In 2000, Congress passed the Trafficking Victim Protection Act, which set out new penalties for slave traffickers and required the State Department to publish an annual report on slave trafficking worldwide. The department vigorously opposed the report provision. Officials said they did not want to do research for another annual report, on top of the human rights and drug trafficking reports, and did not believe nations found to be out of compliance should be penalized automatically.

The bill was amended to make the sanctions subject to the president's discretion. And since 2003, when the sanction provision took effect, only two countries -- Venezuela and Equatorial Guinea -- have been cited. Under the law, no decisions on whether to sanction the 14 nations cited this year can be made before September -- to give the nations time to improve their records, Mr. Miller said.

The other nations include Bolivia, Cambodia, Ecuador, Jamaica, Sudan, Togo and Venezuela. Also listed were Cuba, Myanmar and North Korea, nations that are mentioned in almost every government list of problem states. Last year, the department listed only 10 problem states. But the first report, in 2001, listed 23.

Saudi Arabia is a key American ally and oil supplier whose leader, Crown Prince Abdullah, visited President Bush at his Texas ranch in April. Kuwait and the United Arab Emirates, along with Qatar, are also allies, and the United States maintains an important military base in Qatar.

The criticisms of the four countries were similar. All four nations, the report says, imported workers from the region, from the Middle East and Asia and then effectively enslaved them.

"Some foreign women who migrate legally to Kuwait as domestic workers," the report says, "are subsequently abused by their employers or coerced into situations of debt bondage or involuntary servitude," the legal term for slavery. In the United Arab Emirates, "women are trafficked" from many nations "for the purpose of sexual exploitation."

Saudi Arabia, the report adds, discourages victims from complaining. "The government offers no legal aid to foreign workers," the report says, "and does not otherwise assist them in using the Saudi criminal justice system to bring exploiters to justice. If a victim chooses to file a complaint, he or she is not allowed to work."

None of the embassies of the four countries responded to requests for comment.

The government was particularly critical of Kuwait, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates for allowing young children to be held in captivity and used as jockeys in camel races, "a multi-million dollar activity" in the Persian Gulf states. Tiny children, some 3 or 4 years old, are prized, and they are underfed to keep their weight down, the report notes.

"Some boys as young as 6 months old were reported kidnapped and sold to traffickers and raised to become camel jockeys." Others, it adds, "were sold by their parents to traffickers." Recently, it adds, one fell off his camel and was trampled to death.

In Kuwait, it says, "some have been thrown from the camels they rode and suffered serious neurological damage. Most no longer remember where they came from."

The United States estimates that about 800,000 people are trafficked against their will between nations each year, and that many hundreds of thousands more are enslaved within their own nations.

The government also estimates that about 15,000 people are trafficked to the United States each year. That estimate has fallen since the Central Intelligence Agency issued the first one in 2000. Then it was estimated that as many as 50,000 people were trafficked to the United States from a dozen foreign countries each year.

URL: <http://www.nytimes.com>

LOAD-DATE: June 4, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

100 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Xinhua General News Service

June 4, 2005 Saturday 1:15 AM EST

Major news items in leading Indian newspapers

SECTION: WORLD NEWS

LENGTH: 223 words

DATELINE: NEW DELHI

Following are the major news items in leading Indian newspapers on Saturday.

Hindustan Times:

-- Energy cooperation is likely to be the "big ticket" issue of Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh's first bilateral visit to Washington from July 18 to 20.

According to US President George W. Bush, "big things" are expected to emanate from this visit, with both countries "joingly engaged in the process of widening and deepening" their "multifaceted cooperative relationship."

The Times of India:

-- The US state department has included India among countries in the "watch list" in its annual report on global human trafficking released on Friday, for the second year in succession, saying it did not show "evidence of increased efforts to address trafficking in persons." The fifth annual trafficking in persons report, which meanwhile removed Pakistan from the watch list.

The Hindu:

-- Ending all speculation to the contrary, India has come out in support of a controversial Sri Lankan Government proposal to involve the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE) in a joint domestic mechanism for administering post-tsunami operations in that country. The India-Sri Lanka joint statement was issued in New Delhi on Friday during the ongoing working visit of Sri lankan President Chandrika Kumaratunga.

LOAD-DATE: June 5, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

101 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 3, 2005 Friday

United States, Canada and Africa; State Department Releases 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report

BYLINE: United States Department of State

LENGTH: 4810 words

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Thank you, Madame Secretary. As Secretary of State Rice eloquently explained, human trafficking or trafficking in persons is synonymous with slavery. Now, this is a time when we roll out this report with facts, with figures, with categories, but this report is, more than anything, about human beings. And so I want to start by telling you about Svetlana, an all too typical victim of human trafficking.

Last year, Svetlana was a young woman living in Belarus, looking for a job. She came upon some Turkish men who promised her a well-paying job in Istanbul and once Svetlana crossed the border, the men seized her money, her papers, her passport. They locked her up. They forced her into prostitution. And then one night, they farmed her out to two businessmen, just like a commodity. Desperate, Svetlana jumped out of a window and fell six stories to a sidewalk. According to Turkish court documents, the so-called customers went down, found her on the sidewalk and instead of calling the police, called the traffickers, who killed her.

Svetlana's body lay unclaimed in the morgue for two weeks until Turkish authorities learned her identity and sent her body to Belarus. There is a bright spot in this too common tragedy. Belarusian and Turkish authorities cooperated this year to arrest and charge those responsible for Svetlana's death, which I think brings out that bad things are happening, but also how there are counterattacks going on.

Svetlana and other victims' stories are interspersed throughout the introduction to this year's report. I think you've all got copies of it. And they're there so that we may always remember what this struggle is about. Trafficking in persons relies on coercion and exploitation. It thrives on converting hope to fear. It is maintained through violence and it is highly profitable. In that sense, while there are differences, there are also similarities to the slavery of earlier centuries. U.S. Government is committed to taking action in cooperation with other nations to end modern-day slavery and that is the ultimate purpose of this annual Trafficking in Persons Report, which we're releasing today for the fifth year.

This is a tool, along with the assessment of the United States, which comes out later this month -- one of many tools to help free the slaves and throw traffickers in jail. Trafficking is not simply a crime against human rights. It amounts to a public health menace and a rich source of financing for organized crime. It's a dangerous and perverse mutation of otherwise beneficial global exchange. We believe that modern day slavery plagues every, every country, including the United States. This report covers 150 countries found to be a source destination or transit country, for on the order of 100 victims, the threshold for inclusion in the report.

If you find a country is not listed, it probably means we have insufficient knowledge of slavery in that country or else the government in the country cannot exercise sufficient control to be evaluated. Our sources of information are diverse: law enforcement, U.S. embassies, NGOs, daring activists, foreign governments, our own visits. Everything enters the mix, extensive analysis and debate goes into the assessment of each country and assignment into Tier 1, Tier 2, Tier 2 watch list, or Tier 3.

We didn't design the system. Congress designed the system with important help from nongovernmental organization and faith-based communities. I'm happy to note that the Tier 2 warning watch list, introduced last year, has been very effective. 31 of the 46 countries on the 2004 TIP reports, Tier 2 watch list improve their ratings this year. The increased scrutiny of these countries' anti-trafficking efforts required of us by Congress has led to the State Department's greater engagement with these governments. More important, it has led to greater efforts by the governments themselves.

For the third year, Tier 3 countries can be sanctioned if they don't take significant anti-slavery action in the next few months. I'm encouraged to note several countries that were on Tier 3 last June stepped up anti-slavery activities so that they have been raised. In South America, Guyana's president pushed through the country's first anti-trafficking law and led a countrywide awareness campaign on the dangers of trafficking. In South Asia, Bangladesh set up a long-promised special anti-trafficking police unit, which started new investigations while rescuing an increased number of victims.

When we look at slavery worldwide, we believe sex slavery is the largest category of transnational slavery. It is intrinsically linked to prostitution and we find that where prostitution is encouraged, the number of victims increases. That is why to combat sex slavery, we are urging a greater focus on demand, educating and dissuading the so-called customers. But while sex slavery is large, we are concerned with all forms of slavery. This year, trafficking through labor exploitation, particularly in voluntary servitude of foreign laborers, received greater attention. This greater emphasis came as a result of better data obtained from source countries and nongovernmental organizations. Four countries are placed on Tier 3 for their failure primarily to make significant efforts to combat forced labor trafficking: Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates.

The forced labor may involve foreign workers who end up in conditions of involuntary servitude or child camel jockeys who live in slave-like conditions and are forced to race in extremely dangerous environments.

Burma and North Korea, Sudan and Cuba remain on Tier 3, largely because they still fail to address forced labor in their countries. Another government, Cambodia, is on Tier 3 because of government complicity in trafficking in persons -- another important criteria for Tier 3 and the law.

The report covers efforts from March 2004 to March 2005. Some governments have taken steps against slavery since the report was drafted. This is great. Ecuador was placed on Tier 3 again this year for its lack of significant efforts during the reporting period. Two days ago, Ecuador's congress passed criminal code changes that could lead to positive progress in fighting slavery.

The country ratings here, the government ratings are based strictly on government actions to combat trafficking in persons as defined by U.S. law. The standards are set up for the Trafficking Victim Protection Act and are applied equally to every country. We examine each country individually. The goal of the report is not to punish but to stimulate government action to end modern day slavery. We hope all Tier 3 countries will move off Tier 3 within the 90-day grace period by taking concrete steps to combat trafficking in persons. We are prepared to work with them to help achieve this.

At the same time, nowhere on earth is it allowable to systematically abuse children for sport or to stand up while household help is trapped and exploited with no recourse to help or to look the other way while sex traffickers seize young women.

I'd like to address one misperception that is developed around this Trafficking in Persons Report. The Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 requires Tier ratings to emphasize government efforts against human trafficking, especially in terms of prosecution, protection and prevention, rather than just the extent of the slavery problem. Under the law, countries that have substantial anti-trafficking in person efforts underway justify higher ratings, even if they have a large trafficking in person problem.

Now, stepping back and looking around the world, the picture is not all bleak. Shining through this global tragedy are many rays of hope. In addition to the tremendous efforts of heroic individuals and private organizations, governments around the globe are awakening to this issue and taking action to end this form of modern day slavery.

Worldwide, this past year, the number of trafficking related convictions has increased over 3,000. And new anti-human trafficking legislation was approved in 39 countries. That's a big change from five or ten years ago.

We're seeing progress on many fronts. In this year's report, several countries on Tier 1 showed anti-trafficking in person leadership through strong policies and implementation of laws. South Korea launched a brave initiative to close down outlets for commercial sexual exploitation and trafficking, arresting over 500 people and rescuing over 1,000 victims.

Sweden continued its path-breaking program to prosecute exploiters and clients of prostitution while identifying and protecting women in commercial sexual exploitation. Sweden has funded anti-trafficking information campaigns throughout Europe, focusing on curbing demand for trafficking victims.

Morocco has led efforts to hold accountable UN peacekeepers guilty of sexual abuse of minors in areas of UN deployment. The report on pages 33 and 38 identifies international best practices and anti-slavery heroes throughout the world. And those sections could have been much longer, believe me.

The best practices are wide and varied and all are commendable, but let me highlight a few. The Indian NGO Shakti Vahini produces an informative Indian Trafficking in Persons Report that rates anti-slavery efforts in Indian states. The Malawian nongovernmental organization People Serving Girls at Risk works to identify and help underage girls in prostitution through undercover outreach. And the Fahmina Institute of Indonesia engages Islamic boarding schools to spread anti-trafficking awareness.

The anti-slavery heroes cited in the report, a few out of thousands, range from Ansar Burney the Pakistani human rights activist who has sought to help Asian and African children who have been trafficked to the Arabian Gulf countries for exploitation, as camel jockeys. To Somaly Mam and Pierre Legros of the French NGO AFESIP who braved personal threats from traffickers to rescue victims of sex slavery in Southeast Asia.

The U.S. is deeply committed to fulfilling its responsibilities in the fight against trafficking in persons. And that's why we contributed an excess of $80 million abroad for all kinds of anti-trafficking programs last year. In January, President George W. Bush said, "no one is fit to be a master and no one deserves to be a slave." And because of the stain of slavery, on our own history, these words have special meaning to us and they guide our efforts against trafficking in persons, based on our strong belief in freedom and human dignity. As the Secretary has stated, modern slavery has been met and is being met with a growing powerful response -- a 21st century abolitionist movement. We must all do our part.

Thank you and let's turn to questions. Oh, my gosh. Okay, yes. Go ahead. Yeah.

QUESTION: Andrea Mitchell from NBC. Can you tell us regarding Saudi Arabia, Qatar, Kuwait, the UAE, whether you believe that it was the prior sanctions to get some action? In particular in Saudi Arabia, they have moved backwards, not forward since last year's report. And you've got four countries that are major allies of the United States in the war on terror and in military operations that are chief abusers in this practice.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Well, I won't disagree with your characterization of the situation. It is serious, for example, in Saudi Arabia we have domestic workers being brought in from many countries into domestic servitude -- child beggars, a lot of beatings, reports of beatings and rape, very difficult to get shelter, no convictions. But you're -- the first part of your question was: Is this going to lead to sanctions? My answer is I hope not because the purpose of the law is not to sanction, it is to get progress in freeing the victims and throwing the traffickers in jail.

QUESTION: They've moved backwards in the last year.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Wait a minute -- that's...

QUESTION: Will it require sanctions?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: If they stay in Tier 3, it will require sanctions. However, the reason why I hope this will not take place is under the law, there are now three months for any government in Tier 3 to take significant steps against trafficking and we're prepared to work with these governments, including the governments you mentioned. Our hope is there will be enough progress in freeing the victims and throwing the traffickers in jail that at the end of 120 days, there will not have to be sanctions, but there is that possibility.

Yes.

QUESTION: Can I follow-up on that?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: This law has been in effect for five years?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: Could you say how many countries and which ones have been sanctioned until now?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah. There have been several countries sanctioned. But the interesting thing is that countries that are willing to work on this issue in the past, we've had several relationships with, have avoided sanctions by taking action in the three months or four months after the report.

For example, two years ago, we placed Turkey and Greece, two NATO allies, on Tier 3. But in the four months over the summer, the arrests, the prosecutions, the setting up of referral systems to get victims to nongovernmental organizations, the setting up of shelters, there was significant progress made, which we were delighted with. So the purpose here is not to result in sanctions, although that may happen, it is to get progress.

Yes. Go ahead.

QUESTION: Under which capacity, the United States is preparing in those type of reports, interfering in the internal affairs of sovereign countries?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: I'm sorry. Could you just repeat the question again?

QUESTION: Yes. Under which capacity, the United States of America is preparing, those type of reports interfering in the internal affairs of sovereign countries?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Okay. Well, this is not the first time I've heard that question. The answer -- that is that reminds me of a question that was asked William Wilberforce. On the floor of the English Parliament, back in the 1790s when he discovered, realized the extent of slavery and started his campaign to end the slave trade, and the question that was asked of him by another parliamentarian was: Will the right honorable gentleman tell me what rights we have to impose British moral values on the world? Wilberforce, who was alone in Parliament when he started this action, cited universal and religious values, to show that people nowhere wanted slavery.

Today, we have -- the case is much stronger because unlike in Wilberforce's time, no government in the world, that I'm aware of, officially endorses slavery and there are numerous international covenants, UN covenants, that nations of the world have subscribed to that are -- banned slavery.

So I would say in this effort that we're participating in, we are trying both at home and abroad to work with other countries in trying to end a slavery, that citizens around the world and ostensibly, governments around the world, all agree is a scourge that should be ended. Let's take somebody in the back.

Yeah, go ahead.

QUESTION: Advocacy organizations around the world are saying that poverty and lack of job opportunities is one of the causes of women or families being vulnerable to slavery. To what extent is the United States prepared to relieve debt to World Bank or IMF loans and other forms to substantially improve the quality of life and services in nations around the world vulnerable?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Sure. Well, as Ambassador-at-large on international slavery, I'm not the U.S. expert or authority on international debt, but I want to comment on the premise of your question. You identified poverty as a major cause of slavery and slave trade and I would agree it is a major cause. There are a lot of studies that have been done in the last couple of years -- I won't cite them all -- that show, however, that it is one of several major causes. Poverty is a push factor. There is the pull factor of the attraction of the better life in the wealthier country. There is the factor of gender attitudes. Believe me, when you look at sex slavery and parts of domestic servitude slavery, gender attitudes play a big role.

There is the role of organized crime and greed. I mean, this is a big source of revenue for organized crime. I mean, now they -- we talked about the arms trade, the drug trade, and the people trade being sources of revenue for organized crime.

So all of these causes we hope will be addressed, but in the meantime -- in the meantime -- we are seeking, through our office, to do what we can to work with other countries to get better law enforcement, get better protection for victims, and get prevention and education campaigns.

Yes.

QUESTION: To what extent are the efforts in the United States to identify victims and to give them the T-4 visa programs they -- to what extent are those efforts successful and why are not --

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: How many victims have been identified to date?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: And what are the problems in identifying victims?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah. That's a very good question. Did everybody hear -- should I be repeating the questions or --

QUESTION: No, that's fine. We don't mind.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: You can hear, okay. Your question about identifying victims in the United States, you put your finger on a problem that is -- confronts the United States and almost every country in the world. The gap between what are estimated to be the number of victims and the actual number of victims getting help -- just two weeks ago, President Bush's task force on trafficking in persons consisting of cabinet officers chaired by Secretary of State Rice discussed this issue and the Health and Human Services Secretary Leavitt specifically brought up, as an area where we need to do more, exactly that.

What has been done? And the gap is such -- to give you an idea of the gap, I believe the figure now is about roughly 700 people have been helped with temporary visas in the United States. They cooperate in prosecutions, get assistance and all that, yet we know the figure -- we suspect -- we don't scientifically know, since victims don't stand in line to be -- raise their hands to be counted, but we suspect that the figure for the number of victims annually crossing into the United States across our borders every year is in excess of 14 and a half thousand. So there's a gap.

Presently, Health and Human Services has pilot programs in ten -- I believe it's soon to be 20 cities -- trying to reach out to the foreign migrant communities to help victims come forward. We are starting to consider another additional approach, a work sector approach, and Health and Human Services has done some work on this, but this approach would involve mobilizing or involving doctors, hospitals, lawyers, travel industry personnel in this effort to try to help victims come forward.

So you're right in identifying one of the big challenges.

Yes, back?

QUESTION: Can I follow up on this question, sir?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah. Well, just --

QUESTION: It's on this particular area.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Okay.

QUESTION: Can you speak about what the U.S. is doing to just not only identify victims, but to combat demand, as the Secretary said? You just said that nowhere on earth --

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: Is it acceptable, so --

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Right.

QUESTION: -- what is the U.S. doing? And it's your -- you just mentioned that you were the Ambassador of international slavery. Is this a new title or are you just kind of encapsulating what it is that the --

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Well, it's -- I guess it's sort of new. It's -- Congress and the President raised the position to ambassadorial status -- well, I was confirmed by the Senate nine months ago and in the previous year, I guess the end of 2003, legislation was passed raising this position to ambassadorial status. In addition, I -- at the direction of the President, I chair a -- under that Presidential task force I referred to, I chair a senior policy operating group of domestic and foreign U.S. agencies trying to coordinate policies.

Now, let's get to the first part of your question: demand and what's being done in the United States. I think if you look at the United States and around the world, you'll see there are a lot of demand education programs directed at potential victims. However, what you don't see yet are a lot of programs directed at the demand for the victims. That is starting to change in the United States.

I'll give you a good example. There is an organization, SAGE in San Francisco, with U.S. taxpayers' support, that first convinced the San Francisco law enforcement authorities to arrest not just the women engaged in prostitution, who might be trafficking victims, but arrest the traffickers, the pimps, the brothel owners, and the so-called customers. And then that organization convinced the authorities that a fine should be imposed on the first offense so there would be a school, which has the name, John School, that these men would have to go to. I visited there a couple of weeks ago and this school now has been going for some time, appears to have very good results, two percent recidivism rate.

This program has now spread in different forms to 15 or 20 U.S. cities. I think it's going to spread further and we are discussing with different countries around the world how this could be replicated in those countries to address demand. For example, we're in discussions with the Korean Ministry of Gender and Equality on that issue.

Yes, in the back. Go ahead.

QUESTION: Are you saying that the Brazil Government is making progress, but is not fully complying? Could you say what needs to be done?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Sure. Brazil, I believe, if I'm not mistaken, is listed in Tier 2, which is the upper category of the report. I visited Brazil last fall. One of the positive things going on in Brazil: Brazil has started setting up, in different provinces, anti-trafficking in persons efforts.

I think one of the problems that Brazil faces is that while there has been tremendous government interest, the President of Brazil has spoken out very strongly on this issue, but if you look at the actual finished product in law enforcement, three convictions last year, coming out of scores and scores of investigations and hundreds and hundreds of victims -- so, I think in that area, they can do more. They can do more in terms of their awareness campaigns and their protection efforts for victims, but I would say law enforcement would be the major area.

I hope I'm calling -- yes, go ahead.

QUESTION: You mentioned Canada as a transit country.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yes.

QUESTION: With some of these sex trade workers.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: And although Canada is in Tier 1, how would you rate Canada in terms of this problem and what do you think Canada should do to improve the situation?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Okay. Well, you're talking about Canada as a transit country and Canada has done some very aggressive things the last year. We have a specific transit problem we have to address with Canada and I think it's referred to in the report. I hope it's referred to. And the challenge that we face is that there are migrants from the Far East that come into Canada -- for example, Korea, they don't need a visa and then they just come across the U.S. border and we -- there's a lot of evidence that there's hundreds of such victims involved.

We're going to have to -- we're working on this with Canada and Korea. We're going to see what we can do to try to address this problem. That's an example.

I'm sorry, there's so -- yes? There's so many people. Go ahead.

MR. CASEY: Mr. Ambassador I'm afraid we're going to have to make this limited to a couple more people. So why don't you take that one and then I know Teri wanted to get in --

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Okay. Oh, Teri -- no, no, no, no. Okay, yes. Okay, I'll take two. Go ahead.

QUESTION: Yeah. Ambassador Miller, my name is Wen Ha (ph), Radio Free Asia.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: I didn't hear -- you didn't mention anything about Vietnam.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: However, the problem is there. You know, like there -- now, Vietnam last year was on Tier 2 watch list.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Watch list, yes.

QUESTION: On the Tier 2 --

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: It's not on the watch list anymore.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: My question is, what is the method that you used to -- in order to classify Vietnam to Tier 2 watch list?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: To -- well, we thought they --

QUESTION: Did you find -- yeah, did you send a fact-finding team to Vietnam?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah, yeah. We have had -- Vietnam made some significant progress in the last year. For example, we were very critical of Vietnam before on exporting Vietnamese labor and cooperating with what we thought were slave owners in other countries, including one operation in American Samoa. But they have stepped in and are giving much better supervision and control. Their number of convictions has increased, so there's been some progress in Vietnam.

Teri, Teri? No, I've got to -- no, Teri -- I ignored her last year.

QUESTION: He ignored me last year.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: I didn't call on her. I got to -- okay.

QUESTION: Okay, thank you. Ambassador Miller, a couple of things. You didn't actually tell us who has been sanctioned when you talked about sanctions and I wanted to go back to the question of these very close allies: Kuwait, UAE, Saudi Arabia. And could you -- you've been to these countries and you've had discussions with these leaders about these issues --

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: -- and many of them have laws in place, not to mention authoritarian regimes that should be able to enforce these laws, one would think. Could you help us understand why they aren't doing more, especially being such close allies of the U.S. in counterterrorism, for example? And we really do want to know who's been sanctioned.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: I'm glad you've -- the toughest question comes last. Well, in terms of countries that have been sanctioned, if you look at the countries in -- nobody has been sanctioned this year. If you look at the countries from last year's report, and we can -- I can't recall them from memory, but you can -- our staff can get them to you, but your -- the tough part of your question was -- well, here are close friends of the United States; how can this happen? Two years ago, I was asked about Greece and Turkey; how can allies be on Tier 3?

I believe that this is a function, to a large extent, of information and public awareness, that as public awareness increases in these countries, you see more action. For example, just for example, in Saudi Arabia, a recent case involving an Indonesian young woman tortured, beaten, dumped at a hospital -- domestic servitude case has gotten publicity. A human rights lawyer in Saudi Arabia has protested there and I don't know how it's all going to come out, but they're -- apparently in the last month, there was an arrest made.

As public awareness increases -- and sometimes when countries don't have free flows of information, that's hard -- but as public awareness increases, I don't think people want slavery today and this is where one of the signs of progress has been the exponential increase of news media attention to this issue the last couple of years.

Since I'm at the end here, I want to tell you, when you write on this -- when you write on this, I know you're journalists and all that -- but when you write on this issue, you indirectly help free victims and throw traffickers in jail because it increases public awareness. People become more aware all over the world. They become more aware in the United States. They start talking to their local police. They start talking to their public officials.

Good things happen when -- so -- but the last comment, I am -- so, I have a meeting coming up with foreign ambassadors and then NGOs.

I know there are a lot of people that didn't get to ask questions. If --

QUESTION: You're going to come up, sir. We have about 10 minutes to (inaudible) --

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Oh, I've got 10 more minutes, okay. And -- but we've also got people on our staff: Eleanor Kennelly, Caroline Tetschner that even if I have to move out after five or ten minutes can answer questions.

So thank you all for coming. I appreciate it.

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 AllAfrica, Inc.

102 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 3, 2005 Friday

PanAfrica; Trafficking in Persons Report Focuses On Labor Exploitation

BYLINE: United States Department of State

LENGTH: 1079 words

Secretary Rice, Ambassador Miller aim to end modern-day slavery

Citing both the positive actions and failures of governments around the world to take the necessary steps to end modern-day slavery, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice presented to the public the fifth annual "http://allafrica.com/peaceafrica/resources/view/00010661.pdf" target="_blank" alt="http://allafrica.com/peaceafrica/resources/view/00010661.pdf">Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP) [pdf; 6.26 MBytes] at the U.S. Department of State June 3.

Rice expressed the hope that the comprehensive, worldwide report "will raise international awareness of the crime of trafficking and spur governments across the globe to take determined actions against it."

Introducing the findings, the secretary noted that "up to 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders every year and millions more are trafficked internally." Four out of five of those trafficked are women and one in two is a minor, she said.

The data, she said, illustrate that the majority of transnational victims are trafficked into commercial sexual exploitation, but there is also an alarming enslavement of people for purposes of labor exploitation, a form of slavery given special attention in this year's report.

The responsibility for trafficking does not rest only with developing countries, whose citizens are vulnerable to trafficking because of poverty or corruption or lack of education, Rice pointed out, but "destination or demand countries like the United States and other prosperous nations, whose citizens create the marketplace for trafficking, also bear a heavy responsibility."

There is a modern-day abolitionist movement of "concerned citizens, students, faith-based organizations, feminists and other non-governmental groups ... doing courageous and compassionate work to end this trade in human degradation," Rice said. "The United States government is proud to stand with them at the forefront of this international anti-trafficking campaign."

The United States provided more than $96 million in foreign aid during 2004 to help other countries strengthen their anti-trafficking efforts, Rice noted, and is now helping them to develop legislation to combat abuse. The aid assists in creating special law enforcement units to investigate trafficking cases and rescue victims, build emergency shelters and develop long-term rehabilitation and vocational training programs," she said.

The report records the efforts of 150 nations between March 2004 and March 2005 to deal with the issue, explained Ambassador John Miller, the senior adviser on trafficking in persons in the State Department. "Shining through this global tragedy are many rays of hope. In addition to tremendous efforts of heroic individuals and private organizations, governments around the globe are awakening to this issue and taking action to end this form of modern-day slavery.

"Worldwide this past year the number of trafficking-related convictions has increased over 3,000. And new anti-human trafficking legislation was approved in 39 countries. That's a big change from four or five years ago," he said.

The report's methodology includes a three-tier system for rating countries' effectiveness in combating trafficking:

Tier 1 includes those countries that have met international standards for coping with trafficking and are vigorously addressing the problem.

Tier 2 comprises countries that are demonstrating commitment to address their problems but have not yet achieved international standards; the Tier 2 "Watch List" consists of countries that might be vulnerable to an erosion of their efforts.

Tier 3, the least favorable rating, lists countries whose governments fail to meet minimal international standards and are not making significant efforts to do so.

While some governments have taken steps against slavery since the report was drafted, Miller said, others have failed to move forward: "Ecuador was placed on Tier III [the lowest] again this year for its lack of significant efforts during the reporting period. Two days ago, Ecuador's congress passed criminal code changes that could lead to positive progress in fighting slavery."

In an overview of this year's report, Miller noted that sex slavery is the largest category of transnational slavery, which translates to an increased number of sex victims in countries where prostitution is allowed or encouraged. Hence there has been "a greater focus on demand, educating and dissuading the so-called customers," he said.

But the United States is concerned with all forms of slavery, Miller insisted, so "this year trafficking through labor exploitation, particularly involuntary servitude of foreign laborers, received greater attention. This greater emphasis came as a result of better data obtained from source countries and non-governmental organizations."

Four countries -- Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates -- remain on Tier III, primarily for failing to make significant efforts to combat forced labor trafficking, he said. "The forced labor may involve foreign workers who end up in conditions of involuntary servitude, or child camel jockeys who live in slavlike conditions and are forced to race in extremely dangerous environments," he added.

"Burma, North Korea, Sudan and Cuba remain on Tier III, largely because they still fail to address forced labor in their countries. Another government, Cambodia, is on Tier III because of government complicity in trafficking in persons."

On the positive side, Miller said: "The Tier II Warning Watch List introduced last year has been very effective. Thirty-one of the 46 countries on the 2004 TIP reports Tier II Watch List improved their ratings this year."

Several countries that were on Tier III on the 2004 report have acted to be raised to the next tier, Miller stated: "Guyana's president pushed through the country's first anti-trafficking law and led a countrywide awareness campaign on the dangers of trafficking, [and] Bangladesh set up a long-promised anti-trafficking police unit, which started new investigations while rescuing an increased number of victims."

Miller also explained: "Country ratings are based strictly on government actions to combat trafficking of persons as defined by U.S. law. The standards are set up by the Trafficking Victim Protection Act and are applied equally to every country."

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

103 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 3, 2005 Friday 1:55 PM GMT

Pakistan removed from US human trafficking watchlist

LENGTH: 412 words

DATELINE: ISLAMABAD June 3

The United States has removed Pakistan from its watchlist on human trafficking, but Islamabad needs to do more to stamp out the practice, the US embassy said Friday.

US Ambassador Ryan Crocker had delivered a copy of the State Department's fifth annual Trafficking in Persons report, due to be released later Friday, to Pakistani Interior Minister Aftab Sherpao on Thursday, it said in a statement.

"The report indicates that Pakistan has improved its anti-trafficking performance over the reporting period," the statement said.

Pakistan is regarded as a major hub for human trafficking and was placed on the watch list last year, but President Pervez Musharraf's government has launched a drive to tackle people smugglers.

Crocker commended Pakistan's efforts during his meeting with Sherpao but encouraged continued progress. "We look forward to further cooperation on trafficking-in-persons issues," he was quoted as telling the minister.

Pakistan had increased trafficking-related prosecutions and convictions and strengthened implementation of key 2002 legislation to prevent human smuggling, the US embassy statement said.

It had also established an anti-trafficking unit and co-sponsored several public awareness campaigns, it added.

Pakistani authorities said earlier this year they had arrested two key suspects linked to a human smuggling mafia that has allegedly sent thousands of Pakistanis illegally to Europe in the past eight years.

Intelligence officials also investigated whether the pair had helped wanted Islamic militants to flee the country following a crackdown on extremism by Musharraf.

There are no official estimates on how many Pakistanis go abroad illegally, but thousands are repatriated every year.

Pakistan had been in danger of slipping into a category under which it would have been in line for economic sanctions, Director General of Pakistan's Federal Investigation Agency Tariq Pervaiz told AFP. The agency is responsible for combating human trafficking.

"It is an acknowledgement of the efforts by the government to curb the problem," he said. "In recent years we have given the highest priority to investigation of cases of trafficking and convicting those involved in the trade."

Pakistan had also taken action against corrupt officials involved in the trade, arresting 90 officials.

"We are going to step up our efforts," said Pervaiz. "It is a very serious humanitarian issue. Thousands of families have been destroyed by the traffickers."

dk-rj/fz

LOAD-DATE: June 4, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2005 Agence France Presse
All Rights Reserved

104 of 359 DOCUMENTS

AP Worldstream

June 3, 2005 Friday

U.S. removes Pakistan from its watchlist on human smuggling, says interior minister

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 208 wordsDATELINE: ISLAMABAD, Pakistan

The United States has removed Pakistan from its watchlist on human trafficking, a Cabinet minister said Friday.

Interior Minister Aftab Khan Sherpao said he had been briefed by U.S. ambassador Ryan C. Croker on Thursday and that the news will be officially announced by the State Department in its annual Trafficking in Persons Report this week.

The department recommends sanctions against countries that fail to combat human trafficking.

Pakistan is considered to be a major route for human smuggling, and was included on the list in 2002, but authorities have in recent months taken several steps to crack down on trafficking.

In 2002, Pakistan made human smuggling an offense punishable by up to 10 years in prison, or a fine, and in January, announced it would establish special courts to expedite trials of those suspected of smuggling.

Smugglers are accused of taking vast sums of money from thousands of Pakistanis who every year attempt to sneak into oil-rich Middle Eastern countries or Europe, often without travel documents, searching for work. Officials say that a number of young children are also smuggled to the United Arab Emirates and elsewhere to act as camel jockeys and women are lured abroad to work as prostitutes.

LOAD-DATE: June 4, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 Associated Press

105 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Federal News Service

June 3, 2005 Friday

SPECIAL STATE DEPARTMENT BRIEFINGTOPIC: RELEASE OF THE 2005 TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT*BRIEFERS: SECRETARY OF STATE CONDOLEEZZA RICE; JOHN R. MILLER, THE SECRETARY'S SENIOR ADVISER ON TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS; PAULA DOBRIANSKY, UNDERSECRETARY OF STATE FOR GLOBAL AFFAIRS*LOCATION: THE STATE DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON, D.C.*SECTION: STATE DEPARTMENT BRIEFING*LENGTH: 5357 words

SEC. RICE: Good afternoon. I'm pleased to join Undersecretary for Global Affairs Paula Dobriansky and the director of the Office for Monitoring and Combatting Trafficking in Persons, Ambassador John Miller, for the release today of the Department of State's annual Trafficking in Persons Report.

This congressionally mandated report represents the United States' deep commitment to stop the brutal crime of human trafficking. Trafficking in human beings is nothing less than a modern form of slavery, and President Bush has called upon all countries to confront this evil. As the president has said, human life is the gift of our creator, and it should never be for sale. The United States has a particular duty to fight this scourge, because trafficking in persons is an affront to the principles of human dignity and liberty upon which this nation was founded.

We estimate that up to 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders every year, and millions more are trafficked internally. Victims of trafficking, most of them women and children, are forced, defrauded or coerced into inhumane conditions. They're made to toil on farms and in work camps, in brothels and in sweatshops. Children are even forced to become soldiers.

Whatever cruel form of servitude they may take, trafficking victims live in fear and misery. And wherever the trafficking trade flourishes, the rule of law erodes, corruption thrives, public health suffers, and organized crime threatens the security of entire communities.

To confront the abomination of human trafficking, a modern-day abolitionist movement has emerged.

Concerned citizens, students, faith-based organizations, feminists and other nongovernmental groups are doing courageous and compassionate work to end this trade in human degradation.

The United States government is proud to stand with them at the forefront of this international anti-trafficking campaign. We provided more than $96 million in foreign aid last year to help other countries strengthen their anti-trafficking efforts. We're helping them develop legislation to combat abuse, create special law enforcement units to investigate trafficking cases and rescue victims, build emergency shelters, and develop long-term rehabilitation and vocational training programs.

We trust that this year's report will raise international awareness of the crime of trafficking and spur governments across the globe to take determined actions against it. All states must work together to close down trafficking routes, prosecute and convict traffickers, and protect and reintegrate victims into society.

The responsibility does not rest only with developing countries whose citizens are vulnerable to trafficking because of poverty or corruption, or lack of education. Destination, or "demand" countries, like the United States and other prosperous nations whose citizens create the marketplace for trafficking, also bear a heavy responsibility.

As President Bush has said, nearly two centuries after the abolition of the transatlantic slave trade and more than a century after slavery was officially ended in its last strongholds, the trade in human beings for any purpose must not be allowed to thrive in our times. We must all work to end this terrible tragedy.

Now, my senior advisor on trafficking in persons, Ambassador John Miller, will give a brief presentation on the report, and he will answer your questions. John?

Q May we ask you a question, Madam Secretary?

SEC. RICE: Ambassador Miller is going to do the report, and he'll answer your questions.

MR. MILLER: Thank you, Madam Secretary.

As Secretary of State Rice eloquently explained, human trafficking, or trafficking in persons, is synonymous with slavery.

Now, this is a time when we roll out this report with facts, with figures, with categories. But this report is, more than anything, about human beings. And so I want to start by telling you about Svetlana -- an all too typical victim of human trafficking.

Last year, Svetlana was a young woman living in Belarus looking for a job. She came upon some Turkish men who promised her a well-paying job in Istanbul, and once Svetlana crossed the border, the men seized her money, her papers, her passport; they locked her up. They forced her into prostitution, and then one night, they farmed her out to two businessmen just like a commodity. Desperate, Svetlana jumped out of a window and fell six stories to a sidewalk. According to Turkish court documents, the so-called customers went down, found her on the sidewalk and instead of calling the police, called the traffickers who killed her. Svetlana's body lay unclaimed in the morgue for two weeks until Turkish authorities learned her identity and sent her body to Belarus.

There is a bright spot in this too common tragedy. Belarusian and Turkish authorities cooperated this year to arrest and charge those responsible for Svetlana's death, which I think brings out that bad things are happening, but also how there is -- there are counterattacks going on.

Svetlana and other victims' stories are interspersed throughout the introduction to this year's report -- I think you've all got copies of it -- and they're there so that we may always remember what this struggle is about.

Trafficking in persons relies on coercion and exploitation. It thrives on converting hope to fear. It is maintained through violence. And it is highly profitable. In that sense, while there are differences, there are also similarities to the slavery of earlier centuries.

The U.S. government is committed to taking action in cooperation with other nations to end modern-day slavery, and that is the ultimate purpose of this annual Trafficking In Persons Report, which we're releasing today for the fifth year. This is a tool, along with the assessment of the United States, which comes out later this month, one of many tools to help free the slaves and throw traffickers in jail. Trafficking is not simply a crime against human rights, it amounts to a public health menace and a rich source of financing for organized crime. It's a dangerous and perverse mutation of otherwise beneficial global exchange.

We believe that modern-day slavery plagues every, every country, including the United States. This report covers 150 countries found to be a source, destination or transit country for on the order of 100 victims, the threshold for inclusion in the report. If you find a country is not listed, it probably means we have insufficient knowledge of slavery in that country, or else the government in the country cannot exercise sufficient control to be evaluated.

Our sources of information are diverse: law enforcement, U.S. embassies, NGOs, daring activities, foreign governments, our own visits. Everything enters the mix. Extensive analysis and debate goes into the assessment of each country, and assignment into Tier 1, Tier 2, Tier 2 Watch List, or Tier 3.

We didn't design this system, Congress designed the system with important help from nongovernmental organizations and faith-based communities.

I'm happy to note that the Tier 2 Warning Watch List, introduced last year, has been very effective; 31 of the 46 countries on the 2004 TIP Report's Tier 2 Watch List improved their ratings this year. The increased scrutiny of these countries' anti-trafficking efforts required of us by Congress has led to the State Department's greater engagement with these governments. More important, it has led to greater efforts by the governments themselves.

For the third year, Tier 3 countries can be sanctioned if they don't take significant anti-slavery action in the next few months. I'm encouraged to note several countries that were on Tier 3 last June stepped up anti-slavery activities so that they have been raised. In South America, Guyana's president pushed through the country's first anti-trafficking law, and led a countrywide awareness campaign on the dangers of trafficking.

In South Asia, Bangladesh set up a long-promised special anti- trafficking police unit, which started new investigations while rescuing an increased number of victims.

When we look at slavery worldwide, we believe sex slavery is the largest category of transnational slavery. It is intrinsically linked to prostitution, and we find that where prostitution is encouraged, the number of victims increases. That is why to combat sex slavery, we are urging a greater focus on demand, educating and dissuading the so-called customers.

But while sex slavery is large, we are concerned with all forms of slavery. This year, trafficking for labor exploitation, particularly involuntary servitude of foreign laborers, received greater attention. This greater emphasis came as a result of better data obtained from source countries and nongovernmental organizations. Four countries are placed on Tier 3 for their failure primarily to make significant efforts to combat forced labor trafficking: Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates.

The forced labor may involve foreign workers who end up in conditions of involuntary servitude or child camel jockeys, who live in slave- like conditions and are forced to race in extremely dangerous environments.

Burma, North Korea, Sudan and Cuba remain on Tier 3 largely because they still fail to address forced labor in their countries. Another government, Cambodia, is on Tier 3 because of government complicity in trafficking in persons, another important criteria for Tier 3 in the law.

The report covers efforts from March 2004 to March 2005. Some governments have taken steps against slavery since the report was drafted, which is great. Ecuador was placed on Tier 3 again this year for its lack of significant efforts during the reporting period. Two days ago, Ecuador's congress passed criminal code changes that could lead to positive progress in fighting slavery.

The country ratings here, the government ratings are based strictly on government actions to combat trafficking persons, as defined by U.S. law. The standards are set up by the Trafficking Victim Protection Act and are applied equally to every country. We examine each country individually.

The goal of the report is not to punish but to stimulate government action to end modern-day slavery. We hope all Tier 3 countries will move off Tier 3 within the 90-day grace period by taking concrete steps to combat trafficking in persons. We're prepared to work with them to help achieve this.

At the same time, nowhere on Earth is it allowable to systematically abuse children for sport or to stand up while household help is trapped and exploited, with no recourse to help, or to look the other way while sex traffickers seize young women.

I'd like to address one misperception that has developed around this Trafficking in Persons Report. The Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 require tier ratings to emphasize government efforts against human trafficking, especially in terms of prosecution, protection and prevention, rather than just the extent of the slavery problem.

Under the law, countries that have substantial anti-trafficking in persons efforts under way justify higher ratings, even if they have a large trafficking in persons problem.

Now, stepping back and looking around the world, the picture is not all bleak. Shining through this global tragedy are many rays of hope. In addition to the tremendous efforts of heroic individuals and private organizations, governments around the globe are awakening to this issue and taking action to end this form of modern-day slavery.

Worldwide, this past year, the number of trafficking-related convictions has increased to over 3,000. And new anti-human trafficking legislation was improved -- approved in 39 countries. That's a big change from five or 10 years ago.

We're seeing progress on many fronts. In this year's report, several countries on Tier 1 showed anti-trafficking in person leadership through strong policies and implementation of laws. South Korea launched a brave initiative to close down outlets for commercial sexual exploitation and trafficking, arresting over 500 people and rescuing over 1,000 victims.

Sweden continued its path-breaking program to prosecute exploiters and clients of prostitution, while identifying and protecting women in commercial sexual exploitation. Sweden has funded anti-trafficking information campaigns throughout Europe, focusing on curbing demand for trafficking victims.

Morocco has led efforts to hold accountable U.N. peacekeepers guilty of sexual abuse of minors in areas of U.N. deployment.

The report, on pages 33 and 38, identifies international best practices and anti-slavery heroes throughout the world. And those sections could've been much longer, believe me. The best practices are wide and varied and all are commendable, but let me highlight a few.

The Indian NGO Shakti Vahini produces an informative Indian Trafficking in Persons Report that rates anti-slavery efforts in Indian states. Jun 03, 2005 13:14 ET .EOF

The Malawian nongovernment organization, People Serving Girls at Risk, works to identify and help underage girls in prostitution through undercover outreach.

And the Fahmina Institute of Indonesia engages Islamic boarding schools to spread anti-trafficking awareness.

The anti-slavery heroes cited in the report, a few out of thousands, range from Ansar Burney, the Pakistani human rights activist who has sought to help Asian and African children who have been trafficked to the Arabian Gulf countries for exploitation as camel jockeys; to Somaly Mam and Pierre Legros of the French NGO AFEISP, who braved personal threats from traffickers to rescue victims of sex slavery in Southeast Asia.

The U.S. is deeply committed to fulfilling its responsibilities in the fight against trafficking in persons. And that's why we contributed in excess of $80 million abroad for all kinds of anti- trafficking programs last year.

In January, President George W. Bush said, "No one is fit to be a master, and no one deserves to be a slave." And because of the stain of slavery on our own history, these words have special meaning to us and they guide our efforts against trafficking in persons, based on our strong belief in freedom and human dignity. As the secretary has stated, modern slavery has been met and is being met with a growing, powerful response, a 21st century abolitionist movement. We must all do our part.

Thank you. And let's turn to questions. Oh my gosh! Okay, yes, go ahead. Yeah.

Q Andrea Mitchell from NBC. Can you tell us, regarding Saudi Arabia, Qatar, Kuwait, the UAE, whether you believe that it would require sanctions to get some action, particularly in Saudi Arabia, they have moved backwards not forward since last year's report. And you've got four countries that are major allies of the United States in the war on terror and in military operations that are chief abusers in this trafficking. Jun 03, 2005 14:04 ET .EOF

MR. MILLER: Well, I won't disagree with your characterization of the situation. It is serious, for example, in Saudi Arabia. We have domestic workers being brought in from many countries into domestic servitude, child beggars, a lot of beatings, reports of beatings, and rape -- very difficult to get shelter, no convictions.

But your -- the first part of your question was, is this going to lead to sanctions? My answer is, I hope not, because the purpose of the law is not to sanction; it is to get progress in freeing the victims and throwing the traffickers in jail.

Q They've moved backwards in the last year. It will require sanctions.

MR. MILLER: Wait a minute. That's -- if they stay in Tier 3, it will require sanctions. However, the reason why I hope this will not take place is, under the law, there are now three months for any government in Tier 3 to take significant steps against trafficking. And we're prepared to work with these governments, including the governments you mentioned.

Our hope is there will be enough progress in freeing the victims and throwing the traffickers in jail that at the end of 120 days, there will not have to be sanctions. But there is that possibility.

Yes?

Q May I follow up on that?

MR. MILLER: Yeah.

Q This law has been in effect for five years.

MR. MILLER: Yeah.

Q Could you say how many countries and which ones have been sanctioned until now?

MR. MILLER: Yeah. There have been several countries sanctioned. But the interesting thing is that countries that are willing to work on this issue in the past -- we've had civil relationships with -- have avoided sanctions by taking action in the three months or four months after the report.

For example, two years ago, we placed Turkey and Greece, two NATO allies, on Tier 3.

But in the four months over the summer, the arrests, the prosecutions, the setting up of referral systems to get victims to nongovernmental organizations, the setting up of shelters; there was significant progress made, which we were delighted with. So the purpose here is not to result in sanctions, although that may happen, it is to get progress.

Yes. Go ahead.

Q Yes, Ambassador, under which capacity the United States is preparing those type of reports interfering in the internal affairs of sovereign countries?

MR. MILLER: I'm sorry. Could you just repeat that question again?

Q Under which capacity --

MR. MILLER: Yeah.

Q -- the United States of America --

MR. MILLER: Yeah.

Q -- is preparing those type of reports interfering in the internal affairs of sovereign countries?

MR. MILLER: Okay.

Well, that's is not the first time I've heard that question. The answer -- that is -- that reminds me of a question that was asked William Wilberforce on the floor of the English Parliament back in the 1790s when he discovered -- realized the extent of slavery and started his campaign to end the slave trade. And the question that was asked of him by another parliamentarian was, "Will the Right Honorable Gentleman tell me what right we have to impose British moral values on the world?" Wilberforce, who was alone in Parliament when he started this action, cited universal and religious values to show that people nowhere wanted slavery.

Today, we have -- the case is much stronger because unlike in Wilberforce's time, no government in the world that I'm aware of officially endorses slavery, and there are numerous international covenants, U.N. covenants that nations of the world have subscribed to that are -- ban slavery.

So I would say, in this effort that we're participating in, we are trying both at home and abroad to work with other countries in trying to end a slavery that citizens around the world and ostensibly governments around the world all agree is a scourge that should be ended.

Let's take somebody in the back. Yeah, go ahead.

Q Advocacy organizations around the world are saying that poverty and lack of job opportunities is one of the causes of women or families being vulnerable to slavery. To what extent is the United States prepared to relieve debt to World Bank or IMF loans and other forms --

MR. MILLER: Yeah.

Q -- to substantially improve the quality of life and services in nations around the world vulnerable --

MR. MILLER: Sure. Well, as ambassador at large on international slavery, I'm not the U.S. expert or authority on international debt. But I want to comment on your -- the premise of your question. You identify poverty as a major cause of slavery and slave trade, and I would agree it is a major cause.

There are a lot of studies that have been done in the last couple of years -- I won't cite them all -- that show, however, that it is one of several major causes. Poverty is a push factor. There is the pull factor of the attraction of the better life in the wealthier country. There is the factor of gender attitudes. Believe me, when you look at sex slavery and parts of domestic servitude slavery, gender attitudes play a big role.

There is the role of organized crime and greed. I mean, this is a big source of revenue for organized crime. I mean, now they -- we talk about the arms trade, the drug trade and the people trade being sources of revenue for organized crime.

So all of these causes, we hope, will be addressed. But in the meantime -- in the meantime -- we are seeking, through our office, to do what we can to work with other countries to get better law enforcement, get better protection for victims and get prevention and education campaigns.

Yes.

Q What about the efforts in the United States to identify victims and to give them the T-4 visa program, to what extent are those successful and why or not?

MR. MILLER: Yeah.

Q How many victims have been identified to date?

MR. MILLER: Yeah.

Q And what are the problems in identifying victims?

MR. MILLER: Yeah. That's a very good question. Did everybody hear it? Should I be repeating the questions?

Q No, that's fine.

MR. MILLER: You can hear? Okay.

Your question about identifying victims in the United States -- you put your finger on a problem that is -- confronts the United States and almost every country in the world, the gap between what are estimated to be the number of victims and the actual number of victims getting help. Just two weeks ago, President Bush's task force on Trafficking in Persons, consisting of Cabinet officers, chaired by Secretary of State Rice, discussed this issue. And the Health and Human Services Secretary Leavitt specifically brought up as an area where we need to do more, exactly that.

What has been done? And the gap is such -- to give you an idea of the gap -- I believe the figure now is about roughly 700 people have been helped with temporary visas in the United States. So they cooperate in prosecutions, get assistance and all that. Yet, we know the figure -- we suspect, we don't scientifically know since victims don't stand in line to be -- raise their hands to be counted, but we suspect that the figure for the number of victims annually crossing into the United States across our borders every year is in excess of 14,500. So there's a gap.

Presently, Health and Human Services has pilot programs in 10 -- I believe it's soon to be 20 -- cities, trying to reach out to the foreign migrant communities to help victims come forward.

We are starting to consider another additional approach, a work sector approach. And Health and Human Services has done some work on this. But this approach would involve mobilizing -- involving doctors, hospitals, lawyers, travel industry personnel, in this effort to try to help victims come forward. So you're right in identifying one of the big challenges.

Yeah, back? Yeah?

Q Can I follow up on this question, sir?

MR. MILLER: Well --

Q It's on this particular issue.

MR. MILLER: Okay.

Q Could you speak about what the U.S. is doing to just not only identify victims, but to combat demand, as the secretary said? You just said nowhere on earth is acceptable.

MR. MILLER: Right.

Q So what is the U.S. doing? And is your -- you just mentioned that you were the ambassador of international slavery. Is this a new title, or are you just kind of encapsulating what it is that --

MR. MILLER: Well, it's -- I guess it's sort of new. Congress and the president raised the position to ambassadorial status -- well, I was confirmed by the Senate nine months ago. And the previous year, I guess the end of 2003, legislation was passed raising this position to ambassadorial status. In addition, at the direction of the president, I chair -- under that presidential task force I referred to, I chair a Senior Policy Operating Group of domestic and foreign U.S. agencies trying to coordinate policies.

Now let's get to the first part of your question -- demand and what's being done in the United States.

I think if you look at the United States and around the world, you'll see there are a lot of demand education programs directed at potential victims. However, what you don't see yet are a lot of programs directed at the demand for the victims. That is starting to change in the United States.

I'll give you a good example. There is an organization, SAGE, in San Francisco, with U.S. taxpayer support, that first convinced the San Francisco law enforcement authorities to arrest not just the women engaged in prostitution who might be trafficking victims, but arrest the traffickers, the pimps, the brothel owners and the so-called customers.

And then that organization convinced the authorities that a fine should be imposed on the first offense so there would be a school, which has the name "John School," that these men would have to go to. I visited there a couple of weeks ago. And this school now has been going for some time; appears to have very good results; 2 percent recidivism rate. This program has now spread in different forms to 15 or 20 U.S. cities. I think it's going to spread further. And we are discussing with different countries around the world how this could be replicated in those countries to address demand. We're -- for example, we're in discussions with the Korean Ministry of Gender and Equality on that issue.

Yes, in the back. Go ahead.

Q Thank you. You say that the Brazil government is making progress, but is not fully complying. Could say what needs to be done?

MR. MILLER: Sure.

Brazil -- Brazil -- I believe if I'm not mistaken -- is listed in Tier 2, which is the upper category of the report. I visited Brazil last fall. One of the positive things going on in Brazil, Brazil has started setting up in different provinces anti-trafficking-in-persons efforts. I think one of the problems that Brazil faces is that while there has been government interest -- the president of Brazil has spoken out very strongly on this issue -- but if you look at the actual finished product in law enforcement, three convictions last year coming out of scores and scores of investigations and hundreds and hundreds of victims. So I think in that area, they can do more. They can do more in terms of their awareness campaigns and their protection efforts for victims, but I would say law enforcement would be the major area.

I am -- I hope I'm calling -- yes, go ahead.

Q You mentioned Canada as a transit countries for some of the sex trade --

MR. MILLER: Yeah.

Q And although Canada's in Tier 1, how would you rate Canada in terms of this problem and what do you think Canada should do to improve the situation?

MR. MILLER: Okay. Well, you're talking about Canada as a transit country. And Canada has done some very aggressive things the last year. We have a specific transit problem we have to address with Canada, and I think it's referred to in the report -- I hope it's referred to. And the challenge that we face is that there are migrants from the Far East that come into Canada -- for example, Korea -- they don't need a visa, and then they just come across the U.S. border. And there's a lot of evidence that there's hundreds of such victims involved. We're going to have to -- we're working on this with Canada and Korea. We're going to see what we can do to try to address this problem. That's an example.

I'm sorry, there are so many -- yes -- there are so many people. Go ahead.

STAFF: Ambassador, I'm afraid we're going to have make this limited to a couple of more people. Why don't you take that one, and then I know Teri also wanted to get in. And then we'll call it a --

MR. MILLER: Oh, Teri --

(Cross talk.)

MR. MILLER: No, no, no, no. Okay, yes. Okay, I'll take two.

Go ahead. Go ahead.

Q Ambassador Miller, my name is Wen Haw (sp), Radio Free Asia. You didn't mention anything about Vietnam.

MR. MILLER: Yeah.

Q However, the problem is there. You know, like they were -- Vietnam last year was on Tier 2 Watch List.

MR. MILLER: Watch List. Yes.

Q This year Tier 2, not on the Watch List anymore.

MR. MILLER: Yeah.

Q My question is, what is the methodology you used to -- in order to classify Vietnam to Tier 2 Watch list --

MR. MILLER: Well, we thought they --

Q Yeah. Did you send a fact-finding team to Vietnam?

MR. MILLER: We have had had -- yeah. Vietnam made some significant progress in the last year. For example, we were very critical of Vietnam before in exporting Vietnamese labor and cooperating with what we thought were slave-owners in other countries, including one operation in American Samoa. But they have stepped in and are giving much better supervision and control. Their number of convictions has increased. So there's been some progress in Vietnam.

Teri?

Q Thank you.

Q (Off mike.)

MR. MILLER: No, I've got to -- no. I ignored her last --

Q He forgot me last year! (Laughs.)

MR. MILLER: Last year I didn't call on her. I've got --

STAFF: We'll make her the last one.

Q Okay, thank you. Ambassador -- (off mike) -- a couple of things. You didn't actually tell us who has been sanctioned, when you talked about sanctions. And I wanted to go back to the question of these very close allies -- Kuwait, UAE, Saudi Arabia -- and could you -- you've been to these countries, you've had discussions with these leaders about these issues --

MR. MILLER: Yeah.

Q -- and many of them have laws in place, not to mention authoritarian regimes that should be able to enforce these laws, one would think.

Could you help us understand why they aren't doing more, especially being such close allies with the U.S. in counter-terrorism, for example? And we really do want to know who has been saying something.

MR. MILLER: I'm glad you've -- the toughest question comes last.

Q (Off mike) -- you called on her.

MR. MILLER: (Chuckles.) Well, in terms of countries that have been sanctioned if you look at the countries in -- nobody's been sanctioned this year. If you look at the countries from last year's report -- and I, we can -- I can't recall them from memory, but you can -- our staff can get them to you. But the top part of your question was, well, here are close friends of the United States. How can this happen? Two years ago it was asked about Greece and Turkey; how can allies be on Tier 3?

I believe that this is a function, to a large extent, of information and public awareness. That is, public awareness increases in these countries; you see more action. For example -- just for example -- in Saudi Arabia, a recent case involving an Indonesian young woman, tortured, beaten, dumped at a hospital -- domestic servitude case -- has gotten publicity. Human rights lawyer in Saudi Arabia has protested there, and I don't know how it's all going to come out. But there -- apparently in the last month there was an arrest made.

As public awareness increases -- and sometimes, when countries don't have free flows of information, that's hard -- but as public awareness increases, I don't think people want slavery today. And this is where one of the signs of progress has been the exponential increase of news media attention to this issue, the last couple of years.

Since I'm at the end here, I want to tell you. When you write on this, when you write on this -- I know you're journalists and all that, but when you write on this issue, you indirectly help. You indirectly help free victims and throw traffickers in jail, because it increases public awareness. People become more aware all over the world. They become more aware in the United States. They start talking to their local police. They start talking to their public officials. Good things happen, when -- so.

But last comment: I am -- so I have a meeting coming up with foreign ambassadors and then NGOs.

I know there are a lot of people that didn't get to ask questions. If --

STAFF: They're going to come up, sir. We have a 10-minute -- (off mike) --

MR. MILLER: Oh, I've got 10 more -- okay. And -- but we've also got people on our staff -- Eleanor Kennelly, Caroline Tetschner -- that even if I have to move out after five or 10 minutes, can answer questions.

So thank you all for coming. Appreciate it.

Q Thank you, Mr. -- (off mike). (Applause.)

LOAD-DATE: June 4, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: International News

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

106 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Fox News Network

June 3, 2005 Friday

SHOW: THE O'REILLY FACTOR 8:48 PM EST

Countries Criticized for Human Trafficking

BYLINE: Bill O'Reilly

GUESTS: Gary Haugen

SECTION: NEWS; Domestic

LENGTH: 831 words

O'REILLY: In the "Back of the Book" segment tonight, the selling of human beings into slavery. It still goes on.

The State Department announced today that 14 new countries are out of control when it comes to human trafficking for sex and other reasons. Among them, Bolivia, Cambodia, Jamaica, Kuwait, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Togo and the United Arab Emirates. Also on the list, Burma, Cuba, Ecuador, North Korea, Sudan and Venezuela.

Joining us now from L.A. is Gary Haugen, the president of International Justice Mission, an author of the book "Terrify No More." I'm sorry about my throat here, Mr. Haugen. It's one of those things that I have to deal with a couple of times a year.

Now, the Arab -- the Arab countries, I mean, these countries have a lot of money with the oil coming in. Kuwait is supposed to be our friend. Saudi Arabia, the Emirates supposed to be our friend. What's going on over there?

GARY HAUGEN, INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE MISSION: Well, this is a good report, because it's telling the truth about modern day slavery and about sex trafficking around the world.

And I think it's an important report, because it also motivates these countries to start to do more to really rescue the victims and bring the perpetrators to justice.

And I think it's also a bold report, because it's really put the names of some of our Arab allies that have serious problems with trafficking, with human trafficking, and it's named them and it's put them on that tier three which...

O'REILLY: But what do they -- what did they do? I know what they do in Cambodia. We're looking at your Cambodian video. We discussed that last time you were here. This is the sex trade into prostitution, brothels. You rescue these people.

But what do they do in the Arab countries? What's the industry there?

HAUGEN: Well, sex trafficking is a problem. The sexual exploitation of women and girls into commercial establishments of sexual exploitation. They also have...

O'REILLY: In Muslim countries, where you get your head cut off for doing that?

HAUGEN: Sure. Sure.

O'REILLY: I thought it was that they brought in people from India, Sri Lanka, and they made them slaves, domestic slaves. I thought there was a lot of that going on.

HAUGEN: They do that, as well. And that's a significant part of this report is that it draws the attention not only to sex slavery but to forced labor, modern day slavery.

O'REILLY: Right. The people come over -- they come over to Saudi Arabia to be domestics, and all of a sudden, they tie them up and sell them to somebody out in the middle of the desert.

Now Jamaica, we had a segment at the top of the program where a New Jersey couple's daughter, professional travel writer, disappeared. What's going on in Jamaica?

HAUGEN: Well, Jamaica is one of those countries, too, that is failing to meet minimum standards in dealing with forced labor and sex trafficking. And then not only that, but they are also not making significant efforts to address the problem.

So Jamaica, all these countries, is failing from a law enforcement point of view to handle the problem.

O'REILLY: OK. So one of the problems, and you saw this in Cambodia, is that the cops are involved with the human trafficking, correct?

HAUGEN: Absolutely right. In fact, this only flourishes in certain places around the world where law enforcement tolerates it. Because if the customers can find these victims by the millions, then the police can, whenever they want. So the only way people get away with this is by bringing people into the business.

In fact, last week, we were able to bust a police officer in one of these Southeast Asia countries who was just openly selling minors in a bar. And so it only takes place because the police are part of the problem.

These governments now need to be serious about drawing their own law enforcement employees to account for what they do. And in fact, with -- one issue about this report is I think it needs to begin to produce more concrete data of just precisely how many prosecutions or disciplinary actions these countries have carried out. Because the reports say corruption's a problem, but it doesn't tell you what they're doing about it.

O'REILLY: Thirty seconds. Is the United States the world leader in trying to stop human trafficking?

HAUGEN: At International Justice Mission, we've been really grateful for the leadership that the United States has put forward in this.

O'REILLY: Good. I'm happy to hear that.

HAUGEN: And some of these countries actually changed because the United States takes a strong position.

O'REILLY: Yes, we threaten them with sanctions. That's what the State Department's doing. But we -- our image has been so battered with the torture and all that, I'm happy to hear a guy like you, a no spin guy, say that we are taking the lead in this problem.

HAUGEN: Glad to.

O'REILLY: Mr. Haugen, thanks very much, appreciate it. And keep up the good work, sir.

Up next, we will wrap things up with "The Most Ridiculous Item of the Day" and some of your mail.

LOAD-DATE: June 4, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

TRANSCRIPT: 060306cb.256

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Show

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

107 of 359 DOCUMENTS

IRNA

June 3, 2005 Friday 9:45 PM EST

Pakistan-Human-Government

BYLINE: Iran News AgencyLENGTH: 88 wordsDATELINE: Tehran, June 03

Pakistan removed from US watch list on human trade - minister Islamabad, June 3, IRNA Pakistan-US The United States government has removed Pakistan from its watch list of human trafficking, an official said.

Pakistan's Interior Minister Aftab Ahmed Sherpao told a news conference here Thursday that US Ambassador Ryan Crocker delivered the annual Trafficking in Person Report to him.

The US not only removed Pakistan from the watch list but also commended the government on its efforts to combat human trafficking, he added.

LOAD-DATE: June 4, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: NewswireJOURNAL-CODE: IRNA

Copyright 2005 U.P.I.
All Rights Reserved
ARABIA 2000

Copyright 2005 by Iran News Agency. Distributed By UPI.

108 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

June 3, 2005 FridayU.S. upgrades Japan's efforts to fight human trafficking*SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 151 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 3

The United States upgraded its assessment of Japanese efforts to fight human trafficking Friday, designated Japan as a Tier 2 country of improving records and removing it from a special watch list of countries on the verge of falling into the worst category.

'The government of Japan does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so,' the U.S. State Department said in its annual Trafficking in Persons Report.

Japan has made an 'impressive start' in providing assistance to trafficking victims, such as implementing a national action plan with 'modest, additional resources' for state-run and private shelters, the department said.

Japan has also made 'substantial' efforts to improve the legal framework by drafting Penal Code revisions to criminalize trafficking and increase penalties, it said.

LOAD-DATE: June 4, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 Kyodo News Service

109 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

June 3, 2005 Friday

U.S. upgrades Japan's efforts to combat human trafficking

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 693 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 3

The United States on Friday upgraded its assessment of Japan's efforts to combat human trafficking, removing Japan from a special watch list of countries on the verge of falling into the worst category, but maintained that Tokyo still needs to make more improvements.

China was downgraded to the Tier 2 Special Watch List, while North Korea remained among the worst countries in combating human trafficking in Tier 3, the State Department said in its fifth annual Trafficking in Persons Report covering a total of 150 countries.

The intensified efforts by the Japanese government follow the country's embarrassing placement on the special watch list last year due to regulatory issues, including lax entertainment visa regulations exploited by criminal organizations to traffic women, particularly Filipino women.

This year, Japan was upgraded to Tier 2 for the government's 'significant efforts.' Countries in this category are those who fail to comply fully with the minimum standards to fight human trafficking but are making strides to do so.

The Japanese government 'has made an impressive start in providing assistance to trafficking victims,' the State Department said.

Japan has implemented a national action plan, increased assistance to state-run and private shelters and bolstered law enforcement efforts, including drafting Penal Code revisions to criminalize trafficking and increase penalties, the report said.

'The foundations that the government of Japan has laid in the past few months offer promise of results that would place Japan in a leadership role in fighting trafficking,' the report said.

But it cautioned that Japan 'has yet to make a significant effort to lessen the domestic demand for trafficking victims.'

China was downgraded from Tier 2 to the special watch list 'due to its failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking,' the report said, particularly protection for victims such as foreign women and Chinese women from Taiwan.

The report also highlighted China's harsh deportation of North Koreans, including trafficking victims, back to North Korea, where they reportedly face punishment including 'forced labor prison camps where torture and public executions are commonplace.'

North Korea remained in Tier 3 alongside 14 other countries including Sudan, Myanmar and Cambodia.

The report said North Korea is 'a source country for men and women trafficked for the purposes of forced labor and sexual exploitation,' most often to China.

'Thousands of North Korean men, women and children are forced to work and often perish under conditions of slavery inside the country,' it said.

The North Korean government made 'no effort to protect trafficking victims during the reporting period; reporting instead indicated that the government punished victims,' the State Department said, noting Pyongyang 'does not recognize trafficking as a problem.'

Overall around the world last year, between 600,000 and 800,000 people were trafficked, 80 percent of the victims were women and 50 percent were children, the report said.

'We trust that this year's report will raise international awareness of the crime of trafficking and spur governments across the globe to take determined actions against it,' Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told a news conference following the report's release. 'All states must work together to close down trafficking routes, prosecute and convict traffickers, and protect and reintegrate victims into society,' she said.

The report classifies countries into three tiers with the additional Tier 2 Special Watch List.

Thirty-one of the 46 countries placed on last year's watch list improved their ratings.

Tier 3 countries are those that do no attempt to comply with the act's minimal standards and could be subject to sanctions if efforts are not stepped up within the 90-day grace period following the report's release.

The State Department compiles the report based upon information provided by nongovernmental organizations, embassies, foreign governments, law enforcement and others.

LOAD-DATE: June 4, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 Kyodo News Service

110 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Saudi Press Agency

June 3, 2005 Friday 3:50 PM ESTU.S. removes Pakistan from its watch list*BYLINE: Saudi Press AgencyLENGTH: 143 wordsDATELINE: Riyadh, June 03

The United States has removed Pakistan from its watch list on human trafficking, a Cabinet minister said Friday..

Interior Minister Aftab Khan Sherpao said he had been briefed by U.S. ambassador Ryan C.

Crocker on Thursday and that the news will be officially announced by the State Department in its annual Trafficking in Persons Report this week..

The department recommends sanctions against countries that fail to combat human trafficking..

Pakistan was included on the list in 2002, but authorities have in recent months taken several steps to crack down on trafficking, according to a report of The Associated Press..

In 2002, Pakistan made human smuggling an offense punishable by up to 10 years in prison, or a fine, and in January, announced it would establish special courts to expedite trials of those suspected of smuggling..

LOAD-DATE: June 4, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: NewswireJOURNAL-CODE: SPA

Copyright 2005 U.P.I.

All Rights Reserved

ARABIA 2000

Copyright 2005 by Saudi Press Agency. Distributed By UPI.

111 of 359 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 3, 2005 FridayRELEASE OF FIFTH ANNUAL TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT*BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 4792 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. Department of State:

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Thank you, Madame Secretary. As Secretary of State Rice eloquently explained, human trafficking or trafficking in persons is synonymous with slavery. Now, this is a time when we roll out this report with facts, with figures, with categories, but this report is, more than anything, about human beings. And so I want to start by telling you about Svetlana, an all too typical victim of human trafficking. Last year, Svetlana was a young woman living in Belarus, looking for a job. She came upon some Turkish men who promised her a well-paying job in Istanbul and once Svetlana crossed the border, the men seized her money, her papers, her passport. They locked her up. They forced her into prostitution. And then one night, they farmed her out to two businessmen, just like a commodity. Desperate, Svetlana jumped out of a window and fell six stories to a sidewalk. According to Turkish court documents, the so-called customers went down, found her on the sidewalk and instead of calling the police, called the traffickers, who killed her. Svetlana's body lay unclaimed in the morgue for two weeks until Turkish authorities learned her identity and sent her body to Belarus. There is a bright spot in this too common tragedy. Belarusian and Turkish authorities cooperated this year to arrest and charge those responsible for Svetlana's death, which I think brings out that bad things are happening, but also how there are counterattacks going on. Svetlana and other victims' stories are interspersed throughout the introduction to this year's report. I think you've all got copies of it. And they're there so that we may always remember what this struggle is about. Trafficking in persons relies on coercion and exploitation. It thrives on converting hope to fear. It is maintained through violence and it is highly profitable. In that sense, while there are differences, there are also similarities to the slavery of earlier centuries. U.S. Government is committed to taking action in cooperation with other nations to end modern-day slavery and that is the ultimate purpose of this annual Trafficking in Persons Report, which we're releasing today for the fifth year. This is a tool, along with the assessment of the United States, which comes out later this month -- one of many tools to help free the slaves and throw traffickers in jail. Trafficking is not simply a crime against human rights. It amounts to a public health menace and a rich source of financing for organized crime. It's a dangerous and perverse mutation of otherwise beneficial global exchange. We believe that modern day slavery plagues every, every country, including the United States. This report covers 150 countries found to be a source destination or transit country, for on the order of 100 victims, the threshold for inclusion in the report. If you find a country is not listed, it probably means we have insufficient knowledge of slavery in that country or else the government in the country cannot exercise sufficient control to be evaluated. Our sources of information are diverse: law enforcement, U.S. embassies, NGOs, daring activists, foreign governments, our own visits. Everything enters the mix, extensive analysis and debate goes into the assessment of each country and assignment into Tier 1, Tier 2, Tier 2 watch list, or Tier 3. We didn't design the system. Congress designed the system with important help from nongovernmental organization and faith-based communities. I'm happy to note that the Tier 2 warning watch list, introduced last year, has been very effective. 31 of the 46 countries on the 2004 TIP reports, Tier 2 watch list improve their ratings this year. The increased scrutiny of these countries' anti-trafficking efforts required of us by Congress has led to the State Department's greater engagement with these governments. More important, it has led to greater efforts by the governments themselves. For the third year, Tier 3 countries can be sanctioned if they don't take significant anti-slavery action in the next few months. I'm encouraged to note several countries that were on Tier 3 last June stepped up anti-slavery activities so that they have been raised. In South America, Guyana's president pushed through the country's first anti-trafficking law and led a countrywide awareness campaign on the dangers of trafficking. In South Asia, Bangladesh set up a long-promised special anti-trafficking police unit, which started new investigations while rescuing an increased number of victims. When we look at slavery worldwide, we believe sex slavery is the largest category of transnational slavery. It is intrinsically linked to prostitution and we find that where prostitution is encouraged, the number of victims increases. That is why to combat sex slavery, we are urging a greater focus on demand, educating and dissuading the so-called customers. But while sex slavery is large, we are concerned with all forms of slavery. This year, trafficking through labor exploitation, particularly in voluntary servitude of foreign laborers, received greater attention. This greater emphasis came as a result of better data obtained from source countries and nongovernmental organizations. Four countries are placed on Tier 3 for their failure primarily to make significant efforts to combat forced labor trafficking: Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates. The forced labor may involve foreign workers who end up in conditions of involuntary servitude or child camel jockeys who live in slave-like conditions and are forced to race in extremely dangerous environments. Burma and North Korea, Sudan and Cuba remain on Tier 3, largely because they still fail to address forced labor in their countries. Another government, Cambodia, is on Tier 3 because of government complicity in trafficking in persons -- another important criteria for Tier 3 and the law. The report covers efforts from March 2004 to March 2005. Some governments have taken steps against slavery since the report was drafted. This is great. Ecuador was placed on Tier 3 again this year for its lack of significant efforts during the reporting period. Two days ago, Ecuador's congress passed criminal code changes that could lead to positive progress in fighting slavery. The country ratings here, the government ratings are based strictly on government actions to combat trafficking in persons as defined by U.S. law. The standards are set up for the Trafficking Victim Protection Act and are applied equally to every country. We examine each country individually. The goal of the report is not to punish but to stimulate government action to end modern day slavery. We hope all Tier 3 countries will move off Tier 3 within the 90-day grace period by taking concrete steps to combat trafficking in persons. We are prepared to work with them to help achieve this. At the same time, nowhere on earth is it allowable to systematically abuse children for sport or to stand up while household help is trapped and exploited with no recourse to help or to look the other way while sex traffickers seize young women. I'd like to address one misperception that is developed around this Trafficking in Persons Report. The Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 requires Tier ratings to emphasize government efforts against human trafficking, especially in terms of prosecution, protection and prevention, rather than just the extent of the slavery problem. Under the law, countries that have substantial anti-trafficking in person efforts underway justify higher ratings, even if they have a large trafficking in person problem. Now, stepping back and looking around the world, the picture is not all bleak. Shining through this global tragedy are many rays of hope. In addition to the tremendous efforts of heroic individuals and private organizations, governments around the globe are awakening to this issue and taking action to end this form of modern day slavery. Worldwide, this past year, the number of trafficking related convictions has increased over 3,000. And new anti-human trafficking legislation was approved in 39 countries. That's a big change from five or ten years ago. We're seeing progress on many fronts. In this year's report, several countries on Tier 1 showed anti-trafficking in person leadership through strong policies and implementation of laws. South Korea launched a brave initiative to close down outlets for commercial sexual exploitation and trafficking, arresting over 500 people and rescuing over 1,000 victims. Sweden continued its path-breaking program to prosecute exploiters and clients of prostitution while identifying and protecting women in commercial sexual exploitation. Sweden has funded anti-trafficking information campaigns throughout Europe, focusing on curbing demand for trafficking victims. Morocco has led efforts to hold accountable UN peacekeepers guilty of sexual abuse of minors in areas of UN deployment. The report on pages 33 and 38 identifies international best practices and anti-slavery heroes throughout the world. And those sections could have been much longer, believe me. The best practices are wide and varied and all are commendable, but let me highlight a few. The Indian NGO Shakti Vahini produces an informative Indian Trafficking in Persons Report that rates anti-slavery efforts in Indian states. The Malawian nongovernmental organization People Serving Girls at Risk works to identify and help underage girls in prostitution through undercover outreach. And the Fahmina Institute of Indonesia engages Islamic boarding schools to spread anti-trafficking awareness. The anti-slavery heroes cited in the report, a few out of thousands, range from Ansar Burney the Pakistani human rights activist who has sought to help Asian and African children who have been trafficked to the Arabian Gulf countries for exploitation, as camel jockeys. To Somaly Mam and Pierre Legros of the French NGO AFESIP who braved personal threats from traffickers to rescue victims of sex slavery in Southeast Asia. The U.S. is deeply committed to fulfilling its responsibilities in the fight against trafficking in persons. And that's why we contributed an excess of $80 million abroad for all kinds of anti-trafficking programs last year. In January, President George W. Bush said, "no one is fit to be a master and no one deserves to be a slave." And because of the stain of slavery, on our own history, these words have special meaning to us and they guide our efforts against trafficking in persons, based on our strong belief in freedom and human dignity. As the Secretary has stated, modern slavery has been met and is being met with a growing powerful response -- a 21st century abolitionist movement. We must all do our part. Thank you and let's turn to questions. Oh, my gosh. Okay, yes. Go ahead. Yeah.

QUESTION: Andrea Mitchell from NBC. Can you tell us regarding Saudi Arabia, Qatar, Kuwait, the UAE, whether

you believe that it was the prior sanctions to get some action? In particular in Saudi Arabia, they have moved backwards, not forward since last year's report. And you've got four countries that are major allies of the United States in the war on terror and in military operations that are chief abusers in this practice. AMBASSADOR MILLER: Well, I won't disagree with your characterization of the situation. It is serious, for example, in Saudi Arabia we have domestic workers being brought in from many countries into domestic servitude -- child beggars, a lot of beatings, reports of beatings and rape, very difficult to get shelter, no convictions. But you're -- the first part of your question was: Is this going to lead to sanctions? My answer is I hope not because the purpose of the law is not to sanction, it is to get progress in freeing the victims and throwing the traffickers in jail. QUESTION: They've moved backwards in the last year. AMBASSADOR MILLER: Wait a minute -- that's QUESTION: Will it require sanctions? AMBASSADOR MILLER: If they stay in Tier 3, it will require sanctions. However, the reason why I hope this will not take place is under the law, there are now three months for any government in Tier 3 to take significant steps against trafficking and we're prepared to work with these governments, including the governments you mentioned. Our hope is there will be enough progress in freeing the victims and throwing the traffickers in jail that at the end of 120 days, there will not have to be sanctions, but there is that possibility. Yes. QUESTION: Can I follow-up on that? AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah. QUESTION: This law has been in effect for five years? AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah. QUESTION: Could you say how many countries and which ones have been sanctioned until now? AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah. There have been several countries sanctioned. But the interesting thing is that countries that are willing to work on this issue in the past, we've had several relationships with, have avoided sanctions by taking action in the three months or four months after the report. For example, two years ago, we placed Turkey and Greece, two NATO allies, on Tier 3. But in the four months over the summer, the arrests, the prosecutions, the setting up of referral systems to get victims to nongovernmental organizations, the setting up of shelters, there was significant progress made, which we were delighted with. So the purpose here is not to result in sanctions, although that may happen, it is to get progress. Yes. Go ahead. QUESTION: Under which capacity, the United States is preparing in those type of reports, interfering in the internal affairs of sovereign countries? AMBASSADOR MILLER: I'm sorry. Could you just repeat the question again? QUESTION: Yes. Under which capacity, the United States of America is preparing, those type of reports interfering in the internal affairs of sovereign countries? AMBASSADOR MILLER: Okay. Well, this is not the first time I've heard that question. The answer -- that is that reminds me of a question that was asked William Wilberforce. On the floor of the English Parliament, back in the 1790s when he discovered, realized the extent of slavery and started his campaign to end the slave trade, and the question that was asked of him by another parliamentarian was: Will the right honorable gentleman tell me what rights we have to impose British moral values on the world? Wilberforce, who was alone in Parliament when he started this action, cited universal and religious values, to show that people nowhere wanted slavery. Today, we have -- the case is much stronger because unlike in Wilberforce's time, no government in the world, that I'm aware of, officially endorses slavery and there are numerous international covenants, UN covenants, that nations of the world have subscribed to that are -- banned slavery. So I would say in this effort that we're participating in, we are trying both at home and abroad to work with other countries in trying to end a slavery, that citizens around the world and ostensibly, governments around the world, all agree is a scourge that should be ended. Let's take somebody in the back. Yeah, go ahead. QUESTION: Advocacy organizations around the world are saying that poverty and lack of job opportunities is one of the causes of women or families being vulnerable to slavery. To what extent is the United States prepared to relieve debt to World Bank or IMF loans and other forms to substantially improve the quality of life and services in nations around the world vulnerable? AMBASSADOR MILLER: Sure. Well, as Ambassador-at-large on international slavery, I'm not the U.S. expert or authority on international debt, but I want to comment on the premise of your question. You identified poverty as a major cause of slavery and slave trade and I would agree it is a major cause. There are a lot of studies that have been done in the last couple of years -- I won't cite them all -- that show, however, that it is one of several major causes. Poverty is a push factor. There is the pull factor of the attraction of the better life in the wealthier country. There is the factor of gender attitudes. Believe me, when you look at sex slavery and parts of domestic servitude slavery, gender attitudes play a big role. There is the role of organized crime and greed. I mean, this is a big source of revenue for organized crime. I mean, now they -- we talked about the arms trade, the drug trade, and the people trade being sources of revenue for organized crime. So all of these causes we hope will be addressed, but in the meantime -- in the meantime -- we are seeking, through our office, to do what we can to work with other countries to get better law enforcement, get better protection for victims, and get prevention and education campaigns. Yes. QUESTION: To what extent are the efforts in the United States to identify victims and to give them the T-4 visa programs they -- to what extent are those efforts successful and why are not -- AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah. QUESTION: How many victims have been identified to date? AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah. QUESTION: And what are the problems in identifying victims? AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah. That's a very good question. Did everybody hear -- should I be repeating the questions or -- QUESTION: No, that's fine. We don't mind. AMBASSADOR MIL-LER: You can hear, okay. Your question about identifying victims in the United States, you put your finger on a problem that is -- confronts the United States and almost every country in the world. The gap between what are estimated to be the number of victims and the actual number of victims getting help -- just two weeks ago, President Bush's task force on trafficking in persons consisting of cabinet officers chaired by Secretary of State Rice discussed this issue and the Health and Human Services Secretary Leavitt specifically brought up, as an area where we need to do more, exactly that. What has been done? And the gap is such -- to give you an idea of the gap, I believe the figure now is about roughly 700 people have been helped with temporary visas in the United States. They cooperate in prosecutions, get assistance and all that, yet we know the figure -- we suspect -- we don't scientifically know, since victims don't stand in line to be -- raise their hands to be counted, but we suspect that the figure for the number of victims annually crossing into the United States across our borders every year is in excess of 14 and a half thousand. So there's a gap. Presently, Health and Human Services has pilot programs in ten -- I believe it's soon to be 20 cities -- trying to reach out to the foreign migrant communities to help victims come forward. We are starting to consider another additional approach, a work sector approach, and Health and Human Services has done some work on this, but this approach would involve mobilizing or involving doctors, hospitals, lawyers, travel industry personnel in this effort to try to help victims come forward. So you're right in identifying one of the big challenges. Yes, back? QUESTION: Can I follow up on this question, sir? AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah. Well, just -- QUESTION: It's on this particular area. AMBASSADOR MILLER: Okay. QUESTION: Can you speak about what the U.S. is doing to just not only identify victims, but to combat demand, as the Secretary said? You just said that nowhere on earth -- AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah. QUESTION: Is it acceptable, so -- AMBASSADOR MILLER: Right. QUESTION: -- what is the U.S. doing? And it's your -- you just mentioned that you were the Ambassador of international slavery. Is this a new title or are you just kind of encapsulating what it is that the -- AMBASSADOR MILLER: Well, it's -- I guess it's sort of new. It's -- Congress and the President raised the position to ambassadorial status -- well, I was confirmed by the Senate nine months ago and in the previous year, I guess the end of 2003, legislation was passed raising this position to ambassadorial status. In addition, I -- at the direction of the President, I chair a -- under that Presidential task force I referred to, I chair a senior policy operating group of domestic and foreign U.S. agencies trying to coordinate policies. Now, let's get to the first part of your question: demand and what's being done in the United States. I think if you look at the United States and around the world, you'll see there are a lot of demand education programs directed at potential victims. However, what you don't see yet are a lot of programs directed at the demand for the victims. That is starting to change in the United States. I'll give you a good example. There is an organization, SAGE in San Francisco, with U.S. taxpayers' support, that first convinced the San Francisco law enforcement authorities to arrest not just the women engaged in prostitution, who might be trafficking victims, but arrest the traffickers, the pimps, the brothel owners, and the so-called customers. And then that organization convinced the authorities that a fine should be imposed on the first offense so there would be a school, which has the name, John School, that these men would have to go to. I visited there a couple of weeks ago and this school now has been going for some time, appears to have very good results, two percent recidivism rate. This program has now spread in different forms to 15 or 20 U.S. cities. I think it's going to spread further and we are discussing with different countries around the world how this could be replicated in those countries to address demand. For example, we're in discussions with the Korean Ministry of Gender and Equality on that issue. Yes, in the back. Go ahead. QUESTION: Are you saying that the Brazil Government is making progress, but is not fully complying? Could you say what needs to be done? AMBASSADOR MILLER: Sure. Brazil, I believe, if I'm not mistaken, is listed in Tier 2, which is the upper category of the report. I visited Brazil last fall. One of the positive things going on in Brazil: Brazil has started setting up, in different provinces, anti-trafficking in persons efforts. I think one of the problems that Brazil faces is that while there has been tremendous government interest, the President of Brazil has spoken out very strongly on this issue, but if you look at the actual finished product in law enforcement, three convictions last year, coming out of scores and scores of investigations and hundreds and hundreds of victims -- so, I think in that area, they can do more. They can do more in terms of their awareness campaigns and their protection efforts for victims, but I would say law enforcement would be the major area. I hope I'm calling -- yes, go ahead. QUESTION: You mentioned Canada as a transit country. AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yes. QUESTION: With some of these sex trade workers. AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah. QUESTION: And although Canada is in Tier 1, how would you rate Canada in terms of this problem and what do you think Canada should do to improve the situation? AMBASSADOR MILLER: Okay. Well, you're talking about Canada as a transit country and Canada has done some very aggressive things the last year. We have a specific transit problem we have to address with Canada and I think it's referred to in the report. I hope it's referred to. And the challenge that we face is that there are migrants from the Far East that come into Canada -- for example, Korea, they don't need a visa and then they just come across the U.S. border and we -- there's a lot of evidence that there's hundreds of such victims involved. We're going to have to -- we're working on this with Canada and Korea. We're going to see what we can do to try to address this problem. That's an example. I'm sorry, there's so -- yes? There's so many people. Go ahead. MR. CASEY: Mr. Ambassador I'm afraid we're going to have to make this limited to a couple more people. So why don't you take that one and then I know Teri wanted to get in -- AMBASSADOR MILLER: Okay. Oh, Teri -- no, no, no, no. Okay, yes. Okay, I'll take two. Go ahead. QUESTION: Yeah. Ambassador Miller, my name is Wen Ha (ph), Radio Free Asia. AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah. QUESTION: I didn't hear -- you didn't mention anything about Vietnam. AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah. QUESTION: However, the problem is there. You know, like there -- now, Vietnam last year was on Tier 2 watch list. AMBASSADOR MILLER: Watch list, yes. QUESTION: On the Tier 2 -- AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah. QUESTION: It's not on the watch list anymore. AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah. QUESTION: My question is, what is the method that you used to -- in order to classify Vietnam to Tier 2 watch list? AMBASSADOR MILLER: To -- well, we thought they -- QUESTION: Did you find -- yeah, did you send a fact-finding team to Vietnam? AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah, yeah. We have had -- Vietnam made some significant progress in the last year. For example, we were very critical of Vietnam before on exporting Vietnamese labor and cooperating with what we thought were slave owners in other countries, including one operation in American Samoa. But they have stepped in and are giving much better supervision and control. Their number of convictions has increased, so there's been some progress in Vietnam. Teri, Teri? No, I've got to -- no, Teri -- I ignored her last year. QUESTION: He ignored me last year. AMBASSADOR MILLER: I didn't call on her. I got to -- okay. QUESTION: Okay, thank you. Ambassador Miller, a couple of things. You didn't actually tell us who has been sanctioned when you talked about sanctions and I wanted to go back to the question of these very close allies: Kuwait, UAE, Saudi Arabia. And could you -- you've been to these countries and you've had discussions with these leaders about these issues -- AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah. QUESTION: -- and many of them have laws in place, not to mention authoritarian regimes that should be able to enforce these laws, one would think. Could you help us understand why they aren't doing more, especially being such close allies of the U.S. in counterterrorism, for example? And we really do want to know who's been sanctioned. AMBASSADOR MILLER: I'm glad you've -- the toughest question comes last. Well, in terms of countries that have been sanctioned, if you look at the countries in -- nobody has been sanctioned this year. If you look at the countries from last year's report, and we can -- I can't recall them from memory, but you can -- our staff can get them to you, but your -- the tough part of your question was -- well, here are close friends of the United States; how can this happen? Two years ago, I was asked about Greece and Turkey; how can allies be on Tier 3? I believe that this is a function, to a large extent, of information and public awareness, that as public awareness increases in these countries, you see more action. For example, just for example, in Saudi Arabia, a recent case involving an Indonesian young woman tortured, beaten, dumped at a hospital -- domestic servitude case has gotten publicity. A human rights lawyer in Saudi Arabia has protested there and I don't know how it's all going to come out, but they're -- apparently in the last month, there was an arrest made. As public awareness increases -- and sometimes when countries don't have free flows of information, that's hard -- but as public awareness increases, I don't think people want slavery today and this is where one of the signs of progress has been the exponential increase of news media attention to this issue the last couple of years. Since I'm at the end here, I want to tell you, when you write on this -- when you write on this, I know you're journalists and all that -- but when you write on this issue, you indirectly help free victims and throw traffickers in jail because it increases public awareness. People become more aware all over the world. They become more aware in the United States. They start talking to their local police. They start talking to their public officials. Good things happen when -- so -- but the last comment, I am -- so, I have a meeting coming up with foreign ambassadors and then NGOs. I know there are a lot of people that didn't get to ask questions. If -- QUESTION: You're going to come up, sir. We have about 10 minutes to (inaudible) -- AMBASSADOR MILLER: Oh, I've got 10 more minutes, okay. And -- but we've also got people on our staff: Eleanor Kennelly, Caroline Tetschner that even if I have to move out after five or ten minutes can answer questions. So thank you all for coming. I appreciate it.

LOAD-DATE: June 9, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

112 of 359 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 3, 2005 Friday

TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT FOCUSES ON LABOR EXPLOITATION

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 1063 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the State Department:

Citing both the positive actions and failures of governments around the world to take the necessary steps to end modern-day slavery, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice presented to the public the fifth annual Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP) at the U.S. Department of State June 3.

Rice expressed the hope that the comprehensive, worldwide report "will raise international awareness of the crime of trafficking and spur governments across the globe to take determined actions against it."

Introducing the findings, the secretary noted that "up to 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders every year and millions more are trafficked internally." Four out of five of those trafficked are women and one in two is a minor, she said.

The data, she said, illustrate that the majority of transnational victims are trafficked into commercial sexual exploitation, but there is also an alarming enslavement of people for purposes of labor exploitation, a form of slavery given special attention in this year's report.

The responsibility for trafficking does not rest only with developing countries, whose citizens are vulnerable to trafficking because of poverty or corruption or lack of education, Rice pointed out, but "destination or demand countries like the United States and other prosperous nations, whose citizens create the marketplace for trafficking, also bear a heavy responsibility."

There is a modern-day abolitionist movement of "concerned citizens, students, faith-based organizations, feminists and other non-governmental groups ' doing courageous and compassionate work to end this trade in human degradation," Rice said. "The United States government is proud to stand with them at the forefront of this international anti-trafficking campaign."

The United States provided more than $96 million in foreign aid during 2004 to help other countries strengthen their anti-trafficking efforts, Rice noted, and is now helping them to develop legislation to combat abuse. The aid assists in creating special law enforcement units to investigate trafficking cases and rescue victims, build emergency shelters and develop long-term rehabilitation and vocational training programs," she said.

The report records the efforts of 150 nations between March 2004 and March 2005 to deal with the issue, explained Ambassador John Miller, the senior adviser on trafficking in persons in the State Department. "Shining through this global tragedy are many rays of hope. In addition to tremendous efforts of heroic individuals and private organizations, governments around the globe are awakening to this issue and taking action to end this form of modern-day slavery.

"Worldwide this past year the number of trafficking-related convictions has increased over 3,000. And new anti-human trafficking legislation was approved in 39 countries. That's a big change from four or five years ago," he said.

The report's methodology includes a three-tier system for rating countries' effectiveness in combating trafficking: 'cents Tier 1 includes those countries that have met international standards for coping with trafficking and are vigorously addressing the problem.

'cents Tier 2 comprises countries that are demonstrating commitment to address their problems but have not yet achieved international standards; the Tier 2 "Watch List" consists of countries that might be vulnerable to an erosion of their efforts.

'cents Tier 3, the least favorable rating, lists countries whose governments fail to meet minimal international standards and are not making significant efforts to do so.

While some governments have taken steps against slavery since the report was drafted, Miller said, others have failed to move forward: "Ecuador was placed on Tier III [the lowest] again this year for its lack of significant efforts during the reporting period. Two days ago, Ecuador's congress passed criminal code changes that could lead to positive progress in fighting slavery."

In an overview of this year's report, Miller noted that sex slavery is the largest category of transnational slavery, which translates to an increased number of sex victims in countries where prostitution is allowed or encouraged. Hence there has been "a greater focus on demand, educating and dissuading the so-called customers," he said.

But the United States is concerned with all forms of slavery, Miller insisted, so "this year trafficking through labor exploitation, particularly involuntary servitude of foreign laborers, received greater attention. This greater emphasis came as a result of better data obtained from source countries and non-governmental organizations."

Four countries -- Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates -- remain on Tier III, primarily for failing to make significant efforts to combat forced labor trafficking, he said. "The forced labor may involve foreign workers who end up in conditions of involuntary servitude, or child camel jockeys who live in slavelike conditions and are forced to race in extremely dangerous environments," he added.

"Burma, North Korea, Sudan and Cuba remain on Tier III, largely because they still fail to address forced labor in their countries. Another government, Cambodia, is on Tier III because of government complicity in trafficking in persons."

On the positive side, Miller said: "The Tier II Warning Watch List introduced last year has been very effective. Thirty-one of the 46 countries on the 2004 TIP reports Tier II Watch List improved their ratings this year."

Several countries that were on Tier III on the 2004 report have acted to be raised to the next tier, Miller stated: "Guyana's president pushed through the country's first anti-trafficking law and led a countrywide awareness campaign on the dangers of trafficking, [and] Bangladesh set up a long-promised anti-trafficking police unit, which started new investigations while rescuing an increased number of victims."

Miller also explained: "Country ratings are based strictly on government actions to combat trafficking of persons as defined by U.S. law. The standards are set up by the Trafficking Victim Protection Act and are applied equally to every country."

The full text of the report is available on the State Department's Web site.

LOAD-DATE: June 9, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

113 of 359 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 3, 2005 FridaySTATE DEPARTMENT BRIEFING, JUNE 3*BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 5596 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the State Department:

[U.S. Department of State] Daily Press Briefing Index

Friday, June 3, 2005 2:10 p.m. EDT

Briefer: Sean McCormack, Spokesman

DEPARTMENT -- Sec. Rice: Farewell to Richard Boucher, former Spokesman; Introduction of Sean McCormack, Spokesman/ Richard Boucher: Thank You -- Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP)/ Ambassador Dobriansky meeting with Ambassadors/ Sanctions/ Tier 3 allies/ Ambassador Miller -- Sec. Rice Attendance at Organization of American States (OAS) Summit in Ft. Lauderdale/ Aid to Fragile Democracies/ Inter-American Democratic Charter

SRI LANKA -- Sec. Rice Meeting with Foreign Minister Lakshman Kadirgamar/ Tsunami Reconstruction/ Violence

INDONESIA -- Warden Message/ Specific Threat/ Travel Warning/ Security Measures at Embassy/ Hotels

LEBANON -- Killing of Journalist Samir Kassir/ Investigation/ Sec. Meetings with Zebari and Makabi

SYRIA -- SCUD Missile Test/ Weapons of Mass Destruction/ Out of Step with Region

SAUDI ARABIA -- Response to TIP report/ Possibility of Sanctions -- Record on International Religious Freedom / Country of Particular Concern Designation

NORTH KOREA -- Six Party Talks/ Food Aid

SUDAN -- Dep. Sec. Zoellick's Trip/ Kartoum/ Darfur/ African Union Mission/ Security

G-8 -- Prime Minister Tony Blair Meeting with President Bush/ G8 Summit/ AIDS/ Poverty

IRAQ -- Ambassador to Iraq/ Ambassador Khalilzad / Embassy of Baghdad/ Security/ US Support of Iraqi People and Government / Iraqi Process

BOLIVIA -- OAS Summit/ Assistance

ARUBA -- Missing American Natalee Hardaway /FBI Assistance

GREECE/CYPRUS -- State of Relations / Cyprus

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE DAILY PRESS BRIEFING

FRIDAY, JUNE 3, 2005 (ON THE RECORD UNLESS OTHERWISE NOTED)

2:15 p.m. EDT

MR. MCCORMACK: Under any circumstance, the Secretary of State is a hard act to follow and, well, for that matter, so is Richard Boucher. So why don't I just jump right into questions. I don't have anything to start with.

Mr. Gedda.

QUESTION: I have no questions. I just want to say congratulations on your confirmation and your swearing-in and I hope you have a long --

QUESTION: Please speak up, George.

QUESTION: I wanted to congratulate Sean at the outset on his confirmation and his swearing-in and I'm sure we'll have a long and productive and sometimes contentious time together.

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, I very much look forward to working with you and all of your colleagues in the State Department press corps. You serve an important function in our form of government and our way of life and I think it's an example for the entire world, you know, the Spokesman of the State Department standing up here and taking questions from a free and responsible press and trying to provide the best, most timely information that we can. So I look forward to working with you over the coming period.

QUESTION: Ah, flattery.

MR. MCCORMACK: Will it get me everywhere?

QUESTION: I have a question. I realize we've already had a briefing on the trafficking report.

MR. MCCORMACK: Mm-hmm.

QUESTION: Have you -- has the government, the U.S. Government, gotten any reaction from any of the countries that were put in Tier 3 for the first time, notably the Saudis, the Kuwaitis, the UAE, Qatar? Are they dismayed about this? Have they given any strong signals that they're going to try to act fast to do something about it?

MR. MCCORMACK: I'll try to get for you any information that we might have on specific reactions, but in general, I would note that Undersecretary Paula Dobriansky is this afternoon -- I don't know if she's already met with them or not -- meeting with about a hundred ambassadors here in Washington to talk about the Trafficking in Persons Report. And included in that number are a number of Tier 3 countries and I would note that we have already had some consultations with some of the countries that appear in Tier 3. Our ambassadors went in and talked to the foreign ministries about the report. I would note that -- I think Ambassador Miller talked about this, that one country -- I believe Bolivia -- has already acted on some of the issues raised by the report.

So if there's anything further with respect to -- on those four, I'll let you know.

QUESTION: Thank you.

QUESTION: Sean?

MR. MCCORMACK: Yeah.

QUESTION: Regarding those four, how serious is the threat of sanction? Does the administration believe that that is a real weapon that can be used? Is it the threat of sanctions that you hope, because of the reputational impact, would have some effect on their behavior? And particularly with the Saudis, since they have gotten worse, not better.

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, if --

QUESTION: Worse through this whole process.

MR. MCCORMACK: Right. As you know, and you heard in your briefing today, sanctions, you know, that is one possibility here. But the overall intent of the lives, it's -- this is meant to foster a dialogue and discussion about this issue. There's a 90-day period in which we will have a dialogue with the countries that are on Tier 3 and the hope is that we can address some of the issues raised by the report and that, as a result of that dialogue, that you actually take effective action in response to some of the issues that are raised by the report.

I mentioned to Arshad one of the countries, Bolivia, has already taken some steps and I think that that is a model for the kind of cooperative dialogue on these kinds of issues that is envisioned not only by the law, but by, you know, our application of the law.

QUESTION: May I follow up?

MR. MCCORMACK: Sure.

QUESTION: How do you weigh the balance of benefits and risks with four countries, in this case, that are key allies in the war on terror and key components of our military operation in that region?

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, in any relationship, in any sort of deep, involved relationship like we have with a number of these different countries, including Saudi Arabia and including Qatar, as you mentioned -- they are allies in the war on terror, as well as others that are in the report -- oftentimes you have to bring up difficult issues. And as the President has talked about before, as the Secretary has talked about before, we're not going to hesitate to bring up these issues with those countries. It's important that -- the President believes it's important that we speak out clearly on these issues. This is an important moral issue of our time.

I think Ambassador Miller talked about how this trafficking in persons was the modern-day equivalent of slavery, and both the Secretary and the President are committed to abolishing this. Part of that effort is to speak clearly about the problem in an objective manner using the criteria laid out by the law. The second part to that is to work with these countries to try to address, in a real way, some of these issues and to end the practices that are cited in the report.

Why don't we move back here.

QUESTION: Sean, congratulations and welcome aboard.

MR. MCCORMACK: Thank you very much.

QUESTION: I have a question. On Tuesday, there was a meeting between the Council of Arab Ambassadors in Washington with the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern Affairs Mr. Welch, in which they say the Deputy Ambassador was included. Is that an indication that maybe we're heading towards a lowering of diplomatic relations with Syria?

MR. MCCORMACK: I'm not up on that meeting. Let me look into it. And if there's anything that we have to add, we'll get back to you.

QUESTION: Thanks.

MR. MCCORMACK: Okay. Saul.

QUESTION: (Inaudible) the Secretary's with the Sri Lankan Foreign Minister this morning. Can you do a readout from that for us, please?

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, if you put it that way. (Laughter.)

Secretary Rice and Sri Lankan Foreign Minister Kadirgamar had a good meeting today. They met this morning up in the Secretary's office. It was the Foreign Minister and just a couple of his aides and the Secretary and a couple of her aides. They talked about bilateral issues of mutual interest, including tsunami reconstruction assistance and the need for arrangements to assure its equitable distribution. The Secretary recognized and applauded Sri Lanka's commitment to democracy.

QUESTION: How about issues of the general war on terrorism, given that they've got their own problems with the Tamils? Is that something that Rice reiterated that she would be giving support to, to the mediating process done by Norway?

MR. MCCORMACK: I don't believe that came up in the meeting, but let me check for you.

QUESTION: But on the -- you said equitable distribution for the tsunami aid. Do you have a reason to believe that it is being inequitably distributed, the tsunami aid in Sri Lanka?

MR. MCCORMACK: No, we don't. As a matter of fact, the Secretary and the Foreign Minister had a good talk about this. They talked about how we have moved from the immediate relief phase into, really, the reconstruction phase and how the importance of working with all the various groups in establishing the mechanisms with the NGOs and the governments and other foreign governments that are involved in the reconstruction process, and make sure that it's a coordinated process. And I think both of them were comfortable with the progress thus far in making sure that those reconstruction funds are spent in an equitable manner.

QUESTION: Great. So you don't have concerns, for example, that the Tamil population is getting less than its due?

MR. MCCORMACK: I'm not aware of any concerns along those lines.

In the back, Teri.

QUESTION: Change of subject?

MR. MCCORMACK: Sure.

QUESTION: Can you talk about concerns in Indonesia, the Warden Message put out today, and the fact that the missions are remaining open despite the threat to hotels?

MR. MCCORMACK: As you noted, we did issue a Warden Message in Indonesia. This was in response to a credible and specific information that talked about hotels specifically, so we thought this was and is an appropriate step to issue this message. And because it was -- the information was specific, we decided that it was most appropriate to issue a Warden Message as opposed to making any changes to the Travel Warning at this time.

QUESTION: The Warden Message said that the plans were as of June 1st. Does the fact that you only put the Warden Message out on June 3rd indicate that the threat remains at at least a constant level?

MR. MCCORMACK: I believe that the Warden Message is still operative and I'll check to see if there's any action that we would take to notify people that the actual threat had ended. I don't know the --

QUESTION: Yeah, it's unusual just that they would say that two days ago there was this threat and we're notifying you today.

MR. CASEY: Effective as of June 1, meaning ongoing.

QUESTION: (Inaudible.)

MR. MCCORMACK: Sure, let's move around. Peter.

QUESTION: Can we stay on this?

MR. MCCORMACK: Oh, okay.

QUESTION: I don't mean to nitpick, but if you're saying the reason for only doing a Warden Message, not a Travel Warning, is that it was very specific to hotels, wouldn't a Warden Message just go to Americans whom you have contacts with who you know are already in the country and the Travel Warning would be for the people who would be visiting and wanting to go to hotels and therefore might be victims to the targeted hotels?

MR. MCCORMACK: The Embassy, working with the Consular Affairs people back here in Washington, felt, based on the information that they have and which I can't go into any more than I have, this was the most appropriate step to take. Peter. Any other on this subject?

QUESTION: Syria.

QUESTION: Just one more. Despite the fact that it seemed very specific, have there been any measures taken by Indonesian local security forces to shore up U.S. missions?

MR. MCCORMACK: In these cases, typically, the embassy does work with the local officials but I'm not aware of any specific measures that they may have taken.

Peter.

QUESTION: Syria. The killing of the journalist the other day. Do you have any more information on it indicating who might be behind it? And is the United States, as it did in the killing of Hariri, going to be asking for an international or an independent investigation?

MR. MCCORMACK: The Secretary did address this yesterday in her remarks with Minister Zebari and I don't have -- I really don't have at this point anything to add to those remarks. I don't have any further information on the question of who.

She noted the fact that it would appear that these were efforts by individuals who were attempting to intimidate the population at a time when they're holding elections. At this point, I think that, again, I would reiterate what the Secretary said, and she urged Prime Minister Mikati to follow through in a real way on his pledge to investigate and ultimately hold accountable those responsible for this, for this act.

QUESTION: Is there a point that you might be seeking in independent or outside investigation or you're holding that in abeyance or is that a possibility?

MR. BOUCHER: I think at this point, I would just stick with what the Secretary said.

QUESTION: Also on Syria. Welcome, Sean.

MR. MCCORMACK: Thank you very much.

QUESTION: Do you know if there's been any contact between the Department and Syria either on the killing of Samir Kassir or about the scud missile test by Syria last week? Scott confirmed that the U.S. knew about the test, but has there been any dialogue on that? And then I have a question on a separate subject.

MR. MCCORMACK: Okay. Thanks for the warning. On both of those questions, in terms of contact with the Syrian Government, I'm not aware of any.

On the Syrian missile test, as Scott indicated, we have information that indicates that it did occur. And I would just add that it's one more example of Syria being out of step with what's going on in the rest of the region. You have Lebanon on one side, Iraq on the other, and the populations of those countries are focused on trying to build the institutions -- political, economic, security -- that form the foundation for a more free, prosperous country as well as region. So it's just one more example of the fact that they're out of step with what else is going on in the region.

QUESTION: One more on this, okay?

MR. MCCORMACK: Sure.

QUESTION: Do you know anything about whether these missiles or any of the technology related to the missiles were supplied by North Korea?

MR. MCCORMACK: I don't have any information I could share with you on that.

QUESTION: One last follow-up on (inaudible) in principle Syria is a sovereign country, should it not test missiles of any kind as long as it's not illegal?

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, again, we have long talked about our concerns of Syria's efforts to develop and acquire weapons of mass destruction as well as the means of delivering them. That's -- you know, that's not a new message. I just think that this type of step is, when you look at the rest of what's going on in the region and the efforts that people are taking to try to develop a more peaceful, a more stable, more harmonious region, it's just a discordant note and that's the reason why I wanted to point that out to you.

Tammy.

QUESTION: New topic?

MR. MCCORMACK: Mm-hmm. Anybody else on Syria?

QUESTION: Can you take a question on whether there's been any contacts today between -- seems a lot going on in the U.S.-Syria front. Like, if anybody spoke to anybody?

MR. MCCORMACK: Sure, sure.

QUESTION: And Sean, when you said you had indications that the test went ahead, do you have indications that the missile actually went into Turkish territory?

MR. MCCORMACK: That -- I don't have anything for you on that.

Tammy.

QUESTION: On Saudi Arabia, last September, the U.S. designated Saudi Arabia a Country of Particular Concern about religious freedom. Has there been any decision taken so far to impose sanctions on Saudi Arabia? And I think I'm going to follow up.

MR. MCCORMACK: Oh, I'll raise your follow-up with, "I'll have to get back to you on that." (Laughter.)

I'll have to check on that. I don't have any information on that.

QUESTION: Well, my follow-up may not -- well, if I could.

MR. MCCORMACK: Okay, sure.

QUESTION: Given that at least we haven't heard of any action taken, how realistic should the threat of sanctions be seen by a country such as Saudi Arabia, given that nothing appears to have happened since last September? I'm sorry, sanctions regarding trafficking in persons

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, again, that is in the law. That's part of the law as a possibility. But the law -- the spirit of the law -- also is to emphasize a consultative process. That's why you have this 90-day period. And I expect that -- we already have had contact with the Saudis on this when we delivered a copy of the report to them and discussed the chapter dealing with them. And I expect that we would have follow-up conversations on the subject as well.

So, again, the emphasis is on a dialogue and trying to solve the problem, as well as on measure -- we're not trying to single anybody out. These are objective criteria applied evenly across states, so -- and we use the criteria that are in the law.

QUESTION: May I just follow on that quickly?

MR. MCCORMACK: Sure.

QUESTION: Did the President and the Secretary raise this in Crawford at the most recent meetings?

MR. MCCORMACK: That was before my time, but I'll check for you.

QUESTION: You'll check that?

MR. MCCORMACK: Yeah, sure.

QUESTION: A follow-up?

MR. MCCORMACK: George.

QUESTION: Could you take a question on the status of the religious freedom decision, the deadline for which was in March?

MR. MCCORMACK: I will.

Charlie.

QUESTION: Sean, I believe yesterday there was a report out of Israel that the Israelis plan to build more housing at Maale Adumim. Do you know about that? Have you talked to the Israelis about it? And if it's true, how does it comport with the President's recent discussions with Prime Minister Sharon?

MR. MCCORMACK: I did see some reporting in the news concerning some plans to take down Palestinian houses. Is that what you're referring to?

QUESTION: I think this was more building, just more houses at Maale Adumim. This was --

MR. MCCORMACK: That I haven't seen. I haven't seen those reports, so -- the President was very clear last week when he met with Prime Minister Abbas. He was asked about these types of questions and I'd just refer you back to his remarks.

QUESTION: The North Koreans said this morning that they were pleased to see that President Bush had used the honorific Mister, referring to Kim Jong Il.

MR. MCCORMACK: Right.

QUESTION: And they didn't call him a bloodthirsty beast.

MR. MCCORMACK: Right.

QUESTION: I wonder, is the administration trying to lower the temperature here a year after their departure from the six-party talks? And how, if at all, do you plan to mark the anniversary of that one-year departure?

MR. MCCORMACK: I wouldn't necessarily read anything into the President's remarks besides, you know, exactly what he said. I think he said exactly what he wanted to.

In terms of the anniversary, I'm not aware of any particular plans other than to, once again, urge the North Koreans to do -- once again, to do what we've said: return back to the six-party talks to engage with the other five parties in a constructive manner to work towards the goal of a denuclearized Korean Peninsula.

QUESTION: Have you heard anything back via the New York channel or have you had any contacts at all via the New York channel since the last ones?

MR. MCCORMACK: No, no. Any other on that?

QUESTION: North Korea.

MR. MCCORMACK: Yeah.

QUESTION: You didn't read anything into the bloodthirsty beast comments?

MR. MCCORMACK: We've seen these kind of statements out of the North Koreans before.

QUESTION: Continuing on that subject, apparently Secretary Rumsfeld said on his flight to Singapore that the U.S. is reviewing policy toward North Korea. Can you expound on this at all?

MR. MCCORMACK: Let me take a look at his remarks first. I haven't seen -- I haven't had a chance to look at his remarks.

QUESTION: Okay. And even if you dismiss the North Korean -- I mean, the kind of rhetorical nastiness that we've heard before, every time this happens does it concern you that we really aren't getting anywhere in terms of having a dialogue at least publicly?

MR. MCCORMACK: You know, this is rather -- we're looking for actions, so I wouldn't necessarily read anything into it.

Yes, sir.

QUESTION: Within the last number of weeks, there have been massive protests here in Washington as well as protests of the Sudanese Embassy, and Deputy Secretary Zoellick has just been to Sudan. What progress has he made with the Khartoum central government? And also do you have any plans to work with the logistics groups putting together this Live Aid concert -- Live Eight Concert -- for debt and relief from poverty in Africa?

MR. MCCORMACK: On the second part of your question, I don't have anything.

QUESTION: It's days prior to the G-8 Summit.

MR. MCCORMACK: Right. I'm not aware of any plans in that regard. Deputy Secretary Zoellick is actually right now in Khartoum. I think he's scheduled to have some meetings there shortly, if not already. He flew into Sudan today. He visited a refugee camp in Darfur. He also met with tribal officials. He met with AU officials there as well. And I think I would just say that he's working the issue. He is working on the security aspects of Darfur, working and talking to the AU mission on the ground.

And one of the reports that he got back from the head of the AU mission in the area that he was visiting with responsibilities for security was that in areas where the AU was deployed, they actually had seen a reduction in violence. And he also had an opportunity to meet with Jan Prank while he was on the ground in Darfur. And both of them had a good discussion and one of the things that came out of it was, I think, both of them were pleased with the increased flow of food to that part of the -- to Darfur.

So it's a complex, difficult issue. I think the fact that this is Deputy Secretary Zoellick's second trip there, Secretary Powell has visited there, the President has spoken out about it, the Secretary has spoken out about it, is an indication of our commitment to try to resolve the tough issues that you see there in Darfur -- in Sudan and Darfur.

Yes. Same topic? Okay.

QUESTION: Yes. Is there any likely change to the -- in the way Deputy Zoellick will conduct those talks in light of what the President terming what's happening in Sudan -- in Darfur as a genocide?

MR. MCCORMACK: No, I don't think there will be any change. No.

QUESTION: Can I follow up on the G-8?

MR. MCCORMACK: Sure.

QUESTION: Tony Blair is coming to Washington to try to raise support for his initiative, which includes writing off debt relief and doubling aid, but the U.S. really made clear it won't sign up to some of these proposals. I was wondering if you think there is a danger here that the U.S. will be seen as party-poopers at the G-8. Also, will you be offering, sort of, real alternatives to what the Brits are putting forward?

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, Prime Minister Blair is going to be coming here and he's going to be meeting with the President. That's the reason for his coming here so I'm going to defer any questions about that visit to my colleagues at the White House.

As for the G-8 summit, the Secretary will be -- is deeply engaged in this issue, as is the President, working on issues related to development around the world. You know, the President, since he has come in, I think, has made an unprecedented commitment not only to taking steps and devoting resources to alleviating poverty but also to fighting the scourge of AIDS and other disease. So and, you know, this is also a President that has, I think, met, I daresay met with more African leaders than any other President in recent memory. So we are deeply committed to the cause of poverty alleviation as well as helping populations around the world, and in particular in Africa, try to realize a better life.

Why don't we move over here.

QUESTION: Can we go back to North Korea for a minute?

MR. MCCORMACK: Sure.

QUESTION: First off, congratulations on your appointment.

MR. MCCORMACK: Thank you very much. I like the way these questions all begin with that.

QUESTION: Are you aware of any reports that China has told North Korea that it will cut off food aid to North Korea if they test a nuclear bomb?

MR. MCCORMACK: No.

QUESTION: Just to follow up on that, has the U.S. Government yet made any decision on whether it will provide additional food aid to North Korea in response to the 2005 appeal?

MR. MCCORMACK: I believe the decision on that is still pending and we have made donations in the past two years and going back as well of 50,000 metric tons and 100,000 metric tons. But as for the current decision, that's still pending.

Mr. John Karl.

QUESTION: Yeah, Sean, I'm sure you saw Foreign Minister Zebari's comments in The Washington Post and elsewhere basically saying he thinks the U.S. needs to be more involved in the political process in Iraq. I'm wondering your reaction to that. And also, where are we on a U.S. Ambassador to Iraq? I mean, it's been -- quite some time since Negropon-te left. Is there a concern to such an important post go unfilled for so long?

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, Ambassador Khalilzad has been nominated by the President to fill Ambassador Negropon-te's spot in Baghdad. He looks forward to a Senate hearing, which is going to happen next week on June 7th. And we would hope and urge a speedy confirmation process for him so he can get out to Embassy Baghdad and work with the great men and women of the State Department and other U.S. Government agencies that are working closely with the Iraqi Government on building political institutions, economic institutions, legal institutions and working on the security issue as well.

I think that, you know, if you look back at the series of meetings that we have, including the one yesterday between Dr. Rice and Minister Zebari, it's evident that our commitment to assisting the Iraqi people and building those institutions, as well as helping on the political process wherever we can, is really unquestionable. We have literally -- there are hundreds of contacts every single day between U.S. officials and Iraqi officials on a whole variety of issues.

But -- and it's clear this is an Iraqi process. This is part of their process of moving beyond the dark era of Saddam Hussein and writing a constitution that embodies the values that we see in the TAL and that reflect their culture, tradition and society.

So we are prepared and do stand ready to assist the Iraqis as they move through this constitution writing process. But at its core, certainly, this is an Iraqi process. If there are any adjustments in the level of effort or level of interaction that we need to make with the Iraqis, certainly we'll talk to them about it.

Any other on that topic?

QUESTION: Just one quick one, speaking about embassies. I might have missed this but has there been an announcement on an Ambassador to Kabul to replace Mr. Khalilzad?

MR. MCCORMACK: That I have to check on. I'm not -- let me check on that for you.

Yes.

QUESTION: Can you preview the administration's objectives at the OAS this weekend and early next week and specifically, whether or not Secretary or the President propose to and are looking maybe to create a committee to monitor the progress towards democracy in some of these countries?

MR. MCCORMACK: The Secretary is going to be traveling down to the OAS summit in Ft. Lauderdale. She's going to be leaving Sunday and many of you are going to coming with us. She looks forward to her meetings at the summit. As you know, the President will be speaking there as well.

I think we look at this summit as really a part of a transformational moment for the Organization of American States.

We have a new dynamic Secretary General, a former cabinet minister, Minister Insulza, who has a vision for promoting democracy and reinforcing democracy in the region. I think that we support and we looking forward to not only meeting with him but meeting with all the member-states for a discussion on the importance of reinforcing democracies and the freedoms that the people of the hemisphere enjoy.

The theme, if you will, of the summit is delivering the benefits of democracy. So what does that mean? That means working for a more prosperous, safer and more free hemisphere. So we're going to talk about a variety of different mechanisms that the OAS as well as the member-states can look at to, perhaps, come to the assistance of those, as Secretary Rice has referred to, as those fragile democracies, those democracies where there are tensions, that are having difficulties. I think there have been a couple in the news.

So we're going to talk about that. I think we're open to talking about mechanisms, but I don't think I'm going to prejudge those conversations, other than to say that Secretary Rice looks forward to her meetings with her counterparts as well as Secretary General Insulza.

QUESTION: What kind of an OAS role does the U.S. support in Bolivia at the moment, which, as you said, is, well, is one of the countries in the news?

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, you know, again, I think that Bolivia is going to be, I'm sure, a topic of discussion down in Ft. Lauderdale. There have been -- to my knowledge, there haven't been any requests from the Bolivian Government for assistance. I think that, as I said, it would be a topic for discussion and that we ourselves are open to any variety of mechanisms in terms of general assistance to those fragile democracies in the region. But with respect to Bolivia, I don't have anything to share with you.

QUESTION: Rather than requesting assistance, what they've done is the Foreign Ministry issued a statement rejecting OAS mediation, which they have interpreted as what Richard was saying the other day. And because they don't want mediation by the OAS, is that something that the U.S. would also rule out?

MR. MCCORMACK: Again, I don't -- you know, I don't want to rule anything in or rule anything out at this point. What I'd prefer to do is -- what I prefer to do is actually let the discussions down there in Florida take place.

QUESTION: You won't rule it out. That seems to imply that it doesn't matter what the Bolivians think they need, they're saying we don't want mediation, they're saying, well, let the rest of us talk about it.

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, they themselves are going to be part of the conversation as well down in Florida. So what I'd prefer to do, if I could, is just let those conversations take place first.

QUESTION: Just to follow on the issue of these mechanisms, is the U.S. going to make any proposals for specific mechanisms?

MR. MCCORMACK: We are going to be talking about the Inter-American Democratic Charter and many different parties have talked about the Inter-American Democratic Charter, ways that that could be strengthened to look at that as one possible mechanism which we can talk about these issues. At this point, I don't have anything -- any particular proposals to share with you. I think that, again, we're going to be looking forward to a good discussion with the fellow OAS members down there in Ft. Lauderdale.

Elise.

QUESTION: Can you say anything about an American woman, an 18-year-old teen missing in Aruba? She's from Alabama. Her family believes that she's kidnapped. Have there been any discussions with authorities in Aruba or the Dutch Government?

MR. MCCORMACK: What I can share with you is that the Department learned on Tuesday, June 1st, that an American citizen was missing in Aruba. The citizen's name is Natalee Holloway and she was last seen on Monday night, I think, on May 31st. Natalee's family have arrived in Aruba and a consular officer from Curacao is in Aruba at this time and is in contact with the family. And we are making sure that we provide all possible assistance to the family and local authorities and would also note that the FBI is also on hand and cooperating with local authorities in the search effort. And beyond that, I can't really offer anything else, due to Privacy Act considerations.

Why don't we go in the back. Yes.

QUESTION: Mr. McCormack.

MR. MCCORMACK: Yes.

QUESTION: Congratulation and every success.

MR. MCCORMACK: Thank you very much.

QUESTION: Since you are new from the White House here to the State Department, how do you assess the Greek-U.S. relations and the prospects for a solution to the Cyprus problem?

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, the U.S. --

QUESTION: Welcome to the State Department.

MR. MCCORMACK: What's that?

QUESTION: Welcome to the State Department.

(Laughter.)

MR. MCCORMACK: I notice a little difference here.

In terms of U.S.-Greek relations, you know, the state of our relations is excellent. As for the issue of Cyprus, I think that this question comes up frequently in this room and I don't, at this point, don't have anything to add beyond what my esteemed predecessor has talked about on the topic recently.

Thank you very much.

(The briefing was concluded at 2:50 p.m.)

(end transcript)

(Distributed by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State. Web site:

<http://usinfo.state.gov>)

LOAD-DATE: June 9, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

114 of 359 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 3, 2005 Friday

U.S. FINDS FEW EFFORTS TO HALT HUMAN TRAFFICKING IN ARAB GULF

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 742 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. Department of State:

Nearly all the Arab Gulf countries experienced a deterioration in efforts to combat human trafficking, according to the State Department's 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report. Four countries -- Kuwait, Qatar, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates -- fell to Tier 3 rankings, indicating that their governments are not making significant efforts to address the trafficking problem.

The report groups countries into three tiers according to their efforts to confront the problem of human trafficking. Tier 1 countries are in compliance with the minimum standards outlined in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000. Tier 2 countries are not in compliance with the minimum standards but are working to address the problem. Tier 3 countries are not making significant efforts to combat trafficking.

The Gulf countries are destination countries for people trafficked from South and Southeast Asia and from East Africa. Women are trafficked for the purpose of sexual exploitation and domestic servitude. Men are trafficked to work in forced labor. Children are trafficked to the Gulf to work as beggars and camel jockeys.

The report noted that the Kuwaiti government outlawed the use of children as camel jockeys and made public statements condemning human trafficking during 2004, but it said Kuwait made no apparent effort to prosecute traffickers. The report said that Kuwait has made no effort to protect victims of trafficking. Domestic servants are not protected under Kuwait's labor law, and victims of trafficking are often detained, jailed and either deported for immigration violations or returned to abusive employers.

Qatar adopted a National Action Plan on human trafficking in 2003 calling for public awareness campaigns, establishment of a complaints hotline, an end to the use of child camel jockeys, and training for judges on trafficking issues, but, according to the report, most of the plan's provisions remain unimplemented.

The report says that Saudi Arabia has not protected victims of trafficking or prosecuted those responsible for the human trade. Despite reports of trafficking and abuses of domestic and other unskilled workers and children, there is evidence of only one Saudi Government prosecution of a Saudi employer for a trafficking-related offense during the reporting period, the report said.

The report says Saudi Arabia lacks laws criminalizing human trafficking and does not provide protection for domestic workers under its labor laws. It also says that cases of abuse involving foreign workers are seldom subject to criminal prosecution.

The trafficking of young boys to serve as jockeys for camel races remains a widespread problem in the United Arab Emirates, with victims numbering in the thousands, the report said. The Emirates is also a major destination for women trafficked into the sex trade. The report says that the United Arab Emirates government has made no significant effort to confront the problem. It says that decrees and laws regarding human trafficking have largely remained unenforced.

The report noted that the United Arab Emirates government has recently stated its intention to address the trafficking problem through new legislation on camel jockeys and closer monitoring of visas and passports of foreign nationals entering the country.

The report places Bahrain in the group of Tier 2 countries, saying that it is making efforts to confront its problems with human trafficking. Nevertheless, it places Bahrain on a watch list on the grounds that it has failed to follow through on its national anti-trafficking action plan with concrete measures aimed at protecting victims and prosecuting traffickers.

The State Department issues its annual Trafficking in Persons Report pursuant to a congressional mandate. Presenting the 2005 report on June 3, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, All states must work together to close down trafficking routes, prosecute and convict traffickers, and protect and reintegrate victims into society. The responsibility does not rest only with developing countries, whose citizens are vulnerable to trafficking because of poverty or corruption or lack of education. Destination or demand countries, like the United States and other prosperous nations, whose citizens create the marketplace for trafficking, also bear a heavy responsibility, she added.

LOAD-DATE: June 9, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 States News Service

115 of 359 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 3, 2005 FridaySTATE DEPARTMENT RELEASES 2005 TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT*BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 5227 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the State Department:

The U.S. Department of State released June 3 its fifth annual Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP), which estimates that as many as 800,000 victims may be transported across international borders each year and forced to work against their will. The report surveys the counter-trafficking activities in 150 nations, 10 more than in 2004.

Ambassador John Miller, the director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, said at a June 3 Washington press briefing that sex slavery is the largest category of transnational slavery and, to combat it, the United States is urging a greater focus on demand and on educating and dissuading the "customers."

Miller also cited labor exploitation, particularly involuntary servitude of foreign workers, as receiving greater attention in the 2005 report.

The U.S. law mandates the annual international survey, which ranks countries in three tiers: Tier 1 indicates that a nation is in compliance with international standards; Tier 3 denotes countries that are not. A Tier 2 designation is given to countries that are not meeting the minimum standards but are making significant efforts to do so. Placement in Tier 3 could make a nation subject to U.S. sanctions.

Miller said that four countries -- Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates -- have been placed in Tier 3, primarily for their failure to make significant efforts to combat forced labor trafficking.

The TIP report uses tier ratings to emphasize government efforts against human trafficking -- especially in terms of prosecution and protection, rather than just the extent, of the slavery problem, according to Miller.

"I'm happy to note that the Tier 2 warning watch list, introduced last year, has been very effective. 31 of the 46 countries on the 2004 TIP reports Tier 2 watch list improve their ratings this year," Miller said.

The full text of the report is available on the State Department's Web site.

Following is the transcript of Miller's press briefing:

(begin transcript)

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE Office of the Spokesman For Immediate Release June 3, 2005

ON-THE-RECORD BRIEFING

Senior Advisor on Trafficking in Persons, Ambassador John R. Miller On the Release of the Fifth Annual Department of State "Trafficking in Persons Report"

June 3, 2005 Washington, D.C.

(12:00 p.m. EDT)

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Thank you, Madame Secretary. As Secretary of State Rice eloquently explained, human trafficking or trafficking in persons is synonymous with slavery. Now, this is a time when we roll out this report with facts, with figures, with categories, but this report is, more than anything, about human beings. And so I want to start by telling you about Svetlana, an all too typical victim of human trafficking.

Last year, Svetlana was a young woman living in Belarus, looking for a job. She came upon some Turkish men who promised her a well-paying job in Istanbul and once Svetlana crossed the border, the men seized her money, her papers, her passport. They locked her up. They forced her into prostitution. And then one night, they farmed her out to two businessmen, just like a commodity. Desperate, Svetlana jumped out of a window and fell six stories to a sidewalk. Ac-

According to Turkish court documents, the so-called customers went down, found her on the sidewalk and instead of calling the police, called the traffickers, who killed her.

Svetlana's body lay unclaimed in the morgue for two weeks until Turkish authorities learned her identity and sent her body to Belarus. There is a bright spot in this too common tragedy. Belarusian and Turkish authorities cooperated this year to arrest and charge those responsible for Svetlana's death, which I think brings out that bad things are happening, but also how there are counterattacks going on.

Svetlana and other victims' stories are interspersed throughout the introduction to this year's report. I think you've all got copies of it. And they're there so that we may always remember what this struggle is about. Trafficking in persons relies on coercion and exploitation. It thrives on converting hope to fear. It is maintained through violence and it is highly profitable. In that sense, while there are differences, there are also similarities to the slavery of earlier centuries. U.S. Government is committed to taking action in cooperation with other nations to end modern-day slavery and that is the ultimate purpose of this annual Trafficking in Persons Report, which we're releasing today for the fifth year.

This is a tool, along with the assessment of the United States, which comes out later this month -- one of many tools to help free the slaves and throw traffickers in jail. Trafficking is not simply a crime against human rights. It amounts to a public health menace and a rich source of financing for organized crime. It's a dangerous and perverse mutation of otherwise beneficial global exchange. We believe that modern day slavery plagues every, every country, including the United States. This report covers 150 countries found to be a source destination or transit country, for on the order of 100 victims, the threshold for inclusion in the report.

If you find a country is not listed, it probably means we have insufficient knowledge of slavery in that country or else the government in the country cannot exercise sufficient control to be evaluated. Our sources of information are diverse: law enforcement, U.S. embassies, NGOs, daring activists, foreign governments, our own visits. Everything enters the mix, extensive analysis and debate goes into the assessment of each country and assignment into Tier 1, Tier 2, Tier 2 watch list, or Tier 3.

We didn't design the system. Congress designed the system with important help from nongovernmental organization and faith-based communities. I'm happy to note that the Tier 2 warning watch list, introduced last year, has been very effective. 31 of the 46 countries on the 2004 TIP reports, Tier 2 watch list improve their ratings this year. The increased scrutiny of these countries' anti-trafficking efforts required of us by Congress has led to the State Department's greater engagement with these governments. More important, it has led to greater efforts by the governments themselves.

For the third year, Tier 3 countries can be sanctioned if they don't take significant anti-slavery action in the next few months. I'm encouraged to note several countries that were on Tier 3 last June stepped up anti-slavery activities so that they have been raised. In South America, Guyana's president pushed through the country's first anti-trafficking law and led a countrywide awareness campaign on the dangers of trafficking. In South Asia, Bangladesh set up a long-promised special anti-trafficking police unit, which started new investigations while rescuing an increased number of victims.

When we look at slavery worldwide, we believe sex slavery is the largest category of transnational slavery. It is intrinsically linked to prostitution and we find that where prostitution is encouraged, the number of victims increases. That is why to combat sex slavery, we are urging a greater focus on demand, educating and dissuading the so-called customers. But while sex slavery is large, we are concerned with all forms of slavery. This year, trafficking through labor exploitation, particularly in voluntary servitude of foreign laborers, received greater attention. This greater emphasis came as a result of better data obtained from source countries and nongovernmental organizations. Four countries are placed on Tier 3 for their failure primarily to make significant efforts to combat forced labor trafficking: Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates.

The forced labor may involve foreign workers who end up in conditions of involuntary servitude or child camel jockeys who live in slave-like conditions and are forced to race in extremely dangerous environments.

Burma and North Korea, Sudan and Cuba remain on Tier 3, largely because they still fail to address forced labor in their countries. Another government, Cambodia, is on Tier 3 because of government complicity in trafficking in persons -- another important criteria for Tier 3 and the law.

The report covers efforts from March 2004 to March 2005. Some governments have taken steps against slavery since the report was drafted. This is great. Ecuador was placed on Tier 3 again this year for its lack of significant efforts during the reporting period. Two days ago, Ecuador's congress passed criminal code changes that could lead to positive progress in fighting slavery.

The country ratings here, the government ratings are based strictly on government actions to combat trafficking in persons as defined by U.S. law. The standards are set up for the Trafficking Victim Protection Act and are applied equally to every country. We examine each country individually. The goal of the report is not to punish but to stimulate government action to end modern day slavery. We hope all Tier 3 countries will move off Tier 3 within the 90-day grace period by taking concrete steps to combat trafficking in persons. We are prepared to work with them to help achieve this.

At the same time, nowhere on earth is it allowable to systematically abuse children for sport or to stand up while household help is trapped and exploited with no recourse to help or to look the other way while sex traffickers seize young women.

I'd like to address one misperception that is developed around this Trafficking in Persons Report. The Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 requires Tier ratings to emphasize government efforts against human trafficking, especially in terms of prosecution, protection and prevention, rather than just the extent of the slavery problem. Under the law, countries that have substantial anti-trafficking in person efforts underway justify higher ratings, even if they have a large trafficking in person problem.

Now, stepping back and looking around the world, the picture is not all bleak. Shining through this global tragedy are many rays of hope. In addition to the tremendous efforts of heroic individuals and private organizations, governments around the globe are awakening to this issue and taking action to end this form of modern day slavery.

Worldwide, this past year, the number of trafficking related convictions has increased over 3,000. And new anti-human trafficking legislation was approved in 39 countries. That's a big change from five or ten years ago.

We're seeing progress on many fronts. In this year's report, several countries on Tier 1 showed anti-trafficking in person leadership through strong policies and implementation of laws. South Korea launched a brave initiative to close down outlets for commercial sexual exploitation and trafficking, arresting over 500 people and rescuing over 1,000 victims.

Sweden continued its path-breaking program to prosecute exploiters and clients of prostitution while identifying and protecting women in commercial sexual exploitation. Sweden has funded anti-trafficking information campaigns throughout Europe, focusing on curbing demand for trafficking victims.

Morocco has led efforts to hold accountable UN peacekeepers guilty of sexual abuse of minors in areas of UN deployment. The report on pages 33 and 38 identifies international best practices and anti-slavery heroes throughout the world. And those sections could have been much longer, believe me.

The best practices are wide and varied and all are commendable, but let me highlight a few. The Indian NGO Shakti Vahini produces an informative Indian Trafficking in Persons Report that rates anti-slavery efforts in Indian states. The Malawian nongovernmental organization People Serving Girls at Risk works to identify and help underage girls in prostitution through undercover outreach. And the Fahmina Institute of Indonesia engages Islamic boarding schools to spread anti-trafficking awareness.

The anti-slavery heroes cited in the report, a few out of thousands, range from Ansar Burney the Pakistani human rights activist who has sought to help Asian and African children who have been trafficked to the Arabian Gulf countries for exploitation, as camel jockeys. To Somaly Mam and Pierre Legros of the French NGO AFESIP who braved personal threats from traffickers to rescue victims of sex slavery in Southeast Asia.

The U.S. is deeply committed to fulfilling its responsibilities in the fight against trafficking in persons. And that's why we contributed an excess of $80 million abroad for all kinds of anti-trafficking programs last year. In January, President George W. Bush said, "no one is fit to be a master and no one deserves to be a slave." And because of the stain of slavery, on our own history, these words have special meaning to us and they guide our efforts against trafficking in persons, based on our strong belief in freedom and human dignity. As the Secretary has stated, modern slavery has been met and is being met with a growing powerful response -- a 21st century abolitionist movement. We must all do our part.

Thank you and let's turn to questions. Oh, my gosh. Okay, yes. Go ahead. Yeah.

QUESTION: Andrea Mitchell from NBC. Can you tell us regarding Saudi Arabia, Qatar, Kuwait, the UAE, whether you believe that it was the prior sanctions to get some action? In particular in Saudi Arabia, they have moved backwards, not forward since last year's report. And you've got four countries that are major allies of the United States in the war on terror and in military operations that are chief abusers in this practice.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Well, I won't disagree with your characterization of the situation. It is serious, for example, in Saudi Arabia we have domestic workers being brought in from many countries into domestic servitude -- child beggars, a lot of beatings, reports of beatings and rape, very difficult to get shelter, no convictions. But you're -- the first part of your question was: Is this going to lead to sanctions? My answer is I hope not because the purpose of the law is not to sanction, it is to get progress in freeing the victims and throwing the traffickers in jail.

QUESTION: They've moved backwards in the last year.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Wait a minute -- that's...

QUESTION: Will it require sanctions?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: If they stay in Tier 3, it will require sanctions. However, the reason why I hope this will not take place is under the law, there are now three months for any government in Tier 3 to take significant steps against trafficking and we're prepared to work with these governments, including the governments you mentioned. Our hope is there will be enough progress in freeing the victims and throwing the traffickers in jail that at the end of 120 days, there will not have to be sanctions, but there is that possibility.

Yes.

QUESTION: Can I follow-up on that?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: This law has been in effect for five years?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: Could you say how many countries and which ones have been sanctioned until now?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah. There have been several countries sanctioned. But the interesting thing is that countries that are willing to work on this issue in the past, we've had several relationships with, have avoided sanctions by taking action in the three months or four months after the report.

For example, two years ago, we placed Turkey and Greece, two NATO allies, on Tier 3. But in the four months over the summer, the arrests, the prosecutions, the setting up of referral systems to get victims to nongovernmental organizations, the setting up of shelters, there was significant progress made, which we were delighted with. So the purpose here is not to result in sanctions, although that may happen, it is to get progress.

Yes. Go ahead.

QUESTION: Under which capacity, the United States is preparing in those type of reports, interfering in the internal affairs of sovereign countries?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: I'm sorry. Could you just repeat the question again?

QUESTION: Yes. Under which capacity, the United States of America is preparing, those type of reports interfering in the internal affairs of sovereign countries?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Okay. Well, this is not the first time I've heard that question. The answer -- that is that reminds me of a question that was asked William Wilberforce. On the floor of the English Parliament, back in the 1790s when he discovered, realized the extent of slavery and started his campaign to end the slave trade, and the question that was asked of him by another parliamentarian was: Will the right honorable gentleman tell me what rights we have to impose British moral values on the world? Wilberforce, who was alone in Parliament when he started this action, cited universal and religious values, to show that people nowhere wanted slavery.

Today, we have -- the case is much stronger because unlike in Wilberforce's time, no government in the world, that I'm aware of, officially endorses slavery and there are numerous international covenants, UN covenants, that nations of the world have subscribed to that are -- banned slavery.

So I would say in this effort that we're participating in, we are trying both at home and abroad to work with other countries in trying to end a slavery, that citizens around the world and ostensibly, governments around the world, all agree is a scourge that should be ended. Let's take somebody in the back.

Yeah, go ahead.

QUESTION: Advocacy organizations around the world are saying that poverty and lack of job opportunities is one of the causes of women or families being vulnerable to slavery. To what extent is the United States prepared to relieve debt to World Bank or IMF loans and other forms to substantially improve the quality of life and services in nations around the world vulnerable?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Sure. Well, as Ambassador-at-large on international slavery, I'm not the U.S. expert or authority on international debt, but I want to comment on the premise of your question. You identified poverty as a major cause of slavery and slave trade and I would agree it is a major cause. There are a lot of studies that have been done in the last couple of years -- I won't cite them all -- that show, however, that it is one of several major causes. Poverty is a push factor. There is the pull factor of the attraction of the better life in the wealthier country. There is the factor of gender attitudes. Believe me, when you look at sex slavery and parts of domestic servitude slavery, gender attitudes play a big role.

There is the role of organized crime and greed. I mean, this is a big source of revenue for organized crime. I mean, now they -- we talked about the arms trade, the drug trade, and the people trade being sources of revenue for organized crime.

So all of these causes we hope will be addressed, but in the meantime -- in the meantime -- we are seeking, through our office, to do what we can to work with other countries to get better law enforcement, get better protection for victims, and get prevention and education campaigns.

Yes.

QUESTION: To what extent are the efforts in the United States to identify victims and to give them the T-4 visa programs they -- to what extent are those efforts successful and why are not --

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: How many victims have been identified to date?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: And what are the problems in identifying victims?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah. That's a very good question. Did everybody hear -- should I be repeating the questions or --

QUESTION: No, that's fine. We don't mind.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: You can hear, okay. Your question about identifying victims in the United States, you put your finger on a problem that is -- confronts the United States and almost every country in the world. The gap between what are estimated to be the number of victims and the actual number of victims getting help -- just two weeks ago, President Bush's task force on trafficking in persons consisting of cabinet officers chaired by Secretary of State Rice discussed this issue and the Health and Human Services Secretary Leavitt specifically brought up, as an area where we need to do more, exactly that.

What has been done? And the gap is such -- to give you an idea of the gap, I believe the figure now is about roughly 700 people have been helped with temporary visas in the United States. They cooperate in prosecutions, get assistance and all that, yet we know the figure -- we suspect -- we don't scientifically know, since victims don't stand in line to be -- raise their hands to be counted, but we suspect that the figure for the number of victims annually crossing into the United States across our borders every year is in excess of 14 and a half thousand. So there's a gap.

Presently, Health and Human Services has pilot programs in ten -- I believe it's soon to be 20 cities -- trying to reach out to the foreign migrant communities to help victims come forward. We are starting to consider another additional approach, a work sector approach, and Health and Human Services has done some work on this, but this approach would involve mobilizing or involving doctors, hospitals, lawyers, travel industry personnel in this effort to try to help victims come forward.

So you're right in identifying one of the big challenges.

Yes, back?

QUESTION: Can I follow up on this question, sir?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah. Well, just --

QUESTION: It's on this particular area.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Okay.

QUESTION: Can you speak about what the U.S. is doing to just not only identify victims, but to combat demand, as the Secretary said? You just said that nowhere on earth --

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: Is it acceptable, so --

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Right.

QUESTION: -- what is the U.S. doing? And it's your -- you just mentioned that you were the Ambassador of international slavery. Is this a new title or are you just kind of encapsulating what it is that the --

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Well, it's -- I guess it's sort of new. It's -- Congress and the President raised the position to ambassadorial status -- well, I was confirmed by the Senate nine months ago and in the previous year, I guess the end of 2003, legislation was passed raising this position to ambassadorial status. In addition, I -- at the direction of the President, I chair a -- under that Presidential task force I referred to, I chair a senior policy operating group of domestic and foreign U.S. agencies trying to coordinate policies.

Now, let's get to the first part of your question: demand and what's being done in the United States. I think if you look at the United States and around the world, you'll see there are a lot of demand education programs directed at potential victims. However, what you don't see yet are a lot of programs directed at the demand for the victims. That is starting to change in the United States.

I'll give you a good example. There is an organization, SAGE in San Francisco, with U.S. taxpayers' support, that first convinced the San Francisco law enforcement authorities to arrest not just the women engaged in prostitution, who might be trafficking victims, but arrest the traffickers, the pimps, the brothel owners, and the so-called customers. And then that organization convinced the authorities that a fine should be imposed on the first offense so there would be a school, which has the name, John School, that these men would have to go to. I visited there a couple of weeks ago and this school now has been going for some time, appears to have very good results, two percent recidivism rate.

This program has now spread in different forms to 15 or 20 U.S. cities. I think it's going to spread further and we are discussing with different countries around the world how this could be replicated in those countries to address demand. For example, we're in discussions with the Korean Ministry of Gender and Equality on that issue.

Yes, in the back. Go ahead.

QUESTION: Are you saying that the Brazil Government is making progress, but is not fully complying? Could you say what needs to be done?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Sure. Brazil, I believe, if I'm not mistaken, is listed in Tier 2, which is the upper category of the report. I visited Brazil last fall. One of the positive things going on in Brazil: Brazil has started setting up, in different provinces, anti-trafficking in persons efforts.

I think one of the problems that Brazil faces is that while there has been tremendous government interest, the President of Brazil has spoken out very strongly on this issue, but if you look at the actual finished product in law enforcement, three convictions last year, coming out of scores and scores of investigations and hundreds and hundreds of victims -- so, I think in that area, they can do more. They can do more in terms of their awareness campaigns and their protection efforts for victims, but I would say law enforcement would be the major area.

I hope I'm calling -- yes, go ahead.

QUESTION: You mentioned Canada as a transit country.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yes.

QUESTION: With some of these sex trade workers.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: And although Canada is in Tier 1, how would you rate Canada in terms of this problem and what do you think Canada should do to improve the situation?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Okay. Well, you're talking about Canada as a transit country and Canada has done some very aggressive things the last year. We have a specific transit problem we have to address with Canada and I think it's referred to in the report. I hope it's referred to. And the challenge that we face is that there are migrants from the Far East that come into Canada -- for example, Korea, they don't need a visa and then they just come across the U.S. border and we -- there's a lot of evidence that there's hundreds of such victims involved.

We're going to have to -- we're working on this with Canada and Korea. We're going to see what we can do to try to address this problem. That's an example.

I'm sorry, there's so -- yes? There's so many people. Go ahead.

MR. CASEY: Mr. Ambassador I'm afraid we're going to have to make this limited to a couple more people. So why don't you take that one and then I know Teri wanted to get in --

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Okay. Oh, Teri -- no, no, no, no. Okay, yes. Okay, I'll take two. Go ahead.

QUESTION: Yeah. Ambassador Miller, my name is Wen Ha (ph), Radio Free Asia.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: I didn't hear -- you didn't mention anything about Vietnam.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: However, the problem is there. You know, like there -- now, Vietnam last year was on Tier 2 watch list.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Watch list, yes.

QUESTION: On the Tier 2 --

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: It's not on the watch list anymore.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: My question is, what is the method that you used to -- in order to classify Vietnam to Tier 2 watch list?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: To -- well, we thought they --

QUESTION: Did you find -- yeah, did you send a fact-finding team to Vietnam?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah, yeah. We have had -- Vietnam made some significant progress in the last year. For example, we were very critical of Vietnam before on exporting Vietnamese labor and cooperating with what we thought were slave owners in other countries, including one operation in American Samoa. But they have stepped in and are giving much better supervision and control. Their number of convictions has increased, so there's been some progress in Vietnam.

Teri, Teri? No, I've got to -- no, Teri -- I ignored her last year.

QUESTION: He ignored me last year.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: I didn't call on her. I got to -- okay.

QUESTION: Okay, thank you. Ambassador Miller, a couple of things. You didn't actually tell us who has been sanctioned when you talked about sanctions and I wanted to go back to the question of these very close allies: Kuwait, UAE,

Saudi Arabia. And could you -- you've been to these countries and you've had discussions with these leaders about these issues --

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: -- and many of them have laws in place, not to mention authoritarian regimes that should be able to enforce these laws, one would think. Could you help us understand why they aren't doing more, especially being such close allies of the U.S. in counterterrorism, for example? And we really do want to know who's been sanctioned.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: I'm glad you've -- the toughest question comes last. Well, in terms of countries that have been sanctioned, if you look at the countries in -- nobody has been sanctioned this year. If you look at the countries from last year's report, and we can -- I can't recall them from memory, but you can -- our staff can get them to you, but your -- the tough part of your question was -- well, here are close friends of the United States; how can this happen? Two years ago, I was asked about Greece and Turkey; how can allies be on Tier 3?

I believe that this is a function, to a large extent, of information and public awareness, that as public awareness increases in these countries, you see more action. For example, just for example, in Saudi Arabia, a recent case involving an Indonesian young woman tortured, beaten, dumped at a hospital -- domestic servitude case has gotten publicity. A human rights lawyer in Saudi Arabia has protested there and I don't know how it's all going to come out, but they're -- apparently in the last month, there was an arrest made.

As public awareness increases -- and sometimes when countries don't have free flows of information, that's hard -- but as public awareness increases, I don't think people want slavery today and this is where one of the signs of progress has been the exponential increase of news media attention to this issue the last couple of years.

Since I'm at the end here, I want to tell you, when you write on this -- when you write on this, I know you're journalists and all that -- but when you write on this issue, you indirectly help free victims and throw traffickers in jail because it increases public awareness. People become more aware all over the world. They become more aware in the United States. They start talking to their local police. They start talking to their public officials.

Good things happen when -- so -- but the last comment, I am -- so, I have a meeting coming up with foreign ambassadors and then NGOs.

I know there are a lot of people that didn't get to ask questions. If --

QUESTION: You're going to come up, sir. We have about 10 minutes to (inaudible) --

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Oh, I've got 10 more minutes, okay. And -- but we've also got people on our staff: Eleanor Kennelly, Caroline Tetschner that even if I have to move out after five or ten minutes can answer questions.

So thank you all for coming. I appreciate it.

(end transcript)

(Distributed by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State. Web site:

<http://usinfo.state.gov>)

LOAD-DATE: June 9, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

116 of 359 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 3, 2005 FridaySOUTH ASIA ANTI-TRAFFICKING EFFORTS IMPROVE, REPORT SAYS*BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 971 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the State Department: Three South Asian countries, Nepal, Bangladesh and Pakistan, received praise in the State Department's 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report for their significant efforts to confront the problem of human trafficking over the past year.

Nepal and Bangladesh are both sources of women and children trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation, domestic servitude and forced labor. Pakistan is both a source and destination country for victims of trafficking. Women and girls from South and Central Asia are trafficked to Pakistan for sexual and domestic servitude while Pakistanis are trafficked to the Middle East for bonded labor. Both Bangladeshi and Pakistani boys are trafficked to the Arab Gulf countries to serve as camel jockeys for organized camel racing.

The report also observed that internal trafficking takes place within each country, typically bringing rural women and children to cities in order to work as prostitutes, domestic servants and forced laborers.

The report groups countries into three "tiers," according to their efforts to combat the scourge. Tier 1 groups countries that are in compliance with the minimum standards of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA). Tier 2 includes countries that are not in compliance but are making efforts to comply. Tier 3 groups countries that are not making significant efforts to combat the problem.

The 2005 report moved Nepal from a Tier 2 country to a Tier 1 country, indicating that the Nepalese government is now in compliance with the minimum standards.

Despite political and security challenges, the government has sustained its efforts to combat trafficking in persons. Nepal has a National Plan of Action to combat trafficking, a draft Human Trafficking Control Bill to strengthen its 1986 anti-trafficking law, and a National Rapporteur on trafficking, the report said.

The report noted that the Nepalese government faces significant challenges in addressing the problem of human trafficking given the country's ongoing Maoist insurgency. It also noted that the Maoist insurgents are responsible for internal trafficking of children, whom they forcibly conscript into military service.

Nevertheless, the report calls the Nepalese government's law enforcement efforts commendable and says the government works well with nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) to provide protection and assistance for the victims.

According to the report, the government has established anti-trafficking vigilance committees in high-priority districts, conducts mandatory safe migration orientation sessions for workers traveling abroad, and carries out national public awareness campaigns.

Bangladesh improved its performance in combating trafficking, moving from a Tier 3 country to a Tier 2 country in the 2005 report, indicating that it has begun making efforts to comply with the minimum standards of the TVPA.

Over the last year, Bangladesh showed commendable progress in all areas of anti-trafficking efforts, the report stated. Bangladesh established an inter-ministerial anti-trafficking committee to oversee its national efforts to combat trafficking, created a national anti-trafficking police monitoring unit with presence in all 64 districts, prosecuted an increased number of trafficking and trafficking-related corruption cases, rescued over 161 boys from servitude in the fishing industry, devised and launched a multi-faceted anti-trafficking public awareness campaign, and increased its cooperation with NGOs involved in the fight against trafficking.

The report stated that Bangladesh continues to have difficulty confronting the trafficking problem due to generalized corruption of public officials who in many cases are complicit in the human trade.

Pakistan moved from the watch list to the "general list" within the tier-two category, indicating that its efforts to combat trafficking and meet the minimum standards of TVPA have become noticeably more effective over the past year.

Most notably, [Pakistan] has increased trafficking-related prosecutions and convictions, strengthened implementation of its 2002 Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance, established an Anti-Trafficking Unit within the Federal Investigation Agency, and co-sponsored several public awareness campaigns, the report said.

The report noted that Pakistan obtained 72 convictions on trafficking crimes in 2004 compared to six in 2003. It also said that the Pakistani government has committed itself to providing resources for protection, shelter and repatriation of trafficking victims.

Afghanistan and Sri Lanka remained in the Tier 2 category, indicating that they are working to confront their human-trafficking problems. India remained on the Tier 2 watch list due to its inability to show evidence of increased efforts to address the problem, and specifically its failure to empower a national law enforcement entity with an anti-trafficking mandate.

The State Department prepares the annual Trafficking in Persons Report in response to a congressional mandate. In presenting the 2005 report on June 3, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, The United States has a particular duty to fight this scourge because trafficking in persons is an affront to the principles of human dignity and liberty, upon which this nation was founded.

We trust that this year's report will raise international awareness of the crime of trafficking and spur governments across the globe to take determined actions against it, she added.

The full text of the report is available on the State Department's Web site.

(The Washington File is a product of the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State. Web site: <http://usinfo.state.gov>)

LOAD-DATE: June 9, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 States News Service

117 of 359 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 3, 2005 Friday

BURMA, CAMBODIA, NORTH KOREA CITED FOR HUMAN TRAFFICKING ABUSES

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 12012 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the State Department:

The world's most comprehensive report on trafficking in persons has cited Burma, Cambodia and North Korea as countries in East Asia whose governments have neglected to implement minimal standards against this form of criminal activity --often called modern-day slavery. The findings were contained in the fifth annual Trafficking in Persons Report released by the State Department June 3.

The report's methodology includes a three-tier system for rating countries' effectiveness in combating trafficking: 'cents Tier 1 includes those countries that have met international standards for coping with trafficking and are vigorously addressing the problem.

'cents Tier 2 comprises countries that are demonstrating commitment to address their problems but have not yet achieved international standards; the Tier 2 "Watch List" consists of countries that might be vulnerable to an erosion of their efforts.

'cents Tier 3, the least favorable rating, lists countries whose governments fail to meet minimal international standards and are not making significant efforts to do so.

Burma, Cambodia and North Korea were listed as Tier 3 countries because their governments not only failed to implement international standards but also engaged in acts such as state-sanctioned use of forced labor and failed to make progress in prosecuting rampant trafficking.

China is one of the countries in East Asia placed on the watch list. China was cited for failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking, specifically its inadequate protection for trafficking victims, particularly foreign women (especially those from Vietnam) and mainland Chinese women routed for sex work in Taiwan.

The Philippines also was added to the Tier 2 Watch List due to its failure to show evidence of increasing efforts to convict traffickers.

Consistent with its objective of inspiring action against human trafficking, the report also praised countries that have adopted "best practices" in their efforts to prevent trafficking, provide for victims or prosecute traffickers themselves. South Korea, for example, passed two significant anti-prostitution and anti-trafficking laws in 2004 aimed at combating the commercial sexual exploitation of women and girls. Indonesia worked with nongovernmental organizations to build Islamic boarding schools to educate young girls from impoverished families. The Philippines established four shelters for trafficking victims at major port cities.

The full text of the report is available on the State Department's Web site.

Following are excerpts for East Asia from the 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report:

(begin text)

U.S. Department of State 2005 Report Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000: Trafficking in Persons Report

BURMA (TIER 3)

Burma is a source country for women and men trafficked for the purposes of forced labor and sexual exploitation. Burmese men, women, and children (primarily from the country's ethnic minority populations) are trafficked to Thailand, China, Bangladesh, Taiwan, India, Malaysia, Korea, Macau, and Japan for forced labor - including commercial labor - involuntary domestic servitude, and sexual exploitation. To a lesser extent, Burma is a destination for women from the People's Republic of China (P.R.C.) who are trafficked for commercial sexual exploitation. Internal trafficking of women and girls for sexual exploitation occurs from villages to urban centers and other areas, such as truck stops, fishing villages, border towns, and mining and military camps. The junta's policy of using forced labor is a driving factor behind Burma's large trafficking problem.

The Government of Burma does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to do so. While Burma has made improved efforts to combat trafficking for sexual exploitation, significant state-sanctioned use (especially by the military) of forced labor continued. The Burmese armed forces continued to force ethnic minorities to serve as porters during military operations in ethnic areas. There also are continuing reports that some children were forced to join the Burmese Army. Although eight local officials were convicted in January 2005 on charges of forced labor, the Burmese Government supported or tolerated the use of forced labor for large infrastructure projects. The government sentenced three individuals to death for communicating with the ILO on the subject of forced labor. Because of the Burmese Government's failure to end forced labor, the ILO postponed implementation of a plan of action to address such practices. During the reporting period, the government took some steps to combat trafficking for sexual exploitation, including drafting anti-trafficking legislation and improving cooperation with UN agencies, neighboring countries, and NGOs.

Prosecution

Over the past year, the Burmese Government made progress in addressing trafficking for commercial sexual exploitation, including establishing a police task force to combat trafficking, enhancing cooperation with Burma's neighbors, and beginning to draft anti-trafficking legislation. The Burmese Government made only minimal progress in prosecuting cases involving trafficking for forced labor. Since July 2002, the government claims it prosecuted 474 cases related to trafficking for sexual exploitation and smuggling; an indeterminate number of these cases actually involved severe forms of trafficking in persons. Authorities also convicted eight local officials for using forced labor in a road construction project, sentencing the offenders to six to eight months' imprisonment. The government created a police anti-trafficking unit in 2004 and stationed the unit's teams in border towns to monitor and interdict trafficking. The Burmese Government is developing an anti-trafficking law, but currently uses kidnapping and prostitution statutes to arrest and prosecute traffickers. Corruption continued to be a major problem. Although local and regional officials were suspected of complicity in trafficking, the Burmese Government reported no prosecutions of corrupt government officials related to trafficking. The Burmese military continued to carry out trafficking abuses including forced portering and other forced labor.

Protection

During the reporting period, the Burmese Government provided minimal assistance to victims. Burma's protection included a repatriation center on the Thailand-Burma border, but its overall efforts were hampered by a lack of adequate funding. The government continued to refer victims to NGOs and international organizations that provide protection for victims of trafficking. The Burmese Government also coordinated the repatriation of a limited number of victims from Thailand with international NGOs and provided limited counseling and job training for returning victims trafficked for sexual exploitation. The government did not provide assistance to victims trafficked internally for forced labor, nor did it fund international or domestic NGOs that provide protective services to victims. The Ministry of Home Affairs' Anti-Trafficking Unit received training on various aspects of investigating and handling trafficking cases.

Prevention

The Burmese Government's efforts to prevent trafficking remained inadequate. Governmental measures to prevent trafficking for sexual exploitation include publicizing the dangers in border areas through government-sponsored discussion groups, distribution of printed materials, and media programming. However, these efforts remained under-funded. The government also conducted awareness workshops at the local level on the dangers of trafficking for the purpose of sexual exploitation.

CAMBODIA (TIER 3)

Cambodia is a source, destination, and transit country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor. A significant number of Cambodian women and children are trafficked to Thailand and Malaysia for labor and commercial sexual exploitation. Cambodian men are primarily trafficked to Thailand for labor exploitation in the construction and agricultural sectors, particularly the fishing industry. Cambodian children are trafficked to Vietnam and Thailand to work as street beggars. Cambodia is a transit and destination point for women from Vietnam who are trafficked for prostitution.

The Government of Cambodia does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to do so. Cambodia is placed on Tier 3 for its lack of progress in combating severe forms of trafficking, particularly its failure to convict traffickers and public officials involved in trafficking. During the last year, the Cambodian Government failed to take effective action to ensure that those responsible for the raid on an NGO shelter for trafficking victims were held accountable and brought to justice. The Cambodian Government's failure to act calls into question Cambodia's commitment to combating human trafficking. Cambodia's anti-trafficking efforts remained hampered by systemic corruption and an ineffectual judicial system. The government must take aggressive measures to prosecute and convict traffickers and public officials found to be involved in trafficking, and confront the corruption in its judicial system that hampers prosecutions of traffickers.

Prosecution

During the reporting period, the Cambodian Government made no significant progress in its anti-trafficking law enforcement efforts. Prosecutions of suspected traffickers dropped significantly, despite a small increase in the number of arrests. The Cambodian Government's response to an attack on an NGO shelter for trafficking victims and removal of suspected trafficking victims was unsatisfactory. Moreover, the government did not adequately investigate or hold accountable those who were responsible for the attack. Cambodia does not have a comprehensive anti-trafficking law but it used existing statutes to prosecute traffickers. Penalties for trafficking for commercial sexual exploitation carry sentences of up to 20 years' imprisonment. The National Assembly has not yet acted on a draft anti-trafficking bill that would provide law enforcement and judicial officials with more powers to arrest and prosecute traffickers. In 2004, the Cambodian police reported 165 arrests but only 24 successful prosecutions. Despite the number of arrests, there were few actual convictions of traffickers. There was no available information on the length of sentences for trafficking-related cases. Systemic corruption and a weak judiciary remain the most serious impediments to the effective prosecution of traffickers. Senior Cambodian Government officials and their family members are reportedly involved in or profit from trafficking activities but there were no trafficking-related prosecutions of corrupt officials.

Protection

The Cambodian Government continued to refer victims to NGOs and international organizations with victim protection programs. The Ministry of Social Affairs, Veterans and Youth Rehabilitation operated two temporary shelters for victims, but the government relied primarily on foreign and domestic NGOs to provide shelter to victims. The Cambodian Government also supported an NGO that places trafficking victims in long-term shelters. Victims in Cambodia are not treated as criminals and have the right to seek legal action against traffickers, but seldom do.

Prevention

The government continued its efforts to raise awareness of trafficking by cooperating with numerous NGOs and international organizations. The Ministry of Women's Affairs (MWA) continued to carry out information campaigns, including grassroots meetings in key provinces. The MWA worked with IOM to expand a nationwide anti-trafficking information and advocacy campaign that included district-level meetings with government officials and the distribution of educational materials and videos. During the reporting period, the Anti-Trafficking Police Unit conducted an outreach program to warn high school students of the dangers of trafficking. The Ministry of Tourism produced pamphlets and advertisements warning tourists of the penalties for engaging in sex with minors, and conducted workshops for hospitality staff on how to identify and intervene in cases of trafficking or sexual exploitation of children.

NORTH KOREA (TIER 3)

The Democratic People's Republic of North Korea is a source country for men and women trafficked for the purposes of forced labor and sexual exploitation. Thousands of North Korean men, women, and children are forced to work and often perish under conditions of slavery inside the country. Thousands of North Koreans, pushed by deteriorating conditions in the country, become economic migrants who are subjected to conditions of debt bondage, commercial sexual exploitation, and/or forced labor upon arrival in a destination country, most often the People's Republic of China (P.R.C.). The illegal status of North Koreans in other nations increases their vulnerability to trafficking schemes and sexual and physical abuse. North Korean women are trafficked for commercial sexual exploitation and forced marriages with Chinese men while North Korean men are trafficked for forced labor. North Koreans forcibly returned from China are sent to labor prison camps operated by the government.

The Government of North Korea does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making efforts to do so. The government does not recognize trafficking as a problem and imposes slave-like labor conditions on prisoners and repatriated North Koreans.

Prosecution

During the reporting period, North Korea publicly executed three men for trafficking North Korean women into China. There were no reports that authorities investigated the trafficking of North Korean women for sale into brothels and marriages with Chinese men. The North Korean Government continued to carry out trafficking abuses, particularly forced labor. There were no reports of prosecutions of corrupt officials related to trafficking.

Protection

The Government of North Korea made no effort to protect trafficking victims during the reporting period; reporting instead indicated that the government punished victims. Press reports indicated that nine women who were trafficked and returned from China were sentenced to prison terms of two years to 18 years. The government sent all North Koreans who were forcibly returned from China, including trafficking victims, to forced-labor prison camps where torture and public executions are commonplace. There are also reports that North Koreans who were forcibly returned from China are detained in re-education camps.

Prevention

The North Korean Government does not recognize trafficking as a problem, and there were no reports of any government anti-trafficking efforts. Due to the lack of prevention efforts, there have been reports of an increase in the trafficking of North Korean women along the Chinese-North Korean border. The government has not taken steps to warn its citizens about the kidnapping of North Korean women by Chinese or North Korean men along the border who prey on unaccompanied women.

CHINA (TIER 2 - WATCH LIST)

The Peoples' Republic of China is a source, transit, and destination country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labor and sexual exploitation. A significant number of Chinese women and children are trafficked internally for forced marriage and forced labor. Chinese women are at times lured abroad with false promises of legitimate employment and then trafficked for commercial sexual exploitation to destinations throughout Asia, the Middle East, Africa, Europe, and North America, while Chinese men have been trafficked for forced labor to Europe, South America, and the Middle East. A large number of Chinese men and women are smuggled abroad at enormous personal financial cost and, upon arrival in the destination country, are subjected to commercial sexual exploitation or other forms of exploitative labor to repay their debts. They often face exploitative conditions that meet the definition of involuntary servitude. Women from Burma, North Korea, Russia, Vietnam, and Mongolia are trafficked to China for labor and commercial sexual exploitation and forced marriage.

The Government of the People's Republic of China does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. China's placement on Tier 2 Watch List is due to its failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking, specifically its inadequate protection for trafficking victims, particularly foreign women and P.R.C. women identified from Taiwan. There are reports of the involuntary return of North Koreans from China to North Korea, as these returnees often face serious abuses. The Chinese Government does not, as a matter of policy, fine identified trafficking victims, but it reportedly and unintentionally does fine some victims - particularly P.R.C. women and girls returning from Taiwan - who are among illegal migrants. China needs to identify these trafficking victims, and provide them with protection, rather than levying fines or other punishment on them. The government should also vigorously investigate allegations of coercive labor practices, including alleged situations of involuntary servitude and forced labor.

Prosecution

The Chinese Government continued its anti-trafficking law enforcement efforts in 2004, actively arresting and prosecuting traffickers. China has a law that specifically outlaws the trafficking or kidnapping of women and coercion into prostitution. Penalties for trafficking carry sentences of up to ten years' imprisonment. "Snakeheads" or traffickers who smuggle victims overseas can be fined, have their property confiscated, be imprisoned for terms up to life, or be executed. China's criminal code imposes the death penalty for traffickers who coerce girls under 14 into prostitution. Over the past year, the police reportedly investigated 309 trafficking gangs and arrested 5,043 suspected traffickers, referring 3,144 for prosecution. While the Chinese Government did not provide statistics on the number of convictions, media reports indicated that 36 members of a child trafficking ring were given sentences ranging from two years' imprisonment to the death penalty. There do not appear to be adequate efforts to focus law enforcement resources on the problem of forced or coercive labor that meet the definition of involuntary servitude. Several police officials, including those that reportedly profited from trafficking, were convicted of commercial sexual exploitation and issuing visas to facilitate trafficking.

Protection

During the reporting period, the Chinese Government provided an inadequate level of protection for victims of trafficking. China does not fine repatriated trafficking victims once identified, and generally categorizes them separately from illegal migrants. However, there have been reports that police have levied fines for immigration violations on trafficking victims, particularly women and girls repatriated from Taiwan. The Chinese Government also did not take measures to protect foreign women who were trafficked for commercial sexual exploitation and forced marriages with Chinese men. Over the past year, the Chinese Government funded programs operated by an NGO to reintegrate trafficked women into their local communities and relieve the stigma attached to trafficking victims. The Chinese Government reportedly allocated funds to provincial and local police departments to use in returning trafficking victims to their hometowns. Some government agencies also provided basic living necessities and return assistance. The Ministry of Public Security (MPS) continued to train police officers on how to handle trafficking-related crimes. The MPS reportedly eliminated special anti-trafficking police units and subsumed their duties into general law enforcement units but its national office for trafficking crimes remains in place.

Prevention

The Chinese Government expanded its efforts to raise awareness of trafficking in 2004. The government cooperated with the Vietnamese Government and UNICEF on a mass communications effort to educate people and local government leaders on trafficking. Through its law enforcement agencies and its school systems, the government continued its awareness campaigns to warn of the potential dangers of trafficking. Posters, videos and pamphlets are distributed throughout the country.

THE PHILIPPINES (TIER 2 - WATCH LIST)

The Philippines is a source, transit, and destination country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor. Philippine women are often lured abroad with false promises of legitimate employment and are trafficked for commercial sexual exploitation to destinations throughout Asia, the Middle East, Africa, Europe, and North America. A significant number of the 71,084 Philippine women who entered Japan as overseas performing artists in 2004 are believed to have been women trafficked into the sex trade. Philippine men and women who go overseas to work in domestic service and the construction and garment industries often face exploitative conditions that meet the definition of involuntary servitude - a severe form of trafficking in persons. To a lesser extent, the Philippines is a transit point and destination for women from the People's Republic of China (P.R.C.) who are trafficked for sexual exploitation. Within the Philippines, there is internal trafficking from rural to urban metropolitan areas and sexual exploitation of children. Endemic poverty, a high unemployment rate, a cultural propensity towards migration, a weak rule-of-law environment, and sex tourism all contribute to significant trafficking activity in the Philippines.

The Government of the Philippines does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. Although the Philippines remains a strong proponent of anti-trafficking measures in the context of international organizations, more progress in its law enforcement efforts is needed.

The Philippines' placement on Tier 2 Watch List is due to its failure to show evidence of increasing efforts to convict traffickers. The government made modestly better efforts to implement its anti-trafficking law, dedicating four state prosecutors to focus on trafficking-related cases and providing training to law enforcement officials on the anti-trafficking law. The Philippine Government should take immediate corrective action by arresting, prosecuting, and convicting traffickers and any public officials found to be involved in trafficking. The government also needs to make greater efforts to address allegations of corruption and fraud regarding the issuance of documents to facilitate the recruitment of Philippine entertainers to Japan, a process that traffickers exploit.

Prosecution

During the reporting period, the Philippine Government made increasing efforts to implement its anti-trafficking law; the number of trafficking-related prosecutions under the anti-trafficking law remained low, although there were other prosecutions under legislation related to child abuse and illegal recruitment. There were no reported convictions under the anti-trafficking law of 2003. The government dedicated four state prosecutors to focus on trafficking-related cases and provided training to law enforcement officials on the anti-trafficking law. Currently, there are 28 cases under investigation. The Department of Justice is prosecuting at least 15 cases under the anti-trafficking law and other statutes related to child abuse and illegal recruitment. Corruption and a weak judiciary remain serious impediments to the effective prosecution of traffickers. Despite widespread allegations of law enforcement officials' complicity in trafficking, the government reported no prosecutions of trafficking-related corruption.

Protection

The Philippine Government continued to sponsor impressive protection efforts for trafficking victims in 2004. The anti-trafficking law passed in 2003 recognizes trafficked persons as victims and does not penalize them. Despite limited resources, the Department of Social Welfare and Development (DSWD) continued to provide a range of protective services, including temporary residency status, relief from deportation, shelter, and access to legal, medical, and counseling services. With assistance from the Department of Foreign Affairs, the DSWD also established arrangements with NGOs in destination countries to provide overseas Philippine workers who had been exploited with temporary shelter, counseling, and medical assistance. The government also provided additional protective services, including telephone hotlines for reporting cases of abused/exploited women and children. The Philippine Government increased its efforts to train law enforcement officials and consular officials in all of its embassies to deal with trafficking victims.

Prevention

The government continued modest efforts to raise awareness of trafficking. Senior government officials frequently spoke out about the dangers of trafficking. Fourteen government agencies also coordinate the government's anti-trafficking efforts, much of which is prevention-oriented. The Philippine Government's information campaign on overseas employment resulted in a decline in illegal recruitment and recruitment violations. The government has a national action plan to address trafficking in persons.

EAST TIMOR (TIER 2)

East Timor is a destination country for women trafficked for the purpose of sexual exploitation. The majority of trafficking victims in East Timor are women from Thailand, Indonesia, and the People's Republic of China (P.R.C.) who had been trafficked for commercial sexual exploitation.

The Government of East Timor does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. The government shows the political will to address the problem but lacks the resources to combat trafficking effectively. While the East Timorese Government actively engages with NGOs and regional and international bodies, it continues to have difficulty distinguishing trafficking victims from illegal migrants. Government action should concentrate on adopting a strong and comprehensive anti-trafficking law, arresting and prosecuting traffickers, and improving victim protection measures. The government and the United Nations should also continue to address credible reports that UN peacekeepers are clients of brothels that have trafficked women.

Prosecution

The Government of East Timor's law enforcement efforts against trafficking were modest during the reporting period. The government has not developed the capacity to compile full information on trafficking-related arrests, prosecutions, and convictions. East Timorese authorities conducted sporadic investigations and raids but did not prosecute any trafficking-related cases over the last year. The Immigration and Asylum Act of 2003 criminalizes trafficking for commercial sexual exploitation and for non-sexual purposes but penalties are less severe than penalties for rape and forcible sexual assault. The Ministry of Justice is finalizing a new penal code that will criminalize the activities of pimps and brothel owners/operators. There is a lack of coordination between prosecutors and the police, and law enforcement officials generally lack training.

Protection

Due to a lack of resources, the East Timorese Government provided only sporadic protection and assistance to trafficking victims during the reporting period. Some trafficking victims were repatriated with the help of the government, their embassies, and international organizations. While the government assisted a few victims in finding shelter and protection from NGOs it appears that some victims may have been charged and deported for prostitution and/or immigration violations. The government did not fund foreign and domestic NGOs that provided shelter and access to services for victims.

Prevention

There have been no anti-trafficking campaigns conducted in East Timor, in part because East Timor has not been a country of origin for trafficking victims. While the government continued to recognize that trafficking is a problem, it did not place a priority on trafficking prevention programs. The government has been considering a national action plan.

INDONESIA (TIER 2)

Indonesia is a source and transit country for men, women, and children trafficked internationally for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor, while the country also faces a significant internal trafficking problem. Indonesian victims are trafficked to Malaysia, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, United Arab Emirates, Hong Kong, Taiwan, Japan, South Korea, Singapore, and Australia. To a much lesser extent, Indonesia is a destination for women from the People's Republic of China (P.R.C.), Thailand, Taiwan, Uzbekistan, the Netherlands, Poland, Russia, Venezuela, Spain, and Ukraine who are trafficked for sexual exploitation. Within Indonesia, there is extensive internal trafficking primarily from rural to urban areas for commercial sexual exploitation and for other forced labor such as involuntary domestic servitude.

The Government of Indonesia does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. In 2004, the Indonesian Government showed clear progress in applying greater law enforcement efforts to fighting trafficking and assisting Indonesian victims abroad, including migrant workers who had been trafficked. The government significantly increased its convictions of traffickers and adopted standard operating procedures for the protection of victims. In some Indonesian provinces, local governments drafted and enacted new laws and budgeted resources for anti-trafficking programs. Following the tsunami that devastated Aceh province, the Indonesian Government rapidly responded with appropriate measures to reduce the potential for trafficking of children from the region. While local governments gave greater priority to trafficking, translating national commitment to local action remained a problem. The Indonesian Government can take significant action by passing a strong and comprehensive anti-trafficking law; addressing internal trafficking; recognizing and taking steps to eliminate debt bondage for migrant workers; and arresting and prosecuting officials involved in trafficking.

Prosecution

The Indonesian Government increased its law enforcement efforts against trafficking during the reporting period. Indonesia does not have a comprehensive anti-trafficking law, but a draft bill is currently pending before Parliament. Although Indonesian law criminalizes trafficking, it lacks a comprehensive definition of the crime. In 2004, the government reported 141 trafficking-related investigations, 51 prosecutions, and 45 convictions. The number of convictions reflected an 80 percent increase over the previous year's performance. Although law enforcement efforts increased, convictions for trafficking-related offenses often carried light sentences, with an average sentence of just over three years' imprisonment. The Indonesian Government cooperated with the Malaysian Government in arresting and prosecuting a major network that trafficked Indonesians into Malaysia for commercial sexual exploitation. Corruption and a weak judiciary remain serious impediments to the effective prosecution of traffickers. The government has recognized that action must be taken against officials involved in trafficking, but has provided little information concerning actions it has taken against corrupt officials who may be complicit in trafficking.

Protection

In 2004, the Indonesian Government improved its efforts to provide protection to trafficking victims despite limited resources. National and local victim assistance efforts increased, but remained small in comparison to the scope of the problem. Assistance for internal trafficking victims was minimal. The Indonesian Government continued to operate shelters for Indonesian victims of involuntary servitude and commercial sexual exploitation at its embassies and consulates in Singapore, Malaysia, Saudi Arabia, and Kuwait. The government also operates crisis centers inside the country and cooperates with domestic NGOs and civil society organizations that provide services for victims. The Indonesian Government continued to provide training to officials and law enforcement officers in the handling of witnesses and victims. The Women's Ministry also finalized standard operating procedures used to assist trafficking victims in 2004. Although Indonesia's national action plan calls for proper treatment of trafficking victims, implementation varies widely at the local level.

Prevention

The Indonesian Government made commendable efforts to promote public awareness of trafficking in 2004. The government increasingly used its National Anti-Trafficking Ambassador, a well-known television personality, to raise awareness of trafficking and of the need for more anti-trafficking efforts. Although the government has a limited ability to fund prevention programs, it welcomed international assistance and continued to work with NGOs on anti-trafficking and education initiatives. Most education campaigns focused on warning potential victims about trafficking. Some public education material in the campaign to stop child sex tourism in Batam and Bali contained messages for potential clients of prostitutes. Government-sponsored public awareness campaigns often featured senior officials and included television, radio, and print media.

JAPAN (TIER 2)

Japan is a destination country for a large number of Asian, Latin American, and Eastern European women and children who are trafficked for the purpose of sexual exploitation. There have also been cases of Asian and Latin American men trafficked to Japan for criminal, labor and/or commercial sexual purposes. Japanese organized crime groups (yakuza) that operate internationally are involved in trafficking.

The Government of Japan does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. The government has made an impressive start in providing assistance to trafficking victims, including implementation of a national action plan with modest, additional resources for government-run shelters and private shelters.

The government made substantial efforts to improve the legal framework by drafting penal code revisions which specifically criminalize trafficking and increase penalties for trafficking-related offenses. During the reporting period, the government undertook major reforms to significantly tighten the issuance of entertainer visas to women from the Philippines, a process used by traffickers to enslave thousands of Philippine women in Japan each year. Japan continued to provide support for international anti-trafficking programs and conferences. The foundations that the Government of Japan has laid in the past few months offer promises of results that would place Japan in a leadership role in fighting trafficking.

Prosecution

Japan increased its law enforcement efforts against trafficking during the reporting period. The government uses the penal code and a variety of labor, immigration, and child welfare/protection statutes to prosecute trafficking-related offenses. While Japan's current laws provide for up to ten-year prison terms and steep fines, actual penalties thus far have been much less severe. The government has drafted revisions to the penal code that specifically criminalize trafficking and increase penalties for trafficking-related offenses. Japan's National Police Agency (NPA) reported 58 arrests and 48 prosecutions in 2004, reflecting a significant increase over the previous year's performance. The NPA improved its handling of trafficking cases and provided guidelines on victim identification and treatment to local police forces. The NPA also took concrete steps to increase cooperation with foreign law enforcement agencies on trafficking cases.

Protection
In 2004, the government improved its efforts to protect victims of trafficking. Twenty-two trafficking victims were provided government protection from January through October 2004, a dramatic increase over the previous year. The government implemented a national action plan that provides additional resources for victim protection in government-run shelters and private shelters. Trafficking victims are no longer treated as criminals, and a short grace period allows the government time to develop its cases against traffickers. Japanese authorities referred trafficking victims to government-run prefectural domestic violence shelters and NGO facilities. While the government's prefectural shelters are now open to foreign trafficking victims, few victims use the shelters for fear that they would be sent to an immigration detention center and then deported. The prefectural governments of Tokyo and Kanagawa continued to provide modest funding to NGOs operating shelters for trafficking victims in those prefectures.

Prevention

The government continued its efforts to raise public awareness of violence against women and trafficking. The NPA produced a training video on trafficking and distributed it to all police offices to improve their awareness of trafficking. The government also took major steps to significantly tighten the issuance of entertainer visas to women from the Philippines, a major source of trafficking victims. The government continued to provide support for international anti-trafficking programs to alleviate poverty, raise awareness of the dangers of trafficking, and promote alternative economic opportunities for women. The government, however, has yet to make a significant effort to lessen the domestic demand for trafficking victims.

LAOS (TIER 2)

Laos is a source and, to a lesser extent, transit, and destination country for men and women trafficked for the purposes of forced labor and sexual exploitation. Many Lao victims are economic migrants who become victims of involuntary servitude or commercial sexual exploitation in Thailand. A small number of victims from the People's Republic of China (P.R.C.) and Vietnam are trafficked to Laos to work as street vendors and for sexual exploitation in prostitution. The Government of Laos does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so.

The Lao Government has recognized that trafficking is a problem, and has strongly supported NGO and international organization efforts to assist victims and promote awareness of trafficking. In September 2004, the government passed a Law on Women that covers trafficking in persons. The new law criminalizes trafficking; provides for the protection of victims, both internally and through international cooperation; and prohibits the punishing of trafficking victims upon their return to Laos. Until the new law is implemented effectively at the local level, however, the government should establish an official mechanism to identify trafficking victims among returnees to the country and take necessary measures to ensure that they are not subjected to fines or other punishment by local authorities.

Prosecution

The Government of Laos reportedly increased its prosecution efforts during the reporting period. Lao law enforcement is decentralized, and the central government does not keep data on efforts of local officials to prosecute traffickers. However, the anti-trafficking office, operated jointly by the Ministry of Labor and Social Welfare (MLSW) and the Ministry of Public Security reported five convictions for trafficking-related crimes in 2004. The new Law on Women stipulates specific penalties for trafficking, including the death penalty for the most egregious forms of trafficking, and those that lead to the loss of life or permanent disability. It also contains provisions defining trafficking and recognizing and guaranteeing the rights of trafficking victims. Overall, judicial and law enforcement institutions are extremely weak. Corruption is widespread; some local government officials reportedly profited from trafficking, though there were no reported prosecutions of officials for complicity in trafficking. The Lao Government does not effectively control its long and porous borders.

Protection

While the Lao Government provided minimal assistance to victims, it continued to refer victims to NGOs and international organizations that run protection programs for victims of trafficking. The government continued to expand its engagement with NGOs and requested their assistance in providing vocational training and establishing another shelter for returnees. While the Lao Government recognized the status of trafficking victims and made efforts to educate provincial and district-level officials on the need to protect them, it made minimal efforts to distinguish trafficking victims from returning migrants who had left the country illegally.

Prevention

The government, in cooperation with NGOs, continued to raise awareness in the media of the dangers of trafficking. The MLSW, with NGO funding, has sponsored media messages on the dangers of trafficking and conducted data collection and public education campaigns. In conjunction with UNESCO, the MLSW conducted a radio project designed to raise awareness of trafficking and HIV/AIDS among ethnic minorities. The Ministry of Education also integrated some anti-trafficking information into school curricula.

MALAYSIA (TIER 2)

Malaysia is a destination and, to a lesser extent, a source and transit country for men and women trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor. As many as several thousand women from Thailand, Indonesia, the People's Republic of China (P.R.C.), Cambodia, and Burma are trafficked to Malaysia for commercial sexual exploitation. Additionally, some economic migrants from Indonesia who work as domestic servants and as laborers in the construction and agricultural sectors face exploitative conditions in Malaysia that meet the definition of involuntary servitude. Malaysian women (primarily of Chinese origin) are trafficked to Western Europe, North America, Australia, Japan, Singapore, and Taiwan.

The Government of Malaysia does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. While the government took some steps to combat trafficking, Malaysia lacks comprehensive anti-trafficking legislation to enable officials to provide adequate victim protection and work effectively at the interagency level to combat trafficking in persons. The Ministry for Women, Family, and Community Development announced in December 2004 the establishment of a dedicated shelter for foreign trafficking victims. The National Human Rights Commission (Suhakam) drafted a national action plan on trafficking, though it has not yet been approved by the government. The Malaysian Government should screen illegal migrants detained for immigration violations to identify and provide care for trafficking victims that may be in their midst. The Malaysian Government should draft and enact a comprehensive trafficking law that recognizes trafficked men and women as victims and provides them with shelter, counseling, and assistance in repatriation.

Prosecution

During the reporting period, the Malaysian Government continued efforts to investigate and prosecute trafficking-related cases. Malaysia does not have a law that specifically addresses trafficking in persons but uses existing laws to prosecute traffickers. Twenty individuals were convicted under trafficking statutes in the penal code during the first six months of 2004. The penal code criminalizes most of the acts involved in severe forms of trafficking and those laws carry penalties of up to 15 years' imprisonment. In 2004, the government began to use new amendments to the 2001 Anti-Money Laundering Act to seize the assets of businesses involved in illicit activities, including trafficking. The Malaysian Government reported four such seizures in early 2004. Malaysia does not have a witness protection program that would encourage victims to testify against the criminal syndicates that are responsible for much of the trafficking. There were no reported prosecutions of officials complicit in trafficking.

Protection

In 2004, Malaysia provided an inadequate level of protection for most victims of trafficking. While police procedure is to send victims who can prove their nationality to embassy shelters rather than immigration detention, many victims, including some who agreed to cooperate in prosecutions, were placed in harsh conditions in immigration detention centers to await deportation. Because the police continued to lack the training and language skills to identify trafficking victims among illegal migrants, foreign trafficking victims often went unrecognized and were treated as immigration offenders. The Malaysian Government has not yet implemented a formal screening process to identify trafficking victims but Suhakam has developed a questionnaire for foreign women arrested for prostitution to identify trafficking victims. In December 2004, the Women's Ministry announced the establishment of a dedicated shelter for foreign trafficking victims, though the shelter has yet to open and care for victims. The Malaysian Government provided training for some of its higher-ranking officials but there was no systematic training program to sensitize front line police and immigration officers on trafficking.

Prevention

The Malaysian Government continued efforts to prevent trafficking through public awareness or education campaigns.

The Malaysian Chinese Association (MCA), within the government's ruling political coalition, continued to publish warnings about trafficking in its Chinese-language publications, make public statements to caution potential victims about overly lucrative job offers abroad, and hold periodic press conferences highlighting the plight of returned Malaysian trafficking victims. In 2004, Malaysian state-run television ran a documentary on trafficking victims who had been assisted by MCA. The Women's Ministry is planning a nationwide campaign to increase public awareness on trafficking through seminars, workshops, and dissemination of brochures.

MONGOLIA (TIER 2)

Mongolia is a source and transit country for women and men trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor; it also faces a problem of children trafficked internally for the purpose of commercial sexual exploitation. In 2004, the government documented over 200 Mongolian children exploited as prostitutes. Mongolian women are trafficked to China, Macau, and South Korea for commercial sexual exploitation. There are also reports that Mongolian women have been trafficked to Hungary, Poland, and other East European countries, as well as France and Germany. Some Mongolian men working overseas face exploitative conditions that meet the definition of involuntary servitude - a severe form of trafficking.

The Government of Mongolia does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. The Mongolian Government has acknowledged that trafficking is a problem and has tried to improve its ability to address it. While the government engages NGOs and regional and international organizations on anti-trafficking measures, it lacks the resources to combat trafficking effectively on its own. The Mongolian Government does not systematically monitor its anti-trafficking efforts and some officials lack an understanding of what constitutes trafficking. Government action should concentrate on adopting a strong and comprehensive anti-trafficking law, arresting and prosecuting traffickers, and providing victim protection measures.

Prosecution

The Mongolian Government's law enforcement efforts against trafficking were modest during the reporting period. The government investigated four trafficking-related cases in 2004, but there were no successful prosecutions. Authorities have not developed the capacity to compile full information on trafficking-related arrests, prosecutions, and convictions. Mongolia's criminal code and criminal procedure code contain provisions against trafficking in women and children and prostitution, with penalties of ten to 15 years' imprisonment for trafficking and a maximum of five years' imprisonment for prostitution. The Ministry of Justice and Home Affairs, in coordination with the National Human Rights Commission, is currently reviewing the anti-trafficking provisions of the criminal code in an effort to strengthen the law and make it easier to prosecute traffickers.

Protection

The Mongolian Government did not provide protection and direct assistance to trafficking victims during the reporting period, largely due to resource constraints. The government did not fund foreign and domestic NGOs that provided support for victims.

Prevention

While there were no anti-trafficking campaigns conducted in Mongolia over the last year, the government worked with travel industry representatives and UNICEF to establish a voluntary code of conduct to prevent the sexual exploitation of children in the travel and tourism industry. The Mongolian Government recognized that trafficking is a problem, but it did not place a priority on trafficking prevention programs. During the last year, the government began developing a national action plan to combat trafficking and the commercial sexual exploitation of children.

SINGAPORE (TIER 2)

Singapore is a destination country for a limited number of women and girls trafficked for the purpose of sexual exploitation. Some of the women and girls from the People's Republic of China (P.R.C.), Indonesia, Thailand, Malaysia, the Philippines, and Vietnam who travel to Singapore voluntarily for prostitution or non-sexual work are deceived or coerced into sexual servitude in the city-state. A small minority of foreign domestic workers in Singapore face seriously abusive labor conditions that amount to involuntary servitude, a severe form of trafficking.

The Government of Singapore does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. While Singapore has made improvements to its labor laws and regulations to address abuse of foreign domestic workers, it made limited progress in its efforts to combat trafficking for commercial sexual exploitation. Authorities in Singapore generally tolerate prostitution, which largely involves foreign women, a few of whom are trafficked. The government authorizes the operation of brothels in "traditional redlight districts" and does not criminalize the prostitution of adults and of 16 and 17 year-old minors. Pursuant to international protocols, the government should consider reforming its laws to criminalize the prostitution of 16 and 17 year-old children as a trafficking offense. The government should address child sex tourism by Singaporeans in foreign destinations, and do more to publicize the problem of trafficking for the purpose of commercial sexual exploitation in these destinations, particularly Batam, Indonesia. Singapore should also consider adopting a comprehensive law, containing victim protection measures, for all forms of trafficking.

Prosecution

During the reporting period, the Singapore Government increased its efforts to curb abuses of foreign domestic workers. A small but significant number of Singapore's estimated 140,000 foreign domestic workers continued to experience abusive employment conditions that may amount to involuntary servitude, and the government vigorously prosecuted cases involving such allegations. Singapore does not have a consolidated anti-trafficking law, but its criminal code criminalizes all activities that fall under the UN definition of trafficking. Involuntary servitude is punishable by up to one year in prison, a fine, or both; wrongful confinement is punishable by up to nine years in prison, a fine, or both; slavery is punishable with up to ten years in prison, a fine, and caning. Laws against forced or coerced prostitution carry sentences of up to ten years' imprisonment. In 2004, there were no prosecutions reported for trafficking for commercial sexual exploitation; violators are often prosecuted under other statutes, such as those prohibiting third parties from living off the earnings of a prostitute. The government maintains effective border and immigration controls and there is no evidence that government officials are complicit in trafficking.

Protection

The government provided minimal assistance to trafficking victims in 2004. The government continued to lack a systematic procedure to identify trafficking victims among the foreign women detained for immigration or vice violations; there was no evidence of proactive screening during the detentions of over 4,600 foreign women for prostitution in 2004. The few victims of trafficking for sexual exploitation that are identified by authorities are generally referred to NGO shelters that offer counseling; foreign domestic workers who are victims of involuntary servitude or other abuse are referred to shelters run by their embassies or local NGOs, some of which provide legal assistance. The Singaporean Government, through the Ministry of Community Development, Youth, and Sports, provided counseling and health care for abused foreign domestic workers and victims of commercial sexual exploitation. There are no NGOs in Singapore that focus exclusively on trafficking, but there is one NGO devoted exclusively to helping women in prostitution, and victims often receive assistance from groups dedicated to helping abused women and children. There are several NGOs that assist foreign workers and seek the enactment of enhanced labor protections. The Ministry of Manpower continued to promote the welfare of foreign domestic workers by educating employees and employers on acceptable employment practices, establishing a hotline for foreign domestic workers, enhancing regulations, and undertaking a public outreach campaign on the rights and responsibilities of employers and foreign domestic workers.

Prevention

The Singaporean Government made efforts to raise awareness of trafficking. The government sought to improve awareness of the regulations protecting foreign domestic workers and the consequences of violating those laws, and has taken some steps to raise societal awareness of sex tourism by Singaporeans in an effort to curb demand. There were no specific anti-trafficking campaigns directed at the use of fraud or coercion to recruit foreign women as prostitutes. Singapore has no national action plan to address trafficking.

TAIWAN (TIER 2)

Taiwan is primarily a destination for women and girls, mainly from the People's Republic of China (P.R.C.), who are trafficked for the purpose of sexual exploitation. Some trafficking victims from the P.R.C., Thailand, Cambodia, and Vietnam are forced or coerced into the commercial sex trade or lured to Taiwan by fraudulent offers of employment or marriage. Some Taiwan women are also trafficked to Japan for sexual exploitation.

Taiwan authorities do not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, they are making significant efforts to do so. Taiwan authorities have increased efforts to provide protection for trafficking victims. Despite prosecutions of traffickers, there is insufficient protection for trafficking victims, particularly for women and girls from the P.R.C. While illegal immigrants from other countries are generally quickly repatriated, the P.R.C. often delays Taiwan efforts to assist P.R.C. victims to return home. Taiwan authorities and NGOs have collaborated in ongoing efforts to develop a plan of action on trafficking. Some law enforcement officials conflate trafficking with smuggling. Taiwan laws criminalize most forms of trafficking but do not address prevention of trafficking or victim protection, which the authorities nonetheless provide on an ad hoc basis.

Prosecution

Taiwan lacks a comprehensive trafficking law providing for preventive measures and victim protection, though most forms of human trafficking are criminalized through a number of different statutes. Trafficking of Taiwan residents abroad or children of any nationality is prohibited by the 1995 Statute for Prevention of Child and Juvenile Sexual Trafficking and provisions in Taiwan's Criminal Code. Article 296 criminalizes a broad range of forms of trafficking and servitude. Article 296-1 provides for stronger penalties when the crimes are committed by officials. Taiwan authorities report that they indicted 241 and convicted 150 persons under these statutes in 2004. Taiwan authorities took steps in 2004 to address the growing number of Vietnamese women lured to Taiwan as brides and then forced into prostitution. A more stringent law enacted in January 2004 and aimed at cross-Strait trafficking stipulates that any person found guilty of smuggling Mainland Chinese into Taiwan shall be punished with a prison term of three to ten years and fined up to $150,000. Authorities in late March 2005 broke up a trafficking ring run by two Taiwan Army officers and their wives. A year-long investigation into the ring produced a number of arrests for trafficking of P.R.C. women to Taiwan for exploitation in the sex industry. Taiwan authorities have increased training for law enforcement officials on trafficking issues and how to best assist a victim. In early 2005, Taiwan executed a local trafficker convicted of killing P.R.C. victims.

Protection

Foreign victims of trafficking who are not of P.R.C. origin are provided with shelter and counseling and are generally quickly repatriated. Current Taiwan law provides no legal alternative to the return to the P.R.C. of all unlawfully present

P.R.C. citizens, including trafficking victims. Taiwan has recently increased efforts to provide protection to P.R.C. trafficking victims. Taiwan law enforcement authorities and NGO social workers interview all illegal immigrants in detention centers in order to identify possible trafficking victims. Women and girls identified as trafficking victims are housed in a separate wing, where they are provided with access to social workers, health care, vocational activities, and counseling. Women with children have an additional, separate area within the facility. Identified trafficking victims are exempt from rules that apply to criminal detainees. There is no policy or law that requires the authorities to evaluate whether victims would face persecution or retribution upon returning to the P.R.C. Authorities have established an island-wide toll-free "113 Women's and Children's Protection" hotline.

Prevention

Taiwan law enforcement authorities are working to intercept criminal syndicates that smuggle P.R.C. migrants, including trafficking victims, to Taiwan. Taiwan continued its support of NGO anti-trafficking prevention programs, with government funding for public awareness programs targeting minors and awareness campaigns targeting Southeast Asian women who marry Taiwan men, including publicity campaigns funded by Taiwan in source countries. Taiwan officials have raised public awareness of the dangers of pornography and the use of the Internet to lure children into the sex trade. Social workers automatically visit high-school students with unexcused school absences to provide counseling and to ensure that the children do not fall into the sex trade or other illicit activities.

THAILAND (TIER 2)

Thailand is a source, transit, and destination country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor. Thai women are trafficked to Australia, Bahrain, Japan, Malaysia, Singapore, South Africa, Taiwan, Europe, and North America for commercial sexual exploitation. A significant number of men, women, and children from Burma, Laos, Cambodia, and the People's Republic of China (P.R.C.) are economic migrants who wind up in forced or bonded labor and commercial sexual exploitation in Thailand. Regional economic disparities drive significant illegal migration into Thailand, presenting traffickers opportunities to move victims into labor or sexual exploitation. Internal trafficking also occurs in Thailand, involving victims from Northern Thailand, especially ethnic hill tribe women and girls. Widespread sex tourism in Thailand encourages trafficking for commercial sexual exploitation.

The Government of Thailand does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. Thailand showed clear progress in applying greater law enforcement efforts to fighting trafficking and systematically screening hundreds of thousands of undocumented illegal migrants to identify and provide care for trafficking victims in their midst. The government also made modest progress in addressing widespread trafficking-related corruption within the ranks of the police, immigration services, and judiciary. In November 2004, the Thai Government began a new, intensified effort to improve the vetting procedure used by the police and immigration authorities to identify trafficking victims. While reports suggest increased efforts by police and immigration officials to provide protection to trafficking victims, international organizations and NGOs continue to play an important role in screening of trafficking victims, especially underage victims found in street work. There are reports that child trafficking victims continued to be incarcerated in and deported from Thailand without proper victim care or any attempt to investigate the trafficking crimes committed against these children.

Prosecution

During the reporting period, the Thai Government increased its law enforcement efforts against trafficking. Thailand has a law specifically prohibiting trafficking. In 2004, the government reported 307 trafficking-related arrests, 66 prosecutions, and 12 convictions - an increase in arrests over the previous year's performance. Sentences handed down for trafficking cases remained light, with an average sentence of three years' imprisonment. However, a number of sentences in trafficking cases were severe, with imprisonment of up to 50 years. In early March 2005, a Thai court convicted a Cambodian woman for trafficking eight Cambodian girls to Thailand and Malaysia; the trafficker was sentenced to 85 years' imprisonment. As in previous years, the Thai Government made minimal progress in reducing trafficking-related corruption in the police, immigration services, and judiciary. Law enforcement officials continued to be implicated in facilitating trafficking, but only one police officer was convicted and sentenced to ten years' imprisonment over the past year; prosecutions of 18 others fired in 2003 for complicity in trafficking continues. Thailand is not able to adequately control its long land borders.

Protection

In 2004, the Thai Government continued to provide commendable protection to trafficking victims. The government continued to operate 97 shelters throughout the country for abused women and children, six regional shelters for foreign trafficking victims, and a central shelter outside of Bangkok with capacity for over 500 foreign trafficking victims. The government reportedly identified and provided protection to 108 women and children since the November 2004 institution of the new screening mechanism. Thailand's overseas missions continued to provide support to Thai victims who wish to return home, but limited funding is available to assist their repatriation. The government also provided police and consular officials with training on trafficking issues and dealing with victims.

Prevention

The Thai Government continued its efforts to raise awareness of trafficking. In 2004, the Thai police began an information campaign, which included the distribution of pamphlets and creation of a hotline for reporting suspected cases. The government also continued to support the work of NGOs and international organizations to carry out public awareness campaigns and provide victim support services.

VIETNAM (TIER 2)

Vietnam is a source and destination country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labor and sexual exploitation. Vietnamese women and girls are trafficked to Cambodia, the People's Republic of China (P.R.C.), Hong Kong, Macau, Malaysia, Taiwan, and the Czech Republic for commercial sexual exploitation. A large percentage of the Vietnamese women who are trafficked to Taiwan are lured by fraudulent offers of employment or marriage to Taiwanese men. Labor export companies recruit and send workers abroad. Although there were no confirmed reports during the rating period, some of these laborers were victims of abuses that constitute "involuntary servitude," a severe form of trafficking. To a lesser extent, Vietnam is a destination country for Cambodian children who are trafficked for forced work as beggars. There is also internal trafficking from rural to urban areas.

The Government of Vietnam does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. In July 2004, the government issued a national action plan to combat trafficking for commercial sexual exploitation, as well as a five-year national program for addressing all aspects of Vietnam's anti-trafficking efforts including prevention, prosecution, and protection. In addition to implementing strategies to address trafficking for sexual exploitation, the government took steps to provide greater protection for Vietnamese workers sent abroad by labor export companies. It continued to engage neighboring governments to combat trafficking and cooperated on the repatriation of victims and other cross-border issues.

Prosecution

In 2004, the government continued its anti-trafficking law enforcement efforts, actively investigating trafficking cases, and prosecuting and convicting traffickers. Vietnam has a statute that prohibits commercial sexual exploitation and the trafficking of women and children with penalties ranging up to 20 years' imprisonment. Trafficking for the purpose of labor exploitation is covered under Vietnam's Penal Code. Over the past year, the government's crime statistics office reported 142 prosecutions and 110 convictions specifically related to trafficking in women and children. While some local government officials reportedly profited from trafficking, there were no reported prosecutions of officials for complicity in trafficking. The government does not effectively control its long and porous borders.

Protection

The Vietnamese Government improved its efforts to provide protection to victims during the reporting period by strengthening protections for Vietnamese workers sent abroad by labor export companies. It stationed labor attaches in the nine top labor export receiving countries to look after the welfare of workers and to assist in resolving workplace disputes. The government also increased its oversight of labor export companies, and imposed penalties and sanctions against companies that violated labor laws or regulations. Vietnam's revised labor code has provisions that allow workers to negotiate settlements from labor export companies in cases of fraud or abuse, although precise statistics on these actions were not provided. Trafficking victims in Vietnam are usually not detained, arrested or otherwise punished. However, the government routinely sends women who engage in prostitution within the country to "rehabilitation" detention centers that provide medical treatment, vocational training, and counseling, and seek to deter the women's return to prostitution. The government's rehabilitation efforts lack adequate financial resources and usually take place at the provincial and local levels.

Prevention

While the Vietnamese Government did not implement specific anti-trafficking awareness campaigns in 2004, it raised the issue of trafficking in combination with other information and education programs. In 2004, it cooperated with the Chinese Government and UNICEF on a mass communications effort to educate the public and local government leaders on trafficking. The yearlong campaign included workshops on local laws regarding the commercial sexual exploitation of women and children and training on how to counsel trafficking victims.

2005 BEST PRACTICES

The Republic of Korea (R.O.K.): Cracking Down on Prostitution and Trafficking. In response to a petition by a million Korean women, the R.O.K. passed two significant anti-prostitution and anti-trafficking laws in 2004 aimed at combating the commercial sexual exploitation of women and girls. The laws not only stiffened penalties for trafficking and prostitution, established support mechanisms and facilities for victims, and provided for public awareness and education campaigns, but also reflected the input of the NGO community and the government agencies charged with responsibility for enforcement. The Government of the Republic of Korea backed its new laws with both political will and resources. The new legislation has resulted in the rescue of over 200 victims and the arrests of over 500 traffickers and sex-buyers. The government's efforts have also produced a visible reduction in the commercial sexual exploitation of women and girls and markedly raised public awareness of trafficking and prostitution.

Indonesia: Involving Local Muslim Leaders. Many young girls from impoverished families are educated in Islamic boarding schools (pesantren). The Asia Foundation supports the Fahmina Institute to provide anti-trafficking training materials to pesantren teachers, and to male and female preachers. In January 2005, The Asia Foundation helped organize a meeting of pesantren leaders, resulting in 32 schools forming the Pesantren-Based Alliance for Eliminating Trafficking in Persons in East Java.

Philippines: Public-Private Partnership. NGO Visayan Forum Foundation (VFF) operates four shelters for victims at major Philippine ports, including Manila and Davao. The Philippine Port Authority, police, and shipping companies, including the country's largest passenger shipping company, identify victims, mainly children, transiting the port and turn them over to VFF, which provides housing and protection. VFF then works with police to facilitate investigations and with the Department of Social Welfare and Development (DSWD) to repatriate and counsel victims. At the Davao shelter alone, VFF serves up to 45 victims a week.

(end text)

(Distributed by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State. Web site: <http://usinfo.state.gov>)

LOAD-DATE: June 9, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 States News Service

118 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

June 3, 2005

South Asia Anti-Trafficking Efforts Improve, Report Says; State Department report praises Nepal, Bangladesh, Pakistan

BYLINE: David Shelby, Washington File Staff Writer

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 961 words

Washington -- Three South Asian countries, Nepal, Bangladesh and Pakistan, received praise in the State Department's 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report for their significant efforts to confront the problem of human trafficking over the past year.

Nepal and Bangladesh are both sources of women and children trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation, domestic servitude and forced labor. Pakistan is both a source and destination country for victims of trafficking. Women and girls from South and Central Asia are trafficked to Pakistan for sexual and domestic servitude while Pakistanis are trafficked to the Middle East for bonded labor. Both Bangladeshi and Pakistani boys are trafficked to the Arab Gulf countries to serve as camel jockeys for organized camel racing.

The report also observed that internal trafficking takes place within each country, typically bringing rural women and children to cities in order to work as prostitutes, domestic servants and forced laborers.

The report groups countries into three "tiers," according to their efforts to combat the scourge. Tier 1 groups countries that are in compliance with the minimum standards of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA). Tier 2 includes countries that are not in compliance but are making efforts to comply. Tier 3 groups countries that are not making significant efforts to combat the problem.

The 2005 report moved Nepal from a Tier 2 country to a Tier 1 country, indicating that the Nepalese government is now in compliance with the minimum standards.

"Despite political and security challenges, the government has sustained its efforts to combat trafficking in persons. Nepal has a National Plan of Action to combat trafficking, a draft Human Trafficking Control Bill to strengthen its 1986 anti-trafficking law, and a National Rapporteur on trafficking," the report said.

The report noted that the Nepalese government faces significant challenges in addressing the problem of human trafficking given the country's ongoing Maoist insurgency. It also noted that the Maoist insurgents are responsible for internal trafficking of children, whom they forcibly conscript into military service.

Nevertheless, the report calls the Nepalese government's law enforcement efforts "commendable" and says the government works well with nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) to provide protection and assistance for the victims.

According to the report, the government has established anti-trafficking "vigilance committees" in high-priority districts, conducts mandatory "safe migration" orientation sessions for workers traveling abroad, and carries out national public awareness campaigns.

Bangladesh improved its performance in combating trafficking, moving from a Tier 3 country to a Tier 2 country in the 2005 report, indicating that it has begun making efforts to comply with the minimum standards of the TVPA.

"Over the last year, Bangladesh showed commendable progress in all areas of anti-trafficking efforts," the report stated. "Bangladesh established an inter-ministerial anti-trafficking committee to oversee its national efforts to combat trafficking, created a national anti-trafficking police monitoring unit with presence in all 64 districts, prosecuted an increased number of trafficking and trafficking-related corruption cases, rescued over 161 boys from servitude in the fishing industry, devised and launched a multi-faceted anti-trafficking public awareness campaign, and increased its cooperation with NGOs involved in the fight against trafficking."

The report stated that Bangladesh continues to have difficulty confronting the trafficking problem due to generalized corruption of public officials who in many cases are complicit in the human trade.

Pakistan moved from the "watch list" to the "general list" within the tier-two category, indicating that its efforts to combat trafficking and meet the minimum standards of TVPA have become noticeably more effective over the past year.

"Most notably, [Pakistan] has increased trafficking-related prosecutions and convictions, strengthened implementation of its 2002 Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance, established an Anti-Trafficking Unit within the Federal Investigation Agency, and co-sponsored several public awareness campaigns," the report said.

The report noted that Pakistan obtained 72 convictions on trafficking crimes in 2004 compared to six in 2003. It also said that the Pakistani government has committed itself to providing resources for protection, shelter and repatriation of trafficking victims.

Afghanistan and Sri Lanka remained in the Tier 2 category, indicating that they are working to confront their human-trafficking problems. India remained on the Tier 2 "watch list" due to its inability to show evidence of increased efforts to address the problem, and specifically its failure to empower a national law enforcement entity with an anti-trafficking mandate.

The State Department prepares the annual Trafficking in Persons Report in response to a congressional mandate. In presenting the 2005 report on June 3, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, "The United States has a particular duty to fight this scourge because trafficking in persons is an affront to the principles of human dignity and liberty, upon which this nation was founded."

"We trust that this year's report will raise international awareness of the crime of trafficking and spur governments across the globe to take determined actions against it," she added.

The full text of the report is available on the State Department's Web site.

(The Washington File is a product of the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: June 5, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

119 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

June 3, 2005

Trafficking in Persons Report 2005 - Eurasia; Introduction, Armenia, Azerbaijan, Belarus, Estonia, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyz Republic, Latvia, Lithuania, Moldova, Russia, Tajikistan, Ukraine, Uzbekistan

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILELENGTH: 15163 words

Following are excerpts from the 2005 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report pertaining to Eurasia:

(begin excerpt)

INTRODUCTION

By Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice

Dear Reader:

In his 2005 inaugural address, President Bush gave renewed voice to the hopes and dreams of people around the world who seek lives of freedom. He said, "America will not pretend that the jailed dissidents prefer their chains, or that women welcome humiliation and servitude, or that any human being aspires to live at the mercy of bullies." Yet for millions of people entrapped each year in vicious schemes of labor and sex trafficking, freedom is denied. These trafficking victims are deprived of their most basic human rights and fall into modern-day slavery. President Bush, the Congress, and the American people are united in efforts to eradicate trafficking in persons internationally and within national borders because this global crime opposes the universal value of freedom.

This fifth annual Trafficking in Persons Report, along with the $96 million in anti-trafficking assistance our nation provided to foreign governments and non-government organizations last year, demonstrates our strong commitment to this cause. This year, we included more country analyses as a result of deeper research and a wider range of sources. We also expanded our coverage of labor slavery, especially internal labor trafficking. Forced labor and involuntary servitude are appallingly common, including whole villages working to pay off old debts passed down through generations.

The TIP Report serves to expose these despicable aspects of trafficking. It provokes, lauds, and challenges. Countries including the United States, which is dealing with its own trafficking problem, have been inspired to greater action against human trafficking as a result of this unique compendium. By reading it, we hope you are joining with us in the abolitionist movement of the 21st century to advance freedom for the world's most vulnerable citizens.

Sincerely,

Condoleezza Rice

This Report and subsequent updates are available at <http://www.state.gov/g/tip>

INTRODUCTION

The 2005 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report:

Its Purpose

The Department of State is required by law to submit a report each year to the U.S. Congress on foreign governments' efforts to eliminate severe forms of trafficking in persons. This Report is the fifth annual TIP Report. This Report is intended to raise global awareness and spur foreign governments to take effective actions to counter all forms of trafficking in persons - a form of modern day slavery. The Report has increasingly focused the efforts of a growing community of nations to share information and to partner in new and important ways to fight human trafficking. A country that fails to take significant actions to bring itself into compliance with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking in persons receives a negative "Tier 3" assessment in this Report. Such an assessment could trigger the withholding of non-humanitarian, non-trade-related assistance from the United States to that country. In assessing foreign governments' efforts, the TIP Report highlights the "three P's" - prosecution, protection, and prevention. But a victim-centered approach to trafficking requires us equally to address the "three R's" - rescue, rehabilitation, and reintegration. The law that guides these efforts, the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA), makes clear from its first sentence that the purpose of combating human trafficking is to ensure just and effective punishment of traffickers, to protect their victims, and to prevent trafficking.

[...]

In last year's Report, we used U.S. Government data that disaggregated transnational trafficking in persons by age and gender for the first time. These data showed that, of the estimated 600,000 to 800,000 men, women, and children trafficked across international borders each year, approximately 80 percent are women and girls and up to 50 percent are minors. The data also illustrate that the majority of transnational victims are trafficked into commercial sexual exploitation. With a focus on transnational trafficking in persons, however, these data fail to include millions of victims around the world who are trafficked within their own national borders.

The alarming enslavement of people for purposes of labor exploitation, often in their own countries, is a form of human trafficking that can be hard to track from afar. It may not involve the same criminal organizations profiting from transnational trafficking for sexual exploitation; more often individuals are guilty of, for example, enslaving one domestic servant or hundreds of unpaid, forced workers at a factory.

[...]

Over the next year, the Department of State intends to focus more attention on involuntary servitude and its related manifestations...

The Common Thread of Servitude

[...]

The means by which people are subjected to servitude -- their recruitment and the deception and coercion that may cause movement -- are important factors but factors that are secondary to their compelled service. It is the state of servitude that is key to defining trafficking. As such, "trafficking" denotes the act of placing someone in servitude and everything done knowingly that surrounds or contributes to it. In the popular lexicon, and because of the century-old history of the term in international law, this has been interpreted widely as movement.

A person may travel of his or her own volition to another location within his or her own country or abroad and still fall into a state of involuntary servitude later. The movement of that person to the new location is not what constitutes trafficking; the force, fraud or coercion exercised on that person by another to perform or remain in service to the master is the defining element of trafficking in the modern usage. The person who is trapped in compelled service after initially voluntarily migrating or taking a job willingly is still considered a trafficking victim.

[...]

The Human and Social Costs of Trafficking

Victims of human trafficking pay a horrible price. Psychological and physical harm, including disease and stunted growth, often have permanent effects. In many cases the exploitation of trafficking victims is progressive: a child trafficked into one form of labor may be further abused in another. Another brutal reality of the modern-day slave trade is that its victims are frequently bought and sold many times over -- often sold initially by family members.

Victims forced into sex slavery can be subdued with drugs and subjected to extreme violence. Victims trafficked for sexual exploitation face physical and emotional damage from forced sexual activity, forced substance abuse, and exposure to sexually transmitted diseases including HIV/AIDS. Some victims suffer permanent damage to their reproductive organs. When the victim is trafficked to a location where he or she cannot speak or understand the language, this compounds the psychological damage caused from isolation and domination by traffickers.

The Human Rights Dimension.

Fundamentally, trafficking in persons violates the universal human right to life, liberty, and freedom from slavery in all its forms. Trafficking of children violates the inherent right of a child to grow up in a protective environment and the right to be free from all forms of abuse and exploitation.

Promoting Social Breakdown.

The loss of family and community support networks makes trafficking victims vulnerable to traffickers' demands and threats, and contributes in several ways to the breakdown of social structures. Trafficking tears children from their parents and extended family. The profits from trafficking allow the practice to take root in a particular community, which is then repeatedly exploited as a ready source of victims. The danger of becoming a trafficking victim can lead vulnerable groups such as children and young women to go into hiding, with adverse effects on their schooling or family structure. The loss of education reduces victims' future economic opportunities and increases their vulnerability to being re-trafficked in the future. Victims who are able to return to their communities often find themselves stigmatized or ostracized. Recovery from the trauma, if it ever occurs, can take a lifetime.

Fueling Organized Crime.

The profits from human trafficking fuel other criminal activities. According to the U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation, human trafficking generates an estimated $9.5 billion in annual revenue. It is closely connected with money laundering, drug trafficking, document forgery, and human smuggling. Where organized crime flourishes, governments and the rule of law are undermined and weakened.

Depriving Countries of Human Capital and Inhibiting Development.

Trafficking has a negative impact on labor markets, contributing to an irretrievable loss of human resources. Some effects of trafficking include depressed wages, fewer individuals left to care for an increasing number of elderly persons, and an undereducated generation. These effects lead to the loss of future productivity and earning power. Forcing children to work that denies them access to education can reinforce the cycle of poverty and illiteracy that stunts national development. When forced or bonded labor involves a significant part of a country's population, this form of trafficking retards the country's development, as generation after generation of these victims remain mired in poverty.

Public Health Costs.

Victims of trafficking often endure brutal conditions that result in physical, sexual, and psychological trauma. Sexually transmitted infections, pelvic inflammatory disease, and HIV/AIDS are often the result of being used in prostitution. Anxiety, insomnia, depression, and post-traumatic stress disorder are common psychological manifestations among trafficked victims. Unsanitary and crowded living conditions, coupled with poor nutrition, foster a host of adverse health conditions such as scabies, tuberculosis, and other communicable diseases. The most egregious abuses are often borne by children, who are more easily controlled and forced into domestic service, armed conflict, and other hazardous forms of work.

Erosion of Government Authority.

Many governments struggle to exercise full law enforcement authority over their national territory, particularly where corruption is prevalent. Armed conflicts, natural disasters, and political or ethnic struggles can create large populations of internally displaced persons, who could be vulnerable to trafficking. Human trafficking operations further undermine government efforts to exert authority, threatening the security of vulnerable populations. Many governments are unable to protect women and children kidnapped from their homes and schools or from refugee camps. Moreover, the bribes paid to law enforcement, immigration, and judicial officials impede a government's ability to battle corruption from within government ranks.

The Methods of Traffickers

Slave traders prey on the vulnerable. Their targets are often children and young women, and their ploys are creative and ruthless, designed to trick, coerce, and win the confidence of potential victims. Very often these ruses involve promises of marriage, employment, educational opportunities, or a better life...

The Myriad Causes of Trafficking

The causes of human trafficking are complex and often reinforce each other. Viewing trafficking in persons as a global market, victims constitute the supply, and abusive employers or sexual exploiters (also known as sex buyers) represent the demand.

The supply of victims is encouraged by many factors including poverty, the attraction of perceived higher standards of living elsewhere, lack of employment opportunities, organized crime, violence against women and children, discrimination against women, government corruption, political instability, and armed conflict. In some societies a tradition of fostering allows the third or fourth child to be sent to live and work in an urban center with a member of the extended family (often, an "uncle"), in exchange for a promise of education and instruction in a trade. Taking advantage of this tradition, traffickers often position themselves as employment agents, inducing parents to part with a child, but then traffic the child to work in prostitution, domestic servitude, or a commercial enterprise. In the end, the family receives few if any wage remittances, the child remains unschooled and untrained and separated from his or her family, and the hoped-for educational and economic opportunities never materialize.

On the demand side, factors driving trafficking in persons include the sex industry and the growing demand for exploitable labor. Sex tourism and child pornography have become worldwide industries, facilitated by technologies such as the Internet, which vastly expand the choices available to "consumers" and permit instant and nearly undetectable transactions. Trafficking is also driven by the global demand for cheap, vulnerable, and illegal labor. For example, there is great demand in some prosperous countries of Asia and the Gulf for domestic servants who sometimes fall victim to exploitation or involuntary servitude.

[...]

Effective Strategies in Combating Trafficking

To be effective, anti-trafficking strategies must target both the supply side, the traffickers - and the demand side - the owners or, in the case of trafficking for sexual exploitation, the sex buyers - of this ugly phenomenon.

On the supply side, the conditions that drive trafficking must be dealt with through programs that alert communities to the dangers of trafficking, improve and expand educational and economic opportunities to vulnerable groups, promote equal access to education, educate people regarding their legal rights, and create better and broader life opportunities.

Regarding traffickers, law enforcement must vigorously prosecute traffickers and those who aid and abet them; fight public corruption which facilitates and profits from the trade; identify and interdict trafficking routes through better intelligence gathering and coordination; clarify legal definitions of trafficking and coordinate law enforcement responsibilities; and train personnel to identify and direct trafficking victims to appropriate care.

On the demand side, persons who exploit trafficked persons must be identified and prosecuted. Employers of forced labor and exploiters of victims trafficked for sexual exploitation must be named and shamed. With regard to sex slavery, awareness-raising campaigns must be conducted in destination countries to make it harder for trafficking to be concealed or ignored. Victims must be rescued from slave-like living and working situations, rehabilitated, and reintegrated into their families and communities.

Local, state, national, and regional programs to fight trafficking must be coordinated. By drawing public attention to the problem, governments can enlist the support of the public in the fight against trafficking. Anti-trafficking strategies and programs developed with input from stakeholders (civil society and NGOs) are the most effective and likely to succeed as they bring a comprehensive view to the problem. Coordination and cooperation-whether national, bilateral, or regional-will leverage country efforts and help rationalize the allocation of resources. Nations should cooperate more closely to deny traffickers legal sanctuary and facilitate their extradition for prosecution. Such cooperation should also aim to facilitate the voluntary and humane repatriation of victims.

Knowledge about trafficking must be continually improved, and the network of anti-trafficking organizations and efforts strengthened. Religious institutions, NGOs, schools, community associations, and traditional leaders need to be mobilized and drawn into the struggle. Victims and their families are important stakeholders in the fight against trafficking. Governments need to periodically reassess their anti-trafficking strategies and programs to ensure they remain effective to counter new methods and approaches by traffickers.

Finally, government officials must be trained in anti-trafficking techniques and methods, and trafficking flows and trends must be closely monitored to better understand the nature and magnitude of the problem so that appropriate policy responses can be crafted to tackle trafficking.

[...]

How the Report Is Used

This Report is a diplomatic tool for the U.S. Government to use as an instrument for continued dialogue, encouragement, and a guide to help focus resources on prosecution, protection, and prevention programs and policies. The Department will continue to engage governments about the content of the Report in order to strengthen cooperative efforts to eradicate trafficking. In the coming year, and particularly in the months before a determination is made regarding sanctions for Tier 3 countries, the Department will use the information gathered in the compilation of this Report to more effectively target assistance programs and to work with countries that need help in combating trafficking. The Department hopes the Report will be a catalyst for government and non-government efforts to combat trafficking in persons around the world.

Methodology

The Department of State prepared this Report using information from U.S. embassies, meetings with foreign government officials, NGOs and international organizations, published reports, research trips to every region, and the information submitted to the e-mail address (tipreport@state.gov) which was established for NGOs and individuals to report information on government progress in addressing trafficking. Our diplomatic posts reported on the trafficking situation and governmental action based on thorough research, including meetings with a wide variety of government officials, local and international NGO representatives, international organizations, officials, journalists, academics, and victims.

To compile this year's Report, the Department took a fresh look at sources of information on every country to make the assessments in this report. Assessing each government's anti-trafficking efforts involved a two-step process:

Step One: Significant Numbers of Victims

First, the Department determined whether a country is "a country of origin, transit, or destination for a significant number of victims of severe forms of trafficking," generally on the order of 100 or more victims, the same threshold applied in previous reports. Some countries for which such information was not available were not given tier ratings, but are included in the Special Case section, as they exhibited indications of trafficking.

Step Two: Tier Placement

The Department placed each of the countries included on the 2005 TIP Report into one of the three lists, described here as tiers, mandated by the TVPA. This placement is based on the extent of a government's actions to combat trafficking. The Department first evaluates whether the government fully complies with the TVPA's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. Governments that do are placed in Tier 1. For other governments, the Department considers whether they made significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance. Governments that are making significant efforts to meet the minimum standards are placed in Tier 2. Those countries whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so are placed in Tier 3. Finally, the Special Watch List criteria are considered and, if applicable, Tier 2 countries are placed on the Tier 2 Watch List. As required by the TVPA, in making tier determinations between Tiers 2 and 3, the Department considers the overall extent of human trafficking in the country; the extent of government noncompliance with the minimum standards, particularly the extent to which government officials have participated in, facilitated, condoned, or are otherwise complicit in trafficking; and, what measures are reasonable to bring the government into compliance the minimum standards in light of the government's resources and capabilities.

[...]

Regardless of tier placement, every country can do more, including the United States. No country placement is permanent. All countries must maintain and increase efforts to combat trafficking. The United States will continue to monitor progress throughout the world and work with its partners to strengthen international efforts to eliminate all forms of modern-day slavery.

2005 TIP REPORT INTERNATIONAL BEST PRACTICES

[...]

Estonia: Raising Awareness. To raise public awareness about trafficking in persons among students, the Estonian Government sponsored two essay competitions in spring 2004 for young people to write on the issues of prostitution and human trafficking. The subject was, "How could I fall into the hands of traffickers?"

[...]

HEROES ACTING TO END MODERN-DAY SLAVERY

[...]

Adiba Umarova, Journalist, Tajikistan

As a result of a U.S. Government-funded program for media professionals in Tajikistan, reporter Adiba Umarova investigated a labor migration trafficking scam that had been dismissed from court. Her investigation led to the re-opening of the case and the re-arrest of the ringleader of the trafficking syndicate. The scam involved a group of men from Charku Village, who were deceived by an advertisement in a local newspaper promising work in Russia. After arriving in Moscow, the workers' passports were taken. They were forced to work in a landfill site to repay debts incurred for transportation. Several managed to escape and return to Tajikistan where they pushed for the arrest of the local scam leader.

When the suspect was quickly released from custody without a satisfactory investigation, Ms. Umarova pursued the case beyond local officials to the regional prosecutor's office, which took an interest in the case and reopened the investigation. A short documentary was produced to highlight this story, which emphasizes important themes of forced labor abuse and local corruption.

[...]

COMBATING TRAFFICKING: THE INVALUABLE ROLE OF THE MEDIA

The media plays an indispensable role in educating us about the many manifestations of global human trafficking, presenting the problem in human terms and in all its painful detail. Yet media coverage is weak in many parts of the world. Some news media outlets are not yet aware of the trafficking phenomenon, or confuse it with other issues such as illegal migration and alien smuggling. The media's role is most effective when it:

--Illuminates the problem. By writing an article or airing a segment focusing on trafficking in persons, media not only educates the public but also shines a light on an issue typically shrouded in darkness. We know of many cases, particularly in corrupt systems, in which scrutiny by international media has made the difference between a trafficker's release or imprisonment.

--Provides a help line. When the media prints or airs an item on trafficking, it is beneficial to include a local anti-trafficking help line number and other assistance sources, for potential victims and community members who may want to get involved.

--Shames the perpetrators. Identify traffickers and protect victims. Press accounts tend to focus on victims. It is ethical and respectful for the media to protect victims by altering details of identity and personal story. Identify and photograph traffickers - they deserve the limelight.

The Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons has a Public Affairs and Outreach Section that is eager to hear from you. Please join us in the fight against trafficking: tipoutreach@state.gov, or (202) 312-9639.

ARMENIA (TIER 2 - WATCH LIST)

Armenia is a source and, to a lesser extent, a transit and destination country for women and girls trafficked for sexual exploitation largely to the United Arab Emirates (U.A.E.) and Turkey. Some evidence indicates that Armenian victims were trafficked to other European countries as well. According to UN estimates, up to 1,000 Armenian women work as prostitutes in the U.A.E. and Turkey, most of whom are victims of trafficking. The Government of Armenia does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. Armenia is placed on Tier 2 Watch List this year because of its failure to show evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking over the past year. Specifically, the government failed to disseminate or implement any elements of its January 2004 National Action Plan. The government should take proactive steps to officially distribute, publicly support, and implement this plan as soon as possible. Notably, trafficking-related prosecutions and convictions increased; however, reluctance to apply the new anti-trafficking statute produced insufficient penalties. The government adopted an anti-corruption program and created a task force in 2004; however, it failed to take any measures beyond issuing a rhetorical pledge to address trafficking-related complicity.

Prosecution

Article 132 of the criminal code prohibits trafficking in persons and provides for a maximum penalty of four to eight years' imprisonment. However, the government overwhelmingly applied Article 262 of the criminal code - a lighter pimping charge. Out of 16 convictions in 2004, the government applied the 2003 anti-trafficking statute (Article 132) only once; the remaining 15 convictions under Article 262 produced much weaker penalties. While the government increased the overall number of trafficking-related convictions, the cases produced outcomes ranging from six-month to two-year sentences, suspended sentences, corrective labor and fines. These penalties are not commensurate with Armenian penalties for other grave crimes, such as rape. Indications of official collusion and complicity among government officials hampered the government's efforts to adequately tackle Armenia's trafficking problem. Members of the Prosecution allegedly assisted traffickers and border guards accepted bribes facilitating traffickers' movements across the border. The government failed to investigate or prosecute government officials complicit in trafficking.

Protection

Armenia's anti-trafficking law enforcement efforts remained anemic over the last year. While Armenia's law provides trafficking victims with protection, the government largely failed to provide this assistance during the reporting period. NGOs and international organizations continued to provide the majority of victim protection and widely reported good cooperation with the government. The government did not issue any formalized or standard operating procedures for police to follow when encountering possible victims of trafficking. In the absence of a formalized referral mechanism, police informally referred victims to local NGOs. Police also referred potential victims of sexual exploitation for medical screening and treatment as necessary. The rights of victims were generally respected. The police often failed, however, to treat victims' identities with confidentiality. Victim assistance programs reported sheltering 15 victims in 2004.

Prevention

Cooperation between the government and NGOs continued to help raise awareness about trafficking in Armenia. The government sustained its program of providing housing to vulnerable children released from Armenian orphanages. The Department of Migration and Refugees initiated anti-trafficking discussions on several local talk shows. Lack of official recognition of the problem within many sectors of the government, however, contributed to the overall lack of progress. In a recent interview, the Minister of Justice declared that "trafficking does not exist as a phenomenon in Armenia." Informally, the government made a preliminary effort to engage bilaterally with Georgia, but did not develop any proactive programs to assist Armenian victims in transit or destination countries.

AZERBAIJAN (TIER 2 - WATCH LIST)

Azerbaijan is primarily a country of origin and transit for women and children trafficked for the purpose of sexual exploitation. Azerbaijani, Russian, Ukrainian, and Central Asian women and girls were trafficked from or through the country to the United Arab Emirates (U.A.E.), Turkey, Pakistan, and India. Internal trafficking of women and girls appeared to be an increasing problem. There were some reports of men trafficked to neighboring countries (e.g., Turkey and Russia) for forced labor. The Government of Azerbaijan does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. The Government of Azerbaijan is placed on Tier 2 Watch List for a second consecutive year because of its inability to show evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking over the reporting period. The government's efforts remained in preliminary stages of implementation. However, government recognition and acknowledgement of the problem increased and progress was made in a few notable areas, particularly in the drafting of anti-trafficking legislation and amendments to the criminal code. In addition, the government increased the number of its trafficking investigations and established an anti-trafficking police unit. The Government of Azerbaijan should ensure full implementation of its national action plan, formalize a victim referral and protection system, provide adequate anti-trafficking training for police, and properly vet officers on the anti trafficking unit.

Prosecution

Anti-trafficking law enforcement efforts in Azerbaijan remained anemic during the last year. The government drafted anti-trafficking legislation and amendments to the criminal code, but did not officially adopt them during 2004. The government continued its use of trafficking-related charges of slavery, rape, coercion into prostitution and inducing a minor into prostitution to investigate trafficking crimes. The government in 2004 reported 106 trafficking-related investigations, ten of which resulted in convictions - a decrease from 20 convictions in 2003. Eight perpetrators received one-year prison sentences and two female offenders were reportedly released because they had children. The government created a special anti-trafficking police unit and developed operational guidelines for the unit, though the unit's members were not vetted according to international standards. Reports of official complicity continued during the reporting period, yet the government failed to investigate or prosecute any new cases of official corruption during the year. In January 2005, a new anti-corruption law adopted by the Government of Azerbaijan came into force; it aims to reduce corruption and increase professionalism, particularly among police and customs officials.

Protection

During the reporting period, the government did not show evidence of employing a formal referral mechanism or specialized protections for trafficking victims but did informally refer victims to state healthcare facilities, international organizations, and some local NGOs for assistance. The government continued to provide mandatory health screening and treatment to women in prostitution, many of whom the government believes fit the trafficking profile. As previously recommended, the government did not provide these individuals with information on trafficking. The Cabinet of Ministers identified property that will be used to house a shelter for trafficking victims.

Prevention

In May 2004, the President issued an official decree ordering all government bodies to implement Azerbaijan's National Action Plan and named the Deputy Minister of Internal Affairs as National Coordinator for Trafficking. International organizations and NGOs conducted the bulk of anti-trafficking prevention activities; however, cooperation and participation from local government officials increased slightly. A local NGO provided some anti-trafficking training to police. For the first time in 2004, Azerbaijani consular officers began to report potential trafficking cases to international organizations. The government targeted prevention efforts at populations vulnerable to being trafficked and funded the construction of permanent housing for internally displaced persons. The government continued its communication with neighboring governments on transnational crime issues, including trafficking in persons.

BELARUS (TIER 2)

Belarus is primarily a source country for women and children trafficked to Europe, North America, the Middle East, and Japan for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor. Approximately one-fifth of the victims IOM assisted in 2004 were trafficked for labor exploitation. Organizations reported an increase in men trafficked for forced labor to Russia during the reporting period. Belarus' borders with Russia and Ukraine remained porous, allowing for the easy movement of people. The Government of Belarus does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. In early March 2005, President Lukashenko signed a presidential decree to combat trafficking in persons; the lower house of parliament approved the decree in early April. Belarus continued to increase its law enforcement efforts, but it lacked adequate funding for victim protection and trafficking prevention. To advance anti-trafficking efforts, Belarus should adopt amendments to strengthen anti-trafficking legislation including defining victims' rights. The interagency task force should meet regularly. Also, as a major source country, Belarus should provide the training and funding its overseas personnel need to assist trafficking victims.

Prosecution

Belarusian anti-trafficking enforcement efforts increased during the reporting period. Law enforcement authorities prosecuted 290 trafficking cases in 2004, up from 191 in 2003. To detect victims and trafficking schemes, the State Border Guards worked with former trafficking victims. Existing 2001 anti-trafficking legislation prohibits trafficking for the purpose of sexual exploitation with sufficiently severe penalties. Prosecutors and judges improved their use of this law in 2004; the government secured the first conviction under it in July. The government deals with trafficking for labor exploitation under a separate article with sentences of up to three years' imprisonment. In total, Belarusian courts convicted 26 individuals for trafficking and recruiting for sexual exploitation. In 2004, the courts imposed penalties for trafficking of three to eight years' imprisonment. In 2004, Belarusian authorities cooperated on trafficking cases with their counterparts from Germany, Austria, Israel, Turkey, the Netherlands, France, the United Kingdom, and Poland. While reports continued of bribes to law enforcement and border officials for ignoring trafficking activities, in 2004 the government made strong statements condemning such inducements. In February 2005, the courts found a Ministry of Culture official guilty of complicity in trafficking for sexual exploitation from January 2001 to April 2003. The court sentenced him to eight years' imprisonment and confiscated his personal property.

Protection

The Belarusian Government did not directly fund victim assistance during the reporting period, though it gave some in-kind support to NGOs. In July 2004, the Minsk city government provided building space for an EU/UNDP-funded shelter. The government integrated into its law enforcement training academy an IOM-produced anti-trafficking operations manual that provides guidance on victim detection methods and approaches to working with and assisting victims. According to the Ministry of Interior, it did not arrest, fine, or charge victims with prostitution or immigration violations in 2004; it made 110 direct referrals to IOM during the reporting period. Witness protection of trafficking victims remained inadequate. Overall, Belarusian law and society continued to consider women "victims" only if they were unaware prior to their trafficking ordeal that they would be involved in prostitution; even then, they often suffered as social outcasts.

Prevention

While the government did not conduct independent anti-trafficking information campaigns in 2004, it actively supported those of international organizations. The government aired anti-trafficking public service announcements produced by international organizations on State television channels free of charge. In January 2005, a State-owned television channel aired the UNDP documentary film, Ally's Dream, which is about Belarusian girls trafficked to Germany and Russia for sexual exploitation. The documentary also ran in selected theaters with strong advertising to students. The government's Task Force to Combat Trafficking did not convene during the reporting period.

ESTONIA (TIER 2)

Estonia is primarily a source and transit country for a small number of women and children trafficked internally and abroad - to surrounding Nordic and EU countries for the purpose of sexual exploitation. New information shows that Estonian victims include both ethnic Estonians and those that are Russian-speaking natives from the country's northeast. Victims transiting through Estonia are mainly from neighboring countries, such as Russia and Latvia. The Government of Estonia does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. The deputy under secretaries of four principal ministries met regularly during the reporting period to coordinate Estonia's efforts to combat trafficking in persons. In 2004, police raided and closed 28 of an estimated 45 brothels in Estonia. Still, the number of trafficking victims assisted remained low, as did the sentences imposed on convicted traffickers.

Prosecution

Estonia's enforcement record improved over the reporting period, from no convictions in 2003 to nine trafficking-related convictions during the reporting period. While this is a significant improvement, only two of the nine convicted are currently serving time in prison. Trafficking in persons is prohibited in Estonia under related criminal articles on enslavement and abduction with maximum penalties of 12 years' imprisonment. In February 2005, the Government of Estonia prosecuted its first anti-trafficking case under the enslavement statute, convicting four traffickers and sentencing two of those to four years' imprisonment each and two to sentences of only two years and four months of probation. The courts convicted five remaining persons involved in the case under other statutes such as forcing minors into prostitution and pimping, and sentenced them to conditional probation. Estonian law enforcement investigated an additional ten trafficking-related cases during the reporting period. The Estonian Government incorporated trafficking-specific training at the Police Academy, the Border Guard School, and the Public Service Academy in 2004. Law enforcement officials attended prevention, recognition, and prosecution training events, at which some trained social workers and police to work together.

Protection

During the reporting period, the Estonian Government continued to increase its funding of crime victim assistance programs that apply to trafficking victims. Each Estonian county has been assigned a Victim Assistant who is able to provide trafficking and other victims access to the public assistance system. Victim Assistants are paired with police and provided space in police prefectures to better assist victims. During the reporting period, one trafficking victim received shelter and three received counseling. Law enforcement officials did not provide clear information on how they deal with foreign trafficking victims, particularly from Russia. In accordance with a Baltic States agreement on witness protection, Estonia provided witness protection to a trafficking victim of a neighboring country in 2004. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs organized consular officer training in April 2004 specifically tailored to teach consuls how to assist trafficking victims.

Prevention

In its efforts to raise public awareness about trafficking in persons, the Estonian Government in spring 2004 sponsored two essay competitions for young people to write on the issues of prostitution and trafficking. The Ministry of Social Affairs and the Nordic Council of Ministers initiated in May 2004 a public awareness project called, "Drugs, Prostitution, and Trafficking from a Gender Perspective," which demonstrated the correlation of these issues. The government completed its first draft of a national action plan against trafficking in December 2004. In January 2005, the government appointed the Ministry of Justice to lead and coordinate Estonia's anti-trafficking efforts. Estonia's National Roundtable on Trafficking continued to meet, though it was supplanted to some extent by a high-level interagency group comprised of the Ministries of Justice, Interior, Foreign Affairs, and Social Affairs that met on several occasions at the deputy under secretary level.

GEORGIA (TIER 2)

Georgia is a source and transit country for women and men trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor. Victims are trafficked through Georgia from Ukraine, Russia, and other former Soviet republics to destinations such as Turkey, United Arab Emirates, Greece, Western Europe, and the United States. Evidence suggests there is some internal trafficking within Georgia, though only one case has been confirmed in the last two years. The Government of Georgia does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. The government took steps to implement several of its commitments, yet some important pledges remain unfulfilled. The government established and adequately supported a new police anti-trafficking unit, replacing the previous administration's dysfunctional anti-trafficking unit under the Ministry of Interior. In addition, the government revised and publicly endorsed a comprehensive National Action Plan, appointed a primary point of contact for trafficking, and established an interagency commission. The government identified few victims for protection and assistance. The government should take proactive steps to fully implement its action plan, implement and formalize a victim referral mechanism with NGO assistance, ensure increased victim identification, and continue special law enforcement training programs. In addition, the government should ensure that up-to-date, comprehensive law enforcement statistics are collected and disseminated, perhaps via the interagency commission on trafficking.

Prosecution

In January 2005, the government established and adequately funded a new anti-trafficking unit with a staff of 49 operating in Tbilisi and throughout Georgia. In its first few months the unit investigated 13 cases and arrested 30 traffickers. In one case, the unit arrested some members of an international ring operating in Georgia, Turkey, and Azerbaijan and shared information with law enforcement counterparts in Azerbaijan and Turkey to identify and arrest the Azeri and Turkish traffickers. In 2004, three traffickers were convicted and sentenced to eight to 12 years' imprisonment. The Ministry of Justice has also drafted a new law in collaboration with a legal NGO to address deficiencies in the current legislation, particularly to release victims from criminal liability and assure the right to refuse to give evidence or testimony. Furthermore, the government increased its recognition of trafficking-related corruption and took some action against complicit officials. In August 2004 and February 2005, the government arrested and charged three passport officials with facilitating trafficking.

Protection

Georgia continued to offer an inadequate level of protection for victims of trafficking during the reporting period. The government maintains no shelters for trafficking victims; however a domestic violence NGO provided temporary shelter for some victims. Although the government failed to create a formalized system for referring trafficking victims to the NGO shelter, police made a number of informal referrals to NGOs and international organizations over the last year. The government established and successfully implemented a policy to protect the identity of trafficking victims. In one case early in the reporting period, police investigators verbally mistreated victims during initial interrogations. The Police Academy has since instituted formal trafficking awareness and sensitivity training for all new officers. Since January 2005, the new anti-trafficking unit successfully identified 15 victims and informally referred them to temporary shelter and other resources.

Prevention

In 2004, the government initiated some anti-trafficking public awareness efforts and continued to participate in prevention programs including the airing of public service announcements with NGOs and international organizations. Senior government officials spoke out about trafficking and the government's new action plan. Although the government has not yet allocated specific funds to implement the new action plan, several ministries redirected funds from their budgets to underwrite anti-trafficking efforts. The government upgraded and enhanced the security features of Georgian passports to render passport fraud more difficult. After the discovery of four trafficking victims recruited from a specific area, the anti-trafficking unit proactively disseminated information in the neighborhood and in local colleges and schools to educate and prevent possible further victims.

KAZAKHSTAN (TIER 2)

Kazakhstan is a source, transit, and destination country for people trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor. Kazakhstani men, women, and children are trafficked to the United Arab Emirates (U.A.E.), Turkey, Israel, South Korea, Greece, Cyprus, Russia, Syria, and Western Europe. Persons from other countries in Central Asia, particularly Uzbekistan, are trafficked through or to Kazakhstan primarily for forced labor in construction and agriculture. Internal trafficking occurs from rural to urban areas for the purposes of both sexual and labor exploitation. Small trafficking rings, employment and travel agencies, and marriage brokers are often involved in trafficking individuals out of Kazakhstan. The Government of Kazakhstan does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. Kazakhstan's interagency National Working Group on Trafficking in Persons met regularly and made progress in implementing the National Action Plan adopted in February 2004. The government incorporated anti-trafficking curricula at high schools and universities, and local governments and NGOs throughout Kazakhstan concluded formal agreements of cooperation. The government should adopt amendments it has drafted to strengthen its anti-trafficking legislation, support legislative and prosecutorial initiatives to increase convictions and penalties, and considerably increase funds for trafficking victim assistance and prevention programs.

Prosecution

The Government of Kazakhstan increased its convictions of traffickers during the reporting period, although prosecution numbers remain low relative to the size of the problem. The Kazakhstani Criminal Code covers trafficking for the purposes of sexual or other exploitation both internally and abroad. The government has drafted a set of amendments to strengthen anti-trafficking legislation by more clearly defining trafficking, increasing penalties, and improving protection of victims. Law enforcement conducted 27 trafficking-related investigations during the last year. The courts prosecuted 14 cases and convicted 12 traffickers. However, only five of these traffickers are currently serving prison time; the rest received suspended sentences. Among other training events, the Ministry of Internal Affairs held a conference on trafficking in December 2004 for law enforcement from all parts of the country. In 2004, Kazakhstan cooperated on trafficking investigations with Uzbekistan, Russia, and the U.A.E. Evidence exists of some government officials' complicity in trafficking. During the reporting period, the government investigated two higher-level officials suspected of aiding trafficking rings.

Protection

Kazakhstan increased its efforts to protect trafficking victims in 2004; however, protection and assistance to victims remained inadequate mainly due to lack of government resources. The government grants temporary residency to identified trafficking victims to ensure safe repatriation or participation in criminal proceeding against their traffickers, though this residency is not specifically guaranteed by law. Local law enforcement officials have a mechanism to refer victims to crisis centers and shelters based on formal agreements with NGOs. The government provided a small amount of funding to the Union of Crisis Centers in 2004, whose member NGOs run nationwide trafficking hotlines and shelters to assist all types of victims, including trafficking victims. In the city of Ust-Kamenogorsk, the local government provided room, board, and protection for trafficking victims, in conjunction with a local NGO. Shelters reported effective coordination with local law enforcement to increase patrols and respond quickly to calls. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs assisted in the repatriation of 36 Kazakhstani citizens from abroad, up from 24 in 2003.

Prevention

Public information about trafficking and education campaigns sponsored by the government has led to greater awareness of the risks of traveling abroad for employment. The government incorporated an anti-trafficking component into curricula at high schools, vocational schools, and universities, and required private and state television and radio stations to broadcast anti-trafficking public service announcements. The government covered the costs of disseminating information packets to media outlets with information on assistance hotlines and government efforts to combat trafficking. Law enforcement agencies continued to undertake unannounced inspections and investigations of travel and employment agencies. Kazakhstan's National Action Plan is publicly available and lays out a multi-year strategy to combat trafficking.

KYRGYZ REPUBLIC (TIER 2)

The Kyrgyz Republic is a source and transit country and, to a lesser degree, a destination country for persons trafficked for the purpose of labor exploitation - to Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan for agricultural labor; to Russia for labor in agriculture, industry, commerce, and construction; and to China for bonded labor. Kyrgyz women and girls are trafficked for the purpose of sexual exploitation to the United Arab Emirates (U.A.E.), China, South Korea, Turkey, Greece, Cyprus, Thailand, and Syria. Researchers in 2004 concluded that 80 percent of Kyrgyz women trafficked abroad for sexual exploitation ended up in the U.A.E. Smaller numbers of trafficking victims transited the Kyrgyz Republic from Uzbekistan and South Asia to Russia, Turkey, and Europe. In 2004, the Kyrgyz Republic was a destination country for Uzbek women trafficked for sexual exploitation. Internal trafficking occurred from poor, rural areas to larger cities. An estimated 295,000 Kyrgyz migrant laborers work illegally in Russia, making them vulnerable to being trafficked. The Government of the Kyrgyz Republic does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. The government adopted a new comprehensive anti-trafficking law in January 2005 and focused its prevention efforts on protecting migrant laborers abroad. While the government's victim protection efforts remained lacking, it donated space for a trafficking shelter. The government should amend the Kyrgyz Criminal Code to bring its new anti-trafficking law into force and update its 2002 to 2005 Action Plan to Combat Trafficking in Persons.

Prosecution

The Kyrgyz Government improved its law enforcement efforts with the May 2004 creation of a dedicated anti-trafficking enforcement unit, formed from a unit previously established in June 2003. Authorities produced 31 indictments and 17 convictions for trafficking-related offenses, including recruitment for sexual or labor exploitation and marriage to underage persons. Three of these convictions fell under the Kyrgyz Republic's 2003 amended criminal code criminalizing trafficking in persons; information on sentences in these cases was not available at the time of this report. The Kyrgyz anti-trafficking law prohibits all types of trafficking with sufficiently severe penalties. Over the last year, authorities shut down seven recruitment agencies and investigated eight more for illegally recruiting people to work abroad. Allegations continued of corruption and perceived tolerance of trafficking by some low-level officials, though the government reported no officials prosecuted for complicity in trafficking crimes. Kyrgyz law enforcement officials established contacts in 2004 with counterparts in South Korea and the U.A.E., and pursued joint trafficking investigations with Azerbaijan and Ukraine.

Protection

The Kyrgyz Government's efforts to assist and protect trafficking victims remained inadequate during the reporting period, though NGOs reported an increase in victim referrals by law enforcement officials. In October 2004, the government donated space for a trafficking shelter in Bishkek. In January 2005, the parliament adopted a new comprehensive anti-trafficking law giving immunity from prosecution to trafficking victims who cooperate with investigators. However, this provision and other new legal guarantees for victims require corresponding changes to the criminal code, which are pending in parliament, before they can take effect. Existing legislation provides for witness protection, but the government did not often use these measures due to resource constraints. During the reporting period, Kyrgyz diplomatic missions abroad assisted in the return of 71 Kyrgyz trafficking victims - 67 from the U.A.E. and four from Turkey.

Prevention

In August 2004, the government joined IOM and an NGO to distribute anti-trafficking information to labor migrants. During the reporting period, the government opened new consulates in Russia and China to better protect Kyrgyz citizens' rights in each country. Kyrgyz officials met regularly with Kazakh local authorities and monitored Kyrgyz labor migrants' working and living conditions in Kazakhstan. The number of Kyrgyz citizens trafficked to Russia, Kazakhstan, and South Korea continued to decrease during the reporting period because of bilateral labor migration agreements signed with those countries in 2003 and 2004. The National Council to Combat Trafficking met regularly, and in April 2004 the government provided office space for and started paying the salaries of the Council's two-staff-member Secretariat.

LATVIA (TIER 2)

Latvia is a source and transit country for primarily women and minors trafficked to Germany, Spain, the United Kingdom, Italy, Cyprus, Switzerland, and the Nordic countries for the purpose of sexual exploitation. Victims are also trafficked internally, from rural areas to urban centers, for the purpose of sexual exploitation. The Government of Latvia does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. The government appears politically committed to its March 2004 National Action Plan to Combat Trafficking in Persons, but is struggling to adequately fund and implement it. While the Latvian Government significantly enlarged its anti-trafficking police squad, its victim support services remained lacking and the Latvian court system imposed weak sentences on traffickers.

Prosecution

Latvia specifically criminalizes trafficking in persons for sexual and non-sexual exploitation purposes. In December 2004, Latvia amended its criminal law to cover internal trafficking as well as trafficking across international borders. Although Latvian legislation allows for sufficiently severe penalties under the section of the law against trafficking in persons, the courts in all cases in 2004 only applied those sections of the law that criminalize pimping and alien smuggling for sexual exploitation. While the law was amended in 2004 to provide greater penalties for alien smuggling for sexual exploitation, making it a felony, penalties under this section remain significantly less than those under the trafficking statute. The number of trafficking-related investigations increased, from 12 in 2003 up to 30 in 2004 (with four of those cases initiated under the trafficking section of the criminal law), but Latvian court delays made for fewer convictions in 2004. Of the 21 trafficking-related convictions, down from 40 in 2003, only one trafficker was sentenced to two years' imprisonment, while the rest received conditional sentences. In nine of those cases, the courts confiscated traffickers' property. The staff of the anti-trafficking police squad was increased in 2004 from eight full-time officers to 13. In 2004, the Latvian anti-trafficking unit continued close cooperation with German, Danish, Estonian, and Finnish law enforcement agencies. Latvia has established an anti-corruption bureau and continues to fight official corruption.

Protection

Latvia's efforts to assist and protect trafficking victims remained deficient. The government continued to provide no direct funding for foreign or domestic NGOs for services to victims. Some local municipalities provide ad hoc funds to victim assistance projects. The Riga city municipality granted limited funding to the Skalbes Crisis Center and to the Dardedze Center for abused children, NGOs that identified and assisted trafficking victims in 2004. Trafficking victims continue to be housed in a facility shared by a small number of asylum seekers, although the two groups are separated from one another within the facility. Law enforcement officials do not criminally punish victims, but rather refer them to NGOs for assistance. The process for applying for witness protection is complicated, perhaps explaining police reports that no trafficking victims requested protection in 2004. Latvian embassies abroad identified and assisted three victims during the reporting period, and helped repatriate the remains of two probable Latvian trafficking victims. In 2004, the Ministry of Education trained municipal social workers on trafficking issues, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in April sponsored an annual training for consular officers on trafficking-related issues, and the state police organized three training sessions in all regions of Latvia on how to identify and develop trafficking cases.

Prevention

The Government of Latvia does not conduct independent anti-trafficking campaigns, but supports the efforts of NGOs. The Ministries of Education and Welfare continued to use the Swedish anti-trafficking film, "Lilya 4-Ever," to raise awareness among students through videos and associated materials in secondary schools. Also, the Ministry of Education, in cooperation with a local NGO, has developed a guide on crime prevention, including trafficking in persons, for distribution in high schools. The Ministry of Interior leads an inter-ministerial working group that meets on a regular basis to implement Latvia's National Anti-Trafficking Action Plan adopted in March 2004. The Ministry of Interior in early 2005 released Latvia's first annual trafficking in persons report, which noted significant progress in modifying Latvian legislation to conform to international standards and problems with adequately funding the government's anti-trafficking efforts.

LITHUANIA (TIER 1)

Lithuania is a source, transit, and destination country for women and children primarily trafficked to large cities in Europe for the purpose of sexual exploitation. Victims are trafficked to and through Lithuania from countries such as Ukraine, Russia (Kaliningrad), and Belarus. Traffickers continued to target Lithuanian boarding schools, which also serve as orphanages, to recruit victims. The Government of Lithuania fully complies with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. During the reporting period, the government increased trafficking-related convictions, augmented funds for anti-trafficking programs, and assisted more victims. Still, overall trafficking convictions and sentences remained low, and some NGOs called for greater government funding of victim protection programs. To further strengthen anti-trafficking efforts, the government should consider establishing a specialized anti-trafficking law enforcement unit, formalize screening and referral mechanisms, and increase sensitivity training for police. The Lithuanian Government should consider expanding its prevention program to include domestic demand-reduction programs.

Prosecution

In 2004, the Government of Lithuania in 2004 opened 22 new investigations, involving 25 traffickers, up from 15 investigations in 2003. During that period, the courts prosecuted 16 trafficking cases and convicted 14 individuals with sentences ranging from fines to three years' imprisonment. Lithuania's Criminal Code penalized trafficking with prison sentences of up to ten years in cases of trafficking in children. In March 2005, a Vilnius court finalized the extradition of a Costa Rican wanted by Costa Rican authorities for trafficking children in that country. In 2004, Lithuanian law enforcement officials participated in trafficking-related training in Norway, Belarus, the Netherlands, Ukraine, and Sweden. Lithuania's law enforcement training center provided four hours of anti-trafficking training biannually to all new officers. While there was no official evidence of government involvement in or tolerance of trafficking in persons, some individual police officers may condone it. Lithuanian law enforcement officials continued to cooperate with other governments on trafficking investigations and participated in 23 joint trafficking investigations in 2004.

Protection

The Lithuanian Government provided grants to 13 of the approximately 20 NGOs that offer trafficking victims assistance or temporary shelter - up from 11 in 2003. Experts estimated over 300 trafficking victims received support in 2004. No formal screening and referral procedures existed, but police cooperation with assistance providers was adequate. The police signed an agreement of cooperation in December 2004 with one NGO that provided shelter and social assistance to 17 trafficking victims. The government provided 30 trafficking victims with counseling and occupational training under its rehabilitation and orientation program established in July 2003. In 2004, trafficking victims and witnesses composed 13 to 14 percent of all protected people in the police department's protection program. Police did not charge trafficking victims as criminal violators in 2004, and the government submitted to the parliament in February 2005 new draft legislation to guarantee formal protections for victims. The government continued to provide guidance to its overseas posts on the handling of trafficking cases; the Lithuanian Ministry of Foreign Affairs assisted in the repatriation of 42 trafficking victims during the reporting period, up from 20 in 2003.

Prevention

The government and local NGOs organized a series of educational events for more than 200 boarding school students who are particularly at risk for trafficking. An NGO that received approximately half of its annual budget from government funding distributed over 82,000 anti-trafficking brochures and posters throughout Lithuania, and implemented over ten trafficking prevention programs in 2004. Schools continued to use the anti-trafficking curricula on a voluntary basis. Lithuania's first National Strategy to combat trafficking ended in 2004; an interagency group drafted a National Strategy for 2005 to 2008 that is expected to receive official approval in spring 2005.

MOLDOVA (TIER 2)

Moldova is primarily a source country for persons, particularly women and girls, trafficked for the purpose of sexual exploitation to the Middle East and European countries west and south of Moldova. It is also to a lesser extent a transit country to European destinations for victims trafficked from former Soviet states. Moldovan victims continued to be increasingly trafficked to Turkey, the Middle East (including the United Arab Emirates (U.A.E.) and Israel), and Russia (particularly minors). New information indicates that Moldovan men are trafficked to Baltic and other former Soviet states for the purpose of agricultural and construction labor exploitation. IOM reported an increased number of families trafficked to Poland for forced begging. The small breakaway region of Transnistria in eastern Moldova is outside the central government's control and remained a significant source and transit area for trafficking in persons. The Government of Moldova does not fully comply with minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. In 2004, the government more than doubled the number of trafficking convictions handed down with prison sentences. While Moldova's National Committee to Combat Trafficking in Persons continued to meet regularly and frequently, the government spent very little of its own funds to combat trafficking. The trafficking problem severely affects the Moldovan population. The government should lead Moldova's fight against trafficking rather than continuing to rely heavily on initiatives from NGOs and international organizations.

Prosecution

While Moldova made progress in its law enforcement efforts during the reporting period, it is widely suspected that the Anti-Trafficking Unit limited the number of cases it investigated due in some instances to pressure from complicit officials at higher levels in the government. Moldovan legislation prohibits all types of trafficking and provides for severe penalties ranging from seven years to life imprisonment. The Ministry of Interior's Anti-Trafficking Unit opened 274 trafficking investigations, up from 189 investigations in 2003. The courts convicted 16 individuals for trafficking in persons and seven for trafficking in children, of which 13 received prison sentences (compared to six in 2003) ranging from two to 16 years. Police and prosecutors received anti-trafficking investigations training in September 2004. Moldovan law enforcement officials participated in the regional operation "Mirage 2004" that led authorities to open nine trafficking cases in Moldova. Despite continued allegations of trafficking-related corruption among some law enforcement officials, the government took no action against these officials. Authorities investigated a former Moldovan policeman for trafficking women to the U.A.E.; he is currently free on bail pending his trial. Corrupt judges often downgraded trafficking charges to pimping for lesser penalties.

Protection

The Moldovan Government's efforts to assist and protect trafficking victims remained inadequate. The government provided practically no funding to NGOs for victim assistance, though it continued to provide space in state buildings for a rehabilitation center run by IOM and another anti-trafficking organization's branch offices. Moldova has not implemented its witness protection law adopted in 1998, though in certain cases police posted guards outside witnesses' homes during the reporting period. Still, a majority of victims did not feel secure enough to take action against their traffickers. The government did not prosecute trafficking victims in 2004 for crimes committed in the course of being trafficked. No official victim referral system existed; however, the Anti-Trafficking Unit signed cooperative agreements with two lead anti-trafficking organizations under which it referred several hundred victims for assistance during the reporting period.

Prevention

The government continued its work to prevent trafficking, though NGOs and international organizations conducted most of the anti-trafficking campaigns. While the National Committee on Trafficking in Persons met twice a month on a regular basis, it produced limited results due to the lack of a full-time secretariat and a clear mandate. In December 2004, the National Committee asked NGOs and international organizations to evaluate its work and suggest ways to improve government efforts to combat trafficking. It then released an assessment of anti-trafficking work by all entities for the 2003 to 2004 period. In January 2005, the government established a working group with NGO participation to draft a new National Action Plan that will replace the outdated 2001 Action Plan. Additionally, the government drafted and sent to parliament in February 2005 new legislation to comprehensively address all aspects for trafficking. All local committees, underneath the National Committee, conducted trafficking awareness-raising meetings in schools with students and teachers. The Ministry of Internal Affairs withdrew the licenses of several tourism and employment agencies in 2004 for their suspected involvement in trafficking.

RUSSIA (TIER 2 - WATCH LIST)

Russia is a major source of women trafficked globally for the purpose of sexual exploitation. Russia is also a significant destination and transit country for persons trafficked for sexual and labor exploitation from regional and neighboring countries into Russia, and on to the Gulf states, Europe, Asia, and North America. The ILO estimates that 20 percent of the five million illegal immigrants in Russia are victims of forced labor, which is a form of trafficking. There were reports of trafficking of children and of child sex tourism in Russia. Internal trafficking from rural to urban areas remained a problem. The Government of Russia does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. Russia is placed on Tier 2 Watch List for a second consecutive year for its failure to show evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking, particularly in the area of victim protection and assistance. A new general witness protection program may improve care of trafficking victims who participate in an investigation or protection. While the central government sustained its commitment and recognition to address trafficking, more remains to be done. The government made particular progress in the area of enforcement, increasing investigations and prosecutions under the new amendments to the Criminal Code. It took important preliminary steps to raise awareness among law enforcement and the public through a national training program and development of a training manual. However, the government must develop mechanisms to protect Russian and foreign trafficking victims immediately, administer its new witness protection legislation, and target public awareness programs at potential victims, particularly regarding recruitment scams inherent in employment ads throughout Russia. Moreover, the government should intensify its efforts to work with the NGO community in Russia. The government should continue to actively prosecute and sentence traffickers. It should also identify and address trafficking complicity of public officials. Specialized targeted training for law enforcement is essential to ensure that police are armed with the proper investigative tools to implement anti-trafficking statutes and the new witness protection legislation.

Prosecution

The central government took visible efforts to improve Russia's law enforcement response to trafficking over the last year with its implementation of the 2003 anti-trafficking amendments to the criminal code. In January 2005, President Putin signed additional legislative amendments to the criminal code punishing the organization of illegal entry and transit of aliens into and through Russia. Investigators increased their application of new anti-trafficking tools, but few convictions were reported. In 2004, the government investigated 26 cases under the new anti-trafficking provisions of the criminal code, eight of which were cases of labor trafficking. A total of 11 cases were successfully referred for prosecution. The government continued to bring charges against traffickers using older code provisions. In May 2004, the government convicted and sentenced two Ukrainian men to eight and ten years for trafficking in girls for sexual exploitation. Official corruption continued to facilitate and protect the operation of criminal trafficking networks. The government reported two trafficking-related corruption cases pending before the Russian courts. In September 2004, the Ministry of Internal Affairs (MVD) co-sponsored a regional anti-trafficking coordination conference for specialized anti-trafficking units of law enforcement agencies of neighboring countries. The government developed an anti-trafficking training manual analyzing current laws and procedures; a field manual was under development and was shared with Russian law enforcement and neighboring countries. The government actively cooperated in transnational law enforcement investigations with other countries. In June 2004, the Interior Minister announced the arrest of five individuals involved in a ring trafficking young women to the United States and Asia. The MVD rescued 72 victims and confiscated a large amount of criminal proceeds from the ring. In January 2005, the MVD publicly announced the creation of specialized anti-trafficking units throughout Russia. These units cooperated with Ukraine, Belarus, Moldova, and numerous other countries on trafficking investigations and prosecutions.

Protection

The Russian Government's protection and assistance for victims of trafficking remained weak throughout the reporting period; however, in August 2004, it supplemented its 2003 anti-trafficking amendments with the passage of witness protection legislation, which became effective in January 2005. This well-funded legislation could potentially allow shelter and protection for trafficking victims who are witnesses in an investigation or prosecution. The statute includes rights to employment and collection of damages. Regrettably, the Duma failed to pass comprehensive victim protection, and assistance legislation needed to address the broader issues of prevention, protection and rehabilitation for foreign victims and victims not party to an investigation. As a result, the government has yet to support or establish shelters specifically for trafficking victims. While the central government did not institute a formalized screening referral process, IOM reported that the MVD solicited repatriation assistance for illegal migrants, including some trafficking victims. In addition, one regional government collaborated with an anti-trafficking NGO to develop a referral procedure for victims in Yaroslavl. While a prosecutor or investigator in a trafficking case may permit a foreign victim to remain in Russia during a pending criminal case, Russian law afforded no specific status to assist or protect foreign victims of trafficking; their involuntary deportation remained a problem. Currently, additional legislation is pending to address some of these critical deficiencies; future passage of the law, however, remained uncertain. The need to assist victims and provide them with legal status remained paramount.

Prevention

Senior government officials continued to highlight the trafficking issue in the media during the last year; they also participated in anti-trafficking seminars. In November 2004, in front of the Russian Duma and again in February 2005, the central government hosted two regional anti-trafficking conferences to develop public awareness, consider draft legislation, and encourage closer cooperation between the MVD and NGOs. The events received widespread media attention. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs placed detailed warnings on its consular affairs website for potential victims. The government did not have a formal trafficking coordination body, but coordination of anti-trafficking policies and programs took place primarily through the Duma Legislative Working Group. The Duma began drafting a comprehensive report on the nature and scope of trafficking in Russia and the means to address it.

NGOs and international organizations continued to conduct virtually all targeted prevention programs for victims; however, they reported increasingly good relations with the government and actively participated in the Duma anti-trafficking working group. Some local NGOs reported they received operational support from local officials, and many reported they provided anti-trafficking training to local government and police.

TAJIKISTAN (TIER 2)

Tajikistan is a source country for men, women, and children trafficked to Russia, Kazakhstan, the United Arab Emirates (U.A.E.), Turkey, Saudi Arabia, and Iran for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor. The Government of Tajikistan does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. Over the past year, the government adopted a comprehensive trafficking in persons law, established a specialized anti-trafficking police unit, and created an interagency commission to coordinate anti-trafficking activities and draft a national action plan. While victim assistance and protection remained inadequate, in large part due to a lack of resources, Tajikistan's new law provides a useful framework for the protection of victims. The government should make strong efforts to meet trafficking victims' needs and increase convictions.

Prosecution

The Government of Tajikistan adopted a comprehensive Law on Combating Trafficking in Persons in August 2004. Tajikistan's Criminal Code criminalized trafficking in persons for both sexual and labor exploitation. Penalties include imprisonment of five to 15 years and confiscation of property. Traffickers may also be prosecuted under other laws such as those prohibiting exploitation of prostitution, rape, kidnapping, and buying and selling of minors. In 2004, law enforcement officials investigated 14 trafficking cases. A Dushanbe court in late 2004 handed down the first conviction under Tajikistan's new anti-trafficking law, sentencing a trafficker to 14 years' imprisonment and confiscating her property. In May 2004, the government established a dedicated police unit with five officers directly involved in trafficking investigations. The Ministry of Interior added a special trafficking training course to its academy curriculum. The government arrested 14 low-level law enforcement officers who engaged in sexually exploiting underage girls. Defendants charged with trafficking have received reduced charges allegedly due to bribes accepted by judges.

Protection

Assistance for trafficking victims in Tajikistan remained inadequate during the reporting period. In theory, victims are protected under the new anti-trafficking law, but in practice the government offers no protection or reintegration programs for victims, citing limited resources. The Ministry of Interior and a local NGO signed an agreement on cooperation in December 2004, in part, as an effort to try to locate space to interview victims in a secure, confidential environment. Enforcement officials did not jail, fine, detain, or otherwise punish victims.

Prevention

In January 2005, the government established an interagency commission on combating human trafficking, a product of its new anti-trafficking law. The commission began meeting monthly in February and is charged with producing a national plan to combat human trafficking. The commission consists of representatives from the Ministries of Interior, Security, Labor, Foreign Affairs, Education, Health, and Economy and Trade, as well as the State Border Protection Committee, the Prosecutor General's Office, and the President's Administration. The government continued to cooperate with local NGOs and international groups on prevention, and may include them in future meetings of the commission. On May 5, 2004, the Ministry of Interior and IOM signed a Memorandum of Cooperation in the Sphere of Combating Trafficking in Persons, leading to a formal cooperative relationship between IOM and the anti-trafficking unit on prosecution and protection activities.

UKRAINE (TIER 2 - WATCH LIST)

Ukraine is primarily a source country for men, women, and children trafficked to Europe, the Middle East, and Russia for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor. Recent studies indicate an increase in internal trafficking for all forms of exploitation and a growing problem of trafficking in minors. Ukraine continued to serve as a significant transit country for Asian and Moldovan victims trafficked to Western destinations. The Government of Ukraine does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. Ukraine has been placed on Tier 2 Watch List because of its failure to show evidence of increasing efforts and its commitment to take additional future steps over the next year, particularly in the area of victim protection and prosecution of trafficking-related complicity. Ukraine's new government, which assumed power in late 2004, is expected to respond more effectively to institutional weaknesses and corruption, which hindered the previous government's anti-trafficking efforts. The government should create a special witness protection program for trafficking victims, expand the legal definition of trafficking to conform with international requirements, ensure the appropriation of consistent resources for the anti-trafficking unit, and conduct sensitivity training to reduce victim blaming and breaches of victim confidentiality.

Prosecution

Ukraine's Criminal Code remained inadequate to address the full range of trafficking in Ukraine over the reporting period. The Ministry of Interior initiated 269 new cases, completed 72 investigations, and charged 138 persons with trafficking crimes. A total of 68 trafficking prosecutions were started. The courts convicted traffickers in 67 cases, an increase from the previous year. Regrettably, only 22 persons were sentenced to time in prison, the rest receiving probation. During the reporting period, the government successfully dismantled 17 organized crime groups involved in trafficking cases. Trafficking-related complicity and official involvement continued to be a problem; there were persistent reports of high-level official intervention, which may have resulted in significant sentence reductions. The government did not investigate or prosecute any cases of trafficking-related corruption during the year.

Protection

The Government of Ukraine failed to provide adequate protection and rehabilitation services to victims of trafficking in 2004. The lack of a credible victim witness protection program impaired the government's ability to protect victims, and as a result few victims were willing to cooperate in prosecutions. Ukrainian courts showed a lack of sensitivity to victims during court proceedings; trafficking victims were characterized as prostitutes, rather than victims of a serious crime. The Ministry of Family and Youth Affairs coordinated some rehabilitation services, but the majority of funding for these programs came from international donors. Commendably, the government screened all victims repatriated or deported from abroad to the port of Odesa and referred them to a local NGO for services. The government instructed all diplomatic officials abroad to accelerate procedures for identifying Ukrainian victims and providing them with appropriate travel documents.

Prevention

Ukraine's trafficking prevention efforts were woefully inadequate over the last year. The country's Comprehensive Program for Combating Trafficking was not implemented well in 2004, as it lacked both financing and practical measures needed for its effective implementation. As a result, internal trafficking was not addressed. In December 2004, the government established an advisory anti-trafficking working group to improve coordination of the largely ineffectual Inter-Ministerial Group. The government continued to rely on NGOs and international organizations to conduct the bulk of prevention programs. However, it provided minor support for their activities, primarily by distributing literature throughout the government and in public schools. In 2004, the Ministry of Family and Youth Affairs conducted outreach to some rural youth and provided mortgage assistance to young families.

UZBEKISTAN (TIER 2 - WATCH LIST)

Uzbekistan is primarily a source, and, to a lesser extent, a transit country for people trafficked to the United Arab Emirates (U.A.E.), Israel, Turkey, Egypt, South Korea, Bahrain, India, Thailand, Malaysia, Western Europe, and other former Soviet states. Typically women are trafficked to those countries for the purpose of sexual exploitation; men end up trafficked in Kazakhstan and Russia for labor exploitation in construction, agriculture, and the service sector. IOM reported an increase of trafficked victims from the Fergana Valley in 2004. Internal trafficking occurred from rural to urban areas primarily for labor exploitation. The Government of Uzbekistan does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. The government has been placed on Tier 2 Watch List based on commitments by the country to take additional steps over the next year, including the adoption of comprehensive anti-trafficking legislation, criminal code amendments to raise anti-trafficking penalties, support to the country's first trafficking shelter, and approval of a national action plan. During 2004, the government created an anti-trafficking unit, improved Uzbek consulate efforts to free trafficked victims abroad, and increased trafficking convictions.

Prosecution

While the Government of Uzbekistan increased trafficking convictions to 251 in 2004 (up from 80 in 2003), a majority of convicted traffickers were amnestied. The government extended a general amnesty to anyone convicted of crimes with prison terms of less than ten years. Uzbekistan's law on trafficking prescribes prison sentences of five to eight years, which meant that most traffickers qualified for general amnesty during 2004 and thus served little to no jail time, unless they were convicted for additional offenses or were repeat offenders. The government amnestied in December 2004 two women convicted earlier in the Fall for their role in trafficking 14 women to Georgia for onward movement to the U.A.E. Proposed legislation that would comprehensively address trafficking and raise penalties for cross-border trafficking to ten to 15 years' imprisonment remained pending during the reporting period. In 2004, the Uzbek Government established contacts with anti-trafficking counterparts in the U.A.E., the top destination for Uzbek women trafficked for sexual exploitation. Still, the government acknowledged that it needed more cooperative relationships with destination countries for effective trafficking prosecutions. Ministry of Internal Affairs participants in a May 2004 anti-trafficking training course used their skills to train an additional 1,500 officers throughout Uzbekistan. Allegations of local officials falsifying or selling travel documents continued, although the government reported no actions taken against this corruption in 2004.

Protection

The Uzbek Government provided no direct support to trafficking victims, due in part to limited resources. However, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs assisted some with obtaining the necessary identification documents to return to Uzbekistan. Following an Uzbek delegation's visit in December 2004 to the U.A.E. - where it interviewed 119 women in five prisons - and an ensuing consular officers' training in January 2005, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs changed the identification policy for trafficking victims, compressing the process into weeks as opposed to months. Airport police continued to refer identified trafficking victims to an NGO in Tashkent. The state-run Uzbekistan Airways issued tickets at a 50 percent discount to destitute citizens abroad, including trafficking victims. Authorities did not jail or prosecute trafficking victims in 2004. The government encouraged victims to assist with investigations, but no formal programs existed to protect victims of any crime who served as witnesses in criminal prosecutions.

Prevention

The government continued to support anti-trafficking educational programming via state-controlled mass media and informational posters in public and government spaces. It paid to translate trafficking awareness posters into the Karakalpak language for those in western Uzbekistan. The Uzbek Government allowed free advertising on local television stations of seven regional anti-trafficking hotlines, run by IOM's partner organizations. Members of the anti-trafficking unit traveled to each region of Uzbekistan during the summer of 2004 to assess regional anti-trafficking measures; consequently, regional units were formed to better coordinate local anti-trafficking measures. At the end of 2004, Uzbekistan reconstituted its anti-trafficking working group in which three government agencies participated.

(end excerpt)

(Distributed by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: June 5, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

120 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

June 3, 2005

Trafficking in Persons Report Focuses on Labor Exploitation; Secretary Rice, Ambassador Miller aim to end modern-day slavery

BYLINE: Susan Ellis, Washington File Staff Writer

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 1076 words

Washington ' Citing both the positive actions and failures of governments around the world to take the necessary steps to end modern-day slavery, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice presented to the public the fifth annual Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP) at the U.S. Department of State June 3.

Rice expressed the hope that the comprehensive, worldwide report "will raise international awareness of the crime of trafficking and spur governments across the globe to take determined actions against it."

Introducing the findings, the secretary noted that "up to 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders every year and millions more are trafficked internally." Four out of five of those trafficked are women and one in two is a minor, she said.

The data, she said, illustrate that the majority of transnational victims are trafficked into commercial sexual exploitation, but there is also an alarming enslavement of people for purposes of labor exploitation, a form of slavery given special attention in this year's report.

The responsibility for trafficking does not rest only with developing countries, whose citizens are vulnerable to trafficking because of poverty or corruption or lack of education, Rice pointed out, but "destination or demand countries like the United States and other prosperous nations, whose citizens create the marketplace for trafficking, also bear a heavy responsibility."

There is a modern-day abolitionist movement of "concerned citizens, students, faith-based organizations, feminists and other non-governmental groups -- doing courageous and compassionate work to end this trade in human degradation," Rice said. "The United States government is proud to stand with them at the forefront of this international anti-trafficking campaign."

The United States provided more than $96 million in foreign aid during 2004 to help other countries strengthen their anti-trafficking efforts, Rice noted, and is now helping them to develop legislation to combat abuse. The aid assists in creating special law enforcement units to investigate trafficking cases and rescue victims, build emergency shelters and develop long-term rehabilitation and vocational training programs," she said.

The report records the efforts of 150 nations between March 2004 and March 2005 to deal with the issue, explained Ambassador John Miller, the senior adviser on trafficking in persons in the State Department. "Shining through this global tragedy are many rays of hope. In addition to tremendous efforts of heroic individuals and private organizations, governments around the globe are awakening to this issue and taking action to end this form of modern-day slavery.

"Worldwide this past year the number of trafficking-related convictions has increased over 3,000. And new anti-human trafficking legislation was approved in 39 countries. That's a big change from four or five years ago," he said.

The report's methodology includes a three-tier system for rating countries' effectiveness in combating trafficking:

" [cents] Tier 1 includes those countries that have met international standards for coping with trafficking and are vigorously addressing the problem.

" [cents] Tier 2 comprises countries that are demonstrating commitment to address their problems but have not yet achieved international standards; the Tier 2 "Watch List" consists of countries that might be vulnerable to an erosion of their efforts.

" [cents] Tier 3, the least favorable rating, lists countries whose governments fail to meet minimal international standards and are not making significant efforts to do so.

While some governments have taken steps against slavery since the report was drafted, Miller said, others have failed to move forward: "Ecuador was placed on Tier III [the lowest] again this year for its lack of significant efforts during the reporting period. Two days ago, Ecuador's congress passed criminal code changes that could lead to positive progress in fighting slavery."

In an overview of this year's report, Miller noted that sex slavery is the largest category of transnational slavery, which translates to an increased number of sex victims in countries where prostitution is allowed or encouraged. Hence there has been "a greater focus on demand, educating and dissuading the so-called customers," he said.

But the United States is concerned with all forms of slavery, Miller insisted, so "this year trafficking through labor exploitation, particularly involuntary servitude of foreign laborers, received greater attention. This greater emphasis came as a result of better data obtained from source countries and non-governmental organizations."

Four countries -- Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates -- remain on Tier III, primarily for failing to make significant efforts to combat forced labor trafficking, he said. "The forced labor may involve foreign workers who end up in conditions of involuntary servitude, or child camel jockeys who live in slavlike conditions and are forced to race in extremely dangerous environments," he added.

"Burma, North Korea, Sudan and Cuba remain on Tier III, largely because they still fail to address forced labor in their countries. Another government, Cambodia, is on Tier III because of government complicity in trafficking in persons."

On the positive side, Miller said: "The Tier II Warning Watch List introduced last year has been very effective. Thirty-one of the 46 countries on the 2004 TIP reports Tier II Watch List improved their ratings this year."

Several countries that were on Tier III on the 2004 report have acted to be raised to the next tier, Miller stated: "Guyana's president pushed through the country's first anti-trafficking law and led a countrywide awareness campaign on the dangers of trafficking, [and] Bangladesh set up a long-promised anti-trafficking police unit, which started new investigations while rescuing an increased number of victims."

Miller also explained: "Country ratings are based strictly on government actions to combat trafficking of persons as defined by U.S. law. The standards are set up by the Trafficking Victim Protection Act and are applied equally to every country."

The full text of the report is available on the State Department's Web site.

(The Washington File is a product of the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: June 5, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

121 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

June 3, 2005

State Department Briefing, June 3; Department / Sec. Rice welcomes McCormack as spokesman / Trafficking in Persons report / Amb. Dobriansky meeting with ambassadors / Sec. Rice attendance at OAS summit / aid to fragile democracies / Inter-American Democratic Charter, Sri Lanka, Indonesia, Lebanon, Syria, Saudi Arabia, North Korea, Sudan, G8, Iraq, Bolivia, Aruba, Greece/Cyprus

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 5608 words

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack briefed the press June 3.

Following is the transcript of the State Department briefing:

(begin transcript)

[U.S. Department of State]

Daily Press Briefing Index

Friday, June 3, 2005

2:10 p.m. EDT

Briefer: Sean McCormack, Spokesman

DEPARTMENT

-- Sec. Rice: Farewell to Richard Boucher, former Spokesman; Introduction of Sean McCormack, Spokesman/ Richard Boucher: Thank You

-- Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP)/ Ambassador Dobriansky meeting with Ambassadors/ Sanctions/ Tier 3 allies/ Ambassador Miller

-- Sec. Rice Attendance at Organization of American States (OAS) Summit in Ft. Lauderdale/ Aid to Fragile Democracies/ Inter-American Democratic Charter

SRI LANKA

-- Sec. Rice Meeting with Foreign Minister Lakshman Kadirgamar/ Tsunami Reconstruction/ Violence

INDONESIA

-- Warden Message/ Specific Threat/ Travel Warning/ Security Measures at Embassy/ Hotels

LEBANON

-- Killing of Journalist Samir Kassir/ Investigation/ Sec. Meetings with Zebari and Makabi

SYRIA

-- SCUD Missile Test/ Weapons of Mass Destruction/ Out of Step with Region

SAUDI ARABIA

-- Response to TIP report/ Possibility of Sanctions

-- Record on International Religious Freedom / Country of Particular Concern Designation

NORTH KOREA

-- Six Party Talks/ Food Aid

SUDAN

-- Dep. Sec. Zoellick's Trip/ Kartoum/ Darfur/ African Union Mission/ Security

G-8

-- Prime Minister Tony Blair Meeting with President Bush/ G8 Summit/ AIDS/ Poverty

IRAQ

-- Ambassador to Iraq/ Ambassador Khalilzad / Embassy of Baghdad/ Security/ US Support of Iraqi People and Government / Iraqi Process

BOLIVIA

-- OAS Summit/ Assistance

ARUBA

-- Missing American Natalee Hardaway /FBI Assistance

GREECE/CYPRUS

-- State of Relations / Cyprus

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE DAILY PRESS BRIEFING

FRIDAY, JUNE 3, 2005

(ON THE RECORD UNLESS OTHERWISE NOTED)

2:15 p.m. EDT

MR. MCCORMACK: Under any circumstance, the Secretary of State is a hard act to follow and, well, for that matter, so is Richard Boucher. So why don't I just jump right into questions. I don't have anything to start with.

Mr. Gedda.

QUESTION: I have no questions. I just want to say congratulations on your confirmation and your swearing-in and I hope you have a long --

QUESTION: Please speak up, George.

QUESTION: I wanted to congratulate Sean at the outset on his confirmation and his swearing-in and I'm sure we'll have a long and productive and sometimes contentious time together.

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, I very much look forward to working with you and all of your colleagues in the State Department press corps. You serve an important function in our form of government and our way of life and I think it's an example for the entire world, you know, the Spokesman of the State Department standing up here and taking questions from a free and responsible press and trying to provide the best, most timely information that we can. So I look forward to working with you over the coming period.

QUESTION: Ah, flattery.

MR. MCCORMACK: Will it get me everywhere?

QUESTION: I have a question. I realize we've already had a briefing on the trafficking report.

MR. MCCORMACK: Mm-hmm.

QUESTION: Have you -- has the government, the U.S. Government, gotten any reaction from any of the countries that were put in Tier 3 for the first time, notably the Saudis, the Kuwaitis, the UAE, Qatar? Are they dismayed about this? Have they given any strong signals that they're going to try to act fast to do something about it?

MR. MCCORMACK: I'll try to get for you any information that we might have on specific reactions, but in general, I would note that Undersecretary Paula Dobriansky is this afternoon -- I don't know if she's already met with them or not -- meeting with about a hundred ambassadors here in Washington to talk about the Trafficking in Persons Report. And included in that number are a number of Tier 3 countries and I would note that we have already had some consultations with some of the countries that appear in Tier 3. Our ambassadors went in and talked to the foreign ministries about the report. I would note that -- I think Ambassador Miller talked about this, that one country -- I believe Bolivia -- has already acted on some of the issues raised by the report.

So if there's anything further with respect to -- on those four, I'll let you know.

QUESTION: Thank you.

QUESTION: Sean?

MR. MCCORMACK: Yeah.

QUESTION: Regarding those four, how serious is the threat of sanction? Does the administration believe that that is a real weapon that can be used? Is it the threat of sanctions that you hope, because of the reputational impact, would have some effect on their behavior? And particularly with the Saudis, since they have gotten worse, not better.

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, if --

QUESTION: Worse through this whole process.

MR. MCCORMACK: Right. As you know, and you heard in your briefing today, sanctions, you know, that is one possibility here. But the overall intent of the lives, it's -- this is meant to foster a dialogue and discussion about this issue. There's a 90-day period in which we will have a dialogue with the countries that are on Tier 3 and the hope is that we can address some of the issues raised by the report and that, as a result of that dialogue, that you actually take effective action in response to some of the issues that are raised by the report.

I mentioned to Arshad one of the countries, Bolivia, has already taken some steps and I think that that is a model for the kind of cooperative dialogue on these kinds of issues that is envisioned not only by the law, but by, you know, our application of the law.

QUESTION: May I follow up?

MR. MCCORMACK: Sure.

QUESTION: How do you weigh the balance of benefits and risks with four countries, in this case, that are key allies in the war on terror and key components of our military operation in that region?

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, in any relationship, in any sort of deep, involved relationship like we have with a number of these different countries, including Saudi Arabia and including Qatar, as you mentioned -- they are allies in the war on terror, as well as others that are in the report -- oftentimes you have to bring up difficult issues. And as the President has talked about before, as the Secretary has talked about before, we're not going to hesitate to bring up these issues with those countries. It's important that -- the President believes it's important that we speak out clearly on these issues. This is an important moral issue of our time.

I think Ambassador Miller talked about how this trafficking in persons was the modern-day equivalent of slavery, and both the Secretary and the President are committed to abolishing this. Part of that effort is to speak clearly about the problem in an objective manner using the criteria laid out by the law. The second part to that is to work with these countries to try to address, in a real way, some of these issues and to end the practices that are cited in the report.

Why don't we move back here.

QUESTION: Sean, congratulations and welcome aboard.

MR. MCCORMACK: Thank you very much.

QUESTION: I have a question. On Tuesday, there was a meeting between the Council of Arab Ambassadors in Washington with the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern Affairs Mr. Welch, in which they say the Deputy Ambassador was included. Is that an indication that maybe we're heading towards a lowering of diplomatic relations with Syria?

MR. MCCORMACK: I'm not up on that meeting. Let me look into it. And if there's anything that we have to add, we'll get back to you.

QUESTION: Thanks.

MR. MCCORMACK: Okay. Saul.

QUESTION: (Inaudible) the Secretary's with the Sri Lankan Foreign Minister this morning. Can you do a readout from that for us, please?

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, if you put it that way. (Laughter.)

Secretary Rice and Sri Lankan Foreign Minister Kadirgamar had a good meeting today. They met this morning up in the Secretary's office. It was the Foreign Minister and just a couple of his aides and the Secretary and a couple of her aides. They talked about bilateral issues of mutual interest, including tsunami reconstruction assistance and the need for arrangements to assure its equitable distribution. The Secretary recognized and applauded Sri Lanka's commitment to democracy.

QUESTION: How about issues of the general war on terrorism, given that they've got their own problems with the Tamils? Is that something that Rice reiterated that she would be giving support to, to the mediating process done by Norway?

MR. MCCORMACK: I don't believe that came up in the meeting, but let me check for you.

QUESTION: But on the -- you said equitable distribution for the tsunami aid. Do you have a reason to believe that it is being inequitably distributed, the tsunami aid in Sri Lanka?

MR. MCCORMACK: No, we don't. As a matter of fact, the Secretary and the Foreign Minister had a good talk about this. They talked about how we have moved from the immediate relief phase into, really, the reconstruction phase and how the importance of working with all the various groups in establishing the mechanisms with the NGOs and the governments and other foreign governments that are involved in the reconstruction process, and make sure that it's a coordinated process. And I think both of them were comfortable with the progress thus far in making sure that those reconstruction funds are spent in an equitable manner.

QUESTION: Great. So you don't have concerns, for example, that the Tamil population is getting less than its due?

MR. MCCORMACK: I'm not aware of any concerns along those lines.

In the back, Teri.

QUESTION: Change of subject?

MR. MCCORMACK: Sure.

QUESTION: Can you talk about concerns in Indonesia, the Warden Message put out today, and the fact that the missions are remaining open despite the threat to hotels?

MR. MCCORMACK: As you noted, we did issue a Warden Message in Indonesia. This was in response to a credible and specific information that talked about hotels specifically, so we thought this was and is an appropriate step to issue this message. And because it was -- the information was specific, we decided that it was most appropriate to issue a Warden Message as opposed to making any changes to the Travel Warning at this time.

QUESTION: The Warden Message said that the plans were as of June 1st. Does the fact that you only put the Warden Message out on June 3rd indicate that the threat remains at at least a constant level?

MR. MCCORMACK: I believe that the Warden Message is still operative and I'll check to see if there's any action that we would take to notify people that the actual threat had ended. I don't know the --

QUESTION: Yeah, it's unusual just that they would say that two days ago there was this threat and we're notifying you today.

MR. CASEY: Effective as of June 1, meaning ongoing.

QUESTION: (Inaudible.)

MR. MCCORMACK: Sure, let's move around. Peter.

QUESTION: Can we stay on this?

MR. MCCORMACK: Oh, okay.

QUESTION: I don't mean to nitpick, but if you're saying the reason for only doing a Warden Message, not a Travel Warning, is that it was very specific to hotels, wouldn't a Warden Message just go to Americans whom you have contacts with who you know are already in the country and the Travel Warning would be for the people who would be visiting and wanting to go to hotels and therefore might be victims to the targeted hotels?

MR. MCCORMACK: The Embassy, working with the Consular Affairs people back here in Washington, felt, based on the information that they have and which I can't go into any more than I have, this was the most appropriate step to take.

Peter. Any other on this subject?

QUESTION: Syria.

QUESTION: Just one more. Despite the fact that it seemed very specific, have there been any measures taken by Indonesian local security forces to shore up U.S. missions?

MR. MCCORMACK: In these cases, typically, the embassy does work with the local officials but I'm not aware of any specific measures that they may have taken.

Peter.

QUESTION: Syria. The killing of the journalist the other day. Do you have any more information on it indicating who might be behind it? And is the United States, as it did in the killing of Hariri, going to be asking for an international or an independent investigation?

MR. MCCORMACK: The Secretary did address this yesterday in her remarks with Minister Zebari and I don't have -- I really don't have at this point anything to add to those remarks. I don't have any further information on the question of who.

She noted the fact that it would appear that these were efforts by individuals who were attempting to intimidate the population at a time when they're holding elections. At this point, I think that, again, I would reiterate what the Secretary said, and she urged Prime Minister Mikati to follow through in a real way on his pledge to investigate and ultimately hold accountable those responsible for this, for this act.

QUESTION: Is there a point that you might be seeking in independent or outside investigation or you're holding that in abeyance or is that a possibility?

MR. BOUCHER: I think at this point, I would just stick with what the Secretary said.

QUESTION: Also on Syria. Welcome, Sean.

MR. MCCORMACK: Thank you very much.

QUESTION: Do you know if there's been any contact between the Department and Syria either on the killing of Samir Kassir or about the scud missile test by Syria last week? Scott confirmed that the U.S. knew about the test, but has there been any dialogue on that? And then I have a question on a separate subject.

MR. MCCORMACK: Okay. Thanks for the warning. On both of those questions, in terms of contact with the Syrian Government, I'm not aware of any.

On the Syrian missile test, as Scott indicated, we have information that indicates that it did occur. And I would just add that it's one more example of Syria being out of step with what's going on in the rest of the region. You have Lebanon on one side, Iraq on the other, and the populations of those countries are focused on trying to build the institutions -- political, economic, security -- that form the foundation for a more free, prosperous country as well as region. So it's just one more example of the fact that they're out of step with what else is going on in the region.

QUESTION: One more on this, okay?

MR. MCCORMACK: Sure.

QUESTION: Do you know anything about whether these missiles or any of the technology related to the missiles were supplied by North Korea?

MR. MCCORMACK: I don't have any information I could share with you on that.

QUESTION: One last follow-up on (inaudible) in principle Syria is a sovereign country, should it not test missiles of any kind as long as it's not illegal?

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, again, we have long talked about our concerns of Syria's efforts to develop and acquire weapons of mass destruction as well as the means of delivering them. That's -- you know, that's not a new message. I just think that this type of step is, when you look at the rest of what's going on in the region and the efforts that people are taking to try to develop a more peaceful, a more stable, more harmonious region, it's just a discordant note and that's the reason why I wanted to point that out to you.

Tammy.

QUESTION: New topic?

MR. MCCORMACK: Mm-hmm. Anybody else on Syria?

QUESTION: Can you take a question on whether there's been any contacts today between -- seems a lot going on in the U.S.-Syria front. Like, if anybody spoke to anybody?

MR. MCCORMACK: Sure, sure.

QUESTION: And Sean, when you said you had indications that the test went ahead, do you have indications that the missile actually went into Turkish territory?

MR. MCCORMACK: That -- I don't have anything for you on that.

Tammy.

QUESTION: On Saudi Arabia, last September, the U.S. designated Saudi Arabia a Country of Particular Concern about religious freedom. Has there been any decision taken so far to impose sanctions on Saudi Arabia? And I think I'm going to follow up.

MR. MCCORMACK: Oh, I'll raise your follow-up with, "I'll have to get back to you on that." (Laughter.)

I'll have to check on that. I don't have any information on that.

QUESTION: Well, my follow-up may not -- well, if I could.

MR. MCCORMACK: Okay, sure.

QUESTION: Given that at least we haven't heard of any action taken, how realistic should the threat of sanctions be seen by a country such as Saudi Arabia, given that nothing appears to have happened since last September? I'm sorry, sanctions regarding trafficking in persons

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, again, that is in the law. That's part of the law as a possibility. But the law -- the spirit of the law -- also is to emphasize a consultative process. That's why you have this 90-day period. And I expect that -- we already have had contact with the Saudis on this when we delivered a copy of the report to them and discussed the chapter dealing with them. And I expect that we would have follow-up conversations on the subject as well.

So, again, the emphasis is on a dialogue and trying to solve the problem, as well as on measure -- we're not trying to single anybody out. These are objective criteria applied evenly across states, so -- and we use the criteria that are in the law.

QUESTION: May I just follow on that quickly?

MR. MCCORMACK: Sure.

QUESTION: Did the President and the Secretary raise this in Crawford at the most recent meetings?

MR. MCCORMACK: That was before my time, but I'll check for you.

QUESTION: You'll check that?

MR. MCCORMACK: Yeah, sure.

QUESTION: A follow-up?

MR. MCCORMACK: George.

QUESTION: Could you take a question on the status of the religious freedom decision, the deadline for which was in March?

MR. MCCORMACK: I will.

Charlie.

QUESTION: Sean, I believe yesterday there was a report out of Israel that the Israelis plan to build more housing at Maale Adumim. Do you know about that? Have you talked to the Israelis about it? And if it's true, how does it comport with the President's recent discussions with Prime Minister Sharon?

MR. MCCORMACK: I did see some reporting in the news concerning some plans to take down Palestinian houses. Is that what you're referring to?

QUESTION: I think this was more building, just more houses at Maale Adumim. This was --

MR. MCCORMACK: That I haven't seen. I haven't seen those reports, so -- the President was very clear last week when he met with Prime Minister Abbas. He was asked about these types of questions and I'd just refer you back to his remarks.

QUESTION: The North Koreans said this morning that they were pleased to see that President Bush had used the honorific Mister, referring to Kim Jong Il.

MR. MCCORMACK: Right.

QUESTION: And they didn't call him a bloodthirsty beast.

MR. MCCORMACK: Right.

QUESTION: I wonder, is the administration trying to lower the temperature here a year after their departure from the six-party talks? And how, if at all, do you plan to mark the anniversary of that one-year departure?

MR. MCCORMACK: I wouldn't necessarily read anything into the President's remarks besides, you know, exactly what he said. I think he said exactly what he wanted to.

In terms of the anniversary, I'm not aware of any particular plans other than to, once again, urge the North Koreans to do -- once again, to do what we've said: return back to the six-party talks to engage with the other five parties in a constructive manner to work towards the goal of a denuclearized Korean Peninsula.

QUESTION: Have you heard anything back via the New York channel or have you had any contacts at all via the New York channel since the last ones?

MR. MCCORMACK: No, no. Any other on that?

QUESTION: North Korea.

MR. MCCORMACK: Yeah.

QUESTION: You didn't read anything into the bloodthirsty beast comments?

MR. MCCORMACK: We've seen these kind of statements out of the North Koreans before.

QUESTION: Continuing on that subject, apparently Secretary Rumsfeld said on his flight to Singapore that the U.S. is reviewing policy toward North Korea. Can you expound on this at all?

MR. MCCORMACK: Let me take a look at his remarks first. I haven't seen -- I haven't had a chance to look at his remarks.

QUESTION: Okay. And even if you dismiss the North Korean -- I mean, the kind of rhetorical nastiness that we've heard before, every time this happens does it concern you that we really aren't getting anywhere in terms of having a dialogue at least publicly?

MR. MCCORMACK: You know, this is rather -- we're looking for actions, so I wouldn't necessarily read anything into it.

Yes, sir.

QUESTION: Within the last number of weeks, there have been massive protests here in Washington as well as protests of the Sudanese Embassy, and Deputy Secretary Zoellick has just been to Sudan. What progress has he made with the Khartoum central government? And also do you have any plans to work with the logistics groups putting together this Live Aid concert -- Live Eight Concert -- for debt and relief from poverty in Africa?

MR. MCCORMACK: On the second part of your question, I don't have anything.

QUESTION: It's days prior to the G-8 Summit.

MR. MCCORMACK: Right. I'm not aware of any plans in that regard. Deputy Secretary Zoellick is actually right now in Khartoum. I think he's scheduled to have some meetings there shortly, if not already. He flew into Sudan today. He visited a refugee camp in Darfur. He also met with tribal officials. He met with AU officials there as well. And I think I would just say that he's working the issue. He is working on the security aspects of Darfur, working and talking to the AU mission on the ground.

And one of the reports that he got back from the head of the AU mission in the area that he was visiting with responsibilities for security was that in areas where the AU was deployed, they actually had seen a reduction in violence. And he also had an opportunity to meet with Jan Prank while he was on the ground in Darfur. And both of them had a good discussion and one of the things that came out of it was, I think, both of them were pleased with the increased flow of food to that part of the -- to Darfur.

So it's a complex, difficult issue. I think the fact that this is Deputy Secretary Zoellick's second trip there, Secretary Powell has visited there, the President has spoken out about it, the Secretary has spoken out about it, is an indication of our commitment to try to resolve the tough issues that you see there in Darfur -- in Sudan and Darfur.

Yes. Same topic? Okay.

QUESTION: Yes. Is there any likely change to the -- in the way Deputy Zoellick will conduct those talks in light of what the President terming what's happening in Sudan -- in Darfur as a genocide?

MR. MCCORMACK: No, I don't think there will be any change. No.

QUESTION: Can I follow up on the G-8?

MR. MCCORMACK: Sure.

QUESTION: Tony Blair is coming to Washington to try to raise support for his initiative, which includes writing off debt relief and doubling aid, but the U.S. really made clear it won't sign up to some of these proposals. I was wondering if you think there is a danger here that the U.S. will be seen as party-poopers at the G-8. Also, will you be offering, sort of, real alternatives to what the Brits are putting forward?

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, Prime Minister Blair is going to be coming here and he's going to be meeting with the President. That's the reason for his coming here so I'm going to defer any questions about that visit to my colleagues at the White House.

As for the G-8 summit, the Secretary will be -- is deeply engaged in this issue, as is the President, working on issues related to development around the world. You know, the President, since he has come in, I think, has made an unprecedented commitment not only to taking steps and devoting resources to alleviating poverty but also to fighting the scourge of AIDS and other disease. So and, you know, this is also a President that has, I think, met, I daresay met with more African leaders than any other President in recent memory. So we are deeply committed to the cause of poverty alleviation as well as helping populations around the world, and in particular in Africa, try to realize a better life.

Why don't we move over here.

QUESTION: Can we go back to North Korea for a minute?

MR. MCCORMACK: Sure.

QUESTION: First off, congratulations on your appointment.

MR. MCCORMACK: Thank you very much. I like the way these questions all begin with that.

QUESTION: Are you aware of any reports that China has told North Korea that it will cut off food aid to North Korea if they test a nuclear bomb?

MR. MCCORMACK: No.

QUESTION: Just to follow up on that, has the U.S. Government yet made any decision on whether it will provide additional food aid to North Korea in response to the 2005 appeal?

MR. MCCORMACK: I believe the decision on that is still pending and we have made donations in the past two years and going back as well of 50,000 metric tons and 100,000 metric tons. But as for the current decision, that's still pending.

Mr. John Karl.

QUESTION: Yeah, Sean, I'm sure you saw Foreign Minister Zebari's comments in The Washington Post and elsewhere basically saying he thinks the U.S. needs to be more involved in the political process in Iraq. I'm wondering your reaction to that. And also, where are we on a U.S. Ambassador to Iraq? I mean, it's been -- quite some time since Negroponte left. Is there a concern to such an important post go unfilled for so long?

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, Ambassador Khalilzad has been nominated by the President to fill Ambassador Negroponte's spot in Baghdad. He looks forward to a Senate hearing, which is going to happen next week on June 7th. And we would hope and urge a speedy confirmation process for him so he can get out to Embassy Baghdad and work with the great men and women of the State Department and other U.S. Government agencies that are working closely with the Iraqi Government on building political institutions, economic institutions, legal institutions and working on the security issue as well.

I think that, you know, if you look back at the series of meetings that we have, including the one yesterday between Dr. Rice and Minister Zebari, it's evident that our commitment to assisting the Iraqi people and building those institutions, as well as helping on the political process wherever we can, is really unquestionable. We have literally -- there are hundreds of contacts every single day between U.S. officials and Iraqi officials on a whole variety of issues.

But -- and it's clear this is an Iraqi process. This is part of their process of moving beyond the dark era of Saddam Hussein and writing a constitution that embodies the values that we see in the TAL and that reflect their culture, tradition and society.

So we are prepared and do stand ready to assist the Iraqis as they move through this constitution writing process. But at its core, certainly, this is an Iraqi process. If there are any adjustments in the level of effort or level of interaction that we need to make with the Iraqis, certainly we'll talk to them about it.

Any other on that topic?

QUESTION: Just one quick one, speaking about embassies. I might have missed this but has there been an announcement on an Ambassador to Kabul to replace Mr. Khalilzad?

MR. MCCORMACK: That I have to check on. I'm not -- let me check on that for you.

Yes.

QUESTION: Can you preview the administration's objectives at the OAS this weekend and early next week and specifically, whether or not Secretary or the President propose to and are looking maybe to create a committee to monitor the progress towards democracy in some of these countries?

MR. MCCORMACK: The Secretary is going to be traveling down to the OAS summit in Ft. Lauderdale. She's going to be leaving Sunday and many of you are going to coming with us. She looks forward to her meetings at the summit. As you know, the President will be speaking there as well.

I think we look at this summit as really a part of a transformational moment for the Organization of American States. We have a new dynamic Secretary General, a former cabinet minister, Minister Insulza, who has a vision for promoting democracy and reinforcing democracy in the region. I think that we support and we looking forward to not only meeting with him but meeting with all the member-states for a discussion on the importance of reinforcing democracies and the freedoms that the people of the hemisphere enjoy.

The theme, if you will, of the summit is delivering the benefits of democracy. So what does that mean? That means working for a more prosperous, safer and more free hemisphere. So we're going to talk about a variety of different mechanisms that the OAS as well as the member-states can look at to, perhaps, come to the assistance of those, as Secretary Rice has referred to, as those fragile democracies, those democracies where there are tensions, that are having difficulties. I think there have been a couple in the news.

So we're going to talk about that. I think we're open to talking about mechanisms, but I don't think I'm going to prejudge those conversations, other than to say that Secretary Rice looks forward to her meetings with her counterparts as well as Secretary General Insulza.

QUESTION: What kind of an OAS role does the U.S. support in Bolivia at the moment, which, as you said, is, well, is one of the countries in the news?

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, you know, again, I think that Bolivia is going to be, I'm sure, a topic of discussion down in Ft. Lauderdale. There have been -- to my knowledge, there haven't been any requests from the Bolivian Government for assistance. I think that, as I said, it would be a topic for discussion and that we ourselves are open to any variety of mechanisms in terms of general assistance to those fragile democracies in the region. But with respect to Bolivia, I don't have anything to share with you.

QUESTION: Rather than requesting assistance, what they've done is the Foreign Ministry issued a statement rejecting OAS mediation, which they have interpreted as what Richard was saying the other day. And because they don't want mediation by the OAS, is that something that the U.S. would also rule out?

MR. MCCORMACK: Again, I don't -- you know, I don't want to rule anything in or rule anything out at this point. What I'd prefer to do is -- what I prefer to do is actually let the discussions down there in Florida take place.

QUESTION: You won't rule it out. That seems to imply that it doesn't matter what the Bolivians think they need, they're saying we don't want mediation, they're saying, well, let the rest of us talk about it.

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, they themselves are going to be part of the conversation as well down in Florida. So what I'd prefer to do, if I could, is just let those conversations take place first.

QUESTION: Just to follow on the issue of these mechanisms, is the U.S. going to make any proposals for specific mechanisms?

MR. MCCORMACK: We are going to be talking about the Inter-American Democratic Charter and many different parties have talked about the Inter-American Democratic Charter, ways that that could be strengthened to look at that as one possible mechanism which we can talk about these issues. At this point, I don't have anything -- any particular proposals to share with you. I think that, again, we're going to be looking forward to a good discussion with the fellow OAS members down there in Ft. Lauderdale.

Elise.

QUESTION: Can you say anything about an American woman, an 18-year-old teen missing in Aruba? She's from Alabama. Her family believes that she's kidnapped. Have there been any discussions with authorities in Aruba or the Dutch Government?

MR. MCCORMACK: What I can share with you is that the Department learned on Tuesday, June 1st, that an American citizen was missing in Aruba. The citizen's name is Natalee Holloway and she was last seen on Monday night, I think, on May 31st. Natalee's family have arrived in Aruba and a consular officer from Curacao is in Aruba at this time and is in contact with the family. And we are making sure that we provide all possible assistance to the family and local authorities and would also note that the FBI is also on hand and cooperating with local authorities in the search effort. And beyond that, I can't really offer anything else, due to Privacy Act considerations.

Why don't we go in the back. Yes.

QUESTION: Mr. McCormack.

MR. MCCORMACK: Yes.

QUESTION: Congratulation and every success.

MR. MCCORMACK: Thank you very much.

QUESTION: Since you are new from the White House here to the State Department, how do you assess the Greek-U.S. relations and the prospects for a solution to the Cyprus problem?

MR. MCCORMACK: Well, the U.S. --

QUESTION: Welcome to the State Department.

MR. MCCORMACK: What's that?

QUESTION: Welcome to the State Department.

(Laughter.)

MR. MCCORMACK: I notice a little difference here.

In terms of U.S.-Greek relations, you know, the state of our relations is excellent. As for the issue of Cyprus, I think that this question comes up frequently in this room and I don't, at this point, don't have anything to add beyond what my esteemed predecessor has talked about on the topic recently.

Thank you very much.

(The briefing was concluded at 2:50 p.m.)

(end transcript)

(Distributed by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: June 5, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

122 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

June 3, 2005

U.S. Finds Few Efforts To Halt Human Trafficking in Arab Gulf; Gulf states serve as trafficking destination for sex trade, camel jockeys

BYLINE: David Shelby, Washington File Staff Writer

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 766 words

Washington ' Nearly all the Arab Gulf countries experienced a deterioration in efforts to combat human trafficking, according to the State Department's 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report. Four countries -- Kuwait, Qatar, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates -- fell to Tier 3 rankings, indicating that their governments are not making significant efforts to address the trafficking problem.

The report groups countries into three tiers according to their efforts to confront the problem of human trafficking. Tier 1 countries are in compliance with the minimum standards outlined in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000. Tier 2 countries are not in compliance with the minimum standards but are working to address the problem. Tier 3 countries are not making significant efforts to combat trafficking.

The Gulf countries are destination countries for people trafficked from South and Southeast Asia and from East Africa. Women are trafficked for the purpose of sexual exploitation and domestic servitude. Men are trafficked to work in forced labor. Children are trafficked to the Gulf to work as beggars and camel jockeys.

The report noted that the Kuwaiti government outlawed the use of children as camel jockeys and made public statements condemning human trafficking during 2004, but it said Kuwait made no apparent effort to prosecute traffickers.

The report said that Kuwait has made no effort to protect victims of trafficking. Domestic servants are not protected under Kuwait's labor law, and victims of trafficking are often detained, jailed and either deported for immigration violations or returned to abusive employers.

Qatar adopted a National Action Plan on human trafficking in 2003 calling for public awareness campaigns, establishment of a complaints hotline, an end to the use of child camel jockeys, and training for judges on trafficking issues, but, according to the report, most of the plan's provisions remain unimplemented.

The report says that Saudi Arabia has not protected victims of trafficking or prosecuted those responsible for the human trade.

"Despite reports of trafficking and abuses of domestic and other unskilled workers and children, there is evidence of only one Saudi Government prosecution of a Saudi employer for a trafficking-related offense during the reporting period," the report said.

The report says Saudi Arabia lacks laws criminalizing human trafficking and does not provide protection for domestic workers under its labor laws. It also says that cases of abuse involving foreign workers are seldom subject to criminal prosecution.

The trafficking of young boys to serve as jockeys for camel races remains a widespread problem in the United Arab Emirates, with victims numbering in the thousands, the report said. The Emirates is also a major destination for women trafficked into the sex trade. The report says that the United Arab Emirates government has made no significant effort to confront the problem. It says that decrees and laws regarding human trafficking have largely remained unenforced.

The report noted that the United Arab Emirates government has recently stated its intention to address the trafficking problem through new legislation on camel jockeys and closer monitoring of visas and passports of foreign nationals entering the country.

The report places Bahrain in the group of Tier 2 countries, saying that it is making efforts to confront its problems with human trafficking. Nevertheless, it places Bahrain on a "watch list" on the grounds that it has failed to follow through on its national anti-trafficking action plan with concrete measures aimed at protecting victims and prosecuting traffickers.

The State Department issues its annual Trafficking in Persons Report pursuant to a congressional mandate. Presenting the 2005 report on June 3, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, "All states must work together to close down trafficking routes, prosecute and convict traffickers, and protect and reintegrate victims into society."

"The responsibility does not rest only with developing countries, whose citizens are vulnerable to trafficking because of poverty or corruption or lack of education. Destination or demand countries, like the United States and other prosperous nations, whose citizens create the marketplace for trafficking, also bear a heavy responsibility," she added.

The full text of the report is available on the State Department's Web site.

(The Washington File is a product of the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: June 5, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

123 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

June 3, 2005

State Department Releases 2005 Trafficking In Persons Report; Miller discusses annual review of anti-trafficking efforts of 150 nations

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILELENGTH: 5212 words

The U.S. Department of State released June 3 its fifth annual Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP), which estimates that as many as 800,000 victims may be transported across international borders each year and forced to work against their will. The report surveys the counter-trafficking activities in 150 nations, 10 more than in 2004.

Ambassador John Miller, the director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, said at a June 3 Washington press briefing that sex slavery is the largest category of transnational slavery and, to combat it, the United States is urging a greater focus on demand and on educating and dissuading the "customers."

Miller also cited labor exploitation, particularly involuntary servitude of foreign workers, as receiving greater attention in the 2005 report.

The U.S. law mandates the annual international survey, which ranks countries in three tiers: Tier 1 indicates that a nation is in compliance with international standards; Tier 3 denotes countries that are not. A Tier 2 designation is given to countries that are not meeting the minimum standards but are making significant efforts to do so. Placement in Tier 3 could make a nation subject to U.S. sanctions.

Miller said that four countries -- Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates -- have been placed in Tier 3, primarily for their failure to make significant efforts to combat forced labor trafficking.

The TIP report uses tier ratings to emphasize government efforts against human trafficking -- especially in terms of prosecution and protection, rather than just the extent, of the slavery problem, according to Miller.

"I'm happy to note that the Tier 2 warning watch list, introduced last year, has been very effective. 31 of the 46 countries on the 2004 TIP reports Tier 2 watch list improve their ratings this year," Miller said.

The full text of the report is available on the State Department's Web site.

Following is the transcript of Miller's press briefing:

(begin transcript)

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE

Office of the Spokesman

For Immediate Release

June 3, 2005

ON-THE-RECORD BRIEFING

Senior Advisor on Trafficking in Persons, Ambassador John R. Miller

On the Release of the Fifth Annual Department of State

"Trafficking in Persons Report"

June 3, 2005

Washington, D.C.

(12:00 p.m. EDT)

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Thank you, Madame Secretary. As Secretary of State Rice eloquently explained, human trafficking or trafficking in persons is synonymous with slavery. Now, this is a time when we roll out this report with facts, with figures, with categories, but this report is, more than anything, about human beings. And so I want to start by telling you about Svetlana, an all too typical victim of human trafficking.

Last year, Svetlana was a young woman living in Belarus, looking for a job. She came upon some Turkish men who promised her a well-paying job in Istanbul and once Svetlana crossed the border, the men seized her money, her papers, her passport. They locked her up. They forced her into prostitution. And then one night, they farmed her out to two businessmen, just like a commodity. Desperate, Svetlana jumped out of a window and fell six stories to a sidewalk. According to Turkish court documents, the so-called customers went down, found her on the sidewalk and instead of calling the police, called the traffickers, who killed her.

Svetlana's body lay unclaimed in the morgue for two weeks until Turkish authorities learned her identity and sent her body to Belarus. There is a bright spot in this too common tragedy. Belarusian and Turkish authorities cooperated this year to arrest and charge those responsible for Svetlana's death, which I think brings out that bad things are happening, but also how there are counterattacks going on.

Svetlana and other victims' stories are interspersed throughout the introduction to this year's report. I think you've all got copies of it. And they're there so that we may always remember what this struggle is about. Trafficking in persons relies on coercion and exploitation. It thrives on converting hope to fear. It is maintained through violence and it is highly profitable. In that sense, while there are differences, there are also similarities to the slavery of earlier centuries. U.S. Government is committed to taking action in cooperation with other nations to end modern-day slavery and that is the ultimate purpose of this annual Trafficking in Persons Report, which we're releasing today for the fifth year.

This is a tool, along with the assessment of the United States, which comes out later this month -- one of many tools to help free the slaves and throw traffickers in jail. Trafficking is not simply a crime against human rights. It amounts to a public health menace and a rich source of financing for organized crime. It's a dangerous and perverse mutation of otherwise beneficial global exchange. We believe that modern day slavery plagues every, every country, including the United States. This report covers 150 countries found to be a source destination or transit country, for on the order of 100 victims, the threshold for inclusion in the report.

If you find a country is not listed, it probably means we have insufficient knowledge of slavery in that country or else the government in the country cannot exercise sufficient control to be evaluated. Our sources of information are diverse: law enforcement, U.S. embassies, NGOs, daring activists, foreign governments, our own visits. Everything enters the mix, extensive analysis and debate goes into the assessment of each country and assignment into Tier 1, Tier 2, Tier 2 watch list, or Tier 3.

We didn't design the system. Congress designed the system with important help from nongovernmental organization and faith-based communities. I'm happy to note that the Tier 2 warning watch list, introduced last year, has been very effective. 31 of the 46 countries on the 2004 TIP reports, Tier 2 watch list improve their ratings this year. The increased scrutiny of these countries' anti-trafficking efforts required of us by Congress has led to the State Department's greater engagement with these governments. More important, it has led to greater efforts by the governments themselves.

For the third year, Tier 3 countries can be sanctioned if they don't take significant anti-slavery action in the next few months. I'm encouraged to note several countries that were on Tier 3 last June stepped up anti-slavery activities so that they have been raised. In South America, Guyana's president pushed through the country's first anti-trafficking law and led a countrywide awareness campaign on the dangers of trafficking. In South Asia, Bangladesh set up a long-promised special anti-trafficking police unit, which started new investigations while rescuing an increased number of victims.

When we look at slavery worldwide, we believe sex slavery is the largest category of transnational slavery. It is intrinsically linked to prostitution and we find that where prostitution is encouraged, the number of victims increases. That is why to combat sex slavery, we are urging a greater focus on demand, educating and dissuading the so-called customers. But while sex slavery is large, we are concerned with all forms of slavery. This year, trafficking through labor exploitation, particularly in voluntary servitude of foreign laborers, received greater attention. This greater emphasis came as a result of better data obtained from source countries and nongovernmental organizations. Four countries are placed on

Tier 3 for their failure primarily to make significant efforts to combat forced labor trafficking: Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates.

The forced labor may involve foreign workers who end up in conditions of involuntary servitude or child camel jockeys who live in slave-like conditions and are forced to race in extremely dangerous environments.

Burma and North Korea, Sudan and Cuba remain on Tier 3, largely because they still fail to address forced labor in their countries. Another government, Cambodia, is on Tier 3 because of government complicity in trafficking in persons -- another important criteria for Tier 3 and the law.

The report covers efforts from March 2004 to March 2005. Some governments have taken steps against slavery since the report was drafted. This is great. Ecuador was placed on Tier 3 again this year for its lack of significant efforts during the reporting period. Two days ago, Ecuador's congress passed criminal code changes that could lead to positive progress in fighting slavery.

The country ratings here, the government ratings are based strictly on government actions to combat trafficking in persons as defined by U.S. law. The standards are set up for the Trafficking Victim Protection Act and are applied equally to every country. We examine each country individually. The goal of the report is not to punish but to stimulate government action to end modern day slavery. We hope all Tier 3 countries will move off Tier 3 within the 90-day grace period by taking concrete steps to combat trafficking in persons. We are prepared to work with them to help achieve this.

At the same time, nowhere on earth is it allowable to systematically abuse children for sport or to stand up while household help is trapped and exploited with no recourse to help or to look the other way while sex traffickers seize young women.

I'd like to address one misperception that is developed around this Trafficking in Persons Report. The Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 requires Tier ratings to emphasize government efforts against human trafficking, especially in terms of prosecution, protection and prevention, rather than just the extent of the slavery problem. Under the law, countries that have substantial anti-trafficking in person efforts underway justify higher ratings, even if they have a large trafficking in person problem.

Now, stepping back and looking around the world, the picture is not all bleak. Shining through this global tragedy are many rays of hope. In addition to the tremendous efforts of heroic individuals and private organizations, governments around the globe are awakening to this issue and taking action to end this form of modern day slavery.

Worldwide, this past year, the number of trafficking related convictions has increased over 3,000. And new anti-human trafficking legislation was approved in 39 countries. That's a big change from five or ten years ago.

We're seeing progress on many fronts. In this year's report, several countries on Tier 1 showed anti-trafficking in person leadership through strong policies and implementation of laws. South Korea launched a brave initiative to close down outlets for commercial sexual exploitation and trafficking, arresting over 500 people and rescuing over 1,000 victims.

Sweden continued its path-breaking program to prosecute exploiters and clients of prostitution while identifying and protecting women in commercial sexual exploitation. Sweden has funded anti-trafficking information campaigns throughout Europe, focusing on curbing demand for trafficking victims.

Morocco has led efforts to hold accountable UN peacekeepers guilty of sexual abuse of minors in areas of UN deployment. The report on pages 33 and 38 identifies international best practices and anti-slavery heroes throughout the world. And those sections could have been much longer, believe me.

The best practices are wide and varied and all are commendable, but let me highlight a few. The Indian NGO Shakti Vahini produces an informative Indian Trafficking in Persons Report that rates anti-slavery efforts in Indian states. The Malawian nongovernmental organization People Serving Girls at Risk works to identify and help underage girls in prostitution through undercover outreach. And the Fahmina Institute of Indonesia engages Islamic boarding schools to spread anti-trafficking awareness.

The anti-slavery heroes cited in the report, a few out of thousands, range from Ansar Burney the Pakistani human rights activist who has sought to help Asian and African children who have been trafficked to the Arabian Gulf countries for exploitation, as camel jockeys. To Somaly Mam and Pierre Legros of the French NGO AFESIP who braved personal threats from traffickers to rescue victims of sex slavery in Southeast Asia.

The U.S. is deeply committed to fulfilling its responsibilities in the fight against trafficking in persons. And that's why we contributed an excess of $80 million abroad for all kinds of anti-trafficking programs last year. In January, President George W. Bush said, "no one is fit to be a master and no one deserves to be a slave." And because of the stain of slavery, on our own history, these words have special meaning to us and they guide our efforts against trafficking in persons, based on our strong belief in freedom and human dignity. As the Secretary has stated, modern slavery has been met and is being met with a growing powerful response -- a 21st century abolitionist movement. We must all do our part.

Thank you and let's turn to questions. Oh, my gosh. Okay, yes. Go ahead. Yeah.

QUESTION: Andrea Mitchell from NBC. Can you tell us regarding Saudi Arabia, Qatar, Kuwait, the UAE, whether you believe that it was the prior sanctions to get some action? In particular in Saudi Arabia, they have moved backwards, not forward since last year's report. And you've got four countries that are major allies of the United States in the war on terror and in military operations that are chief abusers in this practice.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Well, I won't disagree with your characterization of the situation. It is serious, for example, in Saudi Arabia we have domestic workers being brought in from many countries into domestic servitude -- child beggars, a lot of beatings, reports of beatings and rape, very difficult to get shelter, no convictions. But you're -- the first part of your question was: Is this going to lead to sanctions? My answer is I hope not because the purpose of the law is not to sanction, it is to get progress in freeing the victims and throwing the traffickers in jail.

QUESTION: They've moved backwards in the last year.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Wait a minute -- that's...

QUESTION: Will it require sanctions?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: If they stay in Tier 3, it will require sanctions. However, the reason why I hope this will not take place is under the law, there are now three months for any government in Tier 3 to take significant steps against trafficking and we're prepared to work with these governments, including the governments you mentioned. Our hope is there will be enough progress in freeing the victims and throwing the traffickers in jail that at the end of 120 days, there will not have to be sanctions, but there is that possibility.

Yes.

QUESTION: Can I follow-up on that?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: This law has been in effect for five years?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: Could you say how many countries and which ones have been sanctioned until now?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah. There have been several countries sanctioned. But the interesting thing is that countries that are willing to work on this issue in the past, we've had several relationships with, have avoided sanctions by taking action in the three months or four months after the report.

For example, two years ago, we placed Turkey and Greece, two NATO allies, on Tier 3. But in the four months over the summer, the arrests, the prosecutions, the setting up of referral systems to get victims to nongovernmental organizations, the setting up of shelters, there was significant progress made, which we were delighted with. So the purpose here is not to result in sanctions, although that may happen, it is to get progress.

Yes. Go ahead.

QUESTION: Under which capacity, the United States is preparing in those type of reports, interfering in the internal affairs of sovereign countries?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: I'm sorry. Could you just repeat the question again?

QUESTION: Yes. Under which capacity, the United States of America is preparing, those type of reports interfering in the internal affairs of sovereign countries?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Okay. Well, this is not the first time I've heard that question. The answer -- that is that reminds me of a question that was asked William Wilberforce. On the floor of the English Parliament, back in the 1790s when he discovered, realized the extent of slavery and started his campaign to end the slave trade, and the question that was asked of him by another parliamentarian was: Will the right honorable gentleman tell me what rights we have to impose British moral values on the world? Wilberforce, who was alone in Parliament when he started this action, cited universal and religious values, to show that people nowhere wanted slavery.

Today, we have -- the case is much stronger because unlike in Wilberforce's time, no government in the world, that I'm aware of, officially endorses slavery and there are numerous international covenants, UN covenants, that nations of the world have subscribed to that are -- banned slavery.

So I would say in this effort that we're participating in, we are trying both at home and abroad to work with other countries in trying to end a slavery, that citizens around the world and ostensibly, governments around the world, all agree is a scourge that should be ended. Let's take somebody in the back.

Yeah, go ahead.

QUESTION: Advocacy organizations around the world are saying that poverty and lack of job opportunities is one of the causes of women or families being vulnerable to slavery. To what extent is the United States prepared to relieve debt to World Bank or IMF loans and other forms to substantially improve the quality of life and services in nations around the world vulnerable?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Sure. Well, as Ambassador-at-large on international slavery, I'm not the U.S. expert or authority on international debt, but I want to comment on the premise of your question. You identified poverty as a major cause of slavery and slave trade and I would agree it is a major cause. There are a lot of studies that have been done in the last couple of years -- I won't cite them all -- that show, however, that it is one of several major causes. Poverty is a push factor. There is the pull factor of the attraction of the better life in the wealthier country. There is the factor of gender attitudes. Believe me, when you look at sex slavery and parts of domestic servitude slavery, gender attitudes play a big role.

There is the role of organized crime and greed. I mean, this is a big source of revenue for organized crime. I mean, now they -- we talked about the arms trade, the drug trade, and the people trade being sources of revenue for organized crime.

So all of these causes we hope will be addressed, but in the meantime -- in the meantime -- we are seeking, through our office, to do what we can to work with other countries to get better law enforcement, get better protection for victims, and get prevention and education campaigns.

Yes.

QUESTION: To what extent are the efforts in the United States to identify victims and to give them the T-4 visa programs they -- to what extent are those efforts successful and why are not --

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: How many victims have been identified to date?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: And what are the problems in identifying victims?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah. That's a very good question. Did everybody hear -- should I be repeating the questions or --

QUESTION: No, that's fine. We don't mind.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: You can hear, okay. Your question about identifying victims in the United States, you put your finger on a problem that is -- confronts the United States and almost every country in the world. The gap between what are estimated to be the number of victims and the actual number of victims getting help -- just two weeks ago, President Bush's task force on trafficking in persons consisting of cabinet officers chaired by Secretary of State Rice discussed this issue and the Health and Human Services Secretary Leavitt specifically brought up, as an area where we need to do more, exactly that.

What has been done? And the gap is such -- to give you an idea of the gap, I believe the figure now is about roughly 700 people have been helped with temporary visas in the United States. They cooperate in prosecutions, get assistance and all that, yet we know the figure -- we suspect -- we don't scientifically know, since victims don't stand in line to be -- raise their hands to be counted, but we suspect that the figure for the number of victims annually crossing into the United States across our borders every year is in excess of 14 and a half thousand. So there's a gap.

Presently, Health and Human Services has pilot programs in ten -- I believe it's soon to be 20 cities -- trying to reach out to the foreign migrant communities to help victims come forward. We are starting to consider another additional approach, a work sector approach, and Health and Human Services has done some work on this, but this approach would involve mobilizing or involving doctors, hospitals, lawyers, travel industry personnel in this effort to try to help victims come forward.

So you're right in identifying one of the big challenges.

Yes, back?

QUESTION: Can I follow up on this question, sir?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah. Well, just --

QUESTION: It's on this particular area.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Okay.

QUESTION: Can you speak about what the U.S. is doing to just not only identify victims, but to combat demand, as the Secretary said? You just said that nowhere on earth --

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: Is it acceptable, so --

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Right.

QUESTION: -- what is the U.S. doing? And it's your -- you just mentioned that you were the Ambassador of international slavery. Is this a new title or are you just kind of encapsulating what it is that the --

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Well, it's -- I guess it's sort of new. It's -- Congress and the President raised the position to ambassadorial status -- well, I was confirmed by the Senate nine months ago and in the previous year, I guess the end of 2003, legislation was passed raising this position to ambassadorial status. In addition, I -- at the direction of the President, I chair a -- under that Presidential task force I referred to, I chair a senior policy operating group of domestic and foreign U.S. agencies trying to coordinate policies.

Now, let's get to the first part of your question: demand and what's being done in the United States. I think if you look at the United States and around the world, you'll see there are a lot of demand education programs directed at potential victims. However, what you don't see yet are a lot of programs directed at the demand for the victims. That is starting to change in the United States.

I'll give you a good example. There is an organization, SAGE in San Francisco, with U.S. taxpayers' support, that first convinced the San Francisco law enforcement authorities to arrest not just the women engaged in prostitution, who might be trafficking victims, but arrest the traffickers, the pimps, the brothel owners, and the so-called customers. And then that organization convinced the authorities that a fine should be imposed on the first offense so there would be a school, which has the name, John School, that these men would have to go to. I visited there a couple of weeks ago and this school now has been going for some time, appears to have very good results, two percent recidivism rate.

This program has now spread in different forms to 15 or 20 U.S. cities. I think it's going to spread further and we are discussing with different countries around the world how this could be replicated in those countries to address demand. For example, we're in discussions with the Korean Ministry of Gender and Equality on that issue.

Yes, in the back. Go ahead.

QUESTION: Are you saying that the Brazil Government is making progress, but is not fully complying? Could you say what needs to be done?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Sure. Brazil, I believe, if I'm not mistaken, is listed in Tier 2, which is the upper category of the report. I visited Brazil last fall. One of the positive things going on in Brazil: Brazil has started setting up, in different provinces, anti-trafficking in persons efforts.

I think one of the problems that Brazil faces is that while there has been tremendous government interest, the President of Brazil has spoken out very strongly on this issue, but if you look at the actual finished product in law enforcement, three convictions last year, coming out of scores and scores of investigations and hundreds and hundreds of victims -- so, I think in that area, they can do more. They can do more in terms of their awareness campaigns and their protection efforts for victims, but I would say law enforcement would be the major area.

I hope I'm calling -- yes, go ahead.

QUESTION: You mentioned Canada as a transit country.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yes.

QUESTION: With some of these sex trade workers.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: And although Canada is in Tier 1, how would you rate Canada in terms of this problem and what do you think Canada should do to improve the situation?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Okay. Well, you're talking about Canada as a transit country and Canada has done some very aggressive things the last year. We have a specific transit problem we have to address with Canada and I think it's referred to in the report. I hope it's referred to. And the challenge that we face is that there are migrants from the Far East that come into Canada -- for example, Korea, they don't need a visa and then they just come across the U.S. border and we -- there's a lot of evidence that there's hundreds of such victims involved.

We're going to have to -- we're working on this with Canada and Korea. We're going to see what we can do to try to address this problem. That's an example.

I'm sorry, there's so -- yes? There's so many people. Go ahead.

MR. CASEY: Mr. Ambassador I'm afraid we're going to have to make this limited to a couple more people. So why don't you take that one and then I know Teri wanted to get in --

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Okay. Oh, Teri -- no, no, no, no. Okay, yes. Okay, I'll take two. Go ahead.

QUESTION: Yeah. Ambassador Miller, my name is Wen Ha (ph), Radio Free Asia.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: I didn't hear -- you didn't mention anything about Vietnam.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: However, the problem is there. You know, like there -- now, Vietnam last year was on Tier 2 watch list.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Watch list, yes.

QUESTION: On the Tier 2 --

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: It's not on the watch list anymore.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: My question is, what is the method that you used to -- in order to classify Vietnam to Tier 2 watch list?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: To -- well, we thought they --

QUESTION: Did you find -- yeah, did you send a fact-finding team to Vietnam?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah, yeah. We have had -- Vietnam made some significant progress in the last year. For example, we were very critical of Vietnam before on exporting Vietnamese labor and cooperating with what we thought were slave owners in other countries, including one operation in American Samoa. But they have stepped in and are giving much better supervision and control. Their number of convictions has increased, so there's been some progress in Vietnam.

Teri, Teri? No, I've got to -- no, Teri -- I ignored her last year.

QUESTION: He ignored me last year.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: I didn't call on her. I got to -- okay.

QUESTION: Okay, thank you. Ambassador Miller, a couple of things. You didn't actually tell us who has been sanctioned when you talked about sanctions and I wanted to go back to the question of these very close allies: Kuwait, UAE, Saudi Arabia. And could you -- you've been to these countries and you've had discussions with these leaders about these issues --

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: -- and many of them have laws in place, not to mention authoritarian regimes that should be able to enforce these laws, one would think. Could you help us understand why they aren't doing more, especially being such close allies of the U.S. in counterterrorism, for example? And we really do want to know who's been sanctioned.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: I'm glad you've -- the toughest question comes last. Well, in terms of countries that have been sanctioned, if you look at the countries in -- nobody has been sanctioned this year. If you look at the countries from last year's report, and we can -- I can't recall them from memory, but you can -- our staff can get them to you, but your -- the tough part of your question was -- well, here are close friends of the United States; how can this happen? Two years ago, I was asked about Greece and Turkey; how can allies be on Tier 3?

I believe that this is a function, to a large extent, of information and public awareness, that as public awareness increases in these countries, you see more action. For example, just for example, in Saudi Arabia, a recent case involving an Indonesian young woman tortured, beaten, dumped at a hospital -- domestic servitude case has gotten publicity. A human rights lawyer in Saudi Arabia has protested there and I don't know how it's all going to come out, but they're -- apparently in the last month, there was an arrest made.

As public awareness increases -- and sometimes when countries don't have free flows of information, that's hard -- but as public awareness increases, I don't think people want slavery today and this is where one of the signs of progress has been the exponential increase of news media attention to this issue the last couple of years.

Since I'm at the end here, I want to tell you, when you write on this -- when you write on this, I know you're journalists and all that -- but when you write on this issue, you indirectly help free victims and throw traffickers in jail because it increases public awareness. People become more aware all over the world. They become more aware in the United States. They start talking to their local police. They start talking to their public officials.

Good things happen when -- so -- but the last comment, I am -- so, I have a meeting coming up with foreign ambassadors and then NGOs.

I know there are a lot of people that didn't get to ask questions. If --

QUESTION: You're going to come up, sir. We have about 10 minutes to (inaudible) --

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Oh, I've got 10 more minutes, okay. And -- but we've also got people on our staff: Eleanor Kennelly, Caroline Tetschner that even if I have to move out after five or ten minutes can answer questions.

So thank you all for coming. I appreciate it.

(end transcript)

(Distributed by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: June 5, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

124 of 359 DOCUMENTS

PR Newswire
Public Interest Services
Delivering the most policy, issue & advocacy news
U.S. Newswire

June 3, 2005 Friday 5:16 PM EST

State Department Releases 2005 Trafficking Report

SECTION: NATIONAL DESK

LENGTH: 616 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 3

Helsinki Commission Co-Chairman Chris Smith (R-NJ), the author of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act and the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act, released the following statement regarding the success and positive impact of the State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report, released today for the fifth year. The report was mandated by Smith's first trafficking bill, signed in October 2000 (Public Law 106-386).

"Since its inception in 2001, the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report has been a powerful tool to encourage governments around the world to address the growing problem of trafficking in human beings for forced labor and sexual exploitation.

"The 2005 Report includes an analysis of 150 countries. This is ten more than the previous year's publication, and the most countries ever included in the report.

"A review of the report shows that over the past year, a stronger response from governments, an increase in public awareness of victim protection services, and a successful effort in anti-trafficking practices have occurred in many countries. Thirty-four countries improved their tier status, a sign of the system's success and effectiveness. Regrettably, some other governments' efforts lagged in the past year, resulting in the downward assessment of twenty-six countries. While it is disturbing that many strong allies of the United States fell into Tier 3, I commend the State Department for allowing the facts with regard to human trafficking to determine each country's tier placement, rather than unrelated political considerations.

"The 2005 TIP report includes an informative list of 'International Best Practices' consisting of examples of innovative and effective anti-trafficking policies, such as the Czech Republic's screening and identification procedures, as well as Estonia's campaign to raise public awareness on global trafficking.

"This year's report brings needed attention to the problem of peacekeepers' complicity in the sexual exploitation of vulnerable populations, including through trafficking, and highlights some positive steps underway to prevent such exploitation.

"In addition, this year's report includes data provided by foreign governments on trafficking-related investigations, prosecutions, convictions, and sentences. As in our own country, the number of traffickers prosecuted and convicted has increased by nearly 300% since enactment of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000. Likewise, the number of worldwide convictions increased this past year to more than 3000 convictions, as more countries acquired the legal tools necessary to combat trafficking and the political will to implement those tools."

To support the U.S. Government's ongoing efforts to combat human trafficking, on February 17, Smith introduced the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2005, H.R. 972. The bill would reauthorize appropriations for anti- trafficking programs in the United States and abroad. The bill also offers solutions to specific scenarios in which trafficking is a problem and which experience has shown could benefit from additional initiatives.

The Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe, also known as the Helsinki Commission, is a U.S. Government agency that monitors progress in the implementation of the provisions of the 1975 Helsinki Accords. The Commission consists of nine members from the United States Senate, nine from the House of Representatives, and one member each from the Departments of State, Defense and Commerce.

<http://www.usnewswire.com/>

Contact: James E. Geoffrey, II of the U.S. Helsinki Commission, 202-225-1901; Web: <http://www.csce.gov>

LOAD-DATE: June 4, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2005 PR Newswire Association LLC
All Rights Reserved

125 of 359 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 3, 2005 Friday 7:31 AM EST

KEY U.S. GULF ALLIES CITED IN HUMAN TRAFFICKING REPORTBYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 803 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The Voice of America issued the following story:

By David Gollust

State Department

The U.S. State Department, in a congressionally mandated report, has cited 14 countries, including key Gulf allies Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, for failing to take adequate steps to combat human trafficking. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice says the U.S. reports have helped generate a modern day abolitionist movement against forced labor and sexual exploitation.

The State Department's fifth annual Trafficking in Persons report covered 150 countries, 10 more than last year. And the list of countries whose efforts against the problem were deemed inadequate rose from 10 in 2004 to 14 this year, and included U.S. Gulf allies Saudi Arabia and Kuwait.

At a news conference launching this year's report, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said as many as 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders each year, and millions more are trafficked within various countries.

She said trafficking, for sexual exploitation, forced labor and other forms of servitude, is nothing less than a modern form of slavery, and that the U.S. reports, mandated by an act of Congress in 2000, have contributed to a growing international movement against it.

"To confront the abomination of human trafficking, a modern-day abolitionist movement has emerged," Secretary Rice said. "Concerned citizens, students, faith-based organizations, feminists and other non-governmental groups are doing courageous and compassionate work to end this trade in human degradation. The United States government is proud to stand with them at the forefront of this international anti-trafficking campaign."

The report, based on information gathered by U.S. diplomatic posts, non-governmental groups and other sources, divides countries into three categories, based on their efforts to deal with the trafficking problem.

Those given the lowest ranking, so called Tier Three countries, could face a cutoff of non-humanitarian U.S. aid or other penalties, if they do not take remedial steps by the end of September.

In addition to Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, this year's Tier-Three list also includes Gulf countries Qatar and the United Arab Emirates.

The report said the Gulf states were destinations for men, women and children from South and East Asia and Africa, trafficked for labor exploitation, including children forced to work as camel jockeys.

Six countries faulted last year appeared again: Burma, Cuba, Ecuador, North Korea, Sudan and Venezuela. The others in Tier Three are Bolivia, Cambodia, Jamaica and Togo.

The East Asian, Latin American and African states placed in Tier Three were said to be source or destination countries for women and children trafficked for sexual exploitation and forced labor.

The report said North Korea, a perennial third tier nation, does not even recognize trafficking as a problem and imposes slave labor conditions on state prisoners and repatriated citizens.

The head of the State Department's anti-trafficking office, former U.S. Congressman John Miller, said only a handful of countries have actually faced U.S. penalties, and that the point of annual exercise is not to sanction, but to prod countries into action.

"The goal of the report is not to punish, but to stimulate government action to end modern-day slavery," Cong. Miller said. "We hope that all Tier Three countries will move off Tier Three within the 90-day grace period, by taking concrete steps to combat trafficking in persons. We're prepared to work with them to help achieve this."

Mr. Miller said that since the new report was compiled, one Third Tier country, Ecuador, has already taken action, with its congress this week approving changes in the country's criminal code to deal with trafficking.

He said several countries listed in the bottom category last year, including Guyana and Bangladesh, were moved up this year because of remedial steps.

Mr. Miller also commended South Korea for what he termed a brave initiative to curb the sex trade in that country, and Sweden for similar action and for a Europe-wide information campaign focused on curbing demand for trafficking victims.

The 256 page report does not rank the United States, though Secretary Rice said in an accompanying letter that it is dealing with its own trafficking problem. Mr. Miller estimated that nearly 15,000 people are trafficked to the United States each year.

For Gollust report - Download 531k, visit:

http://www.voanews.com/mediaassets/english/2005_06/Audio/rm/GollustStateDeptHumanTrafficking3Jun05.rm.

To listen to Gollust report, visit:

<http://www.voanews.com/english/fileaf/ramfilegenerate.cfm?filepath=http%3A%2F%2Fwww%2Evoanews%2Ecom%2Fmediaassets%2Fenglish%2F2005%5F06%2FAudio%2Frm%2FGollustStateDeptHumanTrafficking3Jun05%2Er>.

LOAD-DATE: July 16, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

126 of 359 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 3, 2005 Friday 5:29 AM EST

2005 TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT

BYLINE: US States News

LENGTH: 336 words

DATELINE: GEORGETOWN, Guyana

The U.S. Embassy issued the following press release:

The U.S. Embassy is pleased to announce that Guyana appears on Tier 2 of the fifth annual Trafficking in Persons Report prepared by the U.S. Department of State. Guyana made appreciable progress during the last year in the fight against human trafficking. The new trafficking in persons legislation coupled with increased national awareness programs sponsored by the government will give new hope to Guyanese victims of this egregious crime.

The 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report is a reminder that the battle against human traffickers has only just begun. It is important to continue to build on the important steps taken in Guyana during the last year. By prosecuting human traffickers and partnering with non-government organizations to improve services to victims, Guyana will build on the progress made during the last year. Continued commitment to complementary legislation, such as the age of consent bill under consideration by the National Assembly, will provide additional protection for potential trafficking victims.

The crime of human trafficking impacts us all. It deprives people of their most basic human rights and freedoms. It is a public health risk and it fuels organized crime. It is a problem that cannot be ignored by any of us in the world community. To that end, the United States is committed to partner with the Government of Guyana to combat human trafficking wherever it is found.

The entire TIP Report will be available on-line at www.state.gov/g/tip shortly after Secretary Rice releases the report on June 3. The Secretary's statement at the June 3 press event, and the statement of and fielding of media questions by G/TIP Director and Senior Advisor to the Secretary Ambassador John Miller will also be available on the State Department's Website.

To read the letter to the editor written by Paula Dobriansky, Under Secretary for Global Affairs, U.S. Department of State visit: www.georgetown.usembassy.gov/guyana/tip_oped.html

LOAD-DATE: June 12, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

127 of 359 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 3, 2005 Friday 4:52 AM EST

AMBASSADOR MILLER BRIEFS PRESS ON RELEASE OF TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT

BYLINE: US States News

LENGTH: 4799 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons issued the text of the following speech:

Ambassador John R. Miller, Senior Advisor on Trafficking in Persons

(12:00 p.m. EDT)

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Thank you, Madame Secretary. As Secretary of State Rice eloquently explained, human trafficking or trafficking in persons is synonymous with slavery. Now, this is a time when we roll out this report with facts, with figures, with categories, but this report is, more than anything, about human beings. And so I want to start by telling you about Svetlana, an all too typical victim of human trafficking.

Last year, Svetlana was a young woman living in Belarus, looking for a job. She came upon some Turkish men who promised her a well-paying job in Istanbul and once Svetlana crossed the border, the men seized her money, her papers, her passport. They locked her up. They forced her into prostitution. And then one night, they farmed her out to two businessmen, just like a commodity. Desperate, Svetlana jumped out of a window and fell six stories to a sidewalk. According to Turkish court documents, the so-called customers went down, found her on the sidewalk and instead of calling the police, called the traffickers, who killed her.

Svetlana's body lay unclaimed in the morgue for two weeks until Turkish authorities learned her identity and sent her body to Belarus. There is a bright spot in this too common tragedy. Belarusian and Turkish authorities cooperated this year to arrest and charge those responsible for Svetlana's death, which I think brings out that bad things are happening, but also how there are counterattacks going on.

Svetlana and other victims' stories are interspersed throughout the introduction to this year's report. I think you've all got copies of it. And they're there so that we may always remember what this struggle is about. Trafficking in persons relies on coercion and exploitation. It thrives on converting hope to fear. It is maintained through violence and it is highly profitable. In that sense, while there are differences, there are also similarities to the slavery of earlier centuries. U.S. Government is committed to taking action in cooperation with other nations to end modern-day slavery and that is the ultimate purpose of this annual Trafficking in Persons Report, which we're releasing today for the fifth year.

This is a tool, along with the assessment of the United States, which comes out later this month - one of many tools to help free the slaves and throw traffickers in jail. Trafficking is not simply a crime against human rights. It amounts to a public health menace and a rich source of financing for organized crime. It's a dangerous and perverse mutation of otherwise beneficial global exchange. We believe that modern day slavery plagues every, every country, including the United States. This report covers 150 countries found to be a source destination or transit country, for on the order of 100 victims, the threshold for inclusion in the report.

If you find a country is not listed, it probably means we have insufficient knowledge of slavery in that country or else the government in the country cannot exercise sufficient control to be evaluated. Our sources of information are diverse: law enforcement, U.S. embassies, NGOs, daring activists, foreign governments, our own visits. Everything enters the mix, extensive analysis and debate goes into the assessment of each country and assignment into Tier 1, Tier 2, Tier 2 watch list, or Tier 3.

We didn't design the system. Congress designed the system with important help from nongovernmental organization and faith-based communities. I'm happy to note that the Tier 2 warning watch list, introduced last year, has been very effective. 31 of the 46 countries on the 2004 TIP reports, Tier 2 watch list improve their ratings this year. The increased scrutiny of these countries' anti-trafficking efforts required of us by Congress has led to the State Department's greater engagement with these governments. More important, it has led to greater efforts by the governments themselves.

For the third year, Tier 3 countries can be sanctioned if they don't take significant anti-slavery action in the next few months. I'm encouraged to note several countries that were on Tier 3 last June stepped up anti-slavery activities so that they have been raised. In South America, Guyana's president pushed through the country's first anti-trafficking law and led a countrywide awareness campaign on the dangers of trafficking. In South Asia, Bangladesh set up a long-promised special anti-trafficking police unit, which started new investigations while rescuing an increased number of victims.

When we look at slavery worldwide, we believe sex slavery is the largest category of transnational slavery. It is intrinsically linked to prostitution and we find that where prostitution is encouraged, the number of victims increases. That is why to combat sex slavery, we are urging a greater focus on demand, educating and dissuading the so-called customers. But while sex slavery is large, we are concerned with all forms of slavery. This year, trafficking through labor exploitation, particularly in voluntary servitude of foreign laborers, received greater attention. This greater emphasis came as a result of better data obtained from source countries and nongovernmental organizations. Four countries are placed on Tier 3 for their failure primarily to make significant efforts to combat forced labor trafficking: Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates.

The forced labor may involve foreign workers who end up in conditions of involuntary servitude or child camel jockeys who live in slave-like conditions and are forced to race in extremely dangerous environments.

Burma and North Korea, Sudan and Cuba remain on Tier 3, largely because they still fail to address forced labor in their countries. Another government, Cambodia, is on Tier 3 because of government complicity in trafficking in persons - another important criteria for Tier 3 and the law.

The report covers efforts from March 2004 to March 2005. Some governments have taken steps against slavery since the report was drafted. This is great. Ecuador was placed on Tier 3 again this year for its lack of significant efforts during the reporting period. Two days ago, Ecuador's congress passed criminal code changes that could lead to positive progress in fighting slavery.

The country ratings here, the government ratings are based strictly on government actions to combat trafficking in persons as defined by U.S. law. The standards are set up for the Trafficking Victim Protection Act and are applied equally to every country. We examine each country individually. The goal of the report is not to punish but to stimulate government action to end modern day slavery. We hope all Tier 3 countries will move off Tier 3 within the 90-day grace period by taking concrete steps to combat trafficking in persons. We are prepared to work with them to help achieve this.

At the same time, nowhere on earth is it allowable to systematically abuse children for sport or to stand up while household help is trapped and exploited with no recourse to help or to look the other way while sex traffickers seize young women.

I'd like to address one misperception that is developed around this Trafficking in Persons Report. The Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 requires Tier ratings to emphasize government efforts against human trafficking, especially in terms of prosecution, protection and prevention, rather than just the extent of the slavery problem. Under the law, countries that have substantial anti-trafficking in person efforts underway justify higher ratings, even if they have a large trafficking in person problem.

Now, stepping back and looking around the world, the picture is not all bleak. Shining through this global tragedy are many rays of hope. In addition to the tremendous efforts of heroic individuals and private organizations, governments around the globe are awakening to this issue and taking action to end this form of modern day slavery.

Worldwide, this past year, the number of trafficking related convictions has increased over 3,000. And new anti-human trafficking legislation was approved in 39 countries. That's a big change from five or ten years ago.

We're seeing progress on many fronts. In this year's report, several countries on Tier 1 showed anti-trafficking in person leadership through strong policies and implementation of laws. South Korea launched a brave initiative to close down outlets for commercial sexual exploitation and trafficking, arresting over 500 people and rescuing over 1,000 victims.

Sweden continued its path-breaking program to prosecute exploiters and clients of prostitution while identifying and protecting women in commercial sexual exploitation. Sweden has funded anti-trafficking information campaigns throughout Europe, focusing on curbing demand for trafficking victims.

Morocco has led efforts to hold accountable UN peacekeepers guilty of sexual abuse of minors in areas of UN deployment. The report on pages 33 and 38 identifies international best practices and anti-slavery heroes throughout the world. And those sections could have been much longer, believe me.

The best practices are wide and varied and all are commendable, but let me highlight a few. The Indian NGO Shakti Vahini produces an informative Indian Trafficking in Persons Report that rates anti-slavery efforts in Indian states. The Malawian nongovernmental organization People Serving Girls at Risk works to identify and help underage girls in prostitution through undercover outreach. And the Fahmina Institute of Indonesia engages Islamic boarding schools to spread anti-trafficking awareness.

The anti-slavery heroes cited in the report, a few out of thousands, range from Ansar Burney the Pakistani human rights activist who has sought to help Asian and African children who have been trafficked to the Arabian Gulf countries for exploitation, as camel jockeys. To Somaly Mam and Pierre Legros of the French NGO AFESIP who braved personal threats from traffickers to rescue victims of sex slavery in Southeast Asia.

The U.S. is deeply committed to fulfilling its responsibilities in the fight against trafficking in persons. And that's why we contributed an excess of $80 million abroad for all kinds of anti-trafficking programs last year. In January, President George W. Bush said, "no one is fit to be a master and no one deserves to be a slave." And because of the stain of slavery, on our own history, these words have special meaning to us and they guide our efforts against trafficking in persons, based on our strong belief in freedom and human dignity. As the Secretary has stated, modern slavery has been met and is being met with a growing powerful response - a 21st century abolitionist movement. We must all do our part.

Thank you and let's turn to questions. Oh, my gosh. Okay, yes. Go ahead. Yeah.

QUESTION: Andrea Mitchell from NBC. Can you tell us regarding Saudi Arabia, Qatar, Kuwait, the UAE, whether you believe that it was the prior sanctions to get some action? In particular in Saudi Arabia, they have moved backwards, not forward since last year's report. And you've got four countries that are major allies of the United States in the war on terror and in military operations that are chief abusers in this practice.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Well, I won't disagree with your characterization of the situation. It is serious, for example, in Saudi Arabia we have domestic workers being brought in from many countries into domestic servitude - child beggars, a lot of beatings, reports of beatings and rape, very difficult to get shelter, no convictions. But you're - the first part of your question was: Is this going to lead to sanctions? My answer is I hope not because the purpose of the law is not to sanction, it is to get progress in freeing the victims and throwing the traffickers in jail.

QUESTION: They've moved backwards in the last year.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Wait a minute - that's...

QUESTION: Will it require sanctions?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: If they stay in Tier 3, it will require sanctions. However, the reason why I hope this will not take place is under the law, there are now three months for any government in Tier 3 to take significant steps against trafficking and we're prepared to work with these governments, including the governments you mentioned. Our hope is there will be enough progress in freeing the victims and throwing the traffickers in jail that at the end of 120 days, there will not have to be sanctions, but there is that possibility.

Yes.

QUESTION: Can I follow-up on that?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: This law has been in effect for five years?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: Could you say how many countries and which ones have been sanctioned until now?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah. There have been several countries sanctioned. But the interesting thing is that countries that are willing to work on this issue in the past, we've had several relationships with, have avoided sanctions by taking action in the three months or four months after the report.

For example, two years ago, we placed Turkey and Greece, two NATO allies, on Tier 3. But in the four months over the summer, the arrests, the prosecutions, the setting up of referral systems to get victims to nongovernmental organizations, the setting up of shelters, there was significant progress made, which we were delighted with. So the purpose here is not to result in sanctions, although that may happen, it is to get progress.

Yes. Go ahead.

QUESTION: Under which capacity, the United States is preparing in those type of reports, interfering in the internal affairs of sovereign countries?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: I'm sorry. Could you just repeat the question again?

QUESTION: Yes. Under which capacity, the United States of America is preparing, those type of reports interfering in the internal affairs of sovereign countries?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Okay. Well, this is not the first time I've heard that question. The answer - that is that reminds me of a question that was asked William Wilberforce. On the floor of the English Parliament, back in the 1790s when he discovered, realized the extent of slavery and started his campaign to end the slave trade, and the question that was asked of him by another parliamentarian was: Will the right honorable gentleman tell me what rights we have to impose British moral values on the world? Wilberforce, who was alone in Parliament when he started this action, cited universal and religious values, to show that people nowhere wanted slavery.

Today, we have - the case is much stronger because unlike in Wilberforce's time, no government in the world, that I'm aware of, officially endorses slavery and there are numerous international covenants, UN covenants, that nations of the world have subscribed to that are - banned slavery.

So I would say in this effort that we're participating in, we are trying both at home and abroad to work with other countries in trying to end a slavery, that citizens around the world and ostensibly, governments around the world, all agree is a scourge that should be ended. Let's take somebody in the back.

Yeah, go ahead.

QUESTION: Advocacy organizations around the world are saying that poverty and lack of job opportunities is one of the causes of women or families being vulnerable to slavery. To what extent is the United States prepared to relieve debt to World Bank or IMF loans and other forms to substantially improve the quality of life and services in nations around the world vulnerable?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Sure. Well, as Ambassador-at-large on international slavery, I'm not the U.S. expert or authority on international debt, but I want to comment on the premise of your question. You identified poverty as a major cause of slavery and slave trade and I would agree it is a major cause. There are a lot of studies that have been done in the last couple of years - I won't cite them all - that show, however, that it is one of several major causes. Poverty is a push factor. There is the pull factor of the attraction of the better life in the wealthier country. There is the factor of gender attitudes. Believe me, when you look at sex slavery and parts of domestic servitude slavery, gender attitudes play a big role.

There is the role of organized crime and greed. I mean, this is a big source of revenue for organized crime. I mean, now they - we talked about the arms trade, the drug trade, and the people trade being sources of revenue for organized crime.

So all of these causes we hope will be addressed, but in the meantime - in the meantime - we are seeking, through our office, to do what we can to work with other countries to get better law enforcement, get better protection for victims, and get prevention and education campaigns.

Yes.

QUESTION: To what extent are the efforts in the United States to identify victims and to give them the T-4 visa programs they - to what extent are those efforts successful and why are not -

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: How many victims have been identified to date?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: And what are the problems in identifying victims?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah. That's a very good question. Did everybody hear - should I be repeating the questions or -

QUESTION: No, that's fine. We don't mind.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: You can hear, okay. Your question about identifying victims in the United States, you put your finger on a problem that is - confronts the United States and almost every country in the world. The gap between what are estimated to be the number of victims and the actual number of victims getting help - just two weeks ago, President Bush's task force on trafficking in persons consisting of cabinet officers chaired by Secretary of State Rice discussed this issue and the Health and Human Services Secretary Leavitt specifically brought up, as an area where we need to do more, exactly that.

What has been done? And the gap is such - to give you an idea of the gap, I believe the figure now is about roughly 700 people have been helped with temporary visas in the United States. They cooperate in prosecutions, get assistance and all that, yet we know the figure - we suspect - we don't scientifically know, since victims don't stand in line to be - raise their hands to be counted, but we suspect that the figure for the number of victims annually crossing into the United States across our borders every year is in excess of 14 and a half thousand. So there's a gap.

Presently, Health and Human Services has pilot programs in ten - I believe it's soon to be 20 cities - trying to reach out to the foreign migrant communities to help victims come forward. We are starting to consider another additional approach, a work sector approach, and Health and Human Services has done some work on this, but this approach would involve mobilizing or involving doctors, hospitals, lawyers, travel industry personnel in this effort to try to help victims come forward.

So you're right in identifying one of the big challenges.

Yes, back?

QUESTION: Can I follow up on this question, sir?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah. Well, just -

QUESTION: It's on this particular area.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Okay.

QUESTION: Can you speak about what the U.S. is doing to just not only identify victims, but to combat demand, as the Secretary said? You just said that nowhere on earth -

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: Is it acceptable, so -

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Right.

QUESTION: - what is the U.S. doing? And it's your - you just mentioned that you were the Ambassador of international slavery. Is this a new title or are you just kind of encapsulating what it is that the -

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Well, it's - I guess it's sort of new. It's - Congress and the President raised the position to ambassadorial status - well, I was confirmed by the Senate nine months ago and in the previous year, I guess the end of 2003, legislation was passed raising this position to ambassadorial status. In addition, I - at the direction of the President, I chair a - under that Presidential task force I referred to, I chair a senior policy operating group of domestic and foreign U.S. agencies trying to coordinate policies.

Now, let's get to the first part of your question: demand and what's being done in the United States. I think if you look at the United States and around the world, you'll see there are a lot of demand education programs directed at potential victims. However, what you don't see yet are a lot of programs directed at the demand for the victims. That is starting to change in the United States.

I'll give you a good example. There is an organization, SAGE in San Francisco, with U.S. taxpayers' support, that first convinced the San Francisco law enforcement authorities to arrest not just the women engaged in prostitution, who might be trafficking victims, but arrest the traffickers, the pimps, the brothel owners, and the so-called customers. And then that organization convinced the authorities that a fine should be imposed on the first offense so there would be a school, which has the name, John School, that these men would have to go to. I visited there a couple of weeks ago and this school now has been going for some time, appears to have very good results, two percent recidivism rate.

This program has now spread in different forms to 15 or 20 U.S. cities. I think it's going to spread further and we are discussing with different countries around the world how this could be replicated in those countries to address demand. For example, we're in discussions with the Korean Ministry of Gender and Equality on that issue.

Yes, in the back. Go ahead.

QUESTION: Are you saying that the Brazil Government is making progress, but is not fully complying? Could you say what needs to be done?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Sure. Brazil, I believe, if I'm not mistaken, is listed in Tier 2, which is the upper category of the report. I visited Brazil last fall. One of the positive things going on in Brazil: Brazil has started setting up, in different provinces, anti-trafficking in persons efforts.

I think one of the problems that Brazil faces is that while there has been tremendous government interest, the President of Brazil has spoken out very strongly on this issue, but if you look at the actual finished product in law enforcement, three convictions last year, coming out of scores and scores of investigations and hundreds and hundreds of victims - so, I think in that area, they can do more. They can do more in terms of their awareness campaigns and their protection efforts for victims, but I would say law enforcement would be the major area.

I hope I'm calling - yes, go ahead.

QUESTION: You mentioned Canada as a transit country.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yes.

QUESTION: With some of these sex trade workers.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: And although Canada is in Tier 1, how would you rate Canada in terms of this problem and what do you think Canada should do to improve the situation?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Okay. Well, you're talking about Canada as a transit country and Canada has done some very aggressive things the last year. We have a specific transit problem we have to address with Canada and I think it's referred to in the report. I hope it's referred to. And the challenge that we face is that there are migrants from the Far East that come into Canada - for example, Korea, they don't need a visa and then they just come across the U.S. border and we - there's a lot of evidence that there's hundreds of such victims involved.

We're going to have to - we're working on this with Canada and Korea. We're going to see what we can do to try to address this problem. That's an example.

I'm sorry, there's so - yes? There's so many people. Go ahead.

MR. CASEY: Mr. Ambassador I'm afraid we're going to have to make this limited to a couple more people. So why don't you take that one and then I know Teri wanted to get in -

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Okay. Oh, Teri - no, no, no, no. Okay, yes. Okay, I'll take two. Go ahead.

QUESTION: Yeah. Ambassador Miller, my name is Wen Ha (ph), Radio Free Asia.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: I didn't hear - you didn't mention anything about Vietnam.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: However, the problem is there. You know, like there - now, Vietnam last year was on Tier 2 watch list.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Watch list, yes.

QUESTION: On the Tier 2 -

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: It's not on the watch list anymore.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: My question is, what is the method that you used to - in order to classify Vietnam to Tier 2 watch list?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: To - well, we thought they -

QUESTION: Did you find - yeah, did you send a fact-finding team to Vietnam?

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah, yeah. We have had - Vietnam made some significant progress in the last year. For example, we were very critical of Vietnam before on exporting Vietnamese labor and cooperating with what we thought were slave owners in other countries, including one operation in American Samoa. But they have stepped in and are giving much better supervision and control. Their number of convictions has increased, so there's been some progress in Vietnam.

Teri, Teri? No, I've got to - no, Teri - I ignored her last year.

QUESTION: He ignored me last year.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: I didn't call on her. I got to - okay.

QUESTION: Okay, thank you. Ambassador Miller, a couple of things. You didn't actually tell us who has been sanctioned when you talked about sanctions and I wanted to go back to the question of these very close allies: Kuwait, UAE, Saudi Arabia. And could you - you've been to these countries and you've had discussions with these leaders about these issues -

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Yeah.

QUESTION: - and many of them have laws in place, not to mention authoritarian regimes that should be able to enforce these laws, one would think. Could you help us understand why they aren't doing more, especially being such close allies of the U.S. in counterterrorism, for example? And we really do want to know who's been sanctioned.

AMBASSADOR MILLER: I'm glad you've - the toughest question comes last. Well, in terms of countries that have been sanctioned, if you look at the countries in - nobody has been sanctioned this year. If you look at the countries from last year's report, and we can - I can't recall them from memory, but you can - our staff can get them to you, but your - the tough part of your question was - well, here are close friends of the United States; how can this happen? Two years ago, I was asked about Greece and Turkey; how can allies be on Tier 3?

I believe that this is a function, to a large extent, of information and public awareness, that as public awareness increases in these countries, you see more action. For example, just for example, in Saudi Arabia, a recent case involving an Indonesian young woman tortured, beaten, dumped at a hospital - domestic servitude case has gotten publicity. A human rights lawyer in Saudi Arabia has protested there and I don't know how it's all going to come out, but they're - apparently in the last month, there was an arrest made.

As public awareness increases - and sometimes when countries don't have free flows of information, that's hard - but as public awareness increases, I don't think people want slavery today and this is where one of the signs of progress has been the exponential increase of news media attention to this issue the last couple of years.

Since I'm at the end here, I want to tell you, when you write on this - when you write on this, I know you're journalists and all that - but when you write on this issue, you indirectly help free victims and throw traffickers in jail because it increases public awareness. People become more aware all over the world. They become more aware in the United States. They start talking to their local police. They start talking to their public officials.

Good things happen when - so - but the last comment, I am - so, I have a meeting coming up with foreign ambassadors and then NGOs.

I know there are a lot of people that didn't get to ask questions. If -

QUESTION: You're going to come up, sir. We have about 10 minutes to (inaudible) -

AMBASSADOR MILLER: Oh, I've got 10 more minutes, okay. And - but we've also got people on our staff: Eleanor Kennelly, Caroline Tetschner that even if I have to move out after five or ten minutes can answer questions.

So thank you all for coming. I appreciate it.

LOAD-DATE: June 5, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2005 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

128 of 359 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 3, 2005 Friday 4:20 AM EST

STATE DEPARTMENT RELEASES 2005 TRAFFICKING REPORT

BYLINE: US States News

LENGTH: 543 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J. (4th CD), issued the following statement:

Rep. Chris Smith (R-Hamilton), the author of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act and the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act, released the following statement regarding the success and positive impact of the State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report, released today for the fifth year. The report was mandated by Smith's first trafficking bill, signed in October 2000 (Public Law 106-386).

"Since its inception in 2001, the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report has been a powerful tool to encourage governments around the world to address the growing problem of trafficking in human beings for forced labor and sexual exploitation.

The 2005 Report includes an analysis of 150 countries. This is ten more than the previous year's publication, and the most countries ever included in the report.

A review of the report shows that over the past year, a stronger response from governments, an increase in public awareness of victim protection services, and a successful effort in anti-trafficking practices have occurred in many countries. Thirty-four countries improved their tier status, a sign of the system's success and effectiveness. Regrettably, some other governments' efforts lagged in the past year, resulting in the downward assessment of twenty-six countries. While it is disturbing that many strong allies of the United States fell into Tier 3, I commend the State Department for allowing the facts with regard to human trafficking to determine each country's tier placement, rather than unrelated political considerations.

The 2005 TIP report includes an informative list of 'International Best Practices' consisting of examples of innovative and effective anti-trafficking policies, such as the Czech Republic's screening and identification procedures, as well as Estonia's campaign to raise public awareness on global trafficking.

This year's report brings needed attention to the problem of peacekeepers' complicity in the sexual exploitation of vulnerable populations, including through trafficking, and highlights some positive steps underway to prevent such exploitation.

In addition, this year's report includes data provided by foreign governments on trafficking-related investigations, prosecutions, convictions, and sentences. As in our own country, the number of traffickers prosecuted and convicted has increased by nearly 300% since enactment of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000. Likewise, the number of worldwide convictions increased this past year to more than 3000 convictions, as more countries acquired the legal tools necessary to combat trafficking and the political will to implement those tools."

To support the U.S. Government's ongoing efforts to combat human trafficking, on February 17, Smith introduced the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2005, H.R. 972. The bill would reauthorize appropriations for anti-trafficking programs in the United States and abroad. The bill also offers solutions to specific scenarios in which trafficking is a problem and which experience has shown could benefit from additional initiatives.

Contact: David Kush, 202/225-3765.

LOAD-DATE: June 5, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2005 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

129 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Voice of America News

June 3, 2005

HUMAN TRAFFICKING (L-ONLY)BYLINE: DAVID GOLLUSTSECTION: RADIO SCRIPTS - CORRESPONDENT REPORT 2-325042LENGTH: 766 words

STATE DEPARTMENT

HEADLINE: US Gives 14 Countries, Including Gulf Allies, Failing Marks on Human Trafficking

INTRO: The U.S. State Department, in a congressionally mandated report, has cited 14 countries, including key Gulf allies Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, for failing to take adequate steps to combat human trafficking. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice says the U.S. reports have helped generate a modern day abolitionist movement against forced labor and sexual exploitation. VOA's David Gollust reports from the State Department.

The State Department's fifth annual Trafficking in Persons report covered 150 countries, 10 more than last year. And the list of countries whose efforts against the problem were deemed inadequate rose from 10 in 2004 to 14 this year, and included U.S. Gulf allies Saudi Arabia and Kuwait.

At a news conference launching this year's report, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said as many as 800-thousand people are trafficked across international borders each year, and millions more are trafficked within various countries.

She said trafficking, for sexual exploitation, forced labor and other forms of servitude, is nothing less than a modern form of slavery, and that the U.S. reports, mandated by an act of Congress in 2000, have contributed to a growing international movement against it:

[RICE ACTUALITY]

"To confront the abomination of human trafficking, a modern-day abolitionist movement has emerged. Concerned citizens, students, faith-based organizations, feminists and other non-governmental groups are doing courageous and compassionate work to end this trade in human degradation. The United States government is proud to stand with them at the forefront of this international anti-trafficking campaign."

[END ACT]

The report, based on information gathered by U.S. diplomatic posts, non-governmental groups and other sources, divides countries into three categories, based on their efforts to deal with the trafficking problem.

Those given the lowest-ranking, so called Tier Three countries, could face a cut-off of non-humanitarian U.S. aid or other penalties, if they do not take remedial steps by the end of September.

In addition to Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, this year's Tier-Three list also includes Gulf countries Qatar and the United Arab Emirates.

The report said the Gulf states were destinations for men, women and children from South and East Asia and Africa, trafficked for labor exploitation, including children forced to work as camel jockeys.

Six countries faulted last year appeared again: Burma, Cuba, Ecuador, North Korea, Sudan and Venezuela. The others in Tier Three are Bolivia, Cambodia, Jamaica and Togo.

The East Asian, Latin American and African states placed in Tier Three were said to be source or destination countries for women and children trafficked for sexual exploitation and forced labor.

The report said North Korea, a perennial third-tier nation, does not even recognize trafficking as a problem and imposes slave-labor conditions on state prisoners and repatriated citizens.

The head of the State Department's anti-trafficking office, former U.S. Congressman John Miller, said only a handful of countries have actually faced U.S. penalties, and that the point of annual exercise is not to sanction, but to prod countries into action.

[MILLER ACTUALITY]

"The goal of the report is not to punish, but to stimulate government action to end modern-day slavery. We hope that all Tier Three countries will move off Tier Three within the 90-day grace period, by taking concrete steps to combat trafficking in persons. We're prepared to work with them to help achieve this."

[END ACT]

Mr. Miller said that since the new report was compiled, one Third Tier country, Ecuador, has already taken action, with its congress this week approving changes in the country's criminal code to deal with trafficking.

He said several countries listed in the bottom category last year, including Guyana and Bangladesh, were moved up this year because of remedial steps.

Mr. Miller also commended South Korea for what he termed a brave initiative to curb the sex trade in that country, and Sweden for similar action and for a Europe-wide information campaign focused on curbing demand for trafficking victims.

The 256-page report does not rank the United States, though Secretary Rice said in an accompanying letter that it is dealing with its own trafficking problem. Mr. Miller estimated that nearly 15-thousand people are trafficked to the United States each year. (SIGNED)

NEB/DAG/KBK/TW

LOAD-DATE: June 3, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

130 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Voice of America News

June 3, 2005

US Gives 14 Countries Failing Marks on Human Trafficking

SECTION: VOA ENGLISH SERVICE

LENGTH: 731 words

DATELINE: State Department

The U.S. State Department, in a congressionally mandated report, has cited 14 countries, including key Gulf allies Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, for failing to take adequate steps to combat human trafficking. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice says the U.S. reports have helped generate a modern day abolitionist movement against forced labor and sexual exploitation.

The State Department's fifth annual Trafficking in Persons report covered 150 countries, 10 more than last year. And the list of countries whose efforts against the problem were deemed inadequate rose from 10 in 2004 to 14 this year, and included U.S. Gulf allies Saudi Arabia and Kuwait.

At a news conference launching this year's report, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said as many as 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders each year, and millions more are trafficked within various countries.

She said trafficking, for sexual exploitation, forced labor and other forms of servitude, is nothing less than a modern form of slavery, and that the U.S. reports, mandated by an act of Congress in 2000, have contributed to a growing international movement against it:

"To confront the abomination of human trafficking, a modern-day abolitionist movement has emerged, Secretary Rice said. Concerned citizens, students, faith-based organizations, feminists and other non-governmental groups are doing courageous and compassionate work to end this trade in human degradation. The United States government is proud to stand with them at the forefront of this international anti-trafficking campaign."

The report, based on information gathered by U.S. diplomatic posts, non-governmental groups and other sources, divides countries into three categories, based on their efforts to deal with the trafficking problem.

Those given the lowest ranking, so called Tier Three countries, could face a cutoff of non-humanitarian U.S. aid or other penalties, if they do not take remedial steps by the end of September.

In addition to Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, this year's Tier-Three list also includes Gulf countries Qatar and the United Arab Emirates.

The report said the Gulf states were destinations for men, women and children from South and East Asia and Africa, trafficked for labor exploitation, including children forced to work as camel jockeys.

Six countries faulted last year appeared again: Burma, Cuba, Ecuador, North Korea, Sudan and Venezuela. The others in Tier Three are Bolivia, Cambodia, Jamaica and Togo.

The East Asian, Latin American and African states placed in Tier Three were said to be source or destination countries for women and children trafficked for sexual exploitation and forced labor.

The report said North Korea, a perennial third tier nation, does not even recognize trafficking as a problem and imposes slave labor conditions on state prisoners and repatriated citizens.

The head of the State Department's anti-trafficking office, former U.S. Congressman John Miller, said only a handful of countries have actually faced U.S. penalties, and that the point of annual exercise is not to sanction, but to prod countries into action.

"The goal of the report is not to punish, but to stimulate government action to end modern-day slavery, Cong. Miller said. We hope that all Tier Three countries will move off Tier Three within the 90-day grace period, by taking concrete steps to combat trafficking in persons. We're prepared to work with them to help achieve this."

Mr. Miller said that since the new report was compiled, one Third Tier country, Ecuador, has already taken action, with its congress this week approving changes in the country's criminal code to deal with trafficking.

He said several countries listed in the bottom category last year, including Guyana and Bangladesh, were moved up this year because of remedial steps.

Mr. Miller also commended South Korea for what he termed a brave initiative to curb the sex trade in that country, and Sweden for similar action and for a Europe-wide information campaign focused on curbing demand for trafficking victims.

The 256 page report does not rank the United States, though Secretary Rice said in an accompanying letter that it is dealing with its own trafficking problem. Mr. Miller estimated that nearly 15,000 people are trafficked to the United States each year.

LOAD-DATE: June 3, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

131 of 359 DOCUMENTS

June 3, 2005 Friday 6:17 PM EST

U.S. cites 4 Gulf allies in trafficking report

BYLINE: From Elise Labott CNN Washington Bureau

SECTION: U.S.

LENGTH: 664 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Four American allies in the Persian Gulf are among the countries criticized for not doing enough to combat human trafficking in a U.S. State Department report released Friday.

"Human trafficking is nothing less than a modern form of slavery," said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in a news conference on the report.

In the annual "Trafficking in Persons" report, the State Department listed Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates as "Tier 3" countries, which are defined as nations "whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards" set by American law and "are not making significant efforts to do so."

The report identified the countries as destinations for trafficking victims exposed to sexual exploitation and forced labor.

The State Department also listed Bolivia, Cambodia, Cuba, Ecuador, Jamaica, Myanmar (formerly Burma), North Korea, Sudan, Togo and Venezuela as Tier 3 countries.

The United States could impose sanctions on these 14 countries, including the withholding of nonhumanitarian and non-trade-related assistance. The U.S. government also could oppose requests for assistance from international financial institutions.

The State Department estimates that 600,000 to 800,000 men, women and children are trafficked across international borders against their will each year.

Many victims are forced into prostitution, sweatshops, domestic labor, farm work or child armies.

About 80 percent of trafficking victims are women and girls, with a large majority forced into the sex industry. About 50 percent are minors, the report found.

"Whatever cruel form of servitude they may take, trafficking victims live in fear and in misery," Rice said. "And wherever the trafficking trade flourishes, the rule of law erodes."

Looking at 150 countries, the report focuses on the growing problem of trafficking in women and children for sexual exploitation, sex tourism and prostitution. It found that more than 1 million children are exploited in the global commercial sex trade each year.

The State Department estimates that 14,500 to 17,500 people are trafficked into the United States each year.

"We believe that modern-day slavery plagues every country," said John R. Miller, a senior adviser to Rice and director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

The report found that "hundreds of thousands of low-skilled workers" from South Asia and Africa who arrive in Saudi Arabia and other Gulf countries fall into either forced begging or "involuntary servitude, suffering from physical and sexual abuse, nonpayment of wages, withholding of travel documents and restriction of movement."

Saudi Arabia, a Tier 2 country last year, was upgraded to Tier 3 this year because of its lack of progress in protecting victims and prosecuting those guilty of involuntary servitude.

("Tier 2" countries do not fully comply with the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 but are making "significant progress" toward compliance, according to the report. "Tier 1" countries comply fully with the law.)

Kuwait, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates have legislation against trafficking and forced labor, but the report cited the three countries for weak implementation of laws to investigate, prosecute and punish traffickers as well as for inadequate steps to protect victims.

The report found some Tier 3 countries -- Bolivia, Myanmar, Jamaica, Sudan and Togo -- as "source" countries, where traffickers find victims, while others --Cambodia, Ecuador and Venezuela -- are source, transit and destination countries for trafficking victims.

The United States put several countries on notice that they are at risk of joining the Tier 3 list if they don't take adequate steps to combat human trafficking.

Bahrain, China, the Dominican Republic, India, Mexico, the Philippines and Russia were among 27 cited on a "Tier 2 Watch list," which will receive special scrutiny and be subject to an interim assessment before next year's report.

LOAD-DATE: June 4, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

132 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Pakistan Newswire

June 2, 2005 ThursdayPakistan removed from U.S. Human Trafficking Watch List*SECTION: Nationwide International NewsLENGTH: 124 wordsDATELINE: Islamabad, June 2

Pakistan has been removed from Human Trafficking Watch List by the United States. A US State department report to this affect was delivered Thursday by the US Ambassador to Pakistan to Interior Minister Aftab Ahmad Khan Sherpao in Islamabad. The report said Pakistan demonstrated significant progress in its anti-trafficking efforts and indicated that Pakistan has improved its performance in this regard. Later addressing a news conference, Interior Minister described the removal of Pakistan from Watch List as "a big achievement". Enumerating steps taken to check human trafficking, Aftab Sherpao said government promulgated a comprehensive law and rules to over come menace of trafficking in all its forms and manifestations.

LOAD-DATE: June 3, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 Pakistan Press International

133 of 359 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 2, 2005 Thursday 4:50 AM EST

PAKISTAN IMPROVES EFFORTS AGAINST TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS; REMOVED FROM WATCH LIST, BUT MORE REMAINS TO BE DONE

BYLINE: US States News

LENGTH: 482 words

DATELINE: ISLAMABAD, Pakistan

The U.S. Embassy issued the following press release:

The U.S. Department of State will release its fifth annual Trafficking in Persons Report on June 3, 2005. The 150-country report is the most comprehensive worldwide report on the efforts of governments to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons or modern-day slavery. This year Pakistan received a Tier 2 placement in the 2005 Trafficking in Persons Report.

Ambassador Ryan C. Crocker delivered the report to Minister of Interior Sherpao on June 2, commending the Government of Pakistan on its efforts to combat trafficking-in-persons. Pakistan moved up this year from being placed on the Tier 2 Watch List last year.

The report indicates that Pakistan has improved its anti-trafficking performance over the reporting period. Most notably, it has increased trafficking-related prosecutions and convictions, strengthened implementation of its 2002 Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance, established an Anti-Trafficking Unit (ATU) within the Federal Investigation Agency, and co-sponsored several public awareness campaigns.

The U.S. government has helped support these efforts by providing over $100,000 through the International Organization for Migration to establish a model shelter for trafficked victims, build the capacity of law enforcement officials in the ATU, and conduct mass awareness activities.

In his meeting with Minister Sherpao, Ambassador Crocker noted that continued improvement in all three areas of protection, prosecution and prevention will be important in the coming year. In order to free people from modern-day slavery, he encouraged continued progress. "We look forward to further cooperation on trafficking-in-persons issues," he said.

The U.S. Congress, through its passage of the 2000 Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA), requires the Secretary of State to submit the Trafficking-in-Persons Report by June of each year. The goal of this Report is to raise global awareness and spur countries to take effective actions to counter trafficking in persons. This year, there will be an added focus on forced labor trafficking including involuntary servitude and debt bondage.

Countries determined to have a significant trafficking problem are evaluated in this Report and are assigned to one of three tiers. Countries assessed as meeting the "minimum standards for the elimination of severe forms of trafficking" set forth in the U.S. TVPA law are classified as Tier 1. Countries assessed as not fully complying with the minimum standards, but making significant efforts to do so are classified as Tier 2. Countries assessed as neither complying with the minimum standards, nor making significant efforts to do so are classified as Tier 3. Countries classified as Tier 2 Watch List are weak Tier 2s that are at risk of slipping to Tier 3 unless serious concerns are addressed.

LOAD-DATE: June 10, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2005 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

134 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Knight Ridder Washington Bureau

May 26, 2005, Thursday

Japan cracking down on human trafficking in sex industry

BYLINE: By Sharon Noguchi and Emi Doi

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 1349 words

TOKYO _ Angel Kiss, Zeus and cabarets that offer "live love" still beckon customers in Kabukicho, Tokyo's infamous red-light district. But near-daily police and immigration raids have banished the women who once openly solicited potential customers on the street.

Humiliated by international criticism of its commerce in girls and women, Japan last year began to clamp down on human trafficking. Yet the tougher laws that are expected to pass next month face huge obstacles. Japan must reorient a slow-moving bureaucracy, overcome widespread social acceptance of sex for hire and take on the powerful sex industry and the criminal groups that control it.

Marisela _ not her real name _ entered Japan on a tourist visa procured by a recruiter. The waitress job that she thought would support her two daughters in the Philippines turned out to be a bar-hostessing job that included being sent out on calls with customers. Like most women in the industry, she was moved from place to place and sometimes was terrified. "I thought if I complained, I would get killed," she said.

Thousands of Mariselas, desperate to earn money for their families, slip into Japan on short-term visas or with falsified passports. Told that they have to pay off debts of sometimes 5 million yen ($47,600), they're held captive, beaten and controlled by threats to their families at home, anti-trafficking groups say.

Estimates of the number of victims vary wildly. The National Police Agency identified 79 in 2004 from among arrested illegal foreigners. The Organization of American States estimates that 1,700 girls and women from Latin America have been sold in Japan. Anti-trafficking groups say there are more than 100,000 victims, mostly Thais, Filipinas and Colombians _ but also Russians, Chinese, Koreans, Taiwanese and other Southeast Asians.

Until now, police dealt with the problem by arresting the victims as illegal aliens, jailing and deporting them as soon as they presented enough money for airfare home.

Trafficked women often live brutal, desolate lives, forced into having unprotected sex with sometimes dozens of customers a day, say those who work rescuing the women.

"The Japanese are the coldest people, without any heart, that can possibly exist in the world," wrote one girl, who arrived at age 16, in a statement after she fled to the Colombian Consulate. "Besides the mafia who own us, on the streets they treat us as criminals and beat me when I don't earn enough money. They force us to do horrible, repulsive things, and often the police come in, showing their badge and force us to service them for free."

The United States, the International Labor Organization and other groups have singled out Japan for harsh criticism. A U.S. State Department report last year demoted Japan to a "watch list" of foot-dragging governments _ the same ranking as Laos and Russia _ in human trafficking.

Globally, the International Labor Organization estimates that 12.3 million people are victims of forced labor, including 2.4 million trafficking victims _ a majority of them in the Asia-Pacific region.

The 2004 State Department report jolted Japan into speeding up reform.

This year's State report, due out June 1, is expected to credit Tokyo with progress in addressing the problem.

Two months ago, the government began cutting back on entertainer visas, which last year were issued to 80,000 people, mostly Filipinas. Those were a sham, said Hidenori Sakanaka, a former head of the Tokyo Regional Immigration Bureau. "The women are ordered to become hostesses, even though they are invited as singers or dancers, and end up in prostitution," he said.

After his agents embarked on an aggressive campaign 10 years ago, arresting illegal entertainers as well as club owners and brokers, he received irate phone calls from politicians and anonymous threats on his life, he said. "Trafficking is the shame of Japan," he wrote in a recently published book. Now, he said, he regrets not being able to tackle the problem fully.

Will the new campaign meet less resistance? For more than a year, immigration and police officers have been arresting thousands of undocumented workers, including trafficking victims. To live up to an October 2003 pledge to cut in half the population of illegal foreigners in Tokyo, then estimated at 125,000, officers have staked out stations and streets populated by Third World migrants.

Agents are so busy that the immigration jails are full. On a recent 5 a.m. raid, agents nabbed 10 women _ to fill the 10 vacancies in the women's immigration jail, said Takuma Fukumoto, the chief of the newly established Shinjuku branch of the Tokyo Regional Immigration Bureau, which covers Kabukicho. The men's side was already full, he said.

To have an impact, authorities will have to tackle the most difficult problem of all: challenging the Japanese yakuza and their foreign partners who profit from the trafficking.

"If the Japanese want to do something," one victim wrote in a statement at the Colombian Consulate, "they have to first get rid of the mobsters." Arresting the victims will do nothing because "Colombians will just continue coming in, like flowers, in huge numbers at all the airports."

Last year, 46 people were found guilty of trafficking-related crimes.

One of the most notorious traffickers, Koichi Hagiwara _ known as Sony for his habit of videotaping his victims while he humiliates and tortures them _ served less than two years in prison for violating labor laws.

New laws criminalizing human trafficking and beefing up penalties will allow authorities to crack down on brokers. Currently, immigration agents who record victims' testimonies can arrest only the visa violators, not the traffickers, said Fukumoto. "We turn all our information to police _ who may not move on it," he said.

But Jun Shimado, of the Ministry of Justice's Public Security Division, said police are working on apprehending traffickers. Proof of their success, he said, is in the shuttering of shops that preyed on trafficked women in Yokohama's red-light district, Koganecho.

New measures will help victims. A $200,000 fund will pay for some victims' airfare home. And some women may be allowed to stay in Japan for up to three months.

That's a start, advocates say. But the few shelters for the women are often full, and the time limit for a stay is two weeks. Women who once had tens of thousands of yen _ hundreds of dollars _ pass through their hands find themselves without income, assistance or support. Some may be pregnant, and many have mental and other health problems, including AIDS and other sexually transmitted diseases, said Keiko Otsu, who runs the HELP Asian Women's Shelter.

So far there's been little training for law enforcement to handle traumatized victims, either to elicit information or to avoid inflicting further trauma.

"Someone who's been under the control of the mafia and then arrested and put under police control is not likely to just open up and speak freely," said Yoko Yoshida, an attorney who works with the Japan Network Against Trafficking in Persons.

Another question is whether the crackdown will only move the sex industry deeper underground. Prostitution is widespread and not confined to areas such as Kabukicho, with its 4,300 bars and restaurants. Fliers recruiting girls for "compensated dating" and sex-related businesses are handed out on streets or posted on walls. Even in rural towns, the "snacks," as small bars are known here, often feature foreign hostesses who do more than serve drinks.

But pushing prostitution, and trafficked women, further underground succeeds in making them less accessible to the market, said Yoshida. "It sends the consumers a kind of warning. Perhaps they will stop buying women."

(Noguchi is on leave from the San Jose Mercury News. Doi is a Knight Ridder special correspondent.)

For information on republishing this content, contact us at (800) 661-2511 (U.S.), (213) 237-4914 (worldwide), fax (213) 237-6515, or e-mail reprints@krtinfo.com.

LOAD-DATE: July 28, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

KR-ACC-NO: K1920

JOURNAL-CODE: WA

Copyright 2005 Knight Ridder/Tribune News Service
Knight Ridder/Tribune News Service
Copyright 2005 Knight Ridder/Tribune Information Services

135 of 359 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

May 25, 2005 Wednesday 12:13 PM EST

U.S. ENVOY: HALF OF ALL TRAFFICKED PERSONS MAY BE CHILDREN

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 954 words

DATELINE: BALTIMORE

The Voice of America issued the following story:

By David Gollust

State Department

The U.S. State Department's chief envoy on trafficking in persons says as many as half of all those trafficked worldwide for sex and domestic slavery may be children and young people under 18 years of age. Ambassador John Miller says the aim of the State Department's annual report on the issue is not to punish countries with trafficking problems, but prod them into action.

The State Department's annual reports on human trafficking, first authorized by an act of Congress in 2000, rate countries around the world according to efforts they make to combat the problem.

Those placed in the lowest, or third, tier of countries could face the prospect of U.S. sanctions including the loss of non-humanitarian aid. But the penalty provision has been only lightly used since the first annual report came out in 2001.

Ambassador Miller, director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, says the hope is that the so-called Tier-Three countries will consider the designation a wake-up call to take remedial action.

In a talk with VOA as he prepared for release of the 2005 report, Mr. Miller said in the vast majority of cases, and notably the listing of NATO allies Greece and Turkey in 2002, governments are responsive to U.S. criticism.

"They didn't necessarily agree with the report, but in the three months after the report, we believe that they made some very significant efforts: stepped up arrests and prosecutions, stepped up cooperation with non-governmental organizations, and referring victims for help, stepped-up education activities to warn victims," he said. "And as a result they were raised out of Tier-Three. That's the hope. The purpose here is not to put countries in Tier-Three. The purpose here is not to levy sanctions. The purpose is to get progress toward freeing victims and putting traffickers in jail."

Mr. Miller called modern human trafficking, which includes sex slavery, forced domestic, factory and farm labor, and the conscription and kidnapping of child soldiers, one of the great human rights issues of the 21st century.

The U.S. envoy, a former four-term U.S. Congressman from the state of Washington, said statistics on human trafficking are hard to come by given its criminal nature.

But he says the most recent U.S. estimate is that between 600,000 and 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders each year, and that internal slavery means the figure far surpasses a million. He said as many as half of the victims are children and minors.

"This is the sad fact," he said. "When you look at sex slavery, which is inextricably linked to prostitution, many of those engaged in prostitution around the world are under age 18. If you look at domestic servitude slavery, many of those engaged in domestic servitude slavery have left their homes for a job, what they hope will be a job in somebody's home. So children are at the center of this issue. They form a large number of the victims."

Mr. Miller said in absolute numbers, more children are probably trafficked in Asia than other areas and cited notorious sex-tourism problems in several Southeast Asian countries.

But he said regrettably, there is plenty of child slavery going on in Europe and every country in the world including the United States, where the State Department said last year that more than 14,000 people from abroad were trafficked.

He said some of the issues are long-standing, including the trafficking of children from South Asia to countries in the Gulf region to be camel jockeys, some of whom he said are half-starved to keep their weight down, and suffer serious injuries in racing accidents.

Mr. Miller said he is hopeful that states of origin for the child jockeys, including Bangladesh, Pakistan and India, and destination countries such as the United Arab Emirates, Qatar and Kuwait, will take significant steps in the coming year to end the practice.

He said he thinks most countries try to respond to criticisms in the trafficking report. But he said some governments, those with few or no official dealings with the United States, have refused to cooperate - citing Cuba, where he said children have been caught up in the sex trade.

"The major problem in Cuba is that there is a government-affiliated, supported sex-tourism industry that includes many, many children," he added. "And not just by U.S. law, but by international protocol. When you have children in prostitution, you have trafficking. So this is the challenge in Cuba. We hope the Cuban government will take action to meet that challenge."

The 2004 trafficking report faulted 10 countries including long-standing U.S. sanctions targets Cuba, Burma and North Korea for failing to adequately fight trafficking. Four of them - Bangladesh, Ecuador, Guyana and Sierra Leone - were later removed from the list in recognition of subsequent remedial action.

The United States has provided nearly $300 million to support anti-trafficking programs in more than 120 countries since 2001.

Ambassador Miller said despite the appalling nature of the trafficking problem, he sees signs of progress in the nearly three years he has run the State Department office, in large part due to the exposure the issue gets from the annual reporting exercise.

Gollust report - Download 786k:

http://www.voanews.com/mediaassets/english/2005_05/Audio/rm/gollust_childtrafficking_25may05.rm

Listen to Gollust report:

<http://www.voanews.com/english/fileleaf/ramfilegenerate.cfm?filepath=http%3A%2F%2Fwww%2Evoanews%2Ecom%2Fmediaassets%2Fenglish%2F2005%5F05%2FAudio%2Frm%2Fgollust%5Fchildtrafficking%5F25may05%2Erm>

LOAD-DATE: September 23, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

136 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Voice of America News

May 25, 2005

CHILD TRAFFICKING: RUSSIA / CISBYLINE: LISA MCADAMSSECTION: RADIO SCRIPTS - BACKGROUND REPORT 5-56907LENGTH: 1004 words

MOSCOW

HEADLINE: New Program aims to Fight Child Trafficking in Russia

INTRO: A swiss-based non-governmental organization (N-G-O) known as Terre D'Homme is in the final stages of introducing a program in Russia, aimed at stopping the illegal flow of children into the country from other former-Soviet nations. VOA's Lisa McAdams in Moscow reports the group hopes the project will not only help improve the situation in Russia, but serve as a role model to other countries trying to combat child trafficking.

Sit at any traffic stoplight in Moscow and you are bound to see a mother carrying a swaddled child past car windows with her hand open, pleading for spare coins.

The more faint-hearted might be inclined to think that by handing over their hard-earned money they are helping the child. But more often than not, they are paying into the multi-billion-dollar illegal trade in child trafficking that is booming not only in Russia, but across the former Soviet Union.

In Russia more than 30-thousand children and teenagers are reported missing every year. Many fall prey to traffickers. Another five-thousand, living hand-to-mouth in the streets, are also an easy mark.

Numbers are inexact, hard to come by, and nearly impossible to confirm, but experts from Terre D'Homme say there is no doubt the problem is on the rise, especially in the former Soviet Republic of Moldova.

Terre D'Homme project director Natalia Chuard says the group plans to unveil the first two-year anti-trafficking project of its kind between Moldova and Russia. The pilot project, beginning this June, will focus initially on repatriating 100 Moldovan children recently found begging in the streets of Moscow for the benefit of criminal gangs.

She says the goal is to repatriate as many of them as possible and, through a combination of psychological and economic re-integration programs, ensure that they do not end up back in the vicious circle that is child-trafficking.

[CHUARD ACT]

"In two years time, we'll really be able to understand more on the phenomena and to provide correct answers and to prevent it. And then we will be able to have quite good guidelines and collaboration here between Russia and Moldova that, at the end, those two countries, without any other kind of external support, they will be able to coordinate properly the identification and return of children back to the country of origin. (And) not only Moldova, that is the country we started with, but that could be other countries as well."

[END ACT]

But Ms. Chuard says one of the biggest hindrances to the work at present is that across the former Soviet Union there are very few groups specializing in fighting child trafficking, and certainly not enough to combat the problem at the rate it is growing.

She also says there is a tremendous lack of legislation, and virtually no coordination between the government and non-governmental organizations and other bordering nations.

Olga Agapova is a psychologist at Coalition Angel, one of Russia's few NGOs working to fight child trafficking. Ms. Agapova agrees more coordination is needed at all levels.

[AGAPOVA ACT IN RUSSIAN EST. & FADE]

Ms. Agapova says very often law enforcement bodies do one thing, while governmental departments and educational bodies do others. She says all these structures face the same issues and problems, but are subordinate to different bodies and end up working at cross-purposes in the dark.

As a result, she says many children end up bouncing from one place to another, before ending up back out on the streets, where they are subject to drugs, prostitution, theft, violence and forced labor in the form of sexual exploitation or begging.

The Commissioner for Children's Rights in Moscow, Alexei Golovan, tells VOA the Russian government must own up to the extent of the problem, before it can ever hope to fix it.

[GOLOVAN ACTUALITY IN RUSSIAN EST. & FADE]

Mr. Golovan says protecting children from trafficking is not yet a major priority, either from the standpoint of the government or society. He also laments what he says is the near total lack of coverage about the problem in the Russian media.

A researcher at UNICEF's Moscow office, Gabriella Akimova, says there is some action being taken in Russia to combat the problem. But like so many experts working in the field, Ms. Akimova says the laws in Russia, as they stand right now, are far from sufficient.

[AKIMOVA ACT]

"There has got to be within any law, or combination of legal provision mechanisms, there's got to be recognition of caring for the victims needs. And again, I believe that in the draft laws being drafted, there is an interest in trying to do that. Now, whether it will be implemented is another question."

[END ACT]

Ms. Akimova says lawmakers also need to take into account the need for greater funding in order to provide care for victims of trafficking.

Others, like Ms. Agapova of Coalition Angel, believe that government workers serving in customs, migration and the interior ministry, need to undertake special training to both recognize and halt the problem, which she says often crosses their paths first.

The annual TIP, or trafficking in persons, report released in the United States, classifies Russia as a tier-two watch list country, for failing to fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. Once just a country of origin for victims of child trafficking, Russia has now earned the dubious distinction of being a country of transit and destination as well.

Children in the former Soviet Republics of Belarus, Ukraine, the Baltics, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan and Uzbekistan have also been hard hit by trafficking.

But with the start of programs like those of Terre D'Homme and Coalition Angel, and efforts to upgrade laws and information-sharing, there is at least a glimmer of hope that the massive problem unfolding can at minimum - be slowed down, if not realistically stopped. (SIGNED)

NEB/LAM/RAE/KBK

LOAD-DATE: May 25, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

137 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Voice of America News

May 25, 2005

CHILD TRAFFICKING: U.S.BYLINE: DAVID GOLLUSTSECTION: RADIO SCRIPTS - BACKGROUND REPORT 5-56920LENGTH: 928 words

STATE DEPARTMENT

HEADLINE: US Envoy Says Half of All Trafficked Persons May Be Children

INTRO: The U.S. State Department's chief envoy on trafficking in persons says as many as half of all those trafficked world-wide for sex and domestic slavery may be children and young people under 18 years of age. Ambassador John Miller says the aim of the State Department's annual report on the issue is not to punish countries with trafficking problems, but prod them into action. VOA's David Gollust reports from the State Department.

The State Department's annual reports on human trafficking, first authorized by an act of Congress in 2000, rate countries around the world according to efforts they make to combat the problem.

Those placed in the lowest, or third, tier of countries could face the prospect of U.S. sanctions including the loss of non-humanitarian aid.

But the penalty provision has been only lightly used since the first annual report came out in 2001.

Ambassador Miller, director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, says the hope is that the so-called Tier-Three countries will consider the designation a wake-up call to take remedial action.

In a talk with V-O-A as he prepared for release of the 2005 report, Mr. Miller said in the vast majority of cases - and notably the listing of NATO allies Greece and Turkey in 2002 - governments are responsive to U.S. criticism:

[MILLER ACT ONE]

"They didn't necessarily agree with the report, but in the three months after the report, we believe that they made some very significant efforts: stepped up arrests and prosecutions, stepped up cooperation with non-governmental organizations, and referring victims for help, stepped-up education activities to warn victims. And as a result they were raised out of Tier-Three. That's the hope. The purpose here is not to put countries in Tier-Three. The purpose here is not to levy sanctions. The purpose is to get progress toward freeing victims and putting traffickers in jail."

[END ACT]

Mr. Miller called modern human trafficking which includes sex slavery, forced domestic, factory and farm labor, and the conscription and kidnapping of child soldiers, one of the great human rights issues of the 21st century.

The U.S. envoy, a former four-term U.S. Congressman from the state of Washington, said statistics on human trafficking are hard to come by given its criminal nature.

But he says the most recent U.S. estimate is that between 600-thousand and 800-thousand people are trafficked across international borders each year, and that internal slavery means the figure far surpasses a million. He said as many as half of the victims are children and minors:

[MILLER ACT TWO]

This is the sad fact. When you look at sex slavery, which is inextricably linked to prostitution, many of those engaged in prostitution around the world are under age 18. If you look at domestic servitude slavery, many of those engaged in domestic servitude slavery have left their homes for a job, what they hope will be a job in somebody's home. So children are at the center of this issue. They form a large number of the victims.

[END ACT]

Mr. Miller said in absolute numbers, more children are probably trafficked in Asia than other areas and cited notorious sex-tourism problems in several Southeast Asian countries.

But he said regrettably, there is plenty of child slavery going on in Europe and every country in the world including the United States, where the State Department said last year that more than 14-thousand people from abroad were trafficked.

He said some of the issues are long-standing, including the trafficking of children from South Asia to countries in the Gulf region to be camel jockeys, some of whom he said are half-starved to keep their weight down, and suffer serious injuries in racing accidents.

Mr. Miller said he is hopeful that states of origin for the child jockeys, including Bangladesh, Pakistan and India, and destination countries such as the United Arab Emirates, Qatar and Kuwait, will take significant steps in the coming year to end the practice.

He said he thinks most countries try to respond to criticisms in the trafficking report. But he said some governments, those with few or no official dealings with the United States, have refused to cooperate - citing Cuba, where he said children have been caught up in the sex trade:

[MILLER ACT THREE]

"The major problem in Cuba is that there is a government-affiliated, supported sex-tourism industry that includes many, many children. And not just by U.S. law, but by international protocol. When you have children in prostitution, you have trafficking. So this is the challenge in Cuba. We hope the Cuban government will take action to meet that challenge."

[END ACT]

The 2004 trafficking report faulted 10 countries including long-standing U.S. sanctions targets Cuba, Burma and North Korea for failing to adequately fight trafficking. Four of them - Bangladesh, Ecuador, Guyana and Sierra Leone - were later removed from the list in recognition of subsequent remedial action.

The United States has provided nearly 300-million dollars to support anti-trafficking programs in more than 120 countries since 2001.

Ambassador Miller said despite the appalling nature of the trafficking problem, he sees signs of progress in the nearly three years he has run the State Department office, in large part due to the exposure the issue gets from the annual reporting exercise. (Signed)

NEB/DAG/KBK/MAR

LOAD-DATE: May 25, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

138 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Voice of America News

May 25, 2005

US Envoy: Half of All Trafficked Persons May Be Children

SECTION: VOA ENGLISH SERVICE

LENGTH: 887 words

DATELINE: State Department

The U.S. State Department's chief envoy on trafficking in persons says as many as half of all those trafficked worldwide for sex and domestic slavery may be children and young people under 18 years of age. Ambassador John Miller says the aim of the State Department's annual report on the issue is not to punish countries with trafficking problems, but prod them into action.

The State Department's annual reports on human trafficking, first authorized by an act of Congress in 2000, rate countries around the world according to efforts they make to combat the problem.

Those placed in the lowest, or third, tier of countries could face the prospect of U.S. sanctions including the loss of non-humanitarian aid. But the penalty provision has been only lightly used since the first annual report came out in 2001.

Ambassador Miller, director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, says the hope is that the so-called Tier-Three countries will consider the designation a wake-up call to take remedial action.

In a talk with VOA as he prepared for release of the 2005 report, Mr. Miller said in the vast majority of cases, and notably the listing of NATO allies Greece and Turkey in 2002, governments are responsive to U.S. criticism.

"They didn't necessarily agree with the report, but in the three months after the report, we believe that they made some very significant efforts: stepped up arrests and prosecutions, stepped up cooperation with non-governmental organizations, and referring victims for help, stepped-up education activities to warn victims, he said. And as a result they were raised out of Tier-Three. That's the hope. The purpose here is not to put countries in Tier-Three. The purpose here is not to levy sanctions. The purpose is to get progress toward freeing victims and putting traffickers in jail."

Mr. Miller called modern human trafficking, which includes sex slavery, forced domestic, factory and farm labor, and the conscription and kidnapping of child soldiers, one of the great human rights issues of the 21st century.

The U.S. envoy, a former four-term U.S. Congressman from the state of Washington, said statistics on human trafficking are hard to come by given its criminal nature.

But he says the most recent U.S. estimate is that between 600,000 and 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders each year, and that internal slavery means the figure far surpasses a million. He said as many as half of the victims are children and minors.

This is the sad fact, he said. When you look at sex slavery, which is inextricably linked to prostitution, many of those engaged in prostitution around the world are under age 18. If you look at domestic servitude slavery, many of those engaged in domestic servitude slavery have left their homes for a job, what they hope will be a job in somebody's home. So children are at the center of this issue. They form a large number of the victims.

Mr. Miller said in absolute numbers, more children are probably trafficked in Asia than other areas and cited notorious sex-tourism problems in several Southeast Asian countries.

But he said regrettably, there is plenty of child slavery going on in Europe and every country in the world including the United States, where the State Department said last year that more than 14,000 people from abroad were trafficked.

He said some of the issues are long-standing, including the trafficking of children from South Asia to countries in the Gulf region to be camel jockeys, some of whom he said are half-starved to keep their weight down, and suffer serious injuries in racing accidents.

Mr. Miller said he is hopeful that states of origin for the child jockeys, including Bangladesh, Pakistan and India, and destination countries such as the United Arab Emirates, Qatar and Kuwait, will take significant steps in the coming year to end the practice.

He said he thinks most countries try to respond to criticisms in the trafficking report. But he said some governments, those with few or no official dealings with the United States, have refused to cooperate - citing Cuba, where he said children have been caught up in the sex trade.

"The major problem in Cuba is that there is a government-affiliated, supported sex-tourism industry that includes many, many children, he added. And not just by U.S. law, but by international protocol. When you have children in prostitution, you have trafficking. So this is the challenge in Cuba. We hope the Cuban government will take action to meet that challenge."

The 2004 trafficking report faulted 10 countries including long-standing U.S. sanctions targets Cuba, Burma and North Korea for failing to adequately fight trafficking. Four of them - Bangladesh, Ecuador, Guyana and Sierra Leone - were later removed from the list in recognition of subsequent remedial action.

The United States has provided nearly $300 million to support anti-trafficking programs in more than 120 countries since 2001.

Ambassador Miller said despite the appalling nature of the trafficking problem, he sees signs of progress in the nearly three years he has run the State Department office, in large part due to the exposure the issue gets from the annual reporting exercise.

LOAD-DATE: May 26, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

139 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

May 18, 2005 Wednesday

United States, Canada and Africa; U.S. Fighting Government Corruption That Enables Child Labor

BYLINE: United States Department of State

LENGTH: 1494 words

More international law enforcement needed, says State's Miller

Each year 600,000 to 800,000 people--half of them children--are forced from their homes and their countries to work in other countries. These children are being used as soldiers, camel jockeys, and forced laborers, or engaged in commercial sexual exploitation. The U.S. government, working directly with governments and through nongovernmental organizations, is committed to stopping child traffickers, rehabilitating child victims, and reunifying them with their families. "We must fight government corruption, which allows trafficking to flourish and destabilizes economies," says John Miller, the State Department's top official in the effort to stem human trafficking. "We must step up law enforcement to rescue child slaves and deter traffickers. And we must improve our prevention efforts so children are not vulnerable to this terrible crime."

Ambassador John R. Miller is senior advisor to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

Since all countries have outlawed slavery, many people think the practice is a thing of the past. Unfortunately, the crime of trafficking in persons, or modern-day slavery, is thriving in 2005, and it is having a particular impact on children around the globe.

When we talk about trafficking in persons, we are talking about victims who are forced, defrauded, or coerced into labor or sexual exploitation. The U.S. government estimates that 600,000 to 800,000 men, women, and children are trafficked across international borders each year. Shockingly, up to half of all trafficking victims may be children, who are used as soldiers, camel jockeys, and forced laborers, or engaged in prostitution. The forced labor takes many forms, from back-breaking work in stone quarries, to domestic servitude, to factory and fieldwork.

In response to this egregious offense, the U.S. Congress passed the Trafficking Victims Protection Act in 2000. The law mandates a yearly State Department report that reviews foreign government actions to prevent trafficking, protect the victims, including children, and prosecute the traffickers. It must report on U.S. efforts in these areas. In 2004, the U.S. government gave more than $96 million in funding for anti-trafficking programs abroad, and we are aggressively working to raise public awareness to the plight of children trapped in lives of bondage.

COOPERATIVE EFFORTS

As a result of our work and that of others, progress is being made to combat the problem on every front. Since 2003, there have been nearly 3,000 convictions of traffickers, and 40 countries have passed comprehensive anti-trafficking laws. There are a number of efforts to warn vulnerable people of trafficking schemes so that slavery can be prevented before it begins. And partnerships between government and nongovernmental organizations have led to successful initiatives that are improving children's lives by freeing them from forced labor and other forms of slavery.

For example, the International Rescue Committee (IRC) is using U.S. funding to rehabilitate children who were abducted and trafficked to the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) bases in southern Sudan and northern Uganda. Many of these children were forced to kill friends and family members as a result of their conscription. IRC also works to support children who flee Ugandan villages for towns every night for fear of abduction by the rebel LRA group.

To combat the enslavement of children used as camel jockeys, in December 2004 the Ansar Burney Welfare Trust opened a shelter in the United Arab Emirates to care for trafficking victims. The shelter serves many boys who have been trampled by the camels they were forced to ride. As of March 2005, this shelter had rescued and cared for as many as 50 children, at least 16 of whom have been repatriated.

The International Organization for Migration, in partnership with the Department of State, relevant Ghanaian government ministries, the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), and local nongovernmental organizations, works to identify and provide documentation to children who have been trafficked to Ghana's Lake Volta region to work in the fishing industry. To help stop the trafficking of children in this region, this program provides counseling for the child victims, family reunification, and activities to help reintegrate children into daily life. Togbega Hadjor, paramount chief of Ghana's Bakpa Traditional Area, was honored as a hero in the State Department's 2004 Trafficking in Persons Report for his work with this project and his efforts to raise awareness in the region.

We are also working with Free the Slaves to shut down fishing villages in the Bay of Bengal region of Bangladesh that use child slaves. Since October 2004, Bangladeshi police and coast guard have rescued 129 children.

As part of President Bush's initiative to combat all forms of human trafficking, Catholic Relief Services is working with Brazilian law enforcement to identify the routes traffickers use to exploit their victims. They are also working to improve coordination between law enforcement and labor inspectors in order to detect and investigate these activities so that more children can be free.

"NO ONE DESERVES TO BE A SLAVE"

Even with all of the efforts under way, we know that hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of children remain enslaved, and this is a challenge we must face fully and without delay. We must fight government corruption, which allows trafficking to flourish and destabilizes economies. We must step up law enforcement to rescue child slaves and deter traffickers. And we must improve our prevention efforts so that children are not vulnerable to this terrible crime.

The movement to forever abolish the trafficking and enslavement of children continues, and I am proud the United States has taken a leading role to create a world, as President Bush said in his 2005 inaugural address, where "no one is fit to be a master and no one deserves to be a slave."

Sanctions Against Human Traffickers

Each year, the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report identifies countries whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards in U.S. law for prohibiting severe forms of trafficking in persons and do not make significant efforts to do so. The 2004 report identified Bangladesh, Burma, Cuba, Ecuador, Equatorial Guinea, Guyana, North Korea, Sierra Leone, Sudan, and Venezuela in this "Tier 3" category. Under U.S. law, the United States can impose on such nations sanctions that include:

- * withholding non-humanitarian, non-trade-related assistance;
- * withholding funding for participation in educational and cultural exchange programs, when the country does not receive other assistance;
- * opposing loans and grants--except for humanitarian, trade-related, and certain development-related assistance--from the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund (IMF), and other international financial institutions. For example, in 2004 the United States voted against IMF and World Bank loans to Venezuela as a result of Tier 3 placement.

U.S. law allows the president some discretion in waiving these sanctions, particularly if he feels that the waiver would be in the U.S. national interest or would avoid a significant adverse effect on vulnerable populations such as women and children, or if he finds that a government has come into compliance with the minimum standards after the report was issued. Waivers were granted in 2004 for Bangladesh, because of its increasing efforts to prosecute traffickers and rescue victims; for Guyana, because of its new action plan to direct more resources for victims and its new public awareness efforts; for Sierra Leone, for training police officers on trafficking prevention and enforcement and for designating a high government official as the coordinator for trafficking in persons; and for Ecuador, for increasing police raids on traffickers and for raising public awareness (see <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/prsrl/36127.htm> for the full presidential determination).

Sanctions are a last resort and one of only many tools used to stimulate foreign government action on behalf of victims and potential victims of modern-day slavery. Other U.S. efforts in the last year included providing more than $96 million in anti-trafficking funding abroad, participating in extensive bilateral discussions and partnerships, undertaking numerous anti-trafficking activities in cooperation with international organizations, and staging far-reaching public awareness and outreach programs.

The above article appears in the May 2005 issue of the State Department's electronic journal, Economic Perspectives. The complete issue, titled Ending Abusive Child Labor, can be viewed on the USINFO Web site.

LOAD-DATE: May 18, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 AllAfrica, Inc.

140 of 359 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

May 18, 2005 Wednesday

U.S. FIGHTING GOVERNMENT CORRUPTION THAT ENABLES CHILD LABOR

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 1528 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the State Department:

The following article appears in the May 2005 issue of the State Department's electronic journal, Economic Perspectives. The complete issue, titled Ending Abusive Child Labor, can be viewed on the USINFO Web site.

ELIMINATING THE INTERNATIONAL TRAFFICKING OF CHILDREN

Ambassador John R. Miller

Each year 600,000 to 800,000 people--half of them children--are forced from their homes and their countries to work in other countries. These children are being used as soldiers, camel jockeys, and forced laborers, or engaged in commercial sexual exploitation. The U.S. government, working directly with governments and through nongovernmental organizations, is committed to stopping child traffickers, rehabilitating child victims, and reunifying them with their families. "We must fight government corruption, which allows trafficking to flourish and destabilizes economies," says John Miller, the State Department's top official in the effort to stem human trafficking. "We must step up law enforcement to rescue child slaves and deter traffickers. And we must improve our prevention efforts so children are not vulnerable to this terrible crime."

Ambassador John R. Miller is senior advisor to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

Since all countries have outlawed slavery, many people think the practice is a thing of the past. Unfortunately, the crime of trafficking in persons, or modern-day slavery, is thriving in 2005, and it is having a particular impact on children around the globe.

When we talk about trafficking in persons, we are talking about victims who are forced, defrauded, or coerced into labor or sexual exploitation. The U.S. government estimates that 600,000 to 800,000 men, women, and children are trafficked across international borders each year. Shockingly, up to half of all trafficking victims may be children, who are used as soldiers, camel jockeys, and forced laborers, or engaged in prostitution. The forced labor takes many forms, from back-breaking work in stone quarries, to domestic servitude, to factory and fieldwork.

In response to this egregious offense, the U.S. Congress passed the Trafficking Victims Protection Act in 2000. The law mandates a yearly State Department report that reviews foreign government actions to prevent trafficking, protect the victims, including children, and prosecute the traffickers. It must report on U.S. efforts in these areas. In 2004, the U.S. government gave more than $96 million in funding for anti-trafficking programs abroad, and we are aggressively working to raise public awareness to the plight of children trapped in lives of bondage.

COOPERATIVE EFFORTS

As a result of our work and that of others, progress is being made to combat the problem on every front. Since 2003, there have been nearly 3,000 convictions of traffickers, and 40 countries have passed comprehensive anti-trafficking laws. There are a number of efforts to warn vulnerable people of trafficking schemes so that slavery can be prevented before it begins. And partnerships between government and nongovernmental organizations have led to successful initiatives that are improving children's lives by freeing them from forced labor and other forms of slavery.

For example, the International Rescue Committee (IRC) is using U.S. funding to rehabilitate children who were abducted and trafficked to the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) bases in southern Sudan and northern Uganda. Many of these children were forced to kill friends and family members as a result of their conscription. IRC also works to support children who flee Ugandan villages for towns every night for fear of abduction by the rebel LRA group.

To combat the enslavement of children used as camel jockeys, in December 2004 the Ansar Burney Welfare Trust opened a shelter in the United Arab Emirates to care for trafficking victims. The shelter serves many boys who have been trampled by the camels they were forced to ride. As of March 2005, this shelter had rescued and cared for as many as 50 children, at least 16 of whom have been repatriated.

The International Organization for Migration, in partnership with the Department of State, relevant Ghanaian government ministries, the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), and local nongovernmental organizations, works to identify and provide documentation to children who have been trafficked to Ghana's Lake Volta region to work in the fishing industry. To help stop the trafficking of children in this region, this program provides counseling for the child victims, family reunification, and activities to help reintegrate children into daily life. Togbega Hador, paramount chief of Ghana's Bakpa Traditional Area, was honored as a hero in the State Department's 2004 Trafficking in Persons Report for his work with this project and his efforts to raise awareness in the region.

We are also working with Free the Slaves to shut down fishing villages in the Bay of Bengal region of Bangladesh that use child slaves. Since October 2004, Bangladeshi police and coast guard have rescued 129 children.

As part of President Bush's initiative to combat all forms of human trafficking, Catholic Relief Services is working with Brazilian law enforcement to identify the routes traffickers use to exploit their victims. They are also working to improve coordination between law enforcement and labor inspectors in order to detect and investigate these activities so that more children can be free.

"NO ONE DESERVES TO BE A SLAVE"

Even with all of the efforts under way, we know that hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of children remain enslaved, and this is a challenge we must face fully and without delay. We must fight government corruption, which allows trafficking to flourish and destabilizes economies. We must step up law enforcement to rescue child slaves and deter traffickers. And we must improve our prevention efforts so that children are not vulnerable to this terrible crime. The movement to forever abolish the trafficking and enslavement of children continues, and I am proud the United States has taken a leading role to create a world, as President Bush said in his 2005 inaugural address, where "no one is fit to be a master and no one deserves to be a slave."

Sanctions Against Human Traffickers

Each year, the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report identifies countries whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards in U.S. law for prohibiting severe forms of trafficking in persons and do not make significant efforts to do so. The 2004 report identified Bangladesh, Burma, Cuba, Ecuador, Equatorial Guinea, Guyana, North Korea, Sierra Leone, Sudan, and Venezuela in this "Tier 3" category. Under U.S. law, the United States can impose on such nations sanctions that include:

- * withholding non-humanitarian, non-trade-related assistance;

- * withholding funding for participation in educational and cultural exchange programs, when the country does not receive other assistance;

- * opposing loans and grants--except for humanitarian, trade-related, and certain development-related assistance--from the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund (IMF), and other international financial institutions. For example, in 2004 the United States voted against IMF and World Bank loans to Venezuela as a result of Tier 3 placement.

U.S. law allows the president some discretion in waiving these sanctions, particularly if he feels that the waiver would be in the U.S. national interest or would avoid a significant adverse effect on vulnerable populations such as women and children, or if he finds that a government has come into compliance with the minimum standards after the report was issued. Waivers were granted in 2004 for Bangladesh, because of its increasing efforts to prosecute traffickers and rescue victims; for Guyana, because of its new action plan to direct more resources for victims and its new public awareness efforts; for Sierra Leone, for training police officers on trafficking prevention and enforcement and for designating a high government official as the coordinator for trafficking in persons; and for Ecuador, for increasing police raids on traffickers and for raising public awareness (see <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/prsr/36127.htm> for the full presidential determination).

Sanctions are a last resort and one of only many tools used to stimulate foreign government action on behalf of victims and potential victims of modern-day slavery. Other U.S. efforts in the last year included providing more than $96 million in anti-trafficking funding abroad, participating in extensive bilateral discussions and partnerships, undertaking numerous anti-trafficking activities in cooperation with international organizations, and staging far-reaching public awareness and outreach programs.

(end byliner)

(Distributed by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State. Web site:
<http://usinfo.state.gov>)

LOAD-DATE: May 19, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 States News Service

141 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

May 18, 2005

U.S. Fighting Government Corruption that Enables Child Labor; More international law enforcement needed, says State's Miller

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 1537 words

The following article appears in the May 2005 issue of the State Department's electronic journal, Economic Perspectives. The complete issue, titled Ending Abusive Child Labor, can be viewed on the USINFO Web site.

(begin byliner)

ELIMINATING THE INTERNATIONAL TRAFFICKING OF CHILDREN

Ambassador John R. Miller

Each year 600,000 to 800,000 people--half of them children--are forced from their homes and their countries to work in other countries. These children are being used as soldiers, camel jockeys, and forced laborers, or engaged in commercial sexual exploitation. The U.S. government, working directly with governments and through nongovernmental organizations, is committed to stopping child traffickers, rehabilitating child victims, and reunifying them with their families. "We must fight government corruption, which allows trafficking to flourish and destabilizes economies," says John Miller, the State Department's top official in the effort to stem human trafficking. "We must step up law enforcement to rescue child slaves and deter traffickers. And we must improve our prevention efforts so children are not vulnerable to this terrible crime."

Ambassador John R. Miller is senior advisor to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

Since all countries have outlawed slavery, many people think the practice is a thing of the past. Unfortunately, the crime of trafficking in persons, or modern-day slavery, is thriving in 2005, and it is having a particular impact on children around the globe.

When we talk about trafficking in persons, we are talking about victims who are forced, defrauded, or coerced into labor or sexual exploitation. The U.S. government estimates that 600,000 to 800,000 men, women, and children are trafficked across international borders each year. Shockingly, up to half of all trafficking victims may be children, who are used as soldiers, camel jockeys, and forced laborers, or engaged in prostitution. The forced labor takes many forms, from back-breaking work in stone quarries, to domestic servitude, to factory and fieldwork.

In response to this egregious offense, the U.S. Congress passed the Trafficking Victims Protection Act in 2000. The law mandates a yearly State Department report that reviews foreign government actions to prevent trafficking, protect the victims, including children, and prosecute the traffickers. It must report on U.S. efforts in these areas. In 2004, the U.S. government gave more than $96 million in funding for anti-trafficking programs abroad, and we are aggressively working to raise public awareness to the plight of children trapped in lives of bondage.

COOPERATIVE EFFORTS

As a result of our work and that of others, progress is being made to combat the problem on every front. Since 2003, there have been nearly 3,000 convictions of traffickers, and 40 countries have passed comprehensive anti-trafficking laws. There are a number of efforts to warn vulnerable people of trafficking schemes so that slavery can be prevented before it begins. And partnerships between government and nongovernmental organizations have led to successful initiatives that are improving children's lives by freeing them from forced labor and other forms of slavery.

For example, the International Rescue Committee (IRC) is using U.S. funding to rehabilitate children who were abducted and trafficked to the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) bases in southern Sudan and northern Uganda. Many of these children were forced to kill friends and family members as a result of their conscription. IRC also works to support children who flee Ugandan villages for towns every night for fear of abduction by the rebel LRA group.

To combat the enslavement of children used as camel jockeys, in December 2004 the Ansar Burney Welfare Trust opened a shelter in the United Arab Emirates to care for trafficking victims. The shelter serves many boys who have been trampled by the camels they were forced to ride. As of March 2005, this shelter had rescued and cared for as many as 50 children, at least 16 of whom have been repatriated.

The International Organization for Migration, in partnership with the Department of State, relevant Ghanaian government ministries, the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), and local nongovernmental organizations, works to identify and provide documentation to children who have been trafficked to Ghana's Lake Volta region to work in the fishing industry. To help stop the trafficking of children in this region, this program provides counseling for the child victims, family reunification, and activities to help reintegrate children into daily life. Togbega Hadjor, paramount chief of Ghana's Bakpa Traditional Area, was honored as a hero in the State Department's 2004 Trafficking in Persons Report for his work with this project and his efforts to raise awareness in the region.

We are also working with Free the Slaves to shut down fishing villages in the Bay of Bengal region of Bangladesh that use child slaves. Since October 2004, Bangladeshi police and coast guard have rescued 129 children.

As part of President Bush's initiative to combat all forms of human trafficking, Catholic Relief Services is working with Brazilian law enforcement to identify the routes traffickers use to exploit their victims. They are also working to improve coordination between law enforcement and labor inspectors in order to detect and investigate these activities so that more children can be free.

"NO ONE DESERVES TO BE A SLAVE"

Even with all of the efforts under way, we know that hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of children remain enslaved, and this is a challenge we must face fully and without delay. We must fight government corruption, which allows trafficking to flourish and destabilizes economies. We must step up law enforcement to rescue child slaves and deter traffickers. And we must improve our prevention efforts so that children are not vulnerable to this terrible crime.

The movement to forever abolish the trafficking and enslavement of children continues, and I am proud the United States has taken a leading role to create a world, as President Bush said in his 2005 inaugural address, where "no one is fit to be a master and no one deserves to be a slave."

Sanctions Against Human Traffickers

Each year, the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report identifies countries whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards in U.S. law for prohibiting severe forms of trafficking in persons and do not make significant efforts to do so. The 2004 report identified Bangladesh, Burma, Cuba, Ecuador, Equatorial Guinea, Guyana, North Korea, Sierra Leone, Sudan, and Venezuela in this "Tier 3" category. Under U.S. law, the United States can impose on such nations sanctions that include:

- * withholding non-humanitarian, non-trade-related assistance;
- * withholding funding for participation in educational and cultural exchange programs, when the country does not receive other assistance;
- * opposing loans and grants--except for humanitarian, trade-related, and certain development-related assistance--from the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund (IMF), and other international financial institutions. For example, in 2004 the United States voted against IMF and World Bank loans to Venezuela as a result of Tier 3 placement.

U.S. law allows the president some discretion in waiving these sanctions, particularly if he feels that the waiver would be in the U.S. national interest or would avoid a significant adverse effect on vulnerable populations such as women and children, or if he finds that a government has come into compliance with the minimum standards after the report was issued. Waivers were granted in 2004 for Bangladesh, because of its increasing efforts to prosecute traffickers and rescue victims; for Guyana, because of its new action plan to direct more resources for victims and its new public awareness efforts; for Sierra Leone, for training police officers on trafficking prevention and enforcement and for designating a high government official as the coordinator for trafficking in persons; and for Ecuador, for increasing police raids on traffickers and for raising public awareness (see <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/prsrl/36127.htm> for the full presidential determination).

Sanctions are a last resort and one of only many tools used to stimulate foreign government action on behalf of victims and potential victims of modern-day slavery. Other U.S. efforts in the last year included providing more than $96 million in anti-trafficking funding abroad, participating in extensive bilateral discussions and partnerships, undertaking numerous anti-trafficking activities in cooperation with international organizations, and staging far-reaching public awareness and outreach programs.

(end byliner)

(Distributed by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: May 18, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

142 of 359 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

May 18, 2005 Wednesday 5:27 AM EST

U.S. FIGHTING GOVERNMENT CORRUPTION THAT ENABLES CHILD LABOR

BYLINE: US States News

LENGTH: 1522 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's International Information Programs issued the following press release:

The following article appears in the May 2005 issue of the State Department's electronic journal, Economic Perspectives. The complete issue, titled Ending Abusive Child Labor, can be viewed on the USINFO Web site at <http://usinfo.state.gov/journals/ites/0505/ijee/ijee0505.htm>

(begin byliner)

ELIMINATING THE INTERNATIONAL TRAFFICKING OF CHILDREN

Ambassador John R. Miller

Each year 600,000 to 800,000 people-half of them children-are forced from their homes and their countries to work in other countries. These children are being used as soldiers, camel jockeys, and forced laborers, or engaged in commercial sexual exploitation. The U.S. government, working directly with governments and through nongovernmental organizations, is committed to stopping child traffickers, rehabilitating child victims, and reunifying them with their families. "We must fight government corruption, which allows trafficking to flourish and destabilizes economies," says John Miller, the State Department's top official in the effort to stem human trafficking. "We must step up law enforcement to rescue child slaves and deter traffickers. And we must improve our prevention efforts so children are not vulnerable to this terrible crime."

Ambassador John R. Miller is senior advisor to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

Since all countries have outlawed slavery, many people think the practice is a thing of the past. Unfortunately, the crime of trafficking in persons, or modern-day slavery, is thriving in 2005, and it is having a particular impact on children around the globe.

When we talk about trafficking in persons, we are talking about victims who are forced, defrauded, or coerced into labor or sexual exploitation. The U.S. government estimates that 600,000 to 800,000 men, women, and children are trafficked across international borders each year. Shockingly, up to half of all trafficking victims may be children, who are used as soldiers, camel jockeys, and forced laborers, or engaged in prostitution. The forced labor takes many forms, from backbreaking work in stone quarries, to domestic servitude, to factory and fieldwork.

In response to this egregious offense, the U.S. Congress passed the Trafficking Victims Protection Act in 2000. The law mandates a yearly State Department report that reviews foreign government actions to prevent trafficking, protect the victims, including children, and prosecute the traffickers. It must report on U.S. efforts in these areas. In 2004, the U.S. government gave more than $96 million in funding for anti-trafficking programs abroad, and we are aggressively working to raise public awareness to the plight of children trapped in lives of bondage.

COOPERATIVE EFFORTS

As a result of our work and that of others, progress is being made to combat the problem on every front. Since 2003, there have been nearly 3,000 convictions of traffickers, and 40 countries have passed comprehensive anti-trafficking laws. There are a number of efforts to warn vulnerable people of trafficking schemes so that slavery can be prevented before it begins. And partnerships between government and nongovernmental organizations have led to successful initiatives that are improving children's lives by freeing them from forced labor and other forms of slavery.

For example, the International Rescue Committee (IRC) is using U.S. funding to rehabilitate children who were abducted and trafficked to the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) bases in southern Sudan and northern Uganda. Many of these children were forced to kill friends and family members as a result of their conscription. IRC also works to support children who flee Ugandan villages for towns every night for fear of abduction by the rebel LRA group.

To combat the enslavement of children used as camel jockeys, in December 2004 the Ansar Burney Welfare Trust opened a shelter in the United Arab Emirates to care for trafficking victims. The shelter serves many boys who have been trampled by the camels they were forced to ride. As of March 2005, this shelter had rescued and cared for as many as 50 children, at least 16 of whom have been repatriated.

The International Organization for Migration, in partnership with the Department of State, relevant Ghanaian government ministries, the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), and local nongovernmental organizations, works to identify and provide documentation to children who have been trafficked to Ghana's Lake Volta region to work in the fishing industry. To help stop the trafficking of children in this region, this program provides counseling for the child victims, family reunification, and activities to help reintegrate children into daily life. Togbega Hadjor, paramount chief of Ghana's Bakpa Traditional Area, was honored as a hero in the State Department's 2004 Trafficking in Persons Report for his work with this project and his efforts to raise awareness in the region.

We are also working with Free the Slaves to shut down fishing villages in the Bay of Bengal region of Bangladesh that use child slaves. Since October 2004, Bangladeshi police and coast guard have rescued 129 children.

As part of President Bush's initiative to combat all forms of human trafficking, Catholic Relief Services is working with Brazilian law enforcement to identify the routes traffickers use to exploit their victims. They are also working to improve coordination between law enforcement and labor inspectors in order to detect and investigate these activities so that more children can be free.

"NO ONE DESERVES TO BE A SLAVE"

Even with all of the efforts under way, we know that hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of children remain enslaved, and this is a challenge we must face fully and without delay. We must fight government corruption, which allows trafficking to flourish and destabilizes economies. We must step up law enforcement to rescue child slaves and deter traffickers. And we must improve our prevention efforts so that children are not vulnerable to this terrible crime.

The movement to forever abolish the trafficking and enslavement of children continues, and I am proud the United States has taken a leading role to create a world, as President Bush said in his 2005 inaugural address, where "no one is fit to be a master and no one deserves to be a slave."

Sanctions Against Human Traffickers

Each year, the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report identifies countries whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards in U.S. law for prohibiting severe forms of trafficking in persons and do not make significant efforts to do so. The 2004 report identified Bangladesh, Burma, Cuba, Ecuador, Equatorial Guinea, Guyana, North Korea, Sierra Leone, Sudan, and Venezuela in this "Tier 3" category. Under U.S. law, the United States can impose on such nations sanctions that include:

- * Withholding non-humanitarian, non-trade-related assistance;
- * Withholding funding for participation in educational and cultural exchange programs, when the country does not receive other assistance;
- * Opposing loans and grants—except for humanitarian, trade-related, and certain development-related assistance—from the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund (IMF), and other international financial institutions. For example, in 2004 the United States voted against IMF and World Bank loans to Venezuela as a result of Tier 3 placement.

U.S. law allows the president some discretion in waiving these sanctions, particularly if he feels that the waiver would be in the U.S. national interest or would avoid a significant adverse effect on vulnerable populations such as women and children, or if he finds that a government has come into compliance with the minimum standards after the report was issued. Waivers were granted in 2004 for Bangladesh, because of its increasing efforts to prosecute traffickers and rescue victims; for Guyana, because of its new action plan to direct more resources for victims and its new public awareness efforts; for Sierra Leone, for training police officers on trafficking prevention and enforcement and for designating a high government official as the coordinator for trafficking in persons; and for Ecuador, for increasing police raids on traffickers and for raising public awareness (see <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/prsr1/36127.htm> for the full presidential determination).

Sanctions are a last resort and one of only many tools used to stimulate foreign government action on behalf of victims and potential victims of modern-day slavery. Other U.S. efforts in the last year included providing more than $96 million in anti-trafficking funding abroad, participating in extensive bilateral discussions and partnerships, undertaking numerous anti-trafficking activities in cooperation with international organizations, and staging far-reaching public awareness and outreach programs.

(end byliner)

LOAD-DATE: May 20, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2005 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

143 of 359 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

May 10, 2005 Tuesday

EXCHANGE PROGRAM ALUMNI FIGHT HUMAN TRAFFICKING IN UZBEKISTAN

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 1137 words

DATELINE: NUKUS, Uzbekistan

The following information was released by the U.S. Department of State:

On a warm Saturday in April in a remote desert town in Uzbekistan south of the Aral Sea, dozens of high school students gathered in a small classroom to learn about a growing scourge in Central Asia trafficking in human beings and how to keep from becoming victims.

This was just one of 150 different seminars on human trafficking given recently in more than 30 primary schools and colleges throughout the autonomous republic of Karakalpakstan in western Uzbekistan.

The project, called "Know Your Rights," reached more than 2,200 potential trafficking victims directly and tens of thousands more through posters, pamphlets, and word of mouth. The total cost of the project was roughly $520.

The force behind this enormous undertaking is a small nongovernmental organization (NGO) called KaDem, short for Karakalpak Democracy and meaning step in the Karakalpak language.

Two alumni from the U.S. Department of State's Future Leaders Exchange (FLEX) program -- Raihan Izimbetova and Nigora Dekhkanova, who each spent a year attending high school in the United States under the program are the co-founders and directors of KaDem.

They trained 28 university students on human-trafficking issues and sent them out to conduct seminars throughout Karakalpakstan during a three-week period.

"Since we live in a country with a challenging economic situation, huge numbers of people from Karakalpakstan move to foreign countries in search of work. Many of these migrants are not aware of their rights and they become victims of human traffic, Izimbetova said in an interview with the Washington File.

The U.S. government estimates that 600,000 - 800,000 people are trafficked globally across international borders to be exploited sexually or as forced laborers, while millions more are trafficked within countries. Eighty percent of those trafficked are women and children.

Within Uzbekistan, people are trafficked from rural to urban areas for labor exploitation, while Uzbek women are trafficked abroad for sexual exploitation. Many participants in the conference were the potential victims [of trafficking], because they were graduating this year and most of them would be searching for a job outside the country, said Izimbetova.

The Karakalpak Republic has had its share of hardships in recent years. The shrinkage of the Aral Sea has reduced the region's main industries -- fishing and cotton production -- resulting in a lack of employment and a harsher climate. In the 1950s, the Soviet Union decided to cultivate cotton in the region on a massive scale, using the Syr Darya and Amu Darya Rivers for large-scale irrigation leading to a drop in the flow of freshwater into the sea. It is estimated that the Aral Sea has lost 66 percent of its size in area and 88 percent of its volume between 1960 and 2005.

The lack of jobs, the need to provide for family members and the lure of nearby countries with higher standards of living have made many women easy prey for traffickers promising employment and travel abroad.

The co-founders of KaDem said they want to give young people the knowledge they need to make choices. Democracy for KaDem is to have a choice, said Raihan Izimbetova.

Nigora Dekhkanova said the human-trafficking seminars have been her most rewarding experience with KaDem so far. Not only has the organization taught over 2,200 young people about the dangers of human trafficking during the three-week series of seminars, but it is now receiving calls from the participants and their families asking for advice before leaving the country for summer jobs.

The two women said KaDem has been successful thanks in part to the experiences gained during their yearlong program in the United States. Izimbetova spent a year studying in California in 1998, and Dekhanova studied for a year in Indiana in 2000.

"After completing the FLEX program we realized the importance of community service, said Dekhkanova. We are glad that not only [FLEX] alumni, but also the young generation of our country are involved in community service with the help of KaDem.

The FLEX program was established in 1992 to provide an opportunity for high-school students from the countries of the former Soviet Union to experience life in a democratic society. Over the past decade, more than 14,000 young people have participated in the State Department-funded program, and many today are making important contributions to the development of their countries.

Because of the work by organizations like KaDem and a greater willingness by the Uzbek government to discuss human trafficking and work to combat it, Uzbekistan in 2003 was promoted from the list of countries in the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report with the most serious human trafficking situation (Tier 3) to the list of countries that have a trafficking problem but are working to meet minimum standards for combating it (Tier 2). The report, issued annually in June, assesses trafficking activity and efforts to control it in most of the world's nations. The United States has called on the Uzbek government to cooperate more with law enforcement officials in countries where trafficking victims are taken, to train border guards and customs officials in identifying and assisting victims, and to train police on trafficking investigations.

In January, U.S. Ambassador to Uzbekistan Jon Purnell opened a two-day meeting in Tashkent to discuss effective mechanisms for assisting Uzbek victims of human trafficking and enabling them to return home. The meeting brought together officials from Uzbekistan and countries determined to be the most common destinations for Uzbek trafficking victims: Israel, Russia, Kazakhstan, Turkey, Ukraine, South Korea, China and the United Arab Emirates.

The United States has been urging countries to impose serious penalties on traffickers, adopt laws that prohibit trafficking and provide for victim protection and assistance, ensure that legal tools exist to apprehend "sex tourists," and support preventive education to curb demand for trafficking, especially the demand created by military and civilian peacekeepers and other international personnel in conflict regions.

The United States vigorously enforces U.S. laws against those who traffic in persons and does not deport trafficking victims. Under U.S. law, victims have the right to stay in the United States either through "continued presence" that allows them to stay pending an outcome of a trial, or through a "T" visa, which allows them to stay for up to three years and then apply for permanent residency.

The United States is currently the only country that offers the possibility of permanent residency to victims of trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: May 12, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

144 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

May 10, 2005

Exchange Program Alumni Fight Human Trafficking in Uzbekistan; FLEX graduates reach out to potential victims of labor, sexual exploitation

BYLINE: Tim Receveur, Washington File Staff Writer

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 1169 words

Nukus, Uzbekistan -- On a warm Saturday in April in a remote desert town in Uzbekistan south of the Aral Sea, dozens of high school students gathered in a small classroom to learn about a growing scourge in Central Asia ' trafficking in human beings ' and how to keep from becoming victims.

This was just one of 150 different seminars on human trafficking given recently in more than 30 primary schools and colleges throughout the autonomous republic of Karakalpakstan in western Uzbekistan.

The project, called "Know Your Rights," directly reached more than 2200 potential trafficking victims, as well as tens of thousands more through posters, pamphlets, and word of mouth. The total cost of the project was roughly $520.

The force behind this enormous undertaking is a small nongovernmental organization (NGO) called KaDem, short for Karakalpak Democracy and meaning "step" in the Karakalpak language.

Two alumni from the U.S. Department of State's Future Leaders Exchange (FLEX) program -- Raihan Izimbetova and Nigora Dekhkanova, who each spent a year attending high school in the United States under the program ' are the co-founders and directors of KaDem.

They trained 28 university students on human trafficking issues and sent them out to conduct seminars throughout Karakalpakstan during a three-week period.

"Since we live in a country with a challenging economic situation, huge numbers of people from Karakalpakstan move to foreign countries in search of work. Many of these migrants are not aware of their rights and they become victims of human traffic," Izimbetova said in an interview with the Washington File.

The U.S. government estimates that 600,000 - 800,000 people are trafficked globally across international borders to be exploited sexually or as forced laborers, while millions more are trafficked within countries. Eighty percent of those trafficked are women and children.

Within Uzbekistan, people are trafficked from rural to urban areas for labor exploitation, while Uzbek women are trafficked abroad for sexual exploitation.

"Many participants in the conference were the potential victims [of trafficking], because they were graduating this year and most of them would be searching for a job outside the country," said Izimbetova.

The Karakalpak Republic has had its share of hardships in recent years. The shrinkage of the Aral Sea has reduced the regions main industries -- fishing and cotton production -- resulting in a lack of employment and a harsher climate. In the 1950s the Soviet Union decided to cultivate cotton in the region on a massive scale, using the Syr Darya and Amu Darya Rivers for large-scale irrigation leading to a drop in the flow of freshwater into the sea. As of 2005, it is estimated that the Aral Sea has lost 66 percent of its size in area and 88 percent of its volume since 1960.

The lack of jobs, the need to provide for family members, and the lure of nearby countries with higher standards of living have made many women perfect prey for traffickers promising employment and travel abroad.

The co-founders of KaDem said they want to give young people the knowledge they need to make choices. "Democracy for KaDem is to have a choice," said Raihan Izimbetova.

Nigora Dekhkanova said the human trafficking seminars have been her most rewarding experience with KaDem so far. Not only has the organization taught over 2200 young people about the dangers of human trafficking during the three-week series of seminars, but they are now receiving calls from the participants and their families asking for advice before leaving the country for summer jobs.

The two women said KaDem has been successful thanks in part to the experiences gained during their yearlong program in the United States. Izimbetova spent a year studying in California in 1998, and Dekhkanova studied for a year in Indiana in 2000.

"After completing the FLEX program we realized the importance of community service," said Dekhkanova. "We are glad that not only [FLEX] alumni, but also the young generation of our country are involved in community service with the help of KaDem."

The FLEX program was established in 1992 to provide an opportunity for high school students from the countries of the former Soviet Union to experience life in a democratic society. Over the past decade, more than 14,000 young people have participated in the State Department-funded program, and many today are making important contributions to the development of their countries.

Because of the work by organizations like KaDem and a greater willingness by the Uzbek government to discuss human trafficking and work to combat it, Uzbekistan in 2003 was "promoted" from the list of countries in the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report with the most serious human trafficking situation (Tier 3) to the list of countries that have a trafficking problem but are working to meet minimum standards for combating it (Tier 2). The report, issued annually in June, assesses trafficking activity and efforts to control it in most of the world's nations.

The United States has called on the Uzbek government to cooperate more with law enforcement officials in countries where trafficking victims are taken, to train border guards and customs officials in identifying and assisting victims, and to train police on trafficking investigations.

In January, U.S. Ambassador to Uzbekistan Jon Purnell opened a two-day meeting in Tashkent to discuss effective mechanisms for assisting Uzbek victims of human trafficking and enabling them to return home. The meeting brought together officials from Uzbekistan and countries determined to be the most common destinations for Uzbek trafficking victims: Israel, Russia, Kazakhstan, Turkey, Ukraine, South Korea, China and the United Arab Emirates.

The United States has been urging countries to impose serious penalties on traffickers, adopt laws that prohibit trafficking and provide for victim protection and assistance, ensure that legal tools exist to apprehend "sex tourists," and support preventive education to curb demand for trafficking, especially the demand created by military and civilian peacekeepers and other international personnel in conflict regions.

The United States vigorously enforces U.S. laws against those who traffic in persons. Trafficking victims are not deported. Under U.S. law, victims have the right to stay in the United States either through "continued presence" that allows them to stay pending an outcome of a trial, or through a "T" visa, which allows them to stay for up to three years and then apply for permanent residency.

The United States is currently the only country that offers the possibility of permanent residency to victims of trafficking.

For additional information on U.S. efforts to combat trafficking in persons, see Human Trafficking.

(The Washington File is a product of the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: May 10, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

145 of 359 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

May 10, 2005 Tuesday 12:52 AM EST

EXCHANGE PROGRAM ALUMNI FIGHT HUMAN TRAFFICKING IN UZBEKISTAN

BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 1185 wordsDATELINE: NUKUS, Uzbekistan

The U.S. Department of State's International Information Programs issued the following press release:

By Tim Receveur

Washington File Staff Writer

On a warm Saturday in April in a remote desert town in Uzbekistan south of the Aral Sea, dozens of high school students gathered in a small classroom to learn about a growing scourge in Central Asia - trafficking in human beings - and how to keep from becoming victims.

This was just one of 150 different seminars on human trafficking given recently in more than 30 primary schools and colleges throughout the autonomous republic of Karakalpakstan in western Uzbekistan.

The project, called "Know Your Rights," reached more than 2,200 potential trafficking victims directly and tens of thousands more through posters, pamphlets, and word of mouth. The total cost of the project was roughly $520.

The force behind this enormous undertaking is a small nongovernmental organization (NGO) called KaDem, short for Karakalpak Democracy and meaning "step" in the Karakalpak language.

Two alumni from the U.S. Department of State's Future Leaders Exchange (FLEX) program - Raihan Izimbetova and Nigora Dekhkanova, who each spent a year attending high school in the United States under the program - are the co-founders and directors of KaDem.

They trained 28 university students on human-trafficking issues and sent them out to conduct seminars throughout Karakalpakstan during a three-week period.

"Since we live in a country with a challenging economic situation, huge numbers of people from Karakalpakstan move to foreign countries in search of work. Many of these migrants are not aware of their rights and they become victims of human traffic," Izimbetova said in an interview with the Washington File.

The U.S. government estimates that 600,000 - 800,000 people are trafficked globally across international borders to be exploited sexually or as forced laborers, while millions more are trafficked within countries. Eighty percent of those trafficked are women and children.

Within Uzbekistan, people are trafficked from rural to urban areas for labor exploitation, while Uzbek women are trafficked abroad for sexual exploitation.

"Many participants in the conference were the potential victims [of trafficking], because they were graduating this year and most of them would be searching for a job outside the country," said Izimbetova.

The Karakalpak Republic has had its share of hardships in recent years. The shrinkage of the Aral Sea has reduced the region's main industries - fishing and cotton production - resulting in a lack of employment and a harsher climate. In the 1950s, the Soviet Union decided to cultivate cotton in the region on a massive scale, using the Syr Darya and Amu Darya Rivers for large-scale irrigation leading to a drop in the flow of freshwater into the sea. It is estimated that the Aral Sea has lost 66 percent of its size in area and 88 percent of its volume between 1960 and 2005.

The lack of jobs, the need to provide for family members and the lure of nearby countries with higher standards of living have made many women easy prey for traffickers promising employment and travel abroad.

The co-founders of KaDem said they want to give young people the knowledge they need to make choices. "Democracy for KaDem is to have a choice," said Raihan Izimbetova.

Nigora Dekhkanova said the human-trafficking seminars have been her most rewarding experience with KaDem so far. Not only has the organization taught over 2,200 young people about the dangers of human trafficking during the three-week series of seminars, but it is now receiving calls from the participants and their families asking for advice before leaving the country for summer jobs.

The two women said KaDem has been successful thanks in part to the experiences gained during their yearlong program in the United States. Izimbetova spent a year studying in California in 1998, and Dekhanova studied for a year in Indiana in 2000.

"After completing the FLEX program we realized the importance of community service," said Dekhkanova. "We are glad that not only [FLEX] alumni, but also the young generation of our country are involved in community service with the help of KaDem."

The FLEX program was established in 1992 to provide an opportunity for high-school students from the countries of the former Soviet Union to experience life in a democratic society. Over the past decade, more than 14,000 young people have participated in the State Department-funded program, and many today are making important contributions to the development of their countries.

Because of the work by organizations like KaDem and a greater willingness by the Uzbek government to discuss human trafficking and work to combat it, Uzbekistan in 2003 was "promoted" from the list of countries in the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report[1] with the most serious human trafficking situation (Tier 3) to the list of countries that have a trafficking problem but are working to meet minimum standards for combating it (Tier 2). The report, issued annually in June, assesses trafficking activity and efforts to control it in most of the world's nations.

The United States has called on the Uzbek government to cooperate more with law enforcement officials in countries where trafficking victims are taken, to train border guards and customs officials in identifying and assisting victims, and to train police on trafficking investigations.

In January, U.S. Ambassador to Uzbekistan Jon Purnell opened a two-day meeting in Tashkent to discuss effective mechanisms for assisting Uzbek victims of human trafficking and enabling them to return home. The meeting brought together officials from Uzbekistan and countries determined to be the most common destinations for Uzbek trafficking victims: Israel, Russia, Kazakhstan, Turkey, Ukraine, South Korea, China and the United Arab Emirates.

The United States has been urging countries to impose serious penalties on traffickers, adopt laws that prohibit trafficking and provide for victim protection and assistance, ensure that legal tools exist to apprehend "sex tourists," and support preventive education to curb demand for trafficking, especially the demand created by military and civilian peacekeepers and other international personnel in conflict regions.

The United States vigorously enforces U.S. laws against those who traffic in persons and does not deport trafficking victims. Under U.S. law, victims have the right to stay in the United States either through "continued presence" that allows them to stay pending an outcome of a trial, or through a "T" visa, which allows them to stay for up to three years and then apply for permanent residency.

The United States is currently the only country that offers the possibility of permanent residency to victims of trafficking.

For additional information on U.S. efforts to combat trafficking in persons, see Human Trafficking at http://usinfo.state.gov/global_issues/human_trafficking.html

[1] <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/tiprpt/2004/>

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2005 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

146 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Washington Post

washingtonpost.com

The Washington Post

May 8, 2005 Sunday
Final Edition

Japan Moves to Bar Human Trafficking; U.S. Pressure Prompts Legal Action

BYLINE: Natalie Obiko Pearson, Associated PressSECTION: A Section; A18LENGTH: 1150 wordsDATELINE: TOKYO

Monica's life as a Tokyo prostitute was her own choice. Like thousands of others over the past two decades, she took what she thought was a lucrative offer to work in Japan's multibillion-dollar sex industry.

But the Colombian woman had no idea of what can await a foreign prostitute in Japan: debt bondage, violent working conditions, fines imposed by pimps or brothel owners for attempting escape -- and an utter lack of help from authorities.

"The reality is different once you arrive. It's much harder than you ever imagined," said Monica, 31, a single mother who still works the Tokyo streets 12 years after arriving in Japan. She spoke on condition she be identified only by her first name.

The thousands of cases like Monica's are at the center of a crackdown on human trafficking in Japan after it was placed on a U.S. watch list in June 2004 and was cited for trafficking in a State Department human rights report in February.

In March, authorities tightened visa requirements for what are euphemistically known as "entertainers," a category thought to be used to provide legal cover for foreign sex workers. And the Diet, the Japanese legislature, is expected to pass a law by this summer that would for the first time make trafficking of foreign victims a criminal offense.

Affluence and a lack of laws against sex trafficking have combined to make Japan one of the world's top destinations for women like Monica.

Experts say cases involving women who are kidnapped or otherwise tricked into working as prostitutes are rare in Japan. More commonly, women come voluntarily, but find themselves caught in slave-like conditions after they arrive.

"The Japanese human trafficking problem is the sex industry," said Kazuo Inoue, a member of the opposition Democratic Party in the Diet and an anti-trafficking activist who says the crackdown also needs to address the root cause: demand stoked by loosely regulated red-light districts.

"We are in the process of drawing up the necessary measures to effectively battle this," said Masaru Sakamoto, of the cabinet office overseeing the government's anti-trafficking plan. "I think once those are in place, the fruits of our efforts will become more evident."

Critics, however, are waiting to see if Japan is serious about protecting victims. The country has long treated women like Monica as traffickers' accomplices. The women are given scant legal protections because of their status as sex workers and illegal migrants.

A mother at age 13, Monica was struggling to survive in a poor, violent barrio of Bogota more than a decade ago when she was approached by a broker with the offer of sex work in Japan. The money would be enough to provide a better future for her daughter. Monica left her daughter behind when she came to Japan.

"No one comes because they want to do this work. But we choose to because there's no better option," in Japan or Colombia, she said in a late-night interview at a cafe near one of Tokyo's busiest red-light districts.

Monica arrived in Japan in 1993 at age 20 and was saddled immediately with $48,000 of debt -- much more than she had been led to believe, she said -- and warned of reprisals against her family if she tried to flee. Minor infringements, including missing work because of illness, can inflate that debt, she said. Women suffer a brutal physical toll serving dozens of customers a week, with no days off.

Monica was able to repay her debts in several months, since Japan's economy was stronger then, and said she now works on her own. She said women who come to Japan these days aren't as lucky, some finding themselves financially obligated for more than a year.

It's hard to come by statistics on women trafficked to Japan. Activists estimate more than 1 million women may have arrived since the early 1980s. The Switzerland-based International Organization for Migration calculates that about 150,000 foreigners work in Japan's sex industry.

The Philippines, Colombia and Thailand are the top sources, according to the International Labor Organization's Japan office, although anecdotal evidence on the street points to a significant number of Russians, Koreans and Chinese.

The sex industry has long been treated leniently in Japan. Critics have repeatedly alleged ties between traffickers and law enforcement, accusing immigration officers of taking bribes to allow prostitutes into the country on fake passports and police of returning abused sex workers to their captors after they had fled. Those allegations are denied by the National Police Agency.

Kinsey Alden Dinan, a Columbia University researcher, said the Japanese government does little to safeguard sex workers' rights or to help them quit the business.

"When there's clearly a demand for these people to work in your country, you have an obligation to work out a system that they can do it in legally and safely," she said, charging that Japanese officials find it "easier to deport them than to deal with them."

Sakamoto, of the cabinet office, said the government's anti-trafficking plan will include provisions for counseling for prostitutes and for postponing deportation to allow victims time to testify and to encourage them to cooperate with authorities.

But only a few women are expected to qualify for assistance under the new law, because the government does not recognize as victims those who have willingly entered the country for unauthorized labor, regardless of what happens to them.

"I don't see a clear plan to protect and support victims," said Yoko Yoshida, a lawyer and director of the Japan Network Against Trafficking in Persons. She said there was a need for medical attention, legal advice and job training for victims.

Japan's wealth has long drawn the hopeful, and many believe turning them away could prove difficult.

Entertainment visas, intended for musicians, dancers and other entertainers, are issued to 80,000 Filipina women each year. Critics contend the visas are a cover for sex trafficking, saying most women who get the visas end up working illegally as strippers, hostesses and prostitutes.

Yet while the new visa restrictions are expected to reduce dramatically the number of entertainment visas issued, such measures also threaten the flow of $400 million sent home each year by citizens of the Philippines working in Japan. The Philippine government has urged leniency for its citizens already working here with entertainment visas.

Chaturont Chaiyakam, a consular official at the Thai Embassy in Tokyo, estimates that of 15,000 illegal Thai migrants in Japan, roughly 6,000 are in prostitution.

Flipping through stacks of victims' affidavits collected by his embassy, Chaiyakam said it is not unusual for those sent home to Thailand to get smuggled back into Japan.

"There is still demand, so people want to come," he said.

LOAD-DATE: May 8, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2005 The Washington Post

147 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Associated Press

April 26, 2005, Tuesday, BC cycle

Japan cracks down on human trafficking, but sprawling sex industry is a tough target

BYLINE: By NATALIE OBIKO PEARSON, Associated Press Writer

SECTION: International News

LENGTH: 1158 words

DATELINE: TOKYO

Monica's life as a Tokyo prostitute was her own choice. Like thousands of others over the past two decades, she took what she thought was a good offer of lucrative work in Japan's multibillion-dollar sex industry.

But the Colombian woman had no idea of what awaits foreign prostitutes in Japan: debt bondage, sometimes violent working conditions, "fines" imposed by pimps or brothel owners for any attempt to escape - and an utter lack of help from authorities.

"The reality is different once you arrive. It's much harder than you ever imagined," says Monica, 31, a single mother who still works the Tokyo streets. She spoke on condition she only be identified by her first name.

The thousands of cases like Monica's are at the center of a new crackdown on human trafficking in Japan following the country's placement on a U.S. watch list last year. Japan was again cited for trafficking in a U.S. human rights report in February.

Affluence and a lack of laws against sex trafficking have combined to make Japan one of the world's top destinations for women like Monica.

In the popular imagination, human trafficking involves women who are kidnapped or otherwise tricked into working as prostitutes. But experts say such cases are rare in Japan. More common are women who come voluntarily, but find themselves caught in slave-like conditions upon arrival.

"The Japanese human trafficking problem is the sex industry," said Kazuo Inoue, an opposition Democratic Party lawmaker and anti-trafficking activist who says the crackdown also needs to address the root cause - demand stoked by loosely regulated red-light districts.

Tokyo is moving to clean up its act. The government is expected to pass a law by this summer to make trafficking of foreign victims into Japan a criminal offense for the first time. Authorities also have tightened visa requirements for "entertainers," a category that is suspected of providing legal cover for foreign sex workers.

"We are in the process of drawing up the necessary measures to effectively battle this," said Masaru Sakamoto from the Cabinet office overseeing the government's anti-trafficking plan. "I think once those are in place, the fruits of our efforts will become more evident."

Critics, however, are waiting to see if Japan is serious about protecting victims. Japan has long treated women like Monica as accomplices to the traffickers who bring them here, deserving of few rights as sex workers and illegal migrants.

A mother at age 13, Monica was struggling to survive in a poor, violent barrio of Bogota more than a decade ago when she was approached by a broker with the offer of sex work in Japan, something that would pay enough to buy her daughter a better future back home in Colombia.

"No one comes because they want to do this work. But we choose to because there's no better option," in Japan or back in Colombia, says the petite redhead dressed modestly during a late-night interview at a cafe near one of Tokyo's busiest red-light districts.

Arriving in 1993 at age 20, Monica was slapped with a debt of $48,000 - much larger than she had been led to believe - and warned of reprisals against her family if she tried to escape. Minor infringements, including illness, can inflate that debt, she says, and women suffer a brutal physical toll in serving dozens of customers a week, with no days off, to get rid of the debt.

She was able to repay her debt in several months, since Japan's economy was stronger then, and now works on her own. She says women who come these days aren't as lucky, with some finding themselves in bondage for more than a year amid ever-increasing fines for various infringements.

Statistics on women trafficked here are hard to get. Activists estimate more than 1 million may have come since the early 1980s. The Switzerland-based International Organization for Migration calculates Japan's sex industry has about 150,000 foreign workers today.

The Philippines, Colombia and Thailand are the top sources, according to the International Labor Organization's Japan office, although anecdotal evidence on the street points to a surging number of Russians, Koreans and Chinese as well.

The sex industry has long been treated with leniency in Japan: Red-light districts have openly thrived from the patronage of legitimate businesses.

Critics have repeatedly alleged ties between traffickers and law enforcement, from immigration officers taking bribes to allow prostitutes into the country on fake passports, to police who return escaped, abused sex workers to their captors. Those allegations are denied by the National Police Agency.

Kinsey Alden Dinan, a Columbia University researcher, said the Japanese government does little to safeguard sex workers' rights and well-being or ensure they have ways to quit the business.

"When there's clearly a demand for these people to work in your country, you have an obligation to work out a system that they can do it in legally and safely," she said, charging that for Japanese officials "it's easier to deport them than to deal with them."

Sakamoto of the Cabinet office said the government's anti-trafficking plan will include some counseling for prostitutes and plans to postpone immediate deportation to encourage victims to testify and cooperate with authorities.

But it's expected only a few women will qualify since the government does not recognize those who have willingly entered the country for unauthorized labor as victims, regardless of what happens to them.

"I don't see a clear plan to protect and support victims," said Yoko Yoshida, a lawyer and director of the Japan Network Against Trafficking in Persons. She said there is a need for medical attention, legal advice and job training for victims.

Japan's wealth has long drawn the hopeful, and many believe turning them away could prove difficult.

"Entertainment" visas, intended for musicians, dancers and other entertainers, are issued to 80,000 Filipina women each year. Critics contend the visas are a cover for sex trafficking, saying most women who get the visas end up working illegally as strippers, hostesses and prostitutes.

The government tightened visa requirements in mid-March, which is expected to dramatically reduce the number it issues.

Yet that plan threatens the flow of $400 million sent home each year by Philippines citizens working in Japan, and the Philippines government has urged leniency for its citizens already working here with entertainment visas.

Chaturont Chaiyakam, a consular official at the Thai Embassy in Tokyo, estimates that of 15,000 illegal Thai migrants in Japan, roughly 6,000 are in prostitution.

Flipping through stacks of victims' affidavits collected by his embassy, Chaiyakam said it is not unusual for those sent home to Thailand to get smuggled back into Japan.

"There is still demand, so people want to come," he said.

LOAD-DATE: May 2, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

These materials may not be republished without the express written consent of The Associated Press

GRAPHIC: AP Photos APN SUNDAY ILLUSTRATIONS: Subscribers get 2 photos of

Copyright 2005 Associated Press
All Rights Reserved

148 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Prospect

April 21, 2005

Learning the Thai sex trade

BYLINE: Alex Renton

LENGTH: 5644 words

January was ugly in our part of Bangkok. We live near Soi Nana, off Sukhumvit Road, a famous tourist site catering for a specific sort of visitor: middle-aged western men. They come to Nana for one reason-to have sex cheaply. November to January is high season in Thailand for holidaymakers from northern nations, and the bars and pavements of Nana are packed with hundreds of people buying and selling sex. January was busier than ever this year. It took a struggle every evening to get through the ranks of skinny Thai women and the pale men in shorts picking them over.

It was the tsunami, of course. Patong beach, one of the worst hit parts of Phuket island, is among Thailand's best known destinations for tourists seeking sex. So the men transferred their holidays to Bangkok. Happily for them, there was a drought in northeastern Thailand at the end of 2004. The poor rice crop that resulted sent more young girls than usual down from their impoverished villages on the plains of Isaan to harvest the tourists in the big city. This seasonal migration goes back, historians of the sex trade will tell you, to the Vietnam war and the establishment of Thailand as a brothel for American GIs on leave. Prostitution for foreign visitors developed into a major industry, although official Thailand shrouds its economic and social significance in misinformation and a variety of interesting hypocrisies.

For a start, no one knows how many foreigners come to Thailand every year to buy sex. Many people have opinions on the matter-not least Thailand's government, which understandably resists the label "brothel of the world." It has threatened to expel journalists who impugn the honour of Thai womenfolk, and forced Longman's dictionary to change its 1993 edition, the entry for Bangkok which included the line "a place where there are a lot of prostitutes." Thailand, in its turn, has been considerably abused by statisticians and NGOs. Claims that there are 2m or more prostitutes in the population of 64m, as was once stated in a Time cover story, are absurd. This much-quoted figure was drawn from the statistics of the Coalition Against Trafficking in Women, an international NGO. If true, it would mean that one in four Thai women between the ages of 15 and 29 in Thailand was a prostitute. Another anti-trafficking organisation, Ecpat (End Child Prostitution, Child Pornography and Trafficking of Children for Sexual Purposes), claimed in the mid-1990s that there were up to 800,000 Thai child prostitutes-a lunatic figure that still circulates in the US state department.

The trade in humans across the borders of southeast Asia is a real and ugly story, but it continues to throw up incredible statistics-perhaps because it is an issue that generates large amounts of aid dollars. There are 21 UN agencies and NGOs based in Bangkok which concern themselves with trafficking. The Boxing day tsunami predictably generated a trafficking angle. Within a few days, aid agencies led by Unicef were issuing grim warnings of orphans being sold for adoption or the sex trade. The western media got particularly excited by the picture of an angelic Nordic child, supposedly stolen from a Thai hospital. This proved baseless, and there has yet to emerge a single credible example of a tsunami child, blond or brown, being sold. But the story has flourished in the global consciousness, leaving the few facts from which it seeded far behind.

The sex industry in Thailand generates fantasies. There are the fantasies of pliant girls which draw the western sex tourists, and then there are the fantasies of lurid exploitation which draw the western moralisers and NGOs. But what is the actual scale of prostitution in Thailand? And how serious is the trafficking problem?

Selling sex has been illegal in the kingdom since 1960, but Longman's was right-there are a lot of prostitutes. Ask most sensible analysts in Thailand and you will be told that the number of women employed in prostitution, though a long way short of 2m, is between 150,000 and 220,000 (male prostitutes are a tiny fraction of that). You will also hear that western sex tourism is not economically significant, that most prostitution in Thailand is for local men, and that most of the people who do come from abroad for sex are Asian. There is some truth in this. Sixty per cent of Thailand's 10m visitors in 2003 were from elsewhere in east Asia, and certainly the brothel-lined towns on Thailand's Malaysian border, and the entire streets in Bangkok that are devoted to sex clubs for "Japanese only," are evidence of the sex trade designed for the region.

But the proof is there-in Pattaya, in Phuket and on my own street in Bangkok-that huge numbers of non-Asian visitors buy sex in Thailand. But how many? Sex tourism is notoriously difficult to measure. How can you ask at immigration if tourists have arrived in Thailand primarily for the prostitution? How do you know if a man on a business trip is likely to visit a sex venue with his Thai colleagues? Yet while the government, and the tourist and aviation industries, resist attempts to measure the significance of the sex trade, there is one way to gauge the extent of sex tourism, even if in fairly crude terms. A look at the Thai immigration department's statistics, culled from the cards foreigners must fill in on entry, reveals an interesting discrepancy: 60 per cent of visitors are male and only 40 per cent female. The gap grows when you look at arrivals from the rich countries who come to Thailand on holiday in large numbers-the US, Japan, Britain, France. For these places, nearly two males arrived for every female in 2003.

More British citizens visit Thailand than those of any other non-Asian country. In 2003 (the last year for which full figures are available) some 545,000 British residents arrived on visits. If you remove the children, and the British citizens visiting for business or reasons other than a holiday, you arrive at about 489,000-314,000 men and 175,000 women. That is 139,000 more British men than women coming to Thailand for a holiday-a gap of 28 per cent. The French gender disparity-60,500 more men than women-is 32 per cent, about the same as that of visitors from the US. The Japanese, at 35 per cent, is the highest-over 300,000 more men. If you take Europe as a whole (though there are some countries, like Finland and Sweden, with virtually no disparity) the gap is 25 per cent-494,000 more men than women.

A look at the major rich-nation visitors-those from the US, Australia, Europe and Japan-shows that 952,000 more men than women visited Thailand on holiday in 2003, a disparity of 28 per cent. (The 2004 statistics, not yet complete, will show a slight narrowing of this gap, but a leap of overall numbers of around 20 per cent.) This pattern is unique among major tourist destinations. Take, for example, the Caribbean, another popular tropical destination for economy tourism. Here, the disparity runs at 2 or 3 per cent-the only country with a significant gap in favour of men, nearly 11 per cent, is Cuba, the Caribbean country most notorious for sex tourism.

Do nearly a million men from the rich world come to Thailand to buy sex every year? The proposition deserves challenge. Men are capable of holidaying for reasons other than fornication with strangers. There is golf, after all. I asked Sasithara Pichaichannarong, director general of the Thai government's office of tourism development, how she accounted for the discrepancy. "Businessmen!" she said promptly. "They're counted as tourists in the statistics." But I had factored them out-and in any case, only 31,000 Britons stated business rather than holiday as the purpose of their visit in 2003, less than 6 per cent of the total. So did sex explain the extra 950,000 men that arrive from wealthy countries? "Probably," she said. "But sex tourism exists everywhere, not just in Thailand." Not in such numbers, however. These extra men represent 10 per cent of all international arrivals in Thailand.

So what are these men doing in Thailand? I took the problem to John Koldowski, managing director for strategic intelligence at the Bangkok-based Pacific Asia Travel Association. He was understandably cagey: Pata is funded by government, airlines and the hotel industry. But yes, he confirmed, the gender discrepancy is unusual for the global tourist destinations. So these extra men are coming here for sex? "It's that, or the golf," said Koldowski.

And why so many Brits? He thought that the backpacker tourists might account for the gap-young British males, following the traditional trail through southeast Asia to see mates or relatives in Australasia. But the average British arrival is aged 40, I pointed out. "Backpacking is a state of mind, not an age thing," pronounced Koldowski. That's an advertising slogan, not an explanation, I said.

He became tetchy. "Look, if you are really researching the social factors of this, you should consider if men might come here because they're fed up with the ball-breaking females they have to deal with at home. Maybe they want to meet the sort of gentle, beautiful, kind-hearted women they'll find here." This seemed to answer my question. The men are here for sex and, of course, golf. Or both. Female golf caddies who double as prostitutes are, anecdotally, one of the special features of the courses of Thailand.

Sex tourism is a significant part of Thailand's economy. Tourism overall has been the country's major foreign currency earner since 1982. In 2003, international tourism alone accounted for 309.26bn baht (£4.56bn) in receipts-about 6 per cent of GDP-ranking Thailand 15th in the world. That year, the extra adult male holidaymakers from around the world probably generated almost £1bn-over 1 per cent of Thailand's GDP.

But prostitution in Thailand is much bigger than just the trade for tourists. There is no official measurement of the economics, but the clues are there. Many Thai men are habitual users of prostitutes, and the trade, while illegal, carries less stigma than in most countries and is acknowledged by the government as a source of revenue. In January, the Thai excise department announced that it was going to seek a larger take in the so-called "sin tax" from massage parlours, a common brothel front. But Thai tax collection is notoriously inefficient. A better indicator of the money around in the prostitution business came last year from Chuwit Kamolvisit, who was employing 2,000 prostitutes in six luxury massage parlours in Bangkok (which he liked to refer to as "semen collection centres"). Chuwit, the "Tub Tycoon," is an amusing rogue-"very un-Thai," they say here-who in February 2005 became an opposition member of parliament with an anti-corruption agenda. During his campaign he opened his books to the press, revealing to a largely unsurprised nation that his monthly bill for bribes and payoffs to the Bangkok authorities came to £160,000. Separately, Thailand's National Economic and Social Advisory Council (Nesac) said that massage parlour owners pay £62m a year in police bribes. The income directly generated by prostitution was estimated at 100bn baht (£1.5bn) by the respected Thai economist Pasuk Phongpaichit in a 1998 study. This is about a third of the value of the agriculture sector, which employs more people than any other in Thailand.

Westerners form an important-albeit not the major-part of this economic picture. A few have settled here because of it, calling themselves "sexpatriates." In towns like Pattaya on the Gulf of Thailand, on Phuket island and in the sex trade districts of Bangkok, they run bars, hotels and brothels, mediating the transactions between male tourists and Thai women. They are vocal on websites and in local publishing ventures, churning out guides for sex tourists. Some of these men see themselves as exiles, refugees from the "feminazis" who are crushing the spirit of the western male. Here, the old order of the sexes still reigns. Women know their place, they wash your feet before they have sex with you, they say thank you and help you in the shower afterwards. And, of course, westerners' savings and pensions go a long way. Beer is a dollar a bottle, and a woman for the night available for £10 or less. It's the "last place you can be a white man," says one bar-owning sexpat on his website.

Their guidebooks picture a world of grasping, stupid peasant girls, known as "LBFMs" (little brown fucking machines), out to entrap and rip off the honest, randy male visitor, who must treat them firmly and be sure to stamp out any nonsense for the sake of the next bloke who comes along. Books like Sex, Lies & Bar Girls are available in mainstream shops, including at Bangkok airport. They are full of robust advice on "scrogging" as many Thai women in as short a time and for as little money as possible.

One of the self-justifications put forward by the sexpats is that the business makes everyone happy-the exploitation is two-way. It is not like normal prostitution, you hear. All the girls are smiling! ("All smile, all the time!" is an official tourism slogan). But you don't have to be a feminazi to see that the power relationship is grossly unbalanced. The real choices lie with the man with the wallet.

The famous Thai smile hides a lot. The women of rural Thailand who descend on the tourist areas are driven by poverty. Around a third of the Thai population lives on less than $ 2 a day; in the agricultural northeast, where farmers are beset by drought and collapsing prices (chiefly because of the dropping of trade barriers with China), one in six people lives on less than $ 1 a day. A high proportion of prostitutes-over 60 per cent, according to some surveys-have left children at home in the countryside. In traditional Thai society, a girl's first duty is the support of her family. Seventy-five per cent of prostitutes, according to one study, entered the trade after the failure of a relationship-"damaged goods" in a society that still puts a high premium on female virginity. Another common reason given for entering prostitution is the pressure of family debts.

And the gains to be had are fabulous. The price of sex from a street prostitute in Nana starts at perhaps 500 baht, a little over £7. That is a fortnight's living costs in the countryside, or half a week's salary for a Thai police constable. There is little doubt that the sex trade is vital to the economy of the poor northeast, which is another of the well-rehearsed justifications of the sexpats. Tales of bar girls who retire rich and happy to their home villages-some of them with a farang (foreign) husband-are many, and there is no social disgrace attached. "The land a girl child ploughs lies between her legs," goes a saying from rural Thailand. But some women are broken in the process, and on my street, occasionally, you can see the damage that results.

Still, there is a grain of truth in the sexpat argument. Soi Nana is not like the grim red light districts of London or New York, with their backdrop of organised crime, violence, and drug use. The only fight I have seen on Nana was between drunken Englishmen. Amphetamines are widely used by the prostitutes, it is said, but not heroin. I have spotted one used syringe in the gutter in our four years here: there was worse to be seen nightly on the crack-infected street in west London where we used to live. Most women soliciting rich-world foreigners are relatively free agents. Their worst affliction appears to be the corrupt Bangkok police. In Thailand, the industry is not generally pimp-driven and, although technically illegal, its openness undoubtedly provides some protection for women. The sex tourist is more likely to visit a bar or a massage parlour than a traditional "closed" brothel (these appear to be more common for the domestic sex trade). NGOs say that condom use is close to 100 per cent, and HIV infection has been in decline in Thailand for a decade.

My family and I have become blasé about the street over the four years since we rented a house off Nana. We used to stare, transfixed by the grotesque Beauty and the Beast scenes: slender girls being slobbered over by beery skinheads, the doddering grandfathers being escorted to hotels by tiny teenagers. But you come to realise these objections are chiefly aesthetic. The tourists, as opposed to the sexpats, are not so bad—often ignorant, yes, but lonely and innocent too. We have only once on our street seen a girl who was plainly underage. She was being bundled into a car by two western men—we tried to get the police to stop the vehicle but they were not interested. (Of the 21 agencies and NGOs working from Bangkok on the trafficking problem, not one has managed to set up a 24-hour hotline where foreign visitors can report it actually happening.)

On my street you get snapshots of sadness—the look of a woman as she turns her face from her elderly male escort, her smile slipping to reveal what she is really thinking; the desperate patience of the older women, not pretty enough any longer to be attached to a bar, who must patiently wait in line under the glaring lights of the Nana Hotel sign. These can make you feel like crying for humanity, but, rationally, you must think, this is what globalised tourism and the laws of supply and demand will produce. What specifically should we object to? To stamp out the sex trade would cause enormous harm in a country that fails abjectly, despite its relative wealth, to provide for its poor. After four years, I find that the only aspect that can get me really heated about sex tourism in Thailand is the hypocrisy, from both the trade's apologists and its enemies.

There is another sex-related industry in Bangkok—run by those who survey and lobby, preach and analyse and argue endlessly with each other about how to stop or curb prostitution and human trafficking. There is a harvest here, too, for cultural anthropologists and social historians. The books on why people have sex in Thailand line the bookshop shelves next to those on how to have sex in Thailand. There are socioeconomists analysing the "incomplete dialectic between tourist and prostitute"; anthropologists on the Foucaultian relationship between a Thai prostitute and her body; social historians on the growth of the myth of the exotic Orient, as promulgated by Puccini, Gauguin or the young British men who ran the trading posts of the East India Company. There are, as Pasuk Phongpaichit points out, many people beyond the prostitutes themselves who make a living on the back of Thailand's sex trade.

And there is one aspect about which everyone agrees something must be done: "trafficking," the sale of women and children into the sex trade. Worrying about trafficking is another business, employing its own community of expats in Bangkok, which is the southeast Asian hub for many international NGOs. Thirteen UN agencies and eight international NGOs are involved in anti-trafficking work, so many that a further UN body (Uniap, the United Nations Inter-Agency Project on Human Trafficking in the Greater Mekong Sub-Region) was established in 2000, employing 18 people, to co-ordinate them and all the international NGOs (Save the Children, Oxfam and so on) which run programmes or policies on trafficking in the six countries through which the Mekong river flows.

Donors—particularly the US and British governments—throw millions of dollars at trafficking every year. Spending on the issue has shot up during the Bush administration—it was $ 50m in 2003—for which the trafficking of women and children for sex is an ideal target for foreign aid. "It fits the demands of an ideological morality that says that in essence all sex issues should be dealt with by abstinence. And it's about defenceless kids and teenagers," said one former Unicef worker. Another who was involved in the agency's anti-trafficking programmes in east Asia told me that within Unicef they are seen as "a great collecting bucket," a reliable method of raising funds that can then be spent on less donor-thrilling projects, like education or immunisation.

Thus hardly a fortnight in Bangkok goes by without another seminar, conference or children's forum, organised by Uniap or others. In November, I dropped in on the "post-Yokohama mid-term review of the east Asia and Pacific regional commitment and action plan against commercial sexual exploitation of children," held by Unescap (UN Economic and Social Commission for Asia and Pacific), Unicef and Ecpat. This three-day meeting, attended by delegates from more than 20 countries, was to report on what had happened since the last such meeting three years earlier in Yokohama. The only concrete development, it seemed, was the signing in Burma a month earlier by ministers from Cambodia, China, Laos, Thailand and Vietnam of a "memorandum of understanding to co-ordinate action to prevent trafficking." This was being hailed as a big achievement. But it was also noted that "a lack of reliable data remains a major hindrance to the implementation of well-targeted and effective measures to stop the commercial sexual exploitation of children."

That is an understatement. Everyone in the anti-trafficking industry is painfully aware that there is no real data at all. There are gruesome anecdotes and a few unimpressive figures for arrest and prosecution, but hard facts do not exist. You are told that each year many Thai women are sold into the sex trade in Japan, that they arrive thinking they are going to work as nannies or waitresses and find themselves saddled with "debts" of $ 25,000-45,000 and forced to work them off by yakuza gangsters in brothels known as "black jails." Such was the report of human rights lobbyist Kinsey Dinan, published by the Harvard Asia Centre in 2002. But that article, like so many others, made no attempt to attach numbers to the stories. Dinan's "several-year long research project" with Human Rights Watch merely says she "found that thousands of women from Thailand were being trafficked into... Japan each year." That is it. The truth is there are no useful statistics on this issue in Japan, other than some on the female visa overstayers (10,000 from Thailand in 2001). But the NGO lobbyists need better than that to tickle the donors. There are much more frightening ones around, and they are widely quoted: Unicef's estimate, for example, that 1.2m children (meaning under-18 year olds) are trafficked every year, a third of them in Asia.

At a recent anti-trafficking meeting of international NGOs, I met a woman from Oxfam India who told the meeting that in Delhi alone child-trafficking was a business worth $ 1m a day. No one raised an eyebrow. Another agency claims the child sex trade has a $ 7bn annual turnover in Asia (a figure the US state department gives as the global value of the human trafficking trade). These numbers are endlessly parroted by lobbyists and journalists, and never, it seems, challenged. The trade in humans is an area where anyone seems pretty much able to say anything. David Feingold, international co-ordinator on HIV and trafficking for Unesco, analyses the statistics on these issues, but even he has not been able to get Unicef to explain its figure of 1.2m children. "Trafficking is a dangerous word," Feingold says. "It stops the brain working."

If you ask the agencies how they get these figures, you get a weary response: "Why are you journalists so obsessed with statistics?" At the post-Yokohama mid-term review, I put the question to Anupama Rao Singh, regional director of Unicef for east Asia. She replied that she understood the journalistic "compulsion" for figures, but added, "I must make one point: the trafficking of children for sexual exploitation is one of the worst and most abhorrent abuses, one that cannot be condoned, irrespective of the numbers!" For this, she earned a cheer from her colleagues. Question the figures and you will be told you are helping the exploiters. A researcher I know who has worked in east Europe and west Africa on trafficking surveys for Unicef and Save the Children says that the problem lies in the fact that the data everyone wants are near impossible to come by. "It's not like measuring HIV infections, or seeing if children have access to safe drinking water. How do you extrapolate from the anecdotes? How do you separate a woman whose uncle gave her a lift to the big city to help her find work from a woman whose uncle paid her mother money to be allowed to put her to work?" But the commissioners of reports demand hard statistics. "The pressure to fudge them is enormous."

Feingold has a favourite example: the commonly used figure of 5-7,000 girls trafficked each year from Nepal to India. "It dates from a 1986 NGOs' seminar, when it was, I gather, a wild guess, and it was published in the Times of India in 1989. It has been in use ever since." After we met, I searched for the terms "5,000-7,000 Nepali girls" in Google and got 110 results, most of them relevant and appearing in documents by eminent organisations, including the World Bank and USAid. The most recent references to this 19-year-old "wild guess" were dated February 2005, and appeared in a Unicef paper and on the website of the Catholic aid agency APHD.

Bad statistics have a habit of reproducing and mutating. "The US government," says Feingold, "recently revised its figure of 700,000-2m people trafficked worldwide-a figure which no one could possibly know. On the state department website, this is now down to 600-800,000. Then they say that 80 per cent of these are female and 50 per cent minors. How could anyone possibly know that? I've been given a private explanation of their methodology and it's ludicrous."

I asked Anne Horsley for statistics. She is project co-ordinator for the International Organisation for Migration, working on "long-term recovery and reintegration assistance to trafficked women and children." Based in Phnom Penh, Horsley seemed more hands-on than most trafficking lobbyists. Cambodia to Thailand is meant to be a big export route for women and children. There is migrant labour going, legally and illegally, across these borders in the hundreds of thousands. Horsley, though, was also reluctant to be specific. Her rehabilitation project dealt with "a few hundred" Cambodian children each year, repatriated from Thailand. Some 25 per cent had had sexual experience, and two per cent said they had been involved in prostitution. If "a few hundred" were, say, 400, then 2 per cent would amount to eight under-18 year olds.

Shortly after the tsunami, Unicef started raising the spectre of orphans from the disaster being preyed upon and sold for sex, quoting "reports" of this having already happened. This was seized on by other agencies, and doubtless brought more money into appeal funds that were, as some organisations will admit, already subscribed beyond the organisations' ability to spend the cash. (Privately, the agencies are staggered at the success of their appeals. One international NGO says it will take eight years to spend the money donated in the first month after the wave hit.) No one at Unicef has come up with a credible example of a tsunami orphan being sold for sex—despite journalists' repeated requests. A British aid agency worker returning from the devastation in Aceh said to me: "Well, I heard that only one case of that actually having happened has been proved. But the good thing about that story is that it made the Indonesians wake up to the fact that there could be a problem, and that their people needed training to look out for it."

The statistics are seductive: a powerful tool for raising money, but also, as in Aceh, for embarrassing complacent governments whose women and children are demonstrably vulnerable. Some shocking stats and opprobrium in the media have got the Thai government to beef up its laws and policing, and in Thailand, arrests on trafficking or child abuse charges have risen a little. In May 2004, Thailand's autocratic prime minister Thaksin Shinawatra announced a "war on trafficking and prostitution," shortly after the International Labour Organisation (ILO) announced that 200-300,000 children were trafficked for sex into Thailand annually (though it is hard to see how they would fit into an existing population of 200,000 prostitutes), and shortly before the US state department released a report putting Thailand on its "watch list" of countries not working adequately to prevent human trafficking. Special police squads now exist to track the trafficking gangs, which are said to number about 30 in Thailand, and to have links to 70 or 80 in other countries; and in April 2005 a deputy prime minister was put in charge of a new human trafficking control board. But arrests and prosecutions remain few. In December 2004, in a report on one of the special 36-man anti-trafficking squads now patrolling 1,165km of the northern Thai-Burmese border, it was revealed that not a single arrest had been made, nor any victim rescued. In fact, in the first year of operation, on the entire Burmese border only four arrests had been made and four suspected trafficking victims freed. Many things can be deduced from this—not least the inefficiency of the Thai police. But a worrying question remains: how can you stop the trafficking of children for sex if you cannot find out where or how or in what numbers they are being trafficked?

Some of the agencies are beginning to admit that bad numbers can undermine their credibility. Ecpat, the child prostitution agency, does impressive work at the "demand side," including the training of hotel staff in Thailand to report on customers who may be using underage prostitutes. Formerly one of the worst offenders with exaggerated numbers, Ecpat now bases its statistics on figures provided by national governmental bodies, which are likely to be underestimates. In 2003, the ILO started a $ 10m, five-year project to combat trafficking in Thailand and four neighbouring countries, largely funded by Britain's department for international development. Allan Dow, communications officer for the project, partially disowns that ILO figure of 200-300,000 children trafficked into the region. "We've stopped using numbers now. We know the problem is serious: there's no point coming up with unreliable statistics. Not having numbers doesn't mean we don't know what we're doing... but we have to admit that the current methodology for getting statistics doesn't work."

Trafficking is a real problem and, though there is little prospect of it being measured accurately, circumstances suggest that it will grow. Tourism into southeast Asia is forecast to increase by 14 per cent a year. Even after the tsunami, 13m people are expected to visit Thailand during 2005, and the kingdom plans to push that to 20m by 2008, which would make it the world's seventh most popular destination, just after Britain. And sex is demonstrably one of Thailand's major tourist attractions. What must concern those who, like me, take a liberal view of the sex trade is that underage prostitution is an inevitable part of it. Teenagers, research shows, are brought into the trade not principally because of the dedicated paedophiles we read so much about, but because youth is a valuable commodity. Men like to buy sex with young women: the young poor are the most easily obtained for them.

A few in the anti-trafficking community admit they have to reassess their approach. Amid the self-congratulation of the post-Yokohama meeting, there was one note of caution sounded. Vitit Muntarbhorn, a law professor and former special rapporteur for the UN secretary general on child prostitution and trafficking, told the meeting: "We've focused a lot on supply issues. It's time we placed as much focus on demand." The professor is a Thai, but his own country is set, if anything, to increase the demand for prostitutes. "The Thai government is committed to quality tourism," said Sasithara Pichaichannarong of the office of tourism development, "and that includes being anti-sex tourism." She gave no details of exactly what the kingdom is doing to oppose sex tourism—though if you tried to set up a sex tourism business today you would probably be discouraged. It was not always thus. In the 1980s, overt sex tourism flourished with considerable government encouragement. Doctors were even asked to play down the threat of Aids in order not to put off tourists.

Quietly, though, Thailand appears to have accepted its role as provider of sexual services to the rest of the planet. All that can be realistically asked is that it sets about doing it as cleanly and kindly as possible: that means tackling poverty in the rural north and corruption in the police force, as well as properly addressing the problem of the trafficked and the underage. The country would be aided in the latter by more honesty from the NGOs who have been given so many millions of aid dollars to tackle these problems.

Travelling to Thailand for sex will continue. The brand is established. The beautiful young woman wrapped in silk with her demure but inviting smile is a feature of Thai travel posters across the world. The promise is of "happiness on earth"-the delights of paradise just a cheap flight away. Most of the traditional tourist attractions are disappearing. The country's beaches are overexploited, its forests shrinking and the islands poisoned by tourists' waste. But Thailand and its neighbours retain one renewable resource for the tourists that is not in danger of running out-the supply of poor, smiling women.

LOAD-DATE: April 18, 2005

LANGUAGE: English

Copyright 2005 Prospect

149 of 359 DOCUMENTS

BusinessWorld

April 4, 2005, Monday

Entertainers in Korea

SECTION: Pg. 10LENGTH: 154 words

As if taking cue from Japan, the Korean government is set to slash the number of Filipino entertainers entering Seoul every year as part of its efforts to curb human trafficking. "We will restrict the entry of Filipino entertainers because of this human rights program. We would reduce the number of importation (of entertainers)," Korean Embassy First Secretary Bae Han-Jin told BusinessWorld. Mr. Bae noted that Korea, like Japan, is faced with the sex trade problem, which has placed it in the United States watch list of human trafficking countries. Japan began implementing its revised immigration law last month that is seen to decrease to tenfold the 80,000 Filipino entertainers entering Tokyo every year. There are about 41,000 Filipino workers in Korea, 1,012 of them entertainers. The embassy did not specify by how much the number of Filipino entertainers to Seoul's entertainment industry would be cut.

LOAD-DATE: April 3, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 BusinessWorld Publishing Corporation

150 of 359 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

March 29, 2005 TuesdayCONDITIONS IN BURMA AND U.S. POLICY TOWARD BURMA FOR PERIOD SEPT. 28, 2004 - MARCH 27, 2005*BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 4720 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. Department of State:

Introduction and Summary

As a result of the Burmese junta's blatant disregard for human rights, its intolerance of dissent, and its ongoing efforts to perpetuate military rule, prospects for meaningful political change and reform continued to decline over the past six months. The October 2004 ouster of Prime Minister and Military Intelligence (MI) chief General Khin Nyunt and his close associates kicked off a struggle for political and economic power. As a result, more hard-line elements of the leadership further consolidated their positions. The Government of Burma (GOB, also referred to as the State Peace and Development Council - SPDC) kept senior democratic opposition leaders Aung San Suu Kyi and U Tin Oo under house arrest and arrested other key democracy activists, including leading ethnic political leader Hkun Htun Oo. Although the National League for Democracy's (NLD) party headquarters in Rangoon was still open, all the party's other offices remained closed.

The GOB continued to arrest people for taking part in peaceful political activities and over a thousand persons remained jailed for their political beliefs. In February 2005, the junta reconvened its National Convention, adjourned since July 2004, to complete the drafting of a new constitution without the participation of the democratic opposition. The junta failed to set a timetable for taking subsequent steps on its "road map," including an oft-promised transition of power to an elected government.

The United States continued to consult with countries in the region, the European Union, and other interested parties to encourage them to maintain pressure on the Burmese junta to make progress toward a genuine political transition. During this reporting period, no other country adopted economic sanctions against the junta.

The government's dismal economic policies have resulted in widespread poverty and the flight of most foreign investors. The latest U.S. economic sanctions, imposed in 2003 and renewed in 2004, contributed to the closure of some garment factories in 2003 that had relied on exports to the United States. In addition, financial sanctions led the Burmese to rely increasingly on Euros, rather than on U.S. dollars, for their foreign exchange transactions. The 33 members of the Financial Action Task Force (FATF) lifted countermeasures on the GOB in October, although Burma remains on the FATF's list of non-cooperative countries and territories. The United States continued its ban on the export of financial services to Burma by U.S. persons.

The SPDC continued to abuse severely the human rights of its citizens. Freedom of speech, press, religion, assembly, and association remained greatly restricted. Egregious abuses of ethnic minority civilians by the Burmese military including rape, torture, execution, and forced relocation continued. Forced labor, trafficking in persons, and religious discrimination remained serious problems. During the reporting period, the SPDC refused requests from UN Special Envoy Razali and UN Commission on Human Rights Special Rapporteur Pinheiro to visit. In February 2005, a high-level delegation representing the International Labor Organization (ILO), mandated to evaluate the attitude of GOB authorities at the highest level toward the elimination of forced labor, curtailed its visit to Burma when the junta's top two leaders declined to meet with its members.

U.S. policy objectives in Burma remain unchanged: the immediate and unconditional release of Aung San Suu Kyi, U Tin Oo, Hkun Htun Oo and all political prisoners; the re-opening of all NLD party offices and the start of a meaningful dialogue leading to genuine national reconciliation and the establishment of democracy. Overall U.S. policy goals include the establishment of constitutional democracy, respect for human rights and religious freedom, the repatriation of refugees with monitoring by UNHCR, the return home of internally displaced persons (IDPs), cooperation in fighting terrorism, regional stability, a full accounting of missing U.S. servicemen from World War II, combating HIV/AIDS, eliminating trafficking in persons, ending forced labor, and increased cooperation in eradicating the production and trafficking of illicit drugs. During the reporting period, GOB cooperation decreased in some areas.

The United States will continue to urge other nations to use sanctions and diplomacy to press the junta to release all political prisoners and to allow all political parties to operate. The United States also encourages all countries with a major interest in Burma, particularly Burma's immediate neighbors China, India, and Thailand, as well as other ASEAN members and Japan, to use their influence with the government to urge it to take immediate steps on political reform and human rights. We will continue to urge the international community to support the UN Secretary General in his efforts to start meaningful talks on a political transition in Burma and to support UN efforts to improve the dismal human rights situation.

I. Measuring Progress Toward Democratization

Burma's pro-democracy movement continued to face severe repression. The GOB constantly harassed and regularly arrested opposition party members, pro-democracy activists, dissidents, and their supporters. Aung San Suu Kyi, the Nobel Peace Prize Laureate General Secretary of the NLD, and U Tin Oo, the party's Vice Chairman, remained under detention. During the reporting period, the SPDC extended their house arrests for an additional year. Authorities also restricted Aung San Suu Kyi's access to medical care and her contacts with the outside world, leaving her virtually incommunicado. All NLD offices, except the party's Rangoon headquarters, remained closed. In February 2005, authorities arrested and later tried Hkun Htun Oo, the Chairman of the Shan Nationalities League for Democracy (SNLD), Burma's most influential ethnic democracy party. Authorities also detained and harassed several other ethnic pro-democracy party members.

The October 2004 ouster of Prime Minister and Military Intelligence (MI) chief General Khin Nyunt and his close associates in a struggle for political and economic power further consolidated the position of more hard-line members of the leadership. The SPDC claimed it released nearly 20,000 people from prison, many of whom the GOB asserted were "wrongly imprisoned" by MI. Among those released were 96 political prisoners, including pro-democracy student leader Min Ko Naing, detained since 1989. However, most of those released had already completed their original sentences. GOB authorities continued to arrest and imprison NLD members and other democracy supporters for alleged political offenses. Over 1,200 long-term political prisoners remain in prison.

U.S. officials persistently requested meetings with Aung San Suu Kyi and U Tin Oo. The government prohibited U.S. and other diplomats in Burma from visiting either. It also published a series of newspaper articles attempting to intimidate diplomats, including U.S. Embassy personnel, who visited NLD headquarters or met with other pro-democracy leaders. No independent observer has been able to visit Aung San Suu Kyi since UN Secretary General Special Envoy Razali Ismail met with her in March 2004.

Despite the government's refusal to allow Razali and UN Commission on Human Rights Special Rapporteur Paulo Sergio Pinheiro to visit Burma, Razali continued his efforts to encourage a political dialogue between the SPDC and the NLD. These efforts, however, consisted entirely of diplomatic discussions outside of Burma. The GOB has not permitted Razali or Pinheiro to visit since March 2004 and November 2003 respectively.

On February 17, 2005, the junta reconvened its National Convention, adjourned since July 2004, purportedly to complete the drafting of a new constitution to serve as the first step of its "road map to disciplined democracy." As it did in May 2004 (when the Convention originally reconvened after an eight-year hiatus), the SPDC handpicked pro-regime delegates to participate in the Convention, refused to include the NLD or pro-democracy ethnic groups, and prohibited free and open debate.

In October, Pinheiro noted in his October 2004 report to the UN General Assembly that "a credible process of national reconciliation and political transition is not possible without the early release of all political prisoners, and the relaxation of restrictions which continue to hamper the ability of political parties and ceasefire partners to operate." Following the reconvening of the Convention, UN Secretary General Kofi Annan released a statement concluding that "the National Convention, in its present format, does not adhere to the recommendations made by successive resolutions of the General Assembly." He reiterated his call on the Burmese authorities "even at this late stage, to take the necessary steps to make the roadmap process more inclusive and credible."

Although the junta has not set a firm timetable for completing its "road map," it continued to seek support from countries in the region. Several leaders from Southeast Asian countries attended the SPDC's Buddhist Summit in December 2004, despite a boycott of the event by its original Japanese sponsor. However, they did not publicly press the junta to take steps to make the National Convention credible. After much debate about Burma's participation at the biannual Asia-Europe Meeting (ASEM), which was held in Hanoi in October, Burma was allowed to become a member, but its participation in Hanoi was limited to a lower level of representation than other countries. New Prime Minister Lt. General Soe Win attended the November ASEAN Summit in Laos. In neither forum was the GOB publicly criticized for its detention of Aung San Suu Kyi or its continuing abuses of human rights, although the ASEM Chairman's Statement did call for all political parties to be included in the National Convention. GOB senior-level officials visited India, Bangladesh, Thailand, and China during the last six months.

The SPDC and Burma's largest remaining ethnic insurgent group, the Karen National Union (KNU), entered into a temporary cease-fire in early 2004 after KNU leader General Bo Mya visited Rangoon and held "productive" discussions. However, the junta postponed negotiations when the National Convention convened in May 2004 and the two sides have yet to formalize an end to over five decades of armed conflict. In the meantime, there have been reports of occasional, low-level skirmishes between the KNU and Burmese military.

In mid-November, two small bombs exploded at a Rangoon cafe and near Rangoon's central Court. Two other improvised explosive devices went off in Karen and Mon States in October and November. The GOB blamed exile opposition groups for the incidents, as it has done in the past, but provided no convincing evidence to prove its allegations.

II. The Quality of Life in Burma

(Economy)

General Khin Nyunt's ouster caused significant short-term disruption to the economy. His now-dismantled MI apparatus played a key role in various sectors of the Burmese economy, particularly in the lucrative border trade and in commercial dealings with ethnic cease-fire groups. By the beginning of 2005, the situation began to return to normal with military, customs, immigration, and police units taking over MI's former economic role. However, an air of uncertainty remains, and with it, a chilling effect on new business investment.

The December 26, 2004 Indian Ocean earthquake and tsunami affected Burma, but to a much smaller degree than other countries in the region. According to UN and NGO sources, 86 people died in Burma and another 15,000 were affected economically. The GOB did not request any international aid, although UN agencies and NGOs are providing assistance.

Despite continuing energy shortages, a lingering crisis in the private banking sector, the loss of its primary export market due to the 2003 U.S. ban on Burmese imports, and the expiration on January 1, 2005 of the WTO Multi-fiber Agreement, Burma's private garment sector has managed to survive. New orders from importers in EU member states and Latin America enabled the remaining factories to continue production and avoid new personnel layoffs.

Chronic mismanagement by the junta and a correspondingly poor business and investment climate continued to be the primary reasons for Burma's increasingly dismal economic performance. Despite GOB claims of 13.8 percent economic growth in FY 2004-05 (April-March), most foreign observers saw little evidence of real economic expansion. Little new foreign investment entered the country during this period, though interest by Korean, Indian, and Chinese firms in new offshore and onshore oil and gas exploration increased.

At the request of the FATF, in October 2004 the GOB enacted the "Rules for the Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters Law," that now provides a framework for Burma to engage in effective international cooperation in the fight against money laundering. Simultaneously, the GOB added fraud to its list of predicate offenses for money laundering and made clear that there was not a threshold amount for money laundering offenses associated with any of the listed predicate crimes. In November 2004, the government further amended its money laundering law to specify a penalty of up to three years imprisonment and/or fine for "tipping off" the filing of a suspicious transaction report against an individual. In response to these actions, amendments to existing legislation, and new legislation issued in 2003 and early 2004, the FATF lifted its request that its 33 members impose countermeasures on Burma. Burma remains, however, on FATF's list of non-cooperative countries and territories, and the U.S. will continue to maintain Burma's designation as a primary money laundering concern.

Serious money laundering problems persist. A GOB committee formed in November 2003 to investigate two banks accused of money laundering - Asia Wealth and Myanmar Mayflower - has taken little action despite direct FATF and U.S. government pressure. In light of the fact that Burma has done little to ensure that criminals do not control or have a significant investment in Burmese financial institutions, the Treasury Department has decided to maintain the application of Section 311 of the USA PATRIOT ACT on both the Jurisdiction and the above-mentioned banks. These designations will remain until Burma fully addresses this issue and adequately implements legal reforms.

(Human rights/forced labor)

The SPDC severely abused the human rights of its citizens. Identified by Secretary of State Rice as one of the world's outposts of tyranny, Burma continued to restrict freedom of speech, press, assembly, religion, and association. Additional abuses in ethnic minority areas included persecution, torture, disappearances, extrajudicial executions, demolition of places of worship, forced relocation, rape, and forced labor. Burmese citizens were not free to criticize their government. Security forces regularly monitored the movements and communications of residents, searched homes without warrants, and relocated persons forcibly without just compensation or legal recourse. In 2004, the United States again designated Burma as a "Country of Particular Concern" for its particularly severe violations of religious freedom, especially among Muslim and Christian populations, and ranked Burma as a Tier 3 country for its unwillingness to make serious and sustained efforts to combat trafficking in persons.

During the reporting period, the GOB released 96 of the country's roughly 1,300 long-term political prisoners, although the majority of these released detainees had already completed their original sentences. Concurrent to these releases, the GOB arrested and sentenced a roughly equal number of additional individuals for their peaceful political activities.

In March 2004, the government admitted that it had sentenced to death three individuals in part for communicating with the ILO and a Thailand-based labor rights group. In response, the ILO continued to postpone implementation of a plan of action to address forced labor practices. After commuting and then reducing these sentences, the government on January 3 released two of the three prisoners as part of an amnesty to recognize Burmese Independence Day. The third person, convicted of high treason, remained imprisoned. In February 2005, a high-level delegation representing the International Labor Organization (ILO), and charged with evaluating the attitudes of senior-level GOB authorities on the elimination of forced labor, curtailed its visit to Burma when the junta's top two leaders, SPDC Chairman Than Shwe and Vice Chairman Maung Aye, declined to meet with it.

The junta allowed UNHCR to maintain a presence in northern Rakhine State, where it provides humanitarian support and protection services to more than 230,000 Rohingya Muslims who have returned from Bangladesh. Approximately 20,000 Rohingya refugees remained in camps in Bangladesh, although another estimated 200,000 Rohingyas lived illegally in southernmost Bangladesh.

More than 144,000 Burmese ethnic minorities lived in camps along the border in Thailand. The UNHCR continued to monitor the Burmese side of the border region to assess conditions for the eventual repatriation of refugees and for the return home of internally displaced persons. In February, UNHCR concluded that current conditions are still not adequately safe for the repatriation of thousands of refugees from Thailand and the return home of thousands of internally displaced persons.

The GOB's economic mismanagement, political intransigence, and repression remained the primary causes of unemployment, illegal migration, and trafficking in persons. Over one million Burmese, ethnic minorities as well as ethnic Burmans, continued to live illegally in Thailand. Burmese living illegally in neighboring countries were willing to endure an often perilous existence, working in dangerous or exploitative jobs, because they believed it was more dangerous and/or economically difficult to make a living in Burma. This became abundantly clear when the December 26 tsunami hit southern Thailand, where a number of Burmese migrants resided and worked.

There was abundant evidence that the practice of forced labor in Burma continued, although for the first time the penal code was invoked to combat the practice. The use of forced labor met the U.S. and UN definitions of trafficking in persons, and was a key factor in Burma's Tier 3 designation in the Department's 2004 TIP Report. During the year, the ILO Liaison Office in Rangoon reported to the GOB 46 cases of forced labor. As of February 2005, the GOB had responded to only 36 of these cases. In five of them, the GOB upheld the allegations and initiated criminal prosecutions against the officials involved. In 25 cases, the allegations were rejected. Of six cases involving complaints by individuals directly to the courts, three went to trial resulting in four officials sentenced to prison terms, a landmark decision marking the first application of section 374 of the penal code, which addresses the illegal imposition of forced labor. The Burmese government supported or tolerated the use of forced labor for large infrastructure projects and the Burmese Armed Forces used forced conscription to enlist porters. A February report by the UN Security Council noted the continued use of child soldiers in conflict areas both by the government and by some ethnic minority insurgent groups. The report singled out the Burmese army, the Karen National Liberation Army, and the Karenni Army as the main culprits. Some ethnic minority groups that have concluded cease-fire agreements with the government, particularly the United Wa State Army, also continued to conscript child soldiers.

UN Special Rapporteur Pinheiro continued to urge the government to release political prisoners, allow all opposition parties to participate in the National Convention, investigate the May 2003 attack on Aung San Suu Kyi, and allow an independent investigation of allegations of rape and other abuses by the Burmese military in ethnic regions. The government has not responded to any of these requests. In his October 2004 report to the UN General Assembly, Pinheiro concluded: "The situation with regard to the exercise of fundamental human rights and freedoms in Myanmar has not substantially changed, and may have even worsened."

(Environment)

The Ministry of Forestry (MOF) is responsible for overseeing the protection of the environment and the SPDC's profitable logging operations. Logging is a source of revenue for Burma's army as well as the insurgent groups. The MOF instituted a program to increase the size of protected areas. However, the government committed few resources to support the policy and issued contradictory directives that the MOF increase foreign currency revenue from export of teak and other hardwoods. Consequently, unsustainable legal and illegal logging and illicit trade in wildlife products, much of it in border areas where ethnic minority groups have some autonomy, overwhelmed efforts to protect natural resources. Conservationists are engaged in a battle against encroaching agriculture, logging, and poaching on "protected lands."

The government focused on the commercial possibilities of eco-tourism. During the last several years, the government opened up areas in Chin State, Kachin State, Sagaing Division, and Tanintharyi Division to specially arranged eco-tourism. There were credible reports that in the promotion of some of these tourism activities the government expropriated civilian property and forced others to provide services, including transportation for tourists and their baggage.

III. Development of a Multilateral Strategy

Immediate U.S. policy objectives in Burma remained securing the release of Aung San Suu Kyi, U Tin Oo, Hkun Htun Oo, and all other political prisoners and encouraging a genuine dialogue on democratic political reform, including the re-opening of all NLD offices. The United States continued its efforts to encourage all countries with a major interest in Burma, particularly Burma's immediate neighbors China, India, and Thailand as well as other ASEAN members and Japan, to use their influence to convince the generals to take these steps, noting that future regional stability requires the SPDC to take more constructive positions on political dialogue, economic reform, and the institution of rule of law. Most countries in the region continued to express similar concerns, and agreed the SPDC must work with the democratic opposition in order to effect a smooth political transition.

The ILO has long been concerned with Burma's serious forced labor problem and its violation of its obligations under the ILO's Forced Labour Convention. In 2000, the International Labor Conference concluded the GOB had not taken effective action to deal with the use of forced labor in the country and, for the first time in its history, called on all ILO members to review their relations with Burma to ensure that they did not support forced labor. In February, a senior-level delegation representing the ILO visited Burma, and provided the junta with a list of four steps it considered important for the effective eradication of forced labor. The GOB's response, if any, will be an important indicator of the attitude of the junta and its willingness to cooperate with the ILO. The United States supported the ILO's continuing close scrutiny of Burma, given the country's failure to deal effectively with its pervasive forced labor problems.

Overall U.S. policy goals included the establishment of constitutional democracy, genuine respect for human rights and religious freedom, the repatriation of refugees with monitoring by UNHCR, the return home of internally displaced persons (IDPs), cooperation in fighting terrorism, regional stability, a full accounting for missing U.S. servicemen from World War II, stemming the spread of HIV/AIDS, combating trafficking in persons, ending forced labor, and increased cooperation in eradicating the production and trafficking of illicit narcotics. During the reporting period, however, GOB cooperation with us on WWII remains recovery operations and an annual joint opium yield study decreased from previous years.

We will continue to urge the international community to support the UN Secretary General in his efforts to start genuine talks on a political transition in Burma. The United States co-sponsored the annual human rights resolution on Burma at the 2004 UN General Assembly and the annual Burma resolution at the 2004 UN Commission on Human Rights, both of which were adopted by consensus. The Secretary of State again designated Burma as a "Country of Particular Concern" in September 2004 for its particularly severe violations of religious freedom.

The United States maintained extensive sanctions on Burma. These measures include an arms embargo, bans on new investment and imports, an asset freeze, and a prohibition on the exportation of financial services to Burma and the provision of financial assistance to the GOB. The Department of State maintained visa restrictions on SPDC members; Government ministers and other senior Burmese Government officials; military officers above the rank of Colonel; all officials of the Union Solidarity and Development Association (USDA); civil servants above the rank of Director General; and managers of state-owned enterprises. The visa restrictions covered the immediate family members for all the categories of individuals listed above. Although the EU imposed a number of sanctions that parallel U.S. sanctions, no other country joined the United States in adopting bans on investment and imports, or a prohibition on the exportation of financial services. The EU strengthened its sanctions in October 2004 to include a ban on extending credit to a list of Burmese state-run enterprises and a more restrictive visa ban. The EU also called on its member states to vote against assistance to Burma by international financial institutions, though they were not required to do so. In advance of the October 8-9 ASEM Summit in Hanoi, the U.S. strongly urged the EU to oppose Burmese participation. Under a compromise hammered out between the EU and East Asian participants, Burma was allowed to become a member, but its participation in Hanoi was at a lower level of representation than other countries.

U.S. sanctions will be maintained until there is significant progress toward political transition and genuine respect for human rights or until a democratically elected government in Burma requests that they be lifted.

In 2004-2005, we provided $2 million to address the growing HIV/AIDS epidemic in Burma by funding international non-governmental organizations to undertake prevention and care activities; no assistance is provided to the government through this program. We also seek a greater commitment to more effective prevention, treatment, and care programs, including for pregnant mothers and high-risk groups. In addition, the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria - which receives one-third of its funding from the USG - has made grant commitments totaling $35 million over two years to fight the three diseases. These funds are intended to be provided to non-governmental organizations. The Burmese government provided cooperation on counterterrorism issues, ratifying two additional UN conventions in 2004, and the United States noted the GOB's growing cooperation with states of the region on narcotics issues. Thus far in FY05, we are using funding appropriated by Congress to develop programs in support of democracy and human rights inside Burma, as well as democracy, human rights, social, feeding, health, educational, and governance-related programs outside Burma. None of these funds are disbursed to or through the Burmese government.

LOAD-DATE: May 2, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 States News Service

151 of 359 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

March 29, 2005 Tuesday 3:18 AM ESTCONDITIONS IN BURMA, U.S. POLICY TOWARD BURMA FOR PERIOD
SEPT. 28, 2004 - MARCH 27, 2005*BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 4722 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs issued the following report:

Introduction and Summary

As a result of the Burmese junta's blatant disregard for human rights, its intolerance of dissent, and its ongoing efforts to perpetuate military rule, prospects for meaningful political change and reform continued to decline over the past six months. The October 2004 ouster of Prime Minister and Military Intelligence (MI) chief General Khin Nyunt and his close associates kicked off a struggle for political and economic power. As a result, more hard-line elements of the leadership further consolidated their positions. The Government of Burma (GOB, also referred to as the State Peace and Development Council - SPDC) kept senior democratic opposition leaders Aung San Suu Kyi and U Tin Oo under house arrest and arrested other key democracy activists, including leading ethnic political leader Hkun Htun Oo. Although the National League for Democracy's (NLD) party headquarters in Rangoon was still open, all the party's other offices remained closed.

The GOB continued to arrest people for taking part in peaceful political activities and over a thousand persons remained jailed for their political beliefs. In February 2005, the junta reconvened its National Convention, adjourned since July 2004, to complete the drafting of a new constitution without the participation of the democratic opposition. The junta failed to set a timetable for taking subsequent steps on its "road map," including an oft-promised transition of power to an elected government.

The United States continued to consult with countries in the region, the European Union, and other interested parties to encourage them to maintain pressure on the Burmese junta to make progress toward a genuine political transition. During this reporting period, no other country adopted economic sanctions against the junta.

The government's dismal economic policies have resulted in widespread poverty and the flight of most foreign investors. The latest U.S. economic sanctions, imposed in 2003 and renewed in 2004, contributed to the closure of some garment factories in 2003 that had relied on exports to the United States. In addition, financial sanctions led the Burmese to rely increasingly on Euros, rather than on U.S. dollars, for their foreign exchange transactions. The 33 members of the Financial Action Task Force (FATF) lifted countermeasures on the GOB in October, although Burma remains on the FATF's list of non-cooperative countries and territories. The United States continued its ban on the export of financial services to Burma by U.S. persons.

The SPDC continued to abuse severely the human rights of its citizens. Freedom of speech, press, religion, assembly, and association remained greatly restricted. Egregious abuses of ethnic minority civilians by the Burmese military including rape, torture, execution, and forced relocation continued. Forced labor, trafficking in persons, and religious discrimination remained serious problems. During the reporting period, the SPDC refused requests from UN Special Envoy Razali and UN Commission on Human Rights Special Rapporteur Pinheiro to visit. In February 2005, a high-level delegation representing the International Labor Organization (ILO), mandated to evaluate the attitude of GOB authorities at the highest level toward the elimination of forced labor, curtailed its visit to Burma when the junta's top two leaders declined to meet with its members.

U.S. policy objectives in Burma remain unchanged: the immediate and unconditional release of Aung San Suu Kyi, U Tin Oo, Hkun Htun Oo and all political prisoners; the re-opening of all NLD party offices and the start of a meaningful dialogue leading to genuine national reconciliation and the establishment of democracy. Overall U.S. policy goals include the establishment of constitutional democracy, respect for human rights and religious freedom, the repatriation of refugees with monitoring by UNHCR, the return home of internally displaced persons (IDPs), cooperation in fighting terrorism, regional stability, a full accounting of missing U.S. servicemen from World War II, combating HIV/AIDS, eliminating trafficking in persons, ending forced labor, and increased cooperation in eradicating the production and trafficking of illicit drugs. During the reporting period, GOB cooperation decreased in some areas.

The United States will continue to urge other nations to use sanctions and diplomacy to press the junta to release all political prisoners and to allow all political parties to operate. The United States also encourages all countries with a major interest in Burma, particularly Burma's immediate neighbors China, India, and Thailand, as well as other ASEAN members and Japan, to use their influence with the government to urge it to take immediate steps on political reform and human rights. We will continue to urge the international community to support the UN Secretary General in his efforts to start meaningful talks on a political transition in Burma and to support UN efforts to improve the dismal human rights situation.

I. Measuring Progress Toward Democratization

Burma's pro-democracy movement continued to face severe repression. The GOB constantly harassed and regularly arrested opposition party members, pro-democracy activists, dissidents, and their supporters. Aung San Suu Kyi, the Nobel Peace Prize Laureate General Secretary of the NLD, and U Tin Oo, the party's Vice Chairman, remained under detention. During the reporting period, the SPDC extended their house arrests for an additional year. Authorities also restricted Aung San Suu Kyi's access to medical care and her contacts with the outside world, leaving her virtually incommunicado. All NLD offices, except the party's Rangoon headquarters, remained closed. In February 2005, authorities arrested and later tried Hkun Htun Oo, the Chairman of the Shan Nationalities League for Democracy (SNLD), Burma's most influential ethnic democracy party. Authorities also detained and harassed several other ethnic pro-democracy party members.

The October 2004 ouster of Prime Minister and Military Intelligence (MI) chief General Khin Nyunt and his close associates in a struggle for political and economic power further consolidated the position of more hard-line members of the leadership. The SPDC claimed it released nearly 20,000 people from prison, many of whom the GOB asserted were "wrongly imprisoned" by MI. Among those released were 96 political prisoners, including pro-democracy student leader Min Ko Naing, detained since 1989. However, most of those released had already completed their original sentences. GOB authorities continued to arrest and imprison NLD members and other democracy supporters for alleged political offenses. Over 1,200 long-term political prisoners remain in prison.

U.S. officials persistently requested meetings with Aung San Suu Kyi and U Tin Oo. The government prohibited U.S. and other diplomats in Burma from visiting either. It also published a series of newspaper articles attempting to intimidate diplomats, including U.S. Embassy personnel, who visited NLD headquarters or met with other pro-democracy leaders. No independent observer has been able to visit Aung San Suu Kyi since UN Secretary General Special Envoy Razali Ismail met with her in March 2004.

Despite the government's refusal to allow Razali and UN Commission on Human Rights Special Rapporteur Paulo Sergio Pinheiro to visit Burma, Razali continued his efforts to encourage a political dialogue between the SPDC and the NLD. These efforts, however, consisted entirely of diplomatic discussions outside of Burma. The GOB has not permitted Razali or Pinheiro to visit since March 2004 and November 2003 respectively.

On February 17, 2005, the junta reconvened its National Convention, adjourned since July 2004, purportedly to complete the drafting of a new constitution to serve as the first step of its "road map to disciplined democracy." As it did in May 2004 (when the Convention originally reconvened after an eight-year hiatus), the SPDC handpicked pro-regime delegates to participate in the Convention, refused to include the NLD or pro-democracy ethnic groups, and prohibited free and open debate.

In October, Pinheiro noted in his October 2004 report to the UN General Assembly that "a credible process of national reconciliation and political transition is not possible without...the early release of all political prisoners, and the relaxation of restrictions which continue to hamper the ability of political parties and ceasefire partners to operate." Following the reconvening of the Convention, UN Secretary General Kofi Annan released a statement concluding that "the National Convention, in its present format, does not adhere to the recommendations made by successive resolutions of the General Assembly." He reiterated his call on the Burmese authorities "even at this late stage, to take the necessary steps to make the roadmap process more inclusive and credible."

Although the junta has not set a firm timetable for completing its "road map," it continued to seek support from countries in the region. Several leaders from Southeast Asian countries attended the SPDC's Buddhist Summit in December 2004, despite a boycott of the event by its original Japanese sponsor. However, they did not publicly press the junta to take steps to make the National Convention credible. After much debate about Burma's participation at the biannual Asia-Europe Meeting (ASEM), which was held in Hanoi in October, Burma was allowed to become a member, but its participation in Hanoi was limited to a lower level of representation than other countries. New Prime Minister Lt. General Soe Win attended the November ASEAN Summit in Laos. In neither forum was the GOB publicly criticized for its detention of Aung San Suu Kyi or its continuing abuses of human rights, although the ASEM Chairman's Statement did call for all political parties to be included in the National Convention. GOB senior-level officials visited India, Bangladesh, Thailand, and China during the last six months.

The SPDC and Burma's largest remaining ethnic insurgent group, the Karen National Union (KNU), entered into a temporary cease-fire in early 2004 after KNU leader General Bo Mya visited Rangoon and held "productive" discussions. However, the junta postponed negotiations when the National Convention convened in May 2004 and the two sides have yet to formalize an end to over five decades of armed conflict. In the meantime, there have been reports of occasional, low-level skirmishes between the KNU and Burmese military.

In mid-November, two small bombs exploded at a Rangoon café and near Rangoon's central Court. Two other improvised explosive devices went off in Karen and Mon States in October and November. The GOB blamed exile opposition groups for the incidents, as it has done in the past, but provided no convincing evidence to prove its allegations.

II. The Quality of Life in Burma

(Economy)

General Khin Nyunt's ouster caused significant short-term disruption to the economy. His now-dismantled MI apparatus played a key role in various sectors of the Burmese economy, particularly in the lucrative border trade and in commercial dealings with ethnic cease-fire groups. By the beginning of 2005, the situation began to return to normal with military, customs, immigration, and police units taking over MI's former economic role. However, an air of uncertainty remains, and with it, a chilling effect on new business investment.

The December 26, 2004 Indian Ocean earthquake and tsunami affected Burma, but to a much smaller degree than other countries in the region. According to UN and NGO sources, 86 people died in Burma and another 15,000 were affected economically. The GOB did not request any international aid, although UN agencies and NGOs are providing assistance.

Despite continuing energy shortages, a lingering crisis in the private banking sector, the loss of its primary export market due to the 2003 U.S. ban on Burmese imports, and the expiration on January 1, 2005 of the WTO Multi-fiber Agreement, Burma's private garment sector has managed to survive. New orders from importers in EU member states and Latin America enabled the remaining factories to continue production and avoid new personnel layoffs.

Chronic mismanagement by the junta and a correspondingly poor business and investment climate continued to be the primary reasons for Burma's increasingly dismal economic performance. Despite GOB claims of 13.8 percent economic growth in FY 2004-05 (April-March), most foreign observers saw little evidence of real economic expansion. Little new foreign investment entered the country during this period, though interest by Korean, Indian, and Chinese firms in new offshore and onshore oil and gas exploration increased.

At the request of the FATF, in October 2004 the GOB enacted the "Rules for the Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters Law," that now provides a framework for Burma to engage in effective international cooperation in the fight against money laundering. Simultaneously, the GOB added fraud to its list of predicate offenses for money laundering and made clear that there was not a threshold amount for money laundering offenses associated with any of the listed predicate crimes. In November 2004, the government further amended its money laundering law to specify a penalty of up to three years imprisonment and/or fine for "tipping off" the filing of a suspicious transaction report against an individual. In response to these actions, amendments to existing legislation, and new legislation issued in 2003 and early 2004, the FATF lifted its request that its 33 members impose countermeasures on Burma. Burma remains, however, on FATF's list of non-cooperative countries and territories, and the U.S. will continue to maintain Burma's designation as a primary money laundering concern.

Serious money laundering problems persist. A GOB committee formed in November 2003 to investigate two banks accused of money laundering - Asia Wealth and Myanmar Mayflower - has taken little action despite direct FATF and U.S. government pressure. In light of the fact that Burma has done little to ensure that criminals do not control or have a significant investment in Burmese financial institutions, the Treasury Department has decided to maintain the application of Section 311 of the USA PATRIOT ACT on both the Jurisdiction and the above-mentioned banks. These designations will remain until Burma fully addresses this issue and adequately implements legal reforms.

(Human rights/forced labor)

The SPDC severely abused the human rights of its citizens. Identified by Secretary of State Rice as one of the world's outposts of tyranny, Burma continued to restrict freedom of speech, press, assembly, religion, and association. Additional abuses in ethnic minority areas included persecution, torture, disappearances, extrajudicial executions, demolition of places of worship, forced relocation, rape, and forced labor. Burmese citizens were not free to criticize their government. Security forces regularly monitored the movements and communications of residents, searched homes without warrants, and relocated persons forcibly without just compensation or legal recourse. In 2004, the United States again designated Burma as a "Country of Particular Concern" for its particularly severe violations of religious freedom, especially among Muslim and Christian populations, and ranked Burma as a Tier 3 country for its unwillingness to make serious and sustained efforts to combat trafficking in persons.

During the reporting period, the GOB released 96 of the country's roughly 1,300 long-term political prisoners, although the majority of these released detainees had already completed their original sentences. Concurrent to these releases, the GOB arrested and sentenced a roughly equal number of additional individuals for their peaceful political activities.

In March 2004, the government admitted that it had sentenced to death three individuals in part for communicating with the ILO and a Thailand-based labor rights group. In response, the ILO continued to postpone implementation of a plan of action to address forced labor practices. After commuting and then reducing these sentences, the government on January 3 released two of the three prisoners as part of an amnesty to recognize Burmese Independence Day. The third person, convicted of high treason, remained imprisoned. In February 2005, a high-level delegation representing the International Labor Organization (ILO), and charged with evaluating the attitudes of senior-level GOB authorities on the elimination of forced labor, curtailed its visit to Burma when the junta's top two leaders, SPDC Chairman Than Shwe and Vice Chairman Maung Aye, declined to meet with it.

The junta allowed UNHCR to maintain a presence in northern Rakhine State, where it provides humanitarian support and protection services to more than 230,000 Rohingya Muslims who have returned from Bangladesh. Approximately 20,000 Rohingya refugees remained in camps in Bangladesh, although another estimated 200,000 Rohingyas lived illegally in southernmost Bangladesh.

More than 144,000 Burmese ethnic minorities lived in camps along the border in Thailand. The UNHCR continued to monitor the Burmese side of the border region to assess conditions for the eventual repatriation of refugees and for the return home of internally displaced persons. In February, UNHCR concluded that current conditions are still not adequately safe for the repatriation of thousands of refugees from Thailand and the return home of thousands of internally displaced persons.

The GOB's economic mismanagement, political intransigence, and repression remained the primary causes of unemployment, illegal migration, and trafficking in persons. Over one million Burmese, ethnic minorities as well as ethnic Burmans, continued to live illegally in Thailand. Burmese living illegally in neighboring countries were willing to endure an often perilous existence, working in dangerous or exploitative jobs, because they believed it was more dangerous and/or economically difficult to make a living in Burma. This became abundantly clear when the December 26 tsunami hit southern Thailand, where a number of Burmese migrants resided and worked.

There was abundant evidence that the practice of forced labor in Burma continued, although for the first time the penal code was invoked to combat the practice. The use of forced labor met the U.S. and UN definitions of trafficking in persons, and was a key factor in Burma's Tier 3 designation in the Department's 2004 TIP Report. During the year, the ILO Liaison Office in Rangoon reported to the GOB 46 cases of forced labor. As of February 2005, the GOB had responded to only 36 of these cases. In five of them, the GOB upheld the allegations and initiated criminal prosecutions against the officials involved. In 25 cases, the allegations were rejected. Of six cases involving complaints by individuals directly to the courts, three went to trial resulting in four officials sentenced to prison terms, a landmark decision marking the first application of section 374 of the penal code, which addresses the illegal imposition of forced labor.

The Burmese government supported or tolerated the use of forced labor for large infrastructure projects and the Burmese Armed Forces used forced conscription to enlist porters. A February report by the UN Security Council noted the continued use of child soldiers in conflict areas both by the government and by some ethnic minority insurgent groups. The report singled out the Burmese army, the Karen National Liberation Army, and the Karenni Army as the main culprits. Some ethnic minority groups that have concluded cease-fire agreements with the government, particularly the United Wa State Army, also continued to conscript child soldiers.

UN Special Rapporteur Pinheiro continued to urge the government to release political prisoners, allow all opposition parties to participate in the National Convention, investigate the May 2003 attack on Aung San Suu Kyi, and allow an independent investigation of allegations of rape and other abuses by the Burmese military in ethnic regions. The government has not responded to any of these requests. In his October 2004 report to the UN General Assembly, Pinheiro concluded: "The situation with regard to the exercise of fundamental human rights and freedoms in Myanmar has not substantially changed, and may have even worsened."

(Environment)

The Ministry of Forestry (MOF) is responsible for overseeing the protection of the environment and the SPDC's profitable logging operations. Logging is a source of revenue for Burma's army as well as the insurgent groups. The MOF instituted a program to increase the size of protected areas. However, the government committed few resources to support the policy and issued contradictory directives that the MOF increase foreign currency revenue from export of teak and other hardwoods. Consequently, unsustainable legal and illegal logging and illicit trade in wildlife products, much of it in border areas where ethnic minority groups have some autonomy, overwhelmed efforts to protect natural resources. Conservationists are engaged in a battle against encroaching agriculture, logging, and poaching on "protected lands."

The government focused on the commercial possibilities of eco-tourism. During the last several years, the government opened up areas in Chin State, Kachin State, Sagaing Division, and Tanintharyi Division to specially arranged eco-tourism. There were credible reports that in the promotion of some of these tourism activities the government expropriated civilian property and forced others to provide services, including transportation for tourists and their baggage.

III. Development of a Multilateral Strategy

Immediate U.S. policy objectives in Burma remained securing the release of Aung San Suu Kyi, U Tin Oo, Hkun Htun Oo, and all other political prisoners and encouraging a genuine dialogue on democratic political reform, including the re-opening of all NLD offices. The United States continued its efforts to encourage all countries with a major interest in Burma, particularly Burma's immediate neighbors China, India, and Thailand as well as other ASEAN members and Japan, to use their influence to convince the generals to take these steps, noting that future regional stability requires the SPDC to take more constructive positions on political dialogue, economic reform, and the institution of rule of law. Most countries in the region continued to express similar concerns, and agreed the SPDC must work with the democratic opposition in order to effect a smooth political transition.

The ILO has long been concerned with Burma's serious forced labor problem and its violation of its obligations under the ILO's Forced Labour Convention. In 2000, the International Labor Conference concluded the GOB had not taken effective action to deal with the use of forced labor in the country and, for the first time in its history, called on all ILO members to review their relations with Burma to ensure that they did not support forced labor. In February, a senior-level delegation representing the ILO visited Burma, and provided the junta with a list of four steps it considered important for the effective eradication of forced labor. The GOB's response, if any, will be an important indicator of the attitude of the junta and its willingness to continue to cooperate with the ILO. The United States supported the ILO's continuing close scrutiny of Burma, given the country's failure to deal effectively with its pervasive forced labor problems.

Overall U.S. policy goals included the establishment of constitutional democracy, genuine respect for human rights and religious freedom, the repatriation of refugees with monitoring by UNHCR, the return home of internally displaced persons (IDPs), cooperation in fighting terrorism, regional stability, a full accounting for missing U.S. servicemen from World War II, stemming the spread of HIV/AIDS, combating trafficking in persons, ending forced labor, and increased cooperation in eradicating the production and trafficking of illicit narcotics. During the reporting period, however, GOB cooperation with us on WWII remains recovery operations and an annual joint opium yield study decreased from previous years.

We will continue to urge the international community to support the UN Secretary General in his efforts to start genuine talks on a political transition in Burma. The United States co-sponsored the annual human rights resolution on Burma at the 2004 UN General Assembly and the annual Burma resolution at the 2004 UN Commission on Human Rights, both of which were adopted by consensus. The Secretary of State again designated Burma as a "Country of Particular Concern" in September 2004 for its particularly severe violations of religious freedom.

The United States maintained extensive sanctions on Burma. These measures include an arms embargo, bans on new investment and imports, an asset freeze, and a prohibition on the exportation of financial services to Burma and the provision of financial assistance to the GOB. The Department of State maintained visa restrictions on SPDC members; Government ministers and other senior Burmese Government officials; military officers above the rank of Colonel; all officials of the Union Solidarity and Development Association (USDA); civil servants above the rank of Director General; and managers of state-owned enterprises. The visa restrictions covered the immediate family members for all the categories of individuals listed above. Although the EU imposed a number of sanctions that parallel U.S. sanctions, no other country joined the United States in adopting bans on investment and imports, or a prohibition on the exportation of financial services. The EU strengthened its sanctions in October 2004 to include a ban on extending credit to a list of Burmese state-run enterprises and a more restrictive visa ban. The EU also called on its member states to vote against assistance to Burma by international financial institutions, though they were not required to do so. In advance of the October 8-9 ASEM Summit in Hanoi, the U.S. strongly urged the EU to oppose Burmese participation. Under a compromise hammered out between the EU and East Asian participants, Burma was allowed to become a member, but its participation in Hanoi was at a lower level of representation than other countries.

U.S. sanctions will be maintained until there is significant progress toward political transition and genuine respect for human rights or until a democratically elected government in Burma requests that they be lifted.

In 2004-2005, we provided $2 million to address the growing HIV/AIDS epidemic in Burma by funding international non-governmental organizations to undertake prevention and care activities; no assistance is provided to the government through this program. We also seek a greater commitment to more effective prevention, treatment, and care programs, including for pregnant mothers and high-risk groups. In addition, the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria - which receives one-third of its funding from the USG - has made grant commitments totaling $35 million over two years to fight the three diseases. These funds are intended to be provided to non-governmental organizations.

The Burmese government provided cooperation on counterterrorism issues, ratifying two additional UN conventions in 2004, and the United States noted the GOB's growing cooperation with states of the region on narcotics issues.

Thus far in FY05, we are using funding appropriated by Congress to develop programs in support of democracy and human rights inside Burma, as well as democracy, human rights, social, feeding, health, educational, and governance-related programs outside Burma. None of these funds are disbursed to or through the Burmese government.

LOAD-DATE: April 6, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

152 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Al-Bawaba

This content is provided to LexisNexis by Comtex News Network, Inc.

March 23, 2005 Wednesday

Report: Israeli sex trade industry amounts to over US$1 billion per year

BYLINE: By Al-Bawaba Reporters

LENGTH: 164 words

Thousands of women are being smuggled into Israel, creating a booming sex trade industry in Israel that amounts to over US$1 billion a year, a parliamentary committee said on Wednesday.

According to ynet, findings showed that some 3,000 and 5,000 women are smuggled to Israeach yearand sold into the prostitution industry, where they are constantly subjected to violence and abuse.

The report, issued annually, said some 10,000 such women currentlylive in 300 to 400 brothels throughout Israel. They are traded for about US$ 8,000 - US$ 10,000, the report said.

The U.S. State Department ranks Israel in the second tier of human trafficking around the world, saying the Jewish State does not maintain minimal conditions regarding the issue but is working to improve.

Most foreign prostitutes in Israel come from Ukraine, Moldova, Uzbekistan and Russia and many are smuggled in across the Egyptian border.

(C) 2005 Mena Report (www.menareport.com)

LOAD-DATE: March 24, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 Comtex News Network, Inc.
All Rights Reserved
Copyright 2005 Albawaba.com, All rights reserved.

153 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Worldstream

March 16, 2005 Wednesday

Japan cracks down on human trafficking, but sprawling sex industry poses complications

BYLINE: NATALIE OBIKO PEARSON; Associated Press WriterSECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 1252 wordsDATELINE: TOKYO

Monica's life as a Tokyo prostitute was her own choice. Like thousands of others over the past two decades, she took what she thought was a good offer - lucrative work in Japan's multibillion dollar sex industry.

But Monica had no idea of what awaits foreign prostitutes in Japan: debt bondage, sometimes violent working conditions, so-called fines imposed by pimps or brothel owners for any attempt to escape, and an utter lack of help from authorities.

"The reality is different once you arrive - it's much harder than you ever imagined," says Monica, 31, a Colombian single mother who still works the Tokyo streets. She spoke on condition she only be identified by her first name.

The thousands of cases like Monica's are at the center of a mounting crackdown on human trafficking in Japan following the country's placement on a U.S. watchlist last year. Japan was again cited for trafficking in a U.S. human rights report last month.

Affluence and a lack of laws against sex trafficking have combined to make Japan one of the world's top destinations for women like Monica.

In the popular imagination, human trafficking involves women who are kidnapped or otherwise tricked into working as prostitutes. But experts say such cases are rare in Japan. More common are women who come voluntarily but encounter slave-like conditions - and trapping debts - on arrival.

"The Japanese human trafficking problem is the sex industry," said Kazuo Inoue, an opposition Democratic Party lawmaker and anti-trafficking activist who says a crackdown also needs to address the root cause - demand stoked by loosely regulated red-light districts.

Tokyo is moving to clean up its act. The government is expected to pass a law this spring to make trafficking of foreign victims into Japan a criminal offense for the first time. Authorities also have moved to tighten visa requirements for "entertainers" - suspected to be legal cover for foreign sex workers.

"We are in the process of drawing up the necessary measures to effectively battle this," said Masaru Sakamoto from the Cabinet office overseeing a government anti-trafficking plan released in December. "I think once those are in place, the fruits of our efforts will become more evident."

Critics, however, are still waiting to see if Japan is also serious about protecting victims. Japan has long treated women like Monica as accomplices to the traffickers who bring them here, deserving of few rights as sex workers and illegal migrants.

Monica was a single mother - she had her daughter at 13 - from a poor, violent barrio of Bogota, Colombia, when she was approached by a broker with the offer of sex work in Japan, something that would pay enough to buy her daughter a better future back home in Colombia.

"No one comes because they want to do this work. But we choose to because there's no better option. We want to get out - at any cost," said the petite redhead dressed modestly at a cafe one late night in Shinjuku near one of Tokyo's busiest red-light districts.

After arriving in 1993, Monica was slapped with a debt of 5 million yen (US$48,000; [euro]36,000) - much larger than she'd been led to believe - and warned of reprisals against her family if she tried to escape. Minor infringements, including illness, can inflate that debt, she said, and women suffer a brutal physical toll in serving dozens of customers a week, with no days off, to get rid of the debt.

She was able to repay her debt in several months since Japan's economy was then faring better. But she said others now aren't as lucky, with some finding themselves in bondage for more than a year amid ever-increasing fines for various infringements.

Statistics on women trafficked here are hard to get. Activists estimate more than 1 million may have come since the early 1980s. The Switzerland-based International Organization for Migration calculates that Japan's sex industry hosts about 150,000 foreign workers today.

The Philippines, Colombia and Thailand are the top source countries, says a recent report by the International Labor Organization's Japan office, although anecdotal evidence on the street points to a surging number of Russians, Koreans and Chinese as well.

The sex industry has long been treated with leniency here: red-light districts have openly thrived from the patronage of legitimate businesses.

Critics have repeatedly alleged ties between traffickers and law enforcement, from immigration officers taking bribes to allow prostitutes into the country on fake passports, to police who return escaped, abused sex workers to their captors. Those allegations are denied by the National Police Agency.

Kinsey Alden Dinan, a Columbia University researcher and trafficking expert, says the Japanese government has done little to safeguard sex workers' rights and well-being or ensure they have ways to exit the industry.

"When there's clearly a demand for these people to work in your country, you have an obligation to work out a system that they can do it in legally and safely," she says. "It's easier to deport them than to deal with them."

Sakamoto of the Cabinet office pointed out that the government's anti-trafficking plan would include some counseling for prostitutes and plans to postpone immediate deportation to encourage victims to testify and cooperate with authorities. But it's expected only a few would qualify since the government does not recognize those who have willingly entered the country for unauthorized labor as victims, regardless of the ensuing conditions.

"I don't see a clear plan to protect and support victims," said Yoko Yoshida, a lawyer and director of the Japan Network Against Trafficking in Persons, calling for the anti-trafficking plan to include medical attention, legal advice and job training for victims.

Japan's fabled wealth has long drawn the hopeful, and many believe turning them away could prove difficult.

"Entertainment" visas, intended for musicians, dancers and other entertainers, are issued to 80,000 Filipina women each year. But critics call the visas a front for sex trafficking, saying most women who get the visas end up working illegally as strippers, hostesses and prostitutes.

Tokyo tightened visa requirements this week, which is expected to dramatically reduce the number it issues.

Yet those plans threaten a US$400 million-flow ([euro]300 million-flow) in annual worker remittances sent home by Philippine citizens in Japan, and last month Foreign Secretary Alberto Romulo came to Tokyo to seek leniency for entertainers already here.

Chaturont Chaiyakam, a consular official at the Thai Embassy in Tokyo, estimates that of 15,000 illegal Thai migrants in Japan, roughly 6,000 are in prostitution.

Flipping through stacks of victims' affidavits collected by his embassy, Chaiyakam says it's not unusual for those sent home to Thailand to get smuggled again into Japan.

"There is still demand, so people want to come," he explains.

Pointing to another problem, Chaiyakam says some 4,000 children of Thai victims are estimated to be living in Japan effectively stateless. With no registered fathers and no documents, they can't enroll in public schools and wander the streets waiting for their mothers to get off work.

Monica says her dream of a new life can never be realized in a country that offers women like her a place in its sex industry but no place in larger society.

"Japan obligates us to do things we don't want to do," Monica says.

LOAD-DATE: March 17, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 Associated Press
All Rights Reserved

154 of 359 DOCUMENTS

CQ Congressional Testimony

March 9, 2005 Wednesday

COMBATING HUMAN TRAFFICKING

SECTION: CAPITOL HILL HEARING TESTIMONYLENGTH: 3217 words

Statement of Linda Smith Founder and Executive Director Shared Hope International Committee on House International Relations Subcommittee on Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations

March 9, 2005

Thank you Mr. Chairman, for the opportunity to testify on H.R. 972, the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2005. It is always an honor to come before your subcommittee because of the great respect I have for your passionate and tireless commitment to defending the world's most vulnerable victims.

It is encouraging to see the continued commitment by many in Congress to fine-tune and further develop our anti-trafficking efforts at home and abroad. I am honored to have the opportunity to present what Shared Hope International has learned in its years of rescuing and restoring women and children who are victims of trafficking around the world.

The Bush Administration has taken significant leadership on this issue and should be commended for all that it has done so far. President Bush himself has demonstrated his commitment to eradicating the trade of persons both internationally and domestically by addressing the United Nations on September 23, 2003 and at the Department of Justice's National Training Conference on Human Trafficking held in Tampa, Florida in July of 2004.

Ambassador John Miller is a catalyst among international leaders evaluating government's progress and directing US dollars. I appreciate this opportunity to commend him for his bold leadership on this issue.

The Department of Justice is also moving aggressively to prosecute human traffickers. Since January 2001, Civil Rights Division's Criminal Section - working with U.S. Attorney's Offices nationwide - has charged, convicted, or secured sentences for 92 human traffickers in 21 cases. They have also developed city wide taskforces to increase the capacity of local law enforcement to identify victims and bring their traffickers to justice.

The effects of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act are being felt around the world. Regardless of whether you agree on the specific tier placements, it is clear that in the past several years the annual report issued by the Department of State's Office to Combat and Monitor Trafficking in Persons is pushing countries to make strides of progress to fight human traffickers and aid their victims. The United States government demonstrates it's most noble leadership by holding our allies feet to the fire, encouraging them to take all necessary efforts to address trafficking in persons in their country. As a country of destination for trafficking, the United States can continue aggressively leading this international movement by strengthening the protection in our own country. Most notably we need to aggressively tackle the demand that creates market places of victimization.

H.R. 972 is a good bill and I strongly support it. It addresses many of the gaps that exist in the global fight against trafficking in persons. It deals with some issues we'd rather not acknowledge as a country - exploitation of child prostitutes by U.S. government personnel, U.S. government contractors and international peacekeepers - but it provides tools for ensuring that this exploitation is no longer tolerated. It also acknowledges, as did the original TVPA, that trafficking in persons is not something that happens only in other countries but is still a problem in our own country.

I would like to comment on two sections of the bill which I believe are very important:

1) The provisions to create pilot programs for long-term residential care facilities for trafficking victims in the United States and abroad, and

2) The provisions related to the protection of children in post- conflict situations and humanitarian crises. Pilot Programs for long-term care

I am particularly pleased to see language in the bill that enhances services for trafficking victims, both domestic and international. Since the TVPA was passed, the United States government has dramatically improved its service for victims of trafficking in the U.S. There are still improvements that can be made - particularly in the area of housing for victims - and this pilot program will address that.

Creating a pilot project for programs will establish a basis for best-practices and development of services around the world. Starting with two pilot projects is useful, but I would hope this would not limit us to providing long-term residential care facilities in countries with high incidences of trafficking.

Helping women and children who are victimized is the core of Shared Hope International's mission since its inception in 1998. In the past six years, we have established Homes of Hope in seven countries - India, Nepal, Fiji, the Dominican Republic, Jamaica, South Africa and most recently, The Netherlands. All of Shared Hope International's Homes of Hope include the following services: outreach & identification, residential facilities, education, vocational training, and assistance with medical care and job placement. Each of these elements must be in place to provide effective care to trafficking victims.

A victim of human trafficking is a victim of a serious crime, a person whose physical, mental and emotional well-being has been severely damaged. While the seriousness of this crime is not in question, service providers, including ourselves, are still learning how best to bring about healing and long term restoration. I want to give credit to some of my colleagues working in the field who are pioneers on this issue. There was strong testimony presented on after-care to the Subcommittee on International terrorism, Non-proliferation and Human Rights on June 25, 2003 by Rev. Luran Bethel with the European Baptist Federation, and Nancy Murphy, Executive Director of the Northwest Life and Family Center. I would refer Members to that testimony because it confirms my own experience in working with trafficking victims.

Of course every rehabilitation program must be tailored to the specific cultural context in which it is located, but there are some core principles that I have seen to be highly effective in the restoration and rehabilitation process.

First, effective rehabilitation programs must reflect a holistic view of the person. Programs must consider the displacement of a person who is a victim of trafficking, recognizing the many ways in which the person must be addressed for their long-term restoration. They must meet the needs of the woman and child, including their physical, mental, spiritual and social needs.

Second, effective rehabilitation programs must be safe. Security is one of the most crucial factors and often one of the most expensive to put in place. All facilities require significant security measures to protect the survivors from the threats of gangs, pimps and traffickers.

Third, rehabilitation care facilities must be available to the person for the long term. We must move from thinking of rehabilitation centers as "short-term shelters" to thinking in terms of "home" and "community." A home is a place where a person can grow, learn and develop (or recover) a sense of independence with loving care and nurture. A home is a place where people care about you as a person. A home is a place where it is safe to share your feelings and experiences, both positive and negative, with people who will listen and will love you regardless. A home is a place where you belong. We have seen in our experience working with trafficking victims that these individuals need to feel loved and protected before they can move toward recovery. Every individual comes with their own unique story. This requires programs to have the flexibility to meet the individual's needs.

"Leila" is a Thai girl who was trafficked to Australia. I discovered her while conducting a human rights investigation in February of 2004. She was studying at a University in Thailand and withdrew. She felt responsible for providing the tuition costs for her brother and sister to also attend the University. Different "friends" from Bangkok told her they could get her a job in Australia. She trusted them and they flew with her to Sydney around the time of the 2000 Olympic Games. They told her she could work in a restaurant and make a lot of money. When she arrived they took her to a small hotel where she was kept and forced to prostitute. The girl who traveled with her knew they were going to be sold for prostitution; she had already been taken to other countries. "Leila" paid 50,000 Baht (USD$1,300) to go to Australia. When she arrived she had to pay back A$60,000 (USD$47,500). Eventually, a customer became sympathetic and put her into hiding. She was taken to a safe place but still lives in fear of her traffickers, and believes her mother will not receive her knowing she was a prostitute.

I just returned from Amsterdam where I met with several strong and educated young women whose lives radically changed by the deception and exploitation of human traffickers. "Sarah", a Nigerian from Edo State, was recruited by a Nigerian trafficker who said that she could be a beautician in Europe and send money home for her family. She was recruited while she was in school learning economics. She is also the oldest child of a family with 9 children and believes she is financially responsible for her family. To intimidate and maintain control of "Sarah" the trafficker took her to a voodoo doctor where they had taken her nails, hair, and body fluids before leaving Nigeria. The first destination was Vienna, Austria where she worked in a strip club and was forced to prostitute. When she arrived in Europe she was told that she owed the trafficker Euro 35,000 (USD$46,350.00). After 8 months she was taken to Amsterdam where she told a "client" what happened to her. He assisted her out of the brothels and introduced her to a place of safety.

"Vanessa" was a University student in Nigeria from Edo State. Vanessa was having trouble getting the money she needed for tuition and books. Another student said he had an auntie who helped people come to Europe. The lady was very nice and helped her get her papers. She arrived in Amsterdam where the woman told her that there weren't jobs except prostitution. Vanessa did not want to do this and tried to get out. The woman held her captive and sent a man who raped her. They beat her and locked her up. Vanessa eventually ran away and went to Germany where she was picked up and put into an immigration camp. She was raped in the camp and got pregnant. She is now a mother of a five-month-old boy and are both safe in a Home of Hope.

The Netherlands does not provide residency status for victims of trafficking. They also can not return home to Nigeria due to the threat of being re-trafficked. Shared Hope International is establishing an economic program to enable these women to provide for themselves.

I have shared before the story of Ganga who came to our Home of Hope in India in 1998. Ganga had been trafficked from Nepal to India and brought to a brothel on Falkland Road in Bombay. She was malnourished, repeatedly raped and locked in a dark room for a year. She tried to flee numerous times but was always discovered and beaten harshly by her trafficker. She finally managed to escape with the help from one of our outreach workers. The good news is that a year ago January, my husband Vern and I went to Ganga's wedding with 500 other guests at the Village of Hope. After five years of recovery she is now married and a leader at the Shared Hope International Village of Hope.

Anthea is a 19-year-old girl who is a victim of trafficking in South Africa. She was managed as a prostitute by gangs, addicted to drugs and was coerced by satanic rituals that included having most of her body covered in tattoos. She was identified by a local non-governmental organization (NGO) and offered a safe place to flee the gangs. When I first met Anthea she was pensive, withholding and adjusting to the requirements and comforts of the Home of Hope. After one year in the program, she was becoming a leader. We invited her to join a meeting with the Shared Hope International Board of Directors last fall. She came to tell us that she was accepting a job with the Home of Hope to help direct the girls' center in Cape Town. As she sat around the board room table she looked around at each one of us and burst into an assertive tone and confidently proclaimed, "I am a person." We were captivated by this young woman who, after a year in the Home of Hope, was radiating not as a victim of a crime but as a young woman who had come to a new understanding of who she really is.

Imagine taking any one of these girls and women and giving them 30 days to 3 months to recover in a safe home. Ganga was illiterate, did not have formal education, a family support network, and very little sense of worth. Women like "Vanessa", "Sarah" and "Leila" are educated and in need of employment and protection in their home countries. All of these young women and girls have hopes and dreams. Each of them has a desire to be empowered to obtain their dreams and provide for their families.

These women and youth are viewed by the traffickers as products to be sold. Market places of victimization are no respecter of persons; it robs the individual of their value. Part of restoring a life, is recognizing the individual person by rediscovering and building her dreams, one life at a time.

The pivotal element to restoration is the long-term commitment and expectation that is given to the woman and children. It is about creating a place that the victimized person would identify as home and like good homes do, provide enough security and opportunity to help them further establish themselves after their period of recovery. We can not underestimate the kind of time it takes for a person to regain their own sense of dignity and the acquired skills to be productive members of society. They must have a place to call home for as long as it takes.

Fourth, more efficient and effective rehabilitation is provided when there is on-going outreach to local service providers already working with women and children and a commitment to build local capacity, including the capacity to provide effective security, so victims of trafficking can be incorporated into existing programs. We don't need to reinvent the wheel, just educate and build capacity into groups, including faith-based groups, currently committed to helping women and children.

Organizations such as Teen Challenge International have created models for addiction recovery programs that are often effective for victims of trafficking when applied to the specific cultural context and to the special needs of women and children. Shared Hope International's partners in three locations are modeled after the Teen Challenge recovery model.

Shared Hope International partners with local service providers to run Homes of Hope because we believe that local leaders committed to helping women and youth do develop the most culturally relevant and effective programs. We look for leaders who demonstrate a sacrificial and sustained commitment to helping vulnerable and victimized women and youth. We then educate them on the nature of trafficking and build their capacity to address the needs of trafficking victims.

One way the U.S. government could help the efforts of the anti-trafficking community worldwide would be to encourage US Embassies and the USAID Missions to routinely inventory NGOs providing a variety of services to women and children. There needs to be a deliberate strategy to identify a broader base of these NGOs, including the faith-based organizations that serve victimized women or youth in cities of destination for human trafficking and commercial sex tourism. We should then ensure that those providing direct services have an increased capacity to apply their programs to women and children trafficking victims.

I should also say for the record that the faith-based community has really stepped up to the plate on the issue of victim rehabilitation. There are new networks being developed around the world of faith-based groups willing and ready to engage in the work of rehabilitation. That is something that is encouraging to me personally. Strategies for Preventing Trafficking in post-conflict situation and humanitarian emergency situations.

The other aspect of H.R. 972 which is very needed are the provisions that encourage the U.S. government and the international community to develop trafficking prevention strategies for post-conflict and humanitarian emergency situations.

After the Tsunami in Asia, the media highlighted the trafficking threat in countries such as Thailand and made it seem like it was a new problem. Those of us who have been doing anti-trafficking work know, however, that trafficking was already a big problem in many of those countries before the Tsunami. The only difference is that the Tsunami created a more expansive group of vulnerable victims - children without parents and women who, through the loss of a husband or family, lost their means of livelihood and support.

What is needed are short-term strategies for protecting vulnerable children and long-term strategies for assuring that women benefit from the reconstruction efforts and are able to gain meaningful employment. If women can find jobs and the ability to support their families, they will be less likely to fall prey to traffickers.

Part of this long-term strategy should include programs to train U.S. military personnel who will engage in regions affected by conflict or humanitarian crises about the crime of trafficking, those who are most vulnerable, and how traffickers operate.

This April Shared Hope International will be co-hosting the sixth event as follow up to the world summit that we co-sponsored with the U.S. Department of State in February of 2003. The event will convene 14 nations in Southeast and East Asia to address measures that tackle the demand for child sex tourism and sex trafficking. This event will be among one of the many activities in the region to continue raising the awareness about the conditions of sex trafficking in the region and move practical measures forward. We must continue focusing on programs that educate vulnerable populations as to the nature of trafficking and build economic and educational alternatives that will keep women and children from the false promises that lead to such severe exploitation.

The women and children that I've met through our Homes of Hope demonstrate to me the vitality of the human spirit. They are among the strongest people I have encountered. I know that their strength comes in part from the sustained support and development that is offered to them through a community of hope. Together, we can help build these communities offering victims of a serious crime a place to rebuild their lives. This is not an inevitable crime. And, the women and children can be survivors, even becoming the agents of change for others like them.

Thank you for the opportunity to provide remarks on this important piece of legislation.

LOAD-DATE: March 14, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

COMMITTEE: HOUSE INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

SUBCOMMITTEE: AFRICA

H.R. 972

Retrieve Bill Tracking Report
Retrieve Full Text of Bill

TESTIMONY-BY: LINDA SMITH, FOUNDER AND EXECUTIVE

AFFILIATION: DIRECTOR SHARED HOPE INTERNATIONAL

Copyright 2005 Congressional Quarterly, Inc. All Rights Reserved.

155 of 359 DOCUMENTS

BusinessWorld

February 25, 2005, Friday

Rule of Law; The Japanese challenge

BYLINE: Augusto R. Bundang

SECTION: Pg. 4

LENGTH: 682 words

And then it came like a bolt of lightning. Just when the volume of remittances from Filipinos working abroad was starting to pick up, another unexpected cut in the lifeline of the national economy is about to be made. This time, it's the Japanese government which is giving local officials and numerous overseas performing artists one big headache.

With the March 15 implementation of its new immigration policy, the Japanese government is set to enforce tougher, stricter rules on the issuance of entertainer or working visas with the aim of curbing human sex trafficking. The new policy will require a visa applicant to produce a certification that he/she graduated from a two-year course in performing arts or a certification that applicant has been a performing artist for two years in another country aside from Japan.

After the United States State department stunned Japan last year by including it on a human trafficking watch list alongside Guatemala and Laos, Japan chose the path of less resistance by seeking to immediately alter its immigration rules, making these less attractive to would-be criminals and sex traffickers.

Of course, local officials and those in the overseas entertainment industry are now moving heaven and earth, pleading with Tokyo to postpone the policy's implementation in order to prevent a perceived economic catastrophe from taking place.

With the Japanese media estimating the number of visas issued to Filipino entertainers annually to fall from 80,000 to 8,000 this year, the Arroyo administration stands to lose approximately US$1 billion every year in foreign exchange remittances, according to Sen. Francis Pangilinan. Rep. Florencio Noel, on the other hand, noted that local banks could easily lose $20 million in foreign exchange should Japanese promoters withdraw their deposits in escrow as required under the law. Well, not to be forgotten are the millions of Filipinos dependent on the overseas entertainment industry for a living, including the families of the entertainers and those employed by the industry, who might as well say good-bye to their sources of livelihood once the number of overseas Filipino entertainers is cut by approximately 90% this year.

A life with no money will surely spell disaster for the government and for the people as well. Many will certainly be displaced once the yen becomes as scarce as hen. In this country where every monetary earning counts, not as a matter of living but as a matter of survival, a drop in one's income will have reverberating effects on the dinner table, not to mention the psyche of those affected.

But one does not live by bread alone, we are told to believe. There is yet the other side of the matter, the better side if I may say so, the side we do not readily see since we always dwell on what our stomachs ache for, not what our spirits crave for. And that is, each crisis brings out the best in us. Did we not uncover our unified strength some 19 years ago in EDSA I when we triumphed over tyranny and oppression? The new hiring policy of Japan will allow us to unearth our core competencies and explore other fields like information technology and health services, rather than concentrate on providing entertainment in nightclubs where incidents of abuse are common and expected.

The derogatory term "Japayuki" will hopefully find a different meaning as the new policy will strive to give the work of entertainers the value and dignity it deserves as only qualified professional entertainers who can prove their worth will be able to find a place in the Japanese entertainment industry. Filipino girls will no longer dream of becoming Japayukis to earn easy money, but to practice a profession deserving to be harnessed.

In the end, it will give us the opportunity to reexamine our values as a Christian nation and discover what really is important to us, that is, whether to earn at whatever cost or to earn but with honor and pride. The new policy is not detrimental to our cause as a nation, but more of a challenge we all should look forward to.

LOAD-DATE: February 24, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 BusinessWorld Publishing Corporation

156 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Worldstream

February 24, 2005 Thursday

Cabinet approves bill to combat human traffickers in Japan

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 283 wordsDATELINE: TOKYO

Japan's Cabinet Friday approved a bill that would crack down on human traffickers, making it harder for them to bring women from around the world into Japan to work in the sex industry, officials said.

The legislation, which revises Japan's criminal laws and introduces penalties for human traffickers, will be submitted to Parliament for final approval, a Justice Ministry official said on condition of anonymity.

Japanese yakuza, or crime syndicates, are believed to be involved in bringing thousands of women and children from Asia, Latin America and Eastern Europe to work in Japan's sex industry, or as forced laborers.

Under the proposed penalty for human trafficking, an offender could face up to three years and seven months in prison. A broker who uses or gives out fake passports will face up to three years in prison or a fine of 3 million yen (US$28,600; [euro]21,568.63), Kyodo News agency reported.

The bill would provide protection for human trafficking victims rather than detaining them as illegal entrants.

Japan will also tighten visa requirements for foreign entertainers as part of the effort to crack down on human trafficking. The move could affect tens of thousands of women from the Philippines, who comprise more than half of the foreign nationals entering Japan on entertainer visas every year.

In June, the U.S. State Department put Japan on its 40-nation watch-list of countries that have failed to fully comply with an international treaty outlawing human trafficking.

Japan signed the United Nations Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons in December 2002, but critics have said it has done little to stop the trade.

LOAD-DATE: February 25, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 Associated Press
All Rights Reserved

157 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The International Herald Tribune

February 17, 2005 Thursday

Japan aims to stop trafficking in prostitutes

BYLINE: Norimitsu Onishi

SOURCE: The New York Times

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 2

LENGTH: 1236 words

DATELINE: TOKYO:

After years of denying it had a problem with human trafficking, Japan is now putting the finishing touches on a law that would make the practice illegal in this country and help foreigners forced into the sex industry.

Over the next months, the new law, along with programs to assist victims testifying against traffickers, could begin to slow the illegal flow of women into one of the world's biggest destinations for foreign prostitutes.

In Japan, the foreign women who are victims of trafficking end up working everywhere from Tokyo's sprawling red-light districts to rural areas unfamiliar to most foreigners. They stand on street corners and sit behind glass windows; they serve as sex performers or hostesses at clubs outside of which they are expected to date customers.

A 28-year-old Colombian woman, who spent four years working as a prostitute in Japan, mostly to repay $45,000 she owed the criminals who sold and bought her, finally fled to her embassy here late last year.

Having given testimony that could help arrest her traffickers, she now waits for authorization from immigration officials to return to Medellin, Colombia, to be reunited with her 12-year-old son and 11-year-old daughter. "We shouldn't be treated as criminals to be deported out of Japan, but as victims," she said in an interview at the Colombian Embassy.

Starting in March, the government is expected to severely restrict the number of entertainer visas granted, a category that has allowed the entry of, and sometimes trafficking in, women with dubious skills as entertainers. The number of such visas granted Filipinos alone, now 80,000 annually, could be slashed to 8,000.

But advocates for trafficking victims are watching cautiously. They say the government seemed ambivalent about addressing this problem, which they describe as a form of modern slavery, and began taking serious steps only after American pressure.

Japan, which signed the 2002 United Nations' protocol against human trafficking, but could not ratify it without a law against it, has long been known for its lax attitudes on the issue. The U.S. State Department in June placed Japan on a watch list in a report that ranks governments' efforts to fight human trafficking. It was the only developed nation on the list.

In Japan, some foreign workers come knowing they will become part of the sex industry. But few are aware that they will incur huge debts to traffickers, who typically confiscate their passports, restrict their movements and sometimes sell them to Japanese criminals.

Japan has always taken a businesslike attitude toward the sex industry, regarding it as necessary, and not necessarily evil. The Japanese government organized Asian sex slaves for its soldiers during World War II and brothels for American soldiers during the postwar occupation.

Today, the Japanese authorities take a laissez-faire attitude. At the main crossroads in the Shibuya district, touts openly solicit young women for the sex trade.

Japanese schoolgirls meet older men in a widespread practice euphemistically called "compensated dating." The sex industry remains a part of the business culture, as was shown in 2003 when an Osaka company organized a three-day sex party with 500 prostitutes in Zhuhai, a city in southern China. The party infuriated the Chinese, especially because it ended on Sept. 18, the anniversary of Japan's invasion of China in 1931.

For the first nine months of 2004, Japan's National Police Agency recorded 46 cases of human trafficking, and arrested 12 brokers on immigration or other charges. But the figures hide the problem's true magnitude, since most cases are never reported, according to diplomats, victims' advocates and the Japanese authorities.

Victims are said to number in the thousands, with the three largest sources being Thailand, Colombia and the Philippines. The Colombian Embassy estimates that 3,500 Colombian women work as prostitutes in Japan.

Yoko Yoshida, a lawyer for the Japan Network Against Trafficking in Persons, a private organization, said many Japanese women do not stop their husbands from hiring prostitutes. "If the husbands really fall in love with the foreign women, that would be a problem," she said. "But as long as that doesn't happen, there is little sense that these foreign women are human beings like them."

Motohisa Suzuki, the official coordinating the government's new antitrafficking campaign at the prime minister's cabinet office, said the Japanese had already started taking measures against trafficking, using criminal and labor laws.

In addition to a new antitrafficking law that will punish perpetrators, revisions of immigration laws will exempt victims without proper papers from being deported so that they can cooperate in investigations against traffickers, Suzuki said. Until recently, the women even those few willing to testify against traffickers were deported immediately.

How many of those with entertainment visas end up as trafficking victims and are coerced into prostitution is unclear, Suzuki said, though he added that the visa "offered a tool for human trafficking." About 70 percent of them end up doing work other than entertainment, including working as bar hostesses, he said.

But Joji Imai, president of the Association of Japanese Promoters Recruiting Foreign Entertainers, said cases of prostitution were isolated. "Many of the customers who like to patronize clubs with foreign entertainers are interested in learning foreign languages or discovering foreign cultures," Imai said. "They enjoy different cultures, such as Filipinos' cheerfulness."

Koki Kobayashi, a lawmaker in the governing Liberal Democratic Party, said the visas allowed Filipinos to earn good wages and support their families back home. "It is Japanese economic aid," he said.

"Why is only Japan criticized?" he added. "I just can't help thinking that the Japanese government is targeting innocent people just because it has been told to do something by the U.S."

The 28-year-old Colombian woman waiting to return home was approached about working in Japan as a waitress four years ago by a Colombian woman in Medellin, she said. But three hours after arriving in Tokyo, she was dropped off in a red-light area, Shin Okubo, and taught four Japanese phrases: "Good evening. Where are you going? Let's go to the hotel. Twenty thousand yen," or $200

She had to hand over $80 a night to two Japanese criminals and make regular payments on a $35,000 debt to her Colombian traffickers, allowing her to send home only $300 a month. Her passport was taken. She was largely confined in her off hours to a small apartment with other Colombian women.

After she had repaid all but $5,000 of the debt, she was sold to one of the Japanese criminals, who demanded an additional $5,000. She repaid the Japanese, but then went into hiding. She worked by herself for six months to buy a plane ticket home.

Deported from Japan, she went back to Colombia, with $130 left

But after only three days in Colombia, one of the Colombian traffickers called her at home, saying, "You still owe me $5,000." He threatened to kill her children unless she returned to Japan and worked off the debt. A few weeks later, holding a forged passport that cost her yet another $5,000, she was back in Japan, she said.

LOAD-DATE: February 17, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

158 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The New York Times

February 16, 2005 Wednesday
Late Edition - Final

Japan, Easygoing Till Now, Plans Sex Traffic Crackdown

BYLINE: By NORIMITSU ONISHI

SECTION: Section A; Column 1; Foreign Desk; Pg. 3

LENGTH: 1501 words

DATELINE: TOKYO, Feb. 14

After years of denying it had a problem with trafficking in humans, Japan is now putting the finishing touches on a law that would make the practice illegal in this country and help foreigners forced into the sex industry here.

In the months to come, the new law, along with programs to assist victims testifying against traffickers, could begin to stanch the illegal flow of women into one of the world's biggest destinations for foreign prostitutes.

In Japan, the foreign women who are victims of trafficking end up working everywhere from Tokyo's sprawling red-light districts to rural areas unfamiliar to most foreigners. They stand on street corners and sit behind glass windows; they serve as sex performers or hostesses at clubs outside of which they are expected to date customers.

A 28-year-old Colombian woman, who spent four years working as a prostitute in Japan, mostly to repay $45,000 she owed criminals who sold and bought her, finally fled to her embassy here late last year. Having given testimony that could help arrest her traffickers, she now waits for authorization from immigration officials to return to Medellin, Colombia, to be reunited with her 12-year-old son and 11-year-old daughter.

"We shouldn't be treated as criminals to be deported out of Japan, but as victims," she said in an interview at the Colombian Embassy.

Starting in March, the government is expected to severely restrict the number of entertainer visas granted, a category that has allowed the entry of, and sometimes trafficking in, women with dubious skills as entertainers. The number of such visas granted Filipinos alone, now 80,000 annually, could be slashed to 8,000.

But advocates for trafficking victims are watching cautiously. They say the government seemed ambivalent about addressing this problem, which they describe as a form of modern slavery, and began taking serious steps only after American pressure.

John Miller, director of the United States State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, said the Japanese authorities were skeptical about the problem one year ago.

"We had some frank and candid discussions, and there was a lot of tussle back and forth," Mr. Miller said. "In the course of the succeeding months, there was a turnaround."

"But the final result is not in," he added. "We don't know whether the proposed law will lead to real change and whether these antitrafficking programs will be funded. Nonetheless, the foundation seems to be in the process of being laid."

Japan, which signed the 2002 United Nations protocol against human trafficking but could not ratify it without a law against it, has long been known for its lax attitudes on the issue. In June, the State Department placed it on a watch list in a report that ranks governments' efforts to fight human trafficking. It was the only developed nation on the list.

In Japan, some women come knowing they will work in the sex industry. But few are aware that they will incur huge debts to traffickers, who typically confiscate their passports, restrict their movements and sometimes sell them to criminals.

Japan has always taken a businesslike attitude toward the sex industry, regarding it as necessary, and not necessarily evil. The Japanese government organized Asian sex slaves for its soldiers during World War II and brothels for American soldiers during the postwar occupation.

Today, the Japanese authorities take a laissez-faire attitude. At the main crossroads in the Shibuya district here, the equivalent of Times Square, touts openly solicit young women for the sex trade. Japanese schoolgirls meet older men in a widespread practice euphemistically called "compensated dating." The sex industry remains a part of the business culture, as was shown in 2003 when an Osaka company organized a three-day sex party with 500 prostitutes in Zhuhai, a city in southern China. The party infuriated the Chinese, especially because it ended on Sept. 18, the anniversary of Japan's invasion of China in 1931.

For the first nine months of 2004, Japan's National Police Agency recorded 46 cases of human trafficking, and arrested 12 brokers on immigration or other charges. But the figures hide the problem's true magnitude, because most cases are never reported, according to diplomats, victims' advocates and the Japanese authorities.

Victims are said to number in the thousands, with the three largest sources being Thailand, Colombia and the Philippines.

The Colombian Embassy estimates that 3,500 Colombian women work as prostitutes in Japan. How many were brought here by traffickers is unclear. But the number of women fleeing to the embassy -- more than 60 last year -- suggested the enormity of the problem to Francisco J. Sierra when he took over as ambassador two years ago.

When Mr. Sierra approached the Japanese Justice and Foreign Ministries, each said it was the other ministry's responsibility, he said, adding, "They were evading this topic."

Mr. Sierra attributed the lack of attention to a general permissiveness toward prostitution, saying, "Normal people in Japan don't think it's a problem."

Yoko Yoshida, a lawyer for the Japan Network Against Trafficking in Persons, a private organization, said many Japanese women do not stop their husbands from hiring prostitutes. "If the husbands really fall in love with the foreign women, that would be a problem," she said. "But as long as that doesn't happen, there is little sense that these foreign women are human beings like them."

Each month the Thai Embassy here receives about 20 forged passports confiscated from women trying to enter Japan illegally, said Chaturont Chaiyakam, a consul at the embassy. Most of those entering know they will work as prostitutes, but, once here, are kept in servitude and saddled with debts averaging $50,000, he said.

"They may take years to repay the debts," Mr. Chaiyakam said. "Or sometimes a Japanese customer will pay the debt and acquire the girl."

Motohisa Suzuki, the official coordinating the government's new antitrafficking campaign at the prime minister's cabinet office, said the Japanese had already started taking measures against trafficking, using criminal and labor laws.

In addition to a new antitrafficking law that will punish offenders, revisions of immigration laws will exempt victims without proper papers from being deported so that they can cooperate in investigations against traffickers, Mr. Suzuki said. Until recently, the women -- even those few willing to testify against traffickers -- were deported immediately.

How many of those with entertainment visas end up as trafficking victims and are coerced into prostitution is unclear, Mr. Suzuki said, but he added that the visa "offered a tool for human trafficking." About 70 percent of them end up doing work other than entertainment, including working as bar hostesses, he said.

But Joji Imai, president of the Association of Japanese Promoters Recruiting Foreign Entertainers, said cases of prostitution were isolated. "Many of the customers who like to patronize clubs with foreign entertainers are interested in learning foreign languages or discovering foreign cultures," Mr. Imai said. "They enjoy different cultures, such as Filipinos' cheerfulness."

Koki Kobayashi, a lawmaker in the governing Liberal Democratic Party, said the visas allowed Filipinos to earn good wages and support their families back home. "It is Japanese economic aid," he said. "Why is only Japan criticized?" he added. "I just can't help thinking that the Japanese government is targeting innocent people just because it has been told to do something by the U.S."

The 28-year-old Colombian woman waiting to return home was approached about working in Japan -- as a waitress -- four years ago by a Colombian woman in Medellin, she said. But three hours after arriving in Tokyo, she was dropped off in a red-light area, Shin Okubo, and taught four Japanese phrases: "Good evening. Where are you going? Let's go to the hotel. Twenty thousand yen," or $200.

She had to hand over $80 a night to two Japanese criminals and make regular payments on a $35,000 debt to her Colombian traffickers, allowing her to send home only $300 a month. Her passport was taken. She was largely confined in her off hours to a small apartment with other Colombian women.

After she had repaid all but $5,000 of the debt, she was sold to one of the Japanese criminals, who demanded an additional $5,000. She repaid the Japanese, but then went into hiding. She worked by herself for six months to buy a plane ticket home.

Deported from Japan, she went back to Colombia, with $130 left.

But after only three days in Colombia, one of the Colombian traffickers called her at home, saying, "You still owe me $5,000." He threatened to kill her children unless she returned to Japan and worked off the debt. A few weeks later, holding a forged passport that cost her yet another $5,000, she was back in Japan.

URL: <http://www.nytimes.com>

LOAD-DATE: February 16, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Photos: Japan takes a businesslike attitude toward the sex industry. At a brothel in the Kawasaki district near Tokyo, a transaction seemed under way.

Brothels in the Kogane-cho section of Yokohama, which the police shut down at the end of 2004. Foreign prostitutes were numerous there. (Photographs by Ko Sasaki for The New York Times)

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

159 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

February 15, 2005 Tuesday 10:37 AM GMT

Controversial Japanese visa clampdown aimed at sex trade to start March 15

LENGTH: 348 wordsDATELINE: TOKYO Feb 15

Japan said Tuesday it would tighten requirements from March 15 for entertainment visas in new rules meant to cut down on the sex trade but criticized in the Philippines where foreign remittances provide vital income.

The government enacted the revisions Tuesday, meaning they would go into effect in one month on March 15, an official at the justice ministry's immigration bureau said.

The visa reform plans were announced in December after the United States put Japan on a watchlist for human trafficking and said many woman, particularly Filipinas, who entered as "entertainers" were forced into prostitution.

But the proposal led to protests outside the Japanese embassy in the Philippines, whose vast overseas labor force sends home billions of dollars a year, equivalent to 11 percent of domestic economic output.

Philippine Foreign Secretary Alberto Romulo flew to Tokyo to make a last-minute appeal on February 3 to his Japanese counterpart Nobutaka Machimura to reconsider the visa plan.

Japan went ahead after assuring Romulo that Filipinos here for legitimate reasons would not be targetted and that Japan would not impose quotas on fewer visas to issue or retroactively target Filipinos who entered under the more lax rules.

Some 80,000 of the 130,000 foreign entertainers certified in Japan are Filipina. The new rules will also affect other nationalities, with Colombia, Russia, Thailand and the United States also major sources of entertainers in Japan.

Under the new rules, only Filipino entertainers with two years' performance training at a foreign educational institution, or with two years' experience outside Japan, can be issued visas.

Previously, applicants needed only to show certification in their own country to be granted visas as entertainers.

The visa crackdown is one of the main thrusts of the Japanese effort to cut down on human trafficking.

Police also plan to require employers to keep ready documentation for foreign entertainers and to ban or restrict home distribution of leaflets promoting paid sexual services, which are illegal but mostly tolerated in Japan.

LOAD-DATE: February 16, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

160 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Manila Times

February 15, 2005 Tuesday

PINOY OPAS STILL BEING TREATED WELL IN JAPAN

BYLINE: Ma. Theresa Torres

LENGTH: 523 words

MALACANANG remains persuaded that the Japanese government has been treating the country fairly well despite reports that Japan is considering accepting more Thai workers.

Last week, Japan ignored Manila's protests against its new visa rules that are likely to reduce the number of Filipinos allowed to work as entertainers.

Press Secretary Ignacio Bunye said that under the proposed provisions of the Japan-Philippines Economic Partnership Agreement (JPEPA), more opportunities have been opened to Filipino workers going to Japan.

"So we believe we are getting a fair treatment from the Japanese government for our workers who are interested in going to Japan," Bunye said.

The agreement seeks to expand trade and investment relations between the two countries.

Through the agreement, the Philippines expects to boost its gross domestic product between 1.7 percent and 3 percent since Japan is the second biggest trading partner of the country.

But both countries have yet to sign the agreement.

Tokyo is considering relaxing employment conditions for Thai cooks, masseurs and caregivers.

Still, the Arroyo administration is confident that the Philippines' target of gaining full access to Japan's health-care service would not be affected by the entry of Thai masseurs and caregivers.

A lawyer supporting the plight of Filipino artists assailed the Japanese government for undermining the country's sovereignty when it refused to honor the artist accreditation certificates of overseas performing artists (OPAs).

The lawyer, Ramon Calubag, said: "For Japan not to honor the certificates while we honor its official documents is an affront to our sovereignty."

He said that despite repeated assurances by Japan that OPAs would not be affected, there is a "massive reduction" of Filipino workers in Osaka and Tokyo.

He also called on all OPAs to boycott Japanese products in order to send a strong message to Japan.

"If human trafficking is really the issue, why did Japan keep quiet in 2001 when we had 13 cases of human trafficking? Why only now when we have zero in 2003 and 2004? Is it because there is now a growing consensus to press the Japanese government to settle once and for all the issue of compensation for our comfort women?" Calubag asked.

Bunye noted that although the JPEPA is only an agreement in principle, both countries are finalizing its details before it is signed.

He said that Japan's new immigration law does not only focus on Filipinos but is a measure against human trafficking.

Bunye said slots for entertainers would be replaced only by health and information and technology workers.

Japan announced the visa reforms in December after the United States put the country on a watchlist for human trafficking and said many women, particularly Filipino, who entered Japan as entertainers were forced into prostitution.

The Philippines has a vast overseas labor force, which sends home billions of dollars a year, equivalent to 11 percent of domestic economic output.

Tokyo's tougher rules could in effect mean fewer Filipinos would be allowed in Japan. Some 80,000 of the 130,000 foreign entertainers certified in Japan are Filipino.

LOAD-DATE: June 30, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Trade/External Payments

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2005 News Bites Pty Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

Global News Bites

161 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

February 8, 2005 Tuesday 5:52 AM GMT

Japan to press ahead with visa crackdown despite Philippine pleas

LENGTH: 366 wordsDATELINE: TOKYO Feb 8

Japan will soon tighten visa rules to cut down on the sex trade, likely reducing the number of Filipinas allowed to enter as entertainers, despite protests in the Philippines, an official said Tuesday.

Japan will implement the new visas regulations "rather soon" after assuring the Philippines that the crackdown on visas will not be arbitrary, a foreign ministry official said.

Japan announced the visa reforms in December after the United States put the country on a watchlist for human trafficking and said many woman, particularly Filipinas, who entered Japan as entertainers were forced into prostitution.

Philippine Foreign Secretary Alberto Romulo visited Tokyo last week and asked his Japanese counterpart Nobutaka Machimura not to target legitimate Filipino laborers, after protests in Manila outside the Japanese embassy.

The foreign ministry official said Romulo's talks here paved the way for the "speedy implementation" of the stricter rules on entertainer visas.

"There was a meeting of the minds that Japan's measures cannot be changed," said the official, who asked not to be named.

He said Japan promised the Philippines that the visa rules would not be retroactive for entertainers already in Japan and that Tokyo would not set quotas to lower the number of visas issued.

But the official acknowledged that the tougher rules could in effect mean fewer Filipinos would be allowed in Japan. Some 80,000 of the 130,000 foreign entertainers certified in Japan are Filipina.

"Quite naturally, that number will be reduced for the moment," he said.

"It could go down to 60,000 or 50,000; it is hard to tell. We are thinking it could fluctuate," he said, adding that the figure could go back up "if efforts are made to comply."

He estimated that of the entertainers, several hundred had been reported to be involved in the sex trade. Besides the Philippines, many entertainers also come from Thailand and Colombia, he said.

Under the new rules, certification as an entertainer in the applicant's home country would no longer be sufficient for a visa.

The Philippines has a vast overseas labor force which sends home billions of dollars a year, equivalent to 11 percent of domestic economic output.

LOAD-DATE: February 9, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2005 Agence France Presse
All Rights Reserved

162 of 359 DOCUMENTS

UPI

February 8, 2005 Tuesday 12:29 PM EST

UPI Hears ...

LENGTH: 777 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, Feb. 8

Insider notes from United Press International for Feb. 8:

One item undoubtedly discussed in private during Secretary of State Condoleeza Rice's visit on Monday to Israel was that the State Department may shortly rank Israel among the group of countries not taking action against human trafficking, which could result in the imposition of economic sanctions. Since 2001 the U.S. State Department has published an annual report on international human trafficking, ranking countries by their willingness to eradicate it. In the report's first edition Israel was ranked on the third and lowest tier, among such countries as Albania, Bahrain, Pakistan and Qatar that do not meet the minimum standards in the struggle against human trafficking and are not making any efforts to improve. The report stated, "Israel is a destination country for trafficked persons, primarily women. Women are trafficked to Israel from the New Independent States (specifically Moldova, Russia, and Ukraine), Brazil, Turkey, South Africa, and some countries in Asia." Since then Israel has moved up to the second tier. Israeli officials fear that the fourth edition of the report, published in June, will bounce Israel back to the third tier. Justice Ministry attorney Miri Sasson told the Knesset committee on foreign workers, "Israel's position - that foreign workers are exploited but not to the extent of trafficking - was rejected by the Americans." Washington bureaucrats point to the U.S. legal criteria that stipulate that a minimal standard for combating the phenomenon is harsh punishment.

While human trafficking in the United States carries a penalty of 16 years in jail, Israel's maximum penalty is one year. Hoping to head off the rift, Knesset member Ran Cohen has asked Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to appoint someone to coordinate the state's fight against human trafficking.

Someone's asleep in South Korea's Ministry of National Defense, which has just released its Defense White Paper. The document notes that about 690,000 U.S. troops -- a number five times greater than U.S. troops currently deployed in Iraq -- along with 2,000 military aircraft and 160 warships would be mobilized to defend South Korea in the event of war. Citing the Pentagon's contingency plan, the ministry document said the deployment would include 70 percent of the U.S. Marine Corps, 50 percent of the U.S. Air Force and 40 percent of the U.S. Navy. The report commented that the vast buildup of U.S. forces is designed to first provide strikes against North Korean field artillery located near the Demilitarized Zone inter-Korean border in a conflict's early stage of any war. This despite the Pentagon's stated intention to remove 12,500, or one-third, of its current troops from South Korea by 2008.

British Muslims are nervously contemplating that a proposed amendment to Part 3 of the Public Order Act of 1986 might mean up to seven years in jail for a Muslim quoting certain verses from the Koran or hadith (traditions about the prophet) under the new amendment's "incitement to religious hatred." In Schedule 10 of the bill, "religious hatred" is defined as "hatred against a group of persons defined by reference to religious belief or lack of religious belief." When former Home Secretary David Blunkett presented the amendments to Parliament, he commented: "It is possible to quote or misquote passages of sacred texts out of context so that they become threatening, abusive or insulting and intended or likely to stir up hatred. Such activities would rightly be caught by the scope of the law." Among the milder verses concerning Muslims is a line from Koran Surah 5: "O you who believe! Do not take the Jews and the Christians for friends; they are friends of each other; and whoever amongst you takes them for a friend, then surely he is one of them; surely Allah does not guide the unjust people."

Most Americans probably think that the Communist Party USA collapsed along with the Evil Empire. Not so: "With pride in our unity and fighting spirit," the National Committee of the Communist Party USA begun preparing for its 28th national convention scheduled for July 1-3 in Chicago, briefly turning Illinois into the ultimate "red state." The Windy City is dear to Yankee Commies, as the Communist Party USA was born 85 years ago. Convention organizers are preparing for 400 party members and invited guests. Organizers promise that a convention highlight will be an "international solidarity evening" with representatives from fraternal parties around the world. Convention organizer Pam Saffer bubbled, "We will be talking about solutions - here's what the 'Reds' are saying today!"

LOAD-DATE: February 9, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2005 U.P.I.
All Rights Reserved

163 of 359 DOCUMENTS

BusinessWorld

February 4, 2005, Friday

WEEKENDER; A case of Human Trafficking

BYLINE: Ma. Eloisa I. Calderon

SECTION: Pg. 25

LENGTH: 1435 words

For the past two months, hundreds of young women bearing placards trooped to the Japanese embassy along Roxas Boulevard protesting Japan's imminent imposition of rigid visa requirements - a move that is seen to affect some 80,000 Filipino entertainers annually.

As expected, talent managers and participants in the entertainment industry also joined the bandwagon that rattled both the embassy and concerned government offices such as the Department of Labor and Employment, Philippine Overseas Employment Administration (POEA), and Department of Foreign Affairs (DFA).

The Japanese government first announced in December its plan to cut tenfold the number of visas issued to Filipinos entering as "entertainers."

Shuhei Ogawa, embassy press officer, said the move was part of his government's plan to stop human trafficking, a problem that has put Japan on the watch list of the United States for countries allegedly condoning the illegal activity.

"For the past decade, most of the Filipino entertainers in Japan are now working as hostesses in a bar or night club. They have been pushed into the sex trade when they are supposed to be there as professional singers and dancers," Mr. Ogawa said.

He noted that prior to 1994, when Japan used to require a two-year training in a specific field of entertainment or a two-year work experience before Filipinos could obtain entertainment visas, instead of the "more lax" artist record book (ARB) or artist accreditation card (AAC).

The number of Filipino entertainers then entering Japan annually was only 40,000.

Latest estimates, however, show that the figure doubled, accounting for more than 60% of the 130,000 total foreign entertainers in Japan.

Under the proposed visa regulation, which Mr. Ogawa said is being reviewed by the Japanese Ministry of Justice, the ARB or AAC requirement would be scrapped and the two-year training or experience would be reimposed.

As expected, the entertainers hit the proposal as only an estimated 9,000 of them are reported to have met the stringent requirements, translating to about $1 billion in annual loss in remittances from overseas Filipino workers from Japan.

The Japanese government, however, is undeterred in implementing the stricter visa rules; Mr. Shuhei noted that the Ministry of Justice has begun introducing changes to the immigration ordinance and is set to have the amendments take effect in March.

Records at the DFA's Office of the Undersecretary for Migrant Workers Affairs (OUMWA) show that as of 2004, there were only eight reported cases of Filipino trafficking in Japan.

In an interview with BusinessWorld, Edna Mae G. Lazaro, special assistant for the OUMWA, noted there could be more incidents of human trafficking, but the victims themselves do not file complaints.

"That is just the figure of those who actually sought help at our embassy in Japan and gave sworn statements. The victims could be more but the problem is that some do not even consider themselves as victims because the idea of having to work abroad and earn is liberalizing to them," she said.

Mr. Ogawa admitted that the Japanese entertainment industry cannot be spared from fault.

"Out of fear, the Filipinos never report. The club owners threaten the girls. They hold their visas and give any orders with the threat that if they do not follow, they would be deported," he said.

The higher cases of Filipinos falling prey to the sex trade, the Japanese government noted, would be attributed to the fact that while some entered Japan with ARBs/AACs, some "as matter of fact, do not have capability as an artist."

Priscilla S. Caro, president of Artist Managers, Developers and Training Centers Association, admitted that the ARB system, previously issued by the Technical Education and Skills Development Authority has been fraught with fraud as Japan-bound entertainers tend to "buy" visas without having undergone training and testing.

"The Japanese found the ARB system too lax, higitan pa daw [they said there is a need to be stricter]," she said.

Ms. Caro, who had been training entertainers for more than 10 years now, however, criticized the government for its decision to replace the ARB system with the AAC to institute reforms. The POEA is now the agency that issues the AAC, which, she said, is not enough to attest that the applicant is a qualified entertainer.

"All of a sudden, the ARB was replaced by the AAC. They removed the training and testing components. They say they hold auditions for the issuance of an AAC. But audition is different from testing, it means you just show yourself to a Japanese," Ms. Caro said in mixed English and Pilipino.

The government, meanwhile, defended the AAC system, saying safeguards are in place to check against forging and corruption.

"The AAC would ensure that the [applicant] is a legitimate entertainer. If you are an AAC holder, that means you went through training, and audition. We accredit auditioners and venues. We have tie-ups with the private sector. The [applicant] would be issued an AAC only upon passing the audition with accredited auditioners," POEA director for land-based workers Stella Z. Banawis said in an interview with BusinessWorld.

To stem human trafficking, the government cites the passage of the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act, or Republic Act No. 9208, in May 2003, which created an interagency council to implement the law.

The Foreign Affairs department, meanwhile, is actively participating in international meetings on anti-trafficking issues, which included the second Bali regional ministerial conference on people smuggling, trafficking in persons, and related transnational crime in 2003 and the labor migration ministerial consultations for countries of origin in Asia held in Sri Lanka also in the same year.

The government even conducted a strategic planning of the multisectoral network against trafficking in persons in Ba-coor, Cavite in July 2003.

Foreign Affairs Undersecretary Jose S. Brillantes said it is for these reasons that the government could not object to Japan's stricter visa scheme since both countries are combating human trafficking.

"We are also in favor of stopping human trafficking. What the government can do is tell Japan that this [AAC] is the new system and we have introduced all of the safeguards," Mr. Brillantes said.

A high-level delegation, led by Foreign Affairs Secretary Alberto G. Romulo flew to Tokyo this week to impress that the AAC works in "separating the chaff from the grain."

The move is part of the government's last-ditch attempts after failing in the first two efforts to secure a five-year stay on the new visa rules.

Mr. Romulo earlier said the government is banking on "friendly relations" with Japan for it to accede to this request.

The DFA's move, considered a diplomatic posture, highlights whether the government's foreign policy is "pro-active" in protecting and promoting overseas workers welfare, whose remittances have been a major contribution to national growth.

Dr. Clarita Carlos, political science professor at the University of the Philippines, said, "Taking a pro-active stance means you assume that you have fairly a good knowledge of things that might happen in the future so that you can handle them when they happen."

The Japan experience fanned speculations that the entertainers would flock to other Asian countries like Hong Kong, which has less stringent worker's visa requirements, but which, in effect, may defeat the thrust against human trafficking as shown in the Japan case.

If not Hong Kong or to other destinations, there will be a glut of jobless entertainers - about 80,000 of them.

"Who would have known that Japan is going to be strict in terms of entry? What needs to be done is to address the supply side. Dito pa lang plantsahin mo na [Fix things at home]. The government does not have a national strategic plan in all areas. Kung dia por dia ka, walang mangyayari [Nothing will happen if things are done only on a daily basis]," Ms. Carlos said.

Part of the strategic plan apparently does not only concern foreign policy, but covers other aspects of governance, including security and the economy, she added.

"This administration should create job opportunities. If this government would sit down and identify the root of this all, it will boil down to [high] population [growth] and not enough education," Ms. Carlos said.

"We are a competent people and yet our leaders are not able to harness our human competence. That is the greatest tragedy of all," she added.

LOAD-DATE: February 3, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

164 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Vancouver Province (British Columbia)

February 4, 2005 Friday
Final Edition

Sex-industry crackdown

BYLINE: Agence France-Presse

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. A24

LENGTH: 61 words

DATELINE: TOKYO

TOKYO -- Japanese police are planning ways to tighten registration rules for foreign sex workers in a bid to fight human trafficking, a problem that has put Japan on a U.S. watch list. Police want businesses in the sex industry to show that their foreign employees have permits to live and work in Japan, where adult entertainment is widely available although illegal.

LOAD-DATE: February 4, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: News

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

165 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

February 3, 2005 Thursday 8:21 AM GMT

Philippine foreign minister to press Japan over immigration, free trade

LENGTH: 355 wordsDATELINE: TOKYO Feb 3

Philippine Foreign Secretary Alberto Romulo arrived Thursday to press Japan not to jeopardize the livelihood of legal Filipino workers amid a crackdown on sex trafficking.

Romulo will also hold talks to push forward a free trade agreement which the two countries want to finalize this year.

The Japanese embassy in Manila has been the scene of regular protests since Tokyo announced it would impose tougher requirements for "entertainer" visas -- which have been used to lure Filipinas into sexual slavery.

"We share the desire of the Japanese government to fight human trafficking and the victimization of our workers," Romulo said in a statement on his trip.

"I will meet with Japanese officials to ensure that the new immigration measures taken by Japan do not adversely affect the interests of our legitimate workers, particularly those already working in Japan," he said.

Romulo was to have a working dinner Thursday with Japanese Foreign Minister Nobutaka Machimura at the start of his three-day visit, the Philippine embassy said.

Nearly 300,000 Filipinos work in Japan, many in bars and other nightspots. They are part of the Philippines' vast overseas labor force whose billions of dollars remitted each year are equivalent to 11 percent of the country's domestic economic output.

Japan has vowed action after close ally the United States in June placed it on a watchlist of nations with problems in human trafficking.

Japan plans to restrict entertainment visas to people with two years' training outside Japan or at foreign educational institutes.

On Thursday, police said they also aimed to require businesses to prove that foreign employees had work permits. They hope to ban fliers sent to homes advertising the sex trade, which is illegal but widely available in Japan.

Romulo is also due to meet Trade Minister Shoichi Nakagawa for talks on the free trade deal, which would ease regulations on Filipino nurses and other care-givers entering Japan.

Philippine President Gloria Arroyo and Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi agreed on basic points of a trade pact in November on the sidelines of a regional summit in Laos.

LOAD-DATE: February 4, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2005 Agence France Presse
All Rights Reserved

166 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

February 3, 2005 Thursday 4:05 AM GMT

Japanese police plan fresh crackdown on sex industry trafficking

LENGTH: 318 wordsDATELINE: TOKYO Feb 3

Japanese police said Thursday they are planning ways to tighten registration rules for foreign sex workers in a bid to fight human trafficking, a problem which has put Japan on a US watchlist.

The National Police Agency said it hoped to require businesses in the sex industry to show that their foreign employees had permits to live and work in Japan, where adult entertainment is widely available although illegal.

Businesses in violation of these rules could have their right to operate revoked, an agency spokesman said.

"We are drafting the proposed changes and are hoping to receive the cabinet's approval soon," he told AFP.

Many owners of businesses in the sex industry get away with flouting the rules by telling authorities they did not know their foreign employees were living and working illegally in Japan.

The police also aimed to ban the distribution of leaflets offering sexual services to private residences, the spokesman said.

Japan has vowed to do more to stop the sex trade after a damning US report in June that put it on a watchlist of countries involved in human trafficking.

The US State Department said Japan has "a huge problem with slavery, particularly sex slavery", and that there was a "tremendous gap" between the size of the problem and the resources devoted to addressing it.

However, Japan's crackdown on the sex trade has also drawn international criticism, with weekly pickets outside the Japanese embassy in Manila by Filipinos worried that many legitimate workers would be deprived of their livelihoods.

Japan plans to begin restricting the issue of entertainment visas -- often used in human trafficking -- only to Filipinos with two years' training outside Japan or at foreign educational institutes.

Nearly 300,000 Filipinos work in Japan, many of them women "entertainers" at bars and other nightspots.

Filipino officials estimate that up to 77,000 entered the country illegally.

LOAD-DATE: February 3, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

167 of 359 DOCUMENTS

World Markets
Research Centre

World Markets Analysis

January 13, 2005

Authorities Arrest Pakistan's Most Notorious Human Trafficker

BYLINE: Elizabeth MillsSECTION: IN BRIEFLENGTH: 252 words

Authorities in Pakistan announced yesterday that the country's most notorious human trafficker, Mohammad Hanif, had been arrested. According to news agency Agence France-Presse (AFP), Hanif was detained last week in the southern port city of Karachi, following an intelligence tip-off. He is believed to have been the key figure in the country's human trafficking racket, which sees thousands of Pakistanis smuggled into other countries every year. The situation has got so bad that the issue has been taken up by the US administration. Many of Hanif's clients are believed to have been sent to Britain and Europe, although the numbers involved remain unclear. In light of international pressure, the government has taken steps to curb the problem; it is currently in the process of amending the Human Trafficking Ordinance, and the steps that have already been taken have been welcomed. The US's 2004 Interim Assessment Report on Human Trafficking praised the government for curtailing trafficking and pursuing cases through the legal system, although the country remains on the US watchlist.

Significance: Ultimately, it is the domestic economic situation that is spurring many Pakistanis to consider leaving their country. The lure of employment abroad sees thousands tempted to pay the traffickers extortionate fees, in the hope of a better life. The government has no figures for the numbers involved, but AFP reports that Oman has returned more than 30,000 such individuals in just four years.

LOAD-DATE: January 13, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 World Markets Research Limited;
All Rights Reserved

168 of 359 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

January 6, 2005 ThursdayU.S. COOPERATES WITH EUROPE TO COMBAT SEX TRAFFICKING*BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 2591 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. Department of State:

Fact Sheet: U.S. assistance in combating sex trafficking

The following fact sheet on U.S. efforts to combat sex trafficking was compiled from U.S. government sources:
(begin fact sheet)

U.S. Department of State

International Information Programs

Washington, D.C.

January 6, 2005

FACT SHEET: SEX TRAFFICKING, THE UNITED STATES, AND EUROPE

Every nation that fights human trafficking has a friend in the United States.

-- President Bush, July 16, 2004

Trafficking in human beings - often called modern day slavery - involves forced labor, most often of men, women and children in the commercial sex industry as prostitutes, but it can also involve forced labor in factories, fields, restaurants and homes. Traffickers prey on the ignorance or aspirations of people living in war-torn areas or in despair or poverty, often promising them a legitimate job opportunity. Once under the trafficker's control, the victim is then coerced or misled into work beyond legal protection.

Prostitution and related activities fuel the growth of trafficking by providing a facade behind which criminals can exploit the vulnerable. It is a vicious myth that women and children who work as prostitutes have voluntarily chosen such a life for themselves. A 2003 study first published in the scientific Journal of Trauma Practice found that 89 percent of women in prostitution want to escape. And children are also trapped in prostitution - despite the fact that international covenants and protocols impose upon state parties an obligation to criminalize the commercial sexual exploitation of children. For more information on the link between prostitution and sex trafficking, see

<http://www.state.gov/r/pa/ei/rls/38790.htm>

The U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) estimates that 600,000-800,000 people are trafficked globally across international borders, while millions more are trafficked within countries. Trafficking provides organized crime with annual profits in the range of $8-10 billion (Ashcroft, July 16, 2004).

DOJ estimated in June 2004 that 14,500-17,500 people were being trafficked into the United States annually:

3,500-5,500 from Europe and Eurasia

3,500-5,500 from Latin America

5,000-7,000 from East Asia and the Pacific

200-700 from Africa

200- 600 from South Asia

0- 200 from the Near East

Age, Sex and Type of Exploitation - All Regions (DOJ):

33 percent Women - forced or coerced commercial sex

23 percent Girls (under 18) - forced or coerced commercial sex

14 percent Women - other forms of exploitation

11 percent Girls (under 18) - other forms of exploitation

10 percent Boys (under 18) - forced or coerced commercial sex

6 percent Boys (under 18) - other forms of exploitation
 3 percent Men - other forms of exploitation
 1 percent Men - forced or coerced commercial sex

TRAFFICKING BY REGION

Region of origin:

43 percent East Asia and the Pacific
 29 percent Europe and Eurasia
 17 percent Africa
 5 percent Western Hemisphere
 5 percent South Asia
 less than 1 percent Near East

Region of Destination:

40 percent East Asia and the Pacific
 36 percent Europe and Eurasia
 8 percent Near East
 6 percent Africa
 6 percent Western Hemisphere
 4 percent South Asia

WHAT THE UNITED STATES IS DOING TO COMBAT TRAFFICKING

The Trafficking in Persons Protocol:

In January 1999, the United States and Argentina proposed the first international protocol to require governments to criminalize trafficking in persons and to provide a framework for enhanced protection of, and assistance to, victims. The Trafficking in Persons Protocol, as it is called, entered into force in December 2003.

The Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA):

The first federal law aimed specifically at trafficking, TVPA was signed into law on October 28, 2000. TVPA sets harsh penalties for traffickers and allocates $95 million to protect victims and penalize criminals. It requires the U.S. State Department to create annually the "Trafficking in Persons Report" and rate each country's efforts according to its government's efforts to combat trafficking. For a fact sheet on TVPA, see http://www2.acf.hhs.gov/trafficking/about/TVPA_2000.html

Interagency Task Force: In February 2002, pursuant to the TVPA, President George W. Bush established a Cabinet-level Interagency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. This Task Force is chaired by the Secretary of State and includes the Attorney General, the Secretary of Labor, the Secretary of Health and Human Services, the Secretary of Homeland Security, the Director of Central Intelligence, the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, and the Administrator of the U.S. Agency for International Development. The Task Force's responsibilities include coordination and implementation of the Administration's anti-trafficking activities.

The State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons:

The TVPA also created the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, which is headed by Ambassador John R. Miller. This office supported more than 240 anti-trafficking programs in over 75 countries in fiscal year 2003. The types of assistance include the following: economic alternative programs for vulnerable groups; education programs; training for government officials and medical personnel; development or improvement of anti-trafficking laws; provision of equipment for law enforcement; establishment or renovation of shelters, crisis centers, or safe houses for victims; support for voluntary and humane return and reintegration assistance for victims; and support for psychological, legal, medical and counseling services for victims provided by NGOs, international organizations and governments.

International Support:

Since 2001, the United States has provided more than $295 million to support anti-trafficking programs in more than 120 countries, according to the White House. Funding goes to governments and nongovernmental and international organizations to create specialized law enforcement units; train prosecutors and judges; strengthen anti-trafficking laws; provide emergency shelter and care for victims; offer voluntary repatriation assistance; make available long-term rehabilitation assistance and vocational training for victims; legal advocacy; psychological and medical assistance for victims; and launch information campaigns.

The PROTECT Act: In April 2003, Congress passed and President Bush signed into law The PROTECT Act, which provides better tools for combating international sex tourism, commercial sexual exploitation of children, and the federal offenses of child abuse, child kidnapping and child torture. The PROTECT Act enables U.S. law enforcement to prosecute Americans who travel abroad and sexually abuse children.

President Bush addresses UN General Assembly: In September 2003, President Bush underscored his commitment to fight trafficking in a speech to the General Assembly with a pledge of $50 million to support the work of anti-trafficking organizations.

The Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act: In December 2003, Congress passed and President Bush signed the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act strengthening the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000. The new legislation required better statistical monitoring; created a Special Watch List in the State Department's annual report; made convicting and sentencing traffickers as important as investigations when evaluating efforts of countries to combat trafficking; provided new tools for addressing destination countries that may not be doing anything about trafficking.

International Anti-trafficking Initiatives:

Under the leadership of the United States and Norway, NATO adopted a comprehensive plan to help combat worldwide trafficking in persons in Istanbul in June 2004. NATO personnel will support the efforts of authorities in host countries to combat trafficking while working with non-governmental organizations and anti-trafficking experts.

In addition, the United States:

- Vigorously enforces U.S. laws against all those who traffic in persons;
- Strives to raise awareness at home and abroad about human trafficking and how it can be eradicated;
- Identifies, protects, and assists victims exploited by traffickers;
- Reduces the vulnerability of individuals to trafficking through increased education, economic opportunity, and protection and promotion of human rights; and -- Employs diplomatic and foreign policy tools to encourage other nations, the United Nations and other multilateral institutions to work together to draft and enforce laws against trafficking and to hold accountable those engaged in it.

Cooperation with other countries has contributed to the prosecution around the world of nearly 8,000 perpetrators of trafficking crimes, resulting in over 2,800 convictions, according to the White House.

The United States does not deport victims. Under U.S. law victims have the right to stay in the United States, either through "continued presence," which allows victims to stay pending an outcome of a trial, or through a "T" visa, which allows them to stay for up to three years and to thereafter apply for legal permanent status. T-visas and continued presence had been granted to 584 victims as of July 2004.

For a fact sheet on certification for victims of trafficking see

http://www2.acf.hhs.gov/trafficking/about/cert_victims.html

The United States is currently the only country that offers the possibility of permanent residency to victims of trafficking.

THE TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT (TIP)

The best source to begin exploring the Trafficking in Persons Report is the "Introduction" provided by the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. It is available at <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/tiprpt/2004/34021.htm>

This introduction details the human and social toll of trafficking, provides an overview of the causes and effective strategies for combating trafficking, and then describes the 2004 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report.

The Tiers

Tier 1: Countries whose governments fully comply with the Trafficking Victims Protection Act's minimum standards.

Tier 2: Countries whose governments do not fully comply with the act's minimum standards but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards.

Tier 2 Watch List: Countries whose governments do not fully comply with the act's minimum standards but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards, and:

- a. The absolute number of victims of severe forms of trafficking is very significant or is significantly increasing; or
- b. There is a failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons from the previous year; or
- c. The determination that a country is making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with minimum standards was based on commitments by the country to take additional future steps over the next year.

Tier 3: Countries whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so. Six European and Eurasian countries moved up from Tier 3 status in the 2004 Trafficking Report: Bosnia and Herzegovina, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Turkey and Uzbekistan.

WHAT IS THE UNITED STATES DOING ABOUT TRAFFICKING SPECIFICALLY IN EUROPE?

Brief descriptions of the 105 anti-trafficking programs involving the U.S. Department of State, USAID and/or the U.S. Department of Labor can be found at <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/rpt/34182.htm>

For example, the Department of State supports the Angel coalition, which assists NGOs in Russia and is building an international hotline to improve investigations of trafficking rings and to get more convictions in court.

The U.S. Department of Labor estimates that since 1995, more than 88,000 children have been rescued, rehabilitated and/or protected from trafficking through the $125 million in international projects it has funded to combat trafficking. 22,000 of these children have been enrolled in education and training programs.

By working to increase compliance with labor laws, the Labor Department is helping to ensure that vulnerable immigrants are treated fairly. It is U.S. policy that all workers are entitled to full and fair compensation for their labor, regardless of their status.

In Eastern Europe, a Department of Labor-funded project created economic alternatives and job training for at-risk women in seven major cities. That project has provided skills training and job placement services to 20,000 women and young people of legal working age, the age group most vulnerable to traffickers. A DOL-funded project in the Balkans and Ukraine is helping children and young people stay in school and learn marketable skills so they can find jobs when they reach the legal working age, thereby strengthening national policies in those two countries regarding trafficking.

The U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) is certifying trafficking victims so they may qualify for the same assistance available to refugees. HHS is also running a major public awareness campaign to alert victims in the U.S. - some of whom are from Europe or Eurasia - that help is available through the hotline number 888-3737-888.

The Department of Defense has implemented a zero-tolerance stand against any actions by Defense personnel that contribute to human trafficking and is instituting a service-wide mandatory training program.

The National Institute of Justice funded five trafficking studies that have been completed, including a study of trafficking in women from Ukraine.

For a list of active research grants by the National Institute of Justice and selected U.S. government agency research proposals with an international criminal justice component, see:

<http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/nij/international/grants.html>

Public service announcements in the United States have been issued in Spanish, Russian, and Polish to inform victims of their rights.

Following are more fact sheets on specific topics:

The Link Between Prostitution and Sex Trafficking

<http://www.state.gov/r/pa/ei/rls/38790.htm>

How Can I Recognize Trafficking Victims?

<http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/fs/34563.htm>

Best Shelter Practices by Non-Governmental Organizations (NGOs):

<http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/30069.htm>

To End Child Sex Tourism: Fighting Trafficking in Persons

<http://www.state.gov/p/io/fs/2004/36409.htm>

Child Victims of Human Trafficking (including how to recognize) http://www2.acf.hhs.gov/trafficking/about/children_victims.html

Citizen Action: How Can I Help End Modern-Day Slavery?

<http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/fs/35011.htm>

Facts About Human Trafficking

<http://www.state.gov/r/pa/ei/rls/33109.htm>

Certification for victims of Trafficking (T visas, etc.)

http://www2.acf.hhs.gov/trafficking/about/cert_victims.html

Federal Efforts to Assist Victims of Trafficking

http://www2.acf.hhs.gov/trafficking/about/fed_assist.html

Victim Assistance

http://www2.acf.hhs.gov/trafficking/about/victim_assist.html

Operation Predator (targets sexual abusers of children)

<http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2004/07/20040707-10.html>

Presidential Initiatives to Combat Trafficking

<http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2004/07/20040716-3.html>

LOAD-DATE: April 28, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2005 States News Service

169 of 359 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

January 4, 2005 Tuesday 4:30 AM EST

STATE DEPARTMENT SUBMITS INTERIM ASSESSMENT REPORT TO CONGRESS ON CYPRUS' EFFORTS TO COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS

BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 364 wordsDATELINE: NICOSIA, Cyprus

The U.S. Embassy issued the following press release:

On December 22, 2004, the Department of State submitted to Congress its first Interim Assessment of the progress made by countries on the September 2004 Special Watch List to combat trafficking in persons (TIP), pursuant to section 110(b)(3)(B) of the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000, Public Law 106-386, as amended by the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2003, Public Law, 108-193. The full text follows:

The Government of Cyprus has made modest progress in its efforts to combat trafficking; a number of planned government initiatives have yet to be approved and implemented. Two intergovernmental groups meet regularly to discuss anti-trafficking efforts and promote information sharing. The groups expect to officially present to the Government a national plan to combat trafficking and legislation to address trafficking and immigration by the end of 2004. There was a significant increase in trafficking-related arrests in the first 10 months of 2004, 173 vice 26 in 2003. Additionally, 15 cases are being tried under 2000 anti-trafficking legislation, although no one has been convicted.

While police produced press releases on every trafficking in persons-related arrest, the Government has funded no large-scale efforts to educate the public on trafficking. The Government froze the issuing of new cabaret licenses in June 2004. It has prohibited hiring replacements of women on "artiste" visas who are identified as victims and removed from their cabaret employment. Women who are trafficking victims and leave a cabaret now have the right to stay in Cyprus and receive legal advice and financial assistance if they agree to aid the police in prosecuting their former employer or the person who trafficked them to the island. The Government has also set aside several rooms for trafficking victims in government- subsidized homes for the elderly until more permanent shelters can be secured. Victim protection remains inadequate. The Government drafted, but has not yet finalized or distributed, an information sheet to provide to newly arrived female foreign workers.

LOAD-DATE: February 25, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

170 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Facts on File World News Digest

December 31, 2004Thailand;
Police Sent to Muslim South; Attacks Feared; Other Developments*SECTION: Pg. 1085C3LENGTH: 276 wordsOther News

In other news from Thailand:

- . Thaksin August 6 announced a crack-down on human trafficking. Thailand was a major source of and transit point for the global traffic in women and children in sexual servitude. Thaksin blamed corrupt officials and civil servants for "collusion" in the "evil" of trafficking, and called for police to target businesses that profited from the trade, rather than the women who worked in it. The U.S. in June had added Thailand to a watch-list of countries that had allowed human trafficking to continue unabated. [See 2004 U.S. President Bush Defends Iraq War, U.N.'s Annan Urges Rule of Law as U.N. General Assembly Opens; Other Developments]
- . The National Economic and Social Development Board December 7 said Thailand's gross domestic product (GDP) slowed to 6% in the third quarter of 2004 from a year earlier. The board cited a drop in domestic demand and a weaker agricultural sector due to avian influenza, drought and high oil prices. The board projected 6.2% GDP growth for the year, down from its earlier peak projection of 7%, and said inflation had averaged 2.7% through November. [See 2003 Thailand: News in Brief]
- . The country's Human Rights Commission had ordered a temporary halt to work on the 158-mile (255-km) Trans Thai-Malaysia pipeline while the government investigated accusations of violations of social and environmental standards set by the World Bank for lenders, it was reported December 12. The project was about half-funded by British bank Barclays PLC, which human rights activists urged to withdraw its help. [See 2001 Thailand: U.S. Plans to Accept Young Rebel Twins; Other Developments]

LOAD-DATE: January 20, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2004 Facts on File, Inc.

171 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Xinhua General News Service

December 15, 2004 Wednesday 9:30 AM ESTPhilippine gov't urged to step up anti-human trafficking efforts*SECTION: WORLD NEWS; PoliticalLENGTH: 344 wordsDATELINE: MANILA

The United States Wednesday urged the Philippine government to exert more efforts in the fight against human trafficking.

US Ambassador Francis Ricciardone stressed that "more work" should be done by the Philippine government although the Arroyo administration has made progress to eliminate human trafficking.

"There is so much more to go," he told reporters during the turnover ceremony of a 227,000-US-dollar grant from the US government to a non-governmental organization which helps people suffering from injustice and oppression, the International Justice Mission (IJM), to help prosecute cases of human trafficking.

According to a US report released in June, the Philippines is a "source, transit and destination country" for persons trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor.

The Philippines was placed on Tier 2 Watch List due to the government's "failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat severe forms of trafficking, particularly in terms of its weak implementation of the anti-trafficking law and a lack of progress in law enforcement," the report said.

However, Ricciardone said that the significant progress made by the Arroyo administration against the problem is not enough for the Philippines to be removed from a US watch list of countries that have not fully complied with minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking.

"I suppose there's possibility, but what matters is the qualitative assessment of progress and that will be verbal... and I'm sure whatever words Washington comes up with will be based on report from here," he said.

IJM Executive Director Patty Sison-Arroyo said that there is an increasing number of children in the Philippines who succumb to trafficking and who are exploited in prostitution and other forms of commercial sexual exploitation.

"The estimated number is about 60,000 to 75,000 children who are prostituted within the country. This does not reflect children prostituted outside the Philippines," he said.

LOAD-DATE: December 16, 2004LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

172 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Daily Yomiuri (Tokyo)

December 9, 2004 Thursday

Govt moves to stem human trafficking

SOURCE: YomiuriSECTION: Pg. 3LENGTH: 254 words

The government will crackdown on human traffickers and strengthen immigration controls as part of a comprehensive strategy to combat human trafficking that received official endorsement at a meeting of related ministries and agencies at the Prime Minister's Office on Tuesday.

The government hopes that moves to strengthen domestic laws and promote efforts to prevent human trafficking will stem international criticism of Japan's record on the issue.

The country was included on the Tier 2 Watch List, the second-worst of the four categories for trafficking, in the U.S. State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report released in June. A recently released report by the International Labor Organization also criticized the lack of anti-trafficking measures.

The Immigration Control and Refugee Recognition Law will be revised and rules for the entertainer visa strictly enforced.

Traffickers will face a revised Criminal Code and a new law addressing human trafficking. Under the new law, the government will provide the International Criminal Police Organization with information on missing and stolen passports and share information internationally.

The government will also cooperate with private organizations that provide shelter for victims of human trafficking and will extend financial assistance to International Organization for Migration projects that assist victims to return to their home countries. The government will also provide financial assistance for victims to return home.

LOAD-DATE: December 8, 2004LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 The Yomiuri Shimibun

173 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Worldstream

December 7, 2004 TuesdayBill to combat human traffickers in Japan to reach parliament next year*SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 279 wordsDATELINE: TOKYO

Legislation targeting Japanese crime syndicates that transport women from around the world into Japan to work in the sex industry will reach parliament in early 2005, an official said Tuesday.

Japan's crime gangs are believed to be involved in bringing thousands of women and children from Asia, Latin America and Eastern Europe to work in Japan's sex industry, or as forced laborers.

The proposed legislation would revise Japan's criminal laws to include harsh penalties for human traffickers, Justice Ministry official Hideharu Maruyama said.

In June, the U.S. State Department put Japan on its 40-nation watch-list of countries that have failed to fully comply with an international treaty outlawing human trafficking.

Japan will also tighten visa requirements for foreign entertainers to crack down on human trafficking - a move that could affect thousands of women from the Philippines. Of the 130,000 foreign nationals who enter Japan on entertainer visas every year, 80,000 are Filipino women.

Previously, foreigners certified in their native countries as entertainers would automatically qualify for an entertainer visa in Japan. However, under the new visa rules, expected to go into effect next year, applicants will need at least two years experience or education in dance or other performing arts to qualify for an entertainment visa.

The visas - allowing a six-month stay in Japan - apply to professional athletes, musicians, circus performers and other entertainers.

Japan signed the United Nations Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons in December 2002, but critics have said it has done little to stop the trade.

LOAD-DATE: December 8, 2004LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 Associated Press
All Rights Reserved

174 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Daily Yomiuri (Tokyo)

November 25, 2004 Thursday

Govt to crack down on human trafficking

SOURCE: YomiuriSECTION: Pg. 1LENGTH: 565 words

The draft of a comprehensive government action plan to combat human trafficking includes a measure to protect human trafficking victims at private facilities, government sources said Wednesday.

According to the sources, the action plan, which will be finalized in December, calls for tougher immigration controls; strengthening a domestic crackdown on human trafficking, including the creation of related laws; and protection of trafficking victims at private facilities originally established for domestic violence victims.

As the plan puts top priority on protecting human trafficking victims, the government will provide financial assistance to private facilities when commissioning them to do so, the sources said.

The government aims to dispel international criticism that it has turned a blind eye to human trafficking by implementing the plan, the sources said.

Labeling human trafficking a serious violation of human rights that needs to be addressed swiftly and appropriately from a humanitarian viewpoint, the draft stresses the meaning of formulating a general and comprehensive action plan.

So that a protocol on human trafficking can be adopted as soon as possible, the government will seek approval of the action plan during the next ordinary Diet session, the sources said.

To review visa statuses and strengthening screening, the plan includes a proposed revision of a Justice Ministry ordinance related to the Immigration Control and Refugee Recognition Law to abolish a requirement stipulating that foreign entertainers must possess government certifications to obtain entertainment visas to work in Japan, the sources said.

The proposal was made because 80,000 Filipinos annually enter the country with entertainer certifications issued by their government, the sources said.

After the revision of the ministerial ordinance, like entertainers of other countries, Filipinos will have to have studied a particular entertainment field for at least two years before they can apply for a visa, the sources said.

To crack down on human trafficking, the plan calls for a revision of the criminal law to make human trafficking a crime, the sources said.

The government will offer within this year information on lost and stolen Japanese passports to Interpol to share such information with the international community, the sources said.

In addition to using counseling centers for women in the prefectures and dispatching counselors, the plans proposes joining forces with private facilities for victims of domestic violence to protect human trafficking victims, the sources said.

In the event victims cannot afford to pay their airfare home, the plan suggests considering offering state funds for their return, the sources said.

The plan also proposes providing financial assistance to the International Organization for Migration, which promotes the voluntary return of human trafficking victims to their country.

Japan has been criticized internationally for allowing the sex and entertainment industries to traffic foreign women.

In June, the U.S State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report placed Japan on the Tier 2 List, the second-worst of the four categories for trafficking.

The International Labor Organization also released recently a special report pointing out a lack of anti-trafficking measures in this country.

LOAD-DATE: November 24, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 The Yomiuri Shimbun

175 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Herald News (Passaic County, NJ)

November 25, 2004 Thursday
All Editions

Sexual slavery: Real, but largely ignored

BYLINE: By CARLIN ROMANO, Knight Ridder News Service, Wire Services

SECTION: VALUES; Pg. D03

LENGTH: 1102 words

"The Natashas: Inside the New Global Sex Trade" by Victor Malarek; Arcade ($25)

"Woman, Child for Sale: The New Slave Trade in the 21st Century" by Gilbert King; Penguin ($9.95)

Abduct, enslave and kill foreigners to make terrorist points, and world news media not only provide regular coverage but sometimes agree - as in the case of al-Jazeera - to enable the crimes.

Abduct, enslave and kill foreigners to make money off their bodies and there's a good chance you stay under the radar while attracting the best clients around - U.N. peacekeepers, NGO humanitarian workers, U.S. contractors, sleazy businessmen and more.

It's not hard to understand why the mounting global disaster of human trafficking gets so little mass-media attention. Even after decades of marketing and teasing sex in endless ads and programming, most media find it tough to "report" on sex. Particularly sordid sex.

Teenagers might be watching. And we wouldn't want them to see what so many of their peers experience.

The publication of these two modest books - "The "Natashas" by Victor Malarek and "Woman, Child for Sale" by Gilbert King - reminds us of how seamy the whole explosion in human trafficking has become.

"Trafficking in human beings is now the third-largest moneymaking venture in the world," writes Malarek, a Ukrainian Canadian investigative journalist, "after illegal weapons and drugs ... the United Nations estimates that the trade nets organized crime more than $12 billion a year."

Yet its moments in the spotlight are few.

One came on Sept. 23, 2003, when President Bush denounced human trafficking in his annual talk to the U.N. General Assembly.

"Each year," Bush stated, "an estimated 800,000 to 900,000 human beings are bought, sold or forced across the world's borders. ... The victims of the sex trade see little of life before they see the very worst of life - an underground of brutality and lonely fear. ... Governments that tolerate this trade are tolerating a form of slavery."

That glimmer of light on a dark side of globalization hardly triggered an ovation.

That's why Malarek's and King's books usefully complement coverage of more frequently discussed problems on the international scene.

You want to talk about corruption in U.N. missions overseas? Thuggish behavior by U.S. security contractors? Tolerance of brutal criminal elements in places, such as Bosnia, that we don't want to catch fire again?

You don't need the Oil-for-Food program. It's all present in the world of sex slavery.

Malarek focuses on trafficking of women from former Soviet states. King, a New York journalist, examines slavery more broadly and historically. He looks at imprisonment of domestic workers and directs readers to a rich cache of reference materials.

The point both men drive home is simple. Why isn't there more public outrage?

In explaining world sexual slavery, Malarek suggests that many people don't understand the criminality that drives the supply side of the commercial sex business.

They think prostitutes, lap-dancers and the like from impoverished places like Moldova or Ukraine choose to work in places like Bosnia the way, say, French lycee graduates apply to Ph.D. programs in the United States.

To better themselves. To earn crucial money. Freely. Tawdry choices, perhaps, but still choices.

Malarek argues that unscrupulous deception and violence, not choice, is the rule rather than the exception. Thugs take advantage of desperation among impoverished women.

As Malarek relates in horrific detail, women in former Soviet and Eastern European states, particularly naive small-town women, respond to ads promising respectable jobs in countries where they can make more than a few dollars a day.

Once they permit advertisers to pay for their airline tickets and handle their visas, the first step into slavery has begun. On their arrival in Bosnia, or Serbia, or other countries, thugs may seize their documents, lock them in apartments, beat them senseless and threaten their families: all to coerce them into prostitution.

Referred to in the trade as "Natashas" regardless of where they come from, such young women suddenly find themselves without any protection. They've surrendered their passports. They're guarded by goons with guns. They're told (often accurately) that local cops cooperate with the traffickers. They're even ordered to give police "freebies" as bribes.

You remember the "Killing Fields" of Cambodia? Serbia now contains "Breaking Fields," according to Malarek. In Belgrade, apartments exist in which as many as 50 to 100 young foreign women suffer as slaves. They're forced to strip for inspection by traffickers who buy and smuggle them to brothels in Kosovo, or Greece, or Israel - or the United States (into which an estimated 20,000 people a year are trafficked).

Serbian mobsters reportedly beheaded a Ukrainian woman in front of fellow prisoners to enforce their fear.

Thankfully, both Malarek and King also report good news and decent people fighting back.

While the State Department's annual "Trafficking in Persons" list remains too politicized, it keeps some pressure on countries by assigning them to more or less shameful "tiers." The U.N. Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, which came into effect on Dec. 25, 2003, also promises increased action.

Individual do-gooders persist, like the Puglian priest Don Cesare, who founded his Regina Pacis center in 1995 to help women trafficked from Albania to Italy. Philadelphia can take pride in former police officer David Lamb, who turned whistle-blower after a stint in Bosnia for DynCorp, the U.S. firm that recruits U.S. police for U.N. work in world hot spots. (That's the same firm now under criticism for its rough tactics in providing security for Afghanistan's President Hamid Karzai.)

Lamb testified to Congress in 2002 about the participation of U.N. peacekeepers in Bosnia's sex-slave business.

Both Malarek and King make recommendations. Corrupt police from Bosnia to Israel must be punished for tolerating rape and slavery just because the victims have engaged (often against their will) in prostitution. Corrupt peacekeepers must be stopped from converting "humanitarian" missions into sex tourism in places such as Bosnia (where, Malarek reports, 260 bars house up to 5,000 Eastern European women "who've become nothing more than playthings for the international soldiers and staff").

King asks a mind-boggling question: "How could it be that there are twice as many people enslaved today ... (as) were enslaved in an African slave trade that lasted centuries?"

How indeed?

LOAD-DATE: November 30, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: REVIEW

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2004 North Jersey Media Group Inc.,
All Rights Reserved

176 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

November 23, 2004 Tuesday

SCOPE: U.S. awaits results of Japan's actions on human trafficking

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 879 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, Nov. 23

Recovering from the sting of international embarrassment since being placed on the U.S. State Department's 'watch list' for human trafficking in 2004, Japan hopes that the actions it has taken this year to combat the problem will improve its ranking the next time around.

While the United States has seen some progress in Japan's measures to address the issue, it is still waiting to see the results, citing poor victim protection measures, including a lack of women's shelters, lax regulation of entertainment visas and minimal public awareness.

'Good foundation building steps are being taken. But, we still have to await the results,' John Miller, director of the U.S. State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, said in a recent interview, following a week-long fact-finding trip to Japan and South Korea.

In June, the State Department released the '2004 Trafficking in Persons Report,' which placed Japan on the Tier 2 Watch List. Japan is the only industrialized, developed country to be placed on this watch list, with Tier 3 as the worst ranking.

'Japan is a country of destination for men, women, and children trafficked for sexual exploitation,' the report said, adding that victims come mainly from China, South Korea, Thailand, Taiwan and the Philippines, Colombia and Eastern Europe.

Since the release of the report, the Japanese government has moved quickly to establish the prime minister's interagency task force on human trafficking, draft antitrafficking legislation, and meet with nongovernmental organizations and foreign ambassadors, actions that Miller said, 'are all good steps that could lead to very positive results.'

But Miller remains cautious in his assessment of what Japan has done so far. 'On the ground, at this point, we cannot say that more victims are being sheltered, we cannot say, at this point, that more traffickers are being sent to jail or anything like that, so the next several months will be very crucial,' Miller said.

A midterm assessment will be released on Jan. 3. But this will have no effect on Japan's Tier 2 rank, which will remain until the release of the next report next June.

Every year, roughly 600,000 to 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders, 80 percent of victims are female, and 50 percent are children.

One reason for Miller's cautious stance is that he is waiting to see whether the draft antitrafficking legislation, to be sent for Diet approval next year, will include increased victim protection funding.

'If Japan is really going to tackle this issue the way it should, the law, to be progressive and advanced, should deal not only with the prosecutions and the penalties but also with the victim protection, and there should be some specific funding for trafficking victim protection,' Miller said.

Calling entertainment visas a 'sick joke,' Miller remained hopeful that the Japanese government would decrease the number of entertainment visas issued, which are often blatantly exploited by crime syndicates to traffic women.

A draft action plan currently under review by the Japanese government will aim to strengthen requirements for foreign entertainers wishing to obtain visas and decrease the number of visas issued to Filipinos to about 8,000.

Currently, all foreign entertainers including singers, musicians, and dancers who are officially certified in their home countries automatically receive entertainer visas.

According to Japanese Justice Ministry figures, about 130,000 foreign nationals enter Japan annually by entertainment visas, with 80,000 from the Philippines.

Miller also highlighted the need for an ongoing, permanent relationship between NGOs and the Japanese government.

'There have been some meetings but I don't sense, when I met with NGOs, I still don't sense any kind of ongoing relationship,' said Miller. 'I hope that cooperation with the NGOs that has been initiated, blossoms and continues.'

In addition, the lack of shelters for foreign victims, which was criticized in the 2004 report, still persists.

'It's still a true statement that there are only two trafficking victim shelters in Japan, however, the government officials are looking at this,' Miller said.

While some point to the availability of Japan's network of 'women consultative centers,' or domestic abuse shelters, these shelters lack many crucial components to aid foreign trafficking victims.

'The difficulty is, that when you're dealing with trafficking victims that are primarily foreign, you need foreign language skills, you need a certain set of skills that are not necessarily present in the domestic violence centers,' Miller said.

To address the fundamental issue behind sex trafficking, the most common form of trafficking in Japan, all societies around the world must address gender inequality, Miller said.

'Sex trafficking comes about not just because of organized crime or poverty, but it comes about because there is a market, a demand for prostitution,' said Miller. 'If you're going to address the market when it comes to sex trafficking, any society has to look at the attitudes towards gender on the part of males, and it's not just Japan.'

LOAD-DATE: November 24, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 Kyodo News Service

177 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Xinhua General News Service

November 23, 2004 Tuesday 12:19 AM EST

Philippine government urges return of overstaying workers in Japan

SECTION: WORLD NEWSLENGTH: 416 wordsDATELINE: MANILA

The Philippine government Tuesday called for immediate return of overseas Filipino workers, who have overstayed in Japan, before a new immigration law takes effect in the country on Saturday.

Labor and Employment Secretary Patricia Santo Tomas said in a radio interview that overstaying aliens face a maximum fine of 3 million yen, deportation and a 10-year ban from entering Japan, according to the law.

Although amendments to the immigration law allows the provisional stay of illegal aliens who applied for refugee status, illegal aliens guilty of violating the penal code or other laws of Japan are not entitled for a provisional status or refugee status, she said.

Japanese official statistics show that as of January 2004, there have been a total of 31,428 overstaying Filipinos in the country, 10,582 of them are entertainers.

Lorenzo J. Langomez, President of the Philippine Association of Recruitment Agencies Deploying Artists, earlier also warned that allegedly overstaying Filipino overseas performing artists in Japan would be facing either stiff fines or deportation when a newly amended Immigration Control and Refugee Recognition Act is implemented.

"The Philippine overseas entertainment industry is very likely to be severely affected by these developments. They could result in decreased deployment by as much as 50 percent a year and hence, a drastic decrease in the government's estimated one billion dollars in annual foreign exchange earnings," Langomez said.

According to the president, Japan imposes stricter measures against the entry of all foreign entertainers including Filipinos after the US government in June put Japan and the Philippines, among other countries, in the watchlist of countries that allegedly failed to curb human trafficking.

The US State Department report said that entertainer visas were being abused and their holders forced into situations of sexual exploitation, prostitution, or forced labor, which, however, was denied by the Philippines' and Japan's entertainment sectors.

Langomez said that their businesses were "legitimate, lawful, and beneficial to the economies of both countries."

However, Philippine and Japanese recruitment groups said that they would exert "utmost efforts to police their ranks and institute drastic reforms" to get rid of misunderstanding.

They also urged the governments of Japan and the Philippines to see the entertainment industry in a different light.

LOAD-DATE: November 25, 2004LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

178 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Daily Yomiuri (Tokyo)

November 20, 2004 Saturday

Japan blasted over human trafficking

SOURCE: YomiuriSECTION: Pg. 1LENGTH: 448 words

Victims of human trafficking in Japan are not protected and are treated like criminals, according to a special report compiled by the International Labor Organization.

The organization's Tokyo office has begun distributing copies of the report to relevant government and nonprofit organizations.

The report is the second to criticize Japan's handling of human trafficking, following the U.S. State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report, released in June.

The ILO report highlights the lack of antitrafficking measures in the country to protect foreign women forced to work in the sex industry, and ministries and agencies are likely to respond quickly.

Titled "Human Trafficking for Sexual Exploitation in Japan," the report apportioned about 20 percent of its 81 pages to victims in this country.

The report cited case studies compiled by ILO staffers and others who interviewed female victims and says many women did not come to Japan aiming to become prostitutes, but were forced to do so.

According to the report, a 20-year-old Colombian woman came to Japan because she had been told she could work at a personal computer shop, but on her arrival, gangsters took her passport and forced her to work as a prostitute in Tokyo.

A Thai woman who had been promised a job at a Thai restaurant was told by a Japanese man that she owed him 4.8 million yen for travel costs, among other expenses, the report says.

She was forced to work at a bar in a provincial area and have sex with three to four men a day, the report says.

A Filipina who refused to cooperate was beaten and raped by her employer in front of his male employees, according to the report.

Women from Southeast Asia, South America and Eastern Europe have become victims of human trafficking, but Japanese bureaucrats seem to be blind to the issue, regarding them as illegal residents who entered the country of their own will, the report says.

In Japan, "victims of trafficking may be perceived to be voluntary participants in illegal immigration, which thereby removes their right to protection," the report added.

The report points out that "traffickers retain their profits and are rarely prosecuted. When they are, it is not necessarily in proportion to their crimes."

But the report praises the government's attempts to "address human trafficking since the beginning of 2004."

In the U.S. State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report places, Japan was the only industrially developed country to be included in the Tier 2 List for Trafficking. Countries on the list do not meet minimum U.S. standards for combating trafficking, but are making efforts to comply.

LOAD-DATE: November 19, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 The Yomiuri Shimbum

179 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Yomiuri Shimbun

November 19, 2004, Friday

Japan blasted over human trafficking

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 464 words

TOKYO _ Victims of human trafficking in Japan are not protected and are treated like criminals, according to a special report compiled by the International Labor Organization.

The organization's Tokyo office has begun distributing copies of the report to relevant government and nonprofit organizations.

The report is the second to criticize Japan's handling of human trafficking, following the U.S. State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report, which was released in June.

It highlighted a lack of anti-trafficking measures in Japan to protect foreign women forced to work in the sex industry, and ministries and agencies are likely to respond quickly.

Titled "Human Trafficking for Sexual Exploitation in Japan," the report apportioned about 20 percent of its 81 pages to victims in Japan.

The report cited case studies compiled by ILO staffers and others who interviewed female victims and says many women did not come to Japan aiming to become prostitutes, but were forced to do so.

According to the report, a 20-year-old Colombian woman came to Japan because she had been told she could work at a personal computer shop, but on her arrival, gangsters took her passport and forced her to work as a prostitute in Tokyo.

A Thai woman who had been promised a job at a Thai restaurant was told by a Japanese man that she owed him 4.8 million yen for traveling costs, among other expenses, the report says. She was forced to work at a bar in a provincial area and have sex with three to four men a day, the report says.

A Filipina who refused to cooperate was beaten and raped by her employer in front of his male employees, according to the report.

Women from Southeast Asia, South America and Eastern Europe have become victims of human trafficking, but Japanese bureaucrats seem to be blind to the issue, regarding them as illegal residents who entered the country of their own will, the report says.

In Japan, "victims of trafficking may be perceived to be voluntary participants in illegal immigration, which thereby removes their right to protection," the report added.

The report points out that "traffickers retain their profits and are rarely prosecuted. When they are, it is not necessarily in proportion to their crimes."

But the report praises the government's attempts to "address human trafficking since the beginning of 2004."

In the U.S. State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report, Japan was the only industrially developed country to be included in the Tier 2 List for Trafficking. Countries on the list do not meet minimum U.S. standards for combating trafficking, but are making efforts to comply.

(c) 2004, The Yomiuri Shimbun.

Visit the Daily Yomiuri Online at <http://www.yomiuri.co.jp/index-e.htm/>

r is cs ar e

LOAD-DATE: November 19, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

KR-ACC-NO: K3111

JOURNAL-CODE: YS

Copyright 2004 Knight Ridder/Tribune News Service
Knight Ridder/Tribune News Service

180 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

November 17, 2004 Wednesday

LDP eyes tough entertainer visa requirements to combat human traffic

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 445 words

DATELINE: TOKYO, Nov. 17

A ruling Liberal Democratic Party panel decided Wednesday to propose strict requirements for entertainer visas for foreigners to tackle the problem of the trafficking of women.

The panel will propose that the government abolish a Justice Ministry provision allowing foreigners with official certification for musicians, singers and dancers from their home countries to automatically obtain entertainer visas to enter Japan.

Many Asian women who enter with such visas are not trained or qualified as musicians, singers or dancers and the visas are used as a front for human trafficking, as many of them end up working in the sex industry in Japan, the panel said.

According to the ministry, there were about 130,000 foreigners entering Japan last year on entertainer visas, with 80,000 of them coming from the Philippines. Many had official certification for singers and dancers from their government.

However, certification from the Philippine government is relatively easy to obtain and is valid for 10 years, the panel members said.

The ministry had been asking the Philippines to tighten its screening of applicants but the LDP panel thought it is also necessary for the Japanese government to tighten its rules to tackle the problem.

Meanwhile, Japanese and Filipino entertainment business organizations have signed an accord to establish welfare monitoring systems to protect licensed artists, they said.

The measures include abolition of a Japanese system in which foreign musicians, singers and dancers are forced to have dates with their patrons before their performances and accompany them to their club.

The accord also said the two organizations will urge business enterprises which invite such entertainers from abroad to fully realize the shows they promised to promote, and the Philippines to come up with a system not to send any entertainers to promoters which do not promote such shows.

The move by the National Union of Promotion Companies and the Confederated Associations of Licensed Entertainment Agencies of the Philippines is in response to growing criticism that such systems nurture human trafficking, especially after the U.S. State Department put Japan and the Philippines on its watch list of countries involved in human trafficking.

Joji Imai, president of the Japanese union comprising eight associations of foreign artist promotion companies with 860 member companies in Japan, said, 'We decided to come up with such measures to protect foreign entertainers in Japan so that people will not get the wrong idea that those entering Japan on entertainer visas are involved in human trafficking.'

LOAD-DATE: November 18, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

181 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

November 16, 2004 Tuesday

2-day confab on human trafficking in Cambodia begins

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 757 words

DATELINE: PHNOM PENH, Nov. 16

Foreign diplomats, representatives of international organizations and government officials gathered in Phnom Penh on Tuesday to discuss human trafficking in Cambodia and ways to combat the problem.

In an opening speech at a two-day conference, Prime Minister Hun Sen said 'human trafficking is the most serious form of human rights violation.'

About 60 people are taking part in the conference sponsored by the embassies of the United States, Britain, Australia and Thailand.

U.S. Ambassador to Cambodia Charles R. Ray said 'This problem is one that Cambodia has struggled within its recent past as traffickers move human beings into, through, and from Cambodia to other countries in the region.'

'We are here today to look at both regional and local actions that can be taken to combat trafficking in persons,' he said.

According to the government's report, people are trafficked from villages to cities and between provinces. Cambodians are also trafficked across the border to Thailand and Vietnam, where, in some cases, women and girls are trafficked to further destinations -- other parts of Asia, Europe, and the United States.

'Adding to the problem, there are possibly hundreds of thousands of undocumented aliens in Cambodia, notably Vietnamese and Chinese, as well as a growing number of South Asians, many of whom have been victims of trafficking,' the report said.

A recent government study estimates that there are 18,256 sex workers in Cambodia, of whom 66 percent are Cambodians and 33 percent are Vietnamese. Of these people, an estimated 20 percent are involved in human trafficking.

Hun Sen said that the government has stepped up investigations and crackdown operations, in which authorities have arrested 728 suspects and rescued 1,179 victims, 607 of them juveniles.

But the Australian government said Cambodia still lacks political will to deal with the issue.

'Trafficking in Cambodia is facilitated by shortfalls of political will and a weak legal system with inadequate laws and enforcement,' says a report released by the Australian government.

'The typical end purposes of trafficking both to and from Cambodia have been identified as: sex industry; begging, soliciting business or selling flowers; forced or exploit labor; baby buying and child trafficking for adoption,' the report adds.

Although more than 100 government, local and international agencies are working against trafficking in Cambodia, cases of Cambodians who were trafficked into sex work and domestic labor in Malaysia have recently emerged.

According to a British government report, 'Human trafficking has become a significant source of income for increasingly sophisticated criminal enterprises.'

It is estimated that approximately 800,000-900,000 people are trafficked across international borders worldwide. The figure does not include internal trafficking, which some observers estimate would raise the number to more than 2 million, the report said.

'Trafficking in human beings is now the third largest illegal moneymaking venture in the world after illegal weapons and drugs trafficking. Increasingly, it is women and children who are the victims of this odious trade,' the report says.

'Approximately 125,000 women and children from Myanmar, Cambodia, Laos and China have been sold into the Asia-Pacific sex industry alone since 1990,' it says.

An estimated 5,000 children aged 10 to 16 are internally and externally trafficked within and into Cambodia for the purpose of sexual exploitation each year, according to the report.

The Cambodian government also said in its report that an increasing number of elderly women and children are brought to Thailand for begging.

It said there are also cases of young men brought to Thailand for forced labor on fishing boats, and a few known cases of men trafficked to Thailand for forced sex work.

There are also a large number of Cambodians working in the agriculture and construction sectors in Thailand, many of whom find themselves in the situation of bondage and exploitation. It is estimated that there are 88,000 undocumented Cambodians in Thailand, the report says.

An annual report by the United States on human trafficking, which was released recently, has placed Cambodia in Tier 2, which means problems remain but efforts were made to combating trafficking.

Corruption and a weak judiciary remain the most serious impediments to the effective prosecution of traffickers, the report says.

LOAD-DATE: November 16, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 Kyodo News Service

182 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Yomiuri Shimbun

October 27, 2004, Wednesday

Japanese government begins efforts to halt human trafficking

BYLINE: By Yoshimi Nagamine

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 629 words

TOKYO _ The Japanese government has begun talks to establish a legal framework to halt international trafficking of women and children brought to the nation to work as prostitutes, and human-rights groups want the policy to include protection for the victims.

Dealers involved in the human trade hunt for women everywhere to use them as property.

The U.N. Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons adopted in 2000 mandates governments to protect and support victims of human trafficking.

Governments of the nations that signed the protocol have worked out legal measures to punish offenders but protect victims through withholding penalties for engaging in prostitution or illegally residing within their borders.

In the United States, the Trafficking of Victims Protection Act allows victims to remain in the country for some time and receive public support that supplies them with housing, medical and interpretive services, for example.

In France, victims are sent to public-run facilities for shelter and social rehabilitation that is designed to help them return to a life away from prostitution. The center provides the victims with a temporary residency permit on condition that they cooperate with a police investigation and attempt to find legal work.

Although Japan signed the U.N. protocol in 2002, the country has made little progress on the issue.

A Thai woman was persuaded by the Japanese man with whom she lived to return to Thailand when he learned she was pregnant. The man paid her debts to a broker and promised to send her money after she returned. But she lost contact with him and was forced to return to prostitution to support her family, leaving her prey to a local crime syndicate.

This example was presented to lawmakers during a meeting in Tokyo that was organized by a Thailand-based civic group that supports female victims of human trafficking.

In this case, a woman who appeared to have been saved from a terrible situation fell into a similar trap.

Nancy Kassebaum Baker, a former U.S. senator and the wife of Howard Baker Jr., U.S. ambassador to Japan, attended the meeting, at which she emphasized the importance of protecting victims and providing a safe environment in which they can testify against offenders without fear of retribution.

In June, the U.S. State Department released a report titled "Trafficking in Persons Report 2004," in which Japan was the only industrially developed country to be included in the Tier 2 List for Trafficking. Countries on the list do not meet minimum U.S. standards for combating trafficking, but are making efforts to comply.

The listing urged the government to take serious action in summer toward working out a legal framework on the issue.

The Justice Ministry hopes to revise the Criminal Code in next year's ordinary Diet session to enable the government to charge those involved in human trafficking.

But this action does not extend to significantly improving the nation's support system for victims. Police and judicial authorities will devise a plan this year, but the practical effects remain questionable.

The Health, Labor and Welfare Ministry plans to use women's consultation centers run by local governments and private-sector shelters to provide victims with temporary protection. But these facilities focus on assisting victims of domestic violence.

If the government is to rely on private shelters that barely have enough funds to operate, it should begin offering them financial support.

There are numerous problems to solve, including helping the victims return to society and stay away from prostitution.

—

(c) 2004, The Yomiuri Shimbun.

Visit the Daily Yomiuri Online at <http://www.yomiuri.co.jp/index-e.htm/>

r is cs ar e

LOAD-DATE: October 27, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

KR-ACC-NO: K1399

JOURNAL-CODE: YS

Copyright 2004 Knight Ridder/Tribune News Service
Knight Ridder/Tribune News Service

183 of 359 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Latin America - Political Supplied by BBC Worldwide MonitoringOctober 24, 2004, Sunday

Guyana parliament sends trafficking in persons bill to special select committee

SOURCE: Caribbean Media Corporation news agency, Bridgetown, in English 19:06 GMT, 23 Oct 04

LENGTH: 434 words

Text of report by Caribbean Media Corporation (CMC) news agency on 23 October

Georgetown, Guyana: An anti-human trafficking Bill, which provides for lengthy prison terms, forfeiture of offenders' property and the payment of restitution to victims, has gone to a Special Select Committee of Guyana's parliament for evaluation before its final passage through the House.

The six-part Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Bill comes after the US State Department placed Guyana on a watch list of countries that do not comply with a US human trafficking act.

Guyana was placed in Tier 3, the worst category, but was later upgraded to Tier 2 when the Human Services and Social Security Ministry began to implement a series of measures to combat human trafficking.

The US State Department report includes every country where investigators can establish 100 or more victims. Tier 1 countries are those that have victims but are meeting the minimum standards of the act. Tier 2 countries are not meeting the minimum standards but are making significant efforts to comply. Tier 3 governments are not making significant efforts and could face sanctions.

The Parliamentary Select Committee review of the bill is expected improve the measure, which opposition parties have criticized as a clone of the North American legislation.

The bill criminalizes human trafficking, imposing jail terms of up to life imprisonment; forfeiture of property and an order to pay full restitution to victims.

Persons convicted of human trafficking for prostitution purposed shall be fined 2m Guyana dollars (10,000 US dollars) and shall be imprisoned for not more than 10 years. However, the Bill also makes provisions under which the convicted person can be sentenced to a maximum of 20 years in jail.

Convicts must pay restitution "promptly upon the conviction of the defendant" with the proceeds from the property forfeited, and a victim's right to receive compensation shall not be affected if the victim returns to his/her home country or is absent from the jurisdiction for any other reason, the bill states.

Overseas assets of convicted persons can also be subjected to forfeiture. All property of convicted TIP offenders, including money, valuables and other movable and immovable property, "that was either used, intended to be used or was obtained in the course of the crime," shall be forfeited to the State.

Human Services and Social Security Minister Bibi Shadick who piloted the bill said it represents "Guyana's and the government's commitment to combating trafficking in persons."

LOAD-DATE: April 15, 2005

LANGUAGE: English

184 of 359 DOCUMENTS

October 24, 2004, SundayLENGTH: 629 words

TOKYO _ The Japanese government has begun talks to establish a legal framework to halt international trafficking of women and children brought to the nation to work as prostitutes, and human-rights groups want the policy to include protection for the victims.

Dealers involved in the human trade hunt for women everywhere to use them as property.

The U.N. Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons adopted in 2000 mandates governments to protect and support victims of human trafficking.

Governments of the nations that signed the protocol have worked out legal measures to punish offenders but protect victims through withholding penalties for engaging in prostitution or illegally residing within their borders.

In the United States, the Trafficking of Victims Protection Act allows victims to remain in the country for some time and receive public support that supplies them with housing, medical and interpretive services, for example.

In France, victims are sent to public-run facilities for shelter and social rehabilitation that is designed to help them return to a life away from prostitution. The center provides the victims with a temporary residency permit on condition that they cooperate with a police investigation and attempt to find legal work.

Although Japan signed the U.N. protocol in 2002, the country has made little progress on the issue.

A Thai woman was persuaded by the Japanese man with whom she lived to return to Thailand when he learned she was pregnant. The man paid her debts to a broker and promised to send her money after she returned. But she lost contact with him and was forced to return to prostitution to support her family, leaving her prey to a local crime syndicate.

This example was presented to lawmakers during a meeting in Tokyo that was organized by a Thailand-based civic group that supports female victims of human trafficking.

In this case, a woman who appeared to have been saved from a terrible situation fell into a similar trap.

Nancy Kassebaum Baker, a former U.S. senator and the wife of Howard Baker Jr., U.S. ambassador to Japan, attended the meeting, at which she emphasized the importance of protecting victims and providing a safe environment in which they can testify against offenders without fear of retribution.

In June, the U.S. State Department released a report titled "Trafficking in Persons Report 2004," in which Japan was the only industrially developed country to be included in the Tier 2 List for Trafficking. Countries on the list do not meet minimum U.S. standards for combating trafficking, but are making efforts to comply.

The listing urged the government to take serious action in summer toward working out a legal framework on the issue.

The Justice Ministry hopes to revise the Criminal Code in next year's ordinary Diet session to enable the government to charge those involved in human trafficking.

But this action does not extend to significantly improving the nation's support system for victims. Police and judicial authorities will devise a plan this year, but the practical effects remain questionable.

The Health, Labor and Welfare Ministry plans to use women's consultation centers run by local governments and private-sector shelters to provide victims with temporary protection. But these facilities focus on assisting victims of domestic violence.

If the government is to rely on private shelters that barely have enough funds to operate, it should begin offering them financial support.

There are numerous problems to solve, including helping the victims return to society and stay away from prostitution.

(c) 2004, The Yomiuri Shimbun.

Visit the Daily Yomiuri Online at <http://www.yomiuri.co.jp/index-e.htm/>

r is cs ar e

LOAD-DATE: October 24, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

JOURNAL-CODE: YS

Copyright 2004 Knight Ridder/Tribune News Service
Knight Ridder/Tribune News Service

185 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Daily Yomiuri (Tokyo)

October 23, 2004 Saturday

Govt efforts insufficient to halt international human trafficking

BYLINE: Yoshimi Nagamine Yomiuri Shimbun Staff Writer

SOURCE: Yomiuri

SECTION: Pg. 4

LENGTH: 630 words

The government has begun discussing the establishment of a legal framework aimed at preventing the international trafficking of women and children brought to Japan to work as prostitutes, but victim protection and security should not be forgotten.

A Thai woman was persuaded by the Japanese man with whom she lived to return to Thailand when he learned she was pregnant. The man paid her debts to a broker and promised to send her money after she returned. But she lost contact with him and was forced to return to prostitution to support her family, leaving her prey to a local crime syndicate.

This example was presented to lawmakers during a meeting in Tokyo that was organized by a Thailand-based civic group that supports female victims of human trafficking.

In this case, a woman who appeared to have been saved from a terrible situation fell into a similar trap.

Dealers involved in the trade of humans hunt for women everywhere to use them as property.

Nancy Baker, a former U.S. senator and the wife of the U.S. ambassador to Japan, attended the meeting, at which she emphasized the importance of protecting victims and providing a safe environment in which they can testify against offenders without fear of retribution.

The U.N. Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons adopted in 2000 mandates governments to protect and support victims of human trafficking.

Governments of the nations that signed the protocol have worked out legal measures to punish offenders but protect victims through withholding penalties for engaging in prostitution or illegally residing within their borders.

In the United States, the Trafficking of Victims Protection Act allows victims to remain in the country for some time and receive public support that supplies them with housing, medical and interpretive services, for example.

In France, victims are sent to public-run facilities for shelter and social rehabilitation that is designed to help them return to a life away from prostitution. The center provides the victims with a temporary residency permit on condition that they cooperate with a police investigation and attempt to find legal work.

Although Japan signed the U.N. protocol in 2002, the country has made little progress on the issue.

In June, the U.S. State Department released a report titled "Trafficking in Persons Report 2004," in which Japan was the only industrially developed country to be included in the Tier 2 List for Trafficking. Countries on the list do not meet minimum U.S. standards for combating trafficking, but are making efforts to comply.

The listing urged the government to take serious action in summer toward working out a legal framework on the issue.

The Justice Ministry hopes to revise the Criminal Code in next year's ordinary Diet session to enable the government to charge those involved in human trafficking.

But this action does not extend to significantly improving the nation's support system for victims. Police and judicial authorities will devise a plan this year, but the practical effects remain questionable.

The Health, Labor and Welfare Ministry plans to use women's consultation centers run by local governments and private-sector shelters to provide victims with temporary protection. But these facilities focus on assisting victims of domestic violence.

If the government is to rely on private shelters that barely have enough funds to operate, it should begin offering them financial support.

There are numerous problems to solve. Who will help the victims return to society and stay away from prostitution, for example?

Japan should act responsibly and provide those who have been trafficked with support as a nation that has created many such victims.

LOAD-DATE: October 22, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 The Yomiuri Shimbun

186 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

October 22, 2004 Friday

South Africa; Sex Workers 'Could Be Hit By Trafficking Laws'

BYLINE: Cape Argus

LENGTH: 815 words

South Africa is moving rapidly to improve its international reputation in the controversy around human trafficking, but a warning has been sounded that adult sex workers may become scapegoats in the process.

With specialised trafficking legislation firmly on the cards for South Africa, there are fears this could spell an end to "a more humane and socially responsible approach" to adult sex work, and see it branded "trafficking in women".

South Africa is rated a Tier 2 country in the 2004 Trafficking in Persons report, published by the US Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, joining countries whose "governments do not comply with the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorisation Act of 2003's minimum standards", but which are making "a significant effort to do so"

'Legislation must be relevant to local circumstances'

South Africa is a signatory to the UN Protocol on Trafficking in Persons, and hopes to have comprehensive domestic legislation in place by 2006, according to the International Organisation on Migration (IOM).

According to the Geneva-based organisation, South Africa is the regional centre of an intricate trafficking network that recruits women and children from Mozambique, Angola, Malawi, Eastern Europe, Thailand and China.

But Ted Leggett, senior researcher at the Institute for Security Studies in Pretoria, is adamant the extent of South Africa's problem is unclear, with preliminary research here hinging on the direct experience of fewer than 35 people.

The greatest deficiency of this research, Leggett said in the Institute article, "The Risks of Human Trafficking Legislation", lay in the small number of victims interviewed - yet the research was being taken as "authoritative" by international agencies which, he said, needed evidence to support the cause.

Leggett said human trafficking called to mind images of children being snatched from the streets into panel vans, stowed in the holds of cargo ships and dumped in chains in a foreign brothel or work camp far from their mothers' arms.

"It is difficult to imagine a more horrific crime, and no one would question the drive to halt this activity. But definitions of trafficking are broad, and much of the activity that has been labelled trafficking falls far from this scenario," he wrote.

In addition, the offences involved could be prosecuted under existing South African law.

There were also grave dangers in passing a new law if it was poorly drafted; there were some who would argue that all adult sex work was based on the exploitation of economic vulnerability, making it possible that all consensual domestic adult commercial sex work could be deemed "trafficking in women".

"By possibly locking the country into a law enforcement approach to the problem of adult prostitution, the country could lose its flexibility to deal creatively with local problems," he said, pointing to the fact that for nearly 10 years academics and human rights advocates here had championed a movement to see adult commercial sex work decriminalised or legally regulated.

"The consensus has been that criminalising prostitution only locks women deeper into sex work and exacerbates the abuses they suffer - while deterring no one," Leggett wrote.

Writing in the IOM bulletin, Eye on Human Trafficking, Advocate Lowesa Stuurman, law adviser at the South African Law Reform Commission, acknowledged that while this country had an obligation to bring its domestic legislation in line with the Trafficking Protocol, "the extent of the problem of trafficking within and across the borders of South Africa is unclear".

But she argued that the absence of definite statistics was an added reason for urgent promulgation of anti-trafficking legislation.

"Legislation can be used to ensure that the necessary structure is established for determining, on a continuous basis, the extent of the problem," she said.

Stuurman argued too that the trafficking of people for sexual exploitation should not be confused with voluntary involvement in prostitution.

Victims of trafficking forced into prostitution were often afraid to seek help because they feared arrest, they were held under debt bondage and paid very little, if anything.

The Law Reform Commission was currently investigating the possible legalisation, regulation and decriminalisation of adult prostitution however, and legal interventions to combat human trafficking needed to take into account any changes that may result.

But existing legal measures that could be applied to prosecute offences related to trafficking in people were insufficient to combat trafficking, or to effectively protect victims.

"Although South African legislation on trafficking in persons must adhere to international standards, it must be relevant to local circumstances," Stuurman said.

LOAD-DATE: October 22, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

187 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Philadelphia Inquirer

October 20, 2004, Wednesday

Sexual slavery: Real, but largely ignored

BYLINE: By Carlin Romano

SECTION: ENTERTAINMENT NEWS

LENGTH: 1144 words

"The Natashas: Inside the New Global Sex Trade" by Victor Malarek; Arcade ($25)

"Woman, Child for Sale: The New Slave Trade in the 21st Century" by Gilbert King; Penguin ($9.95)

Abduct, enslave and kill foreigners to make terrorist points, and world news media not only provide regular coverage but sometimes agree _ as in the case of al-Jazeera _ to enable the crimes.

Abduct, enslave and kill foreigners to make money off their bodies and there's a good chance you stay under the radar while attracting the best clients around _ U.N. peacekeepers, NGO humanitarian workers, U.S. contractors, sleazy businessmen and more.

It's not hard to understand why the mounting global disaster of human trafficking gets so little mass-media attention. Even after decades of marketing and teasing sex in endless ads and programming, most media find it tough to "report" on sex. Particularly sordid sex.

Teen-agers might be watching. And we wouldn't want them to see what so many of their peers experience.

The publication of these two modest books _ "The "Natashas" by Victor Malarek and "Woman, Child for Sale" by Gilbert King _ reminds us of how seamy the whole explosion in human trafficking has become.

"Trafficking in human beings is now the third-largest moneymaking venture in the world," writes Malarek, a Ukrainian Canadian investigative journalist, "after illegal weapons and drugs ... the United Nations estimates that the trade nets organized crime more than $12 billion a year."

Yet its moments in the spotlight are few.

One came on Sept. 23, 2003, when President Bush denounced human trafficking in his annual talk to the U.N. General Assembly.

"Each year," Bush stated, "an estimated 800,000 to 900,000 human beings are bought, sold or forced across the world's borders. ... The victims of the sex trade see little of life before they see the very worst of life _ an underground of brutality and lonely fear. ... Governments that tolerate this trade are tolerating a form of slavery."

That glimmer of light on a dark side of globalization hardly triggered an ovation.

That's why Malarek's and King's books usefully complement coverage of more frequently discussed problems on the international scene.

You want to talk about corruption in U.N. missions overseas? Thuggish behavior by U.S. security contractors? Tolerance of brutal criminal elements in places, such as Bosnia, that we don't want to catch fire again?

You don't need the Oil-for-Food program. It's all present in the world of sex slavery.

Malarek focuses on trafficking of women from former Soviet states. King, a New York journalist, examines slavery more broadly and historically. He looks at imprisonment of domestic workers and directs readers to a rich cache of reference materials.

The point both men drive home is simple. Why isn't there more public outrage?

In explaining world sexual slavery, Malarek suggests that many people don't understand the criminality that drives the supply side of the commercial sex business.

They think prostitutes, lap-dancers and the like from impoverished places like Moldova or Ukraine choose to work in places like Bosnia the way, say, French lycee graduates apply to Ph.D. programs in the United States.

To better themselves. To earn crucial money. Freely. Tawdry choices, perhaps, but still choices.

Malarek argues that unscrupulous deception and violence, not choice, is the rule rather than the exception. Thugs take advantage of desperation among impoverished women.

As Malarek relates in horrific detail, women in former Soviet and Eastern European states, particularly naive small-town women, respond to ads promising respectable jobs in countries where they can make more than a few dollars a day.

Once they permit advertisers to pay for their airline tickets and handle their visas, the first step into slavery has begun. On their arrival in Bosnia, or Serbia, or other countries, thugs may seize their documents, lock them in apartments, beat them senseless, and threaten their families: all to coerce them into prostitution.

Referred to in the trade as "Natashas" regardless of where they come from, such young women suddenly find themselves without any protection. They've surrendered their passports. They're guarded by goons with guns. They're told (often accurately) that local cops cooperate with the traffickers. They're even ordered to give police "freebies" as bribes.

You remember the "Killing Fields" of Cambodia? Serbia now contains "Breaking Fields," according to Malarek. In Belgrade, apartments exist in which as many as 50 to 100 young foreign women suffer as slaves. They're forced to strip for inspection by traffickers who buy and smuggle them to brothels in Kosovo, or Greece, or Israel _ or the United States (into which an estimated 20,000 people a year are trafficked).

Serbian mobsters reportedly beheaded a Ukrainian woman in front of fellow prisoners to enforce their fear.

Thankfully, both Malarek and King also report good news and decent people fighting back.

While the State Department's annual "Trafficking in Persons" list remains too politicized, it keeps some pressure on countries by assigning them to more or less shameful "tiers." The U.N. Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, which came into effect on Dec. 25, 2003, also promises increased action.

Individual do-gooders persist, like the Puglian priest Don Cesare, who founded his Regina Pacis center in 1995 to help women trafficked from Albania to Italy. Philadelphia can take pride in former police officer David Lamb, who turned whistle-blower after a stint in Bosnia for DynCorp, the U.S. firm that recruits U.S. police for U.N. work in world hot spots. (That's the same firm now under criticism for its rough tactics in providing security for Afghanistan's President Hamid Karzai.)

Lamb testified to Congress in 2002 about the participation of U.N. peacekeepers in Bosnia's sex-slave business.

Both Malarek and King make recommendations. Corrupt police from Bosnia to Israel must be punished for tolerating rape and slavery just because the victims have engaged (often against their will) in prostitution. Corrupt peacekeepers must be stopped from converting "humanitarian" missions into sex tourism in places such as Bosnia (where, Malarek reports, 260 bars house up to 5,000 Eastern European women "who've become nothing more than playthings for the international soldiers and staff").

King asks a mind-boggling question: "How could it be that there are twice as many people enslaved today ... (as) were enslaved in an African slave trade that lasted centuries?"

How indeed?

—

(c) 2004, The Philadelphia Inquirer.

Visit Philadelphia Online, the Inquirer's World Wide Web site, at <http://www.philly.com/>

r is cs ar e

LOAD-DATE: October 20, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

KR-ACC-NO: K6931

JOURNAL-CODE: PH

Copyright 2004 Knight Ridder/Tribune News Service
Knight Ridder/Tribune News Service

188 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Philadelphia Inquirer

Found on Philly.com
The Philadelphia Inquirer

OCTOBER 17, 2004 Sunday ADVANCE EDITION

Sexual slavery: Real, but largely ignored; Two books fault media, international officials.

BYLINE: Carlin Romano

SECTION: FEATURES MAGAZINE: ENTERTAINMENT; Pg. H14

LENGTH: 1147 words

The Natashas

Inside the New Global Sex Trade

By Victor Malarek

Arcade. 303 pp. $25

Woman, Child for Sale

The New Slave Trade in the 21st Century

By Gilbert King

Penguin. 232 pp. $9.95

Abduct, enslave and kill foreigners to make terrorist points, and world news media not only provide regular coverage, but sometimes agree - as in the case of Al-Jazeera - to enable the crimes.

Abduct, enslave and kill foreigners to make money off their bodies and there's a good chance you stay under the radar while attracting the best clients around - U.N. peacekeepers, NGO humanitarian workers, U.S. contractors, sleazy businessmen, and more.

It's not hard to understand why the mounting global disaster of human trafficking gets so little mass-media attention. Even after decades of marketing and teasing sex in endless ads and programming, most media find it tough to report on sex. Particularly sordid sex.

Teenagers might be watching. And we wouldn't want them to see what so many of their peers experience.

The publication of these two modest books - The Natashas by Victor Malarek and Woman, Child for Sale by Gilbert King - reminds us of how seamy the whole explosion in human trafficking has become.

"Trafficking in human beings is now the third-largest moneymaking venture in the world," writes Malarek, a Ukrainian Canadian investigative journalist, "after illegal weapons and drugs . . . the United Nations estimates that the trade nets organized crime more than $12 billion a year."

Yet its moments in the spotlight are few.

One came on Sept. 23, 2003, when President Bush denounced human trafficking in his annual talk to the U.N. General Assembly.

"Each year," Bush stated, "an estimated 800,000 to 900,000 human beings are bought, sold or forced across the world's borders. . . . The victims of the sex trade see little of life before they see the very worst of life - an underground of brutality and lonely fear. . . . Governments that tolerate this trade are tolerating a form of slavery."

That glimmer of light on a dark side of globalization hardly triggered an ovation.

That's why Malarek's and King's books usefully complement coverage of more frequently discussed problems on the international scene.

You want to talk about corruption in U.N. missions overseas? Thuggish behavior by U.S. security contractors? Tolerance of brutal criminal elements in places, such as Bosnia, that we don't want to catch fire again?

You don't need the Oil-for-Food program. It's all present in the world of sex slavery.

Malarek focuses on trafficking of women from former Soviet states. King, a New York journalist, examines slavery more broadly and historically. He looks at imprisonment of domestic workers and directs readers to a rich cache of reference materials.

The point both men drive home is simple. Why isn't there more public outrage?

In explaining world sexual slavery, Malarek suggests that many people don't understand the criminality that drives the supply side of the commercial sex business.

They think prostitutes, lap-dancers and the like from impoverished places like Moldova or Ukraine choose to work in places like Bosnia the way, say, French lycee graduates apply to Ph.D. programs in the United States.

To better themselves. To earn crucial money. Freely. Tawdry choices, perhaps, but still choices.

Malarek argues that unscrupulous deception and violence, not choice, is the rule rather than the exception. Thugs take advantage of desperation among impoverished women.

As Malarek relates in horrific detail, women in former Soviet and Eastern European states, particularly naive small-town women, respond to ads promising respectable jobs in countries where they can make more than a few dollars a day.

Once they permit advertisers to pay for their airline tickets and handle their visas, the first step into slavery has begun. On their arrival in Bosnia, or Serbia, or other countries, thugs may seize their documents, lock them in apartments, beat them senseless, and threaten their families: all to coerce them into prostitution.

Referred to in the trade as "Natashas" regardless of where they come from, such young women suddenly find themselves without any protection. They've surrendered their passports. They're guarded by goons with guns. They're told (often accurately) that local cops cooperate with the traffickers. They're even ordered to give police "freebies" as bribes.

You remember the "Killing Fields" of Cambodia? Serbia now contains "Breaking Fields," according to Malarek. In Belgrade, apartments exist in which as many as 50 to 100 young foreign women suffer as slaves. They're forced to strip for inspection by traffickers who buy and smuggle them to brothels in Kosovo, or Greece, or Israel - or the United States (into which an estimated 20,000 people a year are trafficked).

Serbian mobsters reportedly beheaded a Ukrainian woman in front of fellow prisoners to enforce their fear.

Thankfully, both Malarek and King also report good news and decent people fighting back.

While the State Department's annual "Trafficking in Persons" list remains too politicized, it keeps some pressure on countries by assigning them to more or less shameful "tiers." The U.N. Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, which came into effect on Dec. 25, 2003, also promises increased action.

Individual do-gooders persist, like the Puglian priest Don Cesare, who founded his Regina Pacis center in 1995 to help women trafficked from Albania to Italy. Philadelphia can take pride in former police officer David Lamb, who turned whistle-blower after a stint in Bosnia for DynCorp, the U.S. firm that recruits U.S. police for U.N. work in world hot spots. (That's the same firm now under criticism for its rough tactics in providing security for Afghanistan's President Hamid Karzai.)

Lamb testified to Congress in 2002 about the participation of U.N. peacekeepers in Bosnia's sex-slave business.

Both Malarek and King make recommendations. Corrupt police from Bosnia to Israel must be punished for tolerating rape and slavery just because the victims have engaged (often against their will) in prostitution. Corrupt peacekeepers must be stopped from converting "humanitarian" missions into sex tourism in places such as Bosnia (where, Malarek reports, 260 bars house up to 5,000 Eastern European women "who've become nothing more than playthings for the international soldiers and staff").

King asks a mind-boggling question: "How could it be that there are twice as many people enslaved today . . . [as] were enslaved in an African slave trade that lasted centuries?"

How indeed?

Contact book critic Carlin Romano at 215-854-5615 or cromano@phillynews.com. Read his recent work at <http://go.philly.com/carlinromano>.

LOAD-DATE: September 1, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

NOTES: On Books

Copyright 2004 Philadelphia Newspapers, LLC
All Rights Reserved

189 of 359 DOCUMENTS

BBC Summary of World Broadcasts

October 14, 2004, Thursday

NGOs urge Japanese measures against human trafficking

SOURCE: Kyodo News Service, Tokyo, in English 1134 gmt 14 Oct 04LENGTH: 470 words

Text of report by May Masangkay, carried in English by Japanese news agency Kyodo

Tokyo, 14 October: A nationwide liaison network of human rights groups urged the Japanese government Thursday 14 October to build an effective legal framework to prevent human trafficking mainly of woman from abroad, provide relief to victims and punish perpetrators.

The efforts of the Tokyo-based Japan Network Against Trafficking in Persons come at a time the Japanese government is trying to step up measures to fight human trafficking after the US State Department in a report in June downgraded its assessment on Japan and put the country on a special watch list.

In a proposal issued Thursday, the network called for the establishment of human trafficking victims' recovery support centres at some 11 locations nationwide including Hokkaido, Tokyo and Okinawa based on the coordination between the government and private groups.

"Human trafficking victims are in dire need of psychological care, but centres that provide them with such care are scarce," Keiko Otsu, co-chairwoman of the network and director of Women's Shelter HELP, told an audience of lawmakers, lawyers, media members and human rights campaigners during a gathering at a House of Representatives building.

Otsu said several experts who have knowledge about human trafficking should be placed at each centre to identify the authenticity of people's claims as victims of human trafficking, and that the number of interpreters for various languages should be increased to support the victims.

According to the US report, "Japan is a destination country for Asian, Latin American and Eastern European women and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labour and sexual exploitation." Human rights groups say many women from Thailand, the Philippines and Colombia may be victims of trafficking.

The proposal also said legal rights of trafficking victims should be protected, such as by freeing the centre of any obligation to report to immigration authorities if a victim is an illegal resident, and that victims should not be punished.

On the government level, the network also called for the creation of a countermeasures headquarters headed by the prime minister to pursue a comprehensive package of steps to eliminate human trafficking, as well as an in-house special working-level group that could train law enforcement officials.

The government has said it will compile an "action plan" by the end of this year, but House of Councillors lawmaker Mieko Kamimoto, who also attended the meeting, criticized as slow-paced the way the government is addressing the human trafficking issue.

Japan has dealt with cases of human trafficking under existing laws but does not have a law that directly bans human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: October 14, 2004LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 The British Broadcasting Corporation

190 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

October 14, 2004 Thursday

NGOs call for better legal framework on human trafficking in Japan

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 453 wordsDATELINE: TOKYO, Oct. 14

A nationwide liaison network of human rights groups urged the Japanese government Thursday to build an effective legal framework to prevent human trafficking mainly of woman from abroad, provide relief to victims and punish perpetrators.

The efforts of the Tokyo-based Japan Network Against Trafficking in Persons come at a time the Japanese government is trying to step up measures to fight human trafficking after the U.S. State Department in a report in June downgraded its assessment on Japan and put the country on a special watch list.

In a proposal issued Thursday, the network called for the establishment of human trafficking victims' recovery support centers at some 11 locations nationwide including Hokkaido, Tokyo and Okinawa based on the coordination between the government and private groups.

'Human trafficking victims are in dire need of psychological care, but centers that provide them with such care are scarce,' Keiko Otsu, co-chairwoman of the network and director of Women's Shelter HELP, told an audience of lawmakers, lawyers, media members and human rights campaigners during a gathering at a House of Representatives building.

Otsu said several experts who have knowledge about human trafficking should be placed at each center to identify the authenticity of people's claims as victims of human trafficking, and that the number of interpreters for various languages should be increased to support the victims.

According to the U.S. report, 'Japan is a destination country for Asian, Latin American and Eastern European women and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labor and sexual exploitation.' Human rights groups say many women from Thailand, the Philippines and Colombia may be victims of trafficking.

The proposal also said legal rights of trafficking victims should be protected, such as by freeing the center of any obligation to report to immigration authorities if a victim is an illegal resident, and that victims should not be punished.

On the government level, the network also called for the creation of a countermeasures headquarters headed by the prime minister to pursue a comprehensive package of steps to eliminate human trafficking, as well as an in-house special working-level group that could train law enforcement officials.

The government has said it will compile an 'action plan' by the end of this year, but House of Councillors lawmaker Mieko Kamimoto, who also attended the meeting, criticized as slow-paced the way the government is addressing the human trafficking issue.

Japan has dealt with cases of human trafficking under existing laws but does not have a law that directly bans human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: October 14, 2004LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

191 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

October 7, 2004

State Dept. Urges U.S., Mexico Fight Human Trafficking Together; About 17,000 people trafficked into United States from Mexico each year

BYLINE: Eric Green, Washington File Staff Writer

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 853 words

Washington -- An official with the U.S. State Department has called on the United States and Mexico to work together to end the global problem of trafficking in persons, a crime against humanity that has been likened to "modern-day slavery."

Speaking October 4 in Tijuana, Mexico, John Miller, the State Department's director of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, said the cooperation is needed because about 17,000 people are being "trafficked" from Mexico into the United States each year. That number includes migrant workers, and women and children brought into the United States for purposes of commercial and sexual exploitation.

Miller indicated that even though U.S.-Mexican cooperation is important, Mexico also must work on its own to eradicate the country's internal problem with trafficking, with estimates pointing to 16,000-20,000 Mexican and Central American child sex victims in Mexico, found largely in border, urban, and tourist areas. For instance, the State Department says Mexico needs to expand cooperation on its land borders with Guatemala to identify trafficking cases that occur as part of cross-border illegal migration.

Miller said that although some of the people trafficked across the U.S.-Mexican border are from Mexico and elsewhere in Latin America such as Honduras, Guatemala, El Salvador and Colombia, others are from Asia or Europe who pass through Mexico on their way to the United States. Miller said that even though Mexico needs to do much more to combat trafficking in persons, it is also a U.S. national security problem because people are being trafficked and enslaved in the United States.

The official said the United States is anxious to work with Mexico to increase cooperation on issues related to trafficking in persons. One way to increase joint efforts is through what is called the Senior Law Enforcement Plenary, which the State Department says serves as the "primary coordinating mechanism" for U.S.-Mexican law enforcement cooperation. Bilateral cooperation, the State Department says, includes the exchange of information and coordination between personnel from the United States and Mexico to ensure a "seamless enforcement effort" against criminal groups engaged in human trafficking.

In Tijuana, Miller spoke at the inauguration of a State Department-funded center for at-risk children, designed to address every aspect of human trafficking and exploitation of people. The center aims to provide counseling and support to children taken from traffickers and is part of a joint U.S.-Mexico project, based in San Diego, California, called the Bilateral Safety Corridor Coalition to prevent and intervene in the commercial and sexual exploitation of women and children, while advocating for all exploited persons.

One of the main goals of the coalition is to renovate or construct shelters in cities along the U.S.-Mexico border to house and assist identified trafficking victims. Another component is to increase awareness of the trafficking problem in the border region through stepped-up publicity campaigns.

The coalition helped arrange a September 30-October 1 conference in San Diego called "Closing the Borders to Human Trafficking: Best Practices," in which the State Department's Miller gave opening remarks, and which included participants from other U.S. government agencies and nongovernmental organizations, as well as groups from other nations.

Human trafficking is often linked to organized crime and its profits help fuel other illegal activity, the State Department says, adding that human trafficking is among the world's fastest-growing criminal activities. Annually, at least 600,000-800,000 people are trafficked across borders worldwide, the State Department said.

President Bush announced in July that eight countries, including Mexico and Brazil, had been selected to receive a total of $50 million in U.S. aid to fight human trafficking, with Mexico slated to eventually receive about $8.2 million of that amount. The assistance funds would be used to support nongovernmental organizations and U.S. agencies working abroad that rescue women and children from bondage and give them shelter, medical treatment and rehabilitation.

The State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report for 2004 said the Mexican government does not "fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so." The report put Mexico on a "Tier II watch list" for failing to do more against the trafficking of humans by criminal elements.

The report said many cross-border trafficking victims are difficult to identify because their cases are "shrouded" in a "clandestine transnational [criminal] movement."

More information about human trafficking is available online from the State Department at: <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/>
(The Washington File is a product of the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: October 7, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

192 of 359 DOCUMENTS

BBC Summary of World Broadcasts

October 1, 2004, FridayUSA upgrades Guyana's Trafficking In Persons status but only to Tier 2SOURCE: Caribbean Media Corporation news agency, Bridgetown, in English 1841 gmt 30 Sep 04LENGTH: 258 words

Text of report by Caribbean Media Corporation (CMC) news agency on 30 September

Georgetown, Guyana: The United States, citing Guyana's efforts at dealing with the crime of Trafficking In Persons (TIP), has upgraded the country's status, according to an official statement issued here.

"On the basis of positive actions undertaken by the Government of Guyana since the end of the 2004 reporting period, the deputy secretary of state has determined that the government of Guyana does not yet fully comply with the act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but is making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance," a US State Department release issued through the Government Information Agency (Gina) here said.

The US agency has upgraded Guyana to Tier 2, after downgrading it to Tier 3 citing a lack of government compliance with the minimum standards and simultaneously making no effort to do so.

The new placement indicates that the government still does not fully comply with the minimum standards. However, the State Department has deemed that the country is making strides to comply.

The Guyana government established an Anti-Trafficking Taskforce, which spearheaded a series of national sensitization programmes in the upgrading quest. The country has already tabled a comprehensive anti-TIP Bill, which will be debated when parliament reconvenes in October.

Among plans for protection of victims, the government will direct resources to a state-run shelter to work with TIP victims.

LOAD-DATE: October 1, 2004LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 The British Broadcasting Corporation

193 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Daily Yomiuri (Tokyo)

September 26, 2004 Sunday

U.S. diplomat urges Japan to combat human trafficking

SOURCE: YomiuriSECTION: Pg. 3LENGTH: 376 wordsDATELINE: OSAKA

Ann Kambara, counselor for Labor Affairs at the U.S. Embassy in Japan, encouraged Japan to draw up comprehensive measures to tackle international human trafficking in a recent lecture at the U.S. Consulate General in Osaka.

The American Center invited Kambara and Yukiko Oishi, probation officer of the U.N. Asia and Far East Institute for the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders in Tokyo, as lecturer and moderator, respectively, to discuss the prevention and eradication of trafficking in response to the U.S. State Department's recently released Trafficking in Persons Report 2004 that placed Japan on the Tier 2 Watch List.

Kambara said that human trafficking was a grave issue, affecting not only domestic public security but also international relationships, adding, "The issue is becoming more important for Japan, too," she said.

Although Japan signed the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children in December 2002, supplementing the U.N. Convention against Transnational Organized Crime, there has not been sufficient awareness to encourage the Japanese government to develop legislation to control human trafficking, Kambara said.

Along with the United States, Japan is one of the primary destinations for women and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labor and sexual exploitation.

Consequently, she added, criminals involved in human trafficking might regard Japan as a good place to do business.

Explaining why the United States has urged Japan to work harder on the issue, she said: "We care about Japan because Japan is the strongest of allies. We work together in a number of very good ways, and we certainly want to work together in combatting trafficking. That's the priority for us."

She added that the United States was not alone in wanting Japan to make an effort to prevent trafficking, saying that she has also heard about the issue from concerned Japanese citizens.

According to Kambara, antitrafficking measures in the United States, especially the Trafficking Victims Protection Act that was introduced in October 2000, have as their theme three P's: prevention of crime, protection of victims and prosecution of criminals.

LOAD-DATE: September 25, 2004LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

194 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

September 16, 2004 Thursday 5:10 AM GMT

Thai officials free 18 Laotian girls from sweatshop slavery

LENGTH: 362 wordsDATELINE: BANGKOK Sept 16

Thai officials rescued 18 Laotian girls from slavery at a sweatshop in Bangkok where they were forced to work 18-hour days, were regularly beaten and badly fed, according to officials and reports.

The girls, aged between 11 and 14, were forced to live crammed together inside a secret underground chamber hidden by a pile of old cloth and wood and watched over by a guard dog, officials said.

The children's families had paid up to 5,000 baht each (120 dollars) for them to be smuggled into Thailand from Laos with the promise of work. But they were kept as slave labourers at the makeshift jeans factory and never paid.

They were promised 200 baht a day -- just above the Bangkok minimum wage -- but were not paid for months because the sweatshop owners said the money was for food and rent.

"This was the third time that this factory was raided," said Vallop Ploythaptim, permanent secretary of Thailand's ministry of social development and human security. "Some of the girls said they had been working there for four or five months."

Two girls escaped from the factory in June and told police they were beaten, badly fed and forced to work from 6am to midnight, according to Thai officials quoted by the Nation newspaper.

Thailand in August announced it was cracking down on human trafficking, two months after the US put the country on a watchlist for its failure to stamp out the illegal trade.

Human trafficking is considered a surging crisis in Asia, and several countries of the region have been strongly criticized for failing to recognize the scale of the problem.

The International Labour Organisation warned last year that hundreds of Laotian children were feared to have fallen victim to human traffickers after their families lost track of where they were.

The US State Department people trafficking report for 2004 said the totalitarian regime failed to police its borders adequately and attempts to prosecute traffickers were "weak and uncoordinated".

Some 800,000 men, women and children are estimated to be trafficked annually across borders worldwide in a billion-dollar illicit trade. Most victims of trafficking are severely exploited and many are sexually abused.

LOAD-DATE: September 17, 2004LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

195 of 359 DOCUMENTS

International Enforcement Law Reporter

September, 2004

A. House Subcommittee Holds Hearing on Trafficking in Persons(fn. 1)
(fn. 1) This article is by and large a summary of the June 24, 2004 Hearing on Trafficking in Persons before the Subcommittee on International Terrorism, Nonproliferation and Human Rights. The testimonies can be found in their entirety at http://wwwc.house.gov/international_relations/ithrhear108.htm

BYLINE: Lindsay Nordell

SECTION: III. HUMAN TRAFFICKING; Vol. 20, No. 9

LENGTH: 987 words

On June 24, 2004, a review of the fourth annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report was held before the Subcommittee on International Terrorism, Nonproliferation & Human Rights. Trafficking in persons is often considered the modern-day equivalent of slavery, and many countries worldwide are taking steps to stem its increase. International human trafficking remains an especially dire problem, with 600,000 to 800,000 people falling victim to it each year.(fn. 1) Of these, 80 percent are female and 50 percent are children.(fn. 3)

-----Start of Footnote-----

(fn. 1)2 see Testimony of John R. Miller. http://wwwc.house.gov/international_relations/108/mil062404.htm
(fn. 3) ibid

-----End of Footnote-----

1. Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act

The Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA), which mandates the annual TIP Report, was passed by Congress in 2000, and the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act (TVPRA), authorizing, among other things, $200 million to fight against incoming US human trafficking, was passed in 2003. The TVPA created a tier system that ranks countries based on their level of proactiveness in addressing the problem of human trafficking within their borders. Governments that fully follow the TVPA's minimum protocol for the elimination of trafficking are placed on Tier 1. Countries which are not meeting the minimum protocol but are nonetheless taking action to eliminate trafficking are placed on Tier 2. Tier 3 consists of countries that neither meet the minimum protocol nor are making any efforts in that direction.

In order to identify countries that are in danger of falling from Tier 2 to Tier 3, the 2003 TVPRA added another tier. The so-called Tier 2 Watch List allows policy makers to distinguish between strong and weak Tier 2 countries, and to be "able to give a stern warning to those Tier 2 countries that fell backward while still taking some significant action."(fn. 4)

-----Start of Footnote-----

(fn. 4) ibid

-----End of Footnote-----

2. Effective Methods of Combating Human Trafficking

Michele Clark, co-director of the Protection Project at Johns Hopkins University, pointed to some disappointing trends in human trafficking. Of the 131 countries surveyed in the TIP Report, only 68 have any legislation regarding human trafficking. Even among these 68 countries, enforcement is lax and funding problematic.

Another difficulty in combating human trafficking, particularly international trafficking, is the varying interpretation across countries of victims of trafficking. In order to effectively combat human trafficking, she argues, legislation must take account of this. It must define human trafficking, and it must define it in terms that designate the victim as such and not as a criminal. "To law enforcement officials," Clark says, "they remain cabaret dancers or prostitutes and not victims of a crime."

3. Effect of the Report

Generally, the report has been met with approval by countries that are profiled in it. Japan was placed on Tier 2 this year, but its media has reacted well to the placement. Pakistan has also declared that its Tier 2 ranking has caused it to work on improving itself. United Arab Emirates, which received a worse rating than it had the previous year, also used the ranking as a motivation for change.(fn. 2)

-----Start of Footnote-----

(fn. 2)5 Ibid .

-----End of Footnote-----

The TIP report is also reaping the benefits of the legal enforcement powers bestowed on the TVPRA in 2003. The 2003 TVPRA allows civil suits to be brought against traffickers under the Racketeering Influenced and Corrupt Organization statue.(fn. 6) "I am particularly pleased that Director Miller took advantage of the new diplomatic tools provided to the executive branch by Congress when it reauthorized the Trafficking Victims Protection Act last year," Holly Burkhalter, Policy Director of Physicians for Human Rights said in her testimony. "The new Act's heavier emphasis on law enforcement and tangible outcomes and the creation of the Watch List add to the diplomatic tool kit and heighten the prospect that governments that fail to take appropriate steps will be subjected to economic pressure as well in the form of reduced foreign assistance."(fn. 3)

-----Start of Footnote-----

(fn. 6) See US Department of Health and Human Services Fact Sheet: Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000. http://www.acf.hhs.gov/trafficking/about/TVPA_2000.html

(fn. 3)7 See http://wwwc.house.gov/international_relations/108/bur062404.htm

-----End of Footnote-----

4. International Accountability

The purpose of the TIP report is to provide accountability,(fn. 8) particularly international accountability. In the global community it is easy to let an international problem, such as trafficking of persons across borders, slip through the cracks, and in the dynamic field of international criminal enforcement there are a lot of cracks. By having a system that ranks countries by their ability and willingness to address human trafficking, it brings a country's problems to its own attention and to the attention of the international community.

-----Start of Footnote-----

(fn. 8) See Testimony of Michele A. Clark. http://wwwc.house.gov/international_relations/108/cla062404.htm

-----End of Footnote-----

LOAD-DATE: August 19, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

196 of 359 DOCUMENTS

International Enforcement Law Reporter

September 2004

House Subcommittee Holds Hearing on Trafficking in Persons n1

n1 This article is by and large a summary of the June 24, 2004 Hearing on Trafficking in Persons before the Subcommittee on International Terrorism, Nonproliferation and Human Rights. The testimonies can be found in their entirety at http://wwwc.house.gov/international_relations/ithrhear108.htm

BYLINE: Lindsay Nordell

SECTION: HUMAN TRAFFICKING; Vol. 20, No. 9

LENGTH: 854 words

On June 24, 2004, a review of the fourth annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report was held before the Subcommittee on International Terrorism, Nonproliferation & Human Rights. Trafficking in persons is often considered the modern-day equivalent of slavery, and many countries worldwide are taking steps to stem its increase. International human trafficking remains an especially dire problem, with 600,000 to 800,000 people falling victim to it each year. n2 Of these, 80 percent are female and 50 percent are children. n3 n2 see Testimony of John R. Miller. http://wwwc.house.gov/international_relations/108/mil062404.htm

n3 ibid

1. Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act

The Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA), which mandates the annual TIP Report, was passed by Congress in 2000, and the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act (TVPRA), authorizing, among other things, $200 million to fight against incoming US human trafficking, was passed in 2003. The TVPA created a tier system that ranks countries based on their level of proactiveness in addressing the problem of human trafficking within their borders. Governments that fully follow the TVPA's minimum protocol for the elimination of trafficking are placed on Tier 1. Countries which are not meeting the minimum protocol but are nonetheless taking action to eliminate trafficking are placed on Tier 2. Tier 3 consists of countries that neither meet the minimum protocol nor are making any efforts in that direction.

In order to identify countries that are in danger of falling from Tier 2 to Tier 3, the 2003 TVPRA added another tier. The so-called Tier 2 Watch List allows policy makers to distinguish between strong and weak Tier 2 countries, and to be "able to give a stern warning to those Tier 2 countries that fell backward while still taking some significant action." n4

n4 ibid

2. Effective Methods of Combating Human Trafficking

Michele Clark, co-director of the Protection Project at Johns Hopkins University, pointed to some disappointing trends in human trafficking. Of the 131 countries surveyed in the TIP Report, only 68 have any legislation regarding human trafficking. Even among these 68 countries, enforcement is lax and funding problematic.

Another difficulty in combating human trafficking, particularly international trafficking, is the varying interpretation across countries of victims of trafficking. In order to effectively combat human trafficking, she argues, legislation must take account of this. It must define human trafficking, and it must define it in terms that designate the victim as such and not as a criminal. "To law enforcement officials," Clark says, "they remain cabaret dancers or prostitutes and not victims of a crime."

3. Effect of the Report

Generally, the report has been met with approval by countries that are profiled in it. Japan was placed on Tier 2 this year, but its media has reacted well to the placement. Pakistan has also declared that its Tier 2 ranking has caused it to work on improving itself. United Arab Emirates, which received a worse rating than it had the previous year, also used the ranking as a motivation for change. n5

n5 Ibid.

The TIP report is also reaping the benefits of the legal enforcement powers bestowed on the TVPRA in 2003. The 2003 TVPRA allows civil suits to be brought against traffickers under the Racketeering Influenced and Corrupt Organization statute. n6 "I am particularly pleased that Director Miller took advantage of the new diplomatic tools provided to the executive branch by Congress when it reauthorized the Trafficking Victims Protection Act last year," Holly Burkhalter, Policy Director of Physicians for Human Rights said in her testimony. "The new Act's heavier emphasis on law enforcement and tangible outcomes and the creation of the Watch List add to the diplomatic tool kit and heighten the prospect that governments that fail to take appropriate steps will be subjected to economic pressure as well in the form of reduced foreign assistance." n7

n6 See US Department of Health and Human Services Fact Sheet: Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000. http://www.acf.hhs.gov/trafficking/about/TVPA_2000.html

n7 See http://www.house.gov/international_relations/108/bur062404.htm

4. International Accountability

The purpose of the TIP report is to provide accountability, n8 particularly international accountability. In the global community it is easy to let an international problem, such as trafficking of persons across borders, slip through the cracks, and in the dynamic field of international criminal enforcement there are a lot of cracks. By having a system that ranks countries by their ability and willingness to address human trafficking, it brings a country's problems to its own attention and to the attention of the international community.

n8 See Testimony of Michele A. Clark. http://www.house.gov/international_relations/108/cla062404.htm

LOAD-DATE: September 2, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 International Enforcement Law Reporter

197 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

August 29, 2004 Sunday

Kenya; 'Deya Babies' Are Victims of Trafficking

BYLINE: The Nation

LENGTH: 1722 words

That the story of Archbishop Gilbert Deya's miracle "miracle babies" broke just two months after the US State Department fingered Kenya as a country deeply involved in the human traffic trade made many sit up and take notice.

The Americans are threatening to impose heavy trade sanctions on Kenya if no steps are taken to prevent human trafficking. Such sanctions would affect all businesses involved in the African Growth and Opportunity Act (Agoa) scheme and could lead to even tougher times for Kenya's already cash-strapped economy.

While the Kenya police are treating the whole "miracle babies" affair with suspicion and caution, they are not yet convinced as are some NGOs that it is a human trafficking incident. However, they continue to hold a total of 21 children as they investigate the operations of the UK-based evangelist.

While Archbishop Deya, whose wife is being questioned, continues to maintain that he can and did create "miracle babies" for childless couples by exorcising demons to make them fertile, some charities have come out and said in no uncertain terms that his actions are, in fact, a front for trafficking babies from Kenya to the UK.

However, Police Spokesman Jasper Ombati told the Sunday Nation that for the time being, they were concentrating their efforts on trying to establish the parentage of the "miracle babies". "If this proves futile, then we will follow leads to try and establish the source of the children and maybe then we shall find out if they have been victims of trafficking."

One of the NGOs with an interest in the matter, the Child Rights Advisory Documentation and Legal Centre (Cradle), brought up the connection between the alleged activities of the Deyas and child trafficking, when they reminded Kenyans in a statement that since 1997, "the UN Special Rapporteur on Violence Against Women had identified Kenya as a conduit for the trafficking in women and children."

Ms Janice Ogonji, a programme officer with Cradle, gave the Sunday Nation access to material that gave a real life case study of a child who had been trafficked. The case study also went some way to show how child trafficking works.

The story is about a nine-year-old child living on the outskirts of Nairobi identified only as J.

J was a flower girl at a wedding from where she was abducted by a man who then took her to a nearby house and locked her in a room overnight before bringing yet another child, M, to join her.

The two children were kept in captivity for six days before a woman arrived to take M away. The following day, another woman came to take J away but J managed to run away and eventually found her way home.

Police investigating the kidnapping of J found that the woman who had tried to take her away actually knew J's family and had intended to exchange her for another child before having her sent to work as a domestic servant for a family far from Nairobi.

Meanwhile, as a result of the country's growing reputation for seeming lax on matters of human trafficking, Kenya risks losing substantial amounts in US aid and trade.

Earlier this year on June 14, US Secretary of State Colin Powell issued the annual trafficking in persons report and, as a result, US embassy officials told the Sunday Nation that sanctions would be imposed on Kenya if within the next year, no progress is seen in the area of the prevention of human trafficking.

Speaking to the Sunday Nation, an American government official explained that Kenya was seen by the US State Department as "a country of origin, destination and transit" for victims of human trafficking. As such, Kenya has been moved to a critical "watch list" where, if there is no improvement on the human trafficking front, the country will next June be automatically demoted from Tier 2, which it has inhabited for some years now, to Tier 3. This would mean closer and more critical scrutiny by the US Congress, which could decide to impose sanctions on the country in an effort to curb the practice.

According to the report, the Kenya government does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. Also the government stands accused of failing to provide evidence of its efforts to combat severe forms of trafficking.

The State Department's suggested way out of the potentially dangerous situation for the already fragile Kenyan economy is to suggest that Kenyan officials take the matter more seriously.

According to the report, the government could show its determination to combat human trafficking by developing "a national action plan, step up border security, provide training to law enforcement officials, and conduct anti-trafficking public awareness campaigns".

In connection with this, the American official said that already some funds had been disbursed to the Kenya police for the training and setting up of an anti-trafficking unit.

However, the Kenya police, through Mr Ombati, told the Sunday Nation: "As far as we know, Kenya is not in the business of trafficking. We are aware, of course, that the country is used as a conduit and we are taking corrective measures. So far, however, I don't think we are a point of origin. Having said that, of course, if we break the Deya case we may finally get evidence that we are a country of origin. So far we have no evidence pointing to this."

Nevertheless, the US report suggests that comprehensive anti-trafficking legislation to combat official corruption should be passed.

The State Department ranks countries in tiers. Being a Tier 3 country makes a state eligible for trade sanctions if Congress so decides. Tier 3 countries are also nations that are thought to be making direct profits from trafficking in persons.

Tier 2 countries are those where, though the government is not necessarily involved directly in human trafficking, they could do a bit more to improve the situation.

Kenya has traditionally been on this list as a result of incidents such as those from the early 1990s when Kenyan nationals were not protected by the government from being taken for jobs in places such as the Gulf States and the Middle East to work in inhuman conditions or as bonded labour.

The newly-created category of a watch list is designed as a sort of purgatory or stop-gap measure before a nation finds itself declared a Tier 3 country.

Tier 1 countries are those such as Canada and the United Kingdom, for instance, where the government is probably doing all it can to counter trafficking in persons, but is an ideal destination for human traffickers.

The US itself is not on the list and the official reckoned that this was because the report was prepared for the US Congress, where the elected representatives of the American people work and that, as representatives of the people, they were expected to have a good idea of the situation on the ground.

The American official, however, accepted that the US's exemption from the list was often used by critics to discredit the whole operation.

This year, for instance, the South American country of Venezuela was put on the Tier 3 list and accused of not doing enough to stop the trafficking of thousands of people forced into servitude or the sex trade every year.

Worried about what trade sanctions could do to the domestic economy and fragile politics of the oil rich nation, the Venezuelan government fought back with their own statistics on the US.

The Venezuelan Deputy Minister for Foreign Affairs, Mr Arevalo Mendez, said: "The numbers on prostitution, illegal traffic of all kinds, and the permanent violation of human rights in the US and against other nations, places the US government between the permanent violation of those rights, cynicism and arrogance."

"Has Colin Powell forgotten that 7 per cent of US agricultural workers are between 10 and 17 years old, and that [they] come mostly from the trafficking of people?" he asked.

Speaking to the Sunday Nation, the American official, who opted to remain anonymous, clarified that people or "alien" smuggling fell in a different category from trafficking in persons. Smuggling is a straight business deal with each party being aware of what they are getting into, whereas the victims of human trafficking were often abducted, or lured by false promises and then mistreated when they reached the other end.

Kenya stands accused of being "a country of origin, destination, and transit for victims trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labour."

According to the report, victims are trafficked from South and East Asian countries as well as the Middle East, through Kenya to destinations in Europe for sexual exploitation.

The report is also concerned with trafficking to Kenya of Asian nationals, principally Indians, Bangladeshis and Nepalese (colloquially referred to as Rockets) who are brought here and then coerced into bonded labour in the construction and garment industries.

The US State Department is also concerned that Kenyan children are trafficked internally from rural areas to urban centres and the coast into involuntary servitude including work as street vendors, day labourers and prostitution. The report also claims that women and children are trafficked from Rwanda and Burundi to Kenya to be exploited in what it refers to as "the growing sex tourism industry."

In April last year, a UN special investigator, Juan Miguel Petit, said children from Angola and Mozambique were being trafficked and forced into prostitution on the streets of Johannesburg and Cape Town.

He added that the problem is growing with others from as far away as Kenya, Senegal, Uganda, and Ethiopia also being smuggled in to work as prostitutes. Mr Petit argued that the children were forced into the business by mainly Angolan, Congolese, and Nigerian syndicates.

He said that despite the fact that child trafficking in South Africa was not yet recognised as a criminal offence, police there had conceded that more needed to be done to tackle the problem. "The police authorities recognise that the problem exists, of course," he said. "They deal with the problem. They also say at the same time that the problem has no exact figures."

He says that the international police system, Interpol, had been invited to get involved.

LOAD-DATE: August 30, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

198 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

August 29, 2004 Sunday

PanAfrica; Human Trafficking Thrives, Barons Escape Justice

BYLINE: VanguardLENGTH: 2252 words

During its annual conference of June, 2002, the International Labour Organization (ILO) declared June 12 World Day Against Child Labour. It was a day set aside for highlighting the global movement to eliminate child labour.

This was after the ILO had adopted Convention 182 on the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour. To demonstrate its commitment to the elimination of child labour, the ILO set up a department, the International Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC). IPEC has worked in many countries including Nigeria. Nigeria has also benefitted from financial support towards the elimination of child labour from the United States Labor Department, Friedrich Ebert Stiftung and other non-governmental organizations.

However, the problem persists. Human trafficking, its social implications, efforts so far taken and the expectations of the international community is the focus of this article.

IN June 2002, when the ILO declared the World Day Against Child Labour, the ILO at its headquarters in Geneva, Switzerland, presented two teenagers as evidence of child labour. A Nigerian girl, Comfort, who was a child prostitute, was one of those presented.

Comfort who was born in Akwa- Ibom state was rehabilitated under the ILO/ IPEC programme. What then is the link between Child Labour and Human Trafficking? Studies have shown that human trafficking is the first stage of what results in child labour. Children are trafficked from their countries of origin to other countries or cities to do hazardous work such as forced labour, prostitution, domestic help, etc.

The ILO in its report on Child Labour released during the 2004 conference stated that " Child domestic labour is a widespread and growing global phenomenon that traps as many as 10 million or more - mostly girls in hidden forms of exploitation, often involving abuse, health risks and violence". It identifies the worst form of child domestic labour as that which is " extremely hazardous to the child because of the tasks given, conditions of work or physical, emotional and sexual abuse; practices similar to slavery such as debt bondage or forced labour, and child domestic labour into which a child has been trafficked".

Back home in Nigeria, prompted mainly by the activities of non-governmental organizations, the National Assembly passed the anti-trafficking law in June 2003 and established the National Agency for the Prohibition of Trafficking in Persons (NAPTIP). Beyond these, the federal government appears unwilling to do more to stop human trafficking. Headlines such as "Police rescue 64 children from suspected traffickers", "Royal father in child trafficking scandal", "Police nab four human traffickers" appear in our newspapers almost on a daily basis.

Trafficking in children

All the stories confirm that some people have been arrested for engaging in the trafficking of children from one state to another within Nigeria and while others are taken across the borders. Recently, officials of the United States Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons were in Nigeria. The Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons monitors the efforts of governments and non-governmental organizations in many countries directed at putting an end to human trafficking.

Its report on human trafficking in West Africa stated that thousands of children are trafficked from Benin Republic to Nigeria, Ghana, Gabon, Cote-D' Ivoire and Cameroon into forced labour situations which include, "agricultural labour, quarries, domestic service and prostitution".

On Cameroon, the report states, " Cameroon is a destination country for Nigeria and Beninese children trafficked to work in commercial agriculture, bars, auto parts shops, prostitution, or as street vendors.

It is also a transit country for the movement of children between Nigeria and Gabon".

Cote D' Ivoire - as stated in the report, " women are trafficked from Nigeria, Ghana, Liberia and Asian countries for sexual exploitation in Abidjan and other urban centres. Some of these women are forced to prostitute themselves to earn money to reimburse the traffickers, to buy their release so their traffickers can send them to final destinations, including Italy, the Netherlands and Scandinavia". The situation in Ghana, Togo, Niger and other countries are similar.

For Nigeria, the report states, " Nigeria is a source, transit and destination country for trafficked women and children. Nigerians are trafficked to Europe, the Middle East and other countries for the purposes of forced labor, domestic servitude, and sexual exploitation. Nigerian girls and women are trafficked for forced prostitution to Italy, France, Spain, the Netherlands, Cote d' Ivoire and South Africa. Nigerian children are trafficked for involuntary domestic labour and street hawking within Nigeria and to countries in West and Central Africa.

Nigeria is a destination country for Togolese, Beninese, Ghanaian and Cameroonian children trafficked for forced labour".

Beyond the report, child labour is visible on our streets. Children are mostly used as house helps. They also work as feet washers, hawkers, porters in major the markets. Others are bus conductors. The worst cases have been those of children murdered for ritually purposes but it would appear that Nigerians have not come to appreciate the negative effect of human trafficking and child labour.

Human trafficking barons have been able to get away without the long arms of the law catching up with them. The governments; state and federal, have not provided medical facilities for victims. Once rescued, they are thrown back into the streets.

Ms. JoAnn Schwider of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, who was in Nigeria recently, said the agency is not pleased with the failure of governments in Nigeria to punish offenders. Her words, "We are looking forward to government bringing traffickers to justice because laws are just on paper if they are not enforced. We were extremely disappointed with the lack of prosecutions. It is disappointing for the victims".

Her colleague Mr. Nicholas Levingtow said "it is important for governments to educate people on the dangers of child trafficking". He said the agency understands that poverty and labour migration provides a shield for those who traffick in children but AP TIP is expected to create awareness .

Levingtow said although Nigeria is not expected to solve the problem of child trafficking at once, the government should show commitment in terms of prosecution and prevention of trafficking so that traffickers can get the message that Nigeria is no longer a safe haven for traffickers. For instance, in Ghana, a report from the monitoring office based in Washington showed that two persons were recently sentenced to two year jail terms for attempting to sell a child.

To create awareness on the dangers of child trafficking and child labour, the Ghana National Commission on Children conducted community gatherings nationwide to discuss the hazards of trafficking. That country's ministry of women and children affairs also introduced a programme, " Operation Bring Your Children Home" which was aimed at encouraging parents who sold their children to bring them home in exchange for business assistance, vocational training, credit facilities and assistance with school fees and uniforms. A Women' Development Fund was also established from which mothers of trafficked children received loans and business training to help them start small enterprises.

To assist Nigeria tackle the problem of trafficking in persons, the United States Agency for International Development (USAID) Nigeria office granted $500,00, to the International Office for Migration (IOM) to support a shelter in Lagos for returned trafficking victims, mostly women deported from European countries.

USAID mission director in Nigeria, Ms. Dawn Liberi, said the financial assistance was to provide shelter, training in skills for victims to enable them have economic alternatives and also to assist the victims return to school. She said Delta and Rivers State had also been identified as states to benefit from such assistance soon. Ms. Liberi like the officials from the Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons officials commended the efforts of Nigeria so far but emphasized that public awareness is very important if Nigeria is to effectively tackle the problem of human trafficking.

By the assessment of the United States Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, Nigeria is on the "Tier 2- Watch list", which means Nigeria has made significant efforts but she still needs to do more.

The report states, "Nigeria is placed on the Tier 2 Watch List because of the continued significant complicity of Nigerian security personnel in trafficking and the lack of evidence of increasing efforts to address this complicity. Unlike other governments in the region, the Nigerian government does not face severe resource constraints, yet it commits inadequate funding and personnel to the fight against Nigeria's serious trafficking problem".

Corrupt officials

It was suggested that the government "should move quickly to implement the new law through vigorous high court prosecutions of corrupt officials and traffickers; it should also give adequate support to the new anti-trafficking agency and improve protection facilities or funding for NGO protection activities".

However, the report commended some state governments for their efforts. Imo state government repatriated 29 victims from Gabon during the year while Edo and Abia states ran skills acquisition centres for trafficking victims. Akwa- Ibom state government worked with the government of Cameroon to effect the repatriation of Nigerian children trafficked to that country".

The United States Agency noted that victims of trafficking from overseas are provided shelter but those trafficked within the country are usually kept in jails. The Agency prefers that all victims are provided decent shelter and medical facilities. It notes that "sex trafficking victims returned from abroad are usually forcibly tested for HIV/AIDS; the results of these tests are not kept confidential". It prefers that the results are kept confidential.

Why the international concern on human trafficking and Child Labour?

The International Labour Organisation during its June conference in Geneva, Switzerland released a report on a research conducted by its IPEC department titled "Helping Hands or Shackled Lives? Understanding child domestic labour and responses to it". The report highlights the exploitation of children as young as 10 on a global level.

ILO director-general, Mr. Juan Somavia, said, "Millions of children work night and day outside of their family homes, toiling as domestic child labourers. Nearly all are exploited, exposed to hazardous work and subjected to abuse".

As stated in the ILO report, "all domestic child labourers, without exception, are at risk because of the very nature of child domestic labour, which is not only widely accepted but often considered a "better" alternative for children from poor families".

The author of the report, Dr. June Kane, said, these children are in the workplace, "even if that workplace is someone else's home- hidden from public view and labour inspection. The children are consequently at risk not only of exploitation but also of abuse and violence. It is vital that child domestic labour, so often neglected because the exploitation and abuse take place behind closed doors, receives attention".

The director of the ILO/ IPEC programme, Mr. Frans Roselaers, described child domestic labour as "a waste of human talent and potential". He said "with the help of constructive and sustainable solutions from the ILO technical cooperation programme, governments, employers and workers worldwide stand ready to put an end to this abuse".

However the ILO report states: "Not all child domestics end up without a future. ILO experience in Asia, Central and South America and Africa shows that with strong social and national institutions, and income or credit options for the parents, children under the minimum working age can be successfully removed from domestic labour".

Financial assistance

The United States Government through agencies such as USAID and the embassy's labour department has offered Nigeria technical and financial assistance to enable her tackle the twin problem of human trafficking and child labour.

The American Secretary of State, Collin Powell, in his comments on the 2004 annual trafficking in persons report released in the United States, said the report "represents the collective work of our embassies, as well as foreign governments and NGO partners throughout the world who are committed to ending the scourge of slavery. We intend to use it as a guide in our efforts in the coming year to combat the trafficking of persons around the globe through improved laws, regulation, monitoring, enforcement and the protection of victims".

Mr. Powell called human trafficking " modern-slavery".

He said citizens of the U.S.A. who prey on foreign children around the globe for commercial sex are no longer beyond the reach of U.S. prosecution. Powell therefore called on governments all over the world to " join in the effort to prosecute these pedophiles through the application of similar laws".

LOAD-DATE: August 30, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 AllAfrica, Inc.

199 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Saudi Press Agency

August 29, 2004 Sunday 4:55 PM ESTSPA -33- General\, Guyanese president travels to*BYLINE: Saudi Press AgencyLENGTH: 204 wordsDATELINE: Riyadh, August 29

Guyana President Bharrat Jagdeo is to hold talks with officials of the Inter-American Development Bank (IADB) for a 108m-US-dollar loan to the country, the state-owned Government Information Agency (Gina) has said..

It said that the loan is expected to materialize by September 2005..

Gina said that Jagdeo, who leaves here this weekend [28-29 August] for Washington, would discuss with the IADB officials how soon Georgetown could access the loan and that he would also participate in a review and programming of priority projects..

Gina said that among the priority projects include the construction of a new road to the Cheddi Jagan International Airport at Timehri.

It said the discussion with the IADB would also focus on the 10m-US-dollar existing loan that Guyana wants to use to construct the Berbice River Bridge..

"I intend to have discussions with the IADB on how soon we can release those resources so that we can move forward speedily with construction of the bridge," Jagdeo said.

While in Washington, Jagdeo will meet with United States government officials on the recent decision to provide a Tier-Three ranking for Trafficking in Persons (TIP), Gina said..

--More 2318 Local Time 2018 GMT

LOAD-DATE: February 12, 2005LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: NewswireJOURNAL-CODE: SPA

Copyright 2004 U.P.I.
All Rights Reserved
ARABIA 2000

Copyright 2004 by Saudi Press Agency. Distributed By UPI.

200 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

August 26, 2004 Thursday

Gov't eyes tougher visa screening on foreign dancers, singers

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 407 wordsDATELINE: TOKYO, Aug. 26

The Justice Ministry intends to tighten its visa screening on foreign women entering Japan as dancers and singers to try to prevent crime syndicates from forcing them into prostitution, ministry officials said Thursday.

The move comes amid growing international criticism against Japan's efforts to combat human trafficking, the officials said. Critics call Japan's efforts in the area weak.

In its annual Trafficking in Person Report released in June, the U.S. State Department put Japan on a special watch list of countries that are on the verge of falling into the worst category.

The Justice Ministry is considering revising a ministerial ordinance that serves as a basis for setting standards used for approving a person's status of residence, the officials said, adding concrete measures are being mapped out within the year.

The current ordinance requires entertainment operators that plan to host foreign citizens to have no past record of offenses in terms of Japan's immigration or anti-prostitution laws.

The ministry is also considering setting stricter conditions on the number of employees at entertainment facilities, and the size of stages and performer waiting rooms, the officials said.

At present, the ministry starts launching investigation only if problems are reported regarding the producer or entertainment facilities.

Under the envisioned screening, the ministry would have to check the performers' future workplaces or performance sites for illicit activity as frequently as possible as well as documenting screening prior to entry and for every visa renewal, the officials said.

Should the ministry uncover any prostitution taking place, it will also file a criminal complaint.

In addition to all this, the ministry is expected to propose to its Legislative Council in September revisions to the Penal Code, one of which is to create a new charge for human trafficking.

Activities covered under entertainment visas include performing in concerts, theaters and sporting events, and the duration of stay lasts from three months to one year. Those who come to Japan holding the visas are prohibited from working as bar hostesses.

Ministry statistics show the number of people entering Japan on entertainment visas has been increasing since 1997. Last year, 133,000 people entered Japan under such visas with Filipinos constituting about 60 percent or some 80,000.

LOAD-DATE: August 26, 2004LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

201 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

August 25, 2004 Wednesday 7:45 AM GMTThai official busted for trafficking in Myanmar labourers*LENGTH: 222 wordsDATELINE: MAE SOT, Thailand Aug 25

A local official in Thailand has been arrested with her husband for illegally smuggling Myanmar workers into the kingdom, police said Wednesday.

Khomkhai Boonsitakul, 60, was taken into custody Tuesday at her house in the Mae Sot district of western Tak province with four Myanmar nationals after a warrant was issued for her arrest on charges of smuggling and sheltering illegal workers, police said.

An investigation showed that Khomkhai and her husband ran a human trafficking ring and job placement service for hundreds of Myanmar labourers, a policeman told AFP.

Police found records for 50 bank accounts along with hundreds of dollars worth of Myanmar currency, as well as a 100-name list of Myanmar labourers who apparently obtained work through the suspects.

Thailand launched a war on human trafficking in early August, nearly two months after the United States put it on a watchlist for its failure to make progress in stamping out the illegal trade.

Some 850,000 illegal migrant workers from Myanmar and 350,000 from Cambodia and Laos registered with the Thai authorities in July after being threatened with arrest and deportation.

Human rights groups have highlighted deteriorating conditions for up to two million migrant workers in the kingdom, who often live and toil in squalor in dozens of factories along the Myanmar border.

LOAD-DATE: August 26, 2004LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

202 of 359 DOCUMENTS

CNN INTERNATIONAL

August 19, 2004 ThursdaySHOW: INSIGHT 11:00 PM Eastern Standard Time

Human Trafficking in Japan

GUESTS: John Miller, Gilbert KingBYLINE: Jonathan Aiken, Atika Shubert, Stan GrantSECTION: NEWS, INTERNATIONALLENGTH: 3717 wordsHIGHLIGHT: A look at the problem of human trafficking, particularly in Japan.

JONATHAN AIKEN, CNN HOST: It brings in nearly as much money to organized crime and cooperating governments as arms sales or the drug trade, and every year between 600,000 and 800,000 women, children, even men, find themselves sent across borders, often against their will or without their knowledge. It's called trafficking in persons.

Hello everyone and welcome to INSIGHT. I'm Jonathan Aiken.

Human trafficking is a multi-billion dollar business. It spawns sex industries. It keeps some agricultural economies afloat and it has helped to subsidize a global network of sweatshops and smugglers.

In May, the U.S. State Department released its annual report on the trafficking of persons worldwide. It divided countries into three general categories based on their efforts to combat the problem. Many of the countries on the list, no surprise, but some, like Japan, were. And Japan found itself in the company of 41 other nations where, in the eyes of U.S. officials, the number of victims of human trafficking is on the rise and the government is on official notice from Washington that it needs to do better.

On our program today, the global trade in people.

Atika Shubert begins our coverage in Tokyo, Japan.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

ATIKA SHUBERT, CNN CORRESPONDENT (voice-over): It is a sight in plain view in Japan. Foreign women working the bars and streets of red light districts euphemistically called talent. They have brokers and pimps, managers, but the life of a talent is anything but entertaining.

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE (through translator): I wanted to quit, but the mafia didn't let me. They forced me into prostitution, even when I was pregnant. They followed me and threatened to kill my baby if I didn't (UNINTELLIGIBLE).

SHUBERT: She says she is a victim of human trafficking. Afraid for her life, she refuses to be identified. She says she was lured from Colombia with promises of a casino job. A broker, she says, gave her a fake passport and a number to call. The woman who answered was a so-called manager.

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE (through translator): She told me I could not go home because they would kill my family. Then she told me I had to pay $50,000.

SHUBERT: A U.S. State Department report on human trafficking described Japan as having a large problem in trafficking, placing the country on a watch list.

The report says, quote, "Considering the resources available, Japan could do much more to protect its thousands of victims of sexual slavery."

(on camera): Japan has no law that specifically makes human trafficking a crime, making it virtually impossible to prosecute. But the deeper problem is public awareness. Many people here do not know or willfully ignore that many of these women are would into prostitution against their will.

(voice-over): Omira Nagatska (ph) at the Colombian embassy has helped dozens of victims seeking refuge at the embassy. Many arrive battered and penniless, turned away by police.

OMIRA NAGATSKA (ph), COLOMBIAN EMBASSY (through translator): Japan is a paradise for traffickers. We brought one victim to the police and told them that she is a victim of human trafficking. He told me there is no human trafficking in Japan. If there is no human trafficking, what is she? She is illegal, the officer says.

SHUBERT: But the government is taking steps to combat trafficking, distributing this video to raise awareness, debating a new law in parliament that would officially make trafficking a crime, but the roots of the problem remain.

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: If I day say a very politically incorrect thing, we didn't see in our history a (UNINTELLIGIBLE) system (UNINTELLIGIBLE) but I must say that this was a surprise for us all, for the public. Some of those ladies were (UNINTELLIGIBLE).

SHUBERT: Japan does have a history, although not openly discussed. World War II comfort women, sex slaves from conquered nations forces to service Japanese soldiers. In the same way the past has not been addressed, neither is the present.

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: Our public policy is the (UNINTELLIGIBLE) of the people's role, of people's (UNINTELLIGIBLE). There is a misconception among Japanese society and in this case our view is that (UNINTELLIGIBLE) out of state workers in illegal businesses.

SHUBERT: Compounding the problem, Japan's poor support network. This is the only women's shelter in Japan that caters to foreign victims. It has only nine rooms.

One Philippino woman fled her Japanese husband here. She married him without knowing he paid her cousin a fee for providing a wife. She says when he tried to kill her, she reported him to police and found that he had married twice before, each time paying a cousin a few hundred dollars for a new wife.

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: (UNINTELLIGIBLE) in the house. I cannot come back, because my husband get (UNINTELLIGIBLE) for me and then to tell me "I kill you."

SHUBERT: Do you feel tricked?

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: Yes. I do.

SHUBERT: Her husband remains free, as does her cousin in the Philippines. Trafficking, less visible, just as insidious.

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: It's not trafficking in itself, but it is trafficking because the -- how should I say -- though there is no syndicate or there's no gun that's at the back of their having the deals or something like that, but the person is being sold.

SHUBERT: Japan is the world's second largest economy, an economic powerhouse. Little wonder that the world's poor come here to make money from Colombia, Philippines, Thailand and now Russia and the Ukraine. Few women suspect they will be sold into sexual slavery.

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE (through translator): There are many girls that come here deceived. Don't come here. Everything is a lie. In Colombia, they will draw a paradise for you, but when you get here, it is hell.

SHUBERT (on camera): Japan is now on a watch list, but the State Department says it can be taken off if the country takes concrete steps. Making it a crime to trade in people is one. Enforcing that law is the next. Most important, however, is awakening the public to this crime committed in plain view every day.

Atika Shubert, CNN, Tokyo.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

AIKEN: Joining us now from Seattle, Ambassador John Miller. He is the director of the U.S. State Department's Office To Monitor And Combat Trafficking In Persons.

Mr. Ambassador, thanks very much for joining us.

Is it that things in Japan has changed, or is it that the State Department has changed the way in which it monitors this that Japan finds itself on a watch list?

JOHN MILLER, U.S. STATE DEPT.: Well, we're operating with a law that's only be in effect a couple of years, and I think in the last year or two we've come to realize that this is not just a problem in the less developed nations of the world where trafficking victims may originate. It's a problem in wealthier destination countries where the trafficking victims end up.

Japan is one. Western Europe, also. The United States. We're all destination countries.

I think what stood out about Japan was the huge nature of the problem and the relatively small amount of resources devoted by this wealthy democracy towards meeting the problem.

AIKEN: Was it they didn't know the problem existed? Or they just didn't want to take action in stronger terms?

MILLER: Well, I think that there certainly has been in the last several months a growing awareness of the problem in Japan. I think that's been true all over the world in the last year or two, but particularly in Japan.

Many countries, people think, oh, slavery, that's something from the 19th century. But modern day slavery is going on in many parts of the world.

The positive news in Japan is in the last several months we have seen the start of some very significant steps. The prime minister has appointed a special task force on this. They're drafting a comprehensive anti- trafficking law. They're looking at reviewing their whole so-called entertainer visa policy. There are many steps that appear to be underway. So we're hopeful that Japan, a leading democracy, will take the lead in combating trafficking in persons, which is just a euphemism for the slave trade.

AIKEN: It's a broad issue. Paint a big picture for us. The report says that in terms of a revenue stream, this is right up there with illegal gun sales or drugs, when it comes to organized crime or cooperating governments. How big a till are we talking here?

MILLER: We're talking billions and billions of dollars.

Our FBI believes that it may be as high as $9.5 billion a year for organized crime, and that would place it behind the arms trade and the drug trade, the trade in people, here in the 21st century.

AIKEN: But what has changed significantly between the 21st century and ot he centuries in the past? People have always been bought or sold or fought into slavery. What makes it different now?

MILLER: I think a couple hundred years ago, you had largely government-sanctioned slavery, often based on color.

Today you don't have governments officially supporting slavery. They may look the other way, but they're not supporting it. But what you have are organized criminal networks. It's the underside of globalization, is organized criminal networks moving people from country to country, some into sex slavery, some into domestic servitude slavery, some into farm and factory slavery.

And I think in the last several years, Jonathan, governments in the world are starting to wakeup, are starting to take steps, and of course non-governmental organizations, private charitable organizations, have been the lead and have been undertaking efforts to get governments to wake up.

AIKEN: Is there any one issue that set off the alarm on this worldwide?

MILLER: I don't think there's any one issue. I think if you look at just about every country in the world, you'll find a major incident.

Japan, a couple of years ago, there was a man who was arrested who had been involved with hundreds of trafficking victims, probably engineered thousands of rapes. This started to get attention for this subject in Japan.

United States, there are several major cities that have had big cases.

AIKEN: Secretary of State Powell was quoted as saying about this, "Human trafficking could very well help to finance terrorist activity," and yet he was somewhat vague on this.

Is there any concrete evidence to suggest that it's out there?

MILLER: Well, I think there's concrete evidence that a select number of terrorist groups are using trafficking to get recruits. They're abducting children and making them child soldier slaves. That we know.

In terms of other financing, there is research going on on that, but there is not any hard evidence that I can make available at this time.

AIKEN: Ambassador John Miller, from the U.S. State Department, from his post in Seattle, Washington. Thank you very much for being with us.

MILLER: Glad you're covering this subject -- Jonathan.

AIKEN: Thank you, sir.

When we come back, on INSIGHT, children as young as 12 being sold into the sex industry in Thailand. We'll have a report from Bangkok.

Stay with us.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

AIKEN (voice-over): Back in May, CNN aired a documentary called "Easy Prey." It was a rare look inside the child sex trade.

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: (UNINTELLIGIBLE)

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: (UNINTELLIGIBLE)

(END VIDEO CLIP)

AIKEN: Welcome back.

Although it is thought that as many as 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders every year, millions more are bought and sold within the borders of their own countries and in some cases by their own impoverished families. And for some children, that's almost a death sentence.

CNN's Stan Grant reports now from Thailand.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

STAN GRANT, CNN CORRESPONDENT (voice-over): These girls admit they are what they look like. They are prostitutes. They exist in a shadowy, secretive world, afraid even to show their faces.

They have agreed to talk to us, but are nervous about the camera, and we filmed discreetly. The mere sight of it is enough to spook them. They tell me they're 20. They look more like 12, at best 14.

"We sleep with foreigners," they tell me. Japanese and Chinese, some Westerners.

I ask them how they feel about that. "We just go blank," they say.

They do it for money. One girl tells me she needs to support her younger brother. Their families, they say, know what they do.

The girls used to go to this school in a town on the Thai-Myanmar border. Now they work for the pimps of the sex trade.

Thailand is notorious for its trade in young girls. From poor villages or nearby countries, many find themselves here in Bangkok's red light districts. They serve the desires of tourists or businessmen.

According to social workers and welfare groups, girls as young as 10 are sold into brothels here. In some areas they say as many as 90 percent of the girls who leave their villages become prostitutes, often they are sold by their own parents.

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: Many parents or cousins, relatives, who know that young girls, cheap girls from the village, when they arrive they can make a lot of money, so those people will just try to introduce them to, bring them to a person (UNINTELLIGIBLE).

GRANT (on camera): Their own family?

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: Well, yes. Right now I can say most of them are there own people.

GRANT (voice-over): (UNINTELLIGIBLE) has made it his mission to save young girls from the sex trade. He runs a safe house here, The Development and Education Program for Daughters and Communities. He's been nominated twice for the Nobel Peace Prize. In 2002 he was named one of "Time" magazine's Asian Heroes.

But his greatest achievement, he says, is seeing girls grow up free, healthy, and getting an education. It is, he concedes, a tough battle. He's had death threats from traffickers who deal not only in sex, but drugs.

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: The pimps or the broker, they have to control these groups by giving them some drugs or something so they will not run away from them, and they took all documents they might have. Maybe ID cards.

GRANT: These are the lucky girls. They are among the nearly 1,000 children rescued by (UNINTELLIGIBLE) since his center started in 1996.

It began with just 19 girls. At any one time now there are about 200 here.

"I have been saved," this girl tells me. "There is no chance for me to go out at night. If I was at home, I'd be on the streets, which is dangerous."

The children here are from bordering countries such as Laos, China and, like this girl, Myanmar.

"It's a big risk," she says. "It's very easy to be raped in Myanmar and put into forced labor." She tells me she knows some girls who have been taken.

(on camera): To understand what's at the root of the sex trade, you must first understand what's happening in countries like Myanmar, not 50 meters from where I'm standing.

Now, the United States has warned of an impending humanitarian crisis there. Human rights groups have complained of violence, rape, torture and false imprisonment. And that makes children especially vulnerable.

(voice-over): Dr. Cynthia Moong (ph) is a refugee from Myanmar. There are tens of thousands like her on the Thai border. Here she has setup a clinic and schools. The aim, she says, is not just to educate but protect.

DR. CYNTHIA MOONG (ph): They school becomes like a protection center because the children are very vulnerable (UNINTELLIGIBLE) can be kidnapped or (UNINTELLIGIBLE).

GRANT: The government in Thailand is trying to clamp down on the sex trade. It has imposed new, strict limits on closing times for bars. They can no longer stay open all night. But the image of Thailand as a sex tour destination remains.

(on camera): Is this a problem that is too big, too difficult, for the police?

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: I cannot say the traffickers are stronger than the police, but they get away with it. The fact that we still have lots of problems that cannot be reached. There are thousands of young girls who are the victims of trafficking, missing in other countries.

GRANT (voice-over): And thousands of girls, like these two, who are lured into the sex trade each year. They try to shrug it off, but they are young and vulnerable, and it shows.

Do they think of getting married, falling in love, I ask them.

"No one would want us," they say. "No one would be sincere with girls like us."

What of the future?

"We don't think about the future," they tell me. "Only now, and making money."

(END VIDEOTAPE)

AIKEN: Well, joining us to talk more about this is Gilbert King. He is the author of a book called "Women: Child For Sale," and he joins us from New York.

Mr. King, thanks for being with us.

GILBERT KING, AUTHOR: Thanks for having me.

AIKEN: How typical are the children Stan Grant talked to?

KING: Actually, those are the victims, right there.

You know, 70 percent of the victims of human trafficking are women. 50 percent are children. So that's a typical story and, believe me, the same exact stories you hear from countries like Uzbekistan to Bulgaria -- the same exact stories of deception, fraud, sometimes by their own families, that get them into human trafficking.

AIKEN: It sounds like an old story. What makes this new for the 21st century?

KING: I think it's new because, you know, the world is moving towards a global economy, and as goods are moved between nations now, you're seeing more and more of an epidemic in human trafficking.

And so, you know, I was listening to John Miller earlier. He was saying that the African slave trade -- right now, there's 24 million victims of human trafficking living as slaves right now. And when you look back to Africa, over 400 years of the African slave trade, there's twice as many living today than that entire span. So that's an epidemic.

AIKEN: Where is the focus of all of this going? Is it going more for the sex trade or more for cheap labor? It's exploitation no matter which way you cut it, but who is going to be winning? The sex operators or those who run sweatshops and things?

KING: The sex -- no. It's 70 percent -- according to the State Department statistics, 70 percent are in the sex trade.

And what's really frightening about this is that, you know, back in African slave trade times you had a plantation owner who would like at an African slave as a $30,000 investment. He wanted to maximize that investment.

The slave traders today, they don't see a 30 year investment in a sex trade operator. What they see is a three, maybe a four year period of maximum output, and so these lives are just bought and sold at a very low price, just $1,000. And they're basically discarded. It's a disposable industry.

AIKEN: I was just going to say, it sounds like a disposable issue, a disposable problem, really, when you think about it.

KING: Right.

AIKEN: So where is it focused now? Is this an international issue or an intra-national issue? We heard reports of people within border of their own countries being sold by their own families into servitude within their nation. Is this something that only extends across borders or is this something that each individual house is embarrassed to talk about?

KING: That's exactly -- good point.

You know, the statistics of 24 million living in slavery right now does not begin to talk about countries like India, where they're transported from smaller villages and brought into the cities. We really have no way of tracking those numbers.

But in those kinds of cities, South Asia especially, in those kinds of countries, we really don't have a way of tracking, but we know it's significant.

AIKEN: Missing from all of this so far has been a conversation about the United States. The idea of sex trade taking place in Thailand or Mexico, not surprising for many. What about the United States? Is this an issue within the borders of this country?

KING: It certainly is. I mean, the numbers are not quite as staggering. I think the State Department estimates somewhere around 17,000 per years are coming into the United States. But it's a very quiet thing. You don't hear about it because the media tends to report it as a prostitution issue, you know, more prostitutes having pimp problems. Let's arrest them and deport them.

Really, what is happening is these women are just too scared to say that they are victims of human trafficking. Their families are being threatened back home in, say, Mexico, whatever countries they come from, and so they don't cooperate at all with authorities, and that's a big problem.

I mean, down in Florida a couple of years ago you had the Catena (ph) family who was bringing these Mexican girls in, sneaking them into these migrant farm working areas, and basically keeping them there for a few weeks and then moving them on to another migrant farm area. It never really got a lot of attention until they found these shacks that were just used for these women and young girls to basically turn tricks for the migrant workers and then be deported back out of the country.

AIKEN: Let me get a real quick answers from you -- we're almost out of time here. What is the solution? These reports come out year after year. What's the answer?

KING: I think it's probably education. A lot of the countries now in the tier (ph) system of countries that you heard John Miller talking about, are starting these public awareness campaigns and they're trying to put pressure for prosecution, to try and prosecute some of the human traffickers.

AIKEN: All right, Gilbert King, author, talking to us from New York. Thanks very much for spending time with us today.

KING: Thank you.

AIKEN: Thank you.

Well, that is it for this edition of INSIGHT. I'm Jonathan Aiken. The news continues on CNN.

TO ORDER VIDEOTAPES AND TRANSCRIPTS OF CNN INTERNATIONAL PROGRAMMING, PLEASE CALL 800-CNN-NEWS OR USE THE SECURE ONLINE ORDER FROM LOCATED AT www.fdch.com

LOAD-DATE: August 21, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Transcript # 081901cb.k01

TYPE: SHOW

Copyright 2004 Cable News Network
All Rights Reserved

203 of 359 DOCUMENTS

BBC Summary of World Broadcasts

August 16, 2004, Monday

Bangladesh paper says US trafficking wish-list "almost fulfilled"

SOURCE: New Age web site, Dhaka, in English 16 Aug 04

LENGTH: 520 words

Text of report by Ehsanul Haque and Raheed Ejaz, carried by Bangladeshi newspaper New Age web site on 16 August Dhaka has "almost fulfilled" Washington's six-point recommendations on combating human trafficking out of Bangladesh within the US state department-set timeframe of 60 days that expired on Saturday 14 August , home ministry officials claimed on Sunday.

The government now hopes that the US state department will reassess its ranking of Bangladesh as one of the most vulnerable countries of origin for human trafficking.

US ambassador to Bangladesh Harry K. Thomas, however, declined to make any comment on the issue at this stage. "It is too early and premature to say anything about the position of Bangladesh in the ranking," he told New Age on Sunday.

Although optimistic about a change in Washington's stance, the home ministry officials did admit that a major area of concern - corruption within the law enforcing agencies - still remains largely unaddressed.

Following America's insistence on prosecuting at least one security official involved in trafficking, the government took measures against two security guards who had already been sacked.

The government earlier informed the US state department that there had been no reports of complicity of any official in trafficking since 15 June, when the 14 August deadline was given to fulfil the six points.

"Bangladesh is committed to taking the most serious of actions against anyone including security officials having any complicity in trafficking," Dhaka's letter to Washington said, adding that it is extremely difficult for any official to have such complicity due to continuous monitoring.

The five other recommendations were activation of an anti-trafficking unit of the police, appointment of a special prosecutor for speedy trial tribunals, development and implementation of systematic BDR Bangladesh Rifles screening to identify victims, rescue of at least 100 victims along the border with India, and initiating prosecution of at least three new cases.

Out of 20 selected cases across the country, 15 cases were disposed of till 15 August. Of them, two cases were related to the use of children as camel jockeys in the Middle East.

In these cases, 28 people were convicted while 16 acquitted, a home ministry official said quoting records.

About the appointment of a special prosecutor, he said a deputy attorney-general was assigned to take steps in this regard.

Also, 88 victims of human trafficking were recovered out of a target of 100 people as set by Washington.

The foreign affairs ministry, meanwhile, has taken an initiative to develop a mechanism to exchange information on trafficking.

"We will soon send a report to the US state department about the latest developments," the home ministry official said.

Washington has ranked Bangladesh in tier three of countries of origin for human trafficking along with Burma, Cuba, Ecuador, Equatorial Guinea, Guyana, North Korea, Sierra Leone, Sudan and Venezuela in the Trafficking in Persons Report of 2004 published on 14 June.

LOAD-DATE: August 16, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 The British Broadcasting Corporation

204 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Guardian (London) - Final Edition

August 12, 2004
Correction Appended

G2: Women: Tracking the traffickers: Victor Malarek, author of a new book about the global sex trade, says we should stop focusing on its victims and start prosecuting those who buy and sell them

BYLINE: Julie Bindel

SECTION: Guardian Features Pages, Pg. 14

LENGTH: 1739 words

For the past four years, Victor Malarek has immersed himself in the world of pimps, traffickers, rapists and some of the most disenfranchised women and girls in the world. One of Canada's leading investigative journalists, he is the author of a new book about the global sex trade, The Natashas, a harsh introduction into a business that causes uncalculated misery to hundreds of thousands of young women.

The title refers to the generic name given by customers to the women and girls trafficked across international borders every year; the US state department currently puts this figure at around 900,000, most of them from eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union. Malarek estimates that trafficking in women generates about $ 12bn (£6.6bn) a year, making it the third largest money-making venture in the world, after trafficking in weapons and drugs.

Malarek's book takes us to auctions in Bosnia, where women are displayed naked on wooden crates to be poked and prodded like livestock. He hears stories of rape, abuse and torture on a shocking scale. But he avoids repeating what counter-trafficking activists already know, and what has been said many times before - that these women deserve our pity and compassion. There have been countless international events set up to address the issue of trafficking, but in Malarek's view the focus has been too much on the women forced into it, and not enough on the traffickers themselves, the perpetrators of the crime; there has been too much hand-wringing, and not enough action and enforcement. "We have spent millions researching the causes," he says, "and on international talking shops drawing up action plans and new legislation. But unless we implement these laws, and give police more money to investigate and prosecute the pimps, we will get nowhere."

The Natashas is an angry, impassioned book, for which Malarek makes no apologies. He describes the people who buy and sell women as "low-life criminals", "gutter trash" and "heartless goons". He does not make a distinction between "forced" and "chosen" prostitution - as many campaigners in the field do - but outlines the human rights abuses evident in the sex industry per se. He also identifies customers as a large part of the problem. "Let's look at how societies can discourage men from buying these women," he says, "which would reduce the supply. Some people justify prostitution by saying, 'It's the world's oldest profession.' I say there are ways to stop this. Trafficking is an easy crime to solve. If I can find the brothels and traffickers, so can the police. Just look in the tabloid personal advertisements for a start." These men are not looking for relationships, he says. "They want sex with a faceless female. Those who use trafficked women want to pretend that they are not like their sisters, mothers or partners."

Born in Lachine, Quebec, in 1948, Malarek was taken into care when he was nine, and grew up in a children's home. Before that, he regularly witnessed his father beat his mother in fits of drunken rage. As a teenager, he spent time in juvenile correction centres for petty crimes, but then decided to turn his life around and got a job as a copy boy on a Montreal magazine.

A front-page story for the Montreal Star in 1971 about the suicide of three boys in a Canadian correction centre launched him as a serious investigative reporter. He has since become a passionate advocate for the abused and the marginalised, writing books about Canada's immigration policy and drugs trade, as well as hosting a television documentary series, The Fifth Element. "As a writer, I have always relied on my gut," he says. "If I feel a story is important, I will go all out to expose it."

When Malarek began research for The Natashas in 2000, journalists in Canada and elsewhere were by and large uninterested in the subject. "I would see stories coming in through the wires about the abduction and mass rape of Moldovan, Russian and Bosnian girls, but no one was following them up. I decided it was something I could not ignore," he says.

Focusing mainly on trafficking from the former Soviet Republic, Malarek examines the role of the Russian mafia, as well as the Albanian, Israeli, Czech, Serbian, Hungarian and Ukrainian gangs involved in international pimping. He reserves his fiercest criticism for those EU countries that have gone some way toward legalising prostitution in the belief that it will alleviate illegal elements within the sex trade. Governments should come down hard on criminals, he says, not improve their working conditions.

"Countries like the Netherlands and Germany (which have legalised 'off-street' prostitution) should hang their heads in shame," he says. "They should walk into the UN building with their flags held at half-mast for what their policies on the sex trade have done to thousands of young women. Traffickers have been given a red carpet to walk on in those countries."

His no-tolerance stance is not shared by some in the UK. Liverpool city council will seek Home Office approval for a "managed zone" for street prostitutes this November, and last month shortlisted two industrial estates as possible sites. The council maintains that a common area for women to work will improve their safety, as well as give them access to health and support networks; it is also popular with residents who do not want prostitution on their doorsteps. But similar zones have been established and subsequently closed down in the Netherlands because of an increase in trafficked women being brought to the area, along with high levels of violence and drug abuse.

The Natashas also examines the complicity of some members of the international community based in the Balkans, where trafficking is a growing problem. In 2002, an employment tribunal heard how Kathryn Bolkovac, a UN police officer, had been sacked after revealing that colleagues were involved in the sexual abuse of women and young girls in Bosnia. The American security firm she worked for, DynCorp, was ordered to pay Bolkovac £110,000 in compensation for unfair dismissal, and three men concerned were fired but never charged. (The UN itself is powerless to prosecute, and it is up to member countries to take further action.) During the employment tribunal, the court heard that one of the men had bought a young girl for $ 700 and kept her in his apartment for sex.

In Bosnia, Malarek met a 15-year-old girl who had been trafficked to Bosnia. "She was the 21st birthday present for one of a (UN) platoon and was raped in turn by men with American, Canadian, British, Russian and French accents - so many she stopped counting," he writes. Malarek describes the traffickers' recruitment methods. An orphanage in Romania might receive a visit from "social workers" offering "apprentice programmes" for adolescent girls. The girls are taken away and forced into prostitution.

Much of Malarek's anger focuses on the annual US state department Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report, which grades countries with a trafficking problem according to three tiers. Nations fully compliant with the minimum standards in combatting trafficking are graded tier one, while those unwilling and unable to counter the problem are graded tier three. The UK is in tier one, but there are those who believe - Malarek among them - that the grading system is merely another strategy adopted by the US to reward its allies.

"The TIP report was designed to stop the traffickers operating with impunity," he says. "It was supposed to be about having the courage and vision to take a firm and even bold stand. It was supposed to be about leadership and accountability. But despite all the hoopla and sabre rattling, the US has degraded the process to little more than a diplomatic game."

Earlier this week, protesters in Bangladesh (graded a tier-three country) argued that the report was a means of pressuring the government into deploying troops in Iraq, and only criminalised the poor. "Poverty is the main cause of human trafficking and the US should look into it," said a spokesperson for the Bangladesh Citizens Alliance Against Trafficking .

Despite its TIP status, the UK does not have a strong track record in prosecuting traffickers, with the few cases that are brought being investigated mainly by the Metropolitan police. Even with the new legislation introduced through the Sex Offences Act, which has increased the penalty for human trafficking to a maximum of 14 years, traffickers are scarcely deterred by the force of the law.

In December last year, Luan Plakici, an Albanian, was sentenced to 10 years in prison for trafficking up to 60 young women from south-eastern Europe into the UK; he was also convicted on counts of incitement to rape, living on prostitution and kidnap. When the sentence was passed, there were gasps of disbelief from police and anti-trafficking activists at the judge's leniency.

The court of appeal later increased the sentence to 24 years. "Ten years is no deterrent," says Malarek. "Traffickers see it as an occupational hazard to go to jail every now and again. What hurts is when you seize their assets - take everything they have and give it back to the women they've abused and the police so they can track more of them down."

Does he think the situation has got worse? "There are no new crimes of this nature; just different ways of getting away with them." Malarek accuses the UK, and other countries that have thriving sex industries, of turning a blind eye. "Tolerance is worse than legalisation in a way. It means we can ignore the fact that some countries provide a safe haven for pimps rather than think of a solution. I would say to the UK, 'Legalise prostitution at your peril'. It would be a red light for pimps to operate with impunity, knowing vice is out of the police's hands."

The Natashas can seem like a hopeless story, the scale of the problem is so vast. But Malarek is not pessimistic. "What we need is for governments to say, 'Stop this, and stop it now'. I have a daughter, and would do anything I could to prevent her going into the sex trade. I'm proud of this book, and hope to hell it makes a difference. If it prevents just one life being ruined, then it will have been worth it."

The Natashas: The New Global Sex Trade, by Victor Malarek, is published today by Vision, £10.99

LOAD-DATE: August 12, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

CORRECTION-DATE: August 16, 2004

CORRECTION: The CBC documentary series, mentioned in an article head lined Tracking the traffickers, is The Fifth Estate and not, as we said, the Fifth Element, (G2, page 14, August 12).

Copyright 2004 Guardian Newspapers Limited

205 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Prague Post (Czech Republic)

August 12, 2004

U.S. seeks solution to trafficking

BYLINE: Dinah A. Spritzer

SECTION: News

LENGTH: 1033 words

Expert lauds efforts, decries drift toward sex-trade legalization Ambassador John Miller, director of the U.S. State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, paid a visit to the Czech Republic at the beginning of the month and met with trafficking experts. Miller's office helps countries to curtail forced labor and sexual slavery. His position was created last year as part of an expansion of the U.S. Trafficking Victim Protection Act. Passed in 2000, the act provided stiffer penalties against human traffickers and funding for assistance to victims of modern-day slavery. On Aug. 6 Miller discussed with The Prague Post the Czech fight against sexual slavery and U.S. concern over the Czech government's aim to legalize prostitution. The Prague Post: The Czech Republic has been dubbed by some as the brothel of Europe because of its booming sex trade. Does that bother you? John Miller: First of all, I am not in a position at all to look at the Czech Republic that way. I have seen a lot of other European countries that could make a pretty good claim to that title. TPP: Nonetheless, the number of sex clubs here has dramatically grown in the last few years. Aren't you concerned that they fuel trafficking? JM: There is no question that when you have a brothel, you have a demand for victims. Research indicates that enormous percentages of the women involved are not doing this of their free choice. The most recent survey - it's an American study by eight doctors - looks at 854 women engaged in prostitution in nine countries, ranging from Germany to Taiwan. That survey shows that the overwhelming majority report being continuously harassed, assaulted and raped. Eighty-nine percent want to escape from prostitution. TPP: You called it the oldest form of abuse, but don't women have the right to be prostitutes? JM: If most women are not getting into it by their free choice, we have to acknowledge this fact. And if it is associated with rape and assault and harassment, we have to acknowledge that fact as well. For the most part it is a human rights violation. TPP: So is this what you're telling mayors in this country: "Hey, I know you want to legalize prostitution: Don't do it"? JM: I haven't talked to any mayors. I wish I had. But we feel making the state the chief pimp is not going to help matters. We talked to NGOs nongovernmental organizations and they privately said this is not going to help the women involved. This is going to stigmatize them as a class. It is going to create a demand for more victims. It is going to invite organized crime to extend their tentacles. TPP: Jitka Gjuricova, the Interior Ministry expert on prostitution, says the ministry "draws inspiration" from countries where regulation of licensed prostitution has proven to be an effective means in fighting trafficking. JM: She draws inspiration, let's be blunt about it, from the Netherlands. If you look at the last decade in the Netherlands, the number of trafficking victims has quadrupled. They created a magnet for victims from all over the world, particularly from Eastern Europe. There is absolutely no evidence the Netherlands, this inspiration for those who seek legalization, has reduced trafficking in victims. It appears to be the opposite. TPP: How do you assess Czech efforts to curtail sexual slavery? JM: You now have a national action plan on trafficking. You have an organized-crime unit with officers focusing specifically on trafficking and this is something many countries don't have. You are just in the process of finishing a pilot project for victims, very advanced, and the government officials I have talked to want to expand it. TPP: And the shortcomings? JM: The Czech Republic is a Tier 1 best-practices country according to the U.S. Global Report on Trafficking, but every government can improve. We did notice there were 15 or 20 arrests last year of traffickers, five convictions and then only one person went to jail and the rest got suspended sentences. There was an educational campaign a couple of years ago in the schools but it ended and I think there is something to be done there. And it has to be directed not just at potential victims but at society as a whole. There is a need to develop an attitude that recognizes that such women are not criminals; they are not a lower class; they are victims. TPP: Does the U.S. fight against trafficking have any real influence on what governments do? JM: A year ago, in our Trafficking in Persons Report, we listed a host of countries in Tier 3, those not making significant efforts to stop trafficking. Included were some friends of ours, Greece and Turkey. In the three months after the report came out, while there was of course some criticism in these countries of our report, nonetheless there were people of goodwill who recognized this was a valuable tool. And so in these countries you found increased efforts at education, public service announcements directed at potential victims. You found law-enforcement training courses sensitizing police to look for victims, not just treating them as illegal immigrants. You found more arrests and prosecutions; you found more funding for NGOs helping victims. The point is to see progress. TPP: Many people object to the U.S. government acting as a moral bully. What gives you the right to boss other countries around? JM: There is not a government in the world that officially sanctions slavery. This is a universal value. I do not apologize for the fact that maybe the U.S. feels this value more acutely because of our history with slavery. I do not apologize for the fact that we take a leadership role on this. It is also not just a case of the U.S. looking at the world. One of the first things I did when I started this position was to commission a report on the U.S. TPP: What is the greatest weakness in the U.S. effort to combat trafficking at home? JM: Prosecutions. We have tripled them in the last two years, but there is more to be done. We know there are thousands of victims in the U.S. but the prosecutions are in the hundreds. Dinah A. Spritzer can be reached at dspritzer@praguepost.com

LOAD-DATE: August 12, 2004

LANGUAGE: English

PUB-TYPE: Paper

Copyright 2004 Prague Post s.r.o.

206 of 359 DOCUMENTS

BBC Summary of World Broadcasts

August 11, 2004, Wednesday

Bangladesh rally protests US trafficking report

SOURCE: The Daily Star web site, Dhaka, in English 11 Aug 04

LENGTH: 271 words

Text of report by Bangladesh newspaper The Daily Star web site on 11 August

No dateline as received The US report on human trafficking in Bangladesh is completely motivated, said the speakers at a rally yesterday.

They said the United States wants to create pressure on Bangladesh to deploy its troops in Iraq in the name of imposing sanctions for its alleged "worsening" trafficking situation.

The rally was jointly organized by Bangladesh Citizens Alliance Against Trafficking (BCAAT) and Sushasoner Janno Procharavijan Campaign for Good Governance (SUPRO) at Muktangon in the city.

The speakers said most of the Bangladeshi victims of trafficking were abused severely in some Middle East countries, but Bangladesh was relegated to tier three of the US State Department's "Human Trafficking in Persons Report 2004" which put those countries at Tier two.

The US has no authority to interfere in the internal affairs of Bangladesh, said alliance convenor Farida Aktar.

She said, "The poor are not criminal, rather they are the victims of trafficking. Poverty is the main cause of human trafficking and the US should look into it."

The US should also realize that sanctions would not help reduce trafficking in Bangladesh, she added.

SUPRO Secretary Rezaul Karim termed the sanction a device of imperialism to achieve its purposes.

He cautioned the government to abstain from entering any deal with the United States that goes against the interest of the country.

Later, a procession was brought out protesting US relegation of Bangladesh on trafficking and its possible sanctions.

LOAD-DATE: August 11, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 The British Broadcasting Corporation

207 of 359 DOCUMENTS

BBC Summary of World Broadcasts

August 11, 2004, Wednesday

Bangladesh disagrees with US human trafficking rating, calls for status upgrade

SOURCE: The Daily Star web site, Dhaka, in English 11 Aug 04

LENGTH: 555 words

Text of report by Bangladesh newspaper The Daily Star web site on 11 August

Foreign Minister M. Morshed Khan yesterday reiterated that Dhaka does not subscribe to the US report that tags Bangladesh as one of the most vulnerable states of origin in human trafficking.

He, however, said the United States should upgrade Bangladesh to a higher tier in recognition of the country's recent proactive measures against human trafficking.

"We never did accept Bangladesh's position in tier three and that's why we are pressing our case forward," Morshed told reporters referring to re-assessment of the country's role in containing human trafficking.

A US team arrived in Dhaka Monday 10 August to re-assess relegation of Bangladesh as one of the worst performers in preventing human trafficking.

Earlier on 14 June, the US State Department in its report on human trafficking downgraded Bangladesh to tier three for countries that are most vulnerable states of origin for human trafficking from tier two.

In a letter in May the US embassy in Dhaka gave a six-step work plan for Bangladesh to follow in response to the "Human Trafficking in Persons Report 2004".

Speaking in his office, Morshed said the government has taken some very significant steps to prevent human trafficking.

Morshed said government steps that include stronger implementation of existing anti-human trafficking laws, greater conviction of traffickers and more rigorous border screening measures, within a span of only 38 days of the US report is well up to par and should be encouraged by a return to tier two.

"We need support, because no country with such limited resources like ours can tackle the menace itself," said Morshed, adding, "Even more affluent nations like Greece and Turkey were downgraded to tier three in the US State Department's reports on human trafficking in previous years, but were put up to tier two after a year."

Reaz Rahman, adviser to the government on foreign affairs, told reporters that Dhaka has explained its difficulties in stemming the flow of human trafficking to the visiting US team, but also maintained that the government is very determined to make every possible effort to meet the challenge.

"We'd continue the process as part of our commitment to the people, not merely to graduate to tier two of a particular report," said Morshed.

The continuation of Bangladesh in tier three, Rahman said, would project a negative image of the country and might even deter possible General System of Preference facility as well as military assistance.

Withdrawal of non-humanitarian and non-trade US assistance could follow, if the visiting US team judge Bangladesh to have made inadequate efforts in improving the human-trafficking situation.

No country, however, has ever been slapped with such sanctions by the US for being marked as tier three country.

The US had given Bangladesh a deadline till 14 August to make "significant efforts" to comply with related US laws on human trafficking in persons in order to have a re-assessment. The visiting US team, lead by Mark Taylor, a senior official at the State Department, would return to US and have till 14 September to re-assess Bangladesh's position in tier three and give its report to Secretary of State Colin Powell.

LOAD-DATE: August 11, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 The British Broadcasting Corporation

208 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

August 11, 2004

Bangladesh Cited in Trafficking in Persons Report; Dhaka could be subject to sanctions if it does not address trafficking concerns

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 177 words

Following is the response to a question taken at the August 10 State Department daily briefing:

(begin text)

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE

Office of the Spokesman

August 10, 2004

Question Taken at August 10, 2004 Daily Press Briefing

BANGLADESH - TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS RANKING

Question: Is Bangladesh a Tier 3 country in the Trafficking in Persons report? If so, is Bangladesh being sanctioned, or would it face sanctions, as a result?

Answer: Bangladesh has been designated as a Tier 3 country on the Trafficking in Persons report. The U.S. is working with Bangladesh on areas of compliance with the recommendations of this report. Sanctions could be imposed if the government of Bangladesh does not take significant steps to address trafficking issues. No decision has been made on whether sanctions would be appropriate in this case. The President has until September 30, 2004 to make a decision on whether to impose or waive sanctions.

(end text)

(Distributed by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: August 11, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

209 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

August 10, 2004Question Taken at August 10, 2004 Daily Press Briefing; Bangladesh - Trafficking in Persons Ranking*SECTION: STATE DEPARTMENT PRESS RELEASESLENGTH: 114 words

Question: Is Bangladesh a Tier 3 country in the Trafficking in Persons report? If so, is Bangladesh being sanctioned, or would face sanctions, as a result?

Answer: Bangladesh has been designated as a Tier 3 country on the Trafficking in Persons report. The U.S. is working with Bangladesh on areas of compliance with the recommendations of this report. Sanctions could be imposed if the government of Bangladesh does not take significant steps to address trafficking issues. No decision has been made on whether sanctions would be appropriate in this case. The President has until September 30, 2004 to make a decision on whether to impose or waive sanctions.

2004/889

LOAD-DATE: August 11, 2004LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

210 of 359 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

August 10, 2004 Tuesday 8:42 AM EST

STATE DEPARTMENT RESPONDS TO QUESTION ON BANGLADESH ? TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS RANKING

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 121 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State issued the following press release:

Question: Is Bangladesh a Tier 3 country in the Trafficking in Persons report? If so, is Bangladesh being sanctioned, or would face sanctions, as a result?

Answer: Bangladesh has been designated as a Tier 3 country on the Trafficking in Persons report. The U.S. is working with Bangladesh on areas of compliance with the recommendations of this report. Sanctions could be imposed if the government of Bangladesh does not take significant steps to address trafficking issues. No decision has been made on whether sanctions would be appropriate in this case. The President has until September 30, 2004 to make a decision on whether to impose or waive sanctions.

LOAD-DATE: January 25, 2005

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

211 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English -- English

August 6, 2004 Friday

Thailand unveils war on human trafficking

BYLINE: JACK BARTONSECTION: International NewsLENGTH: 612 wordsDATELINE: BANGKOK, Aug 6

Thailand announced a war on human trafficking Friday, with Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra comparing those implicated in the global scourge to murderers leading their victims to a life of hell.

The campaign comes almost two months after the United States put Thailand on a human trafficking watchlist for its failure to make progress in stamping out the illegal trade.

"Human trafficking is cruel and equivalent to murder," said Thaksin, describing how thousands of poor people in the Mekong sub-region were being tricked into lives of virtual slavery by trafficking gangs.

"They (victims) are only seeing the heavenly tip of the iceberg, but the hell part is much bigger," he said at a national conference on trafficking.

The United Nations says up to one million people, mainly women, are trafficked globally each year, generating some seven billion dollars in annual profits for criminal gangs involved in the trade.

Thaksin pledged that Thailand would overhaul laws, create a special police taskforce, improve protection for victims, boost preventative education, forge greater local and international coordination and weed out corruption among politicians and police.

"If border police are corrupt that is the end of the matter and this ... is a waste of time," said a defiant Thaksin, adding that without effective and transparent enforcement any move to toughen penalties would be meaningless.

Thaksin said new legislation, yet to be signed into law, would more clearly define human trafficking and separate traffickers from their victims who are often reluctant to testify because of harsh treatment under current laws.

Some 500 million baht (12 million US dollars) would be set aside to care for and treat trafficking victims, he said.

Social Development Minister Sora-at Linparatoom said Thailand's role as a country of destination, transit and origin of victims meant it was pivotal to stemming the regional scourge.

"This government ... has declared war against human trafficking as seriously as it did in its declaration of war against drug trafficking," said Sora-at, referring to a controversial narcotics crackdown which saw more than 2,000 people killed.

The UN was highly critical of Thailand's drug war, but on Friday threw its support firmly behind the new initiative.

"The response is pragmatic and focuses both on law enforcement and human rights of victims," said the head of the UN's regional human trafficking program Philip Robertson.

"First and foremost human trafficking is a human rights abuse and when we talk about rights violations the first response should be to help the victims, then we must focus on how to stop it from taking place," he said.

Robertson said the depth of the strategy would be the most crucial element of its potential success.

"There is a recognition that it's not a problem that lends itself to one-dimensional solutions and also that it's critical for Thailand to cooperate with its neighbours and to better educate police," he said.

Thai police General Amnony Phetsiri said better police training, coupled with clearer laws targeting trafficking, would be a key factor in the new strategy.

"They need to know how to work appropriately with victims who have suffered physical and psychological harm," said Amnony, adding that officials are currently hamstrung because there is "no direct law or definition on human trafficking."

Friday's announcement comes ahead of a regional pact to fight trafficking that is expected to be signed between Cambodia, China, Laos, Myanmar, Thailand and Vietnam when ministers meet in Yangon in October.

jb/mlm/sdm

Thailand-trafficking

LOAD-DATE: August 7, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 Agence France Presse

212 of 359 DOCUMENTS

IPS-Inter Press Service

August 6, 2004, Friday

RIGHTS-THAILAND: TRAFFICKING VICTIMS FINALLY GIVEN PROTECTION by Marwaan Macan-Markar

LENGTH: 818 wordsDATELINE: BANGKOK, Aug. 6, 2004

The Thai government opened its arms to victims of human trafficking by unveiling a raft of measures aimed at protecting children, women and men trapped in this modern form of slavery.

The announcement made Friday by Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra underscored the priority Bangkok was giving to this form of abuse that is prevalent across Thailand and in neighbouring countries.

The law in Thailand will be amended to ensure that victims of human trafficking are protected, the prime minister told a packed auditorium in Bangkok gathered for the 'National Conference on Human Trafficking.'

"We must separate the victims from the traffickers," Thaksin said. "Victims must not be treated as offenders."

This marks a shift from the way victims of human trafficking were viewed under Thai immigration or labour laws - as violators of, say, the immigration law for having entered Thailand illegally.

Till now Thailand did not have specific laws to deal with victims of human trafficking, said Amnony Phetsiri, deputy commissioner-general of the Thai police.

"We must see victims as the beginning of (a process to gather) evidence to prosecute somebody," he added. "Human trafficking cases are unlike other cases."

To support such efforts, Thaksin announced that 500 million baht ($ 12.5 million) will be set aside to "look after victims of human trafficking."

"Human trafficking is evil and it is something we must be concerned about," he added. "Human trafficking is equivalent to murder."

The government also plans to help neighbouring countries, such as Burma, Cambodia and Laos, to prevent their citizens from being trafficked into Thailand.

And in October, Bangkok will join leaders from the neighbouring countries to sign a pledge to pursue joint efforts to "intercept the cycle of trafficking."

"It is very encouraging that Prime Minister Thaksin recognised the importance of regional cooperation in the Greater Mekong Sub-region to solve the problem, since they have to work together," Philip Robertson, of the United Nations Inter-Agency Project on Human Trafficking in the Greater Mekong Sub-region, told IPS.

Such a display of commitment comes shortly after Thailand was taken to task by the U.S. government for failing to crack down on a scourge that is ranked, on the level of drug-trafficking, as among the major trans-national crimes perpetrated by global crime syndicates.

In June, in the U.S. State Department's annual 'Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report, Thailand had slipped from being a 'tier 2' nation to being placed on the 'tier 2 watch list' of nations.

The 'tier 2' nations are those that the State Department concludes are throwing their weight to maintain minimum standards to combat trafficking, while 'tier 3' nations are those that have failed to do so and run the risk of having the U.S. government impose sanctions on them.

Besides Thailand, the other Mekong region countries on the watch list are Laos and Vietnam.

Meanwhile Burma is in the lowest ranking, Cambodia, however, was among the 'tier 2' nations -- a sign of its improved record after being ranked at the lowest level last year.

Currently, an estimated 600,000 to 800,000 people are trafficked across borders annually by crime gangs. Of that number, 250,000 - mostly women and children - are trafficked in South-east Asia.

The victims are forced to work as prostitutes after being lured away from their homes by being offered other jobs, such as working in restaurants.

In South-east Asia, Thailand stands out as the country affected by the three levels of human trafficking: a source of trafficking, a transit point for other nationals to be trafficked to a third country and a point where victims are trafficked to.

Thailand's inability to retain children through the school system has been cited as one factor feeding the human trafficking trade.

"Although we have compulsory education, 20 percent of children drop out by the sixth year," says Saisuree Chutikul, head of the national sub-committee on trafficking in women and children.

Close to 600,000 children who join the school system at the primary level have dropped out before they reach the high school level, she adds.

Friday's announcement by the Thaksin administration is being well received by non-governmental groups who have been in the vanguard to protect women and children from being trafficked.

"The government is moving in the correct direction. It is an important first step to protect and help victims," Sanphasit Koompraphant, director of the Bangkok-based Centre for the Protection of Children's Rights Foundation, told IPS.

The laws in the past pushed the victims to the traffickers because of the way the authorities treated them, he added. "Now victims will feel safe knowing they will not be arrested and can help detect the traffickers."

LOAD-DATE: August 6, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

213 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English -- English

July 28, 2004 Wednesday

Six Asian states convene to tackle human trafficking crisis

SECTION: International News

LENGTH: 338 words

DATELINE: BANGKOK, July 28

Senior officials from China and five Southeast Asian nations gathered in the Thai capital Wednesday to thrash out a new framework for fighting human trafficking in the region.

Representatives from Cambodia, China, Laos, Myanmar, Thailand and Vietnam were due to hammer out an inaugural agreement to address the problem that sees some 800,000 men, women and children trafficked annually across borders in a billion-dollar illicit trade.

It was the first time the countries came together to combat what Thailand's minister of social development and human security, Sora-at Klinpratoom, described as a "modern-day form of slavery".

"We must admit that the problem is a major one, and that it has huge impacts on the rights and livelihoods of our peoples," he said in an opening speech.

"The long land-borders that our countries share, and the geography of those border areas, makes it almost impossible to control these movements.

"Accordingly we have to work together, as good neighbours, to solve these problems."

The meeting is working on a memorandum of understanding that is expected to be signed by ministers of the six nations in Myanmar's capital Yangon in October.

The countries of the region have been strongly criticized for failing to recognize the scale of the problem.

In June the United States downgraded Thailand on its human trafficking watchlist for failure to make progress in stamping out the global scourge.

Thailand joins other Southeast Asian nations placed on the so-called "Tier Two watchlist" including Laos, the Philippines and Vietnam, while neighbouring Myanmar remains at Tier Three, the lowest level.

Earlier this month US President George W. Bush announced that 50 million dollars would be given to eight countries including Southeast Asia's Cambodia and Indonesia to fight trafficking.

The projects will focus primarily on fighting sex slavery, the fastest-growing category of trafficking, according to the US State Department.

mlm/ppy/nj

Thailand-trafficking-Asia

LOAD-DATE: July 29, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

214 of 359 DOCUMENTS

BBC Summary of World Broadcasts

July 27, 2004, Tuesday

Guyana disagrees with US decision on trafficking of persons

SOURCE: Caribbean Media Corporation news agency, Bridgetown, in English 1902 gmt 27 Jul 04

LENGTH: 297 words

Text of report by Caribbean Media Corporation (CMC) news agency on 27 July

Georgetown, Guyana: Guyana has disagreed with a decision by the United States to place the Caribbean state among countries that do not "fully comply with the minimum standards" in a bid to prevent the trafficking of people.

Two officials from the Office of Human Trafficking in the United States State Department have held talks with President Bharrat Jagdeo and Human Services and Social Security Minister Bibi Shadick on the issue.

Shadick later told reporters that Washington had erred by placing Guyana on the category of countries that fail to deal adequately with trafficking in persons (TIP), adding that by next year "Guyana will be on Tier I".

Last year the US State Department placed the Guyana on Tier 3 suggesting that the country "does not fully comply with the minimum standards and is not making significant efforts to prevent victimization, ensure protection of victims and prosecute perpetrators or traffickers".

The minimum standards require countries to criminalize trafficking; provide assistance and protection of victims in countries of origin, transit and destination; and repatriation of victims.

Shadick said Georgetown would be pressing ahead with efforts to meet the minimum standards outlined in the US Protocol on TIP.

A Guyana Government Information Agency (GINA) statement said that in the quest to meet global standards, the government would table TIP legislation before the August recess.

It said that an inter-governmental steering committee, including representatives from the Guyana Police Service, the ministries of Education, Amerindian Affairs, Foreign Affairs and Labour, had been established to help fight the TIP problem here.

LOAD-DATE: July 28, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 The British Broadcasting Corporation

215 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

July 24, 2004 Saturday

Nigeria; US Accuses Police, Immigration of Aiding Human Trafficking

BYLINE: This Day

LENGTH: 327 words

The United States of America, yesterday acc-used the Nigeria Police and top Immigration officers of being behind the notorious cases of human trafficking in Nigeria.

The accusation was made in Lagos yesterday by the Deputy Director, office to Combat and Monitor Traffi-cking in Person, Joann Schneider, said Nigeria unlike other government in Africa does not face severe resource constraints yet it commits inadequate funds and personnel to the fight against human trafficking.

She threatened that unless the Nigerian government demonstrates greater commitment in the fight against the malaise, the US may consider sanctioning Nigeria by withholding its support from Nigeria in matters of financial credit at the World Bank.

Beside, the US, according to Schneider, may also deny Nigeria from benefitting from the US assistance in several ways.

According to her: " Nigeria Police reported 98 arrests of trafficking suspects, 44 of whom remain under investigation. There are no known prosecution during the last year and anti-trafficking efforts among the states appeared to diminish considerably over the reported period. Report indicated that government officials particularly police, and immigrations officials, facilitate the trafficking of women and children. There is no discernible commitment by Nigerian government to address this trafficking Malaise".

Schneider explained that Nigeria which is presently in Tier 2 Watch List need to improve in its policy toward preventing human trafficking adding if it fails it will move down to Tier 3 Watch List, which is the category of countries under America sanction.

Shneider pointed out that the proposed sanction is not plan to punish Nigeria, rather it is executed to make Nigeria show a lot of seriousness in human trafficking problems and try to solve it.

"We want to do all that we can to make Nigeria government save its people and to stop them being traffic as slaves," she said.

LOAD-DATE: July 26, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

216 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Nation

July 13, 2004 Tuesday

TRAFFICKING OF WEAKER VESSELS

BYLINE: ASIF J. MIR

LENGTH: 860 words

ASIF J. MIR

Women are being sold like animals in Pakistani markets. Trafficking in persons - the illegal and highly profitable recruitment, transport, or sale of human beings into all forms of forced labour and servitude, including trafficking into forced marriage - is a tragic and complex human rights abuse. Like it or not, the increasing trend lays bare the sort of future we are ill fatedly going to see. Bangladeshi women are being kidnapped, married off to agents by unsuspecting parents, trafficked under false pretenses, or enticed by prospects of a better life, into brothels in Pakistan. Border police and other law enforcement agencies are well aware of the trafficking through entry points into Pakistan like Lahore, Kasur, Bahawalpur, Chhor and Badin.

In cases of women trafficking, coercive tactics are used to control women. In many cases corrupt officials facilitate the trafficking, accepting bribes to falsify documents and provide protection. Without such corruption and complicity on the part of state officials, trafficking could not thrive. Pakistan treats trafficked persons as illegal aliens, criminals, or both, exposing them to further abuse. By targeting the victims instead of the perpetrators, it thus allows the abuses to continue.

The buyers of these unfortunate women fix their prices after examining and scanning their bodies. They humiliate and sexually harass them in public. A Bengali woman can be sold in Pakistan for Rs 70,000 to 150,000 - depending on age and looks. Auctions of girls are arranged for three kinds of buyers: rich visiting Arabs (sheiks, businessmen, visitors, state-financed medical and university students), the rich local gentry, and rural farmers. Hidden in the slums of Karachi, Pakistan is a flourishing trade in young women and girls from Bangladesh. The forced trafficking of Bangladeshi women into Pakistan for the purposes of domestic or sexual slavery has been going on for at least 10 to 15 years. The majority of is lured from with promises of jobs, decent pay and a better life. They often end up in brothels in Bangladeshi paras (slums) in Karachi, although as their numbers have grown, brothels have been found in small towns throughout Pakistan.

In recent years, as the number of Bangladeshi women and girls trafficked into Pakistan has increased, the practice of selling female has become more clandestine. They are held under terrible conditions: they are not given proper food and are kept in crowded rooms. To compel the women and girls to provide the desired services, the pimps threaten to expose the women's status as illegal immigrants or denounce them under the Hudood laws, which penalise, among other things, sex outside of marriage and impose long prison terms and severe corporal punishment. Those who resist are beaten or worse. Instead of protecting the Bangladeshi women and girls by arresting those accountable for their illegal sale and forced prostitution or forced marriage, the Pakistani government imprisons the luckless women while allowing most brokers and pimps to go free.

In many cases Bangladeshi women and girls arrested by police in raids on brothels suffer prolonged detention, usually because they lack legal counsel or the financial resources to pay bail or surety. In other cases, the police allows pimps to bail out the women and take them back to the prostitution dens. Meanwhile, the pimps go free. Some pimps involved in the sale of Bangladeshi women and girls are occasionally arrested by the police, not one has ever been prosecuted or punished by the government for trafficking or for any of the other abuses resulting from trafficking and forced prostitution. Thus, the government, instead of dealing with the problems, seems intent on victimizing the victims.

The 2004 Trafficking in Persons Annual Report the launching ceremony of which was performed by Secretary of State Colin Powell was recently made public. With respect to Pakistan the Report notes that the arrests and conviction, a number of cases may be smuggling, the law enforcement officials do not often distinguish between trafficking and smuggling. It says that Pakistan is a source, transit, and destination country for trafficked persons. Women and girls are trafficked to Pakistan from Bangladesh, Afghanistan, Iran, Burma, Nepal, and Central Asia for forced commercial sexual exploitation and bonded labor. Girls and women from rural areas are trafficked to urban centers for commercial sexual exploitation and labor. Women trafficked from East Asian countries and Bangladesh to the Middle East often transit through Pakistan. Like other South Asian countries including India, Bangladesh, Nepal and Afghanistan, Pakistan is placed on Tier 2 Watch List this year "because of a failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons from the previous year."

Pakistan does not consistently differentiate between trafficking and smuggling so actual rates of prosecution are difficult to determine. Lack of resources also limits victim assistance efforts. Government officials greatly need training on the distinction between trafficking and smuggling.

LOAD-DATE: November 16, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Commentary/Opinion; Crime/Courts; Human Rights/Civil Liberties

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2004 News Bites Pty Ltd
All Rights Reserved

Global News Bites

217 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Federal Document Clearing House Congressional Testimony

July 8, 2004 Thursday

TRAFFICKING IN PERSON

SECTION: CAPITOL HILL HEARING TESTIMONYLENGTH: 1709 words

Statement of Charles Song Dir. of Legal Services for the Coalition to Abolish Slavery

Committee on House Government Reform Subcommittee on Human Rights and Wellness

July 8, 2004

Thank you for the pleasure and honor of speaking with you this afternoon on behalf of nongovernmental organizations working to combat trafficking and the thousands of survivors of trafficking and their families that are working hard to rebuild their lives. I would also like to commend Congressman Burton and Congresswoman Watson for their leadership in championing the rights of survivors of trafficking.

As the Staff Attorney at the Coalition to Abolish Slavery & Trafficking, I have been privileged to work collaboratively with nongovernmental organizations, pro bono attorneys, and law enforcement officials to ensure that survivors of trafficking receive comprehensive legal services. Since its inception in 1998, CAST has been dedicated exclusively to assisting all victims of human trafficking and modern-day slavery and working towards ending all instances of such human rights violations. CAST achieves its mission by providing social and legal services to victims, conducting training and advocacy to improve survivors' access to services and resources. CAST's activities are interconnected by a client-centered approach that seeks to empower trafficked victims to fully realize their individual potential while advancing the human rights of all trafficked persons, including victims of sex trafficking, domestic worker trafficking, and garment worker trafficking, to name but a few. CAST has been a trailblazer since its establishment by creating a social services model tailored to the needs of trafficking survivors and drafting a comprehensive training curriculum with its partners to provide practitioners with the tools to better serve trafficking victims. The latest milestone in CAST's continued leadership in the anti-trafficking movement is that it opened the first shelter for trafficking survivors in the country.

This afternoon, I would like to talk about the recently published Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report 2004, which chronicles anti- trafficking efforts of 140 countries worldwide and places them in one of three tiers based on their performances. The U.S. government has linked the tier-system to non-humanitarian aid to put pressure on countries that have not made substantial efforts to curb trafficking. I would like to convey our recommendations on ways the U.S. government could strengthen its efforts to combat trafficking and assist victims of trafficking, both at home and abroad. Human trafficking is a global problem that requires a global response. Globalization, along with the easy flow of information and goods thanks to technological advances, has made trafficking harder to track and easier to hide. Victims are trafficked through multiple routes and various transit points before they arrive in the U.S..

Therefore, it is imperative that the TIP Report take a holistic approach to combating trafficking rather than compartmentalizing trafficking happening in and outside of the U.S.. Treating trafficking in and outside of the U.S. as separate may not reflect the multi-dimensional aspects of the problem and provide a full scope of the issue. The foreign governments' activities need to be linked to U.S. government's efforts to provide a complete picture of the trafficking problem and to be able to tackle it. Furthermore, nongovernmental organizations both in and outside of the U.S. can work closely with foreign and U.S. governments to share their expertise and ground experience in formulating a multi-pronged response. This approach may facilitate collaboration between governments and enhance relations to mobilize for a common cause.

We urge the U.S. government to: 1) Improve implementation of the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000 (VTVPA), 2) Expand efforts to prevent trafficking from source countries, and 3) Increase its collaborative efforts with nongovernmental organizations nationwide and worldwide that serve victims of trafficking.

Landmark Trafficking Legislation

In 2000, thanks to the wisdom and leadership of Congress and anti- trafficking advocates nationwide, the VTVPA was passed to prosecute traffickers, protect victims of trafficking and prevent further trafficking. The landmark legislation, which is one of the most comprehensive in the world, criminalized trafficking for the first time and granted benefits to victims of trafficking provided they cooperate in a federal investigation. To date, not one single trafficker has been prosecuted under the new trafficking statute introduced in the VTVPA. Instead, they have been convicted of existing statutes, such as human smuggling and kidnapping, which usually carry lighter prison sentences. The new trafficking statute could carry a 20-year prison sentence with a maximum life sentence for some offenses, and this statute has yet to be applied in trafficking cases. Traffickers ought to pay for their crimes, especially if the legal measures to prosecute them already exist.

The number of investigations and benefits issuance has grown significantly since the VTVPA was enacted. Yet the absolute number of investigations and prosecutions of traffickers, certification letters that would allow victims to receive benefits, and T-visas that would allow victims to stabilize their immigration status and focus on rebuilding their lives, has room for improvement.

As of April 2004, the Department of Justice's Criminal Section of the Civil Rights Division had 153 open trafficking investigations. There were 26 convictions in all of FY2003. The Department of Health & Human Services granted 151 certifications and benefits eligibility letters in FY2003. As of November 2003, the Department of Homeland Security approved 328 - or less than half - of the 757 T-visa applications filed. The VTVPA mandates an annual quota of 5,000 T-Visas or nearly 20,000 over four years since it was passed. The numbers indicate that the VTVPA assists less than three percent of the estimated 14,500 to 17,500 victims trafficked into the U.S. every year. When we consider this figure to be an underestimate, the portion of victims receiving assistance is even smaller. Current Administration officials have set trafficking as a top priority for its government. It is safe to say that the VTVPA and its supporters had not intended to have traffickers going unpunished for this heinous crime and victims left without proper immigration status, work permits or basic survival necessities.

What Tier is the U.S.? CAST commends the U.S. government on its outreach campaign to raise awareness on trafficking in the U.S.. As the wealthiest nation in the world, the U.S. is a major destination country with its alluring promise of the American Dream. Yet the TIP Report does not mention how the U.S. government works with its embassies and consulates worldwide to provide information in various languages about workers' rights and immigrants' rights to all foreign nationals applying for a visa to enter the U.S.. Many trafficking victims receive inaccurate information from their traffickers before, during and after enslavement, and many are threatened with wrong information to prevent them from escaping. We at CAST have seen many instances where the very knowledge of one's rights in the U.S. could have saved a slavery victim from further abuse and possible death. Victims usually do not self-identify as victims of trafficking because they are isolated, threatened and live in fear for their well-being under the thumb of the traffickers. In fact, this lack of self-identification as victims of trafficking is one of the biggest obstacles in discovering and identifying victims of trafficking. Once they become aware that what is being done to them is a violation of their rights, it will become easier for them to come forward to denounce their traffickers.

International Forums on Trafficking

Conferences have been useful forums where practitioners of all backgrounds and ideologies congregate to exchange new ideas, best practices and lessons learned so that innovative programs will be replicated and tailored to meet the needs of victims enslaved in any U.S. state or country in the world. We would like to encourage the U.S. government to organize international conferences open to all practitioners at home and abroad to allow for transparent and free-flowing information and resources so that victims worldwide will be served in the most effective and efficient manner possible.

As the number of trafficked people grows exponentially and traffickers become savvier in skirting around law enforcement, it is critical that governments collaborate closely with nongovernmental organizations to find and assist victims. Furthermore, government estimates of the number of people trafficked into the U.S. every year has been changed from 50,000 in 1999 to 18,000-20,000 in 2003. In 2004, the estimate was further revised down to 14,500-17,500 a year, citing methodology changes rather than a decline in trafficked persons. CAST and many of the NGOs working in the field believe this number does not fully capture the scope of the trafficking problem in the U.S., and are concerned that trafficking may be misconstrued as a waning problem. CAST alone has served over 200 survivors of trafficking since its inception in 1998 and the Samoan case alone had another 200 survivors. While we recognize the difficulties associated with measuring this virtually invisible underground activity, we urge the government to apply a more consistent and accurate measurement tool to quantify this increasingly ubiquitous problem that could be as close to the average person as a neighboring home.

Conclusion

On behalf of CAST and other NGOs working to eradicate trafficking and assist victims of trafficking, we praise the work of the United States Congress in addressing one of the most egregious human rights violations in the world today and look forward to continuing to collaborate closely with members of Congress to protect survivors and abolish human trafficking in all of its forms.

Thank you.

LOAD-DATE: July 9, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

COMMITTEE: HOUSE GOVERNMENT REFORM

SUBCOMMITTEE: HUMAN RIGHTS AND WELLNESS

TESTIMONY-BY: CHARLES SONG, DIR.

AFFILIATION: LEGAL SERVICES FOR THE COALITION TO ABOLISH SLAVERY

Copyright 2004 FDCHeMedia, Inc. All Rights Reserved.

218 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

July 6, 2004 Tuesday

Japan to compile 'action plan' on human trafficking by year-end

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 802 words

DATELINE: TOKYO, July 6

The Japanese government will compile an 'action plan' by the end of this year to fight human trafficking after the U.S. State Department downgraded its assessment of Japan's efforts to combat the problem in a recent report, a Cabinet Secretariat official said Tuesday.

The plan will include measures such as submitting a bill to stipulate human trafficking as a crime, ratifying a U.N. protocol and working together with an international body on the matter, and imposing stricter visa rules for Filipinos who enter Japan on 'entertainment' visas.

Although government officials have indicated their discontent with the U.S. report, released June 14, which placed Japan on a special watch list for human trafficking, it obviously had an effect in accelerating Japanese efforts.

Chief Cabinet Secretary Hiroyuki Hosoda told a meeting of senior officials from the Foreign, Justice and welfare ministries as well as the National Police Agency to take prompt steps to deal with the issue.

'Human trafficking is a serious violation of human rights...Regardless of whether the (U.S.) report is right or wrong, we will have to take necessary measures,' Hosoda said at the outset of the meeting, the second of its kind since April.

Deputy Chief Cabinet Secretary Masahiro Futahashi called for compiling all the measures being considered by the relevant ministries into an action plan as soon as possible during this year, the official said.

According to the data reported to the meeting, police have uncovered at least 24 cases of human trafficking during the first half of this year, involving 13 suspects, including five brokers, and 16 female victims consisting of 15 Thais and one Colombian.

The police highlighted a case in which an American manager of a strip club in Okinawa hired a Colombian woman staying in Japan illegally to dance in strip shows and work as a prostitute and another in which a Thai woman brokered Thai women to a pub for prostitution purposes, the official said.

The latest tally compares to 51 cases involving 41 suspects, including eight brokers, and 83 female victims, including 43 Colombians, 21 Thais and 12 women from Taiwan, in 2003, the official added.

Of the victims, three Filipinos and three Thai women were sheltered at prefectural women's shelters during fiscal 2003, which ended in March this year, up from one in fiscal 2001 and two in fiscal 2002.

According to immigration authorities, over 100,000 women were overstaying their visas as of Jan. 1. Of these, 20,000 were Filipinos and 8,000 were Thais. Human rights groups and nongovernmental organizations say many of these women may be the victims of trafficking.

In order to deal with the problem, the Justice Ministry is drafting a bill to revise the Penal Code and enact a new law to submit it to the next ordinary Diet session convening in January, the official said.

Japan has dealt with cases of human trafficking, such as for sexual exploitation and forced labor, under existing laws, but they may fall short in dealing with cases aimed at selling internal organs, he said.

Immigration authorities are considering relaxing rules on requiring special permission for illegal residents to temporarily stay in Japan in cases involving trafficking victims.

The Health, Welfare and Labor Ministry will consider tie-ups with private-sector shelters to help expand the capacities of the prefectural-based shelters.

The Foreign Ministry will seek the ratification of the U.N. convention against transnational organized crime protocol on trafficking in persons, and allocations in the fiscal 2005 budget to join hands with the International Organization for Migration to repatriate victims.

Currently, Japan does not have a law that directly bans human trafficking, but instead employs the Penal Code and a variety of laws, including immigration and anti-prostitution legislation, to carry out trafficking-related prosecutions.

As a result, enforcement methods are limited to people such as low-end brokers or the victims' employers.

In the 'Trafficking in Persons' report, the U.S. State Department pressed Japan to boost its efforts to combat human trafficking, including increased investigations, prosecutions and convictions of trafficking crimes, and to provide better assistance for victims.

'Japan is a destination country for Asian, Latin American and Eastern European women and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labor and sexual exploitation,' the report said.

The report put Japan on a newly created watch list, citing the lack of a comprehensive law against human trafficking and victim protection efforts. The category contains 42 countries that are in danger of falling into the worst category in next year's report.

LOAD-DATE: July 6, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

219 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English -- English

July 5, 2004 Monday

US reprimanded by Thailand after misusing Queen's name

SECTION: International News

LENGTH: 330 words

DATELINE: BANGKOK, July 5

Thailand has reprimanded the United States after the name of the kingdom's highly revered queen was used in a US report as an alias for a human trafficking victim, a Thai official said Monday.

A diplomatic spat loomed after Thai officials spotted a US State Department report which used the name of Sirikit to mask the identity of a Thai girl who had been trafficked to Japan.

The kingdom's monarchy is held in the highest esteem by Thais and the penalty for making disparaging remarks about the royal family, which can include calling a royal by an incorrect title, is seven years in prison.

A prominent Thai intellectual was once arrested for referring to the king as "the skipper" -- King Bhumibol Adulyadej is an accomplished sailor -- and again about a decade later for describing the royals as "ordinary people".

He eventually received a royal pardon.

A Thai official said the US embassy had been contacted as soon as it became known that the queen's name was used to describe a 15-year-old Thai girl forced to work in a Japanese karaoke bar.

"We pointed out that this was very inappropriate," Thai foreign ministry spokesman Sihasak Phuangketkeow told AFP. "They said they were unaware of the name's significance and expressed regret and corrected it."

Sihasak said an investigation was still underway to see if the name, which only the Queen possesses in Thailand, was used intentionally.

"We are checking whether they were really unaware, or if someone deliberately provided them this name," he said, adding that the report had been compiled at the US embassy in Japan.

The use of the queen's name in a report on human trafficking is particularly embarrassing for the US, which has consistently hounded the kingdom about its record on the issue.

Last month, the United States downgraded the status of Thailand on its human trafficking watchlist for its failure to make progress in stamping out the global scourge.

jb/ppy/sdm

Thailand-US-row

LOAD-DATE: July 6, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

220 of 359 DOCUMENTS

BBC Summary of World Broadcasts

July 3, 2004, Saturday

Officials say Japan to probe new measures against human trafficking

SOURCE: Kyodo News Service, Tokyo, in English 1002 gmt 3 Jul 04

LENGTH: 349 words

Excerpt from report in English by Japanese news agency Kyodo

Tokyo, 3 July: To boost its efforts to combat human trafficking, the Japanese government is studying ways to implement sweeping changes to revise the Penal Code or the enactment of a new law to protect human trafficking victims, government officials said Saturday 3 July .

The Ministry of Justice, the Ministry of Health, Labour and Welfare, the National Police Agency and other concerned government agencies are set to meet Tuesday to prepare bills for submission to the regular Diet session next year, the officials said.

The latest moves by Japan follow the release of an annual US report that downgraded its assessment of Japan's efforts against human trafficking, putting Japan on a special watch list of countries that are on the verge of falling into the worst category.

According to the officials, the government is studying measures such as a revision of the Penal Code to make human trafficking a crime or the enactment of a new law that would stipulate criminal punishment for human trafficking.

The new law envisions a comprehensive set of measures that would include protection and relief provisions to victims of trafficking.

The move is also in line with efforts mainly by the Justice Ministry to prod Japan to ratify the United Nations Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime and its Protocols. Japan signed the three protocols in December 2002, which urges countries to clearly stipulate that human trafficking is a crime.

Methods on how to protect the victims have to be discussed among relevant authorities, given that many of the victims have issues regarding their legal status such as expired visas, officials said.

Currently, Japan does not have a law that directly bans human trafficking, but instead employs the code and a variety of laws such as immigration and anti-prostitution legislation to carry out trafficking-related prosecutions. As a result, enforcement methods are limited to people such as low-end brokers or the victims' employers. passage omitted

LOAD-DATE: July 3, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 The British Broadcasting Corporation

221 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

July 3, 2004 Saturday

Japan mulls revised penal code, new law to fight human trafficking

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 483 words

DATELINE: TOKYO, July 3

To boost its efforts to combat human trafficking, the Japanese government is studying ways to implement sweeping changes to revise the Penal Code or the enactment of a new law to protect human trafficking victims, government officials said Saturday.

The Ministry of Justice, the Ministry of Health, Labor and Welfare, the National Police Agency and other concerned government agencies are set to meet Tuesday to prepare bills for submission to the regular Diet session next year, the officials said.

The latest moves by Japan follow the release of an annual U.S. report that downgraded its assessment of Japan's efforts against human trafficking, putting Japan on a special watch list of countries that are on the verge of falling into the worst category.

According to the officials, the government is studying measures such as a revision of the Penal Code to make human trafficking a crime or the enactment of a new law that would stipulate criminal punishment for human trafficking.

The new law envisions a comprehensive set of measures that would include protection and relief provisions to victims of trafficking.

The move is also in line with efforts mainly by the Justice Ministry to prod Japan to ratify the United Nations Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime and its Protocols.

Japan signed the three protocols in December 2002, which urges countries to clearly stipulate that human trafficking is a crime.

Methods on how to protect the victims have to be discussed among relevant authorities, given that many of the victims have issues regarding their legal status such as expired visas, officials said.

Currently, Japan does not have a law that directly bans human trafficking, but instead employs the code and a variety of laws such as immigration and anti-prostitution legislation to carry out trafficking-related prosecutions.

As a result, enforcement methods are limited to people such as low-end brokers or the victims' employers.

In a 'Trafficking in Persons' report released last month, the U.S. State Department pressed Japan to boost its efforts to combat human trafficking, including increased investigations, prosecutions and convictions of trafficking crimes and to provide better assistance for victims.

'Japan is a destination country for Asian, Latin American and Eastern European women and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labor and sexual exploitation,' the report said.

The report put Japan on a newly created Tier 2 Watch List, citing a lack of a comprehensive law against human trafficking and victim protection efforts. 'Japan's trafficking problem is large and Japanese organized crime groups that operate internationally are involved,' the report said.

The Tier 2 category comprises 42 countries that are in danger of falling into the worst Tier 3 category in next year's report.

LOAD-DATE: July 3, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 Kyodo News Service

222 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 29, 2004 Tuesday

Ghana; Child Trafficking a Major Problem in Africa, Report Finds

BYLINE: Ghanaian Chronicle

LENGTH: 715 words

Ghanaian chief describes efforts to combat child labor

For the scores of boys who work in the fishing industry on Ghana's Lake Volta, life is more than simply grueling and monotonous - it is slavery, with no schools, no medical care, and no hope.

The boys, some as young as six years old, have been sold by their families to spend their days rowing boats across the lake and pulling nets laden with fish from the water.

More than a year ago, Togbega Hadjor, paramount chief of Ghana's Bakpa Traditional Area, where child trafficking has been common, committed himself to ending this exploitation of children when the International Organization for Migration (IOM) asked for his help in combating child slavery in the Lake Volta region.

Hadjor was among several heroes in the fight against human trafficking who were honored in Washington June 14 when the U.S. Department of State released its annual Trafficking in Persons Report. The report evaluated efforts by 140 countries around the world to combat human trafficking, and ranked countries in tiers that correspond to their efforts to end the practice.

When the IOM approached him, Hadjor put together a list of 13 villages in his region where child trafficking was taking place, and held community meetings to discuss ways to reintegrate boys who had been working in the fishing industry. Over the past year, 228 children have been rescued from forced labor on Lake Volta, and Hadjor has helped many of them enroll in school and reunite with their families.

"The problem is being overcome. When I have people approach me, I advise them that they should remove their children [from slavery], and they've been doing it," he said.

Among nations in sub-Saharan Africa, Ghana was the only one to be listed as a "Tier One" nation for its strong efforts to prevent child trafficking. The report found that Ghana has excelled at protecting victims of trafficking and reintegrating them into their communities, although it still urged the Ghanaian government to pass anti-trafficking legislation.

Three nations in sub-Saharan Africa - Equatorial Guinea, Sierra Leone, and Sudan - received a "Tier Three" or least favorable ranking in the report for failing to make reasonable attempts to end the exploitation of minors. In Equatorial Guinea, the report found, the government has not used the resources from its petroleum industry to do anything to alleviate the situation. In Sierra Leone, it said, the government recognizes that trafficking is a problem, but has not made substantial efforts to prevent it.

The report was particularly critical of Sudan, noting, "Government officials deny the existence of trafficking in Sudan." It is estimated that 17,500 people have been abducted in Sudan since 1980.

Nations ranked as Tier Three face the possibility of losing U.S. aid if they do not make an effort to combat human trafficking. Globally, 10 countries were included on the Tier three list. The report indicated that child trafficking is a particularly challenging problem in Africa because of the practice of "fostering" or "placement" of children.

Under this traditional system, children are sent to live with relatives or other trusted individuals, and are given schooling or learn a trade. Yet "in all too many cases, the child is trafficked into a situation of forced domestic servitude, street vending, or sexual exploitation," the authors wrote.

In Ghana's Bakpa Traditional Area, where Chief Hajor has helped reunite children with their families, trafficking has been driven by economic need. Communities downstream from Lake Volta that once supported themselves through farming and fishing have been left destitute by the construction of two dams on the Volta River, and many families that sent their children to work on the lake did so because they could no longer support them.

Hajor sees another underlying cause of child trafficking: polygamy. Men who marry several wives and have large families often find themselves unable to support their children, he said.

["I tell [villagers] that if you want a wife, take only one," he said. (The Washington File is a product of the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State. Web site: <http://usinfo.state.gov>)]

LOAD-DATE: June 29, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 AllAfrica, Inc.

223 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Daily Telegraph (Sydney, Australia)

June 26, 2004 Saturday

Standing up to the sex-slave traders

SOURCE: MATP

BYLINE: MARTIN WALLACE

SECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 18

LENGTH: 740 words

For years Australia refused to admit sex slavery was a problem. Now the blindfold is off, as MARTIN WALLACE reports

AUSTRALIA'S shameful role in the sex slavery trade has been massively under-estimated, the Federal Government's own expert adviser warned last night.

The revelation comes as Australia was named for the first time as a "destination country" for sex slavery in a global report.

A wide-ranging inquiry by the Australian Crime Commission's parliamentary watchdog has revealed sex traders bring 1000 women into the country every year.

Estimates by sex worker support groups that thousands of victims are suffering unspeakable treatment in captivity here have long been at odds with official figures, which only list 15 victims over the past four years.

International authority on sex slavery Paul Holmes has been brought in to train the Government's new anti-trafficking unit -- formed as part of a $20 million response to sex slavery in Australia.

The former Scotland Yard detective is the author of Interpol's trafficking investigation guide.

"By the time investigations in Australia have been running for 12 months I believe no one will be telling me that they have only found 15 victims," Mr Holmes said.

The majority of sex slaves are brought in from Thailand, China, Malaysia, Korea and Indonesia. Others are smuggled in from Central Asia and Eastern Europe.

The US State Department's most comprehensive report on human trafficking listed Australia as a "tier 1 country" -- meaning there is a significant problem but the Government's response only meets minimum standards.

That puts us on a par with Morocco, Lithuania and the Czech Republic.

US anti-sex slavery group Shared Hope said Australia was only now admitting the extent of the problem.

The parliamentary joint committee inquiry has urged the Crime Commission to focus on how traffickers are getting round Australia's immigration barriers using student and holiday visas and false passports.

A 26-year-old trafficking victim has told Melbourne-based sex worker support group Project Respect of how she was tricked into moving from Thailand by sex traders.

The woman was promised work but had her passport taken as soon as she arrived at a Sydney "safe house".

She was beaten and starved for three weeks when she refused to work as a prostitute.

The woman was kept locked inside the apartment with five other sex slaves.

She was made to work seven days a week and serviced more than 300 men over the next eight months. The only cash she saw was tips.

Her Asian captors threatened to kill her if she spoke to anyone about her situation.

She was too terrified to run away and was eventually released after paying off her $40,000 debt bondage.

The woman is now living with friends in Sydney.

According to the US report, the number of illegal sex workers has tripled in NSW since brothels were legalised in 1995.

In October last year, Justice Minister Chris Ellison announced $20 million worth of anti-sex slavery measures, including the formation of the AFP's 23-member Transnational Sexual Exploitation and Trafficking Team.

He also introduced victim support measures including access to legal, medical and counselling services.

Ten people are awaiting trial on sex slavery-related offences in Australia.

Mr Holmes believes Australia's sex slavery networks have been emboldened by the Government's refusal to admit the problem exists.

"Once governments channel resources into it, then we start seeing results," he said.

One woman's tragic story

THE fate of women forced into sex slavery in Australia is exemplified by the case of Nawaporn Buntanchai.

Nawaporn, 30, arrived in Sydney from her home in northern Thailand in April, 2001, with a promise she would work in a restaurant.

Instead, she was raped, drugged and forced to become a sex worker. An "acquaintance of an acquaintance" had promised her visas and work permits would be waiting for her when she arrived.

"For a long time I had a dream of living in a democratic country where I could live like a respected human being, having not only material wealth, but also spiritual fulfillment," Nawaporn wrote. But her dreams were shattered.

She was attacked by a pimp, drugged and told she had to provide sexual services for money until she was rescued by the police.

She told police her story and she is now living in Europe.

LOAD-DATE: June 25, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

JOURNAL-CODE: DTM

224 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Japan Times

June 26, 2004, Saturday

Cooperation key to war on human trafficking

LENGTH: 284 words

By HIROSHI MATSUBARA, Staff writer

A surge in human trafficking has become an urgent global problem that can only be curbed through international cooperation, experts said Friday.

The call came from participants of a two-day international meeting on human trafficking that was held in Tokyo earlier this week.

Speaking at a news conference at the Foreign Correspondents' Club in Japan, they urged Japan to take effective steps to crack down on the complex problem through better cooperation with various government bodies and nongovernmental organizations. Japan was placed on a "special watch" list in the U.S. State Department's annual report on human trafficking earlier this month.

One of the speakers, Saisuree Chutikul, a former Cabinet minister of Thailand and a member of the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child, said Japan is a major destination of trafficking victims - mainly women - from Thailand and other parts of Southeast Asia.

She urged Tokyo to act on the "three Ps": prevent trafficking, protect victims and prosecute traffickers or exploiters.

Mu Sochua, Cambodia's minister for women's and veterans' affairs, said her country's efforts to recover from its war-torn past have been greatly obstructed by the trafficking of its nationals.

She said such crimes not only violate the rights of victims but also destroy "the culture, economy, and the whole nation."

Speaking at the symposium, former Justice Minister Mayumi Moriyama expressed her dissatisfaction with the U.S. report, which criticized Japan for failing to create a comprehensive law to curb human trafficking. She said the report failed to properly take into account Japan's past efforts.

LOAD-DATE: June 25, 2004LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 The Japan Times Ltd.

225 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Japan Times

June 26, 2004, Saturday

Cooperation key to war on human trafficking

LENGTH: 284 words

By HIROSHI MATSUBARA, Staff writer

A surge in human trafficking has become an urgent global problem that can only be curbed through international cooperation, experts said Friday.

The call came from participants of a two-day international meeting on human trafficking that was held in Tokyo earlier this week.

Speaking at a news conference at the Foreign Correspondents' Club in Japan, they urged Japan to take effective steps to crack down on the complex problem through better cooperation with various government bodies and nongovernmental organizations. Japan was placed on a "special watch" list in the U.S. State Department's annual report on human trafficking earlier this month.

One of the speakers, Saisuree Chutikul, a former Cabinet minister of Thailand and a member of the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child, said Japan is a major destination of trafficking victims - mainly women - from Thailand and other parts of Southeast Asia.

She urged Tokyo to act on the "three Ps": prevent trafficking, protect victims and prosecute traffickers or exploiters.

Mu Sochua, Cambodia's minister for women's and veterans' affairs, said her country's efforts to recover from its war-torn past have been greatly obstructed by the trafficking of its nationals.

She said such crimes not only violate the rights of victims but also destroy "the culture, economy, and the whole nation."

Speaking at the symposium, former Justice Minister Mayumi Moriyama expressed her dissatisfaction with the U.S. report, which criticized Japan for failing to create a comprehensive law to curb human trafficking. She said the report failed to properly take into account Japan's past efforts.

LOAD-DATE: June 25, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 The Japan Times Ltd.

226 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Cabinet Maker

June 25, 2004

ETHICAL SOURCING: What price teak?

SECTION: Pg. 20

LENGTH: 1600 words

If you sell teak furniture, or have some in your garden, perhaps you should spare a thought for where it was sourced from and how. Mark Lewis looks at the Burmese teak situation

Teak is a beautiful, durable hardwood. It grows in very few places and demands a large premium because of this. The very best teak grows in Burma (Myanmar), which derives a large bulk of its income from it. This Burmese wood makes sturdy and popular garden furniture, but should British retailers be stocking it?

Non-governmental organisations such as Global Witness and The Burma Campaign think not. They argue that, like West Africa's so called blood diamonds', Burmese teak funds civil wars, and sustains a vicious government.

A classic military dictatorship, the Burmese government drips with Orwellian irony. Since it came to power in a military coup in 1962, The State Peace and Development Council (SPDC) has kept the country in abject poverty and almost perpetual civil war.

The British Foreign Office estimates that 40% of Burma's GDP is spent on the army, compared to 0.3% spent on health. This in a country where AIDS, given sustenance by human trafficking and forced prostitution, is threatening to spiral to African proportions.

Girls as young as 10 are bought and sold into sexual slavery, often smuggled across borders into neighbouring countries. Last November The Economist reported on sex trafficking into Cambodia. A girl, aged 17, has lesions on her skin, a symptom of AIDS,' it wrote. She traces them with her fingertips and says they are the result of a disease caused by the local water. She and others who have similar markings use a local traditional medicine to try, without success, to clean them up.' When they become too ill to work, they will be discarded.

The Burmese government is soft on this kind of slavery. Under the US's three-tier categorisation of countries which allow human trafficking, Burma is in tier three. That means it neither adheres to minimum standards of prevention, nor makes any effort to do so.

The other form of human trafficking, forced labour, is also a favourite of the Burmese government, particularly for building roads and military camps. In 2000, Burma was censured by the UN's International Labour Organisation who called on the international community to impose sanctions on Burmese goods. The ILO found that the use of forced labour was systematic and widespread, and it accused the government of a crime against humanity'. John Jackson, The Burma Campaign director, described a situation where women were being raped on the roadside, and old people were dying of exhaustion at work.

The Foreign Office argues that doing business with Burma, whether teak or anything else, puts money in the pocket of the generals who maintain the dictatorship. It is impossible to do business there without working with generals, because it is such a highly centralised state,' says a spokesman. Many of those generals lead armies of children. With 77,000 child soldiers, Burma boasts more than any other country. That's 25% of the world's child soldiers,' says Jackson. He talks about a country where 11 year-olds are made to rape women, burn villages and beat people to death'.

The Foreign Office also believes companies that source timber from Burma or set up factories there, put money in the pocket of the military junta, and give it political legitimacy.

In 1990 the military junta did eventually allow an election. Believing itself popular enough to receive a public mandate, it was shocked when the rival National League for Democracy (NLD) won by a landslide. The result was never honoured, and the NLD's leader, Aung San Suu Kyi was promptly locked up. She remains perhaps the world's best-known political prisoner, and has been awarded a Nobel Peace prize in absentia.

Suu Kyi is reported to have urged companies not to invest in Burma. The Burma Campaign uses this as a clarion call to its cause. It publishes a 'dirty list' of British companies that invest there.

On the list is garden furniture manufacturer Alexander Rose. It sources teak from Burmese forests, and maintains a factory in the country. Borge Leth, Alexander Rose technical director, spends a lot of time in Burma, and mounts an eloquent defence for the company's association with the country. He broadly agrees with much of what The Burma Campaign says. Yes, the Burmese government is horrible; yes, the Burmese people are downtrodden because of it, but his factory keeps 200 families in food and clothes.

Even so, The Burma Campaign has hurt. Ikea and John Lewis refuse to buy furniture from Burma (John Lewis's Alexander Rose teak comes from Africa).

Major garden furniture retailers B&Q, Homebase, Focus-Wickes and Wyevale also told Cabinet Maker that they do not sell products made from Burmese teak.

Alexander Rose's Burma operation is constantly under internal review. Indeed, three years ago it was worth pounds 1.632m, today it is worth only pounds 544,000. It accounts for just 10% of the company's turnover. And given the political damage the company incurs because of its association with Burma, pulling out at a loss of 10% of turnover is something Leth feels it could live with. But in my heart I feel that would be the wrong decision,' he says. I am 90% sure that I am doing the right thing for those people. It is a topic which is close to my heart.'

The British Government is less sure. British American Tobacco recently sold its concern in Burma after an unprecedented request from the Foreign Office which said its presence offered economic succour and political legitimacy to the military junta. It advises British companies not to invest in the country and will provide no assistance to those which do. And like The Burma Campaign, the Foreign Office points to Suu Kyi's supposed opposition to foreign investment.

If Aung San Suu Kyi or someone from her party comes down and sees what we are doing,' says Leth, and comes back with the recommendation that we should still not be dealing with them, then I will put my hands up and admit I was wrong. But not somebody sitting in London from The Burma Campaign.'

It is the only time he gets upset. He is calmer when he compares Alexander Rose's legally felled teak to some of the illegal timber. The government sponsored timber is, at least, sustainable, he says. And while it does not agree that government commercial logging is sustainable, Global Witness does concede that it is a good deal less damaging than the illegal logging happening in the north and south of the country.

In Kachin State on the Chinese border, there is an ecological disaster unfolding. Uninhibited illegal logging of 150 year-old teak trees is devastating the local landscape and setting the whole region up for soil erosion and flooding. The country is losing forest cover at a rate of 1.4% a year and is threatening the ecosystem of this biologically diverse region.

As a Global Witness report, A Conflict of Interests: The Uncertain Future of Burma's Forests, noted at the end of last year: Despite the environmental and economic disasters experienced by both the Chinese and the Thais as a result of deforestation, they have encouraged the very same companies to log just over the border in Burma, with the same predictable results.'

Burma's neighbours are fantastically resource hungry. Fortunately for them, Burma is fantastically resource rich. It has some of the most fertile soil in mainland Asia, large and important offshore oil reserves, as well as jade, rubies and sapphires. Most important, it has timber, and sports around 60% of the world's teak. Yet its people are pitifully poor, while Burmese border towns in China and Burmese generals and strongmen are getting rich.

In 1999-2000, official Burmese teak exports totalled 806,000cu metres. Teak importing countries officially imported 1.72million cu m over the same period. The shortfall of 914,000cu m is just a fraction of how much teak is illegally felled every year. Most of it ends up in China. Much will make its way to British gardens in the shape of outdoor furniture.

There are three types of teak: Burmese, Indonesian and African. Leth says anyone dealing with teak can see immediately which is which. China does not have any teak. So anyone importing teak from China knows it is the Burmese variety, probably from Burma, and often illegal.

EU regulations state that timber products should be marked with a made in x' label. But that refers only to the last place the timber was substantially changed. Global Witness suggests clearing up any confusion by scrapping that and having a timber sourced in x' label and a last manufactured in x' label.

It also suggests consumers should ensure that timber imported from Burma does not fund conflict, or lead to human rights abuse or increased poverty, and that it is harvested from a legal, sustainable, managed source and produced in accordance with Burma's international obligations'

Andrew Berry, HJ Berry and Sons director has a more radical solution. Using local product is the most environmentally friendly thing you can do,' he says. He is thinking of introducing a range of garden furniture made from British oak. It is just as attractive as teak and nearly as durable, he claims.

It would take an immense effort, and almost as large subsidies, to create a manageable British forestry sector. Because though traditional teak furniture certainly feels British, it's worth remembering where the trees were cut down.

LOAD-DATE: June 29, 2004

LANGUAGE: English

PUB-TYPE: Magazine

227 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Daily Yomiuri (Tokyo)

June 25, 2004 Friday

Govt must act on human trafficking

BYLINE: Jake Adelstein Yomiuri Shimbun Staff WriterSOURCE: YomiuriSECTION: Pg. 4LENGTH: 866 words

Japan, which was the venue for a two-day international meeting on human trafficking that closed in Tokyo on Thursday, was itself listed in the U.S. State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report released on June 14 as a "special watch" country for not fully complying with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking.

The symposium, "Strategies for Human Trafficking in Asia," was organized by the U.S. Embassy, the nongovernmental organization Vital Voices, and the International Labor Organization and was attended by, among others, officials of the National Police Agency and the Justice Ministry.

In his opening remarks, U.S. Ambassador Howard Baker said, "I hope the ideas that come out this conference help victims all over the world."

One such victim was Sirikit (not her real name), whose experiences in Japan were documented in the State Department's report.

Born into a poor community in rural Thailand, at 15 Sirikit found a foreign labor agent in Bangkok who advertised well-paid waitressing jobs in Japan. But on her arrival in Japan, she was taken to a karaoke bar, where the owner raped her, subjected her to a blood test and then bought her.

"I felt like a piece of flesh being inspected," Sirikit recounted in the report. She was told that she had to pay off a large debt for her travel expenses and she was warned that girls who tried to escape were brought back by the yakuza, severely beaten, and their debts doubled. The only way to pay off the debt, she was told, was to service as many clients as possible as quickly as possible.

The report described in great detail the plight of Sirikit and other human-trafficking victims in Japan, focusing a harsh spotlight on the reality of the trafficking problem in this country.

It states quite critically that "the Japanese government must begin to fully employ its resources to address this serious human rights crime within its borders." And while crediting Japanese authorities for the arrest of 41 individuals involved in trafficking, last year, the report does not mention whether this was a significant number.

The watch list targets countries in which more than 100 hundred reports of human trafficking have been collected. However, the rating attached to countries is based on the judgment of the State Department alone.

Former Justice Minister Mayumi Moriyama touched upon this in her remarks. Expressing her displeasure, she noted that while the Japanese authorities had increased their cooperation and are preparing legislation, the United States had not properly noted these efforts.

Why did the United States, which is so sensitive to human rights issues, make Japan such a target of criticism in the report?

In all likelihood it is because Japan has neglected to create a legal framework for dealing with this modern form of slavery.

The report states: "Japan lacks a comprehensive law against trafficking...The government currently employs the penal code and a variety of labor, immigration, and child welfare/protection statutes to carry out limited trafficking-related prosecutions. These laws provide for up to 10-year prison terms and steep fines, but actual penalties have been far less severe."

Japan's failure to protect the women trafficked to its shores also is a major bone of contention. "Over the past year, the Japanese Government offered victims of sexual slavery little in the way of legal advice or psychological or financial support. Generally, victims were deported as illegal aliens," the report states.

The report is very unforgiving in regard to Japan's lack of action in trafficking matters.

Govt to implement measures

The Yomiuri Shimbun

The government decided Wednesday to implement a number of measures to eradicate human trafficking, including formulating a new law, tightening existing rules and making penalties for traffickers more severe.

The specifics of the new measures are to be hammered out by a forum to reinforce cooperation between four ministries and agencies on preventing women being trafficked into Japan from abroad and forced to work in the sex industry, which opens July 6.

The forum will be attended by bureau chief-class officials from the National Police Agency, the Justice Ministry, the Foreign Ministry and the Health, Labor and Welfare Ministry.

The government's decision is a response to mounting international criticism of how Japan is combating people trafficking following the publication of the U.S. State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report on June 14.

The report put Japan on a special watch list of countries on the verge of falling into the worst of three categories of countries involved in the trade, and urged Tokyo to do more to prosecute traffickers and help victims.

The government decided drastic new measures were necessary following criticism from legal circles that there currently is no law that comprehensively outlaws the trade and penalizes traffickers, and that existing punishments are relatively light given the seriousness of the crime.

People trafficking is prohibited under the Prostitution Prevention Law and the Penal Code.

LOAD-DATE: June 24, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 The Yomiuri Shimbun

228 of 359 DOCUMENTS

BusinessWorld

June 24, 2004, Thursday

Official contradicts US assessment of gov't anti-trafficking efforts, cites progress made

BYLINE: Ma. Eloisa I. Calderon

SECTION: Pg. 11

LENGTH: 331 words

The government yesterday took a defensive stance on the United States' assessment of its efforts to combat trafficking noting that the US Department of State failed to consider that the Philippines implemented the anti-trafficking law just this year.

The US State Department, in its 2004 Trafficking in Persons Report, gave the Philippines a Tier 2 Watch List rating, a downgrade from the grade it got for the past three years after noting there was no improvement in the enforcement of the new law.

But Executive Director Catherine Maceda of the Commission on Filipino Overseas, a division of the Department of Foreign Affairs said Republic Act 9208 or the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act, said although it was passed on May 26, was just implemented in January. A fact that may not have been taken into consideration when the US made its annual trafficking report.

"Between January and now, we are talking of six months time frame for the implementation. We have six cases involving six people since the law was passed. In terms of seeing actual results since the law was passed, this is the first time we've seen people really coming out to report cases," Ms. Maceda told reporters and US embassy officials at a videoconference held in Roxas Boulevard, Manila.

The latest State Department report, noted that the Philippines has prosecuted only three trafficking cases under the new law and had only two convictions for trafficking-related offenses under other laws. It also stressed that country should take immediate corrective action as its prosecution remained weak.

But Ms. Maceda and other government officials noted the significant efforts the Philippines had been undertaking to combat human trafficking.

"The law which was just passed created an Interagency Council Against Human Trafficking. This is the first time where you see government efforts being integrated. [But] we realize that there is a big need for us to improve law enforcement," she said.

LOAD-DATE: June 23, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

229 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Federal Document Clearing House Congressional Testimony

June 24, 2004 Thursday

TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS

SECTION: CAPITOL HILL HEARING TESTIMONYLENGTH: 3523 words

Statement of Michele A. Clark Co-Director, The Protection Project at Johns Hopkins University School of Advanced International Studies

Committee on House International Relations Subcommittee on International Terrorism, Nonproliferation and Human Rights

June 24, 2004

Mr. Chairman, members of the sub-committee, I am honored to be here today and would like to thank you for holding this hearing on trafficking in persons, a most egregious form of modern slavery. My name is Michele Clark and I am the co-director of The Protection Project, a human rights research institute located at the Johns Hopkins University School of Advanced International Studies. For the past seven years, we have focused on documenting and analyzing the complex dimensions of human trafficking. We have worked with members of Congress and US government agencies as well as representatives of foreign governments and NGOs to develop sound policy and practice in the war against trafficking and to conduct training, in this country as well as overseas, on the provision of services to victims of trafficking, drafting anti-trafficking legislation and identifying victims of trafficking.

In the past year, Protection Project staff have traveled to over twenty-five countries on 5 different continents, and throughout the United States. On behalf of the many victims we have spoken with in places as diverse as the Amazon jungle region in Peru, the cabarets in Cyprus and prisons in the United Arab Emirates, I would like to thank you for your strong, on-going support of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA).

The Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act (TVPRA), signed into law on December 19, 2003, has proven to be an effective tool in the war against trafficking. This law provides not only for appropriations for the TVPA for 2004 and 2005, but also, through its amendments, enhances efforts to prevent trafficking, protect victims and prosecute traffickers.

I would also like to take this opportunity to thank John Miller and the outstanding staff of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons for their hard work, and for the excellent 2004 Trafficking in Persons Report issued on June 14, 2004. The report is thorough, well written and highly informative. By including short testimonies illustrating experiences of victims of trafficking as well as acknowledging the valiant work of heroes in this cause, we come away with not only a sense of the policy and programmatic activities being undertaken to combat trafficking; we are also able to glimpse the heartaches and the horrors, the triumphs and the victories, of those who suffer and those who labor on their behalf. Our common mission is about saving lives, and this report helps us to focus on what is needed to accomplish this goal.

The War Against Trafficking Today

My intent today is to present a bird's eye view of where we are in the war against trafficking, and to provide recommendations on areas that deserve our immediate attention.

We have come a long way since October 2000, when Congress passed the Trafficking Victims Protection Act. Anti-trafficking laws have been passed in countries around the world - but still not enough countries have such laws. Of the 131 countries included in the Trafficking In Persons report, only 68, or 51 percent, have legislation which addresses trafficking. Among those with anti- trafficking legislation, enforcement remains weak. Thirty-three countries, or 25 percent, have adopted national action plans to combat countries. However, these are infrequently implemented, owing to a lack of capacity, a lack of resources or a lack of political will. No Tier 3 country has a national action plan to combat trafficking in persons. Funding is being allocated by affluent countries, but many of these funds fail to find their way to small grass roots organizations which are often the most well-suited to provide protection to victims of trafficking once they have been identified through rescue, arrest, or escape.

I would like to elaborate briefly on the Report, because this helps us to gain a quick overview of where countries stand in their fight against human trafficking today.

This year, 131 countries were included in the report. In 2003, 116 countries were listed. This significant increase indicates that we are doing a better job identifying victims and documenting criminal activities.

Of these 131 countries, 25 are on Tier 1; 54 countries are on Tier 2; 42 countries are on the new Tier 2 Watch list and 10 countries are listed on Tier 3.

Ten countries, or 7.6 percent, received a higher rating, moving from Tier 3 to Tier 2 or Tier 2 Watch List. Only one country, Canada, rose to Tier 1.

Thirty-seven countries, or 28 percent, received a lower rating. Four countries dropped from Tier 1 to Tier 2; 4 countries dropped from Tier 2 to Tier 3; and 27 dropped from Tier 2 to Tier 2 Watch List.

The most significant movement among countries was downward.

The numbers cited above tell us that more intensive efforts are being made to document the scope of the problem of human trafficking around the world - in countries of destination, transit and origin. At the same time, improved documentation indicates shortcomings in the progress of many countries to make serious and concerted efforts to eliminate trafficking in persons.

I would like to address three specific issues where significant gaps remain in advancing a comprehensive, global anti-trafficking agenda. These are 1) the need for aggressive enactment of anti- trafficking legislation and for improved law enforcement; 2) the need for continued research and concerted practical efforts to identify victims of trafficking; and 3) the need to provide greater protection to victims of trafficking, especially in areas of repatriation and reintegration, in countries of transit and destination and origin.

1. Laws and Law Enforcement

Anti-Trafficking Legislation: The existence of good laws, and the enforcement of these laws, plays an important role in a country's ability to combat trafficking. Where there is a recognized legal framework that defines the crime, prevents different forms of trafficking, identifies and protects the victim, and punishes the perpetrators, and where this legislation is enforced, a country can begin to make progress. While we acknowledge that even small legislative measures are better than none, we would like to comment briefly on what constitutes effective anti- trafficking legislation.

Effective anti-trafficking legislation should:

Define the concept of a victim of trafficking and treat the trafficked person as a victim and not a criminal.

Recognize the trafficked person as a victim of the crime of trafficking and, as such, entitled to basic or fundamental rights including the right to safety, privacy, information, legal representation, to be heard in court, compensation for damages, medical assistance, social assistance and the right to residence and to return.

Address the scope of what constitutes a form of trafficking.

Recognize trafficking as a serious crime.

Law Enforcement Activities:

Tier 1. The TIP report reflects that Tier 1 countries are actively pursuing the prosecution of traffickers, utilizing either their trafficking statutes or related legislation to arrest, investigate, file cases and convict traffickers, reflecting a commitment to enforcement of existing laws. However, some Tier 1 countries are still levying relatively light sentences for convicted traffickers. For example in Austria, while 17 out of 27 persons convicted for trafficking offences during the reporting period spent time in prison, the majority served only a year or less. Likewise in Germany, a large number of convicted offenders received suspended sentences, reflecting the fact that these sentences were originally not higher than two years in duration. In Lithuania, sentences handed down to convicted traffickers averaged between two to three years of imprisonment, and in Spain, the average sentence of trafficking-related convictions in 2003 was cited as 2.4 years.

Tier 2. Significantly, a vast majority of countries in Tier 2 are also arresting, investigating or prosecuting traffickers. However, corruption is mentioned in 5 of the Tier 2 narratives as remaining a problem or being investigated as a problem. Law enforcement corruption is one of the biggest challenges in combating trafficking, as corrupt law enforcement officials, working in collusion with traffickers, or utilizing services of trafficked women prevent the effective identification of victims and preclude their ability to access services. Corruption among law enforcement creates fear and reluctance among victims of trafficking to approach the police for help, thereby perpetuating their state of abuse. Tier 2 Watch List. The prosecution record of countries on the Tier 2 Watch List demonstrates that existence of a law is not in and of itself enough to result in punishment of perpetrators and signals that law enforcement remains a problem in many of these countries. While close to 48% of the countries included this year on the Tier 2 Watch List have some type of anti-trafficking legislation, approximately half of these countries are cited as either not having prosecuted any cases of trafficking throughout the reporting period, as having prosecuted only a handful of traffickers while facing a significant problem of trafficking, suggesting a lack in the enforcement mechanisms of existing laws; or as not having maintained any records of prosecutions. For example, Nigeria, which passed a comprehensive anti-trafficking law in June of 2003, has not yet prosecuted any cases under this law. Cyprus, Russia and Turkey, all countries with very significant problems of trafficking in persons have not prosecuted nearly as many traffickers as would be expected commensurate with the extent of the trafficking problems they are facing.

2. Identification of Victims of Trafficking

The lack of accurate victim identification remains one of the central obstacles to implementing effective anti-trafficking measures. If we do not know the identities, the conditions and the location of victims, we can do little to reach out to them to ensure that they benefit from existing protective measures. The following are key elements which highlight the importance of victim identification:

Proper victim identification ensures rapid intervention. How accurately law enforcement officials, social service providers, and even Good Samaritans identify a trafficked person will determine how quickly a victim of trafficking will receive assistance.

The interpretation of trafficking legislation must be harmonized with existing legal provisions related to the issue of trafficking, and which might confuse victim identification.

A legally recognized practice can be used to exploit victims of trafficking.

I would like to cite the example of Cyprus, which authorizes entertainment visas to women of other countries. As of December 2003, according to latest immigration figures, it was estimated that 1,400 foreign "artistes" work in 79 cabarets and 53 nightspots. However, investigations have revealed that the cabaret industry can conceal instances of human trafficking. Women entering the country on legal entertainment visas to work in the cabarets are coerced into providing sexual services to clients and become virtual prisoners of the club owners, their mobility severely limited, their contact with the outside world tightly monitored, and their gain from their activities very small. To law enforcement officials, however, they remain cabaret dancers or prostitutes and not victims of a crime.

Proper victim identification helps to ensure compassionate treatment and full access to available benefits. If a victim is not properly identified, she will not be granted any of the benefits, including shelter and protection that a country might provide. Women trafficked overseas from Azerbaijan who have been deported back to their home country and identified as prostitutes are taken to a state run clinic where they are examined and treated if they are diagnosed with a sexually transmitted disease. Because they are not identified as victims, they are not provided with any psychological counseling, nor are they referred to NGOs, which can provide this type of counseling. In countries without adequate anti-trafficking provisions, which include a definition of what constitutes trafficking, government and law enforcement officials tend to proceed according to a law-enforcement and crime control approach, rather than one which considers the human rights of victims of trafficking.

Without aggressive outreach, many victims of trafficking, especially in countries of destination, remain hidden and without assistance. In December 2003, The Protection Project trained law enforcement officials in nine countries of Southeastern Europe, a region of both destination and transit for trafficked women. During this visit, NGO representatives reported that, while many shelters have been established to house women trafficked to this region few victims have availed themselves of the protective services of these shelters. Reasons cited for this focused on the lack of outreach to victims. Victims in these countries do not know about the shelters, do not feel that they provide adequate protection, and believe that they can do better for themselves on their own.

3. Protection of Victims of Trafficking

The TVPA provides that "The Secretary of State and the Administrator of the United States Agency for International Development, in consultation with appropriate non-governmental organizations, shall establish and carry out programs and initiatives in foreign countries to assist in the safe integration, reintegration or resettlement, as appropriate, of victims of trafficking." (Sec. 107(1)) However, victims of trafficking around the world are still not able to benefit from full protective measures in countries of destination, transit and, tragically, in their own countries of origin.

The consequences of insufficient victim protection are vast and have extensive personal as well as policy implications.

Absent protective measures, victims of trafficking who have been rescued or released from their enslavement will not testify against their traffickers. Consequently traffickers go free, victims live in fear of reprisal, and the cause of justice is not served.

Absent sufficient protective measures, victims of trafficking will not receive the medical or psychological attention they require.

Absent comprehensive protective measures in their countries of origin, including shelters and reintegration programs, victims of trafficking will continue to be vulnerable to traffickers and will be recycled into international networks.

Absent humane repatriation practices, trafficked persons will be revictimized during the process of return.

Finally, absent centers which provide hope in their countries of origin, women in destination countries, faced with the possibilities of returning home as a criminal, branded as a prostitute, and confronting the same bleak economic opportunities that made them vulnerable to being trafficked in the first place, have committed, and tragically will continue to commit suicide. Countries of origin must be confronted with the responsibility of caring for their own citizens when these women return.

Repatriation procedures leave vast room for improvement in many countries. In one of the countries cited in the TIP report, trafficked women who are arrested during raids are summarily deported, left with no time to collect their personal possessions, contact associates, or seek legal assistance. Law enforcement officials do not interview them in order to determine to what extent they have been victims of trafficking. This process is an affront to the dignity of women who have already suffered extensive abuse and degradation. In other countries, women seeking repatriation assistance from their consular offices in countries of destination find that their new travel documents identify them as having been arrested for immigration violations, and having worked as a prostitute. These offenses stigmatize the victim and frequently contribute to her marginalization upon return to her country of origin.

Recommendations

Based on our analysis of available data and our first-hand experiences with anti-trafficking policies and practices around the world, we would like to make the following recommendations:

Enacting Anti-Trafficking Legislation: Anti-trafficking legislation which defines the crime, identifies and protects the victims, encourages the prevention of trafficking and prosecutes the offenders is a cornerstone in the war against trafficking. Countries, which have not yet enacted such legislation, must be encouraged to do so.

Training of Law Enforcement Officials: In order to ensure the effectiveness of anti-trafficking legislation, we advocate training of law enforcement officials in countries of destination, transit and origin. This training should include understanding of the laws related to trafficking, how to recognize a victim of trafficking and the rights accorded to victims of trafficking.

Enhancing Victim Identification Methods: Aggressive measures must be taken to identify victims of trafficking in countries of destination in order to provide them with information on where to seek assistance as well as the extent of their rights according to the laws of the countries where they have been trafficked. This information needs to be made available in languages of possible victims and placed in locations accessible to these individuals.

Training in Victim Identification Methods: Law enforcement representatives, social service providers, and other individuals who are likely to encounter victims of trafficking must be trained on how to identify victims of trafficking in their country. This training should include a description of the forms of trafficking particular to the region. It should also include a definition of a victim of trafficking as well information on services for victims of trafficking. Training should also include cooperation between law enforcement and the NGO community, so that these two entities can work together on behalf of victims of trafficking. Furthermore, we advocate training in large urban areas as well as more rural communities. We have found that training tends to be concentrated in big cities despite the fact that significant trafficking activity also takes place outside of urban centers.

Ensuring Adequate Victim Protection in Countries of Transit and Destination: Protection in countries of transit and destination should include shelters with adequate safety and protective measures as well as access to social, medical and psychological assistance.

Ensuring Humane Repatriation Procedures: Careful repatriation and reintegration programs are critical in enabling victims of trafficking to regain control over their lives. In countries of origin, protective measures must include temporary shelters for returning victims, decriminalization, and measures to assist with social and economic reintegration. These will include access to job training as well as further educational opportunities for work that is actually available in the country of origin.

Funding Foreign NGOs: Because of their strong community ties, we encourage the funding of small, local NGOs in countries of destination, transit and origin for provision of protective services including shelter, repatriation and reintegration. These organizations tend to be successful because they are known and trusted in their communities. They conduct extensive outreach to trafficked persons and they have few limitations related to the length of stay in their shelters. Because they are local, they understand the complex psychological as well as cultural factors involved in reintegration.

Engaging in Research: Further research is necessary in order to successfully win the war against trafficking and we would like to encourage sponsorship of areas mentioned during this hearing. The TVPRA (Sec. 12A) states that "The President. . . shall carry out research included by providing grants to nongovernmental organizations as well as to relevant United States Government Agencies and international organizations. . . Such research activities shall, to the maximum extent practicable, include, but not be limited to, the following: "(1) The economic causes and consequences of trafficking in persons. "(2) The effectiveness of programs and initiatives funded or administered by Federal agencies to prevent trafficking in persons and to protect and assist victims of trafficking. "(3) The interrelationship between trafficking in persons and global health risks.

Mr. Chairmen, members of the committee, I thank you for your commitment to this issue and look forward to working with you in the future.

LOAD-DATE: June 24, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

COMMITTEE: HOUSE INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

SUBCOMMITTEE: INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM, NONPROLIFERATION AND HUMAN RIGHTS

TESTIMONY-BY: MICHELE A. CLARK, CO-DIRECTOR, THE PROTECTION PROJECT AT JOHNS HOPKINS UNIVERSITY

AFFILIATION: SCHOOL OF ADVANCED INTERNATIONAL STUDIES

230 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Prague Post (Czech Republic)

June 24, 2004

Postview

BYLINE: StaffSECTION: OpinionLENGTH: 646 words

Report on human trafficking praises Czechs The government might be on the verge of collapse due to a lack of internal support within the ruling party, but it still has something to celebrate. The Czech Republic is the only former Eastern bloc state listed as a Tier 1 country in the just released U.S. Report on Human Trafficking. That ranking, on a four-tier scale, indicates that the country is doing everything possible - prevention, victim aid, prosecution, arrest - to curtail the crime of human trafficking, which traps thousands of men, women and children in forced labor and sexual servitude each year. In the Czech Republic human trafficking is linked to street prostitution and forced sex work in the country's more than 200 brothels. The victims are primarily from the poorest ex-Soviet states, such as Ukraine and Moldova. U.S. Embassy political officer and trafficking expert Ben Rockwell did castigate the country on two points, however. First, sentencing in the Czech Republic, as in many countries, is too light, according to Rockwell. And despite excellent police work, he said, far too few traffickers are actually charged. Out of the five persons convicted of human trafficking last year, four were sentenced to jail time, but all of the sentences were suspended. "Judges and prosecutors still do not really know how to apply the trafficking law, which was only passed in 2000," Rockwell explained. The bigger problem, as Rockwell acknowledged, is that the country has developed a reputation as the brothel of Europe, with cheap flights fueling sex tourism. Traffickers see a great business opportunity in the Czech Republic. And if prosecutors and judges do not start to take the issue seriously, the Czech Republic could become even more of a trafficker's heaven, Tier 1 rating or not. Rockwell and the trafficking report also criticized the government's plan to submit a bill to the Chamber of Deputies to legalize prostitution. Although the Interior Ministry insists that legalization and the regulations that come with it would eliminate trafficking, Rockwell argues that this assumption is counterintuitive. "If a country becomes a legal haven for prostitution, then traffickers will be in greater demand. And there will always be people who want to avoid paying taxes and higher fees to prostitutes, so there will be an underground market for illegal prostitutes," he said. Jitka Gjuricova, the Interior Ministry's prostitution expert, says the claim of a link between trafficking and prostitution is not based on real evidence. "Legalization helps distinguish between persons involved in prostitution forcibly and voluntarily," she said, adding that legalization also reduces the number of prostitutes. "Since prostitution was legalized in Holland in 2000, the number of window prostitutes in Amsterdam has decreased by one-third." The question is whether that one-third has gone underground and can now be tapped through other means, such as mobile-phone escort services. "Where prostitution is legalized, a black market in trafficking emerges," the U.S. report asserts, "as exploiters seek to maximize profit by avoiding the scrutiny and regulatory costs of the legal prostitution market." The Brussels-based European Women's Lobby, representing hundreds of nongovernmental organizations, has also taken an anti-prostitution stand. It supports the approach of Sweden, which since 1999 has vigorously prosecuted prostitutes' clients. Since then, according to the Stockholm police, street prostitution has declined by 70 percent to 90 percent and brothel prostitution by half. It is hard to tell who is right, the Americans or the Czechs. But it is far from a merely academic or political question: Finding the right solution to the trafficking crisis in the former Soviet bloc could save the lives of thousands of women in the future.

LOAD-DATE: June 24, 2004LANGUAGE: English

PUB-TYPE: Paper

Copyright 2004 Prague Post s.r.o.

231 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Prague Post (Czech Republic)

June 24, 2004

Postview

BYLINE: StaffSECTION: OpinionLENGTH: 646 words

Report on human trafficking praises Czechs The government might be on the verge of collapse due to a lack of internal support within the ruling party, but it still has something to celebrate. The Czech Republic is the only former Eastern bloc state listed as a Tier 1 country in the just released U.S. Report on Human Trafficking. That ranking, on a four-tier scale, indicates that the country is doing everything possible - prevention, victim aid, prosecution, arrest - to curtail the crime of human trafficking, which traps thousands of men, women and children in forced labor and sexual servitude each year. In the Czech Republic human trafficking is linked to street prostitution and forced sex work in the country's more than 200 brothels. The victims are primarily from the poorest ex-Soviet states, such as Ukraine and Moldova. U.S. Embassy political officer and trafficking expert Ben Rockwell did castigate the country on two points, however. First, sentencing in the Czech Republic, as in many countries, is too light, according to Rockwell. And despite excellent police work, he said, far too few traffickers are actually charged. Out of the five persons convicted of human trafficking last year, four were sentenced to jail time, but all of the sentences were suspended. "Judges and prosecutors still do not really know how to apply the trafficking law, which was only passed in 2000," Rockwell explained. The bigger problem, as Rockwell acknowledged, is that the country has developed a reputation as the brothel of Europe, with cheap flights fueling sex tourism. Traffickers see a great business opportunity in the Czech Republic. And if prosecutors and judges do not start to take the issue seriously, the Czech Republic could become even more of a trafficker's heaven, Tier 1 rating or not. Rockwell and the trafficking report also criticized the government's plan to submit a bill to the Chamber of Deputies to legalize prostitution. Although the Interior Ministry insists that legalization and the regulations that come with it would eliminate trafficking, Rockwell argues that this assumption is counterintuitive. "If a country becomes a legal haven for prostitution, then traffickers will be in greater demand. And there will always be people who want to avoid paying taxes and higher fees to prostitutes, so there will be an underground market for illegal prostitutes," he said. Jitka Gjuricova, the Interior Ministry's prostitution expert, says the claim of a link between trafficking and prostitution is not based on real evidence. "Legalization helps distinguish between persons involved in prostitution forcibly and voluntarily," she said, adding that legalization also reduces the number of prostitutes. "Since prostitution was legalized in Holland in 2000, the number of window prostitutes in Amsterdam has decreased by one-third." The question is whether that one-third has gone underground and can now be tapped through other means, such as mobile-phone escort services. "Where prostitution is legalized, a black market in trafficking emerges," the U.S. report asserts, "as exploiters seek to maximize profit by avoiding the scrutiny and regulatory costs of the legal prostitution market." The Brussels-based European Women's Lobby, representing hundreds of nongovernmental organizations, has also taken an anti-prostitution stand. It supports the approach of Sweden, which since 1999 has vigorously prosecuted prostitutes' clients. Since then, according to the Stockholm police, street prostitution has declined by 70 percent to 90 percent and brothel prostitution by half. It is hard to tell who is right, the Americans or the Czechs. But it is far from a merely academic or political question: Finding the right solution to the trafficking crisis in the former Soviet bloc could save the lives of thousands of women in the future.

LOAD-DATE: July 19, 2004LANGUAGE: English

PUB-TYPE: Paper

Copyright 2004 Prague Post s.r.o.

232 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

June 24, 2004

Anti-Trafficking Efforts Save Lives, Lawmakers Say; Congressional committee marks progress against modern day slavery

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 1132 words

By Charlene Porter

Washington File Staff Writer

Washington -- A four-year-old U.S. law to protect victims of human trafficking and end 21st century slavery worldwide is saving people from lives of abuse and exploitation, lawmakers and witnesses declared June 24 at a Congressional hearing.

"Many thousands of women will be protected from forced prostitution as well as rape," said Representative Christopher Smith (Republican, New Jersey) at a House International Relations Subcommittee hearing on the Trafficking in Persons Report released by the U.S. State Department June 14.

Smith also cited a Department of Defense zero-tolerance policy for personnel who are complicit in trafficking by frequenting brothels where victims are forced into the sex industry. He said NATO is headed toward imposing a similar policy on its troops, and declared that the United Nations must follow the same course.

The hearing served as a forum for lawmakers to review the progress of their legislative actions to combat trafficking since initial implementation of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act in 2000.

Several representatives from advocacy groups testified to the progress made against modern-day slavery, even while they underscored the need for more aggressive action. Sharon Cohn of the International Justice Mission works to identify and win freedom for victims of trafficking in places around the world. She described her experiences escorting victims out of brothels to the committee, and said it is a "literal truth" that a person can leave servitude and rape one day to begin rehabilitation the next "because of this law."

The Trafficking in Persons Report, mandated by the 2000 law, surveys 140 nations this year in their activity to prevent trafficking, prosecute the crime when detected and protect victims and potential victims. Director of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons John Miller said one distinct indicator of progress on the issue over the last several years is found in the increasing numbers of nations that are taking legislative and law enforcement actions against trafficking in persons.

"We know that 24 new countries this year enacted comprehensive anti-trafficking in persons legislation," Miller said. "That is great."

In compiling the report, the State Department also has placed new emphasis on documenting the actions of law enforcement to combat trafficking. "There were almost 8,000 prosecutions of traffickers around the world last year, and almost 3,000 convictions," Miller said.

The report divides nations into three tiers: Tier 1 is reserved for those nations in full compliance with international standards; Tier 2, for those nations making progress in meeting international standards; and Tier 3, for countries whose efforts to combat trafficking are out of line with international standards. One recent change, just added in the 2003 compilation of the report, is the creation of a "watch list" of Tier 2 countries that are at risk of backsliding, and could face sanctions.

Despite the reports of progress in the 2004 Trafficking in Persons report, lawmakers posed some tough questions about this global campaign. The report puts Ecuador, Guyana and Venezuela in the lowest-ranking category of its three-tier placement system for the first time, making them subject to a possible loss of some forms of U.S. assistance. Lawmakers expressed concern that these Western Hemisphere nations were among the 10 lowest-rated countries in the world.

Miller said discussions are under way with Ecuador, Guyana and Venezuela about ways in which they can improve their activities to prevent human trafficking. "I think there's a lack of awareness there, and they're becoming aware fast."

Miller said he is hopeful that Ecuador and Guyana, in particular, will be able to take adequate steps in the next several months to avoid the withdrawal of aid when the president makes that ultimate decision.

Bangladesh, Burma, Cuba, Equatorial Guinea, North Korea, Sierra Leone and Sudan are also ranked in Tier 3, and considered out of line with international standards in their efforts to prevent trafficking.

Miller said the watch-list ranking device has given the State Department new leverage in challenging nations to take stronger action to prevent human trafficking. "We are able to give a signal to those countries at the bottom of Tier 2 that, a [tilde]you better be doing something this coming year if you don't want to fall into Tier 3."

Greece, India, Japan, Mexico, Pakistan, Peru, Russia and Turkey are among the 42 nations included on the watch list, and Miller told the lawmakers that some of them are already responding with new commitments to take stronger actions to address their trafficking problems.

The watch-list nations also will undergo a midyear assessment to ascertain whether they are actually taking the actions they promise, and to give notice as to whether they may be likely to fall into the lowest category when the next report is issued in June 2005.

Specifically citing Japan, Miller described an attitude of "complacency" toward human trafficking among government officials.

"Japan's trafficking problem is large," backed by international organized crime, according to the report itself. "Japan could do much more to protect its thousands of victims of sexual slavery" the report says.

Miller told the committee the Japanese government has become more attuned to the issue just over the last two months, and he has become hopeful that stronger action will be taken in the near future.

In its ongoing efforts to monitor human trafficking, Miller said his office is going to start focusing more on "the demand side of this equation." He cited child sex tourism as an example. The abduction of children and their exploitation in the sex industry occurs largely in underdeveloped countries, "but where do the tourists come from?" Miller asked. "They come from the Netherlands, United Kingdom, Germany, U.S. [and] Japan. We're focusing more on that issue," Miller said.

One new approach the United States has taken to address child sex tourism rests in the Child Protection Act, passed by the Congress earlier this year. It allows U.S. authorities to arrest and prosecute a U.S. citizen for engaging in this form of exploitation anywhere it occurs in the world. Federal authorities already are pursuing several cases under that recent law, and Miller credited the lawmakers for their action.

Looking toward what remains to be done to further curtail trafficking, Miller told the subcommittee members, "All of us in the 21st century have to be abolitionists."

(The Washington File is a product of the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: June 25, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

233 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

June 23, 2004 Wednesday

Ex-justice minister questions U.S. human trafficking report

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 462 words

DATELINE: TOKYO, June 23

A former Japanese justice minister questioned Wednesday a U.S. human trafficking report released last week that put Japan on a special watch list of countries on the verge of falling into the worst category.

'It may be that the United States has not been fully informed of the situation of trafficking in Japan and the work of the Japanese government,' Mayumi Moriyama said. 'I feel that more research could have resulted in a different observation.'

Moriyama, who served as justice minister in Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi's previous cabinet, made the remarks in a keynote speech at the outset of a two-day international meeting on human trafficking in Asia in Tokyo.

But Moriyama, a House of Representatives lawmaker, also said that Japan and other developed countries have 'the long way to go' in fighting against human trafficking.

In its annual Trafficking in Persons Report unveiled June 14, the U.S. State Department said, 'Japan is a destination country for Asian, Latin American and Eastern European women and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labor and sexual exploitation.'

It put Japan, Russia and others on a special watch list of countries on the verge of falling into the worst of three categories, which include countries such as North Korea, Myanmar, Cuba and Sudan. It urged Tokyo to address trafficking crimes and to provide better assistance for victims.

The two-day conference, 'Strategies for Combating Human Trafficking in Asia,' began at the United Nations University in Tokyo, hosted by the U.S. Embassy in Japan, the International Labor Organization's Tokyo Office, and Vital Voices Global Partnership, an international nonprofit organization.

Around 100 officials from the United States, Japan and other Asian countries as well as various organizations attended the meeting.

The conference is an 'example of the pledge of the United States to lead this support in the fight against the crime of human trafficking,' U.S. Ambassador to Japan Howard Baker said in the opening ceremony.

'As many of you may know, the crime of trafficking men, women and children for the purpose of prostitution and forced labor is of concern to both President (George W.) Bush and to first lady Laura Bush,' Baker said.

Laura Bush said in a video message prepared for the event, 'Human trafficking is a crime across the borders. We know regional and international cooperation is crucial.'

In closed sessions, experts will discuss ways to thwart various forms of human trafficking, including forced labor and commercial sexual exploitation.

The participants are also aiming at increasing the level of cooperation between governments and nongovernment entities in Asia to combat human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: June 23, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

234 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Jerusalem Post

June 23, 2004 Wednesday

US faults Israel on human trafficking

BYLINE: NINA GILBERT

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 4

LENGTH: 254 words

There are an estimated 14,000 victims of human trafficking in the United States, whereas only 82 investigations were opened against traffickers in Israel, and 151 victims received assistance, a Justice Ministry official said Tuesday in response to the State Department's criticism of Israel in its 2004 report on trafficking in women.

Israel was placed in the same category (Tier 2) as in the 2003 Trafficking in Persons Report, but was cited for "inadequate care for victims of trafficking" and "minimal efforts in the area of prevention" via a public awareness campaign. At the same time, Israel was credited for improvements made in law enforcement against trafficking. The best ranking is Tier 1, and Israel was previously on the Tier 2 watch list.

The US is not included in the rankings, but the report includes a section on the efforts of the US government to combat the problem.

The 2004 report was discussed on Tuesday in the Knesset Committee of Inquiry into Women Trafficking. Committee chair Zehava Gal-On (Yahad) backed the conclusions of the 2004 report on treatment of victims, saying that a shelter was opened in February that can house 50 women, but has taken in only 23 women who are waiting to testify in sex slavery cases.

All the rest of the women are being held in prisons without any assistance while awaiting deportation, Gal-On said.

Gal-On also noted that the report found that the Internal Security Ministry has issued only seven visas to victims, which has forced most of them to go back into prostitution.

LOAD-DATE: October 4, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

235 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

June 23, 2004

Human Trafficking Needs Multi-pronged Opposition, Harrison Says; Prevention of trade, rehabilitation and reintegration of victims needed

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 2501 words

Fighting the scourge of human trafficking requires a "multi-pronged approach," according to Patricia de Stacy Harrison, the acting under secretary of state for public diplomacy and public affairs.

Prevention, rehabilitation and reintegration into society for victims are all necessary to deal with the complex problem of the "new slavery," she said at a conference held in Tokyo that discussed strategies for combating human trafficking in Asia.

In her keynote address delivered June 23 at Tokyo's United Nations University, Harrison said prevention must include anti-trafficking education campaigns, sex tourism prevention programs and economic alternatives for at-risk groups.

Rehabilitation should include emergency assistance and vocational training for foreign trafficking victims; and reintegration should include voluntary repatriation assistance for victims and border shelters in key areas, she explained.

"Trafficking in persons," Harrison said, "is truly a form of personal terrorism." Vulnerable people -- predominantly women and children -- are "lured and then trapped, their lives taken away," she said, while the victimizers, in many cases, are "free to live in society, to reap economic benefits from the human misery they have inflicted."

Fighting against human trafficking, Harrison said, is fighting for human dignity, human rights, rule of law and all the basic tenets of a civil society. "If we believe in these values, we must be against trafficking in a vigorous and a measurable way," she said.

Legal reform is also critical in this venture, Harrison said. The United States is working "to educate foreign police on the new Protect Act, create law enforcement units to rescue women and children, train judges and prosecutors and provide technical assistance to help countries draft or amend their laws on trafficking and sex tourism."

The Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 is the cornerstone of American anti-trafficking efforts. "This law declares trafficking a crime, and it requires federal agencies to combat trafficking domestically and work with other nations to address the problem globally," Harrison explained. She said an interagency task force to oversee U.S. anti-trafficking efforts has enjoyed favorable results -- criminal prosecution of human traffickers has increased sharply in just the last three years.

The Protect Act passed by the U.S. Congress in 2003 strengthens existing laws. "Under the Protect Act, U.S. law enforcement officials may prosecute American citizens or permanent residents who travel abroad and sexually abuse children. The law criminalizes actions to arrange or facilitate the travel of so-called child sex tourists," Harrison said.

The Bush administration, Harrison said, is working around the world to stop trafficking directly, and, through development assistance, "to improve economic and social conditions so that potential victims will see opportunity and hope in their future and not be swayed by the siren song of the traffickers."

The two-day conference, "Strategies for Combating Human Trafficking in Asia," was hosted by the U.S. embassy in Japan, the International Labour Organization's Tokyo office, and Vital Voices Global Partnership, a U.S. nonprofit organization.

The 2004 edition of the U.S. Department of State's Trafficking in Persons Report has put Japan on a "watch list" of countries that may slide into the category of the most poorly performing countries for dealing with trafficking issues.

According to the report, "Japan's trafficking problem is large and Japanese organized crime groups (yakuza) that operate internationally are involved. The Japanese government must begin to fully employ its resources to address this serious human rights crime within its borders."

Following is the transcript of Harrison's remarks:

(begin transcript)

Acting Under Secretary of State Patricia de Stacy Harrison

Strategies for Combating Human Trafficking In Asia

Keynote Speech

23 June 2004

United Nations University

Tokyo

ACTING UNDER SECRETARY HARRISON:

Good morning. Thank you Ms. Horiuchi, and good morning Mr. Ambassador, Mrs. Baker, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen.

First let me just say, Mrs. Moriyama (Mayumi Moriyama, Member of Parliament and former Minister of Justice), that was really wonderful, and your leadership on behalf of victims is really extraordinary.

I am so pleased to be here among so many distinguished guests - not only from Japan and the Asian region, but globally - as we all work together to end the scourge of human trafficking. Trafficking in persons is truly a form of personal terrorism. Vulnerable people - women and children - lured and then trapped, their lives taken away, and to complete the cycle of injustice, the victimizers, in many cases, free to live in society, to reap economic benefits from the human misery they have inflicted.

As each of us works to end the scourge of trafficking, we are really working for, as President Bush has said, the non-negotiable demands of human dignity - human rights, rule of law, all the basic tenets of a civil society. If we believe in these values, we must be against trafficking in a vigorous and a measurable way.

If you were to ask almost anyone, "Are you for or against slavery?" the person would reply "Against, of course," because slavery is a word that everyone understands. But very few people really know - outside of this room - what trafficking means. They associate the word entirely with the selling and buying of illegal drugs, and it is true that human trafficking is linked to international crime syndicates involved in drugs and terrorism, and guns and false documents and the spread of HIV/AIDS. But so few people understand that this word "trafficking" really means selling into slavery women, men and children - a life of prostitution, degradation, violence and shame.

As Ambassador Baker said, President Bush was the first leader to raise the issue of trafficking at the General Assembly, and ending the scourge of slavery - trafficking - is a priority for him. That's why he has committed an additional $50 million more funding, on top of the $70 million allocated this past year. The President's determination is reflected in the remarks that he made to the General Assembly, and he said, "There is a special evil in the abuse and the exploitation of the most innocent and vulnerable. The victims see little of life... an underground of brutality and lonely fear. Those who create these victims and profit from their suffering must be severely punished, and governments that tolerate this trade are really tolerating a form of slavery." Secretary of State Colin Powell used the word "slavery" as well, when he said, "This form of modern slavery plagues every single country in the world including the United States." Last Monday, the Secretary remarked, "We fight trafficking in persons not just for the sake of victims and potential victims of these crimes; we do it for ourselves, because we can't fully embrace our own dignity as human beings unless we champion the dignity of others." That is basically what Mrs. Horiuchi and everyone gathered here is doing - championing the dignity of others.

I know through this important conference, you're going to increase the numbers of people of good will who will be inspired to help those who are being victimized now. We know that heroes come from every level of society. The Colombian Ambassador to Japan is certainly a hero for his commitment to this issue, and each of you here today - you can be the heroes that inspire others. My personal hero is Nancy Kassebaum Baker, because her leadership on behalf of the dignity of others, through a lifetime of work just speaks volumes.

Let me quickly talk about what the United States is doing to eliminate trafficking in persons. As you know, the U.S. is not immune from the human trafficking problem, and we are working to accelerate anti-trafficking measures at home. In 2000, we passed the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, which is the cornerstone of our anti-trafficking efforts. This law declares trafficking a crime, and it requires federal agencies to combat trafficking domestically and work with other nations to address the problem globally. President Bush has established the President's interagency task force to oversee U.S. anti-trafficking efforts. The task force is chaired by Secretary of State Colin Powell, and its directives are carried out by senior-level government officials from 10 federal agencies and departments. As a result, I'm happy to say that criminal prosecution of human traffickers has increased sharply in just the last three years.

The United States advocates a multi-pronged approach. It isn't a one-size-fits-all approach. As we just heard, this is a complex problem. This multi-pronged approach includes prevention, for one. So that means anti-trafficking education campaigns, sex tourism prevention programs and economic alternatives for at-risk groups. Rehabilitation - that provides emergency assistance and vocational training for foreign traffic victims, and it builds the capacity for NGOs focused on trafficking. And then reintegration - that includes voluntary repatriation assistance for victims and border shelters in key areas. And finally, legal reform. We are working to educate foreign police on the new Protect Act, create law enforcement units to rescue women and children, train judges and prosecutors and provide technical assistance to help countries draft or amend their laws on trafficking and sex tourism.

The U.S. Congress passed the Protect Act last year, which strengthens existing laws. Under the Protect Act, U.S. law enforcement officials may prosecute American citizens or permanent residents who travel abroad and sexually abuse children. The law criminalizes actions to arrange or facilitate the travel of so-called child sex tourists. Its directives are carried out through the President's task force. We are of course working around the world to stop trafficking directly, and most importantly, through development assistance, we are working to improve economic and social conditions so that potential victims will see opportunity and hope in their future and not be swayed by the siren song of the traffickers.

As a result of these efforts, we've begun to see real success in combating trafficking, both in the U.S. and worldwide. And I want to underscore that in our critical need to stop the traffickers, we must continue to help the victims once they are rescued. In the United States, victims of trafficking are eligible for temporary housing, legal assistance, educational opportunities, mental health counseling, foster care and other benefits, and we do work in partnership with NGOs to help us communicate what the benefits are and to deliver them to the victims.

We have an anti-trafficking public awareness campaign, letting victims know that if they do move forward - and moving forward sometimes takes the most courageous step for these people, to move forward to get help - that they will be protected. We also ask for help from those who may know of victims and can work with us to free them. We sponsor a hotline advising callers what resources are available to them, and we've also set up a new Web site for victim assistance.

My own bureau, Educational and Cultural Affairs, works to fight trafficking through educational exchange programs. We bring leading anti-trafficking experts to the United States, where they and their U.S. counterparts can focus on what is working, what needs to be done, and what resources are required. Alumni of these programs represent a positive force in every country on behalf of victims and potential victims. My bureau has also supported the travel of trafficking victims to conferences such as the one in Bali, and the important thing is that when victims of trafficking go to these conferences it provides an opportunity for the public to hear from them directly.

I had an opportunity to meet with some young people who had received both rescue and shelter from volunteers from the private sector. And I have to tell you: Once you meet a victim, you will not sleep at night until you do everything you can to end this terrible scourge.

In 2003, an Asia-only group participated in an ECA (the Bureau of Educational and Cultural Affairs) program that introduced them to policies and strategies to prevent and actively combat trafficking in persons. The program demonstrated how from a wide range of professions. We can effectively maximize what we are invested in doing, because it hits all levels of society. By bringing people from different sectors together, we have a much wider net.

We are supporting projects to provide journalists in Eastern Europe with the tools they need to increase public awareness and to ensure responsible coverage of the issue. We've provided support for four fellows to study anti-trafficking while participating in the Hubert Humphrey Fellowship Program. We support NGOs that build awareness through communications programs. We want to reach potential victims where they receive information - at shelters, but beyond shelters, at bus stops, in restaurants - so that young people can be aware before they succumb.

I'm extremely pleased to learn that some of the alumni of these programs are here today. You were selected for these programs because of your experience and dedication, and you will be part of a sustainable, multiplier effect increasing the numbers of people, who as I said can then form a circle of prevention surrounding those who would fall prey to traffickers. And of course, our Embassy here in Tokyo and American embassies overseas support anti-trafficking efforts by organizing workshops and conferences, giving grants to local NGOs, and providing both public and private statements of support for anti-trafficking activities. Many of our participants today from other parts of Asia were selected to attend this conference by our U.S. Embassy colleagues in those countries. All of you have a strong ally in the war against trafficking, and that ally is the American Ambassador, and his or her staff in your home country. On behalf of those who are helpless, your dedication, your commitment is so important.

I want to thank and commend the co-sponsors of this very important conference: the Tokyo branch of the International Labour Organization and Vital Voices, and each one of you for being here today. As President Bush said, "We must show new energy in fighting back an old evil. Nearly two centuries after the abolition of the trans-Atlantic slave trade, and more than a century after slavery was officially ended in its last stronghold, the trade in human beings for any purpose must not be allowed to thrive in our times."

Thank you so very much.

(end transcript)

(Distributed by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: June 24, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

236 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Voice of America News

June 23, 2004

Japan to Strengthen Human Trafficking Measures

BYLINE: Steve Herman, Tokyo

SECTION: ASIA PACIFIC

LENGTH: 418 words

Filed: 10:06 UTC

Japan is hosting a conference on human trafficking - just a few days after being placed on a U.S. watch list of nations which need to do more to combat the problem.

Interpol, the international police agency, calls human trafficking the world's fastest growing crime with hundreds of thousands of people traded each year.

The State Department's Acting Undersecretary for Public Diplomacy, Patricia Stacy Harrison, says more than half the victims are women and children who are sexually exploited. "So few people understand that this word trafficking really means selling into slavery women, men and children -- a life of prostitution, degradation, violence and shame."

First Lady Laura Bush, in a video message to this week's Tokyo conference on human trafficking, says the United States is committed to ending modern-day slavery.

"We're monitoring human trafficking patterns, we're working to build public awareness and we plan to spend approximately 150 million dollars over two years to support anti-trafficking," says Mrs. Bush.

The U.S. State Department in its annual report Monday, says the 10 worst countries for trafficking include Bangladesh, Burma and North Korea. But it also listed Japan as a country which needs to do more, noting it is a major destination for Asian, South American and Eastern European women and children for sexual exploitation or forced labor.

Governor Akiko Domoto of Japan's Chiba Prefecture, adjacent to Tokyo and home to Japan's largest international airport, admits it is a problem. She says Asian women, most believing they are being recruited for work in restaurants, are flown into the country posing as wives of Japanese men.

Governor Domoto says homeless or unemployed men are paid thousands of dollars to register paper marriages to the young foreign women who are then forced to work as prostitutes.

Japanese activists say police do not treat such matters seriously. They say police usually defer to immigration officials who deport the victims but do not go after the traffickers. In Japan, last year only 51 arrests were made in connection with trafficking women.

Japan's Assistant Chief Cabinet Secretary Shotaro Yachi, says Tokyo - stung by its inclusion on the U.S. watch list - is acting. "The government of Japan has clear intention to strengthen our domestic measures to combat trafficking in persons."

Japan and Russia are the only countries among the Group of Eight most industrialized nations on the U.S. watch list.

LOAD-DATE: June 23, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

237 of 359 DOCUMENTS

BBC Summary of World Broadcasts

June 19, 2004, Saturday

Philippine Justice Department unhappy with US human trafficking report

SOURCE: The Philippine Star web site, Manila, in English 19 Jun 04

LENGTH: 572 words

Excerpt from report by Aurea Calica entitled: "DOJ slams US State Department report on RP"; published in English by Philippine newspaper The Philippine Star web site on 19 June

The Department of Justice branded yesterday as unfair and baseless the US State Department's 2004 annual report that ranked the Philippines among several countries that have failed to do enough to stop human trafficking.

Acting Justice Secretary Merceditas Gutierrez said the report placed the Philippines in a "tier 2 watch list" despite government efforts to combat human trafficking, particularly the passage of a law imposing tougher penalties for such offences. A country that lands in the "tier 3 watch list" faces US sanctions.

"We do not agree with the sweeping statements of the United States, particularly on the prosecution aspect. We are wondering why we were placed in the tier 2 watch list after passing our own law against trafficking," Gutierrez told reporters.

"The Philippines' anti-trafficking law is a relatively new law. It is barely a year since it was enacted and it is quite unfair to judge the efficacy of the law solely on the basis of prosecutions, and more so, on the number of convictions."

Gutierrez said the new law "is not merely a penal legislation, but also a comprehensive legislation addressing trafficking in persons from prevention, protection to recovery and reintegration. Thus the success of its implementation should not be measured by the number of prosecutions and convictions alone."

The report failed to note that the Philippines is one of two countries in Southeast Asia that have an anti-human trafficking law. Washington should have also considered the difficulty of prosecuting an offender and the need for cooperation from transit and destination countries, Gutierrez added.

Manila's Inter-Agency Council Against Trafficking has gathered that several cases are awaiting trial or preliminary investigation, and that the Department of Foreign Affairs had repatriated a number of trafficking victims, many from Bahrain, Malaysia, Nigeria and South Korea, among other countries, Gutierrez said.

"The embassy in Korea was likewise successful in prosecuting the traffickers of 11 Filipinos who were trafficked for the purpose of prostitution. While the Korean employer was not penalized for trafficking because South Korea has no trafficking law, he was convicted under its labour laws."

Because of the lack of a more efficient monitoring system, the government has no clear idea of the extent of human trafficking in the country, Gutierrez said. "For this purpose, the council, as one of its priorities, will establish a shared central data base on trafficking with a capacity for case tracking and monitoring."

In its report, the State Department said Filipino women, often lured abroad with false promises of legitimate employment, are being trafficked for sexual exploitation to Asia, the Middle East, Europe and North America in a modern day version of the slave trade. passage omitted

The report, which covers the period from April 2003 through March 2004, said the sexual exploitation of children within the Philippines was a growing concern. Last year, the Philippines was listed in the State Department report as a tier 2 country that did not comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but was making significant efforts to do so.

LOAD-DATE: June 19, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 The British Broadcasting Corporation

238 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Malaysia General News

June 19, 2004, Saturday

SINGLE FEMALES, FEMALE GROUPS TO BE BARRED FROM ENTERING KUWAIT

SOURCE: Kuwait-FemalesLENGTH: 363 wordsDATELINE: DOHA, Qatar, June 19, 2004

Single females or groups of females from 34 countries including Malaysia will be barred from entering Kuwait using the "visa-on-arrival" privilege.

To enter Kuwait they must be accompanied by their husbands, sons or brothers.

The other countries include China, Japan, South Korea, France, Belgium, Sweden, Norway, Denmark and Spain.

"If such women claim they are visiting Kuwait for business purposes they should produce documentary evidence to prove their claims," Assistant Undersecretary at the Interior Ministry Major-General Thabet Al-Muhanna was quoting as saying in the local Arabic daily Al Watan.

The move comes in the wake of the US State Department's fourth annual "Trafficking in Persons Report" placing Kuwait among 42 countries on "Tier 2 Watch List" - countries that have not been complying with US legal standards but had promised to make or are in the process of making significant efforts to meet the requirements.

"Tier 2" countries require "special scrutiny" and could fall into the bottom category - Tier 3 - on which sanctions could be imposed.

According to Arab Times, the report noted that domestic servants in Kuwait are trafficked internally for sexual and labour exploitation with victims suffering debt bondage, involuntary sexual servitude, coerced labour and verbal and physical abuse.

Meanwhile Malaysian business people going to Kuwait will soon find that a Malaysian smart passport is not secure enough as their thumbs as a form of identification.

In a move to counter forged passports, Kuwait's Interior Ministry has approved a proposal to install online fingerprint identification systems at all border points in the tiny wealthy emirate which is a major trade and investment gateway into Iraq.

All arriving and departing passengers will be asked to place their thumb on a fingerprint identification device linked to the computer of the immigration officer, the local daily Arab Times reported.

If everything is in order, the immigration officer will fill in the flight details and other relevant information and save the updated information into the database of the Ministry's Information centre.

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2004LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 Pertubuhan Berita Nasional Malaysia

239 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Malaysia General News

June 19, 2004, Saturday

KUWAIT TO INTRODUCE FINGERPRINT ID AT ENTRY POINTS

SOURCE: Kuwait-FingerprintLENGTH: 408 words

DOHA (Qatar), June 19 (Bernama) -- Malaysian business people going to Kuwait will soon find that a Malaysian smart passport is not secure enough a form of identification as their thumbs.

In a move to counter forged passports, Kuwait's Interior Ministry has approved a proposal to install online fingerprint identification systems at all border points in the tiny wealthy emirate which is a major trade and investment gateway into Iraq.

All arriving and departing passengers will be asked to place their thumb on a fingerprint identification device linked to the computer of the immigration officer, the local daily Arab Times reported.

If everything is in order, the immigration officer will fill in the flight details and other relevant information and save the updated information into the database of the Ministry's Information centre.

Meanwhile, female individuals or groups from "some countries" travelling without their husbands, brothers or sons will be barred from entering Kuwait using the visa-on-arrival privilege offered to 34 countries.

Malaysia is one of the 34 countries, along with China, Singapore, Brunei, Hong Kong, South Korea, Japan, US, the UK, France, Italy, Germany, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Netherlands, Belgium, Luxembourg, Switzerland, Austria, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Portugal, Ireland, Greece, Finland, Spain, Monaco, the Vatican, Iceland, Andorra, San Marino, Liechtenstein.

"If such women claim they are visiting Kuwait for business purposes they should produce documentary evidence to prove their claims," Assistant Undersecretary at the Interior Ministry Major-General Thabet Al-Muhanna was quoting as saying in the local Arabic daily Al Watan.

The reports comes in the wake of the US State Department's fourth annual "Trafficking in Persons Report" placing Kuwait among 42 countries on "Tier 2 Watch List" - countries that have not been complying with US legal standards but had promised to make or are in the process of making significant efforts to meet the requirements.

"Tier 2" countries require "special scrutiny" and could fall into the bottom category - Tier 3 - on which sanctions could be imposed.

According to Arab Times, the report noted that domestic servants in Kuwait are trafficked internally for sexual and labour exploitation with victims suffering debt bondage, involuntary sexual servitude, coerced labour and verbal and physical abuse.

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2004LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 Pertubuhan Berita Nasional Malaysia

240 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English -- English

June 18, 2004 FridayPhilippines says US human trafficking watchlist "unfair"*SECTION: International NewsLENGTH: 292 wordsDATELINE: MANILA, June 18

President Gloria Arroyo's government on Friday branded as "unfair" a US move to put the Philippines on a global watchlist of countries that have failed to adequately fight international sex trafficking.

Justice Secretary Merceditas Gutierrez said Manila's anti-trafficking law was only passed last year, one of only two such statutes among the countries comprising Southeast Asia, and it should not be judged on the basis of how many suspects have been arrested and prosecuted.

The 2004 State Department report classifies Manila on a "Tier 2 watch list" of countries that are not yet in compliance with US legal standards, but which have promised to make or are in the process of making significant efforts to meet the requirements.

It said the Philippines "is a source, transit, and destination country for persons trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor" involving not only local women, but also as a "transit point and destination for victims" from China.

The report recognized Manila's "significant efforts" to fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking."

However, it cited Manila's "failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat severe forms of trafficking, particularly in terms of its weak implementation of the anti-trafficking law and a lack of progress in law enforcement."

Gutierrez told reporters: "It is quite unfair to judge the efficacy of the law solely on the basis of the number of prosecutions, and more so, on the number of convictions."

The law is not merely penal legislation but one that seeks to comprehensively address the problem from "prevention, protection to recovery and integration."

str/cgm/sdm

Philippines-US-trafficking

LOAD-DATE: June 19, 2004LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

241 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Nation

June 18, 2004 Friday

KID CAMEL JOCKEYS TRAFFICKING THRIVING

LENGTH: 1148 words

By Our Staff Reporter

KARACHI- Beside tough enforcement of laws, children continue to be trafficked from Pakistan to be used as camel jockeys in UAE.

This was reported in a recently conducted research study on child trafficking for camel races-a perspective from Pakistan, one of the singularly few of its kind research study in the world. The study brings to light vital information on an issue about which little is known. It was carried out by Centre for Research and Social Development (CRSD).

Pakistan being the ally of US government on war against terror, but Pakistan does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, therefore, is placed on Tier 2 Watch List of Trafficking in Persons Report 2004.

The study pointed out that child trafficking is not new, but it is a current practice in most regions in the world. However, it has considerably gathered momentum over the past years. The trafficking of young children for forced labour is one of the fastest growing areas of international crimes.

While there are local groups involved in human trafficking, it is mainly international networks that have made it a sophisticated and well-organised industry in Pakistan.

Identifying the high risk areas for child trafficking, it says that for child traffickers Rahim Yar Khan and Dera Ghazi Khan and Southern Punjab are the centre for trafficking in children, and are a major sources of children trafficked as camel jockeys.

The use of children as jockeys in camel racing is itself extremely dangerous and can result in serious injury and even death. Some children are also abused by traffickers and their employers.

Highlighting the history and trend of this sport, it says that camel racing in UAE is an old sport. The use of children as jockeys from Pakistan, however, dates back to early '70s. Some of the local people attribute this to frequent visits of Arab Sheikhs to the area for purpose of hunting. A Pakistani businessman is alleged to be involved in inviting who in return was rewarded by expansion of his business empire in the Middle East manifolds. There are estimated 14,000 active racing camels and about 15 racetracks throughout the UAE. Dubai, which is centres of this activity, has two of the main stadiums.

The trafficking of children for use as camel jockeys is prohibited by the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child and by ILO Conventions 29, 138 and 182 - all of which have been ratified by the UAE.

Sheikh Hamdan bin Zayed Al Nahyan, Minister for Foreign Affairs and also the Chairman of the Emirates Camel Racing Federation promulgated Order No.1/6/266 on 22 July 2002, which prohibits children under 15 or weighing less than 45kg from being employed in camel racing. It also specifies that all camel jockeys must have proof of their age through their passports and be issued with a medical certificate by the Camel Racing Federation. The minister announced that the ban would come into effect on 1 September 2002. A fine of 20,000 dirhams ($ 5,500) will be imposed for a first offence and a second offence will lead to a ban from camel racing for one year. A prison sentence of three months along with a fine of 20,000 dirhams will be imposed for subsequent offences.

Tougher enforcement efforts in Pakistan and the ban on child camel jockeys in the United Arab Emirates are believed to have reduced the numbers of boys trafficked through Pakistan for that purpose.

Violation of the law enforced in 2002 is still being continued, as evidences (cases of more than 40 children deported and repatriation in April and May 2003) of deportation and repatriation of more than 15 children in February and March 2004, indicates that rules are still being blatantly ignored and violated.

As during the last 15 months, more than 80 children were deported and repatriated from UAE, after working for more than two and three years as camel jockeys. Even the large number of such children are not traceable or deducted by government officials in UAE and Pakistan and remains ignored and invisible from the scene.

Highlighting the root causes of trafficking in children, it says that they are multiple and complex. Some more apparent, which especially persuade parents to part heir children at such a young age are poverty, unemployment, illiteracy, unawareness.

And inadequate legislation, and weak enforcement of related laws and may be greed in some cases.

Poverty has forced many families to send their children, some as young as three, to find whatever work they can. Even Pakistani children are smuggled as camel jockeys to the Gulf states; some are sold by their parents and others are kid-napped by organised groups.

Regarding the rehabilitation and re-integration of the camel jockeys to normal life, it draws that it is the most challenging task and requires a pragmatic programme of actions. Based on nature of the number of issues involved, it requires a multi-dimensional strategic approach. This also requires a strong and active cooperation of relevant government departments and agencies as well as NGOs.

Below given are the steps by steps strategic interventions, pointing out specific actions, must be taken to redress issues involved.

Exploring the role of government departments, the study says that in addition to deliberate connivance of a few corrupt officials, there is a lack of understanding of the issue among the government officials, as they have no understanding of difference between trafficking and smuggling, so actual rates of prosecution are difficult to determine. They especially have less knowledge of the laws and penalties under the new Ordinance on the Crime promulgated in 2002.

Frequent transfers, postings and ambiguities in role and responsibilities of different governmental departments add to worst situations.

Highlighting the efforts from the Government of Pakistan, it says that it has taken children trafficking as a major problem. It has signed regional and international protocols/ conventions. It has promulgated the 'Prevention and Control of the Human Trafficking Ordinance 2002' in August 2002 to check growing menace of human trafficking. The Ordinance covers issue of camel-kids, declaring it a criminal offence. Similarly it initiated a few strong initiatives and projects at different level. With such agreements and efforts there is hope that the issues of children trafficking can be taken seriously and brought to an end.

Regarding the recommendations, it proposes various practical suggestion as the issue is multi-dimensional and requires multi-sectoral approach, therefore, successful implementation of local, international laws, conventions and protocol is the main thrust of the issue.

Similarly, implementation and interventions as highlighted in the section of consequences and strategic interventions need to be addressed and implemented in the light of local experience and culture.

LOAD-DATE: November 16, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Welfare/Social Services; Social Issues; Crime/Courts

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Global News Bites

242 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Pakistan Newswire

June 18, 2004 Friday

Despite tougher laws, children still being trafficked to UAE for camel race: CRSD report

SECTION: Nationwide International News

LENGTH: 1270 words

DATELINE: Karachi, June 18

Despite tough enforcement of laws against trafficking of children from Pakistan, the practice is continued and children are regularly being trafficked from Pakistan to be used as camel jockeys in United Arab Emirates (UAE). This was reported in a recently conducted research study on "Child Trafficking for Camel Races; a Perspective from Pakistan" one of few of its kind research studies in the world, brings to light vital information on an issue about which little is known, carried out by Centre for Research and Social Development (CRSD). Pakistan is an important ally of US government on war against terror, it does not fully comply with the minimum standards for elimination of trafficking, therefore is placed on Tier 2 Watch List of Trafficking in Persons report 2004, the study adds. The study pointed out that child trafficking is not new; it is a current practice in most regions in the world. However, it has considerably gathered momentum over the past years. The trafficking of young children for forced labour is one of the fastest growing areas of international crimes while there are local groups involved in human trafficking, it is mainly international networks that have made it a sophisticated and well-organized industry in Pakistan. The study is based on primary and secondary data from different sources. Interviews of experts, government officials and children recovered/ repatriated were taken for this study. As research on the issue of child trafficking for labour exploitation in Pakistan is the weakest in South Asia. Information and data on trafficking in children has not yet been systematically collected. Furthermore, the illegal and clandestine nature of the activities involved makes it difficult to obtain reliable and accurate data either from NGOs or different governmental departments. Identifying high risk areas for child trafficking, it says that for child traffickers Rahim Yar Khan, Dera Ghazi Khan (Southern Punjab) are the center for trafficking in children and are major sources of children trafficked as camel jockeys. The use of children as jockeys in camel racing is itself extremely dangerous and can result in serious injury and even death. Some children are also abused by traffickers and their employers by depriving them of food and basic human rights. Highlighting the history and trend of this sport, it says that camel racing in UAE is an old sport. The use of children as jockeys from Pakistan, however, dates back to early 70s. Some of the local people attribute this to frequent visits of Arab Sheikhs to the Area for purpose of hunting. A Pakistani businessman is alleged to be involved in inviting who in return was rewarded by expansion of his business empire in the Middle East manifolds. There are estimated 14,000 active racing camels and about 15 racetracks throughout the UAE. Dubai, which is centre of this activity, has two of the main stadiums and a modern Camel. The trafficking of children for use as camel jockeys is prohibited by the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child and by ILO Conventions 29, 138 and 182 - all of which have been ratified by the UAE. Sheikh Hamdan bin Zayed Al Nahyan, the Minister for Foreign Affairs and also the Chairman of the Emirates Camel Racing Federation promulgated Order No.1/6/266 on 22 July 2002, which prohibits children under 15 or weighing less than 45kg from being employed in camel racing. It also specifies that all camel jockeys must have proof of their age through their passports and be issued with a medical certificate by the Camel Racing Federation.

The Minister announced that the ban would come into effect on September 1, 2002. A fine of 20,000 dirhams (US$5,500) will be imposed for a first offence and a second offence will lead to a ban from camel racing for one year. A prison sentence of three months along with a fine of 20,000 dirhams will be imposed for subsequent offences. Tougher enforcement efforts in Pakistan and the ban on child camel jockeys in the United Arab Emirates are believed to have reduced the numbers of boys trafficked through Pakistan for that purpose. Violation of the law enforced in 2002 is still being continued, as evidences (cases of more than 40 children deported and repatriation in April and May 2003) of deportation and repatriation of more than 15 children in February and March 2004, indicates that rules are still being blatantly ignored and violated. As during the last 15 months, more than eighty children were deported and repatriated from UAE, after working for more than two and three years as camel jockeys. Even the large number of such children are not traceable or deducted by government officials in UAE and Pakistan and remains ignored and invisible from the scene. Highlighting the root causes of trafficking in children, research report says that they are multiple and complex. Some more apparent, which especially persuade parents to part their children at such a younger age are poverty, unemployment, illiteracy, unawareness, inadequate legislation, and weak enforcement of related laws and may be greed in some cases. Poverty has forced many families to send their children, some as young as three, to find whatever work they can. Even Pakistani children are smuggled as camel jockeys to the Gulf states; some are sold by their parents and others are kidnapped by organized groups. Regarding the rehabilitation and re-integration of the camel jockeys to normal life, it draws that it is the most challenging task and requires a pragmatic programme of actions. Based on nature of the number of issues involved, it requires a multi-dimensional strategic approach. This also requires a strong and active cooperation of relevant government departments and agencies as well as NGOs. Below given are the steps by steps strategic interventions, pointing out specific actions, must be taken to redress issues involved. Exploring the role of government departments, it says that in addition to deliberate connivance of a few corrupt officials, there is a lack of understanding of the issue among the government officials as they have no understanding of difference between trafficking and smuggling so actual rates of prosecution are difficult to determine. They especially have less knowledge of the laws and penalties under the new Ordinance on the Crime promulgated in 2002. Frequent transfers, postings and ambiguities in role and responsibilities of different governmental departments add to worst situations. Highlighting the efforts from the government of Pakistan, it says that it has taken children trafficking as a major problem. It has signed regional and international protocols/ conventions. It has promulgated the 'Prevention and Control of the Human Trafficking Ordinance 2002' in August 2002 to check growing menace of human trafficking. The Ordinance covers issue of camel-kids, declaring it a criminal offence. Similarly it initiated few strong initiatives and projects at different level. With such agreements and efforts there is hope that the issues of children trafficking can be taken seriously and brought to its end. Regarding the recommendations, it proposes various practical suggestion as the issue is multi-dimensional and requires multi-sectoral approach, therefore successful implementation of local, international laws, conventions and protocol is the main thrust of the issue. Similarly implementation and interventions as highlighted in the section of consequences and strategic interventions need to be address and implemented in the light of local experiences and culture.

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 Pakistan Press International

243 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Pakistan Newswire

June 18, 2004 Friday

Child trafficking, violation of laws continue in Pakistan

SECTION: Nationwide International NewsLENGTH: 634 wordsDATELINE: Karachi, June 18

Despite enforcement of laws, children continue to be trafficked from Pakistan and used as camel jockeys in the UAE. This was reported in a recently conducted research study on "Child Trafficking for camel races; a perspective from Pakistan" carried out by Centre for Research and Social Development (CRSD). Pakistan does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, therefore has been placed on Tier 2 Watch List of Trafficking in Persons report 2004. The study pointed out that child trafficking has considerably gathered momentum over the past years. The trafficking of young children for forced labour is one of the fastest growing areas of international crimes. While there are local groups involved in human trafficking, it is mainly international networks that have made it a sophisticated and well-organized industry in Pakistan. The study is based on primary and secondary data from different sources. Interviews of experts, government officials and children recovered/ repatriated were taken for this study. As research on the issue of child trafficking for labour exploitation in Pakistan is the weakest in South Asia, information and data on trafficking in children has not yet been systematically collected. Furthermore, the illegal and clandestine nature of the activities involved makes it difficult to obtain reliable and accurate data either from NGOs or different governmental departments. Identifying the high risk areas for child trafficking, it says that for child traffickers Rahim Yar Khan & Dera Ghazi Khan & (Southern Punjab) are the center for trafficking in children, and are major sources of children trafficked as camel jockeys. The use of children as jockeys from Pakistan dates back to early '70s. Some of the local people attribute this to frequent visits of Arab Sheikhs to the Area for hunting. A Pakistani businessman is alleged to be involved in inviting them who in return was rewarded by expansion of his business empire in the Middle East manifolds. There are estimated 14,000 active racing camels and about 15 racetracks throughout the UAE. Dubai, which is centre of this activity, has two of the main stadiums. The trafficking of children for use as camel jockeys is prohibited by the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child and by ILO Conventions 29, 138 and 182 - all of which have been ratified by the UAE. Sheikh Hamdan bin Zayed Al Nahyan, the Minister for Foreign Affairs and also the Chairman of the Emirates Camel Racing Federation promulgated Order No.1/6/266 on 22 July 2002, which prohibits children under 15 or weighing less than 45kg from being employed in camel racing. It also specifies that all camel jockeys must have proof of their age through their passports and be issued with a medical certificate by the Camel Racing Federation. The Minister announced that the ban would come into effect on 1 September 2002. A fine of 20,000 dirhams (US$5,500) will be imposed for a first offence and a second offence will lead to a ban from camel racing for one year. A prison sentence of three months along with a fine of 20,000 dirhams will be imposed for subsequent offences. However, violation of the law enforced in 2002 continues, as evidences (cases of more than 40 children deported and repatriation in April and May 2003) of deportation and repatriation of more than 15 children in February and March 2004, indicate that rules are still being blatantly ignored and violated. During last 15 months, more than eighty children were deported and repatriated from UAE, after working for more than two and three years as camel jockeys. Even the large number of such children are not traceable by government officials in UAE and Pakistan and remains ignored and invisible from the scene.

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2004LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

244 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 17, 2004 Thursday

Kenya; Minister Pledges Probe of Slavery Claims

BYLINE: The Nation

LENGTH: 417 words

The Government is to investigate claims of sex slavery in Kenya.

Cabinet minister Linah Jebii Kilimo yesterday appealed to the public to volunteer information on abused children and women.

The Nation reported yesterday that Kenya had been placed on an international "watch list", quoting a US government report. It said Kenya was a "country of origin, destination and transit " for people smuggled across borders for sexual exploitation and forced labour.

The State Department report claimed that among the victims were rural children trafficked into urban centres and coastal resorts. Sex tourism was becoming common along the coast, it added.

Belonging to the "watch list" means a country could face US sanctions if it did not take steps to stop human trafficking.

Mrs Kilimo said: "It could be true there are cases of child smuggling, but it's probably done in the pretext of using the children to work in the house or as relatives who stay with the abusers."

It was a crime, she said, to use children as sex slaves or for labour "and the law will take its course once we apprehend the culprits."

Answering questions from journalists after presiding over this year's Day of the African Child celebrations at St Michael Primary School, Nairobi, the minister said Aids orphans were some of the most abused children.

Child slavery, sales, prostitution and trafficking were some of the African child's major challenges, she added.

Mrs Kilimo also condemned abortion as violence against children, saying: "I urge the communities to work closely with mothers to ensure they do not abort." Earlier, in a memorandum to the minister, Children's Parliament urged the Government to enact tough legislation against abortion. They also wanted an end to child abuse, including defilement.

They called for additional classrooms because schools were congested due to the free education programme. New classrooms, they said, should be part of the plan to put up 150,000 homes a year.

Unicef country representative Heimo Laakkonen urged the Government to find ways of enrolling the 1.5 million children yet to take advantage of the free schooling.

He urged school management committees to be proactive in following up the out-of-school children in their communities.

"Where families are negligent or absent, the community has a responsibility to step make sure that the children go to school," he said.

The theme of this year's celebrations was: The African Child and the Family.

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 AllAfrica, Inc.

245 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 17, 2004 Thursday

Nigeria; Women Trafficking: Nigeria On US Watch List

BYLINE: This Day

LENGTH: 1078 words

The United States has listed Nigeria on Tier 2 Watch List for women and children trafficking.

The fourth annual trafficking in Persons Report released by US Department of state yesterday classified Nigeria as "a source, transit, and destination country for trafficked women and children".

Furthermore, the Department's evaluation of government's compliance with the US Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA) stated that Nigeria does not comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking despite making significant efforts to so do.

Nigeria is placed on the Tier 2 Watch List because of the continued significant complicity of Nigerian security personnel in trafficking and the noticeable failure to address this complicity.

According to the report, the Nigerian Government does not face severe resource constraints, faced by other countries in the region yet it commits inadequate funding and personnel to the fight against serious trafficking in women and children.

The Nigerian Government is, however, "commended for its new anti-trafficking law and the new central government anti-trafficking in persons law enforcement unit created by that law."

The government is however urged to "move quickly to implement the new law through vigorous high court prosecutions of corrupt officials and traffickers; it should also give adequate support to the new anti-trafficking agency and improve protection facilities or funding for NGO protection activities."

Some state governments were also mentioned for their efforts in combating trafficking crimes. These include Imo State for the repatriation of 29 victims from Gabon during the year. Edo and Abia States for running skills acquisition centers for victims, and Akwa Ibom State for working with Cameroon to effect the repatriation of Nigerian children trafficked to that country.

John Miller, Director of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, at the presentation of the report, described Tier 2 watch list countries as "weak Tier 2 countries that are in danger, the coming year, of falling to Tier 3." Tier 3 countries or governments include those that are not making significant efforts and may be subject to certain U.S. sanctions.

Miller, however, stressed that sanctions are not the preferred way to go. "Let me make clear that while Tier 3, under the law, brings with it the possibility of losses of certain kinds of U.S. aid, the purpose of this report is not sanctions, it is to get progress. And as the law provides, last year, many countries that were named in Tier 3, over the succeeding three months before the presidential decision on sanctions, made tremendous progress. And we hope that all countries, particularly those on Tier 3, in the next three months, will make similar progress."

This placement in tiers is based on the extent of a government's actions to combat trafficking. The Department first evaluates whether the government fully complies with the TVPA's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking.

The minimum standards include the prohibition of severe forms of trafficking in persons and prescription of punishment commensurate with that for grave crimes, such as forcible sexual assault for the knowing commission of any act of sex trafficking involving force, fraud, coercion, or in which the victim of sex trafficking is a child incapable of giving meaningful consent, or of trafficking which includes rape or kidnapping or which causes death.

The government of a country is also expected to prescribe punishment that is sufficiently stringent to deter and that adequately reflects the heinous nature of the offence for the knowing commission of any act of a severe form of trafficking in persons, as well as make serious and sustained efforts to eliminate severe forms of trafficking in persons.

In addition to the above criteria, the minimum standard also considers:

- whether the percentage of victims of severe forms of trafficking in the country that are non-citizens of such countries is insignificant;
- whether the government of the country, consistent with the capacity of such government, systematically monitors its efforts to satisfy the criteria described in paragraphs above and makes available publicly a periodic assessment of such efforts; and,
- whether the government of the country achieves appreciable progress in eliminating severe forms of trafficking when compared to the assessment in the previous year.

As required by the TVPA, in making tier determinations between Tiers 2 and 3, the Department considers the overall extent of human trafficking in the country; the extent of governmental non compliance with the minimum standards, particularly the extent to which government officials have participated in, facilitated, condoned, or are otherwise complicit in trafficking; and, what measures are reasonable to bring the government into compliance with the minimum standards in light of the government's resources and capabilities.

Governments of countries in Tier 3 may be subject to certain sanctions including the withholding by US government of non-humanitarian, non-trade-related assistance. Countries that receive no such assistance would be subject to withholding of funding for participation in educational and cultural exchange programmes.

Consistent with the TVPA, such governments would also face U.S. opposition to assistance (except for humanitarian, trade-related, and certain development-related assistance) from international financial institutions such as the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and multilateral development banks such as the World Bank.

These potential consequences would take effect at the beginning of the next fiscal year, October 1, 2004. All or part of the TVPA's sanctions can be waived upon a determination by the President that the provision of such assistance to the government would promote the purposes of the statute or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States.

The TVPA also provides that sanctions shall be waived if necessary to avoid significant adverse effects on vulnerable populations, including women and children. Sanctions also would not apply if the President finds that, after this report is issued but before the imposition of sanctions, a government has come into compliance with the minimum standards or is making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance.

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

246 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 17, 2004 Thursday

PanAfrica; State Dept Releases Human Trafficking Report

BYLINE: allAfrica.com

LENGTH: 351 words

"We can't fully embrace our dignity unless we champion the dignity of others," U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell said during the release of the U.S. State Department's annual report on human trafficking in Washington, D.C. Monday.

Powell said 600,000 to 800,000 people are bought and sold, or forced across the world's borders each year.

Trafficking is on President George W. Bush's agenda, Powell said and the U.S. government will increase funding by $50 million in addition to the $70 million already available.

"Women and girls as young as six years old" are the vast majority of trafficking victims, Powell said, and most of them find themselves in sexual servitude.

However, "we are making progress against this evil," Powell said. "Real people have been helped."

Human trafficking is linked to other international problems, such as drug trafficking and HIV/Aids, he said. It is a major source of revenue for organized crime and "plagues every country in the world, including the United States."

"Trafficking is a global security threat," Powell said. "All nations must double their efforts."

The state department established a new "Tier 2 Watchlist" category this year to describe countries that have met the minimum standards, but are falling behind in their efforts to combat human trafficking, said John Miller, the Secretary of State's senior advisor on trafficking in persons.

Information on slavery is very inexact, Miller said, but estimated that 80 percent of trafficking victims are female, and half of those are children.

Miller said there is no hard evidence that trafficking is linked to terrorism, increased HIV/Aids rates or child prostitution in Africa, but that trafficking victims are more likely to be exposed to HIV infection.

"Victims frequently fall victim to HIV/Aids," Miller said. "There is a link."

Miller said the international community should integrate their HIV/Aids and anti-trafficking programs to better coordinate their efforts.

"Twenty-first century slavery is a story of evil, but also a story of hope," Miller said.

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

247 of 359 DOCUMENTS

AFX.COM

June 17, 2004 Thursday

Myanmar blames US sanctions for its poor record on human trafficking

SECTION: GENERAL; GOVERNMENT

LENGTH: 516 words

DATELINE: YANGON, Myanmar

Myanmar has strongly objected to a US report criticising the military-run state's poor record on human trafficking and blames Washington's tough economic sanctions for the problem.

The State Department's annual report on human trafficking put Myanmar among the countries doing the least to combat the problem, which sees hundreds of thousands of people trafficked for forced labour, sexual slavery and other forms of exploitation globally each year.

"The report failed to mention that the government of Myanmar is doing everything it can possibly do to prevent and stop this trafficking," the junta said in a statement.

"But the trade and economic sanctions imposed on Myanmar by the US undermine our economy, taking away resources that could be used to fight human trafficking effectively, help the victims and prevent potential victims from being exploited", the statement said.

In contrast, the US report said the regime's economic policies fuel trafficking and are responsible for Myanmar's listing in Tier 3 -- the lowest category in the report.

"The military junta's economic mismanagement and its policy of using forced labour are driving factors behind Burma's huge trafficking problem," it said, using the country's former name.

"The government of Burma does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to do so", it said.

In rejecting the report, Myanmar takes a swipe at what it says is rampant human trafficking and workplace abuse in the US, charging that a "huge sex trade and sweat shops" thrived there.

"It is unfortunate to realize that the US is merely putting all the blame on others", it said.

"It not only refuses to directly shoulder its shared responsibility in this war against trafficking in persons, but indirectly promotes poverty and unemployment by imposing sanctions on many developing countries, creating the main cause for women and children in becoming easy prey for human traffickers", the statement said.

Myanmar's rejection of the report comes three days after the US House of Representatives passed a resolution renewing a one-year ban on all imports from Myanmar, as part of sanctions for abuse of human rights and repression of democratic opposition.

The resolution was adopted by an overwhelming vote of 373-2, and an identical resolution introduced in the Senate is expected to be voted on soon.

The administration of President George Bush has called for passage of the resolution to pressure Yangon to hold talks with the opposition, led by Aung San Suu Kyi.

She remains under house arrest and her National League for Democracy (NLD) party's activities have been further curtailed.

The NLD won overwhelming support in Myanmar's 1990 elections, considered free and fair by the international community, but has not been allowed to govern.

ingrid.smith@afxnews.com

mlm/sls/br/ims/

For more information and to contact AFX: www.afxnews.com and www.afxpress.com

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 AFX News Limited

248 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English -- English

June 17, 2004 Thursday

Japan considering legislation against human trafficking

SECTION: International NewsLENGTH: 317 wordsDATELINE: TOKYO, June 17

Japan's justice ministry plans to submit a bill to parliament next year on punishment for human traffickers, an official said Thursday, days after a damning US report said it was not doing enough about the problem.

"We are working towards submitting the bill to the ordinary session of parliament," the justice ministry official said.

The session is to be convened in January and the bill would likely go before parliament around March, the official said.

Japan's penal code has no provisions to punish traffickers as such, forcing the authorities to resort to charging suspects under the immigration law, prostitution and other charges.

Such offences can be punished by a few years' imprisonment at most.

"We want to make certain all (traffickers) are punished," the official said, adding it had yet to be decided whether the ministry would aim to create a totally new law or revise the existing legislation.

Japan vowed Tuesday to step up its efforts to fight human trafficking after being put on a "watch list" of nations involved in the problem by its closest ally, the United States.

The US State Department "Trafficking in Persons" report for 2003 slammed Japan for being lax in cracking down on human trafficking, often for sexual enslavement.

Japan's trafficking problem is large, the report said, adding that organized crime groups that operate internationally, like the yakuza, were involved.

The National Police Agency said in a report late May that police uncovered 83 foreign women who had been trafficked into Japan's sex industry last year although experts said the figure was only a fraction of the total.

The women were found as police arrested 41 brokers, strip club owners and others in 20 trafficking cases involving foreign women. Most of them were arrested for obscenity charges and violations of immigration law.

mis/ja/br

Japan-crime-trafficking-US

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2004LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

249 of 359 DOCUMENTS

BusinessWorld

June 17, 2004, Thursday

US exec asks RP to improve record on human trafficking

BYLINE: Ma. Eloisa I. Calderon

SECTION: Pg. 11

LENGTH: 553 words

The United States said the Philippines needed to do more to boost its fight against human trafficking, even as it noted that the Arroyo administration had put in motion measures meant to protect victims.

US Embassy political officer Kim Harrington noted that the Philippine government has been a doing a "great job" in the prevention of trafficking and has continued to sponsor adequate protection efforts for trafficking victim. But its efforts, she said, in enforcing the Republic Act 9208 or Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act it enacted in May 26 last year, remained weak.

"The Philippines has been maverick in that sense [prevention and protection] but the problem is in the area of prosecution. We are happy with Gloria [Macapagal Arroyo] and the entire Congress passing the legislation on anti-trafficking. That was a great job. But having it in paper is something, having it implemented is another," Ms. Harrington told reporters in yesterday's briefing at the embassy.

Ms. Harrington added that prosecution of violators of the anti-trafficking law in the Philippines has been a problem as it takes a long time for cases to be processed.

The latest report cited that the Philippine government has prosecuted only three trafficking cases under its new law, and only two convictions for trafficking-related offenses under other laws.

The Philippines should take immediate corrective action through the prosecution of traffickers, aggressive implementation of the new law, and the arrest and prosecution of officials involved in trafficking, the report said.

"If the government fails to act immediately and the country falls to Tier 3, economic sanctions and the cut-off of non-humanitarian aid is a very real possibility," Ms. Harrington said.

According to the 2004 Trafficking in Persons Report, the Philippines landed in Tier 2 Watch List category.

"The Government of the Philippines does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. The Philippines is placed on Tier 2 Watch List due to the government's failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat severe forms of trafficking, particularly in terms of its weak implementation of the anti-trafficking law and a lack of progress in law enforcement," the fourth annual report said.

Since the US Congress passed the Trafficking Victims Protection Act in 2000, the State Department has been producing an annual report rating countries in the following tiers:

* Tier 1: Countries that fully comply with the act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking.

* Tier 2: Countries that do not fully comply with the minimum standards but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance.

* Tier 2 Watch List: Countries on Tier 2 requiring special scrutiny because of a high or significantly increasing number of victims; failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking in persons; or an assessment as Tier 2 based on commitments to take action over the next year.

* Tier 3: Countries that neither satisfy the minimum standards nor demonstrate a significant effort to come into compliance. Countries in this tier are subject to potential non-humanitarian and non-trade sanctions.

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 BusinessWorld Publishing Corporation

250 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

June 17, 2004

U.S. Embassy, OSCE Work to Combat Trafficking in Macedonia; Workshop aims to improve investigation, prosecution of human trafficking cases

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 470 words

The U.S. embassy in the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and the OSCE Spillover Monitor Mission to Skopje are sponsoring a three-day workshop July 17-19 that aims to improve the investigation and prosecution of human trafficking cases in the country.

Some 30 law enforcement officials and judges are attending the workshop. Barbara Carlin, resident legal advisor at the embassy, said that through professional, collaborative efforts of key law enforcement officials, "increased results to combat trafficking can be achieved."

Following is an OSCE press release on the workshop, which is taking place in the Macedonian city of Ohrid:

(begin text)

Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe

Spillover Monitor Mission to Skopje

17 June 2004

OSCE MISSION AND U.S. EMBASSY IN SKOPJE HOLD WORKSHOP ON COUNTERING HUMAN TRAFFICKING

SKOPJE, 17 June 2004 -- In an effort to enhance domestic capacity to investigate and prosecute human trafficking cases, the OSCE Spillover Monitor Mission to Skopje and the U.S. Embassy in Skopje today launched a three-day training workshop in Ohrid.

"Ensuring that law enforcement officers of the Ministry of Interior, prosecutors and investigative and trial judges have an integrated approach to human trafficking cases is essential to effective case processing," said Victor Ullom, Head of the OSCE Mission's Rule of Law Unit.

Over 30 workshop participants will address inter-agency approach and cases processing techniques, and will provide for a review of changes to the Criminal Code and the impact they have on the fight against human trafficking.

"Through the professional, collaborative efforts of key law enforcement officials increased results to combat trafficking can be achieved," said Barbara Carlin, Resident Legal Advisor for the U.S. Embassy in Skopje.

Carlin, who also serves as the Overseas Prosecutorial Development Assistance and Training Officer in Skopje, noted that country's Tier 1 ranking in the State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report, released on June 14, underscores the necessity of continued effective law enforcement, prosecution and adjudication of cases.

The workshop, conducted in partnership with the U.S. Department of Justice International Criminal Investigative Training Assistance Programme and the Overseas Prosecutorial Development Assistance and Training Programme, is the second in a series of three, planned for 2004.

Nikola Gaon, Acting Spokesperson, OSCE Spillover Monitor Mission to Skopje, 11 Oktomvri str. 25, QBE Building MK-1000, Skopje, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia. Tel.: +389 2 323 46 50, +389 70 327 158 (mobile). Fax: +389 2 323 42 34. E-mail: nikola.gaon@osce.org

(end text)

(Distributed by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

251 of 359 DOCUMENTS

World Markets
Research Centre

World Markets Analysis

June 17, 2004

US Report Highlights Asia's Widespread Problem with Human Trafficking

BYLINE: amit chanda

SECTION: MAIN STORY

LENGTH: 1874 words

The US has this week released its fourth annual Trafficking in Persons report, in which a number of Asian countries feature either as the worst abusers, or on a second-tier watchlist.

WMRCNW Perspective

Significance

The US's list covers 141 countries, ranking them against its own criteria, with just 25 of these deemed to meet the requisite standards.

Implications

The US hopes that by highlighting the issue and - in the case of the worst offenders - pursuing sanctions, this awareness and pressure will be sufficient to elicit a positive change in the situation.

Outlook

The issue of trafficking has ramifications not only in the human rights sphere, but also, increasingly, for security. As such, in light of the US's increased global presence in security matters, it can be expected to pursue the issue doggedly.

Traffick Flows

Presenting the report, US Secretary of State Colin Powell estimated that 600,000-800,000 people are trafficked on an annual basis. Following the passing of its Trafficking Victims Protection Act in 2000, the US has been monitoring the situation globally, surveying countries where more than 100 victims of trafficking have been reported. From this research, it has drawn up a comprehensive table, identifying the worst offenders and highlighting a watchlist of countries where there is known to be a problem, or where the existing situation is deteriorating, but the authorities are prepared to address the issue. There are two further tiers of countries; those that have a problem but are actively tackling it, and those where there is either no problem, or effective laws and procedures against trafficking are in place.

The Three Tiers (Global)

3 (10 facing sanctions)

Bangladesh, Myanmar (Burma), Cuba, Ecuador, Equatorial Guinea, Guyana, North Korea, Sierra Leone, Sudan and Venezuela

2 (42 on the watchlist)

including Japan, Russia, Greece, Turkey and Cyprus

2 (54 not on the watchlist)

including Argentina, China, Finland, Mozambique, Saudi Arabia and Uzbekistan

1 (25 meet US criteria)

including Australia, Canada, France, Poland, Sweden and the UK

The Three Tiers (Asia)

3 (10 facing sanctions)

Bangladesh, Myanmar (Burma) and North Korea

2 (42 on the watchlist)

India, Japan, Laos, Pakistan, Philippines, Thailand and Vietnam

2 (54 not on the watchlist)

Afghanistan, Cambodia, China, Indonesia, Malaysia, Nepal, Singapore and Sri Lanka

1 (25 meet US criteria)

Australia, Hong Kong, South Korea, New Zealand and Taiwan

Definitions

Minimum US Standards: Prohibiting severe forms of trafficking and punishing these acts; prescribing punishment commensurate with the crime; making serious efforts to eliminate trafficking.

Tier 3: These countries may face sanctions in an attempt to pressure them into addressing the trafficking issue. They do not currently comply with minimum standards (as given in US law) and the authorities are making no effort to redress this.

Tier 2 (watchlist): In addition to the concerns raised in general for Tier 2, those on the watchlist also display the following tendencies: a deterioration in the situation; a failure to provide evidence of greater effort to combat trafficking; and a clear commitment on the part of the country to tackling the problem in the coming year.

Tier 2: These nations are under 'special scrutiny' because their governments currently do not fully comply with the minimum US standards, but they are making progress on this.

Tier 1: These states comply with the US's set of minimum standards.

The Usual Suspects?

Among the worst offending nations within Asia are Bangladesh, Myanmar (Burma) and North Korea. To some degree, their inclusion will not come as a great surprise to many observers, but the one particularly interesting inclusion on the second tier watchlist is Japan.

Bangladesh: The report was damning with regard to Bangladesh, arguing both that the government had failed to make any progress in attempting to tackle the issue and, worse, that government officials were complicit in the practice. It estimated that 10,000-20,000 girls and women are trafficked annually, most being sent to Bahrain, India, Kuwait, Pakistan and the UAE. Most are sent to urban areas for either domestic work or sexual exploitation. Furthermore, there is a smaller market for trafficked boys, who often find themselves in Qatar or the UAE working as beggars and camel jockeys. The report concedes that the government has made progress in raising public awareness of the issue, but suggests that it should restart its anti-trafficking strategy. Furthermore, it calls on the government to tackle corruption more effectively, and prosecute officials involved in the people trade. It points to the international aid that Bangladesh receives, arguing that although the government faces considerable difficulty, not least of which is poverty, it should enlist the cooperation of non-governmental organisations (NGOs) and the international community in its campaign.

Myanmar: In light of the US's raft of sanctions against Myanmar, and its hostile attitude towards the ruling State Peace and Development Council (SPDC) military junta - particularly over its detention of pro-democracy campaigner Aung San Suu Kyi and general poor attitude towards democracy - it comes as little surprise that the country finds its way into the worst offenders category. The report highlights the junta's complicity in the use of forced labour, a factor that has long been an issue, but one on which some progress is believed to have been made (see Myanmar: 7 June 2004: UN Makes Fresh Charges Against Myanmar Over Forced Labour). The report highlights that Myanmar acts more as a source for trafficking rather than a destination for trafficked individuals; men, women and children have been recorded as being trafficked to a number of countries in the region, including China, Malaysia, Japan and Taiwan, subsequently being forced into domestic service, commercial labour and the sex trade. Similarly, the report highlights a problem with internal trafficking, with girls and women taken from villages to urban areas and camps, usually to work as prostitutes.

Japan: This was one of the more surprising inclusions in the list of Tier 2 countries, where it found itself along with Russia and Turkey for the second year in a row. The report criticised Japan, labelling it a 'destination country for Asian, Latin American and Eastern European women and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labour and sexual exploitation,' adding that 'Japan's trafficking problem is large and Japanese organized crime groups yakuza] that operate internationally are involved.' "

The State Department director in charge of producing the human trafficking report chastised Japan for falling short of employing its full legal and humanitarian resources in combating the problem. John Miller told a press conference, 'We believe that there has been a tremendous gap in Japan that has a huge problem with slavery, particularly sex slavery, a tremendous gap between the size of the problem and the resources and efforts devoted to addressing the problem.' The country currently lacks any kind of comprehensive legislation against human trafficking as a specific offence, relying instead upon the penal code - including various labour, immigration and child welfare statutes - to carry out the few trafficking prosecutions it has so far.

In fact, only in April 2004 did Japanese authorities apply human trafficking charges for the first time, arresting two men suspected of trafficking girls for the purpose of sexual slavery. Miller cited the need to increase investigations, prosecutions and convictions for trafficking, while simultaneously providing greater assistance for victims. Japanese authorities have a tendency to downplay the scale of the problem - an instinctive reaction that effectively blunts pressure for a cohesive legal and social response; the National Police Agency recently reported that only 83 women had been trafficked into Japan during 2003 and forced to work in the sex industry, whereas Colombia's ambassador recently told Japanese authorities that around 4,000 Colombian women had been trafficked to Japan for sexual exploitation and other purposes.

The State Department official appealed to Japanese leaders to play a greater leadership role in the fight against human trafficking as 'one of the leading and wealthiest democracies in the world', adding that 'if Japan takes the lead and takes the steps that they have indicated that they will take, this will be a big, big step forward'. Chief Cabinet Secretary Hiroyuki Hosoda told reporters at a later press conference that 'eliminating human rights violations is an urgent duty, and it is necessary to form a body linking up the related agencies to take appropriate measures'. Toward this end, the government plans to boost inter-ministry and inter-agency co-operation, with a view to encouraging the Diet (parliament) to ratify UN protocols against human trafficking during its next session."

Outlook and Implications

Alongside the human rights ramifications, the US will be keen to highlight the security threat that trafficking poses as a means to elicit support for its stance. Powell was quick to state that profits from trafficking finance crime and violence, and potentially terrorism, although he provided no evidence for the latter. Whether this type of pressure will prompt countries to address the problem is questionable; the US is effectively attempting to impose a global standard, and, furthermore, is using its own criteria to do so. As such, there is the potential for its moves to unnecessarily politicise the situation. For example, heaping further criticism and sanctions on a nation such as Myanmar threatens to exacerbate tensions, not only with the junta but also with other Asian countries, and potentially with international bodies such as the International Labour Organisation (ILO), which are seeking to improve the situation through engagement and dialogue. Furthermore, a number of UN protocols have been established on the topic of human trafficking, including the Convention against Transnational Organised Crime, as well as specific protocols regarding human trafficking and migrant smuggling.

At the same time, however, the sheer scale of the human trafficking problem is such that most countries are never really doing enough to root out traffickers or provide support for victims. If the State Department's annual report succeeds in raising the issue's profile in countries that value their international image - like Japan - perhaps the US government's unilateral approach will have made a positive contribution to addressing the problem. In most cases, it is the same factors - poverty, a lack of legislation and effective policing, and porous borders - that conspire to create this and other similar problems.

WMRCNW Contacts

Amit Chanda (amit.chanda@wmrc.com) Elizabeth Mills (elizabeth.mills@wmrc.com)

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 World Markets Research Limited;
All Rights Reserved

252 of 359 DOCUMENTS

XINHUA GENERAL NEWS SERVICE

June 17, 2004, Thursday

US urged to change policy on Myanmar

SECTION: WORLD NEWS; POLITICALLENGTH: 277 wordsDATELINE: YANGON, June 17

Myanmar urged the United States on Thursday to change its policy on Myanmar, saying that the negative approach of sanctions and isolation is a "lose-lose" strategy for both of them.

The Myanmar government, in an information sheet, stressed that "If our countries are to move forward, it is clearly time for a fresh approach", calling upon Washington to help Myanmar realize the road map to democracy.

The statement encouraged the United States to understand Myanmar's complex political culture, to consider the entire Myanmar people and to help develop a healthy society in which democracy can flourish and endure.

"America would benefit from a democratic Myanmar, yet Washington ignores Myanmar's invitations to work constructively toward this goal," it said.

While Myanmar is doing everything it possibly could manage, with its limited resources, to fight trafficking in person but it is difficult to understand why the United States has not been mentioned or simply exempted its own failure in its own report, it cited.

The United States is merely putting all the blame on others while it not only refuses to directly shoulder its shared responsibility in this war against trafficking in person but indirectly promotes poverty and unemployment by imposing sanctions on many developing countries creating the main cause for women and children in becoming an easy prey for human traffickers, it blamed.

The US House of Representative on Monday passed a resolution renewing one year ban on all imposed on Myanmar. The US State Department released on the same day its 2003 "Trafficking in Persons" report having placed Myanmar in a US "watch list".

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2004LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

COPYRIGHT 2004 XINHUA NEWS AGENCY

253 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 16, 2004 Wednesday

Kenya; US Names Kenya in Slavery Report

BYLINE: The Nation

LENGTH: 491 words

Kenya has been placed on an international watchlist as a transit point for women and children smuggled from other African countries as sex slaves.

A report by the United States Government says Kenya is "country of origin, destination, and transit point" of people smuggled across borders for sexual exploitation and forced labour.

The annual report on human trafficking worldwide claims that among the victims are Kenyan children from rural areas who are trafficked into urban centres and coastal resorts for involuntary work, including prostitution.

Sex tourism is becoming more common on the Coast, the US alleges.

"Women and children are trafficked from Burundi and Rwanda to coastal areas in Kenya for sexual exploitation in the growing sex tourism industry," the report says. It notes that "the Government recently began a registration programme for coastal guesthouses, in part to deter sex tourism".

Some of the victims from Asian countries are trafficked through Kenya to European destinations for sexual exploitation, the report says. In addition, "Asian nationals, principally Indians, Bangladeshi and Nepalese, are trafficked into Kenya and coerced into bonded labour in the construction and garment industries".

Overall, the United States gives the Kenyan Government a failing grade for efforts to combat the growing slave trade within and across Kenya's borders.

The State Department report puts Kenya on a "watch list" of countries that could face US sanctions if they do not take more effective action to prevent human trafficking.

"Some trafficking offences could be prosecuted under laws addressing child labour, forced detention for prostitution and the commercial exploitation of children, but no trafficking-related offences have been prosecuted", the report says in its assessment of Kenya. "Kenyan police officials continue to deny that trafficking is a problem."

But in seeming contradiction to these criticisms, the State Department says elsewhere in the same assessment that Kenyan officials are increasingly engaged with the United States to develop anti-trafficking programmes. The report notes that a human trafficking unit was created in the police force last year with US assistance.

Ten countries are designated in the report as most out of compliance with international efforts to prevent human trafficking. African countries included on this list are Equatorial Guinea, Sierra Leone and Sudan.

The watchlist on which Kenya is placed also includes Tanzania as well as leading US allies such as Japan and Greece.

Some countries have made significant progress in fighting what Secretary of State Colin Powell described as a "kind of evil" that victimises up to 800,000 people a year.

Introducing the report on Monday, Mr Powell was accompanied by Paramount Chief Togbega Hadjor from Ghana, who was praised for fighting child trafficking "like a warrior" in his Lake Volta region.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 AllAfrica, Inc.

254 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English -- English

June 16, 2004 Wednesday

US puts Thailand on human trafficking watch list

SECTION: International News

LENGTH: 523 words

DATELINE: BANGKOK, June 16

The United States has put Thailand on a human trafficking watchlist for its failure to make progress in stamping out the global scourge, the US embassy said Wednesday citing a State Department report.

Washington's Trafficking in Persons report, which analyses efforts to combat the trade in 140 countries, downgraded Thailand to the "Tier Two watchlist" over its poor treatment of street children trafficked from Cambodia.

It joins other Southeast Asian nations placed on the watchlist including Laos, the Philippines and Vietnam, while neighbouring Myanmar remains at Tier Three, the lowest level.

The watchlist is a new category added to the system for weak Tier Two countries in danger of slipping to Tier Three, the level which permits the US government to impose non-trade-related economic sanctions on the country.

"Thailand was placed on the list for one very specific reason: the government did not make progress over the past year over extending protection to Cambodian street children who beg or sell in urban areas," a US embassy official told AFP.

Thailand's setbacks were of particular concern as it signed a memorandum of understanding with Cambodia last year to help regularize the protection and repatriation of trafficking victims, he said.

The report released Monday pointed to two instances in the past year in which large numbers of Cambodian youths were rounded up and deported "without proper screening for trafficking victims or referral to shelters for those identified," he said.

The first occurred last October in the run-up to APEC, a Pacific leaders' summit for which Thai authorities scrubbed clean Bangkok streets and removed "eyesores" including street vendors and beggars.

Some 620 Cambodians were deported prior to the summit, while a second mass deportation of 236 Cambodians occurred in March 2004, the report said.

Washington's trafficking downgrade of its war-on-terror ally marked "an important wake-up call for Thailand," according to United Nations regional human trafficking official Philip Robertson.

"I think the Thais are quite concerned about it and will take some significant pro-active steps to address the issue of how the street children from Cambodia are dealt with," Bangkok-based Robertson told AFP.

According to the report, other problem areas include the need to reduce trafficking-related corruption in the police, immigration services, and judiciary.

"Thailand is not able to adequately control its long land borders and there appears to be an increase in trafficking along the Thai-Malaysian border," it added.

The US government estimates up to 800,000 men, women and children are trafficked across international borders, and the billion-dollar trade ranks among the fastest growing transnational crimes.

Victims are forced into many forms of involuntary servitude, with more than half of all international victims trafficked for sexual exploitation, the report said.

Thailand's trafficking problem is particularly acute, as the kingdom is simultaneously a country of origin, transit and destination.

mlm/sls/rmj

Thailand-US-trafficking

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 Agence France Presse

255 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English -- English

June 16, 2004 Wednesday

Guyana accuses US of being unfair in report on human trafficking

SECTION: International News

LENGTH: 450 words

DATELINE: GEORGETOWN, June 16

Guyana on Wednesday accused the United States of being "unfair" in its assessment of Guyana's efforts to combat human trafficking but promised to fast-track plans to avoid a cut in funding from US and international lending agencies.

"That Guyana has been ranked 'tier three' in the US State Department's report disappoints me. I think it's very unfair with all the work that we have been doing," Guyana's Minister of Labour and Human Services, Bibi Shadick, told the opening of a seminar on trafficking in persons.

She recalled that it was Guyana that last year asked the Inter American Commission of Women (IACW) to stop focusing only on human trafficking in Latin America because the Caribbean has "its own special brand of the problem."

The seminar is one of seven planned for Guyana, Bahamas, Barbados, Netherlands Antilles, St Lucia and Suriname by the International Organisation for Migration and the IACW, an agency of the Organisation of American States (OAS) to craft a regional strategy for combatting the problem.

"The Caribbean region, itself, has not been well looked at in terms of understanding the context and certainly countries were asking for and requesting assistance to be able to develop a response," IOM Project Manager for trafficking in persons, Ashley Garrett, said.

Shadick said Guyanese police and other authorities have been raiding mining camps and other areas to rescue mainly indigenous women from prostitution, cheap and forced labour, as well as prosecuting offenders under existing laws.

She said efforts to erase Guyana from tier-three of the US State Department's global report on human trafficking included drafting legislation on human trafficking, training people to identify and report instances of the crime, and educate the public about the issue.

"Rest assured, we're not doing this because we want to satisfy the US State Department that we're doing something about it," Shadick said, however.

Tier-three countries are those whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards to tackle human trafficking and are not making significant efforts to do so.

Under the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2003 (TVPRA), the US may withhold non-humanitarian, non-trade-related assistance and this could result in withholding of funding for participation in educational and cultural exchange programs.

The US could also oppose assistance, except for humanitarian, trade-related, and certain development-related assistance, from international financial institutions such as the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and multilateral development banks such as the World Bank.

dc/mdl

Guyana-US-trafficking

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 Agence France Presse

256 of 359 DOCUMENTS

June 16, 2004

ESTONIA NOT DOING ENOUGH TO FIGHT HUMAN TRAFFICKING - U.S. REPORT

LENGTH: 464 words

DATELINE: TALLINN, Jun 16

A recent survey by the U.S. State Department ranks Estonia among countries which do not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking in humans, adding however that the country is making significant efforts to do so.

The Estonian government is placed in the State Department's fourth annual Trafficking in Persons Report on Tier 2 Watch List for lack of evidence of progress. The watch list includes 42 countries, among them Russia, Ethiopia, Japan and Thailand.

Of the 25 member states of the European Union only Cyprus and Greece are in the same group.

Lithuania is ranked in Tier 1 and Latvia in Tier 2 non-watch.

Kristiina Luht, project manager with the Estonian Social Affairs Ministry, told BNS the ranking was based not on the scope of the problem but on the country's readiness to fight with human trafficking.

Despite a few factual errors, the report's reproaches are justified, Luht said.

She said one of the biggest reproaches for Estonia was the lack of a state action plan. The obligation to draw up a state action plan for fight against human trafficking by 2005 was assumed by Estonia during a meeting of the Baltic and Nordic ministers in charge of justice, interior and gender equality affairs in Stockholm last year.

The report says Estonia is a source country for women and girls trafficked for the purpose of sexual exploitation both internally and abroad. Victims are usually trafficked to Finland, Sweden and the other Nordic countries, as well as Germany. There are also indications of internal trafficking typically from the northeast border region to the capital for prostitution. Estonia is a destination for foreign sex tourists, especially from neighboring countries.

High-ranking Estonian government officials condemned trafficking during the past year, but were slow to support such statements with institutional support or priority. The government should identify relevant focal points in each ministry and promptly establish a referral system for victim assistance, protection and increased outreach, says the report.

The government increased its funding to crime victim programs, which would be applicable to trafficking victims, but no trafficking victims reportedly benefited from such protections, according to the report. The government did not institute a referral system to NGOs for assistance, shelter or repatriation, although victims would be entitled to support under general (non-trafficking-specific) assistance programs.

The report also points out that the government led public discourse over the link between trafficking in persons and prostitution to determine a strategy for future action, but it did not institute a policy or plan during the reporting period.

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2004

LANGUAGE: English

PUB-TYPE: News

Copyright 2004 Baltic News Service

257 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Nation (Thailand)

June 16, 2004, Wednesday

Thailand hovering above Tier 3

BYLINE: The Nation.

LENGTH: 594 words

Thailand hovering above Tier 3

Thailand is managing to stay above the board in terms of its efforts to end human trafficking, but it is edging ever closer to 'Tier 3' status, a not-so-flattering category reserved for countries that are not doing enough to curb the practice. The following are excerpt from the US State Department's report on Human Trafficking:

Thailand (Tier 2 ' Watch List)

Thailand is a source, transit and destination country for persons trafficked for sexual exploitation and forced labour. Thailand is a destination for men, women and children from Burma, Laos, Cambodia, and China who are trafficked for forced or bonded labour and prostitution. Thai women are trafficked to Australia, South Africa, Japan, Bahrain, Taiwan, Europe and North America for sexual exploitation. Internal trafficking also occurs in Thailand, involving victims from northern Thailand. Additionally, regional economic disparities drive significant illegal migration into Thailand, presenting traffickers opportunities to move victims into labour exploitation. Widespread sex tourism in Thailand encourages trafficking for forced prostitution. The government of Thailand does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so.

Thailand's placement on Tier 2 Watch List is due to the government's failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat severe forms of trafficking in one area: the protection of Cambodian trafficking victims, particularly those exploited in street work. The Thai government needs to take measures to protect trafficking victims in order to demonstrate significant efforts to eliminate severe forms of trafficking.

The Thai government's law enforcement efforts showed some progress, with a significant increase in prosecutions and more seizures of assets related to trafficking cases. Thailand has a law specifically prohibiting trafficking. However, as in previous years, the law was used sparingly in 2003. Some police and prosecutors seem to be unfamiliar with its provisions and therefore do not use it. The government needs to reduce trafficking-related corruption in the police, immigration services, and judiciary.

The Thai government continued to provide adequate protection to trafficking victims in 2003, operating 97 shelters throughout the country for abused women and children. In 2003, Thailand signed a memorandum of understanding (MOU) with Cambodia and a wider agreement between government agencies and NGOs to help regularise the protection and repatriation of foreign trafficking victims. Foreign victims in Thailand are no longer subject to deportation. However, in an attempt to remove street children from Bangkok in advance of the Apec summit in October of 2003, the Thai government deported 620 Cambodians, some of whom were trafficking victims, without any of the protections required by the MOU.

Thai missions overseas have provided support to Thai victims who wish to return home, but limited funding is available to assist their repatriation. Police and consular officials have received training on trafficking issues and dealing with victims. The Thai police in 2004 began an information campaign to increase public awareness of trafficking that included the distribution of pamphlets and creation of a hotline for reporting suspected cases. The government also supports the work of NGOs and international organisations to carry out public awareness campaigns and provide victim support services.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 Nation Multimedia Group

258 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 15, 2004 Tuesday

PanAfrica; Child Trafficking a Major Problem in Africa, Report Finds

BYLINE: United States Department of State

LENGTH: 715 words

Ghanaian chief describes efforts to combat child labor

For the scores of boys who work in the fishing industry on Ghana's Lake Volta, life is more than simply grueling and monotonous -- it is slavery, with no schools, no medical care, and no hope.

The boys, some as young as six years old, have been sold by their families to spend their days rowing boats across the lake and pulling nets laden with fish from the water.

More than a year ago, Togbega Hadjor, paramount chief of Ghana's Bakpa Traditional Area, where child trafficking has been common, committed himself to ending this exploitation of children when the International Organization for Migration (IOM) asked for his help in combating child slavery in the Lake Volta region.

Hadjor was among several heroes in the fight against human trafficking who were honored in Washington June 14 when the U.S. Department of State released its annual Trafficking in Persons Report. The report evaluated efforts by 140 countries around the world to combat human trafficking, and ranked countries in tiers that correspond to their efforts to end the practice.

When the IOM approached him, Hadjor put together a list of 13 villages in his region where child trafficking was taking place, and held community meetings to discuss ways to reintegrate boys who had been working in the fishing industry. Over the past year, 228 children have been rescued from forced labor on Lake Volta, and Hadjor has helped many of them enroll in school and reunite with their families.

"The problem is being overcome. When I have people approach me, I advise them that they should remove their children [from slavery], and they've been doing it," he said.

Among nations in sub-Saharan Africa, Ghana was the only one to be listed as a "Tier One" nation for its strong efforts to prevent child trafficking. The report found that Ghana has excelled at protecting victims of trafficking and reintegrating them into their communities, although it still urged the Ghanaian government to pass anti-trafficking legislation.

Three nations in sub-Saharan Africa -- Equatorial Guinea, Sierra Leone, and Sudan -- received a "Tier Three" or least favorable ranking in the report for failing to make reasonable attempts to end the exploitation of minors. In Equatorial Guinea, the report found, the government has not used the resources from its petroleum industry to do anything to alleviate the situation. In Sierra Leone, it said, the government recognizes that trafficking is a problem, but has not made substantial efforts to prevent it.

The report was particularly critical of Sudan, noting, "Government officials deny the existence of trafficking in Sudan." It is estimated that 17,500 people have been abducted in Sudan since 1980.

Nations ranked as Tier Three face the possibility of losing U.S. aid if they do not make an effort to combat human trafficking. Globally, 10 countries were included on the Tier Three list.

The report indicated that child trafficking is a particularly challenging problem in Africa because of the practice of "fostering" or "placement" of children. Under this traditional system, children are sent to live with relatives or other trusted individuals, and are given schooling or learn a trade. Yet "in all too many cases, the child is trafficked into a situation of forced domestic servitude, street vending, or sexual exploitation," the authors wrote.

In Ghana's Bakpa Traditional Area, where Chief Hadjor has helped reunite children with their families, trafficking has been driven by economic need. Communities downstream from Lake Volta that once supported themselves through farming and fishing have been left destitute by the construction of two dams on the Volta River, and many families that sent their children to work on the lake did so because they could no longer support them.

Hadjor sees another underlying cause of child trafficking: polygamy. Men who marry several wives and have large families often find themselves unable to support their children, he said.

"I tell [villagers] that if you want a wife, take only one," he said.

(The Washington File is a product of the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State. Web site: <http://usinfo.state.gov>)

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 AllAfrica, Inc.

259 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English -- English

June 15, 2004 Tuesday

Japan among seven Asian nations in US human trafficking watchlist

SECTION: Domestic, non-Washington, General News

LENGTH: 547 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 15

Japan is among seven Asian nations placed in a US "watch list" of countries involved in human trafficking, officials said.

A key destination for women and children trafficked for forced labor and sexual exploitation, Japan was relegated to a so-called Tier 2 watch list by the US State Department in its 2003 "Trafficking in Persons" report released on Monday.

In the previous report, Japan was on Tier 2 but was relegated to a special watch list with a warning that it could be downgraded further to Tier 3, of countries not making significant efforts to combat human trafficking.

Nations deemed to be complying with US and international efforts to fight trafficking are placed in "Tier 1," while those making "significant efforts" are placed in "Tier 2."

For the first time in its four-year history, the report created a Tier 2 watch list for countries that are not yet in compliance with US legal standards and may be downgraded, but have promised to make or are in the process of making significant efforts to meet the requirements, officials said.

Aside from Japan, Asian nations on the watch list were India, Laos, Pakistan, the Philippines, Thailand and Vietnam.

Tier 2 Asian nations comprised Afghanistan, Cambodia, China, Indonesia, Malaysia, Nepal, Singapore and Sri Lanka.

Hong Kong, South Korea and Taiwan are on Tier 1 while Tier 3 consists of Myanmar, Bangladesh and North Korea.

"Japan does not comply with the minimum standards," John Miller, director of the State Department's office to monitor and combat trafficking in persons, told a media briefing.

"We believe that there has been a tremendous gap in Japan that has a huge problem with slavery -- particularly sex slavery -- a tremendous gap between the size of the problem and the resources and efforts devoted to addressing the problem," he said.

Japan's trafficking problem is "large," the report said, adding that organized crime groups that operate internationally, like the Yakuza, are involved.

"The Japanese government must begin to fully employ its resources to address this serious human rights crime within its borders," the report said.

Last year, Japan's National Police Agency arrested 41 people for trafficking-related offenses, eight of whom were traffickers.

Human trafficking victims around the globe are women and girls, as young as six years old, forced into commercial sexual exploitation, men trafficked into forced labor and children forced to become child soldiers.

The report estimated up to 800,000 cases each year of people illegally transported across international frontiers.

It cited one documented example: Khan, an 11-year-old girl living in the hills of Laos, taken by traffickers in Southeast Asia to an embroidery factory in a large city.

She and dozens of other children were made to work 14 hours a day for food and clothing, but for no wages.

When Khan protested this, she was beaten. When she protested again, she was stuffed into a closet where the factory owner's son poured industrial chemicals over her and disfigured her, the report said.

"The trade in people is a major source of revenue, in the billions, for organized crime, along with the drug trade and the arms trade," Miller said.

pp/fgf

US-trafficking-Asia-Japan

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 Agence France Presse

260 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English -- English

June 15, 2004 Tuesday

Japan vows to fight human trafficking after damning US report

SECTION: International NewsLENGTH: 264 wordsDATELINE: TOKYO, June 15

Japan vowed Tuesday to step up efforts to fight human trafficking after being put on a "watch list" of nations involved in the problem by its closest ally, the United States.

"We want to strengthen measures in our country where there are inadequacies," top government spokesman Chief Cabinet Secretary Hiroyuki Hosoda told reporters.

His comments came after the release of the US State Department "Trafficking in Persons" report for 2003 which slammed Japan for being lax in cracking down on human trafficking, often for sexual enslavement.

"Eliminating human rights violations is an urgent duty and it is necessary to form a body linking up the related agencies to take appropriate measures," Hosoda said.

In the report, Japan was relegated to a watch list of so-called "Tier 2" nations that are not in compliance with US laws and may be downgraded to "Tier 3" despite promises to make further efforts to fight the problem.

"Japan does not comply with the minimum standards," John Miller, director of the State Department's office to monitor and combat trafficking in persons, told a media briefing in Washington.

Japan's trafficking problem is "large," the report said, adding that organized crime groups that operate internationally, like the yakuza, are involved.

Aside from Japan, Asian nations on the watch list were India, Laos, Pakistan, the Philippines, Thailand and Vietnam.

Last year, Japan's National Police Agency arrested 41 people for trafficking-related offenses, eight of whom were traffickers.

bur-rn/ja/dk

US-trafficking-Asia-Japan-reax

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2004LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

261 of 359 DOCUMENTS

June 15, 2004

LITHUANIA REMAINS SOURCE, TRANSIT COUNTRY FOR HUMAN TRAFFICKING -- REPORT BY US DEPARTMENT OF STATE

LENGTH: 459 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON/VILNIUS, Jun 15

Lithuania remains a source and transit country for trafficking in persons, a report by the U.S. Department of State says.

According to the report, arranged by the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons of the Department of State, Lithuania is rated in Tier 1 together with Austria, 13 European Union states, Macedonia, Morocco, Ghana, Taiwan, Canada, Hong Kong, New Zealand, South Korea, Colombia, Norway.

According to the study, Lithuania is a source and transit country for women and children trafficked to Germany, Spain, Denmark, Norway, The Netherlands, the United Kingdom, France, and Poland for the purpose of sexual exploitation. Women are trafficked for sexual exploitation into and through Lithuania from countries such as Ukraine, Russia (Kaliningrad), and Belarus, and within Lithuania.

The report suggests that Lithuania fully complies with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. The Lithuanian government demonstrated a strong commitment through increased funding for anti-trafficking efforts and sustained law enforcement activities.

According to the study, to further strengthen anti-trafficking efforts, the government should establish formal screening and referral mechanisms to ensure that victims receive adequate assistance services, and ensure that police and social workers remain vigilant in identifying and addressing the needs of trafficked individuals as victims.

The report stresses that the new Lithuanian criminal code that came into effect in May 2003 includes eight articles that address trafficking with sufficiently severe penalties. Each of the 10 counties in Lithuania assigned a police officer to coordinate trafficking issues. During the reporting period of 2003-2004, Lithuanian authorities initiated 15 new criminal investigations and convicted a total of 13 traffickers as compared to eight in 2002.

Trafficking sentences ranged from fines to 14 years' imprisonment, with an average sentence of two to three years' imprisonment.

According to the report, while there was no official evidence of government involvement in or tolerance of trafficking in persons, some individual police officers may condone it. Lithuanian law enforcement officials continued to cooperate with other governments on trafficking investigations and participated in over 25 joint investigations in 2003.

The report also describes in detail the activity of government agencies and NGOs in the fields of social, psychological, and legal assistance to trafficking victims.

Latvia is rated in Tier 2. The report says international groups of human traffickers operate in the country. Estonia is rated in the Tier 2 "Watch List" and described also as a sex tourism country.

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2004

LANGUAGE: English

PUB-TYPE: News

Copyright 2004 Baltic News Service

262 of 359 DOCUMENTS

June 15, 2004

LITHUANIA REMAINS SOURCE, TRANSIT COUNTRY FOR HUMAN TRAFFICKING -- REPORT BY US DEPARTMENT OF STATE

LENGTH: 459 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON/VILNIUS, Jun 15

Lithuania remains a source and transit country for trafficking in persons, a report by the U.S. Department of State says.

According to the report, arranged by the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons of the Department of State, Lithuania is rated in Tier 1 together with Austria, 13 European Union states, Macedonia, Morocco, Ghana, Taiwan, Canada, Hong Kong, New Zealand, South Korea, Colombia, Norway.

According to the study, Lithuania is a source and transit country for women and children trafficked to Germany, Spain, Denmark, Norway, The Netherlands, the United Kingdom, France, and Poland for the purpose of sexual exploitation. Women are trafficked for sexual exploitation into and through Lithuania from countries such as Ukraine, Russia (Kaliningrad), and Belarus, and within Lithuania.

The report suggests that Lithuania fully complies with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. The Lithuanian government demonstrated a strong commitment through increased funding for anti-trafficking efforts and sustained law enforcement activities.

According to the study, to further strengthen anti-trafficking efforts, the government should establish formal screening and referral mechanisms to ensure that victims receive adequate assistance services, and ensure that police and social workers remain vigilant in identifying and addressing the needs of trafficked individuals as victims.

The report stresses that the new Lithuanian criminal code that came into effect in May 2003 includes eight articles that address trafficking with sufficiently severe penalties. Each of the 10 counties in Lithuania assigned a police officer to coordinate trafficking issues. During the reporting period of 2003-2004, Lithuanian authorities initiated 15 new criminal investigations and convicted a total of 13 traffickers as compared to eight in 2002.

Trafficking sentences ranged from fines to 14 years' imprisonment, with an average sentence of two to three years' imprisonment.

According to the report, while there was no official evidence of government involvement in or tolerance of trafficking in persons, some individual police officers may condone it. Lithuanian law enforcement officials continued to cooperate with other governments on trafficking investigations and participated in over 25 joint investigations in 2003.

The report also describes in detail the activity of government agencies and NGOs in the fields of social, psychological, and legal assistance to trafficking victims.

Latvia is rated in Tier 2. The report says international groups of human traffickers operate in the country. Estonia is rated in the Tier 2 "Watch List" and described also as a sex tourism country.

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2004

LANGUAGE: English

PUB-TYPE: News

Copyright 2004 Baltic News Service

263 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

June 15, 2004, Tuesday

TAIWAN DOING WELL IN FIGHT AGAINST HUMAN TRAFFICKING: U.S STATE DEPT

BYLINE: By Jay Chen and Deborah Kuo

LENGTH: 346 words

DATELINE: Washington, June 14

The U.S. government says that Taiwan is complying with U.S. and international efforts to fight human trafficking, sources from the Department of State reported Monday.

In its just-published annual report on global human trafficking, the State Department placed Taiwan among nations "deemed to be complying with U.S. and international efforts to fight trafficking, " a group labeled as "Tier 1."

The report praises the Taiwan authorities for having paid close attention to the human trafficking issue. In addition to strengthening law enforcement to crack down on trafficking, the Taiwan authorities have also collaborated with NGO groups in efforts to stem such crimes from reoccurring, the report says.

The report also infers that some Taiwanese women had been forced to engage in the sex trade in Japan, and many mainland Chinese women were conned into coming to Taiwan under the guise of employment but ended up in underground brothels. The report adds that the situation pertaining to Vietnamese women being tricked into coming to Taiwan has also become increasingly serious.

Countries that have made "significant efforts" are placed in "Tier 2."

For the first time in its four-year history, the 2004 report created a "Tier 2 watchlist" for countries that are not yet in compliance with U.S. legal standards and may be downgraded, but have promised to make or are in the process of making significant efforts to meet the requirements, officials from the State Department said.

By far the largest number of the 140 nations surveyed for the study were placed on the watchlist, including longstanding U.S. ally Japan as well as Greece, Turkey, India and Thailand.

Ten nations, including Cuba, Myanmar, North Korea and Sudan, were cited by the report as being in the "Tier 3" group for not having done enough to combat trafficking and will be subjected to sanctions unless they "demonstrably improve their records by October, " the State Department said.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 Central News Agency

264 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

June 15, 2004 Tuesday4,000 Colombian women trafficked to Japan: ambassador*SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 130 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 15

Colombia's Ambassador to Japan Francisco Sierra said Monday that 4,000 women from his country have been trafficked to Japan for sexual exploitation and other purposes, urging the Japanese government to tackle the problem.

Sierra, who also serves as ambassador to several other Asian countries, made the remark when speaking to a group of reporters.

The envoy attended a news conference held by the U.S. State Department on the release of its 2004 Trafficking in Persons Annual Report, which put Japan on a special watch list of countries on the verge of falling into the worst category.

Sierra cited an example in which one person trafficked 400 Colombian women to Japan. He also said part of the problem is that Japanese people are fond of Colombian women.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2004LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 Kyodo News Service

265 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Jiji Press Ticker Service

June 15, 2004, Tuesday

U.S. Places Japan on Human Trafficking Watch List

LENGTH: 274 words

DATELINE: Washington, June 14

The United States has placed Japan on a special watch list of countries to be scrutinized for efforts to improve its human trafficking records, a Department of State report showed Monday.

Japan "does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking," the department said in its "Trafficking in Persons" report for 2004.

The report classifies countries into three groups according to measures they have taken to prevent human trafficking.

The lowest-ranking Tier 3 lists 10 countries, such as North Korea, Myanmar and Cuba, that face sanctions if they fail to take measures to improve the situation in three months.

In the previous year's report, Japan was among Tier 2 countries. But this year, Japan was placed on a newly created Tier 2 Watch List of countries to receive special scrutiny during the following year.

The countries on the list, which also includes Russia, Mexico and Thailand, are on the verge of falling into the Tier 3 category unless they take additional action within one year.

On Japan, the report noted international human trafficking practices involving "yakuza" organized crime groups. "Japan is a destination country for Asian, Latin American and Eastern European women and children trafficked for the purpose of forced labor and sexual exploitation," it said.

Japan is making "significant efforts" to fully comply with the minimum standards, but it "could do more to protect its thousands of victims of sexual slavery," the report said.

Many other industrial nations, such as Britain, Germany and France, are in the Tier 1 category, along with South Korea and Taiwan.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 Jiji Press Ltd.

266 of 359 DOCUMENTS

PR Newswire

June 15, 2004 Tuesday

Twenty Four Children Rescued From Sex Slavery in the Dominican Republic, Five Perpetrators Jailed

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 435 wordsDATELINE: ARLINGTON, Va. June 15

Yesterday officers from the Dominican Republic National Police led a raid that resulted in the rescue of 24 children who were being sold for commercial sexual exploitation. The youngest victim rescued is believed to be seven years old. In addition, five perpetrators were arrested for trafficking related offenses. The lead officer on the raid, Frank F. Duran Mejia, conducted the operation acting on a tip from investigators at International Justice Mission, a Washington, DC-based human rights organization that investigates cases of sex trafficking and exploitation, and rescues victims of oppression around the world.

"The work in this case by the Dominican Republic National Police and Deputy Attorney General Eliza Sanchez was exemplary," said Sharon Cohn, vice president of interventions for IJM. "They acted swiftly on behalf of these children to rescue them from a horrendous situation. This is going to send a strong message to people in the Dominican Republic who are exploiting children."

The Dominican Republic was listed on the Tier 2 watch list in the U.S. State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report released yesterday. This categorization means the country is under special scrutiny with regard to its efforts to stop trafficking, and is in danger of being dropped to Tier 3, which could result in U.S. government sanctions.

Investigators in yesterday's case reported that the perpetrators had been preying on orphaned children on the beach and other vulnerable children, offering them to tourists for sex. In undercover investigations one of the perpetrators repeatedly bragged about his ability to provide very young children to customers for the purpose of rape and sexual exploitation.

Alba Beard Marcos is the prosecutor who will prepare the case for trial. The perpetrators are being held in a Santo Domingo jail awaiting trial.

About International Justice Mission

International Justice Mission is a human rights organization that rescues victims of violence, sexual exploitation, slavery and oppression. A multi-national team of law enforcement professionals and a highly qualified legal staff conduct criminal investigations and collect evidence to rescue victims and bring perpetrators to justice. The work of IJM has been featured on Dateline NBC, in Forbes, New York Times Magazine, The Wall Street Journal and other media outlets. IJM was founded by Gary Haugen who was the Officer in Charge of the U.N. investigation into the Rwanda genocide.

SOURCE International Justice Mission

CONTACT: Penny Hunter of International Justice Mission, Cell: +1-571-215-5158, or hunterpg@msn.com

URL: <http://www.prnewswire.com>

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DISTRIBUTION: TO FOREIGN AND NATIONAL EDITORS

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2004 PR Newswire Association, Inc.

267 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

June 15, 2004

U.S. Combats Human Trafficking on Many Fronts; State Dept. issues overview of U.S. action against trafficking

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 1062 words

The U.S. State Department issued a fact sheet May 24 outlining the range of activities that U.S. government agencies are conducting to combat human trafficking in this country and abroad.

Following is the text of the fact sheet:

(begin fact sheet)

U.S. State Department

Facts About Human Trafficking

Bureau of Public Affairs

Washington, DC

May 24, 2004

What is human trafficking?

Trafficking in persons is modern-day slavery, involving victims who are forced, defrauded or coerced into labor or sexual exploitation. Annually, about 600,000 to 800,000 people -- mostly women and children -- are trafficked across national borders which does not count millions trafficked within their own countries.

People are snared into trafficking by many means. In some cases, physical force is used. In other cases, false promises are made regarding job opportunities or marriages in foreign countries to entrap victims.

What impact does human trafficking have on the world?

Human trafficking is a multi-dimensional threat: it deprives people of their human rights and freedoms, it is a global health risk, and it fuels the growth of organized crime.

Human trafficking has a devastating impact on individual victims, who often suffer physical and emotional abuse, rape, threats against self and family, passport theft, and even death. But the impact of human trafficking goes beyond individual victims; it undermines the safety and security of all nations it touches.

What is the United States doing to stop trafficking?

Trafficking impacts many nations, including the United States. That's why the U.S. Government has taken a number of serious and significant actions to combat trafficking occurring at home. A few examples of American efforts include:

-- Congress passed legislation so Americans who sexually prey on children abroad can be prosecuted and sentenced to as many as 30 years in prison.

-- The Department of Justice has focused on increasing the number of trafficking victims rescued and the number of prosecutions and convictions of traffickers.

-- The Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) is certifying trafficking victims so they may qualify for the same assistance available to refugees. HHS is also running a major public awareness campaign to alert victims in the U.S. that help is available through the hotline number 888.3737.888.

-- The Department of Defense has implemented a zero-tolerance stand against any actions by Defense personnel that contribute to human trafficking and is instituting a service-wide mandatory training program.

-- The Departments of Labor and Homeland Security, USAID, and other government agencies are executing action plans to combat human trafficking.

What is the U.S. doing to help other countries?

Because human trafficking is transnational in nature, partnerships between countries are critical to win the fight against modern-day slavery. The U.S. is reaching out to other countries in a number of important ways:

-- In a speech to the United Nations General Assembly, President Bush raised the issue of human trafficking and asked leaders of the world to work together to end it.

-- The State Department is working extensively with governments on action plans for prevention, protection of victims, and prosecution.

-- Congress last year strengthened anti-trafficking legislation and provided more than $70 million in funding worldwide for efforts to end slavery. The U.S. is providing money around the world for:

-- Rehabilitation and work training centers for victims

-- Special housing shelters for victims

-- Law enforcement training and legal reform assistance

-- Information and awareness campaigns

-- Voluntary repatriation for displaced victims

-- Training for immigration officials, medical personnel and social workers

-- Combating sex tourism

-- Rescuing victims from slave-like situations

What needs to be done?

When dealing with an issue of this importance and urgency, there is much to be done. The U.S. is asking governments to immediately take action to step up their anti-trafficking efforts:

-- There is a critical need for increased rescues of trafficking victims and prosecutions of traffickers.

-- People freed from slavery must be treated as victims of crime, not criminals.

-- The demand for modern-day slaves must be stopped. This is not a victimless or harmless crime, and the public should be informed of the risks involved with it.

What are the Trafficking Victims Protection Act and the Trafficking in Persons Report?

Congress passed the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) in 2000 and strengthened it in 2003. This law provides tools for the U.S. to combat trafficking in persons, both domestically and abroad.

One of the key components of the law is the creation of the Trafficking in Persons Report. The Department of State produces this annual report assessing government response in each country with a significant number of victims of severe forms of trafficking in persons. Countries in the annual report are rated in tiers, based on government efforts to combat trafficking.

What do the tiers of the Trafficking in Persons Report mean?

-- Tier 1: Countries that fully comply with the act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking.

-- Tier 2: Countries that do not fully comply with the minimum standards but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance.

-- Tier 2 Watch List: Countries on Tier 2 requiring special scrutiny because of a high or significantly increasing number of victims; failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking in persons; or an assessment as Tier 2 based on commitments to take action over the next year.

-- Tier 3: Countries that neither satisfy the minimum standards nor demonstrate a significant effort to come into compliance. Countries in this tier are subject to potential non-humanitarian and non-trade sanctions.

For more information, please log on to the Web site of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons at <http://www.state.gov/g/tip>.

(end fact sheet)

(Distributed by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

268 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

June 15, 2004

Fact Sheet: U.S. Combats Human Trafficking on Many Fronts; State Dept. issues overview of U.S. action against trafficking

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 1062 words

The U.S. State Department issued a fact sheet May 24 outlining the range of activities that U.S. government agencies are conducting to combat human trafficking domestically and abroad.

Following is the text of the fact sheet:

(begin fact sheet)

U.S. State Department

Bureau of Public Affairs

Washington, DC

May 24, 2004

FACTS ABOUT HUMAN TRAFFICKING

What is human trafficking?

Trafficking in persons is modern-day slavery, involving victims who are forced, defrauded or coerced into labor or sexual exploitation. Annually, about 600,000 to 800,000 people -- mostly women and children -- are trafficked across national borders which does not count millions trafficked within their own countries.

People are snared into trafficking by many means. In some cases, physical force is used. In other cases, false promises are made regarding job opportunities or marriages in foreign countries to entrap victims.

What impact does human trafficking have on the world?

Human trafficking is a multi-dimensional threat: it deprives people of their human rights and freedoms, it is a global health risk, and it fuels the growth of organized crime.

Human trafficking has a devastating impact on individual victims, who often suffer physical and emotional abuse, rape, threats against self and family, passport theft, and even death. But the impact of human trafficking goes beyond individual victims; it undermines the safety and security of all nations it touches.

What is the United States doing to stop trafficking?

Trafficking impacts many nations, including the United States. That's why the U.S. Government has taken a number of serious and significant actions to combat trafficking occurring at home. A few examples of American efforts include:

-- Congress passed legislation so Americans who sexually prey on children abroad can be prosecuted and sentenced to as many as 30 years in prison.

-- The Department of Justice has focused on increasing the number of trafficking victims rescued and the number of prosecutions and convictions of traffickers.

-- The Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) is certifying trafficking victims so they may qualify for the same assistance available to refugees. HHS is also running a major public awareness campaign to alert victims in the U.S. that help is available through the hotline number 888.3737.888.

-- The Department of Defense has implemented a zero-tolerance stand against any actions by Defense personnel that contribute to human trafficking and is instituting a service-wide mandatory training program.

-- The Departments of Labor and Homeland Security, USAID, and other government agencies are executing action plans to combat human trafficking.

What is the U.S. doing to help other countries?

Because human trafficking is transnational in nature, partnerships between countries are critical to win the fight against modern-day slavery. The U.S. is reaching out to other countries in a number of important ways:

-- In a speech to the United Nations General Assembly, President Bush raised the issue of human trafficking and asked leaders of the world to work together to end it.

-- The State Department is working extensively with governments on action plans for prevention, protection of victims, and prosecution.

-- Congress last year strengthened anti-trafficking legislation and provided more than $70 million in funding worldwide for efforts to end slavery. The U.S. is providing money around the world for:

-- Rehabilitation and work training centers for victims

-- Special housing shelters for victims

-- Law enforcement training and legal reform assistance

-- Information and awareness campaigns

-- Voluntary repatriation for displaced victims

-- Training for immigration officials, medical personnel and social workers

-- Combating sex tourism

-- Rescuing victims from slave-like situations

What needs to be done?

When dealing with an issue of this importance and urgency, there is much to be done. The U.S. is asking governments to immediately take action to step up their anti-trafficking efforts:

-- There is a critical need for increased rescues of trafficking victims and prosecutions of traffickers.

-- People freed from slavery must be treated as victims of crime, not criminals.

-- The demand for modern-day slaves must be stopped. This is not a victimless or harmless crime, and the public should be informed of the risks involved with it.

What are the Trafficking Victims Protection Act and the Trafficking in Persons Report?

Congress passed the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) in 2000 and strengthened it in 2003. This law provides tools for the U.S. to combat trafficking in persons, both domestically and abroad.

One of the key components of the law is the creation of the Trafficking in Persons Report. The Department of State produces this annual report assessing government response in each country with a significant number of victims of severe forms of trafficking in persons. Countries in the annual report are rated in tiers, based on government efforts to combat trafficking.

What do the tiers of the Trafficking in Persons Report mean?

-- Tier 1: Countries that fully comply with the act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking.

-- Tier 2: Countries that do not fully comply with the minimum standards but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance.

-- Tier 2 Watch List: Countries on Tier 2 requiring special scrutiny because of a high or significantly increasing number of victims; failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking in persons; or an assessment as Tier 2 based on commitments to take action over the next year.

-- Tier 3: Countries that neither satisfy the minimum standards nor demonstrate a significant effort to come into compliance. Countries in this tier are subject to potential non-humanitarian and non-trade sanctions.

For more information, please log on to the Web site of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons at <http://www.state.gov/g/tip>.

(end fact sheet)

(Distributed by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

269 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

June 15, 2004

Colombian Hailed as Hero in Fight Against Trafficking in Persons; Ambassador Sierra calls for greater international involvement

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 877 words

By Brian Kaper

Washington File Staff Writer

Washington -- On any given day, two or three Colombian women fall victim to the deceit and lies of traffickers and begin a journey that has lured an estimated 35,000 to 50,000 Colombian women to leave home for a better life -- only to disappear into the dark underworld of sex slavery.

Francisco Sierra, Colombia's ambassador to Japan, has made it his personal goal to stop this trafficking in persons that has taken so many women into forced prostitution. For his efforts, Sierra was recognized by Secretary of State Colin Powell on June 14 as one of six heroes in the fight against an illicit industry that preys upon society's most vulnerable members.

Sierra said the women are told they will find a better life by working in other countries such as Holland, Japan, and Spain, but they most often find themselves trapped into working in brothels to pay off their so-called "transportation" fees; such fees may total as much as $50,000 to $80,000. Sierra said that the women are expected to pay their captors roughly $2,000 every ten days or they will be severely punished.

"The reason is [the women] are from a low-income sector of the population with a lack of education and opportunities," Sierra said through an interpreter, when asked why so many women are likely to be exploited in their attempts to go abroad to find work. They are tempted by false promises and become victims of an elaborate network of traffickers.

Thanks in large part to the efforts of Sierra and others who are working hard to save Colombian women from traffickers, Colombia was rated as a Tier 1 country in the 2004 Trafficking in Persons Report issued by the U.S. Department of State. This rating signifies that the Colombian government fully complies with the minimum standards set by the United States government in the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2003.

In recent years, Sierra explained, a significant number of the trafficked women have found themselves ensnared in Japan's lucrative sex industry. "The girls arrive in Japan and pass through the immigration authorities," Sierra said. "Then the Yakuza, the Japanese mafia, take their passports and other documents. Also, they take their tickets."

Without any form of documentation or means of getting home, the women are forced to work for their captors in brothels -- essentially to buy back their own freedom, according to Sierra. And most are prevented from seeking help because they fear for their own safety as well as the safety of their family members in Colombia, whom the women believe the traffickers can harm.

"For that reason, sometimes the women don't even dare to escape. Most of the women are not willing to make depositions or statements or declarations to the authorities," Sierra said.

In recent months, he observed, there has been progress in preventing the trafficking of Colombian women to Japan. The breakthrough came with the arrest of Koichi "Sony" Hagiwara, a notorious trafficker, who helped supply Japan's brothels, and that arrest has encouraged more women to come forward and seek assistance to escape the sex industry.

However, Sierra added, the victims of trafficking are also the primary victims of the legal system in Japan, due to Japan's lack of anti-trafficking laws. "In Japan, currently, the victims of trafficking in persons are [treated as] the culprits... and are the ones prosecuted because of the violations of the immigration law -- they don't have work visas," he said.

He noted that these women are often arrested for prostitution, despite the fact that they were forced to engage in it. The arrests serve merely to victimize the women even further, he pointed out.

"Meanwhile, those really responsible -- the brokers and traffickers -- are totally free to [pursue] their activities," said the ambassador. The traffickers can only be charged for violating various immigration laws, in the absence of anti-trafficking legislation.

"Colombia is making great efforts to counter trafficking in persons, but Japan specifically has to adopt a law to punish the traffickers," Sierra argued.

He said he is hopeful that the plight of his country's citizens will be more widely recognized by the international community, which would help garner aid and support in combating the trafficking industry.

Sierra's call for international action was echoed by Ambassador John Miller, director of the State Department's office to monitor and combat trafficking in persons.

At the June 14 launch of the 2004 Trafficking in Persons Report, Miller said: "In the last month or two, the government of Japan, at the direction of the prime minister, has started to take an enormous number of steps that we hope will lead to more prosecutions, more investigations, more convictions, more pursuit of organized crime figures and more help for victims. The prime minister has just formed a new ministerial task force that will be chaired by one of the [Japanese cabinet] secretaries, and they are already at work with the parliament on a new comprehensive anti-trafficking law."

(The Washington File is a product of the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

270 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

June 15, 2004

Child Trafficking a Major Problem in Africa, Report Finds; Ghanaian chief describes efforts to combat child labor

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 707 words

By Tara Boyle

Washington File Staff Writer

Washington -- For the scores of boys who work in the fishing industry on Ghana's Lake Volta, life is more than simply grueling and monotonous -- it is slavery, with no schools, no medical care, and no hope.

The boys, some as young as six years old, have been sold by their families to spend their days rowing boats across the lake and pulling nets laden with fish from the water.

More than a year ago, Togbega Hadjor, paramount chief of Ghana's Bakpa Traditional Area, where child trafficking has been common, committed himself to ending this exploitation of children when the International Organization for Migration (IOM) asked for his help in combating child slavery in the Lake Volta region.

Hadjor was among several heroes in the fight against human trafficking who were honored in Washington June 14 when the U.S. Department of State released its annual Trafficking in Persons Report. The report evaluated efforts by 140 countries around the world to combat human trafficking, and ranked countries in tiers that correspond to their efforts to end the practice.

When the IOM approached him, Hadjor put together a list of 13 villages in his region where child trafficking was taking place, and held community meetings to discuss ways to reintegrate boys who had been working in the fishing industry. Over the past year, 228 children have been rescued from forced labor on Lake Volta, and Hadjor has helped many of them enroll in school and reunite with their families.

"The problem is being overcome. When I have people approach me, I advise them that they should remove their children [from slavery], and they've been doing it," he said.

Among nations in sub-Saharan Africa, Ghana was the only one to be listed as a "Tier One" nation for its strong efforts to prevent child trafficking. The report found that Ghana has excelled at protecting victims of trafficking and reintegrating them into their communities, although it still urged the Ghanaian government to pass anti-trafficking legislation.

Three nations in sub-Saharan Africa -- Equatorial Guinea, Sierra Leone, and Sudan -- received a "Tier Three" or least favorable ranking in the report for failing to make reasonable attempts to end the exploitation of minors. In Equatorial Guinea, the report found, the government has not used the resources from its petroleum industry to do anything to alleviate the situation. In Sierra Leone, it said, the government recognizes that trafficking is a problem, but has not made substantial efforts to prevent it.

The report was particularly critical of Sudan, noting, "Government officials deny the existence of trafficking in Sudan." It is estimated that 17,500 people have been abducted in Sudan since 1980.

Nations ranked as Tier Three face the possibility of losing U.S. aid if they do not make an effort to combat human trafficking. Globally, 10 countries were included on the Tier Three list.

The report indicated that child trafficking is a particularly challenging problem in Africa because of the practice of "fostering" or "placement" of children. Under this traditional system, children are sent to live with relatives or other trusted individuals, and are given schooling or learn a trade. Yet "in all too many cases, the child is trafficked into a situation of forced domestic servitude, street vending, or sexual exploitation," the authors wrote.

In Ghana's Bakpa Traditional Area, where Chief Hadjor has helped reunite children with their families, trafficking has been driven by economic need. Communities downstream from Lake Volta that once supported themselves through farming and fishing have been left destitute by the construction of two dams on the Volta River, and many families that sent their children to work on the lake did so because they could no longer support them.

Hadjor sees another underlying cause of child trafficking: polygamy. Men who marry several wives and have large families often find themselves unable to support their children, he said.

"I tell [villagers] that if you want a wife, take only one," he said.

(The Washington File is a product of the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

271 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

June 14, 2004 Monday

Japan put on U.S. human-trafficking watch list

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 753 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 14

The United States on Monday downgraded its assessment of Japanese efforts to fight human trafficking, putting Japan on a special watch list of countries that are on the verge of falling into the worst category.

In its annual Trafficking in Persons Report, the U.S. State Department urged Japan to fully employ its resources and boost its efforts to combat human trafficking, including increased investigations, prosecutions and convictions of trafficking crimes and better assistance for victims.

'Japan is a destination country for Asian, Latin American and Eastern European women and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labor and sexual exploitation,' the report said. 'Japan's trafficking problem is large and Japanese organized crime groups that operate internationally are involved.'

The department put Japan, which was designated as a Tier 2 country in last year's report, on the newly created Tier 2 Watch List, citing a lack of a comprehensive law against human trafficking and victim protection efforts.

John Miller, director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, said at a news conference, 'We believe that there has been a tremendous gap in Japan that has a huge problem with slavery, particularly sex slavery, a tremendous gap between the size of the problem and the resources and efforts devoted to addressing the problem.'

North Korea, the report said, operates forced-labor prison camps to punish criminals and repatriated North Koreans. Thousands of North Korean men, women and children are forced to work and often perish under conditions of slavery.

'The government of North Korea does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making efforts to do so. The government does not recognize trafficking as a problem and imposes slave-like labor conditions on its prisoners,' the report said.

The U.S. Trafficking Victims Protection Act, enacted in October 2000, requires the department to submit an annual report to Congress on the status of severe forms of human trafficking.

Under the act, the department classifies other countries into three tiers. This year's report covers 131 nations.

The worst Tier 3 represents a group of countries that do not fully comply with the act's minimum standards and are making insignificant efforts to come into compliance.

Tier 3 countries could be subject to cutoffs in nonhumanitarian and nontrade-related U.S. aid, such as military, educational and cultural assistance, unless they improve their records in the coming months.

Tier 2 countries do not fully comply but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance, while Tier 1 nations are in full compliance with the act's minimum standards.

This year, the department introduced the Tier 2 Watch List category for countries that are in the danger of falling into the Tier 3 category in next year's report.

In this year's report, the department singled out 10 countries, including North Korea and Myanmar, as Tier 3 nations, down from 15 in last year's report.

The other Tier 3 countries in this year's report are Bangladesh, Cuba, Ecuador, Equatorial Guinea, Guyana, Sierra Leone, Sudan and Venezuela.

The department put a total of 42 countries on the newly created Tier 2 Watch List, including Georgia, India, Laos, Mexico, the Philippines and Russia, in addition to Japan.

The Japanese government, which lacks a comprehensive law against human trafficking, currently employs the Penal Code and a variety of labor, immigration and child-welfare statutes to carry out limited trafficking-related prosecutions, the report said.

'These laws provide for up to 10-year prison terms and steep fines, but actual penalties have been far less severe,' it said.

At the news conference, Miller, who visited Japan in February, also said Japan lacks efforts to protect human-trafficking victims.

'If you look at the victim-protection effort, when the victims number in the thousands, I found only two small shelters in Japan willing to take trafficking victims,' he said. 'I visited them both. They each have eight to 10 beds.'

Miller urged Japan to take a greater leadership in fight against human trafficking as 'one of the leading and wealthiest democracies in the world.'

'If Japan takes the lead and takes the steps that they have indicated that they will take, this will be a big, big step forward,' he said.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 Kyodo News Service

272 of 359 DOCUMENTS

United Press International

June 14, 2004 Monday

U.S. raps allies on human trafficking

LENGTH: 165 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 14 (UPI)

U.S. allies Japan and Pakistan are on a watch list of countries that do not comply with a U.S. human trafficking act, the U.S. State Department said Monday.

In its document, "Trafficking in Persons Report," the department also lists Cuba and North Korea among 10 countries facing sanctions for failing to satisfy minimum standards or attempt to comply with the U.S. Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000.

As many as 800,000 people are trafficked across borders each year, Secretary of State Colin Powell said Monday while releasing the report.

Last year the report identified 15 countries that could face sanctions.

"Trafficking is ... a global security threat because profits from trafficking finance still more crime and violence, including very likely terrorist violence," Powell said.

The State Department is required by law to report each year to Congress on efforts by foreign governments to fight human trafficking. This year's report is the department's fourth.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2004LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 U.P.I.

273 of 359 DOCUMENTS

United Press International

June 14, 2004 Monday

U.S. raps allies on human trafficking

BYLINE: By KRISHNADEV CALAMUR

LENGTH: 883 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 14 (UPI)

Close U.S. allies Japan, Pakistan and Turkey are on a watch list of countries that do not comply with a U.S. human trafficking act, the U.S. State Department said Monday in its annual human trafficking report.

The document, "Trafficking in Persons Report," also lists Cuba and North Korea among 10 countries that face sanctions for their failure to satisfy minimum standards or comply with the U.S. Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000.

The report includes every country where investigators can establish 100 or more victims. Tier 1 countries are those that have victims but are meeting the minimum standards of the act. Tier 2 countries are not meeting the minimum standards but are making significant effort. Tier 3 governments are not making significant effort and could face sanctions. The Tier 2 watch list countries, a new category this year, are in danger of falling to Tier 3.

Twenty-five countries, including Britain, Australia and Canada, fall into Tier 1. Tier 2 countries, 54 in all -- include Afghanistan, Israel and Saudi Arabia.

The Tier 2 watch list has 42 countries, including U.S. allies Japan, Pakistan, India and Turkey.

"Japan does not comply with the minimum standards," said John Miller, the director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. "We believe that there has been a tremendous gap in Japan that has a huge problem with slavery, particularly sex slavery ... between the size of the problem and the resources and efforts devoted to addressing the problem."

Countries on the Tier 2 watch list are expected to have an interim assessment at the beginning of next year.

"It won't be a re-ranking," Miller said. "But we hope to have an assessment so all of us can see what's going on."

The Tier 3 countries are Bangladesh, Burma (now Myanmar), Cuba, Ecuador, Equatorial Guinea, Guyana, North Korea, Sierra Leone, Sudan and Venezuela. Countries listed in Tier 3 could have non-humanitarian and non-trade-related U.S. aid cut off unless they improve their performance or receive a waiver.

Miller noted that in countries such as Myanmar, there had been some progress, but not enough to get them moved off the list.

"Burma has made some progress in the area of sex slavery," Miller said. "But one of our criteria when you're looking at Tier 3 gets to government complicity, and this is something that we hope with regards to forced labor will end with Burma."

Last year the report named 15 countries -- Greece, Turkey, Belize, Bosnia, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Georgia, Haiti, Kazakhstan, Liberia, Myanmar, North Korea, Sudan, Suriname and Uzbekistan -- in Tier 3. The 2002 report had 19 countries that could face sanctions.

"Let me make clear that while Tier 3 under the law brings with it the possibility of losses of certain kinds of U.S. aid, the purpose of this report is not sanctions; it is to get progress," Miller said.

Countries that are in Tier 3 can avoid sanctions by making commitments to take steps over the next year. Miller denied this meant a country could get out of Tier 3 through commitments alone.

"Well, no, I wouldn't say that," he said, "but that is a key factor where there are promises of action and we have hope that the promises will be met in the next several months."

U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell noted the progress being made in fighting human trafficking, but cautioned that an estimated 600,000-800,000 people were trafficked across borders each year. He said human trafficking was linked to international crime syndicates involved in terrorism, drugs, guns and false documents. He also cited its role in the spread of HIV/AIDS.

"Trafficking is also a global security threat because profits from trafficking finance still more crime and violence, including very likely terrorist violence," Powell said.

This year's report mentions 140 countries. Miller pointed out that the United States did not have adequate information on those countries not on the list.

"Let there be no misunderstanding; modern slavery plagues every country in the world, including the United States," he said at the report's release.

Miller acknowledged that the data on slavery was "very inexact," but 80 percent of slave victims were female and 50 percent were children. Sex slavery was the largest category, he said.

As part of global efforts to fight human trafficking, this year 24 countries passed comprehensive anti-trafficking laws. Some 8,000 traffickers were prosecuted and 3,000 were convicted.

Powell, however, called for more international cooperation.

"Many international covenants and national laws condemn and outlaw trafficking, and that's important and that's good," he said. "But agreements and laws have to be honored and enforced fairly and consistently if they're to make any difference."

The United States has committed $50 million to fight trafficking in addition to $70 million already allocated for the past year. Of this money, $10 million comes from the State Department, which is seeking an increase in funding to $17 million in 2005.

The State Department is required by law to turn in a report each year to U.S. Congress on the efforts by foreign governments to fight human trafficking. Thursday's report is the department's fourth.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

274 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Jerusalem Post

June 11, 2004 Friday

Knesset to protect foreign workers

BYLINE: NINA GILBERTSECTION: NEWS; Pg. 5LENGTH: 287 words

A comprehensive bill against human trafficking was advanced in the Knesset for the first time this week with the aim of fighting white slavery and the abuse of foreign workers in Israel.

The legislation would impose a prison sentence of up to 16 years for those convicted of trafficking, buying, selling, holding hostage or forcibly employing humans, including for work in the sex trade. A minimum sentence upon conviction would be four years.

Until now, the law enforcement only operated according to laws in the Penal Code against work in prostitution when combating human trafficking.

The legislation passed a preliminary reading unanimously with the support of the government, although it was initiated by Yahad MK Zehava Gal-On, who heads the Knesset committee of inquiry into women trafficking.

Gal-On said the legislation would give law enforcement authorities the tools to combat the problem and thereby bring about a significant improvement in efforts to combat the phenomenon. The bill also has provisions to aid the victims, including granting them permits to work and stay in the country.

Israel has been put on Tier 2 of the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report. The category includes countries whose governments do not fully comply with minimum standards set by the US, but are making efforts to get into compliance.

Gal-On said the legislation would bring Israel into international compliance. It was drafted in coordination with the Justice and Internal Security ministries. The government intends to combine its own version of the bill with Gal-On's during committee discussions.

Justice Minister Yosef Lapid said the state wants to combat the "painful and worsening" phenomenon of human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: October 4, 2011LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

275 of 359 DOCUMENTS

United Press International

May 26, 2004 Wednesday

Film challenges myths on human trafficking

BYLINE: By REENA VADEHRA

LENGTH: 773 words

In a dirty, village hut somewhere in Southeast Asia, a young girl is sold off by her parents to a trafficker for extra income. The girl ends up in a brothel in a big city, dancing and having sex for tourist dollars.

This has been the traditional image of trafficking of women in Southeast Asia. The issue has often been attributed to bad parenting, a non-caring culture, or to the growth of sex tourism in Asian metropolises. For anthropologist, David A. Feingold, however, this image is far from reality.

In his documentary "Trading Women," Feingold aims to dispel popular beliefs about trafficking of women in Southeast Asia. The film depicts a much more complex problem, that is often overlooked by the media, governments and organizations.

The path from village girl to trafficked woman for sexual purposes varies greatly. Some are kidnapped by traffickers and forced into sexual slavery. Others leave their home in search of greater opportunities or jobs but are coerced into the sex sector along the way. Some even voluntarily enter the trade, often out of desperation and a need for income.

Actress and U.N. Ambassador Angelina Jolie, who narrated the documentary, echoed the film's sentiment. Speaking at the State Department's Open Forum Tuesday, Jolie said, "If we truly want to end the cycle of abuse and exploitation, we must get at the underlying causes."

"Trading Women" sets out to answer one central question. Why has trafficking of women in Thailand shifted from Thai girls to minorities and refugees in the highlands of the country?

The answer is twofold. In Thailand, minorities, such as the Lahu and the Aka, do not have citizenship in the country. Without this right, hill tribes in the country cannot vote, cannot own land, and cannot get an education. Hence, young girls in hill tribes become the most vulnerable commodity for the sex trade.

The destruction of the upland economy, once heavily invested in narcotics, as well as the increase of refugees into northern Thailand are other factors leading to the rise of minority women being trafficked into the sex industry.

In Burma, one of the larger sources of trafficked women, the growth of the sex sector has been attributed to political repression and economic destruction. In a strange move by the military junta, universities, schools, and even kindergartens are closed down for months on end, leaving many children and young adults in search of jobs.

One such student was a 19-year-old girl depicted in the film. Hiding her eyes under a pair of sunglasses, she spoke in broken English about her journey into the sex sector. A former university student, majoring in biology, the Burmese girl told the story of her mother's death and her subsequent hard-reached decision to begin working as a prostitute, ending her virginity. In the last scene of the film, the girl hopefully declares her wish to go back to school to give herself a peace of mind.

The numbers of human trafficking in Asia are unavailable due to the incapability to measure and account for victims. However, the United States government estimates that 800,000 to 900,000 women, men and children are trafficked each year across the world for sexual purposes.

To combat the problem, the United States government has passed the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000. Under this bill, the State Department publishes the "Trafficking in Persons Report" each year, which rates countries according to their efforts in diminishing human trafficking. The third tier, the lowest tier, is rated for a country that has serious human trafficking problems but not does do enough to meet the minimum standards set out by the U.S. government.

If a country should fall into the tier-three category, Congress has the option of imposing sanctions against those countries.

However, Feingold's film criticizes such international responses to human trafficking, claiming that the underlying root of the problem in Southeast Asia is poverty. Sanctions may undermine the economic and social reasons for the growth of the sex sector and create more avenues for women and children to be trafficked.

Human Rights Watch has also criticized the "Trafficking in Persons Report" for inconsistencies and inaccuracy. For example, the organization has pointed out that reasoning is not given as to why a country is moved from one tier to the next.

For Feingold, the true test for successful policy comes not from ratings or punishment.

At the State Department's Open Forum, Feingold said, "At the end of the day, are the Aka girls better off? Has anyone consulted them on the matter?"

LOAD-DATE: May 27, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2004 U.P.I.

276 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Forward

May 7, 2004

U.S. Official Does 'God's Work': Eradicating Slavery

BYLINE: Ori Nir

SECTION: News; Pg. 2

LENGTH: 1457 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Critics think John Miller is a zealot. Supporters view the State Department official as a hero. Both sides agree that he is leading a crusade to abolish slavery worldwide.

Backed by an unlikely coalition of conservative Evangelical Christian and liberal human rights advocates, Miller, who is Jewish, unabashedly has infused religious fervor into his position as the director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. The office follows slavery worldwide, country by country, and issues an annual report that is used as a basis for sanctions if countries do not take actions to combat the enslavement and trafficking of people.

According to State Department estimates, as many as 800,000 to 900,000 people are trafficked annually across international borders worldwide, some for forced labor, some for prostitution. Some are children forced to serve as combatants.

"I really believe that anybody fighting to free victims, to abolish slavery, is doing God's work," said the former Republican congressman from Seattle in an interview in his Washington office, which is not housed in the State Department's main building at Foggy Bottom. Faith-based groups, he said, can play a "key role" in advancing the modern-day cause of abolitionism.

Evangelical Christian groups were the driving force behind the creation of the office. But it was another Jew, conservative scholar and religious-freedom advocate Michael Horowitz, who pushed the coalition of mainly Christian organizations and activists to lobby for the cause. The coalition, Horowitz said, for years has focused on defending the rights of Christian minorities and Western missionaries in developing countries. Six years ago it started fighting slavery around the globe.

In 1998, after reading a New York Times front-page story on the sex trafficking of women from the former Soviet Union in Israel, Horowitz decided to harness his coalition in fighting sex slavery worldwide. "The second I saw the story, I knew what to do," said Horowitz, a senior fellow at the conservative Hudson Institute and a former general counsel for the Office of Management and Budget in the Reagan administration. "It was so powerful to me that Israel was so awful (as a) destination for women, that I immediately brought this to the coalition, and we started drafting legislation."

The chief organization in the coalition is the Wilberforce Forum, a division of the Prison Fellowship, headed by Chuck Colson, the former Nixon White House counsel who spent seven months in prison for his part in the Watergate affair. After his release from prison, Colson founded his group, which operates an Evangelical Christian rehabilitation program for inmates in several states. The Wilberforce Forum, named after 18th century British abolitionist William Wilberforce, strives "to help Christians approach life with a biblical worldview so that they can in turn shape culture from a biblical perspective," according to a mission statement posted on its Web site.

The evangelical activists reached out to the feminist community and found divisions, Horowitz said. "Some agreed with us. Others argued that prostitution was a legitimate career choice and that what these women need are ergonomic mattresses and a minimum wage."

In the Senate, the coalition of extremes found its parallels: conservative Republican Sam Brownback of Kansas and liberal Democrat Paul Wellstone, the late senator from Minnesota. The two senators sponsored the bill that became the Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000.

The law requires that the State Department report on human trafficking in foreign countries, including whether authorities participate in, facilitate or condone trafficking, and what steps governments have taken to prohibit, investigate, prosecute and convict individuals for severe forms of trafficking.

The office's annual report ranks countries involved in trafficking in one of three "tiers." Tier 1 represents those countries in which the government complies with the act's minimum standards. Tier 2 represents those with governments that do not fully comply with the standards but "are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance." Tier 3 is for those countries not making significant efforts to meet minimum standards. Countries in tier 3 lose their non-humanitarian foreign assistance if they remain in that category the following year.

Does the threat of sanctions and humiliation work? "You'd better believe it," replied Miller. Israel, he said, is a good example. The 2002 Report on Trafficking in Persons classified Israel as a tier 3 violator because of the government's nonchalant attitude in the face of a booming sex trade of women from the former Soviet Union, and its indifference to the exploitation of foreign low-skilled workers. Last year's report noted that although "the government of Israel does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking it is making significant efforts to do so."

His first report, Miller said, shamed Israel into action. "No country wants to be seen as supporting slavery," he said, noting that Israel has improved its performance further since the report was issued last June. The government there has passed tighter legislation, is collaborating with human rights groups and is focusing on stricter law enforcement, Miller said.

"That's what I am looking for: Prosecute! Arrest! Convict!," Miller said, raising his voice. "If a country has the will to arrest, prosecute and convict; if the country has the will to set up a referral system for victims - from police to NGOs, that is a lot."

Miller, 65, who says he is "revved up" after traveling overseas and meeting with former slaves, wasn't initially enthusiastic about the job.

In 1992, after eight years in Congress, Miller retired, promising his wife not to leave Washington State for Washington, D.C. again. In his hometown, he served as chairman of the Seattle-based Discovery Institute, a think tank that focuses on international affairs, trade, defense and science. He also taught English at Seattle's Jewish high school.

Less than two years ago, after the abolitionist coalition and its supporters in Congress convinced State Department chiefs to replace Nancy Ely-Raphael, the career diplomat who was appointed to head the office, members of the coalition tapped Miller for the job. Ely-Raphael was accused by the coalition of being too much of a bureaucrat and not aggressive enough, sources said. With the help of powerful conservative legislators, she was booted out.

In Seattle, Miller received a bundle of papers, sent by members of the coalition, documenting the scope of modern slavery. He was shocked, and convinced that he should take the job.

"I had no idea of the dimensions of this problem. I realized that it is the primary human-rights issue in the 21st century," he said.

Miller was a "perfect choice" for the job, Horowitz said. In addition to his conservative credentials, Miller had gained respect on both sides of the political aisle when he fought against granting China a "Most Favored Nation" status during the first Bush administration, snubbing a Republican administration and risking a confrontation with the biggest employer in his district, Boeing, which sold jets to the Chinese.

While his office still focuses mainly on "finding the victims" to liberate and rehabilitate them, it has also recently increased its efforts to tackle the demand for coerced prostitution. America is not immune to the phenomenon. Some 20,000 people, according to conservative estimates - Miller thinks the number is much higher - are trafficked annually into the United States. Many of them are young women - often girls in their early teens, who are brought by networks of pimps for forced prostitution.

The United States and other Western countries, are stepping up measures against the child-sex tourism industry. His office, Miller said, is also trying to facilitate tighter law-enforcement coordination between the countries in which people are being enslaved and those to which they are trafficked.

Asked if he sees himself as performing a mission akin to that of Moses, Miller burst out laughing, noting that he is just a civil servant. He did say, however, that Passover has a special personal appeal to him. It reinforces the notion, he said, "that God has told us that slavery is wrong and that we have a moral mission" to abolish it.

The Passover Seder, he said, "always reminds me that when God tells Moses, in Exodus, to demand of Pharaoh: 'let my people go,' he adds: "let my people go, so they may serve me." The message, he said, is that "you cannot be a slave to man if you want to have a full relationship with God."

LOAD-DATE: June 14, 2006

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: IMAGE

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2004 The Forward Association, Incorporated
All Rights Reserved

277 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Vancouver Sun (British Columbia)

May 7, 2004 Friday Final Edition

Profiting from flesh and blood: Vancouver a hot spot for trafficking in migrants, who are then exploited to pay debts

SOURCE: Vancouver Sun

BYLINE: Daphne Bramham and Amy O'Brian

SECTION: News; Daphne Bramham and Amy O'Brian; Pg. A12

LENGTH: 1948 words

They come by the thousands across the Pacific in search of money and opportunity. But for the crime syndicates who bring them, they are nothing but a commodity to be sold in a dimly lit massage parlour or dank bawdy house.

They arrive at Vancouver International Airport under the vigilant eyes of men or women who have tens of thousands of dollars riding on the safe delivery of human goods.

Some arrivals have valid passports. Some have top-quality fakes that are quickly collected by their handlers once everyone is safely past the Canadian authorities. The documents will be recycled for the next shipment.

Those being smuggled may then leave or, if their destination is the U.S., they go somewhere to wait for their next guide.

Some of those being trafficked go directly to local massage parlours or karaoke bars and immediately are set to work to repay the debt owed to agents for arranging their transport and the establishment owners who bought them. Others end up in motels or "safe houses" waiting for a guide to take them on the next leg of the journey, either across Canada or over the border.

When the time is right, the travellers pile into motor homes, mini-vans and even U-Haul trucks.

If they're headed south, the drivers go to a remote part of the world's longest, undefended border where the migrants pour out of the vehicles, run through brush, forest, fields or tidal mudflats to meet their next driver -- usually a fellow countryman -- who will take them to their destination.

There the long process of earning enough to repay tens of thousands of dollars of debts begins.

*

When it comes to human trafficking, the U.S. government believes Canada is no better than countries like Albania, Cambodia, Nigeria, Angola and Japan.

In its annual report on human trafficking, released in March, the U.S. State Department pointed at Vancouver as a hot spot because it says thousands of migrants -- aided by organized crime syndicates -- arrive and then disappear into brothels and karaoke bars here and in the United States.

Canadian senior government officials, police intelligence agents, non-governmental organizations working with street kids and sex-trade workers agree human smuggling and trafficking is a problem.

"Whether it's importing women for the sex trade or importing refugees, it's organized crime and it's done for profit," Vancouver police Detective Constable Jim Fisher says. A specialist in Asian organized crime, he says Vancouver is one of the few cities where every major organized crime group is represented and has some sort of operation, whether drugs, prostitution or human smuggling or trafficking. It's an unprecedented level of organized crime activity, he says, and not much is done about it.

"There has yet to be an organized crime prosecution in this province," says Fisher. "It's a contributing factor for these guys to be here -- the lack of prosecution.

"As a cop, I'm offended. As a citizen, I'm offended."

But just how big the problem is, nobody is willing to estimate. The last Canadian estimate was in a 1998 report from the solicitor-general's office that said between 8,000 and 16,000 people are trafficked each year and the money involved was $120 million to $400 million US -- $160 million to $530 million Cdn.

One of the few estimates available is from the U.S. border patrol's anti-smuggling unit on the B.C.-Washington border. It estimates every month as many as 500 South Koreans arrive at Vancouver International Airport and head south.

Special Agent John Bryant says some are smuggled across the Canada-U.S. border to be reunited with their families. But many are women and girls recruited by agents in their home towns who charge them for passage and sell them as prostitutes to massage parlour and karaoke bar owners in Seattle and Los Angeles. The debts they are forced to work off sometimes never seem to diminish.

Gillian Blackell, co-chair of the federal government's recently established interdepartmental committee on human trafficking, insists human trafficking is a priority for Ottawa. But she says: "In Canada, we're more in the situation of grappling with the fact that trafficking even exists. Many people don't believe it exists here and we have few non-governmental organizations working on it."

Blackell calls it "a modern form of slavery because of the debt bondage."

"The victim does not know how long they will be held and as a result they are extremely vulnerable," she says. "They can also be resold. It's very lucrative because as a source of income generation, the human being is much higher than a one-off like selling drugs."

She says the government's plan is to start by raising public awareness of the issue and then coming up with a comprehensive strategy for how to deal with it.

As a first step, Blackell says the RCMP has been asked to come up with an estimate of how many people are smuggled and trafficked into Canada.

"It's an illicit crime," says Sgt. Alain Petit of the RCMP's immigration and passport section's policy branch in Ottawa. "It's really hard to put a figure to it."

But people like Roz Prober of Beyond Borders, in Winnipeg, wonder what has taken Ottawa so long to pay attention.

"It [human trafficking] is finally just coming up on everybody's radar screen," says Prober. "The problem has been there for a while, but most people you talk to on the street don't know it's going on."

Her organization is affiliated with an international network lobbying to end trade in children called ECPAT International -- End Child Prostitution, Child Pornography and Trafficking of Children for Sexual Purposes -- and has been working on the issue for years.

The global trade in humans is estimated to be worth as much as $10 billion. It's so pervasive the UN voted recently to appoint a special rapporteur, or commissioner, on human trafficking to oversee implementation of the 2003 protocol aimed at preventing and suppressing all forms of human trafficking, as well as prosecuting and punishing traffickers.

Selling people into the sex trade is so lucrative and so loosely policed that two months ago some traffickers brazenly offered two Vietnamese women for sale on EBay, the Internet auction site. The traffickers said the women could only be delivered in Taiwan.

EBay pulled it from the website., but is now being sued by a Taiwanese women's rights group.

Last month, a German couple put their eight-year-old child up for sale in another Internet auction with the starting bid equivalent to about $1.65 Cdn. The auction was stopped by police and the couple faces trafficking charges.

Part of the reason the U.S. State Department dropped Canada from the top tier of countries in its human trafficking report is that Canada has little detailed information about the problem.

But most importantly, Paula Dobriansky, U.S. under-secretary of global affairs, said there is insufficient data on enforcement and prosecutions. "Laws and law enforcement do matter in combatting trafficking," she said.

Human trafficking became a criminal offence in Canada two years ago when the Immigration and Refugee Act was proclaimed, but so far there hasn't been a single conviction. However, the RCMP's Petit said 198 charges were taken to court in 2002 that had "trafficking connotations" including kidnapping, prostitution and assault. The 2003 figures have yet to be tallied.

Human trafficking is one of U.S. President George W. Bush's priorities. It fits well not only with his anti-terrorism agenda, but it dovetails nicely with the priorities of the Christian right, which has been lobbying for years to stop the trade in humans and sexual exploitation of women and children.

Here, the only time trafficking really grabbed Canadians' attention was five years ago when 600 migrants from China's Fujian province arrived in dilapidated fishing boats on the B.C. coast. Some of them were sent back, but many simply disappeared.

And, as immigration officials noted at the time, 600 people in boats seems like a lot, but nearly as many illegal migrants arrive weekly at Canadian airports and disappear. Most illegal migrants and victims of trafficking fly into Canada in economy-class seats next to tourists and business people.

For many, the journey begins when they are recruited by an agent, or see a newspaper ad promising a better life in Canada or the United States.

Young women and girls are often told they will be working as waitresses or hostesses in bars, cocktail lounges or karaoke bars, although most end up in the sex trade. Only after they arrive do they realize they will be working as prostitutes.

Most of the Thai, Malaysian, Korean and Chinese women found in raids on massage parlours, karaoke bars and brothels across Canada have told police they relied on an agent in their home countries, who charged them for their safe passage and job placements. Some demanded payment in advance, others said they could repay them once they were working in Canada.

In turn the agents sold them to bar and brothel owners for prices ranging from $7,500 to $15,000. Added to the price of safe passage, some of the women ended up with debts of $40,000 or more.

Because of the high cost charged to smuggle people illegally into countries like Canada and the U.S., it's hard to make a distinction between those who are trafficked and those who are smuggled.

"What people need to understand is that a person can be transitioned from being an illegal migrant to being trafficked," says Bruce Harris, Central American director of Casa Alianza, the Latin American branch of Covenant House, which works with street kids in Canada and the U.S.

Because of the distances Central Americans travel as they're smuggled into the U.S. and Canada, Harris says they are vulnerable if they run into problems. Harris says it's not uncommon for grandparents to pay for smugglers to deliver young children to parents living illegally in the U.S. Harris has heard of smugglers selling boys and girls as young as seven or eight to brothels along the way.

But Blackell says the sex trade is also the easiest place to find trafficked people.

"In order to make money, you have to advertise the service. It's easier for law enforcement to find sex trade workers than it is to find sweat shops, because they don't need to reach out to the general public to sell their services.

"We haven't had any sweat shop cases in the justice system. But there are organizations that know that it exists."

The other area where Canada doesn't stack up well against the UN protocol or against the U.S. is how it treats victims of trafficking.

In Canada, they are routinely deported often within days or weeks of being found. In the U.S., foreign women and children picked up in raids of bawdy houses, massage parlours or factories can apply for a visa if they agree to testify against the people who helped them get into the country. A special visa allows them to stay for up to three years while they decide whether to apply for permanent residency or return home.

The federal health and human services department provides care, shelter and food. And non-governmental organizations, supported by federal grants, help the women and children to get out of the sex-trade by providing them with opportunities for education and job training.

In Canada, the only tangible evidence combatting human smuggling is a priority are posters and pamphlets recently printed by the justice department. But more change may be coming. Justice Minister Irwin Cotler has indicated the Criminal Code may be amended to include a human trafficking provision.

LOAD-DATE: May 7, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Map: U.S. State Department Trafficking in Persons Report, Vancouver Sun; CANADA: PEOPLE-TRAFFICKING GATEWAY?: American authorities place Canada in the second tier of nations -- those making positive efforts to clamp down on trafficking in humans, but still have some way to go. The U.S. State Department named seven countries and one region that are prime sources of smuggled prostitutes and "forced labour" headed for Canada and, via Canada, the U.S. They are shown on this map.; Photo: ...from South Korea being smuggled into the United States.; Photo: ...surveillance videos are said to be of individuals ...; Photo: These images from the U.S. Border Patrol ...; Photo: (Border patrol badge.); Photo: Glenn Baglo, Vancouver Sun; U.S. Border Patrol agents Sean Monroe (left, a field operations supervisor) and Greg Marshall (senior patrol agent) on the lookout for human smuggling near Blaine.

TYPE: Special Report; Column; Crime

Copyright 2004 CanWest Interactive, a division of CanWest Global Communications Corp.
All Rights Reserved

278 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Jerusalem Report

April 5, 2004

WAKING UP TO A BLIGHT

BYLINE: Ina Friedman

SECTION: Pg. 20

LENGTH: 1595 words

After years of neglect, Israel is finally cracking down on trafficking in women

The contrast between the brightly lit, spanking-clean courtroom of the Beersheba District Labor Court and the six men being sued in it for dark and dirty dealings is thoroughly jarring. As three of the six defendants gather in the room (the others fail to show), tensions briefly spark when they see an unfamiliar figure with an open notebook in hand. "We're the victims here," one shouts as he swaggers in my direction. "That filthy whore is trying to bleed us dry!"

Indeed, the claim they're fighting - for 791,130 shekels ($ 175,600) in back wages and compensation for pain, suffering and mental distress - is not only punishing but, so far, also unique in Israel. The six defendants are ex-cons who have already done time for crimes ranging from soliciting for purposes of prostitution to consensual statutory rape. Essentially, though, they were not only pimps but slave-traders, and were they to be tried today, it would be under a 2000 law forbidding trafficking in women, which carries a maximum 16-year sentence. But as an anti-trafficking law was not yet on the books when they committed their crimes, they got off on lesser charges. The civil suit is designed to redress at least their monetary profit from that legal fluke.

The claimant is a 24-year-old Moldavian woman named Victoria, whose story was first told in The Report in "Victoria's - and Israel's - Ugly Secret" (March 12, 2001). Whatever the legal merits of her case, she clearly deserves a prize for sheer spunk and perseverance. Three years ago, at a time when the state was turning a blind eye to the trafficking of women for work in the sex industry, Victoria was discovered - by a fieldworker of the Hotline for Migrant Workers - battered, bewildered, but nonetheless brimming with outrage in Neveh Tirtzah women's prison. Having been freed by the police from her "owners" - who had traded her back and forth during the 16 months they held her captive and forced her into prostitution - she was being treated as a criminal, rather than a victim, and was sent to the lock-up pending her deportation. Sensing her pluck, the Hotline coaxed Victoria to take an unusual step at that time: to fight back by fingering her captors, testifying against them and, for good measure, suing them for compensation. She signed on for all three challenges.

The criminal proceedings ended with convictions in the summer of 2001. But the civil suit has plodded on for over three years now, with sessions sometimes scheduled months apart, leaving Victoria exasperated with the system. She still lives in hiding, terrified of revenge by the men she helped convict and still faces, from time to time, across a courtroom. And due to a melange of misunderstandings and bad luck, she's now on her third lawyer. Back in the spring of 2001, a hint of optimism vied with the heavy sadness that held Victoria in thrall. Now confusion and impatience are settling in. "I don't understand why this case is taking so long," she says in a mixture of pain and pique. "As long as my life is up in the air," she complains in serviceable Hebrew, "I can't start to move on, go back to school, or even get the psychological counseling I need. It's hard for me to even fantasize about the future."

Though sensitive to her plight, Victoria's lawyer, the soft-spoken Yacov Shimshi, says that the length of the litigation is not surprising. "This is a complex case because the court is being asked to make unusual decisions," he explains. "Standard employers who find themselves sued don't deny their essential status; there are salary slips and other documentation to prove it." But in this case there are no records - no receipts, for example, showing how much the traffickers earned from Victoria's repeated "sale" from pimp to pimp or from the sexual services she supplied under duress. Their criminal convictions notwithstanding, the defendants are even denying that they ever "employed" her. "So it's necessary to go into the legal nuances of what constitutes an employer-employee relationship," Shimshi adds, "and this becomes all the more complicated when the employer's 'business' was in itself patently illegal."

There's a double irony embedded in Victoria's story. Originally conceived as a high-profile landmark suit meant to deter traffickers for the good of all, over the years the case has faded into an obscure, grueling, private battle by an isolated and all-but-forgotten young woman. Yet in these intervening three years, thanks to a process she helped start, Israel has nevertheless done an about-face and made great strides in combatting the heinous crime of trafficking for the sex trade.

Following Victoria's example, more and more women have been encouraged to testify against traffickers. And those who agree are now housed in a special state-financed hostel, which can accommodate 50 women, opened in Tel Aviv in mid-February. Thanks to the intensive activity of the Knesset's Inquiry Committee on Trafficking in Women, headed by Meretz Knesset Member Zahava Gal-On, a number of anti-trafficking amendments have been added to the penal code and a comprehensive anti-trafficking bill to be tabled this spring will also cover economic sanctions against traffickers and state protection for trafficked women.

The police - a key factor in this battle - have shed their indulgent attitude toward pimps (who were formerly pampered as prized sources of intelligence) and have established a special unit to hunt traffickers down. The State Attorney's Office has been toughening up the terms of plea bargains (which are widely used to ease the load of Israel's clogged court system). Judges have begun to impose truly stiff sentences on traffickers (the required minimum now being four years) while also requiring them to pay their victims compensation. And the state funds a hotline specifically for trafficked women. Even Egypt has been induced (albeit by the United States) to cooperate in the effort by helping to block the main route used to smuggle women into Israel, over the long and porous frontier with the Sinai Peninsula. As a result, say the police, that avenue has effectively been sealed.

Now the government has gone a step further by creating a special task force - comprised of representatives of the police, the State Attorney's Office, the Income Tax Authority and the Money Laundering Prohibition Authority (MLPA) - to paralyze traffickers by targeting their ties to international crime networks.

"The strategy behind this comprehensive approach is to strike directly at their assets, which is why the involvement of the MLPA is so important," says Leah Gruenpeter-Gold of the Awareness Center, an NGO dedicated to combatting trafficking. The police have recently surveyed 644 brothels throughout the country with the aim of nabbing their owners for more than just pimping, a crime that carries a relatively light sentence. "And they have already given the MLPA the names of 70 offenders deemed liable to the confiscation of their assets," says Gruenpeter-Gold.

There are also signs of a welcome change in Israel's consideration for the safety of women who have testified against traffickers and fear retaliation by their cohorts once they return to their native countries. "So far, we've been instrumental in obtaining temporary-residence visas for a number of women who fear for their lives if they return home," Gruenpeter-Gold reports. "The visas are for one year, with an option for renewal. But since this is a fairly new arrangement," she says, "we don't yet know whether they will be extended after a year."

It would be heartening to report that this surge of concerted activity was spawned by the persistent work of Israeli NGOs and responsible parliamentarians alone. But the fact is that they had critical help from an outside source: the U.S. State Department, whose 2001 Trafficking in Persons Report slated Israel in the ignominious "third tier," meaning countries that make no effort to meet even Washington's minimum standard of anti-trafficking efforts.

As third-tier states risk facing sanctions by the American government - including limitations on U.S. financial assistance - the report was treated in Israel as a loud wake-up call. Since then, Israel has been upgraded to the "second tier," dispelling the threat of economic sanctions, and may be on its way up to the highest rank. "The delay in creating a secure hostel for trafficked women was the main obstacle to the second upgrade," says Gruenpeter-Gold. "Now that one has been opened," along with the broader and newly energized campaign against traffickers, "we hope we'll be upgraded again."

"But even being bumped up to the highest tier means that we are satisfying only the minimal anti-trafficking requirements," cautions Nissan Ben Ami, co-director of the Awareness Center. "Much work remains to be done in order to shatter the organizational and financial infrastructure of trafficking." Still, there are ample grounds for satisfaction that a scandalously lazy and negligent system has been spurred to vigorous action. "A lot has been accomplished in the last few years," says Gruenpeter-Gold. But the main achievement, adds Ben Ami, "is the change in the government's mindset, to the point where wiping out trafficking in women has become a top priority. That alone is no mean feat."

For Victoria, all this has come too late. But her civil suit holds out the chance for a modicum of justice.

LOAD-DATE: May 10, 2004

LANGUAGE: English

PUB-TYPE: Magazine

Copyright 2004 The Jerusalem Report

279 of 359 DOCUMENTS

White House Press Releases

March 18, 2004

Human Trafficking Fact Sheet

SECTION: WHITE HOUSE PRESS RELEASESLENGTH: 1101 words

Recent Developments in U.S. Government Efforts to End Human Trafficking

Human trafficking denies hundreds of thousands of people their basic human rights, poses a serious public health risk, and fuels organized crime around the world. It is a dark and uncomfortable subject, but one that must be illuminated.

The United States has taken significant action to combat trafficking in persons, including trafficking for commercial sexual exploitation.

In April 2003, the PROTECT Act was signed into law by President Bush. This bill serves as a historic milestone for protecting children while severely punishing those who victimize young people. The PROTECT Act allows law enforcement officers to prosecute Americans who travel abroad to abuse minors, without having to prove prior intent to commit illicit crimes. This bill also makes clear there is no statute of limitations for crimes involving the abduction or physical or SEXUAL abuse of a child-in virtually all cases. The bill also strengthens laws punishing offenders who travel abroad to prey on children ("sex tourism"). These U.S. "tourists" are now subject to domestic child abuse/child exploitation laws even if their crimes are committed abroad, and they face up to 30 years imprisonment, from a previous maximum of 15 years.

In December 2003, President Bush reauthorized the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, which accelerates our global work against modern-day slavery in a number of ways:

Provides new tools for addressing destination countries that may be turning a blind eye to trafficking, especially the abuse of foreign women.

Makes convictions and sentencing of traffickers as important as arrests in evaluating country progress.

Requires better statistical monitoring, giving us access to critical law enforcement data related to trafficking.

Creates a Watch List of countries weakening their commitment to prosecute traffickers, prevent abuse, and protect victims.

President Bush has made the fight against slavery an American priority. In a September 2003 speech he made to the United Nations, President Bush called slavery, "A special evil in the abuse and exploitation of the most innocent..." He declared: "Those who patronize this industry debase themselves and deepen the misery of others. Governments that tolerate this trade are tolerating a form of slavery." The president committed $50 million to support the global fight against human trafficking.

The U.S. is actively partnering with other nations to combat this transnational crime, providing assistance to trafficking victims and striving to highlight the dangers of sex tourism and trafficking. Nearly $74 million in U.S. government funding was devoted to anti-trafficking activities worldwide in FY 2003.

Our progress is real, and the fight is occurring on many fronts:

After 15 countries were ranked in Tier 3 (the lowest category of a 1-3 scale) in the State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report, 10 took swift action to combat trafficking: passing national anti-trafficking legislation, instituting law enforcement training, engaging in public education, and making arrests.

In FY02 and FY03, over $54 M in assistance was provided to more than 70 countries to strengthen anti-trafficking law enforcement, victim support, legislation, and regional cooperation.

Tackling trafficking at home, the Justice Department has arrested eight U.S. citizens abroad for illegal sexual conduct with minors since May 2003. In FY 2001- 2003, 111 traffickers have been charged-nearly a three-fold increase compared to those charged in the previous three years. As of January 2004, the Criminal Section has 142 open trafficking investigations.

Sentencing expected in the largest anti-trafficking case in U.S. history: a Korean garment factory owner and two others were convicted in Hawaii of enslaving over 250 Vietnamese and Chinese workers in American Samoa.

The Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) certified 491 victims of trafficking as of March 15, 2004, allowing them to receive services to the same extent as refugees.

HHS has implemented a public outreach campaign to boost awareness of assistance available to victims. The Rescue & Restore campaign is designed to increase the number of identified trafficking victims and to help those victims receive the benefits and services needed to live safely in the U.S. A critical component of the Rescue & Restore campaign is the creation of the Trafficking Information and Referral Hotline, 1.888.3737.888, which connects victims of trafficking to Non-Government Organizations (NGOs) who can help victims in their local area.

To learn more information about the Rescue and Restore campaign, please visit <http://www.acf.hhs.gov/trafficking>.

The Department of Labor has increased the focus worldwide on illegal child trafficking and work exploitation, dispersing nearly $48M for this purpose in 27 countries.

Labor Secretary Chao recently traveled to Africa to meet victims of child trafficking and highlight new efforts to expose child labor.

The Department of Defense Office of the Inspector General completed two assessments of U.S. military compliance with the Administration's zero tolerance policy on activity that might fuel sex trafficking and prostitution in Korea and Bosnia/Kosovo. In early 2004, DoD issued a directive that outlines specific objectives, including anti-trafficking education requirements for all service members and DoD civilians.

New language is being adopted in DoD contracts for services overseas making trafficking-related prohibitions crystal clear.

The Department of Homeland Security launched Operation Predator last summer, a comprehensive effort to protect children from international sex tourists, traffickers, and prostitution rings using the full range of cyber, intelligence, investigative, and detention tools. Arrests have already been the result.

Partnering with World Vision and ECPAT, DHS is putting law enforcement muscle behind the best efforts of international NGOs.

The U.S. Agency for International Development implements anti-trafficking programs in over 40 countries supporting a wide range of anti-trafficking efforts including public education, victim protection through shelters and counseling, and legislative reform to strengthen prosecution of trafficking criminals.

The Central Intelligence Agency has collected and coded new information, compiling a database for the 2004 TIP report.

LOAD-DATE: March 21, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

280 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Nation (Thailand)

March 2, 2004, TuesdayHUMAN TRAFFICKING: Thailand to plead its case*BYLINE: The Nation.LENGTH: 334 words

HUMAN TRAFFICKING: Thailand to plead its case

US ambassador will be summoned over plan to lower country's ranking

The government will summon the US ambassador to Thailand to clarify what it believes will be Washington's significantly lower human-trafficking ranking for Thailand.

Noppadol Inna, deputy secretary-general to the prime minister, said Deputy Prime Minister Purachai Piumsombun would summon Ambassador Daryl Johnson to explain the implications for Thailand if it is downgraded to a tier-three country.

Although the US's annual 'Trafficking in Persons Report' has yet to be released, Thai officials believe the country's ranking will be lowered. Thailand has been lobbying the US not to lower its status for fear it will damage the country's international standing.

In response, the US might consider a new two-and-a-half-tier category as a compromise, an informed source said.

According to US State Department criteria, tier-three countries are those whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards of combating human trafficking and are not making significant efforts to do so.

Tier-two countries may not fully comply with standards but are making significant efforts to combat human trafficking.

Tier-three countries could be subject to certain sanctions, notably the withholding of non-humanitarian, non-trade-related assistance.

Thailand has for decades been a prime destination for illegal migrants and victims of human trafficking from neighbouring countries. Many have been lured here to work in the sex industry, as well as back-breaking jobs shunned by most Thai nationals.

'The government has recognised for years that trafficking in persons is a problem, but the issue is still not among Thailand's top priorities,' the latest US report released in June last year said. </P>'Thailand needs to give more focus on persecution and increase the number of arrests and convictions of traffickers at home,' the report said.

LOAD-DATE: March 1, 2004LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

281 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

February 22, 2004 Sunday

US praises Cambodia's fight against human trafficking, paedophiles

SECTION: International NewsLENGTH: 362 wordsDATELINE: PHNOM PENH, Feb 22

A top United States official on Sunday praised Cambodia's efforts to combat human trafficking and arrest foreign paedophiles, including several Americans, but said more work was needed.

"We are looking very carefully at what is going on in Cambodia," John Miller, director of the US State Department's office to monitor and combat trafficking in humans, said at the end of a three-day visit.

"We are very pleased at some of the steps the government of Cambodia has taken, and we are urging them to take more steps and to continue the steps they are taking," he told a press conference.

"Some of the things that we are impressed with is the increasing number of arrests of traffickers... and foreign paedophiles, including paedophiles from the United States of America."

But Miller criticised endemic corruption in Cambodia and bribery in the judicial system.

"We cannot ignore all the reports that we hear from Cambodia and from foreigners about the challenges of corruption," he said. "We hope to see more effortful law enforcement."

Cambodia has earned notoreity as a haven for paedophiles, partly due to its lawlessness and culture of impunity after nearly three decades of war.

But recently it has begun a campaign to crack down on paedophiles, with heavy jail sentences and a policy of deporting foreigners arrested on sex charges to face trial in their home countries.

Since December, three Americans have been charged with molesting Cambodian children.

"I hope that all embassies here will cooperate with Cambodia in fighting against childsex tourism," Miller said.

In its annual report on human trafficking released last June, the State Department cited an improving record on the issue when it moved Cambodia and Indonesia from the "Tier 3" group of countries, inclusion in which can lead to sanctions, and into "Tier 2".

But Miller said Cambodia, Indonesia and Japan were still facing major challenges.

"Yes, it's very serious in Cambodia... but you are not alone," he said.

Trafficking in people, particularly women and children destined for the sex trade, is rife in Southeast Asia.

suy/sls/nj

Cambodia-US-trafficking

LOAD-DATE: February 23, 2004LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

282 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Malaysia General News

February 18, 2004, Wednesday

US YET TO DECIDE ON MALAYSIA'S CATEGORY IN HUMAN TRAFFICKING

SOURCE: Malaysia-Trafficking

LENGTH: 414 words

DATELINE: PETALING JAYA, Feb 18, 2004

The US Government has yet to decide on Malaysia's category in human trafficking as it was presently evaluating the country's actions in combating the human trafficking menace domestically.

Last year Malaysia was put under Tier Two of the US government Trafficking in Persons Report. Tier Two signifies countries that do not fully comply with the minimum standards but are making significant efforts to bring themselves to compliance.

The US Director of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking In Persons, John Miller, who is here on a two day visit, said his office would identify steps taken by the Malaysian Government to eradicate human trafficking before re-categorising the country.

"We are now evaluating (the situation). Tier two or Three, it is possible. We have not made a judgment yet," he told reporters at a luncheon meeting here today.

Miller said during his visit here, he met victims of human trafficking, representatives of non-governmental organisations, government officials and representatives of the Malaysian Human Rights Commission.

"My mission to the region is two fold, one was to learn of the situation on the ground and the second is to spur action to combat slavery," said Miller, who would visit Singapore, Cambodia and Japan soon.

Last year US President George W. Bush in an address at the United Nations pledged US$100 million to efforts to eradicate the problem and to date some US$52 million had been spent.

"But the problem cannot be solved by money alone. We need to educate potential victims and the public. Victims too must be treated humanely by the authorities.

"We are looking for a model programme...not just solving the problem by throwing money," he said.

Miller also said the US government had yet to decide how much money would be injected into Malaysia to solve the human trafficking problem.

He said since Malaysia was known to be a leader in its fight against drugs the US government "looked forward to Malaysia to emerge as a leader" in eradicating the human trafficking problem.

Asked if the problem was rampant in the South East Asian region, Miller said it would be a mistake to say that the problem was rampant here as human trafficking existed in all nations whether they were poor or wealthy.

"It is everywhere...Malaysia used to be a source (of human trafficking) but now it's a destination. There is an extensive challenge, from what I have heard so far," he said.

LOAD-DATE: February 19, 2004

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

283 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

October 31, 2003

Testimony of State Dept.'s Steven Pifer to Senate subcommittee Oct. 30

BYLINE: Christine Johnson, Washington File Staff Writer

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 5234 words

Strengthening the capacity of Russia and Ukraine to deal with the problem of transnational crime remains a major part of U.S. policy toward those countries, State Department official Steven Pifer told a Senate Foreign Relations subcommittee October 30.

Pifer, deputy assistant secretary of state for European and Eurasian affairs, focused his remarks on Russia and Ukraine, because they are "key to our efforts to combat transnational crime."

His testimony described the growth in organized criminal activities following the collapse of the Soviet Union. Pifer noted that "organized crime figures and groups have in some cases been linked with key government and business figures. Unfortunately, organized crime increasingly exercises both political and economic power, and there are numerous reports of corruption among government officials and members of legislative bodies... It is difficult to get an accurate picture of how widespread this problem is."

He described some of the measures taken by the Russian and Ukrainian governments, such as judicial reform, to cope with these problems, and also described the strategies and policy tools, including financial assistance, the United States uses to address these challenges.

"We recognize the reform path will be, in both countries, a difficult and lengthy process," Pifer said. "In order to succeed on this reform path, political leaders and law enforcement agencies will have to come to grips with and seriously tackle the problems of organized crime and corruption."

Pifer outlined in particular the progress that has been made, to varying degrees, in Russia and Ukraine against trafficking in persons, money laundering, and narcotics.

"Transnational crime is a real threat to stability in the countries of the former Soviet Union," he concluded. "However, in the last decade, with U.S. assistance, progress has been made in institutionalizing the rule of law, and developing criminal justice systems, especially in Eurasia."

"Strengthening the capacity of countries such as Russia and Ukraine to deal with today's transnational crime problems, as well as improving bilateral and multilateral cooperation to counter these threats, will remain major parts of the U.S. agenda with these countries," he said.

Following is Pifer's prepared testimony as it appears on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee Web site (foreign.senate.gov/testimony/2003/PiferTestimony031030.pdf):

(begin text)

TESTIMONY FOR THE SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE SUBCOMMITTEE ON EUROPEAN AFFAIRS BY DEPUTY ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE STEVEN PIFER

Transnational Crime in Europe

October 30, 2003

Mr. Chairman, members of the Subcommittee, thank you for the opportunity to address the impact of transnational crime on U.S. priorities in Europe. I will focus my remarks today on Russia and Ukraine -- two countries that are key to our efforts to combat transnational crime.

I would like to discuss briefly the historical context that has given rise to crime and corruption in the former Soviet Union following the collapse of the USSR and focus on some of the steps that the Russian and Ukrainian governments are taking to cope with these problems. I would also like to describe the strategy and some of the policy tools that the U.S. Government brings to bear to address these challenges.

Historical Context

Along with the positive and historic possibilities created by the collapse of the Soviet Union, the early 1990's were marked by an increase in criminal activities in the region, in large part because of a vacuum in institutions resulting from the breakup. The process of privatization of vast state resources often took place in the absence of any effective legal or regulatory structure, and many valuable state assets were privatized in "insider transactions." As a result, property rights were unclear, and disputes over property rights often could not be resolved in courts of law. Insiders and organized crime took advantage of this situation to take control of major assets, often having to pay no more than a small fraction of their true value.

Privatization took place roughly simultaneously with the development of small-scale private businesses. Again, because of the absence of an effective legal and regulatory system governing the activity of private enterprises, these businesses were ripe for extortion by street gangs. In order to protect themselves, small businesses often had to turn to other gangsters to provide a "krysha" (roof) of protection. Consequently, gangsters gained control of many small businesses and accumulated capital, which they frequently used to acquire larger businesses during the privatization process. They often then used these businesses to make more money and to acquire public status, which they then used to obtain political office.

Organized crime figures and groups have in some cases been linked with key government and business figures. Unfortunately, organized crime increasingly exercises both political and economic power, and there are numerous reports of corruption among government officials and members of legislative bodies. Corruption weakens the ability of a government to conduct normal business; it undermines political processes, allows the trafficking of illegal drugs and terrorist activities, impedes trade and investment, and hampers participation in the global economy. It is difficult to get an accurate picture of how widespread this problem is. The situation is very opaque, and we often have little more than anecdotal glimpses. The proliferation of organized crime groups has had reverberations in the United States, where many of the same organized crime groups that plague Russia and Ukraine now have a foothold.

We wish to see Russia and Ukraine develop as modern states, with democratic institutions and prosperous market economies, and we have since the end of the Soviet Union urged political and democratic reforms in these directions. We recognize the reform path will be, in both countries, a difficult and lengthy process. In order to succeed on this reform path, political leaders and law enforcement agencies will have to come to grips with and seriously tackle the problems of organized crime and corruption.

Russia -- Reforms

To address organized crime, corruption and other threats to continued democratic and economic development, the Russian government has passed impressive legislation in the past several years.

In June 2002, the Russian Duma (parliament) passed a new Code of Criminal Procedure of the Russian Federation. The new Code substantially changes the previous Soviet-era criminal justice system. It establishes a more adversarial system of justice, extending jury trials for significant crimes nationwide and giving defense counsel a greater role in the proceedings.

The Code also strengthens the powers and independence of the judiciary by requiring the approval of judges for search and arrest warrants and for the pretrial detention of defendants. Additionally, it broadens the rights of criminal defendants by requiring, among other things, the review of pretrial detention within 48 hours after arrest. After the introduction of the new Code the number of criminal cases opened by the Procuracy declined by 25 percent; the number of suspects placed in pretrial detention declined by 30 percent; and the courts rejected 15 percent of requests for arrest warrants. Judges released some suspects held in excess of allotted time when the government failed properly to justify its request for extension, and the Supreme Court overturned some lower court decisions to grant pretrial detention considered inadequately justified.

Human rights advocates reported that the strict new limits on time held in police custody without access to family or lawyers, and the stricter standards for opening cases, have discouraged abuse of suspects by police as well. As a result of the passage of the new Code, 83 of 89 regions in Russia have introduced jury trials, 713 jury trials have taken place during the first nine months of this year, resulting in 614 convictions and 99 acquittals. This system should reduce the potential for corruption.

Ukraine -- Reforms

Ukraine has also taken significant steps in recent years to address deficiencies in its judicial system. Its ability to attract investment, and thus to sustain its recent economic growth, will depend on continued progress towards development of a legal infrastructure that protects investors' legal and contractual rights.

In 1999, the State Executive Service was established as a special department in the Ministry of Justice to execute court decisions. Its powers include enforcement of judgements in civil cases; decisions in criminal and administrative courts involving monetary compensation; and judgements of foreign courts, the Constitutional Court, and other authorities.

Legislation enacted in the past three years to regulate the court system and improve the administration of justice has brought Ukraine's legal framework more into line with the Constitutional requirements for an independent judiciary. Enactment in 2002 of the Law on the Judicial System of Ukraine and the Law on Enforcement of Foreign Court Decisions are hopeful signs, although these still need to be fully implemented. The Law on the Judicial System created an independent State Judicial Administration as well as a new appellate body, the Court of Cassation. Ukraine also enacted a new Criminal Code in 2001. The law also established a Judicial Academy to train new judges and continue the education of sitting judges.

Other legislative changes enacted in 2001 curtailed prosecutors' authority. The Procuracy no longer may initiate new criminal cases; its powers are limited to the observance of laws by law enforcement agencies only. In May 2001, the Constitutional Court ruled that citizens may challenge court actions by the prosecutors and investigative agencies, as well as government actions regarding national security, foreign policy, and state secrets.

While there has been significant progress in criminal justice reform in Russia and Ukraine, both governments must continue to make strides towards fully utilizing their justice systems to fight transnational crime.

Policy Tools

The U.S. Government would, of course, like Russia, Ukraine and all of the states of Europe and Eurasia to have the capacity to enforce their laws in accordance with international standards while employing up-to-date practices. While recognizing that the responsibility for fighting organized crime and corruption lies first and foremost with the countries themselves, the U.S. Government has increasingly made efforts to fight money laundering, narcotics and trafficking in persons a central element of our engagement with Russia, Ukraine and the other states of the former Soviet Union.

The U.S. strategy for combating transnational crime in the former Soviet Union has five prongs: 1) expand rule of law and law enforcement programs with an emphasis on criminal justice reform and enhancing the capabilities of law enforcement agencies at all levels, 2) provide judicial and law enforcement training that introduces modern crime-fighting techniques while also promoting concepts of respect for human rights and professional integrity, 3) promote the development of working relationships among U.S. and regional law enforcement counterparts, 4) institutionalize cooperation through law enforcement agreements (MLATs), and 5) promote the eventual integration of these countries into multilateral and regional institutions.

To implement this strategy, we have several policy tools:

Law Enforcement Working Groups with both Russia and Ukraine were established to provide high-level policy oversight and to serve as ongoing fora for the coordination of bilateral anti-crime efforts. Earlier this month I co-chaired a meeting of the U.S.-Ukraine Law Enforcement Working Group via digital video conference. We addressed four transnational crime threats: 1) intellectual property rights enforcement, 2) counternarcotics efforts, 3) money laundering and 4) trafficking in persons. Representatives of many Ukrainian government agencies took part, which gave us the ability to engage the full spectrum of Ukrainian entities dealing with these crime issues. We engaged at a substantive level, noting the progress that has been made on these issues and the areas where continued progress is necessary.

Mutual Legal Assistance Treaties (MLATs) are not a traditional policy tool; the purpose of an MLAT is to improve U.S. law enforcement abilities, by enabling U.S. authorities to obtain evidence and other types of law enforcement assistance from other countries. Conversely, foreign governments can use the MLAT to request assistance from the United States.

Rule of law therefore is generally a consideration for the State Department and the Senate before a treaty is concluded; we do not want to create international legal obligations to provide assistance to criminal prosecutions in countries that do not respect the rule of law.

That said, an MLAT, by creating formal and regular bases for law enforcement cooperation, can help support other efforts towards promotion of rule of law. The dialogue and cooperation that is resulting from the MLATs with Russia and Ukraine advance the regularization and improvement of our joint law enforcement efforts. In the long term, these MLATs further the rule of law and help Russia and Ukraine regularize their law enforcement efforts overall. Having this kind of regularized process for seeking and obtaining evidence will help strengthen Russian and Ukrainian institutions and encourage the rule of law in these countries.

Our experience with the Ukraine MLAT has been particularly positive. Under the MLAT, the U.S. Government has sent the Ukrainian government requests in cases involving fraud, money laundering, homicide, computer crime, interstate transportation of stolen property, racketeering, corruption, and embezzlement. Each request has been executed promptly and thoroughly. In one high profile example -- the prosecution of former Ukrainian Prime Minister Pavel Lazarenko -- Ukraine has handled numerous requests with exemplary professionalism. According to Justice Department records, we have conducted more formal depositions in Ukraine in connection with that case than in any other country in connection with any other case.

The U.S.-Russia Counterterrorism Working Group serves as a forum for cooperation on transnational crime issues linked to the Global War on Terror. For example, through the working group our two countries promote counternarcotics activities that will reduce the trafficking of illicit drugs through Central Asia to major markets. These activities are aimed at identified needs on the ground, including our recent agreement to work together to develop a narcotics-detecting canine program in Central Asia.

Multilateral efforts to address transnational crime have also been successful. For example:

The international Financial Action Task Force (FATF), with the U.S. Government as an active participant, has begun to tackle the problem of money laundering in Ukraine and Russia. As a result of improvements in its legislation and overall practices against money laundering, Russia was admitted to FATF. Under the threat of sanction from FATF, Ukraine finally passed new legislation earlier this year to deal better with the money laundering problem. I will come back to these cases in more detail.

The United States, along with many member states of the European Union, is a major contributor to projects managed in Central Asia by the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC). UNODC, for example, established a senior level Drug Control Agency (DCA) in Tajikistan several years ago, and is now in the process, thanks to a U.S. contribution, of replicating that success in the Kyrgyz Republic. We have also contributed to a number of other diverse UNODC-managed projects, from assisting border control between Turkmenistan and Afghanistan, to providing video surveillance equipment for a major bridge crossing on the Uzbek-Afghan border, to helping the Uzbek prosecutor's office in archiving on a web site legal materials for the prosecution of narcotics cases across the country.

The Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) is expanding its work in law enforcement and prison reform in Eurasia. In Ukraine, for example, the OSCE is supporting rule of law development through a project to train the staff of the Office of the General Prosecutor. We are also encouraging efforts to cooperate regionally, based on the successful Bucharest Anti-Crime Center for Southeast Europe. A similar effort is underway with the GUUAM states (Georgia, Ukraine, Uzbekistan, Azerbaijan and Moldova), which aims at the creation of a virtual law enforcement center to strengthen regional cooperation among those states' law enforcement agencies. We are supporting this effort and are exploring the possibility of a second center in Central Asia.

Bilateral assistance is vital to our anti-crime strategy. Our assistance program targeting Russia, Ukraine and the other states of the former Soviet Union is the FREEDOM Support Act (FSA). FSA assistance and exchanges have played and are playing a key role in helping the governments of states such as Russia and Ukraine make progress to deal with crime and corruption issues. We greatly appreciate the strong support that Congress has provided since the breakup of the Soviet Union for the transition to democracy and market economies of the states that emerged from Communism.

Since the start of the Anti-Crime Training and Technical Assistance program with FSA funding in 1995, we have allocated roughly $166 million to the states of the former Soviet Union for reforms, training and capacity-building in the areas of law enforcement and counternarcotics. Close to one-half of that total has been allocated to our efforts in Russia and Ukraine, given their size and importance in the region, and the potential role that Russia can play as a model of reform for all of the former Soviet states. An increasing proportion of our assistance will now go to the states of Central Asia, given the role they play as "front-line" states in the fight against terrorism and heroin smuggling out of Afghanistan. Congress, in fact, specifically appropriated $22 million in Fiscal Year 2002 for law enforcement and counternarcotics efforts in Central Asia.

With regard to Russia, an important step forward was made in September 2002, when the United States and Russia signed our first bilateral agreement on law enforcement assistance. Under that agreement, over $4 million in funds have been allocated to start a series of new projects. These will provide training and equipment to Russian units fighting drug trafficking along Russia's southern border with Kazakhstan and training and equipment to improve narcotics searches and seizures at key ports in the south of Russia and in areas that drugs transit in the northwest region of the country. Projects on fighting Internet child pornography and trafficking in persons will be started. Support to the new financial unit set up to combat money laundering will be provided, as will assistance to help implement the new criminal procedure code and the U.S.-Russia Mutual Legal Assistance Treaty. A further $4.7 million in Fiscal Year 2003 funds will be allocated to such projects in Russia to maintain the momentum we have achieved.

We have made a major transition in our assistance programs in the last few years. In the past, most of our assistance went to training, much of it provided at the U.S.-led International Law Enforcement Academy in Budapest. Today, our FSA assistance has evolved and is focused on comprehensive, multidisciplinary institution-building, including major legal reforms, creating new forensics laboratories, setting up financial intelligence units to fight money laundering, helping introduce investigative methods that would eliminate the use of torture, creating "vetted" counternarcotics units, and more.

We are, of course, limited in what we can do by two things: the limits on the assistance we can provide and the political circumstances in the recipient countries. We cannot do it all. We continue to engage the European Union and its member states to increase their support for anti-crime and legal reform efforts.

Progress

There are three areas of major progress in the battle against transnational crime I would like to highlight today. All three of these areas, trafficking in persons, money laundering and counternarcotics, are linked with organized crime.

Trafficking in Persons: We have seen a concerted and welcome effort to combat trafficking in persons from our European partners this year. Russia and Ukraine have both shown some improvement, but at different paces and to varying degrees.

Our efforts to counter the Trafficking in Persons problem focus on three areas: prevention of trafficking; protection of the victims (and potential victims); and prosecution of those who perpetrate this crime. Progress on trafficking can be accomplished in a number of ways: legislation and amendments to criminal codes can be passed; public awareness of the trafficking in persons problem can be increased; and, most importantly, prosecution numbers can rise. In the State Department's Trafficking in Persons report from last year, the Bureau of European and Eurasian Affairs had eight countries in Tier 3, the lowest tier. Today, there are none.

Russia

Russia has begun to turn the corner on combating human trafficking. There is increasing recognition at the top of the problem. On October 27 President Putin said "trafficking in people is part of organized crime, it is one of the most serious and vital world problems."

The UN has cited Russia as the largest source country for trafficked women throughout Europe. Making use of substantial U.S. technical assistance, the Duma Committee on Legislation drafted aggressive anti-trafficking legislation that would criminalize human trafficking and all related crimes. The legislation would also provide protection for victims and witnesses in human trafficking cases and mandate government-funded public awareness campaigns designed to raise awareness of the dangers of human trafficking.

An omnibus criminal code amendment bill is pending before the Duma that includes the anti-TIP criminal articles that were originally put in the anti-TIP law. It appears that the criminal code amendments are also going through some unwelcome changes, according to our Embassy in Moscow, which closely follows this issue. Passage of the anti-TIP articles included in the President's Omnibus Criminal Code Reform Bill will require a concerted effort by key Duma members to gain the support of government agencies and regional governments. Currently, the Russians are using older and weaker laws to go after traffickers; last year Russia prosecuted some traffickers under lesser laws. We hope -- and it will be important -- to see convictions rise with the new legislation.

Ukraine

Ukraine is another large source country for trafficking victims to all parts of Europe and around the globe. The Ukrainian government has a comprehensive action plan for each government ministry to support public awareness, education, and prosecutions. The police opened 169 trafficking cases last year alone, double the number opened in 2001, and followed up with 41 prosecutions and 28 convictions. The Ministry of Internal Affairs has established 27 special anti-trafficking units at the national and oblast levels.

The Ukrainian anti-trafficking NGO community and police across the country have developed vital linkages that have resulted in prosecutions. We have seen political will on the part of the Ukrainians to engage on the trafficking issue but must continue to work with them to ensure further progress, and to ensure that such progress is not impeded by corruption.

Money Laundering:

Russia

In the last two years, Russia has made substantial strides in combating money laundering. On February 1, 2002, Russia's new financial investigation unit, the Financial Monitoring Committee ("FMC"), began operation. The FMC is responsible for collecting suspicious activity reports from banks and coordinating all of Russia's anti-money laundering and counterterrorist financing efforts.

In 1997, Russia passed amendments to the Criminal Code criminalizing money laundering. In 2002, additional amendments were passed, strengthening the 1997 legislation and criminalizing all financial transactions designed to conceal the source of any illegal proceeds.

Largely as a result of the passage of broad anti-money laundering legislation and the FMC's successful monitoring work, in 2002, Russia was removed from the international Financial Action Task Force (FATF) Non-Cooperative Countries and Territories list. In 2003, following further progress, Russia was admitted to FATF. This was a major achievement. Since beginning operation, the FMC has received over a half million suspicious transactions reports. However, according to FATF, few criminal money laundering cases have been successfully prosecuted, and more needs to be done in this area.

Ukraine

The U.S. Government also engages with Ukraine on money laundering issues through FATF. In September 2001, FATF placed Ukraine on its Non-Cooperative Countries and Territories list, citing inadequacies in Ukraine's anti-money laundering regime. In November 2002, Ukraine passed a comprehensive anti-money laundering law, but FATF's Europe Review Group found it deficient in a number of areas and not in compliance with international standards.

In December 2002, FATF called on its members to impose counter-measures against Ukraine. The U.S. Government, in response, designated Ukraine a jurisdiction of money laundering concern under Section 311 on the USA PATRIOT Act. Following consultations between FATF and the Ukrainian government, and with assistance from our Embassy in Kiev, the Ukrainian Rada passed amendments to the anti-money laundering law, the criminal code, and the banking law that brought Ukraine's anti-money laundering law into compliance with international standards. At its mid-February plenary, FATF rescinded its call for counter-measures. Early this month, Ukraine submitted to FATF an implementation plan; that plan must now be vetted by FATF's Europe Review Group. Until full and satisfactory answers are provided to the FATF review group, no decision will be taken by the FATF to undertake an on-site visit -- the penultimate step prior to recommendation for removal from the FATF Non-Cooperative list. Ukraine's work with FATF nonetheless is an example of success -- fundamental reforms, combined with close international scrutiny, resulting in real progress.

Counternarcotics:

Russia

The flow of Afghan heroin into and across Russia has increased tremendously. While overall seizures have yet to increase noticeably, we are now seeing instances of seizures of roughly 50 to 60 kilograms of heroin at a time.

Russia is a party to the 1988 UN Drug Convention and other UN agreements on combating drug trafficking. In 1998, the Russian government enacted the Law on Narcotics and Psychotropic Substances, which criminalized the purchase and possession of drugs and stiffened penalties for large-scale trafficking. More recently, the Russian government has taken additional steps that show promise for future progress in this area with the support of U.S. assistance programs.

In March 2003, President Putin took primary responsibility for the investigation of narcotics trafficking away from the Ministry of Internal Affairs and reassigned it to the newly formed "State Committee for the Control of Narcotics and Psychotropic Substances," known by its Russian acronym, GKN. GKN is still in the start-up process, so it is too early to evaluate its effectiveness. However, most observers view its creation, and the appointment of a close political ally of President Putin, Viktor Cherkessov, as its director, as signs that President Putin intends to take the war on drugs very seriously.

At the same time, Russian law enforcement authorities have come to support the use of drug demand reduction programs as a complement to their efforts to reduce the supply of drugs.

The U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency is also seeing hopeful signs of growing cooperation between Russian law enforcement and a new counter-narcotics Special Investigative Unit created and vetted by the DEA in Uzbekistan. Such bilateral cooperation will be an important component of any successful effort to halt the flow of drugs out of Afghanistan.

Ukraine

The Ukrainian Government takes effective steps to limit illegal cultivation of poppy and hemp. Ukraine is a party to the 1988 UN Drug Convention, and it follows the provisions of the Convention in its counternarcotics legislation. Combating narcotics trafficking continues to be a national priority for law enforcement bodies, although a lack of financial resources seriously hinders Ukrainian efforts. Corruption is also a problem, although it has rarely been linked to drug enforcement. Coordination between law enforcement agencies responsible for counternarcotics work has improved, but still remains a problem because of a lack of resources, some tendencies to resist interagency cooperation and sharing of information, and regulatory and jurisdictional constraints.

The National Counter-narcotics Coordinating Council, established in 1994 within the Cabinet of Ministers to coordinate the efforts of government and public organizations to combat drugs, is responsible for a counternarcotics program for the period through 2008. The main objective of the program is to make qualitative changes in the national strategy for combating narcotics. Although many of the measures in previous national counternarcotics plans (1994-1997, 1998-2000) were constrained by lack of funding, the Ministry of Internal Affairs is giving a high priority to counternarcotics actions and is providing overall support to the maximum extent available.

Conclusion

Transnational crime is a real threat to stability in the countries of the former Soviet Union as those countries move to develop more modern political and economic structures. However, in the last decade, with U.S. assistance, progress has been made in institutionalizing the rule of law, and developing criminal justice systems, especially in Eurasia.

While challenges remain, my colleagues will attest to the strengthened capacity of their law enforcement counterparts, and the strong law enforcement networks that have developed. Strengthening the capacity of countries such as Russia and Ukraine to deal with today's transnational crime problems, as well as improving bilateral and multilateral cooperation to counter these threats, will remain major parts of the U.S. agenda with these countries. We have made progress, but the challenges remain serious and will require our continued attention.

Thank you.

(end text)

(Distributed by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State. Web site: usinfo.state.gov)

LOAD-DATE: November 3, 2003

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

284 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Federal Document Clearing House Congressional Testimony

October 29, 2003 Wednesday

SLAVERY AND HUMAN TRAFFICKING

SECTION: CAPITOL HILL HEARING TESTIMONYLENGTH: 3693 words

Statement of Kent R. Hill Assistant Administrator Bureau for Europe and Eurasia United States Agency for International Development

House Government Reform Committee Subcommittee on Human Rights and Wellness

October 29, 2003

Introduction

Thank you, Mr. Chairman and Members of the Subcommittee. I am very pleased to have the opportunity to be here today to participate in your consideration of the nature and scope of human trafficking. This is a serious and heart-rending abuse of human rights, and it is a 21st century form of slavery which diminishes us all, not just its victims.

As Assistant Administrator for the Bureau for Europe and Eurasia at the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID), I have seen the impact of the trade in human beings firsthand in many countries in that region. And as the USAID representative to the United States Government Senior Policy Operating Group which deals with trafficking, I have become even more aware of the global nature of this terrible scourge and of the collective United States Government (USG) efforts to address this problem.

Trafficking in human beings has different faces in different parts of the world, but it has in common its total disregard for human freedom and dignity and the shameful immorality of those who live off the slavery of others. I am happy to have this chance to share with you how USAID has joined this fight against trafficking in persons, what we are doing now, and what we intend to do to meet this great challenge in the future.

What the trafficking problem is world wide

International slavery and human trafficking are not new. Slavery and slavery-like practices are documented in some of the earliest historical records. Tragically, the sale and exploitation of human beings is a global phenomenon. The U.S. State Department's 2003 Trafficking in Persons Report estimates that at least 800,000 to 900,000 are trafficked annually. This is in addition to large numbers of people who are trafficked within their own countries.

Not only are women, men, and children trafficked for forced labor, but a substantial part of this trade involves the trafficking of women and children for sexual exploitation. In any circumstance, trafficking feeds on the poverty and powerlessness of its victims and the greed and immorality of its perpetrators. It also inflicts human suffering on individual victims whose rights and freedoms are violated by traffickers. The sale and exploitation of human beings is often dominated by criminal networks that work both locally and across international borders in source, transit, and destination countries. Human trafficking is highly profitable and relatively low risk for the perpetrators. Like other criminal activities, it thrives within and contributes to conditions of official corruption and weak law enforcement.

The increasing globalization of the world's economies has given rise to complex migration patterns, as workers have lost traditional sources of income or have been drawn to new job markets. As people move both internally and across borders in search of economic opportunity and what they perceive as a better life, what starts as voluntary migration, either legal or illegal, often leads to victimization by traffickers.

Conflict, like social and economic upheaval, also gives rise to conditions leading to trafficking. As populations are displaced and community and legal structures break down in the turmoil, women and children become more vulnerable. The presence of displaced male civilian populations among this chaos and violence, as well as combatants and sadly even international peacekeepers, increases and concentrates demand for women in prostitution. Women and children - both girls and boys - are swept up by fighting forces as they are abducted or coerced to serve either as direct combatants, "child soldiers", "war wives" or porters, and cooks.

Trafficking is both a supply- and a demand-driven industry. People from impoverished countries most often are trafficked to areas that are relatively more wealthy or developed and the supply of trafficked victims is fueled by political, economic, social, ethnic and/or religious upheaval. Violence against women and children, and women's weaker economic position relative to men further contribute to their vulnerability to the deceptions and power of traffickers. The persistent demand for cheap labor and the increasingly created demand for services of prostitutes and child pornography through the internet feed the trafficking industry. At USAID we believe that both the conditions that lead to a supply of individuals who are vulnerable to traffickers and the attitudes of those waiting to exploit these victims sexually or economically must be addressed. We see prostitution as inherently degrading to those who are sexually exploited and as a factor in fueling the trade in humans, and thus we completely oppose the legalization or normalization of prostitution as a legitimate activity. To take any other position provides traffickers an open door to trade and exploit the most vulnerable of the human family.

USAID's Anti-Trafficking Activities

USAID began to mount anti-trafficking efforts in a few countries in the late 1990s. The Agency now has a worldwide effort with activities in around 40 countries. Field missions, regional bureaus, and central offices are all involved. USAID's Office of Women in Development coordinates the Agency's efforts and chairs USAID's Anti-trafficking Working Group, an internal group with representatives from all USAID bureaus. USAID has made steady progress in increasing the volume and geographic coverage of its anti-trafficking assistance. USAID obligations which specifically target anti-trafficking activities reached $6.7 million in fiscal year 2001; in fiscal year 2002 the Agency increased its anti-trafficking assistance to $10.7 million; and in FY 2003 USAID obligated just over $15 million. Geographic diversity has also increased in USAID's anti-trafficking programs. The Europe and Eurasia region has the largest level of funding in the world for anti-trafficking activities. This is in part because this region of the world has more victims as a percentage of the population than any other region in the world. USAID has significant activities in South and Southeast Asia and some robust programs in Africa and Latin America and the Caribbean. Of the 15 countries on Tier 3 of the Trafficking in Persons List published in June 2003, USAID has development activities in nine and direct anti-trafficking projects in eight of these nine. These are: Belize, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Dominican Republic, Haiti, Kazakhstan, Liberia, Sudan, and Uzbekistan. And we have now begun work in Georgia as well - the ninth country we provide assistance to which was on Tier 3 in June. By September, ten countries had demonstrated sufficient progress in the opinion of the State Department that they were moved from Tier 3 to Tier 2. The five which remained on Tier 3 were: Burma, Cuba, Liberia, North Korea, and Sudan. According to a White House Press Release of September 10, "While Liberia and Sudan have also failed to meet the standards of the Act, and are thus subject to sanctions, the President has determined that certain multilateral assistance for these two countries would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States. For Sudan, the assistance will be limited to that which may be necessary to implement a peace accord."

The evidence is very encouraging. The strong pressure, particularly since 2000, exerted by the U.S. Congress and the Administration is having a positive impact around the world to heighten international efforts to counter trafficking in persons.

Trafficking in persons is a very complex issue which manifests itself in a variety of ways in different regions and countries. USAID's responses reflect this complexity through a wide range of country-specific as well as regional programs. Targeted anti-trafficking programs take advantage of USAID's field presence and expertise, addressing the underlying causes of trafficking through prevention efforts, working to provide care and assistance to victims through protection and strengthening aspects of national legislation and international prosecution. The broad range of USAID development assistance programs reinforces the Agency's direct anti-trafficking efforts by helping to reduce vulnerability to trafficking through activities that reduce poverty, strengthening governance and rule of law, decreasing conflict, increasing economic opportunities for women and men, and increasing girls' access to quality education. USAID's anti-trafficking efforts are conducted in partnership with international, regional, and local organizations, including NGOs, private voluntary organizations (both faith-based and secular), and multilateral institutions.

USAID's Anti-Trafficking Policies

In February 2003, USAID released its anti-trafficking program statement, "Trafficking in Persons: The USAID Strategy for Response." The strategy reflects and complements the U.S. Government's integrated approach to combating trafficking in persons, both internationally and domestically. Principles underlying the strategy include:

- Emphasis on a targeted set of countries and/or regions

- Anti-trafficking activities focused on prevention of trafficking, protection of victims, reform, and implementation of anti-trafficking legislation

- Development efforts that support and reinforce direct anti- trafficking activities, e.g., girls' education, reduction of violence against women and promotion of their rights, poverty reduction, administration of justice, and refugee assistance

- Partnerships with organizations such as NGOs and faith-based institutions that are fighting trafficking and assisting victims of prostitution, child labor, and other forms of slavery

- Coordination with other parts of the U.S. Government and with local, regional, and international institutions

The Strategy specifies how USAID will implement its activities through partnerships. In keeping with the Administration's position that prostitution is degrading to women, the USAID strategy states:

"Organizations advocating prostitution as an employment choice or which advocate or support the legalization of prostitution are not appropriate partners for USAID anti-trafficking grants or contracts. Missions will avoid contracting or assistance agreements with such organizations as primary or sub-grantees, or contractors."

Recognizing that USAID staff or contractors may come in contact with individuals who have been trafficked whom they cannot and should not ignore, the strategy states:

"In the course of their development work, especially in STD and HIV/AIDS programs, USAID staff and primary grantees, subgrantees, contractors, and subcontractors may become aware of individuals who may have been trafficked for sexual exploitation. When this occurs, USAID staff or grantees and contractors should report this information to the U.S. Embassy officer who handles trafficking."

Selected examples of USAID anti-trafficking activities

In Ukraine, USAID's "Trafficking Prevention Project" addresses two key factors that contribute to the vulnerability of Ukrainian women to trafficking: lack of economic opportunity and violence against women. This project began in 1998 and will continue through April 2004. In it, USAID and its partner, Winrock International, pioneered the strategy of increasing women's income-earning options as a way to prevent trafficking. Project activities are grounded on the assumption that in order to improve trafficking prevention efforts in Ukraine: 1) women in the at-risk group need to be trained in recognizing and creating viable economic opportunities for themselves; and 2) improved crisis prevention services for at-risk women and returned trafficking victims need to be enhanced. Through nine trafficking prevention centers run by Ukrainian non-governmental organizations, this activity offers both job skills training and resources for women including support groups, free legal consultations, and referrals to physicians and psychologists.

Children from marginalized populations in Albania, particularly ethnic minorities, are unusually vulnerable to being sold by their relatives, manipulated by traffickers, and ignored by law enforcement. Albania's proximity to developed countries in the European Union (notably Greece and Italy), combined with porous borders, has made it a prime illegal market for trade in human beings, especially children. A new USAID-sponsored activity, "Transnational Action Against Child Trafficking," links Albanian non-governmental organizations and public officials with their counterparts in Greece and Italy to identify trafficking routes, cooperate on voluntary and legal repatriation of trafficked children, and to improve care for trafficking victims both before and after repatriation. The activity includes prevention efforts such as information dissemination and assistance for at-risk children and their families. Terre des Hommes, an international non-governmental organization, is leading implementation of this activity, and other contributors joining USAID in supporting it include the Swedish International Development Agency, UNICEF, the Oak Foundation, and the National Albanian American Council.

Just this past week we received some very welcome and very tangible evidence regarding the effectiveness of our USAID anti- trafficking efforts in South Central Europe. On October 25, the USAID-funded International Organization for Migration (IOM) public information campaign against trafficking was selected by a jury of 11 experts as "the best comprehensive campaign in 2003" in Croatia.

In the Democratic Republic of Congo, rebel forces and militias continue to abduct and forcibly recruit Congolese men, women, and children to serve as forced laborers, porters, combatants, and sex slaves in areas of the country under their control. USAID/DRC is providing survivors with legal advice and medical assistance and is building the capacity of local groups which provide counseling. USAID is using media to develop messages to inform the population about trafficking, connect victims with assistance, and encourage reintegration of survivors.

The Sudan Program in the Regional Economic Development Support Office (REDSO) is working to prevent and reduce abductions through the documentation, collection, and compilation of information on trafficking routes and abductions and is conducting awareness raising campaigns on the negative impact of raiding and abduction practices on relations and exchanges with neighboring communities. USAID is also supporting the provision of appropriate interim care and longer-term planning for identified victims through transit centers and reintegration support as well as reuniting of families, where possible.

One of the largest source countries for trafficking victims in the Western Hemisphere is the Dominican Republic. It is a source, transit, and destination country for trafficking for sexual exploitation and forced labor. The Government there is taking steps to combat trafficking. In May 2003, the Attorney General of the Dominican Republic announced the creation of a new unit to fight the exploitation and trafficking of children, and in July 2003 the nation's Congress passed anti-trafficking legislation. The USAID Mission in the Dominican Republic is supporting implementation of the new legislation by training judicial personnel and other government officials as well as victim protection agencies.

In Brazil, women and children are trafficked into prostitution and there is a significant problem with internal trafficking of men and children into forced labor in agriculture, mines, and charcoal production. USAID signed a Memorandum of Understanding with the Brazilian Ministry of Social Assistance and the National Secretariat of Human Rights to improve social and psychological services to trafficking victims, assist the government of Brazil to develop national laws to prevent domestic trafficking in persons, and support a national trafficking awareness campaign targeting tourists and truck drivers. USAID is training government workers in the trafficking victim assistance network in a child/youth victim assistance methodology. Diagnostic studies carried out by USAID show that capacity building for NGOs providing shelter and psychosocial assistance to trafficking victims requires significant training in a number of areas including strategic planning, fund raising, activity design, and monitoring and evaluation. The USAID Mission in Brazil is designing and delivering a comprehensive training program for NGOs in several municipalities.

Haitian children are sometimes trafficked internally by poor parents who place their children as servants in households of better-off families. Not all of these children are victimized or kept in slave-like conditions, but significant numbers are sexually exploited and otherwise abused. In order to change attitudes in Haiti toward child domesticity and help prevent its recurrence, a network of community radio stations will disseminate information about trafficking patterns, living and working conditions of child domestics, Haitian legislation and international agreements condemning the practice, respect for the basic rights of children, and affects of trafficking on society.

USAID has established the South Asia "Regional Initiative on Women's and Children's Equity" to support South Asian efforts to protect rights and enhance opportunities for women and children in the region. This initiative includes programs for Bangladesh, India, Nepal, Pakistan, and Sri Lanka that cover child labor and violence against women as well as trafficking. The initiative promotes political and community support to combat trafficking, use of reliable research findings and data to support advocacy, and effective protection and prevention programs. This regional initiative is helping increase the capacities of and cooperation among Asian regional and national organizations to initiate and sustain more effective programs.

The anti-trafficking approach of the USAID Mission in Bangladesh includes targeted research, strengthening Bangladesh's anti-trafficking networks, supporting NGO capacity building, prosecution of traffickers, protection of victims, and targeted prevention efforts. The Mission provides support and funding to the "Action Against Trafficking and Sexual Exploitation of Children" (ATSEC), a regional anti-trafficking network of NGOs. ATSEC builds anti-trafficking alliances, disseminates information, and promotes awareness-raising activities, particularly among vulnerable populations such as rural populations and border region communities. USAID also supports the "Bangladesh National Women Lawyers' Association" (BNWLA) in its efforts to combat trafficking. BNWLA focuses on the protection of trafficking victims and the prosecution of trafficking perpetrators. The BNWLA provides legal aid, rehabilitation, and repatriation support services to trafficking survivors, and manages Proshanti, a shelter home for trafficking victims and abused women and children. BNWLA has provided shelter and services to nearly 1,000 women and children over several years. It also works in cooperation with the Government of Bangladesh to promote the prosecution of traffickers.

At USAID, we are supporting mapping of trafficking routes and examining closely the geographic relationship between conflict; social, political, and economic disruption; and increases in human trafficking in those areas. We will link our anti- trafficking efforts with our involvement in post-conflict situations. We are committed to preventing the trafficking of more young women and children by providing economic opportunity, education, and effective public information. We are equally committed to protecting and helping those who have been trafficked to return to their own communities to find hope and a better life. Shelters run by NGOs are an important part of this effort. This year we are supporting the International Justice Mission's work in Cambodia to rescue trafficking victims from sexual exploitation and to prosecute the traffickers. We are designing a program for victims of trafficking in Liberia, where young women and girls were pressed into the conflicts as sex slaves or even fighters, and boys were forced to serve as child soldiers.

Because we recognize that there are two sides to the equation, supply and demand, we are working with cross-border programs involving both source and destination in countries such as Albania, Greece, Italy, Haiti, and the Dominican Republic. Finally, we will use the media, courts, and civil society to combat the demand for cheap sex and labor that drives the criminals who make profit from this demand at the expense of our fellow human beings.

Conclusion

The development assistance that USAID provides around the world is directly linked to the causes and effects of human trafficking. Our commitment to fight all forms of trafficking in persons is deep and long term. The challenges ahead are great. Traffickers are criminals who change their patterns of operation as they are discovered. We must be just as agile in shifting strategies to continually cut the ground out from under the criminals who feed over human misery.

As President George W. Bush put it on September 23, 2003, before the United Nations General Assembly, "the trade in human beings for any purpose must not be allowed to thrive in our time." USAID is committed to playing its part in effectively combating the evil of trafficking in persons. Our success will be measured by the assistance and healing we provide to trafficking victims, and ultimately by the hundreds of thousands we hope to prevent from ever suffering the horrible degradation that accompanies the modern-day slavery which is trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: October 30, 2003

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

COMMITTEE: HOUSE GOVERNMENT REFORM

SUBCOMMITTEE: HUMAN RIGHTS AND WELLNESS

TESTIMONY-BY: KENT R. HILL, ASSISTANT ADMINISTRATOR

AFFILIATION: BUREAU FOR EUROPE AND EURASIA

285 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

October 28, 2003

Senior State Department Official discusses human trafficking

BYLINE: Vicki Silverman, Washington File Staff Writer

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 1431 words

Washington -- In early October 2003, John R. Miller, director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, traveled abroad to view the challenges and accomplishments related to U.S. efforts to end modern slavery around the world. At each location he sought opportunities to speak with victims, as well as representatives of the non-governmental organizations (NGOs) who provide essential aid to the victims and educate others, and police and government officials essential to eradicating the transnational movement of forced laborers.

Miller spoke with the Washington File October 21 about his working visits in The Netherlands, Greece, Sweden, Russia, India and Thailand, as well as what he characterized as "recent milestones" in U.S. efforts to end human trafficking.

A veteran human rights advocate and experienced public servant, Miller said the opportunities to talk to trafficking victims during his travels had left the deepest impression on him.

"You can read the statistics -- this office estimates the number of persons trafficked annually between 700,000 and 900,000, and there are other organizations with even higher estimates. You can read all the reports of this office but it's through the victims you come to understand the horror," Miller said.

"I spoke with a young Czech woman," he recalled. "Living in the Czech Republic, with a 2-year old daughter and bad marriage, she was told by a friend of the family' she could make a better life in The Netherlands working in a restaurant. The friend' turned her over to another Czech, who drove her and three or four other girls to The Netherlands. They were handed over to a Dutch trafficker, who took them to a brothel.

"When she refused to prostitute herself, she was told, 'You will do this if you want your daughter back in the Czech Republic to live.' She did it, day after day servicing men. The trafficker told her she had to pay off her debts. The other incentive was that if she worked really hard,' she could bring her daughter to live with her. She did manage to bring her daughter. Living in an apartment that cost twice what the trafficker had told her, she worked at night and returned in the morning to get her daughter off to school. Her thoughts began to turn to suicide, thoughts of killing her daughter and herself," Miller said.

"Later in my trip, I met with a Laotian girl delivered at age 10 or 11 to work in an embroidery factory in Bangkok. Forced to work 12 to 15-hour days, she received no compensation. She rebelled, was locked in a room and the factory owner's son shot a BB gun through her cheek. They dumped chemicals on her; she has scars all over her body. She's one of the lucky ones; she got out. There was a raid and she is now in a good shelter in Thailand. She had the courage to participate in a highly publicized prosecution. Now, at age 14, she's studying, but she is also still undergoing plastic surgery. She'll never forget this," Miller said.

In addition to underscoring the personal tragedies hidden behind the trafficking numbers, these conversations revealed the diverse manifestations of slavery. "Whether we are talking about the sex industry or factory labor, rich country or developing economy, this is slavery. Our conversations hammered in the fact that these victims come from somewhere else, never from the hometowns. They are the victims of brutality and greed," Miller said.

Working Toward Change

In September 2003, President Bush underscored the hidden crisis of human trafficking in his annual address to the United Nations General Assembly. "He was the first world leader to raise the issue to this level of international attention,"

Miller said, adding that the president's remarks at the U.N. are one important indication of the U.S. government's determination to end slavery at home and abroad.

Miller noted several other recent milestones in America's drive to end human trafficking. They include Bush's requirement in early 2003 -- Executive Order 13257 -- that every relevant agency of the U.S. government bring its expertise to the effort to end trafficking in persons and assist its victims.

"That is an effort that the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons is charged with coordinating," Miller explained. "Our office has a modest amount of funds, $10 million, to support programs abroad on prevention, education, law enforcement and prosecution.

"Overall annual U.S. government assistance for overseas programs is about $55 million, most of which is channeled to non-governmental agencies. NGOs, in my view, have been the leaders in this effort," Miller said. In addition to linking resources, he hopes that coordinating policies among the various agencies within the federal government will result in a unified, streamlined grant process to aid NGO partnerships.

U.S. Annual Report on Trafficking

Another milestone, according to Miller, was passed just months before the Department of State issued its third annual Trafficking in Persons Report. "For the first time, in conjunction with the June 2003 report, countries would bear consequences -- some type of U.S. sanction -- for their inaction in facing the problem. What we saw in the months preceding the report was a marked increase in nations' willingness to take fundamental steps, such as anti-trafficking legislation, police training, public education," he said.

Miller believes the combined effect of known consequences, increased public awareness, shame, and targeted support for reform programs all contributed to the elevation of 10 out of 15 Tier 3 countries to Tier 2 status, meaning these 10 countries made significant progress in addressing human trafficking.

Today, approximately 70 percent of the countries with a documented problem (which the United States defines as 100 or more individuals brought or sent into slave labor) now lie within Tier 2, as defined by U.S. law.

"A majority of the countries in the world today have become aware of the problem and they are starting to undertake efforts. But a majority of the world is nowhere near meeting the seven standards, outlined on page 15 of the report, required for any nation to maintain a Tier 1 status. Congress is thinking of revising the law -- perhaps divide Tier 2 to further recognize the efforts and resources being brought to bear to combat trafficking, but I am not sure what will happen on that this year," Miller said.

Explaining further, Miller said, "Countries in Tier 2 are distinguished by the significant efforts' they are making. One of the interpretations we've made is that significant efforts' or the progress a country has made does not mean the same every year. The bar gets higher from year to year. For instance, once anti-trafficking legislation is in place, we'll be looking for evidence that investigations and prosecutions are being actively pursued. We will continue to work on a government-to-government basis and with our NGO partners to come up with the strategies and plans needed to effect change."

With a clear picture of the U.S. financial resources, increasing experience and direction, Miller is confident that the United States will maintain momentum in aiding the forces destined to end today's slave trade.

Further information on Executive Order 13257, which defines human trafficking and outlines U.S. policy toward it, is available on the Internet at HYPERLINK "usinfo.state.gov/gi/Archive/2003/Jun/10-239581.html"

President Bush's September 2003 UNGA speech can be found at HYPERLINK "usinfo.state.gov/topical/pol/usandun/03091201.htm" .

The biography of John R. Miller is available at HYPERLINK "state.gov/r/pa/pil/21777.html" .

Other useful Internet sites related to U.S. policy on trafficking in persons include the State Department Bureau of International Information Programs at HYPERLINK "usinfo.state.gov/gi/global_issues/human_trafficking.html" ; , The Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons at HYPERLINK " http://www.state.gov/g/tip/" ; and the June 2003 Trafficking in Persons Report at HYPERLINK " http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/tiprpt/2003/" .

(The Washington File is a product of the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State. Web site: usinfo.state.gov)

LOAD-DATE: October 29, 2003

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2003 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

286 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Nation (Thailand)

October 7, 2003, Tuesday

Washington frowns on Cambodians? repatriation

BYLINE: The Nation.LENGTH: 419 words

Washington frowns on Cambodians? repatriation

The recent forced repatriation of 600 Cambodian migrants is a major setback for Thailand's anti-human-trafficking record and will affect Washington's evaluation of the country next year, a visiting US State Department official said yesterday.

John R Miller, director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, said the deportation was dangerous as it risked exposing some of those repatriated to their traffickers.

In an effort to clear the country of illegal migrants during the month of the Apec summit, the government last Monday repatriated 621 Cambodians ? some of whom Miller believes were victims of human trafficking ? without pre-arrangements to receive them at home.

Miller, in Thailand to evaluate the country's performance in human-trafficking prevention, told reporters: ?It is a beginning of the circle [of trafficking] again.?

The State Department's ?Trafficking in Persons 2003?? report classified Thailand as ?tier 2?, which means the country does not fully comply with minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking.

Thailand is a source, transit point and destination country for persons trafficked into sexual exploitation and forced labour, said the annual report released in June.

Economic disparity in the region helps to drive significant illegal migration into Thailand from its neighbours.

International trafficking victims come mainly from Burma, Laos, Cambodia and China, the report said.

Miller said Thailand had done some positive things, notably its effort to have joint-economic development with immediate neighbours in an attempt to curb trans-border migrants.

However, he added that the Kingdom needed to improve the prosecution of illegal migrants, pointing to the fact that out of 504 human-trafficking-related arrests last year, only 42 prosecutions and 21 jail sentences had followed.

In order to improve Thailand's ability to fight human trafficking, the State Department has approved $38 million in financial assistance for the 2003-2004 fiscal year, Miller said.

Of that amount, only one-third will go to the government, with the remainder ? $25 million ? going to non-governmental organisations, he said.

The money will go towards training police, prosecutors, NGO social workers and medical professionals to help them better protect victims, as well as aiding the fight against human trafficking, he added.

Supalak Ganjanakhundee</P>The Nation

LOAD-DATE: October 6, 2003LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

287 of 359 DOCUMENTS

BBC Summary of World Broadcasts

September 12, 2003, Friday

Turkish ministry says upgrade in US human trafficking report "positive but Inadequate"

SOURCE: Anatolia news agency, Ankara, in English 1553 gmt 12 Sep 03

LENGTH: 245 words

Text of report in English by Turkish news agency Anatolia

Ankara, 12 September: Foreign Ministry said on Friday 12 September that US State Department, in its trafficking in persons report, upgraded Turkey from Tier 3 to Tier 2, stating that this was positive but inadequate.

Foreign Ministry statement said government attributed importance to fight against human smuggling that turned into a serious problem for all the countries in the recent years.

The statement said all legal measures were taken in the past one year under the coordination of Foreign Ministry and with the participation of all state institutions. The statement said despite this, in the "2002 trafficking in persons report" of US State Department, which was published on 11 June 2003, Turkey had been taken to group of countries "whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so". After US State Department re-evaluated the countries included in the Tier 3, Turkey was upgraded to Tier 2, "including countries whose governments do not fully comply with the act's minimum standards but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards". Foreign Ministry statement said, "Although this decision is considered as positive, it is inadequate. We are following the issue with sensitivity and that cooperation between related institutions and NGOs will be continued efficiently."

LOAD-DATE: September 13, 2003

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2003 The British Broadcasting Corporation

288 of 359 DOCUMENTS

BBC Summary of World Broadcasts

September 11, 2003, Thursday

USA approves of Georgia's recent efforts against human trafficking

SOURCE: Prime-News news agency, Tbilisi, in Georgian 1250 gmt 11 Sep 03

LENGTH: 154 words

Excerpt from report by Georgian news agency Prime-News

Tbilisi, 11 September: The US embassy to Georgia has expressed satisfaction with the progress made by Georgia in fighting against human trafficking. Georgia has now been included in the second tier of countries in the human trafficking report by the US Department of State .

Prime-News was told at the embassy that the US administration declared on Wednesday 10 September that Georgia had achieved certain success in the fight against human trafficking. The White House urged the Georgian government to continue fight against this inhuman practice.

Georgia was included in the in the third tier of countries not making significant efforts to deal with the problem on 11 June 2003. Passage omitted However, after the 90-day evaluation period, the US Secretary of State re-examined the Georgian government's efforts in this regard. Passage omitted

LOAD-DATE: September 11, 2003

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2003 The British Broadcasting Corporation

289 of 359 DOCUMENTS

M2 PRESSWIRE

September 11, 2003

US STATE DEPARTMENTProgress in the fight against trafficking in persons*LENGTH: 586 words

Press Statement; Richard Boucher, Spokesman Washington DC

We announce today some excellent progress. The President announced that ten countries have made important progress over the last three months in the fight to abolish modern day slavery. This announcement reflects several months of intensive effort on the part of diplomats in the field and of foreign governments that have made the commitment to fighting trafficking in persons. These efforts merited effectively raising our ratings of those countries anti-trafficking performance. These ten countries are Belize, Bosnia-Herzegovina, the Dominican Republic, Georgia, Greece, Haiti, Kazakhstan, Suriname, Turkey and Uzbekistan.

These countries all made important progress: some passed comprehensive anti-trafficking legislation; some funded victims support programs; some formed national task forces to combat trafficking and to arrest and prosecute traffickers; some ran public announcements warning the public of the dangers of trafficking. In every one of these countries, public officials including in some cases heads of state, foreign ministers, and other cabinet officials spoke out on this emerging human rights issue. These positive actions deserve our recognition and support.

This is the first year that the President was required by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 to make determinations regarding countries placed on Tier 3 of the Departments annual Trafficking in Persons report.

One hundred sixteen countries were ranked in the June report, and 15 of them were placed on Tier 3, the lowest tier, for their governments failure to comply with the Acts minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and failure to make significant efforts to do so. In the months following the issuance of the report, the Secretary reviewed the anti-trafficking efforts of these 15 countries governments.

The Secretary determined that the governments of the 10 governments cited earlier are now making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance, the standard for placement on Tier 2.

Burma, Cuba, Liberia, North Korea and Sudan still meet the Tier 3 standard, because their governments still fail to comply with the minimum standards, and fail to make significant efforts to do so. The President, acting on the recommendations of the Secretary determined that sanctions will be imposed on Burma, Cuba and North Korea. While Liberia and Sudan are also subject to sanctions, the President determined that certain multilateral assistance for these two countries would promote the purposes of the act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States. For Sudan, that assistance will be limited to that which may be necessary to implement a peace accord.

These determinations by the President clearly demonstrate his personal commitment to this issue and the significant cooperation and effort that the United States and other nations are starting to make to fight this transnational crime and modern day form of slavery. These successes are attributable not only to the efforts of the countries themselves but to our Ambassadors and the Department, particularly its Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

((M2 Communications Ltd disclaims all liability for information provided within M2 PressWIRE. Data supplied by named party/parties. Further information on M2 PressWIRE can be obtained at <http://www.presswire.net> on the world wide web. Inquiries to info@m2.com)).

LOAD-DATE: September 11, 2003LANGUAGE: English

PUB-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2003 M2 Communications Ltd.

290 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Federal News Service

September 10, 2003 Wednesday

STATE DEPARTMENT REGULAR BRIEFINGBRIEFER: RICHARD BOUCHER, DEPARTMENT SPOKESMAN*LOCATION: STATE DEPARTMENT BRIEFING ROOM, WASHINGTON, D.C.

SECTION: STATE DEPARTMENT BRIEFING

LENGTH: 5950 words

Q You know, Rumsfeld's briefing --

MR. BOUCHER: There's somebody more interesting somewhere. Anyway, that's fine with me. I'm happy to see you all here. And I have one thing that I do want to talk about, and that's trafficking in persons.

The White House has put out a short statement to indicate the president's notified Congress that 10 countries that were on the tier 3, the low -- the trafficking persons list from earlier this year, have made significant progress and therefore are being moved up to tier 2, and thereby have avoided possible sanctions under the Trafficking Victims Protection Act. This is in recognition of their quick work to address problems that existed with regard to their trafficking in persons policy. And so we're very pleased today to announce that this excellent progress has been made in these countries, and that the United States has worked very closely with these countries over the past three months to achieve it.

There's been several months of very intensive effort on behalf of diplomats in the field and foreign governments that made the commitment to fighting trafficking in persons more effective. These efforts merited raising our ratings on the countries, on these 10 countries' anti-trafficking performance. The 10 countries are Belize, Bosnia -- Belize, Bosnia-Herzegovina, the Dominican Republic, Georgia, Greece, Haiti, Kazakhstan, Suriname, Turkey and Uzbekistan. All these countries have made important progress. Some have passed legislation. Victims support programs have been started. They've arrested and (are) prosecuting traffickers. There have been public service announcements and awareness campaigns. In every one of these countries, public officials spoke out on this important human rights issue.

This is the first year that the president was required by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act to make determinations regarding traffic -- countries placed on tier 3 in the report. And sanctions were required. Unfortunately, there are still five countries that did not make improvements and still -- are still in the tier 3 -- under this tier 3 standard. Those countries are Burma, Cuba, Liberia, North Korea and Sudan.

The president, acting on the recommendations of the secretary, determined that sanctions will be imposed on Burma, Cuba and North Korea. While Liberia and Sudan are also subject to sanctions, the president determined that certain multilateral assistance for these two countries would promote the purposes of the act, or is otherwise in our national interest. And so he's made the appropriate determinations of some certain bilateral -- multilateral assistance can continue. In the case of Sudan, that's assistance -- in the case of Sudan, this means assistance that would support a peace accord. In both cases, I point out that humanitarian assistance is not affected.

So, that's a determination that the president has notified the Congress of based on recommendations he received from the secretary of State, and I think a remarkable amount of progress that we've been able to make in three months through effective diplomacy, using the act, and the effort of our diplomats, and the effort of foreign countries to really address a very important issue.

So with that, I'd be glad to take your questions on this or other matters.

Q Not on this.

MR. BOUCHER: Start on this. Any particulars? All right, for -- for those who are interested, we'll put out a more complete statement, and the press office will have more specific information.

Q The president is withholding a judgment on the new Palestinian prime minister. I wondered if here at State there's any indication of who might be in the cabinet, and how important is it who he appoints? For instance, the security or interior minister.

MR. BOUCHER: Well, we note that that process, the -- we note that he has accepted the nomination, or the request to form a cabinet, and that the process of cabinet formation has begun. As I think the president made some reference to and the White House has said, it's essential the next prime minister have the authority and the control of the security forces and the finances of the Palestinian Authority to stop terrorist organizations such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad. The issue is taking action to fight terror. So we urge that Mr. Qureia's cabinet appointments reflect candidates free from associations with terror and violence, committed to acting decisively on reform and peace negotiations. That will benefit all Palestinians.

Understand the way it works. He has three weeks to form a cabinet. And if he needs it, can get a further two-week extension.

The new Palestinian cabinet must make clear its opposition to all forms of terrorism, demand that all acts of terrorism cease, and insist that terrorists and military organizations not under the control of the Palestinian Authority be disarmed and dismantled.

Our representatives in the region have continued their meetings. Our acting consul general Jeff Feltman has met with Mr. Qureia today again. He and Ambassador Wolf have continued to meet and speak with a wide variety of Israeli and Palestinian officials on a daily basis and to encourage both sides to recommit themselves to finding a way forward towards the president's two-stage vision.

Risa (sp)?

Q The prime minister of Kuwait is proposing to create a kind of national council for security in charge of supervising all the security agencies. Does it seem to you a good idea, a good step --

MR. BOUCHER: I don't -- I don't think it's for us to specify the exact governing arrangements. The point that we've made is there needs to be commitment, there needs to be authority, and there needs to be resources in the hands of the government to be able to effectively use the security services against the terrorist organizations. It'll be for them to figure out how exactly that can be done.

Yeah. Sir.

Q Yes. This is Nayyar Zaidi from Daily Jang in Pakistan. I didn't know we would move so fast to Middle East. But I want to go back to the trafficking persons.

MR. BOUCHER: Yep.

Q This trafficking obviously involves trafficking abroad, like exporting human beings to other countries, or is it only internal?

MR. BOUCHER: No, it's all forms of forced labor --

Q Okay.

MR. BOUCHER: -- forced prostitution, trafficking in persons. I think there are estimates, you know, of 50,000 people who are trafficked into the United States. So it's just -- it's a problem for countries where people are being taken, it's a problem for countries where they're showing up, and it's a problem that we think the whole world needs to work together against.

Q Yeah. This is what I was coming to.

MR. BOUCHER: Yeah.

Q Is the United States the only country, or is it in Europe, number one? Number two, in case of, say, nuclear technology, we fault the person who exported the technology and the person who imported it. Now, in this case, are the countries which are getting these people, like 50,000 in the United States, are taking any responsibility, and --

MR. BOUCHER: It's -- it -- these are the countries covered in the report, that are placed in different categories.

Q Yes.

MR. BOUCHER: Okay? It covers -- any country in the world where this problem exists in one form or the other is covered. Every country is expected to take action, whether people are trafficked out of that country or into that country or within that country. There may be forced labor in some of these cases inside the country, where we do expect people to take action against it, governments to take action. The United States has passed comprehensive legislation. The United States has taken any number of steps of public awareness, of law enforcement action, arrest, prosecution. And we are acting domestically as well as -- through the domestic agencies as well as part of our international agenda to work with other governments so we can effectively all fight this problem wherever it exists.

Okay?

Q Richard, going back to the Middle East for a second. The president called for the prime minister-designate to get control of all the security forces and unleash them on the militants. Absent his ability to do that, are you simply reconciled to the prospect of continuing violence? Do you see any other options, policy options for you?

MR. BOUCHER: The question is sort of -- I need to separate out the pieces because it's really three different questions. Are we -- you know, absent his ability to do that, to get control of the security services, I think I would complete the sentence by saying, absent the ability of the government to get control of the security services and use them effectively against terrorist groups, it will be impossible to make progress on the road map, to make progress towards a two-state vision, to achieve what the Palestinian people say they want, which is to build the institutions of their own state. So, absent progress on security, we really think it's -- we don't see how you can make progress on creating a Palestinian state, and that these bombers, in addition to harming innocent people, have harmed the lives of Palestinians but have also harmed the ability of Palestinians to achieve their dreams and their aspirations.

The second part is, are we reconciled to continuing violence if this doesn't happen the way we want? And I think the answer has to be no. We'll continue to work against violence, but -- or is there any other way? I think we've also made clear that we don't think there's any other way.

The road map lays out how to achieve the president's vision of two states living side by side. As the president noted again this morning, the road map is there as the mechanism to achieve that vision.

And we need to -- we need to continue to focus on the steps that both sides need to take as we move forward, the key one at this juncture, we think, being to end the activities of these violent groups.

Q Do you get the sense from what he has said so far that he has any intention of getting a grip on the security services?

MR. BOUCHER: I -- I don't think one can judge a government until it's formed, until it starts taking action. We have made the point -- I made it again today -- that as he forms a cabinet, it needs to be a cabinet that is committed to progress, and that the cabinet needs to make clear its opposition to all forms of terrorism and its desire to move forward in a peaceful manner to achieving a Palestinian state.

Q Can you tell us why Mr. -- I'm sorry, go ahead --

Q No, no. Go ahead.

Q -- why Mr. Armitage has decided not to go -- not to carry through on what he said were his plans to go to the Middle East.

MR. BOUCHER: (Laughs.) The -- the deputy secretary talked to you all, I think, or talked to various media about the prospects of a trip. As it came to putting together that trip, there were questions of scheduling, there were questions of timing, there were questions of formation of the Palestinian government, and we're coming right up on the General Assembly, when most of the people will be traveling to New York, anyway. So in the end it was impossible to put together the kind of trip he was looking at in this immediate time frame and thought it was better to postpone it till later.

Q What kind of trip was he looking at? Was it a sort of Middle East peace process trip, or was it more -- he said "Arab capitals" --

MR. BOUCHER: He was looking at a number of stops, and will continue to look at a number of stops as we -- as we think about a later trip.

Q Are you thinking he will possible take a trip later this year, or is it sort of --

MR. BOUCHER: I'd expect something later in the fall, yeah. That's what they're thinking about now.

Okay.

Q Could all this happen with Arafat on the premises? All the things the U.S. wants to see happen? Like -- like security forces under one command?

MR. BOUCHER: Yes. It's a question of will. It's a question of desire. It's a question of --

Q Whose will?

MR. BOUCHER: The will of all the people in the Palestinian community. The Palestinian legislature obviously has a lot of say over powers. The individuals involved in the political process have a lot of say over the powers. I think we're pointing to objective fact that we hope others would realize, that we're not going to make progress on the Palestinian agenda until the Palestinians make progress in eliminating the terrorist groups.

Q And so, I -- I guess that means the administration position on exile hasn't changed.

MR. BOUCHER: It hasn't changed. The secretary re-stated it on Sunday.

Q Okay.

MR. BOUCHER: Yeah.

Joel.

Q Richard, nearby in Syria the government has been shuffled there. Do you in talking to Bashir there, do you expect the same type thing in the formation of their new government?

MR. BOUCHER: Nothing in particular to say about that situation, no.

Q Is the prime minister urging that the -- Assad seems to be following through. He said he needed a more reform-minded government, and --

MR. BOUCHER: We'll -- we'll see what emerges. I -- I don't have anything to say at this moment.

Yeah.

Q Richard, if I can just go back to Arafat for one minute, please. I know you've said this before, but in light of the latest attacks, why does the U.S. believe that expelling Arafat is not the solution to the current impasse crisis?

MR. BOUCHER: For the reasons the secretary said on TV on Saturday -- Sunday.

Q If -- if you could just -- (laughter).

MR. BOUCHER: (Laughs.)

Q Short summary. Thirty-five seconds.

Q Preferably 10. (Laughter.)

MR. BOUCHER: Six and a half. I don't -- I don't have the transcripts with me. I --

The -- the United States has made clear our view that Arafat is not part of the solution, he's part of the problem. But at the same time as, I think, the secretary has made clear, the -- the Israelis need to think about potential actions, this discussion of expelling Arafat, because we don't see how it would be any better if he was outside the country working the capitals of the world. Pretty much the way he put it.

Sir.

Q So do you believe he would be more vocal and more extreme? So keeping him in the occupied territory will contain him? That's what we understand?

MR. BOUCHER: I -- we don't understand it one way or the other. We just don't see how it would help the situation or help anybody move forward towards a more peaceful situation for Israelis and Palestinians alike.

Sir.

Q Do you think Arafat should be (confined ?) to Ramallah?

MR. BOUCHER: I'm not going to dictate any particular treatment or location. We don't spend a whole lot of time worrying about Mr. Arafat anymore.

Nayyar?

Q Yes, sir. Nayyar Zaidi again. What --

MR. BOUCHER: I know. (Laughter.)

Q Yeah. Well, I was looking for the -- (laughs). So Mr. Arafat, we keep hearing, you know, various solutions to getting him out of the way. And what kind of obstruction is he putting up to the peace process? I mean, he has been a leader for, God knows, 35 years. And he should have the cause of Palestinians at heart. So what kind of political or other obstructions is he putting up that people are saying that he is part of the problem?

MR. BOUCHER: I think -- first of all, we've talked about this --

Q Yeah.

MR. BOUCHER: -- many times over many years, including in the president's speech last -- a year ago June 24th. The most recent question that's come up is whether or not he's going to allow the control and consolidation of the security services under a government that was chosen by the Palestinian legislature to take authority for the Palestinian Authority.

Q You took from him the financial control, now you want security. He will be left with nothing.

MR. BOUCHER: You sound like we're picking his pocket. (Laughter.) We're not.

The Palestinians are establishing institutions that can support a state. Let's not forget what this is all about; it's about creating a Palestinian state to take responsibility in its own areas, that can have responsibility vis-a-vis its own people and vis-a-vis its neighbors. If you're going to create those institutions, you have to operate on a transparent, and solid and legal basis. And that's what the Palestinian legislature has tried to do in giving the authorities to the government, that's what the Palestinian government has done in terms of finance, and that's what the Palestinian government needs to do in terms of security, as well.

You can't have a government competing with armed groups. No country has a government that has to rival other armed groups for control of the security situation -- at least not voluntarily. And therefore, if we're talking about creating institutions that can support a Palestinian state, we're talking about a Palestinian government that can take responsibility in all areas of government.

Terri?

Q Different subject?

MR. BOUCHER: Yes.

Q What's your reaction to the Security Council deciding to postpone the Libya vote -- the Lockerbie vote, the Libya vote?

MR. BOUCHER: As you noted, yesterday the Security Council went on record publicly in adopting an agenda item that includes a vote on the resolution to lift U.N. sanctions on Libya. That meeting will now convene on Friday, September 12th at 10:30 in the morning. The United States agreed to this formal procedural motion, essentially allowing a short additional period of time, while at the same time making the council's intent to vote on Friday in order to resolve the matter in a way that would ultimately result in adoption of the resolution. Nevertheless, we're very disappointed that the vote did not take place yesterday.

Our hearts go out to the victims -- to the families of the victims of the Lockerbie bombing, who have been waiting so patiently for some closure. We strongly regret that the families were faced with a situation of having to wait again, for the fourth time, for a vote in order to avoid a French veto of this resolution. We do think the time is past due for bringing this resolution to a vote, but given the circumstances in the council yesterday, we feel this is the best that could be worked out. We're satisfied that there is a strong commitment on the part of council members to proceed to a vote this coming Friday.

I'd note also that later yesterday, Ambassador Negroponte, along with U.K. Ambassador Jones Parry and the Bulgarian Ambassador Tafrov, met with the victims' families at the U.S. mission to confer and discuss the situation.

Q Has France given you any indications that it will not veto on Friday?

MR. BOUCHER: I'm not aware of anything like that. You'd have to ask the French what their intentions are.

Q Is this a final date, Richard, or is there a chance (of it ?) being postponed again?

MR. BOUCHER: This is a firmly-scheduled agenda item. It's a firm schedule for a vote, which we have not had before - when this was postponed before. There was a discussion, there was an unwritten understanding, there were things like that that were postponed. This is a much more firm commitment than we've had before. I suppose the council, in its infinite wisdom, can decide to do what it wants if it desires. But this is a more -- a much clearer commitment than we've had before.

Sir?

Q (Off mike) -- indication that they can reach a deal with the Libyans by Friday, or they think they can reach a deal with the Libyans by Friday?

MR. BOUCHER: Again, that will be something you'll have to ask the French, if they think they can get some additional compensation or whatever for the families of the UTA bombing. Of course, we have every sympathy with their attempts to do so. We just don't think the families of the Pan-Am 103 bombing should be forced to wait again and again.

Q Just so we're all current on the security issue in the Palestinian situation, on the one hand, the U.S. is clear what they want: unified command; on the other, you don't want to micro-manage Palestinian matters. Mr. Wolf's out there, and his speciality was to -- or, is to promote a better security situation. Is he involved, or is he -- is he there on call to deal with the mechanics of this, if it would be helpful, consolidating at all, lending his special expertise?

MR. BOUCHER: The -- I wouldn't describe his role as that way. I wouldn't say he's the mechanic here. The mechanics have to be put together by the people who are going to run the Palestinian government. The politics have to be put together by the people who are going to run the Palestinian government. And the effective use of the institutions have to be -- has to be handled by the people who are going to run the Palestinian government. Obviously, the United States has long had an important role in conferring with both sides about security issues, in talking to them about their plans, in hearing from them what their plans are, particularly their plans to move against terrorism. But the organization and the determination need to come from the Palestinian side.

Okay?

Q Richard, we've had a Rewards for Justice-type program. Is there something comparable that you'd like to see in the Middle East, so that some of these so-called terrorists would be deactivated?

MR. BOUCHER: The United States Rewards for Justice program has always applied to American citizens who have died because of -- or to the -- to those who have killed American citizens, regardless of where it's happened. So in some cases in the Middle East, it already applies.

Q New subject?

MR. BOUCHER: Yeah.

Q Richard, to your -- does the U.S. government have an assessment of whether the North Korean nuclear facilities at Yongbyon are still active?

MR. BOUCHER: No, I don't have one that I can share with you.

Q Okay. Are you aware that there's a Japanese news report suggesting that a senior State Department official yesterday told legislators on the Hill that it's your assessment that that plant has ceased the activity that was detected earlier this year?

MR. BOUCHER: I don't have any assessment that I can share with you.

Yeah, sir?

Q Change of subject. Geneva.

MR. BOUCHER: Please. Quickly.

Q Geneva. Anything more you can tell us about the agenda for that?

MR. BOUCHER: Let me sort of walk to Geneva by reviewing where we are generally on the resolution, first, so you'll understand the context that Geneva comes in.

We've been continuing to discuss our draft resolution with other members of the Security Council in New York, in Washington and in capitals. There was a meeting -- informal meeting yesterday afternoon with the permanent five members of the Security Council. At that meeting, we got some feedback on our draft. As I think has been reported, we heard from the French on proposed amendments to the text. The Russians offered us a separate set of suggestions.

We're reviewing those proposals. We'll respond after further internal consultations. This is the normal process that one goes through negotiating a Security Council resolution.

There are no additional meetings planned for New York prior to the secretary's trip to Geneva on Saturday. We will keep in touch with other delegations and other governments, however, in other ways.

The secretary spoke this morning with Foreign Minister Ivanov of Russia. He also spoke with Secretary-General Kofi Annan. The discussion with Ivanov was -- I would describe it as a good and constructive exchange on the resolution and the elements of the resolution. We certainly welcome the work that we've been able to do with Russians so far on that matter.

We're also working with Secretary-General Annan to prepare for a good meeting, a meeting in Geneva on Saturday.

As I think we've said before, we see it as an informal discussion among the Perm 5 and the secretary-general to discuss the situation in Iraq and discuss ideas about the resolution. We would expect the discussion to be about the concepts of how we go forward in the resolution and generally with the United Nations on Iraq, not a negotiation of the text itself.

As the president and the secretary have both stated, we're committed to advancing the cause of the resolution. And if the Geneva meeting can move the process forward, then we're willing to do what we can, through that meeting and through our discussions in New York, to get to a satisfactory conclusion to these negotiations.

Q Can you go a step further -- (off mike)? I know you don't usually want to get into conversations, but Russia's position has been interpreted by some people as supportive and by other reporters as a little skeptical. Would you put them in the "helpful" column?

MR. BOUCHER: (Chuckles.) I don't --

Q They're not with France and Germany, for instance, are they?

MR. BOUCHER: I don't think we've quite done all the columns on this one yet. The views are still coming in.

What I would note is that the Russian -- Russia's -- we've had a separate dialogue with Russia, than with France and Germany. We've had some separate discussions with Germany as well.

Our -- I'm not going to try to negotiate the specific ideas or proposals from different countries in a public forum, but I would say that we found the discussion with Russia very productive or constructive.

The comments on the substance that I would make are sort of our approach to the situation. We think that all council members do share essentially the same objective. That's to help Iraq and the Iraqi people exercise their full sovereignty as quickly as possible. The differences in the council, we think, should relate to the steps that need to be taken to get there. That's where the discussion should focus.

Proposals have to be grounded in the reality of the current situation. The -- you can't pretend the war never happened. You can't pretend the coalition never happened. You can't pretend that the Iraqis have not already made considerable progress under the Governing Council and that what we need to do is work with them, build on that progress and see how all of us can help.

Our proposal takes as a point of departure the reality of the situation: that the coalition is already working with the allies -- where the coalition is already working with the Governing Council, the Iraqis, to move forward in -- towards constitution and elections, and also to move forward on the exercise of sovereignty.

The point is not to argue either about which foreigner's going to take control in Iraq. The point is to go out and look and see what we can all do to support the Iraqis as they go forward in that process.

I would note also a press conference statement by the secretary-general two days ago, where he said it's not so much for the U.N. to go in and take over the administration or management of Iraq, but for us to ensure that we accelerate the establishment of a government and the transfer of authority and to have the Iraqis run their own affairs, as indicated in the Security Council resolution. That's what we would hope all parties would be prepared to go talk about in Geneva.

Terri?

Q You haven't mentioned the Chinese at all. Have there been discussions recently? How long ago did Secretary Powell speak with his --

MR. BOUCHER: The secretary talked to the Chinese foreign minister -- about a week ago?

STAFF: (Off mike.)

Q Last week? Right.

MR. BOUCHER: Yeah, last week. We -- certainly they've been participating and speaking up at the Perm Five meeting that took place yesterday and the other discussions in New York. I'm not trying to convey views on behalf of all those who have views. We've also had specific comments and constructive discussions with the British, with the Spanish, and probably with several others who I should probably mention but can't remember. So we've had some very specific discussions, heard specific proposals and constructive ones from a number of countries.

Q Have the Chinese given you a list of suggested --

MR. BOUCHER: I'm not aware that they have, but if you want a whole list of who's given us specifics, I think you'd have to check with the countries.

Q The P-5.

MR. BOUCHER: Well, if you want a whole list of the P-5 members who've presented changes, I'll have to demur on that, too, because I'm just not sure I've got the whole list.

Okay. Andrea?

Q Richard, can you help us understand what it is that these other governments are to get out of essentially contributing, you know, thousands of their own troops, who could potentially become cannon fodder for these terrorists, and allowing them to pitch in with various NGOs? What is it that they are supposed to get out of, you know, this whole participatory process?

MR. BOUCHER: A safer world. A better environment for their children and grandchildren to grow up in. I think, despite differences over the war itself, that most countries recognize that building of a stable Iraq that has representative government can be an important element in building a more stable region. It's important to their security that this process succeed, whether or not they agreed with going to war in the first place.

And I think we've actually had that and heard that and seen that in public from statements of various governments.

And the governments that are considering contributing troops or who are contributing troops, governments that are contributing money or are considering contributing money, the governments who are supporting or considering supporting U.N. resolutions, I'm sure are looking at it from their own point of view; that it's better for them in the long run for this process to succeed in Iraq than to have Iraq go back to being some kind of source of instability. Certainly, the United States has made that decision, and the president expressed that decision quite clearly on Sunday night when he asked for not only the commitment to do so, but the money to do so, as well.

Q Does the U.S. believe, then, that without the help of the international community beyond the countries that are already participating, that this process is destined to fail?

MR. BOUCHER: No. The president expressed our commitment to succeed. It's --

Q No, I understand. But you're reaching out to the international community, so I'm just wondering if the U.S. believes that without the additional troops, without the additional money, that it can't succeed?

MR. BOUCHER: No. The president expressed our commitment to succeed, and we are going to succeed in this. He also made clear there's an opportunity for others to take steps that contribute to their own security, that contribute to their own well-being and that contribute to the well-being of the people of Iraq.

Terri?

Q Change of subject. Vienna. How's it going with the new resolution? Does it look like you're going to get it passed?

MR. BOUCHER: Discussions continue in Vienna. I'm not sure there's any update. It's also not clear exactly when the vote might be, but I don't -- I was going to say, I don't think it will be today.

We're still working actively with other members on the strongest possible board resolution. France, Germany and the United Kingdom have jointly proposed a draft board resolution on Iran that highlights the international community's concerns. The resolution calls on Iran to take essential and urgent steps to answer fully the unresolved questions from the agency, to cooperate fully with the agency's ongoing investigation and to take these actions by the end of October. We strongly support these objectives, and I think as you know, we've worked with them in developing this resolution.

Negotiations are continuing today in Vienna, so we'll see where that leads to in terms of a vote and a text.

We would say once again that Dr. ElBaradei's June and August reports on Iran clearly confirm that Iran has failed to meet its obligations under its safeguards agreement.

We believe the director-general's reports provided compelling evidence of Iran's non-compliance with its obligations.

Got one more. We got one or two more back here.

Q In Indonesia --

MR. BOUCHER: Yeah.

Q In Indonesia, the person responsible for the Bali bombings last year was sentenced to death today. Do you have any reaction to this --

MR. BOUCHER: I think this is second, or maybe more, sentencing involving the Bali bombings. And we commend the government of Indonesia for the professional manner in which it conducted this trial. The court sentenced this Imam Samdura (sic - should be Samudra) for his role in planning and executing the bombing. This was the worst act of terrorism since September 11th, the attacks in the United States. And we once again extend our sympathy to the families. Bringing the perpetrators to justice is an important step in ensuring that whatever happened -- that what happened in Bali is not repeated.

Okay. Let's do these two, three, four.

Q I was hoping you could respond to some remarks published today by Joschka Fischer in a German magazine calling the U.S. post-war policy in Iraq a complete failure.

MR. BOUCHER: I haven't seen those remarks. I want to see how said it and where he said it and what the context was. Obviously, that's not the way we would characterize the situation.

Q On the case of Charles Li, do you have any updates on that?

MR. BOUCHER: U.S. embassy officials in Beijing spoke with Ministry of Foreign Affairs officials on September 8th concerning imprisoned American Chuck Li. This was one of several matters involving U.S. prisoners which was discussed. The conversation was one of the many opportunities that embassy and consular officials in China have taken to express our continuing interest in Mr. Li's welfare and his well-being while he remains in custody serving his sentence. We last spoke to him directly on August 15th, the last visit was in early August. We have spoken with him, or met with him 10 times in the last three months.

Q Who requested this meeting?

MR. BOUCHER: I'll have to check on that. I think we went in to talk to him about a number of cases.

Q Does that meeting has anything to do with the genocide lawsuit filed by the Falun Gong practitioner around the world?

MR. BOUCHER: Not that I'm aware of.

Sir?

Q Any reaction on the Cuba vote last night in the House? And can you say more generally why the administration feels so strongly about this that it's fair to (have issued ?) a veto threat?

MR. BOUCHER: The administration position is available on the White House web site, the statement of the administration position. So -- I assume you've already seen that? All right.

So, let me -- for others who haven't seen that, go to the White House website and search on SAP and you can find the position on that. The basic rationale is that providing material benefit to a regime which only six months ago undertook the most significant act of political repression in the Americas in a decade strikes us as deeply unwise.

I had one more, I guess. Sir?

Q A brigadier general in Burma has said that if they do release Aung San Suu Kyi, it would cause instability, and they said they could face protests. They don't want to release her because of that, and you've criticized that in the last week. Is -- are you putting more pressure on the military --

MR. BOUCHER: I hadn't seen those remarks. They're obviously ridiculous. And we'll continue to work with others in the international community to try to see that she and her followers are freed from this detention.

Q Thank you.

Q One more.

MR. BOUCHER: One more. Sorry.

Do you want to ask one more there, ma'am?

Q Yes.

MR. BOUCHER: A late hand.

Q Do you know what's happened to the military and weapons expert who was arrested in China? He was trying to defect to Australia.

MR. BOUCHER: I haven't heard that story. Sorry.

Q Okay. Thanks.

END

LOAD-DATE: September 12, 2003

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

TYPE: International News

291 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

September 10, 2003

Daily Press Briefing for Sept. 10

SECTION: STATE DEPARTMENT BRIEFINGS

LENGTH: 5912 words

Richard Boucher, Spokesman

Washington, DC

September 10, 2003

TRANSCRIPT:

MR. BOUCHER: I'm happy to see you all here, and I have one thing that I do want to talk about, and that's trafficking in persons. The White House has put out a short statement to indicate the President has notified Congress that 10 countries that were on the tier three, the Trafficking in Persons list from earlier this year, have made significant progress and therefore are being moved up to tier two, and thereby have avoided possible sanctions under the Trafficking Victims Protection Act.

This is in recognition of their quick work to address problems that existed with regard to their trafficking in persons policy, and so we are very pleased today to announce that this excellent progress has been made in these countries and that the United States has worked very closely with these countries over the past three months to achieve it.

There's been several months of very intensive effort on behalf of diplomats in the field and foreign governments that have made the commitment to fighting trafficking in persons more effective. These efforts merited raising our ratings on the countries, on these ten countries' anti-trafficking performance. The 10 countries are: Belize, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Dominican Republic, Georgia, Greece, Haiti, Kazakhstan, Suriname, Turkey and Uzbekistan. All these countries have made important progress. Some have passed legislation. Victims' support programs have been started. They've arrested and prosecuting traffickers. There have been public service announcements and awareness campaigns. In every one of these countries, public officials spoke out on this important human rights issue.

This is the first year that the President was required by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act to make determinations regarding countries placed on tier three in the report, and sanctions were required. Unfortunately, there are still five countries that did not make improvements and are still in the tier three, under the tier three standard. Those countries are Burma, Cuba, Liberia, North Korea and Sudan.

The President, acting on the recommendations of the Secretary, determined that sanctions will be imposed on Burma, Cuba and North Korea. While Liberia and Sudan are also subject to sanctions, the President determined that certain multilateral assistance for these two countries would promote the purposes of the act or is otherwise in our national interest, and so he has made the appropriate determinations that some certain bilateral -- multilateral assistance can continue. In the case of Sudan, that's assistance -- excuse me. In the case of Sudan, this means assistance that would support a peace accord. In both cases, I would point out that humanitarian assistance is not affected.

So that is a determination that the President has notified the Congress of based on recommendations he received from the Secretary of State, and I think a remarkable amount of progress that we've been able to make in three months through effective diplomacy using the Act and the effort of our diplomats and the effort of foreign countries to really address a very important issue.

So, with that, I'd be glad to take your questions on this or other matters.

QUESTION: Not on this.

MR. BOUCHER: Start on this? Any particulars?

(No response.)

MR. BOUCHER: All right. For those who are interested, we'll put out a more complete statement and the Press Office will have more specific information.

QUESTION: The President is withholding a judgment on the new Palestinian Prime Minister. I wondered if here at State there's any indication of who might be in the cabinet, and how important is it who he appoints, for instance, as security or interior minister?

MR. BOUCHER: Well, we note that that process -- we note that he has accepted the nomination or the request to form a cabinet and that the process of cabinet formation has begun. As I think the President made some reference to and the White House has said, it's essential the next Prime Minister have the authority and the control of the security forces and the finances of the Palestinian Authority to stop terrorist organizations such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad. The issue is taking action to fight terror.

So we urge that Mr. Qureia's cabinet appointments reflect candidates free from associations with terror and violence, committed to acting decisively on reform, and peace negotiations that will benefit all Palestinians. I understand the way it works, he has three weeks to form a cabinet and, if he needs it, can get a further two-week extension.

A new Palestinian cabinet must make clear its opposition to all forms of terrorism, demand that all acts of terrorism cease, and insist that terrorists and military organizations not under the control of Palestinian Authority be disarmed and dismantled.

Our representatives in the region have continued their meetings. Our Acting Consulate General Jeff Feltman has met with Mr. Qureia today again. He and Ambassador Wolf have continued to meet and speak with a wide variety of Israeli and Palestinian officials on a daily basis and to encourage both sides to recommit themselves to finding a way forward toward the President's two-state vision.

Christophe.

QUESTION: Prime Minister Qureia is proposing to create a kind of national council for security in charge of supervising all the security agencies. Does it seem to you a good idea, this step?

MR. BOUCHER: I don't think it's for us to specify the exact governing arrangements. The point that we've made is there needs to be a commitment, there needs to be authority, and there needs to be resources in the hands of the government to be able to effectively use the security services against the terrorist organizations. It will be for them to figure out how exactly that can be done.

Sir.

QUESTION: Yes, this is Nayyar Zaidi from Daily Jang in Pakistan. I didn't know we would move so fast to Middle East, but I want to go back to the trafficking in persons.

MR. BOUCHER: Yes.

QUESTION: This trafficking obviously involves trafficking abroad, like exporting human beings to other countries, or is it only internal?

MR. BOUCHER: No, it's all forms of forced labor, forced prostitution, trafficking in persons. I think there are estimates, you know, of 50,000 people who are trafficked into the United States. So it's just -- it's a problem for countries where people are being taken, it's a problem for countries where they're showing up, and it's a problem that we think the whole world needs to work together against.

QUESTION: Yeah, this is what I was coming to. Is United States the only country, or is it in Europe, number one?

And number two, in case of, say, nuclear technology, we fault the person who has exported the technology and the person who imported it. Now, in this case, are the countries which are getting these people, like 50,000 in United States, are taking any responsibility?

MR. BOUCHER: These are the countries covered in the report. They are placed in different categories. Okay? It covers any country in the world where this problem exists in one form or the other is covered. Every country is expected to take action, whether people are trafficked out of that country or into that country, or within that country. There may be forced labor in some of these cases inside the country where we do expect people to take action against the -- take the government -- governments to take action.

The United States has passed comprehensive legislation, the United States has taken any number of steps of public awareness, of law enforcement action, arrest, prosecution, and we are acting domestically as well as through the domestic agencies, as well as part of our international agenda to work with other governments so we can effectively all fight this problem wherever it exists.

Okay?

QUESTION: Do you know, coming back to the Middle East for a second, the President called for the Prime Minister-designate to get control of all of the security forces and unleash them on the militants. Absent his ability to do that, are you simply reconciled to the prospect of continuing violence? Do you see any other options, policy options, for you?

MR. BOUCHER: The question is sort of -- I need to separate out the pieces, because it's really three different questions. Are we -- you know, absent his ability to do that, to get control of security services, I think I would complete the sentence by saying, "Absent the ability of the government to get control of the security services and use them effectively against terrorist groups, it will be impossible to make progress on the roadmap, to make progress towards the two-state vision, to achieve what the Palestinian people say they want, which is to build the institutions of their own state."

So, absent progress on security, we really think it's -- we don't see how you can make progress on creating a Palestinian state and that these bombers, in addition to harming innocent people, have harmed the lives of Palestinians, but have also harmed the ability of Palestinians to achieve their dreams and their aspirations.

The second part is: Are we reconciled to continuing violence, if this doesn't happen the way we want? And I think the answer has to be no, we'll continue to work against violence. But -- or is there any other way? I think we've also made clear that we don't think there's any other way. The roadmap lays out how to achieve the President's vision of two states living side by side. As the President noted again this morning, the roadmap is there as the mechanism to achieve that vision, and we need to -- we need to continue to focus on the steps that both sides need to take as we move forward, the key one at this juncture we think being to end the activities of these violence groups.

QUESTION: Do you get the sense from what he has said so far, that he has any intention of getting a grip on the security services?

MR. BOUCHER: I don't think one can judge a government until it's formed, until it starts taking action. But we have made the point -- I made it again today -- that as he forms the cabinet, it needs to be a cabinet that is committed to progress, and that the cabinet needs to make clear it's opposition to all forms of terrorism, and its desire to move forward in a peaceful manner to achieving a Palestinian state.

QUESTION: Can you tell us why Mr. -- I'm sorry, go ahead --

QUESTION: No, no.

QUESTION: Why Mr. Armitage has decided not go, not to carry through on what he said were his plans to go to the Middle East?

MR. BOUCHER: The Deputy Secretary talked to you all, I think, or talked to various media about the prospects of a trip. As it came to putting together that trip, there were questions of scheduling, there were questions of timing, there were questions of formation of the Palestinian Government, and we're coming right up on the General Assembly, when most of the people will be traveling to New York anyway. So, in the end, it wasn't possible to put together the kind of trip he was looking at in this immediate time frame and thought it was better to postpone it till later.

QUESTION: What kind of trip was he looking at? Was it a sort of Middle East peace process trip, or was it more Arab capitals or --

MR. BOUCHER: He was looking at a number of stops, and will continue to look at a number of stops as we think about a later trip.

QUESTION: Are you thinking he will possibly take a trip later this year, or is it sort of --

MR. BOUCHER: I'd expect something later in the fall, yeah. That's what they're thinking about now, yeah.

QUESTION: Can all this happen with Arafat on the premises, all the things the U.S. wants to see happen, like security forces under one command?

MR. BOUCHER: Yes. It's a question of will, it's a question of desire, it's a question of --

QUESTION: Whose will?

MR. BOUCHER: The will of all the people in the Palestinian community. The Palestinian legislature obviously has a lot of say over powers. The individuals involved in the political process have a lot of say over the powers. I think we're pointing to objective fact that we hope others would realize, that we're not going to make progress on the Palestinian agenda until the Palestinians make progress in eliminating the terrorist groups.

QUESTION: So I guess that means the administration's position on exile hasn't changed.

MR. BOUCHER: Hasn't changed. The Secretary restated it on Sunday.

Joel.

QUESTION: Richard, nearby in Syria, the government has been shuffled there. Do you, in talking to Bashar there, do you expect the same type thing in the formation of their new government?

MR. BOUCHER: Nothing particular to say about that situation, no.

QUESTION: Do you find it encouraging that Assad seems to be following through? He said he needed a more reform-minded government in --

MR. BOUCHER: We'll see what emerges. I don't have anything to say at this moment.

QUESTION: Richard, if I could just go back to Arafat for one minute, please. I know you've said this before, but in light of the latest attacks, why does the U.S. believe that expelling Arafat is not the solution to the current impasse, crisis?

MR. BOUCHER: For the reasons the Secretary said on TV on Saturday -- Sunday.

QUESTION: Well, if you could just -- (laughter).

QUESTION: For 35 seconds.

QUESTION: Preferably ten. (Laughter.)

MR. BOUCHER: Six and a half. I don't -- I don't have the transcripts with me.

The United States has made clear our view that Arafat is not part of the solution, he's part of the problem. But at the same time, as I think the Secretary has made clear, the Israelis need to think about potential actions, this discussion of expelling Arafat, because we don't see how it would be any better if he was outside the country working the capitals of the world. Pretty much the way he put it.

Sir.

QUESTION: He would be more vocal and more extreme, so keeping him in the occupied territory will contain him? That's what we understand?

MR. BOUCHER: We don't understand it one way or the other. We just don't see how it would help the situation or help anybody move forward towards a more peaceful situation for Israelis and Palestinians alike.

Sir.

QUESTION: Is it better than being confined to Ramallah?

MR. BOUCHER: I'm not going to dictate any particular treatment or location. We don't spend a whole lot of time worrying about Mr. Arafat any more.

QUESTION: Yes, sir, Nayyar Zaidi again.

MR. BOUCHER: I know. (Laughter.)

QUESTION: Well, I was looking for that. (Laughter.)

So, Mr. Arafat, we keeping hearing, you know, various solutions to getting him out of the way, and what kind of obstruction is he putting up to the peace process? I mean, he has been a leader, for, God knows, 35 years, and he should have the cause of Palestinians at heart. So what kind of political or other obstructions is he putting up that people are saying that he is part of the problem?

MR. BOUCHER: I think, first of all, we've talked about this many times over many years, including in the President's speech last -- a year ago, June 24th. The most recent question that's come up is whether or not he is going to allow the control and consolidation of the security services under a government that was chosen by the Palestinian legislature to take authority for the Palestinian Authority.

QUESTION: You took from him the financial control. Now you want security. He will be left with nothing.

MR. BOUCHER: You sound like we're picking his pocket. (Laughter.) We're not.

The Palestinians are establishing institutions that can support a state. Let's not forget what this is all about. This is about creating a Palestinian state that can take responsibility in its own areas, that can have responsibility vis-a-vis its own people and vis-a-vis its neighbors.

If you're going to create those institutions, you have to operate on a transparent and solid and legal basis, and that's what the Palestinian legislature has tried to do in giving the authorities to the government, that's what the Palestinian Government has done in terms of finance, and that's what the Palestinian Government needs to do in terms of security as well. You can't have a government competing with armed groups. No country has a government that has to rival other armed groups for control of the security situation, at least not voluntarily. And therefore, if we're talking about creating institutions that can support a Palestinian state, we're talking about a Palestinian Government that can take responsibility in all areas of government.

QUESTION: New subject? What's your reaction to the Security Council deciding to postpone the Libya vote -- Lockerbie vote, the Libya vote?

MR. BOUCHER: As you noted yesterday, the Security Council went on record publicly in adopting an agenda item that includes a vote on the resolution to lift UN sanctions on Libya. That meeting will now convene on Friday, September 12th, at 10: 30 in the morning.

The United States agreed to this formal procedural motion essentially allowing a short additional period of time while, at the same time, making the Council's intent to vote on Friday in order to resolve the matter in a way that would ultimately result in adoption of the resolution.

Nevertheless, we are very disappointed that the vote did not take place yesterday. Our hearts go out to the victims of -- to the families of the victims of the Lockerbie bombing who have been waiting so patiently for some closure.

We strongly regret that the families were faced with the situation of having to wait again, for the fourth time, for a vote in order to avoid a French veto of this resolution. We do think the time is past due for bringing this resolution to a vote, but given the circumstances in the Council yesterday feel that this is the best that could be worked out.

We are satisfied that there is a strong commitment on the part of Council members to proceed to a vote this coming Friday.

I would note also that later yesterday Ambassador Negroponte, along with UK Ambassador Jones Parry and the Bulgarian Ambassador Tafrov met with the victims' families at the U.S. Mission to confer and discuss the situation.

QUESTION: Has France given you any indications that it will not veto on Friday?

MR. BOUCHER: I am not aware of anything like that. You'd have to ask the French what their intentions are.

QUESTION: Is this the final date, Richard, or is there a chance it will be postponed again?

MR. BOUCHER: This is a firmly scheduled agenda item. It's a firm schedule for a vote, which we have not had before when this was postponed before. There was discussion, there was an unwritten understanding, there were things like that that were postponed. This is a much more firm commitment than we've had before. I suppose the Council, in its infinite wisdom, can decide to do what it wants, if it desires, but this is a more -- a much clearer commitment than we've had before.

Sir.

QUESTION: Do you have any indication that they can reach a deal with the Libyans by Friday, or they think they can reach a deal with the Libyans by Friday?

MR. BOUCHER: Again, that will be something you'll have to ask the French if they think they can get some additional compensation or whatever for the families of the UTA bombing. Of course, we have every sympathy with their attempts to do so. We just don't think the families of the Pan Am 103 bombing should be forced to wait again and again.

QUESTION: (Inaudible) on the security issue in the Palestinian situation. On the one hand, the U.S. is clear what they want, unified command; on the other, you don't want to micromanage Palestinian matters. Mr. Wolf is out there and his specialty was to -- or is -- to promote a better security situation. Is he involved, or is he -- is he there on call to deal with the mechanics of this if it would be helpful -- consolidating it all, lending his special expertise?

MR. BOUCHER: The -- I wouldn't describe his role as that way. I wouldn't say he's the mechanic here. The mechanics have to be put together by the people who are going to run the Palestinian Government, the politics have to be put together by the people who are going to run the Palestinian Government, and the effective use of the institutions have to be -- has to be handled by the people who are going to run the Palestinian Government.

Obviously, the United States has long had an important role in conferring with both sides about security issues and talking to them about their plans and hearing from them what their plans are, particularly their plans to move against terrorism. But the organization and the determination need to come from the Palestinian side.

QUESTION: Richard, we've had a Rewards for Justice-type program. Is there something comparable that we'd like to see in the Middle East so that some of these so-called terrorists would be deactivated?

MR. BOUCHER: The United States Rewards for Justice Program has always applied to American citizens who have died because of -- or to those who have killed American citizens, regardless of where it's happened. So, in some cases, in the Middle East it already applies.

QUESTION: New subject?

MR. BOUCHER: Yes.

QUESTION: Richard, does the U.S. Government have an assessment of whether the North Korean nuclear facilities at Yongbyon are still active?

MR. BOUCHER: No, I don't have one that I can share with you.

QUESTION: Are you aware that there's a Japanese news report suggesting that a senior State Department official yesterday told legislators on the Hill that it's your assessment that that plant has ceased the activity that was detected earlier this year?

MR. BOUCHER: I don't have any assessment that I can share with you.

Sir.

QUESTION: Change of subject. Geneva?

MR. BOUCHER: Yes. Quickly.

QUESTION: Geneva? Anything you can tell us about the agenda for that?

MR. BOUCHER: Let me sort of walk to Geneva by reviewing where we are generally on the resolution first so you'll understand the context that Geneva comes in.

We've been continuing to discuss our draft resolution with other members of the Security Council in New York, in Washington, and in capitals. There was a meeting, informal meeting yesterday afternoon, of the Permanent 5 members of the Security Council. At that meeting we got some feedback on our draft, as I think has been reported. We heard from the French on proposed amendments to the text. The Russians offered us a separate set of suggestions.

We are reviewing those proposals. We'll respond after further internal consultations. This is the normal process that one goes through negotiating a Security Council resolution. There are no additional meetings planned for New York prior to the Secretary's trip to Geneva on Saturday. We will keep in touch with other delegations and other governments, however, in other ways.

The Secretary spoke this morning with Foreign Minister Ivanov of Russia. He also spoke with Secretary General Kofi Annan. The discussion with Ivanov was, I would describe it as a good and constructive exchange on the resolution, and the elements of the resolution. We certainly welcome the work that we've been able to do with the Russians so far on that matter.

We're also working with Secretary General Annan to prepare for a group meeting, a meeting in Geneva on Saturday. As I think we've said before, we see it as an informal discussion among the Perm 5 and the Secretary General to discuss the situation in Iraq, and discuss ideas about the resolution. We would expect the discussion to be about the concepts of how we go forward in the resolution, and generally with the United Nations on Iraq, not a negotiation of the text itself.

As the President and the Secretary have both stated, we're committed to advancing the cause of the resolution, and if the Geneva meeting can move the process forward, then we're willing to do what we can through that meeting, and through our discussions in New York, to get to a satisfactory conclusion to these negotiations.

QUESTION: Can you go a step a step further on Ivanov? I know you don't usually want to get into conversations, but Russia's position has been interpreted by some people as supportive, and by other reporters as a little skeptical. Would you put him in the helpful column? I mean, they're not with France and Germany, for instance, are they?

MR. BOUCHER: I don't think we've quite done all the columns on this one yet. The views are still coming in. What I would note is that the Russian -- Russia is -- we've had a separate dialogue with Russia than with France and Germany. We've had some separate discussions with Germany as well. Our -- I'm not going to try to negotiate specific ideas or proposals from different countries in a public forum, but I would say that we found the discussion with Russia very productive, constructive.

The comments on the substance that I would make are sort of our approach to the situation. We think that all Council members do share essentially the same objective as to help Iraq and the Iraqi people exercise their full sovereignty as quickly as possible. The difference is, in the Council, we think, should relate to the steps that need to be taken to get there. That's where the discussion should focus. Proposals have to be grounded in the reality of the current situation. You can't pretend the war never happened, you can't pretend the coalition never happened, you can't pretend that the Iraqis have not already made considerable progress under the Governing Council, and what we need to do is work with them, build on that progress, and see how all of this can help.

Our proposal takes as a point of departure, the reality of the situation, that the coalition is already working with the allies, where the coalition is already working with the Governing Council, the Iraqis, to move forward, towards constitutional elections and also to move forward on the exercise of sovereignty. The point is not to argue either about which foreigner's going to take control in Iraq. The point is to go out and look and see what we can all do to support the Iraqis as they go forward in that process.

I would note, also, a press conference statement by the Secretary General two days ago where he said it's not so much for the UN to go in and take over the administration and management of Iraq, but for us to ensure that we accelerate the establishment of the government and the transfer of authority, and to have the Iraqis run their own affairs, as indicated in the Security Council resolution. That's what we would hope all parties would be prepared to go talk about in Geneva.

Teri.

QUESTION: Do you want to mention the Chinese at all? Have there been discussions recently, or how long ago did Secretary Powell speak with the --

MR. BOUCHER: The Secretary talked to the Chinese Foreign Minister -- about a week ago?

QUESTION: Last week. Right.

MR. BOUCHER: Yeah, last week. Certainly they've been participating and speaking up at the Perm 5 meeting that took place yesterday and the other discussions in New York. I'm not trying to convey views on behalf of all those who had views. We've also had specific comments and constructive discussions with the British, with the Spanish, and probably with several others who I should probably mention but can't remember. So we've had some very specific discussions, heard specific proposals, and constructive ones from a number of countries.

QUESTION: Have the Chinese given you a list of suggested changes or --

MR. BOUCHER: I'm not aware that they have, but if you want a whole list of who's given us specifics, I think you'd have to check with the countries.

QUESTION: The P-5?

MR. BOUCHER: Yeah. If you want a whole list of the P-5 members who presented changes, I'll have to demure on that too, because I'm just not sure about the whole list.

Andrea.

QUESTION: Richard, can you help us understand what it is that these other governments are to get out of, essentially, contributing thousands of their own troops who could potentially become cannon fodder for these terrorists, and allowing them to pitch in with various NGOs? What it is that they are supposed to get out of, you know, this whole participatory process?

MR. BOUCHER: A safer world. A better environment for their children and grandchildren to grow up in.

I think despite differences over the war itself, that most countries recognize that building of a stable Iraq as representative government can be an important element in building a more stable region. It's important to their security that this process succeed whether or not they agreed with going to war in the first place.

And I think we have actually had that and heard that and seen that in public from statements of various governments. And the governments that are considering contributing troops or consider -- who are contributing troops, governments that are contributing money or are considering contributing money, the governments who are supporting or considering supporting UN resolutions, I am sure are looking at it from their own point of view, that it's better for them in the long run for this process to succeed in Iraq than to have Iraq go back to being some kind of source of instability.

Certainly, the United States has made that decision and the President expressed that decision quite clearly on Sunday night when he asked for not only the commitment to do so, but the money to do so as well.

QUESTION: Does the U.S. believe, then, that without the help of the international community beyond the countries that are already participating, that this process is destined to fail?

MR. BOUCHER: No. The President expressed our commitment to succeed.

QUESTION: No, I understand. But you're reaching out to the international community so I'm just wondering if the U.S. believes that without the additional troops, without the additional money, that it can't succeed.

MR. BOUCHER: No. The President expressed our commitment to succeed, and we are going to succeed in this. He also made clear there's an opportunity for others to take steps that contribute to their own security, that contribute to their own well-being and that contribute to the well-being of the people of Iraq.

Teri.

QUESTION: Change of subject? Vienna. How's it going with the new resolution? Does it look like you're going to get it passed?

MR. BOUCHER: Discussions continue in Vienna. I'm not sure there's any update. It's also not clear exactly when the vote might be, but I don't -- I was going to say I don't think it will be today. We are still working actively with other members on the strongest possible board resolution. France, Germany and the United Kingdom have jointly proposed a draft board resolution on Iran that highlights the international community's concerns. The resolution calls on Iran to take essential and urgent steps to answer fully the unresolved questions from the agency, to cooperate fully with the agency's ongoing investigation, and to take these actions by the end of October. We strongly support these objectives, and I think as you know, we have worked with them in developing this resolution.

Negotiations are continuing today in Vienna, so we'll see where that leads to in terms of a vote and a text. We would say once again that Dr. ElBaradei's June and August reports on Iran clearly confirm that Iran has failed to meet its obligations under its safeguards agreement. We believe the Director General's reports provide a compelling evidence of Iran's noncompliance with its obligations.

QUESTION: Thank you.

MR. BOUCHER: We've got one more. We've got one or two more back here.

QUESTION: In Indonesia, the person responsible for the Bali bombings last year was sentenced to death today. Do you have any reaction to that?

MR. BOUCHER: I think this is the second, or maybe more, sentencing involving the Bali bombings, and we commend the Government of Indonesia for the professional manner in which it conducted this trial. The court sentenced Imam Samudra for his role in planning and executing the bombing. This was the worst act of terrorism since September 11th attacks in the United States.

And we once again extend our sympathy to the families. Bringing the perpetrators to justice is an important step in ensuring that what happened in Bali is not repeated.

Let's do these two, three, four.

QUESTION: I was just hoping you could respond to some remarks published today by Joschka Fischer in a German magazine, calling the U.S. postwar policy in Iraq a complete failure.

MR. BOUCHER: I haven't seen those remarks. I'd want to see how he said it, and where he said it, and what the context was. Obviously, that's not the way we would characterize the situation.

QUESTION: On the case of Charles Lee, do you have any updates on that?

MR. BOUCHER: U.S. Embassy officials in Beijing spoke with Ministry of Foreign Affairs officials on September 8th concerning imprisoned American Chuck Lee. This was one of several matters involving U.S. prisoners which was discussed. The conversation was one of many opportunities that embassy and consular officials in China have taken to express our continuing interest in Mr. Lee's welfare and his well-being while he remains in custody serving his sentence.

We last spoke to him directly on August 15th. The last visit was in early August. We've spoken with him or met with him ten times in the last three months.

QUESTION: Who requested this meeting?

MR. BOUCHER: I'll have to check on that. I think we went in to talk to them about a number of cases.

QUESTION: Does that meeting have anything to do with the genocide lawsuit filed by the Falun Gong practitioners around the world?

MR. BOUCHER: Not that I'm aware of.

Sir.

QUESTION: Any reaction on the Cuba vote last night in the House, and can you say more generally why the Administration feels so strongly about this, its apparent position to veto threat?

MR. BOUCHER: The Administration position is available on the White House website, the statement of the Administration's position. So I assume you've already seen it? All right.

So let me, for others who haven't seen that, go to the White House website and search on SAP, and you can find the position on that. The basic rationale is that providing material benefit to a regime, which only six months ago undertook the most significant act of political repression in the Americas in a decade, strikes us as deeply unwise.

And one more, I guess. Sir.

QUESTION: (Inaudible) General in Burma has said that if they do release Aung San Suu Kyi, it would cause instability, and they said they could face protests. They don't want to release her because of that, and you've criticized that in the last week. Are you putting more pressure on the military junta?

MR. BOUCHER: I haven't seen those remarks. They're obviously ridiculous. And we continue to work with others in the international community to try to see that she and her followers are freed from this detention.

QUESTION: Thank you.

QUESTION: One more?

MR. BOUCHER: Do you want to ask one more there?

QUESTION: Yes.

MR. BOUCHER: A late hand.

QUESTION: Do you know what's happened to the North Korean weapons expert who was arrested in China who's trying to defect to Australia?

MR. BOUCHER: I haven't heard that story. Sorry.

QUESTION: Okay. Thanks.

LOAD-DATE: September 11, 2003

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2003 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

292 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

September 10, 2003

Progress in the Fight Against Trafficking in Persons

SECTION: STATE DEPARTMENT PRESS RELEASES

LENGTH: 547 words

Richard Boucher, Spokesman

September 10, 2003

Progress in the Fight Against Trafficking in Persons

We announce today some excellent progress. The President announced that ten countries have made important progress over the last three months in the fight to abolish modern day slavery. This announcement reflects several months of intensive effort on the part of diplomats in the field and of foreign governments that have made the commitment to fighting trafficking in persons. These efforts merited effectively raising our ratings of those countries' anti-trafficking performance. These ten countries are Belize, Bosnia-Herzegovina, the Dominican Republic, Georgia, Greece, Haiti, Kazakhstan, Suriname, Turkey and Uzbekistan.

These countries all made important progress: some passed comprehensive anti-trafficking legislation; some funded victims support programs; some formed national task forces to combat trafficking and to arrest and prosecute traffickers; some ran public announcements warning the public of the dangers of trafficking. In every one of these countries, public officials - including in some cases heads of state, foreign ministers, and other cabinet officials spoke out on this emerging human rights issue. These positive actions deserve our recognition and support.

This is the first year that the President was required by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 to make determinations regarding countries placed on Tier 3 of the Department's annual Trafficking in Persons report.

One hundred sixteen countries were ranked in the June report, and 15 of them were placed on Tier 3, the lowest tier, for their governments' failure to comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and failure to make significant efforts to do so. In the months following the issuance of the report, the Secretary reviewed the anti-trafficking efforts of these 15 countries' governments. The Secretary determined that the governments of the 10 governments cited earlier are now making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance, the standard for placement on Tier 2.

Burma, Cuba, Liberia, North Korea and Sudan still meet the Tier 3 standard, because their governments still fail to comply with the minimum standards, and fail to make significant efforts to do so. The President, acting on the recommendations of the Secretary determined that sanctions will be imposed on Burma, Cuba and North Korea. While Liberia and Sudan are also subject to sanctions, the President determined that certain multilateral assistance for these two countries would promote the purposes of the act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States. For Sudan, that assistance will be limited to that which may be necessary to implement a peace accord.

These determinations by the President clearly demonstrate his personal commitment to this issue and the significant cooperation and effort that the United States and other nations are starting to make to fight this transnational crime and modern day form of slavery. These successes are attributable not only to the efforts of the countries themselves but to our Ambassadors and the Department, particularly its Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

LOAD-DATE: September 11, 2003

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2003 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

293 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

September 10, 2003

Ten governments improve counter-trafficking measures and avoid sanctions

BYLINE: Charlene Porter, Washington File Staff Writer

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 812 words

U.S. State Department Spokesman Richard Boucher said the efforts made by 10 nations to strengthen policies to stop human trafficking demonstrate that U.S. policies are proving effective in the battle to eradicate this form of modern day slavery.

The Bush administration has determined that 10 nations have made sufficient progress against human trafficking to avoid the imposition of U.S. sanctions. A State Department finding in a June report that the nations were not taking adequate actions could have led to sanctions under the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000.

In the three months since the report's release, however, Boucher said Belize, Bosnia-Herzegovina, the Dominican Republic, Georgia, Greece, Haiti, Kazakhstan, Suriname, Turkey and Uzbekistan all made important progress.

"Some passed comprehensive anti-trafficking legislation; some funded victims support programs; some formed national task forces to combat trafficking and to arrest and prosecute traffickers; some ran public announcements warning the public of the dangers of trafficking," Boucher said.

Burma, Cuba and North Korea will be subject to sanctions because of their failure to comply with minimum standards to prevent trafficking. Liberia and Sudan also fail to meet the standards, but sanctions will not be imposed, Boucher said.

Following is the text of the Boucher statement:

(begin text)

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Office of the Spokesman, September 10, 2003

Statement By Richard Boucher, Spokesman

Progress in the Fight Against Trafficking in Persons

We announce today some excellent progress. The President announced that ten countries have made important progress over the last three months in the fight to abolish modern day slavery. This announcement reflects several months of intensive effort on the part of diplomats in the field and of foreign governments that have made the commitment to fighting trafficking in persons. These efforts merited effectively raising our ratings of those countries' anti-trafficking performance. These ten countries are Belize, Bosnia-Herzegovina, the Dominican Republic, Georgia, Greece, Haiti, Kazakhstan, Suriname, Turkey and Uzbekistan.

These countries all made important progress: some passed comprehensive anti-trafficking legislation; some funded victims support programs; some formed national task forces to combat trafficking and to arrest and prosecute traffickers; some ran public announcements warning the public of the dangers of trafficking. In every one of these countries, public officials - including in some cases heads of state, foreign ministers, and other cabinet officials spoke out on this emerging human rights issue. These positive actions deserve our recognition and support.

This is the first year that the President was required by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 to make determinations regarding countries placed on Tier 3 of the Department's annual Trafficking in Persons report.

One hundred sixteen countries were ranked in the June report, and 15 of them were placed on Tier 3, the lowest tier, for their governments' failure to comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and failure to make significant efforts to do so. In the months following the issuance of the report, the Secretary reviewed the anti-trafficking efforts of these 15 countries' governments. The Secretary determined that the governments of the 10 governments cited earlier are now making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance, the standard for placement on Tier 2.

Burma, Cuba, Liberia, North Korea and Sudan still meet the Tier 3 standard, because their governments still fail to comply with the minimum standards, and fail to make significant efforts to do so. The President, acting on the recommendations of the Secretary determined that sanctions will be imposed on Burma, Cuba and North Korea. While Liberia and Sudan are also subject to sanctions, the President determined that certain multilateral assistance for these two countries would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States. For Sudan, that assistance will be limited to that which may be necessary to implement a peace accord.

These determinations by the President clearly demonstrate his personal commitment to this issue and the significant cooperation and effort that the United States and other nations are starting to make to fight this transnational crime and modern day form of slavery. These successes are attributable not only to the efforts of the countries themselves but to our Ambassadors and the Department, particularly its Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

(end text)

(Distributed by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State. Web site: usinfo.state.gov)

LOAD-DATE: September 11, 2003

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2003 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

294 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

September 10, 2003

Trafficking in Persons, Israel/Palestinians, Mideast, Syria, Libya, Department, North Korea, Iraq, Iran, Indonesia, China, Cuba, Burma,

BYLINE: Janelle Simmons, Washington File Staff Writer

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 6280 words

State Department Spokesman Richard Boucher briefed.

Following is the State Department transcript:

(begin transcript)

U.S. Department of State, Daily Press Briefing Index, Washington, DC , September 10, 2003

BRIEFER: Richard Boucher, Spokesman

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE DAILY PRESS BRIEFING, Daily Press Briefing Index, Wednesday, September 10, 2003, 1: 00 p.m. EDT

BRIEFER: Richard Boucher, Spokesman

TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS -- President's Decisions on Tier Placement Under Trafficking Victims Protection Act -- Confronting Trafficking in Source and Destination Countries

ISRAEL/PALESTINIANS -- Formation of New Palestinian Cabinet -- Prime Minister Qureia's Security Proposal -- Impact of Current Violence on Roadmap/Security Situation -- Status of Yassar Arafat/Discussion of Expelling Arafat -- Arafat Obstructions to the Peace Process -- Creation of Palestinian Institutions/Palestinian State

MIDDLE EAST -- Deputy Secretary Armitage Travel Postponed

SYRIA -- Changes in Cabinet

LIBYA -- Security Council Vote on Lifting UN Sanctions on Libya Postponed -- Ambassador Negroponte's Meeting with Pan Am 103 Families -- Compensation to French Families for UTA Bombing

DEPARTMENT -- Rewards For Justice Program -- Secretary Powell's Phone Calls with FM Ivanov and UN Sec. Gen. Annan

NORTH KOREA -- Status of Nuclear Facilities at Yongbyon

IRAQ -- Secretary Powell's Trip to Geneva -- Security Council Members' Views on Draft Proposal -- Transferring Authority to Iraqi Governing Council -- Importance of International Cooperation -- U.S. Commitment to Succeed

IRAN -- U.S. Participation in International Atomic Energy Agency Discussions -- Director General's Report on Iran's Non-compliance under Safeguards Agreement

INDONESIA -- U.S. Reaction to Sentencing of Imam Samudra

CHINA -- Current Status of Charles Lee

CUBA -- U.S. Policy on Cuba Travel Restrictions

BURMA -- Reaction to Burmese Statement on Continued Detention of Aung San Suu Kyi

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE, DAILY PRESS BRIEFING

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 2003, (ON THE RECORD UNLESS OTHERWISE NOTED)

1: 00 p.m. EDT

MR. BOUCHER: I'm happy to see you all here, and I have one thing that I do want to talk about, and that's trafficking in persons. The White House has put out a short statement to indicate the President has notified Congress that ten countries that were on the tier three, the Trafficking in Persons list from earlier this year, have made significant progress and therefore are being moved up to tier two, and thereby have avoided possible sanctions under the Trafficking Victims Protection Act.

This is in recognition of their quick work to address problems that existed with regard to their trafficking in persons policy, and so we are very pleased today to announce that this excellent progress has been made in these countries and that the United States has worked very closely with these countries over the past three months to achieve it.

There's been several months of very intensive effort on behalf of diplomats in the field and foreign governments that have made the commitment to fighting trafficking in persons more effective. These efforts merited raising our ratings on the countries, on these ten countries' anti-trafficking performance. The ten countries are: Belize, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Dominican Republic, Georgia, Greece, Haiti, Kazakhstan, Suriname, Turkey and Uzbekistan. All these countries have made important progress. Some have passed legislation. Victims' support programs have been started. They've arrested and prosecuting traffickers. There have been public service announcements and awareness campaigns. In every one of these countries, public officials spoke out on this important human rights issue.

This is the first year that the President was required by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act to make determinations regarding countries placed on tier three in the report, and sanctions were required. Unfortunately, there are still five countries that did not make improvements and are still in the tier three, under the tier three standard. Those countries are Burma, Cuba, Liberia, North Korea and Sudan.

The President, acting on the recommendations of the Secretary, determined that sanctions will be imposed on Burma, Cuba and North Korea. While Liberia and Sudan are also subject to sanctions, the President determined that certain multilateral assistance for these two countries would promote the purposes of the act or is otherwise in our national interest, and so he has made the appropriate determinations that some certain bilateral -- multilateral assistance can continue. In the case of Sudan, that's assistance -- excuse me. In the case of Sudan, this means assistance that would support a peace accord. In both cases, I would point out that humanitarian assistance is not affected.

So that is a determination that the President has notified the Congress of based on recommendations he received from the Secretary of State, and I think a remarkable amount of progress that we've been able to make in three months through effective diplomacy using the Act and the effort of our diplomats and the effort of foreign countries to really address a very important issue.

So, with that, I'd be glad to take your questions on this or other matters.

QUESTION: Not on this.

MR. BOUCHER: Start on this? Any particulars?

(No response.)

MR. BOUCHER: All right. For those who are interested, we'll put out a more complete statement and the Press Office will have more specific information.

QUESTION: The President is withholding a judgment on the new Palestinian Prime Minister. I wondered if here at State there's any indication of who might be in the cabinet, and how important is it who he appoints, for instance, as security or interior minister?

MR. BOUCHER: Well, we note that that process -- we note that he has accepted the nomination or the request to form a cabinet and that the process of cabinet formation has begun. As I think the President made some reference to and the White House has said, it's essential the next Prime Minister have the authority and the control of the security forces and the finances of the Palestinian Authority to stop terrorist organizations such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad. The issue is taking action to fight terror.

So we urge that Mr. Qureia's cabinet appointments reflect candidates free from associations with terror and violence, committed to acting decisively on reform, and peace negotiations that will benefit all Palestinians. I understand the way it works, he has three weeks to form a cabinet and, if he needs it, can get a further two-week extension.

A new Palestinian cabinet must make clear its opposition to all forms of terrorism, demand that all acts of terrorism cease, and insist that terrorists and military organizations not under the control of Palestinian Authority be disarmed and dismantled.

Our representatives in the region have continued their meetings. Our Acting Consulate General Jeff Feltman has met with Mr. Qureia today again. He and Ambassador Wolf have continued to meet and speak with a wide variety of Israeli and Palestinian officials on a daily basis and to encourage both sides to recommit themselves to finding a way forward toward the President's two-state vision.

Christophe.

QUESTION: Prime Minister Qureia is proposing to create a kind of national council for security in charge of supervising all the security agencies. Does it seem to you a good idea, this step?

MR. BOUCHER: I don't think it's for us to specify the exact governing arrangements. The point that we've made is there needs to be a commitment, there needs to be authority, and there needs to be resources in the hands of the government to be able to effectively use the security services against the terrorist organizations. It will be for them to figure out how exactly that can be done.

Sir.

QUESTION: Yes, this is Nayyar Zaidi from Daily Jang in Pakistan. I didn't know we would move so fast to Middle East, but I want to go back to the trafficking in persons.

MR. BOUCHER: Yes.

QUESTION: This trafficking obviously involves trafficking abroad, like exporting human beings to other countries, or is it only internal?

MR. BOUCHER: No, it's all forms of forced labor, forced prostitution, trafficking in persons. I think there are estimates, you know, of 50,000 people who are trafficked into the United States. So it's just -- it's a problem for countries where people are being taken, it's a problem for countries where they're showing up, and it's a problem that we think the whole world needs to work together against.

QUESTION: Yeah, this is what I was coming to. Is United States the only country, or is it in Europe, number one?

And number two, in case of, say, nuclear technology, we fault the person who has exported the technology and the person who imported it. Now, in this case, are the countries which are getting these people, like 50,000 in United States, are taking any responsibility?

MR. BOUCHER: These are the countries covered in the report. They are placed in different categories. Okay? It covers any country in the world where this problem exists in one form or the other is covered. Every country is expected to take action, whether people are trafficked out of that country or into that country, or within that country. There may be forced labor in some of these cases inside the country where we do expect people to take action against the -- take the government -- governments to take action.

The United States has passed comprehensive legislation, the United States has taken any number of steps of public awareness, of law enforcement action, arrest, prosecution, and we are acting domestically as well as through the domestic agencies, as well as part of our international agenda to work with other governments so we can effectively all fight this problem wherever it exists.

Okay?

QUESTION: Do you know, coming back to the Middle East for a second, the President called for the Prime Minister-designate to get control of all of the security forces and unleash them on the militants. Absent his ability to do that, are you simply reconciled to the prospect of continuing violence? Do you see any other options, policy options, for you?

MR. BOUCHER: The question is sort of -- I need to separate out the pieces, because it's really three different questions. Are we -- you know, absent his ability to do that, to get control of security services, I think I would complete the sentence by saying, "Absent the ability of the government to get control of the security services and use them effectively against terrorist groups, it will be impossible to make progress on the roadmap, to make progress towards the two-state vision, to achieve what the Palestinian people say they want, which is to build the institutions of their own state."

So, absent progress on security, we really think it's -- we don't see how you can make progress on creating a Palestinian state and that these bombers, in addition to harming innocent people, have harmed the lives of Palestinians, but have also harmed the ability of Palestinians to achieve their dreams and their aspirations.

The second part is: Are we reconciled to continuing violence, if this doesn't happen the way we want? And I think the answer has to be no, we'll continue to work against violence. But -- or is there any other way? I think we've also made clear that we don't think there's any other way. The roadmap lays out how to achieve the President's vision of two states living side by side. As the President noted again this morning, the roadmap is there as the mechanism to achieve that vision, and we need to -- we need to continue to focus on the steps that both sides need to take as we move forward, the key one at this juncture we think being to end the activities of these violence groups.

QUESTION: Do you get the sense from what he has said so far, that he has any intention of getting a grip on the security services?

MR. BOUCHER: I don't think one can judge a government until it's formed, until it starts taking action. But we have made the point -- I made it again today -- that as he forms the cabinet, it needs to be a cabinet that is committed to progress, and that the cabinet needs to make clear it's opposition to all forms of terrorism, and its desire to move forward in a peaceful manner to achieving a Palestinian state.

QUESTION: Can you tell us why Mr. -- I'm sorry, go ahead --

QUESTION: No, no.

QUESTION: Why Mr. Armitage has decided not go, not to carry through on what he said were his plans to go to the Middle East?

MR. BOUCHER: The Deputy Secretary talked to you all, I think, or talked to various media about the prospects of a trip. As it came to putting together that trip, there were questions of scheduling, there were questions of timing, there were questions of formation of the Palestinian Government, and we're coming right up on the General Assembly, when most of the people will be traveling to New York anyway. So, in the end, it wasn't possible to put together the kind of trip he was looking at in this immediate time frame and thought it was better to postpone it till later.

QUESTION: What kind of trip was he looking at? Was it a sort of Middle East peace process trip, or was it more Arab capitals or --

MR. BOUCHER: He was looking at a number of stops, and will continue to look at a number of stops as we think about a later trip.

QUESTION: Are you thinking he will possibly take a trip later this year, or is it sort of --

MR. BOUCHER: I'd expect something later in the fall, yeah. That's what they're thinking about now, yeah.

QUESTION: Can all this happen with Arafat on the premises, all the things the U.S. wants to see happen, like security forces under one command?

MR. BOUCHER: Yes. It's a question of will, it's a question of desire, it's a question of --

QUESTION: Whose will?

MR. BOUCHER: The will of all the people in the Palestinian community. The Palestinian legislature obviously has a lot of say over powers. The individuals involved in the political process have a lot of say over the powers. I think we're pointing to objective fact that we hope others would realize, that we're not going to make progress on the Palestinian agenda until the Palestinians make progress in eliminating the terrorist groups.

QUESTION: So I guess that means the administration's position on exile hasn't changed.

MR. BOUCHER: Hasn't changed. The Secretary restated it on Sunday.

Joel.

QUESTION: Richard, nearby in Syria, the government has been shuffled there. Do you, in talking to Bashar there, do you expect the same type thing in the formation of their new government?

MR. BOUCHER: Nothing particular to say about that situation, no.

QUESTION: Do you find it encouraging that Assad seems to be following through? He said he needed a more reform-minded government in --

MR. BOUCHER: We'll see what emerges. I don't have anything to say at this moment.

QUESTION: Richard, if I could just go back to Arafat for one minute, please. I know you've said this before, but in light of the latest attacks, why does the U.S. believe that expelling Arafat is not the solution to the current impasse, crisis?

MR. BOUCHER: For the reasons the Secretary said on TV on Saturday -- Sunday.

QUESTION: Well, if you could just -- (laughter).

QUESTION: For 35 seconds.

QUESTION: Preferably ten. (Laughter.)

MR. BOUCHER: Six and a half. I don't -- I don't have the transcripts with me.

The United States has made clear our view that Arafat is not part of the solution, he's part of the problem. But at the same time, as I think the Secretary has made clear, the Israelis need to think about potential actions, this discussion of expelling Arafat, because we don't see how it would be any better if he was outside the country working the capitals of the world. Pretty much the way he put it.

Sir.

QUESTION: He would be more vocal and more extreme, so keeping him in the occupied territory will contain him? That's what we understand?

MR. BOUCHER: We don't understand it one way or the other. We just don't see how it would help the situation or help anybody move forward towards a more peaceful situation for Israelis and Palestinians alike.

Sir.

QUESTION: Is it better than being confined to Ramallah?

MR. BOUCHER: I'm not going to dictate any particular treatment or location. We don't spend a whole lot of time worrying about Mr. Arafat any more.

QUESTION: Yes, sir, Nayyar Zaidi again.

MR. BOUCHER: I know. (Laughter.)

QUESTION: Well, I was looking for that. (Laughter.)

So, Mr. Arafat, we keeping hearing, you know, various solutions to getting him out of the way, and what kind of obstruction is he putting up to the peace process? I mean, he has been a leader, for, God knows, 35 years, and he should have the cause of Palestinians at heart. So what kind of political or other obstructions is he putting up that people are saying that he is part of the problem?

MR. BOUCHER: I think, first of all, we've talked about this many times over many years, including in the President's speech last -- a year ago, June 24th. The most recent question that's come up is whether or not he is going to allow the control and consolidation of the security services under a government that was chosen by the Palestinian legislature to take authority for the Palestinian Authority.

QUESTION: You took from him the financial control. Now you want security. He will be left with nothing.

MR. BOUCHER: You sound like we're picking his pocket. (Laughter.) We're not.

The Palestinians are establishing institutions that can support a state. Let's not forget what this is all about. This is about creating a Palestinian state that can take responsibility in its own areas, that can have responsibility vis-o -vis its own people and vis-o -vis its neighbors.

If you're going to create those institutions, you have to operate on a transparent and solid and legal basis, and that's what the Palestinian legislature has tried to do in giving the authorities to the government, that's what the Palestinian Government has done in terms of finance, and that's what the Palestinian Government needs to do in terms of security as well. You can't have a government competing with armed groups. No country has a government that has to rival other armed groups for control of the security situation, at least not voluntarily. And therefore, if we're talking about creating institutions that can support a Palestinian state, we're talking about a Palestinian Government that can take responsibility in all areas of government.

QUESTION: New subject? What's your reaction to the Security Council deciding to postpone the Libya vote -- Lockerbie vote, the Libya vote?

MR. BOUCHER: As you noted yesterday, the Security Council went on record publicly in adopting an agenda item that includes a vote on the resolution to lift UN sanctions on Libya. That meeting will now convene on Friday, September 12th, at 10: 30 in the morning.

The United States agreed to this formal procedural motion essentially allowing a short additional period of time while, at the same time, making the Council's intent to vote on Friday in order to resolve the matter in a way that would ultimately result in adoption of the resolution.

Nevertheless, we are very disappointed that the vote did not take place yesterday. Our hearts go out to the victims of -- to the families of the victims of the Lockerbie bombing who have been waiting so patiently for some closure.

We strongly regret that the families were faced with the situation of having to wait again, for the fourth time, for a vote in order to avoid a French veto of this resolution. We do think the time is past due for bringing this resolution to a vote, but given the circumstances in the Council yesterday feel that this is the best that could be worked out.

We are satisfied that there is a strong commitment on the part of Council members to proceed to a vote this coming Friday.

I would note also that later yesterday Ambassador Negroponte, along with UK Ambassador Jones Parry and the Bulgarian Ambassador Tafrov met with the victims' families at the U.S. Mission to confer and discuss the situation.

QUESTION: Has France given you any indications that it will not veto on Friday?

MR. BOUCHER: I am not aware of anything like that. You'd have to ask the French what their intentions are.

QUESTION: Is this the final date, Richard, or is there a chance it will be postponed again?

MR. BOUCHER: This is a firmly scheduled agenda item. It's a firm schedule for a vote, which we have not had before when this was postponed before. There was discussion, there was an unwritten understanding, there were things like that that were postponed. This is a much more firm commitment than we've had before. I suppose the Council, in its infinite wisdom, can decide to do what it wants, if it desires, but this is a more -- a much clearer commitment than we've had before.

Sir.

QUESTION: Do you have any indication that they can reach a deal with the Libyans by Friday, or they think they can reach a deal with the Libyans by Friday?

MR. BOUCHER: Again, that will be something you'll have to ask the French if they think they can get some additional compensation or whatever for the families of the UTA bombing. Of course, we have every sympathy with their attempts to do so. We just don't think the families of the Pan Am 103 bombing should be forced to wait again and again.

QUESTION: (Inaudible) on the security issue in the Palestinian situation. On the one hand, the U.S. is clear what they want, unified command; on the other, you don't want to micromanage Palestinian matters. Mr. Wolf is out there and his specialty was to -- or is -- to promote a better security situation. Is he involved, or is he -- is he there on call to deal with the mechanics of this if it would be helpful -- consolidating it all, lending his special expertise?

MR. BOUCHER: The -- I wouldn't describe his role as that way. I wouldn't say he's the mechanic here. The mechanics have to be put together by the people who are going to run the Palestinian Government, the politics have to be put together by the people who are going to run the Palestinian Government, and the effective use of the institutions have to be -- has to be handled by the people who are going to run the Palestinian Government.

Obviously, the United States has long had an important role in conferring with both sides about security issues and talking to them about their plans and hearing from them what their plans are, particularly their plans to move against terrorism. But the organization and the determination need to come from the Palestinian side.

QUESTION: Richard, we've had a Rewards for Justice-type program. Is there something comparable that we'd like to see in the Middle East so that some of these so-called terrorists would be deactivated?

MR. BOUCHER: The United States Rewards for Justice Program has always applied to American citizens who have died because of -- or to those who have killed American citizens, regardless of where it's happened. So, in some cases, in the Middle East it already applies.

QUESTION: New subject?

MR. BOUCHER: Yes.

QUESTION: Richard, does the U.S. Government have an assessment of whether the North Korean nuclear facilities at Yongbyon are still active?

MR. BOUCHER: No, I don't have one that I can share with you.

QUESTION: Are you aware that there's a Japanese news report suggesting that a senior State Department official yesterday told legislators on the Hill that it's your assessment that that plant has ceased the activity that was detected earlier this year?

MR. BOUCHER: I don't have any assessment that I can share with you.

Sir.

QUESTION: Change of subject. Geneva?

MR. BOUCHER: Yes. Quickly.

QUESTION: Geneva? Anything you can tell us about the agenda for that?

MR. BOUCHER: Let me sort of walk to Geneva by reviewing where we are generally on the resolution first so you'll understand the context that Geneva comes in.

We've been continuing to discuss our draft resolution with other members of the Security Council in New York, in Washington, and in capitals. There was a meeting, informal meeting yesterday afternoon, of the Permanent 5 members of the Security Council. At that meeting we got some feedback on our draft, as I think has been reported. We heard from the French on proposed amendments to the text. The Russians offered us a separate set of suggestions.

We are reviewing those proposals. We'll respond after further internal consultations. This is the normal process that one goes through negotiating a Security Council resolution. There are no additional meetings planned for New York prior to the Secretary's trip to Geneva on Saturday. We will keep in touch with other delegations and other governments, however, in other ways.

The Secretary spoke this morning with Foreign Minister Ivanov of Russia. He also spoke with Secretary General Kofi Annan. The discussion with Ivanov was, I would describe it as a good and constructive exchange on the resolution, and the elements of the resolution. We certainly welcome the work that we've been able to do with the Russians so far on that matter.

We're also working with Secretary General Annan to prepare for a group meeting, a meeting in Geneva on Saturday. As I think we've said before, we see it as an informal discussion among the Perm 5 and the Secretary General to discuss the situation in Iraq, and discuss ideas about the resolution. We would expect the discussion to be about the concepts of how we go forward in the resolution, and generally with the United Nations on Iraq, not a negotiation of the text itself.

As the President and the Secretary have both stated, we're committed to advancing the cause of the resolution, and if the Geneva meeting can move the process forward, then we're willing to do what we can through that meeting, and through our discussions in New York, to get to a satisfactory conclusion to these negotiations.

QUESTION: Can you go a step a step further on Ivanov? I know you don't usually want to get into conversations, but Russia's position has been interpreted by some people as supportive, and by other reporters as a little skeptical. Would you put him in the helpful column? I mean, they're not with France and Germany, for instance, are they?

MR. BOUCHER: I don't think we've quite done all the columns on this one yet. The views are still coming in. What I would note is that the Russian -- Russia is -- we've had a separate dialogue with Russia than with France and Germany. We've had some separate discussions with Germany as well. Our -- I'm not going to try to negotiate specific ideas or proposals from different countries in a public forum, but I would say that we found the discussion with Russia very productive, constructive.

The comments on the substance that I would make are sort of our approach to the situation. We think that all Council members do share essentially the same objective as to help Iraq and the Iraqi people exercise their full sovereignty as quickly as possible. The difference is, in the Council, we think, should relate to the steps that need to be taken to get there. That's where the discussion should focus. Proposals have to be grounded in the reality of the current situation. You can't pretend the war never happened, you can't pretend the coalition never happened, you can't pretend that the Iraqis have not already made considerable progress under the Governing Council, and what we need to do is work with them, build on that progress, and see how all of this can help.

Our proposal takes as a point of departure, the reality of the situation, that the coalition is already working with the allies, where the coalition is already working with the Governing Council, the Iraqis, to move forward, towards constitutional elections and also to move forward on the exercise of sovereignty. The point is not to argue either about which foreigner's going to take control in Iraq. The point is to go out and look and see what we can all do to support the Iraqis as they go forward in that process.

I would note, also, a press conference statement by the Secretary General two days ago where he said it's not so much for the UN to go in and take over the administration and management of Iraq, but for us to ensure that we accelerate the establishment of the government and the transfer of authority, and to have the Iraqis run their own affairs, as indicated in the Security Council resolution. That's what we would hope all parties would be prepared to go talk about in Geneva.

Teri.

QUESTION: Do you want to mention the Chinese at all? Have there been discussions recently, or how long ago did Secretary Powell speak with the --

MR. BOUCHER: The Secretary talked to the Chinese Foreign Minister -- about a week ago?

QUESTION: Last week. Right.

MR. BOUCHER: Yeah, last week. Certainly they've been participating and speaking up at the Perm 5 meeting that took place yesterday and the other discussions in New York. I'm not trying to convey views on behalf of all those who had views. We've also had specific comments and constructive discussions with the British, with the Spanish, and probably with several others who I should probably mention but can't remember. So we've had some very specific discussions, heard specific proposals, and constructive ones from a number of countries.

QUESTION: Have the Chinese given you a list of suggested changes or --

MR. BOUCHER: I'm not aware that they have, but if you want a whole list of who's given us specifics, I think you'd have to check with the countries.

QUESTION: The P-5?

MR. BOUCHER: Yeah. If you want a whole list of the P-5 members who presented changes, I'll have to demure on that too, because I'm just not sure about the whole list.

Andrea.

QUESTION: Richard, can you help us understand what it is that these other governments are to get out of, essentially, contributing thousands of their own troops who could potentially become cannon fodder for these terrorists, and allowing them to pitch in with various NGOs? What it is that they are supposed to get out of, you know, this whole participatory process?

MR. BOUCHER: A safer world. A better environment for their children and grandchildren to grow up in.

I think despite differences over the war itself, that most countries recognize that building of a stable Iraq as representative government can be an important element in building a more stable region. It's important to their security that this process succeed whether or not they agreed with going to war in the first place.

And I think we have actually had that and heard that and seen that in public from statements of various governments. And the governments that are considering contributing troops or consider -- who are contributing troops, governments that are contributing money or are considering contributing money, the governments who are supporting or considering supporting UN resolutions, I am sure are looking at it from their own point of view, that it's better for them in the long run for this process to succeed in Iraq than to have Iraq go back to being some kind of source of instability.

Certainly, the United States has made that decision and the President expressed that decision quite clearly on Sunday night when he asked for not only the commitment to do so, but the money to do so as well.

QUESTION: Does the U.S. believe, then, that without the help of the international community beyond the countries that are already participating, that this process is destined to fail?

MR. BOUCHER: No. The President expressed our commitment to succeed.

QUESTION: No, I understand. But you're reaching out to the international community so I'm just wondering if the U.S. believes that without the additional troops, without the additional money, that it can't succeed.

MR. BOUCHER: No. The President expressed our commitment to succeed, and we are going to succeed in this. He also made clear there's an opportunity for others to take steps that contribute to their own security, that contribute to their own well-being and that contribute to the well-being of the people of Iraq.

Teri.

QUESTION: Change of subject? Vienna. How's it going with the new resolution? Does it look like you're going to get it passed?

MR. BOUCHER: Discussions continue in Vienna. I'm not sure there's any update. It's also not clear exactly when the vote might be, but I don't -- I was going to say I don't think it will be today. We are still working actively with other members on the strongest possible board resolution. France, Germany and the United Kingdom have jointly proposed a draft board resolution on Iran that highlights the international community's concerns. The resolution calls on Iran to take essential and urgent steps to answer fully the unresolved questions from the agency, to cooperate fully with the agency's ongoing investigation, and to take these actions by the end of October. We strongly support these objectives, and I think as you know, we have worked with them in developing this resolution.

Negotiations are continuing today in Vienna, so we'll see where that leads to in terms of a vote and a text. We would say once again that Dr. ElBaradei's June and August reports on Iran clearly confirm that Iran has failed to meet its obligations under its safeguards agreement. We believe the Director General's reports provide a compelling evidence of Iran's noncompliance with its obligations.

QUESTION: Thank you.

MR. BOUCHER: We've got one more. We've got one or two more back here.

QUESTION: In Indonesia, the person responsible for the Bali bombings last year was sentenced to death today. Do you have any reaction to that?

MR. BOUCHER: I think this is the second, or maybe more, sentencing involving the Bali bombings, and we commend the Government of Indonesia for the professional manner in which it conducted this trial. The court sentenced Imam Samudra for his role in planning and executing the bombing. This was the worst act of terrorism since September 11th attacks in the United States.

And we once again extend our sympathy to the families. Bringing the perpetrators to justice is an important step in ensuring that what happened in Bali is not repeated.

Let's do these two, three, four.

QUESTION: I was just hoping you could respond to some remarks published today by Joschka Fischer in a German magazine, calling the U.S. postwar policy in Iraq a complete failure.

MR. BOUCHER: I haven't seen those remarks. I'd want to see how he said it, and where he said it, and what the context was. Obviously, that's not the way we would characterize the situation.

QUESTION: On the case of Charles Lee, do you have any updates on that?

MR. BOUCHER: U.S. Embassy officials in Beijing spoke with Ministry of Foreign Affairs officials on September 8th concerning imprisoned American Chuck Lee. This was one of several matters involving U.S. prisoners which was discussed. The conversation was one of many opportunities that embassy and consular officials in China have taken to express our continuing interest in Mr. Lee's welfare and his well-being while he remains in custody serving his sentence.

We last spoke to him directly on August 15th. The last visit was in early August. We've spoken with him or met with him ten times in the last three months.

QUESTION: Who requested this meeting?

MR. BOUCHER: I'll have to check on that. I think we went in to talk to them about a number of cases.

QUESTION: Does that meeting have anything to do with the genocide lawsuit filed by the Falun Gong practitioners around the world?

MR. BOUCHER: Not that I'm aware of.

Sir.

QUESTION: Any reaction on the Cuba vote last night in the House, and can you say more generally why the Administration feels so strongly about this, its apparent position to veto threat?

MR. BOUCHER: The Administration position is available on the White House website, the statement of the Administration's position. So I assume you've already seen it? All right.

So let me, for others who haven't seen that, go to the White House website and search on SAP, and you can find the position on that. The basic rationale is that providing material benefit to a regime, which only six months ago undertook the most significant act of political repression in the Americas in a decade, strikes us as deeply unwise.

And one more, I guess. Sir.

QUESTION: (Inaudible) General in Burma has said that if they do release Aung San Suu Kyi, it would cause instability, and they said they could face protests. They don't want to release her because of that, and you've criticized that in the last week. Are you putting more pressure on the military junta?

MR. BOUCHER: I haven't seen those remarks. They're obviously ridiculous. And we continue to work with others in the international community to try to see that she and her followers are freed from this detention.

QUESTION: Thank you.

QUESTION: One more?

MR. BOUCHER: Do you want to ask one more there?

QUESTION: Yes.

MR. BOUCHER: A late hand.

QUESTION: Do you know what's happened to the North Korean weapons expert who was arrested in China who's trying to defect to Australia?

MR. BOUCHER: I haven't heard that story. Sorry.

QUESTION: Okay. Thanks.

(The briefing was concluded at 1: 40 p.m.)

(end transcript)

(Distributed by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State. Web site: usinfo.state.gov)

LOAD-DATE: September 11, 2003

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2003 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

295 of 359 DOCUMENTS

FDCH Political Transcripts

September 10, 2003 Wednesday

AMBASSADOR RICHARD A. BOUCHER HOLDS STATE DEPARTMENT REGULAR NEWS BRIEFING

LENGTH: 5733 words

SPEAKER:

AMBASSADOR RICHARD A. BOUCHER, ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE FOR PUBLIC AFFAIRS

LOCATION: WASHINGTON, D.C.

STATE DEPARTMENT REGULAR NEWS BRIEFING

SEPTEMBER 10, 2003

SPEAKER: AMBASSADOR RICHARD A. BOUCHER

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE FOR PUBLIC AFFAIRS

BOUCHER: I'm happy to see you all here, and I have one thing that I do want to talk about, and that's trafficking in persons.

The White House has put out a short statement to indicate the president's notified Congress that 10 countries that were on the Tier 3, the trafficking in persons list from earlier this year, have made significant progress, and therefore are being moved up to Tier 2, and thereby have avoided possible sanctions under the Trafficking Victims Protection Act.

This is in recognition of their quick work to address problems that existed with regard to their trafficking-in-persons policy. And so, we're very pleased today to announce that this excellent progress has been made in these countries, and that the United States has worked very closely with these countries over the past three months to achieve it.

It has been several months of very intensive effort on behalf of diplomats in the field and foreign governments that have made the commitment to fighting trafficking in persons more effective. These effort merited raising our ratings on the countries -- on these 10 countries anti-trafficking performance. The 10 countries are Belize, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Dominican Republic, Georgia, Greece, Haiti, Kazakhstan, Suriname, Turkey and Uzbekistan.

All these countries have made important progress. Some have passed legislation, victims' support programs have been started. They've arrested and prosecuting traffickers. There have been public service announcements and awareness campaigns. In every one of these countries, public officials spoke out on this important human rights issue.

This is the first year that the president was required by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act to make determinations regarding trafficking countries placed on Tier 3 in the report, and sanctions were required.

Unfortunately, there's still five countries that did not make improvements and are still under the Tier 3 standards. Those countries are Burma, Cuba, Liberia, North Korea and Sudan. The president, acting on the recommendations of the secretary, determined that sanctions will be imposed on Burma, Cuba, and North Korea.

While Liberia and Sudan are also subject to sanctions, the president determined that certain multilateral assistance for these two countries would promote the purposes of the act, or as otherwise in our national interest, and so he's made the appropriate determinations of some certain multilateral assistance can continue. In the case of Sudan, this means assistance that would support a peace accord. In both cases, I point out, humanitarian assistance is not affected.

So that's a determination that the president has notified the Congress of, based on recommendations he received from the secretary of state. And I think a remarkable amount of progress that we've been able to make in three months through effective diplomacy using the act and the effort of our diplomats, and the effort of foreign countries to really address a very important issue.

BOUCHER: So with that, I'd be glad to take your questions on this or other matters. Start on this? Any particulars? All right, for those who are interested, we'll put out a more complete statement and the press office will have more specific information.

QUESTION: The president is withholding a judgment on the new Palestinian prime minister. I wondered if here at State there's any indication of who might be in the cabinet and how important is it who he appoints, for instance, as security or interior minister?

BOUCHER: Well, we note that that process -- we note that he has accepted the nomination or the request to form a cabinet and that the process of cabinet formation has begun.

As I think the president made some reference to and the White House has said, it's essential the next prime minister have the authority and the control of the security forces and the finances of the Palestinian Authority to stop terrorist organizations, such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

The issue is taking action to fight terror. So we urge that Mr. Qureia's cabinet appointments reflect candidates free from associations with terror and violence, committed to acting decisively on reform and peace negotiations that will benefit all Palestinians.

I understand the way it works, he has three weeks to form a cabinet and if he needs it can get a further two-week extension.

New Palestinian cabinet must make clear its opposition to all forms of terrorism, demand that all acts of terrorism cease and insist that terrorists or military organizations not under the control of the Palestinian Authority be disarmed and dismantled.

Our representatives in the region have continued their meetings. Our acting consul general, Jeff Feltman, has met with Mr. Qureia today again. He and Ambassador Wolf have continued to meet and speak with a wide variety of Israeli and Palestinian officials on a daily basis to encourage both sides re-commit themselves to finding a way forward toward the president's two-stage vision.

QUESTION: Apparently (inaudible) is proposing to create a kind of national council for security in charge of supervising of the security agencies. Does it seem to be a good idea?

BOUCHER: I don't think it's for us to specify the exact governing arrangements. The point that we've made is there needs to be a commitment, there needs to be authority and there needs to be resources in the hands of the government to be able to be able to effectively use the security services against the terrorist organizations. It'll be for them to figure out how exactly that can be done.

QUESTION: I didn't know we would move so fast to Middle East, but I want to go back to the trafficking persons. This trafficking obviously involves trafficking abroad, like exporting human beings to other countries, or is it only internally?

BOUCHER: No. It's all forms of forced labor, forced prostitution, trafficking in persons.

I think there are estimates, you know, of 50,000 people who are trafficked into the United States. So it's just -- it's a problem for countries where people are being taken. It's a problem for countries where they're showing up and it's a problem that we think the whole world needs to work together against.

QUESTION: Yes, this is what I was coming to.

BOUCHER: Yes.

QUESTION: Is the United States the only country or is it in Europe, number one?

And number two, in case of, say, nuclear technology, we fault the person who exported the technology and the person who imported it. Now, in this case, are the countries which are getting these people, like 50,000 in United States, are taking any responsibility?

BOUCHER: These are the countries covered in the report. They were placed in different categories, OK? It covers -- any country in the world where this problem exists in one form or the other is covered. Every country is expected to take action whether people are trafficked out of that country or into that country or within that country. There may be forced labor in some of these cases inside the country, where we do expect people to take action -- the governments to take action.

The United States has passed comprehensive legislation. The United States has taken any number of steps of public awareness, of law enforcement action, arrest, prosecution, and we are acting through the domestic agencies as well as part of our international agenda to work with other governments so that we can effectively all fight this problem wherever it exists.

QUESTION: The president has called for the prime minister designate to get control of all of the security forces and unleash them on the militants. Absent his ability to do that, are you simply reconciled to the prospects of continued violence? Do you see any other policy options?

BOUCHER: The question is, sort of -- I need to separate out the pieces because it's really three different questions.

Absent his ability to do that to get control of security services -- I think I would complete the sentence by saying, absent the ability of the government to get control of the security services and use them effectively against terrorist groups, it would be impossible to make progress on the road map, to make progress toward the two-state vision, to achieve what the Palestinian say they want, which is to build the institutions of their own state.

So absent progress on security, we don't see how you can make progress on creating a Palestinian state. And that these bombers, in addition to harming innocent people, have harmed the lives of Palestinians, but have also harmed the ability of Palestinians to achieve their dreams and their aspirations.

The second part is are we reconciled to continuing violence if this doesn't happen the way we want?

BOUCHER: And I think the answer has to be no. We'll continue to work against violence, but -- or is there any other way? I think we've also made clear that we don't think there's any other way.

The road map lays out how to achieve the president's vision of two states living side by side. As the president noted again this morning, the road map is there as the mechanism to achieve that vision. And we need to continue to focus on the steps that both sides need to take as we move forward, the key one at this juncture, we think, being to end the activities of this violent groups.

QUESTION: Do you get the sense from what he has said so far that he has any intention of getting a grip on the security services?

BOUCHER: I don't think one can judge a government until it's formed, until it starts taking action.

We have made the point, I made it again today, that as he forms the cabinet, it needs to be a cabinet that is committed to progress, and that the cabinet needs to make clear its opposition to all forms of terrorism, and its desire to move forward in a peaceful manner to achieving a Palestinian state.

QUESTION: Can you tell us why Mr. Armitage has decided not to go -- not to (OFF-MIKE) on what he said were his plans to go to the Middle East?

BOUCHER: The deputy secretary talked to you all, I think, or talked to various media about the prospects of the trip. As it came to putting together that trip, there were questions of scheduling, there were questions of timing, there were questions of formation of the Palestinian government, and we're coming right up on the General Assembly, when most of the people will be traveling to New York anyway.

So in the end, it was impossible to put together the kind of trip he was looking at in this immediate time frame and thought it was better to postpone it till later.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) was he looking at, was it a, sort of, Middle East peace process trip or was it more -- he said Arab capital.

BOUCHER: He was looking a number of stops, and will continue to look at a number of stops as we think about a later trip.

QUESTION: Are you thinking he will possibly take a trip later this year or...

BOUCHER: I'd expect something later in the fall, yes. That's what they're thinking about now.

QUESTION: Can all this happen with Arafat on the premises, all the things the U.S. wants to see happen, like the security forces under one command?

BOUCHER: Yes, it's a question of will. It's a question of desire. It's a question of...

QUESTION: Whose will?

BOUCHER: The will of all the people in the Palestinian community.

BOUCHER: The Palestinian legislature, obviously, has a lot of say over powers. The individuals involved in the political process have a lot of say over the powers.

I think we're pointing to objective fact that we hope others would realize, that we're not going to make progress on the Palestinian agenda until the Palestinians make progress in eliminating the terrorist groups.

QUESTION: So I guess the administration's position on exile hasn't changed.

BOUCHER: It hasn't changed. The secretary restated it on Sunday.

QUESTION: Richard, nearby in Syria, the government has been shuffled there. In talking to (inaudible) there, do you expect the same type thing with the formation of their new government?

BOUCHER: Nothing particular to say about that situation.

QUESTION: Asad seems to be following through. He said he needed a more reform-minded government.

BOUCHER: We'll just see what emerges. I don't have anything to say at this moment.

QUESTION: Richard, if I could just go back to Arafat for one minute, please. I know you've said this before, but in light of the latest attacks, why does the U.S. believe that expelling Arafat is not the solution to the current impasse crisis?

BOUCHER: For the reasons the secretary said on TV on Sunday.

QUESTION: Well, if you could just (OFF-MIKE)

QUESTION: Preferably ten.

BOUCHER: Six and a half.

I don't have the transcript with me.

The United States has made clear our view that Arafat is not part of the solution. He's part of the problem. But at the same time, as I think the secretary has made clear, the Israelis need to think about potential actions, discussion of expelling Arafat, because we don't see how it would be any better if he was outside the country working the capitals of the world.

Pretty much the way he put it.

QUESTION: (inaudible) more extreme, so keeping him in the occupied territory will contain him. That's what we understand?

BOUCHER: We don't understand it one way or the other. We just don't see how it would help the situation or help anybody move forward toward a more peaceful situation for Israelis and Palestinians alike.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) to Ramallah?

BOUCHER: I'm not going to dictate any particular treatment or location. We don't spend a whole lot of time worrying about Mr. Arafat anymore.

QUESTION: So, Mr. Arafat we keep hearing, you know, various solutions to getting him out of the way. What kind of obstruction is he putting up to the peace process? I mean, he has been a leader for, God knows, 35 years and he should have the cause of Palestinians at heart. So what kind of political or other obstructions is he putting up that people are saying that he is part of the problem?

BOUCHER: I think, first of all, we've talked about this...

QUESTION: Yes.

BOUCHER: ... many times, over many years, including in the president's speech last -- a year ago, June 24th. The most recent question that's come up is whether or not he's going to allow the control and consolidation of the security services under a government that was chosen by the Palestinian legislature to take authority for the Palestinian Authority.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) initial control, now they want security. He will be left with nothing.

BOUCHER: You sound like we're picking his pocket; we're not. The Palestinians are establishing institutions that can support a state.

Let's not forget what this is all about. It's about creating a Palestinian state, to take responsibility in its own areas, that can have responsibility vis-a-vis its own people and vis-a-vis its neighbors.

If you're going to create those institutions, you have to operate on a transparent and solid and legal basis. And that's what the Palestinian legislature has tried to do in giving the authorities to the government, that's what the Palestinian government has done, in terms of finance, and that's what the Palestinian government needs to do in terms of security, as well.

We can't have a government competing with armed groups. No country has a government that has to -- it has to rival other armed groups for control of the security situation, at least not voluntarily.

And therefore, if we're talking about creating institutions that can support a Palestinian state, we're talking about Palestinian government that can take responsibility in all areas of government.

QUESTION: What's your reaction to the Security Council deciding to postpone the Libya vote, the Lockerbie vote?

BOUCHER: As you noted yesterday, the Security Council went on record publicly in adopting an agenda item that includes a vote on the resolution to lift U.N. sanctions on Libya. That meeting will now convene on Friday, September 12th, at 10:30 in the morning.

The United States agreed to this formal procedural motion, essentially allowing a short additional period of time while at the same time making the council's intent to vote on Friday, in order to resolve the matter in a way that would ultimately result in adoption of the resolution.

Nevertheless, we're very disappointed that the vote did not take place yesterday. Our hearts go out to the victims of -- to the families of the victims of the Lockerbie bombing who have been waiting so patiently for some closure.

We strongly regret that the families were faced with a situation of having to wait again for the fourth time for a vote in order to avoid a French veto of this resolution.

We do think the time is past due for bringing this resolution to a vote, but given the circumstances in the council yesterday, feel this is the best that could be worked out. We're satisfied that there is a strong commitment on the part of council members to proceed to a vote this coming Friday.

I'd note also that later yesterday Ambassador Negroponte, along with U.K. Ambassador Jones Parry and the Bulgarian ambassador, Tafrov, met with the victims' families at the U.S. mission to confer and discuss the situation.

QUESTION: Has France given you any indications that it will not veto on Friday?

BOUCHER: I'm not aware of anything like that. You'd have to ask the French what their intentions are.

QUESTION: Is this the final date or is there a chance of it being postponed again?

BOUCHER: This is a firmly scheduled agenda item. It's a firm schedule for a vote, which we have not had before when this was postponed before.

There was discussion, there was an unwritten understanding, there were things like that that were postponed. This is a much more firm commitment that we've had before.

I suppose the council, in its infinite wisdom, can decide to do what it wants if it desires. But this is a more -- a much clearer commitment than we've had before.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) any indication that they can reach a deal with the Libyans by Friday? They think they can deal with the Libyans?

BOUCHER: Again, that'll be something I have to ask the French if they think they can get some additional compensation or whatever for the families of the UTA bombing. Of course, we have every sympathy with their attempts to do so. We just don't think the families of the Pan Am 103 bombing should be forced to wait again and again.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) occurred on the security issue in the Palestinian situation. On the one hand, U.S. is clear is what they want: unified command. On the other, you don't want to micromanage Palestinian matters.

Mr. Wolf's out there, and his speciality was, or is to promote better security situation. Is he involved or is he there on-call to deal with the mechanics of this if it would be helpful, consolidating and all, lending his special expertise?

BOUCHER: I wouldn't describe his role as that way. I wouldn't say he's the mechanic here.

The mechanics have to be put together by the people who are going to run the Palestinian government. The politics have to be put together by the people who are going to run the Palestinian government. And the effective use of the institutions has to be handled by the people who are going to run the Palestinian government.

Obviously, the United States has long had an important role in conferring with both sides about security issues, and talking to them about their plans, and hearing from them what their plans are, particularly their plans to move against terrorism. But the organization and the determination need to come from the Palestinian side.

QUESTION: Richard, we've had a rewards for justice-type program. Is there something comparable that you'd like to see in the Middle East so that some of these so-called terrorist would be deactivated?

BOUCHER: The United States Rewards for Justice Program is always applied to American citizens who've died because of -- or to those who've killed American citizens, regardless of where it's happened. So in some cases, the Middle East would already apply.

QUESTION: Richard, does the U.S. government have an assessment of whether the North Korea nuclear facilities at Yongbyon are still active?

BOUCHER: I don't have one that I can share with you.

QUESTION: Are you aware that there's a Japanese news report suggesting that a senior State Department official yesterday told legislators on the Hill that it's your assessment that that plant has ceased the activity that was detected earlier this year?

BOUCHER: I don't have any assessment that I can share with you.

QUESTION: Change subject, Geneva?

BOUCHER: Please. Quickly.

QUESTION: Geneva. Anything more you can tell us about the agenda for that?

BOUCHER: Let me sort of walk to Geneva by reviewing where we are generally on the resolution first so you'll understand the context that Geneva comes in.

We've been continuing to discuss our draft resolution with other members of the Security Council in New York, in Washington and in capitals. There was an informal meeting yesterday afternoon with the permanent five members of the Security Council. At that meeting, we got some feedback on our draft. As I think has been reported, we heard from the French on proposed amendments to the text. The Russians offered us a separate set of suggestions.

We're reviewing those proposals. We'll respond after further internal consultations. This is the normal process that one goes through negotiating a Security Council resolution.

There are no additional meetings planned for New York prior to the secretary's trip to Geneva on Saturday. We will keep in touch with other delegations and other governments, however, in other ways.

The secretary spoke this morning with Foreign Minister Ivanov of Russia. He also spoke with Secretary General Kofi Annan. The discussion with Ivanov, I would describe it as a good and constructive exchange on the resolution and the elements of the resolution. We certainly welcomed the work that we've been able to do with the Russians so far on that matter.

We're also working with Secretary General Annan to prepare for a good meeting, a meeting in Geneva on Saturday.

As I think we've said before, we see it as an informal discussion among the Perm Five and the secretary general to discuss the situation in Iraq and discuss ideas about the resolution.

We would expect the discussion to be about the concepts of how we go forward in the resolution and generally with the United Nations on Iraq, not a negotiation of the text itself.

BOUCHER: As the president and the secretary have both stated, we're committed to advancing the cause of the resolution. And if the Geneva meeting can move the process forward, then we're willing to do what we can through that meeting and through our discussions in New York to get to a satisfactory conclusion to these negotiations.

QUESTION: Can you go a step further on Ivanov? I know you don't usually want to get into conversations. But Russia's position has been interpreted by some people as supportive and by other reporter as a little skeptical. Would you put them in the helpful column? I mean, they're not with France and German, for instance.

BOUCHER: I don't think we've quite done all the columns on this one yet. The views are still coming in.

What I would note is that we've had a separate dialogue with Russian than with France and Germany. We've had some separate discussions with Germany, as well.

I'm not going to try to negotiate specific ideas or proposals from different countries in a public forum. But I would say that we found the discussion with Russia very productive, constructive.

The comments on the substance that I would make are sort of our approach to this situation. We think that all council members do share, essentially, the same objective; that's to help Iraq and the Iraqi people exercise their full sovereignty as quickly as possible. The differences in the council we think should relate to the steps that need to be taken to get there. That's where the discussion should focus.

Proposals have to be grounded in the reality of the current situation. You can't pretend a war never happened. You can't pretend the coalition never happened. You can't pretend that the Iraqis have not already made considerable progress under the Governing Council, and that what we need to do is work with them, build on that progress, and see how all of us can help.

Our proposal takes, as a point of departure, the reality of the situation, that the coalition is already working with the allies -- the coalition is already working with the Governing Council, the Iraqis, to move forward towards the constitutional elections and also to move forward on the exercise of sovereignty.

BOUCHER: The point is not to argue either about which foreigner is going to take control in Iraq, the point is to go out and look and see what we can all do to support the Iraqis as they go forward in that process.

I would note also a press conference statement by the secretary general two days ago where he said it's not so much for the U.N. to go in and take over the administration and management of Iraq, but for us to ensure that we accelerate the establishment of a government and the transfer of authority, and to have the Iraqis run their own affairs, as indicated in the Security Council resolution. That's what we would hope all parties would be prepared to go talk about in Geneva.

QUESTION: You never mention the Chinese at all. Have there been discussions recently? I mean, how long ago did Secretary Powell speak with...

BOUCHER: The secretary talked to the Chinese foreign minister about a week ago.

QUESTION: Last week? Right.

BOUCHER: Yes, last week.

Certainly, they've been participating and speaking up at the Perm Five meeting that took place yesterday and the other discussions in New York.

I'm not trying to convey views on behalf of all those who had views. We've also had specific comments and constructive discussions with the British, with the Spanish, and probably with several others who I should probably mention but can't remember.

So we've had some very specific discussions, heard specific proposals and constructive ones from a number of countries.

QUESTION: Have the Chinese given you a list of suggested...

BOUCHER: I'm not aware that they have. But if you want a whole list of who's given us specifics, I think you'd have to check with the countries.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

BOUCHER: If you want a whole list of the P-5 members who presented changes, I'll have to demur on that, too. I'm just not sure I've got the whole list.

QUESTION: Richard, can you help us understand what it is that these other governments are to get out of essentially contributing, you know, thousands of their own troops who could potentially become cannon fodder for these terrorists and allowing them to pitch in with various NGOs. What is it that they are supposed to get out of, you know, this whole participatory process?

BOUCHER: A safer world. A better environment for their children and grandchildren to grow up in.

I think despite differences over the war itself, that most countries recognize that building of a stable Iraq, has representative government, can be an important element in building a more stable region. It's important to their security that this process succeed, whether or not they agreed with going to war in the first place.

BOUCHER: And I think we've actually had that and heard that and seen that in public from statements from various governments.

And the governments that are considering contributing troops or who are contributing troops, governments that are contributing money or are considering money, the governments who are supporting or considering supporting U.N. resolutions, I'm sure are looking at it from their own point of view, that it's better for them in the long run for this process to succeed in Iraq than to have Iraq go back to being some kind of source of instability.

Certainly, the United States has made that decision, and the president expressed that decision quite clearly on Sunday night when he asked for not only the commitment to do so, but the money to do so as well.

QUESTION: Does the U.S. believe, then, that without the help of the international community, beyond the countries that are already participating, that this process is destined to fail?

BOUCHER: No. The president expressed our commitment to succeed.

QUESTION: No, I understand, but you're reaching out to the international community, so I'm just wondering if the U.S. believes that without the additional troops, without the additional money, that it can't succeed.

BOUCHER: No. The president expressed our commitment to succeed, and we are going to succeed in this. He also made clear there's an opportunity for others to take steps that contribute to their own security, that contribute to their own well-being, contribute to the well-being of the people of Iraq.

QUESTION: Change of subject? Vienna? How's it going with the new resolution? Does it look like you're going to get it passed?

BOUCHER: Discussions continue in Vienna. I'm not sure there's any update. It's also not clear exactly when the vote might be, but I don't -- I was going to say, I don't think it'll be today.

We're still working actively with other members on the strongest possible board resolution. France, Germany and the United Kingdom have jointly proposed a draft board resolution on Iran that highlights the international community's concerns.

The resolution calls on Iran to take essential and urgent steps to answer fully the unresolved questions from the agency, to cooperate fully with the agency's ongoing investigation, and to take these actions by the end of October.

We strongly support these objectives, and I think, as you know, we've worked with them in developing this resolution. Negotiations are continuing today in Vienna, so we'll see where that leads to in terms of a vote and a text.

We would say once again that Dr. ElBaradei's June and August reports on Iran clearly confirm that Iran has failed to meet its obligations.

BOUCHER: Under its Safeguards Agreement, we believe the director general's reports provide a compelling evidence of Iran's noncompliance with its obligations.

QUESTION: In Indonesia, the person responsible for the Bali bombings last year was sentenced to death today? Do you have any reaction to this?

BOUCHER: I think this is the second, or maybe more, sentencing involving the Bali bombings. And we commend the government of Indonesia for the professional manner in which it conducted this trial.

The court sentenced Imam Samudra for his role in planning and executing the bombing. This was the worst act of terrorism since September 11th attacks on the United States. And we, once again, extend our sympathy to the families.

Bringing the perpetrators to justice is an important step in ensuring that what happened in Bali is not repeated.

QUESTION: (inaudible) respond to some remarks published today by Joschka Fischer in a German magazine calling the U.S. postwar policy in Iraq a complete failure.

BOUCHER: Haven't seen those remarks. I'd want to see how he said it and where he said it and what the context was. Obviously, that's not the way we would characterize the situation.

QUESTION: On the case of Charles Li, do you have any updates on that?

BOUCHER: U.S. embassy officials in Beijing spoke with ministry of foreign affairs officials on September 8th concerning imprisoned American Chuck Li. This was one of several matters involving U.S. prisoners which was discussed. The conversation was one of the many opportunities that embassy and consular officials in China have taken to express our continuing interest in Mr. Li's welfare and his well being while he remains in custody serving his sentence.

We last spoke to him directly on August 15th. The last visit was in early August. We've spoken with him, or met with him, 10 times in the last three months.

QUESTION: Who requested this meeting?

BOUCHER: I'll have to check on that. I think we went in to talk to them about a number of cases.

QUESTION: Does that meeting have anything to do with the genocide lawsuit filed by the Falun Gong practitioner around the world?

BOUCHER: Not that I'm aware of.

QUESTION: Any reaction on the Cuba vote last night in the House and can you say more generally why the administration feels so strongly about this that it's prepared to -- has issued a veto threat?

BOUCHER: The administration position is available on the White House Web site, the statement of the administration position. So I assume you've already seen it?

For others who haven't seen that, go to the White House Web site and search on SAP and you can find the position on that.

The basic rationale is that providing material benefit to a regime which, only six months ago, undertook the most significant act of political repression in the Americas in a decade strikes us as deeply unwise.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) general in Burma has said that if they do release Aung San Suu Kyi, it would cause instability and they said they could face protests. They won't want to release because of that and you've criticize that in the last weeks. Are you putting more pressure on the military junta?

BOUCHER: I hadn't seen those remarks. They're obviously ridiculous. And we continue to work with others in the international community to try to see that she and her followers are freed from this detention.

QUESTION: Do you know what's happened to the North Korean weapons expert who was arrested in China? He was trying to defect to Australia.

BOUCHER: I haven't heard that story. Sorry.

QUESTION: OK.

END

LOAD-DATE: September 11, 2003

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

TYPE: NEWS BRIEFING

NOTES:

[????] - Indicates Speaker Unknown

[-] - Indicates could not make out what was being said.[off mike] - Indicates could not make out what was being said.

Copyright 2003 FDCHeMedia, Inc. All Rights Reserved.

296 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

September 8, 2003 Monday

Myanmar announces arrest of 400 human traffickers this year

SECTION: International NewsLENGTH: 389 wordsDATELINE: YANGON, Sept 8

Myanmar police have uncovered 223 cases of human trafficking this year, arresting 417 traffickers and rescuing over 1,000 youths bound for the illicit trade, according to figures announced Monday.

The announcement follows intense pressure on Yangon by arch-critic Washington to boost efforts to crackdown on the illegal trade in humans.

"Eighty-three of the human trafficking cases have already been decided by the courts, and those found to be guilty given effective sentences," the New Light of Myanmar cited new Prime Minister General Khin Nyunt as saying.

No details of the sentences were provided.

It said 192 females were among those suspected traffickers detained in the operations from January through August, while 1,106 "gullible youths" including 495 girls were saved from being trafficked outside the country.

"Today, the problem of human trafficking has become more prominent than before, and various nations have begun to address it seriously," Khin Nyunt was quoted as saying in a speech to police officers.

"As far as Myanmar is concerned, the issue is also serious, although indications are that this was not the work of syndicated gangs.

"We are addressing it as a national issue because we do not want our young women's lives to be destroyed," he added.

Myanmar youths, particularly girls, are routinely swept up into the sex trade, lured to neighbouring countries like Thailand under the pretense of being placed into service industry jobs such as housekeeping.

The daily also said authorities prevented 82,251 persons from crossing the border illegally as of July this year, of whom 11,544 were sent home after a reprimand while 10,028 were prosecuted.

Myanmar has been rebuked by Washington for what the US State Department perceives is a failure to combat human trafficking.

In its third annual "Trafficking in Persons Report" released in June, the department kept Myanmar on its "Tier 3" list, a designation which can lead to a cut off in non-humanitarian and non-trade-related US aid unless Yangon acts to meet Washington's trafficking concerns.

Yangon is already under punishing new sanctions imposed by Washington last month, the product of international outrage following the arrest of democracy leader Aung San Suu Kyi in late May.

kmt/mlm/pt/rcw

Myanmar-trafficking

LOAD-DATE: September 9, 2003LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

297 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Federal Document Clearing House Congressional Testimony

July 31, 2003 Thursday

CORRUPTION IN ECONOMY OF NORTH KOREA

SECTION: CAPITOL HILL HEARING TESTIMONY

LENGTH: 1684 words

Statement of Michael J. Horowitz Senior Fellow, Hudson Institute

Before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee

July 31, 2003

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, thank you for inviting me to share information and my views on the issue that will best test America's capacity for decency and greatness - one that may also best determine the world's safety and security.

I'm particularly honored to participate in a hearing designed to expose the most corrupt aspects of North Korea's so-called "economy." A significant purpose of my testimony is to speak of a truly evil income-producing activity in which the Pyongyang regime is actively engaged, beyond its better-known export of missiles and drugs. There's a third export category which is a growing and increasingly important source of cash to Kim Jong Il and the leadership cadres around him: the export of human beings as slaves.

The Trafficking in Persons Office, in its June report issued pursuant to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, rightly listed North Korea as a so-called Tier 3 country. It did so because of two separate categories of deliberately enslaved North Koreans whom the regime literally "exports": women sold either as prostitutes or "wives" of rural Chinese men; and men "contracted" to work in Siberian logging camps. As to the women, human rights and religious observers have reported that tens of thousands of North Korean women are sold to brothels or to Chinese "snake" traders. Here's a report that appeared in August 2002 in the South Korean magazine Women's News:

The victims are reported to be sold to old bachelors or widowers in the countryside for 3000 yuan (a little over $400) each and forced into marriage. According to a North Korean women support group, in most cases a few men from the same village pool their money to purchase one woman. If five men buy the joint ownership of one woman, the woman is forced to have sex with all five of them by night and take care of all five households and farms by day. There are cases where brothers buy and share one woman. A woman caught and sold to a village becomes an important village property. And so all the villagers keep watch over the woman, making escape impossible. On top of this, marriage between North Korean refugees and Chinese nationals is not recognized by law, meaning that these women have nowhere to turn to for protection.

Originally reported by Claudia Rosett of the Wall Street Journal, the mistreatment and fate of men sent to Siberian logging camps is equally inhuman. Begun in the mid-sixties as a bargain between the regimes of Leonid Brezhnev and Kim Il Sung, father of North Korea's current "Dear Leader" dictator, the Pyongyang-Moscow labor program is now employed by the North Korean regime in part as a means by which it repays debts to Russia and finances trade barter with that country. North Korean loggers are housed in unheated facilities, often without windows notwithstanding 50 degree below zero temperatures. As reported by Human Rights Watch, men are required to work 16-18 hours a day, given almost no food, are of course wholly separated from their families and have their movements controlled by regime security guards. Other observers have noted that men seeking escape or asylum or even temporary respite from monitoring by their North Korean guards are routinely tortured and in most cases put to death. Needless to say, tens of thousands of "contract labor" men have died and continue to die in logging camps now estimated to employ no fewer than 15,000-20,000 men.

The above examples of deliberate, for-profit slave trade by the Pyongyang regime is and should be shocking to the conscience of all mankind. But there is an additional fact - even more shocking - that perhaps provides the best indication of what life is like inside the evil, lunatic regime of Kim Jong Il.

In fact, knowing much of the death camp character of Russian logging camps, many men seek to work there as an alternative to continuing life inside North Korea.

In fact, knowing that they risk capture in China either by traffickers who will rape and sell them or by Chinese authorities who will return them to North Korea for certain imprisonment in gulags, many women seek escape to China as an alternative to continuing life inside North Korea.

The reasons why people "choose" Siberian logging/death camps and fugitive lives inside China are not only, not primarily, "economic." North Korean Christians routinely risk their lives to escape North Korea's borders on any terms because they know that discovery of a bible which they or any member of their family may hold in secret will expose all of them to imprisonment and torture. Residents of portions of North Korea thought not to be sufficiently loyal to the regime also routinely risk their lives to escape because they know that the regime will initiate genocidal starvation campaigns on their villages. Others, human beings in the fullest sense of the term, crave basic freedoms and know they will be imprisoned and tortured for manifesting the smallest sign of that desire, and find it preferable to risk their lives to escape.

I also appear before the Committee today, Mr. Chairman, as a representative of an extraordinary group now being formed in the United States: the North Korea Freedom Coalition. Chaired by Concerned Women for America's president, Sandy Rios, who has been to North Korea and the North Korea-China border, this coalition held its opening session last week. More than 35 religious groups pledged their active participation in the coalition, as did - and this is critical - representatives of the Korean American communities of the United States.

This coalition, which ranges from the National Association of Evangelicals to the Religious Action Center of Reform Judaism, from Korean American leadership groups of New York to Korean American leadership groups of Los Angeles, has an overarching, strategic public policy goal. It will passionately work to put at the core of U.S. foreign policy towards North Korea a commitment to address and ameliorate the human rights conditions under which those living under the Pyongyang regime must now endure. Put in other terms, the North Korea Freedom Coalition and its members will use every democratic resource at its command to ensure that no agreement with Pyongyang of which the United States is a part purports to exchange promises by Pyongyang not to export its terrorism for licenses and subsidies to the regime to continue practicing terrorism against its own people.

The Coalition also intends to work with church and human rights groups in South Korea to oppose the South Korean government's current unwillingness to seek human rights and democracy for the people of North Korea. In particular, the Coalition intends to do all within its power to broadcast and counter the seeming policy of the South Korean government to maintain the Pyongyang regime in power because it fears, based on the experience of West Germany following the collapse of East Germany, that freedom for its North Korean brothers and sisters will impose unduly costly burdens on the South Korean economy.

The Coalition will also focus on the condition of North Korean refugees and would-be defectors and will work to provide safe harbor protection for those starving and vulnerable victims. This will be done through calls to revise U.S. immigration law, through pressures the Coalition intends to place on the United Nations to more aggressively seek access to North Korean refugees in China, and through efforts it intends to make with the South Korean and Chinese governments to ensure fair, safe and legal treatment of North Korean refugees.

The Coalition expects to soon begin active work with Members of Congress to introduce and enact major legislation focused on true Korean Peninsular security and North Korean freedom. As indicated, any such legislation will contain provisions to protect North Korean refugees, and provisions restricting U.S. burden-sharing support for countries impacted by the North Korean economy to those actively committed to promoting North Korean human rights. In addition, the Coalition will support legislation to provide financial support for North Korea human rights organizations and will seek to ensure fulfillment of Chairman Lugar's recent request to Kofi Annan that the U.N. prepare reports on the North Korean gulag system, and will seek to mandate United States intelligence agencies to prepare similar, public reports. The Coalition will seek to expand Radio Free Asia and Voice of America Korean language broadcasts into North Korea, will seek authorization for the Commission on International Religious Liberty to hold educational hearings on religious persecution in North Korea, and will seek more active United States monitoring of North Korean drug smuggling activities.

But perhaps most of all, the legislation and the Coalition will seek to ensure that no financial aid will be given to the Pyongyang regime under any negotiated agreement to which the United States is a party unless the agreement ensures measurable progress in such areas as family reunification, expanded religious freedom, freedom to migrate by families of persons kidnapped by the North Korean regime, modification of the regime's definitions and prosecutions of "political crimes," active gulag monitoring by outside bodies and monitored assurances that food aid to the regime actually goes to starving people on a needs basis.

The Coalition believes as, from all we know, what President Bush believes: That American interests are best pursued by respect for American values, and that American security in a post-9/11 world is best ensured by the spread of human rights and democracy.

I thank this Committee for holding hearings today based on those principles and thus believe that today's hearings will contribute both to American security and to the amelioration of the inhuman conditions which the current residents of North Korea must now endure.

LOAD-DATE: August 1, 2003

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

COMMITTEE: SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS

TESTIMONY-BY: MICHAEL J. HOROWITZ, SENIOR FELLOW

AFFILIATION: HUDSON INSTITUTE

Copyright 2003 FDCHeMedia, Inc. All Rights Reserved.

298 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Federal News Service

June 25, 2003 Wednesday

PREPARED TESTIMONY OF GARY A. HAUGEN PRESIDENT & CEO, INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE MISSIONBEFORE THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS
SUBCOMMITTEE ON INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM, NONPROLIFERATION AND HUMAN RIGHTS

SECTION: PREPARED TESTIMONY

LENGTH: 4317 words

Mr. Chairman,

My name is Gary Haugen and I serve as the President of International Justice Mission (IJM). On behalf of IJM, I would like to express my thanks to the Committee for the privilege of participating in this important hearing on Global Trends in Trafficking and the Trafficking in Persons Report.

International Justice Mission is an international human rights agency that provides a hands-on, operational field response to cases of human rights abuse referred to us from faith-based ministries serving around the world. Frequently these workers observe severe human rights abuses in the communities where they serve. These workers refer these cases to us, and then we conduct a professional investigation to document the abuses and mobilize intervention on behalf of the victims. Many of the cases referred to us involve women and children abducted into sex trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation. Accordingly, we deploy criminal investigators to infiltrate the brothels, use surveillance technology to document where the victims are being held, and then identify secure police contacts who will conduct raids with us to release the victims and arrest the perpetrators. We then coordinate the referral of these victims to appropriate aftercare, and support and monitor the prosecutions.

Ijm investigators have spent literally thousands of hours infiltrating the sex trafficking industry and working with government authorities around the world to bring effective rescue to the victims and accountability to the perpetrators. In the process, Ijm is gaining, I believe, some precise insights about the nature of the problem and helpful lessons about concrete steps that actually prove effective in fighting sex trafficking. We are grateful, therefore, for the opportunity to share something of what we have learned with this Committee.

Of course, most of what we have learned has come from the victims of sex trafficking themselves - the hundreds upon hundreds of individual women and girls whom we have come to know by name around the world. The hundreds of women and children who have been abducted, assaulted, bought and sold, tortured and raped as part of a moneymaking enterprise. Everything useful that we have learned has emerged from entering into the nightmare experience of girls like Balamani. We first came to know Balamani because another girl we had rescued from a brothel took us back on a follow-up raid to show us the underground dungeon in which other young trafficking victims were being hidden. Balamani was about 17-years-old when she was lured from her rural village in South Asia with promises of a job working as a domestic servant or at a medical center in the city. A local trafficker won her trust and diverted her to a larger city on the other side of the country where she was sold into a brothel for about $170. Once inside the brothel she was ferociously beaten by the brothel keepers and forced to provide sex to the customers. From then on, Balamani had to service between 15 and 20 customers per day- 7 days a week- from 11.00 am until 5:00 am- everyday for 10 months. Some police regularly frequented the brothel to collect their weekly bribe, and routinely threatened to take the young girls out as a way of extorting a larger bribe from the brothel keeper.

Based on information from other rescued girls, IJM was able to lead a raid on the brothel and rescue Balamani and about a dozen other girls out of this nightmare of brutal rape and slavery. Balamani responded well to the provision of aftercare and was able to return to her village, find work, and even expressed a willingness to testify against the brutal brothel keepers who were now facing prosecution. But before she was able to do so, the deadly legacy of her abuse in the brothel seized her body. The HIV virus that had been forcibly injected into her body exploded into full-blown AIDS and soon she lay dying on a gurney, painfully assaulted now by tuberculosis, meningitis and a host of sexually transmitted diseases. A few days ago, Balamani died with my colleagues by her side. She was slowly, and horribly murdered by the traffickers, pimps and brothel customers who abused her. And by the police who protected the criminals rather than the vulnerable teenage girl.

Balamani's story gives a face and a heart to the otherwise mind-numbing statistics about the epidemic of sex trafficking in our world. But also within Balamani's story are insights about why this global atrocity is one of the most preventable catastrophes in our world today.

The simple fact of the matter is this: sex trafficking only flourishes where it is tolerated by local law enforcement. The business of sex trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation requires that the perpetrators commit multiple felonies of abduction, rape, assault, and false imprisonment - and then it requires that the perpetrators hold out the victims of these crimes openly to the public so that the customers can find them. It does no good at all for the brothel keepers and pimps to hide their victims. In fact, to make money on their investment, the pimps and brothel keepers must make their victims openly available to the customer public - and not just once, but continuously, and over a long period of time. Obviously, therefore, if the customers can find the victims of sex trafficking whenever they want, so can the police. How, therefore, do you possibly get away with running a sex trafficking enterprise? You do so only if permitted by local law enforcement. Generally, this is facilitated by bringing the police into the business and sharing the profits with them in exchange for protection against the enforcement of the laws that are openly and continuously violated every single day the business is in operation. Certainly sex trafficking is exacerbated by poverty and economic desperation; but we do not find epidemic levels of sex trafficking wherever we find poverty in the world. Rather, sex trafficking flourishes on a large scale only in those countries where it is tolerated by local law enforcement.

This is the indispensable insight about the fundamental vulnerability of sex trafficking that must be grasped. Sex trafficking requires the commission of multiple felonies in a way that is held out openly to the public. Therefore it can be shut down wherever there is the political will and operational resources to do so.

Sex trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation can be drastically reduced wherever a country has the political will and the operational capacity to send the perpetrators to jail and to treat the victims with compassion and dignity. This is a fight that can actually be won. In fact, this was the animating conviction behind the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA). The TVPA sought to influence the political will of countries with serious trafficking problems by making clear that there would be consequences for a country's relationship with the United States, including the possibility of sanctions, if that country did not make significant efforts to meet minimum standards in combating sex trafficking. Secondly, the TVPA also authorized grants to help strengthen a country's capacity to address sex trafficking through prevention, prosecution, and protection activities.

The authors of the TVPA understood that it was essential to strengthen both the political will and the operational capacity of countries to fight sex trafficking. It was well understood that in many countries the victims of sex trafficking fundamentally lack the voice and power to make themselves a priority for national law enforcement.

Sex trafficking operations prey upon the most marginalized groups in society - women, children, refugees, undocumented persons, ethnic minorities and the poor. Fundamentally, political leaders do not feel threatened in their hold on power if they fail to protect impoverished and low-status women and girls. Scarce law enforcement resources are deployed to protect the things that societies value the most, and thus women and children are often left utterly vulnerable to the brutalities of the commercial sex trade. Accordingly, the TVPA endeavored to place the voice and values of the American people on the side of these vulnerable women and children by making it clear that their abuse would not be tolerated. Specifically, the TVPA established the Office to Combat and Monitor Trafficking in Persons to provide a voice of accountability for the otherwise voiceless victims of trafficking. This new office would tell the truth about whether a country was vigorously defending women and children against the horrors of trafficking, with the understanding that those countries unwilling to provide such basic protections would find an adverse impact on their relationship with the United States.

This was the theory behind the policy expressed in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000. All of the great effort in passing the TVPA was intended to actually make a real-world difference for the women and children being crushed by the forces of sex trafficking. I offer this review simply to ask whether the policy is actually having its intended effect. What have we learned about the efforts to implement the policy that actually make a difference and what have we learned about those actions that undermine the impact of the policy? In a number of countries, IJM has been working hand-in-hand with foreign governments, NGOs and State Department personnel to conduct hands-on operations to rescue victims and to bring perpetrators to justice, and we are learning about the practical impact of U.S. policy at the street level. Our experience is starting to demonstrate that, as we all hoped, the policy can have a tremendous impact if implemented vigorously.

What makes the policy actually work?

I would suggest three things:

1. Vigorous and transparent reporting on a government's record on sex trafficking convictions and police disciplinary actions;
2. A credible and clearly communicated threat of consequences for governments that are not taking serious steps to actually send perpetrators to jail and to get police out of the trafficking business; and
3. Focused and practical capacity building for sending perpetrators to jail and caring compassionately for victims.

I would like to take a moment to examine these one at a time. First, vigorous and transparent reporting on a government's record on sex trafficking convictions and police disciplinary actions.

The purpose of the Trafficking In Persons Report is simple: it is intended to provide accountability. Therefore, the report has its intended effect when it is actually written in a way that makes accountability easy, rather than making it hard. We should make no mistake. There are those who will have an interest in making clear accountability harder rather than easier- and there are ways to fashion a document that either promotes accountability or obscures accountability. Effective accountability is achieved when the Report provides specific, objective, transparent data on a government's actions that actually matter. And from the perspective of the sex traffickers, only two government actions matter: a) Is the government seriously threatening to actually send me to jail for doing this? and b) Is the government seriously threatening to remove the police protection that I have paid for?

Consequently, effective accountability regarding the seriousness of a government's efforts to combat trafficking will only begin to emerge when there is specific objective data on the number of successful trafficking-related convictions resulting in jail time, as well as data on the number of disciplinary actions that have been taken against police who are complicit in protecting sex trafficking operations (remembering that such operations simply don't exist on a significant scale without such protection).

Again, it must be emphasized that the relevant data point is convictions - not raids, arrests, and prosecutions. Traffickers, brothel keepers, and pimps are quite willing to endure raids, arrests, and even prosecutions if, at the end of the day, they don't have to actually go to prison. In fact, such actions are just considered part of the cost of doing business. Moreover, even the most corrupt police carry out raids, arrests and initiate prosecutions. In fact, they must do so in order to maintain the credible threat by which they extort bribes from the perpetrators. That is why countries with the worst sex trafficking records can report raids, arrests, and prosecutions; but such countries have very little to report in terms of actual convictions. None of these other actions turn into a credible law enforcement threat that actually deters sex trafficking unless they result in convictions with imprisonment. This is the only cost of doing business that the perpetrators are unwilling to pay. This is why IJM is so pleased that the new Director of the Office to Combat and Monitor Trafficking in Persons, the Hon. John Miller, has adopted as the policy of his office that governments wishing to be certified as making serious efforts to meet minimum standards in combating sex trafficking must bear the burden of providing objective data on trafficking-related convictions and police disciplinary actions. After all, these governments are themselves in the best position to report on their own positive actions, and the Office cannot be reasonably expected to affirmatively certify that a government is making significant efforts if the government provides no verifiable data on these two most basic responsibilities. Self-reporting by a government regarding its own counter-trafficking initiatives with follow-up by the State Department provides the best means for transparency and accountability. As the TIP Report states, "... national governments must supply such information." (See Trafficking in Persons Report, June 2003, p. 17).

The second ingredient for making the TVPA policy actually work has been a credible and clearly communicated threat of consequences for governments that are not taking serious steps to actually send perpetrators to jail and to get police out of the trafficking business.

In order to bring effective protection to women and children vulnerable to sex trafficking, governments must move counter-trafficking efforts from being a good idea to being an urgent priority. And in reality, the only dynamic that generates such a shift is usually the belief that something bad will happen if they fail to do so. This is why the threat of possible sanctions was incorporated within the legislation for countries placed on Tier 3 of the Trafficking In Persons Report (TIP). In this regard, we have found that trafficking issues become an urgent priority for the worst offending countries only after they have been placed on Tier 3 or faced a credible risk of being placed on Tier 3. While some countries may diplomatically protest their placement on Tier 2, foreign governments clearly understand that actual consequences for their poor trafficking record only kick in if they are on Tier 3. Among countries with serious trafficking problems, therefore, it is only the credible risk of Tier 3 sanctions that actually moves countries to earnestly make the work of combating trafficking an urgent law enforcement priority, rather than just a public relations nuisance.

Accordingly, a TIP Report that presumes that Tier 3 status for certain countries is diplomatically intolerable or politically untenable severely undermines the effectiveness of the TIP Report process. An unspoken but de facto presumption against a Tier 3 ranking effectively freezes the status quo of the worst offending nations and weakens the TVPA's capacity to impact political will. It profoundly dishonors the suffering of women and children brutalized by sex trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation. Likewise, the TVPA's capacity to strengthen the political will of authorities to end the toleration of sex trafficking is utterly diluted by the failure to articulate clearly to foreign governments the straightforward requirements of the TVPA and the real risks of consequences associated with a poor trafficking record.

Finally, U.S. policy is effectively advanced through focused and practical capacity building for programs that send perpetrators to jail and care compassionately for victims. In addition to political will, foreign governments also need the practical wherewithal to take decisive law enforcement measures to combat trafficking and to care for the victims. Accordingly, U.S. policy is advanced by funding programs that address the intensely practical challenges of strengthening law enforcement capacities to investigate, arrest and successfully prosecute sex trafficking offenders.

Programs are needed to support special anti-trafficking police units and prosecutorial teams with training, operational support, and hands-on assistance in achieving the priority outcome of sending offenders to jail and removing dirty cops.

Education, awareness, and poverty alleviation programs are important preventative measures, but such programs will never be able to keep pace with the entrepreneurial energy and creativity of the traffickers unless they are combined with practical programs that act, tally help make national law enforcement successful in sending perpetrators to jail. Police complicity in sex trafficking has been so pervasive and ugly that many have been tempted to imagine solutions that simply ignore the police. But in combating any crime, the answer to bad law enforcement is never no law enforcement - the answer must always be a committed struggle for better law enforcement.

Accordingly, IJM is very pleased that recent legislation has cleared the way for funding by USAID and other agencies of targeted programs that strengthen counter-trafficking activities of specialized police and prosecution units, as well as legal advocacy to protect victims and to bring perpetrators to justice. (See the Consolidated Appropriations Resolution, 2003 (PL. 108-7).)

Equally critical are programs that fund comprehensive and compassionate aftercare services for the victims of sex trafficking. Not only are such programs necessary to treat victims with the dignity and care that they deserve, but they are also absolutely indispensable for establishing the victim cooperation that is essential for any meaningful counter-trafficking endeavor. At present, the existing capacities for providing comprehensive aftercare for the victims of sex trafficking are tragically inadequate. In fact, IJM has found itself limited in the rescue operations it could conduct for victims because of the lack of aftercare capacity. This is a need that can and must be addressed by targeted and generous appropriations.

Additional opportunities to fund programs to fight sex trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation have emerged as a result of President Bush's bold initiative to combat the AIDS epidemic. Research has demonstrated that sex trafficking is one of the great engines driving the spread of the AIDS global pandemic, and while traditional AIDS prevention programs of education and awareness go a long way in helping women and girls make good choices in avoiding high-risk sexual activities, these programs do nothing to protect the millions of women and girls who do not get to make choices about their sexual encounters - particularly the millions of victims of commercial sexual exploitation like Balamani who are forcibly infected with the HIV virus. Accordingly, federal funding of programs aimed at combating the international AIDS epidemic must include support of programs to combat sex trafficking and other forms of sexual violence against women and girls, or else America's effort to fight AIDS will simply fail to address one of the fundamental and certainly most brutal causes of the epidemic.

Finally, in recent weeks IJM has directly experienced the positive impact of U.S. policy in combating sex trafficking in Cambodia. More than two years ago, IJM began conducting extensive investigations into one of the most appalling cesspools of child prostitution in the world, a village called Svay Pak outside Phnom Penh where scores of girls between the ages of 5 and 12 were being sold in an open market for pedophiles and sex tourists. Over a two-year period we turned our investigative findings over to Cambodian authorities, but failed to obtain a satisfying response. Then last year, the TIP Report placed Cambodia on Tier 3 and the new U.S. Ambassador to Cambodia Ambassador (3.aries A. Ray, initiated a very proactive engagement with the senior Cambodian authorities on U.S. policy toward trafficking. %is direct advocacy with Cambodian authorities and the excellent work of Ambassador Ray's staff, helped make it possible for IJM and the Cambodian authorities to bring rescue to 37 minor victims of commercial sexual exploitation out of Svay Pak, including about a dozen children between the ages of 5 and 10. In addition, approximately 12 suspects have been arrested and charged, with cooperative police investigations continuing with IJM to locate and prosecute additional suspects identified in our initial report.

Not only did these actions lead to the release of children from unspeakable horrors of sexual abuse; but also perhaps of even greater long-term significance, the senior Cambodian police official who was allegedly protecting and profiting from the child sex industry in Svay Pak has now been fired and finds himself behind bars facing a closely monitored prosecution. This is, of course, the other face of sex trafficking - the face of those police and public authorities who provide the official protection without which the open assault and rape of children could never flourish. When such corrupt authorities are brought to account, it will be the traffickers and brothel keepers who will live in fear, rather than the children of a, or South Asia, or West Africa or Eastern Europe. We will not have to watch the Balamanis waste away in pain and death, but can secure for them the life of goodness and hope we seek for our own daughters.

In the case of Cambodia, Ambassador Ray, and representatives of the U.S. State Department were very successful in making clear to the Cambodian authorities the priority that American foreign policy places on addressing sex trafficking. Senior Cambodian authorities were well and effectively briefed on the dynamics and significance of the tier rating system of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, and on the consequences of failing to make significant efforts to meet minimum standards in combating trafficking. Cosequently, by the time IJM was able to brief the Cambodian authorities on our latest Svay Pak investigation, they were prepared to provide extraordinary cooperation in working with IJM to seek rescue for the victims and to pursue accountability for the perpetrators. We believe that the advocacy of the U.S. Embassy with the Cambodian authorities was an indispensable and decisive factor in generating effective law enforcement cooperation.

These actions have paved the way for significant and continuing progress in mobilizing effective law enforcement responses to human trafficking in Cambodia. Cambodian police authorities have had a positive experience of effective counter-trafficking investigations and enforcement actions with IJM that produced arrests, proper charges, and compelling evidence for prosecution. They have participated in groundbreaking procedures for humanely conducting victim interviews in the presence of a social worker and an NGO lawyer-monitor while being videotape& They have also requested further training from IJM in effective counter-trafficking investigations and enforcement actions.

Of course, it will be very important to continue to monitor the actions of the Cambodian authorities as they follow up on these specific cases, and as they persevere in vigorous efforts to investigate and successfully prosecute sex trafficking crimes on an on-going basis. Cambodia has had a very poor record of tolerating sex trafficking (especially among very young children) and such a record cannot be turned around overnight. But we believe that a very promising beginning has been made in supporting the Cambodian government in taking a new direction to seriously combat sex trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation.

We believe these encouraging events help to serve as a model for what can be achieved when there is transparent reporting through the TIP Report, a meaningful application of the der rating system, direct advocacy by U.S. authorities at the highest levels of government, and tangible, practical assistance to foreign governments in bringing rescue to trafficking victims and justice to perpetrators.

I would also like to thank Congress for recently passing the PROTECT Act, paving the way for U.S. Attorneys' Offices to vigorously prosecute Americans who travel abroad and exploit young girls. The Act eliminates the intent requirement and necessitates only that a prosecutor prove an American committed an illicit sexual act abroad. As the little victims in Cambodia have told my colleagues, many of their clients were Americans. It is imperative that the U.S. crush the demand created by ks own citizenry.

IJM looks forward to continuing its constructive work with the U.S. State Department, foreign governments, and panner NGOs in helping to ensure that the promises of U.S. policy in fighting sex trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation deliver tangible results to vulnerable women and children and hastens the day when these brutal enterprises of rape-for-profit are simply put out of business.

Thank you very much.

END

LOAD-DATE: July 4, 2003

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

TYPE: Washington-dateline general news.

Copyright 2003 Federal News Service, Inc.

299 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Federal News Service

June 25, 2003 Wednesday

PREPARED STATEMENT OF MOHAMED Y. MATTAR, S.J.D. CO-DIRECTOR, THE PROTECTION PROJECT AT JOHNS HOPKINS UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF ADVANCED INTERNATIONAL STUDIES

BEFORE THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS
SUBCOMMITTEE ON INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM, NONPROLIFERATION AND HUMAN RIGHTS

SECTION: PREPARED TESTIMONY

LENGTH: 10879 words

A Comparative Analysis of the Anti-Trafficking Legislation in Foreign Countries: Towards a Comprehensive and Effective Legal Response to Combating Trafficking in Persons

The Status of the Early "Procuration Laws" and the "Prostitution Laws." On June 28, 1999, Laura Lederer, the former Director of The Protection Project at Johns Hopkins University School of Advanced International Studies testified before the 106th Congress stating:

"We have found that more than 154 countries currently have legislation that at least minimally target the prosecution of traffickers by prohibiting the procuration of women or children for the purposes of prostitution and forced labor. Most of these laws were drafted between 1912 and 1960 to address earlier waves of trafficking. However, these laws are poorly, if ever, enforced. In fact, we found that the prostitution laws are enforced, but the procuration laws are ignored. They're rarely invoked. So that the women and children end up in jail and the traffickers go free."

This was the status of anti-trafficking legislation in foreign countries prior to the passage of the United States Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (hereinafter referred to as the "TVPA") and the United Nations Protocol to Prevent, Suppress, and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, supplementing the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime (hereinafter referred to as the "UN Protocol").

I am privileged to speak to you today on the current status of existing anti-trafficking legislation and to report to you on what has been done in the anti-trafficking legislative movement in foreign countries and what should be done to move towards a more comprehensive and effective legal response to combat the problem of trafficking in persons.

I would like to give you a brief overview of early anti-trafficking legislation.

First, most anti-trafficking legislation was enacted as a part of the Penal Code or Criminal Code rather than as separate comprehensive acts and, as such, they only addressed trafficking as a criminal offense. Since the function of criminal law is to describe crimes and determine punishments for such crimes, protection of women and children was not part of these laws.

Second, trafficking in persons was prohibited mainly as a prostitution related activity. Anti-trafficking legislation during this time were influenced by the "White Slave Traffic" Conventions, especially the 1949 Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Persons and of the Exploitation of Prostitution of Others. The Convention mandated that "The Parties to the present Convention agree to punish any person who, to gratify the passions of another: (1) Procures, entices or leads away, for purposes of prostitution, another person, even with the consent of that person; (2) Exploits the prostitution of another person, even with the consent of that person." In fact, this language was explicitly used in the criminal codes of many countries.

Third, trafficking in persons was not recognized as a specific crime. Instead, it was addressed under other related offenses such as kidnapping, abduction, illegal confinement, deprivation of liberty, international prostitution, sexual slavery, sexual violence, illegal transportation of aliens across state borders, torture, violation of equality, procurement and compelling a person to engage in sexual intercourse.

Fourth, criminal sanctions for the procurement of prostitution were limited to a small fine and/or short term of imprisonment, which is not comparable to the gravity of the crime. Fifth, the trafficked person was treated as a criminal who is subject to deportation for the commission of the acts of illegal entry, falsification of travel documents and prostitution.

Inadequate Measures in Satisfying the Special Needs of Victims of Trafficking. Domestic laws provided limited measure of protection. In particular, the 1956 Suppression of Immoral Traffic in Women and Girls Act of India called for "rescue of women and girls" and "protective homes," the 1956 Prostitution and Prevention Act of Japan called for taking measures of "rehabilitation" of women in prostitution, the 1973 Women and Girls Protection Act of Malaysia provided for the removal of the women in prostitution to "a place of refuge" (Section 7), the 1973 Women and Girls Protection Act of Brunei provided for "care" and "education of women and girls detained under this act" (Section 25(1)), and the Measures in Prevention and Suppression of Trafficking in Women and Children Act of 1997 in Thailand provided for "appropriate assistance" to the trafficked woman or child including "primary shelter" and repatriation. However, these measures were inadequate in meeting the special needs of victims of trafficking.

Regional Initiatives Calling for Adopting Domestic Measures to Combat Trafficking. On the regional level, there have been a number of initiatives calling for drafting comprehensive anti-trafficking legislation that not only criminalize the trafficking offense, but also prevent the act of trafficking and protect the victims of trafficking. The February 24, 1997 Joint Action to Combat Trafficking in Human Beings and Sexual Exploitation of Children adopted by the European Council mandates that Member States "review their relevant national laws" to classify trafficking as a criminal offense, provide the appropriate penalties for such offense and take the necessary measures that to ensure "appropriate assistance for victims...". The European Parliament, in a May 19, 2000 resolution, called for "legislative action against trafficking in human beings, including common definition, incriminations and sanctions." The European Council Framework Decision of July 19, 2002 mandates that Member States must take the necessary measures, no later than August 1, 2004 to criminalize trafficking in persons and provide for the appropriate penalties in addition to assistance to victims of trafficking. The 1994 Inter-American Convention on International Traffic in Minors mandates that "The States Parties undertake to adopt effective measures, under their domestic law, to prevent and severely punish the international traffic in minors defined in this Convention" (Article 7). The Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) Declaration of December 2001 on the Fight Against Trafficking in Persons calls upon Member States to "adopt... such legislative... measures as that are necessary to establish as criminal offenses the trafficking in persons..." (Para. 5). The January 2002 South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation (SAARC) Convention on Prevention and Combating Trafficking in Women and Children for Prostitution mandates that "The State Parties to the Convention shall take effective measures to ensure that trafficking in any form is an offence under their respective criminal law and make such an offence punishable by appropriate penalties which take into account its grave nature" (Article 3). The Organization for Cooperation and Security in Europe (OSCE) Declaration on Trafficking in Human Beings of December 2002 states "We will consider adopting legislative..., measures that permit victims of trafficking to remain in our territory, temporarily or permanently in appropriate cases..."

"

Recognition of Trafficking in Persons as a Human Rights Violation Under International Treaty Law. International conventional law has recognized trafficking in persons as a human rights violation. The 1956 Convention on the Abolition of Slavery, the Slave Trade and Institutions and Practices Similar to Slavery outlawed slavery practices including debt bondage, serfdom, bride price and exploitation of child labor. The 1979 Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW) explicitly prohibited "exploitation of prostitution of women" and "all forms of traffic in women" (Article 6). The 1989 Convention on the Rights of the Child mandated that state parties must take all appropriate measures to prevent "the abduction of, the sale of or traffic in children for any purpose or in any form" (Article 35). The 1999 Convention to Eliminate the Worst Forms of Child Labour similarly prohibited "the use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution..." (Article 3(c)). However, it was the UN Protocol that provided the first definition of trafficking in persons and a comprehensive approach to the problem of trafficking. The Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families which goes into effect July 1, 2003 provides that "No migrant worker or member of his or her family shall be held in slavery or servitude" and "No migrant worker or member of his or her family shall be required to perform forced or compulsory labour." (Article 11 (1)-(2)).

Recent Anti-Trafficking Legislation Recognizing the Trafficked Person as a Victim of a Crime. In response to these international mandates a number of new anti-trafficking legislation have been enacted. These laws shifted the focus from criminalizing the behavior of the trafficked person to recognizing such a person as a victim of a crime. These laws include: the "Prohibiting Trafficking in Human Beings for Sexual Purposes Act" of Sweden, which entered into force on July 1, 2002; the Nigerian Act to Establish the National Agency for Traffic in Persons Law Enforcement and Administration to Enforce Laws Against Traffic in Persons, To Investigate and Prosecute Persons Suspected to be Engaged in Traffic in Persons, and to Take Charge and Co-ordinate the Rehabilitation and Counseling of Trafficked Persons and For Other Matters Connected Therewith; the UNMIK Regulation No 2001/4 on the Prohibition of Trafficking; Law Number 678 of Romania on the Prevention and Combat of Trafficking in Human Beings (D tuber 2001); Combating of Trafficking in Persons and Sexual Exploitation of Children Law of Cyprus of 2000 and the Bulgarian Law On Combating Illegal Trafficking of Human Beings of 2002. In 2002, Greece, Denmark and Pakistan enacted anti trafficking legislation and in 2003 France and the Philippines enacted anti-trafficking legislation.ending Existing Criminal Laws to Criminalize Trafficking in Persons as a Specific Offense. In addition to the enactment of comprehensive anti-trafficking legislation, some countries have amended existing Criminal Codes to criminalize trafficking in persons as a specific offense. These amendments include: Article 169 the Criminal Code of Portugal, as amended by Act 99/2001, of August 25, 2001; Article 165 "Trafficking in Human Beings" of the Criminal Code of Moldova as amended, which entered into force September 13, 2002; Article 149 "Trafficking in Human Beings or Other Transfer Deals in Respect of Human Beings" of Ukraine which entered into force on September 1, 2001 and Article 110a "Trafficking of Human Beings" of the Criminal Code of Albania, as amended by Law No. 8733 of January 24, 2001. In addition, Armenia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Serbia, Tanzania and Turkey have amended their existing Criminal Codes to recognize trafficking in persons as a specific offense.

Recent Draft Anti-Trafficking Legislation. Many countries are considering drafting new antitrafficking legislation. These drafts include: the Federal Law of the Russian Federation on "Countering Trafficking in Persons and Measures to Protect Victims of Trafficking in Persons;" the Georgian Draft Law on Amendments to the Criminal Code on "Trade in People (Trafficking in Persons) and other Unlawful Deal (bargain, agreement) Regarding Transfer of a Human" Article 144; and the Draft Amendments to the Criminal Code of Tajikistan Article 130, "Trafficking in Human Beings." In addition, the following countries are in the process of enacting new anti-trafficking laws: Burkina Faso, Burundi, Cote d'Ivoire, Croatia, Dominican Republic, Equatorial Guinea, Finland, Gabon, Jamaica, Kyrgyz Republic, Mauritius, Niger, Slovenia and Togo.

A Call for a Comprehensive Legal Approach to Trafficking that Include Crime Control, Human Rights, Immigration Status, Behavioral Model, and Foreign Policy. A study of these recent anti-trafficking laws indicates that the crime control approach to trafficking in persons has been coupled with a human rights-based approach to trafficking. Many immigration policies have been redefined to allow for a legitimate immigration status for the trafficked person. Some laws even provide for what I call a behavioral approach. In addition, the United States recognizes trafficking in persons as a foreign policy objective.

The following is a discussion of these five approaches to the problem of trafficking.

1. Crime Control: An Effective Criminal Law Approach to the Offense of Trafficking in Persons Anti-Trafficking Legislation Must Criminalize All Forms of Trafficking. Obviously any anti-trafficking legislation must address the scope of what it considers to be an offense of trafficking. Some criminal codes only criminalize trafficking for the purpose of prostitution, such as the Criminal Code of Germany as amended by the Criminal Law Reform Act (trafficking in human beings) of 1992; Article 246 entitled "Trafficking in human beings for the purpose of sexual relations" of the criminal law of the Czech Republic, as amended in 2002; the 2002 'Prohibiting Trafficking in Human Beings for Sexual Purposes Act" of Sweden; Article 169 of the Criminal Code of Portugal, as amended by Act 99/2001 which prohibits trafficking for "Prostitution" and Article 250(a) of the penal code of the Netherlands prohibits trafficking in human beings for the purpose of "the performance of sexual acts" (Draft of 2001).

A Distinction Between Commercial and Non-Commercial Sex. A comprehensive antitrafficking law should not be limited to criminalizing trafficking for the purpose of prostitution. Here I would like to draw a distinction between commercial sex and non- commercial sex.

Commercial Sex. Commercial sex typically covers prostitution. However, there are other forms of commercial sex such as pornography and sex tourism, which may constitute a form of trafficking. For example, the Criminal Code of Colombia explicitly criminalizes sex tourism. The Code provides that "any person who directs, organizes, or promotes tourist activities that include the sexual use of minors shall be punished by imprisonment of three to eight years. The penalty shall be increased by one half if the conduct is committed with a minor under the age of twelve years" (Article 219). Section 2423 of the Mann Act prohibits a United States national or resident from traveling abroad with the intent to engage in illicit sexual activity with a child.

Non-Commercial Sex. In the event that non-commercial sex involves abuse, it should be considered an illicit activity, especially in cases of forced marriages, arranged marriages, early marriages, temporary marriages, marriages for the purpose of child bearing and mail-order brides. It must be noted that mail-order brides may be classified as trafficking for the purpose of labor or a case of sex trafficking. Section 652 of the United States Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996 imposes upon the matchmaking organizations an obligation to inform the prospective bride "upon recruitment, such immigration and naturalization information as the Immigration and Naturalization Service deems appropriate, in the recruit's native language, including information regarding conditional permanent residence status and the battered spouse waiver under such status, permanent resident status, marriage fraud penalties, the unregulated nature of the business engaged in by such organizations, and the study required under subsection (c)."

The 2003 TIP Report Monitoring the Status of Commercial Sex and Non-Commercial Sex. Section 105(d)(5) of the TVPA calls for the Inter Agency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons to "examine the role of the international "sex tourism" industry in the trafficking of persons and the sexual exploitation of women and children around the world." The 2003 United States Department of State Trafficking in Persons Report (hereinafter referred to as "TIP Report") examines the problem and makes explicit reference to its significance in the countries of Brazil, Cambodia, Costa Rica, Cuba, France, Gambia, India, Jamaica, Japan, Malawi, Mauritius, the Philippines, South Africa, Sri Lanka, Taiwan and Thailand.

The TIP Report, in addition to documenting cases of sex trafficking and labor trafficking, also addresses the problem of marriage which may contribute to the problem of trafficking in the countries of Armenia, Belarus, Finland, Ghana, Malawi, Niger, Taiwan, Uzbekistan and Vietnam. The TIP Report also makes references to pornography and trafficking for the purpose of pornography in Gambia, India, Lithuania, Mexico, the Philippines and Zimbabwe.

The TVPA Limiting Sex Trafficking to Trafficking for a Commercial Sex Act. It must be noted, however that the TVPA narrowly defines sex trafficking to mean "the recruitment, harboring, transportation, provision, or obtaining of a person for the purpose of a commercial sex act" and defines "Commercial Sex Act" to mean only "any sex act on account of which anything of value is given to or received by any person" (Section 103(9) and 103(3), respectively).

An anti-trafficking legislation must address all forms of trafficking including trafficking for the purpose of commercial sex and non-commercial sex, trafficking for the purpose of forced labor, including domestic service, street begging, camel jockeying, trafficking for the purpose of illicit inter-country adoption, trafficking for military purposes, trafficking for the removal of organs and trafficking for other forms of exploitation.

Determining the Elements of Criminal Liability in a Trafficking Case: What Should Be Included and What Should be Excluded. My reading of recent anti-trafficking legislation suggests that some legal systems make prosecution of cases of trafficking difficult by including unnecessary elements, which make such proof difficult or impossible.

Is Proof of Material Profit Required? Some anti-trafficking legislation require material profit. For instance, Article 110 of the Criminal Code of Albania of 1995 requires proof of "material profit or any other profit." Likewise, Article 113-2 of the Criminal Code of Moldova, as amended in 2001, defines trafficking in human beings to include trafficking "with the purpose of obtaining profit." Article 180Co) of the German Law on Trafficking in Human Beings also makes material benefit an element of the crime of trafficking. Although, in the event that the act of trafficking was "committed with the intention of gaining valuable benefit," such act may warrant an enhanced penalty as provided, for example, by Article 246 of the Criminal Code of the Czech Republic.

Should Organized Trafficking Be Required for the Establishment of the Crime? Criminal liability of a trafficker should not depend upon whether the activity is organized. Many cases of trafficking involve only an individual and individual trafficking should not be excluded from the definition of the crime. If the act of trafficking is committed by a member of an organized gang the punishment for such crime should be enhanced such as the case under Article 246 of the Criminal Code of the Czech Republic. Similarly, Article 181 of the German Law on Trafficking in Human Beings makes "professional recruitment" grounds for an enhanced penalty of 10 years instead of 5 years.

Defining Trafficking to Include Transnational Trafficking and Internal Trafficking. Most cases of trafficking are transnational in nature; however, internal trafficking must be included in any definition of trafficking in persons. Crossing international borders should not be an element of the crime itself; although it may warrant an additional penalty. Internal trafficking is a problem in many countries, including Afghanistan, Brazil, Haiti, India, Malawi, the Philippines and Russia, and should not be excluded from the definition of trafficking.

Recognizing Trafficking as a Form of Violence Against Women or as a Form of Slavery Should Not Effect the Prima-Facie Case of Trafficking. Violence also should not be an element of the crime of trafficking, although it may be grounds for increasing the penalty for such crime. Likewise, while trafficking is a form of slavery, enslavement, as traditionally, defined should not be required for the existence of the crime of trafficking.

The TVPA Narrowly Defining "Illegal Means" by Requiring Force, Fraud, and Coercion. Illegal means should be broadly defined to include debt bondage, disclosure of confidential information to the victim's family or to other persons, confiscation of travel documents, abuse of power, abuse of office, bribery, abuse of a position of vulnerability and other illegal or improper means. The TVPA requires force, fraud or coercion to prove a case of trafficking. Such requirement may render prosecution of a case of trafficking difficult where the victims of trafficking are not coerced into prostitution. Suffice here, to mention the case of United States v. Wu was prosecuted under Title 18, United States Code Sections 2421 and 2422 and not under the TVPA.

Trafficking in Persons Must Be Recognized As A Serious Crime. Many anti-trafficking laws do not provide for the appropriate sentence to the crime of trafficking. For instance, Article 367 of the Criminal Code of Chile only provides for a fine for "one who promotes or facilitates the entry or exit of persons to or from the country to exercise prostitution in the national territory or abroad." According to Article 436 of the Criminal Code of Turkey "Whoever transports from one place to another a virgin or a woman who has not yet reached the age of twenty-one for the purpose of prostitution...seduction or procurement or transportation, will be sentenced to between one and three years of imprisonment and be fined from nine thousand to ninety thousand liars."

Legal systems do not always consider sex trafficking as grave a crime as other sexual offenses. Many laws do not impose similar punishments for trafficking offenses as for other serious crimes such as rape. For example, in Guatemala, the punishment for rape under the Criminal Code is six months to one year in prison, whereas the punishment for trafficking is only a fine.

Recently, many anti-trafficking laws increased the criminal sanctions for the crime of trafficking in persons. For instance, Israel has changed its law to enhance the penalty to 16 years of imprisonment for "any person who buys or sells another person for the purpose of prostitution..." The Women and Children Suppression Prevention Act of 2000 of Bangladesh states that "whoever brings or traffics or sends any (women) abroad with the intention of using that woman in prostitution or using for unlawful or immoral purposes or buys or sells or lets to hire or hands her over for any kind of torture or similar reason, keeps a woman in his possession, (care) or puts under his custody, shall be punished with death sentence or life imprisonment..." (Section 5(1)).

I have no contention with the maximum penalties provided in most of the countries of the AsiaPacific region, although the minimum sentence should not be less than 4 years in accordance with the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime (Article 2). In Burma punishment is up to 10 years imprisonment. In Cambodia punishment is 5 to 10 years, which is enhanced to 10 to 20 years if the offense is committed against a minor younger than 15. In Indonesia punishment for trafficking is imprisonment up to 6 years. In Malaysia punishment for trafficking is imprisonment for up to 5 years. In Singapore the punishment for trafficking is also imprisonment for up to 5 years.

Prison sentences tend to be shorter in most European countries, including the sentences for trafficking in persons. The European Council Framework Decision of July 19, 2002 mandates that European countries provide penalties for trafficking of at least 8 years imprisonment. It must be noted that European domestic laws as well other legal systems following the civil law model do not recognize plea-bargaining as a device, which may result in a lesser sentence. The TVPA provides for up to 20 years imprisonment and recognizes plea-bargaining.

Criminal sanctions for trafficking in persons should not be limited to prison sentences. An antitrafficking legislation must also provide for the forfeiture of the assets of the trafficker, the proceeds of which are to be used to compensate victims of trafficking.

Recognition of Trafficking in Persons as a Transnational Crime. Since trafficking is transnational in nature, combating the problem requires transnational legal responses.

Applying the Extraterritorial Principle to the Crime of Trafficking in Persons. For instance, Article 5 of the Criminal Code of Macau provides that the criminal law is applicable to acts carried outside of Macau when such acts constitutes the crimes of "trafficking in human beings," "trade in slavery" and such acts are committed by a national or resident of the country. In Thailand, the Penal Code Amendment Act has expanded the territorial jurisdiction of courts to cover "indecent sexual acts" and "trafficking offenses" provided in Section 282 and 283 of the Penal Code, irrespective of where such offenses are committed. In New Zealand, The Crimes Act Amendment of 1995 applies to offenses concerning sexual conduct with children committed by nationals abroad (Article 144A). The Act also prohibits assisting persons traveling overseas for the purpose of having sex with children. In Ireland, under the Sexual Offenses (Jurisdiction) Act of 1996, persons who are nationals or residents of Ireland may be prosecuted for sexual offenses committed against children abroad.

Law No. 269 of August 3, 1998 amended Article 604 of the Penal Code to extend its application to sexual offenses committed abroad by an Italian national or to the harm of an Italian national or by a foreign national in conjunction with an Italian national sex tour (Article 144C). The Crimes (Child Sex Tourism) Amendment Act of 1994 of Australia provide for a similar rule. Other legal systems must consider the application of anti-trafficking legislation on extraterritorial basis, irrespective of the place where the crime of trafficking occurs.

Recognition of Trafficking in Persons as an Extraditable Offense. Trafficking in persons must be recognized as an extraditable offense. For instance, in Cyprus trafficking in persons and sexual exploitation of children are deemed as extraditable offenses under the Extraction of Fugitive Law No 97 of 1970.

Under the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime, it is interesting to note that in Article 16(4) if a State Party that makes extradition conditional on the existence of a treaty receives a request for extradition from another State Party with which it has no extradition treaty, it may consider the Convention the legal basis for extradition in respect of any offence to which this article applies.

Recognition of Trafficking in Persons as an Offense for the Purpose of Applying AntiMoney Laundering Legislation. Countries should expand the scope of the offense of money laundering from one solely related to goods arising from illicit-drug trafficking, to one related to all proceeds derived from trafficking in persons and other serious crimes. An anti-money laundering law must authorize the seizure of proceeds from prostitution, trafficking in persons, or other illegal activities.

Cooperation Between Countries of Origin and Countries of Destination. Bilateral treaties on mutual assistance in criminal matters must be a part of any transnational legal response since apprehension of traffickers, investigation of cases of trafficking and prosecution of the traffickers sometimes require cooperation between countries of origin and countries of destination in matters including request for assistance, search, seizure, attachment and surrender of property, measures for securing assets, service of judicial decision, judgments and verdicts, appearance of witness and expert witnesses and transmittal of information of records. This regional approach has been adopted by the 1996 Inter-American Convention on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters. Likewise, the 1959 European Convention on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters provides for similar measures.

Building Consensus as to the Appropriate Legal Response to Trafficking in Persons Through a Regional Approach. Consequently, a regional approach to the problem of trafficking is imperative. Such an approach builds regional consensus as to the forms of trafficking which must be subject to criminalization and the appropriate response for the prosecution of such crimes.

2. A Behavioral Model Approach to Trafficking in Persons: Targeting All Principle Actors in the Trafficking Enterprise.

Any comprehensive legal response to trafficking in persons must extend liability to all those who are responsible for committing or facilitating the act of trafficking.

Distinction Between Private Actors and Public Actors. I would like to first draw a distinction between public actors and private actors. While the trafficking act, whether the act of "recruitment, transportation, harbouring or receipt of persons" (UN Protocol, Article 3(a)) may be committed by a private individual or group, many cases involve a public official, an immigration officer, a law enforcement agent, a border patrol officer or other officials who facilitate the act of trafficking or refrain from prosecuting such an act. In such cases, an antitrafficking law must render such an act a crime and provide for an enhanced penalty for such crime.

The United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime criminalizes the corruption of public officials (Article 8) and requires that "Each state party shall adopt such legislative and other measures as may be necessary to establish as criminal offenses, when committed intentionally: (a) the promise, offering, or giving to a public official, directly or indirectly, of an undue advantage, for the official himself or herself or another person or entity, in order that the official act or refrain from acting in the exercise of his or her official duties; (b) the solicitation or acceptance by a public officials, directly or indirectly, of an undue advantage, for the official himself or herself or another person or entity, in order that the official act or refrain from acting in the exercise of his or her official duties." The Convention further requires that State Parties shall "adopt legislative, administrative or other effective measures to promote integrity and to prevent, detect and punish the corruption of public officials" (Article 9).

Some anti-trafficking laws explicitly consider public corruption in the context of trafficking. For instance, the Criminal Code of Moldova recognizes not only "abuse of power" but "abuse of office" as an illegal mean which give rise to an enhanced penalty (Article 113/2). Distinction Between Natural Persons and Legal Persons. I would like to draw a second distinction between natural persons and legal persons. Any effective legal response to trafficking in persons must address not only the liability of the trafficker, a natural person, but also the legal person or the corporate person that facilitates such acts. Travel agencies, employment agencies, adoption agencies, matchmaking organizations, advertisement agencies, hotels, restaurants, bars, taxi companies and sex operators must all be criminally liable for any illicit activity

The liability of sex operators including, strip clubs, massage parlors, escort services, should not be limited to compliance with residential zoning regulations. Instead, nuisance/ton liability should be combined with criminal liability in examining the legitimacy of sex operators. Sex operators who abuse their employees or force them to engage in illicit sexual activities should be fined, have their business license revoked, or be forced to close their business. European Council Framework Decision on Trafficking in Persons calls upon countries to provide for liability of legal persons. The UN Protocol explicitly addresses the liability of commercial carders "including any transportation companies or the owner or operator of any means of transport" (Article 11(3)).

Who Should be Liable.* The Customer or the Victim: Addressing the Issue of Demand. "Prostitution laws" are divided as to whether to criminalize the act of the person in prostitution or the person who is buying the sexual services. However, few legal systems criminalize the behavior of the customer.

Criminalizing the Act of Prostitution and the Act of Purchasing Sexual Services. Muslim countries such as Saudi Arabia, Iran, Pakistan, Yemen, Mauritania, Jordan, Bahrain, Sudan, Tunisia, Malaysia, Brunei and the United Arab Emirates punish both the woman in prostitution and the customer.

Making the Purchase of Sexual Services a Crime. The Swedish Act "Prohibiting Purchase of Sexual Services" provides that "a person who obtains casual sexual relations in exchange for payment shall be sentenced--unless the act is punishable under the Swedish Penal Code-- for the purchase of sexual services to a fine or imprisonment for at most six months." Attempts to purchase sexual services is punishable under Chapter 23 of the Swedish Penal Code.

Knowledge of Trafficking Makes the Customer Liable. Another approach is adopted by Article 418-a of the Criminal Code of Macedonia which provides that "The one that uses or enables another person's usage of sexual services from the persons for whom he knows are victims of human trafficking will be punished with from six months up to five years imprisonment." The new draft legislation of Croatia of May 2003 follows the Macedonian model in criminalizing the act of the customer if he has knowledge that the person in prostitution has been trafficked. When the Customer is Associated with United States Military. According to the Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act of 2000 (18 U.S.C. 3261-67 2000), criminal jurisdiction is established for acts committed by persons employed by or accompanying military forces outside the United States, including civilian employees of the Department of Defense and its contractors, if such acts would carry prison sentences of over one year within the United States.

When the Customer is a Tourist Engaging in Sex with a Child. Title 18, United States Code Section 2423 makes sex tourism a crime by prohibiting travel of United States citizens and residents who travel abroad to engage in illicit sexual activities with a child.

When the Customer is a Diplomat. I would like to say that the law of diplomatic immunity should not be used as a shield to justify abuse of domestic servants in the United States.

The Principle of Non-Criminalization of the Behavior of the Victim of Trafficking. While the customer should be penalized, the victim should be immune from liability every time she commits an illegal act as long as such act is related to their trafficking, whether this act is illegal entry, falsification of travel documents, or prostitution. This is the principle of noncriminalization of the behavior of the victim of trafficking, which has been articulated in United Nations Regulation No 2002/4 on the Prohibition of Trafficking in Persons in Kosovo, stating that "a person is not criminally responsible for prostitution or illegal entry, presence or work in Kosovo, if that person provides evidence that supports a reasonable belief that he or she was the victim of trafficking."

The Principle of No-Fault Liability in Civil Actions. Treating trafficked persons as victims means that the fault of the victim of trafficking should not be a hindrance in a civil compensation action. A victim should not be denied civil remedy by being blamed for her own victimization. This is principle of no-fault liability, which should implemented by a civil judge. Treating trafficked persons as victims also means that a victim of trafficking must be granted the opportunity to abandon the illegal work and allowed to apply for employment, which is valid under the law.

To What Extent Does the 2003 TIP Report Consider the Issue of Demand? The TIP Report addresses the issue of demand by making explicit references to the law of Sweden stating that "the Government...passed a pioneering law that criminalizes the purchase rather than the sale of sex..." The TIP Report also makes reference to the Islamic law approach to the issue of demand explicitly stating that in Saudi Arabia "Islamic law prohibits sexual relationships outside the context of marriage and provides for strict penalties if the law is breached." The TIP Report rightly criticizes the application of Islamic law in Pakistan when it states "If rape or forced prostitution cases are prosecuted under the Islamic law-oriented Hudood ordinances, victims are reluctant to testify since, the woman's testimony is tantamount to an admission of adultery if prosecutors conclude that her testimony does not meet the burden of proof." This application is inconsistent with the Qur'anic legislation, which states that women should not be forced into prostitution and if they are compelled they should not be punished because they have been forced into prostitution (Holy Qu'ran, Surah 24:33).

In a statement I submitted for the hearing before the Committee on International Relations, House of Representatives, 107th Congress, Second Session, June 19, 2002, I stated that although the TVPA does not require that the TIP Report takes into consideration "the extent of trafficking" but only "the extent to which the country is a country of origin, transit, or destination for severe forms of trafficking" warning about the harm of prostitution must be addressed in any program warning against the danger of trafficking. It is not clear to what extent the TIP Report takes into consideration the issue of demand in placing countries in certain tiers. Only the countries of Ghana, Lithuania, Morocco and the United Arab Emirates out of the 26 countries placed on Tier 1 outlaw prostitution. The other 22 countries legalize, decriminalize, or tolerate prostitution.

This approach is inconsistent with the TVPA, which explicitly distinguishes between sex trafficking and labor trafficking and does not consider sex as a form of labor. A review of this approach is imperative in light of the Trafficking in Persons National Security Directive of February 2003 which explicitly states that "Prostitution and related activities, which are inherently harmful and dehumanizing, contribute to the phenomenon of trafficking in persons..."

Potential Victims of Trafficking: Preventive Legal Measures to Combat Trafficking. The causes of vulnerability of women and children must be addressed in any preventive legal response, which must address poverty, lack of education, unemployment, gender discrimination, and other root causes of the trafficking infrastructure.

Birth registration laws should be enforced in accordance with Article 7 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child since unregistered children, such as 400,000 children in Honduras, are left vulnerable to exploitation. They do not attend school and they are targeted by traffickers who force them to work or sexually exploit them. Labor laws regarding the minimum age of employment should be enforced so that children do not enter the workforce at an age where they can be subject to exploitation. Similarly, the laws regarding the age of marriage, the age of consent and the age of majority must also be enforced.

The Legal System Must Allow For a Role of Non-Governmental Organizations. Laws that regulate the activities of organizations within civil society, especially non-governmental organizations, human rights organizations and advocacy groups, must also be reviewed in any legislative attempt to combat trafficking in persons. NGOs play a vital role coordinating with governmental agencies and providing services to victims of trafficking. Unfortunately, many countries are still ruled by authoritarian leaders who do not allow elements of civil society to perform these functions. 3. An Immigration Policy Approach: Granting a Victim of Trafficking a Residency Status in the Country of Destination

The Trafficked Victim: A Prohibited Immigrant Under Traditional Immigration Law. Traditional immigration law treated a trafficked victim as a "prohibited immigrant" who is ineligible for admission or entry into the country "if such persons is a...prostitute" and "prostitution is a grounds for deportation." This is the rule in Section 22 of the Immigration and Deportation Act of Zambia, Section 8 of the Immigration Act of Uganda, Article 10 of the Tanzania Citizenship Act, Section 9 of the Immigration Act of Swaziland, Section 31 of the Immigrants and Emigrants Act of Sri Lanka, Section 8 of the Immigration Act of Mauritius, Section 5 Immigration Law of Malta, Section 3 of the Proclamation Regulation the Issuance of Travel Documents and visas and Registration of Foreigners of Ethiopia and Section 14 of the Immigration Act of Zimbabwe. This traditional immigration law policy must shift its focus from denying women in prostitution entry into a foreign country to recognizing trafficking as a grounds for inadmissibility.

The Entertainment Visa as a Disguised Vehicle for Trafficking: Strict Regulations Must be Enforced. A legal system must control issuance of visas so that traffickers do not take advantage of existing types of visas that disguise the real purpose of travel of the holder of the visa. Although entertainment visas are used properly and legally in some countries, the law must provide for strict requirements so that such visas are not used illegally by the traffickers. In Cyprus the law allows for only 15 entertainment visas per nightclub and requires that prospective employers apply for the visa on behalf of the employee. The Thai law requires a letter issued by the employer confirming responsibility of the applicant for the entertainment visa and specifying the time of employment. In Norway, an entertainer who obtains an entertainment visa may work for a period of no more than one year, and an applicant for an entertainment visa must submit a written contract specifying the terms of employment. In Chile, the law requires an explicit authorization from the Ministry of Interior for the approval of an entertainment visa. In Portugal before the issuance of the entertainment visa, an inquiry is conducted into the criminal record and medical history of the applicant. The South Korean law requires HIV testing in addition to identity references. This month, South Korea ceased issuing entertainment visas to Philippine dancers because of the high numbers of women being trafficked to South Korea under the auspices of working as dancers.

Withholding the Travel Documents of Foreign Nations: A Call for the Abolition of the Sponsorship Rule. The February 23-26, 2003 International Conference on Pathbreaking Strategies in the Global Fight against Sex Trafficking states in its recommendations released by the State Department that "the holding of passports and other travel documents by employers of foreign workers" must be outlawed. As I stated in an article published in Volume 26, Fordham International Law Journal, March 2003 entitled "Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, in Countries of the Middle East: The Scope of the Problem and the Appropriate Legislative Responses," the sponsorship rule is still followed in some countries of the Middle East and it must be abolished. It is encouraging that the Council of Ministers Decree, No. 166 (July 12, 2001) of Saudi Arabia has provided that the relationship between the employer and the alien employee must be regulated in accordance with the employment contract and not the sponsorship rule.

Is Trafficking in Persons a Crime Against the State or a Crime Against the Individual: A Call for a Humanitarian Basis for Granting Victims of Trafficking an Immigration Status.

Deportation is still the norm in most parts of the world including the countries of the Middle East, Latin America, Africa and Asia. It reflects a traditional immigration law approach. Legal systems differ as to the basis of granting victims of trafficking a residency status.

In Belgium, a residency status is dependent upon the "legal proceedings." First, a 45 day period is granted to allow the victim to decide whether to make statements (a complaint against the trafficker) or to prepare for a return to his or her country of origin. Second, a victim who has made a statement or filed a complaint during the 45 day period receives a temporary permit valid for three months and a temporary work permit for the same period. Third, if the prosecuting authorities decided to proceed with the case, the residency permit becomes valid for longer periods, usually six months, which may be renewed until the legal proceedings are concluded. Then the victim returns to their country of origin.

In Germany, the Aliens Act grants victims of trafficking a grace period of at least 28 days to decide whether to cooperate with the authorities as witnesses or prepare to return to their country of origin. In Portugal, victims of trafficking can obtain a residency permit if they cooperate with prosecutors. In Hungary, the Alien Act provides for the possibility of suspending an expulsion order against victims of trafficking if they intend to testify against their traffickers. In Italy, the immigration law of 1998 provides victims of trafficking who are aliens, a special residency permit for a six month period. In Spain, a victim of trafficking, under a 2000 Act, is not to be deported if such victim reports the perpetrators of such trafficking to the proper authorities. They are granted temporary work permits. Once the legal proceedings are completed, the government facilitate the return of the victims of trafficking to their country of origin.

In the Netherlands, expulsion of an illegal alien who is a victim of trafficking may be suspended for three months during which such victim decides to report the trafficking offense. If the victim decides to report, a residency permit is issued for the complete duration of the investigation, prosecution and trial. However, a residency permit may also be issued to a victim of trafficking upon the conclusion of the criminal proceedings. Such permit is granted on humanitarian grounds which includes the risk of reprisals against the victim or her family, the risk of persecution in the victim's country of origin for committing an offense related to prostitution, and the difficulty of social reintegration in the country of origin.

The TVPA does not require the victim of trafficking to testify in court to be eligible for a residency status under T-visa regulations. A victim of trafficking need only comply with any reasonable request for assistance in the investigation or prosecution of acts of trafficking. A victim may apply for an adjustment of the temporary status to acquire a permanent residency status. This new immigration policy shifts the focus from interception-detention-repatriation to prevention-protection-prosecution. This is a human rights approach to trafficking in persons, which must be followed by all legal systems.

The 2003 TIP Report Documenting Countries that Provide a Residency Status. The TIP Report takes into consideration whether a country provides a victim of trafficking a temporary or permanent residency status. The TIP Report made references to the following countries:

Belgium, Bulgaria, Norway, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Czech Republic, Denmark, Portugal, Turkey, Romania, Russian Federation, Sweden, Moldova, Germany, Austria, Italy, Spain, the Netherlands, Israel, Canada, France, Hong Kong, Hungary, Macedonia, Pakistan, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and Bahrain. Other countries of destination must consider granting victims of trafficking a residency status.

4. A Human Rights Based Approach to Trafficking in Persons

Colombia, which is listed on Tier 1 of the 2003 TIP Report, recognizes, in Law No. 360, that "every person who is a victim of crimes against sexual liberty and human dignity has the right to be treated with dignity, privacy, and respect." This human rights approach must be emphasized in any anti-trafficking legislation in all legal systems.

A Bill of Rights for Victims of Trafficking. Victims of trafficking in persons should be entitled to basic human rights, especially the right to safety, the right to privacy, the right to information, the right to legal representation, the right to be heard in court, the right to compensation for damages, the right to medical assistance, the right to social assistance, the right to seek residence, and the right to return to their country of origin. Victims of trafficking should be treated with dignity, fairness, compassion and respect for their human rights.

The Double Witness Rule or the Corroborative Evidence Rule: A Violation of the Right of a Victim of Trafficking to be Heard in Court. These rights are being violated by legal systems that still follow the double witness rule or the corroborative evidence rule, which provides that in cases of trafficking in persons, the admission of evidence of only one witness is not permissible unless the witness's testimony is corroborated by another witness or other material evidence implicating the accused. This rule means that we are not treating the victim of trafficking as a credible witness. The rule is contradictory to the UN Protocol which mandates that "views and concerns (of the victims of trafficking) must...be presented and considered...against offenders." (Article 6(2)(b)). This rule is followed by the legal systems of the countries of The Bahamas, Botswana, Fiji, Gambia, Iran, Ireland, Israel, Jamaica, Kenya, Kiribati, Lesotho, Liberia, Malawi, Mauritius, Nigeria, Pakistan, and St. Kitts and Nevis, St. Lucia, St. Vincent and Grenadines, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Tanzania, Tonga, Tuvalu, Uganda, and Zambia.

Special Testimonial Rules for a Child Witness. Special testimonial rules must be adopted to meet the special needs of child witnesses. A child witness should be allowed to testify outside the court or in court without the presence of the offender. A child witness should also to be accompanied by a proper guardian.

Protection of the Right of Privacy of the Victim and the Derivative Victim Doctrine. Victims of trafficking are entitled to the right to privacy, which should extend to members of the victim's family, in accordance with the derivative victim doctrine. The United Nations Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power defines the term victim to include "the immediate family or dependants of the direct victim and persons who have suffered harm in intervening to assist victims in distress or to prevent victimization." The Declaration calls for "taking measures to minimize inconvenience to victims, protect their privacy, when necessary, and ensure their safety, as well as that of their families and witnesses on their behalf; from intimidation and retaliation." These measures must be explicitly recognized in an anti-trafficking legislation.

Extending Witness Protection Programs to Victims of Trafficking. Victims of trafficking should be entitled to the right to safety. They must be included in any witness protection program. Such program does not apply except when a witness is testifying in cases involving serious crimes. For instance, the witness protection program under the United States Victim and Witness Protection Act provides for protection of a witness in proceedings concerning "an organized criminal activity or other serious offense." So the TVPA had to recognize trafficking as "an organized criminal activity or other serious offense" for the purpose of applying the witness protection program to victims of trafficking.

Recently, a number of countries enacted special witness protection laws including the law of July 14, 1999 of Portugal on "Governing the Enforcement of Measures on the Protection of Witnesses in Criminal Proceedings;" the law of March 2, 2001 of Bosnia and Herzegovina on "Special Witness Identity Protection in Criminal Proceedings;" the Law No. 137/2001 of Czech Republic on "The Special Protection of a Witness and Other Persons in Connection With Criminal Proceedings," the Law of January 28, 1998 on "State Protection of the Victim, of Witnesses and Other Persons Who Provide Assistance in the Criminal Proceedings" of Moldova; and the August 31, 2001 Witness Protection Program Act of Canada. Other legal systems should adopt similar measures to include victims of trafficking in witness protection programs. Victims of Trafficking Should be Entitled to Civil Compensation: a TVPA Shortcoming. Victims of trafficking should be entitled to the right to compensation for damages. Civil compensation is not restitution and restitution should not be a substitute for civil compensation. While the TVPA empowers a criminal court to order restitution, it does not provide victims of trafficking the ability to file a private civil action for damages. Other legal systems allow for such possibility including the right of trafficked person to seek punitive damages "when the degree of the exploitation or the degree of relationship or the dominating position of the offender with regard to the victim so require.

" And I am quoting the 2000 Cyprus Combating of Trafficking in Persons and Sexual Exploitation of Children Law. So while the award of restitution depends upon a conviction of a crime and is a part of the sentencing of such crime, civil compensation should be awarded even if the trafficker is not convicted. I would also like to see the state itself paying for such compensation when an official of the state, whether that official is a police officer, an immigration officer, or any other public official is involved in the trafficking scheme.

5. Trafficking in Persons as a Foreign Policy Objective: The Role of the United States in Assisting Foreign Countries in Drafting Anti- Trafficking Legislation.

As I stated in an article entitled "Monitoring the Status of Severe Forms of Trafficking in Foreign Countries: Sanctions Mandated Under the U.S. Trafficking Victims Protection Act", Brown Journal of World Affairs, Summer/Fall 2003, Vol. X, Issue 1:

"Human rights have been an important foreign policy objective of the United States... This policy provides that "the United States shall, in accordance with its international obligations as set forth in the charter of the United Nations and in keeping with the constitutional heritage and traditions of the United States, promote and encourage increased respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms throughout the world without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion. Accordingly, a principal goal of the foreign policy of the United States shall be to promote the increased observance of internationally recognized human rights by all countries."... The TVPA explicitly recognized trafficking in persons as a "grave violation of human rights" and "a matter of pressing international concern." I also stated that "(M)onitoring and combating trafficking in persons in foreign countries is not limited to reporting on the status of severe forms of trafficking in these countries. The United States Congress was not satisfied with merely making a statement of condemnation of human rights violation in the context of trafficking. Congress, in addition to the reporting process, decided to "name names" or engage in "shaming" by classifying countries into different categories, depending on their efforts to combat trafficking through the three tier model. It is also the policy of the United States, under the TVPA, to take actions against governments that do not comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and are not making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with such standards. However, sanctions against governments must be carefully considered and applied in light of the numerous exceptions stipulated in the TVPA, especially when sanctions have adverse affects on the innocent population, including women and children. Sanctions should not be imposed when providing assistance instead of imposing sanctions will induce the offending government to make the necessary efforts to comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking as required by the TVPA." The United States should continue its policy of constructive engagement.

Constructive Engagement: The Need for Extending the State Department Legislative Assistance to Countries of the Middle East and Latin America. Congress recognized in Section 102 of the TVPA states that "(E)xisting legislation...in ...other countries (is) inadequate to deter trafficking and bring traffickers to justice, failing to reflect the gravity of the offenses involved." The TVPA provides for assistance to foreign countries especially in "... drafting of laws to prohibit and punish acts of trafficking" (Section 109).

The United States, through the Department of State and in cooperation with the Department of Justice and other agencies, has been assisting countries in drafting comprehensive antitrafficking legislation. These countries include: the ECOWAS countries, countries in Southeastern Europe, the Philippines, Togo, Thailand, Vietnam, Brazil, the Dominican Republic, Haiti and Russia.

It is to be noted that none of the countries of the Middle East except Sudan were placed in Tier 3, although none of these countries have a specific anti-trafficking legislation. Morocco and United Arab Emirates were placed in Tier 1, while Bahrain, Israel, Kuwait, Lebanon, Qatar and Saudi Arabia were placed on Tier 2. The Department of State has worked closely with some of these countries to improve the status of victims of trafficking and the results of these efforts were fairly documented in the narratives of the 2003 TIP Report, regardless of the discretionary judgment that was made regarding the placement of a country in a particular tier. I urge the Department of State to continue such efforts in the area of legislation, which I think believe reform.

Similarly, most legal systems in the region of Latin America and the Caribbean still follow the traditional legal approach to trafficking and do not have a specific anti-trafficking legislation. Again, many countries within this region need the guidance of the Department of State in drafting comprehensive and effective anti-trafficking legislation.

The Role of Anti-Trafficking Legislation in Placing Countries in a Particular Tier in the 2003 TIP Report. Although the TIP Report takes into consideration whether a country has a specific anti-trafficking legislation that criminalizes trafficking and provides for the appropriate sentence for such trafficking, it is not clear to what extent the TIP Report considers legislation in placing countries in the three tiers. It may be argued that absence of an anti-trafficking legislation should be a determinative factor excluding a country from Tier 1. The same argument has previously been made regarding prosecution, which has been characterized as the most important criterion of serious and sustained efforts to eliminate trafficking in persons. In my judgment the TVPA rightly does not indicate any priority to be given to any particular criterion of the seven criteria stipulated in Section 108.

As I stated in my aforementioned article: "The minimum standards adequately address the various aspects of the problem of trafficking. There is no doubt that combating trafficking requires effective prosecution of the traffickers, but the root causes of the problem must also be addressed. Preventive measures must be taken to decrease the supply of innocent women and children. In the meantime, the trafficked person must be treated as a victim and governments must establish the necessary protective programs to assist victims of trafficking."

"Does the TVPA require equal weight of these criteria in assessing government efforts to eliminate trafficking? It has been argued that prosecution should be considered the most important criterion of serious and sustained efforts to eliminate trafficking in persons, since the very first indicator is "whether the government of the country vigorously investigates and prosecutes acts of severe forms of trafficking in persons that take place wholly or partly within the territory of the country." The TVPA, however, does not indicate that it lists these criteria in any particular order. The seventh and last criteria in determining such efforts, is "whether the government of the country vigorously investigates and prosecutes public officials who participate in or facilitate severe forms of trafficking in persons, and take all appropriate measures against officials who condone such trafficking." If one follows this argument, it may be concluded that the TVPA considers combating public corruption as the least important indicator of government efforts in eliminating trafficking. Official corruption threatens any efforts to combat trafficking and it must be confronted, otherwise any preventive measures or protective initiatives taken by the government would be severely and adversely affected. Abuse of public office for private gain circumvents the implementation of human rights, since misuse of government expenditures results in misallocation of resources, denying the population the right to education, employment, health and adequate living conditions. Another problem with this argument is that it may implicitly indicate that prevention of the root causes of trafficking is less important, although as it has been pointed out that "prevention is the key" in combating trafficking in persons. In addition, while prosecution of the traffickers is an important tool in the fight against trafficking, many governments still treat trafficked persons as criminals who are not entitled to any rights. The mere fact that governments have changed their policies towards the protection of the trafficked person must be considered a "serious" step towards eliminating trafficking, even if such governments have not yet taken all the necessary measures to investigate and prosecute cases of trafficking, especially since the legislator never intended that governments would be required to fulfill all the criteria listed in the TVPA as an indication of its serious and sustained efforts."

The United States "Model Law to Combat Trafficking in Persons" as a Model of a AntiTrafficking Legislation to be Borrowed by Foreign Countries. The Model Law to Combat Trafficking in Persons released by the Department of State in March 2003 serves as a good model of an anti-trafficking legislation. The Model Law is based upon the United Nations Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children; the United Nations Regulation No 2002/4 on the Prohibition of Trafficking in Persons in Kosovo; the United States Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 and the Romanian Law on Prevention and Combating Trafficking in Human Beings. The explanatory notes to the Model Law make references to these laws. I believe that other comparative anti-trafficking laws must also be considered in assisting foreign countries to design a comprehensive and effective legal response to combat trafficking in persons.

Bernhard Grossfeld, a comparative law scholar, recognized in "The Strengths and Weakness of Comparative Law" that "law develops mainly by borrowing" and "the ability of a legal system to react to change depends in large part on its ability to make good use of the experiences of other systems."

Since the Model Law follows the UN Protocol and promotes its definition of trafficking and the approach to combat the problem of trafficking, the United States should expedite the UN Protocol ratification process. As of today there are 25 countries that have already ratified the UN Protocol. We need forty instruments of ratification for the UN Protocol to become international law.

In conclusion, I would like to emphasize that a more comprehensive legislative reform is needed. An anti-trafficking legislation should not be limited to the specific provision in the criminal code. While any effective legal response to combating trafficking in persons should ideally be embodied in a comprehensive anti-trafficking law, such legal response should take into consideration all relevant laws to which I made reference in my testimony.

Thank you.

END

LOAD-DATE: July 4, 2003

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

TYPE: Washington-dateline general news.

Copyright 2003 Federal News Service, Inc.

300 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Federal Document Clearing House Congressional Testimony

June 25, 2003 Wednesday

GLOBAL TRENDS IN TRAFFICKING

SECTION: CAPITOL HILL HEARING TESTIMONY

LENGTH: 4351 words

Statement of Gary A. Haugen President & CEO, International Justice Mission

Subcommittee on International Terrorism, Nonproliferation and Human Rights Committee on House International Relations

Mr. Chairman,

My name is Gary Haugen and I serve as the President of International Justice Mission (IJM). On behalf of IJM, I would like to express my thanks to the Committee for the privilege of participating in this important hearing on Global Trends in Trafficking and the Trafficking in Persons Report.

International Justice Mission is an international human rights agency that provides a hands-on, operational field response to cases of human rights abuse referred to us from faith-based ministries serving around the world. Frequently these workers observe severe human rights abuses in the communities where they serve. These workers refer these cases to us, and then we conduct a professional investigation to document the abuses and mobilize intervention on behalf of the victims.

Many of the cases referred to us involve women and children abducted into sex trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation. Accordingly, we deploy criminal investigators to infiltrate the brothels, use surveillance technology to document where the victims are being held, and then identify secure police contacts who will conduct raids with us to release the victims and arrest the perpetrators. We then coordinate the referral of these victims to appropriate aftercare, and support and monitor the prosecutions.

IJM investigators have spent literally thousands of hours infiltrating the sex trafficking industry and working with government authorities around the world to bring effective rescue to the victims and accountability to the perpetrators. In the process, IJM is gaining, I believe, some precise insights about the nature of the problem and helpful lessons about concrete steps that actually prove effective in fighting sex trafficking. We are grateful, therefore, for the opportunity to share something of what we have learned with this Committee.

Of course, most of what we have learned has come from the victims of sex trafficking themselves - the hundreds upon hundreds of individual women and girls whom we have come to know by name around the world. The hundreds of women and children who have been abducted, assaulted, bought and sold, tortured and raped as part of a moneymaking enterprise. Everything useful that we have learned has emerged from entering into the nightmare experience of girls like Balamani. We first came to know Balamani because another girl we had rescued from a brothel took us back on a follow-up raid to show us the underground dungeon in which other young trafficking victims were being hidden. Balamani was about 17-years-old when she was lured from her rural village in South Asia with promises of a job working as a domestic servant or at a medical center in the city. A local trafficker won her trust and diverted her to a larger city on the other side of the country where she was sold into a brothel for about $170. Once inside the brothel she was ferociously beaten by the brothel keepers and forced to provide sex to the customers. From then on, Balamani had to service between 15 and 20 customers per day - 7 days a week - from 11:00 am until 5:00 am - every day for 10 months. Some police regularly frequented the brothel to collect their weekly bribe, and routinely threatened to take the young girls out as a way of extorting a larger bribe from the brothel keeper.

Based on information from other rescued girls, IJM was able to lead a raid on the brothel and rescue Balamani and about about a dozen other girls out of this nightmare of brutal rape and slavery. Balamani responded well to the provision of aftercare and was able to return to her village, find work, and even expressed a willingness to testify against the brutal brothel keepers who were now facing prosecution. But before she was able to do so, the deadly legacy of her abuse in the brothel seized her body. The HIV virus that had been forcibly injected into her body exploded into full-blown AIDS - and soon she lay dying on a gurney, painfully assaulted now by tuberculosis, meningitis and a host of sexually transmitted diseases. A few days ago, Balamani died with my colleagues by her side. She was slowly, and horribly murdered by the traffickers, pimps and brothel customers who abused her. And by the police who protected the criminals rather than the vulnerable teenage girl.

Balamani's story gives a face and a heart to the otherwise the mind-numbing statistics about the epidemic of sex trafficking in our world. But also within Balamani's story are insights about why this global atrocity is of the most preventable catastrophes on our world today.

The simple fact of the matter is this: sex trafficking only flourishes where it is tolerated by local law enforcement. The business of sex trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation requires that the perpetrators commit multiple felonies of abduction, rape, assault, and false imprisonment - and then it requires that the perpetrators hold out the victims of these crimes openly to the public so that the customers can find them. It does no good at all for the brothel keepers and pimps to hide their victims. In fact, to make money on their investment, the pimps and brothel keepers must make their victims openly available to the customer public - and not just once, but continuously, and over a long period of time. Obviously, therefore, if the customers can find the victims of sex trafficking whenever they want, so can the police. How, therefore, do you possibly get away with running a sex trafficking enterprise? You do so only if permitted by local law enforcement. Generally, this is facilitated by bringing the police into the business and sharing the profits with them in exchange for protection against the enforcement of the laws that are openly and continuously violated every single day the business is in operation. Certainly sex trafficking is exacerbated by poverty and economic desperation; but we do not find epidemic levels of sex trafficking wherever we find poverty in the world. Rather, sex trafficking flourishes on a large scale only in those countries where it is tolerated by local law enforcement.

This is the indispensable insight about the fundamental vulnerability of sex trafficking that must be grasped. Sex trafficking requires the commission of multiple felonies in a way that is held out openly to the public. Therefore it can be shut down wherever there is the political will and operational resources to do so.

Sex trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation can be drastically reduced wherever a country has the political will and the operational capacity to send the perpetrators to jail and to treat the victims with compassion and dignity. This is a fight that can actually be won. In fact, this was the animating conviction behind the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA). The TVPA sought to influence the political will of countries with serious trafficking problems by making clear that there would be consequences for a country's relationship with the United States, including the possibility of sanctions, if that country did not make significant efforts to meet minimum standards in combating sex trafficking. Secondly, the TVPA also authorized grants to help strengthen a country's capacity to address sex trafficking through prevention, prosecution, and protection activities.

The authors of the TVPA understood that it was essential to strengthen both the political will and the operational capacity of countries to fight sex trafficking. It was well understood that in many countries the victims of sex trafficking fundamentally lack the voice and power to make themselves a priority for national law enforcement. Sex trafficking operations prey upon the most marginalized groups in society - women, children, refugees, undocumented persons, ethnic minorities and the poor. Fundamentally, political leaders do not feel threatened in their hold on power if they fail to protect impoverished and low-status women and girls. Scarce law enforcement resources are deployed to protect the things that societies value the most, and thus women and children are often left utterly vulnerable to the brutalities of the commercial sex trade. Accordingly, the TVPA endeavored to place the voice and values of the American people on the side of these vulnerable women and children by making it clear that their abuse would not be tolerated. Specifically, the TVPA established the Office to Combat and Monitor Trafficking in Persons to provide a voice of accountability for the otherwise voiceless victims of trafficking. This new office would tell the truth about whether a country was vigorously defending women and children against the horrors of trafficking, with the understanding that those countries unwilling to provide such basic protections would find an adverse impact on their relationship with the United States.

This was the theory behind the policy expressed in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000. All of the great effort in passing the TVPA was intended to actually make a real-world difference for the women and children being crushed by the forces of sex trafficking. I offer this review simply to ask whether the policy is actually having its intended effect. What have we learned about the efforts to implement the policy that actually make a difference and what have we learned about those actions that undermine the impact of the policy? In a number of countries, IJM has been working hand-in-hand with foreign governments, NGOs and State Department personnel to conduct hands-on operations to rescue victims and to bring perpetrators to justice, and we are learning about the practical impact of U.S. policy at the street level. Our experience is starting to demonstrate that, as we all hoped, the policy can have a tremendous impact if implemented vigorously.

What makes the policy actually work?

I would suggest three things:

Vigorous and transparent reporting on a government's record on sex trafficking convictions and police disciplinary actions; # A credible and clearly communicated threat of consequences for governments that are not taking serious steps to actually send perpetrators to jail and to get police out of the trafficking business; and # Focused and practical capacity building for sending perpetrators to jail and caring compassionately for victims.

I would like to take a moment to examine these one at a time. First, vigorous and transparent reporting on a government's record on sex trafficking convictions and police disciplinary actions.

The purpose of the Trafficking In Persons Report is simple: it is intended to provide accountability. Therefore, the report has its intended effect when it is actually written in a way that makes accountability easy, rather than making it hard. We should make no mistake. There are those who will have an interest in making clear accountability harder rather than easier - and there are ways to fashion a document that either promotes accountability or obscures accountability. Effective accountability is achieved when the Report provides specific, objective, transparent data on a government's actions that actually matter. And from the perspective of the sex traffickers, only two government actions matter: a) Is the government seriously threatening to actually send me to jail for doing this? and b) Is the government seriously threatening to remove the police protection that I have paid for?

Consequently, effective accountability regarding the seriousness of a government's efforts to combat trafficking will only begin to emerge when there is specific objective data on the number of successful trafficking-related convictions resulting in jail time, as well as data on the number of disciplinary actions that have been taken against police who are complicit in protecting sex trafficking operations (remembering that such operations simply don't exist on a significant scale without such protection).

Again, it must be emphasized that the relevant data point is convictions - not raids, arrests, and prosecutions. Traffickers, brothel keepers, and pimps are quite willing to endure raids, arrests, and even prosecutions if, at the end of the day, they don't have to actually go to prison. In fact, such actions are just considered part of the cost of doing business. Moreover, even the most corrupt police carry out raids, arrests and initiate prosecutions. In fact, they must do so in order to maintain the credible threat by which they extort bribes from the perpetrators. That is why countries with the worst sex trafficking records can report raids, arrests, and prosecutions; but such countries have very little to report in terms of actual convictions. None of these other actions turn into a credible law enforcement threat that actually deters sex trafficking unless they result in convictions with imprisonment. This is the only cost of doing business that the perpetrators are unwilling to pay.

This is why IJM is so pleased that the new Director of the Office to Combat and Monitor Trafficking in Persons, the Hon. John Miller, has adopted as the policy of his office that governments wishing to be certified as making serious efforts to meet minimum standards in combating sex trafficking must bear the burden of providing objective data on trafficking-related convictions and police disciplinary actions. After all, these governments are themselves in the best position to report on their own positive actions, and the Office cannot be reasonably expected to affirmatively certify that a government is making significant efforts if the government provides no verifiable data on these two most basic responsibilities. Self-reporting by a government regarding its own counter-trafficking initiatives with follow-up by the State Department provides the best means for transparency and accountability. As the TIP Report states, ". . . national governments must supply such information."

The second ingredient for making the TVPA policy actually work has been a credible and clearly communicated threat of consequences for governments that are not taking serious steps to actually send perpetrators to jail and to get police out of the trafficking business.

In order to bring effective protection to women and children vulnerable to sex trafficking, governments must move counter-trafficking efforts from being a good idea to being an urgent priority. And in reality, the only dynamic that generates such a shift is usually the belief that something bad will happen if they fail to do so. This is why the threat of possible sanctions was incorporated within the legislation for countries placed on Tier 3 of the Trafficking In Persons Report (TIP). In this regard, we have found that trafficking issues become an urgent priority for the worst offending countries only after they have been placed on Tier 3 or faced a credible risk of being placed on Tier 3. While some countries may diplomatically protest their placement on Tier 2, foreign governments clearly understand that actual consequences for their poor trafficking record only kick in if they are on Tier 3. Among countries with serious trafficking problems, therefore, it is only the credible risk of Tier 3 sanctions that actually moves countries to earnestly make the work of combating trafficking an urgent law enforcement priority, rather than just a public relations nuisance.

Accordingly, a TIP Report that presumes that Tier 3 status for certain countries is diplomatically intolerable or politically untenable severely undermines the effectiveness of the TIP Report process. An unspoken but de facto presumption against a Tier 3 ranking effectively freezes the status quo of the worst offending nations and weakens the TVPA's capacity to impact political will. It profoundly dishonors the suffering of women and children brutalized by sex trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation. Likewise, the TVPA's capacity to strengthen the political will of authorities to end the toleration of sex trafficking is utterly diluted by the failure to articulate clearly to foreign governments the straightforward requirements of the TVPA and the real risks of consequences associated with a poor trafficking record.

Finally, U.S. policy is effectively advanced through focused and practical capacity building for programs that send perpetrators to jail and care compassionately for victims. In addition to political will, foreign governments also need the practical wherewithal to take decisive law enforcement measures to combat trafficking and to care for the victims. Accordingly, U.S. policy is advanced by funding programs that address the intensely practical challenges of strengthening law enforcement capacities to investigate, arrest and successfully prosecute sex trafficking offenders. Programs are needed to support special anti-trafficking police units and prosecutorial teams with training, operational support, and hands-on assistance in achieving the priority outcome of sending offenders to jail and removing dirty cops.

Education, awareness, and poverty alleviation programs are important preventative measures, but such programs will never be able to keep pace with the entrepreneurial energy and creativity of the traffickers unless they are combined with practical programs that actually help make national law enforcement successful in sending perpetrators to jail. Police complicity in sex trafficking has been so pervasive and ugly that many have been tempted to imagine solutions that simply ignore the police. But in combating any crime, the answer to bad law enforcement is never no law enforcement - the answer must always be a committed struggle for better law enforcement.

Accordingly, IJM is very pleased that recent legislation has cleared the way for funding by USAID and other agencies of targeted programs that strengthen counter-trafficking activities of specialized police and prosecution units, as well as legal advocacy to protect victims and to bring perpetrators to justice. [See the Consolidated Appropriations Resolution, 2003 (P.L. 108- 7).]

Equally critical are programs that fund comprehensive and compassionate aftercare services for the victims of sex trafficking. Not only are such programs necessary to treat victims with the dignity and care that they deserve, but they are also absolutely indispensable for establishing the victim cooperation that is essential for any meaningful counter-trafficking endeavor. At present, the existing capacities for providing comprehensive aftercare for the victims of sex trafficking are tragically inadequate. In fact, IJM has found itself limited in the rescue operations it could conduct for victims because of the lack of aftercare capacity. This is a need that can and must be addressed by targeted and generous appropriations.

Additional opportunities to fund programs to fight sex trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation have emerged as a result of President Bush's bold initiative to combat the AIDS epidemic. Research has demonstrated that sex trafficking is one of the great engines driving the spread of the AIDS global pandemic, and while traditional AIDS prevention programs of education and awareness go a long way in helping women and girls make good choices in avoiding high-risk sexual activities, these programs do nothing to protect the millions of women and girls who do not get to make choices about their sexual encounters - particularly the millions of victims of commercial sexual exploitation like Balamani who are forcibly infected with the HIV virus. Accordingly, federal funding of programs aimed at combating the international AIDS epidemic must include support of programs to combat sex trafficking and other forms of sexual violence against women and girls, or else America's effort to fight AIDS will simply fail to address one of the fundamental and certainly most brutal causes of the epidemic.

Finally, in recent weeks IJM has directly experienced the positive impact of U.S. policy in combating sex trafficking in Cambodia. More than two years ago, IJM began conducting extensive investigations into one of the most appalling cesspools of child prostitution in the world, a village called Svay Pak outside Phnom Penh where scores of girls between the ages of 5 and 12 were being sold in an open market for pedophiles and sex tourists. Over a two-year period we turned our investigative findings over to Cambodian authorities, but failed to obtain a satisfying response. Then last year, the TIP Report placed Cambodia on Tier 3 and the new U.S. Ambassador to Cambodia, Ambassador Charles A. Ray, initiated a very proactive engagement with the senior Cambodian authorities on U.S. policy toward trafficking. This direct advocacy with Cambodian authorities and the excellent work of Ambassador Ray's staff, helped make it possible for IJM and the Cambodian authorities to bring rescue to 37 minor victims of commercial sexual exploitation out of Svay Pak, including about a dozen children between the ages of 5 and 10. In addition, approximately 12 suspects have been arrested and charged, with cooperative police investigations continuing with IJM to locate and prosecute additional suspects identified in our initial report.

Not only did these actions lead to the release of children from unspeakable horrors of sexual abuse; but also perhaps of even greater long-term significance, the senior Cambodian police official who was allegedly protecting and profiting from the child sex industry in Svay Pak has now been fired and finds himself behind bars facing a closely monitored prosecution. This is, of course, the other face of sex trafficking - the face of those police and public authorities who provide the official protection without which the open assault and rape of children could never flourish. When such corrupt authorities are brought to account, it will be the traffickers and brothel keepers who will live in fear, rather than the children of Cambodia, or South Asia, or West Africa or Eastern Europe. We will not have to watch the Balamanis waste away in pain and death, but can secure for them the life of goodness and hope we seek for our own daughters.

In the case of Cambodia, Ambassador Ray, and representatives of the U.S. State Department were very successful in making clear to the Cambodian authorities the priority that American foreign policy places on addressing sex trafficking. Senior Cambodian authorities were well and effectively briefed on the dynamics and significance of the tier rating system of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, and on the consequences of failing to make significant efforts to meet minimum standards in combating trafficking. Consequently, by the time IJM was able to brief the Cambodian authorities on our latest Svay Pak investigation, they were prepared to provide extraordinary cooperation in working with IJM to seek rescue for the victims and to pursue accountability for the perpetrators. We believe that the advocacy of the U.S. Embassy with the Cambodian authorities was an indispensable and decisive factor in generating effective law enforcement cooperation.

These actions have paved the way for significant and continuing progress in mobilizing effective law enforcement responses to human trafficking in Cambodia. Cambodian police authorities have had a positive experience of effective counter-trafficking investigations and enforcement actions with IJM that produced arrests, proper charges, and compelling evidence for prosecution. They have participated in groundbreaking procedures for humanely conducting victim interviews in the presence of a social worker and an NGO lawyer-monitor while being videotaped. They have also requested further training from IJM in effective counter- trafficking investigations and enforcement actions.

Of course, it will be very important to continue to monitor the actions of the Cambodian authorities as they follow up on these specific cases, and as they persevere in vigorous efforts to investigate and successfully prosecute sex trafficking crimes on an on-going basis. Cambodia has had a very poor record of tolerating sex trafficking (especially among very young children) and such a record cannot be turned around overnight. But we believe that a very promising beginning has been made in supporting the Cambodian government in taking a new direction to seriously combat sex trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation.

We believe these encouraging events help to serve as a model for what can be achieved when there is transparent reporting through the TIP Report, a meaningful application of the tier rating system, direct advocacy by U.S. authorities at the highest levels of government, and tangible, practical assistance to foreign governments in bringing rescue to trafficking victims and justice to perpetrators.

I would also like to thank Congress for recently passing the PROTECT Act, paving the way for U.S. Attorneys' Offices to vigorously prosecute Americans who travel abroad and exploit young girls. The Act eliminates the intent requirement and necessitates only that a prosecutor prove an American committed an illicit sexual act abroad. As the little victims in Cambodia have told my colleagues, many of their clients were Americans. It is imperative that the U.S. crush the demand created by its own citizenry.

IJM looks forward to continuing its constructive work with the U.S. State Department, foreign governments, and partner NGOs in helping to ensure that the promises of U.S. policy in fighting sex trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation deliver tangible results to vulnerable women and children and hastens the day when these brutal enterprises of rape-for-profit are simply put out of business.

Thank you very much.

LOAD-DATE: July 2, 2003

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

COMMITTEE: HOUSE INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

TESTIMONY-BY: GARY A. HAUGEN, PRESIDENT & CEO

AFFILIATION: INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE MISSION

Copyright 2003 FDCHeMedia, Inc. All Rights Reserved.

301 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Bahrain Tribune

June 19, 2003 Thursday

Kingdom lauded for protection of expats' rights, BAHRAIN TRIBUNELENGTH: 578 words

Recent efforts by the government of Bahrain to push through legal measures and increase awareness of human-rights issues among migrant workers has won conditional praise for the Kingdom from international rights groups. The Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons (OMCTP), which maintains a record of countries' efforts to eliminate such activities, recently moved Bahrain from tier 3 to tier 2 level in light of its improvement in legal and human-rights conditions in the Kingdom.

"It's a significant victory for Bahrain, and although everybody acknowledges that much still needs to be done, it's a sign that we're proceeding in the right direction," said Nabeel Rajab, vice-president of the Bahrain Center for Human Rights (BCHR) which has a subcommittee, the Migrant Workers Group (MWG), that works with victims of workplace abuse.

"The government of Bahrain has made significant efforts to do so. The government has made great progress in the areas of prevention and prosecution but it should expand services provided to victims and needs to continue to expand prosecution efforts," commented OMCTP in its report announcing the improvement in Bahrain's status. Bahrain's newly created inter-ministerial task force which drafted and organized the distribution of a manual on the rights of expatriate workers came in for special praise. The manual was distributed earlier this year to local embassies, Bahraini embassies abroad and manpower-recruitment agencies in Bahrain. It also drafted a simpler brochure for distribution to workers in their languages.

The task force also announced plans to set up a shelter for workers caught in disputes with their employers, a move that was welcomed by rights groups and embassies as being particularly necessary for housemaids. While the government does not regularly provide assistance to victims, it does provide shelter in many cases. There is no established system for providing legal or psychological services but emergency medical treatment is available to anyone in Bahrain. In cases where mediation does not succeed, government officials assist workers in finding lawyers to pursue legal action.

The government often allows temporary residency during disputes and permits a foreigner to work while he or she seeks settlement or legal redress. These were considered by OMCTP in its assessment of Bahrain and helped swing the vote in favor of Bahrain's "improved status," according to BCHR.

In order to certify that employers need the number of foreign workers for whom they are requesting visas and to inspect working conditions, the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs increased the number of labor inspectors from nine to 40.

The government recently reformed work-sponsorship rules to allow foreign workers to change sponsors or jobs without a no-objection letter from their current sponsor. This allows foreign workers to legally remove themselves from potentially abusive situations.

Victims of abuse in Bahrain come primarily from the Philippines, Bangladesh, Indonesia, India and Sri Lanka to work as domestic servants and in the construction industry. Female domestic servants have also often complained of abuse. Many low-skilled foreign workers in Bahrain have their passports withheld, their contracts altered and suffer non-payment of salaries of varying degrees and duration's.

The government has issued clear signals that trafficking and prostitution will be punished.

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2003LANGUAGE: ENGLISHEMEDIA-ACC-NO: 200306194939.m38

JOURNAL-CODE: m38

Copyright 2003 WorldSources, Inc.,
A Joint Venture of FDCH e-Media, Inc.
(f/k/a Federal Document Clearing House, Inc.); and World Times, Inc.
Copyright 2003 Bahrain Tribune all rights reserved as distributed by WorldSources, Inc.
Emerging Markets Datafile

302 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Worldstream

June 17, 2003 Tuesday

Haitians protest trafficking of Haitian workers in the Dominican Republic, lack of justice in shooting years ago

BYLINE: MICHAEL NORTON; Associated Press Writer

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 579 words

DATELINE: PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti

Nearly two dozen Haitians demonstrated outside the Dominican Embassy on Tuesday to protest the Dominican government's failure to try a group of soldiers who allegedly shot and killed six Haitian migrant workers three years ago.

The migrants were aboard a truck entering the Dominican Republic when four soldiers, who said the vehicle failed to stop, opened fire on June 18, 2000. Six Haitians were killed and 22 were injured. One Dominican man, who was a friend of the truck driver's, was also killed.

"The soldiers have not been brought to justice. We are demanding justice for the victims," said Colette Lespinasse, director of the Haitian Refugee and Repatriate Support group that organized the demonstration of about 20 placard-brandishing protesters in suburban Petionville.

Haitians, who live in the Western Hemisphere's poorest country, often pay traffickers to take them to the Dominican Republic where they work on farms or in construction. Although they provide a source of cheap labor, Haitians are often mistreated and discriminated against once they arrive in the Spanish-speaking country, which shares the same island as Haiti.

The workers who survived the border shooting three years ago said they paid about 1,000 gourdes - which at the time was about $US50 - to a Dominican driver who organized the trip.

A Dominican court summoned the soldiers for questioning but they have failed to show up for each the hearings, Lespinasse said.

It is unclear whether the soldiers have been charged, or whether they are still in the Dominican military.

The State Department has put 15 countries on a blacklist, accusing them of failing to reduce human trafficking. Among the countries on the list that could face sanctions are the Dominican Republic and Haiti.

It is not known how many Haitian workers, fleeing poverty and unemployment at home, cross the border illegally every year. But about 500,000 Haitians live in the Dominican Republic.

An estimated 350,000 live in the country illegally. Last year, Dominican authorities expelled some 15,000.

The two countries' rocky relations date back centuries. In the late 1930s, troops taking orders from Dominican dictator Rafael Trujillo massacred at least 20,000 Haitians along the border. Both sides have tried to mend the relationship since.

"The fundamental problem is poverty in Haiti. Two hundred years of bad government is responsible for that," said Dominican Ambassador Alfredo Despradel Cabral, who met the demonstrators at the embassy's gate on Tuesday and accepted their letter of protest.

The State Department report, which came out last week, also named Belize, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Burma, Cuba, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Liberia, North Korea, Sudan, Suriname and Uzbekistan as countries who weren't doing enough to stop human trafficking.

For the first time, countries that do not take actions to stop human trafficking could face the loss of U.S. assistance, though the government can waive any penalties. The sanctions would take effect Oct. 1.

"Haiti is doing a lot to combat this scourge, in fact it is doing more to fight it than are other countries that have not been blacklisted," government spokesman Mario Dupuy said.

The Haitian Parliament prohibited trafficking in persons on May 15.

Border efforts include steps to increase specialized patrols. A presidential commission is also addressing border issues, he said.

On the Net:

State Department: <http://www.state.gov>

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2003

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2003 Associated Press
All Rights Reserved

303 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Bahrain Tribune

June 17, 2003 Tuesday

Kingdom praised for rights awareness, BAHRAIN TRIBUNE

LENGTH: 580 words

Recent efforts by the government of Bahrain to push through legal measures and increase awareness of human-rights issues among migrant workers have won conditional praise for the Kingdom from international rights groups. The Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons (OMCTP), which maintains a record of countries' efforts to eliminate such activities, recently moved Bahrain from tier 3 to tier 2 level in light of its improvement in legal and human-rights conditions in the Kingdom.

"It's a significant victory for Bahrain, and although everybody acknowledges that much still needs to be done, it's a sign that we're proceeding in the right direction," said Nabeel Rajab, vice-president of the Bahrain Centre for Human Rights (BCHR) which has a subcommittee, the Migrant Workers Group (MWG), that works with victims of workplace abuse.

"The government of Bahrain has made significant efforts to do so. The government has made great progress in the areas of prevention and prosecution but it should expand services provided to victims and needs to continue to expand prosecution efforts," commented OMCTP in its report announcing the improvement in Bahrain's status. Bahrain's newly created inter-ministerial task force which drafted and organised the distribution of a manual on the rights of expatriate workers, came in for special praise.

The manual was distributed earlier this year to local embassies, Bahraini embassies abroad and manpower-recruitment agencies in Bahrain. It also drafted a simpler brochure for distribution to workers in their languages. The task force also announced plans to set up a shelter for workers caught in disputes with their employers, a move that was welcomed by rights groups and embassies as being particularly necessary for housemaids. While the government does not regularly provide assistance to victims, it does provide shelter in many cases. There is no established system for providing legal or psychological services but emergency medical treatment is available to anyone in Bahrain.

In cases where mediation does not succeed, government officials assist workers in finding lawyers to pursue legal action.

The government often allows temporary residency during disputes and permits a foreigner to work while he or she seeks settlement or legal redress.

These were considered by OMCTP in its assessment of Bahrain and helped swing the vote in favour of Bahrain's "improved status," according to BCHR.

In order to certify that employers need the number of foreign workers for whom they are requesting visas and to inspect working conditions, the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs increased the number of labour inspectors from nine to 40.

The government recently reformed work-sponsorship rules to allow foreign workers to change sponsors or jobs without a no-objection letter from their current sponsor.

This allows foreign workers to legally remove themselves from potentially abusive situations. Victims of abuse in Bahrain come primarily from the Philippines, Bangladesh, Indonesia, India and Sri Lanka to work as domestic servants and in the construction industry.

Female domestic servants have also often complained of abuse. Many low-skilled foreign workers in Bahrain have their passports withheld, their contracts altered and suffer non-payment of salaries of varying degrees and durations.

The government has issued clear signals that trafficking and prostitution will be punished.

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2003

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

EMEDIA-ACC-NO: 200306172239.m38

JOURNAL-CODE: m38

Copyright 2003 WorldSources, Inc.,
A Joint Venture of FDCH e-Media, Inc.
(f/k/a Federal Document Clearing House, Inc.); and World Times, Inc.
Copyright 2003 Bahrain Tribune all rights reserved as distributed by WorldSources, Inc.
Emerging Markets Datafile

304 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 14, 2003 Saturday

Kenya; Women Forced to Toil Abroad

BYLINE: The NationLENGTH: 365 words

An unspecified number of Kenyan women are on forced labour in Lebanon and other Middle Eastern countries.

Kenyan children were often trafficked to Uganda for work, says the US State Department in a new report on human trafficking worldwide.

It claims that internal trafficking also occurred in Kenya in form of forced child labour and prostitution, adding that many of Kenya's estimated 200,000 street children were engaged in prostitution.

The Nation was unable to independently verify claims in the report, which is compiled with the help of US embassy staff.

"The Government of Kenya does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. However, it is making significant efforts to do so despite severe resource constraints," says the document.

As a result of that assessment, Kenya is included in a group of 74 countries that, according to the State Department, are striving to comply with international anti-trafficking agreements. This "Tier 2" category includes most sub-Saharan nations. "Kenya should prosecute traffickers more vigorously and act against corruption among police and immigration officials," it says.

The country had made some progress in protecting its children, the report says, adding that district advisory committees had been established to monitor child-labour issues and provide services.

It adds that "the government is removing street children, placing them in youth homes and in social halls, and providing them with meals and shelter to prevent them from being victimised."

"Free primary education has been reinstated as a means to assist vulnerable populations and prevent trafficking," the report says.

Some 26 countries - mostly in Europe but also including Ghana and Mauritius - are listed in the report's top tier of states fully compliant with anti-trafficking standards.

Sudan and Liberia are among 15 countries consigned to the bottom tier and the US says it may cut off most forms of aid to them unless they acted more effectively to prevent human trafficking. The department said it could not get information to assess conditions in seven countries, including Somalia and Mauritius.

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2003LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

305 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

June 13, 2003Transcript: U.S. "Strongly Committed" to Combating Human Trafficking; June 12: Douglas Davidson to OSCE Permanent Council*SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILELENGTH: 1065 words

U.S. diplomat Douglas Davidson told the OSCE Permanent Council June 12 that the United States is working with international organizations, foreign governments and non-governmental organizations to combat trafficking in persons both in the U.S. and abroad.

Davidson made his remarks the day after the U.S. State Department published its annual human trafficking report. "Trafficking in persons, whether in the form of forced labor or sexual exploitation, is a serious human rights abuse and transnational crime," he said, adding that "our goal in issuing this report is not to finger-point, but rather inspire all of us to strengthen our efforts to fight this scourge."

He also said the Justice Department will be issuing a progress report on the U.S. government's domestic anti-trafficking efforts later this year.

The United States "will continue working with other countries to develop programs, policies, law enforcement capabilities, and protection efforts to step up our fight against trafficking in persons," Davidson said. "We believe that the OSCE Anti-Trafficking Action Plan currently being negotiated will help forward this agenda."

Following are Davidson's remarks:

(begin transcript)

United States Mission to the OSCE Vienna June 12, 2003

RELEASE OF THE REPORT ON TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS

Delivered by Deputy Chief of Mission Douglas A. Davidson to the Permanent Council

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I would like to announce the release yesterday of the United States Trafficking in Persons Report for year 2003. A U.S. federal law, the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000, requires the Secretary of State to submit to United States Congress an annual report on Trafficking in Persons. The Department has prepared the third such report.

This year's report records the efforts of more than 100 countries, most of which share our concern over this issue and, which like us, are working to combat trafficking in persons.

Trafficking in persons, whether in the form of forced labor or sexual exploitation, is a serious human rights abuse and transnational crime. Various United States Government agencies are working to combat this growing phenomenon in cooperation with international organizations - including the OSCE, as well as with foreign governments and NGOs.

We are also doing a bit more at home. The U.S. Government is strongly committed to combating trafficking in persons both in the U.S. and abroad. Our domestic efforts include an anti-trafficking law that enhances pre-existing criminal penalties and affords protections to trafficking victims, the President's Interagency Task Force to coordinate implementation of the Act, training for our law enforcement and prosecutorial officers, and funding for programs to help victims. We are also anticipating the release of our own Department of Justice report, which will explain the United States' efforts to combat trafficking in persons within our own borders.

The transnational character of trafficking in persons means that countries of origin, transit and destination must recognize that trafficking is a crime that threatens both societies and individuals, and therefore must collaborate to prevent trafficking, protect victims and prosecute traffickers. This requires government coordination on national strategies, and coordination on the local level.

We are pleased that we have strengthened cooperation with many states since the first two reports. The USG will continue working with other countries to develop programs, policies, law enforcement capabilities, and protection efforts to step up our fight against trafficking in persons. We believe that the OSCE Anti-Trafficking Action Plan currently being negotiated will help forward this agenda.

In addition, we continue to expand our programmatic assistance to NGOs and committed governments working aggressively to combat trafficking in persons. In the last two years the U.S. government has invested over $100 million in programs to address prevention of trafficking, protection and assistance to victims, and prosecuting of traffickers for over 60 countries around the world.

In listing countries in this report it is our intention to recognize the efforts of countries making concrete efforts to fight trafficking as well as those countries that are not.

I want to note here that we do not exclude ourselves from scrutiny when it comes to combating trafficking in persons. The Department of Justice will be issuing a progress report on the U.S. Government's domestic anti-trafficking efforts later this year. Our goal in issuing this report is not to finger-point, but rather inspire all of us to strengthen our efforts to fight this scourge.

In compiling this report, the State Department drew from information from our embassies as well as reports by international organizations, media and NGOs. Additional information came from host governments, the Department of Justice, Department of Labor and USAID.

Each country was evaluated separately and was not compared to other countries. The State Department considered each country's efforts in light of the magnitude of the problem, and its resources and technical capabilities.

The 2003 Trafficking in Persons Report can potentially have serious policy and programmatic implications for those countries listed on tier 3 of the report. Under the trafficking victims protection act (TVPA), sanctions, effective October 1, may be imposed on tier 3 countries. The TVPA's possible alternatives to these sanctions include a determination of subsequent compliance, for example, that since the end of the reporting period the government has taken steps that effectively move it out of tier 3. If the facts support it, the Secretary of State can make a determination of subsequent compliance, and the government would no longer warrant being sanctioned.

So, the sanctions may not actually be applied to countries currently in Tier 3 if significant progress can be made prior to the October 1 deadline. The USG is committed to working with these and other countries to increase their success in combating trafficking, in the hope that all designated countries will make significant improvements by 2004. Our goal is to not see any country listed on tier 3.

Thank you.

(end transcript)

(Distributed by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2003

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2003 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

306 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

June 13, 2003

Official Urges Expanded Alliances with NGOs Against Human Trafficking

BYLINE: Anthony Kujawa, Washington File Staff Writer

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 550 words

Washington -- The United States needs to expand alliances and information sharing with non-governmental organizations (NGO) in the fight to end trafficking in persons, according to John Miller, Director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

Speaking June 12 to a group of NGO leaders at the department the day after his office released the third annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report, Miller called human trafficking the most important human rights issue of the century and urged greater cooperation between NGOs and governments to end the practice. Miller praised NGOs as "the pillars" in the fight against human trafficking.

Compilation of the trafficking in persons (TIP) report is required by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act passed by Congress in 2000. It outlines a three-tier system for classifying nations depending on how aggressively they are acting to prevent trafficking in persons, to prosecute those associated with this form of organized criminal activity, and to protect victims.

Those nations found to be unresponsive to international calls for specific actions to control human trafficking are placed in Tier 3. Now reaching its third year of implementation, the law calls for the possible imposition of certain sanctions against nations found to be in that category.

"It is not just about the courts, the documents, laws and sanctions, this is about individuals who have lost their freedom," said Miller.

Recently passed anti-trafficking laws in Haiti and the Philippines, arrests of human traffickers in Cambodia and Serbia, and U.S. embassy reports of an increase in anti-trafficking activities by many governments in the months leading up to the report's release, Miller said, demonstrate "how powerful a tool this report can be."

"This shows that the U.S. legislation with its combination of carrots and sticks is having some effect," said Miller.

"It shows how much more effort there can be in the next four months [by October 1, 2003]," he said, before President Bush, as required by the law, decides whether sanctions will be applied or waived for nations in the "Tier-3" category.

The nations placed in "Tier-3" that could be subject to sanctions, according to the 2003 TIP report, are Belize, Bosnia & Herzegovina, Burma, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Georgia, Greece, Haiti, Kazakhstan, Liberia, North Korea, Sudan, Suriname, Turkey, and Uzbekistan.

But Miller emphasized that the goal of the report is "not to punish, but to bring about progress" and to gain "more significant efforts by countries to abolish modern-day slavery."

One of our priorities in the coming year, added Miller, is to examine the demand side of trafficking. The Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, he said, plans to create a program that developed nations can implement to reduce demand for sex tourism, such as working with airlines to enforce criminal laws.

"Don't think that this is just the end of the dialogue," said Miller, who urged NGOs to continue to make suggestions on how to make the report more effective, better pool resources and reach the common goal of ending human trafficking.

(The Washington File is a product of the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2003

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2003 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

307 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 12, 2003 Thursday

US lauds Russia's 'Herculean' anti-trafficking efforts

SECTION: Domestic, non-Washington, General News

LENGTH: 348 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 11

The United States on Wednesday lauded Russia for its "Herculean" effort to draft a law banning the trafficking in human beings that it said could be a model for the rest of the world.

The State Department, in its third annual "Trafficking in Persons Report," rewarded Moscow for its work by promoting Russia from a "Tier 3" to "Tier 2" country, a designation that means it will escape possible sanctions for failing to combat trafficking.

Countries in Tier 3 risk losing non-humanitarian and non-trade-related US assistance unless they improve their records by October 1 or receive a waiver.

Russia was elevated to Tier 2 -- a designation that means it does not yet fully comply with US and international anti-trafficking requirements but is making a "significant effort" to do so -- because of improvements in its record, mainly in the drafting of the new law.

"Russia has been engaged in a Herculean effort in drafting what could well be a model anti-trafficking law," said John Miller, the director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

In addition, he said Russia had begun to sponsor and promote public awareness events educating mainly children and women of the dangers of trafficking and the perils of the sex trade and forced labor.

Still, the report notes deficiencies in Russia's efforts and says that the new law -- which is expected to be passed this month -- has not yet come into force.

"Russia's legal structure still does not allow for effective prosecution of traffickers, nor for victim assistance, and efforts to prosecute traffickers for related crimes have been largely unsuccessful," the report said.

Miller stressed that the United States would be watching Russia to see how the law is enforced and whether violators are prosecuted to the fullest possible extent.

"We're going to be looking closely at Russia and see how they perform over the coming year," he said. "We're going to look and see if this law is indeed passed and if on the ground it is implemented."

mvl/aln

US-trafficking-Russia

LOAD-DATE: June 12, 2003

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

308 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 12, 2003 Thursday

Gulf countries improve trafficking records, escape US sanctions

SECTION: Domestic, non-Washington, General News

LENGTH: 468 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 11

The Gulf nations of Bahrain, Saudi Arabia, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates on Wednesday escaped US censure for their efforts to combat the trafficking of human beings and were spared the possible imposition of sanctions, the State Department said.

In its third annual "Trafficking in Persons Report" released on Wednesday, the department moved Bahrain, Saudi Arabia and Qatar out of its so-called "Tier 3" group of countries, inclusion in which can lead to sanctions, into "Tier 2" citing improvements in their anti-trafficking records.

Countries in Tier 3 will lose non-humanitarian and non-trade-related US assistance unless they improve their records by October 1 or receive a waiver.

The UAE was promoted directly from Tier 3 to Tier 1, skipping Tier 2, members of which do not fully meet US standards but are making "significant efforts" to comply and are therefore not subject to sanctions, the report said.

Tier 1 countries are those the department has found to be in full compliance with US and international efforts to stamp out the trafficking in human beings for forced labor and the sex trade.

The UAE's leap was almost entirely due to the country's decision last year to ban child camel jockeys, according to John Miller, director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

"The United Arab Emirates has taken the lead in the Middle East in what has been a severe trafficking challenge in the Middle East camel jockeys," he told reporters.

The UAE is also moving to enforce the law using retinal scans and DNA tests which has led other countries in the region to consider similar bans, he said.

Qatar, another Tier 3 country last year, has improved its anti-trafficking efforts but is included in Tier 2 this year in part because it has not yet followed the UAE lead on the child camel jockey ban, according to the report.

"The government needs to take additional steps to prevent the use of children in camel jockey races," the report said.

Saudi Arabia was promoted from Tier 3 to Tier 2 because it "showed significant effort," Miller said, noting that Saudi embassies abroad had begun to inform foreign workers going to the kingdom to work of their rights.

In addition, Saudi Arabia established a reporting mechanism for victims of trafficking to report abuses, he said.

Bahrain's record also improved over the past year but still does not meet US standards for elevation beyond Tier 2, according to the report, which cited the chief trafficking problem there to be abuse of workers.

"The government has made great progress in the areas of prevention and prosecution, but it should expand services provided to victims, and needs to continue to expand prosecution efforts," it said.

mvl/aln

US-trafficking-Gulf

LOAD-DATE: June 12, 2003

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2003 Agence France Presse

309 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 12, 2003 Thursday

Cambodia, Indonesia escape US trafficking sanctions, Myanmar berated

BYLINE: MATTHEW LEE

SECTION: Domestic, non-Washington, General News

LENGTH: 537 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 11

Cambodia and Indonesia on Wednesday escaped US censure for their efforts to combat the trafficking of human beings and spared the possible imposition of sanctions while Myanmar, already under heavy US criticism, was rebuked anew by the State Department.

In its third annual "Trafficking in Persons Report" released on Wednesday, the department moved both Cambodia and Indonesia out of its so-called "Tier 3" group of countries, inclusion in which can lead to sanctions, into "Tier 2" citing improvements in their records.

But Myanmar, the only other Southeast Asian nation to have been included in Tier 3 last year, remained so designated and will face a cut off in non-humanitarian and non-trade-related US aid unless it acts to meet Washington's trafficking concerns, according to the report.

"The government of Burma does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to do so," the report said, using the former name of the country.

The report accused Myanmar's military rulers, now under US fire for their continued detention of opposition leader Aung San Suu Kyi and their failure to adequately fight the narcotics trade, of complicity in trafficking people for forced labor.

"Government involvement in forced labor continues," it said, adding that Yangon's efforts to stamp out sex trafficking had been reluctant and achieved only mixed results.

"Burma's failure to make progress on forced labor more than offsets the government's improving, but still inadequate, record of combating trafficking for sexual exploitation," the report said, explaining the failing grade.

The problem of trafficking still exists in Cambodia and Indonesia, the report said, and much more needs to be done to successfully combat it but Phnom Penh and Jakarta both recognize their deficiencies and are working to fix them.

"Faced with limited resources, government officials have recognized that trafficking is a major problem confronting the country and have put in place new measures -- particularly in prosecution and law enforcement -- to address the challenge," the report said of Cambodia.

"Much remains to be done to build upon this modest start," it said.

In Indonesia, the report said the government had approved legislation aimed at protecting children from trafficking and was moving to improve its criminal code to effectively prevent and punish traffickers.

"Indonesia is (also) open to multilateral cooperation to combat trafficking ... but much remains to be done, particularly within the country," it said.

Southeast Asia has historically suffered from massive trafficking of people, particularly women and children, for the thriving international sex trade, but with the exception of Myanmar, all 10 of the countries in the region passed US muster, according to the report.

Brunei, Laos, Malaysia, the Philippines, Thailand and Vietnam remained in Tier 2 -- which means they do not fully meet US standards but are making "significant efforts" to comply -- for the second year in a row.

Singapore, which had been included in Tier 2 in 2002, was not mentioned in the 2003 report.

mvl/gs

US-trafficking-SEAsia

LOAD-DATE: June 12, 2003

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2003 Agence France Presse

310 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 12, 2003 Thursday

US allies Greece, Turkey angry over naming on sex trade blacklist

SECTION: International News

LENGTH: 660 words

DATELINE: ANKARA, June 12

Greece and Turkey slammed as unjustified Thursday their inclusion on a US blacklist of countries that could face sanctions for failing to fight human trafficking.

The two countries, both key US allies in NATO, were indignant at being named on a list of 15 nations issued by the US State Department which risk losing aid from Washington if they do not make significant efforts to crack down on trade in women and children.

"The picture given in this report does not correspond to reality," said Greek foreign ministry spokesman Panos Beglitis, whose country currently holds the rotating presidency of the European Union.

Ankara, under international pressure over its human rights record and whose relations with Washington have been strained over its refusal to admit US troops for the Iraq war, also said the move was unfair.

The list also includes Belize, Bosnia, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Georgia, Haiti, Kazakhstan, Liberia, Myanmar, North Korea, Sudan, Suriname and Uzbekistan.

At an International Labour Organisation conference devoted to the problem Thursday, Queen Rania of Jordan described child trafficking as a "brutal trade" which affects about 1.2 million children every year.

In a speech to mark World Day Against Child Labour, she told ILO delegates meeting in Geneva that the business of human trafficking was fuelled by poverty, lack of education, conflict and natural disasters.

And she said that global integration had increased the problem.

"The mentioning of Turkey among countries which have failed to fulfill the minimum standards in combatting human-trafficking shows that all progress (in Turkey) has been disregarded," Interior Minister Abdulkadir Aksu said.

"We think that this decision is not based on objective information and we regret it," Anatolia news agency quoted him as saying.

The US "Trafficking in Persons" report released Wednesday described Turkey as a destination country for women -- mainly from former Soviet Union countries -- trafficked for sexual exploitation and as a country of transit for such women.

People were also trafficked to Turkey for labour, it said.

The countries named will be subject to cut-offs in non-humanitarian and non-trade-related US aid unless they take steps to improve their performance by October 1 or receive a waiver.

Affected aid could include military, educational and cultural assistance.

If Turkey fails to improve its record by October, ensuing sanctions could also target a one-billion-dollar (850-million-euro) aid fund allocated to Ankara -- but not yet released -- in a supplementary budget adopted by Congress for the war in Iraq.

Congress agreed to the one-billion-dollar aid package despite Turkey's failure to allow US troops to use its bases as staging areas for an invasion of northern Iraq.

A US official in Ankara said Turkey was failing particularly in the prosecution of traffickers, in assisting their victims and in raising public awareness of the problem.

He said that under US law, Washington is required to oppose funds from the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank for countries which fail to toe the line in international efforts to fight trafficking.

Turkey, which is struggling to overcome one of its worst recessions, has received multi-billion-dollar loans from both financial institutions.

"We do recognize that Turkey has been making greater efforts over the last year. Those efforts also accelerated into the spring. We hope... that further evaluation in 90 days from now will provide some new positive developments," the US official said.

In Athens, the foreign ministry spokesman said the report did not take account of policies implemented by the Greek government to fight the problem of trafficking.

Beglitis said Foreign Minister George Papandreou would be bringing up the issue in a meeting with US ambassador to Greece Tom Miller later Thursday.

bur-txw/gk

US-trafficking-reax

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2003

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

311 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

June 12, 2003

Excerpt: State Dept. Report Says Burma's Military Uses Forced Labor; Trafficking in persons report also cites sexual exploitation

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 866 words

The State Department designated Burma as a Tier 3 government in its third annual Trafficking in Persons Report due to the Burmese government's lack of significant efforts to meet congressionally set standards for combating human trafficking.

The report, released June 11, faults Burma's military rulers for continued extensive use of internal forced labor.

"The military is directly involved in forced labor trafficking," the report says.

The report acknowledges that the military junta ruling Burma has taken steps to combat trafficking in persons for sexual exploitation, but it describes Burma's record as "inadequate."

"The Government of Burma does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to do so," the report says.

The State Department is required to report to Congress annually whether foreign governments fully meet the minimum standards set for the elimination of trafficking as detailed in the U.S. Trafficking Victims Protection Act of October 2000. Governments that are not making significant efforts to meet the standards are placed on the Tier 3 list.

The full text of the report is available at: http:// www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/tiprpt/2003/

Following is an excerpt on Burma from the report released by the Department of State June 11:

(begin excerpt)

Burma (Tier 3)

Burma is a source country for persons trafficked for labor and sexual exploitation. Although the government has taken steps to combat trafficking for sexual exploitation, significant use of internal forced labor continues, especially by the military. Burmese are trafficked mainly to Thailand, but also to China, Taiwan, Malaysia, Pakistan, and Japan for sexual exploitation, as well as domestic and factory work. Internally, trafficking of women and girls for prostitution occurs from villages to urban centers and other areas, such as trucking crossroads, fishing villages, border towns, and mining and military camps.

The Government of Burma does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to do so. The military is directly involved in forced labor trafficking. The ILO's attempts to work with the government to address forced labor abuses have had only limited success. Burma's failure to make progress on forced labor more than offsets the government's improving, but still inadequate, record of combating trafficking for sexual exploitation. The government has allowed some limited but important NGO and international organization activity to educate officials and vulnerable populations, and to assist trafficking victims returning from abroad.

Prevention

Governmental measures to prevent trafficking for sexual exploitation include publicizing the dangers in border areas via government-sponsored discussion groups, distribution of printed materials, and media programming. The government has worked with the UN to educate officials and potential victims on the nature of trafficking for sexual exploitation. The results are uneven and their effectiveness is often undercut by the repressive political climate in Burma and constrained by the government's limited financial resources. Government involvement in forced labor continues. Forced labor prevention efforts are limited to posting directives prohibiting such practices. The government has not publicly acknowledged that forced labor is a widespread problem and has rebuffed recommendations on prevention made by the ILO, which maintains an office in Rangoon.

Prosecution

Burma lacks a comprehensive anti-trafficking law, but a combination of statutes against kidnapping and prostitution is used to arrest and prosecute offenders who traffick in persons for sexual exploitation. According to official government data, Burma prosecuted about 100 such traffickers over the last year. Although information on convictions is incomplete, sentences reportedly ranged from 5 to 12 years, with most carrying a prison sentence of seven years. Corruption is a problem as some local and regional officials are suspected of turning a blind eye to trafficking. The Burmese military has generally not implemented directives prohibiting forced labor trafficking, while continuing to carry out abuses including forced portering, road construction, and military conscription (including of children). There have been no arrests or prosecutions of corrupt officials related to trafficking.

Protection

The government provides limited programming to provide women with income-generating skills and to assist returning victims of trafficking, but there is no specific budget for such activities, which are largely "self-financing." It allows two foreign NGOs and the UN to provide some services and support for repatriation of victims trafficked for sexual exploitation. The government provides no assistance to victims trafficked for forced labor.

(end excerpt)

(Distributed by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: June 12, 2003

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2003 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

312 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

June 11, 2003

More Nations Acting to Counter Human Trafficking, New Report Finds

BYLINE: Charlene Porter, Washington File Staff Writer

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 836 words

Washington -- More than 100 governments around the world are making concrete efforts to end trafficking in persons, according to a wide-ranging international survey released by the U.S. Department of State June 11.

At a Washington briefing, Secretary of State Colin Powell said "We hope that this report will help to raise awareness among governments and publics and serve as a catalyst for coordinated international action."

Compilation of the trafficking in persons (TIP) report is required by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act passed by Congress in 2000. It outlines a three-tier system for classifying nations depending on how aggressively they are acting to control trafficking within their jurisdictions. A nation's tier placement is determined by the actions it is taking to prevent trafficking in persons, to prosecute those associated with this form of organized criminal activity, and to protect victims.

Those nations found to be unresponsive to international calls for specific actions to control human trafficking are placed in Tier 3. Now reaching its third year of implementation, the law calls for the imposition of certain sanctions against nations found to be in that category.

"Countries can avoid sanctions by working with us and taking prompt action to improve their policies and practices," Powell said.

The nations that could be subject to sanctions according to the 2003 TIP report are Belize, Bosnia & Herzegovina, Burma, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Georgia, Greece, Haiti, Kazakhstan, Liberia, North Korea, Sudan, Suriname, Turkey, and Uzbekistan.

The TIP report emphasizes that several governments have increased their efforts to combat trafficking in the year since the last such survey, Powell said. "Mauritius has developed a multiagency initiative to combat the sexual exploitation of children. Brazil is fighting sex tourism by working with hotels to stop child prostitution, he noted.

The United Arab Emirates provides an "admirable example," according to the report, having made "great strides to strengthen its efforts throughout the year." The UAE's progress has moved it into Tier 1 in this year's report, among those nations fully compliant with standards for reducing trafficking, as contrasted with the UAE's Tier 3 placement last year.

Benin, Ghana and Morocco also improved their rankings this year, moving from Tier 2 -- those countries making "significant efforts" toward compliance -- to Tier 1.

Regarding the possibility of sanctions on non-compliant nations, the director of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, John Miller, said the law requires the president to make a decision on whether to impose or waive sanctions by October 1.

"It is my hope, and I think the hope of everybody in this department, that the president, when he reaches that decision, will find that such countries have made significant efforts to improve their performance in the fight against trafficking so that that consequence will not happen," Miller said. "That's what this four-month period is for."

The report says that it is meant to be a diplomatic tool, "a guide to help focus resources on prosecution, protection and prevention programs and policies." Miller said the three-year history of the 2000 law requiring the report does indicate that nations have been responding to that intent.

"One of the fascinating developments has been how efforts have increased in the last several months," Miller said. "As this report neared its publication date, we have seen laws passed from the Philippines to Haiti; we've seen more arrests, from Serbia to Cambodia; we've seen special prosecution units set up."

Another significant finding of the report is that estimates on the number of victims have been scaled back considerably from previous years. The 2003 TIP report cites U.S. government estimates that approximately 800,000 to 900,000 people may be trafficked around the world each year. Estimates in previous years set the possible number of victims anywhere from 700,000 to 4 million, though experts readily acknowledge that estimates are unreliable in an area of such covert, underground activity.

The number of victims estimated to be trafficked into the United States annually is between 18,000 and 20,000, down from an estimate of 50,000 in previous years.

Both Powell and Miller emphasized that the United States and all Tier 1 nations can still do a better job to stop trafficking. Powell noted that the United States has spent $100 million on international counter-trafficking programs over the last two years.

Miller said the United States is continuing its efforts to support other nations in stopping this form of organized criminal activity. "We're going to work with all countries, whether they're in the report, not in the report, on Tier 1, Tier 2, Tier 3. The goal has to be to abolish modern-day slavery."

(The Washington File is a product of the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: June 12, 2003

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

313 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Federal Document Clearing House Congressional Testimony

April 9, 2003 Wednesday

TRAFFICKING IN WOMEN AND CHILDRENSECTION: CAPITOL HILL HEARING TESTIMONY*LENGTH: 1538 words

Statement of John Miller Senior Advisor & Director Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons Department of State

Senate Foreign Relations Committee Subcommittee on East Asian and Pacific Affairs

April 9, 2003

Thank you, Senator Brownback, for this opportunity to discuss the United States' efforts to fight trafficking in persons in East Asia. Let me start by thanking you for your visionary leadership in combating human trafficking worldwide, which you often say, is truly the modern-day face of slavery. As the recently appointed director of this office, which you helped establish through your landmark legislation, I look forward to working with you in this continuing fight to eradicate human trafficking worldwide.

I would like to give an overview of our anti-trafficking efforts, particularly regarding the East Asian and Pacific region. The focus in East Asia and Pacific is concentrated on the following strategies:

- Emphasizing the importance of continuing and expanding regional collaboration
- Engaging governments bilaterally to bring all possible tools to bear to encourage and assist countries in addressing their trafficking problem

To date, U.S. engagement on trafficking in the East Asia Pacific region has generated positive progress, but the countries in the region need to do much more. As you know, most of the countries in the region face serious trafficking problems. The good news is that almost all of these governments are aware of this transnational problem and seek cooperative solutions. The diversity of the region means there is no one-size-fits-all model for a response to the trafficking problem. Governments are at different points along the continuum in responding to this arduous task.

As noted, my office seeks to expand and encourage cooperation between and among neighboring governments. After working closely with the governments in the Mekong region, we have seen, for example, the beginnings of cooperative efforts between governments to ensure that trafficking victims are humanely treated and where appropriate, are helped to return voluntarily to their countries of origin.

Similar bilateral and regional cooperation is occurring as governments more fully recognize that trafficking in persons is a transnational crime. There have been positive practical responses by governments. Governments have begun to build capacity by exchanging law enforcement information, enhancing their ability to better challenge the international syndicates. For example, Thailand has begun taking measures to build a transnational law enforcement unit. This development has the potential to demonstrate the Thai government's long-term commitment to regional law enforcement. Also, such cooperation should help governments improve their own domestic law enforcement efforts.

The Government of Indonesia hosted the first Regional Ministerial Conference on People Smuggling, Trafficking in Persons and Related Transnational Crime last year. The Second Regional Ministerial Conference on People Smuggling, Trafficking in Persons and Related Transnational Crime will be held on April 29- 30 in Bali. We support Indonesia's effort to confront trafficking issues in a pragmatic and results-oriented fashion, and we look forward to participating in the next conference as an observer. We consider this to be a positive opportunity to stimulate much-needed regional cooperation.

These are important steps forward, but many challenges remain. Generally, domestic law enforcement efforts, particularly "prosecutions" are the most problematic area in combating trafficking in the East Asia and Pacific region. We have communicated with a number of governments, including Thailand, Cambodia, and Indonesia, that much more needs to be done in this respect. We have emphasized that prosecution efforts, in addition to protection and prevention measures, are an important component in their tier placement on the annual Trafficking in Persons Report.

A related concern is that a lack of transparency and weak institutions are hampering the effectiveness of efforts to combat trafficking in some countries. We have expressed these concerns to our partners and are working vigorously to help them address these broader issues. We recognize that trafficking networks build up over time and will take some concerted long-term efforts to dismantle. We do not, however, see these systemic problems as an excuse for weak political will. In this context, we have clearly communicated to relevant partners that any complicity of public officials in trafficking must be addressed urgently.

Simply stated, we are engaged in a vigorous fight to eradicate trafficking in persons, which is a modern day form of slavery. Key actors throughout the region - government officials, activists and NGOs, and engaged citizens - are with us in this anti-trafficking fight, and we continue to expand our cooperation with these friends.

We have the assistance of some governments in the region, which like the U.S., are providing program assistance in the fight against trafficking. Like the U.S., they also face their own trafficking problems at home. For example, we are developing closer cooperation with destination countries such as Australia, Japan and South Korea, in funding anti-trafficking programs in source and transit countries. Australia, for example, is spending $6.4 million in the region to fight both human trafficking and child sex tourism. After a review of their trafficking projects in 2001, Australia developed a pilot program to build the capacity of South East Asian countries, coordinated through a workshop of representatives from sponsored countries, and including the U. S. Government as a participant. The six diverse components of the project range from boosting law enforcement capacity in Cambodia to an integrated early detection system in Laos.

During the 2002 fiscal year, the U.S. Government approved approximately $11 million for anti-trafficking programs in the East Asia Pacific region during the 2002 fiscal year, with funds supplied from the Departments of State, Labor, and USAID. Of this amount, $5 million came from the Department of State from INCLE, ESF and MRA funds. These programs were designed to improve the capacities of governments and NGOs to fight trafficking by assisting law enforcement, providing protection and assistance to victims, and bolstering prevention efforts. Such programs include helping the Government of Vietnam to develop a national plan of action. Other measures include a program in Laos promoting education and awareness-raising on the dangers of trafficking in the villages; supporting victims' shelters in Vietnam; and, sending technical experts from the Department of Justice to train Indonesian police officials on investigating trafficking crimes.

There are impressive programmatic successes in the region, although much more needs to be done. In the Philippines, for example, the U.N. Center for International Crime Prevention created a National Coordination Project involving several components including a trafficking study, review of governmental efforts, and a profile development of trafficked women. The project addressed better coordination of governmental efforts so successfully, it has become a model for other countries in the region with a significant trafficking problem suffering inadequate national responses. The Department provided funding in FY2002 for this program to be reproduced in Vietnam.

Another example of program success in the region involves child victim advocacy and law enforcement in Thailand. With funding from the Department, the Asia Foundation administered 9 projects to improve the capacity of NGOs addressing regional trafficking. One particularly notable Thai NGO is the Coalition to Fight Against Child Exploitation (FACE), which is in the forefront of efforts to secure convictions of traffickers and pedophiles. The Department funding helped FACE expand to include advocacy on behalf of Cambodian children trafficked into Bangkok. Additionally, since this funding, FACE was empowered to provide key data on prosecutions and investigations, previously unavailable.

As you know, my office leads preparation of the Department's legislatively mandated Trafficking in Persons Report, otherwise known as the TIP Report, issued each June. In compiling this report, my office will maintain its high standards of objective and fair reporting that is consistent with our role as advocates for victims. This year for the first time, those countries in Tier 3 of the TIP Report will face the loss of non-humanitarian and nontrade related aid absent a national interest waiver.

This is a good beginning, but it is only the start of a long-term effort. We must press for immediate action while assisting in promoting sustained regional and country strategies. Human trafficking is many insidious things. It is a human rights atrocity. It is a transnational crime. It is an offense against human dignity. I look forward to working with you combating this scourge which is counted among the great human rights battles of our time.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

LOAD-DATE: April 10, 2003

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

COMMITTEE: SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS

SUBCOMMITTEE: EAST ASIAN AND PACIFIC AFFAIRS

TESTIMONY-BY: JOHN MILLER, SENIOR ADVISOR & DIRECTOR

AFFILIATION: DEPARTMENT OF STATE

Copyright 2003 FDCHeMedia, Inc. All Rights Reserved.

314 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Federal Document Clearing House Congressional Testimony

April 9, 2003 Wednesday

TRAFFICKING IN WOMEN AND CHILDRENSECTION: CAPITOL HILL HEARING TESTIMONY*LENGTH: 3821 words

Statement of Gary A. Haugen President & CEO International Justice Mission

Subcommittee on East Asian and Pacific Affairs Senate Foreign Relations Committee

April 9, 2003

INTRODUCTION

Mr. Chairman

My name is Gary Haugen and I serve as the President of International Justice Mission (IJM). On behalf of IJM, I would like to express my thanks to the Committee for the privilege of participating in this important hearing to Review U.S. Policy on the Trafficking of Women and Children in East Asia and Beyond.

International Justice Mission is an international human rights agency that provides a hands-on, operational field response to cases of human rights abuse referred to us from faith-based ministries serving around the world. Frequently these workers observe severe human rights abuses in the communities where they serve. These workers refer these cases to us, and then we conduct a professional investigation to document the abuses and mobilize intervention on behalf of the victims.

Many of the cases referred to us involve children taken into sex trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation. Accordingly, we deploy criminal investigators to infiltrate the brothels, use surveillance technology to document where the children are being held, and then identify secure police contacts who will conduct raids with us to get the children out. We then coordinate the referral of these children to appropriate aftercare.

At a time when our nation is vigorously engaged in a struggle against tyranny and terrorism in the world, this Committee manifests the generous and conscientious spirit of the U.S. Senate by making room in its agenda for vigilant oversight of our national commitment to combat the global scourge of human trafficking.

I would like to focus my remarks today on the nightmare of human trafficking for purposes of sexual exploitation. Quite simply, sex trafficking is the ugliest and most preventable man-made disaster in our world today. It is ugly because it is massive and brutal. UNICEF estimates that about a million children are victimized by sex trafficking each year around the world. IJM investigators have spent literally thousands of hours infiltrating the sex trafficking industry, and the reality we find is a horror one only encounters in nightmares. I've just returned from an investigation of a sex trafficking ring in a South East Asian country where I entered a brothel and was promptly offered a dozen children between the ages of 6 and 12 who, for a modest price, were made available by the pimps to be raped and molested.

At the same time, this ugly and appalling epidemic is also one of the most preventable catastrophes on our globe today. The simple fact of the matter is this: sex trafficking only flourishes where it is tolerated by local law enforcement. The business of sex trafficking and forced prostitution requires that the perpetrators commit multiple felonies of abduction, rape, assault, and false imprisonment - and then it requires that the perpetrators hold out the victims of these crime openly to the public so that the customers can find them. It does no good at all for the brothel keepers and pimps to hide their victims.

In fact, to make money on their investment, the pimps and brothel keepers must make their victims openly available to the customer public - and not just once, but continuously, and over a long period of time. Obviously, therefore, if the customers can find the victims of sex trafficking whenever they want, so can the police. How, therefore, do you possibly get away with running a sex trafficking enterprise?

You do so only if permitted by local law enforcement. Generally, this is facilitated by bringing the police into the business and sharing the profits with them in exchange for protection against the enforcement of the laws that are openly and continuously violated every single day the business is in operation. Certainly sex trafficking is exacerbated by poverty and economic desperation; but we do not find epidemic levels of sex trafficking wherever we find poverty in the world. Rather, sex trafficking flourishes on a large scale only in those countries where it is tolerated by national law enforcement.

This is the indispensable insight about the fundamental vulnerability of sex trafficking that must be grasped. Sex trafficking requires the commission of multiple felonies in a way that is held out openly to the public. Therefore it can be shut down wherever there is the political will and operational resources to do so.

Sex trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation can be drastically reduced wherever a country has the political will and the operational capacity to send the perpetrators to jail and to treat the victims with compassion and dignity. This is a fight that can actually be won. In fact, this was the animating conviction behind the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA). The TVPA sought to influence the political will of countries with serious trafficking problems by making clear that there would be consequences for a country's relationship with the United States, including the possibility of sanctions, if that country did not make significant efforts to meet minimum standards in combating sex trafficking. Secondly, the TVPA also authorized grants to help strengthen a country's capacity to address sex trafficking through prevention, prosecution, and protection activities.

The authors of the TVPA understood that it was essential to strengthen both the political will and the operational capacity of countries to fight sex trafficking. It was well understood that in many countries the victims of sex trafficking fundamentally lacked the voice and power to make themselves a priority for national law enforcement. Sex trafficking operations prey upon the most marginalized groups in society - women, children, refugees, undocumented persons, ethnic minorities, and the poor.

Fundamentally, political leaders do not feel threatened in their hold on power if they fail to protect a bunch of impoverished and low-status women and girls. Scarce law enforcement resources are deployed to protect the things that societies value the most, and in countries where the women and children have been relegated to the status of a lower life form, they are left utterly vulnerable to the brutalities of the commercial sex trade. Accordingly, the TVPA endeavored to place the voice and values of the American people on the side of these vulnerable women and children by making it clear that their abuse would not be tolerated. Specifically, the TVPA established the Office to Combat and Monitor Trafficking to provide a voice of accountability for the otherwise voiceless victims of trafficking. This new office would tell the truth about whether a country was vigorously defending women and children against the horrors of trafficking, with the understanding that those countries unwilling to provide such basic protections would find an adverse impact in their relationship with the United States.

This was the theory behind the policy expressed in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000. All of the great effort in passing the TVPA was intended to actually make a real-world difference for the women and children being crushed by the forces of sex trafficking. I offer this review simply to ask the question whether the policy is actually having its intended effect, especially in East Asia. What have we learned about the efforts to implement the policy that actually make a difference and what have we learned about those actions that undermine the impact of the policy? In a number of countries, IJM has been working hand-in-hand with foreign governments, NGO's and State Department personnel to conduct hands-on operations to rescue victims and to bring perpetrators to justice, and we are learning about the practical impact of U.S. policy at the street level. Our experience is starting to demonstrate that, as we all hoped, the policy can have a tremendous impact if implemented vigorously.

What makes the policy actually work?

I would suggest 3 things:

1. Vigorous and transparent reporting on a government's record on sex trafficking convictions and police disciplinary actions.
2. A credible, and clearly communicated threat of consequences for governments that are not taking serious steps to actually send perpetrators to jail and to get police out of the trafficking business.

3. Focused and practical capacity building for sending perpetrators to jail and caring compassionately for victims.

I would like to take a moment to examine these one at a time. First, vigorous and transparent reporting on a government's record on sex trafficking convictions and police disciplinary actions. The purpose of the Trafficking In Persons Report is simple: it is intended to provide accountability.

Therefore, the report has its intended effect when it is actually written in a way that makes accountability easy, rather than making it hard. We should make no mistake. There are those who will have an interest in making clear accountability harder rather than easier - and (as all of my fellow lawyers well know) there certainly are ways to fashion a document that either promotes accountability or obscures accountability. Effective accountability is achieved when the Report provides specific, objective, transparent data on a government's actions that actually matter. And from the perspective of the sex traffickers, only two government actions matter: a) Is the government seriously threatening to actually send me to jail for doing this? b) Is the government seriously threatening to remove the police protection that I have paid for?

Consequently, effective accountability regarding the seriousness of a government's efforts to combat trafficking will only begin to emerge when there is specific objective data on the number of successful trafficking-related convictions resulting in jail time, as well as data on the number of disciplinary actions that have been taken against police who are complicit in protecting sex trafficking operations (remembering that such operations simply don't exist on a significant scale without such protection).

Again, it must be emphasized that the relevant data point is convictions - not raids, arrests, and prosecutions. Traffickers, brothel keepers, and pimps are quite willing to endure raids, arrests, and even prosecutions if, at the end of the day, they don't have to actually go to prison. In fact, such actions are just considered part of the costs of doing business. Moreover, even the most corrupt police carry out raids, arrests and initiate prosecutions. In fact, they must do so in order to maintain the credible threat by which they extort bribes from the perpetrators. That is why countries with the worst sex trafficking records can report raids, arrests, and prosecutions; but such countries have very little to report in terms of actual convictions. None of these other actions turn into a credible law enforcement threat that actually deters sex trafficking unless they result in convictions with imprisonment. This is the only cost of doing business that the perpetrators are unwilling to pay.

This is why IJM is so pleased that the new Director of the Office to Combat and Monitor Trafficking, the Hon. John Miller, has adopted as the policy of his office that governments wishing to be certified as making serious efforts to meet minimum standards in combating sex trafficking must bear the burden of providing objective data on trafficking-related convictions and police disciplinary actions. After all, these governments are themselves in the best position to report on their own positive actions, and the Office cannot be reasonably expected to affirmatively certify that a government is making significant efforts if the government provides no verifiable data on these two most basic responsibilities. Self-reporting by a government regarding its own counter-trafficking initiatives with follow up by the State Department provides the best means for transparency and accountability.

The second ingredient for making the TVPA policy actually work has been a credible, and clearly communicated threat of consequences for governments that are not taking serious steps to actually send perpetrators to jail and to get police out of the trafficking business.

In order to bring effective protection to women and children vulnerable to sex trafficking, governments must move counter- trafficking efforts from being a good idea to being an urgent priority. And in reality, the only dynamic that generates such a shift is usually the belief that something bad will happen if they fail to do so. This is why the threat of possible sanctions was incorporated within the legislation for countries placed on Tier 3 of the Trafficking In Persons Report (TIP). In this regard, we have found that trafficking issues become an urgent priority for the worst offending countries only after they have been placed on Tier 3 or faced a credible risk of being placed on Tier 3. While some countries may diplomatically protest their placement on Tier 2, foreign governments clearly understand that actual consequences for their poor trafficking record only kick in if they are on Tier 3. Among countries with serious trafficking problems, therefore, it is only the credible risk of Tier 3 sanctions that actually moves countries to earnestly make the work of combating trafficking an urgent law enforcement priority, rather than just a public relations nuisance.

Accordingly, a TIP Report process that proceeds with a presumption that Tier 3 status for certain countries is diplomatically intolerable or politically untenable severely undermines the effectiveness of the TIP Report process. An unspoken but de facto presumption against a Tier 3 ranking effectively freezes the status quo of the worst offending nations and weakens the TVPA's capacity to impact political will. It profoundly dishonors the suffering of women and children brutalized by sex trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation. Likewise, the TVPA's capacity to strengthen the political will of authorities to end the toleration of sex trafficking is utterly diluted by the failure to articulate clearly to foreign governments the straightforward requirements of the TVPA and the real risks of consequences associated with a poor trafficking record. Ultimately, it will be up to congressional committees such as this to thoroughly and rigorously scrutinize the precise factual basis upon which the State Department grants passing grades to the some of the most notorious sex trafficking countries.

Finally, U.S. policy is effectively advanced through focused and practical capacity-building for programs that send perpetrators to jail and care compassionately for victims. In addition to political will, foreign governments also need the practical wherewithal to take decisive law enforcement measures to combat trafficking and to care for the victims. Accordingly, U.S. policy is advanced by funding programs that address the intensely practical challenges of strengthening law enforcement capacities to investigate, arrest and successfully prosecute sex trafficking offenders. Programs are needed to support special anti- trafficking police units and prosecutorial teams with training, operational support, and hands-on assistance in achieving the priority outcome of sending offenders to jail and removing dirty cops.

Education, awareness, and poverty alleviation programs are important preventative measures, but such programs will never be able to keep pace with the entrepreneurial energy and creativity of the traffickers unless they are combined with practical programs that actually help make national law enforcement successful in sending perpetrators to jail. Police complicity in sex trafficking has been so pervasive and ugly that many have been tempted to imagine solutions that simply ignore the police.

But in combating any crime, the answer to bad law enforcement is never no law enforcement - the answer must always be a committed struggle for better law enforcement. Accordingly, IJM is very pleased that recent legislation has cleared the way for funding by USAID and other agencies of targeted programs that strengthen counter-trafficking activities of specialized police and prosecution units, as well as legal advocacy to protect victims and to bring perpetrators to justice.

(See the Consolidated Appropriations Resolution, 2003 (P.L. 108- 7).

Equally critical are programs that fund comprehensive and compassionate aftercare services for the victims of sex trafficking. Not only are such programs necessary to treat victims with the dignity and care that they deserve, but they are also absolutely indispensable for establishing the victim cooperation that is essential for any meaningful counter- trafficking endeavor. At present, the existing capacities for providing comprehensive aftercare for the victims of sex trafficking are tragically inadequate. In fact, IJM has found itself limited in the rescue operations it could conduct for victims because of the lack of aftercare capacity. This is a need that can and must be addressed by targeted and generous appropriations.

Additional opportunities to fund programs to fight sex trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation have emerged as a result of President Bush's bold initiative to combat the AIDS epidemic. Research has demonstrated that sex trafficking is one of the great engines driving the spread of the AIDS global pandemic, and while traditional AIDS prevention programs of education and awareness go a long way in helping women and girls make good choices in avoiding high-risk sexual activities, these programs do nothing to protect the millions of women and girls who do not get to make choices about their sexual encounters - particularly the millions of victims of commercial sexual exploitation who are forcibly infected with the HIV virus. Accordingly, federal funding of programs aimed at combating the international AIDS epidemic must include support of programs to combat sex trafficking and other forms of sexual violence against women and girls, or else America's effort to fight AIDS will simply fail to address one of the fundamental and certainly most brutal causes of the epidemic.

Finally, in recent weeks IJM has directly experienced the positive impact of U.S. policy in combating sex trafficking in Cambodia. More than two years ago, IJM began conducting extensive investigations into one of the most appalling cesspools of child prostitution in the world, a village called Svay Pak outside Phnom Penh where scores of girls between the ages of 5 and 12 were being sold in an open market for pedophiles and sex tourists. Over a two-year period we turned our investigative findings over to Cambodian authorities, but failed to obtain a satisfying response. Then last year, the TIP Report placed Cambodia on Tier 3 and the new U.S. Ambassador to Cambodia, Ambassador Charles A. Ray, initiated a very proactive engagement with the senior Cambodian authorities on U.S. policy toward trafficking. This direct advocacy with Cambodian authorities and the excellent work of Ambassador Ray's staff, helped make it possible last month for IJM and the Cambodian authorities to bring rescue to 37 minor victims of commercial sexual exploitation out of Svay Pak, including about a dozen children between the ages of 5 and 10. In addition, approximately 12 suspects have been arrested and charged, with cooperative police investigations continuing with IJM to locate and prosecute additional suspects identified in our investigative report.

Ambassador Ray, and representatives of the U.S. Department of State were very successful in making clear to the Cambodian authorities the priority that American foreign policy places on addressing sex trafficking. Senior Cambodian authorities were well and effectively briefed on the dynamics and significance of the tier rating system of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, and on the consequences of failing to make significant efforts to meet minimum standards in combating trafficking. Consequently, by the time IJM was able to brief the Cambodian authorities on our latest Svay Pak investigation, they were prepared to provide extraordinary cooperation in working with IJM to seek rescue for the victims and to pursue accountability for the perpetrators. We believe that the advocacy of the U.S. Embassy with the Cambodian authorities was an indispensable and decisive factor in generating effective law enforcement cooperation.

These actions have paved the way for significant and continuing progress in mobilizing effective law enforcement responses to human trafficking in Cambodia. Cambodian police authorities have had a positive experience of effective counter-trafficking investigations and enforcement actions with IJM that produced arrests, proper charges, and compelling evidence for prosecution. They have participated in groundbreaking procedures for humanely conducting victim interviews in the presence of a social worker and an NGO lawyer-monitor while being videotaped. They have also requested further training from IJM in effective counter- trafficking investigations and enforcement actions, and have developed new relationships with local NGO's.

Of course, it will be very important to continue to monitor the actions of the Cambodian authorities as they follow-up on these specific cases, and as they persevere in vigorous efforts to investigate and successfully prosecute sex trafficking crimes on an on-going basis. Cambodia has had a very poor record of tolerating sex trafficking (especially among very young children) and such a record cannot be turned around overnight. But we believe that a very promising beginning has been made in supporting the Cambodian government in a new direction to seriously combat sex trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation.

We believe these encouraging events help to serve as a model for what can be achieved when there is transparent reporting through the TIP Report, a meaningful application of the tier rating system, direct advocacy by U.S. authorities at the highest levels of government, and tangible, practical assistance to foreign governments in bringing rescue to trafficking victims and justice to perpetrators. IJM looks forward to continuing its constructive work with the U.S. State Department, foreign governments, and partner NGO's in helping make sure that the promises of U.S. policy in fighting sex trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation deliver tangible results to vulnerable women and children and hastens the day when these brutal enterprises of rape for profit are simply put out of business.

Thank you very much.

LOAD-DATE: April 10, 2003

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

COMMITTEE: SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS

SUBCOMMITTEE: EAST ASIAN AND PACIFIC AFFAIRS

TESTIMONY-BY: GARY A. HAUGEN, PRESIDENT & CEO

AFFILIATION: INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE MISSION

315 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

March 15, 2003 Saturday

US may downgrade Thailand's rating on human trafficking

SECTION: International NewsLENGTH: 289 words

BANGKOK, March 15 (AFP) The United States has threatened to downgrade Thailand's rating on human trafficking prevention in light of alleged poor performance by the kingdom in stemming illicit migration, Thai lawmakers said Saturday.

MP Lalita Ruerksamran, chairwoman of the House committee on women, children and the elderly, said Thai police presented a letter from the US embassy in Bangkok blaming local authorities for insufficient action to solve prostitution and human trafficking.

"They blamed the overall domestic picture on Thai authorities for allowing a flourishing of prostitution of foreign women while exporting Thai women for the sex trade," she said.

If the United States downgrades the country to tier three from tier two, in an upcoming review, it would suggest Thailand is unable to meet some requirements for fighting human trafficking and its image would suffer, the MP said.

"Like drugs, prostitution also destroys our country in terms of culture and identity," she said.

Thailand and the United States agreed last year to boost cooperation in the fight against human trafficking, which ranks among the world's fastest growing transnational crimes.

Three years ago the trade was estimated as being worth 7.0 billion dollars annually -- more lucrative, experts said, than the trade in illicit weapons.

Thailand's trafficking problem is particularly acute, as the kingdom is simultaneously a country of origin, transit and destination.

It was not immediately clear whether there would be and penalties imposed on Thailand, such as a slashing of US aid.

Lalita said she would address the issue with US embassy officials in a meeting next Thursday.

ask/mlm/nj

Thailand-US-trafficking

LOAD-DATE: March 16, 2003LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

316 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Moscow Times

February 19, 2003

Bill Makes Human Trafficking a Crime

BYLINE: Nabi Abdullaev

SECTION: No. 2622

LENGTH: 923 words

Staff Writer

With an eye on ratifying a UN convention combating organized crime, the State Duma has drawn up legislation that for the first time outlaws human trafficking and slavery. The bill, which was approved by the Duma's legislation committee Monday and will go up for a vote this spring, seeks to crack down on a problem that human rights activists say has reached epidemic proportions over the past decade.

Hundreds of thousands of people are forced into prostitution both in Russia and abroad each year, while slavery has become commonplace in the North Caucasus.

The Russian sex trafficking industry is worth $ 7 billion per year, said Marianna Solomatova, the Moscow director of Angel Coalition, a nongovernmental organization that fights human trafficking and helped draft the Duma bill.

"Trafficking in drugs and weapons is punishable by law, while human trafficking has remained a relatively safe business," she said.

Yelena Mizulina, the deputy head of the Duma's legislation committee, said it was time that something be done.

"This is a very serious problem for Russia, which has become an active supplier of slaves to customers here and in foreign countries," she said in an interview Tuesday. "Slaves are used on farms and they are forced to work as prostitutes. Women are forced to bear babies for childless couples." Her committee hammered out the human trafficking legislation with the Interior, Labor and Justice ministries, the Prosecutor General's Office and nongovernmental organizations -- in a sign that the government is taking the issue seriously.

The bill provides Russia's first legal definition for slavery and human trafficking and pursues three main objectives, said Mizulina, who oversaw the drafting of the legislation.

These are to educate the public about human trafficking and slavery; oblige the government to protect and rehabilitate victims; and give law enforcement a legal basis to fight human trafficking and slavery, which should in turn discourage the practices.

Mizulina said the part of the bill involving a victim's right to be protected and rehabilitated was especially significant.

"These people are now considered criminals. Under Russian law, they are accomplices in a crime that was actually committed against them," she said.

The bill adds seven new crimes to the Criminal Code, including human trafficking, recruiting people for sexual exploitation and using slave labor.

Penalties outlined in the bill closely adhere to those used in the West, said a senior official in the Interior Ministry.

For example, a person convicted of trafficking another person within Russia faces up to six years in prison. A person convicted of belonging to a human trafficking ring or of trafficking with another country faces up to 10 years in prison.

"Slavery and forced prostitution have become systemic across Russia and account for hundreds of thousands of cases," the Interior Ministry official said, speaking on condition of anonymity. "Russia is going to ratify the UN Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime. To do this the government must comply with the demands of the convention, which include anti-trafficking laws." He said existing laws that can be used against traffickers do not have enough bite. Those laws cover border violations, kidnapping, rape, fraud, organized crime and pornography.

There are no official statistics on human trafficking or slavery because they are not considered a crime. Under the law, only those who use minors can be punished, with prison terms of up to 10 years. Sixty-four such cases were opened in 2000 and 2001, according to the police.

The Angel Coalition estimates that as many as 50,000 Russian women are forced into sex slavery abroad each year.

Mizulina said human trafficking is closely tied with migration.

In Moscow, a haven for migrants from all over the former Soviet Union, migrants reportedly are being forced to build out-of-town mansions for the newly rich, and women are being lured from the regions with promises of steady jobs but then forced into prostitution.

The North Caucasus is notorious for human trafficking, where the kidnapping of people for ransom is a lucrative business for local gangsters, Chechen rebels and, in some cases, federal troops.

The proposed legislation calls for the creation of a countrywide network of protection and rehabilitation centers for victims. Part of their expenses are supposed to be covered by assets seized from convicted traffickers.

"Protection of the victims will be the most difficult task in implementing the anti-trafficking legislation," the Interior Ministry official said. "The creation of these centers will demand a considerable amount of money from the federal budget." In fighting human trafficking, Russia lags behind most of the other former Soviet republics. Estonia, Ukraine, Belarus and the countries of Central Asia already have laws against trafficking.

Last June, the United States put Russia on a blacklist of countries facing sanctions for not doing enough to crack down on human trafficking and slavery. In the U.S. State Department's 2002 Trafficking in Persons Report, Russia was ranked with 18 other countries in the worst category of 89 countries surveyed.

Countries in this category risk losing nonhumanitarian aid from the United States.

The report played an important role in getting the government to tackle the human-trafficking legislation, the Angel Coalition said.

LOAD-DATE: February 19, 2003

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUB-TYPE: PAPER

317 of 359 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

January 29, 2003, Wednesday

Human trafficking reaches "critical level" in Thai Northern border provinces

SOURCE: The Nation web site, Bangkok, in English 29 Jan 03

LENGTH: 340 words

Text of report in English by Thai newspaper The Nation web site on 29 January

The problem of transnational human trafficking has reached a critical level in three northern border provinces and Thailand is seen as making only moderate efforts to tackle it, women's and children's advocates said yesterday.

Tak, Chiang Mai and Chiang Rai have emerged as notorious transit points for traffickers of women and children from neighbouring countries, Bandit Paenwiset of the Friends of Women Foundation said.

Government officials and non-governmental organization (NGO) workers should step up their cooperation to crack down on transnational people-smuggling and launch a rehabilitation programme for victims before repatriation, Bandit said.

"Victims of human trafficking suffer the ordeals associated with prostitution and forced labour and they deserve care and treatment to overcome their trauma," he said.

To lessen the burden on Thai authorities and NGOs, the government should open talks with neighbouring countries and ask them to open shelters for victims awaiting repatriation, he said.

Children's rights advocate Sudarat Seriwat called on the government to start collecting detailed data on trafficked women and children, saying accurate information was needed to map out appropriate measures.

"Thailand needs to put more effort into the suppression of human trafficking if it is to avoid possible trade sanctions by Western countries like the United States," she said.

The US government enacted the Trafficking Victims Protection Act in 2000 and has encouraged other countries to join the fight against human trafficking, she said.

The act is seen as a pretext for the US to impose trade barriers against countries uncooperative on the matter, she said.

In a US government report, Thailand was classified as a tier-2 country on a scale of one to three in terms of efforts to eradicate human trafficking, she said, adding that the report was based on an assessment done by a foreign-based NGO.

LOAD-DATE: April 15, 2005

LANGUAGE: English

318 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Nation (Thailand)

January 29, 2003, Wednesday

PEOPLE SMUGGLING: Trafficking in North at crisis levelsBYLINE: The Nation.LENGTH: 334 words

PEOPLE SMUGGLING: Trafficking in North at crisis levels

The problem of transnational human trafficking has reached a critical level in three northern border provinces and Thailand is seen as making only moderate efforts to tackle it, women's and children's advocates said yesterday.

Tak, Chiang Mai and Chiang Rai have emerged as notorious transit points for traffickers of women and children from neighbouring countries, Bandit Paenwiset of the Friends of Women Foundation said.

Government officials and non-governmental organisation (NGO) workers should step up their cooperation to crack down on transnational people-smuggling and launch a rehabilitation programme for victims before repatriation, Bandit said.

"Victims of human trafficking suffer the ordeals associated with prostitution and forced labour and they deserve care and treatment to overcome their trauma," he said.

To lessen the burden on Thai authorities and NGOs, the government should open talks with neighbouring countries and ask them to open shelters for victims awaiting repatriation, he said.

Children's rights advocate Sudarat Seriwat called on the government to start collecting detailed data on trafficked women and children, saying accurate information was needed to map out appropriate measures.

"Thailand needs to put more effort into the suppression of human trafficking if it is to avoid possible trade sanctions by Western countries like the United States," she said.

The US government enacted the Trafficking Victims Protection Act in 2000 and has encouraged other countries to join the fight against human trafficking, she said.

The act is seen as a pretext for the US to impose trade barriers against countries uncooperative on the matter, she said.

In a US government report, Thailand was classified as a tier-2 country on a scale of one to three in terms of efforts to eradicate human trafficking, she said, adding that the report was based on an assessment done by a foreign-based NGO.

LOAD-DATE: January 28, 2003LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

319 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Straits Times (Singapore)

Migration boom;
When Malaysia took steps to send thousands of illegal workers back to Indonesia and the Philippines, it sparked tensions between the Asean neighbours. But these workers are just a small part of the regional flow of workers, legal and otherwise.

September 30, 2002 Monday

Yeoh En-lai

TEN million South-east Asians left their homes seeking work outside their countries in the past eight years.

But this might just be the beginning of a migration boom in the region.

Experts believe that workers from China will be a major presence in the next 20 years as labour migration - legal and illegal - becomes a feature of cross-border relations.

'China has not peaked, and could flood the region with cheap, semi-skilled workers,' said Mr Nilim Baruah, a key author of the upcoming World Migration Report, published by the International Organisation for Migration (IOM).

One reason for this: China's internal migration (estimated at 150 million) to its larger cities cannot immediately sustain such a large move.

In 2000, an estimated one million workers from China entered the region but that hardly takes into account the illegals who mostly utilise 'snakeheads' or illegal traffickers.

The Scalabrini Migration Institute in Australia estimates that 100,000 migrants from China are smuggled out every year, with the gangs raking in over US$1 billion (S$1.8 billion) from them.

The expected influx into South-east Asia, said Mr Jean-Louis Rallu of France-based migration think-tank Institut National d'Etudes Demographiques, is going to come from 'illegal migration of labourers and small business migration'.

But it is not the numbers, but the nature of work and the virtual impossibility of integration into local society, which can cause problems.

Irregular, short-term, mostly illegal work is a problem, as is locals' resentment of foreigners.

Labourers move from one employer to the next, and even after the contract work is done, they rarely head home.

Most prefer to remain in their 'host' country.

'This migration of workers, determined by the short duration of contracts and the non-availability of long-term integration, and the increasing presence of migrant women, employed as nurses, domestic workers and entertainers are contributing to the problem,' said Mr Nilla, who is IOM's labour migration head.

'The widespread irregularity in the migration movement appears the most marked and troublesome feature of labour migration in Asia.'

Most recent data from the Scalabrini centre places the figure for both legal and illegal migration into Malaysia at over 1.5 million five years ago. Indonesia alone contributed 716,000 legal and 450,000 illegal migrants.

It is not immediately known how many of them were trafficked in but Indonesia has been placed as a 'tier three' trafficking country by the US State Department.

A 'tier three' country is one which makes 'unsatisfactory progress towards meeting international standards' of trafficking in persons.

Mr Nilim told The Straits Times that as the more developed countries in the region lose labour to the West and North Asia, they still need to import labour from within the region, no matter how much they claim they do not need it.

Most Indonesians work in Malaysia's plantation and manufacturing industries.

Mr Rallu added: 'Malaysia and Thailand remain resource- and labour-based economies, with large plantation- and farm-produce industries, and receive the largest number of migrant workers.'

He said that migration in the Asia Pacific is categorised by large flows in two areas - illegals from Indonesia and the Philippines pour into Malaysia and those from Myanmar go to Thailand.

Malaysia's recent crackdown on illegals led to protests from Indonesia and the Philippines over alleged poor treatment of its citizens.

Still, many workers are trying to get back in - legally this time.

Immigration centres in Tanjung Pinang, Bintan and Nunukan are flooded by passport-seeking Indonesians.

Mr Rallu claims the expulsion has only been 'partly successful', with employers still heavily reliant on foreign labour.

Thailand is also under pressure to deport its illegals, mostly from Myanmar, Laos, Cambodia.

There is no easy solution for, until the poorer home economies pick up, migrants will still try to cross their borders, with or without passports.

SECTION: EAST & SE ASIA

LENGTH: 679 words

LOAD-DATE: October 1, 2002

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

320 of 359 DOCUMENTS

International Enforcement Law Reporter

August 2002

Trafficking in Human Beings: The U.S. Department of State Issues 2002 Trafficking in Persons Report

BYLINE: Dimple R. Shah

SECTION: MIGRATION ENFORCEMENT; Vol. 18, No. 8

LENGTH: 2933 words

It is estimated that over 50,000 people are trafficked to the United States each year for the purpose of sexual and labor services that violate the prohibition against involuntary servitude. These individuals are trafficked from one country to another under conditions of fraud, misrepresentation, and coercion. Once they arrive in the United States they become vulnerable as they are unfamiliar with the language, culture, and local customs. In order to combat trafficking in persons the United States Congress passed the Trafficking in Victims Protection Act of 2000 (herein "the Act")ⁿ¹ which requires the Department of State to publish the annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report.ⁿ² This article highlights critically the report and its contribution to the international efforts to combat trafficking in persons.

ⁿ¹ Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000, Pub. L. No. 106-386, § 106, 114 Stat. 1464, (2000).

ⁿ² OFFICE TO MONITOR & COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS, U.S. DEP'T OF STATE, REPORT NO. 2, TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT (2002).

I. Criteria Utilized TIP Report in conjunction to Trafficking Victim Protection Act of 2000

The TIP report issued by the Department of State addresses the international problem of trafficking in persons in persons in conjunction with the Act whereby, nations should comply with minimum standards set out by the Act in order to combat the scourge of trafficking in persons. The minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking are as follows: (1) the government of any country should prohibit severe forms of trafficking in persons and punish such acts of trafficking;ⁿ³ (2) for the knowing commission of any act of sex trafficking involving force fraud or coercion, or in which the victim of sex trafficking is a child incapable of giving meaningful consent, or trafficking includes rape or kidnapping or which causes a death, the government should prescribe punishment commensurate with that for grave crimes such as forcible sexual assault;ⁿ⁴ (3) for the knowing commission of any act of severe forms of trafficking in persons, the government of the country should prescribe punishment that is sufficiently stringent to deter and that adequately reflects the heinous nature of the offense;ⁿ⁵ and (4) the government should make serious and sustained efforts to eliminate severe forms of trafficking.ⁿ⁶ ⁿ³ § 108(a)(1), 114 Stat. at 1474.

ⁿ⁴ § 108(a)(2), 114 Stat. at 1474.

ⁿ⁵ § 108(a)(3), 114 Stat. at 1474.

ⁿ⁶ § 108(a)(4), 114 Stat. at 1474.

The Act also sets out seven criteria that should be considered as indicia to determine whether a nation is making a "serious and sustained effort to eliminate trafficking." As summarized in the TIP report they are: (1) whether a government vigorously investigates and prosecutes trafficking acts within its territory; (2) whether the government protects victims of trafficking, encourages victims' assistance in investigation and prosecution, provides victims with legal alternatives to removal to countries where they would face retribution or hardship, and ensures that victims are not inappropriately penalized solely for unlawful acts as a direct result of being trafficked; (3) whether the government has adopted measures such as public education to prevent trafficking; (4) whether a government cooperates with other governments in investigating and prosecuting trafficking; (5) Whether the government extradites persons charged with trafficking; (6) whether the government monitors immigration and emigration patterns for evidence of trafficking, and whether law enforcement agencies respond appropriately to such evidence; and (7) whether the government vigorously investigates and prosecutes public officials who participate in or facilitate trafficking, and takes all measures against officials who condone trafficking. n7

n7 See note 2, Id at 8-9.

2. Methodology Used for the TIP Report

In order to compile the report the Department of State utilized a "statistical compilation" to determine whether a country is "a country of origin, transit, or destination for a significant number of victims" of trafficking. In order to make such a determination there must be data where at least one hundred or more persons are trafficked to a country. The State Department obtained the information from embassies, journalists, host governments, international non-governmental organizations (NGO), NGO reports, and international organizations. n8

n8 Id. at 7.

The Department of State applied a similar approach utilized in the 2001 report. Based on the criterion described above, the TIP report places countries into 3 tiers. Countries placed in Tier 1 consist of countries that are already in compliance with the minimum standards. Countries placed in tier 2 are not yet fully in compliance with the acts minimum standards but have implemented some of the seven indicia to combat trafficking. Countries placed in tier 3 have not fully complied with the minimum standards and have not taken significant steps to bring themselves into compliance. n9 The purpose of the tier system is to determine which penalties are appropriate for a country. The countries in tiers 1 and 2 will receive aid while countries in tier 3 receive sanctions. There are 18 countries in tier 1, 53 in tier 2, and 19 countries in tier 3.

n9 Id. at 9-10.

3. The Application of the Minimum Standards to the Report

The first standard requires the report to examine the criminalization of "severe forms of trafficking in persons." This is interpreted to mean whether a country has a law that recognizes trafficking as a criminal offense and whether such law prohibits all forms of trafficking in persons. n10 n10 Mohamed Mattar, The 2002 Trafficking in Victims Protection Act of 2002: Does the Report serve the Purposes of the Act? (2002) at www.protectionproject.org/commentary.

The TIP report addresses whether a country has a trafficking law, however some of the report's findings seem inconsistent with other data. For example, the report states that in Burma "There is no trafficking law, although there are laws against migrant smuggling and kidnapping, which can be used against traffickers." n11 However, the Penal Code of Burma "prohibits habitual dealing in slaves." According to Article 371 of the Code, "whoever habitually imports, buys, sells, traffics, or deals in slaves shall be punished with deportation for life or with imprisonment for a term not exceeding 10 years, and shall also be liable to fine." n12 The Code also prohibits "buying or disposing of any person as a slave." n13 Furthermore, "whoever imports into the Union of Burma, any girl under the age of 21 years with intent that she may be, forced or seduced to illicit intercourse with another person, shall be punishable with imprisonment which may extend to 10 years and shall also be liable to fine." n14 From the evidence it is clear TIP report's documentation is inconsistent with Burma's penal code. n15

n11 Id. at 35.

n12 BURMA CODE Vol. VIII, Art. 371.

n13 BURMA CODE Vol. VIII, Art. 370.

n14 BURMA CODE Vol. VIII, Art. 366B.

n15 See note 9.

Although there are some inconsistencies, the report does attempt to adequately address whether a country has a specific law that penalizes trafficking. However, the report does not clearly define "severe forms of trafficking." Trafficking in persons occurs in many forms that include but are not limited to domestic service, forced marriages, forced labor, inter-country adoption, and child soldiers. n16

n16 Id.

According to the Act, sex and labor trafficking fall under the umbrella of "all forms of trafficking." n17 The Act defines sex trafficking as "any commercial act of sex". The report mentions some of the various forms of sex trafficking when it discusses certain countries, but it does not do so as required by section 105 of the Act which states that it is necessary to "examine the role of the international sex tourism industry in the trafficking of persons and the sexual exploitation of women and children around the world." Thus, the definition of severe forms of trafficking as mandated by the Act is not a comprehensive one because it is unclear exactly what forms of trafficking the Department of State should adopt in its report. n18 n17 B 103(8), 114 Stat. at 1474.

n18 Id.

The report does not adequately address points 2 and 3 of the minimum standards of the Act that require a country to implement adequate punishment that will deter criminal acts of trafficking because the report does not state penalties that exist for trafficking in persons, how many convictions are issued, and how much prison time is actually served as required by the minimum standards.

For example, the report documents that Austria complies with the minimum standards of the Act because "the government investigates all cases filed, and prosecutes these cases rigorously. The Austrian court has handed down many convictions." n19 Based on this simple analysis Austria receives a Tier 1 rating. Such an analysis is vague because it does not clearly address the manner in which Austria complies with standards 2 and 3 although data on charges, prosecution, penalties, convictions, and sentences related to trafficking in Austria are available. The Protection Project's 2002 Trafficking in Persons Report documents that "Several traffickers in Austria have been prosecuted and charged with repeat offenses. Of 49 people convicted, 27 had previous convictions and 10 were formerly convicted of trafficking, 35 out of 49 convicted traffickers were Austrian natives." n20

n19 See note 6, id. at 25.

n20 THE PROTECTION PROJECT, HUMAN RIGHTS REPORT ON TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS, ESPECIALLY WOMEN AND CHILDREN (THE PAUL H. HITZE SCHOOL OF ADVANCED INTERNATIONAL STUDIES, JOHN HOPKINS UNIVERSITY) at 28 (2002).

Another example of a lack of specific data is the documentation on the Republic of Korea, the only country to move from a tier 3 rating in 2001 to tier 1 rating in the 2002 report. The report states that Korea has no trafficking law but has used other laws to prosecute traffickers and has done so in more than 100 cases. n21 The change in the tier rating becomes questionable when there is no evidence in the report of charges, convictions, sentences, and actual time served by the 100 traffickers who were prosecuted.

n21 See Note 6, id. at 86.

The report must address standards 2 and 3 in a more specific fashion. Otherwise it is unclear why a country is placed in a tier and what the country did to combat trafficking in persons via law enforcement. Discussion of the fourth standard again requires consideration of the definition of "severe forms of trafficking" as discussed above. The steps that a government should take to make "serious and sustained efforts" to combat trafficking are clearly defined by the seven criteria of indicia from the Act. The seven criteria are quite thorough. However, they are not consistently utilized by the report. For example, there is no discussion in the documentation on either Korea's or Austria's extradition policies though extradition is listed as point 5 of the indicia to combat trafficking. The report instead utilizes the conventional prosecution, protection, and prevention analysis. Though the conventional approach is effective, the report should have taken into consideration the seven criteria of the act as it presents a clear analysis of a country's "serious and sustained efforts to eliminate severe forms of trafficking" n22.

n22 See note 13, id.

4. The Application of the Statistics to the Report

The statistical compilation created by the Department of State incorporates 90 countries out of a possible 190 countries and territories. Other organizations such as Amnesty International, Human Rights Watch, and the Protection Project have documented numerous cases of trafficking in a number of countries that are not included in the report. Hence, data on trafficking is available in many countries that were not included in the report. However, many NGOs have resources and reporting capabilities in regions where the United States does not, specifically in regions where the United States has no diplomatic ties. Even so, adequate information must be available before a country is placed in a tier. Thus, the Department of State must collect reliable information regarding countries for the 2003 report so that nations will not receive aid or be exempt from sanctions only on the basis of insufficient information. Countries not discussed in the report include but are not limited to Argentina, Australia, Bolivia, Cyprus, Denmark, Ecuador, Egypt, Finland, Iceland, Ireland, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Luxembourg, New Zealand, Peru, Sweden, and Venezuela. The majority of the countries listed have diplomatic ties with the United States and have more than 100 documented cases of trafficked persons. For example, upon request by the Protection Project via a law enforcement survey, the Embassy of Denmark submitted detailed reports on the number of people to be prosecuted, convicted, and deported based on prostitution and related activities.

Countries should not be included in the report where there is little or no information on trafficking in persons. In some instances the report documents abuses in trafficking where there is little evidence. For example, Iran was added to the 2002 report and placed in tier 3 when it was not in the previous report. Iran may now receive sanctions though the report itself acknowledges that "there is no information available" in certain areas with respect law enforcement. n23 Furthermore, the documentation on Iran does not consider "severe forms of trafficking" but focuses on women's rights and human rights violations that occur in Iran.

n23 See note 6, id. at 62.

5. Analysis of Tier Divisions and Country Placement

Many of the countries that are placed in tier 1 have made significant steps to combat trafficking. However, 16 out of 18 countries in tier 1 have legalized prostitution. This means that the report does not recognize any correlation between legalized prostitution and trafficking.

All of the countries in tier 1 are destination countries for trafficked women. This means that the countries in tier 1 are consumer nations. Hence, the fact that a country does not affect its rating as a Tier 1 country and is decidedly under compliance with the minimum standards of the act.

The criminalization of prostitution should be an important preventive measure to be taken into consideration with compliance of the minimum standards when trafficked persons and other migrants are estimated to comprise 80% of the prostitutes in Vienna, Austria, 75% of the prostitutes in Germany and, 80% of prostitutes in Amsterdam, Netherlands. n24 All of these countries have legalized prostitution. Destination countries where prostitution is legalized contribute significantly to the trafficking problem and must be held accountable by the TIP report.

n24 See Note 18 at 28, 212, 386.

There are a range of countries included in tier 2; many of which appear to be combating trafficking to the best of their ability in light of scarce financial resources. For example, there are an overwhelming number of countries in this tier where prostitution is illegal or in the process of being criminalized but there are also countries in this tier that are seemingly complacent after being placed in tier 2 twice because governments are aware that they have avoided sanctions and will still receive aid.

Countries such as India and Thailand are placed in this tier but have done little to combat trafficking. Many government officials facilitate trafficking. Moreover, these countries have not made strides with NGO's. Few people are charged with trafficking offenses, even fewer are convicted, and many refuse to acknowledge that the scourge of trafficking exists. For example, in India it is believed that 2.3 million women are involved in prostitution -- the majority of them trafficked. However, not one person in India has been prosecuted for a trafficking related offense in the past year. n25 n25 Coalition Against Trafficked Women, Country Specific Statistics, <http://www.catw-ap.org/facts.htm>.

The TIP report must not allow countries to become complacent. Countries must be evaluated strictly on the basis of measures taken to combat trafficking in persons. Strategic, economic, and political reasons should not be a factor in the report, otherwise the report will not serve as an effective tool to eliminate all practices of trafficking in persons.

6. Conclusion

The report and the Act are the beginning of the effort to combat trafficking in persons. Many goals remain to be accomplished. The report must clearly apply the minimum standards of the Act to its documentation. The report must make a serious attempt to obtain accurate data on a country and present documentation once such information is obtained. The report must address the role of law enforcement by cataloging and analyzing the number of cases of trafficking, penalties, punishment, and convictions. The problem of trafficking must be addressed in both source and destination countries. The report should address the criminalization of prostitution and its correlation to trafficking in persons.

LOAD-DATE: July 26, 2002

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2002 International Enforcement Law Reporter

321 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Channel NewsAsia

July 8, 2002 Monday

S'pore disagrees with US rating on people smuggling

SECTION: SINGAPORE NEWSLENGTH: 154 words

Singapore is surprised that the United States feels it's not doing enough to combat human trafficking across its borders.

Senior Minister of State for Law and Home Affairs Ho Peng Kee told Parliament that this is the second year in a row that the US State Department has classified Singapore as a second tier country in its report on human trafficking.

He said: "We did not agree with this classification as we are the only country in tier two to have met the minimum standards but still placed in tier two instead of tier one.

"We pointed out the inaccuracies in the report to the US embassy in Singapore. We will continue to point out inaccuracies in this annual report to the US embassy here.

"No country, including the US, can claim to be completely immune to the problems of human trafficking. Indeed some would say even the US has problems of its own in this area and falls short of its own criteria."

LOAD-DATE: July 9, 2002LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2002 Media Corporation of Singapore Pte Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

322 of 359 DOCUMENTS

XINHUA GENERAL NEWS SERVICE

July 8, 2002, Monday

S'pore displeased with US anti-human-smuggling ratingSECTION: WORLD NEWS; POLITICALLENGTH: 190 wordsDATELINE: SINGAPORE, July 8

Singapore Monday voiced its displeasure with the US rating of its efforts against human smuggling across the border.

In a reply to a question in the parliament, Singapore Senior Minister of State for Law and Home Affairs Ho Peng Kee admitted that the United States feels Singapore is not doing enough to combat human trafficking across its borders and for the second year in a row that the US State Department has classified Singapore as a second tier country in its report on human trafficking.

He said: "We did not agree with this classification as we are the only country in tier two to have met the minimum standards but still placed in tier two instead of tier one."

"We pointed out the inaccuracies in the report to the US Embassy in Singapore and will continue to point out inaccuracies in this annual report to the US Embassy here," he added.

He underlined that no country, including the United States, can claim to be completely immune to the problems of human trafficking.

"Indeed some would say even the United States has problems of its own in this area and falls short of its own criteria," he said.

LOAD-DATE: July 9, 2002LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

COPYRIGHT 2002 XINHUA NEWS AGENCY

323 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 20, 2002 Thursday

Cambodian police arrest 14 girls trafficked into brothels

SECTION: International News

LENGTH: 342 words

DATELINE: PHNOM PENH, June 20

Cambodian police arrested 14 girls for illegal immigration after they were trafficked into local brothels from Vietnam and then rescued by human rights advocates, witnesses said Thursday.

The arrests outraged aid workers and came as international donors were meeting here to assess the situation in Cambodia before deciding how much foreign assistance to give the country for the next 12 months.

Pierre Legros, an advisor to the non-governmental organisation Afesip which sought to protect the girls, said they were aged between 12 and 18.

This was disputed by Cambodian authorities who said they were between 18 and 20.

"It's a tragic misunderstanding of justice," Legros said. "These girls should be considered victims of trafficking now they are considered the perpetrators."

The girls, arrested because they did not have the correct travel documents, were apparently going to be held at Prey Sar prison.

A warrant for their arrest was issued by the courts last Monday.

Phuong Sophy, deputy bureau chief of the Ministry of Interior's Juvenile Protection Against Child Exploitation Department, confirmed that the girls had been rescued from a brothel after being trafficked into Cambodia.

"Now there is a court warrant that these 14 Vietnamese girls aged between 18 and 20 had illegally entered Cambodia so we are taking them to the prison," he told AFP.

Legros said legislation was before the national assembly to offer protection to minors who were trafficked.

Cambodia is seeking 1.46 billion dollars from international donors who will make their pledges based on an assessment of this country's troubled past 12 months.

That includes a report by the US State Department on "Trafficking in Persons" which added Cambodia to a blacklist of states Washington blames for making insufficient efforts to combat the scourge.

From 2003 Cambodia could be subject to US sanctions, including the halting of non-humanitarian and non-trade related assistance, unless it shows a vast improvement in combatting human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2002

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH ARRESTS (94%); HUMAN TRAFFICKING (91%); IMMIGRATION (91%); ARREST WARRANTS (90%); LAW ENFORCEMENT (90%); JUVENILE CRIME (90%); HUMAN RIGHTS ORGANIZATIONS (90%); ALIEN SMUGGLING (89%); HUMAN RIGHTS (89%); EMBARGOES & SANCTIONS (85%); ILLEGAL IMMIGRANTS (78%); NONGOVERNMENTAL ORGANIZATIONS (78%); FOREIGN RELATIONS (78%); JUVENILE JUSTICE (78%); STATE DEPARTMENTS & FOREIGN SERVICES (77%); INTERNATIONAL ASSISTANCE (77%); PASSPORTS & VISAS (73%); INTERNET CRIME (73%);

324 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

June 20, 2002

Text: U.S. Official Cites New Information in Latest Trafficking Report; Data provided by NGOs played significant role

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 2235 words

The U.S. Department of State took new steps to improve this year's recently released Trafficking in Persons Report, according to Under Secretary Paula Dobriansky. In the second annual compilation of the congressionally mandated report, Dobriansky said the department collected additional information from overseas ministries, law enforcement and border officials, local nongovernment organizations (NGOs), academics and journalists.

In testimony delivered June 19 before the House International Relations Committee, Dobriansky said the team preparing this year's report supplemented the information it gathered from 186 overseas posts with assessments from the intelligence community. The team also invited 150 U.S. NGOs to submit information on trafficking in persons through a specially established e-mail address.

Based on the NGO input, Dobriansky said, U.S. missions overseas were able to include specific inquiries about numbers of arrests, indictments and prosecutions, evidence of governmental involvement or corruption, and what steps have been taken to deal with these circumstances.

"As a result, the report reflects our increased collection of data and consideration of the scope of the trafficking problem in many countries," she said. Dobriansky's remarks came in response to some criticisms that the report was based on inadequate data.

Dobriansky said political considerations were not a factor in assessing whether a foreign government is complying with the minimum standards to eliminate trafficking in persons. "Many of our friends and allies are on Tiers II and III," she said. "They simply do not comply with minimum standards."

Countries that are in full compliance with minimum standards of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act merit a Tier I ranking. Countries not yet in full compliance but making significant efforts are listed on Tier II, and countries neither meeting minimum standards nor making significant efforts are listed on Tier III. Those minimum standards as outlined by the law include prosecution of perpetrators, protection of victims and educating the public about human trafficking.

Following is the text of Dobriansky's testimony as prepared for delivery:

(begin text)

Testimony of Under Secretary of State Paula Dobriansky Before the House International Relations Committee

Combating Trafficking in Human Beings: An Overview of Current U.S. Policy and the Trafficking in Persons Report

June 19, 2002

Thank you for inviting me here today to discuss U.S. policy to combat trafficking in persons and the second annual Trafficking in Persons Report. Your strong leadership on this issue, first by passing the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 and then by focusing national attention on its implementation has been crucial. We look forward to continuing to work closely with Congress - as well as foreign governments and NGOs - toward eradicating this egregious human rights abuse and crime.

The annual Trafficking in Persons Report is an essential tool available to the U.S. Government for achieving this objective. As Secretary Powell has said, the "annual Trafficking in Persons Report shines a much-needed light on this global problem. We use the information we collect for the report to bolster the will of the international community to combat this unconscionable crime."

In accordance with the legislative mandate, foreign governments are judged on whether they comply with the minimum standards to eliminate trafficking in persons and are ranked in one of three tiers. These governments are judged on their actions, not on plans that are merely in progress. According to the statute's minimum standards, countries must treat victims as victims, not criminals; they must prosecute traffickers, recognizing that trafficking is a crime that must be punished with sentences commensurate for those of other grave crimes, such as sexual assault; and they must prevent trafficking, recognizing the importance of public education campaigns in not only urban but also rural areas.

Since the release of the first report, we have used its contents to engage aggressively with other countries about what more effective concrete steps they can take in the area of prevention, protection and prosecution. To that end, I have met personally with representatives from India, Cote d'Ivoire, Romania, South Korea and numerous other countries to discuss trafficking in persons. Ambassador Ely-Raphel and her team in the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons have met with representatives from more than two dozen countries -- some of them repeatedly. Our ambassadors and their staffs, as well as others in the Department, have also raised this issue numerous times with foreign government officials. These efforts have made a difference, and over the last year there were some improvements. At the same time, there was, disappointingly, regression and no change in a number of countries.

In preparing this year's report, our team undertook some new steps. They gathered information from 186 posts overseas, with input from Ministries of Foreign Affairs, Justice and Interior, as well as law enforcement, border officials, local NGOs, representatives of international organizations working in those countries, academics, and journalists. The Trafficking in Persons Report team also supplemented the information with assessments from the intelligence community. Moreover, in December 2001, the Trafficking in Persons Office invited 150 U.S. NGOs to submit information on trafficking in persons through a specially established email address.

It's important to note that the Report goes beyond what is called for in the Act, which requires a listing of three tiers. Instead, we included brief country summaries, which are invaluable in identifying for foreign governments the areas in which they need to improve their efforts. Based on NGO input, we directed U.S. missions overseas to expand their information-gathering efforts to include specific inquiries about numbers of arrests, indictments and prosecutions, evidence of governmental involvement or corruption and what steps have been taken to deal with these circumstances. As a result, the report reflects our increased collection of data and consideration of the scope of the trafficking problem in many countries.

The report analyzes the actions of countries based on the determination of whether they were "a country of origin, transit or destination for a significant number of victims" of trafficking and whether they were meeting the minimum standards to eliminate severe forms of trafficking in persons, and, if not, whether they are making significant efforts to do so. Political considerations were not a factor in our assessments. Many of our friends and allies are on Tiers II and III. They simply do not comply with minimum standards.

The release of this year's report has already generated many responses from a number of countries on Tiers II and III, including Japan, Malaysia, Greece and Turkey. We are meeting with each to discuss the report and suggest concrete follow-up steps. In addition, throughout the year we work with foreign NGOs to obtain feedback on whether the report's descriptions ring true to their experiences working with trafficking victims. We also distribute and publicize the report within the United States to educate Americans about the global scope of trafficking in persons.

Just as the report has already elicited feedback from countries listed in the report, it has also generated considerable reaction among activists in this country, as well as Members of Congress. I appreciate - and indeed share - the fervor that so many people bring to this issue. Let there be no mistake about it: we are all in pursuit of the same goal, namely the eradication of trafficking once and for all. In response to some of the criticisms I have heard expressed since release of the report and in anticipation of some of your questions today, I wish to address some of the criticisms of the report.

First, I have heard people say that placement of certain countries on Tier II constitutes their receiving a "passing grade." The legislation calls for three lists. Countries that are in full compliance with the Act's minimum standards merit a Tier I ranking. Countries not yet in full compliance but making significant efforts are on Tier II. Countries neither meeting minimum standards nor making significant efforts to do so are placed on Tier III. Countries with some of the worst trafficking problems are also some of the countries making a significant effort to combat them. The two are not mutually exclusive.

There is no question that Tier III placement is for the worst offenders, but being listed on Tier II means that countries are not in full compliance. It's not a pass to be listed on Tier II. Countries do not like to be listed on either Tier II or III and have challenged our findings. Moreover, countries on Tier II do not want to run the risk of falling to Tier III next year and face sanctions, including the possible cutoffs of non-humanitarian aid.

Second, and related to this, is the fact that honest people can disagree on the tier placements of certain countries. Congress asked that we look at the "significant effort" that a country is making. What constitutes a significant effort as defined in the Act is something that people can discuss and analyze differently. No country - including our own - is doing enough as long as trafficking continues to exist. That said, progress in one country will look very different from progress in others - as circumstances are different and what can impact the situation may also be different. At the same time, in our diplomatic engagement, we will set a high bar for these countries and demand solid action, not rhetoric. This is an extremely complex issue in which numerous factors - law enforcement, judicial action, legislative action, women's and children's rights, protection, economic conditions, and social assistance - have a bearing on how effective a country is in dealing with the problem and how we can engage and pressure that country to make progress. Simply, in each case there is not just one defining issue. We recognize the complexity and will take a hard look at each country.

Lastly, some have criticized the report for lacking data. I'd like to assure you that we have made significant efforts to collect data, which we then factored into our decision-making. With a world estimate of between 700,000 and four million trafficking victims, this underground crime is not easy to pinpoint. Accumulating verifiable data is extremely difficult, even here in the United States. Statistics are important and we will continue to push our various sources on collection. But statistics are one part of what we are looking at. Action, or inaction, is the primary focus.

The report is one of many tools at our disposal to address this criminal activity, to shed light on the terrible problem of trafficking, and to crack down on traffickers. The report is most effective when combined with a comprehensive strategy of diplomacy and direct engagement with other governments, multilateral fora, public affairs, programmatic support and technical assistance. That is why we are moving forward on developing and implementing a comprehensive approach to dealing with this issue. We have taken other steps, which we believe reinforce the impact of the report. These include:

- (1) The meeting of the President's Cabinet-level Interagency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, which established the Senior Policy Advisory Group of representatives from the various task force agencies. This Senior Policy Advisory Group has already undertaken two significant actions: the completion of the Overview of the Administration's Implementation of the Trafficking Victims' Protection Act and a review of our policy parameters.
- (2) A comprehensive review of prospective programs with a view to having the greatest amount of influence on these problematic areas.
- (3) Seeking to use every forum - bilateral, regional and global - to aggressively address the issue of trafficking in persons. Working closely with our partners to spotlight such egregious human rights abuses can only strengthen our hand in eradicating trafficking.
- (4) Moving forward with the ratification process of the UN Protocol to Prevent, Suppress, and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, which supplements the UN Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime and was adopted by the UN General Assembly in November 2000. To date, the United States and 104 other countries have signed the Protocol.
- (5) Educating the public about the issue, by expanding the section on trafficking in persons in our annual Country Reports on Human Rights Practices, which has contributed to our keeping the issue of trafficking in persons central in our discourse with other countries - particularly the offenders; and speaking at conferences and with the media.

In conclusion, let me reiterate that we want to continue to work vigorously with you, the NGOs and other governments to eradicate the often-hidden phenomenon of human bondage in modern-day society.

Thank you.

(end transcript)

(Distributed by the Office of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2002

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2002 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

325 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Federal News Service

June 19, 2002 Wednesday

HEARING OF THE HOUSE INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS COMMITTEESUBJECT: FOREIGN GOVERNMENT COMPLICITY IN HUMAN TRAFFICKING: A REVIEW OF THE STATE DEPARTMENT'S 2002 TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT*CHAired BY: REPRESENTATIVE HENRY J. HYDE (R-IL)*LOCATION: 2172 RAYBURN HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING, WASHINGTON, D.C.*SECTION: CAPITOL HILL HEARING*LENGTH: 26690 words

REP. HENRY J. HYDE (R-IL): The committee will come to order. I am pleased to convene this hearing, which is the second in a series of hearings being held by the House Committee on International Relations on implementation of the Smith-Gejdensen Trafficking Victims Protection Act 2000.

The Smith-Gejdensen Act provides a comprehensive plan for putting an end to modern day slavery. A key component of this plan is the State Department's annual "Trafficking in Persons" report. This report is intended to inform the president and the Congress about which foreign governments are making serious efforts to combat the most egregious forms of trafficking in persons, the buying and selling of women and children into the international sex industry, and the trafficking of men, women and children alike into slavery and involuntary servitude, and which governments are failing to make such efforts.

At today's hearing, the committee will hear testimony on the State Department's second annual "Trafficking in Persons" report. This year's report is particularly important because it's intended to serve as a final wake-up call to governments which are doing little or nothing to combat human trafficking. This is because the Trafficking Victims Protection Act contemplates that the United States will withdraw non-humanitarian aid from governments which remain on the Tier 3 list after the next year's report. The Tier 3 governments are those that not only fail to meet minimum international standards for combating human trafficking, but who are not even making serious efforts to bring themselves into compliance with these standards.

In addition to providing an overview of the state of the war against human trafficking and the general assessment of the "Trafficking in Persons" report, I hope our witnesses will address one question in particular. The Trafficking Victims Protection Act places particular emphasis on the need to take action against governments that not only tolerate human trafficking, but are actively complicit in such trafficking through their agencies and officials.

Both this year and last year, criticism of the report by human rights advocates and humanitarian organizations has singled out governments that are omitted from the Tier 3 list, even though they appear to give impunity to their own officials who participate in, and profit from the sex trafficking and slave trafficking. In some cases the report acknowledges this problem but finds nevertheless that the government has engaged in significant efforts to end trafficking. These efforts typically include co-sponsoring rehabilitation and training programs with international organizations or perhaps prosecuting an occasional perpetrator.

This raises the question whether governments whose own agencies or officials are pervasively involved in human trafficking and who lack the political will to take the difficult measures that would be necessary to put an end to such involvement, will nevertheless be able to avoid sanctions under the Trafficking Victims Protection Act. If so, what must be done to put an end to this impunity? Should the State Department reassess its standard for what constitutes significant efforts by a government whose officials or agencies are engaged in human trafficking? Or does the act need to be amended in order to make clear that government complicity in sex trafficking and slave trafficking, is simply unacceptable.

I look forward to hearing from our witnesses today and I am pleased to yield to the distinguished ranking member of the committee, Representative Tom Lantos, for any opening remarks he may have.

REP. TOM LANTOS (D-CA): Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. Let me at the outset thank you for holding this extremely important hearing on trafficking in persons, a heinous practice that amounts to nothing less than modern day slavery.

At the outset I would like to pay special tribute to my good friend, Chris Smith, of New Jersey who has played such a pivotal role on this whole issue and to my friend and colleague the Republican co-chair of the Human Rights Caucus, Frank Wolf of Virginia who has been such a staunch advocate for all of these human rights issues.

I also want to express publicly my personal gratitude to three women who taught me everything I know about human rights and particularly this issue. My wife, Annette, who is here in the audience and our two daughters Annette, and Katrina. Katrina, when she lived in Copenhagen the last three years as the wife of our ambassador, took it upon herself to choose the issue of trafficking as her cause and devoted untold hours on behalf of fighting this important issue.

From the foothills of the Himalayas to the rice paddies of the Mekong Delta and from the steps of Central Asia to the desert sands of the Arabian Peninsula, hundreds of thousands, probably millions of women and girls, are suffering under the yoke of sexual slavery, and other unthinkable forms of forced labor. Tragically, this terrible practice extends to our own shores.

Each year, Mr. Chairman, thousands of kidnapped or manipulated women and children slip through our own borders to join the underground workforce of coerced labor here in the United States. Sadly, our government has for too long been woefully unprepared to combat this barbarous behavior. Recognizing this growing problem, our committee during the last Congress, successfully worked for the enactment of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000.

In addition to initiatives to prevent trafficking, to protect victims and to punish traffickers, one of the most important achievements of our legislation was the creation of the report we are to hear about today which focuses international attention on these horrendous abuses.

This report's primary purpose of course is to penetrate the darkness surrounding the subject and shed light on the countries where trafficking occurs, where trafficking is tolerated and in some instances, where trafficking is encouraged. The report holds foreign governments accountable for the persistence of trafficking on their soil. No longer will they get away with making excuses rather than taking action.

Many argue, Mr. Chairman, that human rights reporting such as this needlessly complicates our diplomacy and often proves counterproductive. I couldn't disagree more. Since the publication of the first "Trafficking In Persons" report, 14 countries have responded by intensifying their efforts to combat trafficking. This year's report by the Department of State recognizes these countries for their progress and they are properly praised for making important strides in achieving the goal of eliminating this sickening practice.

For example, the state of Israel, despite being under unceasing attacks by terrorists and human suicide bombers, has passed a new law against trafficking. Israel has been actively prosecuting trafficking cases. It has been cracking down on government officials who have been connected with trafficking activities. In direct response to last year's report, our friends in South Korea established new mechanisms to prosecute traffickers, to promote public awareness, and to protect victims.

Mr. Chairman, while the effectiveness of this report has already been seen, we must do much more. There are still far too many trafficking victims. Countries that are making progress need to sustain that progress, and countries that have yet to act must do so, now. If not, U.S. law will require that we impose sanctions on these countries.

Let there be no mistake, Mr. Chairman, we will not hold back from taking action where we must. The voices of thousands of women and children from all over the world who are suffering every day, compel us to expose these horrible practices and to take stern measures to ensure that these practices end.

I want to thank you, Mr. Chairman. I look forward to listening to our witnesses.

REP. HYDE: Thank you, Mr. Lantos.

Mr. Smith.

REP. CHRISTOPHER H. SMITH (R-NJ): Thank you very much, Chairman Hyde, for convening this very important hearing to review the 2002 "Trafficking In Persons" report that has been issued by the State Department. And I want to especially thank you for the leadership. I think everyone, every member, knows this that this bill was referred to four major committees, I believe it was 11 or 12 subcommittees, and one of the key pieces of the legislation was protection for the victims. A sea change, a radical change we were seeking to effectuate that would protect the women and cease the treatment of those women as criminals and to treat them as victims. That piece went to the Judiciary Committee when Chairman Hyde was chairman of that committee and there was reluctance among some of the key members including a key subcommittee member and without Chairman Hyde's leadership, the new T- visa and the protection side of this would not have been enacted into law.

So I want to thank especially our distinguished chairman. Now that he chairs this committee but in his previous chairmanship for making that possible. It was a dead letter and he was -- he just made it --

REP. LANTOS: Will my friend yield for a second? I want to associate myself with these remarks concerning Chairman Hyde.

REP. C. SMITH: Thank you, Mr. Lantos. And let me just say as well that Joseph Reece (ph), David Abramowitz, you mentioned Sam Gejdensen who was our chief Democratic sponsor and we worked together on that. On the Senate side, it was Brownback and Wellstone, it was a team effort, and that's why this legislation is law and now it's being safely implemented by the Bush administration.

Let me just say that when the law was enacted there were many people who didn't want to publicly name offending countries. The experience of the first two TIP reports, however, supports the argument that I and others made, that some countries would only get serious about their failure to address this travesty of human rights if their deficiencies were publicly identified.

During the year between the first and second reports the government of more than two dozen countries improved their behavior and policies enough to merit an improved mark. Only Cambodia and Kyrgyzstan dropped in ranking from the first year to the second. Naming names commands the attention of the countries around the globe and puts all countries on notice. If they are found to have significant amount of human trafficking taking place on their soil, they too will be included in the next report.

The guiding principle for the State Department in preparing this report should be to go where and anywhere that the evidence leads. Countries which are not making significant efforts to comply with the minimum standard must be placed on Tier 3 and remain there, regardless of competing political considerations, until their efforts truly warrant their elevation.

Even our allies should not escape, nor do they escape scrutiny, if the facts show that they are failing to address modern day slavery. If the report is to continue to be an effective document, it must continue to honestly evaluate countries according to the evidence. In this regard, although I agree with most of this report, I do take exception to the placement of India, Thailand and Vietnam on Tier 2 rather than Tier 3 again this year, as they were in the 2001 report. In the case of Vietnam there is clear evidence that the government's own labor export program is deeply complicit in human trafficking. Indeed, much of this evidence can be found in a recent decision by a U.S. court in American Samoa. This landmark anti-trafficking case found that two Vietnamese government owned labor export companies actively participated in trafficking several hundred workers into slavery in a factory in American Samoa, and repeatedly threatened them with retaliation if they complained about the abuses to which they were subjected.

In India more than 200,000 persons are trafficked in the country each year. More than 2.3 million girls and women are believed to be working in the sex industry against their will at any given time in India. Possibly as many as 40 percent are children. Indian boys, some as young as age 4, are trafficked abroad to be enslaved and brutalized as jockeys in camel races. Evidence exists that law enforcement and government officials help facilitate human trafficking and investigations and prosecutions of traffickers are rare. Indeed, the State Department points to just 47 cases in Delhi to support the statement that investigations and prosecutions are rare, but increasing. In any event, local corruption renders most prosecutorial efforts ineffective.

I do not mean to suggest that the governments of India, Thailand and Vietnam are not taking any steps to address trafficking or to assist victims. I am saying that their efforts to combat trafficking cannot reasonably be judged to be significant in light of the enormity of the human trafficking problems in those countries, and the absence of meaningful legal accountability for the traffickers. In Vietnam, India and Thailand, and frankly in other Tier 2 countries such as Albania, Bulgaria, Moldova, traffickers or corrupt officials are rarely prosecuted and even more rarely convicted. This lack of accountability is not made acceptable by the fact that the NGOs are allowed to run awareness raising campaigns in the country, or that police officers or other government officials participate in training seminars. Nevertheless, the State Department deem these countries to be making significant efforts to comply with the minimum standards.

There should be no question in anyone's mind, however, that countries on Tier 2 and perhaps even on Tier 1 still have a great deal of work to do to combat trafficking. Countries on Tier 2 are not meeting the barest minimum standards to effectively end the trafficking of persons on their territory. Being placed on Tier 2 is not by any stretch of the imagination a badge of honor. I applaud those governments such as Romania, Yugoslavia and Israel which created the political will in the past year to raise themselves from Tier 3 to 2. Last January in Yugoslavia, for example, Serbian police launched a nationwide crackdown on human trafficking, which involved raids on 441 different locations where trafficked women were likely being held. The government today is cooperating with the OSCE and other international organizations. Anti-trafficking initiatives and new anti-trafficking law is currently under consideration by their parliament.

Despite the improved rankings of Yugoslavia, Romania and Israel and others, let us be clear on one point. Appalling human rights violations continue in these countries. In Belgrade today women and girls are still being sold to the highest bidder at auctions, where they are stripped of their clothes and inspected like cattle. I wrote to each of these countries to press forward with the same political will in the coming year until the day that they can say that trafficking and slavery has been eradicated in their land, and the victims of trafficking and slavery were protected in the process.

Finally, I just want to thank -- we have -- we're jointed, Mr. Chairman, as you know by Congressman Frank Wolf, the chairman of the Commerce, Justice and State Committee in the Appropriations Committee, who in his bill last year, and again this year, has ensured that sufficient monies are allocated, appropriated, to fight this terrible scourge. And Frank has been a leader on human rights as well on a whole host of areas like religious freedom. So great to have him here and thank you.

REP. HYDE: Thank you, Mr. Smith. One of the benefits of being chairman of a committee is you get to pronounce some very exotic names. Shalikashvili, General Shalikashvili. I learned that one. Former prime minister of Israel Benjamin Netanyahu. But we have on this committee the most exotic name of all, belonging to one of the really fine Congressman from American Samoa: Eni Faleomavaega.

Eni.

REP. ENI F. H. FALEOMAVEGA (D-AS): Mr. Chairman, thank you for such a pronounced introduction.

(Laughter.)

And for which I really do appreciate. I would look forward to hearing from our witnesses this afternoon, and curious also to find out how our State Department makes the valuations in classifying different countries in Tier 1, 2 and 3. And from all that I've heard so far, Mr. Chairman, I suspect that maybe even our own country might qualify for Tier 1. But I look forward to hearing from our good friends and witnesses representing the State Department.

As my good friend from New Jersey has alluded to earlier, we did have a little problem of Vietnamese workers that were brought in by a foreign national. I just wanted to know -- let my friend from New Jersey know that the situation has been resolved. And quite critically one of the biggest problems we had were the companies that were representing by the government of Vietnam, that caused so much of the mess that we ended up with. But I do want to assure my good friend from New Jersey that the problem no longer exists, and I would welcome any member of this committee to come and join me to visit my humble jurisdiction out there in the middle of the Pacific.

But with that, Mr. Chairman, I do look forward to hearing from our witnesses this afternoon. Thank you.

REP. HYDE: Thank you. Mr. Tancredo of Colorado.

REP. THOMAS G. TANCREDO (R-CO): Mr. Chairman, thank you. In order to expedite this part of the hearing, I would only want to say that I want to associate myself with all of the comments that have been made to this point, especially the accolades that have been heaped upon you, Mr. Chairman.

REP. HYDE: Does the gentleman require additional time?

(Laughter.)

Thank you, Mr. -- we'll cut you off now, thank you.

Mr. Smith of Michigan.

REP. NICK SMITH (R-MI): Mr. Chairman, likewise, thank you for having this hearing. Certainly I would like to align myself with a lot of the comments made so far. I would like my full statement -- written statement to be entered into the record without objection.

REP. HYDE: Without objection, so ordered.

REP. N. SMITH: But let me just say trafficking affects virtually -- and let me also comment that our former Congresswoman Linda Smith, who has done so much in the last several years to rescue women from trafficking throughout the world. So thank you, Linda, for being here and for all that you've done. Trafficking affects virtually every country in the world and is one of the fastest growing areas of international criminal activity. Chinese and Vietnamese Triads, the Japanese Yakusa, South American drug cartels, the Italian Mafia, the Russian gangs are some of the worst offenders. But it's also believed that some 50,000 people are trafficked here to the United States in reports that I've recently surveyed. Hopefully, strengthening our INS is going to result in a better job of reducing that trafficking, at least in the United States.

Beginning in Fiscal Year 2004 countries that remain in Tier 3 will be subject to sanctions from the United States. And although I support harsh actions against countries who refuse to make the necessary changes to combat trafficking, I do have serious concerns that by withdrawing aid, or some of the other penalties, we will in some cases exacerbate conditions that increase the likelihood of trafficking. Chronic unemployment, widespread poverty create opportunities for trafficking, so I think it's very important that we examine these on a case by case basis, to make sure that our reaction and penalties for trafficking don't exacerbate the situation. And with that I yield back, Mr. Chairman.

REP. HYDE: I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Pitts of Pennsylvania.

REP. JOSEPH R. PITTS (R-PA): Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and thank you for holding this important and timely hearing regarding the "Trafficking In Persons" report.

I think it is vital that the Congress and the administration continue to shine the spotlight on the terrible violence against women and children and men as they are forced into slave labor or sexual servitude. The human rights violations, the criminal actions, must be addressed in the strongest possible manner so that the criminals and the violators receive a clear message that their actions will not be tolerated.

And thank you to all the individuals who worked on this report, the Department of State, the Department of Justice, other officials who are working on trafficking issues and helping bring perpetrators to justice. And I would like to specifically thank Under Secretary Paula Dobriansky and Ambassador Nancy Ely Raphel for their work on this report, and their efforts to raise the profile of this issue. In its continued aid to erase this terrible form of slavery, clear leadership from the administration will help millions of enslaved women, children and even men, around the world.

There are horrifying stories of young girls imprisoned, forced to sexually service large numbers of men each day. The physical, the psychological toll on these individuals is heart wrenching. And the rescue and the rehabilitation work being done by many NGOs on behalf of those in forced servitude is commendable, and should be supported.

We also need, however, to focus on preventing this servitude from ever occurring, and on prosecuting those involved in criminal activities. A number of NGOs working on trafficking in persons issues, as well as a number of members of Congress, have concerns about the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report, and the lack of clarity regarding data collection and methodology of decision making.

There have been particular concerns regarding the placement of India, of Vietnam and Thailand, in the ranking as -- there seems to be substantial evidence that these nations deserve to be placed in Tier 3, instead of Tier 2. It would be helpful, as this report develops, for the State Department to clarify their decision-making process that was used.

So, thank you, Mr. Chairman. I look forward to hearing from our distinguished witnesses today.

REP. HYDE: Thank you, Mr. Pitts.

I would like to welcome Dr. Paula Dobriansky.

Prior to her appointment as Under Secretary of State for Global Affairs, Dr. Dobriansky served as Senior Vice President and Director of the Washington Office of the Council on Foreign Relations. Previously, she served as Senior International Affairs and Trade Adviser at the law firm of Hunton and Williams, and as co-chair of the International TV Council at the Corporation for Public Broadcasting.

Dr. Dobriansky is accompanied by Ambassador Nancy Ely-Raphel, Senior Adviser to the Secretary of State on Trafficking in Persons.

We are very honored to have you appear before the committee today, both of you. And if you could proceed with a five-minute summary, give or take, your full statement will be made a part of the record.

Secretary Dobriansky.

MS. PAULA DOBRIANSKY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

First, thank you for inviting me, us, here today to discuss U.S. policy to combat trafficking in persons, and the second annual Trafficking in Persons Report. I will submit a longer version for the record, and will condense my report.

Your strong leadership on this issue, first, by passing the Trafficking Victims Protection Act 2000, and then by focusing national attention on its implementation, has been crucial. We look forward to continuing to work closely with Congress, as well as with foreign governments and NGOs towards eradicating this egregious human rights abuse and crime.

The annual Trafficking in Persons Report is an essential tool available to the United States Government for achieving this objective. And in accordance with the legislative mandate, foreign governments are judged on whether they comply with the minimum standards to eliminate trafficking in persons. Governments are judged on their actions, not on plans that are merely in progress. Countries must treat victims as victims, not criminals; they must prosecute traffickers; and they must prevent trafficking, recognizing the importance of public education campaigns, and not only urban but in rural areas.

Since the release of the first report, we have used its contents to engage aggressively with other countries about what more effective concrete steps they can take in the area of preventing, protection and prosecution. To that end, I have met personally with representatives from India, Cote d'Ivoire, Romania, South Korea and numerous other countries to discuss trafficking in persons. Ambassador Ely Raphel and her team in the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons have met with representatives from more than two dozen countries, some of them repeatedly. Our ambassadors and their staffs, as well as others in the department, have also raised this issue numerous times with a very broad range of foreign government officials.

These efforts have made a difference. And over the last year, there were some improvements. At the same time, there was disappointingly, regression and no change in a number of countries. It is important to note that the report goes beyond what is called for specifically in the act, which requires a listing of three tiers. Instead, we include country, brief country narrative, which are invaluable in identifying for foreign governments the areas in which they need to improve their effort.

Based on NGO input, we directed U.S. missions overseas to expand their information gathering efforts to include specific inquiries about numbers of arrests, indictments, and prosecutions, evidence of government involvement, or corruption, and what steps had been taken to deal with these circumstances. As a result, the report reflects our increased collection of data, and consideration of the scope of the trafficking problem in many countries.

The release of this year's report has already generated many responses from a number of countries on Tiers 2 and 3, including Japan, Malaysia, Greece and Turkey. We are meeting with each to discuss the report, and to suggest concrete follow-up steps. Just as the report has already elicited feedback from countries listed in the report, it has also generated considerable reaction from activists in this country, as well as members of Congress.

I appreciate and, indeed, share the fervor that so many people bring to this issue. Let there be no mistake about it. We are all in pursuit of the same goal, namely, the eradication of trafficking once and for all. In response to some of the criticisms I have heard expressed since release of the report, and in anticipation of some of your questions today, I wish to address some of the criticisms that have been rendered.

First, I have heard some people say that placement of certain countries on Tier 2 constitute their receiving a passing grade. The legislation calls for three lists. Countries that are in full compliance with the act's minimum standards merit a Tier 1 ranking. Countries not yet in full compliance, but making significant efforts, are on Tier 2. Countries neither meeting minimum standards, nor making significant efforts to do so, are placed on Tier 3. Countries with some of the worst trafficking problems are also some of the countries making a significant effort to combat them. The two are not necessarily mutually exclusive.

There is no question that Tier 3 placement is for the worst offenders. But being listed on Tier 2 means that countries are not in full compliance. It's not a pass to be listed on Tier 2. Countries do not like to be listed on Tier 2 or on Tier 3 and, in fact, have challenged our finding. Moreover, countries on Tier 2 do not want to run the risk of falling to Tier 3 next year and face sanctions, including the possible cut-off of non-humanitarian aid.

Second, and related to this, is the fact that honest people can disagree on the tier placements of certain countries. Congress asked that we look at the significant effort that a country is making. What constitutes a significant effort, as defined in the act, is something that people can discuss, and maybe analyze differently. No country, including our own, is doing enough, as long as trafficking continues to exist. That said, progress in one country will look very different from progress in others, as circumstances are different, and what can impact the situation may also be different.

At the same time, in our diplomatic engagement, we will set a high bar for these countries, and demand solid action, not rhetoric. This is an extremely complex issue in which numerous factors, law enforcement, judicial action, legislative action, women's and children's rights, protection, economic conditions, and social assistance, have a bearing on how effective a country is in dealing with the problem and how we engage and pressure that country to make progress. Simply, in each case there is not just one defining issue. We recognize the complexity and will take a hard look at each country.

Lastly, some have criticized the report for lacking data. I'd like to assure you that we have made significant efforts to collect data, which we then factored into our decision making. With the world estimate of between 700,000 on one hand and four million trafficking victims on the other hand, this underground crime is not easy to pinpoint. Accumulating verifiable data is extremely difficult even here in the United States. Statistics are important and we will continue our various sources on collection. But statistics are one part of what we are looking at. Action or inaction is the primary focus. The report is one of many tools that are at our disposal to address this criminal activity, to shed light on the terrible problem of trafficking and to crack down on traffickers.

The report is most effective when combined with the comprehensive strategy of diplomacy and direct engagement with other governments, multilateral fora, public affairs, programmatic support and technical assistance. We have taken other steps which we believe reinforce the impact of the report. These include the president's cabinet level interagency taskforce, the newly established senior policy advisory group, a comprehensive review of prospective programs, the usage of every forum, bilateral, regional, global, the ratification process of the U.N. protocol to prevent, suppress and punish trafficking in persons, especially women and children, educating the public, for example, through the annual country reports on human rights practices.

In conclusion, let me reiterate that we want to continue to work vigorously with you, the NGOs and other governments to eradicate the often hidden phenomenon of human bondage in modern day society. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

REP. C. SMITH: Thank you very much, Secretary Dobriansky.

Ambassador.

MS. ELY-RAPHEL: I don't have a statement.

REP. C. SMITH: Okay, thank you. Without objection, a number of written statements by groups and individuals who were unable to testify today will be included in the record. And I do want to make clear to my good friend from American Samoa, Mr. Faleomavaega, that while I'm aware and very pleased that the justice system on that island has operated well, the problem is with the Vietnamese government, and the fact that these people were working for state run organizations. So I think his point was well taken. The judicial system worked and worked well. But there still is a problem with the government and that's -- sir, that's very clear.

I do have some questions and again, I want to thank both of you for being here and for the work you're doing on behalf of trafficked human being, especially the women who disproportionately are being mal-affected by this egregious practice. A couple of questions. I was wondering if you could tell us, either of you, how well are our embassies abroad using this issue? Are they raising it in their diplomatic discussions? Data collection is important. Certainly it is part of a diplomatic process. Are they letting particularly the egregious violators know that sanctions are really real, they're in the offing if significant reform is not made and what has been the response, Madam Secretary?

MS. DOBRIANSKY: Mr. Chairman, the answer is yes. Our ambassadors and our officials in our posts abroad I believe have been very aggressive in raising the issue of trafficking in persons with foreign counterparts. First, before many of our ambassadors go overseas, I have had the benefit of briefing them through ambassadorial seminars that we hold at the state department and which this topic has been extensively discussed. Many of our ambassadors have also come to see me personally, have also visited with ambassador Ely Raphael to discuss the issue prior to departure.

In addition, when the report comes out and even before the report comes out, the posts are extremely well engaged in this. As you know, we derive our information from our posts. We solicit prior to the putting together of the report a rather extensive amount of documentation from our posts abroad in which we post questions that emanate from the standards and the criteria as set forth in the act.

In addition, our posts have not only come back but also have been very engaged, particularly in those countries that have been very willing and interested in partnering with us. They have been very engaged in setting forth programs and plans by which countries can become much more effective in their trafficking programs.

REP. C. SMITH: If I could ask you, I was wondering why in countries like Syria, Iraq, Cuba and Libya, known sponsors of terrorism are not included in the report and are not analyzed in the report?

MS. DOBRIANSKY: Well, let me respond to those in the mix that you mentioned where we not have a post and we don't have diplomatic relations. First, in terms of our access in those countries in which our relationship is virtually non-existent, the ability in acquiring access to information is limited one. In fact, this time in the introduction of the report, we addressed this. The fact that a number of our posts have been in fact constrained, the example that we cite, not one of the ones that you've mentioned but is in fact North Korea, which has come up and we've had under discussion where we don't have the direct access through a presence on the ground. Having said that, we are determined through other ways and means of trying to get information as we can.

REP. C. SMITH: If I could encourage you, as you go forward, to look at those countries because borrowing access, we had the same problem with the International Religious Freedom Act, countries of interest and you mentioned North Korea. North Korea in particular was left out of the mix and as our recent hearing in this committee, chaired by Mr. Hyde pointed out, or Mr. Leach pointed out, the subcommittee chairman, and it is now a country of interest to the United States in that regard, the crackdown on religious believers is comprehensive and barbaric in that country.

So, I just point that out as -- I mean, there is some, at least from the human rights organizations and other means of deriving information that might be, at least give us the ability to classify. Let me just ask you, were there cases and you don't have to tell us which ones in which the trafficking office staff initially recommended a country be placed on Tier 3 but in which the country was eventually put on Tier 2 after a push back from the U.S. embassy in that country? Were there any examples of that?

MS. DOBRIANSKY: I will respond and I think Nancy should respond to this. I'm not aware. I will say this because your question was about whether our posts came in and challenged. Is that correct?

REP. C. SMITH: That's correct. That's basically the bottom line, that it might muck up the relationship that's being --

MS. DOBRIANSKY: They come in and they provide the data and discussions take place within the department in an inter-agency basis. I'm not aware of, in this round, last year's round, there were some challenges. In this year round, I'm not aware of any.

MS. ELY-RAPHEL: No, I am not aware of any either. The decisions were really made back in the state department and we would go back out to them asking questions. But there really was not a post that came in -- they're complaining now but they didn't complain at the time.

REP. C. SMITH: Okay. Let me ask a question on China. In today's USA Today there's a front page story, "China thrown off balance as boys outnumber girls." Many of us on this panel, and I've been doing it since the early 1980s, have raised the specter of a disproportionate number of boys vis-a-vis girls. That is to say, much fewer girls or women in that country. As a matter of fact, the State Department report suggested that the imbalance may be as high as 100 million girls versus boys, males versus females in that country, which is because of the one child per couple policy. But it creates, as we all know, a magnet for a bride. This points out that there may be 40 million young Chinese men who won't be able to marry or start families because of this disproportionality.

China is Tier 2 country. In other words, it has a serious problem but has been judged to be making some progress. The point is made in the narrative that it has a law on trafficking, but the police maintain a national database of abducted and rescued people and a DNA database to facilitate the return of abducted children. Do we have any figures on how many have been prosecuted, because that's also mentioned in the narrative? How many have been abducted children and women and how many have been rescued?

MS. DOBRIANSKY: I don't have on me -- with me the specific data. But congressman, you -- Mr. Chairman, excuse me, you raised I think an important point which I did address in my opening remarks and that is the issue about data collection. We did go out to all of our posts to solicit specific data across the board. And the responses back were varied and in some cases, contingent upon what they were honestly were able to get on the ground. In some cases because of lack of access and in some cases because of very poor record keeping. There were a combination of factors.

Having said that in this we can certainly provide you with that information. We have not in our narrative gone through and provided documentation and statistics but through this process of hearing critiques from Congress, from the NGO community, it seems that it would be very helpful in our future go round for us to look at that integration into our future reports.

REP. C. SMITH: I raise that question about the numbers especially. We all know and we recently and as a matter of fact I had a resolution that passed on behalf of one of the scholars that when information very quickly is classified as state secrets by the Chinese government and even the Dow Jones or Reuters or one of them ran into a problem with financial information being somehow being construed to be state secrets, it would seem to me that, if we had that information, it would be helpful to know. With a police state, I would be concerned about national DNA data banks, particularly in China, with the dictatorship running that country but I think the committee would benefit greatly if you could provide that to us in as great as detail as possible.

MS. DOBRIANSKY: On your specific question concerning China, we will come back to you with that information.

REP. C. SMITH: Finally, because then I'll yield to my good friend and colleague, Mr. Faleomavaega, on India the narrative makes clear and I said this in my opening comments about making significant investigations and prosecutions of traffickers are rare. If you could just perhaps touch on that. Part of it is, as is pointed out here and I've seen this elsewhere, is the lack of coordination between the federal and the states, the bribing of local police. As a matter of fact, local police have actually been on the take. But you do point out this Swadhar which is a government shelter program is being at least a positive that needs to be lifted up and hopefully increased in India. You might want to touch on that as well.

MS. DOBRIANSKY: Okay. Well, several points. First, with regard to our evaluation of India, we would certainly not dispute and, in fact, we documented it here by saying that India in the case of looking at prevention, protection and prosecution. In the area of prosecution, India's record has been abysmal. We ranked India because of what it has done with respect to prevention and protection. But let me comment first on the point of the issue of prosecutions.

Here, you're quite right, Mr. Chairman in pointing out -- in fact in my discussions with Indian officials, the frustration that exists whereby the federal authorities have not been able to secure the kind of cooperation and the kind of responsibility that should exist from state authorities. I think there is a recognition that this is an area that is extremely weak, to say the least, and that there needs to be much more aggressive action. Having said that, we ranked India the way we did because, in looking at what India has done in the area of prevention and protection, in the area of protection India has provided resources, given the very limited finances and budget which it has which is one of the criteria that one must look at. The availability from which a country is able to commit itself against trafficking in persons. Here there are some 80 shelters that do exist.

This program by the way that is mentioned in there is a program which has been announced and which it is a continuation of establishing more shelters. In fact, the goal is to establish more shelters to basically rescue those women who are confronted not only with circumstances of trafficking but even other human rights abuses which they've been confronted with. The Indians have announced this. This has gotten underway, but what we based our information on was not this program but already the 80 shelters that are in place not only what they're planning as we said for the future.

Last point, on prevention the federal government has been centrally involved. The president of India delivered a speech Republic Day in which he addressed the issues of trafficking in persons. There have been other efforts taken by the government to wage a number of prevention campaigns, not only in urban areas but in rural areas, through the media, through the theater, through a variety of means and that is the reason why we gave the ranking which, by the way, I have to say again we do not see that as a past. But we also do take note of clearly the emphasis that has been placed in the critiques on the significance of prosecutions and the significance of taking concrete action to curb corruption.

REP. C. SMITH: Let me just ask one final question. I do have others which I will submit for the record, or if we do a second round. I recently viewed some video tape that Tom Merriman from Fox news channel out in Ohio had filmed in an undercover operation that he embarked upon in South Korea, right outside Camp Casey and it raised the question of whether or not we're doing all that we can possibly do to mitigate and hopefully have a zero tolerance policy when it comes to exploitation of women, trafficked women, in this case Russians, Filipinos and indigenous women from South Korea and I know, ambassador, your office reviewed it and was outraged by it and expressed deep concern.

We have fired off a letter to Secretary Rumsfeld asking for a complete investigation, but secondly, or firstly, to stop it. If it is going on, military police should not be policing in a way that protects the traffickers. They ought to be arresting - - the South Korean police ought to be arresting these traffickers rather than providing some protection so that the exploitation can continue unabated and you might want to comment on it but it's very, very disturbing. We want no part of this. We need to lead by example and again I was glad to see that, ambassador, your office very strongly denouncing what was going on there. So thank you for that. But if you wanted to comment on it. Yes.

MS. DOBRIANSKY: I'll make a quick comment and then you should comment. My only quick comment is we do plan to follow up with our colleagues at the Department of Defense in response to the letter that you've sent to them. We want to ensure that we collaborate on this. Our policy is one of zero tolerance.

MS. ELY-RAPHEL: And I did follow up and, secretary, the army is responding and it's his office that's handling this and they will get back to you and they are in coordination with us as well.

REP. C. SMITH: Thank you very much.

Mr. Faleomavaega, thank you.

REP. FALEOMAVAEGA: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And I certainly want to thank Secretary Dobriansky for a very eloquent statement. I would be the last person to render judgment in terms of having to be tasked in trying to resolve such a very complex issue and a problem that is certainly worldwide in scale.

As you mentioned, Madam Secretary, there was some minimum standard being applicable in rendering some 90 countries, if my math is correct to these three tiers -- Tier 1, Tier 2 and Tier 3, and I just wanted to ask you how did the State Department make a determination of these minimum standards. I mean, for example, how does our ally countries like France, Germany and the United Kingdom got to qualify for Tier 1 in your assessment?

MS. DOBRIANSKY: The reason why these countries are listed on Tier 1 first and foremost is we use a standard of how many individuals, based on our data, are trafficked into or through a country and the gauge is 100 persons. That's what we use. So, why you see some countries for example on Tier 1 simply starting with the premise that there are over 100 persons trafficked through those countries and then as I mentioned --

REP. FALEOMAVAEGA: So, with a country like France with 70 million people if, in your statistical analysis, even if there was over 100 people being trafficked, France qualifies for Tier 1.

MS. DOBRIANSKY: Correct. Because it's over 100. That's what we start with. And then secondly, then those are the countries that we have, according to the legislation, in evaluating we see them as complying with the minimum standards set forth.

REP. FALEOMAVAEGA: : You consider the standard pretty fair in assessing -- I'm trying to get a sense of relativity here. India with 900 million people and if a 100 people are trafficking therefore they automatically fall into Tier 1. I'm trying to deal with a sense of scale with a population of some of these countries. It's --

MS. DOBRIANSKY: I think we think that the legislation did set forth important parameters for judgment. The minimum standards -- let me just give you a thumbnail sketch here. One, the government prohibits severe forms of trafficking and punish acts of trafficking. Governments prescribe punishment with grave crimes. Governments should prescribe punishments sufficiently stringent to deter and reflect trafficking. Governments should make serious and sustained efforts.

Those are broad parameters, if you will, but we have looked at those minimum standards and then the seven criteria laid out in the legislation. My response to you is, first, we think that those standards were certainly very appropriate because they do place an emphasis on looking at what governments are doing in the three critical areas -- prevention, protection and prosecution.

Secondly, I would also add that from this process of hearing critiques, I think there are some areas that we can refine more. That I think that in our evaluations we can be much more specific in terms of the information that we render in the report and also issues that we push on further with governments.

REP. FALEOMAVAEGA: If my arithmetic serves me correctly, I think we've listed some 90 countries out of some 189 nations that make up the United Nations.

The fact that the other 100 nations are not listed, what does this mean in terms of our report? That means they're doing an outstanding job or they're just so miserably bad, we can't even put them in a Tier 3.

MS. DOBRIANSKY: No, that is not the case. The first determination we have to make in doing an analysis on every country in the world is whether or not there are a significant number of trafficked victims in that country, either as a source from the country, through the country or as a destination to that country.

If we determine that there are in the order of 100 victims, we then look to see if the government is meeting the minimum standard set out in the legislation and the countries that are not on the list are those countries that we were not able to get sufficient evidence through our investigation to determine that there were a significant number which the number we use is 100 or, if a country like North Korea that we haven't been able to get enough information on, there are many countries that we're still looking at. Some that are right in an area -- a region -- where there's a lot of trafficking and we look at the countries that border those countries to see if there are traffic victims there. Where do they come from. So that ultimately we can come up with enough to get to the 100 figure and then make the analysis.

REP. FALEOMAVAEGA: There is always a sensitivity, a reaction from our friendly allies in other nations of the world where making a judgment against them putting a standard and saying 100 traffickers, therefore you're it. And my question is how does our nation bear this standard that we're applying against other nations as far as human trafficking is concerned?

MS. DOBRIANSKY: Congressman, you posed that in your opening remarks and let me reference. In the opening of the report and our introduction, we referenced the fact that in the United States we have a problem. We cite the rough figures that we do have -- some 40,000 to 50,000 -- and, in fact, when do sit down with other countries we do so referencing the fact that we do have a problem in the United States and by the way also what other countries do has ramifications for us. Just as what we do, has ramifications for others. That's why this is not, and cannot be, an individual effort. We have to see action from all those in which significant numbers are being trafficked through.

REP. FALEOMAVAEGA: I understand you, you said that in our own country we have 40,000 traffickers going on.

MS. DOBRIANSKY: Yes, it is in the introduction.

REP. FALEOMAVAEGA: Why are we not listed then, ourselves, in these tiers?

MS. DOBRIANSKY: We don't because the State Department doesn't rank the United States itself. We don't in our country human rights reports as you know. But we have called attention to the reality in this country quite openly in the introduction.

REP. FALEOMAVAEGA: I see. Do you consider, Madam Secretary, that there are any other provisions of the current law that might need improvements in terms of human trafficking?

MS. DOBRIANSKY: Well, you know, I will say the point about more specific data in its integration, not just only in our solicitation to the Post, but actually putting this into the report is something, as I've already suggested, that we certainly should be considering. There have been a number of ideas that have been put on the table by many of the NGOs. I'll just say this, that at this time, we want to have the benefit of hearing these ideas, thinking about how to integrate them. But, as a result of the issuance of this report, there have been clearly certain ideas like it's clear to me, as I said, there seems to be of the three areas -- protection, prevention and prosecution -- a heavy emphasis on particularly prosecution even over maybe protection and prevention.

REP. FALEOMAVAEGA: What about in some of these countries that have an entirely different cultural bearing as far as relationships go? Not necessarily to say one is right or one is better but how do you pass judgment? Some of the countries among the Middle Eastern countries that have entirely different standard or different ways of looking at making judgments and say whether the person should be convicted of committing, breaking a law or code or whatever it is in their society, is quite different from western societies.

MS. DOBRIANSKY: Well, I'll make two comments. I don't know if my colleague would like to mention. But two comment I have. First, I know from having worked extensively in the broad human rights field -- I start with the premise that there are some outright human rights abuses that can't be explained away by culture. I mean remember when we had discussions and I was in the Human Rights Office on torture. Torture cannot be explained away by culture. A human rights abuse is a human rights abuse.

Secondly, though is we've tried to suggest that there are a number of tools which we could use which we think could be effective. The report provides us one in which we can and should use in our diplomatic discussions and break through some barriers that may exist with other countries. Some countries that, not even for cultural reasons, but outright are not even willing to acknowledge the existence of the problem.

REP. FALEOMAVAEGA: But that's basically a minority among the countries though, I mean, outright rejection of what we're trying to resolve here. I mean you can't say that that's generally the sense of the all the countries.

MS. DOBRIANSKY: No. I have to --

REP. FALEOMAVAEGA: Would you agree that perhaps -- and I've got one more question, Mr. Chairman -- that perhaps the common factor that really ties into the problem that we have in trying to resolve the situation with these countries is lack of resources?

MS. DOBRIANSKY: It does tie in. In fact, that's one of the points mentioned in significant efforts. It says what measures are reasonable to bring the government into compliance with minimum standards in light of resources and capabilities. That is one of the factors that we have to also weigh into this.

REP. FALEOMAVAEGA: And India is probably the greatest example of that. It is not because the officials don't want to enforce human trafficking, it's simply that the resources are so limited.

MS. DOBRIANSKY: I think it's a combination of factors but, in my own response to the chairman, I did reference that. I do think that the resources have had an impact on what they have been able to do but I would say at the same time I think that in the area of prosecution certainly they could be doing a lot more than they have.

REP. FALEOMAVAEGA: Thank you, Madam Secretary.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

REP. C. SMITH: Mr. Pitts.

REP. PITTS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And in follow up for those questions of the previous member, could you tell us how the United States government is encouraging the implementation of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, law enforcement provisions in the United States.

MS. DOBRIANSKY: Well, I know that we had, in fact, as a result of our senior policy review group, we called upon all of the agencies like justice, like the FBI and others to come forward with a report on what they are doing quite specifically to implement the act. In fact in brought with me a copy here. We sent up to you a copy a couple of months ago when we concluded this. It documents what different agencies are doing. I can't, with the exception of the recent announcement about the T-visa which I think was important, by the Department of Justice, each agency has responsibility for what it has been doing.

I would be glad to certainly share another copy of that with you. You know if you have any comments on that.

REP. PITTS: Yes. Sure. Thank you.

MS. ELY-RAPHEL: I would just add one other thing, and that is that we have detailees from the Department of Justice, two lawyers, and we have another -- had another one from Health and Human Services, which has been a great advantage in dealing with those agencies, and I think when they return to their agencies they will know much more about what all the agencies are doing. We also will have someone detailed to our office from the Bureau of Consular Affairs and I believe the Labor Department.

MS. DOBRIANSKY: Congressman, may I just add one thing?

REP. PITTS: Yes.

MS. DOBRIANSKY: I should add that that was only our first round and I hope you did receive that report because we sent it to each of you when we concluded it. When we set up our senior policy review group, in fact, separate from the policy review that is almost being concluded, we did ask, as I said, all of the participating agencies to document how they have followed the Act and what steps they have taken to fulfill the Act, and each agency came in. Ambassador Ely-Raphel's office put the report together and this was sent to you. But as I said, we will make sure you get another copy.

REP. PITTS: Thank you. When we last met madam secretary you informed us that some 85 countries had signed the new UN protocol on trafficking. I'm wondering, has this translated into concrete steps by the signatory countries to address the problem. Has it resulted in increased pressure on traffickers? Has it facilitated international cooperation to address a crime? And how many Tier 3 countries, for instance, are signatories to the protocol? Is support for the protocol a measure used by the Department to differentiate between Tier 3 countries?

MS. DOBRIANSKY: Well, let me respond first in terms of the last question about whether it's not a measure. Each of our posts, when they come back in and report on the progress or lack thereof by various countries, almost, I believe, all of them have indicated whether a country is or is not a signatory. Having said that as to what influence, I think the greatest influence that the protocol has is that it brings international attention certainly to bear on the issue of trafficking in person.

However, I think back to my days in the Human Rights Bureau where you have at times situations where you may have countries that may be signatories, but their record may not necessarily equate with the signing of a protocol or a convention. In this case, actually, I'd have to get back to you in terms of all the entire Tier 3 as to who has signed and who has not. But I could tell you a few that have and that are on Tier 3, Bosnia Herzegovina, for example, has been one, Indonesia, Greece. And yet we have placed them on Tier 3.

REP. PITTS: Okay. Based on the feedback that you receive from U.S. embassies, can you talk about the willingness of foreign governments to share data with the United States regarding the extent of their trafficking problem or their efforts to combat it, specifically how willing are governments to compile and share data on investigations, arrests, prosecutions or convictions against traffickers, and does the willingness vary a great deal, depending on the country's ranking in the TIP Report? You know, which governments provide data on prosecutions, which don't. Do you have a list of those?

MS. DOBRIANSKY: I will give my response and if you'd like to comment on this as well. First, in terms of the data I would say that in terms of the actual scope of how forthcoming countries have been, honestly it does depend on the number and the specific country. In some cases it may be attributable not to a lack of intent, if you will, or the intent to avoid giving data, but it can be attributable to what we were discussing earlier, a lack of gathered or collected information, a lack of resources, problems that exist in the country.

I'll give you one example which I think that we need to do a much better job in terms of getting data, is in the case of Vietnam. I was sharing with the chairman that in looking at the record of Vietnam, the way in which they compile their statistics based on our embassies reporting, they do it in groupings over a period of a number of years. When you look at it, the number of cases that they say that have been addressed, you can view it as possibly being significant. But what is very unclear is the way the data is presented in terms of the area of prosecution, what is the end result.

The point I would make is I think in this area, this is the area that going back to the question of areas of improvement, I think we need to be much more vigilant and really pin down and maybe document in our report those that are forthcoming with data, those that are not forthcoming with such data. Do you have a comment on that?

MS. ELY-RAPHEL: No. I would just say that it does really -- it varies from country to country, and a great deal of it is whether or not that data is even available to them. This morning I had a television, a DVD with the government of Ukraine through our embassy, and their minister of interior and justice were there, and I asked them about that. They had statistics, they had figures, but they were aggregate figures. They could tell you how many cases they had from 1998 to now, but they didn't break it down. So I think you find this -- it really does vary.

REP. PITTS: One last question. How has the war on terrorism affected our efforts with the Central South Asia countries' efforts to monitor and combat trafficking? You know, we have a sensitive relationship, some improved relations with some of those countries who are allied with us in this war. How does that balance against their traditionally poor record in the area of trafficking?

MS. DOBRIANSKY: Well, first, congressman, the way in which we did these evaluations we undertook these evaluations based on the criteria set forth in the legislation. And as I said, looking at prevention, prosecution, protection. In terms of coalition members and whether there's influence or not in this rating, there is no correlation. But I will say this, in the broad area of human rights, and this being one of the issues and a very egregious one, interestingly enough because of the coalition effort, we have been afforded opportunities at more direct engagement with countries, countries that have -- heretofore have shunned many of these issues and have been very unwilling to discuss these issues with us.

Actually now by being coalition members, the door is open and we are aggressively addressing them with a number of countries. In fact, there are several on the list which we have ranked in Tier 3, the Kyrgyz Republic, Tajikistan, that I believe were in fact not listed last year. We want to be able to, through the open door, be able to engage and hope that that does not deter countries from moving away and being open and honestly addressing this very serious problem.

REP. PITTS: Thank you for that answer and for your efforts, and finally let me just say, regardless of cultural differences, slavery, specifically sex slavery and exploitation of women and children is always wrong. Thank you.

REP. C. SMITH: Thank you, Mr. Pitts.

Ms. Watson.

REP. DIANE E. WATSON (D-CA): Thank you so much, Mr. Chairman, for having the witnesses here so we can hear their report. And I understand that according to the State Department report, the United States is principally a transit and destination country for approximately 50,000 or more enslaved persons. These persons are primarily women and children who are exploited and abused to perform commercial sex services and to work in sweat shops or the agricultural sector under conditions that are comparable to slavery.

Furthermore, studies have shown that more than eight million children are currently enslaved around the world. There is little discussion of whether race or other forms of discrimination contribute to the likelihood of women and children becoming victims of trafficking. Despite the success of the department's report in highlighting the extend of human trafficking, I'm concerned that we are not paying more attention to the man side of human trafficking, especially here in the United States, we might -- should be listed in that report.

Furthermore, I am concerned that the report does not recognize explicit connections between trafficking, racism and racial discrimination.

The demand and supply aspects of this issue is similar to the war on drugs. As a country we can assist foreign nations in helping poor rural farmers find alternative crops to grow in place of the poppy. And we can supply air support and training to detect and bring down planeloads of cocaine. But what remains is a demand. Simple economics teach us that without demand there is little need for supply.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman and members, I wonder if we're doing enough to address the demands affixed to tourism, commercial sex, human servitude and inexpensive labor here in our own country. I am also concerned that political decisions are driving how countries are placed in this tier scheme. Some of the worst offenders seem to be granted some leniency and are we too concerned about causing offence that might damage other U.S. interests, and turn a blind eye to the offenders such as India, Thailand, Vietnam, Burma, Cambodia and the list goes on? Addressing this problem and bringing relief to its many victims will only be possible with international cooperation. And trafficking has reached staggering dimensions around the globe and we must address all aspects of this problem.

In addressing this issue, we need to focus upon the long term approaches which will address each aspect of the trafficking cycle and which recognize explicitly the connection between demand, trafficking, migration, racism and racial discrimination. And that's the statement, I'll give the rest for the record, Mr. Chair, but I would like to bring some attention to an issue that was brought up in Los Angeles. And we have been told just this afternoon that our country does not help the victims of trafficking. Rather, what we're doing, particularly where there's women and children, is putting them in jail and waiting for them to be deported, and some of them have been there for years. So you might want to comment on that.

And also I'd like to raise this question and I won't be here for the answers because I have two more hearings going on at the same time. But I do have staff here that will report back to me. And the last two questions are: What is the status of the U.N. protocol that we talked about in the last hearing that we had on trafficking? And why hasn't the United States submitted whatever they have to the Senate for its advice and consent? So if you can remark on the overall statement and on these two questions, I would appreciate it. Thank you so much for being here and supplying us with the details.

MS. DOBRIANSKY: Okay, thank you. Congresswoman, if you're here I can respond very quickly --

REP. WATSON: Go ahead.

MS. DOBRIANSKY: -- before you go off. First, let me address the three specific -- on the issue of helping the victims here in the United States, I am going to suggest that we have -- who joined me here in the hearing last year, Dr. Wade Horn of the Health and Human Services. HHS is very responsible and very engaged in this issue of helping victims in the United States, providing the kind of assistance that is necessary. I will make sure that we follow up directly with you and your office on this issue. But I will say that they have -- the State Department doesn't do this, but we work with them, clearly. HHS has been very aggressive about helping victims here in the United States.

REP. WATSON: Let me just say this to the issue of deportation. Can you address -- are they placed in jail while they are waiting to be deported?

MS. DOBRIANSKY: Not to my knowledge.

REP. WATSON: Okay. We'll just check that out, will we?

MS. DOBRIANSKY: To my knowledge. But that's why both I am going to ensure that we come to visit you with --

REP. WATSON: Thank you, I'd appreciate that.

MS. DOBRIANSKY: -- our colleagues from Health and Human Services and the Department of Justice and INS. On the status of the U.N. protocol, we are almost there. We do expect that this will be moved shortly to the Senate. Some colleagues of mine are here from our legal advisors office. We've had issues that we've had to clarify, but we expect fairly quick movement on that.

REP. WATSON: Okay, time.

MS. ELY-RAPHEL: I believe we're expecting to send that up this summer.

REP. WATSON: Thank you.

REP. C. SMITH: Would the gentle lady yield?

MS. DOBRIANSKY: And then --

REP. WATSON: I'm sorry.

MS. DOBRIANSKY: -- I was going to make one final comment, and that is on your broader points I will just say I've taken notes -- we've taken notes and we certainly will take that all into account in terms of our deliberations as to how we refine this report and our narrative in the future.

REP. WATSON: In closing, Mr. Chairman, I'd like to thank you. You did come to my office, we did have some discussions on these concerns that I raised then and I continue to raise, and I would appreciate it if we could set up another time, Madam Ambassador.

MS. DOBRIANSKY: We will.

REP. WATSON: Absolutely when we can sit down and talk about some of the trouble points. I do plan to take Poudel down to Micronesia. We might also look at going to Burma where we've just got a report earlier today, and we might be able to check out some of these other points too. So thank you very much and I'll look forward to talking with you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I yield.

REP. C. SMITH: If the gentle lady would yield. Just the law itself established that the women should be treated as a victim and not as part of -- not as a criminal. If you have any instances or you know of any where that law -- our law is not being followed, please let us know because I think that -- you know, we have asked INS, we have asked HHS and all the other people who have a piece of this, make sure that they adequately implement it. And Attorney General John Ashcroft has been very faithful in promulgating -- we think it's a little bit slow, but it's still nevertheless happening, and issuing guidance to the prosecutors, U.S. attorneys to go after the traffickers, but to treat the women, the victims, as victims and not as part of the problem. So --

REP. WATSON: I'll get in touch with you.

REP. C. SMITH: Please do. Thank you for bringing that up.

Mr. Tancredo.

REP. TANCREDO: Madam Secretary, Madam Ambassador, I am trying very hard to believe that this report was not influenced at all by the State Department's perspective vis--vis each of these countries, and any other kind of relationship that the United States has with them. I'm trying to believe that that didn't enter into this report at all, and that the report was based solely and entirely on the legislation that we passed. I must say that something appears to be wrong here and I do not know exactly where to affix the blame, if any is actually necessary.

But when you have -- let's see, the Wilberforce Forum, the International Justice Mission, Protection Project, the Salvation Army, Human Rights Watch, European law enforcements, the International Justice Mission, Southern Baptists Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission, Concerned Women for America, when you have these organizations expressing such opposition, such concern about this report, it seems to me something is wrong. Just as pure and simple as that. It seems as though they understand fully well, I think at least -- you know, most of the people that I mention here, most of the organizations are relatively sophisticated in this particular arena.

They understand the kind of constraints that you face and that you actually address here in your testimony with trying to obtain good data.

And so I guess my question to you is this: is there a legislative change that you would -- are there legislative changes that you would propose that would enable us to avoid what is apparently a contradiction in the listing? That is to say, where we have organizations -- I mean countries that end up in Tier 2, for instance, that are so blatantly, again it appears from my point of view, undeserving of even that status and have a much more severe penalty that should be attached to their inability, unwillingness to participate in any effort to try and stop this horrendous activity? And if it is our fault, if it is something that there's something in the law -- something in the law that we passed that prevents you from doing what you would do if you did not have the constraint of the law and actually were able to call a spade a spade here and call one of these countries, put these countries into the position, into the categories that we really think they should be, is there something that we need to do that will help you to do that?

MS. DOBRIANSKY: Congressman, if I may first address the first part of your question about the doubts about placement, let me call your attention to not only last year's report but this year's report in terms of some of our closest allies who are on Tier 3. Israel and South Korea were on Tier 3 last year. This year, we have close relationships with Greece and Turkey and that did not interfere with the placement of these countries on Tier 3. So, first on that.

Secondly, I tried to suggest and honestly address in my testimony. I think we're sometimes -- as I said, honest people who are committed to the same goal and objective can honestly and genuinely disagree. Here we did evaluate countries on the three equally. It is clear to me from a number of comments that have been made today and also the comments from all of the very extremely engaged groups that you have mentioned and groups that we have benefited from, the NGOs that a heavy emphasis is placed on prosecution.

And as we go forward, I want to, because a number of you have raised what could we do and what would we recommend -- maybe, despite my earlier comments, I've mentioned a few. I'd like us to be able to give thought, if I can say so, to your last question as to how it can be more refined because when one looks at the issue of significant efforts. For example, the congressman from Samoa asked -- I won't venture to pronounce, my name is difficult enough -- the congressman from Samoa had indicated that, well, how do you factor in resources?

We do factor that into our deliberations. At the same time, we do look back to magnitude. We do look at concrete action. Separate from our evaluation, totally separate from the evaluation, is, in my judgment, and I have to make that clear, is also the engagement. I've been very struck by, based on the report as I said, who comes in and who we can go to have a discussion where you know that there's political will to try to bring about change versus cases where there is no political will. And it is a solid placement in Tier 3.

I'd like to, in sum, give thought seriously to the question. It's been raised by almost everyone here and I think that is worth our giving serious consideration to and coming back in a very thoughtful way as to ways that we can refine this more and be more effective in our targeted approach.

REP. TANCREDO: Thank you very much.

REP. C. SMITH: Thank you very much.

Madam Secretary, I'm sure you were referring to Smith when you were talking about pronunciation then.

MS. DOBRIANSKY: Yes (laughs.)

REP. C. SMITH: Gary Haugen makes, after our hearing that we had last fall, winter, made some recommendations and I know we made them to the State Department in terms of improving and of course, everything is a work in progress and I think he had some very good ideas. One, the estimated number of victimizations ought to be included. The number of prosecutions and convictions for sex trafficking offences, number two and number three, the number of government employees, including police officers, who were disciplined for complicity in sex trafficking.

I think it's a very worthwhile recommendation to add more specifics to it, which may already be in your database. Maybe that's already part of the qualitative analysis that you're making. But it would help us to make a better analysis as well, specially since there seems to be, I think, almost uniform concern about India, Thailand. Holly Burkhalter will be testifying later and she points out Thailand and India. Others have done likewise. So, I just would ask you to consider those three recommendations by the International Justice Commission. I think they're very well thought out.

MS. DOBRIANSKY: Mr. Chairman, if I may. In fact, Gary Haugen visited with us and we were discussing that. We did use his information in our solicitation, or his suggestion, excuse me, in our solicitation to our post. However, this gets back to the other point which we discussing with Gary, the need to also work this at the other end, meaning in terms of our embassies, thinking of ways and means and strategies of getting as much reliable information and documentation as we can. We also, as I said, we did not register it here in these reports and clearly, there's a great interest in that. For our next go around, that is one of the changes that we will in fact make.

REP. C. SMITH: Let me just ask you on Cuba, if I could. When I mentioned earlier about countries that are terrorist countries and were not included in the list, obviously we have an interest section there. So we do have some reporting capabilities. But they do have Internet sites where Cuban girls are actually promoted for sale as escorts, offering them as merchandise, and obviously the sex tourism industry there is alive and regrettably very profitable for Fidel Castro. Are we looking at Cuba at all, Ambassador?

MS. DOBRIANSKY: Yes, we are. Again however, we are not able to generate the numbers. But that is clearly one of the countries that are --

REP. C. SMITH: I know you know this. But you know, there's an annual report that is prescribed by law. But we also put language in the statute that says interim reports can be offered up at any time that data is available. So, that's important too. Even as you do analysis or re-analysis of countries that are on two or three, Tier 2 or Tier 3, if based after these hearings and looking at the body of evidence, you want to put Thailand, for example, or India. Thailand is, like I said before, offered up by many of the NGOs and Human Rights organizations as a country that ought to be on Tier 3. Perhaps they could be re-evaluated and a report issued but before next year, because obviously interim reports can be proffered at any time. So I ask you if you would look into that.

MS. DOBRIANSKY: Chairman --

REP. FALEOMAVEGA: I was just wondering. I was thinking in the years past, hasn't our country taken the lead in bringing this issue before the United Nations? There was tremendous resistance from our own ally countries who wanted to get into this issue which they consider as an internal problem. It is none of your business sort of reaction. Are we still trying to pursue this issue before the United Nations to make this clearly as a global issue and not just something that is pursued just by our country and put in the mandate on these other countries to comply and really to resolve this hideous activity?

MS. DOBRIANSKY: Yes, we have brought it forward to the United Nations. There has been a number of meetings that have taken place and in which the United States has been very much in the lead. As to your other point, I would even say it more broadly whether we're talking about allies or we're talking about non-allies. There has been, depending upon the country a great uneasiness and that's also been very broadly with the issue of human rights and how human rights issues have been addressed, for example, in the U.N. Human Rights Commission meeting, for example.

REP. SMITH: Madam Secretary, last year at the hearing, you mentioned that the Democratic Republic of Congo was one of the, quote, "major violators in terms of human trafficking and a country which has not engaged in a positive manner with the U.S. government on the issue.

" Can you explain why the Congo does not appear in this year's report?

MS. DOBRIANSKY: Yes. My understanding is a -- like I said, you may want to comment a bit more on this -- my understanding is that given the conflict there, our post, in fact, came in because of seriously under the circumstances being able to provide the kind of information that would be warranted in this report. This goes back to the point as to why some countries are listed, why some other countries are not listed. And that may be, for example, something that we need to consider because it's not necessarily the case that there may not be a problem. We may not know precisely the scope of the problem and particularly, if you have an ongoing war and conflict situation, it's particularly difficult to get data. That is the reason. I don't know if you have anything to add.

MS. ELY-RAPHEL: I would just add that we got additional information this past year that did not corroborate the information that we had the year before.

REP. C. SMITH: Really? Okay. I appreciate that explanation. The Interagency Working Group, how well is that working?

MS. DOBRIANSKY: The Interagency Working Group, if you mean in this case, the senior policy review?

REP. C. SMITH: Yes.

MS. DOBRIANSKY: Prior to the report we met with the two goals that I mentioned earlier. One was to undertake a policy review. We're almost at the end of that which I think will be quite important. And then secondly is that we did call upon all participants there to report how they are fulfilling the act, which is the report that we shared and sent to you a couple of months back.

What we are looking to in our next phase in bringing the group together is to sit down and looking at programs, quite specifically. How, in light of problems, problematic areas, how our resources would be used effectively. And that's the next goal and objective of the group.

REP. C. SMITH: If I could just on the -- ask for some hurry up in terms of the program. This year's fiscal year, preparations bills are making their way. Last year I think we got less than what was possible in the House Senate Conference on Foreign Ops. Mr. Wolf was very faithful and came forward with his piece on Commerce, Justice and State but I think we lost out on an opportunity. And from my continued conversations with government -- this morning I met with several parliamentarians from Kosovo who were here for that warrant in Virginia. There were 30 of them in the room and then we had a hearing on Kosovo to elaborate in the area of trafficking, there's still not enough resources.

So, I mean -- the money, even while we can't pinpoint exactly how every dollar will be spent going in, I'm sure the need so far outnumbers the current authorization levels that we should at least meet those authorization levels. So I would hope that you could provide us with a --

MS. DOBRIANSKY: We agree with you and we want to move expeditiously, sorry.

REP. C. SMITH: Let me just, finally, before going -- Mr. Wolf, do you have any questions, Chairman Wolf? No.

According to written testimony that was submitted today to the committee that a Vietnamese-American Human Rights Organization, boat people SOS -- the trafficking report from Vietnam focuses on relatively insignificant government actions and misses the big picture, according to SOS, when it finds that the government has made significant efforts. For an example, the government prosecuted one junior official but did not -- not for anything he did to the women. It was for misappropriating government funds which he lost when his Korean accomplice absconded. The report also ignores the fact that the Vietnamese Ministry of Labor official who traveled to American Samoa and publicly threatened the workers, is now deputy director of the government whole labor export program.

How did we manage to miss these very important facts and could it be that our embassy in Hanoi is getting too many of its facts from the government itself and not enough from the human rights advocates?

MS. DOBRIANSKY: On the last point. Our embassies do gather information from foreign NGOs, from our NGOs, as well as from government sources. In this case you're quite right. We did not cite and I don't know the specific reason why, the case that you mentioned was not referenced in here but in fact the American-Samoa court case is referenced in here and what action, although as we cite belatedly, was taken by the Vietnamese.

This gets back I think to the broader point. We evaluated Vietnam based on efforts that it is taking in terms of prevention campaigns. Efforts that it's taking in terms of protection campaigns where it certainly is and has not been doing well, has been in the area of prosecution, which that is something that we need to address much more aggressively, I think, with them.

REP. C. SMITH Thank you.

MS. ELY-RAPHEL: I would just add that as we gather evidence after the American-Samoa case we may find that there was a lot more government corruption involved in that case.

REP. C. SMITH: I do have one final question. It's on Indonesia and in the report you mention that there was a conference held by a number of the source transiting and destination countries. What was our low on that and what are your -- what is your sense I should say with regards to Jakarta? Do you think they are putting some programs in place that might get them off Tier 3 and most importantly protect the women?

MS. ELY-RAPHEL: I was the representative to that conference in Bali and it was the first ministerial to be held in that region and all the governments came and I must say, I was impressed with the statements, certainly the president of the Philippines was there, and made a very moving statement on trafficking. So, I think the governments -- and this was a conference that was co-sponsored by Australia and Indonesia. They have lots of plans in the works. I want to see these plans implemented. There were a lot of words that were said at the conference and I hope still there will be follow up, particularly on trafficking. There was also a lot of focus on smuggling.

The government of Indonesia, I met with many of the government officials in Jakarta before I went to the meeting, in Bali. They need to do a lot more than they are doing now to address the problem of trafficking, particularly, drafting legislation, having a criminal statute and implementing it. I would -- they need to make improvements. They do some -- do cooperate and there are very active NGOs on the prevention and the protection side. But I was disappointed with what I found on the prosecution side.

REP. C. SMITH: Let me, and I know time -- it is getting late and I apologize to the second panel of witnesses and to many of you that this has gone longer than I think you might have anticipated, but on Russia and I do appreciate, Secretary Dobriansky, that you made the point, Turkey is on the list. Greece is on the list. I mean these are NATO countries. Obviously Turkey is the underbelly of NATO as it's often been referred to, a very important strategic ally and yet no punches were pulled there, and we all appreciate that.

And Russia, with whom we have a very close friendship, at least it would appear that way and there have been recent agreements in the area of our arms control with President Bush. Is this issue being raised at the highest levels? I've been to Russia many times. I've met with their Duma speaker. I've met with many of their leaders. They just don't seem to get it yet that Russian women are being raped day in and day out having been trafficked to New York and Philadelphia and elsewhere in the United States. Why don't they want to do more? And as pointed out in the report, age 14 is the age of consent so it makes it even harder to pass a law. Perhaps the Duma will move to change that, but at the highest levels is it being raised?

MS. DOBRIANSKY: We clearly need to do more because as the report demonstrates in three areas, Russia has really come up miserably short. And we need to think about other creative ways and means diplomatically at all levels, in raising this issue. And I think you raise a very important point because given the strides that we have made with Russia in other areas and that gets back to the earlier point, you know, we have a vibrant exchange in many areas but this hasn't translated into action in this case. And in the area of trafficking in persons.

We need to do more and we would welcome any suggestions that you may have because you have dealt with Russia for quite some time and thinking about ways and means of applying pressure, not only the threat of sanctions if they do not improve their record by 2002.

REP. C. SMITH: Thank you very much. I want to thank both of you for your personal strong commitment to eradicating this modern slavery. We do appreciate it on the committee in a bipartisan way and look forward to working with you in a cooperative way. I appreciate your testimony and your work.

I'd like to now welcome our second panel of witnesses. Mr. Gary Haugen, president of the International Justice Mission. Mr. Haugen has worked in the civil rights division of the U.S. Department of Justice and served as the officer in charge of the United Nations Genocide Investigation in Rwanda in 1994. Mr. Haugen also served on the executive committee of the National Initiative for Reconciliation in South Africa. He is the author of numerous articles and books on foreign affairs, international law in human rights. We welcome Mr. Haugen to the full committee.

The next witness will be our distinguished former member of Congress, the Honorable Linda Smith. Ms. Smith began her political career by serving in the Washington State Legislature and was elected to the U.S. House in 1994. During her tenure in Congress, Ms. Smith has visited India and Nepal to witness first hand the situation of young women and children who were being exploited there. After leaving Congress in 1998, Ms. Smith formed Shared Hope International in partnership with Teen Challenge International. These two groups work together to rescue victims of trafficking and to supply them with shelter, health care, and vocational training. And, Linda, welcome to the committee today.

Next I'd like to welcome, Ms. Manjou Poudel, a woman from Nepal. Ms. Poudel began her career as a journalist for the Nepali Daily. In 1994 she founded the women's section of the NGO federation of Nepal. And for the last two years has worked as a full-time social worker and researcher on women in development for INHRD (ph) International in Nepal.

Donna Hughes is a professor in the Oscar and Carlson Endowed Chair in women's study at University of Rhode Island. Professor Hughes has done research, and published reports on the trafficking of women in the United States, Russia, Ukraine and South East Asia. From 2000 to 2002, she was team leader for research trafficking with the National Institute of Justice U.S. Ukraine research partnership.

And, finally, we will be hearing from Holly Burkhalter. Since 1997, Ms. Burkhalter has been the Advocacy Director of Physicians for Human Rights, a Boston-based human rights organization that works to promote health by promoting human rights. Previously, for 14 years, she was affiliated with Human Rights Watch as its Advocacy Director, and Director of its Washington Office, and frequently provided her insights and counsel to the subcommittees that I previously chaired, the International Human Rights and International Committee, and we always valued her opinion. From 1981-82, Ms. Burkhalter was a professional staff member of our committee's subcommittee on human rights and international organization. She was a frequent witness, as I just pointed out.

We look forward to your testimony. All of your testimonies will be made a part of the record.

Mr. Haugen, if you could begin.

MR. GARY HAUGEN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. First of all I'd like to thank, of course, Chairman Hyde for convening this hearing, and I'm grateful to you, sir, for your continued persistent leadership on this issue. We will be submitting our written statement for the record.

I'm specifically grateful that this hearing on the TIP Report is focusing on government complicity in human trafficking. As congressmen would know, the International Justice Mission spent thousands of hours infiltrating the commercial sex industry to specifically rescue victims of sex trafficking. And in the process we've learned, I think, some important lessons about the way the industry works, and the way it can be most effectively combated.

Sex trafficking is, I think, clearly the ugliest and yet the most preventable man-made disaster on our globe today. Why is it so preventable? It's preventable because it requires the commission of multiple felony openly before a customer public. You have to abduct these girls, you have to confine them, rape them, assault them, hold them against their liberty, and hold them out for the public, so that they can come as customers.

So there are, in fact, 2.3 million women and girls held in forced prostitution in India. And they service about four to five customers a day, which means there are 10 million men every day who find the victims of sex trafficking. So this is not something that is really hard to find. I wish I could say that it was.

Why is it so preventable? Because, first it requires the open commission of these multiple crimes, and then it then simply requires that you hold it out to the public on a continuous basis. Unlike drugs which you can consume and then it goes away, you have to hold out these victims for months and months, and years and years.

How do the traffickers get away with this? They only do it with means, and that is with the complicity of government officials who are supposed to enforce these laws. Massive levels of sex trafficking simply don't occur everywhere in the world. They only occur in most parts of the world where it's tolerated by local authority. You can't have high levels of sex trafficking without government complicity, because it has to be held open to the public.

We have just a couple of minutes of video that we wanted to share with the committee that makes two points. One, to show just how open and ugly the sex trafficking is. But, secondly, to also show you how casual the official complicity is in the crime of sex trafficking. And if we can get that up on the monitor, let's go ahead and run that.

The first is some footage which was taken just a few weeks ago in Cambodia, in Sle Pok(ph), a particular neighborhood outside Phnom Penh, where anyone can simply enter to buy in an open market these young girls for sex. These are girls between 11, 12, 13 years of age. They can be purchased for a dollar or two for short time sex, or you can purchase them outright for between $50 and $100. You can see this young girl here being presented to our investigator for sex, a very young girl. "If you don't like that one, here's another little girl." Just one after another in this open market. There are hundreds of these minor girls simply offered for sale.

You'll see here, actually, a girl eventually being offered to us who was being held in the arms of the older woman there. That little girl, about 6 or 7 years of age, was being offered for sale for sex. As the video goes on, you can see just these very little girls that are sold out of these brothels openly to our customers. These are girls that should be tucked in bed at night in the proper way, but instead these are little Vietnamese girls in Cambodia right now who are being sold for sex. We've been supplying this information to the Cambodians for more than a year and a half.

This shows you in India, when I say 2.3 million girls held in forced prostitution, that's sort of a vague statistic. But these are the conditions under which they are held. These are underground cells where these young girls are held and confined, and they are forced to provide sex to customers, between 10 and sometimes 30 times a day, seven days a week. The end story for the vast majority of these girls is, of course, the death sentence because they will simply be forcibly injected with the HIV virus, and they will eventually die of AIDS.

This has a very human face to it and it's totally out in the public. How do you get away with this? With complete complicity. This is a video --

(Video played.)

-- here on the video, and something which we've been able to capture on video several times in a country like Thailand, the police are just very casual about their protection. Now, the good news in all of this, is that sex trafficking can be drastically reduced if government simply switches sides. If they do two things: if they get their own officials out of the business, and if they send to jail the perpetrators who openly commit the crime.

This is why this hearing is so important, because it focuses specifically on the two actions that are most important for stopping sex trafficking, and the two actions that are most doable for any government. One, disciplining their own police authorities who protect sex trafficking. And, two, convicting the perpetrators.

And, frankly, that is why this TIP Report is so devastatingly disappointing to the International Justice Mission. That's a strong word to say. But the report simply refuses to provide verifiable data on the two things that matter most: "Have you put anyone in jail? Have you dismissed anybody from the police force who is protecting this?" Is such information difficult or mysterious to obtain? No. Because this is information about the government's own actions. It might be difficult to obtain precise numbers of victimization and other things. But the government knows what the government has been doing, or not doing. So, this is the information that can be easily provided.

We met with the State Department early in January and began to discuss the need for this information. And it may be, as I understand from the secretary, that the requests were made. But our concern is that it doesn't show up in the report. There are numbers on this. It would just be great for transparency to know what they are.

The result of rejecting that move is that the report gives passing grade to some of the worst offending countries, who have the highest levels of victimization, countries that have no known convictions, and no known proof of disciplinary action. So India, with its 2.3 million women and children held in forced prostitution, zero known conviction, zero known disciplinary action. Thailand, with hundreds of thousands of victims, zero known conviction, zero known disciplinary action.

All we have to do is think about if this applied to our own country. If we had an epidemic of rape in one of our cities, and we said we want our officials to do something significant about it. And they said, "Well, we've got protection centers to educate women that they shouldn't do certain things that make them vulnerable. And here's some after-care facilities. But, no, we don't ever send anybody to jail for this. And, no, we don't discipline the police officers who protect it." No American would accept that as being significant.

The TIP Report has arrived at this tragic result simply because it has ignored the requirements of the statute, which I think were quite straightforward. The battle is over whether you are on Tier 2 or Tier 3. We can see that Tier 2 is not really a passing grade, but I can say that in these countries I found that it is treated as so.

There is in the legislation three clear points on whether or not you get to be on Tier 2. What's the extent of victimization? What's the extent of official tolerance or complicity? And, thirdly, have you taken reasonable steps? The report should just report on those three things: what do you estimate the victimizations to be, what do you estimate the extent of official tolerance and complicity to be? And the way to answer that question is to see whether or not they've disciplined any police officers and sent anyone to jail.

Instead, what does the report say? Here is how the report summarizes how countries like India and Thailand get to stay on Tier 2, and this is also just on page 9 I believe of the report. It says: "The governments of countries in Tier 2 do not yet fully comply with the act's minimum standards, but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards by: (1) some are strong in the prosecution of traffickers, but provide little or no assistance to victims. Others work to assist victims and punish traffickers, but have not yet taken any significant steps to prevent traffickers, or; (3) some governments are only beginning to adjust trafficking but nonetheless have already taken significant steps towards the eradication of trafficking."

So if you ask which of these is India? Are they strong in the prosecutions of traffickers? No, it can't be number one because they've never convicted anyone. Could they be number two, work to assist victims and punish traffickers? Well, you can't punish a trafficker if you've never convicted them. So it's not one and it's not two, so then we're stuck with three. Is it a government that's only beginning to address trafficking, but nonetheless have already taken significant steps towards the eradication of trafficking? I don't see how that helps our understanding.

Therefore, in the absence of simple objective facts we're left with an utterly confusing and thus utterly subjective evaluation that undermines the usefulness of the accountability process that the statute was intended to provide. We have a simple and what we think is a very doable request, and I'm so grateful that the madam secretary has admitted that there is a need and she has been very positive in working with us, a need to improve. And we'd just like to make a simple suggestion for improvement. For any country that is not meeting minimum standards, that country should be required that they tell how many, if any, perpetrators they've sent to jail and how many of the dirty police they've dismissed.

In other words, if you right now aren't meeting minimum standards, you, the government, bear the burden of providing that data on the perpetrators you've sent to jail and any police you've dismissed. The embassy doesn't have to chase you to find that, the NGOs don't have to exhaust themselves. It's your government, you tell us who you've sent to jail and whether you've disciplined any police officers. To do otherwise is to say that a country can be making significant efforts without any conviction and without ever dismissing any police officers that protect the crime. And I think the State Department should say so. If it is saying, well, there can be sufficient after care facilities and sufficient education programs that even if there's zero convictions and zero police dismissals, that meets the standard. If that's the policy, that should be well stated.

I've had to meet with scores of girls who've been victimized by sex trafficking. They've explained to me what it's like to have their mouth taped shut when their first customer is raping them. I see girls that limp because they've been so continuously brutalized. I've seen girls that are just laying in fetal positions in these homes because they have been brutalized over years of time, and I've seen them being carried out in little coffins, dying from AIDS. What we have to do is picture that audience and tell them "Your country is meeting minimum standards, even though" -- or rather "Your country is making significant efforts, even though we've never sent anyone to jail for these crimes against you and we've never dismissed a police officer for protecting these crimes." I think we can do much better than that, and that's what I would urge: for a concrete change and improvement in next year's report. And, again, I thank Mr. Chairman for the opportunity to provide a testimony at this hearing.

REP. C. SMITH: Mr. Haugen, thank you very much for your testimony and your very useful recommendations, and the record should note that as we crafted this legislation in the first place, you were very helpful in helping guide us as to what it ought to look like. So I do thank you for that as well.

I'd like to introduce Ms. Smith, former member of Congress. And, you know, some people when they leave Congress go out and get these lucrative contracts with lobbying organizations. Linda Smith jumped into this very, very important human rights fight on behalf of women who are being exploited, and we're very grateful for the work you do, Ms. Smith.

REP. FALEOMAVAEGA: Would the chairman yield? I'd like to offer my personal welcome to our former colleague and member of the Congress, Ms. Smith, whom I've had the privilege of serving with years past in our membership in the Resources Committee. I'm just so happy to see her as a witness this afternoon. So welcome, Linda.

MS. LINDA SMITH: Thank you. I want to first thank you and all of your efforts, particularly Chairman Smith. This is not an issue where there are people that vote and so often it's easy to get caught up in votes, or in issues where your constituency is pressuring you. And this is a silent constituency. It's a group of people with no one to speak for them, not even in their own countries. When I left Congress I had to make a decision on where I would go, but I spent a night in a brothel. And in that brothel in Bombay, India, it got my heart, it made me sick and I had to face a question, and that was whether I was going to leave the girls there. And I just couldn't. When I'm faced with little girls younger than my granddaughters, aged six to 14 -- for any of you that want to know how old I am, I do have a 14-year-old granddaughter.

And these little girls were being used by men every 15 minutes, used as virgins because they believed it cured AIDS.

Most of these women that I serve now, and we have 19 homes around the world and the homes started in India, most of these girls were seven, eight, nine, 10 years old when they were put into prostitution. I don't think about them as them. I don't think about it as that issue over there. It has names: Mannisha. I carry this little girl's picture with me because some day I want to tell somebody in some country I'm frustrated with others and sometimes I don't think I can go on, because I've never dealt with anything that made me cry like this, because you see I didn't cry until I was probably 40 years old, and these little girls make me cry.

So I would like to summarize my testimony with about two-and-a-half minutes of my girls, and then I would like to conclude with the recommendations that I have in my limited experience of four years with these girls, and what I think our government should do as it relates to the TIP Report. So if we could see that with the permission of the chair?

(Video played.)

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I wanted you to see the faces because so often I sat where you are and you -- we talk about issues, and I want you to know that, Mr. Smith, you are changing the lives of little girls like you just saw, because shining the light on this problem itself is a strong first action to helping Gina, and Ganga(ph) and Mannisha. And I have been encouraged by the Bush administration.

September 11th could have had this fall of the radar screen, I know what it's like here. I know when there's all these issues and all this pressure that something could just make something like that go away because they don't vote. And yet, the administration literally continued keeping this on the top burner, and I want to commend the administration. Ambassador Ely-Raphel, I know she got a new office, but this would not have been an easy one. And Paula Dobriansky. I think what they ended up getting was a lot of work in a very difficult time. And I say this right before I'm going to just really be very -- in very much opposition to some of their report. I think heavy lifting is what they did. This report and the number of countries was heavy lifting. This administration has been what, 18 months? Just about 18 months. And they've had two reports so far. And so I have to believe that they're going to do better later. But if they don't do better later, I think that we have to rewrite the legislation or you have to rewrite the legislation to make it explicit as to what you want.

I encourage this administration to keep the light on India, Nepal and several other countries. I would like them to tell them in writing that we can see something that says this was a D minus. The only thing that's going to give you an A, or even a C, a passing grade, is prosecutions. We want to see the name of that affluent man in Bombay who is selling his little girls and comes to America for his vacations. We want to see his name. We want to see the prosecutions of these people who are going to die of old age, who have been prosecuted for selling these girls into other countries. We want to see that if you're going to get a passing grade next time.

Now, I know that this is very difficult to address but I also would like to have the committee consider this issue very strongly. Any country that is tolerant of prostitution, regulates or causes to be legal prostitution, is a cover for the violation of the girls you just saw. Any reports you've seen, and I've been looking at a lot of them, as well as our experience in these countries, will tell you that where there is legalized prostitution, it's hard to tell who's legal and who isn't, and you can't tell the ages. And it's just a blanket of cover to use these children.

I would like you to encourage this administration and the trafficking office to rate next year on these two top issues. Do you have legalized prostitution? If you do, then you are not giving your best significant effort. Second, if you do not have prosecutions you are not giving a significant effort to eliminate prostitution -- or excuse me, trafficking.

With that, Mr. Chairman, I want to again thank you for everything that you've done and I want to say that we stand willing and able and anxious to be a part of the next report which I believe will hopefully be a much better report than the one that we just received. Thank you.

REP. C. SMITH: Thank you very much, Congresswoman Smith. And I just want to point out for the record, and I don't know if it's actually been implemented yet because the Justice Department is still in the process, but section 111 of our law did provide for significant sanctions against those who traffic -- the persons who traffic, inadmissibility to the United States and other kinds of actions that could be taken against those persons so that that person you mentioned in Bombay making that money off of these little girls couldn't come to the United States to vacation because of the sanctions that are in this statute.

MS. SMITH: Thank you, Mr. Chair.

REP. C. SMITH: But it needs to be implemented.

Ms. Poudel.

MS. MANJU POUDEL: Good afternoon, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee. Thank you for receiving me in your Congress.

My name is Manju Poudel and I am a director of the Daywalka Foundation, an American and Nepali NGO that has been researching and working to the -- on the problems of the girl trafficking in South Asia for several years. Still, I would like to explain about the human rights crisis that we've seen in Nepal and the danger it brings to the region. I hope you will forgive me if my English is not perfect, but I have come very far away and I do want to tell you some important things.

It is very difficult to say the exactly number of Nepalese girls who have been trafficked to the brothels in India, but most women's NGOs in Nepal agree it is about the 200,000. There is no trafficking problems in the world bigger than Nepal and India. One in 10 Nepalese girls live in these terrible conditions in the brothels of India. Each one at risk of HIV. One in 10, this is equivalent to 10,000 girls from just one major American city like Washington.

What does this look like? Why do small communities make such terrible choices and send their daughters away? First we must see the village. In my fieldwork I have visited many remote areas of Nepal's very poor population of 23 million, and too often it is the same. Great poverty and a male dominated society keeps this problem going. I have walked all day through one village in search of girls, only to find none. I have visited with one family who sold four daughters.

One victim girl of many I have met was named Nita. She was trafficked from Eastern Nepal from an extremely poor family in a town called Melumchi. Nita was one of the first girls I interviewed in my research. Nita refused to cooperate with her brothel owners. She received a very harsh treatment, torture of her genitals, burning and -- I'm sorry -- burning and very bad beating, but she never gave in. She was eventually sold and resold to eight different brothels. Nita told me, "I never respect my customers and never cooperated with them." Nita also told me, "I got sick and it took a long time to get -- recover, and the sickness repeated. After the brothel owners found I have HIV they sent me back home with AIDS as a present."

Nita spent some time in a rehabilitation center in Katmandu, but soon she was too sick to continue her training and daily chores. In the end, after a year, she returned to her village where I saw her one last time. As I came down the hill I saw her standing in front of her house. She wore a torn blouse without money for a sari -- sari means like me. Her body had swelled up, she had the most big rashes, her illness was getting worse and she was dying alone, and she had one mother -- she also left alone in her last days.

Unfortunately, it is not only the hundreds of thousands of Nepalese girls who will suffer. The consequence of an epidemic for all of Asia are beyond imagination. Lately, the girls trafficking is a primary cause of what could be an AIDS epidemic in Asia in the next 10 years. As we know, Nepal is located as a crossroad between the two largest countries in the world, India and China. Countries which are the major trading partners with the United States. Countries which are nuclear rivals. Along with an AIDS epidemic comes the collapse of health care infrastructure, and with that the collapse of economies and then regional instability.

In all of this darkness there is some hope. Slavery once existed in your country for 300 years and no one thought it might one day be ended but it was. The United States can assist us in our anti- trafficking efforts by helping our local NGOs to keep working.

Thank you for inviting me to testify. I have two young daughters myself and I grew up in a Nepalese hill village. It can be Heaven on Earth. Please, help us find a way back. Thank you.

REP. C. SMITH: Ms. Poudel, thank you, very much, for your testimony and we do very much appreciate it.

Professor Hughes.

MS. DONNA HUGHES: Thank you for this invitation to speak before the committee. It's got to be tough following these three powerful previous testimonies but I'll see what I can do.

As you all know, the trafficking of persons is a modern day atrocity that we should take every opportunity to abolish. The Trafficking Victims Protection Act criminalized severe forms of trafficking for commercial sex acts and forced labor. These are two distinct crimes with different impact of the victims. Those are serious and all efforts should be made to combat those forms of trafficking in persons.

Today, my comments will focus on trafficking for commercial sex acts. The trafficking process begins with the demand for victims to be used in prostitution. Countries with legal or widely tolerated prostitution creates a demand in other destination countries. While countries where traffickers easily recruit victims are the sending countries. Unless compelled by poverty, past trauma or substance addiction, few women will voluntarily engage in prostitution.

Where insufficient numbers of local women can be recruited, brothel owners and pimps place orders with traffickers for the number of women and children they need. In destination countries, pimps organize crime groups, corrupt officials and even governments, devise strategies to protect the profits derived from the sale of women and children which depends on maintaining the flow of foreign women to the brothels.

It's this flow of victims that the Trafficking Act aims to stop. The Trafficking in Persons Report is a tool to evaluate countries in the world on their efforts to combat trafficking. It's a powerful tool to hold countries accountable for the trade of women and children that goes on within their borders. Consequently, it should be used wisely and vigorously.

The 2002 TIP Report has been widely criticized. I believe this universal criticism is the result of two major deficiencies in the report. First, the efforts to combat trafficking that a country had to make were pathetically low. Supposedly the prosecution of traffickers was the heaviest weighted factor in determining peer placement, yet there are countries on Tier 2 and even Tier 1 that have imprisoned few if any traffickers. Even in countries where there are more convictions, there's little evidence that they have been sufficient to stem the tide of trafficking of thousands of victims.

Second, the TIP Report fails because of a lack of comprehension of demand factors that cause trafficking for the sex trade. Ambassador Ely-Raphel has said that the TIP Report team did not consider prostitution or the demand for trafficking victims in their evaluation of countries. Trafficking is a modern form of slavery. To not understand the relationship between prostitution and trafficking is like not understanding the relationship between slavery in the old South and the kidnapping of victims in Africa and the Trans-Atlantic shipment of them to our shores. Ambassador Ely-Raphel has said that the connection between legalized prostitution and trafficking is only anecdotal. I believe that view is either naive or a lack of political will to face up to what the trafficking and the sex trade is all about. There is a connection between prostitution and trafficking. In this brief oral testimony, I do not have time to review all the statistics I have. I refer you to the written text which I have submitted.

There are destination spots in every region of the world. To make my point I'm going to focus on the countries of Europe. First, they're popular destination countries. And second, most of them are ranked on Tier 1, meaning the trafficking office judged that they fully complied with the Trafficking Act minimum standards.

In the brothels of Europe, foreign women make up a significant portion and in most cases the majority of women in prostitution. In the last two years, two European countries, both with a significant trafficking problem, legalized prostitution, pimping and brothel keeping.

In the case of the Netherlands, women in prostitution come from 32 different countries. There are few Dutch women in the brothels. One year after legalization of prostitution in brothels, the traffickers control 50 percent of the women. The situation is similar in Germany where there are an estimated 400,000 women in prostitution. Seventy-five percent of those women come from other countries.

Tolerance and legalization of sex industries also leads to an increase in child prostitution. In the last five years, the number of children in prostitution in the Netherlands increased from 4,000 to 15,000, a 400 percent increase, yet the Netherlands is placed on Tier 1 in the TIP Report. Increasing the demand for women in prostitution violates the criteria set out in the Trafficking Act that governments should adopt measures to prevent trafficking.

The 2002 TIP Report profoundly fails to grasp the scope, magnitude and causal factors of trafficking and what efforts are needed to hold countries accountable for the complicity and the trafficking. The trafficking of women and children for prostitution will decrease when two things happen: one, there are sufficient arrests and convictions with sentences commensurate with the severity of the crime to deter traffickers and corrupt officials from engaging and the buying and selling of victims. And two, there's a reduction in the demand for women and children to be used in prostitution.

Those two crucial factors are missing in the evaluation and ranking of countries in this year's TIP Report. This report is a lost opportunity to render assistance to millions of victims who have no one to speak on their behalf. It's a missed leadership opportunity to advance human rights for women and children in the world. We need a TIP office that is led by people with the insights, vision and courage to take a stand against the trafficking of women and children who aren't afraid to name the brutal violence for what it is and not flinch at holding the perpetrators accountable.

Members of this committee, I ask you to use the power invested in you to ensure that the Trafficking Victims Protection Act is implemented as intended, so that the victims of the global sex trade are freed from bondage and new victims are not recruited to replace them.

REP. C. SMITH: Ms. Hughes, thank you, very much, for that very powerful statement and we will weigh each of your comments and I think you made a number of important contributions. The idea that the conditions and penalties need to be commensurate with the crime that's committed at least for our legislation for the United States, we looked at our own law, found that it was incredibly infirm and had no real teeth which is why we provide 20 years to life for the commission of these crimes by either harboring, transporting or the final end game exploitation of the women. It seems to me that as we look at other countries, we ought to use that as the prism through which we look and say, how serious do you take it? Is it the equivalent of rape or not? Is it the equivalent of what we would consider slavery, which it is, or not? So I think your points were very well taken and we thank you for it.

Ms. Burkhalter.

MS. HOLLY BURKHALTER: Thank you, Chairman Smith, for having me, I appreciate being here and I will not take too much time since the preceding testimony has been so thorough and so excellent.

I was asked by the committee staff to comment on the TIP Report and I'm glad to do so from an advantage point of about two decades of working on conditionality of one type or another. We've worked together on many human rights conditions on different parcels of foreign aid over the years so I do have a perspective.

But I wanted to begin by saying that my irritation over particularly the inclusion of Thailand and India in the second tier, I think persuaded me to write a sentence or two in the written testimony that is intemperate and I would not want the record to be left with any lack of appreciation, for not only the enormous changes that this law has effected in the world in the area of protection of victims, prevention of the crime, et cetera. It is one of the most extraordinary pieces of human rights legislation I've ever seen. Maybe the most -- and I also don't want to in any way disregard the extraordinary work done by my friends at the State Department in the trafficking office. So my criticism of the TIP Report should be also tempered with those initial remarks.

Mr. Chairman, these days I'm working almost full time on the global AIDS epidemic, representing many, many American doctors and nurses who are concerned about the epidemic. And I know of no way that the epidemic can be checked and stopped, what with 65 million infections over the last 20 years and hundreds of thousands of new infections every year with India and China, the second wave, with Africa just dying as we watch.

But I will tell you that it should be possible to protect the youngest victims of HIV/AIDS and that would be children around the world who are trafficked into prostitution. I note that UNICEF estimates that there may be as many as 2 million additional children induced into, or forced into prostitution every year. Now that's millions of victims that shouldn't be there and can be helped. They are now being subjected, in addition to crimes that are life and soul destroying in and of themselves, a death sentence within a matter of years because of HIV/AIDS.

They are victims of violent transmission of AIDS and those crimes against them must be stopped and can be. But I only know of one way and that of, is to prosecute or otherwise discipline, convict, administratively punish, persons involved in the trade. And I don't need to amplify Gary's spectacularly good testimony. He's been my tutor on this subject.

So I'd like to look at the State Department reporting with regard to accountability. Secretary Dobriansky, who is a great friend of the human rights community and of myself and my colleagues at PHR, admitted that she weighed equally, and I think if I heard her correctly, she said she evaluated equally three factors in determining placement on the three tiers. She evaluated equally prevention, protection and prosecution. I don't understand why they are taking that stance in terms of evaluating placement, when I think the act makes it pretty clear that prosecution is your first consideration.

The first four of the standards listed in section 104 in the reporting requirement all relate to accountability and in the minimum standards, the first -- all of them relate to accountability and under criteria of serious and sustained efforts, the very first indicator is investigation, prosecution and conviction. So I would encourage the administration not to give equal weight to all three important features of determining a government's alacrity with regard to trafficking and elevate, as you did, the office of the law -- elevate the issue of accountability.

How can we do this? There was a long and interesting discussion about data collection. A topic I'm very interested in because I know how hard it is to collect data. We at Physicians for Human Rights use some very interesting data collection tools, using public health surveys to get at health data and human rights data in large populations. But it seems to me, as Gary mentioned, the people who can give you the data about prosecutions and convictions and administrative punishments are the governments themselves and if they refuse to do so, or fail to do so, that alone should be a reason not to include them in the first two tiers. Withholding the information or being unable to produce the information in an of itself, shows that a government is simply not engaged in even asking local officials what they're doing with regard to prosecution.

If one can imagine, for example, if government officials were to query local officials who don't get any rewards whatsoever for proper policing. There's no rewards and no promotions for providing police protection to the poor in this world. And if it becomes of interest to do so, then one can imagine a policeman being able to try to swim against the tide. The tide of corruption, the tide of low pay, you know, the tide of indifference and injustice against the poor everywhere, if there were a reason to. Well, this report gives them a reason to. If their own higher ups are demanding the data, well how many are there? You can imagine the very asking of that question might cause a few people to scurry around and it wouldn't take thousands of prosecutions. It might just take a dozen for goodness sake. We're not asking governments to prosecute everyone involved or every corrupt official. Just enough to catch the attention of others who will modulate their activities accordingly.

So I think that -- what was your data collection is actually the kind of key here in terms of using the report alone, never mind all the other really marvelous features of this law that provide help for the victims and assistance to governments of goodwill who are trying to do the right thing. I really think if governments are holding out on data, they themselves are not engaging in a key way of getting at the crime and getting at the -- stopping the crime, which is why we're all here at the table.

So I would think that the law should -- given the goodwill in the executive branch on this issue, I can't imagine that the law would actually have to be amended since it's a model of clarity as it is. But if it should have to be amended or if there were follow up conversation between the members and the bureau and the deputy secretary, perhaps this issue of requiring that data be produced by governments that don't expect to get a failing grade, would be one way to go about it.

A couple of very other tiny suggestions then I will stop and let everybody go home after a long, though unusually important hearing I would say. You know, I remember, and you'll see some of this reflected in my testimony, the various efforts we made, frequently together, over the years to try to use the leverage of foreign aid to make change. What were the successful ones and what were the unsuccessful ones? Well, we need a couple of hours for that and I know you would probably like to stay that long but the rest of the group would not.

So I will take you down memory lane about 20 years but I would direct your attention to the nuns case in El Salvador. A case of high importance to every member of this body and to our government, because four American churchwomen were raped and butchered by national policemen and other security officials in El Salvador in 1981. They just wouldn't prosecute that case because it implicated higher ups. And finally, Congress which was willing -- the majority in Congress were willing to provide continued large amounts of military aid, simply said a portion of this is going to be held back until we get a conviction in that case. And by golly, they did.

They held back -- I can't even remember the numbers any more, I want to say 25 percent, but it's been a long time. It doesn't actually matter what percentage or what chunk -- but there was this notion of we don't want to stop all of your foreign aid. And by the way, I have no problem stopping military aid but I'm not a proponent of holding back humanitarian aid or other poverty alleviation assistance, and I know you've sheltered that in your bill, quite appropriately.

But there was this kind of, put this money in escrow, till we see something here. But you might want to think about, in terms of providing a little encouragement to those that do take the -- gather the political and the -- what's necessary to prosecute these crimes. And if they could get a little assistance after they do that, or maybe hold back some of the assistance they otherwise would have gotten, it would be a way to go about this.

I might also add, just back in terms of rewarding good behavior. Another reason for including the data in this report, is that because there are so few rewards for doing the right thing in corrupt judicial systems and very poor judicial systems, you know this is one way to lift up and highlight and reward good example. You know, you can simply name the cases where a police jurisdiction was cooperative in an investigation, or a bust or a raid, or a liberation and name the brave magistrates who took these cases to trial, and it would be something that lifts them up above their colleagues and could even -- particularly if there could be resources associated with doing that good work. You know, I have no objection whatsoever to providing police and judicial assistance to governments of goodwill really trying, that need a little help. And I would envision doing that, to reward precisely those jurisdictions that are making a good effort. And then that sort of enhances the respectability and the value and the -- well, I've gone on too long.

In closing, I would just direct your attention to seven recommendations for donors with regard to the global AIDS epidemic and violent transmission of HIV/AIDS through rape and sexual violence.

It's an issue that the donors are largely not taking into account, but they lie at the heart of the spread of the pandemic, and I simply offer them for your consideration. Thank you very much.

REP. C. SMITH: Ms. Burkhalter, thank you very much for your testimony and your fine work. You mentioned El Salvador and you worked on that when you were here, those -- that conditionality. I'll never forget 1984 when I was in El Salvador meeting with our ambassador, Ambassador Core(ph), but more importantly with President Duarte, and I asked him what he thought about the human rights conditions on the aid to El Salvador. And he looked at me and he said "Keep them. It helps me within my own government."

So just like the men's case -- I mean, there are bad actors even in a government that -- I think he made a good faith effort to provide a good government. Some may disagree. But he wanted those human rights conditions and said so very candidly. And while we fight Democrat and Republic administrations who always say, no, that is counterproductive, I think 99.9 percent of the time it is very productive. Just like the naming of names in this legislation. This legislation was almost defeated and it would have been defeated by killing it in committee or killing it and never getting it onto the floor because we insisted on naming names. Thankfully, it was done in a bipartisan way so we had actors on both sides of the aisle pulling on the oar, and that's very important.

I do have a couple of questions, not many because your testimonies collectively have been thoroughly comprehensive. Frontline NGOs like Congresswoman Smith, what kind of risks do you, your workers and the women and girls themselves take? I mean, obviously there has to be a retaliation factor. And how do you encourage the governments -- and we do this -- I do it every -- every parliamentarian I meet, every government official I talk to, I bring up not just the women and trafficking and the idea of trading them as victims, but also this issue of retaliation against the NGOs and the frontliners who are out there. We know that, for example, in Russia, in St Petersburg in meeting with some of the NGOs that do business there, they have been threatened. They have been told that -- you know, the women themselves get threatened, their families get threatened, but also those brave souls who step up to plate to protect the women who get threatened.

What about your experience, Ms. Smith? And perhaps Gary or some of the others might want to touch on that as well.

MS. SMITH: I don't call myself an authority on anything, Representative Smith, because I don't think four years gives us that. We have had some experiences where we have lost girls that have decided that they're going to go back in and tell other girls that there's a place, there's a safe house. We've had one moved. As we get larger, we are Teen Challenge International in Bombay and we were just written up as being the largest NGO in that area, under Teen Challenge. We're less likely to be touched when there's more visibility.

I think, though, that we have to remember that we do put those are working with us in jeopardy if we're not careful. We can do things in some of these countries and we have and after four years there's some things we've done that I am proud of, and some that I wouldn't do again. But we do believe they're still there and as long as there's police corruption making money at the lower levels, and the upper levels of India are saying "Well, we don't have good coordination" we have very bad cover at the lower levels and our people are in danger. And so I think the important thing that I heard today from the under secretary was this: there is not a good coordination in India between the higher levels and the different jurisdictions. Then they need to have one. And they need to have prosecutions of lower level officials, and higher level officials, to understand that retaliating against people that are abiding trafficking is an offence, and it will give us some cover. But right now, we just know that we take risks, and they're worth the risk.

MR. HAUGEN: I would just add that, as everyone knows in a society, the scariest thing is a police that's on the wrong side. And that we feel most exposed, most vulnerable, when we sense that the police are part of perpetrating the crimes. But the police, as scary as they seem, are very accountable to their political superiors. And they will respond to what the priorities are, the political superiors, about what it is they are required to report on.

And it would significantly change our sense of protection out in the field to know that the very highest authorities in the land were sending the message all the way down to the street level police, that I want to know whether police are getting dismissed from complicity with these crimes, and I want to see whether or not you are collecting evidence and prosecuting in such a way that you actually convict someone.

A lot of our girls that we interact with in the brothels in some of these police raids are very reluctant to come out, because they are totally scared of the police. Now, we will go on police raids and bring the police with us, usually with a secure group of police that we've worked with before and we can trust. But many times, the girls will see in that police party, girls that have been visiting -- I mean, police that have been visiting the brothel, and protecting the brothel, they do do raids, but it's usually just for the purpose of extorting more money out of the brothel keepers.

But what will change that? When the idea that the police are in a chain of command, understand that the bosses up top want to see prosecutions succeed, and they want to see dirty police dismissed.

REP. C. SMITH: Yes, Ms. Poudel.

MS. POUDEL: My opinion is a little different. I think it's -- in my country, I don't know like the international sectors. In my country is very poor nutrition and people is not educated in their -- that's why we need -- like most important is education. And if it stop that one -- first of all we go to the very root area, not like a police. And they say first we go to the root area, where the girls come from, the village. We have to stop it at that point. And we have to give them the, like, education and some economic resources like training or income generating programs, like that.

REP. C. SMITH: I am just thinking aloud, but -- and I'd appreciate your thoughts on this. When we began looking, as a committee, we had some seven hearings on it, the issue in Northern Ireland. One of the issues that jumped out, it wasn't just the extremism on the part of the IRA or the other paramilitaries on the -- whether it be the loyalist side, or either side of that conflict, it was the policing, and the collusion that we found, and the corruption, in the police department that was aiding and abetting and creating a climate where this impunity could continue.

Perhaps we need a new initiative. And you've already said it in so many words, in the area of policing. I mean, put the heavy emphasis on the prime ministers, the parliamentarians, and everybody in between, the attorneys general, but focus as well on police as being the point of contact, and the point of corruption, that facilitates these horrendous crimes.

I know for a fact that we do train a number of police, there are all kinds of collaborative efforts between the U.S. and other police departments. As a matter of fact, one amendment I had relative to Northern Ireland, was that there could be no more training of the RUC, the Royal Ulster Constabulary, from Northern Ireland at Quantico unless they were vetted, and properly vetted, to make sure that they were not in collusion with a terrorist.

Perhaps we need to look at an initiative on police, and use every venue imaginable, because there's an interface on an ongoing base stream, New York police, and everyone else, with regard to this issue to try to get at it, and make this another avenue of attack, and certainly reporting on the number of police who have been held to account at the barest minimum, to begin to get a handle on just how large in scope this is, and as you indicated.

MR. HAUGEN: If I can just comment, Mr. Chairman. There is no way to combat trafficking that leaves out the police. The brothel keepers and the traffickers care about one thing: money, and whether they'll go to jail. Whether they go to jail depends upon whether or not the police in the street is on his side or not. So, the great problem now is the police, but the great hope is the police. And whenever we rescue girls out of forced prostitution on raids, we do it with police. You can't do it without police.

And so they are, in fact, the great hope. And there are wonderful ways to radically change the way police do their job. Here in America 100 years ago, in an urban setting, the police were thoroughly corrupt, thoroughly protective of forced prostitution within our own country.

There were steps that were taken to improve that. And we are continually trying to do that. But it's not all dark and dreary. There can be drastic change by addressing the police.

REP. C. SMITH: Frankly, are we doing that? Isn't the U.S. State Department and other agencies of the U.S. Government promoting that?

MR. HAUGEN: I would just say that, right now, from the countries that we work in, the priority of dealing with sex trafficking has not been communicated down to the police. And this is part of one of the questions I would want to ask Secretary Dobriansky. Where in the government are you interfacing? Because if your meeting is with the commissioner of Women's Affairs or something, someone within the government or someone who is most likely to be sympathetic, you're going to get very earnest responses. But the question is, are you meeting with the people who are -- the general in charge of the police in the country? Do you have commitments from him? Does he have a sense of understanding that he understands his police force is riddled with people who are making off this? What is the point of interface? And as far as I know, there perhaps has not been a strong or direct interface with police and military who, in these countries, controls who goes to jail.

REP. C. SMITH: Anyone else like to comment on that?

MS. BURKHALTER: The only addition is that you don't want to forget about customs officials and immigration officials in terms of complicity particularly when you're talking about people moving across borders. My testimony focused on child rape, child prostitution. But in terms of bringing people in and out of sovereign nations, the role of your customs and your immigration and your border patrol and your border police, oftentimes military forces play that role in countries, particularly those that are in conflict or newly out of conflict. So, don't forget the interface with them, particularly when you're talking about the movement of people.

I was thinking just for a moment about another issue I was much involved with last year: conflict diamonds. It's pretty hard to find a way to monitor conflict diamonds coming across a border. They are little and they are valuable and you can put a whole bunch of dollars' worth of them into your mouth. Transporting people across the border, on the other hand, is a little different. You know, they are pretty visible and thus you have to have official complicity for this to really go on without interference.

MR. HAUGEN: Can I just add one word on the minute -- sorry.

MS. BURKHALTER: Please.

MR. HAUGEN: Just that police are maybe 75 percent of it. The extra 25 percent of getting to the goal line is the prosecutors and the courts who actually need to convict. And so, there's a tremendous role of the U.S. government being able to assist either through its own resources or through NGOs hands-on training of prosecutors and courts. Because we're in countries where they've never done this successfully. So there, they're dealing with it for the first time, they go find a friend who's done this before and figure out how to do it. In these countries, they don't have that person to go to. And so, there's a significant need for training of prosecutors in the courts, in a hands-on practical way.

REP. C. SMITH: As you know, Mr. Haugen, again the legislation that we have contemplated at least some of that, providing an authorization for $10 million for that kind of program in other countries. So I would hope that we would fully implement it. We've got to get a better accounting as to how that money is being spent.

MR. HAUGEN: Maybe we need more.

REP. C. SMITH: Yes, Ms. Hughes. Professor Hughes.

MS. HUGHES: Yes, I would just say that I would agree with that. In my experience, in Ukraine, although certainly there are some very good police officers who really want to do the right thing, the majority of them that I interviewed really thought there wasn't a problem at all trafficking of women and had many excuses to either blame the victim or say the problem simply didn't exist. In one particular case, I went with my research partner to a nightclub which was known to have under-age girls performing sex acts there and was a site of recruitment by traffickers. The owner came and sat down and had dinner with us and then the regional prosecutor joined us as well as his best friend. So that showed us right there that there really was not going to be much action taken against what was happening in that night-club.

REP. C. SMITH: Yes, Ms. Poudel.

MS. POUDEL: In my experience, we have like open border with India and Nepal and police also, our government also with police, they try to stop the Date(ph) soldiers. Police also involving working with the anti-trafficking. But they cannot every day passing across border to the guards because the broker, they came, they say this is my wife, she is sick. My sister, she's sick. We are going to visit in India somebody, like this. It cannot be stopped. That means in my country we need like education, like a health assistant to go to the village and you know, around this program like that. This is my experience. But ours is a open border.

MS. SMITH: Mr. Chairman?

REP. C. SMITH: Yes.

MS. SMITH: I had two things that I did want to address. They are now a little beyond the time where they were addressed. One, the RFP. Last year, the funding for this bill was an extensive focus of Shared Hope International and the World Trafficking Alliance and we spent all year trying to make sure that the money was appropriated, working with Chairman Wolf's office extensively. And we were pleased with what came through. My concern is that money is not being distributed. The RFP from the State Department, Justice Department and others, the money is still there and has -- I know they're working and thinking we need the training the International Justice Mission could do. I mean they did a great job, they're in places we are and why aren't they training the policemen? I come back home and I find out there's $2 million sitting there waiting for a bureaucracy to give it out. And I guess it is bothering me a little bit. If I were a member, I think I would be knocking on the doors and I would imagine you are.

We need to get that money out there to credible groups that are doing the work, not just to ones that will talk about it. It appears what's been happening with money is often it's been at the level of the ambassador level. And they pass out condoms in some places. They do things. But I don't see any real strong programming. I'd like this committee to please take a look at those RFPs, get the money out to groups like IJM. We don't have an RFP so I can say this.

The other thing that I would like to bring to your attention is I'm very concerned about that Korean incident with the military, but not so much the military as I was with the issue of the airport. If they were lining the woman that were coming off the airplane at the airport along the side to be sold at auction, somebody had to be involved in that. Immigration officials, Korean officials. It's an airport. It's an international airport and it appears that it was done publicly and in front of everyone. Why was Korea given a number one rating when they have an airport that has public auctions of women at the airport?

I think that's is a very serious issue of omission on the State Department's problem -- side. But also I think that the issue of Korea needs to be visited. When I saw that tape, and I just saw it in your office, I was not -- the issue of our American military is very serious. But the bigger issue to me was they take them aside, line them up at the airport and then auction them. Now, tell me that that isn't visible. So I think that we've got a real, real issue with our officials accepting this because we're very visible in the airports in these countries and we have officials there also that had to have known it besides the military.

REP. C. SMITH: I appreciate you bringing that up. We will get to the bottom of that. I mean, the request that we've made of Donald Rumsfeld, the Secretary of Defense, still has not been answered.

Earlier today, Secretary Dobriensky, I think it was who said that a letter will be forthcoming -- or maybe it was the ambassador -- to us, explaining it. But orders need to be issued, cut immediately if they are not already out there on an absolute cessation and even a prosecution to the fullest extent of Korean law or any other breached military order -- code of conduct breaches, to ensure that those who have committed these crimes -- I mean, on the tape, as you saw I'm sure, a member of the military police acting as a courtesy patrol, talking about how this is standard operating procedure. The passport is taken away, these women are held in captivity and then are offered --

MS. SMITH: And lined up at the airport. You know, Chris -- excuse me, Chairman, what bothered me about that whole thing was this: it was very clear everyone knew. But also what bothered me was the statement earlier today where she said, "We'll issue a letter on it." Today, right now, as you and I are sitting here, women are being auctioned and they are talking about issuing letters. So I guess it's a concern to me that they act quicker than issuing a letter.

REP. C. SMITH: You know, in all candor, we have -- one of the reasons why we had the implementation hearing last fall was that we were unhappy with the pace of implementation. Of course, 9/11 -- and Mr. Pitt did ask a question about that, whether or not the war on terror had a chilling effect or caused us to operate at less than optimum speed on this. The TB's (ph) still have not been issued, or the final regs -- I understand are on final approach here, but they should have been issued much sooner so that women could garner the protections as envisioned by the law. So hopefully this goes a little faster now. You know, we've been through this now the second time. I mention -- and I would encourage all of you as very, very influential and knowledgeable non-government organizations and individuals to encourage the department to issue interim reports. I mean this isn't something that just shouldn't come around every year like the country reports on human rights practices, which is a very good document, but information as it becomes available, particularly when it becomes available in a way that is compelling either way, ought to be issued as a report as envisioned by the statute.

For example, much has been stated about Thailand and India and Vietnam. Hopefully the department will go back and get out the documentation and have a second look at that. You know, this is not frivolous criticism. This is very constructive criticism by people who care deeply and have sacrificed their time and their lives working on these issues. So I, you know -- there are members of the department here I hope they would re-look at those countries with an eye towards a revision and a revision would be towards Tier 3 based on the documents and based on the documentation, as you'd say.

Looking at that -- those tapes both of you have provided and others that I've seen as well, it just absolutely breaks your heart. And to see the cop getting his cut, Gary, is very disturbing.

Let me just ask Ms. Burkhalter. You mentioned the UNICEF numbers, I think it was two million children, that are unfortunately put into this terrible exploitation. In terms of the AIDS transmission, are there any numbers of how many of these children are getting AIDS or other STDs, but especially AIDS.

MS. BURKHALTER: No. To my knowledge no one has done a kind of public health data collection on its prevalence among child prostitutes and to be honest with you that would be a very difficult -- ethically speaking, that would be a very difficult study to do because those children are torture victims and to take data about their situation while they're there is something I think health professionals have a lot of difficulty doing. But I think we can assume that anybody in prostitution is -- has a very good chance of getting AIDS.

I can't tell you what that chance is but just to give you a sense about the exponential spread, we were looking at -- we had a report on child prostitution, PHR, Physicians for Human Rights on child prostitution in Cambodia in 1997, which is the early, you know, it's the forward end of the AIDS epidemic and prevalence among prostitution -- among prostitutes of AIDS problems, went from like you know 11 percent to 35 percent in a couple of years. And so the -- when you consider that the CIA is estimating that the entire number of cases of AIDS in Africa are going to double by the year 2005-'06 just because of prevalence in Nigeria and Ethiopia alone, you can see that people who are having non consensual sex 20 or 25 times a day or six or 10 times a day, are going to be very vulnerable to AIDS. And as you know, women are much more likely to be infected through sexual transmission of AIDS than men, which is partly just physiological, which is part of the reason why prevalence is higher among women.

But I would also say that the technical responses of female condoms and microbicides as helpful as they would be for men and women to be able to use them for a choice or for women to have -- this does not get at women who have no choice, none whatsoever. In terms of determining the terms of reference prevention education -- AIDS prevention education and strategies particularly insisting upon cleanliness are -- cannot help those least able to negotiate the terms of reference. That applies by the way to many married women as well in Africa and Asia. But particularly vulnerable, more vulnerable than any I would think, are children in the sex trade who have no possibility of negotiating condom use that could save their lives.

REP. C. SMITH: Yes, Professor Hughes.

MS. HUGHES: I can give you some information that I just got from Steve Cook who is the International Organization for Migration representative for Ukraine and Moldova and they're assisting about 50 victims returning each month and he said 100 percent of them have sexually transmitted diseases. He didn't say what percentage of that was HIV but 100 percent some type of sexually transmitted infection.

REP. C. SMITH: Are there any other comments any of you would like to make before we conclude the hearing?

MR. HAUGEN: I, on behalf of the International Justice Mission, would like to echo Holly Burkhalter's comments about our commitment to engage constructively with the State Department in this. We appreciate the way Secretary Dobriansky has had an open door for us. We feel like it's been a constructive give and take. Sometimes we're giving, obviously on a critical way but we felt like there's been an open door to that and that this is something that can get better and for the International Justice Mission's part, I just want to say for the record that we've appreciated that very much.

MS. SMITH: Mr. Chair, I would that I think that the relationship especially with the ambassador -- excuse me, with Paula Dobri-ansky, is a very open door. Not that the other levels aren't, it's just, it's been an office in making that she has put together. She is -- I was a part of forming the summit idea last year of having a summit, a world summit right here in Washington D.C. and worked with Chairman Wolf on getting that funded and now the world alliance, of which International Justice Mission, Shared Hope International, Johns Hopkins University, Protection Project and Salvation Army are the leaders. We are in cooperation with them in forming a summit where we can bring these people together who have not been able to be anywhere other than in isolation in their own countries. The real people that are doing the work.

And if there's any criticism I've had, it has been often we get these reports and they come from ambassador level and that level really doesn't have a clue what's going on. And so our reports are insufficient because of that. And we believe that the World Summit, in cooperation with the State Department, will be able to bring together greater knowledge and also better reporting, and a more openness in reporting because of these groups will not tell us anything as well as not their government because they are frightened of what will happen to them.

So we believe this will shine light on the issue and the State Department and -- what is her title, Under Secretary Paula Dobri-ansky, has been a leader in that. So we're looking forward, all of us, to working with them and have a meeting tomorrow to bring this effort forward.

REP. C. SMITH: Yes, Professor Hughes.

MS. HUGHES: I would just like to second that about Paula Dobri-ansky's office. I've met with her on a couple of occasions. She and her staff have been very open for comment.

REP. C. SMITH: Let me conclude just by reminding us that the Foreign Office Appropriations Bill, I mean, Mr. Walter's been very, I think, generous with his part but last year I offered the amendment to provide $30 million to fully fund the sections that are in the Foreign Ops part. That is to say, you know, the shelters that are overseas, assisting countries overseas in the development of their laws and policies. It passed unanimously. I don't think there was a single vote against it, 400 and something to zero. It got up to conference and we lost a third of that funding and part of the idea coming from the professional staff at the Foreign Ops Committee and others, was that they can't absorb this money.
And I said that's why we designed the legislation and that's what we want you to think about new initiatives. And again we'll have another fight with this on the floor and they'll probably say, oh, we only need 20 million not 30 or something along those lines.

I encourage you to be in touch with the appropriators, particularly the chairman and the ranking member to fully fund the authorized levels and to exceed it, get a waiver and exceed it. I mean, it seems to me that we could be building shelters until the cows come home and we will not have enough shelters to help those women who are in need of rescue. So it's -- I just encourage you to help us on that as we go forward.

The hearing's adjourned. Thank you very much.

(Adjourn)

END

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2002

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

WITNESSES: PAULA DOBRIANSKY, UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR GLOBAL AFFAIRS, UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF STATE;

DONNA M. HUGHES, PROFESSOR AND ELEANOR M. AND OSCAR M. CARLSON ENDOWED CHAIR IN WOMEN'S STUDIES, UNIVERSITY OF RHODE ISLAND;

HOLLY BURKHALTER, ADVOCACY DIRECTOR, PHYSICIANS FOR HUMAN RIGHTS;
GARY A. HAUGEN, PRESIDENT AND CEO, INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE MISSION;
LINDA SMITH, FOUNDER AND EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR, SHARED HOPE INTERNATIONAL;
MANJU POUDEL, FOUNDING MEMBER, THE DAYWALKA FOUNDATION

TYPE: Washington-dateline general news.

Copyright 2002 Federal News Service, Inc.

326 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Federal Document Clearing House Congressional Testimony

June 19, 2002 Wednesday

HUMAN TRAFFICKING

SECTION: CAPITOL HILL HEARING TESTIMONYLENGTH: 637 words

Statement of Representative Henry Hyde

Committee on House International Relations

"Foreign Government Complicity in Human Trafficking: The State Department's 2002 Trafficking in Persons Report"

June 19, 2002

I am pleased to convene this hearing, which is the second in a series of hearings being held by the House Committee on International Relations on implementation of the Smith-Gejdensen Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000.

The Smith-Gejdensen Act provides a comprehensive plan for putting an end to modern-day slavery. A key component of this plan is the State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report. This report is intended to inform the President and the Congress about which foreign governments are making serious efforts to combat the most egregious forms of trafficking in persons ---- the buying and selling of women and children into the international sex industry, and the trafficking of men, women, and children alike into slavery and involuntary servitude --- and which governments are failing to make such efforts.

At today's hearing, the Committee will hear testimony on the State Department's second annual Trafficking in Persons Report. This year's report is particularly important because it is intended to serve as a final "wake-up call" to governments which are doing little or nothing to combat human trafficking. This is because the Trafficking Victims Protection Act contemplates that the United States will withdraw nonhumanitarian aid from governments which remain on the "Tier Three" list after next year's report. The "Tier Three" governments are those that not only fail to meet minimum international standards for combatting human trafficking, but who are not even making serious efforts to bring themselves into compliance with these standards.

In addition to providing an overview of the state of the war against human trafficking and a general assessment of the Trafficking in Persons Report, I hope our witnesses will address one question in particular. The Trafficking Victims Protection Act places particular emphasis on the need to take action against governments that not only tolerate human trafficking, but are actively complicit in such trafficking through their agencies and officials. Both this year and last year, criticism of the report by human rights advocates and humanitarian organizations has singled out governments that are omitted from the Tier Three list even though they appear to give impunity to their own officials who participate in and profit from sex trafficking and slave trafficking. In some cases, the report acknowledges this problem, but finds nevertheless that the government has engaged in "significant efforts" to end trafficking. These efforts typically include co-sponsoring rehabilitation and training programs with international organizations, or perhaps prosecuting an occasional perpetrator.

This raises the question whether governments whose own agencies or officials are pervasively involved in human trafficking --- and who lack the political will to take the difficult measures that would be necessary to put an end to such involvement --- will nevertheless be able to avoid sanctions under the Trafficking Victims Protection Act. If so, what must be done to put an end to this impunity? Should the State Department reassess its standard for what constitutes "significant efforts" by a government whose officials or agencies are engaged in human trafficking? Or does the Act need to be amended in order to make clear that government complicity in sex trafficking and slave trafficking is simply unacceptable?

I look forward to hearing from our witnesses today, and I yield to the distinguished Ranking Member of the Committee, Representative Tom Lantos, for any opening remarks he may have.

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2002

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

COMMITTEE: HOUSE INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

TESTIMONY-BY: HENRY HYDE, REPRESENTATIVE

Copyright 2002 FDCHeMedia, Inc. All Rights Reserved.

327 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Federal Document Clearing House Congressional Testimony

June 19, 2002 Wednesday

HUMAN TRAFFICKING

SECTION: CAPITOL HILL HEARING TESTIMONYLENGTH: 1851 words

Statement of Under Secretary of State Paula Dobriansky

Before the House International Relations Committee

Combating Trafficking in Human Beings: An Overview of Current U.S. Policy and the Trafficking in Persons Report

June 19, 2002

Thank you for inviting me here today to discuss U.S. policy to combat trafficking in persons and the second annual Trafficking in Persons Report. Your strong leadership on this issue, first by passing the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 and then by focusing national attention on its implementation has been crucial. We look forward to continuing to work closely with Congress - as well as foreign governments and NGOs - toward eradicating this egregious human rights abuse and crime.

The annual Trafficking in Persons Report is an essential tool available to the U.S. Government for achieving this objective. As Secretary Powell has said, the "annual Trafficking in Persons Report shines a much-needed light on this global problem. We use the information we collect for the report to bolster the will of the international community to combat this unconscionable crime."

In accordance with the legislative mandate, foreign governments are judged on whether they comply with the minimum standards to eliminate trafficking in persons and are ranked in one of three tiers. These governments are judged on their actions, not on plans that are merely in progress. According to the statute's minimum standards, countries must treat victims as victims, not criminals; they must prosecute traffickers, recognizing that trafficking is a crime that must be punished with sentences commensurate for those of other grave crimes, such as sexual assault; and they must prevent trafficking, recognizing the importance of public education campaigns in not only urban but also rural areas.

Since the release of the first report, we have used its contents to engage aggressively with other countries about what more effective concrete steps they can take in the area of prevention, protection and prosecution. To that end, I have met personally with representatives from India, Cote d'Ivoire, Romania, South Korea and numerous other countries to discuss trafficking in persons. Ambassador Ely-Raphel and her team in the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons have met with representatives from more than two dozen countries -- some of them repeatedly. Our ambassadors and their staffs, as well as others in the Department, have also raised this issue numerous times with foreign government officials. These efforts have made a difference, and over the last year there were some improvements. At the same time, there was, disappointingly, regression and no change in a number of countries.

In preparing this year's report, our team undertook some new steps. They gathered information from 186 posts overseas, with input from Ministries of Foreign Affairs, Justice and Interior, as well as law enforcement, border officials, local NGOs, representatives of international organizations working in those countries, academics, and journalists. The Trafficking in Persons Report team also supplemented the information with assessments from the intelligence community. Moreover, in December 2001, the Trafficking in Persons Office invited 150 U.S. NGOs to submit information on trafficking in persons through a specially- established email address.

It's important to note that the Report goes beyond what is called for in the Act, which requires a listing of three tiers. Instead, we included brief country summaries, which are invaluable in identifying for foreign governments the areas in which they need to improve their efforts. Based on NGO input, we directed U.S. missions overseas to expand their information-gathering efforts to include specific inquiries about numbers of arrests, indictments and prosecutions, evidence of governmental involvement or corruption and what steps have been taken to deal with these circumstances. As a result, the report reflects our increased collection of data and consideration of the scope of the trafficking problem in many countries.

The report analyzes the actions of countries based on the determination of whether they were "a country of origin, transit or destination for a significant number of victims" of trafficking and whether they were meeting the minimum standards to eliminate severe forms of trafficking in persons, and, if not, whether they are making significant efforts to do so. Political considerations were not a factor in our assessments. Many of our friends and allies are on Tiers II and III. They simply do not comply with minimum standards.

The release of this year's report has already generated many responses from a number of countries on Tiers II and III, including Japan, Malaysia, Greece and Turkey. We are meeting with each to discuss the report and suggest concrete follow-up steps. In addition, throughout the year we work with foreign NGOs to obtain feedback on whether the report's descriptions ring true to their experiences working with trafficking victims. We also distribute and publicize the report within the United States to educate Americans about the global scope of trafficking in persons.

Just as the report has already elicited feedback from countries listed in the report, it has also generated considerable reaction among activists in this country, as well as Members of Congress. I appreciate - and indeed share - the fervor that so many people bring to this issue. Let there be no mistake about it: we are all in pursuit of the same goal, namely the eradication of trafficking once and for all. In response to some of the criticisms I have heard expressed since release of the report and in anticipation of some of your questions today, I wish to address some of the criticisms of the report.

First, I have heard people say that placement of certain countries on Tier II constitutes their receiving a "passing grade." The legislation calls for three lists. Countries that are in full compliance with the Act's minimum standards merit a Tier I ranking. Countries not yet in full compliance but making significant efforts are on Tier II. Countries neither meeting minimum standards nor making significant efforts to do so are placed on Tier III. Countries with some of the worst trafficking problems are also some of the countries making a significant effort to combat them. The two are not mutually exclusive.

There is no question that Tier III placement is for the worst offenders, but being listed on Tier II means that countries are not in full compliance. It's not a pass to be listed on Tier II. Countries do not like to be listed on either Tier II or III and have challenged our findings. Moreover, countries on Tier II do not want to run the risk of falling to Tier III next year and face sanctions, including the possible cutoffs of non-humanitarian aid.

Second, and related to this, is the fact that honest people can disagree on the tier placements of certain countries. Congress asked that we look at the "significant effort" that a country is making. What constitutes a significant effort as defined in the Act is something that people can discuss and analyze differently. No country - including our own - is doing enough as long as trafficking continues to exist. That said, progress in one country will look very different from progress in others - as circumstances are different and what can impact the situation may also be different. At the same time, in our diplomatic engagement, we will set a high bar for these countries and demand solid action, not rhetoric. This is an extremely complex issue in which numerous factors - law enforcement, judicial action, legislative action, women's and children's rights, protection, economic conditions, and social assistance - have a bearing on how effective a country is in dealing with the problem and how we can engage and pressure that country to make progress. Simply, in each case there is not just one defining issue. We recognize the complexity and will take a hard look at each country.

Lastly, some have criticized the report for lacking data. I'd like to assure you that we have made significant efforts to collect data, which we then factored into our decision-making. With a world estimate of between 700,000 and four million trafficking victims, this underground crime is not easy to pinpoint. Accumulating verifiable data is extremely difficult, even here in the United States. Statistics are important and we will continue to push our various sources on collection. But statistics are one part of what we are looking at. Action, or inaction, is the primary focus.

The report is one of many tools at our disposal to address this criminal activity, to shed light on the terrible problem of trafficking, and to crack down on traffickers. The report is most effective when combined with a comprehensive strategy of diplomacy and direct engagement with other governments, multilateral fora, public affairs, programmatic support and technical assistance. That is why we are moving forward on developing and implementing a comprehensive approach to dealing with this issue. We have taken other steps, which we believe reinforce the impact of the report. These include:

(1) The meeting of the President's Cabinet-level Interagency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, which established the Senior Policy Advisory Group of representatives from the various task force agencies. This Senior Policy Advisory Group has already undertaken two significant actions: the completion of the Overview of the Administration's Implementation of the Trafficking Victims' Protection Act and a review of our policy parameters.

(2) A comprehensive review of prospective programs with a view to having the greatest amount of influence on these problematic areas.

(3) Seeking to use every forum - bilateral, regional and global - to aggressively address the issue of trafficking in persons. Working closely with our partners to spotlight such egregious human rights abuses can only strengthen our hand in eradicating trafficking.

(4) Moving forward with the ratification process of the UN Protocol to Prevent, Suppress, and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, which supplements the UN Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime and was adopted by the UN General Assembly in November 2000. To date, the United States and 104 other countries have signed the Protocol.

(5) Educating the public about the issue, by expanding the section on trafficking in persons in our annual Country Reports on Human Rights Practices, which has contributed to our keeping the issue of trafficking in persons central in our discourse with other countries - particularly the offenders; and speaking at conferences and with the media.

In conclusion, let me reiterate that we want to continue to work vigorously with you, the NGOs and other governments to eradicate the often-hidden phenomenon of human bondage in modern-day society.

Thank you.

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2002

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

COMMITTEE: HOUSE INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

TESTIMONY-BY: PAULA DOBRIANSKY, UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE

328 of 359 DOCUMENTS

U.S. Newswire

June 19, 2002 Wednesday

UPDATE: Human Rights in Greece Subject of Commission Hearing; New Time & Witnesses

SECTION: Assignment Desk, Daybooks

LENGTH: 422 words

News Advisory:

The United States Helsinki Commission will conduct a hearing to highlight the human rights developments and the prospects for further improvement in Greece, an original signatory to the 1975 Helsinki Final Act.

WHAT:

Human Rights in Greece: A Snapshot of the Cradle of Democracy

WHEN:

Thursday, June 20

11:30 a.m. - 1:30 p.m.

WHERE:

334 Cannon House Office Building

Washington, D.C.

WHO:

Mania Telalian, legal advisor, Ministry of Foreign Affairs

-- Dimitrios Moschopoulos, counselor, Ministry of Foreign Affairs

-- Vassilios Tsirbas, senior counsel for the European Centre for Law and Justice

-- Adamantia Pollis, PhD, professor emerita, New School University

-- Panayote Dimitras, founding member and spokesperson, Greek Helsinki Monitor & Minority Rights Group - Greece; director, Center for Documentation and Information on Minorities in Europe-Southeast Europe

Topics of the hearing will include minority rights; religious liberty; freedom of the media; human trafficking; and domestic terrorism.

As Athens prepares to host the 2004 Summer Olympic Games, Roma have been uprooted from villages and areas around Athens in a "beautification" effort. Other ethnic and religious minorities face discrimination and harassment in Greece, the most homogeneous country in the Balkans.

There are an estimated 40,000 women and girls trafficked into Greece each year, many of them underage and living in virtual servitude after being forced or tricked into leaving their home countries. The government has recently introduced legislation to combat trafficking in persons, but the Department of State's Trafficking in Persons Report released on June 5 has ranked Greece as a Tier 3 country indicating that there have not been significant efforts to meet minimum anti-trafficking standards.

Freedom House recently ranked Greece last in media freedom among free countries, citing a pattern of criminal defamation lawsuits against journalists, some being sentenced to prison for their reporting.

An un-official transcript will be available on the Helsinki Commission's Internet Web site at <http://www.csce.gov> within 24 hours of the hearing.

The United States Helsinki Commission, an independent federal agency, by law monitors and encourages progress in implementing provisions of the Helsinki Accords. The Commission, created in 1976, is composed of nine Senators, nine Representatives and one official each from the Departments of State, Defense and Commerce.
<http://www.usnewswire.com>

CONTACT: Ben Anderson of the United States Helsinki Commission, 202-225-1901; <http://www.csce.gov>

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2002

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2002 PR Newswire Association LLC
All Rights Reserved

329 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Pakistan Newswire

June 15, 2002 SaturdayHR (Government to combat human trafficking, narcotics, bonded labour)*SECTION: Nationwide International NewsLENGTH: 118 wordsDATELINE: Islamabad, June 15

The Government has taken a number of measures to combat human trafficking, narcotics and bonded labour. According to a press release issued by the Interior Ministry here Saturday, these steps include issuance of computerized National Identity Cards, registration of aliens living in Pakistan and introduction of Automated Border Control System on all exit and entry points . A comprehensive draft law has been prepared which prescribes severe punishment for human traffickers and simultaneous rehabilitation of victims. As a result of Government measures, the US State Department in its recent report on human trafficking has improved the rating of Pakistan and has placed it in the second tier.

LOAD-DATE: June 19, 2002LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2002 Pakistan Press International

330 of 359 DOCUMENTS

U.S. Newswire

June 12, 2002 Wednesday

Human Rights in Greece Subject of Commission Hearing

SECTION: Assignment Desk, Daybook Editor

LENGTH: 392 words

News Advisory:

The United States Helsinki Commission will conduct a hearing to highlight the human rights developments and the prospects for further improvement in Greece, an original signatory to the 1975 Helsinki Final Act.

WHAT:

Human Rights in Greece: A Snapshot of the Cradle of Democracy

WHEN:

Thursday, June 20

9:30 - 11:30 a.m.

WHERE:

334 Cannon House Office Building

Washington, D.C.

Witnesses:

Adamantia Pollis, PhD, professor emerita, New School University

-- Panayote Dimitras, founding member and spokesperson, Greek Helsinki Monitor & Minority Rights Group - Greece; director, Center for Documentation and Information on Minorities in Europe-Southeast Europe

-- Other witnesses may be added.

Topics of the hearing will include minority rights; religious liberty; freedom of the media; human trafficking; and domestic terrorism.

As Athens prepares to host the 2004 Summer Olympic Games, Roma have been uprooted from villages and areas around Athens in a "beautification" effort. Other ethnic and religious minorities face discrimination and harassment in Greece, the most homogeneous country in the Balkans.

There are an estimated 40,000 women and girls trafficked into Greece each year, many of them underage and living in virtual servitude after being forced or tricked into leaving their home countries. The government has recently introduced legislation to combat trafficking in persons, but the Department of State's Trafficking in Persons Report released on June 5 has ranked Greece as a Tier 3 country indicating that there have not been significant efforts to meet minimum anti-trafficking standards.

Freedom House recently ranked Greece last in media freedom among free countries, citing a pattern of criminal defamation lawsuits against journalists, some being sentenced to prison for their reporting.

An un-official transcript will be available on the Helsinki Commission's Internet web site at <http://www.csce.gov> within 24 hours of the hearing.

The United States Helsinki Commission, an independent federal agency, by law monitors and encourages progress in implementing provisions of the Helsinki Accords. The Commission, created in 1976, is composed of nine Senators, nine Representatives and one official each from the Departments of State, Defense and Commerce.
<http://www.usnewswire.com>

CONTACT: Ben Anderson of the U.S. Helsinki Commission, 202-225-1901; Web <http://www.csce.gov>

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2002

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2002 PR Newswire Association LLC
All Rights Reserved

331 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 10, 2002 Monday

Uganda; US Accuses Kampala, TZ of Slavery

BYLINE: The East African

LENGTH: 616 words

Significant numbers of women and children in Tanzania and Uganda are abducted or coerced to serve as sex slaves, prostitutes and forced labourers, the US State Department says in a new report on worldwide Trafficking in Persons.

Kenya is not included in the survey because it is among the countries where the State Department could not gather enough reliable information about what it terms "this modern form of slavery."

In Tanzania, the practice is said to occur mainly on an internal basis, although the report cites unidentified sources as suggesting that Tanzanian women and girls may be trafficked to South Africa, the Middle East, Asia and Europe to work as prostitutes. "To a lesser degree," the report adds, "Tanzania is a destination point for trafficked persons from India and surrounding African countries."

The United States itself is not exempted from the findings. Describing the US as principally a transit and destination country for trafficking in persons, the State Department cites a 1997 estimate that some 50,000 women and children are trafficked annually into the US for sexual exploitation.

In its section on Uganda, the report focuses on the "tens of thousands" of women and children abducted by the Lord's Resistance Army during the past 15 years. Other instances of trafficking in Uganda are not mentioned in the study.

Neither the Tanzanian nor Ugandan governments fully complies with minimum standards for combating trafficking in persons, according to the State Department. The report consequently places the two East African countries in a "Tier 2" category, which includes about 50 nations making "significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance" with the standards.

Tier 1 countries, those judged to be carrying out the most rigorous anti-trafficking initiatives, are mostly prosperous and politically stable states. Tier 3 consists of 19 countries, including Sudan, that are said to be making no effort to institute safeguards against enslavement of their people.

The US law requiring issuance of an annual international survey on human trafficking calls for imposition of penalties on Tier 3 countries beginning next year. The punishments could take the form of cuts in US aid as well as moves by Washington to block World Bank lending to the condemned countries.

The State Department report says Uganda is striving to stem trafficking despite "limited resources, a civil conflict and continued kidnapping raids" by LRA forces. At the same time, however, the Ugandan government "does not actively investigate or prosecute cases of trafficking," according to the report.

Tanzania's efforts to curb the practice are hampered by "severe financial constraints, pervasive corruption and porous borders." A new section of Tanzania's penal code makes trafficking inside or outside the country a crime, but the penalty for it is "relatively light," the State Department says.

Tanzania is one of three countries participating in a pilot programme intended to eliminate the worst forms of child labour, the report notes.

Children are trafficked from rural to urban areas in Tanzania for domestic work, commercial agriculture, fishing and mining. Young members of the country's large refugee population are especially vulnerable to being used as labourers on Tanzanian plantations, the report says.

The State Department says there are no firm estimates of the total number of people being trafficked worldwide. No fewer than 700,000 and as many as four million were bought, sold, transported and held in slave-like conditions during the past year, the report suggests.

Copyright 2002, Nation Media Group Ltd. All rights reserved.

LOAD-DATE: June 10, 2002

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2002 AllAfrica, Inc.

332 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 7, 2002 Friday

Cambodia hits back at US over human trafficking

SECTION: International News

LENGTH: 338 words

DATELINE: PHNOM PENH, June 7

The Cambodian government hit back at a US report on human trafficking on Friday arguing it had taken a clear stance against the slave trade.

Co-Interior Minister Sar Kheng told reporters that several people had been arrested for human trafficking "but we don't know whether the US knew about that or not."

"It is the United States' issue, and the US can say whatever they want," he said.

On Wednesday the US State Department released its annual "Trafficking in Persons" report which added Cambodia to a blacklist of states Washington blames for making insufficient efforts to combat the scourge.

Sar Kheng, who had just returned from Australia where he held official talks on human trafficking, pointed out that US citizens had come to Cambodia to adopt children and marry local women.

He said many of the women would end up as prostitutes while US citizens had paid money to adoption agencies.

"For that reason, this could mean that US citizens are corrupt," he said.

However, government spokesman Pen Thol said Cambodia admitted that there were some problems related to the issue of human trafficking.

On May 20, authorities arrested a Cambodian polygamist and his two wives for trading Vietnamese virgins in a scam that indicated a new trafficking route has emerged across three Asian countries.

Police said four girls -- one was acquired for 75 dollars -- along with another six Vietnamese women were smuggled from Vietnam to Cambodia where they were to receive fake passports while being held in a Phnom Penh brothel.

They were then to be sold on to brothels in Malaysia.

"We have to recognise the truth," Pen Thol quoted Cambodian Prime Minister Hun Sen as saying.

From 2003, Cambodia could be subject to US sanctions including the halting of non-humanitarian and non-trade related assistance, unless it shows a vast improvement in combatting human trafficking.

The State Department report found that up to four million people had been bought and sold around the world in the last year.

LOAD-DATE: June 8, 2002

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH HUMAN TRAFFICKING (94%); ARRESTS (90%); ADOPTION (90%); STATE DEPARTMENTS & FOREIGN SERVICES (89%); EMBARGOES & SANCTIONS (89%); PROSTITUTION (88%); SMUGGLING (78%); PASSPORTS & VISAS (74%); PRIME MINISTERS (73%); MARRIAGE (73%); HEADS OF STATE & GOVERNMENT (73%);

333 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Gold Coast Bulletin (Australia)

June 7, 2002, Friday4 million in slave trade*LENGTH: 98 words

THE United States said yesterday that up to four million people had been bought and sold in the 21st century slave trade in the past year, and accused 19 countries of doing too little to stamp it out.

In its annual 'Trafficking in Persons' report, the State Department added Afghanistan, Armenia, Cambodia, Tajikistan, Iran and the Krygyz Republic, to a blacklist of states it blames for making insufficient efforts to combat the scourge, which also includes Russia and Saudi Arabia.

The report said that people were trafficked to supply the international sex trade.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2002LANGUAGE: ENGLISHJOURNAL-CODE: GCB

Copyright 2002 Nationwide News Pty Limited

334 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

June 7, 2002 Friday

Cambodia accepts critical U.S. report on human trafficking

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 302 wordsDATELINE: PHNOM PENH, June 7

Prime Minister Hun Sen said Friday he accepts a U.S. State Department report designating Cambodia as one of 19 countries taking less action against human trafficking.

'We realize the fact, we must try our best to further prevent such a matter,' government spokesman Pen Thol quoted Hun Sen as saying in a weekly cabinet meeting.

Hun Sen admitted that some Cambodian women were trafficked by fake marriages orchestrated by foreigners, Pen Thol said.

The premier's remarks came two days after the U.S. State Department accused 19 countries of failing to act against human trafficking for sexual and labor exploitation.

'Traffickers often force them into pornography and prostitution, subjecting them to terrible mental and physical abuse and putting them at risk from devastating diseases, such as HIV-AIDS,' U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell said.

Powell released the second annual report on human trafficking, which put the annual number of victims at between 700,000 and 4 million.

The State Department report classifies countries in three tiers, depending on their legal systems and government measures to combat human trafficking.

Cambodia and Kyrgyzstan fell into 'Tier 3' in the latest report. Last year, Cambodia was placed in Tier 2, a category for countries which do not yet fully comply with the minimum standards as defined by U.S. law but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance.

Observers said human trafficking in Cambodia has been increasing over the last few years due to poverty.

Thailand and Vietnam, meanwhile, were listed in Tier 2 for making significant efforts to tackle the problem, the report said.

Sexual exploitation for commercial purposes and demand for inexpensive labor have risen over the past several decades, the report said.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2002LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

335 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Saint Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 7, 2002 Friday

Can U.S. avoid political expedience in fight against human exploitation?

SECTION: MAIN; Pg. 12A

LENGTH: 731 words

Expedience, the hemoglobin of diplomacy, seems inseparable from the whole blood coursing through the bruised body of wartime American foreign policy. A reminder of the power of expedience arrived this week via the U.S. State Department's second annual report on trafficking in human beings.

Five of the 19 worst-offender nations in the assessment are Persian Gulf countries, including Saudi Arabia. The State Department assessment is mandated by Congress in a law aimed at curtailing slavery, forced prostitution, sweatshop labor practices and other gross exploitations that bring financial benefit to the exploiters.

In releasing the report on Wednesday, Secretary of State Colin Powell said the United States is determined "to stop this appalling assault on the dignity of men, women and children." He also noted that 50,000 such exploited people are in the United States. Worldwide, the report estimates, from 700,000 to 4 million people fall in the category of "trafficked" people. Obviously, an accurate count is one challenge in addressing the problems.

So, too, is making objective assessments of national performance to own these problems. The State Department observes 89 countries in the context of human trafficking and sorts them into three tiers, according to their commitment to stop these abuses, with Tier 3 comprising the worst offenders. Powell's senior adviser on trafficking defends the methodology.

"There were absolutely no political considerations entering into this," said Nancy Ely-Raphel at a press conference. "Some of our closest allies are on Tier 3, and they were on Tier 3 last year. This is a straight-out, objective report determining whether a country meets the minimum standards and whether it's making serious and sustained efforts to meet those minimum standards."

Let's take her at her word while remembering that the expedient avenues next year raise cause for concern that the important human rights work of stopping human trafficking could stumble to alliances of economics and immediate security.

One has to wonder what will happen next year, when the law provides that a country that hasn't improved its performance enough to emerge from the cellar of human rights behavior during the three years becomes subject to U.S. economic punishment.

One also has to wonder how many three-strikes offenders President Bush will exempt (his right under the trafficking victims law) if he sees punishing them as against U.S. national interests. With fortunate rarity in Washington, the anti-trafficking impetus is not partisan. The law, passed in 2000, was championed in the Senate by the odd couple of Sen. Paul Wellstone, D-Minn., and Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan.

Bahrain, Belarus, Bosnia, Greece, Indonesia, Lebanon, Myanmar, Qatar, Russia, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Turkey and the United Arab Emirates appeared this year in Tier 3 for a second time. The economically hard-pressed countries, of course, are mined for people vulnerable to trafficking. The rich nations consume the victims.

Note the high number of pivotal U.S. "allies" in the war on terrorism and in trying to stabilize the Mideast's violence. Note also that some countries with ghastly records on allowing human exploitation but are newfound friends of great strategic importance -- for instance, Pakistan the Philippines and India -- have risen from the bottom category to Tier 2 in this year's State Department report.

The idea of economic leverage, even if applied, will move nothing in places like Saudi Arabia or the small Gulf States. Expedience in dealing with the rulers of countries that feed us oil has always trumped engagement, just as neglect of Afghanistan's human rights horrors was expedient after it served no geostrategic importance to the United States.

The notion that trafficking concerns would take a priority in relations with Russia is an unlikely one.

But putting systematic focus on trafficking, however imprecise the measure and however subject to the whole of foreign policy judgment, makes an important difference by saying that nations are accountable for human misery perpetrated in the name of economic profit. The next year will be telling for this effort to build diplomatic capacity on behalf of the victims of trafficking.

Write Holste at gholste@pioneerpress.com or at the Pioneer Press, 345 Cedar St., St. Paul, MN 55101.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2002

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

TYPE: news

Copyright 2002 St. Paul Pioneer Press
All Rights Reserved

336 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

June 6, 2002 Thursday

Japan among worst human trafficking offenders: rights group

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 245 wordsDATELINE: NEW YORK, June 6

The U.S.-based group Human Rights Watch on Thursday faulted the U.S. State Department for giving Japan more credit than it says the Japanese government deserves in dealing with human trafficking.

The group raised the issue a day after the State Department released an annual report that says Japan is 'making significant efforts' to end the trafficking of women for sexual exploitation.

The State Department report, which classifies countries in three tiers, depending on their legal systems and government measures to combat human trafficking, kept Japan in 'Tier 2,' along with 51 other countries such as Brazil, China, India, Laos, Mexico, the Philippines, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam.

'Japan should be a Tier 3 country,' Human Rights Watch said.

Under the State Department classification, a 'Tier 2' country does not yet fully comply with the minimum standards as defined by U.S. law but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance.

Pakistan, another country listed in 'Tier 2,' should be in Tier 3, Human Rights Watch said.

Human Rights Watch said the State Department report mentions only trafficking of women for sexual exploitation in Japan and does not distinguish debt-bondage as forced labor.

The rights group criticized the Japanese government, which it says continues to treat trafficked women as illegal immigrants or criminals.

'They are often arrested and deported. Traffickers are rarely punished,' it says.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2002LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2002 Kyodo News Service

337 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 5, 2002 Wednesday

Up to four million trapped in global slave trade

BYLINE: STEPHEN COLLINSON

SECTION: Domestic, non-Washington, General News

LENGTH: 551 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 5

The United States said Wednesday that up to four million people have been bought and sold in the 21st century slave trade in the last year, and accused 19 countries of doing little to stamp it out.

In its annual "Trafficking in Persons" report, the State Department added Afghanistan, Armenia, Cambodia, Tajikistan, Iran and the Kyrgyz Republic, to a blacklist of states it blames for making insufficient efforts to combat the scourge, which also includes Russia and Saudi Arabia.

"Over the last year, at least 700,000 and possibly as many as four million men, women and children were bought, sold, transported and held against their will in slave like conditions," the report said.

"In this modern form of slavery, known as 'trafficking in persons' traffickers use threats, intimidation and violence to force victims to engage in sex acts or to labor under conditions comparable to slavery."

The report, which includes input from various US government agencies and embassies overseas, said that people are trafficked to supply the international sex trade in prostitution, sex tourism and commercial sex services.

Others find themselves working in appalling conditions for low pay in sweatshops, construction or agriculture.

Most of the countries deemed as not doing enough to combat trafficking are in east and central Asia, southern and eastern Europe and the Middle East.

On the basis of the report, governments in Africa and South America seem to be taking the problem seriously.

The report groups countries in three tiers based on the government's efforts to combat trafficking, as defined by the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act 2000.

The law defines trafficking as an offence in which a person is forced, coerced or transported to commit a sex act, or to indulge in forced labor or provision of services.

States in tier three are deemed to be in violation of the Act's minimum standards and not making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance.

In this report, they are : Afghanistan, Armenia, Bahrain, Belarus, Bosnia, Myanmar, Cambodia, Greece, Indonesia, Iran, Kyrgyz Republic, Lebanon, Qatar, Russia, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Tajikistan, Turkey and the United Arab Emirates.

Several countries placed in tier three last year, have moved up, including South Korea, which the report said had made "extraordinary strides" to combat trafficking over the last year and is now in tier one.

Romania, Israel, Albania, Gabon, Kazakhstan, Malaysia, Pakistan and Yugoslavia moved up from tier-three to tier-two, which reflects a judgement that their governments do not fully comply with the Act but is trying to do so, the report said.

States and territories in tier one are deemed to fully comply with the Act's standards, and this year include, France, Belgium, Germany, Switzerland, South Korea and Colombia.

Governments were assessed on whether they vigorously investigate acts of trafficking, protect victims, and adopt measures to prevent trafficking and cooperate with other countries to cut down on the trade in humans.

They are also held up for scrutiny on the extent to which they extradite traffickers, monitor immigration patterns for evidence of trafficking and prosecute public officials caught in the trafficking trade.

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2002

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH HUMAN TRAFFICKING (91%); PROSTITUTION (90%); HUMAN RIGHTS VIOLATIONS (88%); US FEDERAL GOVERNMENT (78%); EMBASSIES & CONSULATES (77%); VICTIMS RIGHTS (75%); CRIMINAL FALSE IMPRISONMENT (74%); GARMENT WORKERS (73%); UNITED ARAB STEVEDORING (52%);

Copyright 2002 Agence France Presse

338 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 5, 2002 Wednesday

Up to four million trapped in global slave trade : US report

BYLINE: STEPHEN COLLINSON

SECTION: Domestic, non-Washington, General News

LENGTH: 603 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 5

The United States said Wednesday that up to four million people had been bought and sold in the 21st century slave trade in the last year, and accused 19 countries of doing little to stamp it out.

In its annual "Trafficking in Persons" report, the State Department added Afghanistan, Armenia, Cambodia, Tajikistan, Iran and the Kyrgyz Republic to a blacklist of states it blames for making insufficient efforts to combat the scourge. The list also includes Russia and Saudi Arabia.

"Every year an estimated 700,000 to four million people around the world are victimized by traffickers through fraud, coercion and outright kidnapping," said Secretary of State Colin Powell.

"The overwhelming majority of victims are women and children.

"Traffickers often force them into pornography and prostitution, subjecting them to terrible mental and physical abuse and putting them at risk from devastating diseases, such as HIV-AIDS."

The report, which includes input from various US government agencies, NGOs and embassies overseas, said that some people are trafficked to supply the international sex trade in prostitution and sex tourism.

Others find themselves working in appalling conditions for low pay in sweatshops, construction or agriculture.

Most of the countries deemed not to be doing enough to combat trafficking are in east and central Asia, southern and eastern Europe and the Middle East.

On the basis of the report, governments in Africa and South America seem to be taking the problem seriously.

The report groups countries in three tiers based on the 89 governments' efforts to combat trafficking, as defined by the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act 2000.

Some countries are not included owing to a lack of reliable data.

The law defines trafficking as an offence in which a person is forced, coerced or transported to commit a sex act, or to indulge in forced labor or provision of services.

States in tier three are deemed to be in violation of the Act's minimum standards and not making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance.

In this report, they are : Afghanistan, Armenia, Bahrain, Belarus, Bosnia, Myanmar, Cambodia, Greece, Indonesia, Iran, Kyrgyz Republic, Lebanon, Qatar, Russia, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Tajikistan, Turkey and the United Arab Emirates.

From 2003, states which remain in tier three will be subject to sanctions including the halting of non-humanitarian and non-trade related assistance, and could also see the United States block aid from world finance bodies.

Several countries placed in tier three last year have moved up, including South Korea, which the report said had made "extraordinary strides" to combat trafficking over the last year and is now in tier one.

Romania, Israel, Albania, Gabon, Kazakhstan, Malaysia, Pakistan and Yugoslavia moved up from tier three to tier two, reflecting a judgment that their governments do not fully comply with the Act but are trying to do so, the report said.

States and territories in tier one are deemed to fully comply with the Act's standards, and this year include France, Belgium, Germany, Switzerland, South Korea and Colombia.

Governments were assessed on whether they vigorously investigate acts of trafficking, protect victims, and adopt measures to prevent trafficking and cooperate with other countries to cut down on the trade in humans.

They are also held up for scrutiny on the extent to which they extradite traffickers, monitor immigration patterns for evidence of trafficking and prosecute public officials caught in the trafficking trade.

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2002

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH FRAUD & FINANCIAL CRIME (90%); HUMAN TRAFFICKING (90%); NONGOVERNMENTAL ORGANIZATIONS (90%); KIDNAPPING & ABDUCTION (90%); PROSTITUTION (90%); STATE DEPARTMENTS & FOREIGN SERVICES (89%); US FEDERAL GOVERNMENT (78%); EMBASSIES & CONSULATES (77%); DISEASES & DISORDERS (73%); GARMENT WORKERS (71%); AIDS & HIV (69%); UNITED ARAB STEVEDORING (52%); COLIN POWELL (56%);

Copyright 2002 Agence France Presse

339 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

June 5, 2002 Wednesday

U.S. seeks Japan action to stop human trafficking

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 338 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 5

The United States asked Japan on Wednesday to redouble its efforts to combat international traffic in people.

'Japan is a destination country for women trafficked for commercial sexual exploitation and for men trafficked for labor purposes,' the State Department said in an annual report.

'Some internal trafficking exists, as illegal migrants engaged in commercial sexual exploitation are sold and become bound by debt to the new 'owner,' the report said.

The report, the second of its kind, was compiled under the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000, which calls for imposing economic sanctions in 2003 against countries that fail to take full action against human trafficking.

It classifies countries in three tiers, depending on their legal systems and government measures to combat human trafficking.

Japan continued to be put on a list of 'Tier 2' countries, which do not yet fully comply with the act's minimum standards but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with them.

Female trafficking victims in Japan come from Southeast Asia, especially Thailand and the Philippines, and increasingly from Colombia, Russia and other former Soviet republics, the report said.

Male victims in Japan come primarily from Asian countries such as China.

This year's report put 51 other countries on the Tier 2 list, including Brazil, China, India, Laos, Mexico, the Philippines, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam.

The department designated 19 countries, including Afghanistan, Cambodia, Indonesia, Iran, Myanmar, Saudi Arabia and Russia, as 'Tier 3' countries that do not fully comply with the act's minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to bring them into compliance.

There are 18 'Tier 1' countries and territories, defined as those which fully comply with the act's minimum standards. They include Austria, Belgium, Canada, France, Germany, Hong Kong, Italy and South Korea.

South Korea jumped to Tier 1 from Tier 3 in last year's report.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2002LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

340 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

June 5, 2002

14 Nations Make Gains in Combating Human Trafficking; State Department issues annual Trafficking in Persons Report

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 873 words

Washington -- The U.S. Department of State issued a congressionally-mandated report June 5 evaluating 89 nations in their efforts to control human trafficking, a "modern form of slavery" and an "unconscionable crime," according to Secretary of State Colin Powell, who explained the findings to reporters.

The Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report 2002 "represents the resolve of the entire United States government to stop this appalling assault on the dignity of men, women and children," said Powell. The study estimates that between 700,000 and four million people fall victim to the deception, coercion and fraud that are the hallmarks of trafficking, even while acknowledging that the collection of data on such a covert activity is difficult.

Powell said the survey is achieving the goal that Congress outlined with passage of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000: encouraging nations to adopt more aggressive policies toward trafficking.

"In the year since the last report I am pleased to announce that South Korea by the standards of the report has made great strides in improving its record," Powell said. "Romania and Israel have also worked with us to significantly strengthen their anti-trafficking efforts."

The TIP report categorizes nations in one of three tiers. The first tier, the most favorable ranking, is made up of nations that have met the minimum standards outlined in the law for the elimination of trafficking. The State Department analysis concludes that these Tier 1 nations are clamping down on human trafficking by prosecuting perpetrators, protecting victims and educating the public about this activity, which has been described as one of the most rapidly expanding criminal enterprises in the world.

Tier 2 comprises those nations that have not met the minimum standards set by law but are making progress toward them. The third tier is reserved for those nations that don't meet the standards and have not been able to make significant efforts to do so.

When the law reaches its third year of implementation in 2003, it calls for sanctions to be imposed on nations that remain in the Tier 3 ranking and are not taking action against trafficking. Ambassador Nancy Ely-Raphel, of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, said the sanctions will limit non-humanitarian and non-trade related assistance and will invoke U.S. opposition to the issuance of loans to Tier 3 nations from international financial institutions.

Ely-Raphel said the intent of the TIP report is not to grade countries but rather to empower and assist nations in joining the world community in prevention of a crime with many victims. In the 2002 report, 14 nations have advanced to a more favorable ranking, evidence that the report is creating "success stories" according to Ely-Raphel.

Like Powell, she cited the positive action taken by Romania in response to the 2001 report. "The government of Romania passed a law in December 2001 that criminalizes trafficking," Ely-Raphel said. "They organized a crime directorate that is investigating trafficking and arresting traffickers, and the government has prosecuted traffickers under kidnapping and pimping codes."

Albania, the Czech Republic, France, Gabon, Israel, Kazakhstan, Lithuania, Macedonia, Malaysia, Pakistan, Poland, South Korea, Romania, and Yugoslavia are all nations that have progressed in their anti-trafficking efforts over the last year.

Ely-Raphel did not speak harshly of the countries in Tier 3; she credited many with having introduced anti-trafficking laws and having taken some strides toward addressing the problem. She said that many are developing action plans, and she anticipates their efforts will be recognized in next year's assessment. The head of the primary office for monitoring trafficking issues said the most serious problems exist in those countries that won't admit to having any trafficking problem at all.

The TIP report is described as the most comprehensive international anti-trafficking review issued by any single government despite its acknowledged limitations in data collection. The report cautions that the non-inclusion of some countries in the survey does not necessarily mean they have no trafficking problem. It could mean that sufficient data was unattainable or that data was difficult to analyze to ascertain whether observed activity was actually human trafficking or migrant smuggling.

Asked about possible links between human trafficking and organized crime networks, El-Raphel said, "There's got to be a tie-in." She said that traffickers are using the same types of falsified documents and money-laundering techniques that terrorists and drug traffickers use, so authorities are still looking for direct connections.

The U.S. government supported more than 110 anti-trafficking programs around the world last year in several dozen countries. The programs dealt with the problem from a variety of angles, including development of anti-trafficking laws; support for victims; and training of government, law enforcement and medical personnel.

(The Washington File is a product of the Office of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: June 5, 2002

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2002 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

341 of 359 DOCUMENTS

State Department

June 5, 2002

Transcript: Trafficking in Persons Report Produces "Success Stories"; 89 countries surveyed for human trafficking, 14 improve

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 3849 words

The U.S. State Department issued the Trafficking in Persons report June 5, assessing the state of the modern slave trade in 89 countries found to have significant trafficking activity. Upon the release of the second annual report required under the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000, Ambassador Nancy Ely-Raphel, of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, said, "The report is working. Already we are seeing success stories."

A primary purpose of the Congressionally-mandated report is to assess how well nations are doing in their efforts to comply with certain minimum standards to control trafficking, including prosecution of perpetrators, protection of victims and educating the public about this form of criminal activity. Briefing reporters upon the release of the document, Ely-Raphel said that 14 nations have strengthened their anti-trafficking policies since last year's report, notably South Korea, Romania and Israel.

"This report is intended to empower everyone fighting to stop slavery in the 21st century," said Ely-Raphel.

The report finds that at least 700,000 and perhaps as many as four million people each year were "bought, sold, transported and held against their will in slave-like conditions."

The report ranks nations in three tiers based upon their governments' commitment and action to clamp down on human trafficking crimes. Next year, after the third survey, Tier 3 nations -- those showing a lack of action against trafficking -- will be subject to sanctions on non-humanitarian and non-trade assistance.

Following is the transcript of the Ely-Raphel remarks:

(begin transcript)

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE Office of the Spokesman June 5, 2002

SPECIAL BRIEFING

Ambassador Nancy Ely-Raphel, Senior Advisor to the Secretary, Officer to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, Release of 2002 Trafficking in Persons Report

June 5, 2002

(11:05 p.m. EDT)

AMBASSADOR ELY-RAPHEL: Thank you, Secretary Powell, for your inspiring introduction of this second annual Trafficking in Persons Report.

I am proud to say that this is the largest annual report of its kind created by any single government worldwide. To compile this document, which reports on 89 countries, information was gathered from 186 US embassies and consulates, among other sources, including NGOs and media reports.

The Report is many things. It's a sober reminder of the reality of this modern-day form of slavery. It is a tool for our engagement with other countries, a starting point for dialogue. It's a platform for advocates. It's a coordination opportunity for regional, anti-trafficking efforts among governments. Hopefully, and most importantly, it's a freedom-promoting mechanism for individual victims of enslavement everywhere.

Ultimately, the Report should be employed as a practical tool for producing anti-trafficking strategies globally. And I invite NGOs, think tanks, Congress, and other experts to embrace this opportunity.

Trafficking in persons is a leading international crime and human rights abuse. As the Secretary noted, the global magnitude is staggering. Annual estimates range from 700,000 to 4 million people bought, sold, transported and held in slavery-like conditions for sex and labor exploitation. The nature of this crime -- underground, often unacknowledged -- contributes to the inability to pin down the number of people who are victimized by traffickers each year. The scope of this hideous exploitation is wide and varied, but typically involves victims entrapped into commercial, sexual exploitation such as prostitution and pornography, and labor exploitation such as sweatshops, construction sites and agriculture. Additional forms of forced labor and abuse include domestic servitude, forced marriages, and camel jockeys, to name just a few.

The Report is produced by the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, which was established at the Department of State last October, pursuant to comprehensive legislation adopted by the Congress. In addition to reporting duties, the Office assists in the coordination of the US Government's anti-trafficking efforts, both domestically and abroad, guided by the vision of eradicating trafficking worldwide.

The Report includes a three-tiered country list, which evaluates governmental efforts to combat trafficking on the basis of minimum standards described in the law, followed by individual country narratives. This year, 89 countries are listed as follows: 18 countries in Tier 1, 52 countries on Tier 2, and 19 countries in Tier 3. The last, or third, tier identifies countries that neither fully comply with the minimum standards, nor are making significant efforts to do so.

Since the Report last year, many countries improved their anti-trafficking efforts, 14 of them so much that they are placed in a more favorable tier from last year. Furthermore, because of changed circumstances or new information, two countries that were on the 2001 Report are not included on this year's Report.

The Report is working. Already we are seeing success stories, as mentioned by the Secretary. The Republic of Korea, as well as Romania and Israel, have aggressively pursued anti-trafficking initiatives since the first report was issued last year, extensively coordinating with us on practical measures and policy strategies.

Acknowledging the huge task before us, this is a good beginning for concerted anti-trafficking efforts internationally. In closing, the degrading, insidious practice of slavery is found worldwide. It is found in rich countries and in poor countries, in sending countries and destination countries. It is found in democracies such as the United States, into which at least 50,000 people are trafficked annually. It is found in conflict-ridden countries and among displaced, vulnerable populations.

As we enter the 21st century, trafficking must be challenged worldwide. Trafficking must end. This Report is intended to empower everyone fighting to stop slavery in the 21st century.

I'd be happy to answer your questions.

QUESTION: Which countries might face sanctions next year, as the Secretary said? And what kind of sanctions does the law require or would impose on those countries?

AMBASSADOR ELY-RAPHEL: It will be all of the countries in 2003 in the report that comes out a year from now that are on Tier 3, and the sanctions will involve non-humanitarian and non-trade-related sanctions, and in directions in the international financial institutions to vote against loans in the World Bank and the IMF, for example.

QUESTION: A group that's dedicated to freeing young girls from sexual trafficking has indicated they think that India and Thailand are among the worst offenders, and yet they are in Tier 2. Why is that the case?

AMBASSADOR ELY-RAPHEL: The evaluation we make on India and Thailand is, first of all, whether they have significant numbers of traffic victims. They both, of course, meet that category. So they are then immediately analyzed to determine whether they are making serious and sustained efforts to meet those minimum standards. Neither India nor Thailand meets the minimum standards.

However, they have over the last year sustained the efforts that they were making to combat trafficking in persons. For example, India supports 80 homes for victims of trafficking. It has invited NGOs to provide specialized services to victims, including counseling and legal advocacy. In many cities, NGOs and police work closely together to help rescued women. They have a very, very low conviction rate. They have serious problems in prosecutions. However, in a number of cities -- New Delhi, for example -- they now have 47 cases in the courts of prosecuting traffickers.

QUESTION: Is it -- we are certainly -- this is a very sensitive time for India right now, and there are some on Capitol Hill, well, wondering whether political considerations entered into this.

AMBASSADOR ELY-RAPHEL: Not at all. This is, I think, the most objective report that we could issue. There were absolutely no political considerations entering into this. Some of our closest allies are on Tier 3, and they were on Tier 3 last year. This is a straight-out, objective report determining whether a country meets the minimum standards, and whether it's making serious and sustained efforts to meet those minimum standards, which would then place it in Tier 2.

QUESTION: Those were quite harsh words for the Afghan Interim Administration. I know it only covers last year, but can you tell us if you have anecdotal information of them making an effort this year?

AMBASSADOR ELY-RAPHEL: It's very difficult with a situation such as Afghanistan to come up with adequate information and statistics. We did determine that there were over 100 trafficking victims either trafficked into Afghanistan or out of Afghanistan, so that we would make that determination and evaluate them.

But the Afghan Interim Administration hasn't been there long enough. The Report runs through March, and we were basing our information on what they are doing, but also what the Taliban was doing. And they were very much involved in trafficking.

So we'll look at Afghanistan again next year, after we have had a whole year of the Afghan Interim Administration.

QUESTION: Russia is on Tier 3. You say the Report says that they are making an effort, but they still remain on the bottom. Could you discuss why they are still there?

AMBASSADOR ELY-RAPHEL: Well, I wouldn't say they remain on the bottom. I don't think that's fair. The countries that I think of as on the bottom are the ones that don't acknowledge they have a trafficking problem. And Russia is not one of them. Russia is working; Russia acknowledges it has a trafficking problem. It's providing funding for some victim services and compensation, as well as protection of rights. It is dealing with victims. They are not jailed any more or prosecuted for prostitution, which had been going on before.

And the Duma has requested advice and information from us to help draft a trafficking law, so that is all good news. However, they don't have a trafficking law, and there are rarely cases that are investigated. So that is why they are still on Tier 3, but they are making efforts. And that is what we want to encourage as a result of this Report.

QUESTION: If I could ask you a question about the figures. Last year's Report spoke of 700,000 people possibly involved in trafficking or who were kind of snared by trafficking. This year's Report includes the upper figure of possibly 4 million people. Can I just ask you the kind of basis of those figures, how you come up with --

AMBASSADOR ELY-RAPHEL: Right. It's very, very hard to come up with statistics, which is one of our problems. It's very difficult to count, to get accurate figures. And the 700,000 figure is, I think, from 1994 or 1996. The 4 million figure comes from a study that was done by the International Organization of Migration, and that's an organization that's very, very active in the field of trafficking. So we don't really have good statistics, and we're hoping to when the State Department and the Justice Department opens a new center to share intelligence on trafficking and migrant smuggling, and I'm hoping that will produce better information for us than we have presently.

QUESTION: That might answer my question. Some senators are concerned that the Report doesn't include any numbers, and since the Act was theirs, they feel like they should be able to -- not dictate, but more or less suggest some things they would like included in that. And some even suggested the Report be delayed while you try to add more numbers in, which I don't believe was done.

Could you address that, and see if you're going to be able to put in some more numbers, as they wish?

AMBASSADOR ELY-RAPHEL: See, that's a real problem. That's even a problem in the United States. We didn't have an anti-trafficking law, until the year 2000 when this landmark legislation was passed. So if you want to keep track of the numbers of anti-trafficking cases in the United States, you have to look at the Mann Act, you have to look at various state kidnapping statutes, in order to add up and come up with a figure that would give you those kinds of statistics.

And we have that problem in the United States. Can you imagine what the problem is in countries that don't keep those statistics? And in fact, it would look like the Western countries, or the countries that keep very good criminal justice statistics on the numbers of cases, would look like the worst offenders.

So it's very, very hard. We're trying to get more figures, and we're trying to get more statistics, and we will over the coming year. But it's a very dicey area.

Yes, sir.

QUESTION: Most of the victims from South Asia, they come -- they are bought and sold for Saudi Arabia or many other Middle Eastern or South Arabian countries. And Saudi Arabia is in two or three. So what the United States doing, because Saudi Arabia was involved in many other low-level trafficking and other things, and it's friends with the United States?

And also, under Saudi Arabia, you have mentioned that victims come from India and Bangladesh and Sri Lanka and so forth, so many other countries, but you have not mentioned that victims also come from Pakistan, because I was told that so many Pakistanis are also trafficked in Saudi Arabia.

AMBASSADOR ELY-RAPHEL: Absolutely. You're absolutely correct. There are many, many people who are trafficked from South Asia into the countries in the Gulf. And Saudi Arabia is one of them. The government has an extensive system of labor courts that enforce terms of work contracts, because, as you know, many, many go as workers. But a lot of these workers are exempt from the labor laws.

QUESTION: But also protects the young girls --

AMBASSADOR ELY-RAPHEL: Exactly, exactly. So there is really no protection, and there is certainly no protection for those people who are trafficked into the country because they don't have any legal documentation frequently. And we hope to raise this, and I hope -- I plan -- to meet with the government representatives and expect that they will seriously look at the problem that exists in Saudi Arabia.

QUESTION: As far as India is concerned, what are you -- this earlier question that -- what response are you getting from India or other South Asian countries what they are doing about this trafficking, because it's a very serious problem. Is it economy, or it's under -- it's out of control from the government hands? Or if they are coming also in the United States, that means we have border problems, or what are the latest problems?

AMBASSADOR ELY-RAPHEL: It's all of those problems, as I said before. The Government of India recognizes it has a problem. It's working cooperatively with NGOs to provide protection for victims. It needs to do it much more prosecution.

QUESTION: Speaking about the cooperation between the United States and Romania in fighting trafficking, can you give us more detail what has been done, what remains to be done in this field?

AMBASSADOR ELY-RAPHEL: Yes. I would cite the Government of Romania as one of those governments that really was a model at responding to our Report last year and working very, very closely with us. Your Foreign Minister, in fact, came and met with us and sat in a room with a table of all kinds of people talking about trafficking, and responded and answered their questions and was really engaged, which is what I hope to see as a result of this Report this year. The Government of Romania passed a law in December of 2001 that criminalizes trafficking. It organized a crime directorate that is investigating trafficking and arresting traffickers. And the government has prosecuted traffickers under kidnapping and pimping codes. For protection, the government has allocated space for the shelter of trafficking victims, cooperates with other governments in repatriation for its trafficked citizens abroad, and has made substantial efforts to comply with our Report last year. And I hope that other governments will respond as well.

QUESTION: Do you have anything to look at, I guess you could call them subcontract companies, some which are maybe highly illegal, that are tied in to the underworld here in the United States, for instance -- Las Vegas, overseas and other countries that shadow type of subcontract work where people find work from vans or trucks in the area where they're --

AMBASSADOR ELY-RAPHEL: Well, within the United States, that jurisdiction is with the Department of Justice. And I know that they are looking very carefully into that. We are also raising that with other governments, and there are a number of governments that have shut down operations that have been phony front organizations, travel agencies, employment agencies, that are soliciting particularly women for jobs and are really phony organizations and fronts for traffickers.

QUESTION: Thank you. I think maybe this goes to (inaudible) State Department, but precisely has been to take the kind of network of mafias that are managing all these situation, and what is done about that?

AMBASSADOR ELY-RAPHEL: Well, it's obvious that the documentation, the false documentation that traffickers in persons get, is similar to the false documentation that drug traffickers get, that arms dealers provide. The money laundering operations are very similar. There has got to be a tie-in with organized crime. We see it. It's more difficult to do something about it, but we are working on it.

QUESTION: Can you say who you think the worst offenders are? You said that some of the Tier 3 list aren't the bottom. Who are on the bottom?

AMBASSADOR ELY-RAPHEL: Well, we don't grade countries. We just look at what they are doing in an objective fashion. As I said before, the countries that have a serious, serious trafficking problem, who refuse to acknowledge that they have a problem--it makes such a difference if you have a country that maybe does not have the capacity to deal with a serious problem, but recognizes that they have a problem and are willing to work regionally with us, with other countries, particularly if it's a source country, and we can get a destination country that is able financially to provide economic assistance; alternative assistance to those countries.

But I can't say that one is the worst. I mean, we really don't grade them that way.

QUESTION: Two questions. First of all, is there any evidence -- I remember some talk a while back that perhaps terrorist financing, some of it anyway, was coming from trafficking in persons. If you can respond to that?

And then also, in addition to this Report, and you going out or diplomats going out and talking to governments? One of the tools of US diplomacy, and its leverage, is public criticism of countries for these practices. And you don't -- contrary to some human rights violations or drug trafficking problems, you don't hear a lot of US officials criticizing countries publicly to make them take more efforts in terms of trafficking in persons. Do you think that the creation of this office, and this legislation and perhaps the sanctions will increase public attention to the problem of trafficking, and perhaps tougher US diplomacy on the subject?

AMBASSADOR ELY-RAPHEL: I think the Report has increased the attention that the world pays on trafficking, and that the United States, that the American people pay to trafficking, but we need a lot more publicity, and I would call on all of you to help us get the word out and publicize the trafficking cases because we really do need the assistance of all of you.

QUESTION: If I could follow up, though, do you see a scenario where, in addition to a lot of the other issues of bilateral relations that the US has with other countries, are we going to see this issue being raised publicly, on a public level?

AMBASSADOR ELY-RAPHEL: This issue is raised all the time in all of the meetings that we hold. In some cases, it pays to do it in quiet diplomacy. Sometimes the reverse is true. But we tailor what we do to the country that we're dealing with bilaterally.

MR. BOUCHER: Can we just do one or two more?

QUESTION: Some of the Tier 3 countries are both very strong US allies and also fairly well-to-do countries -- I mean, not rich, but -- Saudi is one of them; Greece, being an EU country; and even on Tier 2, with Israel. Why -- when -- in the country profiles, you say that government has yet to comply fully or doesn't seem willing to comply fully; what excuses are given, if it's not a financial reason, like with some of these countries?

AMBASSADOR ELY-RAPHEL: Well, some of it is that they don't have the legislation; they don't have the criminal law in place. They haven't trained their prosecutors to recognize the difference between trafficking and smuggling, for example. They have not provided any protection for victims. The government is not providing any kind of secure places for victims, a hotline for them to call to get assistance.

QUESTION: My question is, what excuses do they give for not having this, other than -- I mean, if they don't have legislation, why aren't they pushing it through? If they don't have hotlines, why do they say they're not setting them up?

AMBASSADOR ELY-RAPHEL: Well, some of them are. But a law that's been introduced in parliament won't do it; you have to be implementing the law. And an action plan -- some of the countries you mentioned have action plans, but they have to implement the action plans. We can't just say, you know, that's great; you have wonderful plans. But let's see what you do with it.

And so that's the problem. And I think a number of the countries that you mentioned do have action plans and will be making efforts. But we haven't seen the results. And this Report only reports results.

MR. BOUCHER: Last question to Elaine.

QUESTION: Speaking of results, I wonder if you could update us on some of the information that was released by this building in April that talked about plans for centers to be set up in Central and Eastern Europe, and for -- and US laws? I know it's not your area, but maybe you could update us, for US laws to be made tougher so that prosecutors have an easier task prosecuting Americans who are --

AMBASSADOR ELY-RAPHEL: Americans in the Balkans, you're talking about?

QUESTION: Well, just generally refer to plans to make laws tougher and to set up special centers and so on; is there any progress since --

AMBASSADOR ELY-RAPHEL: The Justice Department has draft statutes that they're working on presently, and I would refer you to the Justice Department. But we have been talking to them, and they are very serious about getting this introduced.

MR. BOUCHER: Okay. Thank you very much, ladies and gentlemen.

(The briefing was concluded at 11:35 p.m. EDT.)

(end transcript)

(Distributed by the Office of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: June 5, 2002

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

342 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Federal Document Clearing House Congressional Testimony

April 24, 2002 Wednesday

U.N. PEACEKEEPERS AND SEX SLAVE TRADE IN BOSNIASECTION: CAPITOL HILL HEARING TESTIMONY*LENGTH: 2954 words

Testimony of Martina E. Vandenberg, J.D. Europe Researcher, Women's Rights Division

Human Rights Watch

House Committee on International Relations

Subcommittee on International Operations and Human Rights

April 24, 2002

Madame Chairperson and Members of the Subcommittee,

Thank you for inviting Human Rights Watch to provide testimony on trafficking of women and girls to Bosnia and Herzegovina for forced prostitution. My name is Martina Vandenberg and I serve as the Europe Researcher for the Women's Rights Division of Human Rights Watch. It is an honor to testify before you today. My colleagues and I at Human Rights Watch thank you for the attention that you have focused on these important human rights violations.

Human Rights Watch has documented and monitored trafficking for almost a decade, publishing reports on trafficking of women and girls from Burma to Thailand, Nepal to India, Bangladesh to Pakistan, Thailand to Japan, and from Eastern Europe into Greece.

Trafficking flourishes throughout the world, aided by corruption, complicity, and neglect by states. Seeking better lives and opportunities, trafficking victims migrate only to find themselves trapped in debt bondage, forced labor, and slavery-like conditions. The United Nations has estimated that as many as 700,000 people are trafficked into forced labor and forced prostitution around the world each year. The United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina has estimated that between 750 and 1,000 trafficked women and girls remain trapped in brothels scattered around the country. Non-governmental organizations, such as Lara, an anti-trafficking group in Bijeljina, Bosnia and Herzegovina, place the figure at 2,000 or more. Stripped of their passports, sold as chattel, and forced to work for little or no pay, these women, many of whom anticipated lucrative job opportunities in Italy and other western European countries, instead face danger and human rights abuses.

In researching trafficking, Human Rights Watch has relied since December 2000 on the definition of trafficking enunciated in the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, Supplementing the United Nations Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime (Trafficking Protocol). In Article 3(a), the Protocol defines trafficking in persons as: the recruitment, transportation, transfer, harboring or receipt of persons, by means of threat or use of force or other forms of coercion, of abduction, of fraud, of deception, of abuse of power or of position of vulnerability or of the giving or receiving of payments or benefits to achieve the consent of a person having control over another person, for the purpose of exploitation. Exploitation shall include, at a minimum, the exploitation of the prostitution of others or other forms of sexual exploitation, forced labor or services, slavery or practices similar to slavery, servitude or the removal of organs.

The Trafficking Protocol encourages states to provide human rights protections for victims of trafficking, including temporary residence, legal assistance, appropriate shelter, psychological and medical care. The protocol, like the U.S. Trafficking Victims Protection Act, covers all forms of trafficking, not just trafficking into the sex industry. To date, 104 countries have signed the protocol and six have ratified. The government of Bosnia signed the Trafficking Protocol and has committed to ratifying it.

I'd like to begin this afternoon by briefly summarizing our findings in Bosnia and Herzegovina. I will then turn to the question of the international community's links with trafficking and close with recommendations for alleviating these abuses.

Trafficking of Women and Girls to Bosnia and Herzegovina for Forced Prostitution

Human Rights Watch began researching the trafficking of women and girls into Bosnia and Herzegovina in 1999, interviewing victims of trafficking, U.N. Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina officials, members of the International Police Task Force (international unarmed police monitors serving with the U.N. mission under Annex 11 of the Dayton Agreement), and local officials. The investigations uncovered extensive trafficking into the country, with traffickers luring women from their homes in Moldova, Romania, Ukraine, Russia, Belarus, and Bulgaria with promises of high wages and good jobs. Traffickers quickly broke those promises, selling the women to bar and nightclub owners for prices ranging from 500 Deutschmarks (US$231) to 5,000 Deutschmarks (US$2,314). In many cases, these transactions took place in Belgrade, the capital of the neighboring Federal Republic of Yugoslavia; from there traffickers or owners transported the women and girls to Bosnia and Herzegovina.

The women's prices became their debts. Owners and employers promised the women and girls that they would receive 50 percent of their earnings after clearing their debt; this rarely happened in practice. Instead, owners often sold women to new "employers," saddling them with new debts and ending their hopes of sending money to parents and children at home.

In one illustrative case, a twenty-two year old Ukrainian woman interviewed during a brothel raid told Human Rights Watch, "I have been in Bosnia for three months [since December 1998]. I came to work here in a bar. I knew nothing when they took me to Serbia - I was sold there four times to different men." 2

While some of the women agreed to migrate and work in the sex industry, none of them anticipated that they would be sold, forced to work without payment, and abused. Human Rights Watch obtained the verbatim transcript of one woman trafficked into Prijedor, Republika Srpska of Bosnia and Herzegovina in 2000. She told International Police Task Force investigators:

The girls were obliged to dance, drink a lot and go into their rooms with anyone. All girls were working three months for free. We were eating once per day and sleeping 5-6 hours per day. If we would not do what they [the owners and guards] wanted us to do, the security guards would beat us. 3

Some bar owners allowed women to keep their tips. But in many cases, the owners simply levied fines that sucked even those small earnings away from the women. Through fines, forced purchases of lingerie and food, or outright theft, the women found that they effectively earned no money. One woman, D.D., trafficked to Bosnia from Ukraine in 1998 told Human Rights Watch, "I did not earn anything. I earned money at the [first bar that I worked in], but [the owner] fined me for any small infraction and took 300 Deutschmarks (US$138) that I had saved away from me." 4

In 1999, the International Organization for Migration (IOM), an intergovernmental organization, initiated a program to provide shelter and voluntary repatriation to trafficking victims trapped in Bosnia. The women accepted into the IOM voluntary repatriation program receive shelter in Bosnia, assistance with procuring travel documents, plane tickets, escorts at transit airports, overnight shelter upon arrival at their country of origin, and train or bus tickets home.

Involvement of Local Police

Trafficking of persons cannot flourish without the cooperation of state officials and law enforcement authorities. In Bosnia, involvement of local police ranged from visiting brothels as "gratis" clients to facilitating the trafficking of women in the country. This complicity and corruption on the part of local police officers facilitated and exacerbated these human rights abuses. Victims spoke of police officers who visited the brothels to partake of free sexual services in exchange for assistance in procuring false documents and tipping off owners to upcoming raids. Some police officers moonlighted as waiters in the brothels. Still others engaged in trafficking directly.

For the most part, the police engaged in these activities with complete impunity. As of April 2002, according to a letter from the United Nations Headquarters in New York to Human Rights Watch, only six local police officers faced deauthorization (removal) as a result of UNMIBH investigations. In one case a police officer received a prison sentence of one year and three months for trafficking women from Belgrade into Banja Luka. Unfortunately, the paucity of successful criminal investigations and disciplinary proceedings against local police underscored the record of failure in this area.

The International Community and Trafficking

In July 2001, the United Nations created the Special Trafficking Operations Program (STOP) to fight trafficking more aggressively. Since July 2001, the mixed International Police Task Force and local police teams have conducted over 270 raids and interviewed over 800 women. Those women and girls identified as trafficking victims are referred to the International Organization for Migration for assistance. IOM assisted 14 women in 1999, 199 in 2000, and over 200 in 2001 with shelter, medical care, and voluntary repatriation to their countries of origin. Local non-governmental organizations, such as Lara in Bijeljina, have provided shelter and assistance to victims with funding from international sources.

While these interventions by the international community have served a positive role in combating trafficking, other activities have only exacerbated this human rights abuse. I believe that others testifying today will give more information on specific allegations concerning the international community and trafficking, but I would like to give an overview of Human Rights Watch's own conclusions.

Our researchers scoured internal investigative International Police Task Force (IPTF) reports, conducted interviews with IPTF monitors, and reviewed verbatim transcripts of testimony given to IPTF by trafficking victims. These sources all pointed to one conclusion that IPTF monitors visited the brothels or arranged to have trafficked women delivered to their residences in violation of their code of conduct. Most striking, however, was the evidence that at least three IPTF monitors purchased women and their passports from traffickers and brothel owners.

Human Rights Watch takes no position on prostitution. However, IPTF officers, who through their work and training knew or should have known that the brothels contained trafficked women, violated the United Nations "zero tolerance" policy by even visiting the brothels. More importantly, according to NGOs in the field working with victims, the presence of IPTF monitors in the clubs as clients discouraged women from seeking safe haven in IPTF stations.

In at least one case, an IPTF officer who purchased a woman maintained that he had done so in order to "rescue" her. But, like his colleagues, he should have known that this is not the proper procedure for a police officer to free someone from captivity. The "rescues" thwart efforts to enforce the law and remain factually questionable. From the perspective of the victim, she may have traded one owner for another.

In November 2000, International Police Task Force monitors conducted raids of three nightclubs - Crazy Horse I, Crazy Horse II, and Masquerade in Prijedor. The raids, which freed 34 women trafficked into these three brothels in that city, resulted in the repatriation of six IPTF officers - two Americans, two Spaniards, and two British nationals. The official reason given for the disciplinary measures was "exceeding the mandate" of the IPTF - a reflection of accusations that the monitors had conducted the raids themselves, rather than supervising the actions of local police officers as required under the IPTF mandate. However, one United Nations official in the Bosnia Mission with extensive knowledge of the case and who interviewed the women told Human Rights Watch, "SFOR [the NATO Stabilization Force] and IPTF brought the girls to Sarajevo, and then the girls pointed out that the guys driving them had been their clients." 5 In all, according to verbatim statements obtained by Human Rights Watch, five of the trafficking victims asserted that IPTF monitors had numbered among their clients.

The fact that officers who had used the sexual services at the nightclubs transported the women to Sarajevo created an opportunity for witness tampering. The internal report on the investigation, examined in full by Human Rights Watch, quoted one of the trafficked women as saying, "[The IPTF officer from Spain] told me that this was the last chance for me to go back to my country and to tell all the truth but not too much or anything about our relations."

Allegations of purchase of trafficked women have also been raised in relation to U.S. military contractors providing support services to the U.S. contingent of the Stabilization Force (SFOR). In 1999, the direct employer of these contractors, DynCorp, repatriated a group of contractors after allegations emerged that the men had purchased women from the brothels. 7 And again in 2000, two DynCorp contractors returned home after the U.S. Army Criminal Investigation Division learned of allegations of the purchase of women and weapons from local brothel owners.

A Record of Impunity

Although immense attention has focused on the international community's involvement in trafficking in Bosnia, it is important to note that the majority of those involved are civilians, local crime figures, and local governmental officials.

Nevertheless, IPTF officers and SFOR contractors share one major characteristic: impunity. United Nations Bosnia Mission officials admitted that repatriation served as the only punishment for involvement in trafficking-related misconduct. They could not point to any cases where the U.N. secretary-general had waived immunity, nor could they point to any prosecutions in home countries. In February, the United Nations reported that twelve international police officers in Bosnia were expelled or voluntarily left the country after facing allegations of involvement in trafficking. The U.N. Office of Internal Oversight Services (OIOS) has investigated and cleared the IPTF of wrongdoing, issuing a statement in February this year that there was "no evidence of widespread or systematic involvement" in trafficking by the U.N. police force.

The U.N. statement was attacking a straw man; no one had claimed that IPTF involvement was broad-based. The concern not addressed was that IPTF monitors who violate the law enjoy complete impunity: they cannot be prosecuted in Bosnia and Herzegovina under the terms of the 1995 Dayton Agreement nor are they likely to face liability under the criminal laws of their home country. For American IPTF monitors implicated in trafficking, because of a gap in U.S. jurisdiction, U.S. courts lack jurisdiction to prosecute them when they return to the United States. Civilian contractors to the U.S. military could similarly evade prosecution in Bosnia and Herzegovina. However, the passage of the Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act (MEJA) in November 2000 remedied the jurisdictional gap, permitting prosecutions to be brought in the U.S. for criminal acts committed abroad by civilian contractors to the U.S. military.

But multiple FOIA requests to the U.S. government have not unearthed even one prosecution for crimes relating to trafficking committed by Americans while serving abroad. The de facto blanket immunity enjoyed by IPTF officers and civilian contractors also troubled local officials struggling to establish the rule of law in post-conflict Bosnia and Herzegovina. Local police, prosecutors, and judges told Human Rights Watch that they lacked jurisdiction to investigate or prosecute any of these cases.

In light of these concerns, Human Rights Watch makes the following recommendations to the U.S. Government:

Explore legislative changes to allow for the prosecution of U.S. citizens serving as international police monitors in U.N. missions. Such legislation should be tailored to end the jurisdictional gap that currently allows such persons to avoid prosecution for trafficking-related crimes committed abroad.

Investigate thoroughly all allegations of SFOR contractors and U.S. IPTF officers involved in trafficking, the purchase of women or girls and their passports, or witness tampering.

Investigate thoroughly allegations of physical or sexual abuse of women or girls by SFOR contractors in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

Ensure that the records of all investigations are delivered to the Department of Justice and the Department of State. Ensure that federal prosecutors receive all records necessary to bring charges against U.S. contractors found to have engaged in trafficking or other illegal activities related to trafficking in persons.

Prosecute U.S. citizens implicated in participation in trafficking to the fullest extent of the law.

Allocate funds authorized in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act for use in Bosnia and Herzegovina for anti-trafficking training programs for police and prosecutors, financial support for non-governmental organizations fighting trafficking, and for the establishment of witness protection programs.

Condemn the Bosnian government's failure to take effective measures to end impunity for trafficking by continuing to classify the country as a tier three nation in the Trafficking in Persons report, required under the Trafficking Victims Protection Act.

Pressure the United Nations to respond with more transparency on disciplinary proceedings on international personnel accused of involvement in trafficking and trafficking-related crimes.

Thank you.

LOAD-DATE: April 25, 2002

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

COMMITTEE: HOUSE INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

SUBCOMMITTEE: INTERNATIONAL OPERATIONS AND HUMAN RIGHTS

TESTIMONY-BY: MARTINA E. VANDENBERG, J.D., EUROPE RESEARCHER, AFFILIATION: WOMEN'S RIGHTS DIVISION

Copyright 2002 FDCHeMedia, Inc. All Rights Reserved.

343 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Bulletin's Frontrunner

December 3, 2001

State Department Moving To Enforce Human Trafficking Law.

SECTION: International NewsLENGTH: 163 words

The Washington Post/AP (12/3, A19, Holland) reports, "Despite a slow start, US officials say they are moving forward on implementing a law passed by Congress last year cracking down on human trafficking and countries that allow it around the world. 'We have covered a lot of ground, from establishing the new trafficking office to releasing the first Trafficking in Persons report to getting some 85 countries to sign the new UN protocol on trafficking,' Undersecretary of State Paula Dobriansky said." The State Department "opened its Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in October, with a ribbon-cutting ceremony on Nov. 15, Dobriansky said." The first "annual report on human trafficking, issued by the State Department in July, listed 23 countries that were not complying with the law -- including Israel, Greece, Saudi Arabia, Russia, Romania, Turkey and South Korea -- and 47 other 'tier two' nations that did not meet requirements but were making progress."

LOAD-DATE: December 3, 2001LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2001 Bulletin Broadfacing Network, Inc.

344 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Washington Post

washingtonpost.com

The Washington Post

December 3, 2001 Monday
Final Edition

State Department Says It Is Enforcing Law to Combat Human Trafficking

BYLINE: Jesse J. Holland, Associated Press

SECTION: A SECTION; Pg. A19

LENGTH: 448 words

Despite a slow start, U.S. officials say they are moving forward on implementing a law passed by Congress last year cracking down on human trafficking and countries that allow it around the world.

"We have covered a lot of ground, from establishing the new trafficking office to releasing the first Trafficking in Persons report to getting some 85 countries to sign the new U.N. protocol on trafficking," Undersecretary of State Paula Dobriansky said.

Women and children are the main targets of human traffickers. Women and girls are often duped into believing they will become wealthy as maids or dancers. Others are kidnapped. After the women surrender their savings, traffickers often take their passports and pressure them into prostitution or sweatshop labor.

The State Department opened its Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in October, with a ribbon-cutting ceremony on Nov. 15, Dobriansky said.

The first annual report on human trafficking, issued by the State Department in July, listed 23 countries that were not complying with the law -- including Israel, Greece, Saudi Arabia, Russia, Romania, Turkey and South Korea -- and 47 other "tier two" nations that did not meet requirements but were making progress.

"We've been busy," she said. "But we know there remains a lot to be done."

But some lawmakers say more progress should have been made. "I have been deeply concerned about the slow pace," Rep. Christopher H. Smith (R-N.J.) said at a House International Relations Committee hearing. "Many important tasks remain undone."

Smith questioned why the State Department office in charge of enforcing the new law only opened in October and why rules have not yet been issued to allow human trafficking victims to apply for visas as provided by the law.

Smith was one of the driving forces behind the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Prevention Act of 2000, which provides life sentences for some categories of trafficking, threatens sanctions against countries that allow trafficking to flourish and permits victims to remain in the United States, rather than be immediately deported.

Officials say an estimated 700,000 people are taken across borders to work annually. The report said the United States is a transit and destination point, with as many as 50,000 people brought into the country each year.

International Relations Committee Chairman Henry J. Hyde (R-Ill.) said Congress will continue to monitor how quickly the government moves on getting the law enforced.

"A law without vigorous and effective implementation is worse than no law at all, because it lulls us into the false sense that we have done something to solve the problem," he said.

LOAD-DATE: December 3, 2001

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2001 The Washington Post

345 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Online

November 29, 2001 Thursday

Human Trafficking Laws Eyed

BYLINE: JESSE J. HOLLAND; Associated Press WriterSECTION: WASHINGTON DATELINELENGTH: 445 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

Despite a slow start, U.S. government officials say they're moving forward on implementing a law passed by Congress last year cracking down on human trafficking and countries that allow it around the world.

"We have covered a lot of ground, from establishing the new trafficking office to releasing the first Trafficking in Persons report to getting some 85 countries to sign the new UN protocol on trafficking," Undersecretary of State Paula Dobriensky said.

Women and children are the main targets of human traffickers. Women and girls are often duped into believing they will become wealthy as maids or dancers. Others are kidnapped. After the women surrender their savings, traffickers often take their passports and pressure them into prostitution or sweatshop labor.

The State Department opened its Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in October, with a ribbon cutting ceremony on Nov. 15, Dobriensky said. And the first annual report on human trafficking, issued by the State Department in July, listed 23 countries that were not complying with the law - including Israel, Greece, Saudi Arabia, Russia, Romania, Turkey and South Korea - and 47 other "tier two" nations that did not meet requirements but were making progress.

"We've been busy," she said. "But we know there remains a lot to be done."

However, some lawmakers think that more progress should have been made. "I have been deeply concerned about the slow pace," Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J., complained in a House International Relations committee hearing. "Many important tasks remain undone."

Smith questioned why the State Department office in charge with enforcing the new law only opened in October and why rules have not yet been issued to allow human trafficking victims to apply for visas as provided by the law.

Smith was one of the driving forces behind the Victims Trafficking and Violence Prevention Act of 2000, which provides life sentences for some categories of trafficking, threatens sanctions against countries that allow trafficking to flourish and permits victims to remain in the country, rather than be immediately deported.

Officials say an estimated 700,000 people are taken across borders to work annually. The report said America is a transit and destination point, with up to 50,000 people brought into the country each year.

Committee chairman Henry Hyde, R-Ill., said Congress will continue to monitor how quickly the government moves on getting the law enforced. "A law without vigorous and effective implementation is worse than no law at all, because it lulls us into the false sense that we have done something to solve the problem," he said.

LOAD-DATE: November 29, 2001LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

346 of 359 DOCUMENTS

November 29, 2001, Thursday, BC cycle

Government agencies say they're working hard to implement new anti-trafficking law

BYLINE: By JESSE J. HOLLAND, Associated Press Writer

SECTION: Washington Dateline

LENGTH: 446 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Despite a slow start, U.S. government officials say they're moving forward on implementing a law passed by Congress last year cracking down on human trafficking and countries that allow it around the world.

"We have covered a lot of ground, from establishing the new trafficking office to releasing the first Trafficking in Persons report to getting some 85 countries to sign the new UN protocol on trafficking," Undersecretary of State Paula Dobriansky said.

Women and children are the main targets of human traffickers. Women and girls are often duped into believing they will become wealthy as maids or dancers. Others are kidnapped. After the women surrender their savings, traffickers often take their passports and pressure them into prostitution or sweatshop labor.

The State Department opened its Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in October, with a ribbon cutting ceremony on Nov. 15, Dobriansky said. And the first annual report on human trafficking, issued by the State Department in July, listed 23 countries that were not complying with the law - including Israel, Greece, Saudi Arabia, Russia, Romania, Turkey and South Korea - and 47 other "tier two" nations that did not meet requirements but were making progress.

"We've been busy," she said. "But we know there remains a lot to be done."

However, some lawmakers think that more progress should have been made. "I have been deeply concerned about the slow pace," Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J., complained in a House International Relations committee hearing. "Many important tasks remain undone."

Smith questioned why the State Department office in charge with enforcing the new law only opened in October and why rules have not yet been issued to allow human trafficking victims to apply for visas as provided by the law.

Smith was one of the driving forces behind the Victims Trafficking and Violence Prevention Act of 2000, which provides life sentences for some categories of trafficking, threatens sanctions against countries that allow trafficking to flourish and permits victims to remain in the country, rather than be immediately deported.

Officials say an estimated 700,000 people are taken across borders to work annually. The report said America is a transit and destination point, with up to 50,000 people brought into the country each year.

Committee chairman Henry Hyde, R-Ill., said Congress will continue to monitor how quickly the government moves on getting the law enforced. "A law without vigorous and effective implementation is worse than no law at all, because it lulls us into the false sense that we have done something to solve the problem," he said.

LOAD-DATE: November 30, 2001

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

The Associated Press

347 of 359 DOCUMENTS

THE KOREA HERALD

November 2, 2001, Friday

Trapped in modern slavery: Sex trafficking turns Russian women into Korean pawns

BYLINE: By Ben Jhoty Staff reporter

LENGTH: 1762 words

Choice is something Olga, a young woman from Havaropsk in Russia's far east, clings to. Working as a dancer in a bar in Anjeong-ri, a red light area close to the U.S. military base in Pyeongtaek, she says it was her choice to come here. Her choice to leave her boyfriend of four years, her family and her job selling electrical goods. And it is her choice she insists, whether she has sex with customers for money or not. Sadly however, circumstances in Korea's sex industry leave little room for such freedom. Her manager has her passport. She cannot return home until her contract finishes. She must work from 5 p.m. till 2 a.m. seven nights a week, drinking juice while talking to customers and dancing in little more than her underwear once every hour. Living in a small apartment with seven other Russian women, she is given little money for food and must abide by a strict curfew, however, she says she is better off here than she would be back in Russia.

The girls - attractive, fair skinned young women hailing from Russia and former Soviet bloc countries - are but the visible face of an insidious trade that reduces women to little more than commodities and is driven by the realities of the global economy and the U.S. military presence in Asia.

Sex trafficking of women like Olga (the name she gives, although not her real name), has been on the rise in Korea since the late 1990s, when growing numbers of Russian women began to enter the country on E-6 visas reserved for entertainers and artists, ostensibly to work in bars and clubs.

While women from Russia and the CIS are the current "product" of choice in the Korean market, they work alongside women from the Philippines, Bolivia, Peru, Mongolia, China and Bangladesh, taking the place once occupied by Korean women in red light areas near the U.S. military bases in Pyeongtaek, Dongducheon and Gunsan. In Busan, meanwhile, clubs employing Russian women have proliferated in an area known as Texas Street.

Figures from the Immigration Bureau of the Ministry of Justice illustrate the extent of the problem. The number of immigrants issued E-6 entertainment visas jumped to 7,044 last year, from 4,486 in 1999 and 2,150 in 1998. Of last year's total, 3,064 were Russian, 2,927 of them women. This, of course, doesn't take into account the huge number of women working illegally on C-3 tourist visas. According to a report by the Joonggang Ilbo on April 24 this year, up to 6,000 Russian women entered Korea through Busan port and Gimpo airport between January 2000 and March this year.

'The Korean Dream' The phenomenon has been dubbed the "Korean dream" by the Korean media, and while Olga and others like her claim to be happy, her story is laced with dark facts that no amount of shoulder shrugging or game smiles can mask.

Beautiful, statuesque and vivacious, she was recruited by one of the many companies in Havaropsk that advertise for entertainers to work throughout Asia. Only half joking, she says that probably half of the women in Havaropsk are working in countries across Asia and that the competition was so tough she was on a waiting list for two months before being deemed suitable. The company then organized her visa and paid for her flight here, after which a Korean agent decided she would work in Anjeong-ri. Olga says she makes roughly $300 a month compared to under $100 back in Russia, where there are few opportunities, even for educated women. And so, if all goes well she will probably remain in Korea next year, after her contract finishes in May.

While Olga is frank about her circumstances and appears relatively sanguine, Kim Joo-young, secretary general of Saewoomtuh, a civic group that provides shelter and counseling to women involved in the sex trade around U.S. bases, says that though many women like Olga try to be positive about their circumstances, they are merely burying the shame and humiliation they feel. "They try to justify it, by saying 'I'm just an entertainer', but when they sell their body they feel awful," he said.

Living in oppressive conditions with little freedom, they must abide by a strict curfew, Kim says, and are prohibited from making contact with outsiders during non-working hours. It was this kind of detainment he says, that led to five foreign women dying in a fire in a Gunsan house last year. Sometimes packed into one room with six or more women, they often survive on little more than ramyeon and are forced to work, even when ill.

Saewoomtuh volunteer Teresa Oh, who through her counseling and support has won the confidence of many foreign women, is in a position to offer deeper insight into the anguish they feel. She says the women mentally condition themselves to cope with the physical demands imposed on them by drinking alcohol to drown the pain and shame and sometimes take drugs to help cope with the ordeal.

Oh, who usually contacts the women through a third party and strives to develop a rapport with them, said they feel stress, anger and frustration at the inhumane conditions inherent in their job.

The nightmare of prostitution According to Oh, while some women such as Olga insist that it is their choice as to whether they sleep with customers or not, their circumstances leave them little alternative. "They have no choice except to work in prostitution, because they have to earn money to repay their debt to the trafficker, which can range from $3,000 to $30,000, depending on where they come from," she said.

Kim Joo-young agrees. "They have two sentiments in conflict: 'I want to escape the situation but I came here to make money and I have to support my family,'" he said.

According to a report by Saewoomtuh titled "The Reality of Prostituted Women in South Korea," women must sit by customers and drink more than 200 glasses of juice per month. If they fail to meet the quota, as most do, they have to "sell tickets" also known as "barfine," meaning prostitution. The cost of the barfine depends on the time, amounting to U.S. $300 in the early evening and U.S. $150-$200 in the late evening. Korean customers have to pay 200,000-250,000 won. The women receive 30 percent, although the money is usually not paid to them directly but instead reduces the number of glasses they must drink. If the women fall short of the 200-glass quota they receive severe verbal abuse and often have part of their wages extorted, the report said.

In Pusan, the problem is even more acute, with large numbers of Russian women from Vladivostok and Havaropsk entering through the port. The Association for Foreign Workers' Human Rights in Pusan (FWR) compiled a report last year titled "Russian Migrant women in Entertainment sites in Pusan." The report found that women working in the Texas street area were isolated due to language barriers, and since many had overstayed on E-6 visas or were working illegally on C-3 visas, were unable to seek legal recourse for human rights violations. They also received no medical services or STD tests. Many also had their passports confiscated, had to abide by a strict curfew and were openly asked to engage in prostitution by club owners, the report said.

Is there a way out? Naturally, large numbers of women flee such circumstances. However, foreign sex workers have few avenues for assistance. "They feel completely isolated because they can't get help from their embassies," said Kim Joo-young. "They are here on E-6 visas for entertainment, so as soon as they escape from their clubs they become illegal aliens and are sent to an immigration detention center and deported."

The Russian embassy was asked for its position on the issue but declined to comment on the record.

Despite anti-prostitution laws that have been in place since 1961, crimes related to human trafficking have been on the increase in Korea and the country was rated in the third tier, comprising 23 countries in regard to human trafficking by the U.S. State department earlier this year.

While the report titled "Trafficking in Persons" labeled Korea a country of origin and transit, it only briefly made reference to the country as a destination for human trafficking, saying that the government treated aliens as immigration law violators and subsequently deported them. The Korean government responded by saying it has made it a rule to treat these women leniently, returning them to their country of origin rather than punishing them. It also pointed out that those women should not be categorized as trafficking victims, since they voluntarily engaged in certain activities to make money.

According to Kim Joo-young, the State Department's rating was fair. "That the government argues that it was groundless is funny to me. I believe it was deserved," he said.

Teresa Oh, meanwhile, said that as the rating was based on Korea as a country of origin and transit, rather than destination, it was not accurate. In contrast to the justice ministry however, she believed that the women were victims of trafficking. "Because the contract is vague and deceitful ... they do not know they have been trafficked for the sex industry," she said. "Being trafficked for the sex industry means that women are denied their dignity and human rights as people, they are exploited for the financial gain of their brokers and are forced into situations of prostitution."

Both Oh and Kim called for the government to draw up legislation and develop strategies for prevention, protection, prosecution, reintegration and repatriation. Kim said Saewoomtuh and other civic groups are pushing for a revision of the Anti-Prostitution law, which would be inclusive of prohibiting sex trafficking in Korea.

The justice ministry as recently as this week announced that it is considering banning hotels ranked second class and below and hotels and restaurants outside special tourist zones and regions where U.S. troops are stationed, from hiring foreign entertainers. This measure however, would not have any effect on the red light areas around the U.S. bases.

In regard to the revision of the anti-prostitution law, an official from the women's policy bureau at the justice ministry said, "In the past, prostitutes were considered law breakers. However, this bill intends to view prostitutes as victims of organized crime and therefore protect them while being directed at the organizers." He continued that although various civic groups were pushing for the bill to go before the national assembly this year, it was unlikely.

(bjhoty@hotmail.com)

LOAD-DATE: November 01, 2001

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2001 The Korea Herald

348 of 359 DOCUMENTS

July 20, 2001

NEW LITHUANIAN INTERIOR MINISTER SAYS NATION FIGHTING HUMAN TRAFFICKING

LENGTH: 588 words

DATELINE: VILNIUS, Jul 20

Lithuania's new interior minister Juozas Bernatonis says Lithuania really is fighting and determined to stop human trafficking.

The minister was commenting to BNS Friday in response to the first annual report by the U.S. State Department on human trafficking worldwide. The report put Lithuania in a second tier along with 43 other states it said failed to meet minimum criteria in the war on human trafficking but were making significant efforts to stop the practice.

Minister Bernatonis told BNS his ministry doesn't have any information on what the U.S. State Department defines as minimal criteria.

He said Lithuania is taking strong measures to stop human trafficking.

He cited a draft project called Prostitution and Human Trafficking Control and Prevention Program, slated for consideration in the government cabinet soon.

The program is aimed at curbing the causes of prostitution and human trafficking and will create a system of prevention measures to stop sex-slavery, prostitution and human trafficking as well as organized crime syndicates profiting from these practices.

The new program will bring Lithuanian law enforcement and other governmental institutions up to date, encourage action by NGOs, put the heat on criminal gangs specializing in human trafficking, create a social support system to keep people from entering prostitution, institute social as well as psychological and legal help for victims, step up the system for searching for lost and missing persons, create a framework for sharing information on human trafficking and its prevention and investigation and expand international cooperation.

The Lithuanian State Border Security Service under the Interior Ministry should soon introduce a new digital data base containing information on people detained with false passports, suspected of pimping or trafficking in humans, missing persons and people deported from and to Lithuania. Recommendations contained in international agreements for controlling human trafficking and the sex trade are also scheduled for implementation.

Minister Bernatonis said the Lithuanian criminal code was updated in 1998 with an additional section on human trafficking. The new article of legislation provides penalties for human trafficking from 4 to 8 years imprisonment, and in extreme cases from 6 to 12 years.

The Lithuanian minister presented information showing there were 4 criminal cases brought last year under the law. During the first half of this year an additional five charges have been brought in Lithuania for human trafficking.

"Unfortunately there haven't been any convictions on human trafficking in Lithuania yet," Bernatonis said. He said there were objective as well as subjective reasons behind the lack of a conviction so far.

Commonly investigations into human trafficking take a long time because victims are usually abroad, and interviews with witnesses are drawn out because of the time it takes to correspond with foreign law enforcement agencies.

"Moreover, we haven't signed the needed treaties on cooperation in criminal and other cases with every country," Bernatonis said, mentioning Germany as a prime example.

The U.S. State Department report on human trafficking around the world was released last week.

The new annual report is required by a law passed in the U.S. last fall introducing sanctions beginning in 2003 against countries which don't take measures to fight human trafficking or don't provide for victims' safety.

LOAD-DATE: July 21, 2001

LANGUAGE: English

PUB-TYPE: News

Copyright 2001 Baltic News Service

349 of 359 DOCUMENTS

THE KOREA HERALD

July 18, 2001, Wednesday

Human trafficking in Korea

LENGTH: 720 words

The U.S. State Department's report on trafficking in persons is a shocking reminder to South Koreans that, in spite of all the phenomenal growth in many areas, their society still has some distance to go before shedding its disgraceful reputation for fostering the abominable business of dealing in human beings. In the first report of its kind offering a nation-by-nation account on human trafficking in 82 countries around the world, South Korea takes an inglorious place among the so-called "third tier" group. Twenty-three nations belong to this category reserved for those nations "that do not meet the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking and are not making significant efforts to do so."

According to the U.S. Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000 that required the report, these nations could become subject to sanctions on non-humanitarian and non-trade-related assistance if they fail to improve their standards by 2003. Aside from the possible economic disadvantages, it should certainly be insulting for many Koreans who believe that their society has shown remarkable progress in terms of democracy and human rights.

The government embarrassment was reflected in the statement by the Foreign Ministry expressing regret over the report's portrayal of Korea in a negative light without sufficient analysis of its situation. The ministry called on Washington to revise the report, arguing that the Korean government is doing its utmost to crack down on human trafficking by implementing laws and joining related international conventions. It is a shame however that, contrary to its stance, the government hardly seems to do its very best. Those who feel this assessment is unfair need only take heed of a lawyer's recent revelations about the case of five young women who were burned to death in an iron-barred brothel room in Gunsan, North Jeolla Province last year. The tragic death of these women, who were all in their early 20s and enslaved due to perennial debt bondage, epitomized the inhumane sufferings of most women in the profession anywhere. Strangely, however, the case was brought to a quick close after a brief investigation that brought nobody under due punishment. Now to our dismay, some 10 months after the unfortunate young women perished in the flames, it has been made known that some officials of the provincial city were provided with sexual services by the brothel owners for closing their eyes on the illegal businesses. This represents a classic case of lobbying at the expense of the exploitation of hapless women. It is a sad fact that Gunsan is by no means the only city where prostituted women find themselves shackled by debts and threats of physical and mental abuse. And what is even more serious is that the sex industry is so widespread throughout our society that a debate has begun in public whether it is becoming necessary to consider decriminalizing prostitution and designating certain areas for its lawful practice. This is truly disturbing, because decriminalizing prostitution is tantamount to the legalization of human trafficking, albeit in limited areas, in a most despicable form. This should not be allowed to happen because the idea goes against time, the principle of human dignity and the equal rights of genders.

The State Department report describes Korea as a "country of origin and transit in trafficking in persons." The report elaborates on the trafficking of young Korean women for sexual exploitation in other countries. It also brings to light Korea's role in the smuggling of women from other countries "through visa fraud and possession or sale of fraudulent civil documents, against which there are no laws to regulate."

Protesting what appeared to be an unfair report is one thing but, on the other hand, the government should also take stern measures to root out those immoral businesses. Yet, no smaller challenge facing the nation is stemming the growing moral laxity and demands for commercialized sex among people of various age groups, which has much to do with a quest for easy money and greater pleasure. This is a crucial issue that the nation should tackle with a carefully-considered strategy in order to prevent our society from turning increasingly shallow and vulgar.

LOAD-DATE: July 17, 2001

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2001 The Korea Herald

350 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

July 13, 2001, Friday

TAIWAN RECOGNIZED IN EFFORTS TO STAMP OUT HUMAN SMUGGLING

BYLINE: By Nelson Chung and Flor WangLENGTH: 299 wordsDATELINE: Washington, July 12

Taiwan and Hong Kong were named in a U.S. report released Thursday by the State Department as tier-one states which are judged to fully comply with the seven criteria laid out in the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act 2000.

Austria, Belgium, Britain, Canada, Colombia, Germany, Holland, Italy, Spain, and Switzerland also belong to the group of tier-one states for their efforts to conform to the law's minimum standards despite the fact that there are still victims of human trafficking in those countries.

The U. S. government thinks that tier-one states should vigorously investigate acts of trafficking, protect victims and adopt measures to prevent trafficking and cooperate with other countries to cut down on the buying and selling of people.

Mainland China, Japan, France, and 44 other countries are tier-two countries, as they are judged to be making noticeable efforts to bring themselves into line with the law, although they are not yet in full compliance.

A total of 23 countries, such as Russian, Sudan, Saudi Arabia, Greece, South Korea, Turkey and Israel, made the tier-three group, according to the report. They are judged not to be making significant moves to resolve the problem.

According to the report, the first of its kind in U. S. history, root causes of trafficking include greed, moral turpitude, economics, political instability and political transition.

Some 700,000 people around the world, from both developed and developing countries, are smuggled across international borders and forced into the sex trade, sweatshops, construction sites and into farm labor after being drawn in by human cargo rings in the hope of seeking a better life and opportunities, the report said.

LOAD-DATE: July 15, 2001LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2001 Central News Agency

351 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Jerusalem Post

July 13, 2001, Friday

US: Israel among states lax on human trafficking

BYLINE: Janine Zacharia

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 6A

LENGTH: 557 words

WASHINGTON - The US has grouped Israel among countries most lax in fighting human trafficking.

In its first annual "Trafficking in Persons" report the State Department yesterday listed Israel in "Tier 3 a group of 23 nations that do not take minimal measures to halt the buying and selling of people, mainly women and children, across their borders.

Under the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act passed last year by Congress, any country still listed in Tier 3 in the 2003 report will be subject to economic sanctions, though the president can waive the penalties if it is in the US national interest to do so. Israel receives just under $ 3 billion in assistance from the US each year.

The Government of Israel does not meet the minimum standards for combating trafficking in persons and has not yet made significant efforts to combat the problem although it has begun to take some steps to do so the report said. The government recognizes that trafficking in persons is a problem but devotes limited resources to combating it."

The report criticized Israel for not working enough with other governments on trafficking cases. It also said Israel has not conducted anti-trafficking campaigns or other efforts aimed at prevention does not actively encourage victims to raise charges against traffickers, and provides inadequate funds to Israeli non-governmental organizations who assist victims of trafficking.

"The State Department report could cost the State of Israel its US foreign assistance. We hope that this report will cause the Israeli authorities to understand the seriousness of the problem and begin to treat the phenomenon with the seriousness it deserves said a statement issued by Kav LaOved (Workers' Hot Line), a volunteer organization that assists foreign workers and victims of trafficking in Israel.

Israel has long been a top destination for women trafficked primarily from former Soviet republics like Russia, Ukraine, and Moldova.

According to Kav LaOved director Sigal Rozen, police estimate between 2,000 and 3,000 women are trafficked into Israel each year, the bulk of them forced into prostitution by traffickers who take all the money the women earn.

According to Kav LaOved, 392 foreign women without proper work or residential permits were arrested in brothels throughout the country last year. All of them were bought or sold at least once, but only a handful testified against the people who had brought them to Israel.

Israel said it is studying the report.

Israel takes the issues raised very seriously. We received the report today and are studying it closely. Israel is making an ongoing effort to improve our record both in updating laws and enhancing policing. We hope that our effort will be reflected in next year's report said Mark Regev, spokesman for the Israeli Embassy in Washington.

Secretary of State Colin Powell told a news conference yesterday that the overwhelming majority of the victims of trafficking worldwide are women and children who have been lured coerced or abducted by criminals who trade in human misery." He called for collective action by all nations to deal with the problem.

Among the other countries listed in Tier 3 were Bahrain Lebanon Qatar Saudi Arabia Sudan United Arab Emirates Greece and Turkey.

LOAD-DATE: July 27, 2001

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2001 The Jerusalem Post

352 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Knight Ridder Washington Bureau

July 13, 2001, Friday

Many nations not fighting human trafficking, State Department reports

BYLINE: By Warren P. Strobel

SECTION: WASHINGTON DATELINE

LENGTH: 791 words

WASHINGTON _ Many nations have failed to fight "a modern-day form of slavery" that ensnares 700,000 people every year, mostly women and children, the State Department said in a report released Thursday.

The report cited several close U.S. allies, including Israel, Saudi Arabia, South Korea and Turkey, as not meeting minimum standards for prohibiting trafficking in humans across their borders and prescribing stringent punishments for it.

Others in that category include Russia and several Balkan nations, where women seeking better lives frequently are duped into sexual bondage abroad, and Sudan, where militias abduct women and children and force them into slavery.

The 102-page document is the first official U.S. government report on the subject. It divides countries where a problem with human trafficking could be documented into three categories, or "tiers," that reflect a country's level of efforts against the problem. The data could be used in the future to restrict U.S. foreign aid to nations that do not comply with minimum standards in fighting trafficking.

U.S. officials said that by issuing the report, required annually under a law passed last year, they were not trying to embarrass individual nations but to underscore the need for cooperative international efforts against a problem that has received little attention until recently.

"It is incomprehensible that trafficking in human beings should be taking place in the 21st century. Incomprehensible, but it's true. Very true," said Secretary of State Colin Powell. "We hope that this report will help to focus international attention on this abhorrent practice and galvanize systemic worldwide efforts to combat it."

Recent articles by Knight Ridder correspondents documented how enslaved boys as young as 11 pick cocoa beans in Ivory Coast that can end up in Americans' chocolate.

Ivory Coast, according to the report, is a "tier 2" country, meaning it does not comply with minimum standards to combat human trafficking but is making significant efforts to do so. The report cited Ivorian authorities' prosecution of at least 22 traffickers and the repatriation of 3,000 children to their home countries.

An earlier Knight Ridder investigation described how women from Nepal, Brazil and Ukraine were tricked or forced into sexual servitude.

The United States itself is far from immune from the problem. An estimated 45,000 to 50,000 people are trafficked into this country each year, the State Department report said.

Sen. Paul Wellstone, a co-author of last year's law, praised the report. "Often, trafficking is treated as an issue of illegal immigration and criminal activity," the Minnesota Democrat said. "Trafficking is a profound human rights abuse _ a modern-day form of slavery _ and I believe the report released today recognizes this."

The law, signed last October by President Bill Clinton, would block U.S. foreign aid, except for humanitarian and trade-related assistance, to countries that do not meet the minimum standards for trying to stop human trafficking.

The sanctions would not take effect until 2003, however, and the law gives the president broad authority to waive them. Powell and other top aides to President Bush have expressed caution about economic sanctions as a foreign policy tool, saying the United States often has been too quick to impose them.

State Department officials said they preferred working with countries on the issue to sanctioning them.

"This report is about trying to raise awareness around the world and get nations together to have dialogue to work to resolve this problem. This is not intended, although there will always be that aspect of it, to point fingers," Assistant Secretary of State Rand Beers said.

The report puts 23 countries in the "tier three" category, those that do not comply with minimum anti-trafficking standards and are not making significant efforts to do so.

They are Albania, Bahrain, Belarus, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Burma, Democratic Republic of Congo, Gabon, Greece, Indonesia, Israel, Kazakhstan, Lebanon, Malaysia, Pakistan, Qatar, Romania, Russia, Saudi Arabia, South Korea, Sudan, Turkey, United Arab Emirates and Yugoslavia.

Israel, a major destination for women from the former Soviet Union lured into prostitution, recognizes it has a problem "but devotes limited resources to combating it," the report said. Victims get little protection, it said.

In Saudi Arabia, expatriate workers from Asia frequently are forced into domestic servitude or sexual exploitation. The Saudi government "does not believe that trafficking is a problem" because the workers come to Saudi Arabia voluntarily, the report said.

(c) 2001, Knight Ridder/Tribune Information Services.

LOAD-DATE: July 13, 2001

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

KR-ACC-NO: K0952

JOURNAL-CODE: WA

Copyright 2001 Knight Ridder/Tribune News Service
Knight Ridder/Tribune News Service

353 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Pakistan Newswire

July 13, 2001 Friday

Foreign: US blacklists 23 countries for violation of human traffickingSECTION: Nationwide International NewsLENGTH: 556 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, July 13

The United States has issued a news list of 23 countries including their allies Israel and Saudi Arabia which have been blacklisted for failing to tackle human trafficking.

Secretary of State of USA Colin Powell released the report Thursday with a view to withholding U.S. aid from nations who fail to address the issue by 2003.

Powell said report should make it abundantly clear that trafficking is going on all over the world in both developed and developing countries, even within the United States.

At least 700,000 people around the world fall victim to the practice every year, Powell said. Between 40,000 and 50,000 of them end up in the United States, the report noted. He said most victims are women and children who have been duped or coerced by criminals.

He said deprived of the most fundamental human rights, subjected to threats and violence, victims of trafficking are made to toil under horrific conditions in shops and on construction sites, in fields and in brothels.

In the first annual "Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act," Israel was in the lowest category, "tier three," as a trafficking destination mainly for women from ex-Soviet states, Brazil, Turkey, South Africa and Asia.

In a sign this key U.S. ally could end up getting a waiver, however, the State Department has claimed that the Israeli government had "begun to take some steps" to combat the problem.

Under the law, the president can exempt any country from sanctions if punishing them is seen as counter-productive to fighting the problem -- or against U.S. national interests.

The report stated that Greece, a transit and destination point, "Has not yet acknowledged publicly that trafficking is a problem.

In Saudi Arabia, some expatriate workers were "forced into domestic servitude and sexual exploitation," it added.

Another U.S. ally in tier three was South Korea, a source of women forced into the sex industry primarily in the United States but also in other Western countries and Japan. The others countries in tier three are Albania, Bahrain, Belarus, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Democratic Republic of Congo, Gabon, Indonesia, Kazakhstan, Lebanon, Malaysia, Myanmar, Pakistan, Qatar, Romania, Russia, Sudan, Turkey, United Arab Emirates and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.

"It s a clear message to all countries, including even some of our closest allies: If you do not make ending the trafficking in human beings a top priority, you will place at jeopardy your relations with the United States," said Rep. Chris Smith, a New Jersey Republican who co-authored the law. Fellow co-authors, Sens. Paul Wellstone and Sam Brownback also praised the report, with Brownback calling it "one volley in that global fight for the freedom of countless people."

The report stated that 47 countries in "tier two," which included countries like China, France and Japan that failed to meet minimum standards, but were trying to.

Countries put in "tier one," ranked because they had a significant number of victims, got into the top category by prosecuting those behind the illegal trade, protecting the victims and sponsoring or coordinating prevention campaigns. Britain, Canada, Germany and Hong Kong were in this section, along with Austria, Belgium, Colombia, Italy, the Netherlands, Spain, Switzerland and Taiwan.

LOAD-DATE: July 15, 2001

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2001 Pakistan Press International

354 of 359 DOCUMENTS

The Philadelphia Inquirer

Found on Philly.com
The Philadelphia Inquirer

JULY 13, 2001 Friday CITY-D EDITION

State Dept. cites nations for human trafficking

BYLINE: Warren P. Strobel INQUIRER WASHINGTON BUREAU

SECTION: NATIONAL; Pg. A02

LENGTH: 628 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Many nations have failed to fight trafficking in humans across their borders, "a modern-day form of slavery" that ensnares 700,000 people every year, mostly women and children, the State Department said in a report released yesterday.

The report cites several close U.S. allies, including Israel, Saudi Arabia, South Korea and Turkey, as not meeting minimum standards, such as prohibiting trafficking and prescribing stringent punishments for it.

Others in that category include Russia and several Balkan nations, where women seeking better lives frequently are duped into sexual bondage abroad, and Sudan, where militias abduct women and children and force them into slavery. Traffickers also force people to work in sweatshops, construction sites and fields.

The 102-page document is the first official U.S. government report on the subject. It divides countries where a problem with human trafficking could be documented into three categories, or "tiers," that reflect a country's level of effort in combating the problem. The data could be used in the future to restrict U.S. aid to nations that do not comply with minimum standards in fighting trafficking.

U.S. officials said that by issuing the report, required annually under a law passed last year, they were not trying to embarrass individual nations but to underscore the need for cooperative international efforts against a problem that has received little attention until recently.

"It is incomprehensible that trafficking in human beings should be taking place in the 21st century. Incomprehensible, but it's true. Very true," Secretary of State Colin L. Powell said. "We hope that this report will help to focus international attention on this abhorrent practice and galvanize systemic worldwide efforts to combat it."

Recent articles by Knight Ridder correspondents documented how enslaved boys as young as 11 pick cocoa beans in Ivory Coast that can end up in Americans' chocolate.

Ivory Coast, according to the report, is a "tier two" country, meaning it does not comply with minimum standards to combat human trafficking but is making significant efforts to do so. The report cited Ivorian authorities' prosecution of 22 traffickers and the repatriation of 3,000 children to their home countries.

The United States itself is far from immune from the trafficking problem. An estimated 45,000 to 50,000 people are trafficked into this country each year, the State Department report said.

Sen. Paul Wellstone (D., Minn.), a coauthor of last year's law, praised the report. "Often, trafficking is treated as an issue of illegal immigration and criminal activity," he said. "Trafficking is a profound human-rights abuse - a modern-day form of slavery - and I believe the report released today recognizes this."

The report puts 23 countries in the "tier three" category, those that do not comply with minimum antitrafficking standards and are not making significant efforts to do so.

They are Albania, Bahrain, Belarus, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Congo, Gabon, Greece, Indonesia, Israel, Kazakstan, Lebanon, Malaysia, Myanmar, Pakistan, Qatar, Romania, Russia, Saudi Arabia, South Korea, Sudan, Turkey, United Arab Emirates and Yugoslavia.

Israel, a major destination for women from the former Soviet Union lured into prostitution, recognizes it has a problem "but devotes limited resources to combating it," the report said. Victims get little protection, it said.

In Saudi Arabia, expatriate workers from Asia frequently are forced into domestic servitude or sexual exploitation. The Saudi government "does not believe that trafficking is a problem" because the workers come to Saudi Arabia voluntarily, the report said.

Warren P. Strobel's e-mail address is wstrobel@krwashington.com.

LOAD-DATE: October 31, 2001

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2001 Philadelphia Newspapers, LLC
All Rights Reserved

355 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Saint Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 13, 2001 Friday CITY EDITION

U.S. REPORT CRITICIZES 'SLAVERY'BYLINE: WARREN STROBEL, WASHINGTON BUREAUSECTION: MAIN; Pg. A2LENGTH: 371 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

Many nations have failed to fight "a modern-day form of slavery" that ensnares 700,000 people every year, mostly women and children, the State Department said in a report released Thursday.

The report cited several close U.S. allies, including Israel, Saudi Arabia, South Korea and Turkey, as not meeting minimum standards for prohibiting trafficking in humans across their borders and prescribing tough punishments for it.

Others include Russia and several Balkan nations, where women seeking better lives frequently are duped into sexual bondage abroad, and Sudan, where militias abduct women and children and force them into slavery.

The 102-page document is the first official U.S. government report on the subject. It divides countries where a problem with human trafficking could be documented into three categories, or "tiers," that reflect a country's level of efforts against the problem.

U.S. officials said that by issuing the report, required annually under a law passed last year, they were not trying to embarrass individual nations but to underscore the need for cooperative international efforts against a problem that has received little attention until recently.

"It is incomprehensible that trafficking in human beings should be taking place in the 21st century," said Secretary of State Colin Powell. "We hope that this report will help to focus international attention on this abhorrent practice."

The United States itself is far from immune from the problem. An estimated 45,000 to 50,000 people are trafficked into this country yearly, the State Department report said.

Sen. Paul Wellstone, a co-author of last year's law, praised the report. "Often, trafficking is treated as an issue of illegal immigration and criminal activity," the Minnesota Democrat said. "Trafficking is a profound human rights abuse -- a modern-day form of slavery -- and I believe the report released today recognizes this."

The law, signed last October by President Clinton, would block U.S. foreign aid, except for humanitarian and trade-related assistance, to countries that do not meet the minimum standards for trying to stop human trafficking.

This report includes information from the Associated Press.

LOAD-DATE: November 1, 2001LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

356 of 359 DOCUMENTS

San Jose Mercury News (California)

July 13, 2001 Friday MORNING FINAL EDITION

U.S. ENCOURAGES NATIONS TO END HUMAN TRAFFICKING

BYLINE: WARREN P. STROBEL, Mercury News Washington Bureau

SECTION: FRONT; Pg. 4A

LENGTH: 796 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Many nations have failed to fight "a modern-day form of slavery" that ensnares 700,000 people every year, mostly women and children, the State Department said in a report released Thursday.

The report cited several close U.S. allies, including Israel, Saudi Arabia, South Korea and Turkey, as not meeting minimum standards for prohibiting trafficking in humans across their borders and prescribing stringent punishments for it.

Others in that category include Russia and several Balkan nations, where women seeking better lives frequently are duped into sexual bondage abroad, and Sudan, where militias abduct women and children and force them into slavery.

The 102-page document is the first official U.S. government report on the subject. It divides countries where a problem with human trafficking could be documented into three categories, or "tiers," that reflect a country's level of efforts against the problem. The data could be used in the future to restrict U.S. foreign aid to nations that do not comply with minimum standards in fighting trafficking.

Call for cooperation

U.S. officials said that by issuing the report, required annually under a law passed last year, they were not trying to embarrass individual nations but to underscore the need for cooperative international efforts against a problem that has received little attention until recently.

"It is incomprehensible that trafficking in human beings should be taking place in the 21st century. Incomprehensible, but it's true. Very true," said Secretary of State Colin Powell. "We hope that this report will help to focus international attention on this abhorrent practice and galvanize systemic worldwide efforts to combat it."

Recent articles by the Mercury News Africa Bureau documented how enslaved boys as young as 11 pick cocoa beans in Ivory Coast that can end up in Americans' chocolate.

Ivory Coast, according to the report released Thursday, is a "tier two" country, meaning it does not comply with minimum standards to combat human trafficking but is making significant efforts to do so. The report cited Ivorian authorities' prosecution of at least 22 traffickers and the repatriation of 3,000 children to their home countries.

An earlier Mercury News investigation described how women from Nepal, Brazil and Ukraine were tricked or forced into sexual servitude.

U.S. troubles

The United States itself is far from immune from the problem. An estimated 45,000 to 50,000 people are trafficked into this country each year, the State Department report said.

Sen. Paul Wellstone, a co-author of last year's law, praised the report. "Often, trafficking is treated as an issue of illegal immigration and criminal activity," the Minnesota Democrat said. "Trafficking is a profound human rights abuse -- a modern-day form of slavery -- and I believe the report released today recognizes this."

The law, signed last October by President Clinton, would block U.S. foreign aid, except for humanitarian and trade-related assistance, to countries that do not meet the minimum standards for trying to stop human trafficking.

Flexible law

The sanctions would not take effect until 2003, however, and the law gives the president broad authority to waive them. Powell and other top aides to President Bush have expressed caution about economic sanctions as a foreign-policy tool, saying the United States often has been too quick to impose them.

State Department officials said they preferred working with countries on the issue to sanctioning them.

"This report is about trying to raise awareness around the world and get nations together to have dialogue to work to resolve this problem. This is not intended, although there will always be that aspect of it, to point fingers," Assistant Secretary of State Rand Beers said.

The report puts 23 countries in the "tier three" category, those that do not comply with minimum anti-trafficking standards and are not making significant efforts to do so.

They are Albania, Bahrain, Belarus, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Burma, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Gabon, Greece, Indonesia, Israel, Kazakhstan, Lebanon, Malaysia, Pakistan, Qatar, Romania, Russia, Saudi Arabia, South Korea, Sudan, Turkey, the United Arab Emirates and Yugoslavia.

Israel, a major destination for women from the former Soviet Union lured into prostitution, recognizes it has a problem "but devotes limited resources to combating it," the report said. Victims get little protection, it said.

In Saudi Arabia, expatriate workers from Asia frequently are forced into domestic servitude or sexual exploitation. The Saudi government "does not believe that trafficking is a problem" because the workers come to Saudi Arabia voluntarily, the report said.

LOAD-DATE: December 2, 2001

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2001 San Jose Mercury News
All Rights Reserved

357 of 359 DOCUMENTS

U.S. Newswire

July 13, 2001 Friday

Helsinki Commissioners Praise Report on Trafficking in Persons; Report a Manifestation of Legislation to Combat Modern Day Slavery

SECTION: National and International Desks

LENGTH: 459 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, July 13

United States Helsinki Commission Co-Chairman Rep. Christopher H. Smith (R-N.J.) and Commissioner Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), principal sponsors of the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act, commended the State Department for its first annual report on human trafficking on Thursday.

"Friends don't let friends commit human rights violations," Smith said. "With the release of this report on trafficking in persons, the United States has demonstrated bold leadership in the battle to end the trade in human beings. We wrote this law precisely for the purpose of setting a benchmark from which to judge the efforts and progress in those countries where the trafficking problems are most egregious," Smith said.

Trafficking in human beings "includes the classic and awful elements associated with historic slavery such as abduction from family and home, use of false promises, transport to a strange country, loss of freedom and personal dignity, extreme physical abuse and depravation," said Sen. Brownback.

The report is mandated by the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act, which was signed into law on October 28, 2000. The State Department will issue the Trafficking in Persons report annually and may also issue interim reports. Beginning in 2003, those countries that are listed in Tier 3 -- signifying that they do not satisfy the law's minimum standards to combat trafficking and are not making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards -- may be denied non-humanitarian assistance from the United States, barring a Presidential waiver.

Nine of the current "Tier 3" countries -- namely Albania, Belarus, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Greece, Kazakhstan, Romania, Russia, Turkey, and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia -- have committed in the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe to punish those who traffic in human beings and to better protect their victims.

"The United States expects the OSCE countries to fulfill their commitments. If the countries listed in Tier 3 needed a reminder of the importance that the United States places on combating human trafficking, then this report is it," Smith said. Earlier this week, Smith successfully advanced a resolution against trafficking at the annual meeting of the OSCE's Parliamentary Assembly.

"This report will serve as a catalyst for reinvigorated international efforts to end this scourge," said Smith. "We will just as vigilantly work to expeditiously implement those provisions of the legislation that provide tough new penalties for persons convicted of trafficking in the United States-up to life imprisonment-as well as compassionate new protections for victims of trafficking here," said Smith.

CONTACT: Ben Anderson of the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe, 202-225-1901 Web site: <http://www.csce.gov>

LOAD-DATE: July 13, 2001

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

All Rights Reserved

358 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

July 12, 2001, Thursday

U.S. raps Japan for lack of action to prevent human trafficking

LENGTH: 413 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, July 12 Kyodo

The United States on Thursday criticized Japan for lack of full actions to protect the victims of trafficking in persons.

Japan is a destination country for women, primarily from Asian countries, such as Thailand and the Philippines, who are trafficked for purposes of sexual exploitation, the State Department said in a report.

The department said some law enforcement units in Japan have been 'reluctant' to investigate reports of trafficking and that the Japanese government has 'not been aggressive' in arresting and prosecuting suspected traffickers.

'Victims are often treated as criminals (prostitutes or illegal aliens) by the legal system because the government does not consider people who willingly enter for illegal work to be trafficking victims,' it said.

The report, compiled under the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000, classified countries in three tiers, depending on their legal systems and government measures to combat human trafficking.

Japan was placed on Tier 2 -- countries that do not yet fully comply with the act's minimum standards but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards.

According to the report, at least 700,000 persons, especially women and children, are trafficked each year across international borders and victims are forced to toil in sweatshops, construction sites, brothels, and fields.

Criminal groups choose to traffic in human beings as well because it is highly profitable, the report added.

As for China, which was also put on Tier 2, the department said most trafficking is internal.

'The vast majority of internal trafficking is for the purpose of providing lower-middle income farmers with brides or sons,' it said.

The department placed South Korea on Tier 3 -- countries which do not fully comply with the act's minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance.

'South Korea is a country of origin and transit for trafficking in persons. Young female Koreans are trafficked primarily for sexual exploitation, mainly to the United States, but also to other Western countries and Japan,' it said.

The report said the South Korean government has done little to combat this relatively new and worsening problem of trafficking in persons.

The department defined Tier 1 countries as those which fully comply with the law's minimum standards. Hong Kong and Taiwan are on Tier 1.

LOAD-DATE: July 13, 2001

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

359 of 359 DOCUMENTS

Knight Ridder Washington Bureau

July 12, 2001, Thursday

State Department Report Reveals Counties with 'Modern-Day' Slavery

BYLINE: By Warren P. Strobel

LENGTH: 1033 words

WASHINGTON -- Many nations have failed to fight trafficking in humans across their borders, "a modern-day form of slavery" that ensnares 700,000 people every year, mostly women and children, the State Department said in a report released Thursday.

The report cites several close U.S. allies, including Israel, Saudi Arabia, South Korea and Turkey, as not meeting minimum standards, such as prohibiting trafficking and prescribing stringent punishments for it.

Others in that category include Russia and several Balkan nations, where women seeking better lives frequently are duped into sexual bondage abroad, and Sudan, where militias abduct women and children and force them into slavery.

The 102-page document is the first official U.S. government report on the subject. It divides countries where a problem with human trafficking could be documented into three categories, or "tiers," that reflect a country's level of effort in combating the problem. The data could be used in the future to restrict U.S. foreign aid to nations that do not comply with minimum standards in fighting trafficking.

U.S. officials said that by issuing the report, required annually under a law passed last year, they were not trying to embarrass individual nations but to underscore the need for cooperative international efforts against a problem that has received little attention until recently.

"It is incomprehensible that trafficking in human beings should be taking place in the 21st century. Incomprehensible, but it's true. Very true," said Secretary of State Colin Powell. "We hope that this report will help to focus international attention on this abhorrent practice and galvanize systemic worldwide efforts to combat it."

Recent articles by Knight Ridder correspondents documented how enslaved boys as young as 11 pick cocoa beans in Ivory Coast that can end up in Americans' chocolate.

Ivory Coast, according to the report, is a "tier 2" country, meaning it does not comply with minimum standards to combat human trafficking but is making significant efforts to do so. The report cited Ivorian authorities' prosecution of at least 22 traffickers and the repatriation of 3,000 children to their home countries.

An earlier Knight Ridder investigation described how women from Nepal, Brazil and Ukraine were tricked or forced into sexual servitude.

The United States itself is far from immune from the problem. An estimated 45,000 to 50,000 people are trafficked into this country each year, the State Department report said.

Sen. Paul Wellstone, a co-author of last year's law, praised the report. "Often, trafficking is treated as an issue of illegal immigration and criminal activity," the Minnesota Democrat said. "Trafficking is a profound human rights abuse -- a modern-day form of slavery and I believe the report released today recognizes this."

The law, signed last October by former President Bill Clinton, would block U.S. foreign aid, except for humanitarian and trade-related assistance, to countries that do not meet the minimum standards for trying to stop human trafficking.

The sanctions would not take effect until 2003, however, and the law gives the president broad authority to waive them. Powell and other top aides to President Bush have expressed caution about economic sanctions as a foreign policy tool, saying the United States often has been too quick to impose them.

State Department officials said they preferred working with countries on the issue to sanctioning them.

"This report is about trying to raise awareness around the world and get nations together to have dialogue to work to resolve this problem. This is not intended, although there will always be that aspect of it, to point fingers," Assistant Secretary of State Rand Beers said.

The report puts 23 countries in the "tier three" category, those that do not comply with minimum anti- trafficking standards and are not making significant efforts to do so.

They are Albania, Bahrain, Belarus, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Burma, Democratic Republic of Congo, Gabon, Greece, Indonesia, Israel, Kazakhstan, Lebanon, Malaysia, Pakistan, Qatar, Romania, Russia, Saudi Arabia, South Korea, Sudan, Turkey, United Arab Emirates and Yugoslavia.

Israel, a major destination for women from the former Soviet Union lured into prostitution, recognizes it has a problem "but devotes limited resources to combating it," the report said. Victims get little protection, it said.

In Saudi Arabia, expatriate workers from Asia frequently are forced into domestic servitude or sexual exploitation. The Saudi government "does not believe that trafficking is a problem" because the workers come to Saudi Arabia voluntarily, the report said.

STATE DEPARTMENT REPORT:

The State Department released its first annual Trafficking in Persons Report on Thursday. Trafficked victims often end up in the sex trade, sweatshops, construction or agriculture. An estimated 45,000 to 50,000 people, mostly women and children, are trafficked to the United States each year.

Congress legislated three tiers of standards for judging countries on their "serious and sustained efforts to eliminate trafficking":

One -- Countries have victims of trafficking but have complied with minimum standards, such as making the practice a criminal offense and prosecuting traffickers. They also have programs aimed at stopping trafficking. These countries include Austria, Colombia, Spain, Switzerland and the United Kingdom.

Two -- Countries that are making efforts to prosecute traffickers but do not help the victims, or are helping victims but not making a strong effort to prevent trafficking. These countries include Bulgaria, China, Ivory Coast, Japan, Morocco and Sweden.

Three -- Countries that deny the problem exists or have made only weak efforts to combat it. Some of them are beginning efforts to prevent trafficking. These countries include Sudan, Israel, South Korea, Russia and Greece.

For the report and the complete list of the countries, see the State Department's Web site, www.state.gov/g/inl/rls/tiprpt/2001

Compiled by researcher Tish Wells

LOAD-DATE: July 13, 2001

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

KR-ACC-NO: WA-HUMAN-TRAFFICKING

JOURNAL-CODE: WA