she was sentenced to 79 lashes.

"It was heart-rending," John Miller said of his meeting with Miyati.

A tall, lanky, former congressman from Washington state, Miller has traveled the world as the head of the State Department's office to monitor and combat human trafficking. But after visiting 50 countries since 2002, pleading his case with crown princes and prime ministers and meeting, by his count, more than 1,000 survivors of 21st-century slavery, Miller is moving on.

"It's been rewarding and I think we have made a difference," Miller said in an interview. "But I'm worn down, and after four years it is time for a change."

Job took its toll

As he leaves to take a job as a professor at George Washington University, Miller said the human trafficking problem can be overwhelming. There are no easy answers or quick fixes, and even the blunt threats of diplomacy, such as withholding aid or imposing sanctions, can be ineffective.

Every year, an estimated 600,000 to 800,000 men, women and children are trafficked across international borders, according to the State Department. About 80 percent of them are women and girls. As many as half are minors. Most of them are victims of sex trafficking, winding up as prostitutes in countries ranging from the Dominican Republic to the Netherlands to Japan. Others are forced to become beggars, child soldiers or camel jockeys. Still others are forced to work in sweatshops 20 hours a day or are trapped in involuntary servitude as construction or domestic workers.

After four years of listening to victims' heart-rending stories, Miller is hard to shock.

He recalled meeting an 11-year-old who worked in an embroidery factory in Southeast Asia whose owner poured acid on her and shot her. He met a man in India who was an indentured servant at a brick mill because his grandfather had borrowed 20 or 30 rupees years ago and the family had been unable to repay the debt. In Amsterdam, he met a Czech woman who was forced into prostitution after being told she'd never see her 2-year-old daughter again if she didn't cooperate.

"Intellectually you know this has been with us since the pharaohs," Miller said. "But when you see it, when you meet with the survivors, it hits you -- it's human greed that leads to this type of abuse."

Servitude also exists in U.S.

When it come to human trafficking, no country is clean, including the United States. Every year, about 17,500 people are smuggled across U.S. borders into slavery, Miller said.

"Are we doing enough?" Miller said. "No. No country is doing enough."

Each year, the State Department is required to submit a report to Congress on what other countries are doing to eliminate human trafficking. This year, the report assessed the efforts of 149 countries. Twelve of them, including Saudi Arabia, Iran, Venezuela and Zimbabwe, were identified as Tier 3 countries that don't comply with minimum standards and aren't making significant steps to comply. Another 32 countries were on a watch list.

Threats not carried out

Under U.S. law, the federal government can withhold non-humanitarian aid from the worst offenders. In addition, these countries can face U.S. opposition to assistance from such international financial institutions as the World Bank. But such steps are rarely taken and, in most cases, the threats are toothless. Most Tier 3 countries don't receive U.S. aid or international financial assistance.

Though there's no way to know whether the number of human trafficking victims has peaked, Miller said there are signs of progress. More than 80 countries have passed anti-trafficking laws in the past two years. This year, there'll be an estimated 4,700 convictions in trafficking cases. Two or three years ago there were several hundred. The number of shelters for victims is growing, as is public awareness.

Free trade fuels problem

But even as the international community is struggling to control current levels of human trafficking, a new threat is looming -- the worldwide migration of an estimated 120 million workers spurred on by globalization and the proliferation of free-trade agreements. It's an area ripe for worker abuse.

The State Department called it the latest "trafficking phenomenon" as migrant workers are flooding rapidly development countries in Asia and the Near East, attracted by low-skilled construction, manufacturing, agriculture and domestic jobs.

Critics say the proliferation of free-trade agreements has helped fuel this mass migration of workers as businesses in such countries as Jordan try to cash in on trade with the United States.

The National Labor Committee, which investigates labor abuses around the world, said in a recent report that the number of textile factories in Jordan has increased rapidly since the United States signed a free-trade agreement with that country. The report found substandard conditions in 25 of Jordan's roughly 100 textile manufacturing sites. The migrant workers at these factories, many from Bangladesh, face abusive conditions, the report said.

"It's clear there is a huge amount of trafficking all over the world, and we suspect a lot of them (migrant workers) are headed to countries with which we have or may eventually have free-trade agreements," said Charles Kernaghan of the National Labor Committee.

Kernaghan and others say Congress should refuse to approve a pending free-trade agreement with Oman unless strict labor protections are added. Oman is on the State Department's human trafficking watch list.

Kernaghan said when he met with Miller to discuss the situation in Jordan he expected to find an office filled with "political hacks" toeing the free-trade line.

"But they took it seriously," he said. "Miller struck me as a person of integrity and goodwill. He struck me as the real thing, and it's too bad he is leaving."

Miller said that when he raised the issue with the Jordanians, they promised changes.

"They don't want to lose the free-trade agreement," he said.

Miller, a one-time television commentator in Seattle, said when he took the State Department post he knew human trafficking was a major problem. He was a member of the House International Relations Committee while serving in Congress from 1985 to 1993.

"But I didn't know the personal side," he said.

Stories like those of Nour Miyati trouble him, especially the sentence she received. The Saudi court ordered no punishment for her male owner, 35 lashes for her female owner and 79 lashes for Miyati because of disloyalty, he said.

Miller said he raised Miyati's case in a meeting with the Saudi crown prince, and her sentence was reversed. Though Miyati plans to return home to Indonesia eventually, she remains in Saudi Arabia pursuing her case.

"She's still fighting," Miller said. "She is an amazing and courageous person."

The complete State Department report on human trafficking can be found at: <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/>

LOAD-DATE: November 24, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2006 North Jersey Media Group Inc.,
All Rights Reserved

307 of 445 DOCUMENTS

>KNIGHT RIDDER>
WASHINGTON BUREAU

Knight Ridder Washington Bureau

November 23, 2006 ThursdayBattle against human trafficking to continue as diplomat moves on*BYLINE: Les Blumenthal, McClatchy NewspapersSECTION: WLENGTH: 1272 words

WASHINGTON - He met her in a Starbucks in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia. While the story she told was gut-wrenching, it wasn't unlike those he'd heard countless times over the past four years.

Nour Miyati, an Indonesian woman in her 20s, had come to Saudi Arabia to work as a domestic servant. But her dream of supporting her family back home turned into a nightmare. Her employers abused and tortured her. She lost fingers and toes to gangrene when the wounds from her beatings went untreated and festered. When she finally escaped and sought justice in a Saudi court, she was sentenced to 79 lashes.

"It was heart-rending," John Miller said of his meeting with Miyati.

A tall, lanky, former congressman from Washington state, Miller has traveled the world as the head of the State Department's office to monitor and combat human trafficking. But after visiting 50 countries since 2002, pleading his case with crown princes and prime ministers and meeting, by his count, more than 1,000 survivors of 21st-century slavery, Miller is moving on.

"It's been rewarding and I think we have made a difference," Miller said in an interview. "But I'm worn down, and after four years it is time for a change."

As he leaves to take a job as a professor at George Washington University, Miller said the human trafficking problem can be overwhelming. There are no easy answers or quick fixes, and even the blunt threats of diplomacy, such as withholding aid or imposing sanctions, can be ineffective.

Every year, an estimated 600,000 to 800,000 men, women and children are trafficked across international borders, according to the State Department. About 80 percent of them are women and girls. Up to half are minors. Most of them are victims of sex trafficking, winding up as prostitutes in countries ranging from the Dominican Republic to the Netherlands to Japan. Others are forced to become beggars, child soldiers or camel jockeys. Still others are forced to work in sweatshops 20 hours a day or are trapped in involuntary servitude as construction or domestic workers.

After four years of listening to victims' heart-rending stories, Miller is hard to shock.

He recalled meeting an 11-year-old who worked in an embroidery factory in Southeast Asia whose owner poured acid on her and shot her. He met a man in India who was an indentured servant at a brick mill because his grandfather had borrowed 20 or 30 rupees years ago and the family had been unable to repay the debt. In Amsterdam, he met a Czech woman who was forced into prostitution after being told she'd never see her 2-year-old daughter again if she didn't cooperate.

"Intellectually you know this has been with us since the pharaohs," Miller said. "But when you see it, when you meet with the survivors, it hits you - it's human greed that leads to this type of abuse."

When it come to human trafficking, no country is clean, including the United States. Every year, about 17,500 people are smuggled across U.S. borders into slavery, Miller said.

"Are we doing enough?" Miller said. "No. No country is doing enough."

Each year, the State Department is required to submit a report to Congress on what other countries are doing to eliminate human trafficking. This year, the report assessed the efforts of 149 countries. Twelve of them, including Saudi Arabia, Iran, Venezuela and Zimbabwe, were identified as Tier 3 countries that don't comply with minimum standards and aren't making significant steps to comply. Another 32 countries were on a watch list.

Under U.S. law, the federal government can withhold non-humanitarian aid from the worst offenders. In addition, these countries can face U.S. opposition to assistance from such international financial institutions as the World Bank. But such steps are rarely taken and, in most cases, the threats are toothless. Most Tier 3 countries don't receive U.S. aid or international financial assistance.

Though there's no way to know whether the number of human trafficking victims has peaked, Miller said there are signs of progress. More than 80 countries have passed anti-trafficking laws in the past two years. This year, there'll be an estimated 4,700 convictions in trafficking cases. Two or three years ago there were several hundred. The number of shelters for victims is growing, as is public awareness.

But even as the international community is struggling to control current levels of human trafficking, a new threat is looming - the worldwide migration of an estimated 120 million workers spurred on by globalization and the proliferation of free-trade agreements. It's an area ripe for worker abuse.

The State Department called it the latest "trafficking phenomenon" as migrant workers are flooding rapidly development countries in Asia and the Near East, attracted by low-skilled construction, manufacturing, agriculture and domestic jobs.

Critics say the proliferation of free-trade agreements has helped fuel this mass migration of workers as businesses in such countries as Jordan try to cash in on trade with the United States.

The National Labor Committee, which investigates labor abuses around the world, said in a recent report that the number of textile factories in Jordan has increased rapidly since the United States signed a free-trade agreement with that country. The report found substandard conditions in 25 of Jordan's roughly 100 textile manufacturing sites. The migrant workers at these factories, many from Bangladesh, face abusive conditions, the report said.

"It's clear there is a huge amount of trafficking all over the world, and we suspect a lot of them (migrant workers) are headed to countries with which we have or may eventually have free-trade agreements," said Charles Kernaghan of the National Labor Committee.

Kernaghan and others say Congress should refuse to approve a pending free-trade agreement with Oman unless strict labor protections are added. Oman is on the State Department's human trafficking watch list.

Kernaghan said when he met with Miller to discuss the situation in Jordan he expected to find an office filled with "political hacks" toeing the free-trade line.

"But they took it seriously," he said. "Miller struck me as a person of integrity and goodwill. He struck me as the real thing, and it's too bad he is leaving."

Miller said that when he raised the issue with the Jordanians, they promised changes.

"They don't want to lose the free-trade agreement," he said.

Miller, a one-time television commentator in Seattle, said when he took the State Department post he knew human trafficking was a major problem. He was a member of the House International Relations Committee while serving in Congress from 1985 to 1993.

"But I didn't know the personal side," he said.

Stories like those of Nour Miyati trouble him, especially the sentence she received. The Saudi court ordered no punishment for her male owner, 35 lashes for her female owner and 79 lashes for Miyati because of disloyalty, he said.

Miller said he raised Miyati's case in a meeting with the Saudi crown prince, and her sentence was reversed. Though Miyati plans to return home to Indonesia eventually, she remains in Saudi Arabia pursuing her case.

"She's still fighting," Miller said. "She is an amazing and courageous person."

Here is a list of Tier 3 countries, or those with the worst records on human trafficking, as compiled by the State Department:

Belize

Burma

Cuba

Iran

Laos

North Korea

Saudi Arabia

Sudan

Syria

Uzbekistan

Venezuela

Zimbabwe

The complete State Department report on human trafficking can be found at:

<http://www.state.gov/g/tip/>

LOAD-DATE: November 24, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

308 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Knight Ridder Washington Bureau

Distributed by McClatchy-Tribune News Service

November 22, 2006 Wednesday

Battle against human trafficking to continue as diplomat moves on

BYLINE: By Les Blumenthal, McClatchy Newspapers

SECTION: WASHINGTON DATELINE

LENGTH: 1311 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

WASHINGTON _ He met her in a Starbucks in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia. While the story she told was gut-wrenching, it wasn't unlike those he'd heard countless times over the past four years.

Nour Miyati, an Indonesian woman in her 20s, had come to Saudi Arabia to work as a domestic servant. But her dream of supporting her family back home turned into a nightmare. Her employers abused and tortured her. She lost fingers and toes to gangrene when the wounds from her beatings went untreated and festered. When she finally escaped and sought justice in a Saudi court, she was sentenced to 79 lashes.

"It was heart-rending," John Miller said of his meeting with Miyati.

A tall, lanky, former congressman from Washington state, Miller has traveled the world as the head of the State Department's office to monitor and combat human trafficking. But after visiting 50 countries since 2002, pleading his case with crown princes and prime ministers and meeting, by his count, more than 1,000 survivors of 21st-century slavery, Miller is moving on.

"It's been rewarding and I think we have made a difference," Miller said in an interview. "But I'm worn down, and after four years it is time for a change."

As he leaves to take a job as a professor at George Washington University, Miller said the human trafficking problem can be overwhelming. There are no easy answers or quick fixes, and even the blunt threats of diplomacy, such as withholding aid or imposing sanctions, can be ineffective.

Every year, an estimated 600,000 to 800,000 men, women and children are trafficked across international borders, according to the State Department. About 80 percent of them are women and girls. Up to half are minors. Most of them are victims of sex trafficking, winding up as prostitutes in countries ranging from the Dominican Republic to the Netherlands to Japan. Others are forced to become beggars, child soldiers or camel jockeys. Still others are forced to work in sweatshops 20 hours a day or are trapped in involuntary servitude as construction or domestic workers.

After four years of listening to victims' heart-rending stories, Miller is hard to shock.

He recalled meeting an 11-year-old who worked in an embroidery factory in Southeast Asia whose owner poured acid on her and shot her. He met a man in India who was an indentured servant at a brick mill because his grandfather had borrowed 20 or 30 rupees years ago and the family had been unable to repay the debt. In Amsterdam, he met a Czech woman who was forced into prostitution after being told she'd never see her 2-year-old daughter again if she didn't cooperate.

"Intellectually you know this has been with us since the pharaohs," Miller said. "But when you see it, when you meet with the survivors, it hits you _ it's human greed that leads to this type of abuse."

When it come to human trafficking, no country is clean, including the United States. Every year, about 17,500 people are smuggled across U.S. borders into slavery, Miller said.

"Are we doing enough?" Miller said. "No. No country is doing enough."

Each year, the State Department is required to submit a report to Congress on what other countries are doing to eliminate human trafficking. This year, the report assessed the efforts of 149 countries. Twelve of them, including Saudi Arabia, Iran, Venezuela and Zimbabwe, were identified as Tier 3 countries that don't comply with minimum standards and aren't making significant steps to comply. Another 32 countries were on a watch list.

Under U.S. law, the federal government can withhold non-humanitarian aid from the worst offenders. In addition, these countries can face U.S. opposition to assistance from such international financial institutions as the World Bank. But such steps are rarely taken and, in most cases, the threats are toothless. Most Tier 3 countries don't receive U.S. aid or international financial assistance.

Though there's no way to know whether the number of human trafficking victims has peaked, Miller said there are signs of progress. More than 80 countries have passed anti-trafficking laws in the past two years. This year, there'll be an estimated 4,700 convictions in trafficking cases. Two or three years ago there were several hundred. The number of shelters for victims is growing, as is public awareness.

But even as the international community is struggling to control current levels of human trafficking, a new threat is looming _ the worldwide migration of an estimated 120 million workers spurred on by globalization and the proliferation of free-trade agreements. It's an area ripe for worker abuse.

The State Department called it the latest "trafficking phenomenon" as migrant workers are flooding rapidly development countries in Asia and the Near East, attracted by low-skilled construction, manufacturing, agriculture and domestic jobs.

Critics say the proliferation of free-trade agreements has helped fuel this mass migration of workers as businesses in such countries as Jordan try to cash in on trade with the United States.

The National Labor Committee, which investigates labor abuses around the world, said in a recent report that the number of textile factories in Jordan has increased rapidly since the United States signed a free-trade agreement with that country. The report found substandard conditions in 25 of Jordan's roughly 100 textile manufacturing sites. The migrant workers at these factories, many from Bangladesh, face abusive conditions, the report said.

"It's clear there is a huge amount of trafficking all over the world, and we suspect a lot of them (migrant workers) are headed to countries with which we have or may eventually have free-trade agreements," said Charles Kernaghan of the National Labor Committee.

Kernaghan and others say Congress should refuse to approve a pending free-trade agreement with Oman unless strict labor protections are added. Oman is on the State Department's human trafficking watch list.

Kernaghan said when he met with Miller to discuss the situation in Jordan he expected to find an office filled with "political hacks" toeing the free-trade line.

"But they took it seriously," he said. "Miller struck me as a person of integrity and goodwill. He struck me as the real thing, and it's too bad he is leaving."

Miller said that when he raised the issue with the Jordanians, they promised changes.

"They don't want to lose the free-trade agreement," he said.

Miller, a one-time television commentator in Seattle, said when he took the State Department post he knew human trafficking was a major problem. He was a member of the House International Relations Committee while serving in Congress from 1985 to 1993.

"But I didn't know the personal side," he said.

Stories like those of Nour Miyati trouble him, especially the sentence she received. The Saudi court ordered no punishment for her male owner, 35 lashes for her female owner and 79 lashes for Miyati because of disloyalty, he said.

Miller said he raised Miyati's case in a meeting with the Saudi crown prince, and her sentence was reversed. Though Miyati plans to return home to Indonesia eventually, she remains in Saudi Arabia pursuing her case.

"She's still fighting," Miller said. "She is an amazing and courageous person."

Here is a list of Tier 3 countries, or those with the worst records on human trafficking, as compiled by the State Department:

Belize

Burma

Cuba

Iran

Laos

North Korea

Saudi Arabia

Sudan

Syria

Uzbekistan

Venezuela

Zimbabwe

The complete State Department report on human trafficking can be found at:

<http://www.state.gov/g/tip/>

(c) 2006, McClatchy-Tribune Information Services.

PHOTOS (from MCT Photo Service, 202-383-6099): SLAVERY

For reprints, email tmsreprints@permissionsgroup.com, call 800-374-7985 or 847-635-6550, send a fax to 847-635-6968, or write to The Permissions Group Inc., 1247 Milwaukee Ave., Suite 303, Glenview, IL 60025, USA.

LOAD-DATE: November 24, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

ACC-NO: 20061122-BC-SLAVERY

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: WA

309 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Indo-Asian News Service

November 20, 2006 Monday 2:27 PM EST

What the scribes didn't write about Vietnam

BYLINE: Indo-Asian News Service

LENGTH: 782 words

DATELINE: Hanoi

Hanoi, Nov 20 -- Most of the 2,000-plus international journalists who were here to cover the Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) summit probably missed the real story of Vietnam: a nation going through an internal crisis.

While Vietnam is being lauded as an emerging economic tiger of Asia, behind that image is an array of chronic social and environmental problems seemingly impossible to resolve, according to New America Media.

Since the war ended in 1975, the country's population has more than doubled from 35 million to 84 million. Nearly two out of three Vietnamese are too young to have any direct memory of the Vietnam War. What they do have is a new longing for the west and its stuff.

Materialism is the new ideology. These days everyone needs a cell phone, a motorcycle, and if they can afford it, a flat screen TV and a laptop. Many would do anything to own new toys.

When Vietnam emerged from the Cold War, the forces of globalisation quickly swept through. The result is a country whose Confucian practices - modesty, frugality, respect - have been thrown out of the window, especially in urban areas.

Part of the cultural revolution taking place is a sexual one. Once known for its modesty and traditional practices, the abortion rate is around 1.5 million a year with many unwanted teenage pregnancies.

Statistics estimate that in only four years, a million people will be infected with HIV. Prostitution is rampant, with some NGOs estimating that there are more than 300,000 sex workers in the country. Many women are being trafficked overseas.

Vietnam accounts for 10 percent of women and children trafficking worldwide. According to UNICEF and Vietnam's Ministry of Justice as well as other groups, as many as 400,000 Vietnamese women and children have been trafficked overseas. It is a conservative estimate and doesn't account for mail-order brides - women sent to Taiwan and Korea to work in brothels.

According to the "Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000: Trafficking in Persons Report" released last year by the US State Department, Vietnam was classified as a "tier two" country, meaning that the government "does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking".

For some, most worrying is the ongoing environmental degradation. In Vietnam, the word 'moi-truong' - environment - is still not a familiar one, let alone the term 'sustainable development'. While foreign journalists love to cover the old Agent Orange story, the real environment disaster for the country is how population pressure is causing the depletion of forests and pushing the ecosystem to the brink.

One out of three Vietnamese depend solely on forest and forest products for their living and the number is rising steadily, according to the United Nations Development Programme. Whereas the Vietnam War destroyed close to five million acres of forestland, 10 times that amount has been destroyed since.

Vietnam also experiences terrible floods each year that kill thousands, because there are far fewer trees in the central mountains and hills to absorb the monsoons.

As Vietnam's forests shrink, some of the world's rare species now face extinction, including three of the world's 10 mammals only recently discovered, the green peacock, the Java rhino, the barking deer, the Asian elephant and the rare Sao La ox. There is a lack of public awareness for the need for environmental protection, so conservation practices are rare and government policies ineffective.

Vietnam boasts a 7.5 percent GNP growth, second fastest to China. Economic development needs natural resources, but no one seems to have an answer as to what to do when the forests are gone. Economic progress does not create what the country needs - a civil society in which citizens can fully participate, steering the course of their collective future. This is only possible with real political reform, a multiparty system with true freedom of expression, something the Communist Party staunchly denies its population.

To prepare for the economic meeting, Hanoi was cleaned up for weeks. Protesting peasants and the homeless were packed off to a camp far outside Hanoi. Soldiers patrolled all quarters, especially the homes of well-known political dissidents under house arrests.

Hoang Minh Chinh, Le Hong Ha, Nguyen Thanh Giang, Pham Que Duong, Hoang Tien, Nguyen Khac Toan, Nguyen Van Dai, Le Thi Cong Nhan, Tran Khai Thanh Thuy, Nguyen Phuong Anh, Bach Ngoc Duong, Le Chi Quang are men and women of conscience and sorely needed to participate in discussions on Vietnam's future.

Published by HT Syndication with permission from Indo-Asian News Service.

LOAD-DATE: November 20, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

310 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

November 15, 2006 Wednesday 5:50 PM TST

GOVERNMENT MUST ENFORCE AUTHORITY IN HUMAN TRAFFICKING PREVENTION

BYLINE: Lilian WuLENGTH: 214 wordsDATELINE: Taipei, Nov. 15

Premier Su Tseng-chang said Wednesday that the government should enforce its authority in preventing human trafficking after it was rated as not fully complying with trafficking victim protection measures set forth by the U.S. State Department.

The premier made the remarks after Vice Interior Minister Chien Tai-lan reported on an action plan on human trafficking prevention at a meeting of the Executive Yuan.

With the U.S. State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report for 2006 listing Taiwan on Tier 2 out of four tiers, the same as last year, Chien said the ministry will review current regulations, integrate government agencies in carrying out strategies for protection of trafficking victims, human trafficking prevention and indictments of traffickers.

Taiwan will also promote its efforts in human trafficking prevention in the international community, Chien said.

The premier said that as a nation which attaches importance to human rights, Taiwan has to make more efforts in this regard.

Countries on Tier 2 are those that have made significant efforts to comply with standards of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA), but have not reached full compliance.

Taiwan was listed as Tier 1 in 2004, meaning that it used to be in compliance with TVPA standards.

LOAD-DATE: November 15, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 Central News Agency
All Rights Reserved

311 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Emirates News Agency

November 11, 2006 Saturday 5:48 AM EST

UAE new tough law to help fight

LENGTH: 552 words

UAE new tough law to help fight all other forms of human trafficking: report Abu Dhabi, Dubai, Nov. 11th, 2006 (WAM)---The UAE new tough federal law on combating crimes of human trafficking which was issued by President H.H. Sheikh Khalifa bin Zayed Al Nahyan will help the UAE authorities fight all forms of this crime, reported a local UAE daily newspaper..

Exploring reaction to the new civilized step taken by the UAE government to ban all forms of human exploitation on its territories, , a report by the Dubai-based Gulf News quoted Dubai Police Chief Lieutenant General Dhahi Khalfan Tamim as saying "the UAE has succeeded in stopping the practice of employing children as camel jockeys and with the help of this law it will effectively combat other forms of human trafficking"..

"The law (which) will deter organized international gangs who attempt to harm this country will bridge the gap in the UAE's legislations, which may have been exploited by these gangs", said the law enforcement official..

Former UN official Dr. Ushari Khalil said "the law which slaps stiff penalties against traffickers ranging from one year to life in prison and fines from Dh20,000 up to Dh1 million, criminalizes severe forms of servitude (and therefore) will address trafficking in domestic servants in the UAE." Khalil, a former UN trainer on combating trafficking, warned that thousands of people in the country could be traffickers without them knowing it.

"They are not aware that the way they treat their domestic servants such as denying them communication with others, toying with their salaries, as well as the illegal tricks employed by labour companies constitute servitude," noted Khalil..

"Thousands of such persons should know today that they risk life imprisonment, particularly because almost all domestic servants are females," he said..

The new Anti-human trafficking law states that life-imprisonment term is to be handed down to anyone implicated in human trafficking if the victim is a female, a child or handicapped..

The law incriminates all forms of exploitation of humans and organised groups that intentionally commit these crimes. It incriminates organised groups that, through pre-meditation, commit these crimes, with the option of life imprisonment if the victim is a female, a child, handicapped or if the crime is perpetrated by those in a position of trust, such as relatives or public officials..

The Passage of this law and treating victims of human trafficking in accordance with international standards should serve to remove the UAE from the American Tier Two 'Watch List' country", he added..

The Sixth Annual Trafficking in Persons Report upgraded the UAE to a Tier Two 'Watch List' country, or a country that is vulnerable to losing ground on its human rights record..

The new law "is in keeping with the UAE's constitution and international conventions signed by the country", Dr. Mohammad Abdullah Al Rohn, a professor of law at the UAE University was quoted by the paper..

Al Rokn who is also a human rights activist said "many human traffickers are never caught because their victims are too scared to go to authorities (and the new federal) law will encourage victims to report their tormentors to the authorities, which will also help rehabilitate these victims." WAM- MMYS 13 07 CCCCQQ

LOAD-DATE: November 12, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

JOURNAL-CODE: WAM

Copyright 2006 U.P.I.
All Rights Reserved
ARABIA 2000

Copyright 2006 by Emirates News Agency Distributed by UPI

312 of 445 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

November 5, 2006 Sunday

US special envoy warns Indonesia on human trafficking

LENGTH: 219 words

Text of report by Mustafa Moses in English by Indonesian newspaper Tempo website on 5 November

Jakarta: US Special Envoy for Human Trafficking John R. Miller has admonished the government for not seriously handling human trafficking. "He (John R. Miller) was surprised why Indonesia's complaints on trafficking were very few," Assistant Deputy of Child Protection and Human Trafficking at the Department of Women's Empowerment Soepalarto Soedibjo told Tempo Friday (3 November).

Miller metaphorically mentioned the problem as a mountain of ice phenomenon [as received - a literal translation of the Indonesian for "the tip of the iceberg"]. He suspected that the number of human trafficking cases in Indonesia that were not handled were very high.

According to the report from the institution that Miller led, Indonesia is ranked as a cautious Tier 2: a level for a country with exploding cases of human trafficking.

However, he said, human trafficking cases were not handled well. As for this year, according to Soepalarto, there were around 100 complaints to police. This was a decline compared to reports in 2002 which reached 800. Miller has asked that the government cooperate with members of the House of Representatives (DPR). None of the invited was present.

Source: Tempo website, Jakarta, in English 5 Nov 06

LOAD-DATE: November 5, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

313 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Foreign Affairs

November 2006 - December 2006

The New Global Slave Trade

BYLINE: Ethan B. Kapstein

SECTION: Pg. 103 Vol. 85 No. 6

LENGTH: 4456 words

BACK WITH A VENGEANCE

When most people think about slavery -- if they think about it at all -- they probably assume that it was eliminated during the nineteenth century. Unfortunately, this is far from the truth. Slavery and the global slave trade continue to thrive to this day; in fact, it is likely that more people are being trafficked across borders against their will now than at any point in the past.

This human stain is not just a minor blot on the rich tapestry of international commerce. It is a product of the same political, technological, and economic forces that have fueled globalization. Just as the brutal facts of the Atlantic slave trade ultimately led to a reexamination of U.S. history -- U.S. historiography until the 1960s had been largely celebratory -- so must growing awareness of the modern slave trade spark a recognition of the flaws in our contemporary economic and governmental arrangements. The current system offers too many incentives to criminals and outlaw states to market humans and promises too little in the way of sanctions.

Contemporary slavery typically involves women and children being forced into servitude through violence and deprivation. Disturbingly, the advanced industrial states have failed to take much action to address the issue. The problem is one of political will, not capability, for the rich countries of the world have at their disposal numerous instruments that, if their leaders had the courage to use them, could greatly curtail the global slave trade. Just as the British government (after much prodding by its subjects) once used the Royal Navy to stamp out the problem, today's great powers must bring their economic and military might to bear on this most crucial of undertakings.

After all, ending slavery is not simply a moral crusade, as compelling as the moral case may be. There are also important self-interested reasons why the West should lead a charge to eliminate this practice. The fact of the matter is that the same people who engage in human trafficking also contribute to the deepening criminalization of the world economy overall, often operating in close association with corrupt officials around the world. By allowing slavery to go unpunished, states unwittingly erode the foundations of the international economic system, which requires that governments be capable of enforcing bilateral and multilateral agreements and the rule of law.

Tragically, although the strongest states have the greatest capacity to suppress the slave trade, they have not done so, and key opportunities for action have been lost. The European Union (EU), for example, should have used accession talks with potential new members to pressure them into limiting the trafficking of their female citizens to the West. Meanwhile, President George W. Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice may have made some bold pronouncements about eliminating slavery, but the U.S. administration is so focused on the war on terror that Bush and Rice rarely press matters such as slavery at meetings with relevant governments.

Such a shortsighted approach is dangerous not just for the people who end up as slaves around the world but for anyone with a stake in the future of globalization. The costs of inaction are rising; already, they are too high to bear.

TRAFFIC

The modern global slave trade generally involves the use of deception and coercion to induce victims to cross national borders in search of new jobs; once the target has arrived in a foreign country, he or she (and it is usually a she) is then forced into some form of labor bondage. Although hard figures are difficult to come by, in June 2006, the U.S. government estimated that some 600,000-800,000 people were subjected to such treatment each year. This number does not include the many millions of people who are held as forced laborers within their home countries, such as in India and Myanmar. When those individuals are taken into account, the total number of people estimated to be living in some form of forced servitude around the world (according to the International Labor Organization) grows to 12 million. Whatever the exact number is, it seems almost certain that the modern global slave trade is larger in absolute terms than the Atlantic slave trade in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries was.

Approximately 80 percent of today's slaves on the global market are female, and up to 50 percent are under the age of 18. According to the United Nations (UN), these victims span the globe, being trafficked "from 127 countries to be exploited in 137 countries." Most of the slaves come from countries such as Albania, Belarus, China, Romania, Russia, and Thailand, while the most frequent destinations for traffickers are in Asia, followed by the advanced industrial states of western Europe and North America and a number of states in the Middle East (including Israel). The slave trade is also a major problem in Africa -- where children are often forced to serve as soldiers -- but relatively little is known about the traffic in this region.

Once slaves arrive at their destinations, they typically are forced to serve one of several functions. Approximately 43 percent of those in the global market are used for sex, while another 32 percent are forced into other forms of unpaid labor, working as domestic servants, construction workers, or, occasionally (in the case of very young boys), as camel jockeys in the Persian Gulf states. The rest are pressed into both sexual and economic services. Governments and international agencies differ about these precise figures, since it is somewhat easier to calculate the numbers of persons forced into sexual servitude than it is to figure out how many are forced into bonded labor. Indeed, the number of men who are trapped as indentured laborers is likely underreported.

What all slaves have in common is that they are forced to work. Slavers typically recruit poor people in poor countries by promising them good jobs in distant places. A recruiter will then offer a victim a generous loan -- at an exorbitant interest rate -- to help with travel arrangements, papers, and locating a job in the new community. On arrival, the promised job never materializes, and thus the large debt -- up to several thousand dollars -- can never be repaid. The victim is then stripped of all travel documents, given a false identity, and forced into a job. He or she -- and his or her family -- are threatened with disfigurement or death should the slave try to alert the authorities or escape. If they are paid at all, slaves get the bare minimum required for survival.

As the persistence of the slave trade suggests, it is a profitable activity. The UN estimates that human traffickers earn around $10 billion per year and that the average sale price for a slave is around $12,500. Since operating costs (for transportation and false documents) are estimated to be approximately $3,000 for each slave, slavers can earn nearly $10,000 per victim. It is worth noting that the cost of a slave today is far less than what African slaves once fetched in the antebellum United States -- a difference owing in part to cheap modern transportation.

As a result of the low entry costs of the modern slave trade, the business is dominated by numerous criminal gangs instead of one large mafia. These gangs are mainly from Asia, eastern Europe, and Latin America; the authorities do not know whether they are part of larger syndicates or are specialists in human trafficking. Besides easy profits, the slave trade offers another advantage to criminals: the risks of arrest are low and the penalties are relatively light. In the United States, for example, drug traffickers generally face much stiffer sentences than do those who traffic in humans.

In order to thrive, the slave trade requires the direct or indirect involvement of national governments, at both the source and the destination. Since profits are high, slavers have plenty of money to pay off government officials and local police. In certain countries, these criminal links go to the very top. For example, in a September 2005 memorandum to Secretary of State Rice, titled "Presidential Determination With Respect to Foreign Governments' Efforts Regarding Trafficking in Persons," President Bush stated that the Cambodian government had "failed to address the trafficking complicity of senior law enforcement officials" in that country and that the Myanmar military was "directly involved in forced labor." Bush also singled out a number of other governments -- including those of Ecuador, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, and Venezuela -- for failing to "show a serious commitment" or to devote "sufficient attention" to stopping human trafficking in their countries. If ordinary criminals are rarely punished for dealing in slaves, high-level officials in such places enjoy even more impunity.

A CONVENTIONAL APPROACH

Ever since the abolition of the Atlantic slave trade, slavery has been recognized as the most abhorrent violation of a person's liberty. The practice runs counter to the entire modern history of human rights. Indeed, one of the UN's first acts after its establishment was to pass the Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Persons and of the Exploitation of the Prostitution of Others, which the General Assembly approved in 1949. That convention updated international agreements from 1904 and 1910 on the "suppression of the white slave traffic." Although it dealt largely with prostitution, the 1949 treaty was far more ambitious in certain respects than anything that has been proposed in more recent times. In fact, the convention's blanket condemnation of all forms of prostitution and brothels looks almost quaint by today's standards, given the number of governments (such as, most famously, that of the Netherlands) that have since legalized the sex trade.

The most authoritative modern international agreement aimed at the slave trade is the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress, and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, which was approved by the UN General Assembly in 2000 after the G-8 (the group of leading industrial countries) declared its support for such an undertaking earlier that year. This agreement, which supplemented the UN's Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime, reflected a growing awareness among world leaders of the role of organized crime in global commerce. Unlike earlier slavery treaties, the protocol does not mention prostitution; instead, it aims to serve as the "universal instrument that addresses all aspects of trafficking in persons."

The most difficult issue faced by the diplomats who negotiated the treaty was how to define "human trafficking" in the first place. The confusion stemmed from the fact that it is often difficult to distinguish workers -- even sex workers -- who voluntarily take large loans at high interest rates in order to work abroad from those who are coerced into doing so and end up in bonded servitude. Separating the two groups requires establishing a clear definition of "deception" and "coercion" -- no mean feat.

Reflecting the work of a committee, Article 3 of the protocol defines "human trafficking" awkwardly as "the recruitment, transportation, transfer, harboring or receipt of persons, by means of the threat or use of force or other forms of coercion, of abduction, of fraud, of deception, of the abuse of power or of a position of vulnerability or of the giving or receiving of payments or benefits to achieve the consent of a person having control over another person, for the purpose of exploitation."

It is not hard to see why governments that have signed the protocol have found it hard to incorporate this definition into their criminal codes. In 2000, the United States took the lead by passing the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA), which was signed into law by President Bill Clinton and reauthorized and strengthened by Bush in 2003. The TVPA, which is widely regarded as a model for other countries, establishes a more precise definition of what constitutes human trafficking, imposes stronger penalties than had previously existed, and allocates funds for compensation to the victims of human trafficking and for cooperation efforts with foreign countries.

The TVPA also requires the State Department to issue an annual Trafficking in Persons Report that, among other things, classifies countries according to their efforts to halt the slave trade. There are now 32 countries on the State Department's "Tier 2 watch list," a list of those governments that are making efforts to comply with antislavery treaties but in whose countries compliance is still weak, [see footnote 1] and another 12 on the "Tier 3" list, a list of those governments that are making little effort to halt the slave trade.[see footnote 2]

Since the passage of the TVPA, the United States has charged 189 individuals with sex trafficking, up from only 34 during the five years before the law went into effect. Federal prosecutors have won 109 convictions in these cases, up from 20 in the preceding period. Sentences have ranged from 16 months to 23 years. The U.S. government has also charged 59 defendants with labor trafficking (two major cases involved 24 of these individuals). These cases led to, among other things, the first-ever extradition of Mexican citizens to the United States to face labor-trafficking charges.

As a result of the TVPA, the United States has been much more successful in cracking down on slave traders than have most other countries. For example, according to the UN, in 2003 Lithuania prosecuted 24 traffickers but convicted only 8 of them, and Ukraine prosecuted 59 but convicted only 11. Among those countries that provide figures, only the Netherlands has a better record than the United States of prosecuting those involved with the slave trade.

Despite these accomplishments, the TVPA is far from perfect. For one thing, law enforcement officers have complained that it is difficult to implement. One California police officer who was interviewed about the legislation reported that in one of his cases "half the 30 men arrested ... were deported instead of prosecuted" for their crimes. Another major problem that prosecutors face is how to get victims of human trafficking, who fear the repercussions for themselves and their families, to testify against their oppressors.

The TVPA has also failed to help the U.S. government make much of a dent in the global slave trade, for several reasons. To begin with, the available data suggest that only a relatively few slaves enter the United States each year. The Justice Department reported in 2006 that about 17,500 persons are trafficked into the country annually; in the late 1990s, the CIA put the figure at about 50,000. Even if one accepts the higher figure, this still means that the vast majority of slaves are traded outside the United States.

Yet most other governments have not made combating the slave trade as high a priority as Washington has. This includes many western European governments, which (with a few notable exceptions, such as in Sweden and the Netherlands) have done little to stop the flow of slaves from the East. As a result, ever-increasing numbers of young women and girls are being forced to work the streets of France, Germany, and Italy. This is despite the fact that Europe has numerous nongovernmental organizations and media outlets concerned with the issue. Outside Europe, where such forces play a much smaller role, the situation is even worse. In Thailand, for example, traders who bring in Myanmar women for prostitution are rarely prosecuted. In Russia, government officials show little concern over the plight of young women trafficked into or out of their country. And in the Persian Gulf, the use of slaves for prostitution, domestic service, and camel jockeying remains widespread even though it has been illegal since the 1960s.

Although the United States has sought to cooperate with foreign governments in combating the slave trade, it has rarely punished a country for failing to act against human trafficking. It is probably no coincidence that the lists of noncompliant states include important oil producers (such as Kuwait and Saudi Arabia), key allies in Washington's war on terror (such as Uzbekistan), and great powers (such as China, India, and Russia). Under U.S. law, the president has the authority to impose economic sanctions on states that fail to combat the slave trade by blocking foreign aid and military assistance. Unfortunately, this is rarely a useful tool, since most of the countries in question either do not receive U.S. aid or are of such compelling importance to national security that the president is unwilling to crack down on them. The Bush administration, like its European counterparts, seems to feel that a few slaves should not be allowed to get in the way of high politics.

Instead, Washington and its allies in the industrial world have taken the position that rather than target governments, they should focus their efforts on the demand and supply sides of the slavery problem. But Western countries disagree about what those steps should be. And even if they could reach some sort of consensus, such measures would be insufficient. The slave trade will only come to an end when a few key states muster the will to use force to liberate the victims.

AT THE SOURCE

Such a claim may sound needlessly provocative. It certainly flies in the face of statements made by many European officials who argue that it would suffice to tackle the demand side of slavery by legalizing prostitution in the industrial world, which would supposedly reduce human trafficking by curbing the demand for slaves, or who argue that the supply side should be addressed by promoting economic development and growth in poor countries. It also runs counter to statements by UN officials, who generally focus on the need to strengthen the 2000 protocol -- for example, by educating police officers and prosecutors about its content.

The problem is that none of these measures will work. The demand-side approach has already been tried -- most famously by the Netherlands, which legalized prostitution in October 2000. The Dutch government has explicitly stated that its legalization of sex work was meant to facilitate "action against sexual violence and abuse and human trafficking." The idea was that once brothels were permitted and regulated, the police would be better able "to pick up signs of human trafficking" and prevent it.

But the Dutch strategy has not achieved much. Sex slaves have continued to enter the black market, providing their services at lower prices than those charged by prostitutes in the officially sanctioned red-light district. The slaves work in areas such as railroad stations and on those streets that are off-limits to legal prostitutes, and they attract clients who are too poor to pay official prices. The police, meanwhile, have proved no more able than in the past to stop such practices.

Interestingly, Sweden -- a country usually known for its relaxed attitudes toward sexuality -- has taken the opposite tack, criminalizing the buying of sex. Since 1999, when this new law was introduced, some 750 men in Sweden have been charged with seeking to purchase the services of a prostitute, a crime punishable by up to six months in jail. The Swedish government claims that this policy has greatly reduced the number of prostitutes working the country's streets -- although it is possible that the law has merely driven Sweden's prostitutes and their clients deeper underground.

Other countries have followed Sweden's lead to varying degrees, especially penalizing those who prey on underage sex workers. Some states have even extended their laws to acts committed by their citizens while abroad. France, for example, has played a leading role in prosecuting "sex tourists," who seek pleasure in countries such as Thailand. The effects of such policies have yet to be measured sufficiently, but even if laws criminalizing the buying of sex could make a dent in the trafficking of humans into the industrial world -- changing the demand side of the equation -- they would remain half measures given the number of people traded into slavery each year. For example, all the prosecutions in the United States to date have only led to the release of a few hundred victims of slavery. More action is therefore also needed on the supply side.

Many policymakers have suggested that promoting economic growth in developing countries should be the next step, since this would supposedly eliminate slavery by providing potential victims with an alternative. But economic growth alone will not stop this plague, at least not anytime soon. It will take a huge amount of progress before citizens of the developing world stop being tempted by the prospect of a good job in a rich country. And it is far from clear how such progress should be achieved; it would certainly be unrealistic to expect the industrial world to provide enough aid to make up the difference itself.

It is also important to remember that slavery today seems to thrive in some parts of the world because of economic growth, not despite it. In the Middle East, for example, the demand for young camel jockeys has increased as more people have gained the means to bet on races and as the stakes have increased. In fact, the history of slavery provides little evidence to suggest that economic growth could help end it anywhere.

Rather than seek complicated and distant solutions, governments should focus on a few concrete actions that could have a real impact on human trafficking in the short run. An excellent way to start would be with the naming and shaming of traders and the governments that support them. The United States has already gone further than any other country in this direction with its annual Trafficking in Persons Report. But few people seem aware of the document, and the Bush administration -- and the mass media -- should do much more to publicize its findings. Reputation matters in today's global economy, and a reputation for harboring criminals is something no state wants.

Naming and shaming can also work in other parts of the globe. For example, the Association of Southeast Asian Nations has recently started putting pressure on Myanmar both through quiet diplomacy and through drawing greater public attention to the Myanmar government's dismal human rights record. This policy seems to be working; even military juntas want respect, and Myanmar's leaders seem to recognize that since they rely heavily on tourism for their supply of foreign currency, bad press in foreign papers could inflict real material damage on their country.

Next, wealthy states need to do a better job of confronting countries on the State Department's Tier 2 and Tier 3 lists, imposing economic sanctions on them if they do not act to ban human trafficking. The EU should put pressure on accession candidates, such as Bulgaria and Romania, and on member states, such as Latvia and Portugal, that allow slavery to continue or take inadequate measures to stop it. After all, the EU sometimes exacts penalties on member states that fail to meet their commitments in many other areas, such as industrial policy; surely, there is an even stronger case to be made where slavery is involved. For its part, the United States must not allow its focus on the war on terrorism to distract it from acting on this issue. Washington has allowed too many states -- especially oil producers, such as Kuwait and Saudi Arabia -- to get away with too much for too long. Under the TVPA, the United States already has the authority to impose economic sanctions on states that fail to act against the slave trade. The Bush administration should also remember that governments that allow this scourge to thrive are unlikely to be reliable allies when it comes to other problems that concern the United States.

To complement sanctions, Western states should also empower their police, intelligence, and military forces to act much more aggressively against those who traffic in humans. Just as force was ultimately needed to halt the slave trade in the nineteenth century, so will force be necessary in some cases today. Current international treaties on slavery do not authorize the use of force against slavers, but bilateral agreements should be strengthened to allow such measures. The TVPA already provides funds to support international cooperation against slavery. When it is next reauthorized by Congress, in 2007, lawmakers should add provisions explicitly stating that such cooperation should extend to military and intelligence forces.

It is worth remembering that in the nineteenth century many people argued that slavery would end "naturally" once the practice was no longer economically profitable. But historians now agree that since slavery remained extremely profitable until the day it was abolished, such an end was unlikely ever to come. If this was true in the past, it is even more true today, since the costs associated with the slave trade have shrunk so dramatically. As long as slavers continue to face only mild penalties from a handful of countries -- and none from the rest -- they can be expected to continue their work, undermining in the process the legal and ethical foundations of the global economy. If the United States and some of its European partners wish to halt modern slavery, they will have to use their power to do so, just as the Royal Navy halted the Atlantic slave trade on the high seas in the nineteenth century. There is no "natural" end to slavery in sight, and any productive policy must start by recognizing that fact.

The time has come to tackle the slave trade once and for all, in the interest of not only the people most directly affected but the broader public as well. As usual when it comes to politics, Abraham Lincoln said it best: "In giving freedom to the slave, we assure freedom to the free." Halt the global slave trade today, and all citizens of the world will benefit. Allow the practice to continue, and all will ultimately suffer.

[Footnote 1] The list comprises Algeria, Argentina, Armenia, Bahrain, Bolivia, Brazil, Cambodia, the Central African Republic, China, Cyprus, Djibouti, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, India, Indonesia, Israel, Jamaica, Kenya, Kuwait, Libya, Macau, Malaysia, Mauritania, Mexico, Oman, Peru, Qatar, Russia, South Africa, Taiwan, Togo, and the United Arab Emirates.

[Footnote 2] The list comprises Belize, Burma, Cuba, Iran, Laos, North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan, Venezuela, and Zimbabwe.

LOAD-DATE: November 29, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Essay

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Magazine

Copyright 2006 Council on Foreign Relations, Inc.
All Rights Reserved

314 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Federal Grant Opportunities

October 27, 2006

Department of State; International Programs to Combat Trafficking in Persons

SECTION: EDUCATION/EMPLOYMENT, LABOR AND TRAINING/LAW, JUSTICE AND LEGAL SERVICES/HOUSING/FOOD AND NUTRITION/HEALTH

LENGTH: 343 words

TITLE: International Programs to Combat Trafficking in Persons

DESCRIPTION: OVERVIEW: G/TIP invites U.S. non-profit/non-governmental organizations to submit anti-trafficking in persons concept papers for protection programs in Africa, with a focus on Tier 2 Watch List and Tier 3 countries that have demonstrated a political will to eradicate trafficking. Innovative proposals from other regions will be given full consideration. BACKGROUND: The mission of G/TIP is to nurture a 21st Century abolitionist movement against slavery by prosecuting traffickers, protecting victims, and preventing trafficking in persons. PROPOSAL FOCUS AND GUIDELINES: Programs can include, for example: training initiatives on the identification and administration of effective services to trafficking victims; development of service models to meet the short- and long-term needs of trafficking victims; development of collaborative relationships between service providers and law enforcement, to build a sustainable, holistic approach to combating trafficking and assisting victims. Applicants can request up to $300,000 to support programming for 12-24 months. Concept papers must be submitted via grants.gov no later than 11:59pm, EST, on December 1, 2006.

DOCUMENT TYPE: Cooperative Agreement, Grant

FUNDING OPPORTUNITY NUMBER: GTIP-07-AW-001-102706

POSTED DATE: 20061027

ORIGINAL DUE DATE FOR APPLICATION: 12012006

CURRENT DUE DATE FOR APPLICATION:

ARCHIVE DATE: 12312006

FUNDING INSTRUMENT TYPE: Cooperative Agreement, Grant

CATEGORY OF FUNDING ACTIVITY: Education/Employment, Labor and Training/Law, Justice and Legal Services/Housing/Food and Nutrition/Health

CATEGORY INFORMATION: Not Available

EXPECTED NUMBER OF AWARDS: 5

ESTIMATED TOTAL PROGRAM FUNDING: 1500000

AWARD CEILING: 300000

AWARD FLOOR: None

CFDA NUMBER: 00.000

COST SHARING OR MATCHING REQUIREMENT: N

ELIGIBLE APPLICANTS: 12

ADDITIONAL INFORMATION ON ELIGIBILITY: Not Available

AGENCY NAME: Department of State

OFFICE: Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Person

CONTACT: Amy LeMar-Meredith

Program Analyst

Phone 202-312-9650

LOAD-DATE: November 1, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

315 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Frontier Star

October 2, 2006 MondayPAK NO MORE STAYS ON WATCH LIST WITH REGARD TO HUMAN TRAFFICKING: SHERPAO*LENGTH: 213 words

ISLAMABAD: Interior Minister Aftab Ahmad Khan Sherpao has said FIA has played vital role for prevention of human trafficking and elimination of terrorism, which has been appreciated by UK and US as well. He said this while presiding over a meeting on a briefing given by FIA here Monday. Minister of state for interior, Chaudhry Zafar Iqbal Warriach, home secretary Syed Kamal Shah, additional home secretary Qamar Ul Zaman, director general FIA, Tariq Pervez and other senior officials of interior ministry and FIA were also present on the occasion.

Sherpao held Pakistan was no more on the watch list in terms of human trafficking as per US congress report. On the other hand, India is still there. " We have evolved a national action program with regard to eradication of human smuggling, which is not in place in other neighbouring countries. We have also set up International Task Force," he pointed out.

Interior Minister told competent officers have been inducted in FIA on merit basis to reactivate and revitalize the organizations. Government will provide all the resources to improve the performance of FIA. Earlier FIA director general Tariq Pervez highlighted performance of organization and apprised the interior minister of the ongoing and future plans of the agency.

LOAD-DATE: December 6, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHDOCUMENT-TYPE: Trafficking/SmugglingPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2006 The Frontier Star
All Rights Reserved

316 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

September 27, 2006 Wednesday

Sierra Leone; US $100,000 Grant to Fight Human Trafficking

BYLINE: Concord Times

LENGTH: 319 words

United States Ambassador to Sierra Leone, Thomas Hull and the United Nations Children Fund (UNICEF) Country Representative, Geerte Cappelaere Tuesday signed a $ 100,000 grant to fight Trafficking In Persons (TIP).

The ceremony took place at the United States Embassy, Walpole Street, Freetown.

Ambassador Hull said Sierra Leone has made great progress in recognizing and combating trafficking in persons.

He said the country is rated favourable in the US States Department's annual trafficking in persons report. The country has moved from tier 3- lowest ranking to tier2- watch list.

"Much of the credit for Sierra Leone's improved tier placement goes to the government for passing the Anti-trafficking in Persons Act," he stated and mentioned that the law does not only define trafficking as a crime but also established the TIP taskforce to oversee the work of government.

He said one of the challenges is that many Sierra Leoneans do not understand the risks associated with sending their children away from the village who end up as easy prey to traffickers.

He pointed out that trafficking cannot be addressed without addressing poverty and that many parents cannot afford to send their children to school.

"Trafficking victims are forced, lied to or coerced into their situations," he highlighted adding that victims of trafficking still rely on the goodwill of police and ministry officials.

The Ambassador stated that the grant would help UNICEF to support the government and people of Sierra Leone in combating trafficking in persons through prevention, protection, prosecution, response, and regular monitoring.

Assistant Inspector General of Police Crime Service, Kadi Fakondo disclosed that a woman is presently serving 5 years jail term for trafficking in persons.

"Human trafficking in Sierra Leone is a big time organized crime," she said adding that training on trafficking for police recruits is on course.

LOAD-DATE: September 27, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

317 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Hindustan Times

September 22, 2006 Friday 11:09 AM EST

Human trade monitor

BYLINE: Hindustan TimesLENGTH: 218 wordsDATELINE: NEW DELHI, India

NEW DELHI, India, Sep 22 -- The government on Friday moved to tighten the grip on human trafficking at a federal level, setting in motion an institutionalised mechanism to keep track of trends of trafficking in the states and nudging them into action.

The Union home ministry held its first meeting with nodal officers of states tasked with coordinating efforts on human trafficking in the states on Friday. Nineteen states and three Union territories have appointed nodal officers at the Centre's instance.

The Centre had started a cell in the home ministry to monitor human trafficking in July this year after the US placed India in Tier 2 Watch List for the third consecutive year. This led to fears that unless the Centre took a lead in this issue, there was a real risk that India could slip to the Tier 3 category, which would invoke sanctions under US law.

The 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report noted that India had failed to show evidence of increasing efforts to address human trafficking, lacked a national law enforcement response to any form of trafficking.

A government official said the states were told at the meeting to hold similar monitoring and assessment meetings at the district level and sensitise police officers.

The Hindustan Times is provided through HT Syndication, New Delhi.

LOAD-DATE: September 24, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

318 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Balochistan Times (AsiaNet)

September 19, 2006 Tuesday

PAK FULLY COGNIZANT TO CHALLENGE OF HUMAN SMUGGLING: WARRIACH

LENGTH: 553 words

ISLAMABAD: Pakistan attaches great importance to its relationship with United Kingdom (UK) and the relations between the two countries remained cordial and have continued to grow over the years. Ch Zafar Iqbal Warriach, Minister of State for Interior while talking to a British delegation headed by Liam Byrne, Minister of State for Nationality, Citizenship and Immigration, UK who called on him in Ministry of Interior here Tuesday, stated this. Syed Kamal Shah, Secretary, Ministry of Interior and Mark Lyall Grant British High Commissioner were also present in the meeting.

The minister of State for Interior said that Pakistan has come a long way in fighting the menace of terrorism. Even before 9/11, Pakistan remained victim of terrorism in one form or the other. He said that the 9/11 episodes gave a new fillip to this menace and hence terrorism emerged a major challenge to humanity in this century. He said that the government of Pakistan has reinvigorated its undoubted resolve to root out extremism from the country because we are fully conscious of its adverse effects on our development and stability. He said that government is earnestly manifesting its policy in letter and spirit. When the Pakistan indicated a total policy commitment, which was out of conviction and not compulsion.

He said that the government and the people of Pakistan are grateful for the assistance provided by the United Kingdom in the wake of earthquake in Pakistan. The prompt rescue and relief efforts by the British contingent were a great help for the disaster stricken people of Pakistan. He said that Pakistan has dual nationality agreement with UK and we have agreed to sign the Prisoners Exchange Treaty.

He said that government of Pakistan is fully cognizant of the challenge and the magnitude of the problem of human smuggling/trafficking and has prepared a comprehensive and all-encompassing strategy to address the entire spectrum of the problem ranging from the root causes to protection and rehabilitation of victims. He said that due to proactive steps taken by the government, Pakistan has now been elevated in US State Department's Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report and placed at Tier-2.

He said that UK immigration authorities has shifted Pakistan from High Risk to Low Risk country and acknowledged that the reduction in Inadequately Documented Arrivals in massive which is massive and welcome improvement. He said that in view of cordial relationship with UK, British business have been facilitated visa up to 05 years within hours to the British Businessmen on Production of requisite documents. He said that Pakistan has very safe, secure and conducive environment for foreign investment and lot of foreign investors and leading companies are coming to invest in Pakistan.

He said that present government of General Pervez Musharraf and Prime Minister Shaukat Aziz has put the country on the way of progress and prosperity. Mr Liam Byrne, Minister of State for Nationality citizenship and Immigration, UK appreciated the policies of government of Pakistan especially Pakistan's role in war against terrorism. He said that United Kingdom and Pakistan had a long history of friendly relationship and the British Pakistanis were playing a crucial and important role in further commenting this bond of friendship.

LOAD-DATE: September 21, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Interior Department

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2006 The Balochistan Times
All Rights Reserved

319 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Frontier Star

September 13, 2006 Wednesday

UN REPORT REGARDING PAKISTAN IN HUMAN TRAFFICKING BASE- LESS, SENATE TOLD

LENGTH: 184 words

ISLAMABAD: The Senate was told on Wednesday that Government of Pakistan has rejected the report of United Nation regarding Pakistan not doing enough to stop human smuggling. State Interior Minister Zafar Iqbal Warriach told Senate on Wednesday that Federal Investigation Agency (FIA) and Interior Ministry has taken meaningful steps to stop human trafficking in the country and the government has strongly rejected the UN report in this regard.

British High Commissioner in Pakistan himself lauded the role of FIA for stopping human smuggling and United State has deleted Pakistan's name from its watch list, he added Zafar Iqbal Warriach further said report of United Nation regarding Pakistan for not doing enough to stop human trafficking is baseless.

He said Pakistan has taken all steps to stop human smuggling due to which reservations of British and US in this regard has been removed. Meanwhile, Federal Health Minister Nasser Khan told Upper House a particular lobby is working against Pakistan and several Non Governmental Organizations (NGOs) and European Countries are trying to defame Pakistan.

LOAD-DATE: December 6, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: United Nations; Trafficking/Smuggling; International Relations

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2006 The Frontier Star
All Rights Reserved

320 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

August 18, 2006 Friday

Nigeria; Evils of Human Trafficking

BYLINE: Daily ChampionLENGTH: 1400 words

CLARA, 13, was picked up by her aunty having agreed with her parents that she would work as a house-help somewhere in Lagos on a salary of N7,000 and this money was to be sent to her parents in the village.

Unknown to Clara and her relatives, the aunt, who is involved in human trafficking, was to hand her over to syndicate. By the arrangement of her aunt, whose plans were to be disclosed to her relatives, Clara would continue her voyage to an undisclosed destination as soon as she arrived.

As agreed, Clara was handed over in exchange for money, part of which was sent to her parents as salary for two years. Soon after the deal was sealed, Clara began her journey to Italy where she was forced into prostitution.

Her story typifies the known pattern in all human trafficking cases: First, persons are recruited (most often young girls and children) and they are transferred to a destination country (most Western Europe) where they are sexually exploited. In the event that this exploitation is foiled, they can then be rescued as victims of Trafficking in Persons (TIP) and then most probably repatriated to their countries of origin.

Therefore, Clara's gory experience is replicated in many young girls who have fallen prey to believable stories of fantastic offers of employment and the good life away from the poverty and drudgery of every day living in their villages. As development around the country shows, many girls within her age bracket have been victims of similar gimmicks.

Those involved in the illegal trade conduct it in a seemingly decent manner and ease that their victims do not suspect any foul play. They get the support of family members of their victims under the pretext that they aimed to upgrade the financial status of such impoverished homes. Most often the act is perpetrated by someone known to the victim or her family.

Oftentimes too, the victims are coerced, tricked, lured or outright forced out of the country with promise of a very bright future in the destination country which always turns out to be a fluke. Stories from repatriated victims revealed that some of them were made to swear before priests in shrines where their public hair, finger nails are cut for keeps, to make them pliant. A regional project launched in 2003 by the United Nations Office of Drug and Crime (UNODC) found in a succinct Nigerian case study that although trafficking of persons from Nigeria involved both Nigerian and nationals of other countries; it appeared that the human trafficking activities that take place in Nigeria are conducted entirely by Nigerian citizens. "Those involved include recruiting agents (such as Clara's aunt), native doctors (voodoo priests) who often perform ceremonies to control the victims, lawyers who draw up debt bondage agreements, estate agents who help to launder trafficking proceeds through real estate transactions and travel touts and agents who provide the necessary travel documents and arrangements. Generally, foreign nationals work as temporary guides across borders or provide shelters and safe houses along the routes of harbour victims traveling by land."

This seemingly innocuous transaction has taken such dimensions that Nigeria today has been dubbed an endemic country in the trafficking of human beings. In a Citation Index drawn up by UNODC, Nigeria ranks as "very high" as an origin country, and together with Cote D'Ivoire and South Africa, they are frequently cited as destinations for victims trafficked from African countries, bringing with it negative portrayals and odium internationally.

NAPTIP

Perhaps, this propelled government to enact the Trafficking in Persons (Prohibition) Law Enforcement and Administration Act, 2003, which also created the National Agency for the Prohibition of Trafficking in Persons and Other Related Matters (NAPTIP).

Nigeria is the first African country to enact such a law and establish a specific agency to implement it. Since its establishment, NAPTIP, in collaboration with other law enforcement agencies, international agencies, the Italian and Belgian governments, have started working seriously towards reducing the incidence of this illicit phenomenon. According to NAPTIP, an estimated 4.5 million persons are trafficked internationally, while about 10,000 are trafficked from Nigeria annually.

Before now, many people never knew that Trafficking in Persons (TIP) and Forced Labour (FL) constituted an offence. Reactions hitherto have vacillated between ignorance and indifference.

Executive Secretary of NAPTIP, Mrs. Caroline Ndaguba says it has been difficult obtaining accurate statistics on the trafficking situation in Africa because of the nature of the illicit trade. Quoting a recent UNICEF report on the phenomenon, she says that four per cent of repatriated victims of international trafficking in Nigeria are children. The female/male ratio is seven to three.

Explaining further, she said: "46 per cent are engaged in prostitution domestic labour (21 per cent), forced labour (5 per cent) and entertainment (8 per cent). "Internal trafficking in Nigeria was also reported to be forced labour (32 per cent), domestic labour (31 per cent) and prostitution (30 per cent)."

Inadequate as the statistics may be, Ndaguba says they illustrate the magnitude of human trafficking in Nigeria and efforts that need to be made to combat the illicit trade. The Agency's interventions have been in prosecuting traffickers, rehabilitating victims, collaborating with nations and agencies to fight the scourge and generally creating awareness in the public about this new menace.

So far, she says, NAPTIP has secured the conviction of three traffickers in Benin City and Kano, while 14 other court cases have reached advanced stages of prosecution.

Memoranda

Due to the transnational nature of human trafficking, she said that NAPTIP has also signed a Memorandum of Understanding (MoU) with traffickers' destination and endemic countries such as Britain, Italy, Republic of Benin and Spain.

Specifically, the MoU with the Republic of Benin, which shares a common border with Nigeria, entails joint investigation and prosecution of cases, sensitization as well as repatriation of victims. It was signed because the nation is an important source country for many children drafted into child labour.

The MoU with destination countries for sexual exploitation such as Britain and Italy are, however, different. In the case of Italy, in particular, the understanding deals with an agreement on the re-administration illegal immigrants.

A NAPTIP source says the MoUs already signed are pilots as the Agency plans to sign similar MoUs with all neighbouring African countries and destination countries in order to facilitate investigation and prosecution.

Since it remains a source, transit and destination country, Nigeria had been promoted from the 2nd Tier Watch list to 2nd Tier List in the global rating of human trafficking in endemic nations. The grading recognizes the level of effort put in by countries of fight TIP and CL.

In the case of Nigeria, it recognizes her efforts in the areas of investigation, prosecution of traffickers, public enlightenment and rehabilitation of victims."This promotion is important to us because it has removed us from the threat of possible sanctions by the U.S. Government. This means that US government can give us assistance directly without passing through the Congress," Ndaguba said.

Nonetheless, ILO Chief Technical Adviser on the Programme Against Trafficking in West Africa (PATWA), Dr. Patience Idemudia, says in order to properly wage the war against the phenomenon, there is need for an appropriate policy to link anti-trafficking to development and poverty reduction strategies in Nigeria.

She holds the view that no better vehicle can fulfill such objective, than a National Plan of Action on TIP and FL. The Plan will specifically signpost actions to be taken against TIP and FL.

A recent validation workshop for the National Plan of Action on Human Trafficking and Forced Labour recommended a multifaceted plan of action for an effective effort at combating TIP and FL.

Through studies it conducted, ILO-PATWA has built a network of actors with the aim of raising awareness on migration related risks, provide concrete alternatives for vulnerable groups, rehabilitate victims and returnees, as well as monitor migration trends room communities in Nigeria.

LOAD-DATE: August 18, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

Copyright 2006 AllAfrica, Inc.

321 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

August 15, 2006 Tuesday 2:32 AM GMT

Credibility of US report on human trafficking questioned

BYLINE: P. ParameswaranLENGTH: 514 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, Aug 14 2006

The credibility of an annual US report that blacklisted countries linked to human trafficking has been questioned in a Congressional probe that called the report inconsistent and incomplete.

The report by the State Department analyzes the issue in about 150 countries and ranks them by their efforts to combat trafficking for forced labor, prostitution, military service and other purposes.

But the explanations for ranking decisions in the annual "Trafficking in Persons Report" "are incomplete" and "not used consistently to develop antitrafficking programs," said the Government Accountability Office (GAO), the investigative arm of Congress, in a damning study released Monday.

While the annual report raised the risk of sanctions against governments that did not comply with minimum standards to eliminate trafficking, it "does not comprehensively describe compliance with the standards," the study said.

This "lessen(s) the reports credibility and usefulness as a diplomatic tool," it said.

"Further, incomplete country narratives reduce the reports utility as a guide to help focus US government resources on antitrafficking programming priorities," it added.

In the latest report released in June, the State Department listed Venezuela, Saudi Arabia, North Korea, Sudan, Cuba, Myanmar, Iran, Syria, Zimbabwe, Uzbekistan, Laos and Belize in the so-called Tier 3 worst offenders of human trafficking.

They could face sanctions if they do not take immediate measures within 90 days.

Many Asian governments had come under criticism in the report for not doing enough to stem trafficking.

The US government estimated in the report that 600,000 to 800,000 people were trafficked across international borders annually.

However, the congressional probe said "such estimates of global human trafficking are questionable."

"The accuracy of the estimates is in doubt because of methodological weaknesses, gaps in data and numerical discrepancies," it said.

The study also said that country data "are not available, reliable, or comparable" and highlighted "a considerable discrepancy between the numbers of observed and estimated victims of human trafficking."

It urged Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to ensure that the report "clearly documents the rationale and support for tier rankings and improve the reports usefulness for programming by making the narratives more comprehensive."

It suggested a trafficking data and research unit to serve as an interagency focal point charged with developing an overall research strategy, collecting and analyzing data, and directing research.

US lawmakers who called for the probe expressed concern over the government flaws.

"I am deeply concerned about the stark deficiencies highlighted by this report," said James Sensenbrenner, the Republican chairman of the House of Representatives judiciary committee.

He suggested that the administration allow a clearinghouse managed jointly by the State, Homeland Security and Justice Departments to prepare the estimate of trafficking victims.

The task is undertaken at present by the intelligence community.

pp/kd

LOAD-DATE: August 15, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 Agence France Presse
All Rights Reserved

322 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

August 15, 2006 Tuesday 11:25 PM EST

WOMEN'S ANTI-DISCRIMINATION COMMITTEE URGES PHILIPPINES TO SPEED UP LEGISLATION AIMED AT ERASING STEREOTYPES, COMBATING VIOLENCE AGAINST FEMALES

BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 5278 wordsDATELINE: UNITED NATIONS

The United Nations issued the following press release:

The Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women today urged the Government of the Philippines to speed up the passage of legislation needed to erase sexual stereotypes and to combat violence against women as it considered the combined fifth and sixth periodic reports of the predominantly Roman Catholic country that faces one of the highest population growth rates in Asia.

Expert members of the Committee also urged the Philippine delegation to move on more than a dozen pieces of pending legislation, including the Magna Carta for Women, now in the final stages of review in the House of Representatives, the passage of which would bring the country into alignment with the Convention on the Rights of the Child and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. It would commit the State to recognize, affirm and intensify its efforts to guarantee the rights and fundamental freedoms of women, especially those in marginalized sectors. Once a similar bill was filed in the Philippine Senate, the two would eventually become the country's Gender Equality Law.

Committee Chairperson Hanna Beate Sch?pp-Schilling said more legislation was needed in addition to laws approved over the past decade. They included the anti-rape law of 1997, which expanded rape from being a crime against chastity to a crime against a person; the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act of 2003, which created policies and penalties to stop trafficking in persons; and the Anti-Violence against Women and Their Children Act of 2004, which tried to protect women and children from physical, psychological and economic abuses in the context of marital, dating or common-law relationships.

Country representatives said the Philippine Government was working diligently to revise codes and laws that were incompatible with the Convention and which discriminated against women.

During the discussion, experts focused on Government policies covering a wide range of issues from family planning to overseas workers to divorce. Ethelyn P. Nieto, Under-Secretary in the Department of Health, the lead agency for family planning, said the Government's goal was for Filipinos of all ages to enjoy the benefits of responsible reproductive health services by 2015. The Government had not banned any artificial family planning methods and wished couples to have access to all means they needed to plan their families.

In the few locations where artificial contraceptive methods were banned, national hospitals continued to provide information about all types of family planning, she said. And concerning the legal status of abortion, the Government upheld the Constitutional provision safeguarding the life of the unborn child and mother. It was not moving to abolish the law that made abortion a crime subject to penalties.

The Committee will meet again at 10 a.m. Wednesday, 15 August, to consider the fourth periodic report of Chile.

Background

The Committee had before it the combined fifth and sixth periodic reports of the Philippines (documents CEDAW/C/PHI/5-6) on that country's implementation of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women covering the period between December 1995 and December 2003.

Part I contains responses to the concluding comments and recommendations made by the Committee with respect to the fourth report submitted in December 1995. Part II contains information on the political, social and economic climate in the Philippines, including updates on the situation of women. Part III provides specific information regarding implementation of articles 1 to 16 of the Convention.

According to the report, the National Statistics Office estimates that the country's population totalled 81.1 million in 2003, up from 76.5 million in 2000, and grew by about 2.36 per cent annually, one of the highest rates in Asia. Women made up 49.6 per cent of the population in 1995 and 2000. The country has 111 linguistic, cultural and ethnic groups and about 80 per cent of the population is Roman Catholic.

The report notes that, while the country has made significant efforts to mobilize an increasing number of Government and non-governmental institutions towards a more gender-responsive society, many challenges lie ahead. One area that requires more work is massive poverty and inequality in the ownership of economic resources. More effective poverty-alleviation strategies are needed to help poor women in both urban and rural areas, including those working in the informal sector without basic support systems such as social security and health insurance.

As noted in the section of article 6 regarding the exploitation of women, the impact of crime on women and children, as well as the Government's war against rebel forces and terrorist organizations, require immediate and serious attention. Women should be involved in peacebuilding and the rehabilitation of their communities. Civilians displaced from their homes due to armed conflict suffer in evacuation centres owing to poor living conditions, malnutrition and illness. Violence against women persists and the number of reported crimes increased between 2000 and 2002 before declining to 7,805 in 2003, a figure 13 per cent lower than that for the preceding year.

Many women who leave the country as entertainers, fiancées of foreign nationals, service workers, tourists or undocumented workers fall victim to organized crime syndicates, the report states. Their undocumented or illegal status has kept them outside the protection of laws and from 1992 to December 2002; the Philippine Foreign Service establishment recorded 1,084 cases of human trafficking. Reported data are very low.

To combat the trafficking of women and children, the Government approved the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act of 2003, which defines trafficking in persons as a crime and sets penalties for various types of offences, the report says. The stiffest sanctions, life imprisonment and a fine of up to 5 million Philippine pesos, are reserved for any person found guilty in various situations: if the trafficked person was a child, the trafficked person died or contracted HIV/AIDS; the offender was related to the child or a member of a law enforcement unit.

The Government began designing a national strategy to prevent trafficking in women and children after an alarming number of cases surfaced in 1996, according to the report. These measures included the creation in 2000 of an Executive Council to coordinate the activities of all pertinent agencies, and of the Philippine Centre on Transnational Crime (PCTC) in 1999. The latter includes a database that Government agencies share for information on criminals, arrests and convictions for transnational crimes, including trafficking in persons, illegal recruitment, intermarriages and overseas employment.

Concerning articles 7 and 8 on women's political and public life, the report notes the country's lack of a critical mass of women in top-level and decision-making positions. Their low representation in these positions is linked to the need for more effective measures to eliminate the gender biases still evident among women and those who recommend and approve appointments. It is also related to the need to train women for decision-making posts; to encourage women voters to elect men and women who support women's empowerment and gender equality; and to sustain the political agenda and parties of women.

The report notes that, although the country has a woman President for the second time in Philippine history, there have been no significant changes in other elective positions. For example, in 2001, as in 1998, no more than 20 per cent of the electoral candidates were women and the proportion of them who won election remained at 20 per cent or less. In the legislature, the share of women in the Senate dropped to 9 per cent in 2001, or 3 women out of 23, a drop from 17 per cent in 1995. In the House of Representatives, the trend was reversed and women's share of seats increased from 9 per cent in 1995 to 16 per cent of the 205-member chamber.

On the other hand, by the end of 2003, 5 out of 19 Cabinet department secretaries were women, the report points out. And as of September 2003, four, or 27 per cent, of the country's 15 Supreme Court justices were women; 12, or 25 per cent, of 47 justices on the Court of Appeals were women; and three, or 27 per cent, of 11 justices on the Sandiganbayan, which handles graft and corruption cases involving Government officials, were women.

And regarding women in the diplomatic service, in September 2002, women headed 22 of the 80 Philippine embassies and consulates around the world, or 28 per cent. Twelve of these held the rank of Ambassador and 10 that of Consul-General. In November 2003, only 17 out of a total of 61, or 28 per cent, of ambassadors and chargés d'affaires were female. Ten of the 19 consuls, or 53 per cent, were women.

Introduction of Report

The Philippine delegation was headed by Esperanza I. Cabral, Secretary for Social Welfare and Development, and also included Myrna T. Yao, Chairperson of the National Commission on the Role of Filipino Women; Bayani S. Mercado, Deputy Permanent Representative, Permanent Mission of the Philippines to the United Nations; Ethelyn P. Nieto, Under-Secretary, Department of Health; Luzviminda

G. Padilla, Under-Secretary, Labour and Employment; Amaryllis T. Torres, Commissioner, National Commission on the Role of Filipino Women; Evelyn S. Dunuan, Commissioner; Emmeline L. Verzosa, Executive Director, National Commission; Marie Yvette L. Banzon, Third Secretary, Permanent Mission of the Philippines; Aurora Javate de Dios, non-governmental organization representative and CEDAW expert; Feliz V. de Leon, Jr., AttachÉ, Permanent Mission of the Philippines; and Cecilia Rachel V. Quisumbing, Permanent Mission of the Philippines.

Introducing the report, Ms. CABRAL, Secretary for Social Welfare and Development, said the country had seen substantial gains from the Government's gender mainstreaming policy. Laws, policies, executive and administrative orders in national Government, as well as local ordinances that worked for gender quality had all provided the mandates to develop programmes that could effectively close the gaps in the benefits and opportunities enjoyed by women and men. The Framework Plan for Women served as the gender equality framework of President Gloria Macapagal-Arroyo's present Government. The promotion of women's human rights was a key component of the Plan, as was the promotion of women's economic empowerment and gender-responsive governance.

Regarding article 6, she said landmark legislation for dealing with violence against women and human trafficking had been successfully promulgated and the Convention could now be cited as a reference in cases filed under those laws. Due to the legislation's initial progress in combating trafficking in persons, the Philippines had been removed from the United States Department of State's watch list of countries with severe incidences of human trafficking. In the past year, the courts had convicted seven individuals on trafficking offences and sentenced four to life in prison. Sixty-seven offenders had been charged and 31 prosecuted for violations of the law.

Turning to the fight against poverty, she said it was the focus of the Medium-Term Philippine Development Plan and the Government aimed to create 1.4 million to 1.6 million jobs annually. The promotion and development of small businesses was viewed as a critical strategy to spur economic growth.

Regarding traditional sex roles, she said they had been difficult to break in the area of reproductive health rights and family planning remained largely a female responsibility. The number of male spouses using contraceptives remained low. Family planning and population policy revolved around the "four pillars" of responsible parenthood, birth spacing, respect for life and informed choice. Responsibility for providing reproductive health information and services had been devolved to local government, which may choose to implement aspects of the Responsible Parenthood Programme or ignore it totally.

She noted that the Philippines had made progress in disseminating information on the Convention and its Optional Protocol.

Interactive Dialogue

Committee experts started the discussion with questions and comments on a range of issues under the Convention, including discrimination, policy measures, guarantees of basic human rights and fundamental freedoms, special measures, sex-role stereotyping and prejudice.

Experts asked if there was a time frame for repealing discriminatory laws and sought details on procedures to ensure that all relevant national laws complied with the various articles of the Convention. They also expressed concern over the apparent lack of robust State machinery to guarantee, monitor and evaluate the Convention's consistent application, and asked the delegation to elaborate on Government follow-up efforts.

One expert asked about the membership of the Philippine Commission on Human Rights and its role in drafting the country report, while others questioned the delegation about the rights of Muslim women and the application of sharia law.

A country representative said in response that section 14 of the Philippine Constitution's article 2 guaranteed equal rights for men and women and that there were several national laws that prohibited discrimination against women. The anti-rape law, Family Code and other laws had been amended to expand protections for women. Several pro-women bills, such as the Magna Carta for Women, which included a definition of discrimination, were before Congress. The Magna Carta was currently pending passage in the lower house of Congress and once passed and certified by the President, would be sent to the Senate for approval, probably by the end of 2006.

Another country representative noted efforts to implement the Convention through the enactment of national laws and jurisprudence. For example, the national telephone company and Banco Central of the Philippines had referred to the Convention when addressing discrimination against married women in the workplace. However, measures were needed for the proper implementation of anti-discrimination laws.

In relation to the treatment of Muslim women, a delegate said the Philippine Code of Muslim Personal Laws was perceived as having certain discriminatory provisions. For example, it permitted arranged marriages, marriage for girls under the age of 18 and polygamy, whereby men were allowed up to four wives. A balance must be struck between adherence to the Convention and respect for the cultural sensitivities of the large Muslim population. The Government had consulted non-governmental organizations, Muslim groups and women's leaders to bridge that gap. Sharia courts had indeed been remiss in addressing discrimination against women, many of whom had filed divorce cases but had not been able to recover their dowries. The National Commission on the Role of Filipino Women and the Justice Department were working with sharia courts to address such concerns.

Regarding institutional gender mainstreaming, another delegate said that, since 1986, the National Commission had been conducting capacity-building for civil servants and government bureaucrats at the national and regional levels. In 2004, the Government had circulated memos mandating capacity-building at the regional and local levels in line with the Convention. All government agencies were supposed to earmark at least 5 per cent of their budgets for gender-equality projects. The National Commission was pushing for agencies to increase that percentage and results-based monitoring systems had been set up to track progress.

The delegate said that, in terms of compiling sex-disaggregated data, the National Commission had asked the National Statistics Coordinating Board to provide such data when possible, despite the higher cost of doing so. All data-gathering agencies -- including those charged with education, health, social welfare and labour -- had been asked to disaggregate data in accordance with the Beijing Platform of Action.

Another country representative added that the National Commission did not work directly with women, but rather conducted policy analysis and provided technical assistance for Congress, as well as monitoring evaluation and gender budgeting. It was moving towards gender auditing. The Secretary for Social Welfare and Development had 12 sectoral representatives for gender mainstreaming, including in such areas as academia, labour, agriculture, media, culture and the arts. Those representatives were appointed by the President and worked on a non-paid, voluntary basis.

As for the Philippine Commission on Human Rights, another delegate said it was an independent, constitutional body with investigatory powers that had recently created a women's centre. It was hearing cases on human rights violations against women.

Experts touched on a range of issues including responsibility for implementing the policies of the Commission; when Parliament would adopt the Magna Carta; the present administration's commitment to the status of women; and budgeting for gender equality measures.

They also sought to know about the powers of Commissioners and their ability to influence Cabinet members on the status of women, and whether the Magna Carta would help provide protection for prostitutes. One expert raised the use of temporary special measures as a vehicle to get women into decision-making positions at the national and local levels and to change the perception of women. Was the Magna Carta a mandated temporary special measure?

A country representative said the Commission was not under the Department of Social Welfare and Development. Rather, the Department provided an oversight role for the Commission, which was under the Office of the President from where it operated more effectively. Under the Magna Carta bill, the Commission would operate in the same manner and its Chairperson would assume Cabinet rank. The Commission had about 65 permanent staff members.

Regarding the administration's priorities, the country representative said they were mainly economic. While women's issues were important, the Philippines also faced such challenges as globalization and terrorism. The President had shown her support for women's issues through the Magna Carta bill.

Another country representative said the delay in passing certain laws was due to the patriarchal attitudes among many policymakers. There was a need to boost the representation of women in politics in order to strengthen policies of concern to them. There were serious problems concerning the portrayal of women by the media and the lack of women in business and politics.

Regarding article 4 and temporary special measures, a country representative said the Philippine Constitution had no prohibition against them and did not view such measures as discriminatory. The Indigenous Peoples Rights Act of 1997 was the primary Government agency for indigenous cultures and communities. The passage of the Magna Carta bill would help institutionalize women's rights.

Regarding the elimination of sexual stereotypes, experts sought information about how the Government linked violence with the continuation of sexual stereotypes; the anti-rape law and its provisions regarding marital rape; and concrete data about the anti-trafficking law, such as the number of women rescued. Other questions focused on attitudes surrounding teenage pregnancy and research on the men responsible.

A country representative said the changing of sexual stereotypes must be linked with their contribution to sexual violence against women, adding with respect to rape that it was one of the highest indicators of crime against women. In addition, incest had been recorded as rape. There had been reports on incest and the issue had been out in the open, but there was still a cloud of secrecy surrounding it which must be addressed. The Government must deepen its research on violence against women.

Women's groups were pushing for anti-prostitution in the next few years, she said, adding that obstacles to its passage were the same as those hindering any gender-equality legislation. Such bills had a low priority. Regarding the anti-trafficking law, there had been seven convictions and three persons had been sentenced to life imprisonment. There had been 186 trafficking cases before the Justice Department in 2005.

Concerning women's representation in judicial posts, several experts noted that the Philippines had only five women judges and asked whether there was a quota system to ensure equal representation. How were judges recruited?

Ms. CABRAL, Secretary for Social Welfare and Development, said there were no separate congressional seats for women and that, while the ratio of women to men in the judiciary was not satisfactory, the balance was improving.

Another delegate noted that the National Commission on the Role of Filipino Women and other concerned sectors had proposed the formation of a selection committee that would start to scout women candidates for judicial posts. There were few vacant judgeships since judges were allowed to serve until they reached age 70. The President had worked with the sharia courts to select women nominees as there were several vacancies for judges in those courts.

The Philippine Judicial Academy was providing gender sensitivity training to a branch of the Supreme Court, another delegate noted. Last year, the Supreme Court and the National Commission had created a gender justice award to recognize justices who had a critical understanding of women's issues.

Another country representative noted that, if approved, the Women's Empowerment Act would require that all major political parties sitting on municipal and provincial boards reserve one third of their seats for women.

Turning to follow-up questions, a delegate inquired about rescue and rehabilitation programmes for women who had been prostitutes or victims of trafficking.

A delegate said in response that 137 victims of trafficking, rape and violence, mainly women and children, had been rescued during 25 rescue operations between 2003 and 2005. Officials had made 57 arrests for trafficking crimes out of 169 cases received. The Department of Social Welfare and Development provided immediate assistance to survivors, operating 19 crisis centres nationwide, as well as 16 shelters offering psychosocial support, legal assistance and job training. The National Commission had partnered with religious non-governmental organizations in that regard through an anti-trafficking and anti-prostitution network, but the Government did not fund such civil-society endeavours.

Regarding education, one expert asked whether there were special measures in place to ensure that minorities and women in rural areas had access to the educational system, including scholarships. Other questions focused on what measures were in place to reduce sexual stereotypes in the education system.

Concerning unemployment, one expert asked whether the Government's measures would reduce unemployment among women, which had stood at 8.5 per cent in 1997 and risen to 12.4 per cent in 2004. Would new Government measures reduce the unemployment rate and provide information about training opportunities and access to credit and the social security system?

Turning to articles 11 and 12, which cover issues of employment and health, experts asked about labour conditions; pay and benefits for female home workers; Government approaches to end abuse of and discrimination against female migrant workers, including bilateral agreements with other nations; and the high pay gap between men and women.

Experts also expressed concern over the Philippines' high maternal mortality rate and the fact that women, rather than their male partners, were chiefly responsible for family planning. They asked about measures to prevent abortion and natural family planning programmes.

In response, a country delegate said overseas employment would continue to be an option for Filipino workers. Migrant workers were covered by protective measures from recruitment until they returned home. Only licensed recruitment agencies were allowed to hire migrant workers and all work contracts must be verified by the Labour AttachÉ for compliance with labour codes. All job orders by foreign employers must register with the Philippine administrative authority. Philippine overseas labour offices were staffed with 230 personnel throughout Asia. They provided social services and acted in many cases as halfway houses for workers in stressful conditions. To enhance protection for Filipino migrant workers, the Government had signed memorandums of understanding on migrant workers' rights with other countries, including Bahrain, Indonesia, Iraq, Jordan, Kuwait, Northern Mariana Islands, India, Saudi Arabia and the United States.

Another delegate said the President was promoting microcredit and microfinance for women-owned and women-operated businesses to bolster entrepreneurship among women, particularly those in poor rural areas. The National Federation of Homeworkers, which was recognized by the United Nations and assisted by the International Labour Organization, had successfully lobbied for passage of a law granting informal workers the right to social security, including maternity leave pay.

A country representative said the Government respected the right of women to choose their type of work and if they wanted an overseas job it would provide them with all available protection. As a protective mechanism for women heading overseas, the Government offered free employment seminars that provided information about overseas destinations and what to expect. A woman could not leave the country without attending a pre-departure orientation seminar that included information about foreign cultures.

Regarding overseas migrants, the Department of Labour and Employment provided services for Filipino women working overseas no matter where they resided. The problem was that the Government did not always know where overseas workers lived and whether they needed help. Another delegate said the Government's long-term strategy for those women was to expand the Philippine economy and increase job opportunities at home.

Concerning reproductive health, a country representative said the Department of Health was the Government's lead agency in that area and its goal was for Filipinos of all ages to enjoy the benefits of responsible reproductive health services by 2015. The Government had a number of administrative orders spelling out its reproductive health policies on such issues as safe motherhood and the prevention and management of abortion, as well as guidelines on contraception.

The Government had the responsibility to provide information so that couples could make informed choices as they reached their family goals, she said. It had not banned any artificial family planning methods and wished couples to have access to whatever methods they needed to ensure the recommended spacing of three years between children. The Government used the help of non-governmental organizations, as well as public and private partnerships, to achieve those goals.

She stressed that the Government promoted natural and artificial family planning services and the Population Commission was attached to the Health Department. In the few areas where artificial contraceptive methods had been banned, national hospitals had continued to provide information about all types of family planning. The rhythm method was regarded as a natural means of family planning.

And concerning the legal status of abortion, the Government upheld the constitutional provision safeguarding the life of the unborn child, as well as the mother, she said. While no measures were being taken to abolish the law making abortion a crime, no one, including girls, had gone to jail for violating that law.

One expert asked why the Government did not modify the Penal Code if women were not prosecuted for abortion. Another expert asked how the Government could expect women to use only natural family planning methods in a patriarchal society where most women had difficulty negotiating their right to refuse sex.

Turning to articles 13 and 14, on economic and social benefits and rural women, experts asked about the ability of those women to access land titles and credit. They also sought to know about the effectiveness of Government programmes to assist women in poor rural areas and to help indigenous groups.

In response, a country representative said that, thanks to the lobbying efforts of women's groups and women in academia, many women had been given land transfers whereas, in the past, land-transfer certificates had been given only to men. Still, women were sometimes reluctant to have their names on land and property titles. More advocacy efforts were needed in that regard.

Another delegate said the Arroyo Administration had core asset-reform programmes and that credit programmes had benefited some 618,000 women in the trade sector, more than 46,000 in the livestock sector, over 36,000 in services and more than 12,000 in agriculture. The number of microfinance-programmes beneficiaries in the country's 30 poorest provinces had risen from 86,000 people in 2004 to 100,400 in 2005. $3.75 million in funding had been provided for rural improvement projects.

Another delegate said that, as of 30 June, 44 certificates of ancestral domain titles had been issued to indigenous cultural communities.

The experts then sought clarification on issues of divorce, including whether it was truly an option, the grounds for annulling a marriage and the custody of children. Other questions touched on measures to build stronger family courts and repeal discriminatory codes; what the Government was doing to deal with local laws that were incompatible with the Convention; and efforts to discourage underage marriage.

A delegate said the Government was working diligently to revise codes that were not compatible with the Convention and that discriminated against women. Another delegate said divorce was not legal and the marriage contract could only be terminated by petition for annulment on grounds provided in the Family Code. The annulment would declare the marriage void from the beginning. Another option would be a legal separation, in which case the couple would remain married in name. Courts could grant legal separation and annulment as long as the reasons were grounded in law. The family courts had been revived in 1997 and 79 of them around the country were handling a backlog of cases. That had prompted the Supreme Court to set up a mobile court based in Manila, which showed that more women were asserting their rights.

In concluding remarks, Ms. CABRAL said the meeting had been very productive and that the experts' comments and questions would be brought to the relevant Philippine authorities for serious consideration.

HANNA BEATE SCH?PP-SCHILLING, expert from Germany and the Committee Chairperson, said that one concern that had become clear during the meeting was the need to expedite the legislative process. In addition, the seventh report of the Philippines was already due this year and it was to be hoped that it would be submitted in a timely manner.

LOAD-DATE: August 17, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

323 of 445 DOCUMENTS

August 15, 2006 Tuesday 12:35 PM EST

Government Accountability Office Report Finds Improvements Needed to Enhance U.S. Efforts to Combat Human Trafficking

SECTION: NATIONAL DESK

LENGTH: 726 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, Aug. 15

A Government Accountability Office (GAO) report released today finds that the U.S. government's efforts to combat human trafficking need: (1) a coordinated strategy to combat trafficking in persons abroad; (2) established performance measures or conducted evaluations of U.S. programs to combat human trafficking in foreign countries; (3) improved estimates of the number of trafficking victims or better analysis of human trafficking-related data that already resides within government agencies; and (4) more narrative to explain why the specific "country tier rankings" were assigned.

House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.), who requested this GAO report along with House International Relations Committee Chairman Henry J. Hyde (R-Ill.), said, "I am deeply concerned about the stark deficiencies highlighted by this report. I believe the report clearly illustrates the need for the President to move the preparation of the estimate of victims out of the intelligence community and assign it instead to the Human Smuggling and Trafficking Center (HSTC). The HSTC is a joint State, Homeland Security, and Justice clearinghouse for all relevant human trafficking information, so it should be able to accurately estimate the scale of human trafficking. The HSTC can also assist in improving the reliability of the country tier rankings."

Hyde stated, "The exploitation, mostly of women and children, into the commercial sex industry and the trafficking of men, women, boys and girls into forced labor on farms, in factories and domestic servitude is an offense to the dignity of human life. The congressionally mandated Trafficking in Persons Report has increased global awareness and prompted more anti-trafficking efforts. With each year, Congress will, no doubt, expect to see ever increasing improvements in both data gathering and program efficiency."

Human trafficking occurs worldwide where people are bought, sold and held in slave-like conditions. The Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA) requires the federal government to promote international programs to ensure punishment of traffickers, to protect their victims and to prevent trafficking.

The State Department publishes an annual Trafficking in Persons Report, which includes a ranking of countries into tiers based upon an assessment of foreign governments' compliance with the four minimum standards for eliminating human trafficking set by the TVPA. Three of the standards address whether the countries' laws prohibit severe forms of trafficking and proscribe penalties for trafficking crimes, while the fourth standard is applied to assess actual efforts by the respective government to enforce the laws and eliminate trafficking.

What GAO Found:

The GAO report, titled "Human Trafficking, Better Data, Strategy and Reporting Needed to Enhance U.S. Anti-Trafficking Efforts Abroad," recommends that the government improve information on trafficking, develop and implement a strategy which clarifies agencies' roles and responsibilities and establish a way to gauge results abroad, and clearly document the rationale and support for country rankings.

The U.S. government needs a coordinated strategy to combat trafficking in persons abroad. The U. S. government must measure the performance of its programs to combat trafficking and, consequently, evaluate which programs are effective. Its coordination mechanisms ought to clearly delineate roles and responsibilities for federal or international agencies, identify needs, or leverage activities to achieve greater results.

The State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report is intended to serve as a guide, but agencies managing overseas programs must use this diagnostic tool to identify and correct deficiencies. The report's country assessments must clearly explain how the Department of State assessed each country against anti-trafficking standards. The absence of detailed explanations lessens the ability to bring about reform.

The U.S. government estimates that almost 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders annually, but because of deficiencies in analysis and data gaps, the GAO finds that this estimate likely understates the extent of human trafficking.

<http://www.usnewswire.com/>

Contact: Kirsti T. Garlock of House International Relations Committee, 202-225-5021

LOAD-DATE: August 16, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 PR Newswire Association LLC
All Rights Reserved

324 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

August 14, 2006 Monday 9:26 PM GMT

Credibility of US human trafficking report questioned

LENGTH: 341 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, Aug 14 2006

The credibility of an annual US report that blacklisted countries linked to human trafficking has been questioned in a Congressional probe that called the report inconsistent and incomplete.

The report by the State Department analyzes the issue in about 150 countries and ranks them by their efforts to combat trafficking for forced labor, prostitution, military service and other purposes.

But the explanations for ranking decisions in the annual Trafficking in Persons Report "are incomplete" and "not used consistently to develop antitrafficking programs," said the Government Accountability Office (GAO), the investigative arm of Congress, in a damning study released Monday.

While the annual report raised the risk of sanctions against governments that did not comply with minimum standards to eliminate trafficking, it "does not comprehensively describe compliance with the standards," the study said.

This "lessen(s) the reports credibility and usefulness as a diplomatic tool," it said.

"Further, incomplete country narratives reduce the reports utility as a guide to help focus US government resources on antitrafficking programming priorities," it added.

In the latest report released in June, the State Department listed Belize, Cuba, Iran, Laos Myanmar, North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan, Venezuela and Zimbabwe on the so-called "Tier 3" of worst offenders of human trafficking.

They could face sanctions if they do not take immediate measures within 90 days.

The US government estimated in the report that 600,000 to 800,000 people were trafficked across international borders annually.

However, the Congressional probe said "such estimates of global human trafficking are questionable."

"The accuracy of the estimates is in doubt because of methodological weaknesses, gaps in data, and numerical discrepancies," it said.

The study also said that country data "are not available, reliable or comparable" and highlighted "a considerable discrepancy between the numbers of observed and estimated victims of human trafficking."

pp/kd

LOAD-DATE: August 15, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 Agence France Presse
All Rights Reserved

325 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

August 14, 2006 Monday 2:42 AM EST

GAO REPORT FINDS IMPROVEMENTS NEEDED TO ENHANCE U.S.'S EFFORTS TO COMBAT HUMAN TRAFFICKING

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 743 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Jim Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, issued the following press release:

A Government Accountability Office (GAO) report released today finds that the U.S. government's efforts to combat human trafficking need: (1) a coordinated strategy to combat trafficking in persons abroad; (2) established performance measures or conducted evaluations of U.S. programs to combat human trafficking in foreign countries; (3) improved estimates of the number of trafficking victims or better analysis of human trafficking-related data that already resides within government agencies; and (4) more narrative to explain why the specific "country tier rankings" were assigned.

House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner, Jr. (R-Wis.), who requested this GAO report along with House International Relations Committee Chairman Henry J. Hyde (R-Ill.), said, "I am deeply concerned about the stark deficiencies highlighted by this report. I believe the report clearly illustrates the need for the President to move the preparation of the estimate of victims out of the intelligence community and assign it instead to the Human Smuggling and Trafficking Center (HSTC). The HSTC is a joint State, Homeland Security, and Justice Clearinghouse for all relevant human trafficking information, so it should be able to accurately estimate the scale of human trafficking. The HSTC can also assist in improving the reliability of the country tier rankings."

Chairman Hyde stated, "The exploitation, mostly of women and children, into the commercial sex industry and the trafficking of men, women, boys and girls into forced labor on farms, in factories and domestic servitude is an offense to the dignity of human life. The congressionally mandated Trafficking in Persons Report has increased global awareness and prompted more antitrafficking efforts. With each year Congress will, no doubt, expect to see ever increasing improvements in both data gathering and program efficiency."

Human trafficking occurs worldwide where people are bought, sold, and held in slave-like conditions. The Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA) requires the federal government to promote international programs to ensure punishment of traffickers, to protect their victims, and to prevent trafficking.

The State Department publishes an annual Trafficking in Persons Report, which includes a ranking of countries into tiers based upon an assessment of foreign governments' compliance with the four minimum standards for eliminating human trafficking set by the TVPA. Three of the standards address whether the countries' laws prohibit severe forms of trafficking and proscribe penalties for trafficking crimes, while the fourth standard is applied to assess actual efforts by the respective government to enforce the laws and eliminate trafficking.

WHAT GAO FOUND:

* The GAO report, titled "Human Trafficking, Better Data, Strategy and Reporting Needed to Enhance U.S. Antitrafficking Efforts Abroad," recommends that the government improve information on trafficking, develop and implement a strategy which clarifies agencies' roles and responsibilities and establish a way to gauge results abroad, and clearly document the rationale and support for country rankings.

* The U.S. government needs a coordinated strategy to combat trafficking in persons abroad. The U. S. government must measure the performance of its programs to combat trafficking and, consequently, evaluate which programs are effective.

* The U.S. government's coordination mechanisms ought to clearly delineate roles and responsibilities for federal or international agencies, identify needs, or leverage activities to achieve greater results.

* The State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report is intended to serve as a guide, but agencies managing overseas programs must use this diagnostic tool to identify and correct deficiencies. The report's country assessments must clearly explain how the Department of State assessed each country against antitrafficking standards. The absence of detailed explanations lessens the ability to bring about reform.

* The U.S. government estimates up to 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders annually, but because of deficiencies in analysis and data gaps, the GAO finds that estimate likely understates the extent of human trafficking.

Contact: Jeff Lungren and Terry Shawn, 202/225-2492.

LOAD-DATE: August 17, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

326 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

August 13, 2006 Sunday

GAO REPORT FINDS IMPROVEMENTS NEEDED TO ENHANCE U.S. EFFORTS TO COMBAT HUMAN TRAFFICKING

BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 725 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. House Committee on International Relations:

A Government Accountability Office (GAO) report released today finds that the U.S. Government's efforts to combat human trafficking need: (1) a coordinated strategy to combat trafficking in persons abroad; (2) established performance measures or conducted evaluations of U.S. programs to combat human trafficking in foreign countries; (3) improved estimates of the number of trafficking victims or better analysis of human trafficking-related data that already resides within government agencies; and (4) more narrative to explain why the specific "country tier rankings" were assigned.

House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner, Jr. (R-WI), who requested this GAO report along with House International Relations Committee Chairman Henry J. Hyde (R-Ill.), said, "I am deeply concerned about the stark deficiencies highlighted by this report. I believe the report clearly illustrates the need for the President to move the preparation of the estimate of victims out of the intelligence community and assign it instead to the Human Smuggling and Trafficking Center (HSTC). The HSTC is a joint State, Homeland Security, and Justice clearinghouse for all relevant human trafficking information, so it should be able to accurately estimate the scale of human trafficking. The HSTC can also assist in improving the reliability of the country tier rankings."

Chairman Hyde stated, "The exploitation, mostly of women and children, into the commercial sex industry and the trafficking of men, women, boys and girls into forced labor on farms, in factories and domestic servitude is an offense to the dignity of human life. The congressionally mandated Trafficking in Persons Report has increased global awareness and prompted more anti-trafficking efforts. With each year, Congress will, no doubt, expect to see ever increasing improvements in both data gathering and program efficiency."

Human trafficking occurs worldwide where people are bought, sold, and held in slave-like conditions. The Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA) requires the federal government to promote international programs to ensure punishment of traffickers, to protect their victims, and to prevent trafficking.

The State Department publishes an annual Trafficking in Persons Report, which includes a ranking of countries into tiers based upon an assessment of foreign governments' compliance with the four minimum standards for eliminating human trafficking set by the TVPA. Three of the standards address whether the countries' laws prohibit severe forms of trafficking and proscribe penalties for trafficking crimes, while the fourth standard is applied to assess actual efforts by the respective government to enforce the laws and eliminate trafficking.

What GAO Found:

The GAO report, entitled "Human Trafficking, Better Data, Strategy and Reporting Needed to Enhance U.S. Anti-Trafficking Efforts Abroad," recommends that the government improve information on trafficking, develop and implement a strategy which clarifies agencies' roles and responsibilities and establish a way to gauge results abroad, and clearly document the rationale and support for country rankings.

The U.S. Government needs a coordinated strategy to combat trafficking in persons abroad. The U. S. Government must measure the performance of its programs to combat trafficking and, consequently, evaluate which programs are effective. Its coordination mechanisms ought to clearly delineate roles and responsibilities for federal or international agencies, identify needs, or leverage activities to achieve greater results.

The State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report is intended to serve as a guide, but agencies managing overseas programs must use this diagnostic tool to identify and correct deficiencies. The report's country assessments must clearly explain how the Department of State assessed each country against anti-trafficking standards. The absence of detailed explanations lessens the ability to bring about reform.

The U.S. Government estimates that almost 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders annually, but because of deficiencies in analysis and data gaps, the GAO finds that this estimate likely understates the extent of human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: August 17, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 States News Service

327 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

August 13, 2006 Sunday 2:30 AM EST

GAO REPORT FINDS IMPROVEMENTS NEEDED TO ENHANCE U.S. EFFORTS TO COMBAT HUMAN TRAFFICKING

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 731 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The chairman of the House International Relations Committee, issued the following press release:

A Government Accountability Office (GAO) report released today finds that the U.S. Government's efforts to combat human trafficking need: (1) a coordinated strategy to combat trafficking in persons abroad; (2) established performance measures or conducted evaluations of U.S. programs to combat human trafficking in foreign countries; (3) improved estimates of the number of trafficking victims or better analysis of human trafficking-related data that already resides within government agencies; and (4) more narrative to explain why the specific "country tier rankings" were assigned.

House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner, Jr. (R-WI), who requested this GAO report along with House International Relations Committee Chairman Henry J. Hyde (R-Ill.), said, "I am deeply concerned about the stark deficiencies highlighted by this report. I believe the report clearly illustrates the need for the President to move the preparation of the estimate of victims out of the intelligence community and assign it instead to the Human Smuggling and Trafficking Center (HSTC). The HSTC is a joint State, Homeland Security, and Justice clearinghouse for all relevant human trafficking information, so it should be able to accurately estimate the scale of human trafficking. The HSTC can also assist in improving the reliability of the country tier rankings."

Chairman Hyde stated, "The exploitation, mostly of women and children, into the commercial sex industry and the trafficking of men, women, boys and girls into forced labor on farms, in factories and domestic servitude is an offense to the dignity of human life. The congressionally mandated Trafficking in Persons Report has increased global awareness and prompted more anti-trafficking efforts. With each year, Congress will, no doubt, expect to see ever increasing improvements in both data gathering and program efficiency."

Human trafficking occurs worldwide where people are bought, sold, and held in slave-like conditions. The Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA) requires the federal government to promote international programs to ensure punishment of traffickers, to protect their victims, and to prevent trafficking.

The State Department publishes an annual Trafficking in Persons Report, which includes a ranking of countries into tiers based upon an assessment of foreign governments' compliance with the four minimum standards for eliminating human trafficking set by the TVPA. Three of the standards address whether the countries' laws prohibit severe forms of trafficking and proscribe penalties for trafficking crimes, while the fourth standard is applied to assess actual efforts by the respective government to enforce the laws and eliminate trafficking.

What GAO Found:

The GAO report, entitled "Human Trafficking, Better Data, Strategy and Reporting Needed to Enhance U.S. Anti-Trafficking Efforts Abroad," recommends that the government improve information on trafficking, develop and implement a strategy which clarifies agencies' roles and responsibilities and establish a way to gauge results abroad, and clearly document the rationale and support for country rankings.

The U.S. Government needs a coordinated strategy to combat trafficking in persons abroad. The U. S. Government must measure the performance of its programs to combat trafficking and, consequently, evaluate which programs are effective. Its coordination mechanisms ought to clearly delineate roles and responsibilities for federal or international agencies, identify needs, or leverage activities to achieve greater results.

The State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report is intended to serve as a guide, but agencies managing overseas programs must use this diagnostic tool to identify and correct deficiencies. The report's country assessments must clearly explain how the Department of State assessed each country against anti-trafficking standards. The absence of detailed explanations lessens the ability to bring about reform.

The U.S. Government estimates that almost 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders annually, but because of deficiencies in analysis and data gaps, the GAO finds that this estimate likely understates the extent of human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: August 17, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

328 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

August 8, 2006 Tuesday 12:50 PM GMT

Pakistan seeks access to nearly 100 prisoners in Iran

LENGTH: 175 wordsDATELINE: ISLAMABAD, Aug 8 2006

Pakistan said Tuesday it was trying gain consular access to some 94 Pakistanis held by neighbouring Iran, mostly for violating immigration laws.

Many were arrested more than a year ago while trying to go to European countries in search of work, interior ministry secretary Syed Kamal Shah told a press conference.

Shah said he held talks with senior Iranian officials in Tehran last week and they assured him they would take the necessary steps to grant access to the prisoners.

Islamabad also handed over the names of some 10 Pakistani human smugglers living in Iran and Tehran had pledged not to allow any "terrorists" to shelter on its territory, Shah said.

Pakistan is trying to crush a sporadic insurgency by tribal rebels in its southwestern Baluchistan province bordering Iran. The tribesmen share the same Baluch ethnicity as many in southeastern Iran.

Pakistan is also regarded as a major hub for human trafficking but was removed from a watch list last year by the United States, which said it had made significant progress in curbing the problem.

LOAD-DATE: August 9, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 Agence France Presse
All Rights Reserved

329 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Nation (AsiaNet)

August 8, 2006 Tuesday

NO TERRORISM THREAT ON I-DAY: SHERPAO FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT

LENGTH: 919 words

KARACHI - Federal Interior Minister Aftab Sherpao disclosed on Tuesday that a terrorist who killed prominent Shia cleric Allama Hassan Turrabi in Karachi was Myanmar national and not citizen of Bangladeshi, who had been living in Pakistan since long. Talking to newsmen in Karachi, Sherpao said all seven culprits involved in the killing of Allama Hassan Turrabi had been arrested and now the agencies were trying to trace out the mastermind of this suicide bombing. To a question about reports of possible terrorism on Independence Day, the minister said there was no threat of such attack on Independence Day and the law enforcement agencies had been put on high.

To another question, he said the law enforcement agencies were keeping close watch on the activities of defunct religious organisations. He pointed out that the government was taking concrete steps to eliminate the masterminds of suicide bomb attacks. Lauding the efforts of Pakistan Coast Guards, he said that despite limited resource their performance was remarkable. The Cost Guards had caught more than 1,000 human traffickers during raids in various parts of the country and recovered more than 8,000 kilograms of drugs last year.

He said that Pakistan was on the watch-list of the US due to human trafficking but due to the efforts of Pakistan Coast Guards, Washington had deleted Pakistan's name from the watch-list of human smuggling. Agencies add: Interior Minister Aftab Sherpao said that extremism was a continuous threat to Pakistan as it was linked with terrorism. Aftab Sherpao said while use of drugs and its smuggling was causing grave harm to the society; terrorism and extremism were threatening the freedom of the country and its ideological frontiers.

He reminded that President General Pervez Musharraf had repeatedly drawn the nation's attention towards the threat that extremism was a real danger to Pakistan and was like a cancer, which would eat into the very fabric of the country. He reiterated that the government would eliminate terrorism and extremism from the country, adding that ban had been imposed on unnecessary use of loudspeakers in mosques and other places of worship. A complete ban had been imposed on publication of literature based on religious hatred and sectarianism, he added.

He said extremism and terrorism were destroying the image of Pakistan and added, "the government is taking steps to combat the terrorism in the country." "We all will have to fight against extremism, sectarianism, terrorism and the menace like drugs," he said. The security and secret agencies had gained some "vital successes" in that regard and some "important" accused had been arrested.

He said foreign hands might be involved in the suicide attack on Turrabi. He said that the security agencies had detected a network, which was planning to carry out terrorist attacks after the assassination of Allama Hassan Turrabi in the city and made arrests in this connection. Despite limited resources, PCG was playing great role to combat anti-state activities including smuggling of drugs and arms and illegal immigration, he said.

He also praised PCG's relief activities in earthquake-hit areas. He said the government was well aware of the problems of civil armed forces and trying to resolve them. He said the ministry had issued directives for financial support of those who had lost their lives or sustained injuries while performing their duty.

The minister said the PCG was acknowledged in the country as an important and appreciative force, which had been assigned with the basic objective of surveillance at the coasts and counter the anti-state elements. He noted that despite limited resources and odd conditions, its officers and jawans had carried out vigorous action against anti-state elements and frustrated their nefarious designs.

He announced the government would construct a proper training area and a sports complex for PCG. He also announced that 500 more soldiers would be recruited in the current year to strengthen PCG. "We have received funds for the recruitment of 100 personnel," he said. The arrest of over 900 involved in human trafficking spoke of the high standard performance of this force, the Interior Minister said.

Later, Interior Minister Sherpao inaugurated the construction work of parade ground and family quarters for the PCG staff. He informed that Rs 30 million have been sanctioned for construction of family quarters while Rs 3 million arranged out of total Rs 8.7 million for cementing of parade ground. On the occasion, the minister announced that in the training wing, a proper training area and a grand sports complex would be constructed.

The award winning recruits included Zakaullah Nadeem, Mohammed Azad, Tahir Manzoor, Amir Hussain, Sayar Mohammed, Mohammed Ikram and Shah Nawaz while Tipu Company was declared the champion company of the year. Earlier, in his welcome address, Director General PCG Brigadier Firzooq Attaullah gave details of one-year performance of the force and said the PCG had recovered 8,518 kg narcotics, 26,512 bottles of liquor and a huge quantity of illegal arms besides arresting 30 accused involved in these activities.

He said the PCG also seized five boats, 20 vehicles and 34 camels used in smuggling of drugs and illegal arms. He said the PCG was also taking strong steps to control human trafficking and had arrested 1,108 illegal immigrants from Pak-Iran and other boarders adding that out of them 46 per cent were foreigners involved in this activity.

LOAD-DATE: December 6, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Acts of Terror; Domestic Politics

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2006 The Nation
All Rights Reserved

330 of 445 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

August 3, 2006 Thursday

Taiwan unveils measures to improve treatment of foreign workers

LENGTH: 371 words

Text of report by Sofia Wu, carried in English by Taiwanese Central News Agency website

Taipei, 3 August: The Council of Labour Affairs (CLA) unveiled an explanatory note Thursday [3 August] explaining its determination, stance and strategies to improve treatment of foreign contract workers.

The note will be referred to the United States and major migrant labourer-exporting countries via the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to seek their understanding of Taiwan's efforts to rein in human trafficking and improve management and care of foreign contract workers.

The explanatory paper is a response to a damning US State Department report issued in early June that placed Taiwan on a "Tier 2 Watch List" for allegedly not fully complying with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking and forced labour and sexual exploitation of migrant workers.

According to the CLA note, a government review system will be installed to better protect migrant workers. Under the new system, local governments will be authorized to verify the legality of early annulment of contracts between employers and migrant workers and to ensure the annulment is not disputed.

The CLA's Bureau of Employment and Vocational Training said that the proposed review system will be easy to implement and free of red tape. Three days before the repatriation of the migrant worker after the invalidation of his or her contract, city or county government social workers will interview the migrant worker first by phone to see if there is any labour-management dispute or whether the migrant worker is being forced to return home. If there is any suspicion, the social worker will visit the foreign worker in person. If any labour-management dispute is found, the employer will not be allowed to recruit a new migrant worker to fill the job vacancy.

In its explanatory paper, the CLA also said it will revise the law regarding manpower brokering fee collection standards and forge a "reward" system to screen out bad or poorly managed manpower agencies. Moreover, the CLA said it will step up random checks on the management of foreign workers and their general living conditions.

Source: Central News Agency website, Taipei, in English 1447 gmt 3 Aug 06

LOAD-DATE: August 4, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

331 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

August 3, 2006 Thursday 10:37 PM TST

CLA UNVEILS MEASURES TO IMPROVE TREATMENT OF MIGRANT WORKERS

BYLINE: Sofia Wu

LENGTH: 339 words

DATELINE: Taipei, Aug. 3

The Council of Labor Affairs (CLA) unveiled an explanatory note Thursday explaining its determination, stance and strategies to improve treatment of foreign contract workers.

The note will be referred to the United States and major migrant laborer-exporting countries via the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to seek their understanding of Taiwan's efforts to rein in human trafficking and improve management and care of foreign contract workers.

The explanatory paper is a response to a damning U.S. State Department report issued in early June that placed Taiwan on a "Tier 2 Watch List" for allegedly not fully complying with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking and forced labor and sexual exploitation of migrant workers.

According to the CLA note, a government review system will be installed to better protect migrant workers. Under the new system, local governments will be authorized to verify the legality of early annulment of contracts between employers and migrant workers and to ensure the annulment is not disputed.

The CLA's Bureau of Employment and Vocational Training said that the proposed review system will be easy to implement and free of red tape. Three days before the repatriation of the migrant worker after the invalidation of his or her contract, city or county government social workers will interview the migrant worker first by phone to see if there is any labor-management dispute or whether the migrant worker is being forced to return home. If there is any suspicion, the social worker will visit the foreign worker in person. If any labor-management dispute is found, the employer will not be allowed to recruit a new migrant worker to fill the job vacancy.

In its explanatory paper, the CLA also said it will revise the law regarding manpower brokering fee collection standards and forge a "reward" system to screen out bad or poorly managed manpower agencies. Moreover, the CLA said it will step up random checks on the management of foreign workers and their general living conditions.

LOAD-DATE: August 3, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

332 of 445 DOCUMENTS

International Enforcement Law Reporter

August 2006

U.S. Releases Sixth Annual Human Trafficking Report, Targeted Countries Dispute Findings

A. U.S. Releases Sixth Annual Human Trafficking Report, Targeted Countries Dispute Findings

BYLINE: Jed Borod n1

n1 Jed Borod is the Assistant Editor of the International Enforcement Law Reporter. He holds a degree in International Studies from Johns Hopkins University.

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL HUMAN RIGHTS VIII. INTERNATIONAL HUMAN RIGHTS; Vol. 22, No. 8

LENGTH: 1051 words

On June 5, 2006, the U.S. Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons released the 2006 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report. This year's report notes general international progress against human trafficking, but cautions that some countries praised in the 2005 report have lost ground. The report also singles out a number of Western hemisphere countries Cuba, Venezuela, and Belize as particularly deficient, prompting criticism of the perceived politicization of the report.

Speaking at a press conference announcing the 2006 report, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called human trafficking a modern form of slavery and noted that its harsh reality stuns even the hardest of hearts. n2 n2 Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Remarks at the Release of the Sixth Annual Trafficking in Persons Report (June 5, 2006) (transcript available online at <http://www.state.gov/secretary/rm/2006/67551.htm>).

Ambassador John Miller, Director of the Office for Monitoring and Combating Trafficking in Persons, echoed Rice's remarks, saying that while this year we look at some more general indicators, we see the start I say the start of progress, he was concerned that a number of countries have fallen to lower categories in 2006. n3 n3 Briefing by Ambassador John R. Miller, Ambassador at Large for International Slavery, on Release of the Sixth Annual Trafficking in Persons Report (June 5, 2006) (transcript available online at <http://www.state.gov/r/pa/prs/ps/2006/67559.htm>).

As part of the 2000 Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA), the U.S. Department of State releases a Trafficking in Persons Report each year. n4 n4 In January 2006, President Bush signed a related piece of legislation, the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act (TVPRA), into law. The TVPRA includes additional funds targeting prostitution and sexual exploitation.

This year's report estimates that between 600,000 and 800,000 people were victims of trafficking during the reporting period, reflecting little change from the 2005 report. n5 n5 Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, U.S. Department of State, Trafficking in Persons Report June 2006 (2006) 6. This figure remains controversial among non-governmental organizations that study human trafficking; for more information, see Jed Borod, U.S. Releases Fifth Annual Human Trafficking Report, Criticizes Persian Gulf Allies, 21 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 337 (August 2005).

Of this number, 80 percent are female, and up to half are minors. n6

n6 Id.

The 2006 report also makes reference to people trafficked for forced labor within their borders, citing a U.N. estimate that 12.3 million people are engaged in forced labor, bonded labor, forced child labor, and sexual servitude at any given time. n7

n7 Id.

With respect to the financial impact of trafficking, the 2006 report estimates that trafficking generates $9.5 billion annually for transnational organized crime groups. n8

n8 TIP Report, 13.

Continuing the rankings metric established by the TVPA, the 2006 report uses a three tier system. Countries that follow the TVPA protocol to eliminate trafficking are placed on Tier 1; countries that take some anti trafficking action but fail to meet the minimum TVPA protocol are placed on Tier 2; and countries that fail to meet the minimum protocol and do not make any substantive anti trafficking efforts are placed on Tier 3.

The 2006 TIP Report designates 12 Tier 3 countries: Belize, Burma, Cuba, Iran, Laos, North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan, Venezuela, and Zimbabwe. n9

n9 TIP Report, 46.

Conversely, a group of countries including Australia, Bangladesh, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Columbia, and Ecuador are noted for anti-trafficking best practices. n10

n10 TIP Report, 34.

This year s report has faced criticism from diplomats, foreign governments, and NGOs. Governments ranging from the Bahamas to Saudi Arabia have challenged the report, while some critics have suggested that the Tier 3 rankings are politically motivated. n11 n11 For example, see Quincy Parker, Immigration Officials Call Human Trafficking Report Exaggerated, The Bahama Journal, June 19, 2006.

On the second point, for example, the Government of Belize has asserted that the U.S. report arbitrarily uses a one-to-three rating system ? that can have negative economic and political consequences and suggested that Belize s ranking is tied to its support of Cuba and Venezuela. n12 n12 Rickey Singh, U.S. report upsets Belize PM, The Nation (Barbados), June 16, 2006.

Questioning U.S. legitimacy on human rights issues, Belizean Prime Minister Said Musa angrily stated that those who seek to judge us should perhaps examine their own decadent societies before they come and pass judgment on us. n13

n13 Id.

Conversely, some NGOs and advocacy groups believe the 2006 report does not go far enough. One media report notes that strategically important nations including India, Mexico, Russia, and China, escaped the roll call despite evidence in the report of growing problems. n14 n14 Cam Simpson, U.S. taxpayers financed human trafficking, report says, Chicago Tribune, June 5, 2006.

U.S. advocacy groups have also suggested that Germany be downgraded from Tier 1 due to sexual trafficking concerns surrounding the 2006 World Cup tournament. Interestingly, one page of the 2006 report is devoted to the U.S. Department of Defense s (DOD) response to allegations of human trafficking by DOD subcontractors in Iraq. The report, which lauds the DOD s action against subcontractors trafficking laborers from South Asia, suggests some U.S. sensitivity to international criticism on this issue. n15

n15 TIP Report, 19.

Although political considerations undoubtedly factor into its tier rankings, the 2006 TIP Report remains a valuable tool for government officials and practitioners involved in the fight against human trafficking and transnational organized crime. The overall trend of the report appears to be positive, and the best practices offer concrete examples of solutions that governments can implement with respect to their own trafficking issues.

LOAD-DATE: August 9, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2006 International Enforcement Law Reporter

333 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Hindustan Times

July 31, 2006 Monday 9:56 AM EST

Government gets tough on immoral trafficking

BYLINE: Report from the Asian News International brought to you by the Hindustan Times

LENGTH: 331 words

DATELINE: New Delhi

New Delhi, July 31 -- Taking a tough stance on immoral trafficking, the Centre has decided to amend the Immoral Traffic Prevention Act, 1956 to make it more stringent for traffickers and brothel keepers to prevent trafficking and sale of girls for sexual exploitation.

Informing the Rajya Sabha about this, Minister of State for Women and Child Development Renuka Chowdhury further said the government has also drawn up Plan of Action to combat trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation of women and children.

"The Plan of Action consists of action points such as Prevention of Trafficking and Awareness Generation etc. The State Governments have been requested to implement the Plan," Chowdhury said.

According to official sources, following the amendments, Sections 8 and 20 of the existing law may not feature anymore in it. Section 8 provides for punishment for those seducing or soliciting for the purpose of prostitution while Section 20 relates to removal of a commercial sex worker from any place.

However, experts feel that the proposed amendments, which are aimed more at avoiding sanctions by the US than combating human trafficking, may have some serious impact on the livelihoods of about 10.5 million commercial sex workers in the country.

The Centre's decision to amend the law had come in the wake of a decision by the US State Department to include India among 33 countries in a tier II watch list for evaluating the efforts made by these countries to curb human trafficking.

In an interim report released in February, the U.S. State Department had warned that sanctions might be imposed on India if it slips to tier III status as only 'limited progress' was made by the country in curbing trafficking.

Earlier, the Central Social Welfare Board had listed Karnataka, Andhra Pradesh, Maharashtra, Tamil Nadu and Uttar Pradesh as the high-supply zones of women in prostitution.

Published by HT Media Ltd. with permission from Asian News International.

LOAD-DATE: August 7, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

334 of 445 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Middle East - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

July 30, 2006 Sunday

Israel, US discuss combating "labour, sex trafficking"

LENGTH: 479 words

Text of report by Ruth Eglash headlined "Government, NGOs still find time to fight against human trafficking", carried in English by Israeli newspaper The Jerusalem Post website on 30 July

Despite the current war on the home front, government officials and representatives of the US Embassy and the US State Department took time out of their busy schedules last week to discuss practical recommendations for how to address sex trafficking and labour trafficking in the country.

Those present at the convention included US Ambassador to Israel Richard Jones, Senior Coordinator for International Programmes at the US State Department Dr Jane Nady Sigmon, Israel's newly-appointed Inter-office liaison on trafficking in persons Rochelle Gershuni, MK Zehava Galon, MK Gideon Sa'ar, head of the Jewish law department at the Justice Ministry Dr Michael Vigoda and members of several non-government organizations.

Following opening speeches, participants broke into working groups to make recommendations on what the country should be doing in the fields of protection prevention and prosecution.

Among the challenges identified was the lack of accurate cross-border information available to government and NGOs, which has been worsened by the situation in Lebanon and Gaza. The estimates about the scope of the problem vary wildly. In labour trafficking, NGOs estimate that there are more than 15,000 victims in the country, while government officers say there are only isolated incidences. In the area of sex trafficking, NGOs say there are thousands of victims, while the government claims only hundreds.

"The real problem is the lack of intelligence," commented Yedida Wolf, Co-Director of the Task Force on Human Trafficking (TFHT), a project of the non-profit organization ATZUM and law firm Kabir-Nevo-Keidar.

"In order to comprehend the scope of the problem, the government will have to invest resources in gathering intelligence and initiating investigations. Only then can we know what we are dealing with and how best to address it," Wolf said.

She added that some of the suggestions made at the symposium - such as the eventual creation of a national agency to combat trafficking in persons and mandatory restitution payments to victims in the context of criminal proceedings - were very promising for the future.

"It is important to recognize that this problem is not unique to Israel," Wolf continued. "Human trafficking is a scourge in every country in the world. Indeed, in the region, Israel is one of the more progressive actors in combating this phenomenon, but more can and must be done."

In April, Israel was labelled as a top destination country for human trafficking in a UN report and in June, the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report placed Israel in the Tier Two (watch list) category.

Source: The Jerusalem Post website, Jerusalem, in English 30 Jul 06

LOAD-DATE: July 30, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2006 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

335 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Jerusalem Post

July 30, 2006, Sunday

Gov't NGOs still find time to fight against human trafficking

BYLINE: Ruth Eglash

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 4

LENGTH: 440 words

Despite the current war on the home front government officials and representatives of the US Embassy and the US State Department took time out of their busy schedules last week to discuss practical recommendations for how to address sex trafficking and labor trafficking in the country.

Those present at the convention included US Ambassador to Israel Richard Jones Senior Coordinator for International Programs at the US State Department Dr. Jane Nady Sigmon Israel's newly-appointed Inter-office liaison on trafficking in persons Rochelle Gershuni MK Zehava Galon MK Gideon Sa'ar head of the Jewish law department at the Justice Ministry Dr. Michael Vigoda and members of several non-government organizations.

Following opening speeches participants broke into working groups to make recommendations on what the country should be doing in the fields of protection prevention and prosecution.

Among the challenges identified was the lack of accurate cross-border information available to government and NGOs which has been worsened by the situation in Lebanon and Gaza. The estimates about the scope of the problem vary wildly. In labor trafficking NGOs estimate that there are more than 15 0 victims in the country while government officers say there are only isolated incidences. In the area of sex trafficking NGOs say there are thousands of victims while the government claims only hundreds.

"The real problem is the lack of intelligence commented Yedida Wolf Co-Director of the Task Force on Human Trafficking (TFHT) a project of the non-profit organization ATZUM and law firm Kabir-Nevo-Keidar.

In order to comprehend the scope of the problem the government will have to invest resources in gathering intelligence and initiating investigations. Only then can we know what we are dealing with and how best to address it Wolf said.

She added that some of the suggestions made at the symposium - such as the eventual creation of a national agency to combat trafficking in persons and mandatory restitution payments to victims in the context of criminal proceedings - were very promising for the future.

It is important to recognize that this problem is not unique to Israel Wolf continued. Human trafficking is a scourge in every country in the world. Indeed in the region Israel is one of the more progressive actors in combating this phenomenon but more can and must be done."

In April Israel was labeled as a top destination country for human trafficking in a UN report and in June the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report placed Israel in the Tier Two (watch list) category.

LOAD-DATE: January 10, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

336 of 445 DOCUMENTS

GAO Reports

July 18, 2006

RPT-NUMBER: GAO-06-825

BETTER DATA, STRATEGY, AND REPORTING NEEDED TO ENHANCE U.S. ANTITRAFFICKING EFFORTS ABROAD

SECTION: GAO REPORT

LENGTH: 14193 words

GAO-06-825

Human Trafficking: Better Data, Strategy, and Reporting Needed to Enhance U.S. Antitrafficking Efforts Abroad July 18, 2006 Statement of Thomas Melito, Director International Affairs and Trade

The Honorable Jim Sensenbrenner, Jr. Chairman Committee on the Judiciary House of Representatives

The Honorable Henry J. Hyde Chairman Committee on International Relations House of Representatives

Human trafficking is a worldwide form of exploitation in which men, women, and children are bought, sold, and held against their will in slave-like conditions. People are trafficked and forced to work in the commercial sex trade, sweatshops, agricultural settings, domestic service, and other types of servitude. In addition to the tremendous personal damage suffered by individual trafficking victims, this global crime has broad societal repercussions. It fuels criminal networks, imposes public health costs, and erodes government authority. Since the mid-1990s, the United States has played a leading role in putting human trafficking on the international community's agenda. In 2000, Congress enacted the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) to combat trafficking in persons and established the President's Interagency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons (Interagency Task Force). Congress reauthorized this Act in the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2003 (TVPA 2003) and the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2005 (TVPA 2005). This legislation requires the Secretary of State to report to Congress annually on foreign governments' compliance with minimum U.S. standards for the elimination of trafficking. Since 2001, the U.S. government has provided about $375 million¹ in antitrafficking assistance to foreign governments and nongovernmental organizations to help eliminate human trafficking.

This review is part of a larger body of work that you requested.² To review the status of U.S. international efforts to combat trafficking in persons, we examined (1) estimates of the extent of global trafficking in persons, (2) the U.S. government's strategy for combating trafficking in persons abroad, and (3) the Department of State's (State) process for evaluating foreign governments' antitrafficking efforts.

To address these objectives, we reviewed pertinent State, Justice, Labor, Homeland Security, Health and Human Services, and U.S. Agency for International Development planning, funding, and program documents for international human trafficking. We discussed U.S. international trafficking efforts with officials from these departments, along with knowledgeable officials from international and nongovernmental organizations. We conducted an extensive analysis of the global trafficking databases developed and maintained by the U.S. government, the International Organization for Migration, the International Labor Organization, and the U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC).³ We also analyzed the country narratives in State's 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report to determine how it assesses compliance with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, as laid out in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000. We conducted our review from September 2005 to May 2006 in accordance with generally accepted government auditing standards.

Results in Brief

The U.S. government estimates that 600,000 to 800,000 persons are trafficked across international borders annually; however such estimates of global human trafficking are questionable. The accuracy of the estimates is in doubt because of methodological weaknesses, gaps in data, and numerical discrepancies. For example, the U.S. government's estimate was developed by one person who did not document all of his work, so the estimate may not be replicable, casting doubt on its reliability. Moreover, the quality of existing country level data varies due to limited availability, reliability, and comparability. There is also a considerable discrepancy between the numbers of observed and estimated victims of human trafficking. The U.S. government has not yet established an effective mechanism for estimating the number of victims or for conducting ongoing analysis of trafficking related data that resides within various government agencies.

More than 5 years after the passage of the landmark antitrafficking law, the U.S. government has not developed a coordinated strategy to combat trafficking in persons abroad, as called for in a presidential directive, or evaluated its programs to determine whether projects are achieving the desired outcomes. Task forces and other coordinating mechanisms have been established to coordinate U.S. government efforts abroad; the focus of these mechanisms is to avoid duplication of effort and ensure compliance with U.S. government policy. However, the process does not include a systematic approach for agencies to clearly delineate roles and responsibilities in relation to each other, identify needs, and target ways to complement each others' activities to achieve greater results. In addition, the Interagency Task Force has not established performance measures or conducted evaluations to measure the impact of the U.S. government's antitrafficking programs abroad. The lack of a coordinated strategy and evaluation plan prevents the U.S. government from determining the effectiveness of its efforts to combat human trafficking abroad or to adjust its assistance to better meet needs.

The Department of State annually assesses foreign governments' compliance with U.S. minimum standards to eliminate trafficking in persons, but State's explanations for its ranking decisions are incomplete, and the report is not used consistently to develop governmentwide antitrafficking programs. Each year since 2001, State has issued the Trafficking in Persons Report that ranks foreign governments into one of three categories, or tiers, depending on their efforts to comply with the minimum standards and criteria established in U.S. legislation. This report has increased global awareness of human trafficking, encouraged action by governments who failed to comply with the minimum standards, and raised the risk of sanctions against governments who did not make significant efforts to comply with these standards. However, some of the minimum standards are subjective, and the report does not comprehensively explain how they were applied, lessening the report's credibility and hampering its usefulness as a diplomatic tool. For example, country narratives for most countries in the top category (tier 1) failed to clearly explain compliance with the second minimum standard, regarding prescribed penalties for sex trafficking crimes, established in the TVPA. The report is also intended to serve as a guide to antitrafficking programming priorities overseas, but agencies do not systematically link programs with reported deficiencies.

To improve U.S. efforts to combat human trafficking abroad, we are making several recommendations. To improve information on global trafficking that could be used to effectively target resources and programs, we are recommending that the Chair of the President's Interagency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons work closely with relevant agencies in researching a mechanism to develop a reliable global trafficking estimate.

We are also recommending that the Chair develop and implement a strategy that would delineate agency roles and responsibilities and mechanisms for integrating activities; and determine priorities, measurable goals, time frames, performance measures, and a methodology to gauge results. Finally, to improve the credibility of State's annual report on trafficking in persons, we are recommending that the Secretary of State clearly document the rationale and support for tier rankings and improve the report's usefulness for antitrafficking programming.

In commenting on a draft of this report, State generally agreed with our recommendations. In response to agencies' technical comments, we clarified our second recommendation to state that agencies' roles and responsibilities should be delineated in relation to each other, consistent with our report findings. The U.S. government agency that prepares the trafficking estimate fundamentally concurs with our characterization of the U.S. global estimate of trafficking flows.

Background

Human trafficking occurs worldwide and often involves transnational criminal organizations, violations of labor and immigration codes, and government corruption. Although their circumstances vary, fraud, force, or coercion typically distinguishes trafficking victims from people who are smuggled. Moreover, most trafficking cases follow the same pattern: people are abducted or recruited in the country of origin, transferred through transit regions, and then exploited in the destination country.⁴

People may also be trafficked internally, that is, within the borders of their own country.

Trafficking victims include agricultural workers who are brought into the United States, held in crowded unsanitary conditions, threatened with violence if they attempt to leave, and kept under constant surveillance; child camel jockeys in Dubai who are starved to keep their weight down; Indonesian women who may be drawn to a domestic service job in another country, are not paid for their work and are without the resources to return home; child victims of commercial sexual exploitation in Thailand; and child soldiers in Uganda.

During the 1990s, the U.S. government began drawing attention to the problem of human trafficking before various international forums and gatherings. In 1998, a presidential memorandum⁵ called on U.S. government agencies to combat the problem through prevention of trafficking, victim assistance and protection, and enforcement. This approach came to be known as "the three p's" - prevention, protection, and prosecution.

In 2000, Congress enacted TVPA⁶ and reauthorized and amended the act twice.⁷ The act defines victims of severe forms of trafficking as those persons subject to (1) sex trafficking in which a commercial sex act is induced by force, fraud, or coercion, or in which the person induced to perform such acts is under age 18 or (2) the recruitment, harboring, transportation, provision, or obtaining of a person for labor or services, through the use of force, fraud, or coercion, for the purpose of subjection to involuntary servitude, peonage, debt bondage, or slavery. The TVPA does not specify movement across international boundaries as a condition of trafficking; it does not require the transportation of victims from one locale to another. Under the TVPA, an alien, who is identified as a victim of a severe form of trafficking in the United States and meets additional conditions, is eligible for special benefits and services.

The TVPA, as amended, provides a framework for current U.S. antitrafficking efforts. It addresses the prevention of trafficking, protection and assistance for victims of trafficking, and the prosecution and punishment of traffickers. The TVPA also laid out minimum standards for eliminating trafficking to be used in the Secretary of State's annual assessment of foreign governments' antitrafficking efforts. It authorized U.S. foreign assistance for efforts designed to meet these standards and established sanctions--withholding nonhumanitarian, nontrade-related assistance--that could be applied against governments of countries not in compliance with the standards and not making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance.⁸

Responsibility for implementing U.S. government antitrafficking efforts domestically and abroad is shared by the Departments of State, Justice, Labor, Health and Human Services (HHS), Homeland Security (DHS), and the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID). Each agency addresses one or more of the three prongs of the U.S. antitrafficking approach. Some agencies have more responsibility for implementing international trafficking efforts than others. Figure 1 shows agencies and task forces with responsibilities for antitrafficking efforts.

The government has also created several coordinating mechanisms for these antitrafficking efforts, as shown in figure 1. The TVPA directed the President to establish the Interagency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, comprised of various agency heads and chaired by the Secretary of State, to coordinate the implementation of the act, among other activities. Furthermore, the TVPA authorized the Secretary of State to create the Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons (Trafficking Office) to provide assistance to the task force.

Subsequently, TVPA 2003 established the Senior Policy Operating Group, which addresses interagency policy, program, and planning issues regarding TVPA implementation. The TVPA 2003 directed the Director of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons to serve as chair of the group. In addition, the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act of 2004,⁹ passed in December 2004, established the Human Smuggling and Trafficking Center to be jointly run by the Departments of State, Justice and DHS. This center houses several agency data systems to collect and disseminate information to build a comprehensive picture of certain transnational issues, including, among other things, human trafficking.

Since 2001, the U.S. government has obligated approximately $375 million for international projects to combat trafficking in persons. For example, in fiscal year 2005, the U.S. government supported more than 265 international antitrafficking programs in about 100 countries. State, Labor, and USAID are the three largest providers of international assistance to target trafficking (see table 1).

During an address to the U.N. General Assembly in September 2003, the President declared trafficking in persons a humanitarian crisis and announced that the U.S. government was committing $50 million to support organizations active in combating sex trafficking, sex tourism, and the rescue of women and children. In 2004, eight priority countries for the initiative were identified--Brazil, Cambodia, India, Indonesia, Mexico, Moldova, Sierra Leone, and Tanzania. The initiative was centered on developing the capacity of each country to rescue women and children, to provide emer-agency shelters, medical treatment, rehabilitation services, vocational training, and reintegration services, and to conduct law enforcement investigations and prosecutions.

Estimates of Global Human Trafficking Are Questionable, and U.S. Data Collection Efforts Are Fragmented

Existing estimates of the scale of trafficking at the global level are questionable, and improvements in data collection have not yet been implemented. The accuracy of the estimates is in doubt because of methodological weaknesses, gaps in data and numerical discrepancies. For example, the U.S. government's estimate was developed by one person who did not document all of his work, so the estimate may not be replicable, casting doubt on its reliability. Moreover, country data are generally not available, reliable or comparable. There is also a considerable discrepancy between the numbers of observed and estimated victims of human trafficking. The U.S. government has not yet established an effective mechanism for estimating the number of victims or for conducting ongoing analysis of trafficking related data that resides within various government agencies. While trafficking data collection in the United States is fragmented, the database created by the International Organization for Migration (IOM) provides a useful systematic profile of victims and traffickers across countries.

Accuracy of Estimates in Doubt Because of Methodological Weaknesses, Gaps in Data, and Numerical Discrepancies

The U.S. government and three international organizations gather data on human trafficking, but methodological weaknesses affect the accuracy of their information. Efforts to develop accurate trafficking estimates are further frustrated by the lack of country level data. Finally, there is a considerable discrepancy between the numbers of observed and estimated victims of human trafficking.

Methodological Weaknesses Cast Doubt on U.S. and International Estimates

The U.S. government and three international organizations have gathered data on global human trafficking. However, these organizations face methodological weaknesses and institutional constraints that cast doubt on the accuracy of the collected data.

The four organizations with databases on global trafficking in persons are the U.S. government, International Labor Organization (ILO), IOM,¹⁰ and UNODC. The U.S. government and ILO estimate the number of victims worldwide, IOM collects data on victims it assists in the countries where it has a presence, and UNODC traces the major international trafficking routes of the victims. The databases provide information on different aspects of human trafficking since each organization analyzes the problem based on its own mandate. For example, IOM looks at trafficking from a migration and rights point of view¹¹ and ILO from the point of view of forced labor.

Despite the fact that the databases use different methodologies for data collection and analysis and have various limitations, some common themes emerge. For example, the largest percentage of estimated victims is trafficked for sexual exploitation. In addition, women constitute the majority of estimated victims. However, the estimated percentage of victims that are children ranges from 13 to 50 percent. Table 2 describes the victim profiles that emerge from the data.

U.S. Data Methodological weaknesses and limitations cast doubt on the U.S. estimate of global trafficking flows. We identified several important limitations:

-- Estimate not entirely replicable. The U.S. government agency that prepares the trafficking estimate is part of the intelligence community, which makes its estimation methodology opaque and inaccessible.

During a trafficking workshop in November 2005, the government agency provided a one-page overview of its methodology, which allowed for only a very limited peer review by the workshop participants. In addition, the U.S. government's methodology involves interpreting, classifying, and analyzing data, which was performed by one person who did not document all of his work. Thus the estimate may not be replicable, which raises doubts about its reliability.

-- Estimate based on unreliable estimates of others. The biggest methodological challenge in calculating an accurate number of global trafficking victims is how to transition from reported to unreported victims. The U.S. government does not directly estimate the number of unreported victims but relies on the estimates of others, adjusting them through a complex statistical process. It essentially averages the various aggregate estimates of reported and unreported trafficking victims published by NGOs, governments, and international organizations, estimates that themselves are not reliable or comparable due to different definitions, methodologies, data sources, and data validation procedures. Moreover, the methodologies used to develop these estimates are generally not published and available for professional scrutiny.¹²

-- Internal trafficking data not included. The U.S. government does not collect data on internal trafficking, which could be a significant problem in countries such as India, where forced labor is reportedly widespread.

According to the 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report, many nations may be overlooking internal trafficking or forms of labor trafficking in their national legislations. In particular, what is often absent is involuntary servitude, a form of severe trafficking. The report also noted that the TVPA specifically includes involuntary servitude in the U.S. definition of severe forms of trafficking.

Nonetheless, the U.S. government estimate does not account for it, because it only collects data on offenses that cross national borders.

-- Estimate not suitable for analysis over time. The U.S. government methodology provides an estimate of trafficking flows for a 1-year period and cannot be used to analyze trafficking over time to determine whether it is increasing, decreasing, or staying the same. Therefore, the estimate cannot help in targeting resources and evaluating program effectiveness.

International Data

Methodological weaknesses also raise questions about the accuracy of trafficking information from international organizations. For example, UNODC's methodology attempts to identify global trafficking flows across international borders. It tracks and totals the number of different source institutions that have reported a country having a trafficking incident.

However, whether the trafficking incident involved 5 or 500 victims is irrelevant for UNODC's methodology. In addition, by classifying countries in five categories based on the frequency of reporting, UNODC might rank a country very high as, say, a destination country, due to the country's heightened public awareness, transparency and recognition of trafficking as a serious crime. Alternatively, ILO's methodology provides a global estimate of trafficking victims. However, it attempts to overcome the gap between reported and unreported victims using an extrapolation that is based on assumptions and observations that have not been rigorously tested and validated. Moreover, global databases are based on data sources drawn from reports from a limited number of countries or restricted geographically to specific countries. For example, IOM's data only come from countries where IOM has a presence, which are primarily countries of origin, and the organization is constrained by issues related to the confidentiality of victim assistance. Finally, although the three organizations are trying to collaborate in the area of data collection and research, they are having difficulty in mobilizing the necessary resources for their efforts. Therefore, this fragmentary approach prevents the development of a comprehensive and accurate view of global trafficking. (See app. II for additional information about the different methodologies, analytical assumptions, data validation, and data sources used by the international organizations and the U.S. government.)

Reliable and Comparable Country Data Do Not Exist

The quality of existing country level data varies due to limited availability, reliability, and comparability. Table 3 summarizes the main limitations of trafficking data, identified in our review of literature on human trafficking.

The availability of data is limited by several factors. Trafficking victims are a hidden population because trafficking is a clandestine activity, similar to illegal migration and labor exploitation.

This limits the amount of data available on victims and makes it difficult to estimate the number of unreported victims. Trafficking victims are often in a precarious position and may be unwilling or unable to report to, or seek help from, relevant authorities. Moreover, HHS reported that victims live daily with inhumane treatment, physical and mental abuse, and threats to themselves or their families back home. Victims of human trafficking may fear or distrust the government and police because they are afraid of being deported or because they come from countries where law enforcement is corrupt and feared. In such circumstances, reporting to the police or seeking help elsewhere requires courage and knowledge of local conditions, which the victims simply might not have.

In addition, some governments give low priority to human trafficking violations and do not systematically collect data on victims. In most countries where trafficking data are gathered, women and children are seen as victims of trafficking, and men are predominantly seen as migrant workers, reflecting a gender bias in existing information. Men are also perceived as victims of labor exploitation that may not be seen as a crime but rather as an issue for trade unions and labor regulators. Thus, data collection and applied research often miss the broader dimensions of trafficking for labor exploitation. For example, the demand for cheap labor, domestic service, slavery, and child labor have not been sufficiently investigated as factors affecting the scale of human trafficking.

The reliability of existing data is also questionable. In developing countries, which are usually countries of origin, capacity for data collection and analysis is often inadequate. In countries of destination, human trafficking convictions are often based on victim testimony. Moreover, estimates of trafficking are extrapolated from samples of reported cases, which are not random. Therefore, it is difficult to determine how representative those cases are of the general population of all human trafficking victims and what biases have been introduced.

Data quality is further constrained by limited data comparability. Countries and organizations define trafficking differently. A practice that is considered trafficking in one country may be considered culturally and historically acceptable in another country. For example, in West African countries, people, in particular children, commonly move within and across borders in search of work and are placed in homes as domestic servants or on farms and plantations as laborers. Due to economic deprivation and an abundant supply of children from poor families, a child may be sold by his or her parents based on promises for job training and good education or may be placed with a creditor as reimbursement.

The incompatibility of definitions for data collection is exacerbated by the intermingling of trafficking, smuggling, and illegal migration in official statistics. Countries have used different definitions regarding the scope and means of trafficking; the activities involved, such as recruitment, harboring, transportation and receipt of victims; the purpose; the need for movement across borders; and the consent of victims. For example, there are discrepancies in the collection of data on sex trafficking. Under the TVPA, participation of children under the age of 18 in commercial sex is a severe form of trafficking. However, some countries define children as people under the age of 16 and, according to U.S. government officials, this difference has implications for how countries collect data on children engaged in commercial sex.

Finally, data are often program and institution specific and focus on the needs of individual agencies. Estimates may be developed for the purpose of advocacy. For example, some NGOs record all victims based on the first contact made with them regardless of whether they subsequently meet the criteria for receiving assistance such as legal counsel, shelter, financial support, or support during a trial, while others record only those who receive assistance. Data are also collected for operational purposes within criminal justice systems, and individual authorities use their own definitions and classifications.

Significant Difference Exists between Numbers of Estimated and Observed Victims

There is significant discrepancy between the number of estimated victims and the number of observed victims, which include officially reported, certified, registered and assisted victims. For example, the U.S. government estimated that the number of people trafficked into the United States ranged from 14,500 to 17,500 in 2003.¹³ Despite concerted U.S. government efforts to locate and protect victims, the government certified fewer than 900 victims in the United States during the 4 1/2 years between March 2001 and September 2005.¹⁴ The June 2006 Attorney General's Annual Report to Congress on U.S. Government Activities to Combat Trafficking in Persons for Fiscal Year 2005 indicates that the 14,500 to 17,500 figure may be overstated because it was an early attempt to quantify a hidden problem. The number of certified victims may not reflect the total number of victims identified. For example, some alien victims need not seek certification because they can remain in the United States through family connections. The Justice Department indicates that further research is under way to determine a more accurate figure based on more advanced methodologies and a more complete understanding of the nature of trafficking. Similarly, the U.S. government estimated that a total of 600,000 to 800,000 people were trafficked across transnational borders worldwide annually. Yet, since 1999, fewer than 8,000 victims in 26 countries have received IOM assistance.

Organizations may also publish estimates that incorrectly characterize the data reported by others. For example,¹⁵ in a 2001 report a Cambodian nongovernmental organization states that there were 80,000 to 100,000 trafficked women and children nationwide. However, this statement is based on a report which discusses 80,000 to 100,000 sex workers in the country, who may or may not be trafficking victims. Moreover, the latter report uses two other sources that did not corroborate this estimate. Several factors could explain the differences between the numbers of observed and estimated victims, but it is unclear the extent to which any single factor accounts for the differences. For example, the 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report cited cases in which victims reported by law enforcement were deported before they reached an assistance agency. In addition, agencies may not make sufficient efforts in identifying and helping victims or may have constraints imposed by certain assistance requirements. Victims assisted by IOM missions are those willing to go back to their country of origin. However, if there are other opportunities available in the country of destination, such as receiving a residence permit, victims may not be willing to accept IOM assistance. In the United States, one requirement of receiving official certification is that victims of human trafficking must be willing to assist with the investigation and prosecution of trafficking cases. According to an HHS official, this requirement may work to limit the number of recorded victims. Given the weaknesses in data and methods, it also cannot be dismissed that the estimates may overstate the magnitude of human trafficking.

Trafficking Data Collection in the United States Is Fragmented While IOM's Is Systematic

The U.S. government has not yet established an effective mechanism for estimating the number of victims or for conducting ongoing analysis of trafficking related data that resides within various government agencies.

The TVPA 2005, passed in January 2006, called on the President, through various agencies, to conduct research into the development of an effective mechanism for quantifying the number of victims of trafficking on a national, regional, and international basis. Since 2005, the U.S. government has funded a project to develop a transparent methodology for estimating the number of men, women, and children trafficked into the United States for purposes of sex or labor trafficking. To date, the modeling has been limited to 10 countries of origin--Colombia, Venezuela, Ecuador, Peru, El Salvador, Guatemala, Nicaragua, Mexico, Haiti, and Cuba--and one arrival point in the United States--the southwest border. The firm developing this methodology is in the early stages of this effort and plans to continue to refine and test its methodology. Thus, it is too early to assess this methodology. The U.S. government also recently funded an outside contractor to improve future global trafficking estimates. To date, the U.S. government has funded few projects to improve estimates of trafficking on a regional or international basis.

In addition, the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act of 2004 established the Human Smuggling and Trafficking Center¹⁶ to serve, among other responsibilities, as a clearinghouse for all relevant information and to convert it into tactical, operational, and strategic intelligence to combat trafficking in persons. The Human Smuggling and Trafficking Center collects trafficking information from U.S. government agencies and sends this information to other agencies that have an interest in it for law enforcement purposes. Center officials stated that they receive and collate trafficking information from federal government agencies. However, officials stated that they do not systematically analyze the trafficking information they receive and lack the human and financial resources to do so. In addition, we identified eight entities within the federal government that possess some information related to domestic and international trafficking. The Justice Department alone has four different offices that possess domestic trafficking information. None of the federal agencies systematically shares their international data with the others, and no agency analyzes the existing data to help inform international program and resource allocation decisions. (See app. III for information on the type of trafficking data available within agencies.)

Furthermore, based upon our analysis of agency data sets, we found that federal agencies do not have data collection programs that could share information or include common data fields. As a result, it is difficult to use existing agency trafficking data to compile a profile of trafficking victims. In previous work, we have reported that it is good practice for agencies to establish compatible policies, procedures, standards, and data systems to enable them to operate across agency boundaries.¹⁷ Although some information exists, agencies were unable to provide an account of the age, gender, type of exploitation suffered, and origin and destination of trafficking victims into the United States. Moreover, some agencies with law enforcement missions were generally unwilling to share demographic trafficking data with us and would release statistics for law enforcement purposes only. The U.S. National Central Bureau was able to extract limited profile information from its case management system.

While the information on trafficking victims collected by U.S. agencies is fragmented, the database created by IOM allows for the development of a useful, in-depth profile of traffickers and their victims across 26 countries.

Although IOM's data are limited to countries where IOM provides direct assistance to trafficking victims, has a short history of about 7 years, and may not be easily generalizable, it is the only one of the four databases that contains data directly obtained from victims. Drawing from more than 7,000 cases, it includes information about the victims' socio-economic profile, movement, exploitation, abuse, and duration of trafficking.

Moreover, the database tracks victims from the time they first requested IOM assistance, through their receipt of assistance, to their subsequent return home. Importantly, it also tracks whether victims were subsequently re-trafficked. These factors provide information that could assist U.S. efforts to compile better data on trafficking victims.

As shown in figure 2, the victims IOM assisted often were enticed by traffickers' promise of a job, most believed they would be working in various legitimate professions, and were subjected to physical violence.

In addition, based on cases with available data on the duration of the trafficking episode, the average duration of stay in the destination country before seeking help from IOM is more than 2 years. Most of the sexual exploitation victims worked 7 days a week and retained a small fraction of their earnings. Moreover, about 54 percent of the victims paid a debt to the recruiter, transporter and/or other exploiters, and about 52 percent knew they were sold to other traffickers at some stage of the trafficking process.

The database also contains information about the recruiters' and traffickers' networks, nationality, and relationship to victims. It thus provides insights into the traffickers and the mechanisms traffickers used to identify and manipulate their victims. For example, in 77 percent of the cases, contact with the recruiter was initiated based on a personal relationship. Moreover, the correlation between the nationality of the recruiter and that of the victim was very high (0.92). Trafficking networks may have a complex organization, with the recruiter being only one part of the whole system. The organization may involve investors, transporters, corrupt public officials, informers, guides, debt collectors, and money launderers. The extent of information on victims and traffickers in the database improves the overall understanding of the broader dimensions of trafficking.

Lack of Strategy and Performance Measures Prevents U.S. Government from Determining Overall Program Effectiveness Abroad

While federal agencies have undertaken activities to combat trafficking in persons, the U.S. government has not developed a coordinated strategy to combat human trafficking abroad, as called for in a presidential directive.

The U.S. government has established an interagency task force and working group on human trafficking, which have focused on complying with U.S. policy on prostitution and avoiding duplication of effort, but they have not focused on developing and implementing a systematic way for agencies to clearly delineate roles and responsibilities in relation to each other, and identify targets of greatest need and leverage overseas activities to achieve greater results. In addition, governmentwide task forces have not developed measurable goals and associated indicators to evaluate the overall effectiveness of efforts to combat trafficking abroad or outlined an evaluation plan to gauge results, making the U.S. government unable to determine the effectiveness of its efforts abroad or to adjust its assistance to better meet needs.

U.S. Government Has No Overall Strategic Framework to Combat Human Trafficking Abroad

Although the U.S. government established an interagency task force and working group in 2002 to coordinate U.S. agencies' antitrafficking activities,¹⁸ as required by legislation, it has not developed a coordinated strategy to combat trafficking in persons abroad, as called for by a presidential directive.¹⁹ The directive further stated that strong coordination among agencies working on domestic and foreign policy is crucial and that departments and agencies shall coordinate U.S. foreign assistance programs to combat trafficking in persons. In addition, our previous work on issues that are national in scope and cut across agency jurisdictions has shown that a strategic framework can be useful in guiding agency resource and policy decisions.²⁰ Furthermore, our previous work has shown that lack of a coordinated strategy creates the risk of overlap and fragmentation that may result in wasting scarce funds and limiting program effectiveness.²¹ [18The working group was first established as the Senior Policy Advisory Group in 2002, according to the Department of State, and became the Senior Policy Operating Group as mandated in TVPA 2003.

Despite the presidential directive that requires the Senior Policy Operating Group (the Group) to develop a coordinated strategy to combat human trafficking, agency officials acknowledged that there is no coordinated government strategy for efforts abroad. One senior agency official stated that her agency uses the three-pronged approach of prevention, protection, and prosecution as guidance. However, officials agreed that a strategic plan could help improve understanding and coordination among agencies. In addition, of the six government agencies that conduct antitrafficking programs abroad, only two--State's Trafficking Office and USAID--provided us with strategy-type documents that specifically addressed trafficking abroad and included a majority of the characteristics that we have identified in previous work as necessary to implement a national strategy. Both agencies' documents, at least partially, address the six characteristics we identified. However, neither agency's documents clarified roles in relation to other agencies or established clear and strategic performance measures to gauge results and evaluate effectiveness.

Coordination Efforts Focused on Avoiding Duplication Abroad, Not on Leveraging Resources to Maximize Impact

As required by TVPA 2003, the U.S. government has established the Group to coordinate the activities of federal agencies regarding policies involving international human trafficking; but, although the coordination efforts have focused on compliance with U.S. policy on prostitution and avoiding duplication of effort, the efforts do not include a focus on developing and implementing a systematic way for agencies to clearly delineate roles and responsibilities in relation to each other and to identify targets of greatest need and leverage activities to achieve greater results. The presidential directive calls on agencies to work together through the Group to address coordination, sharing of information, and marshalling of law enforcement resources.

According to participating agency officials, the Group--through the work of its various subcommittees--served as a forum for agency officials to discuss trafficking policy and programs. The Group also instituted a grants funding notification system that requires agencies to notify members about each antitrafficking grant program that an agency is considering awarding.

According to the Group's guidance, agencies can offer comments on potential duplication, partnership opportunities, and whether a proposed project or grantees comply with the U.S. government policy on prostitution.²² Information provided to the Group for notification includes the name of the recipient, location, short description of the project, and the proposed amount. Members can comment on a grant, but they do not provide approval; the awarding agency makes the final decision about whether to award the grant. According to agency officials, the formal notification process takes place after the awarding agency has held its own grants panel and has chosen its final grants, making it too late for other agencies' comments to have a significant impact on the grant.

According to officials knowledgeable with the Group's actions, it has not developed or implemented a systematic way for agencies to identify priorities and target efforts abroad to complement each others' activities to achieve greater results than if the agencies were acting alone.²³ The presidential directive required agencies to submit plans to implement the provisions in the directive. Agencies submitted these plans. Our review of these plans found that, for the most part, they provide information summarizing ongoing activities, but officials from several agencies were unable to explain if, or to what extent, they used them to target resources and coordinate activities. One Trafficking Office official stated that the office never used its implementation plan; however, the official further stated that the office is in the process of updating it to make it more applicable.

The U.S. Government Does Not Have a Plan to Evaluate Its Overall Antitrafficking Efforts Abroad

Despite the mandate to evaluate progress, the Interagency Task Force has not developed a plan to evaluate overall U.S. government efforts to combat trafficking abroad. In TVPA 2000, Congress called upon the Interagency Task Force to measure and evaluate the progress of the United States and other countries in preventing trafficking, protecting and providing assistance to victims, and prosecuting traffickers. However, the Task Force has not developed an evaluation plan or established governmentwide performance measures against which the U.S. government can evaluate the overall impact of its international antitrafficking efforts.²⁴ In previous work, we have reported that monitoring and evaluating efforts can help key decision makers within agencies, as well as clients and stakeholders, identify areas for improvement.²⁵ Further, in its 2005 annual assessment of U.S. government activities to combat human trafficking, the Department of Justice recommended that the U.S. government begin measuring the impact of its antitrafficking activities. Although the project-level documentation that we reviewed from agencies, such as USAID and the Department of Labor, included measures to track activities on specific projects, officials stated that USAID's agency-level aggregate indicators are intended as a way of communicating agency outputs, not as a means of evaluating the effectiveness of programs. In addition, according to the 2005 State Department Inspector General report, State's Trafficking Office needs to better identify relevant, objective, and clear performance indicators to compare progress in combating trafficking from year to year. Officials from State's Trafficking Office recognized the need to establish mechanisms to evaluate grant effectiveness. However, officials stated that the office lacks the personnel to monitor and evaluate programs in the field and that it relies on U.S. embassy personnel to assist in project monitoring. In early 2006, the Trafficking Office adopted a monitoring and evaluation tool to assist embassy personnel in monitoring its antitrafficking programs, but it is too soon to assess its impact.

Our review of the Department of State documentation and discussions with agency officials found little evidence of the impact of various antitrafficking efforts. For example, the 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report asserts that legalized or tolerated prostitution nearly always increases the number of women and children trafficked into commercial sex slavery, but does not cite any supporting evidence. However, apart from a 2005 European Parliament sponsored study²⁶ on the link between national legislation on prostitution and the trafficking of women and children, we found few studies that comprehensively addressed this issue. In addition, the State Inspector General report noted that some embassies and academics questioned the credentials of the organizations and findings of the research that the Trafficking Office funded. The Inspector General recommended that the Trafficking Office submit research proposals and reports to a rigorous peer review to improve oversight of research efforts. In addition, according to agency officials in Washington, D.C. and in the field, there is little or no evidence to indicate the extent to which different types of efforts--such as prosecuting traffickers, abolishing prostitution, increasing viable economic opportunities, or sheltering and reintegrating victims--impact the level of trafficking or the extent to which rescued victims are being re trafficked.

Department of State's Annual Report Ranks Foreign Governments' Antitrafficking Efforts but Has Limited Credibility and Does Not Consistently Influence Antitrafficking Programs

As required by the TVPA, the Department of State issues an annual report that analyzes and ranks foreign governments' compliance with minimum standards to eliminate trafficking in persons. This report has increased global awareness about trafficking in persons, encouraged action by some governments who failed to comply with the minimum standards, and raised the threat of sanctions against governments who did not make significant efforts to comply with these standards. The Department of State includes explanations of the rankings in the report, though they are not required under the TVPA. However, the report's explanations for these ranking decisions are incomplete, and agencies do not consistently use the report to influence antitrafficking programs. Information about whether a country has a significant number of trafficking victims may be unavailable or unreliable, making the justification for some countries' inclusion in the report debatable. Moreover, in justifying the tier rankings for these countries, State does not comprehensively describe foreign governments' compliance with the standards, many of which are subjective. This lessens the report's credibility and hampers its usefulness as a diplomatic tool. In addition, incomplete country narratives reduce the report's utility as a guide to help focus U.S. government resources on antitrafficking programming priorities.

Department of State's Annual Report Assesses Foreign Governments' Efforts to Eliminate Trafficking

Each year since 2001, State has published the congressionally mandated Trafficking in Persons Report, ranking countries into a category, or tier, based on the Secretary of State's assessment of foreign governments' compliance with four minimum standards for eliminating human trafficking, as established in the TVPA. These standards reflect the U.S. government's antitrafficking strategy of prosecuting traffickers, protecting victims, and preventing trafficking. The first three standards deal with countries' efforts to prohibit severe forms of trafficking and prescribe penalties for trafficking crimes, while the fourth standard relates to government efforts to eliminate trafficking.²⁷ The TVPA instructed the Secretary of State to place countries that are origin, transit, or destination countries for a significant number of victims of severe forms of trafficking in one of three tiers. In 2003, State added a fourth category, the tier 2 watch list, consisting of tier 2 countries that require special scrutiny in the coming year (see fig. 3). Governments of countries placed in tier 3 may be subject to sanctions by the United States.

In addition to the rankings, each Trafficking in Persons Report contains country narratives intended to provide the basis for each country's tier placement. Although the narratives are not required by the TVPA, they state the scope and nature of the trafficking problem, explain the reasons for the country's inclusion in the report, and describe the government's efforts to combat trafficking and comply with the minimum standards contained in U.S. legislation. For countries placed in the lowest two tiers, State develops country action plans to help guide governments in improving their antitrafficking efforts.

Trafficking in Persons Report Has Raised Global Awareness about Human Trafficking

The Trafficking in Persons Report has raised global awareness about human trafficking and spurred some governments that had failed to comply with the minimum standards to adopt antitrafficking measures. According to U.S. government and international organization officials and representatives of trafficking victim advocacy groups, this is due to the combination of a public assessment of foreign governments' antitrafficking efforts and potential economic consequences for those that fail to meet minimum standards and do not make an effort to do so.

U.S. government officials cited a number of cases in which foreign governments improved their antitrafficking efforts in response to their tier placements. For example, State and USAID officials cited the case of Jamaica, a source country for child trafficking into the sex trade, which was placed on tier 3 in the 2005 report. The country narrative noted deficiencies in Jamaica's antitrafficking measures and reported that the government was not making significant efforts to comply with the minimum standards. Jamaica failed to investigate, prosecute, or convict any traffickers during the previous year, despite the passage of a law to protect minors. In response, the Jamaican government created an antitrafficking unit within its police force and conducted raids that led to nine trafficking-related arrests.

In addition, the 2004 report placed Japan on the tier 2 watch list, and the country narrative noted that Japan is a destination country for large numbers of foreign women and children who are trafficked for sexual exploitation. It highlighted weaknesses in Japan's law enforcement efforts.

For example, the lack of scrutiny of Japan's entertainer visas reportedly allowed traffickers to use them to bring victims into the country. The country narrative also mentioned Japan's failure to comply with minimum standards for protecting victims, deporting foreign trafficking victims as undocumented aliens who had committed a crime by entering the country illegally. According to State officials and the 2005 report, the Japanese government responded to the report's criticisms by tightening the issuance of entertainer visas and ceasing the criminal treatment of trafficking victims.

Governments of countries placed on tier 3 that do not implement the recommendations in the country action plan may be subject to sanctions or other penalties. The United States, for example, may oppose assistance for the country from international financial institutions such as the International Monetary Fund.²⁸ Since 2003, full or partial sanctions have been applied to eight countries,²⁹ most of which were already under sanctions from the United States.

Limitations in the 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report Affect Its Credibility as a Diplomatic Tool

According to the presidential directive and the 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report, the annual report is intended as a tool to help the United States engage foreign governments in fighting human trafficking.

According to U.S. government officials, the report's effectiveness as a diplomatic tool for discussing human trafficking with foreign governments depends on its credibility. The country narratives used as the basis for ranking decisions should provide clear and comprehensive assessments of foreign governments' antitrafficking efforts and demonstrate consistent application of the standards. Our analysis of the 2005 report found limitations in the country narratives, and State officials in the Regional Bureaus expressed concerns that these limitations detract from the report's credibility and usefulness. These include some countries' inclusion in the report based on unreliable data, incomplete explanations of compliance with the minimum standards by some of the highest-ranked countries, and country narratives that did not clearly indicate how governments complied with certain standards and criteria. We also found criticisms of the process for resolving disputes about country inclusion and tier rankings.

Some Countries' Inclusion in the Report Based on Unreliable Data

The TVPA requires State to rank the antitrafficking efforts of governments of countries that are sources, transit points, or destinations for a "significant number" of victims of severe forms of trafficking. Since 2001, State has used a threshold of 100 victims to determine whether or not to include a country in the Trafficking in Persons Report.³⁰ However, as discussed earlier in this report, reliable estimates of the number of trafficking victims are generally not available. For example, according to State officials, one country was included in the report because a junior political officer stated that at least 300 trafficking victims were in the country and that the government's efforts to combat trafficking should be assessed. According to these officials, this statement was based on the political officer's informal survey of brothels in that country. Since then, other embassy officials, including the ambassador, have argued that the country does not have a significant number of victims, but it continues to appear in the report. In addition, State officials cited Estonia as a country that was included in the report based on an IOM official's informal estimate of more than 100 victims. State officials said that a subsequent embassy-funded study of trafficking in Estonia found that the country had around 100 confirmed victims in a 4-year period, but internal discussions have not led to the removal of Estonia from the Trafficking in Persons Report. However, the country narrative for Estonia in the 2005 report was modified from previous years to state that Estonia is a source and transit country for a "small number" of trafficking victims.

Our review of country narratives in the 2005 report revealed some cases in which it was not clear how the situations used to justify the country's inclusion in the report constituted severe forms of trafficking under U.S. law. For example, the country narratives for Algeria, Saudi Arabia, and Singapore described cases in which human smugglers abandoned people, domestic workers were abused by their employers, and foreign women engaged in prostitution. The narratives either did not clearly establish whether the situation involved victims of severe forms of trafficking or failed to provide enough information about the magnitude of the problem to convey the sense that the number of victims had reached 100 people.

According to State officials, inclusion of human rights abuses or labor issues in the description of foreign countries' human trafficking problem can damage the report's credibility with foreign governments. Some State officials have suggested abandoning the threshold of 100 victims and including all countries in the report.

Unclear Threshold for Meeting Standard on Prescribed Punishment

Our analysis of the 2005 report found that many narratives did not clearly state whether and how the government met the minimum standard regarding stringency of punishment for severe forms of trafficking (see app. I for a description of the methodology used to analyze the 2005 report). This standard requires that prescribed penalties for severe forms of trafficking be sufficiently stringent to deter such trafficking and that they reflect the heinous nature of the offense. The Trafficking Office has not defined a threshold for what constitutes "sufficiently stringent" punishment. Our analysis showed that in over one-third of cases, the 2005 report's country narratives did not characterize the prescribed penalties as sufficiently stringent. Moreover, in many cases the narratives do not state whether or not the government met this minimum standard. State officials agreed that this subjectivity makes it difficult for reports staff and foreign governments to know what constitutes compliance, negatively affecting the report's credibility and utility as a diplomatic tool.

Narratives for Highest-Ranked Countries Did Not Fully Explain Their Placement

Our analysis of the 2005 report found that many country narratives do not provide a comprehensive assessment of foreign governments' compliance with the minimum standards, resulting in incomplete explanations for tier placements. Although the 2005 report discusses the importance of imposing strict penalties on traffickers, we found that only 2 of the 24 tier 1 country narratives clearly explained compliance with the second minimum standard established in the TVPA, which, among other things, calls for governments to prescribe punishment for sex trafficking that is commensurate with that for grave crimes such as forcible sexual assault.

The narratives for 17 (71 percent) of the tier 1 countries provided information on penalties for sex trafficking but did not compare these with the governments' penalties for other grave crimes. Five (21 percent) tier 1 countries did not mention whether the governments complied with this standard at all.

Our analysis of the tier 1 country narratives in the 2005 report also showed that, while most explained how these governments fully met the core criteria for the fourth minimum standard, related to government efforts to eliminate severe forms of trafficking, some did not. A senior official at the Trafficking Office confirmed this finding. We found that country narratives for 11 (46 percent) of the 24 tier 1 countries raised concerns about the governments' compliance with key parts of core criteria used to determine if the government is making a serious and sustained effort to eliminate severe forms of trafficking. However, the narratives failed to explain whether and how the governments' success in meeting the other core criteria outweighed these deficiencies and justified their placement in tier 1.

For example, the 2005 report described France, a tier 1 country, as a destination for thousands of trafficked women and children. Although the report states that the French government fully complied with the minimum standards, our analysis of the narrative found that the first three standards were not mentioned. Furthermore, the narrative also discussed the French government's failure to comply with the criterion on protecting trafficking victims, one of the key objectives of U.S. antitrafficking legislation. The narrative discusses a French law, which harmed trafficking victims by arresting, jailing, and fining them. Senior officials at the Trafficking Office are concerned about France's lack of compliance with the victim protection criterion. The narrative, however, did not balance the discussion of these deficiencies by explaining how the government's compliance with the other core criteria allowed it to meet the fourth minimum standard and thus be placed in tier 1.

Similarly, the country narratives for two tier 1 countries stated that the governments were not taking steps to combat official corruption, which the 2004 report highlights as a major impediment to antitrafficking efforts. For example, the narrative for Nepal, a source country for women and children trafficked to India and the Middle East, states that the government fully complied with the minimum standards. However, the narrative noted that the government has not taken action against immigration officials, police and judges suspected of benefiting from trafficking-related graft and corruption, and it did not explain how the deficiency in this core criteria was outweighed by Nepal's efforts with other core criteria.

Internal Process for Resolving Disagreements Lacks Credibility

According to State officials, there are a considerable number of disagreements within State about the initial tier placements proposed by the Trafficking Office. These disagreements are not surprising, given that the Trafficking Office focuses exclusively on antitrafficking efforts while the Regional Bureaus manage bilateral relations, which comprise a wide range of issues. However, it is important that the process for resolving these conflicts be credible. Some disagreements on tier rankings are resolved in meetings between the Trafficking Office and the Deputy Assistant Secretaries of the Regional Bureaus, but most are elevated to the undersecretary level. A few disagreements are even referred to the Secretary of State for resolution. According to State officials, some disputes are worked out by clarifying misunderstandings or providing additional information. Although Trafficking Office staff said that these discussions are constructive, staff in State's Regional Bureaus said that many disagreements over tier rankings are resolved by a process of "horsetrading," whereby the Trafficking Office agrees to raise some countries' tier rankings in exchange for lowering others. In these cases, political considerations may take precedence over a neutral assessment of foreign governments' compliance with minimum standards to combat trafficking. Senior officials at the Trafficking Office acknowledged that political considerations sometimes come into play when making the tier ranking decisions.

Trafficking in Persons Report Is Not Used to Prioritize Programs or Target Resources

The Trafficking Office's implementation plan and the 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report states that the report should be used as a guide to target resources to prosecution, protection, and prevention programs. However, we found that U.S. government agencies do not systematically link the programs they fund to combat trafficking overseas with the tier rankings or the deficiencies that are identified in the report's country narratives. For example, U.S. agencies did not use the report when they selected high-priority countries to participate in the 2-year $50 million Presidential Initiative to Combat Trafficking in Persons. Moreover, we found that many of the country narratives describing deficiencies in foreign governments' antitrafficking efforts were incomplete, making it difficult to use them to guide programming.

U.S. Government Lacks Mechanism to Link Its Overseas Programs to Deficiencies Identified In Trafficking in Persons Report

Officials from State's Trafficking Office acknowledged that the management processes and staff responsible for producing the report are not linked with those managing overseas assistance programs. State's Inspector General reported in November 2005 that the lack of synchronization between the Trafficking Office's grants cycle (January and February) and reporting cycle (June) makes it difficult to address the shortcomings identified in the report and the countries' programming needs. In addition, most of the State requests for grant proposals that we reviewed were generic in scope and were not tailored to address a specific problem or priority. For example, one request for proposal was directed broadly at prevention and protection programs in Africa, the Caribbean, and Latin America. In addition, officials from State's regional bureaus said that most of their requests for grant proposals are sent to all the embassies in their region and are not targeted to those countries on lower tiers.

However, officials from one regional bureau stated that they sent a request for grant proposals dealing with law enforcement issues only to those countries on the tier 2 watch list to ensure the programs were targeted where they were most needed.

The presidential directive stated that agencies are to develop a consensus on the highest priority countries to receive antitrafficking assistance through interagency consultation and in consultation with U.S. missions overseas. The Trafficking Office's implementation plan called for using the annual Trafficking in Persons Report as a guide to target assistance, with priority to countries ranked in the lowest tiers and assistance to only those tier 1 and 2 countries with limited resources and whose governments showed a clear commitment to combat trafficking. In fiscal year 2005, the U.S. government obligated about $96 million to support more than 265 international antitrafficking programs in about 100 countries. Only one-fourth of this money went to countries ranked in the lowest two tiers (see fig. 4).

Through the Senior Policy Operating Group, in January 2004 agencies selected eight countries to target their efforts for the presidential initiative to combat trafficking in persons; however, documentation of the decision-making process does not mention use of the Trafficking in Persons Report's tier rankings or country narratives to affect this selection.

Officials from the Trafficking Office and the documents we reviewed stated that the Group selected countries based on several factors, including anticipated host government commitment and the ability to start implementation in a short time frame. The eight countries selected were ranked in tier 2 in the 2003 Trafficking in Persons Report, suggesting that their governments showed some commitment to combating trafficking by making efforts to comply with the minimum standards and criteria outlined in the TVPA. However, it was not clear how the Group applied the criteria in selecting the countries. For example, host government commitment to combat trafficking did not necessarily translate into a willingness to receive U.S. assistance. The Department of State cables indicate that the governments in Brazil and India did not support U.S. efforts to fund antitrafficking programs under the presidential initiative. In addition, despite an emphasis on selecting countries in which the United States could start implementation in a short time frame, agreements necessary to conduct law enforcement projects were not in place in Brazil and Mexico, causing these initiatives to be delayed. Also, according to an agency official and documents we reviewed, Tanzania was included because a senior official had just traveled there and thought trafficking might be a problem.

Incomplete Assessments of Foreign Governments' Antitrafficking Deficiencies

The country narratives' incomplete assessments of deficiencies in foreign governments' efforts to combat trafficking diminish the Trafficking in Persons Report's utility as a programming guide. Our analysis of the 2005 report found that many country narratives failed to include information on the governments' compliance with some standards and core criteria, making it difficult for U.S. government officials to use the report as a programming guide. For example, all narratives for countries in the lowest two tiers contained some discussion of government efforts to protect trafficking victims. However, we found that 80 percent failed to mention key aspects of the victim protection criterion, including whether victims were encouraged to cooperate with law enforcement, whether the government provided legal alternatives to deportation, and whether victims were protected from inappropriate treatment as criminals (see fig. 5). In addition, 92 percent of country narratives for tier 2 countries, which receive the largest share of U.S. government antitrafficking funds, did not mention compliance with certain standards and criteria.³¹

Conclusion

The United States has placed trafficking on the international agenda and has spurred governments and organizations into action through its funding of international programs and the publication of the annual Trafficking in Persons Report. Additionally, the development of a victim-centered approach based upon prevention, protection, and prosecution programs has provided an operational framework for both governments and practitioners in the field. However, more than 5 years since the passage of the TVPA, the U.S. government lacks fundamental information on the nature and extent of the global trafficking problem and an overall strategy for agencies to target their programs and resources abroad.

As the United States and other countries work to identify victims of trafficking, the scope of the global trafficking problem remains unknown in terms of overall numbers within countries of origin; victims' gender, age, and type of exploitation suffered; and the profile and methods of the perpetrators. The United States has provided about $375 million in antitrafficking assistance since 2001 for projects in about 100 countries.

However, the lack of an overall government strategy which ties together and leverages the program expertise and resources of agencies with the knowledge of victims' identity and location, raises questions about whether antitrafficking activities are targeted where they are most needed. Furthermore, little evaluation research has been conducted to determine which international antitrafficking activities are working or how best to tailor them to meet specific needs.

The fight against human trafficking will almost certainly require years of effort and the continued monitoring of governments' actions. To enhance its usefulness as a diplomatic tool, the narratives and country rankings in the annual Trafficking in Persons Report must be viewed as credible by governments and informed human rights and country observers. However, the report does not comprehensively or clearly describe how decisions about tier rankings were reached. Moreover, problems identified in the report provide the means to better identify program needs and allocate resources, but agencies have not linked their activities to identified deficiencies.

Recommendations for Executive Action

To improve efforts to combat trafficking in persons abroad, we recommend that the Secretary of State, in her capacity as Chair of the Interagency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking, consider the following actions:

1. Work closely with relevant agencies as they implement U.S. law calling for research into the creation of an effective mechanism to develop a global estimate of trafficking. This could include assigning a trafficking data and research unit to serve as an interagency focal point charged with developing an overall research strategy, collecting and analyzing data, and directing research.
2. In conjunction with relevant agencies, develop and implement a strategic approach that would delineate agency roles and responsibilities in relation to each other, strengthen mechanisms for integrating activities, and determine priorities, measurable goals, time frames, performance measures, and a methodology to gauge results.
3. To improve the credibility of State's annual report on trafficking in persons, we recommend that the Secretary of State ensure that the report clearly documents the rationale and support for tier rankings and improve the report's usefulness for programming by making the narratives more comprehensive.

Agency Comments and Our Evaluation

We requested comments on a draft of this report from the Secretaries of State, Justice, Health and Human Services, Homeland Security, and Labor; the Administrator of USAID; the U.S. government agency that prepares the trafficking estimate; and cognizant officials at the ILO, IOM, and UNODC, or their designees. We received written comments from State, which are reprinted in appendix V along with our responses to specific points.

State generally agreed with our recommendations. State agreed with our first recommendation to work closely with relevant agencies as they implement U.S. law calling for research into the creation of an effective mechanism to develop a global estimate of trafficking and provided detailed suggestions for areas of future research that are consistent with our findings. Regarding our second recommendation that the Secretary of State develop and implement a strategic approach, State recognized the need for better performance measures and enhanced interagency coordination while also stating that roles and responsibilities have been established. In response, we clarified our recommendation to state that agencies' roles and responsibilities should be delineated in relation to each other, consistent with our report findings. In response to our third recommendation, State said that while its annual Trafficking in Persons Report can improve, it has become a much richer, more useful product since first published in 2001. State also said our report includes some useful recommendations that the department will explore integrating with ongoing efforts in light of available resources. In addition, State commented that its 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report offers a greater and more consistent examination of the minimum standards as they apply to each country. We conducted a selective review of 26 tier 1 country narratives in the 2006 report and found that many of the concerns we cited in our report remain. For example, none of the tier 1 country narratives clearly explained whether or not the government complied with the second minimum standard established in the TVPA, which, among other things, calls for governments to prescribe punishment for sex trafficking that is commensurate with that for grave crimes such as forcible sexual assault.

In oral comments, the U.S. government agency that prepares the trafficking estimate fundamentally concurs with our characterization of the U.S. global estimate of trafficking flows. The agency stated that it has sought to improve upon the 2004 estimate's accuracy and utility through working with an outside contractor with the intention of thoroughly documenting and vetting a methodology, as well as preparing detailed recommendations for improving future estimates. According to the agency, many of this contractor's initial recommendations have been in-line with those delineated in our report. Despite these efforts and the inherent difficulty of preparing estimates of hidden populations, the agency agreed with our overall findings-- particularly with the idea that housing the estimate in the intelligence community makes it opaque and inaccessible. The agency stated that it believes that other U.S. government agencies are best positioned to produce the global trafficking estimate in the future, because they have access to the same unclassified data, would be better able to vet the methodology, and could provide additional information to allow for a closer link between international and domestic human trafficking flow estimates.

State, Justice, Labor, USAID, the U.S. government agency that prepared the trafficking estimate, and the ILO, IOM, and UNODC submitted technical comments which we have incorporated into this report as appropriate.

As agreed with your office, unless you publicly announce the contents of this report earlier, we plan no further distribution until 30 days from the report date. At that time, we will send copies of this report to the Secretaries of State, Justice, Health and Human Services, Homeland Security, and Labor; the Administrator of USAID; the U.S. government agency that prepares the trafficking estimate; ILO; IOM; and UNODC; and interested congressional committees. Copies of this report will also be made available to other interested parties on request. In addition, this report will be made available at no charge on the GAO Web site at <http://www.gao.gov>.

If you or your staff have any questions about this report, please contact me at (202) 512-9601. Contact points for our Offices of Congressional Relations and Public Affairs may be found on the last page of this report. GAO staff who made major contributions to this report are listed in appendix VI.

Thomas Melito, Director

International Affairs and Trade

Footnotes:

1This amount includes over $150 million from the Department of Labor, which was unable to break out funding amounts that specifically addressed trafficking but include funding amounts for activities that either have trafficking as a central focus, one component of a larger project linked to trafficking, or as an issue within the overall context of the project.

2We have also initiated a review of U.S. efforts to investigate and prosecute trafficking in persons, and will soon begin a review of multilateral organizations' antitrafficking efforts.

3The International Organization for Migration is a multilateral organization that works with migrants and governments to respond to migration challenges. The International Labor Organization is a United Nations agency that promotes human and labor rights. UNODC assists member states in fighting illicit drugs, crime, and terrorism.

4UNODC. Trafficking in Persons Global Patterns. (April 2006).

5Memorandum for the Secretary of State, the Attorney General, the Administrator of the Agency for International Development, the Director of the United States Information Agency on ``Steps to Combat Violence against Women and Trafficking in Women and Girls`` (Mar. 11, 1998).

6Pub. L. No. 106-386.

7TVPA 2003 (Pub. L. No. 108-193) and TVPA 2005 (Pub. L. No. 109-164).

8The United States is also a signatory to the United Nations Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, Supplementing the United Nations Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime, G.A. res. 55/25, annex II, 55 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No. 49) at 60, U.N. Doc. A/45/49 (Vol. I) (2001), which entered into force on December 25, 2003. The United States ratified the protocol on December 3, 2005.

9Pub. L. No. 108-458.

10IOM's database was funded in part by State's Trafficking Office.

11The database is primarily a social service and protection case management tool.

12Because of concerns with the reliability and credibility of aggregate data, ILO chose not to use such data in developing its global trafficking estimate.

132004 Trafficking in Persons Report, Department of State.

14Adult aliens are eligible for certification; victims under age 18 do not need to be certified to receive benefits. To be certified, the alien must be willing to assist law enforcement in the investigation and prosecution of severe forms of trafficking. Also, the alien's presence in the United States must be required to ensure prosecution of traffickers in persons or the alien must have made application for a T visa.

15As reported in a USAID report.

16Pub. L. No. 108-458. The Human Smuggling and Trafficking Center is a joint State, DHS, and Justice operation.

17GAO, Results-oriented Government: Practices that Can Help Enhance and Sustain Collaboration among Federal Agencies, GAO-06-15 (Washington, D.C.: Oct. 21, 2005).

19National Security Presidential Directive (NSPD) 22, signed on December 16, 2002.

20We identified six desirable characteristics to include in a national strategy: (1) purpose, scope, and methodology; (2) problem definition and risk assessment; (3) goals, subordinate objectives, activities, and performance measures; (4) resources, investments, and risk management; (5) organizational roles, responsibilities, and coordination; and (6) integration and implementation. See GAO, Combating Terrorism: Evaluation of Selected Characteristics in National Strategies Related to Terrorism, GAO-04-408T (Washington, D.C.: Feb. 3, 2004), and Prescription Drugs: Strategic Framework Would Promote Accountability and Enhance Efforts to Enforce the Prohibitions on Personal Importation, GAO-05-372 (Washington, D.C.: Sept. 8, 2005).

21GAO-04-408T.

22The TVPA 2003 added the provision that no funds made available to carry out the TVPA as amended may be used to promote, support, or advocate the legalization or practice of prostitution. In addition, no funds made available to carry out the TVPA, as amended, may be used to implement any program that targets victims of severe forms of trafficking through any organization that has not stated in a grant application or agreement that it does not promote, support, or advocate the legalization or practice of prostitution. National Security Presidential Directive 22, signed on December 16, 2002, states that U.S. policy opposes prostitution and prostitution-related activities, such as pimping, pandering, or maintaining brothels, as contributing to the phenomenon of trafficking in persons. The U.S. government's position is that these activities should not be regulated as a legitimate form of work for any human being.

23In previous work, we broadly defined collaboration as any joint activity intended to produce more public value than could be produced when the organizations act alone. GAO-06-15.

24In previous work on desirable characteristics of a national strategy, we have found that identifying priorities, milestones, and performance measures, usually developed in conjunction with a strategic framework, can help agencies achieve results, and enable more effective oversight and accountability. See GAO-04-408T.

25GAO-06-15.

26The study concluded that a country's legal position on prostitution was not the only factor that influences the number of women and children trafficked for sexual exploitation and that a final evaluation of the legislative model and the im-

26 The number of victims should be based on a wider, more reliable and comparable set of data. Transcrime, Study on National Legislation on Prostitution and the Trafficking in Women and Children, a report prepared for the European Parliament, August 2005.

27 The fourth standard provides 10 indicia that can be used to assess these efforts. According to the Trafficking Office, it focuses on 5 of the 10 as core criteria: (1) prosecution of traffickers, (2) prosecution of corrupt government officials who contribute to trafficking, (3) protection of victims, (4) prevention of trafficking, and (5) demonstrated progress in combating trafficking from year to year (see app. IV).

28 In 2001, we assessed whether the Treasury Department was able to influence operations at the International Monetary Fund (Fund) in a direction that would be consistent with U.S. policies. We found that it was difficult to attribute Fund operations to any one member because the Fund generally operates on a consensus decision-making basis. GAO, International Monetary Fund: Efforts to Advance U.S. Policies at the Fund, GAO-01-214 (Washington, D.C.: Jan. 23, 2001).

29 In 2003, the President decided to impose full sanctions on Burma, Cuba, and North Korea and partial sanctions on Liberia and Sudan. In 2004, full sanctions were again imposed on Burma, Cuba, and North Korea and partial sanctions on Equatorial Guinea, Sudan, and Venezuela. In 2005, full sanctions were imposed on Burma, Cuba, and North Korea and partial sanctions on Cambodia and Venezuela.

30 The threshold of 100 victims is not legislatively mandated.

31 Our finding that 92 percent of tier 2 narratives did not mention compliance with certain standards and criteria is based on a random probability sample and is surrounded by a 95 percent confidence interval that extends from 82 percent to 95 percent.

LOAD-DATE: August 15, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

REQUESTOR: HUMAN TRAFFICKING

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Other

337 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Jerusalem Post

July 12, 2006, Wednesday

Israel Arabs join to fight white slavery

BYLINE: Ruth Eglash

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 1

LENGTH: 581 words

Experts from the Middle East and North Africa met last week at the United Nations headquarters in Vienna to prepare an action plan to stamp out the growing problems of human trafficking and migrant smuggling.

The three-day symposium - the first of its kind - brought together representatives from Israel Lebanon Egypt Syria Bahrain UAE Yemen and Malta.

"This is the first meeting ever held to discuss a regional action plan for the Middle East/North Africa region Muhammad Adul-Aziz of the UN's Office on Drugs and Crime said. We consider this meeting to be an important step forward. The proposed plan of action will provide member states with a framework for their future efforts to fight smuggling of migrants and trafficking in human beings."

A UN report in April said Israel was a top destination country for trafficking in human beings and the US State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report published in June placed Israel in the Tier 2 (Watch List) category of countries whose governments do not fully comply with the US Trafficking Victims Protection Act but are making significant efforts to do so.

"In the Middle East/North Africa region exchange of information is complicated by heightened security concerns and tense diplomatic relations said Israel's representative at the meeting Yedida Wolfe. She is co-director of the Task Force on Human Trafficking - a project of the nonprofit organization ATZUM (Justice Works) and law firm Kabir-Nevo-Keidar.

If there is a consensus on one thing that is the need for bilateral cooperation to combat trafficking. Last week's meeting was a breakthrough in establishing personal cross-border contacts to help fight modern slavery Wolfe said.

She said the action plan created at the meeting focused on three areas: prevention which includes changes in legislature increased policing on national borders and raising awareness; protection of the victims and providing them with access to services that will help them break away from traffickers; and increased prosecution of those facilitating the crimes.

Wolfe said the UN plan required the endorsement of the states involved. This was the next step in implementing the program she said.

I have high hopes that this meeting will form the basis of continued discussions said Wolfe. We really needed the UN to step in; some of the countries do not even publicly recognize trafficking as a problem."

Wolfe said one of the biggest problems for Israel was that the government relied solely on nongovernmental bodies for information and action.

"We've been petitioning the government to appoint one person in the establishment to deal with these issues said Wolfe. So far there is no one."

The meeting is meant to be followed up by a high-level political conference in the spring of 2007 aimed at bringing together all the international stakeholders to endorse the plan.

According to a report released in 2005 by the Knesset Subcommittee on Trafficking in Women between 3 0 and 5 0 women had been smuggled into Israel over the previous four years to work as prostitutes.

According to the report the women who were mostly from the former Soviet Union were sold at public auction for as much as $ 10 0 and forced to work up to 18 hours a day. On average the women received only three percent of the money they earned from prostitution and many were raped and beaten. Most of the women had been smuggled over the Egyptian border.

LOAD-DATE: January 10, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2006 The Jerusalem Post

338 of 445 DOCUMENTS

World Markets Research Centre

Global Insight

July 10, 2006

Government of U.A.E. Approves Tough Law on Human Trafficking; Penalties Against Labour Law Violators

BYLINE: Anoushka MarashlianLENGTH: 354 words

A U.A.E. government committee, chaired by Justice Minister Mohammed al Daheri, yesterday (9 July) approved a draft law which imposes strict penalties against human trafficking, reports the U.A.E. daily Gulf News. The legislation will now be submitted to review by the cabinet and is expected to be passed into law before the year's end. The U.S. State Department's annual human traffic report 2006 acknowledged notable advances by U.A.E. authorities in improving its human trafficking record, although it still remains on a watch list of problem countries. The U.A.E.'s reputation as a location for human trafficking and other smuggling operations was raised by opponents of a deal that would have given Dubai Ports World (DPW), a U.A.E.-owned shipping company, some managerial rights over key U.S. ports; DPW aborted the American wing of its operations in response to the controversy (see U.A.E.: 10 March 2006:). Meanwhile, U.A.E. Labour Minister Ali al-Kaabi this weekend also announced that firms violating a ban on outdoor work between the hours 12.30pm to 3pm, when temperatures can reach over 50 degrees Celsius, will be fined and temporarily denied new work permits. The U.A.E.'s labour record has long been a source of international concern and came under heightened scrutiny following violent riots in March 2006 at the Burj Dubai site, touted to become the world's tallest building; the damage caused during the Burj Dubai riots was estimated in excess of US$1 million. (see U.A.E.: 24 March 2006:). Significance: U.A.E. authorities are proving more responsive to longstanding international criticism of its labour record and are also moving to amend the U.A.E.'s reputation as a human trafficker. Although the steps being taken by the U.A.E. leadership are encouraging, the crucial test, where the U.A.E. has previously been lacking is the implementation stage; some prominent business elites with established ties have previously been allowed to violate labour laws with impunity and it remains to be seen whether they will be affected by the stricter penalties included in this latest law.

LOAD-DATE: July 10, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHCopyright 2006 World Markets Research Limited;
All Rights Reserved

339 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

July 6, 2006 Thursday

Nigeria; Human Trafficking: Nigeria No Longer On Watch List - Naptip

BYLINE: This Day

LENGTH: 345 words

Executive Secretary, National Agency for the Prohibition of Trafficking in Persons and Other Related Matters (NAPTIP), Mrs Carol Ndaguba, yesterday said Nigeria is no longer on the United States government critical watch list (Tier Two Watch List) of countries with static human trafficking record.

This, she said, follows concrete efforts by the agency, with the support of the Federal Government among other stakeholders to tackle the menace head long.

Ndaguba said this yesterday while briefing journalists ahead of the Joint ECOWAS/Economic Community of Central African States (ECCAS), Conference of Regional Ministers on Trafficking in Persons scheduled to begin today.

She said before the constitution of NAPTIP, Nigeria was on the Tier Two Watch list, adding that though the Agency was hopeful that next year, Nigeria would be put on the tier one list, efforts are still on to ensure improvement on some of the Agency's achievements.

Ndaguba said Nigeria was the first country in Africa to set up a full agency to address the phenomenon of trafficking in persons, while research has shown that ignorance, poverty and greed all combine to fuel trafficking in persons.

On the objective of the regional conference, Ndaguba said it was designed to provide a uniform level of ratification and implementation of international instruments against trafficking.

She said no single country could win the war against traffickers, because of the cross border nature of the trade.

Mr Pierre Ferry, UNICEF Regional Protection Officer, urged participating states to ensure commitment to and adoption of recommendations at the workshop.

.He said central and western countries in Africa must stand up to the challenges posed by human trafficking, since traffickers readily use their borders to carry out the nefarious trade.

Among those in attendance were, Mr Pierre Athomo Ndong, Adviser on Child Protection and Section, Mr Pierre Ferry, Regional Protection Officer, UNICEF, Ms Jean Nyalendo, Advisor of the Minister for labour of Gabon, and Mr Lee Swepston, Senior Advisor, Human Right, ILO.

LOAD-DATE: July 6, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

340 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

July 6, 2006 Thursday

Nigeria; Human Trafficking - NAPTIP Prosecutes 120 Cases

BYLINE: Daily Champion

LENGTH: 265 words

A head of today's first Ministerial Regional Conference on Trafficking in persons, National Agency for the Prohibition of Traffic in Persons and other Related Matters (NAPTIP), yesterday said it has successfully prosecuted over 120 cases with seven traffickers serving various jail terms in the country.

Executive secretary of NAPTIP, Mrs Carol Ndaguba, who disclosed this to newsmen in Abuja, explained that the nation's porous borders were responsible for the crime.

According to her 25, cases involving human traffickers are pending in courts, while the agency was investigating 89 other cases.

She said as a result of successes achieved by NAPTIP, United States (US) Department of State elevated the country from a temporal to full second tier level in its yearly global human trafficking report.

She explained that at the on-going joint ECOWAS / ECCAS conference of ministers taking place in Abuja, experts from the ECOWAS secretariat, UNICEF, NAPTIP, International Labour Organisation (ILO), United Nations Office on Drug Control (UNODC), United States Department and several other international and local bodies would evolve effective strategies to combat the crime. UNICEF's Regional Adviser for Child Protection, Pierre Ferry, however, lamented huge social, health and economic problems associated with human trafficking.

He said "the illicit trade is rooted in historical, social and cultural context."

According to him, human trafficking is a transnational crime that impinges on human rights, stressing need for concerted efforts among regional and national agencies to fight the scourge.

LOAD-DATE: July 6, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

341 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 23, 2006 Friday

Zimbabwe; Govt Rapped for Making Citizens Prone to Trafficking

BYLINE: Zimbabwe IndependentLENGTH: 405 words

THE United States has castigated government for making its own people vulnerable to human trafficking through its globally condemned Operation Murambatsvina, a State Department 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report reveals.

Zimbabwe was last year classified under Tier 2, a watch list of countries "assessed as not fully complying with the minimum standards". According to the latest report released on June 5 by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Zimbabwe has since dipped into the lowest classification of countries said to have an appalling human trafficking record in Tier 3 alongside Sudan.

"Zimbabwe showed little political will to address its trafficking problem during the past year," the report says. "Zimbabwean children are trafficked internally for forced agricultural labour, domestic servitude and sexual exploitation. Trafficked women and girls are lured out of the country by false job or scholarship promises."

The report cites government's urban slum clearance blitz, which left more than 700 000 people homeless, as having exposed children to human trafficking vulnerability.

"Government placed many of its citizens at increased risk for exploitation as a result of Operation Murambatsvina. Tens of thousands of people remain homeless in the wake of the operation, which demolished ostensibly illegal homes and businesses. An estimated 223 000 children were affected and left vulnerable to trafficking."

Trafficking in human beings is the criminal commercial trade in human beings, who are subjected to involuntary acts such as begging, sexual exploitation or unfree labour. It also involves a process of using physical force, fraud, deception, or other forms of coercion and intimidation to obtain, recruit, harbour and transport people.

The United States annual Department of State Trafficking in Persons Report is a comprehensive report covering 158 countries analysing their efforts to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons or modern-day slavery. Governments that meet the standards for elimination of trafficking established in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 are placed in Tier 1. Countries assessed as not fully complying with the minimum standards but making significant efforts to do so are classified as Tier 2.

Meanwhile, the US Embassy in Harare this week unveiled a $18US 000 grant to the Girl Child Network in Zimbabwe to help with its Anti-Trafficking in Persons Awareness Campaign.

LOAD-DATE: June 23, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

342 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Nation

June 23, 2006 Friday

PAK NO MORE ON US WATCH LIST

LENGTH: 473 words

ISLAMABAD: Due to the effective measures taken by the FIA to eliminate human trafficking, Pakistan has been taken out of the American Watch list, the Additional Director General FIA Tariq Khosa told The Nation. The FIA has arrested 1006 human traffickers Tariq Khosa said during the year 2005 whereas 300 were arrested in 2004, he said. The US Secretary of state in her report has acknowledged the efforts of Pakistan in curbing human trafficking.

FIA also arrested a notorious Hundi Hawala agent Raheel Butt resident of Gujarat. He was involved in transferring money to Iran, Turkey, Greece and other European countries on behalf of 15 human traffickers involved in this heinous crime. In follow up to these arrests, FIA convicted 1125 culprits during the year 2005, while 585 convictions were made in 2004. 3926 cases were finalized against human smugglers during the year 2005, whereas 239 were finalized during the year 2004. 595 proclaimed offenders were arrested during the year 2005, whereas 281 during the year 2004.

Khosa said, "An anti-trafficking unit has been established in all five-investigation zones of the FIA, these units handled the cases of human trafficking with special reference to women and children." In October 2002, the government passed a law that criminalizes all aspect of trafficking, from recruitment and transporting to receiving a person. It is the first law of such kind in Pakistan. Three passport circles at Turbat, Taftan and Gwadar have been set up in Balochistan to prevent and prosecute human traffickers involved in trafficking from Pakistan to Iran through unfrequented routes.

While talking about the establishment of Inter Agency Task Force he said, "On 23rd September 2005 the interior ministry established the Task Force, which deals with Federal and Provisional Intelligence enforcement agencies." IATF intercepted 2436 illegal immigrants attempting to cross Pak-Iran border for destinations of European countries, out of which 1318 were by FIA. Deportation from Iran dropped by 45%, 3712 were deported from Oman during the 1st half of 2005, whereas 2005 have been deported from Iran so far.

Mark Lyall Grant, the British High Commissioner also appreciated FIA's efforts in a letter written to interior minister in March 2006. Deportation on forged documents decreased to 179 during the year 2005, as compared to 267 in the year 2004; hence, a decrease of 33% was seen in this area. While offloading on forged documents increased to 554 during the year 2005 as compared to 267 in the previous tear, there is a significant rise of 107%.

Increase in offloading and decrease in deportation on forged documents saved Pakistan from heavy fines. Fine on PIA alone decreased by 152%. Raja Abdul Ghaffar of Gujrat who had sent more than 6000 Pakistanis to Greece via unfrequented routes was also arrested.

LOAD-DATE: June 26, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Trafficking/Smuggling

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Global News Bites

343 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Nation (AsiaNet)

June 23, 2006 Friday

Pak no more on US watch list

SECTION: NATIONWIDE INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 471 wordsDATELINE: ISLAMABAD June 23

Due to the effective measures taken by the FIA to eliminate human trafficking, Pakistan has been taken out of the American Watch list, the Additional Director General FIA Tariq Khosa told The Nation. The FIA has arrested 1006 human traffickers Tariq Khosa said during the year 2005 whereas 300 were arrested in 2004, he said. The US Secretary of state in her report has acknowledged the efforts of Pakistan in curbing human trafficking.

FIA also arrested a notorious Hundi Hawala agent Raheel Butt resident of Gujarat. He was involved in transferring money to Iran, Turkey, Greece and other European countries on behalf of 15 human traffickers involved in this heinous crime. In follow up to these arrests, FIA convicted 1125 culprits during the year 2005, while 585 convictions were made in 2004. 3926 cases were finalized against human smugglers during the year 2005, whereas 239 were finalized during the year 2004. 595 proclaimed offenders were arrested during the year 2005, whereas 281 during the year 2004.

Khosa said, "An anti-trafficking unit has been established in all five-investigation zones of the FIA, these units handled the cases of human trafficking with special reference to women and children." In October 2002, the government passed a law that criminalizes all aspect of trafficking, from recruitment and transporting to receiving a person. It is the first law of such kind in Pakistan. Three passport circles at Turbat, Taftan and Gwadar have been set up in Balochistan to prevent and prosecute human traffickers involved in trafficking from Pakistan to Iran through unfrequented routes.

While talking about the establishment of Inter Agency Task Force he said, "On 23rd September 2005 the interior ministry established the Task Force, which deals with Federal and Provisional Intelligence enforcement agencies." IATF intercepted 2436 illegal immigrants attempting to cross Pak-Iran border for destinations of European countries, out of which 1318 were by FIA. Deportation from Iran dropped by 45%, 3712 were deported from Oman during the 1st half of 2005, whereas 2005 have been deported from Iran so far.

Mark Lyall Grant, the British High Commissioner also appreciated FIA's efforts in a letter written to interior minister in March 2006. Deportation on forged documents decreased to 179 during the year 2005, as compared to 267 in the year 2004; hence, a decrease of 33% was seen in this area. While offloading on forged documents increased to 554 during the year 2005 as compared to 267 in the previous year, there is a significant rise of 107%.

Increase in offloading and decrease in deportation on forged documents saved Pakistan from heavy fines. Fine on PIA alone decreased by 152%. Raja Abdul Ghaffar of Gujrat who had sent more than 6000 Pakistanis to Greece via unfrequented routes was also arrested.

LOAD-DATE: June 26, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

344 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 20, 2006 Tuesday 6:42 AM GMT

Myanmar rejects US report on human trafficking

LENGTH: 259 wordsDATELINE: YANGON, June 20 2006

Myanmar on Tuesday rejected a US report that branded the military-ruled country as among the world's worst offenders for trafficking in humans.

A State Department report this month accused the junta of direct involvement in trafficking people for forced labor and sexual exploitation.

"The military junta's economic mismanagement, human rights abuses, and its policy of using forced labor are driving factors behind Burma's large trafficking problem," it said.

Myanmar, formerly known as Burma, rejected the report, saying it was making efforts to combat human trafficking.

The US report "once again unjustifiably classified Myanmar in the list of countries assessed as neither complying with the minimum standards nor making significant efforts in combating trafficking in persons," the foreign ministry said in the official New Light of Myanmar newspaper.

Myanmar would continue to fight human trafficking "regardless of negative views and responses from those who blindly refuse to recognize the ongoing commendable efforts," it said.

The US report said people from Myanmar were mainly trafficked to Bangladesh, China, Malaysia and Thailand for sexual exploitation, domestic service and forced labor.

Myanmar was listed along with North Korea and Laos in the State Department's "Tier 3" list of worst offenders of human trafficking.

Countries in the blacklist could face sanctions if they do not take immediate measures within 90 days.

But Myanmar is already under US sanctions to pressure it to make democratic reforms and to improve its human rights record.

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

345 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Vancouver Sun (British Columbia)

June 17, 2006 Saturday
Final Edition

Canada's Complicity in Human Trafficking: CRIME I The federal visa program for exotic dancers provides an opening for agents of a modern day slave trade

BYLINE: Daphne Bramham, Vancouver Sun

SECTION: WEEKEND REVIEW; Daphne Bramham; Pg. C5

LENGTH: 1080 words

If there's one labour shortage that the Canadian government won't tolerate, it's not having enough strippers.

The apparent need for strippers is so great that, despite a promise by the Liberal government in December 2004 to cancel the special temporary visa program for exotic dancers, Immigration Canada is still issuing them.

The only difference is that Immigration Canada now does a case-by-case confirmation that applicants have a signed contract and a promise from a strip-club operator that their airfare to and from Canada will be paid.

It's led to a reduction in the number of permits issued. Fewer than 10 visas were issued last year and only 60 visas were extended, a sharp decline from a high of 478 permits in 2003 and 366 extensions in 2004.

But among those few issued permits last year was Mark Kraynak, a 29-year-old college sophomore from Pennsylvania. Kraynak, a decorated soldier for his tour of duty in Iraq, died under unusual circumstances on Aug. 22, 2005. His body, along with that of another stripper, 20-year-old Steven Wright from California, was found on a ledge in a quarry outside Laval, Que.

The pair -- along with four other Americans -- had been working at a gay club in Toronto called Remington's. All were under contract to French Connection Francaise, a "modelling" agency.

Kraynak and Wright had gone to Montreal with FCF's owner Stephan Sirard. The night they died, they had been partying at an after-hours club in Laval, and initially police believed the two had fled to avoid paying a $35 taxi fare. But both had more than that amount in cash when their bodies were found. Police have yet to determine how the two men ended up dead in a quarry.

Kraynak and Wright died on the day that they were supposed to return to the United States.

After their deaths, Sirard announced that he was going to release a pornographic film starring Kraynak, with the proceeds going to benefit the two men's families. Janice Kraynak -- Mark's mother -- was outraged. Wright's mother said she'd take the money.

This isn't the first time Sirard has released pornographic videos after the star has died.

Just months before Kraynak and Wright died, Sirard released a porn film starring Canadian Natel King. Twenty-three-year-old King (who used the name Taylor Summers) was murdered, her body found in a ravine in Pennsylvania in March 2004. Photographer Anthony Frederick was later convicted.

Sirard offered the proceeds from King's film to Sick Children's Hospital in Toronto, where King had been a volunteer. The hospital declined. Unlike the Canadian government, the hospital didn't want to be associated with porn purveyors.

Yet these are the kinds of business people that Canada is helping with the stripper program.

Strangely, Canada is deemed by the U.S. government to be on the top tier of countries when it comes to the fight against human trafficking and sexual exploitation even though the Americans are aware of and critical of the stripper permits.

The U.S. State Department's most recent report on how countries deal with human trafficking mentions the stripper permits have decreased substantially since 2004 and notes that Canada now hands out brochures to incoming strippers telling them of their rights and listing contact numbers for support organizations.

Last year, the U.S. report described the stripper permit as "a type of program that has been abused and exploited by traffickers in many other countries." And in 2004, the Americans said Canada was no better than countries like Albania, Cambodia, Nigeria, Angola and Japan when it came to preventing and prosecuting human trafficking.

In that report, Vancouver was described as a hot spot with thousands of migrants -- aided by organized crime syndicates -- arriving and then disappearing into brothels and karaoke bars both here and in the United States.

Gregory Carlin, executive director of the Irish Anti-Trafficking Coalition, can't believe that Canada is among the best in the world based on its anti-trafficking measures. He's been lobbying for years to have the stripper program cancelled, and particularly since the deaths of Kraynak and Wright.

He's sent dozens of letters to Canadian officials saying that "under no circumstances should any permits be issue to any agency with a general modelling and exotic dancing or pornographic portfolio."

That the Americans rank Canada so highly, Carlin says, is "quite remarkable."

A Calgary-based, non-governmental organization whose goal is alleviating the suffering of people who have been trafficked and bringing offenders to justice, is just one of many that opposes the stripper permits agrees.

"We have strongly opposed the famed and dubious 'stripper visas'," says Shuvaloy Majumdar, executive director of The Future Group. "This is usually a front to permit traffickers to pose as legitimate business people, when instead they are participating as agents of the modern-day slave trade."

And while Canada continues to help strip-joint owners, the NGO says it does little to help victims who are trafficked into Canada and the sex trade.

In its recent study of eight western nations' treatment of victims of trafficking, The Future Group gave Canada the only failing grade.

"Canada has systematically failed to comply with its international obligations under the [United Nations] Trafficking Protocol," it said, adding: "Canada's record of dealing with trafficking victims is an international embarrassment and contrary to best practises."

This is particularly so because Canada was the first to have ratified the United Nations protocol on trafficking in May 2002.

With few exceptions, The Future Group says victims of human trafficking are routinely detained as illegal migrants and frequently deported. Some have even faced criminal charges for prostitution.

Up until the report's release in May, Future Group said Canada's only accomplishments were to produce a pamphlet, a poster and "host a conference or two."

Immigration Minister Monte Solberg responded immediately to the criticism. Victims now are issued 120-day temporary visas, are eligible for health services and are not charged any processing fees.

It was a good first step. But there is a lot more to be done beyond posters and pamphlets.

His next step should be to cancel the stripper permit program. It would be cheap and easy plus it would send a message out that Canada isn't interested in exploiting and endangering foreigners by easing their entry to the sex trade.

dbrahamham@png.canwest.com

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC:

Photo: Mark Mraz, Getty Images; (Canada's Complicity in Human Trafficking);

Photo: Courtesy of Montreal Police Department; The bodies of Steve Wright (left) and Mark Kraynak were found in a quarry.

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Column; Crime

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2006 The Vancouver Sun, a division of CanWest MediaWorks Publication Inc.
All Rights Reserved

346 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 16, 2006 Friday

GOVERNOR SIGNS FOUR BILLS DEALING WITH SAFETY

BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 876 wordsDATELINE: Juneau

The following information was released by the Alaska Gov. Frank Murkowski:

Governor Frank H. Murkowski today signed four bills into law dealing with the Alaska Seismic Hazards Safety Commission, human and sex trafficking, offenses against unborn children and victim's rights.

HB 83, co-sponsored by Kodiak Representative Gabrielle Ledoux, extends the Alaska Seismic Hazards Safety Commission's charter through June 30, 2012 and changes the make-up to include three representatives from local government in separate seismically active regions.

"Alaska needs the expertise provided by the members of the Seismic Hazards Safety Commission," Murkowski said. "Alaska's place on the Pacific Rim and unfortunate history with seismic disasters like the 1964 earthquake place added importance on ensuring we are properly prepared through sound analysis and advice we receive from this commission."

The bill also increases the number of members from nine to 11 and allows members term lengths to be staggered.

"I'm pleased my administration has had the honor of appointing three members to the commission from Representative Ledoux's district," Murkowski said.

The governor approved the appointment of Dean Maxwell of Palmer to a four year term, replacing Michael Wilkinson of Anchorage, who did not request re-appointment.

The Alaska Seismic Hazards Safety Commission was formed to recommend goals and priorities for seismic hazard mitigation for the public and private sectors. The commission is made up of state officials from the University of Alaska, Department of Natural Resources, Department of Military and Veterans Affairs and a host of local, state and federal agencies.

SB 12, sponsored by Anchorage Senator Fred Dyson, addresses human trafficking and purchasing products from countries that do not protect against human trafficking. - more - The bill creates two new crimes which prohibit human trafficking, which includes compelling or inducing persons to come to the state to engage in sexual conduct, adult entertainment, or labor through force or threat. The bill also prohibits a person from promoting or selling travel that uses commercial sexual conduct as an enticement for travel.

SB 12 also prohibits all three branches of state government from purchasing products from a person who has a headquarters in a country listed by the United States Secretary of State as a Tier 3 country. Tier 3 countries are those that are considered not to meet the minimum standards in protecting victims of human trafficking.

"We must send a strong message to those who try to enslave others for these deplorable purposes," Murkowski said. "Human trafficking is a growing threat, not only in Alaska, but across the globe. My administration values public safety above all others and by signing this bill I hope the message of no tolerance' is heard loud and clear.

"SB 12 will significantly alter the state's procurement code," Murkowski said. "Now, the Legislature, court system and Executive Branch must terminate financial relationships with organizations that are headquartered in countries considered by the State Department to be below minimum standards.

"It is merely not enough to take a stand against enslavement," Murkowski said. "We must give our public safety and court officials a tool to enforce it."

SB 134, sponsored by Anchorage Senator Con Bunde, creates a new sexual assault and sexual abuse pilot program in the Office of Victim's Rights.

"Unfortunately, sexual assault and sexual abuse are on the rise in Alaska," Murkowski said. "This bill is simply a natural extension of the Office of Victim's Rights abilities and provides victims with a voice in how the office monitors their investigations."

The bill grants attorneys in the office with powers for tracking victim's cases for negligence in the reported investigations and assisting the victims if negligence is found, instituting a pilot program for cases beginning after July 10, 2006. Under current state law victims have no recourse or say in how justice agencies handle investigations or allow advocates to argue or assist on their behalf.

SB 134 tasks the Office of Victim's Rights with reporting the findings of the pilot project to the Legislature no later than September 30, 2008 and may include recommendations for legislative action.

SB 20, also sponsored by Sen. Dyson, creates several new crimes that prohibit causing harm to unborn children. It adopts three levels of homicide of an unborn child: murder, manslaughter, and criminally negligent homicide. These new crimes are similar to homicide offenses against persons. SB 20 also adopts two degrees of assault on an unborn child, which are similar to assault in the first and second degrees.

- more - "Unborn children deserve the same legal protection as live born persons," Murkowski said. "This bill broadens the Alaska Criminal Code by granting rights to those who need them the most.

"Science has proven that any harm done to a mother carrying an unborn child endangers that child," Murkowski said. "And it would be beyond reproach to deny them the same protections we do to those who carry them into life."

The bill defines "unborn child" as a member of the species Homo sapiens, at any stage of development, who is carried in the womb.

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

347 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US States News

June 16, 2006 Friday 8:36 PM EST

GOV. MURKOWSKI SIGNS FOUR SAFETY BILLS

BYLINE: US States NewsLENGTH: 878 wordsDATELINE: JUNEAU, Alaska

Gov. Frank Murkowski, R-Alaska, issued the following news release:

Gov. Frank H. Murkowski today signed four bills into law dealing with the Alaska Seismic Hazards Safety Commission's charter through June 30, 2012 and changes the make-up to include three representatives from local government in separate seismically active regions.

HB 83, co-sponsored by Kodiak Representative Gabrielle Ledoux, extends the Alaska Seismic Hazards Safety Commission's charter through June 30, 2012 and changes the make-up to include three representatives from local government in separate seismically active regions.

"Alaska needs the expertise provided by the members of the Seismic Hazards Safety Commission," Murkowski said. "Alaska's place on the Pacific Rim and unfortunate history with seismic disasters like the 1964 earthquake place added importance on ensuring we are properly prepared through sound analysis and advice we receive from this commission."

The bill also increases the number of members from nine to 11 and allows members term lengths to be staggered.

"I'm pleased my administration has had the honor of appointing three members to the commission from Representative Ledoux's district," Murkowski said.

The governor approved the appointment of Dean Maxwell of Palmer to a four year term, replacing Michael Wilkinson of Anchorage, who did not request re-appointment.

The Alaska Seismic Hazards Safety Commission was formed to recommend goals and priorities for seismic hazard mitigation for the public and private sectors. The commission is made up of state officials from the University of Alaska, Department of Natural Resources, Department of Military and Veterans Affairs and a host of local, state and federal agencies.

SB 12, sponsored by Anchorage Senator Fred Dyson, addresses human trafficking and purchasing products from countries that do not protect against human trafficking. The bill creates two new crimes which prohibit human trafficking, which includes compelling or inducing persons to come to the state to engage in sexual conduct, adult entertainment, or labor through force or threat. The bill also prohibits a person from promoting or selling travel that uses commercial sexual conduct as an enticement for travel.

SB 12 also prohibits all three branches of state government from purchasing products from a person who has a headquarters in a country listed by the United States Secretary of State as a Tier 3 country. Tier 3 countries are those that are considered not to meet the minimum standards in protecting victims of human trafficking.

"We must send a strong message to those who try to enslave others for these deplorable purposes," Murkowski said. "Human trafficking is a growing threat, not only in Alaska, but across the globe. My administration values public safety above all others and by signing this bill I hope the message of 'no tolerance' is heard loud and clear.

"SB 12 will significantly alter the state's procurement code," Murkowski said. "Now, the Legislature, court system and Executive Branch must terminate financial relationships with organizations that are headquartered in countries considered by the State Department to be below minimum standards.

"It is merely not enough to take a stand against enslavement," Murkowski said. "We must give our public safety and court officials a tool to enforce it."

SB 134, sponsored by Anchorage Senator Con Bunde, creates a new sexual assault and sexual abuse pilot program in the Office of Victim's Rights.

"Unfortunately, sexual assault and sexual abuse are on the rise in Alaska," Murkowski said. "This bill is simply a natural extension of the Office of Victim's Rights abilities and provides victims with a voice in how the office monitors their investigations."

The bill grants attorneys in the office with powers for tracking victim's cases for negligence in the reported investigations and assisting the victims if negligence is found, instituting a pilot program for cases beginning after July 10, 2006. Under current state law victims have no recourse or say in how justice agencies handle investigations or allow advocates to argue or assist on their behalf.

SB 134 tasks the Office of Victim's Rights with reporting the findings of the pilot project to the Legislature no later than September 30, 2008 and may include recommendations for legislative action.

SB 20, also sponsored by Sen. Dyson, creates several new crimes that prohibit causing harm to unborn children. It adopts three levels of homicide of an unborn child: murder, manslaughter, and criminally negligent homicide. These new crimes are similar to homicide offenses against persons. SB 20 also adopts two degrees of assault on an unborn child, which are similar to assault in the first and second degrees.

"Unborn children deserve the same legal protection as live born persons," Murkowski said. "This bill broadens the Alaska Criminal Code by granting rights to those who need them the most.

"Science has proven that any harm done to a mother carrying an unborn child endangers that child," Murkowski said. "And it would be beyond reproach to deny them the same protections we do to those who carry them into life."

The bill defines "unborn child" as a member of the species Homo sapiens, at any stage of development, who is carried in the womb.

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

348 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Record (Bergen County, NJ)

June 15, 2006 Thursday
All Editions

Horrors of human trafficking; Congress hears women sold into forced labor or sex

BYLINE: By HERB JACKSON, WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENT, North Jersey Media Group

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. A01

LENGTH: 808 words

Irina Veselykh thought she'd be able to pay off her alcoholic husband's debts. Masha Gnezdilova was excited by the chance to learn other languages and see another country.

But the high-paying jobs waiting tables and cleaning houses that lured them from Russia to Germany were a mirage. Instead, the women were forced to work as prostitutes by pimps who took their passports, beat them, sold them to other pimps, and threatened to injure relatives back in Russia if they escaped.

The two eventually did escape back to Russia, however, and were able to tell their tales -- echoes of which have been heard in North Jersey recently -- at a Congressional hearing Wednesday organized by Rep. Christopher Smith, R-N.J.

"An estimated 17,000 foreign citizens are trafficked into the U.S. each year with more than 600,000 bought, sold or smuggled across other international borders -- all to be exploited through forced labor or commercial sex exploitation," said Smith, chairman of the House human rights subcommittee and author of three bills enacted since 2000 to fight human trafficking.

The hearing focused on global issues, and included horror stories from Africa and Asia told by actress Julia Ormond, goodwill ambassador for the abolition of slavery and human trafficking for the United Nations. She described meeting victims as young as 5 years old, and one 12-year-old girl who was seven months pregnant.

"There are clients who seek HIV assurances who pay large sums so they are assured they are provided with virgins. These girls are then raped repeatedly and then sold off," Ormond said.

But human trafficking is not only happening overseas.

Last month, a federal investigation run out of Newark led to the arrest of more than 60 people for smuggling Mexican women to work as prostitutes in brothels from Union City to Virginia. Last July, federal authorities charged a Cliffside Park woman and nine partners with smuggling 30 women and girls from Honduras to Hudson County, where they were forced to work as virtual slaves in bars in Union City and Guttenberg.

Smith said in an interview there is growing anecdotal evidence that American girls who run away from home are being preyed upon.

"These traffickers spot them at the mall with their eagle eyes, rape them, drug them, beat them and threaten them, and it doesn't take long before they're being carted to Atlantic City for boxing matches and to other venues where large numbers of guys congregate," Smith said. He noted that a bill he drafted that President Bush signed in January includes $50 million in grants to local law enforcement to combat such crimes.

During Wednesday's hearing, Smith praised the efforts by Chris Christie, the U.S. attorney for New Jersey, to make fighting human trafficking a priority, and questioned a State Department witness about how much pressure other nations are applying.

Earlier this month, the State Department's "Trafficking in Persons Report" listed 12 nations as "Tier 3," having the worst records on human trafficking, including Belize and Venezuela in the Western Hemisphere and Saudi Arabia, the United States' ally in the Middle East. Another 32 nations are on a Tier 2 "watch list."

Referring to the Russian victims' testimony, Smith wondered openly how many more women are facing their fate right now as Germany, a Tier 1 country which has legalized prostitution, hosts the World Cup soccer tournament.

"World Cup matches have become a catalyst and magnet for sex trafficking into Germany," Smith said. He noted that over the weekend, Agence France Press reported that police in Latvia arrested a man suspected of selling at least six women to German brothels for 400 euros, or about $500, each.

"I am aware that the German government is supporting public awareness efforts regarding trafficking," Smith said.

"This is a somewhat absurd effort given that the legalized prostitution infrastructure is gearing up to expand its capacity during the World Cup and there is every reason to believe that the 'new recruits' will be trafficked women and girls. I see this as flagrant state complicity."

A statement issued by the German Embassy said that fighting trafficking has always been a high priority, and police have stepped up efforts to combat it during the World Cup.

Veselykh said she had little faith in police, since they had been working with her pimps. After she escaped into the Netherlands using a fake Lithuanian passport her captors had gotten for her to show German authorities, she spent five months in a Dutch jail for entering the country with forged documents.

"I provided all the information I knew about the traffickers but instead I became a perpetrator and was arrested and put in jail," she said. "The people who involved me in that situation are still free and continue to traffic women under government cover."

E-mail: jackson@northjersey.com

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: COLOR PHOTO, GETTY IMAGES - Actress Julia Ormond, goodwill ambassador for the U.N., with Rep. Christopher Smith as she described victims of human trafficking.

PHOTO, ASSOCIATED PRESS - "There are clients who ... pay large sums so they are assured they are provided with virgins," Julia Ormond told a House panel. She said she met a 5-year-old victim and a 12-year-old who was pregnant.

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

349 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Worldstream

June 15, 2006 Thursday 10:34 AM GMT

Microsoft awards $1US million in grants to six Asian countries to fight human trafficking

BYLINE: By TERESA CEROJANO, Associated Press Writer

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 340 words

DATELINE: MANILA Philippines

Microsoft Corp. has awarded over $1US million (euro800,000) in grants to organizations in six Asian countries to provide computer skills in a bid to protect people most vulnerable to human trafficking, the software giant said Thursday.

The "Unlimited Potential" grants against human trafficking were distributed in Cambodia, India, Indonesia, the Philippines, Singapore and Thailand, Lori Forman, Microsoft Asia's community affairs director, said in a telephone interview.

"We believe that technology can help reduce part of Asia's human trafficking tragedy," she said.

The program aims to help human trafficking victims and those vulnerable to offers of money from traffickers who would sell them into forced labor or sexual slavery to gain computer skills needed to get jobs.

Microsoft wants to "reach out both to those who are vulnerable to trafficking in a prevention mode, and also to those who have been victims of trafficking in reintegration efforts," Forman said.

Forman said the NGOs from the six selected countries will spinoff the program, benefiting 130 community technology learning centers that will train about 100,000 people in the region over the next three years, including Sri Lanka, Bangladesh, Nepal and Vietnam.

Cambodia, Indonesia and India are included in the U.S. State Department watch list of countries with high or significantly increasing rates of human trafficking, and which have failed to combat the problem.

The Philippines and Thailand belong to the tier of countries one notch higher, whose governments do not fully comply with international standards but are exerting significant efforts to meet them. Singapore has a good record but is host to a large community of migrant workers.

Microsoft is contributing a total of $9US.2 million (euro7.32 million) this year to help Asian countries battle human trafficking, cyber crimes, child exploitation, and improve computer skills for better chances of employment, Forman said.

On the Net:

Microsoft Unlimited Potential Program: <http://www.microsoft.com/citizenship>

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 Associated Press
All Rights Reserved

350 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Federal News Service

June 14, 2006 Wednesday

HEARING OF THE AFRICA, GLOBAL HUMAN RIGHTS AND INTERNATIONAL OPERATIONS SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS COMMITTEE SUBJECT: MODERN DAY SLAVERY: SPOTLIGHT ON THE 2006 TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT, FORCED LABOR, AND SEX TRAFFICKING AT THE WORLD CUP

CHAired BY: REPRESENTATIVE CHRISTOPHER SMITH (R-NJ)

WITNESSES: JULIA ORMOND, GOODWILL AMBASSADOR FOR THE ABOLITION OF SLAVERY AND HUMAN TRAFFICKING, UNITED NATIONS OFFICE ON DRUGS AND CRIME;

JOHN MILLER, DIRECTOR, OFFICE TO COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS, DEPARTMENT OF STATE;

PANEL II: SHARON COHN, VICE PRESIDENT OF INTERVENTIONS, INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE MISSION;

MASHA GNEZDILOVA, RUSSIAN TRAFFICKING VICTIM;

IRINA VESELYKH, RUSSIAN TRAFFICKING VICTIM;

CHARLES KERNAGHAN, DIRECTOR, NATIONAL LABOR COMMITTEE

LOCATION: 2172 RAYBURN HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING, WASHINGTON, D.C.

SECTION: CAPITOL HILL HEARING

LENGTH: 25538 words

REP. CHRISTOPHER SMITH (R-NJ): Before we begin the hearing, first of all I want to welcome all of you to this hearing on human trafficking.

As you know, we have Julia Ormond, who is the United Nations Special Ambassador, Goodwill Ambassador for Human Trafficking and Slavery, who has traveled around the world, has been to most recently has been to India. She has also been to Ghana, and to other places, raising this modern-day slavery where men and women are coerced -- or by force, fraud or coercion, are either sex-trafficked or find themselves in bonded labor or some other condition that is the equivalent of slavery.

She has done a magnificent job and is just really coming out of the blocks in terms of her work. We invited her here to be at our hearing today, with Ambassador John Miller, who heads up the Trafficking In Persons office, because we in the United States have tried in the last six years to make a major push through prevention, prosecution of traffickers and protection of the women, to do all humanly possible, mutually reinforcing policies to protect and to prosecute, like I said, those who engage in this heinous practice.

Very briefly by way of background, my name is Chris Smith. I chair the Africa Global Human Rights International Operations Committee. I am the author of the three Trafficking Victims Protections Act -- the 2000 Act, the 2003 Act and the 2005 Act -- the results of an enormous amount of bipartisanship and really, it is the Congress at its best. We were able to come together and put together a comprehensive strategy. For the '05 Act we will be spending some $361 million over two years on this effort to rescue women -- mostly women and children from the traffickers.

But I would like to ask Julia Ormond if she would say a word, and then John very briefly, and then we will get to the hearing and maybe answer a question or two.

Ambassador.

MS. JULIA ORMOND: Hi. I would basically like to thank Representative Chris Smith and also the United Nations for giving me this role and this opportunity to speak against trafficking and slavery. I believe this is one of the most heinous problems that we face in the world today. It is a far bigger problem than I realized when I was first asked to do it, and it's something that I have become increasingly passionate about, and I think we're faced with a time where, instead of continuing to be overwhelmed about it, with systemic change we can make great strides against it, and I thank you for the opportunity.

REP. SMITH: John.

MR. JOHN MILLER: Thank you, Julia Ormond, for taking the lead on this issue. And Congressman Smith, you have been there from the beginning. Every year, we discover more and more about this horrendous challenge that affects every country in the world, including the United States of America. But if you look at convictions of traffickers worldwide, and you look at the new shelters being set up for trafficking victims and the countries passing anti-trafficking legislation, just brought out in our current report, there are signs that we're starting to make progress. And what I think everybody is here about is how do we nurture and generate a 21st century abolitionist movement to end modern-day slavery?

REP. SMITH: A question or two? If not, we'll get straight to the hearing. Thank you so much, and please do stay for -- you'll hear some very, very -- I think -- riveting testimony, starting with Ambassador Ormond and with others who will be testifying, including two victims who have made their way from Russia to be with us here today, as well as some internationally-recognized experts on human trafficking. So thank you for being here.

Good morning, everyone. Today's proceeding will begin first as a briefing, and then we'll proceed to an actual hearing. Just protocol dictates that when we have a representative from the United Nations, that it be technically called a briefing. We've done this in the past, it has worked extremely well, and I do want to again thank Ambassador Ormond for being here and for the United Nations for playing this constructive role as they are doing so well on the issue of human trafficking.

Good morning, the subcommittee will hear expert testimony today concerning the scourge of human trafficking -- modern-day slavery. As indeed many people know by now, the United States government estimates that between 600,000 to 800,000 women, children and men are brought and sold across international borders each year, and exploited through forced labor or commercial sex exploitation, and potentially millions more are trafficked internally within the borders of countries. Eighty percent of the victims are women and girls. An estimated 14,500 to 17,500 foreign citizens are trafficked into the United States each and every year.

And now we know well that many American girls and young woman, many of whom start out as runaways, are bought, sold, abused and raped through the United States. To combat -- I would just note parenthetically -- to combat the exploitation of American girls, the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2005 not only requires the Attorney General to conduct prevalent studies of sex trafficking and unlawful commercial sex acts in the U.S. but the new law requires both the secretary of Health and Human Services and the attorney general to prepare reports on best practices to reduce demand.

For the first time, the new law also authorizes $20 million for HHS grants programs for U.S. victims, $10 million for long-term residential treatment facilities, and provides $50 million for a new grants program for state and local law enforcement. In the past, we have focused primarily on international trafficking. Since the enactment of this law, we're refocusing -- not losing the focus on the international side, but realizing we have our own internal trafficking problem that must be ended.

Today's hearing will focus on the findings of the State Department's sixth Annual Trafficking In Persons Report, with a focus on progress made and on the significant challenges ahead.

The committee is indeed privileged to have as our special guest Julia Ormond, in her capacity as the U.N. Goodwill Ambassador for the Abolition of Slavery and Human Trafficking. Ms. Ormond has traveled to Ghana, India, Cambodia and Thailand to raise awareness about the horrors of human trafficking.

Ms. Ormond has been a leader on a number of humanitarian issues, including AIDS and refugee issues. She is the founding chair of Film Aid International, and is well known for her film roles in numerous movies, including "Legends of the Fall", "Sabrina", "First Knight" -- which is my favorite -- "Barbara of Siberia", "Iron-Jawed Angels" and many, many others. Ms. Ormond is also the executive producer of a 1996 Emmy-award winning documentary called "A Calling of the Ghosts", a story about two women in Bosnia caught in war, where rape was as much an every-day weapon as bullets and bombs. We are extremely honored and privileged to have her here with us today.

This is also the second of a two-part series of hearings on sex trafficking in connection with the World Cup Soccer Championship.

Ladies and gentlemen of the committee, the traffickers who use and abuse human beings as commodities to be bought and sold must be tracked down, their nefarious operations crushed and the individuals who commit their heinous crimes sent to jail for a long, long time.

All profits derived from selling women and children into slavery must be seized and put to good use, like providing some semblance of restitution to the victims, or for the construction of shelters. The TIP report itself, as most of us know by now, is mandated by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 which was signed in October of 2000. In 2003 we sponsored the expansion of that Act, and as I indicated earlier, on January 10th, President Bush signed into law still another bill that expands significantly the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000.

These pieces of legislation have created a comprehensive framework for combating trafficking in persons abroad, the trafficking of foreign nationals in the United States, and the domestic trafficking of our own citizens. As a result, the U.S. has become a leader in addressing this human rights violation, whilst simultaneously encouraging other governments to do the same.

Since taking office, the Bush administration has devoted more than $40 million to combat trafficking in more than 149 countries. The new law authorizes an additional $361 million, over two years, to expand those efforts. Across the globe, governments are taking action to prevent trafficking, to prosecute the exploiters, and to give hope and restoration to those victimized by trafficking.

With 4,700 convictions worldwide this year alone, the heinous crime of trafficking is at long last being punished, but still more needs to be done. In the last two years alone, convictions have topped 7,700, because a significant portion of U.S. foreign assistance is now contingent on whether a nation is making basic minimum standards specifically prescribed by the three TPVAs to prevent trafficking, protect victims and prosecute traffickers. Forty-one countries in the last year alone have passed tough new laws to end this modern-day slavery. Shelters have been set up for victims. NGOs and faith communities have reached out to help heal survivors of trafficking.

I want to applaud Ambassador John Miller for keeping trafficking in the forefront of our human rights agenda, and for the progress that we are making. I also welcome the emphasis on forced labor in this year's report. Forced labor in which people are enslaved and exploited for purposes of labor often within their own countries is infrequently mentioned, but affects anywhere from 4 (million) to 27 million people worldwide. In places such as Saudi Arabia, Syria, Brazil, Jordan, Kuwait and Taiwan, all ranked as either Tier 3 or on the Tier 2 Watch List in this year's report, foreign migrant workers or those in -- these countries own citizens are trapped and held in slave-like working conditions. Not only must the victims be freed and properly compensated, their employers must be held responsible, and forced labor punished for the heinous crime that it is.

While the TIP report is good, the best yet I would submit, having read from cover to cover each and every one of them, and studied it, I am nevertheless disappointed that the State Department has failed to place India on Tier 3 with other governments which are not making significant anti-trafficking efforts. Millions of men, women and children, predominantly from India's Dalit caste are in debt bondage, and face involuntary servitude in brick kilns, rice mills and zari embroidery factories.

India's placement on Tier 2 Watch List for the third consecutive year, despite its failure to create a national law enforcement response to the crime of trafficking, and its blatant unwillingness to address the massive problems of bonded labor and trafficking-related corruption, reeks of political considerations with the Department of State overriding the facts about human trafficking. The Watch List, I would submit, was created by my legislation to send a clear warning and enable egregious offenders to make specific reforms. It is not a place to hide our friends who fail to make real improvements.

It is also deeply troubling that while some countries not only turn a blind eye to trafficking, others embrace inhumane policies that actually facilitate or encourage the very crime they profess to abhor. Athletes and fans, as we all know, gathering in Germany for one of the premier worldwide sporting events of our day, the 2006 FIFA World Cup, which opened last Friday -- and many of us have already watched a number of those games on ESPN over the weekend -- over the course of one month at 12 venues throughout Germany, national soccer teams will be competing, and as we know, it is a scatter-sited competition. Millions of fans will join in the festivities.

For most soccer fans like myself, this quadrennial event is the showcase of world-class athleticism and teamwork, but looming in its shadow is the very real threat that the World Cup matches have become a catalyst and a magnet for sex-trafficking into Germany. Those that work with victims report that trafficking for the so-called sex industry often heightens during major sports events. In Germany, the problem is exacerbated by the legalization of prostitution.

Archbishop Agostino Marchetto, secretary of the Vatican's Pontifical Council for Migrants and Travelers, in a June 8th interview, observed that in Germany, many women are forced into prostitution. Quote, "This is a fundamental human rights violation," he said. Women have become market commodities which can be bought and they cost less than a ticket for a football match.

For the last year, the German government has prepared for the World Cup, coordinating security efforts with all neighboring countries, and attending to a myriad of details associated with such international events. Traffickers have also worked overtime to exploit this opportunity to improve their illicit revenues through the expected rise in demand in the so-called sex industry.

Sadly, this is not idle speculation. AFP reported over the weekend that police in Latvia arrested a man suspected of selling at least six women to German brothels. Latvian and German police collaborated in a month-long investigation, in which the suspect allegedly paid his friend 100 euros for each woman found. He, in turn, was paid 400 euros per woman by the German brothel.

We will hear testimony today from two women who have traveled from Russia to tell us about their horrific experiences being trafficked in Germany. Ms Masha Gnezdilova and Ms. Irina Veselykh were deceived by offers of non-existent jobs in Germany, their passports seized, being raped, and forced to work as prostitutes controlled by the Russian (media ?).

I will just point out parenthetically as well that during the February meeting of the OSCE Parliamentary Assembly -- and I serve as head of delegation -- I raised this issue with our German counterparts and raised it in the plenary session and was met with an enormous amount of derision by some of the members of parliament who thought that we were -- we should not be raising these kinds of issues. I would point out that, of approximately (400 ?) prostitutes in Germany, it is estimated that 75 percent of those who are abused in these houses of prostitution are foreigners, and many of those same women are raped, and they are just cruelly mistreated, and if they could, they would leave.

Add to that the approximately 40,000 -- that's one estimate -- that is expected to have been brought in by force, fraud or coercion, trafficked to part of the houses of prostitutions' offering. The Trafficking Victims Protection Act in the State Department gave Germany a Tier 1 rating again this year, and frankly, I think that missed the mark as well, and I know that I have raised that with Ambassador Miller on a number of occasions. Maybe he will speak to that during his testimony.

Let me just conclude by saying that one other area that we have -- this committee and I personally have spent a lot of time on -- we've had two hearings of our committee so far on the U.N. complicity -- U.N. peacekeepers' complicity in trafficking and the abuse of young girls, especially in the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

I want to say that we heard from Jane Holl Lute, who came down from the United Nations, and we know that others within the U.N. system are trying extremely hard to excise this blight. As she said, that the blue helmets when she testified, have become black and blue, and she is determined to rid all forms of trafficking and exploitation from the United States, as are many others within the U.N. system, and that's something -- whether it be military deployments under the NATO, U.S. or any other banner, trafficking in that context needs to be stopped.

I want to applaud President Bush. In 2002, he issued an executive order that calls for zero tolerance within the United States military with regards to trafficking, and the uniform code of military justice recently has been reformed to include even prostitution as an actual offence. And hopefully that will lead to fewer women being treated -- by either U.S. servicemen or by any nation, because we do need to lead by example.

I'd like to now turn to my friend and colleague, Tom Tancredo for any opening comments he might have. Tom?

REP. THOMAS TANDREDO (R-CO): (Off mike.)

REP. SMITH: No? Okay. Thank you.

And again, I've already briefly introduced Ambassador Julia Ormond, but just let me say how delighted this committee is to have her as our witness today, to provide insights from her trips, and the work the United Nations is doing, and she, personally, on behalf of the victims of human trafficking.

Ambassador Ormond, the floor is yours.

MS. ORMOND: (Off mike.) Is that better? Yeah.

Mr. Chairman, distinguished members of the committee and staff, good morning. On behalf of the United Nations Office of Drugs and Crime, and its Executive Director Antonio Maria Costa, who unfortunately could not join me here today, I thank you very warmly for convening this hearing.

As the U.N.'s Goodwill Ambassador to combat human trafficking and slavery, I recently, as you said, had the opportunity to visit Ghana, India, Cambodia and Thailand. I am deeply grateful to all parties for the opportunity to testify this morning about my insights and observations during those travels. I'm going to give an abbreviated version of the written testimony -- I just wanted to say that.

Honorable members of Congress, we applaud your outstanding efforts to combat modern-day slavery, your passage of the landmark Victims of Trafficking and Violent Protection law and subsequent legislation, and are grateful to the United States government for providing in 2005 alone, over 25 million (dollars) in voluntary contributions for UNODC's work, of which over $2 million were allocated for our anti-human trafficking efforts.

I have learnt that in the realm of trafficking, the solutions lie in finding culturally-appropriate answers that reflect not only a country's present circumstance, but specifically embrace that culture's history and, often, our intertwined history. On my recent trip to India, I learnt about the different range of debt bondage, and how it keys into trafficking and modern-day slavery. Debt bondage in India exists in different levels, and as opposed to debt, it is illegal. Culturally, however, even in its severest form, the practice often is not regarded as slavery.

Thankfully, India is now enjoying enormous economic expansion, overcoming the aftermath, for instance, of British Colonial Policy which has hugely contributed to India's current challenges and relationship to trafficking and modern-day slavery.

The 2000 U.N. Convention against Transnational Organized Crime contains the Anti-Trafficking Protocol which lays out a holistic strategy referred to as the Three Ps: prevention, protection and prosecution. And to this list, I would like to add my own fourth P: prioritization. Of course, I am on a learning curve as the UNODC Goodwill Ambassador. However, in a short amount of time, one crucial reality has become clear to me: governments and only governments are uniquely situated to reverse the course of trafficking. Thousands of extraordinary NGOs -- non-governmental organizations -- are providing incredibly effective rehabilitation for the victims, and while they can be supportive, they cannot attack the problems at source in the same way the governments can; especially the United States.

We know that trafficking involves millions of people, and produces billions of dollars rivaling the drug trade. We also know that criminals are shifting from the trafficking of weapons and drugs, into the trafficking of people -- especially children -- because it is easy to get away with, and because unless we prioritize, the traffickers will profit.

While we commit to the eradication of global poverty, the lack of economic opportunity and lack of free education worldwide remain key contributory factors. For example, in recent years, Thailand has made great strides to offer and sustain girls' education, which greatly has reduced the number of Thai girls falling victim to trafficking. However, the hill tribes in Thailand remain especially vulnerable, due to an inability to speak Thai which hugely impacts their educational options.

Today we shall hear a testimony from Masha and Irina, two Russian women, who themselves were victims of trafficking. I commend them for their courage and I thank them for being here today. They stand with many women globally who believe that they are departing for better opportunities and promises of decent salaries as household help, waitresses or teachers and, instead, they end up forced into prostitution.

Part of my role is to talk to these victims, when they are willing, about their experiences. In Cambodia and Thailand, I spoke with many such women, children and men, the vast majority of whom had specifically been trafficked into forced prostitution. The conversations are always painful, and I'm still learning. I believe though that it's important to appreciate the level of abuse that virtually always goes hand-in-hand with being trafficked. The reality is that not everyone survives this ordeal. These people are often functionally invisible. They lack either birth records through lack of birth registration, or citizenship, or they lack legal status in a country.

Not surprisingly, invisible people are incredibly disposable. Victims and survivors and NGOs ask that I carry their message to others that may be in a position to effect change.

I've met with many girls and women from many shelters, some girls so young it was just hard to comprehend their fate -- girls as young as five, seven and 12, who'd been victims of rape, then sold into prostitution.

There is a specific phenomena in this era of the HIV/AIDS pandemic. Clients seeking HIV-negative assurances will pay large sums to buy very young girls who are promised to be virginal. Over the period of a week, these girls are raped repeatedly by their client. The girls then are returned to the brothel, only to be taken to clinics where they are sewn up and sold again. This cycle can be repeated as many as eight or nine times before the girl enters the life of forced prostitution.

Other girls talked of being chained by their relatives in order to force them to enter marriage or prostitution. Some NGOs in one Asian country reported that it's common for girls to be electrocuted, drugged, beaten -- with or without instruments. One girl lost a finger for supposedly not satisfying a client. It's common to be stripped naked and caged with snakes and insects such as scorpions and millipedes, placed not just in the cage with them, but into their mouths and private parts as punishment. These girls often die from the stings and bites.

I believe it is worth reminding ourselves that this is what is termed as "force and coercion" in the Protocol Against Trafficking in Persons, and it's worth our absorbing that reality for the individuals concerned.

Sexual abuse is often present in many different types of trafficking. One of the last girls I met with in India had been trafficked into domestic service. She is 12. She is the victim of rape by five different men. She is seven-months' pregnant.

Trafficking is not just women and girls; there are many male victims too. In Thailand, I spoke with a boy who'd been trafficked into the fishing industry. He escaped by spending two days floating at sea on a barrel before, luckily, being rescued. In India, I met with boys who were trafficked into the carpet loom industry; one particular boy who had been enslaved for 10 years, since he was five years old. He showed me scars from beatings with implements from when he had tried to escape. He told of having a cut finger placed in boiling water in place of proper medical treatment.

In Ghana, I recently visited Yeji, and worked with a local non-governmental organization called Apple which investigates the child slavery around Lake Volta and the fishing villages. Children -- some as young as four years old -- are made to dive in dangerous and extremely cold water to untangle nets. They are beaten with oars when they surface for breath, and then they are forced to dive again.

One recalled intense memories of his nose bleeding because he was forced to dive deeper and deeper. Another described how he would calm the fish by placing his fingers in their eye sockets and pressing, and how you had to avoid getting your fingers trapped in the gills of the fish or the fish could overpower you and may drown you. When I asked him how big the fish were, his arms spread wide. I think we need to imagine that life.

Someone said to me that if people aren't finding evidence of trafficking, then they're not looking. It's everywhere, and it affects us all. But this is not yet another global problem that cannot be solved. I don't want anyone to leave believing that there are no solutions. There are fantastic models out there, and they are working.

Business communities and NGOs are stepping up to take responsibility. The Cocoa Protocol put together by Free the Slaves demonstrates the cocoa industry's commitment to bringing slave-free labor practices to the Ivory Coast and Ghana. Microsoft's initiative of worldwide training for police on computer-facilitated crimes against children is another excellent initiative.

Close to 1,000 children have been released from Lake Volta. In Cambodia, an NGO called Hagar provides such a fabulously comprehensive approach, showing that rehabilitated victims can take on skills training and work in profitable businesses -- from design to catering to soy product manufacturing -- to such a successful degree that they now sell some of their products in Neiman Marcus. Hagar also helped an 11-year-old girl stand before a judge and send her trafficker to prison for 17 years.

Nothing is more moving to me than the resilience and spiritual strength shown by victims. Those girls who suffered mercilessly have been helped to re-find their voices and joyfully sing about walking into the light. The terrifyingly young girls whose virginity was repeatedly stripped from them have found the dignity and grace to sing of the flowering that is our passage to womanhood.

We as men and women must do everything in our power to support the shelter's work and make it the safety net for victims, not rely on the victims to deliver the solution of piecemeal prosecution. The media has played a phenomenal role in bringing this issue to the public's attention. So often issues don't get traction because politicians feel that the public hasn't shown that it cares enough, but the media have ensured that the public knows about this issue, and the public definitely cares.

We must appreciate that while modern-day slavery and trafficking is a global issue, it is also in our backyard. We must make trafficking a priority, we must focus on solutions, and we must allocate the resources needed to achieve the vision allowed by the anti-trafficking protocol.

Together, we can all achieve these goals, strategically and financially, and to that end, I look forward to working with you all. Thank you, and I will be glad to answer any questions.

REP. SMITH: Thank you very much, Ambassador, for that very eloquent statement, and for the written submission -- without objection, which will be made a part of the record, which went into even more detail, and I frankly, wish you had taken the time to do it all, because it is filled with riveting cases, individual examples that -- some of which you began to cite orally, so thank you so much for your leadership. I do have a couple of questions.

I know that you visited Cambodia. Cambodia is one of those countries that the Trafficking in Persons report has moved off the Tier 3 egregious violator list to Tier 2 Watch List and the point is made in the monologue in the report that during the last year, the Cambodian government stepped up efforts to arrest, prosecute and convict traffickers, that the Cambodian Government made clear progress in its anti-trafficking law enforcement efforts. It did provide -- and this is a negative -- only limited assistance to victims, and they made modest efforts to promote awareness on the prevention side.

And I was wondering if you might share some additional insights that you had with regards to Cambodia?

It would appear after being tone-deaf in previous years, the Cambodian authorities are finally getting it, and I think your visit probably helped spur them along.

MS. ORMOND: Thank you. I would definitely say that the sense from Cambodia was that they had definitely made progress. There was movement. But from the NGOs, the feeling was that it really needed to step up, that it needed to continue on that path.

My own experience of Cambodia was, I think, a reflection of 40 years of civil war, and a particularly violent form of trafficking.

A particular focus was asked from the NGOs for the children, and to specifically do something about the children and their rape incidences that I talked about. So yes, they have moved forward, but they need to do a great deal more.

REP. SMITH: Okay. Let me just raise another country that has the serious problem as a source country, and that is Russia. And I say this -- we have with us today Dr. Juliette Engel who is the founder of Miramed, and has done an enormous amount of work in rescuing young girls in Russia, and has helped us with our witnesses today, and she herself testified at our hearing just a few months ago. I'll never -- you know, one of the things that your goodwill ambassador position, I think, can do is help wake up member states of the United Nations, that they have a problem.

I mean, our embassies are trying to do it, other parliamentarians with whom I've met with and my colleagues have met with, we raise it every time we have a dialog with them. And I'll never forget in 1999, I was at a parliamentary assembly of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, and I offered a resolution on human trafficking, and was met with such utter disbelief by the Russian delegation, the Ukrainians and others. One year later at a parliamentary assembly -- similar venue in terms of debate on issues -- they joined in and were on board, so to speak, having seen in the short of a year.

One of the things that Dr. Engel has done so well is to bring witnesses forward so -- not only to help them obviously get their lives back together and to rescue them, but also to help us and others really know the human face of a trafficked woman.

I remember in '99 my wife Marie and I and members of our staff, meeting with woman, who had been trafficked, for about three hours as they told their stories, and there wasn't a dry eye among any of us, and that became the mobilizing -- you know, it became a priority, or other P for me and for others as we met with those trafficked women. And I'm wondering how you might be able to bring that message to the diplomats in New York? You know, they deal with a lot of issues. You know, Iran is on the docket. There are so many issues.

But this issue is tearing the heart out of women, especially women, each and every day, causing new victims every day. And as we all know after the sale of drugs, the trafficking of women is either second or third in terms of a money-maker for organized crime.

So maybe you might want to speak to that, whether or not at the U.N. itself you're able to reach out to diplomats. And secondly, if you do make a trip to Russia, I would hope that you would visit Miramed and the good work of the Angel Coalition in Moscow and throughout Russia.

MS. ORMOND: I would be happy to explore anything with the U.N. in terms of approaching diplomats. We actually did start with a trip to Russia prior to the ceremony that made me the goodwill ambassador. I believe that every -- in my experience, every member state has its own level of denial or understanding of how their own specific culture makes certain people vulnerable to trafficking.

I have a particular soft spot for Russia because I've worked there many times, and I feel that a great deal can be done in terms of public service announcements and educating people, but I know that on one of the occasions that -- one of the times that I worked there, a survey was being done in the 1990s that asked Russian children what they wanted to be when they grew up, and 60 percent of 14-year-old boys said they wanted to be hard-currency taxi drivers, and 60 percent of 14-year-old girls said they wanted to become hard-currency prostitutes. And I think that it's a real reflection of the economic instability that Russians faced in terms of how people were desperate for an out.

But I think what has happened is that has been -- that has changed over time to people wanting valid work and being duped into being trafficked.

REP. SMITH: Okay. You know, I would hope -- and you are probably already doing this -- that you and your office will avail themselves of the good reporting that is done by our missions -- the U.S. missions abroad -- because part of the data collection that goes into the TIP report, all of which obviously does not end up on the pages of the report itself, might be very useful and that kind of collaboration could expand, because I know that you put out your own report just a few months ago --

MS. ORMOND: Yes.

REP. SMITH: -- which I think was a very, very good effort as well.

Let me just finally ask the question with regards to -- you made the point that "functionally invisible people are disposable." Boy, that is a very powerful phrase. You also point out and make mention that the lack of language skills often prevents victims from escaping their abuse. Would you spend a moment or two speaking about the educational issues; particularly of the girl child, which certainly is one of the ways, we know that micro-credit lending and all of that is helpful as they're a little older. It would seem to me that the earlier we start with education, the better.

MS. ORMOND: In particular with the hill tribes, one of the things that I encountered was that there are some 30 different languages within the hill tribes, so you need more than 30 teachers to go to the hill tribes and teach, and for the Thai government, they have a huge drop-out rate. When they take somebody from the hill tribe and they educate them in Thai, that person has incredible pressure on them to then drop out of teaching and go and take other work, say in Bangkok.

But what I also did discover is that within the shelters, the young girls who have gone through the experience of being rescued and being rehabilitated are very keen to become advocates and to go on to take on the role -- relate very much to the women who are working in the centers. And I believe it would be possible with education of them to take the girls who were the victims of trafficking, educate them in Thai, and have them become teachers and advocates who have a much greater sense of their need to be there, who could teach the hillside for instance, Thai.

What I find from the trips is that if you can look at it from a culturally-appropriate perspective, maybe you can help them not dishonor their culture, but maintain their culture, but still find a solution.

If I may, in India, one of the things that keys into India's problems is the dowry system, and mothers or fathers who fall into debt because they have to produce a dowry for their daughters. And I think rather than trying to change that cultural system, it's for us to find a way to provide a different loan system.

REP. SMITH: You mentioned in your testimony that many victims suffer from the Battered-wife Syndrome. Could you elaborate on that a bit and if you also could speak to your trip to Ghana, which -- I have read about it, but if you could just share that with the subcommittee?

MS. ORMOND: Absolutely. Battered-wife syndrome and the Stockholm syndrome, these are syndromes where somebody who has been a victim, who has been traumatized, are so traumatized that they don't easily acknowledge or sometimes don't recognize the level of trauma that they've been under. They don't -- they have a different relationship to abuse. They don't always behave in a way that we might expect a victim to behave.

I think we can maybe all relate to it in terms of the playground bully. You may have had the experience where you fulfill the playground bully's desires rather than constantly fight them. I think women who have been put in these situations are -- they sometimes take months to actually acknowledge, either to the police or to shelters, that they have even been a trafficking victim, because it disables their ability to recognize it.

I have also talked to victims in California who, for instance, have gone to testify but haven't spoken out in defense of their case, because they're not ready yet as a victim. So what the NGOs are dealing with is giving people -- allowing people to have a safe space within the shelter to get over those things emotionally. For a lot of the children, the first step that they take is to just learn how to play again, and what is regarded as a first sign that somebody is recovering, is for them to smile.

REP. SMITH: Let me just (inquire ?) before yielding to my colleague Tom Tancredo. The $2 million that you did mention -- what kind of programs does your organization actually engage in, besides the good work that you do?

MS. ORMOND: They are involved in shelters. They are -- there are different offices of the U.N. that cover trafficking. The United Nations Office of Drugs and Crime is the custodian of the Protocol, but it intersects with many different offices, with Refugees, with UNICEF, to name but a few -- a couple.

They are also working on education. There was one particular program that I was very enthusiastic about that I discovered in Asia, which is somebody who is working on computer-based training developing a program that could be extremely effective in teaching not just police, but border patrol, bank, all sorts of different people, from customs to all these other people who intersect essentially with traffickers, and who could intervene. And that is something that the UNODC is very keen on in terms of the educational aspect.

We -- the UNODC also focuses on public service announcements and doing radio public service announcements to educate people on trafficking, educate the public and take a preventative -- preventative start. Those are just a couple of examples.

REP. SMITH: I do have one additional question. Is there more -- especially given your leadership on Film Aid, is there more that you believe Hollywood might be able to do to bring this issue -- I mean, Lifetimes for example, did an excellent mini-series a few months back, that they have run several times since, that really nailed it when it came to exactly what -- as much as anyone can emphasize and portray in film -- what actually happens during the force, the fraud and the coercion of a trafficked women. It was very well done, and I'm wondering if there are some suggestions you might have? It seems to me that public service announcements and using that medium is a way, whether it's through radio or television, to get the message out, as well as through print ads, but is there some recommendations you might have?

MS. ORMOND: Definitely. There is a certain clout that I think people in Hollywood have in terms of getting media attention and getting public attention, but I also think that Hollywood can take a role in terms of if we can rally people to speak to people's own culture.

For instance, in India, I would love to try and have people in Hollywood try and approach people in Bollywood and say, can we work together with you to do something similar with Bollywood, or find who are the culturally-appropriate people who can encourage something internal.

I think that helps take the sting out of it being a message coming in from the outside, and I think that's very important in terms of the solutions having a future and being sustainable.

REP. SMITH: Thank you.

Mr. Tancredo?

REP. TANCREDO: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Almost as an aside, I just was thinking as the Chairman was talking about the various trips he has taken and the one on which I was able to accompany him. We were in Russia, and I remember an incredibly stirring discussion about the degree to which local orphanages were being used by the traffickers and by the people who ran the orphanages. I mean, they were simply like marketplaces, and a bus would pull up and a number of children would be sold and got taken on the bus and taken away. And I wonder -- again, almost as an aside -- just to the question that the Chairman was asking about Russia in particular, has that particular aspect of this phenomena ebbed, or is it still a major problem?

MS. ORMOND: It was something that did come up in my trip to Russia, but I think it was more from the perspective of they were struggling with how to regulate adoption from outside, and deal with trafficking, which I think keyed into keeping children in orphanages. It's not something that I know a great deal about, but I would be really happy to go back to the UNODC and have -- and follow up with a better response.

REP. TANCREDO: Yeah. I mean it was particularly diabolical. The situation was so horrible. I mean, these people were -- I mean, it was a marketplace. That's all I can say. And the people that ran the orphanages were selling their charges -- selling these children -- and literally, buses would pull up, children would be put on the buses, taken away, and never to be seen again. It was just incredible.

I really only have one question about your testimony. In terms of the NGOs that you mentioned and the success stories that we were certainly happy to hear about, I wondered if you could tell us, is there a template that you see there? Is there an NGO or are there NGOs using a particular process to deal with this issue that we should highlight?

Should there be in this report, for instance, a listing of the most successful processes, the most successful interventions and the NGOs that are responsible for them so that perhaps we could emulate them and/or at least highlight them?

MS. ORMOND: Definitely. Hagar is one particular NGO that I mentioned that I think has a fantastic program.

There are many other NGOs, in particular in Thailand and -- and in Cambodia that I visited that are doing fantastic work. And pulling everything together -- people who are taking a holistic approach I think are having the most impact in providing sustainability for either victims or their families, or even in Ghana, the NGO that I worked with was doing fabulous work with traffickers.

I think there are cases that I have seen in -- especially in areas of extreme poverty where a certain amount of empathy that is afforded the traffickers and giving them an out, giving the traffickers themselves skills training so that they have an alternative as well. I encountered families who, frankly the moral dilemma they face is kind of a Sophie's Choice. They have four children. They have -- one way out for them is either to traffic one of their children -- to sell one of their children -- or to traffic a child into their family to work for them.

Those are the kind of moral dilemmas that I guess we don't necessarily face ourselves here, but having an enormous amount of patience in terms of dealing with the situation, revisiting villages again and again and again, seems to me something that is also -- makes it more sustainable.

Absolutely, in any report, we need to acknowledge the solutions that are working. I think that's crucial in terms of then expanding -- expanding those solutions and finding out what -- what does it -- what is the solution, what does it distill down to, what does it come down to in terms of the key contributory factors that make it sustainable.

REP. TANCREDO: Yes. Well, I think that would be really an important thing for us to think about, Mr. Chairman, in terms of encouragement and there are -- it is not to suggest that there are not a lot of people in the business, in the NGO business, who are not -- I mean, they are certainly doing it for the right reason, I don't doubt that, and -- but I think many -- it's been my experience also in working with some that they are floundering themselves looking for ways to deal with it and perhaps something that we could compile would give them that ability, and it would also give people who want to contribute some sort of, you know, list, if you will, of the ones that do a better job and I think should be rewarded by it.

MS. ORMOND: Absolutely. The NGOs that I have met with are crying out for more -- more direct communication with government -- with government in particular, and whether that be their own government or governments in other countries.

I think one of the -- globalization is clearly one of -- this is the dark side of globalization and I think we have to look at it in terms of everybody working together, different governments working with NGOs in different countries and working together to bring, maybe, pressure on their own local government, national government.

REP. TANCREDO: And just as a very last point, as we talk about the movement of children, especially orphans, we have to remember even in our own history there were times when things happened that, for reasons of economics and a variety of other things, that -- well that perhaps make us more sensitive to this whole thing, but there was such a thing in the late 1800s as an orphan train that used to go across the United States. It used to start out in New York and move across to the west.

My wife's grandmother was a person on that -- an orphan train that left New York and was actually picked off the train by a farmer in Montana. People would line up. You know, they would stop at various places, these kids would get off. Farmers would come up and say, yes, that one, and that one, and that one, take them away and off the train would go. And my wife's grandmother ended up in Montana in that process. I mean, that was just an interesting background, I guess, for us to think about.

MS. ORMOND: I do think that there was a phenomena that I encountered, particularly in Cambodia, and it was -- this is anecdotal, it's not something that I have concrete evidence of, but there is a belief that there is a certain amount of adoption of HIV/AIDS orphans going on, and then that child is brought up in the belief that it's a sibling or part of the family and then at a certain point when they are sold they realize that maybe they weren't. And the NGOs are sort of discovering, well maybe this actually wasn't that person's child at all. And they go back and talk to the families and find that it was maybe a different circumstance.

REP. TANCREDO: Well, anyway, thank you very much for your work, Mrs. Ormond.

MS. ORMOND: Thank you.

REP. SMITH: Ambassador Watson?

REP. DIANE E. WATSON (D-CA): (Off mike.)

REP. SMITH: Okay.

Now, a final question. In 1984 I traveled with Jim Grant, the great leader of UNICEF who is probably the father of a Child Survival Revolution to El Salvador and saw first-hand how important it was that faith-based organizations -- in this case it was the Catholic Church -- how important they were in making it possible to get the immunizations and to just disseminate the message very quickly and to get the immunization out to upwards of 200,000 kids.

It was incredible. Eleanor Neggy (ph) and I, and some other members of our staff, my wife and I, were recently in Uganda and saw the great work that churches were doing on the AIDS issue.

Everywhere I and many of my colleagues go, and I am the special rep. for the OSCE Parliamentary Assembly on Trafficking. In addition to meeting with NGOs that are not religiously based, because I think they have an important role to play, and government leaders, and the media, I always try to meet with religiously-based organizations and I have been amazed at the network that exists out there that can be utilized to get a prevention message out from the pulpit, or from the mosque, or from the synagogue, and also to provide shelters.

Eleanor and I were recently in Peru and saw these young Peruvian girls in Lima, who we've asked the TIP office to provide some funding for and I hope they will, but there were these young girls who are learning computer skills, sewing skills -- a vast array of skills -- under the auspices of nuns that were running that shelter.

So I was just wondering, as ambassador for trafficking if you look to meet with religious leaders when you do travel so as to bring them further into the prioritization which, I agree, I'm going to start using four Ps now. I think that's an excellent point. We don't make it a priority. So if you could?

MS. ORMOND: For myself, yes, I would be happy to meet with anybody in society and, absolutely, religious leaders in terms of dealing with this issue. I think they can have a great deal of influence. Yes.

REP. SMITH: It's been my experience, and I won't belabor the point, that they have passion, they have concern for the vulnerable and the weakest, but they also have an infrastructure that's second to none and they always have an audience virtually every weekend regardless of the denomination. So it seems to me that that's one way of reaching masses amounts of people.

But I think they need to be made aware that they have a role to play. So I just respectfully submit that that's something that all of us should be doing more of.

MS. ORMOND: Yes. I mean, I think not only in terms of the infrastructure in terms of shelters, but also their reach and outreach to the business community and to civil society could be useful.

REP. SMITH: Yes, sure. Anything else you would like to add?

MS. ORMOND: I would only add that it would be great if the -- if we could work with the United States government, if the U.N. could work with the United States government to put pressure on other countries to sign and ratify the trafficking protocol, which is the first step to their finding and working on internal legislation.

REP. SMITH: Excellent point.

Thank you, Ambassador Ormond, for your testimony, for your leadership, for bringing a message that is so often overlooked and neglected, especially by governments. You are doing an enormous -- an extraordinary job, and I know that all of us on both sides of the aisle deeply appreciate your leadership and look forward to working with you going forward.

MS. ORMOND: Thank you.

REP. SMITH: Thank you so much.

I would like to now -- this now moves from being a briefing to a hearing, and the hearing will come to order and I would like to invite to the witness table Ambassador John Miller, who is director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, and senior adviser to Secretary of State, Condoleezza Rice on human trafficking.

From 1985 to '93, Ambassador Miller served in the United States House of Representatives from the State of Washington. Prior to this he was active in State and municipal government serving as Assistant Attorney General for the State of Washington.

It is a privilege to have you back, Mr. Ambassador. The floor is yours.

MR. MILLER: Well, Mr. Chairman, it is good to be here with you, Congressman Tancredo, and Congresswoman Watson who we've been at many meeting together.

Mr. Chairman, you've asked me to come and testify about this report. Of course, this report is here because you, years ago when people were only dimly aware of the scourge of modern day slavery, you took the lead in sponsoring the anti-trafficking victim protections legislation and you have continued to lead the way. And we thank you for that.

I have a copy of my written statement for the record and if there is no objection then I will try to talk a little more informally.

This is the sixth annual report. It recognizes that the challenge of modern day slavery exists in every country of the world, including the United States of America. We all have what we call a human trafficking problem. The goal of the report -- I think this was the goal that you and Congress intended. The goal is to spotlight modern day slavery, the work that's being done, the tricks of the slave masters, and to encourage action to throw the traffickers in jail and help the victims.

Now, there are many ways this can be done, and it's not just from evaluating countries. As you know, in our report we have victims' stories, and this report is dedicated -- her picture is on the next to last page -- to a woman from Indonesia, Nour Miyati. Nour Miyati, of course, represents millions who have been held in slavery. She came from Indonesia seeking a better life in the Near East, to work as a domestic to send money back to her family.

I met her at a café in Riad. She had fallen prey to owners who not only worked her 15, 18 hours a day and gave her no pay and no time off, but abused her, beat her. But she was a valuable, quote, commodity, and so when they saw she was sick they took her to the hospital for, quote, repairs, unquote, and at that time it was discovered she had gangrene. In this picture you can see several of her toes and fingers have been amputated.

The case came to light because of that hospital visit, and through a lawyer supplied by the Indonesian Embassy, she has been fighting that case. An initial court case sentenced her, not the perpetrators -- sentenced her -- to 79 lashes. That, I am pleased to report, after a visit to Saudi Arabia, that has been reversed. But Nour Miyati stands for so many other victims in this world.

In addition in this report, as you'll see on page 34, we highlight best practices of countries because we're trying to give positive examples. We give examples from Senegal to Iraq to Romania, and I think, Congressman Tancredo, you hit on this when you said NGOs need to know what's working. This is an initial effort to highlight some efforts. We're going to try to do more on our website which NGOs around the world look at to say, here, this is working here, this is working there.

And then we have a trafficking in persons heroes section. Last year -- Ambassador Ormond has just mentioned Hagar in Cambodia. Last year one of our heroes was the head of Hagar. We have eight or nine heroes this year. Of course there are thousands of heroes but we mention a few.

Now, getting on to the evaluations of countries, we do rank 149 countries that have in the order of 100 victims or more. There are a few countries that still aren't in here. Generally that's because we couldn't get enough information. I believe there's a trafficking problem in every country in the world. There are still a few countries we haven't gotten enough information, and there are some countries that there was not an effective government to be rated.

The sources we use are embassies, NGOs, varying activists, foreign governments, our own visits, the news media. The standards we apply are the standards that you all have set out in the law. Sometimes we're criticized by foreign governments, sometimes we're even criticized by those that look at the report, the standards get criticized. Well, maybe they're too subjective, or whatever. I think they're pretty good standards that you have laid out, and we try to apply those standards, and they're pretty darn detailed.

As I said, the goal is not to punish, it's to bring about action. This year we placed a new emphasis, or more emphasis I should say, on forced labor, along with sex trafficking.

You will see sections on bonded labor. I was personally out in India meeting with victims of bonded labor just a couple of months ago. It's a wide-spread practice in certain parts of the world where generations are held at the same rice mill and brick kiln, as you've mentioned. We do have more emphasis on this. Some countries' governments got lower ratings this year because of inattention to forced labor.

One thing I'd like to highlight, there's a misconception in parts of the world, on the issue of commercial sex, not just under our law but under the U.N. protocol, any child under the age of 18 that's being used for a commercial sex act is considered a victim of trafficking, and this is something we really have to keep in mind.

Now, if you compare this year's report and last year, you mentioned, Mr. Chairman, in your introductory remarks looking around the world that there has been the start of progress. Almost a 50 percent increase in convictions of traffickers world-wide up to 4700. Many more shelters for victims set up. As you said, 41 countries passing anti-trafficking in persons laws and, not surprisingly, reflecting that, there has been a slight increase overall in the ratings. And you'll see that a significant number of the countries that were on Tier 3 last year moved up to Tier 2 Watch List, and a significant number that were on Tier 2 watch list moved up to Tier 2. However, there were also numbers of countries moving down from Tier 2 to Tier 2 Watch List, and Tier 2 Watch List to Tier 3.

I think this Congress very wisely in the revision, I believe it was in 2003, said in effect, we don't want the status quo here. We want to see appreciable progress, increasing efforts, and that's what we've asked for countries.

There are some examples of individual countries doing well. I mean Ecuador that was Tier 3, our first lady jumped into this effort and suddenly there is more investigations underway and a new law. You see United Arab Emirates, it got a lot of criticism last year, and deservedly so, but since being put in Tier 3 have freed almost 7,000 child camel jockeys and working with UNICEF have sheltered them and helped get them back to their original countries. It doesn't mean the problem is solved but it does mean there has been some progress. Jamaica, Greece -- some other examples of countries that have moved down.

However -- there is always a however, right -- you still find questions about the efforts of many major countries. We still have our friend and ally, Saudi Arabia, on Tier 3, and if you look at Tier 2 Watch List, which is -- could be interpreted as a watch list, a warning list, a worry list, there are several countries that you mentioned that have been there before are still there -- Mexico, Russia, India, China -- and some new countries on that list, Tier 2 Watch List, such as Malaysia and Brazil.

So that shows the challenge that we face. Nonetheless -- nonetheless -- in part because of the news media around the world that has increased its coverage; in part because of the attention that the Congress of the United States and our president, whenever he speaks, gives to this issue, I think we are seeing a growing momentum. I think more and more people becoming part of a 21st century abolitionist movement.

I have made enough general comments. Why don't I yield to your specific questions.

REP. SMITH: Thank you very much, Ambassador Miller.

Let me just begin. Immediately, the day before, Chancellor Merkle visited the White House and President Bush, I convened a hearing that focused on the issue of trafficking in Germany as it relates especially to the World Cup which was then several weeks away. At the time we had asked the State Department to provide a witness or two, and regrettably they chose not to.

But I think at least the message was heard at Foggy Bottom that there's a great deal of concern on Capitol Hill about -- and I know you share it, you raised it when the TIP Report was released and I certainly applaud you for that -- with regards to the specter of women from Slavic countries and from Russia, from many countries, being trafficked into Germany for prostitution purposes -- forced prostitution. And our hearing, and all that preceded it, was an appeal to the German government to realize that when you turn women into commodities by legalizing prostitution, women get hurt, they are exploited.

The studies indicate, as you know, Mr. Ambassador, that women who are in prostitution by huge numbers want to get out but feel there is no way out. Seventy-five percent and more would like to leave. Upwards of 80 percent plus are raped, and many of the women who end up in prostitution have some dysfunction that along their life line that led to their finding themselves in that terrible situation -- whether it be an incest or a rape early in their lives, often as a young girl. So there is an acting out that's extremely unhealthy that then is exploited.

So those who, you know, sing the praises of the Happy Hooker, I think, have not looked into the misery that women who have been -- find themselves in prostitution. And the line of demarcation, I would respectfully submit, between prostitution that seemingly is voluntarily and those who are the result of force, fraud and coercion -- trafficking -- is very often very thin and very -- almost obscure in many cases, and you might want to speak to that.

But my question is, knowing that all of this was about to happen, and I know the German government took some remedial efforts to try to prevent it, has the United States, whether it be foreign service officers or others in our mission in Germany, have we beefed up our efforts to chronicle and report on what is happening during the World Cup? Are there any U.S. assets deployed, FBI, or any others, in this regard, knowing that this huge influx is likely to be occurring as we speak?

MR. MILLER: Well, our office has had extensive communication with our embassy in Bonn on this issue. We have -- we are asking for information; we expect to be getting information.

I have personally met with the German ambassador here on this issue to express the concern and, in a way, we were just -- we were seconding a concern that had already been raised throughout Europe. As you know, Mr. Chairman, there was a meeting of the European Parliament in which delegates from 15 or 20 countries raised the concern that with the World Cup and with the expectation that thousands of women might be coming for commercial sex that there would be many trafficking victims.

And so I think the German government has not only heard from us, they've heard from the government of Sweden, they've heard from many other governments on this issue. They have stated -- the government of Germany has stated that they have added additional hotlines, they've increased police training, they've increased the number of police, they have stepped up information activities, etcetera. But what will happen at this point I don't know.

REP. SMITH: Let me ask you, Mr. Ambassador, I noticed in the TIP Report and, again, I think this is the best one, and I commend you and your staff -- it is filled with more information, the reporting seems to be getting better with each succeeding year and this one appears to be the best, at least from my point of view -- but I did note that positive movement. There were 28 countries that moved in the right direction and 23 countries that moved in the negative direction.

Do you know what accounts for that? Are there specific countries that you, you know, might want to speak to that would -- for instance, the Czech Republic; we know that there is a problem associated with the North Koreans -- could you perhaps elaborate on what you think is happening here?

I also want to commend you for having initiated coverage on some new countries, some eight countries that heretofore had not been covered by the TIP Report, and three of them have found their way on the watch list. So certainly they are -- it's necessary that they be covered by this report.

MR. MILLER: First of all, I want to associate myself with the remarks you made as a prelude to your previous question on the link between prostitution and sex trafficking. I do think the evidence is overwhelming.

Now, on your last question, I think this 28 countries up, 23 countries down overall is probably, as near as we can tell, an accurate reflection of the progress in the world. There is movement in the right direction because of the indicators you and I discussed.

But as I said, the law -- the law says make appreciable progress, increasing efforts, and, for example, you mentioned the Czech Republic. The Czech Republic has done some good things.

They have done some good things to combat sex trafficking; they've done some good things on victim protection and prosecution. They dipped from Tier 1 to Tier 2 for a couple of reasons.

First of all, the sentences that they were giving to traffickers, the majority of the sentences were suspended or probationary sentences. And as you know, and you're a lawyer, you ask for punishment that deters.

The second reason, and maybe even more important, we did give more attention to forced labor in this report. This followed on the provision that you and your colleagues put in the last re-authorization. In the Czech Republic, while we found numerous prosecutions for sex trafficking, we did not find that for labor trafficking, and not only our information but international organization reporting showed increased labor trafficking. In addition, there were several factories in the Czech Republic operating with North Korean labor, and while the Czech Republic did investigate -- there were no interviews, private interviews, that we could tell with the workers, it appeared that the money went to an agency of the North Korean government. It appeared that the workers did not have freedom. And while I don't doubt that their conditions are better than in North Korea, in our mind there was a great concern that this was still slavery.

So, for those reasons, despite many good things the Czech Republic did, they dipped from 1 to 2, but we're working with the Czech Republic. We expect the Czech Republic to move in some of these areas and we hope -- we hope -- they will be back in Tier 1 next year.

REP. SMITH: Mr. Ambassador, one of the things that we -- when we did the '03 Act, we put an emphasis on not only conditions but jail sentences and -- because the belief was that countries could create a ruse of prosecutorial activity when really nothing was really happening other than some indictments. And I'm wondering if you have seen in the reporting that more traffickers are actually going to prison and going to prison with sentences that are commensurate with the crime.

When we originally did the 2000 Act, as you know so well, we put up to life imprisonment for this grave act of trafficking because we believed this is the equivalent of rape and therefore should be treated as such. And the fact of the matter is that prosecutors, U.S. attorneys including my own in New Jersey, Christopher Christie, has been able to secure a number of significant convictions and long prison sentences as a direct result of that. He has made it a priority, again using that fourth P. Hopefully other U.S. attorneys have done so as well.

But in other countries are you finding that people are doing real time?

MR. MILLER: I think speaking broadly sentences are getting tougher and more people are going to jail. I mean we've seen that in the United States in the last four or five years, but the Curretto (ph) brothers up in New York just went to jail for 50 years a-piece. And I think that's true in the world but there are, in general, I would say, sentences around the world -- it's a generalization -- are lighter than here. There are certainly many countries, even in the so-called developed areas -- referring to Europe -- where the sentences, as I mentioned -- too many of the sentences are probationary or conditional.

So I think we have to keep pushing on this. People have to realize that what we're talking here -- this word "trafficking", it's almost antiseptic. It's like a -- it is a euphemism. I mean it stands not only for modern day slavery, it stands for a combination of kidnapping -- it often stands for a combination of kidnapping, beatings, imprisonment, and often rape.

Well, all of those crimes individually in a lot of countries would bring really tough sentences. So we have an education task ahead of us.

REP. SMITH: Mr. Ambassador, one of the issues we've pressed for years is that internal trafficking and trafficking across national borders is really a distinction without a difference, and it reminds me of the difference between a IDP and a refugee. If they're sitting in a camp, if they're displaced, going across a State line, it doesn't matter much to their plight.

I note that this year's report does include some extensive coverage on, and reporting on, internal trafficking and I'm wondering what role that played in the assignment of the tier rankings and whether or not India might rise to the top now of a Tier 3 country because of their internal trafficking for both sex practices and exploitation, as well as labor.

MR. MILLER: No question that internal trafficking is a major factor in India and as to be considered. As you read our narrative in India where there's a lot of emphasis on that, India has done some positive things in the sex trafficking area. They weren't very good about supplying information on arrests and convictions this year, but anecdotally we know there is some evidence there and they're considering changes in their law that are positive. Of course they have a tremendously vibrant NGO community.

But when you talk about internal trafficking, and you talk about bonded labor, it's almost all internal. I visited with the bonded laborers in South India that had survived and been freed, people that had been working several generations to pay off a debt the grandfather incurred maybe 50 years ago, and I would have to say that while India has a good law on the subject, they can even provide compensation for survivors, it is very hard -- I could not find any evidence of a trafficker or so-called owner being punished for holding victims in these conditions in India.

And I'd say there's a -- to put it charitably, there's a divided view in India on this issue. I found NGOs, even some State governments, the National Human Rights Commission, the ILO -- all of these groups are saying this is a huge problem. It could affect 10 to 40 million people. It's largely tied to the caste system.

The federal government feels it's a very small problem, at least the officials in the Ministry of Labor. We're hoping, working with the government of India, that we will get more attention and more focus on this area during the coming year.

REP. SMITH: Just a couple of final questions, then I have about a dozen I would like to submit for the record and ask you to respond, Charles Kernaghan in his testimony -- and I would just note that the last time that we had him as a witness was when he brought forth some very powerful testimony on what was happening in Central America and the Kathy Lee Gifford situation, and that's the first time I had met him, so we're glad to have him back -- but he makes the point that upwards of 10,000 foreign laborers have been trafficked to garment factories in Jordan's free trade zone.

And I'm wondering, since Jordan is a Tier 2 country, shouldn't that have at least triggered them to becoming a Tier 3, or at least a watch list country?

MR. MILLER: Well, this report that Mr. Kernaghan and the National Labor Council did was a stunning report. When it arrived in our office, I called and we had a meeting.

It arrived after all the ratings had been gone through this whole process. We held up the printing to include a reference to this report. So Jordan's rating, I cannot say, is affected by the report. However, the Jordanian government should be well aware of the impact the report has had.

I have personally talked with the DCM of the Jordanian embassy. I have personally emailed our ambassador in Jordan on this. My office is trying to set up a meeting with Jordan's ambassador here. We take this very seriously, very seriously, because the report -- the reason it was so interesting to me, this report does not just allege poor working conditions. That can be a concern obviously to all. But our office is concerned about slavery. That's the mandate you gave us. And the report in its charges about removal of passports, confinement of workers, keeping them from leaving facilities, beatings, etcetera, illegal recruitment fees -- these are all indicators not just of poor working conditions which they undoubtedly are, these are indicators that add up to meeting the trafficking in persons definition in our law.

So we will be pursuing this issue with the government of Jordan, and I have to say the initial response from the government of Jordan has been an open and positive one. But we'll see. There are some specific cases we're pursuing, and maybe Mr. Kernaghan will get into those cases in his testimony.

REP. SMITH: Thank you.

Let me just ask on military deployments finally. As you know, the United Nations has under Prince Zaid have come up with a very good list of actionable items that they hopefully will implement. NATO has done likewise. The United States government is doing the same with our armed forces. How would you rate those efforts?

I would just note parenthetically that when we were doing the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2005, we wanted to create a special office within the Department of Defense with the rank of an assistant secretary to work on this issue and got an enormous amount of push-back, so much so that it's not in the bill, as anyone who would read it would know.

We have gotten a commitment that combatant commanders will have somebody on their staff that deals with the trafficking issue and we're waiting, hopefully, that that will materialize. But what has been your office's -- what would be your sense as to how well they're cooperating on the trafficking issue and on the -- obviously on the prostitution issue?

And also the 2005 passed DOD, U.S. AID, and the DOD, to create an action plan for vulnerable populations. So that when a tsunami hits or in a conflict-stricken area, there will be a protocol as to how we should act, aid workers should act, so that trafficking and the exploitation of vulnerable people, sex trade or labor, is mitigated. How has that -- is that planned -- is that part of the law being implemented? Are they working with you on that?

MR. MILLER: Okay. Let me answer in reverse order and start with the question I cannot answer. Always good to admit you can't answer a question. I will get back to you on your last question on the status of that plan.

But your other questions I do want to answer. I think you even started out on the international organizations because in this law -- in the law you just passed -- you asked -- not only was it asked for additional emphasis on forced labor, you asked us for the first time to evaluate international organizations, which we did. It's in the back of the report. I forget the page. And so there is an evaluation of the U.N. peacekeepers, OSCE and NATO.

NATO and the OSCE I will skip over because I think they're doing reasonably well. The U.N. peacekeepers is another situation. I think you're all familiar that over the past year there has been what could be called -- it's called by some a sex for food scandal -- numerous allegations of trafficking and child rape by U.N. peacekeepers -- and the U.N., to its credit, sent an investigator out, Prince Zaid of Jordan, and of course he came back with a report, a very -- I think a very fair, well done report. The punch line was, and I'm paraphrasing here, Mr. Secretary General, the United Nations commendably has a zero tolerance on trafficking policy. Unfortunately there's zero compliance with zero tolerance.

Now, since then, the U.N. -- the wheels are spinning there. Ambassador Bolton has attempted to highlight the issue. He held a hearing on this at the Security Council. I would have to say that while there has been increased attention and an increased number of speeches, I don't know that on the ground the discipline and training is yet taking place. The United Nations is dealing with 103 troop contributing countries and the United Nations has a bureaucracy that, as far as I can tell, makes our bureaucracy look streamlined which is never -- I never thought I'd say that as a member of Congress -- and so, hopefully, there will be some progress. We've got to keep pushing. We really have to keep pushing.

Now, on to the Department of Defense. I think the Department of Defense -- of course we can all go into the past. We can all say, oh, this wasn't done years ago, or, months ago, or the military of all countries in the world including the United States has been related trafficking and may still be related to trafficking and sexual exploitation.

However, from my perspective, as ambassador-at-large on slavery, and chairing a senior policy operating group, I think the U.S. Department of Defense has taken some very significant actions. And I would say that they are probably the leading military in the world -- maybe Sweden is up there with them, but they are, if not the leading, one of the leading militaries in the world when it comes to combating trafficking.

You mentioned the change in the military code of justice. First they had a zero tolerance on trafficking policy. Then they changed -- because we talked with them and we said, how can the soldier tell whether, at a commercial sexual establishment, that the person is a victim or not? So then they changed that. You cannot patronize. Then they instituted training for all troops. This training has gone into effect for most of the troops as far as we can tell. Obviously we want to see that every one of America's military gets training and that.

Then, beyond that, there was a serious story in the Chicago Tribune, as you're familiar with, last fall -- or maybe it was last December, I can't remember -- talking about trafficking from Nepal into Iraq. The story was about Nepalese who were deceived in Nepal, thought they were going to get jobs in five star hotels in Jordan; got sent off to Jordan, then were sent into Iraq. They were killed in Iraq on the way to what was supposed to be their job.

Well, the Defense Department did a thorough investigation and, to their credit, in April the commandant, General Casey, put out a memorandum that sets out some very good guidelines for contractors starting with that they must see that the workers have control of their own passports and holding the American contractors responsible, even though they're subcontractors down the line. In addition, they have a regulation in the works that's very technical but I understand will enable them to really hold contractors more responsible.

So I would say they're taking steps in the right direction. Everybody -- my office, Defense, every government in the world -- can take more steps.

REP. SMITH: Before I yield to Mr. Tancredo, I think your office and Ambassador Ormond's office, do you work together? Is there a collaboration?

And I think her statement that fundamentally invisible people are disposable people is a phrase that we all need to, I think, repeat over and over again. If they're out of sight they can be exploited in a heinous way. But do you work with her office?

MR. MILLER: We have. In fact -- I don't know if she's still here but -- yes, there you are.

In her first weeks in office she was kind enough to come down and pay me a visit, and we discussed the issue and we looked forward to cooperating with her in her efforts. We want to cooperate with everybody, and I'm just delighted that the Ambassador is taking the lead for UNODC on this.

REP. SMITH: Mr. Tancredo.

REP. TANCREDO: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

In the report under "India", I notice that there is nothing mentioned about the Dalits and the effect of that particular phenomena inside India on the caste system -- or, at least, if it was in there, I just missed it -- and how that affects, especially, the trafficking in internal laborers.

Is it something that you think needs to be highlighted? And, I mean, I certainly do. Do you think it's something that we can have any effect on, I suppose? There's been an awful lot done lately, an awful lot said about Dalits and their plight being brought to the attention of the world. I just would have hoped that perhaps it would have found a place in here. And, again, I just read it quickly and I perhaps missed it.

MR. MILLER: Yes. Well, if it's not mentioned -- and I can't remember and it's a long report, so you may be right -- but if it's not mentioned, it certainly should be. My own -- I think, if you talk with Indian observers, Indian NGO's, you will consistently be told that, yes, a majority of the bonded labor victims, the overwhelming majority are of the lowest caste, including Dalits. And so -- they're certainly not of the upper castes -- so there's obviously some link there.

I don't -- I'm not enough of an expert on the caste system in Indian to comment in more detail, but when you have slavery, attitudes are involved.

It may be -- it may be attitudes relating to caste or social standing; it may be attitudes towards foreigners. In a lot of countries that is involved. It may be attitudes towards gender; that's involved in a lot of countries. I mean, there are so many of these factors that come into play. So, we'll look more at that issue in the coming year, Congressman, that you've raised.

REP. TANCREDO: I'd appreciate it. I know that there are laws that have been passed by the Indian government to try and address it, but like many laws of this nature, they are not enforced, and that's why if we talk about it in the report, it may bring pressure on them to do exactly that. That's why I bring it up.

MR. MILLER: I think, if you all get a chance to visit India, to raise this issue -- I think the Indian government -- we get a variety of reactions from governments around the world to our report; some are positive; some are mildly negative; some express disappointment. I think it's fair to say the Indian government did not receive this report with glee. And I think -- I would think we want to be constructive. We want to engage. India is our friend; they're an ally; they're a large democracy; they have a rising middle-class, rising technology, great NGO community -- all these things. And we really do want to work with them on the modern day slavery issue.

REP. TANCREDO: Well, the complexity of the situation is enormous. We had -- at my request and because the chairman was gracious enough to acquiesce -- we had a hearing not too long ago on this specific subject, on the Dalits and their plight, and it is -- you just can't believe -- you just can't imagine how difficult it is to try to address it because there's such a combination of factors; not just cultural, but, of course, religious, historical, economic. And you feel oftentimes quite impotent to try and address any one of those, let alone all the rest of them, to try to make them -- but in a report of this nature it does seem to me that some mention of that situation is necessary.

And the last question I have of you -- and it's probably one we should address to the next panel too, if I'm -- I don't know if I'll be able to be here for that -- you talked about the effort in Germany, of which you were aware, to try and deal with what they knew was going to be a sort of an onslaught of sex trafficking as a result of the World Cup, and the things that you mentioned focused entirely on what I would say was the supply side of the equation, but nothing on the demand side of the equation. And this is, of course, a problem over and over again -- is that we have a tendency to -- you know, because -- for a variety of reasons.

It may be easier to actually identify the prostitute, the trafficker and that, but if we go after -- if some governments will go after the demand side, do something about the people who are purchasing the services, in some way. And in our last hearing, we talked about this, too, and I asked the NGO's if they had any plans. If they were going to go on the streets, for instance; if they were going to take pictures of the guys who were coming in to, you know, purchase the services, and publish them; something like that. Do something to try and reduce the demand side.

MR. MILLER: Well, I absolutely agree with you. The president's task force on trafficking, chaired by the secretary of state, has made demand a top issue. It's not just the supply issue; it is a demand issue. There is a market out there that is driving this, and it is important to keep that in mind. Your recent legislation attempted to address this in the United States by giving the attorney general authority to give grants to encourage prosecutions on the demand side, education on the demand side.

You take a country like Germany. Germany has -- and this has been the basis of their ratings in the report -- Germany has programs on prosecution protection victims, dealing with trafficking victims once they're found or whatever, that meet, to a large extent, the minimum standards. The issue in a country like Germany is, yes, but if you have -- if you are furthering a sex trade that serves as a magnet for trafficking victims from around the world, you run the risk of being in the position of reducing trafficking, on the one hand, and raising trafficking, on the other.

I think the Congress -- in your recent legislation, you attempted to take note of this. You added a criteria for our report, Congressman, that specifically mentions demand. However, as our law department noted -- the State Department Law Department -- that provision does not go into effect till 2008. It was not in effect in this report.

REP. TANCREDO: Thank you very much, Mr. Ambassador.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

REP. SMITH: Thank you, Mr. Tancredo.

Ambassador Miller, we again will provide or give you a number of questions, for the sake of time, on specific countries, if you could get back to us as soon as possible, that would be great.

MR. MILLER: Absolutely. And I owe you an answer on one question that I couldn't answer. And thank you again for taking the time to hold this hearing. You have some outstanding witnesses coming up from Russia, from all over, and so I look forward to listening to them.

REP. SMITH: Mr. Ambassador, thank you so much.

We now will turn to our next panel, and we will provide, for the record, more extensive resumes, but in the interests of time, I'll introduce our witnesses very briefly. We'll first begin with Ms. Sharon Cohn, who serves as vice president of interventions for the International Justice Mission. Until October of 2001, Ms. Cohn was an associate with Arnold &

Porter in Washington, D.C. Previously, Ms. Cohn served as a judicial clerk for the Honorable Richard Williams, Eastern District of Virginia.

We will then hear from Ms. Masha Gnezdilova, who was born into an upper-class Russian household and studied law and worked as an attorney in special -- inspector for five years. Ms. Gnezdilova was the victim of a trafficking in early 1997, when she was coerced into entering Germany with false promises of legitimate employment. There, she was met by pimps and other traffickers who forced her into prostitution. She escaped back to Russia two months later and has since been working with the Angel Coalition.

We then hear from Irina Veselykh, who was educated as a construction engineer and worked as a supervising financial manager charged with final approval of large construction budgets. She later worked as a senior accountant at a hospital. She was victimized by traffickers when she searched for legitimate work abroad. She was met in Germany by pimps and others who attempted to force her into prostitution, and was later brought to the Netherlands. She spent time in Dutch prisons for failing to pay a fine relating to using a fake passport forced upon her by her traffickers, and eventually escaped back to Russia with the help of the Angel Coalition.

And, finally, we'll hear from Mr. Charles Kernaghan, who has served since 1990 as director of the National Labor Committee. Under Mr. Kernaghan's leadership, the National Labor Committee has played a leading role in bringing the issue of sweatshop abuses and child labor before the American people, and placing it on the national agenda. Additionally, under Mr. Kernaghan, the National Labor Committee has held public campaigns on trafficking in persons and other human rights issues. And it's nice to have him back, when he last testified on child labor several years ago before our committee.

If you all could come to the witness table. And, Ms. Cohn, if you could begin.

MS. SHARON B. COHN: Good afternoon, Mr. Chairman. Good afternoon, Mr. Tancredo, members of the committee.

My name is Sharon Cohn and I serve as the vice president for Interventions for International Justice Mission. IJM is an international human rights agency that mobilizes legal professionals to do work with local governments to conduct investigations and to intervene on behalf of victims of abuse. Specifically, IJM has offices in Latin America, Asia and Africa that work with local authorities to rescue victims and bring perpetrators to justice, in cases of rape, trafficking, forced-labor, slavery, illegal detention, torture, police violence and other cases of abuse.

I'd like to confine my remarks today to this issue of forced labor.

But before I do so, I'd just like to take a moment to thank this committee for calling this hearing on trafficking, and I know that there are many other things that compete for this time. But in calling this hearing, you do honor the victims of trafficking, and, in addition, I think you improve the circumstances and environment where less women and children and men will be victimized. This hearing also helps to ensure that -- the ever-increasing excellence of the Trafficking In Persons report.

And it just is true and it just is my experience that there are little girls and women all over the world that owe their rescue from serial rape, in large part, to the vigilance of the Trafficking In Persons report, and to the vigilance of this committee; in particular, Mr. Chairman, to your great work on this issue. Therefore, as I note with great appreciation, this year's increased emphasis on the issue of forced-labor slavery, I have equal confidence that the TIP report will serve as a catalyst for the release of forced-labor slaves and justice for their perpetrators.

There should be no question as to the prevalence of modern-day forced-labor slavery. I think this has been addressed well. Estimates of forced-labor slaves range from four million to 27 million; some estimates are even higher. In any event, the U.S. State Department's Country Reports itself note that over 100 countries have reports of forced labor or compulsory labor. So, given its prevalence, there is this temptation, however, to minimize the harshness of its reality. There's the temptation to assert that slaves are forced to work only because they owe some money to their slave masters, and I'd just like to take a minute to address that.

First, there are virtually no contracts in the world that can require specific performance. It's illegal to require someone to perform in order to pay a debt. Second, the loan itself is almost always a ruse; it's a sham; it's a simple device like the debt that's incurred by trafficking victims into sexual slavery, and it's done just to lure the potential victims into the trap of forced labor. The victims are charged interest and extremely usurious rates and are forced to buy their necessities from their master at inflated prices, which ensure that they can never repay the loan.

And we've been with slaves as they are being rescued and have asked them -- when they have said, we think we owe a loan, we owe a debt to our masters -- have asked them, have you ever met anybody, ever, any of you, that has ever been able to repay the debt that they owe? And they look around to each other and talk among their friends, and no one has ever met anyone who has repaid these debts. They are simply a sham used to confine the slaves to their place.

Third, and most importantly, however, the whole system of forced labor requires force and intimidation to bind the slaves to their master. Without this the slave market simply can't coexist side by side with the global free market. It requires force and intimidation and we see this in virtually every case we've worked on. IJM staff members have met thousands of slaves face to face, but what the slaves all have in common is abuse or threats of abuse and a desperate desire to be free.

I have interviewed female slaves who have described the gruesome ritualistic rape that they have suffered at the hands of the thugs of the master, and I have seen government authorities rescue men who have been severely beaten and held hostage simply because the master was so outraged that other slaves had managed to escape. IJM staff members have assisted in the rescue of a man who has been held slave from 1947 to 1998 without having received a single penny for his labor. And I have heard firsthand a former slave account how he ran away from his master's facility after his wife committed suicide because of the horrible toil -- horrible conditions under which they toiled.

The runaway slave was recaptured by his master two years later, taken back to the facility and beaten ruthlessly, and when he begged for mercy, saying he would find a way to repay the money that he owed, the owner suggested that, in fact, the repayment of the debt was not what he was interested in, but what he was interested in was the manpower.

Our own staff members have been attacked by mobs of hundreds of people organized by local slave owners, as we assisted the police in providing slaves with the option of leaving their place of confinement to freedom. These stories are not unique. They typify the everyday experiences of millions of individuals around the world and the everyday experience of people today in slavery. Slavery today does bear many similarities to slavery in America's past. For example, now, as then, individuals are, essentially, required to work for little or no money and are not free to leave. But one significant difference is that slavery today is illegal. Whereas abolition movements in the past needed to abolish laws that supported, for example, the African slave trade or apartheid, today slavery is simply illegal.

Countries around the world have enacted laws that clearly identify forced-labor slavery as a crime. Countries have also entered into bilateral agreements and ratified international protocols prohibiting slave labor. Therefore, a massive overhaul of legislation as an expression of the public will is not needed. The public has already expressed itself in the form of laws. What is needed instead is for us to simply recognize that millions of slaves exist, to identify the slaves, and to hold the governments accountable to release them and to prosecute the perpetrators.

Today's abolition movement cannot be accused of misguided cultural imperialism. Governments have the laws that provide them with the authority to abolish slavery. Increased attention on slavery will have a grass roots effect. When slave sectors in local market economies are identified and called to account, local free market businesses will also join the call for local government enforcement of the law, because a free market economic and a slave market economy cannot forever coexist side by side, sharing the same market.

Cynics will tell you that we cannot end slavery, that it is simply inevitable. And pessimists will read the TIP report and be overwhelmed by the amount of injustice in the world. Of this, however, I am confident, neither the cynics nor the pessimists will have the last word. Slavery will end; trafficking will end; child prostitution will end. We are just beginning the modern-day abolition effort.

One final note I would make. The TIP report actually -- accurately describes, in our view, many problems throughout the world, but it also rightly highlights some successes. We'd like to note just one as illustrative of what can be done. On December 26, 2004, a massive tsunami wiped out the southern and eastern coastline of Sri Lanka. Tens of thousands of people were killed. Additionally, tens of thousands of people were displaced, including orphaned children. Despite the massive devastation to Sri Lanka, the TIP report states that, quote, "Officials remained vigilant toward the potential of increased child trafficking in the wake of the December 2004 tsunami and there was no significant increase in reports of trafficking following the tsunami."

This was our experience in Sri Lanka as well. IJM spent weeks in Sri Lanka in early 2005, examining government and community post-tsunami emergency child-protection efforts. In the face of the devastation experienced by the people of Sri Lanka, we found that the government's child-protection response was both credible and effective. And if a country in the midst of perhaps its worst natural disaster in modern history can take effective action to prevent trafficking, what could be achieved if we treat trafficking in persons, including forced labor, as the global man-made disaster that it is?

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

REP. SMITH: Ms. Cohn, thank you very, very much for your testimony.

Ms. Gnezdilova.

MS. MASHA GNEZDILOVA (VIA INTERPRETER): First of all, I'd like to thank Congressman Christopher Smith personally and the House International Relations Committee for inviting me at this important event, and an opportunity to tell the world the truth about the real situation in Germany with trafficking.

My name is Masha and I'm 33 years old. So, by education, I am a lawyer in the sphere of social services. I worked as an inspector in a social -- the social protection department and also as an inspector -- HR inspector in a medical college. In 1996, I visit my relatives in St. Petersburg. On the way back, standing in the line to get my tickets back, I met a middle-aged woman who looked -- seemed very nice. So, in our conversation she mentioned between the lines that she had friends in Germany who were looking for a young Russian woman who can help them around the house. She also mentioned that it would be good opportunity for me to see the country and learn the language.

So, by that time, I have never been overseas and this offer looked for me very interesting. So the lady took my documents and said that it would be really easy to arrange everything. And at the beginning of 1997, I left for Germany by bus. In Hamburg, I was met by a young Russian woman under name Janna. This woman helped me -- at the railway station took me home and took my passport with an excuse that she has to show to the people where I'm supposed to work. Next day she met another three young Russian ladies whom she took home as well, and took their passports as well.

Next day she informed me that the job that I looked for is not there, but she promised that I can stay and then she can help me to find another job. Janna took us to a club under the name Six-Forty, where prostitutes worked. She told us that we shouldn't resist and that we have to work as prostitutes and actually there is no -- any sense to resist or to complain because it will be even worse for us or even be very dangerous. She threaten us that there is no need as well to run away, because she explained that they have good people or their people in the police that will immediately return runaways and then they will be severely beaten up.

I decided in this situation that it will be dangerous actually to resist and I pretended that I agree with that and even simulated complete compliance, and pretended frustration when I was not chosen by clients. Janna believed me and started to look for an appropriate bar for me. That's how I worked in several German bars. One day, together with another three girls, I was taken by Janna to a bar under the name Savoy, which was on the highway between Hamburg and Hanover. I didn't remember the name of this bar, but this bar was -- the city, but it was close to Bielefeld and the bar's name was Savoy.

By that time, the bar was closed and in two days we found out that it was closed because previously several Russian girls had been killed there. So then the bar was opened and we started to work there as hostesses and prostitutes. We were not allowed to go out because we didn't have any documents. Fortunately, soon the police came to the bar with a raid and they took us to a police station next to Bielefeld. We were questioned by a Russian lawyer who sympathized with us, and we were released next day. So we didn't know where to go because we didn't know the language, we didn't know about any progress or about any organizations that could help us, and plus we didn't have any money.

So we returned to the bar to take our things or try to find some help, but by the time when we were there, Janna was informed and she showed up there. The same night, she returned to the bar to take me to another place and sell me to another pimp for $1,000. I was forced to work as a prostitute in another German bar, and in a week there was another police raid and I was arrested again. So when I was released, I didn't know where to go and some people, other people, helped me to do that because I didn't know where to go. So when I went to the police station to get my papers -- by the time I reached this police station they didn't have my documents and there was no translator to explain the situation.

So usually in this situation, when women have no passport and the situation is not clear with them, so they are re-sold again. So most clubs that deal with trafficking in women and exploiting women in prostitution illegally -- the same people deal with drugs as well. So most of them, they also deal with fake documents, and as I know some of the girls that were with me in this situation, we were, this way, then trafficked to Netherlands with the fake documents. So I couldn't stand this situation any more and this condition any more and I stopped eating and threatened my so-called owner that I would actually jump out of the fourth floor.

He believed me and probably sympathized -- me and soon he bought a ticket for me for airplane. This way I returned home. Two years passed but I still was in depression and I didn't know I will live further.

This way I returned home. Two years passed but I still was in depression and I didn't know how I will live further. By chance, I found in a newspaper an article about a center in St. Petersburg that provided assistance for women like me. I called them and then they invited me to their place. So this way I met the Angel Coalition and its members. I received from them psychological, moral and financial assistance. I went back to my town and set up my own independent NGO.

So it seems like we, Russian women, are placed in an impossible economic condition and are not needed by our own country. In other countries we're just spit on as prostitutes when we're really victims. I see that 10 years passed -- what happened to me -- but the situation is still the same. Is the German government really not aware of what is happening in their country? It looks like everybody knows everything and everybody feels okay with what's going on. We think that the government profited from our suffering, exploiting us in prostitution.

REP. SMITH: Ms. Gnezdilova, thank you very much for your testimony. And I truly believe, and I hope it is conveyed back to Germany, that your testimony is not just a challenge and it's not just an appeal; it's really an indictment of the policy of the German government, and the fact that all of this happened when, perhaps, the police were actually raiding brothels. Since it has been legalized just a couple of years ago in Germany, I'm sure those numbers have diminished rather significantly.

So, thank you. And when you mentioned that you replaced murdered girls, that must have been harrowing in and of itself; wondering what your fate might be as well, as a replacement for those murdered girls. So thank you for your bravery, and for forming your own NGO and for enlightening us and helping us better understand the tragedy of human trafficking.

I'd like to now ask Ms. Veselykh -- if you would provide your testimony.

MS. IRINA VESELYKH (VIA INTERPRETER): Good afternoon, ladies and gentlemen. I want to also say that I'd like to thank Congressman Christopher Smith personally and the House International Relations Committee for inviting me at this important event, and given opportunity to tell the truth about the situation with trafficking in Germany.

My name is Irina Veselykh and in 1983 I graduated from Amur construction college, and then since 1984 till 1991, I worked as an engineer at the local construction company. In 1986, I got married and I have two daughters from this marriage. At perestroika time I decided to get another education and this education was in bookkeeping. Of course, by that time this profession was in demand, and with this profession I work as a bookkeeper in a clinic.

So, it happened, so, that my husband became an alcoholic and he got many debts and, of course, most of the debts were the debts of our whole family, so I had to change my profession again. I had one year course in massage and cosmetology, and then I moved to Volgodonsk. So it was hard with my specialty and my salary of $100, to raise my children, and my husband didn't help me with all those debts. Once, in a newspaper, Chance, I found an ad about employment overseas. This ad looked very promising and I thought that if I worked for six months or a year, it would be enough to earn enough money to cover the debts that my family had.

Plus, they said that they would give me advance of 500 euros, and they said that they would arrange everything with visa. They promised that my work will be as a waiter and my final salary will be 800 or 900 euros. So this company had an office in Volgodonsk in Volgograd, and they said that they will arrange for me a contract and arrange all the -- the appropriate documents for me. I went to Germany by bus via Poland, and finally I arrived at Bremen where I was met by a Russian couple who immediately told me, in a rough form, that I shouldn't expect any work as a waitress and I will work as a prostitute.

And they explained that there is no sense to resist or to complain again. And plus to that, when I tried to resist or contradict, they said that I have 1000 euros' debt on me. I refused to work and then they severely beat me up.

So when I tried to say that I would go to police, or threaten them that I would go to police, they said that it won't help because the police is bought and most teams work under the cover of police officers. And plus I didn't have any documents, and they said that if you don't -- documents, they will arrest you and put you in jail. Plus, they showed me the pictures of murdered girls who tried to approach police.

So I had to succumb, and then this married couple appointed for me work as a prostitute and immediately left for Canary Islands. Then, later, they resold me to another team under the name Viktor, who worked in Bremen. So Viktor had a business in Bremen that sold girls to different European countries including Belgium and Netherlands.

So they sold Russian girls for 15,000 dollars -- euros each. Plus to that, they hold -- run a network of brothels around Germany, and I was sent to one of those brothels. So the brothel that I got to was owned by Toni, a woman, Toni. So, Toni's brothel was run legally, so they had a legal status, though the women who worked in this brothel had fake documents on them as their real documents were taken away by pimps.

Viktor and his wife were from Lithuania, so they made for me Lithuanian fake passport that actually increased the sum of my debt for 2000 euros. I didn't get this passport into my hands because they keep it so I couldn't run away. So the pimps in this brothel threaten us that we shouldn't try even to run away, and they kept our documents. Plus, that they said that they know our family members and if we try something, they can easily find them and then it will be dangerous for our family members. Plus that we have big debts and we couldn't cover that.

By the time they realized debts they decided to resell us, so that's how we ended up in another club, under the name Diplomat, that was next to Holland, on the border with Germany. So there were -- in that club I had to serve so many clients. Beside of me there were another three Russian ladies who actually worked there as well with fake passports and were forced to serve many clients. At that time, I took a decision to run away and with an assistance from another Russian young woman under the name Tatiana, who helped me to get my fake documents back, I run away.

And I said that soon I will help her as well, because she refused to run away with me, being so threatened. So with the help of Tatiana, who actually stole these fake documents from the owners, I could run away. She said that she cannot run away with me because she had a son back in Russia and she was afraid that something would happen to her son because the pimp had threatened her. So then, later, I found out from one of the clients, Russian clients, that this young girl was murdered because of helping me with my documents.

So in that run away I was helped by other girls from the club as well, who helped to call a taxi and arrange with the man, under the name Ben, from Dutch city Von Shoten, who was an owner of a club, Antenna, and was well known for helping women like me in this situation. So in Antenna club I didn't work as a prostitute, and I found a -- in a way, a shelter there, but Russian mafia found me there and then informed me that they would kill me next day. At that night, again with the help from Ben, who, together with his friends, took me in a car to a different place, I could escape and run away from this again.

So at Ben's friends' place I lived in a garage, and they fed me there and also provided me some money. Later, I ran away to another club and they suggested if I want, I can earn some money if I work as a waitress serving beverages. Many Dutch people were very kind to me, but Russian mafia was onto me and the only good decision in this situation was for me to go to police.

But it was dangerous because, again, mafia was onto me. So I applied to police -- Dutch police -- and they helped my 21-year-old daughter to come -- who knew English -- to come to Netherlands to help me with my case.

As my daughter arrived, we immediately went to an appropriate police office, but as we reached this office and explained what happened to me, they immediately arrested me with a charge for the fake documents -- for five days. Since that time, the long process of investigation and interrogation started, with misunderstanding on the side of Dutch police and authorities.

So they called me guilty for using a fake Lithuanian passport crossing the borders and that actually was produced not by me but by perpetrators. I provided all information I knew about the traffickers with the hope that it would help. But instead of that, I became a perpetrator and was arrested and put into jail.

So they didn't provide me with any attorney or advocate to help me in this situation that could help me to explain what happened. And they didn't even inform me that I was charged for using a fake passport -- but, indeed -- that actually in the reality I didn't use.

So nobody listened to me. And with all the information I provided them with the hope for justice, it happened just the opposite -- that instead of getting a good assistance and with expectation that these perpetrators will be punished, different happened, so I was completely unprotected and treated badly.

As the crime happened in Germany, they had to contact and pass the case to the German police, and it took more time, because then I was sent to another police station in -- I was sent to another place and they interrogated me again and started to collect all the data I had again. Everything I told was confirmed and, in two weeks, I could meet my daughter.

With the help from my daughter and some good Dutch people, I could obtain a special benefit -- social benefit -- from the local government that could hardly let me cope with payments for my lodgings, and I didn't have enough money to buy even food. After that, my daughter left for Russia and -- but I stayed there to participate in the further investigations, where I was supposed to give further testimony.

Waiting for continuation of proceedings of this investigation lasted for two years. For that period, I didn't hear any developments or any news on this investigation from the local authorities. I couldn't stand it any more. And I, again, applied to the local authorities with a request to return me back to Russia because I couldn't stand it any more. And I also explained that, if they need further testimony, I can return and give this testimony.

I was not in a good health by that time and my children lived in Russia. And in this situation I even tried to commit suicide.

Instead of sending me back to Russia, the Dutch police recalled the previous case with big documents and charged me for -- with this again, and I spent another three months in a jail for an old crime -- so-called crime -- that I didn't commit. So the actions on behalf of national and migration police contradict each other.

The months that I spent in jail, I didn't have any advocate or an interpreter. For me, there were no opportunities to contact my relatives and my children. I tried not to eat. I tried to protest that, trying to find some justice. But instead of that, I was placed to another cell, in a very, very, bad condition, with the only mattress on the floor.

Later, with the help from another young lady from Russia who was in the same jail, I could manage to get an advocate who, for the first time, let me to contact my relatives back in Russia. The only help at that time that I could get -- it was from the Dutch -- from the counselor in Netherlands, who gave me a helpline of the Angel Coalition and helped me to contact the police officers in Dutch embassy in Moscow and Russian consulate in Hague.

A police officer contacted the police in Netherlands while the Angel Coalition members tried to be in constant contact with my relatives, constantly updating them about the situation with me. So after three months of imprisonment, with 30 euros in my pocket, I was just thrown out on the street. Police had to take me to the consulate, but they preferred just to leave me on the street. In order to reach the -- only the local people, the Dutch people, helped me to reach this embassy.

From the consulate, I was placed for a short period of time in a shelter while the local authorities tried to solve the situation with my documents.

Back to Russia in the airport, I was met by the members of the Angel Coalition who helped me to buy a ticket back home, paid for my hotel for one night and provided me with medication. That was the only human treatment that I got after all these months of suffering.

The Angel Coalition is still helping me and very soon -- still helping me. I didn't commit any crime in any of those countries where I've been -- why I was placed into jail -- people that tortured me still are free. And they continue to exploit other young women under the cover of their local police and with their policy of legalized prostitution. My rights were violated. Who will be responsible for that?

In these countries the rights of immigrants are constantly violated -- those ones who got in a difficult situation. But their government, as it looks to me, even don't try to deal with that or be responsible for that, because it looks like they are quite satisfied what's happening in their country.

That's all.

REP. SMITH: Ms. Veselykh, thank you so very much for your testimony and, again, for making the long trip to be here. It does, again, help this committee and helps the Congress by extension, and the executive branch with Ambassador Miller here, and Ambassador Ormond who has remained as well, to hear again and to get motivated to combat this outrage that you have suffered. So thank you so much.

We will have to take a very brief break. There are seven votes on the floor. They are 2-minute votes, so they're very quick.

And then I will come back, reconvene the hearing, and then we'll hear from Mr. Kernaghan and proceed with any questions.

But again -- and I thank you in advance for your patience -- and I apologize for it.

(Recess.)

The committee will resume its sitting. And I again want to apologize to our witnesses for that lengthy delay. There were eight votes -- I think it was eight -- on the floor and they took longer than they were advertised. So I do apologize for that.

Mr. Kernaghan, you are next. Please proceed.

MR. CHARLES KERNAGHAN: (Off mike.)

REP. SMITH: Could you just turn on the mike or bring it closer.

MR. KERNAGHAN: There it goes.

REP. SMITH: Thank you.

MR. KERNAGHAN: I wish everyone in the United States could have heard their stories this morning. It was incredibly powerful. And I think the American people are quite decent and would be sickened by what they heard.

I want to discuss human trafficking and involuntary servitude under the U.S.-Jordan Free Trade Agreement. Today, there is an estimated 300,000 foreign guest workers employed in Jordan as domestic help, in agriculture, construction, and also in Jordan's garment factories, which export $1.2 billion a year of apparel duty free to the United States. Many of these guest workers are victims of human trafficking and are being held today under conditions of involuntary servitude.

Our research focuses on the conditions faced by the guest workers in Jordan's factories -- their garment factories. There are 36,500 foreign guest workers in Jordan's garment factories from Bangladesh, China, Sri Lanka, and India. They're employed in 114 export factories, more than 90 percent of which are foreign owned.

And how the system operates, in Bangladesh for example -- the Bangladesh guest workers -- the prospective workers -- will see ads in the newspapers in Bangladesh, advertising terrific jobs in Jordan. If you go to Jordan, you're going to make $134 a month as a base wage. You're going to get $250 a month with overtime. They tell you you're going to have Fridays off -- the Muslim holiday. You're going to have all national holidays off in Jordan. They tell you that you're going to have free healthcare; you're going to have free food; free housing. And they tell you that you're going to live -- the services are very good, they say. You're going to live like they do in the West.

And so the workers in Bangladesh, where wages are about 21 cents an hour in the garment industry -- they think to themselves, we're going to make a killing in Jordan. We're going to help our families.

But the catch is, you have to pay for these contracts. To get a 3-year contract to work in Jordan, you have to pay about 180,000 taka, which is $2,657. Well, that's an enormous amount of money in Bangladesh. And these are poor workers. So they go out into the informal market and they borrow that money at exorbitant interest rates -- at least five (percent) to 10 percent a month, meaning that loan more than doubles every single year.

They take these loans and they head to Jordan. But there's another catch in the contract. You can only work for one factory. You can't leave that factory and work any place else. You're tied to that one factory.

So the workers get on a plane, like 100 Bangladesh workers did to go to the Al Shahaed factory in Irbid, which is a city -- a large city in Jordan. They went to the Al Shahaed factory. When they arrived at the airport, their passports were immediately confiscated by management. Management wouldn't give them their residency permits, which are necessary documents. You can't go out onto the street without your residence permits. If the police stop you, you will be detained and deported.

So these workers were virtually held as prisoners inside this factory, unable to leave. They found themselves working 15 hours a day, 30 hours a day, 48 hours a day -- 72 hours straight. They would go two and three days in a row without sleep. They worked seven days a week. Instead of getting the $250 they were promised, they got two cents an hour. They got $2.31 for a 98-hour work week.

When workers asked for their wages, they were imprisoned. Workers would spend three days in prison, without food, for asking for their wages. If workers complained about food in the factory -- food that was supplied by the company -- the workers were beaten with sticks, beaten with belts.

Twenty-eight workers shared each tiny room -- 12 foot by 12 foot. They had access to water just once every three days.

And in desperation, when the workers finally asked to be paid at least part of their wages, they were forcibly deported back to Bangladesh. Many of those workers today are back in Bangladesh hiding in Dhaka City, driving bicycle rickshaws because they can't return home to their villages because they can't pay off their loans, and there's no way they'll ever be able to pay off those loans now that they're back in Bangladesh.

They were trafficked out of Bangladesh. They were sent to Jordan under false pretenses. They were abused and exploited. And now they are back in Bangladesh. And they and their families are going to sink deeper and deeper into misery.

The same thing happened with workers who responded to an ad in Bangladesh to go to work in the Western factory, also in Irbid. Both these factories make clothing for Wal-Mart. The minutes they arrived in Jordan, their passports were also confiscated by management. They didn't receive their residency permits either. They were virtual prisoners. They had to work 16 to 20 hours a day, seven days a week.

They worked 109 hours a week and yet, routinely, they were not paid for months on end. So for example, in the beginning of 2006 -- for the first four months of 2006 -- the Western workers did not receive one cent in wages, despite working 109 hours a week making clothing for export to the United States, which enters the United States duty free. When these workers asked for their wages, they were beaten and threatened with possible deportation.

We went on a delegation with the steelworkers to Jordan in May -- mid-May -- and we were given numerous guarantees by the government of Jordan that there'd be no retaliation against any workers who met with our delegation. Well, sad to say that two workers from a factory called Saidan that met with our delegation -- they were beaten and forcibly deported at gunpoint and sent back to Bangladesh without their back wages and without even their meager belongings, for the simple crime of meeting with the U.S. delegation.

Right now in the Saidan factory, which is making clothing for L.L. Bean, the workers are working 56 hours a week of overtime with not one cent of overtime pay. The owner has recently told the workers that, if they complain about their wages, they too will be sent back to Bangladesh with nothing, just as the two workers were who had met with our delegation.

Just last Sunday, in a factory called Al Nahat, 25 workers had the courage to try to do the right thing and they went to the local labor court to try to get help that they would receive some of their back wages.

When the owner of the factory found out that the workers had gone to the labor court, he brought them together, he took out a pistol, and he held it to the heads of many of the workers, and he told them, if you dare go back to the labor court to complain about your wages, we will shoot you or you'll be forcibly deported.

In Al Nahat they're working right now from 7:30 in the morning until 11:00 at night -- minimum 15 1/2-hour shifts, seven days a week. They get no days off whatsoever. They're being cheated of more than 60 percent of the wages that are legally owed them. They're in a situation of great desperation. Both in the Saidan factory and at Al Nahat, the workers are fearing for their lives. The situation is rapidly deteriorating.

I could go on with many of these horror stories about these guest factory workers in Jordan who are being trafficked and who are being held under conditions of involuntary servitude, who are being exploited, who are being abused.

In the Western factory, there was very credible evidence that several of the young women from Bangladesh were sexually assaulted. One 16-year-old girl was raped. There's credible evidence about a young girl hanging herself in a bathroom in the Al (Safi ?) factory after she was raped by management. I think the clear picture of what's happened in those factories is only beginning to emerge now.

But I also want to say there is some good news. The government of Jordan has responded seriously and quickly. If the government of Jordan fulfills what it says it intends to do, then Jordan will be on the road to ending human trafficking and ending involuntary servitude and restoring the rule of law in its factories.

Along with this, the United Steelworkers and the National Labor Committee has asked Jordan to demand that the factories immediately return the workers' passports. We also are asking the government of Jordan to give the workers the right of portability. To be tied to one single factory is a form of modern slavery. The Supreme Court in Israel just announced that, with their own guest worker program. They are ending -- they also returned the passports -- but they are also ending tying workers to specific factories or job locations. Workers have to have the freedom to move from factory to factory or job site to job site. That's the only way to punish bad factories and reward good factories.

The workers in Jordan also need help, especially in the subcontract factories. There are 55 subcontract factories in Jordan which are operating below the radar screen. They're not being monitored by the major U.S. companies. Most of the violations are taking place in those smaller subcontract factories -- or the most egregious violations. We're asking the government of Jordan to give special attention to these 55 subcontract factories and to put permanent monitors in those factories to secure the workers -- the safety of the workers.

And in those factories where there are the worst violations, they need to shut those factories down. They need to prosecute those factory owners. And they need to safely relocate those workers into better factories so they don't suffer any further.

And in Jordan the guest workers have no right to organize, which is a violation of the core ILO's labor standards. So we've asked the government of Jordan to amend the by-laws of the local unions so that the local unions can accept as members these guest workers. These guest workers must have freedom of association, the right to organize and the right to bargain collectively.

So having said that, I really feel that the Jordanian government is taking this seriously. We know, right now on the ground in Jordan -- we're monitoring it every day. We know that factories are shutting down now earlier. Most factories are closing down at about 9:00, after a 13 1/2-hour shift -- but that's much better than working to 11:00 or 12:00 or 1:00 in the morning or much later. Most factories are coming into compliance with the minimum wage law of 641/2-cents- an-hour -- not everyone, but most factories are moving in that direction. Workers are now getting one day off a week -- most factories -- on Friday, the Muslim holiday.

However, overtime pay all across Jordan is being violated, even in the big factories producing under direct contract to the U.S. companies. There are still serious problems in Jordan. Only two or three factories that we know of have the workers actually received their passports back.

So despite the good intentions, workers still have not received their passports back; overtime wages are violated in the majority of factories across Jordan; there are workers in these 55 subcontract factories which are living under an atmosphere of terror, fear, threats of beating, shootings and being forcibly deported.

So I think it's very important that we keep pressure on the Jordanian government to act on its good intention and, again, if they do so, Jordan will then become a model of fair labor standards and respect for human, women's and workers' rights across the Middle East and beyond. Jordan is really at a crossroads, and they could come out as a model or, if these intentions are not implemented, Jordan will be a sweatshop with some of the worst conditions we've ever seen. They rival China, actually. It's completely out of control, and we're now very hopeful that the Jordanian government will implement concrete steps to bring these factories into line with Jordanian law and with U.S. commitments under the U.S.-Jordan Free Trade Agreement.

So thank you very much.

REP. SMITH: And thank you very much for your testimony and for your work all these years on behalf of workers' rights.

Let me just ask you -- apart from being designated Tier 3 -- and I would note for the record that the TIP office at any time can designate any country any level -- one, two, Watch List, or Tier 3. It's now subjected to just the annual review.

Ambassador Miller and his shop were so convinced by the data and persuaded others within the State Department, Jordan could be designated Tier 3 and could be done so tomorrow based on evidence that was presented to him.

The idea behind that flexibility is so that we don't get at least the appearance of cooperation with the U.S. government and with NGOs on trafficking as the review period comes to an end, only to revert and fall back to bad habits. So that flexibility -- and it's something that I'll raise with the ambassador as well, especially vis- a-vis Jordan.

Let me just ask you -- but apart from Tier 3, does the United States have any mechanisms under U.S. law, especially the Free Trade Agreement, that it could -- that could be triggered by this, you know, exploitation of labors in Jordan?

MR. KERNAGHAN: Under the U.S.-Jordan Free Trade Agreement, which was considered a model at the time, because it does actually include worker rights provisions -- worker rights language -- at the core of the agreement, not on a sidebar -- much stronger than NAFTA -- the North American Free Trade Agreement. The problem was is there was a loophole put in the Free Trade Agreement that allowed Jordan to use its resources in any way they thought reasonable. So if the minister of labor said it didn't have the resources to implement Jordanian law, they didn't have to.

And what happened is -- and I think they pretty much acknowledge this -- the ministry of labor in Jordan actually turned into an agency which handed out work permits to foreign workers. There were no inspections of these factories that were very credible. Jordan only has 88 labor inspectors for 95,000 workplaces. And many of these inspectors are untrained and underpaid.

So there was good language in the Agreement -- but the loophole, you could drive a Mack truck through it. And so essentially they didn't do anything wrong. They just didn't put the resources or the time into enforcing these standards, which is one of the reasons why it got completely out of control.

REP. SMITH: You know, earlier, Ms. Cohn mentioned that slavery is illegal. And I would just say, so it torture. And in both cases in the Peoples Republic of China, both are widespread and pervasive. What is your view -- and Ms. Cohn what is your view -- as to whether or not China ought to be on Tier 3?

It does have a sex trafficking problem, but it has an enormous labor trafficking problem.

There's no collective bargaining; they have arrearage payments that are not made to their own workers; 10 (million) to 20 million child laborers, according to best estimates; 6 million, approximately, people are being exploited in the Lao Gai system.

And as I said as we were coming in the door, back in the early '90s, Congressman Frank Wolf and I visited one of those Lao Gai -- Beijing Prison number one -- and saw Tiananmen Square activists doing slave labor for what -- their crime was asking for freedom and democracy in the PRC. There's no OSH regulations and upwards of 126,000 occupational deaths occur in China every year. If ever there were a case to be made that on labor -- and I would submit also on sex trafficking -- but certainly on labor, China ought to be a Tier 3 country. What is your sense on that?

And just let me finally say, and I will include in the record at least a summary of it, on June 8th, Congressman Ben Cardin and I joined with the AFL-CIO in officially petitioning the U.S. trade representative to impose WTO sanctions on China for its violations of their freely entered into obligations with regards to laborers.

So what's your thought?

MR. KERNAGHAN: If I could --

MS. COHN: Sorry. Go ahead.

MR. KERNAGHAN: Okay. Can I just speak for the labor section quickly?

We have had workers in a factory called Fourway (ph) in China smuggle out their time cards which showed them working from 7:31 in the morning until 4:30 the following morning. They were working 134 hours a week. They were getting 16 and a half cents an hour. China's labor law says 40 hours a week and no more than 6 hours of overtime, 9 hours of overtime a week.

The labor laws in China are being completely violated. The workers have no freedom of association. In fact, it has been so stamped out that if you ask many Chinese workers what a union is, and we've asked them this, they think it's a breakfast meeting. They have no idea.

So there are tens of millions of mostly young women from rural areas in these factories with no rights whatsoever and, of course, you know the number of goods that are coming to the United States are just unbelievable. Jordan sends us, I believe 1.2 billion pairs of shoes a year as an example. I mean, this is like a couple of shoes for every single man, woman and child in the United States. I mean it is really revving up to like overwhelm the world with these exports made by workers whose rights are denied. They're not part of the 10 percent growth in China that the economy is growing. They're being left behind. And the living conditions are also barbaric.

MS COHN: Just to answer that, we are often asked if we do work in China and could we do work in China.

We don't currently do work in China and thus can't comment directly as to the situation there based on our own investigative findings. However, I would say that the reason we have not worked in China to date is primarily not for lack of case referrals asking us to do so, but because we, in our assessment, don't believe we could secure the sufficient government cooperation or leverage in order to get rescues for victims and prosecutions for perpetrators.

I think some of the reports you're referring to, and would add to it just the North Korea/China connection with regard to sex slavery as well. So I can't comment as to the Tier ranking, but to say it's a source of great concern for us as well.

REP. SMITH: Thank you.

Ms. Gnezdilova, if you could tell us, are you aware of any action that was taken by the German government to prosecute the owners of the clubs where you were forced to engage in prostitution? And if you could describe exactly what did the Angel Coalition do for you, I guess prior to -- before you set up your own NGO which I assume is a part of it.

MS. GNEZDILOVA (VIA INTERPRETER): I don't know about in the cases pressed against the traffickers in Germany. Beside of helping me to set up my NGO, the Angel Coalition, first of all, it helped me to feel myself -- to feel again as a human being, free and open, and ready to fight for my own human rights.

REP. SMITH: Could I ask you, in your work as an NGO, have you met any women who were trafficked to Germany since prostitution has been legalized?

MS. GNEZDILOVA (VIA INTERPRETER): So in Belgrade where I live there are a lot of ads in newspaper, and I'm sure there are a lot of cases because I heard from my friends like -- but usually in those cases women aren't -- do not tell about that. So in our city I can say that there are several employment agencies and most of them, they provide employment -- so-called employment in Germany. Those agencies that invite girls for work to Germany.

REP. SMITH: Let me ask you, Ms Veselykh, when you worked in Toni's brothel in Germany, what you described in your statement as a "legal brothel," did you ever see the police or any government inspector in the brothel for the purpose of enforcing any of the so-called regulations, and did they make any effort to discern whether or not the women there were there legally, on their own volition, or whether or not they were there involuntarily?

MS. VESELYKH (VIA INTERPRETER): When I was there, I can tell you that I didn't see any inspection on the behalf of police. Actually, Toni, the owner, from her words, was afraid of such inspection, but also from her words what I heard, she said that she pays some amount of money to police, so they basically turn their blind eye to what's happening there because they knew that there are a lot of women who work there illegally without any documents.

REP. SMITH: When did this happen? When were you there, I should say? And let me ask you in addition to that, did any Dutch authorities prosecute brothel owners when you were in the Netherlands?

MS. VESELYKH (VIA INTERPRETER): So when I was there it was August 2003, and as to my knowledge, I don't remember or know any cases when these people were prosecuted -- brother owners. I was promised -- I was promised that they will be penalized, that there will be a trial, but nothing happened.

REP. SMITH: So you were there after the legalization of prostitution, obviously. Let me ask you, in Germany can you give us any sense as to how many of the women were there as -- under force and duress, as opposed to those who might be there voluntarily, in the brothels you were in?

MS. VESELYKH (VIA INTERPRETER): So in one of the clubs -- and if I'm not mistaken, the name of it Poofa (ph) -- so I saw at least five Russian women who were forced. So there are at least three of them I know perfectly, because they were 30 years those, and I saw that they were completely threatened. I was the witness of selling another Russian young lady -- if I'm not mistaken, her name was Marina -- to Belgium for 15,000 euros. So when I say that she was sold, it means that there was a fake marriage but without her -- of course, her agreement on that. So there was an agreement between the owner of the club and Russian mafia with the Belgian party, so that there is a fake marriage and then, when the lady goes to Belgium, she has to work for her so-called husband.

In the Diplomat club, I know when I was there -- so they planned right after me, to deliver another three or four Russian young ladies. And, as I heard from the other women there, so that there is the same situation with the rest of these clubs in the Netherlands. As I heard, the owner of Diplomat made some agreement with Russian mafia groups, so they could provide these young ladies on a regular basis.

REP. SMITH: Let me ask you, you said in your testimony that pimps threatened to hurt your family if you tried to escape. Are you aware of any families that were hurt, or did the threat do its dirty work and people -- women not think to escape?

MS. VESELYKH (VIA INTERPRETER): So as example, I can tell you -- and you heard that already in my statement, that the young woman who helped me to get these fake documents in order to cross the borders, she was killed; that's already a good example.

So then I was also severely beaten up. That's already examples of those threats -- that they're real. And I think that her mother, of that young woman who was killed, still doesn't know what happened to her daughter and probably is looking for her right now. I know where her mother lives, but also, at the same time, I cannot inform her because the only thing I know about this young woman -- that her name was Marina.

REP. SMITH: Ms. Gnezdilova, you said that several Russian girls had been recently murdered in the subway. Both of you -- and Ms. Cohn, you might want to speak to this -- how widespread is the murdering of women who have been trafficked?

MS. GNEZDILOVA (VIA INTERPRETER): So as for that situation with Savoy club, when we arrived there, we were not -- they didn't let us in, and they explained that they had temporary problems with police. As we later found out, the Russian girls were killed there. But then, later, as they say, they opened it again because they cleared the situation with the police.

From my experience, I can tell you that a murder happens really often in the situation of trafficking, at least in that case with me. And I can tell you the felons are usually these people whom I faced while I was in Germany. I can tell you that the traffickers always have the same men from Russia who are there on an illegal basis, basically, without documents, who do so-called, like, dark, or let's say dirty job.

So they're tasked to take those girls who resist to work, or continue to work, take them to special apartments that they usually have where they beat them up, where they break their hands, where they kill them. And personally I saw the pictures of those ladies mutilated, with faces mutilated, and those young men who did that job, being basically torturers for higher owners or management. They, with a joke, said, we just usually put them in concrete and throw them away. Usually how it happens, they can kill resisting young ladies even in a car or take her to the woods and just throw, or bury her there, and nobody will find out.

REP. SMITH: Is there any way that the German police are tipped off that this has happened, and do they do anything?

MS. GNEZDILOVA (VIA INTERPRETER): I don't know about the cases of prosecution on the -- I mean, on the behalf of the police, but what I can tell you, that this is the same Russian gangsters who operated that. So they mention it not once that there is no even sense applied to police because basically it's -- we have our people and police and we will be actually against you.

REP. SMITH: Well, there's a lot of room for us to follow up on that, so I do thank you so much for that.

Let me ask one final question to Ms Cohn, and that is: what has been the typical sentence for a labor trafficker?

MS. COHN: The typical sentence we've seen in labor for slavery has been one day.

REP. SMITH: One day.

MS. COHN: One day, and a moderate to mild fine, and we've only had a few of those. But that's been the sentence.

REP. SMITH: Okay. Yes. Let me yield to Maureen Walsh, our general counselor for the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe.

MS. WALSH: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Actually just maybe two questions for Mr. Kernaghan, if I could?

Your report mentions that at the time you were interviewing workers from one particular factory, a monitoring team from a U.S. company was at the same time inspecting the factory. You uncovered terrible abuses. The monitoring team apparently thought everything was fine and signed off on the factory continuing its operation.

Could you talk, or maybe make some suggestions about what we could do to make the monitoring by U.S. companies more effective?

MR. KERNAGHAN: Well, what we want to do is -- and we've actually discussed this with the companies and had some federal response, is to set up a workers' hotline where they receive a card from us which states Jordan's labor laws on one side, and the other side says that there's people willing to help them, that they should receive their passports back, that they can't be, you know, beaten and denied their wages -- their minimum wages and what not -- with a toll free number where they could call back to their home countries to women's groups, and human rights groups, and labor rights groups to ask for help. And they can report these violations confidentially.

We did this as an experiment on our trip to Jordan in May. We handed out these flyers. We are now getting calls from all across Jordan. It works. The workers are anxious to speak, desperate to speak, but they're terrified in the factories because the monitors parachute in. Even if they're well-meaning people, and many of them are -- many of them are really, truly dedicated to human rights. But the workers have to say to them, we only work eight hours a day.

In a factory we went to in Jordan on this trip in May with the U.S. delegation, we went to a factory that was mostly Chinese women workers, and we walked over to a woman with our translator and we asked the young woman inside the factory, how many hours a day do you work? And the woman started to actually, like, physically shake. She was very young, and she blurted out, I work eight hours a day, five days a week. And then she started to shake and then she started crying. And we obviously left her, not to terrorize her.

The owner of the factory was at the same time telling me, we work 12 hours a day six days a week. So the workers are so terrified that there's no way they could tell the truth inside the factories. So we need to have a system where the workers can feel confident who they're talking to. And what we're finding out with this -- the few flyers we handed in Bangladesh, we handed out 50 flyers with this information on it, -- call Bangladesh. Call the Bangladesh Center for Workers' Solidarity. Call the National Garment Workers' Federation. Here is their number. If you have complaints, call them. We'll try to help you. The calls are flooding in from all across Jordan.

So it will work if workers are given access to actually speak in confidence to people they trust and, you know, you can't fly a corporate monitor into the country to parachute into the factories for two or three days, if even that. Workers under those conditions cannot tell the truth because they're told, if we find out that you've criticized the factory you will never work here again.

So it's a situation which needs something independent.

MS. WALSH: And in your report you actually name by name a number of U.S. companies which are having their goods produced in these factories. What has the response been from those companies since your report was issued?

MR. KERNAGHAN: I would say surprisingly good, and I was caught off guard actually. But I'll tell you, the response on the part of many of the companies, companies you would expect clearly -- Levi Strauss, very strong; Phillips-Van Heusen, very strong, super strong; Gap, Sears, very strong. I think the U.S. companies can play a very positive role. I received a letter from J.C. Paynes (sp), vice president.

I actually think that the U.S. companies want to get it right in Jordan. They're committed to Jordan. We don't want them to pull out of the country. Those workers need the jobs. We just want them to, you know, guarantee that the workers' rights will be respected according to Jordanian law and international standards.

So, I note today the companies are actually meeting with the Jordanian Minister for Industry and Trade, so there's a large meeting today in Washington. So I think the response on the part of many of the companies has been very good.

I mentioned this, the L.L. Bean label, which is a very, you know, well-known company in the United States, being produced in a factory Saidan where these workers were beaten up and deported at gunpoint for a meeting with us. L.L. Bean wrote back to us and said, we have no connection to that factory whatsoever, and I figured we should -- you know, I told them we'll do further research and we'll get back to them. I was ready to pull that stuff.

And then the workers faxed us the L.L. Bean label. So it actually proves that there's this subcontracting going on that the companies don't even know about. So L.L. Bean checked and they could not track any productions to that factory, but, sure enough, the workers are making L.L. Bean. So they have to do more.

But this time around I would say the response on the part of the U.S. companies has been surprisingly good, and they've actually given us some inside information on why the workers never get paid their real wages, because they set the production goals so high that it's impossible to reach. So you have to keep working for free, five or six hours a night, to reach the production goal which itself is ridiculously impossible to reach, so they're working five or six hours a day without wages. And the companies want to try to crack down on that. So I'd say it's been very good.

MS. WALSH: And just one final question.

You also mention in your report the programs where U.S. AID has been training managers at these factories. You talk about the initial training on accounting or basic management principles, but not getting into issues of workers' rights or trafficking.

Have you had any conversations or interaction with AID since your report came out? Is that type of training still ongoing and is there a place there where we can talk to U.S. AID and get them to insert some of these other human rights issues into their training?

MR. KERNAGHAN: Well, it's a very important question, I think, and we did meet with U.S. embassy officials when we were in Jordan. We did not meet with U.S. AID. We haven't received any phone calls from them, but the role that they could play could be huge.

So, for example, the Jordanian government has said they will allow the local unions to accept these guest workers as members, which would some protection for the guest workers, obviously. The problem is, is that the union is not allowed to enter the factories. They told us when we were in Jordan that they've never -- they have prohibited it from entering the factories, and also they have no resources.

So if they don't have trained staff who can speak Bengali and speak Mandarin, and speak to the Sri Lankan workers, the fact that the guest workers can join the union is meaningless because if there's no resources there, the union won't be able to even speak with the workers let alone help them or accompany them. So I think there is a huge role here where resources would need to be put in to, like, the local union there so that it could actually be in contact with the workers and could, you know, accompany them and support them.

MS. WALSH: Thanks very much.

MR. KERNAGHAN: Thank you.

MS. WALSH: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

REP. SMITH: Thank you very much.

One final question if I could? What is the free labor movement like in India, and can it be used to improve the plight of the Dalits in bonded labor?

MR. KERNAGHAN: I'm not qualified to answer.

REP. SMITH: Ms. Cohn?

MS. COHN: I'm not qualified to answer.

REP. SMITH: Okay. Thank you. Thanks for your tender.

I want to thank our very distinguished witnesses for your testimony today, which will be used as we go forward on these issues. It gives us incredibly valuable insights to get the real feeling on the ground as to what is happening, and your recommendations will be very carefully weighed and I can assure you will find their way into policy as we go forward.

I also want to thank on our staff Maureen Walsh, who you just heard from; Eleanor Neggy (ph) who is our chief programs policy for this subcommittee; Lindsay Flumley (ph); Jonathon Bruno (ph), who is actually our intern and doing a fine job; Dorothy Taft (sp), the deputy chief of staff for the Helsinki Commission; and Mary Newitt (ph) who is my personal chief of staff, for all the work that they did into bringing this hearing together and all the work you do on this important human rights issue.

And thank you to the witnesses for your leadership.

The hearing is adjourned. #####

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Washington-Dateline General News

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2006 The Federal News Service, Inc.

351 of 445 DOCUMENTS

CQ Congressional Testimony

June 14, 2006 Wednesday

MODERN-DAY SLAVERYSECTION: CAPITOL HILL HEARING TESTIMONY*LENGTH: 2308 words

Statement of Chairman Christopher H. Smith

Committee on House International Relations Subcommittee on Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations

June 14, 2006

Good morning. The Subcommittee will today hear expert testimony concerning the scourge of human trafficking - modern day slavery. The U.S. Government estimates that 600,000 to 800,000 women, children and men are bought and sold across international borders each year and exploited through forced labor or commercial sex exploitation, and potentially millions more are trafficked internally within the borders of countries. Eighty percent of the victims are women and girls. An estimated 14,500 to 17,500 foreign citizens are trafficked into the United States each year.

And now we know well that many American girls and young women - many of whom start out as "runaways" - are bought, sold, abused, and raped throughout the United States.

(To combat the exploitation of Americans, the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2005 not only requires the Attorney General to conduct prevalence studies of sex trafficking and unlawful commercial sex acts in the U.S. but the new law requires both the Secretary of Health and Human Services and the Attorney General to prepare reports on best practices to reduce demand. For the first time, the new law also authorizes $20 million for a Health and Human Services grants program for U.S. victims, $10 million for long-term residential treatment facilities and provides $50 million for a new grants program for state and local law enforcement.) Today's hearing will focus on the findings in the State Department's sixth annual Trafficking in Persons Report, with a focus on progress made and on the significant challenges ahead.

The Committee is privileged to have as our special guest Julia Ormond in her capacity as the UN Goodwill Ambassador for the Abolition of Slavery and Human Trafficking.

Ms. Ormond has traveled to Ghana, India, Cambodia, and Thailand to raise awareness about the horrors of human trafficking. Ms. Ormond has been a leader on a number of humanitarian issues including AIDS and refugee issues. She is the founding Chair of Film Aid International and is well known for her film roles in numerous movies including "Legends of the Fall," "Sabrina," "First Knight," "Barber of Siberia" and many others. Ms. Ormond is also the Executive Producer of the 1996 Emmy award-winning documentary "Calling of the Ghosts," a story about two women in Bosnia, caught in war where rape was as much an everyday weapon as bullets and bombs. We are extremely honored and privileged to have her with us today. This is also the second of a two-part series of hearings on sex trafficking in connection with the World Cup soccer championship.

(http://wwwc.house.gov/international_relations/afhear.htm) The traffickers who use and abuse human beings as commodities to be bought and sold must be tracked down, their nefarious operations crushed and the individuals who commit these heinous crimes sent to jail for a long, long time. All profits derived from selling women and children into slavery must be seized and put to good use like providing some semblance of restitution to the victims or for the construction of shelters.

The TIP report itself is mandated by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA), which I sponsored and which was signed into law in October 2000. In 2003, I sponsored a reauthorization and expansion of that Act which also became law, and, on January 10, 2006, President Bush signed into law my third anti-trafficking bill the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2005.

These pieces of legislation have created a comprehensive framework for combating trafficking in persons abroad, the trafficking of foreign nationals into the United States, and the domestic trafficking of our own citizens. As a result, the United States has become a leader in addressing this human rights violation and encouraging other governments to do the same.

Since taking office, the Bush Administration has devoted more than $400 million to combat trafficking in more than 149 countries. The new law authorizes an additional $361 over two years to expand these efforts. Across the globe, governments are taking action to prevent trafficking, to prosecute the exploiters, and to give hope and restoration to those victimized by trafficking. With 4,700 convictions worldwide this year alone, the heinous crime of trafficking is at long last being punished. In the last two years alone, convictions have topped 7,700. Because a significant portion of U.S. foreign assistance is now contingent on whether a nation is meeting basic minimum standards specifically prescribed in the three TPVAs to prevent trafficking, protect victims and prosecute traffickers, 41 countries in the last year alone have passed tough new laws to end this modern day slavery. Shelters have been set up for victims. NGOs and faith communities have reached out to help heal survivors of trafficking.

I applaud Ambassador John Miller for keeping trafficking in the forefront of our human rights agenda and for the progress we are making. I also welcome the emphasis on forced labor in this year's report. Forced labor, in which people are enslaved and exploited for purposes of labor often within their own countries, is infrequently mentioned but affects anywhere from 4 to 27 million people worldwide. In places such as Saudi Arabia, Syria, Brazil, Jordan, Kuwait, and Taiwan - all ranked as Tier 3 or on the Tier 2 Watch List in this year's Report - foreign migrant workers or these countries' own citizens are trapped and held in slave-like working conditions. Not only must the victims be freed and properly compensated; their employers must be held responsible and forced labor punished as the heinous crime it is.

While the TIP report is good -- the best yet I would submit -- I am nevertheless disappointed that the State Department has again failed to place India on Tier 3 with other government who are not making significant antitrafficking efforts. Millions of men, women, and children, predominantly from India's Dalit caste, are in debt bondage and face involuntary servitude in brick kilns, rice mills, and zari embroidery factories. India's placement on the Tier 2 Watch List for the third consecutive year, despite its failure to create a national law enforcement response to the crime of trafficking, and its blatant unwillingness to address the massive problems of bonded labor and trafficking-related corruption, reeks of political considerations within the State Department overriding the facts about human trafficking. The Watch List was created by my legislation to send a clear warning and enable egregious offenders to make specific reforms. It's not a place to hide our friends who fail to make real improvements.

It is also deeply troubling that while some countries not only turn a blind eye to trafficking others embrace inhumane policies that actually facilitate or encourage the very crime they profess to abhor. Athletes and fans are gathering in Germany for one of the premiere, world-wide sporting events of our day, the 2006 FIFA World Cup, which opened last Friday. Over the course of one month at 12 venues throughout Germany, national soccer teams will be competing. Millions of fans will join in the festivities. For most soccer fans like myself, this quadrennial event is the showcase of world class athleticism and teamwork. But, looming in its shadow is the very real threat that the World Cup matches have become a catalyst and magnet for sex trafficking into Germany. Those that work with victims report that trafficking for the so-called sex industry often heightens during major sports events. In Germany, the problem is exacerbated by the legalization of prostitution.

Archbishop Agostino Marchetto, secretary of the Vatican's Pontifical Council for Migrants and Travelers, in a June 8th interview, observed that in Germany, many women are forced into prostitution. "This is a fundamental human rights violation," he said. "Women have become market commodities, which can be bought. And they cost less than a ticket for a football match."

For the last year, the German Government has prepared for the World Cup, coordinating security efforts with all neighboring countries, and attending to the myriad of details associated with such major international events. Traffickers have also worked overtime to exploit this opportunity to improve their illicit revenues through the expected rise in demand in the so-called "sex industry."

Sadly, this is not idle speculation. AFP reported over the weekend that police in Latvia arrested a man suspected of selling at least six women to German brothels. Latvian and German police collaborated in a monthlong investigation in which the suspect allegedly paid his friends 100 euros for each woman found. He, in turn, was paid 400 euros per woman by the German brothel.

We will hear testimony today from two women who have traveled from Russia to tell us about their horrific experiences being trafficked to Germany. Ms. Masha Gnezdilova (NEZ-DIL-OH-VAH) and Ms. Irina Veselykh (VEZ-EL-KAH) were deceived by offers of non-existent jobs in Germany, their passports seized, beaten, raped, and forced to work as prostitutes, controlled by the Russian mafia.

During the February meeting in Vienna, as Head of the U.S. Delegation and as Special Representative on Human Trafficking for the OSCE Parliamentary Assembly, I vigorously raised concerns about the trafficking prevention efforts for the World Cup. I was joined by other European parliamentarians who were sobered by the expectation that, especially since the matches are being held in Germany which legalized pimping and prostitution in 2001, the World Cup fans would be legally free to rape women in brothels or even in mobile units designed specifically for this form of exploitation. Of the approximately 400,000 prostitutes in Germany, it is estimated that 75 percent of those who are abused in these houses of prostitution are foreigners, many from Central and Eastern Europe.

The Trafficking Victims Protection Act requires the State Department to analyze and report annually on the efforts of governments to combat trafficking in persons around the world. Germany received a Tier 1 rating again this year meaning that the Government is meeting minimum standards to combat trafficking. Frankly, the German Government has done some good work to identify and protect victims of trafficking and to prosecute their exploiters. And yet, these efforts are at odds with its laws on legalized prostitution, and in some cases the facilitation of prostitution by local governments, which provides direct and indirect sanction for sex trafficking.

Legalized prostitution is not a policy that the German Government has to embrace. I am aware that the German Government is supporting public awareness efforts regarding trafficking for forced prostitution in the context of the World Cup. This is a somewhat absurd effort given that the legalized prostitution infrastructure is gearing up to expand its capacity during the World Cup and there is every reason to believe that the "new recruits" will be trafficked women and girls. I see this as flagrant state complicity in promoting sex trafficking. I believe Germany can do much more to prevent the sexual exploitation of women and children by attacking the demand that fuels this problem.

It is time for Chancellor Merkel to take a stand and speak out against the exploitation of women and children in the name of sport. I would encourage her government to turn the tables beginning now with the World Cup by committing to reverse Germany's laws on prostitution. In this regard, on June 9th I introduced House Resolution 860, calling on the Government of Germany to take immediate action to combat sex trafficking in connection with the 2006 FIFA World Cup. I ask that my Colleagues expeditiously support and move this bill forward to the House floor. As the world's attention is turned to soccer, those committed to ending the tragedy of trafficking of women and girls for sexual exploitation will be watching how Germany protects the most vulnerable.

Finally, let me say a few words about the prevention of trafficking by armed forces. In response to evils such as the sexual exploitation of young women and girls by UN peacekeepers in the Congo - some as young as 11 or 12, and in exchange for a banana or a dollar - the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2005 includes provisions requiring the US government to press international organizations to do more in this area.

Section 104(e)(1) requires the annual trafficking report to include information on measures taken by the UN, NATO, OSCE, and other similar bodies to prevent trafficking, and I am pleased to see the inclusion of such information in this year's report. Section 104(e)(2) requires a report by the Secretary of State at least 15 days prior to voting for a new or reauthorized peacekeeping mission which describes measures taken by the international organization to prevent trafficking and analyzes their effectiveness. I have not seen any such reports by the Department to date, and would ask for a clarification of where we are on this.

In conclusion, I look forward to hearing the testimony of all of our distinguished witnesses who have a vast amount of experience with these and other international trafficking issues. I now yield to my good friend and colleague from New Jersey, Mr. Payne, for his opening statement.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

COMMITTEE: HOUSE INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

SUBCOMMITTEE: AFRICA

TESTIMONY-BY: CHRISTOPHER H. SMITH, CHAIRMAN

Copyright 2006 Congressional Quarterly, Inc. All Rights Reserved.

352 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 14, 2006 Wednesday 5:40 AM EST

VOA NEWS: HOUSE COMMITTEE FOCUSES ON HUMAN TRAFFICKINGBYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 475 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The Voice of America issued the following story:

By Cindy Saine

A congressional subcommittee held a hearing Wednesday on the State Department's 2006 report on human trafficking around the world. British actress Julia Ormond, who is also a Goodwill Ambassador for the United Nations, told about meeting the victims of human trafficking in Ghana, India, Thailand and Cambodia.

The House subcommittee on human rights met to focus on human trafficking, which claims an estimated 800,000 victims around the world, mostly women and children.

Julia Ormond is the U.N.'s Goodwill Ambassador for the Abolition of Slavery and Human Trafficking. She told the subcommittee she has met girls as young as five who had been forced into prostitution, as clients increasingly seek virgins in the belief they will protect themselves from HIV / AIDS. Ormond said it is hard to appreciate the extent of the abuse.

"The reality is that not everyone survives this ordeal. These people are often functionally invisible. They lack either birth records through lack of birth registration or citizenship, or they lack legal status in a country. Not surprisingly, invisible people are incredibly disposable," she said.

Ormond hailed the work of non-governmental organizations in fighting human trafficking, but said nothing was as effective as governments that enforce their own laws to put an end to forced labor and sexual exploitation.

This year's State Department report listed Belize, Burma, Cuba, Iran, Laos, North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan, Venezuela and Zimbabwe as worst offenders, or Tier 3 countries, for failing to combat human trafficking. The State Department ranks countries into three groups, or tiers, with one being the best and three the worst.

Republican Congressman Christopher Smith criticized the State Department for not placing India in Tier 3, or worst offenders' list, for its massive problem with forced labor.

"India's placement on the Tier 2 watchlist for the third consecutive year, despite its failure to create a national law enforcement response to the crime of trafficking, and its blatant unwillingness to address the massive problems of bonded labor and trafficking-related corruption reeks of political considerations within the Department of State overriding the facts about human trafficking," he said.

In response, State Department official John Miller said India was not "gleeful" about the rating they received, and that the country has done some positive things. He said India is a friend, and the United States really wants to work with the Indian government on modern day slavery.

Congressman Smith also expressed concern about the World Cup soccer tournament in Germany serving as a magnet for forced prostitution. Miller said the German government was taking steps to prevent human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

353 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 14, 2006 Wednesday 2:17 AM EST

REP. SMITH COMMENTS ON 'MODERN-DAY SLAVERY: SPOTLIGHT ON 2006 TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT, FORCED LABOR, SEX TRAFFICKING AT WORLD CUP'

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 2280 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

At a hearing of the House Committee on International Relations subcommittee on Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations, Rep. Christopher H. Smith made the following statement:

Good morning. The Subcommittee will today hear expert testimony concerning the scourge of human trafficking - modern day slavery.

The U.S. Government estimates that 600,000 to 800,000 women, children and men are bought and sold across international borders each year and exploited through forced labor or commercial sex exploitation, and potentially millions more are trafficked internally within the borders of countries. Eighty percent of the victims are women and girls. An estimated 14,500 to 17,500 foreign citizens are trafficked into the United States each year.

And now we know well that many American girls and young women - many of whom start out as "runaways" - are bought, sold, abused, and raped throughout the United States.

(To combat the exploitation of Americans, the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2005 not only requires the Attorney General to conduct prevalence studies of sex trafficking and unlawful commercial sex acts in the U.S. but the new law requires both the Secretary of Health and Human Services and the Attorney General to prepare reports on best practices to reduce demand. For the first time, the new law also authorizes $20 million for a Health and Human Services grants program for U.S. victims, $10 million for long-term residential treatment facilities and provides $50 million for a new grants program for state and local law enforcement.)

Today's hearing will focus on the findings in the State Department's sixth annual Trafficking in Persons Report, with a focus on progress made and on the significant challenges ahead.

The Committee is privileged to have as our special guest Julia Ormond in her capacity as the UN Goodwill Ambassador for the Abolition of Slavery and Human Trafficking.

Ms. Ormond has traveled to Ghana, India, Cambodia, and Thailand to raise awareness about the horrors of human trafficking. Ms. Ormond has been a leader on a number of humanitarian issues including AIDS and refugee issues. She is the founding Chair of Film Aid International and is well known for her film roles in numerous movies including "Legends of the Fall," "Sabrina," "First Knight," "Barber of Siberia" and many others. Ms. Ormond is also the Executive Producer of the 1996 Emmy award-winning documentary "Calling of the Ghosts," a story about two women in Bosnia, caught in war where rape was as much an everyday weapon as bullets and bombs. We are extremely honored and privileged to have her with us today.

This is also the second of a two-part series of hearings on sex trafficking in connection with the World Cup soccer championship. (http://wwwc.house.gov/international_relations/afhear.htm)

The traffickers who use and abuse human beings as commodities to be bought and sold must be tracked down, their nefarious operations crushed and the individuals who commit these heinous crimes sent to jail for a long, long time. All profits derived from selling women and children into slavery must be seized and put to good use like providing some semblance of restitution to the victims or for the construction of shelters.

The TIP report itself is mandated by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA), which I sponsored and which was signed into law in October 2000. In 2003, I sponsored a reauthorization and expansion of that Act which also became law, and, on January 10, 2006, President Bush signed into law my third anti-trafficking bill--the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2005.

These pieces of legislation have created a comprehensive framework for combating trafficking in persons abroad, the trafficking of foreign nationals into the United States, and the domestic trafficking of our own citizens. As a result, the United States has become a leader in addressing this human rights violation and encouraging other governments to do the same.

Since taking office, the Bush Administration has devoted more than $400 million to combat trafficking in more than 149 countries. The new law authorizes an additional $361 over two years to expand these efforts. Across the globe, governments are taking action to prevent trafficking, to prosecute the exploiters, and to give hope and restoration to those victimized by trafficking. With 4,700 convictions worldwide this year alone, the heinous crime of trafficking is at long last being punished. In the last two years alone, convictions have topped 7,700. Because a significant portion of U.S. foreign assistance is now contingent on whether a nation is meeting basic minimum standards specifically prescribed in the three TPVAs to prevent trafficking, protect victims and prosecute traffickers, 41 countries in the last year alone have passed tough new laws to end this modern day slavery. Shelters have been set up for victims. NGOs and faith communities have reached out to help heal survivors of trafficking.

I applaud Ambassador John Miller for keeping trafficking in the forefront of our human rights agenda and for the progress we are making. I also welcome the emphasis on forced labor in this year's report. Forced labor, in which people are enslaved and exploited for purposes of labor often within their own countries, is infrequently mentioned but affects anywhere from 4 to 27 million people worldwide. In places such as Saudi Arabia, Syria, Brazil, Jordan, Kuwait, and Taiwan - all ranked as Tier 3 or on the Tier 2 Watch List in this year's Report - foreign migrant workers or these countries' own citizens are trapped and held in slave-like working conditions. Not only must the victims be freed and properly compensated; their employers must be held responsible and forced labor punished as the heinous crime it is.

While the TIP report is good - the best yet I would submit - I am nevertheless disappointed that the State Department has again failed to place India on Tier 3 with other government who are not making significant antitrafficking efforts. Millions of men, women, and children, predominantly from India's Dalit caste, are in debt bondage and face involuntary servitude in brick kilns, rice mills, and zari embroidery factories. India's placement on the Tier 2 Watch List for the third consecutive year, despite its failure to create a national law enforcement response to the crime of trafficking, and its blatant unwillingness to address the massive problems of bonded labor and trafficking-related corruption, reeks of political considerations within the State Department overriding the facts about human trafficking. The Watch List was created by my legislation to send a clear warning and enable egregious offenders to make specific reforms. It's not a place to hide our friends who fail to make real improvements.

It is also deeply troubling that while some countries not only turn a blind eye to trafficking others embrace inhumane policies that actually facilitate or encourage the very crime they profess to abhor.

Athletes and fans are gathering in Germany for one of the premiere, world-wide sporting events of our day, the 2006 FIFA World Cup, which opened last Friday. Over the course of one month at 12 venues throughout Germany, national soccer teams will be competing. Millions of fans will join in the festivities. For most soccer fans like myself, this quadrennial event is the showcase of world class athleticism and teamwork. But, looming in its shadow is the very real threat that the World Cup matches have become a catalyst and magnet for sex trafficking into Germany. Those that work with victims report that trafficking for the so-called sex industry often heightens during major sports events. In Germany, the problem is exacerbated by the legalization of prostitution.

Archbishop Agostino Marchetto, secretary of the Vatican's Pontifical Council for Migrants and Travelers, in a June 8th interview, observed that in Germany, many women are forced into prostitution. "This is a fundamental human rights violation," he said. "Women have become market commodities, which can be bought. And they cost less than a ticket for a football match."

For the last year, the German Government has prepared for the World Cup, coordinating security efforts with all neighboring countries, and attending to the myriad of details associated with such major international events. Traffickers have also worked overtime to exploit this opportunity to improve their illicit revenues through the expected rise in demand in the so-called "sex industry."

Sadly, this is not idle speculation. AFP reported over the weekend that police in Latvia arrested a man suspected of selling at least six women to German brothels. Latvian and German police collaborated in a monthlong investigation in which the suspect allegedly paid his friends 100 euros for each woman found. He, in turn, was paid 400 euros per woman by the German brothel.

We will hear testimony today from two women who have traveled from Russia to tell us about their horrific experiences being trafficked to Germany. Ms. Masha Gnezdilova (NEZ-DIL-OH-VAH) and Ms. Irina Veselykh (VEZ-EL-KAH) were deceived by offers of non-existent jobs in Germany, their passports seized, beaten, raped, and forced to work as prostitutes, controlled by the Russian mafia.

During the February meeting in Vienna, as Head of the U.S. Delegation and as Special Representative on Human Trafficking for the OSCE Parliamentary Assembly, I vigorously raised concerns about the trafficking prevention efforts for the World Cup. I was joined by other European parliamentarians who were sobered by the expectation that, especially since the matches are being held in Germany which legalized pimping and prostitution in 2001, the World Cup fans would be legally free to rape women in brothels or even in mobile units designed specifically for this form of exploitation. Of the approximately 400,000 prostitutes in Germany, it is estimated that 75 percent of those who are abused in these houses of prostitution are foreigners, many from Central and Eastern Europe.

The Trafficking Victims Protection Act requires the State Department to analyze and report annually on the efforts of governments to combat trafficking in persons around the world. Germany received a Tier 1 rating again this year--meaning that the Government is meeting minimum standards to combat trafficking. Frankly, the German Government has done some good work to identify and protect victims of trafficking and to prosecute their exploiters. And yet, these efforts are at odds with its laws on legalized prostitution, and in some cases the facilitation of prostitution by local governments, which provides direct and indirect sanction for sex trafficking.

Legalized prostitution is not a policy that the German Government has to embrace. I am aware that the German Government is supporting public awareness efforts regarding trafficking for forced prostitution in the context of the World Cup. This is a somewhat absurd effort given that the legalized prostitution infrastructure is gearing up to expand its capacity during the World Cup and there is every reason to believe that the "new recruits" will be trafficked women and girls. I see this as flagrant state complicity in promoting sex trafficking. I believe Germany can do much more to prevent the sexual exploitation of women and children by attacking the demand that fuels this problem.

It is time for Chancellor Merkel to take a stand and speak out against the exploitation of women and children in the name of sport. I would encourage her government to turn the tables--beginning now with the World Cup--by committing to reverse Germany's laws on prostitution.

In this regard, on June 9th I introduced House Resolution 860, calling on the Government of Germany to take immediate action to combat sex trafficking in connection with the 2006 FIFA World Cup. I ask that my Colleagues expeditiously support and move this bill forward to the House floor. As the world's attention is turned to soccer, those committed to ending the tragedy of trafficking of women and girls for sexual exploitation will be watching how Germany protects the most vulnerable.

Finally, let me say a few words about the prevention of trafficking by armed forces. In response to evils such as the sexual exploitation of young women and girls by UN peacekeepers in the Congo - some as young as 11 or 12, and in exchange for a banana or a dollar - the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2005 includes provisions requiring the US government to press international organizations to do more in this area. Section 104(e)(1) requires the annual trafficking report to include information on measures taken by the UN, NATO, OSCE, and other similar bodies to prevent trafficking, and I am pleased to see the inclusion of such information in this year's report. Section 104(e)(2) requires a report by the Secretary of State at least 15 days prior to voting for a new or reauthorized peacekeeping mission which describes measures taken by the international organization to prevent trafficking and analyzes their effectiveness. I have not seen any such reports by the Department to date, and would ask for a clarification of where we are on this.

In conclusion, I look forward to hearing the testimony of all of our distinguished witnesses who have a vast amount of experience with these and other international trafficking issues. I now yield to my good friend and colleague from New Jersey, Mr. Payne, for his opening statement.

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

354 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Voice of America News

June 14, 2006

US House Committee Focuses on Human Trafficking

SECTION: VOA ENGLISH SERVICE

LENGTH: 463 words

DATELINE: Washington

A congressional subcommittee held a hearing Wednesday on the State Department's 2006 report on human trafficking around the world. British actress Julia Ormond, who is also a Goodwill Ambassador for the United Nations, told about meeting the victims of human trafficking in Ghana, India, Thailand and Cambodia.

The House subcommittee on human rights met to focus on human trafficking, which claims an estimated 800,000 victims around the world, mostly women and children.

Julia Ormond is the U.N.'s Goodwill Ambassador for the Abolition of Slavery and Human Trafficking. She told the subcommittee she has met girls as young as five who had been forced into prostitution, as clients increasingly seek virgins in the belief they will protect themselves from HIV / AIDS. Ormond said it is hard to appreciate the extent of the abuse.

"The reality is that not everyone survives this ordeal. These people are often functionally invisible. They lack either birth records through lack of birth registration or citizenship, or they lack legal status in a country. Not surprisingly, invisible people are incredibly disposable," she said.

Ormond hailed the work of non-governmental organizations in fighting human trafficking, but said nothing was as effective as governments that enforce their own laws to put an end to forced labor and sexual exploitation.

This year's State Department report listed Belize, Burma, Cuba, Iran, Laos, North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan, Venezuela and Zimbabwe as worst offenders, or Tier 3 countries, for failing to combat human trafficking. The State Department ranks countries into three groups, or tiers, with one being the best and three the worst.

Republican Congressman Christopher Smith criticized the State Department for not placing India in Tier 3, or worst offenders' list, for its massive problem with forced labor.

"India's placement on the Tier 2 watchlist for the third consecutive year, despite its failure to create a national law enforcement response to the crime of trafficking, and its blatant unwillingness to address the massive problems of bonded labor and trafficking-related corruption reeks of political considerations within the Department of State overriding the facts about human trafficking," he said.

In response, State Department official John Miller said India was not "gleeful" about the rating they received, and that the country has done some positive things. He said India is a friend, and the United States really wants to work with the Indian government on modern day slavery.

Congressman Smith also expressed concern about the World Cup soccer tournament in Germany serving as a magnet for forced prostitution. Miller said the German government was taking steps to prevent human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Journal

Copyright 2006 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

355 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Washington Post

washingtonpost.com

The Washington Post

June 10, 2006 Saturday
Final Edition

Soccer With a Side of Slavery

BYLINE: Katherine Chon and Derek Ellerman

SECTION: Editorial; A19

LENGTH: 805 words

"It is truly scandalous. People are talking about women, importing them to satisfy the base instincts of people associated with football. It is humiliating enough for me that football is linked with alcohol and violence. But this is worse. It is slaves that will come and be put into houses. Human beings are being talked about like cattle, and football is linked with that."

-- Raymond Domenech, coach of the French World Cup soccer team

As the 2006 World Cup games get underway in Germany, tourists and soccer fans are being joined at the various competition venues by denizens of an international world of crime where human beings are bought and sold for profit.

Human trafficking is the third-largest criminal industry in the world, after arms and drugs. While soccer fans anticipate the excitement of the games, many of us in the anti-trafficking movement are deeply troubled by the expected surge of sex trafficking in Germany to meet the demand for commercial sex associated with the World Cup. It is estimated that more than 40,000 women and children will be imported to Germany during the month-long competition to provide commercial sex in the "mega-brothels," "quickie shacks," other legalized venues and vast underground networks that exist in Germany.

The traffickers and those who benefit from sex trafficking promote an image of women freely choosing to be involved in prostitution, making huge amounts of money at it and in general having a great time. It is the "Pretty Woman" myth, which many apparently like to believe in order to justify their inaction or ignorance on the issue.

But as our organization, Polaris Project, and many others like it that work every day with people in the sex industry know, this image does not reflect the reality on the streets and in the brothels for a majority of women and children.

In fact this is a world where violence and psychological abuse by the pimps, traffickers and customers are nearly ubiquitous. Research has shown that those who are prostituted face a 62 percent chance of being raped or gang-raped, a 73 percent chance of being physically assaulted, and a chance of dying that is 40 times greater than that of the average person in their age group. There is nothing "pretty" about the sex industry for the majority of people it victimizes.

From our experience as service providers for victims of trafficking, we know that large sporting events, conventions and other such gatherings are closely tied to a spike in demand for commercial sex and, in turn, for sex trafficking. Behind the trophies and cheers is the hidden suffering of women and children who bear the brunt of violence and abuse resulting from the rise in demand. Because of the link between demand and sex trafficking, we are troubled to see that the State Department gave Germany a Tier 1 compliance ranking in its annual Trafficking in Persons report released earlier this week, despite the German government's failure to address this problem.

Exacerbating all of the factors described above are the legalization of pimping and of the buying of commercial sex. The traffickers support legalization because they know that "regulation" has, in practice, meant a thin layer of regulated commercial sex businesses that have opted into the system, resting on top of a far larger group of illegal operations. The underground dealers have correctly calculated that greater profits can be generated through not paying taxes, ignoring basic safety standards for women and engaging in trafficking of children. Without a commensurately large, and politically unrealistic, apparatus to meaningfully monitor and police the thousands of underground operations, the increase in demand under a legalized system dramatically drives the expansion of this sector of sex trafficking. Unlike the success seen in countries such as Sweden, with its policies that decriminalize prostituted women and children but criminalize the buyers and controllers, failure has been the hallmark of the social experiment of full legalization.

The modern-day slave trade is the fastest-growing criminal industry in the world. There should be no country that is uncertain in its opposition to all the things that facilitate this egregious crime. Those who fail to act will surely face international condemnation now, and the judgment of history in the future. A time will come when they will be asked, "Where did you stand? What did you do?" We hope that the German government, soccer fans and governments and people everywhere, will be able to answer in sound conscience: We stood with the oppressed, and did everything in our power to stop these abuses.

The writers are co-executive directors and co-founders of Polaris Project, a Washington-based agency combating human trafficking and modern-day slavery.

LOAD-DATE: June 10, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

356 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Forward

June 9, 2006

Human Trafficking Report Slaps Israel

BYLINE: Ori Nir

SECTION: News; Pg. 5

LENGTH: 913 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The State Department has put Israel on a special "watch list," citing its "failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to address trafficking" in human beings.

In its annual Report on Human Trafficking, published Monday, the State Department contended that "the Government of Israel does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking" and has failed to show efforts to address "conditions of involuntary servitude allegedly facing thousands of foreign migrant workers." Specifically, the report chides Israel's government for not pushing to pass legislation criminalizing all forms of trafficking. It states that Israel "should also more vigorously enforce existing bans against charging recruitment fees and withholding passports, factors that contribute to the trafficking of workers."

This is the first time in four years that the administration has downgraded Israel's ranking, putting it in the unflattering company of Third World, mostly non-democratic regimes. The report classifies 149 countries into four groups. Most countries are in Tier 1, which means that they are effectively fighting human trafficking and reducing it to a minimum. A small minority, 12 countries that include Iran, Cuba, North Korea, Saudi Arabia and Sudan, are in the lowest, Tier 3. These are governments that have not made "significant efforts" to bring themselves "into compliance with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking in persons." Such countries may face the withholding of American foreign aid. In between, there is the Tier 2 category and the even more negative Tier 2 Watch List for countries that are seen as not doing enough to improve.

Trafficking is one of several areas in which Israel has come under U.S. scrutiny. Others include religious freedom, human rights generally and money laundering.

In 2001, when the first trafficking report was published, many were shocked to see Israel ranked in Tier 3. The main reason for this low ranking was the pervasive illegal importation of young women, mainly from Eastern European countries, for prostitution in Israel. Efforts by the Israeli government to confront the phenomenon convinced the State Department to upgrade Israel to Tier 2, where it has remained since 2002. This year, however, Israel found itself downgraded to the Tier 2 Watch List - one step away from being ranked again with the world's most notorious regimes on the issue.

In reaction to the report, Israel's Foreign Ministry issued a statement saying that Israel "is fighting with various tools" against the phenomenon of violating the rights of foreign workers. The statement also points out that the report is based only on data pertaining to the period of April 2004 to April 2005. In the past year, the Israeli statement says, there were "additional actions taken, which contributed significantly to advancing the battle against trafficking in people."

One explanation for Israel's drop this year is that the report focused not on sex-related trafficking but on migrant workers. And although the report noted the progress that Israel made in fighting the trafficking of women, it pointed out that the government "did not demonstrate significant efforts to improve its protection of labor trafficking victims." These victims, the report says, "do not receive adequate protection services. The government does not operate a shelter for their rehabilitation, housing them in detention facilities instead. Such victims are also frequently arrested and deported for violation of immigration regulations before they have an opportunity to testify against their employers. The government does not provide state funded legal aid to foreign workers, and often fails to include interpreters in judicial and deportation hearings."

John Miller, who directs the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, told reporters Monday that being on the Watch List is a "warning," and that some countries on that list are in danger of slipping to the lowest category.

An ironic twist is that Rahel Gershuni, de facto anti-trafficking coordinator of the Israeli government, is mentioned in the State Department report as one of 10 "heroes acting to end modern day slavery" worldwide. Gershuni was noted for having "tirelessly led the Israeli effort to fight sex trafficking."

The downgrading of Israel "is a sobering development that unfortunately reflects what we see every day on the ground," said Shevi Korzen, director of the Hotline for Migrant Workers, an Israeli legal-aid organization. Korzen said that the main problem facing migrant workers is their inability to leave an employer who often maltreats them. Migrant workers, she explained, are typically recruited overseas by local human resources contractors, who charge them large sums of money - often up to $15,000 - to ensure a work license in Israel. Some of that money is paid to Israeli dealers.

Often, Korzen said, these workers have to mortgage their homes to pay the large sum. In Israel, they find themselves bound to their employers. They can't travel back, because of the debt they left at home, but they are also not allowed to stay in Israel unless they are working for the Israeli employer who hired them to come to Israel.

In March, Israel's Supreme Court ruled that this policy, in practice for 13 years, was illegal. The court ordered the government to adopt a new one within six months. That process has not yet been completed.

LOAD-DATE: June 14, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: IMAGE

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

357 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Frontier Star

June 9, 2006 Friday

765 HUMAN SMUGGLERS ARRESTED: SHERPAOLENGTH: 211 words

ISLAMABAD: Federal Interior Minister Aftab Ahmed Sherpao has said that USA has lauded our tall efforts for the elimination of human smuggling, however India is still on a watch list. "During last one year, 765 human smugglers have been arrested and investigations underway while 92 have been punished," Sherpao expressed these views while addressing in a press conference in Parliament House on Friday.

Interior Minister said that according to a US Congress report concerning Human Smuggling, Pakistan is no longer in the watch list but India is. He said that US has lauded Pakistan in our efforts towards elimination of human trafficking underlining that it is satisfied with our investigation and prosecution of cases of human smuggling.

During the last one-year, cases against 765 culprits involved in human smuggling have been lodged stressing that 448 have been formally prosecuted.

He further said that we have constituted a special National Action Plan for the elimination of human smuggling that is not present in other neighbouring countries.

He said that Inter Agency Task Force has been set up under Secretary Interior to review the performance after 15 days besides a cell has also been set up in the Interior ministry for the elimination of human smuggling.

LOAD-DATE: June 14, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHDOCUMENT-TYPE: Trafficking/Smuggling; Law EnforcementPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2006 News Bites Pty Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

Global News Bites

358 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Nation

June 9, 2006 Friday

GOVERNMENT REPORTED 765 CASES OF HUMAN TRAFFICKINGLENGTH: 347 words

ISLAMABAD: The Ministry of Interior has welcomed the acknowledgement of Pakistan's efforts by United States in combating the menace of human trafficking in its 6th Annual Trafficking In-Person (TIP) Report presented by Secretary of State Condoleeza Rice to Congress. To prevent further victimization, United States underlined the need that Government of Pakistan should also step up its efforts to protect the privacy and identity of victims.

Briefing the newsmen in his Parliament chamber, Interior Minister Aftab Ahmed Khan Sherpao while quoting the TIP report said government of Pakistan has improved its efforts to investigate and prosecute human trafficking cases this year. He said that government has reported 765 cases of human smuggling, out of which 448 were filed for prosecution.

The US Congress has also appreciated the Pakistan government's initiative to introduce a bill in the National Assembly to expedite trafficking cases through the judicial system. Sherpao said Pakistan has been placed on tier 2 of TIP Report. He also told the reporters that in this regard, Ministry of Interior has taken several measures like establishment of national plan of action to combat trafficking, approval of special Anti-Human Trafficking Cell within the Ministry to coordinate its anti trafficking response.

He said that Ministry of Interior in collaboration with IOM opened a shelter for trafficking victims providing medical, psychological and legal care. Interior Minister was of the view that Pakistan is the only country in the region, which was placed on tier 2 as India and Bangladesh are still on watch list. Pakistan was excluded from Human Trafficking Watch List by the United States last year.

He said that Interior Ministry has also planned to involve NGOs, local/provincial governments to institute measures to address internal trafficking and broaden public awareness campaign to reach more at-risk population. Sherpao said that no data was made available by India regarding the filing and prosecution of trafficking cases. Besides, Bangladesh prosecuted 36 traffickers

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHDOCUMENT-TYPE: Trafficking/SmugglingPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2006 News Bites Pty Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

Global News Bites

359 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Nation (AsiaNet)

June 9, 2006 Friday

Government reported 765 cases of human trafficking

SECTION: NATIONWIDE INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 345 wordsDATELINE: ISLAMABAD JUN 09

The Ministry of Interior has welcomed the acknowledgement of Pakistan's efforts by United States in combating the menace of human trafficking in its 6th Annual Trafficking In-Person (TIP) Report presented by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to Congress. To prevent further victimization, United States underlined the need that Government of Pakistan should also step up its efforts to protect the privacy and identity of victims.

Briefing the newsmen in his Parliament chamber, Interior Minister Aftab Ahmed Khan Sherpao while quoting the TIP report said government of Pakistan has improved its efforts to investigate and prosecute human trafficking cases this year. He said that government has reported 765 cases of human smuggling, out of which 448 were filed for prosecution.

The US Congress has also appreciated the Pakistan government's initiative to introduce a bill in the National Assembly to expedite trafficking cases through the judicial system. Sherpao said Pakistan has been placed on tier 2 of TIP Report. He also told the reporters that in this regard, Ministry of Interior has taken several measures like establishment of national plan of action to combat trafficking, approval of special Anti-Human Trafficking Cell within the Ministry to coordinate its anti trafficking response.

He said that Ministry of Interior in collaboration with IOM opened a shelter for trafficking victims providing medical, psychological and legal care. Interior Minister was of the view that Pakistan is the only country in the region, which was placed on tier 2 as India and Bangladesh are still on watch list. Pakistan was excluded from Human Trafficking Watch List by the United States last year.

He said that Interior Ministry has also planned to involve NGOs, local/provincial governments to institute measures to address internal trafficking and broaden public awareness campaign to reach more at-risk population. Sherpao said that no data was made available by India regarding the filing and prosecution of trafficking cases. Besides, Bangladesh prosecuted 36 traffickers.

LOAD-DATE: June 11, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

360 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Nation (AsiaNet)

June 9, 2006 Friday

Government reported 765 cases of human trafficking

SECTION: NATIONWIDE INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 345 wordsDATELINE: ISLAMABAD JUN 09

The Ministry of Interior has welcomed the acknowledgement of Pakistan's efforts by United States in combating the menace of human trafficking in its 6th Annual Trafficking In-Person (TIP) Report presented by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to Congress. To prevent further victimization, United States underlined the need that Government of Pakistan should also step up its efforts to protect the privacy and identity of victims.

Briefing the newsmen in his Parliament chamber, Interior Minister Aftab Ahmed Khan Sherpao while quoting the TIP report said government of Pakistan has improved its efforts to investigate and prosecute human trafficking cases this year. He said that government has reported 765 cases of human smuggling, out of which 448 were filed for prosecution.

The US Congress has also appreciated the Pakistan government's initiative to introduce a bill in the National Assembly to expedite trafficking cases through the judicial system. Sherpao said Pakistan has been placed on tier 2 of TIP Report. He also told the reporters that in this regard, Ministry of Interior has taken several measures like establishment of national plan of action to combat trafficking, approval of special Anti-Human Trafficking Cell within the Ministry to coordinate its anti trafficking response.

He said that Ministry of Interior in collaboration with IOM opened a shelter for trafficking victims providing medical, psychological and legal care. Interior Minister was of the view that Pakistan is the only country in the region, which was placed on tier 2 as India and Bangladesh are still on watch list. Pakistan was excluded from Human Trafficking Watch List by the United States last year.

He said that Interior Ministry has also planned to involve NGOs, local/provincial governments to institute measures to address internal trafficking and broaden public awareness campaign to reach more at-risk population. Sherpao said that no data was made available by India regarding the filing and prosecution of trafficking cases. Besides, Bangladesh prosecuted 36 traffickers.

LOAD-DATE: June 12, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

361 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Washington Times

June 9, 2006 Friday

BYLINE: By John McCaslin, THE WASHINGTON TIMESSECTION: WORLD; EMBASSY ROW; Pg. A16LENGTH: 648 words

Economic threads

A top Greek official compared his country's economic diplomacy to Lilliputians trying to restrain Gulliver from wreaking havoc in the world.

Theodore Skylakakis called economic diplomacy a long-range antidote to many international conflicts because trade relations are like "threads interconnecting people, organizations, regions and countries."

"If enough such threads form the relations among countries, then gradually the destructive forces motivating conflicts will find themselves constrained and defeated by this net of intersecting economic threads," Mr. Skylakakis, secretary-general of the Greek Foreign Ministry, told a Washington audience this week.

"These destructive forces have long existed, and they will not disappear overnight. But like the ropes of the Lilliputians, the multiple threats of economic relations, given enough time, can restrain and immobilize the Gulliver who wreaks havoc in the world."

He told the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars that Greece's practice of economic diplomacy includes the promotion of international trade, the reduction of costs and risks in cross-border transactions, the security of property rights and the facilitation of the political climate to support those principles.

"This is a great challenge, especially for governments that must contend with the forces of economic nationalism, cultural anxieties, embedded corruption and resistance to reform," he said.

"Economic diplomacy is necessarily a long-term process. Its results start showing not in mere months or years, but rather in a decade or even longer. So it cannot be effective by itself when a situation rapidly and unexpectedly deteriorates toward conflict."

Mr. Skylakakis cited Greece's relations with Turkey as an example of economic diplomacy. He noted that his country, once a rival of Turkey's, is now its biggest advocate for membership in the European Union.

"Greece took the brave decision to encourage and support Turkish candidacy," he said.

"We believe that if Turkey proceeds with the reforms necessary for European integration, both our countries, and the broader region, will enjoy very substantial political, economic and security benefits."

Mr. Skylakakis also noted such joint economic projects as the natural-gas pipeline being built from Baku, Azerbaijan, through Turkey and Greece and into Italy.

Corrupt Cambodia

Cambodia's government might be drenched in corruption, but it made significant progress in the fight against human trafficking, the U.S. Embassy said this week.

"The record over the past year demonstrates the high-level commitment by the [Cambodian government] and the prime minister to improve the government's performance in fighting trafficking in persons," said Mark C. Storella, charge d'affaires at the embassy in the Cambodian capital, Phnom Penh.

The State Department's "2006 Trafficking in Persons Report" recognized Cambodia's progress by promoting it to a Tier 2 nation from the bottom ranking of Tier 3. The new status means that Cambodia does not fully comply with international standards but is making progress in the fight to end sexual exploitation and forced labor of women and children.

The department urged Cambodia to "make greater efforts to prosecute and convict public officials who profit from or are involved in trafficking and should also pass and enact comprehensive anti-trafficking legislation," the embassy said.

It noted that Cambodia's efforts are "hampered by corruption at all levels of government and by ineffectual judicial system."

Interior Ministry spokesman Khieu Sopheak called the new status a "reflection of reality."

"It is good news," he told Japan's Kyodo News. "We welcome such fair and positive assessment based on the fact that we are committed to fighting against human trafficking."

* Call Embassy Row at 202/636-3297, fax 202/832-7278 or e-mail jmorrison@washingtontimes.com.

LOAD-DATE: June 9, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

362 of 445 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Latin America - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 8, 2006 Thursday

Belize rejects US State Department's human-trafficking charges

LENGTH: 618 words

Text of report by Caribbean Media Corporation news agency website on 8 June

Belmopan, Belize: Belize Prime Minister Said Musa is insisting that his country is addressing the problems of human trafficking while slamming the US State Department for seeking to pass judgement on the Caribbean Community state.

"When you analyse the issue of human trafficking, we have done a lot in this country to address this issue.

"Police, the immigration, people have raided constantly in addressing this issue of prostitution for instance and the whole question of human trafficking we've done a lot.

"But those who seek to judge us should perhaps examine their own decadent societies before they come and pass judgement on us," he told reporters Wednesday in response to the US State Department's Human Trafficking Report which gave Belize a "Tier 3" rating.

Musa said he did not think it was coincidence that Belize is "now lumped and almost put in a box so to speak with, Belize, Venezuela and Cuba".

In its latest report released this week, the Department gave Belize the "Tier 3' rating, which is reserved for countries whose governments do not comply with the minimum standards to prevent trafficking and which are not making significant efforts to do so.

The other two Caricom countries detailed in the report, Guyana and Jamaica, were placed in Tier 2, which indicated that while their governments do not fully comply with minimum standards they were making significant efforts to bring themselves in compliance with those standards.

Haiti and the Bahamas were placed in a special category, as their countries were not assessed for different reasons.

However, while they were not noted as source points for human trafficking, the State Department identified Barbados and Suriname as two countries where Guyanese young girls and women were being trafficked to for sexual exploitation.

In relation to Belize, the report said Belize was "the source, transit and destination country for men, women and children trafficked for the purposes of labour and sexual exploitation. Women and girls are trafficked to Belize, mainly from Central America, and exploited in prostitution."

The report said the country's largely unmonitored borders with Guatemala, Honduras and Mexico facilitated the movement of illegal migrants who were vulnerable to traffickers.

In the face of these activities, the State Department charged that Belize failed to show evidence of significant law enforcement or victim protection efforts over the last year.

"Laws against trafficking remained weak and largely unenforced, adult victims received no attention or assistance and the government made no significant effort to raise public awareness and work with vulnerable populations," it concluded.

It relation to Guyana it noted that government had increased financial support for nongovernmental organizations to provide victim assistance and expand prevention activities, but needed to expand its efforts to include more rural officials, aggressively pursue traffickers and continuing working with NGOs.

The report said that having been placed in Tier 3 last year, Jamaica launched a public awareness campaign, created an inter-agency task force to coordinate anti-trafficking matters and appointed police officers to handle trafficking-related investigations.

However it said, "government should increase law enforcement efforts and take strong action against corruption that may impede progress in this area".

On Tuesday Information Minister Colin Campbell expressed satisfaction with the report which acknowledged Jamaica's efforts with dealing with the problem.

Source: Caribbean Media Corporation news agency website, Bridgetown, in English 1620 gmt 8 Jun 06

LOAD-DATE: June 8, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2006 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

363 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

June 7, 2006 Wednesday 10:15 PM TSTFAMILY HELPERS TO BE SUBJECT TO LABOR STANDARDS LAW PROTECTION: CLA*BYLINE: Elisa KaoLENGTH: 164 wordsDATELINE: Taipei, June 7

Officials of the Council of Labor Affairs (CLA) said Wednesday that they are considering including family helpers under the Labor Standards Law to further protect their interests.

The CLA officials made the remarks after the annual Trafficking in Persons Report released recently by the U.S. State Department downgraded Taiwan's labor situation to the "tier 2 watch list" along with underdeveloped or least developed countries.

In response to questions from reporters, U.S. State Department officials said Taiwan's labor situation being downgraded was due to too much forced labor meted out to foreign caregivers.

CLA officials said the agency has been working on including family helpers under the Labor Standards Law, but claimed that as the agency still has to work on many other details concerning the issue, such as fixing reasonable labor conditions for foreign caregivers, the CLA will hold several surveys among foreign caregivers and consult with experts to draw final conclusions.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

364 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

June 7, 2006 Wednesday 10:28 AM TST

TAIWAN VOWS TO STEP UP CRACKDOWN ON HUMAN TRAFFICKINGBYLINE: Sofia WuLENGTH: 184 words

(repeat)

Taipei, June 6 (CNA) Interior Minister Lee Yi-yang said Tuesday the government will step up crackdown on human trafficking and has outlawed cross-border marriage matchmaking to prevent human trafficking.

Lee made the remarks after the newly released U.S. annual report on trafficking in persons places Taiwan on a "Tier 2 Watch List" for not fully complying with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking.

The U.S. report said Taiwan has failed to show evidence of increasing efforts over the past year to address trafficking, despite ample resources to do so, particularly to address the serious level of forced labor and sexual servitude among legally migrating Southeast Asian contract workers and brides.

Lee said the government is determined to devote more energies and resources to clamp down on human trafficking. Under the newly revised immigration law, no more marriage brokerage companies can be set up and existing marriage matchmaking firms will be subject to stricter regulations and monitoring to prevent cross-border human trafficking in guise of marriage matchmaking.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 Central News Agency
All Rights Reserved

365 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Indo-Asian News Service

June 7, 2006 Wednesday 3:54 PM EST

US sticks to its guns on India-critical slavery report

BYLINE: Indo-Asian News Service

LENGTH: 405 words

DATELINE: Washington

Washington, June 7 -- The United States Tuesday defended its sharp criticism of India in a report on human trafficking, saying the fact that many friends and allies ended up on its watch lists demonstrated Washington's commitment to ending what it calls "modern-day slavery".

Seeking to soft pedal India's sharp reaction to the report, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said listing of countries in various tiers was merely a mechanism to try to solve the problem and was not meant to brand any particular country.

Suggesting that there hadn't been "any particular reaction from the Indian government", he claimed that the US Trafficking in Persons Office tries to gather the best information working with host governments on the issue, and the report reflected "their best judgment based on an objective set of criteria."

"There are many countries who are our friends and allies who end up in Tier 3 or on the Tier 2 Watch List, and that I think is a real demonstration of our commitment to this. This is a hard issue and that we are going to speak out clearly and in public on it," McCormack said.

The whole idea behind listing the various countries and the governments in terms of what steps they have taken on to fight trafficking in persons is to try to solve the problem that both President George Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice took seriously, he said.

"What we want to do is work with governments to try to resolve the problem - work with those governments so that they can take steps, they can change their laws, they can change their regulations to fight trafficking in persons."

"So the actual list itself is more of a mechanism. It's not meant to - it's not meant to brand any particular country, although there are some countries that have sort of - have remained on the list for quite some time," he said.

Citing Malawi, Ecuador and a few others as good examples of countries moving up from the bottom Tier 3 up to Tier 1, McCormack said, the visible improvements in those countries was a demonstration of the utility of talking about the issue in public.

The US report on trafficking in persons evoked a sharp reaction in India with New Delhi taking strong objection to the US tendency to issue reports based on "preconceptions," and rejecting the "judgemental and prescriptive approach by a foreign government".

Published by HT Syndication with permission from Indo-Asian News Service.

For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 8, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

366 of 445 DOCUMENTS

IPR Strategic Business Information Database

June 7, 2006GOVT. RESPONDS TO POOR ANTI-TRAFFICKING RANKING*LENGTH: 154 wordsDATELINE: BAHRAIN

According to "Bahrain Tribune", the government has defended the Kingdom's ranking given out by the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, which put Bahrain on the Tier 2 Watch list in its latest report on global human-trafficking. The news is not unexpected in human rights circles in the Kingdom. A workshop in March prepared the ground by commending Bahrain for 'making significant efforts' to comply with higher standards. The Assistant Undersecretary for Co-ordination and Follow-up at the Ministry for Foreign Affairs, Shaikh Abdulaziz bin Mubarak Al Khalifa, said that the Kingdom was committed to making a difference in its fight against human-trafficking before the year-end. Shaikh Abdulaziz said Bahrain is considering stricter laws with stiff penalties and updating the database of human-trafficking and abuse reports so that proper information would be in place for the implementation of new measures.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

367 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Jerusalem Post

June 7, 2006, Wednesday

'Censure must spur Israel to action' Government admits foreign workers' rights being disregarded

BYLINE: Ruth Eglash And Herb Keinon

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 2

LENGTH: 641 words

Israeli human rights groups welcomed the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report Tuesday and were hopeful that Israel's poor showing - it was placed in the Tier 2 (Watch List) category - would propel the government and other official bodies into taking immediate action.

Shevy Korzen executive director of the Hotline for Migrant Workers one of several organizations involved in the fight against slave labor and sexual exploitation against women warned The Jerusalem Post that if Israel fails to tackle this growing problem "it could fall into the final Tier 3 group which could include economic sanctions."

Tier 3 countries are those whose governments "do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so."

In previous years Israel was in the Tier 2 category of countries whose governments do not fully comply with the Trafficking Victims Protection Act but are making significant efforts to do so.

"Progress has been made by the government in the fight against sex trafficking but the situation for labor trafficking has gravely deteriorated said Korzen. If it were not for the progress made in the sex industry I have no doubt that Israel would have been labeled Tier 3. I hope this will act as a sign to the government to start taking this issue seriously."

The Foreign Ministry issued a response to the report saying that the situation regarding foreign workers in Israel is not as bad as indicated by the report. It claimed that the problems highlighted in the report were not widespread but limited to "isolated incidents." At the same time the statement admitted there was a problem with the rights of foreign workers being disregarded something that the state was trying to combat.

The report also criticized Israel's current anti- trafficking law which does not cover forms of labor trafficking. The Foreign Ministry said that a bill criminalizing human trafficking had passed its first reading in the Knesset.

Roni Aloni-Sadovnik spokeswoman for the Task Force on Human Trafficking (TFHT) - a project of the non- profit organization ATZUM - commented that Israel's standing in the report was mainly due to the government's failure to take the problem seriously. She also said that the police needed to take more action in catching those running trafficking operations in Israel.

A spokesman for Interior Minister Avi Dichter said his ministry would work together with the police to draft a strategy for combating the problem which would be brought before the government and prime minister for approval within the next few weeks.

"More needs to be done to break the vicious cycle of human trafficking commented Ayelet Lahmi coordinator of activities against human trafficking at Amnesty Israel.

She said that one of the biggest problems was the lack of shelters and a viable witness protection program to help get the victims out of the cycle of forced labor and prostitution.

And even though the Foreign Ministry highlighted to the US State Department the improvements Israel has made in providing shelters Lahmi said the one shelter that exists is not enough to help the estimated 4 0 women working in Israel's sex industry. And Korzan of the Hotline for Migrant Workers added that no such program existed for foreign workers trying to escape forced labor.

As well as the negative aspects the report did comment on some of the positive steps taken by the country. The ministry said the State Department had named Rachel Gershuni Israel's interministerial coordinator on the issue as one of ten heroes acting to end modern day slavery" around the world.

The Foreign Ministry praised the State Department for its report saying Israel would study the document and use it to help Israel improve the means to battle human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: January 10, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2006 The Jerusalem Post

368 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Korea Times

June 7, 2006 Wednesday

US Questions Legitimacy of Kaesong Wage System

LENGTH: 465 words

By Christopher Carpenter

The United States is concerned wages intended for North Korean employees working for South Korean companies in the Kaesong Industrial Complex may be going to the North Korean government instead.

A U.S. State Department report on global human trafficking released Monday placed the communist nation in "Tier 3" in terms of human trafficking. The lowest ranking possible, tier 3 is given to governments that do not comply with even minimum standards and are make no effort to do so.

"The DPRK regime reportedly provides workers for foreign investors operating in North Korean industrial parks," the Trafficking in Persons Report said.

DPRK, or the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, is North Korea's official name.

"There are concerns that this labor may be exploitative, with the DPRK government keeping most or all of the foreign exchange paid and then paying workers in local, non-convertible currency," it said.

South Korean manufacturers have set up production plants in Kaesong, a North Korean city just inside the inter-Korean border, combining their capital with cheap North Korean labor to be more price-competitive.

Because of wide differences between official and black market foreign exchange rates, critics believe the North Korean government takes the majority of the workers' wages.

The report notes allegations that North Korea sends its workers to countries like Mongolia, Russia and the Czech Republic, many of them coercively.

With Seoul and Washington starting free trade agreement (FTA) negotiations this week, and South Korea wanting Kaesong products recognized as "Made in South Korea," U.S. officials have not been receptive, raising questions about labor standards at Kaesong and about exactly where the North Koreans' wages are going.

John Miller, senior adviser to the secretary of state, emphasized that although working conditions of these people may be better than in North Korea, they should still be considered trafficking victims.

"They lack freedom," he said at a news conference. "It's not clear that they get any money, whether the money goes to them or the North Korean government. We are talking about forced labor."

South Korea was put in "Tier 1" with nations fully complying with minimum standards.

Regarding South Korea, the report gave high marks to a 2004 law punishing involvement in the sex-trade and related fields.

"The law sends a clear message that the government is serious about taking action against a crime that went largely unpunished in the past," the report said.

Seoul has also successfully worked with U.S. Forces Korea to address sexual exploitation around American bases in South Korea, it said.

"As a result, sources suggest a significant decline in the number of foreign women working near U.S. bases," the report said.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2006 The Korea Times
All Rights Reserved

369 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Manila Times

June 7, 2006 Wednesday

WASHINGTON STRIKES RP OFF HUMAN-TRAFFICKING WATCHLIST BUT ASKS GOVERNMENT TO PROSECUTE OFFICIALS INVOLVED IN THE CRIME

BYLINE: By Jonathan vicente, Reporter

LENGTH: 479 words

THE US State Department has removed the Philippines from its human trafficking watchlist but at the same time asked the Philippine government to prosecute public officials and syndicates involved in human smuggling.

The US government has released on its website the 2006 annual report on human trafficking, which cited the country's improvement in battling human smuggling.

"The Philippine government made discernible progress in its antitrafficking law-enforcement efforts in 2005. In particular, the government made progress in prosecuting human traffickers," the US report said.

Embassy officials said that based on the latest State Department report, the Philippines is no longer on the "Tier 2" watchlist.

The US report said over the last few years, the Philippine government stepped up efforts to enforce its antitrafficking law and made initial progress in implementing strategies to combat trafficking in persons, particularly the prosecution of human traffickers.

Following the imposition by the Japanese government of stricter requirements for entertainer visas, the number of Filipino women given Tokyo visas dropped by almost half in 2005 compared with 2004, the US report added.

The US government, however, advised Manila to shift its focus on prosecuting and convicting traffickers and public officials involved in human smuggling.

The report said that last year alone, 67 human trafficking-related cases were investigated and another 31 cases were filed for prosecution. Two cases resulted in the conviction of four individuals for trafficking offenses, with the courts handing down life sentences to the traffickers and awarding compensation to the victims.

Two additional cases led to convictions under the 2003 antitrafficking law, but the human smugglers pleaded guilty to a lesser offense-and were sentenced to six months of community service and a fine instead of imprisonment.

In justifying Manila's removal from the high-level watchlist, the US government said the Philippine Department of Justice tripled the number of prosecutors handling trafficking cases at the national level and assigned additional prosecutors at the regional level to focus on human-trafficking cases, "resulting in a fourfold increase in the number of investigative cases presented for prosecution under the 2003 antitrafficking law."

Justice Secretary Raul M. Gonzalez also ordered all prosecutors to give preferential attention to human trafficking cases and to oppose any motion for dismissal for lack of testimony by witnesses or where the defendant has made a financial settlement with the victim or family members.

The US report, however, said corruption and a weak judiciary remain serious impediments to the effective prosecution of traffickers. "Despite widespread reports of law-enforcement officials' complicity in trafficking, the government prosecuted only one such official."

LOAD-DATE: June 8, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Trafficking/Smuggling

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2006 News Bites Pty Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

Global News Bites

370 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Moscow Times

June 7, 2006 Wednesday

U.S. Tells Russia to Fight Trafficking

BYLINE: Anastasiya Lebedev, Staff Writer

LENGTH: 462 words

Russia must do more to curb human trafficking, a new U.S. State Department report says. For the third year in a row, the country landed on the department's watch list.

Russia was also criticized for delaying legislation providing money for shelters and medical and psychological assistance for victims.

The sixth annual Trafficking in Persons report was released Monday in Washington.

"Today, victim protection and assistance is provided on an ad hoc basis and is highly dependent upon local and regional authorities," the report said.

According to the report, trafficking victims come from, travel through and end up in Russia. Victims include those used for forced labor, prostitution and child sex tourism. Corruption among police officers and border guards, who accept bribes from traffickers, compound the problem, the report said.

Of Russia's 5 million illegal immigrants, 1 million are thought to be victims of forced labor, which includes construction- and agriculture-related work, the report said, citing the International Labor Organization.

Asona Kadyrova, a lawyer at the Angel Coalition, an umbrella organization of anti-trafficking NGOs operating in nine Russian regions, said the coalition had given advice to 5,233 people who called their emergency phone line since 2004. The phone line services victims, relatives and others concerned about trafficking and working abroad. The coalition has also given shelter, legal consultation and other help to 727 trafficking victims since 2003, Kadyrova said.

Anti-trafficking experts met Tuesday in Moscow to discuss a possible study on trafficking in Moscow and the Moscow region, Maria Melnikova of the International Organization for Migration said. For now, she said, there are no reliable statistics.

The U.S. report stated that Russia had improved its law enforcement efforts, noting that the numbers of prosecutions and investigations had risen. But it also criticized the country for imposing inconsistent and, at times, inadequate sentences on traffickers.

The watch list includes countries whose governments do not meet the State Department's minimum criteria for fighting human trafficking and are not doing enough to improve the situation. Other countries on the list are Cambodia, China, Brazil, Israel, United Arab Emirates, Egypt and Cyprus.

Only 12 countries, including North Korea and Sudan, are considered to be doing a worse job than Russia at combatting trafficking, the report said.

Melnikova said an anti-trafficking bill was being reviewed by government officials. Work began in 2003.

The bill would provide money and facilitate coordination between state agencies and NGOs. Melnikova said the International Organization for Migration plans to open a shelter in Moscow for trafficking victims by the fall.

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2006 Independent Press
All Rights Reserved

371 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Washington Times

June 7, 2006 Wednesday

BYLINE: By James Morrison, THE WASHINGTON TIMESSECTION: WORLD; EMBASSY ROW; Pg. A17LENGTH: 649 words

Mixed message

The U.S. ambassador to India praised the government in New Delhi for "taking action" against human trafficking a day after the State Department criticized India for failing to meet "minimum standards" to stop sexual slavery and forced labor.

"Recognizing trafficking is an important issue, the [Indian] government is taking action," Ambassador David C. Mulford wrote in an article in the Times of India.

Mr. Mulford noted that the government created a minister of state for women and child development, elevating a former bureaucratic agency and "raising the profile of the government's anti-trafficking agenda."

"The central government is also pursuing initiatives that would establish media-awareness campaigns, coordinate national enforcement of anti-trafficking laws and expand coordination of government efforts at the national and state levels," he wrote.

Mr. Mulford noted that the U.S. Embassy in the capital and U.S. consulates in other cities are providing assistance to the Indian government and that Washington is contributing $9 million to 24 projects throughout the country to combat human trafficking.

"We have a good working relationship with our counterparts at all levels of the Indian government and support current legislation that would strengthen laws and penalties against traffickers," wrote Mr. Mulford, a political appointee and former business executive.

The ambassador's assessment of India's response to women and children exploited in sex rings and men and women held in involuntary servitude contrasted sharply with the review of India in the State Department's annual report on human trafficking.

"The government of India does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however it is making significant efforts to do so," said the report, released Monday.

"India is placed on [the] Tier 2 Watch List for the third consecutive year due to its failure to show evidence of increasing efforts to address trafficking in persons."

The report assigns nations to three categories with Tier 1 countries in full compliance and Tier 3 at the bottom. Countries on the Tier 2 watch list risk being downgraded and losing U.S. humanitarian assistance.

India yesterday denounced the report and complained that the State Department failed to consider its "active cooperation" with the United States.

"On the subject of trafficking in persons, .. we reject judgmental and prescriptive approach by a foreign government," the Foreign Ministry said.

Liberty bonds

Israeli Ambassador Daniel Ayalon looked to the American Liberty Bell for inspiration when he spoke on the 50th anniversary of the Israel Bonds' Ambassador's Ball.

"The Bible tells us that the 50th anniversary, or 'jubilee,' is a special time, a time to celebrate liberty and freedom," he said at Monday's soiree.

Mr. Ayalon noted that a portion of a verse from the Book of Leviticus was inscribed on the Liberty Bell, most famous for ringing in 1776 to proclaim American independence.

"And you shall sanctify the 50th year and proclaim liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof. It shall be a jubilee unto you," he said.

"Crucial to liberty is freedom of religion," Mr. Ayalon added, noting that June 7 is also Jerusalem Day, which commemorates the Israeli conquest of the divided city in the 1967 war. The Israeli government proclaimed Jerusalem the national capital and guaranteed Jews, Muslims and Christians access to their holy sites in the city.

"Only after the liberation and unification of Jerusalem could followers of all religions enjoy their most basic rights," he said.

The annual Ambassador's Ball promotes the financial instruments that have underpinned the Israeli economy. More than $26 billion in bonds have been sold since they were first issued in 1951.

* Call Embassy Row at 202/636-3297, fax 202/832-7278 or e-mail jmorrison@washingtontimes.com.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2006 The Washington Times LLC
All Rights Reserved

372 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Xinhua General News Service

June 7, 2006 Wednesday 10:00 PM EST

Venezuela rejects U.S. report on human trafficking

SECTION: WORLD NEWS; PoliticalLENGTH: 171 wordsDATELINE: CARACAS

The Venezuelan government on Tuesday rejected a U.S. report which rated Venezuela's fight against human trafficking poorly, saying it was "part of the greater campaign to discredit President Hugo Chavez."

Venezuelan National Assembly legislators had passed laws against people trafficking and the government planned to invest 170,000 U.S. dollars in fighting the trade during 2006, said a statement issued by the Venezuelan embassy in the United States.

In its annual Trafficking in Persons Report of the U.S. State Department, Venezuela was listed among 12 nations rated "Tier 3": the worst offenders who could face sanctions if they do not take counter-measures within 90 days.

During the last 12 months, Venezuelan authorities have made great efforts to protect victims of human trafficking, sentence smugglers, and help police and public institutions to solve the problem, the Venezuelan press reported.

There was no evidence to support the U.S. government's accusations, the statement added.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 Xinhua News Agency

373 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Xinhua General News Service

June 7, 2006 Wednesday 10:00 PM EST

Major news items in leading Philippine newspapers

SECTION: WORLD NEWS

LENGTH: 120 words

DATELINE: MANILA

The following are major news items in leading Philippine newspapers on Wednesday:

Manila Bulletin:

-- President Arroyo threatened on Tuesday to veto the proposed 2006 national budget if lawmakers insisted on large reductions that would jeopardize the government's pro-poor programs.

Philippine Daily Inquirer:

-- In a move that would benefit about 1,000 people on death row, the Senate and the House of Representatives Tuesday crossed party lines to approve the abolition of the death penalty.

The Philippine Star:

-- The Philippines has improved its ranking in the United States' watch list of human trafficking violators, owing to its efforts at combating modern-day sex and labor slavery.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

374 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 6, 2006 Tuesday 9:27 PM GMT

US govt points to Nigeria's fight against human trafficking

LENGTH: 322 wordsDATELINE: LAGOS, June 6 2006

The US government has called attention to Nigeria's efforts in the fight against human trafficking, which despite showing some progress still fall short of complying with the "minimum standards" for eliminating the vice.

"The sixth annual Department of State Trafficking in Persons Report was released on Monday, June 5. Nigeria is categorized in the report as Tier 2," the US embassy in Nigeria said in a statement.

"The report said the government of Nigeria does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, but it is making significant efforts to do so," the text said.

It said the government continued to strengthen and institutionalise Nigeria's response to human trafficking over the last year, showing substantial commitment to the issue.

The report advised the government to increase prosecutions and convictions of traffickers and boost protection efforts in order to strengthen its response to trafficking.

It said Nigeria is a source, transit and destination country for women and children trafficked for forced labour and sexual exploitation.

"Victims are trafficked for domestic servitude, street hawking, agricultural labour, and sexual exploitation. Within Nigeria, women and children are trafficked from rural areas to urban zones.

"Internationally, they are trafficked to the Central African Republic, Mali, Gabon, Sudan, North Africa, Saudi Arabia, Italy, Spain, the Netherlands, Belgium, Germany, and Austria.

"Women and children are also trafficked to Nigeria from Togo, Benin, Chad, Cameroon, the Central African Republic, Niger, and Ghana," the report also said.

Last year, the US government praised Nigeria for implementing the 2003 anti-trafficking in persons' law. That year, the US commended the Nigerian officials, organisations and individuals who have worked to fight the scourge of trafficking, especially the Nigerian Agency for the Prohibition of Trafficking in Persons (NAPTIP).

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

375 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 6, 2006 Tuesday 3:14 PM GMT

Pakistan hands Turkey list of suspected human smugglers

LENGTH: 261 wordsDATELINE: ISLAMABAD, June 6 2006

Pakistan Tuesday handed Turkey a list of 26 people suspected of involvement in human trafficking, officials said.

The director general of Pakistan's Federal Investigation Agency, Tariq Pervaz, told AFP there was a gang in Turkey that facilitates illegal Pakistani immigrants on their way to Greece and other European destinations for employment.

He said interior ministry official Kamal Shah gave the list of suspect's names to a Turkish interior ministry delegation during a meeting to discuss bilateral cooperation in the fight against human trafficking.

Pervaz said Pakistan had been on a drive against human smugglers, which had led to the arrest of some 1,400 people involved in the illegal trade since last year.

"The drive has paid dividends," Pervaz said, noting that the rate of deportation of illegal Pakistani entrants from Turkey had dropped.

Turkey deported 10,000 Pakistanis in 2005 while the number had been reduced to 1,200 in the first five months of the current year, he said.

Pakistan is regarded as a major hub for human trafficking and in 2004 was placed on the watch list by the United States.

Last year Washington removed Pakistan from the watch list noting the country had made significant progress in curbing the problem.

In December Pakistan, Iran, Turkey and Greece signed an agreement to strengthen border controls, boost cooperation between respective police forces and encourage information sharing.

The four states pledged to hold regular talks on the issue, and to create a working group of senior officials, who will meet at least once a year.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

376 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 6, 2006 Tuesday 1:30 PM GMT

India rejects "judgemental" US report on human trafficking

LENGTH: 342 wordsDATELINE: NEW DELHI, June 6 2006

India Tuesday rejected the US State Department's annual "Trafficking in Persons Report" which accuses New Delhi of not doing enough to eliminate "bonded labor slavery".

"The US has a practice of issuing global reports on a wide variety of subjects ... Such reports are, by their very nature based on US viewpoints and preconceptions," the Indian foreign ministry said in a statement.

"On the subject of trafficking in persons, as with other areas, we reject judgemental and prescriptive approach by a foreign government," the statement said.

The 290-page report which analysed trafficking for forced labor, prostitution, military service and other purposes in about 150 countries, was issued in Washington on Monday.

It blacklists countries that do not take adequate action to stem human trafficking.

On India, the report said that gauging the seriousness of trafficking problem had become difficult due to lack of data from India.

India and giant neighbour China remain on the watchlist from previous years and could be relegated to the lowest-ranked Tier 3 from a special "Tier 2 watchlist", if they do not take prompt action, said John Miller, a senior US advisor on trafficking issues.

While India had taken some steps to check sex trafficking, there was "lack of action" on "bonded labor slavery" in the vast nation, the report said.

The Indian statement said New Delhi and Washington had held a dialogue on trafficking in people and other transnational challenges.

"The approach of the 2006 report does not reflect the active cooperation on this subject between the two countries.

"It certainly is not helpful to furthering our dialogue in that regard," it added.

In an article in the Times of India on Tuesday, meanwhile, US ambassador to India David C. Mulford wrote that India was "taking action" to curb trafficking.

"The government is also pursuing initiatives that would establish media awareness campaigns, coordinate national enforcement of anti-trafficking laws and expand coordination of government efforts at the national and state levels," he wrote.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 Agence France Presse
All Rights Reserved

377 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 6, 2006 Tuesday 11:29 AM GMT

China pledges to fight human trafficking, cooperate internationally

LENGTH: 246 wordsDATELINE: BEIJING, June 6 2006

China Tuesday said it was making headway in its fight to combat the trafficking of women and children and pledged to cooperate internationally to end the scourge.

"China's government attaches high importance to the legitimate rights of the Chinese people and in combatting human trafficking, especially the trafficking of women and children," foreign ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao told journalists.

"Now the numbers of trafficking cases in China have gone down and we have been making great progress in our work combatting human trafficking."

Liu was commenting on the annual "Trafficking in Persons Report," issued Monday by the US State Department, which placed China on a watchlist of countries where human trafficking remains a problem.

China was also cited in the report for "forced labor" involving largely North Korean refugees.

"Some are trafficked after they get to China. A lot of them are trafficked to be brides, filling this (gender) imbalance that comes from this one child (family planning) policy," John Miller, a senior advisor on trafficking issues at the State Department, said.

Chinese spokesman Liu acknowledged that human trafficking was a cross-border issue and pledged to step up international cooperation.

"Human trafficking, especially the trafficking of women and children is a regional and international problem so we are willing to conduct international cooperation in this regard and step up efforts to combat the evil acts of human trafficking," he said.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

378 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 6, 2006 Tuesday 10:20 AM GMT

Cambodia sheds worst offender status on human trafficking list

LENGTH: 251 wordsDATELINE: PHNOM PENH, June 6 2006

Cambodia has climbed out of the worst offenders category on the US State Department's people trafficking blacklist as a result of its efforts to arrest and convict those trading in humans.

The impoverished Southeast Asian country rose from the lowest-ranked Tier 3, where it was listed alongside North Korea and Myanmar, to a special "Tier 2 watchlist", according to the annual "Trafficking in Persons" report.

This designation acknowledges that Cambodia is not fully complying with minimum standards to combat the problem, but is making "significant efforts" to do so, the report said.

"The record over the past year demonstrates the high-level commitment by the (government) and the prime minister to improve the government's performance in fighting trafficking in persons," said US embassy charge d'affairs Mark Storr Tuesday.

"Obviously there is still much work to be done," he added.

Cambodia is both a significant provider and recipient of trafficked people because of its weak border controls and poorly enforced migration laws.

But in a statement released alongside the report, the embassy cited successful domestic trafficking prosecutions and the government's cooperation with Washington to try US citizens committing sex acts against minors in Cambodia as signs of a turnaround.

The new designation means all non-humanitarian and non-trade related sanctions levied on Cambodia as a Tier 3 country will be lifted, the embassy said, but was unable to say how the move would affect US aid to the country.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

379 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 6, 2006 Tuesday 1:35 AM GMT

Missing fingers, toes highlight Asia's human trafficking woes

BYLINE: P. ParameswaranLENGTH: 692 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 5 2006

The shattered dream of an Indonesian domestic maid, who lost her fingers and toes, following torture by her employer in the Middle East is being used by the US State Department to illustrate the seriousness of the human trafficking problem.

Nour Miyatis dream was simple: To provide a brighter future for her nine-year old daughter back home.

But after working as a domestic for four years in the Middle East, her luck ran out as her new employer last year confined her in his house, denied her pay and tortured her.

Injuries she suffered to her hands and feet resulted in gangrene that required the amputation of her fingers and toes and prevented her from working anymore, the State Department said in its annual "Trafficking in Persons Report."

Human trafficking -- which refers to the transportation of persons for sexual exploitation, forced labour or other illicit activities -- threatens to stifle the livelihood of many Asian workers, the report warns.

"I met with Nour Miyati in Riyadh -- a victim of abuse, servitude and torture," John Miller, a senior advisor on trafficking issues at the State Department, told reporters.

The 290-page report was dedicated to the young Indonesian woman and many other foreign migrant workers "who pursued dreams but found hell on earth."

The report, which analyzed trafficking for forced labor, prostitution, military service and other purposes in about 150 countries, blacklists countries that do not take adequate action to stem human trafficking.

Many Asian governments are trying to stem the problem but are not doing enough, the report said.

In the East Asia and Pacific region, prosecutions and convictions of human traffickers have leaped rapidly.

But in South Asia, gauging the seriousness of the problem has become a difficulty due to lack of data from India, the biggest country in the region.

Prosecutions in East Asia ballooned to 2,580 cases in 2005 from a mere 438 cases the year earlier. Similarly, convictions last year jumped to 2,347 from only 348.

Laos this year joined North Korea and Myanmar among Asian nations in the State Department's "Tier 3" list of worst offenders of human trafficking.

Countries in the blacklist could face sanctions if they do not take immediate measures within 90 days.

Others in the blacklist were Zimbabwe, Uzbekistan, Belize, Iran, Syria, Venezuela, Saudi Arabia, Sudan and Cuba.

Cambodia, as a result of stepped up efforts by the government to arrest, prosecute, and convict traffickers, climbed from Tier 3 to a special "Tier 2 watchlist," comprising nations making "significant" efforts to deal with the problem.

India and China have remained on the watchlist from previous years and could be relegated to Tier 3 if they do not take prompt action to tackle the problem, Miller warned.

"This has to be a source of concern," he said.

Miller said that while the Indian government had taken some steps to check sex trafficking, there was "lack of action" on "bonded labor slavery" in the vast nation.

"This is a situation where a grandfather may incur a debt from an employer, gets them to come to work at a rice mill or a brick kiln. The son then continues working to pay off the debt. The grandson continues working," he explained.

The victims were not allowed to leave the mill and those who bolted were tracked down and beaten, said Miller, who had also met with survivors of such a rice mill when he was in India recently.

"I could not find an example while I was there of one owner of such a rice mill or brick kiln that had gone to jail," he said, highlighting India's weak prosecution of offenders despite having a tough law.

China was cited in the report for "forced labor" involving largely North Korean refugees.

"Some are trafficked after they get to China. A lot of them are trafficked to be brides, filling this imbalance that comes from this one child policy," Miller said, adding he had raised the issue with Beijing.

Malaysia and Indonesia were relegated from "Tier 2" to the watchlist. "This is not good news," Miller stressed.

The two Southeast Asian nations were penalized for their alleged failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

380 of 445 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Europe - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 6, 2006 Tuesday

Slovenia does "not fully comply" with anti-trafficking standards - US report

LENGTH: 364 words

Text of report in English by Slovene news agency STA

Washington, 6 June: A US State Department report on trafficking in persons places Slovenia in the second tier of countries which do not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but are making significant efforts to do so.

The 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report, released on Monday [5 June], finds that the parliament has adopted a witness protection law and took steps to improve its ability to track trafficking statistics by establishing a standard methodology for the collection of data.

"In addition to these efforts, Slovenia should take the necessary steps to convict traffickers. The government should also improve support for public awareness efforts and provide consistent budget funding for designated NGO-run trafficking shelters."

The State Department notes modest progress in law enforcement efforts over the reporting period, as police investigated seven new trafficking cases in 2005. However, there have been no convictions of traffickers since 2002.

The government is also criticized for "considerably diminished" efforts to provide victim protection and assistance, as it temporarily withheld funding from the only anti-trafficking NGO shelter.

On the other hand, the report says that Slovenia demonstrated adequate prevention efforts during the reporting period. Specifically, the government tightly controlled its borders and regularly detained persons attempting to enter Slovenia illegally.

Moreover, the government, in cooperation with an NGO, continued a programme which provided trafficking awareness classes for 1,000 students in elementary and secondary schools around Slovenia in 2005.

It also funded a project focused on preventing asylum seekers from becoming trafficking victims and established a web page with contact information for victim assistance organizations.

Overall, the report says that Slovenia is primarily a transit and, to a lesser extent, a source and destination country for women and girls trafficked from Ukraine, Slovakia, Romania, Moldova and Bulgaria for the purpose of sexual exploitation.

Source: STA news agency, Ljubljana, in English 1101 gmt 6 Jun 06

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

381 of 445 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring South Asia - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 6, 2006 Tuesday

India rejects "judgemental" US report on people trafficking

LENGTH: 329 words

Text of report by Indian news agency PTI

New Delhi,StartDateStartDate 6 June: Reacting strongly to the US State Department's observations on status of trafficking in India, the government Tuesday [6 June] rejected "judgemental and prescriptive approach of a foreign government" and said it will not help in furthering the dialogue between the two countries on the issue.

New Delhi pointed out that the "active cooperation" between the two countries is not reflected on the State Department's annual report on Trafficking in Persons for 2006 which said India does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and placed the country in "Tier Two Watch List".

"The US has a practise of issuing global reports on a wide variety of subjects from human rights and religious freedom to narcotics and trafficking in persons," External Affairs Ministry spokesman Navtej Sarna said when asked for comment on the report.

"Such reports are, by their very nature, based on US viewpoints and pre-conceptions," he said.

He asserted that "on the subject of trafficking in persons, as with other areas, we reject judgemental and prescriptive approach by a foreign government."

The State Department report said "India lacks a national law enforcement response to any form of trafficking but took some preliminary measures to create a central law enforcement unit to do so. However, India did not take steps to address the huge issue of bonded labour and other forms of involuntary servitude."

Sarna said India and the US have an ongoing dialogue on the subject of trafficking in persons and other transnational challenges and noted that such subjects are also discussed in the Global Issues Forum.

"The approach of the 2006 report does not reflect the active cooperation on this subject between the two countries. It certainly is not helpful to furthering our dialogue in that regard," the spokesman said.

Source: PTI news agency, New Delhi, in English 1242 gmt 6 Jun 06

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

382 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

June 6, 2006 Tuesday 12:12 PM TSTTAIWAN DOWNGRADED IN U.S. 'TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT'*BYLINE: Lin Chieh-yu and Y.F. LowLENGTH: 423 wordsDATELINE: Washington, June 5

Taiwan has been placed on a "Tier 2 Watch List" for not fully complying with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking, according to the annual Trafficking in Persons Report released Monday by the U.S. State Department.

The latest listing marks a downgrading for Taiwan, which was listed as a "Tier 2" country in past years.

"Taiwan is placed on the Tier 2 Watch List for its failure to show evidence of increasing efforts over the past year to address trafficking, despite ample resources to do so, particularly to address the serious level of forced labor and sexual servitude among legally migrating Southeast Asian contract workers and brides," the report says.

The report urges Taiwan authorities to demonstrate political will in tackling the human trafficking problem and develop a clear policy and action plan that adequately covers sex trafficking and involuntary servitude among foreign workers and brides.

The report describes Taiwan as a destination for men, women and children trafficked for forced labor and sexual exploitation.

While women from China and Southeast Asian countries are trafficked to Taiwan through fraudulent marriages, deceptive employment offers, and illegal smuggling, some foreign workers, primarily from Vietnam, Thailand, and the Philippines, are recruited legally for low-skilled jobs in Taiwan's construction, fishing or manufacturing industries or as domestic servants, and are subjected to forced labor or involuntary servitude by labor agencies or employers upon arrival in Taiwan, the report says.

It notes that Taiwan has a number of related laws that may be used to prosecute traffickers, including laws against slavery and exploiting children for prostitution, but it does not have comprehensive anti-trafficking legislation.

The Taiwan authorities provided inadequate protection for many victims of trafficking on the island over the last year, though they made efforts to improve levels of victim support in some areas, the report says.

Also Monday, Taiwan's representative to the United States David Ta-wei Lee expressed regret over the result.

Lee said the American Institute in Taiwan (AIT) and the U.S. State Department had expressed their concern on the situation of human trafficking in Taiwan three months ago and that Taiwan's Council of Labor Affairs (CLA) had also provided the United States with a brochure for its reference.

Lee said the AIT's Taipei office has continued to communicate with the CLA and the Ministry of Justice for solutions to improve the situation.

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 Central News Agency
All Rights Reserved

383 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Hindustan Times

June 6, 2006 Tuesday 1:38 PM EST

India on US human trafficking watch listBYLINE: Hindustan TimesLENGTH: 306 wordsDATELINE: NEW DELHI, India

NEW DELHI, India, June 6 -- The US has yet again placed India on a "watch list" for allegedly not doing enough to deal with human trafficking for purposes of forced or bonded labour and sexual exploitation. India, which figures on the Tier II Watch List for the third consecutive year, has been faulted for "not taking steps to address the huge issue of bonded labour and other forms of involuntary servitude".

An annual report of the State Department says: "The Government of India does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however it is making significant efforts to do so." The report, however, praises Tamil Nadu grassroots activist Kari Siddama as a hero "acting to end modern-day slavery". Some 30-odd countries, including China, figure on the same list as India while Pakistan, Bangladesh and Sri Lanka are a shade better and placed in Tier II as opposed to Tier II Watch List.

The report says India lacks a national law enforcement response to any form of trafficking but has taken some preliminary measures. It notes that amendments to impose stricter penalties on sex traffickers, though drafted, are yet to be introduced in Parliament. "India should consider designating a national law enforcement agency with investigative and prosecutorial jurisdiction throughout the country to address its inter-state and international trafficking problem," it reads.

Releasing the report, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said: "By calling to account any nation, friend or foe, that can and should do more to confront human trafficking, we are pressing countries into action." John R. Miller, the Department's Ambassador-at-Large for international slavery, spoke of India's lack of action to end "bonded labour slavery".

The Hindustan Times is provided through HT Syndication, New Delhi.

LOAD-DATE: June 8, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

384 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Indo-Asian News Service

June 6, 2006 Tuesday 2:16 PM EST

India placed on US Special Watch List against slavery

BYLINE: Indo-Asian News ServiceLENGTH: 1575 wordsDATELINE: Washington

Washington, June 6 -- The US has placed a dozen countries, including India, on its Special Watch List against modern-day slavery for the third consecutive year due to their alleged failure to show evidence of increasing efforts to address trafficking in persons.

"The Government of India does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so," noted the sixth annual Department of State Trafficking in Persons Report released by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice Monday.

India, it said, is a source, destination, and transit country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of forced or bonded labour and commercial sexual exploitation.

India is also a destination for women and girls from Nepal and Bangladesh trafficked for the purpose of commercial sexual exploitation. In addition, boys from Afghanistan, Pakistan, and Bangladesh are trafficked through India to the Gulf states for involuntary servitude as child camel jockeys.

India's neighbours - Nepal, Pakistan and Bangladesh - have been placed a cut above it in Tier two for although all three did not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, they were, in US assessment, making significant efforts to do so.

India lacks a national law enforcement response to any form of trafficking, but took some preliminary measures to create a central law enforcement unit to do so, said the report which the US intends to use as a diplomatic tool to raise global awareness and spur countries to take effective actions to counter trafficking in persons.

Described as the most comprehensive worldwide report on the efforts of governments to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons, or modern-day slavery, the 158-country report divides them in four tiers.

Countries whose governments fully comply with the minimum standards specified in a 2000 U.S. law are placed in Tier one. Next come countries whose governments are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards.

A dozen countries including India have been placed on tier two Special Watch List for their failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat human trafficking from the previous year. In the last Tier three are countries whose governments are not making significant efforts to comply.

India and other countries placed on the Special Watch List in this Report will be re-examined in an interim assessment to be submitted to the US Congress by Feb 1, 2007.

Those in Tier three, including Iran, North Korea and Saudi Arabia may be subject to certain sanctions, including withholding of non-humanitarian, non-trade-related assistance from the next fiscal year beginning Oct 1, 2006.

"By calling to account any nation, friend or foe, that can and should do more to confront human trafficking, we are pressing countries into action. With each year, more and more governments are increasing public awareness of the crime, targeting and prosecuting the perpetrators and helping victims to rebuild their lives," said Rice.

"To date, the US government has provided almost $400 million to support global anti-trafficking efforts, said Rice noting that an estimated 800,000 people, primarily women and children, are victimised each year, and forced into lives of cruel and punishing degradation," she said.

Rice acknowledged that US too is a destination for the victims of human traffickers, but said they were "taking measures to hasten the coming of the day when no man, woman or child is denied their rights and their common humanity on American soil."

On India, the report said endemic corruption among law enforcement officials impedes the country's ability to effectively combat trafficking in persons. In terms of trafficking for sexual exploitation, corrupt law enforcement authorities reportedly continue to facilitate the movement of trafficking victims, protect brothels that exploit victims, and protect traffickers and brothel keepers from arrest or other threats of enforcement.

In the area of bonded labour and forced child labour, some corrupt police officials continued to protect businesses and managers who rely on forced labour, and take bribes to stop enforcement or judicial action.

India, the report said did not take steps to address the huge issue of bonded labour and other forms of involuntary servitude. The Indian government also did not take meaningful steps to address its sizeable trafficking-related corruption problem.

The government drafted, but had not yet introduced to parliament, amendments to the Immoral Trafficking Prevention Act (ITPA) that would afford greater protection to sex trafficking victims and stricter penalties for their traffickers and for clients of prostitution.

India should consider designating and empowering a national law enforcement agency with investigative and prosecutorial jurisdiction throughout the country to address its interstate and international trafficking problem, the report suggested.

The government should similarly consider taking greater measures to rescue and protect victims of bonded labour and to prosecute their traffickers or employers, giving them punishments sufficiently stringent to deter and that adequately reflect the nature of the heinous crime of trafficking.

It is particularly important to strengthen and enforce sentences applied to individuals convicted of exploiting bonded labourers. India should also improve its long-term protection of trafficking victims and institute nation-wide public awareness programs to educate all segments of the population on the dangers of trafficking.

India, the report said was unable to guard its long, porous borders with Bangladesh and Nepal, through which several thousand trafficking victims reportedly enter India each year.

Reportedly, Bangladeshi women are trafficked through India for sexual exploitation in Pakistan. Moreover, Indian men and women migrate willingly to the Gulf for work as domestic servants and low-skilled labourers, but some later find themselves in situations of involuntary servitude.

The report said a growing gender imbalance in areas of South and East Asia is increasingly driving the demand for trafficking victims and contributing to the phenomenon of bride selling.

India faces a similar problem of gender imbalance in some regions, although it is sparked primarily by cultural attitudes that see girls as economic liabilities due to dowry demands by potential grooms.

This gender gap has resulted in several million more men than women in the marriage market, creating a "marriage squeeze" and pressure for men to find women to marry.

As a consequence, there are some cases in which women from Nepal, Bangladesh, and other areas of India have been bought or kidnapped as brides for "bachelor villages".

The lack of women also contributes to greater demand for prostituted women and girls, fuelling the demand for victims of trafficking.

The report's introduction begins with the story of a 12-year-old girl Reena, who was brought to India from Nepal by her maternal aunt and forced into a New Delhi brothel shortly after arrival.

It also lists Kari Siddama, a grass roots activist and founder of Bharathi Trust in Tamil Nadu as one of the "Heroes Acting To End Modern-Day Slavery".

Kari Siddamma has been working extensively with the marginalised Irula (a low caste) tribal communities in Tamil Nadu for more than 12 years. With her intervention, an Irula movement has emerged that is now better organised to pursue indigenous legal rights from exploitive landlords.

In one incident in 2004, Siddamma helped release over 1,000 bonded labourers employed in the rice mills of the Red Hills area of Tamil Nadu.

The report said it had focused more attention on the plight of low skilled labourers from developing countries, particularly women working as domestics. Many of these labourers, pursuing a dream of giving their family a more secure and prosperous future, fall victim to conditions of servitude in developed destination countries, including the US.

Contract workers, especially in Asia, have modest aspirations but they are the most vulnerable, due to the lack of protection and their low economic status. Unscrupulous labour recruiters, "manpower" agencies, and employers often preyed on the aspirations of these workers, it said.

Economic globalisation has encouraged an unprecedented mobilisation of unskilled and low-skilled labour in response to demand in labour-deficit markets for construction, manufacturing, agriculture, and domestic work.

Migrant workers from less developed South and East Asian countries fill relatively short-term labour contracts in more developed Asian, European, and Near Eastern countries at an ever increasing rate.

The report sheds some light on a trafficking phenomenon, seen increasingly in Asia and the Near East-servitude, imposed on a large number of migrant labourers who accept contracts in other countries for low-skilled work in construction, manufacturing, agriculture and as domestic workers.

Apart from the costs in human terms, profits from human trafficking fuel other criminal activities. According to the US Federal Bureau of Investigation, human trafficking generates an estimated $9.5 billion in annual revenue.

Published by HT Syndication with permission from Indo-Asian News Service.

For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

385 of 445 DOCUMENTS

IPS - Inter Press Service

June 6, 2006 Tuesday

ARGENTINA: ABUSE COMES FULL CIRCLE FOR FORMER CHILD SEX SLAVES

BYLINE: Marcela ValenteLENGTH: 891 wordsDATELINE: BUENOS AIRES, June 6 2006

A trial opened Tuesday in Argentina against a former federal police officer charged with running a brothel and three women who were supposedly his accomplices.

But human rights groups point out that two of the women facing charges were themselves his victims, sold into slavery and forced prostitution at the ages of 9 and 13.

A number of young women have gone missing in Argentina, and human trafficking rings engaged in sexual exploitation are suspected in many of the cases.

The 2006 Trafficking in Persons report released Monday by the U.S. State Department puts Argentina on the "Tier 2 Watch List."

The "Tier 2" category includes countries whose governments do not comply with "minimum standards" set forth in the U.S. Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) but are making "significant efforts" to bring themselves into compliance.

In "Watch List" countries, meanwhile, the number of victims of severe forms of trafficking is considered very significant or significantly increasing, or governments have failed to step up efforts to halt these abuses.

Washington recommended that the Argentine government work with Congress to secure passage of a federal law against trafficking, whose victims are mainly women and children; ramp up efforts to arrest and prosecute traffickers; expand training for court and law enforcement officials; and work with non-governmental organizations to raise public awareness of the problem.

The story behind the current trial dates back to late November 2004, when a 15-year-old girl managed to escape from a hideout built in the back of a cabaret near the town of Inrville, in the province of Córdoba, 800 kilometers northwest of Buenos Aires.

The girl, who was held in captivity, said she was often deprived of food, forced to use drugs, and beaten. She was also tortured, by being made to eat excrement and drink urine, and was anally raped with a stick.

Psychological exams found that the victim was suffering "severe psychological damages" after being subjected to "repeated cruel, abusive and violent behaviors."

In connection with her case, and that of three other minors subjected to sexual exploitation, charges were filed against former police officer Jorge Gonzalez, who owned the cabaret, and his girlfriend Valeria Calderín for promoting prostitution, illegal deprivation of freedom, forced labor, weapons possession and abetment.

But two 21-year-old women, Vanesa Payero and Betiana Zapata, have also been charged with promoting prostitution, illegal deprivation of freedom and forced labor, even though as minors they were also held captive and subjected to a wide range of abuses. And under threat, they say, they were forced to abuse the new victims.

The Red No a la Trata de Mujeres (No to the Trafficking of Women Network), a coalition of Argentine social organizations, called for a suspension of the trial against Payero and Zapata, who were arrested when they were 19 and 20 years old, respectively.

The two women do not deny having taking part in abuses against minors, but say they did so under duress, and under the threat of violence.

According to social psychologist Adriana Dominguez, a member of the Red No a la Trata de Mujeres, Payero was "sold" at the age of 13, and Zapata when she was just 9 years old. Both were raped and tortured -- burned with boiling water and cigarettes, and whipped -- and were often deprived of food, to force them to work as prostitutes. They were held in captivity and reduced to slavery, and were not allowed any contact with the outside world.

Dominguez said Payero was raped and impregnated by Gonz lez, who forced her to abort. And at the age of 13, Zapata says, she bore the daughter of another pimp, but the baby was killed by her captors shortly after the birth.

"They beat me, but they let me bury her," Zapata told the C rdoba daily newspaper La Voz del Interior, in a 2005 interview from the prison in the town of Villa Maria, in the province of C rdoba. "I reported them, but I was never summoned to testify."

"I didn't know what being a child was. I never had a toy," she said.

The Red No a la Trata de Mujeres holds the state responsible for omission "in the face of these abuses and for failing to bring to trial the real perpetrators of these crimes."

"The state was nowhere to be seen when these minors were kidnapped, abused and shuffled around as if they were live-stock," but now it has "shown up to try them," said the coalition of NGOs.

Dominguez told IPS that Payero and Zapata did not even have the right to a defense. They were assigned a pro bono lawyer when no court-appointed public defender was available. But their attorney only met with them once in nearly two years.

When the trial actually began, the two women met Carlos Figueroa, their new lawyer, who had just recently passed the bar exam.

Figueroa explained to IPS that his clients had not been assigned a public defender because the only one available at the time was already representing "the victims" -- the girls and women whose testimony led to the arrests of Gonz lez and his alleged accomplices, Payero and Zapata.

And while Figueroa was appointed to represent the two young women a month ago, they have only met him once.

"We'll see how I'm going to prepare the defense," the lawyer said after the trial had already begun, declining to give any idea of what his strategy would be.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

386 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

June 6, 2006 Tuesday 10:54 AM GMT

U.S. praises Cambodia for improvement in anti-human trafficking

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 545 words

DATELINE: PHNOM PENH June 6

The United States praised Cambodia on Tuesday for efforts to improve anti-human trafficking and upgraded the country from its Tier 3 to Tier 2 Watch List, according to a statement released by the U.S. Embassy in Phnom Penh.

The statement said U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced the upgrade in her address on the State Department's 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report.

A Tier 2 designation is used to indicate governments that do not fully comply with the minimum standards laid out in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards.

Tuesday's statement said the U.S. Embassy "commends the Cambodian authorities" on progress they have made in combating trafficking in persons over the past year, including intensified efforts to prosecute and convict traffickers, progress on a new Anti-Trafficking Law that meets international standards, continuing cooperation with the United States on PROTECT Act cases of U.S. citizens who commit sex crimes against minors in Cambodia, and implementation of a nationwide anti-trafficking plan by the Ministry of Interior.

Embassy charge Mark C. Storella said, "Today's announcement by Secretary Rice reflects my government's recognition of the improved efforts by Cambodian officials in the Ministry of Interior, the Ministry of Women's Affairs and the Ministry of Justice, who are working in concert with courageous Cambodian and international NGO partners."

"The record over the past year demonstrates the high-level commitment by the (government) and the prime minister to improve the government's performance in fighting trafficking in persons," he said.

Khieu Sopheak, spokesman for the Ministry of Interior, told Kyodo News that Cambodia welcomed the report as "a reflection of a reality."

"It is good news. We welcome such fair and positive assessment based on the fact that we are committed to fighting against human trafficking in persons," he said.

While praising Cambodia for the efforts made, the U.S. government also noted Cambodia still has much work to do.

"In terms of recommended areas for improvement, the State Department report notes that the Cambodian government should make greater efforts to prosecute and convict public officials who profit from or are involved in trafficking and should also pass and enact comprehensive anti-trafficking legislation," the statement said.

The U.S. government added that as a result of the new ranking, all non-humanitarian and non-trade sanctions levied on Cambodia as a Tier 3 country will be lifted.

The U.S. placed Cambodia on Tier 3 last year.

Last month, governments of six Greater Mekong Sub-region countries met in Cambodia and promised to bolster cooperation in the fight against human trafficking in the region.

The six said that while significant achievements from the past year were highlighted, the governments in the region also acknowledged the challenges that they encountered and that human trafficking continues to prevail.

Neither the U.S. report and nor the governments of the six Greater Mekong Sub-region countries made any figure available on human trafficking, but unofficial estimates are that the number may reach the thousands, possibly the millions, per year.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 Kyodo News Service
All Rights Reserved

387 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Jerusalem Post

June 6, 2006, Tuesday

US slams Israel for worsening performance on human trafficking

BYLINE: Nathan Guttman Jerusalem Post Correspondent Hilary Leila Krieger Contributed To This Report.

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 1

LENGTH: 644 words

WASHINGTON - Israel's performance in fighting human trafficking was downgraded in a US ranking of nations dealing with the problem.

The State Department determined in a report published Monday that Israel had not done enough to fight human trafficking and thus designated it a "Tier 2 Watch List" country the third echelon in a four-level scale and a one-level drop from last year's Tier 2 rating.

"Israel is placed on Tier 2 Watch List the report states for its failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to address trafficking namely the conditions of involuntary servitude allegedly facing thousands of foreign migrant workers."

The report also notes that Israel failed to pass a law drafted in 2003 which makes all forms of human trafficking a crime. "Israel should extend the scope of the anti-trafficking law to criminalize labor trafficking and establish a shelter for those victims the report says.

According to NGOs operating in Israel there are between 16 0 and 20 0 foreign workers who faced involuntary servitude in Israel. There are also 1 0 0 women who were brought to Israel for sexual exploitation.

While the report notes that Israel has made progress in dealing with trafficking of women for sexual exploitation it has not paid adequate attention to the problem of foreign workers who are subject to involuntary servitude. These workers come from countries including China Romania Jordan Turkey Thailand the Philippines Nepal Sri Lanka and India.

Israel according to the report does not have an effective method of screening the foreign workers to differentiate between those who are victims of human trafficking and those who are attempting to violate its immigration laws. Victims of labor trafficking do not receive adequate protection services the report states and are frequently arrested and deported."

Hanna Zohar of Kav La'oved a workers' rights group welcomed the report's rating. She agrees the government hasn't done enough to eradicate human trafficking and suggested that this report could push the government to do more.

She added however that "in practice the conditions are better than what was before. Awareness is higher because the public is exposed to the phenomenon more than before."

She pointed to slight improvements in working conditions pay and a decrease in the practice of employers holding workers' passports and other documents "hostage but said more should be done.

Uri Sadeh a lawyer with the Hot Line for Migrant Workers also said that there had been some progress made in the last year. He stressed though that the authorities have not grasped what trafficking is about and who the victims are." He attributed the improvements that have been made to "international pressure" on the government including the State Department reports.

The report does commend Israel for stepping up efforts to prevent trafficking over the past year for including information about the problem in the high school curriculum and in training programs for diplomats soldiers and law enforcement officers.

In reaction to the report Israeli sources said assessments show that human trafficking resulting in involuntary servitude is not a widespread phenomenon.

"We will use this report as a source for constructive self-criticism in an effort to improve our tools for dealing with the issue one source said.

The report also lists Israel's de facto anti- trafficking coordinator Rahel Gershuni as one of 10 heroes acting to end modern day slavery" around the world.

The report also rated Syria and Iran for the first time placing both in the Tier 3 group of countries which do not act against human trafficking. There are 12 countries in Tier 3 including Saudi Arabia Cuba and North Korea. According to US law countries in Tier 3 may be subject to financial sanctions.

LOAD-DATE: January 10, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2006 The Jerusalem Post

388 of 445 DOCUMENTS

RIA Novosti

June 06, 2006

Russia remains on human trafficking watch list - U.S. State DeptLENGTH: 211 words

WASHINGTON, June 6 (RIA Novosti) - The U.S. State Department has kept Russia on the list of 32 countries whose governments are not doing enough in the fight against trafficking in human beings, an annual report said.

Russia has been placed on Tier 2 Watch List in the Annual Trafficking in Persons Report "for a third consecutive year for its continued failure to show evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking, particularly in the area of victim protection and assistance."

"The [Russian] government made uneven progress during the reporting period [2005]," says the report, presented Monday by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Fifty three criminal prosecutions were launched in human-trafficking cases in Russia in 2005, up from 11 in 2004, and the country's courts convicted at least nine traffickers and sentenced six to time in prison, the report says, but Russia remains a source, transit, and destination country for trafficking in persons.

In particular, Russia "remains a significant source of women trafficked to over 50 countries for commercial sexual exploitation," the report says.

Presenting the report at the State Department, Rice said up to 800,000 people, primarily women and children, are victims of trafficking in human beings every year.

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHACC-NO: 6082798PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 RIA Novosti
All Rights Reserved

389 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 6, 2006 Tuesday

GULF ARAB COUNTRIES CONFRONT HUMAN TRAFFICKING PROBLEMS

BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 547 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. Department of State:

Three Gulf Arab countries have been elevated from the lowest ranks of offenders to an intermediate ranking in the State Department's 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report.

Kuwait, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates were raised from Tier 3 countries, the least favorable rating, to the Tier 2 Watch List in the report to the U.S. Congress issued June 5.

The report evaluates foreign governments' efforts to eliminate human trafficking, grouping nations in one of four categories based on their efforts to control human trafficking, to prosecute those involved, and to support and assist victims of these crimes.

Governments that meet standards established in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 are placed in Tier 1. Tier 2 comprises countries that are demonstrating commitment to address their problems but have not yet achieved international standards. Tier 2 Watch List includes countries that show signs of falling backwards, while governments not making significant efforts to meet the standards are placed in Tier 3. Saudi Arabia is the only remaining Gulf Arab country in Tier 3. (See related article.)

Gulf Arab countries are a common destination for South and Southeast Asians who serve as domestic workers and unskilled laborers. These workers often fall victim to involuntary servitude, excessive hours, nonpayment of wages, physical abuse, sexual abuse and passport confiscation. These countries also have tolerated trafficking of children to work as camel jockeys, according to the report.

The report welcomed proposed measures in Kuwait to standardize contracts for domestic workers and hailed the government's commitment to enact legislation that would criminalize exploitation of foreign workers. Within the past year, Kuwait has assigned the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labor the task of coordinating the government's anti-trafficking activities.

According to the report, Kuwait also took steps toward implementing anti-trafficking measures by enforcing a ban on child camel jockeys and prosecuting some employers for labor rights abuses. The report said that an association of Kuwaiti labor recruitment agencies has taken steps to defend foreign workers' rights.

Qatar confronted the problem of child trafficking by repatriating numerous child camel jockeys, according to the report. It also established a shelter for abused domestic workers and created a hotline for complaints.

The United Arab Emirates banned the practice of using child camel jockeys and repatriated all identified victims to their home countries. Both the United Arab Emirates and Kuwait have launched anti-trafficking public awareness campaigns.

Saudi Arabia remained in Tier 3 for its unwillingness to confront the issue of human trafficking. The report said Saudi Arabia sometimes arrests, punishes and deports victims rather than protecting them.

Oman fell from Tier 2 to the Tier 2 Watch List due to a lack of evidence over the past year that it is increasing efforts to combat trafficking.

The State Department is under a congressional mandate to prepare the annual Trafficking in Persons Report. Countries that rank in Tier 3 are subject to a suspension of U.S. assistance not related to trade or humanitarian relief.

LOAD-DATE: June 8, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 States News Service

390 of 445 DOCUMENTS

State Department Documents and Publications

June 6, 2006

Gulf Arab Countries Confront Human Trafficking Problems; State Department report evaluates anti-trafficking efforts worldwide

BYLINE: David Shelby, Washington File Staff Writer

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 578 words

Washington -- Three Gulf Arab countries have been elevated from the lowest ranks of offenders to an intermediate ranking in the State Department's 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report.

Kuwait, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates were raised from Tier 3 countries, the least favorable rating, to the Tier 2 "Watch List" in the new report to the U.S. Congress issued June 5.

The report evaluates foreign governments' efforts to eliminate human trafficking, grouping nations in one of four categories based on their efforts to control human trafficking, to prosecute those involved, and to support and assist victims of these crimes.

Governments that meet standards established in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 are placed in Tier 1. Tier 2 comprises countries that are demonstrating commitment to address their problems but have not yet achieved international standards. Tier 2 "Watch List" includes countries that show signs of falling backwards, while governments not making significant efforts to meet the standards are placed in Tier 3. Saudi Arabia is the only remaining Gulf Arab country in Tier 3. (See related article.)

Gulf Arab countries are a common destination for South and Southeast Asians who serve as domestic workers and unskilled laborers. These workers often fall victim to involuntary servitude, excessive hours, nonpayment of wages, physical abuse, sexual abuse and passport confiscation. These countries also have tolerated trafficking of children to work as camel jockeys, according to the report.

The report welcomed proposed measures in Kuwait to standardize contracts for domestic workers and hailed the government's commitment to enact legislation that would criminalize exploitation of foreign workers. Within the past year, Kuwait has assigned the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labor the task of coordinating the government's anti-trafficking activities.

According to the report, Kuwait also took steps toward implementing anti-trafficking measures by enforcing a ban on child camel jockeys and prosecuting some employers for labor rights abuses. The report said that an association of Kuwaiti labor recruitment agencies has taken steps to defend foreign workers' rights.

Qatar confronted the problem of child trafficking by repatriating numerous child camel jockeys, according to the report. It also established a shelter for abused domestic workers and created a hotline for complaints.

The United Arab Emirates banned the practice of using child camel jockeys and repatriated all identified victims to their home countries. Both the United Arab Emirates and Kuwait have launched anti-trafficking public awareness campaigns.

Saudi Arabia remained in Tier 3 for its unwillingness to confront the issue of human trafficking. The report said Saudi Arabia sometimes arrests, punishes and deports victims rather than protecting them.

Oman fell from Tier 2 to the Tier 2 "Watch List" due to a lack of evidence over the past year that it is increasing efforts to combat trafficking.

The State Department is under a congressional mandate to prepare the annual Trafficking in Persons Report. Countries that rank in tier three are subject to a suspension of nonhumanitarian and nontrade related U.S. assistance.

The full text of the report is available on the State Department Web site.

For additional information, see Human Trafficking.

(The Washington File is a product of the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

Copyright 2006 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

391 of 445 DOCUMENTS

State Department Documents and Publications

June 6, 2006

Daily Press Briefing -- June 6

SECTION: STATE DEPARTMENT BRIEFINGS

LENGTH: 7532 words

Daily Press Briefing

Sean McCormack, Spokesman

Washington, DC

June 6, 2006

INDEX:

IRAN

EU Foreign Policy Chief Javier Solana Presents Proposal to Iranian Government / Contents of Package / How Long Iran has to Respond / Why Contents of Package have not been Made Public / U.S. Security Guarantees Not on Table / Three Different Tracks

INDIA

Trafficking in Persons Report / India's Tier Placement

VENEZUELA

Venezuela's Response to Trafficking in Persons Report

SOMALIA

Reports that Islamic Courts' has taken Control of Mogadishu / U.S. Concerned

About Presence of Foreign Terrorists and al-Qaeda in Somalia / Spike in Violence

/ Allegations that U.S. is Contributing to Instability / U.S. Involvement

MISCELLANEOUS

Department of Defense Detainee Directive / LA Times Story that it will Exclude Certain Geneva Convention Protections

ISRAEL/PALESTINIANS

General Dayton Continues to work with President Abbas to Implement Gaza Movement and Access Agreement / Rafah Crossing Still Open / Palestinian Security

Possible Palestinian Referendum

Quartet Tasked EU to Come Up with a Proposal to be Considered by Quartet

IRAQ

Prime Minister al-Maliki's Efforts to Heal Divisions Within Iraqi Society

Recent Violence and Attacks on Coalition Forces / Motives of Those Committing Acts of Violence

TAIWAN

Query on U.S. Position on Whether President Chen Should Step Down or Complete his Term

BURMA

U.S. Efforts to Free Aung San Suu Kyi

TRANSCRIPT: 12:50 p.m. EDT

MR. MCCORMACK: Good afternoon, everybody. How are you? How's it going?

QUESTION: Good.

MR. MCCORMACK: We've got a full house today. I don't have any opening statements, so we can get right into your questions. Who'd like to start?

Anne Gearan.

QUESTION: Since the proposal has been made to Iran, can you ascribe at all what is happening here -- has the -- who has the Secretary been in touch with, if anyone? And what is your assessment of the initial reaction from the Iranians?

MR. MCCORMACK: Mm-hmm. We have not had an opportunity to talk to Mr. Solana or any other member of his party. My understanding is that Mr. Solana as well -- accompanied by the political directors from the EU-3 -- England, Germany and France -- presented the proposal to the Iranian Government this morning and that they answered some of the Iranian Government's questions about it. We don't have a readout yet of the meeting. I would expect that in the near future the Secretary will probably talk to Mr. Solana but at the political director level we'll be in touch as well. So I can't offer you any insight into the atmosphere --

QUESTION: Today?

MR. MCCORMACK: Today. I would expect today. And we'll -- I'll try to keep you up to date on that. If there are any phone calls this afternoon, I'll try to let you know about them and share what I am able to from those phone calls. So I can't provide you any readout as to the atmosphere or any particular reaction from the Iranian Government. We have seen some public comments from it. I think you could look at them for yourself. I wouldn't characterize them one way or the other at this point, as either accepting or rejecting the proposal. So what we're going to do is going to wait to see what Mr. Solana has to report back from the meeting and then we'll try to have a little bit -- little bit fuller reaction. I can't tell you exactly when that will be, whether that's today or tomorrow.

QUESTION: We're reporting that the -- one of the components is an offer of U.S. technological help for civilian nuclear development. Can you describe that component at all?

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, I -- you know, I've seen a lot of reports flying around for the past couple of days about what may or may not be in this package. I would just caution everybody, until we actually are able to discuss what is in the package in public, to take reports with a grain of salt. There are robust measures on both sides, both the incentive side as well as the disincentive side in the package that was presented to the Iranian Government today. Where it presents the Iranian Government with a very clear choice on both sides of the road here: a pathway of negotiation, a pathway of increased isolation. So we'll to wait to see what their answer is. At the moment, we're going -- we're not going to discuss in public what the elements of the package may be, we want to give them time to consider it. They have had it presented to them. Now it's time for them to consider what their answer is going to be. We hope that there's going to be a positive answer. That we think is the best outcome for all involved; that they choose the pathway of negotiation; that they meet the conditions that the P-5+1 has laid them for them in order to have those negotiations.

QUESTION: And how long do they have to do that?

MR. MCCORMACK: The Secretary said it's a matter of weeks, not months. I'm not going to pin it down any further than that.

QUESTION: Sean, I'm sorry, did you say how Javier Solana is going to report back his discussions with the Iranians? Is there going to be another meeting or --

MR. MCCORMACK: What I told Anne, as well as the others here, is that I would expect the Secretary will be in contact with Mr. Solana at some point in the near future. We'll try to let you know when that is and I'll share with you what I can out of that contact.

Sue.

QUESTION: Are you anticipating that there's going to be some sort of give and take and some negotiations over these robust measures? And secondly, why are you not releasing details of them? They now have them in hand. I mean, it could take weeks or possibly even a month, I don't know, for them to answer. So why do you want to keep it secret?

MR. MCCORMACK: Because we want to give this every opportunity to succeed. And once we start talking about these various -- the package in public, it becomes a public document, it becomes a matter for public debate and that's not where we are right now. The diplomacy, I would say, is at a sensitive stage. This package has been presented to the Iranian Government and we want to give them a little bit of space to consider what's in the package, both on the positive as well as the negative side. And we want to do that free from having a public debate about what has been agreed upon by all the members of the P-5+1.

QUESTION: And what about negotiations? Is there room to negotiate over this package?

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, we're not to that point yet. And when we reach that point, what we talked about is having negotiations. But in order to get that point -- to that point, the Iranian regime needs to meet the conditions that were laid out for it by the P-5+1. And central to those conditions is a full suspension of all enrichment-related activities. It was laid out -- as laid out in the IAEA Board of Governors resolution in February -- I believe February of this year.

QUESTION: Can I just ask you that when do you think you're going to be able to give us details of what is in the package?

MR. MCCORMACK: In due course. In due course we hope to be able to share these with you. But as I said, we want to give the Iranian Government some time to consider what is in this package. So in due course, we will, I'm sure, be able to share this with you. But the time is not now.

QUESTION: But don't the public have a right to know what their governments are offering the Iranians?

MR. MCCORMACK: What the governments have a right to expect -- what the people have the right to expect is that their governments do everything that they possibly can to give diplomacy a chance to succeed and that's what we're doing now.

Yes.

QUESTION: Sean, how would the fact that you would make this public impede Iran's chances or their desire to respond positive to the package? I mean, what --

MR. MCCORMACK: I think I just answered that question for Sue, Nicholas.

QUESTION: Well, I didn't hear the answer. If somebody did, please let me know. But what you said was that it leaves you more room in the negotiations.

MR. MCCORMACK: No, that's not what I said. That's not what I said, Nicholas. What I said is that this is a matter of sensitive diplomacy at the moment. We want to give the Iranian Government some time to consider this, to consider this package, free from having a public debate about what may or may not be in the package and we think that that's appropriate. We think that -- and all the ministers in the P-5+1 agreed that that is appropriate. There was an agreement among the ministers that we would not discuss the elements of the package in public before the Iranian Government has had some time to consider what is being offered to them.

Libby.

QUESTION: But if they do stop their enrichment work -- this is following up on Sue -- that means that the elements of the incentive package are still under negotiation. Is that accurate?

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, if --

QUESTION: I mean, it's still open for discussion once they stop -- if they stop their nuclear work*?

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, it's -- then if they meet the conditions that have been laid out for them, it then becomes a negotiation. And we have laid out -- laid out for the Iranian regime -- the P-5+1 has laid out what as a group we believe is a positive package, a positive pathway. We're offering them that pathway and we hope that they take up the international community on that positive pathway. As we talked about, there's another one. And the international community, the P-5+1 is fully prepared to go down that pathway if the Iranian regime doesn't meet the conditions laid out for it.

Teri.

QUESTION: Can -- without going into the elements of the package then, can you at least assure us that some of the principals that were very firm before the package was presented, such as no security guarantees, no security assurances for Iran, that that's still true?

MR. MCCORMACK: In terms of U.S. Security affairs?

QUESTION: Right. U.S. policy.

MR. MCCORMACK: Yes. This is, as Saul will remember, this is the exception -- the exception that I made to not talking about the package. U.S. security guarantees are not on the table.

Yes, Sylvie.

QUESTION: (Inaudible) to characterize the answer, the response of Iran, but can you at least tell us if, according to you, it's something -- it's a good sign or it's a bad sign or it's --

MR. MCCORMACK: Sylvie, without -- without all the facts here, I'm not going to try to characterize it. We've seen along with you all the public comments that Mr. Larijani have made. I think we're going to wait until we get a sense of what the response was from the representatives from the EU-3 and Mr. Solana before we have any further comment on it.

After we have had an opportunity to consult with them, then I'll try to get you a little bit more of a response. I'll try to share something a little bit more with you.

QUESTION: They're -- while not revealing any parts of the package, the Iranians have said that they find there is some ambiguities. Would you agree with them that there are any ambiguities or would you dispute that analysis?

MR. MCCORMACK: Again, without having access to the facts here and the facts would be what Mr. Solana may have heard from the Iranians, I'm not going to try to dissect what they have said in public.

Yes. Anything else on Iran?

QUESTION: Yes.

MR. MCCORMACK: Elise.

QUESTION: Although there's no kind of timeline, at what point do the penalties or sticks kick in if Iran doesn't suspend? I mean, you're not going to wait for them indefinitely to suspend.

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, we've talked about weeks, not months, as the timeline for them to consider whether or not they want to go down this positive pathway. If they choose not to, then the international community is fully prepared at that point to go down the pathway of the UN Security Council.

QUESTION: Well -- but weeks, not months is also kind of ambiguous. While you don't want to tell us specifically, have you told the Iranians you have X date to give us an answer?

MR. MCCORMACK: We -- let me wait until we get the readout from Mr. Solana's meeting before I go into any more detail on that.

Anne.

QUESTION: How long would it take the Iranians to suspend and have that verified to your satisfaction?

MR. MCCORMACK: That -- well, part of that's a technical question because the suspension would be verified by the IAEA.

QUESTION: I'm just wondering how long that whole thing takes.

MR. MCCORMACK: I think it'll probably take a matter of weeks.

QUESTION: Not months.

MR. MCCORMACK: Yes.

QUESTION: You said U.S. security guarantees are not on the table.

MR. MCCORMACK: Yes.

QUESTION: Does that also include the U.S. acceding to any multilateral security guarantees that the other five may be willing to present?

MR. MCCORMACK: U.S. security guarantees, U.S.-based security guarantees, U.S. participation in security guarantees not on the table.

QUESTION: That should cover it. Thank you.

QUESTION: But are you willing to discuss the idea of security with them in a dialogue without providing a guarantee?

MR. MCCORMACK: I don't think I could be any more clear than I was with Teri.

QUESTION: Well, there's a difference between providing a guarantee and engaging with a country on a dialogue about the issue of security.

MR. MCCORMACK: I think that we have sliced the salami here about as thin as you can slice it.

Anything else on Iran?

QUESTION: Iranian President keeps saying according to the reports and also he keeps saying in public also that he is backed by China and Russia, and he will not move as far as nuclear program where Iran is concerned.

MR. MCCORMACK: All I can say is the package that was presented to the Iranians was agreed upon by the P5+1, which includes Russia and China.

Joel?

QUESTION: Change of subject, Sean.

MR. MCCORMACK: I don't know. Is there anything else on Iran?

Yes, sir?

QUESTION: There must be some content inside this incentive side of the proposal like freezing foreign assets of Iran, like that. Do you recognize them as economic sanction or this is the only disincentive. Is there any difference between disincentives and economic sanctions?

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, there -- well, people will use different words to characterize it. We have used the words robust measures, robust steps that the international community would take that are agreed upon by the P5+1. So I'm not going to characterize it any further than that.

But I will say that we have talked about outside of this process, outside the Security Council, outside of this potential negotiating track, the United States and other like-minded states are looking at what other measures they might take that might prevent the Iranian regime from using the international financial system to further their nuclear weapons program, to further financing of terror, also talking to other like-minded states about counterproliferation measures.

A good example of that is our Proliferation Security Initiative, how to use those sort of defensive or counterproliferation measures to stop the inflow or the outflow of WMD, weapons of mass destruction technology and know how. So those are discussions that are also taking place but are outside the track of the P-5+1 potential negotiating track and outside of the Security Council track as well.

QUESTION: Do you mean it is -- you don't require any resolution in the Security Council for this -- disincentives?

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, you're mixing terms a bit here. Let me go back. We talked about this in terms of three tracks. There's the Security Council track, there's the P-5+1 potential negotiating track that everybody's very interested in today, and there's a third track and those are the so-called financial measures or the counterproliferation steps. Those are things that don't necessarily require any action by the Security Council. Those are steps that individual states or like-minded states can take together in concert outside of the Security Council track.

QUESTION: I just have one more question --

MR. MCCORMACK: Sure.

QUESTION: You say --

MR. MCCORMACK: I'll start apologizing now. (Laughter.)

QUESTION: I mean, you say you're not going to reveal the details of the package, but details are being leaked. I'm not saying by you, but clearly some information coming out of Vienna. Would you correct anything that is wrong in those leaks?

MR. MCCORMACK: I'm not going to do it one way or the other because that starts going down the road of what's in it, what might not be in it. I would just point out that the negotiations aren't taking place in Vienna.

QUESTION: New subject?

MR. MCCORMACK: Yes.

QUESTION: Sean, yesterday the Secretary released the report on trafficking, as I said yesterday, and the Ambassador was very clear also. It's disturbing for the world's largest democracy, India, that India has gone down on the list and what sort of steps India is taking or the Secretary has been talking with Indian Government officials she meets so many times here and also in Delhi, and what is the reaction from the Indian Government on --

MR. MCCORMACK: I don't have any particular reaction from the Indian Government on this, Goyal. Look, this is a very serious problem. It's something that the President takes seriously, the Secretary of State takes seriously. Our Trafficking in Persons Office tries to gather the best information that they possibly can working with host governments on this issue, and what you see is their best judgment based on an objective set of criteria.

There are many countries who are our friends and allies who end up in Tier 3 or on the Tier 2 Watch List, and that I think is a real demonstration of our commitment to this. This is a hard issue and that we are going to speak out clearly and in public on it.

Now, the whole idea behind listing the various countries and the governments in terms of what steps they have taken on to fight trafficking in persons is to try to solve the problem. What we want to do is work with governments to try to resolve the problem, get -- work with those governments so that they can take steps, they can change their laws, they can change their regulations to fight trafficking in persons.

So the actual list itself is more of a mechanism. It's not meant to -- it's not meant to brand any particular country, although there are some countries that have sort of -- have remained on the list for quite some time. There are examples of countries moving up, and moving up in this case is a good thing, up from Tier 3 up to Tier 1. Malawi is a good example. Ecuador is a good example. And there are other examples that were listed in the report yesterday. So it is possible to see improvements and I think that when you look at those countries that have moved up the list, it's a demonstration of the utility of talking about this in public.

QUESTION: How about the United States? What are the UN doing on this issue and are we going to talk when the UN General Assembly meets in September or October this year?

MR. MCCORMACK: Honestly, Goyal, I don't have any particular information on what the UN may be doing. You can check with them.

Teri.

QUESTION: Change of subject?

MR. MCCORMACK: Yeah.

QUESTION: Venezuela is complaining about its designation for a fourth year, I think, on Tier 3.

MR. MCCORMACK: Right.

QUESTION: And they put out a press release yesterday saying that contrary to State's report which says there have been no prosecutions of human traffickers, they say there were 21 prosecutions last year, three so far this year. How could the records be so different?

MR. MCCORMACK: I saw the press release and I talked to our Trafficking in Persons Office about this because I wanted to try to square this. What I was told is that, first of all, the report goes from March -- this particular report covers the time period from March 2005 to March 2006. And the office, our Trafficking in Persons Office, gathered all the information that it could. This particular set of facts or purported facts was not made available to our Trafficking in Persons Office. So I talked to John Miller about this and he said, look, if these are -- if these really are real prosecutions last year and this year, they're going to look into it. They're going to see if, in fact, this is real data. If it is, then it will be reflected in upcoming reports.

As part of this process, what we do is we encourage countries that are on Tier 3 -- and Venezuela is in Tier 3 -- we encourage them in this time period from when the report is issued until September to take remedial steps, to take action, to change the laws, change the regulations. So if the Government of Venezuela has, in fact, done these prosecutions and they're real prosecutions and they have taken steps, certainly that will be reflected in future reports.

Sue.

QUESTION: Change of subject to Somalia?

MR. MCCORMACK: Anything else on trafficking in persons? That's a no.

QUESTION: Do you see the rise of the Islamists in Somalia as a setback for counterterrorism measures in the region? And just to clarify, there are many reports that you have been backing this anti-terrorism coalition and that you have said -- that the State Department has said publicly that you would support those who are fighting terrorism, especially within the Horn of Africa. Do you think you backed the wrong horse?

MR. MCCORMACK: A few things. One, we have certainly our set of facts with respect to what is happening in Mogadishu, and I think that these reports are centered on Mogadishu itself as opposed to the rest of the country. It's imperfect. I will tell you that right now. We don't have an embassy there. We watch what is going -- we have a group of people in Embassy Nairobi in Kenya that watches the situation in Somalia.

As for the press reports about this group that has allegedly "taken control" of Mogadishu, I can't verify any particular aspect of those reports, what area they may control as opposed to another group. The situation, I think as many people will understand, is very fluid in Mogadishu. It has been for some time, years in fact.

So but there is one thing in asking questions about this particular group. My understanding is that they are not, in fact, a monolithic group. There is a -- there are many different factions even to this one group. So I can't -- I'm not going to characterize them in any particular way. I couldn't get into whether or not they have links to al-Qaida or not.

Now, all of that said, we do have serious concerns and publicly stated concerns about the presence of foreign terrorists in Somalia. The institutions in Somalia are -- the national institutions in Somalia are virtually nonexistent. The international community has been working to try to support the transitional federal institutions which has sought to set up a capital in a town -- in a city outside of Mogadishu. To this point, those efforts have not been successful. These institutions are very, very weak and it's really unclear how much authority they actually are able to exercise over Somalian territory.

So we view the international efforts to try to reinforce and to build up these international institutions and efforts to fight the presence of foreign terrorists in Somalia as mutually reinforcing. If you're able to combat the presence of foreign terrorists, who like nothing more than ungoverned areas -- failed states, if you will -- then that helps -- that could help build up these national institutions. Fighting did not just break out in Mogadishu four weeks ago. Sadly, this has been the case in Somalia for quite some time. It hasn't had a central government since, I think, about 1991. It's a tragic situation for the Somalian people. It's a real source of concern for the international community. The international community is still, despite the conditions in -- violent conditions in many parts of Mogadishu and parts of Somalia, still working to get humanitarian food aid in. We contribute to that via the World Food Program.

So we and the rest of the world have an interest in seeing a better day for the Somalian people and we have an interest in seeing democratic institutions reinforced in the Horn of Africa. And we have -- also have an interest as well as the rest of the world in combating the presence of foreign terrorists in that Horn of Africa region. It's a place where Usama bin Laden after he left Afghanistan -- before he went to Afghanistan sought refuge in Sudan. So there is a long history of foreign terrorist presence in that Horn of Africa. It's an important area of responsibility for our Central Command.

QUESTION: Are you concerned that this violence that has been going on for several -- that's been going on since 1991 basically, but it's intensified in the last three months, are you concerned that this is going to create an even more dire humanitarian situation? Apparently people have been fleeing the capital of Mogadishu and NGOs are very concerned that it could be a repeat of sort of the 1992, 1993.

MR. MCCORMACK: Certainly, the humanitarian -- the situation for the Somalian people is a real source of concern for us. That's why I mentioned that we do contribute to the World Food Program. The violence over the years has waxed and waned. There have been periods where it spiked. I think that -- I can't speak to the relative level of violence today versus 1992. But I think it is safe to say, relative to recent times, there has been -- there has been a spike in violence. Yes. It's a source of concern. Yeah.

George.

QUESTION: All right. Can you say anything about the foreign terrorists you were alluding to before and where they are from and with which groups do they have links?

MR. MCCORMACK: We do have concerns about the presence of al-Qaida in Somalia, George. I can't go into a list of names for you. If I am able to share that information with you, I'll be certainly happy to do so. You know, we have certain constraints in terms of intelligence information. But yes, we do have concerns about the presence of al-Qaida in Somalia.

Jonathan.

QUESTION: Just following up on that. What do you say to the accusation that the U.S. is contributing to instability in the country because of its support by (inaudible) of certain groups?

MR. MCCORMACK: Right. Well, we have talked about the fact in public that we certainly want to work with people in Somalia who are interested in combating terrorism, foreign terrorists. And the presence of foreign terrorists in Somalia is a destabilizing fact in and of itself. I would just go back to the -- I would just go back to the sad fact that violence is not new in Somalia. And it's certainly not new in Mogadishu. This is a place that has known violence for the past you know, since 1991, coming up on two decades now.

So we have an interest as well as the rest of the world in seeing what we can do to try to help the Somali people realize a better day. I talked a little bit about the basic approach, in that helped to try to build up those institutions in Somalia that might someday lay the foundation for a stable, well-governed state. Sadly that seems to be far off in the future, as well to fighting the presence of foreign terrorists in Somalia.

So that's a general explanation for what our policy is. And certainly, we as well as others around the world have an interest in seeing a stable, secure, peaceful and prosperous Somalia. But that's going to take a lot of work on the part of the international community as well as on the part of the Somali people

Elise.

QUESTION: Sean, also on Somalia, you're working with these people in Somalia who are interested in fighting terrorism. Do you have a minimum kind of set of standards for their practices or, you know, when you talk about the issue of working with some unsavory characters, what kind of accountability factor do you have for people that you're working with? And also, who is taking the lead in terms of dealing with Somalia? Is it the State Department? Is it the Embassy in Nairobi or is it the Pentagon in terms of dealing with some of these characters?

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, all the various elements that the U.S. Government have an interest in Somalia. You have the State Department, who certainly is very interested in the political situation there, interested in the humanitarian situation there.

I think the Department of Defense also has interest in that. They have a -- Central Command has a task force that has area of responsibility for -- that includes Somalia I believe that they're based in Djibouti. So they have an interest in the Horn of Africa. Somalia policy is of interest to a variety of different agencies in the U.S. Government and it's one that is coordinated across those agencies.

QUESTION: And what about the -- I'm sorry, what about the minimum standards for people that you're working with that are fighting terrorism? Obviously no institutions there, so what kind of benchmarks do you put for these people?

MR. MCCORMACK: As I said, we work with a variety of individuals and have interest in working with a variety of groups in Somalia. I don't have any further details on that. There's nothing I can share with you from the podium

QUESTION: Change of subject?

QUESTION: (Off-mike.)

MR. MCCORMACK: Sylvie. Why don't we go back to Sylvie.

QUESTION: The African Union criticized yesterday -- the President of African Union, President Sassou Nguesso, criticized yesterday your involvement in Somalia saying that it would be better if you supported the official government, which is in exile in Nairobi. So what do you have to answer to that? What do you do for this government in exile?

MR. MCCORMACK: It's a question that I'll have to look into for you, Sylvie. I don't have any information on what our view is on that particular group. I know that we have worked to try to support the transitional federal institutions that are I think in Baidoa. I think that's the name of the city.

QUESTION: I just wondered whether you had any comment on the international crisis group's assertions that the U.S. is sponsoring this anti-terrorism alliance to the tune of about $150,000 a month?

MR. MCCORMACK: Anything else on Somalia?

QUESTION: Can you look into it?

MR. MCCORMACK: I'd be happy to share with you what I can, yes. Anything else on Somalia?

Libby?

QUESTION: Change of subject?

MR. MCCORMACK: Yeah.

QUESTION: Sean, there was a report in yesterday's LA Times that said State Department officials were upset over a decision by the U.S. military to exclude certain Geneva Convention protections in the new army field manual on interrogations. So I'm just wondering if you have any comment on that? I know that the new army field manual is not out yet, but just the aspect that they may happen, you know.

MR. MCCORMACK: Yeah. No, I looked into this and I, you know, talked with our legal advisor, John Bellinger, who if anybody would be upset would probably -- he'd be the guy that's upset and he wasn't upset.

In fact, I can say that we believe that the directive is a good directive. We have had full opportunity to review it. We have had ample input. We are, I think comfortable with the directive but it has yet to come out. It's going to be issued by the Department of Defense. So I'm not going to try to preempt them and describe for you what is in there, but I would point out a couple of things.

One, that we believe that the directive establishes a minimum level of protections for detainees that is consistent with Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, and that was one of the questions that was raised by this LA Times story. And in fact, some of the important respects, the directive will contain broader protections than those contained in Article 3.

The other point is that the Detainee Treatment Act, which has been referred to around here -- around Washington as the McCain Amendment, prohibits cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment of any detainees in U.S. Government custody. And this is also reflected in the DOD directive.

So I think -- on the whole we think it's a good directive. We're comfortable with it. And we had ample opportunity to provide our input to the directive, and I think that much of that input is going to be reflected in the final product.

QUESTION: Just to follow up, though, just the notion that it may contain certain elements of Article 3, but that it doesn't exactly follow the rule of the Geneva Convention. Just the image of that, isn't that damaging considering --

MR. MCCORMACK: I would caution you against making those sorts of assumptions. Again, I don't want to preempt what is a Department of Defense wide effort. This is going to be for use by Department of Defense employees, so I think you understand that I don't want to -- I don't want to talk about their work. But I can say from the State Department's perspective we think it's a good directive. Our input is reflected in it and it does contain those protections consistent with Common Article 3 as well as the Detainee Treatment Act.

Okay. Anybody else on this? Joel.

QUESTION: Sean, change of subject. The Gaza preventive security building was fired on with grenades and it appears there's still an ongoing duel militant army between Fatah and Hamas. And it appears that President Abbas is giving out his recommendation for this referendum and it appears, too, that Prime Minister Olmert is negotiating with various countries so it's ongoing.

If you would, maybe it can be called a mini-roadmap. The whole effort is to drive Hamas from power. Is there someone such as a James Wolfensohn that once again -- or General Dayton -- working to facilitate this between the Palestinians and the Israelis?

MR. MCCORMACK: In terms of a potential meeting between Prime Minister Olmert and President Abbas, that's for them to decide.

QUESTION: Just this small -- whole drive to get something ongoing where it's back to the regular roadmap.

MR. MCCORMACK: Okay, well, there are a few -- there are a few elements in that question. One, in terms of General Dayton, he is -- he continues to work with the office of President Abbas to implement the Gaza movement and access agreement. The Rafah crossing is still open. The security on the Palestinian side is handled by a presidential guard so that's directly with the office of President Abbas. European monitors are still there. There's still traffic that goes through there. General Dayton is still part of that process. And I have to emphasize working with President Abbas's office, not with the Hamas-led government.

In terms of the referendum question, this is -- I think what this reflects is the ongoing discussion within Palestinian society about their future: What pathway are they going to follow? Certainly the pathway that the Hamas-led government would like to take the Palestinian people down leads to nowhere because it's a pathway of violence and it does not lead to a two-state solution, it does not lead to a Palestinian state for the Palestinian people.

There's another way and that is the way that President Abbas has talked about: recognition of Israel's right to exist and being a negotiating partner for peace with the state of Israel. It's going to be up to the Palestinian people to decide which pathway they go down. I think that discussion of a referendum, discussion about the various kinds of proposals and agreements that are now ongoing in Palestinian society is a healthy debate but it's going to be a debate that is going to have to be finally answered by the Palestinian people. We can't answer it. Nobody else can answer it for them.

QUESTION: So you support this idea of referendum?

MR. MCCORMACK: No, that's not what I'm saying. I'm saying -- what I'm saying is that it's the Palestinian people that have had the choice. They are going to have to decide for themselves how they resolve these fundamental issues. The fundamental issues are what kind of future is the Palestinian people going to have. Are they going to continue down the same pathway that they are on with a Hamas-led government that advocates use of terror, does not recognize the right of the state of Israel to exist? There's another pathway and that is represented by President Abbas and people that work in the office of the president. That is a pathway that could potentially lead to a Palestinian state, Palestine. But how those questions get answered and using what mechanisms are only questions for the Palestinian people to answer.

QUESTION: On the same connection?

MR. MCCORMACK: Yeah.

QUESTION: Is the U.S. going to do anything to help Abbas in conducting this referendum and campaigns or anything?

MR. MCCORMACK: That's for -- those are questions for the Palestinian people and President Abbas and others to answer.

QUESTION: Sean, one on Burma?

MR. MCCORMACK: On -- we're still in the Middle East.

QUESTION: Do you have anything on the aid mechanism that the Quartet's come up with, that the Quartet agreed on in New York? Apparently the EU is very close to -- this is for the Palestinians. The EU is close to making some decisions and I wondered whether they'd been consulting you and what you had on it.

MR. MCCORMACK: Yeah, we have been talking. I don't think that they have -- I don't think they have reached the point of having a final proposal. And the way this would work is that the Quartet tasked the EU to come up with this, come up with a proposal that then would be put forward for consideration by the Quartet. We have been consulting with them. I think there was a meeting in Brussels within the past couple of weeks that we attended at the deputy assistant secretary of state level. But as of this point, I don't think that they have come to closure on a final proposal yet that they could submit to the Quartet for consideration.

QUESTION: So how would that work? Would that be submitted to political directors within the Quartet? Would that be presented to the ministers or --

MR. MCCORMACK: I'm not sure what the exact mechanism would be, Sue. But the Quartet envoy -- it's usually David Welch who handles those things in close consultation with the interagency, including the White House.

QUESTION: Okay.

MR. MCCORMACK: Sylvie.

QUESTION: In Iraq, the Prime Minister al-Maliki is proposing a new plan for security and actually he started by releasing -- or announcing the release of 2,500 detainees and also he proposed a South African-style truth and reconciliation committee. Do you think it's a good idea?

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, certainly on the prisoner -- on the prisoner question, this is something that is being done in consultation with the U.S. Government and the multinational forces on the ground there. We are deeply involved with Prime Minister Maliki's government on this issue.

Let me step back for a second. There is very clearly going to come a time when the Iraqi people need to come together and to try to reconcile whatever differences that they may have. This has been -- the period of Saddam Hussein was a very difficult and dark period for the Iraqi people in terms of their rights, the abuses that were visited upon them by this regime, and they're very clearly over the past few years there have been differences among the Iraqi population about the liberation of Iraq as well as the formation of this new government.

So I would interpret -- the way I would view Prime Minister Maliki's efforts is as an attempt to start to heal some of the -- some of those divisions that currently exist in Iraqi society to try to bring together the Iraqi people.

We have, for quite some time, talked about our strategy working very closely with the Iraqi Government to bring as many people into the political process as we possibly can. We believe that that ultimately is the way, the most important way of reducing the level of violence in Iraq and helping the Iraqi people build a more stable, prosperous Iraq.

There are going to be people that are irreconcilable to any political process. The al-Qaida adherence of the world, the Zarqawi's of the world, and some hardcore insurgents that are just, regardless of what sort of political process may exist to try to bring them in to a better future for Iraq, they're not going to participate in it. And you have to deal with them militarily or through the use of force, and that is what we're working with also on -- with the Iraqi Government in training of their troops, training of their security forces, and also the presence of multinational forces in Iraq.

QUESTION: Follow up on Iraq?

MR. MCCORMACK: Excuse me?

QUESTION: Follow up on Iraq?

MR. MCCORMACK: Yeah, sure.

QUESTION: Yesterday, an Italian soldier was killed in an explosion near Nasiriyah in an area which was relatively calm until a few weeks ago, and now we are have a number of violence and a number of deaths. Does that mean that the violence is spreading off to the Sunni area or does that mean that the insurrection is targeting the weakest element of the coalition and trying to push them out of Iraq sooner than they plan?

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, I don't have the particular details of this incident, and I think that the security people on the ground, our coalition forces on the ground are in a better position to more precisely describe to you where violence may be occurring, whether that's in new places or whether it's a pattern that they have witnessed before. So I think that type of question is best posed to them on the ground in Baghdad.

Certainly, we honor the sacrifice of all the coalition forces. We honor the sacrifice of the Italian forces that have also previously shed blood in Iraq in defense of liberty. So our condolences go out to those who have given their lives for this cause of freedom.

As for the motivation of those committing these acts of violence, they're interested in seeing -- halting the progress along the pathway to democracy of this new Iraqi Government. They're interested in seeing multinational forces leave Iraq before the Iraqi people have a real opportunity to set a solid foundation for a better way of life for themselves.

Yes?

QUESTION: I think I asked you about the trips (inaudible) that Assistant Secretary of Affairs --

MR. MCCORMACK: Oh, Mr. Yamamoto? Did we get any answers on that? We'll get back to you. Check with Tom after the briefing, he'll get you an answer.

QUESTION: Okay. I have just a couple of questions. Do you have any comments on last week there was an announcement on Ethiopian radio that you're going to be maybe directly or indirectly participating on the fundraising that is taking place here in Washington, D.C., for the opposition party? Has anyone is being invited from your Department?

MR. MCCORMACK: We'll check for you.

Okay, yes, ma'am?

QUESTION: On South Korea it is reported that South Korean Government has requested the United States to agree that goods manufactured at Kaesong in North Korea to be regarded as made in South Korea. Was this issue formally discussed at FTA meeting between U.S. and South Korea?

MR. MCCORMACK: I'll check. I know that we've begun FTA negotiations with South Korea. I don't have a readout for you as to what issues were discussed in the meeting.

We have other people with their hands up? Anybody else here?

Yes, ma'am.

QUESTION: Thank you for taking my question yesterday. I saw you put out a statement on Taiwan. I'm just wondering how the U.S. perceives the latest development now the opposition party has filed a motion to impeach Chen Shui-bian. Are you concerned the impeachment may cause instability in Taiwan?

MR. MCCORMACK: I would refer you to the statement that I put out yesterday.

QUESTION: A quick follow-up. There have been a lot of confusing reports in Taiwan. A few politicians claim now the U.S. is backing them. Just for the record, can you clarify whether or not the U.S. has any preference for Chen Shui-bian to either step down or complete his terms?

MR. MCCORMACK: Those are political decisions for the Taiwan people to make, not for us.

QUESTION: Just a follow-up.

MR. MCCORMACK: Yes?

QUESTION: Taiwan's Government on the news agency, Central News Agency filed a report on -- saying that U.S. hoped President Chen to complete his term in the office. And they said -- a government-owned agency says the report was read everywhere in Taiwan. So the people in Taiwan now says perhaps the U.S. Government take side on that issue.

MR. MCCORMACK: It sounds like a political issue for the Taiwan people to decide.

QUESTION: Sean, first one on Burma. It's been like ten years, I saw the statements from the State Department on Burma, the democratically elected leader. She's still under house arrest further beyond ten years and celebrating her 61st birthday still not in freedom.

Like we did with the other dictators, the U.S. -- how the U.S. is not going to deal with this Burma dictator to free her and have a free election and let the people decide what they want and she was elected freely in that country which still -- she is not free still.

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, you do that a variety of different ways, Goyal. You do it by speaking out in public, trying to bring diplomatic pressure to bear on that regime. You work quietly behind the scenes with countries in the region and around the world who have an interest in seeing democracy come to Burma. So there are a lot of different ways that you do that. You can act through the Security Council as well. So I think it's safe to say way we're pursuing all those different avenues.

QUESTION: Thanks.

MR. MCCORMACK: Thank you.

(The briefing was concluded at 1:37 p.m.)

DPB #94

Released on June 6, 2006

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

Copyright 2006 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

392 of 445 DOCUMENTS

State Department Documents and Publications

June 6, 2006

Burma, North Korea, Laos Fail To Stop Human Trafficking, U.S. Says; China, Indonesia, Malaysia, Cambodia among those on special "watch list"

BYLINE: Susan Krause, Washington File Staff Writer

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 1202 words

Washington -- The U.S. Department of State has cited three East Asian nations -- Burma, North Korea and Laos -- for failing to make a significant effort to combat trafficking in persons, according to an annual report released June 5.

In the department's Trafficking in Persons Report for 2006, the three are among 12 countries ranked in the lowest of three categories. The categories, called tiers, were determined on the basis of government action to combat trafficking, prosecute offenders and assist victims. (See related article.)

The department first determined whether a country was a point of origin, transit or destination for a significant number -- usually at least 100 -- of victims of severe forms of trafficking. It then assigned each country to one of the four tiers on the basis of that determination.

In its evaluations, the State Department compiled information from U.S. diplomatic posts, foreign government officials, nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) and published reports. The diplomatic posts conducted investigations to gather information -- meeting with government officials, representatives of local and international NGOs and multilateral organizations, journalists, academics and survivors of trafficking.

Countries in Tier 1 fully complied with standards of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA). Those in Tier 2 made significant efforts to comply with the TVPA, but did not reach full compliance.

A special "watch list" was established for countries in Tier 2 that showed a significant number of victims of the most severe forms of trafficking, a significant increase in numbers of victims or other evidence of falling backward. In the East Asia-Pacific region, Cambodia, China, Indonesia and Malaysia were included in this category, as well as Macau and Taiwan.

Countries that did not comply fully with the standards of the TVPA and did not make significant efforts to do so were placed in Tier 3, the lowest rank. Third tier countries may be subject to certain sanctions by the U.S. government, including withholding of nonhumanitarian, nontrade-related assistance funds.

BURMA

Burma is a source country for human trafficking for the purpose of forced labor and sexual exploitation, according to the report. Burmese men, women and children are trafficked to Thailand, China, Bangladesh, Malaysia, Korea and Macau for domestic service, forced and bonded labor in industrial zones and agricultural estates, and prostitution. The Burmese military has been implicated in trafficking persons for forced labor, and there have been reports of forced enlistments of children in the Burmese army.

"The Burmese government made minimal progress in prosecuting trafficking-related cases, especially cases involving trafficking for sexual or labor exploitation," the report said.

The State Department said Burma passed anti-trafficking legislation in September 2005 that addressed sexual exploitation, forced labor, slavery, servitude and debt bondage. But the law has not been applied effectively, the report says, because of corruption in Burma's judiciary and lack of resources.

For more information on Burma, see U.S. Support for Democracy in Burma.

NORTH KOREA

North Korea is also a source country of persons trafficked for the purpose of forced labor and sexual exploitation, according to the report.

The North Korean government's own repressive activities have contributed to the problem, the report notes. The government operates forced-labor prison camps, incarcerating an estimated 150,000-200,000 people. An unknown number of North Koreans have attempted to escape the camps by fleeing across the Chinese border. In China, they are vulnerable to trafficking rings, sold as brides to Korean and Chinese men or forced into prostitution and exploitative labor arrangements.

Little information is available on North Korea's legal system, the report says, and there are no known laws that directly address trafficking in persons.

"The government does not acknowledge that trafficking is occurring, either within the country or transnationally," the report says.

For more information on North Korea, see The U.S. and the Korean Peninsula.

LAOS

A significant number of men, women and children in Laos are economic migrants who fall victim to commercial sexual exploitation or forced labor arrangements in Thailand, the report says.

Laos is also a transit and destination country for women who have been trafficked for the purpose of sexual exploitation.

A "Law on Women" passed in September 2004 was intended to protect victims of trafficking, but the government of Laos has not implemented its provisions fully.

Laos has no specific anti-trafficking legislation, according to the report, and data is limited on local officials' efforts to prosecute other offenses, such as kidnapping and prostitution.

"Overall, judicial and law enforcement institutions are extremely weak and corruption is widespread in Laos," the report says.

"TIER 2 WATCH LIST" COUNTRIES

Countries on the Tier 2 special watch list should receive "special scrutiny," according to the State Department.

Cambodia was placed on the watch list, according to the report, because "the determination that it is making significant efforts is based in part on commitments to sustain progress over the coming year." Cambodia increased its enforcement efforts over the past year, the report notes, with more police actions, leading to arrests and convictions of traffickers.

China was assigned to the watch list for a second consecutive year because it failed to show evidence of increasing efforts to address transnational trafficking, according to the report.

"The government of China provides reasonable protections to internal victims of trafficking," the report says. "However, protections for Chinese and foreign victims of transnational trafficking remain inadequate and victims are sometimes punished for unlawful acts that were a direct result of their being trafficked -- e.g., violations of prostitution or immigration/emigration controls."

Indonesia was placed on the watch list for failure to show evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking, according to the report.

"The Indonesian government has not passed a much-needed anti-trafficking law that has been under consideration for three years," the report says. "While the government launched an unprecedented anti-corruption campaign, widespread corrupt practices continued to contribute to trafficking."

Malaysia also was cited for failure to show evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking and protect trafficking victims.

"Some commitments made by Malaysian officials in 2004 and 2005 went unfulfilled," the report says. "Although Malaysia has criminal statutes that allow it to punish elements of trafficking, Malaysia lacks comprehensive anti-trafficking legislation that would enable officials to identify and shelter victims and to prosecute traffickers under a single criminal statute."

For additional information, see Human Trafficking.

The full text of the 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report is available on the State Department Web site.

(The Washington File is a product of the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

Copyright 2006 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

393 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 6, 2006 Tuesday 8:26 PM EST

STATE DEPT.: GULF ARAB COUNTRIES CONFRONT HUMAN TRAFFICKING PROBLEMS

BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 607 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's International Information Programs issued the following press release:

By David Shelby

Washington File Staff Writer

Three Gulf Arab countries have been elevated from the lowest ranks of offenders to an intermediate ranking in the State Department's 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report.

Kuwait, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates were raised from Tier 3 countries, the least favorable rating, to the Tier 2 "Watch List" in the report to the U.S. Congress issued June 5.

The report evaluates foreign governments' efforts to eliminate human trafficking, grouping nations in one of four categories based on their efforts to control human trafficking, to prosecute those involved, and to support and assist victims of these crimes.

Governments that meet standards established in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 are placed in Tier 1. Tier 2 comprises countries that are demonstrating commitment to address their problems but have not yet achieved international standards. Tier 2 "Watch List" includes countries that show signs of falling backwards, while governments not making significant efforts to meet the standards are placed in Tier 3. Saudi Arabia is the only remaining Gulf Arab country in Tier 3. (See related article: <http://usinfo.state.gov/gi/Archive/2006/Jun/05-20237.html>.)

Gulf Arab countries are a common destination for South and Southeast Asians who serve as domestic workers and unskilled laborers. These workers often fall victim to involuntary servitude, excessive hours, nonpayment of wages, physical abuse, sexual abuse and passport confiscation. These countries also have tolerated trafficking of children to work as camel jockeys, according to the report.

The report welcomed proposed measures in Kuwait to standardize contracts for domestic workers and hailed the government's commitment to enact legislation that would criminalize exploitation of foreign workers. Within the past year, Kuwait has assigned the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labor the task of coordinating the government's anti-trafficking activities.

According to the report, Kuwait also took steps toward implementing anti-trafficking measures by enforcing a ban on child camel jockeys and prosecuting some employers for labor rights abuses. The report said that an association of Kuwaiti labor recruitment agencies has taken steps to defend foreign workers' rights.

Qatar confronted the problem of child trafficking by repatriating numerous child camel jockeys, according to the report. It also established a shelter for abused domestic workers and created a hotline for complaints.

The United Arab Emirates banned the practice of using child camel jockeys and repatriated all identified victims to their home countries. Both the United Arab Emirates and Kuwait have launched anti-trafficking public awareness campaigns.

Saudi Arabia remained in Tier 3 for its unwillingness to confront the issue of human trafficking. The report said Saudi Arabia sometimes arrests, punishes and deports victims rather than protecting them.

Oman fell from Tier 2 to the Tier 2 "Watch List" due to a lack of evidence over the past year that it is increasing efforts to combat trafficking.

The State Department is under a congressional mandate to prepare the annual Trafficking in Persons Report. Countries that rank in Tier 3 are subject to a suspension of U.S. assistance not related to trade or humanitarian relief.

The full text of the report is available on the State Department Web site.

For additional information, see Human Trafficking: http://usinfo.state.gov/gi/global_issues/human_trafficking.html.

LOAD-DATE: June 8, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

394 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 6, 2006 Tuesday 6:32 AM EST

AMBASSADOR MORIARTY: FOR THE COURAGEOUS, A MODERN DAY FIGHT TO ABOLISH SLAVERY

BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 798 wordsDATELINE: KATHMANDU, Nepal

The U.S. Embassy issued the text of the following speech:

U.S. Ambassador James F. Moriarty, in an opinion column June 6 in a major Nepali-language daily newspaper, The Annapurna Post, urges greater efforts to stop the scourge of trafficking in persons:

Yesterday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice released the Department of State's fifth annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report. The report puts it bluntly: trafficking in persons is modern day slavery and is a crime that affects virtually every country, including the United States. The U.S. government estimates that over the past year 600,000 - 800,000 persons - including children and especially women and girls - have been forced into sexual servitude, child soldiering, forced labor, and debt bondage.

Some like Nayla, 8, brought to Dubai from Azerbaijan and prostituted when she was 13, are sold into slavery by acquaintances or family members.

Others, like 15-year-old Michael, kidnapped from his Ugandan village to serve as a combatant for a rebel army, are simply accosted and held with threats against their lives and the lives of their families. Another, 12-year-old Malik of Niger, was lured from his parents by a religious leader, who made false promises of education and instead forced him to beg on the streets of Mali.

Along with the more than $400 million in international anti-trafficking assistance to date, the annual TIP Report is an important part of the U.S. commitment to work with international partners to fight trafficking. The report, mandated by law, is intended to raise global awareness of the problem, underscore the growing efforts of the international community to combat human trafficking, and encourage nations around the world to take effective actions against this abuse. Again this year, the TIP Report presents "tier assessments" of countries' compliance with what U.S. law has set as minimum standards for the elimination trafficking in persons.

This year's report classifies Nepal as having slipped to "tier two," meaning it is not fully complying with the minimum standards for the elimination of severe forms of trafficking but is making significant efforts to meet them. The United States is pleased to note, though, that from July 15, 2004 through July 15, 2005, Nepal's government reported prosecuting 347 cases at the district, appellate and Supreme Court levels, and filing 73 new trafficking cases. Nonetheless, it is clear the government of Nepal must improve its anti-corruption efforts to meet the minimum standards.

Similarly, the Maoists must abandon the forcible conscription of children.

Events in Nepal over the past year made anti-trafficking efforts more difficult. Yet the United States hopes the recent reinstatement of a multiparty Parliament will enable the new Nepal Government to focus on this issue more directly. To assist the Nepal Government, the Department of State and USAID will continue to support the Ministry of Women, Children and Social Welfare in its anti-trafficking activities in the areas of prevention, rehabilitation and prosecution.

We can all do better in this fight. The U.S. government, for its part, continues to seek new ways to address America's own trafficking problem. Earlier this year, President George W. Bush signed a law reauthorizing the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA), which strengthens provisions designed to combat human trafficking by prosecuting and punishing traffickers, protecting their victims, and preventing future attempts by criminals to perpetrate this scourge against human dignity and freedom.

Critical partners in the fight against trafficking are non-government organizations (NGOs). These civil society leaders press governments to combat trafficking, keep law enforcement officials informed, and assist victims with shelters, counseling and education. Altogether, USAID in Nepal has provided $1.3 million over a four-year period for anti-trafficking programs, such as providing skills-based training to women and girls who are most at risk of being trafficked. Other NGOs have organized non-formal education and trafficking awareness programs in rural Nepal. These programs led to the arrest of several people involved in trafficking girls to circuses in India and the rescue and repatriation of these girls.

Thanks to these and other NGOs - and spurred by the U.S. Department of State's annual Trafficking in Persons Report - more governments have joined a growing international partnership of nations sharing information and cooperating in the fight against human trafficking.

For millions of enslaved people around the world, this new abolitionist movement has come none too soon. As President Bush recently noted, "Our nation is determined to fight and end this modern form of slavery."

LOAD-DATE: July 25, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

395 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 6, 2006 Tuesday 5:19 AM EST

U.S. GOVERNMENT URGES NIGERIA TO INCREASE PROSECUTIONS, CONVICTIONS OF TRAFFICKERS IN PERSONS

BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 319 wordsDATELINE: ABUJA, Nigeria

The U.S. Diplomatic Mission issued the following press release:

The sixth annual Department of State Trafficking in Persons Report was released on Monday, June 5. Nigeria is categorized in the report as Tier 2. The report said the Government of Nigeria does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, but it is making significant efforts to do so. It said the government continued to strengthen and institutionalize Nigeria's response to human trafficking over the last year, showing substantial commitment to the issue.

The report advised that the government should increase prosecutions and convictions of traffickers and strengthen protection efforts in order to strengthen its response to trafficking. It said Nigeria is a source, transit, and destination country for women and children trafficked for forced labor and sexual exploitation. Victims are trafficked for domestic servitude, street hawking, agricultural labor, and sexual exploitation. Within Nigeria, women and children are trafficked from rural areas to urban zones.

Internationally, they are trafficked to the Central African Republic, Mali, Gabon, Sudan, North Africa, Saudi Arabia, Italy, Spain, the Netherlands, Belgium, Germany, and Austria. Women and children are also trafficked to Nigeria from Togo, Benin, Chad, Cameroon, the Central African Republic, Niger, and Ghana. Follow this link for the full report: <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/tiprpt/2006/65989.htm>

In 2005, the U.S. Government praised Nigeria for implementing the 2003 anti-trafficking in persons' law. That year, the U.S. Government commended the federal government and all the state governments, organizations, and individuals who have worked to fight the scourge of trafficking, especially the Nigerian Agency for the Prohibition of Trafficking in Persons (NAPTIP). Related story:<http://nigeria.usembassy.gov/wwwhp060605a.html>.

LOAD-DATE: June 27, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

396 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 6, 2006 Tuesday 5:03 AM ESTU.S. EMBASSY ISSUES STATEMENT ON 2006 TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT*BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 372 wordsDATELINE: PORT LOUIS, Mauritius

The U.S. Embassy issued the following statement:

On Monday, June 5, 2006, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice released the sixth annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report in a public event at the State Department's Press Briefing Room in Washington, D.C. This 150-country report is the most comprehensive worldwide report on the efforts of governments to combat "severe forms of trafficking in persons." The annual Trafficking in Persons Report serves as the primary diplomatic tool through which the U.S. Government encourages partnership and increased determination in the fight against forced labor, sexual exploitation, and modern-day slavery.

In the 2006 report, the rating for the Republic of Mauritius has improved to Tier 2, which is defined as countries not fully complying with minimum standards of the 2000 Trafficking Victims Protection Act, but making significant efforts to meet these standards. This elevates Mauritius from the Tier Two Watch List. As stated in the report, the scope of the trafficking problem in Mauritius is limited to child prostitution. The improved tier rating is a result of the following anti-trafficking efforts implemented by the Government of Mauritius: passage of the 2005 Child Protection Bill which contained comprehensive anti-child trafficking provisions; additional police training and resources in detecting and responding to instances of trafficking in persons; and public awareness-raising efforts on the dangers of engaging in prostitution.

The U.S. urges continued progress by Mauritius in the area of law enforcement, particularly in arresting, prosecuting and convicting perpetrators of child prostitution as well as the passage of comprehensive anti-trafficking legislation. The Government of the United States looks forward to working with the government of Mauritius to support its ongoing anti-trafficking efforts. Working in cooperation with governments and its citizens around the world, The United States and the American people look forward to the day when all people may be free from these contemporary forms of human servitude and exploitation.

The entire Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP) is available via the following Internet URL: www.state.gov/g/tip.

LOAD-DATE: June 27, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

397 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Xinhua General News Service

June 6, 2006 Tuesday 9:30 AM ESTCambodia makes progress in fighting trafficking in persons, U.S. report*SECTION: WORLD NEWS; PoliticalLENGTH: 233 wordsDATELINE: PHNOM PENH

Cambodia has made progress in combating trafficking in persons over the past year, a statement of U.S. Embassy here said on Tuesday.

The U.S. State Department's 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report, released on Monday, said that Cambodia has been upgraded from Tier 3 to Tier 2 Watch List, which meant the government has made "significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards."

The report highlighted the progress made by Cambodia in intensified efforts to prosecute and convict traffickers; progress on a new Anti-Trafficking Law that meets international standards; and implementation of a nationwide anti-trafficking plan by the Ministry of Interior and continued cooperation with other countries including the U.S.

"The record over the past year demonstrates the high-level commitment by the RGC (the Royal Government of Cambodia) and the Prime Minister to improve the government's performance in fighting trafficking in persons," said Charge Mark C. Storella.

However, the U.S. urged Cambodia to "make greater efforts to prosecute and convict public officials who profit from or are involved in trafficking and should also pass and enact comprehensive anti-trafficking legislation."

As a result of the new tier ranking, all non-humanitarian and non-trade related sanctions levied on Cambodia as a Tier 3 country will be lifted, it said.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 Xinhua News Agency

398 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Xinhua General News Service

June 6, 2006 Tuesday 1:15 AM EST

Major news items in leading Pakistani newspapers

SECTION: WORLD NEWS

LENGTH: 295 words

DATELINE: ISLAMABAD

The following are major news items in leading Pakistani newspapers on Tuesday:

Dawn:

-- The Pakistani government has presented 1.5 trillion federal budget for the coming fiscal year 2006-07.

Perceived to have been prepared with next year's general elections in mind, the budget envisages development spending to increase by 52.57 percent to 415 billion rupees (about 6.91 billion U.S. dollars), and offers a 15 percent dearness allowance to government employees, and 20 and 15 percent increase to pensioners who retired before 1977 and afterwards, respectively, amounting to a relief of 10 billion rupees.

The News:

-- The Pakistani government Monday allocated an outlay of 250.182 billion rupees (about 4.17 billion U.S. dollar) for defense for fiscal 2006-07, an increase of only 4.65 percent on the revised figures of 241.063 billion rupees of the current year (July 2005-June 2006).

However, the defense allocations are nearly 27 billion rupees or 11.93 percent higher than the initial defense budget of 223.501 billion rupees of the outgoing fiscal.

The Nation:

-- Pakistan has rejected Indian accusations of cross border terrorism. Foreign Office has asked India to provide evidence in support of the allegations leveled against Pakistan. In a statement Monday, Foreign Office spokesperson Tasneem Aslam termed the Indian national security adviser's allegations of cross border terrorism as baseless.

Daily Times:

-- U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice released the sixth annual Trafficking in Persons Report at a public event on Monday, placing Pakistan in Tier 2 countries whose governments had made significant efforts to meet the minimum standards for fighting severe forms of human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

399 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Worldstream

June 6, 2006 Tuesday 8:13 AM GMT

U.S. removes Philippines from human trafficking watch list, cites improvements

BYLINE: By TERESA CEROJANO, Associated Press Writer

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 385 words

DATELINE: MANILA Philippines

The United States removed the Philippines from its human trafficking watch list because of the country's progress in fighting modern day slavery, including forced prostitution, sex trafficking and child labor, the U.S. Embassy said Tuesday.

The U.S. State Department's annual "Trafficking in Persons" report, released Monday, moves the Philippines up a tier from its watch list of problem nations, to one that is making significant efforts to combat trafficking.

The report congratulated the Philippines for last year's improvements, saying the government "has stepped up efforts to implement its anti-trafficking law and made initial progress in implementing strategies to combat trafficking in persons, particularly in prosecuting human traffickers."

But it said the Philippines still does not fully comply with minimum standards and remains a source, transit and destination country for men, women and children trafficked for sexual exploitation or forced labor.

The report noted that the Justice Department tripled the number of prosecutors, resulting in a fourfold increase in cases presented for prosecution. The government also sponsored "impressive efforts (to help) trafficking victims," including arrangements with nongovernment organizations and Philippine embassies to provide shelter, counseling and medical assistance to victims.

The number of Filipino women sent to Japan as entertainers in 2005 was almost half that of 2004, because of Japan's stricter visa requirements, the report said. Most of the women are forced into prostitution, it said.

"The U.S. urges continued progress in the Philippines in these areas, and we look forward to working with the government of the Philippines to support its ongoing anti-trafficking efforts," the embassy said in a statement.

According to the report's ranking, "Tier 1" countries fully comply with minimum international standards while those in "Tier 2" including the Philippines do not fully comply but are making significant efforts to combat the problem.

Down a rank is the "Tier 2 Watch List" which lists countries that have made efforts to combat trafficking but still have a significant number of victims and, until this year, had included the Philippines.

"Tier 3" countries are the worst offenders and could face restrictions on U.S. government assistance.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

All Rights Reserved

400 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Worldstream

June 6, 2006 Tuesday 8:18 AM GMT

U.S. State Department report says Albania not doing enough to fight human trafficking

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 368 wordsDATELINE: TIRANA Albania

A report of the U.S. State Department says Albania was not doing enough to fight human trafficking, and the tiny Balkan country remained a source for prostitution and forced labor.

The 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report released Monday by U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Albania was still classified as a Tier 2 country assessed as not fully complying with the minimum standards, but making significant efforts to meet them.

"Albania is primarily a source country for women and children trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor," said the report made available by the U.S. Embassy in Tirana.

"The government of Albania does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so," it said.

The report lists three tiers. Tier 3 is for a country that neither complies with the minimum standards nor is making significant efforts to do so. Tier 1 classifies countries as meeting the minimum standards for the elimination of severe forms of trafficking.

The report said Albanian victims were trafficked to Greece and Italy, "with many of these victims trafficked onward to the United Kingdom, France, Belgium, Norway, Germany, and the Netherlands."

Internal trafficking within Albania and re-trafficking of Albanian victims to other countries remained a problem in 2005, and reports of Roma and Egyptian children trafficked for forced labor or begging continued, it added.

The report urged Tirana to strengthen protection and prevention programs, to fully implement its witness protection program, encourage a greater number of victims to testify against their traffickers and make efforts to guarantee victims' safety.

"The government as a whole should assume a greater leadership role in the country's anti-trafficking efforts, actively implement its National Action Plan, and vigorously investigate and prosecute trafficking-related corruption at all levels of law enforcement," the report said.

Albanian authorities have stepped up efforts to crack down on organized crime, trafficking and corruption in the impoverished ex-communist country, which aspires to join NATO and the European Union one day.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 Associated Press
All Rights Reserved

401 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Worldstream

June 6, 2006 Tuesday 12:07 PM GMT

India rejects U. S. criticism for inability to control human trafficking

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 236 words

DATELINE: NEW DELHI

India on Tuesday criticized the United States for putting it on a watch list of nations with a mixed record of tackling human trafficking, child labor and forced marriages.

India "rejects judgmental and prescriptive approach by a foreign government," the External Affairs Ministry said in a statement.

The 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report released by the U.S. State Department on Monday cites child and forced labor and forced marriages as abuses in India.

The U.S. State Department listed 32 countries, including allies such as Mexico, India and Kuwait, and important world powers including China and Russia, as being on a "watch list" of problem nations where the record of prevention and prosecution is mixed.

The Indian ministry statement said India and the United States have an ongoing dialogue on the trafficking in persons, and the annual report "certainly is not helpful to furthering our dialogue."

Rep. Christopher Smith, a Republican author of the 2000 law that established the annual trafficking reports, said in Washington that the Bush administration went too easy on India by placing it on the watch list instead of among the dozen worst offenders.

Smith cited India's "blatant unwillingness to address the massive problems of bonded labor and trafficking-related corruption," and said its ranking "reeks of political considerations within the State Department, overriding the facts about human trafficking."

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

402 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Worldstream

June 6, 2006 Tuesday 3:03 PM GMT

U.S. State Department report: Albania not doing enough to fight human trafficking

BYLINE: By LLAZAR SEMINI, Associated Press Writer

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 487 words

DATELINE: TIRANA Albania

The U.S. State Department issued a report criticizing Albania for not doing enough to fight human trafficking, and said the tiny Balkan country remained a source for prostitution and forced labor.

According to the 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report released on Monday, Albania is still classified as a Tier 2 country one which does not fully comply with minimum standards, but is making significant efforts to meet them.

"Albania is primarily a source country for women and children trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor," said the report made available by the U.S. Embassy in Tirana.

"The government of Albania does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so," it said.

The report lists three tiers. Tier 3 is for a country that neither complies with minimum standards nor is making significant efforts to do so. Tier 1 classifies countries as meeting the minimum standards for the elimination of severe forms of trafficking.

According to the report, those smuggled through Albania were sent to Greece and Italy, "with many of these victims trafficked onward to the United Kingdom, France, Belgium, Norway, Germany, and the Netherlands."

Internal trafficking within Albania and re-trafficking of Albanian victims to other countries remained a problem in 2005, and reports of Roma children trafficked for forced labor or begging continued, it added.

The report urged Tirana to strengthen protection and prevention programs, implement its witness protection program, encourage more victims to testify against their traffickers and make efforts to guarantee victims' safety.

"The government as a whole should assume a greater leadership role in the country's anti-trafficking efforts, actively implement its National Action Plan, and vigorously investigate and prosecute trafficking-related corruption at all levels of law enforcement," the report said.

Meanwhile, an opinion poll on corruption released Tuesday indicated that Albanians believe customs and tax officials, doctors, judges and parliamentarians to be the most corrupt professionals in the country. Courts were also perceived as not being transparent.

The poll was conducted in December 2005 and January 2006 by a local non-governmental organization, the Institute for Development Research and Alternatives, and funded by the U.S. Agency for International Development. It questioned about 1,200 people in 10 Albanian cities and had a 2.8 percent margin of error.

Political parties and trade unions had the lowest level of public trust. "This suggests that corruption corrodes the support for the political system," the survey said in an analysis of the results.

Albanian authorities have stepped up efforts to crack down on organized crime, trafficking and corruption in the impoverished ex-communist country, which aspires to join NATO and the European Union.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 Associated Press
All Rights Reserved

403 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 5, 2006 Monday

Malawi; United States Praises Malawi, Morocco for Anti-Trafficking Gains

BYLINE: United States Department of State

LENGTH: 553 words

Two African governments received praise for progress in fighting human trafficking and two countries were cited for doing enough in the State Department's 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report.

In its annual report to the U.S. Congress, released June 5, the State Department evaluated foreign governments' efforts to eliminate human trafficking. The report groups nations in one of four categories based on their efforts to control human trafficking, to prosecute those involved, and to support and assist victims of these crimes.

Governments that meet standards established in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 are placed in Tier 1. Tier 2 comprises countries that are demonstrating commitment to address their problems but have not yet achieved international standards. Tier 2 "Watch List" includes countries that show signs of falling backwards, while governments not making significant efforts to meet the standards are placed in Tier 3. (See related article.)

MALAWI, MOROCCO

Two Tier 1 countries, Malawi and Morocco, were praised for taking steps to prevent human trafficking in 2005.

Despite limited resources, Malawi made significant progress, particularly in the areas of prosecuting traffickers and educating the public to recognize human trafficking. Malawi, with support from international donors also produced and distributed 10,000 posters and 20,000 pamphlets to schools, welfare agencies, hospitals and youth clubs to educate the public about the issue.

Morocco fully complies with the minimum standards for eliminating trafficking, according to the report. Its international anti-trafficking cooperation "reflects the government's strong commitment to addressing the trafficking problem," the report said.

In February, Moroccan officials dismantled a large international network that was trafficking and smuggling migrants from India. Seventy suspects, including a police officer, were arrested.

SUDAN, ZIMBABWE MUST IMPROVE ANTI-TRAFFICKING EFFORTS

Sudan and Zimbabwe - both Tier 3 countries -- were cited for not doing enough to fight human trafficking.

Even though Sudan demonstrated initial progress on a number of fronts, "most of these efforts were not sustained," the report said. During the country's recently ended civil war, adults and children were forced to join armed groups.

To improve its anti-trafficking efforts, the Sudanese government should take steps to provide protective services to all types of trafficking victims and remove child soldiers from armed groups.

Zimbabwe showed "little political will" to address its trafficking problem during the past year, the report said. Zimbabwean children are trafficked internally for forced agricultural labor, domestic servitude and sexual exploitation. Trafficked women and girls are lured out of the country by false job or scholarship promises.

To further its anti-trafficking efforts, the report said, Zimbabwe should improve anti-trafficking legislation and launch a broad public awareness campaign.

Algeria, Central African Republic, Djibouti, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Kenya, Libya, Mauritania, South Africa, and Togo were among the countries listed on the reports Tier 2 "Watch List."

(The Washington File is a product of the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State. Web site: <http://usinfo.state.gov>)

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

Copyright 2006 AllAfrica, Inc.

404 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 5, 2006 Monday 9:31 PM GMT

Iran, Syria added to US blacklist of human traffickers

LENGTH: 723 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 5 2006

Iran and Syria were added to a US blacklist of countries trafficking in people, a State Department report said Monday, while raising concerns over an influx of sex workers to Germany for the World Cup soccer tournament.

Zimbabwe, Uzbekistan, Laos and Belize were also on the blacklist for the State Department's annual "Trafficking in Persons Report" which analyzed efforts in about 150 countries to combat trafficking for forced labor, prostitution, military service and other purposes.

The six countries join Venezuela, Saudi Arabia, North Korea, Sudan, Cuba and Myanmar among the "Tier 3" worst offenders of human trafficking who could face sanctions if they do not take immediate measures within 90 days.

"By calling to account any nation, friend or foe, that can and should do more to confront human trafficking, we are pressing countries into action," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in the presentation of the 290-page report.

"The harsh reality of human trafficking stuns even the hardest of hearts," she said.

The United States estimates that up to 800,000 people -- primarily women and children -- fall victims each year to trafficking, Rice said.

Iran and Syria, both of which have been accused by Washington of backing international terrorism, were cited in the report for being a "source, transit and destination country" for women and girls trafficked for sexual exploitation.

The United States is currently in the forefront of international efforts to slap UN Security Council sanctions on Iran if it does not suspend uranium enrichment activities, which could lead to the manufacture of nuclear bombs.

"Iran is downgraded to Tier 3 after persistent, credible reports of Iranian authorities punishing victims of trafficking with beatings, imprisonment and execution," the State Department said.

A key criteria of US law, which is used as a basis for the rankings, is protection of human trafficking victims.

"The law specifically says victims should not be punished for acts they commit after they've been trafficked, whether it's prostitution or anything else," said John Miller, a State Department advisor on efforts to stem the problem.

"We hope this situation will change in the next year," he said.

Last year, Syria was not rated at all while Iran was in "Tier 2," comprising countries which were making "significant" efforts to deal with the problem.

Nations deemed to be complying with US and international efforts to fight trafficking are placed in "Tier 1."

A notable relegation from Tier 1 to Tier 2 this year is Portugal, cited as a destination and transit country for women, men and children trafficked from Brazil, Eastern Europe and Africa.

Germany, where prostitution is legal, was criticized for reportedly allowing sex workers to be trafficked into the country to meet the demand from hundreds of thousands of soccer fans during the World Cup which runs from June 9 to July 9.

"Are we concerned about the World Cup? And the answer to that, in terms of trafficking, is yes," Miller said, adding that he had expressed his concern directly to the German envoy in Washington over reports of sex trafficking ahead of the World Cup.

"This has become a big issue in Europe with Swedish ministers, a French soccer coach, the Irish Women's Federation, all speaking out," he said, citing reports that thousands of women were transported to Germany for sex during the premier sports event.

Research and evidence available showed that "when you have large flows of women for sexual purposes, there is going to be trafficking (and) there is a link between prostitution and sex trafficking," he said.

Germany remained on Tier 1 in the US trafficking ranking, drawing criticism from some rights activists.

"It is unconscionable to give Germany Tier One status when it is blatantly encouraging sex trafficking," said Janice Shaw Crouse of Concerned Women for America (CWA), the largest US public policy womens group.

The United States itself came under scrutiny in the report, which cited abuses, "some of them considered widespread," committed by Pentagon contractors or subcontractors of third country workers in Iraq.

They include illegal confiscation of passports, deceptive hiring practices and substandard living conditions of largely low-skilled workers from Nepal, India, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Sri Lanka and the Philippines.

pp/kd

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

405 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

June 5, 2006 Monday 11:29 PM GMT

U.S. criticizes N. Korea, China in human trafficking report

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 359 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON June 5

The United States again harshly criticized North Korea and China for their continuing complacency in the face of human trafficking within and across their borders in an annual report released Monday.

In the State Department's sixth annual Trafficking in Persons Report, China remained on the Tier 2 Watch List, and North Korea made no headway out of its Tier 3 classification, a place reserved for countries with the worst human trafficking records.

"Defeating human trafficking is a great moral calling of our time," U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told reporters upon the release of the report, which covers about 150 countries.

In its second year as a Tier 2 country, Japan also received criticism for its ongoing trafficking of men, women and children for commercial sexual exploitation. But it did receive praise in the report for its "remarkable progress" in limiting so-called entertainer visas, which are often used to traffic foreign women into the Japanese sex industry.

This year's report criticized North Korea for reports that the government provided "forced or coerced" labor for Mongolia, Russia and the Czech Republic, and for not acknowledging that trafficking exists.

Criticism of China in the report also stemmed in part from the treatment of North Korean refugees who have crossed over into China.

North Koreans trafficked into China face sexual exploitation, forced labor, or repatriation into North Korea, where they are often imprisoned and tortured, according to the report.

A minimum of 10,000-20,000 people are trafficked within China each year, according to the report, 90 percent of whom are women and children.

While most trafficking in China is internal, some remains international. Women are trafficked from China to Japan, Taiwan, Thailand and Malaysia. And some are brought to China from Mongolia, Burma, North Korea, Russia and Vietnam, often for forced marriage, sexual slavery or forced labor, the report found.

The Tier 2 Watch List category, in which China finds itself, is considered very close to Tier 3 countries. Tier 3 countries make no attempt to deal with human trafficking and are subject to U.S. sanctions.

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

406 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 5, 2006 Monday

UNITED STATES PRAISES MALAWI, MOROCCO FOR ANTI-TRAFFICKING GAINS

BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 539 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. Department of State:

Two African governments received praise for progress in fighting human trafficking and two countries were cited for doing enough in the State Department's 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report.

In its annual report to the U.S. Congress, released June 5, the State Department evaluated foreign governments' efforts to eliminate human trafficking. The report groups nations in one of four categories based on their efforts to control human trafficking, to prosecute those involved, and to support and assist victims of these crimes.

Governments that meet standards established in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 are placed in Tier 1. Tier 2 comprises countries that are demonstrating commitment to address their problems but have not yet achieved international standards. Tier 2 Watch List includes countries that show signs of falling backwards, while governments not making significant efforts to meet the standards are placed in Tier 3. (See related article.)

MALAWI, MOROCCO

Two Tier 1 countries, Malawi and Morocco, were praised for taking steps to prevent human trafficking in 2005.

Despite limited resources, Malawi made significant progress, particularly in the areas of prosecuting traffickers and educating the public to recognize human trafficking. Malawi, with support from international donors also produced and distributed 10,000 posters and 20,000 pamphlets to schools, welfare agencies, hospitals and youth clubs to educate the public about the issue.

Morocco fully complies with the minimum standards for eliminating trafficking, according to the report. Its international anti-trafficking cooperation "reflects the government's strong commitment to addressing the trafficking problem," the report said.

In February, Moroccan officials dismantled a large international network that was trafficking and smuggling migrants from India. Seventy suspects, including a police officer, were arrested.

SUDAN, ZIMBABWE MUST IMPROVE ANTI-TRAFFICKING EFFORTS

Sudan and Zimbabwe both Tier 3 countries -- were cited for not doing enough to fight human trafficking.

Even though Sudan demonstrated initial progress on a number of fronts, "most of these efforts were not sustained," the report said. During the country's recently ended civil war, adults and children were forced to join armed groups.

To improve its anti-trafficking efforts, the Sudanese government should take steps to provide protective services to all types of trafficking victims and remove child soldiers from armed groups.

Zimbabwe showed "little political will" to address its trafficking problem during the past year, the report said. Zimbabwean children are trafficked internally for forced agricultural labor, domestic servitude and sexual exploitation. Trafficked women and girls are lured out of the country by false job or scholarship promises.

To further its anti-trafficking efforts, the report said, Zimbabwe should improve anti-trafficking legislation and launch a broad public awareness campaign.

Algeria, Central African Republic, Djibouti, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Kenya, Libya, Mauritania, South Africa, and Togo were among the countries listed on the reports Tier 2 "Watch List."

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 States News Service

407 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 5, 2006 Monday

U.S. SAYS BELIZE, CUBA, VENEZUELA NOT FIGHTING HUMAN TRAFFICKING

BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 1026 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the State Department:

The U.S. State Department has determined that three countries in the Americas -- Belize, Cuba, and Venezuela -- are not meeting minimum standards to fight trafficking in persons, a criminal practice which Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice says is "more than a human rights objective; it is a matter of global security."

In the department's 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report, released June 5, the three countries are placed on what is called a Tier 3 list, meaning that their governments are not fully complying with the minimum standards against trafficking in persons, and are not "making significant efforts to do so." The placement is based more on the extent of the government's action (or inaction) to combat trafficking, rather than the size of the problem, "important though that is," the report said.

The report assigns countries to one of four categories. Countries doing the best job are in Tier 1. Tier 2 comprises countries that are demonstrating commitment to address their problems but have not yet achieved international standards. Tier 2 Watch List includes countries that show signs of falling backwards. (See related article.)

BELIZE

Regarding Belize, the department's annual report said women and girls are trafficked to that country, mainly from Central America, and exploited in prostitution, while children are trafficked there for labor exploitation.

The country's largely unmonitored borders with Guatemala, Honduras and Mexico allow for the movement of illegal migrants who are vulnerable to traffickers, while girls are trafficked within Belize for sexual exploitation.

The report said Belize failed to "show evidence of significant law enforcement or victim protection efforts" in 2005, and that the country's laws against trafficking remained "weak and largely unenforced."

CUBA

In Cuba, the report said, women and children are trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced child labor, adding that the nature and extent of trafficking in the country is hard to gauge due to the closed nature of the Cuban government and a lack of nongovernmental reporting.

However, the report said, Cuba is a major destination for sex tourism, which largely caters to European, Canadian and Latin American tourists.

Cuba's "thriving sex trade," the report said, involves large numbers of minors. The report said there is "anecdotal evidence" that state-run hotel workers, employees of travel companies, taxicab drivers, bar and restaurant workers and law enforcement personnel are complicit in the commercial sexual exploitation of these children.

VENEZUELA

The report said women and children from Colombia, China, Peru, Ecuador, and the Dominican Republic are trafficked to and through Venezuela and subjected to commercial sexual exploitation or forced labor.

Venezuelans are trafficked internally and to Western Europe -- particularly Spain and the Netherlands -- and to other countries in Latin America and the Caribbean for commercial sexual exploitation. The report found that Venezuela is a transit country for illegal migrants from other countries in the region -- particularly Peru and Colombia -- and for Asian nationals.

The Venezuelan government has made some "clear improvements" in anti-trafficking activities, such as training officials and undertaking initiatives to raise public awareness against trafficking in persons, but the report found that these increased activities were not matched by progress in prosecutions of traffickers.

The Venezuelan government "should increase investigation and prosecution efforts against traffickers, continue educating the public, and provide victim assistance geared to the specific needs of trafficking victims," the report said.

HUMAN TRAFFICKING TIER 2 WATCH LIST

Several other countries in the Americas were placed on what the State Department calls its "Tier 2 Watch List." These are countries that the Department says should receive "special scrutiny." Countries listed in this group are Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Jamaica, Mexico and Peru.

Argentina was placed on the watch list "for its failure to show evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking" in 2005, particularly in the "key area of prosecutions." In addition, the Argentine government's efforts to improve inter-agency anti-trafficking coordination "did not achieve significant progress in moving cases against traffickers through the judicial system." However, the report said, Argentina did make progress in other areas including submitting anti-trafficking legislation to its Congress in August 2005 and "sensitizing provincial and municipal government officials to the trafficking problem."

Even though Bolivia moved up from its Tier 3 listing in the 2005 report, the country was placed on the Tier 2 watch list for its failure to show evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking in the areas of trafficking prosecutions and victim protection. Brazil was put on the watch list for its failure to show evidence of effective criminal penalties against traffickers who exploit forced labor.

After being placed in Tier 3 in 2005, Jamaica was put on the watch list in 2006 based on the Jamaican government's commitments to take "future steps" to fight trafficking in persons. However, the report said, very few investigations against human trafficking have led to prosecutions.

Mexico remains on the watch list for the third straight year "based on future commitments" of that country's government to undertake additional efforts in prosecution, protection, and prevention of human trafficking, the report said.

Peru is on the watch list for its "failure to show evidence of increasing efforts to eliminate trafficking over the previous year." The report said the Peruvian government should prosecute trafficking cases more promptly and increase protection for victims.

The full text of the 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report is available on the State Department Web site.

For additional information, see Human Trafficking.

(Distributed by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State. Web site: <http://usinfo.state.gov>)

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

408 of 445 DOCUMENTS

State Department Documents and Publications

June 5, 2006

U.S. Says Belize, Cuba, Venezuela Not Fighting Human Trafficking; Six other countries in Americas on special "watch list" in State Department report

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 1013 words

Washington -- The U.S. State Department has determined that three countries in the Americas -- Belize, Cuba, and Venezuela -- are not meeting minimum standards to fight trafficking in persons, a criminal practice which Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice says is "more than a human rights objective; it is a matter of global security."

In the department's 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report, released June 5, the three countries are placed on what is called a Tier 3 list, meaning that their governments are not fully complying with the minimum standards against trafficking in persons, and are not "making significant efforts to do so." The placement is based more on the extent of the government's action (or inaction) to combat trafficking, rather than the size of the problem, "important though that is," the report said.

The report assigns countries to one of four categories. Countries doing the best job are in Tier 1. Tier 2 comprises countries that are demonstrating commitment to address their problems but have not yet achieved international standards. Tier 2 "Watch List" includes countries that show signs of falling backwards. (See related article.)

BELIZE

Regarding Belize, the department's annual report said women and girls are trafficked to that country, mainly from Central America, and exploited in prostitution, while children are trafficked there for labor exploitation.

The country's largely unmonitored borders with Guatemala, Honduras and Mexico allow for the movement of illegal migrants who are vulnerable to traffickers, while girls are trafficked within Belize for sexual exploitation.

The report said Belize failed to "show evidence of significant law enforcement or victim protection efforts" in 2005, and that the country's laws against trafficking remained "weak and largely unenforced."

CUBA

In Cuba, the report said, women and children are trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced child labor, adding that the nature and extent of trafficking in the country is hard to gauge due to the closed nature of the Cuban government and a lack of nongovernmental reporting.

However, the report said, Cuba is a major destination for sex tourism, which largely caters to European, Canadian and Latin American tourists.

Cuba's "thriving sex trade," the report said, involves large numbers of minors. The report said there is "anecdotal evidence" that state-run hotel workers, employees of travel companies, taxicab drivers, bar and restaurant workers and law enforcement personnel are complicit in the commercial sexual exploitation of these children.

VENEZUELA

The report said women and children from Colombia, China, Peru, Ecuador, and the Dominican Republic are trafficked to and through Venezuela and subjected to commercial sexual exploitation or forced labor.

Venezuelans are trafficked internally and to Western Europe -- particularly Spain and the Netherlands -- and to other countries in Latin America and the Caribbean for commercial sexual exploitation. The report found that Venezuela is a transit country for illegal migrants from other countries in the region -- particularly Peru and Colombia -- and for Asian nationals.

The Venezuelan government has made some "clear improvements" in anti-trafficking activities, such as training officials and undertaking initiatives to raise public awareness against trafficking in persons, but the report found that these increased activities were not matched by progress in prosecutions of traffickers.

The Venezuelan government "should increase investigation and prosecution efforts against traffickers, continue educating the public, and provide victim assistance geared to the specific needs of trafficking victims," the report said.

HUMAN TRAFFICKING "TIER 2 WATCH LIST"

Several other countries in the Americas were placed on what the State Department calls its "Tier 2 Watch List." These are countries that the Department says should receive "special scrutiny." Countries listed in this group are Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Jamaica, Mexico and Peru.

Argentina was placed on the watch list "for its failure to show evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking" in 2005, particularly in the "key area of prosecutions." In addition, the Argentine government's efforts to improve inter-agency anti-trafficking coordination "did not achieve significant progress in moving cases against traffickers through the judicial system." However, the report said, Argentina did make progress in other areas including submitting anti-trafficking legislation to its Congress in August 2005 and "sensitizing provincial and municipal government officials to the trafficking problem."

Even though Bolivia moved up from its Tier 3 listing in the 2005 report, the country was placed on the Tier 2 watch list for its failure to show evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking in the areas of trafficking prosecutions and victim protection. Brazil was put on the watch list for its failure to show evidence of effective criminal penalties against traffickers who exploit forced labor.

After being placed in Tier 3 in 2005, Jamaica was put on the watch list in 2006 based on the Jamaican government's commitments to take "future steps" to fight trafficking in persons. However, the report said, very few investigations against human trafficking have led to prosecutions.

Mexico remains on the watch list for the third straight year "based on future commitments" of that country's government to undertake additional efforts in prosecution, protection, and prevention of human trafficking, the report said.

Peru is on the watch list for its "failure to show evidence of increasing efforts to eliminate trafficking over the previous year." The report said the Peruvian government should prosecute trafficking cases more promptly and increase protection for victims.

The full text of the 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report is available on the State Department Web site.

For additional information, see Human Trafficking.

(Distributed by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

409 of 445 DOCUMENTS

State Department Documents and Publications

June 5, 2006

United States Praises Malawi, Morocco for Anti-Trafficking Gains; State Department cites two African nations for doing enough to fight trafficking

BYLINE: Michelle Austein, Washington File Staff Writer

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 571 words

Washington ' Two African governments received praise for progress in fighting human trafficking and two countries were cited for doing enough in the State Department's 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report.

In its annual report to the U.S. Congress, released June 5, the State Department evaluated foreign governments' efforts to eliminate human trafficking. The report groups nations in one of four categories based on their efforts to control human trafficking, to prosecute those involved, and to support and assist victims of these crimes.

Governments that meet standards established in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 are placed in Tier 1. Tier 2 comprises countries that are demonstrating commitment to address their problems but have not yet achieved international standards. Tier 2 "Watch List" includes countries that show signs of falling backwards, while governments not making significant efforts to meet the standards are placed in Tier 3. (See related article.)

MALAWI, MOROCCO

Two Tier 1 countries, Malawi and Morocco, were praised for taking steps to prevent human trafficking in 2005.

Despite limited resources, Malawi made significant progress, particularly in the areas of prosecuting traffickers and educating the public to recognize human trafficking. Malawi, with support from international donors also produced and distributed 10,000 posters and 20,000 pamphlets to schools, welfare agencies, hospitals and youth clubs to educate the public about the issue.

Morocco fully complies with the minimum standards for eliminating trafficking, according to the report. Its international anti-trafficking cooperation "reflects the government's strong commitment to addressing the trafficking problem," the report said.

In February, Moroccan officials dismantled a large international network that was trafficking and smuggling migrants from India. Seventy suspects, including a police officer, were arrested.

SUDAN, ZIMBABWE MUST IMPROVE ANTI-TRAFFICKING EFFORTS

Sudan and Zimbabwe ' both Tier 3 countries -- were cited for not doing enough to fight human trafficking.

Even though Sudan demonstrated initial progress on a number of fronts, "most of these efforts were not sustained," the report said. During the country's recently ended civil war, adults and children were forced to join armed groups.

To improve its anti-trafficking efforts, the Sudanese government should take steps to provide protective services to all types of trafficking victims and remove child soldiers from armed groups.

Zimbabwe showed "little political will" to address its trafficking problem during the past year, the report said. Zimbabwean children are trafficked internally for forced agricultural labor, domestic servitude and sexual exploitation. Trafficked women and girls are lured out of the country by false job or scholarship promises.

To further its anti-trafficking efforts, the report said, Zimbabwe should improve anti-trafficking legislation and launch a broad public awareness campaign.

Algeria, Central African Republic, Djibouti, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Kenya, Libya, Mauritania, South Africa, and Togo were among the countries listed on the reports Tier 2 "Watch List."

The full text of the report is available on the State Department Web site.

For more information on U.S. policy, see Human Trafficking.

(The Washington File is a product of the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

410 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 5, 2006 Monday 11:45 PM EST

U.S. RELEASES 2006 ANNUAL TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 1132 words

DATELINE: TIRANA, Albania

The U.S. Embassy issued the following press release:

Today, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice released the 2006 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report, as mandated by the U.S. Congress and the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) of 2000.

The goal of the TIP Report is to stimulate action and create partnerships around the world in the fight against modern-day slavery. Countries determined to have a significant number of trafficking victims are evaluated in the report and are assigned to one of three tiers. This year 158 nations from around the world were evaluated.

Albania maintained a Tier 2 placement in the 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report, having moved up from Tier 3 to Tier 2 in the 2002.

Countries assessed as meeting the "minimum standards for the elimination of severe forms of trafficking" set forth in the law are classified as "Tier 1."

Countries assessed as not fully complying with the minimum standards, but making significant efforts to meet those minimum standards, are classified as "Tier 2."

Countries assessed as neither complying with the minimum standards nor making significant efforts to do so are classified as "Tier 3."

Countries classified as "Tier 2 Watch List" are at risk of slipping to Tier 3 unless serious concerns are addressed.

The entire TIP Report is available at www.state.gov/g/tip. Below is a copy of this year's report on Albania. This is also available in both English and Albanian on the Embassy website at www.usemb-tirana.rpo.at/

2006 Trafficking in Persons Report

Albania (Tier 2)

Albania is primarily a source country for women and children trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor. Victims are trafficked to Greece and Italy, with many of these victims trafficked onward to the United Kingdom, France, Belgium, Norway, Germany, and the Netherlands. Internal trafficking within Albania and re-trafficking of Albanian victims to other countries remained a problem in 2005. Reports of Roma and Egyptian children trafficked for forced labor or begging continued.

The Government of Albania does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. The government continued to produce successful prosecutions and convictions of traffickers, appointed a new full-time national anti-trafficking coordinator with staff, began to implement its witness protection law for trafficking victims, and signed a bilateral anti-child trafficking agreement with Greece. While the government demonstrated strong law enforcement efforts, overall implementation of the government's protection and prevention programs remained weak. The government should fully implement its witness, protection program, encourage a greater number of victims to testify against their traffickers and make efforts to guarantee victims' safety. Comprehensive reintegration and rehabilitation services are critical to prevent the re-trafficking of Albanian citizens. The government as a whole should assume a greater leadership role in the country's anti-trafficking efforts, actively implement its National Action Plan, and vigorously investigate and prosecute trafficking-related corruption at all levels of law enforcement.

Prosecution

In 2005, the Government of Albania actively continued to investigate and prosecute trafficking; it investigated 49 cases, prosecuted 51 traffickers, and convicted 54 traffickers. Albanian courts sentenced more than half of the convicted traffickers to five to 10 years, with some sentences over 10 years - significant penalties for the region. In February 2005, the government established a specialized asset forfeiture unit and thus far has obtained final judgments of forfeiture for two trafficking cases, with additional cases pending. The government failed to conduct its own specialized anti-trafficking training for police, prosecutors, judges, and other relevant law enforcement officials in 2005, but continued to cooperate closely with NGOs and international organizations on border control and various trainings. Reports of trafficking-related corruption in Albania involving government and police officials continued. The government increased its investigations of police officers for involvement in illegal border crossings, but did not find any government officials complicit in trafficking.

Protection

The government sustained its modest efforts to protect and reintegrate trafficking victims during 2005. NGOs and international organizations administered and funded the majority of services for victims; however, the government provided some facilities and personnel. In 2006, the government began using in one case a witness protection program for trafficking victims. While the government approved a national victim referral mechanism in 2005, it did not employ it during the reporting period. In 2005, Albanian police continued to informally refer victims to shelters and re-integration assistance. Police identified and referred 28 victims identified in Albania and referred 214 victims either repatriated or deported back to Albania to the Vatra Center, a leading NGO in Albania providing shelter and services to victims. The Vatra Center reported assisting 238 victims in 2005, more than half of which had been trafficked at least on one other occasion. In addition, another reintegration shelter, Different and Equal, reported assisting 23 women and girls in 2005. The government-run National Victim Referral Center temporarily housed 32 victims in 2005; many were transferred to other shelters for reintegration. In February 2006, the government signed a bilateral agreement with Greece to address child trafficking, which should assist with the return of child trafficking victims to Albania from Greece.

Prevention

The government made some progress in anti-trafficking prevention during the reporting period. In 2005, the government appointed a new, full-time, national coordinator with a dedicated staff of five. It publicly endorsed the previous government's National Action Plan for 2005-2007, though it failed to implement most of the Plan's objectives, including implementing a referral mechanism, improving witness protection, vocational training and other key reintegration efforts, specialized law enforcement training, and a targeted awareness campaign. The government took steps to increase the level of coordination with NGOs and international organizations, but relied primarily on these groups for anti-trafficking prevention and outreach to vulnerable populations and potential victims. The Ministry of Education continued to implement with IOM a project targeting 36 schools in at-risk regions, and in 2005 expanded the project to another 10 schools.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

411 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 5, 2006 Monday 10:50 PM EST

REP. SMITH ISSUES STATEMENT REGARDING STATE DEPARTMENT'S 2006 TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 566 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J. (4th CD), issued the following statement:

Rep. Chris Smith (R-Hamilton), the author of the historic Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 and two subsequent anti-trafficking expansion laws (2003, 2005), released the following statement regarding the State Department's 2006 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report. The annual TIP report, a comprehensive assessment of global status of anti-trafficking measures, was mandated by Smith's first trafficking bill, signed in October 2000 (Public Law 106-386).

"The State Department's 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report shows that the global community is responding to US pressure as other countries do more to combat trafficking and protect women.

With 4,700 convictions worldwide this year alone, the heinous crime of trafficking in women and children is finally at long last being punished. In the last two years alone, convictions have topped 7,700.

Because a significant portion of US foreign assistance is now contingent on whether a nation is meeting basic minimum standards to prevent trafficking, protect women and prosecute traffickers, 41 countries in the last year have passed tough new laws to end this modern day slavery.

Victim support is another critical component of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act and the report outlines numerous activities in which victims-mostly women and children-are being better identified and receiving shelter, counseling, medical care and training.

The Trafficking Victims Protection Act is working as intended-but more needs to be done.

Regrettably, the State Department again failed to include India on its list of Tier 3 countries. India's placement on the Tier 2 Watch List for the third consecutive year, despite its failure to create a national law enforcement response to the crime of trafficking, and its blatant unwillingness to address the massive problems of bonded labor and trafficking-related corruption, reeks of political considerations within the State Department overriding the facts about human trafficking. The watch list was created by my legislation to send a clear warning and enable egregious offenders to make specific reforms. It's not a place to hide our friends who fail to make real improvements.

Likewise, I am not pleased that Germany received a Tier 1 rating this year. This report is being released on the eve of the World Cup soccer matches, when potentially thousands of women and children will be trafficked and exploited in Germany's legal sex industry for the benefit of fans attending the games. Because Germany has legalized prostitution, cities hosting World Cup games and 'business people' are free to accommodate this trade in women by constructing brothels and 'sex huts,' or issue permits for street prostitution, thereby creating a virtual partnership with brothel owners, pimps and traffickers.

Legalized prostitution is not a policy that the German Government has to embrace. I believe Germany can do much more to prevent the sexual exploitation of women and children by attacking the demand that fuels this problem.

Over the next several days we will pour through this report and I have already scheduled a hearing in my subcommittee for June 14th. The report has proven to be an effective means for spotlighting the problems and pressuring offending countries to make reforms."

Contact: Ryan Goodwin, 202/225-3765.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

412 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 5, 2006 Monday 10:35 PM EST

STATE DEPT.: U.S. PRAISES MALAWI, MOROCCO FOR ANTI-TRAFFICKING GAINS

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 615 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's International Information Programs issued the following press release:

By Michelle Austein

Washington File Staff Writer

Two African governments received praise for progress in fighting human trafficking and two countries were cited for doing enough in the State Department's 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report.

In its annual report to the U.S. Congress, released June 5, the State Department evaluated foreign governments' efforts to eliminate human trafficking. The report groups nations in one of four categories based on their efforts to control human trafficking, to prosecute those involved, and to support and assist victims of these crimes.

Governments that meet standards established in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 are placed in Tier 1. Tier 2 comprises countries that are demonstrating commitment to address their problems but have not yet achieved international standards. Tier 2 "Watch List" includes countries that show signs of falling backwards, while governments not making significant efforts to meet the standards are placed in Tier 3. (See related article: <http://usinfo.state.gov/xarchives/display.html?p=washfile-english&y=2006&m=June&x=20060605164421cmretrop0.2916681&t=livefeeds/wf-latest.html>.)

MALAWI, MOROCCO

Two Tier 1 countries, Malawi and Morocco, were praised for taking steps to prevent human trafficking in 2005.

Despite limited resources, Malawi made significant progress, particularly in the areas of prosecuting traffickers and educating the public to recognize human trafficking. Malawi, with support from international donors also produced and distributed 10,000 posters and 20,000 pamphlets to schools, welfare agencies, hospitals and youth clubs to educate the public about the issue.

Morocco fully complies with the minimum standards for eliminating trafficking, according to the report. Its international anti-trafficking cooperation "reflects the government's strong commitment to addressing the trafficking problem," the report said.

In February, Moroccan officials dismantled a large international network that was trafficking and smuggling migrants from India. Seventy suspects, including a police officer, were arrested.

SUDAN, ZIMBABWE MUST IMPROVE ANTI-TRAFFICKING EFFORTS

Sudan and Zimbabwe - both Tier 3 countries - were cited for not doing enough to fight human trafficking.

Even though Sudan demonstrated initial progress on a number of fronts, "most of these efforts were not sustained," the report said. During the country's recently ended civil war, adults and children were forced to join armed groups.

To improve its anti-trafficking efforts, the Sudanese government should take steps to provide protective services to all types of trafficking victims and remove child soldiers from armed groups.

Zimbabwe showed "little political will" to address its trafficking problem during the past year, the report said. Zimbabwean children are trafficked internally for forced agricultural labor, domestic servitude and sexual exploitation. Trafficked women and girls are lured out of the country by false job or scholarship promises.

To further its anti-trafficking efforts, the report said, Zimbabwe should improve anti-trafficking legislation and launch a broad public awareness campaign.

Algeria, Central African Republic, Djibouti, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Kenya, Libya, Mauritania, South Africa, and Togo were among the countries listed on the reports Tier 2 "Watch List."

The full text of the report is available on the State Department Web site.

For more information on U.S. policy, see Human Trafficking:
http://usinfo.state.gov/gi/global_issues/human_trafficking.html.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

413 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 5, 2006 Monday 10:33 PM EST

STATE DEPT.: U.S. SAYS BELIZE, CUBA, VENEZUELA NOT FIGHTING HUMAN TRAFFICKING

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 1054 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's International Information Programs issued the following press release:

The U.S. State Department has determined that three countries in the Americas - Belize, Cuba, and Venezuela - are not meeting minimum standards to fight trafficking in persons, a criminal practice which Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice says is "more than a human rights objective; it is a matter of global security."

In the department's 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report, released June 5, the three countries are placed on what is called a Tier 3 list, meaning that their governments are not fully complying with the minimum standards against trafficking in persons, and are not "making significant efforts to do so." The placement is based more on the extent of the government's action (or inaction) to combat trafficking, rather than the size of the problem, "important though that is," the report said.

The report assigns countries to one of four categories. Countries doing the best job are in Tier 1. Tier 2 comprises countries that are demonstrating commitment to address their problems but have not yet achieved international standards. Tier 2 "Watch List" includes countries that show signs of falling backwards. (See related article: <http://usinfo.state.gov/xarchives/display.html?p=washfile-english&y=2006&m=June&x=20060605164421cmretrop0.2916681&t=livefeeds/wf-latest.html>.)

BELIZE

Regarding Belize, the department's annual report said women and girls are trafficked to that country, mainly from Central America, and exploited in prostitution, while children are trafficked there for labor exploitation.

The country's largely unmonitored borders with Guatemala, Honduras and Mexico allow for the movement of illegal migrants who are vulnerable to traffickers, while girls are trafficked within Belize for sexual exploitation.

The report said Belize failed to "show evidence of significant law enforcement or victim protection efforts" in 2005, and that the country's laws against trafficking remained "weak and largely unenforced."

CUBA

In Cuba, the report said, women and children are trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced child labor, adding that the nature and extent of trafficking in the country is hard to gauge due to the closed nature of the Cuban government and a lack of nongovernmental reporting.

However, the report said, Cuba is a major destination for sex tourism, which largely caters to European, Canadian and Latin American tourists.

Cuba's "thriving sex trade," the report said, involves large numbers of minors. The report said there is "anecdotal evidence" that state-run hotel workers, employees of travel companies, taxicab drivers, bar and restaurant workers and law enforcement personnel are complicit in the commercial sexual exploitation of these children.

VENEZUELA

The report said women and children from Colombia, China, Peru, Ecuador, and the Dominican Republic are trafficked to and through Venezuela and subjected to commercial sexual exploitation or forced labor.

Venezuelans are trafficked internally and to Western Europe - particularly Spain and the Netherlands - and to other countries in Latin America and the Caribbean for commercial sexual exploitation. The report found that Venezuela is a transit country for illegal migrants from other countries in the region - particularly Peru and Colombia - and for Asian nationals.

The Venezuelan government has made some "clear improvements" in anti-trafficking activities, such as training officials and undertaking initiatives to raise public awareness against trafficking in persons, but the report found that these increased activities were not matched by progress in prosecutions of traffickers.

The Venezuelan government "should increase investigation and prosecution efforts against traffickers, continue educating the public, and provide victim assistance geared to the specific needs of trafficking victims," the report said.

HUMAN TRAFFICKING "TIER 2 WATCH LIST"

Several other countries in the Americas were placed on what the State Department calls its "Tier 2 Watch List." These are countries that the Department says should receive "special scrutiny." Countries listed in this group are Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Jamaica, Mexico and Peru.

Argentina was placed on the watch list "for its failure to show evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking" in 2005, particularly in the "key area of prosecutions." In addition, the Argentine government's efforts to improve inter-agency anti-trafficking coordination "did not achieve significant progress in moving cases against traffickers through the judicial system." However, the report said, Argentina did make progress in other areas including submitting anti-trafficking legislation to its Congress in August 2005 and "sensitizing provincial and municipal government officials to the trafficking problem."

Even though Bolivia moved up from its Tier 3 listing in the 2005 report, the country was placed on the Tier 2 watch list for its failure to show evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking in the areas of trafficking prosecutions and victim protection. Brazil was put on the watch list for its failure to show evidence of effective criminal penalties against traffickers who exploit forced labor.

After being placed in Tier 3 in 2005, Jamaica was put on the watch list in 2006 based on the Jamaican government's commitments to take "future steps" to fight trafficking in persons. However, the report said, very few investigations against human trafficking have led to prosecutions.

Mexico remains on the watch list for the third straight year "based on future commitments" of that country's government to undertake additional efforts in prosecution, protection, and prevention of human trafficking, the report said.

Peru is on the watch list for its "failure to show evidence of increasing efforts to eliminate trafficking over the previous year." The report said the Peruvian government should prosecute trafficking cases more promptly and increase protection for victims.

The full text of the 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report is available on the State Department Web site.

For additional information, see Human Trafficking: http://usinfo.state.gov/gi/global_issues/human_trafficking.html.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

414 of 445 DOCUMENTS

June 5, 2006 Monday 3:06 PM EST

2006 Trafficking Report Shows Countries Responding with New Laws; U.S. Rep. Smith Schedules Hearing for June 14

SECTION: NATIONAL DESK

LENGTH: 565 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 5

U.S. Rep. Chris Smith (R- Hamilton), the author of the historic Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 and two subsequent anti-trafficking expansion laws (2003, 2005), released the following statement regarding the State Department's 2006 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report. The annual TIP report, a comprehensive assessment of global status of anti- trafficking measures, was mandated by Smith's first trafficking bill, signed in October 2000 (Public Law 106-386).

"The State Department's 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report shows that the global community is responding to US pressure as other countries do more to combat trafficking and protect women.

"With 4,700 convictions worldwide this year alone, the heinous crime of trafficking in women and children is finally at long last being punished. In the last two years alone, convictions have topped 7,700.

"Because a significant portion of US foreign assistance is now contingent on whether a nation is meeting basic minimum standards to prevent trafficking, protect women and prosecute traffickers, 41 countries in the last year have passed tough new laws to end this modern day slavery.

"Victim support is another critical component of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act and the report outlines numerous activities in which victims -- mostly women and children -- are being better identified and receiving shelter, counseling, medical care and training.

"The Trafficking Victims Protection Act is working as intended -- but more needs to be done.

"Regrettably, the State Department again failed to include India on its list of Tier 3 countries. India's placement on the Tier 2 Watch List for the third consecutive year, despite its failure to create a national law enforcement response to the crime of trafficking, and its blatant unwillingness to address the massive problems of bonded labor and trafficking-related corruption, reeks of political considerations within the State Department overriding the facts about human trafficking. The watch list was created by my legislation to send a clear warning and enable egregious offenders to make specific reforms. It's not a place to hide our friends who fail to make real improvements.

"Likewise, I am not pleased that Germany received a Tier 1 rating this year. This report is being released on the eve of the World Cup soccer matches, when potentially thousands of women and children will be trafficked and exploited in Germany's legal sex industry for the benefit of fans attending the games. Because Germany has legalized prostitution, cities hosting World Cup games and 'business people' are free to accommodate this trade in women by constructing brothels and 'sex huts,' or issue permits for street prostitution, thereby creating a virtual partnership with brothel owners, pimps and traffickers.

"Legalized prostitution is not a policy that the German Government has to embrace. I believe Germany can do much more to prevent the sexual exploitation of women and children by attacking the demand that fuels this problem.

"Over the next several days we will pour through this report and I have already scheduled a hearing in my subcommittee for June 14th. The report has proven to be an effective means for spotlighting the problems and pressuring offending countries to make reforms."

<http://www.usnewswire.com/>

Contact: Ryan Goodwin of the Office of U.S. Rep. Chris Smith, 202-225-3765

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 PR Newswire Association LLC
All Rights Reserved

415 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 5, 2006 Monday 9:07 AM EST

GREECE ADVANCES TO 'TIER TWO' RANKING IN STATE DEPARTMENT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORTBYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 318 wordsDATELINE: ATHENS, Greece

The U.S. Embassy issued the following press release:

Greece has been elevated to Tier 2 status from its ranking last year of Tier 2 Watch List in the annual Trafficking in Persons Report released today by the U.S. Secretary of State in Washington, DC. This new designation means that the Government of Greece is making significant efforts to comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking in persons.

Ambassador Charles Ries noted, "I was pleased to be able to inform the Foreign Minister today that Greece has been elevated to Tier Two on the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report. This is a reflection of Greece's efforts over the past year to address this serious problem. There is more work to be done, however, especially to protect victims and to prosecute traffickers."

According to the report, Greece has increased its capacity to protect and assist victims, has continued to investigate trafficking cases, and has expanded its cooperation with neighboring countries, among other improvements. The Government should now ensure that all the available protections are provided to trafficking victims, that non-governmental organizations are integrated even more closely into the victim identification and protection process, and that traffickers are convicted and actually serve time in prison.

The Department of State is required by law to submit a report each year to the U.S. Congress on foreign governments' efforts to eliminate trafficking in persons. This report is intended to raise global awareness and spur foreign governments to take effective actions to counter all forms of trafficking in persons, including sex trafficking, involuntary servitude, child trafficking, debt bondage and other forms of trafficking in persons.

Secretary Rice's remarks on the release of the report, as well as the text of the report, are available at <http://www.state.gov>.

LOAD-DATE: July 25, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

416 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 5, 2006 Monday 4:32 AM EST

REP. MALONEY SAYS STATE DEPT. REPORT ON HUMAN TRAFFICKING REVEALS NEED FOR FURTHER ACTION

BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 562 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney, D-N.Y. (14th CD), issued the following press release:

Following the release today by the U.S. State Department of its 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report (report), Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney (D-NY) expressed concern about the mixed results in the battle against human trafficking. Despite some encouraging steps forward on this issue, broad progress has been slow in some of the world largest countries.

On the positive side, the report shows a more than 50% increase in the number of convictions for human trafficking - from 3000 in the 2005 to 4700 in this year's report. Additionally, 41 additional countries have implemented some form of anti-trafficking policies.

The report rates countries on a three tier scale, with those in the bottom tier becoming subject to sanctions. Some success stories include Ecuador, where the First Lady has adopted trafficking as her own personal cause, and Malawi, the first sub-saharan African country to receive the highest ranking.

However Maloney is highly concerned that Russia, Mexico and India for the third year in a row remain on the Tier 2 watchlist, meaning that they are in danger of sinking to the level at which sanctions would be imposed.

"This report is an important yardstick of the progress we are making in combatting one of the world's most terrible and persistent crimes: the trafficking of human beings," said Congresswoman Maloney. "While some countries have clearly made progress, it's clear that some nations that are the most serious contributors to human trafficking are not taking the necessary steps to combat it.

"This report should serve as a wake up call that more needs to be done. The countries who have lingered on the Tier 2 watchlist year after year should be told to take serious steps to put an end to this business the way Ecuador and Malawi have done or otherwise face real penalties."

Ambassador at Large John Miller, director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, noted that, "While many governments have made progress, it is disappointing that several major countries remain on the Tier 2 watch list. For the third consecutive year these countries such as India, Mexico and Russia have shown no signs of progress in their anti-trafficking commitments."

Along with Representative Deborah Pryce, Congresswoman Maloney helped author the End Demand for Sex Trafficking Act, which targets the demand side of trafficking, and was incorporated into the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2005.

Background

Under the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000, the State Department is required to produce an annual report that reviews recent trends in human trafficking and places countries on a four tier scale based on their commitment to anti-trafficking policies.

The State Department estimates that between 600,000 to 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders each year, and an additional 2 to 4 million people are trafficked within their own borders. Most of the victims are women and children. Each year an estimated 14,500 people enter the United States through trafficking rings. Experts say human trafficking is a $10 billion dollar worldwide industry and sex trafficking is the third largest and fastest growing crime ring in history.

Contact: Afshin Mohamadi, 202/225-7944.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

417 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Worldstream

June 5, 2006 Monday 9:55 PM GMTSeveral Southeast Asian countries improve on U.S. people-trafficking rankings*SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 180 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The Philippines, Singapore and Cambodia moved up on a U.S. ranking of efforts to fight modern-day sex and labor slavery.

The State Department's annual "Trafficking in Persons" report, released Monday, uses a "tier" system to evaluate countries' performances, from those found to be complying fully with international standards to those that are seen as failing to comply.

Singapore moved up to the highest tier as the report praised its efforts to deal with abuses of foreign domestic workers and to combat the buying and selling of people for forced sex.

Cambodia also was said to have improved, moving up one slot from the lowest tier. While the report said the government had not complied fully with minimum standards to fight trafficking, the United States found that Cambodian officials were committed to continue recent progress.

"During the last year, the Cambodian government stepped up efforts to arrest, prosecute and convict traffickers," the report said.

The Philippines was also said to have made "discernible progress in its anti-trafficking law enforcement efforts in 2005."

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 Associated Press
All Rights Reserved

418 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Jiji Press Ticker Service

May 16, 2006 Tuesday 2:46 AM JST

Japan, Thailand to Combat Human Trafficking

LENGTH: 156 wordsDATELINE: Bangkok, May 15

Japan and Thailand set up a task force Monday to eradicate human trafficking, the first initiative of its kind for Japan.

At a meeting in Bangkok the same day, members of a Japanese government mission and Thai government officials agreed to share information on individual cases of human trafficking and step up education for Thai women in order to prevent them from being involved in such incidents.

The Japanese mission consisted of seven officials from government agencies including the Foreign Ministry and the National Policy Agency.

From Thursday, Japan will hold similar talks with Indonesia.

Japanese police made arrests in 319 cases of human trafficking between 2001 and 2005. Thai women topped the list of victims, accounting for 169.

The United States criticized Japan for lack of sufficient efforts to prevent human trafficking in the country and placed it on a special watch list of countries in its 2004 report on human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: May 15, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

419 of 445 DOCUMENTS

BusinessWorld

May 15, 2006 Monday

Filipinos may be using 'spouse' visas to work in Japan - POEA

BYLINE: Rommer M. Balaba

SECTION: Pg. S1/10

LENGTH: 323 words

Filipino entertainers who want to work in Japan may be circumventing tighter rules for migrant workers by obtaining "spouse" visas, the top official of the Philippine Overseas Employment Administration (POEA) said.

"One of our concerns [with the decline in deployment to Japan] is the increase in spouse visa," said Rosalinda D. Baldoz, the agency's administrator.

"We would like to find out whether it is connected with the decline in entertainers visa," she added during an interview on the sidelines of a labor and employment conference on Friday.

Without citing numbers, Ms. Baldoz said there is an "alarming" rise in the issuance of Japan's spouse visas to Filipino women.

She said Japan's so-called international marriages, where one of the spouses is a non-Japanese citizen, have been rising in the aftermath of the stricter visa policy. Japan carried out the visa reforms after being placed by the United States on a watch list for human trafficking.

"We want to get some feedback from the [labor] posts [in Japan] regarding this. The attaches have said they will give us the numbers... but it is the connection we need to know, concrete evidence that links the decline [in entertainers visa] with the increase in [spouse visa]," she added.

The deployment of Filipino performing artists to Japan went down by as much as 50% to 35,000 last year because of the stricter visa rules and is expected to be cut further by half this year.

Ms. Baldoz noted that there is nothing wrong if these international marriages were genuine, but some Filipinos, especially female entertainers, may be using such scheme to circumvent Japan's new immigration rules.

A spouse visa is valid for either a one- or three-year period, which can be extended. It remains valid even after a divorce until it expires.

"The spouse visa however can be subject to abuse... in the same way the Filipinas involved can be abused by forcing them to do other jobs," Ms. Baldoz said.

LOAD-DATE: May 14, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

420 of 445 DOCUMENTS

BusinessWorld

May 10, 2006 Wednesday

RP to receive $1.9-M grant from Japanese gov't, UNBYLINE: Bernardette S. Sto. DomingoSECTION: Pg. S1/11LENGTH: 400 words

The Philippines stands to benefit from a $1.9-million assistance (P101 million) from the Japanese government and the United Nations (UN) aimed at helping human trafficking victims reintegrate into society through counseling, job trainings and legal support.

The amount was channeled to the Trust Fund for Human Security for the economic and social empowerment of returned victims of trafficking project that will be implemented by the International Labor Organization.

Thailand, which also faces serious human trafficking problems, will also benefit from the project.

"Victims confront difficulties upon their repatriation such as reprisals from traffickers and threats of re-trafficking. This project aims to facilitate social reintegration of victims who returned to their countries of origin," the Japanese embassy in Manila said in a statement.

"This project is expected to restore the dignity of victims of human trafficking in the Philippines and Thailand as well as to improve their livelihoods," it added.

Citing lack of conviction of traffickers and the need for continued improvement in protection, prosecution, and prevention, the US has placed the Philippines in Tier 2 of its watch list of countries violating anti- human trafficking laws under the Trafficking in Persons Report.

Tier 2 countries do not meet the standards fully, but are working to improve compliance to laws. Relegation to Tier 3, however, will mean possible restrictions in US foreign assistance.

The US has attributed the increasing number of "significant trafficking activity" in the Philippines to "endemic poverty, high unemployment rate, a cultural propensity towards migration, a weak rule-of- law environment, and sex tourism."

The project will delve on providing immediate and continuous legal assistance, psychological counseling and medical services to returned trafficked victims; conducting reintegration assistance programs for victims who returned to their country of origin; empowering victims to make them self-sustaining through education, job placement, and small-scale savings and credit schemes; and giving opportunities to meet other victims and setting up self-help groups.

The Trust Fund for Human Security, established in the UN Secretariat in March 1999, has supported projects from more than 140 UN agencies, addressing threats to human life, livelihood and dignity, from the perspective of human security.

LOAD-DATE: May 9, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

421 of 445 DOCUMENTS

BusinessWorld

May 10, 2006 Wednesday

RP to receive $1.9-M grant from Japanese gov't, UNBYLINE: Bernardette S. Sto. DomingoSECTION: Pg. S1/11LENGTH: 400 words

The Philippines stands to benefit from a $1.9-million assistance (P101 million) from the Japanese government and the United Nations (UN) aimed at helping human trafficking victims reintegrate into society through counseling, job trainings and legal support.

The amount was channeled to the Trust Fund for Human Security for the economic and social empowerment of returned victims of trafficking project that will be implemented by the International Labor Organization.

Thailand, which also faces serious human trafficking problems, will also benefit from the project.

"Victims confront difficulties upon their repatriation such as reprisals from traffickers and threats of re-trafficking. This project aims to facilitate social reintegration of victims who returned to their countries of origin," the Japanese embassy in Manila said in a statement.

"This project is expected to restore the dignity of victims of human trafficking in the Philippines and Thailand as well as to improve their livelihoods," it added.

Citing lack of conviction of traffickers and the need for continued improvement in protection, prosecution, and prevention, the US has placed the Philippines in Tier 2 of its watch list of countries violating anti- human trafficking laws under the Trafficking in Persons Report.

Tier 2 countries do not meet the standards fully, but are working to improve compliance to laws. Relegation to Tier 3, however, will mean possible restrictions in US foreign assistance.

The US has attributed the increasing number of "significant trafficking activity" in the Philippines to "endemic poverty, high unemployment rate, a cultural propensity towards migration, a weak rule-of-law environment, and sex tourism."

The project will delve on providing immediate and continuous legal assistance, psychological counseling and medical services to returned trafficked victims; conducting reintegration assistance programs for victims who returned to their country of origin; empowering victims to make them self-sustaining through education, job placement, and small-scale savings and credit schemes; and giving opportunities to meet other victims and setting up self-help groups.

The Trust Fund for Human Security, established in the UN Secretariat in March 1999, has supported projects from more than 140 UN agencies, addressing threats to human life, livelihood and dignity, from the perspective of human security.

LOAD-DATE: May 9, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

422 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Federal News Service

May 4, 2006 Thursday

COUNCIL ON FOREIGN RELATIONS SYMPOSIUM ON HUMAN TRAFFICKING: A DAY OF LEARNINGSESSION 2: HUMAN TRAFFICKING AND GLOBAL HEALTH

SPEAKERS: SARAH MENDELSON, SENIOR FELLOW, RUSSIA AND EURASIA PROGRAM, CENTER FOR STRATEGIC AND INTERNATIONAL STUDIES; ALICE MILLER, PROFESSOR, DEPARTMENT OF POPULATION AND FAMILY HEALTH, SCHOOL OF PUBLIC HEALTH, COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY; LAW AND HEALTH ADVISER, SEXUAL HEALTH AND RIGHTS PROJECT, OPEN SOCIETY INSTITUTE; JOY ZAREMBKA, DIRECTOR, BREAK THE CHAIN

PRESIDER: NICHOLAS KRISTOF, COLUMNIST, THE NEW YORK TIMES

LOCATION: COUNCIL ON FOREIGN RELATIONS, NEW YORK CITY, NEW YORK

SECTION: PRESS CONFERENCE OR SPEECH

LENGTH: 12412 words

MR. KRISTOF: Thank you. I think we're going to get started now. Thank you -- thank you all for coming. It's great to see this turnout. This is really terrific. Standing-room-only audience on trafficking at the Council on Foreign Relations. Wow! (Applause.)

MS. : (Off mike.)

MR. KRISTOF: And there's (global time ?) for women. Equal opportunity applause.

I'm Nicholas Kristof from The New York Times. I should say I was wrote in at the last minute to moderate the panel. So this is kind of a bait and switch, but you're stuck with me for the next little bit. And I'm sure a lot of you were at the previous session, so you know that in contrast to usual council rules, this panel is actually on the record. And so scribble away and spread the news. And when we do get to questions then, again, make sure there's a question mark that comes pretty quickly in what you raise.

First of all, let me introduce our panelists. We have Sarah Mendelson, who is at CSIS, a senior fellow and, in particular, an expert on security aspects and peacekeeping troops as they apply to trafficking issues, and in particular on Russia and Eastern Europe.

Next, we have Alice Miller, who is at Columbia, a professor of population issues and public health, and also an adviser to the Open Society Institute, which as many of you know is also much engaged in these issues.

And then we have Joy Zarembka, who heads a NGO in Washington, the Break the Chain campaign, which does both advocacy and service provision, and is particularly engaged in trafficking issues in the U.S.

So let me -- we've got a lot of ground to cover focusing on health and security issues. Allie (ph), let me start with you. Can you talk a little bit about how trafficking issues do relate to the public health challenge and in particular AIDS? And kind of give us a framework of what you think about this?

MS. MILLER: Okay. And I will, again -- as all of us -- in thanking both the council and The Global Fund for this opportunity, and particularly the opening panel, which I think really began to set up an understanding of the issue, which in my close to 15 years of work for the rights of persons who have been trafficked and different forms of workers, it's unparalleled in this new kind of clarity about how to confront the problem. And I want to say that because I'm going to give the perverse answer of saying that after 15 years of this work, I'm now concerned not only about the health and human rights impacts of trafficking and forced labor itself, but I now have to be concerned about the health and human rights negative impacts of anti- trafficking policies. And for those of us who work in the public health law, rights and policy field, the fact that policy is set up to respond to trafficking can be counterproductive has been deeply troubling to many of us.

So in my remarks, I'm going to be addressing both sides of what, as a public health person and law and rights person, I confront in addressing trafficking.

The easy way to think about the harms of trafficking are what people use the horrible word in terms of clinical, which is to say at the personal level, at the level of the body. What a person faces who is in a forced labor or highly exploitative situation. Those are the kind of issues that I think you easily understand in terms of bodies. They come from abuse. They come from denial of access to air and lights. They come from health impacts of rape and other forms of torture. They come from health impacts of denial of food, of exposure to toxic chemicals in certain unregulated plantation and agricultural industries. They come from over-work. All of those are immediately visible on the body.

But from the health, the public health standpoint, we also want to think about the way in which systems can reach or not reach people who have been trafficked and the fact that people who are in a highly exploitative situation -- those have direct impacts on their bodies and cannot get services to ameliorate those impacts. So the health and human rights questions are doubled. What happens to the body? And then -- this is the part that's hard to cover from a journalistic standpoint -- what happens to the systems that should be in place either to prevent people from facing those harms? What do we need to know, for example, about HIV/AIDS prevention? What kind of information and practices would people need to know to protect themselves? Can they protect themselves? In other words, are they in a situation where denial of information or forced sex or forced other forms of abuse make it individually impossible? But then, if they go to seek services to ameliorate those harms, can they get those services?

And this is where in regard to the health and human rights impact of anti-trafficking policies -- the sort of perverse impact of the U.S. on the one hand taking a leadership position to combat the global AIDS epidemic, but then linking the flow of that money to respond to that global epidemic, some of which is connected to the specific abuses that people in trafficking face, linking the flow of that money to particular positions that may make it impossible for those of us who do public health and human rights-based AIDS education with people in sex work, for example, through peer education. But the linkage of funding and policies that say it's impossible to do that work unless you take a position opposing prostitution as part of our work to end trafficking. And I'm going to hopefully -- I won't take up more time on that --

MR. KRISTOF: We'll come back to that.

MS. MILLER: But I want to come back. But those three aspects -- the clinical aspect, what do persons face and what are their health needs, and then structurally how do they face those harms, and then structurally how do we respond to those harms -- are all the health and human rights questions that I want us to deal with, I hope, over the course of this panel.

MR. KRISTOF: Joy, maybe I'll ask you next. You deal principally, I think, with a situation in the U.S., and with some other kinds of trafficking. Maybe you could talk for a moment about the situation in the U.S. and these various other kinds of trafficking and those health implications.

MS. ZAREMBKA: Right. I mainly work with the domestic worker community, so I'm working with maids, nannies, housekeepers, gardeners, anybody sort of related to the home who potentially is brought into this country and made to work against their will.

Interestingly, I work both with people who are trafficked as well as people who are being exploited, and by that, I mean, say, they're not getting the proper wages. So I often say there's a sort of worker continuum. There's those of us who are skipping off to work in the morning. There are those of us who are about to go postal working the post office. There are those who are exploited. And then we have this sort of -- this group of trafficked individuals.

And I work with people who are exploited all the way up to people who are trafficked. And what's fascinating about the way in which the trafficking act has influenced my work is that we now have to put, you know, we have to demarcate who was trafficked and who was not. And interestingly, it very much affects what type of services -- medical services and other services -- we can offer.

So for example, let me give you a quick story. Oftentimes, we get frantic calls from people who want to get out of their egregious situation. And I'll be talking to them and trying to figure out is it trafficking, is it not trafficking? And quickly we'll get to sort of the sensitive questions about if there's been any sort of physical abuse or sexual abuse in the situation. And sadly, I recognize that in the back of my head I'm saying, "Gosh, I hope this person's been beaten; I hope this person has been, you know, sexually assaulted," because all of a sudden we have millions of services for that person. We have -- unfortunately, we have great protections. We have benefits. We have immigration relief, et cetera, for that particular group of people. But unfortunately, if you fall into this other section where you've been abused but not abused enough, we don't have those same services. We don't have funding for that person. And so it's interesting. When those two different individuals come out of a situation, we have very different mental care and medical care available to them.

And you know, again, it's sort of -- it's an interesting sort of underbelly of this great trafficking act that came out. Yes, we finally have services for a certain group. But unfortunately, there are others who aren't getting those same services.

MR. KRISTOF: And Sarah, often we try to address the security problem. In the Congo, for example, we have a security problem; we send in peacekeeping troops, then we end up with a new problem, which is trafficking. And a lot of the places that are trafficking centers have been concentrations of servicemen at some point.

So tell us a little bit of the connection between that security issue and, in turn, trafficking.

MS. MENDELSON: Sure. First, thank you very much to the council and The Global Fund. It is really -- as a council member, it is wonderful to see you all here on this issue.

I'm a Russia specialist, and I had a grant a few years ago from the MacArthur Foundation to look at military-to-military contact -- U.S.-Russia. And everybody said look at Bosnia; this is a great success story. So when I started interviewing people who had served with the Russians -- Americans who had served with the Russians -- I started hearing another story. I started hearing a story about how U.S. peacekeepers were serving with Russians, and they were encountering on their troop movements as they were going around patrolling a lot of trafficked females from various parts of the former Soviet empire. And these American military officers would try and raise the issue up their command chains only to be told not to say anything -- "shhh!" The Russia relationship with NATO is more important than the human rights of these women and girls.

And then, of course, as I dug deeper, I realized it's not just about the Russians. There are U.S. contractors. There's involvement of, in some cases, U.S. military. There's French. We have all sorts of -- you mentioned the Congo, that this is a much larger issue and that it hadn't been -- it had been documented that trafficking in women and girls had followed the peacekeepers in Bosnia and Kosovo.

We have a story that broke a few days ago that hasn't been picked up by The New York Times or The Washington Post that there is widespread labor trafficking in Iraq by U.S. contractors. And we have the order that General Casey issued, and we have the response by at least one contractor -- Kellogg, Brown & Root -- which is entirely superficial, and it betrays the fact that I think they're not going to take this seriously.

This is also saying there are security implications when those involved in peacekeeping missions engage in human rights abuses. The link between abuse and security is a very serious one that has gone unrecognized by many policy-making communities. The local community knows what's going on. It undermines the mission. A lot of these missions are about trying to help enforce rule of law. When they engage in criminal acts and abuse, they're directly undermining it. In some cases, we had those who are responsible for force protection -- that is, entry to the base -- were in some ways involved. This is extremely worrisome.

Also, in a lot of conflict and post-conflict situations, organized crime is a main security threat. When you have people either turning a blind eye or actively engaged in purchasing humans as chattel, there's a continuum, and there's different kinds of harm that are done. But they all harm not only the victim, but they harm the mission.

And understanding and getting our arms around the role that organized crime plays and what we can do about, what you can do about it, who you can call to try and affect policy I think is in some ways one of the more hopeful aspects of trafficking. We can stop international and U.S. engagement in this. We've got the tools; we just have to enforce them.

MR. KRISTOF: Let me ask a skeptical question that I open up to anybody who wants to take it, and it was one that was raised in the last panel. And that is really whether the notion of trafficking is the best way to slice this issue or to look at it. If one looks at the security nexus, for example, in the former Yugoslavia, the problems there clearly have to do with trafficking. In other parts of the world -- I mean, for example, Congo -- a lot of the victims are local people who aren't being trafficked in any kind of conventional sense. Likewise, in terms of the AIDS connection, you have these trucking routes in India where the issue is very much trafficking. In Zambia, you have similar routes from South Africa where you have truckers and brothels. But the women in the brothels in many cases aren't trafficked. They're local women who have gone there on their own.

And so I wonder if really the most useful way to look at this issue is trafficking, or whether it's, you know, some other method such as forced labor, or exploitation or whatever.

MS. MENDELSON: I think that what I'm hearing -- e-mails, conversations, a recent U.N. report -- I'm hearing repeatedly cases of force fraud, coercion, exploitation in the context of peacekeeping operations or in ongoing conflicts. So I think there is a merit to using the language of trafficking in this case. I'm hearing about cases in Kabul where there are Chinese food restaurants that are -- as one contractor e-mailed me -- the worst kept secret in Kabul. They are fronts for brothels where expat males go. And in a situation where you have third-country females in a place where there is no legal sex industry, you immediately worry, who are these people? How did they get there? And what's going on with them? This is a case of coercion, exploitation, fraud.

Korea -- you don't usually think of Korea as a peacekeeping mission, but that's how the U.S. military is poised there. And there are females that are trafficked from the Philippines and the far east of Russia to Korea. And the U.S. military had an effort to address these issues -- we can talk about how good an effort it was. But when the general who was trying to enforce this left, the e-mails that I'm getting suggest that the problem has gotten worse.

So I think yes, we are seeing -- there's a different modality to all of these. And I think in Congo, it is much more of a case of sexual exploitation and abuse as opposed to trafficking. I don't know that any trafficking experts have looked at it. The U.N. is sometimes impenetrable, although we have some people who are very much working with us to try and combat this. But I think it provides us tools to address these issues.

MS. MILLER: I'd like to actually take a slightly different take, which is that I think -- it will be a double answer -- which is I agree with Sarah that many of the conditions that we see people -- women and men recruited and moved into in a range of both postconflict and so-called peacetime situations -- are rightfully called trafficking. What the term trafficking gets you, however, is not the -- will not necessarily be all of the interventions that you need to address the other questions of general HIV/AIDS prevention at a population level, more general health care systems and the repair of access to health services for poor and unprotected populations. So we have to do, I think, a bit of both. It will sound like bait and switch because the media, to a large extent, will follow a story of trafficking. What we need to then do is ensure that the response to the specific harms documented by Sarah. Or there are a number of colleagues in this room working with projects with Physicians for Human Rights in regard to trafficking in Thailand; Human Rights Watch, Amnesty International have done specific documentation projects on those specific harms.

But what we cannot do is mistake the specific harm response as being sufficient as a policy response to the other set of problems that you raised, Nicholas -- which include how do we strengthen the way that both individuals and populations confront the AIDS epidemic? And that is information, services, self-organization and broader associational rights. So we always -- we need to focus on specific response for trafficking but not be misled into thinking -- and this comes hard to those of us who are used to doing traditional human rights work when you rescue one torture victim and that feels enough. We're talking about setting up, as the earlier panel said, processes of prevention that stop the funnel of people into exploitative situations. And we're talking within the HIV/AIDS epidemic and responses to health problems with a whole host of long-term and short-term empowerment strategies that make it more likely that people can avoid the risk of HIV/AIDS, or get the services they need if infected. And those two things have to be dealt with at the same time. But as we know, one tends to eclipse the other. And this, I think, is our challenge.

MS. ZAREMBKA: I agree wholeheartedly with both Allie (ph) and Sarah on this point, but it really provides a tool. I mean, I often say as a social service provider that our social services are really the chemotherapy. And making the systemic changes -- that's the cure to the cancer. And we have to be working on both of those simultaneously.

We can't just continuously be giving services if we're not changing the sort of -- the overall focus.

And I mean, interestingly in the United States, I would dare say I'm enslaved to the semantics and the legislation as it relates to trafficking. And so we have to use those definitions, and we have to use the word trafficking to be able to get the services that are necessary and needed. I also think that the fact our trafficking act includes psychological coercion is very important. That people are being enslaved not just because they have shackles on their ankles but because they're being coerced into staying. They're being threatened at home. They're being threatened by violence. It doesn't have to be, you know, the sexual assault. It doesn't have to be the beating. There's various ways in which people are being psychologically coerced. And so I do appreciate that part of our trafficking law that takes that into consideration.

MS. ZAREMBKA: Nicholas, can I add one more point? And I'm going to call -- I'm going to here reference the work of a colleague who's here in the room working in South Korea precisely in regard to the issue that Sarah raised and anthropologist Seling Chang, who can speak for herself later. But her work has demonstrated that on the one hand, the range of people who move and are moved into the entertainment basis around the -- entertainment areas -- around the U.S. military bases are a mixture of trafficked and non-trafficked women. And one of the ironies in her work from published articles that I, at least, have been involved in the reviewing of have indicated that some of the anti-trafficking interventions -- because they are about removing women and sending them home -- are a part of breaking up the capacity to do effective both labor rights work and AIDS work. Simultaneously within the Korean structure, people who don't move into the entertainment industry -- migrants in other forms of work -- are entirely unaddressed by the attention that the U.S. is putting in regard to trafficking for a range of sexual labor, including forced prostitution. So we have again this double issue that I'm going to endlessly ask us to think about. Because if our long-term goal is stopping immediate harm, but doing, as I think Jyoti Sanghera said so eloquently on the first panel, empowering and building the structures for the human rights protection of the individuals most at risk, we can't just stop at the one or the other.

And I think within the Korea example -- and I think there's a history there. And this links back again to the first panel that the pressure on the Korean government from the U.S. government, among others, because of exposes in the U.S. on U.S. military bases and the way in which the exchange -- sexual exchange between U.S. soldiers and Filipino and other women in the entertainment industry, and nonsexual exchange, led to shutting down of movement of a lot of those women out. There's questions about whether the law reform that happened in South Korea, in part to move up the tier from the lowest tier of not doing enough to being, you know, the Good Housekeeping seal of approval, that happens as countries are raised up the review process under the U.S. Trafficking in Persons Report, which is issued by the U.S. State Department. Whether those pressures and whether that change in the law has been good for the people most affected is precisely the question we should be asking. And I think we'll hear more about that also from colleagues in the audience.

MR. KRISTOF: Let me raise one of the most controversial areas in this whole issue, which is the question, as was raised in the last session as well, of prostitution versus sex work. And in particular, the U.S. law curbs provision of money to groups unless they say that they are opposed to prostitution. How does that work on the ground from each of your perspectives in terms of effectiveness of dealing with, for example, these kind of public health issues?

MS. ZAREMBKA: This issue of complexity that you're hearing about -- we need to have complex responses in our policy -- is really quite critical. And the problem is that this debate of prostitution versus trafficking has in many ways, I think, inhibited us from developing complex responses -- for example, in the case of the Department of Defense. We have, actually, a DOD policy on trafficking. In a $450 billion budget, give or take a billion or two, there is no line item to implement this policy -- zero. And the response by the DOD has been to develop long-distance training modules, which colleagues who work on this issue were not -- DOD basically did this themselves.

The main response that DOD has done is that they have added language about prostitution to the UCMJ -- the Uniform Code of Military Justice. They've tightened it up a bit. But they haven't done any kind of systematic effort to change the organizational culture within the DOD or within the armed forces or within the contracting community to understand this issue at all. And we had a fix actually in the trafficking bill that was passed. There was a large piece in there that drew on research a lot of us have done advocating for an office to really get out in front. The House Armed Services Committee refused to pass the bill with that language in the bill. So there's still language about peacekeeping, but the policy tools -- the office, the resources, the leadership -- were taken out.

And my impression is -- and I would be very encouraged to hear from some of you if I'm wrong -- my impression is the DOD and House Armed Services Committee thought they were doing everything right because they had other language that they were working with inside the DOD on prostitution. But they weren't really addressing the fundamental issues in the field.

MS. MILLER: Can I take a step back and perhaps explain the law and the way the two conditionalities on the flow of money function, because I think that may be useful to people.

There are two pieces of legislation, both enacted in 2003, which contain language about specific to prostitution and related in different ways to the conversation today about anti-trafficking. The first piece of legislation where the language first appeared is in the U.S. global leadership act on HIV/AIDS, malaria and tuberculosis, and the language and conditionality in that flow of money. So that is the money that basically feeds the president's -- the PEPFAR -- the president's emergency prevention act -- response to AIDS act. And that was the kind of big pledge of we will -- the U.S. government as part of fighting the global AIDS pandemic will put in $15 billion, and we will do both prevention and treatment. So the act in its big lineaments was revolutionary in many ways and represented the joining together of many forces. And it had a prevention component and a treatment component. But as many of you following the work around sexual and reproductive health will understand, the politics of sexual and reproductive health have been quite polarized to the extent where evidence-based work on what is both useful -- in particular, for women to enjoy their sexual and reproductive health rights -- is less important than certain ideological frameworks. That's a (train ?) throughout the congressional work. And there's quite a good working piece on U.S. policy in regard to this that I can refer you to by a woman named Francois Gerard (ph), currently at the OSI, who did a piece on the intersections between all this.

Fast forward to the bill itself. It's about getting money out to combat the AIDS epidemic. Within that, there is a set of conditionalities that says no U.S. money can be used for the promotion, for the advocacy of legalization of prostitution or the promotion of prostitution. That part's -- and also in favor of sex trafficking. No one is in favor of sex trafficking. Obviously, it's the first part that is the contentious part.

It is a norm for the U.S. government to say what you can do with our money. It's the second half that is particularly problematic, which says that no NGO is eligible to receive this money -- and remember, this is part of a big push for public-private partnerships in combating HIV/AIDS around the world. No NGO is eligible to receive this money if it does not have a policy opposing prostitution. Now, what that means in function is that an NGO both has to make a policy, and not only can it not use U.S. money for this in any way that doesn't oppose prostitution but it cannot in any of its other activities, anywhere in the world, do anything that might fall afoul of this conditionality.

So two kinds of problems. What is falling afoul? What does it mean to insufficiently oppose prostitution? If you organize with sex workers and teach them language skills, which help negotiate safer sex as colleagues an NGO in Cambodia have been doing, is that part of the promotion? Is that insufficient opposition, because they're also more successful in holding onto their money and -- one catches the drift. What is that?

The second half, which is that policy, which people who follow reproductive health will recognize elements of what's often called the Mexico City policy or global gag rule around abortion. There was an assumption that this notion that you could constrain what an NGO says by giving it U.S. money would not apply to NGOs based in the United States, because NGOs in the U.S. would have First Amendment rights. That general assumption, which has held true for the abortion gag rule, is no longer true for this prostitution pledge. U.S. NGOs that receive this money are now bound by this conditionality following a series of internal memos starting last fall of 2004 and then the actual appearance of this grant in U.S. NGO's contracts, which they sign with USAID.

Now, this same set of restrictions with similar -- not identical but similar language also appears in the 2003 anti-trafficking -- what people have been referring to as the trafficking victim protection or Trafficking Victim Protection Reauthorization Act of 2003 -- same set of restrictions -- U.S. money use and NGO can't do other or speak, and applied to U.S. NGOs receiving this money.

Now, the First Amendment part of that is being challenged in two sets of lawsuits, because U.S. groups can fight for their First Amendment rights through U.S. courts.

But I want to highlight the fact that although this lawsuit is proceeding -- two different suits filed -- we can speak more about them if people are interested in it -- in last summer and fall of last year -- one suit in D.C. by a population services group called DKT International, which receives about (16/60 ?) percent of its funding from USAID, and the second suit filed here in New York by OSI and Pathfinder International, both groups who work in sexual and reproductive health more generally. So that lawsuit proceeds. But I want to highlight the fact that even the success of that lawsuit does not remove the restriction from non-U.S. NGOs receiving this money. And as a public health person -- and we can talk about the research that shows that peer-based education programs with people in sex work that both help them fight abuse and fight AIDS are among the most successful AIDS prevention strategies -- this is a problem for us.

So I hope that wasn't too long.

MS. MENDELSON: And let me give a concrete example of this, if I will. As I mentioned, we work mostly with domestic workers, but we also have individuals who have been trafficked into prostitution. And we are a subcontractor of monies that are to be used to provide services to these individuals.

Now, we had some clients -- and this is prior to this passing -- but we had some clients who came to us who had consented to coming to this country to work in the sex sector. They knew that. But once they arrived here, they were forced to work against their will. It was above and beyond what they thought and signed up for -- right. They were trafficked into their situation. And when they got out, they came to us.

Now, we offered them services. We did everything we could in terms of language. Our main gist is to meet people where they are and help them move toward self-sufficiency -- so, you know, everything from food, clothing, shelter to, you know, life skills, language, et cetera.

Now, we can't force these people to do one thing or another. We can't say okay, but you can never go back into prostitution. We had no control over what they did next. Now, they ended up returning to their home country, and we can't really say what happened to them.

But am I promoting prostitution by helping individuals who've been trafficked but now are trying to get back on their feet? And how do I even negotiate that? Am I violating this? So interesting questions like that are going to continuously come up until we have more definition. And you know, I think it's very problematic that we can't just do the service provision that we had signed up to do for trafficked individuals without worrying about, quite frankly, a policy that has nothing to do with the work that I do. I don't have -- we don't have a policy on prostitution. It's not of any interest to the work that we're doing. But we're wondering how is that going to stymie our ability to actually serve our clients.

MR. KRISTOF: The administration doesn't have a lot of fans on the panel, maybe -- (laughter) -- but let me ask a question about that. I mean, this issue has been -- had tremendous hostility from a lot of the NGO community. But it's also my impression that actually on the ground, it matters much less than people have feared. And part of that is because NGOs lie. And part of that is because in fact policies in Washington always get diluted on the ground as they go through layers and layers and layers. And so I wonder if in fact all the, you know, concern about this issue -- and, for example, in Poipet, Cambodia, and in Livingstone, Zambia, and in Calcutta -- each of those three places I've seen programs that are getting U.S. funding that on their face would raise precisely these kinds of concerns but that are going through and that are doing great work.

And so I wonder whether we really need to be so alarmed (it doesn't come to much ?) about this particular issue?

MS. ZAREMBKA: It strikes me that -- we -- it might be useful to go back to what was said on the first panel about the funnel issue, and that the way in which this is destructive is it diverts -- it's the politics of distraction, as our colleague, Martina Vandenberg, likes to say. It distracts from the larger issue of root causes and where the money from both public and private foundations should be going and how U.S. foreign policy should be executed and whether or not you place rights and development really fundamentally behind the rhetoric. There's a lot of rhetoric out there.

On paper -- I don't know how many of you have read the national security strategy that came out. I read it and I thought well, on paper, you know, this is a very right-faced national security strategy. But when you look at the implementation and you look at the budgets and you look at -- that's where things begin to fall apart. And this administration is not of one voice, frankly. And when you look really closely inside, even with the executive branch, there are people who are beginning to think about this and trying to figure out how to move it forward. And there are many people on the legislative side who are very frustrated by both this debate taking us away from the real fundamental issues, and trying to keep it back on track.

MS. MENDELSON: And I think -- I think we need to look at what this looks like -- the impact on the ground. Even though perhaps some NGOs might be able to slither around, I think it's most important to note that many of the social service providers that do not have a policy do not have funding anymore. Funding has completely been diverted to faith-based initiatives and other such areas, so that it actually is having a really strong impact on those who have, you know, sort of built up an expertise in this work over the years. But now, for example, we don't have any sort of funding streams that are coming specifically from the office of victims of crime or from Health and Human Services.

MS. MILLER: I'd like to add that -- to support both this conversation about the way in which uncertainty makes for bad programming. It may be true that NGOs lie, and certain AID program officers can nod and wink. It is not consistently true, and the inability to know when that will be true means that you cannot program. And services cannot be given on a heroic and ad hoc measure, which is what essentially we're asking for -- that people be heroic, ad hoc and individual. And I do love individual heroes, but that's not the basis of good programming, either in prevention or in response.

So as just a fundamental matter, all of us are caught by saying yes, good stuff's going on; can't talk about it. (Laughter). Do we give the credit to the policy for that and secondly that can't talk about it -- and as someone who is both an academic and an advocate, not being able to talk about the impact of policies and research, to really look at and even to go back to the vexed question of what are the relationships between different forms of unprotected labor and exploitation -- if we cannot talk, network and associate with people who are receiving U.S. money and get operational-based research, we can't do good intervention.

And I think Joy's second point that the flow of money is shifting because of this policy -- not just this policy, but the general shift. So one wants to pay attention to each of those pieces, even as we say yes, good programming, go forward. But we cannot give a bad policy the credit to the fact that those programs survive.

There are individual incidences which keep scaring people to self-censorship, to limiting even what they can do under the program, to shutting down good programs, in part because of the intersection of certain moments of U.S. foreign policy. A recent set of events in India, which you may be familiar with -- last summer when an advocate who has been working for years both in regard to AIDS prevention -- named Mina Sashu (ph) -- and in looking at anti-exploitation was named as a child trafficker and found herself caught in a battle between interventionists and rescue and raids, who found the group that she worked with insufficiently helpful to them, which then attempted to shut down and intervene with AIDS programming, which had worked with collectives who were also looking to remove people from exploitative circumstances in the brothel. And that particular vortex shut down very good AIDS programming and was part and parcel of the intersection of this ideology with domestic U.S. politics. And it is affecting programs on the ground, even as good programs may continue to sort of slither under the radar.

MR. KRISTOF: Let me ask a very practical question as sort of how we translate all this into reality.

Maybe the worst place for trafficking I've ever seen was old Svay Pak in Cambodia where you used to be able to, you know, buy 7-year-old girls. They were completely imprisoned and so on. Doctors Without Borders -- MSF had a program there. They had a clinic there twice a week where they sent a doctor who would provide free medical treatment for these very young, essentially enslaved girls and treat STI and so on. Then they were criticized because the notion was it was effectively like providing treatment to slaves so they could work harder. And so they pulled out. They closed that clinic. In the meantime, Svay Pak has been to some degree closed down. But what do you -- what does one do in that kind of situation? Suppose, you know, each of you are whatever -- whether it's ambassador to Cambodia or you're U.N. OCHA head in Cambodia or you're head of a major NGO there, and you have this kind of a brothel district. What do you do with the public health problem there?

MS. : This is the conversation I think that has not -- or at least maybe you've been in these conversations more, but in the policy community, we've not been able to get beyond this and have serious conversations about what is a viable response to this. I mean, I think a lot of us can see that giving medical treatment to a 7-year-old in that situation is enabling.

On the other hand, with all due respect, the idea of purchasing somebody and getting them out is also, I mean -- (laughter) -- could be construed as -- in other places where that has gone on --

MR. KRISTOF: President Bush is calling to -- (laughter).

MS. : Sorry. I thought it was off. Oops!

MS. : I had no idea that was supposed to be off. My apologies.

MS. MILLER(?): Maybe they had some constructive ideas. (Laughter.)

It's a very serious issue, and I don't think that we've put in place the kinds of policies that can address the situation of that child. If you have somebody who comes in and they buy somebody, they are another trafficker in some sense. To the person who's being bought, they're no different. I mean, you know, you're a good person and you weren't taking them and reselling them. But the move to repatriate, the move to rescue, the move to -- none of this is adequate. I mean, we are not dealing with -- we have something in place, but it's not -- you know, we're not talking about serious amounts of money.

And the one place I would disagree with the first panel is that there are still very large, unresolved issues in Eastern Europe and Eurasia, and there is not a lot of money going to the health and education of children and youth. And there's nothing for these people. And you can understand why people would end up in a situation.

So the answer is cloudy and ask later, but we need to be talking about this. And we need to be doing it in a way that is not -- immediately backs everyone into a corner where you say so, you are pro-prostitution. No, you are -- sex workers. And then you can't go on. I mean, and then it's of no help to anybody.

MS. MENDELSON: I often -- I often -- at the end of any talk that I give about trafficking, people want to know, what can I do? And while my first inclination is send me money -- (laughter) -- I know that that's not the answer. My second answer is send money to these sending countries. I mean, you know, support some sort of economic initiative. You know, help a school in that area where these young, you know, 7-year-olds are not able to get proper education. I think that -- I mean, I'm just really wanting to echo what we heard in the first panel, this idea of really thinking about systemic change that's going to allow us to take away the root causes and conditions that are then leading to these trafficking situations.

I think we need to start talking about long term versus short term. You know, buying a slave is a short-term solution, but it doesn't really replace that revolving door that's going to put another slave in that exact same position. So sort of taking a step back and --

MS. MILLER: I think -- and I come from the world of specific human rights intervention and moved into public health. So the question about what you when you see a single individual and then changing systems I understand as being a point of tension. But I would actually somewhat also take issue with the notion that what you described -- and in my work in Cambodia, I did not see brothels full of 7-year-olds. One of the interesting questions is how to respond immediately to the extreme situation but not characterize that as true of the whole. And that sounds really cold-hearted, but that is what we have to do.

Cambodia has a deeply -- and I've spent years working within the criminal justice system in the early mid-90s to try to set up the criminal justice system. It is still an incapable and unfortunately still highly corrupt criminal justice system to the extent that a colleague who was with us for the last two days, Carol Jenkins -- a report will be recently released that talks about more than 70 percent of the women that she interviewed who were in prostitution were raped by police. So that the idea that on the one hand we're trying to respond to the 7-year-old, but we're calling into play a set of authorities that are themselves unaccountable in a way that we aren't now talking about becomes part of the problem there.

So I want to see a discussion that says, one, how do we actually understand who's in the brothels in Phnom Penh and outside Phnom Penh. And the study that was spoken about this morning was very interesting -- an investigator who followed cab drivers until he felt like he had mapped out all of the known brothels that both foreigners and non- foreigners went to, and then within that did representative sampling of the people in those brothels, which is the first of its kind actually in that area. And it did not turn up hosts of 7-year-olds. It doesn't say that there aren't any. But it's just so now how do we respond to both sets of problems.

And then as a health -- in terms of MSF's own work, part of the notion of enabling them to work with the people in the brothels. There are organizations of sex workers attempting to organize to fight exploitation. How do we support them as well as supporting their work to get children out of the brothels when those people are children, you know, and trafficked? And that work to tease that out is what is going to be shut down by certain versions of anti-trafficking policies that don't allow us to try to do both things. And this is the problem for many of us who are trying so hard to end the harm and then end the systems that lead to the harm, as well as respond to HIV/AIDS.

MR. KRISTOF: I'll go to questions in a moment, but let me just push you all a little more on that question of specifically, you know, what we do, or what interventions you've seen that you think are great. And everybody talks in the long run about raising the status of women and about educating girls and so on. But you know, if you were ambassador to Cambodia, you're going to be there for two or three years, you know, what do you do in the here and now that is going to make a real difference on the issue?

MS. ZAREMBKA: I make sure that if I have troops that are on Fighter Management Pass Programs, R&R, that are going to Cambodia, that they're prosecuted if they engage in these activities -- prosecution; you know, a zero-tolerance policy, but zero prosecutions.

MS. MILLER: The other piece is that you work with the Cambodian legal system to protect the people who have been trafficked, because the statistics that trafficked and/or any person in prostitution is more likely to be raped by the police has to become top of your list. And I think that we should step away from the notions that poverty causes trafficking, girls' education will stop trafficking. The earlier panel made it clear that the causative factors are differential development, inability to move safely into good work, inability to have job opportunities that pay a living wage. Those are different problems. In fact, there's evidence in both northern Thailand and Cambodia that a little bit of education -- because it increases the ability of a girl or a young woman to be able to move -- increases her social capital. That does not increase her ability to move safely becomes a factor in trafficking. So we have to stop listing these things as just educating girls will fix the problem. It will not.

Within public health, we know that individual behavior change is useless if the structures that force people into unsafe behaviors don't change. So I think we always -- you know, my ambassador's going to talk long and hard, but spend a lot of time with these differential issues: the cross-border movement of people into Thailand; the fact that people in Thailand, either non-registered Thai people or Cambodians, have no ability to argue for their rights; the fact that they are deported without neither prosecution of the harms against them or any ability to appear in Thailand to claim their rights and very few groups are able to speak with them and for them; the fact that the debt bondage system has continued to be left in place, which means that when you send one child home to Cambodia from a begging operation in Thailand, a younger child is sent; which means Operation Hope has been doing extremely good work in Thailand trying to break the debt bondage system and work with the individuals and stop the pressures that move the younger and younger children who are less and less able to move safely. Those are the things I would focus on.

MS. MENDELSON: I don't want to be ambassador. (Laughter.)

MR. KRISTOF: Okay. Your turn. Now, we don't have a floating mike and so -- but, you know, same idea. Please just stand up and identify yourself and ask a question that is a genuine question.

Yes.

Q (Off mike.)

MS. MENDELSON: When I was doing interviews in Bosnia and Kosovo --

MR. KRISTOF: I should re-rephrase the question for the transcript which will be done. Andrew Pierre asked about the connection between these kinds of issues and other kinds of illicit behaviors, whether arms or drug smuggling for it -- other kinds of trafficking issues.

MS. MENDELSON: When I was in Bosnia meeting with senior U.S. military who were serving there, they would say I'm all about slaying the dragon, I'm all about stopping trafficking and arms and drugs. Well, what about trafficking in humans? Hmmm, trafficking in humans? When I just said that, that's the first time I've ever said it or thought about it. For a lot of people, there hasn't been -- in the DOD, frankly, at NATO there hasn't been an understanding of how these networks are connected, partly because the research has not been done in the way that it should be.

There's one report that came out in July 2004 from IOM that talked about how these criminal networks were interlinked. Somebody once said to me what I need in order to be able to really move this issue -- I need a chart that shows me X percentage of persons indicted for war criminals are making money off of trafficking in arms, trafficking in drugs, trafficking in fill in the blank and legitimate business.

I need to understand the illegal political economy of this region, and then I will respond. And what they were doing was essentially leaving the trafficking in humans part aside. And that's -- and they weren't seeing it as a security issue, and that's partly why they weren't responding to it.

So research on some level. They need the evidence. They need to see -- I keep waiting for Mladic to be picked up, and then they're going to go through what was supporting him. And it's going to be all sorts of illegal activity and the connectivity is going to be very intense.

Q (Off mike.)

MS. MENDELSON: UNODC just has a report out -- I don't know how many of you have seen it. They looked very closely -- this is the part of the U.N. that looks at drugs and crime. And there seems to be the strongest link is between drugs and human trafficking. I know everybody wants to make the connection with terrorism, but I think we're -- on some level, I think it's an overreach.

MR. KRISTOF: I'm not sure to what extent a moderator should try to moderate himself, but just two quick thoughts. One is that, purely anecdotal, you sure do see that, I mean, trafficking in humans is run by the same connection of -- these cartels, criminal cartels, which usually means a law enforcement cartel hooked in with it. And that's true of all of these things -- all of these activities. And as a result, one of the best ways I think to try to fight some of these issues is to undermine economic incentives for trafficking. And one can do that in sensitive ways.

The other thought is that technology in some ways is undermined or has acted (to ?) great accountability on trafficking and, in particular, cell phones. Particularly in the case of China, I see that, for example, young women from Fujian or young people generally from Fujian province routinely now are trafficked all over the world. And now they call back and tell their families and their villagers what kind of situation they've ended up in. And so people in the village, in the community, have some idea whether a given trafficker in that area -- to what extent they're telling the truth about the final situation. So that has created a real -- sort of changed the dynamic of that kind of situation.

Yes.

Q Lisa Kerbeel (ph) from the U.N. Department of Peacekeeping, and my question is also for Sarah. Sarah, you've been a leader in pushing NATO, the U.N. and DOD on trafficking, and there's been a seismic shift. We have policies in place. We admit at the U.N. that we're part of the problem in peacekeeping. NATO has put into place an implementation strategy. But as you highlighted, lip service -- and what will it take to get this room of advocates linked to those contractors at Halliburton and those multimillionaires who run those companies -- (off mike) -- Washington, Brussels and New York to really step up? Any advice on how we can all work together in our --

MR. KRISTOF: Lisa Kerbeel (ph) from U.N. --

MS. : Lisa Kerbeel (ph). (Laughter.)

MR. KRISTOFF: -- asks about what it actually takes to go from lip service to actually making a difference with whether Halliburton or other operations on the ground.

MS. MENDELSON: Traffickers work in networks, and countertrafficking works in networks and, you know, Lisa at UNDPKO has been part of this countertrafficking, peacekeeping network.

We did have momentum, and I think when we got the policies we thought that was it. And frankly, what needs to happen is more research. We need to have more reports. We need reporters also going out and finding information. Examining -- we need independent, nongovernmental eyes and ears on the ground looking at how policies are being implemented.

I mean, essentially what's happening is the DOD, NATO and the U.N. -- they hide behind the policies. But there's no real examination of how have they implemented their policies. So the very political issue, though, is international organizations are a reflection of member states, right? So NATO and the U.N. sign onto a policy. The policy may be good, but it all goes back to the member states, right? This is a kind of organic community, and the member states make up what it does.

In the Euro-Atlantic region, which is where I both live and work, I think there is actually a crisis of human rights. I think that it's there for a variety of reasons, but human rights is considered more or less a luxury. There isn't serious implementation of these policies. And what happens concretely is that states are not putting in the money to implement the policies. We've witnessed it at DOD. We saw in the legislation there was a piece to deal with this. It would have given us the ability of having the U.S. lead, and on a global military front it's actually very important what the U.S. does. If the U.S. is engaging in abuse, it affects the entire human rights regime. If it's more compliant with international human rights and humanitarian law, it affects the human rights regime.

So the fact that DOD did not respond -- guess what the NATO leading member troop contributing country responses are. That's the U.S., Germany, Italy, France. Nothing. I mean, essentially there have been a series of meetings since NATO passed their policy in June 2004. There have been -- we have been invited to a meeting in Finland -- non-NATO state -- meeting in Switzerland -- non-NATO state -- meeting in Sweden -- non-NATO state. And what members of NATO deployments are present? Nobody from Afghanistan, nobody from Kosovo. The guys who are in Macedonia, like all five of them, come to these meetings. They're really nice guys. (Laughter.) They actually know some things. And believe me, there's trafficking problems in Macedonia. But this is an utterly un-serious effort.

And these countries, our country, they need to be shamed, essentially. They need to be brought before audiences in New York, in Washington, in Paris, in London, and they need to be asked, what are you doing? How are you implementing? And then we need people out there on the ground in Kosovo or in Bulgarian Romania where we're going to build bases. We're going to do vertical integration in trafficking. We're going to provide the contractors to source countries. And unless somebody is really watching -- you know, I was told the inspector general's office that went out to Iraq to look at the contracting issue -- they told some friends in the legislative branch that well, I understand that the passports of these people were taken away, but that was for security reasons. These are the people who are tasked with inspecting whether or not there is a problem with contractors or U.S. military.

So to date, it has been utterly un-serious. We need a serious campaign. We can do a disciplined campaign. It involves resources. It involves people. It involves a plan -- a campaign plan -- but it's possible.

MS. : Can I ask a question? Because in kind of classic human rights terms, one says that immunity equals impunity. And in the world of -- and some interesting studies about what actually allows trafficking to flourish, whether it's in sweatshops in terms of garment-making sweatshops, or in plantation work, or in different forms of the sex sector. What allows trafficking to flourish is the impunity for the offense. And I'm wondering if you wanted to say more on what -- in particular, the pieces that have been left out of the -- because we're very concerned in general anti-trafficking work to understand how it is that certain forms of employers are immune, which increases the likelihood that they will commit abuses, because they have impunity. It's a very short link.

MS. MENDELSON: There's impunity, but there's also the perception of immunity. There is, since 2000, there's been something called the Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act -- MEJA. And it would cover any crime that was committed by somebody serving under a DOD contract. One of the things that did stick in the 2005 reauthorization act is that the jurisdiction was extended from not only DOD contractors, but to any U.S. government contractors.

The problem is the regulations haven't been written yet, or if they've been written -- I don't know. Is anybody from the DOJ in the room? I mean, it's literally been -- it was six years and the regulations haven't been written. There needs to be more, and we've got this thing MEJA -- it could be implemented. The worst of it is, though, that people who are out on the ground -- for example, the criminal investigative division -- has no idea that the contractors could be prosecuted back in the U.S. They don't know what tools are available. And so -- plus the response of most employers if they have somebody who's been doing something is rapid repatriation. They disappear in the middle of the night. So no witness, no prosecution.

One of the things that was remarkable about the Zade (ph) report that came out from the U.N. March 2005 was how it was a blueprint for essentially revolutionizing, modernizing peacekeeping operations, stability operations -- pick whatever word you want to use -- both in terms of legal and forensic. If you had somebody who was involved in a crime that there would be forensics so you could actually -- you know, welcome to the modern world.

You know, as far as I can tell, the impact of the Zade (ph) report has been almost zero.

And so we need reporters to be asking, you know, a year later what is the impact of the Zade (ph) report in the U.N. system?

MS. MILLER(?): I wanted to piggyback on that answer with an example much closer to home. We're finding here in the United States individuals who bring in domestic workers who work at the -- unfortunately, I hate to pick on the U.N., the World Bank, the IMF -- individuals who work there are allowed to legally bring their domestic workers with them here. And unfortunately, in embassies -- I was going to get to the embassy part and diplomatic immunity. We have a lot of cases where unfortunately, due to diplomatic immunity, we're not able to go after these individuals who are abusing their workers. And it's the exact same thing -- the taking of the passports, individuals not being allowed to leave the home and being made to work around the clock. And yet, of course, there are all sorts of things on the books somewhere that should be stopping this, but there's no implementation. And unfortunately, the abuses continue.

MR. KRISTOF: Yes.

Q (Off mike) -- human rights organizations ought to make common cause with right-wing think tanks -- (off mike) -- notably in an article published in Foreign Affairs and (our ?) publication here. (Off mike) -- is there a benefit (cluster ?) for the human rights -- (off mike)?

MR. KRISTOFF: So should human rights organizations work together with the faith-based community on some of these kinds of issues?

Q And they mention the trafficking -- (off mike) --

MS. MENDELSON(?): I think it makes a lot of sense. I think there's a lot of synergy that can happen there.

I think the bigger problem that we're seeing is that you have -- at this point, you have specialized organizations that are really interested in doing things that are culturally appropriate. The human rights organizations that have been working on this issue for a while sort of have the linguistical capacities. They've sort of built up programs. And now newer faith-based organizations are getting involved, and I think that's important. But the money is now being shifted to folks who don't have any experience working with trafficking, and they're somewhat tacking it on to some of the other programs they have and say oh, it's just like domestic violence; we can, you know, send them through that channel. And it hasn't yet come together. I think we need to really think more about how those two groups can be talking about, so the expertise can be shared, so the funding can be shared. And I think that there's a lot of possibility there -- yeah.

MS. MILLER: I'm assuming you're talking about the piece by Holly Burkhalter from Physicians for Human Rights. And part of what was both implicit -- explicit and less explicit than I think it could have been in that piece is that in working together, one presumes that you would have agreement on core principles and underlying values, which would undergird the work. It cannot simply be a political tactic to appear together, and therefore to appear appropriately in a coalition.

In my own work in human rights coalitions, both in this country and elsewhere, what you set as a basis is the core values that underpin the agreed-upon common work together. And what was also partly clear in Burkhalter's article and quite clear in much of the work against trafficking is we don't have those agreed common principles yet.

For example, one of the panelists on the earlier panel talked about as a human rights principle protecting against both discrimination and coercion, and the basis of understanding that your goal is to create the conditions where a person becomes more empowered and more in control of their own life. If that were agreed common value, then perhaps we could work together. But that -- one of my colleagues in Cambodia who heads a crisis center was asked to hold women against their will who had been rescued from a brothel. That cannot be part of the common values of a human rights organization.

So I would say possible, talk about the values, talk about the rights principles and then include in that the conversation about the impact of the different interventions from rights principles, both short term and long term. Then we can talk about the possibilities of coalition.

MS. MENDELSON: Let me give a slightly different answer. I am on a steering committee for Human Rights Watch, and I work very closely with Russian organizations. So I would be amiss if I didn't follow the words that we often talk about in the Russian context, which is in certain cases it strategically does make sense. And I think that the answer is really case by case. And it depends on which organizations and individuals. It depends on which case.

I think that we've done some great work with Mr. Smith in Congress, who is both a human rights activist, but also a -- I don't know. What would you characterize him? I don't know how he characterizes himself but -- yeah, you know, he's religious. I mean, he's a fundamentalist Christian.

So you know, in certain cases it can be enormously effective. I don't think there is a sweeping in every case we should be doing this and there's a way to negotiate it. So maybe a little micro response.

MS. MILLER(?): I think the other piece is to not let off the fact -- you know, after 20 years of doing prison work in this country, organizations that would be faith-based that worked under a common thread of human rights principles. So we should be careful about also understanding what we're talking about when we talk about different organizations and be clear about the content of that work. And then I would agree with Sarah in terms of strategy.

MR. KRISTOF: Joy?

MS. ZAREMBKA: I think, again, it's -- I don't know if I would break them up in that way. For me, I think it's really important that we're working with organizations that are interested in making sure the agency stays with the actual trafficked individual. I'm often struck by the fact that some organizations take somebody out of a situation where they're trafficked, where they had no control over their food, their clothing, their shelter, what they did with their lives. And then they go to agencies who again take away their agency by then telling them what they can wear, what they can eat, how they need to operate.

So I think -- right. How frequently they might have to pray. You know, that sort of -- perhaps that element might be part of it. And I think that's -- the real concern is, again, going back to are we coming at this from a similar point of view? And I think interestingly, though, we're being forced -- whether it's strategically right or not for different groups to be working together, the funding is now forcing everybody to come together. (There are ?) task force. Money now in the United States has been given out in terms of task force. It's going to law enforcement. It's going to faith-based organizations. And if you're interested in being part of it, you have to show up at the table and work collectively.

And to answer the earlier question, I think it is good that law enforcement and NGOs are talking a lot more -- somewhat strange bedfellows for some folks, but it's really important if we're going to figure out how to identify people and get them out of trafficked spaces. But it's actually a sort of a forced situation that we're dealing with at this point.

Q (Off mike.) My question is for Alice, and it's a broad question. And that is how useful is the trafficking way of looking at things for actually solving the problems? At -- (off mike) -- we're organized around exploitation of labor, commercial sexual exploitation, exploitation by military, and exploitation of refugees and -- (off mike) -- peoples. And in each of those spheres, for every bit of exploitation (that's trans-border ?), there are a dozen (U.S. domestic ?) -- (word inaudible).

So in fact, the trafficking is a consequence of these forms of exploitation rather than a driver and how we're managing -- (off mike). And the big problems are interstate in each of these spheres -- not to say that being trafficked is a high-class problem, but there's a lot more focus. And yet, the causes are different and the solutions are different, which is really important -- (off mike) -- in our looking at it. How you deal with military exploitation and trafficking and how you deal with labor exploitation and trafficking and how you deal with sex -- each are different things, different ministries, different international agencies, different U.N. agencies, and so on. So then come back -- is the trafficking (paradox ?), you know, part of the solution or part of the problem?

MR. KRISTOF: So is interstate trafficking really part of the solution or part of the problem?

MS. MILLER(?): Well, except the re-framing, but the bigger question -- a point of information -- law point. By both U.S. law and the U.N. law, the trafficking cover situations that are not cross-border movements -- under U.S. law, if you meet the standard of the recruitment by duplicity or with coercion into a situation where -- of servitude, peonage, et cetera, it falls as trafficking.

So it is -- you don't need cross-border movement per se.

The focus on movement -- and I'll expand from the law part -- the focus on movement comes from our kind of historical association of trafficking of being -- of coming out of what was often termed the white slavery scare, the movement of women into prostitution across borders. The legal definition of trafficking doesn't require that, but we're left with that legacy of storytelling. And to a large extent, that legacy of storytelling is part of what you hear us responding to today.

So we have a story that was told that got attention and money, but it got attention and money to policies and with programs that are not always, as you say, effective responses to either the root causes of the harm or to the specific problems we see people present with. So we have that terrible kind of paradox of being careful what you wish for when something that many of us spent 15 years trying to put on the agenda gets put on the agenda. And I think it is fair to say the rhetoric of trafficking is far more pervasive than actual work against exploitation.

In the U.S., because the TVPRA is an actual law with the capacity to give specific benefits, if you can walk a person, as Joy often does, through the door as a traffic victim, then it has some utility as a legal project. The question is whether the analysis, including the historical legacy that keeps trailing over everyone's account of it, is useful to us in understanding the problems of uneven development, irrational immigration and worker policies, and unprotected labor spheres in which young people work. I think the answer is often no, but we have to walk through the language of trafficking to open up attention and hopefully get better responses.

It's a frustrating moment, because many of us worked so hard to get attention to this thing that we called trafficking. But I would be interested in hearing the specific programming that you think works, because those are the kinds of good models that were also earlier today being discussed, because they end exploitation in the short and the long term.

MR. KRISTOF: Let me actually follow that up. In terms of good models, I would like to, you know, look at some lessons we can learn or some specific kinds of things that can be done, whether in public health or in security issues. I mean, for example, in the public health field, what a number of countries have done is regardless of whether they legalize, they in effect regulate. And they have some kind of regular system where prostitutes of all kinds, whether they're trafficked or not, get some kind of examination for STI, for HIV. So they try to drive down the public health problems of HIV. Are those -- is that approach useful? Or, I mean, another way of putting it is if you got -- if you inherited, you know, a billion dollars tomorrow and wanted to make a big difference on these kinds of issues, then where would you invest that money? What kinds of specific interventions would you engage in?

MS. MENDELSON: You know, a lot of work that I've done -- not specifically on trafficking but on human rights in Russia -- we spent an enormous amount of time surveying -- public opinion surveys, random samples, large random sample surveys. How do Russians feel about X -- democracy, authoritarianism, Stalin, the war in Chechnya. It has been very difficult to get funds to do surveys of young females or young males around these issues. But if you're going to program money, you need to have a better sense -- and empirical sense -- of what kind of gender-based discrimination, harassment, abuse they've experienced. And then you use it in programming, whether it's public service announcements or whatever. There's this really sinister thing that goes on where -- you know, the health field knows how to do strategic communication. But oftentimes -- and I see it in HIV work and in trafficking -- we do it on the cheap. We develop messages that come out of our heads, but have nothing to do with surveys, have nothing to do with public opinion. So on that --

On the lessons learned on the peacekeeping front, I'm very -- I mean, the good news is in 2000 when I went to NATO with a group from the council and raised this issue in every meeting and was then labeled the, you know, feminist in the group -- everybody rolled their eyes, you know, both in our group but also senior military -- senior -- senior military snickered "boys will be boys." And literally four years later, there was a policy. So if you push, there is a response that can happen, but it needs to be sustained and it needs to go on.

In terms of very concrete what's gone on, it hasn't happened yet.

MR. KRISTOF: We're short on time so you're going to have to solve the problem pretty quickly.

MS. MILLER(?): I think I would look to Brazil, which had a health and human rights approach to its AIDS epidemic and dealt both with the prevention side about being realistic and real about sexual reproductive health and rights, organizing from the ground up, and from the treatment access side -- and we can talk more about what that means in terms of generic drugs and access for poor people.

And then quickly, in terms of regulation. Data is extraordinarily bad, but most of those systems are, in fact, abusive in two ways, one of which is health information is known about a person who is a registered sex worker, but he or she does not control the information. It is accessible to others, and that model is not on voluntary counseling and testing but coercion, which in general we know is a failure as a model.

There's some indications that this sort -- so that the commercial regulation is generally a tool of abuse and almost never a doorway into effective health education and health services. I'm actually going to Senegal in about a week to look at what is often touted as the best version of this system. I've seen dueling reports, but in general I think right now it's a failed system. So the short answer is commercial -- the regulation by the government as far as impacts on people's health and rights -- probably not good -- may or may be actively bad.

MS. ZAREMBKA(?): While I didn't want to be ambassador, I'll be a billionaire -- (laughter) -- for just a moment and I'm going to give a very ethnocentric answer about changes that could be made in the U.S. I think, you know, everything else should happen. But interestingly here, I mean, we still are not getting the public awareness and the training out there about this issue. I mean, when I tell people what I do, you know, people are still at this point, you know surprised that this sort of thing is happening, you know, in the land of the free, that folks are actually being enslaved.

So I think I would actually put quite a bit of money into not only training the general public but also law enforcement -- in particular, FBI and immigration, who are now, you know, tasked with doing this work but don't yet quite have a grasp of the issue.

MR. KRISTOF: Presumably, you would also give a large share of that one billion to Break the Chain.

MS. ZAREMBKA(?): Yes, yes. (Laughter.)

MR. KRISTOF: I'm afraid that our time is up. We will have maybe informally a chance to raise some of these, and some of the larger issues can be raised in the next session for those of you who are staying.

I've been asked to in turn ask everybody to move directly on to the lunchroom as there is an event upstairs and we don't want to lose people in either direction.

And finally, please join me in giving the panel a great hand.

(Applause.) CFR-TRAFFICKING-II PAGE 32 05/04/2003 .STX

LOAD-DATE: May 5, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: International News

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2006 The Federal News Service, Inc.

423 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Federal News Service

May 1, 2006 MondayNEWS CONFERENCE WITH REPRESENTATIVE CHRIS SMITH (R-NJ)*SUBJECT: EXPLOITED WOMEN IN THE SEX TRADE*LOCATION: CANNON HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING, WASHINGTON, D.C.*SECTION: PRESS CONFERENCE OR SPEECHLENGTH: 649 words

REP. SMITH: Thank you. And first of all, I want to thank you for coming out for this press conference on a very, very profoundly disturbing issue.

I want Michael Horowitz and Lisa for inviting me to be here to say a couple of words on an issue that we have worked jointly on for many, many years, but there's a very ominous undertaking about to take place in Germany. The World Cup, as you know, will begin on June 9th. It will last to about July 9th. It involves about 12 venues where various soccer teams from around the world will be playing, and the sad and disturbing news is that the German government currently is facilitating prostitution and we believe what will be a very significant influx of trafficked women who will be exploited. They will be treated as commodities; they will be raped as a direct result of their having been trafficked into Germany for the World Cup event.

By way of background, I chair the Human Rights Committee as well -- in the Congress as well as co-chairing the Commission on the Security and Cooperation in Europe. As the co-chair of the Helsinki Commission, as it's known, I have met frequently with friends who are members of the German bundestag to express my outrage and our outrage collectively as a Congress over this problem.

In January, at the OSCE parliamentary assembly in Belgium, I raised on three separate occasions during this parliamentary assembly with our Germany counterparts the fact that this is an outrage, that they will be remembered in Germany more for what happened off the field, rather than that which happened on the field.

And we ask them to go back, to raise it with their government. And there is still time for the Merkel government, and we believe -- you know, this is a policy that she inherited. It's not a policy that she has to embrace. We hope that she will step up for women who are about to be exploited and in very huge numbers.

There are many estimates as to how many women will be exploited. Probably the commonly accepted number is that about 40,000 women will be trafficked, mostly from Eastern and Central Europe, from the Ukraine, from the former Soviet Union, and that is an outrage beyond -- beyond compare.

Let me also say that, as I think you know, the Trafficking Victims Protection Act requires that every year the United States government tier -- that is, to say put countries around the world, after a thorough analysis of how well or poorly they are doing with regards with trafficking -- are they preventing it? Are they providing protection for the women who are trafficked? Are they prosecuting the traffickers? Well, I happen to believe that unless there is a change by the German government, that they need to be ranked as a Tier 3 country, an egregious violator of human trafficking because of this next step that they're taking, this quantum leap in providing venues, building houses of prostitutions -- which is what they're doing with state funds and with local funds -- and then providing official state sanctions for what will be a very serious trafficking problem.

You know, about -- of the 400,000 prostitutes -- because it is legal in Germany -- the estimates are about 75 percent of those who are degraded in these houses of prostitution are foreigners, are people who are brought in from Central Europe, who are brought in from the Ukraine, and, like I said, and from places like Moldova or other countries in that area.

That is an outrage. We know beyond any reasonable doubt that so many of these women are coerced by -- and they are there because of forced fraud or, like I say, coercion. So we're calling on the German government to reverse course. There is still time. Otherwise, this will be a blight, a very serious blight on the German government, and I and others will be pushing hard that they be regarded as Tier 3, egregious violators.

Thank you. (Applause.)

LOAD-DATE: May 2, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: International News

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2006 The Federal News Service, Inc.

424 of 445 DOCUMENTS

FDCH Political Transcripts

May 1, 2006 Monday

U.S. REPRESENTATIVE CHRIS SMITH (R-NJ) DELIVERS REMARKS ON HUMAN TRAFFICKING

LENGTH: 670 wordsSPEAKER:

U.S. REPRESENTATIVE CHRIS SMITH (R-NJ)

LOCATION: WASHINGTON, D.C.

REPRESENTATIVE SMITH DELIVERS REMARKS ON HUMAN TRAFFICKING

MAY 1, 2006

SPEAKER: U.S. REPRESENTATIVE CHRISTOPHER SMITH (R-NJ)

SMITH: First of all, I want to thank you for coming out for this press conference on a very, very profoundly disturbing issue.

I want to thank Michael Horowitz and Lisa for inviting me to be here to say a couple of words on an issue that we have worked jointly on for many, many years.

But there's a very ominous undertaking about to take place in Germany.

The World Cup, as you know, will begin on June 9; will last to about July 9. It involves about 12 venues where various soccer teams from around the world will be playing.

And the sad and disturbing news is that the German government currently is facilitating prostitution and, we believe, what will be a very significant influx of trafficked women who will be exploited. They will be treated as commodities. They will be raped as a direct result of their having been trafficked into Germany for the World Cup event.

By way of background, I chair the Human Rights Committee in the Congress, as well as co-chairing the Commission on the Security and Cooperation in Europe.

As a co-chair of the Helsinki Commission, as it's known, I have met frequently with friends who are members of the German Bundestag to express my outrage and our outrage collectively as a Congress over this problem.

In January, at the OSCE Parliamentary Assembly in Belgium, I raised on three separate occasions during this Parliamentary Assembly with our German counterparts the fact that this is an outrage; that they will be remembered in Germany more for what happened off the field rather than that which happened on the field.

And we asked them to go back, to raise it with their government. And there is still time for the Merkel government. And we believe this is a policy that she inherited; it's not a policy that she has to embrace.

We hope that she will step up for women who are about to be exploited, and in very huge numbers. There are many estimates as to how many women will be exploited. Probably the commonly accepted number is about 40,000 women will be trafficked, mostly from Eastern and Central Europe, from the Ukraine, from the former Soviet Union. And that is an outrage beyond compare.

SMITH: Let me also say that, as I think you know, the Trafficking Victims Protection Act requires that every year the United States government tier -- that is to say, put countries around the world, after a thorough analysis of how well or poorly they're doing with regard to trafficking -- are they preventing it, are they providing protection for the women who are trafficked, are they prosecuting the traffickers?

Well, I happen to believe that unless there is a change by the German government, that they need to be ranked as a tier three country, an egregious violator of human trafficking, because of this next step that they're taking, this quantum leap in providing venues, building houses of prostitution, which is what they're doing with state funds and with local funds, and then providing official state sanction for what will be a very serious trafficking problem.

You know, of the 400,000 prostitutes -- because it is legal in Germany -- the estimates are about 75 percent of those who are degraded in these houses of prostitution are foreigners, are people who are brought in from Central Europe, who are brought in from the Ukraine, like I said, and from places like Moldova or other countries in that area.

That is an outrage. We know beyond any reasonable doubt that so many of these women are coerced and they are there because of force, fraud or, like I say, coercion.

So we're calling on the German government to reverse course. There is still time. Otherwise, this will be a blight -- a very serious blight on the German government. And I and others will be pushing hard that they be regarded as tier three egregious violators.

Thank you.

(APPLAUSE)

END

LOAD-DATE: May 1, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

TYPE: NEWS EVENT

NOTES:

[????] - Indicates Speaker Unknown

[-] - Indicates could not make out what was being said.[off mike] - Indicates could not make out what was being said.

425 of 445 DOCUMENTS

CQ Congressional Testimony

March 29, 2006 Wednesday

HUMAN RIGHTS IN VIETNAM

SECTION: CAPITOL HILL HEARING TESTIMONYLENGTH: 1718 words

Statement of Nguyen Dinh Thang, Ph.D. Executive Director, Boat People SOS, Inc.

Committee on House International Relations Subcommittee on Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations

March 29, 2006

Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee,

The next eight months present a rare window of opportunity to truly influence Vietnam's policies towards religious freedom, human rights, and human trafficking.

Vietnam hopes to achieve permanent Normal Trade Relations status this Summer and enter the World Trade Organization by the end of the year. The Vietnamese government is preparing to welcome world leaders, including President Bush, to the APEC summit in Ha Noi this November. It is in Vietnam's interest to convince the international community that it is a country in transition to a more open society. In that context, the Vietnamese government has become more sensitive to the Country of Particular Concern (CPC) designation by the U.S. Department of State.

Last year Prime Minister issued Directive on Protestantism and instructions on the implementation of the Ordinance on Religion and Belief. To avoid sanctions, Vietnam has signed on to a roadmap to improve religious freedom.

These changes, while promising, have had little real effect on the ground. So far only three of some 4,500 Christian house churches have been approved for conducting religious activities. Many house churches, such as the General Baptist Church, the Fellowship Baptist Church and the Southern Baptist Church in Saigon and many more in other provinces have not been allowed to even register. The authorities told them that they would review applications only on an informal basis and would notify when time comes for formal submission. Months have passed and there has been no word from these authorities.

I would like to note that registering religious activities is not the same as legal recognition as a religious institution. Not a single house church has received legal recognition. It appears that the Vietnamese government conducts a two-pronged policy. The central government promises changes to appease the concerns of the international community, particularly the U.S. At the same time provincial and local officials use administrative maneuvers to harass people of faith, persecute religious leaders, and block religious activities. In fact the Ordinance on Religion and Belief gives these authorities full discretion to authorize religious activities or recognize a religious institution, making it much harder for the international community to monitor the situation in Vietnam.

We have noted a significant increase in violations of religious freedom after Prime Minister Phan Van Khai's visit to the U.S. last June. Following is an illustrative sample.

(1) July 2005, the government of Son Tay Village, Quang Ngai Province, pulled down the houses of ten Protestant families, declaring that Son Tay was a "clean village" untainted by a foreign religion.

(2) August 2005, the government of Son Thuong Village, Quang Ngai Province, declared that their community did not tolerate Protestants and burned the home of Dinh Van Hoan, a member of the General Association of Vietnamese Evangelical Churches-South, because he did not renounce his faith.

(3) September 2005, seven Hmong Protestants in Chi Ca Village, Ha Giang Province were tortured with electric rods for "following the American religion." Three of them were mortally wounded.

(4) October 2005, Ma Seo Sung, an evangelical group leader in Lao Cai Province, was beaten six times in a day because he refused to admit that Protestantism was "an illegal faith."

(5) November 2005, two female members of the Mennonite Church in Central Highland were detained for seven days. They were repeatedly beaten and tortured.

(6) December 2005, the people's committee of Xin Man and Quang Binh Districts of Ha Giang Province detained a dozen Christians appointed as group leaders by the Evangelical Church of Vietnam- North. The authorities used fabricated letters denouncing them as impostors in the name of their Church.

(7) January 2006, prior to a visit to Kontum by a delegation of the American Embassy, A Ngai and his fellow members of the Mennonite Church were chased into the woods. The U.S. delegation was reportedly led to meet a person who pretended to A Ngai.

(8) February 2006, the Presbyterian Church in Darlak Province applied for official recognition. The provincial government denied the application on the ground that it had not received the order from the central government. The authorities ordered Pastor Nguyen Van Dan to take down the cross they displayed in front of his house and stop all prayer services.

(9) March 2006, the public security police, People's Committee officials, and the militia surrounded the home of Ms. Hoang Thi Le, where 30 members of the Emmanuel Christian Church were holding their Sunday prayer. Ms. Le was told that her house would be burned down if she continued to allow prayer service at her home.

The Hoa Hao Buddhist Church is no less persecuted. On August 5, 2005 Monk Vo Van Thanh Liem was arrested in front of his Quang Minh Tu Buddhist Temple in An Giang Province. On Sept 14, 2005, in a closed court, he was sentenced to seven years in prison convicted of the charge "opposing public Authorities." He had submitted a written statement to the hearing held by this Committee in June of last year. Mr. Bui Thien Hue, a Hoa Hao Buddhist who also submitted his written testimony at last year's hearing, is currently under house arrest. On February 18, 2006, plain-clothed police of Can Tho Province beat up Truong Van Thuc and his brother and then dumped them into the river. Three weeks ago Thuc was sentenced to house arrest for the reports he had written concerning violations of human rights and religious freedom. On February 16, Venerable Thich Quang Do, Deputy Head of the Unified Buddhist Church of Vietnam (UBCV), and 11 UBCV monks were assaulted and detained for six hours as they boarded the train to visit their Patriarch Thich Huyen Quang, who remained in detention in Binh Dinh Province. Two weeks ago the public security police expelled Buddhist nun Thich Nu Thong Man from her own pagoda in Khanh Hoa Province. The expulsion order cited "wrongful acts by being a member of the Unified Buddhist Church, in violation of the [State-sponsored] Vietnam Buddhist Sangha's Charter and the laws of the Socialist Republic of Vietnam". With religious persecution still widespread, I am concerned that many victims do not have full and prompt access to U.S. refugee programs. While I am encouraged that the relatives of Father Nguyen Van Ly have made it to the U.S. under the Priority One Refugee Program, it is troubling that they are the only ones, with only one exception, who have left Vietnam under this program in the past 12 years.

I am also concerned that those victims who have successfully escaped to neighboring countries are not receiving due protection by the office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. I am aware of a dozen cases with very compelling claims that have been denied refugee status. I am also aware of many recognized refugee cases in Thailand, Cambodia, and Indonesia that UNHCR has not referred for resettlement for years.

A major source of trafficking in persons, Vietnam each year exports tens of thousand men, women and children to sweatshops and the sex industry in Cambodia, China, Hong Kong, Ma Cau, Taiwan, Malaysia, Japan, and the Czech Republic. Vietnam has refused to pay $3.5 million in damages to 321 victims in the Daewoosa American Samoa case as ruled by the High Court of American Samoa.

Last December I spent more than a week in Taiwan to meet with many trafficked victims. Taiwan currently has one hundred thousand contract workers from Vietnam. Twenty thousand of them had escaped their employers. In late 2004 Vietnam sent bounty hunters to Taiwan to round up escapees. By October 2004 some 500 escapees were captured. They were forced to work to pay off their debt to the brokers before repatriation. A number of female workers were raped by their brokers. Dropped from Tier 1 to Tier 2 in last year's Trafficking In Person's annual report, Taiwan has introduced several measures to combat trafficking. In response, Vietnam has shifted to South Korea as destination for its contract workers.

The situation in Malaysia is even worse. By late 2005 an estimate 80,000 Vietnamese workers were laboring in Malaysia. Malaysian brokers have total control over these workers, keeping their documents and regularly "re-selling" them to higher bidders. Some of these brokers are mafia bosses. Since I was not issued a visa to join you in Vietnam late last year, I spent time in Kuala Lumpur to meet with many trafficked workers. Many were not paid for their work. Others were not allowed to return to Vietnam until they paid off their debt to the brokers. Actually I talked to a group of workers who attempted to escape back to Vietnam through Cambodia as their travel documents had been confiscated. Some female contract workers were lured into prostitution.

Considering the gravity of the problem, I believe that Vietnam belongs squarely in Tier 3. There is still hope if our government takes full advantage of the present window of opportunity to push for real improvements. I offer the following recommendations:

- (1) Use test cases as benchmarks of real progress: We will provide the State Department the list of house churches that have applied for recognition or registered their activities without success and the list of refugee cases not allowed access to U.S. interviews or not issued exit visa.
- (2) Engage and fund the independent churches to conduct human services, including HIV/AIDS prevention and re-integration of repatriated trafficking victims.
- (3) Organize a series of conferences in Vietnam on human rights, civil society, human trafficking, and religious freedom during President Bush's visit to Vietnam.

I commend you for holding this hearing. It will send a strong message to the Vietnamese communist leaders as they prepare for their Congress, to be held in three weeks, to choose new leaders and set national policies for the next five years.

LOAD-DATE: March 29, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

COMMITTEE: HOUSE INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

SUBCOMMITTEE: AFRICA

TESTIMONY-BY: NGUYEN DINH THANG, PH.D., EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

AFFILIATION: BOAT PEOPLE SOS, INC.

426 of 445 DOCUMENTS

CQ Congressional Testimony

March 29, 2006 Wednesday

HUMAN RIGHTS IN VIETNAM

SECTION: CAPITOL HILL HEARING TESTIMONYLENGTH: 1717 words

Statement of Nguyen Dinh Thang Executive Director, Boat People SOS, Inc.

Committee on House International Relations Subcommittee on Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations

March 29, 2006

Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee,

The next eight months present a rare window of opportunity to truly influence Vietnam's policies towards religious freedom, human rights, and human trafficking.

Vietnam hopes to achieve permanent Normal Trade Relations status this Summer and enter the World Trade Organization by the end of the year. The Vietnamese government is preparing to welcome world leaders, including President Bush, to the APEC summit in Ha Noi this November. It is in Vietnam's interest to convince the international community that it is a country in transition to a more open society. In that context, the Vietnamese government has become more sensitive to the Country of Particular Concern (CPC) designation by the U.S. Department of State.

Last year Prime Minister issued Directive on Protestantism and instructions on the implementation of the Ordinance on Religion and Belief. To avoid sanctions, Vietnam has signed on to a roadmap to improve religious freedom.

These changes, while promising, have had little real effect on the ground. So far only three of some 4,500 Christian house churches have been approved for conducting religious activities. Many house churches, such as the General Baptist Church, the Fellowship Baptist Church and the Southern Baptist Church in Saigon and many more in other provinces have not been allowed to even register. The authorities told them that they would review applications only on an informal basis and would notify when time comes for formal submission. Months have passed and there has been no word from these authorities.

I would like to note that registering religious activities is not the same as legal recognition as a religious institution. Not a single house church has received legal recognition. It appears that the Vietnamese government conducts a two-pronged policy. The central government promises changes to appease the concerns of the international community, particularly the U.S. At the same time provincial and local officials use administrative maneuvers to harass people of faith, persecute religious leaders, and block religious activities. In fact the Ordinance on Religion and Belief gives these authorities full discretion to authorize religious activities or recognize a religious institution, making it much harder for the international community to monitor the situation in Vietnam.

We have noted a significant increase in violations of religious freedom after Prime Minister Phan Van Khai's visit to the U.S. last June. Following is an illustrative sample.

(1) July 2005, the government of Son Tay Village, Quang Ngai Province, pulled down the houses of ten Protestant families, declaring that Son Tay was a "clean village" untainted by a foreign religion.

(2) August 2005, the government of Son Thuong Village, Quang Ngai Province, declared that their community did not tolerate Protestants and burned the home of Dinh Van Hoan, a member of the General Association of Vietnamese Evangelical Churches-South, because he did not renounce his faith.

(3) September 2005, seven Hmong Protestants in Chi Ca Village, Ha Giang Province were tortured with electric rods for "following the American religion." Three of them were mortally wounded.

(4) October 2005, Ma Seo Sung, an evangelical group leader in Lao Cai Province, was beaten six times in a day because he refused to admit that Protestantism was "an illegal faith."

(5) November 2005, two female members of the Mennonite Church in Central Highland were detained for seven days. They were repeatedly beaten and tortured.

(6) December 2005, the people's committee of Xin Man and Quang Binh Districts of Ha Giang Province detained a dozen Christians appointed as group leaders by the Evangelical Church of Vietnam- North. The authorities used fabricated letters denouncing them as impostors in the name of their Church.

(7) January 2006, prior to a visit to Kontum by a delegation of the American Embassy, A Ngai and his fellow members of the Mennonite Church were chased into the woods. The U.S. delegation was reportedly led to meet a person who pretended to A Ngai.

(8) February 2006, the Presbyterian Church in Darlak Province applied for official recognition. The provincial government denied the application on the ground that it had not received the order from the central government. The authorities ordered Pastor Nguyen Van Dan to take down the cross they displayed in front of his house and stop all prayer services.

(9) March 2006, the public security police, People's Committee officials, and the militia surrounded the home of Ms. Hoang Thi Le, where 30 members of the Emmanuel Christian Church were holding their Sunday prayer. Ms. Le was told that her house would be burned down if she continued to allow prayer service at her home.

The Hoa Hao Buddhist Church is no less persecuted. On August 5, 2005 Monk Vo Van Thanh Liem was arrested in front of his Quang Minh Tu Buddhist Temple in An Giang Province. On Sept 14, 2005, in a closed court, he was sentenced to seven years in prison convicted of the charge "opposing public Authorities." He had submitted a written statement to the hearing held by this Committee in June of last year. Mr. Bui Thien Hue, a Hoa Hao Buddhist who also submitted his written testimony at last year's hearing, is currently under house arrest. On February 18, 2006, plain-clothed police of Can Tho Province beat up Truong Van Thuc and his brother and then dumped them into the river. Three weeks ago Thuc was sentenced to house arrest for the reports he had written concerning violations of human rights and religious freedom. On February 16, Venerable Thich Quang Do, Deputy Head of the Unified Buddhist Church of Vietnam (UBCV), and 11 UBCV monks were assaulted and detained for six hours as they boarded the train to visit their Patriarch Thich Huyen Quang, who remained in detention in Binh Dinh Province. Two weeks ago the public security police expelled Buddhist nun Thich Nu Thong Man from her own pagoda in Khanh Hoa Province. The expulsion order cited "wrongful acts by being a member of the Unified Buddhist Church, in violation of the [State-sponsored] Vietnam Buddhist Sangha's Charter and the laws of the Socialist Republic of Vietnam". With religious persecution still widespread, I am concerned that many victims do not have full and prompt access to U.S. refugee programs. While I am encouraged that the relatives of Father Nguyen Van Ly have made it to the U.S. under the Priority One Refugee Program, it is troubling that they are the only ones, with only one exception, who have left Vietnam under this program in the past 12 years.

I am also concerned that those victims who have successfully escaped to neighboring countries are not receiving due protection by the office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. I am aware of a dozen cases with very compelling claims that have been denied refugee status. I am also aware of many recognized refugee cases in Thailand, Cambodia, and Indonesia that UNHCR has not referred for resettlement for years.

A major source of trafficking in persons, Vietnam each year exports tens of thousand men, women and children to sweatshops and the sex industry in Cambodia, China, Hong Kong, Ma Cau, Taiwan, Malaysia, Japan, and the Czech Republic. Vietnam has refused to pay $3.5 million in damages to 321 victims in the Daewoosa American Samoa case as ruled by the High Court of American Samoa.

Last December I spent more than a week in Taiwan to meet with many trafficked victims. Taiwan currently has one hundred thousand contract workers from Vietnam. Twenty thousand of them had escaped their employers. In late 2004 Vietnam sent bounty hunters to Taiwan to round up escapees. By October 2004 some 500 escapees were captured. They were forced to work to pay off their debt to the brokers before repatriation. A number of female workers were raped by their brokers. Dropped from Tier 1 to Tier 2 in last year's Trafficking In Person's annual report, Taiwan has introduced several measures to combat trafficking. In response, Vietnam has shifted to South Korea as destination for its contract workers.

The situation in Malaysia is even worse. By late 2005 an estimate 80,000 Vietnamese workers were laboring in Malaysia. Malaysian brokers have total control over these workers, keeping their documents and regularly "re-selling" them to higher bidders. Some of these brokers are mafia bosses. Since I was not issued a visa to join you in Vietnam late last year, I spent time in Kuala Lumpur to meet with many trafficked workers. Many were not paid for their work. Others were not allowed to return to Vietnam until they paid off their debt to the brokers. Actually I talked to a group of workers who attempted to escape back to Vietnam through Cambodia as their travel documents had been confiscated. Some female contract workers were lured into prostitution.

Considering the gravity of the problem, I believe that Vietnam belongs squarely in Tier 3. There is still hope if our government takes full advantage of the present window of opportunity to push for real improvements. I offer the following recommendations:

- (1) Use test cases as benchmarks of real progress: We will provide the State Department the list of house churches that have applied for recognition or registered their activities without success and the list of refugee cases not allowed access to U.S. interviews or not issued exit visa.
- (2) Engage and fund the independent churches to conduct human services, including HIV/AIDS prevention and re-integration of repatriated trafficking victims.
- (3) Organize a series of conferences in Vietnam on human rights, civil society, human trafficking, and religious freedom during President Bush's visit to Vietnam.

I commend you for holding this hearing. It will send a strong message to the Vietnamese communist leaders as they prepare for their Congress, to be held in three weeks, to choose new leaders and set national policies for the next five years.

LOAD-DATE: April 4, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

COMMITTEE: HOUSE INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

SUBCOMMITTEE: AFRICA

TESTIMONY-BY: NGUYEN DINH THANG, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

AFFILIATION: BOAT PEOPLE SOS, INC.

427 of 445 DOCUMENTS

University Wire

March 29, 2006 Wednesday

Baylor U. professors push for laws to abolish human slavery

BYLINE: By Kelly Knox, The Lariat; SOURCE: Baylor U.

LENGTH: 1033 words

DATELINE: WACO, Texas

It's a crime you might never have known existed. It's stealthy, not easily recognizable to the untrained eye and for the most part, silent. It's human trafficking, and it's being called present-day slavery.

The International Organization for Migration defines human trafficking as the as an illegal violation of international laws and human rights. It is the fastest-growing criminal industry in the world today, according to the Lutheran Immigration and Refugee Service.

Trafficking victims are routinely taunted, beaten, raped and broken, said Amy Jackson, a task supervisor in the School of Social Work. The Baylor University alumna spent her internship working with the Abolition of Sexual Trafficking at the Salvation Army National Headquarters in Washington, D.C.

"As a Christian community, Baylor should support research in the area of human trafficking, support internships dealing with trafficked populations and support nongovernmental organizations that are proactively working against trafficking," Jackson said.

She also said she sees an implication for social work practice within the multifaceted issue of human trafficking.

"We need to acknowledge the problem, bring awareness to the community, change our views about the objectification of women and take stands against pornography and the legalization of prostitution which lead to and worsen the problem of trafficking," she said.

Trafficking occurs when criminals, often members of crime networks, transport victims within their own countries or across international borders. Victims are robbed of basic rights, including liberty, personal security and privacy. They're then sold as commerce.

While in Washington, Jackson provided advocacy for victims of sexual trafficking and participated in an outreach program for prostitutes.

"Since I was 14 years old, I have felt called to women who suffer from some sort of oppression," Jackson said. "As I learned more about oppression and injustice, my heart grew for women involved in sex trafficking. I just went where I saw a need."

While there, she also conducted a master's level research project on sexual trafficking.

Jackson's efforts were rewarded in 2005 with the reauthorization of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act. The act, which amends the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000, strengthens tools law enforcement officers use to prosecute traffickers and enhances assistance to victims.

Jackson said the Trafficking in Persons Report offers a three-tiered system for cataloging the ways in which countries respond to human trafficking. Countries that neither satisfy the minimum standards nor demonstrate a compliance toward ending human trafficking receive Tier 3 status. These countries, such as Jamaica, Cambodia and Sudan, are subject to nonhumanitarian and nontrade sanctions.

Tier 2 countries, such as Mexico, India and the Dominican Republic, are assigned to a watch list because of a significant number of victims. Countries within this ranking often fail to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking.

Countries that fully comply with the act's standards for the elimination of trafficking are assigned to Tier 1 status.

Rife in many countries, human trafficking is a problem that isn't going away.

The CIA estimates 50,000 people are trafficked annually into the United States as sex slaves and laborers. John Miller, U.S. State Department's director of the Office to Monitor and Combat Human Trafficking in Persons, said 17,000 individuals are trafficked into the United States from Mexico each year.

A study by the 2004 Trafficking in Persons Report suggests 600,000 to 800,000 people are trafficked annually across international borders. Among these, 70 percent are female and 50 percent are children.

Victims often are shipped to remote locations. At the same time, they are ferried into places much closer to home.

"The United States offers help to those in need as they try to seek asylum in our country. At the same time, we're sending tourists over to those countries, and these are so often men from the West who use these children," Yancey said. "We have no systems in place which regulate tourism. So my question is, 'Are we saying and doing things that aren't consistent?'"

Vicki Northern, director of recruitment and career services in the School of Social Work, traveled to Moldova with several colleagues last fall. Moldova is a leading country in the number of human trafficking offenses reported each year. While there, Northern and her colleagues provided aid to victims.

Northern said Moldova is overwhelmingly the poorest nation in Europe, and many citizens are forced into trafficking as a way to make ends meet. Northern explained that people are tricked into the sex trafficking trade by means of fraud.

"Sometimes women answer ads that promise jobs in other countries, such as being a nanny or working in a department store," Northern said. "But they're then trafficked as prostitutes."

Northern said there's a difference between blatant prostitution and sexual slavery; however, she questioned to what extent the difference matters.

"How can we tell them it's wrong when this is the way in which they are able to provide for their families?" Northern asked. "We don't know how many are choosing prostitution. Whether they're selling their bodies willingly or they're caught in the cycle of human trafficking, how can we tell them it's wrong?"

Jacksonville senior Sorana Ban had a different opinion as to how women become entrenched within the trafficking system.

Ban, who moved to the U.S. from Romania four years ago, said, "Some are tricked into human trafficking because they think it's a door to the Western world. But just because you're in another country doesn't mean you have access to the opportunities available there."

She also added that many large families sometimes sell one or more of their children into trafficking out of sheer desperation and poverty.

"When I think of trafficking, I think of a large family with seven or more children. They sell one or more of their children of a couple of hundred dollars," Ban said. "To us, that's not a lot. To them, it's a fortune and a way to get by."

(C) 2006 The Lariat via U-WIRE

LOAD-DATE: March 29, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

428 of 445 DOCUMENTS

PR Newswire
Public Interest Services
 Delivering the most policy, issue & advocacy news
 U.S. Newswire

March 13, 2006 Monday 10:20 AM EST

Former Sudanese Slave to Lead Historic 300-Mile Walk to be Joined by Former NBA Star Manute Bol

SECTION: ASSIGNMENT AND METRO DESKS

LENGTH: 404 words

From March 15 to April 5, former Sudanese slave, Simon Deng will lead a walk from New York to Washington, D.C., to shed light on the genocide and modern-day slavery in Sudan, and call for U.S. government action to stop the violence and enslavement of black African Sudanese.

The 300-mile walk will begin Wednesday, March 15 at 1 p.m., at UN Dag Hammarskjold Plaza, (47th and 1st Ave.) where Deng will hold a press conference before commencing the walk. Former NBA player Manute Bol will join Deng in NYC. Bol, known for his advocacy on behalf of Sudan, is the second tallest player to appear in the NBA and holds the all-time NBA record for the most blocked shots per minute. Spanning five states, the walk will stop in 19 cities, including Philadelphia and Baltimore and will end in front of the Capitol on April 5.

The Sudan Campaign supports the following:

- That the U.S. Congress pass the Darfur Peace and Accountability Act without delay, provide $514 million in emergency funding called for by the President to support humanitarian and peacekeeping programs in Darfur, and adopt Senate Resolution 383 to strengthen the peacekeeping efforts;
- That President Bush appoint a new Special Envoy for Sudan, and the U.S. Government use all available means to increase pressure on the Government of Sudan until peace is secured throughout the country by implementing the provisions of the Sudan Peace Agreement;
- That the U.S. State Department reclassify the Government of Sudan as a Tier 3 Nation with regard to Human Trafficking (the worst classification possible) for its failure to make significant progress to eradicate slavery and that the U.S. establish an independent anti-slavery commission to monitor slavery and its eradication in Sudan.

At nine, Deng, a native of Southern Sudan was captured and sold to an Arab family in Northern Sudan. He was enslaved for over three years until he escaped. Now 44, Deng speaks on his difficult childhood and about the atrocities that continue to plague Sudan. One of the first 40 Sudanese to come to the U.S. on political asylum, Deng has emerged a national leader among the 250,000 Sudanese Refugees now living in the U.S.

<http://www.sudanfreedomwalk.org>

--

<http://www.usnewswire.com/>

Contact: Maria Sliwa of Freedom Now Communications (Local Media), 973-272-2861 or sliwanews@aol.com or Meryl Zegarek of MZ Public Relations, Inc. (National Media), 917-493-3601 or mz@mzpr.com

LOAD-DATE: March 14, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 PR Newswire Association LLC
All Rights Reserved

429 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

March 7, 2006 Tuesday

HUMAN TRAFFICKING A HUGE PROBLEM FOR CHINA, U.S. OFFICIALS SAY

BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 844 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. Department of State:

Human trafficking is a huge problem for China, both for Chinese seeking better lives overseas and for those within China, U.S. experts say.

"Chinese of both sexes migrate all over the world for low-skilled labor, and a significant number of these fall victim to involuntary servitude," or forced labor, according to Ambassador John R. Miller. "There are also reports of involuntary servitude among migrant workers moving internally within China in search of economic opportunities."

Miller is the director of the U.S. State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons and senior adviser on human trafficking to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. He spoke March 6 before the Congressional-Executive Commission on China, which monitors human rights and rule of law in China. Created by Congress in October 2000, the commission, composed of members of Congress and senior administration officials, submits an annual report to the president.

Miller called human trafficking "modern-day slavery" that uses kidnapping, fraud and psychological and physical abuse to force men, women and children into labor and sexual exploitation. Often linked to organized crime, human trafficking is a billion-dollar industry, according to estimates by the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI).

A 2002 United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) estimate says there are approximately 250,000 victims of trafficking inside China alone. Senator Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska and chairman of the commission, noted that many of the trafficking victims in China are North Korean refugees.

Steven Law, deputy secretary at the U.S. Department of Labor and a member of the commission, said that although human trafficking is a worldwide phenomenon, the problem in China has some unique characteristics.

"China is stepping forward to address a broad range of human rights and worker rights issues, and the U.S. Department of Labor has provided technical support and other assistance for these efforts," Law said. "Still, the interplay between forced marriage, one-child restrictions and rural-urban migration creates an atmosphere where human trafficking could explode unless proactive measures are taken now." The Labor Department has contributed $164 million since 1995 to anti-trafficking projects worldwide, he said.

Miller said China has made "limited progress" in addressing human trafficking. "Although the government has undertaken some efforts to investigate and prosecute trafficking-related crime, much more needs to be done," he said.

The State Department official urged a "victim-centered" approach that emphasizes prevention, protection and prosecution. Vulnerable people, especially women and children, he said, should be warned that promises of employment are often traps. Victims of trafficking should be provided protection via adequate shelter and care, and the traffickers should be prosecuted vigorously. "The traffickers function as long as they operate beyond the law and between systems of enforcement" from region to region, he said.

Hagel, in his opening remarks, said the commission is concerned that China fell from "Tier 2" to "Tier 2 Watch Status" in the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report for 2005 because of inadequate protection of trafficking victims. The U.S. law mandates the annual international survey, which ranks countries in three tiers: Tier 1 indicates that a nation is in compliance with international standards; Tier 3 denotes countries that are not. Tier 2 comprises countries that are demonstrating commitment to address their problems but have not yet achieved international standards; the Tier 2 "Watch List" consists of countries that might be vulnerable to an erosion of their efforts.

"The Chinese government must uphold international agreements and grant the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees unimpeded access to screen the refugee petitions of North Korean in China," he said.

Hagel said the Chinese government has not signed the U.N. Protocol to Prevent, Suppress, and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children.

Miller added that human trafficking affects human rights, public health and international security. The Bush administration is committed to ending the trade in human beings, he said.

"The Departments of State, Labor, Justice, Homeland Security, and Health and Human Services and the U.S. Agency for International Development are working together to combat this scourge both at home and abroad. Since 2001, we have contributed approximately $375 million toward anti-trafficking programs and we are seeing results," the State Department official said.

"This 21st century struggle for freedom," Miller said, "is one we can and must win everywhere in the world."

Testimony from the March 6 commission hearing is available on the Congressional-Executive Commission on China's Web site. The 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report is available on the State Department Web site.

For more on U.S. policy, see Human Trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: March 9, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

430 of 445 DOCUMENTS

State Department Documents and Publications

March 7, 2006

Human Trafficking a Huge Problem for China, U.S. Officials Say; Greater need for prevention, protection and prosecution

BYLINE: Jane Morse, Washington File Staff Writer

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 853 words

Washington -- Human trafficking is a huge problem for China, both for Chinese seeking better lives overseas and for those within China, U.S. experts say.

"Chinese of both sexes migrate all over the world for low-skilled labor, and a significant number of these fall victim to involuntary servitude," or forced labor, according to Ambassador John R. Miller. "There are also reports of involuntary servitude among migrant workers moving internally within China in search of economic opportunities."

Miller is the director of the U.S. State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons and senior adviser on human trafficking to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. He spoke March 6 before the Congressional-Executive Commission on China, which monitors human rights and rule of law in China. Created by Congress in October 2000, the commission, composed of members of Congress and senior administration officials, submits an annual report to the president.

Miller called human trafficking "modern-day slavery" that uses kidnapping, fraud and psychological and physical abuse to force men, women and children into labor and sexual exploitation. Often linked to organized crime, human trafficking is a billion-dollar industry, according to estimates by the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI).

A 2002 United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) estimate says there are approximately 250,000 victims of trafficking inside China alone. Senator Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska and chairman of the commission, noted that many of the trafficking victims in China are North Korean refugees.

Steven Law, deputy secretary at the U.S. Department of Labor and a member of the commission, said that although human trafficking is a worldwide phenomenon, the problem in China has some unique characteristics.

"China is stepping forward to address a broad range of human rights and worker rights issues, and the U.S. Department of Labor has provided technical support and other assistance for these efforts," Law said. "Still, the interplay between forced marriage, one-child restrictions and rural-urban migration creates an atmosphere where human trafficking could explode unless proactive measures are taken now." The Labor Department has contributed $164 million since 1995 to anti-trafficking projects worldwide, he said.

Miller said China has made "limited progress" in addressing human trafficking. "Although the government has undertaken some efforts to investigate and prosecute trafficking-related crime, much more needs to be done," he said.

The State Department official urged a "victim-centered" approach that emphasizes prevention, protection and prosecution. Vulnerable people, especially women and children, he said, should be warned that promises of employment are often traps. Victims of trafficking should be provided protection via adequate shelter and care, and the traffickers should be prosecuted vigorously. "The traffickers function as long as they operate beyond the law and between systems of enforcement" from region to region, he said.

Hagel, in his opening remarks, said the commission is concerned that China fell from "Tier 2" to "Tier 2 Watch Status" in the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report for 2005 because of inadequate protection of trafficking victims. The U.S. law mandates the annual international survey, which ranks countries in three tiers: Tier 1 indicates that a nation is in compliance with international standards; Tier 3 denotes countries that are not. Tier 2 comprises countries that are demonstrating commitment to address their problems but have not yet achieved international standards; the Tier 2 "Watch List" consists of countries that might be vulnerable to an erosion of their efforts.

"The Chinese government must uphold international agreements and grant the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees unimpeded access to screen the refugee petitions of North Korean in China," he said.

Hagel said the Chinese government has not signed the U.N. Protocol to Prevent, Suppress, and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children.

Miller added that human trafficking affects human rights, public health and international security. The Bush administration is committed to ending the trade in human beings, he said.

"The Departments of State, Labor, Justice, Homeland Security, and Health and Human Services and the U.S. Agency for International Development are working together to combat this scourge both at home and abroad. Since 2001, we have contributed approximately $375 million toward anti-trafficking programs and we are seeing results," the State Department official said.

"This 21st century struggle for freedom," Miller said, "is one we can and must win everywhere in the world."

Testimony from the March 6 commission hearing is available on the Congressional-Executive Commission on China's Web site. The 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report is available on the State Department Web site.

For more on U.S. policy, see Human Trafficking.

(The Washington File is a product of the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: March 8, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

431 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

March 7, 2006 Tuesday 7:54 PM EST

STATE DEPT.: HUMAN TRAFFICKING HUGE PROBLEM FOR CHINA, U.S. OFFICIALS SAY

BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 890 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's International Information Programs issued the following press release:

By Jane Morse

Washington File Staff Writer

Human trafficking is a huge problem for China, both for Chinese seeking better lives overseas and for those within China, U.S. experts say.

"Chinese of both sexes migrate all over the world for low-skilled labor, and a significant number of these fall victim to involuntary servitude," or forced labor, according to Ambassador John R. Miller. "There are also reports of involuntary servitude among migrant workers moving internally within China in search of economic opportunities."

Miller is the director of the U.S. State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons and senior adviser on human trafficking to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. He spoke March 6 before the Congressional-Executive Commission on China, which monitors human rights and rule of law in China. Created by Congress in October 2000, the commission, composed of members of Congress and senior administration officials, submits an annual report to the president.

Miller called human trafficking "modern-day slavery" that uses kidnapping, fraud and psychological and physical abuse to force men, women and children into labor and sexual exploitation. Often linked to organized crime, human trafficking is a billion-dollar industry, according to estimates by the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI).

A 2002 United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) estimate says there are approximately 250,000 victims of trafficking inside China alone. Senator Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska and chairman of the commission, noted that many of the trafficking victims in China are North Korean refugees.

Steven Law, deputy secretary at the U.S. Department of Labor and a member of the commission, said that although human trafficking is a worldwide phenomenon, the problem in China has some unique characteristics.

"China is stepping forward to address a broad range of human rights and worker rights issues, and the U.S. Department of Labor has provided technical support and other assistance for these efforts," Law said. "Still, the interplay between forced marriage, one-child restrictions and rural-urban migration creates an atmosphere where human trafficking could explode unless proactive measures are taken now." The Labor Department has contributed $164 million since 1995 to anti-trafficking projects worldwide, he said.

Miller said China has made "limited progress" in addressing human trafficking. "Although the government has undertaken some efforts to investigate and prosecute trafficking-related crime, much more needs to be done," he said.

The State Department official urged a "victim-centered" approach that emphasizes prevention, protection and prosecution. Vulnerable people, especially women and children, he said, should be warned that promises of employment are often traps. Victims of trafficking should be provided protection via adequate shelter and care, and the traffickers should be prosecuted vigorously. "The traffickers function as long as they operate beyond the law and between systems of enforcement" from region to region, he said.

Hagel, in his opening remarks, said the commission is concerned that China fell from "Tier 2" to "Tier 2 Watch Status" in the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report for 2005 because of inadequate protection of trafficking victims. The U.S. law mandates the annual international survey, which ranks countries in three tiers: Tier 1 indicates that a nation is in compliance with international standards; Tier 3 denotes countries that are not. Tier 2 comprises countries that are demonstrating commitment to address their problems but have not yet achieved international standards; the Tier 2 "Watch List" consists of countries that might be vulnerable to an erosion of their efforts.

"The Chinese government must uphold international agreements and grant the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees unimpeded access to screen the refugee petitions of North Korean in China," he said.

Hagel said the Chinese government has not signed the U.N. Protocol to Prevent, Suppress, and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children.

Miller added that human trafficking affects human rights, public health and international security. The Bush administration is committed to ending the trade in human beings, he said.

"The Departments of State, Labor, Justice, Homeland Security, and Health and Human Services and the U.S. Agency for International Development are working together to combat this scourge both at home and abroad. Since 2001, we have contributed approximately $375 million toward anti-trafficking programs and we are seeing results," the State Department official said.

"This 21st century struggle for freedom," Miller said, "is one we can and must win everywhere in the world."

Testimony

(<http://www.cecc.gov/pages/hearings/2006/20060306/index.php?PHPSESSID=a05f2dca16917bed7699fe5ebf35b354>) from the March 6 commission hearing is available on the Congressional-Executive Commission on China's Web site. The 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report is available on the State Department Web site.

For more on U.S. policy, see Human Trafficking: http://usinfo.state.gov/gi/global_issues/human_trafficking.html.

LOAD-DATE: March 9, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

432 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Congressional Press Releases

March 6, 2006 MondayOPENING STATEMENT BY U.S. SENATOR CHUCK HAGEL CHAIRMAN, CONGRESSIONAL-EXECUTIVE COMMISSION ON CHINA*BYLINE: CHUCK HAGEL, SENATOR, SENATESECTION: PRESS RELEASELENGTH: 998 words

For Immediate Release

Opening Statement by U.S. Senator Chuck Hagel Chairman, Congressional-Executive Commission on China

Contact: Mike Buttry 202/224-4224

March 6, 2006

"The Congressional-Executive Commission on China meets today to examine human trafficking in China. The Commission will also consider domestic and international efforts to help stop human trafficking in and through China and to help rehabilitate victims of trafficking.

Human trafficking in China is a serious problem. According to a 2002 United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) estimate, there are approximately 250,000 victims of trafficking in China. Traffickers are increasingly linked to organized crime and specialize in abducting girls and women both for the bridal market in China's poorest areas and for sale as prostitutes in urban areas. North Korean refugees are an especially vulnerable group. Today's Administration witness, Ambassador John Miller, has estimated that 80 to 90 percent of the refugees from North Korea, particularly women and children, end up as trafficking victims.

The Chinese government has publicly acknowledged the seriousness of the problem and has taken steps to stop trafficking and aid victims. Chinese experts and officials have cooperated with international agencies including the International Labor Organization (ILO) and UNICEF to combat trafficking. China's Law on the Protection of Rights and Interests of Women outlaws trafficking, and Article 240 of the Criminal Law outlines harsh penalties for those convicted of human trafficking related crimes.

These steps reflect a serious effort, but the Chinese government needs to do more. The Commission is concerned that China fell from "Tier 2" to "Tier 2 Watch Status" in the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report for 2005 because of inadequate protection of trafficking victims. The Chinese government must uphold international agreements and grant the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees unimpeded access to screen the refugee petitions of North Koreans in China. The Chinese government has not signed the U.N. Protocol to Prevent, Suppress, and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children.

The United States can do more. In its 2005 Annual Report, the Commission recommended that the President and Congress continue to support international programs to build law enforcement capacity to prevent trafficking in and through China, and additionally should develop and fund programs led by U.S.-based Non-Governmental Organizations (NGO) that focus on the protection and rehabilitation of victims, especially legal and educational assistance programs. But the Chinese government must become more open to cooperation with foreign NGOs.

To help us better understand the human trafficking problem in China, and international and domestic efforts to fight trafficking and assist victims, we turn to our witnesses.

Representative Chris Smith has been a leader in Congressional efforts to combat trafficking worldwide and assist victims of trafficking. Earlier this year, President Bush signed into law Representative Smith's third anti-trafficking bill, the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2005. This new law provides significant additional anti-trafficking and protection measures for victims and potential victims of trafficking. Representative Smith is Vice Chairman of the House International Relations Committee, and Chairman of the International Relations subcommittee on Africa, Global Human Rights, and International Operations. The Commission is very pleased that Mr. Smith will be making a statement at today's hearing.

Speaking on behalf of the Administration will be Ambassador John R. Miller, who is Director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons and Senior Advisor to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on human trafficking. From 1985 to 1993, Mr. Miller served in the U.S. House of Representatives from the state of Washington. While in Congress, Mr. Miller held a seat on the Committee on International Relations and was a member of the Congressional Human Rights Caucus.

After Ambassador Miller, we will hear from a distinguished panel of experts who will share their knowledge and expertise. Mr. Roger Plant will lead Panel Two. Mr. Plant is the Head of the ILO's Special Action Program to Combat Forced Labor. Mr. Plant has been a leading investigator and activist on forced labor and modern slavery for more than 30 years. Prior to joining the ILO Mr. Plant worked with the Asian Development Bank, United Kingdom Department for International Development; Inter-American Development Bank, United Nations Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights; Shell International, Danish International Development Agency, and several international human rights NGOs.

Ms. Wenchi Yu Perkins will provide perspectives on the problem of human trafficking to and from China. Ms. Perkins is the Director of Anti-Trafficking and Human Rights Program at Vital Voices. Prior to joining Vital Voices, Ms. Perkins worked with victims of trafficking and conducted training for law enforcement and NGOs in the Midwest. She was also a foreign policy assistant in Taiwan's parliament and worked in the Taiwan representative office in Chicago. She has an MA in International Relations from the University of Chicago and a BA in Political Science from National Taiwan University.

Finally, Mr. Abraham Lee will testify to the Commission on the problems faced by North Korean refugees in China. Mr. Lee is Director of Public Affairs for Crossing Borders, an NGO devoted to assisting North Korean refugees in Northeast China. Mr. Lee has been in China for the past three years working with North Korean refugees and teaching college English. He received his BA in Economics from the University of Maryland in 1999 and his JD from the University of Maryland School of Law in 2002.

We welcome all of our witnesses today and appreciate their time and presentations."

LOAD-DATE: March 7, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Other

433 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

March 6, 2006 Monday 11:01 AM EST

JAMAICA: JAMAICAN GOVERNMENT PROVIDES UPDATES ON POST-CABINET BRIEFINGS, MARCH 6

BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 897 wordsDATELINE: KINGSTON, Jamaica

The government of Jamaica issued the following news release:

PORT AUTHORITY OF JAMAICA TO PURCHASE PROPERTIES

Cabinet approved a request from the Port Authority of Jamaica to purchase three (3) properties located on the Titchfield Hill in Port Antonio from the Commissioner of Lands and National Land Agency.

The properties will be included in a development programme to restore properties on the historic Titchfield Hill to its 19th Century profile, creating a "Heritage Village" and provide an opportunity to expose our art, craft, music and other cultural products.

The Heritage Village would compliment the Marina, Cruise Shipping and Navy Island Developments and establish an additional tourism attraction.

The properties are:

37 Fort George Street

39 Fort George Street

13 King Street

In addition, the Port Authority of Jamaica obtained approval to purchase a private property for the same purposes.

It is anticipated that government agencies and Private Sector partners will collaborate fully in the new developmental phase and that a joint venture company will be responsible for the management of the project once completed.

REGIONAL MEDICAL WASTE TREATMENT AND COLLECTION SYSTEM

Approval was given for the implementation of a Regional Medical Waste Treatment and Collection System.

It is estimated that the health sector generates approximately 1596 tonnes of medical waste annually. This represents approximately 20% of the total waste stream from health care facilities. The remaining 80% is non-risk or "genuine" health care waste with similar characteristics to domestic waste such as uncontaminated waste items. Eighty three percent (83%) of the total medical waste is generated by public health care facilities, while the remaining 17% is generated by private facilities.

Against this background, it is imperative that the Government invest in appropriate technology for the treatment of medical waste, as the negative effects of improper handling and disposal practices is a burden on the public purse.

The project will be implemented in two phases, beginning in the new financial year at a cost of $114.6m and $273Jm in 2007 - 2008. Additionally there will be recurrent costs of $14.3m as of 2008 - 2009.

The technology which has been decided on after wide inter Agency and inter-Ministerial consultations is the autoclave technology endorsed by the World Health Organization. It is a wet heat treatment process which combines shredding materials, direct heated steam, and high pressure to achieve complete sterilization of infections networks. It is reputed to achieve virtually 100% of micro - bial inactivation and make all processed waste harmless.

THE CONSTABULARY FORCE ACT

The Cabinet approved a proposal to amend the Constabulary Force Act to grant legal status to the Jamaica Police Officers Association. This is in keeping with the legal status enjoyed by the Police Federation and the Special Constabulary Force Association.

The amendments also introduce provisions to cover the broad areas of membership, functions, appellate procedure and disciplinary proceedings.

TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS

The Cabinet received a note informing that in relation to Trafficking in Persons, Jamaica's ranking by the U.S. State Department in the 2005 Annual Report has moved from Tier 3 to Tier 2.

The improvement in rating is attributed to the measures implemented by the Government of Jamaica.

Efforts will continue within the limits of our resumes and in accordance with the national priorities.

ECONOMIC AND TECHNICAL COOPERATION AGREEMENTS BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENT OF JAMAICA (GOJ) AND THE GOVERNMENT OF PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA

The Cabinet received a report on the status of the economic and technical cooperation agreements concluded between the GOJ and the Government of People's Republic of China for 2003 - 2005.

The report gave an update on the Sligoville Complex, which is to include sports facility, police station and post office; and assistance with the construction of new Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Foreign Trade (MFAFT) office building in down town Kingston.

The Cabinet noted that the presence of the MFAFT building down town would assist in the revitalization of the area.

Currently the country is benefiting from the two Chinese Table Tennis Coaches and a Chinese language instructor at UWI.

The Sligoville Complex project will also provide collateral benefits thorough the expected provision of pipes and fittings to improve the water supply by the NWC in that area.

In addition, the NWC is already benefiting from US 12.5 million soft loan (2%) for the purchase of pipes and appurtenances 2.5million worth of which have already been delivered, with the remainder due by mid-year. The impact will be islandwide.

The Cabinet also authorized the MFAFT to indicate to the Chinese Government its approval of the US $100,000.00 or J $6.5m to support the improvement of the MOEYC management information system.

The total value of the economic cooperation agreement between China and Jamaica is as follows:

Grant A: $3US.6m Y30,000.00

Grant B: $3US.5m Y30,000.00

Loan: $2US.5m Y20,000.00

Cabinet Secretary: The Honourable Carlton E. Davis O.J., C.D., Ph.D

Address: Office of the Prime Minister,

1 Devon Road, Kingston 10

Jamaica West Indies.

Telephone: (876) 929-8880 to 5

Fax: (876) 929-8459

E-Mail: cablib@cwjamaica.com

LOAD-DATE: March 10, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

434 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

March 2, 2006 Thursday 1:49 AM EST

REP. SMITH URGES STATE DEPARTMENT TO RECONSIDER SUDAN HUMAN TRAFFICKING POLICY

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 750 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J. (4th CD), issued the following press release:

In response to a failed effort by the US Department of State to encourage the government of Sudan to effectively address human trafficking, Rep. Chris Smith (R-NJ) urged the Administration to correct its policy. Last fall, a four month experiment began designed to improve Sudan's ranking on the Trafficking in Persons (TIP) ratings from Tier 3 (the worst traffickers) to Tier 2.

That experiment ended in January 2006, but there are indications that the US Department of State may continue the experiment. In a letter to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Smith called the experiment a failure and urged the Administration to return Sudan to Tier 3. Smith noted that the basis for elevating Sudan in the TIP rankings was its support for the Committee to Eliminate the Abduction of Women and Children (CEAWC). The next US State Department Trafficking in Persons report is due to be released in June.

"When Ambassador John Miller, head of the Office of Trafficking in Persons gave a briefing this month on the TIP interim assessment, he acknowledged that the Government of Sudan had suspended its support for CEAWC," said Smith, who has written three landmark US human trafficking laws. "This alone should demonstrate why the effort to gently encourage the Sudanese government to take action to redress its history of involvement in slavery has not succeeded."

Smith met with the Director of CEAWC in August during a visit to Sudan, and was told that the organizational focus was on returning women who had been forced to become brides against their will to their families.

"While this is no doubt a serious problem, it is only part of the tragedy and does not deal satisfactorily with the thousands of people who have been sold into slavery in Sudan over the years," said Smith, Chairman of the House Subcommittee that has oversight on Africa and Global Human Rights.

Members of Congress and anti-slavery activists reacted strongly to the elevation of Sudan in the TIP rankings, despite the fact that Sudan was placed on a watch list and could potentially be dropped in rankings even between annual reports. While the Administration considered the elevation of Sudan's ranking to be a useful means of coaxing positive action from a recalcitrant government, others felt the Government of Sudan continues to refuse to admit its involvement in or support for slavery and has no intention of undoing the terrible wrong done to so many of its own citizens with its cooperation.

The complicity of the Sudanese government was confirmed during a March 13, 1996, hearing chaired by Rep. Smith. Then-Deputy Secretary of State for African Affairs William Twadell testified that the Government of Sudan's campaign to subjugate its opposition in the South included the taking of slaves by its army or by forces under its control.

Over the past decade, I have convened several hearings examining the phenomenon of modern-day slavery in Sudan, and written three landmark laws on human trafficking," said Smith. "In none of the testimony, including a hearing my current Subcommittee convened on November 1, 2005, has there been any evidence presented to demonstrate Sudanese government willingness to return those sold into slavery to their families - not even as part of a general repatriation of people forced from southern Sudan to their homes in this newly-semi-autonomous South."

Amnesty International, Human Rights Watch, Christian Solidarity and other organizations have investigated this situation thoroughly over the years. The Campaign of Conscience, organized by the Center for Religious Freedom at Freedom House, the National Urban League, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and other organizations have organized teach-ins, letter campaigns to our government and raised money to help the Sudanese people. Members of Congress, such as Congressman Smith and the February congressional delegation led by House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, have visited Sudan in an effort to place U.S. policy on the right side of this issue.

"All these efforts do not prepare the American people or their representatives in Congress to accept the lack of effort by the Government of Sudan on the issue of freeing and repatriating people sold into slavery, and I call on the Administration to take this into account in its deliberations of the TIP rankings," Smith said.

Contact: Brad Dayspring, 202/225-3765.

LOAD-DATE: March 4, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

435 of 445 DOCUMENTS

ABA Journal

March, 2006

92 A.B.A.J. 59

SINISTER INDUSTRY: ABA Joins Worldwide Effort to Fight Criminal Trade in Human Beings

AUTHOR: Siobhan Morrissey

LENGTH: 1583 words

SECTION: Your ABA

THE GALAPAGOS ISLANDS ARE famed for the extraordinary wildlife that evolved in relative isolation some 600 miles out in the Pacific Ocean from the mainland coast of Ecuador.

But the islands are not isolated enough to escape one of the most sinister criminal scourges of modern times--human trafficking. The exploding scope of the modern trade in human beings has begun to draw attention from governments, human rights organizations and legal groups like the ABA.

Human trafficking "is the fastest-growing and third-largest criminal industry in the world today after the arms and drugs trades, generating billions in profits each year," states the ABA Center for Human Rights in the introduction to its resource manual on the issue published in October.

"Sex trafficking is the most lucrative of trafficking efforts and involves sexual exploitation in prostitution or pornography, bride trafficking or the commercial or sexual abuse of children. Millions of innocents are victimized each year in this contemporary form of slavery; thousands are trafficked within the U.S. alone."

The U.S. State Department's "Trafficking in Persons Report," issued in June, estimates that some 12.3 million people are enslaved in forced labor, bonded labor, sexual servitude and involuntary servitude at any given time around the world. That includes the U.S., where the FBI estimates that human trafficking generates $ 9.5 billion annually.

Actually, human traffickers "could be making much more money" in the United States than suggested by government estimates, which are based only on information from traffickers who have been apprehended, says Andreea Vesa, a senior legal analyst working on human rights issues with the ABA's Central European and Eurasian Law Initiative. The victims, she notes, "are people who are trafficked into the U.S.--from Mexico to the southern United States and Asia to California, and by the Russian mafia into New York."

The State Department report notes that the victims of human trafficking "are as diverse as the world's cultures. Some leave developing countries seeking to improve their lives through low-skilled jobs in more prosperous countries. Others fall victim to forced or bonded labor in their own countries. Some families give children to related or unrelated adults who promise education and opportunity--but deliver the children into slavery for money."

AN UNSEEN CRIME

BUT HUMAN TRAFFICKING GOES LARGELY UNNOTICED, says Jerome J. Shestack of Philadelphia, an ABA past president who co-chairs the Human Rights Center with Steven T. Walther of Reno, Nev. Part of the reason, says Shestack, is that victims often are reluctant to testify against their captors.

"Basically, what we're trying to do is muster interest," he says about the efforts of the Human Rights Center.

Other ABA entities also are involved in the growing international effort to fight human trafficking.

In 2004, the Latin America and Caribbean Law Initiative Council launched its Project to Combat Trafficking in Persons in Ecuador. The project is funded by the State Department's Office to Combat and Monitor Trafficking in Persons. The American Bar Foundation also supports the project.

The project was part of the response to Ecuadorian authorities' 2003 arrest of a couple who ran a dance studio on the Galapagos Islands on charges that they exploited some 50 children for Internet pornography, says Salvador A. Cicero, director of the project. (While Ecuador maintains 90 percent of the Galapagos as a national park, the islands also are home to some 12,000 residents.)

"These people would feed them popcorn laced with cocaine and pizza laced with marijuana and other drugs," Cicero says. "They would drug the children who went to their dance academy, and then they would rape them and make pornographic pictures. The guy would rape them and the woman would record them."

But Ecuador did not have a law on human trafficking when the couple was arrested, Cicero says. Each was sentenced to a 25-year prison term for violating Ecuador's drug laws (which carry a harsher sentence than child-abuse laws).

"This was the case that gave evidence that they really needed to do something about the problem," Cicero says. "People were coming to Ecuador to buy this. That was the case that made the government pull the ABA in because it was so grotesque."

The human-trafficking law adopted by the Ecuadorian Congress in June was drafted largely by lawyers from the United States and Ecuador working with the trafficking project of the Latin America law initiative. Lawyers from the project are now assisting in efforts to help Ecuadorian law enforcement agencies develop enforcement mechanisms.

When the Ecuadorian supreme court asked the ABA for help in drafting anti-trafficking legislation in 2004, Ecuador was in danger of sanctions from the U.S. government under the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 that could have affected its military funding, says Cicero.

The act established a three-tier system for rating the efforts of countries to address human trafficking, and Ecuador had dropped down to the lowest rating for its lack of enforcement efforts before adopting its new law.

"We have had the cooperation of the U.S. Embassy in Ecuador, and we are very satisfied" with the final version of the law, says Armando E. LaCasa of Miami, who chairs the Latin America and Caribbean Law Initiative Council.

"I hope this will serve as the basis to go into other countries," LaCasa says. "There are several countries in Latin America where there is a need."

ISSUES IN ECUADOR

WHILE THE GALAPAGOS CASE INVOLVED CHILD pornography, human trafficking also takes other forms in Ecuador, says Luis Velez, an Ecuadorian attorney based in Miami who serves on the advisory committee for the trafficking project.

First, he says, there is the problem of Colombian girls forced into prostitution in Ecuador, where they command a high price because they are considered exotic. The other concern, Velez says, is Ecuadorians lured overseas with the promise of a good job who end up in prostitution.

"Because it's a very poor country, the poor people try to go out of Ecuador, especially to Europe and the United States," Velez says. "The girls or the girls' parents think they are going to find a job. But it is really not a job. They are kept like slaves. They go to Europe and think they are going to work as top models. But as a matter of fact, this is not true. They have to work as a prostitute in order to pay for their airline ticket and expenses."

But human trafficking patterns work in both directions, according to project director Cicero.

"In Colombia, Ecuadorian kids are trafficked there for begging," he says. "There are kids begging in the streets. They follow you. They are persistent to the point of being annoying. Apparently some of them walk back to Ecuador with drugs. Sometimes they are kidnapped. Sometimes their parents are talked into it. Trafficking is usually done by people you know."

CAMPAIGN IN AFRICA

WHILE THE LATIN AMERICA LAW INITIATIVE CONTINUES its work, another ABA entity--ABA-Africa--is fighting against human trafficking on another continent.

In 2004, ABA-Africa started a two-year campaign against human trafficking that focuses on East Africa, particularly Kenya, Tanzania and Uganda. The project concentrates on educating judges, lawyers and human rights advocates in the region about the trafficking problem, highlighting the issue in the news media, and helping provide legal aid to victims. The project also convened the first-ever conference in East Africa on the human-trafficking problem.

The project is exploring possible legislative initiatives as well, says Vernice I. Guthrie-Sullivan, the staff director for ABA-Africa.

"There is no overarching trafficking law in any of the East African countries," says Guthrie-Sullivan. "A law has been introduced in Kenya, and we are working to support a law in Uganda and eventually in Tanzania."

Beyond its tragic toll on individuals, one of the greatest dangers of human trafficking is its insidious nature. Human trafficking, experts say, is not a stand-alone crime. Often it is intertwined with money laundering, drug trafficking, document forgery and human smuggling.

Traffickers "are people who are also part of organized crime groups and could be doing other unauthorized activity," says Vesa of CEELI. "We're not able to list how many traffickers are out there. There are those who peddle their own kids. India is a big place where that happens, as are Cambodia, Laos and Thailand."

Traffickers tend to target an area repeatedly once they succeed in obtaining their first victim there.

"The profits from trafficking allow the practice to take root in a particular community, which is then repeatedly exploited as a ready source of victims," notes the State Department's "Trafficking in Persons Report."

At the same time, many countries, including Ecuador, lack the necessary social services infrastructure to help human-trafficking victims rejoin society, say Cicero and other experts.

"Ecuador is not set up to accommodate these people," Cicero says. "There are no shelters, no programs to help them reinsert themselves into society. These people are vulnerable," which only makes it possible for traffickers to victimize them again. Traffickers search for victims "the way lions look at a herd," he says. "They look for the easy target."

LOAD-DATE: 04/06/2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Photo, Luis Velez: Poor people seeking work may fall prey to prostitution., PHOTOGRAPH BY RODRIGO VARELA

436 of 445 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Latin America - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

February 18, 2006 Saturday

Surinam police arrest woman for people trafficking, forced prostitution

LENGTH: 354 words

Text of report by Caribbean Media Corporation news agency website on 17 February

Paramaribo, Surinam: Police have detained a well-known female brothel keeper for luring six migrants from the Dominican Republic to Surinam and subsequently forcing them into prostitution.

The detainee was arrested Monday [13 February] at the Johan Adolf Pengel International airport near the capital Paramaribo by the special Trafficking in Persons Police Unit.

According to police the 42-year-old suspect lured the six women to Surinam by promising them employment but on arriving in the country they were forced into prostitution.

The police unit followed up on a tip from the community that the suspect was engaged in human trafficking and forced prostitution.

Prosecuting Attorney Garcia Paragsingh said in a statement that the victims had already given evidence to the police.

Police spokeswoman Marita Ritfeld-Asontoe confirmed that the suspect's name already surfaced in an ongoing investigation where recently three other hotel owners were arrested and detained on similar charges.

At the launching of a nation-wide awareness campaign, Paragsingh told reporters that a greater awareness of trafficking in persons was necessary in order to successfully fight this crime.

Starting with the publication of posters and brochures, the campaign will also target the media in an effort to reach a wider audience.

Meanwhile the authorities have discovered several human trafficking routes to Surinam. Most victims are recruited in China, Colombia, Brazil, Dominican Republic and, to a lesser extent, some Eastern European countries.

Currently Surinam is on the United States' Tier 2 watch list of countries not doing enough to combat human trafficking. In 2003 the country was listed on the Tier 3 section risking sanctions from Washington if nothing was done to this crime.

Since then several actions have been taken by the government and judicial authorities to comply with the international policy regarding the fight against trafficking in persons.

Source: Caribbean Media Corporation news agency website, Bridgetown, in English 2000 gmt 17 Feb 06

LOAD-DATE: February 18, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

437 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

February 9, 2006 Thursday 11:32 PM EST

U.S. PRAISES SLOVAKIA'S PROGRESS IN COMBATING TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS

BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 397 wordsDATELINE: BRATISLAVA, Slovakia

The U.S. Embassy issued the following press release:

An interim progress report submitted by the U.S. Department of State to Congress praises Slovakia's "considerable political will and progress in combating trafficking in persons" since its placement on the "Special Watch List" last June.

The report cited Slovakia's creation of a National Coordinating Expert Working Group in April 2005, and the appointment in October of a national coordinator for the fight against trafficking in persons. According to the progress report, Slovakia has shown dedication to increasing its victim assistance network, acquiring additional equipment and training for police, and establishing an improved hotline for trafficking victims. The report also commends Slovakia for its increased outreach and educational efforts, including a media campaign to raise public awareness, and the distribution of informational flyers in police stations and high schools.

The February 1 report, called an "Interim Assessment," evaluates the progress made by countries that are on the "Special Watch List" in addressing key deficiencies that were highlighted in the U.S. State Department's June 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report. The Slovak Republic was included along with 36 other countries on the "Special Watch List" last June because it had not shown evidence of increasing efforts to address trafficking in persons in previous years. That assessment has now changed, with significant progress by the Government of Slovakia. The State Department's full annual report on Trafficking in Persons will be issued later this year.

U.S. Ambassador to the Slovak Republic Rodolphe M. Vallee said that the interim progress report reflects the strong commitment Slovakia has shown to combating trafficking in persons: "Slovakia has demonstrated that it is serious about the struggle to abolish trafficking in persons, and is emerging as a valued partner and role model on this issue within the region," the Ambassador said. "While there remains a lot of work to be done, Slovakia has set a course in the past year which we think will help protect the citizens of Slovakia and other countries from being denied their most basic human rights and falling into this terrible form of modern-day slavery."

More information, including the full text of the Interim Assessment, is available at <http://www.state.gov/g/tip>.

LOAD-DATE: February 28, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

438 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

February 8, 2006 Wednesday

CONGRESSMAN URGES U.S. TO SEEK SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION ON BURMA

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 2125 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the State Department:

As the current president of the United Nations Security Council, the United States should introduce a resolution to address the disastrous situation in Burma, says Congressman Christopher Smith, chairman of the House International Relations Subcommittee on Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations.

Smith delivered an opening statement February 7 at a joint hearing on Human Rights in Burma, which he convened in cooperation with the House International Relations Subcommittee on Asia and the Pacific. (See related article.)

Largely as a result of "relentless" efforts by the United States government, the New Jersey Republican said, the world is beginning to face up to the gathering humanitarian crisis created by Burma's ruling military regime.

Referring to the State Department's most recent reports on human rights and religious freedom, Smith outlined several areas of increasing international concern, including the abuse and torture of more than 1,100 political prisoners; human trafficking, military conscription of children, and use of forced labor; and evidence of involvement by the Burmese military and government in illicit sales of heroin and methamphetamines throughout China and other parts of Asia.

Smith said that the restrictions imposed by the Burmese regime are creating a health care crisis in the country, forcing the withdrawal of international organizations and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) that work to limit the spread of HIV/AIDS, tuberculosis, and malaria.

"The military's self-justification for its decades of arbitrary rule is to protect Burma from 'instability,' the congressman said. "Yet for forty years it has waged endless war on the nation's ethnic minorities, killing tens of thousands, driving hundreds of thousands -- perhaps millions -- of others into exile as refugees or within Burma as displaced persons."

In response to these problems, the United States has imposed a wide range of sanctions, Smith said, many of which will come up for renewal in 2006.

Yet, despite the dark situation in Burma, according to Smith, some recent developments show that progress is possible.

He cited a September 2005 report by Archbishop Desmond Tutu and former Czech President Vaclav Havel, which charged that Burma's human-rights infringements threaten regional peace and security. And in a step forward that might lead to stronger international action, he said, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan and the member states of the Security Council were briefed on the situation in Burma in December 2005.

Smith said the "next logical step" is for the United States to introduce a Security Council resolution calling upon the Burmese junta, "in the strongest possible terms," to release detained democratic opposition leader and Nobel Laureate Aung San Suu Kyi and other political prisoners, to implement a program for national reconciliation that includes the democratic opposition party National League for Democracy, and to open access to all parts of Burma for relief agencies and international humanitarian organizations.

If the junta failed to comply with such a resolution, Smith said, the resolution should include provisions for imposition of punitive sanctions.

For information on U.S. policy, see U.S. Support for Democracy in Burma.

Following is the full text of Smith's statement:

(begin text)

U.S. House of Representatives Committee on International Relations

Statement of Representative Christopher H. Smith Chairman, Subcommittee on Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations

Joint Hearing on Human Rights in Burma February 7, 2006

The Subcommittee will come to order, and good afternoon to everyone. Today's joint hearing of the Subcommittees on Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations and on Asia and the Pacific will focus on the current human rights situation in Burma, and what the U.S. and the international can and must do to improve that situation. After forty years of brutal military dictatorships, the human rights situation in Burma is frightening. That nation's current military junta, in power for over seventeen years, is an abysmal failure on every conceivable level.

It has ruined a beautiful and naturally rich land. According to the State Department's most recent Human Rights Country Report,

"More than 4 decades of economic mismanagement and endemic corruption have resulted in widespread poverty, poor health care, declining education levels, poor infrastructure, and continuously deteriorating economic conditions. During the year, poor economic policymaking, lingering consequences of the 2003 private banking sector collapse, and the economic consequences of international sanctions further weakened the economy. The estimated annual per capita income was approximately $225. Most of the population of more than 50 million live in rural areas at subsistence levels."

The Heritage Foundation ranked Iran and North Korea as the only countries with more restrictive economies than that of Burma.

But economic misery is probably the least of the problems faced by Burma's long-suffering people.

"Citizens still did not have the right to criticize or change their government...Security forces continued to carry out extrajudicial killings. Disappearances continued, and security forces raped, tortured, beat, and otherwise abused prisoners and detainees. Citizens were subjected to arbitrary arrest without appeal." --2004 State Department Human Rights Report

There are more than 1,100 political prisoners in Burma, who are abused and tortured. 7 are reported to have died in custody last year, and just last month a 38-year old democratic activist died in custody due to inadequate medical attention.

Over fifteen years ago the National League for Democracy, led by Nobel laureate Aung San Suu Kyi and other democratic forces, won an overwhelming victory in free elections (82%). The junta refused to accept the results or to call Parliament into session. Instead it imprisoned many activists, including Aung San Suu Kyi, who has spent 10 years under house arrest. Her current house arrest is tantamount to solitary confinement. She has been cruelly kept away from her children, and her husband, who died abroad. For fifteen years the junta has cynically proclaimed its intention to draft a new constitution via a National Convention, with no participation by the people's democratic representatives. That National Convention has again been adjourned, with no Constitution, and no freedom, in sight.

Since 1999, the U.S. Secretary of State has designated Burma as a "Country of Particular Concern" under the International Religious Freedom Act for particularly severe violations of religious freedom.

According to the U.S. Department of State, Burma continues to be a Tier 3 Country for human trafficking, and "the junta's policy of using forced labor is a driving factor behind Burma's large trafficking problem." The ILO has condemned Burma's use of forced labor, and the ILO representative in Burma has received death threats. Burma has threatened to quit the ILO. Burma regularly prosecutes those who complain about forced labor. Last October, Burma sentenced a 34-year-old woman to twenty months in prison for "criminal intimidation" of local officials. Her offense? She had the temerity to initiate the first successful prosecution for use of forced labor in Burma. She had lodged a complaint in 2004 against local government officials over their use of forced labor on a road construction project. She exercised her right to do this under new regulations introduced by the government to appease the International Labor Organization (ILO). She is now in prison, and her appeal was summarily denied.

Burma is high on the list of uncooperative drug producing or transiting countries, and there is evidence of military and government involvement in the narcotics traffic. Burma produces about 80% of Southeast Asia's heroin, and is one of the largest producers of methamphetamines in the world. It exports its illicit narcotics throughout China and Southeast and Central Asia.

And as Burma's heroin circulates through Asia, so does HIV/AIDS, which Burma refuses to take seriously as a domestic problem, although the UN estimated in 1999 that over half a million adults had HIV. According to one estimate, Burma spent only $22,000 in 2004 to help AIDS victims. In 2005 the regime tightened restrictions on NGOs and U.N. agency staff providing humanitarian assistance in Burma. The Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria announced in August that it was terminating its $98 million program on the ground -- that "its grants to the country cannot be managed in a way that ensures effective program implementation." The French contingent of medical aid group Medecins Sans Frontieres reportedly plans to withdraw from Burma because of restrictions imposed on access to villagers.

The military's self-justification for its decades of arbitrary rule is to protect Burma from "instability." Yet for forty years it has waged endless war on the nation's ethnic minorities, killing tens of thousands, driving hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions, of others into exile as refugees or within Burma as displaced persons. It has destroyed over 2,500 villages, and uses rape as an instrument of policy. And to wage these wars, it has resorted to conscription of children: more than 70,000 child soldiers may be serving, in horrible circumstances, in Burma's bloated army.

The U.N. Special Rapporteur for Human Rights, Sergio Pinheiro, has not been allowed into Burma for two years. In January 2006, U.N. Special

Envoy to Burma Razali Ismail resigned his post after nearly five years, since the junta has not allowed him into the country for two years.

With such a record, it is no wonder that the U.S. has a wide array of sanctions in place against Burma, many of which must be renewed this year.

And many wonder, can any progress be made? Yet in the midst of so much darkness, there has been light this year.

In September 2005, Nobel Laureates Archbishop Desmond Tutu and former Czech President Vaclav Havel released a major report documenting Burma's human rights problems as a threat to regional peace and security.

In December, with the strong support of the United States, U.N. Undersecretary for Political Affairs Ibrahim Gambari, in the unusual but significant presence of Secretary General Kofi Annan, personally gave the Security Council its first-ever briefing on the situation in Burma, a possible first step towards tougher international action. He went on record that the Burmese junta imprisons dissidents, ignores basic human rights, and is steering the country "towards a humanitarian crisis."

The Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN, which Burma joined in 1997) has finally moved from a posture of "constructive engagement," without sanctions or diplomatic pressure, to a more proactive approach to promote change.

But most of all, we owe this progress to this administration. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, and even more importantly, President George Bush, have been relentless in making the world face up to the appalling disaster in Burma. We have just begun, and we have a long way to go, but we in Congress are determined to support these efforts to bring peace and freedom to the heroic Burmese people, who, in the face of so much persecution and suffering, still persist in their resolute struggle for justice.

The next logical step to take is for the U.S., which is currently President of the Security Council, to introduce a Security Council Resolution calling on Burma, in the strongest possible terms:

--To release Aung San Suu Kyi and other political prisoners,

--Implement a program for national reconciliation that includes the National League for Democracy,

--Grant immediate and unhindered access to all parts of Burma for U.N. relief agencies and other international humanitarian organizations.

Such a resolution should include a timeline for compliance and punitive sanctions if the SPDC fails to comply.

We welcome here today Assistant Secretary of State Barry Lowenkron, of the Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights and Labor. This is Mr. Lowenkron's first time before this House, and we look forward to a very fruitful collaboration on the vital issues he promotes. His Bureau has kept attention focused on Burma when most have forgotten it. We shall also hear from Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, who is the chief executor of our President's policy to change Burma.

(end text)

(Distributed by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State. Web site:
<http://usinfo.state.gov>)

LOAD-DATE: February 10, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 States News Service

439 of 445 DOCUMENTS

State Department Documents and Publications

February 8, 2006

Congressman Urges U.S. To Seek Security Council Action on Burma; World is facing up to gathering humanitarian crisis, says New Jersey's Smith

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 2108 words

As the current president of the United Nations Security Council, the United States should introduce a resolution to address the disastrous situation in Burma, says Congressman Christopher Smith, chairman of the House International Relations Subcommittee on Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations.

Smith delivered an opening statement February 7 at a joint hearing on Human Rights in Burma, which he convened in cooperation with the House International Relations Subcommittee on Asia and the Pacific. (See related article.)

Largely as a result of "relentless" efforts by the United States government, the New Jersey Republican said, the world is beginning to face up to the gathering humanitarian crisis created by Burma's ruling military regime.

Referring to the State Department's most recent reports on human rights and religious freedom, Smith outlined several areas of increasing international concern, including the abuse and torture of more than 1,100 political prisoners; human trafficking, military conscription of children, and use of forced labor; and evidence of involvement by the Burmese military and government in illicit sales of heroin and methamphetamines throughout China and other parts of Asia.

Smith said that the restrictions imposed by the Burmese regime are creating a health care crisis in the country, forcing the withdrawal of international organizations and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) that work to limit the spread of HIV/AIDS, tuberculosis, and malaria.

"The military's self-justification for its decades of arbitrary rule is to protect Burma from 'instability,'" the congressman said. "Yet for forty years it has waged endless war on the nation's ethnic minorities, killing tens of thousands, driving hundreds of thousands -- perhaps millions -- of others into exile as refugees or within Burma as displaced persons."

In response to these problems, the United States has imposed a wide range of sanctions, Smith said, many of which will come up for renewal in 2006.

Yet, despite the dark situation in Burma, according to Smith, some recent developments show that progress is possible.

He cited a September 2005 report by Archbishop Desmond Tutu and former Czech President Vaclav Havel, which charged that Burma's human-rights infringements threaten regional peace and security. And in a step forward that might lead to stronger international action, he said, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan and the member states of the Security Council were briefed on the situation in Burma in December 2005.

Smith said the "next logical step" is for the United States to introduce a Security Council resolution calling upon the Burmese junta, "in the strongest possible terms," to release detained democratic opposition leader and Nobel Laureate Aung San Suu Kyi and other political prisoners, to implement a program for national reconciliation that includes the democratic opposition party National League for Democracy, and to open access to all parts of Burma for relief agencies and international humanitarian organizations.

If the junta failed to comply with such a resolution, Smith said, the resolution should include provisions for imposition of punitive sanctions.

For information on U.S. policy, see U.S. Support for Democracy in Burma.

Following is the full text of Smith's statement:

(begin text)

U.S. House of Representatives

Committee on International Relations

Statement of Representative Christopher H. Smith

Chairman, Subcommittee on Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations

Joint Hearing on Human Rights in Burma

February 7, 2006

The Subcommittee will come to order, and good afternoon to everyone. Today's joint hearing of the Subcommittees on Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations and on Asia and the Pacific will focus on the current human rights situation in Burma, and what the U.S. and the international can and must do to improve that situation. After forty years of brutal military dictatorships, the human rights situation in Burma is frightening. That nation's current military junta, in power for over seventeen years, is an abysmal failure on every conceivable level.

It has ruined a beautiful and naturally rich land. According to the State Department's most recent Human Rights Country Report,

"More than 4 decades of economic mismanagement and endemic corruption have resulted in widespread poverty, poor health care, declining education levels, poor infrastructure, and continuously deteriorating economic conditions. During the year, poor economic policymaking, lingering consequences of the 2003 private banking sector collapse, and the economic consequences of international sanctions further weakened the economy. The estimated annual per capita income was approximately $225. Most of the population of more than 50 million live in rural areas at subsistence levels."

The Heritage Foundation ranked Iran and North Korea as the only countries with more restrictive economies than that of Burma.

But economic misery is probably the least of the problems faced by Burma's long-suffering people.

"Citizens still did not have the right to criticize or change their government...Security forces continued to carry out extrajudicial killings. Disappearances continued, and security forces raped, tortured, beat, and otherwise abused prisoners and detainees. Citizens were subjected to arbitrary arrest without appeal."

--2004 State Department Human Rights Report

There are more than 1,100 political prisoners in Burma, who are abused and tortured. 7 are reported to have died in custody last year, and just last month a 38-year old democratic activist died in custody due to inadequate medical attention.

Over fifteen years ago the National League for Democracy, led by Nobel laureate Aung San Suu Kyi and other democratic forces, won an overwhelming victory in free elections (82%). The junta refused to accept the results or to call Parliament into session. Instead it imprisoned many activists, including Aung San Suu Kyi, who has spent 10 years under house arrest. Her current house arrest is tantamount to solitary confinement. She has been cruelly kept away from her children, and her husband, who died abroad. For fifteen years the junta has cynically proclaimed its intention to draft a new constitution via a National Convention, with no participation by the people's democratic representatives. That National Convention has again been adjourned, with no Constitution, and no freedom, in sight.

Since 1999, the U.S. Secretary of State has designated Burma as a "Country of Particular Concern" under the International Religious Freedom Act for particularly severe violations of religious freedom.

According to the U.S. Department of State, Burma continues to be a Tier 3 Country for human trafficking, and "the junta's policy of using forced labor is a driving factor behind Burma's large trafficking problem." The ILO has condemned Burma's use of forced labor, and the ILO representative in Burma has received death threats. Burma has threatened to quit the ILO. Burma regularly prosecutes those who complain about forced labor. Last October, Burma sentenced a 34-year-old woman to twenty months in prison for "criminal intimidation" of local officials. Her offense? She had the temerity to initiate the first successful prosecution for use of forced labor in Burma. She had lodged a complaint in 2004 against local government officials over their use of forced labor on a road construction project. She exercised her right to do this under new regulations introduced by the government to appease the International Labor Organization (ILO). She is now in prison, and her appeal was summarily denied.

Burma is high on the list of uncooperative drug producing or transiting countries, and there is evidence of military and government involvement in the narcotics traffic. Burma produces about 80% of Southeast Asia's heroin, and is one of the largest producers of methamphetamines in the world. It exports its illicit narcotics throughout China and Southeast and Central Asia.

And as Burma's heroin circulates through Asia, so does HIV/AIDS, which Burma refuses to take seriously as a domestic problem, although the UN estimated in 1999 that over half a million adults had HIV. According to one estimate, Burma spent only $22,000 in 2004 to help AIDS victims. In 2005 the regime tightened restrictions on NGOs and U.N. agency staff providing humanitarian assistance in Burma. The Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria announced in August that it was terminating its $98 million program on the ground -- that "its grants to the country cannot be managed in a way that ensures effective program implementation." The French contingent of medical aid group Medecins Sans Frontieres reportedly plans to withdraw from Burma because of restrictions imposed on access to villagers.

The military's self-justification for its decades of arbitrary rule is to protect Burma from "instability." Yet for forty years it has waged endless war on the nation's ethnic minorities, killing tens of thousands, driving hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions, of others into exile as refugees or within Burma as displaced persons. It has destroyed over 2,500 villages, and uses rape as an instrument of policy. And to wage these wars, it has resorted to conscription of children: more than 70,000 child soldiers may be serving, in horrible circumstances, in Burma's bloated army.

The U.N. Special Rapporteur for Human Rights, Sergio Pinheiro, has not been allowed into Burma for two years. In January 2006, U.N. Special

Envoy to Burma Razali Ismail resigned his post after nearly five years, since the junta has not allowed him into the country for two years.

With such a record, it is no wonder that the U.S. has a wide array of sanctions in place against Burma, many of which must be renewed this year.

And many wonder, can any progress be made? Yet in the midst of so much darkness, there has been light this year.

In September 2005, Nobel Laureates Archbishop Desmond Tutu and former Czech President Vaclav Havel released a major report documenting Burma's human rights problems as a threat to regional peace and security.

In December, with the strong support of the United States, U.N. Undersecretary for Political Affairs Ibrahim Gambari, in the unusual but significant presence of Secretary General Kofi Annan, personally gave the Security Council its first-ever briefing on the situation in Burma, a possible first step towards tougher international action. He went on record that the Burmese junta imprisons dissidents, ignores basic human rights, and is steering the country "towards a humanitarian crisis."

The Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN, which Burma joined in 1997) has finally moved from a posture of "constructive engagement," without sanctions or diplomatic pressure, to a more proactive approach to promote change.

But most of all, we owe this progress to this administration. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, and even more importantly, President George Bush, have been relentless in making the world face up to the appalling disaster in Burma. We have just begun, and we have a long way to go, but we in Congress are determined to support these efforts to bring peace and freedom to the heroic Burmese people, who, in the face of so much persecution and suffering, still persist in their resolute struggle for justice.

The next logical step to take is for the U.S., which is currently President of the Security Council, to introduce a Security Council Resolution calling on Burma, in the strongest possible terms:

--To release Aung San Suu Kyi and other political prisoners,

--Implement a program for national reconciliation that includes the National League for Democracy,

--Grant immediate and unhindered access to all parts of Burma for U.N. relief agencies and other international humanitarian organizations.

Such a resolution should include a timeline for compliance and punitive sanctions if the SPDC fails to comply.

We welcome here today Assistant Secretary of State Barry Lowenkron, of the Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights and Labor. This is Mr. Lowenkron's first time before this House, and we look forward to a very fruitful collaboration on the vital issues he promotes. His Bureau has kept attention focused on Burma when most have forgotten it. We shall also hear from Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, who is the chief executor of our President's policy to change Burma.

(end text)

(Distributed by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: February 9, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

Copyright 2006 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

440 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

February 8, 2006 Wednesday 8:47 PM EST

STATE DEPT.: CONGRESSMAN URGES U.S. TO SEEK SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION ON BURMA

BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 2145 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's International Information Programs issued the following press release:

As the current president of the United Nations Security Council, the United States should introduce a resolution to address the disastrous situation in Burma, says Congressman Christopher Smith, chairman of the House International Relations Subcommittee on Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations.

Smith delivered an opening statement February 7 at a joint hearing on Human Rights in Burma, which he convened in cooperation with the House International Relations Subcommittee on Asia and the Pacific. (See related article at <http://usinfo.state.gov/eap/Archive/2006/Feb/08-263128.html>.)

Largely as a result of "relentless" efforts by the United States government, the New Jersey Republican said, the world is beginning to face up to the gathering humanitarian crisis created by Burma's ruling military regime.

Referring to the State Department's most recent reports on human rights and religious freedom, Smith outlined several areas of increasing international concern, including the abuse and torture of more than 1,100 political prisoners; human trafficking, military conscription of children, and use of forced labor; and evidence of involvement by the Burmese military and government in illicit sales of heroin and methamphetamines throughout China and other parts of Asia.

Smith said that the restrictions imposed by the Burmese regime are creating a health care crisis in the country, forcing the withdrawal of international organizations and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) that work to limit the spread of HIV/AIDS, tuberculosis, and malaria.

"The military's self-justification for its decades of arbitrary rule is to protect Burma from 'instability,'" the congressman said. "Yet for forty years it has waged endless war on the nation's ethnic minorities, killing tens of thousands, driving hundreds of thousands - perhaps millions - of others into exile as refugees or within Burma as displaced persons."

In response to these problems, the United States has imposed a wide range of sanctions, Smith said, many of which will come up for renewal in 2006.

Yet, despite the dark situation in Burma, according to Smith, some recent developments show that progress is possible.

He cited a September 2005 report by Archbishop Desmond Tutu and former Czech President Vaclav Havel, which charged that Burma's human-rights infringements threaten regional peace and security. And in a step forward that might lead to stronger international action, he said, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan and the member states of the Security Council were briefed on the situation in Burma in December 2005.

Smith said the "next logical step" is for the United States to introduce a Security Council resolution calling upon the Burmese junta, "in the strongest possible terms," to release detained democratic opposition leader and Nobel Laureate Aung San Suu Kyi and other political prisoners, to implement a program for national reconciliation that includes the democratic opposition party National League for Democracy, and to open access to all parts of Burma for relief agencies and international humanitarian organizations.

If the junta failed to comply with such a resolution, Smith said, the resolution should include provisions for imposition of punitive sanctions.

For information on U.S. policy, see U.S. Support for Democracy in Burma (http://usinfo.state.gov/eap/east_asia_pacific/burma.html).

Following is the full text of Smith's statement:

(begin text)

U.S. House of Representatives

Committee on International Relations

Statement of Representative Christopher H. Smith

Chairman, Subcommittee on Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations

Joint Hearing on Human Rights in Burma

February 7, 2006

The Subcommittee will come to order, and good afternoon to everyone. Today's joint hearing of the Subcommittees on Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations and on Asia and the Pacific will focus on the current human rights situation in Burma, and what the U.S. and the international can and must do to improve that situation. After forty years of brutal military dictatorships, the human rights situation in Burma is frightening. That nation's current military junta, in power for over seventeen years, is an abysmal failure on every conceivable level.

It has ruined a beautiful and naturally rich land. According to the State Department's most recent Human Rights Country Report,

"More than 4 decades of economic mismanagement and endemic corruption have resulted in widespread poverty, poor health care, declining education levels, poor infrastructure, and continuously deteriorating economic conditions. During the year, poor economic policymaking, lingering consequences of the 2003 private banking sector collapse, and the economic consequences of international sanctions further weakened the economy. The estimated annual per capita income was approximately $225. Most of the population of more than 50 million live in rural areas at subsistence levels."

The Heritage Foundation ranked Iran and North Korea as the only countries with more restrictive economies than that of Burma.

But economic misery is probably the least of the problems faced by Burma's long-suffering people.

"Citizens still did not have the right to criticize or change their government...Security forces continued to carry out extrajudicial killings. Disappearances continued, and security forces raped, tortured, beat, and otherwise abused prisoners and detainees. Citizens were subjected to arbitrary arrest without appeal."

-2004 State Department Human Rights Report

There are more than 1,100 political prisoners in Burma, who are abused and tortured. 7 are reported to have died in custody last year, and just last month a 38-year old democratic activist died in custody due to inadequate medical attention.

Over fifteen years ago the National League for Democracy, led by Nobel laureate Aung San Suu Kyi and other democratic forces, won an overwhelming victory in free elections (82%). The junta refused to accept the results or to call Parliament into session. Instead it imprisoned many activists, including Aung San Suu Kyi, who has spent 10 years under house arrest. Her current house arrest is tantamount to solitary confinement. She has been cruelly kept away from her children, and her husband, who died abroad. For fifteen years the junta has cynically proclaimed its intention to draft a new constitution via a National Convention, with no participation by the people's democratic representatives. That National Convention has again been adjourned, with no Constitution, and no freedom, in sight.

Since 1999, the U.S. Secretary of State has designated Burma as a "Country of Particular Concern" under the International Religious Freedom Act for particularly severe violations of religious freedom.

According to the U.S. Department of State, Burma continues to be a Tier 3 Country for human trafficking, and "the junta's policy of using forced labor is a driving factor behind Burma's large trafficking problem." The ILO has condemned Burma's use of forced labor, and the ILO representative in Burma has received death threats. Burma has threatened to quit the ILO. Burma regularly prosecutes those who complain about forced labor. Last October, Burma sentenced a 34-year-old woman to twenty months in prison for "criminal intimidation" of local officials. Her offense? She had the temerity to initiate the first successful prosecution for use of forced labor in Burma. She had lodged a complaint in 2004 against local government officials over their use of forced labor on a road construction project. She exercised her right to do this under new regulations introduced by the government to appease the International Labor Organization (ILO). She is now in prison, and her appeal was summarily denied.

Burma is high on the list of uncooperative drug producing or transiting countries, and there is evidence of military and government involvement in the narcotics traffic. Burma produces about 80% of Southeast Asia's heroin, and is one of the largest producers of methamphetamines in the world. It exports its illicit narcotics throughout China and Southeast and Central Asia.

And as Burma's heroin circulates through Asia, so does HIV/AIDS, which Burma refuses to take seriously as a domestic problem, although the UN estimated in 1999 that over half a million adults had HIV. According to one estimate, Burma spent only $22,000 in 2004 to help AIDS victims. In 2005 the regime tightened restrictions on NGOs and U.N. agency staff providing humanitarian assistance in Burma. The Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria announced in August that it was terminating its $98 million program on the ground - that "its grants to the country cannot be managed in a way that ensures effective program implementation." The French contingent of medical aid group Medecins Sans Frontieres reportedly plans to withdraw from Burma because of restrictions imposed on access to villagers.

The military's self-justification for its decades of arbitrary rule is to protect Burma from "instability." Yet for forty years it has waged endless war on the nation's ethnic minorities, killing tens of thousands, driving hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions, of others into exile as refugees or within Burma as displaced persons. It has destroyed over 2,500 villages, and uses rape as an instrument of policy. And to wage these wars, it has resorted to conscription of children: more than 70,000 child soldiers may be serving, in horrible circumstances, in Burma's bloated army.

The U.N. Special Rapporteur for Human Rights, Sergio Pinheiro, has not been allowed into Burma for two years. In January 2006, U.N. Special

Envoy to Burma Razali Ismail resigned his post after nearly five years, since the junta has not allowed him into the country for two years.

With such a record, it is no wonder that the U.S. has a wide array of sanctions in place against Burma, many of which must be renewed this year.

And many wonder, can any progress be made? Yet in the midst of so much darkness, there has been light this year.

In September 2005, Nobel Laureates Archbishop Desmond Tutu and former Czech President Vaclav Havel released a major report documenting Burma's human rights problems as a threat to regional peace and security.

In December, with the strong support of the United States, U.N. Undersecretary for Political Affairs Ibrahim Gambari, in the unusual but significant presence of Secretary General Kofi Annan, personally gave the Security Council its first-ever briefing on the situation in Burma, a possible first step towards tougher international action. He went on record that the Burmese junta imprisons dissidents, ignores basic human rights, and is steering the country "towards a humanitarian crisis."

The Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN, which Burma joined in 1997) has finally moved from a posture of "constructive engagement," without sanctions or diplomatic pressure, to a more proactive approach to promote change.

But most of all, we owe this progress to this administration. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, and even more importantly, President George Bush, have been relentless in making the world face up to the appalling disaster in Burma. We have just begun, and we have a long way to go, but we in Congress are determined to support these efforts to bring peace and freedom to the heroic Burmese people, who, in the face of so much persecution and suffering, still persist in their resolute struggle for justice.

The next logical step to take is for the U.S., which is currently President of the Security Council, to introduce a Security Council Resolution calling on Burma, in the strongest possible terms:

- To release Aung San Suu Kyi and other political prisoners,
- Implement a program for national reconciliation that includes the National League for Democracy,
- Grant immediate and unhindered access to all parts of Burma for U.N. relief agencies and other international humanitarian organizations.

Such a resolution should include a timeline for compliance and punitive sanctions if the SPDC fails to comply.

We welcome here today Assistant Secretary of State Barry Lowenkron, of the Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights and Labor. This is Mr. Lowenkron's first time before this House, and we look forward to a very fruitful collaboration on the vital issues he promotes. His Bureau has kept attention focused on Burma when most have forgotten it. We shall also hear from Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, who is the chief executor of our President's policy to change Burma.

(end text)

LOAD-DATE: February 10, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

441 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

February 7, 2006 Tuesday

BURMA'S REGIME POSES DEMOCRATIC AND SECURITY CHALLENGES

BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 882 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. Department of State:

Burma's ruling military junta poses a security concern to the country's immediate neighbors and the broader region, says U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for East Asia and Pacific Affairs Christopher Hill.

"Burma's neighbors have particular reason to be concerned, because many of the country's growing problems will not stay within its borders," Hill warned.

Hill spoke February 7 in testimony before the Asia and Pacific Subcommittee and the Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations Subcommittee of the House Committee on International Relations.

The Burmese government's economic policies have severely hurt the economy, which remained stagnant in 2005. Inflation might have risen as much as 50 percent, Hill said.

Citing the regime's failure to devote resources to health and education, the assistant secretary said HIV infections are on the rise and there are high rates of tuberculosis and malaria.

Burma could have unreported cases of avian influenza in both poultry and humans, which would have global health implications, Hill said.

"Burma remains the world's second-largest producer of opium, and production of amphetamine-type stimulants is on the rise," he said, adding 90 percent of the heroin in Southeast Asia comes from Burma.

In separate testimony, Assistant Secretary of State for Democracy, Human Rights and Labor Barry Lowenkron cited forced labor, trafficking in persons, the use of child soldiers and religious discrimination as serious human rights concerns in Burma.

The regime's use of forced labor is particularly common in regions with ethnic and religious minorities, Lowenkron said, and the military has persecuted Muslim and Christian communities in Burma's western China state. (See related article.)

Trafficking of women and girls for sexual exploitation, factory labor and as household servants continues unabated, Lowenkron said. Most are sent to Thailand, China, India, Bangladesh, Taiwan, Pakistan, Malaysia, Japan and countries in the Middle East, he said.

The State Department's 2005 Trafficking in Persons report lists Burma as a Tier 3 country -- a country that fails to take significant actions to bring itself into compliance with minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. (See related article.)

According to Hill, the United States' long-term goal for Burma is the emergence of a unified, democratic and independent nation in which the government respects human rights of its citizens and promotes policies that contribute to the well-being of the Burmese people and regional peace and prosperity.

CALL FOR RELEASE OF BURMESE DEMOCRACY LEADER

Hill and Lowenkron both called on Burmese authorities immediately to release pro-democracy leader Aung San Suu Kyi and all other political prisoners, initiate a credible and inclusive political process, grant access for U.N. representatives and lift restrictions on U.N. agencies and nongovernmental organizations providing humanitarian relief.

Lowenkron said the Burmese government's January 31 session of the National Convention to draft a new constitution was "lacking credibility" since the regime hand-picked delegates, barred the participation of the National League for Democracy (NLD) and other pro-democracy parties and did not allow delegates to debate freely.

The regime wants to redraft Burma's Constitution in such a way as to nullify the results of the legitimate 1990 elections - during which the NLD, followed by the Shan Nationalities League for Democracy, won the majority of seats, Lowenkron said.

Additionally, the United States calls for greater involvement from the international community to help reverse the deteriorating situation in Burma, he said.

"We will continue to press hard for further U.N. Security Council discussion and action on Burma," Lowenkron said. The United States, he added, plans to support strong resolutions in the U.N. General Assembly as well as other international bodies.

He called for the U.N. secretary-general to name another U.N. special envoy to Burma and to give the envoy a broader mandate to enhance coordination with the international community to gain support for pressing the Burmese regime to change.

Hill also cited increased U.S. diplomatic efforts with India, China, Japan and the 10-member Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) to define steps the regime needs to take to address the international community's concerns.

Since 2000, the State Department has administered more than $16 million through the National Endowment for Democracy to focus on democracy and human rights activities, including capacity building for NGOs in exile and collection of information on human rights, Lowenkron said.

One such program involves $650,000 for training Burmese journalists and other media professionals; the United States also has provided $325,000 in scholarships for 200 Burmese students to universities, he said.

The United States will also continue to monitor and annually report on human rights in Burma, and describe our efforts to support human rights and democracy there, Lowenkron said.

For more information on U.S. policies, see U.S. Support for Democracy in Burma.

The text of Hill's remarks to the panel is available on the State Department Web site.

LOAD-DATE: February 9, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

442 of 445 DOCUMENTS

State Department Documents and Publications

February 7, 2006

Burma's Regime Poses Democratic and Security Challenges; State's Hill, Lowenkron cite human rights abuses, junta's failing policies

BYLINE: Todd Bullock, Washington File Staff Writer

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 891 words

Washington -- Burma's ruling military junta poses a security concern to the country's immediate neighbors and the broader region, says U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for East Asia and Pacific Affairs Christopher Hill.

"Burma's neighbors have particular reason to be concerned, because many of the country's growing problems will not stay within its borders," Hill warned.

Hill spoke February 7 in testimony before the Asia and Pacific Subcommittee and the Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations Subcommittee of the House Committee on International Relations.

The Burmese government's economic policies have severely hurt the economy, which remained stagnant in 2005. Inflation might have risen as much as 50 percent, Hill said.

Citing the regime's failure to devote resources to health and education, the assistant secretary said HIV infections are on the rise and there are high rates of tuberculosis and malaria.

Burma could have unreported cases of avian influenza in both poultry and humans, which would have global health implications, Hill said.

"Burma remains the world's second-largest producer of opium, and production of amphetamine-type stimulants is on the rise," he said, adding 90 percent of the heroin in Southeast Asia comes from Burma.

In separate testimony, Assistant Secretary of State for Democracy, Human Rights and Labor Barry Lowenkron cited forced labor, trafficking in persons, the use of child soldiers and religious discrimination as serious human rights concerns in Burma.

The regime's use of forced labor is particularly common in regions with ethnic and religious minorities, Lowenkron said, and the military has persecuted Muslim and Christian communities in Burma's western China state. (See related article.)

Trafficking of women and girls for sexual exploitation, factory labor and as household servants continues unabated, Lowenkron said. Most are sent to Thailand, China, India, Bangladesh, Taiwan, Pakistan, Malaysia, Japan and countries in the Middle East, he said.

The State Department's 2005 Trafficking in Persons report lists Burma as a Tier 3 country -- a country that fails to take significant actions to bring itself into compliance with minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. (See related article.)

According to Hill, the United States' long-term goal for Burma is the emergence of a unified, democratic and independent nation in which the government respects human rights of its citizens and promotes policies that contribute to the well-being of the Burmese people and regional peace and prosperity.

CALL FOR RELEASE OF BURMESE DEMOCRACY LEADER

Hill and Lowenkron both called on Burmese authorities immediately to release pro-democracy leader Aung San Suu Kyi and all other political prisoners, initiate a credible and inclusive political process, grant access for U.N. representatives and lift restrictions on U.N. agencies and nongovernmental organizations providing humanitarian relief.

Lowenkron said the Burmese government's January 31 session of the National Convention to draft a new constitution was "lacking credibility" since the regime hand-picked delegates, barred the participation of the National League for Democracy (NLD) and other pro-democracy parties and did not allow delegates to debate freely.

The regime wants to redraft Burma's Constitution in such a way as to nullify the results of the legitimate 1990 elections - during which the NLD, followed by the Shan Nationalities League for Democracy, won the majority of seats, Lowenkron said.

Additionally, the United States calls for greater involvement from the international community to help reverse the deteriorating situation in Burma, he said.

"We will continue to press hard for further U.N. Security Council discussion and action on Burma," Lowenkron said. The United States, he added, plans to support strong resolutions in the U.N. General Assembly as well as other international bodies.

He called for the U.N. secretary-general to name another U.N. special envoy to Burma and to give the envoy a broader mandate to enhance coordination with the international community to gain support for pressing the Burmese regime to change.

Hill also cited increased U.S. diplomatic efforts with India, China, Japan and the 10-member Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) to define steps the regime needs to take to address the international community's concerns.

Since 2000, the State Department has administered more than $16 million through the National Endowment for Democracy to focus on democracy and human rights activities, including capacity building for NGOs in exile and collection of information on human rights, Lowenkron said.

One such program involves $650,000 for training Burmese journalists and other media professionals; the United States also has provided $325,000 in scholarships for 200 Burmese students to universities, he said.

"The United States will also continue to monitor and annually report on human rights in Burma, and describe our efforts to support human rights and democracy there," Lowenkron said.

For more information on U.S. policies, see U.S. Support for Democracy in Burma.

The text of Hill's remarks to the panel is available on the State Department Web site.

(The Washington File is a product of the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: February 8, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

443 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

February 7, 2006 Tuesday 9:13 PM EST

STATE DEPT.: BURMA'S REGIME POSES DEMOCRATIC, SECURITY CHALLENGES

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 942 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's International Information Programs issued the following press release:

By Todd Bullock

Washington File Staff Writer

Burma's ruling military junta poses a security concern to the country's immediate neighbors and the broader region, says U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for East Asia and Pacific Affairs Christopher Hill.

"Burma's neighbors have particular reason to be concerned, because many of the country's growing problems will not stay within its borders," Hill warned.

Hill spoke February 7 in testimony before the Asia and Pacific Subcommittee and the Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations Subcommittee of the House Committee on International Relations.

The Burmese government's economic policies have severely hurt the economy, which remained stagnant in 2005. Inflation might have risen as much as 50 percent, Hill said.

Citing the regime's failure to devote resources to health and education, the assistant secretary said HIV infections are on the rise and there are high rates of tuberculosis and malaria.

Burma could have unreported cases of avian influenza in both poultry and humans, which would have global health implications, Hill said.

"Burma remains the world's second-largest producer of opium, and production of amphetamine-type stimulants is on the rise," he said, adding 90 percent of the heroin in Southeast Asia comes from Burma.

In separate testimony, Assistant Secretary of State for Democracy, Human Rights and Labor Barry Lowenkron cited forced labor, trafficking in persons, the use of child soldiers and religious discrimination as serious human rights concerns in Burma.

The regime's use of forced labor is particularly common in regions with ethnic and religious minorities, Lowenkron said, and the military has persecuted Muslim and Christian communities in Burma's western China state. (See related article at <http://usinfo.state.gov/eap/Archive/2005/Nov/08-550050.html>.)

Trafficking of women and girls for sexual exploitation, factory labor and as household servants continues unabated, Lowenkron said. Most are sent to Thailand, China, India, Bangladesh, Taiwan, Pakistan, Malaysia, Japan and countries in the Middle East, he said.

The State Department's 2005 Trafficking in Persons report lists Burma as a Tier 3 country - a country that fails to take significant actions to bring itself into compliance with minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. (See related article at <http://usinfo.state.gov/gi/Archive/2005/Jun/03-125859.html>.)

According to Hill, the United States' long-term goal for Burma is the emergence of a unified, democratic and independent nation in which the government respects human rights of its citizens and promotes policies that contribute to the well-being of the Burmese people and regional peace and prosperity.

CALL FOR RELEASE OF BURMESE DEMOCRACY LEADER

Hill and Lowenkron both called on Burmese authorities immediately to release pro-democracy leader Aung San Suu Kyi and all other political prisoners, initiate a credible and inclusive political process, grant access for U.N. representatives and lift restrictions on U.N. agencies and nongovernmental organizations providing humanitarian relief.

Lowenkron said the Burmese government's January 31 session of the National Convention to draft a new constitution was "lacking credibility" since the regime hand-picked delegates, barred the participation of the National League for Democracy (NLD) and other pro-democracy parties and did not allow delegates to debate freely.

The regime wants to redraft Burma's Constitution in such a way as to nullify the results of the legitimate 1990 elections - during which the NLD, followed by the Shan Nationalities League for Democracy, won the majority of seats, Lowenkron said.

Additionally, the United States calls for greater involvement from the international community to help reverse the deteriorating situation in Burma, he said.

"We will continue to press hard for further U.N. Security Council discussion and action on Burma," Lowenkron said. The United States, he added, plans to support strong resolutions in the U.N. General Assembly as well as other international bodies.

He called for the U.N. secretary-general to name another U.N. special envoy to Burma and to give the envoy a broader mandate to enhance coordination with the international community to gain support for pressing the Burmese regime to change.

Hill also cited increased U.S. diplomatic efforts with India, China, Japan and the 10-member Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) to define steps the regime needs to take to address the international community's concerns.

Since 2000, the State Department has administered more than $16 million through the National Endowment for Democracy to focus on democracy and human rights activities, including capacity building for NGOs in exile and collection of information on human rights, Lowenkron said.

One such program involves $650,000 for training Burmese journalists and other media professionals; the United States also has provided $325,000 in scholarships for 200 Burmese students to universities, he said.

"The United States will also continue to monitor and annually report on human rights in Burma, and describe our efforts to support human rights and democracy there," Lowenkron said.

For more information on U.S. policies, see U.S. Support for Democracy in Burma (http://usinfo.state.gov/eap/east_asia_pacific/burma.html).

The text of Hill's remarks to the panel is available on the State Department Web site (<http://www.state.gov/p/eap/rls/rm/60553.htm>).

LOAD-DATE: February 9, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

444 of 445 DOCUMENTS

UPI

January 19, 2006 Thursday 10:46 PM EST

Drug gang plan to smuggle in Osama's guys

BYLINE: SHAUN WATERMANLENGTH: 832 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, Jan. 19

A drug-trafficker who admitted importing a quarter-ton of cocaine from Mexico also plotted to smuggle 20 men he said were Iraqi terrorists into the United States, charging them $8000 a head.

In December 2004, Noel Exinia told associates in wiretapped and consensually recorded conversations that the men were "gente de Osama" -- Osama's guys -- and that they were "really bad people," who were armed and made the smugglers working with them afraid, according to papers filed last week by the U.S. Justice Department with the federal court in Brownsville, Texas.

In the papers, prosecutors say that Exinia was asked to move the men in by his boss in the notorious Gulf Cartel, a Mexican drug smuggling and organized crime network.

Investigators moved immediately at the suggestion of a terrorist nexus. "We jumped on that right away," a federal law enforcement official from one of the agencies involved told United Press International.

But the investigation "did not develop that way," the official said.

"The goods were not as advertised."

Nonetheless, the official said, "We were ready. That's the good news. If it had been the real deal, we had all the visibility we needed. We could have stopped it."

Exinia's plans never came to fruition. He was arrested the following month, and pleaded guilty late last year to drug importation charges.

According to the Brownsville Herald, which first reported the story, his defense lawyers had successfully fought to keep any reference to terrorism out of the trial.

Nonetheless, the case is the latest in a string that have highlighted the security risks posed by human trafficking and weak points in the country's immigration and border security.

A naturalized citizen faces charges in Michigan as the head of a ring that smuggled 200 mainly Iraqi illegal immigrants into the United States since 2001.

Iraqi-born Neeran Hakim Zaia was indicted in October 2004 along with her husband and three others following an undercover investigation spanning three continents that lasted more than three years and cost millions of dollars, U.S. officials familiar with the case told UPI last year.

And other federal officials tell UPI that Zaia is just one of a handful of so-called Tier One human trafficking targets in the sights of federal investigators and U.S. intelligence agencies concerned about their links to "special interest" countries -- those where global Islamic terrorists are thought to have a foothold.

The cases are stoking concern that human trafficking routes, including those across the porous southern border, are increasingly being used to smuggle special interest aliens into the United States.

The 2004 Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act gave legislative form to the U.S. Human Smuggling and Trafficking Center. It aims to co-ordinate the work of federal government agencies and their foreign and international partners against "the separate but related issues of alien smuggling, trafficking in persons, and smuggler support of clandestine terrorist travel," according to the State Department.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, part of the Department of Homeland Security currently holds the directorship of the center, which its web site describes as "an interagency joint intelligence fusion center," conjoining other parts of homeland security, the Departments of State and Justice and "members of the intelligence community."

Exinia will be sentenced in March, according to court records, and could face life in prison.

His lawyer said that there was no evidence of any real terrorist involvement. "They were terrorists only in his mind," John Blaylock told United Press International in a telephone interview from Harlingen, Texas.

Blaylock said his client had been asked about getting people over the border, but the idea that they were Iraqi terrorists "was an invention of Noel Exinia's."

He said the reference had none the less "got the attention" of federal authorities. "He got himself in a world of trouble."

Blaylock added prosecutors were introducing the terrorism conversations as "relevant conduct," to argue for a longer sentence even though "They know there were no real terrorists involved." He accused them of "piling on."

"It is unseemly," he said.

According to the pre-sentence review filing by federal prosecutors, the wiretapped and consensually recorded conversations about the "gente de Osama" took place largely with a pilot who had volunteered to help with his drug importation business and who later become a federal informant.

The pilot was husband to a "curandera," a traditional Mexican spiritualist, and met Exinia after the smuggler and his brother Carlos had asked for her help in silencing someone they believed to be an informant, and in blocking a police investigation after Carlos was arrested.

The curandera made "A doll with certain characteristics," that the brothers believed would "help in controlling" the informant and in "closing the mouth" of the policeman leading the investigation.

LOAD-DATE: January 20, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

445 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

January 11, 2006 Wednesday 4:58 AM GMT

ASIAN LIVES: Ex-prostitute helps others escape the vice trap

LENGTH: 1725 wordsDATELINE: HONG KONG, Jan 11 2006

When ships carrying thousands of American servicemen sailed into the former American naval base in the Philippines' Subic Bay for routine port calls during the 1980s, it was not just the shore crews who were ready for their arrival.

Greeting them was blasting rock music from hundreds of bars in nearby Olongapo City, and inside were thousands of call-girls waiting for their next uniformed "trick".

Among them was Minda Pascual.

"The bar owners would announce that a big ship was coming in and they always said that we should look our best for the customers," Pascual recalls.

It was a reception the seamen eagerly awaited after months at sea. But behind the parties and the colourful neon lights, and hidden by the girls' smiles, make-up and scandalously short skirts, lurked intense misery.

Most of the 16,000 women estimated to have worked the bars around the largest overseas naval base were forced into the sex industry.

Far from the lip-glossed world of Suzy Wong and the other "happy hookers" of fictionalised Asia, the experience of Pascual and her colleagues was anything but fun. During eight years as a call-girl in Olongapo and the capital Manila, Pascual says she was raped, beaten, forced into drug addiction and driven to the brink of suicide by abusive clients, pimps and bar owners.

"I would have to take drugs because I could not accept what they would do to me unless I was high," she says of her days as a sex worker, when she masked her pain through marijuana and methamphetamine hydrochloride, a stimulant popularly known as "shabu" or "ice".

"If I didn't have drugs I couldn't work. I couldn't dance or loosen up enough to show my body," she says. "Every time I felt depressed, I felt suicidal. But every time I used the drugs and alcohol, I felt happier."

Pascual has since pulled herself from the vicious cycle of poverty that beats a well-trodden path to prostitution. Now she counsels younger women who face similar prospects in an industry that, despite the US pull-out from Subic Bay in 1992, continues to fester, catering to a new generation of civilian sex tourists.

Her mission brought her to Hong Kong last month for the World Trade Organisation summit to highlight the problem of human trafficking and violence against women in the sex trade.

Her aim is simple: to spare other young women the misery she endured.

"I have to make myself a role model and show them they too can survive without being a prostitute," says Pascual, who visits sex workers in her old stomping ground and tries to persuade them to leave the seedy life behind.

"I know this is a slow process but I want to give them hope and make them realise there are other ways to live and other kinds of jobs they can do," Pascual says.

She knows too well the despair that sucks the helpless women into this life. Twenty years on, Pascual still sheds tears when she tells her story.

-- 'I didn't want to save my life anymore' --

Born in the southern part of the main Philippines island of Luzon, Pascual was 16 when she began working the bars, fresh out of high school and with heady dreams of becoming a restaurateur.

She asked her aunt for help in getting her a job. The aunt sold her to a man who pimped her to a massive nightclub of 3,000 girls in Olongapo in return for a cut of her first four months of "wages".

Pascual's "training" was brutal. She was locked in a room for a month, starved and force-fed drugs and alcohol to ensure she was addicted and could be more easily controlled.

"My aunt always said to me I would be going home tomorrow. But it never happened," the 39-year-old recalls.

She was often beaten unconscious for refusing to have sex with customers, but had no money for hospital treatment. Her old community shunned her.

"I didn't want to save my life anymore. I felt really dirty. People all looked down on me. Even if I wore perfume, had a bath, no matter what I did, people still considered me as dirty. I hated all the things that were going on. They ruined my life," Pascual says.

During her years working the bars, Pascual had five abortions and bore three children by different strangers. She made almost no money as what little she earned was spent on food, babysitting, rent and pay-offs to corrupt police to prevent her being arrested.

Leaving the job was not an option.

"I had no choice and needed money and food to survive. I had no dignity. My self-esteem was very low," she says.

Pascual had no one to turn to. She had never met her biological father because he was on constant leave with the military, and her mother no longer made contact with her. The bar owners threatened to kill her if she ran away.

"I was depressed, I was losing my hope. I was intoxicated with drugs and alcohol. I didn't want to think so I let it go on," she says.

-- 'Most women in prostitution are victims of human trafficking' --

Jean Enriquez, regional deputy director of Coalition Against Trafficking in Women, says Pascual's story is not unusual in the Philippines. Nor is the problem restricted to Olongapo.

Thousands of women, as well as underaged boys and girls, are stuck in a similar plight across a country that has become one of the major centres for the global sex tourism industry, she says.

According to a report commissioned by the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), prostitution is a massive industry and the fourth largest source of income in the Philippines.

Enriquez estimates that at least 400,000 women work in prostitution in the staunchly Roman Catholic country, even though it is illegal. She says poverty in Philippines forces millions of people to seek work abroad -- but that's often when they fall into traps set by human traffickers.

"The basic problem is the massive poverty in the country," she says. "A lot of women have no jobs and are desperate for money."

A 2004 study by End Child Prostitution, Child Pornography and Trafficking of Children for Sexual Purposes (ECPAT) found family and close friends sometimes helped recruit children for prostitution, some in the genuine belief they were helping the children and family out of poverty.

Enriquez says many Filipinos are being transported to Japan, South Korea and Hong Kong, where they work as entertainers, dancers or domestic helpers but often end up sex slaves in nightclubs or massage parlours.

Despite being one of its strongest allies, the Philippines is on the US's human trafficking watchlist, cited as a source, transit point and destination for trafficked women, men and children.

John Miller, director of the US State Department tasked with fighting human trafficking, says despite detailed and well-drafted laws against the crime in the Philippines, few prosecutions are brought. He blames poor policing and corruption for hindering any crackdown.

"The biggest challenge facing the Philippines and the area most in need of improvement has been in the law-enforcement area," he says.

Enriquez, along with Pascual and other advocates, are fighting to push through a law that decriminalises prostitution, saying sex workers are stigmatised in the Philippines' conservative society.

"Most of these women in prostitution are victims of human trafficking. They should not be arrested. Those who buy and sell women should be the ones who are punished," Enriquez says.

-- 'This is still very painful for me' --

Leaving Olongapo was not easy for Pascual. Without a job, she moved to Manila hoping to find work but only found herself going back to work in a bar.

Eventually she made up her mind to get out of prostitution altogether at the end of 1998.

"I decided not to go back any more as my kids were growing up. I was disappointed with myself but I didn't want them to be disappointed with me," she says.

Pascual found help at BUKAL, a support group for female street workers, and other women's organisations that gave her moral support as she finally summoned the courage to quit the bar she worked at -- without the threatened retribution she had long feared.

She began working for BUKAL and in 2003, she founded a support and campaign group called Bagong Kamalayan Collective, or New Consciousness, that provides counselling services to prostitutes and training on legal issues on the rights of the women.

She says there are thousands of women with similar stories to hers -- many sexually abused as a child, as she was, and too embarrassed to talk about their problems.

"Every time I visit these women on the streets, they tell me the same story. They remind me of my past," she says. "This is still very painful for me."

Her group creates alternative jobs for prostitutes, such as making soap and providing catering services to other NGOs.

But Pascual knows too well it is an uphill struggle. Even she is not totally free from her past, despite a year of counselling and a regular stream of anti-depressants. She never spoke to her mother again and her biological father was in his 60s by the time she found him.

"He probably knew what happened to me but just didn't want to talk about it. He never asked me what happened," she says. He died last year at the age of 72.

She finds it hard to trust men again, but through friends she found a partner, a company driver. They have been together for six years.

"I even blame him for what happened to me. But he is always so understanding. He often tells me not to look back and that I have to move on with my life. He gives me support every time I feel depressed," Pascual says.

But what really helps her to go forward is her three children, now aged 20, 17 and seven -- even though they remind her of her unhappy past.

"They blamed me for not having a father. People say their mother is a prostitute. It's very hard for them," she says. "Sometimes they remind me of the bad times I had. It's always very hard to forget. That's why I always keep myself busy so I don't think about it," she says.

Her oldest son is going to college and plans to fulfill the same dream his mother had -- opening a restaurant. Her second son went into rehab to solve a drugs problem but has since kicked his habit.

"This Christmas, he sent me a card to tell me he was proud to have a mum like me ... and wrote 'I love you'. It's the first time he's done that. I cried," Pascual says.

"My children are the ones who inspire me. That's why I'm working and helping these women. If one woman says to me that she wants to quit, I'm happy.

"That's a good therapy for myself."

LOAD-DATE: January 12, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2006 Agence France Presse
All Rights Reserved

1 of 359 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

December 22, 2005 Thursday 5:06 AM ESTMICHELE SISON NAMED ABOLITIONIST AMBASSADOR OF YEAR 2005*BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 136 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons issued the following press release:

The Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons has named Ambassador to the United Arab Emirates Michele Sison the 2005 Abolitionist Ambassador of the Year.

Ambassador Sison's leadership helped stimulate U.A.E. government action to: rescue and shelter more than 800 trafficked children, repatriate camel jockey victims, and pass a law criminalizing child camel jockey trafficking. These actions lifted the U.A.E. out of Tier 3 of the Trafficking in Persons Report. This is an example of the great progress that can be achieved when the U.S. and other countries partner to address this issue in a meaningful way, thereby giving hope of new life to some of the world's most vulnerable citizens.

LOAD-DATE: January 3, 2006LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2005 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

2 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

December 15, 2005 Thursday 11:27 PM GMT

US to give more teeth to human trafficking laws

BYLINE: P. ParameswaranLENGTH: 593 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, Dec 15 2005

The United States is to give more teeth to laws against human trafficking and widen criteria under which nations are blacklisted, officials said Thursday.

The House of Representatives overwhelmingly passed a bill late Wednesday providing greater powers to prosecute American traffickers abroad and those who launder money through such illicit activities.

US civilian contractors, federal employees and even their dependents accused of human trafficking overseas could be prosecuted in US courts under the bill.

US military personnel in South Korea have been accused previously of patronizing bars with women from the Philippines and Russia who had been forced into the sex trade.

"We want to get everyone thinking protection, prosecution and prevention -- all of these are mutually reinforcing obviously but the more we do that, I think the better we stop this modern day slavery," Republican legislator Chris Smith, the author of the bill, told AFP in an interview.

He expected the "very comprehensive" bill to also be passed by the Senate and signed into law by President George W. Bush, who is "strongly in favour" of the legislation.

"With a crime as abhorrent as human trafficking, it is essential that the United States takes the lead and that includes within our own borders," said Smith, who just returned from a trip to Asia where he had campaigned strongly for stiffer measures against trafficking in persons.

The bill tightens criteria that blacklists governments turning a blind eye to human trafficking.

The blacklist appears in the annual "Trafficking in Persons Report" by the State Department and countries included face economic and security sanctions.

The bill requires governments to reduce demand for commercial sex acts and prevent citizens from participating in sex tourism.

Following violations among UN peacekeeping troops in several countries this year, the bill requires governments to investigate and punish any of their peacekeepers who engage in or facilitate trafficking.

"This is a significant piece of legislation that, for the first time, expands domestic trafficking protections in the United States and also targets prostitution and the sex trade industry for the first time," Smith said.

"It will have a large effect on the sex trade industry not only in the US, but across the globe specifically in Asia, where the sex trade problem is so rampant," Smith said.

Each year, an estimated 600,000-800,000 people are trafficked across international borders, mostly women and children, including 14,500-17,500 persons into the United States.

Smith said in the past four years, twice as many people in the United States had been prosecuted and convicted for trafficking than in the prior four-year period.

Worldwide, he said, more than 3,000 traffickers were convicted last year, during which also about 40 countries tightened or introduced new laws against trafficking.

According to estimates by the Congressional Budget Office, the bill would provide 361 million dollars over the next two years to combat trafficking in persons worldwide.

The money would also be used for upgrading or building rehabilitation centers for victims of trafficking so that they could equip themselves with vocational skills to help reintegrate them into society, Smith said.

Topping the US State Department human trafficking blacklist are Ecuador, Myanmar, Saudi Arabia, Venezuela, Cambodia, Kuwait, Cuba and North Korea.

Among nations in the second tier of a "watch list" are Mexico, South Africa, Bahrain, the Philippines, Russia, India, Zimbabwe and China.

LOAD-DATE: December 16, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

3 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

November 15, 2005

Western Hemisphere Praised for Fight Against Human Trafficking; State Department's Miller singles out Brazil for actions on labor victims

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 2814 words

The Western Hemisphere has come a "very long way in the last few years" in addressing the problem of human trafficking, says John Miller, director of the U.S. State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

In November 15 prepared remarks at the Inter-American Development Bank (IDB) in Washington, Miller said the hemisphere is now much more active than in previous years in fighting the human trafficking problem, which he likened to "modern-day slavery."

"When I came to the State Department three years ago, the issue was in its infancy. We are seeing so much more recognition [of] and activity" against trafficking, Miller told the IDB.

The official singled out the actions of Brazil, in particular, in combating labor trafficking.

"Brazil has been especially diligent and productive in this regard. It is a world leader in identifying labor victims, especially in agriculture," said Miller.

However, Miller said he is concerned that a State Department "Tier 2 watch list" contains a number of Western Hemisphere countries that are weak in prosecuting human trafficking. Those countries are Belize, the Dominican Republic, Haiti, Mexico, Nicaragua and Suriname. More information about the Tier 2 watch list is available in the Trafficking in Persons 2005 report and the electronic journal Responses to Human Trafficking on the State Department Web site.

The main purpose of this watch list is to "stimulate action, not make a comparative list of who's up and who's down," said Miller. "We make each recommendation based on the minimum standards described in the law, not as a function of politics."

Miller said that in recommending follow-up action, the State Department looks at three facets of the anti-trafficking fight -- prosecution, prevention and protection.

"My message -- in every country I visit and with every dignitary I meet with -- is that each part of this three-part approach is essential," Miller said.

The Western Hemisphere needs to give extra attention to four broad areas of the human trafficking phenomenon, said Miller. Those areas, he said, are the "explosion" of child prostitution and commercial sexual exploitation, the many "faces of the migration issue and the frequency [with which] human smuggling turns into human trafficking," the fact that state corruption "often facilitates human trafficking" and the need to encourage nongovernmental involvement in the solution because "private organizations are often essential in victim protection."

Miller said the U.S. government estimates that between 600,000 and 800,000 people are trafficked across borders around the world each year, and between 14,500 and 17,500 people are trafficked into the United States yearly. Millions more are trafficked within their own countries, he added.

On the positive side, Miller said that in recent years, governments and citizens and nongovernmental organizations have begun to awaken to the problem of human trafficking. Worldwide, the number of trafficking-related convictions has increased to more than 3,000 in 2004, and new legislation to combat human trafficking was approved in 39 countries, he said.

"We need your dedication and energy and patience," Miller told the IDB. He added that the U.S. government "can engage governments, we can seek to educate people around the world, but the fight to end modern slavery" depends on the involvement of nongovernmental organizations, regular citizens, individual diplomats, businesspeople and others -- "all of us committed to the new abolition movement" of ending human trafficking.

Following is the text of Miller's prepared remarks:

(begin text)

REMARKS BY JOHN MILLER,
DIRECTOR, OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS,
U.S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
AT THE
INTER-AMERICAN DEVELOPMENT BANK
WASHINGTON, D.C.
NOVEMBER 15, 2005

Good afternoon. I am honored to speak to such a distinguished audience today. It is especially gratifying to come before a group of people who are normally thinking about finance and development. Your work is, in many ways, the ultimate solution to the circumstances that make millions of men, women, and children vulnerable to the global crime of human trafficking -- my subject today.

Modern-day slavery, euphemistically called trafficking in persons, is a global phenomenon that relies on coercion and exploitation. It thrives on converting hope to fear. It is maintained through violence. And it is highly profitable.

Human trafficking extends into every country in the world, including the United States. We have not yet found a country immune, largely because in every country there are people hoping to improve their lives through work. Too often there aren't enough domestic opportunities so they seek jobs abroad -- and that's when individuals become vulnerable to the lies, coercion, and manipulation that traffickers employ to lure victims.

Fundamentally, human trafficking deprives people of their human rights and freedoms, which is the most prominent reason that the U.S. government is working to confront this despicable practice. But human trafficking is a multi-dimensional threat. It is a global health risk, profoundly harming individual victims and facilitating the transmission of disease, including HIV/AIDS. And it is a threat to the safety and security of nations because of the profits generated for organized crime networks that have no respect for the rule of law.

By definition, human trafficking involves force, fraud, or coercion -- legally sanitized words that cover intimidation, kidnapping, beatings, rape, deceit, abandonment, and murder. Victims describe mind-numbing varieties of torture, psychological abuse, and physical deprivation that are at the heart of the trafficking experience.

Before generalizing, allow me to introduce one victim. Rosa was trafficked from Mexico to the U.S. Her true story illustrates the nature and scope and harm of human trafficking.

Rosa was 13 and waiting tables in a restaurant in a small village near Vera Cruz, Mexico, when she was approached by an acquaintance of the family who told her, "You know you can make 10 times more money in the U.S. doing what you're doing here. I know someone who can find you a job in Texas. You can send money home to your family; you can have your own life. If you don't like the job, we'll get you a new one. If you're homesick, we'll bring you back across the border. You can't lose."

Rosa was young and hopeful. She asked her parents if she could go, but they forbade her. But she wanted a better life than what she had, and so, against her parents' and friends' warnings, she secretly accepted the offer. She was told to go to the main hotel in town on Friday evening. When she got there, a car was waiting, with several other young girls in it from neighboring villages.

They drove as far up into the desert toward the Mexican-American border. Then they arrived at what looked like a pre-arranged place in the desert on the Mexican side. There were dozens more girls from other towns in Mexico, and more men too.

On the ground were backpacks and water bottles. They were told to put the backpacks on their backs, and then they began to walk. They walked four days and four nights -- through the desert, across the Rio Grande, and into Brownsville, Texas, where they were picked up by a white van and driven across Texas, Louisiana and into rural Florida, where they were dropped off in front a series of trailers.

A big guy came out and told them, "I've just bought you. Now you work for me." A little later an older woman took them to spots in the trailer. She told Rosa she was in a brothel and that she would have to buy her freedom by sexually servicing men.

Rosa was young. She was a virgin. She was Catholic. She knew what the woman was telling her was bad -- a sin. She began to cry and begged to be taken to a restaurant to work. But she was told, "There are no restaurant jobs, only this." When she refused to do what they said, the burly man brought out three other men who took her into one of the trailers and gang-raped her to induct her into the "business." Then they locked her in the trailer without food and water until she succumbed.

For the next six months she was a prisoner. She was forced to service 10 or more men a day. On the weekends it was as many as 20 to 30 men. The men bought a ticket, which was a condom, for $20. But they often didn't use it.

Twice Rosa was impregnated and twice forced to have an abortion and twice forced back into the brothel the next day. She also was forced to pay off the price of the abortions in more services. She was beaten if she refused a customer's demands. She was guarded 24 hours a day, even when she went to the bathroom. She was passed around at private parties the trafficking ring held in the evenings and on weekends, for in addition to trafficking women and children, this ring also robbed banks and ran drugs.

Once she and several others tried to escape. They were caught and pistol-whipped around the head and face in front of the other girls -- to deter all of them. She became sick and felt crazy. The traffickers offered her drugs and alcohol to numb her pain.

She was only rescued when one of the young women jumped out of a second-story window at one of the private parties and ran to a neighbor's house. The neighbor called the local police. The police called the INS and FBI, and a sting operation was set up. Over 40 young women and girls were rescued, and 14 traffickers were arrested.

A medical doctor examined Rosa. She had several STDs; she had pelvic inflammatory disease and scar tissue from the forced abortions. She had broken bones that hadn't healed properly from the beatings. She was addicted to drugs and alcohol, had post-traumatic stress syndrome, including nightmares, flashbacks, depression, and suicidal tendencies. In short, she was physically, mentally, emotionally, and spiritually broken.

To make matters worse, when Rosa was discovered, the U.S. didn't have a trafficking law. Instead of really rescuing Rosa, the police arrested her and the other young women and children, and locked them up in jail along with the traffickers.

If you take Rosa's story and multiply it by hundreds of thousands, even millions, you will get an idea of the magnitude of the problem.

The U.S. government estimates that between 600,000 and 800,000 people are trafficked across borders each year, and between 14,500 and 17,500 are trafficked into the U.S. each year. Millions more are trafficked within their own countries.

People are trafficked for many purposes. You just heard one story -- of trafficking for purposes of prostitution. But men, women, and children are trafficked for forced labor into construction, agriculture, sweatshops, and factories. Children are trafficked for camel jockeying, and to be child soldiers, or into brick factories, rug-making sweatshops, or cocoa plantations because their small bodies and little fingers are useful in making or picking these products. Women and children are trafficked for domestic servitude and sexual exploitation. Up to 80 percent of the victims of transnational human trafficking are women and children.

Countries can be divided roughly into countries of origin (usually the resource-poor countries or countries that are politically or economically unstable); countries of destination (usually resource-rich developed countries, where demand is located); and transit countries (countries along a trafficking route, where traffickers have safe passage and harbor). Some countries are countries of origin, transit, and destination.

In the past, people working against human trafficking, and the State Department, have focused most attention on countries of origin. More and more, we are also focusing on the demand for slaves, generally coming from wealthier countries, that creates the market for more victims.

I've made the point that the crime of human trafficking is a global problem. I would like to address a few points regarding the situation in the hemisphere.

There are many tools to combat human trafficking, and one of these is the Trafficking in Persons Report mandated by the U.S. Congress since 2000.

Among Western Hemisphere countries, we have:

-- Two Tier 1 countries: Colombia and Canada

-- Twelve countries on Tier 2: Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Guyana, Honduras, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Uruguay

-- Six countries on Tier 2 Watch List: Belize, Dominican Republic, Haiti, Mexico, Nicaragua, Suriname

-- Three countries on Tier 3: Cuba, Ecuador, and Venezuela

-- Bolivia and Jamaica started on Tier 3 but took significant steps to avoid sanctions and were raised to Tier 2 by the President in September.

The main purpose of this report is to stimulate action, not make a comparative list of who's up and who's down. We make each recommendation based on the minimum standards described in the law, not as a function of politics.

In each country narrative and in recommending follow-up action we look at three facets of the anti-slavery fight, also known as the three "Ps": prosecution, prevention, and protection. My message -- in every country I visit and with every dignitary I meet with -- is that each part of this three-part approach is essential.

To prosecute, regional cooperation is essential. The traffickers function as long as they operate beyond the law and between systems of enforcement. Prevention is self-evident but under-employed. Vulnerable people, especially women and children, should be warned that promises of work abroad are often traps. And protection appears to be the greatest challenge for many governments that, tragically, treat slaves like criminals.

The Western Hemisphere has come a very long way in the last few years in addressing the complex human-trafficking challenge. When I came to the State Department three years ago, the issue was in its infancy. We are seeing so much more recognition and activity.

I want to single out the actions of Brazil in combating labor trafficking. Brazil has been especially diligent and productive in this regard. It is a world leader in identifying labor victims, especially in agriculture.

I am worried to see a number of "weak Tier Twos" from the hemisphere on the watch list. Many countries are still weak on prosecution. This is true around the globe, and it is true in the U.S.

Four broad areas of the human trafficking phenomenon that the hemisphere should put some extra attention on are: 1) the explosion of child prostitution and commercial sexual exploitation, 2) the many faces of the migration issue and the frequency that human smuggling turns into human trafficking, 3) the fact that state corruption often facilitates human trafficking, and; 4) the need to encourage non-government involvement in the solution because private organizations are often essential in victim protection.

If prostitution and commercial sexual exploitation were not tolerated, we wouldn't have sex trafficking. To confront that fact, we need to confront the demand for victims, not just the supply of victims.

Migration continues to diversify. There is increasing Asian migration into the hemisphere, and migration trends from the hemisphere to Europe, not to mention migration into the U.S. More and more, we find bonded labor schemes function to put people -- who start out as willing participants -- into slavery that is simply inhuman. Can you imagine this? Chinese smugglers commonly charge $20,000-$30,000 a head to arrange transport to the hemisphere. Essentially the smuggler owns that person when they reach whatever destination they reach. And the debt is often impossible to fulfill. It's labor slavery, not a new future.

For a programmatic organization such as the Inter-Development Bank, anti-trafficking programs can be integrated into many of your activities, especially in rule of law, anti-corruption, and social welfare programs as well as programs targeting youth.

I have painted a bleak picture but in recent years governments and citizens and non-governmental organizations have begun to awake. Worldwide, the number of trafficking-related convictions has increased to over 3,000 in 2004, and new anti-human trafficking legislation was approved in 39 countries. The struggle will be a long one.

We need your dedication and energy and patience. The U.S. government can engage governments, we can seek to educate people around the world, but the fight to end modern slavery depends on the involvement of NGOs, citizens, individual diplomats, businesspeople, the IFIs [international financial institutions], all of us committed to the new abolition movement, together.

(end text)

(Distributed by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: November 16, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

4 of 359 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

November 15, 2005 Tuesday

WESTERN HEMISPHERE PRAISED FOR FIGHT AGAINST HUMAN TRAFFICKING

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 2803 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the State Department:

The Western Hemisphere has come a "very long way in the last few years" in addressing the problem of human trafficking, says John Miller, director of the U.S. State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

In November 15 prepared remarks at the Inter-American Development Bank (IDB) in Washington, Miller said the hemisphere is now much more active than in previous years in fighting the human trafficking problem, which he likened to "modern-day slavery."

"When I came to the State Department three years ago, the issue was in its infancy. We are seeing so much more recognition [of] and activity" against trafficking, Miller told the IDB.

The official singled out the actions of Brazil, in particular, in combating labor trafficking.

"Brazil has been especially diligent and productive in this regard. It is a world leader in identifying labor victims, especially in agriculture," said Miller.

However, Miller said he is concerned that a State Department "Tier 2 watch list" contains a number of Western Hemisphere countries that are weak in prosecuting human trafficking. Those countries are Belize, the Dominican Republic, Haiti, Mexico, Nicaragua and Suriname. More information about the Tier 2 watch list is available in the Trafficking in Persons 2005 report and the electronic journal Responses to Human Trafficking on the State Department Web site.

The main purpose of this watch list is to "stimulate action, not make a comparative list of who's up and who's down," said Miller. "We make each recommendation based on the minimum standards described in the law, not as a function of politics."

Miller said that in recommending follow-up action, the State Department looks at three facets of the anti-trafficking fight -- prosecution, prevention and protection.

"My message -- in every country I visit and with every dignitary I meet with -- is that each part of this three-part approach is essential," Miller said.

The Western Hemisphere needs to give extra attention to four broad areas of the human trafficking phenomenon, said Miller. Those areas, he said, are the "explosion" of child prostitution and commercial sexual exploitation, the many "faces of the migration issue and the frequency [with which] human smuggling turns into human trafficking," the fact that state corruption "often facilitates human trafficking" and the need to encourage nongovernmental involvement in the solution because "private organizations are often essential in victim protection."

Miller said the U.S. government estimates that between 600,000 and 800,000 people are trafficked across borders around the world each year, and between 14,500 and 17,500 people are trafficked into the United States yearly. Millions more are trafficked within their own countries, he added.

On the positive side, Miller said that in recent years, governments and citizens and nongovernmental organizations have begun to awaken to the problem of human trafficking. Worldwide, the number of trafficking-related convictions has increased to more than 3,000 in 2004, and new legislation to combat human trafficking was approved in 39 countries, he said.

"We need your dedication and energy and patience," Miller told the IDB. He added that the U.S. government "can engage governments, we can seek to educate people around the world, but the fight to end modern slavery" depends on the involvement of nongovernmental organizations, regular citizens, individual diplomats, businesspeople and others -- "all of us committed to the new abolition movement" of ending human trafficking.

Following is the text of Miller's prepared remarks:

(begin text)

REMARKS BY JOHN MILLER, DIRECTOR, OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

AT THE INTER-AMERICAN DEVELOPMENT BANK WASHINGTON, D.C. NOVEMBER 15, 2005

Good afternoon. I am honored to speak to such a distinguished audience today. It is especially gratifying to come before a group of people who are normally thinking about finance and development. Your work is, in many ways, the ultimate solution to the circumstances that make millions of men, women, and children vulnerable to the global crime of human trafficking -- my subject today.

Modern-day slavery, euphemistically called trafficking in persons, is a global phenomenon that relies on coercion and exploitation. It thrives on converting hope to fear. It is maintained through violence. And it is highly profitable.

Human trafficking extends into every country in the world, including the United States. We have not yet found a country immune, largely because in every country there are people hoping to improve their lives through work. Too often there aren't enough domestic opportunities so they seek jobs abroad -- and that's when individuals become vulnerable to the lies, coercion, and manipulation that traffickers employ to lure victims.

Fundamentally, human trafficking deprives people of their human rights and freedoms, which is the most prominent reason that the U.S. government is working to confront this despicable practice. But human trafficking is a multi-dimensional threat. It is a global health risk, profoundly harming individual victims and facilitating the transmission of disease, including HIV/AIDS. And it is a threat to the safety and security of nations because of the profits generated for organized crime networks that have no respect for the rule of law.

By definition, human trafficking involves force, fraud, or coercion -- legally sanitized words that cover intimidation, kidnapping, beatings, rape, deceit, abandonment, and murder. Victims describe mind-numbing varieties of torture, psychological abuse, and physical deprivation that are at the heart of the trafficking experience.

Before generalizing, allow me to introduce one victim. Rosa was trafficked from Mexico to the U.S. Her true story illustrates the nature and scope and harm of human trafficking.

Rosa was 13 and waiting tables in a restaurant in a small village near Vera Cruz, Mexico, when she was approached by an acquaintance of the family who told her, "You know you can make 10 times more money in the U.S. doing what you're doing here. I know someone who can find you a job in Texas. You can send money home to your family; you can have your own life. If you don't like the job, we'll get you a new one. If you're homesick, we'll bring you back across the border. You can't lose."

Rosa was young and hopeful. She asked her parents if she could go, but they forbade her. But she wanted a better life than what she had, and so, against her parents' and friends' warnings, she secretly accepted the offer. She was told to go to the main hotel in town on Friday evening. When she got there, a car was waiting, with several other young girls in it from neighboring villages.

They drove as far up into the desert toward the Mexican-American border. Then they arrived at what looked like a pre-arranged place in the desert on the Mexican side. There were dozens more girls from other towns in Mexico, and more men too.

On the ground were backpacks and water bottles. They were told to put the backpacks on their backs, and then they began to walk. They walked four days and four nights -- through the desert, across the Rio Grande, and into Brownsville, Texas, where they were picked up by a white van and driven across Texas, Louisiana and into rural Florida, where they were dropped off in front a series of trailers.

A big guy came out and told them, "I've just bought you. Now you work for me." A little later an older woman took them to spots in the trailer. She told Rosa she was in a brothel and that she would have to buy her freedom by sexually servicing men.

Rosa was young. She was a virgin. She was Catholic. She knew what the woman was telling her was bad -- a sin. She began to cry and begged to be taken to a restaurant to work. But she was told, "There are no restaurant jobs, only this." When she refused to do what they said, the burly man brought out three other men who took her into one of the trailers and gang-raped her to induct her into the "business." Then they locked her in the trailer without food and water until she succumbed.

For the next six months she was a prisoner. She was forced to service 10 or more men a day. On the weekends it was as many as 20 to 30 men. The men bought a ticket, which was a condom, for $20. But they often didn't use it.

Twice Rosa was impregnated and twice forced to have an abortion and twice forced back into the brothel the next day. She also was forced to pay off the price of the abortions in more services. She was beaten if she refused a customer's demands. She was guarded 24 hours a day, even when she went to the bathroom. She was passed around at private parties the trafficking ring held in the evenings and on weekends, for in addition to trafficking women and children, this ring also robbed banks and ran drugs.

Once she and several others tried to escape. They were caught and pistol-whipped around the head and face in front of the other girls -- to deter all of them. She became sick and felt crazy. The traffickers offered her drugs and alcohol to numb her pain.

She was only rescued when one of the young women jumped out of a second-story window at one of the private parties and ran to a neighbor's house. The neighbor called the local police. The police called the INS and FBI, and a sting operation was set up. Over 40 young women and girls were rescued, and 14 traffickers were arrested.

A medical doctor examined Rosa. She had several STDs; she had pelvic inflammatory disease and scar tissue from the forced abortions. She had broken bones that hadn't healed properly from the beatings. She was addicted to drugs and alcohol, had post-traumatic stress syndrome, including nightmares, flashbacks, depression, and suicidal tendencies. In short, she was physically, mentally, emotionally, and spiritually broken.

To make matters worse, when Rosa was discovered, the U.S. didn't have a trafficking law. Instead of really rescuing Rosa, the police arrested her and the other young women and children, and locked them up in jail along with the traffickers.

If you take Rosa's story and multiply it by hundreds of thousands, even millions, you will get an idea of the magnitude of the problem.

The U.S. government estimates that between 600,000 and 800,000 people are trafficked across borders each year, and between 14,500 and 17,500 are trafficked into the U.S. each year. Millions more are trafficked within their own countries.

People are trafficked for many purposes. You just heard one story -- of trafficking for purposes of prostitution. But men, women, and children are trafficked for forced labor into construction, agriculture, sweatshops, and factories. Children are trafficked for camel jockeying, and to be child soldiers, or into brick factories, rug-making sweatshops, or cocoa plantations because their small bodies and little fingers are useful in making or picking these products. Women and children are trafficked for domestic servitude and sexual exploitation. Up to 80 percent of the victims of transnational human trafficking are women and children.

Countries can be divided roughly into countries of origin (usually the resource-poor countries or countries that are politically or economically unstable); countries of destination (usually resource-rich developed countries, where demand is located); and transit countries (countries along a trafficking route, where traffickers have safe passage and harbor). Some countries are countries of origin, transit, and destination.

In the past, people working against human trafficking, and the State Department, have focused most attention on countries of origin. More and more, we are also focusing on the demand for slaves, generally coming from wealthier countries, that creates the market for more victims.

I've made the point that the crime of human trafficking is a global problem. I would like to address a few points regarding the situation in the hemisphere.

There are many tools to combat human trafficking, and one of these is the Trafficking in Persons Report mandated by the U.S. Congress since 2000.

Among Western Hemisphere countries, we have:

-- Two Tier 1 countries: Colombia and Canada

-- Twelve countries on Tier 2: Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Guyana, Honduras, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Uruguay

-- Six countries on Tier 2 Watch List: Belize, Dominican Republic, Haiti, Mexico, Nicaragua, Suriname

-- Three countries on Tier 3: Cuba, Ecuador, and Venezuela

-- Bolivia and Jamaica started on Tier 3 but took significant steps to avoid sanctions and were raised to Tier 2 by the President in September.

The main purpose of this report is to stimulate action, not make a comparative list of who's up and who's down. We make each recommendation based on the minimum standards described in the law, not as a function of politics.

In each country narrative and in recommending follow-up action we look at three facets of the anti-slavery fight, also known as the three "Ps": prosecution, prevention, and protection. My message -- in every country I visit and with every dignitary I meet with -- is that each part of this three-part approach is essential.

To prosecute, regional cooperation is essential. The traffickers function as long as they operate beyond the law and between systems of enforcement. Prevention is self-evident but under-employed. Vulnerable people, especially women and children, should be warned that promises of work abroad are often traps. And protection appears to be the greatest challenge for many governments that, tragically, treat slaves like criminals.

The Western Hemisphere has come a very long way in the last few years in addressing the complex human-trafficking challenge. When I came to the State Department three years ago, the issue was in its infancy. We are seeing so much more recognition and activity.

I want to single out the actions of Brazil in combating labor trafficking. Brazil has been especially diligent and productive in this regard. It is a world leader in identifying labor victims, especially in agriculture.

I am worried to see a number of "weak Tier Twos" from the hemisphere on the watch list. Many countries are still weak on prosecution. This is true around the globe, and it is true in the U.S.

Four broad areas of the human trafficking phenomenon that the hemisphere should put some extra attention on are: 1) the explosion of child prostitution and commercial sexual exploitation, 2) the many faces of the migration issue and the frequency that human smuggling turns into human trafficking, 3) the fact that state corruption often facilitates human trafficking, and; 4) the need to encourage non-government involvement in the solution because private organizations are often essential in victim protection.

If prostitution and commercial sexual exploitation were not tolerated, we wouldn't have sex trafficking. To confront that fact, we need to confront the demand for victims, not just the supply of victims.

Migration continues to diversify. There is increasing Asian migration into the hemisphere, and migration trends from the hemisphere to Europe, not to mention migration into the U.S. More and more, we find bonded labor schemes function to put people -- who start out as willing participants -- into slavery that is simply inhuman. Can you imagine this? Chinese smugglers commonly charge $20,000-$30,000 a head to arrange transport to the hemisphere. Essentially the smuggler owns that person when they reach whatever destination they reach. And the debt is often impossible to fulfill. It's labor slavery, not a new future.

For a programmatic organization such as the Inter-Development Bank, anti-trafficking programs can be integrated into many of your activities, especially in rule of law, anti-corruption, and social welfare programs as well as programs targeting youth.

I have painted a bleak picture but in recent years governments and citizens and non-governmental organizations have begun to awake. Worldwide, the number of trafficking-related convictions has increased to over 3,000 in 2004, and new anti-human trafficking legislation was approved in 39 countries. The struggle will be a long one.

We need your dedication and energy and patience. The U.S. government can engage governments, we can seek to educate people around the world, but the fight to end modern slavery depends on the involvement of NGOs, citizens, individual diplomats, businesspeople, the IFIs [international financial institutions], all of us committed to the new abolition movement, together.

(end text)

(Distributed by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State. Web site: <http://usinfo.state.gov>)

LOAD-DATE: November 16, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2005 States News Service

5 of 359 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

November 15, 2005 Tuesday 3:34 AM EST

STATE DEPT.: WESTERN HEMISPHERE PRAISED FOR FIGHT AGAINST HUMAN TRAFFICKING

BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 2824 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's International Information Programs issued the following press release:

The Western Hemisphere has come a "very long way in the last few years" in addressing the problem of human trafficking, says John Miller, director of the U.S. State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

In November 15 prepared remarks at the Inter-American Development Bank (IDB) in Washington, Miller said the hemisphere is now much more active than in previous years in fighting the human trafficking problem, which he likened to "modern-day slavery."

"When I came to the State Department three years ago, the issue was in its infancy. We are seeing so much more recognition [of] and activity" against trafficking, Miller told the IDB.

The official singled out the actions of Brazil, in particular, in combating labor trafficking.

"Brazil has been especially diligent and productive in this regard. It is a world leader in identifying labor victims, especially in agriculture," said Miller.

However, Miller said he is concerned that a State Department "Tier 2 watch list" contains a number of Western Hemisphere countries that are weak in prosecuting human trafficking. Those countries are Belize, the Dominican Republic, Haiti, Mexico, Nicaragua and Suriname. More information about the Tier 2 watch list is available in the Trafficking in Persons 2005 report at <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/tiprpt/2005/> and the electronic journal Responses to Human Trafficking on the State Department Web site at <http://usinfo.state.gov/journals/itgic/0603/ijge/ijge0603.htm>

The main purpose of this watch list is to "stimulate action, not make a comparative list of who's up and who's down," said Miller. "We make each recommendation based on the minimum standards described in the law, not as a function of politics."

Miller said that in recommending follow-up action, the State Department looks at three facets of the anti-trafficking fight - prosecution, prevention and protection.

"My message - in every country I visit and with every dignitary I meet with - is that each part of this three-part approach is essential," Miller said.

The Western Hemisphere needs to give extra attention to four broad areas of the human trafficking phenomenon, said Miller. Those areas, he said, are the "explosion" of child prostitution and commercial sexual exploitation, the many "faces of the migration issue and the frequency [with which] human smuggling turns into human trafficking," the fact that state corruption "often facilitates human trafficking" and the need to encourage nongovernmental involvement in the solution because "private organizations are often essential in victim protection."

Miller said the U.S. government estimates that between 600,000 and 800,000 people are trafficked across borders around the world each year, and between 14,500 and 17,500 people are trafficked into the United States yearly. Millions more are trafficked within their own countries, he added.

On the positive side, Miller said that in recent years, governments and citizens and nongovernmental organizations have begun to awaken to the problem of human trafficking. Worldwide, the number of trafficking-related convictions has increased to more than 3,000 in 2004, and new legislation to combat human trafficking was approved in 39 countries, he said.

"We need your dedication and energy and patience," Miller told the IDB. He added that the U.S. government "can engage governments, we can seek to educate people around the world, but the fight to end modern slavery" depends on the involvement of nongovernmental organizations, regular citizens, individual diplomats, businesspeople and others - "all of us committed to the new abolition movement" of ending human trafficking.

Following is the text of Miller's prepared remarks:

(begin text)

REMARKS BY JOHN MILLER,

DIRECTOR, OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS,

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

AT THE

INTER-AMERICAN DEVELOPMENT BANK

WASHINGTON, D.C.

NOVEMBER 15, 2005

Good afternoon. I am honored to speak to such a distinguished audience today. It is especially gratifying to come before a group of people who are normally thinking about finance and development. Your work is, in many ways, the ultimate solution to the circumstances that make millions of men, women, and children vulnerable to the global crime of human trafficking - my subject today.

Modern-day slavery, euphemistically called trafficking in persons, is a global phenomenon that relies on coercion and exploitation. It thrives on converting hope to fear. It is maintained through violence. And it is highly profitable.

Human trafficking extends into every country in the world, including the United States. We have not yet found a country immune, largely because in every country there are people hoping to improve their lives through work. Too often there aren't enough domestic opportunities so they seek jobs abroad - and that's when individuals become vulnerable to the lies, coercion, and manipulation that traffickers employ to lure victims.

Fundamentally, human trafficking deprives people of their human rights and freedoms, which is the most prominent reason that the U.S. government is working to confront this despicable practice. But human trafficking is a multi-dimensional threat. It is a global health risk, profoundly harming individual victims and facilitating the transmission of disease, including HIV/AIDS. And it is a threat to the safety and security of nations because of the profits generated for organized crime networks that have no respect for the rule of law.

By definition, human trafficking involves force, fraud, or coercion - legally sanitized words that cover intimidation, kidnapping, beatings, rape, deceit, abandonment, and murder. Victims describe mind-numbing varieties of torture, psychological abuse, and physical deprivation that are at the heart of the trafficking experience.

Before generalizing, allow me to introduce one victim. Rosa was trafficked from Mexico to the U.S. Her true story illustrates the nature and scope and harm of human trafficking.

Rosa was 13 and waiting tables in a restaurant in a small village near Vera Cruz, Mexico, when she was approached by an acquaintance of the family who told her, "You know you can make 10 times more money in the U.S. doing what you're doing here. I know someone who can find you a job in Texas. You can send money home to your family; you can have your own life. If you don't like the job, we'll get you a new one. If you're homesick, we'll bring you back across the border. You can't lose."

Rosa was young and hopeful. She asked her parents if she could go, but they forbade her. But she wanted a better life than what she had, and so, against her parents' and friends' warnings, she secretly accepted the offer. She was told to go to the main hotel in town on Friday evening. When she got there, a car was waiting, with several other young girls in it from neighboring villages.

They drove as far up into the desert toward the Mexican-American border. Then they arrived at what looked like a pre-arranged place in the desert on the Mexican side. There were dozens more girls from other towns in Mexico, and more men too.

On the ground were backpacks and water bottles. They were told to put the backpacks on their backs, and then they began to walk. They walked four days and four nights - through the desert, across the Rio Grande, and into Brownsville, Texas, where they were picked up by a white van and driven across Texas, Louisiana and into rural Florida, where they were dropped off in front a series of trailers.

A big guy came out and told them, "I've just bought you. Now you work for me." A little later an older woman took them to spots in the trailer. She told Rosa she was in a brothel and that she would have to buy her freedom by sexually servicing men.

Rosa was young. She was a virgin. She was Catholic. She knew what the woman was telling her was bad - a sin. She began to cry and begged to be taken to a restaurant to work. But she was told, "There are no restaurant jobs, only this." When she refused to do what they said, the burly man brought out three other men who took her into one of the trailers and gang-raped her to induct her into the "business." Then they locked her in the trailer without food and water until she succumbed.

For the next six months she was a prisoner. She was forced to service 10 or more men a day. On the weekends it was as many as 20 to 30 men. The men bought a ticket, which was a condom, for $20. But they often didn't use it.

Twice Rosa was impregnated and twice forced to have an abortion and twice forced back into the brothel the next day. She also was forced to pay off the price of the abortions in more services. She was beaten if she refused a customer's demands. She was guarded 24 hours a day, even when she went to the bathroom. She was passed around at private parties the trafficking ring held in the evenings and on weekends, for in addition to trafficking women and children, this ring also robbed banks and ran drugs.

Once she and several others tried to escape. They were caught and pistol-whipped around the head and face in front of the other girls - to deter all of them. She became sick and felt crazy. The traffickers offered her drugs and alcohol to numb her pain.

She was only rescued when one of the young women jumped out of a second-story window at one of the private parties and ran to a neighbor's house. The neighbor called the local police. The police called the INS and FBI, and a sting operation was set up. Over 40 young women and girls were rescued, and 14 traffickers were arrested.

A medical doctor examined Rosa. She had several STDs; she had pelvic inflammatory disease and scar tissue from the forced abortions. She had broken bones that hadn't healed properly from the beatings. She was addicted to drugs and alcohol, had post-traumatic stress syndrome, including nightmares, flashbacks, depression, and suicidal tendencies. In short, she was physically, mentally, emotionally, and spiritually broken.

To make matters worse, when Rosa was discovered, the U.S. didn't have a trafficking law. Instead of really rescuing Rosa, the police arrested her and the other young women and children, and locked them up in jail along with the traffickers.

If you take Rosa's story and multiply it by hundreds of thousands, even millions, you will get an idea of the magnitude of the problem.

The U.S. government estimates that between 600,000 and 800,000 people are trafficked across borders each year, and between 14,500 and 17,500 are trafficked into the U.S. each year. Millions more are trafficked within their own countries.

People are trafficked for many purposes. You just heard one story - of trafficking for purposes of prostitution. But men, women, and children are trafficked for forced labor into construction, agriculture, sweatshops, and factories. Children are trafficked for camel jockeying, and to be child soldiers, or into brick factories, rug-making sweatshops, or cocoa plantations because their small bodies and little fingers are useful in making or picking these products. Women and children are trafficked for domestic servitude and sexual exploitation. Up to 80 percent of the victims of transnational human trafficking are women and children.

Countries can be divided roughly into countries of origin (usually the resource-poor countries or countries that are politically or economically unstable); countries of destination (usually resource-rich developed countries, where demand is located); and transit countries (countries along a trafficking route, where traffickers have safe passage and harbor). Some countries are countries of origin, transit, and destination.

In the past, people working against human trafficking, and the State Department, have focused most attention on countries of origin. More and more, we are also focusing on the demand for slaves, generally coming from wealthier countries, that creates the market for more victims.

I've made the point that the crime of human trafficking is a global problem. I would like to address a few points regarding the situation in the hemisphere.

There are many tools to combat human trafficking, and one of these is the Trafficking in Persons Report mandated by the U.S. Congress since 2000.

Among Western Hemisphere countries, we have:

- * Two Tier 1 countries: Colombia and Canada
- * Twelve countries on Tier 2: Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Guyana, Honduras, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Uruguay
- * Six countries on Tier 2 Watch List: Belize, Dominican Republic, Haiti, Mexico, Nicaragua, Suriname
- * Three countries on Tier 3: Cuba, Ecuador, and Venezuela
- * Bolivia and Jamaica started on Tier 3 but took significant steps to avoid sanctions and were raised to Tier 2 by the President in September.

The main purpose of this report is to stimulate action, not make a comparative list of who's up and who's down. We make each recommendation based on the minimum standards described in the law, not as a function of politics.

In each country narrative and in recommending follow-up action we look at three facets of the anti-slavery fight, also known as the three "Ps": prosecution, prevention, and protection. My message - in every country I visit and with every dignitary I meet with - is that each part of this three-part approach is essential.

To prosecute, regional cooperation is essential. The traffickers function as long as they operate beyond the law and between systems of enforcement. Prevention is self-evident but under-employed. Vulnerable people, especially women and children, should be warned that promises of work abroad are often traps. And protection appears to be the greatest challenge for many governments that, tragically, treat slaves like criminals.

The Western Hemisphere has come a very long way in the last few years in addressing the complex human-trafficking challenge. When I came to the State Department three years ago, the issue was in its infancy. We are seeing so much more recognition and activity.

I want to single out the actions of Brazil in combating labor trafficking. Brazil has been especially diligent and productive in this regard. It is a world leader in identifying labor victims, especially in agriculture.

I am worried to see a number of "weak Tier Twos" from the hemisphere on the watch list. Many countries are still weak on prosecution. This is true around the globe, and it is true in the U.S.

Four broad areas of the human trafficking phenomenon that the hemisphere should put some extra attention on are: 1) the explosion of child prostitution and commercial sexual exploitation, 2) the many faces of the migration issue and the frequency that human smuggling turns into human trafficking, 3) the fact that state corruption often facilitates human trafficking, and; 4) the need to encourage non-government involvement in the solution because private organizations are often essential in victim protection.

If prostitution and commercial sexual exploitation were not tolerated, we wouldn't have sex trafficking. To confront that fact, we need to confront the demand for victims, not just the supply of victims.

Migration continues to diversify. There is increasing Asian migration into the hemisphere, and migration trends from the hemisphere to Europe, not to mention migration into the U.S. More and more, we find bonded labor schemes function to put people - who start out as willing participants - into slavery that is simply inhuman. Can you imagine this? Chinese smugglers commonly charge $20,000-$30,000 a head to arrange transport to the hemisphere. Essentially the smuggler owns that person when they reach whatever destination they reach. And the debt is often impossible to fulfill. It's labor slavery, not a new future.

For a programmatic organization such as the Inter-Development Bank, anti-trafficking programs can be integrated into many of your activities, especially in rule of law, anti-corruption, and social welfare programs as well as programs targeting youth.

I have painted a bleak picture but in recent years governments and citizens and non-governmental organizations have begun to awake. Worldwide, the number of trafficking-related convictions has increased to over 3,000 in 2004, and new anti-human trafficking legislation was approved in 39 countries. The struggle will be a long one.

We need your dedication and energy and patience. The U.S. government can engage governments, we can seek to educate people around the world, but the fight to end modern slavery depends on the involvement of NGOs, citizens, individual diplomats, businesspeople, the IFIs [international financial institutions], all of us committed to the new abolition movement, together.

(end text)

LOAD-DATE: November 17, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2005 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

6 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

November 9, 2005 Wednesday 9:19 AM GMT

US says Philippines not doing enough to curb human trafficking

LENGTH: 189 wordsDATELINE: MANILA Nov 9

The Philippines is not doing enough to curb human trafficking with no one so far prosecuted for the crime, a US official said Wednesday.

US embassy deputy chief of mission Scott Bellard said the lack of prosecutions was a major factor in the State Department's decision to retain the Philippines in tier two of its watchlist in its annual "Trafficking in Persons Report".

"We need to see more progress in prosecution and convictions this year to avoid a downgrade to tier three next year," Bellard said during a police workshop on preventing the crime.

He noted that the Philippines in 2003 passed a law penalizing human trafficking and called on authorities to "aggressively pursue prosecutions" and obtain timely convictions.

In the report the Philippines was cited as a source, transit point and destination for trafficked women, men and children.

Others in the same tier of the watchlist are Armenia, Azerbaijan, Bahrain, Belize, Cameroon, China, the Dominican Republic, Gambia, Greece, Haiti, India, Mauritius, Mexico, Nicaragua, Niger, Russia, Rwanda, Sierre Leone, South Africa, Surinam, Ukraine, Uzbekistan and Zimbabwe.

str-jvg/sm

LOAD-DATE: November 10, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

7 of 359 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

November 9, 2005 WednesdaySTATE DEPARTMENT BRIEFING, NOVEMBER 9*BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 6829 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the State Department:

State Department deputy spokesman Adam Ereli briefed the press November 9.

Following is the transcript of the State Department briefing:

(begin transcript)

U.S. Department of State Daily Press Briefing Index Wednesday, November 9, 2005 12:18 p.m. EDT

Briefer: Adam Ereli, Deputy Spokesman

IRAQ -- Secretary Rice's Meeting with Deputy Prime Minister Ahmad al-Chalabi -- Trial of Saddam Hussein/Security Issues/Prospects for Change of Venue -- Detention of Journalist Kemal Kadir by Iraqi Authorities

MISCELLANEOUS -- Allegations CIA Maintains Secret Prisons -- Secretary Rice's Comments Yesterday -- Administration's Policy on Use of Torture

SAUDI ARABIA -- Secretary Rice's Upcoming Travel to the Middle East -- International Religious Freedom Report Regarding Saudi Arabia -- Trafficking In Persons Report Regarding Saudi Arabia and Kuwait

CHINA -- US Embassy Warden Message on Chinese Police Advisory regarding Possible Attacks on Hotels -- US Position on Lifting EU Arms Embargo -- Secretary Rice's meeting with the Dalai Lama

CYPRUS -- Secretary Rice's Meeting with Turkish Cypriot Community Leader Mehmet Ali Talat

MACEDONIA -- Macedonia's Aspirations to Join EU -- Macedonia Name Issue

NORTH KOREA -- Food Aid to North Korea

ZIMBABWE -- Speech by US Ambassador Dell

LIBYA -- Imprisonment of Five Bulgarian Medics

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE DAILY PRESS BRIEFING

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 2005 (ON THE RECORD UNLESS OTHERWISE NOTED)

12:18 p.m. EST

MR. ERELI: Afternoon, everyone. No statements to begin with so let's start with your questions.

QUESTION: How about the U.S. account of the Secretary's meeting with Ahmad Chalabi? And if you could touch on what U.S. interest is there in all this -- many meetings. He's seen Cheney, now you can't speak for the whole Administration. What is the U.S. interest in having these extensive talks with Chalabi?

MR. ERELI: The United States meets with a wide range of Iraqi Government officials on a regular basis, here in Washington, in Baghdad, and in international fora and conferences and other occasions. So the way to look at this visit, and the meetings with Chalabi, is in the context of a broad and sustained and intensive partnership between the United States and Iraq and consistent with our shared goals of promoting Iraq's political development, helping its economic reconstruction and assuring its security. And as I said yesterday, as Deputy Prime Minister of the Government of Iraq, Dr. Chalabi has a role to play in all that.

So we meet with Dr. Chalabi, we meet with Foreign Minister Zebari, we meet with Prime Minister Jafari, we meet with Deputy President Al-Mahdi, we meet with the oil minister, the finance minister. So I guess the simple answer would be this is a meeting with an Iraqi Government official as part of a sustained and broad set of engagements with the Iraqi Government as a whole. That's number one.

Number two, the meeting itself. It was a good meeting. They had a wide-ranging discussion over a full range of issues regarding Iraq -- economic, security, political. I think in view of the fact that Dr. Chalabi does have the portfolio for energy and finance issues, the bulk of the conversation focused on those sectors, taking note of really the devastating state which Saddam Hussein's regime left Iraq's energy infrastructure and finance sectors. They talked about some of the challenges that Iraq is working to overcome, particularly in the areas of refining capacity, oil production, encouraging private and foreign investment in Iraq, on the security front looking at progress made in developing Iraqi capabilities to provide for its own security, on the political front, looking forward to the December elections. And the Secretary making the point, as we regularly do, that inclusiveness and the broadest participation possible is in everybody's interest. Spending time on both the finance and agricultural sectors and focusing on, you know, how to build institutions that operate on the basis of technocratic principles as opposed to secrecy and privilege and corruption, as was the case under Saddam Hussein.

So that's basically how I'd characterize their discussion.

QUESTION: I don't expect you to speak for the whole Administration but did Secretary Rice solicit Chalabi's advice on such other issues as how to beat back the insurgency? He again is speaking in terms of Iraq should have a deeper relationship with Iran. Is he still someone you ask the advice of and do you find -- have you found him to be a reliable source of advice?

MR. ERELI: Obviously, the insurgency was discussed or came up as part of the discussion, but within the context of the other issues, as I described, particularly when you're talking about the infrastructure of -- the oil infrastructure, the energy infrastructure and the challenge that the insurgency poses to that and related to the security side of things how we and the Iraqis can work together to protect Iraqis and Iraqi assets from terrorists bent on attacking them. And I think it was noted that the cooperation with the MNFI and the Iraqi security forces in this regard is good and is a priority for both of us.

QUESTION: Well, the other part of question was do you consider him a reliable advisor, a consultant or whatever --

MR. ERELI: You know, he was a -- I would characterize it the way I did, which is he's a member of the Government of Iraq. He has responsibility for areas that are critical to Iraq's future recovery and that was the context in which the discussions took place.

QUESTION: I guess going back to the original question -- just trying to get you to elaborate on the reasons why you -- the Secretary would meet with Chalabi. The U.S. Government does veto meeting government officials, you know, you'll say that a Hezbollah member can get in the cabinet in Lebanon, but we won't speak to them. So I want to know about the criteria for Chalabi, not making it a comparison that he is in any way connected to a guerilla group, but he is accused of having passed U.S. intelligence information to Iran. So you would imagine, therefore, he'd be extremely unpopular despite all these things that you've said in the Bush Administration. So was that criterion ignored, the fact that he is accused of passing U.S. secrets to Iran?

MR. ERELI: Well, I don't really have much to add to that issue other than to say that as far as the accusations that are out there, that's a matter under investigation. I'd leave it to the competent authorities to talk about that. As far as Chalabi's meeting with U.S. Government officials goes, he is the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq and he's meeting with us in that context and it's appropriate and right and in everybody's interest to do so.

QUESTION: Well, is the issue of the investigation that -- with Iran came up?

MR. ERELI: No.

QUESTION: Did the issue of faulty intelligence come up and --

MR. ERELI: No.

QUESTION: Any intelligence --

MR. ERELI: Not that I'm aware of, nope.

QUESTION: He don't go for two years and a half. Why does he come today?

MR. ERELI: I don't think that's right. I think he's been since the last two and a half years.

QUESTION: At least eight months ago, at least eight months ago. Can we stay on Iraq?

QUESTION: Sure.

QUESTION: You've said, obviously, that they talked about security, which is key. One problem with security is it's affecting the trial of Saddam, the defense lawyers for him and for his aides, that they've decided to cut off contact with the court because of the killings.

MR. ERELI: Yeah.

QUESTION: Now, yesterday we asked you is it possible to have this trial in Baghdad? Do you hold to the fact that it is if you can't even get the lawyers to be there because of their problems with safety?

MR. ERELI: I'd make the following points, similar to what we said yesterday. Number one, this is an Iraqi trial. This is an Iraqi process. It's taking place under Iraqi laws, through Iraqi institutions. And those laws, those institutions and those officials will determine the way ahead. We are committed to supporting them as they do so. We leave it to them to make the decisions about what's in the best interest of Iraq and Iraqis. We will support them when they make those decisions.

There's -- to my knowledge and at this point -- there's no change in the way forward. We also made the point yesterday that we are offering security support to the facilities that are designated for the trials. I would also note that the Iraqi Government and the Iraqi security forces have offered protection for all the defense lawyers and that it is their decision whether they accept that protection or not. But certainly there are steps being taken by both the coalition and the Iraqi Government to provide the kind of security and protection that people are looking for, for the trial and that's right and good and let's move forward.

Yes.

QUESTION: Back to the thorny subject of secret prisons. The Secretary of State again was asked about this and she did her dance of the seven veils. Why can't we have just a straight answer whether these reports are true or false?

MR. ERELI: I guess it's not enough to look back at the daily transcripts of the last week to answer your question. You want it repeated?

QUESTION: They were not answered, is my point.

MR. ERELI: Pardon?

QUESTION: There's no straight answer.

MR. ERELI: The straight answer is I'm not going to comment on intelligence -- reports about intelligence.

QUESTION: Okay, then. What about the fact that she said the President doesn't support torture. Do we take it that the State Department supports John McCain's proposal not to exempt the CIA?

MR. ERELI: There's a statement of Administration policy on that issue that I would refer you to.

QUESTION: Okay.

MR. ERELI: Yes. Go ahead.

QUESTION: On a new subject. Did the Secretary, when she was National Security Advisor, know of the existence of secret CIA prisons?

MR. ERELI: I don't have -- again, I told you I'm not going to comment on intelligence matters.

QUESTION: But -- but did she --

MR. ERELI: I'm not going to comment on intelligence matters.

QUESTION: Okay. Here's a follow-up to that then. The Secretary, when she's going abroad will no doubt, as she always does, try to further the President's freedom agenda.

MR. ERELI: Yes.

QUESTION: She will be doing that with a great doubt over her about whether or not she supported a policy --

MR. ERELI: I disagree.

QUESTION: That restricts freedom.

MR. ERELI: I disagree.

QUESTION: You have not done anything to clear up the doubt.

MR. ERELI: I will tell you -- and the Secretary, I think, spoke very eloquently and forcefully to this issue yesterday in talking about the principles, values, and image of the United States throughout the world. And that is one where we state clearly what we believe in. We represent an example for the rest of the world and that example has proved, I think, beneficial to the development of freedom and democracy throughout the world as evidenced, as the Secretary said yesterday, in the changes that swept the Soviet Union in the final years of that system.

I think in looking forward to her upcoming travels, I would expect that the United States and the Secretary will find a very positive and favorable reception in -- certainly in Bahrain, certainly in Saudi Arabia and elsewhere to the United States freedom agenda, to the support that the United States has given reformers and democrats and people struggling for their rights and freedoms throughout the region and that what so consumes you here in this briefing will not adversely color our dealings on this trip.

QUESTION: You mentioned Saudi Arabia. The freedom agenda, presumably encompasses such essential freedoms as freedom of religion.

MR. ERELI: Yes.

QUESTION: Freedom of speech.

MR. ERELI: Yes.

QUESTION: Women's rights.

MR. ERELI: Yes.

QUESTION: The State Department had very critical things to say this week about what the Department calls a lack of freedom of religion in Saudi Arabia. Do you think she'll get a glowing reception on that issue as well? Yeah, and will she take up with the Saudis, because they're in a period of --

MR. ERELI: The issue of --

QUESTION: A 180-day trial period.

MR. ERELI: This is an issue that will certainly be raised as it always is when we have discussions with the Saudis. This is the value of having kind of a strategic dialogue that the Secretary will be inaugurating on her visit to the Kingdom in that it provides us an opportunity to raise the level of discussion of these issues to a senior level to do it in a sustained way and to work out ways to address these problems. I think that if you look at the policies and actions of King Abdullah -- and we have noted this -- they recognize that this is an issue, they recognize that the challenge is before them and they are looking to ways to respond to these challenges in order to -- not because it's something that we put before them, but first and foremost, because it's in their own interests to do so and it's the impulse for change is coming from within their own societies.

So when you combine that homegrown momentum, along with the role of the United States as a power for, supportive of and encouraging of change and reform, you get progress. Now each country does it in a different way, at a different pace and we are mindful of each country's unique circumstances. But we're going to, as I said in respect to other issues, call it like we see it and not hold back from putting down on the table the issues and challenges that we think are important for all of us to deal with in our collective self-interest.

QUESTION: Follow on that?

MR. ERELI: Sure.

QUESTION: To talk to you again about the message to the world and the principles and values and images to the world that the Secretary talked about yesterday: promotion of freedom and liberty. Saudi Arabia has now twice in the last six weeks been waived by the Administration on some very important findings along these lines.

I think about six weeks ago, they were placed on the top tier on the U.S. Human Trafficking Watch List. The President gave them a waiver allowing more than $4 billion in military sales to go forward uninhibited. They were given a waiver on religious freedom as well. They've been given more time. Kuwait got a waiver on human trafficking, also allowing more than, I think, $2 billion in military sales to go forward.

What's the message to the world then, that freedom and liberty are --

MR. ERELI: You've got to look at the details. I think details are important and you're glossing over them in a, I think, careless way. If you look at the case of Kuwait, if you -- on trafficking in persons, if you look at the case of Saudi Arabia on religious freedom, the way those are based on specific actions that those countries have taken and the waivers are limited in scope and duration. And there's a relationship between the actions they take and the waiver.

So, you know, you've got to be prepared to take -- I'm sorry, you have to be prepared to take yes for an answer. You can't just -- let me finish, just a second -- are you going to let me finish?

QUESTION: Yeah.

MR. ERELI: You can't just say, you've got to do all this right now or we're going to beat you over the head with a stick. You say, these are the goal posts, you need to work with us to find a way to get there and if you move incrementally, we're prepared to move incrementally. But the fact of the matter is the sanctions are still - pending a real progress, the sanctions are still out there. They're still a possibility. But it's: (a) it's not black and white; (b) you've got to take an approach that matches incentives or disincentives in a realistic way. And you, most importantly, you've got to follow these things over time. I mean, it's not just like, okay, today you issue a waiver and the problem's gone and you're not -- you're letting them off the hook. Rather, there's an annual process of -- actually, in some cases, more frequent than annual -- process of review that you establish benchmarks, you establish standards, you hold them to standards and there are actions that you take or don't take based on their actions.

QUESTION: Waivers for both Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, according to the President's statements, on both of those instances were based on -- the war on terrorism had nothing to do with the progress that they were making towards ending human trafficking, unlike UAE and, I think, Qatar, which the Secretary herself downgraded the two of them. So they were just given a waiver for a U.S. strategic interest in that case. Is the message to the world that if you're helping us with our strategic interests, we'll look askance on issues of freedom and liberty?

MR. ERELI: No.

Yeah.

QUESTION: You said that they've made -- they've taken action, but that it was because, you know, you do these waivers. Could you see them taking action? What action has Saudi Arabia taken?

MR. ERELI: I'd refer you to our International Religious Freedom Report. I think it says --

QUESTION: Which says that there's --

QUESTION: There's no freedom of religion in Saudi Arabia.

QUESTION: -- an unqualified statement.

MR. ERELI: They have, as Ambassador Hanford pointed out in his briefing to all of you yesterday, I believe, they have taken action against certain religious preachers who incite violence and preach intolerance and hatred and they have worked with us to develop an action plan that shows a willingness to engage and to plan for action.

Now, as I said in response to the other question, that is a limited response and limited scope and therefore, the measures we're taking are limited. But again, you have to be able to take a yes for an answer. In this case, Saudi Arabia is showing -- even though as the report says, there is no freedom of religion in Saudi Arabia -- that they are willing to address this issue, that they're willing to discuss this issue with us, that they are willing to consider actions, as opposed to other countries which refuse to engage and just tell us to go take a hike. So if they're going to talk to you and they're going to be receptive to your entreaties, then you should respond accordingly. And we think the steps we've taken are an appropriate response.

QUESTION: With apologies to Elise because I know she was due a question. On this idea of the message that you're giving to the world, I think it is -- some people would say that it's confusing, that we have this cloud over the possibility of secret prisons and yet you're pushing your freedom agenda. And what you do is you say, well, we've got all these great values and that you won't address the issue. The Secretary always, when she's abroad, talks about freedoms that divide. She says some people are on the wrong side of that divide. Her argument is there are governments that restrict the freedoms of people and those unfortunate people are on the wrong side of freedom's divide.

Those people who are disappeared into secret prisons, are they on the wrong side of freedom's divide?

MR. ERELI: Without speaking to this issue specifically, let me make a couple of points that we've made repeatedly, but I guess it stands -- it could use reiteration.

Number one, we are in a war on terror that this is an issue, when dealing with terrorists, of people who have and will continue, unless stopped, try to kill Americans, innocent civilians, attack our infrastructure and -- in horrific ways, and that it is incumbent upon the leaders of this country, the President, the Secretary and those who are sworn to uphold our Constitution, to use every instrument of national power to defeat this enemy.

So we engage in the war and we will in conducting that war, be true to our values, be true to our principles, be true to our laws and constitutions, and be respectful and mindful of our international obligations. And I think that -- and following on that, the President, the National Security Advisor and the Secretary have all said very clearly, we do not torture and when dealing with the challenges posed by those who respect no rules, we will stay true to our laws and our values and our Constitution.

Yes.

QUESTION: How does holding people in secret, though, keep America any more safe? You've got people in Guantanamo Bay that are being held because you believe it makes America more safe. Why not hold people out in the open and let the investigation -- sorry, let visitations take place by the ICRC? Why does holding --

MR. ERELI: I don't have anything for you on that (inaudible).

QUESTION: But, sir, when you say -- sorry -- you say, you know, no torture of prisoners but people know what happened in Abu Ghraib and I know that wasn't condoned by the Administration in any way.

MR. ERELI: Mm-hmm.

QUESTION: But the fact that those things did happen, make people wonder what would happen if there were secret prisons. So you can't just say that, you've got to show it, too. And how are you going to show it when you're not even going to tell us whether there are secret prisons or not?

MR. ERELI: We -- I think have, as I said before, an unmatched record of accountability and transparency when it comes to conducting our war. Remember -- excuse me. Let me finish. Let me finish. Let me finish.

We are conducting a war. No country conducts a war completely -- no country conducts a war without holding things close to the vest, okay. So I challenge you to tell me any country that doesn't have any classified information. I'm not going to talk about classified information. That's against the law, all right. So let's be clear about that.

Number two, in conducting the war on terror there has been no country, I would submit to you, that has been more forthcoming and more mindful of the need to communicate what it's doing and to act in a way that is responsible and consistent with international norms and obligations.

And specific to the point of Abu Ghraib, sure, abuses happen. That's inevitable in any system. But the point that we made, at the very beginning, when the Abu Ghraib photos came out, was, number one, we were the ones -- it was American servicemen who alerted the authorities to the fact that there was abuse, that there was an intensive and exhaustive process of investigation by members of Congress calling before them the senior levels of the Administration. There was legal proceedings taken. There was recognition that this was abuse, that it was contrary to the laws, that the laws did mean something, that those responsible would be held accountable and they have been accountable. There have been prosecutions and convictions. And so, again, I think our record is strong and enviable.

QUESTION: It was only after the servicemen alerted the press, not the authorities, that the investigations took place. And if you have secret prisons where there isn't any way to get this information out, how can anybody be sure that you would be transparent, that you would launch investigations if abuse was taking place in secret facilities?

MR. ERELI: Again, I think that if you look at what happened after Abu Ghraib, if you look at all the measures that we've -- if you look at all the actions we've taken with Guantanamo, with access to ICRC, with access to the press, with access to delegations from foreign countries, I think our record is one that stands scrutiny and that should be recognized as positive and laudable.

Yep.

QUESTION: Is this a fair evaluation of the U.S. policy on torture: we do not torture detainees but we want to have an exception for the CIA in case it's ever necessary --

MR. ERELI: No, I think there is a clear statement of policy -- is the Administration's statement of policy, which is available to you. I'll endeavor to get you the site. It should be on a website somewhere and you can read it for yourself. It's exhaustive.

Yeah.

QUESTION: Adam, just to follow up real quick on this, we've heard this now for several days running: On the one hand, we don't torture, we stay within the limits of our values and our laws; but on the other hand, these are really bad people and this is a different kind of war. Isn't there kind of -- no offense to my British friend -- an inherent nudge-nudge, wink-wink there in that message that you're sending out? No, we don't torture but these are really bad people? What's the message?

MR. ERELI: I'm not nudging or winking. I'm saying --

QUESTION: Then what are you saying?

MR. ERELI: I'm saying that --

QUESTION: What are you trying to say with that? We've heard that from the White House as well.

QUESTION: And from the Secretary.

QUESTION: Yes, give us an answer is basically what we're asking for.

MR. ERELI: On the nudge-nudge -- well, I guess the point is -- let me put it this way. We're in a -- what people want to do when they're looking at this is try to understand it in terms of past experience. Right? Geneva Conventions governing the laws of war, for example. Well, those were written in a world where you didn't have people flying planes into buildings or you didn't have armed groups trying to develop chemical weapons capabilities and you didn't have armies that weren't under the flag of a national power or that didn't wear uniforms or that didn't -- that crossed borders and lived within societies.

So all we're saying is you've got codes of conduct that are incumbent upon countries that respect the rule of law and believe in certain values and certain principles, and that's what guides us, while at the same time recognizing that a lot of the lessons of history are -- lessons of history are that this is an unprecedented conflict with an unprecedented challenge.

QUESTION: So that --

MR. ERELI: But that does not mitigate in any way the imperative of acting right and respecting our values and our norms and our laws.

QUESTION: Are you saying, then, that while you recognize the Geneva Conventions for certain detainees, and the President and others have said that there is a -- that the Geneva Conventions would apply to detainees at Guantanamo, then that all terror suspects are entitled to the same protections under the Geneva Conventions?

MR. ERELI: You know, I'm not going to give you a legal exegesis of treaties in the context of the war on terror. That has been done much, much better than I could ever do by our officials who have provided testimony on the subject as well as the statement of Administration policy. So I refer you to existing documents on that score.

QUESTION: But you're opening -- I'm sorry, you're opening up the door here, saying --

MR. ERELI: No, I'm not. I'm not opening up -- do not interpret my remarks to be the opening of any door. I'm just trying to explain to you -- in fact, I'm trying to shut the door, actually. (Laughter.) But anyway, I'm just trying to explain, you know, in response to Cam's philosophical question, give a philosophical answer, but not a legal interpretation.

QUESTION: So, philosophically, you're saying that --

MR. ERELI: Philosophically, I'm saying we are dealing with an unprecedented threat and we are trying to deal with it with norms and structures and processes from the past. And that's a challenge.

QUESTION: So, Adam, since you're dealing with structures from the past, would you support -- that the Administration support, then, a new convention, since you're dealing with a new enemy, as every Administration official has said, since you're dealing with new enemy combatants, are you looking for a new international structure then that would be able to deal with this new enemy?

MR. ERELI: No, we are -- again, I'd refer you to the statement of Administration policy, which lays out where we stand on this. And I think the President was very clear in his statement on Monday and that really gives it to you in a capsule form.

QUESTION: I just have to try one more, just following up on Cam. If the U.S. holds -- has these values and they're enduring values, why does it matter what kind of people you're dealing with, because the U.S. values would stand regardless of who they are?

MR. ERELI: Exactly. Good. I agree.

QUESTION: Okay. So why do you feel it necessary to keep saying that these are "really bad" people, we have these values but these are "really bad" people? The U.S. values stand no matter who you're dealing with.

MR. ERELI: Right.

QUESTION: So why are some people in secret prisons and some people not? I'm serious. That was the question. Why are you holding some "really bad" people in secret prisons?

MR. ERELI: I didn't -- that -- the issue that you raised and that you raised and that you're all interested in, that you've been raising for like four days or five days, I'm not going to speak to. I'm going to speak to --

QUESTION: But this is not the values --

MR. ERELI: What I'm going to speak to is our -- are the -- is the policies which guide us and what informs our decisions and how -- why we do what we do. And that -- I'm sorry -- and that I think we've been over and over and over but without answering the one question you want answered, which I can't answer.

QUESTION: Real quick, just a quick follow. You said you can't talk about classified information or respond to the question of secret prisons. If there were no secret prisons, it wouldn't be classified and therefore you could talk about; is that correct?

MR. ERELI: That's too convoluted for me. I can't understand it.

QUESTION: It's pretty straightforward.

MR. ERELI: Yeah?

QUESTION: Can we change the subject?

MR. ERELI: We probably could -- well, go ahead. Yeah, sure, I'm happy to change the subject.

QUESTION: There was a warning put out by the U.S. Embassy in China. There's some information coming from the government that --

MR. ERELI: Actually, it was --

QUESTION: It was a Warden Message and --

MR. ERELI: Yeah. It was a -- it was an advisory put out by the Chinese that said that Islamic extremists could be planning to attack four- and five-star hotels in China sometime over the course of the next week. What we did was just disseminate that information through our Warden system.

QUESTION: Do you have more information?

MR. ERELI: We don't have more information that was included -- than what was included in the Chinese advisory. Our understanding is that they are continuing to -- the Chinese are continuing to, investigate the matter to determine the credibility of the information they have. We, ourselves, do not have any specific information concerning the timing, target or method of any possible attacks.

QUESTION: So what did you put out? You put out --

MR. ERELI: We put out a Warden Message --

QUESTION: -- a warning message by the Chinese. In other words, you attributed the --

MR. ERELI: If I could read to you the warning message -- the Warden Message, it says: "The Embassy has learned that Chinese police advised hotels that Islamic extremist elements could be planning to attack four- and five-star hotels in China sometime over the course of the next week. Chinese authorities have assured the Embassy that they are taking appropriate security measures and investigating the possible threat thoroughly."

QUESTION: And yet there is no -- I haven't seen this, but there is no follow-on U.S. advice to travelers?

MR. ERELI: No. Other than what's included -- well, in the Warden Message it says American citizens visiting Chinese four- and five-star hotels should review their plans carefully, remain vigilant with regard to their personal security, and exercise caution. And then I would also note that we have extensive travel information on China for the traveling public on our website.

QUESTION: Is that -- I mean, that information that you always provide out and it's been very rare that there's ever been any kind of hint of an extremist -- an Islamic extremist threat in China except for the Chinese talking about Uighur Muslims. Do you have any reason to believe that this is part of a Chinese crackdown on Uighur Muslims?

MR. ERELI: No, I don't have any reason to believe that.

Yeah.

QUESTION: Chinese President Hu is visiting Britain right now and Chinese Foreign Ministry source said that Britain may shift its stance on the EU arms embargo. Are you aware of the potential policy change?

MR. ERELI: I really can't speak to the British policy. I can make clear to you what our policy is and we don't think that the arms embargo should be lifted. And this is a matter that we have had discussions with our EU partners about and we haven't really changed our views on that.

QUESTION: Recently, British Defense Minister was in town and met with probably some of the officials here and Pentagon. And also I thought you have a strategic dialogue with EU partners regarding China's emergence. Do you have any update?

MR. ERELI: We have a -- obviously, a dialogue with the -- a strategic dialogue with the Chinese. We have regular engagement with the EU-3. But I don't know really where your question is going on this.

QUESTION: I mean, through your interaction or any recent meeting with your British or European partners, are you aware of any potential policy change?

MR. ERELI: No, I don't -- it hasn't been an issue lately that I think has come up in our discussions.

Mr. Lambros, in the back.

QUESTION: Another philosophical question, however on Cyprus. Senator Olympia Snowe, speaking extensively on the Cyprus issue on the Senate floor the other day, stated, inter alia, criticizing the State Department, "Mr. President, I wanted today to discuss the extremely unfortunate decision by the highest levels of the State Department to meet with Mehmet Ali Talat, the self-declared president of the so-called 'Turkish republic of northern Cyprus.' For more than 30 years, it's been a tenet of the United States' foreign policy not to extend de jure or de facto recognition to the self-declared government which exists only because of the forceful occupation of northern one-third of Cyprus by more than 40,000 Turkish troops."

Since the Senator is criticizing the October 28th meeting between Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and the Turkish Cypriot leader Rauf Denktaş -- excuse me, Mehmet Ali Talat, how do you respond to her criticism against the Department of State?

MR. ERELI: There is no change in U.S. policy. There is no de jure or de facto recognition of anything. This meeting was consistent with past practice whereby the leadership of the State Department believes it is useful and productive to exchange views with the leader of the Turkish Cypriot community. We've done it in the past, we'll continue to do it in the future, and this is consistent and supportive of our efforts to help promote reconciliation on the island on the basis of the Annan plan.

QUESTION: One more question on Iraq. Any response to my pending question regarding the arrest of the Kurdish human activist Dr. Tirman Said Khadil I raised the other day. For your information, Mr. Erel, Amnesty International get involved, too.

MR. ERELI: I don't know anything about --

QUESTION: Can you take this question?

MR. ERELI: I'll see if there's anything we have to say on it, but that doesn't mean that we will.

Yeah.

QUESTION: The British Parliament just rejected legislation proposed by Tony Blair to hold terrorists suspects for 90 days without charging them. Do you think that this is going to hurt joint operations that you have with the British regarding terrorists with respect to the war on terror?

MR. ERELI: I wouldn't speculate on that.

QUESTION: Do you have any reaction to the parliament rejecting it?

MR. ERELI: No, no.

Now, let's go -- ma'am. Sure.

QUESTION: May I change the subject? Yeah? On something that indirectly concerns U.S. interests. Macedonia today received from Brussels positive opinion on its application for joining the EU, but no date was set -- kind of odd. Where does Washington stand on this, I mean, on the pace Balkan countries join EU?

MR. ERELI: Well, the -- the process of accession of Macedonia to the EU is obviously a matter for the Macedonia and the EU to work out. We are supportive of Macedonia's aspirations to join the EU. And we, I think, encourage and support the kind of reforms and actions that Macedonia needs to take to fulfill EU membership requirements.

QUESTION: One more?

MR. ERELI: Sure.

QUESTION: On this issue, Mr. Erel, would you support their efforts to join EU or NATO with their present name, because as you know, there is difference between Greece and FYROM on the name issue?

MR. ERELI: Yeah. Our position on the name issue, as you won't be surprised to hear, has not changed and that is that again, there's a UN-led process to lead Macedonia and Greece to come to a common position on that.

QUESTION: But the question is do you support this process to EU or to NATO or the present name, "Macedonia?"

MR. ERELI: We support Macedonia and Greece settling it with the -- through the UN.

Lou.

QUESTION: You didn't answer my question.

MR. ERELI: That's my answer.

Louie.

QUESTION: USAID put out a statement about cutting off food aid to North Korea if North Korea continues on with its plan to boot out, I guess, the WFP. Can you talk about that and -- it's largely about the timing, given that it's the start of six-party talks today?

MR. ERELI: The decision is not influenced by politics, number one. The decision -- number one, the decision to provide food aid is not a political decision, it is a humanitarian decision and it is -- we take our actions based on a number of criteria, one of which is need; another one is the ability to monitor the situation so that we can be sure that the people who need the food are getting the food. And the decision that was announced by the AID today was taken based on those criteria, specifically, obstacles that are being erected to international aid workers and others, international organization members, to monitoring the delivery and provision of the aid. That's a critical component in making a decision to provide aid, it's also a component critical factor in the decision to take the steps that we have.

QUESTION: Do you see any potential impact on the talks, as a result of this?

MR. ERELI: There shouldn't be. There shouldn't be. As I said, they're completely distinct issues.

Yes.

QUESTION: Adam, as you anticipated yesterday, the American Ambassador in Zimbabwe was called into the foreign ministry.

MR. ERELI: Are we done with North Korea?

QUESTION: I'm sorry.

MR. ERELI: Okay. Yeah. On Zimbabwe.

QUESTION: Could you tell me what happened? I understand there was a -- they gave him a protest note of some sort?

MR. ERELI: The Ambassador met with officials in the foreign ministry today. They took issue with his remarks of last week. We made the point that these remarks were fully consistent with the role of the ambassador and the policies of the United States and that we continue to call on Zimbabwe to change course and to take actions and adopt policies that serve the interests of their people and that are consistent with international norms and the direction that the rest of the world is taking but that seems to be different from where Zimbabwe is going.

QUESTION: Did the issue of expelling them come up because there have new --

MR. ERELI: No.

QUESTION: Okay.

MR. ERELI: Yes.

QUESTION: The Secretary will meet with Dalai Lama this afternoon. Do you know what topic she may like to talk with him? And also, will the Secretary bring up the issue of Tibet when she meets with Chinese leaders on the 19th?

MR. ERELI: Let me see if I can get you something on that.

QUESTION: The last one on HIV. Mr. Erel, according to Reuters yesterday, a senior Libyan official denied a published report that the nation would scrap capital punishment to facilitate the release of the five Bulgarian nurses. The five together with a Palestinian doctor was sentenced to death, following conviction on charges of deliberately infecting 426 children with HIV, using pills for the first time in history of this disease -- of this deadly disease. Any comment, since the execution of November 29th is approaching?

MR. ERELI: The only comment I would have is that the position of the United States, the EU -- and the EU is clear, that these people should -- the Bulgarians and Palestinian should be released. They've been convicted on faulty evidence and faulty procedure. They should not be in jail. They should be released. And we continue to work with the Bulgarians, with the EU-3 and with the Libyans to secure their release.

QUESTION: What about the charges that they used pills?

MR. ERELI: I think those charges are baseless.

(The briefing was concluded at 1:05 p.m.)

(end transcript)

(Distributed by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State. Web site: <http://usinfo.state.gov>)

LOAD-DATE: November 11, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 States News Service

8 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Australian

November 1, 2005 Tuesday All-round Country Edition

Shamed Japan to crack down on sex slavery

SOURCE: The Times

SECTION: WORLD; Pg. 10

LENGTH: 253 words

TOKYO: Under fire for its inaction on eliminating human trafficking, Japan is expected to bring in new laws this week to crack down on the brokers and buyers of women forced to work as sex slaves.

Japan remains embarrassed by a US State Department report last year condemning the world's second-biggest economy for its failure to adequately address the problem and placing it on a watch list with offenders such as Cambodia and the Ivory Coast.

Although a more recent version of the survey praised Japan's efforts to improve the situation, it remains a "tier two" country because its thriving sex industry remains a lucrative destination for those who traffic women from Thailand, The Philippines, Colombia and Belarus.

A place in the tier-two category denotes that a country fails to meet minimum standards for eliminating human trafficking.

The impending changes will make the manager of any establishment in the sex or entertainment industry criminally liable for employing anyone without proper legal documentation.

Keiko Otsu, who runs a secret shelter in Tokyo for women who escape from their captors, described a constant fear that haunts the women who arrive at her door. "They are genuinely terrified, often trembling uncontrollably," she said.

The first prosecution occurred last week, when the Taiwanese manageress of a club in the resort town of Nagano was arrested for buying a 24-year-old Indonesian woman for use as a sex slave. She is understood to have been sold for almost $24,000.

LOAD-DATE: October 31, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

JOURNAL-CODE: AUS

9 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Bangor Daily News (Maine)

November 1, 2005 Tuesday
Correction Appended
All Editions

Judge frees woman suspected of human trafficking attempt

BYLINE: JUDY HARRISON OF THE NEWS STAFF

SECTION: Pg. A1

LENGTH: 507 words

DATELINE: BANGOR

Only because the government couldn't prove that a Canadian woman was involved in human trafficking when she brought a man and two teenage females into the country illegally was she free to return to her husband and children, a federal judge said Monday.

Savita Singh-Murray, 39, of St. Stephen, New Brunswick, wept as U.S. District Judge John Woodcock sentenced her to time served, or 132 days in jail.

The woman pleaded guilty in September to trying to smuggle three illegal aliens from her former homeland, Guyana, into the U.S. at the Calais border crossing this summer.

Guyana is a former British colony on the northern coast of South America bordered by Venezuela to the west, Brazil to the south, and Suriname to the east.

"I have no idea what was going on," Woodcock said Monday. "What I do know gives considerable pause."

He sternly admonished Singh-Murray for her involvement with what prosecutors suspect was a plot to bring young women into the country to be forced to work as prostitutes.

Woodcock said that Guyana is on an international human trafficking watch list.

Singh-Murray initially told officials that she was the aunt of Awad Hansraj, 21, Lalita Depaul, 18, and a 16-year-old girl, and that she intended to take them to the Calais McDonald's restaurant, according to court documents.

Later, she admitted that she was not their aunt and was forced by a former boyfriend in Toronto to smuggle the three into the U.S. and drop them off at the Calais Motor Inn.

"I shudder to think what may have happened to those two young females," Woodcock said Monday. "The purpose of human trafficking is to submit young women to humiliation and degradation. I am appalled that you, as a woman and a Guyanese, would get involved in anything like this.

"Even if you didn't know for certain they would have been abused, you had to know that there was that possibility," he continued. "I can tell you that the only reason I sentenced you the way I did is because of the problem of proof."

The mother of three, who has been held without bail at the Piscataquis County Jail since her arrest on June 22, faced up to 10 years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000. The federal sentencing guidelines, which determine sentencing ranges used by federal judges, called for Singh-Murray to serve zero to six months in prison.

She also was barred from entering the U.S.

"I want to say how sorry I am to the court and the American people," Singh-Murray told Woodcock before he sentenced her. "Most of all, I want to apologize to my husband and my children."

Singh-Murray was returned Monday night to Canada by border patrol agents. Her husband and two friends attended the hearing but did not address the court.

The Guyanese adults, Hansraj and Depaul, each pleaded guilty last month to a misdemeanor charge of attempting to enter the U.S. by making false statements to border agents and were ordered to spend four days in jail before deportation.

The 16-year-old girl, identified only as Sheliza A. in court documents, was turned over to U.S. immigration officials.

LOAD-DATE: November 2, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

CORRECTION-DATE: November 2, 2005

CORRECTION: A story on Tuesday's Page One about a Canadian woman sentenced on charges of trying to smuggle a man and two teenage females into the country requires clarification. U.S. District Judge John Woodcock raised questions about whether Savita Singh-Murray, 39, of St. Stephen, New Brunswick, was involved in human trafficking. Prosecutors charged her with alien smuggling.

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

10 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Federal News Service

November 1, 2005 TuesdayHEARING OF THE AFRICA, GLOBAL HUMAN RIGHTS AND INTERNATIONAL OPERATIONS SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS COMMITTEE*SUBJECT: "SUDAN: LOSING GROUND ON PEACE?"*CHAired BY: REPRESENTATIVE CHRISTOPHER SMITH (R-NJ)*WITNESS: JENDAYI FRAZER, ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE FOR AFRICAN AFFAIRS*LOCATION: 2172 RAYBURN HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING, WASHINGTON, D.C.*SECTION: PRESS CONFERENCE OR SPEECH*LENGTH: 15017 words

REP. SMITH: The subcommittee will come to order. And good afternoon, everybody.

Over the last few years, the U.S. Congress has devoted a great deal of attention to the troubled East Africa nation of Sudan. Initially, we were as concerned about the issue of slavery as we were about the country's destructive civil war. Over several years, I have held several hearings on this issue of slavery, as early as March of 1996. Unfortunately, to this date there is no proof that the existence of slavery in Sudan has been eliminated; certainly no reason has been given to Congress to justify the downgrading of Sudan's status as a nation guilty of trafficking in persons.

We have also devoted attention to resolving the 21-year-old North-South conflict between the National Congress Party government in the North, and the Sudan People's Liberation Movement in the South. With the signing of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement on January 9th of this year, there was great hope that this long-standing war would finally be brought to a peaceful and equitable end so that the suffering would be over and reconstruction could begin. However, the sudden death of SPLN leader Dr. John Garang seems to have thrown the peace process off track, and there is evidence that the National Congress Party may be trying to forestall the peace accords rather than to implement them.

Most recently, we've been focused on the tragic situation in the Darfur region of Sudan, where as many as 400,000 people have been killed in a conflict that began in February of 2003. At one point, as many as 10,000 people per month were dying, due to attacks led or abetted by the government of Sudan. More than 2 million residents of Darfur have been displaced, many of them living in internally displaced persons camps. I visited two of these camps in August with my friend and colleague, my chief of staff on the subcommittee who deals with African issues, Greg Simpkins (sp). We went to Mukjar camp and Kalma camp, perhaps the largest IDP camp in the world. When we visited South Darfur this past August, again with Greg, we found encouraging signs in the determination of the people of Darfur to survive, even in horrendous circumstances. We also were impressed with the dedication of the USAID staff and contractors, as well as the NGOs on the ground, to provide much-needed humanitarian assistance, despite many logistical and bureaucratic obstacles.

However, there were some troubling conditions that have only gotten worse since our return. The tens of thousands of people living in Kalma camp had refused to allow Sudanese police into the camp because they saw them as enemies. The police proved them right by shooting over the camp nightly to frighten residents. When the shooting didn't chase camp residents out, a commercial embargo was put into place so that people in the camp were unable to bring in any supplies beyond what they can carry on themselves.

The people in Kalma camp, like the people in other IDP camps, are justifiably afraid to leave: women who have been routinely raped upon venturing outside the camp for water or for firewood. Bandits are not only robbing people outside the camps, but they are killing men as well in all too many cases.

While in Darfur, we met with African Union troops whose commanders told us that they, too, had few too (sic) vehicles to patrol effectively in carrying out their mission to protect the people of Darfur from attacks. AU commanders told us that the pay that they had been promised had not been forthcoming. When we were there in August, the average AU soldier was receiving $1.28, having been promised about $15 a day. Given the attacks and kidnappings of AU troops, I believe they are demonstrating extraordinary commitment under trying circumstances.

Last month the AU accused the government of Sudan of joining with the janjawid militias in attacking villages and refugee camps. After supposedly ending their collaboration with the janjawid weeks ago, this alliance appears to be back in place.

The Darfur peace talks have not made much progress largely due to the splintering of the rebel Sudan Liberation Army, or SLA, who, with the Justice and Equality Movement, or JEM, declared war on the government of Sudan nearly three years ago. The government of Sudan also bears responsibility for these talks being stymied. Furthermore, Eritrea and Libya are supporting these rebel movements, and they, too, are making a peaceful settlement less likely.

Meanwhile, the SPLA, now part of the government of Sudan, has not played a noticeable role in the Darfur conflict as they did under Dr. John Garang. However, failure to resolve the Darfur situation could help unravel the peace between the north and the south. Certainly, that peace agreement faces its own challenges from a National Congress Party that seems to want an agreement in name only, and from an SPLM struggling to regain its footing after the death of its long-time leader.

Too many aspects of the comprehensive plan -- peace agreement remain undone. I spoke with the Catholic archbishop of Juba last week. And he told me that the development of the south was desperately in need of international support. He said frustration over the slow pace of the peace process will only increase the separatist elements in the south. According to the archbishop, the northern part of the government has not withdrawn its troops from the south as scheduled nor established key commissions to implement the peace accord, nor have complied with the international commission that already has set the boundary between the north and the south.

Congress has tried in our recent legislative effort to take into account the entirety of the crisis of Sudan. We surely want to focus on the accountability of those involved in genocide in Sudan, but we cannot ignore other parts of the complex picture in this country. We must keep a focus on the north-south peace accord, or it may fail and plunge the country back into a wider conflict.

Today's hearing is necessary and is required to learn from the administration how our government's policy is attempting to tackle this difficult situation and how Congress can help create a comprehensive plan to contribute to peace and to accountability for those who have murdered, rape, enslaved, and otherwise plagued the people of Sudan for so many years.

Our committee's chairman, Mr. Hyde, has fashioned a bill with many of us working with him that we feel will make such a contribution. We want to move forward on this effort as soon as possible for the sake of so many who are still in danger in Sudan.

I'd like to yield my friend and colleague Mr. Payne, who has been a tireless worker for peace in Sudan, for such time as he may consume.

REP. DONALD PAYNE (D-NJ): Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. And let me commend you for calling this very important hearing on the increasing worrisome situation in Sudan.

I welcome Assistant Secretary Frazer to the committee. I look forward to working with her and hearing her testimony. I'd like to commend you for the outstanding work that you've done in your previous capacities in National Security Council and as ambassador to South Africa. And it was a pleasure traveling with you to Liberia recently to observe the elections in Liberia, which I thought went extremely well. And we look forward to the runoff on next Tuesday, Tuesday a week from now.

And I know that you traveled through other countries, and I'd be interested at some time to assess what your findings were.

We -- and since you're certainly new in this position, you just happen to be the messenger. So we don't want you to take it personally. Perhaps we'll see some changes under your tenure.

We certainly feel that the loss of Dr. John Garang was a tremendous setback to the peace accord in Sudan. As the chairman said, I have been traveling to Sudan for -- since the early '90s, and Dr. Garang has been a tireless warrior for the people of south Sudan. And it was -- we were all saddened with his untimely death, and certainly we feel it's been a setback to the process.

I had the privilege to attend the wake in Yei the day before funeral in Juba, and you could see on the faces of the Sudanese the sorrow and sadness that has sort of besieged the country.

And so we will have to move forward, but I hope that all of the work that he's done and even his death has not been in vain.

My object for listening to your testimony at this hearing is to get a clarification on U.S. policy towards the current regime in Sudan. We do have a National Unity Government which was recently formed, but I have serious concerns about the commitment of the ruling National Congress Party to real, true, lasting peace in Sudan.

We must not let up pressure on the government. We must ensure that they fully implement the Comprehensive Peace Agreement and end the violence in Darfur without any further foot-dragging and excuse-making.

At the same time, we must provide increased assistance to the government of southern Sudan, led by Salva Kiir, who I first met in 1994 and who has certainly been a close ally of Dr. John Garang for as long as the movement has been going forth.

One hundred and five members of Congress sent a letter to Secretary Rice yesterday expressing the following concerns:

One, recent developments in Darfur, including the kidnapping and killing of African Union troops and humanitarian workers.

The closure of main roads leading out of the capital of West Darfur, Western Darfur.

An estimate by the United Nations that nearly three-quarters of a million refugees are beyond the reach of humanitarian aid, which means that we will start seeing tragedy again by the fact that resources cannot get to these people.

Delay in the implementation of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement, which mandates the immediate withdrawal of government troops from disputed areas.

Government reform of civil service, security forces and the judiciary.

And the establishment of an investigatory commission into the genocide in Sudan.

And apparent softening of U.S. policy toward the government of Sudan was also expressed in the letter to Secretary Rice.

I have followed the crisis in Sudan, as the chairman mentioned, for a long time, for at least 21 years that the war had been going on between Islamist government in Khartoum and the Sudan People's Liberation Army and movement of the SPLA -- SPLM. As you are well aware, more than 4 million people were displaced in that civil war since 1989, and over 2 million people have died as a result of that struggle, that had gone on when Shari'a law was imposed on the entire country to those who were Christians and Animists and Agnostics and Atheists and felt that they should not be under Shari'a law because they did not believe in the Koran.

During that time, the National Islamic Front, the NIF government, led by Omar al-Bashir, committed innumerable brutalities in unimaginable scope against the people of the South. They marginalized areas of Southern Blue Nile and the Nuba Mountains with the longest running war in Africa until January the 9th, when the parties signed the Comprehensive Peace Agreement, the CPA. I was there in Nairobi for the signing and was cautiously hopeful for the long-awaited peace in Sudan. However, once again the North-South conflict reached the point where an agreement was imminent.

The government began its attack on innocent civilians in Darfur, which caught us all by surprise. With the help of the Janjawid, it destroyed villages and communities, maimed, raped, killed, terrorized the people of Darfur.

We know that the AU mission is simply not deployed at the adequate numbers to quell the violence in Darfur, and that its mandate must be strengthened to protect civilians. Still, I commend the AU for the tremendous role it has played, but more is needed to protect the innocent civilians of Darfur. The people of Sudan have suffered tremendously under the hand of this government, which, by the way, came to power in a bloody coup in 1989, as I mentioned. Concerned citizens of this great country have devoted years to ending the bloodshed in Sudan, first South Sudan, now Darfur.

We could be looking at a crisis in East Sudan soon as well if the government does not stop its genocidal behavior in that region.

The message must be clear and concise until the following occurs: the United States is ill-advised and must not normalize relations with the government of Sudan. It's just that simple. The crisis in Darfur is resolved peacefully is when we should look at a normalization of our relations with the government of Sudan. When the Janjawid and allied militia are disarmed and demobilized is when we should look at normalized relations with Sudan. When the government of Sudan is cooperating with the ICC is when we ought to normalize relations with Sudan. When suspects are handed over for trials to the ICC is when we should normalize relations with Sudan. When the government of Sudan negotiates in good faith in the East is when we should normalize relations with Sudan. When the government of Sudan is cooperating fully to disarm, demobilize and hand the LRA leaders, who are killing children -- have done it for 18 years and go to Sudan for cover -- that's when we should normalize relations with Sudan. When the CPA is being implemented in good faith and without delay, including the implementation of the Abyei commission report, withdrawal of the government forces from the South as called for in the CPA; setting up of key commissions, as called for in the CPA; revenue sharings, as called for in the wealth-sharing agreement, that's when we should normalize relations with Sudan.

The Darfur crisis is not abating. We must be firm with Khartoum. We must ensure compliance. We must stop the killing. No more visits from the Sudan intelligence chief or other architects of genocide should be tolerated in this country. No more waiving of certain sanctions, like that allowing Sudan to hire lobbyists in Washington for $530,000 so they can clean up their image.

I look forward to hearing your testimony.

REP. SMITH: Thank you very much, Mr. Payne.

Chairman Royce?

REP. EDWARD ROYCE (R-CA): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Like you, I've traveled to Darfur, and I've seen the results there of the government's genocidal campaign. And when I say genocidal campaign -- we took with us Don Cheadle and Paul Rusesabagina, the hotelier who Paul Cheadle -- who Don Cheadle portrayed, and we went into a little town that had been attacked by the Janjawid, and had been bombed prior to that.

The town formerly had 30,000 inhabitants. There are less than -- there are only a couple hundred left in that particular town. We talked to a number of survivors of those attacks. Children drew us pictures that looked an awful lot like Antonov bombers dropping bombs on their village. And it's hard to believe that since those villages were bombed, it wasn't done by the government.

I remember one young boy who put out his hand -- his arm, but there was no hand. And I asked him what happened to it. And he said, "Janjawid. Janjawid."

So I'm deeply troubled by the continuing violence in Darfur, which is mostly the government's responsibility. And I look forward to hearing from the administration, hearing what it's doing to end the killing and suffering and move the peace process ahead.

And again, I thank the chairman for holding this hearing. And I thank you very much for being with us today. Appreciate it very much.

REP. SMITH: Chairman Royce, thank you very much.

Ambassador Watson?

REP. DIANE WATSON (D-CA): Thank you so much, Mr. Chairman.

I too must join with my colleagues, Royce and Payne. I've had the good great fortune of traveling with Mr. Royce, and I cannot find a more committed and dedicated member of our House for the cause of eradicating this genocide, and Mr. Payne, who has a distinguished record of fighting for the people of the Sudan and who goes often and reports back to us formally and informally. And I want to thank them.

But unfortunately, what I see right now when I look at the United States policy towards Sudan is a willingness to tolerate any behavior by the Khartoum regime -- in the interest of improving relations. And I think there's something wrong about that. This administration has taken several actions over the past few months which send the unmistakable message that Washington is pleased with the behavior of the Sudanese government. Well, not from my viewpoint.

And I understand that Sudan's trafficking in persons status has been upgraded to Title II watchlist and it's a Title II watchlist country, which would put it in the same company as Israel and Switzerland; this despite the fact that earlier this year the U.N. documented abductions and sexual slavery by the Sudanese troops.

And we heard the stories that were given when we were out among the refugees, and they were blood-chilling and blood-curdling. We were able to spend time with Rusesabagina, the actual manager, and he told us what really happened. And that movie did not give you all of the ugliness and the pain and the tragedy that they actually went through.

For an example, he said, when they came into a village, and they would go to -- the Janjawid -- to someone's home -- and by the way, they were high off of drugs and alcohol when they did this. And they would go to someone's home, and they would get the father, or the head of the household, and they would chop off his feet. Well, they wouldn't kill him; they would chop off his feet. Then they'd come back the next day, chop off his arms. And then they'd go back to kill him, had he not bled to death before that. That actually took place. And he told us these stories. And Don Cheadle tried to enact them, some of them, in the movie.

Well, this kind of madness and savagery is actually taking place, and probably as we speak. So -- and the administration has also issued a waiver to permit the government of Sudan to hire -- to hire! -- a Washington lobbyist to permit the architects of genocide in Darfur to develop and sell a public relations strategy on Capitol Hill.

Well, let me tell you, for one, they can't sell that to me, they can't sell that to Payne, and I know the rest of my colleagues will not buy that. They can come in and put whatever face they want on it. But those of us who have been there and talked and been among the refugees know that what they're selling us is a bit of goods.

So meanwhile, the Sudanese government in Khartoum continues to arm and support the militias who have murdered tens of thousands of people and forced over 2 million out of their homes. As for the United States of America, we have an investment in the comprehensive peace agreement for the Sudan. We need to see it work. But it will not work if we fail to press the Sudanese government to stop the genocide. Unless the United States demands that Sudan end the violence in Darfur, I fear we will be left with a comprehensive peace agreement that is neither comprehensive nor peaceful.

So, I will be listening to hear what specific measures the administration will take to first dispel the appearance that we are seeking to rehabilitate Khartoum's genocidal regime; and second, increase the pressure on the Khartoum regime to change its behavior and permit all of its citizens to live in peace. And once you're out there and you go among the people, you know that we must move in a positive direction. Now, we cannot let another child's hand be cut off, we cannot let another mother go into mourning over the loss of her husband, and we cannot let a people be wiped out on this watch.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, very much. I yield back my time.

REP. SMITH: Thank you very much.

Jeff Fortenberry.

REP. JEFF FORTENBERRY (R-NE): Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

I just simply wish to commend you for your consistent concern over this issue, for your long-held willingness to dig deep into the complexities of this irrational lawlessness and violence which seems to govern this area.

So given the complexities and how difficult the challenges are that present themselves in terms of the solution, I just simply look forward to hearing some possible answers today. Thank you so much.

REP. SMITH: Mr. Fortenberry, thank you very much.

Let me now introduce our very distinguished witness for today's hearing: Secretary Jendayi Frazer, who was sworn in as assistant secretary for the Bureau of Africa -- African Affairs in August of 2005. Prior to becoming assistant secretary, Secretary Frazer served as the U.S. ambassador to South Africa and as special assistant to the president and senior director for African Affairs at the National Security Council.

Ambassador Frazer came to the NSC from Harvard University, where she served as an assistant professor of public policy. As a Council on Foreign Relations international affairs fellow, she served as a political military planner with the Joint Chiefs of Staff in the Department of Defense and as director for African Affairs at the NSC.

A very distinguished career and a very capable and very able leader on these very, very vexing issues. So you are very welcome to this hearing, and please proceed as you would like.

MS. FRAZER: Thank you very much. Thank you, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee. I thank you for giving me the opportunity to testify on our Sudan policy, and I also thank you for your resolve and commitment on trying to push for a better Sudan, a Sudan that will be peaceful and prosperous for all of its people.

Today I would like to review with you the U.S. strategy to push for implementation of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement and to resolve the crisis in Darfur.

Mr. Chairman, with your permission, I would request that my written testimony be placed in the record, and I will highlight the main points of the administration's Sudan policy this afternoon.

REP. SMITH: Without objection.

MS. FRAZER: Thank you.

First, the administration's primary goal is a peaceful and democratic Sudan that contributes to regional development and cooperates on counterterrorism. Over the past five years, we have made steady progress towards this goal.

Mr. Chairman, you specifically ask: Are we losing ground on peace in Sudan? The answer is as challenging and complex as the country itself. On the north-south peace front, we have clearly gained ground. On Darfur, it's back and often -- sometimes forth, but mainly back. But we do have a plan for progress there.

We also have to be watchful and take preventative measures to not lose ground in the east.

First, Mr. Chairman, let me outline where we are today and why I say we've made progress toward our overall goal over the past five years.

On January 22nd, 2001, President Bush told his then-national security adviser, Dr. Condoleezza Rice, that we must end the war in Sudan and stop the humanitarian and human rights abuses in the south. As you all know, Mr. Chairman, the National Congress Party-controlled government of Sudan and the Sudan People's Liberation Movement were bitter enemies that had warred for over 22 years. As Congressman Payne said, 4 million people were displaced, 2 million died in that bitter conflict.

Yet as a result of active U.S. diplomacy, working closely with Kenya, IGAD and other international partners, the SPLM and Khartoum government signed the historic Comprehensive Peace Agreement on January 9, 2005, in Nairobi, Kenya. The United States led international efforts to achieve that success, and the Bush administration remains committed to its full implementation.

We witnessed on July 9, 2005, the installation of the chairman of the SPLM, the late Dr. John Garang, as first vice president of Sudan in Khartoum. Since then, members of the SPLM, the NCP, and other parties have formed the Government of National Unity in Khartoum. And the SPLM, under the new first vice president of the Government of National Unity, Salva Kiir, have set up the Government of Southern Sudan in Juba.

And I would just say that, as you know, the first vice president, Salva Kiir, is here on his first international trip, and he's had a chance to meet today with Vice President Cheney, with Secretary Rice, with Deputy Secretary Zoellick and myself. And so some of the testimony that I will state is based on my direct -- on our direct consultations with the first vice president.

But these historic changes are major steps forward, but clearly there is more for the parties to do. I know that you, Mr. Chairman, and members of this committee, as well as the administration, remain concerned that many of the national commissions called for in the CPA still must be stood up; troop withdrawals are behind schedule; demobilization, disarmament and reintegration needs to move forward. These are just three areas to cite that are of particular importance.

Still, and most significantly, the Comprehensive Peace Agreement passed its first major test, the tragic death of its key architect, the first vice president, Dr. John Garang. Dr. Garang was committed to the cause of a peaceful, prosperous and united Sudan. While his death is a great loss, there is every reason to hope that his vision of a peaceful, democratic and unified Sudan will be fulfilled.

Demonstrating the resilience of the CPA, Garang's successor, Salva Kiir, was inaugurated as first vice president in an orderly process, and he has stated his unwavering commitment to realizing Dr. Garang's vision. In addition, Dr. Garang's widow, Rebecca, is carrying forward her husband's vision and is now serving as the minister of Transport and Roads in the Government of Southern Sudan.

Mr. Chairman, Ambassador Zoellick just had a phone call with Vice President Taha to talk about the implementation of this comprehensive agreement, and he confirmed that the Assessment and Evaluation Commission, the National Petroleum Commission, as well as the Boundary Commission have now been formed by decree issued by President Bashir. Vice President Kiir told us this morning that he has expected the announcements today, since when he left Sudan, the membership of the commissions were already agreed upon and it was a matter of making the announcement. So there has been some progress, and we welcome this news of the establishment of these key commissions.

As far as the administration is concerned, the next critical steps are for both parties to honor the security commitments, particularly by forming a Joint Defense Board, setting up the Joint Integrated Units, and, as I mentioned, withdrawing the troops, particularly the government troops being withdrawn from the south and from Juba.

Mr. Chairman, let me emphasize a fundamental premise of our Sudan strategy to maintain peace momentum. The administration views implementation of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement and resolution of the Darfur crisis as inter-related issues.

Implementation of the CPA is crucial to ending the violence in Darfur. Moreover, without progress in Darfur, there is a real danger for the violence to spill over into other areas of Sudan. The bottom line is the CPA is applicable in many respects to all areas of Sudan, and is designed to share power and wealth between the center and the periphery areas, a key root of the conflict in all parts of Sudan. It serves as a framework for our political agreements, including in -- or for other political agreements, including in Darfur.

To get to Darfur, clearly it's an unacceptable situation that must end now. Darfur is complex, it's a difficult situation that we and the administration -- that we, the administration and the Congress have characterized as involving genocide. The people of the United States know that this administration under the direction of President Bush, Secretary Powell, and now Secretary Rice has been the global leader in efforts to end the violence and suffering in Darfur. President Bush was the first head of state to speak out publicly on the unfolding violence and atrocities in Darfur in 2004. The United States was the first country to call for action in the United Nations Security Council. We were instrumental in obtaining a cease-fire agreement between the Government of Sudan and the Darfur rebels, the Sudan Liberation Movement and Justice and Equality Movement in April 2004. The United States was also the first to emphasize the need for intervention to stem the violence. And as a result of our actions, the African Union agreed to deploy observers and troops to Darfur in August 2004.

Since that time, the United States has worked closely with the African Union to build 32 base camps, and with other donors, provided airlift for over 6,900 African Union personnel now deployed to Darfur. This was possible with the over $160 million in resources provided by the Congress. President Bush continues to be committed to ending the conflict in Darfur. And the United States has mounted with the international community -- the effort that the United States has mounted with the international community has yielded results in Darfur.

As a result of the African Union's intervention and pressure exerted on the Government of Sudan and Darfur rebels, the AU-led political talks are moving ahead in Abuja, large-scale organized violence has substantially diminished since early 2005, and mortality rates have dropped. That said, the situation in Darfur remains intolerable. Over 2.4 million people are living in camps for internally displaced persons, another 200,000 have sought refuge in neighboring Chad, violence continues to plague civilian populations, as we see in the current spike of violence, caused by banditry, actions initiated by rebel movements, and actions by government forces, and continued marauding by the janjawid militia. We continue to make categorically clear the responsibility of the Government of Sudan -- now the Government of National Unity -- that is must end support to the janjawid and work actively to stop its actions while ensuring discipline within the Government of National Union's (sic) own forces.

But the bottom line, Mr. Chairman, is that a political solution is needed to end the violence in Darfur.

We are trying to take actions. The U.S. government's actions -- the way ahead in Darfur is to continue to make clear to the government of Sudan its responsibility to insist that all sides respect the cease-fire and to work with regional countries -- Libya, Chad, Eritrea and others -- to try to continue to put pressure on the rebels to respect the cease-fire and to negotiate a political solution.

In that regard, Deputy Secretary Zoellick will be leading a mission next week to Kenya and to Sudan to advance the administration's efforts to restore peace to Darfur and set the groundwork for a lasting political settlement in Abuja. He's going to in those Nairobi talks bring the SLM leadership together, so that they can form a united front in their negotiations with the Government of National Unity.

So making it clear to the government of Sudan its responsibility, insisting on accountability of all sides to the cease-fire, pushing for the political solution in the talks to Darfur, we also are pushing the Government of National Unity to have a joint negotiating team at Abuja. And in my consultations and the administration's consultations with the first vice president, Salva Kiir, he told us that the Government of National Unity has established a high committee on Darfur, which will be headed by Bashir, will also have First Vice President Kiir, Second Vice President Taha and other cabinet ministers as the joint team that will then go to Darfur to negotiate with SLM and JEM.

So we'll continue to support the Abuja talks, the AU-led Abuja talks. We've sent a U.S. senior official as an observer. We've also sent and provided technical expertise to assist the mediator.

And then finally, our approach to Darfur is to strengthen the African Union mission there, strengthen it by pushing for it to have the capability, the 105 Canadian armored personnel carriers. We're also pushing to increase NATO training and advice. We're trying to ensure a consistent understanding by the AU forces of their mandate, continuing to look at U.N. logistical assistance and perhaps even blue-hatting the AU mission in Darfur to strengthen the security environment.

And then finally we're continuing to provide humanitarian assistance in Darfur and in southern Sudan. In fiscal year 2005, we provided over 650 million (dollars), mostly in humanitarian assistance and support to the African Union mission, and over 450 million (dollars) in reconstruction and humanitarian assistance to other areas in Sudan, including southern Sudan and the three transition areas -- Nuba Mountains, Southern Blue Nile and Abyei.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, the USG continues its strong support for the south, and we will help the government of southern Sudan to build the institutions, capacity, transparency and infrastructure necessary for it to function.

We believe that the institutions in Sudan have changed substantially over the past 10 months since the signing of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement, which has led to the new national -- interim national constitution, the formation of a new Government of National Unity in Khartoum, and the new Government of Southern Sudan. We have to keep working with the SPLM to develop the new governmental institutions both in the south and in the north. We will continue to work with international partners to support the commissions and other integrated programs designed to facilitate the peaceful transition to Dr. Garang's vision of a united or unified government.

Congress and the administration share an interest in keeping the pressure on the central government, but also in supporting the new Government of Southern Sudan. We need to consult with Congress about how existing legal authorities may need to be modified so we can reinforce the SPLM while maintaining and increasing pressure on the north. I hope that I can work with you, Mr. Chairman, and the committee so we can move effectively address the challenges and opportunities of the peace agreement.

Mr. Chairman, I believe the United States is on the right track. Our strategy is moving forward. With the strong support of the president and the secretary and the Congress, we believe we have the tools in place to maintain momentum, to influence the parties and to achieve our common goal of a peaceful Sudan.

Thank you very much.

REP. SMITH: Secretary Frazer, thank you very much for your testimony and for your leadership.

I'd like to begin the questioning, if I could. First, one of the real take-homes that Greg Simpkins (sp) and I took away after meetings with President Bashir, Taha, vice president, and Salva Kiir, the first vice president, especially with Salva Kiir -- he was only on the job into his seventh day when we met with him, but he was very committed to making the government work. He said, "I am part of this government and we want to make this government work," you know, "for all the right reasons," as he put it.

And my first question would be about whether or not you feel that unity government has really been integrated. I have read reports that I find somewhat disconcerting that when it came to handing out or allocating the top ministries, that the SPLM did not do all that well; that except for foreign affairs, perhaps, most of the key bureaucracies are safely vested in the other side, if you will.

And secondly, he made a number of points -- and I noticed in your testimony, and if you could speak to this, that you said that we want to consult with Congress about First Vice President Kiir's request that we allow U.S. companies to provide spare parts to rehabilitate Sudan's railways. I struck up that conversation as well when I was in Khartoum about how do you move masses of people from Khartoum back to the south. Yes, it has a dual-use capability, but railroads are indeed now -- or if the peace becomes more durable, does that become a way of providing the means for those people to get back to their homes?

Let me also ask you, if I could, on trafficking. As you know, I was the prime sponsor of the Trafficking in Persons Act in 2000, which led to the creation the tiers, Tier 1, Tier 2, Tier 3 and the Watch List. The Watch List, as you know, we put in the '03 act.

I was very concerned when I saw that Sudan was upgraded, if you will, to watch list from Tier 3. If you could elaborate, if you will, on what concrete facts exist that would suggest that the government of Khartoum -- the government of Sudan merits that kind of treatment. It seems to me that that is still a major problem warranting Tier 3 status. But if you could -- .

On the government of southern Sudan, how well or poorly is -- and the government doing in the south in establishing that government? And then, on the issue of humanitarianism, and the lack of responsiveness by Khartoum, Greg and I saw and we've heard reports before and since our trip that the government has not been helpful in ensuring that the NGO community, the United Nations, our USAID personnel flow in an unfettered way. They have been profoundly unhelpful in many instances, which means that people are put at grave risk.

And finally, when it comes to accountability -- and Mr. Payne and I and many of us are trying to get Henry Hyde's bill, which is now a bipartisan piece of legislation, moved forward. But the key -- one of the key phrases in that legislation is the accountability, holding those men and women to account who have committed atrocities. Well, we know the U.N. Resolution 1593, which was adopted on March 29th, provides for referral to the ICC for those who have, perhaps, committed -- not perhaps; those who have committed atrocities. The International Commission of Inquiry recommended that the ICC prosecute; where is that? Is there a list of individuals on a printed page somewhere of people who need to be prosecuted at the ICC, and when will that be made public, if you will, and what's the status of that whole effort? Madame Secretary.

MS. FRAZER: Thank you. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

The -- on the national -- your first question was on the National Congress Party and the -- its domination of the Government of National Unity, particularly of the ministries, key ministries. I think that was the perception, particularly given that the National Congress Party received the Finance Ministry and the Energy Ministry as well.

Now, in our consultations with the SPLM, part of what we learned is that some of their capable senior officials wanted to be ministers in the government of southern Sudan, and so didn't put themselves forward to be part of the Government of National Unity, because the feeling is that there needs to be a very strong government of southern Sudan. So certainly, we continue to have concern and will watch carefully whether the Government of National Unity is dominated by the National Congress Party and what type of influence do the SPLM ministers have in that government.

I had the opportunity to visit Sudan earlier in October. And I actually posed this question to a couple of the SPLM ministers, to say do you have authority within your ministry?

What's the nature of all of these mini-advisers? Is there a shadow government? And I was assured that they do have the authority. But I do think that, clearly, SPLM is the new member of this government, and the United States must continue in our effort to back and to transform the nature of this regime, which is characterized by many other members of this committee appropriately; that we must work very closely with the SPLM and build their capacity, continue to assist them so that they can be an effective force within the Government of National Unity, an effective, transformative force. And certainly, I think that the vice president's visit to the United States, being the first country that he came to on an international visit, suggests his understanding and continued appreciation of the strong support of the United States for his role as the second-senior official in that Government of National Unity.

The government of Southern Sudan -- the same story. We need to continue to support them, build their capacity, especially help them with their development. When I, again, was traveling, I went to Juba. I met with the first vice president, Salva Kiir. I met with senior officials -- SPLM officials. I had an opportunity to meet with Rebecca Garang, who is now the government of Southern Sudan's minister of transport. And this issue of spare parts did come up, and they were saying that they had, because they government of Sudan sent soldiers through the railways, they had destroyed the rail capacity. Now they need development to come through those same railways. And they did raise the question of the possibility of allowing for spare parts.

REP. SMITH: If I could -- are they in favor of that -- (inaudible) -- sanctions --

MS. FRAZER: When I was in -- When I was in Juba, they spoke favorably of it. But what I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, is that the first vice president is here himself and will have an opportunity to meet with members, and that question can be posed directly to him.

But a couple of weeks ago, in my consultations with them in Juba, they all spoke favorably for it. But we need to look across the board at how we can help the government of Southern Sudan. It will also involve supporting the reform of the security sector, professionalizing the SPLM. And because Sudan is -- we have sanctions on them, many numerous sanctions on them, we many need carve-outs. But I think that Ambassador Zoellick, when he goes to Sudan, will have a better opportunity to make an assessment of that and then come back to the Congress with some specifics of ways in which we may need to look at authorities to provide the avenue for assisting the government of Southern Sudan while maintaining the pressure on the National Congress Party within the Government of National Unity.

You asked me a question, Mr. Chairman, about the trafficking, and it indeed -- the recommendation has gone forward that Sudan be put on the Tier 2 watch list. And the reason behind that was specifically related to the sexual violence against women. And as Secretary Rice had asked -- when she went to Darfur, she met with women who had been abused and violated. And she asked the administration to come up with a -- an initiative to counter violence against women, and we sent that to the government of Sudan.

They developed an action plan, which was a tailored work plan to address those issues. In particular, Sudan committed to implement a plan to address sexual violence against women in Darfur itself. It also helped to assist with the repatriation of a hundred Sudanese children, camel jockeys from Qatar and began investigation into the trafficking of these children, and it was the basis of that action that they were put on the watch list with the understanding that they could always go back to Tier 3 if we weren't satisfied with the actions being taken to implement the plan. And so that was the basis of the Tier 2 Watch List. But again, it's not a permanent status. It can easily revert to Tier 3.

REP. SMITH: Excuse me, but if you could provide for the record a copy of that national plan, I think it would be very helpful.

MS. FRAZER: Certainly.

REP. SMITH: Because the idea behind the act was to try to prod constructive action, and as you pointed out so well, if this is nothing but a paper promise, they should immediately revert back to Tier 3. So I thank you for that explanation.

MS. FRAZER: Absolutely.

You asked about the humanitarian. We still have concerns that the government of Sudan, namely the National Congress Party, is not allowing humanitarian access, and Ambassador Zoellick raised this specifically in his conversation with Vice President Taha this afternoon and got some assurances. But you know assurances -- words are one thing, action is another. And so we will continue to press the government to allow for that humanitarian access.

And on the accountability, as far as I know, Mr. Chairman, the ICC list has not become public. But Ambassador Zoellick again has signaled that if the ICC requires assistance, the United States stands ready for any assistance, but they haven't asked us for any assistance in developing their list or getting the government to adhere to that -- to the -- any ICC charges.

REP. SMITH: Just two final questions before yielding to Mr. Payne. The Sudan Tribune had an article online over the weekend that said "Darfur rebel SLA opens unity conference without leader." Can you speak to how -- you know, what that means in terms of not having a segment of the group there, including its leader?

And secondly, you heard in my opening comments concerns about the pay for African Union troops. Has that been rectified? And I also note that the administration, you know, has it identified. Approximately $100 million we're expected to contribute to the African Union, and will that be forthcoming and when?

MS. FRAZER: I missed the very first part of your question on the African Union.

REP. SMITH: African troops. What we heard from commanders on the ground was that -- and we also heard it in Addis when we went to AU headquarters -- that they have been promised about $15 a day; they were getting $1.28 a day. And while the moral implications have not really shown themselves yet, it will and it will soon, especially if there's remittances back to their families back home, and they don't have it.

MS. FRAZER: Sure.

REP. SMITH: And I mean, it's a tough posting to begin with and to be under paid. And they told us at headquarters and in the field in Darfur they're cash poor. They have airlift; they have other kinds of help; but they're not getting the cash.

MS. FRAZER: Okay. Thank you.

Yes, on Darfur, the SLM, Mani Minawi is there, but Abdul Wahid is not at the SLM conference. We raised this question -- I raised this question with the first vice president Salva Kiir. He said that there may be some concerns in terms of security of Abdul Wahid, and that that's the reason that the Nairobi conference will be so important, because it'll be on neutral ground.

And we expect both leaders to show up at the Nairobi conference that the United States will be hosting.

So it's critical that the SLM come together. They are providing an excuse for the National Congress Party to not make progress on the peace front. And so without rebel unity, we -- it's just -- the negotiations won't go anywhere. So we're taking an active role to try to bring them together.

On the African Union, there is a financial shortfall, which is partly the reason why we're looking at, over time, the possibility of blue-hatting them as a U.N. force. But certainly the United States is looking to meet its shortfall, which is about $100 million. The EU is also coming up with the money. As far as the pay differential, it's my understanding that the AU has rectified it.

REP. SMITH: Mr. Payne?

REP. PAYNE: Thank you very much.

Thank you for your testimony. And I'd just like to ask a few questions.

Would USAID -- how is it going to organize itself? We were hoping that there would have been some peace dividends after the signing of the accord. And will there be a permanent mission in Southern Sudan, or will you work out of Khartoum? Or would there be a special coordinator to deal with the aid projects, which would be very important to the South, since they are certainly in need of development.

And secondly, with a brand new government being set up, I wonder if the SPLN will be given specific support in setting up regional governments in Nuba, Southern Blue Nile, and other places. Since they have to start from scratch, it seems that they would need financial and technical support. And I wonder whether the U.S. government, through USAID or other agencies, has any formal plan to work with the government of South Sudan.

Also, I noted that -- and I'm not sure the funds that the chairman was talking about -- but there was $100 million requested from the Southern -- the emergency supplement, and it was reduced in Congress by almost two-thirds; only $37 million was appropriated. And I wonder if the administration is going to come forward with a new request, and whether there will be a need for us to try to develop a strategy to get those funds in play.

And you mention about the commissions that were called for in the CPA, which you mentioned in your testimony, a response to the first vice president's visit here. And I wonder whether -- whether the pronouncements that are being made by the government of Sudan is -- are they real, or is it just because Salva Kiir is coming here, and to try to have a smooth -- a smooth series of meetings here that the government of Sudan is acting as if it's trying to play ball. But, I mean, it's very difficult to tell the real intent. But I wonder whether the feeling of the administration is that these are things that are just being done because of the visit here by Salva Kiir.

MS. FRAZER: Thank you. The -- on your first question, Congressman Payne, in terms of USAID and how it's going to organize itself, there is a building being constructed in Juba. And the plan is to move the operations that are in Nairobi to Juba to -- so that we can more effectively support the government of southern Sudan. That support includes training, helping to train the capacity of the SPLM officials both in the assembly as well as in the executive, the ministers themselves; also trying to provide assistance with the budgetary monitoring and transparency so that the oil revenue that they'll get as well as the donor assistance can be accounted for and used for the people. We are also trying to work with India and IRI and other institutions to try to build the political party, the government -- the SPLM becoming a political party able to contest elections over the future and supporting the parliamentarians -- just assembly members with training. So, yes, we are doing -- we're -- a whole range of activities to try to support the government of southern Sudan. We think it's critical. That's why the administration is focused on Sudan in the first place. It was because of the grievances in the south, the atrocities that were taking place in the south. So, it behooves us to really put a focus on assisting them in establishing a peaceful and prosperous Sudan, and particularly southern Sudan.

On the question of the funds, yes, I do look forward to working with you to try to develop a strategy to get the type of funding and assistance that will be necessary to fully support the peace process in Sudan. And I will come back to have -- to discuss that directly with you on how we might address any shortfalls in funding that we're facing. Nov 01, 2005 18:01 ET .EOF

Your question about the commissions is apt. It's a -- timing is everything, and I'm certain that the first vice president's visit here helped to get the announcement.

That said, when I visited Juba, the first vice president told me at that time that he had submitted the names of the SPLM ministers who would be part of these new commissions, and it was clear that many of the commissions required government of southern Sudan ministers. Until the government was -- the government of southern Sudan was established, the commissions could not go forward.

And so I believe that it has been in the works, without a doubt. And as I said, the first vice president told us this morning that when he left Sudan, he expected the decree to have been already announced, because he left it on Bashir's desk, to be done with everyone having agreed on the composition of the commission.

So I don't doubt that the timing was intended for effect, but it does represent, I think, considerable work, particularly considerable work on the part of the government of southern Sudan and on Vice President Kiir's part.

REP. PAYNE: Thank you very much.

Just my final two questions. The State Department, as you know, in the last administration, had a very intensive interviewing of, I think, over 1,200 individuals that built up a case to declare genocide in Darfur. And it would appear to me that this information would certainly be helpful for the ICC. And I know that there is the problem of formal relations, although the U.S. did abstain and therefore allowed the International Criminal Court to proceed. And for that, we're very thankful.

However, we do feel that since we did indicate by our abstention that we felt that there should be prosecutions going on in Sudan by the ICC, it would appear that we would try to cooperate with the court and to allow the court, if they ask, to review any materials that was taken -- that Secretary Powell built the case of genocide. And so I would hope that some way there can be cooperation between ICC and our State Department.

And just finally, if you might indicate to us -- recently a senior diplomat was sent to Khartoum, and I just wonder: Is the State Department intending to name him as an ambassador, the person as an ambassador? Are we getting ready to normalize relations with Sudan?

MS. FRAZER: Thank you. Yes, Ambassador Zoellick -- Deputy Secretary Zoellick has made very clear that if we were asked by the ICC for our help, we would try to make sure that this gets pursued fully, to use his words, because we don't want to see impunity for any of these actors. And so they haven't asked, but if they did, we're -- we stand ready to assist.

On the question of the senior diplomat, no, it's not a matter of normalizing relations. What we did was, we sent Ambassador Hume there, and we sent Ambassador Hume, who used to be the former ambassador to South Africa, as well as the former ambassador -- Algiers -- he speaks Arabic. He's got extensive expertise in conflict management.

He worked in Mozambique. He's been working at the U.N. What we wanted was a senior diplomat who could pursue U.S. interests, and our interests are clear. Our interests are we need someone that can put pressure on the National Congress Party to end its support for the Janjawid, to stop the violence in Darfur. We need a senior person who understands how the former liberation movement, the SPLM, can be transformed into a government of Southern Sudan. And he has the expertise across the board. And so our sending him there was in the U.S. interest. It was in no way a signal of a normalization of relations. And I think we're not trying to normalize relations with the government of Sudan or the Government of National Unity. What we're trying to do is implement the Comprehensive Peace Agreement so that we transform the very nature of that regime. And we need someone senior with that mandate who's able to engage all parties to push forward on the areas that I outlined: support for the government of Sudan, implementation of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement, and ending the violence in Darfur and creating a broader peace -- prosperous and unified Sudan.

REP. PAYNE: Last question or two. We mentioned that there had been 105 armed personnel carriers delivered to the AU mission to go in Sudan. But from what I understand, that they were supposed to be delivered, but the government of Sudan has blocked them from being delivered and have refused to cooperate. I wonder if you could comment on that?

And just finally, I don't know whether Mr. Roger Winter speaks Arabic, I was under the impression that he was some type of an envoy. I don't think anyone knows Sudan any better than Roger Winter. I think that all members of the committee has a great deal of respect for his long-time interest and -- more than interest, but he's dedicated his whole life working in Sudan, even before becoming part of the government. And I just wonder what role will he play, if in fact we have a more senior diplomat in Khartoum?

MS. FRAZER: Thank you. Yes, the armored personnel carriers have been held up by President Bashir. I think we can say that it's President Bashir himself that's holding up those armored personnel carriers. What they've agreed to do is to let 35 come in. We're continuing to push for all of the armored personnel carriers to be allowed in to support the AU mission in Darfur.

So we're continuing to pressure. Certainly this is something that Deputy Secretary Zoellick will raise in his mission to Sudan next week. It's something that I raised when I met with President Bashir, when I met with Vice President Taha and other officials. So we're continuing to push on that front.

The question of Roger Winter, who was our special representative to the deputy secretary and how he will interface with Ambassador Hume, who is our charge now. The idea here is that the charge is there permanently, in terms of he doesn't go in and out. He's a presence there daily. And we can call him and say you need to put pressure on these guys right now at this moment in time. And so he's sort of managing our operation and has a daily presence there.

Roger Winter, as you said, has a longtime engagement in Sudan. He has excellent contacts there. He has a good sense of what's actually taking place. He will continue to be a senior adviser, especially to the deputy secretary. He will continue to have an influence and a role as an envoy going back and forth, in and out. He'll continue to meet with SPLM and government officials as necessary. He and I will work closely together in the formulation of our Sudan policy. So his role -- he will continue to meet with constituency groups there and here. So his role is one of more roving, whereas the charge is a permanent presence to try to keep the pressure on.

REP. PAYNE: I have no more questions. I just want to say that, you know, the government of Sudan once again, 105 armored personnel carriers supposed to go in, well, they hold them up, we may let a third in, we'll get back to you next week. You know, it's the same thing they've been doing decade after decade after decade.

Now, I know we need to try to work along with them, but you see it's the same bloody hands that let Osama bin Laden live in that country from '91 to '96, that planned the bombing of the Nairobi and the Dar es Salaam U.S. embassies. People I knew, had been there a week before and knew families that worked in that embassy who are dead now. Same government. And once again, we're going to start fiddling while Rome burns.

In dealing with this government, we ought to have a policy that tells them they either have to make the policy work or we ought to come down with some serious policy against them! This business about we let a few in and we may let them out, and some of our humanitarian groups now have not been issued any more permits to come in, Doctors Without Borders were given a hard time because they were outspoken, it just continues as people die every day in this millennium. It makes no sense at all.

REP. SMITH (?): Would my friend yield?

REP. PAYNE: Yes.

REP. SMITH (?): If I could, Madame Secretary, ask you, in addition to the armored personnel carriers not being allowed in, what other materiel has been stopped by Bashir?

And I had asked earlier about the humanitarian crisis, though, because we've heard it, it's ongoing, the reluctance to allow the Norwegians, for example, in Kalma camp to get the director, who was absolutely committed, suffered malaria himself doing this humanitarian work, didn't know from one day to the next whether or not his mission was going to be decertified or not re-upped by the Bashir government

What other problems do you see? I mean, you have a platform. If on this side the government of Sudan was sitting, what other things would you say "this has to be done"?

I think my friend is absolutely right, you know, to allow a third in but not the other two-thirds, constantly crippling the efforts of the international community to help the people on the ground.

MS. FRAZER: Yes. Thank -- thank you very much. The Kalma camp issue also came in in Ambassador Zoellick's phone call with Vice President Taha and emphasized again that that has to be resolved. He got assurances; we'll see. We know the character of the regime.

I would also say that redeployment of the government troops from Juba is necessary. It's an immediate necessary action that they must take. It's absolutely unacceptable for them to continue to have their presence there. They're behind the schedule in redeployment; it represents psychological warfare for them to continue to be there. And so, I would push very strongly on the government -- and I know that Ambassador Zoellick is going to do so -- that those government forces redeploy and get out of the south on -- at -- because they're already behind schedule. So that certainly is an area.

A second area that's important, now they established this boundary commission. That's one of the announcements that's made. But it's critical that that boundary commission's work be transparent and that we have oversight, because it establishes the line for where the north and the south is. And as the first vice president has stated and others have stated, that line is creeping southward, so that they're capturing more area of the south, claiming it to be north, particularly where there are oil fields. And that will have a major impact on revenue-sharing. And so that's another area that we have to get immediate action and have some very clear -- very clear oversight.

So, those are two areas. And certainly, to allow, there's at least 11,000 international NGO workers in Sudan. They have to have free access, they have to be allowed to do their work.

And so, these are -- that would be three areas that I'm sure that Ambassador Zoellick is going to continue to push on, and I certainly will as well.

REP. SMITH (?): Thank you.

REP. SMITH: Chairman Royce.

REP. EDWARD R. ROYCE (R-CA): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And we have several hundred thousand people wandering around the desert of Sudan without any help. They've been run off of their land by the Janjawid, and part of the strategy on the part of the government has been to prevent any assistance from being delivered to those individuals.

It's a daunting task for the African Union, because this is a country the size of -- this is a region. Darfur is the size of France. And when Diane Watson and I were there in -- earlier this year in Darfur, Sudan, we had an opportunity to be briefed by one of the African Union military units that are there in order to record the attacks.

And we got first-hand accounts of these mysteriously coincidental attacks by the government and the Janjawid, where the government comes in and attacks the villages, and then the Janjawid horsemen do the clean-up, seize the property, do the pursuit of those who flee. And allegedly, the volume of these attacks are down. But now I read that the African Union this week have come forward and said, no, they've documented yet another attack. The government is working with the Janjawid -- it's their assertion -- on attacking a camp.

So I would ask you to specifically tell us about government support for the Janjawid. How is it done? Who is doing it? The International Criminal Court is supposed to be undertaking an examination. They're interviewing Janjawid leaders who are ratting out people in the government, and vice versa, pointing fingers. But how widespread is this backing? What do we know?

And another thing I would like to know, is that President Bouteflika assured us when we were there -- I mean, he had conversations with the government in Sudan in which they agreed no longer to engage in use of airpower in attacks on villages. What air assets are being utilized? I'd like to know that. I saw recent press accounts that the Sudanese government was purchasing 34 Chinese-built jet fighters. So I'd ask you if there's anything to do that. I certainly would want to know -- and the members of this committee I know want to know if there's any more use of airpower.

The reason I bring up the question specifically about these Chinese fighters is because our past experience with the government of Sudan includes their use of helicopter gunships built in China deployed in attacks on civilians in Southern Sudan. These were not only Chinese-made, but they were based on the Chinese-built airstrips controlled by the Chinese oil companies. So if there's the introduction of these assets, I'd like to understand how that can be, because I remember some seven months ago the U.N. arms embargo that we were involved in shepherding through, and the U.N. Security resolution -- I think that was 1591 that was passed. So apparently it has not been implemented if the discussion now is to bring these Chinese fighters into the theater.

And lastly, in your testimony, you note that we continue to make categorically clear the responsibility of the government of Sudan -- now the Government of National Unity -- to both end support to the Janjawid and work actively to stop its actions while ensuring discipline within the Government of National Unity's old forces. Those are the words from the testimony that we got today. And, by the way, just -- I know with the administration -- the chairman and his staff -- his staff has worked diligently to try to get testimony in advance so that we can read through the testimony rather than an hour before the hearing. But I just raise that as a procedural question. But my point is what are we doing besides protests to get this message across?

MS. FRAZER: Thank you. And let me apologize for the lateness of the testimony. It --

REP. ROYCE: I fully suspect this has nothing to do with you. I -- I know you very well, Jendayi -- Secretary Frazer. I know that your testimony was submitted to the administration for clearance. The point I'm raising --

MS. FRAZER: Yes.

REP. ROYCE: -- is that so often, in my committee and in the chairman's committee here, it's the day before. And some of us have the -- have the eccentricity of reading these things the night before, and when we can't go through it in order to really look at the statements and the questions that we'd like to ask, it, I think, doesn't allow Congress to as effectively do its oversight responsibilities. That comment was not directed to you. It's directed to the administration, so thank you.

MS. FRAZER: Yes, certainly.

You ask a very complex and difficult question for me on how exactly is the Janjawid operating. I'll answer it a few ways. One, we clearly have seen in the past that the Janjawid were armed by the government, that the government of Sudan -- this is before it became a Government of National Unity -- did provide air cover for their operation. So there was clear coordination between the Janjawid and the government of Sudan, the National Congress Party.

What Salva Kiir -- the first vice president Salva Kiir has said -- as often happens when you support armed militia groups, you can lose control of them. It's his --- it's his view that the government has lost control of Janjawid. That's not to say that there was a recent -- I know there was a recent attack on a village in which there seemed to be some coordination again.

REP. ROYCE: According to the African Union -- and those troops are highly trained --

MS. FRAZER: Yes.

REP. ROYCE: -- they're sort of our canary in the mineshaft there, warning about these attacks --

MS. FRAZER: Right.

REP. ROYCE: And I -- one other point. I would think that if we could increase or expand their mandate to not just protection of their units and their observer status, but also protection of civilian population, it would give a deterrent effect in the region and might really encourage so many displaced people who are wandering the desert to at least come in close in order to try to get this -- the support and defense they need to stay alive.

MS. FRAZER: Yes. No, a point very well taken. And it's our understanding that the AU actually has the mandate to protect civilians as well as themselves, but that different units don't seem to understand their mandate very well. So partly we have to work with the AU to make sure that there's communication and capacity, and that there's a headquarter element that can -- that can coordinate better the various units of the force itself. And so that's where we're looking for potentially NATO to play a role. We'll work with the AU to try to get NATO to support the headquarters' capacity.

REP. ROYCE: And the numbers, too, because the week we were there, there was an attack to the south of us on a village.

MS. FRAZER: Yes.

REP. ROYCE: And because the AU troops were spread out so thinly through this region, you know, they weren't able to deter that, so we need --

MS. FRAZER: Yes.

REP. FRAZER: -- we need support for a more robust force in the West.

MS. FRAZER: Absolutely.

On the question of the Sudanese government purchasing Chinese fighters, I will have to go back and look into this. This is -- this would be very concerning, as you said. We'll look into it. I will be actually going to Beijing at the end of this month, and certainly we will raise -- Sudan is on the agenda to be discussed, and we'll raise this. If, in fact, they're circumventing an arms embargo, that's a very serious issue. But it's -- it -- I actually don't have the information that you've cited. So I have to --

REP. ROYCE: I read it in Aviation Week and Space Technology, and it was the assertion that they had purchased these 35 -- 34 new fighters. So if -- if you could check that with those sources, and also maybe we could look at the budget on the Sudanese side. If there's transparency in the budget, we'll be able to see if that's budgeted.

MS. FRAZER: Yeah.

REP. ROYCE: Thank you.

MS. FRAZER: Uh-huh.

REP. SMITH: Ambassador (sic) Watson?

REP. WATSON: Thank you so much.

We understand that during the course of the Sudan civil war there were tens of thousands of children who were employed by various armed groups as child soldiers. And I guess that's USAID or other aid agencies -- estimate that 20,000 of them have been demobilized since 2001. So, given the importance of restoring children's access to education in conflict and post-conflict situations, can you describe for us any assistance that USAID is providing to address the needs of reintegrating these child soldiers in the region, and what would be the future plans, if you are aware, for educating children in the Sudan? I mean, how can we bring these children back in so they can re-enter childhood?

MS. FRAZER: Yes. Thank you. I do know that USAID is planning to work on reintegration, and certainly the children soldiers would be part of that reintegration. Let me see if we -- if I can find --

REP. WATSON: Sure.

MS. FRAZER: -- some more specific information. (Pause, searches documents.)

Congresswoman Watson, it looks like I'm going to have to come back to you with the specific plan that USAID has for --

REP. WATSON: Sure. You can --

MS. FRAZER: -- for integration of these children. I know that that specifically is in a disarming, demobilization, reintegration. They're going to focus on reintegration, but I don't have in front of me their specific plan for dealing with the children. So I can come back to you with that.

REP. WATSON: Yes. And I would hope that the chair would entertain maybe another hearing on the positives, that there are some urgent actions that need to be taken now. And for the future, you know, how do we stabilize these young people?

So it's not that I need the information this moment. I would like to know what the plans are.

So if the chair would be so kind as to hold subsequent hearings, we can get the information then. If not, I can take it in writing.

MS. FRAZER: Thank you.

REP. WATSON: But there's no rush on it; I just want to know --

REP. SMITH: If the gentlelady will yield --

REP. WATSON: Yes.

REP. SMITH: -- this is part of an ongoing effort.

REP. WATSON: Yeah.

REP. SMITH: I can guarantee we will have several additional hearings on Darfur, on Sudan. So you will have ample time.

REP. WATSON: Thank you so very much, Madame Secretary.

MS. FRAZER: Thank you.

And Congressman (sic) Watson, let me just say that we do have experience with this in Liberia, where we -- I and Congressman Payne were just there for the elections. And what we've done is, we've actually taken many of those children and given them the skills training to help rebuild the infrastructure in Liberia. And I would imagine that USAID will work on some of that type of skills training, but I certainly will come back to you with a detailed plan.

REP. WATSON: And I would -- thank you. I would like to emphasize that these children need not only retraining in skill sets, but they're going to need some psychological and emotional support. I'm a school psychologist in my other life, and what I know about these children -- many of them orphans, many of them were probably forced into picking up these guns, and many of them were too young to understand the permanency of the death that they caused. And so I would hope that in your plan and working with the children, as we say, you work with the whole child --

MS. FRAZER: Yes.

REP. WATSON: -- and be sure that they have a mind-set and a thought process where they will not go back into this behavior again. And I'm sure they were forced in probably the most gruesome ways to take up arms and kill innocent people.

MS. FRAZER: Sure.

REP. WATSON: So we have to minister to their psychological and emotional side as well.

Thank you so very much, and thank you, Mr. Chairman.

REP. SMITH: Thank you, Ms. Watson.

Ambassador Frazer, just let me ask you a couple of additional questions. We've been talking a little bit about the mandate of the AU. And first of all, if you could assess what your feeling is about how well they have performed -- I would just say parenthetically that I think both Mr. Simpkins and I, as much as you can glean from, you know, a couple of day visit in Darfur, were very impressed by their esprit de corps. They were very committed. When I got talking to Major Ajumbo (sp), who's from Kenya, we compared notes because he was very active in peacekeeping in Sarajevo, in the former Yugoslavia. And so, you know, he's no stranger to being deployed in very difficult straits.

Is their mandate enough? Is it clear enough? How would you like to see it either changed or expanded? Because I am concerned, I think, like many, that -- but again, when you don't have armored personnel carriers, and you're riding around in mini vans -- not mini vans, but small vehicles, that hardly gives you the kind of protection to have a more robust mandate -- but if you could speak to the mandate issue.

Secondly, in your prepared testimony, you mentioned that we convened a donor meeting on October 18th. Could you just give us an update on what happened at that donor meeting to help the African Union?

Third, I -- on the issue of Dr. Garang's tragic death, do you have any insight as to -- you know, obviously most of us hoped that it was an accident, but obviously there was also some suggestions, including by the president of Uganda, that it might have been something other than that. What does the evidence tell you so far?

Number four, the Lord's Resistance Army in or new Juba, in the South. What is being done to get the Sudanese to end its relationship with these government rebels, the Lord's Resistance Army?

And finally, if I could, a mention was made earlier about the $535,000 contract to CR International. Could you elaborate on what that was all about?

And you know we've had lobby firms in the past that have represented dictatorial governments. I remember from Haiti to governments in Eastern Europe very reputable -- maybe not reputable by the clients that they were able to front for -- often come up and make a presentation that has an awful lot of surface appeal. I remember when I was leading the effort to stop MFN for Romania because of the Securitate's horrific abuse of religious believers and other human rights abuses and -- under the Ceausescu regime.

They had lobby firms that would make -- you know, every year when MFN was coming up for review -- had this excellent -- seemingly excellent talking points that really got you to look askance as to what was really happening on the ground and put a gloss on gross misbehavior, so if you could speak to the lobbying firms as well.

MS. FRAZER: Thank you. Thank you.

The mandate -- the AU needs to tell us if the mandate is not sufficient, and they haven't yet told us that is the case. As I say, it's a mandate that clearly states that they can protect civilians and protect themselves from attack. But it's also clear that there's certain units that don't seem to understand that mandate very clearly. So part of this is communication.

It may be that they need a more robust mandate, but they need to carry out the one that they have first, and also, as I said, let us know if indeed -- and we don't -- we're not opposed to a more robust mandate or for a more robust mandate. We'll follow the lead of the forces in Darfur and try to make sure that they have what they need, whether that be mandate, as well as equipment, training and most importantly logistics and command and control, because as you say, they've operated very well, particularly at the battalion level.

They've done a fantastic job. They stepped up to the plate, and we should commend their effort and continue to support their area. But when you start talking about brigade-level operations, they need more support at the headquarters element -- more planning, more logistics, make sure they get the fuel that they need, et cetera. And so we are looking at how we can assist them.

This is not new to the administration. We worked very much like this with the ECOWAS force in Liberia, where we had a EUCOM element embedded in their planning headquarters to assist with that brigade-level operation. And it's also the case that it may be that over time, particularly if we talk about increasing the troop levels for the AU, that we may need to look at a blue U.N. force because the AU may be tapped out in terms of its ability to get new troop contributors, because, frankly, they're all over. They're in Cote d'Ivoire, they're in Liberia, they're in Burundi. They're stretched fairly thin. The countries that normally come up and provide troops are fairly stretched, and so it may be that we need to look at a U.N. blue-hatting. But they've done very well. And, you know, I think the African Union is demonstrating the very philosophy of Africans taking control of their own destiny. And certainly they've stepped up in Darfur.

There's no information that we have that Dr. Garang's death was anything but an accident. I think the investigation is going on, but as far as the initial assessments, it was indeed a tragic -- a very tragic accident.

As far as the LRA is concerned, there has been an agreement between the government of Sudan and the government of Uganda to allow for the government of Uganda to have sort of quick action in the southern territory. We believe that the SPLM will become an effective part of that relationship to try to address the LRA threat. The LRA is actually starting to attack SPLM. So it's a very, very dangerous situation, and I think we have to take and do whatever we can to push the government of Sudan, because what we fear is that there may be elements within the military that continues to provide information to the LRA, and maybe even arms. They may not represent government of Sudan policy. That's a question that's still out there. But there's certainly some type of assistance, we believe, continuing with the LRA.

On the question of the lobby, the only thing that I can say there is that certainly not -- one lobby can't change the administration's approach to Sudan. We think that this is a regime that needs fundamental transformation. That's been our approach from day one. As I said, January 22nd, President Bush said that he needs -- we need to change and stop the killing that was taking place. That continues to apply in Darfur.

This administration is very serious about what -- the challenges in Sudan and where the responsibility lies in Sudan. So certainly one lobbyist can't change in any way, advocating for whomever, the fundamental approach of the administration on Sudan.

REP. SMITH: Mr. Payne?

REP. PAYNE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And we realize that one lobbyist can't change, you know, this administration probably. However, the thing that's baffling is why would the administration -- even though one lobbyist can't necessarily change the policy of this administration -- why would the administration break an eight-year sanction -- regardless to whether the lobbyist can change it or not -- to change a sanctions law to allow a lobbyist to be paid $530,000 by the government of Sudan to lobby the Congress and the administration.

Now, on one hand we say that we want to really show Sudan that we're serious. How do you show them that we're serious when you allow them to have a lobbyist come in?

Now, I know it wasn't made on your level. However, I'm simply saying it sends the wrong message. It sends the message that the administration is not serious about Sudan. We had sanctions on gum arabic. The administration will allow gum arabic to come into this country unimpeded because gum arabic is something that some corporations want, and the administration is not going to stop gum arabic from Sudan to come in, in spite of the fact that we have sanctions on Sudan.

And so you see, the thing that's frustrating is that we say the right things, we talk things, but then on the other hand, it seems like we concede, and we cajole, and we finesse this government of Sudan. We don't have to do that. We're the most powerful nation in the world. We don't have to play around with Sudan. There is no excuse for it. It's disgraceful. It absolutely makes no sense. Why do we have to play around with Sudan? We don't play around with anybody else. When we're serious about something, as we can see, we make our feelings known. But why do we play around with Sudan? It makes no sense at all to allow a law to be changed to allow a lobby firm to come in to lobby.

If I were Bashir and Taha, I'd say things have gone all right. You know, they wink here and nod. And we're just going to do the same thing.

If I were the government of Sudan, I'd continue to do what I'm doing anyway, because I would say that they're not serious. Why aren't they serious? Well, they're letting our government come in, they're letting us violate the CPA, they allowed a lobbyist to come in, they sent a top former ambassador, very distinguished person, to be here, not to be an ambassador, but to just keep an eye on things that are going on. I think that -- and I can't understand why our government continues to allow this dastardly, murderous government to have a wink and a nod. I just can't understand it. It's not a question, it's just a statement.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

REP. SMITH: Thank you.

If I could, if the gentleman would yield for one second, the record should note that on the gum Arabic question both Mr. Payne and I were united. When the original Sudanese Peace Act went through our committee, way back in the 1990s, we originally wanted to proscribe that in terms of it -- its ability to come into this country.

There was another New Jerseyan who also sits on this committee who took the opposite view, and that view prevailed. So we, at the mark-up level, could not hold onto that sanction. But we were united on that in trying to keep that. Even though Mars is located in our state, a number of pharmaceuticals -- Mars, obviously the great producer of chocolates, which I love. But, you know, at what -- at what price? So, we did unite on that one. But again, it was another member from our state who led the effort in the opposite direction.

Mr. Tancredo.

REP. THOMAS G. TANCREDO (R-CO): Mr. Chairman, because I'm -- I have just a -- maybe a couple of questions. And if they've -- if you've answered them while I was called out of the room, please tell me, and I will just simply read the transcript.

First of all, the issue of -- other countries that are aiding the rebel movements in Darfur, what is their -- what's in it for them? Why are they doing that? That's one --

MS. FRAZER: Okay.

REP. TANCREDO: Go ahead.

MS. FRAZER: Okay. Yes. Thank you -- thank you very much, Congressman.

The other countries that are supporting the rebels in Darfur: Chad, it may be ethnic and tribal-based support; Eritrea, it's probably more strategic. Eritrea has had issues with the character of the regime itself, just as the United States has had trouble with the character of the regime. And so, they may be supporting various rebel forces to try to transform the nature of the regime.

REP. TANCREDO: And what are we doing -- what are our communications with them?

MS. FRAZER: Our communications at this moment is that the solution to Darfur and the solution to the East is negotiation, that we have a comprehensive peace agreement in place that provides for the devolving of power from the center to the periphery, that provides for power-sharing, wealth-sharing, and that what we need to do is push the rebels to form a united front and to negotiate so that they can become part of the Government of National Unity, deliver benefits to their population, and help the SPLM to transform the character of that regime as part of that Government of National Unity.

REP. TANCREDO: Secondly, the ICC and its -- the status of its investigation. I know -- I'm well aware of our position with regard to the ICC. But several of us have attempted to, you know, make sure that we would like the State Department to help and to cooperate in any way possible with that investigation. What is the status?

MS. FRAZER: This issue did come up earlier.

REP. TANCREDO: All right. That's okay. I was just -- you don't have to be redundant. I'll wait and read it.

Thank you very much.

MS. FRAZER: Thank you very much.

REP. SMITH: Just one final question, and Mr. Payne might have one final as well -- but really two.

H.R. 3127 as amended, does the administration have a position on that legislation?

And secondly, I did ask this previously, but, you know, I did ask multiple questions -- about that donor meeting on October 18th. And maybe you did answer it and I missed it, but what was concluded at that meeting for the African Union in terms of additional resources?

MS. FRAZER: Yes, thank you. On the question of the 3127, clearly we support the spirit of the legislation and the need for accountability for the perpetrators of violence and atrocities. We will continue to watch to see how the bill comes out. So we're -- and we're prepared to consult with you on it. But the spirit of it, certainly we're with you on that.

On the donors conference, it was to strengthen the African Union mission, particularly looking at funding over time, trying to build international support to continue that funding. And looking at the future of Darfur peacekeeping -- some of the issues that came up here: What is the mandate? How do we support the mandate that's currently there? Do they need a stronger mandate? What would be required if it were a stronger mandate? And how can you continue the funding in out years. So that was the purpose of the meeting.

REP. SMITH: Ranking Member Payne has a final statement.

REP. PAYNE: Oh, I just want to say that, you know, we commend your department for the success in Liberia and the runoff that is coming. An outstanding job done by the State Department. We are pleased, and fingers crossed, that Burundi will move forward. And although the U.S. was not totally involved, watched and encouraged, I'm sure, South Africa to move forward.

We're pleased that the difficult job at NDRC is being moved forward in your recent visit to Zimbabwe -- to Tanzania, rather. Dealing with the elections in Zanzibar and the tension that's been there for a decade or so is commendable. So we do feel that things that the department is doing is moving in the right direction and it's the right thing to do.

However, as you can see, members of Congress are very frustrated at U.S. policy in Sudan. We've been frustrated for a long time. And we think that because of the lack of real commitment on the part of the administration, that all of those things that are going well gets lost when we sit around and allow a government like that to have the privileges that it does. And I hope that the message gets back to the food chain up that we're very serious about the situation and that we expect our government to start acting in a more assertive and a more responsible manner as relates to Sudan.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

REP. SMITH: Mr. Payne, thank you very much.

Ambassador, do you have any final comment you'd like to make?

MS. FRAZER: The only final comment is to thank you for convening this meeting, this hearing on Sudan. Again, as I said, I thank you for your commitment and resolve, Mr. Chairman, as well as the committee members.

And I just want to restate and assure you that the administration feels as deeply as you do, and that comes from the very top, from President Bush himself, who is very strong on Sudan and what is necessary to get peace there. And so we'll continue to work together -- (inaudible).

REP. SMITH: (Inaudible) -- thank you so much for your leadership and for your gracious time you've spent here with us this afternoon. It's been very enlightening and informative. Thank you so much.

MS. FRAZER: Thank you.

REP. SMITH: The hearing's adjourned. #####

LOAD-DATE: November 2, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: International News

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

11 of 359 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

November 1, 2005 Tuesday 2:13 AM EST

REP. SMITH HEARING FOCUSES ON CRISIS IN SUDAN AS FIRST VICE-PRESIDENT VISITS U.S.

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 755 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J. (4th CD), issued the following press release:

While Sudanese First Vice-President Lt. General Salva Kiir Mayardit was meeting with Deputy Secretary of State Robert Zoellick and other Administration officials during his first visit to the United States (since assuming his current position), Rep. Chris Smith (R-NJ) used the opportunity to investigate troubles surrounding the East African Nation and seek avenues for the United States to effectively direct its efforts. As Chairman of the Subcommittee on Africa, Global Human Rights, and International Operations, Smith will welcome Dr. Jendayi Frazer, Assistant Secretary of State for the Bureau of African Affairs, U.S. Department of State, to testify at a hearing entitled: "Sudan: Losing Ground on Peace?"

"For the last several years, we have devoted a great deal of attention to the troubled nation of Sudan, ranging from the North-South conflict to the genocide in Darfur to trafficking in persons and abuses by UN Peacekeepers," said Smith, who has held numerous hearings focusing on Sudan. "We need to develop a comprehensive plan that can best contribute to peace and hold those that have murdered, raped, enslaved and plagued the people of Sudan accountable."

U.S. attention has most recently been focused on the genocide in the Darfur region of Sudan, where as many as 400,000 people have been killed in a conflict that began early in 2003. Over 1 million people have been displaced from their homes, and hundreds of thousands remain in refugee camps. The Sudanese police force - under orders from the government - routinely fires shots over the camps nightly to frighten residents. Violence surrounding the camps - including robberies, rapes and murders - prohibits people from feeling safe enough to venture out for supplies. The African Union (AU) troops tasked with maintaining civility and peace are in need of equipment and supplies, and are only being paid an average of $1.28 per day. Smith visited two of these camps in a trip to Sudan in August.

"Those in refugee camps live in constant fear and refuse to allow Sudanese police into their camps and are afraid to venture outside of the camps for water or firewood because of the ongoing violence occurring nearby," Smith said. "While in Darfur, I met with African Union troops who continually demonstrate extraordinary commitment under dire circumstances by putting their lives at stake for minimal return. We must help in providing equipment and supplies to enable them to accomplish their mission."

In September, Smith had expressed disappointment with the State Department decision to move Sudan from Tier III country - a ranking for worst offenders of Trafficking in Persons (TIP) - to Tier II. Smith's Victims of Trafficking Protection Act of 2000 created the Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP) produced by Office of Trafficking in Persons at the Department of State, which ranks countries according to their efforts to combat trafficking around the world into three tiers. Countries listed on Tier 3 - the lowest ranking - are failing to take minimum steps to combat human trafficking and are denied non-humanitarian U.S. aid. According to a Presidential Determination Memorandum, the Secretary of State has determined that Sudan "is making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance."

"America cannot condone human trafficking by any nation," said Smith, who is the author two landmark laws to combat human trafficking and aid the victims of this horrible crime. "We have made significant progress over the past few years to combat human trafficking and actions like this send the wrong signal to nations - friend and foe alike - that turn a blind eye to this international horror."

The hearing will examine how the Administration is handling these issues and the ways that Congress can help in these efforts. Smith is the co-sponsor of HR 3127, the Darfur Peace and Accountability Act of 2005, which was authored by Rep. Henry Hyde. The bill would "impose sanctions against individuals responsible for genocide, war crimes, and crimes against humanity," and "support measures for the protection of civilians and humanitarian operations" and "support peace efforts in the Darfur region of Sudan."

"The situation in Darfur requires prompt international action to stop the attacks on civilians and to try to ensure that the genocide in that nation is truly ended," Smith said. "The time for action on this issue is now."

Contact: Brad Dayspring, 202/225-3765.

LOAD-DATE: November 3, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2005 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

12 of 359 DOCUMENTS

FDCH Political Transcripts

November 1, 2005 Tuesday

U.S. REPRESENTATIVE CHRISTOPHER H. SMITH (R-NJ) HOLDS A HEARING ON SUDAN PEACE

LENGTH: 14830 words

COMMITTEE: AFRICA, GLOBAL HUMAN RIGHTS AND INTERNATIONAL OPERATIONS SUBCOMMITTEE

SUBCOMMITTEE: HOUSE INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS COMMITTEE

SPEAKER:

U.S. REPRESENTATIVE CHRISTOPHER H. SMITH (R-NJ), CHAIRMAN

LOCATION: WASHINGTON, D.C.

WITNESSES:

JENDAYI E. FRAZER, ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE, BUREAU OF AFRICAN AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE

HOUSE COMMITTEE ON INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS: SUBCOMMITTEE ON AFRICA, GLOBAL HUMAN RIGHTS AND INTERNATIONAL OPERATIONS HOLDS A HEARING ON SUDAN PEACE

NOVEMBER 1, 2005

SPEAKERS:

U.S. REPRESENTATIVE CHRISTOPHER H. SMITH (R-NJ)
CHAIRMAN

U.S. REPRESENTATIVE TOM TANCREDO (R-CO)

U.S. REPRESENTATIVE JEFF FLAKE (R-AZ)

U.S. REPRESENTATIVE MARK GREEN (R-WI)

U.S. REPRESENTATIVE JOHN BOOZMAN (R-AR)

U.S. REPRESENTATIVE JEFF FORTENBERRY (R-NE)

U.S. REPRESENTATIVE EDWARD R. ROYCE (R-CA)

U.S. REPRESENTATIVE HENRY J. HYDE (R-IL)

EX OFFICIO

U.S. REPRESENTATIVE DONALD M. PAYNE (D-NJ)
RANKING MEMBER

U.S. REPRESENTATIVE BARBARA LEE (D-CA)

U.S. REPRESENTATIVE BETTY MCCOLLUM (D-MN)

U.S. REPRESENTATIVE BRAD SHERMAN (D-CA)

U.S. REPRESENTATIVE GREGORY W. MEEKS (D-NY)

U.S. REPRESENTATIVE DIANE E. WATSON (D-CA)

U.S. REPRESENTATIVE TOM LANTOS (D-CA)
EX OFFICIO

*

SMITH: The subcommittee will come to order, and good afternoon, everybody.

Over the last few years, the U.S. Congress has devoted a great deal of attention to the troubled East African nation of Sudan. Initially, we were as concerned about the issue of slavery as we were about the country's destructive civil war.

Over several years, I've held several hearings on this issue of slavery, as early as March of 1996. Unfortunately, to this date, there is no proof that the existence of slavery in Sudan has been eliminated. Certainly, no reason has been given to Congress to justify the downgrading of Sudan's status as a nation guilty of trafficking in persons.

We have also devoted attention to resolving the 21-year-old north-south conflict between the National Congress Party government in the north and the Sudan People's Liberation Movement in the south. With their signing of the comprehensive peace agreement on January 9 of this year, there was great hope that this longstanding war would finally be brought to a peaceful and equitable end, so that the suffering would be over and reconstruction could begin. However, the sudden death of SPLM's leader, Dr. John Garang, seems to have thrown the peace process off track, and there is evidence that the National Congress Party may be trying to forestall the peace accords rather than to implement them.

Most recently, we've been focused on the traffic situation in the South Darfur region of Sudan, where as many as 400,000 people have been killed in a conflict that began in February of 2003. At one point, as many as 10,000 people per month were dying due to attacks led or abetted by the government of Sudan. More than 2 million residents of Darfur have been displaced, many of them living in internally displaced persons camps.

I visited two of these camps in August with my friend and colleague, my chief of staff on the subcommittee, who deals with African issues, Greg Simpkins. We went to Mershing camp and Kalma camp, perhaps the largest IDP camps in the world.

When we visited South Darfur this past August, again with Greg, we found encouraging signs in the determination of the people of Darfur to survive, even in horrendous circumstances. We also were impressed with the dedication of the USAID staff and contractors, as well as the NGOs on the ground, to provide much-needed humanitarian assistance despite many logistical and bureaucratic obstacles.

However, there are some troubling conditions that have only gotten worse since our return. The tens of thousands of people living in Kalma have refused to allow Sudanese police into the camp because they saw them as enemies. The police proved them right by shooting over the camp nightly to frighten residents. When shooting didn't chase camp residents out, a commercial embargo was put into place so that people in the camp were unable to bring in any supplies beyond what they can carry on themselves.

The people in Kalma camp, like the people in other IDP camps, are justifiably afraid to leave -- women who have been routinely raped upon venturing outside the camp for water or for firewood. Bandits are not only robbing people outside the camps, but they are killing them as well in all too many cases.

While in Darfur, we met with African Union troops, whose commanders told us that they had too few vehicles to patrol effectively in carrying out their mission to protect the people of Darfur from attack. A.U. commanders told us that the pay that they had been promised had not been forthcoming. When we were there in August, the average A.U. soldier was receiving $1.28 a day, having been promised about $15.00 a day. Given the attacks and kidnappings of A.U. troops, I believe they are demonstrating extraordinary commitment under trying circumstances.

Last month, the A.U. accused the government of Sudan of joining with the Janjaweed militias in attacking villages and refugee camps. After supposedly ending their collaboration with the Janjaweed weeks ago, this alliance appears to be back in place.

The Darfur peace talks have not made much progress, largely due to the splintering of the rebel Sudan Liberation Army, or SOA, who with the Justice and Equality Movement, or JEM, declared war on the government of Sudan nearly three years ago. The government of Sudan also bears responsibility for these talks being stymied. Furthermore, Eritrea and Libya are supporting these rebel movements, and they too are making a peaceful settlement less likely.

Meanwhile, the SPLA, now part of the government of Sudan, has not played a noticeable role in the Darfur conflict, as they did under Dr. John Garang. However, failure to resolve the Darfur situation could help unravel the peace between the north and the south. Certainly that peace agreement faces its own challenges from a National Congress Party that seems to want an agreement in name only and from an SPLM struggling to regain its footing after the death of its long-time leader.

Too many aspects of the comprehensive peace agreement remain undone. I spoke with the Catholic archbishop of Juba last week, and he told me that the development of the south was desperately in need of international support. He said frustration over the slow pace of the peace process will only increase the separatist elements in the south. According to the archbishop, the northern part of the government has not withdrawn its troops from the south as scheduled, nor established key commissions to implement the peace accords, nor complied with the international commission that already had set the boundary between the north and the south.

Congress has tried in our recent legislative effort to take into account the entirety of the crisis of Sudan. We surely want to focus on the accountability of those involved in genocide in Sudan, but we cannot ignore other parts of the complex picture in this country. We must keep a focus on the north-south peace accord, or it may fail and plunge the country back into a wider conflict.

Today's hearing is necessary and is required to learn from the administration how our government's policy is attempting to tackle this difficult situation, and how Congress can create a comprehensive plan to contribute to peace and to accountability for those who have murdered, raped, enslaved and otherwise plagued the people of Sudan for so many years. Our committee's chairman, Mr. Hyde, has fashioned a bill with many of us working with him that we feel will make such a contribution. We want to move forward on this effort as soon as possible for the sake of so many who are still in danger in Sudan.

I'd like to go to my friend and colleague, Mr. Payne, who has been a tireless worker for peace in Sudan for such time as he may consume.

PAYNE: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. And let me commend you for calling this very important hearing on the increasing worrisome situation in Sudan.

I welcome Assistant Secretary Frazer to the committee. And I look forward to working with her and hearing her testimony. I'd like to commend you for the outstanding work that you've done in your previous capacities on the National Security Council and as ambassador to South Africa. And it was a pleasure traveling with you to Liberia recently to observe the elections in Liberia, which I thought went extremely well, and we look forward to the runoff on next Tuesday -- Tuesday a week from now. And I know that you've traveled to other countries, and I'd be interested at some time to assess what your findings were.

We at the center certainly knew in this position you just happen to be the messenger, so we don't want you to take it personally. Perhaps we'll see some changes under your tenure.

We certainly feel that the loss of Dr. John Garang was a tremendous setback to the peace accord in Sudan. As the chairman said, I've been traveling to Sudan since the early '90s, and Dr. Garang has been a tireless warrior for the people of South Sudan. And we were all saddened with his untimely death, and certainly we feel it's been a setback to the process. I had the privilege to attend the wake in Yei the day before the funeral in Juba, and you could see on the faces of the Sudanese the sorrow and sadness that besieged the country.

And so we'll have to move forward, but I hope that all of the work that he's done and even his death has not been in vain. My objective for listening to your testimony at this hearing is to get a clarification on U.S. policy towards the current regime in Sudan. We do have a national unity government which was recently formed, but I have serious concerns about the commitment of the ruling National Congress Party to real, true, lasting peace in Sudan.

We must not let up pressure on the government; we must ensure that they fully implement the comprehensive peace agreement and end the violence in Darfur without any further foot-dragging and excuse-making. At the same time, we must provide increased assistance to the government of southern Sudan, led by Salva Kiir, who I first met in 1994, and who has certainly been a close ally of Dr. John Garang for as long as the movement has been going forth.

One hundred and five members of Congress sent a letter to Secretary Rice yesterday expressing the following concerns: Recent developments in Darfur, including the kidnapping and killing of African Union troops and humanitarian workers;

The closure of main roads leading out of the capital of western Darfur;

An estimate by the United Nations that nearly three-quarters of a million refugees are beyond the reach of humanitarian aid, which means we will start seeing tragedy again by the fact that resources cannot get to these people;

Delay in the implementation of the comprehensive peace agreement, which mandates the immediate withdrawal of government troops from disputed areas, government reform of civil service, security forces and the judiciary, and the establishment of an investigatory commission into the genocide in Sudan.

An apparent softening of U.S. policy towards the government of Sudan was also expressed in the letter to Secretary Rice.

I have followed the crisis in Sudan, as the chairman mentioned, for a long time -- for at least the 21 years that the war has been going on between the Islamist government in Khartoum and the Sudan People's Liberation Army and Movement, the SPLA-SPLM. As you are well aware, more than 4 million people were displaced in that civil war since 1989, and over 2 million people have died as a result of that struggle that has gone on when Sharia law was imposed on the entire country to those who are Christians and animists and agnostics and atheists and felt that they should not be under Sharian law, because they did not believe in the Koran.

During that time, the National Islamic Front -- the NIF government, led by Omar-al-Bashir -- committed innumerable brutalities in unimaginable scope against the people of the south. They marginalized areas of southern Brunel and the Nuba Mountains with the lawless war running until January 9, when the party signed a comprehensive peace agreement, the CPA. I was there in Nairobi for the signing and was cautiously hopeful for the long-awaited peace in Sudan.

However, once again, the north-south conflict reached the point where an agreement was imminent and the government began its attack on innocent civilians in Darfur, which caught us all by surprise. With the help of the Janjaweed, it destroyed villages and communities, maimed, raped, killed, terrorized the people of Darfur.

We know that the A.U. mission is simply not deployed at the adequate numbers to quell the violence in Darfur, and that its mandate must be strengthened to protect civilians. Still, I commend the A.U. for the tremendous role it has played, but more is needed to protect the innocent civilians of Darfur.

The people of Sudan have suffered tremendously under the hand of this government -- which by the way, came to power in a bloody coup in 1989, as I mentioned. Concerned citizens of this great country have devoted years to ending the bloodshed in Sudan -- first South Sudan, now Darfur. We could be looking at a crisis in East Sudan soon as well if the government does not stop its genocidal behavior in that region.

The message must be clear and concise: until the following occurs, the United States is ill-advised and must not normalize relations with the government of Sudan. It's just that simple.

When the crisis in Darfur is resolved peacefully is when we should look at a normalization of our relations with the government of Sudan. When the Janjaweed and allied militia are disarmed and demobilized is when we should look at normalized relations with Sudan. When the government of Sudan is cooperating with the ICC is when we ought to normalize relations with Sudan.

When suspects are handed over for trial to the ICC is when we should normalize relations with Sudan. When the government of Sudan negotiates in good faith in the east is when we should normalize relations with Sudan. When the government of Sudan is cooperating fully to disarm, demobilize, and hand the LRA leaders who are killing children, have done it for 18 years, and go to Sudan for cover -- that's when we should normalize relations with Sudan.

When the CPA is being implemented in good faith and without delay -- including the implementation of the Abyei Commission report, withdrawal of the government forces from the south as called for in the CPA, setting up of key commission as called for in the CPA, revenue-sharing as called for in the wealth-sharing agreement -- that's when we should normalize relations with Sudan.

The Darfur crisis is not abating. We must be firm with Khartoum. We must ensure compliance. We must stop the killing. No more visits from the Sudan intelligence chief or other architects of genocide should be tolerated in this country. No more waiving of certain sanctions, like that allowing Sudan to hire lobbyists in Washington for $530,000 so they can clean up their image.

I look forward to hearing your testimony.

SMITH: Thank you very much, Mr. Payne.

Chairman Royce?

ROYCE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Like you, I've traveled to Darfur, and I've seen the results there of the government's genocidal campaign. And when I say "genocidal campaign," we took with us Don Cheadle and Paul Rusesabagina, the hotelier who Don Cheadle portrayed, and we went into a little town that had been attacked by the Janjaweed, and it had been bombed prior to that. The town formerly had 30,000 inhabitants; there were only a couple of hundred left in that particular town.

We talked to a number of survivors of those attacks. Children drew us pictures that looked an awful lot like Antonov bombers dropping bombs on their village. And it's hard to believe that since those villages were bombed, it wasn't done by the government.

We remember one young boy who put out his arm, but there was no hand, and I asked him what happened to it, and he said, "Janjaweed, Janjaweed." So I'm deeply troubled by the continuing violence in Darfur, which is mostly the government's responsibility, and I look forward to hearing from the administration -- hearing what it's doing to end the killing and suffering and move the peace process ahead.

And again, I thank the chairman for holding this hearing.

And I thank you very much for being with us today. I appreciate it very much.

SMITH: Chairman Royce, thank you very much.

Ambassador Watson?

WATSON: Thank you so much, Mr. Chairman.

I too must join with my colleagues, Royce and Payne. I had the great good fortune of traveling with Mr. Royce, and I cannot find a more committed and dedicated member of our House for the cause of eradicating this genocide. And Mr. Payne, who has a distinguished record of fighting for the people of the Sudan, and who goes often and reports back to us formally and informally, and I want to thank them.

But unfortunately, what I see right now when I look at the United States' policy towards Sudan is a willingness to tolerate any behavior by the Khartoum regime in the interests of improving relations. And I think there's something wrong about that. This administration has taken several actions over the past few months which send the unmistakable message that Washington is pleased with the behavior of the Sudanese government.

Well, not from my viewpoint. And I understand that Sudan's trafficking-in-persons status has been updated to tier two watch list. And it's a tier two watch list country, which would put it in the same company as Israel, and Switzerland -- this despite the fact that earlier this year, the U.N. documented abductions and sexual slavery by the Sudanese troops.

And we heard the stories that were given when we were out among the refugees, and they were blood-chilling and blood-curdling. We were able to spend time with Rusesabagina, the actual manager, and he told us what really happened, and that movie did not give you all of the ugliness and the pain and the tragedy that they actually went through.

For an example, he said when they came into a village they would go -- the Janjaweed -- to someone's home -- and by the way, they were high off of drugs and alcohol when they did this. And they would go to someone's home and they would get the father -- the head of the household -- and they would chop off his feet. Well, they wouldn't kill him, but they'd chop off his feet. And they'd come back the next day and chop off his arms. And then they'd go back to kill him, had he not bled to death before that.

That actually took place, and he told us these stories. And Don Cheadle tried to enact them -- some of them -- in the movie. Well, this kind of madness and savagery is actually taking place, and probably as we speak.

And the administration has also issued a waiver to commit the government of Sudan to hire a Washington lobbyist to permit the architects of genocide in Darfur to develop and sell a public-relations strategy on Capitol Hill. Well, let me tell you for one, they can't sell that to me, they can't sell that to Payne, and I know the rest of my colleagues will not buy that. They can come in and put whatever face they want on it, but those of us who have been there and talked and been among the refugees know that what they're selling us is a bill of goods.

So meanwhile, the Sudanese government in Khartoum continues to arm and support the militias who have murdered tens of thousands of people and forced over 2 million out of their homes. As the United States of America, we have an investment in the Comprehensive Peace Agreement for the Sudan. We need to see it work, but it will not work if we fail to press the Sudanese government to stop the genocide.

Unless the United States demands that Sudan end the violence in Darfur, I fear we will be left with a comprehensive peace agreement that is neither comprehensive nor peaceful. So I will be listening to hear what specific measures the administration will take to first dispel the appearance that we are seeking to rehabilitate Khartoum's genocidal regime, and second, increase the pressure on the Khartoum regime to change its behavior and permit all of its citizens to live in peace.

And once you're out there and you go among the people, you know that we must move in a positive direction. Now, we cannot let another child's hand be cut off. We cannot let another mother go into mourning over the loss of her husband, and we cannot let a people be wiped out on this watch.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, very much. I yield back my time.

SMITH: Thank you very much.

Jeff Fortenberry?

FORTENBERRY: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I just simply wish to commend you for your consistent concern over this issue, for your long-held willingness to dig deep into the complexities of this irrational lawlessness and violence which seems to govern this area. So given decomplexities and how difficult the challenges are that present themselves in terms of a solution, I simply look forward to hearing some possible answers today.

Thank you so much.

SMITH: Fortenberry, thank you very much.

Let me now introduce our very distinguished witness for today's hearing, Secretary Jendayi Frazer, who was sworn in as assistant secretary for the Bureau of Africa and African Affairs in August of 2005.

Prior to becoming assistant secretary, Secretary Frazer served as the U.S. ambassador to South Africa and as special assistant to the president and senior director for African affairs at the National Security Council. Ambassador Frazer came to the NSC from Harvard University, where she served as an assistant professor of public policy. As a Council on Foreign Relations international affairs fellow, she served as a political military planner with the Joint Chiefs of Staff in the Department of Defense and as director for African affairs at the NSC. A very distinguished career, and a very capable and very able leader on these very, very vexing issues.

So you are very welcome to this hearing, and please proceed as you would like.

FRAZER: Thank you very much. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee. I thank you for giving me the opportunity to testify on our Sudan policy, and I also thank you for your resolve and commitment on trying to push for a better Sudan, a Sudan that will be peaceful and prosperous for all of its people.

Today I would like to review with you the U.S. strategy to push for implementation of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement and to resolve the crisis in Darfur. Mr. Chairman, with your permission, I would request that my written testimony be placed in the record, and I will highlight the main points of the administration's Sudan policy this afternoon.

SMITH: Without objection.

FRAZER: Thank you.

First, the administration's primary goal is a peaceful and democratic Sudan that contributes to regional development and cooperates on counter-terrorism. Over the past five years, we have made steady progress toward this goal.

Mr. Chairman, you specifically ask: Are we losing ground on peace in Sudan? The answer is as challenging and complex as the country itself. On the north-south peace front, we have clearly gained ground. On Darfur, it's back and sometimes forth, but mainly back. But we do have a plan for progress there. We also have to be watchful and take preventative measures to not lose ground in the east.

First, Mr. Chairman, let me outline where we are today and why I say we've made progress toward our overall goal over the past five years. On January 22, 2001, President Bush told his then-national security adviser, Dr. Condoleezza Rice, that we must end the war in Sudan and stop the humanitarian and human-rights abuses in the south. As you well know, Mr. Chairman, the National Congress Party-controlled government of Sudan and the Sudan People's Liberation Movement were bitter enemies that had warred for over 22 years. As Congressman Payne said, 4 million people were displaced and 2 million died in that bitter conflict.

Yet as a result of active U.S. diplomacy, working closely with Kenya, EGAD, and other international partners, the SPLM and Khartoum government signed the historic Comprehensive Peace Agreement on January 9, 2005 in Nairobi, Kenya. The United States led international efforts to achieve that success, and the Bush administration remains committed to its full implementation. We witnessed, on July 9, 2005, the installation of the Chairman of the SPLM, the late Dr. John Garang, as First Vice President of Sudan in Khartoum.

Since then, members of the SPLM, the NCP, and other parties have formed a government of national unity in Khartoum. And the SPLM, under the new first vice president of the government of national unity, Salva Kiir, has set up the government of Southern Sudan in Juba. And I would just say that as you know, the first vice president, Salva Kiir, is here on his first international trip, and he's had a chance to meet today with Vice President Cheney, with Secretary Rice, with Deputy Secretary Zoellick, and myself. And so some of the testimony that I will state is based on our direct consultations with the first vice president.

But these historic changes are major steps forward, but clearly, there is more for the parties to do. I know that you, Mr. Chairman, and members of this committee, as well as the administration, remain concerned that many of the national commissions called for in the CPA still must be stood up. Troop withdrawals are behind schedule, and demobilization, disarmament and reintegration needs to move forward. These are just three areas to cite that are of particular importance.

Still, and most significantly, the Comprehensive Peace Agreement passed its first major test, the tragic death of its key architect, the first vice president, Dr. John Garang. Dr. Garang was committed to the cause of a peaceful, prosperous, and united Sudan. While his death is a great loss, there is every reason to hope that his vision of a peaceful, democratic, and unified Sudan will be fulfilled.

Demonstrating the resilience of the CPA, Garang's successor, Salva Kiir, was inaugurated as first vice president in an orderly process, and he has stated his unwavering commitment to realizing Dr. Garang's vision. In addition, Dr. Garang's widow, Rebecca, is carrying forward her husband's vision and is now serving as the minister of transport and roads in the government of Southern Sudan.

Mr. Chairman, Ambassador Zoellick just had a phone call with Vice President Taha to talk about the implementation of this comprehensive agreement. And he confirmed that the Assessment and Evaluation Commission, the National Petroleum Commission, as well as the Boundary Commission, have now been formed by decree issued by President Bashir. Vice President Kiir told us this this morning -- that he expected the announcements today -- since when he left Sudan, the membership of the commissions were already agreed upon, and it was a matter of making the announcement. So there has been some progress, and we welcome this news of the establishment of these key commissions.

As far as the administration is concerned, the next critical steps are for both parties to honor the security commitments, particularly by forming a joint defense board, setting up the joint integrated units, and, as I mentioned, withdrawing the troops, particularly the government troops being withdrawn from the south and from Juba.

Mr. Chairman, let me emphasize a fundamental premise of our Sudan strategy to maintain peace momentum. The administration views implementation of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement and resolution of the Darfur crisis as inter-related issues. Implementation of the CPA is crucial to ending the violence in Darfur.

Moreover, without progress in Darfur, there is a real danger for the violence to spill over into other areas of Sudan. The bottom line is, the CPA is applicable in many respects to all areas of Sudan, and is designed to share power and wealth between the center and periphery areas, a key root of the conflict in all parts of Sudan. It serves as a framework for other political agreements, including in Darfur.

To get to Darfur, clearly it's an unacceptable situation that must end now. Darfur is complex; it's a difficult situation that we, the administration and Congress, have characterized as involving genocide. The people of the United States know that this administration, under the direction of President Bush, Secretary Powell and now Secretary Rice, has been the global leader in efforts to end the violence and suffering in Darfur.

President Bush was the first head of state to speak out publicly on the unfolding violence and atrocities in Darfur in 2004. The United States was the first country to call for action in the United Nations Security Council. We were instrumental in obtaining a cease-fire agreement between the government of Sudan and the Darfur rebels, the Sudan Liberation Movement and the Justice and Equality Movement in April 2004. The United States was also the first to emphasize the need for intervention to stem the violence.

And as a result of our actions, the African Union agreed to deploy observers and troops to Darfur in August 2004. Since that time, the United States has worked closely with the African Union to build 32 base camps, and with other donors, provided airlift for over 6,900 African Union personnel now deployed to Darfur. This was possible with the over $160 million in resources provided by Congress.

President Bush continues to be committed to ending the conflict in Darfur, and the effort that the United States has mounted with the international community has yielded results in Darfur. As a result of the African Union's intervention and pressure exerted on the government of Sudan and the Darfur rebels, the A.U.-led political talks are moving ahead in Abuja, large-scale organized violence has substantially diminished since early 2005, and mortality rates have dropped.

That said, the situation in Darfur remains intolerable. Over 2.4 million people are living in camps for internally displaced persons, and another 200,000 have sought refuge in neighboring Chad. Violence continues to plague civilian populations, as we see in the current spike of violence, caused by banditry, actions initiated by rebel movements, and actions by the government forces, and continued marauding by the Janjaweed militia. We continue to make categorically clear the responsibility of the government of Sudan -- now the government of national unity -- that it must end support to the Janjaweed and work actively to stop its actions while ensuring discipline within the government of national unity's own forces.

But the bottom line, Mr. Chairman, is that a political solution is needed to end the violence in Darfur. We are trying to take actions; the U.S. government's actions, the way ahead in Darfur, is to continue to make clear to the government of Sudan its responsibility to insist that all sides respect the cease-fire, and to work to regional countries -- Libya, Chad, Eritrea, and others -- to try to continue to put pressure on the rebels to respect the cease-fire and to negotiate a solution.

In that regard, Deputy Secretary Zoellick will be leading a mission next week to Kenya and to Sudan to advance the administration's efforts to restore peace to Darfur and set the groundwork for a lasting political settlement in Abuja. He's going to, in those Nairobi talks, bring the SLM leadership together so that they can form a united front in their negotiations with the government of national unity.

So making it clear to the government of Sudan its responsibility, insisting on accountability of all sides to the cease-fire, pushing for the political solution in the talks to Darfur, we also are pushing the government of national unity to have a joint negotiating team at Abuja. And in my consultations and the administration's consultations with the first vice president, Salva Kiir, he told us that the government of national unity has established a High Committee on Darfur, which will be headed by Bashir, will also have First Vice President Kiir, Second Vice President Taha, and other cabinet ministers as the joint team that will then go to Darfur to negotiate with SLM and JEM.

So we'll continue to support the A.U.-led Abuja talks. We've sent a U.S. senior official as an observer. We've also sent and provided technical expertise to assist the mediator. And then finally, our approach to Darfur is to strengthen the African Union mission there -- strengthen it by pushing for it to have the 105 Canadian armored personnel carriers.

We're also pushing to increase NATO training and advice. We're trying to ensure a consistent understanding by the A.U. forces of their mandate, continue to look at UN logistical assistance and perhaps even blue-hatting the A.U. mission in Darfur to strengthen the security environment.

And then finally, we're continuing to provide humanitarian assistance in Darfur and in southern Sudan. In fiscal year 2005, we provided over $650 million, mostly in humanitarian assistance and support to the African Union Mission, and over $450 million in reconstruction and humanitarian assistance to other areas in Sudan, including Southern Sudan and the three transition areas: Nuba Mountains, Southern Blue Nile and Abyei. Finally, Mr. Chairman, the USG continues its strong support for the south, and we will help the government of Southern Sudan to build the institutions, capacity, transparency, and infrastructure necessary for it to function.

We believe that the institutions in Sudan have changed substantially over the past 10 months since the signing of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement, which has led to the new interim national constitution, the formation of a new government of national unity in Khartoum, and the new government of Southern Sudan. We have to keep working with the SPLM to develop the new governmental institutions, both in the south and in the north. We will continue to work with international partners to support the commissions and other integrated programs designed to facilitate the peaceful transition to Dr. Garang's vision of a unified government.

Congress and the administration share an interest in keeping the pressure on the central government, but also in supporting the new government of Southern Sudan. We need to consult with Congress about how existing legal authorities may need to be modified so we can reinforce the SPLM while maintaining and increasing pressure on the north. I hope that I can work with you, Mr. Chairman, and the committee so we can move effectively to address the challenges and opportunities of the peace agreement.

Mr. Chairman, I believe the United States is on the right track. Our strategy is moving forward with the strong support of the president and the secretary and the Congress. We believe we have the tools in place to maintain momentum, to influence the parties and to achieve our common goal of a peaceful Sudan.

Thank you very much.

SMITH: Secretary Frazer, thank you very much for your testimony and for your leadership. I'd like to begin the questioning, if I could.

First, one of the real take-homes that Greg Simpkins and I took away after meetings with President Bashir, Vice President Taha, and Salva Kiir, the first vice president -- especially with Salva Kiir. He was only on the job into his seventh day when we met with him, but he was very committed to making the government work. He said, "I am part of this government, and we want to make this government work, you know, for all the right reasons," as he put it.

And my first question would be about whether or not you feel that unity government has really been integrated. I have read reports that I find somewhat disconcerting, that when it came to handing out or allocating the top ministries, that the SPLM did not do all that well. Except for foreign affairs, perhaps, most of the key bureaucracies are safely vested in the other side, if you will.

And secondly, that you made a number of points -- and I noticed in your testimony, and if you could speak to this -- that you said you want to consult with Congress about First Vice President Kiir's request that we allow U.S. companies to provide spare parts to rehabilitate Sudan's railways. I struck up that conversation as well when I was in Khartoum, about how do you move masses of people from Khartoum back to the south? Yes, it has a dual-use capability, but railroads are indeed now -- or as the peace becomes more durable -- that that become a way of providing the means for those people to get back to their homes.

I might also ask you, if I could, on trafficking -- as you know, I was the prime sponsor of the Trafficking in Persons Act of 2000, which led to the creation of the tiers -- tier one, tier two, tier three -- and the watch list. The watch list, as you know, we put in the '03 act.

I was very concerned when I saw that Sudan was upgraded, if you will, to watch list from tier three. If you could elaborate, if you will, on what concrete facts exist that would suggest that the government of Khartoum or the government of Sudan merit that kind of treatment. It seems to me that there is still a major problem warranting tier three status, but if you could.

On the government of southern Sudan, how well or poorly is Salva Kiir and the government doing in the south in establishing that government? And then, on the issue of humanitarianism and the lack of responsiveness by Khartoum, Greg and I saw, and we've heard reports before and since our trip, that the government has not been helpful in ensuring that the NGO community -- the United Nations, our USAID personnel -- flow in an unfettered way. They have been profoundly unhelpful in many instances, which means that people are put at grave risk.

And finally, when it comes to accountability, and Mr. Payne and I and many of us are trying to get Henry Hyde's bill -- which is now a bipartisan piece of legislation -- moved forward. But one of the key phrases in that legislation is the accountability, holding those men and women to account who have committed atrocities.

Well, we know the U.N. Resolution 1593, which was adopted on March 29, provides for a referral to the ICC for those who have committed atrocities. The International Commission of Inquiry recommended that the ICC prosecute. Where is that? Is there a list of individuals on a printed page somewhere of people who need to be prosecuted at the ICC, and when will that be made public, if you will, and what's the status of that whole effort?

FRAZER: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Your first question was on the National Congress Party and its domination of the government of national unity, particularly of the key ministries. I think that was the perception, particularly given that the National Congress Party received the Finance Ministry and the Energy Ministry as well. Now, in our consultations with the SPLM, part of what we learned is that some of their capable senior officials wanted to be ministers in the government of Southern Sudan, and so didn't put themselves forth to be part of the government of national unity, because the feeling is that there needs to be a very strong government of Southern Sudan.

So certainly, we continue to have concern, and will watch carefully whether the government of national unity is dominated by the National Congress Party, and what type of influences the SPLM ministers have in that government. I had the opportunity to visit Sudan earlier in October, and I actually posed this question to a couple of the SPLM ministers, to say, "Do you have authority within your ministry? What's the nature of all of these mini-advisers? Is there a shadow government?" And I was assured that they do have the authority.

But I do think that clearly, SPLM is the new member of this government, and the United States must continue in our effort to back and to transform the nature of this regime -- which is characterized by many of the members of this committee appropriately that we must work very closely with the SPLM and build their capacity, continue to assist them so that they can be an effective force within the government of national unity, an effective transformative force. And certainly, I think that the vice president's visit to the United States, being the first country that he came to on an international visit, suggests his understanding and continued appreciation of the strong support of the United States for his role as the second senior official in that government of national unity.

The government of Southern Sudan -- the same story, we need to continue to support them, build their capacity, especially help them with the development. When I again was traveling, I went to Juba. I met with the first vice president, Salva Kiir. I met with senior SPLM officials.

I had an opportunity to meet with Rebecca Gurang, who is now the government of Southern Sudan's minister of transport. And this issue of spare parts did come up, and they were saying that they had -- because the government of Sudan sent soldiers through the railways, they had destroyed the rail capacity. Now they need development to come through those same railways. And they did raise the question of the possibility of allowing for spare parts.

SMITH: If they could, are they in favor of that? Are they...

(CROSSTALK)

FRAZER: When I was in Juba, they spoke favorably of it. But what I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, is that the first vice president is here himself, and will have an opportunity to meet with members, and that question can be posed directly to him. But a couple of weeks ago, in my consultations with them in Juba, they all spoke favorably for it.

But we need to look across the board at how we can help the government of Southern Sudan. It will also involve supporting the reform of the security sector, professionalizing the SPLM, and because Sudan is -- we have sanctions on them, many numerous sanctions on them -- we may need carve-outs. But I think Ambassador Zoellick, when he goes to Sudan, will have a better opportunity to make an assessment of that and then come back to the Congress with some specifics of ways in which we may need to look at authority to provide the avenue for assisting the government of Southern Sudan while maintaining the pressure on the National Congress Party within the government of national unity.

You asked the question, Mr. Chairman, about the trafficking. And indeed, the recommendation has gone forth that Sudan be put on the tier two watch list. And the reason behind that was specifically related to the sexual violence against women.

And Secretary Rice had asked -- when she went to Darfur, she met with women who had been abused and violated. And she asked the administration to come up with an initiative to counter violence against women. And we sent that to the government of Sudan.

They developed an action plan, which was a tailored work plan to address those issues. In particular, Sudan committed to implement a plan to address sexual violence against women in Darfur itself.

It also helped to assist with the repatriation of 100 Sudanese children -- camel jockeys from Qatar -- and began an investigation in trafficking of these children. And it was the basis of that action that they were put on the watch list, with the understanding that they could always go back to tier three if we weren't satisfied with the actions being taken to implement the plan.

So that was the basis of the tier two watch list. But again, it's not a permanent status. It can easily revert to tier three.

SMITH: Excuse me, but if you could provide for the record a copy of that national plan, I think it would be very helpful.

FRAZER: Certainly.

SMITH: Because the idea behind the act was to try to prod constructive action, and as you pointed out so well, if this is nothing but a paper promise, they should immediately revert back to tier three. So I thank you for that explanation.

FRAZER: Absolutely.

You asked about the humanitarian -- we still have concerns that the government of Sudan, namely the National Congress Party, is not allowing humanitarian access. And Ambassador Zoellick raised this specifically in his conversation with Vice President Taha, and got some assurances. But, you know, assurances -- words are one thing, action is another. So we'll continue to press the government to allow for that humanitarian access.

And on the accountability, as far as I know, Mr. Chairman, the ICC list has not become public. But Ambassador Zoellick again has signaled that if the ICC requires assistance, the United States stands ready for any assistance. But they haven't asked us for any assistance in developing their list, or getting the government to adhere to any ICC charges.

SMITH: Just two final questions before yielding to Mr. Payne. The Sudan Tribune had an article online over the weekend that said, "Darfur rebel SLA opens unity conference without leaders." Can you speak to what that means, in terms of not having a segment of the group there, including its leaders?

And secondly, you heard in my opening comments concerns about the pay for African Union troops. Has that been rectified? And I also note that the administration, you know, has identified approximately $100 million we're expected to contribute to the African Union. Will that be forthcoming, and when?

FRAZER: I missed the very first part of your question on the African Union.

SMITH: What we heard from commanders on the ground was that -- and we also heard it in Addis when we went to A.U. headquarters -- they had been promised about $15 a day. They were getting $1.28 a day. And while the morale implications have not really shown themselves yet, it will, and it will soon, especially if there's remittances back to their families back home, and they don't have it. I mean, it's a tough posting to begin with, and to be underpaid, and they told us at headquarters and in the field in Darfur, they're cash-poor. They have airlifts, they have other kinds of help, but they're not getting the cash.

FRAZER: OK. Thank you.

Yes, on Darfur, the SLM -- Mani Minawi is there, but Abdulwahed is not at the SLM conference. I raised this question with First Vice President Salva Kiir. He said that there may be some concerns in terms of security of Abdelwahed. And that's the reason why the Nairobi conference will be so important, because it'll be on neutral ground, and we expect both leaders to show up at the Nairobi conference that the United States will be hosting.

So it's critical that the SLM come together. They're providing an excuse for the National Congress Party to not make progress on the peace front. And so, without rebel unity, the negotiations won't go anywhere. So we're taking an active role to try to bring them together.

On the African Union, there is a financial shortfall which is partly the reason why we're looking at, over time, the possibility of blue-hatting them as a UN force. But certainly, the United States is looking to meet its shortfall, which is about $100 million. The EU is also coming up with the money. As far as the pay differential, it's my understanding that the A.U. has rectified it.

PAYNE: Thank you very much. Thank you for your testimony, and I'd just like to ask a few questions.

With USAID, how is it going to organize itself? We're hoping that there would have been some peace dividends after the signing of the accord. And will there be a permanent mission in Southern Sudan, or will you work out of Khartoum, or would there be a special coordinator to deal with the aid projects -- which would be very important to the south, since they are certainly in need of development?

And secondly, with the brand-new government being set up, I wonder if the SPLM will be given specific support in setting up regional governments in Nuba, Southern Blue Nile, and other places? Since they have to start from scratch, it seems that they would need financial and technical support, and I wonder whether the U.S. government, or USAID or other agencies, has any formal plan to work with the government of Southern Sudan.

Also, I noted that -- and I'm not sure of the funds that the chairman was talking about, but -- there was $100 million requested from the emergency supplement, and it was reduced in Congress by almost two-thirds. Only $37 million was appropriated. And I wonder if the administration is going to come forward with a new request, and whether there will be a need for us to try to develop a strategy to get those funds in place.

And you mentioned about the commissions that were called for in the CPA, which you mentioned in your testimony in response to the first vice president's visit here. And I wonder whether the pronouncements that are being made by the government of Sudan -- are they real, or is it just because Salva Kiir is coming here, and to try to have a smooth series of meetings here -- that the government of Sudan is acting as if it's trying to play ball, but it's very difficult to tell the real intent. But I wonder whether the feeling of the administration is that these are things that are just being done because of the business here by Salva Kiir.

FRAZER: Thank you.

On your first question, Congressman Payne, in terms of USAID and how it's going to organize itself, there is a building being constructed in Juba. And the plan is to move the operations that are in Nairobi to Juba, so that we can more effectively support the government of Southern Sudan. That support includes training -- helping to train the capacity of the SPLM officials, both in the assembly as well as in the executive, the ministers themselves -- also trying to provide assistance with the budgetary monitoring and transparency so that the oil revenue that they'll get, as well as the donor assistance, can be accounted for and used for the people.

We're also trying to work with NDI and ILI and other institutions to try to build the political parties, the SPLM becoming a political party able to contest elections over the future, and supporting the parliamentarians -- the assembly members -- with training. So, yes, we are doing a whole range of activities to try to support the government of Southern Sudan. We think it's critical. That's why the administration is focused on Sudan in the first place -- it was because of the grievances in the south, the atrocities that were taking place in the south. So it behooves us to really put a focus on assisting them in establishing a peace for a prosperous Sudan, and particularly southern Sudan.

On the question of the funds, yes, I do look forward to working with you to try to develop a strategy to get the type of funding and assistance that will be necessary to fully support the peace process in Sudan. And I will come back to discuss that directly with you, on how we might address any shortfalls in funding that we're facing.

Your question about the commissions is apt. Timing is everything, and I'm certain that the first vice president's visit here helped to get the announcement. That said, when I visited Juba, the first vice president told me at that time that he had submitted the names of the SPLM ministers who would be part of these new commissions.

And it was clear that many of the commissions required Southern Sudan government ministers. Until the government of Southern Sudan was established, the commissions could not go forward. So I believe that it has been in the works, without a doubt.

And as I said, the first vice president told us this morning that when he left Sudan, he expected the decree to have been already announced, because he left it on Bashir's desk to be done with everyone having agreed on the composition of the commission. So I don't doubt that the timing was intended for effect, but it does represent, I think, considerable work, particularly considerable work on the part of the government of Southern Sudan and on Vice President Kiir's part.

PAYNE: Thank you very much.

Just my final two questions: The State Department, as you know, in the last administration did a very intensive interviewing of, I think, over 1,200 individuals that built up a case to declare genocide in Darfur. And it would appear to me that this information would certainly be helpful for the ICC. And I know that there is the problem of formal relations, although the U.S. did abstain and therefore allowed the International Criminal Court to proceed, and for that we're very thankful.

However, we do feel that since we did indicate by our abstention that we felt that there should be prosecution going on in Sudan by the ICC, it would appear that we would try to cooperate with the court, and to allow the court, as they have, to review any materials that were taken that Secretary Powell built the case of genocide. So I would hope that in some way, there can be cooperation between ICC and our State Department.

And just finally, if you might indicate to us -- recently, a senior diplomat was sent to Khartoum. And I just wonder, is the State Department intending to name him as an ambassador -- a person as an ambassador? Are we getting ready to normalize relations with Sudan?

FRAZER: Thank you.

Yes, Deputy Secretary Zoellick has made very clear that if we were asked by the ICC for help, we would try to make sure that this gets pursued fully, to use his words, because "We do not want to see impunity for any of these actors." So they haven't asked, but if they did, we stand ready to assist.

On the question of the senior diplomat -- no, it's not a matter of normalizing relations. What we did was, we sent Ambassador Hume there. And we sent Ambassador Hume -- who used to be the former ambassador to South Africa, as well as the former ambassador to Algiers -- he speaks Arabic, he's got extensive expertise in conference management, he worked in Mozambique, he's been working at the U.N. What we wanted was a senior diplomat who could pursue U.S. interests.

And our interests are clear -- our interests are, we need someone that can put pressure on the National Congress Party to end its support for the Janjaweed to stop the violence in Darfur. We need a senior person who understands how a former liberation movement, the SPLM, can be transformed into a government of Southern Sudan, and he has the expertise across the board.

So our sending him there was in the U.S. interest. It was in no way a signal of the normalization of relations. And I think that we're not trying to normalize relations with the government of Sudan or the government of national unity.

What we're trying to do is implement the Comprehensive Peace Agreement, so that we transform the very nature of that regime. And we need someone senior with that mandate who is able to engage all parties to push forward on the areas that I outlined -- support for the government of Sudan, implementation of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement, and ending the violence in Darfur and creating a broader peace, a prosperous and unified Sudan.

PAYNE: May I ask a question or two? We mentioned that there's been 105 armored personnel carriers delivered to the A.U. mission to go in Sudan. But from what I understand, they were supposed to be delivered, but the government of Sudan has blocked them from being delivered, and have refused to cooperate. I wonder if you could comment on that.

And just finally, I don't know whether Mr. Roger Winter speaks Arabic, but I was under the impression that he was some type of an envoy. I don't think anyone knows Sudan better than Roger Winter -- I think that all members of the committee have a great deal of respect for his longtime interest. And more than interest, he's dedicated his whole life working in Sudan, even before becoming a part of the government. And I just wonder -- what role will he play if in fact we have a more senior diplomat in Khartoum?

FRAZER: Thank you.

Yes, the armored personnel carriers have been held up by President Bashir. We can say that it's President Bashir himself who's holding up those armored personnel carriers. What they've agreed to do is let 35 come in. We're continuing to push for all of the armored personnel carriers to be allowed in to support the A.U. mission in Darfur.

So we're continuing the pressure. Certainly, this is something that Deputy Secretary Zoellick will raise in his mission to Sudan next week. It's something that I raised when I met with President Bashir, when I met with Vice President Taha, and other officials. So we're continuing to push on that front.

The question of Roger Winter, who is our special representative to the deputy secretary, and how he will interface with Ambassador Hume, who's our charge now -- the idea here is that the charge is there permanently, in terms that he doesn't go in and out. He's a presence there daily, and we can call him and say, "You need to put pressure on these guys right now at this moment in time." So he's sort of managing our operation, and has a daily presence there.

Roger Winter, as you said, has a longtime engagement in Sudan. He has excellent contacts there. He has a good sense of what's actually taking place.

He'll continue to be a senior adviser, especially to the deputy secretary. He will continue to have an influence and a role as an envoy going back and forth, in and out. He will continue to meet with SPLM and government officials as necessary.

He and I will work closely together in the formulation of our Sudan policy. He will continue to meet with constituency groups there and here. So his role is one of more roving, whereas the charge is a permanent presence to try to keep the pressure on.

PAYNE: I have no more questions.

I just want to say, you know, that the government of Sudan, once again -- 105 armored personnel carriers supposed to go in, they hold them up, "we may let a third in, we'll get back to you next week" -- you know, it's the same thing they've been doing decade after decade after decade. Now, I know we need to try to work along with them, but you see, it's the same bloody hands that let Osama bin Laden live in that country from '91 to '96, that planned the bombing of the Nairobi and Dar es Salaam U.S. embassies. Pete Clyde (ph) knew, had been there a week before, knew families that worked in that embassy who are dead now.

Same government, and once again, we're going to start fiddling while Rome burns. In dealing with this government, we ought to have a policy that tells them they either have to make the policy work or we ought to come down with some serious policy against them.

This business about "we let a few in, and we may let them out," and some of our humanitarian groups now have not been issued any more permits to come in -- Doctors Without Borders were given a hard time because they were outspoken. It just continues as people die, every day in this new millennium. It makes no sense at all.

SMITH: If I could, Madame Secretary, ask you -- in addition to the armored personnel carriers not being allowed in, what other materiel has been stopped by Bashir? And I had asked earlier about the humanitarian crisis, because we've heard it, it's ongoing -- the reluctance to allow the Norwegians, for example, in Kalma camp to get the director -- who is absolutely committed, suffered malaria himself doing this humanitarian work -- didn't know from one day to the next whether or not his mission was going to be decertified or not re-upped by the Bashir government.

What other problems do you see? I mean, you have a platform, it's on the side the government of Sudan was sitting. What other things did you say did have to be done? I think my friend is absolutely right -- to allow a third in but not the other two-thirds is constantly crippling the efforts of the international community to help the people on the ground.

FRAZER: Yes. Thank you very much.

The Kalma camp issue also came in in Ambassador Zoellick's phone call with Vice President Taha, and he emphasized again that that has to be resolved. He got assurances -- we'll see. We know the character of the regime.

I would also say that redeployment of the government troops from Juba is necessary. It's an immediate necessary action that they must take. It's absolutely unacceptable for them to continue to have their presence there. They're behind the schedule in redeployment. It represents psychological warfare for them to continue to be there.

So I would push very strongly on the government, and I know that Ambassador Zoellick is going to do so, that those government forces redeploy and get out of the south, because they're already behind schedule. So that certainly is an area.

A second area that's important -- now, they established this Boundary Commission. That's one of the announcements that's made, but it's critical that the Boundary Commission's work be transparent and that we have oversight, because it establishes the line for where the north and the south is.

And as the first vice president has stated and others have stated, that line is creeping southward -- so that they're capturing more area of the south claiming it to be north, particularly where there are oil fields -- and that will have a major impact on revenue-sharing. So that's another area that we have to get immediate action in, and have some very clear oversight.

So those are two areas. And certainly, to allow at least 11,000 international NGO workers in Sudan, they have to have free access -- they have to be allowed to do their work. So that would be three areas that I'm sure that Ambassador Zoellick is going to continue to push on, and I certainly will as well.

SMITH: Chairman Royce?

ROYCE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

We have several hundred thousand people wandering around the desert of Sudan without any help. They've been run off of their land by the Janjaweed, and part of the strategy on the part of the government has been to prevent any assistance from being delivered to those individuals. It's a daunting task for the African Union, because this is a region -- Darfur is the size of France.

And when Diane Watson and I were there earlier this year in Darfur, Sudan, we had an opportunity to be briefed by one of the African Union military units that are there in order to record the attacks. And we got first-hand accounts of these mysteriously coincidental attacks by the government and the Janjaweed, where the government comes in and attacks the villages, and then the Janjaweed horsemen do the cleanup, seize the property, do the pursuit of those who flee -- and allegedly, the volume of these attacks are down.

But now, I read that the African Union this week have come forward and said no, they've documented yet another attack. The government is working with the Janjaweed, it's their assertion, on attacking a camp.

So I would ask you to specifically tell us about government support for the Janjaweed -- how is it done, who is doing it? The International Criminal Court is supposed to be undertaking an examination. They're interviewing Janjaweed leaders who are ratting out people in the government, and vice versa, pointing fingers. But how widespread is this backing? What do we know?

Another thing I would like to know is that President Bouteflika assured us when we were there, I mean, he had conversations with the government in Sudan in which they agreed no longer to engage in use of air power in attacks on villages. What air assets are being utilized? I'd like to know that.

I saw recent press accounts that the Sudanese government was purchasing 34 Chinese-built jet fighters. So I'd ask you if there's anything to that. I certainly would want to know, and the members of this committee, I know, want to know if there's any more use of air power.

The reason I bring up the question specifically about these Chinese fighters is because our past experience with the government of Sudan includes their abuse of helicopter gunships built in China deployed in attacks on civilians in Southern Sudan. These were not only Chinese-made, but they were based on the Chinese-built airstrips controlled by the Chinese oil companies.

So if there's the introduction of these assets, I'd like to understand how that can be, because I remember some seven months ago, the U.N. arms embargo that we were involved in shepherding through, and the U.N. Security Council resolution -- I think that was 1591 that was passed -- so apparently it has not been implemented if the discussion now is to bring these Chinese fighters into the theater.

And lastly, in your testimony, you note that "We continue to make categorically clear the responsibility of the government of Sudan -- now the government of national unity -- to both end support to the Janjaweed and work actively to stop its actions while ensuring discipline within the government of national unity's own forces." Those are the words from the testimony that we got today."

And by the way, just -- I know where the administration, the chairman and his staff has worked diligently to try to get testimony in advance, so that we can read through the testimony rather than an hour before the hearing. But I just raise that as a procedural question.

But my point is, what are we doing besides protests to get this message across?

FRAZER: Thank you.

Let me apologize for the lateness of the testimony.

ROYCE: I fully suspect this has nothing to do with you. I know you very well, Jendayi -- Secretary Frazer. I know that your testimony was submitted to the administration for clearance.

The point I'm raising is that so often, in my committee, and in the chairman's committee here, it's the day before, and some of us have the eccentricity of reading these things the night before. And when we can't go through it in order to really look at the statements and the questions that we'd like to ask, it doesn't allow Congress to as effectively do its oversight responsibilities. That comment was not directed to you, it's directed to the administration, so thank you.

FRAZER: You ask a very complex and difficult question for me on how exactly is the Janjaweed operating. I'll answer it in a few ways.

One, we clearly have seen in the past that the Janjaweed were armed by the government, that the government of Sudan - - this is before it became the government of national unity -- did provide air cover for their operations. So there was clear coordination between the Janjaweed and the government of Sudan -- the National Congress Party.

What First Vice President Salva Kiir has said, as often happens when you support an armed militia group, you can lose control of them. It's his view that the government has lost control of the Janjaweed. That's not to say that -- I know there was a recent attack on a village, in which there seemed to be some coordination again...

ROYCE: According to the African Union, and those troops are highly trained. They're sort of our canary in the mineshaft there, warning about these attacks. And, one other point: I would think that if we could increase or expand their mandate to not just protection of their units and their observer status, but also protection of the civilian population, it would give a deterrent effect in the region and might really encourage so many displaced people who are wandering the desert to at least come in close in order to try to get the support and defense they need to stay alive.

FRAZER: Yes. A point very well taken. And it's our understanding that the A.U. actually has the mandate to protect civilians as well as themselves, but that different units don't seem to understand their mandate very well.

So partly, we have to work with the A.U. to make sure of this communication and capacity, and that there's a headquarters element that can coordinate better the various units of the force itself. And so that's where we're looking for potentially NATO to play a role. We'll work with the A.U. to try to get NATO to support the headquarters capacity.

ROYCE: And the numbers, too, because the week we were there, there was an attack to the south of us on a village. And because the A.U. troops were spread out so thinly throughout this region, they weren't able to deter that. So we need support for a more robust force in the west.

FRAZER: Absolutely.

On the question of the Sudanese government purchasing Chinese fighters, I will have to go back and look into this. This would be very concerning, as you said. We'll look into it. I will be actually going to Beijing at the end of this month, and certainly we will raise -- Sudan is on the agenda to be discussed, and we'll raise this. If in fact they're circumventing an arms embargo, that's a very serious issue. But I actually don't have the information that you cited, so I have to...

(CROSSTALK)

ROYCE: I read it in Aviation Week and Space Technology, and it was the assertion that they have purchased these 34 new fighters. So if you could check that with those sources -- and also maybe we could look at the budget on the Sudanese side. If there's transparency in the budget, we'll be able to see if that's budgeted.

Thank you.

SMITH: Ambassador Watson?

WATSON: Thank you so much.

We understand that during the course of the Sudan civil war, there were tens of thousands of children who were employed by various armed groups as child soldiers. And I guess that USAID or other aid agencies estimate that 20,000 of them had been demobilized in 2001. So, given the importance of restoring children's access to education in conflict and post-conflict situations, can you describe for us any assistance that USAID is providing to address the needs of reintegrating these child soldiers in the region, and what would be the future plans, if you are aware, for educating children in the Sudan? I mean, how can we bring these children back in so they can re-enter childhood?

FRAZER: Thank you.

I do know that USAID is planning to work on reintegration, and certainly the children soldiers would be part of that reintegration. Let me see if I can find more specific information.

Congresswoman Watson, it looks like I'm going to have to come back to you with the specific plan that USAID has for integration of these children. I know that that specifically is in the disarming- demobilization-reintegration. They're going to focus on reintegration, but I don't have in front of me their specific plans for dealing with the children. So I can come back to you with that.

WATSON: Yes, and I would hope that the chair would entertain maybe another hearing on the position that there are some urgent actions that need to be taken now. And for the future, how do we stabilize these young people? So it's not that I need the information this moment. I would like to know what the plans are, so if the chair would be so kind as to hold subsequent hearings, we can get the information then. If not, I can take it in writing. But there's no rush on it...

SMITH: The gentlelady will yield. This is part of an ongoing effort. I can guarantee we will have several additional hearings on Darfur, on Sudan. So you will have ample time.

WATSON: Thank you so very much, Madame Secretary.

FRAZER: Thank you.

Congresswoman Watson, let me just say that we do have experience with this in Liberia, where I and Congressman Payne were just there for the elections. And what we've done is, we've actually taken many of those children and given them the skills training to help rebuild the infrastructure in Liberia, and I would imagine that USAID will work on some of that type of skills training, but I certainly will come back to you with a detailed plan.

WATSON: Thank you. And I would like to emphasize that these children need not only retraining and skill sets, but they're going to need some psychological and emotional support. I'm a school psychologist in my other life, and what I know about these children -- many of them orphans, many of them were probably forced into picking up these guns, and many of them were too young to understand the permanency of the death that they caused.

And so I would hope that in your plan in working with the children, as we say, you work with the whole child, and be sure that they have a mindset and a thought process where they will not go back into this behavior again. And I'm sure they were forced in probably the most gruesome ways to take up arms and kill innocent people. So we have to administer to their psychological and emotional side as well.

Thank you so very much, and thank you, Mr. Chairman.

SMITH: Thank you, Ambassador Watson.

Ambassador Frazer, I just wanted to ask you a couple of additional questions. We've been talking a little bit about the mandate of the A.U., and first of all, if you could assess what your feeling is about how well they have performed. I would just say parenthetically that I think both Mr. Simpkins and I -- as much as you can glean from, you know, a couple of days' visit in Darfur -- were very impressed by their esprit de corps. They were very committed.

When I got to talking to Major Adjumbo (ph), who is from Kenya, we compared notes because he was very active in peacekeeping in Sarajevo, in the former Yugoslavia. So, you know, he's no stranger to being deployed in very difficult straits.

Is their mandate enough? Is it clear enough? How would you like to see it either changed or expanded? Because I am concerned, I think like many, that when you don't have armored personnel carriers and you're riding around in small vehicles, that hardly gives you the kind of protection to have a more robust mandate, but if you could speak to the mandate issue.

Secondly, in your prepared testimony, you mentioned that we convened a donor meeting on October 18. Could you just give some update on what happened at that donor meeting to help the African Union?

Third, on the issue of Dr. Garang's tragic death, do you have any insights as to -- you know, obviously, most of us hope that it was an accident, but obviously there were also some suggestions, including by the president of Uganda, that it might have been something other than that. What does the evidence tell you so far?

Number four, the Lord's Resistance Army in or near Juba in the south -- what is being done to get the Sudanese to end its relationship with these Ugandan rebels, the Lord's Resistance Army?

And finally, if I could, mention was made earlier about the $530,000 contract to CR International. Could you elaborate on what that was all about? And you know, we've had lobbying firms in the past that have represented dictatorial governments, I remember from Haiti to governments in Eastern Europe, very reputable -- maybe not reputable by the crimes that they were able to front for -- often come up and make a presentation that has an awful lot of surface appeal.

I remember when I was leading the effort to stop MFN for Romania, because of the Securitate's horrific abuse of religious believers and other human rights abuses under the Ceacescu regime. They had lobby firms that would make -- you know, every year when MFN was coming up for review -- had these seemingly excellent talking points that really got you to look askance as to what was really happening on the ground and put a gloss on gross misbehavior. So if you could speak to the lobbying firms as well?

FRAZER: Thank you.

The A.U. needs to tell us if the mandate is not sufficient, and they haven't yet told us that's the case. It's a mandate that clearly states that they can protect civilians and protect themselves from attack. But it's also clear that there are certain units that don't seem to understand that mandate very clearly.

So part of this is communication. It may be that they need a more robust mandate, but they need to carry out the one that they have first, and also, as I said, let us know if indeed. We're not opposed to a more robust mandate, or for a more robust mandate. We'll follow the lead of the forces in Darfur and try to make sure that they have what they need, whether that be mandate as well as equipment, training, and most importantly, logistics and command and control.

Because, as you say, they've operated very well, particularly at the battalion level. They've done a fantastic job. They stepped up to the plate, and we should commend their effort and continue to support their area. But when you start talking about brigade-level operations, they need more support at the headquarters element, more planning, more logistics, make sure they get the fuel that they need, et cetera. And so we are looking at how we can assist them.

This is not new to the administration. We worked very much like this with the ECOWAS force in Liberia, where we had a UCOM element embedded in their planning headquarters to assist with that brigade-level operation.

And it's also the case that it may be that over time, particularly if we talk about increasing the troop levels for the A.U., that we may need to look at a blue UN force, because the A.U. may be tapped out in terms of its ability to get new troop contributors -- because frankly, they're all over. They're in Cote D'Ivoire, they're in Liberia, they're in Burundi -- they're stretched fairly thin. The countries that normally come up and provide troops are fairly stretched.

So it may be that we need to look at a UN blue-hatting. But they've done very well. And, you know, I think the African Union is demonstrating the very philosophy of Africans taking control of their own destiny, and certainly they've stepped up in Darfur.

There's no information that we have that Dr. Garang's death was anything but an accident. I think the investigation is going on, but as far as the initial assessments, it was indeed a very tragic accident.

As far as the LRA is concerned, there has been an agreement between the government of Sudan and the government of Uganda to allow for the government of Uganda to have sort of quick action in the southern territory. We believe that the SPLM will become an effective part of that relationship to try to address the LRA threat. The LRA is actually starting to attack SPLM, so it's a very, very dangerous situation, and I think we have to do whatever we can to push the government of Sudan.

Because what we fear is that there may be elements within the military that continues to provide information to the LRA, and maybe even arms. They may not represent government of Sudan policy. That's a question that's still out there. But there's certainly some type of assistance, we believe, continuing with the LRA.

On the question of the lobby, the only thing that I can say there is that certainly not one lobby can change the administration's approach to Sudan. We think that this is a regime that needs fundamental transformation. That's been our approach from day one.

As I said, January 22, President Bush said that we need to change and stop the killing that was taking place. That continues to apply in Darfur. This administration is very serious about what the challenges are in Sudan and where the responsibility lies in Sudan. So certainly, one lobbyist can't change in any way, advocating for whomever, the fundamental approach of the administration on Sudan.

SMITH: Mr. Payne?

PAYNE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And we realize that one lobbyist can't change this administration, probably. However, the thing that's baffling is why would the administration -- even though one lobbyist can't necessarily change the policy of this administration -- why would the administration break an 8-year sanction, regardless of whether the lobbyist can change it or not, but to change a sanctions law to allow a lobbyist to be paid $530,000 by the government of Sudan to lobby the Congress and the administration?

Now, on one hand, we say that we want to really show Sudan that we're serious. How do you show them that we're serious when you allow them to have a lobbyist come in? Now, I know it wasn't made on your level. However, I'm simply saying it sends the wrong message. It sends the message that the administration is not serious about Sudan.

We had sanctions on gum arabic. The administration will allow gum arabic to come into this country unimpeded, because gum arabic is something that some corporations want, and the administration is not going to stop gum arabic from Sudan to come in spite of the fact that we have sanctions on Sudan.

And so, you see, the thing that's frustrating is that we say the right things, we talk things, but then on the other hand it seems like we concede and we cajole and we finesse this government of Sudan. We don't have to do that. We're the most powerful nation in the world. We don't have to play around with Sudan. There is no excuse for it. It's disgraceful. It absolutely makes no sense.

Why do we have to play around with Sudan? We don't play around with anybody else. When we're serious about something, as we can see, we make our feelings known. But why do we play around with Sudan? It makes no sense at all to allow law to be changed, to allow a lobby firm to come in to lobby.

If I were Bashir and Taha -- things are going all right, you know, they wink here, and nod, and we're just going to do the same thing. If I were the government of Sudan, I would continue to do what I'm doing anyway, because I would say that they're not serious. "Why are they not serious? Well, they're letting our gum arabic come in, they're letting us violate the CPA, they allow the lobbyists to come in. They send a top former ambassador, a very distinguished person, to be here, not to be an ambassador, but to just keep an eye on things that are going on."

I think that -- and I can't understand -- why our government continues to allow this dastardly murderous government to have a wink and a nod. I just can't understand. It's not a question, it's just a statement.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

SMITH: Thank you.

If I could, if the gentleman yield for one second, the record should note that on the gum arabic question, both Mr. Payne and I were united when the original Sudan Peace Act went through our committee way back in the 1990s. We originally wanted to proscribe that in terms of its ability to come into this country. There was another New Jerseyan who also sits on this committee who took the opposite view, and that view prevailed.

So we, at the markup level, could not hold onto that sanction, but we were united on that in trying to keep that out, even though Mars is located in our state -- a number of pharmaceuticals, Mars, obviously, the great producer of chocolates, which I love. But, you know, at what price? So we did unite on that one, but again, it was another member from our own state who led the effort in the opposite direction.

Mr. Tancredo?

TANCREDO: Mr. Chairman, because I have just maybe a couple of questions, and if you've answered them while I was called out of the room, please tell me, and I will just simply read the transcript. First of all, the issue of the other countries that are stating the rebel movements in Darfur -- what's in it for them? Why are they doing that?

FRAZER: Thank you very much, Congressman.

The other countries that are supporting the rebels in Darfur -- Chad, it may be ethnic and tribal-based support. Eritrea -- it's probably more strategic. Eritrea has had issues with the character of the regime itself, just as the United States has had trouble with the character of the regime. And so, they may be supporting various rebel forces to try to transform the nature of the regime. But...

TANCREDO: And what are our communications with them?

FRAZER: Our communications at this moment is that the solution to Darfur and the solution to the east is negotiation -- that we have a Comprehensive Peace Agreement in place that provides for the devolving of power from the center to the periphery, that provides for power-sharing, wealth-sharing. And that what we need to do is push the rebels to form a united front and to negotiate so that they can become part of the government of national unity, deliver benefits to their population, and help the SPLM to transform the character of that regime as part of that government of national unity.

TANCREDO: Secondly, the ICC, and the status of the investigation -- I know, I'm well aware of them in regard to the ICC. But several of us have attempted to make sure that we would like the State Department to help and to cooperate in any way possible with that investigation. What is the status?

FRAZER: This issue did come up earlier.

TANCREDO: That's OK. I was just -- don't have to be redundant. I'll wait and read the -- thank you very much.

FRAZER: Thank you very much.

SMITH: Just one final question, and Mr. Payne might have one final as well, but really two.

H.R. 3127, as amended -- does the administration have a position on that legislation? And secondly, I did ask this previously, but I did ask multiple questions. About that donor meeting on October 18 -- maybe you did answer and I missed it, but -- what was concluded at that meeting for the African Union in terms of additional resources?

FRAZER: Thank you.

On the question of H.R. 3127, clearly, we support the spirit of the legislation and the need for accountability for the perpetrators of violence and atrocities. We will continue to watch to see how the bill comes out, and we're prepared to consult with you on it, but the spirit of it, certainly, we're with you on that.

On the donor conference, it was to strengthen the African Union mission -- particularly looking at funding over time, trying to build international support to continue that funding, and looking at the future of Darfur peacekeeping. Some of the issues that came up here: What is the mandate? How do we support the mandate that's currently there? Do they need a stronger mandate? What would be required if it were a stronger mandate? And how can you continue the funding in out years? So that was the purpose of the meeting.

SMITH: Ranking Member Payne has a final statement.

PAYNE: I just want to say that, you know, we commend your department for the success in Liberia, and the runoff that is coming -- an outstanding job done by the State Department. We are pleased, and fingers crossed, that Burundi will move forward -- and although the U.S. was not totally involved, watched and encouraged, I'm sure, South Africa to move forward. We're pleased that the difficult job at NDRC is being moved forward in your recent visit to Tanzania; dealing with the elections in Zanzibar and the tension that's been there for a decade or so is commendable.

So we do feel that things that the department is doing is moving in the right direction, and it's the right thing to do. However, as you can see, members of Congress are very frustrated at U.S. policy in Sudan.

We've been frustrated for a long time, and we think that because of the lack of real commitment on the part of the administration, that all of those things that are going well get lost when we sit around and allow a government like that to have the privileges that it does. And I hope that the message gets back to the food chain up that we're very serious about this situation, and that we expect our government to start acting in a more assertive and a more responsible manner as it relates to Sudan.

SMITH: Ambassador, do you have any final comments you'd like to make?

FRAZER: The only final comment is to thank you for convening this hearing on Sudan. Again, as I said, I thank you for your commitment and resolve, Mr. Chairman, as well as the committee members. And I just want to restate and assure you that the administration feels as deeply as you do -- and that comes from the very top, from President Bush himself, who is very strong on Sudan and what is necessary to get peace there. And so we'll continue to work together, and I thank you.

SMITH: Thank you so much for your leadership, and for your gracious time you spent here with us this afternoon. You're very enlightening and informative. Thank you so much.

Hearing is adjourned.

END

LOAD-DATE: November 7, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

TYPE: COMMITTEE HEARING

NOTES:

[????] - Indicates Speaker Unknown

[--] - Indicates could not make out what was being said.[off mike] - Indicates could not make out what was being said.

Copyright 2005 Congressional Quarterly, Inc. All Rights Reserved.

13 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

October 31, 2005 Monday

Sudan; Congressman Mike Capuano Demands Explanation of U.S. Policy in Sudan

BYLINE: United States Congress

LENGTH: 580 words

Congressman Mike Capuano (D-MA), co-chair of the Congressional Caucus on Sudan wrote to Secretary of State Dr. Condoleezza Rice, requesting an explanation of the U.S. policy towards Sudan in the wake of a number of troubling developments.

105 members of Congress, Democrats and Republicans, joined Rep. Capuano in requesting these critical clarifications. "Congress and President Bush have long ago declared that the atrocities occurring in Sudan constitute genocide, yet our government has not taken strong and decisive action, even as the violence worsens in Darfur," stated Congressman Capuano.

Congressman Capuano and his colleagues expressed alarm at what appears to be a shift in U.S. policy toward Sudan. "Rather than hold accountable a regime that the President, former Secretary of State, Colin Powell, and the Congress declared guilty of genocide, we appear to be engaged in a policy of appeasement," the lawmakers wrote. Federal lawmakers outlined three areas of significant concern:

- Recent developments in Darfur, including the kidnapping and killing of African Union troops and humanitarian workers; the closure of main roads leading out of the capital of Western Darfur, and an estimate by the United Nations that nearly three-quarter of a million refugees are beyond the reach of humanitarian aid.
- Delay in the implementation of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement (CPA), which mandates the immediate withdrawal of government troops from disputed areas; government reform of civil service, security forces, and the judiciary; and establishment of investigatory commissions into the genocide in Sudan.
- An apparent softening of U.S. policy towards the Government of Sudan.

Hundreds of thousands of refugees and internally displaced persons risk genocide by attrition as the security situation deteriorates.

The delay in implementing the Comprehensive Peace Agreement (CPA) is equally troubling. The Government of Sudan has yet to establish key commissions, including the Assessment and Evaluation Commission and the North-South Boundary Commission.

The Government of Sudan, including people in power when over 400,000 civilians were killed, was granted a waiver by the State Department to hire a U.S. lobbyist for $530,000. Their responsibilities include assisting the Government of Sudan with an image-boosting public relations campaign.

Further evidence of a shift in U.S. policy comes in the recent report that Sudan's Trafficking in Persons status was upgraded from a Tier III to a Tier II watch-list country, despite the fact that there is no evidence to justify this upgrade. With this change, Sudan was placed in the same category as Tier II democratic countries like Switzerland and Israel.

"Only this past January the UN Commission of Inquiry released a report on Darfur in which it documented cases of Sudanese troops involved in abductions and sexual slavery. On what grounds, then, was Sudan upgraded? What "significant efforts" were made? And for what purpose was Sudan's Trafficking in Persons status elevated?" the lawmakers wrote.

"The United States has declared that the atrocities in Darfur constitute genocide. Any actions that appear to be inconsistent with that declaration are concerning and we expect clarification from Secretary Rice on US policy," stated Congressman Capuano.

Click here to view letter in pdf format

LOAD-DATE: November 1, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 AllAfrica, Inc.

14 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Calgary Herald (Alberta)

October 31, 2005 Monday
Final EditionJapan set to introduce tougher sex-trade laws*BYLINE: Leo Lewis, Times of LondonSECTION: NEWS; Asia Report: News From the Region; Pg. A8LENGTH: 275 wordsDATELINE: TOYKO

Under fire for its sluggish action on eliminating human trafficking, Japan is expected to bring in new laws this week to enable tougher police crackdowns on the brokers and buyers of women forced to work as sex slaves.

Japan remains acutely embarrassed by a 2004 U.S. State Department report condemning the world's second-biggest economy for its failure to adequately address the problem, and placing it on a watch list with offenders such as Cambodia and Ivory Coast.

Although a more recent version of the survey praised Japan's efforts to improve the situation, it remains a "tier-two" country since its thriving sex industry remains a lucrative destination for those who traffic women from Thailand, the Philippines, Colombia and Belarus. Placement in the tier-two category denotes a country that fails to meet the minimum standards for eliminating human trafficking. The U.S. report concluded Japan "has yet to make a significant effort to lessen the domestic demand for trafficking victims."

The impending changes to the law will come into effect next spring and make the manager of any establishment in the sex or entertainment industry criminally liable for employing anyone without proper legal documentation.

Keiko Otsu, who runs a secret shelter in Tokyo for women who escape from their captors, described to The Times a constant fear that haunts the women who arrive at her door. "They are genuinely terrified, often trembling uncontrollably," she said.

They know they can't go to the police because they have no visas. They fear, if they are spotted coming to the shelter, they will be killed, or their families back home will be hurt by thugs.

LOAD-DATE: October 31, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISHDOCUMENT-TYPE: NewsPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

15 of 359 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

October 31, 2005 MondayCONGRESSMAN CAPUANO QUESTIONS U.S. POLICY IN SUDAN*BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 580 words

The following information was released by The Office of Massachusetts Congressman Michael Capuano:

Congressman Mike Capuano (D-MA), co-chair of the Congressional Caucus on Sudan wrote to Secretary of State Dr. Condoleezza Rice, requesting an explanation of the U.S. policy towards Sudan in the wake of a number of troubling developments. [Read a PDF of the letter]

105 members of Congress, Democrats and Republicans, joined Rep. Capuano in requesting these critical clarifications. "Congress and President Bush have long ago declared that the atrocities occurring in Sudan constitute genocide, yet our government has not taken strong and decisive action, even as the violence worsens in Darfur," stated Congressman Capuano.

Congressman Capuano and his colleagues expressed alarm at what appears to be a shift in U.S. policy toward Sudan. "Rather than hold accountable a regime that the President, former Secretary of State, Colin Powell, and the Congress declared guilty of genocide, we appear to be engaged in a policy of appeasement," the lawmakers wrote.

Federal lawmakers outlined three areas of significant concern:

Recent developments in Darfur, including the kidnapping and killing of African Union troops and humanitarian workers; the closure of main roads leading out of the capital of Western Darfur, and an estimate by the United Nations that nearly three-quarter of a million refugees are beyond the reach of humanitarian aid.

Delay in the implementation of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement (CPA), which mandates the immediate withdrawal of government troops from disputed areas; government reform of civil service, security forces, and the judiciary; and establishment of investigatory commissions into the genocide in Sudan.

An apparent softening of U.S. policy towards the Government of Sudan

Hundreds of thousands of refugees and internally displaced persons risk genocide by attrition as the security situation deteriorates.

The delay in implementing the Comprehensive Peace Agreement (CPA) is equally troubling. The Government of Sudan has yet to establish key commissions, including the Assessment and Evaluation Commission and the North-South Boundary Commission.

The government of Sudan, including people in power when over 400,000 civilians were killed, was granted a waiver by the State Department to hire a U.S. lobbyist for $530,000. Their responsibilities include assisting the government of Sudan with an image-boosting public relations campaign.

Further evidence of a shift in U.S. policy comes in the recent report that Sudan's Trafficking in Persons status was upgraded from a Tier III to a Tier II watch-list country, despite the fact that there is no evidence to justify this upgrade. With this change, Sudan was placed in the same category as Tier II democratic countries like Switzerland and Israel.

"Only this past January the UN Commission of Inquiry released a report on Darfur in which it documented cases of Sudanese troops involved in abductions and sexual slavery. On what grounds, then, was Sudan upgraded? What "significant efforts" were made? And for what purpose was Sudan's Trafficking in Persons status elevated?" the lawmakers wrote.

"The United States has declared that the atrocities in Darfur constitute genocide. Any actions that appear to be inconsistent with that declaration are concerning and we expect clarification from Secretary Rice on U.S. policy," stated Congressman Capuano.

--

LOAD-DATE: November 9, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 States News Service

16 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Times (London)

October 31, 2005, Monday

Police powers to curb trade in sex slaves

BYLINE: Leo Lewis in Tokyo

SECTION: Overseas news; 35

LENGTH: 530 words

UNDER fire for its sluggish action on eliminating human trafficking, Japan is this week expected to bring in new laws to enable tougher police curbs on the brokers and buyers of women forced to work as sex slaves.

Japan remains acutely embarrassed by a 2004 US State Department report condemning the world's second-biggest economy for its failure adequately to address the problem, and placing it on a watch list with offenders such as Cambodia and Ivory Coast.

Although a more recent version of the survey praised Japan's efforts to improve the situation, it remains a "tier two" country since its thriving sex industry remains a lucrative destination for those who traffic women from Thailand, the Philippines, Colombia and Belarus. Placement in the tier two category denotes a country that fails to meet the minimum standards for eliminating human trafficking. The US report concluded that Japan "has yet to make a significant effort to lessen the domestic demand for trafficking victims".

The impending changes to the law will come into effect next spring and make the manager of any establishment in the sex or entertainment industry criminally liable for employing anyone without proper legal documentation. Keiko Otsu, who runs a secret shelter in Tokyo for women who escape from their captors, described to The Times a constant fear that haunts the women who arrive at her door. "They are genuinely terrified, often trembling uncontrollably," she said. They know that they can't go to the police because they have no visas. They fear that if they are spotted coming to the shelter they will be killed, or that their families back home will be hurt by thugs.

"They live under the weight of a fake debt, which means that they have to have sex with about ten customers a day, and there are fines for any tiny thing they do wrong that just adds to the debt and keeps them as slaves forever." The tardiness of Tokyo's moves on human trafficking was highlighted when the concept itself was accepted into Japanese law only in July this year.

Although many MPs hoped that the law would clear the way for raids on the managers of brothels, massage parlours and hostess bars, the first three months have hardly seen it used. The first prosecution was carried out last week, when the Taiwanese manageress of a club in the town of Nagano was arrested for buying a 24-year old Indonesian woman for use as a sex slave. The trafficked woman is understood to have been sold for about £10,000.

Much of the criticism of Japan centres on its failure to support the kind of shelter run by Ms Otsu. A report by the International Labour Organisation said: "Victims should receive protection and rehabilitation. In practice they are often arrested, detained and deported. (They) frequently bear all the costs of the deception they have undergone, while the traffickers are rarely prosecuted."

* RISING TOLL

* Japan's underground sex trade is worth £43 billion

* In 2000 120,000 foreign women worked in Japan's sex industry, of whom 75,000 were being held against their will

* Entertainer visas are a well-known method of getting women in to Japan

LOAD-DATE: October 31, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 Times Newspapers Limited

17 of 359 DOCUMENTS

University Wire

October 27, 2005 Thursday

Human trafficking a global issue, ex-State Dept. official says at U. Montana

BYLINE: By Kelly Jackson, Montana Kaimin; SOURCE: U. Montana

LENGTH: 478 words

DATELINE: MISSOULA, Mont.

People in economic misery, seeking political asylum, the jobless and homeless or victims of natural catastrophes are the most likely to become victims of human trafficking, said the former director of the U.S. Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons on Wednesday in a public lecture at the University of Montana.

Nancy Ely-Raphel spoke to a crowd of more than 150 people in a speech titled "21st-Century Slave Trade: International Trafficking in Persons: Crimes Against Women and Children" in honor of United Nations Week.

"Human trafficking is taking human lives and turning their misery into quick cash," Ely-Raphel said. "It puts a value on an individual and measures them by a price."

With 800,000 people a year falling victim to human trafficking in the world, over the past couple of years the United States has taken an active role in stopping the trafficking.

In 2000, the U.S. government adopted the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act. The protection act focuses on preventing human trafficking, the prosecution of traffickers and providing assistance to its victims.

"The government has to confront the rampant corruption that allows traffickers to flourish," Ely-Raphel said. "The government is taking aggressive steps to end these crimes."

Today, traffickers, if prosecuted, can get five years to life in prison in the United States.

To prevent human trafficking, Ely-Raphel suggests tightening border control and combating it with effective law enforcement in the United States. She also suggests that new legislation on training judges and police on trafficking laws should be put in place.

"Prevention is very important because then trafficking can be avoided," Ely-Raphel said.

Each year, the U.S. Department of State issues a trafficking report on 150 countries and ranks them on how effective their governments' efforts are to fight against trafficking in persons and modern-day slavery. The ranking is done in three tiers, the first tier being the best ranking and the third being the worst -- when the country is not making any effort to deal with trafficking in persons. Some countries that are on tier three are Cambodia and Burma, two countries that are in the worst area of trafficking -- Southeast and South Asia, said Ely-Raphel.

"It's really bad when the government in a country is not dealing with it or when the government is involved in it, like in Cambodia, where government officials dealt in human trafficking," Ely-Raphel said.

To stop those governments from ignoring human trafficking going on in their country, the United States imposes sanctions to diminish trade or vote against funding the country might need from the World Bank.

"There has been a tremendous improvement in stopping human trafficking," Ely-Raphel said. "It's a slow process, but it's moving in the right direction."

(C) 2005 Montana Kaimin via U-WIRE

LOAD-DATE: October 27, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2005 Montana Kaimin via U-Wire

18 of 359 DOCUMENTS

University Wire

October 27, 2005 Thursday

Human trafficking a global issue, ex-State Dept. official says at U. Montana

BYLINE: By Kelly Jackson, Montana Kaimin; SOURCE: U. Montana

LENGTH: 478 words

DATELINE: MISSOULA, Mont.

People in economic misery, seeking political asylum, the jobless and homeless or victims of natural catastrophes are the most likely to become victims of human trafficking, said the former director of the U.S. Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons on Wednesday in a public lecture at the University of Montana.

Nancy Ely-Raphel spoke to a crowd of more than 150 people in a speech titled "21st-Century Slave Trade: International Trafficking in Persons: Crimes Against Women and Children" in honor of United Nations Week.

"Human trafficking is taking human lives and turning their misery into quick cash," Ely-Raphel said. "It puts a value on an individual and measures them by a price."

With 800,000 people a year falling victim to human trafficking in the world, over the past couple of years the United States has taken an active role in stopping the trafficking.

In 2000, the U.S. government adopted the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act. The protection act focuses on preventing human trafficking, the prosecution of traffickers and providing assistance to its victims.

"The government has to confront the rampant corruption that allows traffickers to flourish," Ely-Raphel said. "The government is taking aggressive steps to end these crimes."

Today, traffickers, if prosecuted, can get five years to life in prison in the United States.

To prevent human trafficking, Ely-Raphel suggests tightening border control and combating it with effective law enforcement in the United States. She also suggests that new legislation on training judges and police on trafficking laws should be put in place.

"Prevention is very important because then trafficking can be avoided," Ely-Raphel said.

Each year, the U.S. Department of State issues a trafficking report on 150 countries and ranks them on how effective their governments' efforts are to fight against trafficking in persons and modern-day slavery. The ranking is done in three tiers, the first tier being the best ranking and the third being the worst -- when the country is not making any effort to deal with trafficking in persons. Some countries that are on tier three are Cambodia and Burma, two countries that are in the worst area of trafficking -- Southeast and South Asia, said Ely-Raphel.

"It's really bad when the government in a country is not dealing with it or when the government is involved in it, like in Cambodia, where government officials dealt in human trafficking," Ely-Raphel said.

To stop those governments from ignoring human trafficking going on in their country, the United States imposes sanctions to diminish trade or vote against funding the country might need from the World Bank.

"There has been a tremendous improvement in stopping human trafficking," Ely-Raphel said. "It's a slow process, but it's moving in the right direction."

(C) 2005 Montana Kaimin via U-WIRE

LOAD-DATE: October 27, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2005 Montana Kaimin via U-Wire

19 of 359 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

October 13, 2005, Thursday

Thailand, Japan to step up fight against human trafficking

SOURCE: Kyodo News Service, Tokyo, in English 13:13 GMT, 13 Oct 05

LENGTH: 344 words

Text of report in English by Japanese news agency Kyodo

Bangkok, 13 October: The foreign ministries of Japan and Thailand agreed Thursday [13 October] to set up a joint task force to combat human trafficking, according to a press release from the Thai side. The agreement was reached in principle during a high-level annual meeting - the Japan-Thailand Political Partnership Consultation - in Bangkok on Thursday.

The half-day talks led by the Thai Foreign Ministry's Permanent Secretary Krit Garnjana-Goonchorn and Japanese Deputy Foreign Minister Tsuneo Nishida also concluded they should work on an "appropriate framework" for cooperation on the transfer of offenders, said the press release, which gave no details of the plan.

In July, Japan's National Police Agency [NPA] revealed that 51 foreign women were trafficked into Japan and forced into the sex industry or other forms of exploitation in the first half of this year, the highest figure on record for the first half of a year. The latest figure, which was triple the number compared with the corresponding period last year, included a Thai transsexual for the first time since the NPA began compiling the data in 2001. According to the NPA, Filipino and Thai nationals topped the list of victims, with 20 and 17 respectively, followed by women from Indonesia, Romania, Taiwan, South Korea, Australia and Estonia.

Japan came under international pressure last year to combat human trafficking following a June report by the US State Department that downgraded its assessment of Japan's efforts to crack down on the problem by putting it on a special watch list of countries on the verge of falling into the worst category. Tokyo subsequently adopted an action plan to combat human trafficking in December and implemented legal changes such as amending the penal code to make human trafficking a crime. Human rights groups and researchers estimate that thousands of women, mostly from poor Asian countries, are trafficked into Japan every year and to work in the sex industry.

LOAD-DATE: October 13, 2005

LANGUAGE: English

20 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

October 13, 2005 Thursday

Thailand, Japan to step up fight against human trafficking

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 330 wordsDATELINE: BANGKOK, Oct. 13

The foreign ministries of Japan and Thailand agreed Thursday to set up a joint task force to combat human trafficking, according to a press release from the Thai side.

The agreement was reached in principle during a high-level annual meeting -- the Japan-Thailand Political Partnership Consultation -- in Bangkok on Thursday.

The half-day talks led by the Thai Foreign Ministry's Permanent Secretary Krit Garnjana-Goonchorn and Japanese Deputy Foreign Minister Tsuneo Nishida also concluded they should work on an 'appropriate framework' for cooperation on the transfer of offenders, said the press release, which gave no details of the plan.

In July, Japan's National Police Agency revealed that 51 foreign women were trafficked into Japan and forced into the sex industry or other forms of exploitation in the first half of this year, the highest figure on record for the first half of a year.

The latest figure, which was triple the number compared with the corresponding period last year, included a Thai transsexual for the first time since the NPA began compiling the data in 2001.

According to the NPA, Filipino and Thai nationals topped the list of victims, with 20 and 17 respectively, followed by women from Indonesia, Romania, Taiwan, South Korea, Australia and Estonia.

Japan came under international pressure last year to combat human trafficking following a June report by the U.S. State Department that downgraded its assessment of Japan's efforts to crack down on the problem by putting it on a special watch list of countries on the verge of falling into the worst category.

Tokyo subsequently adopted an action plan to combat human trafficking in December and implemented legal changes such as amending the Penal Code to make human trafficking a crime.

Human rights groups and researchers estimate that thousands of women, mostly from poor Asian countries, are trafficked into Japan every year and to work in the sex industry.

LOAD-DATE: October 13, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 Kyodo News Service

21 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Chicago Tribune

October 9, 2005, Sunday

U.S. cash fuels human trade

BYLINE: By Cam Simpson and Aamer Madhani

LENGTH: 1990 words

American tax dollars and the wartime needs of the U.S. military are fueling an illicit pipeline of cheap foreign labor, mainly impoverished Asians who often are deceived, exploited and put in harm's way in Iraq with little protection.

The U.S. has long condemned the practices that characterize this human trade as it operates elsewhere in the Middle East. Yet this very system is now part of the privatization of the American war effort and is central to the operations of Halliburton subsidiary KBR, the U.S. military's biggest private contractor in Iraq.

To document this system, the Tribune retraced the journey of 12 Nepalese men kidnapped last year from an unprotected convoy en route to an American military base in Iraq. The Tribune's reporting found that:

To maintain the flow of low-paid workers key to military support and reconstruction in Iraq, the U.S. military has allowed KBR to partner with subcontractors that hire laborers from Nepal and other countries that prohibit citizens from being deployed in Iraq. That means brokers recruiting such workers operate illicitly.

The U.S. military and KBR assume no responsibility for the recruitment, transportation or protection of foreign workers brought to the country. KBR leaves every aspect of hiring and deployment in the hands of its subcontractors. Those subcontractors often turn to job brokers dealing in menial laborers.

Working in tandem with counterparts in the Middle East, the brokers in South and Southeast Asia recruit workers from some of the world's most remote areas. They lure laborers to Iraq with false promises of lucrative, safe jobs in nations such as Jordan and Kuwait, even falsifying documents to complete the deception.

Even after foreign workers discover they have been lured under false pretenses, many say they have little choice but to continue into Iraq or stay longer than planned. They feel trapped because they must repay brokers' huge fees.

Some U.S. subcontractors in Iraq--and the brokers feeding them--employ practices condemned by the U.S. elsewhere, including fraud, coercion and seizure of workers' passports.

The State Department has long expressed concerns about the treatment of foreign workers in the same Middle Eastern nations the U.S. relies on to supply labor for bases in Iraq. In June, the department added four of these nations--Kuwait, Qatar, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates--to the top tier of its human trafficking watch list for not undertaking "significant efforts to combat forced labor trafficking."

U.S. law calls for sanctions in such cases. But last month, citing Kuwait's and Saudi Arabia's efforts in the "Global War on Terror," President Bush waived the sanctions against them. This allowed more than $ 6 billion in combined military sales to go forward. One reason laborers from developing countries are sought for work in Iraq is the U.S. military fears that hiring Iraqis would allow insurgents to infiltrate its bases.

Halliburton would not say whether it includes such laborers in its public tallies of contractor casualties in Iraq. But figures compiled by Iraq Coalition Casualty Count, a private group, indicate that third-country nationals--neither Iraqis nor citizens from U.S. coalition members--account for more than 100 of the roughly 270 contractor fatalities in the country since the start of the war. Those numbers are based on the group's tracking of Defense Department releases and media accounts.

Halliburton declined to make KBR executives available for an interview, agreeing to respond only to written questions from the Tribune. In a written statement, Halliburton said it outlines the "legal and ethical behaviors that all employees and subcontractors are expected to follow in every aspect of their work."

The U.S. military has outsourced vital support operations in Iraq to KBR at an unprecedented scale, a deal that has cost U.S. taxpayers more than $ 12 billion. KBR, in turn, outsources much of that work to more than 200 subcontractors, many of them based in the Middle East.

The subcontractors employ an army of workers from developing countries to dish out food, wash clothes and clean latrines. About 35,000 of the 48,000 people working for those subcontractors are not Americans, KBR has said.

According to salary statements obtained by the Tribune, the pay for such workers can range from about $ 65 to $ 112 weekly--a fortune to those scratching a living from the farm fields and brick factories of Nepal, where the per capita annual income is about $ 270.

The Nepalese government must grant permission before workers can legally go abroad or brokers can legally send them. It has refused to do so for Iraq, because of the dangers there.

Some Nepalese job brokers have been raided or shut down, but it is unclear how vigorously authorities have pursued those involved. The government, consistently ranked among the world's most corrupt, has little incentive to do so because the Nepalese economy is reliant on the estimated $ 1 billion sent home each year by citizens working overseas.

Many Nepalis willingly assume the risks of working in Iraq, although their knowledge of its dangers before leaving home is questionable. Only 16 of every 1,000 Nepalis even had a phone line when the war broke out in 2003.

The U.S. military and KBR do not screen workers to determine whether they come from Nepal and other nations that prohibit their citizens from working in Iraq. But the military could easily do so, because it issues the badges listing each worker's nationality, name, job and the subcontractor employing him.

Asked what it was doing to stop the flow of workers from these nations or to monitor its subcontractors, KBR said questions "regarding the recruitment practices of subcontractors should be directed to the subcontractor."

The U.S. Army, which oversees the contract, said much the same. "Questions involving alleged misconduct towards employees by subcontractor firms should be addressed to those firms, as these are not Army issues."

KBR said it does not tolerate subcontractors that abuse their workers. But it declined to cite any specific actions taken against any of its subcontractors since the onset of the war.

The company did not respond to several questions about the case of the 12 Nepalis or any other specific abuses uncovered by the Tribune.

An estimated 10,000 of their countrymen are now in Iraq despite policies restricting such work. Many are employed at American bases where KBR runs support operations, according to Prakash Mahat, who was the Nepalese foreign minister until February.

The Philippines, originally a partner in the U.S.-led coalition, instituted a ban last summer after attacks against Filipino workers in Iraq. Before that, the nation had an arrangement that helped protect workers from exploitation because it effectively cut out the job brokers. Filipinos willing to risk working in Iraq went through official channels, which ensured that they didn't have to pay broker fees and helped guarantee contract terms.

But since the Philippine ban, Filipino workers hoping to go to Iraq go through agencies that operate illegally and charge exorbitant fees. The agencies deliver workers through neighboring Middle Eastern nations, said Ricardo Endaya, who was a senior official with the Philippine Embassy in Baghdad until recently.

Many of the same firms engage in practices condemned by the U.S., including luring workers with false promises or contracts, then switching jobs or terms upon arrival.

Even after they learn they'll be in a combat zone--or their wages will be less than promised--some feel compelled to go into Iraq or stay longer than planned so they can repay the money their families borrowed to send them.

"If I could leave now, I would, but I have not yet even paid off my loan," said Sahib Yadev, a 24-year-old from Uttar Pradesh, India, who was working at the American base called Camp Liberty near Baghdad International Airport when the Tribune interviewed him earlier this year.

A Tribune reporter embedded this summer with U.S. forces at Camp Liberty, which comes under fire almost daily, was taken to the base's living area for foreign workers operated by subcontractor Prime Projects International, or PPI, which has offices in the United Arab Emirates.

Several other workers interviewed shared Yadev's sentiment, but like most who work under KBR at U.S. bases in Iraq, they are not supposed to speak with journalists and did so only on condition of anonymity. An American employee for KBR escorted the reporter to the camp, where the reporter interviewed several laborers.

Passports taken

All of the South Asian workers said PPI took their passports upon arrival. Western supervisors for PPI at the camp said the company keeps workers' passports for safety reasons. The supervisors said they feared if documents were lost, it would be difficult for laborers to get new ones, as most of their countries do not have embassies in Iraq.

Veerus, an Indian laborer who spoke on agreement that his last name not be used, said workers insisted they could care for their passports. But Veerus said PPI responded with an ultimatum: They would not be paid until PPI had their passports. Other workers at the camp suspected the firm kept the documents for another reason.

"We might transfer to another company," said another Indian laborer for PPI, who asked not to be identified. "They are paying very little salary, and other companies may be paying very good salaries. Without passports, they know we cannot leave."

HOW U.S. DOLLARS HELPED RECRUIT NEPALESE WORKERS:

An elaborate and largely undocumented system for hiring foreign laborers led 12 Nepalese men to Iraq, where they were kidnapped.

The U.S government . . .

... outsources vital military support operations to Halliburton's KBR subsidiary under a multibillion-dollar deal, giving the company responsibility for logistics on U.S. bases in Iraq.

Halliburton/KBR . . .

. . . outsources much of the day-to-day work on those bases to more than 200 subcontractors, many of them from the Middle East.

Subcontractors . . .

. . . employ thousands of so-called third country nationals, most brought into the Middle East from impoverished nations, to carry out menial labor on the bases. KBR leaves responsibility for virtually everything-- recruitment, deployment and safety--in the hands of these subcontractors.

Middle Eastern brokers . . .

. . . import foreign workers into Iraq's neighboring nations and funnel those workers to KBR's subcontractors. One such broker reported being paid $ 300-$ 500 per head for Nepalese workers.

South Asia labor recruiters . . .

. . . work with their Middle Eastern counterparts. To get workers into Iraq, they sometimes file false paperwork with their home governments, stating the jobs are in Iraq's neighboring states. These men employ their own recruiters, known as dalals, who troll rural villages in search of recruits. They collect huge fees from the workers and their families.

Nepalese workers . . .

... were originally offered as much as $ 700 per month to work in Iraq. Others had paperwork promising jobs in Jordan. All appear to have been deceived about key details that propelled their journey. They paid a Nepalese labor agent and the dalals working for him as much as $ 3,500 apiece, more than a decade's worth of earnings back home.

Source: Tribune reporting

To see more of the Chicago Tribune, or to subscribe to the newspaper, go to <http://www.chicagotribune.com>.

Copyright (c) 2005, Chicago Tribune

Distributed by Knight Ridder/Tribune Business News.

For information on republishing this content, contact us at (800) 661-2511 (U.S.), (213) 237-4914 (worldwide), fax (213) 237-6515, or e-mail reprints@krtinfo.com. HAL,

LOAD-DATE: October 9, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

KR-ACC-NO: TB-US-HUMAN-TRADE-20051009

JOURNAL-CODE: TB

Copyright 2005 Knight Ridder/Tribune Business News
Copyright 2005 Chicago Tribune

22 of 359 DOCUMENTS

CQ Congressional Testimony

October 6, 2005 ThursdayCASTE SYSTEM IN INDIA*SECTION: CAPITOL HILL HEARING TESTIMONY*LENGTH: 2828 words

Opening Statement of Christopher H. Smith U.S. Representative

Committee on House International Relations Subcommittee on Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations

October 06, 2005

The Subcommittee will come to order, and good afternoon to everyone.

Today's hearing of the Subcommittee on Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations will study the terrible situation facing India's Dalits and tribal peoples. Taken together, Dalits and tribal peoples constitute as many as 250 million people. The Dalits, whose name means "the oppressed," are much better known as "untouchables," although this demeaning name is not the one they choose for themselves. They are also often referred to in official documents as "Scheduled Castes, and occasionally as "Harijans (HAR ee johns)," or "Children of God," a name given them by Gandhi. The tribal peoples are often referred to as Scheduled Tribes, or Adivasis (a- di-VAH-sees), which means indigenous or aboriginal inhabitants. The Dalits and tribal peoples are treated as virtual non-humans, and suffer pervasive discrimination and violation of their human rights.

This topic has taken on a special relevance. India's reformist government has made great strides to open its economy, and improve the lot of all its citizens. It has also played a leading role in the Community of Democracies and the UN's Democracy Caucus and the UN Democracy Fund. In June and July of this year the U.S. and India announced a series of agreements that represent a quantum leap in cooperation between the world's two most populous democracies after decades of estrangement during the Cold War. On July 18th, U.S. and Indian leaders issued a joint statement resolving to establish a "global partnership" between the two nations through increased cooperation on a wide range of issues. We heartily welcome all of these actions.

However, there is still a long road to travel. Most observers have focused on the nuclear proliferation implications of our announced agreements as potential stumbling blocks to a true strategic partnership between the U.S. and India. But as we seek to develop a strategic partnership, we must not lose sight of India's serious human rights problems.

These problems are amply documented in the three current State Department reports: the 2004 Human Rights Report on India, the 2005 Report on Trafficking in Persons, and the 2004 Report on Religious Freedom. All three are massive catalogues of human rights violations which the Government of India condones, ignores, and in some instances, has even promoted.

To quote the 2004 Human Rights Report on India: Security force officials who committed human rights abuses generally enjoyed de facto legal impunity. . .violations included: torture and rape by police and other government agents; . . .harassment and arrest of human rights monitors; . . .forced prostitution; child prostitution and female infanticide; trafficking in women and children; . . .serious discrimination and violence against indigenous people and scheduled castes and tribes; widespread intercaste and communal violence; religiously motivated violence against Muslims and Christians; and widespread exploitation of indentured, bonded, and child labor. Further, the 2005 Report on Trafficking in Persons has this to say. Again I quote:

India is a source, transit, and destination country for women, men, and children trafficked for the purposes of sexual and labor exploitation. . .Internal trafficking . . .for . . .sexual exploitation, domestic servitude, bonded labor, and indentured servitude is widespread. . .the vast majority of females in the Indian commercial sex industry are currently victims of sexual servitude or were originally trafficked into the sex trade. India is also home to millions of victims of forced or bonded labor. The Government of India does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking.

India was placed on Tier 2 Watch List for human trafficking a second consecutive year in 2005. Many of us believe it should be a Tier III country.

The State Department's 2004 Report on Religious Freedom also had many harsh words for India's respect for religious freedom. It noted that the Indian government, despite India's constitutional commitment to religious freedom and secular government, was often lax in protecting religious minorities from attack, and in punishing their persecutors. Religious extremists have taken such laxity as a signal that they can attack with impunity. Missionaries were often harassed, and the right to freely choose one's own religion was often violated.

Finally, there is abortion. In theory, India only allows abortions for risk to the life of the mother, or "grave risks" to her health, or for "substantial risk" of fetal impairment. Yet like so many countries where the absolute right to life of the unborn child has been disregarded in a misguided attempt to provide a so-called "limited" abortion license, the reality is that there is abortion on demand. Estimates of abortions run as high as 7 million a year. There are some estimates that 17% of maternal deaths are due to abortion: so much for "safe, legal and rare."

And abortion is not just at the demand of the mother, but often at the demand of relatives who don't want girl babies. The incidence of "sexselection abortions" has reached staggering proportions. As many as 50 million girls and women are missing from India's population as a result of infanticide and abortion. In most countries in the world, there are approximately 105 female births for every 100 males. In India, there are less than 93 women for every 100 men in the population. In one wealthier area of the capital of New Delhi, the sex ratio at birth has dropped to 762 girls for every 1,000 boys, one of the lowest in the entire country. The problem is getting worse as scientific methods of detecting the sex of a baby and of performing abortions are improving. These methods are becoming increasingly available even in rural areas.

India banned sex-selection abortions in 1996, but the health minister recently admitted that not a single person has ever been convicted or otherwise punished for having carried out sex selective abortions. UNICEF has warned that unless steps are taken to address the problem, India will soon face severe social problems, not least increased trafficking of women, which is already an enormous problem. As more and more girls are aborted or murdered after birth, more and more poor women and girls will be trafficked.

All of this background will provide the context for today's hearing.

India's Dalits and tribal peoples are victims of all the human rights violations prevalent in India, and to a far greater extent than most other Indians.

According to India's caste system, Dalits are impure, and even their shadow can pollute. Dalits are discriminated against, denied access to land and forced to work in degrading conditions. Dalit men, women, and children numbering in the tens of millions work as agricultural laborers for a few pounds of rice or less than a dollar a day. Their upper-caste employers frequently use caste as a cover for exploitative economic arrangements. In India's own version of "apartheid," entire villages in many Indian states remain completely segregated by caste. Dalits dare not even walk in the part of the village occupied by higher castes. They may not use the same wells, visit the same temples, drink from the same cups in tea stalls, or lay claim to land that is legally theirs. Dalit children are frequently made to sit in the back of classrooms.

Most Dalits continue to live in extreme poverty, without land or opportunities for better employment or education. India has a policy of quotas in education and government jobs to benefit Dalits and tribal peoples. But most cannot afford primary education, so their literacy rates remain very low and only a small minority can benefit from these quotas.

Dalits are routinely abused at the hands of the police and of higher-caste groups that enjoy the state's protection. According to India's National Crime Records Bureau, in 2000, the last year for which figures are available, 25,455 crimes were committed against Dalits. Every hour two Dalits were assaulted; every day three Dalit women were raped, two Dalits were murdered, and two Dalit homes were torched. And most experts believe that these numbers are grossly underreported, since Dalits are afraid to report crimes to police, and when they do, police often refused to register or investigate their complaints. In 2001 Amnesty International estimated that only about 5 percent of sexual assaults were registered, and that police officers dismissed at least 30 percent of rape complaints as false.

Approximately eighty percent of the tribal population lives below the poverty level. Despite constitutional safeguards, the rights of indigenous groups in the eastern parts of the country are often ignored. In recent years, crime against the tribes has risen. Indigenous peoples suffer discrimination and harassment, are deprived of their land, and subjected to torture and to arbitrary arrest. Mob violence, lynching, arson, and police atrocities against tribal persons occur in many states.

Dalits and tribal peoples suffer horribly from human trafficking. Dalit girls have been forced to become temple prostitutes as devadasis (de-vi-DAH-sees), or "servants of god," a practice where they are "married" to a deity or temple where they are then forced to have sex with upper caste men and are eventually sold into prostitution. In 2001, more than 40,000 tribal women were forced into situations of economic and sexual exploitation. An estimated 40 million people, most of them Dalits, are bonded workers, many working to pay off debts that were incurred generations ago, according to a 1999 report by Human Rights Watch. These people work under slave-like conditions for less than U.S. $1 per day. 15 million are children, and according to UNICEF, the majority are from the lowest castes.

Dalits and tribal peoples are often the targets of Hindu religious extremism as well. Over the years, many Dalits and tribal groups have converted from Hinduism to other faiths to escape widespread discrimination and achieve higher social status. However, such converts often lose benefits conferred by the Government's affirmative action programs because these, according to the Constitution, are reserved only for those having scheduled caste status. Converts to Christianity are particularly targeted.

Christian missionaries have been operating schools and medical clinics for many years in tribal areas and among the very poor, and tribal peoples and Dalits have made great strides as a result. Hindu extremists resent these gains for disturbing the traditional social order, since better educated Dalits and tribals no longer accept their disadvantaged status as readily as they once did. Some Hindu groups fear that Christians may try to convert large numbers of lower-caste Hindus, using economic or social welfare incentives. Many acts of violence against Christians stem from these fears, and most go unpunished. Many states have also adopted anticonversion laws, in violation of India's constitutional protection for religious freedom.

In many cases, India has very good laws to protect the human rights of its citizens, although new and tougher legislation against trafficking is clearly necessary. But the best laws in the world are useless unless there is vigorous enforcement, and all too often, enforcement of laws protecting human rights is weak or non-existent. As an American I can easily understand the difficulty in a democratic, federal system of confronting deeply ingrained social prejudices against a minority, but that difficulty must be faced and overcome in any nation which aspires to its rightful place as one of the great nations in the world. To keep nearly a quarter of one's population in subhuman status is not only a grotesque violation of human rights, but it is a formula for economic and political stagnation as well.

Once in America, we deprived African Americans of the most basic rights and opportunities. This was especially true in our Southern states, which were once a byword for poverty and backwardness among people of all races. For a long time we refused to act at a national level to stop lynchings, often arguing that it was a local problem. Yet we all suffered the consequences of shutting off a huge segment of our population from equality and justice. Now, after the civil rights movement ended all legal basis for discrimination, and lynching is only a shameful memory, the Southern states are among the most economically dynamic in America, and all regions of America enjoy unprecedented prosperity. By fulfilling its promises of equality and justice for all, India will also benefit in every way imaginable.

Today our panel of distinguished visitors will provide us first hand accounts of the situation in India, what Dalits and tribal peoples are doing for themselves to advance their cause, and I hope, they will provide suggestions as to how the U.S. can best ameliorate this terrible situation.

The panel includes

Mr. Udit Raj

Mr. Raj is the National President of the Justice Party, the All India Confederation of Scheduled Castes/Scheduled Tribes Organizations, and the Lord Buddha Club, which was founded in 1996 for furthering the cause of Buddhism, implementation of reservation (India's version of affirmative action), setting up of schools and vocational centers, promoting the cause of human rights, and ensuring economic development of the Dalits. Udit possesses an M.A. in Political Science and is an LL.B, Ph.D scholar. Udit continues to fight against social injustice and contributes to the cause of effective implementation of reservation for the Dalits of India.

Professor Kancha Ilaiah

Professor Ilaiah is a Professor and currently Head of the Department of Political Science at Osmania University, Hyderabad, India. Dr. Ilaiah is the author of many works on the socio-political situation in India, notably: Why I am Not a Hindu: A Critique of Sudra Philosophy, Culture and Political Economy, a best seller published in 1996.

In 1985 when starvation deaths occurred in a poverty-ridden district in India, he established free feeding centers for the starving masses, started a massive campaign against caste atrocities in India, and campaigned against state repression of the Dalits and other lower caste people in India. For the last 25 years, Kancha has been campaigning against the practice of untouchability in India.

Ms. Indira Singh Athwale

Ms. Athwale is the Maharashtra State President of the All India Confederation of Scheduled Castes/Scheduled Tribes Organizations, as well as a professor in the JBD Science College, an affiliate of the University of Pune. Mrs. Athawale fights for the rights of Dalits, Dalit women in particular, in Maharashtra State and across India. She is also the National President of the Fule Shahu Ambedkar Students' Association, a college and university level organization that brings together low caste students.

Dr. Joseph D'Souza

Dr. D'Souza is the President of the All India Christian Council, one of the largest interdenominational alliances of Christians dealing with national concerns and human rights issues. Dr. D'Souza is also the International President of the Dalit Freedom Network and the Associate International Director of OM International. Dr. D'Souza has been writing articles and speaking publicly for nearly 25 years. He focuses on issues of freedom of religion, human rights, and the work among the oppressed and marginalized. He travels extensively in his campaign for the rights of the oppressed and marginalized in society, especially for the rights of the Dalits and the backward castes in India. His most recent book, a best seller, Dalit Freedom Now and Forever, was published in 2004. In addition, Dr. D'Souza's articles have been published in major mission journals and magazines, as well as the three compendiums, Communication in an Asian Context, Perspectives on the World Christian Movement Handbook, and Global Missiology.

Mr. T. Kumar

T. Kumar is the Asia Advocacy Director for Amnesty International USA. He has lived in several Asian and African countries and served as a human rights monitor throughout Asia as well as in Bosnia, Haiti, Guatemala, and South Africa. He has also served as director of several refugee ships and refugee camps. Kumar is a sought after expert on Asia. His comments frequently appear in the New York Times and Washington Post and have been interviewed by CNN, BBC, and NPR. He also frequently testifies before the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives and lectures at Foreign Service Institute where U.S. diplomats are trained.

LOAD-DATE: October 7, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

COMMITTEE: HOUSE INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

SUBCOMMITTEE: AFRICA

TESTIMONY-BY: CHRISTOPHER H. SMITH, U.S. REPRESENTATIVE

23 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Manila Times

September 23, 2005 Friday

WANT TO LEAVE RP WITHOUT A HITCH? BRIBE IMMIGRATION AGENTS

BYLINE: By Jonathan M. Hicap, Reporter

LENGTH: 470 words

HUMAN trafficking is a big business at the Ninoy Aquino International Airport, mostly involving Filipinos who are allowed to leave the country even with suspicious papers, an immigration employee told The Times.

The employee, who asked not to be named, said some immigration agents "fix" the departure of Filipinos who are bound for job overseas but are armed only with tourist visas or without working permits.

The employee said immigration officers get P10,000 to as high as P50,000 for every person allowed to depart.

He said some recruiters have contacts at the NAIA immigration, which facilitates the papers of the Filipino workers.

The workers are usually bound for the Middle East, where many undocumented Filipinos who enter only on visitor's visa.

The Manila International Airport Authority hosted an orientation Thursday on human smuggling at the NAIA and principal seaports.

The orientation was a project of the Interagency Council Against Trafficking and the National Law-Enforcement Task Force Against Trafficking.

Airport General Manager Alfonso Cusi said the MIAA has tightened its intelligence network and boarding procedures to prevent human trafficking. Human smuggling has decreased, he said. He did not elaborate.

He said the Bureau of Immigration at the NAIA is responsible for stopping any form of human smuggling, although the MIAA has its intelligence office.

The Philippines has been put on the Tier 2 Watchlist of human trafficking by the United States Department of State for not complying with minimum international standards against trafficking.

In the 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report, the State Department described the Philippines as "source, transit and destination country for men, women and children trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor."

The report said Filipino women are victims of "false promises of legitimate employment and are trafficked for commercial sexual exploitation to destinations throughout Asia, the Middle East, Africa, Europe and North America."

Filipinos who go abroad to work end up in "exploitative conditions" which can be considered as involuntary servitude. Filipino children are also victims of sexual exploitation in the country, the study added.

"Endemic poverty, a high unemployment rate, a cultural propensity toward migration, a weak rule-of-law environment and sex tourism all contribute to significant trafficking activity in the Philippines," the report said.

It noted the Philippine government "does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so."

President Arroyo signed Republic Act 9208, the Antitrafficking of Persons Act in 2003, to combat human trafficking.

She created the Antiillegal Recruitment Task Force to protect overseas Filipino workers.

LOAD-DATE: February 9, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Trafficking/Smuggling

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2005 News Bites Pty Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

Global News Bites

24 of 359 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

September 22, 2005 Thursday 7:43 AM EST

REP. SMITH DISAPPOINTED WITH WHITE HOUSE FAILURE TO SANCTION ALLIES FOR TRAFFICKING VIOLATIONS

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 446 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J. (4th CD), issued the following press release:

Rep. Chris Smith (R-NJ), today expressed disappointment with President Bush's decision to waive or reduce sanctions against some countries that are known to be among the worst offenders in human trafficking. Smith is the author two landmark laws to combat human trafficking and aid the victims of this horrible crime and introduced H.R. 972 - the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2005 - in February 2005.

"Ally or not, America cannot condone human trafficking by any nation, and that is what we seem to be doing," said Smith, who has long championed efforts to eliminate human trafficking. "I have said it time and time again, 'friends don't let friends commit human rights violations.'"

In fall 2000, Smith's Victims of Trafficking Protection Act became law. In addition to provisions created to provide U.S. authorities explicit tools and powers to prosecute traffickers, the law created the Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP) produced by Office of Trafficking in Persons at the Department of State which ranks countries according to their efforts to combat trafficking around the world into three tiers. Countries listed on Tier 3 - the lowest ranking - of the TIP are failing to take minimum steps to combat human trafficking and are denied non-humanitarian US aid.

On Wednesday, the White House announced that sanctions against United States allies including Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and Ecuador were waived, despite their failure to make any significant reform. Only countries that do not have diplomatic relations with the United States - Burma, Cuba and North Korea - are barred from receiving certain types of foreign aid.

"We have made significant progress over the past few years to combat human trafficking. The waiver in the law to remove sanctions should be reserved for the most crucial national security standards and I am not convinced that this meets that criteria," said Smith, who was elected Special Representative for Trafficking for the Organization for Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) Parliamentary Assembly in 2004.

"Actions like this send the wrong signal to nations - friend and foe alike - that turn a blind eye to this international horror."

Smith noted that he hoped that the President's decision to impose limited sanctions against Cambodia, also announced yesterday, would enable that country to increase their efforts to combat human trafficking.

For additional information about Representative Chris Smith and his efforts on behalf of global human rights, please visit <http://www.house.gov/chris-smith/>.

Contact: Brad Dayspring, 202/225-3765.

LOAD-DATE: September 27, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2005 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

25 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

September 7, 2005 Wednesday 9:47 AM GMT

Eleven Vietnamese sex slaves freed in Cambodia: police

LENGTH: 212 wordsDATELINE: PHNOM PENH Sept 7

Cambodian police said Wednesday they had freed 11 Vietnamese women who were forced to work as prostitutes in a brothel in the capital, in the fourth such raid rescuing Vietnamese nationals since February.

Police raided the brothel on Tuesday, said Keo Thea, deputy chief of police of Phnom Penh's anti-human trafficking unit.

"They told police they were between 19 and 21, but they look smaller and younger than that," he told AFP.

"According to our investigation, they were locked up in the house during the day and when night fell they were forced to be sex workers," he said, adding that a Vietnamese man accused of running the brothel was also arrested.

The raid followed another in the northwestern Cambodian tourist town of Siem Reap on Friday in which five Vietnamese women were rescued from a brothel.

In February and April, 29 Vietnamese women were freed from two other brothels in the town, the gateway to the famous Angkor Wat temple complex.

In June the United States added Cambodia to its blacklist of the world's worst human trafficking violators.

The kingdom, still recovering after decades of conflict which only ended in 1998, has long been a significant sender and receiver of trafficked people because of its weak border controls and poorly enforced migration laws.

LOAD-DATE: September 8, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2005 Agence France Presse
All Rights Reserved

26 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Jerusalem Post

September 6, 2005 Tuesday

Bad traffic

BYLINE: EETTA PRINCE-GIBSON

SECTION: FEATURES; Pg. 13

LENGTH: 2195 words

HIGHLIGHT: MK Zahava Gal-On says Israel still has a long way to go to free the white slaves from the sexual black market

The most recent "Trafficking in Persons Report," issued in June 2005 by the US Department of State, places Israel in "tier two" in terms of its treatment of women who are bought and sold in the sex trade.

The rating is better than in past years, when Israel's treatment of sex slaves almost brought on economic sanctions by the United States. But the rating is still a diplomatic embarrassment, since Israel is left in the dubious company of countries such as Kuwait, Lebanon, Albania, Azerbaijan and the Kyrgyz Republic.

"The Government of Israel," states the report, "does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so."

MK Zahava Gal-On (Meretz-Yahad), who heads the Knesset's Parliamentary Subcommittee on the Trafficking of Women, soberly agrees with the assessment.

According to a recent report by Gal-On, between 3,000 and 5,000 women have been sold as sex slaves over the past four years, each for $8,000-$10,000. The women are forced to work up to 18 hours a day in nearly 400 brothels throughout Israel.

With approximately one million visits to prostitutes each month, the Israeli sex "industry" generates an estimated billion dollars a year, Gal-On reveals.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon declared last month that this "despicable phenomenon completely contradicts Jewish tradition and the values of dignity."

Yet, despite repeated criticism by the State Department and human rights organizations, Israel has not established a central authority to cope with the problem. In December 2003, the government decided to establish a committee of ministerial directors-general to deal with trafficking in persons, but the decision was conditioned on a budgetary allocation, which was never forthcoming. Nearly two years later, this committee still doesn't exist.

To Gal-On's dismay, while the public seems to feel some sympathy for the sex slaves themselves, most Israelis simply do not view trafficking in women as a human rights violation.

To mark last week's International Day Against Trafficking in Women, Gal-On - who has been campaigning against the sex trade in Israel for nearly four years - discusses the State Department's report and its implications.

"We have made tremendous progress with regard to legislation, law enforcement and the treatment of the women victims," she says, reviewing the achievements of the committee she heads. "But we still have a long way to go."

Even after four years of intensive parliamentary effort, Gal-On "still doesn't have the words to describe how abhorrent and cruel trafficking in women really is... These women are bought and sold as if they were merely commodities in the market. They are beaten, raped and abused; imprisoned in brothel-apartments; threatened and forced to work, without a break, for weeks and days on end. If their 'value' goes down, they are traded off again, sold for a lower price. What words are there to describe this modern slavery?"

Gal-On considers the increasing official recognition that "trafficking in women is a phenomenon that the government and the public must deal with" as her committee's primary achievement.

"When we established the committee, most people didn't recognize - even I wasn't fully aware - that we were dealing with a phenomenon, not merely a collection of isolated cases," she says.

Gal-On is also careful to give particular credit for this achievement to the women's and feminist organizations that work with her committee.

"The organizations - who work with the women - brought us the data, and they were the ones to convince MKs from all political parties how serious a problem it really is," she says.

The public often contends, she notes, that most of these women came to Israel of their own free will, knowing they would be prostitutes. This argument infuriates her.

According to her committee's report, fully one third of the women traded in Israel did not know they would be working as prostitutes, and the two thirds who did believed they would be employed in comfortable conditions and would earn enormous sums of money.

"So the majority of them knew they would be prostitutes," she says. "But they didn't come of their own free will. They came out of despair. The public thinks about [the movie] Pretty Woman. Well these women aren't Julia Roberts, and their clients aren't Richard Gere."

There is no free choice in this situation, she says.

"A woman who is sucked into the world of prostitution usually lives in deep poverty and social despair, especially in the former Soviet Union, where everything has fallen apart. The procurers promise them that they'll work for a summer, earn vast sums of money, and be able to come back home. And they believe them, because they don't know the truth and are too desperate to find out."

Furthermore, she asks rhetorically, "What about the effect prostitution has on all women? Is that free choice?"

"A society that allows trade in women only because they're women degrades the entire community of women. If some women can be bought, then all women can be bought.

"The sex trade entrenches women into their inferior social position. It finds its expression in the under- representation of women in politics, the fact that women earn one third less than men."

GALON RECALLS a recent Knesset debate about child prostitution in Jerusalem.

"Everyone was so upset, but I thought, 'Why are you so surprised?' After all, this is a slippery slope. It's another stage in our loss of our humanity as a society. If we are insensitive to foreign women who have been sold into slavery, sooner or later we will become insensitive to Israeli women, and then to children, too."

Incensed, she describes a recent court case in which a judge ordered an insurance company to compensate a man who was wounded in a traffic accident by paying for his visits to a prostitute in order to meet his sexual needs until he reaches the age of 70."

"The man also asked for cigarettes," she continues, "but the judge refused, because cigarettes are dangerous to his health," she says ironically.

"So a judge in the State of Israel is saying that it's OK to buy sex, and the state should pay for it. On the one hand, the state wants to close down the brothels and fight the sex trade and on the other, a judge is mandating their use. A woman as compensation for a traffic accident? That's perverted."

Gal-On also rejects proposals to legalize prostitution, noting first of all that in Israel, prostitution isn't illegal, although pimping and procuring are.

"People say that since prostitution has always been around, let's legalize it and take care of the women. This infuriates me every time I hear it. First of all, whoever wants to legalize prostitution is lending a hand to trafficking. You can't separate the two.

"So these criminals who are trading in human beings will now be considered legitimate businessmen? Upstanding citizens who are called up to the Torah on Shabbat? Pillars of the community? If the pimps become legitimate, tax-paying citizens, then the state becomes a mega-pimp.

"Third, by making prostitution legal and normative, we'd be removing the last inhibitions that people may have, so there will be a greater demand and actually increased criminality. After all, these are not people who want to pay taxes."

She continues, "It has also always been said that slavery can't be eradicated - so should we institutionalize it? We can't eradicate domestic violence, so should we make it legal? And incest has been around forever, too - so should we make incest legal?"

The suggestion wouldn't be made if prostitutes weren't women, Gal-On believes.

"No one is suggesting that we allow drug dealers to legally launder their money. Or gun runners. It's more acceptable to think of institutionalizing prostitution because it involves women and women's bodies."

While protecting the women and criminalizing the pimps, the committee has also devoted attention to the "Johns" (the clients).

"We like to delude ourselves and think that most of the Johns are foreign workers or Palestinians. But they're not. They majority are Israeli Jews - secular and religious, from all ethnic backgrounds."

The committee, Gal-On says, has had numerous discussions about this issue.

"There are a million visits to prostitutes every month. This means that men rape women every day. Some of them rape women several times a day. We've considered criminalizing them, but I think that before we make it a criminal offense to visit a prostitute, we have to work on public opinion, to get men to realize that they have to find other ways to fulfill their sexual needs. There are models of such campaigns in other cities, and we will be studying them in the fall.

"I believe that it will be possible to affect the way the public views the issue. We've already brought about changes in the way the authorities behave toward the women. At first, they treated them like criminals, because of their illegal status in the country. But now, through concerted efforts, the police and the courts recognize they are victims. If we were able to change official opinions on this issue, we should be able to create a shift in public opinion."

Such a shift, she believes, is crucial, pointing to a recent survey conducted by the Information Center at the Knesset and the Dahaf Institute's Mina Tzemah, which found that a majority of the public does not make a connection between trafficking in women and the violation of human rights.

"Israelis see this as an issue for foreigners - foreign workers, illegal residents, foreign prostitutes. And those who do object to trafficking mostly do so for moral or moralistic reasons."

She is thus especially proud of a shelter the government has established to care for the victims of the sex trade.

"The moment the state established the shelter, it was making a statement that Israel views these women as victims. In the shelter, the women are protected from the men who abused them and could try to harm or even kill them because they have agreed to testify against them. They also receive all of the services they need, such as medical treatment, psychological aid and even professional training and education."

Today, there are nearly 50 women in the shelter. Gal-On notes, however, that the shelter only accepts women who are waiting to testify; women who refuse or are unable to testify are held in a separate facility where they are protected, but not entitled to the same services. She is campaigning for all the women to be admitted to the full-service shelter.

DESPITE THE State Department's critique, Gal-On does not believe that Israel is in any way "special" with regard to trafficking in women.

"Israel is part of a world-wide phenomenon," she says. "But for many years, it was virtually risk-free to traffic here, because Israel didn't have anti-trafficking legislation."

The reason for this, she explains, is "because we never had to, since we didn't have a history of slavery in this country."

The massive aliya from Russia, she adds, facilitated the phenomenon, because the women trafficked from the FSU were able to blend in with the genuine immigrants.

Israel's criminal code was amended to specifically address trafficking. Since then, Gal-On has brought some 17 legislative changes in the Knesset, and says that Israel now has some of the most progressive legislation in the world. And when judges were unwilling to impose stiff sentences on the pimps and procurers, she made sure that legislation mandating minimum sentencing was also passed.

Proposals currently in committee include empowering the state to repossess property obtained through the profits of trafficking and a comprehensive proposal that would apply to all forms of coercion - whether ill treatment of foreign workers, organ theft or any other type of behavior that denies a human being his or her freedom.

"Human rights are simply not divisible," she says. "Trafficking is enslavement, and it is a violation of a woman's human rights."

Thanks to new legislation and heightened awareness, Gal-On claims, the police have increased their activity and are catching more of the pimps and procurers before they manage to force the women into slavery. In the past, women were smuggled in through the airport and seaports, but police have cut off most of the activity through these entrances. Today, most women are smuggled in through the Philadelphi corridor, under the nose - and tacit approval - of the Egyptians.

In its report, the State Department criticized Israel for not having established any specific task force or authority to deal with trafficking. Gal-On responds that she has proposed creating a central, statutory authority to coordinate among all relevant ministries and offices to initiate educational campaigns and promote human rights.

The proposal has yet to pass its first reading.

Summing up, Gal-On sighs. "People must realize that prostitution is first and foremost a form of violence against women," she says emphatically. "It is a denial of a woman's right to dignity and physical and mental well-being. How can Israel consider itself a democracy if people in our midst are treated this way?"

LOAD-DATE: October 4, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Photo: ZAHAVA GAL-ON. 'We like to delude ourselves and think that most of the Johns are foreign workers or Palestinians. But they're not.' (Credit: Ariel Jerozolinski/The Jerusalem Post)

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

27 of 359 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

August 30, 2005 Tuesday 5:43 AM EST

REP. SMITH URGES STRENGTHENING OF HUMAN TRAFFICKING LAWS

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 656 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J. (4th CD), issued the following press release:

Rep. Chris Smith (R-NJ), author of two landmark laws to combat human trafficking and aid the victims of this horrible crime, said September is an "important month" for two key efforts to combat human trafficking - one in Congress and one in the United Nations.

Smith urged his colleagues in Congress to move forward on H.R. 972 - the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2005 - which he introduced in February 2005. This legislation will reauthorize appropriations for anti-trafficking programs in the United States and abroad and offers solutions to specific scenarios where additional initiatives are needed to combat trafficking problems including occurrences of sexual exploitation by UN peacekeepers. Smith renewed his call after Louise Arbour - the U.N. High Commissioner for Human Rights - said at the Asia-Pacific human rights conference in Beijing that human trafficking is on the rise worldwide.

"We have made significant progress over the past few years to combat human trafficking, through stronger laws, increased awareness, and better law enforcement but we must fortify and expand our efforts to end this international horror," said Smith, who was appointed Special Representative for Human Trafficking for the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe Parliamentary Assembly in 2004. "It remains essential for Congress to pass the 2005 Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act so that law enforcement can continue to liberate the unfortunate women and children who are forced and coerced into slavery."

Smith has long championed efforts to eliminate human trafficking. In fall 2000, the President signed into law Smith's Trafficking Victims Protection Act which gave U.S. authorities explicit tools and powers to prosecute traffickers. Specifically, the bill created the Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP) produced by the Department of State which ranks countries according to their efforts to combat trafficking around the world into three tiers. Countries listed on Tier 3 - the lowest ranking - are failing to make significant efforts to combat human trafficking and, as a consequence, may be denied non-humanitarian U.S. aid. HR 972 contains new provisions targeted at preventing the well-documented problem of trafficking in persons, and sexual exploitation and abuse in connection with peacekeeping operations.

In March 2005, - as Chairman of the Subcommittee on Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations - Smith held hearings about the 150 allegations of gross sexual misconduct and exploitation of refugees by UN peacekeepers and civilian personnel assigned to the UN peacekeeping mission in the Democratic Republic of Congo. Abuses typically involved peacekeepers' sexual contact with Congolese women and girls, some as young as 11, in exchange for food or small sums of money. In recent years, the UN has struggled to deal with similar allegations in Sierra Leone, Liberia, Guinea, Kosovo, and Bosnia and Herzegovina.

Smith maintained that the UN must act quickly to prevent trafficking and sexual exploitation by its own personnel. He noted that the UN General Assembly is scheduled to meet from September 14-17. "Actions must speak louder than words, and the UN owes it to the victims of peacekeeper misconduct to act and adopt a binding uniform code of conduct for all peacekeeping personnel," he said. Smith also noted that the UN needs to put in place a comprehensive plan for victim assistance. "If a peacekeeper fathers a child, he should pay child support, and troop contributing countries should be obligated to enforce this," said Smith.

For additional information about Representative Chris Smith's global human rights efforts and his continued fight against human trafficking please visit <http://www.house.gov/chris-smith/>.

Contact: Brad Dayspring, 202/225-3765.

LOAD-DATE: September 2, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2005 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

28 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Seattle Times (Washington)

August 25, 2005, Thursday

John Miller takes on the slave trade

BYLINE: By Alicia Mundy

SECTION: WASHINGTON DATELINE

LENGTH: 2750 words

WASHINGTON _ In the lives of public figures, there are make-or-break moments when one has a nanosecond to choose candor or caution. When advisers counsel a politician to fake laryngitis before speaking from the gut.

But John Miller did not have a posse of political advisers on hand last September when the cameras were rolling at the State Department and he was face-to-face with a hard-nosed investigative reporter. The reporter came bearing videotape showing that Miller and his boss, Secretary of State Colin Powell, had been made fools in the international community by one of America's rich allies in the Middle East.

Miller, President George W. Bush's ambassador for human-trafficking issues, had just publicly given his seal of approval to the United Arab Emirates. Home of several internationally famous camel races, the U.A.E. had officially banned the kidnapping and abuse of young boys as camel jockeys for millionaire enthusiasts. Miller had lauded the country as "a model for the region." Powell offered praise, too.

Now Miller was facing Emmy-winning TV correspondent Bernard Goldberg. Goldberg's crew from HBO Sports had just returned from the U.A.E., where they had gone undercover to examine the lives _ and deaths _ of the littlest riders.

As Miller watched their tape, the images unfolded; tiny boys, some as young as 3, skinny and scared, rode and fell from camels as trainers screamed. They slept six to 10 in a room on the floor, or outside on the sand; if their weight passed 50 pounds, they were discarded. A 6-year-old trampled by a camel had been sent back to Pakistan in a box.

Kidnapped from their homes or sold by their families in Pakistan, or Bangladesh, they had no way to escape and no place to go if they did. One 7-year-old showed his bruised rear end, where he had been sodomized by his trainer.

"When you look at that what do you think?" Goldberg asked.

Quietly, shaking his head slowly, Miller denounced the "slavery" of the little boys.

But when Goldberg pressed him on the U.A.E.'s role as an ally, Miller turned feisty. "I will tell you this. From what I know of the president and the secretary of state's feelings about the slavery issue, the fact that a government is a friend or an ally is not gonna keep this government from speaking out.

"And it isn't gonna keep me from speaking out," he said.

The interview could have been a disaster for Miller's credibility. But when the show ran a month later, Goldberg declared Miller "a real straight shooter."

Recently, Goldberg elaborated: "I've only interviewed about 20 million people in my time. He was furious that he'd been lied to about this. He just came through as the real deal."

The real deal. Of course.

Twenty years ago, John Miller was a mild-mannered Republican congressman representing Seattle. He was sincere, intellectual, decent. And perhaps just a bit of a milquetoast.

Today, Mr. Milquetoast storms the back alleys of Calcutta, the gutters and red-light districts of Cambodia and Indonesia with a team of true believers from the State Department and human-rights groups, asking young girls about being forced into prostitution, listening to them describe indescribable acts, looking to change their futures.

His constituents now are Arab domestic maids and Russian construction workers forced into servitude in places as different as Kuwait and Israel.

The crusader's cause is quite fashionable now. Christian conservatives have embraced the mission as a natural extension of their moral agenda. Orthodox Jews have joined in, along with Southern Republicans and New York Democrats, Hollywood stars, arch-feminist Gloria Steinem and born-again ex-congresswoman Linda Smith of Vancouver, Wash.

Bush and his White House advisers on religious issues began pulling moral themes as part of a crossover political-cultural agenda in 2001, and they pounced on trafficking as a win-win, thrusting a fledgling Clinton concept into the limelight. Miller's advent at TIP, the Trafficking In Persons Office, was intended to raise the program's profile. The title "ambassador" was a White House signal that Bush was taking diplomacy in a new direction. With a kinder, gentler Condoleezza Rice as the new boss at State since January, it's touting humanitarian issues, democracy, women's rights and AIDS relief.

The TIP office is presented as a success story. Nearly 90 nations have signed agreements to stop trafficking, and other countries prosecuted some 3,000 offenders last year. Miller's office has even bucked centuries of unspoken military tradition by persuading the Pentagon to pledge it will enforce a long-standing ban on U.S. troops overseas visiting brothels.

But if naivete is considered a virtue, John Miller may be among the purest men alive.

Does "the real deal" have any real power?

And even if the White House is behind him, some question what Miller can actually accomplish as the official scold.

First, some human-rights groups, AIDS activists and politicians complain that Miller is White House window dressing for President Bush's push to promote his personal Christian agenda around the globe. For instance, the White House recently demanded that AIDS organizations sign a pledge against prostitution before they receive federal grants. This infuriated health groups trying to organize sex workers to push for condoms and health care to control HIV.

On top of that, Miller is treading on some State Department toes with a target list of traffickers that reads like a who's who of America's sweethearts: Israel, Japan, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait; the Netherlands and United Nations peacekeepers.

Miller even finds himself at odds with one of the most reputable philanthropic organizations in the world, the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation, because it has given money to an Indian sex-workers union that Miller and others say is part of the problem.

Finally, Miller may be trying to help prostitutes and indentured servants find a way out. But for hundreds of thousands in poverty, prostitution and servitude is a way out.

Miller acknowledges the skeptics, the critics: "I understand what you are asking, can we really make a difference?" he says. "I looked into the face of a girl who was rescued. Do I tell her that her other life wasn't so bad?"

Miller always wanted to save the world. Now he's doing it _ one child, one housemaid, one hooker at a time.

In Miller's frenetic efforts to find his mission, he bounced from cause to case, occasionally dropping out of sight. Friends would ask: "Whatever happened to John Miller? They should have asked: "Whatever didn't happen to John Miller?"

He's been a lawyer and a Seattle City Councilman, a TV commentator, state attorney general candidate, baseball columnist and wanna-be baseball-team owner. He's also been a conservative think tank-er, Yeshiva teacher, late-blooming father, John McCain supporter and, now, ambassador.

When many people think "ambassador," they think Gregory Peck in "The Omen," a debonaire diplomat with graying temples, tall and erect in sartorial splendor. That is not John Miller.

He's tall, but he walks with his neck pitched forward, cranium bent, giving the impression he's in a hurry to charge into the next briefing head first. At 67, his hair is thinning. The furrows of his sloping brow are deep enough to bowl in; he fidgets; in meetings, he repeatedly removes his wire-rimmed glasses and replaces them absentmindedly.

But when he talks, he is commanding. His huge hands swing wildly as he makes a point, causing staffers to surreptitiously move coffee cups and microphones aside. His hazel eyes sparkle when he gets animated, and his smile isn't the coy stuff of diplomacy, it's open and wide. A laugher's smile.

Miller was destined for Seattle from the fourth grade. He was in Public School 6 in Manhattan, and the geography lesson that day was on Puget Sound.

"It looked wonderful," says Miller. "It said the climate was 'temperate.' I looked up 'temperate' and said, 'That's where I'm going to live.'"

That night his New Yorker mother told him he'd fuggeddaboutit in two weeks.

This is John Miller: He went to his room, marked it on the calendar for two weeks hence, and a fortnight later announced again his intention to live there. When he was finishing Yale Law School, he jumped at an offer from a firm in Seattle.

And so Seattle welcomed the son of Russian-Ukrainian Jews, the GOP moderate with a Sierra Club-friendly environmental agenda.

Miller hooked up with GOP progressives such as Bruce Chapman, and worked for good-government initiatives on the City Council.

Next, he became a commentator for KIRO-TV. It wore him down. "I panicked that one morning I would not have anything to say _ and they would only let me fall back on baseball just so much."

Ah, baseball. In the early 1980s, Miller was teamed with George Weigel to produce a baseball column for The Seattle Weekly. Today, Weigel is one of the world's best known conservative Catholic scholars. They spent spring training with the Mariners, but they didn't produce Proust.

Miller careened back into politics in 1984, and won the 1st District Congressional seat. He became a leader of the Human Rights Caucus. When Microsoft and Boeing were lobbying for most-favored-nation status for China, Miller lectured their executives over human-rights abuses there.

In 1988, his good-guy instincts almost cost him re-election. His opponent, Seattle teachers-union president Reese Lindquist, unleashed a nasty TV ad linking Miller's stand on drug sentencing with a body in a morgue.

"We'd heard a lot of rumors about Lindquist," recalls Miller's former press secretary, Anna Perez. There were allegations that Lindquist, married with children, was too interested in teenage boys. "People were trying to give us information," but Miller wouldn't let the staff pursue it, says Perez, now PR chief for NBC Universal. In 1992, Lindquist pleaded to soliciting sex from a minor. That same year, Miller bowed out of politics. He was 54, tired of commuting coast to coast, and he and his wife, June, had adopted a little boy.

During his "missing years," Miller became involved with the Discovery Institute, a Seattle-based conservative-leaning think tank, and headed its board from 2000-2002. He also unsuccessfully attempted to buy a farm team and make his field of dreams in Kitsap County. In 2002, Miller was teaching at the Northwest Yeshiva High School on Mercer Island when he learned that the Bush White House wanted him to head the Trafficking In Persons Office. The approval was held up for several months after the White House noticed that Miller had been a McCain supporter in the 2000 presidential primary, but it was finally OK'd. Last year, he and his wife divorced. They remain friends. There was no one else, he says. Just his job.

So, while many diplomats party hop after work, Miller schleps on the Metro to his spartan apartment in an Arlington high-rise canyon and grabs the five-buck stroganoff special at a nearby noodle cafe.

There's a nine-hour difference between Kuwait and Washington, D.C., and an even greater difference of opinion. A video conference has been arranged for Miller and his team to explain to Kuwait why it has landed on the bottom tier of this year's Trafficking In Persons report, an annual review of all nations' efforts to curtail traffickers. The three-tier TIP rankings rankle some countries. As the screen opens, a huddle of irritated journalists is staring back from Kuwait City. The trafficking crisis in Kuwait is so bad that Bangladeshi servants and construction workers recently rioted in front of their embassy, seeking help to escape employers or get paid.

But the Kuwaiti journalists jump on Miller. They want to know: Who is the United States to tell us what we should do inside our country?

The aim, Miller finally tells them, is to "create discussion."

That's all?

No, Miller explains later. "We hope they will respond to the "name and shame" factor.

For instance, Japan and Korea were embarrassed to land low on an earlier list.

Japan was issuing "entertainment" visas to tens of thousands of Philippine women. "I mean, how many 'dancers' do they need to import?" Miller asked. Japan passed laws against trafficking. But the TIP report was trashed in the Saudi press. And inside the State Department there were tense meetings over its ranking.

On the new TIP list, the U.A.E. shot from first tier to third. "We were duped last year," Miller explains.

The U.A.E. responded by pulling in a powerful Republican lobbyist, former Minnesota Rep. Vin Weber, to jawbone Miller. Weber says he and Miller are working with the U.A.E. on a plan to get them re-upgraded. The U.A.E. has been negotiating a free-trade agreement and doesn't want TIP sanctions to get in the way.

But here's the realistic issue facing "the real deal." The U.A.E. is an important staging area for America in the Middle East. U-2 spy planes are based there, and it risks terrorist attacks to act as a go-between with Arab leaders. Miller says, "It always comes down to Realpolitik versus real rights. But it's not a 'piddly' issue. This is human rights. Playing favorites is not an option."

Still, the question begs: Once the report comes out, does anything really happen? A tier-three country gets three months to show a desire to improve its status or the United States may impose sanctions.

Or not.

Only tiny Equatorial Guinea and Venezuela, whose president is disliked by the Bush administration, have faced them.

John Miller minces no words. The Gates Foundation is, he says, "unintentionally, underwriting the enslavement of children" in India.

Girls and boys are in demand in bordellos, he explains, because brothel owners want disease-free workers for their clients. Condoms are supposed to be provided, but pimps and madams tell clients that for a few rupees more, they can go rubber-free. Plus, there's always a market for virgins.

The Gates Foundation set up a $200 million program in 2003 to prevent the spread of AIDS in several countries, including India. Grantees include sex-worker associations.

"They are very well-intentioned," says Miller. But he claims that one Gates grant recipient, the DMSC, the sex workers union of Calcutta, is really helping brothel owners maintain control in the red-light district.

In fact, in January 2004 while Melinda Gates was visiting India, union members attacked Calcutta police attempting to rescue a 14-year-old prostitute who was being held against her will, according to The Times of India.

Miller was so annoyed with DMSC, he met with Bill Gates, Sr., wrote an op-ed piece in The Seattle Times and sent Gates a letter last February.

"Many DMSC members are older prostitutes (who) become madams or brothel owners themselves and rely on revenues generated by children," he said. "There is also evidence that the DMSC leadership has strong contacts with organized crime."

The foundation's representative, Dr. Helene Gayle, says a million dollars went to the DMSC before the new $200 million project, and that the focus should be on the overall work that is done.

"You do everything you can to see that you are not supporting a group that is in league with the people who enslave the girls," she said. But she did not explain how the foundation vetted the union.

Still, for many impoverished people, it is better to be inside a brothel than outside one, begging.

Prostitutes are protesting in the streets of Korea for their rights. Belgium wants to join the Dutch in legalizing prostitution to curb violence and AIDS. There are marches in India for it.

What could be wrong with helping groups who want to organize sex workers and better the conditions for prostitutes?

Miller's answer: "Look, for hundreds of years there was a group of well-intentioned reformers who said, 'We must get the slaves better mattresses, ventilation, doctors, food, and register the slaves.' They reported back to the queen of England that the slaves were happy.

"They were right in trying to improve conditions. But that cannot be a substitute for abolishing slavery."

He sighs. "I know our embassies have other things on their plate. Freedom and slavery is not always at the top of the agenda."

He pauses. "You think I'm naive? Maybe. Maybe."

But, he adds, "It shouldn't be naive to want to do the right thing."

—

Visit The Seattle Times Extra on the World Wide Web at <http://www.seattletimes.com/>

LOAD-DATE: August 25, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

KR-ACC-NO: K0222

JOURNAL-CODE: SE

Copyright 2005 Knight Ridder/Tribune News Service
Knight Ridder/Tribune News Service
Copyright 2005 The Seattle Times

29 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Nation

August 24, 2005 Wednesday

CURBING HUMAN TRAFFICKING

LENGTH: 373 words

THE plan to check human smuggling and illegal immigration, be it under foreign pressure or the prevailing of sanity in the Interior Ministry, is a welcome step. If a 'glass half-full' view is taken, the fallout of 9/11 and the London bombings have improved the working of the Ministry when it comes to increased trafficking-related prosecutions and convictions, and strengthened implementation of its 2002 Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance.

In addition to Interior Minister Aftab Sherpao's approval to operate a Task Force Action Plan against illegal immigration and human trade across Pakistan-Iran border, the statement by the Minister of State for Overseas Pakistanis, Senator Tariq Azeem, that gangs involved in trafficking of Pakistani children would be arrested, shows a wholesome approach towards eliminating dangerous elements. During the return of 22 children out of 250 in the first batch in June, the media was helpful in creating awareness for these undernourished children and placed the spotlight on the working of the law enforcement agencies responsible for checking human trade. That 10,000 Pakistani children could be smuggled to the Middle East indicates the flaws in the system. Human smuggling takes place mostly with the connivance of immigration and custom officials. Now that the federal government has identified 92 traffickers, including government officials, it would serve as a warning for others involved in the heinous crime. Last year the USA removed Pakistan from its watchlist on human trafficking but pressed Islamabad to do more to stamp out the practice.

In 2004, 479 trafficking-related cases were registered, 289 individuals arrested, 248 court cases filed and 72 convictions obtained - a significant improvement over the six convictions obtained in 2003.

In the wake of the London bombings there is fresh pressure to check extremist elements entering porous borders. Other than prosecuting illegal immigrants and gangs, the new regulations for the implementation of Pakistan's 2002 anti-trafficking law oblige the government to provide assistance to trafficking victims and allocate funding for their repatriation. We have to put our house in order if we want others to stop pointing fingers.

LOAD-DATE: August 25, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Trafficking/Smuggling

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2005 News Bites Pty Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

Global News Bites

30 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Nation (Pakistan)

August 24, 2005 Wednesday

EDITORIAL: Curbing human trafficking

SECTION: Nationwide International News

LENGTH: 378 words

DATELINE: August 24

THE plan to check human smuggling and illegal immigration, be it under foreign pressure or the prevailing of sanity in the Interior Ministry, is a welcome step.

If a 'glass half-full' view is taken, the fallout of 9/11 and the London bombings have improved the working of the Ministry when it comes to increased trafficking-related prosecutions and convictions, and strengthened implementation of its 2002 Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance.

In addition to Interior Minister Aftab Sherpao's approval to operate a Task Force Action Plan against illegal immigration and human trade across Pakistan-Iran border, the statement by the Minister of State for Overseas Pakistanis, Senator Tariq Azeem, that gangs involved in trafficking of Pakistani children would be arrested, shows a wholesome approach towards eliminating dangerous elements.

During the return of 22 children out of 250 in the first batch in June, the media was helpful in creating awareness for these undernourished children and placed the spotlight on the working of the law enforcement agencies responsible for checking human trade.

That 10,000 Pakistani children could be smuggled to the Middle East indicates the flaws in the system. Human smuggling takes place mostly with the connivance of immigration and custom officials. Now that the federal government has identified 92 traffickers, including government officials, it would serve as a warning for others involved in the heinous crime.

Last year the USA removed Pakistan from its watchlist on human trafficking but pressed Islamabad to do more to stamp out the practice. In 2004, 479 trafficking-related cases were registered, 289 individuals arrested, 248 court cases filed and 72 convictions obtained - a significant improvement over the six convictions obtained in 2003.

In the wake of the London bombings there is fresh pressure to check extremist elements entering porous borders. Other than prosecuting illegal immigrants and gangs, the new regulations for the implementation of Pakistan's 2002 anti-trafficking law oblige the government to provide assistance to trafficking victims and allocate funding for their repatriation. We have to put our house in order if we want others to stop pointing fingers.

LOAD-DATE: August 26, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

31 of 359 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

August 19, 2005 Friday

BUSH APPOINTS SPECIAL ENVOY ON HUMAN RIGHTS IN NORTH KOREA

BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 560 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the State Department: President Bush has appointed Jay Lefkowitz as the U.S. special envoy for human rights in North Korea, the White House said in an announcement released August 19. Lefkowitz, an attorney, served as deputy assistant to the president and director of the Domestic Policy Council at the White House. He has been a public member of the U.S. delegation to the U.N. Commission on Human Rights in Geneva.

The special envoy, mandated by the North Korean Human Rights Act of 2004 (Public Law 108-333, October 18, 2004), will work in the State Department's Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights and Labor and report directly to the secretary of state.

The North Korean Human Rights Act of 2004 is intended to promote international cooperation on human rights and refugee protection and increased transparency in the provision of humanitarian assistance to the people of North Korea. It authorizes funds for programs to promote human rights, democracy, rule of law, a market economy and freedom of information.

"Mr. Lefkowitz will increase awareness and promote efforts to improve the human rights of the long-suffering North Korean people," a senior administration official told the press on background August 19.

According to the official, the special envoy will meet with international organizations and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) to promote coordinated humanitarian activities in North Korea and "will also engage with North Korea on human rights concerns."

Lefkowitz plans to increase broadcasting by Radio Free Asia into North Korea and will travel to the region, the official said.

Asked if Lefkowitz's appointment would have any bearing on the Six-Party Talks to end North Korea's nuclear program, the official said the envoy would coordinate his activities with the chief U.S. negotiator for the talks, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill.

North Korea remains one of the most repressive countries in the world and stands in stark contrast to democratic governments elsewhere in Asia, according to the State Department's report Supporting Human Rights and Democracy: The U.S. Record 2004-2005.

The report estimates 150,000-200,000 persons are being held for political reasons in detention camps in remote areas where prisoners have died from torture, starvation, disease, exposure or a combination of these causes.

"The regime controls many aspects of citizens' lives, denying freedom of speech, religion, the press, assembly and association," the report says. "The regime also severely restricts freedom of movement and worker rights."

In the State Department's 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report, North Korea was rated as a Tier 3 country, the least favorable rating. Tier 3 is reserved for countries whose governments not only fail to implement international standards but fail to make progress in prosecuting rampant trafficking and engage in acts such as state-sanctioned use of forced labor.

The announcement is available on the White House Web site.

See the State Department Web site for copies of Supporting Human Rights and Democracy: The U.S. Record 2004-2005 and the 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report.

(The Washington File is a product of the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State. Web site: <http://usinfo.state.gov>)

LOAD-DATE: August 23, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 States News Service

32 of 359 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

August 19, 2005 Friday 6:03 AM EST

BUSH APPOINTS SPECIAL ENVOY ON HUMAN RIGHTS IN NORTH KOREA

BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 573 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's International Information Programs issued the following press release:

By Todd Bullock

Washington File Staff Writer

President Bush has appointed Jay Lefkowitz as the U.S. special envoy for human rights in North Korea, the White House said in an announcement released August 19.

Lefkowitz, an attorney, served as deputy assistant to the president and director of the Domestic Policy Council at the White House. He has been a public member of the U.S. delegation to the U.N. Commission on Human Rights in Geneva.

The special envoy, mandated by the North Korean Human Rights Act of 2004 (Public Law 108-333, October 18, 2004), will work in the State Department's Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights and Labor and report directly to the secretary of state.

The North Korean Human Rights Act of 2004 is intended to promote international cooperation on human rights and refugee protection and increased transparency in the provision of humanitarian assistance to the people of North Korea. It authorizes funds for programs to promote human rights, democracy, rule of law, a market economy and freedom of information.

"Mr. Lefkowitz will increase awareness and promote efforts to improve the human rights of the long-suffering North Korean people," a senior administration official told the press on background August 19.

According to the official, the special envoy will meet with international organizations and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) to promote coordinated humanitarian activities in North Korea and "will also engage with North Korea on human rights concerns."

Lefkowitz plans to increase broadcasting by Radio Free Asia into North Korea and will travel to the region, the official said.

Asked if Lefkowitz's appointment would have any bearing on the Six-Party Talks to end North Korea's nuclear program, the official said the envoy would coordinate his activities with the chief U.S. negotiator for the talks, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill.

North Korea remains one of the most repressive countries in the world and stands in stark contrast to democratic governments elsewhere in Asia, according to the State Department's report Supporting Human Rights and Democracy: The U.S. Record 2004-2005.

The report estimates 150,000-200,000 persons are being held for political reasons in detention camps in remote areas where prisoners have died from torture, starvation, disease, exposure or a combination of these causes.

"The regime controls many aspects of citizens' lives, denying freedom of speech, religion, the press, assembly and association," the report says. "The regime also severely restricts freedom of movement and worker rights."

In the State Department's 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report, North Korea was rated as a Tier 3 country, the least favorable rating. Tier 3 is reserved for countries whose governments not only fail to implement international standards but fail to make progress in prosecuting rampant trafficking and engage in acts such as state-sanctioned use of forced labor.

The announcement is available on the White House Web site at <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2005/08/20050819.html>

See the State Department Web site for copies of Supporting Human Rights and Democracy: The U.S. Record 2004-2005 at <http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/shrd/2004/> and the 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report at <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/tiprpt/2005/>

LOAD-DATE: August 21, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2005 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

33 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Pakistan Newswire

August 11, 2005 Thursday

Collective efforts sought for curbing human trafficking

SECTION: Nationwide International NewsLENGTH: 599 wordsDATELINE: Karachi, August 11

Participants at a meeting on human trafficking Thursday terming poverty, lack of awareness and biased traditional customs basic causes of human trafficking, stressed need for provoking awareness among people on their legal rights and physical and mental hazards they may encounter in wake of being potential trafficking victim.

The meeting arranged by International Organization for Migration (IOM) here to discuss Pakistan Thematic Group on Human Trafficking (PTGHT)'s finding in face of a Position Paper, unanimously agreed collective measures were required on part of government functionaries and society to curb this menace.

Representatives of NGOs, lawyers association, Human Rights Commission of Pakistan, Federal Investigation Agency (FIA), Sindh Government and labour community participated in IOM's last round of discussions, aimed at receiving inputs from various stakeholders for devising an effective strategy.

Shameela Ahmed, Project Coordinator PTGHT, said the anti-trafficking campaign should cover restriction of trafficking, protection and rehabilitation of victims and legal prosecution of traffickers. "Position Paper was compiled after various brain storming sessions on Pakistan's legal position on human trafficking, causes, implications and it's strategic location as a source, transit and destination country for trafficking", she said.

She said Pakistan was being used for human trafficking of vulnerable people, especially women and children, to Middle East and other destinations. Whereas, she added, it was also a destination for women being trafficked from Bangladesh, Afghanistan, Myanmar and Nepal.

She emphasized that while efforts were required within Pakistan, it was essentially important for regional countries to compound anti-trafficking activities for making any long-lasting impact.

Interior Minister Aftab Ahmed Khan Sherpao has already expressed commitment for devising National Strategy for countering human trafficking in Pakistan in light of recommendations and measures suggested in PTGHT's position paper, she said.

The position paper quotes Deputy Director Law, FIA, Muhammad Azam Khan as saying: "FIA, leading institution for anti-trafficking interventions, faces serious concerns in terms of outreach and resources. It has limited staff and vehicles".

However, Monica Steven, also associated with PTGHT, said Pakistani Government was making considerable efforts for tackling human trafficking. She said due to recent developments, Pakistan was removed from US State Department's Tier II (Watch List) on human trafficking.

She too warned against consequences of trafficking, which poses threat to country's security and involved repercussions for public health including transfer of HIV/Aids and other sexually transmitted diseases. Statistics show most victims fall pray to prostitution, she added.

Rasheeda Patel, President PAWLA- women's lawyer association and FIA representatives Shahid Hayat and Siraj Phanswar said it was often hard to ascertain criminals in absence of comprehensive data collection system on human trafficking.

They were of the view that special courts were required to prosecute human traffickers, who were operating massive criminal networks. The meeting said Government along with its tiers, NGOs and legislators should establish a liaison for abolishing causes leading to human trafficking.

They also called for removing socio-economic restraints, which were being used as tools by traffickers for hoodwinking poor masses and selling them into slavery, prostitution and forced labour, abroad.

LOAD-DATE: August 12, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 Pakistan Press International

34 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

August 10, 2005 Wednesday

Nigeria; Human Trafficking: USAID to Spend N140m for Victims

BYLINE: Daily ChampionLENGTH: 213 words

COMMITTED to total eradication of human trafficking in the country, the United States Agency for International Development (USAID) has said it will spend approximately $1 million (about N140 million) to support and reintegrate victims of trafficking as well as promote public awareness on the issue.

The money, which has been budgeted to be spent this year, will also be used to improve capacity of police and immigration officials to detect, investigate and prosecute human traffickers.

Briefing newsmen at the United States (US) Consulate General, the Consulate's Economic/Political Officer, Mr. Eshel William Murad, also disclosed that the embassy, through its Small Grants Fund, recently committed $18,000 to assist non-governmental organisations (NGOs) in educating people in their communities on the dangers of trafficking.

He said Nigeria has been elevated from tier two watchlist status to tier two in the state department's annual international trafficking in persons reports.

The elevation, he said, stemmed from frequent and successful efforts made by the country in fighting human trafficking.

Touching on househelp issue, which many blame on poverty, the Consulate Economic/Political officer insisted that poverty was not the problem.

LOAD-DATE: August 10, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 AllAfrica, Inc.

35 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

August 10, 2005 Wednesday

Nigeria; USAID Votes $1m for Anti-Trafficking War

BYLINE: This DayLENGTH: 326 words

United States Agency for International Development (USAID) has voted about $1 million to "support and re-integrate victims of human trafficking, to promote public awareness, and to improve the capacity of police and immigration officials to detect, investigate, and prosecute traffickers."

This is in addition to the $18,000 already committed by the Embassy through its Small Grants Fund in educating people in their communities.

Economic/Political Officer of the United States Consulate in Nigeria, Mr. Eshel William Murad, revealed this yesterday at the weekly press briefing of the consulate.

According to him, US is also helping to establish state-level working groups, consisting of law enforcement officers, commissioners, community and religious leaders.

He said last week, Ogun State chapter of the working group was inaugurated, but hoped that the Lagos group will be established this week, even as the Ondo group is to be formed next week.

The Department of Labour, he added, is currently working with International Labour Organisation and Cocoa Global Issues Group to withdraw children from hazardous work on cocoa plantations.

He commended the government, non-governmental organisations and concerned communities for the recent elevation of Nigeria from tier two watch list status to tier two in the State Department's annual international trafficking in persons report.

"These rankings reflect the country's will to eliminate trafficking within and across its borders, and serve to help measure how effective US assistance can be in a country," he said.

He added that recently the Lagos zonal Director for National Agency for the Prevention of Trafficking in Persons (NAPTIP) told him that attitudes that led to trafficking are not customary nor traditional.

According to him, the director cited "the 'househelp' syndrome of many Nigerians, who want young girls to act as stewardesses and cooks at home."

LOAD-DATE: August 11, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

36 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

August 8, 2005 Monday

Gambia; National Conference On Human Trafficking

BYLINE: The Independent

LENGTH: 412 words

The first national day conference on the Best Practices to Combat the Trafficking of Children in The Gambia jointly organised by The Gambia Government and United States Embassy in Banjul was recently held at Kairaba Beach Hotel.

The conference brought together about 70 participants drawn from government, civil societies, NCOs and other institutions dealing with children affairs.

In his opening statement, SoS for Health, Tamsir Mbowe said The Gambia Government has been and continues to be committed to the fight against trafficking in persons, especially among children who are subjected to prostitution, terrible mental and physical abuse, which put them at risk of contracting devastating diseases like HIV/Aids.

He said his government has recognised the staggering proportion around the globe, in particular the sub-region. He said solving the problem requires cooperation.

He noted that the government has undertaken several efforts to combat the problem of trafficking, many of which have been aimed specifically at protecting children, ratified several conventions, and is actively working towards combating this problem at both the regional and sub-regional level.

"Currently, government is negotiating draft cooperation agreements with several ECOWAS states to combat child trafficking across the borders in the sub-region in order to conform to the ECOWAS Plan of Action, and has formed a National Task Force to fight against trafficking," he said.

The American Ambassador to The Gambia, Mr. Joseph Stafford emphasised the importance the US Government attached to the trafficking of persons, especially children. He expressed his government's commitment to support all stakeholders to ensure that the humanity wins the fight against this menace. Ambassador Stafford commended the government, NGOs and civil societies for their resolve in the fight against trafficking in person.

Ms Shaye Brown, who is currently on attachment at the American Embassy, said that the US Congress Trafficking Act 2002 among other things noted that wherever a US citizen commits a crime he or she will be prosecuted.

Ms Shaye Brown, who is also responsible for trafficking in Person at the State Department in Washington, said her department prepares a report on countries concerning trafficking in person and send it to the Congress so that countries can be placed correctly on their tiers.

Several papers were presented on how to combat the menace.

LOAD-DATE: August 8, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

37 of 359 DOCUMENTS

International Enforcement Law Reporter

August 2005

U.S. Releases Fifth Annual Human Trafficking Report, Criticizes Persian Gulf Allies

BYLINE: Jed Borod n1

n1 Jed Borod is the assistant editor of the International Enforcement Law Reporter. He received a B.A. in international studies from Johns Hopkins University.

SECTION: HUMAN TRAFFICKING; Vol. 21, No. 8

LENGTH: 1507 words

On Friday, June 3, 2005, the U.S. Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons released the 2005 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, speaking at the press conference announcing the report, called human trafficking nothing less than a modern form of slavery and said that the 2005 TIP report represented the United States deep commitment to stop the brutal crime of human trafficking. n2 n2 Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Remarks at the Release of the Fifth Annual Department of State Trafficking in Persons Report (June 3, 2005) (transcript available online at <http://www.state.gov/secretary/rm/2005/47193.htm>).

Ambassador John R. Miller, Senior Advisor on Trafficking in Persons, echoed Rice's view, calling trafficking synonyms with slavery and affirming that the U.S. Government is committed to taking action in cooperation with other nations to end modern day slavery. n3 n3 Ambassador John R. Miller, Senior Advisor on Trafficking in Persons, Remarks at the Release of the Fifth Annual Department of State Trafficking in Persons Report (June 3, 2005) (transcript available online at <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/rm/2005/47210.htm>).

This 2005 TIP report, released as part of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA), estimates that between 600,000 and 800,000 people are victims of trafficking each year; of this group, 80 percent are female and 50 percent are minors. n4

n4 Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, US Department of State. Trafficking in Persons Report June 2005 (2005) 6. (Hereafter referred to as the TIP Report.)

While the exact number of trafficking victims remains difficult to measure, an earlier CIA report put the number of women involved in sex trafficking for sexual exploitation as high as 2,000,000 n5 n5 Amy O Neil Richard, Center for the Study of Intelligence, International Trafficking in Women to the United States: A Contemporary Manifestation of Slavery and Organized Crime (2000); cited in Susan Tiefenbrum, The Saga of Susannah: A U.S. Remedy for Sex Trafficking in Women: The Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000, 2002 Utah Law Review 111 (2002).

and the 2005 TIP report notes that the 600,000 to 800,000 figure fails to include millions of victims around the world who are trafficked within their own national borders. n6

n6 TIP Report, 6.

This year's report focuses on trafficking for sexual exploitation and trafficking for forced labor, offering a series of case studies that span the globe, as well as country reports, profiles of anti-trafficking NGOs and activists, and a list of international anti-trafficking best practices. The most watched part of the report, however, is the tier list, which ranks countries based on their involvement in human trafficking, their domestic anti-trafficking and victim services laws, and their compliance with U.S. and international anti-trafficking initiatives.

Continuing the rankings metric established by the TVPA, the 2005 report uses a three tier system to rank countries. Countries that follow the TVPA protocol to eliminate trafficking are placed on Tier 1; countries that take some anti-trafficking action but fail to meet the minimum TVPA protocol are placed on Tier 2; and countries that fail to meet the minimum protocol and do not make any substantive anti-trafficking efforts are placed on Tier 3. n7 n7 Lindsay Nordell, House Subcommittee Holds Hearing on Trafficking in Persons, 20 Int L Enforcement L. Rep. 375 (2004).

(The Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2003 also establishes a Tier 2 Watch List, for 2004 Tier 2 countries that have moved to Tier 1, 2004 Tier 3 countries that have moved to Tier 2, and current Tier 2 countries where trafficking is increasing or where anti-trafficking measures are not developed and implemented.) n8

n8 TIP Report, 26.

1. Persian Gulf Countries in the 2005 Report

This year's report places 24 countries in the Tier 1 category, 77 countries in the Tier 2 category, 27 countries in the Tier 2 Special Watch List, and 14 countries in the Tier 3 category. n9

n9 TIP Report, 42.

The placement of a number of American allies in the Persian Gulf Kuwait, Qatar, the United Arab Emirates, and most notably Saudi Arabia into the Tier 3 category in the 2005 TIP Report has drawn international attention and commentary.

The four Persian Gulf countries in Tier 3, all allies in the United States post-9/11 anti-terrorism efforts, were cited as destination countries for traffickers offering men, women, and children for forced labor, especially in the domestic services industry. n10 n10 TIP Report, 137 (Kuwait), 181 (Qatar), 187 (Saudi Arabia), 218 (United Arab Emirates).

Additionally, the report notes that Qatar, the United Arab Emirates, and Kuwait are destination countries for young boys forced to work as camel racing jockeys.

Ambassador Miller devoted special attention to the trafficking situation in Saudi Arabia, a staunch American ally, saying that the country's problem was serious. n11 n11 Gary G. Yerkey. U.S. Threatens FTA Partners in Gulf War with Sanctions over Human Trafficking, Daily Rep. For Exec., June 6, 2005, at A9.

According to the TIP Report, Saudi Arabia is host to numerous trafficking victims brought to the country to provide labor. In a 2004 report entitled Bad Dreams: Exploitation and Abuse of Migrant Workers in Saudi Arabia, Human Rights Watch noted that these foreign workers were subjected to abysmal and exploitative working conditions, sexual violence, and human rights abuses in the criminal justice system.

2. Analysis

Human trafficking is a widely acknowledged international problem resulting from the complex interaction of a number of legal, political, social, and economic forces. In the United States, anti-trafficking efforts are relatively uncontroversial, enjoying support from political groups that are normally opposed to international legal initiatives such as the International Criminal Court.

The 2005 TIP Report comes at a time when the United States faces increasing international criticism, some of which comes from traditional American allies like the United Kingdom. This criticism focuses on America's military intervention and continued presence in Iraq and the alleged human rights violations occurring at the interrogation facilities located at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba.

This contentious political climate may undermine the power of the TIP report. Many of the Tier 3 countries have deplorable human rights records and are unlikely to respond to American overtures for anti-trafficking cooperation: Cuba, North Korea, and Burma are three such examples. The United States has attempted to soften the unilateral nature of their anti-trafficking efforts, repeatedly explaining that the TIP report is not designed to result in sanctions ... [but] to get progress, and acknowledging America's own internal labor and sex trafficking problems. n12

n12 Ambassador John R. Miller, Senior Advisor on Trafficking in Persons, Remarks at the Release of the Fifth Annual Department of State Trafficking in Persons Report (June 3, 2005) (transcript available online at <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/rm/2005/47210.htm>).

Nevertheless, the current international climate raises the possibility that perceptions of American hypocrisy or unilateralism will subvert the goals of the anti-trafficking program.

Given this situation, the decision to include the four Persian Gulf countries in Tier 3 is all the more surprising. Tom Malinowski, advocacy director at Human Rights Watch in Washington, told the WASHINGTON POST that the Tier 3 status of the Gulf states is ... another positive sign that the administration is willing to be honest and straight-forward about the shortcomings of its allies in the Arab world, including Saudi Arabia. n13 n13 Glenn Kessler. Saudis Rebuked on Forced Labor, Washington Post, June 4, 2005, at A10.

Interested observers should continue to monitor State Department human rights and anti-trafficking reports, as they may serve as a proxy for shifts in American foreign policy. In addition, the anti-trafficking reports enable professionals to identify problems in efforts to apply international anti-trafficking requirements, and to review the trends of traffickers and government officials. The success or failure of the 2005 report in generating meaningful international enforcement cooperation on anti-trafficking measures will also offer a useful measure of America's moral and diplomatic authority on human rights issues in the contemporary political climate.

LOAD-DATE: August 16, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 International Enforcement Law Reporter

38 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Pakistan Newswire

August 1, 2005 Monday

Interior Ministry sets up Inter-Agency Passport body to tackle human trafficking

SECTION: Nationwide International NewsLENGTH: 413 wordsDATELINE: LAHORE, August 1-

In order to curb the menace of human trafficking properly, the Interior Ministry has set up Inter-Agency Passport committee headed by Director General Federal Investigation Agency (FIA).

It would prepare a National Plan of Action to tackle the issue, which would be presented in the Interior Ministry's meeting scheduled for August 15.

Director General FIA Tariq Pervaiz disclosed this while talking to newsmen at the Agency's regional headquarters here on Monday. He along with FIA officials heard public complaints against the FIA officials and issued orders on the spot on the pending inquiries.

"Viewing the increasing incidents of human trafficking from Gujranwala Division, the FIA has decided to set up a Passport Circle Office at Gujrat to eliminate the gangs involved in this heinous crime. A database of human traffickers, proclaimed offenders and their cronies would be formed and to round them up from abroad FIA would seek the help of Interpol," the DG said.

Mr. Pervaiz said that there were more 7000 Pakistanis detained in Turkey for entering there illegally while Iran was expelling a number of people, who were either national of Bangladesh, India, Afghanistan, at our borders. "However, a joint tripartite Pak-Iran-Turkey ministerial committee has been constituted to tackle the issue amicably instead of creating any rift among the three Muslim brotherly countries. While, the FIA has considerably been succeeded in controlling the illegal human trafficking."

The DG said that the US has deleted Pakistan's name from its Watch List of Human Trafficking due to the concerted recent efforts and raids by the Agency as a number of culprits have been nabbed and their groups busted. The British government had threatened to reduce its flights from Pakistan, however, up to 40 percent incidents of human trafficking to UK have been reduced, he said.

He said the FIA was able to check properly the rising menace of copyrights at Karachi, which was not only recognized at domestic level rather at internationally. Besides, he said, the focus was given on improving the departmental efficiency, adding that during a couple of years as many as 40 FIA officials up to Inspector rank were sacked, mostly due to their linkage with human traffickers. However, it was imperative to pour more funds for enhancing the capacity building of the Agency, of which 750 personnel have been transferred to the National Accountability Bureau (NAB), the DG said.

LOAD-DATE: August 3, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

39 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

July 29, 2005 Friday 4:55 AM GMT

Two Vietnamese jailed in Cambodia for human trafficking

LENGTH: 293 wordsDATELINE: PHNOM PENH July 29

A Cambodian court has handed sentences of 10 and 15 years to two Vietnamese for trafficking females from their homeland, including the daughter of one of them, to be sex workers in Malaysia, a court official said Friday.

Phnom Penh Municipal Court found Vietnamese nationals Keo Chin, 39, and Nguyen Thi Vang, 45, along with Cambodians Tin Matt Sein and a man identified as Rosat guilty during a hearing Thursday, deputy prosecutor Nget Sarath said.

He told AFP that Keo Chin and Tin Matt Sein were sentenced to 15 years in jail each, while Nguyen Thi Vang was handed a 10-year sentence for selling her own daughter aged about 20 to the men to be taken to Malaysia as a sex worker.

Keo Chin and Nguyen Thi Vang were arrested in January in Cambodia's northwestern Poipet as they tried to take four Vietnamese women, including her daughter as well as a 13-year-old girl, via Thailand to Malaysia. Tin Matt Sein was also involved, the prosecutor said.

But he said Tin Matt Sein was only arrested in March, along with Rosat, as they tried to take a second batch of four Vietnamese women into Thailand, again destined for Malaysia.

"They planned to take all the girls from Saigon (Ho Chi Minh City) to Malaysia through Poipet and Thailand," Nget Sarath said.

In the latter case, Tin Matt Sein was sentenced to another 12 years in jail, to be served separately, while Rosat was given a 10-year sentence.

The United States added Cambodia, one of the world's poorest nations, to its blacklist of the world's worst human trafficking violators in June.

The kingdom, still recovering after decades of conflict which only ended in 1998, has long been a significant sender and receiver of trafficked people because of its weak border controls and poorly enforced migration laws.

LOAD-DATE: July 30, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

40 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Japan Times

July 14, 2005, Thursday

Tokyo still weak on human-trafficking: U.N. investigator

LENGTH: 261 words

By MASAMI ITO, Staff writer

The government will have to do much more than just revise a few laws to combat human-trafficking, the U.N. special rapporteur on the problem said Wednesday.

Sigma Huda, of the U.N. Commission on Human Rights, was in Tokyo on an unofficial visit to meet with nongovernmental groups, lawyers and government officials to learn more about Japan's antitrafficking steps.

"Trafficking is the grossest form of violation of human rights," the Bangladeshi told a news conference. It is "when you lose the control over your own self, when you lose your own dignity" and have no say as others make money off of you.

After the United States put Japan on a watch list in June 2004 for not getting tough on human-trafficking, the government beefed up measures to address the issue, including an addition to the Penal Code that took effect Tuesday that makes the offense punishable.

Huda said the government has taken a step in the right direction, but has not done much else.

"Trafficking is not only a law and order situation," Huda said.

"It is also a social and humanitarian issue."

The U.N. investigator said she was shocked to hear several Japanese men at a Tokyo symposium the previous day condoning the existence of the sex industry, arguing that it is deep-rooted in Japanese culture.

Huda, who was to leave Japan on Thursday, said she hopes to make an official visit to Japan next year.

The special envoy is expected to submit a report on the situation of human-trafficking to U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan next year.

LOAD-DATE: July 13, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

41 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

July 13, 2005 Wednesday

Police log record 51 human trafficking victims in 2005 first half

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 456 words

DATELINE: TOKYO, July 14

Fifty-one foreign women were trafficked into Japan and forced into sex industry or other forms of exploitation in the first half of this year, the highest figure on record for the first half of a year, the National Police Agency said Thursday.

The latest figure, which was triple the numbers compared with the corresponding period last year, includes a Thai transsexual for the first time since the NPA began compiling the data in 2001.

Police uncovered 29 human trafficking cases, up by five, and netted a record 29 suspects, up by 16, involved in trafficking. The suspects, identified as brokers or the victims' employers, were either arrested or had their papers sent to prosecutors by the police.

The NPA report comes after revisions to the Penal Code were enforced on Tuesday. The revised law stipulates human trafficking as a crime and set punishments for violators.

Under the revised laws, those who purchase a person and put him or her under their control face three months to five years in prison. In cases of human trafficking for profits or sexual purposes, the penalty is even harsher or the prison term spans from one year to 10 years.

Based on these revisions, the NPA is hoping to step up measures against brokers and help protect victims.

According to the NPA, Filipino and Thai nationals topped the list of victims, with 20 and 17 respectively, followed by women from Indonesia, Romania, Taiwan, South Korea, Australia and Estonia.

All the victims worked as hostesses, with 27 of them being forced into prostitution and other sexual services, while 24 others dressed in underwear to entertain visitors.

The NPA found that the victims could not escape due to various reasons such as incurring huge debts or having their passports taken away from them.

Of the victims, 28 sought help from the police, immigration officials or their embassies. The other cases were uncovered only when the victims were questioned on charges such as illegally staying in Japan.

Japan came under international pressure last year to combat human trafficking following a June report by the U.S. State Department, which downgraded its assessment of Japan's efforts to crack down on the problem by putting it on a special watch list of countries on the verge of falling into the worst category.

Tokyo subsequently adopted an action plan to combat human trafficking in December and implemented legal changes such as amending the Penal Code.

Last month, the State Department removed Japan from the list.

Human rights groups and researchers estimate that thousands of women, mostly from poor Asian countries, are trafficked into Japan every year and forced to work in the sex industry.

LOAD-DATE: July 14, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 Kyodo News Service

42 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Nation

July 6, 2005 Wednesday

CAMEL KIDS REHABILITATION RECOMMENDED

LENGTH: 1393 words

Karachi - Serious and holistic measures should be taken for the rehabilitation and prevention of future use of child jockeys in Pakistan and UAE as this is the dire need of the time.

This was recommended by a fact-finding report by Centre for Research and Social Development on camel jockeys after the repatriation of 22 camel kids last month. In 2002, Australian Broadcasting Corporation (ABC) quoted that there were 1500 Camel Jockeys in UAE. Whereas in a recent US TIP 2005 report they have quoted that according to UAE interior ministry there are 1200 - 2700 camel kids in UAE. Furthermore when Pakistani Minister for Overseas visited the UAE in May 2005 he reported that there are 2000 camel kids in UAE, mostly of Pakistani origin. Whereas according to Centre for Research and Social Development's (CRSD) review and analysis there are around 500 Pakistani children in UAE, who are being used for races purpose.

According to CRSD's estimates around 200 children in a year are trafficked from Pakistan and less than 150 are repatriated from UAE through official channels. Agents facilitate the whole process of child trafficking for camel races but in most of the cases they are sent with the consent of their parents.

It is interesting to note that in the beginning of engagement of children, the Sheikhs were used to pay PKR 3-5 lacks to family and agents for the engagement of child for the race. Since now the trade has flourished therefore they do not pay anything whereas families themselves pay PKR 20,000 to 30,000 to agents for selection and sponsoring their child to UAE.

After 9/11 in order to control the human trafficking and illegal cross border movement of people, government of Pakistan with support from US installed highly sophisticated 'Personal Identification Secure Comparison and Evaluation System' (PISCES) in December 2001 which was functional within two years in order to control human trafficking, this facility was installed at 18 entry and exist points of Pakistan but yet it was made fail to control human trafficking and child trafficking continued throughout this period and as on with multiple routs.

Computerized national identity card (CNIC) and Machine Readable Passports (MRPs) were also part of the same PISCES system but so far have been unsuccessful in deducting the cases of child being trafficked from Pakistan either legally or illegally.

According to a recent survey by the Asian Development Bank (ADB) rural poverty has increased in Pakistan at 14 per cent, which is one of the major contributing factors in child trafficking mostly from Southern Punjab. Other reports regarding the poverty level in Southern Punjab and upper Sindh quote higher figures compared to this one. Similarly in these areas unemployment has also increased to a much higher level.

Currently, there are more than 20,000 the overall active camel races whereas camels under the age of 2-6 years are used for the races. Mostly female camels are used in the races, those take part in races ranging from 4 - 8 kilometres and complete them within 6 - 14 minutes.

In a race mostly 8 - 25 camels take part whereas in large races more than 70 camels participate. For long route races camels above the age of 6 years are used and complete within 17 minutes.

Trust building and fulfillment of commitment are the major factors those help this trade thriving. Generally a child is or his family is paid something between 600 to 2000 UAE Dharmas per month. In case of any serious injuries they are paid 50,00 to 50,000 UAE Dharmas, whereas in case of death they are paid 100,000 UAE Dharmas.

This economic generation of this trade also support the Pakistani economy through the remittances sent from Middle East on annually which contribute more than 150 US $ as remittances, which also includes the money contributed by these camel kids.

Since December last, the UAE authorities have taken up this issue more seriously and established a Rehabilitation centre in UAE for camel kids located in a military facility at Abu Dhabi. This was followed by Overseas Pakistanis Foundation (OPF) in Karachi with the establishment of another similar centre in April 2005 for 340 children in OPF office. Whereas in May 9, 2005 UAE and UNICEF agreed for the rehabilitation of camel kids and signed an agreement in UAE. UAE preliminary survey report says 3000 children out of which 2000 Pakistanis. On June 20, 2005 total 22 children repatriated under the age of 4-14 years of age.

Since last year there have been few research studies on this topic by local and international organizations but service delivery organizations instead of doing any work for the prevention of trafficking are focussing on rehabilitation thus allowing the continuation of child trafficking. Further this rehabilitation work is being performed in isolation and with the formation of silos instead of building on the previous work by other organization.

In Pakistan since the identification of this heinous crime, only Edhi Foundation was providing the shelter and rehabilitation services to these children since 1986 and has a comprehensive infrastructure to provide such services including 17 shelter homes throughout Pakistan. Later on few other local organizations jumped in and started their work on this issue mostly advocacy based.

Human trafficking ordinance 2002 has been promulgated but since 2002 very few cases were registered under the child trafficking component though this law specifically focuses this issue at various levels.

Since 2001/ 2002 Pakistan has been on the Tier 2 of the United States Trafficking in Persons Report, though child trafficking and Pakistani children's repatriation has been continued.

Government of Pakistan announced in the beginning of year 2004 as 'Year of Child Welfare and Rights' but in practice was failed to take any major steps for their protection and especially for camel jockeys. Though they announced the Punjab Destitute and Neglected Children Act 2004 and currently they are doing rehabilitation work but legally it is not their mandate to provide rehabilitation services to camel jockeys, furthermore they lack expertise in this area. But flow of international funding has opened many doors of providing rehabilitation services without expertise but none of them is focussing on prevention aspect of the issue.

First time as a result of international pressure on UAE in 1993 it bans the use of below 15 years children in the races having less than 45 kg (but violated and used 3-7 years of age, 15-17 Kg). Second time through order No 1/ 6/ 266 on 22 July 2002 - prohibited under 15 years and weight less than 45 kg came into enforcement from September 1, 2002 (but violated and used 3-7 years of age, 15-17 Kg).

Third time on March 16, 2005 UAE government announced a new law to enforce from March 31, 2005-06-30 banning children under 16 years and less than 45 kg. But yet constantly ignoring the age limit of a child as defined in UNCRC of 18 years.

Because of the lack of control and continuation of violation of international agreement UAE has been declining on the Trafficking in Persons Report of US, as this year UAE was included in Tier 3, previously (2004) on Tier 2, 2003 Tier 1.

CRSD strongly urges Government of Pakistan and UAE to take serious actions on this issue and instead of offering lip services should ban the races and use of children. The barbaric practice of using little children as jockeys in camel races has been going on as usual, after announcing internationally ban on the use of the children below the 15 years of age.

There are also few more factors that after the implementation of new ban, they will start using the ex-jockeys for races as they have increased the age limit and will be recruiting child which will ultimately open new windows of child trafficking from Pakistan.

The Government must ensure that all those responsible for trafficking and employing underage jockeys are prosecuted under the existing laws; Provide details of the number of prosecutions brought and the number of successful convictions obtained with details of the sentences passed against those trafficking and employing camel jockeys since 1 September 2002.

Furthermore, the government of Pakistan should substantially increase allocation for education and implement pro-poor policies so that people in the lower strata are able to come out of the vicious cycle of poverty.

LOAD-DATE: July 11, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Trafficking/Smuggling; Human Rights/Civil Liberties

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2005 News Bites Pty Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

Global News Bites

43 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Nation (AsiaNet)

July 6, 2005 Wednesday

Camel kids rehabilitation recommended

SECTION: NATIONWIDE INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 1395 wordsDATELINE: Karachi JUL 6

Serious and holistic measures should be taken for the rehabilitation and prevention of future use of child jockeys in Pakistan and UAE as this is the dire need of the time. This was recommended by a fact-finding report by Centre for Research and Social Development on camel jockeys after the repatriation of 22 camel kids last month. In 2002, Australian Broadcasting Corporation (ABC) quoted that there were 1500 Camel Jockeys in UAE. Whereas in a recent US TIP 2005 report they have quoted that according to UAE interior ministry there are 1200 - 2700 camel kids in UAE. Furthermore when Pakistani Minister for Overseas visited the UAE in May 2005 he reported that there are 2000 camel kids in UAE, mostly of Pakistani origin. Whereas according to Centre for Research and Social Development's (CRSD) review and analysis there are around 500 Pakistani children in UAE, who are being used for races purpose.

According to CRSD's estimates around 200 children in a year are trafficked from Pakistan and less than 150 are repatriated from UAE through official channels. Agents facilitate the whole process of child trafficking for camel races but in most of the cases they are sent with the consent of their parents. It is interesting to note that in the beginning of engagement of children, the Sheikhs were used to pay PKR 3-5 lacks to family and agents for the engagement of child for the race. Since now the trade has flourished therefore they do not pay anything whereas families themselves pay PKR 20,000 to 30,000 to agents for selection and sponsoring their child to UAE.

After 9/11 in order to control the human trafficking and illegal cross border movement of people, government of Pakistan with support from US installed highly sophisticated 'Personal Identification Secure Comparison and Evaluation System' (PISCES) in December 2001 which was functional within two years in order to control human trafficking, this facility was installed at 18 entry and exist points of Pakistan but yet it was made fail to control human trafficking and child trafficking continued throughout this period and as on with multiple routs.

Computerized national identity card (CNIC) and Machine Readable Passports (MRPs) were also part of the same PISCES system but so far have been unsuccessful in deducting the cases of child being trafficked from Pakistan either legally or illegally.

According to a recent survey by the Asian Development Bank (ADB) rural poverty has increased in Pakistan at 14 per cent, which is one of the major contributing factors in child trafficking mostly from Southern Punjab. Other reports regarding the poverty level in Southern Punjab and upper Sindh quote higher figures compared to this one. Similarly in these areas unemployment has also increased to a much higher level. Currently, there are more than 20,000 the overall active camel races whereas camels under the age of 2-6 years are used for the races. Mostly female camels are used in the races, those take part in races ranging from 4 - 8 kilometres and complete them within 6 - 14 minutes.

In a race mostly 8 - 25 camels take part whereas in large races more than 70 camels participate. For long route races camels above the age of 6 years are used and complete within 17 minutes. Trust building and fulfillment of commitment are the major factors those help this trade thriving. Generally a child is or his family is paid something between 600 to 2000 UAE Dharm per month. In case of any serious injuries they are paid 50,00 to 50,000 UAE Dharm, whereas in case of death they are paid 100,000 UAE Dharm. This economic generation of this trade also support the Pakistani economy through the remittances sent from Middle East on annually which contribute more than 150 US $ as remittances, which also includes the money contributed by these camel kids. Since December last, the UAE authorities have taken up this issue more seriously and established a Rehabilitation centre in UAE for camel kids located in a military facility at Abu Dhabi. This was followed by Overseas Pakistanis Foundation (OPF) in Karachi with the establishment of another similar centre in April 2005 for 340 children in OPF office. Whereas in May 9, 2005 UAE and UNICEF agreed for the rehabilitation of camel kids and signed an agreement in UAE. UAE preliminary survey report says 3000 children out of which 2000 Pakistanis. On June 20, 2005 total 22 children repatriated under the age of 4-14 years of age.

Since last year there have been few research studies on this topic by local and international organizations but service delivery organizations instead of doing any work for the prevention of trafficking are focussing on rehabilitation thus allowing the continuation of child trafficking. Further this rehabilitation work is being performed in isolation and with the formation of silos instead of building on the previous work by other organization. In Pakistan since the identification of this heinous crime, only Edhi Foundation was providing the shelter and rehabilitation services to these children since 1986 and has a comprehensive infrastructure to provide such services including 17 shelter homes throughout Pakistan. Later on few other local organizations jumped in and started their work on this issue mostly advocacy based. Human trafficking ordinance 2002 has been promulgated but since 2002 very few cases were registered under the child trafficking component though this law specifically focuses this issue at various levels. Since 2001/ 2002 Pakistan has been on the Tier 2 of the United States Trafficking in Persons Report, though child trafficking and Pakistani children's repatriation has been continued. Government of Pakistan announced in the beginning of year 2004 as 'Year of Child Welfare and Rights' but in practice was failed to take any major steps for their protection and especially for camel jockeys. Though they announced the Punjab Destitute and Neglected Children Act 2004 and currently they are doing rehabilitation work but legally it is not their mandate to provide rehabilitation services to camel jockeys, furthermore they lack expertise in this area. But flow of international funding has opened many doors of providing rehabilitation services without expertise but none of them is focussing on prevention aspect of the issue. First time as a result of international pressure on UAE in 1993 it bans the use of below 15 years children in the races having less than 45 kg (but violated and used 3-7 years of age, 15-17 Kg). Second time through order No 1/ 6/ 266 on 22 July 2002 - prohibited under 15 years and weight less than 45 kg came into enforcement from September 1, 2002 (but violated and used 3-7 years of age, 15-17 Kg).

Third time on March 16, 2005 UAE government announced a new law to enforce from March 31, 2005-06-30 banning children under 16 years and less than 45 kg. But yet constantly ignoring the age limit of a child as defined in UNCRC of 18 years.

Because of the lack of control and continuation of violation of international agreement UAE has been declining on the Trafficking in Persons Report of US, as this year UAE was included in Tier 3, previously (2004) on Tier 2, 2003 Tier 1. CRSD strongly urges Government of Pakistan and UAE to take serious actions on this issue and instead of offering lip services should ban the races and use of children. The barbaric practice of using little children as jockeys in camel races has been going on as usual, after announcing internationally ban on the use of the children below the 15 years of age. There are also few more factors that after the implementation of new ban, they will start using the ex-jockeys for races as they have increased the age limit and will be recruiting child which will ultimately open new windows of child trafficking from Pakistan. The Government must ensure that all those responsible for trafficking and employing under-age jockeys are prosecuted under the existing laws; Provide details of the number of prosecutions brought and the number of successful convictions obtained with details of the sentences passed against those trafficking and employing camel jockeys since 1 September 2002.

Furthermore, the government of Pakistan should substantially increase allocation for education and implement pro-poor policies so that people in the lower strata are able to come out of the vicious cycle of poverty.

LOAD-DATE: June 1, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

44 of 359 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

July 4, 2005, Monday

Philippines' Cebu government takes steps to stamp out child trafficking

SOURCE: The Philippine Star website, Manila, in English 4 Jul 05

LENGTH: 1068 words

Excerpt from report by Wenna Berondo, published in English by Philippine newspaper The Philippine Star website on 4 July

Alarmed by the surge of child trafficking and prostitution in Cebu, local government officials are taking steps to address the problem. Just recently, Cebu City councillor Gerardo Carillo proposed an ordinance requiring airline and shipping companies, terminals, ports and other public transport companies to post warning signs against child trafficking to encourage public awareness. Carillo said the people should know that child trafficking is punishable under Republic Act [RA] 9208 or the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act of 2003.

Under the proposed ordinance, establishments which do not post signs against child trafficking face a fine of 2,000 pesos and 3,000 pesos for the first and second offence, respectively, and 5,000 pesos and suspension of business permit for the third offence .

Carillo said Cebu is one the five areas in the country where child prostitution and sex tourism are prevalent because it is where the international and domestic trafficking of children aged 11 to 17 from the nearby provinces of Samar, Leyte, Bohol and Negros happens.

The End Child Prostitution, Child Pornography and the Trafficking of Children for Sexual Purposes (ECPAT) said the number of commercially and sexually exploited children in the country is increasing. The Philippine Plan of Action estimates that there are between 60,000 and 75,000 Filipino children who are involved in the sex trade. But according to non-government organizations (NGOs), the number could reach up to 100,000.

RA 9208 defines human trafficking as the "recruitment, transportation, transfer or harbouring, or receipt of persons with or without the victim's consent or knowledge, within or across national borders by means of threat or use of force or other forms of coercion, abduction, fraud, deception, abuse of power or position and taking advantage of the vulnerability of the person." [passage omitted]

In its 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report, the US State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons placed the Philippines on the "Tier 2" watch list due to the country's failure to show evidence of increasing efforts to convict human traffickers. According to the report, while the Philippine government has exerted more efforts to implement RA 9208, the number of trafficking-related prosecutions has remained low and that there have been no convictions. [passage omitted]

Justice Secretary Raul Gonzales admitted that human trafficking in the country is still prevalent. However, he said the US report failed to consider the significant efforts which the Philippines has made through the member-agencies of the Inter-Agency Council Against Trafficking (IACAT), which the Department of Justice heads.

Based on the Department Of Justice's records, 65 complaints for human trafficking had been filed from June 2003 to January this year. Of these cases, 24 have been filed in court, while 31 are still under preliminary investigation. These complaints involve 98 alleged traffickers/recruiters. [The] majority of these cases - 35 - were filed in Manila, Quezon City and Pasay City and with the National Prosecution Offices. The rest were filed in Zamboanga City (eight cases), Cebu (four), Davao City (four), Olongapo City (three), Lapu-Lapu City (three), La Union (two), Bacolod City (two), Kabankalan City (two) and Tagbilaran City (two).

While there have been no convictions for violations of the anti-trafficking law, owing to the judicial procedures giving due process to the accused, a number have been convicted for trafficking-related offences. The Inter-Agency Committee on Passport Irregularities reported that 69 people had been convicted for violations of the Passport Law and 20 others for illegal recruitment from 2000 to 2004.

In its report, the US State Department said endemic poverty, high unemployment rate, cultural propensity towards migration, a weak rule-of-law environment and sex tourism have contributed to the significant human trafficking in the Philippines. For its part, ECPAT cited poor educational levels, family breakdown, gender discrimination, weak political will and lax law enforcement.

ECPAT said it is not a remote possibility that the exploited children could acquire illnesses such as sexually transmitted diseases. The victims also face health risks such as unwanted pregnancies, miscarriages and unsafe abortions, the group added.

Last year, the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) recognized Cebu City as one of the most child-friendly cities in Southeast Asia. However, Carillo, chairman of the city council's committee on social services, claimed that the city has to do more because it still lacks laws to prevent child abuse, exploitation and trafficking.

Last March, the city council approved a resolution authorizing Mayor Tomas Osmeo enter into a memorandum of agreement with the national government and the UNICEF to implement the sixth phase of the UNICEF programme in the country. The programme calls for all city barangays [villages] to have their own Barangay Council for the Protection of Children.

Under RA 9208, the government is mandated to establish preventive, protective and rehabilitative programmes for trafficked persons. Local government units (LGUs) are mandated to monitor and document cases of human trafficking in their respective areas, cancel the licenses of establishments which violate the law, and ensure effective prosecution of such cases.

The LGUs shall also undertake an information campaign against human trafficking through the establishment of Migrants Advisory and Information Network (MAIN) desks in coordination with the Department of the Interior and Local Government, Philippine Information Agency, Commission on Filipinos Overseas, NGOs and other concerned agencies. They shall also encourage and support community-based initiatives to address the problem.

The police, for their part, are tasked to conduct surveillance of, investigate and arrest those engaged in human trafficking. They shall closely coordinate with other law enforcement agencies to investigate and apprehend suspected traffickers, and establish a system to receive complaints and calls to assist trafficked persons and conduct rescue operations.

LOAD-DATE: July 4, 2005

LANGUAGE: English

45 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Manila Times

July 4, 2005 Monday

DOUBLETAKEBYLINE: Eric F. MallongaLENGTH: 951 wordsWatchlist

PRESIDENT Arroyo has just announced that her government is making headway in its fight against human trafficking. She is determined to remove the Philippines from the US watch- list of countries that failed to curb this "curse on the poor and transnational evil." The government had been forewarned about its failure in fighting the scourge of human enslavement more than two years ago. Instead of consolidating forces among immigration, customs and law-enforcement agents in trapping human traffickers, and instead of cooperating with foreign affairs, health, labor and social welfare authorities for the protection and reintegration of victimized women and children, then-Acting Justice Secretary Merceditas Gutierrez chose, and as incumbent Justice Secretary Raul Gonzalez chooses, to debate with the US Embassy on the accuracy of the assessment. Since then, no earnest efforts had been undertaken to resolve this particular problem.

The Philippines was thus placed on the Tier 2 Watchlist, a notch lower than its former Tier 2 classification. Because of government's continuing failure to curb human trafficking, this country was described as a "source, transit and destination country for men, women and children trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor" in the Asian region. Unless the Philippines secures a conviction of a human trafficker this year, the country is in danger of being demoted to Tier 3, a category for countries with the worst record of human trafficking.

If demoted, the US government will cut nonhumanitarian and nontrade assistance packages to the Philippines. American funding for Philippine participation in educational and cultural exchange programs could be withheld. The government also faces US opposition to assistance from international financial institutions such as the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank, and other multilateral development banks. The Arroyo administration is very dependent on these institutions for the government's poverty alleviation programs.

Even as Congress, in a rare display, expeditiously promulgated an Antitrafficking in Persons Act (R.A. 9208), this law has basically remained unimplemented. Mark Taylor, US State Department's senior coordinator for reports to monitor and combat human trafficking, observed: "The government of the Philippines does not fully comply with minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. The Philippines' placement on Tier 2 Watchlist is due to its failure to show evidence of increasing efforts to convict traffickers." The Tier 2 Watchlist are "countries on Tier 2 but requiring special scrutiny because of a high or significantly increasing number of victims; failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking in persons; or an assessment as Tier 2 based on commitments to take action over the next year." Secretary Gonzalez claims that the Department of Justice has garnered convictions in trafficking-related activities. He does not get the point. The government must incarcerate human traffickers, not the prostituted women and children.

Indeed, it is humiliating enough that the Philippines has been lumped in the Tier 2 Watchlist with other Third-World countries such as Azerbaijan, Benin, Guinea, Haiti, Mexico, Rwanda, Sierra Leone and Zimbabwe, which are impoverished countries that have unstable governments and national histories of genocide and slavery. But the Philippines is about to be demoted to Tier 3 and lumped with Bolivia, Burma, Cambodia, Cuba, North Korea and Sudan, countries suffering from squalor and where the intelligence quotients of their children are continuously decreasing from extreme malnutrition and disease. This is the place to which the Arroyo administration has steered our country.

The State Department was blunt: "More progress in its law-enforcement efforts is needed. The Philippine government should take immediate corrective action by arresting, prosecuting and convicting traffickers and any public official found to be involved in trafficking." Culpable involvement should include the direct participation or the indispensable cooperation on the part of concerned government officials, and for their failure to take immediate and sustained action. Take the case of two sisters, aged 12 and 13, rescued from the international airport, possessing passports that stipulated their ages at 18 and 19 years. It was supposedly their second time to travel to Kyoto, Japan, where they had been employed as guest relations officers at a beerhouse. Why were they issued passports, visas and employment documents considering their tender ages? How were they allowed to travel to Japan despite their manifest appearances as children? In tepid response, Foreign Affairs Secretary Alberto Romulo visited Washington last month to personally appeal for the Philippines' removal from the US watchlist, briefing the State Department on government measures for the protection of Filipino migrant women. But what steps, what genuine efforts, has Secretary Romulo undertaken to clean up his own backyard?

As the State Department continues to assist governments in improving their antitrafficking activities, the enslavement of our people continues unabated and the situation of women and children continues to worsen. For as long as the government and Filipino presidents fail to solve the burgeoning problem of poverty, there will always be fodder for human traffickers, and there will always be an imminent threat of revolution.

An administration that fails to sensitively respond to our people's impoverishment is its own, as the President expressed, "curse on the poor." It does not deserve our people's trust.

LOAD-DATE: October 4, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Trafficking/Smuggling

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2005 News Bites Pty Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

Global News Bites

46 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Manila Times

July 3, 2005 Sunday

RP NEEDS TO TOUGHEN UP HUMAN TRAFFICKING LAWS-ARROYOLENGTH: 386 words

The Philippines needs to implement its laws more strongly if it wants to be struck off a US human trafficking blacklist, President Arroyo said Saturday.

Speaking at a ceremony on US-Philippine cooperation against trafficking, the President told US diplomats she recognized the country had to do more to tackle the problem.

"I want to tell you . . . that we are determined to be delisted from the international watchlist," Mrs. Arroyo said.

"We know exactly what needs to be done. We have a good law. We have the best after-care service for the victims," she added.

But she conceded implementing the law would require more effort, saying "we are determined to increase efforts to convict the human traffickers."

Justice Secretary Raul M. Gonzalez said 63 people had been charged in 2004 and 22 other cases are now being investigated for alleged violations of an antitrafficking law passed in 2003.

US Embassy charg  d'Affaires Joseph Mussomeli praised the Philippine efforts, saying the country had "perhaps the most comprehensive antitrafficking law in the world."

"It could potentially bring some of the worst trafficking offenders to justice. But we all know that just passing the law isn't enough," he said.

In its "Trafficking in Persons Report" for 2005, the US State Department noted that Filipino women "are often lured abroad with false promises of legitimate employment and are trafficked for commercial sexual exploitation to destinations throughout Asia, the Middle East, Africa, Europe and North America."

It said a "significant number" of the 71,084 Filipinas who entered Japan as overseas performing artists in 2004 "are believed to have been women trafficked into the sex trade."

The State Department traced the roots of human trafficking in Filipinas to "endemic poverty, a high unemployment rate, a cultural propensity toward migration, a weak rule of law environment and sex tourism."

It proposed that the Philippine government "take immediate corrective action by arresting, prosecuting, and convicting traffickers and any public officials found to be involved in trafficking. The government needs to make greater efforts to address allegations of corruption and fraud regarding the issuance of documents to facilitate the recruitment of Philippine entertainers to Japan, a process that traffickers exploit."

LOAD-DATE: October 4, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISHDOCUMENT-TYPE: International RelationsPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Global News Bites

47 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

July 2, 2005 Saturday 9:53 AM GMT

Philippine president vows to get tough on human trafficking

LENGTH: 234 words

DATELINE: MANILA July 2

The Philippines needs to implement its laws more strongly if it wants to be struck off a US human trafficking blacklist, President Gloria Arroyo said Saturday.

Speaking at a ceremony on US-Philippine cooperation against trafficking, Arroyo told US diplomats she recognized the country had to do more to tackle the problem.

"I want to tell you ... that we are determined to be de-listed from the international watchlist," Arroyo said.

"We know exactly what needs to be done. We have a good law. We have the best after-care service for the victims," said added.

But she conceded implementing the law would require more effort, saying "we are determined to increase efforts to convict the human traffickers."

Justice Secretary Raul Gonzalez said 63 people had been charged in 2004 and 22 other cases are now being investigated for alleged violations of an anti-trafficking law passed in 2003.

US embassy charge d'affaires Joseph Mussomeli praised the Philippine efforts, saying the country had "perhaps the most comprehensive anti-trafficking law in the world."

"It could potentially bring some of the worst trafficking offenders to justice. But we all know that just passing the law isn't enough," he said.

The Philippines was recently listed in "Tier 2" of the blacklist of the US State Department's annual "Trafficking in Persons Report." This is just below the Tier 1 rating of the worst human trafficking violators.

LOAD-DATE: July 3, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

48 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Xinhua General News Service

July 2, 2005 Saturday 8:00 AM EST

Philippines vows to fight human trafficking

SECTION: WORLD NEWS; Political

LENGTH: 263 words

DATELINE: MANILA

The Philippines is determined to continue fighting against human trafficking to be removed from the watch list of countries that fail to curb such "curse on the poor and transnational evil," President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo said Saturday.

In a speech on the progress of fighting human trafficking, the president said her country is making headway in the area but admitted that much would still have to be done to solve the problem.

She said the "modest yet significant" accomplishments of the Inter-Agency Council Against Trafficking should be cited, reiterating her marching orders to the law enforcers and the Department of Justice to increase effort to convict human traffickers.

Arroyo also asked local government officials to beef up the law with ordinances to prevent and suppress trafficking and protect the victims.

The Inter-Agency Committee on Passport Irregularities reported that 69 persons were convicted for violation of the law on human trafficking and 20 for illegal recruitment activities for the period of 2000 to 2004.

Earlier, the US State Department said the Philippines remained on the "Tier 2" watch list for the second consecutive year because of its "failure to show evidence of increasing efforts to convict traffickers."

US Embassy charge d'affaires Joseph Mussomeli repeated this, saying the Philippines "must aggressively pursue prosecutions and ultimately convictions" since having one of the most comprehensive anti-trafficking laws in the world would not be enough to be removed from the watch list.

LOAD-DATE: July 3, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

49 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Facts on File World News Digest

June 30, 2005

Human Rights; U.S. Cites 14 Nations for Human Trafficking

SECTION: Pg. 431F2LENGTH: 307 words

The U.S. State Department June 3 released a report criticizing the governments of 14 countries for allowing human trafficking and other forms of forced labor, and for doing little or nothing to end the practice. Among the 14 nations cited were four prominent U.S. allies in the Middle East: Kuwait, Qatar, the United Arab Emirates (UAE) and Saudi Arabia, none of which had been cited in the 2004 report.

The other 10 nations cited were Bolivia, Cambodia, Cuba, Ecuador, Jamaica, Myanmar, North Korea, Sudan, Togo and Venezuela. [See 2002 Human Rights: U.S. Reports on Human Trafficking]

The State Department had begun issuing the annual Trafficking in Persons Report in 2001, as required by the U.S.'s 2000 Trafficking Victims Protection Act. Under the law, the U.S. could penalize nations for permitting human trafficking, but only Equatorial Guinea and Venezuela had been sanctioned.

Introducing the report, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, "Trafficking in human beings is nothing less than a modern form of slavery." The report estimated that 800,000 people were trafficked between countries against their will each year, including some 15,000 who entered the U.S.

The report cited Saudi Arabia for failing to have laws that protected foreign workers who entered the country, among other problems. The State Department cited Kuwait, Qatar, and the UAE for holding small children in captivity, some as young as three or four years old, for use as jockeys in camel races. The U.S. also criticized the four Persian Gulf states for allowing the trafficking of women for sexual exploitation.

The State Department put 27 other countries, including China, on its watch list. That classification meant that the countries had significant human trafficking problems but that their governments were taking steps to address the issue.

LOAD-DATE: July 7, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

50 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 28, 2005 Tuesday 11:07 AM GMT

Four Cambodians charged after 88 sex workers are rescued

LENGTH: 274 wordsDATELINE: PHNOM PENH June 28

A Cambodian court Tuesday charged four people with pimping and debauchery following a weekend raid on a massage parlour at a Phnom Penh hotel in which 88 sex workers were rescued by police.

Twenty-eight Vietnamese and four Chinese were among the female workers, whom police said appeared to be aged at least 18.

Earlier they said they believed they were trafficked into the work.

Phnom Penh Municipal Court prosecutor Uk Savuth charged Sok Leng, 50, the massage parlour owner who remains at large, with pimping and debauchery.

Manager Chring Trang, 33, cashier Chhun Sok Lay, 25, and receptionist Sok Lim Vichka, 25, were charged with being accomplices. They are in custody.

Police presented to the court pornographic VCDs, numbered photographs of the women, condoms and a large number of invoices listing a variety of sexual services provided by the women.

The women have been sent to several shelters operated by non-government organisations, police said.

The accused face five to 10 years in jail if found guilty of pimping plus one to five years for debauchery, as well as a fine of up to 30 million riel (7,500 dollars).

The raid was the largest since a December anti-trafficking operation that rescued more than 80 women and girl sex workers, who were then reportedly abducted from a women's refuge a day later.

The Cambodian government's handling of the case upset the United States, which charged that it failed to ensure those responsible for the shelter raid were brought to justice.

Cambodia, which is particularly notorious for child sex trafficking, was added to a US blacklist of the world's worst human trafficking violators early this month.

LOAD-DATE: June 29, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

51 of 359 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 27, 2005, Monday

Japan calls for international cooperation on human trafficking

SOURCE: Kyodo News Service, Tokyo, in English 04:29 GMT, 27 Jun 05

LENGTH: 253 words

Text of report in English by Japanese news agency Kyodo

Tokyo, 27 June: Japan called Monday [27 June] for unity of countries concerned to fight human trafficking during a seminar on the issue it hosted in Tokyo inviting officials from about 50 countries. Keishiro Fukushima, parliamentary foreign secretary, said at the outset of the seminar: "Measures compiled by a single country are not sufficient to effectively deal with the issue of human trafficking."

Cooperation is necessary among countries in which the victims of human trafficking originate, countries relaying them and countries which are their destinations, Fukushima said. Japan aims to display its efforts to tackle human trafficking to the international community during the session which will last through Tuesday, a ministry official said earlier.

The US State Department a year ago placed Japan on a special watch list of countries on the verge of falling into the worst category in connection with human trafficking. The Japanese government then compiled the action programme, which included law changes, and also dispatched diplomats to the Philippines and Colombia, from which many women are illegally brought to Japan for prostitution and other services, to ask for stricter law enforcement to crack down on brokers.

Such efforts prompted the US government to remove Japan from the list earlier this month, but the Japanese government still sees a need of promoting the efforts on various occasions, the official said.

LOAD-DATE: June 27, 2005

LANGUAGE: English

52 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

June 27, 2005 Monday

Japan calls for int'l unity to fight human trafficking

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 241 wordsDATELINE: TOKYO, June 27

Japan called Monday for unity of countries concerned to fight human trafficking during a seminar on the issue it hosted in Tokyo inviting officials from about 50 countries.

Keishiro Fukushima, parliamentary foreign secretary, said at the outset of the seminar, 'Measures compiled by a single country are not sufficient to effectively deal with the issue of human trafficking.'

Cooperation is necessary among countries in which the victims of human trafficking originate, countries relaying them and countries which are their destinations, Fukushima said.

Japan aims to display its efforts to tackle human trafficking to the international community during the session which will last through Tuesday, a ministry official said earlier.

The U.S. State Department a year ago placed Japan on a special watch list of countries on the verge of falling into the worst category in connection with human trafficking.

The Japanese government then compiled the action program, which included law changes, and also dispatched diplomats to the Philippines and Colombia, from which many women are illegally brought to Japan for prostitution and other services, to ask for stricter law enforcement to crack down on brokers.

Such efforts prompted the U.S. government to remove Japan from the list earlier this month, but the Japanese government still sees a need of promoting the efforts on various occasions, the official said.

LOAD-DATE: June 27, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 Kyodo News Service

53 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 26, 2005 Sunday 4:41 AM GMT

Cambodian police rescue 88 sex workers, nab four alleged human traffickers

LENGTH: 234 wordsDATELINE: PHNOM PENH June 26

Cambodian police said Sunday they rescued 88 trafficked sex workers and nabbed the four men who allegedly coerced them to work, weeks after the United States warned the kingdom to curb the flesh trade.

Police raided a massage parlour at a hotel in the capital on Saturday, rescuing 56 Cambodians, 28 Vietnamese and four Chinese sex workers and detaining the four hotel managers, Phnom Penh police chief Heng Peo told AFP.

"The women were victims of human trafficking," he said, adding they appeared to be aged between 18 and 25.

"We will charge the four men with human trafficking," the police chief said.

Cambodia, which is in particular notorious for child sex trafficking, was added to a US blacklist of the world's worst human trafficking violators early this month, keeping company with North Korea and Myanmar.

The kingdom was downgraded to the "Tier 3" blacklist of the US State Department's annual "Trafficking in Persons Report" for the first time since 2002, largely because of government complicity in trafficking.

Cambodia, one of the world's poorest nations, is viewed as a sender and receiver of trafficked people because of its weak border controls and poorly enforced migration laws.

The United States estimates up to 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders every year and a million more trafficked internally. In East Asia and the Pacific 348 traffickers were convicted in 2004.

LOAD-DATE: June 26, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2005 Agence France Presse
All Rights Reserved

54 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 24, 2005 Friday

Ghana; MPs and Civil Society Clash Over Draft Bill On Human Trafficking

BYLINE: Public Agenda

LENGTH: 1249 words

Members of parliament and civil society groups attending a meeting to discuss the Human Trafficking Bill last weekend clashed over certain portions of the bill.

While some MPs were of the opinion that the Bill is an imposition of foreign culture, others said it should at least reflect Ghanaian cultural practices.

The MPs were drawn from the Committee on Women and Children as well as the Committee on Manpower, Youth and Employment.

But the representatives of Civil Society groups such as Rescue Foundation and the International Organisation for Migration (IOM) as well as the International Labour Organization (ILO) insisted the Bill was in the best interest of Ghanaian children.

They also said the reports were a true reflection of what is actually happening on the ground.

Another bone of contention at the two- day meeting organized by the Ministry of Women and Children's Affairs (MOWAC) and the ILO was the report by some Non-Governmental Organizations (NGOs) on the state of human trafficking activities especially in fishing communities which some MPs said did not reflect the realities on the ground.

Children who are trafficked from rural areas to serve as baby sitters and house helps also came up for discussion.

The Human Trafficking Bill, which is before Parliament, is expected to be passed before Parliament rises at the end of July.

Definition

Section 1(a) of the Bill defines human trafficking as "the recruitment, transportation, transfer, harbouring, trading or receipt of persons," while Section 1 (4) also states, "Where children are trafficked, the consent of the child, parents or guardian of the child cannot be used as a defense in prosecution under this Act regardless of whether or not there is evidence of abuse of power, fraud or deception on the part of the trafficker or whether the vulnerability of the child was taken advantage of."

The Bill further states in Section two that "a person who contravenes Subsection one commits an offense and is liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not less than five years."

The disagreements

The MP for Central Tongu, Joe Gidisu was the first to fire the shot. Attributing the contents of the Bill to some NGO reports, he said, "Some of the findings are contrary to realities on the ground." According to him, some of the so called trafficked children especially in the Tongu area are actually living with their own parents but agree to be resettled to enable them go to school.

According to Gidisu, as a result of the construction of the Akosombo Dam, about 80 to 90 percent of fishermen in the area have moved to Yeji or the Afram plains for fishing.

Such parents do take their children to live with them, but as a result of lack of good education, they allow their children to be resettled.

"They will be back at the next fishing season or when they are on vacation," he added.

"For us some of these things are normal and an age long tradition," he said.

Gidisu was of the opinion that even if the practices of the people were wrong, the NGOs should concentrate themselves on educating them and not painting a bad picture of the practices.

The MP for Hohoe South, Joseph Z. Amenowode had support for Gidisu. He said the NGOs must understand the culture of the people and not draw hasty conclusions.

He later told Public Agenda in an interview that such reports go along way to affect the image of the country in international circles.

The MP for North Tongu, Charles Hodogbey was also not happy with the NGOs' report as well as the definition of human trafficking as contained in the Bill. Nevertheless, he called for sensitization as the best approach to the issue arguing that "the country has always had laws but enforcement has always been a problem."

Another MP who was skeptical about the content of the Bill was the MP for Twifo-Atti Morkwaa, Elisabeth Amoah-Tetteh. In her opinion, the Bill could even be faulting those who genuinely want to help family members by bringing them from the rural areas to live with them in urban areas. She queried, "I was taken care of by my uncle, and today if I want to help my uncle by bringing some of his children to live with me, is that also trafficking?"

The MP for Builsa North, Agnes Chigabatia, said, agencies that recruit young girls and train them as maidservants should also be captured by the Bill.

She said time is needed to deliberate on the Bill since it could incriminate innocent people who are just helping their neighbours who are in need.

"As an MP I now have four girls in my house who I am assisting to learn a trade. Should the law be passed as it is, I could be accused of engaging in child trafficking by my neighbours," she later told Public Agenda.

The MP for Lambussie, Alice Boon said the issue is a dicey one and should be handled with caution. She said she has visited the Gambia and has seen several Ghanaian fishermen there in 'Ghana Town'. She said, since Ghanaian fishermen are more experienced than their Gambian counterparts, their skills are preferred.

Public Officials who addressed the meeting also had support for the MPs.

The deputy Director of the Department of Social Welfare, Stephen Adongo, said there has been an age-old tradition between the people of Immuna, in the Mfantseman District of the Central Region and some fishing communities in the Gambia.

It was done as a normal practice, where children are given to family members or families in Gambia," he said adding, "Every family at Immuna has a child in the Gambia, that was how Ghana Town was built and some of the children have returned to build houses for their families."

According to Adongo, sometimes trafficked children rescued by the Social Welfare become rude, violent and insist on going back.

The rebuff

But the Executive Director of Rescue Foundation, Sylvia Hinson-Ekong will not hear any of these.

"The fact that money has been brought home does not mean it is good," she says.

"We are talking about our children, the future human resource of our country. I want to ask him whether he was trying to convince us that trafficking is good," referring to Adongo's earlier point.

Taking on the MPs later in an interview with Public Agenda, Hinson-Ekong, who has been working in the area of child trafficking, said what NGOs say reflects the realities on the ground.

He denied that NGOs have painted a bad image of the country. "The world knows of it already, most of them come here and do their studies on the quite and do not depend on NGO reports," she said.

An Official of the IOM, Nat Bonnie, also told Public Agenda that the MPs are reacting that way because they do not know the realities on the ground. "If you go to Yeji, you would weep," he said adding, it is the truth, people do not want to accept it."

The Country Director of ILO, Eric Okrah said as a result of large family sizes, some couple considers it a blessing to give their children out.

"Some children trafficked to Gabon have grown up not knowing their countries of origin." he said.

It is not only the MPs who are disputing NGO reports in trafficked communities, the General Agricultural Workers Union (GAWU) has same sentiments and has even completed a study on it.

The US government this year removed Ghana from Tier one to Tier two of its annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report because according to the State Department Ghana has no legislation on Human Trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: June 27, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 AllAfrica, Inc.

55 of 359 DOCUMENTS

CQ Congressional Testimony

June 22, 2005 Wednesday

COMBATING INTERNATIONAL HUMAN TRAFFICKING

SECTION: CAPITOL HILL HEARING TESTIMONY

LENGTH: 4094 words

Statement of Lisa L. Thompson Liaison, Abolition of Sexual Trafficking The Salvation Army National Headquarters
Committee on House Financial Services

June 22, 2005

I am here as a representative of The Salvation Army USA. The Salvation Army was founded in London, England, in 1865 by William and Catherine Booth. The organization is first and foremost a church, which now exists in 110 countries carrying out wideranging forms of ministry and human service from school and hospital administration, micro-credit programs, HIV/AIDS and community health work, elderly residential centers, drug and alcohol rehabilitation programs, disaster and emergency relief, and a growing number of specific programs aimed at combating human trafficking, to mention a few.

The Salvation Army founders, the Booths, were revolutionaries in their time. They went against every Victorian convention and took their ministry to the dirty and dangerous streets of London's east side where they reached out to the destitute and desperate. They tackled the issue of sexual trafficking by, among other things, forming Midnight Rescue Brigades for "Cellar, Gutter, and Garret" work, going at night to the back allies and attics in which they might find women and girls longing to escape from the snares of their traffickers, brothel keepers and pimps to another life. Commenting on this work, Catherine Booth said, "I felt as though I must go and walk the streets and besiege the dens where these hellish iniquities are going on. To keep quiet seemed like being a traitor to humanity."² Once again, The Salvation Army finds itself fighting this same fight and once again we must raise our voices or betray not only humanity but also our faith.

Sexual Gulags: Slavery on an Industrial Scale

Many times I have heard human trafficking referred to as modern-day slavery. It's a powerful and apt analogy that shocks and challenges us. Americans in particular are moved by this comparison. Slavery is an anachronism - something that was supposedly put behind us years ago. However, reports like the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report and the Department of Justice's annual Assessment of U.S. Government Activities to Combat Trafficking in Persons prove to us otherwise.

Today I would like to take the slavery analogy a step further, and give to you another framework with which to conceptualize sexual trafficking. Today I want to introduce to you what I call the "Sexual Gulag."

I'm sure you are all familiar with the term gulag. Generally it's used to describe networks of prisons or labor camps. But the word GULAG (Glavnoe Upravlenie Lagerei) is a Russian acronym meaning Main Camp Administration.³ The Soviet Union built a network of prisons for slave labor so vast and so brutal that the word gulag has been adopted into the English language and today the word's usage is synonymous with inhumane, torturous prison conditions, and industrialized death.

"In the course of the Soviet Union's existence, at least 476 distinct camp complexes came into being, consisting of thousands of individual camps . . . The total number of prisoners in the camps generally hovered around two million, but the total number of Soviet citizens who had some experience of the camps, as political or criminal prisoners, is far higher. From 1929, when the Gulag began its major expansion, until 1953, when Stalin died, the best estimates indicate that some eighteen million people passed through its massive system."

The Soviet regime and its gulags have collapsed, but a new gulag system, stretching far beyond the borders of the former Soviet empire, has risen to take its place - the Sexual Gulag. The Sexual Gulag is a global system made up of hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of brothels, bars, strip clubs, massage parlors, escort services, and street corners where people are sold for sex.

The Sexual Gulag entraps and exploits women and children turning them into sexual commodities. The State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report and its tier ranking of 142 countries testifies to the fact that this gulag exists the world over and that vast numbers of women and children are trapped within its confines. How many women and children exactly? No one knows. But consider these statistics:

UNICEF reports that across the world, there are over one million children entering the sex trade every year and that approximately 30 million children have lost their childhood through sexual exploitation over the past 30 years. In Southeast Asia alone, there are currently around a million children involved in the sex industry, some younger than 10 years old. Thus in scale, both in terms of geographic breadth and the number of those impacted, the comparison of the Soviet's developed and complex gulag system to the modern day Sexual Gulag, is if anything, inadequate.

While there were a great many forms and varieties of camps in the Soviet system and people were sent to them for a variety of reasons, their primary purpose was an economic one. In her book Gulag: A History, Anne Applebaum writes: "They produced a third of the country's gold, much of its coal and timber, and a great deal of almost everything else. . . ."⁸ So the Soviet gulag and the Sexual Gulag share the same purpose, an economic one, and the real difference between the two is that in the Sexual Gulag there is only one industry in which people are exploited the sex industry.

The Sexual Gulag is flourishing and highly profitable. The value of the global trade in women as commodities for sex industries has been estimated to be between seven and twelve billion dollars annually. However, as the information I'm going to share with you demonstrates, these estimates are astonishingly low based on a review of just a few statistics regarding the global sex industry.

As I share this information, it's important to keep in mind the following four items:

- 1) All prostitution of persons under 18 is de facto sex trafficking;
- 2) A high prevalence of foreign-born women in any given country's sex industry is highly indicative of sex trafficking;
- 3) The vast majority of adult women in prostitution in any given country experience levels of physical and psychological coercion, abuse, and torture that plainly classify them as victims of sex trafficking; and
- 4) Victims are trafficked into and are used in various forms of commercial sexual exploitation such as prostitution, pornography, and stripping. Thus prostitution and sexual trafficking are symbiotically related the existence of prostitution is the only reason sex trafficking exists.¹⁰

The Sexual Gulag is Big Business

In Japan, where prostitution is not legal, but widely tolerated, the sex industry is estimated to make 10,000bn (US $83 billion). There are an estimated 150,000 foreign women in the sex industry. Many of them are known to be trafficked from the Philippines, Thailand, Korea, Russia, and Latin America each year. Prostitution in the Philippines is a de facto legal industry that is now the fourth largest source of gross national product (GNP) for the country. Estimates vary but the likelihood is that there are nearly half a million persons in prostitution in the country and an estimated 100,000 of them are children. 300,000 sex tourists from Japan alone are believed to visit the Philippines every year.

The sex industry in the Netherlands is estimated to make almost $1 billion each year. It is a major destination country for trafficked women in Western Europe, with 2000 brothels and numerous escort services, using an estimated 30,000 women. Moreover, 68% of women in its sex industry are from other countries (see figure). Other estimates put this figure as high as 80 percent.¹⁹ Furthermore, representatives of its government have openly defended the demand for women in prostitution. "The demand is already there. We can't eradicate the demand. We will regulate it. Grant permits. Make them pay taxes."²⁰ This official also commented that, "Other countries may have women with working skills that will benefit the Netherlands. We could create special permits that will allow foreign nationals to engage in prostitution."

In Germany, where prostitution and brothels are legal, an estimated 400,000 prostitutes serve 1.2 million buyers a day in an industry with an annual turnover of 14 billion (US $18 billion). No one knows definitively how many of these are trafficked women, but the German news agency DPA has reported that approximately 200,000 prostitutes in the country have been "smuggled" into Germany from Central and Eastern Europe and that most of the prostitutes arrested in Germany in recent police raids come from Russia, Lithuania and Bulgaria.

In London suburbs, there are approximately 1000 brothels. According to Scotland Yard's Vice Squad the Eastern European crime gangs that run them make 50 million (US $91.6 million) a year. In London, a pimp can make 300,000 to 400,000 (US $549,000 to $733,000) a year from prostituting a 16-year-old girl.

More than 2.3 million girls and women are believed to make up India's sex industry. The U.N. reports that an estimated 40 percent are below 18 years of age.²⁸ In 2004, it was reported that transactions in prostitution are worth Rs 185 million (US $4.1 million) a day; Rs 370 billion (US $8.5 billion) per year.

In Antwerp, Belgium, legalization of prostitution has brought in nearly $800,000 of tax revenue to the city. Officials have gone so far as to encourage a business man who was planning to convert a warehouse into loft apartments to convert it into a brothel instead. He took their suggestion and has constructed the city's biggest brothel and is now considering opening a brothel chain.

In 2003, an IPO of brothel shares was introduced on Australia's stock exchange. The Daily Planet Ltd., the first such traded stock, has plans to launch a "sex Disneyland" in Sydney, and intends expansion to the U.S.

A 1998 study by the International Labor Organization on the sex industries of four Asian countries, reported that Indonesia's sex industry was as much as 2.4% (US $3.3 billion) of the gross domestic product and as much as 14% (US $27 billion) of Thailand's gross domestic product. The report stated, "The stark reality is that the sex sector is a big business that is well entrenched in the national International Labor Office, Geneva, p10. economies and the international economy,' with highly organized structures and linkages to other types of legitimate economic activity." According to the report, the revenues generated by the sex industry were crucial to the livelihoods and earnings potential of millions of workers beyond the "prostitutes" themselves. Owners, managers, pimps and other employees of the sex establishments, the related entertainment industry and some segments of the tourism industry make the number of workers earning a living directly or indirectly from prostitution several million. Support staff like cleaners, waitresses, cashiers, parking valets, security guards, medical practitioners, operators of food stalls in the vicinity of sex establishments, vendors of cigarettes and liquor, and property owners who rent premises to providers of sexual services are just some of those who profit from the existence of the Sexual Gulag. In an interview of Ms. Lin Lim, who edited the report, she said government policies had "encourage[d] the growth of tourism, promote[d] migration for employment, promote[d] exports of female labour for earning foreign exchange" and thus contributed indirectly to the growth of prostitution.

Clearly then, many governments and economic sectors have a vested interest in the continued existence and expansion of the Sexual Gulag.

Open Promotion

The Soviet gulags were often in remote and harsh locations, and when located within cities, "physical barriers such as walls and fences were meant to keep outsiders from seeing in." Not so with the Sexual Gulag. The fact that the Sexual Gulag is often fully integrated into the landscape of a community and that it openly seeks to attract outsiders as customers is a key distinction between the two systems.

For example, there is the famed red-light district of Amsterdam where women are put on display in windows for passersby on the street. The women are exhibited in much the same way as zoo animals, or as merchandise for sale in a hardware store. There is also Tijuana's notorious "Zona Norte" where on any given evening, scores of young women and girls are sexual fare openly for sale on the city streets. In this country, yellow pages and newspapers in most major cities run advertisements clearly offering sex for sale. The masters of the Sexual Gulag also opportunely take advantage of special events which lure large numbers of potential consumers as in Dortmund, Germany, one of 12 cities to host World Cup matches. There a series of drive-in wooden "sex huts" are being installed in Experts estimate as many as 40,000 prostitutes may travel to Germany to offer their services to fans during the tournament. City officials in Antwerp are reported to be considering putting decorative gates on the city's legal commercial sex zone to mark it as a tourist attraction.

Dehumanization One of the hallmarks of both the Soviet-styled system and the Sexual Gulag is that they rely upon methods of treatment of prisoners that dehumanize their captives. Applebaum writes, "Within the [Soviet] system, prisoners were treated as cattle, or rather as lumps of iron ore. Guards shuffled them around at will, loading and unloading them into cattle cars, weighing and measuring them, feeding them if it seemed they might be useful, starving them if they were not. They were, to use Marxist language, exploited, reified, and commodified."

The same is true of the captives of the Sexual Gulag. Women and children are bought and sold for prices ranging from $50 U.S., to prices exceeding $16,000.⁴³ They are inspected, shuttled, and traded. They are objects, things to be used for profit as long as their shelf life allows, not human beings.

Like inmates in a prison system, women in some brothels are even given ID numbers. For instance, one brothel in Antwerp, Belgium, has begun using biometric technology to keep track of the women. The women's finger prints are scanned into the system, and after being matched with their fingerprints in its database, the brothel's system clocks them in and flashes an ID number.⁴⁴ Another brothel, this one on the outskirts of Ocana, a city approximately 100 kilometers from Madrid, Spain, is surrounded by electrical wire, has barred windows and attack dogs on the grounds to prevent the women from escaping.

Life and Death in the Sexual Gulag

In their lives as sexual commodities, many of the women and children in the Sexual Gulag will experience a long litany of physical, psychological, and spiritual health harms from such things as:

Bodily injuries such as broken bones, concussions, burns, as well as vaginal and anal tearing from violent assaults, stabbings, rapes, and torture;

Traumatic brain injury (TBI): resulting in such things as memory loss, dizziness, headaches, numbness, etc.;

STDs such as HIV/AIDS, gonorrhea, syphilis, UTIs, and pubic lice;

Sterility, miscarriages, and menstrual problems;

Diseases like TB, hepatitis, malaria, and pneumonia;

Drug and alcohol addiction;

Forced abortions; and

Post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD).

The magnitude of these harms often does irreversible damage and hastens death. And to point out a statistic on just one of these harms, a study of 827 people in different types of prostitution in 9 countries found that 68% of those surveyed suffered PTSD symptoms in the same range as treatment-seeking combat veterans and refugees of state-organized torture.

This degree of trauma is hardly surprising. As Dr. Wendy Freed, in her research of brothel prostitution in Cambodia, explains:

"Sexual trauma is a violation of the most intimate and personal aspect of the self. One's own body becomes the setting in which the atrocities are perpetrated. For the women and adolescent girls living in a brothel, the sexual violations take place inside the tiny cubicle (smaller than most prison cells) that is their only private living space. There is no safe haven for them."

Echoing the findings of researchers, one survivor described her experience this way: "I feel like I imagine people who were in concentration camps feel when they get out . . . It's a real deep pain, an assault to my mind, my body, my dignity as a human being. I feel like what was taken away from me in prostitution is irretrievable."

A Canadian constable described a situation he observed where a man was picking up a prostitute, saying that the prostitute "was the most asexual human being I've ever met. She was (like) a concentration camp victim she looked exactly like the photos of the Jewish women at Auschwitz and Dachau."

Not very many women and children actually make it out of the Sexual Gulag. One reason: the homicide rate among prostituted women is many times higher than for women and men in other "occupational" environments: 204 per 100,000 among prostituted women, versus 4 for female liquor store workers.

This hazard of life in the Sexual Gulag is known by gulag masters and captives alike. For example, the owner of the Antwerp brothel mentioned above has also equipped rooms with panic buttons in case of trouble from buyers. Ironically comforted by this, one prostituted woman in this brothel said, "If something should happen to me and I turn up dead tomorrow the technology here means that police will know exactly who I am."

Seasoning

Understanding of the systematic coercive techniques - known as seasoning - used to break women and girls into prostitution is essential to understanding the power and control the masters of the Sexual Gulag have over their captives. Professionals in the fields of torture, domestic violence, child sexual abuse, and commercial sexual exploitation know that torturers, abusers, pimps, and traffickers use systematic methods to groom and reduce their victims "to the condition of slavery." "Binderman's Chart of Coercion," published by Amnesty International in 1973, describes these methods in detail. Techniques used on political prisoners like those in the Soviet gulag such as isolation, induced debility and exhaustion, threats, degradation, enforcing of trivial demands, granting of occasional indulgences, to mention a few, are the same means used to subjugate women in prostitution and pornography. In the Soviet system these types of procedures and others came to be called "the meat-grinder." Those in prostitution have described their trauma similarly: one fourteen year old stated: "You feel like a piece of hamburger meat all chopped up and barely holding together."

Captives of systems like the Soviet and Sexual Gulags develop strategies to enhance their survival. In her history of the Soviet gulags, Anne Applebaum dedicates an entire chapter to a discussion of "Strategies of Survival."⁵⁸ But survival strategies can deceive outsider observers into believing there is no abuse. This is particularly true of those captive to the Sexual Gulag.

"As people find the best way to survive, some of their behaviors may raise questions if viewed out of context. For example, the woman's and adolescent girl's flirtatiousness, seeking out clients, and getting clients to feel pity or love for them may represent strategies aimed at enhancing their survival."

"When an individual has been beaten into submission, and has become passive and accepting of what is done to her because she is a captive, then any sexual encounter she has is rape. Even if she has worked hard to attract the customer, because she has no right to refuse consent, she is being raped."

Thus we can understand that the woman we see on the street corner the supposed "voluntary prostitute" may give every appearance of choosing to be there, while the unseen forces that keep her there are every bit as real as if they were made of yards of barbed wire.

Recommendations

It's clear from the monumental profits generated by the sex industry that the fight against the Sexual Gulag is a battle like that of David against Goliath. Those who have profited have grown extremely powerful and it will take our relentless energy, creativity, sizeable resources, and a strategic plan to bring this giant down.

Current U.S. policy recognizes the innate harm in prostitution, and acknowledges the symbiosis between prostitution and sexual trafficking. In February 2003, a National Presidential Security Directive was signed by President Bush which states, "Prostitution and related activities, which are inherently harmful and dehumanizing, contribute to the phenomenon of trafficking in persons. . . ." This is an excellent policy foundation from which to begin. But to take new ground in the fight against sexual trafficking there are specific actions that should be taken:

1). The minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking in the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act should be enhanced to include the following provisions:

Whether the government of the country sponsors and supports law enforcement programs and non-governmental organizations tasked with reducing demand for international and domestic trafficking in persons and commercial sex acts as a factor for tier placement advancement.

Whether the government of the country has legalized its sex industry specifically including the activities of pimping, pandering, brothel keeping, and soliciting a prostitute as a factor for tier placement reduction.

2). The Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act should mandate a study of the economics of trafficking, including a detailed and comprehensive analysis of the money flows and connections to transnational organized crime, to be conducted by the U.S. Department of States Bureau of International Narcotics and Law. If we better understand how sex trafficking financial operations work, we will have a better chance of bringing them down.

3). Congress should pass the End Demand for Sex Trafficking Act of 2005. Passage of this bill will among other things strengthen prosecution and punishment of traffickers under the Mann Act. It authorizes federal funds for programs to establish model law enforcement programs for the prosecution of purchasers of commercial sex, as well as to enhance prosecution efforts of traffickers and pimps through surveillance efforts, prosecution for rape, sexual assault, as well as tax evasion.

Conclusion

Timerman, a Holocaust survivor, said in his book Prisoner Without a Name, "The Holocaust will be understood not so much for the number of victims as for the magnitude of the silence. And what obsesses me most is the repetition of the silence." This brings me back to the remarks of Catherine Booth whose challenging words I shared with you earlier: "I felt as though I must go and walk the streets and besiege the dens where these hellish iniquities are going on. To keep quiet seemed like being a traitor to humanity." So I thank you for your interest and concern about this tragic issue, and the opportunity to speak out on behalf of humanity; about what I believe is clearly a brutal and massive system supported and advanced by traffickers, pimps, brothel keepers, organized crime, corrupt government official, buyers of commercial sex, and a growing moral bankruptcy within civil society; a system which is sentencing and condemning women and girls to lives of brutal captivity in the Sexual Gulags of the world's brothels, massage parlors, and streets.

But neither speaking out nor learning about a problem are sufficient. With knowledge comes responsibility the duty to take action. On the wall of The Salvation Army National Headquarters where I work there is a plaque hanging in the lobby with these words of the founder General William Booth:

"While women weep as they do now, I'll fight;

While little children go hungry as they do now, I'll fight;

While men go to prison, in and out, in and out, I'll fight;

While there yet remains one dark soul without the light of God, I'll fight - I'll fight to the very end."

I agree with Booth. While women and children are captive to the Sexual Gulag, I'll fight I'll fight to the very end." Will you?

LOAD-DATE: June 22, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

COMMITTEE: HOUSE FINANCIAL SERVICES

TESTIMONY-BY: LISA L. THOMPSON, LIAISON

AFFILIATION: THE SALVATION ARMY NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS

56 of 359 DOCUMENTS

CQ Congressional Testimony

June 22, 2005 Wednesday

COMBATING INTERNATIONAL HUMAN TRAFFICKING

SECTION: CAPITOL HILL HEARING TESTIMONY

LENGTH: 1494 words

Opening Statement of Deborah Pryce U.S. Representative

Committee on House Financial Services Subcommittee on Domestic Monetary Policy, Technology And Economic Growth

June 22, 2005 2PM

I'd like to welcome everyone this afternoon. Today we are convening the second in a series of hearings in this Subcommittee on the very serious issue of trafficking in persons.

At our first hearing in April, we heard testimony from a great leader at the State Department's Trafficking in Persons office, Ambassador John Miller. Ambassador Miller offered a thorough and passionate testimony about U.S. efforts to combat trafficking here and abroad.

We also heard from Ms. Norma Hotaling, Executive Director and Founder of the SAGE Project in San Francisco. Norma turned her own experience with homelessness, addiction, and sexual exploitation into a mission to make it easier for other women, men, and youth who want to leave the sex trade behind, and find their way from the harsh effects of sexual exploitation to leave the sex trade behind.

Ms. Tina Frundt (pron: FRONT), our final witness, courageously offered her firsthand experience as a victim of sex trafficking and sexual exploitation in the United States. Her harrowing encounters of victimization by pimps and johns put a human face on this tragedy and shed light on an issue that is all too often kept in darkness.

I expect today's hearing to further expose members of this Subcommittee, members of the media, and the public to the multi-faceted and destructive issues surrounding human trafficking, including the significant economic and financial implications.

Today's hearing is timely for a number of reasons.

First, in stating the obvious, modern day slavery will be a timely issue to debate in the halls of Congress and in communities across the world until it has its own chapter - complete with a start and a finish - in the history books of every country in the world.

Second, just a few weeks ago, Ambassador Miller's Trafficking in Persons office at the State Department released its much anticipated Trafficking In Persons Report for 2005. The State Department is required by law to submit a report each year to Congress on the efforts of foreign governments to eliminate severe forms of trafficking in persons. This report, covering April 2004 to March 2005, is the fifth annual TIP Report.

The intent of the Report is to raise global awareness and prompt foreign governments to combat all forms of trafficking in persons. The Report highlights the "three P's" - prosecution, protection, and prevention, and the "three R's" - rescue, rehabilitation, and reintegration. There is great significance in this marriage between the Ps and the Rs, and we need to focus on both in order to fully understand and tackle the scope of the problem.

During my time overseas meeting with NGOs and victims, I saw firsthand the great potential to make this holistic approach work.

While no country I visited came close to perfecting this approach in its entirety, I witnessed improved prosecution efforts in Albania and the implementation of better prevention and reintegration efforts in Moldova, showing that progress can be made with commitment and coordination across the globe. Countries, including the U.S., must strive to implement all aspects of this victim-centered approach to fighting trafficking.

The 2005 Report gave a Tier 3 classification to 14 of the 150 countries that were assessed. A Tier 3 country fails to take significant actions to bring itself in compliance with the minimum standards for eliminating trafficking in persons. Such an assessment can trigger the withholding of non-humanitarian, non-trade-aid and U.S. opposition to assistance from public lenders such as the International Monetary Fund or the World Bank.

One country on the Tier 3 list has already ignited action. Jamaica, a country previously on the Tier 2 list, was downgraded for failure to follow through on previous commitments to strengthen law enforcement and protection measures.

Not long after the report's release, the Jamaican Prime Minister disclosed in a meeting with several journalists that a Cabinet Office group consisting of representatives of the ministries of health, education, and foreign affairs; the Attorney General's office; and immigration authorities would be established to act on the findings of the report and review existing law to identify areas to improve.

Several countries that were on the Tier 3 list last year jumped up a notch this year. For example, Bangladesh showed a strong commitment to implementing anti-trafficking efforts over the last year.

The country established an anti-trafficking committee to oversee its national efforts to combat the issue, and set up a much anticipated special anti-trafficking police unit, which initiated new investigations while rescuing more victims.

And, in South America, Guyana's president facilitated the enactment of the country's first anti-trafficking law and launched a country-wide awareness campaign on the dangers and risks.

The Report revealed that progress is being made in the campaign to combat sexual slavery and other forms of forced servitude. New anti-trafficking measures were enacted in 39 countries last year, and there were more than 3,000 convictions worldwide related to trafficking.

Upon release of the report, Ambassador Miller was quoted as saying "Shining through this global tragedy are many rays of hope. In addition to the tremendous efforts of heroic individuals and private organizations, governments around the globe are awakening to this issue and taking action to end this form of modern day slavery."

Though there is still much work to be done, the U.S. is putting its laws to work. In 2003, "Operation Predator" was launched within the Department of Homeland Security and the Immigration and Customs Enforcement Agency. This marked an unprecedented initiative to protect children worldwide from sexual predators, including those who travel overseas for sex with minors; Internet child pornographers; and child sex traffickers.

Operation Predator targets U.S. citizens suspected of sex crimes against children as well as non-citizens whose child sex crimes render them deportable from the U.S. Since its inception, there have been more than 5,700 individuals arrested nationwide, including 14 arrests brought under the child sex tourism provisions of the PROTECT Act.

While progress has been made to combat human trafficking, sobering statistics linger:

-- An estimated 600,000 to 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders each year, of which 80 percent are females and 50 percent are minors.

-- According to a recent study by the International Labor Organization, a special agency of the United Nations that seeks to promote human and labor rights, at least 12.3 million people are trapped in forced labor across the globe.

-- Of this number, over 2 million are victims of human trafficking and 1.2 million are children forced into prostitution, drug trafficking, and armed conflict.

-- These victims of trafficking are an enormous source of revenue for organized crime. The ILO study estimates that $44 billion in global profits is brought in annually from forced labor, including $15 billion from victims of trafficking in persons.

This report offers us evidence that there is much to learn about how effectively, or ineffectively, we are following the money and enforcing existing anti-money laundering laws to deprive criminals of the economic gains associated with the global sex trade. 8

There is not one clear cause of modern day slavery, nor is there one clear solution. But, there is a clear goal - to stamp out this global crisis for good.

As President George W. Bush so movingly stated in his 2005 Inaugural Address to the nation, a statement that Secretary Condoleezza Rice reminded us of upon release of the 2005 TIP Report, "America will not pretend that the jailed dissidents prefer their chains, or that women welcome humiliation and servitude, or that any human being aspires to live at the mercy of bullies."

That is why we have convened today. That is why we must not stop until we end the victimization of men, women and children across the globe. That is why we must continue to raise awareness and build support for restoring the most basic of human rights to those who have been swept up in the tidal wave of the modern day slave trade.

I want to thank the witnesses who have joined us here today. You each bring a unique perspective, and we appreciate your time, energy, and courage to educating us about this global crisis.

I'd like to now acknowledge the gentlewoman from New York, Mrs. Carolyn Maloney. Her passion for tackling this crisis is admirable, and I have very much enjoyed working with her in our shared goal to shed light on the sad and sobering issue of human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: June 29, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

COMMITTEE: HOUSE FINANCIAL SERVICES

SUBCOMMITTEE: DOMESTIC MONETARY POLICY, TECHNOLOGY AND ECONOMIC GROWTH

TESTIMONY-BY: DEBORAH PRYCE, U.S. REPRESENTATIVE

Copyright 2005 Congressional Quarterly, Inc. All Rights Reserved.

57 of 359 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 22, 2005 Wednesday

STATE'S MILLER CALLS HUMAN TRAFFICKING, SLAVERY GLOBAL PROBLEMS

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 748 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the State Department:

Human trafficking is a modern-day form of slavery and a worldwide problem, according to John Miller, senior adviser to the U.S. secretary of state on trafficking in persons.

In our country, the United States, there were people that just assumed that slavery must have ended with the American Civil War, and it came as a shock to find that slavery still existed -- in the form of human trafficking, Miller told a group of Kuwaiti journalists in a digital videoconference June 22.

He said, Our aim in these dialogues is to focus public attention on this issue so as to create discussion ' about ' the slavery issue within the country, to create discussion about what can be done, and we believe this discussion has the potential to lead to positive steps.

Miller differentiated between smuggling of immigrants and human trafficking. [W]e're referring here not to smuggling; we're referring here to people who find themselves in conditions of slavery, people who have lost their freedom, he said. He noted that many governments in the world, including that of Kuwait, have spoken out against slavery, but he said that the United States does not believe Kuwait is making significant efforts to combat slavery.

From our perspective, the deeds have yet to match the words, he said.

Kuwait was ranked as a Tier 3 country, the lowest possible ranking, in the State Department's recently released 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report. President Bush will review the rankings in September. He may either raise the ranking if improvements have been made or issue sanctions if nothing has been done.

Miller expressed hope that the government of Kuwait would develop a plan of action to protect those in conditions of slavery before Bush's review. He said, We are hopeful that there will be action. The whole purpose of this exercise is not to criticize; it is to bring progress in ending slavery, which is an international problem.

Miller explained that the rankings given to each country are reflections of the efforts being made in the country to stop trafficking, not the size of the problem. Even Tier 1 nations, those receiving the highest ranking, are not exempt from the issue in his opinion. He said, Tier 1 is only meeting minimum standards. Tier 1 doesn't mean you don't have a problem. I can tell you every country in this report in Tier 1 has a large problem.

The primary purpose of the report was to identify the problems. We don't tell anybody how to do something here. We're spotlighting an issue. We're reporting on it. We make recommendations, said Miller.

Kuwait, like many developed countries, such as the United States and Japan, was described as a destination country for slavery. Although these nations do not supply and sell slave labor, people within the nations buy it. Miller said, As destination countries, we have just as much responsibility as source countries.

Responding to a question about how Kuwait can address the problem, given that many Kuwaiti leaders employ slave labor, he said that government officials are certainly not immune and should be setting an example, a positive example. Miller encouraged the journalists to participate actively in stopping slavery within their country. He explained, When you write about this issue, you do increase public awareness. And when public awareness increases in democratic countries or in countries that are moving toward democracy, good things start to happen.

Throughout the discussion, Miller encouraged dialogue on the issue, asking for commentary about the reality of the situation in Kuwait and suggestions on how to end it. He also encouraged other countries and the United Nations to look at the United States' human trafficking situation. Miller said that the United States shares the burden of the worldwide slavery problem and that a thorough analysis of domestic trafficking will be released soon by the Department of Justice. Miller added that, based on his observations, people everywhere generally abhor slavery. He said he remains optimistic about the future of slavery in the world and said, I look forward to the day when this report is not necessary. The full text of the 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report is available on the State Department Web site.

(The Washington File is a product of the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State. Web site: <http://usinfo.state.gov>)

LOAD-DATE: June 24, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 States News Service

58 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

June 22, 2005

State's Miller Calls Human Trafficking, Slavery Global Problems; Ambassador urges all countries and United Nations to address the problem

BYLINE: Brittany Sterrett, Washington File Staff Writer

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 737 words

Washington -- Human trafficking is a modern-day form of slavery and a worldwide problem, according to John Miller, senior adviser to the U.S. secretary of state on trafficking in persons.

"In our country, the United States, there were people that just assumed that slavery must have ended with the American Civil War, and it came as a shock to find that slavery still existed" -- in the form of human trafficking, Miller told a group of Kuwaiti journalists in a digital videoconference June 22.

He said, "Our aim in these dialogues is to focus public attention on this issue so as to create discussion -- about -- the slavery issue within the country, to create discussion about what can be done, and we believe this discussion has the potential to lead to positive steps."

Miller differentiated between smuggling of immigrants and human trafficking. "[W]e're referring here not to smuggling; we're referring here to people who find themselves in conditions of slavery, people who have lost their freedom," he said.

He noted that many governments in the world, including that of Kuwait, have spoken out against slavery, but he said that the United States does not believe Kuwait is making "significant efforts to combat slavery."

"From our perspective, the deeds have yet to match the words," he said.

Kuwait was ranked as a Tier 3 country, the lowest possible ranking, in the State Department's recently released 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report. President Bush will review the rankings in September. He may either raise the ranking if improvements have been made or issue sanctions if nothing has been done.

Miller expressed hope that the government of Kuwait would develop a plan of action to protect those in conditions of slavery before Bush's review. He said, "We are hopeful that there will be action. The whole purpose of this exercise is not to criticize; it is to bring progress in ending slavery, which is an international problem."

Miller explained that the rankings given to each country are reflections of the efforts being made in the country to stop trafficking, not the size of the problem. Even Tier 1 nations, those receiving the highest ranking, are not exempt from the issue in his opinion. He said, "Tier 1 is only meeting minimum standards. Tier 1 doesn't mean you don't have a problem. I can tell you every country in this report in Tier 1 has a large problem."

The primary purpose of the report was to identify the problems. "We don't tell anybody how to do something here. We're spotlighting an issue. We're reporting on it. We make recommendations," said Miller.

Kuwait, like many developed countries, such as the United States and Japan, was described as a destination country for slavery. Although these nations do not supply and sell slave labor, people within the nations buy it. Miller said, "As destination countries, we have just as much responsibility as source countries."

Responding to a question about how Kuwait can address the problem, given that many Kuwaiti leaders employ slave labor, he said that government officials "are certainly not immune and should be setting an example, a positive example."

Miller encouraged the journalists to participate actively in stopping slavery within their country. He explained, "When you write about this issue, you do increase public awareness. And when public awareness increases in democratic countries or in countries that are moving toward democracy, good things start to happen."

Throughout the discussion, Miller encouraged dialogue on the issue, asking for commentary about the reality of the situation in Kuwait and suggestions on how to end it. He also encouraged other countries and the United Nations to look at the United States' human trafficking situation. Miller said that the United States shares the burden of the worldwide slavery problem and that a thorough analysis of domestic trafficking will be released soon by the Department of Justice.

Miller added that, based on his observations, people everywhere generally abhor slavery. He said he remains optimistic about the future of slavery in the world and said, "I look forward to the day when this report is not necessary."

The full text of the 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report is available on the State Department Web site.

(The Washington File is a product of the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: June 23, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

59 of 359 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 22, 2005 Wednesday 5:26 AM EST

STATE'S MILLER CALLS HUMAN TRAFFICKING, SLAVERY GLOBAL PROBLEMS

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 747 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's International Information Programs issued the following press release:

By Brittany Sterrett

Washington File Staff Writer

Human trafficking is a modern-day form of slavery and a worldwide problem, according to John Miller, senior adviser to the U.S. secretary of state on trafficking in persons.

"In our country, the United States, there were people that just assumed that slavery must have ended with the American Civil War, and it came as a shock to find that slavery still existed" - in the form of human trafficking, Miller told a group of Kuwaiti journalists in a digital videoconference June 22.

He said, "Our aim in these dialogues is to focus public attention on this issue so as to create discussion ... about ... the slavery issue within the country, to create discussion about what can be done, and we believe this discussion has the potential to lead to positive steps."

Miller differentiated between smuggling of immigrants and human trafficking. "We're referring here not to smuggling; we're referring here to people who find themselves in conditions of slavery, people who have lost their freedom," he said.

He noted that many governments in the world, including that of Kuwait, have spoken out against slavery, but he said that the United States does not believe Kuwait is making "significant efforts to combat slavery."

"From our perspective, the deeds have yet to match the words," he said.

Kuwait was ranked as a Tier 3 country, the lowest possible ranking, in the State Department's recently released 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report. President Bush will review the rankings in September. He may either raise the ranking if improvements have been made or issue sanctions if nothing has been done.

Miller expressed hope that the government of Kuwait would develop a plan of action to protect those in conditions of slavery before Bush's review. He said, "We are hopeful that there will be action. The whole purpose of this exercise is not to criticize; it is to bring progress in ending slavery, which is an international problem."

Miller explained that the rankings given to each country are reflections of the efforts being made in the country to stop trafficking, not the size of the problem. Even Tier 1 nations, those receiving the highest ranking, are not exempt from the issue in his opinion. He said, "Tier 1 is only meeting minimum standards. Tier 1 doesn't mean you don't have a problem. I can tell you every country in this report in Tier 1 has a large problem."

The primary purpose of the report was to identify the problems. "We don't tell anybody how to do something here. We're spotlighting an issue. We're reporting on it. We make recommendations," said Miller.

Kuwait, like many developed countries, such as the United States and Japan, was described as a destination country for slavery. Although these nations do not supply and sell slave labor, people within the nations buy it. Miller said, "As destination countries, we have just as much responsibility as source countries."

Responding to a question about how Kuwait can address the problem, given that many Kuwaiti leaders employ slave labor, he said that government officials "are certainly not immune and should be setting an example, a positive example."

Miller encouraged the journalists to participate actively in stopping slavery within their country. He explained, "When you write about this issue, you do increase public awareness. And when public awareness increases in democratic countries or in countries that are moving toward democracy, good things start to happen."

Throughout the discussion, Miller encouraged dialogue on the issue, asking for commentary about the reality of the situation in Kuwait and suggestions on how to end it. He also encouraged other countries and the United Nations to look at the United States' human trafficking situation. Miller said that the United States shares the burden of the worldwide slavery problem and that a thorough analysis of domestic trafficking will be released soon by the Department of Justice.

Miller added that, based on his observations, people everywhere generally abhor slavery. He said he remains optimistic about the future of slavery in the world and said, "I look forward to the day when this report is not necessary."

The full text of the 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report is available on the State Department Web site at <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/tiprpt/2005/>

LOAD-DATE: June 24, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

60 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 19, 2005 Sunday

Nigeria; Nigeria, Benin United Against Child Trafficking

BYLINE: This DayLENGTH: 2012 words

The evil called human trafficking is one that Nigeria and Benin Republic have taken a giant step to confront by signing a Co-operation Agreement. Max Amuchie, who was in Cotonou for the event, writes

Some time in 2003 about 300 children were discovered at a slave labour camp at some quarries in Abeokuta. The children were, in the words of Chief Akin Olujinmi, Attorney-General and Minister of Justice, "found working in very horrendous, degrading and inhuman conditions." With Nigeria's help, those children were repatriated back to Benin Republic, where they came from.

The issue of human trafficking is one that has engaged the imagination of people across the world over the years. Penultimate weekend, Nigeria and Benin Republic signed a co-operation in Cotonou, the capital of Benin Republic to put an end to child trafficking. At the auditorium of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and African Integration in Cotonou, Olujinmi signed the accord on behalf of Nigeria while Mr Biaou Rogatien, the Beninois Minister of Foreign Affairs and African Integration signed for his country.

The signing of the agreement followed months of intensive meetings and dialogue between both countries with UNICEF, Nigeria and Benin acting as the facilitators.

Earlier, between April 7 and 8, representatives of both countries governmental and non-governmental agencies from both countries and UNICEF had met at NICON Hilton Hotel, Abuja on what was termed third meeting on country response on child trafficking. The first meeting was held in March 2004 in Lagos while the second took place in June 2005 in Cotonou. These meetings, which were supported by UNICEF, enabled the two countries, to among other things, prepare the Co-operation Agreement.

At that meeting it was noted that "The regional status of child trafficking shows that both countries are source, transit and destination of children from Benin Republic to Nigeria. In addition Nigeria was also noted to be a country with recruiters and intermediaries."

For Nigeria, the highlights and issues included that Nigeria was and still is an origin, transit and destination country;

Nigerian girls working in Europe, Saudi Arabia and Benin Republic;

The ILO Report of 2003 noted that 19 per cent of children work in dangerous environment;

End use of victims of include domestic servants, bus conducting, street trading, agricultural jobs, prostitution in brothels, stone digging, scavenging, drug peddling, crime and violence;

Ratio between boys and girls is 7:3, while 50 per cent of victims are below 18 years;

Women and girls are mostly trafficked for sexual exploitation; Boys are often trafficked to Gabon for cheap labour; Children trafficked to Saudi Arabia are predominantly from states in the North; Deaf and dumb now operate the trafficking ring; Over 50 per cent of returnees are below 18-25 years; Countries from where trafficked Nigerians return in order of priority are Italy, Spain, Belgium, Saudi Arabia, Netherlands, Libya, UK, South Africa, Mali and Benin Republic;

Internal trafficking is increasing due to high demand for child workers at the household level; Security of traffickers and victims is guaranteed through voodoo men in Nigeria and even on departure and point of arrival in destination countries;

Camerounians use Nigeria as transit country to be trafficked to Algiers through Niger;

Togolese and Beninois use Nigeria as transit country to Gabon.

It was also noted that 69 Beninois children rescued in 2005 had been repatriated to Benin from Nigeria.

Furthermore, the National Agency for the Prohibition of Trafficking in Persons and Other Related Matters (NAPTI) was identified as a national monitoring centre that could save finger prints, names and other relevant information on convicted traffickers. The agency has also developed jingles as part of campaign against human trafficking.

In addition, UNICEF supported the production of 10,000 copies of the Trafficking Act.

For Nigeria, the challenges on child trafficking include that investigation and intelligence remain very costly while the judicial process is very slow. The rest are that resources for integration are scarce; awareness for end users of victims is low with penalties for end users negligible.

For Benin Republic, the issues and highlights of concern as stated in the April meeting in Abuja included that:

The country had undertaken policies aimed at eradicating trafficking in Benin in response ECOWAS MoU used as a basis;

Presentation made on interventions in the areas of legislation, awareness creation, community sensitisation, rehabilitation activities and poverty eradication;

Law on protection for family and children promulgated into law in 2004 and its translation is being used to sensitise the people;

Draft Bill against trafficking in progress and should be presented for passage into law before end of this year;

Study on trafficking to be supported by UNICEF will be conducted this year;

Study on juvenile delinquency funded from national resources to be carried out this year;

Liaison committee established for the defence of child rights, among others.

The challenges Benin Republic has had to contend with include lack of resources to fight poverty;

Effective co-operation between Nigeria and Benin Republic;

Monitoring at borders of the two countries;

Means of identifying the victims; and how to identify and discourage the end users of victims.

The meeting in Abuja finalised all the issues leading to the signing ceremony in Cotonou. The co-operation agreement between both countries is a??To prevent, suppress and punish trafficking in persons with emphasis on trafficking in women and children.a??

Article II of the Agreement set out the objectives, which are:

(i) To develop a common front to prevent, fight, suppress and punish trafficking in women and children by setting up joint security surveillance patrols and joint sensitisation and campaigns along border areas of the two countries;

(ii) To protect, rehabilitate and reintegrate victims of trafficking into their original environment;

(iii) To promote friendly co-operation between the parties with a view to attaining these objectives.

The Agreement provides for the setting up of a joint committee to implement provisions of the Agreement. The two countries are to have equal representation on the committee.

It further provides for the formation of joint security surveillance patrol team that would detect, arrest and punish traffickers. The border patrol team will also educate and sensitise local communities at the border on the negative consequences of trafficking in persons.

The accord provides that the two countries should, in strict confidence, exchange information relevant to on possible steps to be taken with a view to combating trafficking in persons and other information that could aid in the prosecution of offenders.

In a case where an offender is to be deported, the host country is enjoined to inform the country of origin of the date and means of transportation.

Notwithstanding their immigration status of victims, both countries are enjoined in the Agreement to treat victims of trafficking as victims and not as criminals. They are not to detain, torture or subject victims to degrading or inhumane treatment. They have to provide for the physical safety, medical care, and provision of shelter, psychosocial support, feeding and clothing for the victims while they are within the territory of the host country.

The fourth chapter of the Agreement makes elaborate provision for the repatriation, rehabilitation and reintegration of victims of trafficking.

In his speech after signing the agreement on behalf of Nigeria, Olujimi said: "Apart from the fact that Nigeria and Benin Republic share common borders, the two countries also share cultural, linguistic, religious and historical affinity. These borders seem more imaginary than real having regard to the level of commercial and social interaction between the two countries. It is a known fact that trans-national crime such as human trafficking has no respect for national borders, hence the need to co-operate with each other at this level."

He said traffickers had developed sophistication in their effort to beat national laws and border controls. "They resort to subtle means of deceit, enticement and superior position of authority to lure their victims from one jurisdiction where the offences are severe to another where the offences are less severe. Victims are led into claws of servitude and slavery, exploitation and abuse of human rights."

Olujimi thanked UNICEF Nigeria and UNICEF Benin for their initiative, financial and technical support in the effort towards making the agreement between the two countries a reality.

In his reply, Mr Rogatien expressed delight at the accord. He debunked claims that his country has not been doing enough to fight trafficking in women and children. He said the fact that the accord was being signed one week ahead of June 16, which is Day of the African Child was evidence of how serious the two countries took the issue of child trafficking.

Dr Phillippe Duamelle, UNICEF Representative in Benin, in his speech, said: "This new era of strengthened co-operation between the Republic of Benin and Nigeria to fight trafficking in persons must rapidly lead to concrete actions. Every day, we face dramatic consequences of this scourge for the victims and for the development of both countries. This agreement will enable a stronger mobilisation to eradicate trafficking, especially child trafficking."

Dr Barbara Reynolds, Deputy Country Representative, UNICEF, Nigeria, congratulated both countries on the agreement. She said the word, trafficking should not be associated with a human being and urged Nigeria and Benin to implement the agreement.

In a statement issued after the ceremony, UNICEF said the signing of the agreement "marks an important step forward in the fight against child trafficking and illustrates the determination of the Republic of Benin and Nigeria to join forces against trafficking in persons.

The statement quoted Ayalew Abai, UNICEF Nigeria Representative as saying: "As child trafficking is now a cross border issue, initiating international co-operation through bilateral agreement is important to obtain better results. We hope that the Benin-Nigeria agreement will be an example for other countries."

In an interview with THISDAY after the ceremony, Olujimi said Nigeria was committed to the agreement and would do every thing within her power to bring the menace to an end. He said even without any formal agreement, Nigeria repatriated the girls discovered in Abeokuta to Benin Republic in 2003.

Also, the fact that Nigeria was this month upgraded from the status of Second tier Watch List to Second tier Status by the US Department of State was evidence of the country's concerted effort in the fight against human trafficking.

He commended the effort of the National Agency for the Prohibition of Traffic in Persons and Other Related Matters (NAPTIP) for the relentless war the agency was waging on human trafficking in Nigeria. He said the agency successfully prosecuted the case of a woman child trafficker in Benin, Edo State this year and got her convicted for child trafficking.

Also in an interview with THISDAY, Mrs Carol Ndaguba, Executive Secretary and Chief Executive of NAPTIP, stressed the readiness of her agency to wage the war against human traffickers in Nigeria. She said Benin was the agreement with Republic of Benin was first and that similar accords with other countries sharing border with Nigeria would be explored in the near future.

She commended UNICEF and all other agencies that have been supporting NAPTIP in the war against human trafficking.

The Joint Committee set up by both countries later met in Quidah, Benin Republic, where the joint plan of action against trafficking in persons was finalised and adopted.

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 AllAfrica, Inc.

61 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 17, 2005 Friday 9:55 AM GMT

US insists human trafficking report not 'political'

LENGTH: 341 wordsDATELINE: BANGKOK June 17

The US State Department defended its annual human trafficking report against accusations that it is a political tool used by Washington to pressure target countries, with one author Friday insisting its findings are impartial.

Military-ruled Myanmar and Cambodia have complained about being blacklisted, with both being relegated to the report's "tier three" of worst offenders which failed to meet the State Departments minimum standards against trafficking.

"We firmly believe that Burma is a tier three country," said Mark Taylor, senior coordinator in the office to monitor and combat trafficking in persons, using the country's former name.

"It is not making significant efforts to address trafficking for forced labour and until we see signs that it is, it will remain at that level."

Though Cambodia has been praised for curbing child sex crimes, it was relegated to tier three for the first time since 2002 because of its failure to convict traffickers or prosecute public officials involved in the flesh trade.

"While we appreciate their cooperation in getting these American paedophiles back to the US for prosecution, we call on them (Cambodia) to prosecute the trafficker who took the child to the brothel keeper that provided this child for rape for profit in the beginning," Taylor said.

Taylor, who was visiting Thailand as part of a regional tour to discuss the report's findings, said the State Department worked hard to ensure the report stuck to its "objective" criteria.

The 2005 report assigned 14 countries to tier three, including US allies Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and United Arab Emirates, he said.

"I hope that that speaks to its ability to see past the political prism and to the objective criteria," Taylor said.

Myanmar has attacked the report as "lacking in objectivity".

"Myanmar does not condone the practice of trafficking in persons and is constantly striving to overcome the pernicious practice," state media said last week, carrying a foreign ministry report highlighting the junta's efforts to combat trafficking.

pjl/mlm/sdm

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2005 Agence France Presse
All Rights Reserved

62 of 359 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 16, 2005, Thursday

Japan revises Penal Code, immigration law to combat human trafficking

SOURCE: Kyodo News Service, Tokyo, in English 04:23 GMT, 16 Jun 05

LENGTH: 321 words

Text of report in English by Japanese news agency Kyodo

Tokyo, 16 June: Japan's parliament on Thursday [16 June] approved legislation to revise the Penal Code and immigration law to punish those involved in human trafficking, while granting victims special residency status to protect them even if they have overstayed their visas. The House of Representative passed a set of relevant bills in a plenary session. The House of Councillors approved them in April.

Under the revised laws, those who purchase a person and put him or her under their control would face three months to five years in prison. The maximum punishment would be increased to seven years if the victim is a minor.

In cases of human trafficking for profits or sexual purposes, the penalty would be even harsher or the prison term would span from one year to 10 years. Human trafficking victims would be permitted to stay in Japan at the discretion of the justice minister so they can receive treatment before returning to their countries. During the stay, they will be asked to cooperate with the Japanese police in investigations, including by explaining how they had entered the country.

Foreign nationals who are found to be involved in human trafficking will be deported under the revised laws. Those who have provided forged travel documents to others with the intention of sending them to Japan would face a prison term of up to three years or a fine of up to 3m yen. The laws also require airline operators to confirm travel documents of their passengers to prevent human smuggling.

The move came after the US State Department placed Japan on the special watch list of countries on the verge of falling into the worst category in human trafficking in June last year. Earlier this month, the State Department removed Japan from the list after it compiled an action programme, including these legal changes, last December.

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2005

LANGUAGE: English

63 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

June 16, 2005 Thursday

Japan revises Penal Code, immigration law to fight human trafficking

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 312 wordsDATELINE: TOKYO, June 16

Japan's parliament on Thursday approved legislation to revise the Penal Code and immigration law to punish those involved in human trafficking, while granting victims special residency status to protect them even if they have overstayed their visas.

The House of Representative passed a set of relevant bills in a plenary session. The House of Councillors approved them in April.

Under the revised laws, those who purchase a person and put him or her under their control would face three months to five years in prison. The maximum punishment would be increased to seven years if the victim is a minor.

In cases of human trafficking for profits or sexual purposes, the penalty would be even harsher or the prison term would span from one year to 10 years.

Human trafficking victims would be permitted to stay in Japan at the discretion of the justice minister so they can receive treatment before returning to their countries.

During the stay, they will be asked to cooperate with the Japanese police in investigations, including by explaining how they had entered the country.

Foreign nationals who are found to be involved in human trafficking will be deported under the revised laws.

Those who have provided forged travel documents to others with the intention of sending them to Japan would face a prison term of up to three years or a fine of up to 3 million yen.

The laws also require airline operators to confirm travel documents of their passengers to prevent human smuggling.

The move came after the U.S. State Department placed Japan on the special watch list of countries on the verge of falling into the worst category in human trafficking in June last year.

Earlier this month, the State Department removed Japan from the list after it compiled an action program, including these legal changes, last December.

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

64 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

June 16, 2005

OSCE Countries Fighting Human Trafficking, but More Work Needed; U.S. diplomat Brucker cites report findings at OSCE Permanent Council

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 552 words

Both developed and developing countries share responsibility for curbing human trafficking and assisting victims, U.S. diplomat Katherine Brucker told the Permanent Council of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) June 16 as she noted the release of the State Department's fifth annual Trafficking in Persons Report.

"All states must work together to close down trafficking routes, prosecute and convict traffickers, and protect and reintegrate victims into society," Brucker said.

She said no OSCE countries were given a Tier 3 ranking for 2005 -- the lowest ranking, which is reserved for countries that do not comply with minimum standards under the United States' Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000.

"Yet we know that because the problem of human trafficking is so large, all OSCE participating States have much more work left to do," Brucker said.

The full text of the Trafficking in Persons Report is available on the State Department Web site.

Following are Brucker's remarks to the Permanent Council:

(begin text)

United States Mission to the OSCE

RELEASE OF THE 2005 DEPARTMENT OF STATE TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT

As delivered by Deputy Political Counselor Katherine Brucker to the Permanent Council, Vienna

June 16, 2005

Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to announce the release on June 3 of the United States Department of State's annual Trafficking in Persons Report.

This fifth annual report, along with the $96 million in anti-trafficking assistance our nation provided to foreign governments and non-government organizations last year, demonstrates our strong commitment to this cause.

This year, we included more country analyses as a result of deeper research and a wider range of sources. We also expanded our coverage of labor slavery, especially internal labor trafficking. Forced labor and involuntary servitude are appallingly common, including whole villages working to pay off old debts passed down through generations.

We trust that this year's report will raise international awareness of the crime of trafficking and spur governments across the globe to take determined actions against it.

All states must work together to close down trafficking routes, prosecute and convict traffickers, and protect and reintegrate victims into society. The responsibility does not rest only with developing countries, whose citizens are vulnerable to trafficking because of poverty, corruption, or lack of education. Destination or demand countries, like the United States and other prosperous nations, whose citizens create the marketplace for trafficking, also bear a heavy responsibility.

We are pleased to note that there are no OSCE countries on Tier 3 this year; yet we know that because the problem of human trafficking is so large, all OSCE participating States have much more work left to do.

The entire report, which covers 150 countries, can be found at <http://www.state.gov/>

The report will be followed later this month by an assessment of how the United States is doing in combating human trafficking.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

(end text)

(Distributed by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

65 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Xinhua General News Service

June 16, 2005 Thursday 11:01 AM EST

Japan revises Penal Code, immigration law to fight human trafficking

SECTION: WORLD NEWS; PoliticalLENGTH: 305 wordsDATELINE: TOKYO

Japan's parliament Thursday approved legislation to revise the Penal Code and immigration law to punish those involved in human trafficking, while granting victims special residency status to protect them even if they have overstayed their visas.

The House of Representative passed a set of relevant bills in a plenary session.

The House of Councilors approved them in April.

Under the revised laws, those who purchase a person and put him or her under their control would face three months to five years in prison. The maximum punishment would be increased to seven years if the victim is a minor.

In cases of human trafficking for profits or sexual purposes, the penalty would be even harsher or the prison term would span from one year to 10 years.

Human trafficking victims would be permitted to stay in Japan at the discretion of the justice minister so they can receive treatment before returning to their countries.

During the stay, they will be asked to cooperate with the Japanese police in investigations, including by explaining how they had entered the country.

Foreign nationals who are found to be involved in human trafficking will be deported under the revised laws.

Those who have provided forged travel documents to others with the intention of sending them to Japan would face a prison term of up to three years.

The laws also require airline operators to confirm travel documents of their passengers to prevent human smuggling.

The move came after the US State Department placed Japan on the special watch list of countries on the verge of falling into the worst category in human trafficking in June last year.

Earlier this month, the State Department removed Japan from the list after it compiled an action program, including these legal changes, last December.

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

66 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 14, 2005 Tuesday 9:56 AM GMT

Japan lacks support system to help victims of human trafficking: study

LENGTH: 344 wordsDATELINE: TOKYO June 14

Japan must do more to fight human trafficking by providing legal and medical support to women who often fear retaliation if they escape from enslavement, a study by activists and scholars said Tuesday.

Japan has taken actions such as tightening visa rules after being put on a US watchlist in 2004 for human trafficking, but the moves are not enough, the report by more than 100 groups said.

"We have heard from victims that they want Japanese authorities to step up their regulatory activities and help them," said Rieko Aoki, a social worker who took part in the study.

"Non-government organizations are offering a variety of help. But they do not have money to give medical care and mental care in the languages that trafficking victims understand. The government must offer help," she told a news conference.

Tokyo must also coordinate with authorities abroad to ensure the safety of victims who are repatriated, said Nanako Inaba, an associate professor specializing in migration and gender studies at Ibaraki University.

"Even after they return home, many victims fear repercussions from traffickers, who are often their relatives or acquaintances," Inaba said.

Japan this year began tightening rules on "entertainer" visas, despite protests from the Philippines which worried that legitimate workers would suffer.

But the study said smugglers were also becoming more clever. It said some traffickers drew highly educated Thai women into Japan's sex trade with promises of work under a bilateral free trade agreement that is still being negotiated.

Human trafficking victims in Japan are mainly Asians but the number of victims from Eastern Europe and Latin America is on the rise, the study said.

The number of victims of trafficking fell in the mid-1990s as Japan plunged into recession but the slump also took attention off the problem, it said.

"We believe it is important that we discuss this issue to lobby the government for improved public policies to help victims of trafficking," said Tamie Kaino, professor of law and gender science at Ochanomizu University.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2005 Agence France Presse
All Rights Reserved

67 of 359 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 14, 2005, Tuesday

Japanese House committee passes human trafficking bill

SOURCE: Kyodo News Service, Tokyo, in English 03:48 GMT, 14 Jun 05

LENGTH: 244 words

Text of report in English by Japanese news agency Kyodo

Tokyo, 14 June: The House of Representatives Judicial Affairs Committee on Tuesday [14 June] approved bills to revise laws to punish those involved in human trafficking while granting victims special residency status to protect them even if they have overstayed their visas.

The bills to revise the Penal Code and the immigration law, which were already passed by the House of Councillors in April, will be tabled for a vote at the full lower house later this week.

Under the revised laws, those who purchase a person to put him or her under their control will face punishment of three months to five years in prison. The maximum punishment will be increased to seven years if the victim is a minor.

In cases of human trafficking for profits or sexual purposes, the penalty will be even harsher or the prison term will be longer than one year and up to 10 years.

Meanwhile, human trafficking victims will be permitted to stay in Japan at the discretion of the justice minister so they can be rehabilitated before returning to their countries.

The move came after the US State Department placed Japan on the special watch list of countries on the verge of falling into the worst category in human trafficking in June last year.

Earlier this month, the State Department removed Japan from the list after it compiled an action programme, including these planned legal changes.

LOAD-DATE: June 14, 2005

LANGUAGE: English

68 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

June 14, 2005 Tuesday

House committee OKs bill against human trafficking

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 365 wordsDATELINE: TOKYO, June 14

The House of Representatives Judicial Affairs Committee on Tuesday approved a set of bills to punish those involved in human trafficking while granting victims special residency status to protect them even if they have overstayed their visas.

The bills to revise the Penal Code and the immigration law, which were passed by the House of Councillors in April, will be tabled for a vote at the full lower house later this week.

Under the revised laws, those who purchase a person and put him or her under their control would face three months to five years in prison. The maximum punishment would be increased to seven years if the victim is a minor.

In cases of human trafficking for profits or sexual purposes, the penalty would be even harsher or the prison term longer than one year and up to 10 years.

Meanwhile, human trafficking victims would be permitted to stay in Japan at the discretion of the justice minister so they can be rehabilitated before returning to their countries.

The move came after the U.S. State Department placed Japan on the special watch list of countries on the verge of falling into the worst category in human trafficking in June last year.

Earlier this month, the State Department removed Japan from the list after it compiled an action program, including these planned legal changes.

The Japanese government has been asking for cooperation from countries from which women are being sent to Japan to help combat human trafficking.

The Foreign Ministry has already dispatched officers to the Philippines and Colombia to ask law-enforcement authorities in these countries to crack down on brokers who are sending women to Japan for prostitution and other services, ministry officials said.

The ministry is considering sending officers to Russia and East European countries as well in late July, the officials said.

They said the officers plan to ask local churches to issue warnings about human trafficking during services, for example.

The number of female victims of human trafficking detected by the government came to 77 in 2004, including 48 Thais, 13 Philippines, five Taiwanese and five Colombians.

LOAD-DATE: June 14, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

69 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

June 14, 2005 Tuesday

House committee OKs bill on human trafficking

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 230 wordsDATELINE: TOKYO, June 14

The House of Representatives Judicial Affairs Committee on Tuesday approved bills to revise laws to punish those involved in human trafficking while granting victims special residency status to protect them even if they have overstayed their visas.

The bills to revise the Penal Code and the immigration law, which were already passed by the House of Councillors in April, will be tabled for a vote at the full lower house later this week.

Under the revised laws, those who purchase a person to put him or her under their control will face punishment of three months to five years in prison. The maximum punishment will be increased to seven years if the victim is a minor.

In cases of human trafficking for profits or sexual purposes, the penalty will be even harsher or the prison term will be longer than one year and up to 10 years.

Meanwhile, human trafficking victims will be permitted to stay in Japan at the discretion of the justice minister so they can be rehabilitated before returning to their countries.

The move came after the U.S. State Department placed Japan on the special watch list of countries on the verge of falling into the worst category in human trafficking in June last year.

Earlier this month, the State Department removed Japan from the list after it compiled an action program, including these planned legal changes.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 Kyodo News Service

70 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

June 14, 2005 Tuesday

House committee OKs bill against human trafficking

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 365 wordsDATELINE: TOKYO, June 14

The House of Representatives Judicial Affairs Committee on Tuesday approved a set of bills to punish those involved in human trafficking while granting victims special residency status to protect them even if they have overstayed their visas.

The bills to revise the Penal Code and the immigration law, which were passed by the House of Councillors in April, will be tabled for a vote at the full lower house later this week.

Under the revised laws, those who purchase a person and put him or her under their control would face three months to five years in prison. The maximum punishment would be increased to seven years if the victim is a minor.

In cases of human trafficking for profits or sexual purposes, the penalty would be even harsher or the prison term longer than one year and up to 10 years.

Meanwhile, human trafficking victims would be permitted to stay in Japan at the discretion of the justice minister so they can be rehabilitated before returning to their countries.

The move came after the U.S. State Department placed Japan on the special watch list of countries on the verge of falling into the worst category in human trafficking in June last year.

Earlier this month, the State Department removed Japan from the list after it compiled an action program, including these planned legal changes.

The Japanese government has been asking for cooperation from countries from which women are being sent to Japan to help combat human trafficking.

The Foreign Ministry has already dispatched officers to the Philippines and Colombia to ask law-enforcement authorities in these countries to crack down on brokers who are sending women to Japan for prostitution and other services, ministry officials said.

The ministry is considering sending officers to Russia and East European countries as well in late July, the officials said.

They said the officers plan to ask local churches to issue warnings about human trafficking during services, for example.

The number of female victims of human trafficking detected by the government came to 77 in 2004, including 48 Thais, 13 Philippines, five Taiwanese and five Colombians.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

71 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

June 13, 2005 Monday

House committee OKs bill on human trafficking

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 230 wordsDATELINE: TOKYO, June 14

The House of Representatives Judicial Affairs Committee on Tuesday approved bills to revise laws to punish those involved in human trafficking while granting victims special residency status to protect them even if they have overstayed their visas.

The bills to revise the Penal Code and the immigration law, which were already passed by the House of Councillors in April, will be tabled for a vote at the full lower house later this week.

Under the revised laws, those who purchase a person to put him or her under their control will face punishment of three months to five years in prison. The maximum punishment will be increased to seven years if the victim is a minor.

In cases of human trafficking for profits or sexual purposes, the penalty will be even harsher or the prison term will be longer than one year and up to 10 years.

Meanwhile, human trafficking victims will be permitted to stay in Japan at the discretion of the justice minister so they can be rehabilitated before returning to their countries.

The move came after the U.S. State Department placed Japan on the special watch list of countries on the verge of falling into the worst category in human trafficking in June last year.

Earlier this month, the State Department removed Japan from the list after it compiled an action program, including these planned legal changes.

LOAD-DATE: June 14, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 Kyodo News Service

72 of 359 DOCUMENTS

San Jose Mercury News (California)

June 12, 2005 Sunday MORNING FINAL EDITION

HUMAN TRAFFICKING IN JAPAN PRESENTS FORMIDABLE CHALLENGE; BUREAUCRACY, TRADITION SLOW NATION'S EFFORT TO AID FEMALE WORKERS

BYLINE: SHARON NOGUCHI AND EMI DOI, Knight Ridder

SECTION: FRONT; Pg. 17A

LENGTH: 820 words

DATELINE: TOKYO

Angel Kiss, Zeus and cabarets that offer "live love" still beckon customers in Kabukicho, Tokyo's infamous red-light district. But near-daily police and immigration raids have banished the women who once openly solicited potential customers on the street.

Humiliated by international criticism of its commerce in girls and women, Japan last year began to clamp down on human trafficking. Yet the tougher laws that are expected to pass next month face huge obstacles. Japan must reorient a slow-moving bureaucracy, overcome widespread social acceptance of sex for hire, and take on the powerful sex industry and the criminal groups that control it.

Marisela -- not her real name -- entered Japan on a tourist visa procured by a recruiter. The waitress job that she thought would support her two daughters in the Philippines turned out to be a bar-hostessing job that included being sent out on calls with customers. Like most women in the industry, she was moved from place to place and sometimes was terrified. "I thought if I complained, I would get killed," she said.

Thousands of Mariselas, desperate to earn money for their families, slip into Japan on short-term visas or with falsified passports. Told that they have to pay off debts of sometimes 5 million yen ($47,600), they're held captive, beaten and controlled by threats to their families at home, anti-trafficking groups say.

Estimates of the number of victims vary wildly. The National Police Agency identified 79 in 2004 from among arrested illegal foreigners. The Organization of American States estimates that 1,700 girls and women from Latin America have been sold in Japan. Anti-trafficking groups say there are more than 100,000 victims, mostly Thais, Filipinas and Colombians -- but also Russians, Chinese, Koreans, Taiwanese and other Southeast Asians.

Until now, police dealt with the problem by arresting the victims as illegal immigrants, jailing and deporting them as soon as they presented enough money for airfare home.

Trafficked women often live brutal, desolate lives, forced into having unprotected sex with sometimes dozens of customers a day, say those who work rescuing the women.

"The Japanese are the coldest people, without any heart, that can possibly exist in the world," one girl, who arrived at age 16, wrote in a statement after she fled to the Colombian Consulate. "Besides the mafia who own us, on the streets they treat us as criminals and beat me when I don't earn enough money. They force us to do horrible, repulsive things, and often the police come in, showing their badge, and force us to service them for free."

The United States, the International Labor Organization and other groups have singled out Japan for harsh criticism. A U.S. State Department report last year demoted Japan to a "watch list" of foot-dragging governments -- the same ranking as Laos and Russia -- in human trafficking.

Globally, the International Labor Organization estimates that 12.3 million people are victims of forced labor, including 2.4 million trafficking victims -- a majority of them in the Asia-Pacific region.

The 2004 State Department report jolted Japan into speeding up reform.

This year's State report, released June 1, credited Tokyo with progress in addressing the problem.

Two months ago, the government began cutting back on entertainer visas, which last year were issued to 80,000 people, mostly Filipinas. Those were a sham, said Hidenori Sakanaka, a former head of the Tokyo Regional Immigration Bureau. "The women are ordered to become hostesses, even though they are invited as singers or dancers, and end up in prostitution," he said.

After his agents embarked on an aggressive campaign 10 years ago, arresting illegal entertainers as well as club owners and brokers, he received irate phone calls from politicians and anonymous threats on his life, he said. "Trafficking is the shame of Japan," he wrote in a recently published book.

For more than a year, immigration and police officers have been arresting thousands of undocumented workers, including trafficking victims. To live up to an October 2003 pledge to cut in half the population of illegal foreigners in Tokyo, then estimated at 125,000, officers have staked out stations and streets populated by Third World migrants.

Agents are so busy that the immigration jails are full.

To have an impact, authorities will have to tackle the most difficult problem of all: challenging the Japanese yakuza and their foreign partners who profit from the trafficking.

Last year, 46 people were found guilty of trafficking-related crimes. Sentences, however, sometimes have been light.

New laws criminalizing human trafficking and beefing up penalties will allow authorities to crack down on brokers. Currently, immigration agents who record victims' testimonies can arrest only the visa violators, not the traffickers.

LOAD-DATE: September 14, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Photo;

PHOTO: TORIN BOYD -- KNIGHT RIDDER

The Kabukicho quarter is a major entertainment hub that contains Tokyo's red-light district, recently the scene of immigration raids as Japan tries to confront its powerful and entrenched sex industry.

Copyright 2005 San Jose Mercury News
All Rights Reserved

73 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 10, 2005 Friday

Ghana; Ghana's Human Trafficking Ranking Drops

BYLINE: Public AgendaLENGTH: 759 words

Ghana has moved from Tier One of US State Department's Human trafficking ranking to Tier two this year.

To be demoted to two tier means Ghana is neither bad or worse off well in terms of protecting children.

According to the Fifth Annual Trafficking in Persons report (TIP) issued on June 3, 2005 in Washington, Ghana has become an important source, transit and destination country for women and children trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced domestic and commercial labour.

Speaking via Video Conference in Washington DC, the Africa Desk Officer in charge of Monitoring and preparing the annual report Rachel Yousey said the Government of Ghana does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking.

"Ghanaian Children are trafficked internally for forced labour in fishing communities and Cocoa plantations," said the report. Ghanaian children are also trafficked to Ivory Coast, Togo, Nigeria and the Gambia for exploitation as labourers or domestic servants.

Recruiters according to the report target poor children who are removed from the home community with their parents consent.

This is because the country has no legislation on human trafficking.

The report further said Ghanaian women and girls are trafficked to Western Europe especially to Germany, Italy and the Netherlands for sexual exploitation.

The report also said some young Ghanaian women are trafficked for involuntary domestic servitude in the Middle East. "Nigerian females moved to Western Europe for sexual exploitation transit in Ghana as do Burkinabe victims on their way to La Cote d'Ivoire.

Victims also include children brought to Ghana from La Cote d'Ivoire, Togo, Benin and Nigeria for forced Labour.

Reacting, the MP for North Dayi, Akua Sena Dansua said, there is no special trafficking ring that recruits women for sexual exploitation in Europe. "These Women travel on their own volition and enter into prostitution when they are unable to face the realities of life in Europe," she said.

She however said Ghana is making efforts aimed at curbing the problem.

"Ghana continues educating the public and providing assistance to trafficked children and their families," Yousey said adding, "but law enforcement efforts were disjointed and hampered by lack of comprehensive national trafficking law."

On prosecution Yousey said the government did not make significant progress in identifying and prosecuting trafficking cases, though it provided modest resources for child victims and reunited child victims with their families during the reporting period.

She further said anti-trafficking legislation proposed since 2002 did not reach Parliament.

"Laws prohibiting slavery, prostitution, use of underage labour and manufacture of fraudulent documents exists, but officials did not keep data on internal cases relating to trafficking and could not determine how many of the approximately 250 reported cases of abduction, child stealing and child abuse involved trafficking.

The US report also made mention of the Ghana Government's refusal to extradite a Ghanaian Member of Parliament for trial in a US court for trafficking a woman to the US for forced domestic servitude.

On protection the report further said the government further worked with the IOM to offer start up assistance for resettlement of repatriated children in their home communities, while few officials were trained in recognizing trafficking and providing assistance to victims.

Yousey also says although resources were scarce, the government of Ghana remains a leader in Africa for its continued efforts to educate the public.

Agencies like the Women and Juvenile Unit of the Ghana police service, the Ghana Child labour Unit, the Department of Social Welfare held community meetings and distributed handbills in local languages to the citizenry.

What the government has to do to reclaim its Tier One position according to Yousey is to seek the passage and implementation of trafficking legislation.

She however said there are no ramifications for the Tier Two position.

Tier one countries are countries whose government complies fully with the minimum standards, while Tier two category consist of countries whose governments do not comply fully with the Acts Minimum standards.

Tier three position is the worst of all and it consists of countries whose governments do not fully comply and are not making efforts to do so. This category attracts sanctions such as denial of aid among others.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

74 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 10, 2005 Friday

Nigeria; Nigeria, Benin Sign MOU On Child Trafficking

BYLINE: This DayLENGTH: 848 words

Nigeria and the Republic of Benin on Thursday signed a Memorandum of Understanding on the fight against trafficking in women and children.

In a ceremony that took place in the conference room of the Beninois Ministry of Foreign Affairs and African Integration in Cotonou, the capital of Benin Republic, Chief Akinlolu Olujimi, Attorney-General and Minister of Justice signed on behalf of Nigeria. Mr Biaou Rogatien, Beninois Minister of Foreign Affairs and African Integration signed on behalf of his country.

In his speech at the ceremony, Olujimi said: "Apart from the fact that Nigeria and Benin Republic share common borders, the two countries also share cultural, linguistic, religious and historical affinity. These borders seem more imaginary than real having regard to the level of commercial and social interaction between the two countries. It is a known fact that trans-national crime such as human trafficking has no respect for national borders, hence the need to co-operate with each other at this level."

He said traffickers had developed sophistication in their effort to beat national laws and border controls. "They resort to subtle means of deceit, enticement and superior position of authority to lure their victims from one jurisdiction where the offences are severe to another where the offences are less severe. Victims are led into claws of servitude and slavery, exploitation and abuse of human rights."

He recollected the story of the about 300 children who were found at a slave labour camp at some quarries in Abeokuta in Nigeria in 2003 "working in very horrendous, degrading and inhuman conditions."

The children, who were identified as Beninois were eventually repatriated to Benin with the help of Nigeria.

Olujimi thanked UNICEF Nigeria and UNICEF Benin for their initiative, financial and technical support in the effort towards making the agreement between the two countries a reality.

In his reply, Mr Rogatien expressed delight at the accord. He debunked claims that his country has not been doing enough to fight trafficking in women and children. He said the fact that the accord was being signed one week ahead of June 16, which is Day of the African Child was evidence of how serious the two countries took the the issue of child trafficking.

Dr Phillippe Duamelle, UNICEF Representative in Benin, in his speech, said: "This new era of strengthened co-operation between the Republic of Benin and Nigeria to fight trafficking in persons must rapidly lead to concrete actions. Every day, we face dramatic consequences of this scourge for the victims and for the development of both countries. This agreement will enable a stronger mobilisation to eradicate trafficking, especially child trafficking."

Dr Barbara Reynolds, Deputy Country Representative, UNICEF, Nigeria, congratulated both countries on the agreement. She said the word, trafficking should not be associated with a human being and urged Nigeria and Benin to implement the agreement.

In an interview with THISDAY after the ceremony, Olujimi said Nigeria was committed to the agreement and would do every thing within her power to bring the menace to an end. He said even without any formal agreement, Nigeria repatriated the girls discovered in Abeokuta to Benin Republic in 2003.

Also, the fact that Nigeria was this month upgraded from the status of Second tier Watch List to Second tier Status by the US Department of State was evidence of the country's concerted effort in the fight against human trafficking.

He commended the effort of the National Agency for the Prohibition of Traffic in Persons and Other Related Matters (NAPTIP) for the relentless war the agency was waging on human trafficking in Nigeria. He said the agency successfully prosecuted the case of a woman child trafficker in Benin, Edo State this year and got her convicted for child trafficking.

Also in an interview with THISDAY, Mrs Carol Ndaguba, Executive Secretary and Chief Executive of NAPTIP, stressed the readiness of her agency to wage the war against human traffickers in Nigeria. She said Benin was the agreement with Republic of Benin was first and that similar accords with other countries sharing border with Nigeria would be explored in the near future.

She commended UNICEF and all other agencies that have been supporting NAPTIP in the war against human trafficking.

The objectives of the agreement between both countries include developing a common front to prevent, fight, suppress and punish trafficking in women and children by setting up joint security surveillance patrols and joint sensitisation campaigns along the border areas of the two countries.

It is to protect, rehabilitate and reintegrate victims of trafficking into their original environment and to promote friendly co-operation between the parties with a view to attaining these objectives.

The two countries will set up a joint committee with equal representation to be responsible for the implementation, monitoring and evaluation of actions taken to achieve the objectives.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

75 of 359 DOCUMENTS

AP Worldstream

June 10, 2005 Friday

Hundreds of Pakistanis return home after being deported by Oman for alleged illegal entry

BYLINE: ZARAR KHAN; Associated Press WriterSECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 203 wordsDATELINE: KARACHI, Pakistan

Hundreds of Pakistanis deported by Oman for alleged illegal entry returned Friday aboard a ferry and were expected to be freed after questioning, an immigration official said.

Oman deported the 552 men at Pakistan's request, said Malik Subh Sadiq, an official with the Federal Investigation Agency which handles immigration issues.

"We will question them to determine who sent them to Oman, and these investigations will help us capture human smugglers," he said.

Thousands of Pakistanis seek work each year in oil-rich Middle Eastern countries. Many pay human traffickers to take them there, often without visas, and they are frequently arrested and deported.

Oman has deported more than 40,000 Pakistanis in the past two years.

The latest group returned home less than a week after the United States said it had removed Pakistan from its human trafficking watch list.

Pakistan is considered to be a major human smuggling route, but authorities have taken steps in recent months to crack down on such trafficking.

In 2002, Pakistan made human smuggling an offense punishable by up to 10 years in prison. In January, it announced it would establish special courts to expedite smuggling suspects' trials.

LOAD-DATE: June 11, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 Associated Press

76 of 359 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Latin America - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 10, 2005, Friday

USA offers Jamaica help to tackle human trafficking

SOURCE: Caribbean Media Corporation news agency, Bridgetown, in English 17:15 GMT, 10 Jun 05

LENGTH: 568 words

Text of report by Caribbean Media Corporation (CMC) news agency on 10 June

Kingston, Jamaica: The United States says it has put in place a plan to address human trafficking in Jamaica, even though the P.J. Patterson administration has until 2 September to implement measures which could persuade Washington against implementing harsh economic sanctions against the island.

Speaking during a Digital Video Conference on Thursday [9 June], the report officer on Jamaica, Rachel Owen said the US Action Plan is intended prevent the imposition of sanctions that now loom over Jamaica in the wake of the recent report, which presented a damning image of human trafficking in the country.

Ms Owen said the measures being proposed include the establishment of a small police unit to monitor the trafficking of persons and public outreach campaigns.

She said over the next three months, Washington would be working closely with the Jamaica government to ensure that some of these objectives were met.

"We will be working in the city of Kingston, we've compiled an action plan of items that the Jamaican government can undertake during the grace period to avoid sanctions and move up to tier two, we've already seen some reaction from the Jamaican government which is positive, we've received something from the national security ministry that we are reviewing right now," she said.

But she argued that the report and the subsequent downgrading of Jamaica should not have surprised local authorities since they had been kept informed of the concerns of the United States.

"Last year we did send out an action plan to Jamaica, there was no follow through on the action plan. In January of this year, we also issued an interim assessment on Jamaica saying that they weren't doing enough particularly in law enforcement in combating trafficking in persons so there was a lot of awareness I believe we gave the Jamaicans," she said.

The Director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, Ambassador John Miller, who participated in the video conference, said the parties would be stepping up the pace of the discussions.

"The next couple of days we are going to get into more specifics through our embassy with the Jamaica government. There will be a lot of specific items all achievable within ninety days. There are a lot of things that can be done in 90 days and I'm looking forward to those things being done, I think it will make the situation better for the women and children of Jamaica," said Miller.

Last week Friday, the US State department released its Trafficking in Persons Report in which Jamaica was placed at the bottom of the pile in the "Tier Three" group of countries.

According to the report, Jamaica is a source country for children trafficked internally for sexual exploitation. It quoted the International Labour Organization's 2001 study, which found that more than 100 boys and girls are involved in Jamaica's sex trade.

The report alleges that Jamaican children often travel from rural areas to urban and tourist centres where they are engaged in prostitution sometimes with the encouragement and complicity of their families.

The Jamaica government also criticized the report, which also claimed that there is a lack of political will in Jamaica to fully protect children who are being sexually exploited.

LOAD-DATE: June 11, 2005

LANGUAGE: English

© Copyright 2005 British Broadcasting Corporation

77 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Washington Times

June 10, 2005 FridayBYLINE: By James Morrison, THE WASHINGTON TIMESSECTION: WORLD; EMBASSY ROW; Pg. A17LENGTH: 665 words

Movement in Malabo

At least one ambassador is happy with the State Department's report on trafficking in human beings.

Ambassador Teodoro Biyogo Nsue of Equatorial Guinea this week said his government is "very pleased" that the United States promoted the tiny, but oil-rich, West African nation from a blacklist of the world's worst offenders to a middle rank of countries that are responding to the forced labor and sexual exploitation of women and children.

"We have worked closely with U.S. officials for over eight months to address the issue and ensure that it is not a problem in my country or an issue that undercuts bilateral relations," Mr. Nsue said.

The State Department report recognized the country's progress, but still expressed concerns over continued abuse.

"The government of Equatorial Guinea does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so," the report said.

"Over the past year, the government has made a number of efforts that attest to its commitment to address Equatorial Guinea's small, but significant, trafficking problem."

The department raised Equatorial Guinea from a "tier 3" nation, which includes those countries that have made no efforts to end human trafficking, to a "tier 2" nation.

Mr. Nsue said his government has adopted laws to ban trafficking in humans and has assigned officials to monitor compliance, especially in the capital, Malabo, where the problem is the worst. The government also adopted U.S. recommendations for a public-awareness program to explain the issue to its citizens and a government office to assist victims of human trafficking.

"This is a worldwide problem, and my government is committed to ensuring that it is not a concern in Equatorial Guinea now or in the future," the ambassador said. "We will continue to work closely with U.S. officials to monitor the situation."

Despite its progress on combating human trafficking, the country's human rights record remains poor, its government is authoritarian and its bureaucracy corrupt, according to the State Department's human rights report.

Mission to Europe

The top U.S. diplomat for Europe yesterday tried to put the best spin on the turmoil created by the French and Dutch rejection of the European constitution.

Daniel Fried, the assistant secretary of state for European affairs, told reporters in Berlin that the United States needs a strong partner in Europe to face joint security threats throughout the world, according to a dispatch from our correspondent in the German capital, Tom Goeller.

"I have come here after the referendum in France to send a message to our European friends," Mr. Fried said.

"We want a strong Europe as our partner, a Europe that faces the challenges that are beyond our shores, located in the Middle East and in other parts of the world."

He praised U.S.-EU cooperation, especially in the promotion of democratic reforms in Kyrgyzstan and Ukraine. However, he noted the disagreements over EU plans to consider lifting a ban on arms sales to China.

"We need a debate with the Europeans about East Asia in general and China in particular. We want Europe to work with us on foreign policy challenges," he said.

Mr. Fried also visited France and Italy this week to prepare for the June 20 U.S.-EU summit in Washington. President Bush is expected to host EU Council President Jean-Claude Juncker, EU Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso, German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder, French President Jacques Chirac and the leaders of the 22 other EU nations.

Two other U.S. officials were barnstorming Europe on similar missions yesterday. Christopher R. Hill, assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs, met with NATO officials in Belgium, and Treasury Secretary John W. Snow began his five-day visit to London, Amsterdam, Brussels, Paris and Frankfurt, Germany.

* Call Embassy Row at 202/636-3297, fax 202/832-7278 or e-mail jmorrison@ washingtontimes.com.

LOAD-DATE: November 22, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2005 The Washington Times LLC
All Rights Reserved

78 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 9, 2005 Thursday 6:20 PM GMT

US hails Qatar new law banning children as camel jockeys

LENGTH: 267 wordsDATELINE: DOHA June 9

The United States welcomed Thursday a new law in Qatar banning the use of children as camel jockeys, but said it came too late to keep Doha off the annual US blacklist for human trafficking.

"The United States welcomes the new law of the State of Qatar banning the use of anyone under the age of 18 as a camel jockey," US Ambassador Chase Untermeyer said in a statement.

He was referring to a decree issued last month threatening jail sentences of three to 10 years for anyone using child jockeys in camel races and fines of up to 55,000 dollars.

"Unfortunately, this law was not enacted within the March 1, 2004 to March 1, 2005 review period for the Department of State's annual Trafficking In Persons (TIP) report, which was released last week," he said.

"Therefore, it could not be taken into account in the report's ranking of Qatar," he said.

Untermeyer said "in the months ahead, the US government looks forward to the implementation of the new law, and to the rescue and repatriation of child camel jockeys," most of whom are smuggled by traffickers from Asia.

The Gulf states of Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and the United Arab Emirates were added to the US blacklist for human trafficking in the State Department's fifth annual "Trafficking in Persons Report" released last Friday.

They were among 14 states in the US report ranked "Tier 3," as the worst offenders who could face sanctions if they do not improve within 90 days.

"The US embassy in Doha will work with the government of Qatar to improve its anti-trafficking efforts before the mid-year review late this summer," said Untermeyer.

fb-nay/al

LOAD-DATE: June 10, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

79 of 359 DOCUMENTS

IPS-Inter Press Service

June 9, 2005, Thursday

POLITICS: U.S. TRAFFICKING REPORT INCLUDES CUBA AND VENEZUELA

BYLINE: By Katherine Stapp

LENGTH: 1290 words

DATELINE: NEW YORK, June 9 2005

The inclusion of Cuba, Venezuela and other countries out of favour with Washington on a blacklist of nations that sponsor or tolerate human trafficking has raised eyebrows among experts who believe the assessment reflects a policy of "selective indignation".

The U.S. State Department report divides countries into three "tiers". Tier 1 includes those that have met international standards for coping with trafficking and are vigorously addressing the problem, while Tier 2 comprises countries that demonstrate a commitment to address their problems but have not yet achieved international standards.

A country is branded "Tier 3" -- the worst of the worst -- if it "fails to take significant actions to bring itself into compliance with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking in persons".

This year, 14 countries out of the 150 surveyed were classified as Tier 3: Bolivia, Ecuador, Qatar, United Arab Emirates, Burma, Jamaica, Saudi Arabia, Venezuela, Cambodia, Kuwait, Sudan, Cuba, North Korea and Togo.

"Country ratings are based strictly on government actions to combat trafficking of persons as defined by U.S. law," said John Miller, the State Department's senior adviser on trafficking in persons, in an overview of the report, which was issued Jun. 3. "The standards are set up by the Trafficking Victim Protection Act and are applied equally to every country."

In the case of Venezuela, whose populist President Hugo Chavez has been at odds with Washington for several years, the report charges that "the government funded no NGO (non-governmental organization) programs geared towards victims of trafficking" and that prevention efforts were "inadequate". It does not mention any reported complaint in 2005.

But in a June 3 statement challenging the report's conclusions, the Venezuelan embassy cited "640 community organizations through which thousands of people have been informed of the problem of human trafficking," as well as joint operations by the Metropolitan Fire Department and the National Guard to monitor the frequency with which non-Venezuelan citizens go to motels, and "increased scrutiny of documentation regarding those seeking to enter and exit the country."

It concludes that the Tier 3 status is "an example of either a profound lack of knowledge of what the government of Venezuela is doing," or an "intentional mischaracterisation of the good faith actions" it has taken.

The report's section on Cuba, another U.S. nemesis, concedes that "there are no reliable estimates available on the extent of trafficking in the country; however, children in prostitution (are) widely apparent, even to casual observers."

This lack of concrete data has led some in the NGO community, including prominent groups like the Inter-American Dialogue and Human Rights Watch, to suspect that the Tier 3 list is shaped more by politics than reality.

"It's pure snake oil," said Larry Birns, director of the Council on Hemispheric Affairs, a Washington-based think-tank. "The drug certification, human rights certification, terrorism and trafficking reports are all essentially political tools that the administration uses to voice selective indignation."

"The purpose is to show that Venezuela is a failed state, making it a candidate for OAS (Organization of American States) intervention. But what's really noteworthy is that the administration doesn't realize how isolated it is. The cumulative effect is to basically eradicate U.S. credibility."

Sanctions against Tier 3 countries may include the withholding of non-humanitarian, non-trade-related aid, and U.S. opposition to assistance from the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, among other public lenders that it dominates.

This year, Caracas plans to apply for a $ 250-million loan from the Inter-American Development Bank, and Washington has announced its intention to veto the request based on Venezuela's Tier 3 ranking.

Janie Chuang, an international legal expert on trafficking issues who teaches at American University's Washington College of Law, said in comments to IPS: "In reviewing the country assessments, it's difficult to glean meaningful standards for Tier placement and movement, at least from a human rights perspective."

"How is it that Tier 1 includes countries that engage in the arrest, jailing, and fining of trafficking 'victims'? Or countries that fail to distinguish between smuggling and trafficking, and end up simply deporting trafficked persons rather than affording them the human rights protections they deserve?"

"I think increased attention to labor trafficking is a significant improvement in the report," she said, adding, "but the Middle Eastern countries don't have a monopoly on this form of trafficking. The country assessments across the board need to include more information regarding government efforts to address labor trafficking."

The International Labor Organization said in a study released in May that at least 12.3 million people are trapped in forced labor around the world, and that of these, the study estimates a minimum of 2.4 million to be victims of human trafficking.

"It'll be interesting to see which countries actually end up under trafficking sanctions," said Chuang. She noted that so far the countries the United States has actually targeted for sanctions tend to be ones with which it has no relationship or at best a strained relationship, like Burma, North Korea, Cuba, Sudan and Venezuela.

Other activists question the wisdom and effectiveness of a heavy-handed approach.

"Sanctions are not the effective way to solve problems," said Anuradha Koirala, head of Maiti Nepal, an anti-trafficking group. "It would be better if the monitoring mechanism is improved."

No one disputes that the problem of global trafficking for forced labor and sex work is pervasive and horrendous. According to U.S. government data, of the 600,000 to 800,000 men, women, and children trafficked across international borders each year, about 80 percent are women and girls and half are minors.

The majority of these transnational victims are condemned to commercial sexual exploitation, and this number does not even include the millions of victims around the world who are trafficked within their own national borders.

"I think what has been largely omitted in the report is the economic situation of the Latin American countries, which is the main cause for the trafficking in persons," said Teresa Ulloa Ziaurriz, the regional director for Latin America and the Caribbean of the International Coalition Against Trafficking in Women.

"But it's not only poverty. It's a poverty that is preyed upon by recruiters, traffickers and pimps," she said. "And it is both local and foreign demand for the sex of prostitution which promotes the market for victims of trafficking."

Human trafficking is the third most profitable illicit activity in the world, just after the trafficking of drugs and weapons, Ziaurriz added.

"It is the demand that perpetuates stereotypes of submission and inferiority of women, considered as merchandise that could be sold, bought or rented for the sexual pleasure of men," she said. "The demand for sexual tourism in Mexico and Latin America is 80 percent from the U.S. and Canada."

"I strongly believe that the rich countries should contribute to generate welfare and investment for development in the poor countries, and there is a need of technical cooperation with the organizations like mine, with a long career in combating prostitution and trafficking in women and children in the Latin American and Caribbean region."

LOAD-DATE: June 10, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 IPS-Inter Press Service/Global Information Network

80 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 8, 2005 Wednesday 6:37 AM GMT

Cambodia brushes off being added to US human trafficking blacklist

LENGTH: 255 wordsDATELINE: PHNOM PENH June 8

Cambodia's Prime Minister Hun Sen on Wednesday shrugged off the kingdom's addition to a US blacklist of the world's worst human trafficking violators.

Cambodia, notorious mostly for child sex trafficking, joined North Korea and Myanmar on the "Tier 3" blacklist of the US State Department's annual "Trafficking in Persons Report" released last week.

"When the US says Cambodia is good, Cambodia is still the same, and when the US says Cambodia is bad, it is still the same," Hun Sen told reporters.

The premier blamed the suffering of many Cambodians in their impoverished country today on the US secret bombing in the 1960s, when the world power sought to root out Vietnamese communists hiding in border areas.

"Even now many Cambodians suffer every day and every month because of the US bombs... When the US says we are good, we should not be happy and when the US says we are bad, we should not be angry either," Hun Sen said.

Landmines and unexploded ordnance from the period as well as from the decades of conflict that followed, including the 1975-79 genocidal Khmer Rouge regime, continue to maim and kill many in the Southeast Asian country.

A total of 756 landmine casualties, including 113 deaths, were reported in 2003.

Cambodia's inclusion on the blacklist stemmed largely from government complicity in trafficking, the US state department said.

Cambodia, one of the world's poorest nations, is both a significant sender and receiver of trafficked people because of its weak border controls and poorly enforced migration laws.

LOAD-DATE: June 9, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

81 of 359 DOCUMENTS

BusinessWorld

June 8, 2005, Wednesday

DFA seeks special courts for recruiters

BYLINE: Bernardette S. Sto. Domingo

SECTION: Pg. S1/11

LENGTH: 296 words

The Department of Foreign Affairs (DFA) would seek the creation of a special court to try human traffickers and speed up prosecution of violators, Foreign Affairs Sec. Alberto G. Romulo said yesterday. The move is seen to help decongest local courts and expedite case proceedings on human trafficking.

"We are serious in pursuing being delisted from the US watch list...we will exert all efforts in apprehending suspects and pursuing their conviction," Mr. Romulo told reporters.

The country was retained in the Tier 2 Watch List of the US state department's 2005 human trafficking report for its failure to prosecute human traffickers.

The US embassy in Manila warned Monday that the Philippines is in danger of being relegated to the Tier 3 level of its human trafficking watch list if it fails to fully implement its anti-trafficking laws and convict violators.

Demotion to Tier 3, or non-compliance with minimum standards or making significant efforts to do so, is subject to sanctions such as cuts in the non-humanitarian and non-trade assistance packages from the US.

On illegal recruitment, Reynaldo H. Jaylo, head of the Presidential Anti-Illegal Recruitment Task Force, reported that from July 2004 to May 2005, the task force has apprehended some 439 suspected illegal recruiters, 22 of which are foreign nationals.

He also indicated that a slow justice system is preventing the government from prosecuting violators. At least 10% of pending cases before the Department of Justice are expected to get conviction, Mr. Jaylo said.

If proven guilty, illegal recruiters are meted with life imprisonment.

"These are at least 400 individuals from unlicensed agencies. We expect our first conviction by the end of the year," Mr. Jaylo told reporters.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

82 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Emirates News Agency

June 8, 2005 Wednesday 4:51 PM EST

UAE-UNICEF agreement on jockeys completes first month

BYLINE: Emirates News Agency

LENGTH: 847 words

DATELINE: Abu Dhabi, June 08

The joint programme between the United Nations Children's Fund, UNICEF, and the Ministry of Interior on efforts to register, rehabilitate and repatriate children formerly involved as jockeys in camel-racing marks the completion of its first month of operations today.

The agreement was signed as a follow up to strict new legislation introduced a few months ago to stamp out the use of children in races..

+we have started the process of registering the children according to international standards agreed with UNICEF.

So far a total of 197 children who were formerly working in camel-camps have been taken into care, and are being housed in two special centres near Abu Dhabi City.+

+ Colonel Najm Sayyar, the director of the Social Support Centre of the Ministry told WAM..

+In addition to this,+ Col. Sayyar said: +UNICEF's technical expert is looking at each and every file that we are registering.

No information has yet been uncovered to suggest that any kidnapping of any of the children occurred, contrary to suggestions in the international media that some of them were originally kidnapped from their homes overseas.+

+ In a reference to the recent report issued by the US State Department on Human Trafficking, which was strongly critical of the UAE, Colonel Sayyar questioned the accuracy of the estimates cited in the report for the number of children involved in camel racing in the Emirates..

+At the Ministry of Interior, we have credible records from the Immigration Department about the number of children used as camel jockeys, as well as access to information from those who are in charge of camel racing in the country.

We believe the numbers involved to be much lower than those cited in the US State Department report, and we ask those who claim to have other figures to reveal their sources so we can evaluate their accuracy.+

+, Sayyar told WAM..

He added: +We are building an accurate database of all children involved in camel racing as well as of those others believed to be at risk, and we will soon have a complete register with the most accurate figures.

More importantly, with this information, we will be well on the way to bringing an end to the use of children as camel jockeys,+..

June Kunuji, the UNICEF representative in the Gulf Region, who was a prime mover in the recently-signed agreement, added: +We at UNICEF are pleased to have entered into a partnership agreement with the Government of the United Arab Emirates, and would like to commend them for making the commitment to provide support to the children formerly involved in camel racing, including for their protection, recovery, rehabilitation and reintegration into their families and communities.+

+ +Over the past month since we signed the agreement,+she added, +UNICEF's focus has been to provide technical support to the Social Support Centre as well as to the shelter where the children formerly involved in camel racing are being kept and provided with care.

Our technical expert has been reviewing and strengthening the examination and registration process of these children, and training the social workers there in the special handling and management of these children that is required.+

+ Ms. Kunuji noted that, as part of planning for the implementation of the agreement, UNICEF helped to facilitate and convene a consultation hosted by the UAE Government with representatives of Government and civil society from four countries - Pakistan, Bangladesh, the Sudan and Mauritania, who are preparing to receive returning children and families..

+We hope that this initiative will develop modalities of inter- -country co-operation that can be used in other situations seeking to protect children and take action in their best interests+, she said..

Asked about the estimated number of camel jockeys or children covered by the agreement, she said: +The UAE Government, through the Ministry of Interior, is taking action to locate and identify under- -aged children involved in camel racing.

We will be providing technical support to establish a database in the Social Support Centre that will keep a record of all children who have been properly registered.+

+ The US State Department report on Trafficking in Persons, issued last week, downgraded the UAE from Tier Two to Tier Three, as a country not taking appropriate measures to eradicate trafficking in people, even though it noted that the UAE's collaboration with UNICEF was one of "several steps (taken by the UAE) that may lead to potentially positive outcomes."

However, the US report made no mention of the UAE-UNICEF agreement and the recent steps taken as a result of that agreement to implement the UAE Government's commitment to bring an end to the use of children in camel racing..

The head of the Ministry of Interior's Social Support Centre urged any person who has information about kidnapped children brought to the UAE to inform the Ministry of Interior by calling 999 or the Social Support Centre, directly, at 02-5561000 or to contact any UAE diplomatic mission overseas.

LOAD-DATE: June 9, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

JOURNAL-CODE: WAM

Copyright 2005 U.P.I.
All Rights Reserved
ARABIA 2000

Copyright 2005 by Emirates News Agency. Distributed By UPI.

83 of 359 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Latin America - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 7, 2005, Tuesday

Guyana receives encouraging grade from US on people trafficking

SOURCE: Caribbean Media Corporation news agency, Bridgetown, in English 15:00 GMT, 7 Jun 05

LENGTH: 363 words

Text of report by Caribbean Media Corporation (CMC) news agency on 7 June

Georgetown, Guyana: The United States government has praised Guyana's efforts in dealing with trafficking in persons (TIP).

According to the fifth annual TIP report released over the last weekend, Washington said that the Guyana government has "made appreciable progress over the last year, particularly through its enactment of anti-trafficking legislation, improvement in Government coordination and aggressive public awareness campaigns".

Guyana's status was recently upgraded to Tier Two, indicating that while Georgetown does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, it is making significant strides in the area.

The strides include legislation to criminalise the practice with severe penalties including prison terms; forfeiture of property; and an order to pay full restitution to the victims.

TIP is a global industry that is said to be earning approximately 8m US dollars.

According to the US report, most foreign victims come from bordering regions of Brazil, south of Guyana, and may be trafficked through Guyana to Dutch-speaking Surinam to the east.

The State Department's report said that while the Guyana government made good efforts to assist trafficking victims over the last year, protection remains inadequate.

Last week, the Jamaica government rejected the report as being highly prejudicial and based on unsubstantiated information.

The US State department gave Jamaica a tier three country grading on human trafficking. The grading implies that the government does not fully comply with the minimum standards for combating trafficking and is not making significant efforts to do so.

The new ranking means that Jamaica could be banned from receiving non-humanitarian and non-trade related assistance from the United States as of October this year.

According to the report, Jamaica is a source country for children trafficked internally for sexual exploitation. It quotes a 2001 International Labour Organization study, which found that more than 100 boys and girls are involved in Jamaica's sex trade.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2005

LANGUAGE: English

84 of 359 DOCUMENTS

BusinessWorld

June 7, 2005, Tuesday

RP may further slip in human trafficking listBYLINE: Bernardette S. Sto. DomingoSECTION: Pg. S1/11LENGTH: 229 words

The Philippines may be relegated to the Tier 3 level of the US State Department's report on human trafficking if it fails to fully implement its anti-trafficking laws and convict violators, the US embassy in Manila warned yesterday. The country was retained in the Tier 2 Watch List of the 2005 report for its failure to prosecute human traffickers.

Demotion to Tier 3, or noncompliance with minimum standards or making significant efforts to do so, is subject to sanctions such as cuts in the non-humanitarian and non-trade assistance packages of the US. Countries currently in the lowest placement include Cambodia, Kuwait, Sudan, United Arab Emirates, among others.

"If there is progress, then you can go up to Tier 2 [but] if there is lack of progress and there is no conviction, then you will go potentially be placed in Tier 3," US political counselor Joseph Novak said.

Tier 2 countries, which also include Bahrain, China, Greece, India and South Africa among others, are described as having "noncompliance with minimum standards, requires interim assessment and receives special scrutiny." "It is hypothetical, and we do hope that the Philippines will be able to move up to Tier 2 again," Mr. Novak said.

Last year, the Philippines had a zero turnout on convicted human traffickers out of the 348 cases that were successfully prosecuted in East Asia.

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 BusinessWorld Publishing Corporation

85 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Washington Times

June 7, 2005 TuesdayBYLINE: By James Morrison, THE WASHINGTON TIMESSECTION: WORLD; EMBASSY ROW; Pg. A15LENGTH: 647 words

Caracas condemned

Venezuela denounced the State Department for placing it on a black list of countries that fail to take even minimum steps to prevent forced child labor and the sexual exploitation of women.

The Venezuelan Embassy complained that the department's move is a "sad demonstration of how the [Bush] administration has politicized its work on human rights."

The inclusion of Venezuela as a "tier three" country, the worst category in the annual Report on Human Trafficking, increases the tension between the United States and the government of left-wing President Hugo Chavez, a champion of anti-American causes in Latin America.

The State Department placed Venezuela on a list that includes Cuba, North Korea and other major violators of human rights.

"Venezuela is a source, transit and destination country for women and children trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor," said the State Department report, which was released last week.

Smugglers sell women and children from Brazil, Colombia, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Guyana and Peru to brothels and sweatshops in Venezuela, the report said.

"Traffickers lure victims with promises of lucrative jobs or educational opportunities and take advantage of lax border controls or move victims using illegally obtained Venezuelan or false travel documents," the report said.

The State Department blamed the Venezuelan government for failing to "fully comply with the minimum standards for elimination of trafficking" and the report cited "widespread" corruption among immigration officials and border patrol agents.

The embassy, however, insisted the government has initiated public awareness programs, assisted private charities that try to rescue the exploited women and children and placed undercover agents in motels and hostels in the capital, Caracas, to try to unmask the smugglers.

"The issue is whether Venezuela is working actively and with a seriousness of purpose to combat human trafficking," the embassy said. "The answer, as demonstrated by our deeds, is a clear and cogent, 'Yes.'"

Pakistan piqued

Pakistani Ambassador Jehangir Karamat is complaining about "extraordinary delays" Pakistanis face trying to get visas to work or study in the United States.

Mr. Karamat met last week with Maura Harty, assistant secretary of state for consular affairs, who promised to try to reduce the red tape facing citizens from a country seen as one of the most important U.S. partners in the war on terrorism.

The ambassador said Pakistanis in Canadian border cities also face problems commuting to jobs in the United States and asked that they be given visa waivers.

He cited delays in the issuance of H1B work visas, F1 student visas and J1 visas for doctors, scientists, researchers and teachers in U.S.-Pakistani exchange programs.

"The assistant secretary ... assured the ambassador that her bureau was making efforts to speed up the process," the Pakistani Embassy said. "She said that students and businessmen are being given priority for the issuance of visas, but at time delays occur due to security clearance requirements, which in some cases take longer time."

Indian visit official

The meeting next month between President Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh will mark "the next stage" in the expanding relationship between the United States and the South Asian powerhouse, the White House said in officially announcing the July 18 visit.

"The two leaders will discuss all aspects of U.S.-India bilateral relations, including energy, economic and strategic elements," the White House said on Friday.

Embassy Row last week noted Indian press reports of Mr. Singh's plans for a three-day Washington visit, beginning July 18. His supporters here are trying to arrange for him to address Congress.

* Call Embassy Row at 202/636-3297, fax 202/832-7278 or e-mail jmorrison@ washingtontimes.com.

LOAD-DATE: November 22, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2005 The Washington Times LLC
All Rights Reserved

86 of 359 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Trans Caucasus Unit
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 6, 2005, Monday

Armenia "source" of human trafficking - US State Department

SOURCE: Arminfo, Yerevan, in Russian 14:57 GMT, 6 Jun 05

LENGTH: 248 words

Excerpt from report by Armenian news agency Arminfo

Yerevan, 6 June: The US State Department has included Armenia on a watch list of countries in its annual human trafficking report.

"Armenia is more like a source of trafficking rather than a transit country," the document says. According to the document, Armenian women and girls are sent for sex exploitation mainly to Turkey and the UAE, and according to some information, to European countries. According to UN information, more than a 1,000 women are engaged in prostitution in the UAE and Turkey, most of them being victims of trafficking. According to the State Department report, although the Armenian authorities are making efforts to fight this phenomenon, they are not achieving a proper result. Armenia was included on the watch list of countries because last year it could not prove that it has increased its efforts in the fight against this phenomenon, the document says.

[Passage omitted: the Armenian Criminal Code envisages punishment for human trafficking]

The report also notes that some officials' involvement in this phenomenon hinders the appropriate fight against it. Specifically, the report notes that some prosecutors illegally help people engaged in trafficking while officers of the border service take bribes and simplify procedures for crossing the border. The Armenian authorities have proved incapable of investigating these cases and punishing the culprits, the document says.

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2005

LANGUAGE: English

87 of 359 DOCUMENTS

BusinessWorld

June 6, 2005, Monday

RP still on human trafficking watch listSECTION: Pg. S1/11LENGTH: 181 words

The Philippines remained on the US State Department's watch list of countries violating anti-human trafficking laws, the 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report stated. US Secretary of State Condoleeza Rice said the Philippine received a Tier 2 placement, noting its noncompliance with the minimum standards to eliminate trafficking. "Although the Philippine government made modestly better efforts to implement its anti-trafficking law, it failed to show evidence of increasing efforts to convict traffickers," the report said. It stressed continued improvement in the areas of protection, prosecution, and prevention will be important over the next years. "The Philippines is a source, transit, and destination country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor," it said. "Endemic poverty, a high unemployment rate, a cultural propensity towards migration, a weak rule-of-law environment, and sex tourism all contribute to significant trafficking activity in the Philippines," the 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report added.

LOAD-DATE: June 5, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 BusinessWorld Publishing Corporation

88 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Manila Times

June 6, 2005 Monday

ERASING THE BLIGHT OF HUMAN TRAFFICKINGLENGTH: 457 words

Human trafficking is a global scourge, as far as the US State Department is concerned. That is why it has been diligently monitoring countries where human trafficking thrives in one form or another.

Every year, the State Department issues a "Trafficking in Persons" report, which ranks countries according to the extent of human trafficking and the efforts of their governments to curb them. For the past two years the Philippines has been in the report's "Tier 2 watch list," a level just above "Tier 3," where the biggest violators are. That means while the country has made some progress in its antitrafficking campaign, it is still way below the minimum requirements listed by the State Department.

The report is an eye-opener. It considers the Philippines as "a source, transit and destination country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor." It cites as the biggest problem the plight of Filipino entertainers to Japan. The report says that a "significant number of the 71,084 Philippine women who entered Japan as overseas performing artists in 2004 are believed to have been women trafficked into the sex trade."

The report also notes that sexual exploitation of children thrives within the Philippines, nurtured by "endemic poverty, a high unemployment rate, a cultural propensity toward migration, a weak rule-of-law environment and sex tourism."

The report acknowledges that the government made "modestly better" efforts to implement the antitrafficking law. Four state prosecutors have been assigned to focus on traffic-related cases and law-enforcement officials are now being trained on the antitrafficking law. The government also earned the State Department's nod for continuing to provide protection to trafficking victims in 2004.

Still, the State Department feels the Philippines is not doing enough to convict traffickers for it to be lifted to the next rung, "Tier 2."

What more needs to be done? A lot more, in the State Department's assessment.

The government must step up efforts to arrest, prosecute and convict traffickers and state officials involved in trafficking. But before it can accomplish this, it must address corruption and a weak judiciary.

It also needs to do more "to address allegations of corruption and fraud regarding the issuance of documents to facilitate the recruitment of Philippine entertainers to Japan, a process that traffickers exploit."

That's a tall order, considering that antitrafficking measures are not high on the government's roster of priorities. But the question remains: Can we live with the notoriety of being labeled as a country that abets human trafficking?

There is no excuse for the government not to take trafficking head-on.

LOAD-DATE: September 21, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISHDOCUMENT-TYPE: International Relations; Human Rights/Civil LibertiesPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

All Rights Reserved

Global News Bites

89 of 359 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 6, 2005 Monday 2:53 AM ESTU.S. EMBASSY STATEMENT ON BELARUS, 2005 TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT*BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 234 wordsDATELINE: MINSK, Belarus

The U.S. Embassy issued the following press release:

On June 3, 2005, the Department of State released the 2005 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report.

This Report is the fifth annual TIP Report and covers the period April 2004 through March 2005.

The TIP Report is intended to raise global awareness and spur foreign governments to take effective actions to counter all forms of trafficking in persons, a form of modern day slavery. In assessing foreign governments' efforts, the Report highlights the "three P's" - prosecution, protection, and prevention. In addition, a victim-centered approach to trafficking requires addressing the "three R's" - rescue, rehabilitation, and reintegration.

Belarus received a Tier 2 placement in the 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report. Tier 2 countries are those whose governments do not fully comply with the standards of the 2000 Trafficking Victims Protection Act, but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance. The Government of Belarus has made progress in its anti-trafficking efforts over the past year. It continued to recognize that trafficking is a serious problem in Belarus and increased investigative and law enforcement efforts. However, more remains to be done, particularly in the area of protection and assistance to victims.

The 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report may be found at <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/tiprpt/2005/>.

LOAD-DATE: June 26, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

90 of 359 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 6, 2005 Monday 12:51 AM EST

MOLDOVA REMAINS IN TIER TWO IN 2005 TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORTBYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 323 wordsDATELINE: CHISINAU, Moldova

The U.S. Embassy issued the following press release:

To inspire greater determination, creativity, and cooperation among governments in the fight against modern-day slavery, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice released the fifth annual Trafficking in Persons Report on June 3, 2005.

The report describes the actions, and in some cases the lack of actions, taken by 150 governments to end the crime of human trafficking, with a goal of raising global awareness and spurring countries to take effective actions to counter trafficking in persons. The efforts of governments to fight human trafficking are rated in tiers in the report based on tangible actions taken throughout the year.

In the 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report, Moldova remained in Tier Two - an indication that Moldova does not yet fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, however it is making significant efforts to do so. The steps outlined in the report as taken by the Moldovan Government include moving forward in creating new legislation to comprehensively address all aspects of trafficking, and establishing a working group to draft a new national Action Plan.

U.S. Embassy spokesperson, Aleisha Woodward, said in connection with the release of the report, "We encourage the Moldovan Government to increase its efforts to protect and assist trafficking victims, fight trafficking-related corruption, and address trafficking with even greater vigor since this is a real threat to the Moldovan people."

The entire Trafficking in Persons Report is available on-line at www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/tiprpt/2005/. The transcript of a briefing by Ambassador John R. Miller, Senior Advisor on Trafficking in Persons at the Department of State, as well as other related materials, can also be found on that website. The section of the report specifically on Moldova can be found in English, Romanian, and Russian at www.usembassy.md.

LOAD-DATE: June 26, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

91 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 5, 2005 Sunday

Kenya; Human Trafficking Checked

BYLINE: The NationLENGTH: 532 words

A <http://allafrica.com/peaceafrica/resources/view/00010661.pdf> [pdf; 6.26 MBytes] released by the US State Department indicates that Kenya is among more than 20 countries in Africa which have made good progress in meeting minimum standards in the elimination of trafficking in persons.

However, the report says Kenya is still a source, transit, and destination country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labour and sexual exploitation.

The report, released on Friday by the US government's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, says Kenyan children are internally trafficked for forced domestic servitude, street vending, agricultural labour, and sexual exploitation.

Kenya is among more than 20 countries in Africa which have been classified as tier two in human trafficking which means that they are among countries whose Governments are making significant efforts to meet minimum standards in the elimination of human trafficking.

Classification of countries in tiers is based on the extent of a Government's action to combat human trafficking.

Governments that fully comply with minimum standards for elimination of trafficking of persons are classified as tier one.

Governments that do not fully comply with the minimum standards to eliminate trafficking and are not making significant efforts to do so, are placed in tier three.

The report says that Kenyan women are trafficked to the Middle East, other African nations, and Western Europe for forced domestic labour and sexual exploitation.

It adds that Burundian and Rwandan children are trafficked to Kenya for sexual exploitation and unpaid domestic labour, while Asian nationals, mainly Chinese women, are reportedly trafficked through Nairobi to Europe.

Southeast Asian nationals are allegedly coerced into accepting circumstances of bonded and unpaid labour in Kenya's construction and garment industries.

The reports notes that the Kenya government noticeably expanded its anti-trafficking law enforcement efforts over the reporting period.

The Government is said to be carrying out investigations into over 20 cases of human trafficking, including one involving suspected trafficking of Kenyan children to Tanzania.

It adds that in mid-2004, the Kenya Police launched a 10-member Human Trafficking Unit to undertake investigations. The unit began investigating an alleged child trafficking ring operating between Kenya and the UK.

The report reveals that the unit conducted surveys of individuals and establishments suspected of involvement in trafficking, including brothels, massage parlours, and foreign employment agencies.

The report adds that Kenya has put in place a number of measures to curb the problem and they include a registration programme requiring owners of tourist guesthouses to identify and account for all workers.

On prevention, the report says Kenya has initiated broad measures focused on the prevention of trafficking that include implementation of a code of conduct for the tourist industry to curb sex tourism.

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 AllAfrica, Inc.

92 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Manila Times

June 5, 2005 Sunday

RP KEEPS RANKING ON HUMAN TRAFFIC LIST

LENGTH: 543 words

WASHINGTON: The Philippines remained on the Tier 2 watch list of human trafficking violators compiled by the US State Department.

The Tier 2 watch list is a level created last year for more worrisome countries that were not ranked as "Tier 3" by the State Department, which tracks the problem of human trafficking across the globe.

Cambodia has joined North Korea and Myanmar as Asia's worst human trafficking violators, the US State Department said Friday in its annual "Trafficking in Persons Report."

Notorious mostly for child sex trafficking, Cambodia was lumped together with the hard-line states on the "Tier 3" blacklist.

Cambodia's inclusion stems largely from government "complicity" in trafficking, said John Miller, the department's senior adviser against human trafficking.

The department also gave lower grades to China and Taiwan this year in its review of 150 countries in combating trafficking for forced labor, prostitution and military service, among other areas.

China has been included this year on the Tier 2 Watch List. Its inclusion resulted from its "failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking, specifically its inadequate protection for trafficking victims," the report said.

The department also cited the "involuntary return" of North Korean refugees from China, often facing "serious abuses" by the hard-line communist regime in Pyongyang.

Taiwan, which in 2004 was on "Tier 1" with nations deemed compliant with US and international efforts to fight trafficking, fell to Tier 2.

But Japan, Vietnam, Pakistan, Thailand, Laos and Nepal moved up to Tier 2 from the Tier 2 watch list while Bangladesh, lumped together with the worst violators in 2004, made a significant improvement to Tier 2, indicating stepped-up efforts in the region to combat human trafficking, the department said.

"We estimate that up to 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders every year, and millions more are trafficked internally," Rice said.

She did not give a regional breakdown, but the report said convictions for human trafficking in East Asia and the Pacific last year dropped to 348 last year from 583 in 2003.

In South Asia, however, convictions more than doubled to 1,260 in 2004 from 355 the previous year.

India and the Philippines remained on the Tier 2 watch list while Afghanistan, East Timor, Indonesia, Malaysia, Singapore and Sri Lanka were maintained on Tier 2.

Miller said that trafficking for labor exploitation, particularly involuntary servitude of foreign laborers, received greater attention in 2005.

"This greater emphasis came as a result of better data obtained from source countries and nongovernment organizations," he said.

The State Department's ratings were based on government actions to combat trafficking in persons as defined by US law. The standards are applied equally to every country, Miller said. "We examine each country individually."

Vietnam, he said, had "made some significant progress in the last year," and cited controls on exporting Vietnamese labor and alleged links with "slave owners" in other countries.

"They have stepped in and are giving much better supervision and control. Their number of convictions has increased, so there's been some progress in Vietnam," he said.

AFP

LOAD-DATE: September 20, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Human Rights/Civil Liberties; International Relations

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2005 News Bites Pty Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

Global News Bites

93 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Xinhua General News Service

June 5, 2005 Sunday 6:00 AM EST

Philippine govt admits much to be done to curb human trafficking

SECTION: WORLD NEWS; Political

LENGTH: 297 words

DATELINE: MANILA

The Philippine government said on Sunday that there was still much to be done to curb human trafficking while calling for close cooperation among different government agencies and individuals to fight the scourge.

"Human trafficking is one of the concerns of the government.

The government is doing everything possible to arrest and prosecute those involved in the illegal human traffic trade," Press Secretary Ignacio Bunye said in a radio interview.

Bunye made the statement after the US State Department said the Philippines remained on the "Tier 2" watch list for the second consecutive year because of its "failure to show evidence of increasing efforts to convict traffickers."

Though the Philippines has made "modest efforts" to crack down on human trafficking, the US State Department said this was not enough for the country to be removed from the US watch list of countries cited as Asia's worst human trafficking violators.

The Philippines joins India on the Tier 2 list this year along with Afghanistan, East Timor, Indonesia, Malaysia, Singapore and Sri Lanka.

The United States estimates that up to 800,000 people -- most of them women and children -- are being trafficked across international borders every year and millions more are trafficked internally.

Women and children form a large part of the illegal human traffic trade wherein they are forced into prostitution or cheap labor, according to the US report.

Bunye said that the Philippine Bureau of Immigration and other concerned government agencies have got standing instructions to conduct aggressive moves against human trafficking.

"But we need the cooperation of all concerned, especially the families of would-be victims of human trafficking," he added.

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

94 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 4, 2005 Saturday 12:50 PM GMT

Gulf officials, rights activists dispute US trafficking charges

BYLINE: Lydia GeorgiLENGTH: 709 wordsDATELINE: RIYADH June 4

Officials and rights activists in oil-rich Gulf Arab states on Saturday disputed US charges that they are doing little to combat human trafficking or end the use of children as camel jockeys.

Saudi Arabia and three other Gulf allies -- Kuwait, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates (UAE) -- were added to the US blacklist for human trafficking in the State Department's fifth annual "Trafficking in Persons Report" released Friday.

"I am surprised that the report claims the Saudi government is not combating abuses or punishing those involved in violations, which in no way can be described as human trafficking," said Saleh al-Khathlan, a member of the officially sanctioned National Human Rights Association.

"There are cases of misuse of work permits by agents who bring foreign workers into the country, direct them to jobs other than those specified in their permits and take a commission from them, but these people are punished (when caught)," he told AFP.

There are some six million expatriates, mostly Asians, in Saudi Arabia.

"With regard to the smuggling of children from Yemen who are turned into beggars, authorities carry out campaigns to arrest those responsible and repatriate the children," Khathlan said.

The Saudi daily Al-Watan on Saturday front-paged a report on raids launched by security authorities to track down "gangs" involved in smuggling impoverished women and children across the southern border of Yemen.

It quoted the police chief of the southern Jazan region, Ahmad al-Qazzaz, as saying many of the "dens" used by beggars and the gangs which exploit them were raided in a 25-day-long campaign.

Officials in Saudi Arabia, Qatar and the UAE were either not reachable or unwilling to immediately comment on the US report, but in Kuwait, a senior official said his country had adopted stiff measures to clamp down on human trafficking.

These included closing the camel race club for four months in punishment for using child jockeys. Government reopened it only after the club pledged not to violate the law banning the use of jockeys under 18 or weighing less than 45 kilograms (100 pounds), said Adnan al-Omar, assistant undersecretary at the social affairs and labor ministry.

A plan to replace human jockeys by robots could be applied "within weeks," he told AFP.

Omar said Kuwait, which hosts 1.8 million foreigners, was considering a study by the International Labor Organization (ILO) to "find alternatives for the sponsor system," which binds foreign workers with a view to safeguarding their dignity.

Both Qatar and the UAE have already tested the use of robots as jockeys after banning children in the region's popular sport, and the UAE has signed an agreement with the United Nations children's fund UNICEF to rehabilitate child camel jockeys.

But the State Department report said "the trafficking and exploitation of South Asian and African children as camel jockeys has burgeoned in the Gulf states" despite promises to curb the practice.

The head of Qatar's National Human Rights Committee, a government watchdog, said the 2004 report issued by his group had "not detected a single case of human trafficking."

In addition, Qatar's government had just "issued a law to combat human trafficking, particularly bringing children from abroad for use as camel jockeys," Khaled al-Attiyah told AFP.

He was referring to a decree issued last month threatening jail sentences of between three and 10 years for anyone using child jockeys in camel races and fines of up to 55,000 dollars for violators.

The four Gulf countries were among 14 states in the US report ranked "Tier 3," as the worst offenders who could face sanctions if they don't improve within 90 days.

The Saudis were cited for "lack of progress in anti-trafficking efforts," particularly an alleged failure to protect men and women trafficked for labor and children forced into begging.

Suhaila Hammad, another member of the Saudi National Human Rights Association, said the report was "neither objective nor impartial," because it ignored abuses in the United States itself and Europe.

She charged that the timing of its release suggests Washington is trying to "cover up the scandal over the desecration of the Holy Koran at the US detention camp in Guantanamo."

lg-oh-fb/ksh

LOAD-DATE: June 5, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

95 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 4, 2005 Saturday 1:15 AM GMT

Cambodia joins US human trafficking blacklist, China, Taiwan downgraded

BYLINE: P. Parameswaran

LENGTH: 512 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON June 3

Cambodia has joined North Korea and Myanmar as Asia's worst human trafficking violators, the US State Department said Friday in a report tracking the problem across the globe.

Notorious mostly for child sex trafficking, Cambodia was lumped together with the hardline states in the "Tier 3" blacklist of the department's annual "Trafficking in Persons Report."

Cambodia's inclusion stems largely from government "complicity" in trafficking, said John Miller, the department's senior adviser against human trafficking.

The department also gave lower grades to China and Taiwan this year in its review of 150 countries in combating trafficking for forced labor, prostitution and military service, among other areas.

China has been included this year in the "Tier 2 Watch List" created last year for more worrisome countries that were not ranked as "Tier 3."

It resulted from China's "failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking, specifically its inadequate protection for trafficking victims," the report said.

The department also cited the "involuntary return" of North Korean refugees from China, often facing "serious abuses" by the hardline communist regime in Pyongyang.

Taiwan, which in 2004 was on "Tier 1" with nations deemed compliant with US and international efforts to fight trafficking, fell to "Tier 2".

But Japan, Vietnam, Pakistan, Thailand, Laos and Nepal moved up to Tier 2 from the Tier 2 watchlist while Bangladesh, lumped together with the worst violators in 2004, made a significant improvement to Tier 2, indicating stepped up efforts in the region to combat human trafficking, the department said.

"We estimate that up to 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders every year, and millions more are trafficked internally," Rice said.

She did not give a regional breakdown but the report said convictions for human trafficking in East Asia and the Pacific last year dropped to 348 last year from 583 in 2003.

In South Asia however, convictions more than doubled to 1,260 in 2004 from 355 the previous year.

India and the Philippines remained on the Tier 2 watchlist this year while Afghanistan, East Timor, Indonesia, Malaysia, Singapore and Sri Lanka were maintained on Tier 2.

Miller said that trafficking for labor exploitation, particularly involuntary servitude of foreign laborers, received greater attention in 2005.

"This greater emphasis came as a result of better data obtained from source countries and nongovernmental organizations," he said.

The State Department's ratings were based on government actions to combat trafficking in persons as defined by US law.

The standards are applied equally to every country, Miller said. "We examine each country individually."

Vietnam, he said, had "made some significant progress in the last year," and cited controls on exporting Vietnamese labor and alleged links with "slave owners" in other countries.

"They have stepped in and are giving much better supervision and control. Their number of convictions has increased, so there's been some progress in Vietnam," he said.

LOAD-DATE: June 4, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2005 Agence France Presse
All Rights Reserved

96 of 359 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Latin America - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 4, 2005, Saturday

US revises Jamaica's position on human trafficking list

SOURCE: Caribbean Media Corporation news agency, Bridgetown, in English 15:07 GMT, 4 Jun 05

LENGTH: 416 words

Text of report by Caribbean Media Corporation (CMC) news agency on 4 June

Kingston, Jamaica: The United States Government has downgraded Jamaica on its list of countries tackling the problem of the illegal trafficking of persons.

In its latest Trafficking in Persons Report, released on Friday [3 June], the US State Department ranks Jamaica at the bottom of the pile in the "Tier Three" group of countries down from "Tier Two" last year. That group of worst performing countries includes Cuba, Burma, Sudan, Kuwait and Venezuela.

The new ranking means that Jamaica could be banned from receiving non-humanitarian and non-trade related assistance from the United States as of October this year.

According to the report, Jamaica is a source country for children trafficked internally for sexual exploitation. "A 2001 ILO (International Labour Organization) report cited that more than 100 minors, both boys and girls, are involved in Jamaica's sex trade. Precise numbers of trafficking victims are difficult to establish due to the underground and under-acknowledged nature of trafficking in the country", the report states.

It alleges that Jamaican children often travel from rural areas to urban and tourist centres where they are engaged in prostitution, sometimes with the encouragement and complicity of their families. The report goes on to say that Jamaica is a transit country for illegal migrants moving to the United States and Canada.

The government has also been harshly criticised for "not fully complying with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to do so."

While noting the passage of the Child Care and Protection Act through the Jamaican Parliament in 2004, the State Department report argues that this was not very effective as some of its provisions have not been implemented.

The report argues that additional action needs to be taken against corrupt Jamaican officials who are facilitating the international movement of persons. In what is perhaps its most damning charge, the report alleges that there is a lack of political will in Jamaica to fully protect children who are being sexually exploited.

The US State Department notes that the Child Care and Protection Act has been invoked to prosecute cases of child abuse and violations of children's rights but it said that there was no investigation, arrest or prosecution of persons involved in the trafficking of children.

LOAD-DATE: June 4, 2005

LANGUAGE: English

97 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Frontier Star

June 4, 2005 Saturday

PAKISTAN SEEKING FOR TIER 1 ON HUMAN TRAFFICKINGLENGTH: 294 words

ISLAMABAD, June 4 : Lauding FIA's efforts in controlling human trafficking Interior Minister Aftab Ahmed Sherpao said that Pakistan is aiming for Tier 1 list on human trafficking

Internationally, there are three lists to watch human trafficking Tier 1, 2 and 3 and few countries in the world touch the Tier 1 status due to extra-ordinary planning and work to control the human trafficking.

Mr. Sherpao while talking to journalists before the meeting with high officials of Federal Investigation Officer (FIA) at FIA Headquarter said after viewing the efforts of Pakistan to control the human trafficking, US State Department will soon present the final report to Congress about removing Pakistan among the human trafficking countries.

He said the US government has not only removed Pakistan from the watch list but has also commended the government of Pakistan on its efforts to combat humane trafficking.

"This year Pakistan received a Tier 2 placement in the 2005 trafficking in person report and it will further improve it," he said optimistically.

He said that the report has noted that the Pakistan government has increased trafficking-related prosecution and convictions, strengthened implementations of its 2002 Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance and established Anti Trafficking Unit (ATU) in the FIA.

While appreciating the team of Director General of FIA, Tariq Pervez to control the human trafficking, he said FIA played a significant role to counter the human trafficking across the country.

"The government would air a two part documentary film soon on human trafficking on PTV to create awareness among the masses," he informed.

Secretary Interior, Kamal Shah, DG, FIA, Tariq Pervez and other high officials of FIA were present at the occasion.

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISHDOCUMENT-TYPE: Trafficking/SmugglingPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Global News Bites

98 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Jiji Press Ticker Service

June 4, 2005, Saturday

Japan Removed from U.S. Human Trafficking Watch List

LENGTH: 163 words

DATELINE: Washington, June 3

Japan was removed from the U.S. list of countries that require special watch for human trafficking, according to the Trafficking in Persons Report for 2005, released Friday.

Of the three levels of compliance with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, Japan was placed on Tier 2.

The evaluation reflects the countermeasures the Japanese government has taken in response to its placement on Tier 2 Watch List last year, according to the report published by the Department of State.

"The government of Japan does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so," the report said. It cited proposed penal code revisions to increase penalties for trafficking-related offenses and reforms to significantly tighten the issuances of entertainer visas to women from the Philippines.

The lowest level of Tier 3 listed 14 countries including North Korea and Myanmar.

LOAD-DATE: June 03, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 Jiji Press Ltd.

99 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The New York Times

June 4, 2005 Saturday
Late Edition - Final

U.S. Faults 4 Allies Over Forced Labor

BYLINE: By JOEL BRINKLEYSECTION: Section A; Column 1; Foreign Desk; Pg. 5LENGTH: 952 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 3

The United States criticized four of its closest allies in the Middle East on Friday, saying Kuwait, Qatar, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates are doing little if anything to stop forced labor and other forms of "modern slavery" within their borders.

The four countries are among 14 "Tier III" nations that the State Department said had a serious problem with trafficking in persons and made little or no effort to control it, despite prodding from the United States. Citation as a Tier III country can trigger economic penalties.

"Trafficking in human beings is nothing less than a modern form of slavery," said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, speaking at a news conference introducing the government's fifth annual Trafficking in Persons Report.

None of the four Middle Eastern countries were on the government's list of problem nations last year -- though Saudi Arabia was listed in 2001 and 2002. The government decided this year to focus its attention on forced labor, the primary problem in the four Middle Eastern states.

In Saudi Arabia, said John R. Miller, the State Department's senior adviser on trafficking, "We have domestic workers being brought in from many countries into domestic servitude, child beggars, a lot of beatings, reports of beatings and rape -- very difficult to get shelter, no convictions."

Slave trafficking burst onto the world stage in the mid-1990's, when thousands of women from the former Soviet Union, attracted by job offers in Europe, were forced to work as prostitutes once they arrived. These Russian women began working the streets of major European capitals.

In the United States during the late 1990's, several notorious farm-labor servitude cases in Florida and forced prostitution cases involving hundreds of Mexican and Thai women caught the attention of the Clinton administration, just as Europe was urging Washington to get involved.

