"So, I think Malaysia is sort of paving the way (for others)...I hope other countries will follow Malaysia's step in assisting Afghanistan," he told Bernama in an interview here when asked about Malaysia's participation in Afghanistan.

Earlier, Jones called on Bernama general manager Datuk Hasnul Hassan at the latter's office in Wisma Bernama. Also present was the Malaysian National News Agency's editor-in-chief Datuk Yong Soo Heong.

Jones, 50, presented his credentials to Yang di-Pertuan Agong Tuanku Mizan

In July this year, a 10-member Malaysian Armed Forces contingent was deployed to Afghanistan to serve with the International Security Assistance Force (Malcon ISAF) to help rebuild the health infrastructure and provide medical aid in the Bamyan province.

Tonight, another 30-member contingent, including seven women (two doctors and five paramedics) will be leaving for Afghanistan to serve with Malcon ISAF.

US President Barack Obama had sought Malaysia's help in the reconstruction of Afghanistan and Prime Minister Datuk Seri Najib Tun Razak then gave an undertaking to help in the medical and development programme in that country but not in combative operations.

To a question on Malaysia's commitment to fighting human trafficking, Jones said Kuala Lumpur had taken some very significant steps, both on the enforcement side, charging and prosecuting individuals involved or those facilitating trafficking, and the protection side.

"It is so important that we treat victims of trafficking as victims that they are and offer them counselling and the opportunity to testify against those who put them in that situation.

"I think Malaysia has taken this issue very seriously. We are encouraged by the progress (made by Malaysia on this issue)...and this is something we will continue to meet and work on together," he said.

In June this year, Home Minister Datuk Seri Hishammuddin Hussein told the Dewan Rakyat that Malaysia had risen to Tier 2 of the Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP) 2010 released by the US, saying this was in recognition of the Anti-

Human Trafficking Act 2007, creation of the Anti-Human Trafficking Council and the government's action to address the issue.

Malaysia dropped from Tier 2 to Tier 3 in the TIP Report 2009 issued on June 16 last year. The TIP Report ranks countries based on their level of compliance on established minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking.

Tier 1 countries are for governments that fully comply with minimum standards of the Trafficking Victims' Protection Act (TVPA), Tier 2 countries for governments that do not fully comply with the minimum standards but are making significant efforts to comply, while Tier 3 countries are for governments that do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so.

On Malaysia's commitment to fighting terrorism, Jones said Malaysia had long been a very strong partner of Washington and many other countries in fighting the global problem.

"Malaysia, I think, is known throughout the world...is a place where terrorists will be dealt with severely. For the security of our people wherever they are, it is critical that we continue to do that," said Jones.

LOAD-DATE: October 20, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

29 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Washington Times

October 19, 2010 Tuesday

On the Family: Human trafficking exists disturbingly close to home

BYLINE: By Cheryl Wetzstein THE WASHINGTON TIMES

SECTION: B, CULTURE ETC.; Pg. 5

LENGTH: 704 words

This weekend, dozens of organizations are hosting a rally and walk to highlight the issue of human trafficking. The Oct. 23 event is called the DC Stop Modern Slavery Walk on the Mall.

How is human trafficking a family issue? And what does this nation have to do with such a heinous activity? (In other words - isn't this some tragic Asian or East European problem?)

First a definition: Human trafficking refers to the forced economic exploitation of children, young people and adults. Many of these "modern-day slaves" end up in commercial sex activities such as prostitution and "escort" and "massage" services, servicing clients in hotels, homes, truck stops, strip clubs and so-called gentlemen's clubs.

Human trafficking officially became an American problem in June, when the performance of the United States was included in the State Department's annual Trafficking in People Report for the first time. The U.S. was ranked as a Tier 1 country, meaning it fully complies with the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, but it also was clearly identified as a "source, transit and destination country" for trafficking.

I think it's heart-stopping that an estimated 100,000 of America's own children are snagged into sex-trafficking webs each year. In testimony before Congress in September, the cities of Oakland, Brooklyn, San Francisco, Atlanta, Houston, Miami - and the Washington, D.C.-Baltimore corridor - were mentioned as prime trafficking sites.

Many of the children and teens lured into sex slavery are runaways, abandoned young people or those vulnerable to sweet-talking predators. The average age of "induction" is very young, as "Tonya" - a pseudonym - explains below.

"When I was 12 years old, a guy I thought was just a 'dope [cool] boy' kept following me in his car when I walked to school," Tonya recalled, according to Linda Smith, founder of Shared Hope International, in testimony to the House Judiciary subcommittee on crime, terrorism and homeland security.

"He was older ... and he said I was really cute. He paid a lot of attention to me, and eventually I got in the car with him. For a while, we were boyfriend and girlfriend; we would go everywhere together. When I think about how it must have looked to people - a baby-looking girl like me with an older 'boyfriend' - it makes me wonder why nobody was ever there to stop it, or even ask any questions at all.

"It didn't take long before I experienced the real treatment - being beaten, stomped on, manipulated and sold all day, every day," Tonya said, according to Ms. Smith.

"People have asked me how I could have done what I did - sell my body on the street, in cars, in trucks, anywhere and everywhere, and then deliver every last dollar to my pimp. ... I'm amazed myself that I was so under the control of that man. He was the only person in my life that I felt connected to, and I even felt like he was my only protection; therefore, I would have done anything to stay with him."

Ms. Smith and other anti-trafficking activists are determined to keep the trafficking issue in front of Americans. They are lobbying for more prevention; prosecution of traffickers and customers; and protection, services and shelters for victims.

As for those who wonder whether trafficking is a family issue, Laura Lederer, an adjunct professor at Georgetown Law Center and president of Global Centurion, an anti-trafficking organization, has a ready answer.

"You cannot have a healthy family if the man in the family or the young men and boys in the family are exploiting others," said Ms. Lederer, who worked on trafficking issues at the State Department for eight years.

Groups on "parallel paths" need to collaborate, she added. Those who want to build healthy families and healthy marriages, and those like hers "who are working on the dysfunctional side - with the men and boys who think it's OK to go out, exploit someone and then go home to the family" - need to join forces.

Many Americans may find human sex slavery too baffling and disturbing a subject to follow. But for those who feel called to become modern-day abolitionists, this Saturday's event on the Mall could be a galvanizing experience.

* Cheryl Wetzstein can be reached at cwetzstein@washingtontimes.com

LOAD-DATE: October 18, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 The Washington Times LLC
All Rights Reserved

30 of 404 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

October 7, 2010 Thursday

TRANSNATIONAL ORGANIZED CRIME EXTENDING REACH INTO NEW AREAS - CYBER CRIME, 'HIGH SEAS POACHING' - WHICH NEEDS COORDINATED RESPONSE, THIRD COMMITTEE TOLD

BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 6596 wordsDATELINE: NEW YORK

The following information was released by the United Nations:

From cybercrime and trafficking in cultural property to poaching on the high seas, speakers in the Third Committee (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) today drew attention to new forms of transnational crimes that warrant an international response.

Twenty-one delegations, as well as one organization, took the floor, as the Committee concluded its general discussion on crime prevention and criminal justice and international drug control.

"Indonesia is of the view that it is important to identify emerging issues," its representative said. "Cybercrime and illicit trafficking of cultural properties, often referred to as emerging crimes, are criminal activities that are undeniably linked to transnational organized crimes."

He went on to refer to "criminal activities impacting on the environment", citing as examples illegal fishing - an issue of concern shared by his colleague from Sierra Leone, who lamented "high seas poaching" - and illicit international trafficking in forest products.

The representative of Peru told how drug production could trigger soil depletion and deforestation, while Venezuela told how transnational drug traffickers have turned to using semi-submersible boats capable of carrying 10 tons of cocaine, while avoiding radar. Nigeria told how cannabis had become a preferred crop for some of its farmers, "with obvious consequences for food security".

A number of African countries, such as Ethiopia, told how vulnerable they had become as transnational drug traffickers exploited their territories as transit points to move narcotics between continents. Several delegations alluded to the ongoing problem of trafficking in persons, while India underlined the ongoing threat of terrorism. India has been a victim of terrorism for decades," its representative said, as he appealed for the international community to show political will and conclude the Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism.

Also speaking today were the representatives of the Lao People's Democratic Republic, El Salvador, Maldives, Qatar, Yemen, South Africa, Serbia, United Arab Emirates, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Saudi Arabia, Myanmar, Morocco, and Colombia.

The observer from the International Organization for Migration also spoke.

The Committee will meet again at 10 a.m. on Monday, 11 October, in Conference Room 1, to begin the consideration of the advancement of women, with the Under-Secretary-General of UN Women, Ms. Michelle Bachelet, scheduled to address the Committee and entertain questions.

Background

The Third Committee (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) met today to continue its general debate on crime prevention, criminal justice and international drug control. (For more information, please see Press Release GA/SHC/3975.)

Statements

K.C. VENUGOPAL (India) said that a steady reduction in the cultivation of crops for illicit drugs since 2007 was a significant finding in this year's World Drug Report. The international community had to build on that success and India was resolved to fight the menace of illicit drugs. Supply reduction strategies, incorporating sustained alternative development programmes for cultivators, were the keystone in the fight against illicit drugs. On the demand side, social awareness about the adverse consequences of drug addiction had to be raised, particularly among young people. "Societies should strive to inculcate the highest moral values in our youth," he said. India was the world's largest producer of licit opium, and it appreciated the work of the International Narcotics Control Board (INCB) for monitoring the balance between supply and demand for opium required for legitimate medicinal and scientific purposes.

India has been a victim of terrorism for decades, with innocent lives lost in heinous terrorist attacks, he said. "Our resolve against the perpetrators of such attacks should be strong and resolute." India was party to all United Nations conventions relating to terrorism and it agreed with the Secretary-General that implementation of the Global Counter-Terrorism Strategy would not be complete without the conclusion of the Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism. It was time for the international community to show its resolve and solidarity for collective action against international terrorism and to send a clear message that terrorism, in any form, for whatever cause, would not be tolerated.

KANIKA PHOMMACHANH (Lao People's Democratic Republic), affirming the seriousness of the threats described by the Secretary-General's report, stressed the importance of a concerted global effort to wipe out the roots of illicit drug trafficking and related criminal activities. Welcoming the outcome of the fifty-third Session of the Commission on Narcotic Drugs, he said that the international approach should continue to be based on the principles of common and shared responsibility. Supply and demand strategies should be mutually reinforcing elements of comprehensive strategies and actions.

In his country, where he said opium production, addiction and poverty were closely interrelated, there had been a recent worrisome resurgence of poppy cultivation. As the retail price of opium escalated to nearly $1,300 per kilogram, resuming cultivation appeared to be a very tempting source of income for poppy farmers. Parallel to that, transit trafficking of heroin and amphetamine-type stimulants had soared alarmingly. All opium producing areas were the poorest regions of the country and a reduction of cultivation was dependent on the creation of sustainable livelihood opportunities. Further, an increase in drug arrests and seizures indicated that transnational organized criminal groups still considered the country a major transit route. To tackle emerging challenges and the poverty of the former opium growers, the Government approved a comprehensive drug control plan for 2009 to 2011 focusing on all elements from data analysis and demand reduction to chemical precursor control and law enforcement. He stressed that the continuing support of other Governments and international organizations was crucial to ensure that successes achieved in the effort were not reversed. He reaffirmed his country's unwavering commitment to continue working at the bilateral, regional and multilateral levels through effective coordination mechanisms to combat the scourge.

CARLOS ENRIQUE GARCA GONZLEZ (El Salvador) focused on the issue of crime prevention and criminal justice as they related to the illicit activities and violence of the drug cartels, noting that 14 individuals in the recent massacre of 72 migrants in Mexico by drug traffickers had been identified as Salvadorans. He noted that an angle not previously considered by the international community when studying strategies of organized crime was the dangerous link between criminal activities and international migration. He called upon the international community to redouble its coordination efforts at all levels to respond to that scourge, while considering that the most vulnerable groups of society were being stereotyped and were in extreme poverty. He also called on the United Nations system and its programmes to promote a broad, integrated focus in the coordinated fight against international criminal activity of the drug cartels and gangs. Although Central America was at the epicentre of the problem, it affected the entire world. If it did not receive the needed attention, it could become unmanageable, he said.

His Government was aware of the root causes that deepened the grip of international crime, drug cartels and gangs, especially the lack of opportunities, social exclusion and impunity. His country's President, Mauricio Funes, had said in the General Assembly that the map of poverty traced that of trafficking in people and arms, money-laundering and all kinds of large-scale crime. He believed that the international community should increase the political level at which it dealt with those issues that affected the development of countries. Further, the convention against organized crime was an international framework for cooperation that could be improved, as it should not exhaust the scarce resources of developing countries. Firm political actions to strengthen international coordination, including non-governmental actors, in the enforcement of those issues, and the support of the United Nations systems through the preparation and implementation of a global strategy against organized crime, drug cartels and gangs was needed. He reiterated his gratitude to donor countries and United Nations agencies that were supporting the country in the fight against drugs, and reiterated its political will to redouble efforts and cooperate on all levels in battling transnational crime, drug cartels and gangs.

ABDUL GHAFOOR MOHAMED (Maldives) said his country had started its transition to democracy two years ago, undertaking a reform of institutions to reflect the doctrines of accountability, transparency and the rule of law. But, "corruption currently cripples our efforts to remedy the wrongs of the past" and threatened to undermine the convictions of those who spoke at ballot boxes. Maldives had joined the United Nations Convention against Corruption in 2007, believing that its measures to thwart corruption through criminal law, international cooperation and technical assistance were integral to addressing the nefarious activities that had eroded success in the country and the region. He believed rooting out corruption and protecting human rights required vigorous civil societies, and welcomed cooperation with the international community to develop such a society. On another issue, the Maldives regretted its placement on the Tier-2 watch list in the United States 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report and had taken steps to address the situation, increasing police and immigration department training. But the Government lacked resources and welcomed international cooperation to aid its capacity to investigate human trafficking and holistically treat its victims.

Located near the opiate producing Golden Triangle and Golden Crescent, the Maldives had seen an increase in drug trafficking and drug-related issues from increased poppy growing in those regions. The Government had undertaken efforts to identify and treat drug addiction and sought help from UNODC, which conducted a detailed assessment of the country, which aided the creation of a Drug Control Master Plan. He also supported last year's General Assembly resolution on the problem, believing its promotion of international cooperation based on shared responsibility to respond to increasing links between drug trafficking, corruption and other forms of organized crime was a healthy first step towards addressing social ills.

GRUM ABAY (Ethiopia) said that drug abuse and illicit drug trafficking were among the greatest challenges facing the world. The world drug problem undermined sustainable development, political stability and democratic institutions; Member States were obliged to keep investing in drug control measures and take further stringent steps. Ethiopia's strategic location in the Horn of Africa, and the fact that its capital city, Addis Ababa, was a multidirectional air transit hub, made it very vulnerable to illicit drug trafficking. Its Government had put in place a National Drug Policy to deter the illegal manufacture, distribution and consumption of narcotics and psychotropic substances, and a Criminal Code was in place that stipulated severe penalties for drug traffickers and abusers.

Ethiopia appreciated technical assistance from the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC), but drug control and abuse prevention were not the responsibility of a few institutions, he said. Closer collaboration and the firm commitment of Governments, international organizations, civil societies and the people at large were needed. In Ethiopia, development partners and civil society organizations were among those present for the inauguration in May 2010 of an inter-ministerial committee to implement a national drug control master plan. More resources are needed to minimize the potential risks of drug abuse and illicit trafficking; the gravity of the problem called for strengthened coordination and collaboration.

GONZALO GUTIRREZ (Peru) stressed how drug trafficking was "unavoidably" associated with violence and organized crime; in some countries, it was linked to terrorist activities as well. In addition, it had a negative impact on the environment; the growing of drug-related crops led to deforestation and soil depletion, which combined with the effects of the disposal of chemicals used to make illicit drugs, posed a real threat to biodiversity. Synchronized procedures and tailored legislative measures were needed to address the problem, as well as alternative development programmes focusing on agriculture.

He recalled the efforts and achievements that Peru has been making vis--vis illicit drugs. Under a national strategy on drugs, some 10,025 hectares of coca were eradicated in 2009, and 7,276 people were arrested for possession or unlawful use of drugs. Alternative development programmes have also been implemented. At the international level, Peru stood ready to participate in joint efforts on exchanging intelligence-based information, experiences and best practices. It was also important that developed countries, especially those in which illicit drugs were consumed, made cooperation against drug trafficking a pivotal issue on their agendas.

ALYA AHMED S. AL-THANI (Qatar) highlighted the seriousness of human trafficking and the need to address the problem with resolve, as it was among the most difficult challenges that humanity faced today. Qatar had taken steps to adjust its legislative and institutional structures concerning the phenomenon, with the support of the Crown Prince and in compliance with international commitments. Stating that it had exceeded its responsibilities with regard to the protocol concerning trafficking in persons, he noted that, on the executive level, it had issued Decree No. 8 in 2005, establishing a bureau on human trafficking that could transition into a national institution. At the international level, Qatar had helped launch the Arab initiative to build national capacities in the field of human trafficking, with the support of the Crown Princess. It called for joint cooperation in building national capacities and taking measures to end the problem of trafficking and to promote the results of the Doha Forum.

In addition, he said that his country's efforts concerning drugs included the promotion of a national strategy for combating drugs and preventing their entry into its territories through the comprehensive, integrated activities of State institutions. The Ministry of the Interior had also participated in community programmes to develop community police, such as workshops that established police strategies and mechanisms to cope with contemporary security challenges.

JORGE VALERO (Venezuela) said drug trafficking, while generating millions of dollars for drug cartels, had physically and morally destroyed millions of people. Venezuela had become a country of reference on an international level in the fight against drug trafficking, thanks to policies and strategies that were as successful as they were sovereign. With the challenges posed by its 2,219-kilometre border with Colombia, Venezuela had taken daring steps to prevent its territory from being used by powerful drug cartels supplying markets in the United States and Europe, where demand for illicit drugs was greatest. A new challenge was semi-submersible boats that could each carry 10 tons of cocaine while avoiding radar detection; more than 50 such vessels had been seized.

Venezuela ranked fourth in the world in terms of drug seizures, a fact that had been recognized by competent authorities of the United Nations, he said. So far this year, the security services had seized 46.39 metric tons of illicit drugs, bringing to 559.83 metric tons the amount seized since the start of the Bolivarian revolution 11 years ago. That was a historic record. Up to September this year, 16 big drug chiefs had been arrested and immediately extradited to their respective countries, mainly the United States, Colombia and Europe. The United States, through its Department of State, has published an annual report about the fight against drugs that was unilateral, immoral and illegitimate. Venezuela had demonstrated that it did not need foreign Powers or foreign troops to confront drug trafficking; its own institutions and security forces had the expertise and competence to do the job.

WAHEED ABDULWAHAB AHMED AL-SHAMI (Yemen) said that corruption was a dangerous scourge that threatened society and development, which was why Yemen had been a pioneer in signing the United Nations Convention against Corruption. The country also promulgated a national law in 2006 and set up a national agency in order to combat corruption, as well as passed legislation concerning official tenders on public property and on money-laundering. To reinforce these legislative measures, Yemen developed a national strategy in 2010 to foster awareness of the serious consequences of corruption and hosted events, such as a regional conference of the Arab network last July, to bolster integrity. Given that globalization and information technology had focused the world's attention on global crimes, Yemen had also signed the United Nations convention on organized crime to respond to this problem.

Concerning drug trafficking, he outlined that Yemen had arrested and prosecuted many criminals, was endeavouring to raise awareness of the issue, had established a special governmental department, and had engaged an aviation unit in the fight. Believing that human trafficking was an odious crime and a flagrant violation of human rights, Yemen also had ratified several relevant conventions and protocols to criminalize all human trafficking, conducted awareness-raising campaigns at the regional level, and established cooperation systems. He believed that the best way of combating the scourge of trafficking was to deal with root causes, such as poverty and unemployment, and strengthen cooperation at the international level. He welcomed the global plan of action to combat human trafficking, and stated that a voluntary fund should be established as soon as possible. Additionally, Yemen was a partner in attempting to counteract terrorism. To bolster security efforts, however, capacity-building and cooperation, in particular in the sphere of information exchange, were required. Financial and technical assistance would contribute to combating the crimes that threatened humanity.

AGUS SARDJANA (Indonesia) said cybercrime and illicit trafficking of cultural properties were undeniably linked to transnational organized crime. Other forms of emerging crimes that needed serious consideration and international cooperation related to the environment, such as illegal fishing and illicit international trafficking in forest products and other biological resources. In the fight against corruption, one of his Government's highest priorities, significant progress had been achieved. Indonesia would voluntarily take part in the current year's United Nations Convention against Corruption review. It was also engaged in the pilot review of the implementation programme of the Convention against Transnational Organized Crime. In that regard, increased international cooperation was needed, including technical assistance and sharing of best practices.

He said that Indonesia' commitment to fight against trafficking in persons was unwavering, including through strengthening the Bali Regional Ministerial Conference (Bali Process) on the issue. Further, as a nation that had suffered immensely from terrorist activities, Indonesia believed that counter-terrorism should be conducted with full respect for human rights and the rule of law and that terrorism's root causes should be eliminated. Enhanced regional cooperation was crucial in that regard. Regional and interregional cooperation should also be intensified regarding transboundary drug trafficking. Recognizing the significance of alternative development for effective drug control, his country was expanding its alternative development measures with an initiative to provide sustained livelihood for former and potential drug couriers.

AHMADU GIADE, Chief Executive of the National Drug Law Enforcement Agency (NDLEA) of Nigeria, said that, as a top priority of his Government, the drug-control efforts of his agency, along with those of the agency for Food and Drug Administration and Control, had led to the de-listing of Nigeria from the Drug Majors Watch List by several countries, including the United States, and testified to the national resolve to have a society free of illicit drugs, to prevent trafficking through the country and to address related problems such as money-laundering, violence and addiction. In 2009 alone, 7,042 drug suspects were arrested by the NDLEA and nearly 115,000 kilograms of cannabis was seized, constituting 99 per cent of illicit drug seizures.

Though a small percentage of seizures, heroin and cocaine were also a major challenge due to the involvement of international drug syndicates that use Nigeria as a transit point, he said, noting recent seizures and prosecutions. He also noted public awareness campaigns to reduce the demand for drugs and the activities to manage controlled drugs by the Food and Drug agency. He affirmed, in addition, that international cooperation was necessary and in that effort Nigeria had recently signed a Memorandum of Understanding with the United Kingdom and strengthened cooperation with South Africa, Germany and China, including intelligence sharing, joint training and occasional joint operations. Regional cooperation through all relevant West African organizations would be intensified. He reaffirmed Nigeria's commitment to the various regional and international instruments of which it was a party.

XOLISA MABHONGO (South Africa) stated that South Africa considered the fight against crime and corruption a priority. To that end, his Government had implemented an array of domestic measures, including improved policing, to ensure "conditions of peace, security and stability" for its citizens. These initiatives, he stressed, were being engaged with full respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms. Noting both the transnational and the cross-border nature of crime and corruption, he spoke of his country's participation in joint subregional programmes, including the Southern African Regional Police Chiefs Cooperation Organisation, as well as its participation in international conferences, such as the recent Twelfth United Nations Crime Congress in Brazil which addressed, among others, new and emerging crimes such as cybercrime, and guidelines for the treatment of women prisoners. He looked forward to the upcoming Conference of Parties of the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime, which he hoped would encourage a stronger political commitment to the Convention.

"No country acting alone can successfully address the world drugs problem," he stated and he urged Member States to fully address their role, either as producers, locations of transit hubs or as countries of destination. In his country, cannabis and cocaine were of concern due to local consumption and smuggling across borders. One response taken was the scheduling of some chemicals, which then decreased the number of illegal imports of precursors. Special programmes aimed at South African youth also tackled the issues of drug use and the benefits of a drug free society. Also, he appreciated the wide scope of the work of UNODC, and said it needed to be given more resources and support, financial and otherwise.

MARINA IVANOVIĆ (Serbia) spoke of South-Eastern Europe's significant success in the fight against organized crime, a result of "vibrant cooperation" between the region's countries. Continuing, she noted the Ministerial Conference, hosted this month in Belgrade by the Serbian Ministries of Justice and the Interior. The conference, "Boosting regional and transnational cooperation as a precondition for successful fight against organized crime in south-eastern Europe" was a platform to share national experiences in combating organized crime, human trafficking and illegal migrations. Also discussed at the conference was the idea of a common regional arrest warrant. At the conference's conclusion, nine countries signed the Memorandum on Cooperation in the Fight against Organized Crime, which would facilitate the sharing of information, the establishment of joint investigation teams and the harmonization of legislations in the region's countries.

Continuing, she pointed out that other regional initiatives promoting cooperation between regional States, among others, the Southeast European Cooperative Initiative and Regional Cooperation Council, had also brought about concrete results against illegal migration and drug smuggling. Military intelligence institutions had just recently signed a statement on cooperation and intelligence-sharing at the regional level to deal with security threats. Welcoming the adoption this year of the Global Plan of Action against Trafficking in Persons, she stated that, on a national level, Serbia had taken several actions, including the adoption of the Strategy against Illegal Migrations and the National Action Plan to Combat Human Trafficking, as well as the establishment of the Migration Monitoring and Management Coordinating Body. All these efforts, she said in conclusion, would support an effective fight against human trafficking, as well as provide for victims of human trafficking protection of their human rights and access to rehabilitation.

Mr. MOHAMMED (United Arab Emirates) told how his country had helped to coordinate international efforts to combat human trafficking leading up to the Global Plan of Action to Combat Trafficking in Persons that was adopted by the General Assembly in August 2010. His country had adopted an integrated strategy that incorporated support for the victims of human trafficking, with psychological care being extended to them. Public awareness was being raised as well, and it was important to pursue international partnerships in order to eradicate the root causes of human trafficking.

The United Arab Emirates had been among the first States to cooperate at the international level against money-laundering, he said. For several years it had been undertaking the necessary steps to confront the problem, especially when the problem contributed to terrorism. The United Arab Emirates has been active in regional and international groups in addressing money-laundering and other financial crimes; its success could be used as a model to apply elsewhere.

SULJUK MUSTANSAR TARAR (Pakistan) said the ills of narco-trade, corruption, money-laundering, trafficking in persons, cybercrime and terrorism were challenges for us all. International organized crime had a two-way relation with the developing and developed world. In developing countries, it had its roots in the poorer, less privileged socio-economic surroundings. Conditions of poverty, underemployment and a weak socio-economic context were a catalyst for such crime. At the same time, their partners in developed countries exploited access to advanced technology. A direct supply and demand dimension existed, especially for drug trafficking, human trafficking and money-laundering. Increased demand for drugs, cheap labour and the illegal transfer of money in the developed world resulted in increased supply from the developing world. Further, Pakistan was a State party to both the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime and the United Nations Convention against Corruption, and believed that the world drug problem required and enhanced international cooperation.

His country had undertaken several national initiatives to tackle the issue. Moreover, it had actively contributed to regional and international efforts to stop the outflow of drugs, as well as the inflow of precursor chemicals from neighbouring countries. In efforts to successfully counter human trafficking, Pakistan had promulgated an ordinance which incorporated a role for civil society to work with law enforcement agencies for rehabilitation of victims. His country had also taken measures to combat money-laundering and terrorist financing, and had worked collaboratively to reform its criminal justice system and to secure its border to deter against international crime. In closing, he stressed that the solution to the problem of organized crime lay in an integrated, comprehensive approach with firm long-term political and financial commitments. Such commitments could be realized through capacity-building, technical assistance, financial assistance and the provision of appropriate equipment.

IQBAL AHMED (Bangladesh) said his Government was taking all necessary measures, within its limited resources and capabilities, to control illicit drugs that entered the country through its long, porous borders which were difficult to guard. His country had strict penalties, even the death sentence, for drug trafficking, considering the damage they did in particular to one of its most vulnerable segments - the youth. While sharing the view in the Secretary-General's report that "drug abusers should be sent to treatment, not to jail", he had reservations about the argument in the same report that "people should not be sentenced to death for drug-related offences".

Addressing money-laundering, he drew attention to the fact that his Government had been trying to recuperate money siphoned abroad illegally. The issue of asset recovery was a complicated one, he said. Tracking the money took a long time. Freezing it and bringing it back home involved multiple jurisdictions. He hoped States Parties to the United Nations Convention against Corruption could help in that endeavour. After describing his country's resolute efforts against terrorism, he concluded, saying that transnational organized crime, corruption, terrorism, trafficking of persons and money-laundering were interrelated and could not be prevented without all-out cooperation from all sides. That was a daunting challenge for every country, but developing countries, in particular the least developed countries, were especially vulnerable to the rapid proliferation of emerging crimes. Resources and capacity-building were needed.

Mr. AL-HARTHY (Saudi Arabia) outlined the country's developments in criminal justice with regard to the problem of drugs, stating that legislation had increased penalties for drug-related crimes and that the prosecutor's office was cooperating with the Ministry of the Interior to fight drug use. The Government was also trying to increase awareness about the dangers of illicit drug use, and to increase treatment for drug addicts. Publications and books had been issued, seminars had been organized in schools, and out-patient facilities had been increased. A coordinated strategy had been adopted by the Arab ministers of justice, and cooperation was taking place with friendly countries to fight drug trafficking. Saudi Arabia had established programmes for the rehabilitation of drug addicts and their re-entry into the school system, as well as leisure facilities, such as sports and youth clubs.

He noted that his country was making efforts with regard to these programmes, security and prevention in order to put an end to the drug scourge, because of the large amounts of contraband and illicit drug trafficking that had affected the country in previous years. Saudi Arabia expressed determination to support the efforts of the international community to fight the drug phenomenon, and said that it was not possible to put an end to the problem without cooperation or sharing information.

SOE LYNN HAN (Myanmar) said his delegation was happy to note that, on a worldwide basis, opium poppy cultivation, opium production and potential heroin production had all fallen. His country was tackling the drug problem through a comprehensive framework that included all three international drug control conventions, as well as national legislation, a national plan of action, high-level commitment, and bilateral, regional and international cooperation.

Poverty was among the main causes of the drug problem for poppy-cultivating farmers along the border areas of Myanmar, he said. Eliminating narcotic drugs and upgrading the living standards of the national races, especially in the border areas, were the two strategies being pursued by the Government. Supply elimination, demand elimination and law enforcement were the tactics being applied. Poppy cultivation and production in Myanmar has consequently decreased from 81,400 hectares and 813 tons in 2002 to 31,700 hectares and 330 tons in 2009. Myanmar had been combating the drug problem with its own resources; support and assistance from the international community would speed up its efforts and make them more effective.

HASSAN EL MKHANTAR (Morocco) recounted the steps undertaken by his country to address the problem of illicit drugs, which together with trafficking in weapons and persons was an issue that no one country could tackle alone. It was essential that the principle of shared responsibility be applied at the regional and international levels. Morocco had collaborated with UNODC in producing three studies into cannabis, and hosted a delegation from INCB in December 2009, demonstrating its irreversible commitment to combat cannabis cultivation and trafficking.

Morocco was concerned by new trends in the consumption of hard drugs and the emergence of new trafficking routes, particularly through Africa, he said. It was equally concerned by the link between drug trafficking, terrorism, organized crime and trafficking in persons, with the sub-Saharan region affording opportunities for criminal networks to step up their illicit activities. Morocco has undertaken a multidimensional approach to confront illicit drug production and demand, while at the same time, promoting economic and social alternatives. A higher level of development in the north of the Kingdom would eventually lead to the total eradication of cannabis cultivation.

CLAUDIA BLUM (Colombia) reminded the Committee that, in order to combat the global drug problem, the violence and corruption produced by trafficking and organized crime also needed to be addressed. On a national level, Colombia was engaging a comprehensive strategy based on both reducing supply and demand, as well as combating all drug-related crimes, which resulted in 2009 having the lowest production of cocaine since 1999. "As a result, my country is no longer the largest producer of cocaine in the world," she stated. She also pointed out that, in 2009, 165,000 hectares of coca cultivation had been eradicated, decreasing the acreage by 16 per cent and cocaine production by 9 per cent, as compared to 2008. That amounted to an accumulated decrease of 59.7 per cent between 2001 and 2009. The 5 per cent decrease in the global area of coca cultivation was, thus, mainly due to a significant decrease in Colombia.

Alternative development was an essential part of her country's policy, she said. To that end, the Forest Wander Families Program, which engaged rural communities, indigenous and African descent persons located in environmentally strategic ecosystems, had, since 2003, benefited 70,000 families in 21 departments and 96 municipalities. However, creating sustainable environments and generating social and economic development for people who had given up illicit crops required national investment and international support, and she called for a greater commitment by donor countries to support these alternative development projects. She stressed that effective efforts which addressed the illicit drug industry on a national level was "reduced by the lack of commitment and cooperation of all States". Shared responsibility and international cooperation was crucial and, because of her country's many decades experience with the world drug problem, Colombia was now able to respond to requests for training and technical assistance from many regions of the world.

VICTORIA M. SULIMANI (Sierra Leone) said that cross-border and transnational organized crimes, including terrorism, trafficking in persons and narcotics, piracy and high-sea poaching, exhibited a high level of sophistication. More innovative efforts were, therefore, needed to tackle them. Sierra Leone had upgraded the Joint Drug Interdiction Task-force outfit to a Transnational Organized Crime Unit, which would not only strengthen law enforcement capabilities in the subregion, but would also help to bolster up capacities to implement the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) "Action Plan to Address the Growing Problem of Illicit Drug Trafficking, Organized Crimes and Drug Abuse in West Africa (2008-2011)".

She said that the proliferation of small arms and light weapons was a major concern. Her country had established a national commission in that regard to strengthen the national response to the threat. Such a mechanism could be crucial to the entire West African subregion, which had been "bedevilled" by wars and military coups fuelled by the proliferation of those weapons. It would also enhance sustainable peace in the Mano River Union. The commission would also help to fast track the domestication of the ECOWAS Convention on Small Arms. There was also an urgent need to increase effective surveillance of the coastal and maritime borders in order to combat illegal maritime drug trafficking, piracy and human trafficking. Such surveillance could strengthen wider regional integration and would benefit the security in West Africa and other countries bordering the Atlantic.

MICHELE KLEIN-SOLOMON, Observer for the International Organization for Migration (IOM), said the Global Plan of Action against trafficking in persons was encouraging, since there was a need to raise awareness about the phenomenon around the world and draw attention to the human component involved. Approaches to addressing the tragedy of trafficking must first take into account the well-being of victims.

On terrorism, she said migration had come to be seen as a security issue since the terrorist attacks on New York on 11 September 2001 and measures aimed at preventing terrorism were now often explicitly linked to immigration policies. Her organization's updated publication on the relationship between international terrorism and migration carried a warning against linking migration too closely with security issues, even though migration measures intersected with security issues in areas such as border control, identification systems, information exchange and domestic integration policies. And since migration was destined to increase, it was crucial to strengthen international cooperation to close the door to terrorists wanting to exploit migration channels while facilitating the positive aspirations of legitimate migrants and the societies to which they contributed.

* * * * *

For information media not an official record

LOAD-DATE: October 7, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

31 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

October 3, 2010 Sunday

Philippines implements new system to fight human trafficking

LENGTH: 264 words

Text of report in English by Philippine newspaper The Philippine Star website on 1 October

[Report by Rudy Santos and Evelyn Macairan: "Bureau of Immigration Adopts New Queue System To Foil Human Traffickers"]

Manila, Philippines -The Bureau of Immigration [BI] yesterday started implementing a new queuing system, which it called the "snake-line" or "s-line," for arriving and departing passengers at the Ninoy Aquino International Airport (NAIA) in bid to prevent connivance between human smuggling syndicates and unscrupulous BI personnel.

BI officer-in-charge Ronaldo Ledesma said by changing the line formation, they hope to stop the Filipinos "tourist workers" from ending up as illegal workers in other countries.

In the previous straight line scheme, the passengers are able to choose which immigration counter to queue. Human smugglers usually instruct victims to line up in front of the counter manned by corrupt BI personnel.

But by adopting the s-line, the passengers would be distributed in the different counters.

"The initial results are very encouraging," Ledesma said. "Our Immigration officers have been very cooperative in the implementation of the new system, and we hope to adopt it in all our arrival and departure counters at the soonest possible time."

The Philippines has been placed by the US [United States] State Department in its Tier 2 human trafficking watch list. Should the country slide down to Tier 3, the US threatened to withhold non-humanitarian aid of up to $750 million for the Philippines.

Source: The Philippine Star website, Manila, in English 1 Oct 10

LOAD-DATE: October 3, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

32 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Manila Times (Philippines)

October 1, 2010 Friday

Groups trafficking Pinoys to US busted

BYLINE: BY JOMAR CANLAS REPORTER

LENGTH: 816 words

THE Department Labor and Employment (DOLE) on Thursday announced that the government would support filing of criminal charges against traffickers of Filipinos to the United States whose latest attempt to ship local workers had been foiled by Manila and Washington authorities.

The Filipinos, Labor department said, had complained to the US Department of Homeland Security, which accorded them assistance as victims of "forced labor trafficking."

Labor Secretary Rosalinda Baldoz made the announcement after the arrival in the Philippines of US lawyer Ellaine Carr, who is affiliated with Catholic charities and who assisted the 18 Filipino victims in the US pro bono.

Baldoz said that Carr had worked on the case with lawyer Luzviminda Padilla of the Philippine Overseas Labor Office in Washington, D.C., and their swift action resulted in preventive suspension of Philippine recruitment agencies engaged in human trafficking.

She added that DOLE and the Department of Justice are coordinating on the filing of the criminal charges.

Baldoz identified the alleged human trafficker as "ZDrive Inc.," a Laguna-based private employment agency, and US Opportunities, allegedly an employment services company owned by a certain Mike Lombardi.

The 18 victims were named as Rodolfo Andrade, Ferdinand Antigo, Dennis Belda, Peter Cabusao, Jhoanne Davocol, Eduardo Deytiquez, Lheniehl Florida, Jimmy Hinayo, Theodore Jastillana 3rd, Orlando Lavarnez, Enrico Edmundo Lising, Michael Angelo Maghirang, Jason Magundayao, Wilfredo Mislant, Imie Ramos, Henry Sejera, Regie Tesoro and Roberto Verzo Jr.

"According to our investigation, the victims were illegally trafficked to the United States and were forced to endure sub-human and sub-standard conditions of work," Baldoz said.

She instructed the Philippine Overseas Employment Administration and the Overseas Workers Welfare Administration (OWWA) to work jointly with Ellaine Carr Law Offices, help the victims and prosecute the case.

Baldoz said that OWWA Administrator Carmelita Dimzon would render humanitarian assistance to the Filipino victims and their families.

Subsequent conviction of the human traffickers, according to the Labor chief, would result in a higher regard for the Philippines' crackdown on human trafficking and in eventual removal of the country from Tier 2 watch list in the US State Department's Human Trafficking Report.

Baldoz said that President Benigno Aquino 3rd has called on Labor department to help intensify protection of overseas Filipino workers (OFWs) and pursue and prosecute those engaging in illegal and predatory activities, especially human traffickers, while fully implementing the country's Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act of 2003.

She expressed appreciation of the US Department of Homeland Security placing the 18 victims under its protective umbrella and according them the status of "victims of visa fraud and forced labor trafficking."

Baldoz also voiced the country's gratitude to Ellaine Carr Law Offices for assisting the victims, notably on the immigration aspect.

Earlier, Carr and officials of DOLE and OWWA met with the victims' families who told them about the situation of their loved ones.

The workers, after their illegal recruitment and trafficking by ZDrive in 2009, arrived in the US in the winter and in the unfamiliar environment were compelled to work in a forest farm under sub-human conditions and forced to sleep in trailers without water and electricity.

They allegedly were subjected to threats and intimidation, made to work raking and baling pine leaves in the dead of winter and forced to plant 1,800 pine tree seedlings a day on measly, sub-human wages equivalent to $40.00 a week.

According to the US Department of Labor, the federal minimum wage for covered non-exempt employees is $7.25 per hour effective July 24, 2009, consistent with the Fair Labor Standards Act, and many states also enforce their minimum wage laws.

Eventually, the 18 Filipinos found the courage to escape but, in good faith, got in touch with ZDrive.

Instead of helping them, however, the recruitment company instructed them to work in various hotels and entertainment facilities where they were paid below the minimum wage and their wages subjected to illegal deductions.

ZDrive had recruited the unsuspecting victims, who were unwittingly made to pay large fees in exchange for the promise of lucrative employment as food and beverage servers in the United States.

During the processing of their applications, however, the recruits were compelled to pay for medical, visa-application fees and placement fees.

When their passports, with the approved visas, were delivered to ZDrive, allegedly through a certain Julius Bana and a certain Robert Refugio, the agency explained that the total costs they would be shouldering amounted to P250,000, which was way beyond normal legal requirements for OFWs.

LOAD-DATE: October 5, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 News Bites Pty Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

Global News Bites

33 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Manila Times (Philippines)

October 1, 2010 Friday

Immigration tests new queuing system

BYLINE: BY JOMAR CANLASLENGTH: 428 words

THE Bureau of Immigration (BI) on Wednesday night began dry run of its new "snake line or S-Line" queuing system at the Ninoy Aquino International Airport (NAIA) in order to stop collusion among Immigration personnel and human-smuggling syndicates.

According to Immigration Officer in Charge Ronaldo Ledesma, the S-Line queuing system meant that arriving and departing passengers would not be able to select which immigration counter they would line up before because they would be distributed to different counters from a single, snaking line.

The Immigration bureau intensified its campaign against human trafficking on orders of President Benigno Aquino 3rd who, even during his recent trip to the United States, reiterated the Philippines' commitment to the campaign against human trafficking.

The old queuing system at NAIA allowed multiple straight lines in the airport Immigration areas corresponding to the number of Immigration counters, allowing passengers to select the counters where to queue.

"The initial results are very encouraging," Ledesma said. "Our immigration officers have been very cooperative in the implementation of the new system, and we hope to adopt it in all our arrival and departure counters at the soonest possible time."

"I congratulate our Immigration officers for their successful implementation of the S-Line. They are in the forefront of change, and they are ably performing their roles," he added.

The test run of the S-Line was conducted at the NAIA Terminal I departure area on Wednesday night, and further tests were made on Thursday, Ledesma said.

Earlier, he ordered the relief and reassignment of some Immigration officers on suspicions of collusion with human-trafficking syndicates.

The syndicates operate by instructing victims on which immigration counter they should line up before when going out of the country, and the Immigration officers in cahoots allow the passengers to depart despite suspicious travel papers.

The Immigration bureau offloaded thousands of passengers from airlines on suspicions of being "tourist workers" and therefore victims of human trafficking in the past two months.

Tourist workers are Filipino travelers with tourist visas but who intend to work once they reach their destinations, making them vulnerable to abuse because of their illegitimate work status.

The Philippines has been placed by the US State Department on its Tier 2 human trafficking watch list.

Should the country slide down to Tier 3, the US might withhold non-humanitarian aid of up to $750 million for the Philippines.

LOAD-DATE: October 5, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 News Bites Pty Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

Global News Bites

34 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

September 30, 2010 Thursday 7:39 PM GMT

US lawmaker presses China, India over human trafficking

LENGTH: 464 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, Sept 30 2010

A leading US lawmaker on Thursday urged President Barack Obama's administration to ratchet up pressure on China and India over sex-trafficking and modern day slavery that flourishes in both countries.

Congressman Christopher Smith, who led the charge for the landmark 2000 law Trafficking Victims Protection Act, said the two Asian giants were among the world's worst offenders in their disregard for forced bondage and sexual exploitation.

At a hearing of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, Smith urged the State Department's office dedicated to combating human trafficking to undertake a "comprehensive reassessment" of China and India.

He cited in particular Beijing's failure to prevent rampant trafficking of North Korean refugees.

The countries risk being downgraded in the State Department's annual "Trafficking in Persons" blacklist, and could face sanctions including withholding non-humanitarian, non-trade related US aid, he said.

Smith said the problem with trafficking in China has become particularly acute because of the country's "one child" law that has led to a shortage of marriageable women and created "a colossal market for bride selling."

Chinese demographers forecast that by 2020 some 40 million Chinese men will not be able to find women to marry, Smith said, calling the one child policy "barbaric."

US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, who has made women's and children's rights a signature issue, in June called human trafficking a "terrible crime" as she unveiled a US report on the subject.

China and India were listed on the report's "tier two watch list," for countries making "significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with minimum standards" on trafficking.

Lawmakers said however that they risk being regulated to the report's bottom rung, alongside long-time violators North Korea and Burma.

As Congress prepares to take up a reauthorization bill to update the 2000 law for the next decade, the committee's chair Howard Berman said huge challenges remain to combat the 32-billion-dollar-a-year industry that sees humans "reduced to machines for production or pleasure."

Of the world's estimated 27 million modern day slaves, two thirds are in India chiefly in bonded labor, the committee heard in testimony. Smith slammed New Delhi's action on the issue as "not even remotely commensurate with the size of its current problem."

The number of prosecutions for sex industry traffickers have risen nominally in some Indian states, said advocate Beryl Ann D'Souza, who heads anti-human trafficking efforts in India for the Dalit Freedom Network.

Even with laws on the books, D'Souza said the sub-continent's approach needs comprehensive overhaul, as only seven percent of India's police force have received any type of anti-trafficking training.

LOAD-DATE: October 1, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 Agence France Presse
All Rights Reserved

35 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Congressional Documents and Publications

September 30, 2010

House Foreign Affairs Committee Hearing;
Out of the Shadows: The Global Fight Against Human Trafficking; Testimony by Mark Lagon, Chair for International Relations and Security, and Visiting Professor, Georgetown University Master of Science in Foreign Service (MSFS) Program, and Adjunct Senior Fellow on Human Rights, Council on Foreign Relations

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 3146 words

Thank you Mr. Chairman, and Congresswoman Ros-Lehtinen, for inviting me to testify on an important subject: the slavery of today. This Committee has for years been committed to addressing imperatives of human rights which cross partisan lines, and were it not for Members of this Committee, including the indefatigable Mr. Smith, there would be no Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) or TIP Office. Thank you. I would ask that my full written statement be put into the Record, and I'll summarize my main points now.

On page 7, the latest TIP Report estimates there are 1.8 trafficking victims for every 1000 people in the world. And that is based on a very conservative International Labor Organization (ILO) estimate of 12.3 million victims globally - less than half of what scholar Kevin Bales estimates. So think about it: at least 1 out of every 555 people in today's world is a human trafficking victim.

Based in part upon my experience as the TIP Office Director, I would like to comment on two key priorities in the global context today ten years after the TVPA, the creation of the TIP Office, and the Palermo Protocol to the UN Crime Convention. Then I would like to offer recommendations on four key areas of action.

Two Global Trends and Priorities

The Need for Rule of Law in Practice. Human traffickers treat vulnerable groups such as women, children, migrants, minorities, and disadvantaged castes as if they are not human beings in full. They get away with it when --through neglect, prejudice, and complicity --societies, businesses, and government personnel permit them to, leaving those vulnerable groups without equal access to justice.

The main tangible impact of the TVPA, TIP Office's diplomacy, and Palermo Protocol has been the passage of new laws addressing human trafficking in well over half the countries of the world. This is a major achievement for rule of law, and demanding equal access to justice for TIP victims.

Yet rule of law consists of so much more than laws on the books - whether in the U.S. or the least developed of nations. There has been a lot of progress training law enforcement officials and empowering NGOs as their partners to help find victims and get them access to justice. But transformative change has not yet taken place. Of the TVPA's and Palermo Protocols 3 Ps--prosecution, protection, prevention--prosecution has been the emphasis to date. The TIP Report documents 7,992 prosecutions in the whole world in 2003, and down to 5,506 in 2009. Of the 5,506, only 432 were for labor trafficking. Prosecutions are limited, down from a few years ago, and minimal for non-sexual exploitation. Lots of effort is apparently not "moving the needle" of change a great deal. We need implementation of rule of law.

The Need to Address All Vulnerable Populations. I am often asked where are the more significant places for human trafficking globally --beyond answering simply, "The Tier 3 countries." India is one, because of the 27 million TIP victims in the world Dr. Bales estimates, two-thirds are there, chiefly in bonded labor. China is another, because of the underrecognized extent of the problem in so many forms, due to migrating workers without a safety net, a Wild West sex trade, official discrimination against Uighurs and Tibetans, and failure to treat North Koreans fleeing atrocious political and economic conditions as refugees. East Asia is of particular concern, given the prevalence of human trafficking for both major forms: for labor and for commercial sex. And the Gulf is a major flashpoint, where despite some strides prompted by U.S. diplomacy and self-interest, to be a woman or foreign guest worker - or worst of all both - you are likely to be treated as a lesser human.

Despite global trafficking foci and flashpoints, there are no "lesser" victims of trafficking. Since TIP's essence is groups denied equal dignity, let us not in our anti-TIP policy privilege some victims over others. They are all of equal value in humankind.

One reason the ten year old effort is not moving the needle more is the fissuring of efforts and siloed focus on particular vulnerable groups. It is more than a mere division of labor.

For instance, victims of forced labor are no less important than victims of sex trafficking--and vice versa. That was a signature feature of my tenure directing the TIP Office.

Sex trafficking is not the only source of exploitation and violence against women. Take three examples: As Ambassador, I met a Burmese woman who had been beaten and had her head shaved in a forced labor camp in Thailand. As Executive Director of the NGO Polaris Project, I met two Chinese women in Japan who were victimized in a foreign labor trainee program exempt from Japanese labor law. Chinese victimized in Japan. I also met a woman from an African nation Polaris served as a client right here in Washington. She spoke of the attention America paid to treating animals humanely in the U.S.--since some people like her are treated like animals here. All females victimized for labor.

Some think sex trafficking has been overemphasized due to alleged moralism, but to focus solely on labor would be equally wrongheaded. As the TIP Office Director who established parity of emphasis for labor slavery, I hope the pendulum is not swinging toward focus on labor to the near exclusion of adult sex trafficking. On page 8 of the 2010 Report the highlighted "box" on "What Is Not Human Trafficking?" emphasizing that prostitution is not trafficking is counterproductive. I do not think prostitution is one and the same as slavery. Few contemporary abolitionists do. But prostitution is the enabling environment for sex trafficking

- whether in brothels, or seedy streets or, until recently, on craigslist in the United States. Sex trafficking and its basic enabling environment of men fueling demand for purchasing (chiefly) females globally ought not to lose attention.

One sees fissuring elsewhere. Some devoted to combating sex trafficking focus only on children. (I myself serve on the Advisory Committee of ECPAT-USA, the leading NGO fighting commercial sexual exploitation of children.) This is easier territory given global consensus that there is no meaningful consent by minors to be prostituted. But sex trafficking is not confined to minors. First of all, if lured into the sex trade as a minor, does it suddenly become a choice the day someone turns 18? Moreover, we know that numerous adult females in the global sex trade are subject to force, fraud, or coercion - including subtle psychological terror and trickery - making them trafficking victims even under the strict standards of the Palermo Protocol.

There is one other serious area of fissuring: "Trafficking" may sound like it refers to crossing borders, but it actually refers to turning people into commodities robbed of autonomy. Despite what some at the Department of Labor, the ILO, and some businesses think, crossing borders is not a necessary element of trafficking. The families freed from bonded labor I met in Tamil Nadu, India or the Mexican girl prostituted as a minor I met in Chiapas, Mexico are just as much TIP victims as those who moved across borders.

So we need rule of law and equal dignity, both rightly understood. Rule of law depends on implementation, beyond passage of laws. And the global fight for the dignity of human trafficking victims requires equal value and energy accorded to all the victims. These two tests will be the basic signs to show whether we are successfully on the road to abolishing modern-day slavery.

A Four-Pronged Mission

Let me note four important areas of activity most important to meeting these two tests of success, and to stamping out human trafficking.

An Exemplar. First, the U.S. must be an exemplar. The clear continuity from Amb. John Miller's tenure to mine to Amb. CdeBaca's has been the steadily increasing emphasis on the U.S. being a good example, using the chairmanship of the inter-agency Senior Policy Operating Group codified by Congress. As TIP Office Director, a central premise was that the U.S. needed to be an exemplar to be an effective promoter of the anti-trafficking agenda globally. Let me say, I had very much in mind by analogy how U.S. detainee policy undercut U.S. promotion of freedom, good governance, and credible anti-terrorism policy internationally.

For example, it was pertinent to the country I focused on most: Mexico. I visited Mexico and its Attorney General in his office twice. I met with the Mexican Senate Majority Leader, head of the opposition to the Mexican President. I convened a trilateral meeting with Mexico, the U.S., and Canada, and included executive and legislative branch officials from each. Throughout this effort, we emphasized what the U.S. was doing - and not doing so well - at home. It surprised the Mexicans, who hate assessments, which they associated with the U.S. narcotics certifications. Mexico enacted a comprehensive TIP law and moved up to Tier 2 in 2008.

Under the last Administration we put a profile of the U.S. in the TIP Report, disseminated in hardcopy and CD-ROM the Department of Justice annual report on the U.S. record on TIP, and got DOJ to produce it same month as the TIP Report (assessing ourselves just as we assessed others). I think it is tremendous that Secretary Clinton has gone farther, including a profile with a ranking and more lengthy recommendations about areas of weakness.

ECPAT submitted a comment on that U.S. profile in the report, noting it did not say that according to U.S. Government's statistics from 2008 and 2009, almost three times as many prostituted children were arrested as were offered protection and assistance. To be transparent about this matter, as TIP Office Director I volunteered to co-lead the U.S. delegation to report to the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child on how we were implementing two Optional Protocols which the United States has ratified (on sale and prostitution of children, and on child soldiers). I knew we would face criticism for not having ratified the Convention on the Rights of the Child --the Protocols' mother treaty, pardon the pun. Admitting failings is helpful in pressuring other governments to do more. I saw the South Korean head of that UN Committee at Georgetown University recently, and she noted that benefit of our candor.

A Helping Hand. Persuading other governments to do more also benefits from offering a helping hand. It is not fully appreciated, but the assistance given to NGOs and more efficacious international organizations - like the International Organization of Migration (IOM) - is as important a part of the U.S. policy as any. If this fight against human trafficking is about rule of law and access to justice, civil society organizations are crucial partners to law enforcement to identify victims, make them feel safe, and help them. Victims become more stable, helpful witnesses to punish their exploiters in the process.

A helping hand can be offered directly to some governments too. Training for law enforcement helps turn law on paper into reality. Law enforcement, immigration officials and judges in other countries (just like our own) need a helping hand to learn to see a victim as a victim, not as a dirty or willful criminal. Governments with a will to change (on Tier 2 and Tier 2 Watch List), but with limited resources deserve help. I commend the attention being paid to Africa now, where Amb. CdeBaca went on his first trip. Less developed African nations need not so much "grading on a curve" in the TIP Report as they need tangible assistance.

Tough Love. Being an exemplar and offering a helping hand are important complements to pressuring other governments. Yet make no mistake: pressure governments we must. After ten years, we still need the "tough love" embodied by the TIP Office and its unique report - one that gives grades. The TVPA has manifestly worked - as the rankings and global awareness raised by the report has put pressure on governments. Sure, there are intransigent governments, both undemocratic and democratic. Yet in case after case, we have seen how the report and rankings have worked, even among allies unused to prodding from the U.S.: Turkey, Israel, the Philippines, the UAE, even Ireland, which recently appointed an anti-trafficking "czar."

When some say this "tough love" has not worked, it is flatly untrue. The TIP Office and the Report focus the mind of other governments on the problem; and they focus the mind of U.S. diplomats who would otherwise wish this issue not get in the way of other priorities.

I had the privilege to observe President Bush sign in the Oval Office the Wilberforce TVPRA Reauthorization this Committee launched. One of its most important and welcome provisions was a time limit on Tier 2 Watch List status. Please conduct oversight to ensure this device is used and the fair-minded flexibility you have given to the Executive Branch to defer or avert an automatic Tier 3 ranking is not misused in the name of alleged national interests. Some countries objectively deserve a ranking between Tier 2 and 3, but a so-called "Watch List" is only meaningful if there is a significant prospect of a downgrade to Tier 3.

There is one other area for tougher love. One of the places where trafficking for labor and victimization of women converge takes place right here on U.S. soil. Thanks to the ACLU, I met with a woman from Goa who was the human trafficking victim of a Kuwaiti official stationed in the U.S. She said the family treated her far worse as a domestic servant in the U.S. than in Kuwait because there was even less reason to think they would face consequences in the U.S. than in a Gulf country. That should make us pause in horror. It was worse in our country because of the impunity delivered by diplomatic immunity. I commend the TIP Office and now others at the Department for working hard to reduce the vulnerability of domestic servants to abuses qualifying as TIP by diplomats in the United States. Congress was crystal clear in the TVPA, thrice reauthorized, that attention should be paid to government officials found complicit in human trafficking. Official complicity is precisely the issue here. It is inevitable governments may exercise the option to withdraw accused diplomats rather than agree to lift diplomatic immunity to allow prosecution. Still, to meet the intent of the TVPA, these cases should be cited in the report (without using individual names as the Report never does) - as the TIP Office was overruled on in my tenure.

The Role of Business. So both carrots and sticks, both honey and vinegar, in U.S. diplomacy are essential. Secretary of State Clinton is carrying forward an approach of the Clinton and Bush Administrations to mobilize partnerships with NGOs, philanthropies, and businesses in our foreign policy. She calls "partnerships" a fourth "P" along with prosecution, protection, and prevention--more labeling a continuing, sound, non-partisan policy than introducing an initiative.

Chief among these partners is the business community. But it is high time businesses become more actively and tangibly involved in the global fight against human trafficking. For ten years, governments, NGOs, and international organizations have dedicated sizeable efforts to fight trafficking. More definitive results - more "movement of the needle" to squeeze trafficking and make it less profitable --will come if businesses work together to help. A business coalition would seize the opportunity to leverage varied and unique resources to take a quantum leap in the fight, with the goal to abolish trafficking. Let me be transparent here. I have been a paid consultant of a business engaged in a corporate responsibility campaign related to combating human trafficking: LexisNexis, Inc. It is working with others to explore such a coalition. In a week and a half, major businesses from sectors as diverse as information technology, soft drinks, cosmetics, labor placement, energy, the auto industry, the airline industry, travel and hospitality, entertainment, legal publishing and information solutions, and entertainment are meeting to explore such a business coalition.

Businesses should go farther than they have to date: dialogue with government and the UN; public awareness efforts not involving accountability of their own business operations; and single-sector accountability efforts like apparel, electronics, chocolate, or hotels. How can we end human trafficking if businesses are not fully engaged in reducing enabling environments, and working across siloed sectors. If they did so, we would have a much more significant chance to abolish this contemporary form of slavery.

We must recognize that market demand is a powerful force. Demand for cheap products and commercial sex are drivers of human trafficking. The Department of Labor finally fulfilling the mandate of the 2005 TVPA Reauthorization to produce a list of goods tainted by forced and child labor empowers consumers. If consumers knew some businesses were committed to reducing human trafficking, then demand would become an enormous force for good - creating an incentive for businesses to get ahead of the curve and join the fight. Globalization need not inexorably lead to slavery - but it will take the proactive efforts of businesses to prevent it. It is not too much to ask: take preventive action against the most extreme and autonomy-denying forms of exploitation, which are manifestly illegal under domestic and international law.

Out of the Shadows

Human trafficking victims are indeed in the shadows --vulnerable, women, men, children, migrants, and minorities marginalized socially and economically. Let us move from trafficking victimizing the marginalized, to actually marginalizing trafficking - through diplomatic pressure strengthened by being a good example and a helping hand to partners, and through the business community stepping up to the plate too. Only this way can we make sure that rule of law is fully realized and that all types victims are offered a chance to reclaim their inherent dignity.

The TIP Office and Report have done a lot to take the issue of human trafficking out of the shadows. It is worth thinking how much the TIP Office which Congress created ten years ago has found a formula for doing something in the last decade which has so flummoxed the State Department and Executive Branch - public diplomacy. Creative, feisty, un-bureaucratic, the TIP Office has told the story of universal values and the partnership we offer to extend them. That role has been even more important than its traditional diplomacy, and has indeed strengthened that traditional diplomacy.

Thanks for your effort to take this crucial issue out of the shadows with a Full Committee hearing on it, and the chance for me to participate.

LOAD-DATE: October 1, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: COSHC

Copyright 2010 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

36 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Copyright 2010 CQ Transcriptions, LLC
 All Rights Reserved
 CQ Transcriptions

All materials herein are protected by United States copyright law and may not be reproduced, distributed, transmitted, displayed, published or broadcast without the prior written permission of CQ Transcriptions. You may not alter or remove any trademark, copyright or other notice from copies of the content.

REP. HOWARD L. BERMAN HOLDS A HEARING ON COMBATING HUMAN TRAFFICKING

September 30, 2010 Thursday

EVENT DATE: September 30, 2010

TYPE: COMMITTEE HEARING

LOCATION: WASHINGTON, D.C.

COMMITTEE: HOUSE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SPEAKER: REP. HOWARD L. BERMAN, CHAIRMAN

WITNESSES:

REP. HOWARD L. BERMAN, D-CALIF. CHAIRMAN REP. GARY L. ACKERMAN, D-N.Y. DEL. ENI F.H. FALEOMAVAEGA, D-A.S. REP. DONALD M. PAYNE, D-N.J. REP. BRAD SHERMAN, D-CALIF. REP. ELIOT L. ENGEL, D-N.Y. REP. BILL DELAHUNT, D-MASS. REP. GREGORY W. MEEKS, D-N.Y. REP. DIANE WATSON, D-CALIF. REP. RUSS CARNAHAN, D-MO. REP. ALBIO SIRES, D-N.J. REP. GERRY CONNOLLY, D-VA. REP. MICHAEL E. MCMAHON, D-N.Y. REP. JOHN TANNER, D-TENN. REP. GENE GREEN, D-TEXAS REP. SHEILA JACKSON LEE, D-TEXAS REP. BARBARA LEE, D-CALIF. REP. SHELLEY BERKLEY, D-NEV. REP. JOSEPH CROWLEY, D-N.Y. REP. MIKE ROSS, D-ARK. REP. BRAD MILLER, D-N.C. REP. DAVID SCOTT, D-GA. REP. JIM COSTA, D-CALIF. REP. KEITH ELLISON, D-MINN. REP. GABRIELLE GIFFORDS, D-ARIZ. REP. RON KLEIN, D-FLA. REP. LYNN WOOLSEY, D-CALIF. REP. TED DEUTCH, D-FLA. REP. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN, R-FLA. RANKING MEMBER REP. CHRISTOPHER H. SMITH, R-N.J. REP. DAN BURTON, R-IND. REP. ELTON GALLEGLEY, R-CALIF. REP. DANA ROHRABACHER, R-CALIF. REP. DONALD MANZULLO, R-ILL. REP. ED ROYCE, R-CALIF. REP. RON PAUL, R-TEXAS REP. JEFF FLAKE, R-ARIZ. REP. MIKE PENCE, R-IND. REP. JOE WILSON, R-S.C. REP. JOHN BOOZMAN, R-ARK. REP. J. GRESHAM BARRETT, R-S.C. REP. CONNIE MACK, R-FLA. REP. JEFF FORTENBERRY, R-NEB. REP. MICHAEL MCCAUL, R-TEXAS REP. TED POE, R-TEXAS REP. BOB INGLIS, R-S.C. REP. GUS BILIRAKIS, R-FLA. REP. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN, R-FLA. RANKING MEMBER REP. CHRISTOPHER H. SMITH, R-N.J. REP. DAN BURTON, R-IND. REP. ELTON GALLEGLEY, R-CALIF. REP. DANA ROHRABACHER, R-CALIF. REP. DONALD MANZULLO, R-ILL. REP. ED ROYCE, R-CALIF. REP. RON PAUL, R-TEXAS REP. JEFF FLAKE, R-ARIZ. REP. MIKE PENCE, R-IND. REP. JOE WILSON, R-S.C. REP. JOHN BOOZMAN, R-ARK. REP. J. GRESHAM BARRETT, R-S.C. REP. CONNIE MACK, R-FLA. REP. JEFF FORTENBERRY, R-NEB. REP. MICHAEL MCCAUL, R-TEXAS REP. TED POE, R-TEXAS REP. BOB INGLIS, R-S.C. REP. GUS BILIRAKIS, R-FLA. REP. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN, R-FLA. RANKING MEMBER REP. CHRISTOPHER H. SMITH, R-N.J. REP. DAN BURTON, R-IND. REP. ELTON GALLEGLEY, R-CALIF. REP. DANA ROHRABACHER, R-CALIF. REP. DONALD MANZULLO, R-ILL. REP. ED ROYCE, R-CALIF. REP. RON PAUL, R-TEXAS REP. JEFF FLAKE, R-ARIZ. REP. MIKE PENCE, R-IND. REP. JOE WILSON, R-S.C. REP. JOHN BOOZMAN, R-ARK. REP. J. GRESH-

AM BARRETT, R-S.C. REP. CONNIE MACK, R-FLA. REP. JEFF FORTENBERRY, R-NEB. REP. MICHAEL MCCAUL, R-TEXAS REP. TED POE, R-TEXAS REP. BOB INGLIS, R-S.C. REP. GUS BILIRAKIS, R-FLA.

WITNESSES: THE HONORABLE LUIS CDEBACA, AMBASSADOR-AT-LARGE, OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE

REP. HOWARD L. BERMAN, D-CALIF. CHAIRMAN REP. GARY L. ACKERMAN, D-N.Y. DEL. ENI F.H. FALEOMAVAEGA, D-A.S. REP. DONALD M. PAYNE, D-N.J. REP. BRAD SHERMAN, D-CALIF. REP. ELIOT L. ENGEL, D-N.Y. REP. BILL DELAHUNT, D-MASS. REP. GREGORY W. MEEKS, D-N.Y. REP. DIANE WATSON, D-CALIF. REP. RUSS CARNAHAN, D-MO. REP. ALBIO SIRES, D-N.J. REP. GERRY CONNOLLY, D-VA. REP. MICHAEL E. MCMAHON, D-N.Y. REP. JOHN TANNER, D-TENN. REP. GENE GREEN, D-TEXAS REP. SHEILA JACKSON LEE, D-TEXAS REP. BARBARA LEE, D-CALIF. REP. SHELLEY BERKLEY, D-NEV. REP. JOSEPH CROWLEY, D-N.Y. REP. MIKE ROSS, D-ARK. REP. BRAD MILLER, D-N.C. REP. DAVID SCOTT, D-GA. REP. JIM COSTA, D-CALIF. REP. KEITH ELLISON, D-MINN. REP. GABRIELLE GIFFORDS, D-ARIZ. REP. RON KLEIN, D-FLA. REP. LYNN WOOLSEY, D-CALIF. REP. TED DEUTCH, D-FLA.

REP. HOWARD L. BERMAN, D-CALIF. CHAIRMAN REP. GARY L. ACKERMAN, D-N.Y. DEL. ENI F.H. FALEOMAVAEGA, D-A.S. REP. DONALD M. PAYNE, D-N.J. REP. BRAD SHERMAN, D-CALIF. REP. ELIOT L. ENGEL, D-N.Y. REP. BILL DELAHUNT, D-MASS. REP. GREGORY W. MEEKS, D-N.Y. REP. DIANE WATSON, D-CALIF. REP. RUSS CARNAHAN, D-MO. REP. ALBIO SIRES, D-N.J. REP. GERRY CONNOLLY, D-VA. REP. MICHAEL E. MCMAHON, D-N.Y. REP. JOHN TANNER, D-TENN. REP. GENE GREEN, D-TEXAS REP. SHEILA JACKSON LEE, D-TEXAS REP. BARBARA LEE, D-CALIF. REP. SHELLEY BERKLEY, D-NEV. REP. JOSEPH CROWLEY, D-N.Y. REP. MIKE ROSS, D-ARK. REP. BRAD MILLER, D-N.C. REP. DAVID SCOTT, D-GA. REP. JIM COSTA, D-CALIF. REP. KEITH ELLISON, D-MINN. REP. GABRIELLE GIFFORDS, D-ARIZ. REP. RON KLEIN, D-FLA. REP. LYNN WOOLSEY, D-CALIF. REP. TED DEUTCH, D-FLA.

REP. HOWARD L. BERMAN, D-CALIF. CHAIRMAN REP. GARY L. ACKERMAN, D-N.Y. DEL. ENI F.H. FALEOMAVAEGA, D-A.S. REP. DONALD M. PAYNE, D-N.J. REP. BRAD SHERMAN, D-CALIF. REP. ELIOT L. ENGEL, D-N.Y. REP. BILL DELAHUNT, D-MASS. REP. GREGORY W. MEEKS, D-N.Y. REP. DIANE WATSON, D-CALIF. REP. RUSS CARNAHAN, D-MO. REP. ALBIO SIRES, D-N.J. REP. GERRY CONNOLLY, D-VA. REP. MICHAEL E. MCMAHON, D-N.Y. REP. JOHN TANNER, D-TENN. REP. GENE GREEN, D-TEXAS REP. SHEILA JACKSON LEE, D-TEXAS REP. BARBARA LEE, D-CALIF. REP. SHELLEY BERKLEY, D-NEV. REP. JOSEPH CROWLEY, D-N.Y. REP. MIKE ROSS, D-ARK. REP. BRAD MILLER, D-N.C. REP. DAVID SCOTT, D-GA. REP. JIM COSTA, D-CALIF. REP. KEITH ELLISON, D-MINN. REP. GABRIELLE GIFFORDS, D-ARIZ. REP. RON KLEIN, D-FLA. REP. LYNN WOOLSEY, D-CALIF. REP. TED DEUTCH, D-FLA.

DAVID ABRAMOWITZ, DIRECTOR OF POLICY AND GOVERNMENT RELATIONS, HUMANITY UNITED
 THE HONORABLE MARK P. LAGON, CHAIR, INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS AND SECURITY CONCEN-TRATION, AND VISITING PROFESSOR, EDMUND A. WALSH SCHOOL OF FOREIGN SERVICE, GEORGETOWN UNIVERSITY

ARUNA UPRETY, M.D., FOUNDER, RURAL HEALTH EDUCATION SERVICES AND TRUST, PARTNER, AMERICAN HIMALAYAN FOUNDATION'S STOP GIRL TRAFFICKING PROGRAM

NEHA MISRA SENIOR SPECIALIST, MIGRATION & HUMAN TRAFFICKING, SOLIDARITY CENTER, AFL-CIO

BERYL D'SOUZA, M.D., MEDICAL DIRECTOR AND ANTI-HUMAN TRAFFICKING DIRECTOR IN INDIA, DALIT FREEDOM NETWORK

REP. HOWARD L. BERMAN, D-CALIF. CHAIRMAN REP. GARY L. ACKERMAN, D-N.Y. DEL. ENI F.H. FALEOMAVAEGA, D-A.S. REP. DONALD M. PAYNE, D-N.J. REP. BRAD SHERMAN, D-CALIF. REP. ELIOT L. ENGEL, D-N.Y. REP. BILL DELAHUNT, D-MASS. REP. GREGORY W. MEEKS, D-N.Y. REP. DIANE WATSON, D-CALIF. REP. RUSS CARNAHAN, D-MO. REP. ALBIO SIRES, D-N.J. REP. GERRY CONNOLLY, D-VA. REP. MICHAEL E. MCMAHON, D-N.Y. REP. JOHN TANNER, D-TENN. REP. GENE GREEN, D-TEXAS REP. SHEILA JACKSON LEE, D-TEXAS REP. BARBARA LEE, D-CALIF. REP. SHELLEY BERKLEY, D-NEV. REP. JOSEPH CROWLEY, D-N.Y. REP. MIKE ROSS, D-ARK. REP. BRAD MILLER, D-N.C. REP. DAVID SCOTT, D-GA. REP. JIM COSTA, D-CALIF. REP. KEITH ELLISON, D-MINN. REP. GABRIELLE GIFFORDS, D-ARIZ. REP. RON KLEIN, D-FLA. REP. LYNN WOOLSEY, D-CALIF. REP. TED DEUTCH, D-FLA.

TEXT:

BERMAN: The committee will come to order. In a moment, I'll recognize myself and the ranking member for up to seven minutes each. The ranking member for this hearing will be the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. Smith. So a certain appropriateness to that in this particular hearing. And also Mr. Royce for a three-minute opening statement.

Any other members who come could have one-minute opening statements. And, without objections, members may also place written statements in the record.

Human trafficking, or trafficking in persons, is an affront to human dignity that links communities across the world in a web of money, exploitation and victimization.

Trafficking encompasses many types of exploitative activities, including sex trafficking, slavery, forced labor, peonage, debt bondage, involuntary domestic servitude and making children into soldiers.

The International Labor Organization estimates that 12.3 million children and adults are currently suffering from forced labor, bonded labor and forced prostitution worldwide. Of that number, approximately 2.4 million are trafficked either internally or across -- across national borders.

Human trafficking is a $32 billion global criminal enterprise, second only to illegal drugs in the profits it generates for its perpetrators, which range from sophisticated criminal syndicates to independently owned businesses with labor recruiters to family operations.

Trafficking is a problem that can be effectively confronted only through cross-border cooperation, but it has been -- it has been proven very difficult to combat.

Next month marks the tenth anniversary of enactment of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, authored by our colleague Chris Smith. That law provided protection and assistance for victims of trafficking, authorized public awareness prevention campaigns, and strengthened the prosecution and punishment of traffickers.

We have reauthorized the Trafficking Victims Protection Act several times, and in the process made the act much more effective in protecting the most vulnerable and punishing the guilty.

One hundred and fifteen other nations now have laws on the books banning all forms of trafficking. And the number of victims identified and traffickers prosecuted has grown over the years. But trafficking remains a persistent problem, and many challenges remain -- both at home and abroad -- as we look to the next decade of anti- trafficking efforts.

Earlier this month, the Department of Justice and the FBI dismantled the nation's largest human trafficking ring and indicted six recruiters for bringing 400 Thai laborers to the United States.

These laborers were lured to the United States with false promises of high-paying jobs. Some of the victims were duped into paying up to $21,000 in recruiting fees.

Once in this country, their passports were confiscated, and they were forced to work under slave-like conditions. If the victims complained, they were threatened with deportation.

They lived without electricity, sanitation and running water. They were cheated out of their wages for back-breaking work picking fruits and vegetables. Because their food rations were insufficient, many had to resort to eating leaves or fishing in rivers.

This example of forced labor trafficking involved labor brokers who convinced their victims that they were not free until they first paid off their recruitment fee debt. With a high debt, workers entered into a debt bondage situation and became vulnerable to exploitation.

We need to pay particular attention to this form of forced labor trafficking and examine the role of labor brokers and how their presence increases the chances of exploitation of workers.

According to Anti-Slavery International, debt bondage is "probably the least known form of slavery today, and yet it is the most widely used method of enslaving people."

The State Department's annual trafficking in persons report contains a wealth of information about debt bondage, forced labor and other forms of trafficking worldwide. The report also provides a country-by-country analysis and ranking, based on what progress countries have made throughout the year in their efforts to prosecute, protect and prevent trafficking in persons.

We are honored to welcome Ambassador at Large Lou CdeBaca, who oversaw the compilation of this year's TIP report.

We are particularly interested in hearing from him about the major trends and challenges in trafficking, whether sanctions are a useful tool in persuading other nations to increase cooperation with the United States in anti-trafficking efforts, and the U.S. ranking in the report.

The fight against human trafficking is the modern-day continuation of the fight against slavery. It is the fight to give all people the dignity they deserve and to prevent human beings from being reduced to machines for production or pleasure.

A number of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle have been leaders in the fight against human trafficking. And in the months ahead we'll continue our efforts to make the Trafficking Victims Protection Act as effective as possible.

In addition to Ambassador CdeBaca, we have an extraordinary and distinguished panel of experts with us today that will address some of the key issues associated with human trafficking.

I should let the audience and others who might be following this hearing know that when we set this hearing, we expected Congress to be in session through next week. When we -- when it got into the early and middle of September, we expected Congress to be in session through Friday, and it turns out Congress recessed for the election last night.

This accounts -- the one thing I can assure people is members of Congress and members of this committee have a very high interest in this subject, even though, because of that schedule, a number of members aren't going to be at the hearing this morning. But we will be circulating the testimony and their information passed around.

And now I'm very pleased to turn to the ranking member for this hearing, the ranking member of the Africa and Global Health Subcommittee, the author of the original legislation, Chris Smith, for any comments he may wish to make.

SMITH: Mr. Chairman, thank you very much, and especially thank you for convening this very important hearing on human trafficking.

You know, Mr. Chairman, we've come a long way since a September 1999 hearing that I chaired on human trafficking in this very room. It was part of a series, almost eleven years to the day today.

At that particular hearing, then Assistant Secretary Harold Koh called human trafficking a global plague and said that while the Clinton administration supported the objective of the bill to combat trafficking, he testified that the existing legislative framework was sufficient and that new legislation should not focus on developing new institutions or establishing onerous new requirements.

Beefed-up reporting in the annual country reports on human rights practices, he said, would suffice.

Secretary Koh further testified that the administration sharply objected to singling out and sanctioning countries with poor records and government complicity in trafficking, but did agree on the need for alien asylum protection and enhanced criminal penalties for traffickers.

That said, we pushed hard and ahead in a totally bipartisan fashion and crafted comprehensive landmark legislation known as the Trafficking Victims Protection Act.

So many remarkable people did so much, too many to name today, to help shape that bill. Top staffers on my committee, Joseph Rees, who's our general counsel, and David Abramowitz, who will be speaking momentarily in the second panel on the Democrat side, were extraordinary in helping to craft that bill. And I thank them, because this is an enduring legacy for the most vulnerable and the weakest among us.

On the Senate side, people like Mark Lagon and other staffers also played a vital role. And again, it was totally bipartisan over there as well.

As a direct consequence of the TPVA (sic) and faithful implementation of it since it was enacted, for the past decade the United States has led the world in combating modern-day slavery. Much has been done. Much more remains to be done.

Three presidential administrations, one Republican and two Democrat, have vigorously sought to protect and rescue victims from being turned into commodities for sale. Three administrations have sought to punish traffickers with rigorous prosecutions and jail sentences, both here and promoting that abroad, commensurate with these heinous crimes.

And in the last few years, especially, nations have been strongly admonished to being compliant with the law's minimum standards or face significant sanctions.

Ambassador Mark Lagon did an amazing job at the TIP office under the Bush administration, as did Assistant Secretary Luis CdeBaca today under President Obama.

The United States is indeed fortunate to have had and have individuals of their caliber, their competence and their commitment leading the fight against trafficking. Pardon me.

In 2010, the good news is that convictions are significantly up worldwide, as is the identification and response to the victims, shelters providing safe haven -- and we are trying in this country to expand the shelters that are available and the beds as well.

As special representative for trafficking for the OSCE Parliamentary Assembly, I can also attest to the fact that significant progress has been made in many member states, including Bosnia, which I have visited on several occasions. I've been to shelters in Sarajevo.

And it was the focus of hearings we held because unfortunately, many of the peacekeepers and the police deployed there under the U.N. auspices were actually complicit in trafficking.

Today I would strongly urge Ambassador CdeBaca to undertake a comprehensive reassessment of at least two watch list nations, China and India, for failing to meet the minimum standards prescribed in the TPVA (sic) and for not taking significant action to comply.

I would respectfully ask that you undertake a serious analysis of the nexus between the PRC's barbaric one-child-per-couple policy and its consequences on sex trafficking. I know Ambassador Mark Lagon began to speak about that during his tenure in office, and I think the evidence is absolutely compelling and grows worse by the day.

This past Saturday marked the grim thirtieth anniversary of that anti-child, anti-woman policy. I would note parenthetically that more babies have been murdered by the one-child-per-couple policy, especially baby girls, than all the people slaughtered by Mao Tse-tung.

China's one-child-per-couple policy has resulted in the worst genocide in history. Today, the missing girls of China, a massive crime against young women, means that an increasing number of men simply cannot find wives to marry.

Some Chinese demographers have stated by the year 2020, 40 million Chinese men won't be able to find wives, having been killed by sex-selective abortions, creating a colossal market for bride-selling and sex trafficking.

Earlier this week we heard -- here in this room at a Tom Lantos Human Rights Hearing chaired by Ed Royce -- we heard from three North Korean women who made it across the border into China, thinking they were finding some kind of refuge and some kind of hope going there, only to be trafficked.

And one of the women told us that they are called "pigs" by the Chinese men who enslave them. And because one of the particular women was beautiful -- she is a model -- she said, "They called me the best pig." So dehumanizing to that woman and to all women.

Years ago, I held a hearing, also with North Korean refugees, and one of the women told us how she had made it across the border, first following her daughter. She was trafficked. When she and her other daughter -- because news does not get back to the families, they were looking for her -- they too were then trafficked.

So this magnet that has been created by the one-child-per-couple policy will only mean, going forward, that there will be more missing girls and a greater push by traffickers to bring women in.

In India, it is very similar, although it is not a coercive population control program. But, unfortunately, women are not treated with the same equality to which they are entitled, and sex-selection abortion is rampant there.

Some years ago the U.N. Population Fund actually did a study and suggested that in India, there are missing at least 60 million girls due to sex-selection abortion. Again, a huge magnet in India as well.

And I would hope, Ambassador CdeBaca, that you would take a good hard look at this nexus between this terrible crime of forced abortion and sex-selection abortion and human trafficking, because it is only going to get worse.

I yield back, and I thank the chairman for convening this hearing.

BERMAN: Thank you very much.

I'm pleased to yield three minutes to the gentleman from California, Mr. Royce, the ranking member of the Terrorism, Nonproliferation and Trade Subcommittee.

ROYCE: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, and thank you for calling this hearing.

I think the issue that really strikes us is the -- is the explosion of human trafficking that we've seen over the last few years. It's the magnitude of this explosion, and I think the thing we all ask is why isn't this getting the attention it deserves, why isn't more being done to leverage against this? And I want to thank the chairman for holding this hearing to do exactly that.

I also want to thank Chris Smith for the legislation that he's offered up, that he's worked so hard to pass over the years in order to try to address this real travesty.

And I -- my hope coming out of this hearing is that what it will do is focus attention beyond the NGO community, you know, to the wider international community about the fact that something has to be done to address and stop these practices.

And I think the State Department's report that it released, its annual Trafficking in Persons Report, in some ways is a tool that we can use. It catalogs those human rights abuses around the world. It was the first -- the first report to include the United States.

And we are certainly not immune from this crime. And I think that's evidenced by the arrest and conviction, for example, of a New Jersey woman who smuggled girls from West Africa to the U.S., forced them to work every day, 14 hours a day, in her hair salon, without ever paying them -- without ever paying them. But thankfully this trafficker now faces 27 years in prison.

There are too many cases like that at home, but that conviction and that 27 years sends a message to other traffickers that here in the United States, we're serious about this and there will be serious consequences to trafficking.

What we want to do is make certain that other nations also send that message that there are serious consequences.

And with that respect, I'm going to take a minute here to criticize a portion of this -- of this TIP report that I think falls short. I was disappointed to see that Cambodia was bumped up a level.

It's no longer identified among the world's worst violators of human -- of human trafficking, and I think in some ways the administration's released the pressure here on Cambodia at a time when the situation is really out of control in Cambodia.

Put very bluntly, I think this is a slap in the face to the thousands of victims in Cambodia of this practice, because so many girls there are continuing to be forced into sexual slavery.

And you just saw what "Dateline," the news report from "Dateline" -- many here who were involved in this issue or concerned and following this issue saw that report, where they say Cambodia continues to be such a magnet for people who prey on the young.

There, children as young as three or four are sold to sex tourists. My own chief of staff traveled to Cambodia to work with some of these children, some of the children just recently released from brothels. And the stories that she relays to me was absolutely horrifying.

Sadly, NGOs and eye witnesses report that Cambodia's government continues to hamper trafficking investigations and frequently covers up the problem. As a matter of fact, the government goes after people who bring up the problem in Cambodia.

And it -- corruptions in -- if I could ask for a few more minutes, Mr. Chairman. I just want to...

(CROSSTALK)

BERMAN: ... to the gentleman, an additional minute?

ROYCE: I really appreciate it, if you could, Mr. Chairman. Thank you.

The corruption there is endemic. Local police and government officials are often directly involved in the -- in the trafficking. They're pocketing profits as a result. And we should not be -- we should not be elevating Cambodia on that report.

And today we'll also hear from one of our witnesses about trafficking in India, where caste-based discrimination against its Dalits result in millions of women and children being victims of human trafficking.

Of the 3 million sex workers in India, nearly 40 percent are children, most are Dalits. The Indian government has made recent efforts to protect Dalits, but clearly much more needs to be done to eliminate a very long-standing and entrenched practice.

As I said, no country is immune from the problem of human trafficking. Only with increased accountability and honesty can we help some of the world's most marginalized people.

And I'd like to thank the chairman once again for holding this important hearing.

BERMAN: Thank you. The time for this gentleman has expired.

The gentleman from Texas, Mr. Poe, is recognized for one minute.

POE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate you holding this hearing.

This issue thrives in darkness, and it's going to be the -- I hope the goal of the United States to shed light on this human trafficking nightmare, not only on the rest of the world, but what takes place in the United States as well.

In my other life, I was a judge in Texas forever and saw the results of some of these issues. And I think being from Texas, I've got to keep it simple.

There are three people involved in human trafficking, at least. First and foremost is the victim. And the young girl that is kidnapped and forced into slavery is not a criminal. She is a victim of crime. Then you have the customer who pays for this slavery. And then you have the trafficker. You've got three entities.

And first and foremost, we need to regard the young woman, generally, as a victim and treat her as such. It's interesting. We have a child brought into the United States that's trafficked here, and she is rescued by the system. She's treated as a victim.

We have a child in Houston, Texas, that is trafficked to Los Angeles. That child is treated as a criminal. She's not rescued and put in some safe haven, she's put in the criminal justice system.

I thought I had three minutes. you just said a minute?

BERMAN: I did just say a minute. You don't like that, you want to compromise it at two?

POE: I would ask permission...

BERMAN: An additional minute?

POE: Yes, sir. I'll try to sum it up.

BERMAN: OK.

POE: So that's the first issue. We've got to treat her -- treat the person as a victim.

The second guy, they need to be exposed, and we need to let the world know who they are. And if we capture them and they're prosecuted, let's put their photographs on the Internet so everybody knows who these people are.

And then the last person, the trafficker, they need to be punished to the fullest extent. Even one case, I had a Texas Ranger tell me that, "Judge, when you get one of those in court, just get a rope."

I'm not so sure that that's really the answer, but we need to make sure that they are punished, and that we also then control the visa system in this country: Where a person's an ex-con for child molesting and they leave our country, and the reason they're leaving is to go overseas and continue their evil ways, we need to make sure that you know in the State Department who these people are. And so that's a piece of legislation that's pending.

But the United States is the leader in human rights, and we need to make sure that we continue to be the leader in human rights throughout the world. And we need to protect our young resources, young women, here and abroad.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I yield back.

BERMAN: Thank you. The time of the gentleman has expired.

It is now my pleasure to introduce our first panel, a panel of one.

Ambassador Luis CdeBaca was appointed by President Obama to coordinate U.S. government activities in the global fight against human trafficking. He serves as senior adviser to Secretary Clinton and directs the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

Previously, Ambassador CdeBaca served as counsel to a committee that I am privileged to serve on, the House Judiciary Committee, and as a federal prosecutor for the Department of Justice, leading investigations and prosecution of cases involving money laundering, organized crime, alien smuggling, official misconduct, hate crimes and human trafficking.

Ambassador, it's very good to have you with us. Your entire statement will be placed on the record. Feel free to summarize, and then we'll go through a round of questions.

CDEBACA: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'd like to thank you, Ranking Member Smith and the other members of the committee, for convening this critical hearing on human trafficking and also for your support on this issue over the last decade and before, but, on a personal note, your support and leadership when I was a Judiciary Committee staffer working on this, intelligence and other critical issues.

Almost 150 years have now passed since the Emancipation Proclamation was issued, and slavery persists in many forms. In the 1910s, the focus in Congress and the Justice Department was against European women brought here for sex slavery.

In the 1930s, it was called peonage. It was U.S. citizens held in bonded labor in agricultural situations. The attention of the 1990s, again, European women in sex trafficking.

The Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 hopefully breaks the pendulum of attention and then inattention to this problem that we have so often seen in those 150 years.

No matter the euphemism or the technical term or the technical label that we use, we are seeing things now that show how human trafficking cuts across these lines.

We see victims held in servitude in factories, farms and homes, bought and sold in prostitution, and captured as child soldiers

We've come to understand that men comprise a significant number of victims, but also see the feminization of modern slavery clearly demonstrated, with women making up a majority of those trapped in commercial sex, as well as in forced labor situations.

Traffickers now are changing their methods of control -- more female recruiters, more subtle means of exploitation, greater psychological abuse. This crime impairs human rights, degrades public health, corrupts government officials and weakens the rule of law.

Not limited to one gender, faith or geographic area, the universality of this crime is reflected in the bipartisan consensus around this issue.

The U.S. government's sustained application of the three-P approach of protection, prevention and prosecution through three administrations now, is evidence of this consensus and commitment. And so I'm glad to not only have succeeded Ambassador Mark Lagon at the trafficking office, but that we are both able to come before you today in the spirit of that shared commitment.

So what is the Obama administration doing to fight modern slavery? Well, I'll certainly refer you to the much more fulsome version of this testimony that we're putting into the record, but there are a few things that I'd like to highlight in my oral presentation.

The annual trafficking report remains the United State's principal diplomatic tool to engage foreign governments on the issue of modern slavery. And we feel that it is the world's most comprehensive resource on anti-trafficking efforts by governments.

It's prompted legislation, national action plans, and the implementation of policies and programs. We are committed to using the tools of the TVPA.

And, indeed, Harold Koh, now the legal adviser at the Department of State, has in the Obama administration been a very supportive and strong voice for application of the minimum standards, rankings and sanctions analysis. What a difference 10 years makes from the testimony that he was sent to give, that Mr. Smith references.

And so what have we seen? While there is much to do, there are also many things that have changed for the better: A steady increase in sex trafficking prosecutions and shelters for victims in Gulf states; greater efforts to address the forced begging of Koranic students in West Africa; passage of a law and formation of a national task force in Swaziland; cross-border cooperation and joint law enforcement efforts with Mexico; a significant uptick of victim identification in Albania and Montenegro; the naming of the first TIP "czar" on the island of Malta; and greater anti-trafficking collaboration by the Malaysian government with the U.S. government and NGOs, which have led to new trafficking investigations and prosecutions.

This litany would be impressive if it were the last decade's accomplishments. This is the last year.

Bosnia, as Mr. Smith points out, we feel is a particular success story, on Tier 3 for many years, ravaged and plagued by sex traffickers and organized crime. But the government changed course and aggressively tackled the crime because of the leadership, not just of the United States, the TIP report and programs, but also the Helsinki Commission, the OSCE, and other structures that the U.S. Congress supports.

After a decade of hard work, Bosnia is now a Tier 1 country and a model for other countries that can make that journey.

We feel as well that the inclusion of the United States in this year's TIP report, a testament to Secretary Clinton's insistence on partnership, provides such a model as well, as we try to hold ourselves accountable to the same standards that we would expect of our foreign counterparts.

The TVPA recognized that this was not just a foreign policy imperative but also a domestic law enforcement priority, as Mr. Poe points out, requiring attention at the local and state level, and coordination and expertise across agency lines.

And so, the Interagency Task Force on Trafficking at the Cabinet level, and its working group, which I chair, the Senior Policy Operating Group, were created to coordinate those interagency policies, programs and planning issues.

In the submitted testimony, we have a recitation of many of the things that have been done to coordinate, to implement the laws, the TVPA, and its reauthorizations, and we would certainly call people's attention to that.

One thing that I would like to bring up specifically though, is one of the mandates of the Wilberforce Act, the 2008 reauthorization.

Responding to congressional concerns about guest worker abuse, the State Department, with the Departments of Homeland Security, Justice and Labor, consulting with nongovernmental organizations, developed an information pamphlet on the legal rights and resources available to aliens who are applying for nonimmigrant visas.

The pamphlet is given to visa applicants in the (inaudible) -- overseas -- and they hopefully travel with them. It's in multiple languages. It's resulted in 148 calls to the national hotline this year.

And earlier this week I heard from legal service providers who recounted that seasonal workers, who had suffered in silence in previous years with the same employers, not knowing that they had rights in the United States, this year, when they traveled, had that pamphlet with them, and a number of calls to the hotline have resulted -- workers who had not known of their rights or that there was somebody in the United States who would be willing to help them.

That pamphlet was a direct result of the work of the members of this committee and the staff of this committee in that authorization, and is much appreciated by those of us who are on the front lines.

Going forward and continuing the work of our predecessors in the Bush administration and the Clinton administration, the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons will continue to work with our interagency partners, state and local governments, and foreign governments to develop comprehensive anti-trafficking legislation, to strengthen existing laws, and train criminal justice officials to see victims as victims rather than merely illegal immigrants or criminals.

We hope that this will lead to an increased number of convictions for traffickers and complicit government officials, including military personnel and corrupt border officials.

We hope to strengthen victim protection and assistance by encouraging cooperation between governments and NGOs, and enhancing the capacity of civil society to provide comprehensive services that fully address the needs of the victims. And we will wisely stretch every appropriation that you give us to do that.

We will support evidence-based research to evaluate the impact of our programs and to fill core data gaps, so that we know that the money we're spending on programs is well spent. And we will leverage those resources even more by working with the private sector to have innovative public-private partnerships to solve this problem.

Mindful of those who suffered and died in bondage throughout the history of this country and heeding President Obama's call in January for a recommitment to this ongoing struggle, we'll continue to promote a global movement to abolish modern slavery.

I thank you for your important support of this issue, and I look forward to your questions.

BERMAN: Thank you very much, Ambassador. And we'll begin the questioning.

It's the chair's intent, because we have two panels and we do have the Pakistani foreign minister coming to the committee at 12:30, to limit the questioning to under -- to the five minutes and one round for each panel. I'll yield myself five minutes to start.

Your testimony does an excellent job of giving us an overview of accomplishments in the fight against trafficking in the last 10 years. I'd be interested -- you talked a little bit about looking forward, what we're going to do, but I'd be interested, sort of, in your general thoughts about the next decade in terms of the fight against trafficking.

What is that going to look like? What should it look like? What are your key priorities? What particular countries do we need to put special emphasis on?

CDEBACA: I think that the thing that we'll hopefully see in the next 10 years, and that we're working towards, is to remove this from being a boutique issue. In many ways, human trafficking has been the thing that is kind of done after everything else with the law enforcement community.

It's -- you know, working on trainings, working on rule of law, whether we're doing development work or whether we're talking to our foreign counterparts, trafficking often is then a separate conversation. And I think that one of the things that we're going to be -- that we're working on that's very important to Secretary Clinton, as well as to myself, is to incorporate the trafficking office into the work of other parts of the department, such as the INL and others, who have such an impact when they're doing law enforcement training, when they're getting that kind of mentoring and money out there.

We've seen this now with the inclusion of trafficking in the Merida process with Mexico, standing up and supporting trafficking units with the Mexican government.

I think that that type of joint law enforcement is going to be very important. And we would like to support not just joint law enforcement, where perpetrators are arrested both here and in the source country, doing that together, the way that we've done now with Mexico and Cambodia, but in fact have that become the international norm, especially countries that don't have extradition treaties with us, so that we know the traffickers are being brought to justice.

So on the law enforcement side, that's -- I think our priority is that kind of collaboration and cooperation.

As far as victim protection, we're working, whether it's through international fora or otherwise, to make sure that victim protection comes to the forefront, rather than being solely an adjunct to law enforcement, but rather that the best interests of the victim, the best interests of the child, be the way that the governments look at this.

We think that moving out of a detention-based approach to trafficking victim care -- a cleaner, nicer jail for trafficking victims is better than a dirty and bad jail for trafficking victims, but it's the position of the United States that there should be no jail for trafficking victims. And I think that that's something that we'll see continue in the next decade.

BERMAN: Thank you. Just to follow up, is there a thought about what to do with our missions abroad in terms of prioritizing and training and educating them on things they can be doing in terms of their agendas that raise this issue?

CDEBACA: I think the leadership principle certainly comes into play. And one of the things that we've seen is that -- and it doesn't mean that a good report comes from good activity, because it's up to the local government -- but we have seen that where a chief of mission is very engaged throughout the year, that the governments respond.

We've seen with Harry Thomas for instance, in Manila, the level of engagement that he's brought with him as he's gotten his team in place is now being reflected back by the Philippine government, and not just in words but in actions.

And so that's something that we're encouraging with the outgoing chiefs of mission, we're working with them in the -- at the Foreign Service Institute and otherwise, so that they land with a bang.

I think that we also then see training both for the reporting officers and for diplomatic security agents as being critical.

BERMAN: My time is about to expire.

So I'm going to yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. Smith.

SMITH: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Ambassador, again thank you for your leadership and testimony.

Let me just ask a couple of very quick questions. In my opening, I talked about India and China. Could you speak to those issues? Our hope is that they're on Tier 3, Vietnam will have to be added as well, and you and I have a whole fact sheet on why Vietnam, particularly on labor trafficking, ought to be there.

You know, last year Fiji was -- Fiji Islands -- was Tier 3. When you look at the enormity, the scope, the government complicity in a place like China, or total indifference in some places, India, as well -- I mean, Mumbai has made some efforts, but it's far from effective -- these countries need to be on Tier 3.

What we do with the penalty phase, and I know there's a great deal of push back within the building and from the missions abroad, from our ambassadors very often -- don't complicate statecraft by injecting a human rights issue of this caliber and weight. But, you know, we need to speak truth to power, not some of the time but all of the time. So, please.

And the nexus with the one-child-per-couple policy and sex-selection abortions, because it's only going to get worse -- if you could speak to that and whether or not you would do a comprehensive study on that.

CDEBACA: Well, as Secretary Clinton has pointed out when talking about 21st century statecraft, statecraft and diplomacy exist not to sustain itself, but to convey our national interests and our national values.

And so I think that's why we see the human trafficking issue being something that we are raising at the highest levels of government, and not shying away from those often uncomfortable discussions with our friends and allies.

I'll start with China. I too met with some of the North Korean refugees who were in town last week, and it confirmed what our reporting and other sources of information that are reflected in last year's report had indicated, which the vast majority of the women in northeastern China from North Korea appear to be trafficking victims.

They're not recognized by the Chinese government. To a degree, they are -- they are either seen as a source of low-level corruption, pay-offs, or they're deported.

One of the things that was troubling to me to hear from some of the women was that one of the only ways of escape was whether or not the clients, the men, South Korean men who used them for web chat, sex chat videos, if they could get one of the clients to understand what had happened to them and have that man help them out.

If the only way to escape from sex trafficking is to depend on the kindness of a customer, then we have a problem there. But we also see the reports in other parts of the country, Burmese, Vietnamese and other women trafficked across the borders for prostitution and brides for the specific reason that you mentioned as far as the population imbalance in China. And we're very worried about that as well as the massive labor trafficking that occurs within the borders.

We are heartened by the fact that China recently ratified the Palermo protocol, and -- but we think that at that point now, they need to look at their domestic law to bring it into compliance with Palermo. Their definition of trafficking seems to be different than many. And you see these numbers about child selling and false adoptions as what they seem to be wanting to work on.

I will be going to China as a result in the coming months and beginning to have that conversation with them directly, because it is something that we feel we need to raise with them.

As far as India is concerned, I've -- I have certainly raised this not only with Ambassador Shankar but also with the foreign minister, as has Undersecretary Otero, Secretary Clinton, Bob Blake.

Assistant Secretary Blake cares very much about this. I think he saw it in his iterations in the embassies in the region, recognizes that the south and central Asia region is a kind of a hot spot for a lot of this activity.

We are heartened to see that India finally has characterized bonded labor as part of their trafficking fight in a communique to the field of last September. But bridging the federal and state gap in India will be critical.

You can't divulge power on such an important human rights issue fully to the state and locals, lest you do have simply those bright spots that we've identified, whether in Andhra Pradesh or in Mumbai.

So we're working with the Indians to use our experience with federalism, use our fight as far as how we manage the interplay between local law enforcement and the federal anti-trafficking as an example of how they can deal with that problem.

BERMAN: The time of the gentleman has expired.

The gentleman from Texas, Mr. Green, is recognized for five minutes.

GREEN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I ask unanimous consent to place my statement into the record.

BERMAN: Without objection, it will be included.

GREEN: Thank you for being here, Mr. Ambassador.

One of the concerns -- I mean, there's so many issues with trafficking in persons, one of the ones I'm concerned about is forced labor in government contracts in the -- in conflict regions.

State Department's 2010 TIP report includes a special section on government procurement of forced labor. It states that too often it's reported that workers, particularly in combat zones, have been misinformed about their contracts, poorly housed, had their passports confiscated, are required to pay back large recruitment fees.

On January 15th of 2010, the Offices of the Inspector General for the DOD, State Department, USAID, each submitted the first of a series of congressionally mandated reports that evaluate the incidence of human trafficking violations among U.S. contractors abroad.

In your opinion, how serious is the problem of intentional or inadvertent government procurement of forced labor through contractors, and is the U.S. government doing enough to address the problem?

And second, is what has DOD, State Department, USAID done since the issuance of the January 2010 OIG Report to address reported trafficking vulnerabilities among contractors?

CDEBACA: I think that's an excellent question, Mr. Green.

The thing that we've started to realize is that government procurement strategies, whether it's for service contracts in any of these war zones or whether it's the things we buy, that we end up having a footprint that dwarfs that of the private industry that we go to to encourage to look at their own supply chains.

And so, not only have we been responding to the concerns about -- that were initially raised with peacekeepers coming out of Eastern Europe and have flowed through that, but also are starting to look at procurement on the federal acquisitions side.

But as far as the overseas contractor issue, we are working with the inspectors general, convening meetings with the I.G.s from State, AID and Department of Defense.

They're going out into the regions, doing the samples of what they consider high-risk offices. And, as you know from the report that was submitted in January, some areas of improvement were noted in -- especially with people not knowing what the rules were, not knowing what constituted trafficking and forced labor.

We've taken one beginning step on that, as far as U.S. employees who are under chief of mission authority now, under the Foreign Affairs manual, have heightened responsibilities for not mistreating their staff. And not only are reminded that they could be prosecuted back here in the United States, but also will have administrative punishments if they are caught doing that.

We now need to take that out to the contractor level. And I think that one of the things that is heartening for us in the interagency is that the senior policy operating group has now put together a working group on this contracting issue and the acquisitions manual, led by PHS, which also has a large footprint, DOD and the EEOC, and their convening started after the last meeting of the interagency quarterly working group.

We're going to be working with the acquisitions contractor training corps to make sure that the training officers get this out there.

One of the things that the I.G.s found that was shocking to everybody is that a lot of the contracting officers just aren't even putting this into the contracts.

It's required -- it's required because it's the right thing to do, but it's also required because Congress mandated it. And yet, there's too many contracts where this just doesn't even show up.

GREEN: That effort -- because that's something -- obviously, since we're paying the bill, we ought to be able to deal with it. And that's something our government can do directly.

So thank you, Mr. Chairman.

CDEBACA: I would also note, if I may -- and this is the intersection of policy and art that we often see and hear in this area -- the big hot film at the Toronto Film Festival in the last two weeks was about a whistle-blower, a woman who had called attention to these exact problems during the Kosovo intervention.

I think that the more that we see the public look at this as a problem, the more we'll be able to do to drill that out into the agencies.

BERMAN: The time of the gentleman has expired.

The gentleman from California, Mr. Royce, is recognized for five minutes.

ROYCE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I ask unanimous consent to enter into the record the statement of our ranking member, Ileana Ros- Lehtinen, that...

BERMAN: Without objection, that statement will be included in the record.

ROYCE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And I think by way of further information, that this is a trafficking symposium that she and Ambassador CdeBaca held, what was that at St. Thomas University in Miami, Florida, two weeks ago. So I thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Now I wanted just to ask a little bit about the justification of Cambodia's promotion to Tier 2 status. And I think as you go through the TIP report, the point is, you've got 36 traffickers who were convicted in comparison to 11 last year, and that's the argument.

But you read the report, and the report says that local police and government officials extort money or accept bribes from brothel owners, sometimes on a daily basis -- a daily basis -- in order to allow brothels to continue operating.

In terms of the appeal court judge there -- the appeal court president -- he accepted $30,000 in bribes for the release of brothel owners. I mean, the corruption is absolutely endemic.

So the point I would make is that the conviction of 25 extra traffickers hardly -- hardly -- justifies moving in the wrong direction, when Transparency International now rates Cambodia 158 out of 180 in its corruption index.

The point I'm making is that the corruption is so endemic there, and the Cambodians that we talked to and the NGO groups are so -- are so traumatized by the fact that things are imploding so quickly in terms of the absence of any rule of law and the fact that police are in on the corruption and these girls at the age of what, three, four, are being recruited in larger and larger numbers.

The point they make is that, you know, maybe this was a mistake to tick this down the other direction. And I just would ask you for your observation on that.

CDEBACA: It's tough. And I think especially in a country like Cambodia where there are these problems, one of the things that we look at when we're -- when we are looking at the ranking is what kind of effort the country has made and is making. This is one of the minimum standards that is mandated.

And we had seen a shift in the willingness of the government to work on this, an uptick in prosecutions, a use of the anti-trafficking unit in a different way -- not just simply going out and doing blind sweeps of the red light district and then calling that a trafficking case, but, instead, more long-term investigations, working with some of the NGOs, like APLE -- A-P-L-E, that does a lot of the child sex- tourism investigations and child protection.

So, too, we've also seen a little bit more law enforcement cooperation with the United States, as far as not simply helping arrest our pedophiles and -- so that we can then bring them back to the United States, or the Swiss or the German pedophile, so that they can be prosecuted in the home country, but then also stepping up and prosecuting the Cambodians who sold those children.

That was something that Cambodia had always refused to do in the past, largely casting this as a problem of Westerners coming to abuse their children.

So I think for me that that is one of the things that we see that's a bright spot is their recasting and looking at trafficking in a new way.

The proof is in the pudding though, and I think that, unfortunately, Cambodia is a country where we've seen -- and in the report we always have the chart about what a country has done over the years. It's gone up and down and up and down.

We'd like to see Cambodia get on a glide path of success, but given the endemic corruption, given the poverty, given the breakdowns in rule of law, it's very...

(CROSSTALK)

ROYCE: Well, we've seen other countries take similar measures and they've still been downgraded. Why Cambodia here?

Yemen would be a case in point. I mean, they're taking these measures, but the argument is look, it's so endemic in Yemen that we're not going to adjust that.

The point I'm making is that if there -- if they don't face sanctions, if there isn't these consequences, then when you have a police department that's in on a racket, when you have appeals court judges that are part of the problem, and when you have a political class which themselves are involved in this, then the situation's only going to get worse.

And as "Nightline" says, it is now the magnet, you know, for pedophiles. And it needs to be addressed.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

BERMAN: The time of the gentleman has expired.

The gentleman from Virginia, Mr. Connolly, is recognized for five minutes.

CONNOLLY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and thank you so much for having this hearing on such an important topic.

I also would ask unanimous consent to enter my statements into the record.

BERMAN: Without objection.

CONNOLLY: I thank the chair.

Let me just say, Mr. Ambassador, thank you for being here.

I cannot imagine a more heinous crime than the denial of human autonomy, because to do that is to say a human being is a thing, an object.

And in making sure that this is a priority for U.S. foreign policy, we need go -- we need go no further than our own American history. We fought a civil war over the issue of human autonomy. Now, there are some revisionists that want to pretend it wasn't about slavery. From first to last, it was about human trafficking.

Because there was a whole philosophy that said someone of color was a thing, an object, we fought a civil war to settle that question. And after that civil war, we no longer spoke of these United States in the plural, we spoke in the singular case: The United States is.

There can be no -- no more fundamental American value than the assertion of human autonomy. In our own Declaration of Independence, Thomas Jefferson wrote that "Among these inalienable rights are life, liberty and the pursuit of human happiness," strangely.

And therefore it seems to me, from the wellsprings of our own founding, human trafficking, putting an end to human trafficking, insisting with other governments that they move this way up on the priority list, and making sure our ambassadors and our representatives do the same, it's fundamental to who we are and to American character.

And so my question to you is, candidly, how do you think we're doing?

I mean, I've traveled widely. Ambassadors have full plates. There are lots of competing priorities. I mean there are military, political -- I understand. Not everything can be a priority, because if everything is, nothing is.

But I am concerned that it's possible that unless we ratchet up the importance of this subject, a busy ambassador may -- it may be further down the list of priorities, but not his or her top five or three.

I'd like your assessment of how well we're doing and what kind of mechanism do we have to make sure that the prioritization of this issue that is very fundamental to who we are is impressed on new and reassigned ambassadors?

CDEBACA: I'm -- I'll be going this afternoon to an event at the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association and the Mount Vernon Black Women's Association will be jointly hosting, that draws the exact parallel that...

CONNOLLY: In the 11th district of Virginia.

CDEBACA: That's why -- I try to stay in the area.

And I think that one of the things that's being talked about at this conference is how we have to capture that exact promise: The promises made to the people who were in chattel slavery but also the promise that was made to those who were being held in indentured servitude, debt peonage.

The first law that Congress passed when it came back in 1866 was to extend those protections to the Hispanic residents of the former Mexican territories. It made it very clear that the promise of the 13th Amendment applied to anyone in the United States, whether it was the newly freed African-American population or the newest arrival. And that is as true today as it was almost 150 years ago.

I actually think that the 150th anniversary of emancipation gives us an opportunity, an opportunity to tell our story to the world...

CONNOLLY: I've got to interrupt you, we've got 43 seconds. How are we doing?

CDEBACA: How we're doing is, I think that we're seeing in many ways the anti-slavery and anti-trafficking fight through the lens of the TIP report and the lens of the TIP reporting, rather than necessarily seeing it through the lens of the overarching American value system.

And I think that that's something that we need to work on internally, so it's not merely a "we've got to do the TIP report this year," and everything flows from that, rather it's the "here's this value that our country was born upon."

The last 10 years have been a critical time in this fight, but they're a critical time because they're modernizing that promise that we made so long ago.

BERMAN: The time of the gentleman has expired.

The gentleman from Texas, five full minutes.

POE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The four of the worst abusers are Burma, Cuba, Iran and Zimbabwe, according to our own government. But yet, we -- they still have the ability to receive aid from the United States -- we call it humanitarian or whatever.

But how do we know that that aid is going to the right people in those countries? The only leverage we have to get people's attention is the almighty dollar. And we quit giving them money, maybe they will get their country in order and quit promoting human trafficking or allowing it to exist.

And this has to be an issue the United States leads in. We can't stick around and wait for the United Nations to do anything, because so many people in the United Nations are abusers of this whole process.

So I don't think we ought to be giving aid to any country if -- that promotes human trafficking, especially when we say they are the world's worst abusers. It doesn't make any sense to me. I'd like you to clarify that.

But, first, I've introduced legislation along with my friend Jim Costa, who -- we're both co-chairs of the Victims' Rights Caucus -- to require people who have gone through our own penitentiaries for sexual assault, primarily of minors, if they want to travel abroad, they have to register with the State Department. And then the State Department has the authority -- discretion -- not to allow them to travel overseas.

Now, Ambassador, it's my understanding, and I would like an answer to this, that throughout the world, these middle guys, the customers, you know, the people that pay for the slavery, 25 percent of them are from the United States. And they leave the United States to go abroad to seek out young children to have their way with them, and that's a blight on our country.

So what do you think about the issue of making sure that we know who these folks are when they come to see you and they want to travel abroad, not necessarily to do business, but do monkey business? What do you think about that?

CDEBACA: A lot of the equities in that bill, and I know that there are other similar bills as well, are actually things that are in some other parts of the State Department, and I don't really want to speak for them.

For -- as far as the trafficking office is concerned, I think one of the things that we find is critical, and it's one of the things that we judge a country on, is what are they doing to reduce the demand for child sex tourism, and -- in many ways. That can be everything from the posters that one would see, or training for hoteliers to make sure that the concierges and the front desk aren't collusive in bringing in these kids.

But what we see as reducing demand the most effectively is prosecuting these pedophiles, prosecuting the people who would sell a child to them.

As far as the various restrictions on travel, again I know that there's several different pieces of legislation out there. One thing though, that we've noticed is as we've tried to look at this, especially in demand reduction for commercial sex with children, is that that oft-repeated 25 percent figure comes into question a bit when one looks at the high percentage of Asian clients that are giving children all over Asia.

POE: What is your opinion? Is it 25 percent? Is it less? I mean...

CDEBACA: I don't think we really know the actual number. But if you talk to police -- again, to the Cambodian example that Mr. Royce was concerned about, if you talk to the police and to activists in Cambodia, the unnoticed plague seems to be coming from Japan, Korea, China, et cetera.

And so I think that we need to make sure that we're focusing not simply on the Westerners in these countries, but other sex tourists as well, and harness those countries so that they start doing what we do, which is prosecute their people back home.

We have a number of countries that don't expand extraterritorial jurisdiction over their traveling pedophiles. And I think that's absolutely a U.S. practice that we need to export to the rest of the world.

POE: Last question. It just seems to me, and correct me if it's wrong -- if I'm wrong, that countries are just kind of resistant to do anything about this issue. That's the sense I have, based on your testimony and the -- what I've heard from other people. They're just, you know, that's really not something they want to get involved in. for whatever reason. Is that correct or not?

CDEBACA: It's correct to some degree. I think that there are a number of countries, that when they start to be frankly embarrassed in the international community, they don't want to be the country that is behind their neighbors, and they don't want to lose aid.

So we've seen, for instance, in the New York Times (inaudible) three weeks ago, the president saying it was the U.S. coming to them that made them act.

POE: Thank you.

BERMAN: The time of the gentleman has expired.

The gentlelady from California...

(CROSSTALK)

(UNKNOWN): Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and permission to submit my statement for the record.

BERMAN: It will, without objection, be included.

(UNKNOWN): Ambassador, there are differences in the definition of trafficking in persons between the U.S. and the international community. For example, the U.S. definition omits the removal of organs and makes a distinction between prostitution and sex trafficking.

Can you explain these differences? And can you outline their implications? And how do these differences inhibit the effective coordination between nations?

CDEBACA: The -- I'll start with the second one and then move backwards.

(UNKNOWN): Thank you.

CDEBACA: The U.S. definition, which has severe forms of trafficking being the parts of the trafficking fight that's based on the 13th Amendment's prohibition against involuntary servitude and slavery, is focused upon the involuntary servitude nature of what's being done.

So whether that's -- that the person's being held in compelled service for sex or for labor, they're considered to be a trafficking victim under the 13th Amendment analysis.

The Vienna negotiations for the U.N. Protocol, the exploitation of the prostitution of others, which is the way that the Palermo protocol deals with prostitution, the countries that have used that verbatim in their laws tell us over and over again that they see exploitation of the prostitution of others the way that we use the words "severe forms of trafficking." So it's not that they're saying that it's having a prostitute, it's exploiting the prostitute.

So on that issue, even though the words are dissimilar, the concept of the person who's being held in compelled service ends up being the same.

Where there is that difference is when it comes to the organ trafficking. The United States has interpreted the organ trafficking portion of the Palermo protocol to criminalize those who would traffic a person in order to harvest their organ. Some countries are looking at it more expansively and looking at the trafficking in the organ itself.

And so if we had somebody who, you know -- cases where somebody was being held in servitude to have parts harvested, that would be a slavery situation, that would be a trafficking case.

We've tried to explain to other countries, when they proffer their organ trafficking policy as something that meets our minimum standards from the TVPA or the Palermo protocol, the difference between that thing -- the liver or the kidney or what have you -- and the person whose freedom is being denied them for the harvesting, that that's at the heart of the distinction that we make.

It's the difference between slavery and illicit transport of a piece of contraband.

(UNKNOWN): Since you mentioned the purpose of trafficking in terms of organs and so on, do the countries see this kind of thing as a felony offense, because certainly harvesting these different organs certainly affects the health of the human being and can lead to a fatality.

How is that -- how do they make the difference?

CDEBACA: Unfortunately, one of the -- one of the things that we've seen is that there's been more action kind of at the U.N. conference-going level than there has been at the law enforcement level.

And I think that this is one of the things that we've heard a lot about, the trafficking of organs, but we haven't necessarily seen much law enforcement activity against it.

One big exception being the case here in the United States, in New Jersey, with the folks who were doing some illicit organ trafficking. It's one of the few actual criminal cases that have been done out there. And that was a felony charge that was in that case.

(UNKNOWN): Since my time is almost up, do the other countries, the countries most involved in sex trafficking, organ trafficking and so on, do they make a distinction, and do they penalize people according to whatever the definitions are?

CDEBACA: It's a little up in the air. Most -- many of the countries have a criminal law that simply tries to mimic the Palermo protocol.

Many of them are now changing that to something that's more closely related to U.S. law, because the Palermo protocol itself doesn't necessarily work in a courtroom.

(UNKNOWN): Thank you.

BERMAN: The gentlelady is expired.

The gentleman from New Jersey, chairman of the African Global Health Subcommittee, Mr. Payne, is recognized for five minutes.

PAYNE: Thank you very much.

And the case you talk about in New Jersey with the trafficking of organs, as you know, is still ongoing. It kind of was very shocking, the complexity of the case, of immigrants coming over, predetermined that, you know, their organs would be sold as a part of their coming into the country. So we hope that the prosecution will really convict these people of this heinous crime.

The fact that it's very difficult, according to the 2007 GAO "Report on Human Trafficking" concluded that U.S. federal law enforcement agencies would benefit from improved interagency cooperation on investigations and prosecutions for trafficking crimes, including cooperation between federal, state and local enforcement elements.

And I'm sure that in law enforcement in general this is not a new problem. It permeates the system.

But if, as the 2007 GAO report indicated, the U.S. government is having trouble with law enforcement coordination on human trafficking crimes, what can we reasonably expect from other countries which have fewer resources, fewer support and capabilities than what the U.S. has in combating?

Have we -- have we tried to work with them, or is it possible for them to have the interagency cooperation?

CDEBACA: The GAO report was certainly correct. I think you were dead on as far as seeing that as a problem in many of our law enforcement areas.

One of the things that we've seen and that we're trying to mirror in this important civil rights crime is the experience that we had during the expansion of the hate crime laws in the 1990s, where we realized that federal hate crimes enforcement would never be able to capture the scope of hate crimes in the United States. And so states started passing hate crime statutes enlisting state and local law enforcement.

And, culturally, state and local law enforcement were finally ready for that. You started seeing state and locals in places where the feds had to be the only game in town, because the local sheriff may have been part of the Klan that was being investigated a generation ago.

We see the same thing happening in the human trafficking field, with all but four of the 56 states and territories having passed anti- trafficking legislation. That training is now getting out into the field, and we're starting to see more and more state cases. So we're glad that we don't have all of our eggs in that federal basket.

Taking that then, and looking at the rest of the world, many of the countries that we're dealing with don't have that federal system.

There was a bilateral agreement that the Clinton administration entered into with Italy back in -- I want to say 1998, where the folks from the State Department came back from that meeting, having agreed with the Italians that certain questions would be asked of victims when they would be encountered.

The Italians, because everybody in their system reports to the Justice Minister and the Interior Minister, within a week or two they had all of that information out into the police forces around Italy. More than 300 cases result.

Our State Department folks came back, came over to the Justice Department, and said, "OK, now order everybody to do this." And there are 17,000 independent police forces around the country that does not take orders from the attorney general, as I think Eric Holder can attest to.

So it ends up being much more of the cultural shift that we have to have here in the United States, through the long-term, hard core police training, policemen and prosecutors who do these cases getting promoted. Hopefully that ends up reflecting society's wishes more than something that comes down from on high.

So the types of police training, the types of structures, the task forces, et cetera, that we've put in place to try to increase that coordination, we're now taking and replicating those in other countries. And the countries that have stood up their own anti- trafficking units and had that kind of coordination are starting to see an impact.

PAYNE: Well I think my time is about expired, so thank you very much.

BERMAN: The time of the gentleman has expired.

Ambassador, it's been wonderful to have you here. Thank you very much for your -- not only your testimony here, but what you're doing in your position. And we're -- we want to support you.

I'm now pleased to have a second panel, if they could come up and take their seats. We do have a slight logistical problem. We really have to adjourn this hearing no later than 12:20 or so.

So I will begin the introductions: David Abramowitz, he's the director of policy and government relations at Humanity United, where he leads outreach efforts to the U.S. government, multilateral institutions and international NGOs, and provides strategic counsel and advice to a broad range of grantees.

Previously, Mr. Abramowitz served as chief counsel for this committee, where he worked on the Traffic Victims Protection Act (sic) among many other issues. He also worked at the Office of the Legal Adviser in the State Department.

And I just have to add on a personal note, that as we have recessed our session until after the election, we come to a lame duck session, and people talk about what's the agenda in the lame duck? I watched Mr. Abramowitz take the Wilberforce Act, the reauthorization of the Trafficking Protection Victims Act (sic), and knock himself out to pull off, you know, working with friends and collaborators in the other body to produce a piece of legislation when no one thought he had a chance of doing it -- a tribute to his commitment to this.

And we're really pleased to have him back here testifying on a subject he has demonstrated over and over again he cares greatly about.

Ambassador Lagon, Mark Lagon, is chair of the International -- for the International Relations and Security Concentration, and visiting professor in the Master of Science and Foreign Service program at Georgetown University. He is also adjunct senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations.

Ambassador Lagon served as director of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons at the U.S. Department of State from 2007 to 2009, as Mr. Smith had mentioned earlier.

He also served as deputy assistant secretary of state for international organization affairs and on the staff of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, where he was involved in these issues.

Dr. Aruna Uprety is the founder of the Rural Health Services Education Services Trust (sic) in Nepal. In 1995, Dr. Uprety began working with the American Himalayan Foundation on the problem of young girls in rural Nepal being trafficked to India.

In addition to her work with the Rural Health Education Services Trust, Dr. Uprety also serves as a consultant to the United Nations.

And you came a long way, and we're very honored that you would be with us today.

Also coming a long -- well, Neha Misra is the senior specialist for migration and human trafficking at the Solidarity Center, AFL-CIO, an international workers' rights NGO based in Washington, D.C.

Previously, Ms. Misra was the deputy county -- country director and program manager for the Solidarity Center's Countertrafficking in Persons Project in Indonesia.

Before her assignment in Indonesia, she worked in Bosnia and Herzegovina on post-war elections and democracy, and as a senior attorney adviser with the U.S. Department of Justice.

Dr. Beryl D'Souza heads the health care initiative of the Dalit Freedom Network, an Operation Mercy India foundation. Concerned with the issue of human trafficking and HIV/AIDS in India, Dr. D'Souza works with Dalit activists and international medical professionals to improve the health and well-being of the Dalit people. Also came a long way.

So thank all our witness.

And, Mr. Abramowitz, why don't you begin the testimony?

Your entire statements will be included in the record. And it would be great if you can summarize them and then we'll have questioning.

ABRAMOWITZ: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and Mr. Royce and other distinguished members of the committee. Thank you for holding this very important hearing on the global fight against trafficking.

My ears were burning with both Mr. Smith and yourself, Mr. Chairman, were talking about the work that I did. I know that Doug Anderson, who's also sitting in the room, was there from the beginning on the TVPA, working with Joseph Rees and myself, and I think that should be noted.

But at the end of the day, I remember any number of conversations that I had with Mr. Smith when he was the lead on some of the Trafficking Victim Protection Reauthorization Act, as well as the act itself and with you, Mr. Chairman.

And I have to say that, despite the hard work that we all did at the (inaudible) staff level, at the end of the day, I think, indeed, these things wouldn't have happened without you.

And I think you should be very proud of the work that you've done and the accomplishments that came from it, as Ambassador CdeBaca was discussing.

It's a privilege for me to return to the committee in my new role as director of policy and government relations at Humanity United, a philanthropic organization that works to advance human freedom by combating modern-day slavery, and to build peace and prevent conflict.

Mr. Chairman, it's described in my written testimony, and as you recognized in your opening statement, trafficking continues to inflict suffering on tens of millions of people around the globe, including here in the United States, and may even have undergone a surge during the current global economic downturn, as I think Mr. Royce was suggesting in his opening statement.

Every victim of human trafficking, whether laboring in the fields where our food is grown or in the streets where U.S. youth is sexually exploited, deserve the freedom to be a survivor.

Mr. Chairman, at Humanity United, we believe that there are solutions to these heinous abuses, but that they require a unity of effort between civil society, which can work directly with survivors, the private sector, which can ensure supply chains are slave-free, and governments, which can implement policies to help end this scourge.

In that regard, Mr. Chairman, the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000, or TVPA, and its various reauthorization acts establish a powerful framework for the United States, which, as Mr. Smith noted, has been implemented vigorously by three administrations under presidents from both political parties.

In particular, the Trafficking in Persons, or TIP, report, mandated by the TVPA, has a tremendous -- been a tremendous tool for catalyzing changes, as, again, Mr. Royce noted that it's been an important element of our diplomacy.

I ask that a document that -- demonstrating how the TVPA has fostered real change, which was compiled by the Alliance to End Slavery and Trafficking, or ATEST, be entered into the record.

BERMAN: It will be included, unanimously.

ABRAMOWITZ: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Chairman, as reflected in my written testimony, this year's TIP report continues to show a dynamic analysis of trends in human trafficking.

Continue -- countries continue to be downgraded as well as upgraded, and several key countries remain on Tier 3 and therefore subject to sanctions.

The overall assessment of U.S. performance on the international front, however, remains an unfinished story. My written testimony raises a number of concerns, including the following: First, we need to continue to ensure that the TIP report focuses on trafficking into both sexual and labor exploitation.

This year's report continues the long-standing trend toward focusing a bit more on trafficking into labor exploitation. Yet, I believe the report needs to capture more fully, for example, the risk facing women and children who migrate for legitimate labor purposes, but end up being exploited sexually as well.

During my trip to Nepal last week, activists suggested that as many as 90 percent of women and girls who have migrated from that country face such dual exploitation.

I was encouraged that Ambassador CdeBaca alluded to these phenomena in his testimony today.

Second, the administration needs to ensure continued high-level support for U.S. diplomacy on trafficking issues. Making a difference in perennially difficult cases laid out in the TIP report will require high-level diplomatic intervention. For example, will human trafficking be raised at or around the president's summit with Prime Minister Singh of India later this year?

Mr. Chairman, I cannot emphasize too much the importance of combining the TIP report with robust diplomacy.

Earlier this month, as Ambassador CdeBaca alluded to, Senegal successfully completed a first-ever prosecution of those who were benefiting from child begging. And Senegalese officials specifically stated that this prosecution occurred as a result of the TVPA.

I believe the testimony from all members of this panel suggest that U.S. diplomacy needs to move toward encouraging better implementation of local statutes and rule of law in order to make a real dent in human trafficking, a view I strongly endorse.

This committee also has an important role in this effort. Every subcommittee should ensure that human trafficking is raised -- was raised when assistant secretaries from regional bureaus of State come to testify before them, so that those responsible for day-to-day relations in the department are sensitized to the importance of this issue.

Third, you should keep an eye on diverging approaches to trafficking within the U.S. government.

One of the reasons that it may appear that there is more focus on trafficking in the labor exploitation is continuing differences within the executive branch on how to approach this issue, and I go into that more in my written testimony.

Mr. Chairman, this debate is distracting government from its real work and should be resolved.

Fourth, Mr. Chairman, as I lay out in my written testimony, you should ensure that the TIP report is not merged with other human rights reports, and I'm happy to discuss that with you during the question-and-answer period.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, my written testimony has a number of additional suggestions regarding how U.S. law could be improved in the reauthorization bill the committee will consider next year.

Let me just highlight one at this point: The U.S. should enhance civilian protection in humanitarian crises to prevent trafficking when the vulnerable population often increases.

I think this really goes to the point that Ambassador CdeBaca raised about taking trafficking out of being a boutique issue and bringing it into some of the mainstream.

In particular, Mr. Chairman, I believe the committee should support creating an emergency response fund for the TIP office that (inaudible) can be programmed as needed. This was demonstrated most tellingly this year after the Haiti earthquake.

Rather than robbing Peter to pay Paul to address such urgent needs, an emergency fund should be established to deal with unanticipated humanitarian crises.

The Senate Appropriations Committee actually took a good first step this year by including language on this matter at the request of Senator Kerry. Institutionalizing such a fund on the TVPA could be an important contribution to saving lives.

Mr. Chairman, the voices of the victims and survivors of human trafficking are indeed heard all too often from the shadows. We in civil society will work with you and this committee to ensure that we stay on the path to eradicating modern-day slavery, advancing the cause of human freedom.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and I stand ready to answer your questions.

BERMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Abramowitz.

Ambassador Lagon?

LAGON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Royce, members of the committee, for inviting me to testify on a very important subject, the slavery of today.

I want to note that the committee has for years been committed to addressing the highest imperatives in -- of human rights that transcend partisan lines. And if it weren't for -- if it weren't for members of this committee, noticeably the indefatigable Mr. Smith, there wouldn't be a Trafficking Victims Protection Act or a TIP office, so thank you.

On its page seven, the latest TIP report estimates that there are 1.8 trafficking victims for every 1,000 people in the world. And that's based on a very conservative ILO estimate of 12.3 million victims globally, less than half of the estimate of scholar Kevin Bales.

So think about it: At least 1 out of every 555 people in the world today is a human trafficking victim.

I'd like to comment on a couple of patterns today in the world, 10 years after the TVPA, the creation of the TIP office, and the Palermo protocol, and then I'd like to offer recommendations in four key areas of action.

The first trend that I want to highlight relates to rule of law. The main tangible impact of the TVPA, the TIP's office diplomacy and the Palermo protocol have been passage of new laws addressing human trafficking in well over half the countries of the world.

And yet, rule of law consists in so much more than law on the books, whether in the United States or in the least developed countries. The TIP report documents 7,992 prosecutions in the whole world in 2003 and then down to 5,506 prosecutions in 2009.

And of those 5,506, only 432 were for labor-related trafficking. Prosecutions are limited. They're down from a few years ago. And they're minimal for nonsexual exploitation.

If we're to be plain, lots of effort is apparently not moving the needle of change a great deal. We need implementation of rule of law.

Secondly, I'm often asked where are the more significant places in the world for the human trafficking problem? One answer is India. Because of the -- of those 27 million people Kevin Bales estimates are trafficking victims in the world, some two-thirds are there, chiefly in bonded labor.

China is another answer, due to migrating workers without a safety net, a female deficit as Congressman Smith referred to, a Wild West kind of sex trade, official discrimination against Uighurs and Tibetans, and the failure to treat North Koreans fleeing atrocious political and economic conditions as refugees.

East Asia is of particular concern, because it's a focus of both labor- and sex-related trafficking.

And finally, the Gulf is a major flashpoint, because if you're a woman or if you're a foreign guest worker or, worst of all, if you're both, you are likely to be treated as a lesser human in the Gulf.

But despite all of these flashpoints and foci of trafficking, there are no lesser victims of trafficking. So I see another pattern 10 years after the TVPA which contributes to the needle not moving as much to abolish slavery. It's the fissuring of efforts, the siloing of focus on particular groups.

For instance, victims of forced labor are no less important than victims of sex trafficking -- and vice versa. Sex trafficking is not the only source of exploitation and violence against women.

A couple of examples: when I was executive director of the NGO Polaris Project, I met two Chinese women in Japan who were victimized for forced labor under a labor training program exempt from Japanese labor law.

Also with Polaris, I met with an African woman who was a human trafficking victim, served as a client by Polaris here in our country, right here in Washington. And she noted she thought it was charming how Americans talk so much about cruelty to animals, but some humans -- like her -- are treated worse than animals.

As the TIP office director, who I would say established the parity of emphasis on labor slavery, I hope the pendulum isn't swinging toward focus on labor to the exclusion of adult sex trafficking.

On page eight of the 2010 TIP report, it emphasizes that prostitution is not trafficking. That may be counterproductive. I don't think prostitution is one and the same as slavery. But prostitution is the enabling environment of sex trafficking, whether in brothels or seedy streets or, until recently, on Craigslist in the United States.

Sex trafficking is the basic enabling environment of men, fueling demand for purchasing, chiefly, females. And that problem of sex trafficking and the demand shouldn't lose attention.

There's another serious area of fissuring. Despite what some at the Department of Labor or the ILO or some businesses think, crossing borders is not a necessary element of trafficking.

Whether the families freed from bonded labor that I met in Tamil Nadu, India, or the Mexican girl I met who was prostituted as a minor in Chiapas, those are every bit as much TIP victims as those who crossed borders. The global fight for the dignity of human trafficking victims requires equal value and energy accorded to all of these victims.

Let me talk briefly about four things I think we need to do.

First, we need to be an exemplar. When I was the TIP office director, a central premise was that the United States needed to be an exemplar in order to be an effective promoter of the anti-trafficking agenda internationally.

I very much had in mind the problem of U.S. detainee policy undercutting U.S. promotion of freedom and credible anti-terrorism policy. And that's a continuity between the different directors of GTIP in multiple administrations.

Under the last administration, we put a profile of the United States into the TIP report. We disseminated the Department of Justice's annual report on the U.S. record widely -- globally -- and we got the Department of Justice to produce it in the same month as the TIP report.

I'd really like to commend Secretary Clinton for going farther, for including a profile with a ranking, with a grade, and more lengthy recommendations about areas of weakness.

Let's think about the problem at home: ECPAT, the NGO, commented recently in reading the profile of the United States in the TIP report, that, according to U.S. government's statistics from 2008 and 2009, almost three times as many prostituted children were arrested as offered protection and assistance in the United States. We've got to be an exemplar.

Secondly, persuading other governments to do more benefits from offering a helping hand. It's not fully appreciated, but the assistance to NGOs and the most efficacious international organizations, like the IOM, is as important part of the U.S. policy as any.

And that assistance should go directly to some governments too, those on Tier 2 and the Tier 2 Watch Lists that have a will to change, but deserve help.

I commend Ambassador CdeBaca for going to Africa on his first trip. And it's a good signal, because less developed African nations need not so much a "grading on a curve" in the TIP report as tangible assistance

Being an exemplar and offering a helping hand are important complements to pressuring governments. But make no mistake: pressuring governments we must.

The TVPA has manifestly worked. In case after case, we've seen how reports and the rankings have worked, even among allies unused to prodding from the United States -- Turkey, Israel, the Philippines, the UAE, even Ireland, as we see it recently appointing an anti- trafficking czar.

The Wilberforce TVPA Reauthorization had a tremendously important and welcome provision in the time limit on Tier 2 Watch List status. Please -- please conduct...

(CROSSTALK)

BERMAN: ... on the time limit.

LAGON: OK. I'll wrap up.

BERMAN: No, no. Just repeat what -- on the time limit.

LAGON: Yes. I said that -- that the time limit on Tier 2 Watch List countries...

BERMAN: Got it.

LAGON: ... was probably the most valuable thing that you and your colleagues included in the TVPA reauthorization.

I urge you to conduct oversight in how the Department of State and the executive branch deal with that time limit, because, in fair-mindedness, you gave flexibility to the secretary of state and the executive branch to defer or avert an automatic Tier 3 ranking if the national interest was involved.

Play your vigorous role as ever, please, in looking at how that's dealt with.

And there's one other area for tougher love, which I know my friend David Abramowitz agrees on. One of the places where trafficking for labor and victimization of women converge is right here on U.S. soil -- diplomats mistreating domestic servants.

I met with a woman from Goa, in India, who was a human trafficking victim of a Kuwaiti official stationed here in the United States. She said to me, across a table, that the family treated her far worse as a domestic servant here in the United States than in Kuwait, because they felt even less reason to think that they would face consequences in the United States than in a Gulf country.

That should make us pause in horror: It was worse in our country because of the impunity delivered by diplomatic immunity.

Congress has made crystal clear in the TVPA, three times reauthorized, that attention should be paid to government officials found complicit in human trafficking. That's what we're talking about here. And those cases should be cited specifically in the text of the TIP report.

One final recommendation: For 10 years, governments, NGOs and international organizations have been dedicating sizable efforts to fighting trafficking. More definitive efforts -- more definitive results, more movement of the needle to squeeze trafficking and make it less profitable -- will come about if businesses work together to help.

Let me be totally transparent here. I've been a paid consultant for a business engaged in corporate responsibility work in this area, LexisNexis, Inc.

In a week and a half, major businesses, including LexisNexis, from sectors as diverse as information technology, soft drinks, cosmetics, labor placement, energy, the auto industry, the airline industry, travel, entertainment and legal publishing will meet to talk about the feasibility of forming a business coalition against human trafficking.

Businesses need to go farther than they have to date, not just dialogue with the government and the U.N., not just public awareness campaigns that don't involve any accountability for their own business operations, and not just single-sector accountability efforts in apparel, electronics, chocolate or hotels.

We can end human trafficking if businesses are fully engaged. But if they're not or they're working in siloed sectors, we can't have that impact.

Consumers will be -- are empowered by the Department of Labor report that indicates those goods tainted by forced and child labor. If those consumers knew that some businesses were actually trying to fight human trafficking, rather than being enablers, those business would benefit.

The TIP report and the TIP office have done a lot to take the issue of human trafficking out of the shadows. You might want to think, here at the committee, about how that office has done something that the State Department has had terrible trouble with for 10 years -- public diplomacy -- raising up our universal values, offering the United States as a partner, engaging publics abroad.

That's a model for other policies.

Thank you for holding this hearing, for taking this critical issue out of the shadows all the more.

BERMAN: Very good.

Dr. Uprety?

UPRETY: Mr. Chairman, I want to thank you and other members of the committee for inviting me to testify today.

Yet -- and I really feel that I am representing not only my organization, Rural Health Education Service Trust (RHEST) and American Himalayan Foundation, but I'm also representing my brothers and sisters from Nepal who are trying their best to combat this problem of human trafficking.

And I would like to start with the story why I started this small organization: In 1992 when I was in Mumbai to take part in an international seminar on HIV/AIDS, we went to (inaudible) areas, and found out that there were many Nepalese girls who were minors, and we talked to them if they would like to come back to Nepal.

And one of the girls looked at -- to us and said, "Now it is too late for you to ask this question. If you had asked this question when we were still in our village, we had not lured by the beautiful dream, and if we had an education, maybe we didn't come here, and then we would have been safe with our parents."

That statement, told to us with a very sad voice, made us feel that we had to do something in the villages, where girls are treated very badly, they are not given the education, and all the time they have to do household work because of gender discrimination.

These girls are very much -- very easily lured to see when they are asked to come to Bombay or any other beautiful city. And that was the seed for my organization to be established.

And after establishing this organization, which was started with 54 girls, we have now grown up, up to 7,500 girls. And they are getting education in different places, in (inaudible) schools and the government.

And at the same time, we are trying to raise the issue of girls' trafficking in many places -- with the girls, with the teachers, with the communities, with the parents -- and we have found that it is has been -- really worked really well.

And when we talk about girls' trafficking, we used to think that it is only in India or in some Indian cities.

Now we have seen that it doesn't mean girls' trafficking not only to India, but even in other Middle East countries like Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, Malaysia, where girls again are lured by beautiful dreams that you are going to be house maids, you will have a lot of money, you'll have a very easy job.

And when once they land there, they find that they are victims of sexual abuse. They are not paid, and they have to be repeatedly abused by the owners.

And about only two months ago, we had very sad incident from Lebanon, where 15 Nepalese women had committed suicide because they were sexually exploited by their owners. And they went there with the hope and the dream that they will earn at least $300 per month. But instead of that, they -- their dead body came back to Nepal.

And it was only because they were (inaudible), they did not know where they were going, and they were very much -- very easily cheated by the companies who took them.

That's why we are trying to put so much emphasis on our (inaudible) and education of the girls. And we have found that if the girls can be stayed in schools and if she will know that -- if she will go somewhere, other places, without knowing what she is going to do, without knowing with whom she is going, she can be the victim of sexual abuse, forced labor and be the victim of HIV/AIDS.

That's why we are -- we and many of my friends are trying to raise the issue on the national level as well as in the South -- in the South Asian countries.

And with a strong lobby of our nongovernmental organization and the media, the Nepalese government has started bringing some good teeth. And one of that is to raise the issue in the national level, they have made special rapporteur (ph) of human trafficking in human rights organization, and they have -- they now publish every year what are the problems and how it can be handled.

And they have also started working -- we have also started working together with the police force in the border area. If they find that there are some women and girls who look innocent and who don't know where they are going, they stop them and find out where -- what they are doing, where they are going, and if they are not satisfied with the questions and answers, they bring them back to their parents.

And this issue has really made some progress, and we are proud to say that it has really helped us in some ways. But still we have a long way to go, because when we talk about forced labor and sexual trafficking, there is a big Mafia with international organizations, as well as a lack of political commitment from our government has really made this problem in some ways weak.

We are -- though we are trying our hard -- we are trying our best, but not all the time political people and members of parliament listen to us, and getting (ph) that it is (inaudible) a big problem.

But we think that in 21 century, it is slavery, and if a woman, if a girl (inaudible) is a victim of sex slavery and if she is trafficked, it is shameful for our country, it is shameful for our nation, and that's why we are trying our best to do that.

And we have found that among those people -- girls who are trafficked -- they mostly are -- they are from indigenous groups, and from the Dalit communities. And from the latest research, it has been found that Dalit communities are where the girls and women have literacy rates as low as 3 percent only.

It means that they are very easily lured by the beautiful dream, and that's what we are trying to with our -- with the help of American Humanity (ph) Coalition to give education to the girls so that they would be in schools and they would learn about the problems, they would learn about skills, about their life, and we have found that we have been successful in some cases.

Though, as they say, a thousand lives -- a thousand -- a long journey has to start with a single step. We are trying our best to start this long journey, and we feel that international organizations and American government really can do a lot to prevent this.

And one of that is to make the Stop Girl Trafficking Program very effective. It has to go to -- to the community and not only in the (inaudible), but in the villages, in the (inaudible) where it is for the people -- especially for the trafficker who can go very easily.

But for the people, it is difficult to go there, because sometimes we have to walk about two to three days to reach those places, but traffickers are so smart that they can go very easily.

But we have to make sure, we have to make plans and programs that we also can (inaudible) and make aware people about this issue of 21 century, the heart of the problem, the challenges which they have to face if they will be lured by the beautiful dream.

So, dear Chairman, I am very happy to be here to give testimony, and I sincerely hope that with help of U.S. government and other international organizations, we are able to combat this problem. Thank you.

BERMAN: Well, thank you very much.

Ms. Misra?

MISRA: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee, for this opportunity to present to you the Solidarity Center's view of human trafficking from a labor perspective. My very proud immigrant mother also thanks you.

The Solidarity Center is an international NGO that promotes and protects worker rights around the world, working in over 60 countries last year. As a worker rights organization, the Solidarity Center has seen first-hand how violations of worker rights and lack of labor standards and protections for workers make them vulnerable to human trafficking.

Human trafficking is a labor issue because it is often linked to the various forms of labor exploitation, and it is one of the worst forms of worker abuse. In 2010, a slave is not necessarily a person in chains or shackles. Slavery is not simply ownership of one person over another. Modern-day slavery can be much more subtle.

Trafficking victims toil in factories that produce products that are exported to the United States. They harvest vegetables and process food that ends up on our dining room tables. They pick crops or mine minerals that are raw materials in the products we buy. They make the clothes and shoes that we wear. They clean people's homes and take care of the young, elderly and sick. They are enslaved not only through physical restraint, but also through coercion, fear, and intimidation.

In today's global economy, workers can be enslaved by threats of deportation, lack of viable alternatives, and especially debt. There are many facets that make labor trafficking thrive around the world, and I just want to mention a few of these.

One of them is the particular vulnerability of immigrant or migrant workers to human trafficking. Unsafe migration processes and the lack of labor or legal protections for immigrant workers make them easy targets for traffickers in the form of unscrupulous labor recruiters and employers.

Migrant workers are specifically excluded from the protection of labor laws in many countries, simply because of their foreign status, or because of the sector that they work in, including in the United States, such as domestic work or agriculture.

Traffickers take advantage of this exclusion, and the failure to monitor and enforce laws in sectors where migrant workers or immigrant workers work, and this increases the vulnerability of these workers to human trafficking.

And it's not just undocumented immigrant workers that are vulnerable, but we are increasingly seeing in the United States and around the world legal immigrant workers being trafficked under what are called either temporary or guest worker programs.

There are inherent structural flaws in temporary or guest worker programs around the world that increases the vulnerability of foreign or immigrant workers to trafficking, such as being tied to a particular employer that doesn't allow you, if the employer is abusing you, to leave. If you try to leave, you face deportation.

A common theme about -- for both undocumented and documented migrant workers, Mr. Chairman, is what you mentioned in your opening remarks, which I'd like to highlight, which is the role of labor recruiters in debt bondage.

It really is increasingly around the world, we're really seeing the use of -- by employers and by workers who are seeking to find work outside of their home, they're using labor recruiters. And these labor recruiters are charging thousands of dollars to workers for the privilege of laboring for somebody else. And it's really this -- these fees and these charges that are being placed on workers that is creating the situation of debt bondage.

The other area that I'd like to emphasize where labor trafficking is thriving is within supply chains. It's difficult to quantify the exact number of trafficking victims that work in global supply chains, but as supply chains reach down to smaller and smaller suppliers, the chances increase that trafficking victims are part of the labor force.

The Solidarity Center believes the most effective way to eliminate forced labor, debt bondage and other forms of slavery in supply chains is by empowering workers to have a voice in their workplace, and supporting their right to organize and join unions.

The existence of codes of conduct in multinational corporations' policies have failed to curtail trafficking practices in a number of sectors, including garment-textile, agriculture, and seafood processing.

There is no easy solution to this problem, but we know that a key deterrent is the ability of unions and labor rights organizations to shine a light on these practices -- on these practices through on-the-ground investigations

We believe that it's important for Congress and the administration to support such monitoring efforts, and the efforts of workers to monitor their own workplaces. In order to get rid of trafficking in supply chains, we have to focus on corporate accountability and not just corporate social responsibility.

Governments must also play a major role in eliminating slavery in supply chains. There are examples around the world of governments' reluctance to hold employers accountable for trafficking in their workplaces. When they do address trafficking for labor exploitation in a supply chain, they often blame the labor recruiter and don't hold the end user, the employer who's exploiting the worker, liable for that trafficking.

When cases are prosecuted, they often result in just small fines and no jail time for the perpetrators, which is barely a deterrent for exploitative employers.

I'd also like to emphasize the importance of the Trafficking in Persons Report in highlighting labor trafficking. I've dealt with a lot of governments around the world who complain to me about the Trafficking in Persons Report, but I have to tell you that it's been extremely important in Solidarity Center's work in being able to leverage and push governments to address issues of labor trafficking.

Without this report, without being able to point to it and having cases of -- such as in the Gulf where legal migrant workers are trafficked for forced labor -- it would be very difficult to get these governments to move.

So just in closing, in the interest of time, I'd just like to highlight a few key initiatives that I think we need to focus on to address labor trafficking. These include reforming labor and other laws to include and protect immigrants and domestic workers. Also, we have to pay equal attention to not just passing better laws, but also implementing, monitoring, and enforcing these laws. This includes a greater role for labor inspectors.

Labor inspectors must be engaged in and be an integral part of law enforcement initiatives to combat human trafficking. I think of the countries where literally there have been five to 10 labor inspectors for an entire country to monitor the situation for migrant workers, and that's just not going to help us solve this problem.

In addition, labor inspectors have to be given special training to know how, when they go into workplaces, what are the questions they need to ask that go beyond just the initial questions to find trafficking in the workplace.

We have to ensure that victims of labor trafficking not only participate in criminal prosecutions, but are also given access to civil suits where they can get withheld or back wages.

As I said earlier, we have to ensure that employers are held accountable for their role in labor trafficking, and that they're held accountable not just for what they do, but also for what the labor recruiters that they hire, and the subcontractors that they hire, the abuses that they commit in their supply chains.

We have to place greater emphasis on safer migration processes for workers, and we have to have increased scrutiny of imports and exports to ensure that goods made from slave labor are not allowed into the marketplace.

This also includes reviewing and reworking the role of ICE in overseas inspections. We have to have strict regulation of labor recruiters and employment agencies, and we must have a strict policy of no fees being charged to workers, period.

We have to extend meaningful whistleblower protections to trafficked workers, which allow workers and their representatives to sue to enforce all state, federal, local, and employment laws, as well as the conditions in workers' contract, without having to face deportation or removal.

And finally, we need to put increased pressure and monitoring on states to include trafficking for labor exploitation into antitrafficking laws and regulations, and to increase prosecutions of labor traffickers, including employers as perpetrators of human trafficking.

Thank you, and I look forward to your questions.

BERMAN: Well, thank you very much. You're talking about a lot of issues that I've been interested in for a long time.

Dr. D'Souza?

D'SOUZA: Thank you, Congressman Berman, for organizing this most significant hearing and inviting me to appear today with this prestigious panel.

I would like to speak about India's progress in combating human trafficking, the challenges looming ahead, and four approaches to the crisis that are seeing success.

Of the 28 million people around the world that the U.N. considers human slaves, the U.N. recognizes that most live in India, and most are Dalits. Today, Dalits are the largest number of people categorized as modern-day slaves. So we really cannot have a discussion about human trafficking and not look at India and regard the problem of the Dalits.

Because of their poverty and the resulting desperation and lack of options, trafficking is not simply a problem the Dalits face. It is an atrocity that has swept Dalit culture in all parts of the nation.

Debt bondage is a Dalit destiny most feared. It is inherent in every Dalit village and in the life of every Dalit person. The lack of access to education, healthcare, and a living wage leaves most Dalits resigned to a hopelessness that, without an intervention, will not change.

The 2010 TIP report placed India on the tier two watch list for the seventh year, and defined it as a nation in which the number of victims of severe forms of trafficking is very significant or significantly increasing.

I am the daughter of a Dalit woman. I have dedicated my life to joining others in my country to end Dalit trafficking. Despite the bleakness of the situation, especially for India's 250 million Dalits, India is making progress in combating human trafficking.

First and most notably, the country's top leaders have spoken into the public record that human trafficking is India's number one social problem, with estimates of 100 million people involved.

(CROSSTALK)

BERMAN: Who said that?

D'SOUZA: This has been...

BERMAN: The government, you say?

D'SOUZA: Yes, our home minister.

BERMAN: Thank you.

D'SOUZA: Yes. A crisis that should be dealt with by all stakeholders with a stern and iron hand.

Second, there are committed individuals using their position to end this crisis. The 2010 TIP report recognized Mr. Sattaru Umapathi as one of the nine global heroes. An anti-human trafficking officer, he led rescue operations, contributed to multiple convictions, forged partnerships with NGOs, and educated the state law enforcement community about victim rights. He is a true champion for victims everywhere.

Through our dedicated NGO, we are combating trafficking to rescue and restore, as well as preventive and preemptive programs. The NGO with which I am affiliated, the Dalit Freedom Network, and all its India partners, are driving into the problems from both (inaudible) and seeing results.

But there are still major challenges looming ahead for India. As we anticipate the publication of the 2011 TIP report, we recognize that India is at serious risk for demotion to tier three if significant efforts at improvement are not initiated and registered in the next six months.

Only 7 percent of India's police personnel have received anti- trafficking training. The government's anti-human trafficking units lack sufficient personnel and funding. The existing laws, while substantive, do not focus on the rights and needs of victims. There are low numbers of prosecutions and convictions of known traffickers.

Due to lack of time, I will conclude with four approaches that are gaining traction and can serve as a template for other nations.

First, we are seeing that the end of trafficking begins with education. Education changes a nation. The education of India's most vulnerable children becomes the most significant means of preventing the selling and exploitation of these children in the workforce and the sex trade.

We educate Dalit children so they are worth more than the meager income they can make in the factories employing them. To date, there are 100 of these schools and nearly 25,000 children enrolled. Approximately 30 percent of the children are children of bonded laborers. They are studying hard, learning English, and preparing for a higher education and a future that does not know desperate poverty. Education is preemptive strike in any nation in which its most vulnerable children are at risk of being trafficked.

Second, the end of trafficking draws near when we economically empower marginalized populations. No longer are prostitution and debt bondage the only options for the poor. Dalits are being trained in marketable skills, finance management, and being offered micro-loans to establish their own businesses and earn enough income so that they do not fall prey to fraudulent money lenders who demand exorbitant interests, so that even a small loan can never be repaid. We cannot underestimate the horrors that follow the poor parents who are forced to sell their own children in an attempt to pay down their debt.

Third, human trafficking is deterred when societies pursue healthcare for all its citizens. Preventative healthcare, health, hygiene, HIV and AIDS education, safe labor practices all promote healthy communities and produce healthy economic factors. Most Dalits are forced into debt bondage because of a medical crisis that could have been avoided with proper healthcare.

Finally, we find that advocacy efforts in India and abroad are yielding positive results and should continue to be specific and targeted, beginning with internal advocacy before the Indian government, and extending to our international allies who seek to stand with us before their own government in our united efforts to end Dalit trafficking.

Thank you again, Congressman Berman, and this committee.

BERMAN: Well, thank you all very much -- fascinating and important. I'm going to yield five minutes to my colleague, Mr. Royce, for question -- to begin the questioning.

ROYCE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, very much, and I'll ask Dr. D'Souza a question.

Now, your written testimony -- in your written testimony, you mention that Prime Minister Singh's statement -- his statement was, "Even after 60 years of constitutional and legal protection and support, there is still social discrimination against Dalits in many parts of our country. Dalits have faced a unique discrimination in our society that is fundamentally different from the problems of minority groups in general."

That was his quote. I was going to ask you: How important was his statement and how has it affected the treatment of Dalits as a consequence of that statement?

D'SOUZA: Yes. I think Prime Minister Singh has developed an accolade for his bold statement, and being bold enough to address the issue of human trafficking and the relationship to the Dalit atrocities, and the Dalit situation in India.

I think the entire issue of Dalits has been a political issue in Indian government ever since we've had our independence, and by boldly declaring that as an issue, it has led to more preemptive measures, both from within the government as well as in the nongovernmental organizations, to deal with this significant problem.

ROYCE: Do you think it has changed, in any significant way, the perception and maybe led to a situation where Dalits are less susceptible to human trafficking? Do you think it has an impact among Dalits and among society in general that has assisted?

D'SOUZA: Absolutely. I think that by Prime Minister Singh addressing and accepting the issue of Dalits from the Indian government stance, has been seen very welcoming -- very welcome by the Dalit community. The fact that they are being quantified, the fact that they are being addressed and their rights are being discussed has been very significant.

ROYCE: The question I was going to ask you, too -- the TIP report -- they find certain heroes. And one that they elevate, you mentioned, a Sattaru -- do I say -- Umapathi?

D'SOUZA: That's right.

ROYCE: OK. And he's the anti -- anti-human trafficking officer in Andhra Pradesh. And his work, of course has led to multiple convictions of human traffickers. And a lot of NGOs now across India sort of formed a partnership as a result of his activity, I think, and in Tamil Nadu as well.

But -- but you know, aside from highlighting his good work, how can we export some of the lessons? You know, how do we -- how do we expand on what's being done in those states and get other states involved? What are some of the ideas that might suffice to build the momentum on this?

D'SOUZA: Well again I would like to (inaudible) what has been discussed by Ambassador (inaudible), and the initial part was about how trafficking should not be seen as a boutique (ph) issue, but more a basic primary human right issue. And how by accolading (ph) Umapathi (inaudible) and creating various law enforcement agencies within our country, different states across the country, to look at it as the significant issue it is. And to encourage such behavior, to exchange information, to exchange resources, to exchange best practices, that's the way to go ahead.

ROYCE: And -- but we find that some of the answers here in the United States, too, is training of law enforcement. What was the percentage you gave on training today in trafficking?

D'SOUZA: It's about 7 percent of our police personnel.

ROYCE: Yes.

D'SOUZA: It's only 7 percent of our police personnel that have had adequate training in regards to dealing with victims of human trafficking.

ROYCE: And -- and your point is, of course, if that became a focus along with, primarily education, the education of young women and young people, and their equal opportunities...

(CROSSTALK)

D'SOUZA: That's right.

ROYCE: ... for education, that that more than anything else would -- how would you -- what are some of the ways that we might be able to promote the advocacy for education for everybody in society, including Dalits?

D'SOUZA: Again, access, advocates -- advocating for education, and making sure it is accessible to everybody in a country when other kinds of -- other different countries where you have so many social injustices all connected and so intertwined that it seems impossible to actually do any progress.

You have to work together in a concerted manner to ensure equal opportunity, whether it is access to education or it's access to universal healthcare, because these are the very critical roots that will actually ensure development happening.

ROYCE: Thank you very much, Dr. D'Souza, and thank you again, Mr. Chairman.

BERMAN: Well, thank you, and I yield myself time. The -- we are approaching this moment where I have to leave.

I would love to -- the great thing about being the last person to question and the chairman is if I had the time I would -- there are threads here I'd like to pursue for the next half-hour with you and I'm not going to be able to.

But there was an interesting connection between much of the testimony that all of you gave in a certain way, even though different things were focused on.

So Ambassador Lagon talks about the focus on the prosecution side of it, and raises the implication of are we doing enough in the area of protection and prevention. And then Dr. Uprety describes a very specific situation of young Nepalese women and girls lured by their dreams, and there's nothing in the -- in their education at home or in school that points out the dangers of -- of what could befall you.

And how many people -- how many people could avoid being victims of human trafficking by just focusing on that aspect of making people aware of the pitfalls of doing some of those things that they are enticed to do at a point where you -- they still are not in harm's way?

And then Dr. D'Souza adds the notion that maybe we also need a component of other alternatives, not just the warnings of what could befall you, but the notion there is a -- there are other opportunities, other avenues.

And then Ms. Misra talks -- I mean, I've been very interested in the issues of migrant labor and how to deal with the exploitation that comes from it, but the point that all of you, and particularly Ms. Misra have driven home, is that exploitation turns into slavery trafficking kind of -- it's a fairly thin line between getting shorted on your paycheck, and in the end being held, in a sense, in bondage.

And we've talked about how do you get through some of this if you're going to have guest worker programs to deal with labor shortages in certain areas like farms.

To what extent could the United States and Mexico -- could Mexico as a government be the source of selection, protection of the workers who would be coming over, rather than private recruiters working on behalf of grower interests here, but charging the person more than an effective recruiting -- the grower for bringing them -- if you could turn it into a bit of a government-to-government thing, you could avoid many of those issues.

And the notion that you are stuck in that situation with one employer, and that your alternatives are staying there under what could be horrid conditions, or going back to your home country, rather than that person knowing that he could lose the worker to another grower or employer who isn't engaging in those kinds of practices, could be a great deterrent.

So these are very interesting things.

I want to ask Mr. Abramowitz one question, though. You talked in your testimony urging us, focusing on the importance of the administration's implementation of the new features of the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2008, relating to moving countries from two-tier watch lists to tier three where the sanctions would apply, and the question of presidential waivers. Spell that out a little bit.

ABRAMOWITZ: Well, Mr. Chairman...

(CROSSTALK)

BERMAN: What should we be concerned about here?

ABRAMOWITZ: Well, Mr. Chairman, I think this came up in several of the other testimonies, including Ambassador Lagon, as well as Dr. D'Souza.

As is referenced under the TVPRA 2008, it amended the Trafficking Victims Protection Act so that rather than countries being able to stay on the tier two watch list forever, which has been the situation with a number of countries including India, China, Russia. After two years, they're going to have to go down to tier three if they haven't been able to move up.

And I think that this is going to cause a lot of hydraulic pressure on the Trafficking in Persons Office to try to find ways to, for example, as Mr. Royce suggests might happen to Cambodia, that to move them up from the tier two Watch List, up to tier two, so that they can avoid that, because this is the second year for a number of those countries.

The alternative to that, though, is if it is determined that there's no real progress being made, let's say with India, because it goes from 7 percent to 7.1 percent on the number of police officers trained, then those countries are going to fall down to tier three and therefore be subject to sanctions.

I'd rather have an honest assessment, have the countries fall down, and then the president make a determination as to whether assistance needs to be cut off or not.

However, I do think that there are some risks, that if a number of countries do go down to tier three and there's a wide range of waivers that the president then implements, because in India we need to do cooperation with, or in Russia we need to continue democracy assistance, whatever the national interest is, then I think there's a possibility that people will say, "Oh," -- the officials in foreign countries will say -- "Oh, this is not a big problem because we'll just -- the president will just waive for us."

I do think that the name-and-shame issue remains something that is a very, very powerful motivator. It's not just because of the threat of sanctions but -- Ambassador CdeBaca said today that the threat of sanctions is a component of that.

So my own view is that we need to try to see if the administration will not only continue honest assessment, but also will look at maybe perhaps targeted waivers of assistance that really go to pushing forward, rather than just wholesale waivers in the national interest.

BERMAN: My time is more than expired. I didn't realize the gentlelady was here. Could I invite the gentlelady to take over the questioning and the chair, because I have to go to someplace you may be joining me at very soon.

(CROSSTALK)

BERMAN: Alright, the gentlelady is recognized for three minutes.

JACKSON LEE: OK. I did not want to miss this hearing, Mr. Chairman, because I think the issues before us are so very vital. And I had an overlapping immigration hearing that likewise is facing a number of concerns.

So let me -- let me say that human trafficking is the most dastardly attack on human dignity and the values that one holds for the respect we have for humanity. We cannot describe it any way other than that it cuts off and extinguishes the life of someone without killing them.

And particularly women, who are vulnerable, and with great -- women and children in particular. And we were holding a hearing in the Judiciary Committee on human trafficking in the United States. So we are -- none of us are immune from this.

And I want to thank the chairman for this hearing. Coming out of the shadows is very important.

Let me ask two questions, and I'm just selectively -- David, because we've worked together -- to highlight the vile-ness of it, but what should our first aim be if we want to take the high goal of extinguishing human trafficking around the world?

And then if I could ask Aruna, if you would likewise tell us the lowest ebb that victims fall into and what we should do for those victims?

David?

ABRAMOWITZ: Thank you, Ms. Jackson Lee. It's very hard because there are so many different interventions that we need to consider.

I think what Dr. Uprety has been doing in terms of trying to educate women and girls in particular and also offering, as was said, some hope for the future through talking about additional educational opportunities and so on, is an important part of the prevention piece.

I think that in terms of trying to ensure that we use our diplomacy to try to make sure that discriminated populations, like Dr. D'Souza said, are really highlighted, I think that -- Mr. Royce, one of the things that we should think about is trying to see if the president can raise the issue of the Dalits in some way.

I think if, you know, the first lady were to meet with Dalits while she was in India, that would have an amazing...

(CROSSTALK)

JACKSON LEE: Raise the issue? I'm sorry.

ABRAMOWITZ: ... of Dalits. That is, the discriminated population in India that have historical social discrimination against them. If she were to meet with a Dalit population to talk about the importance of education, those kinds of steps can have an important impact on raising issues in ways that are difficult to quantify, but I think can have a real impact. I'll just leave it to that.

JACKSON LEE: Thank you.

ABRAMOWITZ: I'll turn it over to Dr. Uprety.

JACKSON LEE: Thank you very much.

Doctor?

UPRETY: From my discussion with police officers before I came here, we have found that girls below 12 will have also been trafficked.

And from my personal experience, when I had been in some places where children are trafficked for (inaudible) a nine-year-old girl had been trafficked to -- from a district of Nepal to India. And later on, after two or three -- after a lot of (inaudible), she came back and now she is one of our students.

So if you would look at children below 10 can also be trafficked, and 12, 13 can also be trafficked. That is -- and that is the saddest part of the human trafficking.

JACKSON LEE: So we need to, in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, take this to the highest level of our psychic (ph); be as hostile against it as possible, and let people know that when you're trafficked, you're also sexually violated and abused.

And I join you -- I know the first lady has many issues. She's an eloquent spokesperson, and so I would like to join in that effort and join also as raising my voice against this dastardly deed.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, and...

(CROSSTALK)

BERMAN: Thank you. And while I would really love to pursue some of these things more, we can't since I'm not going to be able to come there. We're going to rush off to something else. I think all three of us have to do that.

We are very grateful you came. We're going to follow up on your testimony and your suggestions and take it very seriously, and maybe even raise this issue at our next meeting. Thank you very much.

END

LOAD-DATE: October 4, 2010

37 of 404 DOCUMENTS

CQ Congressional Testimony

September 30, 2010 ThursdayHUMAN TRAFFICKING PREVENTION;
COMMITTEE: HOUSE FOREIGN AFFAIRS*SECTION: CAPITOL HILL HEARING TESTIMONYLENGTH: 3202 wordsTESTIMONY-BY: AMB. MARK P. LAGON, PH.D., CHAIRMANAFFILIATION: GEORGETOWN UNIVERSITY

Statement of Amb. Mark P. Lagon, Ph.D. Chairman for International Relations and Security, Concentration, and Visiting Professor, Edmund A. Walsh School of Foreign Service Georgetown University

Committee on House Foreign Affairs

September 30, 2010

Thank you Mr. Chairman, and Congresswoman Ros-Lehtinen, for inviting me to testify on an important subject: the slavery of today. This Committee has for years been committed to addressing imperatives of human rights which cross partisan lines, and were it not for Members of this Committee, including the indefatigable Mr. Smith, there would be no Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) or TIP Office. Thank you. I would ask that my full written statement be put into the Record, and I'll summarize my main points now.

On page 7, the latest TIP Report estimates there are 1.8 trafficking victims for every 1000 people in the world. And that is based on a very conservative International Labor Organization (ILO) estimate of 12.3 million victims globally - less than half of what scholar Kevin Bales estimates. So think about it: at least 1 out of every 555 people in today's world is a human trafficking victim. Based in part upon my experience as the TIP Office Director, I would like to comment on two key priorities in the global context today ten years after the TVPA, the creation of the TIP Office, and the Palermo Protocol to the UN Crime Convention. Then I would like to offer recommendations on four key areas of action.

Two Global Trends and Priorities

The Need for Rule of Law in Practice. Human traffickers treat vulnerable groups such as women, children, migrants, minorities, and disadvantaged castes as if they are not human beings in full. They get away with it when -- through neglect, prejudice, and complicity -- societies, businesses, and government personnel permit them to, leaving those vulnerable groups without equal access to justice.

The main tangible impact of the TVPA, TIP Office's diplomacy, and Palermo Protocol has been the passage of new laws addressing human trafficking in well over half the countries of the world. This is a major achievement for rule of law, and demanding equal access to justice for TIP victims. Yet rule of law consists of so much more than laws on the books - whether in the U.S. or the least developed of nations. There has been a lot of progress training law enforcement officials and empowering NGOs as their partners to help find victims and get them access to justice.

But transformative change has not yet taken place. Of the TVPA's and Palermo Protocols 3 Ps prosecution, protection, prevention prosecution has been the emphasis to date. The TIP Report documents 7,992 prosecutions in the whole world in 2003, and down to 5,506 in 2009. Of the 5,506, only 432 were for labor trafficking. Prosecutions are limited, down from a few years ago, and minimal for non-sexual exploitation. Lots of effort is apparently not "moving the needle" of change a great deal. We need implementation of rule of law.

The Need to Address All Vulnerable Populations. I am often asked where are the more significant places for human trafficking globally -- beyond answering simply, "The Tier 3 countries." India is one, because of the 27 million TIP victims in the world Dr. Bales estimates, two-thirds are there, chiefly in bonded labor. China is another, because of the underrecognized extent of the problem in so many forms, due to migrating workers without a safety net, a Wild West sex trade, official discrimination against Uighurs and Tibetans, and failure to treat North Koreans fleeing atrocious political and economic conditions as refugees. East Asia is of particular concern, given the prevalence of human trafficking for both major forms: for labor and for commercial sex. And the Gulf is a major flashpoint, where despite some strides prompted by U.S. diplomacy and self-interest, to be a woman or foreign guest worker - or worst of all both - you are likely to be treated as a lesser human.

Despite global trafficking foci and flashpoints, there are no "lesser" victims of trafficking. Since TIP's essence is groups denied equal dignity, let us not in our anti-TIP policy privilege some victims over others. They are all of equal value in humankind. One reason the ten year old effort is not moving the needle more is the fissuring of efforts and siloed focus on particular vulnerable groups. It is more than a mere division of labor. For instance, victims of forced labor are no less important than victims of sex trafficking and vice versa. That was a signature feature of my tenure directing the TIP Office.

Sex trafficking is not the only source of exploitation and violence against women. Take three examples: As Ambassador, I met a Burmese woman who had been beaten and had her head shaved in a forced labor camp in Thailand. As Executive Director of the NGO Polaris Project, I met two Chinese women in Japan who were victimized in a foreign labor trainee program exempt from Japanese labor law. Chinese victimized in Japan. I also met a woman from an African nation Polaris served as a client right here in Washington. She spoke of the attention America paid to treating animals humanely in the U.S. since some people like her are treated like animals here. All females victimized for labor.

Some think sex trafficking has been overemphasized due to alleged moralism, but to focus solely on labor would be equally wrongheaded. As the TIP Office Director who established parity of emphasis for labor slavery, I hope the pendulum is not swinging toward focus on labor to the near exclusion of adult sex trafficking. On page 8 of the 2010 Report the highlighted "box" on "What Is Not Human Trafficking?" emphasizing that prostitution is not trafficking is counterproductive. I do not think prostitution is one and the same as slavery. Few contemporary abolitionists do. But prostitution is the enabling environment for sex trafficking - whether in brothels, or seedy streets or, until recently, on craigslist in the United States. Sex trafficking and its basic enabling environment of men fueling demand for purchasing (chiefly) females globally ought not to lose attention.

One sees fissuring elsewhere. Some devoted to combating sex trafficking focus only on children. (I myself serve on the Advisory Committee of ECPAT-USA, the leading NGO fighting commercial sexual exploitation of children.) This is easier territory given global consensus that there is no meaningful consent by minors to be prostituted. But sex trafficking is not confined to minors. First of all, if lured into the sex trade as a minor, does it suddenly become a choice the day someone turns 18? Moreover, we know that numerous adult females in the global sex trade are subject to force, fraud, or coercion - including subtle psychological terror and trickery - making them trafficking victims even under the strict standards of the Palermo Protocol.

There is one other serious area of fissuring: "Trafficking" may sound like it refers to crossing borders, but it actually refers to turning people into commodities robbed of autonomy. Despite what some at the Department of Labor, the ILO, and some businesses think, crossing borders is not a necessary element of trafficking. The families freed from bonded labor I met in Tamil Nadu, India or the Mexican girl prostituted as a minor I met in Chiapas, Mexico are just as much TIP victims as those who moved across borders.

So we need rule of law and equal dignity, both rightly understood. Rule of law depends on implementation, beyond passage of laws. And the global fight for the dignity of human trafficking victims requires equal value and energy accorded to all the victims. These two tests will be the basic signs to show whether we are successfully on the road to abolishing modern-day slavery. A Four-Pronged Mission Let me note four important areas of activity most important to meeting these two tests of success, and to stamping out human trafficking.

An Exemplar. First, the U.S. must be an exemplar. The clear continuity from Amb. John Miller's tenure to mine to Amb. CdeBaca's has been the steadily increasing emphasis on the U.S. being a good example, using the chairmanship of the inter-agency Senior Policy Operating Group codified by Congress. As TIP Office Director, a central premise was that the U.S. needed to be an exemplar to be an effective promoter of the anti-trafficking agenda globally. Let me say, I had very much in mind by analogy how U.S. detainee policy undercut U.S. promotion of freedom, good governance, and credible anti-terrorism policy internationally.

For example, it was pertinent to the country I focused on most: Mexico. I visited Mexico and its Attorney General in his office twice. I met with the Mexican Senate Majority Leader, head of the opposition to the Mexican President. I convened a trilateral meeting with Mexico, the U.S., and Canada, and included executive and legislative branch officials from each. Throughout this effort, we emphasized what the U.S. was doing - and not doing so well - at home. It surprised the Mexicans, who hate assessments, which they associated with the U.S. narcotics certifications. Mexico enacted a comprehensive TIP law and moved up to Tier 2 in 2008.

Under the last Administration we put a profile of the U.S. in the TIP Report, disseminated in hardcopy and CD-ROM the Department of Justice annual report on the U.S. record on TIP, and got DOJ to produce it same month as the TIP Report (assessing ourselves just as we assessed others). I think it is tremendous that Secretary Clinton has gone farther, including a profile with a ranking and more lengthy recommendations about areas of weakness.

ECPAT submitted a comment on that U.S. profile in the report, noting it did not say that according to U.S. Government's statistics from 2008 and 2009, almost three times as many prostituted children were arrested as were offered protection and assistance. To be transparent about this matter, as TIP Office Director I volunteered to co-lead the U.S. delegation to report to the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child on how we were implementing two Optional Protocols which the United States has ratified (on sale and prostitution of children, and on child soldiers). I knew we would face criticism for not having ratified the Convention on the Rights of the Child -- the Protocols' mother treaty, pardon the pun. Admitting failings is helpful in pressuring other governments to do more. I saw the South Korean head of that UN Committee at Georgetown University recently, and she noted that benefit of our candor.

A Helping Hand. Persuading other governments to do more also benefits from offering a helping hand. It is not fully appreciated, but the assistance given to NGOs and more efficacious international organizations - like the International Organization of Migration (IOM) - is as important a part of the U.S. policy as any. If this fight against human trafficking is about rule of law and access to justice, civil society organizations are crucial partners to law enforcement to identify victims, make them feel safe, and help them. Victims become more stable, helpful witnesses to punish their exploiters in the process.

A helping hand can be offered directly to some governments too. Training for law enforcement helps turn law on paper into reality. Law enforcement, immigration officials and judges in other countries (just like our own) need a helping hand to learn to see a victim as a victim, not as a dirty or willful criminal. Governments with a will to change (on Tier 2 and Tier 2 Watch List), but with limited resources deserve help. I commend the attention being paid to Africa now, where Amb. CdeBaca went on his first trip. Less developed African nations need not so much "grading on a curve" in the TIP Report as they need tangible assistance.

Tough Love. Being an exemplar and offering a helping hand are important complements to pressuring other governments. Yet make no mistake: pressure governments we must. After ten years, we still need the "tough love" embodied by the TIP Office and its unique report - one that gives grades. The TVPA has manifestly worked - as the rankings and global awareness raised by the report has put pressure on governments. Sure, there are intransigent governments, both undemocratic and democratic. Yet in case after case, we have seen how the report and rankings have worked, even among allies unused to prodding from the U.S.: Turkey, Israel, the Philippines, the UAE, even Ireland, which recently appointed an anti-trafficking "czar."

When some say this "tough love" has not worked, it is flatly untrue. The TIP Office and the Report focus the mind of other governments on the problem; and they focus the mind of U.S. diplomats who would otherwise wish this issue not get in the way of other priorities.

I had the privilege to observe President Bush sign in the Oval Office the Wilberforce TVPRA Reauthorization this Committee launched. One of its most important and welcome provisions was a time limit on Tier 2 Watch List status. Please conduct oversight to ensure this device is used and the fair-minded flexibility you have given to the Executive Branch to defer or avert an automatic Tier 3 ranking is not misused in the name of alleged national interests. Some countries objectively deserve a ranking between Tier 2 and 3, but a so-called "Watch List" is only meaningful if there is a significant prospect of a downgrade to Tier 3.

There is one other area for tougher love. One of the places where trafficking for labor and victimization of women converge takes place right here on U.S. soil. Thanks to the ACLU, I met with a woman from Goa who was the human trafficking victim of a Kuwaiti official stationed in the U.S. She said the family treated her far worse as a domestic servant in the U.S. than in Kuwait because there was even less reason to think they would face consequences in the U.S. than in a Gulf country. That should make us pause in horror. It was worse in our country because of the impunity delivered by diplomatic immunity.

I commend the TIP Office and now others at the Department for working hard to reduce the vulnerability of domestic servants to abuses qualifying as TIP by diplomats in the United States. Congress was crystal clear in the TVPA, thrice reauthorized, that attention should be paid to government officials found complicit in human trafficking. Official complicity is precisely the issue here. It is inevitable governments may exercise the option to withdraw accused diplomats rather than agree to lift diplomatic immunity to allow prosecution. Still, to meet the intent of the TVPA, these cases should be cited in the report (without using individual names as the Report never does) - as the TIP Office was overruled on in my tenure.

The Role of Business. So both carrots and sticks, both honey and vinegar, in U.S. diplomacy are essential. Secretary of State Clinton is carrying forward an approach of the Clinton and Bush Administrations to mobilize partnerships with NGOs, philanthropies, and businesses in our foreign policy. She calls "partnerships" a fourth "P" along with prosecution, protection, and prevention--more labeling a continuing, sound, non-partisan policy than introducing an initiative.

Chief among these partners is the business community. But it is high time businesses become more actively and tangibly involved in the global fight against human trafficking. For ten years, governments, NGOs, and international organizations have dedicated sizeable efforts to fight trafficking. More definitive results - more "movement of the needle" to squeeze trafficking and make it less profitable --will come if businesses work together to help.

A business coalition would seize the opportunity to leverage varied and unique resources to take a quantum leap in the fight, with the goal to abolish trafficking. Let me be transparent here. I have been a paid consultant of a business engaged in a corporate responsibility campaign related to combating human trafficking: LexisNexis, Inc. It is working with others to explore such a coalition. In a week and a half, major businesses from sectors as diverse as information technology, soft drinks, cosmetics, labor placement, energy, the auto industry, the airline industry, travel and hospitality, entertainment, legal publishing and information solutions, and entertainment are meeting to explore such a business coalition.

Businesses should go farther than they have to date: dialogue with government and the UN; public awareness efforts not involving accountability of their own business operations; and single-sector accountability efforts like apparel, electronics, chocolate, or hotels. How can we end human trafficking if businesses are not fully engaged in reducing enabling environments, and working across siloed sectors. If they did so, we would have a much more significant chance to abolish this contemporary form of slavery.

We must recognize that market demand is a powerful force. Demand for cheap products and commercial sex are drivers of human trafficking. The Department of Labor finally fulfilling the mandate of the 2005 TVPA Reauthorization to produce a list of goods tainted by forced and child labor empowers consumers. If consumers knew some businesses were committed to reducing human trafficking, then demand would become an enormous force for good - creating an incentive for businesses to get ahead of the curve and join the fight.

Globalization need not inexorably lead to slavery - but it will take the proactive efforts of businesses to prevent it. It is not too much to ask: take preventive action against the most extreme and autonomy-denying forms of exploitation, which are manifestly illegal under domestic and international law.

Out of the Shadows

Human trafficking victims are indeed in the shadows -- vulnerable, women, men, children, migrants, and minorities marginalized socially and economically. Let us move from trafficking victimizing the marginalized, to actually marginalizing trafficking - through diplomatic pressure strengthened by being a good example and a helping hand to partners, and through the business community stepping up to the plate too. Only this way can we make sure that rule of law is fully realized and that all types victims are offered a chance to reclaim their inherent dignity.

The TIP Office and Report have done a lot to take the issue of human trafficking out of the shadows. It is worth thinking how much the TIP Office which Congress created ten years ago has found a formula for doing something in the last decade which has so flummoxed the State Department and Executive Branch - public diplomacy. Creative, feisty, un-bureaucratic, the TIP Office has told the story of universal values and the partnership we offer to extend them. That role has been even more important than its traditional diplomacy, and has indeed strengthened that traditional diplomacy.

Thanks for your effort to take this crucial issue out of the shadows with a Full Committee hearing on it, and the chance for me to participate.

LOAD-DATE: October 1, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Congressional Testimony

Copyright 2010 Congressional Quarterly, Inc.
All Rights Reserved.

38 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Federal News Service

September 30, 2010 ThursdayPANEL II OF A HEARING OF THE HOUSE FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE;*SUBJECT: OUT OF THE SHADOWS: THE GLOBAL FIGHT AGAINST HUMAN TRAFFICKING;*CHAIR BY: REPRESENTATIVE HOWARD BERMAN (D-CA);*WITNESSES: DAVID ABRAMOWITZ, DIRECTOR OF POLICY AND GOVERNMENT RELATIONS, HUMANITY UNITED; MARK LAGON, CHAIRMAN OF INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS AND SECURITY CONCENTRATION AND VISITING PROFESSOR, GEORGETOWN UNIVERSITY'S EDMUND A. WALSH SCHOOL OF FOREIGN SERVICE; ARUNA UPRETY, FOUNDER, THE RURAL HEALTH EDUCATION SERVICES AND TRUST, AND PARTNER WITH THE AMERICAN HIMALAYAN FOUNDATION'S STOP GIRL TRAFFICKING PROGRAM; NEHA MISRA, SENIOR SPECIALIST ON MIGRATION AND HUMAN TRAFFICKING, AFL-CIO SOLIDARITY CENTER; BERYL D'SOUZA, MEDICAL DIRECTOR AND ANTI-HUMAN TRAFFICKING DIRECTOR IN INDIA, DALIT FREEDOM NETWORK;*LOCATION: 2172 RAYBURN HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING, WASHINGTON, D.C.

SECTION: CAPITOL HILL HEARING

LENGTH: 10046 words

ANEL II OF A HEARING OF THE HOUSE FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE SUBJECT: OUT OF THE SHADOWS: THE GLOBAL FIGHT AGAINST HUMAN TRAFFICKING CHAIRED BY: REPRESENTATIVE HOWARD BERMAN (D-CA) WITNESSES: DAVID ABRAMOWITZ, DIRECTOR OF POLICY AND GOVERNMENT RELATIONS, HUMANITY UNITED; MARK LAGON, CHAIRMAN OF INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS AND SECURITY CONCENTRATION AND VISITING PROFESSOR, GEORGETOWN UNIVERSITY'S EDMUND A. WALSH SCHOOL OF FOREIGN SERVICE; ARUNA UPRETY, FOUNDER, THE RURAL HEALTH EDUCATION SERVICES AND TRUST, AND PARTNER WITH THE AMERICAN HIMALAYAN FOUNDATION'S STOP GIRL TRAFFICKING PROGRAM; NEHA MISRA, SENIOR SPECIALIST ON MIGRATION AND HUMAN TRAFFICKING, AFL-CIO SOLIDARITY CENTER; BERYL D'SOUZA, MEDICAL DIRECTOR AND ANTI-HUMAN TRAFFICKING DIRECTOR IN INDIA, DALIT FREEDOM NETWORK LOCATION: 2172 RAYBURN HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING, WASHINGTON, D.C. TIME: 11:25 A.M. EDT DATE: THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 2010

REP. BERMAN: We're now pleased to have a second panel, if they could come up and take their seats. We do have a slight logistical problem. We really have to adjourn this hearing no later than 12:20 or so. So I will begin the introductions.

David Abramowitz, he's the director of policy and government relations at Humanity United, where he leads outreach efforts to the U.S. government, multilateral institutions and international NGOs, and provides strategic counsel and advice to a broad range of grantees. Previously Mr. Abramowitz served as chief counsel for this committee, where he worked on the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, among many other issues. He also worked at the office of the legal advisor in the State Department.

And I just have to add on a personal note that as we have recessed our session until after the election, we come to a lame duck session and people talk about what's the agenda in a lame duck. I watched Mr. Abramowitz take the Wilberforce Act, the reauthorization of the Trafficking Protection Victims Act, and knock himself out to pull off, you know, working with friends and collaborators in the other body to produce a piece of legislation when no one thought he had a chance of doing it. A tribute to his commitment to this, and we're really pleased to have him back here testifying on a subject he has demonstrated over and over again he cares greatly about.

Ambassador Mark Lagon is chair for the international relations and security concentration and visiting professor and master of science in foreign service program at Georgetown University. He is also adjunct senior fellow on the Council on Foreign Relations.

Ambassador Lagon served as director of the office to monitor and combat trafficking in persons at the U.S. Department of State from 2007-2009, as Mr. Smith mentioned earlier. He also served as deputy assistant secretary of State for international organization affairs, and on the staff of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, where he was involved in these issues.

Dr. Aruna Uprety is the founder of the Rural Health Education Services Trust in Nepal. In 1995 Dr. Uprety began working with the American Himalayan Foundation on the problem of young girls in rural Nepal being trafficked to India. In addition to her work with the Rural Health Education Services Trust, Dr. Uprety also serves as a consultant to the United Nations. You came a long way and we're very honored that you would be with us today.

Also coming a long -- well, Neha Misra is the senior specialist for migration and human trafficking at the Solidarity Center, AFL-CIO, an international workers' rights NGO based in Washington, D.C. Previously Ms. Misra was the deputy country director and program manager for the Solidarity Center's counter-trafficking in persons project in Indonesia. Before her assignment in Indonesia she worked in Bosnia and Herzegovina on post-war elections and democracy, and as a senior attorney advisor with the U.S. Department of Justice.

Dr. Beryl D'souza heads the health care initiative of the Dalit Freedom Network, an Operation Mercy India foundation. Concerned with the issue of human trafficking and HIV-AIDS in India, Dr. D'souza works with Dalit activists and international medical professionals to improve the health and well-being of the Dalit people. Also come a long way.

So thank all our witnesses, and Mr. Abramowitz, why don't you begin the testimony. Your entire statements will be included in the record and great if you can summarize them and then we'll have questioning.

MR. ABRAMOWITZ: Thank you, Mr. Chairman and Mr. Royce, and other distinguished members of the committee. Thank you for holding this very important hearing on the global fight against trafficking. My ears were burning with both Mr. Smith and yourself, Mr. Chairman, were talking about the work that I did. I have to note that Doug Anderson (sp), who's also sitting in the room, was there from the beginning on the TVPA, working with Joseph Reese (sp) and myself.

I think that should be noted, but at the end of the day I remember any number of conversations that I had with Mr. Smith when he was the lead on some of the Trafficking Victim Protection Reauthorization Act, as well as the act itself, and with you, Mr. Chairman. And I have to say that despite the hard work that we all did at the staff level, at the end of the day I think these things wouldn't have happened without you, and I think you should be very proud of the work that you've done and the accomplishment that came from it, as Ambassador CdeBaca was discussing.

It's a privilege for me to return to the committee in my new role as director of policy and government relations at Humanity United, a philanthropic organization that works to advance human freedom by combating modern-day slavery and to build peace and prevent conflict.

Mr. Chairman, as described in my written testimony and as you recognized in your opening statement, trafficking continues to inflict suffering on tens of millions of people around the globe including here in the United States and may even have undergone a surge during the current global economic downturn, as I think Mr. Royce was suggesting in his opening statement. Every victim of human trafficking, whether laboring in the fields where our food is grown or in the streets where U.S. youth is sexually exploited, deserve the freedom to be a survivor.

Mr. Chairman, at Humanity United we believe that there are solutions to these heinous abuses but that they require a unity of effort between civil society, which can work directly with survivors; the private sector, which can ensure supply chains are slave free; and governments, which can implement policies to help end this scourge. In that regard, Mr. Chairman, the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000, or TVPA, and (its various ?) Reauthorization Act establish a powerful framework for the United States which, as Mr. Smith noted, has been implemented vigorously by three administrations under presidents from both political parties. In particular, the Trafficking in Persons, or TIP, report mandated by the TVPA has a tremendous tool for catalyzing changes as, again, Mr. Royce noted that it's been an important element of our diplomacy. I ask that a document that -- demonstrating how the TVPA has fostered real change, which was compiled by the Alliance to End Slavery and Trafficking -- (inaudible) -- be entered into the record.

REP. BERMAN: It will be included -- (off mike).

MR. ABRAMOWITZ: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Chairman, as reflected in my written testimony, this year's TIP report continues to show a dynamic analysis of trends in human trafficking. Continued -- countries continue to be downgraded as well as upgraded and several key countries remain on Tier 3 and therefore subject to sanctions. The overall assessment of U.S. performance on the international front, however, remains an unfinished story. My written testimony raises a number of concerns including the following.

First, we need to continue to ensure that the TIP report focuses on trafficking into both sexual and labor exploitation. This year's report continues the longstanding trend towards focusing a bit more on trafficking into labor exploitation. Yet, I believe the report needs to capture more fully, for example, the risk facing women and children who migrate for legitimate labor purposes but end up being exploited sexually as well. During my trip to Nepal last week, activists suggested that as many as 90 percent of women and girls who have migrated from that country face such dual exploitation. I was encouraged that Ambassador CdeBaca alluded to these phenomena in his testimony today.

Second, the administration needs to ensure continued high-level support for U.S. diplomacy on trafficking issues. Making a difference in perennially difficult cases laid out in the TIP report will require high-level diplomatic intervention. For example, will human trafficking be raised at or around the president's summit with Prime Minister Singh of India later this year?

Mr. Chairman, I cannot emphasize too much the importance of combining the TIP report with robust diplomacy. Earlier this month, as Ambassador CdeBaca alluded to, Senegal successfully completed a first ever prosecution of those who are benefiting from child begging and Senegalese officials specifically stated that this prosecution occurred as a result of the TVPA.

I believe the testimony from all members of this panel suggest that U.S. diplomacy needs to move towards encouraging better implementation of local statutes and rule of law in order to make a real dent in human trafficking, a view I strongly endorse. This committee also has an important role in this effort. Every subcommittee should ensure that human trafficking is raised -- was raised when assistant secretaries from regional bureaus of State come to testify before them so that those responsible for day-to-day relations in the department are sensitized to the importance of this issue.

Third, you should keep an eye on diverging approaches to trafficking within the U.S. government. One of the reasons that it may appear that there's more focus on trafficking in labor exploitation is continuing differences within the executive branch on how to approach this issue, and I go into that more in my written testimony. Mr. Chairman, this debate is distracting government from its real work and should be resolved. Fourth, Mr. Chairman, as I lay out in my written testimony, you should ensure that the TIP report is not merged with other human rights reports and I'm happy to discuss that with you during the question and answer period.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, my written testimony has a number of additional suggestions regarding how U.S. law could be improved in the reauthorization bill the committee will consider next year. Let me just highlight one at this point. The U.S. should enhance civilian protection in humanitarian crises to prevent trafficking when the vulnerable population often increases.

Now, I think this really goes to the point that Ambassador CdeBaca raised about taking trafficking out of being a boutique issue and bringing it into some of the mainstream. In particular, Mr. Chairman, I believe the committee should support creating an emergency response fund for the TIP office that can be programmed as needed. This was demonstrated most tellingly this year after the Haiti earthquake. Rather than robbing Peter to pay Paul to address such urgent needs, an emergency fund should be established to deal with unanticipated humanitarian crises.

The Senate Appropriations Committee actually took a good first step this year by including language on this matter at the request of Senator Kerry. Institutionalizing such a fund in the TVPA could be an important contribution to saving lives. Mr. Chairman, the voices of the victims and survivors of human trafficking are indeed heard all too often from the shadows. We in civil society will work with you and this committee to ensure that we stay on the path to eradicating modern-day slavery, advancing the cause of human freedom. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and I stand ready to answer your questions.

REP. BERMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Abramowitz. Ambassador Lagon.

MR. LAGON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Royce, members of the committee, for inviting me to testify on a very important subject -- the slavery of today. I want to note that the committee has for years been committed to addressing the highest imperatives of human rights that transcend partisan lines and it weren't for -- if it weren't for members of this committee, noticeably, the indefatigable Mr. Smith there wouldn't be a Trafficking Victims Protection Act or a TIP office. So thank you.

On Page 7, the latest TIP report estimates that there are 1.8 trafficking victims for every 1,000 people in the world and that's based on a very conservative ILO estimate of 12.3 million victims globally, less than half of the estimate of scholar Kevin Bales. So think about it. At least one out of every 555 people in the world today is a human trafficking victim.

I'd like to comment on a couple of patterns today in the world, 10 years after the TVPA's creation of the TIP office and the Palermo Protocol, and then I'd like to offer recommendations in four key areas of action. First trend that I want to highlight relates to rule of law. The main tangible impact of the TVPA, the TIP's office diplomacy, and the Palermo Protocol have been passage of new laws addressing human trafficking in well over half the countries in the world and yet rule of law consists in so much more than law on the books whether in the United States or in the least developed countries.

The TIP report documents 7,992 prosecutions in the whole world in 2003 and then down to 5,506 prosecutions in 2009. And of those 5,506, only 432 were for labor-related trafficking. Prosecutions are limited. They're down from a few years ago and they're minimal for nonsexual exploitation. If we're to be plain, loss of effort is apparently not moving the needle of change a great deal. We need implementation of rule of law.

Secondly, I'm often asked where are the most significant places in the world for the human trafficking problem. One answer is India because of the -- of those 27 million people Kevin Bales estimates are trafficking victims in the world. Some two-thirds are there, chiefly in bonded labor. China is another answer due to migrating workers without a safety net, a female deficit -- as Congressman Smith referred to a Wild West kind of sex trade -- official discrimination against Uighurs and Tibetans, and the failure to treat North Koreans fleeing atrocious political and economic conditions as refugees.

East Asia is a particular concern because it's a focus of both labor and sex-related trafficking. And finally, the Gulf is a major flashpoint because if you're a woman or if you're a foreign guest worker or, worst of all, if you're both, you're likely to be treated as a lesser human in the Gulf. But despite all of these flashpoints and foci of trafficking, there are no lesser victims of trafficking. So I see another pattern 10 years after the TVPA which contributes to the needle -- the needle not moving as much to abolish slavery. It's the fissuring of efforts -- the siloing of focus on particular groups.

For instance, victims of forced labor are no less important than victims of sex trafficking, and vice versa. Sex trafficking is not the only source of exploitation and violence against women. Couple of examples. When I was executive director of the NGO Polaris Project, I met two Chinese women in Japan who were victimized for forced labor under a labor training program exempt from Japanese labor law.

Also with Polaris I met with an African woman who was a human trafficking victim served as a client by Polaris here in our country, right here in Washington. And she noted -- she thought it was charming how Americans talk so much about cruelty to animals, but some humans, like her, are treated worse than animals.

As the TIP officer director who I would say established the parity of emphasis on labor slavery, I hope the pendulum isn't swinging towards focus on labor to the exclusion of adult sex trafficking. On page eight of the 2010 TIP Report it emphasizes that prostitution is not trafficking. That may be counterproductive. I don't think prostitution is one and the same as slavery. But prostitution is the enabling environment of sex trafficking whether in brothels or seedy streets or until recently on Craigslist in the United States. Sex trafficking is the basic, enabling environment of men fueling demand for purchasing chiefly females. And that problem affects trafficking and the demand shouldn't lose attention.

There's another serious area of fishing. Despite what some at the Department of Labor or the ILO or some businesses think, crossing borders is not a necessary element of trafficking. Whether the family is freed from bond of labor that I met in Tamil Nadu, India or the Mexican girl I met who was prostituted as a minor in Chiapas, those are every -- that as much TIP victims as those who cross borders. The global fight for the dignity of human trafficking victims requires equal value and energy accordant to all of these victims.

Let me talk briefly about four things I think we need to do. First, we need to be an exemplar. When I was the TIP office director, essential premise was that the United States needed to be an exemplar in order to be an effective promoter of the anti-trafficking agenda internationally. I have very much had in mind the problem of U.S. detainee policy undercutting U.S. promotion of freedom and credible anti-terrorism policy. And that's a continuity between the different directors of GTIP and multiple administrations. Under last administration we put a profile of the United States into the TIP report. We disseminated the Department of Justice's annual report on the U.S. record widely, globally. And we got the Department of Justice to produce it in the same month as the TIP report. I'd really like to commend Secretary Clinton for going farther, for including a profile with a ranking, with a grade, and more lengthy recommendations about areas of weakness. Let's think about the problem at home.

ECPAT, the NGO commented recently in reading the profile of the United States in the TIP report that according to U.S. government statistics 2008 and 2009 almost three times as many prostituted children were arrested as offered protection and assistance in the United States. We've got to be an exemplar.

Secondly, persuading other governments to do more benefits from offering a helping hand. It's not fully appreciated, but the assistance to NGOs and the most efficacious international organizations like the IOM is as important part of U.S. policy as any. And that assistance should go directly to some governments too; those on tier two and two-tier watch list that have a will to change, but deserve help. I commend Ambassador CdeBaca for going to Africa on his first trip. It's a good signal because less developed African nations need not so much a grading on a curve in the TIP report as tangible assistance.

Being an exemplar and offering a helping hand are important complements to pressuring governments. But make no mistake pressuring governments we must. The TVPA has manifestly worked. In case after case we've seen how the report on the rankings have worked. Even among allies, unused to prodding from the United States, Turkey, Israel, the Philippines, the UAE, even Ireland as we see had recently appointing an anti-trafficking czar.

The Wilberforce TVPA reauthorization had a tremendously important and welcome provision and the time limit on Tier II watch list status. Please, please conduct --

REP. BERMAN: Sir, on the time limit.

MR. LAGON: Okay. I'll wrap up.

REP. BERMAN: No, no. Just for people -- on the time limit.

MR. LAGON: Yeah. I said that that was -- the time limit on Tier II watchlist countries was probably the most valuable thing that you and your colleagues including in the TVPA reauthorization.

I urge you to conduct oversight and how the department of state and the executive branch deal with that time limit because in fair mindedness you gave flexibility to the secretary of State and the executive branch to defer or overt an automatic tier-three ranking if the national interest was involved. Play your vigorous role as ever please in looking how that's --

And there's one other area for tougher love which I know my friend David Abramowitz agrees on. One of the places where trafficking for labor and victimization of women converge is right here on U.S. soil; diplomats mistreating domestic servants.

I met with a woman from Goa in India who was a human trafficking victim of a Kuwaiti official stationed here in the United States. She said to me across a table that the family treated her far worse as a domestic servant here in the United States than in Kuwait because they felt even less reason to think that they would face consequences in the United States than in a Gulf country. That should make us pause in horror. It was worse in our country because of the impunity delivered by diplomatic immunity. Congress has made crystal clear in the TVPA three times reauthorized that attention should be paid to government officials found complicit in human trafficking. That's what we're talking about here. And those cases should be cited specifically in the text of the TIP report.

One final recommendation. For 10 years governments, NGOs, and international organizations have been dedicating sizable efforts to fighting trafficking. More definite efforts, more definite results, more movement of the needle to squeeze trafficking and make it less profitable will come about if businesses work together to help.

Let me be totally transparent here. I've been a paid consultant for a business engaged in corporate responsibility work in this area, LexisNexis Inc. In a week and a half major businesses including LexisNexis from sectors as diverse as information technology, soft drinks, cosmetics, labor placement, energy, the auto industry, the airline industry, travel, entertainment, and legal publishing will meet to talk about the feasibility of forming a business coalition against human trafficking.

Businesses need to go farther than they have to date, not just dialogue with the government and the U.N., not just public awareness campaigns that don't involve any accountability for their own business operations, and not just single sector accountability efforts in apparel, electronics, chocolate, or hotels. We can end human trafficking if businesses are fully engaged. But if they're not or they're working in siloed sectors, we can't have that impact. Consumers will be -- are empowered by the Department of Labor report that indicates those goods tainted by forced and child labor. If consumers knew that some businesses were actually trying to fight human trafficking rather than being enablers, those businesses would benefit.

The TIP report and the TIP office have done a lot to take the issue of human trafficking out of the shadows. You might want to think here at the committee about how that office has done something that the state department has had terrible trouble with for 10 years: public diplomacy, raising up our universal values, offering the United States as a partner, engaging publics abroad. That's a model for other pol(sp). Thank you for holding this hearing for taking this critical issue out of the shadows all the more.

REP. BERMAN: Very good.

Dr. Uprety.

MS. UPRETY: Mr. Chairman, I want to thank you and other members of the committee for inviting me to testify today. Yes. And I really feel that I am representing not only my organization, Rural Health Education Service Trust and American Himalayan Foundation, but I'm also representing my brothers and sisters from Nepal who are trying their best to combat this problem of human trafficking.

And I would like to start with a story why I started this small organization. In 1992, when I was in Mumbai to take part in a international seminar on HIV/AIDS, we went to red light areas and found out that there were many Nepalese girls who were minors, and we talked with them if they would like to come back to Nepal. And one of the girls looked to us and said now it is too late for you to ask this question. If you had asked this question when we were still in our village, we had not (ph) by the beautiful dreams and if we had had education, maybe we didn't come here and then we would have been safe with our parents.

That statement, told to us with a very sad voice, made us feel that we had to do something in the villages where girls are treated very badly. They are not given the education. And all the time they have to do household work because of gender discrimination.

These girls are very much easily lured (to see ?) when they are asked to come to Bombay or any other beautiful cities. And that was the (seed ?) for my organization to be established. And after establishing this organization, which started with 54 girls, we have now grown up to 7,500 girls, and they are getting education in different places, in 400 schools of the government.

And at the same time, we are trying to raise the issue of girls' trafficking in many places with those girls, with the teachers, with the communities, with the parents. And we have found that it has been -- really worked very well. And when we talk about girls' trafficking, we used to think that it is only in India or in some Indian cities.

Now we have (felt ?) that it doesn't mean girls' trafficking not only to India, but even in other Middle East countries like Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, Malaysia, where girls, again, are lured by beautiful dreams that you are going to be house maid. You will have a lot of money. You will have a very easy job.

And once they land there, they find that they are victim of sexual abuse. They are not paid. And they have to be repeatedly abused by the owners. And about only two months ago we had very sad incident from Lebanon, where 15 Nepalese women had committed suicide because they were sexually exploited by their owners. And they went there with the hope and dreams that they will earn at least $300 per month. But instead of that, their dead bodies came back to Nepal. And it was only because they were illiterate. They did not know where they were going, and they were very much -- very easily cheated by the companies who took them.

That's why we are trying to put so much emphasis on awareness and education of the girls. And we have found that if the girls can be stayed in school, and if she will know that -- if she will go somewhere, other places, without knowing what she's going to do, without knowing with whom she is going, she can be the victim of sexual abuse, forced labor, and be the victim of HIV-AIDS.

That's why we and many of my friends are trying to raise the issue at the national level as well as in the southeastern countries. And with a strong lobby of our nongovernmental organizations and the media, the Nepalese government has started to bring some good things. And one of that is, to raise the issue in the national level, they have made a special rapporteur of human trafficking in human-rights organizations. And they now publish every year what are the problems and how it can be handled.

And they have also started working -- we have also started working together with the police force in the border area. If they find that there are some women and girls who look innocent and who don't know where they are going, they stop them and find out what they are doing, where they are going. And if they are not satisfied with the -- (inaudible) -- and answers, they bring them back to their parents.

And this issue has really made some progress. And we are proud to say that it has really helped us in some way. But still we have a long way to go, because when we talk about forced labor and sexual trafficking, there is a big mafia with international organization, as well as lack of political commitment from our government, has really made this program in some ways weak, though we are trying our hard -- we are trying our best. But not all the time political people and members of Parliament listen to us, and they think that it is not that big a problem.

But we think that in 21 century, it is slavery. And if a woman -- if a girl -- (inaudible) -- a victim of sex labor and if she's trafficked, it is shameful for our country. It is shameful for our nation. And that's why we are trying our best to do that.

And we have found that among those people, girls who are trafficked, they mostly are there from indigenous groups and from the Dalit communities. And from the (literacy research ?), it has been found that Dalit communities are where the girls and women have literacy rates as low as 3 percent only. It means that they are very easily lured by the beautiful things.

And that's what we are trying to, with help of American Himalayan Foundation, to give education to those girls so that they will be in the schools and they would learn about the problems. They would learn about (skills ?), about their life.

And we have found that we have been successful in some cases, though, as they say, a thousand -- a long journey has to start with a single step. We are trying our best to start this long journey, and we feel that international organizations and American government really can do a lot to prevent this.

And one of that is to make the Stop Girl Trafficking Program very effective. It has to go through the community, and not only in the (policy level ?), but in the villages, in the suburbs, where it is for the people, especially for the traffickers, who can go very easily. But for the people, it is difficult to go there, because sometimes we have to walk about two to three days to reach those places. But traffickers are so smart that they can go very easily.

But we have to make sure -- we have to make plans and programs that we also can -- (inaudible) -- and make (always ?) people about this issue of 21 century -- the problems, the challenges which they have to face if they will be lured by those beautiful dreams.

So, Mr. Chairman, I am very happy to be here to give testimony. And I sincerely hope that with help of U.S. government and other international organizations, we will be able to combat these problems.

Thank you.

REP. BERMAN: Thank you very much.

Ms. Misra.

MS. MISRA: Thank you, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, for this opportunity to present to you the Solidarity Center's view of human trafficking from a labor perspective. My very proud immigrant mother also thanks you.

The Solidarity Center is an international NGO that promotes and protects worker rights around the world, working in over 60 countries last year. As a worker-rights organization, the Solidarity Center has seen first-hand how violations of worker rights and lack of labor standards and protections for workers make them vulnerable to human trafficking.

Human trafficking is a labor issue, because it is often linked to various forms of labor exploitation, and it is one of the worst forms of worker abuse.

In 2010, a slave is not necessarily a person in chains or shackles. Slavery is not simply ownership of one person over another. Modern-day slavery can be much more subtle. Trafficking victims toil in factories that produce products that are exported to the United States. They harvest vegetables and process food that ends up on our dining-room tables. They pick crops or mine minerals that are raw materials in the products we buy. They make the clothes and the shoes that we wear. They clean people's homes and take care of the young, elderly and sick. They are enslaved not only through physical restraints, but also through coercion, fear and intimidation. In today's global economy, workers can be enslaved by threats of deportation, lack of viable alternatives, and especially debt.

There are many facets that make labor trafficking thrive around the world, and I just want to mention a few of these. One of them is the particular vulnerability of immigrants or migrant workers to human trafficking. Unsafe migration processes and the lack of labor or legal protections from immigrant workers make them easy targets for traffickers in the form of unscrupulous labor recruiters and employers.

Migrant workers are specifically excluded from the protection of labor laws in many countries simply because of their foreign status or because of the sector that they work in, including in the United States, such as domestic work or agriculture.

Traffickers take advantage of this exclusion and the failure to monitor and enforce laws in sectors where migrant workers or immigrant workers work, and this increases the vulnerability of these workers to human trafficking.

And it's not just undocumented immigrant workers that are vulnerable, but we are increasingly seeing in the United States and around the world legal immigrant workers being trafficked under what are called either temporary or guest worker programs.

There are inherent structural flaws in temporary or guest worker programs around the world that increases the vulnerability of foreign immigrant workers to trafficking, such as being tied to a particular employer that doesn't allow you, if your employer is abusing you, to leave. If you do try to leave, you face deportation.

A common theme for both undocumented and documented migrant workers, Mr. Chairman, is what you mentioned in your opening remarks, which I'd like to highlight, which is the role of labor recruiters and debt bondage. It really is increasingly around the world where we are seeing the use by employers and by workers who are seeking to find work outside of their homes, they're using labor recruiters, and these labor recruiters are charging thousands of dollars to workers for the privilege of laboring for somebody else. And it's really these fees and these charges that are being placed on workers that is creating the situation of debt bondage.

Another area that I'd like to emphasize where labor trafficking is thriving is within supply chains. It's difficult to quantify the exact number of trafficking victims that work in global supply chains, but as supply chains reach down to smaller and smaller suppliers, the chances increase that trafficking victims are part of the labor force. Solidarity Center believes the most effective way to eliminate forced labor, debt bondage and other forms of slavery in supply chains is by empowering workers to have a voice in the workplace and supporting the right to organize and join unions.

The existence of codes of conduct in multinational corporations' policies has failed to curtail trafficking practice in a number of sectors, including garment, textiles, agriculture and seafood processing. There's no easy solution to this problem, but we know that a key deterrence is the ability of unions and labor rights organizations to shine a light on these practices through on-the-ground investigations.

We believe that it's important for Congress and the administration to support such monitoring efforts and the efforts of workers to monitor their own workplaces. In order to get rid of trafficking in supply chains, we have to focus on corporate accountability and not just corporate social responsibility.

Governments also must play a major role in eliminating slavery in supply chains. There are examples around the world of government reluctance to hold employers accountable for trafficking in the workplace. When they do address trafficking for labor exploitation in a supply chain, they often blame the labor recruiter and don't hold the end user, the employer who's exploiting the worker, liable for that trafficking. When cases are prosecuted, they often result in just small fines and no jail time for the perpetrators, which is barely a deterrent for exploitative employers.

I'd also like to emphasize the importance of the Trafficking in Persons report in highlighting labor trafficking. I've dealt with a lot of governments around the world who complain to me about the Trafficking in Persons report, but I have to tell you that it's been extremely important in Solidarity Center's work in being able to leverage and push governments to address issues of labor trafficking. Without this report, without being able to point to it, and having cases such as in the Gulf, where legal migrant workers are trafficked for forced labor, it would be very difficult to get these governments to move.

Just in closing in the interest of time, I'd just like to highlight a few key initiatives that I think we need to focus on to address labor trafficking. These include forming labor and other laws to include and protect immigrants and domestic workers. Also, we have to pay equal attention not just to passing better laws but also implementing, monitoring and enforcing these laws. This includes a greater role for labor inspectors.

Labor inspectors must be engaged in and be an integral part of law enforcement initiatives to combat human trafficking. I think the countries where literally there have been five to 10 labor inspectors for an entire country to monitor the situation for migrant workers, and that's just not going to help us solve this problem. In addition, labor inspectors have to be given special training to know how, when they go into workplaces, what are the questions they need to ask that go beyond just the initial questions to find trafficking in the workplace.

We need to ensure that victims of labor trafficking not only participate in criminal prosecutions but are also given access to civil suits where they can get withheld or back wages. As I said earlier, we have to ensure that employers are held accountable for their role in labor trafficking, and that they are held accountable not just for what they do but also for what the labor recruiters that they hire and the subcontractors that they hire, the abuses that they commit in their supply chain.

We have to place greater emphasis on safer migration processes for workers, and we have to have increased scrutiny of imports and exports to ensure that goods made from slave labor are not allowed into the marketplace. This also includes reviewing and reworking the role of ICE in overseas inspections.

We have to have strict regulation of labor recruiters and employment agencies, and we must have a strict policy of no fees being charged to workers, period. We have to extend meaningful whistleblower protections to trafficked workers, which allow workers and their representatives to enforce all state, federal, local and employment laws, as well as the conditions in workers' contracts, without having to face deportation or removal.

And finally, we need to put increased pressure and monitoring on states to include trafficking for labor exploitation into anti-trafficking laws and regulations, and to increase prosecutions of labor traffickers, including employers, as perpetrators of human trafficking. Thank you, and I look forward to your questions.

REP. BERMAN: Thank you very much. You're talking about lot of issues that I've been interested in for a long time. Dr. D'souza.

MS. D'SOUZA: Thank you, Congressman Berman, for organizing this most significant hearing and inviting me to be here today with this distinguished panel. I would like to speak about India's progress in combating human trafficking, the challenges looming ahead, and four approaches to the crisis that are seeing success.

Of the 28 million people around the world that the U.N. considers human slaves, the U.N. recognizes that most live in India and most are Dalit. Today, Dalits are the largest number of people categorized as modern-day slaves, so we really cannot have a discussion about human trafficking and not look at India and regard the problem of the Dalits.

Because of their poverty and the resulting desperation and lack of options, trafficking is not simply a problem the Dalits face. It is an atrocity that has swept Dalit culture in all parts of the nation. Debt bondage is the Dalit destiny most feared and is inherent in every Dalit village and in the life of every Dalit person. Their lack of access to education, health care and a living wage leaves most Dalits resigned to a hopelessness that, without an intervention, will not change.

The 2010 TIP report placed India on the Tier II watchlist for the seventh year, and defined it as a nation in which the number of victims of severe forms of trafficking is very significant, or is significantly increasing.

I am the daughter of a Dalit woman. I have dedicated my life to joining others in my country to end Dalit trafficking. Despite the bleakness of the situation, especially for India's 250 million Dalits, India is making progress in combating human trafficking. First and most notably, the country's top leaders have spoken into the public record that human trafficking is India's number-one social problem, with estimates of 100 million people involved.

REP. BERMAN: Who has said that?

DR. D'SOUZA: This has been --

REP. BERMAN: Government, you say?

DR. D'SOUZA: Yes, our rural minister.

REP. BERMAN: Thank you.

DR. D'SOUZA: A crisis that should be dealt with by all stakeholders with a stern and iron hand. Second, there are committed individuals using their position to end this crisis. The 2010 TIP report recognized Mr. Sattaru Umaphathi as one of the nine global heroes. An anti-human trafficking officer, he led rescue operations, contributed to multiple convictions, forged partnerships with NGOs and educated his state law enforcement community about victim rights. He is a true champion for victims everywhere.

Third, dedicated NGOs are combating trafficking through rescue and restore, as well as preventive and preemptive programs. The NGO with which I am affiliated, the Dalit Freedom Network, and all its India partners are driving into the problem some -- (inaudible) -- and seeing results. But there are still major challenges looming ahead for India. As we anticipate the publication of the 2011 TIP report, we recognize that India is at serious risk for demotion to Tier III if significant efforts at improvement are not initiated and registered in the next six months.

Only 7 percent of India's police personnel have received anti-trafficking training. The government's anti-human-trafficking units lack sufficient personnel and funding. The existing laws, while substantive, do not focus on the rights or needs of victims. There are a low number of prosecutions and convictions of known traffickers.

Due to lack of time I will conclude with four approaches that are gaining traction and can serve as a template for other nations. First, we are seeing that the end of trafficking begins with education. Education changes a nation. The education of India's most vulnerable children becomes the most significant means of preventing the selling and exploitation of these children into the workforce and the sex trade. Re-educate Dalit children so that they are worth more than the meagre income they can make in the factories employing them.

To date there are 100 of these schools and nearly 25,000 children enrolled.

Approximately 30 percent of the children are children of bonded laborers. They are studying hard, learning English and preparing for a higher education and a future that does not know desperate poverty. Education is a pre-emptive strike in any nation in which its most vulnerable children are at risk for being trafficked.

Second, the end of trafficking draws near when we economically empower marginalized populations. No longer are prostitution and debt bondage the only options for the poor. Dalits are being trained in marketable skills, finance management, and being offered micro loans to establish their own businesses and earn enough income so that they do not fall prey to fraudulent money lenders that demand exorbitant interest so that even a small loan can never be repaid. We cannot underestimate the horrors that follow when poor parents are forced to sell their own children in an attempt to pay down their debts.

Third, human trafficking is deterred when societies pursue health care for all its citizens. Preventative healthcare, health hygiene, HIV and AIDS education, safe labor practices all promote healthy communities and produce (healthy ?) economic factors. Most Dalits are forced into debt bondage because of a medical crisis that could have been avoided through proper health care.

Finally, we find that advocacy efforts in India and abroad are yielding positive results and should continue to be specific and targeted, beginning with internal advocacy before the Indian government and extending to our international allies who seek to stand with us before their own government in our united efforts to end human Dalit trafficking.

Thank you again, Congressman Berman and this committee.

REP. BERMAN: Well, thank you all very much. It's fascinating and important.

I'm going to yield five minutes to my colleague Mr. Royce for question -- to begin the questioning.

REP. EDWARD R. ROYCE (R-CA): Thank you, Mr. Chairman, very much.

And I'll ask Dr. D'souza a question now. Your written testimony, in your written testimony you mentioned that Prime Minister Singh's statement, his statement was: Even after 60 years of constitutional and legal protection and support, there is still social discrimination against Dalits in many parts of our country. Dalits have faced a unique discrimination in our society that is fundamentally different from the problems of minority groups in general.

That was his quote. I was going to ask you, how important was his statement and how has it affected the treatment of Dalits as a consequence of that statement.

MS. D'SOUZA: Yes. I think Prime Minister Singh has deserved an accolade for his bold statement and being bold enough to address the issue of human trafficking and the relationship to the Dalit atrocities and the Dalit situation in India.

I think the entire issue of Dalits has been a political issue in the Indian government ever since we've had our independence, and by boldly declaring that as an issue, it has led to more pre-emptive measures both from within the government as well as with the non-governmental organizations to deal with this significant problem.

REP. ROYCE: Do you think it has changed in any significant way the perception and that maybe led to a situation where Dalits are less susceptible to human trafficking? Do you think it has an impact among Dalits and among society in general that it's assisted?

MS. D'SOUZA: Absolutely. I think by Prime Minister Singh addressing and accepting the issue (of Dalits ?) from the Indian government stance has been seen very welcoming -- very welcome by the Dalit community, the fact that they're being quantified. The fact that they're being addressed and their rights are being discussed has been very significant.

REP. ROYCE: The question I was going to ask you too, the TIP report, they find certain heroes. and one that they elevate that you mentioned, Saturu -- do I say Humapati (sp)?

MS. D'SOUZA: That's right.

REP. ROYCE: Okay. And he's the anti-human trafficking officer in Andhra Pradesh. And his work, of course, has led to multiple convictions of human traffickers. And a lot of NGOs now across India, you know, sort of formed a partnership as a result of his activity, I think, and in Tamil Nadu, as well. But, you know, aside from highlighting his good work, how can we export some of the lessons; you know, how do we -- how do we expand on what's being done in those states and get other states involved? What are some of the ideas that might suffice to build the momentum on this?

MS. D'SOUZA: Well, again, I would like to appreciate what has been discussed by Ambassador Deehun (ph), and the the initial thought was about how trafficking should not be seen as a (boutique ?) issue but more a basic primary human right issue; and how, by accolading Humapati, we (are creating ?) various law enforcement agencies within our country, different states across the country to look at it as a significant issue and to increase its behavior to exchange information, to exchange resources, to exchange best practices. That's the way to go ahead.

REP. ROYCE: But we find that some of the answers here in the United States too is training of law enforcement. What was the percentage you gave on training today in trafficking?

MS. D'SOUZA: It's about 7 percent of our police personnel.

REP. ROYCE: Yeah.

MS. D'SOUZA: It's only 7 percent of our police personnel that have had adequate training in regard to dealing with victims of human trafficking.

REP. ROYCE: And your point is, of course, if that became a focus along with primarily education, the education of young women and the young people and their equal opportunities for education --

MS. D'SOUZA: That's right.

REP. ROYCE: -- that that, more than anything else, would -- how would you -- what are some of the ways that we might be able to promote the advocacy for education for everybody in society, including Dalits?

MS. D'SOUZA: Again, access, advocating for education and making sure it is accessible to everybody. In our country or in other kinds of -- other different countries where you have so many social injustices all connected and so intertwined that it seems impossible to actually do any progress, you have to work together in a concerted manner to ensure equal opportunity, whether it is access to education or that it's access to universal healthcare, because these are the really critical roots that will actually ensure development happening.

REP. ROYCE: Thank you very much, Dr. D'souza. Thank you again, Mr. Chairman.

REP. BERMAN: Thank you. And I yield myself time.

The -- we are approaching this moment where I have to leave. I would love to -- great thing about being the last person and the chairman is if I have the time, there is material I'd like to pursue for the next half hour with you, and I'm not going to be able to. But there was an interesting connection between much of the testimony that all of you gave, in a certain way, even though different things were focused on.

So Ambassador Lagon talks about the focus on the prosecution side of it, and raises the implication of are we doing enough in the -- in the area of both protection and prevention. And then Dr. Uprety describes a very specific situation of young Nepalese women and girls lured by their dreams and there is nothing in the -- in their education at home or in school that points out the dangers of what could befall you; and how many people -- how many people could avoid being victims of human trafficking by just focusing on that aspect of making people aware of the pitfalls of doing some of those things that they are enticed to do at a point where you -- they still are not in harm's way.

And then Dr. D'souza adds the notion that maybe you also need a component of other alternatives, not just the warnings of what could befall you, but the notion there is a -- there are other opportunities and other avenues. And then Ms. Misra -- I mean, I've been very interested in the issues of migrant labor and how to deal with the exploitation that comes from it, but the point that all of you, and particularly Ms. Misra have driven home is that exploitation turns into a slavery trafficking kind of -- it's a fairly thin line between getting shorted on your paycheck and in the end being held in the sense in bondage.

And we've talked about how do you get through some of this. If you're going to have guest worker programs to deal with labor shortages in certain areas, like (farms ?), to what extent could the United States and Mexico -- could Mexico as a government be the source of selection -- protection of the workers who would be coming over, rather than private recruiters working on behalf of grower interests here but charging the person more than, in effect, the grower for bringing them in?

If you could turn it into a bit of a government-to-government thing, you could avoid many of those issues, and the notion that you are stuck in that situation with one employer and that your alternatives are staying there under what could be horrid conditions or going back to your home country rather than that person knowing that he could lose the worker to another grower or employer who isn't engaging in those kinds of practices could be a great deterrent.

So these are very interesting themes.

I want to ask Mr. Abramowitz one question. You talked in your testimony urging us focusing on the importance of the administration's implementation of the new features of the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2008 relating to moving countries from Two Tier watch list to Tier Three, where the sanctions would apply, and the question of presidential waivers. Spell that out a little bit.

MR. ABRAMOWITZ: Well, Mr. Chairman --

REP. BERMAN: What -- what are -- what should we be concerned about here?

MR. ABRAMOWITZ: Well, Mr. Chairman, I think this came up in several of the other testimonies, including Ambassador Lagon as well as Dr. D'souza. As was referenced under the TVPRA of 2008, it amended the Trafficking Victims Protection Act so that rather than countries being able to stay on the Tier Two watch list forever, which has been the situation with a number of countries, including India, China, Russia, after two years they're going to have to go down to Tier Three if they haven't been able to (move up ?).

And I think that this is going to cause a lot of hydraulic pressure on the Trafficking in Persons office to try to find ways to, for example, as Mr. Royce suggested might have happened to Cambodia, that to move them up from the Tier

Two watch list up to Tier Two so that they can avoid that because this is the second year for a number of those countries.

The alternative to that, though, is, is if it's determined that there's no real progress being made, let's say, within India because it goes from 7 percent to 7.1 percent, the number of police officers trained, then those countries are going to fall down to Tier Three and therefore be subject to sanctions.

I'd rather have an honest assessment -- have the countries fall down, and then the president make a determination as to whether assistance needs to be cut off or not. However, I do think that there's some risk that if a number of countries do go down to this -- to Tier Three and there's a wide range of waivers that the president then implements because in India they need -- we need to do cooperation with or Russia we need to continue democracies -- (inaudible) -- whatever the national interest is, then I think there's a possibility that people will say, oh -- officials in foreign countries will say, oh, this is not a big problem, because we'll just -- the president will just waive for us.

I do think that the name and shame issue remains something that is a very, very powerful motivator. It's not just because of the threat of sanctions but Ambassador CdeBaca said today that the threat of sanctions is a component of that. So my own view is is that we need to try to see if the administration will not only continue honest assessment but also will look at maybe perhaps targeted waivers of assistance that really go to pushing forward rather than just wholesale waivers in the national interest.

REP. BERMAN: My time has more than expired. I didn't realize the gentlelady was here. Could I invite the gentlelady to take over the questioning and the chair because I have to go to someplace you may be joining me at very soon.

REP. SHEILA JACKSON LEE (D-TX): (Off mike.)

REP. BERMAN: All right. The gentlelady is recognized for three minutes.

REP. JACKSON LEE: Okay. I did not want to miss this hearing, Mr. Chairman, because I think the issues before us are so very vital, and I had an overlapping immigration hearing that likewise is facing a number of concerns. So let me -- let me say that human trafficking is the most dastardly attack on human dignity and the values that one holds for the respect we have for humanity. We cannot describe it any way other than that it cuts off and extinguishes the life of someone without killing them and particularly women who are vulnerable and with great -- women and children in particular. And we were holding a hearing in the Judiciary Committee on human trafficking in the United States so we're none -- none of us are immune from this.

And I want to thank the chairman for this hearing. Coming out of the shadows is very important. Let me ask two questions, and -- I'm just selectively, David, because we have worked together -- to highlight the vileness of it. But what should our first aim be if we want to take the high goal of extinguishing human trafficking around the world? And then if I could ask Aruna, if you would likewise tell us the lowest ebb that victims fall into and what we should do for those victims. David?

MR. ABRAMOWITZ: Thank you, Ms. Jackson Lee. It's very hard because there are so many different interventions that we need to consider. I think what Dr. Uprety is doing in terms of trying to educate women and girls in particular and also offering, as was said, some hope for the future through talking about additional educational opportunities and so on -- an important part of the prevention piece.

I think that in terms of trying to ensure that we use our diplomacy to try to make sure that discriminated populations, like Dr. D'souza said, are really highlighted I think that, you know, Mr. Royce, one of the things that we should think about is trying to see if the president can raise the issue of the Dalits in some way. I think if, you know, the First Lady were to meet with Dalits while she was in India that would have an amazing --

REP. JACKSON LEE: Raise the issue -- I'm sorry.

MR. ABRAMOWITZ: Of Dalits. That is the discriminated populations in India that have historical social discrimination against them. If she were to meet with a Dalit population to talk about the importance of education those kinds of steps can have an important impact on raising issues in ways that are difficult to quantify but I think can have a real impact. I'll just leave it.

REP. JACKSON LEE: Thank you.

MR. ABRAMOWITZ: Turn it over to Dr. Uprety.

REP. JACKSON LEE: Thank you very much. Doctor?

MS. UPRETY: From my discussion with police officers before I came here we have found that girls below 12 were -- had also been trafficked, and from my personal experience when I had been in some places where children are trafficked for the circus, a nine-year-old girl had been trafficked to -- from a district of Nepal to India, and later when -- and after two or three years after a lot of -- (inaudible) -- she came back and now she is one of our students. So if we looked at -- children below 10 can also be trafficked and 12, 13, also can be trafficked and that is -- and that is the saddest part of this human trafficking.

REP. JACKSON LEE: So we need to, in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, take this to the highest level of our psychic, be as hostile against it as possible, and let people know that when you're trafficked you're also sexually violated and abused. And I join you. I know the First Lady has many issues. She's an eloquent spokesperson, and so I would like to join in that effort and join also as raising my voice against this dastardly deed. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, and thank you for this hearing.

REP. BERMAN: Thank you. Thank you. And while I would really love to pursue some of these things more, we can't. Since I'm not going to be able to (come there ?) we're going to rush off to a -- something else. I think all three of us have to do that. We are very grateful you came. We're going to follow up on your testimony and your suggestions and take it very seriously and maybe even raise this issue in our next meeting. Thank you very much.

MR. ABRAMOWITZ: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

LOAD-DATE: October 1, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

39 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

September 29, 2010 Wednesday

President says Philippines to step up fight against human trafficking

LENGTH: 496 words

Text of report in English by Philippine newspaper The Philippine Star website on 29 September

[Report by Aurea Calica: "Aquino Vows To Step Up Fight vs Human Trafficking"]

Manila, Philippines -President Aquino said the government would vigorously go after human traffickers and that some of those engaged in the illegal activity would be immediately arrested.

The President said in San Francisco, California that the Department of Labour and Employment, Department of Foreign Affairs, and the Department of Justice were all working to curb human trafficking.

"There are ongoing efforts to run after those engaged in human trafficking," Aquino said.

The President disclosed that he has been looking into the issue for a while now because he received reports last year that only four complaints were filed against a human trafficker who allegedly victimized hundreds.

He did not give details but said: "I'm waiting for an arrest soon."

The President said the law against human trafficking was tough and must be implemented to protect Filipinos from getting victimized.

The Philippines remains on the US [United States] government's human trafficking watch list due to the country's inefficient judicial system and corruption in government.

In its 2010 human trafficking report released last June, the US State Department retained the Philippines in the "Tier 2 watch list" that indicates that the country does not fully comply with, but is making significant efforts to meet, the agency's standards.

"The Philippines is a source country, and to a much lesser extent, a destination and transit country for men, women, and children who are subjected to trafficking in persons, specifically forced prostitution and forced labour," the report said.

The report cited an inefficient judicial system and corruption in government, especially in agencies tasked to solve the human trafficking problem, as the reasons for the Philippines' ranking.

"Widespread corruption and an inefficient judicial system continue to severely limit the prosecution of trafficking cases. The vast majority of initiated trafficking prosecutions are usually unsuccessful, largely due to lack of evidence after victims disappear or withdraw cooperation," the report said.

The Philippines, which has been in the US's human trafficking watch list since 2001, lacks a method to fast-track trafficking cases in its courts, the report said.

It noted that Philippine courts currently have over 380 pending or ongoing human trafficking cases, and that despite legal provisions designed to ensure a timely judicial process, "trafficking cases in the Philippines take an average of three to four years to conclude."

The US State Department recommended to Philippine authorities to demonstrate greater progress on investigating, prosecuting, and convicting both labour and sex trafficking offenders.

It said the government should provide more resources to curb the problem.

Source: The Philippine Star website, Manila, in English 29 Sep 10

LOAD-DATE: September 29, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2010 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

40 of 404 DOCUMENTS

PrairiePundit

September 24, 2010 Friday 10:51 AM EST

China complicit in North brutality

BYLINE: Merv

LENGTH: 399 words

Sep. 24, 2010 (Prairie Pundit delivered by Newstex) --
Washington Times:

China is partially to blame for North Korea's human rights violations because of its policy of sending North Korean refugees back to the isolated communist dictatorship, members of a congressional panel said Thursday.

"What China is doing ... is brutal," said Rep. Frank R. Wolf, Virginia Republican and co-chairman of the Tom Lantos Human Rights Commission, at Thursday's hearing at the Rayburn House Office Building. "This administration has lost its voice. It's silent on these issues."

While Beijing has long been North Korea's sole source of outside diplomatic support, the repatriation policy makes China's complicity deeper, said Rep. Christopher H. Smith, New Jersey Republican.

Mr. Smith recommended that China be placed on the State Department's list of "Tier 3 Countries" on matters of human trafficking. A nation in that category "does not fully comply with the minimum standards [to fight trafficking] and is not making significant efforts to do so," which would enable the U.S. to place economic sanctions on China, which is currently on the "Tier 2" watch list.

Because, among other reasons, the Chinese government offers bounties of up to $1,400 to families who report North Korean defectors, about 90 percent are caught, Mr. Smith said.

Nongovernmental organizations want to bring North Korea to trial for crimes against humanity in the International Criminal Court, said Rep. Jim McGovern, Massachusetts Democrat and the commission's other co-chairman.

Graphic pictures drawn by an unnamed North Korean defector were used to demonstrate the atrocities North Korea performs against its citizens who have been deported by the Chinese government.

Among other things, the pictures showed a prisoner being forced to pick through a cow's manure to find kernels of corn, a prisoner being hung upside down and kicked in the stomach by a guard, and a pregnant woman having a wooden board placed across her body while two other prisoners jumped on either side of the board to force an abortion.

...China probably fears that a failure to return the defectors will result in even more defectors. That maybe true, but it is hardly an excuse for being an accessory to wanton brutality. It is hard to imagine a worse fate than being a North Korean returned to the terror state after escaping.

Newstex ID: PRAI-0001-49036766

LOAD-DATE: September 24, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

NOTES: The views expressed on blogs distributed by Newstex and its re-distributors ("Blogs on DemandÆ") are solely the author's and not necessarily the views of Newstex or its re-distributors. Posts from such authors are provided "AS IS", with no warranties, and confer no rights. The material and information provided in Blogs on DemandÆ are for general information only and should not, in any respect, be relied on as professional advice. No content on such Blogs on DemandÆ is "read and approved" before it is posted. Accordingly, neither Newstex nor its re-distributors make any claims, promises or guarantees about the accuracy, completeness, or adequacy of the information contained therein or linked to from such blogs, nor take responsibility for any aspect of such blog content. All content on Blogs on DemandÆ shall be construed as author-based content and commentary. Accordingly, no warranties or other guarantees will be offered as to the quality of the opinions, commentary or anything else offered on such Blogs on DemandÆ. Reader's comments reflect their individual opinion and their publication within Blogs on DemandÆ shall not infer or connote an endorsement by Newstex or its re-distributors of such reader's comments or views. Newstex and its re-distributors expressly reserve the right to delete posts and comments at its and their sole discretion.

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Blog

Copyright 2010 Newstex LLC
All Rights Reserved
Newstex Web Blogs
Copyright 2010 PrairiePundit

41 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Washington Times

September 24, 2010 Friday

Repatriation policy links China to rights violations; Beijing shares blame with N. Korea, lawmakers say

BYLINE: By Andrew Entzminger THE WASHINGTON TIMES

SECTION: A, NATION; Pg. 5

LENGTH: 521 words

China is partially to blame for North Korea's human rights violations because of its policy of sending North Korean refugees back to the isolated communist dictatorship, members of a congressional panel said Thursday.

"What China is doing ... is brutal," said Rep. Frank R. Wolf, Virginia Republican and co-chairman of the Tom Lantos Human Rights Commission, at Thursday's hearing at the Rayburn House Office Building. "This administration has lost its voice. It's silent on these issues."

While Beijing has long been North Korea's sole source of outside diplomatic support, the repatriation policy makes China's complicity deeper, said Rep. Christopher H. Smith, New Jersey Republican.

Mr. Smith recommended that China be placed on the State Department's list of "Tier 3 Countries" on matters of human trafficking. A nation in that category "does not fully comply with the minimum standards [to fight trafficking] and is not making significant efforts to do so," which would enable the U.S. to place economic sanctions on China, which is currently on the "Tier 2" watch list.

Because, among other reasons, the Chinese government offers bounties of up to $1,400 to families who report North Korean defectors, about 90 percent are caught, Mr. Smith said.

Nongovernmental organizations want to bring North Korea to trial for crimes against humanity in the International Criminal Court, said Rep. Jim McGovern, Massachusetts Democrat and the commission's other co-chairman.

Graphic pictures drawn by an unnamed North Korean defector were used to demonstrate the atrocities North Korea performs against its citizens who have been deported by the Chinese government.

Among other things, the pictures showed a prisoner being forced to pick through a cow's manure to find kernels of corn, a prisoner being hung upside down and kicked in the stomach by a guard, and a pregnant woman having a wooden board placed across her body while two other prisoners jumped on either side of the board to force an abortion.

Defector Bahng Mi-sun told the panel through a translator that while North Korean dictator Kim Jong-il is to blame for the atrocities, "isn't it also the fault of [Chinese President] Hu Jintao whose government arrests North Korean defector women and forcibly repatriates them?"

Because of the treatment of North Koreans in China, I "wanted to actually find ways to stop women from having to go to China," Ms. Bahng said. "I had not even known that I had human rights before I came to South Korea."

Jo Jin-hae, another North Korean defector who testified through a translator, said she was "not sharing my testimony here at this place to solicit your pity, or for you to feel sorry for me."

Instead, she said, "my reason for being here today is to ask the people in the world and all of you here, to come together and concentrate your efforts to help with this situation, so that there will be no more children who suffered like I did."

The Tom Lantos Human Rights Commission is a bipartisan special House panel named for the late Rep. Tom Lantos, the only Holocaust survivor to serve in Congress and a longtime human rights crusader.

LOAD-DATE: September 23, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 The Washington Times LLC
All Rights Reserved

42 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BusinessWorld

September 17, 2010 FridayVictims saved*SECTION: Pg. S1/11LENGTH: 118 words

OVER 200 female victims of trafficking were rescued in a raid Wednesday in Angeles City, Pampanga. In a press conference, Justice Secretary Leila M. de Lima yesterday said a total of 268 victims, including at least 15 minors, were found in a series of raids in 10 night clubs. Officials from the Department of Interior and Local Government, Philippine National Police, National Bureau of Investigation and the Interagency Council Against Trafficking, headed by the Department of Justice, took part in the raid. She said the raids are part of the intensified anti- trafficking campaign in response to the US State Department's "Tier 2 watch list" rank for the Philippines in its 2010 report on human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: September 16, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 BusinessWorld Publishing Corporation
All Rights Reserved

43 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

September 14, 2010 Tuesday

USA to withhold funding to North Korea over human trafficking

LENGTH: 577 words

Text of report in English by South Korean news agency Yonhap

WASHINGTON, Sept. 13 (Yonhap) - President Barack Obama said Monday the US will withhold funding for North Korea and several other countries for their poor human rights records involving human trafficking.

In a memorandum, Obama said, under the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000, he made "the determination, with respect to Cuba, the Democratic People's Republic of North Korea (DPRK), Eritrea and Iran, not to provide certain assistance for those countries' governments for Fiscal Year 2011, until such governments comply with the minimum standards or make significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance."

Also affected are Burma, Zimbabwe, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the Dominican Republic, Kuwait, Mauritania, Papua New Guinea, Saudi Arabia and Sudan, the memorandum said.

The countries were categorized in June by the State Department's "2010 Trafficking in Persons Report" as "Tier 3 countries" that "do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so" under the Trafficking Victims Protection Act.

The US government has imposed financial sanctions and a ban on humanitarian aid on Tier 3 countries for two straight years. North Korea has been on the list since 2003.

South Korea was listed among Tier 1 countries, which fully comply with the minimum standards on human trafficking.

"The Democratic People's Republic of Korea is a source country for men, women and children who are subjected to trafficking in persons, specifically forced labour and forced prostitution," the human trafficking report said. "The most common form of trafficking involves North Korean women and girls forced into marriage or prostitution in China. Women and girls from North Korea migrate to China, often with the help of a facilitator, seeking food, work, freedom and better life prospects."

China has been under criticism for repatriating North Korean refugees under a secret agreement with North Korea, categorizing defectors as economic immigrants rather than refugees, despite the danger of them being persecuted back home.

"If found by Chinese authorities, victims are deported back to North Korea, where they may face harsh punishment, and may be subject to forced labour in DPRK labour camps," the report said. "NGOs and researchers estimate that tens of thousands of undocumented North Koreans currently live in northeast China, and as many as 70 per cent of them are women. Their status in China as economic migrants who may be deported to North Korea makes them particularly vulnerable to trafficking."

NGO stands for nongovernmental organization.

Most North Korean refugees, fleeing poverty, head to South Korea via neighbouring China.

South Korea has received about 20,000 North Korean defectors since the end of the 1950-1953 Korean War. The US has taken in nearly 100 North Korean refugees since the North Korean Human Rights Act of 2004.

The US raised the refugee issue during the first human rights dialogue with China under the Obama administration held in May.

"I think again this is an area - maybe another area where a more regular discussion about refugee protection issues could be a very useful thing," Michael Posner, assistant secretary for democracy, human rights and labour, said at the time. "And we're certainly following those cases and we'll continue to raise them."

Source: Yonhap news agency, Seoul, in English 2245 gmt 13 Sep 10

LOAD-DATE: September 14, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2010 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

44 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring South Asia - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

September 14, 2010 Tuesday

US agency warns Nepal to curb people-trafficking or lose aid

LENGTH: 552 words

Text of report by privately-owned Nepalese newspaper The Himalayan Times website on 14 September

Kathmandu: USAID-Nepal has launched a new anti-trafficking programme from Tuesday [14 September]. The five-year, 6.8m dollar Combating Trafficking in Persons (CTIP) programme will be implemented by the Asia Foundation (TAF) and its 11 partners, who will contribute additional funds for a total of 7.4m dollars for the efforts.

Minister of Women, Children and Social Welfare Sarva Dev Ojha, US Deputy Chief of Mission (DCM) Patricia Mahoney, USAID Deputy Mission Director Jed Meline, TAF Country Representative George Varughese, Chief Secretary Madhav Ghimire and several other government officials and representatives of civil society organizations attended a ceremony in Nepalgunj to announce the launch of the CTIP programme.

According to USAID, CTIP is designed to increase the three P's - prevent trafficking, protect victims and prosecute traffickers - in six high-risk trafficking districts of Banke, Rupandehi, Makwanpur, Kathmandu, Kavre and Sindhupalchowk districts.

This comprehensive and integrated counter trafficking initiative will strengthen coordination, collaboration, and technical skills across a diverse group of government and civil society stakeholders. The programme will work at the national and local levels simultaneously on national policy, institutional capacity building, and community-based service delivery to close critical gaps between legal and policy frameworks and effective implementation, victims and critical services, and traffickers and justice.

At the launch ceremony, DCM Mahoney voiced the US government's strong commitment to end modern-day slavery in Nepal.

"The programme will increase action to combat to human trafficking, a form of slavery that is as big a problem today as perhaps anytime in history and comes at a time of great need in Nepal. We remain deeply concerned about Nepal's ability to maintain a 'Tier 2 ranking' on the Department of State's annual Trafficking in Persons Report. Without successful action by the government to fight trafficking, some of the US government's larger foreign assistance in Nepal may be automatically cut."

She noted that the government of Nepal needs to show significant progress on strengthening enforcement against all types of trafficking; to improve protection of survivors; and to strengthen the national human trafficking working committee.

"Every year thousands of Nepali women are trafficked into Indian brothels, every month hundreds of young girls are trafficked into the growing domestic sex trade, and every day too many Nepalis leave to work abroad and end up in horrific conditions for little or no pay. Human trafficking affects particularly the poor and vulnerable. We need to fight this crime against human dignity together," appealed Minister Ojha.

Non-governmental organizations in Nepal estimate that as many as 15,000 Nepali women and girls are trafficked to India annually, while 7,500 are trafficked domestically for commercial sexual exploitation. In addition, an estimated 20,000 to 25,000 Nepali women become involuntary domestic workers each year within Nepal, according to the US Department of State's 2009 Trafficking in Persons Report.

Source: The Himalayan Times website, Kathmandu, in English 14 Sep 10

LOAD-DATE: September 14, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2010 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

45 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Himalayan Times

September 14, 2010 Tuesday

Multimillion dollar anti-trafficking programme kicks off

BYLINE: THT ONLINE

LENGTH: 525 words

KATHMANDU: USAID/Nepal has launched a new anti-trafficking programme from Tuesday. The five-year USD 6.8 million Combating Trafficking in Persons (CTIP) programme will be implemented by The Asia Foundation (TAF) and its eleven partners, who will contribute additional funds for a total of USD 7.4 million for the efforts.

Minister of Women, Children and Social Welfare Sarva Dev Ojha, U.S. Deputy Chief of Mission (DCM) Patricia Mahoney, USAID Deputy Mission Director Jed Meline, TAF Country Representative George Varughese, Chief Secretary Madhav Ghimire and several other government officials and representatives of Civil Society organisations attended a ceremony in Nepalgunj to announce the launch of the CTIP programme.

According to USAID, CTIP is designed to increase the three P's --Prevent trafficking, Protect victims, and Prosecute traffickers in six high-risk trafficking districts of Banke, Rupandehi, Makwanpur, Kathmandu, Kavre and Sindhupalchok districts.

This comprehensive and integrated counter trafficking initiative will strengthen coordination, collaboration, and technical skills across a diverse group of government and civil society stakeholders. The programme will work at the national and local levels simultaneously on national policy, institutional capacity building, and community-based service delivery to close critical gaps between legal and policy frameworks and effective implementation, victims and critical services, and traffickers and justice.

At the launch ceremony, DCM Mahoney voiced the U.S government's strong commitment to end modern day slavery in Nepal. "The programme will increase action to combat to human trafficking, a form of slavery that is as big a problem today as perhaps anytime in history and comes at a time of great need in Nepal. We remain deeply concerned about Nepal's ability to maintain a 'Tier 2 ranking' on the Department of State's Annual Trafficking in Persons Report. Without successful action by the Government to fight trafficking, some of the U.S. Government's larger foreign assistance in Nepal may be automatically cut."

She noted that the government of Nepal needs to show significant progress on strengthening enforcement against all types of trafficking; to improve protection of survivors; and to strengthen the national human trafficking working committee.

"Every year thousands of Nepali women are trafficked into Indian brothels, every month hundreds of young girls are trafficked into the growing domestic sex trade, and every day too many Nepalis leave to work abroad and end up in horrific conditions for little or no pay. Human trafficking affects particularly the poor and vulnerable. We need to fight this crime against human dignity together," appealed Minister Ojha.

Non-governmental organisations in Nepal estimate that as many as 15,000 Nepali women and girls are trafficked to India annually, while 7,500 are trafficked domestically for commercial sexual exploitation. In addition, an estimated 20,000 to 25,000 Nepali women become involuntary domestic workers each year within Nepal, according to the U.S. Department of State's 2009 "Trafficking in Persons Report.

LOAD-DATE: September 14, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 Himalayan Times, distributed by Contify.com
All Rights Reserved

46 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

September 7, 2010 Tuesday 12:45 AM EST

Asia Foundation and CCHR Report 'Human Trafficking Trials in Cambodia' Finds Victims' Rights Need Increased Attention

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 339 words

DATELINE: PHNOM PENH, Cambodia

The Asia Foundation issued the following news release:

Cambodia is a source, transit, and destination country for human trafficking. The country was placed in the Tier 2 Watch List in the 2009 U.S. Department of State's Trafficking in Persons Report. In efforts to combat this serious problem, The Asia Foundation today announced the availability of a report, "Human Trafficking Trials in Cambodia (<http://www.asiafoundation.org/publications/pdf/756>)." The Report is an output of the Cambodian Trial Monitoring Project, implemented by the Cambodian Center for Human Rights (CCHR) and supported by The Asia Foundation.

The purpose of the project is to monitor human trafficking trials in Cambodia in order to assess their fairness, for both the victims and the accused, against fair trial standards; and to assess the impact of recent legal developments aimed at combating human trafficking, including the Law on the Suppression of Human Trafficking and Sexual Exploitation 2008 (the "LHTSE").

The Report contains data from 15 trials in which the accused were charged under the LHTSE, monitored in courts throughout Cambodia between 10th August and 31st December 2009. Reference is also made to non-LHTSE trials monitored at Phnom Penh Capital Court and Kandal Provincial Court during the same period.

For more than a decade, The Asia Foundation has been a leader in the fight against human trafficking in Asia by implementing country-specific programs and supporting regional workshops to share lessons on key trafficking issues.

In Cambodia, The Asia Foundation has implemented a Counter-Trafficking in Persons (CTIP) Program to strengthen the joint efforts of the Royal Government of Cambodia and civil society to combat trafficking. The Asia Foundation also supports a scholarship program for children vulnerable to trafficking in northwestern Cambodia.

Read the full report: "Human Trafficking Trials in Cambodia." (<http://www.asiafoundation.org/publications/pdf/756>)

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS cp-JF78-100918-3009478 StaffFurigay

LOAD-DATE: September 19, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

47 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Manila Times (Philippines)

September 6, 2010 Monday

Bureau foils trafficking of 18 Pinoys

BYLINE: BY JOMAR CANLAS REPORTERLENGTH: 343 words

Bureau of Immigration (BI) officials assigned at the Ninoy Aquino International Airport (NAIA) announced over the weekend that they had barred 18 Saudi-bound Filipinos from leaving the country because of suspicions that illegal recruiters and human trafficking syndicates were victimizing the group.

According to Immigration bureau officer in charge Ronaldo Ledesma, the 18 passengers were intercepted on August 21 as they were about to board a Philippine Airlines flight to Riyadh, Saudi Arabia.

The BI chief reported that the passengers presented questionable documents and gave conflicting and inconsistent statements when interviewed, prompting the immigration officers to disallow their departure.

Lawyer Arvin Santos, BI airport operations division chief, said the passengers presented clearances supposedly issued by the Philippine Overseas Employment Administration, which showed that they were hired to work as salesmen.

However, Santos said further examination of the passengers' passports revealed that the visas issued to them were for hired carpenters and not for salesmen.

"It was very evident that their job description and visa do not match, thus we had no choice but to disallow their departure," Santos said.

Ledesma, meanwhile, cited that the Department of Justice is set to conduct further investigations for the prosecution of those responsible for recruiting and facilitating the trip of the group.

The BI has been off-loading suspected "tourist workers" by the hundreds since August as an offshoot of a directive from Justice Secretary Leila de Lima for the bureau to intensify the campaign against human trafficking.

Earlier reports indicated that the Immigration bureau off-loaded in August a total of 3,390 passengers about to board planes at the NAIA and at the Clark and Mactan airports.

The Justice chief's order stemmed from a recent report of the US State Department stating that the Philippines continues to be closely monitored for human trafficking activities since it is included in Washington's human trafficking watchlist.

LOAD-DATE: September 10, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Global News Bites

48 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

September 3, 2010 Friday

Taiwan president signs declaration on 'determination to eliminate crime'

LENGTH: 573 words

Text of report in English by Taiwan News website on 3 September

[Article by Joseph Yeh from the "Politics" page: "Ma Signs Anti-Human Trafficking Declaration "]

President Ma Ying-jeou signed an anti-human trafficking joint declaration yesterday which is designed to show his government's determination to eliminate the crime in Taiwan. The signing came three months after Taiwan regained its status as a country in fighting trafficking when the US State Department recognized Taiwan as a "Tier 1" country in its annual Trafficking in Persons report released this June.

"The regaining of the top tier rating in the report is an acknowledgement of how actively Taiwan has been engaged in eliminating the crime for the past few years," said Ma during the signing ceremony.

He added that only 30 countries around the world are listed in the tier one which can show that Taiwan has connected to the world on human rights protection.

The signing of the declaration is also meant to demonstrate Taiwan's determination to become a beacon to Asian democracy and on human rights protection, Ma added.

Also present for the declaration signing ceremony were Premier Wu Den-yih, foreign representatives in Taiwan, and officials of both local and international non-government organizations on combating human trafficking yesterday evening at the end of an international workshop regarding the topic.

Earlier yesterday, during the opening ceremony for the workshop on combating human trafficking, Hsieh Li-kung, Director-General of the National Immigration Agency, which organized the event, said that Taiwan's efforts in fighting the crime were noted in the US report, which listed Taiwan as a "Tier 1" country for the first time since 2004.

"Human trafficking is a crime that seriously violates human rights, and through fighting the crime, Taiwan can further elevate its human rights status," Hsieh said.

American Institute in Taiwan Director William Stanton, who was also on hand for yesterday's opening, congratulated Taiwan for regaining its status after being downgraded for the previous five years.

"Taiwan is the only nation in Asia that moves to Tier 1 this year, and it is also one of the three Asian countries to be listed on the top tier in the report," he noted.

The AIT head also pledged that the US will continue to work with Taiwan on the issue as there are still many victims of trafficking today, more than half of them in Asia.

Yesterday's workshop was attended by local prosecutors and judges specializing in the human trafficking trail in Taiwan as well as international experts, who exchanged their experience and opinions on the subject.

Among the foreign guests were Nina Vallins, executive director of Project Respect in Melbourne, Australia, and Bandana Pattanaik, International Coordinator of the Global Alliance Against Traffic in Women, based in Bangkok, Thailand.

Vallins said that Australia is a destination country for victims of trafficking and most of them were sent into the sex industry.

It is estimated that in 2004 that approximately 1000 women were trafficked to Australia for prostitution each year, a serious problem that her government is also taking action to solve.

Pattanaik said that anti-trafficking measures can be completely ineffective unless issues of labour/work/employment, migration and rights protection of all people are addressed seriously by all governments.

Source: Taiwan News website, Taipei, in English 3 Sep 10

LOAD-DATE: September 3, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2010 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

49 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

September 1, 2010 Wednesday 2:02 AM EST

President Ma Attends Closing Ceremony of 2010 International Workshop on Strategies for Combating Human Trafficking

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 776 words

DATELINE: TAIPEI, Taiwan

The office of the President of Taiwan issued the following news release:

President Ma Ying-jeou on the afternoon of September 1 attended the closing ceremony of the 2010 International Workshop on Strategies for Combating Human Trafficking and reiterated previous assurances that the ROC will continue to resolutely support the United Nations' 2003 Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children. He added that the ROC is determined to work together with all other civilized countries to combat the transnational human trafficking. The president also signed a declaration against human trafficking, with the proceedings being witnessed by Premier Wu Den-yih, Minister of Interior Jiang Yi-huah, Minister of Foreign Affairs Timothy Chin-tien Yang, and Minister of Justice Tseng Yung-fu. The declaration demonstrates the high level of importance that the government places on the prevention of human trafficking, he said.

President Ma stated that according to United Nations (UN) statistics, human trafficking has become the world's third largest illegal industry, trailing only the illicit trade in arms and narcotics. Profits from the trafficking of humans have reached US$320 billion and over 27 million people have been victimized, 80% of them being women and children. The president said that human trafficking is an age-old practice. In the late 1940s, the term "white slave" became prominent in the international community, with this practice seriously infringing on the freedom of humans, he said. As a result, the UN in 2000 specially ratified the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, and the protocol formally took effect in 2003, marking a major step forward in combating the trafficking of humans, he commented.

President Ma stated that while the ROC is not a member of the UN, it supports UN's laws and treaties aimed at protecting human rights and maintaining public welfare. Consequently, the government has incorporated the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights into domestic law. He said that he also asked the Ministry of Justice to carry out a comprehensive examination of the ROC's laws and regulations to determine whether any contravened these two covenants, and if so to make appropriate amendments to the laws. This initiative will ensure that Taiwan's human rights-related laws are in sync with international practice, he said. The president admitted that this is an ambitious project, but declared that it will help to boost Taiwan's protection of human rights.

The president furthermore stated that the US State Department in June of this year announced its Trafficking in Persons Report 2010, and noted that Taiwan is now listed as a Tier 1 country, putting it in a small group of countries that has most effectively combated human trafficking. This marks an improvement from 2006 when Taiwan was on the Tier 2 Watch List, and from 2007 to 2009 when Taiwan was on the Tier 2 list. President Ma said that the improvement this year is a reflection of the international community recognizing the efforts made by the government here in recent years in this regard. Of all 177 countries covered by the survey, only 30 nations were listed as Tier 1, and the ROC and South Korea were the only East Asian nations on the Tier 1 list.

President Ma stressed that prevention of human trafficking requires strict implementation of laws along with a comprehensive package of supplementary measures. For instance, he said that the government over the past two years has made considerable improvements in protecting the human rights of new immigrants. Via strict procedures and legal amendments, the status of 2,200 people residing illegally in Taiwan has been resolved, including 87 ethnic Tibetans and 2,113 students [, who are descendents of former KMT troops,] from Thailand and Myanmar.

The president reiterated that the ROC will continue to resolutely support the content of the UN's Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, and will fight side by side with the international community to combat human trafficking groups in an effort to gradually reduce this shocking and shameful behavior. He also expressed his hopes that everyone will take advantage of the International Workshop on Strategies for Combating Human Trafficking to exchange opinions, reach points of consensus, and vigorously promote preventive measures.

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS C-Santpan-Santpan 100913-2999807 71Santosh

LOAD-DATE: September 19, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 Targeted News Service LLC
All Rights Reserved

50 of 404 DOCUMENTS

ABC Transcripts (Australia)

August 31, 2010 TuesdaySHOW: Lateline 11:47 PM AEST ABC

Tokyo Vice author joins Lateline

REPORTERS: Leigh SalesLENGTH: 2288 words

LEIGH SALES, PRESENTER: For 12 years American Jake Adelstein worked the the crime beat for one of Japan's most prestigious newspapers, the Yomiuri Shimbun.

A fluent speaker and writer of Japanese, the job basically took over his life, exposing him to Japan's disturbing under-world, its violent organised crime networks, the abuse of women in the sex districts, even human trafficking.

The Yakuza threatened his life when he broke a story that a notorious Japanese gangster had turned informant to the FBI in exchange for a liver transplant in an American hospital.

Jake Adelstein has written about his experiences in a book called Tokyo Vice and he's in Australia for the Melbourne and Brisbane writers' festivals. He joined me from Brisbane a short time ago.

Jake Adelstein, thank you for joining us.

JAKE ADELSTEIN, AUTHOR, TOKYO VICE: Thank you for having me.

LEIGH SALES: How did you come to find yourself a reporter in Japan working on one of the most prestigious Japanese language newspapers?

JAKE ADELSTEIN: Ah! Well, I went to the University of - Sophia University in Tokyo as an exchange student - I transferred there. And then I passed the examination to become a newspaper reporter at the newspaper. That's how they hire.

I don't know how ABC hires reporters, but in Japan, everybody takes a test. If you do well in the test, you go to the interview. If you pass the interviews, you get a job as a reporter and they immediately put you on the police beat, which is where I started.

LEIGH SALES: And why do they start you on the police beat?

JAKE ADELSTEIN: Because I think that the Japanese believe that that's the basics of reporting. It's who did what to whom, when, where, and then finally if you have time, why? The why is the non-essential part of the story as far as Japanese are concerned. That's the last thing. It's the first thing that's going to be cut if there's not enough space in the newspaper.

LEIGH SALES: One of the interesting things that leapt out at me was the fact that in Japan reporters would show up at their contacts' houses in the evening bearing gifts in the hopes that you might be able to get some information?

JAKE ADELSTEIN: Oh, yeah, yeah. We would become friendly with the cops. And that is part of the - youmari (phonetic spelling), the evening rounds, is when you go to the officers' homes, you wait for them to come back and if they like you, you go into the house and you have a couple of drinks with them and while you're pretending to be drunk, then they might leak a morsel of information to you.

But the pretext is we were both drunk and if I said anything to you about a case that we're working on, I don't remember it. And of course, you can't take notes when you're talking to the cops. That would be breaking the unwritten rule that you're not really actually sharing information.

LEIGH SALES: You also had a lot to do with the criminals. Explain for people who exactly are the Yakuza and how pervasive are they in everyday Japanese life?

JAKE ADELSTEIN: OK. One thing I should explain about the Yakuza is that they are not a hidden society in Japan; they're very open.

There are 80,000 Yakuza members in all of Japan in a total. The Japanese Government recognises them as groups and designates them - and designated 22 of them as special organised crime groups and keeps tabs on them and regulates them, but they don't ban them.

So for example, this is a Yakuza fan magazine. It comes out every month. There are about five different ones of them and on the cover is the head of Japan's largest organised crime group.

If you open the magazine up, you can see pictures of succession ceremonies and other Yakuza bosses. These are the top Mafia bosses in Japan of the Yamaguchi-gumi.

They're ruling over 400,000 people. It's not very secretive. Of course, people also send in their own photos of their tattoos, other Yakuza members.

And they always have a section too about foreign crime, because one of the things the Yakuza do to justify their existence is they're always claiming that, you know, if it wasn't us that Japan would be taken over by evil foreigners like myself. And therefore, they're serving a valuable function.

LEIGH SALES: So, you broke a very big story about a Japanese crime lord who travelled to the US for a liver transplant. Tell us about that.

JAKE ADELSTEIN: Um, Godo Panamasa (phonetic spelling), who is - who was kicked out of the Yakuza in 2009 - or actually was it 2008? Time goes by so quickly.

He was one of the most powerful mob bosses in Japan and he made a deal with the FBI in which he gave up the names of members of his organisation and the financial institutions they were using in the United States to launder money in exchange for a visa to get entrance into UCLA where he got a liver transplant, as did three other Yakuza under very mysterious circumstances because they were all at the bottom of the list, and suddenly after a few huge cash donations to University of California, Los Angeles, they suddenly got themselves new livers.

LEIGH SALES: How did the Yakuza react to you digging around on that matter?

JAKE ADELSTEIN: This one boss put a contract out on me. And, actually we still really hate each other.

Even though he's become a Buddhist priest, he published his memoirs this year in which, if you understand the Yakuza, he has two lines, which were basically along the lines of, you know, 'If you see this reporter and you want to take him out, I would be very happy.'

So, it's not a very cordial relationship. In the long run, if you read the book, it goes into greater detail, it sort of became a question is: who could I play off in his organisation that would rather see him out and exposed than me dead? So, you know, there's a certain amount of Yakuza politics involved there.

LEIGH SALES: And do you feel comfortable - oh, sorry, go on.

JAKE ADELSTEIN: One thing that's interesting about this that relates to Australia is that Godo made this deal with the FBI and he promised to give them all the names of the Yakuza members, which the FBI wanted because Japan's police agencies will not share that information with the United States or Australia because of concerns about privacy for Japan's indigenous mafia members.

The head of the Inagowaki (phonetic spelling), which is the third largest organised crime group in Japan, tried to get into United States to get a liver transplant at UCLA, but because Godo had betrayed the FBI, they wouldn't let him in, so he came to Australia in 2002 and got his liver transplant here.

Australia used to be one of the top spots for Yakuza bosses to get their liver transplants. I don't know if they're doing it here anymore.

LEIGH SALES: Are there many links that you know of between Japanese organised crime and Australia?

JAKE ADELSTEIN: Just in property and real estate. I mean, they like the Gold Coast, they like to buy property here.

Australia's one of the countries where Yakuza seem to have an easy time getting in and out of. And in that sense, you know, it's kind of a vacation paradise for them.

LEIGH SALES: And you mentioned - let me ask you - and you do explain it in the book - why is there such a preponderance of liver transplants?

JAKE ADELSTEIN: Yakuza tend to be, especially in the younger days, drug users, especially methamphetamines, and in the old days after the Second World War, a lot of them were using dirty needles and got hepatitis C.

Also the tattoos. Like, you can see on the cover of this book and the back of this book - see, one of the things they tend to do is get these full-body tattoos which mark them as members of the Yakuza. And the tattoos themselves are carcinogenic and they prevent your skin from sweating.

So it puts another layer of stress on the liver. It's the number one cause of death for Yakuza members is liver problems and after that is being shot or stabbed to death.

LEIGH SALES: There was another link to Australia in your book, which was that you received a tip-off from actually an Australian woman who was working in Tokyo. You'd spent quite a bit of time nosing around in sex clubs for various investigations and this woman gave you a tip-off that there was a lot of human trafficking going on.

Tell us a little bit about what you learnt there?

JAKE ADELSTEIN: I met this woman named Helena when I was working on the Lucy Blackman story. Lucy Blackman was a British stewardess who had disappeared in Tokyo and was probably killed by a Japanese man, though it's never been really proved in court.

And she called me and told me that she was working in a sex club, because Japan does have a very legal sex industry and that a lot of the girls who were coming into the clubs were working under duress, that they had been brought into the country and their passports taken away and that they were essentially slaves.

And at first I actually didn't take her very seriously, because, you know, all I knew about Japan was that there were lots of Japanese women working in the sex industry legally because it's good money with good benefits.

Whether you approve of the sex industry or not, that's how it is in Japan. I was kind of shocked to realise that there was such a huge human trafficking industry in Japan at the time, and she was very helpful in giving me information and names and numbers to write stories about it in the paper.

And the Yomiuri actually launched kind of a campaign. And the results of our campaign was that Japan was put on the United States watch list of countries that weren't really dealing with human trafficking problems.

And that embarrassed the Japanese enough that they actually put laws on the books which greatly reduced the number of foreign women trafficked into Japan.

LEIGH SALES: You've done some work since finishing up your reporting career around human trafficking. Is that right?

JAKE ADELSTEIN: Yeah. I left Japan in 2005 and then the US State Department sponsored a huge study of human trafficking in Japan, and the study that they wanted done was not about the victims, but how does the process work? Who runs the organisations? What politicians are paid off? Where are the girls brought in?

It was a very intensive project; it took over a year to do. And after finishing up that project and turning in my data, I went to work for the Polaris Project of Japan which is a group that helps trafficking victims and we also work with the police when we get legitimate tips.

This year we got a very good tip about a group of paedophiles who were making child pornography and distributing it and selling it and we took it to the police and worked with them so that the police could actually make an arrest.

Japan, unfortunately, is one of the few countries in the world where it's legal to possess child pornography. You can't sell it or make it, but it's OK to own it, which makes it very hard for the police to actually investigate cases involving child pornography because they can't get a warrant to seize evidence if the person is just using it for their own personal viewing pleasure, if you could say such a thing.

LEIGH SALES: Is that something that the group you've been involved with has been lobbying to change and are authorities receptive to changing those sorts of laws?

JAKE ADELSTEIN: The authorities aren't receptive to changing it. It's a huge money. There's huge money to be made in sort of neo-child pornography.

We lobbied successfully for Amazon Japan to stop putting on their website child pornography for sale. That was successful. The current Japanese government has tabled all laws that would ban possession of child pornography as contraband. And I suppose if there's another political shift that maybe the laws will come back up again.

LEIGH SALES: You realised after you did this human trafficking investigation as a reporter that you were starting to burn out after 12 years on the crime beat. What was it that led you to that realisation?

JAKE ADELSTEIN: (Sighs). You know, I couldn't sleep at night and then I couldn't forget the stories of the people that I'd met or the victims that I'd interviewed.

And, you know, at the time, the human trafficking victims themselves were in a very precarious position because if they went to the police, they would be deported as criminals and the people that had brought them into the country wouldn't be punished because you can't punish someone for a crime if you don't have the witness there because they've already been deported.

And sometimes, you know, the only solution I could see was giving - getting enough money to get them a ticket to get out of the country. And then going to the police and, you know, saying, "Would you raid this club? Would you close this place down?"

I had a very bizarre, surreal conversation with the head of the Azabu Police Station once. I had a tip about a place where women were being - where the women were sex slaves, and he said, 'I can't bust this place unless I have testimony from someone that they're engaging in prostitution, because that is illegal. Then we could arrest the owners for pimping out the women.'

Japan has very bizarre prostitution laws. It's a crime to be a prostitute or to do prostitution, but the prostitute or the customer can't be arrested. The only person who can be arrested is the pimp or the brothel owner.

So, what the chief of police said to me is, 'Why don't you go to this place and have sex with one of the women and then sign a statement and then we can raid the place?' That didn't seem like an acceptable solution to me.

LEIGH SALES: Jake Adelstein, there's many more questions I have for you and lots more I'd like to talk about, but unfortunately we're out of time on this occasion.

Thank you very much for making the time to come and speak to us.

JAKE ADELSTEIN: Thank you for having me on.

LOAD-DATE: September 29, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

51 of 404 DOCUMENTS

South Asia

August 31, 2010 Tuesday

Say no to human trafficking!

BYLINE: Irsa Khan - Email: irsa-khan@hotmail.com

SECTION: Vol. 14 No. 8

LENGTH: 617 words

Two news items have made headlines in the Maldives recently. In May the country secured a seat in the UN Human Rights Council. Claimed to have been achieved through the highest number of votes in the Council's history, it strengthened Maldives' position and enabled it to lend its support for protecting human rights worldwide.

Quite interestingly, the U.S. State Department has placed the Maldives on its watch-list for human trafficking, following the country's failure to "investigate or prosecute trafficking-related offenses or take concrete actions to protect trafficking victims and prevent trafficking in the Maldives."

The State Department's 2010 Human Trafficking report, which came less than a month after the Maldives was given a seat on the UN Human Rights Council, points to the Maldivian government's inaction, particularly regarding forced labor and exploitation of Bangladeshi nationals.

The report fears that half of the 35,000 Bangladeshis in the Maldives went there illegally and that most of these workers are probably victims of human trafficking. These workers on average pay between U.S. $1,000 to U.S. $4,000 in recruitment fees which potentially makes them vulnerable to forced labor.

The report also classified three types of 'illegal workers' in Maldives: "families that subject domestic servants to forced labor; employment agents who bring low-skilled migrant workers to the Maldives under false terms of employment and upon payment of high fees; and employers who subject the migrants to conditions of forced labor upon arrival."

This issue of migrant workers and their supposed exploitation in Maldives has been creating quite a furor internationally. Equally disturbing are reports about government's ineptness in dealing with them where the present government in the country blames the previous Gayoom government for profiting from the exploitation.

But how can the migrant workers, who flock in huge number to Maldives in search of good labor end up being labeled as human traffic victims? Almost all Human Rights Commission reports have pointed towards forced labor, very much prevalent in Maldives, which makes even legal workers vulnerable to the working climate in the country.

Migrant laborers pay an exorbitant amount to agents to get into what they think is the lucrative Maldives labor force, only to be hoodwinked into lesser jobs, lesser pay and appalling working conditions. Moreover the dispossessed laborers find themselves in a place that couldn't have been more different to their dreams. Without proper documents they are unable to report to the police and susceptible to exploitation and extortion. The immigration department estimates that as much as 30,000 "illegal" migrant workers may be in the country. To add to that, the government's "general policy" for dealing with trafficking victims is deportation. It does not provide foreign victims with legal alternatives to their removal to countries where they might face hardship or retribution which in turn further deteriorates the situation.

Although Mohammad Nasheed's government is trying to sort the problem, motivated by its bid to become a member of the International Labour Organisation, it has, so far, failed to bring any of the alleged agents or officials to justice. Instead, the government appears to be concentrating on rounding up illegal immigrants and trying to deport them.

However, human trafficking is a serious international crime and collusion or complicity can seriously jeopardize the Maldives government's bid to join the ILO, which has a constitutional mandate to protect migrant workers.

The writer is a freelance journalist who writes on various issues concerning South Asia.

LOAD-DATE: November 23, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Magazine

Copyright 2010 CMC Pakistan
All Rights Reserved

52 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Manila Times (Philippines)

August 27, 2010 Friday

Lawyers ask Immigration bureau to deport 7 Chinese executives

BYLINE: BY JOMAR CANLAS REPORTERLENGTH: 322 words

A GROUP of pro-environment lawyers asked the Bureau of Immigration to deport and blacklist seven Chinese mining executives in Zambales province for human trafficking and illegal exploitation of natural resources.

In a three-page Complaint for Deportation dated August 10, the Green Lawyers of the Philippines Inc., through its President Dante Carandang, lodged a complaint with the immigration bureau against the Chinese executives allegedly operating the Coto Mines in Masinloc, Zambales.

Officially charged before the bureau were: Ye Zhou, Shen Bing Hua, Shi Jian Chu, Dong Guilin, Shen Hui, Shi Zhen Yu and Shen Zhen Huan.

The document alleged that the accused engaged in human trafficking by facilitating the entry of around 80 Chinese recruited supposedly to work in the mines.

The complaint also stated that these workers did not have valid work permits and visas, as well as not passing immigration inspection formalities when they entered the country.

"Respondents are undesirable aliens [who violated constitutional], immigration, and other laws of the Philippines," the document added. "Accordingly, they must be ordered deported after due proceedings."

It was suspected that the foreigners acquired the right to operate the mine when they entered into a P250-million agreement with Compania Minera Tubajon Inc.

The executives allegedly established a new management team and infused funds for the maintenance and development of the Masinloc chromite project.

Carandang also said that the mining operation is not covered by any financial and technical assistance agreement with the government, adding that Consolidated Mines, the tenement owner, did not sanction it.

"Wherefore, complainant prays that this honorable commission give due course to this Complaint for Deportation; and after due hearing, order their [the executives] immediate deportation . . . and bar their re-entry into the Philippines," the complaint says.

LOAD-DATE: September 2, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Global News Bites

53 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Cape Argus (South Africa)

August 23, 2010 Monday
E1 Edition

Public hearings on human trafficking in Parliament 'vital for SA'

BYLINE: Steve Swart

SECTION: Pg. 11

LENGTH: 717 words

Public hearings will be held tomorrow and Wednesday on the draft Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill by Parliament's justice and constitutional development portfolio committee.

Why are these public hearings so important?

South Africa is a signatory to the Palermo Protocol to prevent, suppress and punish trafficking in persons, especially women and children, which supplements the UN convention against transnational organised crime.

Compliance includes developing comprehensive legislation under-pinned by a victim-centred empowerment approach. In the run-up to the World Cup, public awareness was raised concerning human trafficking for the purposes of sexual exploitation.

The expected increase in human trafficking did not materialise, or it was not detected. This does not mean human trafficking is not taking place in South Africa.

It is therefore important that the public engage in these public hearings to ascertain the extent and seriousness of this modern form of slavery as there has been very little research in South Africa on the issue.

The first comprehensive assessment was conducted by the Human Sciences Research Council (HSRC) earlier this year on behalf of the programme of assistance to the South African government to prevent, react to human trafficking and provide support to victims of crime, which is being implemented by the National Prosecuting Authority and is co-funded by South Africa and the EU.

What is disconcerting is that according to the annual US Department of State Trafficking in Persons Reports, South Africa was placed on a tier two watch list for four consecutive years for its failure to show increasing efforts to address trafficking. However last year South Africa was removed from the watch list, presumably in anticipation of the Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill.

There is very little empirical research on trafficking in South Africa, southern Africa and Africa.

South Africa is not even collecting basic-level data which would help ascertain the extent of the problem facing the country. It is far more widespread than we are led to believe with the HSRC report stating that "the limited number of studies that have been conducted suggest that South Africa is a key destination and, to a lesser extent, a country of origin and transit for people trafficked to and from Africa and globally".

There can be no room for complacency with a key finding of the HSRC report indicating that "both anecdotal data and limited quantitative data obtained, reveal a portrait of trafficking that warrants intervention on all fronts".

South Africa is a destination country for women trafficked from Thailand, Pakistan, Philippines, India, China, Bulgaria, Romania, Russia and the Ukraine, mainly for sexual exploitation.

Major African countries of origin are those immediately adjacent to South Africa, mainly Mozambique and Zimbabwe, but also Malawi, Swaziland and Lesotho.

Long-distance trafficking occurs, according to the report, from the Democratic Republic of Congo, Angola, Burundi, Ethiopia, Senegal, Tanzania, Uganda, Rwanda, Kenya, Cameroon, Nigeria and Somalia.

Trafficking within South Africa is mainly from rural areas to cities, with women, girls and boys (and, according to the report, to a lesser extent, men) being the targets of traffickers for prostitution, domestic servitude, forced labour (including illegal mining in the Free State), begging, drug trafficking and crime.

The report also reveals trafficking of body parts for muti and religious rituals, including the body parts of albinos as well as the trafficking of people, often children, for ritual sacrifice by satanic cults.

There is no doubt a limited understanding of trafficking in South Africa, as well as a denial that human trafficking even exists.

The public hearings that will be held next week will, I trust, bring public scrutiny to bear on the true extent of human trafficking in South Africa. It is by all accounts much more extensive and pervasive than initially thought.

The end aim must be to provide legislation that addresses trafficking in all its forms comprehensively and effectively.

I Steve Swart is a member of Parliament representing the African Christian Democratic Party on the justice and constitutional development portfolio committee.

LOAD-DATE: August 23, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: CA

54 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Daily News (South Africa)

August 23, 2010 Monday
E1 Edition

We need to protect the vulnerable; Public hearings on a draft bill to fight modern-day slavery are vital for all South Africans, writes Steve Swart

SECTION: Pg. 7

LENGTH: 932 words

TOMORROW and on Wednesday, public hearings will be held on the draft Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill in the Justice and Constitutional Development Portfolio Committee in Parliament. Why are these public hearings so important?

South Africa is a signatory to the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children (the "Palermo Protocol"), which supplements the UN Convention against Transnational Organised Crime. Compliance includes developing comprehensive legislation underpinned by a victim-centred empowerment approach.

In the run-up to the World Cup, public awareness was raised about human trafficking for the purposes of sexual exploitation.

The expected increase in human trafficking did not materialise, or it was just not detected. This does not mean that human trafficking is not taking place in South Africa.

It is therefore important that the public engages in these hearings to ascertain the extent and seriousness of this modern-day form of slavery because there has been very little research in South Africa on the issue.

Disconcerting

The first comprehensive assessment was conducted by the Human Sciences Research Council (HSRC) earlier this year on behalf of the "Programme of Assistance to the South African Government to Prevent, React to Human Trafficking and Provide Support to Victims of Crime" which is being implemented by the National Prosecuting Authority. It is co-funded by the South African government and the European Union.

What is disconcerting is that, according to the annual US Department of State Trafficking in Persons Reports, South Africa was placed on the Tier 2 Watch List for four consecutive years for its failure to show increasing efforts to address trafficking.

However, last year, South Africa was removed from the Watch List, presumably in anticipation of the Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill.

There is little empirical research on trafficking in South Africa, southern Africa and Africa in general. South Africa is not even collecting basic-level data that would help ascertain the extent of the problem facing the country.

It is far more widespread than we are led to believe, with the HSRC report stating that "the limited number of studies that have been conducted suggest that South Africa is a key destination and, to a lesser extent, a country of origin and transit for people trafficked to and from Africa and globally".

There can be no room for complacency with a key finding of the HSRC report indicating that "both anecdotal data and limited quantitative data obtained... reveal a portrait of trafficking that warrants intervention on all fronts".

South Africa is a destination for women trafficked from Thailand, Pakistan, Philippines, India, China, Bulgaria, Romania, Russia and the Ukraine, mainly for sexual exploitation.

Major African countries of origin are those immediately adjacent to South Africa, mainly Mozambique and Zimbabwe, but also Malawi, Swaziland and Lesotho.

Longer-distance trafficking occurs, according to the report, from the Democratic Republic of Congo, Angola, Burundi, Ethiopia, Senegal, Tanzania, Uganda, Rwanda, Kenya, Cameroon, Nigeria and Somalia.

Trafficking within South Africa is mainly from rural areas to cities, with women, girls and boys (and, according to the report, to a lesser extent, men) being the targets of traffickers for prostitution, domestic servitude, forced labour (including illegal mining in the Free State), begging, drug trafficking and criminal activity.

The report also reveals trafficking of body parts for the harvesting of muti and religious rituals, including the body parts of albinos as well as the trafficking of people, often children, for ritual sacrifice by satanic cults.

What is particularly disturbing is that parents have also been identified as being involved in trafficking or colluding with traffickers, such as where debts incurred by households borrowing money from gangs are settled through pimping of debtors' children for prostitution and drug trafficking.

There is a limited understanding of trafficking in South Africa, as well as a denial that it even exists.

In this regard, the report found that certain embassies denied their nationals were being subjected to human trafficking and refused to grant interviews to researchers. Additionally, researchers experienced "serious difficulties and delays in accessing key informants in government departments".

The public hearings, I trust, will bring public scrutiny to bear on the true extent of human trafficking.

Pervasive

It is by all accounts much more extensive and pervasive than initially thought.

The end aim must be to provide stand-alone legislation that addresses trafficking in all its forms comprehensively and effectively.

We need to ensure that victims of trafficking are cared for in a humane and compassionate manner, and are protected in our witness protection programme should they be required to give evidence.

We must ensure that the offence of trafficking, whether for the purposes of sexual exploitation, forced labour, forced marriage, debt bondage, servitude or removal of body parts, is severely dealt with.

The draft legislation provides, in certain cases, for life imprisonment for human traffickers.

In view of the untold misery and suffering that such traffickers inflict upon innocent women, children and men, we parliamentarians should require nothing less.

I Swart is a member of Parliament representing the African Christian Democratic Party on the Justice and Constitutional Development Portfolio Committee.

LOAD-DATE: August 23, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: ND

55 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Congressional Documents and Publications

August 18, 2010

Cao Hears Testimony on Human Rights Abuses in Vietnam; Rep. Joseph Cao (R-LA) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 466 words

WASHINGTON, D.C. - Less than four weeks after U.S. Secretary of State Hilliary Clinton pledged stronger U.S. ties with Hanoi, a Congressional human rights commission today heard testimony from Vietnamese-Americans on how relatives in their native country have been tortured and killed at the hands of the Vietnamese government.

Congressman Anh "Joseph" Cao (LA-02), the nation's first and only Vietnamese-American Congressman, called the hearing of the Tom Lantos Human Rights Commission to investigate reports of police attacks earlier this year on Catholic men and women in C?n D?u, a village located in east central Vietnam, after they resisted a plan by local authorities to uproot their 135-year-old parish, as well as its cemetery, to build a tourist resort.

In his opening statement, Cao explained that in May, violence broke out at a funeral procession for a member of the parish. "The police seized the casket," he said, "and cremated the body of the deceased against her last wish."

Cao said that "many members of the funeral procession were beaten and arrested, and now some are facing trial. Others have fled the country and are seeking asylum." He said that Nguy?n Nam, a member of the funeral procession, "was interrogated numerous times and died after a severe beating."

Nguy?n Nam's brother, Nguy?n Tai of Houston, Texas, described his brother's death in riveting detail while holding up a photo of the mauled body for the three Commission members in attendance: Cao, Congressman Christopher Smith (NJ-04) and Congressman Frank Wolf (VA-10). Wolf is Co-Chairman of the Commission. Both Cao and Smith sit on the Executive Committee.

Wolf ordered the body photo and other documents sent to Secretary of State Clinton for her review. During a July visit to Hanoi to celebrate the 15th anniversary of the reestablishment of U.S.-Vietnamese diplomatic relations, Clinton said the Administration is ready to take ties between the two countries to the "next level."

Cao is among Congressmen now calling for a U.N. investigation of the alleged abuses in C?n D?u. He is also calling for Vietnam to be placed on the U.S. State Department's "Countries of Particular Concern" (CPC) list of nations known for ongoing, egregious violations of religious freedom; its "Tier 3" list of countries whose governments do not fully comply with minimum standards for combatting trafficking in persons for purposes of prostitution and labor; and that Congress pass the Vietnam Human Rights Act of 2009, which would prohibit U.S. nonhumanitarian assistance to the Vietnamese government unless the President certifies to Congress that Vietnam has made substantial progress respecting political, media and religious freedoms, minority rights access to U.S. refugee programs and actions to end trafficking in persons.

LOAD-DATE: August 19, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: COSHM

Copyright 2010 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

56 of 404 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

August 18, 2010 Wednesday

CAO HEARS TESTIMONY ON HUMAN RIGHTS ABUSES IN VIETNAMBYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 477 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of Louisiana Rep. Joseph Cao:

Less than four weeks after U.S. Secretary of State Hilliary Clinton pledged stronger U.S. ties with Hanoi, a Congressional human rights commission today heard testimony from Vietnamese-Americans on how relatives in their native country have been tortured and killed at the hands of the Vietnamese government.

Congressman Anh "Joseph" Cao (LA-02), the nation's first and only Vietnamese-American Congressman, called the hearing of the Tom Lantos Human Rights Commission to investigate reports of police attacks earlier this year on Catholic men and women in Ca'n Dau, a village located in east central Vietnam, after they resisted a plan by local authorities to uproot their 135-year-old parish, as well as its cemetery, to build a tourist resort.

In his opening statement, Cao explained that in May, violence broke out at a funeral procession for a member of the parish. "The police seized the casket," he said, "and cremated the body of the deceased against her last wish."

Cao said that "many members of the funeral procession were beaten and arrested, and now some are facing trial. Others have fled the country and are seeking asylum." He said that Nguyen Nfm, a member of the funeral procession, "was interrogated numerous times and died after a severe beating."

Nguyen Nfm's brother, Nguyen Tai of Houston, Texas, described his brother's death in riveting detail while holding up a photo of the mauled body for the three Commission members in attendance: Cao, Congressman Christopher Smith (NJ-04) and Congressman Frank Wolf (VA-10). Wolf is Co-Chairman of the Commission. Both Cao and Smith sit on the Executive Committee.

Wolf ordered the body photo and other documents sent to Secretary of State Clinton for her review. During a July visit to Hanoi to celebrate the 15th anniversary of the reestablishment of U.S.-Vietnamese diplomatic relations, Clinton said the Administration is ready to take ties between the two countries to the "next level."

Cao is among Congressmen now calling for a U.N. investigation of the alleged abuses in Ca'n Dau. He is also calling for Vietnam to be placed on the U.S. State Department's "Countries of Particular Concern" (CPC) list of nations known for ongoing, egregious violations of religious freedom; its "Tier 3" list of countries whose governments do not fully comply with minimum standards for combatting trafficking in persons for purposes of prostitution and labor; and that Congress pass the Vietnam Human Rights Act of 2009, which would prohibit U.S. nonhumanitarian assistance to the Vietnamese government unless the President certifies to Congress that Vietnam has made substantial progress respecting political, media and religious freedoms, minority rights access to U.S. refugee programs and actions to end trafficking in persons.

###

LOAD-DATE: August 18, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 States News Service

57 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

August 18, 2010 Wednesday 12:34 AM EST

Cao Hears Testimony on Human Rights Abuses in Vietnam

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 494 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Joseph Cao, R-La. (2nd CD), issued the following news release:

Less than four weeks after U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton pledged stronger U.S. ties with Hanoi, a Congressional human rights commission today heard testimony from Vietnamese-Americans on how relatives in their native country have been tortured and killed at the hands of the Vietnamese government.

Congressman Anh "Joseph" Cao (LA-02), the nation's first and only Vietnamese-American Congressman, called the hearing of the Tom Lantos Human Rights Commission to investigate reports of police attacks earlier this year on Catholic men and women in C?"n D?u, a village located in east central Vietnam, after they resisted a plan by local authorities to uproot their 135-year-old parish, as well as its cemetery, to build a tourist resort.

In his opening statement, Cao explained that in May, violence broke out at a funeral procession for a member of the parish. "The police seized the casket," he said, "and cremated the body of the deceased against her last wish."

Cao said that "many members of the funeral procession were beaten and arrested, and now some are facing trial. Others have fled the country and are seeking asylum." He said that Nguy?...n N?fm, a member of the funeral procession, "was interrogated numerous times and died after a severe beating."

Nguy?...n N?fm's brother, Nguy?...n Tai of Houston, Texas, described his brother's death in riveting detail while holding up a photo of the mauled body for the three Commission members in attendance: Cao, Congressman Christopher Smith (NJ-04) and Congressman Frank Wolf (VA-10). Wolf is Co-Chairman of the Commission. Both Cao and Smith sit on the Executive Committee.

Wolf ordered the body photo and other documents sent to Secretary of State Clinton for her review. During a July visit to Hanoi to celebrate the 15th anniversary of the reestablishment of U.S.-Vietnamese diplomatic relations, Clinton said the Administration is ready to take ties between the two countries to the "next level."

Cao is among Congressmen now calling for a U.N. investigation of the alleged abuses in C?"n D?u. He is also calling for Vietnam to be placed on the U.S. State Department's "Countries of Particular Concern" (CPC) list of nations known for ongoing, egregious violations of religious freedom; its "Tier 3" list of countries whose governments do not fully comply with minimum standards for combatting trafficking in persons for purposes of prostitution and labor; and that Congress pass the Vietnam Human Rights Act of 2009, which would prohibit U.S. nonhumanitarian assistance to the Vietnamese government unless the President certifies to Congress that Vietnam has made substantial progress respecting political, media and religious freedoms, minority rights access to U.S. refugee programs and actions to end trafficking in persons.

Contact: Taylor Henry, 202/225-3117

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS MT93 100820-2962695 61MarlizTagarum

LOAD-DATE: August 20, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 Targeted News Service LLC
All Rights Reserved

58 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

August 9, 2010 Monday

Malaysian rights group wants separate law for migrant smuggling

LENGTH: 637 words

Text of report in English by Malaysian independent website Malaysiakini, owned by Mkinin Dotcom, on 7 August [Report by Richard Loo Wai Hoong: "Separate Act Needed for Migrant Worker Smuggling"]

Migrant rights NGO Tenaganita is still dissatisfied with the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act 2007 in tackling the smuggling of migrant workers, and wants separate legislation for better enforcement.

"There should be a separate Act for the offence of smuggling migrant workers because the thin line between the definitions of trafficking victims and smuggled migrant workers is confusing," said Aegile Fernandez (left), Tenaganita's consultant manager for the anti-trafficking of humans unit.

"We've talked to our lawyers, who agree that it would be difficult for the various enforcement agencies to differentiate between the two," she said.

Fernandez was responding to Deputy Home Minister Abu Seman Yusop's statements at a press conference after officiating a march in Kuala Lumpur today to raise awareness of child sex trafficking.

A member of the Bar Council had, during the press conference, quizzed the minister about Human Rights Watch Asia division deputy director Philip Robertson's remark that Malaysia was committing a "cardinal sin" for failing to differentiate between the trafficking and smuggling of people in the amendments to the Act.

Wira was adamant that the current Act was clear enough.

"I beg to differ. They are different elements that constitute two different offences. Both offences are clearly defined in the Act, so one must read it to understand clearly," he said.

He added that the country need not worry about being downgraded in the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report because in this year's report, Malaysia had ascended to the second tier watch list from the third.

Ready to ratify

Meanwhile, the deputy minister also announced that the government was finally ready to ratify the UN protocol complementing the Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC), saying they were not prepared to do so earlier.

"We were not ready because the infrastructure was not there. However, now we are more than ready to do so," he said to loud applause from the crowd.

Abu Seman shared with those present statistics of trafficking victims rescued in Malaysia and placed into protection shelters.

"1,656 victims from 19 countries were rescued and given an interim protection order. Only 484 of them were found to be genuine human trafficking victims, after investigations were conducted."

"From this 484,291 of them are sex trafficking victims where 8.6 per cent of them are under-age females."

"Earlier this year, we launched a nine-point national action plan against trafficking in persons to focus on the efforts towards achieving the national goal to suppress the problem and outline the strategic directions for the next five years," he added.

Speeding up prosecution

Abu Seman, who is the Tanah Masjid MP, also said that the attorney-general will work on speeding up the prosecution process for those charged with trafficking, by improving the training of prosecutors.

The march today was part of the 'Petition Campaign to Stop Sex Trafficking of Children and Young People' organised by The Body Shop with several NGOS such as Tenaganita, PS Save the Children and Nursalam.

A crowd of about 250 marched from the main entrance of the Pavilion shopping centre to Berjaya Times Square and back.

Their objective was to pressure the Malaysian government to sign the optional protocol on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography which complements the CRC.

The CRC aims to enhance the protection of children from sexual exploitation. Malaysia is the remaining of three countries in Southeast Asia that has not yet ratified the document.

Source: Malaysiakini website, Petaling Jaya, in English 7 Aug 10

LOAD-DATE: August 9, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

59 of 404 DOCUMENTS

New Straits Times (Malaysia)

August 8, 2010 Sunday

'Bulk of those trafficked are sex workers'BYLINE: Lee Shi-IanSECTION: Pg. 4LENGTH: 394 words

KUALA LUMPUR: Many of the foreigners rescued in Malaysia on suspicion of being victims of human trafficking turned out to be people who came to work as prostitutes.

Deputy Home Minister Datuk Abu Seman Yusop said of the 1,656 suspected human trafficking victims rescued between February 2008 and July this year, only 484 of them were actual victims.

The 1,656 came from 19 countries, including Afghanistan, Vietnam, Thailand, Indonesia and China.

Abu Seman said the 484 victims were now being housed in shelters and safe houses.

"Of the 484, 291 had been trafficked for sexual purposes and checks later revealed that 25 were below the age of 18," he said yesterday.

The remaining 1,172 people had been sent back to their respective countries.

It is learnt that most of those who were deported had entered the country to work in the vice trade.

Earlier, Abu Seman launched the "Stop Sex Trafficking of Children and Young People" campaign organised by the Body Shop and several non-governmental organisations at the Pavilion Kuala Lumpur shopping mall.

"Studies have shown that 2.5 million people are being trafficked annually worldwide and this activity generates a profit of RM38 billion for crime organisations.

"Of that figure, at least 1.2 million are below the age of 18 and they are raped, beaten and tortured. They are normally exploited sexually or for labour purposes," he said.

"This is a difficult issue to eradicate as people enter Malaysia with valid travel documents. How do you differentiate between a trafficker and a person being trafficked?"

He lamented the fact that few people were willing to assist the authorities in fighting the crime.

"However, despite the obstacles, the government remains committed to the battle against human trafficking and our efforts have been reflected in the latest watch list released by the United States State Department."

In June, Malaysia was upgraded back to Tier 2 of the department's Trafficking in Persons list after it had complied with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking.

Malaysia was downgraded from Tier 2 to Tier 3 in 2007.

Abu Seman said the passing of the Anti-Trafficking in Persons (Amendment) Bill recently and -- more importantly -- the inclusion of non-governmental organisations in fighting human trafficking, marked another milestone in Malaysia's battle against the crime.

(END)

LOAD-DATE: August 8, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 New Straits Times Press (Malaysia) Berhad
All Rights Reserved

60 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Fiji Times (Australia)

August 7, 2010 Saturday
1 EditionIMF to visit*BYLINE: Elenoa BaselalaSECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 3LENGTH: 273 words

A JOINT mission of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund will be in the country next month to further discuss with the government its request for significant funding.

This was confirmed by the World Bank East Pacific region vice president James Adams in an interview.

Mr Adams said the mission would likely discuss the economic reforms Fiji needs to take.

Fiji is looking at borrowing up to $1billion from the IMF. One of the previous obstacles in accessing that funding was it being listed as a tier three country in human trafficking, which meant countries such as the United States of America was obliged to object to the funding.

However, Fiji has now moved up to tier two.

During the announcement of the Revised Budget last month, Finance permanent secretary John Prasad said changing the accounting system of the government from cash to accrual, was one of the recommendations of the IMF.

The IMF had visited Fiji this year and made a number of recommendations on economic reforms.

The reforms, Mr Adams explained, would need to be conducted due to the downturn in the economy, particularly in the tourism industry.

In addition, Fiji's expected to pay over $200million next year for the bonds it floated in 2005.

The Asian Development Bank economic update said Fiji's revenue from tourism, export and remittances remained weak.

The revised Budget, the ADB said, did not provide fiscal consolidation required under the current economic conditions.

Therefore, underlying fiscal risk remained.

The update added that any unexpected government expense or a revenue slow down would place the achievement of the planned deficit in doubt.

LOAD-DATE: August 10, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: NewspaperJOURNAL-CODE: FIJ

All Rights Reserved

61 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BusinessWorld

August 2, 2010 Monday

Anti-human smuggling hampered (... as fund lack imperils US watch list prospects)

BYLINE: Prinz P. Magtulis

SECTION: Pg. S1/11

LENGTH: 640 words

THE GOVERNMENT may fall short on improving its status in the human trafficking watch list of the US State Department as lack of funds is hampering efforts to crack down on the illegal activity.

But political analysts said the funding issue is only an excuse to cover up failure in meeting stringent US standards.

The Inter-Agency Council Against Trafficking (IACAT) under the Department of Justice (DoJ) has been given a budget of P25 million of the total P14.9 billion proposed for the Justice department in 2011, data from the department's finance office showed.

Justice Secretary Leila M. de Lima has admitted that IACAT had not been included in the department's budget since its creation in 2003.

In a phone interview, she admitted that the program is sorely lacking in funds.

"If you really want to sustain vigor in prosecution of cases, in investigation, resources are important," Ms. de Lima said.

IACAT facilitates the implementation of Republic Act 9208 or the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act of 2003. Ms. de Lima chairs the group and the members include the chiefs of the Bureau of Immigration, Philippine National Police, National Bureau of Investigation, and Philippine Overseas Employment Agency.

The evaluation period for next year's State Department report on the global human trafficking situation started last February and will end in February 2011.

Delayed budget approval in Congress is largely to blame, especially when the outlay is reenacted for the succeeding year due to Congress's failure to pass a budget before the fiscal year ending December. This has happened several times during the Arroyo administration.

For 2010, the country was forced to operate in a reenacted budget after Congress failed to transmit to then-president and now Rep. Gloria Macapagal-Arroyo (Pampanga, 2nd district) the P1.54-trillion budget before the end of 2009. Mrs. Arroyo enacted the new budget only on Feb. 8.

Tina Rose Marie L. Canda, director of the Budget and Management Bureau-D under the Budget department, said IACAT had been consistently stricken out of the DoJ budget as the group has failed to present an expense breakdown.

"During budget deliberations, [agencies] are given a last look at their budget proposals, and they have a chance to lobby with us some projects that they want us to reconsider," Ms. Canda said by phone.

She said the Justice department has not been persistent in having IACAT's outlay approved. "That is why we removed it (IACAT)."

But this was countered by Rodolfo B. Felix, director III of the DoJ's Finance and Management Service.

"We are giving lots of supporting documents," he said without citing data.

Last June, a US State Department report placed the Philippines in the Tier 2 watch list, which groups countries that fail to meet the minimum standards of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act. The Philippines has been classified under Tier 2 since 2007, but this was the second straight year it has been on the watch list.

The US could withhold aid worth $250 million if the country is downgraded to Tier 3.

Sought for comment, Gary Martinez, chairman of worker rights group Migrante International, said lack of funds should not be an excuse for the DoJ to fail in its fight against human trafficking.

"Wag naman sana presyohan ang laban sa human trafficking [The campaign against human trafficking should not have a price tag]," he said by phone.

Ramon C. Casiple, a political analyst, agreed. "What the Philippines needs to do is to meet the requirements set by the US like to prosecute more cases in relation to human trafficking," he said.

They both said focus should be given to eliminating graft and corruption in the Bureau of Immigration.

Ms. de Lima had reactivated a DoJ task force formed in 2005 to monitor the implementation of the anti-trafficking law immediately after assuming office on July 1.

LOAD-DATE: August 1, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

62 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Sikkim Express

August 2, 2010 Monday

A matter of grave concern

LENGTH: 479 words

The increasing number of incidence of human trafficking in the State is a cause for concern and it is time the authorities woke up and took notice. However, the trend is not just confined to the State; India has the dubious distinction of leading in human trafficking and this is certainly we should be worried about. India has been ranked as a "Tier II Watch List" country - only one level better than worst-performing Tier III countries such as Saudi Arabia and Zimbabwe - in the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP) compiled by the Union government. Given the definition of Tier II Watch List in the TIP, this implies that India ranks among those countries whose governments "do not fully comply with the Trafficking Victims Protection Act's (TVPA) minimum standards, but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards." Additionally, one of the three following conditions was found in India: first, that the absolute number of victims of severe forms of trafficking was very significant or was significantly increasing; second, that there was a failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons from the previous year; or, third, that the determination that India was making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with minimum standards was based on commitments by India itself, to take additional future steps over the next year. In terms of the definition of trafficking under the TVPA, a person may be a trafficking victim "regardless of whether they once consented, participated in a crime as a direct result of being trafficked, were transported into the exploitative situation, or were simply born into a state of servitude." The TIP adds that at the heart of this phenomenon are the myriad forms of enslavement including forced labour, sex trafficking, bonded labour debt bondage among migrant labourers, involuntary domestic servitude, forced child labour, child soldiers and child sex trafficking. The TIP noted that the Government of India "does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so, particularly with regard to the law enforcement response to sex trafficking." Yet, the TIP argues, the Indian government did not demonstrate sufficient progress in its law enforcement, protection, or prevention efforts to address labour trafficking, particularly bonded labour.

"Therefore India is placed on Tier 2 Watch List for the seventh consecutive year," the report said. Rough estimates by the UN suggest that 70000 to 2 million persons trafficked across international borders annually are women and children. It is violation of human rights that India as nation needs to address the issue and the civil societies need to seek to the questions on how to respond to the issue.

LOAD-DATE: August 3, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

63 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

August 2, 2010 Monday 2:23 AM EST

AIT Kaohsiung Branch Office and Kaohsiung City Co-Host Event to 'Turn the Tide' Against Human Trafficking

BYLINE: Targeted News ServiceLENGTH: 285 wordsDATELINE: TAIPEI CITY, Taiwan

The American Institute in Taiwan issued the following news release:

The American Institute in Taiwan Kaohsiung Branch Office (AIT/K) is pleased to join the Kaohsiung City Government in co-hosting the press event, Kaohsiung - Turning the Tide against Human Trafficking, at the Kaohsiung City Hall on Thursday, August 5, 2010 at 10:30 a.m. The event will highlight the critical role of local governments and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) in the international fight to "turn the tide" against human trafficking. In its 2010 Trafficking in Person Report, the U.S. Department of State noted that Taiwan achieved the highest ranking of "Tier 1" for the year because of the Taiwan authorities' full compliance with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking.

The press event will feature remarks by Kaohsiung City Mayor Chen Chu, AIT/Kaohsiung Branch Chief Chris Castro and noted television personality Janet Hsieh, who has agreed to serve as AIT/Kaohsiung's first "Honorary Anti-Human Trafficking Celebrity Ambassador." The widely-acclaimed Kaohsiung City Children's Choir will also perform at the event.

AIT Spokeswoman and Public Affairs Officer Sheila Paskman said, "AIT is pleased to collaborate with the City of Kaohsiung, and the Kaohsiung based NGOs, in their efforts to ensure that Taiwan maintains its forward momentum on dealing with the issue of trafficking in persons. We recognize the key to ending the crime of human trafficking lies within strong and effective partnerships."

For more information about the event, please contact Beatrice Lin by phone at 07-238-7744 ext. 625 or by email at linbmc@state.gov

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS C-NiskSa71- 100823-mv45-2966760 61MarlynVitin

LOAD-DATE: August 29, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

64 of 404 DOCUMENTS

August 2010

Razing Arizona

BYLINE: Robert Draper; - with contributions by John Ritter

SECTION: POLITICS; Pg. 69 Vol. 80 No. 8 ISSN: 0016-6979

LENGTH: 4192 words

HIGHLIGHT: Deep in the desert Southwest, a battle is raging between an ex-maverick presidential nominee and a defeated congressman with a checkered history (and a penchant for bad jokes). In any other election cycle, this contest would be a laugher. But this year: Arizona's voters are royally pissed! Robert Draper goes inside the most entertaining race of 2010

The television studio is J. D. Hayworth's natural habitat, and in the greenroom of the Yuma, Arizona, NBC affiliate he's happily primping for an interview in which he'll defend his state's controversial new immigration policy. But right now he's chewing on his other favorite topic, Senator John McCain, whom Hayworth seeks to upset in the August 24 Arizona Republican primary--which, as a visceral paean to the far right, has become an emblematic brawl of the 2010 election year.

Hayworth is telling me about how McCain--"the patron saint of campaign-finance reform," he snorts--is exploiting a campaign-funding loophole. "He always does that," says Hayworth. "It's always, 'It's cool for me but not for thee.' " While condemning his opponent's lack of authenticity, Hayworth is self-applying a layer of Pan-Cake makeup with the casual dexterity of an opera diva. The red silk handkerchief in his blazer pocket perfectly matches his red necktie. His hair is short, full, and immobile.

Being a former sportscaster and talk-radio personality, Hayworth knows how to deliver a line, and this election year he has been treating Arizona audiences to an attack on his opponent that is both precise and devastating. McCain, he says, criticized the TARP bailout, but only after he voted for it. McCain, the Reagan Republican, voted against Bush's tax cuts. And on the white-hot subject of immigration, the former congressman lingers like a buzzard on desert carrion: "While my opponent five years ago was co-authoring an amnesty bill with the late Senator Ted Kennedy, I was introducing in the House of Representatives the Enforcement First Act."

Closing in for the kill, J.D. then intones, "Whether it is Barack Obama or Janet Napolitano or, yes, even John McCain, here's the fundamental problem. So many in Washington, D.C., view illegal immigration as a political problem to be managed, instead of seeing it for what it is: a national-security threat, an economic-security threat, and an invasion that must be stopped!"

Hayworth's immigration shtick came fairly late in his twelve-year congressional career, which ended when he was voted out of office in 2006. Other than his association with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, the congressman's chief distinction was as a bombastic floor speaker who used his offensive-lineman's girth to intimidate Democrats. Soon after arriving in Washington, he picked a fight with Representative Steny Hoyer by passing out a flyer that said things like "Hoyer = sex training for federal employees" and "Hoyer = illegal drug use" and "Hoyer = New Age cult training."

These days, the 52-year-old Hayworth has both slimmed and toned down. Indeed, among this year's conservative agitators, he's surprisingly well-mannered, and his disapproval of abortion, gun control, and gay marriage play only bit roles in his windy denunciations of Big Government. He has a Rotarian's joviality and feathers his monologues with historical references and ten-dollar words--"He wanted you to know he wasn't a dummy," says congressional analyst Charlie Cook--yet his face is always red as if fighting back a primal scream. To rally the Tea Party faithful, he travels the state in a beige pickup truck ‡ la Scott Brown, though not by choice: He has raised maybe a fifteenth of the McCain campaign's war chest and has no more than a half-dozen paid staffers. Wry and seemingly well-read, Hayworth nonetheless has, like other right-wing insurgents this season, the air of someone who's gotten a little ahead of himself. In the green-room, I ask him a question about a hot-button issue among conservatives: whether he believes individuals who appear on terrorist watch lists should be permitted to buy firearms.

Hayworth looks pleasantly puzzled. "I haven't even taken a look at that right yet," he says.

I point out that the subject came up after the disclosure that the alleged Times Square bomber had purchased a rifle. Hayworth responds by orating generally on "how you preserve liberties and at the same time deal with security threats." In other words, he has no idea how to answer the question.

In any other year, J. D. Hayworth's campaign would merit little more than a few jokes on The Daily Show. Yet McCain, at 73, is regarding the congressman as an existential threat, burying the underdog on the airwaves while relentlessly challenging his conservative purity--and intelligence. In one notable exchange, after Hayworth's remarkable assertion that the United States had never formally declared war on Germany during World War II, the McCain operation circulated online ads mocking the claim, adding, "J. D. Hayworth--is it any wonder he was voted among the dumbest members of Congress?" The senator's operation has never subjected any opponent, including Barack Obama, to such a carpet bombing. When I ask McCain's communication director, Brian Rogers, about the daily savaging, he says, "It's not about Hayworth. It's really about the environment. When you have this massive anti-incumbent sentiment combined with issues about the economy, it's a devil's brew. And look, he's a very vigorous guy who has his lines down. He's gonna get noticed. So you confront him directly."

But McCain has done more than confront--he has converted, shape-shifting in the time-honored manner of a politician who fears his days are numbered. In the past few months--as his lead in the polls fluctuated from twenty-two points to five and, by press time, back to twelve--the senator has lurched to the right. He has backed away from his call to close Guantanamo and threatened to filibuster the repeal of "don't ask, don't tell." He has also voiced his support of Arizona's notorious statute 1070, a bill that permits local police to stop an individual they have "reasonable suspicion" to believe is an illegal immigrant; if unchallenged, it will go into effect July 28. Even some of McCain's Republican friends, including former state attorney general Grant Woods and Senator Lindsey Graham, call the law unconstitutional and mean-spirited. "I think it does a lot of harm in the community," Woods says. "We're talking about doctors, lawyers, firemen, housewives, who were born here, whose parents were born here, and they already have that sinking feeling that they're being watched. And that's not right."

The senator's conservative shift, says Arizona State University professor emeritus and political guru Bruce Merrill, is not without risk. "Conservative ideologues tend to have long memories," he says. "I think that far from attracting their support, McCain's latest moves to the right are likelier to make them more suspicious." Hayworth agrees, of course. "You can see national trends, but ultimately what we're finding anecdotally is a feeling that John has had his time," he says. "He was the party's nominee for president. His position in history is secure. All these contortions to try and morph into my positions, that I hold, appear to be inauthentic and don't reflect well on his legacy."

As such, says J. D. Hayworth, "It's time to have a consistent conservative"--implying quite plainly that he is the man.

Nearly every night during the election year of 1994, Hayworth's maiden voyage for political office, the telephone would ring at the home of Bruce Merrill, and he or his wife would say, "That's J.D." Hayworth would be calling seeking highly specific advice on how to get out his message and organize a staff. Back in 1991, the sportscaster had taken Merrill's class, Public Opinion & Political Communication, and had been an apt pupil. "The class was about creating reality," recalls Merrill. "Something can be true, but people don't have time to keep up on all the issues. So they believe what's presented to them. J.D. grasped that. As a broadcaster, he understood the media and how to manipulate it. He understood that controversy sells."

To rustle through John David Hayworth's life story is to learn that there are as many people out there who find him lovable and bright as there are who regard him as a bully and buffoon. But even among his admirers, the word authentic is never uttered. Born in High Point, North Carolina, he nonetheless "never acted or sounded like a southerner, even though he'd been one all his life," says Kenn Sparks, who anchored the Greenville, South Carolina, TV station where Hayworth spent the early '80s as a sportscaster. N.C. State awarded the offensive lineman a football scholarship, and in Raleigh he found work at a TV station, won election as student-body president, and never looked back. Hayworth was--like Reagan, whom he campaigned against in 1980 but would lovingly quote in years thereafter--a born performer and a politico, camera-ready. "J.D. wanted to be president, there's no doubt about that in my mind," recalls Sparks. But, he adds, Hayworth's political role model was a moderate: "I think he must've sprung from his mother's womb quoting Eisenhower." Back in the Greenville days, according to two of his former colleagues, a favorite Hayworth line was "I'm a liberal Republican and a drinking Baptist!" His signature phrase, however, was nonpolitical; when describing a home run, the sportscaster would invariably boom, "It's VAPOR!!!"

In 1987, Hayworth and his black Corvette convertible departed Greenville for the larger market of Cincinnati, where he spent much of his time discussing politics with then anchorman Jerry Springer and contemplating a run for some office or other. His search for a political springboard intensified upon moving to Phoenix in 1988. Though an actual newsman would have been obligated to maintain a public pretense of objectivity, a sportscaster like Hayworth could regularly exercise his freedom to speak at local GOP "Trunk & Tusk" gatherings. And sure enough, after a relatively unknown progressive was elected to Congress in 1992 in his very district, J. D. Hayworth began assembling staff for a run in '94.

With the full support of Newt Gingrich, who flew out to campaign on his behalf, Hayworth won the race in a landslide. And when John McCain called to congratulate him, the senator offered this advice: "Pick out one or two things to focus on. Because when you get there, you're gonna feel like a mosquito at a nudist colony--there are so many targets of opportunity." In fact, Representative Hayworth would focus, as always, on the camera, becoming the C-SPAN Shakespearean that Speaker Gingrich could rely on to unleash screeds against Clinton and "our good friends in the minority."

IN ANY OTHER YEAR, HAYWORTH'S CAMPAIGN WOULD MERIT LITTLE MORE THAN A FEW JOKES ON 'THE DAILY SHOW.' YET MCCAIN REGARDS HIM AS AN EXISTENTIAL THREAT.

When he wasn't advancing the Gingrich revolution, Hayworth took time to speak his mind on issues as varied as campaign-finance reform and the environment. Charlie Cook remembers Hayworth arguing against expanding preserves for Arizona's endangered spotted owls. "Y'know, the way I figure it," the congressman told him, "if two teenagers can reproduce in the backseat of a car, why do spotted owls need a thousand acres apiece?"

Though other House conservatives would grow disillusioned by Newt's willingness to abandon strict term limits, disciplined budgets, and other precepts of the Contract with America, Hayworth "was a loyal vote for whatever the leadership wanted," recalls fellow Arizona congressman Matt Salmon. "I remember he ended up voting for the transportation bills when we thought they were full of pork. He was very anxious to develop a long-term political career." Indeed, when I contacted Club for Growth spokesman Mike Connolly to ask why Tea Party groups have been reluctant to underwrite Hayworth's Senate campaign, Connolly would reply, "He didn't vote like a Tea Partier when he was in the House."

Hayworth's loyalty to Gingrich paid off with an assignment to the elite House Committee on Ways and Means--though a former House colleague remembers, "I witnessed Hayworth crying in front of Gingrich, his face swollen and red, saying, 'If I don't get on this committee, I won't be able to raise the kind of money I need to win in my district.'" Hayworth's constituents, meanwhile, soon grew tired of the congressman's floor antics. "Entertainment is a big part of J.D.," says his former campaign manager, Scott Hildebrand. "That's his Achilles' heel--learning when it's time to turn down the volume. And that's hard to do for a guy who's spent so many years in front of a television camera."

Hayworth's showmanship seemed specifically designed to offend the sensibilities of John Character Is Destiny McCain. Though the senator gamely campaigned for Hayworth in 1998, the congressman's press secretary at the time, Jim Heath, recalls that "they'd get out of the plane and hug each other, then get back on and never once say a word to each other." In 2001, Hayworth publicly took umbrage with McCain's campaign-finance-reform position, calling it a violation of free speech. After that, "there was a huge freeze-out," recalls Hayworth. During the 2006 cycle, McCain was only too happy to tell people that Hayworth's ties to Jack Abramoff (which included $101,000 in campaign donations and frequent access to Abramoff's sports skybox) would sink the congressman that November. McCain was right. Hayworth lost his seat to Democrat Harry E. Mitchell. And though the Department of Justice never pressed charges, he was forced to return to Arizona and to the airwaves--this time as a talk-radio host whose chief target was&

"J Mac," Hayworth bellowed during a typical rant on his drive-time show on KFYI, "is bound and determined to institute some sort of worker program that involves amnesty& in the midst of double-digit unemployment!" Like most right-wing radio personalities, Hayworth focused his ire on the White House and Nancy Pelosi, but the immigration debate made McCain a ripe target. "McCain is out of touch!" callers said. "Please run for office. The country needs you!" Hayworth would often respond with a creaky imitation of the senator--"My friends, thank you for your support."

And was McCain aware of Hayworth's withering impression? "Oh yes," says campaign spokesman Brian Rogers. By April, the McCain campaign had filed an FCC complaint asserting that the candidate was electioneering on his show. Soon after, Hayworth left the airwaves to focus on campaigning full-time.

"I'm proud of my record--not being Mister Congeniality. I'm proud to have investigated Jack Abramoff, who certain congressmen stood along with.& And if I sound a little angry? I'm angry because you're angry!"

John McCain indeed looks angry, and for the precise reason he specifies. An American hero turned away twice by voters across the nation, he must now in his declining years be content with another six-year turn on the senatorial dance floor, only to come home and find that Arizonans are royally pissed& at him! Not just at him, of course, and maybe far less angry at him than at everyone else in Washington. Nonetheless, here he is, forced to remind his own people that he's the one guy who should not be blamed for all the mess, that he's the Maverick& oh& except that he told Newsweek he's never thought of himself as a Maverick& and God damn the liberal media! No more interviews! (My request was denied.)

"ENTERTAINMENT IS A BIG PART OF J.D.," SAYS HIS FORMER CAMPAIGN MANAGER. "THAT'S HIS ACHILLES' HEEL--LEARNING WHEN IT'S TIME TO TURN DOWN THE VOLUME."

He's red-faced and pacing the stage of a rec center in Sun City West, Arizona, while a hundred or so Anglo senior citizens listen to their senior senator go batshit about the border: "Now, I don't know how often you go down to the southern part of the state. But when you meet the ranchers, they'll tell you their livelihood is not safe.& And why is it? Because their borders are not secure!& Complete the fence, complete the fence, complete the fence!& We have to secure the border!"

But the audience is not with him. Immigration, as a McCain adviser has told me, "is his one weakness," and the senator's overcompensation is a discomfiting spectacle. When a woman asks how he's going to come up with the money to pay for his elaborate new ten-point border-security plan, McCain replies tartly, "I could find you 5 billion in funds tomorrow--from [eliminating] earmarks. That's not a problem, finding the money." When the woman wonders aloud how McCain is going to persuade Congress to give up the practice of earmarks, the senator mumbles, "Listen, I'm not saying it'll be easy."

A man stands up and interjects, "Just a small correction on your speech about immigrants. I don't particularly consider them illegal immigrants. I consider them illegal aliens."

The crowd murmurs its approval. "Thank you, thank you very much," replies the senator. This would have been the moment for him to say--as he once did with regularity, and as he did just this morning to a smaller, less inflamed gathering--that these people, whatever one wishes to call them, are "God's children." That moment passes.

Then comes a somewhat dissenting voice, from a man with a cane who stands up and wonders what, realistically and humanely, can be done about the millions of Hispanics who have crossed the desert at great peril to do honest work and who have raised families here in America. It sounds like the kind of question the senator himself might have posed, not so long ago. Taken aback, McCain jokes, "I thought you were gonna ask me, 'Why are you such a great American?' Look, we have to address this in a nuanced fashion.& " Having blurted out the dreaded N-word, McCain scrambles back to the right: "But the fact is, we're a nation of laws. And they broke these laws. So I would be glad to sit down and discuss that, once we get the borders secured. But certainly not until then."

To the skeptical expressions in the audience, McCain adds, "Some people say this is a change in my position. The last three years, the smugglers and drugs have dramatically increased. Twenty-two thousand Mexican citizens have been killed. In 2007, when I saw this coming, I said we have to secure the borders first!" This, as anyone who followed McCain's campaign in 2007 knows, is more than a little untrue. What McCain "saw coming" was not a darkening picture on the border but instead a growing resentment among Republican voters toward illegal immigrants--and toward McCain's comprehensive immigration-reform bill, which he thereupon disavowed.

A woman stands up and says, "Senator, I've voted for you every time since I moved here to Arizona. But I'd suggest that when you talk about Hayworth, that you be careful. Because I'd hate to see, if you're not nominated, that you'll be out there saying anything bad."

McCain snaps, "I'm not saying anything bad. I'm just pointing out his record. And that's what I'll continue to do. So thanks for the advice."

"You don't sound that grateful for it," the woman says with a smile.

He replies, without a smile, "I will not allow anyone to define me and my record. And that's what I will do. Listen, I know that we're out of time& "

I later ask the woman, whose name is Stephanie Elitz, if she was satisfied with the senator's answer. "Not at all," Elitz replies. "I've always voted for Senator McCain. But I thought he was a bit arrogant."

J. D. Hayworth, she added, could now count on her vote.

The week I spend in Hayworth's orbit takes me through all corners of a border state roiled by the passage of Arizona's immigration statute, Senate Bill 1070. State senator Rebecca Rios, whose electoral base is part of Hayworth's former district, believes that racial profiling will inevitably result from the bill, then adds, "People clearly want to address the increase in illegal immigrants, border violence, and drug and human trafficking. Politically speaking, it's a hot-button issue that can very quickly rally folks behind you. I'm frankly disappointed to see McCain try and reinvent himself in this tough-on-immigration image. Hayworth, clearly that's what we expect of him."

Hayworth often chides McCain for his "conversion" on immigration. But the seal-the-border stalwart tells me he experienced one of his own, which occurred with a visit to an Arizonan's ranch in 2003. By 2005, the congressman was sponsoring the Enforcement First Act, a bill similar to SB 1070, and as his spokesman Mark Sanders says today, he "literally wrote the book on this subject"--which is to say, he wrote a book titled Whatever It Takes in 2006. In the book's opening chapter, the author says that when "I was first elected to Congress," flight crews frequently told him that their red-eye flights were full of illegals. They asked him, "Where is the Border Patrol?" Writes the author, "The real question is: where are the politicians?" Which, back then, would have included Hayworth.

Hayworth's sizable audiences are uniformly white, and on the immigration issue he fields an array of rather edgy questions. But I find that, when pressed in private, Hayworth often backs away from his most extreme rhetoric. For example, I ask what he means by his statement that "we need to stand up for our culture." Well, explains the candidate, "there's a concern about, for lack of a better term, a Balkanization. There's not assimilation anymore." I later ask him how assimilation can be legislated. "Uhh& that's an interesting thought," he says. He suggests that perhaps "the community sector, like YMCAs" or even Tea Party activists, can offer courses in English the way they're now doing on the Constitution. Then Hayworth says, "Of course, those people who play by the rules and want to come here--man, they're eager to learn!"

When discussing Spanish-speaking voters, Hayworth speaks often of "the myth of the Hispanic monolith," a unified voting block. And so I ask him what Hispanic groups are likely to support him. The candidate--who does not speak Spanish, other than when he refers to the "Hayworth hacienda"--mentions a single supporter, a Fountain Hills, Arizona, man who appeared with him on a Fox show, but confesses he's not sure about the guy's name. Maybe Rodriguez.

AN AMERICAN HERO TURNED AWAY TWICE BY VOTERS ACROSS THE NATION, McCAIN CAME HOME ONLY TO FIND THAT VOTERS ARE EXTREMELY PISSED...AT HIM!

I was a little surprised he didn't mention Pee Wee Maestas. Back in his C-SPAN days, Congressman Hayworth more than once praised the little Hispanic lady who operates the Wayside Caf  in Holbrook, Arizona: "She came to this nation legally. Her mother applied for a visa& was willing to work and play by the rules." I decide to drop by the restaurant, and a diminutive woman emerges from the kitchen and offers me a lemonade.

Pee Wee recalls visiting with her former congressman a few times--though she says she never voted for Hayworth, as she is a staunch Democrat. She says he didn't bring up the immigration issue with her, perhaps because her mother was born in the United States. Had Hayworth ever done so, Pee Wee likely would have shared with him the memory of having been one of the only Hispanic children at school and of having been punished by the teacher for an offense that one of the white students committed. Over a half century later, the recollection still pains her. "She wanted to make an example of me," Pee Wee Maestas says. "And how do you think that made me feel? People being singled out for their race--there's no worse feeling than that. Have you ever been prejudiced against? If you haven't, then you can't understand."

Pee Wee mentions John McCain's now notorious "build the danged fence" ad, in which the senator walks the borderlands with a beleaguered county sheriff and lists the issues associated with the border. "Remember how it starts?" she says, referring to the senator's first line--"Drug and human smuggling, home invasions, murder." "He should've said that they're not all criminals. He made it sound too harsh. There are a lot of good people that are coming over, just trying to feed their families."

Were she to make this point to McCain, he might well agree--or he might snarl, as he did at the Sun City West town hall, "Thanks for the advice." It's already evident that J. D. Hayworth will not be the biggest loser on August 24. All but obliterated from memory is the John McCain who once declared that he "would rather lose a political campaign than lose a war," who praised champions of unpopular causes in his book Hard Call, and who promised in his 2008 concession speech "to do all in my power to help [Obama] lead us through the many challenges we face."

Though the incumbent's campaign aides like to describe their candidate as "a competitive guy," in the end McCain is no longer competing against another politician or against a new strain of conservatism. He is now competing only against his own legacy as a statesman--which would be of no concern to us, were the very ranks of statesmen not already so badly depleted. Meanwhile, the legacy of J. D. Hayworth may be that he did his part in persuading the Republican Party to renounce everything that John McCain and its finest standard-bearers once stood for. If that is what prevails in 2010, then let's see the victory for what it is:

Vapor.

ROBERT DRAPER is a GQ correspondent.

LOAD-DATE: August 26, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Picture, While in Congress, J. D. Hayworth commemorated the September 11 attacks with prayer and song.

Picture, While in Congress, J. D. Hayworth commemorated the September 11 attacks with prayer and song.

PUBLICATION-TYPE: MAGAZINE

Copyright 2010 The Conde Nast Publications
All Rights Reserved

65 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Latin America Monitor - Central America

August 1, 2010 Sunday

Sugar Exports Set To Bounce

LENGTH: 377 words

POLITICAL RISK - Still Tier Two

Costa Rica remains in the tier-two category of the US State Department's Trafficking In Persons Report for 2010, yet is placed above neighbours Nicaragua and Panama, which are grouped in the tier two watch list ranking. If the country is to achieve tier one status and join Colombia (the only Latin American country in the highest group) we believe it will need to make a clear attempt on legislative reforms that comply with the UN's anti-trafficking standards. Any consequent effort to improve Costa Rica's rule of law would bode well for the country's 'characteristics of society' subsection of our proprietary long-term political risk rating.

Our short-term political risk rating remains unchanged at 73.3

ECONOMIC RISK - Sugar Exports Set To Bounce

With the last of the import tariffs on sugar removed by the US as part of the Central America Free Trade Agreement (CAFTA), Costa Rica's sugar industry is set to benefit from a significant bounce in export revenues, in our view. Indeed, the country's foreign trade ministry suggests that Costa Rica can now export up to 13,880 tonnes of sugar to the US duty free, which we expect will compensate somewhat for the US$1mn losses that were incurred when the US suspended all tariff-free sugar trade back in January (due to Costa Rica's delay in implementing the reforms required by the CAFTA).

Our short- and long-term economic risk ratings stand at 52.3 and 56.7 respectively.

BUSINESS ENVIRONMENT - Mobile Market Making Progress

We believe that there is considerable potential for growth in the Costa Rican mobile market, and the recent decision by state-owned Instituto Costarricense de Electricidad (ICE) to acquire 400,000 GSM lines from Sweden-based equipment vendor Ericsson supports this view. Our telecoms team forecasts mobile phone subscribers in the country to rise from 2.26mn in 2009 to 3.58mn in 2014, with penetration rising from 49% to 108% over the same period. Indeed, it is likely we will be encouraged to upgrade our technological infrastructure rating (at just 22.8) for Costa Rica in the near term, boding well for the country's business environment going forward.

Our business environment rating stands at 48.8, ranking Costa Rica 68th of 167 economies worldwide.

LOAD-DATE: September 14, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Ratings Update

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

JOURNAL-CODE: MCAM

Copyright 2010 Business Monitor International Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

66 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

July 29, 2010 Thursday 2:55 AM GMT

Human traffickers prey on vulnerable in Thailand

LENGTH: 765 wordsDATELINE: Koh Kred, Thailand, July 29 2010

Sixteen-year-old Kaew slumped into unconsciousness in a van somewhere in southern Thailand, believing she was on her way to work in a textile factory near the border.

She woke up in Malaysia to discover that she had been sold into the sex trade.

Hers is just one of a multitude of cases of modern-day slavery in Thailand, most of which involve a mix of poverty, violence and betrayal.

Apparently drugged and later locked in a room in Kuala Lumpur, Kaew met three other Thai women who asked if she had been lured to work like them.

"I had no idea what they were talking about, but then they told me what kind of job they did and what kind of job I had to do. I was very scared," said Kaew, whose name AFP has changed to protect her identity.

She managed to escape before her first job, using money she had been given to buy food to take a taxi to the Thai embassy.

Now she is now being cared for at Baan Kredtrakarn, a government-run shelter just outside Bangkok. But she can't help thinking of the women she left behind -- or her abductors.

"I want them to be punished. I am very angry," she said.

The US State Department last month put Thailand on its human trafficking watchlist, accusing it of not doing enough to combat trafficking.

It said the country was a source, destination and transit point for trafficking, with ethnic minorities and citizens of neighbouring countries at particular risk of sexual abuse or forced labour.

Victims -- mainly from Myanmar, Cambodia and Laos -- have been found in the fishing industry, seafood factories, sweatshops and domestic work, while young girls are also ensnared in Thailand's vast sex industry.

They form part of a vast shadow economy across Asia that generates about 10 billion dollars in yearly profits from forced labourers, mainly prostitutes, according to a 2005 report by the International Labour Organisation (ILO).

It estimated there were 1.36 million trafficking-related victims in forced labour in the Asia-Pacific region -- more than half the global total.

Thai authorities are believed to have identified and helped 530 foreign victims of trafficking last year and repatriated 79 Thai citizens who had been taken overseas.

But experts say that is just the tip of the iceberg, partly because many victims do not want to identify themselves by making a complaint.

"The fact is we just do not have an accurate understanding of the numbers for Thailand, but we do know that the problem is significant," said Allan Dow, an expert at the ILO.

Thailand has said the US report did not take into account its efforts to curb human trafficking.

The country has introduced a scheme to register migrants to give them legitimacy, and reached agreements with its neighbours to cooperate on tackling the issue.

But experts said costly registration procedures, the risk of extortion by corrupt police or civil servants and -- in Myanmar's case -- fear of the authorities mean people often shy away from going through legal channels.

Phil Robertson, Human Rights Watch's deputy Asia director, said Thai officials needed to recognise that trafficking "will stain their record" internationally.

"In the worse forms of exploitation that these migrant workers face, they are being trafficked into situations where they may be held for months or years with no pay and physical and sexual abuse," he said.

With porous borders and a prosperous economy compared to some of its neighbours, Thailand is a magnet for migration.

The challenges faced by authorities are huge, particularly as trafficking networks are seldom more than loose connections.

Victims are often approached by acquaintances who promise lucrative work across the border. When there is no way back, they find they have been duped.

That's what happened to Bopha, a 40-year-old Cambodian woman who arranged a job in a fish ball factory in Thailand through a broker. After more than a month working from 6:00 am until at least midnight she still had not been paid.

"I cried every day but I had to hide it," she said.

Workers were imprisoned inside the factory compound by high walls, barbed wire and security cameras, and those who tried to escape were beaten.

"When I saw them hit people I thought, we are all human why do they have to do this when we just came to work?" said Bopha, whose name AFP has also changed.

In the end one worker was able to use a smuggled mobile phone to call his relatives and arrange a rescue. Now at the same shelter as Kaew, she yearns to see her family again.

"I am old. I think a lot," Bopha said. "I miss home. I miss my children. I miss my husband and I miss my mother."

tp-klm/dr/lb

LOAD-DATE: July 29, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

67 of 404 DOCUMENTS

IPS - Inter Press Service

July 27, 2010 Tuesday

SINGAPORE: CONCERTS BUILD YOUTH CRUSADE AGAINST TRAFFICKING

BYLINE: Stanislaus Jude Chan

LENGTH: 867 words

DATELINE: SINGAPORE, Jul 27 2010

Ngee Ann Polytechnic is no stranger to loud music and louder fashion sense. Home to one of the most vibrant student communities in Singapore, it wasn't too surprising to see this at Polytechnic - a concert to drum up youth support against human trafficking.

The trafficking of people, including for sex, is still a concept alien to many in affluent Singapore, where young people learn quickly to be more apathetic and less passionate - especially about human rights.

"I didn't know that Singapore also has this sex trafficking going on. It's quite a shock to me that in our country, even this type of things exist," said 19-year-old Ng Chun Yan, at United Nations Development Fund for Women (UNIFEM) Singapore's 'Sound Out' event on July 23. "It's an important issue to look at," she said.

"Human trafficking is now the third largest international crime in the world. It's not a left-of-centre, sort of 'out there' issue. It's an enormous issue," said UNIFEM Singapore volunteer Katrina Dick.

The event, comprising a talk and a concert by local musicians, was part of the U.N. organization's public awareness program to put a stop to trafficking of women and children in Asia, including Singapore.

UNIFEM Singapore also launched a website, inviting young people to leave a note to support the cause, as well as contribute or listen to music tracks, and spread the message through Facebook, the popular social networking site with some 500 million users worldwide.

"We actually dedicated a show on Radio Heatwave (a campus radio station) to talk about 'Sound Out' as well as UNIFEM," says 20-year-old Germaine D'Rozario, a student-radio presenter who pledged her support on the website. "I knew it was about sex trafficking, but I really didn't know the statistics, that there are 1.2 million kids in Asia being trafficked each year."

"Singapore is a destination for girls from foreign and less developed countries to be trafficked for sex exploitation. Although we are lucky enough not to have the same thing happening to Singaporean girls, that does not mean that we are not able to play a part to help these victims," says Fifi Handayani, a 19-year-old student.

"From this event, I've learnt a lot more about the sex trafficking issues. And as a woman, I feel that the issue is close to my heart," adds Handayani, an account director at m:idea - the first media conglomerate in Singapore managed by tertiary students - which was commissioned by UNIFEM Singapore to coordinate and manage the concert.

Already, more than 2,300 people have visited the anti- trafficking website and declared their support. But some say the campaign's effectiveness remains to be seen.

"It's a step in the right direction, but will anything change here, even if one million Singaporeans sign up on the site to say we want to put a stop to this?" says one 18- year-old student, who declined to be named.

He does raise a valid point. The Singapore government, in 2005, turned a deaf ear to some 30,000 citizens who petitioned against the legalising of casinos here, an issue which sparked unprecedented public debate.

Even with the potential of news spreading virally through social media, it is unlikely that the campaign against sex trafficking will attract the same attention, much less put any real pressure on the government to clamp down on the issue.

"I think in Singapore, most of the people think that since it's not happening to them, and it's not a very open situation, then they hardly care about it," says Gaby Aw, a 17-year-old student volunteer at 'Sound Out'.

Like many here, D'Rozario is "not too sure" about the human trafficking situation in Singapore, or that it even exists. "I think we're quite safe (from such occurrences) here, but we may never know," she says.

"Everyone knows about Thailand, Cambodia and Vietnam, where sexual exploitation and trafficking is a big, big problem, but not many people know that Singapore is also affected," says Dick.

Maps depicting sex trafficking activity in the region resemble trade routes, and show the flow of women and children from poorer, developing regions of countries like Thailand, Vietnam and Cambodia, to richer city centres within the country - or across borders to well-off neighbours like Singapore.

However, the Singapore government in June protested a U.S. government report ranking the republic alongside countries such as Afghanistan on a human-trafficking watch list, dismissing it as a "political ritual" rather than an objective study.

The Philippine embassy in Singapore reported some 212 cases of human trafficking here involving Filipino women in 2007. Nearly 30 percent of the women had admitted to having engaged in prostitution or to have been coerced into sexual acts.

Filipino consul Neal Imperial called it just the "tip of the iceberg" as it reflected only women who turned to the embassy for help.

Exact statistics of sex trafficking activity, though, are not easy to derive. Even within various U.N. agencies, Dick says, the figures are different.

"We try not to get too caught up with the numbers because basically if this is happening to one person in Singapore, if this is happening in a flat next door to you, would it be ok to do nothing?" she asks.

LOAD-DATE: July 27, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

68 of 404 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

July 27, 2010 Tuesday

COMBATING HUMAN TRAFFICKING IN THE WESTERN HEMISPHERE: THE NEED FOR INCREASED NGO INVOLVEMENT

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 2903 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the Council on Hemispheric Affairs:

by COHA Research Associate Kelsey Carey

- U.S. politicization of trafficking unfairly nabs Venezuela;
- Human trafficking is a serious issue;
- Haiti's restaveks particularly exploited.

Human Trafficking is a global industry that transcends borders, regions, and cultures. Within the Western Hemisphere trafficking is an important issue that arguably helps to shape relations between Latin American and the United States. In June 2010, the State Department Report on Trafficking in Persons (TIP) included, for the first time, in its ten year existence, a ranking allocated to the United States as well as 177 other countries. The TIP report helps substantiate the claim that the United States and Latin American governments must strive to improve the lives of millions of innocent people who increasingly are victims of human trafficking. The restaveks, Haitian youth forced into domestic labor without compensation, exemplify the lack of protective measures against child trafficking who usually turn out to be the chief victims of trafficking.

The plight of these children, in Haiti and elsewhere throughout the region, reflect both the obvious and more subtle weaknesses in efforts to reduce human trafficking in Latin America. The trafficking of children is an immensely serious problem that regional governments paired with Non-Governmental Organizations (NGOs) must address. Moreover, the United States must actively engage with both the governments of other countries as well as foreign NGOs to facilitate this improvement.

Difficulties in Definition: The Palermo Protocol

Defining human trafficking is quite controversial. Although human trafficking is universally condemned by the international community, individual nations struggle to implement measures that meet the standards under the United Nations Protocol to Prevent, Suppress, and Punish Trafficking in Persons Especially Women and Children, more commonly known as the Palermo Protocol. It defines trafficking in persons as:

the recruitment, transportation, transfer, harboring or receipt of persons, by means of the threat or use of force to other forms of coercion of abduction, of fraud, of deception, of the abuse of power of a position of vulnerability or of the giving or receiving of payments or benefits to achieve consent of a person having control over another person for the purpose of exploitation. Exploitation shall include, at a minimum, the exploitation of the prostitution of others or other forms of sexual exploitation, forced labor or services, slavery or practices similar to slavery, servitude or the removal of organs The consent of a victim of trafficking in persons to the intended exploitation set forth [above] shall be irrelevant where any of the means set forth [above] have been used.

Though the above definition discusses the illegality of both sex trafficking and labor trafficking, two significant weaknesses remain. An article published by Human Rights Quarterly stipulates that the Palermo Protocol fails to acknowledge the trafficking of persons within borders, and instead may focus too heavily on the transfer of persons from one state to another. However, domestic trafficking exists in many Latin American countries, such as Haiti and Brazil. A second concern regarding the Protocol's definition is its inclusion in U.N. Convention on Transnational Organized Crime. Its placement there seems fitting, as much of human trafficking comes as a consequence of the actions of organized crime groups; however, individual actors and small groups also are responsible for a significant portion of trafficking.

Human Trafficking Defined by the U.S.

Even though the U.N. instituted the Palermo Protocol, many Latin American countries use the United States' definition of human trafficking. The Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA) defines trafficking as:

sex trafficking in which a commercial sex act is induced by force, fraud, or coercion, or in which the person induced to perform such act has not attained 18 years of age; or the recruitment, harboring, transportation, provision, or obtaining of a person for labor or services through the use of force, fraud, or coercion for the purpose of subsection to involuntary servitude, peonage, debt bondage, or slavery.

The U.S. government allots foreign aid in part based on the grade a country receives in the Trafficking in Person's Report, thus explaining many regional governments' attempts to adhere to the U.S. definition rather than the one given by the United Nations.

The TIP Report

The U.S. State Department releases the TIP Report annually. It discusses each country elaborating on improvements or regression and gives countries a grade: Tier 1, Tier 2, Tier 2-Watch or Tier 3. Tier 1 countries are those deemed to comply fully with the minimum requirements provided by the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act (TPVA). Tier 2 consists of nations that do not fully comply with the TPVA, but are making substantial attempts to do so, while Tier 2-Watch nations make these efforts as well, but still have a significant increase in absolute number of trafficking victims. Tier 3 countries, such as the Dominican Republic, do not fulfill the minimum standards nor are they making attempts to do so. Some critics of the TIP report argue that some countries in the region attempt to meet TIP requirements out of fear of receiving a low rank in the compilation's annual report and therefore do not implement measures specific to the nature and dimensions of the tempo of trafficking that is occurring within a given country.

Others speculate that the status of diplomatic relations between the U.S. and Latin America serves as the driving force behind the grade each country receives. Opponents of the U.S., like Venezuela unquestionably perceive a lower grade, than a country like Colombia which is rewarded for supporting U.S. interests in the region. For example, the United States ranks Cuba (a country with which the U.S. lacks basic diplomatic relations) as a Tier 3 country while Colombia receives the rank of Tier 1. Moreover, in 2005, Latin America had a higher percentage of Tier 3 countries than any other region in the world.

Even though it is difficult to produce a completely unbiased account of government efforts against trafficking without being swayed by foreign policy objectives, the TIP could at least try to find a balance between ethical concern and broader U.S. geopolitical goals and interests. This equilibrium is particularly important with regards to Latin American countries because the concept of migration and human trafficking are closely related to one another. Illegal immigrants who travel up through Mexico and Central America lack legal protection and are therefore more vulnerable to becoming victims of human trafficking. Moreover, strict immigration policies, such as those in the United States, provide only limited opportunities for legal migration that would go to protect immigrants. Restrictive human trafficking measures implemented by other countries in the region are likely to reduce the amount of trafficking in the United States.

The TIP Report as a Tool

In an interview with COHA, Mark Lagon, Former Ambassador to Combat Trafficking in Persons and current Senior Advisor of Corporate Responsibility for Lexus Nexus, uses the case of Venezuela to refute some criticism of the TIP report: "I advocated for raising Venezuela to a better ranking. The integrity of the report requires acknowledging improvement because all in all, there is no reason to give countries anything but an objective assessment." In this capacity, Lagon contributed to global anti-trafficking policy and directed the compilation of the TIP report. Venezuela, a nation with which the United States has strained ties, had a Tier 3 rank in 2007, but in 2008, it was moved down a level to Tier 2-Watch class. Lagon views the TIP report as a constructive tool for improving relations between the U.S. and Latin America.

He describes the improvement in US-Mexico relations with regards to human trafficking as a quiet success, which in part is due to the State Department's decision to assign the U.S. a grade for the first time. Furthermore, Lagon contends, Mexico continually hated any report where it was given a grade, but by including the U.S. in the TIP report we admitted weaknesses in a way that we had not done before. Consequently, this dialogue has led to a more constructive relationship, fostering cooperation in regards to preventing human trafficking.

He went on to clarify that the heart of human trafficking lies in exploitation; it's not always about migration. Forty percent of trafficking victims in the U.S. come from Latin America. It is every bit as much for labor as for sexual exploitation. A Congressional Research Report highlights the case of Mexico because it accounted for twenty-three percent of recognized human trafficking victims in the U.S. in 2008 alone. Thus, increased collaboration between the U.S. and Mexico regarding immigration and trafficking legislation will only yield positive outcomes. By examining the case of Mexico it is evident that a deepening of relations between the U.S. and Latin American countries could be facilitated by engaging in dialogue regarding human rights, especially trafficking.

The Nature of Child Trafficking

Countries that do not provide programs to combat child trafficking often receive more condemnation and higher rankings in the TIP report. One of the most unsettling aspects of human trafficking is the exploitation of children used for sex tourism. A significant discrepancy exists in the legal age of consent for females in Latin American countries. Averages range from fourteen to eighteen years, the legal age as provided by the Palermo Protocol. These disparities make victim identification more difficult. A 2008 article published in Human Rights Quarterly reports that other forms of trafficking include using children as panhandlers, news agents, garbage recyclers (i.e. those who sort through the public dumps for recyclable materials), domestic help, mining, agriculture, illegal adoption and child soldiers. These types of forced labor jobs frequently occur within the borders of one country, as with the restaveks in Haiti and child soldiers in Colombia.

A Focus on the Restaveks

The term restavek comes from a French word meaning to stay and refers to Haitian children who are forced into domestic labor without pay or guarantee of decent living conditions. According to the TIP report, there are 230,000 restaveks in Haiti who epitomize the concept that trafficking is not based solely on sexual exploitation. The United Nations Human Rights Council estimates that there are between 150,000 and 500,000 restaveks. Either figure still leads to the same conclusion: this form of exploitation should be of real concern to the island nation. Haitian society has historically been characterized by class stratification whereby authoritarian and hierarchal factors largely influence standards of living. In the most impoverished country in the hemisphere, adults regularly view children as economic commodities, which make them highly vulnerable to the perils of trafficking. Death of parents, runaways, and local sources of demand for child labor in urban centers and free trade zones are all factors that leave Haitian children open to exploitation.

Haiti has a long history of economic destitution. Seventy percent of the Port-au-Prince population was living in abject poverty even before the January 12th earthquake. Mark Lagon explains that this distress perpetuates human trafficking in that the rule of law is lacking in Haiti and economic desperation only exacerbates the already dire status quo. Poverty is the driving force here. It leaves people vulnerable and it's likely to take decades if efforts are limited to fighting trafficking." Consequently, parents, if possible, will send their own children to stay with other families in urban areas based on the reasoning that these new caretakers will provide a better life than they themselves could. Unfortunately, this is not the case, as most end up subjected to little better than indentured servitude and then may have to work for their owners from birth to adulthood. Often these children must work from the early hours in the morning until the last household adult goes to bed. When discussing trafficking in Haiti specifically, Mark Lagon commented, "Restaveks suffer the most acute form of domestic servitude. In Haiti there's a permanent underclass locked in homes, paid little or nothing.

In order to improve the lives of Haitian restaveks as well as those of trafficking victims in general, a moral imperative must be present as well as the maintenance of a political system where everyone has equal access to justice, not just the wealthy elites. Additionally, trafficking usually occurs as a consequence of corruption that pervades all levels of society, from law enforcement to the judiciary. The United States has the capacity to assist other countries in the region to make laws become reality by helping train enforcement agencies, pressuring governments, to conduct themselves with rectitude and cooperating with NGOs that have proven themselves worthy of respect.

UN Perspective on the Restaveks

Gulnara Shahinian, Special Rapporteur on Contemporary Forms of Slavery, also articulated the manipulative nature of the restavek system in a BBC article in June 2009. She contends that it is equivalent to slavery through the ways in which it "deprives children of their family environment and violates their most basic rights such as rights to education, health, and food as well as subjecting them to multiple forms of abuse including economic exploitation, sexual violence, and corporal punishment, violating their fundamental right to protection from all forms of violence." This 'modern form of slavery' has proven difficult to suppress for a number of reasons. First, a law exists in Haiti stating that employers must pay people for their services, starting at the age of fifteen. This almost guarantees restaveks being thrown on to the streets at that age, adding to the chronic cycle of poverty in the country. Although Haiti is a signatory to the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child, it has no laws to protect restavek children and the likelihood of any law's effectiveness today would be limited. The January 12th earthquake has only made the situation worse, as both the Haitian National Police and NGOs have reported an increase in alleged cases of forced labor and forced prostitution of children and adults since the disaster. Haiti's inability to protect the most vulnerable societal demographic -children-reflects a problem rampant throughout the region and the world.

The Importance of NGOs

Increased cooperation between the U.S. and Latin American countries regarding laws as well as punitive measures will be crucial to countering the efforts of traffickers in the region, but the legal canvas is not necessarily the only area of concern. Lagon pointed to the problem of corruption among law enforcement officials who "tend to blame victims instead of help them." In order to assist victims not only in Haiti but also those to be found within the region, it is crucial that Washington step up its assistance to NGOs. For example, the Polaris Project is an NGO that focuses on victim identification and then provides social services and transitional housing as called for by advocates of stronger federal anti-trafficking legislation. Another NGO, International Justice Mission (IJM), works in many locations, such as Guatemala, Peru, and Honduras, to rescue victims of human trafficking, particularly children, and bring justice to their perpetrators. Lagon explains that "We need to move the needle by extending the capacities of NGOs. They are often seen as an irritant, but are an essential part of civil society. By assisting NGOs financially, we can help build the capacity to decrease human trafficking." It is not merely a coincidence that Colombia which has a flawed human rights reputation, nevertheless received a Tier 1 ranking and is the largest recipient of U.S. aid in the region as well as being among Washington's primary military allies in the Caribbean.

Working Towards a Brighter Future

Human trafficking is a wealth-generating industry in which the risk to reward ratio eventually perpetuates the problem. A person can be exploited repeatedly, whereas drugs bear a one-time use restriction. This makes trafficking a lucrative matter for those involved. Tensions over definition and desensitization on the trafficking issue have only weakened efforts to prevent it. Consequently, the United States and governments in the region need to work together and thrust human trafficking into more of a spotlight. This must be done not merely once a year when the State Department releases the TIP report. Progress in the fight against human trafficking in the region will not come to fruition until the United States is willing to not only assist the governments of the Latin American countries, but also help NGO's identify as well as liberate victims. Washington must also resist any temptation to politicize the matter, as has been seen in the evaluation of Venezuela.

LOAD-DATE: July 28, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

69 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Sikkim Express

July 26, 2010 Monday

A Matter of Grave Concern

LENGTH: 479 words

The increasing number of incidence of human trafficking in the State is a cause for concern and it is time the authorities woke up and took notice. However, the trend is not just confined to the State; India has the dubious distinction of leading in human trafficking and this is certainly we should be worried about. India has been ranked as a "Tier II Watch List" country - only one level better than worst-performing Tier III countries such as Saudi Arabia and Zimbabwe - in the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP) compiled by the Union government. Given the definition of Tier II Watch List in the TIP, this implies that India ranks among those countries whose governments "do not fully comply with the Trafficking Victims Protection Act's (TVPA) minimum standards, but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards." Additionally, one of the three following conditions was found in India: first, that the absolute number of victims of severe forms of trafficking was very significant or was significantly increasing; second, that there was a failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons from the previous year; or, third, that the determination that India was making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with minimum standards was based on commitments by India itself, to take additional future steps over the next year. In terms of the definition of trafficking under the TVPA, a person may be a trafficking victim "regardless of whether they once consented, participated in a crime as a direct result of being trafficked, were transported into the exploitative situation, or were simply born into a state of servitude." The TIP adds that at the heart of this phenomenon are the myriad forms of enslavement including forced labour, sex trafficking, bonded labour debt bondage among migrant labourers, involuntary domestic servitude, forced child labour, child soldiers and child sex trafficking. The TIP noted that the Government of India "does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so, particularly with regard to the law enforcement response to sex trafficking." Yet, the TIP argues, the Indian government did not demonstrate sufficient progress in its law enforcement, protection, or prevention efforts to address labour trafficking, particularly bonded labour.

"Therefore India is placed on Tier 2 Watch List for the seventh consecutive year," the report said. Rough estimates by the UN suggest that 70000 to 2 million persons trafficked across international borders annually are women and children. It is violation of human rights that India as nation needs to address the issue and the civil societies need to seek to the questions on how to respond to the issue.

LOAD-DATE: July 27, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

70 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Right Vision News

July 24, 2010 Saturday

Speakers demand special law on women trafficking in Khyber Pakhtunkhwa

LENGTH: 506 words

DATELINE: PESHAWAR

PESHAWAR, July 24 -- The speakers at a provincial conference on "Trends and causes of women trafficking in Khyber Pakhtunkhwa" stressed upon the need for special law on women trafficking for Khyber Pakhtunkhwa that would address the issue holistically.

The conference was organized by Community Appraisal and Motivation Program (CAMP) here at a local hotel. Provincial lawmakers and people from various walks of life attended the conference.

Speaking on the occasion, Program Manager Advocacy Camp Mariam Khan, shared the findings and outcomes of the base line survey conducted by CAMP in four targeted districts of Khyber Pakhtunkhwa namely Charsadda, Swabi, Chitral and Landi Kotal where trends and causes of Women Trafficking are high.

She said that most of the victims are trafficked to other Provinces in the country, mostly Punjab, and families have no way of following up.

Among the 50 probable victims who were interviewed, 32 percent had left home for marriage while 28 percent were taken by force, 18 percent left homes for jobs, 16 percent because of the negative attitude of their families, 14 percent on the victim admitted they were subjected to sexual exploitation, 14 percent were forced into marriage, six percent were asked to get money from parents and 10 percent were compelled for theft and smuggling of contraband items, she told.

Mariam Khan said that as for their final destinations 34 percent of those interviewed had reached police stations for help while only 10 percent managed to get to shelter, 34 percent ended up in different cities or towns while the remaining did not share information of their final destinations.

Renowned legal/gender expert Rakhshanda Naz highlighted the national plan of action and policies existing in the country regarding women trafficking.

She said that due to non implementation of the existing laws and policies this year Pakistan have been placed in tier 2 watch list in the United States trafficking in persons report (TIP) for not complying into minimum standard regarding prevention, protection and prosecution.

An official from the Federal Investigation Agency said that FIA has very meager resources to combat the issue adding that it has only 12 officers in 24 districts with no female investigation officers. He said that legally FIA is not authorized to deal cases of internal trafficking.

Addressing the conference, Provincial Minister for Law, Barrister Arshad Abdullah, said that women trafficking is an emerging issue which should be holistically addressed by the government, NGOs and community.

He said that soon law would be made that will address all aspect pertaining to this menace.

Earlier, Program Manager CAMP, Tahir Ali Awan said that drastic reforms in laws and policies and implementation of the national plan of action in letter and spirit would address the issue Published by HT Syndication with permission from Right Vision News. For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: July 23, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 Right Vision News
All Rights Reserved

71 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Balochistan Times (AsiaNet)

July 23, 2010 Friday

Speakers demand special law on women trafficking in Khyber Pakhtunkhwa

SECTION: Vol. XXXIV No. 203

LENGTH: 471 words

The speakers at a provincial conference on "Trends and causes of women trafficking in Khyber Pakhtunkhwa" stressed upon the need for special law on women trafficking for Khyber Pakhtunkhwa that would address the issue holistically.

The conference was organized by Community Appraisal and Motivation Program (CAMP) here at a local hotel. Provincial lawmakers and people from various walks of life attended the conference.

Speaking on the occasion, Program Manager Advocacy Camp Mariam Khan, shared the findings and outcomes of the base line survey conducted by CAMP in four targeted districts of Khyber Pakhtunkhwa namely Charsadda, Swabi, Chitral and Landi Kotal where trends and causes of Women Trafficking are high. She said that most of the victims are trafficked to other Provinces in the country, mostly Punjab, and families have no way of following up. Among the 50 probable victims who were interviewed, 32 percent had left home for marriage while 28 percent were taken by force, 18 percent left homes for jobs, 16 percent because of the negative attitude of their families, 14 percent on the victim admitted they were subjected to sexual exploitation, 14 percent were forced into marriage, six percent were asked to get money from parents and 10 percent were compelled for theft and smuggling of contraband items, she told.

Mariam Khan said that as for their final destinations 34 percent of those interviewed had reached police stations for help while only 10 percent managed to get to shelter, 34 percent ended up in different cities or towns while the remaining did not share information of their final destinations. Renowned legal/gender expert Rakhshanda Naz highlighted the national plan of action and policies existing in the country regarding women trafficking. She said that due to non implementation of the existing laws and policies this year Pakistan have been placed in tier 2 watch list in the United States trafficking in persons report (TIP) for not complying into minimum standard regarding prevention, protection and prosecution.

An official from the Federal Investigation Agency said that FIA has very meagre resources to combat the issue adding that it has only 12 officers in 24 districts with no female investigation officers. He said that legally FIA is not authorized to deal cases of internal trafficking.

Addressing the conference, Provincial Minister for Law, Barrister Arshad Abdullah, said that women trafficking is an emerging issue which should be holistically addressed by the government, NGOs and community. He said that soon law would be made that will address all aspect pertaining to this menace.

Earlier, Program Manager CAMP, Tahir Ali Awan said that drastic reforms in laws and policies and implementation of the national plan of action in letter and spirit would address the issue.

LOAD-DATE: November 16, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

72 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
 Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

July 23, 2010 Friday

Philippines says US report on human trafficking "unfair, discriminatory"

LENGTH: 1454 words

Text of report in English by Philippine newspaper The Manila Times website on 23 July

[Report by Bernice Camille V. Bauzon: "Rising human trafficking cases put RP at par with Somalia"]

Failure to curb human trafficking and to win convictions in court have put the Philippines on the verge of being downgraded to a category with countries like Somalia, according to a US Department of State report. The government said that the report was unfair.

Citing the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report by the US State Department, Cecilia Flores-Oebanda, president of the Visayan Forum Foundation, said that the Philippines was in "a very alarming stage" when it comes to its human trafficking.

The Philippines is currently at the Tier 2 watchlist.

"Exploitation in the Philippines is massive . . . Unless efforts are made, or the President [Benigno Aquino 3rd] signs a waiver [to ask for consideration] from US President Barack Obama, we will be downgraded to Tier 3," Flores-Oebanda said during the Dialogue on Human Trafficking between Civil Society and Leaders in Government held at the G Hotel in Manila.

At Tier 1, a country is at full compliance with the minimum standards of the Trafficking and Violence Protection Act (TVPA). Countries under the Tier 2 are those who have made significant efforts to comply with the act, and Tier 3 countries are those who did not make any effort at all to comply with the Trafficking and Violence Protection Act.

The Philippines, according to the US State Department report, was placed at Tier 2 in 2008 and at Tier 2 watchlist in 2009. The Philippines can be downgraded to Tier 3 by the US unless minimum compliance standards are met by the Aquino administration.

If downgraded to Tier 3, the Philippines will be subjected to various sanctions, including the withholding of all non-humanitarian, non-trade-related foreign assistance and elimination of educational and cultural exchange programmes for government officials.

There is also a risk of losing $250-million worth of foreign assistance for defence and security funding in Mindanao.

Philippines cries unfair

Foreign Affairs Undersecretary Esteban Conejos Jr., who heads the office on migrant affairs, said that the US report "is unfair, discriminatory and not founded on facts." He added that the same report gave the Philippines a grade 9 in almost all important aspects - prevention, protection and partnership - except prosecution.

Conejos added that the report does "not accurately reflect what the executive and legislative is doing."

He argued, however, that the country's inability to prosecute human traffickers was "a matter of perceptions." Conejos noted that the difference between "illegal recruitment and human trafficking," and said that intent has to be established at the time of the recruitment in order to define between the two different violations.

Still, Flores-Oebanda said that the country was placed at Tier 2 watchlist in the US report because it did "not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and further efforts need to be taken to address the significant level of corruption that allows serious trafficking crimes to continue."

She added that "there were reports that officials in government units and agencies assigned to enforce laws against human trafficking permitted trafficking offenders to conduct illegal activities, either tacitly or explicitly."

This month, a few weeks after Justice Secretary Leila de Lima took office, 20 officials of the Bureau of Immigration were given 90-day suspensions after de Lima reversed the earlier ruling of former Justice Secretary Alberto Agra. He had junked the recommendation of a panel of state prosecutors to file administrative charges against the accused immigration officials.

The 20 immigration personnel were allegedly part of a human-trafficking syndicate operating in the Diosdado Macapagal International Airport in Clark, Pampanga, and victimizing Filipino workers bound for Malaysia.

Report cites specifics

Flores-Oebanda said that the US report specifically noted that the Philippines failed to resolve human trafficking cases. Of the 900 reported cases of human trafficking, only 380 cases were filed in court, and there were only 18 convictions since the law, Republic Act 9209, or The Trafficking in Persons Act of 2003, was passed in 2003.

In 2009, law enforcement agencies referred 228 alleged trafficking cases to the Department of Justice, but prosecutors initiated only 206 cases.

The report said: "Greater progress in prosecution and conviction of both labour and sex trafficking offenders are essential for the government of the Philippines to demonstrate significant and increasing progress towards compliance with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking."

The Philippines is the third-most leading source of migrant workers, next to China and India. Of the nine million overseas Filipino workers (OFWs) abroad, only 13 per cent are professionals.

"The remaining percentage [performs some of the most] demeaning works . . . [but] nothing is wrong with Philippines working abroad as long as they are protected," Flores-Oebanda said.

In remittances alone, the country has much to be thankful for migrant workers. In 2007, OFWs remitted $14.8 million; $16.4 billion, 2008; and $17 billion in 2009.

The dark side

Flores-Oebanda said, however, that human trafficking was modern-day slavery. Most victims end up in forced labour, debt bondage and prostitution.

The report said that human trafficking was a $32-billion industry that "places over 12 million people in exploitative situations." More than 161 countries are affected by human trafficking by either being a source, transit or destination country.

Every year, more than 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders. Some 50 per cent are believed to be children and 80 per cent women and girls.

Women were also always trafficked to countries like Malaysia, Singapore, South Korea, Japan and other neighbouring Southeast Asian nations where they are made into sex workers.

Going rate for Filipinas

Susan "Toots" Ople, head of the Blas F. Ople Policy Centre and Training Institute, said that some Filipino women sell for P26,000 if they were "virgins." Others are compelled to take pay as low as P5,000 to be a domestic helper in other countries.

Flores-Oebanda said: "Domestic helpers are the most vulnerable group of workers."

Ople, who is also the daughter of the late Sen. Blas Ople, added that another form of human and sex trafficking were migrant workers who end up working for websites peddling pornography.

In fact, she said that one such site has thousands of Filipino women working as entertainers. Ople added that most Filipinos victims of human trafficking also end up as "bar girls."

According to the US report, "Child sex tourism remained a serious problem in the Philippines, with sex tourists coming from Northeast Asia, Australia, Europe and North America to engage in the commercial sexual exploitation of children."

Ople said, "[If we don't act now], human slavery will have a Filipino face. Please be champions in the fight against human trafficking, not just in words but in well-defined sustainable and concrete actions."

She appealed to legislators who attended the event including Senators Aquilino Pimentel Jr and Ferdinand "Bongbong" Marcos Jr and Rep. Manny Pacquiao of Sarangani province.

Elzadia Washington, acting mission director of the United States Agency for International Development (USAID), said that the government must focus on alleviating poverty and generating jobs so that Filipinos would no longer feel the need to leave their homes and work abroad.

"No one, anywhere in the world including in the US, should be treated as slaves," she said, adding that the US government, who was "very much concerned," was ready to provide resources and assistance to the Philippines' fight against human trafficking and slavery.

Among the recommendations of the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report are to demonstrate greater progress on efficiently investigating, prosecuting and convicting both labour and sex traffickers; increase efforts to investigate and prosecute government officials complicit in trafficking; dedicate more resources and personnel to process trafficking cases; devote increase resources like shelters to victims of human trafficking; increase efforts to create linkages between governments of destination countries; ensure that agreement with foreign countries hosting OFWs are in place; assess methods to measure and address domestic-labour trafficking; and continue to disseminate information on the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act of 2003.

Source: The Manila Times website, Manila, in English 23 Jul 10

LOAD-DATE: July 23, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

73 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Congressional Documents and Publications

July 23, 2010

Cao Disappointed Over Administration's Decision to Strengthen Ties with Hanoi; Rep. Joseph Cao (R-LA) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 384 words

WASHINGTON, DC - Today, Congressman Anh "Joseph" Cao (LA-02) expressed his "profound disappointment" over the Obama Administration's decision to strengthen bilateral relations with Vietnam's communist government.

Cao, the first and only Vietnamese-American ever to serve in the United States Congress, described Hanoi's record on human rights and religious freedom as "atrocious." He said the the Vietnamese government does not deserve better U.S. ties until it demonstrates greater respect for the freedom and dignity of its own people.

Cao cited numerous examples of abuses committed by the Vietnamese government, including the harrassment, arrest and false imprisonment of pro-democracy advocates and clerics, the seizing of religious institutions and destruction of religious symbols, and the use of eminent domain to strip property owners of their holdings without just compensation.

The Congressman said, "These outrageous abuses should be universally condemned."

Clinton, in Vietnam to attend a forum of Southeast Asian nations on security and commemorate the 15th anniversary of normalization between the U.S.-Vietnamese relations, said she would be in Hanoi again this October for the East Asia Summit and to prepare for President Obama's visit to Vietnam next year.

But Cao said Vietnam's progress on the issue of human rights has actually declined since around the time of Vietnam's admission to the World Trade Organization in 2007. "Rather than building stronger ties," Cao said, "the Administration should be holding Hanoi's feet to the fire on its human rights record."

Cao called for Vietnam to be placed on the U.S. State Department's "Countries of Particular Concern" (CPC) list of nations known for ongoing, egregious violations of religious freedom; its "Tier 3" list of countries whose governments do not fully comply with minimum standards for combatting trafficking in persons for purposes of prostitution and labor; and that Congress pass the Vietnam Human Rights Act of 2009, which would prohibit U.S. nonhumanitarian assistance to the Vietnamese government unless the President certifies to Congress that Vietnam has made substantial progress respecting political, media and religious freedoms, minority rights access to U.S. refugee programs and actions to end trafficking in persons.

LOAD-DATE: July 26, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: COSHM

74 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Manila Times (Philippines)

July 23, 2010 Friday

Rising human trafficking cases put RP at par with Somalia

BYLINE: BY BERNICE CAMILLE V. BAUZON REPORTER

LENGTH: 1417 words

Failure to curb human trafficking and to win convictions in court have put the Philippines on the verge of being downgraded to a category with countries like Somalia, according to a US Department of State report.

The government said that the report was unfair.

Citing the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report by the US State Department, Cecilia Flores-Oebanda, president of the Visayan Forum Foundation, said that the Philippines was in "a very alarming stage" when it comes to its human trafficking.

The Philippines is currently at the Tier 2 watchlist.

"Exploitation in the Philippines is massive . . . Unless efforts are made, or the President [Benigno Aquino 3rd] signs a waiver [to ask for consideration] from US President Barack Obama, we will be downgraded to Tier 3," Flores-Oebanda said during the Dialogue on Human Trafficking between Civil Society and Leaders in Government held at the G Hotel in Manila.

At Tier 1, a country is at full compliance with the minimum standards of the Trafficking and Violence Protection Act (TVPA). Countries under the Tier 2 are those who have made significant efforts to comply with the act, and Tier 3 countries are those who did not make any effort at all to comply with the Trafficking and Violence Protection Act.

The Philippines, according to the US State Department report, was placed at Tier 2 in 2008 and at Tier 2 watchlist in 2009. The Philippines can be downgraded to Tier 3 by the US unless minimum compliance standards are met by the Aquino administration.

If downgraded to Tier 3, the Philippines will be subjected to various sanctions, including the withholding of all non-humanitarian, non-trade-related foreign assistance and elimination of educational and cultural exchange programs for government officials.

There is also a risk of losing $250-million worth of foreign assistance for defense and security funding in Mindanao.

Philippines cries unfair

Foreign Affairs Undersecretary Esteban Conejos Jr., who heads the office on migrant affairs, said that the US report "is unfair, discriminatory and not founded on facts." He added that the same report gave the Philippines a grade 9 in almost all important aspects-prevention, protection and partnership-except prosecution.

Conejos added that the report does "not accurately reflect what the executive and legislative is doing."

He argued, however, that the country's inability to prosecute human traffickers was "a matter of perceptions." Conejos noted that the difference between "illegal recruitment and human trafficking," and said that intent has to be established at the time of the recruitment in order to define between the two different violations.

Still, Flores-Oebanda said that the country was placed at Tier 2 watchlist in the US report because it did "not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and further efforts need to be taken to address the significant level of corruption that allows serious trafficking crimes to continue."

She added that "there were reports that officials in government units and agencies assigned to enforce laws against human trafficking permitted trafficking offenders to conduct illegal activities, either tacitly or explicitly."

This month, a few weeks after Justice Secretary Leila de Lima took office, 20 officials of the Bureau of Immigration were given 90-day suspensions after de Lima reversed the earlier ruling of former Justice Secretary Alberto Agra. He had junked the recommendation of a panel of state prosecutors to file administrative charges against the accused immigration officials.

The 20 immigration personnel were allegedly part of a human-trafficking syndicate operating in the Diosdado Macapagal International Airport in Clark, Pampanga, and victimizing Filipino workers bound for Malaysia.

Report cites specifics

Flores-Oebanda said that the US report specifically noted that the Philippines failed to resolve human trafficking cases. Of the 900 reported cases of human trafficking, only 380 cases were filed in court, and there were only 18 convictions since the law, Republic Act 9209, or The Trafficking in Persons Act of 2003, was passed in 2003.

In 2009, law enforcement agencies referred 228 alleged trafficking cases to the Department of Justice, but prosecutors initiated only 206 cases.

The report said: "Greater progress in prosecution and conviction of both labor and sex trafficking offenders are essential for the government of the Philippines to demonstrate significant and increasing progress toward compliance with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking."

The Philippines is the third-most leading source of migrant workers, next to China and India. Of the nine million overseas Filipino workers (OFWs) abroad, only 13 percent are professionals.

"The remaining percentage [performs some of the most] demeaning works . . . [but] nothing is wrong with Philippines working abroad as long as they are protected," Flores-Oebanda said.

In remittances alone, the country has much to be thankful for migrant workers. In 2007, OFWs remitted $14.8 million; $16.4 billion, 2008; and $17 billion in 2009.

The dark side

Flores-Oebanda said, however, that human trafficking was modern-day slavery. Most victims end up in forced labor, debt bondage and prostitution.

The report said that human trafficking was a $32-billion industry that "places over 12 million people in exploitative situations." More than 161 countries are affected by human trafficking by either being a source, transit or destination country.

Every year, more than 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders. Some 50 percent are believed to be children and 80 percent women and girls.

Women were also always trafficked to countries like Malaysia, Singapore, South Korea, Japan and other neighboring Southeast Asian nations where they are made into sex workers.

Going rate for Filipinas

Susan "Toots" Ople, head of the Blas F. Ople Policy Center and Training Institute, said that some Filipino women sell for P26,000 if they were "virgins." Others are compelled to take pay as low as P5,000 to be a domestic helper in other countries.

Flores-Oebanda said: "Domestic helpers are the most vulnerable group of workers."

Ople, who is also the daughter of the late Sen. Blas Ople, added that another form of human and sex trafficking were migrant workers who end up working for websites peddling pornography.

In fact, she said that one such site has thousands of Filipino women working as entertainers. Ople added that most Filipinos victims of human trafficking also end up as "bar girls."

According to the US report, "Child sex tourism remained a serious problem in the Philippines, with sex tourists coming from Northeast Asia, Australia, Europe and North America to engage in the commercial sexual exploitation of children."

Ople said, "[If we don't act now], human slavery will have a Filipino face. Please be champions in the fight against human trafficking, not just in words but in well-defined sustainable and concrete actions."

She appealed to legislators who attended the event including Senators Aquilino Pimentel Jr. and Ferdinand "Bongbong" Marcos Jr. and Rep. Manny Pacquiao of Saranggani province.

Elzadia Washington, acting mission director of the United States Agency for International Development (USAID), said that the government must focus on alleviating poverty and generating jobs so that Filipinos would no longer feel the need to leave their homes and work abroad.

"No one, anywhere in the world including in the US, should be treated as slaves," she said, adding that the US government, who was "very much concerned," was ready to provide resources and assistance to the Philippines' fight against human trafficking and slavery.

Among the recommendations of the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report are to demonstrate greater progress on efficiently investigating, prosecuting and convicting both labor and sex traffickers; increase efforts to investigate and prosecute government officials complicit in trafficking; dedicate more resources and personnel to process trafficking cases; devote increase resources like shelters to victims of human trafficking; increase efforts to create linkages between governments of destination countries; ensure that agreement with foreign countries hosting OFWs are in place; assess methods to measure and address domestic-labor trafficking; and continue to disseminate information on the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act of 2003.

LOAD-DATE: July 26, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 News Bites Pty Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

Global News Bites

75 of 404 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

July 23, 2010 Friday

CAO DISAPPOINTED OVER ADMINISTRATION'S DECISION TO STRENGTHEN TIES WITH HANOI

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 395 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of Louisiana Rep. Joseph Cao:

Today, Congressman Anh "Joseph" Cao (LA-02) expressed his "profound disappointment" over the Obama Administration's decision to strengthen bilateral relations with Vietnam's communist government.

Cao, the first and only Vietnamese-American ever to serve in the United States Congress, described Hanoi's record on human rights and religious freedom as "atrocious." He said the the Vietnamese government does not deserve better U.S. ties until it demonstrates greater respect for the freedom and dignity of its own people.

Cao cited numerous examples of abuses committed by the Vietnamese government, including the harrassment, arrest and false imprisonment of pro-democracy advocates and clerics, the seizing of religious institutions and destruction of religious symbols, and the use of eminent domain to strip property owners of their holdings without just compensation.

The Congressman said, "These outrageous abuses should be universally condemned."

Clinton, in Vietnam to attend a forum of Southeast Asian nations on security and commemorate the 15th anniversary of normalization between the U.S.-Vietnamese relations, said she would be in Hanoi again this October for the East Asia Summit and to prepare for President Obama's visit to Vietnam next year.

But Cao said Vietnam's progress on the issue of human rights has actually declined since around the time of Vietnam's admission to the World Trade Organization in 2007. "Rather than building stronger ties," Cao said, "the Administration should be holding Hanoi's feet to the fire on its human rights record."

Cao called for Vietnam to be placed on the U.S. State Department's "Countries of Particular Concern" (CPC) list of nations known for ongoing, egregious violations of religious freedom; its "Tier 3" list of countries whose governments do not fully comply with minimum standards for combatting trafficking in persons for purposes of prostitution and labor; and that Congress pass the Vietnam Human Rights Act of 2009, which would prohibit U.S. nonhumanitarian assistance to the Vietnamese government unless the President certifies to Congress that Vietnam has made substantial progress respecting political, media and religious freedoms, minority rights access to U.S. refugee programs and actions to end trafficking in persons.

###

LOAD-DATE: July 23, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

76 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

July 23, 2010 Friday 2:11 AM EST

Cao Disappointed Over Administration's Decision to Strengthen Ties with Hanoi

BYLINE: Targeted News ServiceLENGTH: 410 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Joseph Cao, R-La. (2nd CD), issued the following news release:

Today, Congressman Anh "Joseph" Cao (LA-02) expressed his "profound disappointment" over the Obama Administration's decision to strengthen bilateral relations with Vietnam's communist government.

Cao, the first and only Vietnamese-American ever to serve in the United States Congress, described Hanoi's record on human rights and religious freedom as "atrocious." He said the the Vietnamese government does not deserve better U.S. ties until it demonstrates greater respect for the freedom and dignity of its own people.

Cao cited numerous examples of abuses committed by the Vietnamese government, including the harrassment, arrest and false imprisonment of pro-democracy advocates and clerics, the seizing of religious institutions and destruction of religious symbols, and the use of eminent domain to strip property owners of their holdings without just compensation.

The Congressman said, "These outrageous abuses should be universally condemned."

Clinton, in Vietnam to attend a forum of Southeast Asian nations on security and commemorate the 15th anniversary of normalization between the U.S.-Vietnamese relations, said she would be in Hanoi again this October for the East Asia Summit and to prepare for President Obama's visit to Vietnam next year.

But Cao said Vietnam's progress on the issue of human rights has actually declined since around the time of Vietnam's admission to the World Trade Organization in 2007. "Rather than building stronger ties," Cao said, "the Administration should be holding Hanoi's feet to the fire on its human rights record."

Cao called for Vietnam to be placed on the U.S. State Department's "Countries of Particular Concern" (CPC) list of nations known for ongoing, egregious violations of religious freedom; its "Tier 3" list of countries whose governments do not fully comply with minimum standards for combatting trafficking in persons for purposes of prostitution and labor; and that Congress pass the Vietnam Human Rights Act of 2009, which would prohibit U.S. nonhumanitarian assistance to the Vietnamese government unless the President certifies to Congress that Vietnam has made substantial progress respecting political, media and religious freedoms, minority rights access to U.S. refugee programs and actions to end trafficking in persons.

Contact: Taylor Henry, 202/225-3117

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS MT93 100724-2927187 61MarlizTagarum

LOAD-DATE: July 24, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 Targeted News Service LLC
All Rights Reserved

77 of 404 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

July 22, 2010 Thursday

CAO CALLS ON CLINTON TO PRESS FOR HUMAN RIGHTS AND RELIGIOUS FREEDOM IN VIETNAM

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 402 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of Louisiana Rep. Joseph Cao:

On the occasion of U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's visit to Hanoi, Congressman Anh "Joseph" Cao joined fellow members of the Vietnam Caucus on Capitol Hill today in urging her to press Vietnam's communist government to improve its record on human rights and religious freedom.

Cao and other Caucus members cited numerous examples of human rights abuses committed by the Vietnamese government, including: the harassment, arrest and false imprisonment of pro-democracy advocates and clerics; the seizing of religious institutions and destruction or defiling of religious symbols; and the use of eminent domain to strip property owners of their holdings without just compensation and with no recourse.

Clinton's visit marks the 15th anniversary of normalization between the U.S.-Vietnamese relations, and the visit is highlighted by signing of the U.S.-Vietnam Partnership Framework, which outlines a five year joint strategic framework for cooperation between the U.S. Government, the Vietnamese Government and other partners to combat HIV/AIDS through service delivery, policy reforms and coordinated financial commitments.

But Cao said Vietnam's progress on the issue of human rights has been spotty at best, and has actually declined since around the time of Vietnam's admission to the World Trade Organization in 2007. "They don't practice what they preach," Cao said, "and these outrageous abuses should be universally condemned."

Cao was joined at today's news conference by other members of the Vietnam caucus, including fellow Representatives Chris Smith, Loretta Sanchez and Ed Royce.

They recommended that Vietnam be placed on the U.S. State Department's "Countries of Particular Concern" (CPC) list of nations known for ongoing, egregious violations of religious freedom; its "Tier 3" list of countries whose governments do not fully comply with minimum standards for combatting trafficking in persons for purposes of prostitution and labor; and that the U.S. Senate pass the Vietnam Human Rights Act of 2009, which would prohibit U.S. nonhumanitarian assistance to the Vietnamese government unless the President certifies to Congress that Vietnam has made substantial progress respecting political, media and religious freedoms, minority rights access to U.S. refugee programs and actions to end trafficking in persons.

LOAD-DATE: July 23, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

78 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

July 22, 2010 Thursday 2:12 AM EST

Cao Calls on Clinton to Press for Human Rights and Religious Freedom in Vietnam

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 417 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Joseph Cao, R-La. (2nd CD), issued the following news release:

On the occasion of U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's visit to Hanoi, Congressman Anh "Joseph" Cao joined fellow members of the Vietnam Caucus on Capitol Hill today in urging her to press Vietnam's communist government to improve its record on human rights and religious freedom.

Cao and other Caucus members cited numerous examples of human rights abuses committed by the Vietnamese government, including: the harassment, arrest and false imprisonment of pro-democracy advocates and clerics; the seizing of religious institutions and destruction or defiling of religious symbols; and the use of eminent domain to strip property owners of their holdings without just compensation and with no recourse.

Clinton's visit marks the 15th anniversary of normalization between the U.S.-Vietnamese relations, and the visit is highlighted by signing of the U.S.-Vietnam Partnership Framework, which outlines a five year joint strategic framework for cooperation between the U.S. Government, the Vietnamese Government and other partners to combat HIV/AIDS through service delivery, policy reforms and coordinated financial commitments.

But Cao said Vietnam's progress on the issue of human rights has been spotty at best, and has actually declined since around the time of Vietnam's admission to the World Trade Organization in 2007. "They don't practice what they preach," Cao said, "and these outrageous abuses should be universally condemned."

Cao was joined at today's news conference by other members of the Vietnam caucus, including fellow Representatives Chris Smith, Loretta Sanchez and Ed Royce.

They recommended that Vietnam be placed on the U.S. State Department's "Countries of Particular Concern" (CPC) list of nations known for ongoing, egregious violations of religious freedom; its "Tier 3" list of countries whose governments do not fully comply with minimum standards for combatting trafficking in persons for purposes of prostitution and labor; and that the U.S. Senate pass the Vietnam Human Rights Act of 2009, which would prohibit U.S. nonhumanitarian assistance to the Vietnamese government unless the President certifies to Congress that Vietnam has made substantial progress respecting political, media and religious freedoms, minority rights access to U.S. refugee programs and actions to end trafficking in persons.

Contact: Taylor Henry, 202/225-3117

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS MT93 100724-2927189 61MarlizTagarum

LOAD-DATE: July 24, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 Targeted News Service LLC
All Rights Reserved

79 of 404 DOCUMENTS

US State News

July 17, 2010 Saturday 10:37 PM EST

HELSINKI COMMISSION CALLS FOR INCREASED EFFORTS TO COMBAT DEMAND THAT ENCOURAGES HUMAN TRAFFICKING

LENGTH: 593 words

Washington, July 16 --The Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe issued the following news release:

On July 14, 2010, U.S. Senator Benjamin L. Cardin (D-MD), Chairman of the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe (U.S. Helsinki Commission), convened a standing-room only hearing centered on the diplomatic impact of the Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report. The hearing focused on the ten years that the annual TIP report has been prepared by the State Department. In his statement, Chairman Cardin said that the "TIP report has emerged as a centerpiece in diplomatic efforts to advance human rights." He also noted that "child trafficking continues, which is why it is essential that Congress expedite consideration of the bipartisan Child Protection Compact Act (S.3184), an important tool that would give the State Department greater ability to provide assistance to countries with high incidences of child trafficking."

In his statement, Congressman Alcee L. Hastings (D-FL), Co-Chairman of the U.S. Helsinki Commission, cited the inspiration he derived from the designation of "Heroes Acting to End Modern-Day Slavery" acknowledged each year in the TIP report, including this year's designee, fellow Floridian Laura Germino, of the Coalition of Immokalee Workers. Congressman Hastings stated that, "Many agricultural laborers still encounter practices as insidious as I had seen in my youth, which rob them of their basic human rights. Unfortunately, these circumstances thrive throughout the world. We would be at a serious loss in challenging exploitation were it not for the dogged determination of heroes like Laura and the important monitoring efforts of the Trafficking in Persons Report each year."

Ranking Commissioner Congressman Chris Smith (R-NJ), the author of the legislation that created the TIP report (Public Law 106-386), encouraged Ambassador-at-Large Luis CdeBaca of the U.S. Department of State Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons (G/TIP) to work more closely with the Tier 2 Watch List countries in the OSCE Region, helping them to implement the changes necessary to meet the minimum standards and to avoid statutory downgrades which will otherwise be required in next year's TIP report. These countries include Azerbaijan, Moldova, the Russian Federation, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan.

Smith also focused on ways to deter demand for trafficking victims in all countries, including Tier 1 countries, saying: "The internet has opened a whole new front in the war with human trafficking-allowing demand to run free without obstacles. We must develop appropriate safeguards to ensure that freedom of speech does not become freedom to exploit and abuse."

Commissioner Congressman Darrell Issa (R-CA) focused attention on the need for greater tools for prosecution of traffickers and called on CdeBaca and Dr. Maria Grazia Giammarinaro, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) Special Representative and Coordinator for Combating Trafficking in Human Beings, to explore ways to potentially create extra-territorial jurisdiction for trafficking cases.

The Commissioners also heard testimony from Ms. Jolene Smith, CEO and Co-Founder of Free the Slaves and Ms. Holly Burkhalter, Vice President for Government Relations at the International Justice Mission.

More information about the hearing, including copies of statements and a transcript of the proceedings, can be found here. For more information please contact: Sarabjit Jagirdar, Email:- htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: July 17, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 Targeted News Service LLC
All Rights Reserved

80 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Congressional Press Releases

July 16, 2010 Friday

HELSINKI COMMISSION CALLS FOR INCREASED EFFORTS TO COMBAT DEMAND THAT ENCOURAGES HUMAN TRAFFICKING

BYLINE: BENJAMIN L. CARDIN, SENATOR, SENATE

SECTION: PRESS RELEASE

LENGTH: 590 words

For Immediate Release

Helsinki Commission Calls For Increased Efforts To Combat Demand That Encourages Human Trafficking

Contact: Shelly Han 202.225.1901

July 16, 2010

WASHINGTON On July 14, 2010, U.S. Senator Benjamin L. Cardin (D- MD), Chairman of the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe (U.S. Helsinki Commission), convened a standing-room only hearing centered on the diplomatic impact of the Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report. The hearing focused on the ten years that the annual TIP report has been prepared by the State Department. In his statement, Chairman Cardin said that the ``TIP report has emerged as a centerpiece in diplomatic efforts to advance human rights.`` He also noted that ``child trafficking continues, which is why it is essential that Congress expedite consideration of the bipartisan Child Protection Compact Act (S.3184), an important tool that would give the State Department greater ability to provide assistance to countries with high incidences of child trafficking.``

In his statement, Congressman Alcee L. Hastings (D-FL), Co- Chairman of the U.S. Helsinki Commission, cited the inspiration he derived from the designation of ``Heroes Acting to End Modern- Day Slavery`` acknowledged each year in the TIP report, including this year's designee, fellow Floridian Laura Germino, of the Coalition of Immokalee Workers. Congressman Hastings stated that, ``Many agricultural laborers still encounter practices as insidious as I had seen in my youth, which rob them of their basic human rights. Unfortunately, these circumstances thrive throughout the world. We would be at a serious loss in challenging exploitation were it not for the dogged determination of heroes like Laura and the important monitoring efforts of the Trafficking in Persons Report each year.``

Ranking Commissioner Congressman Chris Smith (R-NJ), the author of the legislation that created the TIP report (Public Law 106- 386), encouraged Ambassador-at-Large Luis CdeBaca of the U.S. Department of State Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons (G/TIP) to work more closely with the Tier 2 Watch List countries in the OSCE Region, helping them to implement the changes necessary to meet the minimum standards and to avoid statutory downgrades which will otherwise be required in next year's TIP report. These countries include Azerbaijan, Moldova, the Russian Federation, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan.

Smith also focused on ways to deter demand for trafficking victims in all countries, including Tier 1 countries, saying: ``The internet has opened a whole new front in the war with human trafficking allowing demand to run free without obstacles. We must develop appropriate safeguards to ensure that freedom of speech does not become freedom to exploit and abuse.``

Commissioner Congressman Darrell Issa (R-CA) focused attention on the need for greater tools for prosecution of traffickers and called on CdeBaca and Dr. Maria Grazia Giammarinaro, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) Special Representative and Coordinator for Combating Trafficking in Human Beings, to explore ways to potentially create extra- territorial jurisdiction for trafficking cases.

The Commissioners also heard testimony from Ms. Jolene Smith, CEO and Co-Founder of Free the Slaves and Ms. Holly Burkhalter, Vice President for Government Relations at the International Justice Mission.

More information about the hearing, including copies of statements and a transcript of the proceedings, can be found here.

LOAD-DATE: July 19, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Other

Copyright 2010 Congressional Quarterly, Inc. All Rights Reserved.

81 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Congressional Documents and Publications

July 16, 2010

Helsinki Commission Calls for Increased Efforts to Combat Demand that Encourages Human Trafficking

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 625 words

-- July 16, 2010

Contact: Shelly Han Phone: (202) 225-1901

Helsinki Commission Calls for Increased Efforts to Combat Demand that Encourages Human Trafficking

Highlights Role of Trafficking in Persons Report in Effective Diplomacy

WASHINGTON---On July 14, 2010, U.S. Senator Benjamin L. Cardin (D-MD), Chairman of the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe (U.S. Helsinki Commission), convened a standing-room only hearing centered on the diplomatic impact of the Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report. The hearing focused on the ten years that the annual TIP report has been prepared by the State Department. In his statement, Chairman Cardin said that the "TIP report has emerged as a centerpiece in diplomatic efforts to advance human rights." He also noted that "child trafficking continues, which is why it is essential that Congress expedite consideration of the bipartisan Child Protection Compact Act (S.3184), an important tool that would give the State Department greater ability to provide assistance to countries with high incidences of child trafficking."

In his statement, Congressman Alcee L. Hastings (D-FL), Co-Chairman of the U.S. Helsinki Commission, cited the inspiration he derived from the designation of "Heroes Acting to End Modern-Day Slavery" acknowledged each year in the TIP report, including this year's designee, fellow Floridian Laura Germino, of the Coalition of Immokalee Workers. Congressman Hastings stated that, "Many agricultural laborers still encounter practices as insidious as I had seen in my youth, which rob them of their basic human rights. Unfortunately, these circumstances thrive throughout the world. We would be at a serious loss in challenging exploitation were it not for the dogged determination of heroes like Laura and the important monitoring efforts of the Trafficking in Persons Report each year."

Ranking Commissioner Congressman Chris Smith (R-NJ), the author of the legislation that created the TIP report (Public Law 106-386), encouraged Ambassador-at-Large Luis CdeBaca of the U.S. Department of State Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons (G/TIP) to work more closely with the Tier 2 Watch List countries in the OSCE Region, helping them to implement the changes necessary to meet the minimum standards and to avoid statutory downgrades which will otherwise be required in next year's TIP report. These countries include Azerbaijan, Moldova, the Russian Federation, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan.

Smith also focused on ways to deter demand for trafficking victims in all countries, including Tier 1 countries, saying: "The internet has opened a whole new front in the war with human trafficking--allowing demand to run free without obstacles. We must develop appropriate safeguards to ensure that freedom of speech does not become freedom to exploit and abuse."

Commissioner Congressman Darrell Issa (R-CA) focused attention on the need for greater tools for prosecution of traffickers and called on CdeBaca and Dr. Maria Grazia Giammarinaro, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) Special Representative and Coordinator for Combating Trafficking in Human Beings, to explore ways to potentially create extra-territorial jurisdiction for trafficking cases.

The Commissioners also heard testimony from Ms. Jolene Smith, CEO and Co-Founder of Free the Slaves and Ms. Holly Burkhalter, Vice President for Government Relations at the International Justice Mission.

More information about the hearing, including copies of statements and a transcript of the proceedings, can be found here

<http://csce.gov/index.cfm?FuseAction=ContentRecords.ViewDetailandContentRecordid=481andContentType=H,BandContentRecordType=HandCFID=36633715andCFTOKEN=44199882>.

LOAD-DATE: July 19, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: COH

Copyright 2010 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

82 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

July 16, 2010 Friday 1:40 AM EST

Helsinki Commission Calls for Increased Efforts to Combat Demand that Encourages Human Trafficking

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 616 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe issued the following news release:

On July 14, 2010, U.S. Senator Benjamin L. Cardin (D-MD), Chairman of the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe (U.S. Helsinki Commission), convened a standing-room only hearing centered on the diplomatic impact of the Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report. The hearing focused on the ten years that the annual TIP report has been prepared by the State Department. In his statement, Chairman Cardin said that the "TIP report has emerged as a centerpiece in diplomatic efforts to advance human rights." He also noted that "child trafficking continues, which is why it is essential that Congress expedite consideration of the bipartisan Child Protection Compact Act (S.3184), an important tool that would give the State Department greater ability to provide assistance to countries with high incidences of child trafficking."

In his statement, Congressman Alcee L. Hastings (D-FL), Co-Chairman of the U.S. Helsinki Commission, cited the inspiration he derived from the designation of "Heroes Acting to End Modern-Day Slavery" acknowledged each year in the TIP report, including this year's designee, fellow Floridian Laura Germino, of the Coalition of Immokalee Workers. Congressman Hastings stated that, "Many agricultural laborers still encounter practices as insidious as I had seen in my youth, which rob them of their basic human rights. Unfortunately, these circumstances thrive throughout the world. We would be at a serious loss in challenging exploitation were it not for the dogged determination of heroes like Laura and the important monitoring efforts of the Trafficking in Persons Report each year."

Ranking Commissioner Congressman Chris Smith (R-NJ), the author of the legislation that created the TIP report (Public Law 106-386), encouraged Ambassador-at-Large Luis CdeBaca of the U.S. Department of State Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons (G/TIP) to work more closely with the Tier 2 Watch List countries in the OSCE Region, helping them to implement the changes necessary to meet the minimum standards and to avoid statutory downgrades which will otherwise be required in next year's TIP report. These countries include Azerbaijan, Moldova, the Russian Federation, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan.

Smith also focused on ways to deter demand for trafficking victims in all countries, including Tier 1 countries, saying: "The internet has opened a whole new front in the war with human trafficking--allowing demand to run free without obstacles. We must develop appropriate safeguards to ensure that freedom of speech does not become freedom to exploit and abuse."

Commissioner Congressman Darrell Issa (R-CA) focused attention on the need for greater tools for prosecution of traffickers and called on CdeBaca and Dr. Maria Grazia Giammarinaro, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) Special Representative and Coordinator for Combating Trafficking in Human Beings, to explore ways to potentially create extra-territorial jurisdiction for trafficking cases.

The Commissioners also heard testimony from Ms. Jolene Smith, CEO and Co-Founder of Free the Slaves and Ms. Holly Burkhalter, Vice President for Government Relations at the International Justice Mission.

More information about the hearing, including copies of statements and a transcript of the proceedings, can be found here

(http://csce.gov/index.cfm?FuseAction=ContentRecords.ViewDetail&ContentRecord_id=481&ContentType=H,B&ContentRecordType=H&CFID=36633715&CFTOKEN=44199882).

Contact: Shelly Han, 202/225-1901

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS cp-JF78-100925-3022173 StaffFurigay

LOAD-DATE: September 26, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 Targeted News Service LLC
All Rights Reserved

83 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Straits Times (Singapore)

July 15, 2010 Thursday

Human trafficking or is it smuggling?

BYLINE: Radha Basu, Senior Correspondent

SECTION: REVIEW - OTHERS

LENGTH: 741 words

IS HUMAN trafficking a big problem or is it a rarity in Singapore?

On the one side is the United States government's Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report that downgraded Singapore to a Tier 2 'watch list' of countries that fell short of minimum anti-trafficking standards set by American and international law.

On the other is the Singapore Government, which dismissed the report as 'superficial and perfunctory'. It said that 32 cases of alleged sex trafficking were reported to the authorities here last year. Of these, two were found to be substantiated and were prosecuted.

Given the small number of reported cases here - and the fact that even embassies and activists agree that most women who come here for prostitution do so willingly - it is indeed unfair to lump Singapore in the same category as countries that are hot spots of human trafficking.

But why the difference in views on the extent of human trafficking in Singapore? One possible reason is definition.

In 2004, in response to an earlier TIP report, Singapore maintained that if a person enters the country willingly to work illegally (as, say, a prostitute), such cases would be considered 'human smuggling' not 'trafficking', which Singapore takes to mean the person was coerced or brought in against his or her will.

Human smuggling, as defined in the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organised Crime, is when a person pays another person to transport him or her to another country illegally, usually for work.

These days, the word 'trafficking' has a much looser meaning than what Singapore ascribed to it in 2004. Under American law and a UN Protocol signed by 120 countries, human trafficking refers to any form of forced labour or servitude, irrespective of whether a person consented to the job at some point in time. So those who are willingly smuggled into a country could end up victims of trafficking if they are exploited or forced to work against their will.

Singapore is not a signatory to the UN Protocol, known as the Palermo Protocol.

To bridge the gap of understanding, the US might share details of the alleged transgressions in the countries that have been downgraded. Singapore, too, can have a clearer definition of what constitutes trafficking under its laws.

The Government says Singapore has 'strong laws' against trafficking. The Penal Code, Children and Young Persons Act and Women's Charter allow the authorities to prosecute those involved in trafficking. However, none of these statutes gives a comprehensive definition of trafficking.

Countries that have specific anti-trafficking laws have definitions enshrined in their laws that mirror the Palermo Protocol's definition of human trafficking.

In 2003, the Philippines became the first South-east Asian nation to have a specific anti-trafficking Act. Under this law, the recruitment, transportation, transfer, harbouring or receipt of a person - with or without that person's consent - for the purpose of sexual exploitation, forced labour or services, would constitute trafficking.

The Singapore authorities say the large majority of foreign women arrested for prostitution here came voluntarily, and so were not trafficked. Still, for the few genuine cases that may arise, Singapore could increase the penalties.

Under the Women's Charter, the maximum prison term for trafficking a woman or a girl is five years. Under the Penal Code, the maximum jail sentence is 10 years for selling a minor for prostitution. In the US, penalties for sex trafficking range from a minimum of 10 years to life imprisonment.

There is one critical step the Singapore authorities have taken to encourage victims to come forward: in cases with 'clear evidence' of trafficking, victims will not be prosecuted but will serve as prosecution witnesses.

This approach should be publicised so that foreign victims know that though they have broken the law here, they can get help from the authorities to nail the unscrupulous middlemen who used them.

The fact is whether one calls it human smuggling or trafficking, Singapore is a destination for middlemen who want to trade in women. Tougher laws, together with a softer approach towards the women caught in a legal bind, can help more women report cases and eventually deter criminal rings from carrying on their trade in Singapore.

And if this gets Singapore a better rating in the flawed US trafficking report in the future - that's an incidental plus.

radhab@sph.com.sg

LOAD-DATE: July 14, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

84 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

July 15, 2010 Thursday 5:41 AM EST

Release of the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report - Mauritius Remains in Tier One

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 358 words

DATELINE: PORT LOUIS, Mauritius

The U.S. Embassy issued the following news release:

On Monday, June 14, 2010, U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton released the tenth annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report at the State Department.

The TIP report is the most comprehensive worldwide report on the efforts of governments to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons, a modern form of slavery. Its findings are intended to raise global awareness and spur countries to take effective actions to counter trafficking in persons. The assessment includes reports and rankings on 177 countries, including the first-ever ranking of the United States.

In the 2010 TIP Report, Mauritius remains in Tier 1. The Government of Mauritius fully complied with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. Mauritius sustained its strong efforts to identify, investigate, and prosecute incidences of trafficking during the reporting period. The Mauritius Police Force increased its offerings of anti-trafficking training programs for police officers and continued its awareness campaign in schools and villages. As part of the TIP action plan, the U.S. State Department has suggested possible additional actions by the Government of Mauritius to accomplish even more against Trafficking in Persons. The State Department TIP report recommends that Mauritius utilize anti-trafficking legislation to investigate and prosecute trafficking offenses and convict and punish trafficking offenders, including those involving adult women exploited in forced prostitution. Another recommendation is to designate an official coordinating body or mechanism to facilitate improved anti-trafficking communication and coordination among the relevant ministries, law enforcement entities, working groups, and non-governmental organizations.

The full text of the TIP Report, including all recommendations, is available on the State Department's website, www.state.gov/g/tip. The Mauritius country report is also available from the "Country reports" feature box on the homepage of the Embassy website: <http://mauritius.usembassy.gov>.

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS aa88aa88 100721-2922812 71AfzalAli

LOAD-DATE: July 25, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

85 of 404 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

July 14, 2010 Wednesday

FIJI DELEGATION TELLS WOMEN'S ANTI-DISCRIMINATION COMMITTEE CHANGE WILL TAKE TIME, BUT NEW DECREES AIM TO PROTECT WOMEN'S RIGHTS WHILE CONSTITUTION IS FORMULATED

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 7110 words

DATELINE: NEW YORK

The following information was released by the United Nations:

Committee Experts Urge Greater Voice for Women in Drafting New Constitution, Express Concerns about Human Trafficking, Inadequate Health Care in Rural Areas

More than a year after the abrogation of its Constitution in April 2009, Fiji was working with a series of newly established decrees to ensure that the rights of women were protected as the South Pacific island nation shaped a new Constitution by 2012 before holding elections two years later, members of the Fiji Government delegation told the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women today.

Introducing the country's combined second, third and fourth periodic reports to the 23-member expert Committee that ensures States parties are complying with the Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination against Women, Juki Luveni, Minister for Social Welfare, Women and Poverty Alleviation, said the Government was making significant progress in reforms to advance the equality of women and protect them from adverse and unfair discrimination. Yet the Government was the first to admit, "with sincerity and humility", its shortcomings in regard to its international obligations, and acknowledge that it had work to do to expand the advancement of women in the island nation, she added.

With a country that had both maritime and rural landscapes, members of the delegation addressing the Committee acknowledged that change and reform would take time. The focus in that was to remove the determinants that had caused upheaval in the past - there had been four coups in Fiji, and even with the pressure from the international community to enact "band-aid" solutions, those coups, which were race-based, had continued - and to then create a more stable system.

Dr. Luveni said that to ensure the protection of human rights since the State had been re-established under the Presidential Decree in 2009, the Government had promulgated numerous decrees, including the Domestic Violence Decree, the Crimes Decree, the Criminal Procedures Decree and Human Rights Commission Decree. And, in a direct move to bridge the gap between the Federal Government's Department for Women and non-governmental organizations, the Department had created the Fiji Women's Federation. It was meant to coordinate the programmes and activities of registered women's non-governmental organizations, in order to help achieve gender equality and empower women throughout the islands.

The creation of several women centres, she said, would help rural women by providing a venue for meetings, training activities and health clinics, and also help them to enhance their leadership skills and prove to voters that they could manage programmes, participate in the nation's development and become effective politicians, the delegation told the Committee. Two centres had opened since May.

Experts commended efforts under way, but urged that women be given a voice in shaping the new Constitution and that they ramp up their participation heading into the 2014 elections. The role of non-governmental organizations surfaced with the submission to the Committee of a so-called "shadow report", written in parallel to the country's official presentation. Saying they welcomed those reports, some Committee experts expressed concern that the authors of the "shadow report" in Fiji might face discrimination and personal persecution and victimization. The delegation assured the Committee that would not be the case.

Other concerns voiced by the panel of experts focused on human trafficking, the lack of health-care facilities for rural women and victims of sexual violence, inadequate supply of computers and textbooks in schools, women's insufficient access to credit and the pervasiveness of patriarchal attitudes that produced a bias against women.

The delegation explained that the Government was working in all areas to help women improve their lives. It was encouraging girls to engage in non-traditional academic subjects such as engineering, draft drawing and carpentry. Programmes to help rural women use the country's agricultural resources to earn incomes were in place, and women were targeted in a micro-enterprise scheme of the Government.

In response to questions about violence against women, the delegation said that, while there were no Government facilities for women victims of domestic violence, a non-governmental organization, the Women's Crisis Centre, provided care for those women. The Government also had a Domestic Violence Decree in place that protected women, and the Government was training the police in that area.

The Committee will meet again at 10 a.m. on Thursday, 15 July, to consider the combined sixth and seventh periodic report of the Russian Federation.

Background

The Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women met today to consider the combined second to fourth periodic reports of Fiji (document CEDAW/C/FJI/2-4). Led by Jiko Luveni, the Minister of Women, Social Welfare and Poverty Alleviation, the delegation also included Salote Radrodro, Director for Women, and from the Permanent Mission to the United Nations, Peter Thomson, Permanent Representative, Luke Daunivalu, and Esala Nayasi.

Introduction of Report

Presenting Fiji's combined second, third and fourth periodic reports, Minister LUVENI said her country had experienced a turbulent history since its independence in 1970. That had included military coups, discouraging economic growth and an over-reliance on the agricultural sector, which had made the country vulnerable to political change and natural disasters. The Government believed it had made significant progress in reforms that would advance the equality of women, their protection from adverse and unfair discrimination, and aim to improve the long-term welfare of the vulnerable.

She explained that the report was a collaborative effort, which embraced the consultations with more than 600 individuals, including Government officials, non-governmental organizations, development partners and others.

In May 2010, the Department for Women had created the Fiji Women's Federation to coordinate the programmes and activities of registered women's non-governmental organizations, in an effort to achieve gender equality and women's empowerment. It aimed to bridge the gap between the Department and non-governmental organizations. The Department was also working with development partners to support that goal by constructing women's centres in 14 provinces and semi-urban settlements. Those centres were meant to empower rural women by enhancing their leadership and programme management skills and providing a venue for meetings, training activities, women's health clinics and other exercises to build their capacity.

Referring to the abrogation of the 1997 Constitution on 10 April 2009, she said it had not removed the right to gender equality or the right of ordinary persons to challenge discrimination before the Fiji Human Rights Commission and the High Court of Fiji. Other developments since April 2009 that ensured human rights included the re-establishment of the judiciary, the promulgation of the Domestic Violence Decree, the Crimes Decree, Criminal Procedure Decree and the proposed promulgation of the HIV and STIs (sexually transmitted infections) Prevention, Care and Support Decree 2010.

She added that she had read the "shadow report", written by unnamed persons, about Fiji's commitment to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women. It was clear that the report's focus was not Fiji's commitment to the treaty, but rather on mostly unrelated political issues. The community of non-governmental organizations in Fiji was divided about the admission of the "shadow report"; most of the women's organizations were prepared to work with the Government in the reform process. The "shadow report" was silent about its consultation process and authorship, and it was outdated and did not refer to several important reforms adopted by the Government.

With regard to important economic reforms that impacted women, she said the Wages Regulation Order 2009 had helped boost minimum wages by 20 per cent and the Employment Relations Promulgation 2007 had brought about much fairer employment practices, providing, for example, maternity-leave benefits. As a patriarchal society with culturally driven attitudes on women's subordination, women remained disadvantaged in many fundamental ways. The proper implementation of laws was essential, therefore, and Fiji needed to work harder to strengthen its laws and regulatory frameworks to achieve greater economic empowerment for women.

In that vein, she said many significant laws had been passed and workshops held to train the judiciary, prosecutors, police and legal aid lawyers on the extent of the laws and how to implement them in a gender-sensitive way. Rape, for example, was now tried only in the High Court and was no longer prosecuted in the Magistrates Courts by lay police prosecutors, the need for corroboration had been abolished, and questions on the previous sexual history of the victim was now limited.

Since the Crimes Decree had entered into force on 1 February, she said, extensive laws on human trafficking for the first time. The United States State Department's report on human trafficking last month recognized the Fiji Government's efforts in that area and removed Fiji from Tier 3 of the categories of countries. To give women greater access to the justice system, the Sentencing and Penalties Decree of 2009 required judges and magistrates to follow a careful sentencing process. Section 4, subsection 3, for example, required that the courts, when sentencing offenders for domestic violence, consider such factors as the impact of violence on the children and whether the offenders posed an additional threat.

The Crime Decree had created a new offence of torture as a crime against humanity, she continued. And, with the drafting of its new Constitution, Fiji would be ready to consider ratifying the Convention against Torture. The law on abortion under the Penal Code gave little protection to women who sought abortion, and while the Crimes Decree did not legalize the procedure, it provided much stricter guidelines for doctors to follow before they conducted abortions and required counselling of the patient by a doctor other than the doctor who would conduct the abortion.

She noted that the Department for Women continued its role as the Government's primary adviser on women's development and gender issues. The Cabinet had endorsed the implementation of the new Women's Plan of Action 2010-2019 and the Department would implement the five areas of concern: formal sector employment and livelihood; equal participation in decision-making; elimination of violence against women and children; access to basic services; and women and law.

Turning to women in decision-making, she said Fiji was slowly moving towards its target of having 30 per cent representation of women on all boards and committees. There were plans to address women's representation in Parliament under Fiji's new Constitution, which was being developed in preparation for the general election in 2014. Regarding education, Fiji had 99 per cent school enrolment and had put in place several measures to sustain that high level, such as providing free textbooks to cover all primary school children by 2012.

The Cabinet had deferred the ratification of the Convention's Optional Protocol in April 2009, she said, explaining the view that, during this time of reform, Fiji had to focus on strengthening its laws and institutions that allowed complaints of unfair discrimination within its borders. The Human Rights Commission Decree provided for the creation of the Commission and for investigating complaints, and it prohibited unlawful discrimination based on gender. During the period of institutional strengthening and law reform, the Cabinet would reconsider ratification of the Optional Protocol, after every effort had been made nationally to deal with discrimination cases.

Experts' Comments and Questions

CORNELIS FLINTERMAN, expert from the Netherlands, noted that the definition of discrimination in the 1997 Constitution was comprehensive, but included the word "unfairly". Since that Constitution was no longer in force, was the definition of discrimination still present in current law, and, if so, could the word "unfairly" be reconsidered? In that vein, noting the recommendations of Fiji's peers to restore constitutional order and rule of law, which was crucial to the protection of women's rights, had Fiji taken steps and was there a time frame towards that goal? He also noted that the report stated that Fiji's courts would be the watchdog of the implementation of the Women's Convention in all branches of Government. Was that still the case?

PRAMILA PATTEN, expert from Mauritius, appreciating the challenges that Fiji faced in implementing the Women's Convention, inquired about some decrees made several years ago towards that goal. How was the impact of those new policies and decrees being measured, and was there a special budgetary allocation and a national action plan? She also asked about any awareness campaigns targeting women in particular and if the new judges and magistrates brought in with the new regime had been trained on the Convention.

INDIRA JAISING, expert from India, said that the anonymity of the authors of the "shadow report" on Fiji reflected a fear of discrimination and personal persecution and victimization. She pointed out that the Committee welcomed shadow reports by non-governmental organizations, and she requested that the delegation give assurances that its authors would not be persecuted. Commenting on the report's section on military and security officers being tried for human rights violations, she observed that another section of the report spoke of immunity for such officers. That contradiction did not "quite square with each other", and she sought clarification.

DUBRAVKA IMONOVIC, expert from Croatia, observed that the combined third and fourth reports had been done by the former regime and that the responses to questions and inquiries had been done by the current regime. Was there continuity between the two documents? Also commenting on the "shadow report", she asked whether - with the strict media decree and lack of support for freedom of expression - it was difficult to have constructive dialogues on human rights with non-governmental organizations, which would be, in her view, helpful.

DORCAS AMA FREMA COKER-APPIAH, expert from Ghana, commented on the delegates' statement that they were not ready to ratify the Convention's Optional Protocol because of the need to build national institutions. She reminded the delegates that ratification did not mean that cases would not go through the national system, and she urged Fiji to ratify the Optional Protocol.

VIOLETA NEUBAUER, Expert from Slovenia, inquired about the status of the establishment of women's centres in rural areas. She was also interested in whether or not there were inter-ministerial and departmental systems in place to ensure gender perspective in all programmes.

Country Response

Regarding the definition of discrimination against women, a member of the delegation said there were several pieces of legislation in place, such as the Human Rights Decree and the Family Law Act, which helped to ensure protection of women against discrimination. Plus, the rights of all individuals would be embedded in the new Constitution. Other laws aimed at ensuring a robust legal system helped to protect women against discrimination.

Regarding electoral reform, she acknowledged that Fiji's political problems had had serious negative effects on the country's political life. As for the abrogation of the Constitution, she said that, since then, the Government had made reforms that had forged the independence of the judiciary, which was a priority. The adoption of a new Constitution was another priority for the Government, and a political dialogue was under way towards that goal. The country was in the process of shaping its new Constitution, which should be ready for implementation well before the general election in 2014.

Another delegate said that the Human Rights Commission Decree was in place to replace the Human Rights Protection Act. The Commission plugged in gaps in human rights protections left by the abrogation of the Constitution. He acknowledged that it did not go far enough. The Government intended to ratify all outside human rights treaties within a 10-year period.

Another delegate assured the Committee that the authors of the "shadow report" would not be victimized. The decrees were very new - adopted during the past year. She acknowledged that an impact assessment plan would have to be done.

The creation of the Fiji Women's Federation had bridged the gap between the Government and the community of non-governmental organizations and was an effort to avoid a duplication of resources, another delegate said. Two women's centres had been constructed and opened since May. Each centre, which served many villages, sought to ensure that the voice of rural women was heard.

Regarding the role of the courts, after the abrogation of the Constitution, the Administration of Justice Decree re-established the judiciary and its functions, a delegate said. Training was under way to empower the judges to enforce human rights laws, and gender-sensitivity training was being done to help implement the Domestic Violence Decree, which was enforced.

Experts' Comments and Questions

NAELA MOHAMED GABR, Committee Chairperson and expert from Egypt, inquired about the development and new plan of action for the social justice act, seeking information about how it would impact the gender perspective.

MAGALYS AROCHA DOMINGUEZ, expert from Cuba, noting that indicators on educational life and health and reproductive rights showed improvement, pointed out that political and economic power for women did not show the same improvement and that women were still at a disadvantage with regards to property and inheritance rights. With men moving to urban centres and creating a rural exodus, women were "a bit lost in all this". She also wanted more information on the new class on family life at the primary-school level, including if it had been limited to one area or the whole country. While commending the changes to the educational system, she expressed concerns about persistent stereotypes of women in family life and urged broader measures to eradicate those stereotypes.

SOLEDAD MURILLO DE LA VEGA, expert from Spain, commended Fiji on organizing its Women's Day. She noted that despite the media constraints, the media had been instrumental in challenging military misconduct. Were there any future plans to lift the strict media constraints?

Ms. NEUBAUER, expert from Slovenia, inquiring about the sex industry, requested information on the extent of prostitution, from street business and brothels to sex workers visiting clients in hotels. Commending the new Penal Code that criminalized the use of prostitution services, she asked about the efforts to introduce the new law. Also, were there exit programmes for former prostitutes?

SAISUREE CHUTIKUL, expert from Thailand, noted that the Penal Code stated that prostitution was illegal and that sex workers were not afforded the same protection and rights of other workers. However, the Ministry of Health worked with sex workers, which she found commendable. "You do take care of them even though it is supposed to be illegal." However, she also noted that prostitutes were fined $500, which was quite steep as compared to $30 in Thailand. She was also curious whether, in such a relaxed atmosphere, the decriminalization of prostitution for adult sex workers could be proposed. Because Fiji was based on tourism, and specifically on sex tourism, the report noted the economic issues and social implications of that industry. The Government was taking a multisectoral approach to address prostitution. She asked the delegation to describe that approach in concrete terms.

Turning to trafficking, she asked for Fiji's definition, how police and law enforcement officials were trained, and what protective measures were being taken for victims of trafficking.

Country Response

A delegate said the women's centres would give women the opportunity to prove to voters that they could manage programmes and participate in the nation's development, as well as become effective politicians. The Government was aware that it needed to secure a quota for women in parliamentary seats. That would be addressed as the Constitution was being developed. The Government capitalized on systems in place, such as the semi-annual provincial meetings, to bring women together from the 14 provinces and minimize the isolation of women living in remote islands.

Regarding the country's patriarchal society, she said attitudes differed throughout Fiji, and in several places in the country, it was not difficult to engage men. Though weakening, there was still an extended family support system for the elderly in the villages. Regarding property rights, all women had land rights. If married, a woman moved to her husband's land, but her land remained with her family. All indigenous women and men had property to which they could return. But if a person from the provinces moved into an urban area, they would have to find land for themselves. Eighty-six per cent of the land in Fiji was owned by the people. The Government was using laws to promote policies to enable land owned by a couple to be registered in both their names.

Regarding the participation of representatives of non-governmental organizations in the delegation sent to New York, another delegate explained that financial constraints meant the Government could only send two to this meeting.

As for freedom of the press, a media decree was in place that restricted the level of foreign ownership of the media to ensure that local values were reflected, a delegate said. Given the country's volatile political history, it was necessary for the media to be governed by socially responsible laws.

Turning to questions on prostitution, a delegate said that the Immigration Act did not deal directly with that practice, but requests for student visas and permits were processed by the immigration authorities, who engaged with appropriate entities, such as universities. The Crimes Decree was focusing on punishing people who sexually exploited women, rather than on the victims. The owners of the premises where prostitution was carried out were now prosecuted. The Crimes Decree, which replaced the old Penal Code, was specifically aimed at people who exploited child prostitutes.

Sections 111 to 121 of the Crimes Decree targeted the trafficking of women and children on both a global and domestic basis, strengthening the laws to prosecute the perpetrators.

The Government did not now have a database on prostitution, the delegate said, adding, however, that it was working with the police and prostitutes. Training was under way to identify alternative work for the women, such as in the catering or garment fields.

Experts' Comments and Questions

Ms. CHUTIKUL, expert from Thailand, reiterated her questions regarding the definition of trafficking, and the preparations and training of police and law enforcement. She also requested a description of the multisector approach being taken in those areas.

Mr. FLINTERMAN, expert from the Netherlands, expressed his disappointment with the new Constitution and new constitutional order time frame, and also asked for a more detailed explanation about the use of the term "unfair discrimination on the basis of gender".

Ms. COKER-APPIAH, expert from Ghana, asked how the Fiji Women's Federation decided what areas to work on.

Ms. NEUBAUER, expert from Slovenia, requested further clarification on the advisory committee and its composition, as well as its mandate and any results from its efforts.

YOKO HAYAHSI, expert from Japan, wanted more information about how women, within the time frame of developing the new Constitution, would be contributing.

Ms. IMONOVI, expert from Croatia, asked how the Women's Convention would be directly applied.

Country Response

One delegate stated that the Crime Decree did not give the definition of trafficking, but just gave the acts and offences of trafficking. Regarding the empowerment of police, exchange with the Immigration Department provided continuing education to police working in that area. The Judiciary Department also received that training. Capacity-building was in place for law enforcement personnel being sent overseas to other departments and agencies. At present, no data on prostitution had been provided, but the experts were assured that the delegation would provide that when it became available.

Regarding the participation of women in the drafting of the Constitution, the rural and national population were involved and their inputs would be used in drafting. There was a one-year time frame given before the text's finalization and one year for familiarization before the election in 2014.

Regarding the Women's Federation, participation was not compulsory; each non-governmental organization decided if it was interested in being part of it and how they wished to operate. Members of the Women's Federation Advisory Committee included heads of umbrella non-governmental organizations, among them, the National Council of Women, National Catholic Women's League, and Soqosoqo Vakamarama, an indigenous women's organization. Although there were only two rural women's centres at present, their managers had been invited to serve on the Advisory Committee, which advised ministers on women's issues they wanted addressed by the Government.

The implementation of the Women's Convention had begun within the Government's National Development Plan, which had then been mainstreamed into the planning documents of ministries and departments. All women's issues were now being picked up by line ministries, which then incorporated the concerns into their departments. The Women's Federation "captured" those action plans for implementation from the National Development Plan and developed work plans, which were then used by the women's centres and other groups. From that process, it was evident that there was "clear articulation" of how implementation of the Women's Convention trickled down to the community level.

Experts' Comments and Questions

Ms. HAYASHI, expert from Japan, regarding articles 7 and 8 of the Convention, respectively on political and public life, and representation, sought clarification on how women would be participating in the Constitution's formulation. She also asked for more information about the Media Decree and its interaction with the public emergency regulation, and how it would affect women's right to do outreach activities. She sought reassurance from the delegates that women would be allowed to do so.

Concerning women human rights activists not being allowed to leave the country, she asked for an explanation on the travel restrictions. She also asked for reassurance that the authors of the "shadow report" not be penalized.

MERIEM BELMIHOUB-ZERDANI, expert from Algeria, commended the equal composition of men and women on the delegation and added that the report was well presented and clear. Noting that the Fiji Senate was "by appointment only", she said that, in order to bring women into the political arena and fulfil the requirements of the Convention's article 8, up to at least 50 per cent of the Senate seats should be filled by women.

Country Response

A delegate pointed out that there had been four coups in Fiji, and even with the pressure from the international community to enact "band-aid" solutions, those coups, which were race-based, had continued. The need to eliminate the race-based determinants in institutions and culture required time. Currently, all Fiji citizens were referred to as Fijian, and not by race. With a country that had both maritime and rural landscapes, change and reform would take time. The focus in that was to remove the determinants that had caused upheaval in the past and to then create a more stable system. Regarding women activists, there were no restrictions on outreach activities and they were free to function as they had in the past. There was also no travel ban in place. If there were restrictions, they were court ordered. But at present, all citizens were able to move freely.

Another delegate said that women would participate in drafting the Constitution. In developing the People's Charter of Change, Peace and Progress of Fiji, every village and sector of society had been asked for their views in reforming society and implementing institutional reforms. That had been done without regard to race or gender. The drafting of the Constitution, which the Prime Minister's office was supervising, would ensure that the interests of both men and women would be represented. The interests of all stakeholders, including those of non-governmental organizations, would also be ensured. The electoral process would not be advanced without meeting the benchmarks of the road map the Government had set in place to be achieved before the general elections in 2014. Currently, economic reforms and infrastructure development were Fiji's focus.

The Media Decree and the public emergency regulation did not affect outreach programmes and activities for women, another delegate explained. All that was required was an application for a license or permit for any meetings or gatherings.

Experts' Comments and Questions

XIAOQIAO ZOU, expert from China, noted that 10 per cent of children between the ages of 5 and 14 were not in school in Fiji. She requested data on the racial and gender demographic in both rural and urban areas. Commenting on gender segregation, she noted that, according to the report, in 2003, girls had accounted for only 30 per cent in the technology field, with the majority in domestic service. What special measures were being taken to encourage girls to study non-traditional areas, which was an essential component to eliminating gender discrimination in the work force?

SILVIA PIMENTEL, expert from Brazil, asked when schools would receive computers, books and other educational materials, as indicated in the report. There was also a mention of schools being equipped to educate disabled students, and she requested information about the Education Ministry's plans and strategies in that regard.

Ms. PATTEN, expert from Mauritius, noting that the equal employment policy had had little impact on the presence of women in the work force, asked if counselling was available for women to stimulate occupational choices of non-traditional jobs. Regarding the pay gap, she noted that there were 10 wage councils, but she said she did not know their mandate.

NIKLAS BRUUN, expert from Finland, asked about the forced retirement at age 55 of civil servants, asserting that that had serious financial effects on female civil servants. He also commented on the report's description of cultural attitudes restricting female employment and asked what action plans and measures were being taken to challenge that.

Ms. MURILLO DE LA VEGA, expert from Spain, observed that women made up only a minority of the formal work force, and asked for information about the obstacles they faced in that regard. She also noted that not having a mandatory maternity leave was discriminatory, urging that provision for such leave should be included in the new Constitution. She pointed out that countries that did not utilize women's talents did not emerge from poverty.

ZOHRA RASEKH, expert from Afghanistan, noted that teenage pregnancies were increasing, but that there was no mention about sex education in the school system. What measures were being taken to educate girls in that area? Furthermore, cervical and breast cancer rates indicated a limitation of health services and education for women, and she also requested information on the measures being taken to address that. With HIV and AIDS, although preventive steps had been mentioned, they were vague and not gender-specific. The reference to the 12 women's centres had not contained information about girls' and women's access to them. Turning to prevention of AIDS and sexually transmitted diseases, she asked why programmes targeted at reduction had not been successful.

Taking up the issue of family planning, Ms. PIMENTEL, expert from Brazil, inquired about actions being taken to educate women about contraceptive use and strategies when dealing with unwilling partners. She also noted that the "shadow report" discussed the prevalence of violence against women. Yet, there was no policy against such violence in the Ministry of Health. What present or future measures were in place to address that?

Ms. ZOU, expert from China, questioned whether there was indirect discrimination against women in the area of credit. She asked if the Government had considered taking specific measures to create favourable conditions for women to gain access to credit to start their own businesses. She also asked what measures had been taken to help rural women in that regard.

Among several questions posed by FERDOUS ARA BEGUM, expert from Bangladesh, was whether there were any specific programmes in place to protect the rights of older women in various sectors, such as housing and health. In that connection, she noted that, as younger men and women left the rural areas for better economic prospects in urban areas, older women were left with more responsibilities in the rural areas. She also asked if women working the land had property rights and whether gender was considered in the development of housing plans. How many shelters existed in rural areas to protect victims of trafficking and prostitution?

Country Response

On education, a delegate said there was now free tuition in all primary and secondary schools. The Government provided bus fares to students in areas where there were buses, and free textbooks went to students in islands where there were no buses. Women were encouraged to engage in non-traditional subjects in school, and boys and girls could choose whatever subjects they wanted. Women were encouraged to take up subjects such as engineering, draft drawing and carpentry, and a girl's graduation from a technical school was highlighted by the media.

The delegate noted that Fiji had limited employment opportunities and educated people had traditionally looked to the Government as an employment source. The Government had established a mandatory retirement age of 55 years to give younger people more employment opportunities and to let retired people develop other sources of employment using the land.

To questions concerning the informal sector, the delegate said the Government was helping women engage in the production of agricultural products, such as vanilla farming and honey production, which would produce additional income. Women were targeted in its micro-enterprise scheme, and the Government encouraged banks to provide small loans and training to women in rural areas.

Regarding pregnancy and education, the law allowed any girl who left school when she was pregnant to return after she delivered her baby, the delegate said. It was mandated that women in the workplace could take a three-month maternity leave. Every village would have a women's organization, entrusted with looking after women's livelihoods, she added.

Fiji had a good number of health centres and nursing centres to provide access to reproductive health services and to promote the use of condoms, in order to prevent the spread of HIV/AIDS, another delegate explained. The Government had a family planning campaign, and there was a family-life education programme, which was incorporated into the school curriculum. Many young people living with HIV had "gone public" with their status and even gone on road shows to meet with the public. That had helped to eliminate the discrimination against them. There was a non-governmental organization that helped people living with HIV.

On another point, the delegate acknowledged that Fiji was losing doctors and that the Government was trying to train more physicians in its medical training centres. With a decree governing the care of children and women, doctors were compelled to report any cases stemming from abuse or violence.

Responding to queries on other issues, the delegate said that some islands had no banks and, thus, it was encouraging banks to set up facilities on the islands that had roads. While poverty existed among rural women and they did not always have money to pay for education or health services, there was always food available.

Single women and disabled women were included in the Government's housing scheme, the delegate said to other questions. There were no shelters in rural areas for women victims of domestic violence, but the villages offered community support. The 14 women's centres would serve as health facilities. She added that nearly every maritime island had a nursing centre.

Country Response

Regarding the rights of persons with disabilities, Fiji was developing a framework to foster an inclusive society for all persons, a delegate said. It was also working very closely with non-governmental organizations on a policy focused on the empowerment of all persons, including women and children, with disabilities. The Government was constructing a new facility on one of the islands for persons with disabilities, and looking into constructing additional centres, as well.

Concerning the public emergency regulation, the Government felt the freedom of association was to be balanced with the protection of national interest and security, especially if a gathering might incite political unrest, the delegate said. The procedural requirements for any proposed meeting were intended to safeguard the public interest.

Follow-up Experts Comments and Questions

VIOLET TSISIGA AWORI, expert from Kenya, commented on Fiji's patriarchal society and values, and asked for information about how the new family law was bringing about protection for all women in Fiji.

RUTH HALPERIN-KADDARI, expert from Israel, noted that married people were mentioned in the law, but that "de facto" relationships were not. How were women in informal marriages protected by the law? In terms of property and land ownership, the report stated that both men and women were equally entitled to own land and that in the case of the land being owned by a couple, it had to be registered to both the husband and wife. In the case of divorce, would the wife be entitled to half the land? she asked.

Noting that Amnesty International had said that the full text of the 2009 Decree on Domestic Violence had been limited to the Government's media statement, she asked how women could become aware of their rights under that new legislation if it was not fully available. Also, under that new decree, were shelters available for victims of domestic violence?

She pointed out that "bulubulu", a custom of amicable reconciliation, had previously been included in the Criminal Procedure Decree, but said she had not noticed that that specific section had been repealed under the new Criminal Decree. She said she considered that worrisome as there was no justification of forced reconciliation in a domestic violence case.

Ms. JAISING, expert from India, asked which would prevail in the case of an "intersection" between customs and the law; would the system be willing to put aside the custom and go with the law instead?

Country Response

Regarding de facto relationships, a delegate said that there was no specific law covering property distribution. But, as pointed out earlier, the law of contract would prevail, and on issues of title and ownership, partners were encouraged to share property.

The Decree on Domestic Violence, as mentioned earlier, was still a new law, the delegate said. Training currently was being conducted for the police and judiciary departments, as well as those responsible for implementation of the law. It was the delegate's personal view that the law was a public document and, hence, accessible to anyone. When custom and law intersected, the law would always prevail. The practice of "bulubulu" was in fact declining as women were now more aware of their rights. Furthermore, in courts, "bulubulu" was no longer accepted.

With the new implementation of no-fault divorce, there did not seem to be any significant problem, he said, promising to provide statistics on that at a later date.

Follow-up Experts Comments and Questions

Ms. COKER-APPIAH, expert from Ghana, requested clarification on the Women's Department, asking, in particular, if it was a full ministry.

Ms. HALPERIN-KADDARI, expert from Israel, said she did not want a personal view on the publication of the Decree on Domestic Violence, but an official one. And, she had asked whether or not shelters were available for victims of domestic violence.

Ms. HAYASHI, expert from Japan, said she understood that time was required to get it right in the lead-up to an election. But if the Government was to have open dialogue with its citizens in order to overcome determinants that created instability, then freedom of expression and association was essential. The delegation had said that women activists would have freedom of expression in outreach programmes, but it had also stated there were safeguards in place on the freedom of associations.

Country Response

The delegate clarified that the Ministry of Social Welfare, Women and Poverty Alleviation was referred to in the Department of Women. Although the Government did not have shelters for domestic violence, a non-governmental organization, Women Crisis Centre in Suva, had some provisions for victims. She also noted that, in Fijian tradition, extended family ties were strong and victims often moved in with their families.

The Domestic Violence Decree enforced prosecutions in courts and had ongoing training for law enforcement personnel, with a focus on gender sensitivity. "Bulubulu" was not part of the Criminal Procedure Decree. Law enforcement now had to deal with domestic violence as an offence, despite "bulubulu", and had to proceed with due process. Victims also had a procedure through which to complain against the police officer if her rights were not processed correctly.

LOAD-DATE: July 15, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

ArabianBusiness.com

ArabianBusiness.com

July 13, 2010 TuesdayOfficials plan new Kuwaiti domestic worker salary law*BYLINE: Elsa BaxterLENGTH: 158 words

Employers of domestic workers in Kuwait will have to ensure their employee's salary is paid directly into a bank account under new plans by the General Directorate of Immigration.

Legislation is still in the initial stages because many banks have failed to sign up to the new system saying workers' salaries are too low to warrant setting up an account, the Kuwait Times reports.

Brigadier Abdullah Al-Ali, head of the domestic labour department, told the paper the new measures would help protect workers against withholding of salaries.

The move follows recent concerns over abuses of domestic workers' rights, and officials hope it will help Kuwait remove its name from an official US State Department blacklist of countries with poor human trafficking records.

According to the report, the Commercial Bank of Kuwait and Gulf Bank offer current accounts to people on low salaries, but neither lender has said whether they would sign up to the scheme.

LOAD-DATE: July 14, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Web PublicationJOURNAL-CODE: 167

Copyright 2010 ArabianBusiness.com - ITP Digital Ltd.

All Rights Reserved

Syndigate.info, Al Bawaba.com

87 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution

ajc.com

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution

July 13, 2010 Tuesday
Main Edition

Change exploited kid laws

BYLINE: Jonathan Todres; For the AJC

SECTION: OPINION; Pg. 11A

LENGTH: 699 words

Do you remember being 13 years old? Picture your 13-year-old self and imagine someone older and seemingly much cooler taking an interest in you. It's initially great. Then imagine it all goes terribly wrong. He becomes abusive and forces you to have sex with older men so he can make money. Terrified and repeatedly raped by "customers," you reach a police officer one day. What happens next might surprise you. The handcuffs come out, and you are arrested for prostitution.

At 13, though the law says you are too young to consent to sex, once money is involved, even if it's paid to a pimp, the law now says you are mature enough to be considered criminally responsible.

In June, the U.S. government published its annual Trafficking in Persons Report, in which it reviews countries' progress combating human trafficking. For the first time, the report included a review of U.S. practices, giving the U.S. the highest possible rating. Indeed, the U.S. government has taken many important steps. But that is just part of the picture.

The report noted that the U.S. had rescued 306 children last year, evidence that certain law enforcement officers recognize the trauma these children experience. Yet in 2008, the latest year for which U.S. government data are available, 849 children were arrested for prostitution and commercialized vice. In other words, nearly three times as many children were treated as criminals than as crime survivors/victims.

Until now, in almost every state, a child under the legal age of consent could be charged with prostitution. New York, Connecticut, Washington, and Michigan are now the only exceptions.

On June 18, the Texas Supreme Court might have changed the landscape, when it decided In the Matter of B.W., a case in which a 13-year-old was charged with prostitution. She had been living with her 32-year old "boyfriend" and was arrested for prostitution by an undercover officer. Noting the "special vulnerability of children," the court held that a child under the legal age of consent cannot be deemed criminally liable for the crime of prostitution.

The opinion is worth reading, as it methodically answers every question raised by skeptics. Yes, there are many. This year, in Georgia, several concerned legislators attempted to fix a similar flaw in the state's law, to ensure sexually exploited children are not further victimized by being arrested and charged with a crime. The bill died in committee.

Opponents of "safe harbor" laws argue that they will create a loophole for pimps to exploit. The Texas court has answered that charge: Treating sexually exploited children as crime victims does not change the fact that pimps and johns can be charged with sexual exploitation of a minor. Also, as the court explains, if the concern is being able to help these children, then the juvenile justice system is not our only option.

The U.S. government asserts it deserves a "Tier 1" rating for its efforts to combat human trafficking. Yet too little is done to ensure victims' dignity and recovery, and even less is done to assist vulnerable children before they are exploited.

Let's hope the Texas Supreme Court's decision is the turning point. If we deem children below a certain age to be incapable of consenting to sex, then money paid to a pimp cannot change that. This flaw in the law must be corrected in every state in the land. And while we're at it, let's actually do something to prevent these violations of our children from occurring in the first place.

Legislators ought to prioritize prevention and strengthen family supportive initiatives that enable kids to pursue their education and avoid risky situations. Businesses should adopt socially responsible policies and support community initiatives to protect vulnerable children and reduce the demand for such exploitative services. And as citizens, we should hear the voices of survivors and learn from them so we prevent others from suffering.

If any of us were 13 again and a target of sexual exploitation, what would we expect from our community, state and country?

Jonathan Todres is a law professor at Georgia State University and an advisor to ECPAT-USA (End Child Prostitution and Trafficking).

LOAD-DATE: July 13, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspapers

88 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Kuwait Times

Distributed by McClatchy-Tribune Business News

July 13, 2010 Tuesday

Domestic workers' wages to be paid into bank

BYLINE: Abdullah Al-Qattan, Kuwait Times

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 718 words

July 13--KUWAIT -- The domestic labor department of Kuwait's General Directorate of Immigration is introducing new measures to safeguard the rights of Kuwait's domestic labor workforce, according to department head Brigadier Abdullah Al-Ali. One major change to the current system will be the introduction of legislation compelling employers to pay maids directly into their own bank accounts to avoid any type of embezzlement or withholding of salaries.

This legislation is still in its initial stages, however, due to the failure of many Kuwaiti banks to sign up to the new system since the domestic workers' salaries are considered too low to justify setting up bank accounts, while the Central Bank of Kuwait has also raised some objections. The new measures, which come in response to recent concerns over abuses of domestic workers' rights, will cover all domestic workers, from maids to drivers, cooks and others, he explained.

Brigadier Al-Ali explained that the directorate will specifically target those bodies and individuals concerned with this issue, working closely with recruitment agencies, sponsors and the domestic workers themselves. As well as protecting these workers' rights, the new procedures will help in removing Kuwait's name from the blacklist of countries criticized in the US State Department's 2009 Human Trafficking report for the conditions of migrant workers.

Some of the procedures will take effect at once, while others will take more time," Brig. Al-Ali explained. Some citizens, too, have expressed misgivings about the new regulation. Mohammad Al-Kandari, the head of a Kuwaiti family of five which employs three maids and a chauffeur, said that having to pay one's domestic staff on a monthly basis could disrupt the household budget of those homes with a number of servants.

For this reason, he said, some families pay their servants on a quarterly basis rather than giving them their wages every month. Al-Kandari also complained that paying servants' salaries direct to their bank accounts would cause more problems than it would solve, saying "Why fix something that's not broken?"

Mona Al-Shehab, a housewife and mother-of-two whose family employs two maids, a cook and a chauffeur, said that some households in Kuwait employ more servants than they need in order to make their lives easier. "Later on when it's time to pay the maids their wages, those people tend to underpay them so that they can afford that extra maid that sits all day long doing nothing," she said. The Commercial Bank of Kuwait is the largest bank to offer current accounts for those on low salaries in Kuwait, with man y account holders being paid KD 350 per month or less, a source from the bank said.

CBK has a specialist branch dealing specifically with account holders on low wages, whose charges are less than those for better paid customers, the source explained. The Gulf Bank also offer an account for those on minimal salaries, along with various other flexible accounts for low earners. Neither bank has yet commented, however, on whether it will be participating in the new payment system for domestic workers, although senior executives have welcomed the idea of working closely with the immigration de partment.

Brigadier Al-Ali has also announced that there will be other amendments to the current system governing the employment of domestic workers, with the department working closely with various embassies to provide a refuge for domestic workers fleeing abuse. This shelter will be able to accommodate a maximum of 1,000 people, taking the pressure off local embassies which currently have to house 90 percent of the maids fleeing abuse. The domestic labor recruitment agencies, meanwhile, will also be subject to mo re scrutiny and stricter conditions, which will include increasing the cost of their licenses from the current KD 5,000 to KD 20,000.

To see more of the Kuwait Times or to subscribe to the newspaper, go to <http://www.kuwaittimes.net/>. Copyright (c) 2010, Kuwait Times Distributed by McClatchy-Tribune Information Services. For more information about the content services offered by McClatchy-Tribune Information Services (MCT), visit www.mctinfoservices.com, e-mail services@mctinfoservices.com, or call 866-280-5210 (outside the United States, call +1 312-222-4544).

LOAD-DATE: July 13, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

ACC-NO: 20100713-KU-Domestic-workers-wages-to-be-paid-into-bank-20100713

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: KU

Copyright 2010 Kuwait Times

89 of 404 DOCUMENTS

New Straits Times (Malaysia)

July 6, 2010 Tuesday

Heavier penalty for traffickers

BYLINE: V. Vasudevan; Eileen NgSECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 14LENGTH: 227 words

THE government is taking the fight against human trafficking to the next level by proposing increased penalties for offenders.

The proposal also includes punitive and custodial sentences for those who assist or provide facilities to migrants who use the country as a transit point.

The proposed changes to the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act 2007 have been in the pipeline even after the country's standing in the fight against human trafficking has improved from Tier 3 to Tier 2.

In the Trafficking in Persons Report 2010 released by the United States' Department of State recently, Malaysia's efforts in fighting human trafficking were recognised.

In the bill tabled yesterday, it was proposed that any person who profited from the exploitation of a trafficked person would be fined between RM500,000 and RM1 million.

This is higher than the penalty of between RM50,000 and RM500,000 imposed for the same offence currently. Those convicted under this clause shall also be liable to forfeiture of the profits.

In tabling the bill, Deputy Home Minister Datuk Abu Seman Yusop said it would be tabled for second and third reading during the current meeting.

Under the proposed changes, the prosecution does not need to prove the movement or conveyance of the trafficked person.

The prosecution needs only to prove that the trafficked person was subject to exploitation.

(END)

LOAD-DATE: July 5, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHGRAPHIC: Dewan RakyatPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

90 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Nation (Thailand)

July 5, 2010 Monday

some thoughts on Rejuvenating us and thai relations

BYLINE: The Nation

LENGTH: 1045 words

In normal circumstances, the US Congress would probably not bother to adopt a resolution expressing political support of Thailand's effort to strengthen democracy and rule of law. It could be construed as an act of political interference. But this is an unusual time, so it has been considered as much-needed moral support as the country continues to build up credibility in the international community.

Last week's resolution (411 for, 4 against) by the House of Representatives received media headlines praising the US lawmakers for backing the ongoing national reconciliation roadmap through peaceful means initiated by Prime Minister Abhisit Vejjajiva. The House resolution came hot on heels of a stronger resolution of the US Senate, sponsored by Jim Webb (Democrat-Virginia) in May reiterating the importance of Thailand's long-term military alliance with the US with the five-point road map spelled out in detail. Then, a few days later, the US State Department issued a damaging report on Thailand's substandard handling of human trafficking with a Tier-2 Watch-list rating.

Earlier, the two sides quarrelled over the repatriation of Hmong refugees to Laos. Thailand proceeded with the plan, which was heavily condemned in Washington and Western capitals, ending half a century of Thai-Lao mistrust. There was also a small side-show when Kurt Campbell, Assistant Secretary of State for East Asia and Pacific Affairs, met with the anti-government leaders in early June in a Bangkok hotel, causing emotional outbursts from some senior Thai officials. But they managed to make up briefly after.

Such bickering has categorised the eventful years of Thai-US ties under Abhisit. Indeed, it reads a tale of two lovers who have stuck together for the past 177 years, from days when Siam, the former name of Thailand, was the first Asian nation to establish ties with the US. Since then, they have been through thick and thin, full of hopeful moments and disappointments.

As they try to maintain their relations, the world around them has transformed beyond recognition. After the fall of the Berlin Wall, Thailand is no longer the once much-valued US strategic ally in this part of the world. Amazingly, some Thai policymakers still expect the same old American reactions with the usual all-time support. These days, other countries such as Singapore, Indonesia and Vietnam have come to the fore with improved relations with the US, without being a US ally and immersing themselves with friendly rhetoric. After September 11, 2001, the US mentality has also changed, which affected its diplomatic approach towards friends and foes around the world.

Now, both countries will have the opportunity to address issues of mutual concern and reinvent their nonchalant ties. Foreign Minister Kasit Piromya will hold a third-round of strategic dialogue with the US led by William Burns, Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs, in the middle of this month. Outcomes from previous rounds were anything but strategic. Problem is, Thai-US ties are extremely diverse and entrenched in all spheres of cooperation. The US remains an important trading and economic partner of Thailand. They have made progress by dwelling on the past, building up on past successes. Somehow, this mindset is no longer sufficient. They have to think 'outside the box' to push their relations to the next level.

There should be a serious overall review of their security backbone, underlined by the 1954 Manila Pact and the 1962 Thanat-Rush communiqué, guaranteeing the US protection if foreign forces attack Thailand. Today, we live in a globalised world where armed conflicts among states are a no-no. Their time-tested alliance must be shaped in such a way that it boosts regional security and stability. Maritime security cooperation, nuclear non-proliferation and non-traditional security issues are new areas to be considered. But to do this, both sides would have to be creative and frank.

The Abhisit government has often asked what Thailand and the US, as an alliance, can do together to enhance peace and security in the region. Bangkok wants to be a proactive strategic partner of the US, rather than a recipient, as in the past. Thailand wants to be more than a logistic hub in American strategic thinking during times of natural crisis and conflicts through the use of U-Tapao air base and Sattahip naval base.

With the rise of China and India, Thailand's strategic location as a land bridge between South Asia and East Asia should come into play. Ways must be found to enhance broad-based security cooperation between the two nations. Instead of hedging its ways with major powers - a common practice in the past - Thailand now desires a more comprehensive strategic blueprint with the US.

On the surface, what made these relations more complicated and difficult has been Thailand's unpredictable domestic circumstances. However, deep down, one pivotal element, which must be discerned, has permeated into Thai-US ties - the broader participation of civil society in the government's decision-making process, especially in bilateral negotiations. Article 190 of the present charter, following the US checks and balances system, specifically gives Parliament the mandate to oversee negotiations with foreign countries. Due to bureaucratic red tape and a lack of understanding of Thai lawmakers, this mechanism has been misused and rendered the opposite effect, delaying key bilateral memorandums or agreements, including additional Thai-US public health cooperation.

The collapse of Thai-US free trade talks in 2006 was a case in point. Civil society representatives, for good or for worse, contributed to the richness of the debate, which in turn hampered the expected conclusion. Top-down decisions during the 2001-2006 Thaksin era led to extraordinary Thai-US diplomatic initiatives including claims of "black" prisons in the Kingdom.

Some rethinking on both sides is necessary to redress these aberrations. Transparency and civil society participation, crucial elements of American democracy - has become an indispensable part of Thai foreign policy - a far cry from the secretive world of yesteryears. In the long run, these democratic qualities will help boost Thai-US relations.

LOAD-DATE: July 4, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

91 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Nation (Thailand)

July 5, 2010 Monday

Rejuvenating the US's oldest friend in Asia

BYLINE: The Nation

LENGTH: 976 words

Last week's resolution (411 for, 4 against) by the House of Representatives received media headlines praising the US lawmakers for backing the ongoing national reconciliation roadmap through peaceful means initiated by Prime Minister Abhisit Vejjajiva. The House resolution came hot on heels of a stronger resolution of the US Senate, sponsored by Jim Webb (Democrat-Virginia) in May reiterating the importance of Thailand's long-term military alliance with the US with the five-point road map spelled out in detail. Then, a few days later, the US State Department issued a damaging report on Thailand's substandard handling of human trafficking with a Tier-2 Watch-list rating.

Earlier, the two sides quarrelled over the repatriation of Hmong refugees to Laos. Thailand proceeded with the plan, which was heavily condemned in Washington and Western capitals, ending half a century of Thai-Lao mistrust. There was also a small side-show when Kurt Campbell, Assistant Secretary of State for East Asia and Pacific Affairs, met with the anti-government leaders in early June in a Bangkok hotel, causing emotional outbursts from some senior Thai officials. But they managed to make up briefly after.

Such bickering has categorised the eventful years of Thai-US ties under Abhisit. Indeed, it reads a tale of two lovers who have stuck together for the past 177 years, from days when Siam, the former name of Thailand, was the first Asian nation to establish ties with the US. Since then, they have been through thick and thin, full of hopeful moments and disappointments.

As they try to maintain their relations, the world around them has transformed beyond recognition. After the fall of the Berlin Wall, Thailand is no longer the once much-valued US strategic ally in this part of the world. Amazingly, some Thai policymakers still expect the same old American reactions with the usual all-time support. These days, other countries such as Singapore, Indonesia and Vietnam have come to the fore with improved relations with the US, without being a US ally and immersing themselves with friendly rhetoric. After September 11, 2001, the US mentality has also changed, which affected its diplomatic approach towards friends and foes around the world.

Now, both countries will have the opportunity to address issues of mutual concern and reinvent their nonchalant ties. Foreign Minister Kasit Piromya will hold a third-round of strategic dialogue with the US led by William Burns, Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs, in the middle of this month. Outcomes from previous rounds were anything but strategic. Problem is, Thai-US ties are extremely diverse and entrenched in all spheres of cooperation. The US remains an important trading and economic partner of Thailand. They have made progress by dwelling on the past, building up on past successes. Somehow, this mindset is no longer sufficient. They have to think 'outside the box' to push their relations to the next level.

There should be a serious overall review of their security backbone, underlined by the 1954 Manila Pact and the 1962 Thanat-Rush communique, guaranteeing the US protection if foreign forces attack Thailand. Today, we live in a globalised world where armed conflicts among states are a no-no. Their time-tested alliance must be shaped in such a way that it boosts regional security and stability. Maritime security cooperation, nuclear non-proliferation and non-traditional security issues are new areas to be considered. But to do this, both sides would have to be creative and frank.

The Abhisit government has often asked what Thailand and the US, as an alliance, can do together to enhance peace and security in the region. Bangkok wants to be a proactive strategic partner of the US, rather than a recipient, as in the past. Thailand wants to be more than a logistic hub in American strategic thinking during times of natural crisis and conflicts through the use of U-tapao air base and Sattahip naval base.

With the rise of China and India, Thailand's strategic location as a land bridge between South Asia and East Asia should come into play. Ways must be found to enhance broad-based security cooperation between the two nations. Instead of hedging its ways with major powers - a common practice in the past - Thailand now desires a more comprehensive strategic blueprint with the US.

On the surface, what made these relations more complicated and difficult has been Thailand's unpredictable domestic circumstances. However, deep down, one pivotal element, which must be discerned, has permeated into Thai-US ties - the broader participation of civil society in the government's decision-making process, especially in bilateral negotiations. Article 190 of the present charter, following the US checks and balances system, specifically gives Parliament the mandate to oversee negotiations with foreign countries. Due to bureaucratic red tape and a lack by understanding of Thai lawmakers, this mechanism has been misused and rendered the opposite effect, delaying key bilateral memorandums or agreements, including additional Thai-US public health cooperation.

The collapse of Thai-US free trade talks in 2006 was a case in point. Civil society representatives, for good or for worse, contributed to the richness of the debate, which in turn hampered the expected conclusion. Top-down decisions during the 2001-2006 Thaksin era led to extraordinary Thai-US diplomatic initiatives including claims of "black" prisons in the Kingdom.

Some rethinking on both sides is necessary to redress these aberrations. Transparency and civil society participation, crucial elements of American democracy - has become an indispensable part of Thai foreign policy - a far cry from the secretive world of yesteryears. In the long run, these democratic qualities will help boost Thai-US relations.

LOAD-DATE: July 4, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 Nation Multimedia Group
All Rights Reserved

92 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Straits Times (Singapore)

July 4, 2010 Sunday

S'pore rebuts US trafficking report point by point; Wrong claims, factual errors made, ignoring Republic's holistic and comprehensive efforts

BYLINE: Goh Chin Lian

LENGTH: 981 words

The Singapore Government yesterday made public its detailed rebuttal of a United States Department of State report accusing the Republic of not doing enough to curb sex and labour trafficking.

The six-page document lambasted the annual Trafficking in Persons Report, published on June 14, for wrong assertions and factual errors.

It made the stand that Singapore did not have a serious human trafficking problem.

Singapore's Ambassador in Washington DC Chan Heng Chee has conveyed the document, dated June 30, to Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs Kurt Campbell and Ambassador-at-Large Luis CdeBaca.

The US report placed Singapore on a human trafficking watch list for the first time together with countries like China and India. Singapore's Foreign Affairs Ministry responded swiftly by calling on the US to examine its own record of illegal workers.

The Government's latest response criticised the report's mere reliance on reported and prosecution figures to judge Singapore's commitment against trafficking, as 'superficial and perfunctory at best'.

The Republic's approach of prevention, prosecution and victim assistance is comprehensive and holistic, but one 'which the US has chosen to ignore'.

It covers tough checks to prevent traffickers from entering Singapore, strong laws to prosecute anyone caught for human trafficking or exploiting foreign workers, and engagement with embassies to identify potential victims.

This approach is an effective deterrent, said the Singapore Government, borne out by an extremely low number of substantiated cases: Of the 32 reported cases of alleged trafficking last year investigated, two cases were substantiated and prosecuted.

Singapore will continue its calibrated and pragmatic approach, reviewing the approach if necessary, it said, rather than blindly follow a one-for-all operating model just to achieve a better technical ranking on the US report.

And just as the US has developed its own way to deal with its trafficking problems, different countries adopt different approaches. It said: 'It is a matter of what works for each country.'

Here is a summary of its response to the US allegations:

1 Many domestic workers in Singapore face debts associated with their employment that may amount to six to 10 months' wages.

It is odd that the US would choose to lay the blame on Singapore's door as these debts are almost always incurred in the worker's home country, the Singapore Government said.

Those entering Singapore on a work permit are issued with In-Principle Approval letters before they come, laying out their expected occupation, basic monthly salary and job-related expenses that their employers should bear.

Accredited maid agencies must facilitate the use of an employment contract on pay and rest days, or compensation in place of rest days.

2 Law enforcement agencies are passive and reactive.

Regular inspections ensure employers meet their legal obligations to foreign workers. The authorities held 2,252 foreign worker-related inspections last year.

Errant bosses are prosecuted. Foreign maids working here for the first time are randomly selected for interviews.

3 The Government made no increasing effort to prosecute and punish forced labour offences.

This allegation appears to be based solely on the fact that no cases were prosecuted under the Penal Code's provision on forced labour. The US' preoccupation with this clause is hard to understand, said the Government, which had informed the US that Singapore has prosecuted such behaviour under other Penal Code clauses or other Acts.

Last year, 4,761 errant employers, including those hiring foreign workers and maids, were prosecuted.

The police also conducted some 2,600 anti-vice operations last year, up from some 1,400 operations in 2008.

A total of 7,614 female foreigners were arrested last year for suspected vice activities, up from 5,047 in the previous year.

4 Some foreign embassies here identified about 105 female sex trafficking victims.

The police received only three reports of alleged trafficking from embassies. It is surprising and puzzling that embassies choose not to report these cases to the police, said the Government.

5 Observers expressed doubts as to whether the police routinely applied victim identification protocols in anti-vice sweeps.

As part of the interview protocol for women arrested for vice, all arrested people are asked if they had been coerced into prostitution and if they were trafficking victims.

6 Law enforcement efforts to curb prostitution led to trafficking victims being penalised by deportation for unlawful acts.

Trafficking victims are not prosecuted, but serve as prosecution witnesses. They are granted protection in shelter homes, and given meals and medical attention. When the case is over, the police arrange with the embassy for their return to their home country.

For cases without proof of trafficking, female foreigners are prosecuted only if found to have committed a crime or immigration offence. Otherwise, they are repatriated.

7 The Government reported referring eight children, who were potential trafficking victims, to shelters.

This is a gross distortion of facts, the Government said. The eight were not children, but aged between 17 and 41.

8 The police arrested 89 children for prostitution offences last year.

The Government had told the US Embassy the 89 arrested were minors under 18, not children, who are defined as those below 14. None of the 89 were below the age of 14.

9 None of the 228 prosecutions of employment agencies and bosses last year led to jail terms.

Twenty-seven of the prosecutions resulted in jail terms.

10 Indonesian and Filipino maids in job disputes were forced to stay in embassy shelters as government-funded shelters were not available.

This is false. They can opt to stay in government-funded housing, embassies and non-governmental organisation shelters.

LOAD-DATE: July 3, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 Singapore Press Holdings Limited
All Rights Reserved

93 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Right Vision News

July 2, 2010 Friday

Separate law on women trafficking sought

LENGTH: 245 words

DATELINE: PESHAWAR

PESHAWAR, July 02 -- Participants at a seminar stressed the need for making separate law on women trafficking in Khyber Pakhtun-khwa and its extension to Fata to combat the problem in a holistic manner.

In the consultative meeting of the Counter Trafficking Technical Working Group organised by the Community Appraisal and Motivation Programme, Project Coordinator of Combating Women Trafficking Said Afzal Shinwari said Pakistan Action Plan for Combating Human Trafficking had been prepared. "The goal of the government is to prevent and control human trafficking," he said, adding that the Action Plan had a three-pronged approach to achieve the goals including prevention of the crime, prosecution of those responsible for the crime and protection of the victims. "Unfortunately the government is not doing the needful in this regard, which has resultantly placed it on tier 2 watch-list of trafficking in person report this year," he said.

The participants were briefed on the proposed draft bill, which would deal the issue in a number of ways like inclusion of women and girls as the victims of trafficking, separate tribunal for prosecution, due role of police and other law-enforcement agencies, women trafficking, focused shelter homes and legal-cum-medical support to the victims of trafficking. Published by HT Syndication with permission from Right Vision News. For more information on news feed please contact Sarabjit Jagirdar at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: July 1, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 Right Vision News
All Rights Reserved

94 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 30, 2010 Wednesday 10:04 PM GMT

Five Ukrainians charged in human trafficking ring in US

LENGTH: 670 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 30 2010

Five Ukrainians were charged with running a human trafficking ring that forced migrants to work for little or no pay cleaning US chain stores such as Target and Walmart, according to an indictment unsealed Wednesday.

The victims, mainly young Ukrainians, were subjected to rape and other physical violence, slave-like conditions, debt bondage and extortion of relatives in Ukraine -- abuse that added up to a "nightmare" of human deprivation, the US Justice Department said.

The charges were released just weeks after the United States for the first time included itself in its annual State Department report on global human trafficking, ranking itself in the "top tier" of compliance with standards to protect against such trafficking.

The indictment unsealed in the northeastern city of Philadelphia charged brothers Omelyan Botsvyniuk, Stepan Botsvyniuk, Mykhaylo Botsvyniuk, Dmytro Botsvyniuk, and Yaroslav Botsvyniuk, alias Yaroslav Churuk, with extortion and conspiracy to violate racketeering laws, the Justice Department said.

If convicted of all charges, the defendants face sentences ranging from 20 years in prison and a 250,000 dollar fine to life in prison and a 750,000 fine.

Four of the five suspects were arrested Wednesday. Dmytro Botsvyniuk was said to be in Ukraine, which has not entered into an extradition treaty with the United States, the statement said.

They allegedly conspired "to engage in a pattern of racketeering activity, from the fall of 2000 through the spring of 2007, by operating a human trafficking organization that smuggled young Ukrainian migrants into the United States and forced them to work for the brothers with little or no pay."

The five allegedly told victims they would earn 500 dollars a month with free room and board by working for their organization.

But "they smuggled the workers into the United States and put them to work as cleaning crews in retail stores, private homes and office buildings without paying them," the department said, citing Target and Walmart -- the world's largest retailer -- as examples.

The workers "lived with up to five people in one room, slept on dirty mattresses on the floor, and were rarely, if ever, paid," it said.

"They were told that they had to continue working until their debts, ranging from 10,000 to 50,000 dollars, were paid."

One woman who worked for the brothers was "brutally raped on several occasions," the statement said.

Omelyan Botsvyniuk once "threatened to place a worker's then nine-year-old daughter into prostitution to pay off the family debt," the department statement added.

After some managed to escape, Omelyan Botsvyniuk "resorted to extorting the workers' families in Ukraine, threatening them with harm if the workers did not return to work or pay their debts," it said.

"They used physical force, threats of force, sexual assault and debt bondage to keep the victims in involuntary servitude," the statement noted.

US Attorney Zane Memeger said "the victims in this case entered this country with dreams of great opportunity only to find themselves living a nightmare.

"They trusted this band of brothers, they performed the work they were told only to be rewarded with false promises, threats of brutality, and deprivation of their basic human needs. No one trying to immigrate to this country should have to endure such mistreatment."

The State Department says human trafficking is among the most profitable criminal industries in the world, along with illegal drugs and weapons.

In a State Department report on world trafficking earlier this month, the United States listed itself as compliant with minimum standards to protect against the crime.

The report did however acknowledge that the United States is "a source, transit, and destination country for men, women, and children subjected to forced labor, debt bondage, and forced prostitution."

North Korea, Myanmar and Papua New Guinea remained at the bottom level of countries on the list that do not even meet the minimum standards on human trafficking.

mdl-ksh/mlm

LOAD-DATE: July 1, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

95 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Right Vision News

June 30, 2010 Wednesday

Upgradation of Pakistan on human trafficking list a significant achievement

LENGTH: 152 words

DATELINE: ISLAMABAD

ISLAMABAD, June 30 -- Upgradation of Pakistan from Tier-2 Watchlist to Tier 2 ranking by US Trafficking in Persons Report 2010 is a significant success of Pakistani officials working hard to combat human trafficking, said an Interior Ministry press release on Monday. Earlier on account of illegal human trafficking and smuggling the United States State Department had previously ranked Pakistan on Tier-2 Watchlist which was a cause of concern for the country. With significant efforts of Ministry of Interior, Federal Investigation Authority and other concerned government agencies under the supervision of Rehman Malik, Minister for Interior, the US has upgraded Pakistan's ranking. This development has improved the stature of Pakistan before the world

Published by HT Syndication with permission from Right Vision News. For more information on news feed please contact Sarabjit Jagirdar at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 29, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 Right Vision News
All Rights Reserved

96 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Right Vision News

June 29, 2010 Tuesday

Pak rank in anti-human trafficking improves

LENGTH: 365 words

DATELINE: ISLAMABAD

ISLAMABAD, June 29 -- Out of the twelve South and Central Asia nations ranked in the Trafficking in Persons (TIP) 2010 report, Pakistan is the only country to improve on its ranking from Tier 2 Watch List to Tier 2.

Pakistan's ranking as a Tier 2 country in the TIP 2010 report is an improvement over its 2009 rating, when it was listed as a Tier 2 watch list country," the report read.

The annual report, required by the US Congress, ranks 177 nations by tiers to measure the extent to which each government adheres to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, a US law enacted in 2000 to combat human trafficking and protect victims.

A Tier 2 ranking means a government is "making significant efforts" to comply with the anti-trafficking law's minimum standards but does not yet meet those standards.

Tier 2 watch list countries do not meet the minimum standards but are making significant efforts, yet trafficking is either increasing or more concrete steps are needed by the governments.

For the first time, the 2010 report includes the United States in its rankings, with the U.S. listed as a Tier 1 country, where the government complies fully with the law's minimum standards.

The U.S. Embassy in Islamabad acknowledged Pakistan's 2010 ranking in a statement, saying, "the US Government is committed to supporting Pakistan in its efforts to combat human trafficking."

The embassy's statement added that the 2010 TIP report reflected "the Government of Pakistan's efforts to prosecute trafficking offenders, prevent and combat bonded labour and protect trafficking victims."

Of the 12 South and Central Asia nations ranked in the 2010 report, Pakistan was the only one to improve on its ranking. In 2010, Nepal and Kyrgyzstan are ranked as Tier 2 nations, as they were in 2009. Bangladesh, India, Sri Lanka, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan are ranked as Tier 2 watch list, the same as in 2009. Afghanistan, Kazakhstan and the Maldives all ranked on the Tier 2 watch list in 2010, down from their Tier 2 rankings in 2009. Published by HT Syndication with permission from Right Vision News. For more information on news feed please contact Sarabjit Jagirdar at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 28, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

97 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Right Vision News

June 29, 2010 Tuesday

Pakistan shows improvement

LENGTH: 667 words

DATELINE: ISLAMABAD

ISLAMABAD, June 29 -- Out of the twelve South and Central Asia nations ranked in the 'Trafficking In Persons (TIP) 2010 report,' Pakistan is the only country to improve on its ranking from Tier 2 Watch List to Tier 2.

"Pakistan's ranking as a Tier 2 country in the TIP 2010 report is an improvement over its 2009 rating, when it was listed as a Tier 2 Watch List country," the report read. The annual report, required by the US Congress, ranks 177 nations by tiers to measure the extent to which each government adheres to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, a US law enacted in 2000 to combat human trafficking and protect victims.

A Tier 2 ranking means a government is "making significant efforts" to comply with the anti-trafficking law's minimum standards but does not yet meet those standards.

Tier 2 Watch List countries do not meet the minimum standards but are making significant efforts, yet trafficking is either increasing or more concrete steps are needed by the governments.

For the first time, the 2010 report includes the United States in its rankings, with the US listed as a Tier 1 country, where the government complies fully with the law's minimum standards.

The US Embassy in Islamabad acknowledged Pakistan's 2010 ranking in a statement, saying, "the US Government is committed to supporting Pakistan in its efforts to combat human trafficking."

The embassy's statement added that the 2010 TIP report reflected "the Government of Pakistan's efforts to prosecute trafficking offenders, prevent and combat bonded labour and protect trafficking victims."

Of the 12 South and Central Asia nations ranked in the 2010 report, Pakistan was the only one to improve on its ranking.

In 2010, Nepal and Kyrgyzstan are ranked as Tier 2 nations, as they were in 2009. Bangladesh, India, Sri Lanka, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan are ranked as Tier 2 watch list, the same as in 2009. Afghanistan, Kazakhstan and the Maldives all ranked on the Tier 2 watch list in 2010, down from their Tier 2 rankings in 2009.

During 2009, Pakistan endeavoured to prosecute individuals charged with human trafficking, the TIP report said. According to the report, 385 people were convicted in 2009 under the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance, compared to just 28 in 2008.

Another 166 were convicted under various other laws associated with human trafficking, the report said. At least three of those convicted were guilty of child trafficking, with the rest guilty of either labour or sex trafficking. In addition, the report said more than 150 Pakistani officials were penalised for facilitating or "participating in illegal migration and human smuggling."

"The Government of Pakistan made some progress in its efforts to protect victims of human trafficking," the report said. During 2009, local police successfully freed more than 2,000 bonded labourers in Sindh province, and Pakistan's federal government succeeded in providing legal aid and development assistance, including land, housing, money and agricultural assistance, to bonded laborers from the provinces of Khyber-Pakhtunkhwa, Punjab, Balochistan and Sindh. More than 1,000 children who had been trafficked to the United Arab Emirates were also successfully repatriated, the report said.

Pakistan also received mention for its efforts at preventing human trafficking, including projects such as eliminating bonded labour in brick kilns and the country's Child Protection Management Information System, which collectively spent millions of dollars to issue Computerized National Identification Cards, provide loans so labourers could get out of debt, and fund community organisations to prevent child trafficking.

Pakistan has also invested in training its police and military officials in the most effective ways to combat human trafficking, the report said. Published by HT Syndication with permission from Right Vision News. For more information on news feed please contact Sarabjit Jagirdar at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 28, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 Right Vision News
All Rights Reserved

98 of 404 DOCUMENTS

South Asian Media Network

June 29, 2010 Tuesday

Pak improves "Trafficking In Persons 2010" rankings

LENGTH: 653 words

DATELINE: ISLAMABAD

ISLAMABAD, June 29 -- Out of the twelve South and Central Asia nations ranked in the Trafficking In Persons (TIP) 2010 report,

Pakistan is the only country to improve its ranking from Tier 2

Watch List to Tier 2.

"Pakistan's ranking as a Tier 2 country in the TIP 2010 report is an improvement over its 2009 rating, when it was listed as a Tier 2 watch list country," the report mentioned.

The annual report, required by the US Congress, ranks 177 nations by tiers to measure the extent to which each government adheres to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, a US law enacted in 2000 to combat human trafficking and protect victims.

A Tier 2 ranking means a government is "making significant efforts" to comply with the anti-trafficking law's minimum standards but does not yet meet those standards.

Tier 2 watch list countries do not meet the minimum standards but are making significant efforts, yet trafficking is either increasing or more concrete steps are needed by the governments.

For the first time, the 2010 report includes the United States in its rankings, with the US listed as a Tier 1 country, where the government complies fully with the law's minimum standards.

The US Embassy in Islamabad acknowledged Pakistan's 2010 ranking in a statement, saying, "the US Government is committed to support Pakistan in its efforts to combat human trafficking."

The embassy's statement added that the 2010 TIP report reflected "the Government of Pakistan's efforts to prosecute trafficking offenders, prevent and combat bonded labour and protect trafficking victims."

Of the 12 South and Central Asian nations ranked in the 2010 report, Pakistan is the only one to improve its ranking.

Bangladesh, India, Sri Lanka, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan are ranked as "Tier 2 watch list", the same as in 2009. Afghanistan, Kazakhstan and Maldives all ranked on the Tier 2 watch list in 2010, down from their Tier 2 rankings in 2009.

During 2009, Pakistan endeavoured to prosecute individuals charged with human trafficking, the TIP report said. According to the report, 385 people were convicted in 2009 under the prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance, compared to just 28 in 2008.

Another 166 were convicted under various other laws associated with human trafficking, the report said. At least three of those convicted were guilty of child trafficking, with the rest guilty of either labour or sex trafficking.

In addition, the report said more than 150 Pakistani officials were penalised for facilitating or "participating in illegal migration and human smuggling."

"The Government of Pakistan made some progress in its efforts to protect victims of human trafficking," the report said. During 2009, local police successfully freed more than 2,000 bonded labourers in Sindh province, and Pakistan's federal government succeeded in providing legal aid and development assistance, including land, housing, money and agricultural assistance, to bonded labourers from the provinces of Khyber-Pakhtunkhwa, Punjab, Balochistan and Sindh. More than 1,000 children who had been trafficked to the United Arab Emirates were also successfully repatriated, the report said.

Pakistan also received mention for its efforts at preventing human trafficking, including projects such as eliminating bonded labour in brick kilns and the country's Child Protection Management

Information System, which collectively spent millions of dollars to issue Computerised National Identification Cards, provide loans so labourers could get out of debt, and fund community organisations to prevent child trafficking.

Pakistan has also invested in training of its police and military officials in the most effective ways to combat human trafficking, the report said. Published by HT Syndication with permission from South Asian Media Network. For more information on news feed please contact Sarabjit Jagirdar at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 28, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

Copyright 2010 Right Vision News
All Rights Reserved

99 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Former Soviet Union - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 28, 2010 Monday

Russian condemns new US government report on human trafficking

LENGTH: 867 words

Text of "Commentary by the Russian Ministry of Foreign Affairs information and press department in connection with the publication of the US State Department's report on global human trafficking in 2009", published on the Russian Ministry of Foreign Affairs website on 28 June

The Russian Ministry of Foreign Affairs has closely studied the 10th and latest US State Department report on global human trafficking [the Trafficking in Persons Report].

We were awaiting publication of this document with interest, given the US State Department's promise to analyse the situation "in its own home" for the first time. Unfortunately, instead of a thorough and objective examination of the reasons why human trafficking on US territory is on the rise, the authors of the report, with no sense of false modesty, classified themselves as star pupils. In other words, they allocated themselves to Tier 1 in the system they themselves invented to categorize states by different ratings levels.

The data adduced in the section on the US was designed to stress the episodic and in no way systemic nature of crimes in the area of human trafficking. Meanwhile, it is no secret to anyone that it is specifically the US which has been and remains the world's largest importer of "human commodities". The report's authors managed to ignore numerous publications in the American press about the presence on US territory of more than 11 million illegal migrants, who are ruthlessly exploited on construction sites, in agricultural work, in the services industry and so on. They also chose to ignore the luring of more than 50,000 women and girls into the American sex industry every year, as cited by human rights activists. So the US State Department's idea of positioning itself in the role of "honest broker" in the report clearly didn't succeed. It would seem that preaching to others is considerably easier than sorting out the actual state of affairs in your own country.

We have said on more than one occasion that the methodology used by the US State Department in preparing the report is unacceptable. States are divided into ratings groups based on the extent to which they meet certain "minimum standards" in combating human trafficking, or, simply put, the requirements of domestic American legislation. This approach gives rise to antagonism not only amongst us, but also among many other states. For example, a few years ago, Switzerland, a fairly trouble-free country, reacted extremely negatively to the report after being included in its group of "miscreants" on the grounds that the country does not have the sort of special law on combating human trafficking that features in the "standard package" recommended by the Americans.

We were not surprised that this report once again puts Russia in the group of problem states, the so-called Tier 2. In order to merit being promoted up the rating, we were to have carried out the US Justice Department's "Action plan for Russia", in which we were required to change our legislation and our law-enforcement practices in the fight against human trafficking. It is clear that, from the very start, this requirement could not be met - in fighting organized crime, which includes combating "trafficking", the Russian authorities will never be guided by instructions drawn up in other countries, and will certainly not meet conditions that have virtually been issued as an ultimatum. In addition to everything else, it quite simply suits our American partners to keep us in the group of "miscreants", so that they can have a hypothetical pretext for introducing economic and trade restrictions against Russia - for example, they need at least something to justify the preservation of the notorious Jackson-Vanik amendment.

As far as the use in Russia of US experience of countering human trafficking is concerned, we are undoubtedly ready to make use of those areas of know-how that may be required in the Russian environment. At the same time, practice shows that it is unrealistic, and probably inexpedient, to copy other people's methods of work in full. Each state has the right to work out for itself what would be the best national mechanism for fighting human trafficking, and to devise legislative and other instruments to counter "trafficking".

Russia has an interest in the stepping-up of multilateral and bilateral cooperation in the prevention and restriction of human trafficking. In our opinion, the time has come to move from general political discussions about the problems posed by "trafficking" to specific practical collaboration among law-enforcement agencies and representatives of other state structures whose functions include combating human trafficking. Well-organized direct contacts between relevant units from the police, the migration services and border monitoring agencies in the countries in which "human commodities" originate and arrive, an exchange of experience and expert-level meetings to discuss the most urgent unresolved issues may bring considerably greater results than the US State Department's practice of drawing up "global" reports on human trafficking.

Source: Ministry of Foreign Affairs website, Moscow, in Russian 28 Jun 10

LOAD-DATE: June 28, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2010 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

100 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Financial Daily

June 28, 2010 Monday

Pak improves "Trafficking In Persons 2010" rankings

SECTION: Vol. 3 No. 324

LENGTH: 622 words

Out of the twelve South and Central Asia nations ranked in the Trafficking In Persons (TIP) 2010 report, Pakistan is the only country to improve its ranking from Tier 2 Watch List to Tier 2.

"Pakistan's ranking as a Tier 2 country in the TIP 2010 report is an improvement over its 2009 rating, when it was listed as a Tier 2 watch list country," the report mentioned.

The annual report, required by the US Congress, ranks 177 nations by tiers to measure the extent to which each government adheres to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, a US law enacted in 2000 to combat human trafficking and protect victims.

A Tier 2 ranking means a government is "making significant efforts" to comply with the anti-trafficking law's minimum standards but does not yet meet those standards.

Tier 2 watch list countries do not meet the minimum standards but are making significant efforts, yet trafficking is either increasing or more concrete steps are needed by the governments.

For the first time, the 2010 report includes the United States in its rankings, with the US listed as a Tier 1 country, where the government complies fully with the law's minimum standards.

The US Embassy in Islamabad acknowledged Pakistan's 2010 ranking in a statement, saying, "the US Government is committed to support Pakistan in its efforts to combat human trafficking."

The embassy's statement added that the 2010 TIP report reflected "the Government of Pakistan's efforts to prosecute trafficking offenders, prevent and combat bonded labour and protect trafficking victims."

Of the 12 South and Central Asian nations ranked in the 2010 report, Pakistan is the only one to improve its ranking.

Bangladesh, India, Sri Lanka, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan are ranked as "Tier 2 watch list", the same as in 2009. Afghanistan, Kazakhstan and Maldives all ranked on the Tier 2 watch list in 2010, down from their Tier 2 rankings in 2009.

During 2009, Pakistan endeavoured to prosecute individuals charged with human trafficking, the TIP report said. According to the report, 385 people were convicted in 2009 under the prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance, compared to just 28 in 2008.

Another 166 were convicted under various other laws associated with human trafficking, the report said. At least three of those convicted were guilty of child trafficking, with the rest guilty of either labour or sex trafficking.

In addition, the report said more than 150 Pakistani officials were penalised for facilitating or "participating in illegal migration and human smuggling."

"The Government of Pakistan made some progress in its efforts to protect victims of human trafficking," the report said. During 2009, local police successfully freed more than 2,000 bonded labourers in Sindh province, and Pakistan's federal government succeeded in providing legal aid and development assistance, including land, housing, money and agricultural assistance, to bonded labourers from the provinces of Khyber-Pakhtunkhwa, Punjab, Balochistan and Sindh. More than 1,000 children who had been trafficked to the United Arab Emirates were also successfully repatriated, the report said.

Pakistan also received mention for its efforts at preventing human trafficking, including projects such as eliminating bonded labour in brick kilns and the country's Child Protection Management

Information System, which collectively spent millions of dollars to issue Computerised National Identification Cards, provide loans so labourers could get out of debt, and fund community organisations to prevent child trafficking.

Pakistan has also invested in training of its police and military officials in the most effective ways to combat human trafficking, the report said.

LOAD-DATE: September 19, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 The Financial Daily
All Rights Reserved

101 of 404 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 28, 2010 Monday

RUSSIAN MFA PRESS AND INFORMATION DEPARTMENT COMMENTS ON THE PUBLICATION OF THE US STATE DEPARTMENT REPORT ON HUMAN TRAFFICKING IN THE WORLD IN 2009

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 774 words

DATELINE: MOSCOW, Russia

The following information was released by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Russian Federation:

The Russian Foreign Ministry has taken a close look at the 10th annual Trafficking in Persons Report, released by the US State Department.

We had awaited with interest the publication of this document, given the promise of the US State Department for the first time to analyze in it the situation "at home." Unfortunately, instead of an in-depth and objective review of the causes of the rise in human trafficking in the US the authors of the report without false modesty at once placed themselves among the best performers, that is, in Tier 1 under the country ranking system of their own devising.

The statistics adduced in the chapter on the United States are intended to underline the episodic, not systemic nature of the human trafficking offenses. Meanwhile, it's not a secret to anyone that the United States has been and remains the world's biggest importer of "human commodities." The report's authors managed to overlook the numerous American press reports about the presence in the US of more than 11 million illegal migrants mercilessly exploited at construction sites, on the farm, in the services, etc. They also chose not to notice the facts cited by local human rights activists of the annual trafficking of over 50 thousand women and girls into the US sex industry. So the idea of the US State Department this time to position themselves in the report as "an honest arbitrator" has manifestly failed. Probably, to lecture others is much easier than straightening the actual state of things in their own country.

We have repeatedly talked about the unacceptability to us of the methodological approach that the US State Department uses in preparing the report. Countries are ranked in tiers based on their conformance to certain "minimum standards" in the fight against trafficking in persons, and, more simply, to the requirements of internal American law. Such an approach is rejected not only by us, but also by many other countries. Several years ago, for example, Switzerland, a country with a fairly good track record in this respect, sharply negatively reacted to the report, having been placed among those in breach of the standards for lack of a specific law to combat human trafficking, which is included in the "standard set" recommended by the Americans.

We are not surprised that the current report has again placed Russia among the problem states, on the so-called Tier 2 Watch List. To earn promotion in the rankings, we should have fulfilled the Action Plan for Russia, prepared by the US Justice Department and instructing us to change our legislation and law enforcement practices to combat human trafficking. It is obvious that from the outset, this requirement was unfulfillable - the Russian authorities in the struggle against organized crime, which includes a drive against trafficking in persons, will never be guided by the instructions developed in another country; still less will they fulfill the conditions set forth almost as an ultimatum. Among other things, it is simply advantageous for the American partners to keep us on the Tier 2 Watch List in order to have a hypothetical reason to use economic and trade restrictions against Russia - for example, they must have at least something to justify the retention of the notorious Jackson-Vanik amendment.

As for the application in Russia of the American experience in combating human trafficking, we are certainly ready to take advantage of the ideas and suggestions that can be useful in the Russian context. Practice shows, however, that to fully copy someone else's schemes of work is unrealistic and hardly expedient, too. Each state is free to create the most optimal-for-itself national mechanism for combating trafficking in persons and to develop legislative and other instruments against the trafficking.

Russia is interested in intensifying multilateral and bilateral cooperation to prevent and combat trafficking in persons. In our view, it is time to move from a general debate on trafficking in persons to specific practical cooperation of law enforcement and other government agencies whose functions include the fight against human trafficking. Well-established direct contacts of relevant police units, migration services and border control bodies of countries of origin and destination of human commodities, along with exchange of know-how and meetings at expert level on the critical outstanding issues can bring much better results than preparing "global" Trafficking in Persons reports, which is practiced by the US State Department.

LOAD-DATE: June 28, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 States News Service

102 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Straits Times (Singapore)

June 28, 2010 Monday

Call for clearer laws on human trafficking; It would give officials stronger hand in fighting the crime, says some MPs and activists

BYLINE: Mavis Toh

LENGTH: 670 words

ACTIVISTS and Members of Parliament here have called for specific laws to bring human traffickers to justice so the problem can be fought head on.

The law should spell out what constitutes trafficking, they said.

For example, should a foreign woman who claims she was promised a waitressing job here but is then made to service men in Geylang be considered a trafficking victim?

In some countries, the answer is no because she entered the country willingly and was not smuggled in; elsewhere, she would be considered one because she may have been tricked or coerced into coming here.

MP Halimah Yacob, who often speaks up on foreign worker issues, said: 'Having greater clarity in our laws on what constitutes trafficking helps, as it will give our enforcement officers, who have to work within the framework of the law, a clearer idea of what to look out for when dealing with doubtful cases.'

Ms Bridget Tan, president of the Humanitarian Organisation for Migration Economics, agreed such laws would show traffickers and the world that Singapore is serious about fighting human trafficking and would give enforcement agencies a mandate to protect witnesses and victims.

They were responding to an accusation by the United States' State Department that Singapore is not doing enough to curb the trade in human beings for labour or prostitution.

The State Department's annual Trafficking In Persons Report has, for the first time, put Singapore on a human trafficking watch list, alongside countries such as Bangladesh, China and India.

The report noted that of 7,614 foreign females arrested for prostitution violations in Singapore last year, nearly all were deported. It also asked why, of the 89 child prostitution cases that cropped up last year, only four were investigated as potential sex trafficking cases.

The Ministry of Home Affairs has so far not responded to queries The Straits Times posed on these figures nearly two weeks ago.

Mr John Gee, president of migrant worker advocacy group Transient Workers Count Too, said: 'Many women who are trafficked into sex work end up arrested and charged with overstaying, which leads to a prison sentence.'

This means that, as the law stands, women who may actually be victims of trafficking are made out to be criminals, he said.

Singapore law criminalises trafficking through its Penal Code and statutes like the Children and Young Persons Act and the Women's Charter.

MP Alvin Yeo, who chairs the Government Parliamentary Committee for Home Affairs and Law, however, believes the Penal Code has enough provisions to deal with human traffickers, and the greater challenges lie in detection and enforcement.

'Part of the problem may be that the women in question are reluctant, whether for fear of reprisals or of being deported, to come forward to the police,' he said.

Some activists believe still more can be done, saying Singapore should set up procedures to identify trafficked victims, review its laws and definition of trafficking and compare these to the United Nations' Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons.

Singapore has not signed this first global, legally binding instrument on trafficking in persons.

The activists concede, however, that determining whether an individual is a victim is costly and laborious.

Said Mr Gee: 'There are bound to be uncertainties about whether a person has been trafficked or is working voluntarily, or whether a woman is being intimidated into giving false testimony.'

But still, if the police have clear guidelines, it will help their work and give trafficked women confidence to turn to the police for 'systemic treatment', he said.

MP Christopher De Souza said: 'What we need is when we catch hold of traffickers, to make a strong example out of them. That will be a strong deterrent for future potential traffickers.'

mavistoh@sph.com.sg

RELUCTANCE

'Part of the problem may be that the women in question are reluctant, whether for fear of reprisals or of being deported, to come forward to the police.'

MP Alvin Yeo

LOAD-DATE: June 27, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

103 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Balochistan Times (AsiaNet)

June 27, 2010 Sunday

Pakistan shows improvement in Trafficking In Persons 2010 report

SECTION: Vol. XXXIV No. 177

LENGTH: 639 words

Out of the twelve South and Central Asia nations ranked in the Trafficking In Persons (TIP) 2010 report, Pakistan is the only country to improve on its ranking from Tier 2 Watch List to Tier 2. "Pakistan's ranking as a Tier 2 country in the TIP 2010 report is an improvement over its 2009 rating, when it was listed as a Tier 2 watch list country," the report read.

The annual report, required by the US Congress, ranks 177 nations by tiers to measure the extent to which each government adheres to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, a US law enacted in 2000 to combat human trafficking and protect victims. A Tier 2 ranking means a government is "making significant efforts" to comply with the anti-trafficking law's minimum standards but does not yet meet those standards.

Tier 2 watch list countries do not meet the minimum standards but are making significant efforts, yet trafficking is either increasing or more concrete steps are needed by the governments. For the first time, the 2010 report includes the United States in its rankings, with the U.S. listed as a Tier 1 country, where the government complies fully with the law's minimum standards. The U.S. Embassy in Islamabad acknowledged Pakistan's 2010 ranking in a statement, saying, "the US Government is committed to supporting Pakistan in its efforts to combat human trafficking." The embassy's statement added that the 2010 TIP report reflected "the Government of Pakistan's efforts to prosecute trafficking offenders, prevent and combat bonded labour and protect trafficking victims."

Of the 12 South and Central Asia nations ranked in the 2010 report, Pakistan was the only one to improve on its ranking. In 2010, Nepal and Kyrgyzstan are ranked as Tier 2 nations, as they were in 2009. Bangladesh, India, Sri Lanka, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan are ranked as Tier 2 watch list, the same as in 2009. Afghanistan, Kazakhstan and the Maldives all ranked on the Tier 2 watch list in 2010, down from their Tier 2 rankings in 2009. During 2009, Pakistan endeavoured to prosecute individuals charged with human trafficking, the TIP report said. According to the report, 385 people were convicted in 2009 under the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance, compared to just 28 in 2008.

Another 166 were convicted under various other laws associated with human trafficking, the report said. At least three of those convicted were guilty of child trafficking, with the rest guilty of either labour or sex trafficking. In addition, the report said more than 150 Pakistani officials were penalized for facilitating or "participating in illegal migration and human smuggling." "The Government of Pakistan made some progress in its efforts to protect victims of human trafficking," the report said. During 2009, local police successfully freed more than 2,000 bonded labourers in Sindh province, and Pakistan's federal government succeeded in providing legal aid and development assistance, including land, housing, money and agricultural assistance, to bonded labourers from the provinces of Khyber-Pakhtunkhwa, Punjab, Balochistan and Sindh. More than 1,000 children who had been trafficked to the United Arab Emirates were also successfully repatriated, the report said.

Pakistan also received mention for its efforts at preventing human trafficking, including projects such as eliminating bonded labour in brick kilns and the country's Child Protection Management Information System, which collectively spent millions of dollars to issue Computerized National Identification Cards, provide loans so labourers could get out of debt, and fund community organizations to prevent child trafficking. Pakistan has also invested in training its police and military officials in the most effective ways to combat human trafficking, the report said.

LOAD-DATE: November 16, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 The Balochistan Times
All Rights Reserved

104 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Right Vision News

June 25, 2010 Friday

US acknowledges Pak's 2010 ranking for combating human smuggling

LENGTH: 737 words

DATELINE: ISLAMABAD

ISLAMABAD, June 25 -- US Embassy acknowledged Pakistan's 2010 ranking saying that the U.S. Government is committed to supporting Pakistan in its efforts to combat human trafficking.

According to the US Embassy Spokesman, the 2010 TIP report reflected "the Government of Pakistan's efforts to prosecute trafficking offenders, prevent and combat bonded labor, and protect trafficking victims."

Pakistan's ranking as a Tier 2 country in the 2010 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report is an improvement over its 2009 rating, when it was listed as a Tier 2 watch list country.

The annual report, required by the U.S. Congress, ranks 177 nations by tiers to measure the extent to which each government adheres to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, a U.S. law enacted in 2000 to combat human trafficking and protect victims. A Tier 2 ranking means a government is "making significant efforts" to comply with the anti-trafficking law's minimum standards but does not yet meet those standards. Tier 2 watch list countries do not meet the minimum standards but are making significant efforts, yet trafficking is either increasing or more concrete steps are needed by the governments.

For the first time, the 2010 report includes the United States in its rankings, with the U.S. listed as a Tier 1 country, where the government complies fully with the law's minimum standards.

Of the 12 South and Central Asia nations ranked in the 2010 report, Pakistan was the only one to improve on its ranking. In 2010, Nepal and Kyrgyzstan are ranked as Tier 2 nations, as they were in 2009. Bangladesh, India, Sri Lanka, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan are ranked as Tier 2 watch list, the same as in 2009. Afghanistan, Kazakhstan and the Maldives all ranked on the Tier 2 watch list in 2010, down from their Tier 2 rankings in 2009.

During 2009, Pakistan endeavored to prosecute individuals charged with human trafficking, the TIP report said. According to the report, 385 people were convicted in 2009 under the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance, compared to just 28 in 2008.

Another 166 were convicted under various other laws associated with human trafficking, the report said. At least three of those convicted were guilty of child trafficking, with the rest guilty of either labor or sex trafficking. In addition, the report said more than 150 Pakistani officials were penalized for facilitating or "participating in illegal migration and human smuggling."

"The Government of Pakistan made some progress in its efforts to protect victims of human trafficking," the report said. During 2009, local police successfully freed more than 2,000 bonded laborers in Sindh province, and Pakistan's federal government succeeded in providing legal aid and development assistance, including land, housing, money and agricultural assistance, to bonded laborers from the provinces of Khyber-Pakhtunkhwa, Punjab, Balochistan and Sindh. More than 1,000 children who had been trafficked to the United Arab Emirates were also successfully repatriated, the report said.

Pakistan also received mention for its efforts at preventing human trafficking, including projects such as eliminating bonded labor in brick kilns and the country's Child Protection Management Information System, which collectively spent millions of dollars to issue Computerized National Identification Cards, provide loans so laborers could get out of debt, and fund community organizations to prevent child trafficking. Pakistan has also invested in training its police and military officials in the most effective ways to combat human trafficking, the report said.

The State Department also honored nine Heroes in the Fight Against Modern Slavery in 2010, including activists from Uzbekistan, India, Brazil, Burundi, Hungary, Jordan, Mauritania, Mongolia and the United States.

Natalia Abdullayeva of Uzbekistan was honored for forging unprecedented partnerships between the private sector and the government to fight trafficking. India's Sattaru Umapathi, the anti-human trafficking officer of the Crime Investigation Department for the state of Andhra Pradesh, was honored for leading numerous interstate and intrastate rescue operations, rescuing victims and arresting traffickers, report added Published by HT Syndication with permission from Right Vision News. For more information on news feed please contact Sarabjit Jagirdar at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 24, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 Right Vision News
All Rights Reserved

105 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Right Vision News

June 25, 2010 Friday

US admits Pakistan combating human trafficking effectively

LENGTH: 577 words

DATELINE: ISLAMABAD

ISLAMABAD, June 25 -- Pakistan has received a Tier 2 ranking and is the only country out of 12 South and Central Asia nations which has improved its ranking as far as human trafficking is related.

To achieve this, the Pakistan government has done a commendable job by penalising more than 150 Pakistani officials for facilitating or "participating in illegal migration and human smuggling".

The 2010 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report points out that Pakistan has improved over its 2009 rating. According to the spokesman at the US Embassy who has made available this information, the annual report, required by the US Congress, ranks 177 nations by tiers to measure the extent to which each government adheres to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, a US law enacted in 2000 to combat human trafficking and protect victims.

"A Tier 2 ranking means a government is making significant efforts to comply with the anti-trafficking law's minimum standards but does not yet meet those standards. "The Tier 2 watchlist countries do not meet the minimum standards but are making significant efforts, yet trafficking is either increasing or more concrete steps are needed by the governments", says the report.

The US Embassy in Islamabad acknowledged Pakistan's 2010 ranking in a statement, saying, "The US government is committed to supporting Pakistan in its efforts to combat human trafficking."

The embassy's statement added that the 2010 Trafficking in Persons report reflected "the Government of Pakistan's efforts to prosecute trafficking offenders, prevent and combat bonded labour, and protect trafficking victims."

During 2009, Pakistan endeavoured to prosecute individuals charged with human trafficking, the TIP report said. According to the report, 385 people were convicted in 2009 under the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance, compared to just 28 in 2008.

Another 166 were convicted under various other laws associated with human trafficking, the report said. At least three of those convicted were guilty of child trafficking, with the rest guilty of either labour or sex trafficking.

"The Government of Pakistan made some progress in its efforts to protect victims of human trafficking," the report said. During 2009, local police successfully freed more than 2,000 bonded labourers in Sindh province, and Pakistan's federal government succeeded in providing legal aid and development assistance, including land, housing, money and agricultural assistance, to bonded labourers from the provinces of Khyber-Pakhtunkhwa, Punjab, Balochistan and Sindh.

More than 1,000 children, who had been trafficked to the United Arab Emirates, were also successfully repatriated, the Trafficking in Persons report said. Pakistan also received mention for its efforts at preventing human trafficking, including projects such as eliminating bonded labor in brick kilns and the country's Child Protection Management Information System, which collectively spent millions of dollars to issue Computerized National Identification Cards, provide loans so labourers could get out of debt, and fund community organisations to prevent child trafficking. Pakistan has also invested in training its police and military officials in the most effective ways to combat human trafficking, the report said. Published by HT Syndication with permission from Right Vision News. For more information on news feed please contact Sarabjit Jagirdar at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 25, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 Right Vision News
All Rights Reserved

106 of 404 DOCUMENTS

South Asian Media Network

June 25, 2010 Friday

US to help Pak hit human-smuggling

LENGTH: 625 wordsDATELINE: ISLAMABAD

ISLAMABAD, June 25 -- United States of America is committed to supporting Pakistan in its efforts to combat human trafficking, according to US Embassy.

US Embassy spokesman said the Trafficking in Persons (TIP)-2010 report reflected "the government of Pakistan's efforts to prosecute trafficking offenders, prevent and combat bonded labor, and protect trafficking victims."

Pakistan's ranking as a Tier 2 country in the 2010 TIP Report is an improvement over its 2009 rating, when it was listed as a Tier 2 watch list country.

The annual report, required by the US Congress, ranks 177 nations by tiers to measure the extent to which each government adheres to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, a US law enacted in 2000 to combat human trafficking and protect victims.

A Tier 2 ranking means a government is "making significant efforts" to comply with the anti-trafficking law's minimum standards but does not yet meet those standards. Tier 2 watch list countries do not meet the minimum standards but are making significant efforts, yet trafficking is either increasing or more concrete steps are needed by the governments.

For the first time, the 2010 report includes the United States in its rankings, with the US listed as a Tier 1 country, where the government complies fully with the law's minimum standards.

Of the 12 South and Central Asia nations ranked in the 2010 report, Pakistan was the only one to improve on its ranking.

In 2010, Nepal and Kyrgyzstan are ranked as Tier 2 nations, as they were in 2009. Bangladesh, India, Sri Lanka, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan are ranked as Tier 2 watch list, the same as in 2009. Afghanistan, Kazakhstan and the Maldives all ranked on the Tier 2 watch list in 2010, down from their Tier 2 rankings in 2009. During 2009, Pakistan endeavored to prosecute individuals charged with human trafficking, the TIP report said. According to the report, 385 people were convicted in 2009 under the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance compared to just 28 in 2008. Another 166 were convicted under various other laws associated with human trafficking, the report said. At least three of those convicted were guilty of child trafficking, with the rest guilty of either labor or sex trafficking. In addition, the report said more than 150 Pakistani officials were penalised for facilitating or "participating in illegal migration and human smuggling."

"The government of Pakistan made some progress in its efforts to protect victims of human trafficking," the report said. During 2009, local police successfully freed more than 2,000 bonded laborers in Sindh province, and Pakistan's federal government succeeded in providing legal aid and development assistance, including land, housing, money and agricultural assistance, to bonded laborers from the provinces of Khyber-Pakhtunkhwa, Punjab, Balochistan and Sindh. More than 1,000 children who had been trafficked to the United Arab Emirates were also successfully repatriated, the report said. Pakistan also received mention for its efforts at preventing human trafficking including projects such as eliminating bonded labor in brick kilns and the country's Child Protection Management Information System, which collectively spent millions of dollars to issue Computerized National Identification Cards, provide loans so laborers could get out of debt, and fund community organisations to prevent child trafficking. Pakistan has also invested in training its police and military officials in the most effective ways to combat human trafficking, the report said. Published by HT Syndication with permission from South Asian Media Network. For more information on news feed please contact Sarabjit Jagirdar at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 24, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

Copyright 2010 Right Vision News
All Rights Reserved

107 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 24, 2010 Thursday

Philippines-Germany anti-trafficking resolution adopted by UN - official

LENGTH: 560 words

Text of report in English by Philippine newspaper The Manila Times website on 24 June

[Report by Llanesca T. Panti: "UN adopts RP-Germany anti-trafficking resolution"]

The United Nations Human Rights Council has adopted the Philippines Germany draft resolution on regional and sub-regional cooperation in promoting a human rights-based approach to combating trafficking in persons, especially women and children, the Department of Foreign Affairs reported Wednesday.

This developed just eight days after the US State Department Report on Trafficking in Persons released this month listed the Philippines under the Tier 2 Watch List for the second straight year for being a source country, and to a much lesser extent, a destination and transit country for men, women, and children who are subjected to trafficking in persons specifically forced prostitution and forced labour.

The RP-Germany resolution particularly calls on governments to take measures on three things namely: implementing legally binding international instruments on combating trafficking in persons, coming up with a coordinated and comprehensive approach through the development of regional initiatives or plans of action based on relevant international instruments such as the Palermo Protocol and integrating human rights-based approach to combat trafficking and promote the provision of gender-and age-sensitive responses.

Such measures, according to the Foreign Affairs department, will address the needs of victims in full respect of their human rights that will enhance the level of protection, assistance and recovery, particularly with victim identification, their access to shelter, medical and psychosocial assistance, and rehabilitation, and the cooperation between intergovernmental and non government organizations.

Moreover, the RP-Germany resolution also raised the profile of addressing the demand created by commercial and sexual exploitation and other factors that spur trafficking in persons by encouraging governments to refer to the Recommended Principles and Guidelines on Human Rights and Human Trafficking developed by the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights.

Philippine Permanent Representative to the United Nations in Geneva, Evan Garcia, noted that the RP-Germany resolution will prevent and end trafficking in persons, as well as protect, assist and provide access to adequate redress to victims, including the possibility of obtaining compensation from perpetrators.

For his part, Germany's Permanent Representative Reinhard Schweppe said the resolution is a continuation of the cooperation between the Philippines and Germany on the global problem of trafficking in persons.

"Our two delegations do attach great importance to the fostering of the cooperation in the fight against trafficking on the regional and sub-regional levels. Neighbouring countries do often share common or very similar problems when it comes to the phenomenon of human trafficking," Garcia said.

The Philippines and Germany held three open-ended informal consultations on the draft resolution. Some 60 delegations co-sponsored the resolution including the United States which expressed its gratitude to the Philippines and Germany for their leadership in bringing this issue to the forefront of the Council's attention.

Source: The Manila Times website, Manila, in English 24 Jun 10

LOAD-DATE: June 24, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2010 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

108 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Financial Daily

June 24, 2010 Thursday

US to help Pak hit human-smuggling

SECTION: Vol. 3 No. 320

LENGTH: 594 words

United States of America is committed to supporting Pakistan in its efforts to combat human trafficking, according to US Embassy.

US Embassy spokesman said the Trafficking in Persons (TIP)-2010 report reflected "the government of Pakistan's efforts to prosecute trafficking offenders, prevent and combat bonded labor, and protect trafficking victims."

Pakistan's ranking as a Tier 2 country in the 2010 TIP Report is an improvement over its 2009 rating, when it was listed as a Tier 2 watch list country.

The annual report, required by the US Congress, ranks 177 nations by tiers to measure the extent to which each government adheres to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, a US law enacted in 2000 to combat human trafficking and protect victims.

A Tier 2 ranking means a government is "making significant efforts" to comply with the anti-trafficking law's minimum standards but does not yet meet those standards. Tier 2 watch list countries do not meet the minimum standards but are making significant efforts, yet trafficking is either increasing or more concrete steps are needed by the governments.

For the first time, the 2010 report includes the United States in its rankings, with the US listed as a Tier 1 country, where the government complies fully with the law's minimum standards.

Of the 12 South and Central Asia nations ranked in the 2010 report, Pakistan was the only one to improve on its ranking.

In 2010, Nepal and Kyrgyzstan are ranked as Tier 2 nations, as they were in 2009. Bangladesh, India, Sri Lanka, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan are ranked as Tier 2 watch list, the same as in 2009. Afghanistan, Kazakhstan and the Maldives all ranked on the Tier 2 watch list in 2010, down from their Tier 2 rankings in 2009. During 2009, Pakistan endeavored to prosecute individuals charged with human trafficking, the TIP report said. According to the report, 385 people were convicted in 2009 under the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance compared to just 28 in 2008. Another 166 were convicted under various other laws associated with human trafficking, the report said. At least three of those convicted were guilty of child trafficking, with the rest guilty of either labor or sex trafficking. In addition, the report said more than 150 Pakistani officials were penalised for facilitating or "participating in illegal migration and human smuggling."

"The government of Pakistan made some progress in its efforts to protect victims of human trafficking," the report said. During 2009, local police successfully freed more than 2,000 bonded laborers in Sindh province, and Pakistan's federal government succeeded in providing legal aid and development assistance, including land, housing, money and agricultural assistance, to bonded laborers from the provinces of Khyber-Pakhtunkhwa, Punjab, Balochistan and Sindh. More than 1,000 children who had been trafficked to the United Arab Emirates were also successfully repatriated, the report said. Pakistan also received mention for its efforts at preventing human trafficking including projects such as eliminating bonded labor in brick kilns and the country's Child Protection Management Information System, which collectively spent millions of dollars to issue Computerized National Identification Cards, provide loans so laborers could get out of debt, and fund community organisations to prevent child trafficking. Pakistan has also invested in training its police and military officials in the most effective ways to combat human trafficking, the report said.

LOAD-DATE: September 19, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 The Financial Daily
All Rights Reserved

109 of 404 DOCUMENTS

THE JORDAN TIMES

The Jordan Times

June 24, 2010 Thursday

Human trafficking report ranking 'positive' - gov't

LENGTH: 431 words

By Hani Hazaimeh

AMMAN - The government on Wednesday welcomed a US State Department report on human trafficking which indicated that the Kingdom may be a transit country for forced labour.

Responding to the US State Department's 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report, Minister of State for Media Affairs and Communications Nabil Sharif said in a press conference yesterday that the government reviewed the contents of the annual report, which noted that instances of forced labour in the Kingdom reportedly continued to decline.

He indicated that the government considered Jordan's ranking as a Tier 2 country for the second year in a row as "positive", underlining that the classification means that the Kingdom does not require observation in regards to human trafficking.

"This classification is due to several measures taken by the government including joining the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, supplementing the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organised Crime, the endorsement of Anti-Human Trafficking Law and the launch of the national strategy to prevent human trafficking for the years 2010-2012," the minister said.

Moreover, the government issued bylaws last year governing the recruitment and treatment of non-Jordanian domestic helpers, Sharif pointed out.

In a press conference held jointly with Minister of Transport Alaa Batayneh and Minister of Social Development Hala Lattouf, Sharif also lauded the report for including the United States under its classifications.

This year's Trafficking in Persons Report ranked Jordan in Tier 2, the same classification as in the previous report, indicating that the Kingdom is "possibly a source and transit country for women and men subjected to conditions of forced labour and forced commercial sexual exploitation".

The US State Department report also referred to "reports of Jordanian child labourers experiencing conditions of forced labour. Migrant workers may be rendered vulnerable to forced labour in Jordan due to indebtedness to recruiters; legal requirements mandating foreign workers relying on employers to renew work and residency permits, and negative societal attitudes toward foreign workers".

The report added that some of the Sri Lankan, Indonesian and Filipina women who come to Jordan to work as domestic helpers are subjected to conditions of forced labour after arrival, such as "unlawful withholding of passports, restrictions on movement, non-payment of wages, threats of imprisonment, and physical or sexual abuse".

LOAD-DATE: June 24, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Magazine

JOURNAL-CODE: 62

Copyright 2010 The Jordan Times.
All Rights Reserved
Syndigate.info, Al Bawaba.com

110 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Jordan Times (Amman)

Distributed by McClatchy-Tribune Business News

June 24, 2010 Thursday

Human trafficking report ranking 'positive' - gov't

BYLINE: Hani Hazaimah, Jordan Times, AmmanSECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 500 words

June 24--AMMAN -- The government on Wednesday welcomed a US State Department report on human trafficking which indicated that the Kingdom may be a transit country for forced labour.

Responding to the US State Department's 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report, Minister of State for Media Affairs and Communications Nabil Sharif said in a press conference yesterday that the government reviewed the contents of the annual report, which noted that instances of forced labour in the Kingdom reportedly continued to decline.

He indicated that the government considered Jordan's ranking as a Tier 2 country for the second year in a row as "positive", underlining that the classification means that the Kingdom does not require observation in regards to human trafficking.

"This classification is due to several measures taken by the government including joining the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, supplementing the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organised Crime, the endorsement of Anti-Human Trafficking Law and the launch of the national strategy to prevent human trafficking for the years 2010-2012," the minister said.

Moreover, the government issued bylaws last year governing the recruitment and treatment of non-Jordanian domestic helpers, Sharif pointed out.

In a press conference held jointly with Minister of Transport Alaa Batayneh and Minister of Social Development Hala Lattouf, Sharif also lauded the report for including the United States under its classifications.

This year's Trafficking in Persons Report ranked Jordan in Tier 2, the same classification as in the previous report, indicating that the Kingdom is "possibly a source and transit country for women and men subjected to conditions of forced labour and forced commercial sexual exploitation".

The US State Department report also referred to "reports of Jordanian child labourers experiencing conditions of forced labour. Migrant workers may be rendered vulnerable to forced labour in Jordan due to indebtedness to recruiters; legal requirements mandating foreign workers relying on employers to renew work and residency permits, and negative societal attitudes toward foreign workers".

The report added that some of the Sri Lankan, Indonesian and Filipina women who come to Jordan to work as domestic helpers are subjected to conditions of forced labour after arrival, such as "unlawful withholding of passports, restrictions on movement, non-payment of wages, threats of imprisonment, and physical or sexual abuse".

To see more of the Jordan Times or to subscribe to the newspaper, go to <http://www.jordantimes.com>. Copyright (c) 2010, Jordan Times, Amman Distributed by McClatchy-Tribune Information Services. For more information about the content services offered by McClatchy-Tribune Information Services (MCT), visit www.mctinfoservices.com, e-mail services@mctinfoservices.com, or call 866-280-5210 (outside the United States, call +1 312-222-4544).

LOAD-DATE: June 24, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

ACC-NO: 20100624-JT-Human-trafficking-report-ranking-positive-gov-t-20100624

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: JT

Copyright 2010 Jordan Times (Amman)

111 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Manila Times (Philippines)

June 24, 2010 Thursday

UN adopts RP-Germany anti-trafficking resolution

BYLINE: BY LLANESCA T. PANTI REPORTER

LENGTH: 523 words

The United Nations Human Rights Council has adopted the Philippines Germany draft resolution on regional and sub-regional cooperation in promoting a human rights-based approach to combating trafficking in persons, especially women and children, the Department of Foreign Affairs reported Wednesday.

This developed just eight days after the US State Department Report on Trafficking in Persons released this month listed the Philippines under the Tier 2 Watch List for the second straight year for being a source country, and to a much lesser extent, a destination and transit country for men, women, and children who are subjected to trafficking in persons specifically forced prostitution and forced labor.

The RP-Germany resolution particularly calls on governments to take measures on three things namely: implementing legally binding international instruments on combating trafficking in persons, coming up with a coordinated and comprehensive approach through the development of regional initiatives or plans of action based on relevant international instruments such as the Palermo Protocol and integrating human rights-based approach to combat trafficking and promote the provision of gender- and age-sensitive responses.

Such measures, according to the Foreign Affairs department, will address the needs of victims in full respect of their human rights that will enhance the level of protection, assistance and recovery, particularly with victim identification, their access to shelter, medical and psychosocial assistance, and rehabilitation, and the cooperation between intergovernmental and non government organizations.

Moreover, the RP-Germany resolution also raised the profile of addressing the demand created by commercial and sexual exploitation and other factors that spur trafficking in persons by encouraging governments to refer to the Recommended Principles and Guidelines on Human Rights and Human Trafficking developed by the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights.

Philippine Permanent Representative to the United Nations in Geneva, Evan Garcia, noted that the RP-Germany resolution will prevent and end trafficking in persons, as well as protect, assist and provide access to adequate redress to victims, including the possibility of obtaining compensation from perpetrators.

For his part, Germany's Permanent Representative Reinhard Schweppe said the resolution is a continuation of the cooperation between the Philippines and Germany on the global problem of trafficking in persons.

"Our two delegations do attach great importance to the fostering of the cooperation in the fight against trafficking on the regional and sub-regional levels. Neighboring countries do often share common or very similar problems when it comes to the phenomenon of human trafficking," Garcia said.

The Philippines and Germany held three open-ended informal consultations on the draft resolution. Some 60 delegations co-sponsored the resolution including the United States which expressed its gratitude to the Philippines and Germany for their leadership in bringing this issue to the forefront of the Council's attention.

LOAD-DATE: June 28, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 News Bites Pty Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

Global News Bites

112 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Balochistan Times (AsiaNet)

June 23, 2010 Wednesday

US acknowledges Pak's 2010 ranking for combating human smuggling

SECTION: Vol. XXXIV No. 173

LENGTH: 709 words

US Embassy acknowledged Pakistan's 2010 ranking saying that the U.S. Government is committed to supporting Pakistan in its efforts to combat human trafficking."

According to the US Embassy Spokesman, the 2010 TIP report reflected "the Government of Pakistan's efforts to prosecute trafficking offenders, prevent and combat bonded labour, and protect trafficking victims." Pakistan's ranking as a Tier 2 country in the 2010 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report is an improvement over its 2009 rating, when it was listed as a Tier 2 watch list country.

The annual report, required by the U.S. Congress, ranks 177 nations by tiers to measure the extent to which each government adheres to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, a U.S. law enacted in 2000 to combat human trafficking and protect victims. A Tier 2 ranking means a government is "making significant efforts" to comply with the anti-trafficking law's minimum standards but does not yet meet those standards. Tier 2 watch list countries do not meet the minimum standards but are making significant efforts, yet trafficking is either increasing or more concrete steps are needed by the governments.

For the first time, the 2010 report includes the United States in its rankings, with the U.S. listed as a Tier 1 country, where the government complies fully with the law's minimum standards.

Of the 12 South and Central Asia nations ranked in the 2010 report, Pakistan was the only one to improve on its ranking. In 2010, Nepal and Kyrgyzstan are ranked as Tier 2 nations, as they were in 2009. Bangladesh, India, Sri Lanka, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan are ranked as Tier 2 watch list, the same as in 2009. Afghanistan, Kazakhstan and the Maldives all ranked on the Tier 2 watch list in 2010, down from their Tier 2 rankings in 2009. During 2009, Pakistan endeavoured to prosecute individuals charged with human trafficking, the TIP report said. According to the report, 385 people were convicted in 2009 under the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance, compared to just 28 in 2008.

Another 166 were convicted under various other laws associated with human trafficking, the report said. At least three of those convicted were guilty of child trafficking, with the rest guilty of either labour or sex trafficking. In addition, the report said more than 150 Pakistani officials were penalized for facilitating or "participating in illegal migration and human smuggling."

"The Government of Pakistan made some progress in its efforts to protect victims of human trafficking," the report said. During 2009, local police successfully freed more than 2,000 bonded labourers in Sindh province, and Pakistan's federal government succeeded in providing legal aid and development assistance, including land, housing, money and agricultural assistance, to bonded labourers from the provinces of Khyber-Pakhtunkhwa, Punjab, Balochistan and Sindh.

More than 1,000 children who had been trafficked to the United Arab Emirates were also successfully repatriated, the report said. Pakistan also received mention for its efforts at preventing human trafficking, including projects such as eliminating bonded labour in brick kilns and the country's Child Protection Management Information System, which collectively spent millions of dollars to issue Computerized National Identification Cards, provide loans so labourers could get out of debt, and fund community organizations to prevent child trafficking. Pakistan has also invested in training its police and military officials in the most effective ways to combat human trafficking, the report said.

The State Department also honoured nine Heroes in the Fight Against Modern Slavery in 2010, including activists from Uzbekistan, India, Brazil, Burundi, Hungary, Jordan, Mauritania, Mongolia and the United States. Natalia Abdullayeva of Uzbekistan was honoured for forging unprecedented partnerships between the private sector and the government to fight trafficking. India's Sattaru Umapathi, the anti-human trafficking officer of the Crime Investigation Department for the state of Andhra Pradesh, was honoured for leading numerous interstate and intrastate rescue operations, rescuing victims and arresting traffickers, report added.

LOAD-DATE: November 16, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 The Balochistan Times
All Rights Reserved

113 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Balochistan Times (AsiaNet)

June 23, 2010 Wednesday

Pakistan shows improvement in TIP report

SECTION: Vol. XXXIV No. 173

LENGTH: 638 words

Out of the twelve South and Central Asia nations ranked in the Trafficking In Persons (TIP) 2010 report, Pakistan is the only country to improve on its ranking from Tier 2 Watch List to Tier 2. "Pakistan's ranking as a Tier 2 country in the TIP 2010 report is an improvement over its 2009 rating, when it was listed as a Tier 2 watch list country," the report read.

The annual report, required by the US Congress, ranks 177 nations by tiers to measure the extent to which each government adheres to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, a US law enacted in 2000 to combat human trafficking and protect victims. A Tier 2 ranking means a government is "making significant efforts" to comply with the anti-trafficking law's minimum standards but does not yet meet those standards.

Tier 2 watch list countries do not meet the minimum standards but are making significant efforts, yet trafficking is either increasing or more concrete steps are needed by the governments. For the first time, the 2010 report includes the United States in its rankings, with the U.S. listed as a Tier 1 country, where the government complies fully with the law's minimum standards. The U.S. Embassy in Islamabad acknowledged Pakistan's 2010 ranking in a statement, saying, "the US Government is committed to supporting Pakistan in its efforts to combat human trafficking." The embassy's statement added that the 2010 TIP report reflected "the Government of Pakistan's efforts to prosecute trafficking offenders, prevent and combat bonded labour and protect trafficking victims."

Of the 12 South and Central Asia nations ranked in the 2010 report, Pakistan was the only one to improve on its ranking. In 2010, Nepal and Kyrgyzstan are ranked as Tier 2 nations, as they were in 2009. Bangladesh, India, Sri Lanka, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan are ranked as Tier 2 watch list, the same as in 2009. Afghanistan, Kazakhstan and the Maldives all ranked on the Tier 2 watch list in 2010, down from their Tier 2 rankings in 2009. During 2009, Pakistan endeavoured to prosecute individuals charged with human trafficking, the TIP report said. According to the report, 385 people were convicted in 2009 under the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance, compared to just 28 in 2008.

Another 166 were convicted under various other laws associated with human trafficking, the report said. At least three of those convicted were guilty of child trafficking, with the rest guilty of either labour or sex trafficking. In addition, the report said more than 150 Pakistani officials were penalized for facilitating or "participating in illegal migration and human smuggling."

"The Government of Pakistan made some progress in its efforts to protect victims of human trafficking," the report said. During 2009, local police successfully freed more than 2,000 bonded labourers in Sindh province, and Pakistan's federal government succeeded in providing legal aid and development assistance, including land, housing, money and agricultural assistance, to bonded labourers from the provinces of Khyber-Pakhtunkhwa, Punjab, Balochistan and Sindh. More than 1,000 children who had been trafficked to the United Arab Emirates were also successfully repatriated, the report said.

Pakistan also received mention for its efforts at preventing human trafficking, including projects such as eliminating bonded labour in brick kilns and the country's Child Protection Management Information System, which collectively spent millions of dollars to issue Computerized National Identification Cards, provide loans so labourers could get out of debt, and fund community organizations to prevent child trafficking. Pakistan has also invested in training its police and military officials in the most effective ways to combat human trafficking, the report said.

LOAD-DATE: November 16, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 The Balochistan Times
All Rights Reserved

114 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Frontier Star

June 23, 2010 Wednesday

US acknowledges Pak's 2010 ranking for combating human smuggling

SECTION: Vol. XV No. 173

LENGTH: 709 words

US Embassy acknowledged Pakistan's 2010 ranking saying that the U.S. Government is committed to supporting Pakistan in its efforts to combat human trafficking."

According to the US Embassy Spokesman, the 2010 TIP report reflected "the Government of Pakistan's efforts to prosecute trafficking offenders, prevent and combat bonded labour, and protect trafficking victims."

Pakistan's ranking as a Tier 2 country in the 2010 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report is an improvement over its 2009 rating, when it was listed as a Tier 2 watch list country.

The annual report, required by the U.S. Congress, ranks 177 nations by tiers to measure the extent to which each government adheres to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, a U.S. law enacted in 2000 to combat human trafficking and protect victims. A Tier 2 ranking means a government is "making significant efforts" to comply with the anti-trafficking law's minimum standards but does not yet meet those standards. Tier 2 watch list countries do not meet the minimum standards but are making significant efforts, yet trafficking is either increasing or more concrete steps are needed by the governments.

For the first time, the 2010 report includes the United States in its rankings, with the U.S. listed as a Tier 1 country, where the government complies fully with the law's minimum standards.

Of the 12 South and Central Asia nations ranked in the 2010 report, Pakistan was the only one to improve on its ranking. In 2010, Nepal and Kyrgyzstan are ranked as Tier 2 nations, as they were in 2009. Bangladesh, India, Sri Lanka, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan are ranked as Tier 2 watch list, the same as in 2009. Afghanistan, Kazakhstan and the Maldives all ranked on the Tier 2 watch list in 2010, down from their Tier 2 rankings in 2009.

During 2009, Pakistan endeavoured to prosecute individuals charged with human trafficking, the TIP report said. According to the report, 385 people were convicted in 2009 under the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance, compared to just 28 in 2008.

Another 166 were convicted under various other laws associated with human trafficking, the report said. At least three of those convicted were guilty of child trafficking, with the rest guilty of either labour or sex trafficking. In addition, the report said more than 150 Pakistani officials were penalized for facilitating or "participating in illegal migration and human smuggling."

"The Government of Pakistan made some progress in its efforts to protect victims of human trafficking," the report said. During 2009, local police successfully freed more than 2,000 bonded labourers in Sindh province, and Pakistan's federal government succeeded in providing legal aid and development assistance, including land, housing, money and agricultural assistance, to bonded labourers from the provinces of Khyber-Pakhtunkhwa, Punjab, Balochistan and Sindh. More than 1,000 children who had been trafficked to the United Arab Emirates were also successfully repatriated, the report said.

Pakistan also received mention for its efforts at preventing human trafficking, including projects such as eliminating bonded labour in brick kilns and the country's Child Protection Management Information System, which collectively spent millions of dollars to issue Computerized National Identification Cards, provide loans so labourers could get out of debt, and fund community organizations to prevent child trafficking. Pakistan has also invested in training its police and military officials in the most effective ways to combat human trafficking, the report said.

The State Department also honoured nine Heroes in the Fight Against Modern Slavery in 2010, including activists from Uzbekistan, India, Brazil, Burundi, Hungary, Jordan, Mauritania, Mongolia and the United States.

Natalia Abdullayeva of Uzbekistan was honoured for forging unprecedented partnerships between the private sector and the government to fight trafficking. India's Sattaru Umapathi, the anti-human trafficking officer of the Crime Investigation Department for the state of Andhra Pradesh, was honoured for leading numerous interstate and intrastate rescue operations, rescuing victims and arresting traffickers, report added.

LOAD-DATE: November 16, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 The Frontier Star
All Rights Reserved

115 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Frontier Star

June 23, 2010 Wednesday

United States acknowledges Pakistan's 2010 ranking for combating human smuggling

SECTION: Vol. XV No. 173

LENGTH: 709 words

US Embassy acknowledged Pakistan's 2010 ranking saying that the U.S. Government is committed to supporting Pakistan in its efforts to combat human trafficking.

According to the US Embassy Spokesman, the 2010 TIP report reflected "the Government of Pakistan's efforts to prosecute trafficking offenders, prevent and combat bonded labour, and protect trafficking victims."

Pakistan's ranking as a Tier 2 country in the 2010 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report is an improvement over its 2009 rating, when it was listed as a Tier 2 watch list country.

The annual report, required by the U.S. Congress, ranks 177 nations by tiers to measure the extent to which each government adheres to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, a U.S. law enacted in 2000 to combat human trafficking and protect victims. A Tier 2 ranking means a government is "making significant efforts" to comply with the anti-trafficking law's minimum standards but does not yet meet those standards. Tier 2 watch list countries do not meet the minimum standards but are making significant efforts, yet trafficking is either increasing or more concrete steps are needed by the governments.

For the first time, the 2010 report includes the United States in its rankings, with the U.S. listed as a Tier 1 country, where the government complies fully with the law's minimum standards.

Of the 12 South and Central Asia nations ranked in the 2010 report, Pakistan was the only one to improve on its ranking. In 2010, Nepal and Kyrgyzstan are ranked as Tier 2 nations, as they were in 2009. Bangladesh, India, Sri Lanka, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan are ranked as Tier 2 watch list, the same as in 2009. Afghanistan, Kazakhstan and the Maldives all ranked on the Tier 2 watch list in 2010, down from their Tier 2 rankings in 2009.

During 2009, Pakistan endeavoured to prosecute individuals charged with human trafficking, the TIP report said. According to the report, 385 people were convicted in 2009 under the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance, compared to just 28 in 2008.

Another 166 were convicted under various other laws associated with human trafficking, the report said. At least three of those convicted were guilty of child trafficking, with the rest guilty of either labour or sex trafficking. In addition, the report said more than 150 Pakistani officials were penalized for facilitating or "participating in illegal migration and human smuggling."

"The Government of Pakistan made some progress in its efforts to protect victims of human trafficking," the report said. During 2009, local police successfully freed more than 2,000 bonded labourers in Sindh province, and Pakistan's federal government succeeded in providing legal aid and development assistance, including land, housing, money and agricultural assistance, to bonded labourers from the provinces of Khyber-Pakhtunkhwa, Punjab, Balochistan and Sindh. More than 1,000 children who had been trafficked to the United Arab Emirates were also successfully repatriated, the report said.

Pakistan also received mention for its efforts at preventing human trafficking, including projects such as eliminating bonded labour in brick kilns and the country's Child Protection Management Information System, which collectively spent millions of dollars to issue Computerized National Identification Cards, provide loans so labourers could get out of debt, and fund community organizations to prevent child trafficking. Pakistan has also invested in training its police and military officials in the most effective ways to combat human trafficking, the report said.

The State Department also honoured nine Heroes in the Fight Against Modern Slavery in 2010, including activists from Uzbekistan, India, Brazil, Burundi, Hungary, Jordan, Mauritania, Mongolia and the United States.

Natalia Abdullayeva of Uzbekistan was honoured for forging unprecedented partnerships between the private sector and the government to fight trafficking. India's Sattaru Umapathi, the anti-human trafficking officer of the Crime Investigation Department for the state of Andhra Pradesh, was honoured for leading numerous interstate and intrastate rescue operations, rescuing victims and arresting traffickers, report added.

LOAD-DATE: November 16, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 The Frontier Star
All Rights Reserved

116 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Messenger

June 23, 2010 Wednesday

US acknowledges Pak's 2010 ranking for combating human smuggling

SECTION: Vol. II No. 173

LENGTH: 708 words

US Embassy acknowledged Pakistan's 2010 ranking saying that the US Government is committed to supporting Pakistan in its efforts to combat human trafficking."

According to the US Embassy Spokesman, the 2010 TIP report reflected "the Government of Pakistan's efforts to prosecute trafficking offenders, prevent and combat bonded labour, and protect trafficking victims."

Pakistan's ranking as a tier 2 country in the 2010 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report is an improvement over its 2009 rating, when it was listed as a Tier 2 watch list country.

The annual report, required by the US Congress, ranks 177 nations by tiers to measure the extent to which each government adheres to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, a US law enacted in 2000 to combat human trafficking and protect victims.

A tier 2 ranking means a government is "making significant efforts" to comply with the anti-trafficking law's minimum standards but does not yet meet those standards. Tier 2 watch list countries do not meet the minimum standards but are making significant efforts, yet trafficking is either increasing or more concrete steps are needed by the governments.

For the first time, the 2010 report includes the United States in its rankings, with the US listed as a Tier 1 country, where the government complies fully with the law's minimum standards.

Of the 12 South and Central Asia nations ranked in the 2010 report, Pakistan was the only one to improve on its ranking. In 2010, Nepal and Kyrgyzstan are ranked as tier 2 nations, as they were in 2009.

Bangladesh, India, Sri Lanka, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan are ranked as tier 2 watch lists, the same as in 2009. Afghanistan, Kazakhstan and the Maldives all ranked on the tier 2 watch list in 2010, down from their Tier 2 rankings in 2009.

During 2009, Pakistan endeavoured to prosecute individuals charged with human trafficking, the TIP report said. According to the report, 385 people were convicted in 2009 under the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance, compared to just 28 in 2008.

Another 166 were convicted under various other laws associated with human trafficking, the report said. At least three of those convicted were guilty of child trafficking, with the rest guilty of either labour or sex trafficking. In addition, the report said more than 150 Pakistani officials were penalised for facilitating or "participating in illegal migration and human smuggling."

"The Government of Pakistan made some progress in its efforts to protect victims of human trafficking," the report said. During 2009, local police successfully freed more than 2,000 bonded labourers in Sindh province, and Pakistan's federal government succeeded in providing legal aid and development assistance, including land, housing, money and agricultural assistance, to bonded labourers from the provinces of Khyber-Pakhtunkhwa, Punjab, Balochistan and Sindh. More than 1,000 children who had been trafficked to the United Arab Emirates were also successfully repatriated, the report said.

Pakistan also received mention for its efforts at preventing human trafficking, including projects such as eliminating bonded labour in brick kilns and the country's Child Protection Management Information System, which collectively spent millions of dollars to issue Computerised National Identification Cards, provide loans so labourers could get out of debt, and fund community organisations to prevent child trafficking. Pakistan has also invested in training its police and military officials in the most effective ways to combat human trafficking, the report said. The State Department also honoured nine Heroes in the Fight against Modern Slavery in 2010, including activists from Uzbekistan, India, Brazil, Burundi, Hungary, Jordan, Mauritania, Mongolia and the United States.

Natalia Abdullayeva of Uzbekistan was honoured for forging unprecedented partnerships between the private sector and the government to fight trafficking. India's Sattaru Umapathi, the anti-human trafficking officer of the Crime Investigation Department for the state of Andhra Pradesh, was honoured for leading numerous interstate and intrastate rescue operations, rescuing victims and arresting traffickers, report added.

LOAD-DATE: September 20, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 The Messenger
All Rights Reserved

117 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Pakistan Press International

June 23, 2010 Wednesday

Pakistan's efforts on trafficking cited by United States

LENGTH: 524 words

Pakistan's ranking as a Tier 2 country in the 2010 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report is an improvement over its 2009 rating, when it was listed as a Tier 2 watch list country.

Annual report, required by U.S. Congress, ranks 177 nations by tiers to measure extent to which each government adheres to Trafficking Victims Protection Act, a U.S. law enacted in 2000 to combat human trafficking and protect victims. A Tier 2 ranking means a government is "making significant efforts" to comply with anti-trafficking law's minimum standards but does not yet meet those. Tier 2 watch list countries do not meet minimum standards but making significant efforts, yet trafficking is either increasing or more concrete steps are needed by governments.

U.S. Embassy in Islamabad acknowledged Pakistan's 2010 ranking in a statement, saying, "U.S. Government is committed to supporting Pakistan in its efforts to combat human trafficking." It said 2010 TIP report reflected "the Government of Pakistan's efforts to prosecute trafficking offenders, prevent and combat bonded labour, and protect trafficking victims."

Of 12 South & Central Asia nations ranked in 2010 report, Pakistan was only one to improve on its ranking. In 2010, Nepal & Kyrgyzstan are ranked as Tier 2 nations, as they were in 2009. Bangladesh, India, Sri Lanka, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan & Uzbekistan are ranked as Tier 2 watch list, same as in 2009. Afghanistan, Kazakhstan & Maldives all ranked on Tier 2 watch list in 2010, down from their Tier 2 rankings in 2009.

During 2009, Pakistan endeavoured to prosecute individuals charged with human trafficking, TIP report said. 385 people were convicted in 2009 under Prevention & Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance, compared to just 28 in 2008. Another 166 were convicted under various other laws associated with human trafficking, it said. At least three of those convicted were guilty of child trafficking, with rest guilty of either labour or sex trafficking. It said more than 150 Pakistani officials were penalized for facilitating or "participating in illegal migration and human smuggling."

"Pakistan government made some progress in its efforts to protect victims of human trafficking," report said. During 2009, police successfully freed more than 2,000 bonded labourers in Sindh province. Pakistan's government succeeded in providing legal aid, development assistance, housing, money, agricultural assistance, to bonded labourers from provinces of Khyber-Pakhtunkhwa, Punjab, Balochistan & Sindh. More than 1,000 children who had been trafficked to United Arab Emirates were also successfully repatriated.

Pakistan also received mention for its efforts at preventing human trafficking, including projects of eliminating bonded labour in brick kilns and Child Protection Management Information System, which collectively spent millions of dollars to issue Computerized National Identification Cards, provide loans so labourers could get out of debt, fund community organizations to prevent child trafficking. Pakistan invested in training its police, military officials in most effective ways to combat human trafficking, it said.

LOAD-DATE: September 16, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

All Rights Reserved

118 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

June 23, 2010 Wednesday 1:25 AM EST

Pakistan's Efforts on Trafficking Cited by United States

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 735 words

DATELINE: ISLAMABAD, Pakistan

The U.S. Embassy in Pakistan issued the following news by Gabriella Krohmal Staff Writer:

Pakistan's ranking as a Tier 2 country in the 2010 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report is an improvement over its 2009 rating, when it was listed as a Tier 2 watch list country. The annual report, required by the U.S. Congress, ranks 177 nations by tiers to measure the extent to which each government adheres to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, a U.S. law enacted in 2000 to combat human trafficking and protect victims. A Tier 2 ranking means a government is "making significant efforts" to comply with the anti-trafficking law's minimum standards but does not yet meet those standards. Tier 2 watch list countries do not meet the minimum standards but are making significant efforts, yet trafficking is either increasing or more concrete steps are needed by the governments.

For the first time, the 2010 report includes the United States in its rankings, with the U.S. listed as a Tier 1 country, where the government complies fully with the law's minimum standards.

The U.S. Embassy in Islamabad acknowledged Pakistan's 2010 ranking in a statement, saying, "The U.S. Government is committed to supporting Pakistan in its efforts to combat human trafficking." The embassy's statement added that the 2010 TIP report reflected "the Government of Pakistan's efforts to prosecute trafficking offenders, prevent and combat bonded labor, and protect trafficking victims."

Of the 12 South and Central Asia nations ranked in the 2010 report, Pakistan was the only one to improve on its ranking. In 2010, Nepal and Kyrgyzstan are ranked as Tier 2 nations, as they were in 2009. Bangladesh, India, Sri Lanka, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan are ranked as Tier 2 watch list, the same as in 2009. Afghanistan, Kazakhstan and the Maldives all ranked on the Tier 2 watch list in 2010, down from their Tier 2 rankings in 2009.

During 2009, Pakistan endeavored to prosecute individuals charged with human trafficking, the TIP report said. According to the report, 385 people were convicted in 2009 under the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance, compared to just 28 in 2008. Another 166 were convicted under various other laws associated with human trafficking, the report said. At least three of those convicted were guilty of child trafficking, with the rest guilty of either labor or sex trafficking. In addition, the report said more than 150 Pakistani officials were penalized for facilitating or "participating in illegal migration and human smuggling."

"The Government of Pakistan made some progress in its efforts to protect victims of human trafficking," the report said. During 2009, local police successfully freed more than 2,000 bonded laborers in Sindh province, and Pakistan's federal government succeeded in providing legal aid and development assistance, including land, housing, money and agricultural assistance, to bonded laborers from the provinces of Khyber-Pakhtunkhwa, Punjab, Balochistan and Sindh. More than 1,000 children who had been trafficked to the United Arab Emirates were also successfully repatriated, the report said.

Pakistan also received mention for its efforts at preventing human trafficking, including projects such as eliminating bonded labor in brick kilns and the country's Child Protection Management Information System, which collectively spent millions of dollars to issue Computerized National Identification Cards, provide loans so laborers could get out of debt, and fund community organizations to prevent child trafficking. Pakistan has also invested in training its police and military officials in the most effective ways to combat human trafficking, the report said.

The State Department also honored nine Heroes in the Fight Against Modern Slavery in 2010, including activists from Uzbekistan, India, Brazil, Burundi, Hungary, Jordan, Mauritania, Mongolia and the United States.

Natalia Abdullayeva of Uzbekistan was honored for forging unprecedented partnerships between the private sector and the government to fight trafficking. India's Sattaru Umapathi, the anti-human trafficking officer of the Crime Investigation Department for the state of Andhra Pradesh, was honored for leading numerous interstate and intrastate rescue operations, rescuing victims and arresting traffickers.

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS hc11-JF78-100624-2883505 StaffFurigay

LOAD-DATE: June 24, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 Targeted News Service LLC
All Rights Reserved

119 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Tico Times (San Jose, Costa Rica)

Distributed by McClatchy-Tribune Business News

June 23, 2010 Wednesday

Costa Rica falls short of U.S. human trafficking standards

BYLINE: Mike McDonald, The Tico Times, San Jose, Costa Rica

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 398 words

Jun. 23--The U.S. State Department listed Costa Rica as a tier two country in its 10th annual report on human trafficking released this month.

The ranking, the second that uses the report's three-tier system, grades countries based on their compliance with the United States' Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act. As a tier two country, Costa Rica "does not fully comply with the act's minimum standards, but is making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards."

Third tier countries are the worst offenders.

Since the report's inception in 2001, Costa Rica has consistently been listed as a tier two country, with the exception of 2008, when the country fell to the tier two watch list, signaling a decrease in compliance or a significant increase in the number of victims.

Female sex slaves, some of whom are under 18 years old, account for the majority of human trafficking victims in Costa Rica, according to the report. Women and girls from Nicaragua, the Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Colombia and Panama have been subject to forced prostitution in Costa Rica. The report calls child sex tourism here "a serious problem."

Men, women and children are also victims of forced labor in the agriculture, construction and fishing sectors, according to the report.

The report commended Costa Rica for ensuring basic assistance to trafficking victim, but determined that the country has implemented "no proactive efforts to search for trafficking victims."

The report recommends that Costa Rica "vigorously implement anti-trafficking statutes" and "intensify efforts to investigate and prosecute trafficking offenses."

Costa Rica's neighbors, Nicaragua and Panama, are both listed under the tier two watch list ranking in this year's report. Colombia, having complied with all of the U.N.'s minimum requirements to fight trafficking, is the only Latin American country that was ranked as a tier one country in this year's report.

To see more of The Tico Times or to subscribe to the newspaper, go to <http://www.nicatimes.net/>. Copyright (c) 2010, The Tico Times, San Jose, Costa Rica Distributed by McClatchy-Tribune Information Services. For reprints, email tmsreprints@permissionsgroup.com, call 800-374-7985 or 847-635-6550, send a fax to 847-635-6968, or write to The Permissions Group Inc., 1247 Milwaukee Ave., Suite 303, Glenview, IL 60025, USA.

LOAD-DATE: June 23, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

ACC-NO: 20100623-1TT-Costa-Rica-falls-short-of-U-S-human-trafficking-standards-0623

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: 1TT

Copyright 2010 The Tico Times

120 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 22, 2010 Tuesday

Burmese police chief "unhappy" over US report on human trafficking

LENGTH: 338 words

Text of report in English by Thailand-based Burmese publication Irrawaddy website on 21 June

[Report by The Irrawaddy from the "News" section: "Burma Unhappy over Human Trafficking Ranking"]

Burmese police chief Brig-Gen Khin Yi is angry over a US State Department report that says Burma is one of more than a dozen countries doing the least to stop human trafficking, and he will hold a press conference in response, say sources in Naypyidaw.

"The police chief said that the accusation came despite police efforts to tackle the human trafficking issue, including workshops on prevention," said a police officer in Naypyidaw, speaking on condition of anonymity.

The "Trafficking in Persons Report 2010," released on Monday, ranked Burma along with Iran, North Korea and Cuba as "Tier 3" countries that have made no significant efforts to comply with the minimum standards to eliminate human trafficking.

On Burma, the report said, "The regime's widespread use of and lack of accountability in forced labour and recruitment of child soldiers is particularly worrying and represents the top causal factor for Burma's significant trafficking problem."

There has been no official response to the US report in the state-controlled media. The report also placed Singapore and Thailand on the human trafficking watch list.

Last week, the Thai foreign ministry expressed disappointment over the report, saying that it did not consider the efforts of the government to tackle the problem. The Singapore Ministry of Foreign Affairs said in a statement last week that it is committed to tackling the human trafficking issue, and its efforts have not weakened since last year.

The US report said that Malaysia and Taiwan have made progress on the issue.

"Malaysia's upgraded status is a recognition of what we have been doing so far to tackle the issue of human trafficking," Malaysia Home Minister Datuk Seri Hishammuddin Tun Hussein was quoted as saying in The Star online website last week.

Source: Irrawaddy website, Chiang Mai, in English 21 Jun 10

LOAD-DATE: June 22, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

121 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Caribbean Net News, Grand Cayman, Cayman Islands

Distributed by McClatchy-Tribune Business News

June 22, 2010 Tuesday

US refuses to correct 'inaccuracies' in trafficking in persons report

BYLINE: Caribbean Net News, Grand Cayman, Cayman IslandsSECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 520 words

Jun. 22--GEORGETOWN, Guyana -- The United States State Department said its findings in the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report, which has placed Guyana on tier two for another year, are accurate and there is no need for any correction.

This came as the Guyana government rejected the report last Monday, claiming that it was riddled with inaccuracies and does not present a true picture about the country's human trafficking situation.

In a statement, the government said human services minister Priya Manickchand was discussing Guyana's concern with Luis De Baca, Ambassador-at-large and head of the GTIP office via telephone

The statement said that, during a telephone conversation on Monday, De Baca insisted that the conclusions and recommendations in the report are based on an earlier inaccuracy about large numbers of traffickers and trafficking victims existing in Guyana.

"Minister Manickchand said she observed that, despite sincere and comprehensive efforts, the US State Department failed to have the inaccuracies corrected and continued basing their conclusions and recommendations on those inaccuracies," it added.

Manickchand pointed out how ridiculous the finding is that children from the country who come to town to go to school are potential victims of domestic servitude and therefore trafficking.

"Equally senseless was the recommendation that Guyana establish trafficking specific shelters to provide accommodation, care and counseling without credible evidence of a scale of trafficking to warrant more than what currently exists through Government supported NGOs like Help and Shelter," Manickchand said.

She explained that Guyanese across the board are upset that isolated, anecdotal accounts of trafficking in persons in Guyana were given such unusual significance as to generate many of the recommendations by the US State Department in its report.

The minister added that countered the Ambassador's invitation for Guyana to work in a partnership with the US by pointing out that the US State Department did not see fit to have the glaring inaccuracies and baseless accusations against Guyana corrected.

"The US State Department's stubborn refusal to acknowledge Guyana's contentions and their insistence on not changing anything in the report, makes a favorable response by Guyana to their offer of partnership difficult," the statement noted.

The Guyana government, according to the statement, continues to insist that the reports are misleading and based on fabrications designed to make the GTIP office appear competent. The Administration intends to approach higher levels of the US Government and members of Congress to correct these misleading reports.

To see more of the Caribbean Net News or to subscribe to the newspaper, go to <http://www.caribbeannetnews.com/>. Copyright (c) 2010, Caribbean Net News, Grand Cayman, Cayman Islands Distributed by McClatchy-Tribune Information Services. For reprints, email tmsreprints@permissionsgroup.com, call 800-374-7985 or 847-635-6550, send a fax to 847-635-6968, or write to The Permissions Group Inc., 1247 Milwaukee Ave., Suite 303, Glenview, IL 60025, USA.

LOAD-DATE: June 22, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

ACC-NO: 20100622-1CB-US-refuses-to-correct-inaccuracies-in-trafficking-in-persons-report-0622

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: 1CB

Copyright 2010 Caribbean Net News

122 of 404 DOCUMENTS

IPS - Inter Press Service

June 22, 2010 Tuesday

RIGHTS: PROBLEMS BESET CAMBODIA'S ANTI-TRAFFICKING CAMPAIGN

BYLINE: Irwin Loy

LENGTH: 925 words

DATELINE: PHNOM PEN, Jun 22 2010

Worrying trends continue to plague Cambodia and provide considerable concern for the future despite the gains it has reportedly made in combating human trafficking.

Citing renewed attention to law enforcement and the prosecution of offenders engaged in "modern slavery," the 2010 Trafficking in Persons report released earlier this month by the U.S. State Department removed Cambodia from its watch list of countries seen as not doing enough to fight human trafficking.

"The government of Cambodia demonstrated significant progress in law enforcement efforts against sex trafficking during the last year," the report states.

Cambodia was judged to be a Tier 2 country on a three-level scale, indicating that while it does not comply with "minimum standards for eliminating human trafficking," it is nonetheless "making significant efforts to do so."

The report cites increased convictions of people accused of human trafficking as justification for removing Cambodia from the watch list. There were 36 convictions of offenders during the reporting period, compared with 11 in 2008.

Bith Kimhong, director of the anti-human trafficking department in Cambodia's Ministry of Interior, called the decision to remove the country from the U.S. watch list "just."

"We have worked hard to combat human trafficking," he said.

Samleang Seila, country director for the group Action Pour Les Enfants (APLE), which helps child victims of sex abuse, acknowledged that authorities have demonstrated increased commitment to tackling the problem.

"Cambodia is making progress against trafficking," he said. "The number of arrests and investigations done by the police last year has increased. There are more sex offenders sent to court."

Yet, he added, it remains difficult to prosecute offenders accused of abusing the children his organisation helps.

Impunity and corruption - sometimes from police and judicial officials alleged to be both "directly and indirectly involved in trafficking" - continue to impede progress, states the U.S. report.

Children, women and men still fall victim to trafficking within the country and outside of Cambodia's borders.

And a "weak judicial system," combined with "credible fears of retaliation," means that many victims are unwilling to rely on the legal system for help, the report adds.

These and related warnings have left critics wondering why the U.S. State Department saw fit to lift Cambodia from its human trafficking watch list.

U.S. Congressman Ed Royce, a frequent critic of government corruption in Cambodia, said the country's removal from the watch list was an unjustified reward.

"For Cambodia to make meaningful progress in addressing human trafficking, it must address the growing problem of government corruption," Royce said in response to e-mailed questions. "The problem is getting worse by the year."

Royce, who is a senior member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, sponsored a House Resolution last year condemning Cambodian corruption and "the role it plays in furthering human trafficking."

"Having heard scores of accounts from NGOs (non-government organisations) and from eyewitnesses, the Cambodian government's corruption often hampers trafficking investigations, and at worse, covers up the problem. Rewarding Cambodia, as the State Department Report does, only hampers efforts to curtail human trafficking," said Royce in a statement.

Global Witness, an international anti-corruption watchdog, has accused Cambodia of "widespread corruption and mismanagement of public funds" even as it urged the international donor community to demand that the government fulfill its promised reforms, including those in the judicial system.

"What needs to be improved is the judicial system and the court process, which sometimes discourages victims from participating in the legal system against the defender," APLE's Seila said.

There is also a fear that economic problems could magnify human trafficking concerns in the near future, with migrant workers looking abroad for job opportunities.

Neighbouring Thailand remains a major destination country for Cambodian migrants, with some 124,000 migrants legally registered to work there. However, it is estimated that many more undocumented labourers head abroad each year.

Fueled by a lack of opportunity at home, trafficked migrant workers are often lured by middlemen who promise lucrative jobs abroad. Instead, they are often smuggled to perform dangerous work on fishing vessels.

"Most of them work under slave labour conditions for a very long time," said Manfred Hornung, a legal adviser with the Cambodian rights group LICADHO.

The escaped migrants he has interviewed report brutal conditions - 22-hour work days, frequent beatings, even murder at sea.

Migrants are rarely paid until after they are released, he said, a timeline that can last for months and even years.

"In May, I had two guys come back after being away for three years," Hornung said. "None of them received salaries."

Hornung calls dozens of smuggled migrants he has interviewed "the tip of the iceberg" when it comes to human trafficking concerns.

Estimates suggest that between 250,000 and 300,000 young Cambodians will enter the labour market each year in search of jobs. If they cannot find them in Cambodia, many will choose to look abroad, potentially putting them at risk.

The U.S. State Department has also warned of this alarming trend.

"Labour trafficking among Cambodians migrating abroad for work is a growing problem that will require greater attention from authorities in the coming year," it says.

LOAD-DATE: June 22, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

123 of 404 DOCUMENTS

State Department Documents and Publications

June 22, 2010

Pakistan's Efforts on Trafficking Cited by United States; U.S. joins South, Central Asia nations ranked in trafficking report

BYLINE: Gabriella Krohmal, Staff Writer, ,

SECTION: NEWS FROM AMERICA.COM AND THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 757 words

Washington -- Among the countries of the South and Central Asia region, Pakistan stands out in the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report -- for positive reasons.

Pakistan's ranking as a Tier 2 country in the 2010 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report is an improvement over its 2009 rating, when it was listed as a Tier 2 watch list country. The annual report, required by the U.S. Congress, ranks 177 nations by tiers to measure the extent to which each government adheres to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, a U.S. law enacted in 2000 to combat human trafficking and protect victims. A Tier 2 ranking means a government is "making significant efforts" to comply with the anti-trafficking law's minimum standards but does not yet meet those standards. Tier 2 watch list countries do not meet the minimum standards but are making significant efforts, yet trafficking is either increasing or more concrete steps are needed by the governments.

For the first time, the 2010 report includes the United States in its rankings, with the U.S. listed as a Tier 1 country, where the government complies fully with the law's minimum standards.

The U.S. Embassy in Islamabad acknowledged Pakistan's 2010 ranking in a statement, saying, "The U.S. Government is committed to supporting Pakistan in its efforts to combat human trafficking." The embassy's statement added that the 2010 TIP report reflected "the Government of Pakistan's efforts to prosecute trafficking offenders, prevent and combat bonded labor, and protect trafficking victims."

Of the 12 South and Central Asia nations ranked in the 2010 report, Pakistan was the only one to improve on its ranking. In 2010, Nepal and Kyrgyzstan are ranked as Tier 2 nations, as they were in 2009. Bangladesh, India, Sri Lanka, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan are ranked as Tier 2 watch list, the same as in 2009. Afghanistan, Kazakhstan and the Maldives all ranked on the Tier 2 watch list in 2010, down from their Tier 2 rankings in 2009.

During 2009, Pakistan endeavored to prosecute individuals charged with human trafficking, the TIP report said. According to the report, 385 people were convicted in 2009 under the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance, compared to just 28 in 2008. Another 166 were convicted under various other laws associated with human trafficking, the report said. At least three of those convicted were guilty of child trafficking, with the rest guilty of either labor or sex trafficking. In addition, the report said more than 150 Pakistani officials were penalized for facilitating or "participating in illegal migration and human smuggling."

"The Government of Pakistan made some progress in its efforts to protect victims of human trafficking," the report said. During 2009, local police successfully freed more than 2,000 bonded laborers in Sindh province, and Pakistan's federal government succeeded in providing legal aid and development assistance, including land, housing, money and agricultural assistance, to bonded laborers from the provinces of Khyber-Pakhtunkhwa, Punjab, Balochistan and Sindh. More than 1,000 children who had been trafficked to the United Arab Emirates were also successfully repatriated, the report said.

Pakistan also received mention for its efforts at preventing human trafficking, including projects such as eliminating bonded labor in brick kilns and the country's Child Protection Management Information System, which collectively spent millions of dollars to issue Computerized National Identification Cards, provide loans so laborers could get out of debt, and fund community organizations to prevent child trafficking. Pakistan has also invested in training its police and military officials in the most effective ways to combat human trafficking, the report said.

The State Department also honored nine Heroes in the Fight Against Modern Slavery in 2010, including activists from Uzbekistan, India, Brazil, Burundi, Hungary, Jordan, Mauritania, Mongolia and the United States.

Natalia Abdullayeva of Uzbekistan was honored for forging unprecedented partnerships between the private sector and the government to fight trafficking. India's Sattaru Umapathi, the anti-human trafficking officer of the Crime Investigation Department for the state of Andhra Pradesh, was honored for leading numerous interstate and intrastate rescue operations, rescuing victims and arresting traffickers.

(This is a product of the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State. Web site: <http://www.america.gov>)

LOAD-DATE: June 23, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: SDWF

124 of 404 DOCUMENTS

New Straits Times (Malaysia)

June 21, 2010 Monday

Better ranking next year

SECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 9

LENGTH: 427 words

PUTRAJAYA: The government is optimistic that the country will graduate to Tier 1 in the United Nation's Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report by next year.

Home Ministry secretary-general Datuk Seri Mahmood Adam said the target was based on a strategic action plan by the authorities and significant requirements set out by Malaysia Anti-Trafficking in Persons Council (MAPO).

Mahmood, who is also council chairman, said the government would curb human trafficking activities to the core "until the rate goes down to zero".

Malaysia was re-elevated to Tier 2 Watch List in this year's TIP report released by the United States' State Department last week after being demoted to Tier 3 last year.

Countries in Tier 3 could face trade sanctions from the US and be subjected to non-humanitarian aid cuts.

Mahmood said under MAPO, five main divisions were designated to handle each area and they were supported by 36 government agencies and non-governmental organisations.

"The divisions are law enforcement agencies led by the police force, Attorney-General's Chambers, Women, Family and Community Development Ministry, Human Resources Ministry and the media."

He added that although the aim of reaching zero TIP activities sounded impossible, the ministry would go all out to realise the mission.

"Our target is to hit zero cases where the practice is completely abandoned and we don't report any more cases. Knowing fully that this is going to be an unenviable task, we will do our best to make our target become a reality."

"Last year, we were downgraded to Tier 3 because we did not have any action plan. Now, we can combat these activities efficiently with well-designated national action plans."

He said the National Action Plan (2010-2015) was a strategic direction outlined to ensure smooth and effective initiative implementation.

However, Mahmood said there were several hurdles that needed to be overcome quickly.

"One of them is the long time it takes to prosecute suspects. We hope to expedite cases through law enforcement operations."

He added that traffickers used Malaysia as a transit point for human traffickers to cross to other nations.

"They come here legally with proper travel documents before they are smuggled out. The best way to counter this is through tight screening on visa applications and others."

Mahmood also said agencies under MAPC were monitoring closely visitors from countries identified as sources of human trafficking.

Apart from enforcement, MAPO is also going all out in their campaign to promote awareness among the public on this issue.

(END)

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 New Straits Times Press (Malaysia) Berhad
All Rights Reserved

125 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Toronto Star

June 20, 2010 Sunday

Looking for work, finding a nightmare

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. A6

LENGTH: 290 words

After a gruelling, 18-hour day, 15-year-old Kaminah, a domestic worker, would rest her head on a bag filled with blood-stained clothes, sleeping on cold ceramic tiles outside the bathroom.

The blood was her own, from the beatings inflicted by her employer on a daily basis.

"(Whenever I got a beating) I would always think of my family," Kaminah told The Jakarta Post. "Late at night, before going to sleep, I would think about my father and mother and feel very sad. I miss my parents a lot."

UNICEF estimates that more 100,000 Indonesian women and children are trafficked annually within the country and abroad, with about one in three being under the age of 18.

Pressured by families or lured with promises of work, an alarming number of girls and women find themselves in conditions of virtual slavery, both within Indonesia and abroad.

A recently released report by the U.S. State department on human trafficking lists Indonesia as a Tier-2 country for trafficking, for not fully complying with standards set by the U.S. Trafficking Victims Protection Act.

"There is a particularly big problem with Indonesian women being trafficked as domestic workers, ending up basically enslaved in conditions in the Middle East, Malaysia, and to a lesser extent countries like Singapore," says Elaine Pearson, Deputy Director of the Asia Division for Human Rights Watch.

"Part of the problem is that there is not effective oversight of recruitment agencies in Indonesia."

But for some, the root of the problem lies not with the agencies, but with rampant poverty.

"I really wanted to finish school but we didn't have enough money to pay for tuition," another girl, Kiya, told The Jakarta Post. "So I decided to work as a domestic worker and help my family."

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: COLUMN

PUBLICATION-TYPE: NEWSPAPER

126 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 19, 2010 Saturday

Nigeria; Rape - Naptip Promises Dire Consequences for Offenders

BYLINE: Daily Champion (Lagos)

LENGTH: 406 words

Fire consequences await rapists, Mr. Simon Egede, Executive Secretary of the National Agency for the Prohibition of Trafficking in Persons (NAPTIP) promised in Abuja yesterday.

Egede, who made the promise during an interview with the News Agency of Nigeria (NAN), added that rape offenders would serve jail terms.

According to him, the law that established NAPTIP, the Trafficking in Persons Prohibition, Law Enforcement and Administration Act 2003, prohibits the carnal knowledge of a child.

"So it is an offence under the NAPTIP Act to have carnal knowledge of a child whether she is your own daughter or a neighbour's daughter or a child on the streets.

"Once she is somebody below 18 years you cannot have carnal knowledge of her and where you do, it is an offence and you stand a chance of going to prison," Egede said.

When asked why offenders were given options of fines, Egede said the discretion when it comes to sentencing an accused person belonged to the judge.

"We cannot interfere with judicial process, all we are enjoined to do is properly investigate cases, prosecute, tender evidences and secure convictions. Thereafter, it is entirely judicial discretion.

"For instance, some of these people are sick. If the accused is a mental case or an old person, or shows remorse during trial for an offence, there can be so many considerations," he said.

The NAPTIP boss, however, expressed joy that some of the cases handled by his agency received favourable convictions "like 15 years without option of fine, 10 years, seven years depending on the level of crime".

On the adoption of the Child Rights Act in the remaining 12 states yet to adopt the Act, Egede appealed to such state governments to pass it.

"We hope that the governments and legislatures in these states will take a cue from the majority of other states and pass the Act because it is for the benefit and good of the children of the respective states," he said.

Mrs. Veronica Umar, national coordinator of WOTCLEF in a separate interview, told NAN that old men who sexually assault "babies" are sick.

She advised that such people should go to the psychiatric hospital because it's very unnatural.

"For a big man to force a child to make love with him is more than incest, if there's anything worse than incest, then that is it," she said.

Umar also congratulated the NAPTIP boss for Nigeria's tier one rating for the second year running on anti-human trafficking campaigns.

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

Copyright 2010 AllAfrica, Inc.

127 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Daily Champion (Lagos)

June 19, 2010 Saturday

Rape - Naptip Promises Dire Consequences for Offenders

LENGTH: 406 words

DATELINE: Lagos

Fire consequences await rapists, Mr. Simon Egede, Executive Secretary of the National Agency for the Prohibition of Trafficking in Persons (NAPTIP) promised in Abuja yesterday.

Egede, who made the promise during an interview with the News Agency of Nigeria (NAN), added that rape offenders would serve jail terms.

According to him, the law that established NAPTIP, the Trafficking in Persons Prohibition, Law Enforcement and Administration Act 2003, prohibits the carnal knowledge of a child.

"So it is an offence under the NAPTIP Act to have carnal knowledge of a child whether she is your own daughter or a neighbour's daughter or a child on the streets.

"Once she is somebody below 18 years you cannot have carnal knowledge of her and where you do, it is an offence and you stand a chance of going to prison," Egede said.

When asked why offenders were given options of fines, Egede said the discretion when it comes to sentencing an accused person belonged to the judge.

"We cannot interfere with judicial process, all we are enjoined to do is properly investigate cases, prosecute, tender evidences and secure convictions. Thereafter, it is entirely judicial discretion.

"For instance, some of these people are sick. If the accused is a mental case or an old person, or shows remorse during trial for an offence, there can be so many considerations," he said.

The NAPTIP boss, however, expressed joy that some of the cases handled by his agency received favourable convictions "like 15 years without option of fine, 10 years, seven years depending on the level of crime".

On the adoption of the Child Rights Act in the remaining 12 states yet to adopt the Act, Egede appealed to such state governments to pass it.

"We hope that the governments and legislatures in these states will take a cue from the majority of other states and pass the Act because it is for the benefit and good of the children of the respective states," he said.

Mrs. Veronica Umar, national coordinator of WOTCLEF in a separate interview, told NAN that old men who sexually assault "babies" are sick.

She advised that such people should go to the psychiatric hospital because it's very unnatural.

"For a big man to force a child to make love with him is more than incest, if there's anything worse than incest, then that is it," she said.

Umar also congratulated the NAPTIP boss for Nigeria's tier one rating for the second year running on anti-human trafficking campaigns.

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 AllAfrica Global Media.
All Rights Reserved

128 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Fiji Times (Australia)

June 19, 2010 Saturday
1 Edition

New hope for IMF loan

BYLINE: Shalveen ChandSECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 7LENGTH: 317 words

FIJI has managed to move up in the classification of countries in the United States Trafficking in Persons Report 2010, giving some hope for the Government's $1billion loan application to the International Monetary Fund.

The 2009 TIP Report ranked Fiji as a Tier 3 nation with the 2010 Report upgrading Fiji to the Tier 2 Watch List.

Tier 2 lists countries whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards, but are making significant efforts to comply.

Moving from Tier 3 to Tier 2 removes US congressionally-mandated sanctions against US approval of World Bank, IMF and Asian Development Bank financing proposals.

Fiji has applied for a $1bn loan from the IMF and being a Tier 3 nation meant US members on the IMF board would have had to vote against Fiji's application.

This was highlighted last month by US Deputy Chief of Mission, Richard Pruett, who said Fiji was a Tier 3 nation in the US report on Human Trafficking, and as policy the US government did not support governments listed in that tier.

"Fiji has applied for a standby credit agreement with the IMF of no less than $1 billion. The United States is the most prominent member of the IMF's board," he said.

"So long as Fiji is at Tier 3, our law requires us not just to vote against the loan but to actively oppose it.

"One billion dollars is a lot of money. But trafficking in persons is an important issue."

The report found the Government was making significant efforts to comply with minimum standards for the elimination of the trafficking of people.

Over the past year, the Government has enacted an anti-trafficking law, the Crimes Decree, and repealed the archaic Penal Code.

The Crimes Decree defines trafficking as a crime of compelled service which does not necessarily involve crossing a border or otherwise moving a victim, and includes several innovative provisions to protect both adult and child trafficking victims.

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: NewspaperJOURNAL-CODE: FIJ

Copyright 2010 Nationwide News Pty Limited
All Rights Reserved

129 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Hindustan Times

June 19, 2010 Saturday

Human trade

LENGTH: 463 wordsDATELINE: Assam

Assam, June 19 -- The United State's action in placing India in Tier 2 Watch List on human trafficking for the seventh consecutive year once again brings to the fore this deep rooted problem. Though human trafficking is a global phenomenon, it is very acute in the North Eastern region of the country. It is quite disconcerting that the annual Trafficking in Persons Report 2010 released by US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton revealed that girls from the North Eastern region including the educated are duped with promise of well-paid employment in the large cities and then forced into prostitution or marriages in Haryana and Punjab. Taking advantage of poverty, illiteracy, unemployment well organized groups are luring away women and minors outside the region. Most of such victims of human trafficking are sold off in the red light areas of Mumbai, Delhi, Siliguri .Human trafficking in the North East have reached an alarming proportion.

The US report also slammed the weak implementation of policies and corrupt officials for failure to effectively confront the scourge. It revealed the involvement of a section of corrupt officials facilitating in human trafficking and providing protection to those who are carrying out this nefarious activities. The report had pointed out that the Indian Government has not demonstrated sufficient progress in its law enforcement efforts to tackle prevalent bonded labour trafficking. The only positive aspect in the report is that Assam, Bihar, West Bengal, Andhra Pradesh and Tamil Nadu have constituted Anti- Human Trafficking Units. But it is not known how far these units are effective in tackling trafficking. It is high time the law enforcing agencies coordinate their activities to tackle the menace of human trafficking head on. The vulnerable areas should be identified and awareness campaigns be conducted with the help of voluntary agencies. A strong vigil by the village elders, NGOs can go a long way in thwarting the activities of the traffickers. To check this menace the authorities along with voluntary organizations should identify the vulnerable areas and step up vigil to ensure that the agents of human traffickers cannot dupe the gullible people. The authorities should also initiate action to end complicity of law enforcing officials in trafficking. Strong deterrent action must be taken against those engaged in this heinous criminal activity. Rehabilitation schemes should be formulated to put life back in track for the rescued victims of human trafficking. The society must come forward and assist the authorities in tackling this menace. Published by HT Syndication with permission from Assam Tribune. For more information on news feed please contact Sarabjit Jagirdar at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

130 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 17, 2010 Thursday

US human trafficking reports upgrades Cambodia

LENGTH: 1075 words

Text of report in English by Cambodian state news agency AKP email service

[AKP report: "2010 Trafficking in Persons Report: Cambodia Upgraded to Tier 2"]

Phnom Penh, June 16, 2010 AKP - Cambodia has been upgraded to Tier 2 on 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report, a noted improvement from last year's ranking of Tier 2 Watchlist, according to press release of the US Embassy in Phnom Penh.

The full press release dated June 15 reads as follows:

"On Monday, June 14th, US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton announced the release of the State Department's 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report. This year Cambodia has been upgraded to Tier 2, a noted improvement from last year's ranking of Tier 2 Watchlist. Over the past year, the Cambodian government demonstrated increased efforts to address human trafficking. Law enforcement efforts stepped up significantly, resulting in an increase in convictions over the prior year. The Government also issued guidelines to improve victim treatment and protection, and began to train officials on the use of these standards.

Cambodia is a source, transit, and destination country for men, women, and children, who are subjected to trafficking in persons, specifically forced labour and forced prostitution. Cambodian men, women, and children migrate to Thailand, Malaysia, and other countries for work and many are subsequently forced into commercial sexual exploitation or forced to labour in fishing and seafood processing industries, on agricultural plantations, in factories, in domestic work, or for begging and street selling. Debt bondage is sometimes a factor that contributes to the vulnerability of Cambodians to trafficking. Local recruiting agencies sometimes detained recruits in training centres during the pre-departure training period, and the fees make workers more vulnerable to debt bondage. Some workers are reportedly subjected to confinement and conditions of involuntary servitude in Malaysia, Saudi Arabia, and other destination countries, and some returning workers reported being paid only at the end of their contract, at which time they were also informed that a substantial part of their pay was deducted. Parents sometimes sell their children into exploitation or domestic servitude. Within the country, children are also subjected to forced labour, including being forced to beg, scavenge refuse, work in quarries, and work in the production and processing of bricks, rubber, salt, and shrimp.

The Government of Cambodia does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. The Royal Government demonstrated significant progress in law enforcement efforts against sex trafficking during the last year. Authorities convicted 36 trafficking offenders; all but one of these convictions were for sex trafficking. Authorities also reported one conviction of a public official for trafficking-related corruption during the year. The Ministry of Social Affairs (MOSAVY) issued a new 'Policy and National Minimum Standards for the Protection of the Rights of Victims of Human Trafficking,' which includes guidelines to improve victim treatment and protection, and began to train officials on the use of these standards. The government partnered with NGOs to train several thousand police, social workers, court officials and other employees on the 2008 law and its enforcement.

To improve its Tier ranking, the Royal Government of Cambodia should conduct robust investigations and prosecutions of government officials involved in trafficking activities, expand efforts to proactively identify victims of trafficking among vulnerable groups and refer them to adequate victim services, and establish protections for Cambodian migrant workers such as laws to regulate recruitment and placement. The Royal Government of Cambodia should also continue training officials, particularly provincial-level police, about human trafficking, especially since some officials wrongly believe that enforcing laws against non-trafficking sex crimes contributes to efforts to combat trafficking.

The US Congress, through its passage of the 2000 Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA), as amended, requires the Secretary of State to submit this report each year. The 177-country report is the most comprehensive worldwide report on the efforts of governments to combat trafficking in persons, a modern form of slavery. The goal of the report is to raise global awareness and spur countries to take effective actions to counter trafficking in persons. The assessment includes reports on 175 countries assigned ranks, including the first-ever ranking of the United States, and special case commentaries on Haiti and Somalia. Countries assessed as meeting the 'minimum standards for the elimination of severe forms of trafficking' set forth in the TVPA are classified as Tier 1. Countries assessed as not fully complying with the minimum standards, but making significant efforts to meet those minimum standards, are classified as Tier 2. Countries assessed as neither complying with the minimum standards nor making significant efforts to do so are classified as Tier 3.

This year, in keeping with the Obama Administration's commitment to hold the United States to the same standards to which we hold others, and following up Secretary Clinton's pledge made at the release of 2009 TIP Report last June, the 2010 TIP Report contains a full narrative and ranking of the United States for the first time. The US narrative is a candid and detailed assessment of US anti-trafficking efforts, based on the same methodology used to determine rankings for other countries. It points out a number of deficiencies in those efforts, and contains a list of recommendations for improvement. While the United States is ranked as Tier 1, it is important to remember that Tier 1 means the United States complies with the TVPA minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, not that the United States does not have a human trafficking problem. A Tier 1 ranking means there is much room for improvement; that is the case for all countries ranked Tier 1.

The US Embassy looks forward to working further with the Cambodian government in the upcoming year to achieve the necessary steps to see Cambodia maintain Tier Two, and eventually achieve Tier One, status." - AKP

Source: Agence Kampuchea Presse email, Phnom Penh, in English 0000 gmt 16 Jun 10

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

131 of 404 DOCUMENTS

IPS - Inter Press Service

June 17, 2010 Thursday

SOUTH-EAST ASIA: REGION GETS AN 'F' IN HALTING HUMAN TRAFFICKING

BYLINE: Marwaan Macan-markarLENGTH: 1008 wordsDATELINE: BANGKOK, Jun 17 2010

In the wake of a new U.S. government report on human trafficking, human rights and migrant rights activists are calling on a South-east Asian regional bloc to review its policies toward this scourge to protect the group's most vulnerable citizens - its women and children.

Such an appeal to the 10 members of the Association of South-east Asian Nations (ASEAN) stems from the way human trafficking is viewed by this bloc, currently racing ahead to create a rules-based community that would closely resemble the European Union.

ASEAN's narrow definition of what constitutes human trafficking and how it should be combated was revealed last year. It came after all members of the 43-year-old bloc endorsed its new charter to be a "more rules-based, effective and people-centered organization" to become an ASEAN Community by 2015.

ASEAN's members include Brunei, Burma (or Myanmar), Cambodia, Indonesia, Laos, Malaysia, Philippines, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam.

To achieve this quest of regional unity, leaders of the 10 countries endorsed the creation of three pillars to build on: a political security community, an economic community and a social and cultural community.

In doing so, ASEAN placed human trafficking as a security challenge and labor migration as a social and cultural challenge.

"The separation of migration and trafficking into different areas reveals a lack of understanding about the problem," says Phil Robertson, deputy director at the Asia division for Human Rights Watch, a New York-based global rights lobby. "If ASEAN wants to get its act together on trafficking, it needs to deal with migration and trafficking together."

ASEAN is fortunate that the U.S. State Department's annual trafficking in persons report, released on Jun. 14, does not rank regional blocs, Robertson remarks. "If they grade ASEAN as a region, they would have to give it a Tier 3 rating."

The U.S. government's report, published for the past 10 years, has become a benchmark to assess the scourge of human trafficking and what governments across the world are doing to protect the victims, prosecute the abusers and prevent the spread of the traffickers' network. The worst ranked countries earn a 'Tier 3' rating, while those with a success rate are listed as 'Tier 1' countries.

Washington's 'Trafficking in Persons Report 2010' has been far from flattering for ASEAN, which is trying to reinvent itself from its original mission - as a bulwark against the spread of communism in the region - and appear more meaningful to its over 550 million citizens, some four million of whom have been forced to seek jobs in neighboring countries. Nine ASEAN countries joined a global list of notoriety, where human trafficking is rampant. Military-ruled Burma was ranked among the worst offenders by this 10th annual report, a position shared with other countries like North Korea and Saudi Arabia, where little has been done to protect children, women and men from human trafficking networks.

Cambodian children forced to sell sweets and flowers on the streets of Thai cities, and Burmese women forced into prostitution in Malaysia are among the disturbing cases singled out in the report.

Singapore and Thailand, two of the strongest U.S. allies in the region, were placed on the 'Tier 2 Watch List', suggesting that they had regressed from last year. Other countries in the region ranked likewise for clear evidence of human trafficking were Laos, Philippines, Vietnam and Malaysia, which had been in the worst tier last year.

Indonesia, the region's giant, and Cambodia, one of the region's poorest, were placed among the 'Tier 2' countries. "Indonesia is a major source country, and to lesser extent a destination and transit country for women, children and men who are subjected to trafficking in persons, specifically forced prostitution and forced labor," the report reveals.

Burma was described likewise. "Many men, women, and children who migrate abroad for work in Thailand, Malaysia, China, Bangladesh, India and South Korea are trafficked into conditions of forced or bonded labor or commercial sexual exploitation," the report notes.

The affluent city-state of Singapore, on the other hand, is a "destination country for women and girls subjected to trafficking in persons, specifically forced prostitution, and for some migrant workers in conditions that may be indicative of forced labor," the report adds.

Thailand and Cambodia share similar trends as a source, transit and destination country for victims of human trafficking. "The government of Thailand does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking," the report states while acknowledging that Bangkok was "making significant steps to do so."

The Singapore and Thai governments have fired back at Washington. "(The report) is rather puzzling because the U.S. has not satisfactorily explained how it arrived at its conclusions," the island's foreign ministry spokesman said in a statement released to the media. "Let me say that the (report) is more a political ritual than an objective study."

Bangkok echoed similar sentiments. "Thailand doubts the credibility of the U.S. report because this came out despite our efforts to provide further updates," a Thai foreign ministry spokesman was quoted as saying in the local media on Thursday.

Such reactions confirm the wide gulf between how the U.S. government views human trafficking and how ASEAN countries do. "The U.S. government has a broad definition of what trafficking means, including sex trafficking, labor trafficking and forced labor," says Sinapan Samydarai, convenor of the Task Force on ASEAN Migrant Workers, a coalition of non-government organizations.

"ASEAN countries like Singapore see trafficking as only sex trafficking. Left out is the whole area of labor trafficking," he said during a telephone interview from the city-state. "ASEAN countries also place a greater burden on victims of intra-regional trafficking to prove they have been trafficked or face deportation. This is unfair on the victims."

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

132 of 404 DOCUMENTS

IPR Strategic Business Information Database

June 17, 2010

REJECTS US ACCUSATIONS OF TRAFFICKING IN PERSONSLENGTH: 140 wordsDATELINE: CUBA

According to ACN: The head of the North American Department at the Cuban Foreign Ministry, Josefina Vidal, categorically rejected the inclusion of Cuba in a report released on Monday by the US State Department accusing the island of human trafficking. Countries covered in the report are placed in three categories, according to anti-trafficking performance. Those lowest rated, in Tier 3, are subject to US sanctions, where applicable, including cuts in non-humanitarian aid. There are thirteen Tier 3 countries this year, including Cuba. A statement published in the website of the Cuban Foreign Ministry strongly rejects the US State Department's allegations that in Cuba children are subjected to trafficking in persons, specifically commercial sexual exploitation within the country. "These shameful slanders deeply offend the Cuban people.

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

133 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Korea Times

June 17, 2010 Thursday

Human trafficking severe in Korea :US

LENGTH: 374 words

Korea has been labeled as a 'source and destination country' for human trafficking.

The U.S. State Department said in its annual report on Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Monday that the human trafficking situation in Korea is still substandard, despite its Tier 1 status.

Countries are divided into Tier 1, 2, 2 Watchlist and 3 based upon criteria such as victim protection, criminal prosecution and preventive measures.

Korea has maintained a Tier 1 status for nine consecutive years since 2002. Tier 1 countries are in 'full compliance with the minimum standards of the Trafficking and Violence Protection Act (TVPA),' Tier 2 countries make 'significant efforts' to comply, while Tier 3 countries make 'no efforts.'

But the Korean government's efforts and the actual state of affairs are completely at odds. In its initial words, the TIP Report on South Korea revealed that South Korea 'is a source, transit, and destination country for men and women subjected to trafficking in persons, specifically forced labor, and women and girls in forced commercial sexual exploitation.'

The report also said that men and women from Southeast Asian countries such as Russia, Uzbekistan, Mongolia, Morocco, China, the Philippines, Thailand and Cambodia are forced into prostitution or mandatory labor when they come to Korea for jobs.

The TIP report especially criticized Korea for allowing women from countries such as Russia and Uzbekistan who enter Korea via entertainment visas, including those 'recruited to be singers and bar workers near U.S. military facilities,' to be trafficked for forced prostitution.

It also stressed that Korean women are forced into prostitution not only in Korea, but also in foreign countries such as the U.S., Canada, Japan and Australia.

The report also said that 'Korean men continue to be a major source of demand for child sex tourism in Southeast Asia and the Pacific' and that 'the government has never prosecuted a Korean citizen for engaging in child sex tourism abroad.'

The report also warned that widespread Internet use was revitalizing the prostitution industry, and advised Korea to increase efforts to 'investigate, prosecute, and convict trafficking offenders involved in both sex and labor trafficking in the ROK.'

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

134 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Morning Star

June 17, 2010 Thursday

World - Cuba hits back at 'slander' of US blacklisting

BYLINE: Tom Mellen

LENGTH: 267 words

Cuba blasted President Obama's administration on Tuesday for including it on a US human trafficking blacklist, branding it a 'shameful slander' designed to justify its discredited trade embargo.

On Monday Washington released a report which charged that Cuba is one of 13 countries that they are not complying with minimum international standards to eliminate the trade in human beings.

Cuba and other states on the list, including the Democratic Peoples Republic of Korea and Iran, could face more US sanctions.

Havana was singled out for allegedly not doing enough to prevent the trafficking of child prostitutes on the island.

Cuban Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Josefina Vidal Ferreiro said: "Cuba categorically rejects these allegations as false and disrespectful."

Ms Vidal Ferreiro said that the allegations were all the more offensive because the government had concentrated its limited resources on protecting women and the young.

The socialist system ensures that all citizens have access to free education through university, free health care and heavily subsidised housing and transportation.

Crime and drug abuse rates are low.

Ms Ferreiro added that Cuban laws "put us among the countries in the region with the most advanced norms and mechanisms for the prevention of abuse."

She concluded that Cuba's inclusion on the trafficking list was a political decision.

"It can only be explained by the desperate need that the US government has to justify, under whatever pretext, the persistence of its cruel blockade, which has been overwhelmingly rejected by the international community," said Ms Ferreiro.

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

135 of 404 DOCUMENTS

New Straits Times (Malaysia)

June 17, 2010 Thursday

It takes a generation

SECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 16LENGTH: 441 words

MODERN Malaysian historians now uniformly acknowledge the double-edged sword that was forged in the crucible of the global expansion of tertiary education beginning in the early 1970s, when the first local scholarship recipients under the then New Economic Policy were sent abroad to university. That quantum leap in the educational refinement of Malaysian - especially Malay - youth indeed fuelled the new technocracy serving their country's subsequent transformation, but that vastly expanded exposure was also infused with the heady fumes of radicalism, rebellion and revolution. What has since come to be termed "Islamism" was gestated among young Malaysians at tertiary levels of education abroad, transplanted home to local soil by the alarmed cancellations of overseas scholarships.

The second wave of tertiary educational expansion was domestic, reversing the flow with the proliferation of local colleges offering access to and actively wooing foreign students. Although the imperatives were different - from educating a new generation of Malaysians to developing local tertiary education as a revenue-earning sector of the economy - the leitmotif of connections among transnational radicals has persisted, not only intact but growing, in tandem with the acceleration of communications and ease of travel.

It has also been a historical fact that Malaysians' interest in and support of Islamist causes over the past generation, from Afghanistan through Bosnia to Palestine, has seen many slip through the cracks into the dark underworld of these causes. From the notorious depredations of the now-deceased "Bali Bombers" to the brace of hapless stooges who turned up entangled in Yemeni connections to the "Underwear Bomber" over Detroit last December, Malaysians crop up in such circumstances often enough for the world to have begun developing the notion that this country tolerates and accommodates such nonsense more than it should.

Climbing up to Tier 2 on the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons report, off the Tier 3 blacklist, goes some distance towards redressing this misperception that Malaysia turns a blind eye to being used in this manner; indeed, there is a genuine aspiration here for Tier 1 status: to go from being part of the problem to being part of the solution. Better still, however, would be wider knowledge of how familiar these individuals and their networks are to local enforcers. The recent deportation of 10 foreign nationals for such subversive activities may be taken as an indication of the vigilance required against such elements. It is equally an indication of that vigilance in progress.

(END)

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHDOCUMENT-TYPE: EditorialPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

136 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Right Vision News

June 17, 2010 ThursdayPakistan: US excludes Pakistan from watch list*LENGTH: 157 wordsDATELINE: Islamabad

Islamabad, June 17 -- America praised the Pakistan's efforts in curbing human trafficking and exited its name out of watch list.

Pakistan has been added in the list of nations of 2nd grade in accord of its efforts in curbing human smuggling, mentioned in report issued by American Foreign Ministry. American assistance in efforts of Pakistan to counter human smuggling was also mentioned in the report.

According to the report up till now 385 convicts have been sentenced in accordance with Pakistan's anti human trafficking law whereas 2,864 cases were made. US Foreign Ministry categorized Afghanistan, Brunei, Maldives, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam in first category whereas Bangladesh, China, India, Philippine, Sri Lanka are in the list too likewise that of last yea Published by HT Syndication with permission from Right Vision News. For more information on news feed please contact Sarabjit Jagirdar at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 Right Vision News
All Rights Reserved

137 of 404 DOCUMENTS

South Asian Media Network

June 17, 2010 Thursday

Pakistan: Pakistan out of human smuggling watch list

LENGTH: 176 words

DATELINE: ISLAMABAD

ISLAMABAD, June 17 -- United States of America has deleted the name of Pakistan from the watch list of countries infamous for human trafficking.

From now on Pakistan has been added in the list of nations of 2nd grade in accordance with its efforts in curbing human smuggling, mentioned in the report issued by US Foreign Ministry, a private news channel reported.

The report also lauded the efforts of Pakistan in curbing human smuggling from the country.

American assistance in efforts of Pakistan to counter human smuggling was also mentioned in the report.

Out of 2,864 cases filed against human traffickers, Pakistani government has taken actions against 385 convicted, it noted.

US Foreign Ministry categorised Afghanistan, Brunei, Maldives, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam in first category whereas Bangladesh, China, India, Philippine, Sri Lanka maintained the last year's grades Published by HT Syndication with permission from South Asian Media Network. For more information on news feed please contact Sarabjit Jagirdar at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

138 of 404 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 17, 2010 ThursdayTHAI FOREIGN MINISTRY SPOKESPERSON REBUTS 2010 TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT OF THE U.S. GOVERNMENT*BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 320 wordsDATELINE: BANGKOK

The following information was released by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Kingdom of Thailand:

With reference to the 2010 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report issued annually by the US Department of State, which downgraded Thailand from Tier II to Tier II Watch List on 14 June 2010, Ms. Vimon Kidchob, Director-General of the Department of Information and Foreign Ministry Spokesperson, gave a comment to the media as follows:

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Thailand has conveyed its disappointment to the US Government on the said matter and questioned the accuracy of the 2010 TIP Report since it disregarded and failed to take into account Thailand's strenuous effort to resolve the human trafficking problem, especially prevention and protection of the victims. The combating of human trafficking has always been a matter of high priority of the Royal Thai Government, which has taken actions to tackle it at both national and regional levels. Among others, at the domestic level, efforts have been made through the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Committee, chaired by the Prime Minister, and the Coordinating and Monitoring of Anti-Trafficking in Persons Performance Committee, chaired by the Deputy Prime Minister. At the regional level, Thailand has signed the Memorandum of Understanding on Cooperation for Eliminating Trafficking in Children and Women and Assisting Victims of Trafficking with its neighbouring countries such as Cambodia, Laos, Vietnam and Myanmar. Furthermore, Thailand is also working to enhance cooperation with Japan, Australia and South Africa on the issue of combating human trafficking.

Given the importance the Government and Thai society as a whole have attached to the issue, and the continuous efforts they have made, Thailand wishes to reaffirm its strong determination to press ahead with preventing and combating human trafficking as well as protecting victims of human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 States News Service

139 of 404 DOCUMENTS

US State News

June 17, 2010 Thursday 6:04 PM EST

ANTI-TRAFFICKING SUCCESSES IN AFRICA OFFER HOPE TO CONTINENT

LENGTH: 888 words

LIBREVILLE, Gabon, June 16 -- The U.S. Embassy issued the following press release:

Judged on tier ranking, a look at the map of Africa in the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report reveals that most of the countries there are struggling in the battle to end human trafficking.

But two countries stand out: Nigeria and Mauritius. Both should serve as models for other countries seeking to end modern-day slavery, according to Luis CdeBaca, ambassador-at-large for the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

The State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report tracks to what extent governments worldwide comply with the standards identified in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA), a U.S. law (PDF, 39KB) adopted in 2000 that seeks to prevent human trafficking overseas. Countries are given a tier ranking. At the bottom are Tier 3 countries that have governments that do not comply with the minimum standards of the TVPA and are not making significant efforts to do so. Five countries in Africa have received Tier 3 status in this year's TIP report.

Most of the countries in Africa, however, have received Tier 2 or Tier 2 Watch List rankings. Their governments are attempting to meet TVPA minimum standards but do not yet fully comply (Tier 2). Or, the governments, while attempting to comply with minimum TVPA standards, fall short and suffer from a significant and/or increasing incidence of severe forms of trafficking (Tier 2 Watch List).

Nigeria and Mauritius are in Tier 1, with governments that fully comply with the TVPA minimum standards. The two countries are very different in terms of their size and legal systems, and yet both serve as beacons of hope to other countries grappling with the problem of human trafficking.

Mauritius, a tiny island 800 kilometers (500 miles) east of Madagascar, has a population of just more than 1.2 million people. For years it languished on Tier 2 and suffered as a destination country for victims of human trafficking.

"When you're talking about these small island countries," CdeBaca told America.gov in a recent interview, "you're talking about clusters of victims - dozens rather than hundreds. ... It's very easy, I think, for small island nations to look at the trafficking thing and think that it doesn't apply to them because the numbers are smaller." Nonetheless, every country has a responsibility under international law to address the problem, he said.

Mauritius was able to muster a "combination of political will and then a willingness to go out and find enforcement models that would work there," CdeBaca said. A former French colony with a civil law background, Mauritius should serve as a model for smaller countries, he said.

"Mauritius has actually done a very good job of having those standard operating procedures in place - knowing that they're not going to get hundreds of victims a year, they're going to get less than 20 in a given year," CdeBaca said. "But when they do find them, they know what to do with them, and they know how to treat them right."

Nigeria, a much larger country with a population of some 148 million, suffers from being a source country for victims of human slavery. It, too, spent years on the Tier 2 list in the TIP report.

"Nigeria was well on its way to being on Tier 3 in the report, plagued, as in many countries, by corruption [and] weak rule of law," CdeBaca said. "But they worked with the American Bar Association; they worked with UNODC [United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime]; they worked with us [U.S. Agency for International Development]; they aggressively went out and found best practices."

With the creation of the National Agency for the Prohibition of Trafficking in Persons (NAPTIP), CdeBaca said, all the involved parties were brought together and held accountable. "You've seen success," he said of Nigeria's efforts. "So it is something that I'd like to see replicated and scaled outside of just Nigeria."

Abject poverty and lack of governing structures can be blamed for the prevalence of many social ills, CdeBaca said. "What is interesting is a lot of [social problems] go away as [gross domestic product] rises; a lot of things go away as governments become more set up. And yet, human trafficking is prevalent in all of the countries."

When asked about notions of "hereditary slavery" and "slave castes" in some countries of West Africa, CdeBaca replied: "There's been some progress in West Africa on the issue of hereditary slavery, although it's slow in coming. As was reflected in last year's trafficking report, we've seen some people ordered emancipated from their hereditary slave owners who received some money settlements."

"But at the end of the day, we have to not only change the cultural practice, we also have to call upon the governments to impose the rule of law and to comply with Article 4 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which says no person shall be held as a slave," CdeBaca said. "At some point it stops being culture and it starts being a crime. And with slavery, it's not that hard of a decision to make."

(This is a product of the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State. Web site: <http://www.america.gov>). For more information please contact: Sarabjit Jagirdar, Email:- htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

140 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 16, 2010 Wednesday

Nigeria; Anti-Traffic Agency Retains High Global Rating

BYLINE: Daily Trust (Abuja)

LENGTH: 87 words

The National Agency for the Prohibition of Traffic in Persons and Other Related Matters (NAPTIP) has retained its Tier 1 status in the fight against trafficking, the 2010 annual Global Trafficking in Persons Report has shown.

Executive Secretary of the agency Barrister Simon Chuzi Egede disclosed this yesterday while briefing newsmen in Abuja.

In the annual report, countries are assigned and rated according to Tiers 1-3, depending on the degree of compliance to the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

141 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 16, 2010 Wednesday

Zambia; U.S. Hails Region's Strides in Human Trafficking Fight

BYLINE: The Times of Zambia (Ndola)LENGTH: 224 words

THE United States has said the Zambian Government has made significant efforts in the fight against human trafficking offenders.

US Embassy public affairs officer Pricilla Hernandez said the Zambian Government made great achievements in raising public awareness of trafficking, and that the Government has also addressed the demands for sex and labour trafficking.

She however said that victim's assistance facilities and services for victims in Zambia had remained inadequate despite Government's mandate to construct such facilities.

Ms Hernandez said in a statement released yesterday that according to the 2010 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report, Zambia had been ranked 'Tier 2' for anti-trafficking efforts.

"While the Government does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, it is making significant efforts to do so," she said.

She implored the Zambian Government to continue with programmes such as the training of police, immigration officers, prosecutors and judges on how to effectively investigate and prosecute trafficking crimes.

Ms Hernandez said that this year had marked ten years since the United Nations negotiated the international standards against human trafficking, and she said her government had enacted the Trafficking Victims Protection Act to identify and protect against modern slavery.

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

142 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 16, 2010 Wednesday

Mozambique; Government Criticised on Human Trafficking

BYLINE: Agencia de Informacao de Mocambique (Maputo)

LENGTH: 800 words

The Mozambican government "does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking", although it is making "significant efforts to do so", according to the US State Department's 2010 Annual Report on Human Trafficking, released this week.

During 2009, however, the government "did not show evidence of increased efforts to address human trafficking, particularly efforts to address human trafficking, as it has done in the past, or to investigate continuing reports of government officials' complicity in trafficking crimes".

The US has therefore put Mozambique on its "Tier two watch list". The report divides the nations of the world into three tiers. Tier one covers those countries which, in the eyes of the State Department, acknowledge the existence of human trafficking, take steps against it, and meet minimum standards set by the United States' own Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA).

At the opposite end of the scale is Tier three, which covers those countries that do not comply with the minimum standards and make no efforts to do so (E.g. Saudi Arabia, Eritrea, North Korea, Zimbabwe and Sudan).

Most of the world is in Tier two - these are countries that are making an effort to meet the minimum standards, but have not yet succeeded. Countries are placed on the Tier Two Watch list if the absolute number of victims of trafficking is "very significant or is significantly increasing", or there is no effort of increased efforts (compared with the previous year) to combat trafficking.

The only African countries in Tier one are Nigeria and Mauritius. The great majority of African states are in Tier Two, and Mozambique is joined on the "Watch List" by countries such as Tanzania, Madagascar, Ivory Coast, Senegal and Mali.

The Mozambique section of the report says "there is no evidence of widespread government involvement in or tolerance of trafficking; however, there are known cases of government officials facilitating human trafficking".

It notes that "traffickers commonly bribed law enforcement officials to allow their movement of trafficking victims internally and across national borders into South Africa and Swaziland, sometimes without passports".

Despite this, "no officials have been investigated, detained or prosecuted for complicity in trafficking crimes".

Looking at specific cases, the report mentions one incident in which the police did act promptly. This concerned eight people who were arrested in March for trafficking women to South Africa.

They were detained thanks to investigations by reporters from the Media24 group, which owns the Johannesburg paper "City Press". The journalists infiltrated the crime syndicate by passing themselves off as people interested in buying Mozambican girls who would then be forced to work in the South African sex industry.

Media24 alerted the Mozambican police, and the first arrests occurred on 17 March, in the Milano restaurant in central Maputo. Three members of the gang had just handed over a young Mozambican woman to two supposed buyers, still unaware that in reality that they were journalists, when the police swooped and detained them three. Other arrests followed three days later.

The report remarks that "within weeks, all of the suspects were released on bail". The report is wrong: they were released, not within weeks, but within days, much to the annoyance of the police who believed they had a solid case against the traffickers.

A judge in the Maputo city court released them without explanation. Although the Public Prosecutor's Office can still press charges, there must be a serious risk that all the traffickers will flee the country.

The State Department report also criticized the government for showing "little progress in its efforts to protect victims, as it continued to suffer from limited resources and a lack of political commitment". The government "continued to lack formalized procedures for identifying potential victims of trafficking and referring them to organisations providing protective services".

Nonetheless, the report notes that, with UNCEF assistance, the police have set up services especially designed to assist women and children, including the victims of trafficking.

The report is marred by some odd mistakes - notably the belief that the recruitment of migrant labour for the South African gold mines is a form of trafficking. It claims that "young Mozambican men and boys are subjected to conditions of forced labour in South African farms and mines".

Mozambicans certainly face appalling conditions on South African farms - but all the tens of thousands of Mozambican on the mines went there voluntarily, under a mine labour recruitment scheme which is many decades old, and earn much higher wages than they could expect in rural Mozambique.

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

143 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 16, 2010 Wednesday

Africa; Anti-Trafficking Successes in Africa Offer Hope to Continent

BYLINE: America.gov (Washington, DC)

LENGTH: 837 words

Judged on tier ranking, a look at the map of Africa in the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report reveals that most of the countries there are struggling in the battle to end human trafficking.

But two countries stand out: Nigeria and Mauritius. Both should serve as models for other countries seeking to end modern-day slavery, according to Luis CdeBaca, ambassador-at-large for the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

The State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report tracks to what extent governments worldwide comply with the standards identified in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA), a U.S. law (PDF, 39KB) adopted in 2000 that seeks to prevent human trafficking overseas. Countries are given a tier ranking. At the bottom are Tier 3 countries that have governments that do not comply with the minimum standards of the TVPA and are not making significant efforts to do so. Five countries in Africa have received Tier 3 status in this year's TIP report.

Most of the countries in Africa, however, have received Tier 2 or Tier 2 Watch List rankings. Their governments are attempting to meet TVPA minimum standards but do not yet fully comply (Tier 2). Or, the governments, while attempting to comply with minimum TVPA standards, fall short and suffer from a significant and/or increasing incidence of severe forms of trafficking (Tier 2 Watch List).

Nigeria and Mauritius are in Tier 1, with governments that fully comply with the TVPA minimum standards. The two countries are very different in terms of their size and legal systems, and yet both serve as beacons of hope to other countries grappling with the problem of human trafficking.

Mauritius, a tiny island 800 kilometers (500 miles) east of Madagascar, has a population of just more than 1.2 million people. For years it languished on Tier 2 and suffered as a destination country for victims of human trafficking.

"When you're talking about these small island countries," CdeBaca told America.gov in a recent interview, "you're talking about clusters of victims -- dozens rather than hundreds. ... It's very easy, I think, for small island nations to look at the trafficking thing and think that it doesn't apply to them because the numbers are smaller." Nonetheless, every country has a responsibility under international law to address the problem, he said.

Mauritius was able to muster a "combination of political will and then a willingness to go out and find enforcement models that would work there," CdeBaca said. A former French colony with a civil law background, Mauritius should serve as a model for smaller countries, he said.

"Mauritius has actually done a very good job of having those standard operating procedures in place -- knowing that they're not going to get hundreds of victims a year, they're going to get less than 20 in a given year," CdeBaca said. "But when they do find them, they know what to do with them, and they know how to treat them right."

Nigeria, a much larger country with a population of some 148 million, suffers from being a source country for victims of human slavery. It, too, spent years on the Tier 2 list in the TIP report.

"Nigeria was well on its way to being on Tier 3 in the report, plagued, as in many countries, by corruption [and] weak rule of law," CdeBaca said. "But they worked with the American Bar Association; they worked with UNODC [United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime]; they worked with us [U.S. Agency for International Development]; they aggressively went out and found best practices."

With the creation of the National Agency for the Prohibition of Trafficking in Persons (NAPTIP), CdeBaca said, all the involved parties were brought together and held accountable. "You've seen success," he said of Nigeria's efforts. "So it is something that I'd like to see replicated and scaled outside of just Nigeria."

Abject poverty and lack of governing structures can be blamed for the prevalence of many social ills, CdeBaca said. "What is interesting is a lot of [social problems] go away as [gross domestic product] rises; a lot of things go away as governments become more set up. And yet, human trafficking is prevalent in all of the countries."

When asked about notions of "hereditary slavery" and "slave castes" in some countries of West Africa, CdeBaca replied: "There's been some progress in West Africa on the issue of hereditary slavery, although it's slow in coming. As was reflected in last year's trafficking report, we've seen some people ordered emancipated from their hereditary slave owners who received some money settlements."

"But at the end of the day, we have to not only change the cultural practice, we also have to call upon the governments to impose the rule of law and to comply with Article 4 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which says no person shall be held as a slave," CdeBaca said. "At some point it stops being culture and it starts being a crime. And with slavery, it's not that hard of a decision to make."

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

144 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 16, 2010 Wednesday

Nigeria; We'll Make Our Villages Free of Traffickers, Says Agency

BYLINE: Leadership (Abuja)

LENGTH: 330 words

The Executive Secretary of National Agency for the Prohibition of Trafficking in Persons and other Related Matters (NAPTIP), Mr. Simon Chuzi Egede, has asked the agency and partners not to bask on the cozy warmth of the elevation of Nigeria to tier one on human trafficking until all villages are clean and free of traffickers.

He added that every state should adopt the child rights acts law and pursur its realisation doggedly without any resistant in their domain.

He stressed that, the elevation of Nigeria to tier one in the recently released annual global report on trafficking in persons 2010, does not mean the battle against human trafficking have been won.

Speaking yesterday to members of the press on the release of the annual global report on trafficking in persons by the united secretary of states, Mrs. Hillary Clinton, Egede said, the elevation of Nigeria to tier one has not freed the country from stranglehold of criminal syndicates who would want to continue with their crime, therefore, Nigerians should still be mindful of the fact that the battle is far from being won.

"The enemies of Nigerian children are ever ready to deploy their arsenals of assault through any loophole either real or imagined. We are renewing our call for government, stakeholders, international organization and destination countries to gird their loins for greater battle. "

We must inject more strength, determination and commitment to pursue and achieve the elimination of those factors that predispose and enhance trafficking of Nigerians out of the shores of the country while we internally promote a protective environment."

He added that, NAPTIP will not take the credit alone for the elevation but also acknowledges the support of Honorable Attorney General and Minister of Justice, Mr. Mohamed Bello Adoke (SAN), partners, other organisations and the courage of destination countries like Netherlands, Sweden and Iceland who have criminalised the purchase of sex in their domain.

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

145 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 16, 2010 Wednesday 1:24 PM GMT

Vietnam defends effort against human trafficking

LENGTH: 228 wordsDATELINE: HANOI, June 16 2010

Vietnam on Wednesday defended its efforts against human trafficking, after the United States placed it on a watch list.

The State Department report "has political characteristics with unobjective comments that do not correctly reflect the real situation in Vietnam," foreign ministry spokeswoman Nguyen Phuong Nga said in a statement.

Vietnam joined fellow Southeast Asian nations Singapore and Thailand on the watch list in the State Department's annual report, which accused them of failing to prevent women from being forced into prostitution.

Nga responded that Vietnam considered the trafficking of women and children, in particular, to be a dangerous crime that violated human rights and was severely punished.

She said that since 2004 the government had implemented a plan to reduce the problem.

"So far, efforts by Vietnam in the fight against human trafficking have positively impacted the whole society and have been noticed by the international community," the spokeswoman said.

The state Vietnam News this month cited a government report which said human trafficking was rising in Vietnam, with organised gangs using more sophisticated techniques to evade authorities.

From 2005 until this year, 3,190 women and children returned to Vietnam after being trafficked, the report said, citing the social affairs ministry. Most were rescued or escaped, it said.

tmh-it/mtp

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

146 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Agencia de Informacao de Mocambique (English)

June 16, 2010 Wednesday

Government Criticised on Human Trafficking

LENGTH: 800 words

DATELINE: Maputo

The Mozambican government "does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking", although it is making "significant efforts to do so", according to the US State Department's 2010 Annual Report on Human Trafficking, released this week.

During 2009, however, the government "did not show evidence of increased efforts to address human trafficking, particularly efforts to address human trafficking, as it has done in the past, or to investigate continuing reports of government officials' complicity in trafficking crimes".

The US has therefore put Mozambique on its "Tier two watch list". The report divides the nations of the world into three tiers. Tier one covers those countries which, in the eyes of the State Department, acknowledge the existence of human trafficking, take steps against it, and meet minimum standards set by the United States' own Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA).

At the opposite end of the scale is Tier three, which covers those countries that do not comply with the minimum standards and make no efforts to do so (E.g. Saudi Arabia, Eritrea, North Korea, Zimbabwe and Sudan).

Most of the world is in Tier two - these are countries that are making an effort to meet the minimum standards, but have not yet succeeded. Countries are placed on the Tier Two Watch list if the absolute number of victims of trafficking is "very significant or is significantly increasing", or there is no effort of increased efforts (compared with the previous year) to combat trafficking.

The only African countries in Tier one are Nigeria and Mauritius. The great majority of African states are in Tier Two, and Mozambique is joined on the "Watch List" by countries such as Tanzania, Madagascar, Ivory Coast, Senegal and Mali.

The Mozambique section of the report says "there is no evidence of widespread government involvement in or tolerance of trafficking; however, there are known cases of government officials facilitating human trafficking".

It notes that "traffickers commonly bribed law enforcement officials to allow their movement of trafficking victims internally and across national borders into South Africa and Swaziland, sometimes without passports".

Despite this, "no officials have been investigated, detained or prosecuted for complicity in trafficking crimes".

Looking at specific cases, the report mentions one incident in which the police did act promptly. This concerned eight people who were arrested in March for trafficking women to South Africa.

They were detained thanks to investigations by reporters from the Media24 group, which owns the Johannesburg paper "City Press". The journalists infiltrated the crime syndicate by passing themselves off as people interested in buying Mozambican girls who would then be forced to work in the South African sex industry.

Media24 alerted the Mozambican police, and the first arrests occurred on 17 March, in the Milano restaurant in central Maputo. Three members of the gang had just handed over a young Mozambican woman to two supposed buyers, still unaware that in reality that they were journalists, when the police swooped and detained them three. Other arrests followed three days later.

The report remarks that "within weeks, all of the suspects were released on bail". The report is wrong: they were released, not within weeks, but within days, much to the annoyance of the police who believed they had a solid case against the traffickers.

A judge in the Maputo city court released them without explanation. Although the Public Prosecutor's Office can still press charges, there must be a serious risk that all the traffickers will flee the country.

The State Department report also criticized the government for showing "little progress in its efforts to protect victims, as it continued to suffer from limited resources and a lack of political commitment". The government "continued to lack formalized procedures for identifying potential victims of trafficking and referring them to organisations providing protective services".

Nonetheless, the report notes that, with UNCEF assistance, the police have set up services especially designed to assist women and children, including the victims of trafficking.

The report is marred by some odd mistakes - notably the belief that the recruitment of migrant labour for the South African gold mines is a form of trafficking. It claims that "young Mozambican men and boys are subjected to conditions of forced labour in South African farms and mines".

Mozambicans certainly face appalling conditions on South African farms - but all the tens of thousands of Mozambican on the mines went there voluntarily, under a mine labour recruitment scheme which is many decades old, and earn much higher wages than they could expect in rural Mozambique.

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

ArabianBusiness.com

ArabianBusiness.com

June 16, 2010 Wednesday

UAE says committed to human trafficking fight

BYLINE: Andy SambidgeLENGTH: 470 words

The UAE said on Wednesday that it was committed to stamping out human trafficking as it opened two more shelters for victims in Sharjah and Ras Al Khaimah.

UAE officials said combating human trafficking and protecting victims remained a "top priority on its national agenda".

Dr Anwar Gargash, Minister of State for Foreign Affairs and chair of the National Committee to Combat Human Trafficking, said "several challenges" remained, adding it would continue to work with international partners to fight the crime.

At least 43 cases of human trafficking were registered in the UAE during 2009, compared to 20 cases in 2008, a statistic he said that reflected the country's progress since federal laws were introduced in late 2006 on the issue, news agency WAM reported on Wednesday.

His comments came two days after the US State Department's 2010 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report noted the UAE's progress in addressing the problem of human trafficking.

In a 373-page report, the department said that employers in the Gulf states exploit the widely used 'kafala' system to abuse workers and named Saudi Arabia and Kuwait as the region's worst offenders.

It added that the UAE, Oman, Bahrain and Egypt were each assigned a Tier 2 rating, indicating they have made significant efforts to tackle human trafficking.

Gargash added: "The UAE welcomes recognition of the country's anti-trafficking efforts, constructive criticism, as well as collaborative efforts.

"This year's TIP Report takes into account the measurable progress on the ground in the UAE's concerted fight against this crime, however the UAE is aware that several challenges still lie ahead and we are committed to continuing our efforts alongside our international partners."

According to the UAE's annual trafficking report released in May, the measures undertaken in 2010 as part of the comprehensive four-pillar strategy include expanding the size and scope of the anti-trafficking committee; establishing a human rights department at the Ministry of Interior and starting a new facility at Dubai Police to monitor and control human trafficking.

The government is set to launch its first public awareness campaign at airports and UAE embassies abroad towards the end of 2010 with the clear message that the UAE maintains a zero tolerance approach to the crime of human trafficking.

Millions of migrants, primarily from Asia and Africa, have short-term employment contracts for blue-collar jobs in the construction, domestic work, and service industries across the Middle East.

Under the 'kafala' system, nationals and companies can hire migrant workers who are dependent on their employers for food and shelter.

Many workers complain that agencies or employers confiscate their passports, do not pay them regularly or deduct housing or health costs from their pay.

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

JOURNAL-CODE: 167

Copyright 2010 ArabianBusiness.com - ITP Digital Ltd.
All Rights Reserved
Syndigate.info, Al Bawaba.com

148 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Bahrain News Agency

June 16, 2010 Wednesday 8:45 AM EST

More Operations To Rescue Human Trafficking Victims in Malaysia

LENGTH: 105 words

Kuala Lumpur, June 16 (BNA) In continuous efforts to rescue victims and rout human trafficking syndicates, the police would conduct more operations, Criminal Investigation Department director Mohd Bakri Zinin said Tuesday.

He said policemen would be assigned to 'hot spots' such as the Melaka Straits and South China Sea as they were identified as main entry points for syndicates to traffick victims abroad. He was commenting on a report yesterday, which quoted Home Minister Hishammuddin Tun Hussein as saying that Malaysia had risen to Tier 2 of Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP) 2010 released by the US Department of State EM.

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: NewswireJOURNAL-CODE: BNA

Copyright 2010 U.P.I.

All Rights Reserved

ARABIA 2000

Copyright 2010 by Bahrain News Agency Distributed by UPI

149 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Bahrain News Agency (BNA)

June 16, 2010 Wednesday

More Operations To Rescue Human Trafficking Victims in Malaysia

LENGTH: 118 words

Kuala Lumpur, June 16 (BNA) In continuous efforts to rescue victims and rout human trafficking syndicates, the police would conduct more operations, Criminal Investigation Department director Mohd Bakri Zinin said Tuesday. He said policemen would be assigned to 'hot spots' such as the Melaka Straits and South China Sea as they were identified as main entry points for syndicates to traffick victims abroad. He was commenting on a report yesterday, which quoted Home Minister Hishammuddin Tun Hussein as saying that Malaysia had risen to Tier 2 of Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP) 2010 released by the US Department of State EM Publishing Rights Reserved to Bahrain News Agency © 2003 - 2009

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: NewspaperJOURNAL-CODE: 387

Copyright 2003 - 2010 Publishing Rights Reserved to Bahrain News Agency
Syndigate.info, Al Bawaba.com

150 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring South Asia - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 16, 2010 Wednesday

US praises Pakistan's efforts in curbing human trafficking

LENGTH: 165 words

Text of report headlined "US excludes Pakistan from watch list" published by Pakistani newspaper Pakistan Observer website on 16 June

Islamabad--America praised the Pakistan's efforts in curbing human trafficking and exited its name out of watch list.

Pakistan has been added in the list of nations of 2nd grade in accord of its efforts in curbing human smuggling, mentioned in report issued by American Foreign Ministry, a private news channel reported. American assistance in efforts of Pakistan to counter human smuggling was also mentioned in the report.

According to the report up till now 385 convicts have been sentenced in accordance with Pakistan's anti human trafficking law whereas 2,864 cases were made. US Foreign Ministry categorized Afghanistan, Brunei, Maldives, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam in first category whereas Bangladesh, China, India, Philippine, Sri Lanka are in the list too likewise that of last year.

Source: The Pakistan Observer, Islamabad, in English 16 Jun 10

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2010 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

151 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 16, 2010 Wednesday

Singapore slams US trafficking report

LENGTH: 836 words

Text of report by Singapore newspaper The Straits Times website on 16 June

[Report by Mavis Toh: "Human trafficking: S'pore tells US to put own house in order"]

An American report accusing Singapore of not doing enough to curb sex and labour trafficking has been lambasted by the Singapore Government.

The United States State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons (Tip) report said Singapore's performance in dealing with 'modern slavery' had worsened over the last year.

This resulted in the Republic being placed on a human trafficking watch list for the first time, alongside countries such as Bangladesh, China and India.

However, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MFA) called the report more of a 'political ritual than an objective study'.

In a blunt rebuttal, a ministry spokesman said: 'How, for example, can the US rank itself in Tier 1 when it is well known that it has been unable to stem a flood of illegal workers, many of whom are trafficked by organized criminal gangs?'

The 10th annual report for the first time included a ranking of the US, which it said was 'based on the same standards to which we hold other countries'.

But the ministry spokesman pointed out that the US 'has not been able to cope adequately with the problem, and that is among the reasons why immigration is such a hot political issue in the US'.

He added: 'The US should perhaps examine its own record more carefully before presuming to pronounce on other countries. Then its reports may be more credible.'

This is Singapore's worst showing since the report was first released in 2001. It had previously been in 'Tier 2', except in 2003, when it was excluded, and in 2006, when it made it to 'Tier 1'.

The country's current status is listed as 'Tier 2 Watch List', down from Tier 2.

Countries on the watch list do not fully comply with minimum international standards for protecting migrant workers from forced labour or other forms of trafficking.

They are also deemed to have a significant number of victims and have failed to show increasing efforts to combat the situation.

Other countries downgraded along with Singapore are Thailand, Vietnam, Laos, Brunei, Afghanistan and the Maldives.

This year's report estimated that 12.3 million adults and children worldwide are victims of trafficking.

It said Singapore is a destination for forced prostitution and added that women from Thailand, the Philippines and China have been tricked into coming here for legitimate employment, only to be forced into the sex trade upon arrival.

The report also said that while the Government has taken 'some significant new steps' against trafficking, it has not shown increased efforts in prosecuting more culprits or identifying more victims.

It added that of the 32 sex trafficking reports investigated by the state during the year, only two were confirmed to be trafficking cases and prosecuted. Of the 89 children arrested for prostitution offences last year, according to the report, the police investigated only four cases as potential sex trafficking cases.

MFA called the report 'puzzling' because the US had not satisfactorily explained how it had arrived at its conclusions.

Its spokesman said: 'The Singapore Government is committed to tackling the Tip issue, and our efforts in dealing with this issue have certainly not weakened since last year.'

This is not the first time Singapore has spoken up against the US State Department's report.

In 2008, Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for Home Affairs Wong Kan Seng said its findings were a 'gross distortion of reality' and that investigations here showed there were 'very few' cases of forced servitude. He added that many sex workers are not forced but come to Singapore for economic reasons.

The US report stated that it uses 'information from US embassies, government officials, NGOs and international organizations, published reports, research trips to every region, and information submitted to tipreport@state.gov[1]'.

Ms Bridget Tan, president of the Humanitarian Organization for Migration Economics (Home) here, said that each year, about 10 women claiming they were tricked into prostitution come to her centre for help.

Though unable to tell whether their claims are true, Ms Tan said that these women should be given the benefit of the doubt and seen as 'innocent till proven guilty'.

'To show traffickers and the world that we are serious in fighting human trafficking, we should put in place an anti-human trafficking law,' she said.

Government Parliamentary Committee chairman for Home Affairs and Law, Mr Alvin Yeo, expressed surprise and disappointment at the downgrade, and said he would be interested in seeing what statistics the report is based on.

He added: 'Singapore must remain vigilant to the threat of organized crime, as criminal syndicates are typically involved in the trafficking of women for the 'sex trade'. The fact that their influence level has not been high is no reason to let our guard down now.'

Source: The Straits Times website, Singapore, in English 16 Jun 10

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

152 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 16, 2010 Wednesday

Malaysian police to conduct more anti-human trafficking operations

LENGTH: 247 words

Text of report in English by Malaysian official news agency Bernama website

[Bernama report from the "General" page: "More Operations To Rescue Human Trafficking Victims"]

Kuala Lumpur, June 15 (Bernama) - In continuous efforts to rescue victims and rout human trafficking syndicates, the police would conduct more operations, Criminal Investigation Department director Datuk Seri Mohd Bakri Zinin said Tuesday.

He said policemen would be assigned to 'hot spots' such as the Melaka Straits and South China Sea as they were identified as main entry points for syndicates to traffic victims abroad.

He was commenting on a report yesterday, which quoted Home Minister Datuk Seri Hishammuddin Tun Hussein as saying that Malaysia had risen to Tier 2 of Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP) 2010 released by the US Department of State.

Mohd Bakri said the force would strengthen and expand its Anti-Human Trafficking Unit by cooperating with other countries, such as Australia, Canada and the US.

In addition, he said, policemen would undergo courses related to anti-human trafficking to enable them to be more equipped when carrying out investigations into the syndicates.

"We will also tighten existing laws affecting human trafficking, which involves enforcement agencies, such as the immigration, customs and the like," he said.

According to the TIP 2009 published on June 16, last year, Malaysia had fallen from Tier 2 to Tier 3.

Source: Bernama website, Kuala Lumpur, in English 0129 gmt 15 Jun 10

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

153 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Latin America - Political
 Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 16, 2010 Wednesday

Guyanese officials call US report on people trafficking "crap", "sinister"

LENGTH: 1480 words

Text of report by Guyanese newspaper Stabroek News website on 15 June

[Stabroek News headline: "Outraged government protests US human trafficking ranking -calls on US to back-up findings"]

The government yesterday denounced the 2010 US State Department Report on Trafficking in Persons (TIP), rejecting the findings of a "significant" number of cases here and Guyana's placement on the Tier 2 Watch List for the fourth consecutive year.

At a news conference shortly after the release of the report, Human Services Minister Priya Manickchand said angrily that it was "based on sheer ignorance and eye pass" and labelled it "crap," while Cabinet Secretary Dr Roger Luncheon suggested that there was something "sinister" in the findings. Manickchand warned that while the two countries have enjoyed very good relations over the years, "this inaccurate report hurts this friendship".

Of major contention for the government is a statement in the report that indicates that some 984 children were removed from exploitive child labour from 2005 to 2009. Foreign Affairs Minister Carolyn Rodrigues-Birkett has been mandated to make contact with her counterparts in the US to ascertain from where the children were removed and under which project.

According to the report, "during the reporting period the US Department of Labour reported results of a project that withdrew 984 children from exploitive child labour in logging and saw-milling, fishing, hazardous farming, factory work, mining, and freight handling from 2005 to 2009."

Just hours after the report was released, Luncheon arranged a press conference at the Office of the President, where he along with Manickchand, Minister of Education Shaik Baksh and Minister of Home Affairs Clement Rohee condemned the report. They referred to Guyana's own recent TIP report which concluded that there is no evidence of large-scale trafficking in persons and registered "outrage" on behalf of their cabinet colleagues over the US report.

Luncheon said the fact that the government called a press briefing within hours of the US "un-embargoing" the report was a signal that the country has serious concerns. "They have been unable to sustain the kind of diatribe that they run against Guyana transparently with numbers," he said, adding, "we don't doubt that trafficking exists. Whether it does to justify putting Guyana on Tier 2 and to offend this government and this nation with this tripe that is produced annually by the State Department by the most opaque of units... we have to repudiate it, we got to go public and we are going to be aggressive about this position."

He added, "there is something sinister as far as we are concerned in manufacturing TIP and manufacturing TIP to the extent to be saying that Guyana you are going to be Tier 3 in 2011...." According to him, what Guyana has been saying and doing is consistent with its reality and has a lot to do with how the enormity of trafficking is judged. He said all in Guyana should have a keen interest in the way the country and government "is being held up and put to shame by the US government... for the most nebulous, unproven of grounds."

He said the government is calling upon the TIP unit of the State Department to provide the information that will put to rest its reservations, especially when the threats of sanctions are being held out to enforce decisions that are made "on the most superficial, unproven, the dirtiest kind of information collection and analysis that goes on...."

Source country

According to the report, Guyana is a source country for men, women and children subjected to trafficking in persons, and specifically conditions of forced prostitution and forced labour. "Guyanese trafficking victim cases have been identified in the country, as well as in other countries in the region," the report said. It also said that identified foreign victims have come from Venezuela and Brazil while forced prostitution occurs in brothels on the coast and around mining camps as well as in rum shops and Chinese restaurants. "The common Guyanese practice of poor, rural families sending children to live with higher income family members or acquaintances in more populated areas has the potential to evolve into forced domestic servitude," the report said. It added that trafficking victims may not self-identify to authorities due to fear of retribution, fear of resettlement to abusive home situations, and lack of awareness that human trafficking is a crime. Those most vulnerable to trafficking, the report said, include Amerindian females, foreign women (such as Brazilians) in prostitution, and children.

"The Government of Guyana does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. Despite these efforts, the government did not initiate any new prosecutions of trafficking offences during the reporting period and has yet to convict to punish any trafficking offenders under its five-year-old anti-human trafficking law," it added. (Guyana recorded its first conviction on April 29, this year when Wesley Benn was sentenced to three years in prison after he was found guilty of trafficking two girls at One Mile Potaro Road, Bartica.)

The report said during the reporting period, the government and NGOs identified four victims of trafficking, "two of whom prison officials proactively identified". It said the government provided some resources towards victim protection and local anti-trafficking groups but no suspected traffickers were charged, limiting the level of safety and protection provided to victims. "While the government took some tangible steps to raise awareness of human trafficking, including the establishment of focal point groups and an anti-trafficking task force, some local observers felt that the government discouraged discussions on developing effective strategies for combating this phenomenon of modern-day slavery," it further stated.

In the area of prosecution, it stated that progress is perpetually delayed by judicial backlogs, incorrectly-filed paperwork or the failure of key parties to appear at hearings. "NGOs and one government official expressed concern that trafficking-related official complicity was a problem. It is reportedly common for defendants to bribe court officials for favourable rulings," the report said.

Wrong

Addressing the report yesterday, Manickchand said that the US has again gotten its facts in Guyana wrong, noting that from the beginning the country has objected to its ranking. The government, she said, has always asserted that Guyana did not have significant numbers of trafficking victims. "We have said that we do not have significant numbers of victims. Moreover, no evidence of said significant numbers had been presented by any interested party, including the government of the United States of America," she said.

Manickchand pointed out that there has never been a claim by the US that the government or its officials are complicit in trafficking and in fact they have made positive assertions to the contrary. "...[T]he resources that are being expended on the issue of combating trafficking in Guyana could arguably be called excessive for our country when one considers the scale of the problem in comparison to the other numerous social ills that we have to fight," she added.

She said Guyana has not prosecuted and/or convicted any large numbers of persons for trafficking but argued that no apology should be made for this fact. "Every citizen is guaranteed the right to be presumed innocent until found guilty by a court of competent jurisdiction. We hold this presumption and its constitutional guarantee very dear to us. It must be protected at all times."

According to Manickchand, the sloth of the justice system is being addressed through a massive investment programme - the Justice Sector Reform Strategy - whose conclusion and implementation should see all matters, including trafficking cases, being dealt with expeditiously. Further, she said the government has a duty to nurture confidence in the justice system and to assist victims throughout the process so that they may make informed choices.

She also noted that the US has explained that for countries to be placed on the Tier 2 list, they would have had to fail to increase efforts to combat human trafficking over the past year, fail to make significant efforts based on commitments of anti-trafficking reforms, and to see very significant victims or a significantly increasing victim population. "Taking cognisance of the definition of countries which should be on the Tier 2 watch list as well as the US report on Guyana, one cannot help but question whether the report about us and our subsequent placement on the tier ranking are not contradictory," she declared.

Source: Stabroek News website, Georgetown, in English 15 Jun 10

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2010 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

154 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Daily Trust (Abuja)

June 16, 2010 Wednesday

Anti-Traffic Agency Retains High Global Rating

BYLINE: Akor Ojoma

LENGTH: 87 words

The National Agency for the Prohibition of Traffic in Persons and Other Related Matters (NAPTIP) has retained its Tier 1 status in the fight against trafficking, the 2010 annual Global Trafficking in Persons Report has shown.

Executive Secretary of the agency Barrister Simon Chuzi Egede disclosed this yesterday while briefing newsmen in Abuja.

In the annual report, countries are assigned and rated according to Tiers 1-3, depending on the degree of compliance to the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 AllAfrica Global Media.
All Rights Reserved

155 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Daily Star (Lebanon)

June 16, 2010 Wednesday

Lebanon still lax on human trafficking - US report

BYLINE: Michael Legrand

LENGTH: 774 words

BEIRUT: The Lebanese government does not comply with the minimum standards for prohibition of human trafficking, according to an annual report US Secretary of State Department Hillary Clinton presented on Monday. Lebanon is in the "Tier 2" Watch List category of US State Department's 2010 Trafficking in Persons report, where it rates 130 out of 170 states

BEIRUT: The Lebanese government does not comply with the minimum standards for prohibition of human trafficking, according to an annual report US Secretary of State Department Hillary Clinton presented on Monday.

Lebanon is in the "Tier 2" Watch List category of US State Department's 2010 Trafficking in Persons report, where it rates 130 out of 170 states listed by the report.

The US State Department considers Lebanon a transit point for women and children from Eastern Europe and Maghreb destined for forced prostitution. The traffic chain includes other neighboring countries in the Middle East.

The report also targets forced labor involving Asian and African women who are recruited as domestic workers by Lebanese agencies and later exploited by their employers. It denounces such practices as withholding of passports, non-payment of wages, restrictions on movement, verbal abuse, and physical assault. "In some cases," it says, "employers have kept foreign domestic workers confined in houses for years."

The report further states that "the Lebanese government's 'Artiste' visa program, which facilitated the entry of 4,518 women from Eastern Europe, Morocco, and Tunisia in 2009 to work in the adult entertainment industry, serves to sustain a significant sex trade and facilitates sex trafficking."

Although it seemingly acknowledges some anecdotal progresses, the report is harsh on Lebanese authorities regarding foreign immigrants' treatment and protection.

The legal framework exists, it says, but lacks sufficient law enforcement, as it is "hampered by bureaucratic indifference and inefficiency, difficulty proving cases of abuse, victims' lack of their own rights, court backlogs and cultural prejudices against foreign domestic workers."

It mentions several 2009 cases that exemplified the inefficiency of public authorities in its struggle with local forms of human trafficking.

The report recommends that the government criminalize all forms of human trafficking. It should in particular extend Labor Law protections to foreign workers, a measure NGOs in Lebanon have long campaigned for despite the reluctance of state authorities to enact it.

It also recommends instituting procedures to identify victims of trafficking among vulnerable populations, such as women holding "Artiste" visas and domestic workers who have escaped abusive employers.

The report also insists that authorities refer trafficking victims to protection services instead of detaining or deporting them for unlawful acts committed as a direct result of the traffic, mentioning as a counterexample the case of trafficking victims deported in 2009 with their wages unpaid and legal complaint unresolved.

Taking the 2009 bilateral agreement with Ethiopia as an example, it supports enhancing relations with the countries of origin of immigrant populations. It also points out to the common practice of having domestic workers contract in Arabic, "a language most cannot read" and promotes the translation of work documents.

The report concludes by observing that "the government did not take any steps to reduce the demand for forced labor or commercial sex acts during the year" and that "the Ministry of Labor provided no statistics documenting the work of its 130 inspectors charged with investigating situations of forced adult or child labor."

The report also downgrades traditional allies Singapore and Thailand into the "Tier 2 Watch List" category along with Vietnam, on the ground of "failing to prevent women from being forced into prostitution," a charge US State Department applies as well to Lebanon. Downgrading a country in the human trafficking watch list opens the way for the US to cut off some civilian assistance.

The State Department ranked 13 nations that it considers do not meet minimum standards on fighting trafficking in a lowest "Tier 3" category. The latter includes some of US long-time foes, like Myanmar, Cuba, Iran, North Korea and Sudan, along with others countries: Congo, the Dominican Republic, Eritrea, Kuwait, Mauritania, Papua New Guinea, Saudi Arabia and Zimbabwe.

Although it does mention trafficking problems in the US, the report places it in the top "Tier 1" category for compliance with minimum standards, along with 27 other mainly European countries.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: 23

Copyright 2010 The Daily Star - The Daily Star FZ LLC.
All Rights Reserved
Syndigate.info, Al Bawaba.com

156 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Daily Star (Lebanon)

June 16, 2010 Wednesday

Stop the slavery in Lebanon

BYLINE: Daily Star Staff

LENGTH: 545 words

The US State Department issued on Monday its annual Trafficking in Persons report, and the horrifying litany of abuses catalogued from Lebanon and throughout this region should be more than enough to push our legislators to finally enact a law against trafficking. Yes, that's right - Lebanon does not even have on the books the most basic legislation against trade in human beings

Editorial

The US State Department issued on Monday its annual Trafficking in Persons report, and the horrifying litany of abuses catalogued from Lebanon and throughout this region should be more than enough to push our legislators to finally enact a law against trafficking.

Yes, that's right - Lebanon does not even have on the books the most basic legislation against trade in human beings. A draft amendment to the labor laws is waiting and waiting in Parliament, and we call without reservation on lawmakers to pass this bill as soon as possible.

That glaring absence of rudimentary legislation served as one of the failures that dumped Lebanon into second-tier status in the trafficking report, and Qatar also finished in that ignominious category, as far as other Arab states are concerned. Should the circumstances here further worsen, we could yet find ourselves in the third and lowest tier of countries - nations which are not even making significant efforts to combat human trafficking. Unfortunately, we would find there a number of our regional brethren: Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Sudan and Iran all lack laws against trafficking and any marked moves to address the problem.

In Lebanon, the violations of human rights through trafficking take a variety of forms. For instance, more than 4,500 visas were granted last year alone to allow the entry into Lebanon of "artistes" from Eastern Europe, Morocco and Tunisia. We never knew there was so much art in this country. But this is not a humorous matter - in Lebanon we have a visa category which exists only to let trade flourish in trafficked sex workers. The government must abolish this disgrace immediately.

In addition, we call on parliamentary deputies to grant legal protections to all foreign workers here and to reform the visa system, which essentially gives employment sponsors the status of slave masters. This sponsorship system creates the ideal conditions to foster trafficking and forced labor. Foreign workers - whether female domestic workers or male construction laborers - cannot change jobs or leave the country without the consent of their sponsors.

Over the years, we have recorded in these pages the nearly unavoidable consequences of such a system: Lebanese employers confiscate the passports of their foreign wards and subject them to the spectrum of abuse, from beatings and sexual harassment to the withholding of wages and confinement. A number of nongovernmental organizations have released countless reports - entirely verified and credible reports, we should add - of foreign workers driven to attack their employers, to flee unbearable conditions and even to commit suicide. We wholeheartedly condemn the abuse of our fellow humans through trafficking, and we demand that our legislature without delay approve the basic elements of international law in order to defend those who cannot defend themselves.

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: 23

Copyright 2010 The Daily Star - The Daily Star FZ LLC.
All Rights Reserved
Syndigate.info, Al Bawaba.com

157 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Daily Regional Times

June 16, 2010 Wednesday

Positive changes

SECTION: EDITORIAL Vol. III No. 1560

LENGTH: 454 words

A recently published report on human trafficking has ranked Pakistan as a "Tier 2" country, citing improvements from the previous year due to efforts to prosecute human traffickers, and prevent and combat bonded labour.

Announcing the release of the 2010 US Trafficking in Persons Report, US Secretary of State Hilary Clinton said Washington was committed to supporting Pakistan in its efforts to combat human trafficking.

Highlighting Pakistan's action against human trafficking, the report said the conviction of 385 criminals in 2009 under the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance, and 2,894 prosecutions and 166 convictions under various other penal code sections used to prosecute trafficking offences had led to significant improvements.

The report stated that the Sindh police's successful efforts to free over 2,000 bonded labourers from feudal landlords, and their work with non-governmental organizations (NGOs) to raise awareness and develop better protection services for labourers and their families had also improved the situation.

It also lauded the Sindh government's Landless Haris Programme, which offered the landless-poor in rural Sindh an alternative to tenant farming including land, seed and fertilizer distribution, agricultural development assistance, cash grants, and micro health insurance.

The report stated the Punjab government's Elimination of Bonded Labour in Brick Kilns project - launched with assistance from the International Labour Organization and Pakistani NGOs - helped nearly 6,000 bonded labourers obtain Computerized National Identification Cards, provided $140,000 in interest-free loans to labourers and established 60 schools for the workers' children.

The report highlighted that Islamabad had also completed a four-year project to repatriate and rehabilitate over 1,000 children who had been trafficked to the United Arab Emirates.

The report provides a positive picture into how changes are taking place in Pakistan. The days of vaderas and jagirdars making life miserable for the poor and treating them like slaves are gradually coming to end.

However, this process is considerably slow and many in the rural areas of the country are still suffering the tyranny of feudal landlords. Time and again reports come to fore about people being chained and forced to work by the influential vaderas and jagirdars, who not only boast their power due to their financial background but enjoy political support in many cases as well.

People from the deprived class are also smuggled to other countries to serve as slaves or their kidneys are sold.

Efforts need to be made to bring an end to their cruel practices and bring relief to the poor in the rural areas of the country.

LOAD-DATE: September 19, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 The Regional Times
All Rights Reserved

158 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Daily Regional Times

June 16, 2010 Wednesday

US excludes Pakistan's name out of watch list

SECTION: Vol. III No. 1560

LENGTH: 132 words

United States praised the Pakistan's efforts in curbing human trafficking and exited its name out of watch list. Pakistan has been added in the list of nations of 2nd grade in accord of its efforts in curbing human smuggling, mentioned in report issued by the US Foreign Ministry, a private news channel reported. The US assistance in efforts of Pakistan to counter human smuggling was also mentioned in the report.

According to the report up till now 385 convicts have been sentenced in accordance with Pakistan's anti human trafficking law whereas 2,864 cases were made. The US Foreign Ministry categorized Afghanistan, Brunei, Maldives, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam in first category whereas Bangladesh, China, India, Philippine, Sri Lanka are in the list too likewise that of last year.

LOAD-DATE: September 19, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 The Regional Times
All Rights Reserved

159 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Financial Daily

June 16, 2010 Wednesday

Pakistan out of human smuggling watch list

BYLINE: Monitoring Desk

SECTION: Vol. 3 No. 312

LENGTH: 143 words

United States of America has deleted the name of Pakistan from the watch list of countries infamous for human trafficking.

From now on Pakistan has been added in the list of nations of 2nd grade in accordance with its efforts in curbing human smuggling, mentioned in the report issued by US Foreign Ministry, a private news channel reported.

The report also lauded the efforts of Pakistan in curbing human smuggling from the country.

American assistance in efforts of Pakistan to counter human smuggling was also mentioned in the report.

Out of 2,864 cases filed against human traffickers, Pakistani government has taken actions against 385 convicted, it noted.

US Foreign Ministry categorised Afghanistan, Brunei, Maldives, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam in first category whereas Bangladesh, China, India, Philippine, Sri Lanka maintained the last year's grades.

LOAD-DATE: September 19, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

160 of 404 DOCUMENTS

THE JORDAN TIMES

The Jordan Times

June 16, 2010 Wednesday

Jordan maintains Tier 2 ranking in Trafficking in Persons Report

LENGTH: 1034 words

By Hani Hazaimeh

AMMAN - Jordan is a "destination for women and men subjected to trafficking in persons" although instances of forced labour reportedly continued to decline due to enhanced labour inspections and other recent measures undertaken by the government", a US State Department report said this week.

Issued annually, this year's Trafficking in Persons Report, which covers last year, ranked Jordan in Tier 2, the same classification as in the previous report, indicating that the Kingdom is "possibly a source and transit country for women and men subjected to conditions of forced labour and forced commercial sexual exploitation".

Labour Minister Ibrahim Omoush described the report as positive as it maintains Jordan's position in Tier 2.

In a statement sent to The Jordan Times from Geneva, where he is attending the International Labour Conference, he added that this indicates that the government has taken action.

The minister attributed this to the government's keenness to address the issue by endorsing a law to prevent human trafficking as well as strengthening inspection programmes and amending relevant laws.

"Jordan will continue to work to modernise relevant legislation and improve the capabilities of the ministry's inspectors in order to be able to reach a better ranking," the minister said in the statement.

Meanwhile, the US State Department report also referred to "reports of Jordanian child labourers experiencing conditions of forced labour. Migrant workers may be rendered vulnerable to forced labour in Jordan due to indebtedness to recruiters; legal requirements mandating foreign workers relying on employers to renew work and residency permits, and negative societal attitudes toward foreign workers".

The report added that some of the Sri Lankan, Indonesian and Filipina women who come to Jordan to work as domestic helpers are subjected to conditions of forced labour after arrival, such as "unlawful withholding of passports, restrictions on movement, non-payment of wages, threats of imprisonment, and physical or sexual abuse".

The report cited 400 Filipina, Indonesian and Sri Lankan domestic workers, who had fled some form of forced labour and were sheltered at their respective embassies in Amman.

With regards to working children, the report said some Jordanian children employed within the country as street vendors, carpenters, painters, mechanics, domestics, restaurant staff, or agricultural labourers may be exploited in situations of forced labour.

"The government of Jordan does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so," the report said, adding that over the past year, the government continued to demonstrate a strong commitment to combat human trafficking via implementation of the 2008 Anti-Trafficking Law by increasing investigations into suspected cases, resulting in several prosecutions.

The report also highlighted that the government has finalised a national anti-trafficking action plan; instituted bylaws providing standards for employing domestic workers and operating recruitment agencies; drafted a plan and guidelines for opening a long-term shelter, and designed a public awareness strategy.

However, the report recommended several measures that the government should take in order to address any violations to workers' rights.

These include using the anti-trafficking statute to "increase efforts to investigate, prosecute and sentence trafficking offences, especially those involving the forced labour of domestic workers; increase penalties for forced labour offences and jointly train labour inspectors, police, border officials, judges and prosecutors to enhance anti-trafficking law enforcement cooperation".

The report also suggested the implementation of a comprehensive awareness campaign to educate the general public, as well as foreign migrant workers in all sectors, on the nature of human trafficking, particularly forced labour and the proper treatment of domestic workers under Jordanian law; strengthening efforts to proactively identify victims of forced labour and forced prostitution and ensure identified victims are not punished for unlawful acts committed as a direct result of being trafficked.

Omoush noted that the government will take the report and its recommendations into account and study the suggestions contained therein.

With regards to prosecution, the report said the government "made improved efforts to criminally punish trafficking offenders during the reporting period, citing the 2008 Anti-Human Trafficking Law, which became effective in March 2009 and prohibits all forms of trafficking and prescribes penalties of up to 10 years imprisonment for forced prostitution and trafficking involving aggravating circumstances, such as trafficking of a child".

"These penalties are sufficiently stringent, but not commensurate with those for other serious crimes, such as rape," the report noted.

The report commended the National Committee for the Prevention of Human Trafficking for launching its National Strategy and Action Plan to Combat Human Trafficking (2010-2012).

"This plan includes provisions for a specific visa for human trafficking victims to allow victims to receive residency and work permits while they pursue a legal case. In August 2009, the Cabinet endorsed and made effective two new sets of bylaws to the Labour Law[#x629] these bylaws, however, require the worker to obtain the employer's permission to leave the house," the report said.

Meanwhile, the US-based Human Rights Watch (HRW) criticised Arab countries for not securing protection for domestic helpers in a statement issued earlier this month. The watchdog, however, underlined that in 2008 Jordan became the first Arab country to extend protections in its Labour Law to domestic workers.

"Regulations specifying those protections issued in October 2009 prohibit an employer from taking a domestic worker abroad without her consent and without informing the worker's embassy. This prohibition, if enforced, can help safeguard against trafficking of domestic workers," the HRW statement added.

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Magazine

JOURNAL-CODE: 62

161 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Jordan Times (Amman)

Distributed by McClatchy-Tribune Business News

June 16, 2010 Wednesday

Jordan maintains Tier 2 ranking in Trafficking in Persons Report

BYLINE: Hani Hazaimah, Jordan Times, Amman

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 1092 words

Jun. 16--AMMAN -- Jordan is a "destination for women and men subjected to trafficking in persons" although instances of forced labour reportedly continued to decline due to enhanced labour inspections and other recent measures undertaken by the government", a US State Department report said this week.

Issued annually, this year's Trafficking in Persons Report, which covers last year, ranked Jordan in Tier 2, the same classification as in the previous report, indicating that the Kingdom is "possibly a source and transit country for women and men subjected to conditions of forced labour and forced commercial sexual exploitation".

Labour Minister Ibrahim Omoush described the report as positive as it maintains Jordan's position in Tier 2.

In a statement sent to The Jordan Times from Geneva, where he is attending the International Labour Conference, he added that this indicates that the government has taken action.

The minister attributed this to the government's keenness to address the issue by endorsing a law to prevent human trafficking as well as strengthening inspection programmes and amending relevant laws.

"Jordan will continue to work to modernise relevant legislation and improve the capabilities of the ministry's inspectors in order to be able to reach a better ranking," the minister said in the statement.

Meanwhile, the US State Department report also referred to "reports of Jordanian child labourers experiencing conditions of forced labour. Migrant workers may be rendered vulnerable to forced labour in Jordan due to indebtedness to recruiters; legal requirements mandating foreign workers relying on employers to renew work and residency permits, and negative societal attitudes toward foreign workers".

The report added that some of the Sri Lankan, Indonesian and Filipina women who come to Jordan to work as domestic helpers are subjected to conditions of forced labour after arrival, such as "unlawful withholding of passports, restrictions on movement, non-payment of wages, threats of imprisonment, and physical or sexual abuse".

The report cited 400 Filipina, Indonesian and Sri Lankan domestic workers, who had fled some form of forced labour and were sheltered at their respective embassies in Amman.

With regards to working children, the report said some Jordanian children employed within the country as street vendors, carpenters, painters, mechanics, domestics, restaurant staff, or agricultural labourers may be exploited in situations of forced labour.

"The government of Jordan does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so," the report said, adding that over the past year, the government continued to demonstrate a strong commitment to combat human trafficking via implementation of the 2008 Anti-Trafficking Law by increasing investigations into suspected cases, resulting in several prosecutions.

The report also highlighted that the government has finalised a national anti-trafficking action plan; instituted bylaws providing standards for employing domestic workers and operating recruitment agencies; drafted a plan and guidelines for opening a long-term shelter, and designed a public awareness strategy.

However, the report recommended several measures that the government should take in order to address any violations to workers' rights.

These include using the anti-trafficking statute to "increase efforts to investigate, prosecute and sentence trafficking offences, especially those involving the forced labour of domestic workers; increase penalties for forced labour offences and jointly train labour inspectors, police, border officials, judges and prosecutors to enhance anti-trafficking law enforcement cooperation".

The report also suggested the implementation of a comprehensive awareness campaign to educate the general public, as well as foreign migrant workers in all sectors, on the nature of human trafficking, particularly forced labour and the proper treatment of domestic workers under Jordanian law; strengthening efforts to proactively identify victims of forced labour and forced prostitution and ensure identified victims are not punished for unlawful acts committed as a direct result of being trafficked.

Omoush noted that the government will take the report and its recommendations into account and study the suggestions contained therein.

With regards to prosecution, the report said the government "made improved efforts to criminally punish trafficking offenders during the reporting period, citing the 2008 Anti-Human Trafficking Law, which became effective in March 2009 and prohibits all forms of trafficking and prescribes penalties of up to 10 years imprisonment for forced prostitution and trafficking involving aggravating circumstances, such as trafficking of a child".

"These penalties are sufficiently stringent, but not commensurate with those for other serious crimes, such as rape," the report noted.

The report commended the National Committee for the Prevention of Human Trafficking for launching its National Strategy and Action Plan to Combat Human Trafficking (2010-2012).

"This plan includes provisions for a specific visa for human trafficking victims to allow victims to receive residency and work permits while they pursue a legal case. In August 2009, the Cabinet endorsed and made effective two new sets of bylaws to the Labour Law; these bylaws, however, require the worker to obtain the employer's permission to leave the house," the report said.

Meanwhile, the US-based Human Rights Watch (HRW) criticised Arab countries for not securing protection for domestic helpers in a statement issued earlier this month. The watchdog, however, underlined that in 2008 Jordan became the first Arab country to extend protections in its Labour Law to domestic workers.

"Regulations specifying those protections issued in October 2009 prohibit an employer from taking a domestic worker abroad without her consent and without informing the worker's embassy. This prohibition, if enforced, can help safeguard against trafficking of domestic workers," the HRW statement added.

To see more of the Jordan Times or to subscribe to the newspaper, go to <http://www.jordantimes.com>. Copyright (c) 2010, Jordan Times, Amman Distributed by McClatchy-Tribune Information Services. For reprints, email tmsreprints@permissionsgroup.com, call 800-374-7985 or 847-635-6550, send a fax to 847-635-6968, or write to The Permissions Group Inc., 1247 Milwaukee Ave., Suite 303, Glenview, IL 60025, USA.

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

ACC-NO: 20100616-JT-Jordan-maintains-Tier-2-ranking-in-Trafficking-in-Persons-Report-0616

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: JT

Copyright 2010 Jordan Times (Amman)

162 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Leadership (Abuja)

June 16, 2010 Wednesday

We'll Make Our Villages Free of Traffickers, Says Agency

BYLINE: Christiana Esebonu

LENGTH: 330 words

DATELINE: Abuja

The Executive Secretary of National Agency for the Prohibition of Trafficking in Persons and other Related Matters (NAPTIP), Mr. Simon Chuzi Egede, has asked the agency and partners not to bask on the cozy warmth of the elevation of Nigeria to tier one on human trafficking until all villages are clean and free of traffickers.

He added that every state should adopt the child rights acts law and pursur its realisation doggedly without any resistant in their domain.

He stressed that, the elevation of Nigeria to tier one in the recently released annual global report on trafficking in persons 2010, does not mean the battle against human trafficking have been won.

Speaking yesterday to members of the press on the release of the annual global report on trafficking in persons by the united secretary of states, Mrs. Hillary Clinton, Egede said, the elevation of Nigeria to tier one has not freed the country from stranglehold of criminal syndicates who would want to continue with their crime, therefore, Nigerians should still be mindful of the fact that the battle is far from being won.

"The enemies of Nigerian children are ever ready to deploy their arsenals of assault through any loophole either real or imagined. We are renewing our call for government, stakeholders, international organization and destination countries to gird their loins for greater battle. "

We must inject more strength, determination and commitment to pursue and achieve the elimination of those factors that predispose and enhance trafficking of Nigerians out of the shores of the country while we internally promote a protective environment."

He added that, NAPTIP will not take the credit alone for the elevation but also acknowledges the support of Honorable Attorney General and Minister of Justice, Mr. Mohamed Bello Adoke (SAN), partners, other organisations and the courage of destination countries like Netherlands, Sweden and Iceland who have criminalised the purchase of sex in their domain.

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

163 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Mozambique News Agency (English)

June 16, 2010 Wednesday

GOVERNMENT CRITICISED ON HUMAN TRAFFICKING

LENGTH: 804 words

Maputo, 16 Jun (AIM) - The Mozambican government "does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking", although it is making "significant efforts to do so", according to the US State Department's 2010 Annual Report on Human Trafficking, released this week.

During 2009, however, the government "did not show evidence of increased efforts to address human trafficking, particularly efforts to address human trafficking, as it has done in the past, or to investigate continuing reports of government officials' complicity in trafficking crimes".

The US has therefore put Mozambique on its "Tier two watch list". The report divides the nations of the world into three tiers. Tier one covers those countries which, in the eyes of the State Department, acknowledge the existence of human trafficking, take steps against it, and meet minimum standards set by the United States' own Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA).

At the opposite end of the scale is Tier three, which covers those countries that do not comply with the minimum standards and make no efforts to do so (E.g. Saudi Arabia, Eritrea, North Korea, Zimbabwe and Sudan).

Most of the world is in Tier two - these are countries that are making an effort to meet the minimum standards, but have not yet succeeded. Countries are placed on the Tier Two Watch list if the absolute number of victims of trafficking is "very significant or is significantly increasing", or there is no effort of increased efforts (compared with the previous year) to combat trafficking.

The only African countries in Tier one are Nigeria and Mauritius. The great majority of African states are in Tier Two, and Mozambique is joined on the "Watch List" by countries such as Tanzania, Madagascar, Ivory Coast, Senegal and Mali.

The Mozambique section of the report says "there is no evidence of widespread government involvement in or tolerance of trafficking; however, there are known cases of government officials facilitating human trafficking".

It notes that "traffickers commonly bribed law enforcement officials to allow their movement of trafficking victims internally and across national borders into South Africa and Swaziland, sometimes without passports".

Despite this, "no officials have been investigated, detained or prosecuted for complicity in trafficking crimes".

Looking at specific cases, the report mentions one incident in which the police did act promptly. This concerned eight people who were arrested in March for trafficking women to South Africa.

They were detained thanks to investigations by reporters from the Media24 group, which owns the Johannesburg paper "City Press". The journalists infiltrated the crime syndicate by passing themselves off as people interested in buying Mozambican girls who would then be forced to work in the South African sex industry.

Media24 alerted the Mozambican police, and the first arrests occurred on 17 March, in the Milano restaurant in central Maputo. Three members of the gang had just handed over a young Mozambican woman to two supposed buyers, still unaware that in reality that they were journalists, when the police swooped and detained them three. Other arrests followed three days later.

The report remarks that "within weeks, all of the suspects were released on bail". The report is wrong: they were released, not within weeks, but within days, much to the annoyance of the police who believed they had a solid case against the traffickers.

A judge in the Maputo city court released them without explanation. Although the Public Prosecutor's Office can still press charges, there must be a serious risk that all the traffickers will flee the country.

The State Department report also criticized the government for showing "little progress in its efforts to protect victims, as it continued to suffer from limited resources and a lack of political commitment". The government "continued to lack formalized procedures for identifying potential victims of trafficking and referring them to organisations providing protective services".

Nonetheless, the report notes that, with UNCEF assistance, the police have set up services especially designed to assist women and children, including the victims of trafficking.

The report is marred by some odd mistakes - notably the belief that the recruitment of migrant labour for the South African gold mines is a form of trafficking. It claims that "young Mozambican men and boys are subjected to conditions of forced labour in South African farms and mines".

Mozambicans certainly face appalling conditions on South African farms - but all the tens of thousands of Mozambican on the mines went there voluntarily, under a mine labour recruitment scheme which is many decades old, and earn much higher wages than they could expect in rural Mozambique.

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

164 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Nation (Thailand)

June 16, 2010 Wednesday

US State Department puts Thailand, Singapore on its human-trafficking watch list

BYLINE: The Nation

LENGTH: 475 words

The United States has put allies Singapore and Thailand as well as Vietnam on a human-trafficking watch list, accusing them of failing to prevent women from being forced into prostitution.

The move opens the way for the United States to cut off some civilian assistance, although it usually functions as a way to pressure countries to take action.

Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, who has made women's and children's rights a signature issue, called human trafficking a "terrible crime" as she presented the State Department's annual report.

"All of us have a responsibility to bring this practice to an end," she said.

The report estimated that 12.3 million people were the victims of trafficking in 2009-2010, although it said there has been progress over the past decade.

The State Department added a number of Asian nations to its watch list - Afghanistan, Brunei, Laos, Maldives, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam.

Bangladesh, China, India, Micronesia, the Philippines and Sri Lanka stayed on the list, unchanged from a year earlier.

North Korea, Burma and Papua New Guinea remained at the bottom level of countries that do not even meet the minimum standards on human trafficking.

The State Department said that Thailand was a source, destination and transit point for trafficking, with ethnic minorities and citizens of neighbouring countries at particular risk of sexual abuse or forced labour.

Senator Jim Webb, who heads the Foreign Relations subcommittee on East Asia, had made an unusually open appeal not to place Thailand on the watch list.

Webb visited Bangkok this month and said US embassy staff disagreed with the intended downgrade as it could curb assistance for democracy and human rights programmes in the wake of the kingdom's political violence.

Explaining the downgrade for Singapore, the report said that some women from China, the Philippines and Thailand are tricked into coming to the city-state with promises of legitimate employment and coerced into the sex trade.

The report said that while Singapore launched "some significant new steps" against trafficking, there were no "quantifiable indicators" that the government was identifying more victims or prosecuting more culprits.

The State Department recognised improvements in Pakistan, which was taken off the watch list, and Malaysia, which was on the watch list but lifted from the lowest category.

From other regions, Cuba, Iran and Saudi Arabia remained in the rock-bottom category and the Dominican Republic was newly added.

Representative Christopher Smith, a Republican who authored the law that requires the human trafficking report, said that more countries should have been assigned the lowest rank.

"If we are willing to hold the Dominican Republic to account, as we should, it's outrageous that China, Vietnam and India get a free pass," Smith said.

Agence France-Presse

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 Nation Multimedia Group
All Rights Reserved

165 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Right Vision News

June 16, 2010 Wednesday

Pakistan: US excludes Pakistan's name out of watch listLENGTH: 157 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

WASHINGTON, June 16 -- America praises the Pakistan's efforts in curbing human trafficking and exits its name out of watch list.

Pakistan has been added in the list of nations of 2nd grade in accord of its efforts in curbing human smuggling, mentioned in report issued by American Foreign Ministry. American assistance in efforts of Pakistan to counter human smuggling was also mentioned in the report.

According to the report up till now 385 convicts have been sentenced in accordance with Pakistan's anti human trafficking law whereas 2,864 cases were made.

US Foreign Ministry categorized Afghanistan, Brunei, Maldives, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam in first category whereas Bangladesh, China, India, Philippine, Sri Lanka are in the list too likewise that of last year Published by HT Syndication with permission from Right Vision News. For more information on news feed please contact Sarabjit Jagirdar at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 Right Vision News
All Rights Reserved

166 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Right Vision News

June 16, 2010 Wednesday

Pakistan: US excluded Pakistan's name out of watch list

LENGTH: 161 words

DATELINE: ISLAMABAD

ISLAMABAD, June 16 -- America praised the Pakistan's efforts in curbing human trafficking and exited its name out of watch list.

Pakistan has been added in the list of nations of 2nd grade in accord of its efforts in curbing human smuggling, mentioned in report issued by American Foreign Ministry, a private news channel reported.

American assistance in efforts of Pakistan to counter human smuggling was also mentioned in the report.

According to the report up till now 385 convicts have been sentenced in accordance with Pakistan's anti human trafficking law whereas 2,864 cases were made.

US Foreign Ministry categorized Afghanistan, Brunei, Maldives, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam in first category whereas Bangladesh, China, India, Phillipine, Sri Lanka are in the list too likewise that of last year Published by HT Syndication with permission from Right Vision News. For more information on news feed please contact Sarabjit Jagirdar at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

167 of 404 DOCUMENTS

State Department Documents and Publications

June 16, 2010

Anti-Trafficking Successes in Africa Offer Hope to Continent; Nigeria, Mauritius rank in top tier in 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report

BYLINE: Jane Morse, Staff Writer, ,

SECTION: NEWS FROM AMERICA.COM AND THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 861 words

Washington -- Judged on tier ranking, a look at the map of Africa in the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report reveals that most of the countries there are struggling in the battle to end human trafficking.

But two countries stand out: Nigeria and Mauritius. Both should serve as models for other countries seeking to end modern-day slavery, according to Luis CdeBaca, ambassador-at-large for the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

The State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report tracks to what extent governments worldwide comply with the standards identified in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA), a U.S. law (PDF, 39KB) adopted in 2000 that seeks to prevent human trafficking overseas. Countries are given a tier ranking. At the bottom are Tier 3 countries that have governments that do not comply with the minimum standards of the TVPA and are not making significant efforts to do so. Five countries in Africa have received Tier 3 status in this year's TIP report.

Most of the countries in Africa, however, have received Tier 2 or Tier 2 Watch List rankings. Their governments are attempting to meet TVPA minimum standards but do not yet fully comply (Tier 2). Or, the governments, while attempting to comply with minimum TVPA standards, fall short and suffer from a significant and/or increasing incidence of severe forms of trafficking (Tier 2 Watch List).

Nigeria and Mauritius are in Tier 1, with governments that fully comply with the TVPA minimum standards. The two countries are very different in terms of their size and legal systems, and yet both serve as beacons of hope to other countries grappling with the problem of human trafficking.

Mauritius, a tiny island 800 kilometers (500 miles) east of Madagascar, has a population of just more than 1.2 million people. For years it languished on Tier 2 and suffered as a destination country for victims of human trafficking.

"When you're talking about these small island countries," CdeBaca told America.gov in a recent interview, "you're talking about clusters of victims -- dozens rather than hundreds. ... It's very easy, I think, for small island nations to look at the trafficking thing and think that it doesn't apply to them because the numbers are smaller." Nonetheless, every country has a responsibility under international law to address the problem, he said.

Mauritius was able to muster a "combination of political will and then a willingness to go out and find enforcement models that would work there," CdeBaca said. A former French colony with a civil law background, Mauritius should serve as a model for smaller countries, he said.

"Mauritius has actually done a very good job of having those standard operating procedures in place -- knowing that they're not going to get hundreds of victims a year, they're going to get less than 20 in a given year," CdeBaca said. "But when they do find them, they know what to do with them, and they know how to treat them right."

Nigeria, a much larger country with a population of some 148 million, suffers from being a source country for victims of human slavery. It, too, spent years on the Tier 2 list in the TIP report.

"Nigeria was well on its way to being on Tier 3 in the report, plagued, as in many countries, by corruption [and] weak rule of law," CdeBaca said. "But they worked with the American Bar Association; they worked with UNODC [United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime]; they worked with us [U.S. Agency for International Development]; they aggressively went out and found best practices."

With the creation of the National Agency for the Prohibition of Trafficking in Persons (NAPTIP), CdeBaca said, all the involved parties were brought together and held accountable. "You've seen success," he said of Nigeria's efforts. "So it is something that I'd like to see replicated and scaled outside of just Nigeria."

Abject poverty and lack of governing structures can be blamed for the prevalence of many social ills, CdeBaca said. "What is interesting is a lot of [social problems] go away as [gross domestic product] rises; a lot of things go away as governments become more set up. And yet, human trafficking is prevalent in all of the countries."

When asked about notions of "hereditary slavery" and "slave castes" in some countries of West Africa, CdeBaca replied: "There's been some progress in West Africa on the issue of hereditary slavery, although it's slow in coming. As was reflected in last year's trafficking report, we've seen some people ordered emancipated from their hereditary slave owners who received some money settlements."

"But at the end of the day, we have to not only change the cultural practice, we also have to call upon the governments to impose the rule of law and to comply with Article 4 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which says no person shall be held as a slave," CdeBaca said. "At some point it stops being culture and it starts being a crime. And with slavery, it's not that hard of a decision to make."

(This is a product of the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State. Web site: <http://www.america.gov>)

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: SDWF

168 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Straits Times (Singapore)

June 16, 2010 Wednesday

Human trafficking: S'pore tells US to put own house in order; Foreign Affairs Ministry points to problem of illegal workers in US

BYLINE: Mavis Toh

LENGTH: 844 words

AN AMERICAN report accusing Singapore of not doing enough to curb sex and labour trafficking has been lambasted by the Singapore Government.

The United States State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons (Tip) report said Singapore's performance in dealing with 'modern slavery' had worsened over the last year.

This resulted in the Republic being placed on a human trafficking watch list for the first time, alongside countries such as Bangladesh, China and India.

However, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MFA) called the report more of a 'political ritual than an objective study'.

In a blunt rebuttal, a ministry spokesman said: 'How, for example, can the US rank itself in Tier 1 when it is well known that it has been unable to stem a flood of illegal workers, many of whom are trafficked by organised criminal gangs?'

The 10th annual report for the first time included a ranking of the US, which it said was 'based on the same standards to which we hold other countries'.

But the ministry spokesman pointed out that the US 'has not been able to cope adequately with the problem, and that is among the reasons why immigration is such a hot political issue in the US'.

He added: 'The US should perhaps examine its own record more carefully before presuming to pronounce on other countries. Then its reports may be more credible.'

This is Singapore's worst showing since the report was first released in 2001. It had previously been in 'Tier 2', except in 2003, when it was excluded, and in 2006, when it made it to 'Tier 1'.

The country's current status is listed as 'Tier 2 Watch List', down from Tier 2.

Countries on the watch list do not fully comply with minimum international standards for protecting migrant workers from forced labour or other forms of trafficking.

They are also deemed to have a significant number of victims and have failed to show increasing efforts to combat the situation.

Other countries downgraded along with Singapore are Thailand, Vietnam, Laos, Brunei, Afghanistan and the Maldives.

This year's report estimated that 12.3 million adults and children worldwide are victims of trafficking.

It said Singapore is a destination for forced prostitution and added that women from Thailand, the Philippines and China have been tricked into coming here for legitimate employment, only to be forced into the sex trade upon arrival.

The report also said that while the Government has taken 'some significant new steps' against trafficking, it has not shown increased efforts in prosecuting more culprits or identifying more victims.

It added that of the 32 sex trafficking reports investigated by the state during the year, only two were confirmed to be trafficking cases and prosecuted. Of the 89 children arrested for prostitution offences last year, according to the report, the police investigated only four cases as potential sex trafficking cases.

MFA called the report 'puzzling' because the US had not satisfactorily explained how it had arrived at its conclusions. Its spokesman said: 'The Singapore Government is committed to tackling the Tip issue, and our efforts in dealing with this issue have certainly not weakened since last year.'

This is not the first time Singapore has spoken up against the US State Department's report.

In 2008, Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for Home Affairs Wong Kan Seng said its findings were a 'gross distortion of reality' and that investigations here showed there were 'very few' cases of forced servitude. He added that many sex workers are not forced but come to Singapore for economic reasons.

The US report stated that it uses 'information from US embassies, government officials, NGOs and international organisations, published reports, research trips to every region, and information submitted to tipreport@state.gov'.

Ms Bridget Tan, president of the Humanitarian Organisation for Migration Economics (Home) here, said that each year, about 10 women claiming they were tricked into prostitution come to her centre for help.

Though unable to tell whether their claims are true, Ms Tan said that these women should be given the benefit of the doubt and seen as 'innocent till proven guilty'.

'To show traffickers and the world that we are serious in fighting human trafficking, we should put in place an anti-human trafficking law,' she said.

Government Parliamentary Committee chairman for Home Affairs and Law, Mr Alvin Yeo, expressed surprise and disappointment at the downgrade, and said he would be interested in seeing what statistics the report is based on.

He added: 'Singapore must remain vigilant to the threat of organised crime, as criminal syndicates are typically involved in the trafficking of women for the 'sex trade'. The fact that their influence level has not been high is no reason to let our guard down now.'

mavistoh@sph.com.sg

QUESTIONABLE AUTHORITY

'The US should perhaps examine its own record more carefully before presuming to pronounce on other countries. Then its reports may be more credible.'

A spokesman for the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, on the Trafficking in Persons report

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

169 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Times of Zambia (Ndola)

June 16, 2010 Wednesday

U.S. Hails Region's Strides in Human Trafficking Fight

LENGTH: 224 words

THE United States has said the Zambian Government has made significant efforts in the fight against human trafficking offenders.

US Embassy public affairs officer Pricilla Hernandez said the Zambian Government made great achievements in raising public awareness of trafficking, and that the Government has also addressed the demands for sex and labour trafficking.

She however said that victim's assistance facilities and services for victims in Zambia had remained inadequate despite Government's mandate to construct such facilities.

Ms Hernandez said in a statement released yesterday that according to the 2010 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report, Zambia had been ranked 'Tier 2' for anti-trafficking efforts.

"While the Government does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, it is making significant efforts to do so," she said.

She implored the Zambian Government to continue with programmes such as the training of police, immigration officers, prosecutors and judges on how to effectively investigate and prosecute trafficking crimes.

Ms Hernandez said that this year had marked ten years since the United Nations negotiated the international standards against human trafficking, and she said her government had enacted the Trafficking Victims Protection Act to identify and protect against modern slavery.

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

170 of 404 DOCUMENTS

AAP Newsfeed

June 15, 2010 Tuesday 9:00 AM AEST

Highlights of the AAP world wire at 08:00 June 15SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 685 wordsDATELINE: JAKARTA June 14

An Australian woman accused of conspiring to assassinate East Timor's top two political leaders has had her acquittal upheld by an appeals court. (TIMOR PIRES Wrap sent at 22:26, 271 words.)

NY temple-plot trial delayed

WHITE PLAINS, New York, June 14, AP - The federal trial of four men accused of plotting to blow up New York synagogues and shoot a missile at military planes was delayed on Monday - probably for months - at the request of prosecutors after they were dealt a setback on evidence. (US TEMPLE sent at 08:33, 535 words.)

South, North Korea brief UN on sinking

UNITED NATIONS, June 14 AFP - The UN Security Council heard separate closed-door briefings on Monday by rivals South Korea and North Korea on the sinking of a South Korean warship which Seoul blames on its Stalinist neighbour. (KOREA SHIP UN sent at 07:50, 332 words.)

Whaling Commission chairman sick

AMSTERDAM, June 14 AP - The International Whaling Commission says its chairman is ill and will not attend its annual meeting due to discuss his proposal to control the annual whale hunt. (WHALING CHAIRMAN sent at 21:49, 124 words.)

US teacher gets life murdering girl, 8

STOCKTON, California, June 14 AP - A Sunday school teacher who pleaded guilty to kidnapping and murdering a girl in Northern California made a tearful apology to the victim's family on Monday as she was sentenced to prison for the rest of her life. (US GIRL Update sent at 05:08, 362 words.)

Iraq parly opens three months after vote

BAGHDAD, June 14 AFP - Iraq moved to bolster its shaky democracy on Monday with the opening of its second parliament since the US-led ouster of Saddam Hussein in 2003, more than three months after an election stalemate. (IRAQ PARLIAMENT sent at 04:15, 462 words.)

Kyrgyz refugees find borders shut

OSH, Kyrgyzstan, June 14 AFP - Uzbekistan has ordered its frontier closed to an exodus of refugees fleeing deadly violence in Kyrgyzstan where government forces are accused of helping gangs slaughter ethnic Uzbeks. (KYRGYZSTAN Update sent at 03:41, 727 words.)

Death toll hits 124 in Kyrgyzstan ethnic

BISHKEK, June 14 AFP - At least 124 people have been killed and more than 1,685 wounded in spiralling ethnic violence in the south of the ex-Soviet state of Kyrgyzstan, the health ministry said on Monday. (KYRGYZSTAN TOLL sent at 22:58, 171 words.)

US issues human trafficking watch list

WASHINGTON, June 14 AFP - The United States has put allies Singapore and Thailand as well as Vietnam on a human trafficking watch list, accusing them of failing to prevent women from being forced into prostitution. (US TRAFFICKING Update sent at 02:20, 362 words.)

BP presents oil containment plan

WASHINGTON, June 14 AFP - Energy giant BP has presented a new plan to contain more than 50,000 barrels a day of oil gushing from a ruptured Gulf of Mexico well by the end of June, an administration official said on Monday. (US RIG PLAN Update sent at 23:20, 410 words.)

40 feared dead as boat capsizes in India

LUCKNOW, India, June 14 AFP - At least 25 people drowned and 17 others were missing after their boat capsized on Monday during a prayer ceremony on the river Ganges in northern India, officials said. (INDIA BOAT Update sent at 23:12, 204 words.)

Israel ready to ease Gaza blockade: Blair

LUXEMBOURG, June 14 AFP - Israel has agreed in principle to greatly ease its blockade of the Gaza Strip, allowing in everyday goods while ensuring arms and military material stay out, Middle East envoy Tony Blair said on Monday. (MID-EAST SHIPS GAZA sent at 22:44, 607 words.)

Iran's Revolutionary Guard dismisses UN

TEHRAN, Iran June 14 AP - Iran's powerful Revolutionary Guard says it's "not worried" by the latest wave of UN sanctions imposed over Tehran's controversial nuclear program. (NUCLEAR IRAN sent at 21:58, 127 words.)

Hamas says Israel 'fleeing' pressure

GAZA CITY, Palestinian Territories, June 14 AFP - Hamas has dismissed reports that Israel planned to ease its Gaza blockade, accusing it of "fleeing" international pressure after a botched raid on an aid flotilla. (MIDEAST SHIPS HAMAS sent at 21:54, 303 words.)

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

171 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 15, 2010 Tuesday

Nigeria; Strong Political Will Fuels Country's Fight Against Trafficking

BYLINE: America.gov (Washington, DC)

LENGTH: 1146 words

Nigeria, like many countries in Africa, must cope with issues such as corruption, mismanagement and poverty. Nonetheless, the country has become a success to be emulated with its drive to end human trafficking, according to Reed Slack, who spent three years helping Nigeria implement programs to combat modern-day slavery.

"There was tremendous political will from the highest levels of government to tackle the issue of trafficking," Slack told America.gov in a recent interview. The effort of the Nigerian government, he said, "is most commendable and is -- and ought to be -- a model for other countries, not only in Africa but in Europe and in North and South America and Asia."

Slack is now the executive director of the Utah Health and Human Rights Project, but from 2006 to 2009 he served as chief of party in Nigeria for the American Bar Association Rule of Law Initiative (ABA-ROLI). In that capacity, he worked to help implement a program underwritten by the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID) to fight human trafficking by building capacity in Nigeria's law enforcement agencies and the judiciary and to provide support for victim rehabilitation services. The ABA-USAID program provided training for hundreds of Nigerian prosecutors, police, immigration enforcement officers and government officials in various agencies.

According to Slack, public awareness of the problem of human trafficking in Nigeria began to increase in the mid- to late 1990s, with a series of widely publicized stories about the repatriation of a number of Nigerian women who had been trafficked to Italy for prostitution. Photos showing the women being dropped off on the tarmac at the Lagos airport and abandoned to make their own way engendered a feeling of public insult in Nigeria's citizens, he said.

Amina Titi Atiku Abubakar, the wife of the vice president under the former Obasanjo administration, became alarmed about the issue of trafficking and saw it as "a national affront to the dignity of all Nigeria," Slack said. She established the Women Trafficking & Child Labour Eradication Foundation (WOTCLEF), which was able to further raise public awareness and lobby for the passage of an anti-trafficking statute. The statute was adopted in late 2003 with the strong support of then-President Olusegun Obasanjo, Slack said.

The National Agency for the Prohibition of Trafficking in Persons (NAPTIP) was established as a stand-alone agency within the executive branch. Responsible for preventing trafficking, protecting victims and prosecuting traffickers, NAPTIP engaged all of the law enforcement agencies -- local police as well as immigration officers -- in the fight against trafficking, Slack said.

The greatest strength of Nigeria's anti-trafficking effort, Slack said, was its ability to marshal and coordinate considerable law enforcement resources with the backing of a legislative mandate and political support. "Perhaps the next greatest thing," Slack said, "was the personnel that were chosen to head up these agencies and offices."

"They were all dedicated to the fight; they were passionate about it; they understood the issues very well and were committed to doing all that they had power to do to combat trafficking in Nigeria," Slack said.

Slack attributed the ability of Nigeria's anti-trafficking efforts to evade the corruption that sometimes hobbles other government programs to the fact that human trafficking "affects the dignity and pride of all Nigeria" and the public's "genuine concern for the citizens who are affected by it."

Nigeria's success has been reflected in the United States' annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report, which tracks to what extent governments worldwide comply with the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA), a U.S. law (PDF, 39KB) adopted in 2000 that seeks to prevent human trafficking overseas. Since the report's first publication in 2001, Nigeria consistently ranked as a Tier 2 country -- meaning its government did not comply with TVPA's minimum standards, although it was making efforts to do so. In the 2009 TIP Report, which evaluated governments for the year 2008, Nigeria climbed to Tier 1 status, meaning it fully complied with TVPA minimum standards.

Slack said he believes Nigeria will be able to sustain effective anti-trafficking measures. Ongoing training courses remain, even with the conclusion of the ABA-USAID program. "That is a sustainable long-term impact of the program," he said. "I think it will continue to yield good results in building the capacities of the law enforcement agencies to detect and prosecute trafficking."

The real benefit of training, Slack said, is "helping an officer to see something differently. And in my experience, both in the United States and in Nigeria, we become accustomed to seeing things around us in a way that it becomes, I don't want to say invisible, but it just kind of blends into the background. But once you understand what it is you're seeing, you understand that it's not just normal. There is something abnormal about what's happening. It's not just prostitution; it is slavery. It's not just farm labor; there is someone who is being forced to do that. People see things differently, and that changes the dynamics within law enforcement as to the attention and efforts that they are able to bring to bear on tackling trafficking."

Perceptions within the general public in Nigeria are changing as well, Slack said. Ten or 15 years ago, Nigerians were proud to have a daughter working overseas and sending money back to her family. "There was not an awareness of what actually was involved or what their daughter was doing, or being forced to do," he said. But as awareness grew about the realities of what was really happening to many Nigerian women in Italy and elsewhere, it no longer was socially acceptable to boast of having a daughter working overseas.

The enticement of good pay and a better life somewhere else remain the traffickers' biggest lure, Slack said. "Desperation makes people vulnerable to those enticements," he said. "How do you then address the underlying socio-economic issues that might reduce the vulnerability to those enticements? But it is not a helpless situation, and I don't know of anybody who is actually working in trafficking that feels that it's helpless. Daunting, yes. But there is progress to be made, and is being made."

Nigeria ranked in Tier 1 again for the Trafficking in Persons report for 2010, which reports on 2009 activity. According to the report, Nigeria demonstrated sustained progress to combat human trafficking, convicted 25 trafficking offenders and provided care for 1,109 victims -- an increase over 2008. Nigeria continued to undertake strong efforts to raise awareness of human trafficking, according to the report. The full narrative on Nigeria is available on the State Department website.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

172 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 15, 2010 Tuesday

Nigeria; Strong Political Will Fuels Fight Against Trafficking

BYLINE: America.gov (Washington, DC)

LENGTH: 1146 words

Nigeria, like many countries in Africa, must cope with issues such as corruption, mismanagement and poverty. Nonetheless, the country has become a success to be emulated with its drive to end human trafficking, according to Reed Slack, who spent three years helping Nigeria implement programs to combat modern-day slavery.

"There was tremendous political will from the highest levels of government to tackle the issue of trafficking," Slack told America.gov in a recent interview. The effort of the Nigerian government, he said, "is most commendable and is -- and ought to be -- a model for other countries, not only in Africa but in Europe and in North and South America and Asia."

Slack is now the executive director of the Utah Health and Human Rights Project, but from 2006 to 2009 he served as chief of party in Nigeria for the American Bar Association Rule of Law Initiative (ABA-ROLI). In that capacity, he worked to help implement a program underwritten by the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID) to fight human trafficking by building capacity in Nigeria's law enforcement agencies and the judiciary and to provide support for victim rehabilitation services. The ABA-USAID program provided training for hundreds of Nigerian prosecutors, police, immigration enforcement officers and government officials in various agencies.

According to Slack, public awareness of the problem of human trafficking in Nigeria began to increase in the mid- to late 1990s, with a series of widely publicized stories about the repatriation of a number of Nigerian women who had been trafficked to Italy for prostitution. Photos showing the women being dropped off on the tarmac at the Lagos airport and abandoned to make their own way engendered a feeling of public insult in Nigeria's citizens, he said.

Amina Titi Atiku Abubakar, the wife of the vice president under the former Obasanjo administration, became alarmed about the issue of trafficking and saw it as "a national affront to the dignity of all Nigeria," Slack said. She established the Women Trafficking & Child Labour Eradication Foundation (WOTCLEF), which was able to further raise public awareness and lobby for the passage of an anti-trafficking statute. The statute was adopted in late 2003 with the strong support of then-President Olusegun Obasanjo, Slack said.

The National Agency for the Prohibition of Trafficking in Persons (NAPTIP) was established as a stand-alone agency within the executive branch. Responsible for preventing trafficking, protecting victims and prosecuting traffickers, NAPTIP engaged all of the law enforcement agencies -- local police as well as immigration officers -- in the fight against trafficking, Slack said.

The greatest strength of Nigeria's anti-trafficking effort, Slack said, was its ability to marshal and coordinate considerable law enforcement resources with the backing of a legislative mandate and political support. "Perhaps the next greatest thing," Slack said, "was the personnel that were chosen to head up these agencies and offices."

"They were all dedicated to the fight; they were passionate about it; they understood the issues very well and were committed to doing all that they had power to do to combat trafficking in Nigeria," Slack said.

Slack attributed the ability of Nigeria's anti-trafficking efforts to evade the corruption that sometimes hobbles other government programs to the fact that human trafficking "affects the dignity and pride of all Nigeria" and the public's "genuine concern for the citizens who are affected by it."

Nigeria's success has been reflected in the United States' annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report, which tracks to what extent governments worldwide comply with the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA), a U.S. law (PDF, 39KB) adopted in 2000 that seeks to prevent human trafficking overseas. Since the report's first publication in 2001, Nigeria consistently ranked as a Tier 2 country -- meaning its government did not comply with TVPA's minimum standards, although it was making efforts to do so. In the 2009 TIP Report, which evaluated governments for the year 2008, Nigeria climbed to Tier 1 status, meaning it fully complied with TVPA minimum standards.

Slack said he believes Nigeria will be able to sustain effective anti-trafficking measures. Ongoing training courses remain, even with the conclusion of the ABA-USAID program. "That is a sustainable long-term impact of the program," he said. "I think it will continue to yield good results in building the capacities of the law enforcement agencies to detect and prosecute trafficking."

The real benefit of training, Slack said, is "helping an officer to see something differently. And in my experience, both in the United States and in Nigeria, we become accustomed to seeing things around us in a way that it becomes, I don't want to say invisible, but it just kind of blends into the background. But once you understand what it is you're seeing, you understand that it's not just normal. There is something abnormal about what's happening. It's not just prostitution; it is slavery. It's not just farm labor; there is someone who is being forced to do that. People see things differently, and that changes the dynamics within law enforcement as to the attention and efforts that they are able to bring to bear on tackling trafficking."

Perceptions within the general public in Nigeria are changing as well, Slack said. Ten or 15 years ago, Nigerians were proud to have a daughter working overseas and sending money back to her family. "There was not an awareness of what actually was involved or what their daughter was doing, or being forced to do," he said. But as awareness grew about the realities of what was really happening to many Nigerian women in Italy and elsewhere, it no longer was socially acceptable to boast of having a daughter working overseas.

The enticement of good pay and a better life somewhere else remain the traffickers' biggest lure, Slack said. "Desperation makes people vulnerable to those enticements," he said. "How do you then address the underlying socio-economic issues that might reduce the vulnerability to those enticements? But it is not a helpless situation, and I don't know of anybody who is actually working in trafficking that feels that it's helpless. Daunting, yes. But there is progress to be made, and is being made."

Nigeria ranked in Tier 1 again for the Trafficking in Persons report for 2010, which reports on 2009 activity. According to the report, Nigeria demonstrated sustained progress to combat human trafficking, convicted 25 trafficking offenders and provided care for 1,109 victims -- an increase over 2008. Nigeria continued to undertake strong efforts to raise awareness of human trafficking, according to the report. The full narrative on Nigeria is available on the State Department website.

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

173 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 15, 2010 Tuesday 3:32 PM GMT

The 1530 GMT News Advisory

LENGTH: 712 words

DATELINE: Hong Kong, June 15 2010

Duty Editor: Peter Stebbings

News Desk: +852 2829 6211

-- WORLD HEADLINES --

OSH, Kyrgyzstan: Humanitarian crisis as refugees stranded

PESHAWAR: Pakistan arrests American on bin Laden mission

PENSACOLA, Florida: Oil company execs grilled over disaster

LONDON: PM says sorry for N.Ireland's Bloody Sunday killings

-- ASIA --

Pakistan-unrest-US-BinLaden,4thlead

PESHAWAR, Pakistan

An American businessman armed with a pistol, dagger and a sword has been arrested in Pakistan on suspicion of wanting to hunt down and kill Osama bin Laden, police say.

700 words moved by S.H. Khan

UN-SKorea-NKorea-military-politics,newseries

UNITED NATIONS

The UN Security Council warns South and North Korea against escalating regional tension after hearing briefings by both sides on the sinking of a South Korean warship which Seoul blames on the North.

650 words moved by Gerard Aziakou

We have also moved: SKorea-NKorea-military-history,lead

NKorea-nuclear-weapons-US-diplomacy,lead

WASHINGTON

The Obama administration has been "halfhearted" on North Korea and needs a long-term strategy that includes engaging ordinary people to weaken the regime's grip, a study says.

600 words moved by Shaun Tandon

Bangladesh-weather-landslide,4thlead

COX'S BAZAAR, Bangladesh

At least 53 people have been killed after days of heavy rain triggered flash floods and landslides in southeastern Bangladesh, police say.

600 words moved by Muazzem Shakil

China-Japan-auto-labour-Honda,lead-WRAP

BEIJING

Striking workers at a Honda factory in China resume their duties as Premier Wen Jiabao calls for better treatment of migrant workers, highlighting growing concern over a wave of labour unrest.

550 words moved by Susan Stumme

Indonesia-Australia-Britain-Tonga-history-Bligh,lead

KUPANG, Indonesia

Four adventurers land in Indonesia at the end of a harrowing 47-day re-enactment of Lieutenant William Bligh, [TM]'s epic sea voyage from the mutiny on the HMS Bounty.

650 words moved. Picture

Australia-aviation-accident,4thlead

SYDNEY

A light plane crash-lands and explodes close to a Sydney primary school, killing the two people on board and leaving children and passersby in shock, police said.

600 words moved

US-trafficking-Asia-women,2ndlead

WASHINGTON

The United States puts allies Singapore and Thailand as well as Vietnam on a human trafficking watch list, accusing them of failing to prevent women from being forced into prostitution.

600 words moved by Shaun Tandon

Japan-economy-bank,5thlead

TOKYO

Japan's central bank unveils a 33 billion dollar loan scheme to boost growth and battle deflation as it faces mounting pressure from a new government focused on economic restoration, but analysts question the move.

600 words moved by David Watkins. Picture

Asia-entertainment-media-economy

HONG KONG

China will overtake Japan to become the world's second-largest advertising market within five years, according to a new report.

600 words moved by Adrian Addison. Graphic

-- EUROPE --

Kyrgyzstan-Uzbekistan-unrest-politics,6thlead-WRAP

OSH, Kyrgyzstan

Thousands desperate to flee ethnic clashes in Kyrgyzstan plead to pass through the sealed border into Uzbekistan, powerless to escape a growing humanitarian catastrophe engulfing the country.

750 words moved by Matt Siegel. Picture, video

We have also moved: Kyrgyzstan-Uzbekistan-unrest-politics-rights,lead-SCENE

NIreland-Britain-unrest-report,2ndlead

LONDON

British Prime Minister David Cameron apologises for the Bloody Sunday killings, one of the darkest days in Northern Ireland's history, calling them "unjustified and unjustifiable."

700 words moved by Katherine Haddon. Picture.Video

-- AMERICAS --

US-oil-pollution-environment,newseries-WRAP

PENSACOLA, Florida

Oil company executives are grilled by US lawmakers on the Gulf of Mexico disaster, just hours before President Barack Obama outlines new steps to control the spill and compensate victims in a solemn Oval Office address.

750 words moved by Stephen Collinson. Picture, graphic, video

-- AFRICA --

SAfrica-fbl-WC2010,2ndlead-WRAP

JOHANNESBURG

South African police take over security at two showpiece World Cup venues after a strike by stewards which heaped more pressure on beleaguered organisers.

650 words 1545 GMT by Sibongile Khumalo. Pictures, graphics, video

We will also move: SAfrica-labour-fbl-WC2010,SCENE

afp

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

174 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 15, 2010 Tuesday 10:34 AM GMT

The 1030 GMT News Advisory

LENGTH: 776 words

DATELINE: Hong Kong, June 15 2010

Duty Editor: Peter Stebbings

News Desk: +852 2829 6211

-- WORLD HEADLINES --

OSH: Kyrgyzstan withdraws request for peacekeepers

PESHAWAR: Pakistan arrests American on bin Laden mission

UNITED NATIONS: Security Council warns South, North Korea

JOHANNESBURG: Police take charge of WCup stadium security

-- ASIA --

Pakistan-unrest-US-BinLaden,3rdlead

PESHAWAR, Pakistan

A middle-aged American suspected of going on a mission to hunt down and kill Osama bin Laden has been arrested in Pakistan carrying a pistol, dagger and a sword, police say.

600 words 1130 GMT by S.H. Khan

UN-SKorea-NKorea-military-politics,newseries

UNITED NATIONS

The UN Security Council warns South and North Korea against escalating regional tension after hearing briefings by both sides on the sinking of a South Korean warship which Seoul blames on the North.

650 words moved by Gerard Aziakou

NKorea-nuclear-weapons-US-diplomacy,lead

WASHINGTON

The Obama administration has been "halfhearted" on North Korea and needs a long-term strategy that includes engaging ordinary people to weaken the regime's grip, a study says.

600 words moved by Shaun Tandon

Bangladesh-weather-landslide,3rdlead

COX'S BAZAAR, Bangladesh

At least 42 people have been killed by landslides and flash floods in southeastern Bangladesh and dozens more are missing, police and local officials say.

550 words 1100 GMT by Muazzem Shakil

China-Japan-auto-labour-Honda,lead-WRAP

BEIJING

Striking workers at a Honda factory in China resume their duties as Premier Wen Jiabao calls for better treatment of migrant workers, highlighting growing concern over a wave of labour unrest.

550 words moved by Susan Stumme

Indonesia-Australia-Britain-history-Bligh,lead

KUPANG, Indonesia

In a feat of seamanship, endurance and, some may say, sheer madness, four adventurers from Australia and Britain land in Indonesia after re-enacting William Bligh, [TM]'s epic voyage in an open boat.

600 words 1130 GMT. Picture

Australia-aviation-accident,4thlead

SYDNEY

A light plane crash-lands and explodes close to a Sydney primary school, killing the two people on board and leaving children and passersby in shock, police said.

600 words moved

US-trafficking-Asia-women,2ndlead

WASHINGTON

The United States puts allies Singapore and Thailand as well as Vietnam on a human trafficking watch list, accusing them of failing to prevent women from being forced into prostitution.

600 words moved by Shaun Tandon

Japan-economy-bank,5thlead

TOKYO

Japan's central bank unveils a 33 billion dollar loan scheme to boost growth and battle deflation as it faces mounting pressure from a new government focused on economic restoration, but analysts question the move.

600 words moved by David Watkins. Picture

Asia-entertainment-media-economy

HONG KONG

China will overtake Japan to become the world's second-largest advertising market within five years, according to a new report.

600 words moved by Adrian Addison. Graphic

-- EUROPE --

Kyrgyzstan-Uzbekistan-unrest-politics,4thlead-WRAP

OSH, Kyrgyzstan

Kyrgyzstan's interim leader withdraws a demand for peacekeepers amid a calming of the inter-ethnic fighting in its south but concerns intensify over the scale of the humanitarian catastrophe for tens of thousands of refugees.

800 words 1100 GMT by Matt Siegel. Picture. Video

We will also move: Kyrgyzstan-Uzbekistan-unrest-politics-rights,SCENE

NIreland-Britain-unrest-report,lead

LONDON

Authorities in Britain and Northern Ireland brace for a long-awaited report into the killings of 13 people on Bloody Sunday, a key flashpoint in three decades of violence, amid fears it could re-open wounds.

650 words 1130 GMT by Katherine Haddon. Picture. Video.

We will also move: NIreland-Britain-timeline,CHRONO

NIreland-Britain-unrest-parade,SCENE

-- AFRICA --

SAfrica-fbl-WC2010,lead-WRAP

JOHANNESBURG

South African police take over security at two showpiece World Cup venues after stewards go on strike over pay, infuriating organisers as they tackle a growing list of complaints.

650 words 1045 GMT by Sibongile Khumalo. Pictures. Video. Graphics

We will also move: SAfrica-tourism-fbl-WC2010,FOCUS

-- MIDDLE EAST --

Iran-energy-gas-contracts-Guards,3rdlead

TEHRAN

Iran signs contracts worth 21 billion dollars with local firms to develop six gas fields, some of them awarded to the elite Revolutionary Guards, state media reports.

650 words 1230 GMT by Farhad Pouladi

-- AMERICAS --

US-oil-pollution-environment,2ndlead-WRAP

PENSACOLA, Florida

US President Barack Obama prepares to make his debut Oval Office address to the American people, as he seeks to wrest political control over the Gulf of Mexico oil catastrophe.

800 words 1100 GMT by Stephen Collinson. Picture

afp

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

175 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 15, 2010 Tuesday 10:21 AM GMT

Singapore lashes out at US over trafficking report

LENGTH: 503 wordsDATELINE: SINGAPORE, June 15 2010

Singapore reacted indignantly Tuesday to a US government report putting it on a human-trafficking watchlist and bluntly told Washington to examine its own record on immigration.

The 2010 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report by the State Department listed Singapore, a staunch US ally, along with Thailand and Vietnam as countries that failed to prevent women from being forced into prostitution.

"We have read the latest TIP report. It is rather puzzling because the US has not satisfactorily explained how it had arrived at its conclusions," Singapore's foreign ministry said in a written reply to media queries.

"The Singapore government is committed to tackling the TIP issue, and our efforts in dealing with this issue have certainly not weakened since last year. We will respond in detail as appropriate in due course."

Thousands of women from poorer Asian countries such as China, the Philippines and Thailand work as call girls and bar hostesses in wealthy Singapore, a bustling port city where prostitution is legal in designated zones.

Explaining the downgrade for Singapore to the "Tier Two Watch List" where it sits alongside impoverished countries, the US report said some women were tricked into coming to the city-state with promises of legitimate employment but coerced into the sex trade.

The report said that while Singapore launched "some significant new steps" against trafficking, there were no "quantifiable indicators" that the government was identifying more victims or prosecuting more culprits.

In its reaction, the Singapore foreign ministry said the annual US report "is more a political ritual than an objective study."

"How, for example, can the US rank itself in Tier One when it is well known that the US has been unable to stem a flood of illegal workers, many of whom are trafficked by organised criminal gangs?" the ministry said.

"It has not been able to cope adequately with the problem and that is among the reasons why immigration is such a hot political issue in the US.

"The US should perhaps examine its own record more carefully before presuming to pronounce on other countries. Then its reports may be more credible," the Singapore foreign ministry added.

US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, who has made women's and children's rights a signature issue, called human trafficking a "terrible crime" as she presented the annual report on Monday.

"All of us have a responsibility to bring this practice to an end," she said.

The report estimated that 12.3 million people were the victims of trafficking in 2009-2010, although it said there had been progress over the past decade.

The State Department added a number of Asian nations to its watch list -- Afghanistan, Brunei, Laos, Maldives, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam.

Bangladesh, China, India, Micronesia, the Philippines and Sri Lanka stayed on the list, unchanged from a year earlier.

North Korea, Myanmar and Papua New Guinea remained at the bottom level of countries that do not even meet the minimum standards on human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 Agence France Presse
All Rights Reserved

176 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 15, 2010 Tuesday 5:40 AM GMT

The 0530 GMT News Advisory

LENGTH: 710 words

DATELINE: Hong Kong, June 15 2010

Duty Editor: Tanya Willmer

News Desk: +852 2829 6211

-- WORLD HEADLINES --

OSH: Uzbekistan struggles to cope with Kyrgyzstan refugees

THEODORE, Alabama: Obama says BP deal on oil spill near

UNITED NATIONS: Security Council warns Koreas on rising tension

CAPE TOWN: Police take charge of World Cup stadium security

-- ASIA --

UN-SKorea-NKorea-military-politics,newseries

UNITED NATIONS

The UN Security Council warn rival South and North Korea against escalating tension after hearing briefings by both sides on the sinking of a South Korean warship which Seoul blames on Pyongyang.

650 words moved by Gerard Aziakou

NKorea-nuclear-weapons-US-diplomacy,lead

WASHINGTON

The Obama administration has been "halfhearted" on North Korea and needs a long-term strategy that includes engaging ordinary people to weaken the regime's grip, a study says.

600 words 0600 GMT by Shaun Tandon

China-Japan-auto-labour-Honda,lead-WRAP

BEIJING

Striking workers at a Honda factory in China return to their jobs as Premier Wen Jiabao calls for better treatment of migrant workers, highlighting growing concern over a spate of strikes and suicides at several foreign-backed plants.

500 words 0800 GMT

US-trafficking-Asia-women,2ndlead

WASHINGTON

The United States puts allies Singapore and Thailand as well as Vietnam on a human trafficking watch list, accusing them of failing to prevent women from being forced into prostitution.

600 words moved by Shaun Tandon

Japan-economy-bank,4thlead

TOKYO

Facing pressure from a new government that has put economic restoration at the heart of its agenda, Japan's central bank unveils a three trillion yen lending scheme to boost growth, but analysts question the move.

550 words 0800 GMT by David Watkins

Asia-entertainment-media-economy

HONG KONG

China will overtake Japan to become the world's second largest advertising market by 2015, according to a new report on the entertainment and media industry by accountancy giant PricewaterhouseCoopers.

600 words 0200 GMT by Adrian Addison. Graphic.

Environment-whaling-IWC-Japan-Iceland-Norway

PARIS

Companies in Japan, Iceland and Norway are developing whale-based products ranging from drugs to cosmetics to animal feed, banking on a resumption of global trade, according to a report.

650 words moved by Marlowe Hood. Graphic

US-trade-Asia-APEC,lead

SAN FRANCISCO

The United States and seven other nations launch a second round of talks to forge a Pacific trade deal that could become President Barack Obama's first free trade agreement.

500 words moved

US-Afghanistan-economy-minerals,newseries

WASHINGTON

US officials say Afghanistan has mineral deposits worth at least one trillion dollars and that the vast untapped riches carry the potential to lift the war-ravaged country out of its deep poverty.

750 words moved by Dan De Luce

-- EUROPE --

Kyrgyzstan-Uzbekistan-unrest-politics,2ndlead-WRAP

OSH, Kyrgyzstan

Uzbeks and Kyrgyz exchange hostages as ethnic violence appears to ease in tense southern Kyrgyzstan while neighboring Uzbekistan struggles to cope with tens of thousands of refugees.

600 words 0630 GMT by Matt Siegel. Video. Picture. Graphic.

-- AFRICA --

SAfrica-fbl-WC2010,WRAP

JOHANNESBURG

World Cup organisers battle to contain walkouts by South African workers which forced the police to take charge of security at the champions Italy's opening match and disrupted transport for fans.

600 words 0900 GMT. Picture. Video. Graphic

Mauritania-crime-drugs-Mali-Qaeda-attacks,FOCUS

NOUAKCHOTT

Al-Qaeda's north African operation is not above offering protection to drug traffickers moving into the region, say experts -- despite Islam's condemnation of drugs.

700 words 0730 GMT by Michel Moutot

-- AMERICAS --

US-oil-pollution-environment,WRAP

PENSACOLA, Florida

US President Barack Obama prepares to make his debut Oval Office address to the American people, as he seeks to wrest political control over the Gulf of Mexico oil catastrophe.

800 words 0600 GMT by Stephen Collinson. Picture

We will also move: US-oil-pollution-environment-people,SCENE

Lifestyle-US-France-music-videogames-dance-Ubisoft-E3

LOS ANGELES, California

French videogame titan Ubisoft is making a videogame that lets players "step into the shoes" of legendary King of Pop Michael Jackson.

550 words 0600 GMT by Glenn Chapman. Picture

afp

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

177 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 15, 2010 Tuesday 2:50 AM GMT

AFP Asia news agenda

LENGTH: 668 words

DATELINE: Hong Kong, June 15 2010

Duty Editor: Huw Griffith

News Desk: +852 2829 6211

ASIA NEWS HIGHLIGHTS ON TUESDAY

+ Security Council warns Koreas on rising tension

+ Pakistan court to resume Facebook blasphemy hearing

UNITED NATIONS: The UN Security Council meets to discuss the sinking of a South Korean warship near the disputed border with North Korea, an act Seoul blames on Pyongyang (UN-SKOREA-NKOREA-MILITARY-POLITICS)

LAHORE, Pakistan: A Pakistani court scheduled to resume hearing on a petition brought by Islamic lawyers against Facebook for blasphemy. (PAKISTAN-INTERNET-FACEBOOK-ISLAM-RELIGION)

-- OTHER AGENDA ITEMS --

BANGKOK/HANOI/SINGAPORE: Monitoring reax after Thailand, Vietnam and Singapore were included on a US human trafficking watch list, accused of failing to prevent women from being forced into prostitution (US-TRAFFICKING-ASIA-WOMEN-)

BANGKOK: Eleven leaders of Thailand's Red Shirt anti-government movement to appear in court over recent street protests (THAILAND-UNREST-COURT)

BEIJING: Monitoring a labour dispute at a Honda parts supplier in southern China, after a partial resumption of operations following a pay dispute (CHINA-JAPAN-AUTO-LABOUR-HONDA)

-- Moving a FEATURE on zoos in China, where tourists can pay to feed live animals to lions (CHINA-WILDLIFE-ANIMAL)

COLOMBO: Yasushi Akashi, Tokyo's special representative for peace-building in Sri Lanka, starts five-day visit one year after the island's civil war ended (SRILANKA-UNREST-JAPAN)

DHAKA: Chinese Vice President Xi Jinping completes a two-day visit to Dhaka (BANGLADESH-CHINA-DIPLOMACY)

HANOI: Chinese Vice President Xi Jinping begins official visit to Laos (LAOS-CHINA-ECONOMY-DIPLOMACY)

-- Fred Hochberg, chairman and president of the US Ex-Im Bank, holds press conference at 0400 GMT (VIETNAM-US-TRADE).

-- Moving a piece focussed on China's rising influence in resource-rich Laos despite competition from Vietnam (LAOS-CHINA-ECONOMY-DIPLOMACY,FOCUS)

JAKARTA: The trial resumes of Saudi man Al Khelaiw Ali Abdullah accused of financing twin suicide bombings on luxury hotels in Jakarta last year (INDONESIA-ATTACKS-TRIAL-SAUDI)

-- Awaiting sentencing of Rahmat Puji Prabowo alias Bejo, who assisted Malaysian terror mastermind Noordin M. Top. (INDONESIA-ATTACKS-TRIAL)

NEW DELHI: Reporting ex-GUWAHATI as India plans to start sending paramilitary troops to break a blockade of remote Manipur state by tribal groups who have blocked food and medical supplies for over two months (INDIA-UNREST-NORTHEAST)

SEOUL: South Korean President Lee Myung-Bak holds summit with Turkish President Abdullah Gul on enhancing economic and diplomatic cooperation (SKOREA-TURKEY-DIPLOMACY)

SINGAPORE: The first day of CommuniAsia technology conference, with Skype CEO Josh Silverman and other industry leaders speaking (ASIA-TELECOM-)

SYDNEY: A light plane crash-lands and explodes just metres (yards) from a Sydney primary school, killing at least two people on board (AUSTRALIA-AVIATION-ACCIDENT)

-- Monitoring as scientists prepare to transfer a space probe, thought to contain the first fragments from a moving asteroid, from Australia for analysis in Japan (SPACE-JAPAN-AUSTRALIA-ASTEROIDS)

-- Rugby Union. Australia A v England in Gosford at 0930 GMT (RUGBYU-AUS-ENG)

TAIPEI: China policy decision-maker Lai Shin-yuan to brief parliament at 0800 GMT on progress made during the third round of negotiations for a proposed trade agreement with China (TAIWAN-CHINA-POLITICS-TRADE)

TOKYO: Bank of Japan Governor Masaaki Shirakawa holds press conference at 0630 GMT (JAPAN-ECONOMY-BANK-RATE-FOREX)

-- Japanese media hail national team's first World Cup finals victory on foreign soil after their 1-0 win over Cameroon (FBL-WC2010-JPN-CMR,REAX)

-- Monitoring a widening sumo scandal as the sport's governing body meets to decide disciplinary measures against dozens of wrestlers allegedly involved in illegal gambling (JAPAN-SUMO-CRIME-JPN)

WELLINGTON: Rugby Union. New Zealand announce their team to play Wales in the first of two Tests on Saturday (RUGBYU-NZL-WAL)

afp

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

178 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 15, 2010 Tuesday 1:25 AM GMT

US puts Singapore, Thailand on human trafficking watch list

LENGTH: 658 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 14 2010

The United States has put allies Singapore and Thailand as well as Vietnam on a human trafficking watch list, accusing them of failing to prevent women from being forced into prostitution.

The move Monday opens the way for the United States to cut off some civilian assistance, although it usually functions as a way to pressure countries to take action.

Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, who has made women's and children's rights a signature issue, called human trafficking a "terrible crime" as she presented the State Department's annual report.

"All of us have a responsibility to bring this practice to an end," she said.

The report estimated that 12.3 million people were the victims of trafficking in 2009-2010, although it said there has been progress over the past decade.

The State Department added a number of Asian nations to its watch list -- Afghanistan, Brunei, Laos, Maldives, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam.

Bangladesh, China, India, Micronesia, the Philippines and Sri Lanka stayed on the list, unchanged from a year earlier.

North Korea, Myanmar and Papua New Guinea remained at the bottom level of countries that do not even meet the minimum standards on human trafficking.

Explaining the downgrade for Singapore, the report said that some women from China, the Philippines and Thailand are tricked into coming to the city-state with promises of legitimate employment and coerced into the sex trade.

The report said that while Singapore launched "some significant new steps" against trafficking, there were no "quantifiable indicators" that the government was identifying more victims or prosecuting more culprits.

The State Department said that Thailand was a source, destination and transit point for trafficking, with ethnic minorities and citizens of neighboring countries at particular risk of sexual abuse or forced labor.

Senator Jim Webb, who heads the Foreign Relations subcommittee on East Asia, had made an unusually open appeal not to place Thailand on the watch list.

Webb visited Bangkok this month and said US embassy staff disagreed with the intended downgrade as it could curb assistance for democracy and human rights programs in the wake of the kingdom's political violence.

The downgrade occurs "at a time when this type of aide is desperately needed to bolster political reforms in Thailand and to promote political stability," Webb said last week in a letter to Clinton.

The State Department recognized improvements in Pakistan, which was taken off the watch list, and Malaysia, which was on the watch list but lifted from the lowest category.

Pakistan "has dramatically increased the number of convictions and prosecutions for human trafficking, undertaking creative efforts to prevent bonded labor," Luis CdeBaca, the US envoy on human trafficking, told reporters.

Malaysian authorities "have acknowledged and begun to tackle their serious human trafficking problem, including intensified engagement with foreign governments," CdeBaca said.

From other regions, Cuba, Iran and Saudi Arabia remained in the rock-bottom category and the Dominican Republic was newly added.

Representative Christopher Smith, a Republican who authored the law that requires the human trafficking report, said that more countries should have been assigned the lowest rank.

"If we are willing to hold the Dominican Republic to account, as we should, it's outrageous that China, Vietnam and India get a free pass," Smith said.

Taiwan was upgraded and listed as fully compliant in efforts against human trafficking after starting new services for victims, CdeBaca said.

Australia, New Zealand and South Korea were also listed as fully compliant.

For the first time, the United States included itself in the report. It ranked itself in compliance.

Japan was listed as not fully compliant but making efforts. The United States put its close ally on the watch list in 2004 and 2005, embarrassing Tokyo into stepping up efforts to protect trafficked women.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

179 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 15, 2010 Tuesday 1:16 AM GMT

The 0100 GMT News Advisory

LENGTH: 790 words

DATELINE: Hong Kong, June 15 2010

Duty Editor: Huw Griffith

News Desk: +852 2829 6211

-- WORLD HEADLINES --

OSH: Uzbekistan closes border to people fleeing Kyrgyzstan

THEODORE, Alabama: Obama says BP deal on oil spill near

UNITED NATIONS: Security Council warns Koreas on rising tension

CAPE TOWN: Police take charge of World Cup stadium security

-- ASIA --

UN-SKorea-NKorea-military-politics,newseries

UNITED NATIONS

The UN Security Council warn rival South and North Korea against escalating tension after hearing briefings by both sides on the sinking of a South Korean warship which Seoul blames on the North.

650 words 0130 GMT by Gerard Aziakou

US-trafficking-Asia-women,2ndlead

WASHINGTON

The United States puts allies Singapore and Thailand as well as Vietnam on a human trafficking watch list, accusing them of failing to prevent women from being forced into prostitution.

600 words 0130 GMT by Shaun Tandon

Environment-whaling-IWC-Japan-Iceland-Norway

PARIS

Companies in Japan, Iceland and Norway are developing whale-based products ranging from drugs to cosmetics to animal feed, banking on a resumption of global trade, according to a report.

650 words 0130 GMT by Marlowe Hood. Graphic

US-trade-Asia-APEC,lead

SAN FRANCISCO

The United States and seven other nations launch a second round of talks to forge a Pacific trade deal that could become President Barack Obama's first free trade agreement.

500 words 0130 GMT

US-Afghanistan-economy-minerals,newseries

WASHINGTON

US officials say Afghanistan has mineral deposits worth at least one trillion dollars and that the vast untapped riches carry the potential to lift the war-ravaged country out of its deep poverty.

750 words 0130 GMT by Dan De Luce

Afghanistan-unrest-US-warlords,FOCUS

RAWHANAY, Afghanistan

Drawing on a cigarette held between his tattooed fingers, Mohammed Daoud is thanked by an American junior officer for dispatching 5,000 Afghan militiamen to join the police force.

700 words 0200 GMT by Claire Truscott

Laos-China-economy-diplomacy-Vietnam,FOCUS

HANOI

China's presumed future leader will seek to boost his country's fast-growing ties with Laos during a visit Tuesday, as Beijing competes with Vietnam for influence in the small but resource-rich nation, observers say.

600 words 0230 GMT by Ian Timberlake

-- EUROPE --

Kyrgyzstan-Uzbekistan-unrest-politics,newseries-WRAP

OSH, Kyrgyzstan

Uzbekistan closes its border to refugees fleeing the deadly violence in Kyrgyzstan, some of whom have accused government forces of helping armed gangs slaughter ethnic Uzbeks.

800 words 0200 GMT by Matt Siegel. Graphic. Picture. Video.

We will also move: Kyrgyzstan-Uzbekistan-unrest-politics-history,FOCUS

NIreland-Britain-unrest-report

LONDONDERRY, Northern Ireland

The families of those killed here on Bloody Sunday will finally get to hear Tuesday the findings of a long-awaited, mammoth inquiry into the highly controversial 1972 shootings.

700 words 0200 GMT by Alice Ritchie. File picture.

Greece-finance-economy-ratings-Moodys,5thlead

PARIS

Moody's rating agency slashes its sovereign rating for Greece to 'junk' status on concerns about Athens can pay its debts, as EU and IMF auditors began taking a hard look at the country's budget.

700 words moved

-- MIDDLE EAST --

Israel-conflict-Gaza,6thlead-WRAP

JERUSALEM

Israel's cabinet backs the creation of an internal committee to probe its deadly raid on a Gaza-bound aid flotilla, in a move swiftly dismissed by both Turkey and the Palestinians.

750 words moved by Hazel Ward. Picture. Graphic.

-- AFRICA --

SAfrica-fbl-WC2010,2ndlead-WRAP

CAPE TOWN

South African police take control of security at reigning champions Italy's opening World Cup match, after stewards walk out in a spiralling dispute over pay.

700 words moved by Justine Gerardy. Pictures. Video. Graphics

SAfrica-Germany-Fbl-WC2010-economy,FOCUS

BERLIN

World Cup fans may be split on South Africa's vuvuzela, either merry fanfare or deafening din, but two German entrepreneurs who bought the resale rights for Europe hope the horn will spell gold.

450 words 0130 GMT by Aurelia End. Picture.

-- AMERICAS --

US-oil-pollution-environment,3rdlead-WRAP

THEODORE, Alabama

US President Barack Obama says he hopes to seal a deal with reeling BP by Wednesday on a multi-billion dollar fund for oil disaster victims and vows to deploy all his power to save the Gulf coast from an advancing oil slick.

700 words 0200 GMT by Stephen Collinson. Graphic.

we will also move: US-oil-environment-pollution-drilling,FOCUS

US-Afghanistan-economy-minerals,newseries

WASHINGTON

US officials say Afghanistan has mineral deposits worth at least one trillion dollars and that the vast untapped riches carry the potential to lift the war-ravaged country out of its deep poverty.

750 words 0130 GMT by Dan De Luce

afp

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

180 of 404 DOCUMENTS

June 15, 2010 Tuesday 3:06 PM EET

US REPORT MAKES NOTE OF LITHUANIA'S EFFORTS TO BATTLE HUMAN TRAFFICKING (CORRECTS) US report makes note of Lithuania's efforts to battle human trafficking (corrects) (corrected version: corrects info in para 4)

LENGTH: 474 words

DATELINE: VILNIUS Jun 15

The new Trafficking in Persons Report 2010 released in the US on Monday makes note of Lithuania's anti- trafficking efforts. Even though women and girls are still known to become victims to forced prostitution, the Baltic state has done more to prevent such manifestations than most neighboring and post-soviet states. "The Government of Lithuania fully complies with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking," reads the report, presented on Monday by US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton.

The report, besides stressing that girls and women are most usually subjected to human trafficking in Lithuania, places Lithuania among the ranks of Tier 1 states, which it finds strictly punish human traffickers, protect victims, identify and investigate cases of human trafficking and comply with other minimum standards outlined in US law. Of all former Soviet Union states, Tier 1 classification, besides Lithuania, was given to Georgia. From neighboring states, Poland was also ranked Tier 1. Latvia, Estonia, Belarus and Russia were ranked alongside Tier 2 countries. A total of 177 countries were grouped into three categories based on anti-trafficking efforts during the reporting period. The report said Lithuania is a source, transit, and destination country for women and girls subjected to trafficking in persons, singling out forced prostitution. "Lithuanian women are also subjected to forced prostitution in the United Kingdom, Germany, the Netherlands, Greece, Italy, France, and the Czech Republic. A small number of women from Russia and Belarus are transited through Lithuania and are subjected to forced prostitution in Western Europe," the report reads. The research found that even though the Lithuanian government doesn't put aside financing to aid human trafficking victims, it collaborates with anti-trafficking NGOs. Recommendations for Lithuania are to improve efforts to identify, investigate, and prosecute forced labor offenses and allocate some funding or in-kind support to NGOs providing victim protection services among other suggestions. According to the report, penalties in Lithuania are sufficiently stringent and commensurate with penalties prescribed for other serious crimes. Lithuanian authorities initiated 11 sex trafficking investigations in 2009, the report said. Lithuanian authorities convicted 14 individuals for sex trafficking offenses during the reporting period in comparison to 13 in 2008, says the report. It also said the government extradited one person accused of trafficking offenses to Finland during the reporting period. Lithuania has ranked among Tier 1 states annually from 2002. The report was prepared and countries ranked after investigating data collected by US institutions, international NGOs and foreign governments. Vilnius newsroom, +370 5 2058514, politika@bns.lt-

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 Baltic News Service
All Rights Reserved

181 of 404 DOCUMENTS

June 15, 2010 Tuesday 3:06 PM EET

US REPORT MAKES NOTE OF LITHUANIA'S EFFORTS TO BATTLE HUMAN TRAFFICKING US report makes note of Lithuania's efforts to battle human trafficking

LENGTH: 468 wordsDATELINE: VILNIUS Jun 15

The new Trafficking in Persons Report 2010 released in the US on Monday makes note of Lithuania's anti- trafficking efforts. Even though women and girls are still known to become victims to forced prostitution, the Baltic state has done more to prevent such manifestations than most neighboring and post-soviet states. "The Government of Lithuania fully complies with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking," reads the report, presented on Monday by US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton.

The report, besides stressing that girls and women are most usually subjected to human trafficking in Lithuania, places Lithuania among the ranks of Tier 1 states, which it finds strictly punish human traffickers, protect victims, identify and investigate cases of human trafficking and comply with other minimum standards outlined in US law. Of all former Soviet Union states, Tier 1 classification, besides Lithuania, was given to Georgia and neighboring Poland. Latvia, Estonia, Belarus and Russia were ranked alongside Tier 2 countries. A total of 177 countries were grouped into three categories based on anti-trafficking efforts during the reporting period. The report said Lithuania is a source, transit, and destination country for women and girls subjected to trafficking in persons, singling out forced prostitution. "Lithuanian women are also subjected to forced prostitution in the United Kingdom, Germany, the Netherlands, Greece, Italy, France, and the Czech Republic. A small number of women from Russia and Belarus are transited through Lithuania and are subjected to forced prostitution in Western Europe," the report reads. The research found that even though the Lithuanian government doesn't put aside financing to aid human trafficking victims, it collaborates with anti-trafficking NGOs. Recommendations for Lithuania are to improve efforts to identify, investigate, and prosecute forced labor offenses and allocate some funding or in-kind support to NGOs providing victim protection services among other suggestions. According to the report, penalties in Lithuania are sufficiently stringent and commensurate with penalties prescribed for other serious crimes. Lithuanian authorities initiated 11 sex trafficking investigations in 2009, the report said. Lithuanian authorities convicted 14 individuals for sex trafficking offenses during the reporting period in comparison to 13 in 2008, says the report. It also said the government extradited one person accused of trafficking offenses to Finland during the reporting period. Lithuania has ranked among Tier 1 states annually from 2002. The report was prepared and countries ranked after investigating data collected by US institutions, international NGOs and foreign governments. Vilnius newsroom, +370 5 2058514, politika@bns.lt

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 Baltic News Service
All Rights Reserved

182 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring South Asia - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 15, 2010 Tuesday

Maldives among countries added to US human trafficking watch list

LENGTH: 197 words

Excerpt from report by Maldives pro-government newspaper Miadhu News website on 15 June

The United States on Monday [14 June] put Afghanistan, Brunei, Laos, Maldives, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam on a human trafficking watch list. Although reason for inclusion of the Maldives was not stated, treatment of expatriate labourers was believed to be the reason. Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam was bombarded by the State Department for failing to prevent women from being forced into prostitution.

The move opens the way for the United States to cut off some civilian assistance, although it usually functions as a symbolic means to pressure countries to take action.

The State Department recognized improvements in Malaysia and Fiji, keeping them on the list but removing them from the lowest category of countries that do not even meet the minimum standards on human trafficking.

North Korea, Myanmar and Papua New Guinea remained at that bottom level. Taiwan was upgraded and listed as fully compliant in efforts against human trafficking. Australia, New Zealand and South Korea were also listed as fully compliant. [passage omitted]

Source: Miadhu News website, Male, in English 15 Jun 10

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2010 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

183 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 15, 2010 Tuesday

US State Department says North Korea among "worst" for human trafficking

LENGTH: 207 words

Text of report in English by South Korean news agency Yonhap

WASHINGTON, June 14 (Yonhap) - North Korea remains one of the worst countries in human trafficking, along with 11 other nations, the US State Department said Monday.

The 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report categorized North Korea with other Tier 3 countries that "do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so" under the Trafficking Victims Protection Act.

The Congress-mandated report cited a number of North Koreans subjected to human trafficking in neighbouring China while seeking food, work and freedom.

Among the other worst countries are Iran, Sudan, Cuba, Iran and Myanmar.

"The Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK or North Korea) is a source country for men, women, and children who are subjected to trafficking in persons, specifically forced labour and forced prostitution," the report said. "The most common form of trafficking involves North Korean women and girls forced into marriage or prostitution in China. Women and girls from North Korea migrate to China, often with the help of a facilitator, seeking food, work, freedom, and better life prospects."

Source: Yonhap news agency, Seoul, in English 1412 gmt 14 Jun 10

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

184 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Latin America - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 15, 2010 Tuesday

Guyana dismisses US report on human trafficking

LENGTH: 724 words

Text of report by Caribbean Media Corporation news agency website on 15 June

Georgetown, Guyana: The Guyana government has warned that relations with the United States could be affected if Washington continues to issue reports on human trafficking that were inaccurate and painted Guyana in a bad light.

"It seems to me that the US is contradicting its own report," said Human Services and Social Security Minister Priya Manickchand as she "strongly criticised" the US State Department 2010 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report that placed Guyana on the Tier 2 watch list for the fourth consecutive year.

Manickchand said that there is no evidence made available by the US to the effect that Guyana has a significant number of victims and that the report "is based on ignorance and this type of reporting is hurting Guyana's friendship with the US".

She told reporters that since 2004, when the Combating Trafficking in Persons Act was established, Guyana has been making significant strides in dealing with the situation.

But the US State Department in maintaining the Tier 2 level against Guyana, said the country has failed to take steps to combat human trafficking for the past year, is not making significant efforts based on commitments to anti-trafficking reforms over the next year and has a significant number of trafficking victims or a significantly increasing victim population.

"The Government of Guyana does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. Despite these efforts, the government did not initiate any new prosecutions of trafficking offences during the reporting period and has yet to convict or punish any trafficking offenders under its five-year old anti-human trafficking law," the report said.

"During the reporting period, the government and NGOs (non government organizations) identified four victims of trafficking, two of whom prison officials proactively identified," the report said, noting that "the government provided some resources towards victim protection and local anti-trafficking groups, no suspected traffickers were charged, limiting the level of safety and protection that could be provided to victims".

According to the Trafficking in People (TIP) 2010 Report, while the government took some "tangible" steps to raise awareness of human trafficking, including the establishment of focal point groups and an anti-trafficking task force, "some local observers felt that the government discouraged discussions on developing effective strategies for combating this phenomenon of modern-day slavery".

The 2010 report said Guyana is a source country for men, women, and children subjected to trafficking in persons, specifically conditions of forced prostitution and forced labour. Guyanese trafficking victim cases have been identified in the country, as well as in other countries in the region.

But Manickchand insists that the 2010 document is in contradiction to the reports issued over the years by the US that have noted Guyana's efforts to implement the Combating Trafficking in Persons Act and has made significant efforts to enhance assistance for victims of trafficking. She said that over the years the US State Department reports also acknowledged that Guyana has increased its efforts to prevent trafficking and protect victims and vulnerable persons who may be potential victims.

She said that the US has never asserted that Guyana's non-compliance with minimum standards and its Tier 2 rank are a result of its failure to charge and or prosecute persons who are alleged to have been involved in TIP.

"It has always been because we fail to churn out mass numbers of prosecutions and convictions," she said, adding that Guyana will make no apology for not prosecuting a large number of persons for TIP since citizens are presumed to be innocent until proven guilty by a court of competent jurisdiction.

"If a magistrate cites lack of evidence or if a victim withdraws from a matter or refuse to give evidence, it is the duty of the court to acquit or discharge the accused and to do anything else would be to render an injustice to a citizen who is guaranteed the right to a fair trial and due process," she added.

Source: Caribbean Media Corporation news agency website, Bridgetown, in English 1510 gmt 15 Jun 10

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2010 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

185 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Caribbean Net News, Grand Cayman, Cayman Islands

Distributed by McClatchy-Tribune Business News

June 15, 2010 Tuesday

Guyana remains a Tier 2 country on US State Department's human trafficking watch list

BYLINE: Caribbean Net News, Grand Cayman, Cayman Islands

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 833 words

Jun. 15--GEORGETOWN, Guyana -- Guyana remains on tier two of the United States' State Department trafficking in persons report 2010, which was released on Monday.

The CARICOM nation was placed on tier 2 three years ago has retained that spot. According to the report, this is as a result of Guyana's failure to implement recommendations made by the United States over the past three years.

"The Government of Guyana does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. Despite these efforts, the government did not initiate any new prosecutions of trafficking offenses during the reporting period and has yet to convict or punish any trafficking offenders under its five-year old anti-human trafficking law," the report said.

As such, it noted that Guyana is placed on Tier 2 Watch List for the fourth consecutive year.

"During the reporting period, the government and NGOs identified four victims of trafficking, two of whom prison officials proactively identified," the report said, noting that "The government provided some resources toward victim protection and local anti-trafficking groups, no suspected traffickers were charged, limiting the level of safety and protection that could be provided to victims."

According to the TIP 2010 report, while the government took some "tangible" steps to raise awareness of human trafficking, including the establishment of focal point groups and an anti-trafficking task force, "some local observers felt that the government discouraged discussions on developing effective strategies for combating this phenomenon of modern-day slavery."

The 2010 report said Guyana is a source country for men, women, and children subjected to trafficking in persons, specifically conditions of forced prostitution and forced labour. Guyanese trafficking victim cases have been identified in the country, as well as in other countries in the region.

It noted that identified foreign victims have come from Venezuela and Brazil. Forced prostitution occurs in brothels on the coast and around mining camps as well as in rum shops and Chinese restaurants.

"The common Guyanese practice of poor, rural families sending children to live with higher income family members or acquaintances in more populated areas has the potential to evolve into forced domestic servitude," the report said.

It added that trafficking victims in Guyana may not self-identify to authorities due to fear of retribution from trafficking offenders, fear of resettlement to abusive home situations, and lack of awareness that human trafficking is a crime.

Groups particularly vulnerable to human trafficking in Guyana include Amerindian females, foreign women (such as Brazilians) in prostitution, and children. During the reporting period the US Department of Labor reported results of a project that withdrew 984 children from exploitive child labour in logging and saw-milling, fishing, hazardous farming, factory work, mining, and freight handling from 2005 to 2009.

The report meanwhile urged that the administration "greatly increase efforts to prosecute, convict, and punish trafficking offenders, including any government officials complicit in human trafficking; offer legal alternatives to removal for foreign trafficking victims; encourage law enforcement and other officials as well as NGOs to identify trafficking victims and refer them for assistance."

It also highlighted the need to encourage police, the Ministry of Labour, and the Forest Service to employ formalized procedures, based on recognized trafficking indicators, as part of routine inspections to identify additional victims; ensure trafficking-specific shelter and care is offered to identified victims of trafficking; foster a climate of open discussion about the scope and magnitude of Guyana's human trafficking problem.

It called for enhanced partnerships with NGOs to boost the trust of trafficking victims in law enforcement personnel and raise awareness among the general population about all forms of human trafficking.

The Guyana government is, however, arguing that the report is not a true reflection of the actual situation since there have been significant steps to address this problem.

The government noted too that the report magnifies the situation as the level of human trafficking here is very minimal and that several persons have been charged and prosecuted, with some receiving sentence for this offence.

The government said it will be responding officially to the report soon.

To see more of the Caribbean Net News or to subscribe to the newspaper, go to <http://www.caribbeannetnews.com/>. Copyright (c) 2010, Caribbean Net News, Grand Cayman, Cayman Islands Distributed by McClatchy-Tribune Information Services. For reprints, email tmsreprints@permissionsgroup.com, call 800-374-7985 or 847-635-6550, send a fax to 847-635-6968, or write to The Permissions Group Inc., 1247 Milwaukee Ave., Suite 303, Glenview, IL 60025, USA.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

ACC-NO: 20100615-1CB-Guyana-remains-a-Tier-2-country-on-US-State-Department-s-human-trafficking-watch-list-0615

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: 1CB

186 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Channel NewsAsia

June 15, 2010 Tuesday 9:44 AM GMT

MFA questions US human trafficking report which downgraded Singapore's ranking

SECTION: SINGAPORE NEWSLENGTH: 178 wordsDATELINE: SINGAPORE

Singapore's Foreign Ministry (MFA) has questioned a US Department of State's human trafficking report which has downgraded Singapore's ranking on the issue of human trafficking.

The "Trafficking in Persons Report 2010", which was released on Monday, put Singapore on a watch list this year.

MFA is puzzled and said the US has not satisfactorily explained how it had arrived at this conclusion.

In a statement, the Ministry added the Singapore Government is committed to tackling the human trafficking issue, and its efforts in dealing with the issue have not weakened since last year.

MFA said it will respond in detail as appropriate in due course.

It stressed that the report is more a political ritual than an objective study.

The Singapore Government questioned how the US could rank itself in Tier One, when it is well known that the US has been unable to stem a flood of illegal workers, many of whom are trafficked by organised criminal gangs.

MFA suggested that the US should perhaps examine its own record more carefully before presuming to pronounce on other countries.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

187 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Daily Mirror (Sri Lanka)

June 15, 2010 Tuesday

Lanka must probe traffickers

LENGTH: 338 wordsDATELINE: Sri Lanka

Sri Lanka, June 15 -- The 2010 US State Department Trafficking in Person's Report has recommended that Sri Lanka investigate and prosecute suspected trafficking offences and convict and punish trafficking offenders particularly those who are responsible for recruiting victims with fraudulent offers of employment and excessive commission fees.

The report states that Sri Lanka does not fully comply with the minimum standards of elimination but is making a noteworthy effort to do so. The report also states that although the government has enacted a law that facilitates the prosecution of recruitment engaged in fraudulent recruitment, it has made little progress in identifying trafficking victims.

As a result of these reasons, Sri Lanka has been placed on the Tier 2 Watch List in the 2010 Trafficking in Person's Report. The reports also appreciated the efforts made by the Foreign Employment Bureau to conduct public outreach programs to warn people of the dangers of going abroad illegally and using unlicensed recruitment to find employment. The government also carried out raids in 184 fraudulent foreign recruiting and took legal against some of them.

Commenting on the report, the Chairman of the Sri Lanka Foreign Employment Bureau, Kingsley Ranawaka said that they conduct investigations when they receive complaints regarding fraudulent recruitment and that they produce them to courts after they are arrested.

He added that they have even taken measures to increase the fine imposed on fraudulent.

Ranawaka added that last year, the Foreign Employment Bureau made it mandatory for migrant workers to come and sign their agreements at the Bureau before they take up employment. He added that if there are any complaints to be made, migrant workers can easily gain access to the staff at the Foreign Employment Bureau to make their complaints. Published by HT Syndication with permission from Daily Mirror Sri Lanka. For more information on news feed please contact Sarabjit Jagirdar at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

188 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Daily the Pak Banker

June 15, 2010 Tuesday

Human Trafficking: India on Tier II Watch List

LENGTH: 465 words

DATELINE: Washington

Washington, June 15 -- US today placed India on Tier Two watch list of human trafficking arguing that New Delhi has not demonstrated sufficient progress in its law enforcement, protection, or prevention efforts to address labour trafficking, particularly bonded labour.

This is the seventh consecutive year that India has been placed in Tier Two Watch list of its annual report on human trafficking. The 10th annual Trafficking in Persons Report was released by the State Department today.

The report recommended that India strengthen central and state government law enforcement capacity to conduct intra-state and interstate law enforcement activities against labour trafficking (including bonded labour) and sex trafficking.

It also urged India to encourage state and district governments to file bonded labour cases under the appropriate criminal statutes to facilitate speedier justice and limit traffickers' opportunities for bail; encourage other states to establish Immoral Trafficking.

The report said India is a source, destination, and transit country for men, women, and children subjected to trafficking in persons, specifically forced labour and commercial sexual exploitation.

It said the Indian government does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so, particularly with regard to the law enforcement response to sex trafficking.

Despite these efforts, the Indian government has not demonstrated sufficient progress in its law enforcement, protection, or prevention efforts to address labour trafficking, particularly bonded labour; the report said explaining the reason why India has been placed in Tier Two of the Watch List.

Tier Two Watch List is a list of those countries whose governments do not fully comply with the Trafficking Victims Protection Acts' minimum standards, but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards.

In her remarks, the Secretary of State, Hillary Clinton, said, the Report, for the first time, includes a ranking of the United States based on the same standards to which it hold other countries.

"The United States takes its first-ever ranking not as a reprieve but as a responsibility to strengthen global efforts against modern slavery, including those within America. This human rights abuse is universal, and no one should claim immunity from its reach or from the responsibility to confront it," she said.

The 10th annual Trafficking in Persons Report outlines the continuing challenges across the globe, including in the United States, Clinton said Published by HT Syndication with permission from Daily Pak Banker. For more information on news feed please contact Sarabjit Jagirdar at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 Right Vision News
All Rights Reserved

189 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Gulf Daily News

June 15, 2010

Waging war on trafficking

BYLINE: MOHAMMED AL A'ALI

LENGTH: 480 words

BAHRAIN pledged yesterday to continue combating human trafficking and make it national objective, regardless of international recognition for measures it has already achieved.

The declaration comes after it was announced yesterday that Bahrain is being recognised for continuing significant efforts and being excluded from among nations under watch listed in the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report.

Foreign Ministry Under-Secretary Dr Abdulla Abdullatif praised Bahrain's progress, but said that the country was keen to achieve more in its efforts to eliminate human trafficking.

Bahrain has already implemented a law specifically dealing with human trafficking, set up a special department in the Public Prosecution, a hotline and shelter to help victims, he said.

The report ranks nations in three categories or tiers based on measures they take in accordance with US laws to combat human trafficking.

In tier one are countries whose governments fully comply with the US Trafficking Victims Protection Act's minimum standards, while in tier two are those who do not fully comply with the minimum standards but are making significant efforts to comply.

Bahrain has been in the second category watch list since 2008 after it was in tier three in 2007, which are countries that do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so.

However, despite remaining in the second category, Bahrain's efforts resulted in it being removed from the report's watch list.

Dr Abdullatif said that Bahrain's main aim was not the report's first tier, which he hoped the country would achieve next year, but in having the full implementation of legislation that would eliminate human trafficking.

"It is not about climbing a ladder on a report, it is more about combating human trafficking in Bahrain," said Dr Abdullatif, who is also National Committee to Combat Human Trafficking chairman, at a Press conference.

"There is no pinnacle for us to reach since international standards change frequently and we have to be in line with them.

"As the world looks for ways to put a stop to human trafficking, those committing violations look for loopholes to get around the measures that are being taken."

Dr Abdullatif said that Bahrain was interested in improving the living conditions of expatriate labourers in Bahrain.

"We have formed a committee which is co-operating with embassies concerned, especially of Asian countries, to help raise awareness about not surrendering passports to employers even if they are forced to do so," he said.

Under the country's laws, forcing employees to surrender their passports is a crime that could be punished with up to seven years in prison.

"If the employee willingly gives in the passport as in most cases, we can't take any legal action against the employer, as there is no case of human trafficking."

alaali@gdn.com.bh

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: 5

Copyright 2010 Gulf Daily News - Hilal Publishing and Marketing Group.
All Rights Reserved
Syndigate.info, Al Bawaba.com

190 of 404 DOCUMENTS

IZ Reloaded via Twitter

June 15, 2010 Tuesday 12:00 AM ESTIZ Reloaded via Twitter*BYLINE: IZ ReloadedLENGTH: 564 words

Jun. 15, 2010 (Newstex Newstwits delivered by Newstex) --

"My cough is getting worse. Time for wood's peppermint cough syrup."
sup06-15-2010 at 09:49:20 UTCsup

'US put Singapore on human trafficking watch list, says SG fails to prevent women from being forced into prostitution.'
sup06-15-2010 at 10:18:08 UTCsup

"I've been informed that the Wonder Girls reached Singapore at 11.35 am. I can't wait to meet the girls tomorrow at their media conference."

sup06-15-2010 at 10:23:34 UTCsup

"I'm meeting the Wonder Girls tomorrow. Do you have any question for them?"
sup06-15-2010 at 10:54:54 UTCsup

'Just found out that my first ever girlfriend got engaged to a very ugly guy.'
sup06-15-2010 at 11:18:10 UTCsup

"You guys rock! RT hey! i'm admin of sgwonderfuls. compiling the questions now and will mail you in a moment! #wginsg"
sup06-15-2010 at 11:22:28 UTCsup

'Got any questions for Wonder Girls tomorrow? wants to know what plastic surgery did they do? LOL'
sup06-15-2010 at 11:27:07 UTCsup

"Video: Top 10 World Cup Goalkeeping Blunders. Cheer up Robert Green. You're not alone. #worldcup"
sup06-15-2010 at 11:45:29 UTCsup

'Wonder Girls media conference tomorrow morning. Send me your questions quick so that I can compile them. #wginsg'
sup06-15-2010 at 14:41:35 UTCsup

'I was blowing my nose and coughing non stop at work today. Hopefully no one gets sick because of me.'
sup06-15-2010 at 15:07:08 UTCsup

"Anyone knows a quick remedy for cough? I don't wanna be coughing when I meet Wonder Girls tomorrow. Don't want them to run away."
sup06-15-2010 at 15:09:12 UTCsup

'Excellent cough remedy from : i used to drink cold soya bean milk or eat ice cream whenever i have cough :)'
sup06-15-2010 at 15:28:14 UTCsup

"Maybe I shouldn't be too shock when my first gf got engaged to a very ugly guy. All my exs ended up with Shrek like creatures."
sup06-15-2010 at 15:32:32 UTCsup

'Moral of the story is: Break up with me and your future husband is one ugly mother fucker.'
sup06-15-2010 at 15:33:43 UTCsup

'Good news. Just got a tip. Wonder Girls are safely back in their hotel after their Night Safari adventure. Thank god no tigers eat them up.'
sup06-15-2010 at 15:47:00 UTCsup

"Won't be watching Brazil vs North Korea. Need to sleep. Hopefully I'll be better tomorrow. BTW, go North Korea! All hail Kim Jong il!!!!"
sup06-15-2010 at 16:24:56 UTCsup

"How can I be with another? I don't want any other. I want nobody, nobody but you. "
sup06-15-2010 at 23:39:02 UTCsup

"On the way to marina bay sands to meet the wonder girls. Damn it's raining heavily"
sup06-16-2010 at 02:18:53 UTCsup

'Outside the room where the wonder girls media conference will be held. '
sup06-16-2010 at 02:41:56 UTCsup

'Waiting for wonder girls to enter the room '
sup06-16-2010 at 03:02:15 UTCsup

'The wonder girls are late for their own media conference. Probably too tired after last nights night safari adventure'
sup06-16-2010 at 03:28:00 UTCsup

'The wonder girls are walking from their hotel to the conference room. Shld be here in 5 mins.'
sup06-16-2010 at 03:41:05 UTCsup

"The wonder girls media conference is finally over. Here's a shot of the girls. "
sup06-16-2010 at 04:39:31 UTCsup

"I'm so much in love with yubin. She's so fucking hot at the wonder girls media conference just now. "
sup06-16-2010 at 04:58:51 UTCsup

'River forms in the middle of Orchard Road. The videos! '
sup06-16-2010 at 06:46:54 UTCsup

Newstex ID: IZR-5230-46121761

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

NOTES: The views expressed on blogs distributed by Newstex and its re-distributors ("Blogs on DemandÆ") are solely the author's and not necessarily the views of Newstex or its re-distributors. Posts from such authors are provided "AS IS", with no warranties, and confer no rights. The material and information provided in Blogs on DemandÆ are for general information only and should not, in any respect, be relied on as professional advice. No content on such Blogs on DemandÆ is "read and approved" before it is posted. Accordingly, neither Newstex nor its re-distributors make any claims, promises or guarantees about the accuracy, completeness, or adequacy of the information contained therein or linked to from such blogs, nor take responsibility for any aspect of such blog content. All content on Blogs on DemandÆ shall be construed as author-based content and commentary. Accordingly, no warranties or other guarantees will be offered as to the quality of the opinions, commentary or anything else offered on such Blogs on DemandÆ. Reader's comments reflect their individual opinion and their publication within Blogs on DemandÆ shall not infer or connote an endorsement by Newstex or its re-distributors of such reader's comments or views. Newstex and its re-distributors expressly reserve the right to delete posts and comments at its and their sole discretion.

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Blog

Copyright 2010 Newstex LLC
All Rights Reserved
Newstex Web Blogs
Copyright 2010 IZ Reloaded via Twitter

191 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

June 15, 2010 Tuesday 11:55 AM GMT

Singapore slams U.S. for downgrading ranking on human trafficking

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 380 words

DATELINE: SINGAPORE June 15

The Singaporean government on Tuesday blasted the United States for downgrading the country's ranking in government efforts to crack down on human trafficking.

The Foreign Ministry said the U.S. State Department's "Trafficking in Persons Report 2010," released Monday, was "more a political ritual than an objective study."

"The U.S. should perhaps examine its own record more carefully before presuming to pronounce on other countries," the ministry said in a statement.

It questioned how the United States could give itself the best ranking -- "Tier 1" -- "when it is well-known that the U.S. has been unable to stem a flood of illegal workers, many of whom are trafficked by organized criminal gangs."

Singapore was downgraded a notch in the U.S. ranking list, placed on the so-called "Tier 2 watch list," down from the higher "Tier 2" last year.

"It is rather puzzling because the U.S. has not satisfactorily explained how it had arrived at its conclusions," the Foreign Ministry said, adding that it will respond in detail soon.

The U.S. report has four tiers for ranking countries: Tier 1 for countries that fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; a Tier 2 for those that do not fully comply but are making significant efforts to improve the situation, a Tier 2 watch list for countries which are trying to improve and yet failed to provide evidence of raising their efforts to combat human trafficking and where the number of victims is continuing to rise, and a Tier 3 for countries that have not been making any efforts to comply with the minimum standards.

The report says "Singapore is a destination country for women and girls subjected to trafficking in persons, specifically forced prostitution, and for some migrant workers in conditions that may be indicative of forced labor."

"Some women from Thailand, the Philippines, and China are recruited in their home countries with offers of legitimate employment but upon arrival in Singapore, are deceived or coerced into forced prostitution," it says.

The report says there has been no indication of "increasing efforts to prosecute and punish forced labor offenses or to identify both victims of sex trafficking and victims of forced labor. Therefore, Singapore is placed on Tier 2 Watch List."

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

192 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Korea Times

June 15, 2010 Tuesday

NK one of 13 worst human trafficking countries

LENGTH: 334 words

North Korea remains one of the worst countries in human trafficking, along with 12 other nations, Yonhap News reported Monday.

The 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report of the State Department categorized North Korea with other Tier 3 countries that "do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so" under the Trafficking Victims Protection Act.

The congressionally mandated report cited North Koreans subjected to human trafficking in neighboring China while seeking food, work and freedom.

"North Korea continues to be a Tier 3 country in this year's report," Luis Cdebaca, director of the office to monitor and combat trafficking in persons, told reporters.

"We have not seen any indication that the North Korean government is actually addressing the human-trafficking problem."

North Korea has been on the list since 2003.

The other countries with the worst records are Congo, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Eritrea, Iran, Kuwait, Mauritania, Myanmar, Papua New Guinea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan and Zimbabwe.

The U.S. government imposes financial sanctions and a ban on humanitarian aid on Tier 3 countries for two straight years.

South Korea was listed among Tier 1 countries, which fully comply with the minimum standards on human trafficking.

"The Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK or North Korea) is a source country for men, women, and children who are subjected to trafficking in persons, specifically forced labor and forced prostitution," the report said.

"The most common form of trafficking involves North Korean women and girls forced into marriage or prostitution in China. Women and girls from North Korea migrate to China, often with the help of a facilitator, seeking food, work, freedom, and better life prospects."

China has been under criticism for repatriating North Korean refugees under a secret agreement with North Korea, categorizing defectors as economic immigrants rather than refugees, despite the danger of them being persecuted back home.

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

193 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Malaysia General News

June 15, 2010 TuesdayMORE OPERATIONS TO RESCUE HUMAN TRAFFICKING VICTIMS*LENGTH: 202 wordsDATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR June 15

In continuous efforts to rescue victims and rout human trafficking syndicates, the police would conduct more operations, Criminal Investigation Department director Datuk Seri Mohd Bakri Zinin said today.

He said policemen would be assigned to 'hot spots' such as the Melaka Straits and South China Sea as they were identified as main entry points for syndicates to traffick victims abroad.

He was commenting on a report yesterday, which quoted Home Minister Datuk Seri Hishammuddin Tun Hussein as saying that Malaysia had risen to Tier 2 of Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP) 2010 released by the US Department of State.

Mohd Bakri said the force would strengthen and expand its Anti-Human Trafficking Unit by cooperating with other countries, such as Australia, Canada and the US.

In addition, he said, policemen would undergo courses related to anti-human trafficking to enable them to be more equipped when carrying out investigations into the syndicates.

"We will also tighten existing laws affecting human trafficking, which involves enforcement agencies, such as the immigration, customs and the like," he said.

According to the TIP 2009 published on June 16, last year, Malaysia had fallen from Tier 2 to Tier 3.

LOAD-DATE: June 22, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

194 of 404 DOCUMENTS

New Straits Times (Malaysia)

June 15, 2010 Tuesday

Malaysia goes up to Tier 2

BYLINE: Eileen Ng

SECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 9

LENGTH: 208 words

KUALA LUMPUR: Malaysia's efforts in fighting human trafficking has been recognised by the United States.

The country has been elevated from Tier 3 to Tier 2 in this year's Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report, which was released by the US State Department yesterday.

The news was conveyed to Home Minister Datuk Seri Hishammuddin Hussein by the US embassy.

"I have received a letter from the embassy today informing me that Malaysia's ranking for 2010 has been upgraded from Tier 3 to Tier 2.

"This is a recognition of our efforts in combating human trafficking. I congratulate the ministry's officials and other relevant agencies," he said at the Parliament lobby yesterday.

Lack of progress in combating the scourge in 2008 led Malaysia to be downgraded from the Tier 2 Watch List to Tier 3 (blacklisted countries) in the 2009 TIP report.

The 2009 report listed Malaysia as one of 17 countries not doing enough to curb human trafficking. It said Malaysia was a destination, source and transit country for women and children trafficked for commercial and sexual purposes and forced labour.

Countries listed under Tier 2 are those that do not fully comply with the minimum standards but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance.

(END)

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

195 of 404 DOCUMENTS

RTT News (United States)

June 15, 2010 Tuesday

Singapore Dismisses US Report On Human Trafficking As Subjective

LENGTH: 279 words

(RTTNews) - Singapore, which has been placed on the U.S. human trafficking watch list, dismissed Tuesday the U.S. report as "more a political ritual than an objective study."

In the Trafficking In Persons Report 2010 released on Monday, the U.S. State Department added a number of Asian nations to its watch list - Afghanistan, Brunei, Laos, Maldives, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam - accusing them of failing to prevent women from being forced into prostitution.

It said Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam regressed last year in their efforts to battle trafficking in men, women and children for labor or commercial sex.

The report said while Singapore took "some significant new steps" against human trafficking, there were no "quantifiable indicators" that the government was identifying more victims or prosecuting more culprits.

A spokesman for Singapore's Ministry of Foreign Affairs termed the findings of the latest TIP report as "rather puzzling because the US has not satisfactorily explained how it had arrived at its conclusions."

The annual report presented by Secretary of State Hillary Clinton recognized improvements in Pakistan, which was taken off the watch list, and Malaysia, which was on the list but removed from the lowest category of countries that do not meet minimum standards.

Bangladesh, China, India, Micronesia, the Philippines and Sri Lanka remained on the list unchanged from a year earlier.

North Korea, Myanmar and Papua New Guinea remained at the bottom level of countries that do not even meet the minimum standards on human trafficking.

For comments and feedback: contact editorial@rttnews.com

Copyright(c) 2010 RTTNews.com, Inc. All Rights Reserved

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

196 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Singapore Government News

June 15, 2010 Tuesday 6:30 AM EST

Singapore Reacts Over US Trafficking Report

LENGTH: 102 words

Singapore, June 15: The government has reacted strongly to a US government report putting it on a human-trafficking watch list.

The 2010 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report had listed Singapore, along with other neighbours, as a country that could not prevent women from being forced into prostitution.

Singapore's foreign ministry said, "We have read the latest TIP report. It is rather puzzling because the US has not satisfactorily explained how it had arrived at its conclusions. We are committed to tackling the TIP issue, and our efforts in dealing with this issue have certainly not weakened since last year."

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

197 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Singapore Government News

June 15, 2010 Tuesday 6:30 AM ESTSingapore put on Human Trafficking Watch List*LENGTH: 119 words

Singapore, June 15 -- With the charge of not succeeding from saving women from being forced into prostitution, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam have been put on human trafficking watch list by the US. Pointing out Singapore, the report mentioned that some women from China, the Philippines and Thailand were tricked into coming here with promises of employment and were forced into the sex business.

Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, called human trafficking a 'terrible crime' as she presented the State Department's annual report and said, 'All of us have a responsibility to bring this practice to an end.' It was evident from the report that 12.3 million people were the victims of trafficking merely in 2009-2010.

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

198 of 404 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 15, 2010 Tuesday

RP STILL ON US TRAFFICKING WATCH LIST

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 812 words

DATELINE: MANILA

The following information was released by the government of the Philippines:

The United States is waiting to see labor traffickers sent to jail before it removes the Philippines from its Tier 2 watch list of countries that failed to curb human trafficking last year.

This is the second year in a row that the Philippines is on the Tier 2 watch list, making the country vulnerable to sanctions by next year if the situation does not improve.

Despite legal provisions designed to ensure a timely judicial process, trafficking cases in the Philippines take an average of three to four years to conclude, the US State Department said in its 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report released yesterday in Washington, DC.

It noted that despite rampant labor trafficking in the country, no conviction has yet been made since an anti-trafficking law was passed in 2003.

It added that the first ever conviction of a public official for sex trafficking only happened last year, referring to a September 2009 court ruling that sentenced a police officer caught four years earlier to have trafficked children at a nightclub he owned.

Greater progress in prosecution and conviction of both labor and sex trafficking offenders is essential for the Government of the Philippines to demonstrate significant and increasing progress toward compliance with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, the State Department said in the report.

While it acknowledged the Department of Justice's June 2009 order to have prosecutors prioritize trafficking cases, the US report noted there is no corresponding mechanism to do so in the Philippine court system where over 380 such cases are pending.

US State Secretary Hillary Clinton described the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report as very thorough, which also outlines how countries could be removed from Tier 3 or the Tier 2 watch list.

Tier 3 is a list of countries not making significant efforts to combat human trafficking.

Tier 2 countries are those making significant efforts, but others on the watch list are countries that failed to achieve much during the year in review.

Tier 1 countries are those deemed fully responsive to anti-human trafficking benchmarks. Overall, 177 countries are monitored in the report.

Countries come to us and ask very forcefully not to be dropped in their category and we hear them out and we tell them. And we increasingly tried last year to do that earlier in the process were going to do it even earlier this year to tell them the kinds of things that we would look to that would demonstrate the commitment that we think would make a difference, to talk about best practices, to share stories. And some countries have listened and the results speak for themselves. Others have not, she said during a press briefing.

The State Department's recommendations to the Philippines are:

Demonstrate greater progress on efficiently investigating, prosecuting, and convicting both labor and sex trafficking offenders involved in the trafficking of Filipinos in the country and abroad;

Increase efforts to vigorously investigate and prosecute government officials complicit in trafficking;

Dedicate more resources and personnel to prosecuting trafficking cases;

Devote increased resources to victim and witness protection, including for shelters;

Increase efforts to engage governments of destination countries through law enforcement and diplomatic channels in the investigation and prosecution of trafficking offenders;

Ensure the terms of Memorandums of Understanding (MOUs) with foreign countries hiring Filipino workers are met such that workers are adequately protected while abroad;

Assess methods to measure and address domestic labor trafficking; and continue to disseminate information on the 2003 Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act throughout the country and train law enforcement and social service officials, prosecutors, and judges on the use of the law.

In East Asia and the Pacific, also on the Tier 2 watch list are China, Macau, Laos, Thailand, Vietnam, Malaysia, Singapore, Brunei, Micronesia and Fiji.

On Tier 2 are Mongolia, Japan, Indonesia, Palau and Timor Leste. Among Tier 1 countries in the region are Australia, New Zealand, Taiwan and South Korea.

In contrast, on the negative list (Tier 3 countries) are North Korea, Burma and Papua New Guinea.

Trafficking law enforcement slackened in East Asia and the Pacific last year despite a 55-percent increase in the number of victims identified.

According to the report, the number of prosecutions slid from 1,083 in 2008 to a dismal 357 last year and in terms of convictions, from 643 to 256.

On a global scale, there was an eight-percent increase in trafficking prosecutions and a 40-percent increase in convictions last year compared to 2008.

There were 49,105 trafficking victims identified in 2009, which is almost 60 percent more than the previous years number.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

199 of 404 DOCUMENTS

State Department Documents and Publications

June 15, 2010

Ambassador CdeBaca on 10th Annual Trafficking in Persons Report; CdeBaca answers questions on modern slavery, sex and labor trafficking

SECTION: NEWS FROM AMERICA.COM AND THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 5305 words

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Office of the Spokesman, June 14, 2010

ON-THE-RECORD BRIEFING

Ambassador Luis CdeBaca, On the 10th Annual Trafficking in Persons Report, June 14, 2010

Washington, D.C.

MR. TONER: Good afternoon. Welcome to the State Department. As you know, Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton announced this morning the release of the 10th Annual Trafficking in Persons Report. This 177-country report is the most comprehensive worldwide report on the efforts of governments to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons.

In light of that, we're very fortunate to have with us today Ambassador-at-Large Luis CdeBaca of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons here to answer some of your questions and talk a little bit about the report in more detail. And just for your awareness, later on this week, Ambassador CdeBaca will participate on Tuesday in a congressional reception for the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Heroes that's hosted by the Helsinki Commission.

On Wednesday, June 16th, Ambassador CdeBaca will participate in a briefing on the Trafficking in Persons Report at the Foreign Press Center in New York, and that's at 10:00 a.m. And then at 1:00 p.m. that day, he'll deliver keynote remarks regarding the 2010 report at a panel discussion hosted by the U.S. Mission to the United Nations, the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime, and the Schuster Institute for Investigative Journalism at Brandeis University.

Without further ado, I'll hand it over to Ambassador CdeBaca.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you for the introduction, Mark.

Earlier this morning, Secretary Clinton publicly released the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report. The annual report provides a diagnosis of the global effort to combat modern slavery. This year, the report assessed 177 countries, including two special cases. Those special cases are Haiti and Somalia. Two countries were ranked for the first time, Kiribati and the United States.

It's important to highlight the significance of the U.S. ranking. As we work towards a lead-by-example diplomacy, it was common sense to include ourselves in this year's report. Data was collected across the interagency: prosecutions from Department of Justice, information from DHS, and victim services efforts by Department of Health and Human Services. We also collected information from state and local law enforcement, nongovernmental organizations, and governments.

The Trafficking in Persons Report has spurred action throughout the years by other countries to take a hard look at their internal efforts against trafficking. Finland is a good example. Just a couple weeks ago, they recently completed a self assessment similar to the United States of their trafficking in persons response, and we certainly look forward to other countries undertaking that type of self diagnostic.

Without a doubt, the United States continues to be the world leader on this issue. In the 10 years since President Clinton signed the Trafficking Victims Protection Act and the United Nations outlined the international community's anti-trafficking standards in the Palermo Protocol, we've seen much progress. And as diagnosed by this year's report, we still face a number of challenges.

The report discusses a host of those challenges, including the need for improved victims services. Whether in the United States or another country, we must treat victims as victims and not as criminals. We must look toward promising practices such as shelters that do not imprison victims, but instead allow for rehabilitation and recovery from the crimes committed against them.

The feminization of trafficking is a trend that we see in this year's report, and that's something that's expanding beyond the conventional stereotypes of sex trafficking. Today, more than 56 percent of trafficking in women -- are women and girls, and we see more and more women suffering from labor trafficking, specifically involuntary domestic servitude. These maids suffer in silence behind closed doors, and in some ways are the most vulnerable because they do not know anyone other than their captors.

Often, as I've personally seen while I prosecuted these cases at an earlier career at the Department of Justice, and as still holds true today, these women, and in some cases men and boys, are also forced into sex slavery by those who would hold them in involuntary domestic servitude. And I'd point out that in recent months, I think in the UAE, there have been a couple of prosecutions in which women who were brought in to the Emirates in order to be domestic servants were then prostituted out by their employers. So the connection between domestic servitude and sex slavery is something that we're starting to recognize more and more.

I would like to highlight some successes that are in the report, because even as we face challenges in our fight against modern slavery, there are more people around the world than ever before working on those human rights issues. I'll run through a few quick successes and then we can move to questions.

One success that I think is very noteworthy is that of Bosnia-Herzegovina, which this year is upgraded to Tier 1 on the report. Bosnia was on Tier 3 for many years at the beginning of this decade. And I think that a lot of people -- for a lot of people, the global fight against human trafficking first came to people's attention because of the widespread sex slavery and the widespread abuses in the Balkans during the various wars of the 1990s.

This is something that we've seen on the part of the Bosnian Government: clear progress, especially over the last year; significantly reducing its use of suspended sentences; imposing stronger penalties for convicted traffickers; partnering with nongovernmental organizations on victim protection; and employing proactive procedures to go out and identify and help victims. It is a sea change if you look at the trafficking issue over the course of the last decade that Bosnia would be ranked in the first tier of countries that are fully compliant with the minimum standards.

This year we also saw noteworthy success by the Government of Egypt. The Egyptian Government's progress in combating human trafficking over the last year is particularly evident in its enactment of a comprehensive law and its greater law enforcement and prevention efforts to confront fraudulent short-term marriages, often termed summer marriages, of Egyptian girls, which is a thinly veiled cover for the prostitution of children. Their activity against the summer marriages and, as the Secretary pointed out earlier this morning, the steps that they are taking towards starting shelters with some of the major hospitals in Cairo and Alexandria reflects the government's partnerships with international legal experts, the key of one of which was -- we were happy to be able to help fund from here at the State Department in collaboration with civil society. We're very encouraged by what we're seeing coming out of Egypt.

So, too, the Government of Pakistan, which was upgraded to Tier 2 this year, has dramatically increased the number of convictions and prosecutions for human trafficking, undertaking creative efforts to prevent bonded labor. Behind this enhanced commitment, particularly a greater focus on bonded labor, are stronger partnerships with United States Government and international organizations on the issue of trafficking in persons.

Some of you may recall, some of you may have covered, a situation last fall -- August and September -- in which over 170 Pakistani nationals, victims of bonded laborers, were taken hostage by feudal landlords in Sind Province in retaliation for actually seeking a habeas corpus writ to free them from debt bondage in court. What they got for their troubles was confined and jailed by the landlords and their henchmen, their guards. The Secretary raised this and, in fact, civil society actors asked her about it in her October visit to Islamabad. Simultaneously, as that was going on, local police were in the process of liberating those people. And we certainly appreciate the activities and the actions taken by the Pakistani Government to fight that situation.

Another success, Malaysia upgraded this year to Tier 2 watch list. You may recall that last year Malaysia was downgraded to Tier 3. Over the course of the last year, the Malaysian authorities have acknowledged and begun to tackle their serious human trafficking problem, including intensified engagement with foreign governments. For the first time, the government formed partnerships with nongovernmental organizations to work in partnership. And as a result of their work with the United Nations interagency anti-TIP program out of Bangkok, they identified and assisted victims of forced labor on fishing boats on the coast of Sarawak. Those initial cases of labor trafficking, as well as what they're doing on sex trafficking, is certainly heartening as far as the commitment that is beginning to be shown by the Government of Malaysia.

One final success that I'd like to highlight, although there are many more in the book, and that is the action on the part of the Government of Syria, which was, this year, upgraded to the Tier 2 watch list from Tier 3, where it had been for years. In Syria, partnerships with international organizations and NGOs contributed to the progress. It included its enhancement of an anti-trafficking law, enactment of two decrees to better protect foreign domestic workers, and opening a second shelter for trafficking victims in Aleppo, which added to a preexisting government-supported shelter in Damascus. Again, we see much of the problem in Syria and much of the activity now to protect the workers coming with the issues of foreign domestic workers, the maids who have been brought into Syria. So we see that kind of increased political role on that government as well as many others. And again, we are encouraged.

We look at -- as the Secretary said today, we look at this not as an exercise in finger-wagging or calling out, but rather, diagnosing ourselves and countries around the world so that we can work together in partnership. I appreciate your attention and we'll take a few questions.

I know you had one to begin with.

QUESTION: A couple. One, just in very simple terms, can you explain why the U.S. Government feels that it is beneficial to rate itself? Does it add to your credibility when you talk to others?

Second, the Secretary alluded to some countries who had reached out to the U.S. Government, trying not to be left in low categories or dropped down to them. And can you give us some sense of who those are? Tier 3, for example, this year yet again includes both Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, countries with enormous resources and yet they have been very durable presences in that bottom category. Were they the ones trying to get off it or were they just making no real efforts?

And then lastly, could you address the question of Switzerland, which is on Tier 2 -- not the watchlist, but Tier 2? Again, a country with significant resources; why has it not been possible for the Swiss to do better?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, there's several questions. I'll try to take them in descending order. As far as the self assessment, one of the things that we've seen over the last few years is a number of countries, often in Europe, have put into the -- in place the practice of what's called the national rapporteurs. And they often, like an -- kind of like an ombudsman, are assessing the anti-trafficking efforts within that country.

We have seen that as a helpful activity on the part of those governments, as -- to the degree that they are honest, to the degree that they confront not just successes, but also challenges. And so we felt that the United States needed that as a diagnostic tool for ourselves, that the Obama Administration is committed to applying the same diagnostics that we would apply to other countries.

So when we looked at the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking in persons that we are statutorily bound to apply to the other countries of the world, not only did we feel that it was only fair and just that we apply those same minimum standards, but also that it would be helpful to run the United States anti-trafficking activities through that analytical framework. And so, as I said, we encourage other countries not simply to look to our report for their own self assessment, but to perform their own as well.

Switzerland, I think, is in the process of doing that. We stand ready to continue to work with the Swiss. They're -- in our review this year and working with the Swiss Government, we did identify a gap in their law that created a loophole in which children at the ages of 16 and 17 could legally participate in prostitution. And since the law here in the United States as far as the minimum standards as well as the international norms of the Palermo Protocol and otherwise make 18 a very bright line. Even for countries that have legalized prostitution, the child prostitution situation was something that had to be dealt with.

And I've already spoken with the Swiss ambassador. We've -- we're talking to the Swiss as to how we can -- as -- in partnership, work through some of the legal challenges that they face. And we do see commitment from them to address these issues.

QUESTION: And it would require legislation (inaudible)? And could it be done by, you know, regulations or something?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I wouldn't speculate on the various ways that the Swiss could actually handle this. One of the issues, of course, with Switzerland is when you're dealing at the cantonal level with law enforcement issues, some countries can change their entire trafficking regime overnight simply by passing a federal law. Others have to do it --

QUESTION: Locally?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: -- state by state, locality by locality. And I think that that's something that the Swiss are looking at as --

QUESTION: Was this a problem last year?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: It's a situation that I think --

QUESTION: I mean, I just don't understand how the -- I mean, was -- did something change over the last year to get them dropped from Tier 1?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: The law and the loophole was extant for quite a while. I think that our recognition of it --

QUESTION: Ah, okay.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: -- as we --

QUESTION: So basically, they should have been on Tier 2 last year or -- and the year before?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I wouldn't speculate backwards. I certainly would let -- this year's ranking speaks for itself.

QUESTION: And then how about Kuwait and Saudi Arabia?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: And then Kuwait and Saudi Arabia --

QUESTION: And then who else was trying to -- who was trying to get themselves out of the --

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, I mean, we have yet to see a country come to us and ask to be put on a lower tier ranking. So I think that as we work with the countries throughout the year, there's always the desire to move up in the tier rankings. What we then look for is: What are the actions? What are the activities?

In both Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, we have seen some beginning of action and we will continue to work with them, whether it's the Kuwaitis starting to at least discuss the extension of certain labor protections to foreign workers in Kuwait, or whether it's the Saudi Arabia example in which this spring they did pass a first draft of an anti-trafficking law. In both countries, we would like to see enhanced victim services. In the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia especially, the situation for escaped maids and escaped workers is -- continues to be untenable, in no small part because of the situation where the employer has to kind of countersign the exit visas for the person who they sponsored. Even if that person was running away from the employer for abuse, that employer still has the power to block them from leaving and going home or getting another job.

So we are certainly going to work with the governments both of Kuwait and Saudi Arabia as far as how they can address these situations, not because we're trying to figure out how do we get them onto a different tier; it's how do we get the situation for workers in those countries to be better. The tiers then follow.

Yes.

QUESTION: You said earlier this morning, and it's also in the report which I haven't, of course, read all of, that the United States is a source country for human trafficking. What does that mean? Are you saying that there are U.S. citizens around the country that are trafficking women and children and taking advantage of people that are here for temporary working visas, or are you saying that there's people that are coming in from outside the country that are operating these trafficking rings and those kinds of things? What does it -- because it doesn't seem to specify that in here.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I hate to say this, but the answer is kind of yes. The -- what we have in the United States is a situation where there are homegrown traffickers who are enslaving people in various segments of the economy, and some of those end up enslaving American citizens, some of those end up enslaving foreign nationals. Some of the foreign nationals who are here were recruited in their home countries and brought here by people who intended to do that all along. Others may have immigrated and then, once they're here, get trapped.

I'd actually -- and I know you have a very busy day, but if people have a chance, the Coalition of Immokalee Workers Slavery Museum, which is out in the parking lot right now, breaks this down, I think, pretty well, in that it talks -- it has some of the artifacts not just from cases with men and women from Mexico and Guatemala who are enslaved in Florida picking crops, but African American men from Florida who spoke English who don't have those same issues of being a foreign person or afraid of the immigration or something like that, African American men being enslaved in agriculture in Florida within the last five, six years.

QUESTION: By U.S. citizens or by --

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: By U.S. citizens. So it's a very multifaceted way that it ends up manifesting. And in sex trafficking, then there's also the difference between those who are enslaving immigrant women in prostitution and those who are enslaving U.S. citizen women and girls. It's often runaways. In those situations, those cases have historically been dealt with in the United States under the prostitution statutes rather than under the involuntary servitude and slavery statutes, though what's happening in some of the situations is that the pimps are actually enslaving the women that are working for them.

QUESTION: One quick thing. Can you explain special cases -- what that is, Haiti and -- what was the other country?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Somalia. Haiti and Somalia are special cases in no small part because of the capacity of the government. When we have a functional government, even a very haltingly functional government, then that country not only gets assessed but actually ranked. In both Haiti and Somalia, it continues to be our position that those governments are not sufficiently operative to actually give them a ranking in the report.

QUESTION: Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Yes.

QUESTION: Yes. Back on the case of Cuba, I'm wondering what actually is the justification for the -- I mean, I read a little bit, but it sounds -- it seems like the U.S. might be open to charges of political ranking. I'm just trying to get why Cuba is on Tier 3.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, I think that one of the things that we see for Cuba is that there is no law against this practice. There's some other laws that could be cobbled together perhaps in order to prosecute a trafficker, but there's no evidence that that has actually been done. I think one of the things that we also look at there is, again, the age of legal prostitution. Again, children are -- can legally be in prostitution at ages 16 and 17.

We also see the lack of human trafficking protections and no training for the police, prosecutors, or social workers on what to do if one sees a human trafficking situation. So in a country where not only do you have a -- such a large tourist industry, other countries in the region that draw tourists from the same places as Cuba, have large child sex tourism problems, and are working to address those, we don't see the same activity in Cuba. So it's a multifaceted approach as far as why they would end up on Tier 3.

QUESTION: Can you comment on North Korea? And also, what do you say to China, where a lot of North Korean human trafficking is actually happening?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, North Korea continues to be a Tier 3 country in this year's report. We have not seen any indication that the North Korean Government is actually addressing the human trafficking problem.

One of the issues, of course, that we have when we look at the northeastern part of China is that there is the North Korean refugee community, that population. What we'd like to see from the Government of China is that there would be actual screening of people within that refugee flow to see which are the people who are actually trafficking victims. We're not saying that every one of them necessarily is, but we've had enough reports, whether it's of forced labor, whether it's of forced marriages, of enough reports of abuse coming out of that region that we'd like to see more screening and then more victim protections on the part of the Chinese Government.

When it comes to North Korea, I think that one of the issues that we're looking at is not simply the lack of a legal regime in order to address human trafficking or to be able to prosecute traffickers or rehabilitate the victims or do any of the things that even are the baseline to be working on it, but also when the North Korean Government exports labor to other countries, are those people in the places that they're going -- do they have a modicum of freedom there or is the government sending, whether it's police or security services or others with them in order to keep them in line.

And so we've expressed concern, as have some of the governments of Western Europe. I think it was the Czech Republic actually terminated their contracts with the North Korean Labor Export Company because of their concerns of the type of abuse that was happening with the exported North Korean laborers.

Yes.

QUESTION: (Inaudible) the situation in Taiwan. It had been moved from Tier 2 to Tier 1 year. And is there any special reason for such a movement?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, one of the things that, hopefully, jumps out at you as you read the report this year - - and if not, I'll give it a little bit of a boost -- is the need for more victim protections and the need for a victim response that's not based on detaining the victims. If you take somebody out of a servitude situation where they've had their freedom denied, you take them out, ostensibly rescuing them, and then you put them into a detention center, then that is not necessarily going to win any cases, it's not necessarily going to rehabilitate the victim, it's not really honoring the ethos of the UN protocol on what you're supposed to do as far as the 3-P approach of prevention, protection, and prosecution.

Taiwan -- and one of the things that we've seen that occasioned the upgrade this year is that the victim services side has been addressed. So for the first time, their new comprehensive law, which is very well-conceived, has now come into force. And one of the things that it allows is it allows for victims to work, to be able stay in Taiwan, to get jobs with other employers, and to work while their cases are being investigated.

So many countries around the world when you go to a shelter -- first of all, it might look more like a detention center, but the victims are just there being warehoused -- these are people who are coming out of a tremendously abusive situation. The research shows that most of them haven't even gotten to the point of having Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder; they're still in trauma for the first 90 days or so when they're coming out of this slavery situation. Taiwan has recognized that, has studied it, and has actually acted to make sure that these people are not just put in jail after they get liberated.

QUESTION: I haven't read the report yet, but I was just wondering if you can address this issue of trafficking from China and the Indian subcontinent -- India, Pakistan, Sri Lanka, and Bangladesh -- which usually come to Europe and Africa and then they are brought to U.S. through -- by land or sea, from Mexico. And this is -- it's very much related to the -- the terrorists can use this network.

And another thing was the financial network which is called hawala, which is word-of-mouth, have you addressed that?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I think that the network that you're describing that goes through Africa and into Latin America and up is typically a route that we see with the large-scale alien smuggling situations. We have heard situations of trafficking occurring within that migrant stream, most notably, as you said, with Chinese -- often Chinese women who are waylaid for a couple of years in southern Africa being forced in prostitution in order to pay the smuggling fees or pay the debts that the alien smugglers claim that they're owed.

But one of the things that we've seen is that this is a route that is used by both alien smugglers and human traffickers. It's hard to differentiate amongst the two. And so a lot of our attention -- because it's such a large human smuggling route, much of our attention has been on the smuggling aspect. And our colleagues over at the Department of Homeland Security have beefed up their legal attaches at the embassies -- we've got a good cadre of folks working out of Pretoria - - and have been able to dismantle and impinge a number of the shipments and actually have been able to arrest and prosecute some of the large players in that.

I think that you do raise a good point, though, that we have to be mindful of the fact that these routes can be used for various things. You can have a person who's flowing through it who is headed towards a life of indentured servitude. You can have another person who's headed through that route who's simply going to melt into society as an illegal alien. But then you could also have someone who's coming in to do harm. And so we're looking at that across the board to try to make sure that we can disrupt those established smuggling routes.

QUESTION: And about the financial network with is called hawala, which works just word of mouth? You know, $1 million to be transferred, no money moves across the continents. It is paid by this network.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I would defer to our colleagues at Treasury and others as far as the mechanics.

QUESTION: Because Europe is doing a lot to control this.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Excuse me?

QUESTION: Europe is doing a lot to control this.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Yes, and I know that hawala is something that Treasury and other working groups have been dealing with. That's not necessarily something that's reflected in this year's report.

QUESTION: Do you see improvement? Is the number of victims decreasing or increasing this year? Last year, the UN reported about 12 million people were victims. How do you see it? Is there improvement?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: We see improvement in that we see now 116 countries that have -- 116 countries have enacted legislation. The number of convictions have increased -- 40 percent, actually -- since last year, up to over 4,000. The number of labor convictions have tripled, up to 335. But what we don't necessarily see yet is the decrease in victims, partially because we're still trying to get the baseline as to what is the baseline from which we would work.

I think that one of the things that we see is that as a country starts to comply with their obligations under the Palermo Protocol around prevention, protection, and prosecution, once they put together an intergovernmental -- like an inter-ministerial working group or an interagency working group -- once they put those structures in place, they start to see more victims. It's because they're finding them; it's not because the victims weren't there before.

So the Netherlands Antilles is a perfect example. Up until last year, they didn't have those structures in place and so NGOs would report that there was trafficking in Curacao and those different islands, but there was no cases and no victims identified. In the last year, they've actually arrested and prosecuted nine traffickers because they had built the structures that had been able to see it.

So I actually think that success in the next few years is actually going to look a lot -- it's going to be an increase in numbers of cases, an increase in numbers of victims. That might be counterintuitive; you'd like to see it go down, but I think that success will actually be that we're uncovering more cases. Then as we get the baseline, we'll be able to start assessing the efficacy of the various things.

QUESTION: Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Take one more question and then -- yeah.

MR. TONER: Yeah, one more question.

QUESTION: Yeah, wait -- yeah. Do you get the sense from the report, from the overview, that -- you know, the sense of progress and improvement that you're talking about? One might have imagined that the economic global downturn might have led to -- I mean, you can imagine how it could have led to some, in more cases, worse problems. I'm wondering, do you have any sense of the economic impact of the global recession?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: As far as we can tell, there's a couple of competing issues within the economic downturn. On the one hand, people are more desperate and are therefore willing to take more risks, putting themselves into harm's way with an abusive labor recruiter.

On the other hand, there are fewer big projects for them to be placed by those abusive labor recruiters. So if you see, for instance, building booms in Western Europe or in the Gulf, those building booms collapsed and there is no longer the demand for your Eastern European construction workers in Western Europe or your South Asian construction workers, say, for instance, in the Gulf states. So it seems to be cancelling itself out a little bit as far as the demand for the exploitable labor going down as part of the market.

What we are very concerned, though, about the economic downturn is the softening, or what appears to be a softening of the amount of money that some of the countries are spending on victim protection. And we think that even in the economic downturn, it's something that your money is well spent upon. Victim protection in this situation is not simply a social program. It's also being able to help the folks who you've gotten out of a slavery situation, work them through their trauma, and then have them as effective witnesses against the transnational criminals that you're trying to put out of business.

So it's not simply -- we would suggest to the countries who are thinking about cutting the budgets as far as victim protection is concerned -- it's not simply a social program; it's actually a law enforcement tool that they'd be putting on the shelf. And frankly, we've seen countries that are as poor as Moldova still spending money on victim shelters, still supporting these types of things. So if Moldova, which has one of the lowest GDPs out there -- if Moldova can come up with $50-or-$60,000 to fund shelters, we would certainly expect other countries, even in a recession, would be able to as well.

QUESTION: Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you so much.

(Distributed by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State. Web site: <http://www.america.gov>)

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: SDWF

Copyright 2010 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

200 of 404 DOCUMENTS

State Department Documents and Publications

June 15, 2010

Strong Political Will Fuels Nigeria's Fight Against Trafficking; Activist Reed Slack reflects on how Nigeria battles modern-day slavery

BYLINE: Jane Morse, Staff Writer, ,

SECTION: NEWS FROM AMERICA.COM AND THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 1175 words

Washington -- Nigeria, like many countries in Africa, must cope with issues such as corruption, mismanagement and poverty. Nonetheless, the country has become a success to be emulated with its drive to end human trafficking, according to Reed Slack, who spent three years helping Nigeria implement programs to combat modern-day slavery.

"There was tremendous political will from the highest levels of government to tackle the issue of trafficking," Slack told America.gov in a recent interview. The effort of the Nigerian government, he said, "is most commendable and is -- and ought to be -- a model for other countries, not only in Africa but in Europe and in North and South America and Asia."

Slack is now the executive director of the Utah Health and Human Rights Project, but from 2006 to 2009 he served as chief of party in Nigeria for the American Bar Association Rule of Law Initiative (ABA-ROLI). In that capacity, he worked to help implement a program underwritten by the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID) to fight human trafficking by building capacity in Nigeria's law enforcement agencies and the judiciary and to provide support for victim rehabilitation services. The ABA-USAID program provided training for hundreds of Nigerian prosecutors, police, immigration enforcement officers and government officials in various agencies.

According to Slack, public awareness of the problem of human trafficking in Nigeria began to increase in the mid- to late 1990s, with a series of widely publicized stories about the repatriation of a number of Nigerian women who had been trafficked to Italy for prostitution. Photos showing the women being dropped off on the tarmac at the Lagos airport and abandoned to make their own way engendered a feeling of public insult in Nigeria's citizens, he said.

Amina Titi Atiku Abubakar, the wife of the vice president under the former Obasanjo administration, became alarmed about the issue of trafficking and saw it as "a national affront to the dignity of all Nigeria," Slack said. She established the Women Trafficking and Child Labour Eradication Foundation (WOTCLEF), which was able to further raise public awareness and lobby for the passage of an anti-trafficking statute. The statute was adopted in late 2003 with the strong support of then-President Olusegun Obasanjo, Slack said.

The National Agency for the Prohibition of Trafficking in Persons (NAPTIP) was established as a stand-alone agency within the executive branch. Responsible for preventing trafficking, protecting victims and prosecuting traffickers, NAPTIP engaged all of the law enforcement agencies -- local police as well as immigration officers -- in the fight against trafficking, Slack said.

The greatest strength of Nigeria's anti-trafficking effort, Slack said, was its ability to marshal and coordinate considerable law enforcement resources with the backing of a legislative mandate and political support. "Perhaps the next greatest thing," Slack said, "was the personnel that were chosen to head up these agencies and offices."

"They were all dedicated to the fight; they were passionate about it; they understood the issues very well and were committed to doing all that they had power to do to combat trafficking in Nigeria," Slack said.

Slack attributed the ability of Nigeria's anti-trafficking efforts to evade the corruption that sometimes hobbles other government programs to the fact that human trafficking "affects the dignity and pride of all Nigeria" and the public's "genuine concern for the citizens who are affected by it."

Nigeria's success has been reflected in the United States' annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report, which tracks to what extent governments worldwide comply with the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA), a U.S. law (PDF, 39KB) adopted in 2000 that seeks to prevent human trafficking overseas. Since the report's first publication in 2001, Nigeria consistently ranked as a Tier 2 country -- meaning its government did not comply with TVPA's minimum standards, although it was making efforts to do so. In the 2009 TIP Report, which evaluated governments for the year 2008, Nigeria climbed to Tier 1 status, meaning it fully complied with TVPA minimum standards.

Slack said he believes Nigeria will be able to sustain effective anti-trafficking measures. Ongoing training courses remain, even with the conclusion of the ABA-USAID program. "That is a sustainable long-term impact of the program," he said. "I think it will continue to yield good results in building the capacities of the law enforcement agencies to detect and prosecute trafficking."

The real benefit of training, Slack said, is "helping an officer to see something differently. And in my experience, both in the United States and in Nigeria, we become accustomed to seeing things around us in a way that it becomes, I don't want to say invisible, but it just kind of blends into the background. But once you understand what it is you're seeing, you understand that it's not just normal. There is something abnormal about what's happening. It's not just prostitution; it is slavery. It's not just farm labor; there is someone who is being forced to do that. People see things differently, and that changes the dynamics within law enforcement as to the attention and efforts that they are able to bring to bear on tackling trafficking."

Perceptions within the general public in Nigeria are changing as well, Slack said. Ten or 15 years ago, Nigerians were proud to have a daughter working overseas and sending money back to her family. "There was not an awareness of what actually was involved or what their daughter was doing, or being forced to do," he said. But as awareness grew about the realities of what was really happening to many Nigerian women in Italy and elsewhere, it no longer was socially acceptable to boast of having a daughter working overseas.

The enticement of good pay and a better life somewhere else remain the traffickers' biggest lure, Slack said. "Desperation makes people vulnerable to those enticements," he said. "How do you then address the underlying socio-economic issues that might reduce the vulnerability to those enticements? But it is not a helpless situation, and I don't know of anybody who is actually working in trafficking that feels that it's helpless. Daunting, yes. But there is progress to be made, and is being made."

Editor's note: Nigeria ranked in Tier 1 again for the Trafficking in Persons report for 2010, which reports on 2009 activity. According to the report, Nigeria demonstrated sustained progress to combat human trafficking, convicted 25 trafficking offenders and provided care for 1,109 victims -- an increase over 2008. Nigeria continued to undertake strong efforts to raise awareness of human trafficking, according to the report. The full narrative on Nigeria (scroll down) is available on the State Department website.

(This is a product of the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State. Web site: <http://www.america.gov>)

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: SDWF

201 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

June 15, 2010 Tuesday 3:43 AM EST

Release of the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report - Mauritius Remains in Tier One

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 358 words

DATELINE: PORT LOUIS, Mauritius

The U.S. Embassy issued the following news release:

On Monday, June 14, 2010, U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton released the tenth annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report at the State Department.

The TIP report is the most comprehensive worldwide report on the efforts of governments to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons, a modern form of slavery. Its findings are intended to raise global awareness and spur countries to take effective actions to counter trafficking in persons. The assessment includes reports and rankings on 177 countries, including the first-ever ranking of the United States.

In the 2010 TIP Report, Mauritius remains in Tier 1. The Government of Mauritius fully complied with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. Mauritius sustained its strong efforts to identify, investigate, and prosecute incidences of trafficking during the reporting period. The Mauritius Police Force increased its offerings of anti-trafficking training programs for police officers and continued its awareness campaign in schools and villages. As part of the TIP action plan, the U.S. State Department has suggested possible additional actions by the Government of Mauritius to accomplish even more against Trafficking in Persons. The State Department TIP report recommends that Mauritius utilize anti-trafficking legislation to investigate and prosecute trafficking offenses and convict and punish trafficking offenders, including those involving adult women exploited in forced prostitution. Another recommendation is to designate an official coordinating body or mechanism to facilitate improved anti-trafficking communication and coordination among the relevant ministries, law enforcement entities, working groups, and non-governmental organizations.

The full text of the TIP Report, including all recommendations, is available on the State Department's website, www.state.gov/g/tip. The Mauritius country report is also available from the "Country reports" feature box on the homepage of the Embassy website: <http://mauritius.usembassy.gov>.

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS aa88aa88 100619-2875348 71AfzalAli

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

202 of 404 DOCUMENTS

UAE Government News

June 15, 2010 Tuesday 6:30 AM EST

UAE makes 'Significant' on Human Trafficking

LENGTH: 127 words

Dubai, June15: UAE's significance efforts to solve the problem of sex trade leads to remove its name from the United States "watch list" on human trafficking However, it has to do more to combat forced labour. The 2010 Trafficking in Persons report suggests that the Emirates is making "significant efforts" against human trafficking. Now UAE moved to Tier 2 List from its Tier 2 Watch List.

Luis CdeBaca, the head of the State Department's office to monitor and combat human trafficking informed that "We are starting to see cases going through the court, victims heard and liberated, and see commitment on part of the Government". He also said that both Dubai and Abu Dhabi's police raised their efforts to tackle the issues efficiently.

copyright contify.com

LOAD-DATE: December 7, 2011LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

Copyright 2010 Contify.com
All Rights Reserved

203 of 404 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 15, 2010 Tuesday 10:54 PM EST

2010 TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT

LENGTH: 5283 words

WASHINGTON, June 14 -- The U.S. Department of State's Under Secretary for Public Diplomacy and Public Affairs issued the following press release:

MR. TONER: Good afternoon. Welcome to the State Department. As you know, Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton announced this morning the release of the 10th Annual Trafficking in Persons Report. This 177-country report is the most comprehensive worldwide report on the efforts of governments to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons.

In light of that, we're very fortunate to have with us today Ambassador-at-Large Luis CdeBaca of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons here to answer some of your questions and talk a little bit about the report in more detail. And just for your awareness, later on this week, Ambassador CdeBaca will participate on Tuesday in a congressional reception for the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Heroes that's hosted by the Helsinki Commission.

On Wednesday, June 16th, Ambassador CdeBaca will participate in a briefing on the Trafficking in Persons Report at the Foreign Press Center in New York, and that's at 10:00 a.m. And then at 1:00 p.m. that day, he'll deliver keynote remarks regarding the 2010 report at a panel discussion hosted by the U.S. Mission to the United Nations, the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime, and the Schuster Institute for Investigative Journalism at Brandeis University.

Without further ado, I'll hand it over to Ambassador CdeBaca.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you for the introduction, Mark.

Earlier this morning, Secretary Clinton publicly released the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report. The annual report provides a diagnosis of the global effort to combat modern slavery. This year, the report assessed 177 countries, including two special cases. Those special cases are Haiti and Somalia. Two countries were ranked for the first time, Kiribati and the United States.

It's important to highlight the significance of the U.S. ranking. As we work towards a lead-by-example diplomacy, it was common sense to include ourselves in this year's report. Data was collected across the interagency: prosecutions from Department of Justice, information from DHS, and victim services efforts by Department of Health and Human Services. We also collected information from state and local law enforcement, nongovernmental organizations, and governments.

The Trafficking in Persons Report has spurred action throughout the years by other countries to take a hard look at their internal efforts against trafficking. Finland is a good example. Just a couple weeks ago, they recently completed a self assessment similar to the United States of their trafficking in persons response, and we certainly look forward to other countries undertaking that type of self diagnostic.

Without a doubt, the United States continues to be the world leader on this issue. In the 10 years since President Clinton signed the Trafficking Victims Protection Act and the United Nations outlined the international community's anti-trafficking standards in the Palermo Protocol, we've seen much progress. And as diagnosed by this year's report, we still face a number of challenges.

The report discusses a host of those challenges, including the need for improved victims services. Whether in the United States or another country, we must treat victims as victims and not as criminals. We must look toward promising practices such as shelters that do not imprison victims, but instead allow for rehabilitation and recovery from the crimes committed against them.

The feminization of trafficking is a trend that we see in this year's report, and that's something that's expanding beyond the conventional stereotypes of sex trafficking. Today, more than 56 percent of trafficking in women -- are women and girls, and we see more and more women suffering from labor trafficking, specifically involuntary domestic servitude. These maids suffer in silence behind closed doors, and in some ways are the most vulnerable because they do not know anyone other than their captors.

Often, as I've personally seen while I prosecuted these cases at an earlier career at the Department of Justice, and as still holds true today, these women, and in some cases men and boys, are also forced into sex slavery by those who would hold them in involuntary domestic servitude. And I'd point out that in recent months, I think in the UAE, there have been a couple of prosecutions in which women who were brought in to the Emirates in order to be domestic servants were then prostituted out by their employers. So the connection between domestic servitude and sex slavery is something that we're starting to recognize more and more.

I would like to highlight some successes that are in the report, because even as we face challenges in our fight against modern slavery, there are more people around the world than ever before working on those human rights issues. I'll run through a few quick successes and then we can move to questions.

One success that I think is very noteworthy is that of Bosnia-Herzegovina, which this year is upgraded to Tier 1 on the report. Bosnia was on Tier 3 for many years at the beginning of this decade. And I think that a lot of people - for a lot of people, the global fight against human trafficking first came to people's attention because of the widespread sex slavery and the widespread abuses in the Balkans during the various wars of the 1990s.

This is something that we've seen on the part of the Bosnian Government: clear progress, especially over the last year; significantly reducing its use of suspended sentences; imposing stronger penalties for convicted traffickers; partnering with nongovernmental organizations on victim protection; and employing proactive procedures to go out and identify and help victims. It is a sea change if you look at the trafficking issue over the course of the last decade that Bosnia would be ranked in the first tier of countries that are fully compliant with the minimum standards.

This year we also saw noteworthy success by the Government of Egypt. The Egyptian Government's progress in combating human trafficking over the last year is particularly evident in its enactment of a comprehensive law and its greater law enforcement and prevention efforts to confront fraudulent short-term marriages, often termed summer marriages, of Egyptian girls, which is a thinly veiled cover for the prostitution of children. Their activity against the summer marriages and, as the Secretary pointed out earlier this morning, the steps that they are taking towards starting shelters with some of the major hospitals in Cairo and Alexandria reflects the government's partnerships with international legal experts, the key of one of which was - we were happy to be able to help fund from here at the State Department in collaboration with civil society. We're very encouraged by what we're seeing coming out of Egypt.

So, too, the Government of Pakistan, which was upgraded to Tier 2 this year, has dramatically increased the number of convictions and prosecutions for human trafficking, undertaking creative efforts to prevent bonded labor. Behind this enhanced commitment, particularly a greater focus on bonded labor, are stronger partnerships with United States Government and international organizations on the issue of trafficking in persons.

Some of you may recall, some of you may have covered, a situation last fall - August and September - in which over 170 Pakistani nationals, victims of bonded laborers, were taken hostage by feudal landlords in Sind Province in retaliation for actually seeking a habeas corpus writ to free them from debt bondage in court. What they got for their troubles was confined and jailed by the landlords and their henchmen, their guards. The Secretary raised this and, in fact, civil society actors asked her about it in her October visit to Islamabad. Simultaneously, as that was going on, local police were in the process of liberating those people. And we certainly appreciate the activities and the actions taken by the Pakistani Government to fight that situation.

Another success, Malaysia upgraded this year to Tier 2 watch list. You may recall that last year Malaysia was downgraded to Tier 3. Over the course of the last year, the Malaysian authorities have acknowledged and begun to tackle their serious human trafficking problem, including intensified engagement with foreign governments. For the first time, the government formed partnerships with nongovernmental organizations to work in partnership. And as a result of their work with the United Nations interagency anti-TIP program out of Bangkok, they identified and assisted victims of forced labor on fishing boats on the coast of Sarawak. Those initial cases of labor trafficking, as well as what they're doing on sex trafficking, is certainly heartening as far as the commitment that is beginning to be shown by the Government of Malaysia.

One final success that I'd like to highlight, although there are many more in the book, and that is the action on the part of the Government of Syria, which was, this year, upgraded to the Tier 2 watch list from Tier 3, where it had been for years. In Syria, partnerships with international organizations and NGOs contributed to the progress. It included its enhancement of an anti-trafficking law, enactment of two decrees to better protect foreign domestic workers, and opening a second shelter for trafficking victims in Aleppo, which added to a preexisting government-supported shelter in Damascus. Again, we see much of the problem in Syria and much of the activity now to protect the workers coming with the issues of foreign domestic workers, the maids who have been brought into Syria. So we see that kind of increased political role on that government as well as many others. And again, we are encouraged.

We look at - as the Secretary said today, we look at this not as an exercise in finger-wagging or calling out, but rather, diagnosing ourselves and countries around the world so that we can work together in partnership. I appreciate your attention and we'll take a few questions.

I know you had one to begin with.

QUESTION: A couple. One, just in very simple terms, can you explain why the U.S. Government feels that it is beneficial to rate itself? Does it add to your credibility when you talk to others?

Second, the Secretary alluded to some countries who had reached out to the U.S. Government, trying not to be left in low categories or dropped down to them. And can you give us some sense of who those are? Tier 3, for example, this year yet again includes both Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, countries with enormous resources and yet they have been very durable presences in that bottom category. Were they the ones trying to get off it or were they just making no real efforts?

And then lastly, could you address the question of Switzerland, which is on Tier 2 - not the watchlist, but Tier 2? Again, a country with significant resources; why has it not been possible for the Swiss to do better?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, there's several questions. I'll try to take them in descending order. As far as the self assessment, one of the things that we've seen over the last few years is a number of countries, often in Europe, have put into the - in place the practice of what's called the national rapporteurs. And they often, like an - kind of like an ombudsman, are assessing the anti-trafficking efforts within that country.

We have seen that as a helpful activity on the part of those governments, as - to the degree that they are honest, to the degree that they confront not just successes, but also challenges. And so we felt that the United States needed that as a diagnostic tool for ourselves, that the Obama Administration is committed to applying the same diagnostics that we would apply to other countries.

So when we looked at the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking in persons that we are statutorily bound to apply to the other countries of the world, not only did we feel that it was only fair and just that we apply those same minimum standards, but also that it would be helpful to run the United States anti-trafficking activities through that analytical framework. And so, as I said, we encourage other countries not simply to look to our report for their own self assessment, but to perform their own as well.

Switzerland, I think, is in the process of doing that. We stand ready to continue to work with the Swiss. They're - in our review this year and working with the Swiss Government, we did identify a gap in their law that created a loophole in which children at the ages of 16 and 17 could legally participate in prostitution. And since the law here in the United States as far as the minimum standards as well as the international norms of the Palermo Protocol and otherwise make 18 a very bright line. Even for countries that have legalized prostitution, the child prostitution situation was something that had to be dealt with.

And I've already spoken with the Swiss ambassador. We've - we're talking to the Swiss as to how we can - as - in partnership, work through some of the legal challenges that they face. And we do see commitment from them to address these issues.

QUESTION: And it would require legislation (inaudible)? And could it be done by, you know, regulations or something?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I wouldn't speculate on the various ways that the Swiss could actually handle this. One of the issues, of course, with Switzerland is when you're dealing at the cantonal level with law enforcement issues, some countries can change their entire trafficking regime overnight simply by passing a federal law. Others have to do it --

QUESTION: Locally?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: -- state by state, locality by locality. And I think that that's something that the Swiss are looking at as --

QUESTION: Was this a problem last year?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: It's a situation that I think --

QUESTION: I mean, I just don't understand how the - I mean, was - did something change over the last year to get them dropped from Tier 1?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: The law and the loophole was extant for quite a while. I think that our recognition of it --

QUESTION: Ah, okay.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: -- as we --

QUESTION: So basically, they should have been on Tier 2 last year or - and the year before?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I wouldn't speculate backwards. I certainly would let - this year's ranking speaks for itself.

QUESTION: And then how about Kuwait and Saudi Arabia?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: And then Kuwait and Saudi Arabia --

QUESTION: And then who else was trying to - who was trying to get themselves out of the --

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, I mean, we have yet to see a country come to us and ask to be put on a lower tier ranking. So I think that as we work with the countries throughout the year, there's always the desire to move up in the tier rankings. What we then look for is: What are the actions? What are the activities?

In both Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, we have seen some beginning of action and we will continue to work with them, whether it's the Kuwaitis starting to at least discuss the extension of certain labor protections to foreign workers in Kuwait, or whether it's the Saudi Arabia example in which this spring they did pass a first draft of an anti-trafficking law. In both countries, we would like to see enhanced victim services. In the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia especially, the situation for escaped maids and escaped workers is - continues to be untenable, in no small part because of the situation where the employer has to kind of countersign the exit visas for the person who they sponsored. Even if that person was running away from the employer for abuse, that employer still has the power to block them from leaving and going home or getting another job.

So we are certainly going to work with the governments both of Kuwait and Saudi Arabia as far as how they can address these situations, not because we're trying to figure out how do we get them onto a different tier; it's how do we get the situation for workers in those countries to be better. The tiers then follow.

Yes.

QUESTION: You said earlier this morning, and it's also in the report which I haven't, of course, read all of, that the United States is a source country for human trafficking. What does that mean? Are you saying that there are U.S. citizens around the country that are trafficking women and children and taking advantage of people that are here for temporary working visas, or are you saying that there's people that are coming in from outside the country that are operating these trafficking rings and those kinds of things? What does it - because it doesn't seem to specify that in here.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I hate to say this, but the answer is kind of yes. The - what we have in the United States is a situation where there are homegrown traffickers who are enslaving people in various segments of the economy, and some of those end up enslaving American citizens, some of those end up enslaving foreign nationals. Some of the foreign nationals who are here were recruited in their home countries and brought here by people who intended to do that all along. Others may have immigrated and then, once they're here, get trapped.

I'd actually - and I know you have a very busy day, but if people have a chance, the Coalition of Immokalee Workers Slavery Museum, which is out in the parking lot right now, breaks this down, I think, pretty well, in that it talks - it has some of the artifacts not just from cases with men and women from Mexico and Guatemala who are enslaved in Florida picking crops, but African American men from Florida who spoke English who don't have those same issues of being a foreign person or afraid of the immigration or something like that, African American men being enslaved in agriculture in Florida within the last five, six years.

QUESTION: By U.S. citizens or by --

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: By U.S. citizens. So it's a very multifaceted way that it ends up manifesting. And in sex trafficking, then there's also the difference between those who are enslaving immigrant women in prostitution and those who are enslaving U.S. citizen women and girls. It's often runaways. In those situations, those cases have historically been dealt with in the United States under the prostitution statutes rather than under the involuntary servitude and slavery statutes, though what's happening in some of the situations is that the pimps are actually enslaving the women that are working for them.

QUESTION: One quick thing. Can you explain special cases - what that is, Haiti and - what was the other country?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Somalia. Haiti and Somalia are special cases in no small part because of the capacity of the government. When we have a functional government, even a very haltingly functional government, then that country not only gets assessed but actually ranked. In both Haiti and Somalia, it continues to be our position that those governments are not sufficiently operative to actually give them a ranking in the report.

QUESTION: Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Yes.

QUESTION: Yes. Back on the case of Cuba, I'm wondering what actually is the justification for the - I mean, I read a little bit, but it sounds - it seems like the U.S. might be open to charges of political ranking. I'm just trying to get why Cuba is on Tier 3.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, I think that one of the things that we see for Cuba is that there is no law against this practice. There's some other laws that could be cobbled together perhaps in order to prosecute a trafficker, but there's no evidence that that has actually been done. I think one of the things that we also look at there is, again, the age of legal prostitution. Again, children are - can legally be in prostitution at ages 16 and 17.

We also see the lack of human trafficking protections and no training for the police, prosecutors, or social workers on what to do if one sees a human trafficking situation. So in a country where not only do you have a - such a large tourist industry, other countries in the region that draw tourists from the same places as Cuba, have large child sex tourism problems, and are working to address those, we don't see the same activity in Cuba. So it's a multifaceted approach as far as why they would end up on Tier 3.

QUESTION: Can you comment on North Korea? And also, what do you say to China, where a lot of North Korean human trafficking is actually happening?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, North Korea continues to be a Tier 3 country in this year's report. We have not seen any indication that the North Korean Government is actually addressing the human trafficking problem.

One of the issues, of course, that we have when we look at the northeastern part of China is that there is the North Korean refugee community, that population. What we'd like to see from the Government of China is that there would be actual screening of people within that refugee flow to see which are the people who are actually trafficking victims. We're not saying that every one of them necessarily is, but we've had enough reports, whether it's of forced labor, whether it's of forced marriages, of enough reports of abuse coming out of that region that we'd like to see more screening and then more victim protections on the part of the Chinese Government.

When it comes to North Korea, I think that one of the issues that we're looking at is not simply the lack of a legal regime in order to address human trafficking or to be able to prosecute traffickers or rehabilitate the victims or do any of the things that even are the baseline to be working on it, but also when the North Korean Government exports labor to other countries, are those people in the places that they're going - do they have a modicum of freedom there or is the government sending, whether it's police or security services or others with them in order to keep them in line.

And so we've expressed concern, as have some of the governments of Western Europe. I think it was the Czech Republic actually terminated their contracts with the North Korean Labor Export Company because of their concerns of the type of abuse that was happening with the exported North Korean laborers.

Yes.

QUESTION: (Inaudible) the situation in Taiwan. It had been moved from Tier 2 to Tier 1 year. And is there any special reason for such a movement?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, one of the things that, hopefully, jumps out at you as you read the report this year - and if not, I'll give it a little bit of a boost - is the need for more victim protections and the need for a victim response that's not based on detaining the victims. If you take somebody out of a servitude situation where they've had their freedom denied, you take them out, ostensibly rescuing them, and then you put them into a detention center, then that is not necessarily going to win any cases, it's not necessarily going to rehabilitate the victim, it's not really honoring the ethos of the UN protocol on what you're supposed to do as far as the 3-P approach of prevention, protection, and prosecution.

Taiwan - and one of the things that we've seen that occasioned the upgrade this year is that the victim services side has been addressed. So for the first time, their new comprehensive law, which is very well-conceived, has now come into force. And one of the things that it allows is it allows for victims to work, to be able stay in Taiwan, to get jobs with other employers, and to work while their cases are being investigated.

So many countries around the world when you go to a shelter - first of all, it might look more like a detention center, but the victims are just there being warehoused - these are people who are coming out of a tremendously abusive situation. The research shows that most of them haven't even gotten to the point of having post-traumatic stress disorder; they're still in trauma for the first 90 days or so when they're coming out of this slavery situation. Taiwan has recognized that, has studied it, and has actually acted to make sure that these people are not just put in jail after they get liberated.

QUESTION: I haven't read the report yet, but I was just wondering if you can address this issue of trafficking from China and the Indian subcontinent - India, Pakistan, Sri Lanka, and Bangladesh - which usually come to Europe and Africa and then they are brought to U.S. through - by land or sea, from Mexico. And this is - it's very much related to the - the terrorists can use this network.

And another thing was the financial network which is called hawala, which is word-of-mouth, have you addressed that?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I think that the network that you're describing that goes through Africa and into Latin America and up is typically a route that we see with the large-scale alien smuggling situations. We have heard situations of trafficking occurring within that migrant stream, most notably, as you said, with Chinese - often Chinese women who are waylaid for a couple of years in southern Africa being forced in prostitution in order to pay the smuggling fees or pay the debts that the alien smugglers claim that they're owed.

But one of the things that we've seen is that this is a route that is used by both alien smugglers and human traffickers. It's hard to differentiate amongst the two. And so a lot of our attention - because it's such a large human smuggling route, much of our attention has been on the smuggling aspect. And our colleagues over at the Department of Homeland Security have beefed up their legal attaches at the embassies - we've got a good cadre of folks working out of Pretoria - and have been able to dismantle and impinge a number of the shipments and actually have been able to arrest and prosecute some of the large players in that.

I think that you do raise a good point, though, that we have to be mindful of the fact that these routes can be used for various things. You can have a person who's flowing through it who is headed towards a life of indentured servitude. You can have another person who's headed through that route who's simply going to melt into society as an illegal alien. But then you could also have someone who's coming in to do harm. And so we're looking at that across the board to try to make sure that we can disrupt those established smuggling routes.

QUESTION: And about the financial network with is called hawala, which works just word of mouth? You know, $1 million to be transferred, no money moves across the continents. It is paid by this network.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I would defer to our colleagues at Treasury and others as far as the mechanics.

QUESTION: Because Europe is doing a lot to control this.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Excuse me?

QUESTION: Europe is doing a lot to control this.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Yes, and I know that hawala is something that Treasury and other working groups have been dealing with. That's not necessarily something that's reflected in this year's report.

QUESTION: Do you see improvement? Is the number of victims decreasing or increasing this year? Last year, the UN reported about 12 million people were victims. How do you see it? Is there improvement?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: We see improvement in that we see now 116 countries that have - 116 countries have enacted legislation. The number of convictions have increased - 40 percent, actually - since last year, up to over 4,000. The number of labor convictions have tripled, up to 335. But what we don't necessarily see yet is the decrease in victims, partially because we're still trying to get the baseline as to what is the baseline from which we would work.

I think that one of the things that we see is that as a country starts to comply with their obligations under the Palermo Protocol around prevention, protection, and prosecution, once they put together an intergovernmental - like an inter-ministerial working group or an interagency working group - once they put those structures in place, they start to see more victims. It's because they're finding them; it's not because the victims weren't there before.

So the Netherlands Antilles is a perfect example. Up until last year, they didn't have those structures in place and so NGOs would report that there was trafficking in Curacao and those different islands, but there was no cases and no victims identified. In the last year, they've actually arrested and prosecuted nine traffickers because they had built the structures that had been able to see it.

So I actually think that success in the next few years is actually going to look a lot - it's going to be an increase in numbers of cases, an increase in numbers of victims. That might be counterintuitive; you'd like to see it go down, but I think that success will actually be that we're uncovering more cases. Then as we get the baseline, we'll be able to start assessing the efficacy of the various things.

QUESTION: Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Take one more question and then - yeah.

MR. TONER: Yeah, one more question.

QUESTION: Yeah, wait - yeah. Do you get the sense from the report, from the overview, that - you know, the sense of progress and improvement that you're talking about? One might have imagined that the economic global downturn might have led to - I mean, you can imagine how it could have led to some, in more cases, worse problems. I'm wondering, do you have any sense of the economic impact of the global recession?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: As far as we can tell, there's a couple of competing issues within the economic downturn. On the one hand, people are more desperate and are therefore willing to take more risks, putting themselves into harm's way with an abusive labor recruiter.

On the other hand, there are fewer big projects for them to be placed by those abusive labor recruiters. So if you see, for instance, building booms in Western Europe or in the Gulf, those building booms collapsed and there is no longer the demand for your Eastern European construction workers in Western Europe or your South Asian construction workers, say, for instance, in the Gulf states. So it seems to be cancelling itself out a little bit as far as the demand for the exploitable labor going down as part of the market.

What we are very concerned, though, about the economic downturn is the softening, or what appears to be a softening of the amount of money that some of the countries are spending on victim protection. And we think that even in the economic downturn, it's something that your money is well spent upon. Victim protection in this situation is not simply a social program. It's also being able to help the folks who you've gotten out of a slavery situation, work them through their trauma, and then have them as effective witnesses against the transnational criminals that you're trying to put out of business.

So it's not simply - we would suggest to the countries who are thinking about cutting the budgets as far as victim protection is concerned - it's not simply a social program; it's actually a law enforcement tool that they'd be putting on the shelf. And frankly, we've seen countries that are as poor as Moldova still spending money on victim shelters, still supporting these types of things. So if Moldova, which has one of the lowest GDPs out there - if Moldova can come up with $50-or-$60,000 to fund shelters, we would certainly expect other countries, even in a recession, would be able to as well.

QUESTION: Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you so much. For more information please contact: Sarabjit Jagirdar, Email:- htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

204 of 404 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 15, 2010 Tuesday 10:44 AM EST

TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT

LENGTH: 5272 words

WASHINGTON, June 14 -- The U.S. Department of State issued the following press release:

MR. TONER: Good afternoon. Welcome to the State Department. As you know, Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton announced this morning the release of the 10th Annual Trafficking in Persons Report. This 177-country report is the most comprehensive worldwide report on the efforts of governments to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons.

In light of that, we're very fortunate to have with us today Ambassador-at-Large Luis CdeBaca of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons here to answer some of your questions and talk a little bit about the report in more detail. And just for your awareness, later on this week, Ambassador CdeBaca will participate on Tuesday in a congressional reception for the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Heroes that's hosted by the Helsinki Commission.

On Wednesday, June 16th, Ambassador CdeBaca will participate in a briefing on the Trafficking in Persons Report at the Foreign Press Center in New York, and that's at 10:00 a.m. And then at 1:00 p.m. that day, he'll deliver keynote remarks regarding the 2010 report at a panel discussion hosted by the U.S. Mission to the United Nations, the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime, and the Schuster Institute for Investigative Journalism at Brandeis University.

Without further ado, I'll hand it over to Ambassador CdeBaca.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you for the introduction, Mark.

Earlier this morning, Secretary Clinton publicly released the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report. The annual report provides a diagnosis of the global effort to combat modern slavery. This year, the report assessed 177 countries, including two special cases. Those special cases are Haiti and Somalia. Two countries were ranked for the first time, Kiribati and the United States.

It's important to highlight the significance of the U.S. ranking. As we work towards a lead-by-example diplomacy, it was common sense to include ourselves in this year's report. Data was collected across the interagency: prosecutions from Department of Justice, information from DHS, and victim services efforts by Department of Health and Human Services. We also collected information from state and local law enforcement, nongovernmental organizations, and governments.

The Trafficking in Persons Report has spurred action throughout the years by other countries to take a hard look at their internal efforts against trafficking. Finland is a good example. Just a couple weeks ago, they recently completed a self assessment similar to the United States of their trafficking in persons response, and we certainly look forward to other countries undertaking that type of self diagnostic.

Without a doubt, the United States continues to be the world leader on this issue. In the 10 years since President Clinton signed the Trafficking Victims Protection Act and the United Nations outlined the international community's anti-trafficking standards in the Palermo Protocol, we've seen much progress. And as diagnosed by this year's report, we still face a number of challenges.

The report discusses a host of those challenges, including the need for improved victims services. Whether in the United States or another country, we must treat victims as victims and not as criminals. We must look toward promising practices such as shelters that do not imprison victims, but instead allow for rehabilitation and recovery from the crimes committed against them.

The feminization of trafficking is a trend that we see in this year's report, and that's something that's expanding beyond the conventional stereotypes of sex trafficking. Today, more than 56 percent of trafficking in women - are women and girls, and we see more and more women suffering from labor trafficking, specifically involuntary domestic servitude. These maids suffer in silence behind closed doors, and in some ways are the most vulnerable because they do not know anyone other than their captors.

Often, as I've personally seen while I prosecuted these cases at an earlier career at the Department of Justice, and as still holds true today, these women, and in some cases men and boys, are also forced into sex slavery by those who would hold them in involuntary domestic servitude. And I'd point out that in recent months, I think in the UAE, there have been a couple of prosecutions in which women who were brought in to the Emirates in order to be domestic servants were then prostituted out by their employers. So the connection between domestic servitude and sex slavery is something that we're starting to recognize more and more.

I would like to highlight some successes that are in the report, because even as we face challenges in our fight against modern slavery, there are more people around the world than ever before working on those human rights issues. I'll run through a few quick successes and then we can move to questions.

One success that I think is very noteworthy is that of Bosnia-Herzegovina, which this year is upgraded to Tier 1 on the report. Bosnia was on Tier 3 for many years at the beginning of this decade. And I think that a lot of people - for a lot of people, the global fight against human trafficking first came to people's attention because of the widespread sex slavery and the widespread abuses in the Balkans during the various wars of the 1990s.

This is something that we've seen on the part of the Bosnian Government: clear progress, especially over the last year; significantly reducing its use of suspended sentences; imposing stronger penalties for convicted traffickers; partnering with nongovernmental organizations on victim protection; and employing proactive procedures to go out and identify and help victims. It is a sea change if you look at the trafficking issue over the course of the last decade that Bosnia would be ranked in the first tier of countries that are fully compliant with the minimum standards.

This year we also saw noteworthy success by the Government of Egypt. The Egyptian Government's progress in combating human trafficking over the last year is particularly evident in its enactment of a comprehensive law and its greater law enforcement and prevention efforts to confront fraudulent short-term marriages, often termed summer marriages, of Egyptian girls, which is a thinly veiled cover for the prostitution of children. Their activity against the summer marriages and, as the Secretary pointed out earlier this morning, the steps that they are taking towards starting shelters with some of the major hospitals in Cairo and Alexandria reflects the government's partnerships with international legal experts, the key of one of which was - we were happy to be able to help fund from here at the State Department in collaboration with civil society. We're very encouraged by what we're seeing coming out of Egypt.

So, too, the Government of Pakistan, which was upgraded to Tier 2 this year, has dramatically increased the number of convictions and prosecutions for human trafficking, undertaking creative efforts to prevent bonded labor. Behind this enhanced commitment, particularly a greater focus on bonded labor, are stronger partnerships with United States Government and international organizations on the issue of trafficking in persons.

Some of you may recall, some of you may have covered, a situation last fall - August and September - in which over 170 Pakistani nationals, victims of bonded laborers, were taken hostage by feudal landlords in Sind Province in retaliation for actually seeking a habeas corpus writ to free them from debt bondage in court. What they got for their troubles was confined and jailed by the landlords and their henchmen, their guards. The Secretary raised this and, in fact, civil society actors asked her about it in her October visit to Islamabad. Simultaneously, as that was going on, local police were in the process of liberating those people. And we certainly appreciate the activities and the actions taken by the Pakistani Government to fight that situation.

Another success, Malaysia upgraded this year to Tier 2 watch list. You may recall that last year Malaysia was downgraded to Tier 3. Over the course of the last year, the Malaysian authorities have acknowledged and begun to tackle their serious human trafficking problem, including intensified engagement with foreign governments. For the first time, the government formed partnerships with nongovernmental organizations to work in partnership. And as a result of their work with the United Nations interagency anti-TIP program out of Bangkok, they identified and assisted victims of forced labor on fishing boats on the coast of Sarawak. Those initial cases of labor trafficking, as well as what they're doing on sex trafficking, is certainly heartening as far as the commitment that is beginning to be shown by the Government of Malaysia.

One final success that I'd like to highlight, although there are many more in the book, and that is the action on the part of the Government of Syria, which was, this year, upgraded to the Tier 2 watch list from Tier 3, where it had been for years. In Syria, partnerships with international organizations and NGOs contributed to the progress. It included its enhancement of an anti-trafficking law, enactment of two decrees to better protect foreign domestic workers, and opening a second shelter for trafficking victims in Aleppo, which added to a preexisting government-supported shelter in Damascus. Again, we see much of the problem in Syria and much of the activity now to protect the workers coming with the issues of foreign domestic workers, the maids who have been brought into Syria. So we see that kind of increased political role on that government as well as many others. And again, we are encouraged.

We look at - as the Secretary said today, we look at this not as an exercise in finger-wagging or calling out, but rather, diagnosing ourselves and countries around the world so that we can work together in partnership. I appreciate your attention and we'll take a few questions.

I know you had one to begin with.

QUESTION: A couple. One, just in very simple terms, can you explain why the U.S. Government feels that it is beneficial to rate itself? Does it add to your credibility when you talk to others?

Second, the Secretary alluded to some countries who had reached out to the U.S. Government, trying not to be left in low categories or dropped down to them. And can you give us some sense of who those are? Tier 3, for example, this year yet again includes both Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, countries with enormous resources and yet they have been very durable presences in that bottom category. Were they the ones trying to get off it or were they just making no real efforts?

And then lastly, could you address the question of Switzerland, which is on Tier 2 - not the watchlist, but Tier 2? Again, a country with significant resources; why has it not been possible for the Swiss to do better?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, there's several questions. I'll try to take them in descending order. As far as the self assessment, one of the things that we've seen over the last few years is a number of countries, often in Europe, have put into the - in place the practice of what's called the national rapporteurs. And they often, like an - kind of like an ombudsman, are assessing the anti-trafficking efforts within that country.

We have seen that as a helpful activity on the part of those governments, as - to the degree that they are honest, to the degree that they confront not just successes, but also challenges. And so we felt that the United States needed that as a diagnostic tool for ourselves, that the Obama Administration is committed to applying the same diagnostics that we would apply to other countries.

So when we looked at the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking in persons that we are statutorily bound to apply to the other countries of the world, not only did we feel that it was only fair and just that we apply those same minimum standards, but also that it would be helpful to run the United States anti-trafficking activities through that analytical framework. And so, as I said, we encourage other countries not simply to look to our report for their own self assessment, but to perform their own as well.

Switzerland, I think, is in the process of doing that. We stand ready to continue to work with the Swiss. They're - in our review this year and working with the Swiss Government, we did identify a gap in their law that created a loophole in which children at the ages of 16 and 17 could legally participate in prostitution. And since the law here in the United States as far as the minimum standards as well as the international norms of the Palermo Protocol and otherwise make 18 a very bright line. Even for countries that have legalized prostitution, the child prostitution situation was something that had to be dealt with.

And I've already spoken with the Swiss ambassador. We've - we're talking to the Swiss as to how we can - as - in partnership, work through some of the legal challenges that they face. And we do see commitment from them to address these issues.

QUESTION: And it would require legislation (inaudible)? And could it be done by, you know, regulations or something?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I wouldn't speculate on the various ways that the Swiss could actually handle this. One of the issues, of course, with Switzerland is when you're dealing at the cantonal level with law enforcement issues, some countries can change their entire trafficking regime overnight simply by passing a federal law. Others have to do it -

QUESTION: Locally?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: - state by state, locality by locality. And I think that that's something that the Swiss are looking at as -

QUESTION: Was this a problem last year?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: It's a situation that I think -

QUESTION: I mean, I just don't understand how the - I mean, was - did something change over the last year to get them dropped from Tier 1?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: The law and the loophole was extant for quite a while. I think that our recognition of it -

QUESTION: Ah, okay.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: - as we -

QUESTION: So basically, they should have been on Tier 2 last year or - and the year before?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I wouldn't speculate backwards. I certainly would let - this year's ranking speaks for itself.

QUESTION: And then how about Kuwait and Saudi Arabia?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: And then Kuwait and Saudi Arabia -

QUESTION: And then who else was trying to - who was trying to get themselves out of the -

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, I mean, we have yet to see a country come to us and ask to be put on a lower tier ranking. So I think that as we work with the countries throughout the year, there's always the desire to move up in the tier rankings. What we then look for is: What are the actions? What are the activities?

In both Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, we have seen some beginning of action and we will continue to work with them, whether it's the Kuwaitis starting to at least discuss the extension of certain labor protections to foreign workers in Kuwait, or whether it's the Saudi Arabia example in which this spring they did pass a first draft of an anti-trafficking law. In both countries, we would like to see enhanced victim services. In the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia especially, the situation for escaped maids and escaped workers is - continues to be untenable, in no small part because of the situation where the employer has to kind of countersign the exit visas for the person who they sponsored. Even if that person was running away from the employer for abuse, that employer still has the power to block them from leaving and going home or getting another job.

So we are certainly going to work with the governments both of Kuwait and Saudi Arabia as far as how they can address these situations, not because we're trying to figure out how do we get them onto a different tier; it's how do we get the situation for workers in those countries to be better. The tiers then follow.

Yes.

QUESTION: You said earlier this morning, and it's also in the report which I haven't, of course, read all of, that the United States is a source country for human trafficking. What does that mean? Are you saying that there are U.S. citizens around the country that are trafficking women and children and taking advantage of people that are here for temporary working visas, or are you saying that there's people that are coming in from outside the country that are operating these trafficking rings and those kinds of things? What does it - because it doesn't seem to specify that in here.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I hate to say this, but the answer is kind of yes. The - what we have in the United States is a situation where there are homegrown traffickers who are enslaving people in various segments of the economy, and some of those end up enslaving American citizens, some of those end up enslaving foreign nationals. Some of the foreign nationals who are here were recruited in their home countries and brought here by people who intended to do that all along. Others may have immigrated and then, once they're here, get trapped.

I'd actually - and I know you have a very busy day, but if people have a chance, the Coalition of Immokalee Workers Slavery Museum, which is out in the parking lot right now, breaks this down, I think, pretty well, in that it talks - it has some of the artifacts not just from cases with men and women from Mexico and Guatemala who are enslaved in Florida picking crops, but African American men from Florida who spoke English who don't have those same issues of being a foreign person or afraid of the immigration or something like that, African American men being enslaved in agriculture in Florida within the last five, six years.

QUESTION: By U.S. citizens or by -

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: By U.S. citizens. So it's a very multifaceted way that it ends up manifesting. And in sex trafficking, then there's also the difference between those who are enslaving immigrant women in prostitution and those who are enslaving U.S. citizen women and girls. It's often runaways. In those situations, those cases have historically been dealt with in the United States under the prostitution statutes rather than under the involuntary servitude and slavery statutes, though what's happening in some of the situations is that the pimps are actually enslaving the women that are working for them.

QUESTION: One quick thing. Can you explain special cases - what that is, Haiti and - what was the other country?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Somalia. Haiti and Somalia are special cases in no small part because of the capacity of the government. When we have a functional government, even a very haltingly functional government, then that country not only gets assessed but actually ranked. In both Haiti and Somalia, it continues to be our position that those governments are not sufficiently operative to actually give them a ranking in the report.

QUESTION: Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Yes.

QUESTION: Yes. Back on the case of Cuba, I'm wondering what actually is the justification for the - I mean, I read a little bit, but it sounds - it seems like the U.S. might be open to charges of political ranking. I'm just trying to get why Cuba is on Tier 3.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, I think that one of the things that we see for Cuba is that there is no law against this practice. There's some other laws that could be cobbled together perhaps in order to prosecute a trafficker, but there's no evidence that that has actually been done. I think one of the things that we also look at there is, again, the age of legal prostitution. Again, children are - can legally be in prostitution at ages 16 and 17.

We also see the lack of human trafficking protections and no training for the police, prosecutors, or social workers on what to do if one sees a human trafficking situation. So in a country where not only do you have a - such a large tourist industry, other countries in the region that draw tourists from the same places as Cuba, have large child sex tourism problems, and are working to address those, we don't see the same activity in Cuba. So it's a multifaceted approach as far as why they would end up on Tier 3.

QUESTION: Can you comment on North Korea? And also, what do you say to China, where a lot of North Korean human trafficking is actually happening?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, North Korea continues to be a Tier 3 country in this year's report. We have not seen any indication that the North Korean Government is actually addressing the human trafficking problem.

One of the issues, of course, that we have when we look at the northeastern part of China is that there is the North Korean refugee community, that population. What we'd like to see from the Government of China is that there would be actual screening of people within that refugee flow to see which are the people who are actually trafficking victims. We're not saying that every one of them necessarily is, but we've had enough reports, whether it's of forced labor, whether it's of forced marriages, of enough reports of abuse coming out of that region that we'd like to see more screening and then more victim protections on the part of the Chinese Government.

When it comes to North Korea, I think that one of the issues that we're looking at is not simply the lack of a legal regime in order to address human trafficking or to be able to prosecute traffickers or rehabilitate the victims or do any of the things that even are the baseline to be working on it, but also when the North Korean Government exports labor to other countries, are those people in the places that they're going - do they have a modicum of freedom there or is the government sending, whether it's police or security services or others with them in order to keep them in line.

And so we've expressed concern, as have some of the governments of Western Europe. I think it was the Czech Republic actually terminated their contracts with the North Korean Labor Export Company because of their concerns of the type of abuse that was happening with the exported North Korean laborers.

Yes.

QUESTION: (Inaudible) the situation in Taiwan. It had been moved from Tier 2 to Tier 1 year. And is there any special reason for such a movement?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, one of the things that, hopefully, jumps out at you as you read the report this year - and if not, I'll give it a little bit of a boost - is the need for more victim protections and the need for a victim response that's not based on detaining the victims. If you take somebody out of a servitude situation where they've had their freedom denied, you take them out, ostensibly rescuing them, and then you put them into a detention center, then that is not necessarily going to win any cases, it's not necessarily going to rehabilitate the victim, it's not really honoring the ethos of the UN protocol on what you're supposed to do as far as the 3-P approach of prevention, protection, and prosecution.

Taiwan - and one of the things that we've seen that occasioned the upgrade this year is that the victim services side has been addressed. So for the first time, their new comprehensive law, which is very well-conceived, has now come into force. And one of the things that it allows is it allows for victims to work, to be able stay in Taiwan, to get jobs with other employers, and to work while their cases are being investigated.

So many countries around the world when you go to a shelter - first of all, it might look more like a detention center, but the victims are just there being warehoused - these are people who are coming out of a tremendously abusive situation. The research shows that most of them haven't even gotten to the point of having post-traumatic stress disorder; they're still in trauma for the first 90 days or so when they're coming out of this slavery situation. Taiwan has recognized that, has studied it, and has actually acted to make sure that these people are not just put in jail after they get liberated.

QUESTION: I haven't read the report yet, but I was just wondering if you can address this issue of trafficking from China and the Indian subcontinent - India, Pakistan, Sri Lanka, and Bangladesh - which usually come to Europe and Africa and then they are brought to U.S. through - by land or sea, from Mexico. And this is - it's very much related to the - the terrorists can use this network.

And another thing was the financial network which is called hawala, which is word-of-mouth, have you addressed that?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I think that the network that you're describing that goes through Africa and into Latin America and up is typically a route that we see with the large-scale alien smuggling situations. We have heard situations of trafficking occurring within that migrant stream, most notably, as you said, with Chinese - often Chinese women who are waylaid for a couple of years in southern Africa being forced in prostitution in order to pay the smuggling fees or pay the debts that the alien smugglers claim that they're owed.

But one of the things that we've seen is that this is a route that is used by both alien smugglers and human traffickers. It's hard to differentiate amongst the two. And so a lot of our attention - because it's such a large human smuggling route, much of our attention has been on the smuggling aspect. And our colleagues over at the Department of Homeland Security have beefed up their legal attaches at the embassies - we've got a good cadre of folks working out of Pretoria - and have been able to dismantle and impinge a number of the shipments and actually have been able to arrest and prosecute some of the large players in that.

I think that you do raise a good point, though, that we have to be mindful of the fact that these routes can be used for various things. You can have a person who's flowing through it who is headed towards a life of indentured servitude. You can have another person who's headed through that route who's simply going to melt into society as an illegal alien. But then you could also have someone who's coming in to do harm. And so we're looking at that across the board to try to make sure that we can disrupt those established smuggling routes.

QUESTION: And about the financial network with is called hawala, which works just word of mouth? You know, $1 million to be transferred, no money moves across the continents. It is paid by this network.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I would defer to our colleagues at Treasury and others as far as the mechanics.

QUESTION: Because Europe is doing a lot to control this.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Excuse me?

QUESTION: Europe is doing a lot to control this.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Yes, and I know that hawala is something that Treasury and other working groups have been dealing with. That's not necessarily something that's reflected in this year's report.

QUESTION: Do you see improvement? Is the number of victims decreasing or increasing this year? Last year, the UN reported about 12 million people were victims. How do you see it? Is there improvement?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: We see improvement in that we see now 116 countries that have - 116 countries have enacted legislation. The number of convictions have increased - 40 percent, actually - since last year, up to over 4,000. The number of labor convictions have tripled, up to 335. But what we don't necessarily see yet is the decrease in victims, partially because we're still trying to get the baseline as to what is the baseline from which we would work.

I think that one of the things that we see is that as a country starts to comply with their obligations under the Palermo Protocol around prevention, protection, and prosecution, once they put together an intergovernmental - like an inter-ministerial working group or an interagency working group - once they put those structures in place, they start to see more victims. It's because they're finding them; it's not because the victims weren't there before.

So the Netherlands Antilles is a perfect example. Up until last year, they didn't have those structures in place and so NGOs would report that there was trafficking in Curacao and those different islands, but there was no cases and no victims identified. In the last year, they've actually arrested and prosecuted nine traffickers because they had built the structures that had been able to see it.

So I actually think that success in the next few years is actually going to look a lot - it's going to be an increase in numbers of cases, an increase in numbers of victims. That might be counterintuitive; you'd like to see it go down, but I think that success will actually be that we're uncovering more cases. Then as we get the baseline, we'll be able to start assessing the efficacy of the various things.

QUESTION: Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Take one more question and then - yeah.

MR. TONER: Yeah, one more question.

QUESTION: Yeah, wait - yeah. Do you get the sense from the report, from the overview, that - you know, the sense of progress and improvement that you're talking about? One might have imagined that the economic global downturn might have led to - I mean, you can imagine how it could have led to some, in more cases, worse problems. I'm wondering, do you have any sense of the economic impact of the global recession?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: As far as we can tell, there's a couple of competing issues within the economic downturn. On the one hand, people are more desperate and are therefore willing to take more risks, putting themselves into harm's way with an abusive labor recruiter.

On the other hand, there are fewer big projects for them to be placed by those abusive labor recruiters. So if you see, for instance, building booms in Western Europe or in the Gulf, those building booms collapsed and there is no longer the demand for your Eastern European construction workers in Western Europe or your South Asian construction workers, say, for instance, in the Gulf states. So it seems to be cancelling itself out a little bit as far as the demand for the exploitable labor going down as part of the market.

What we are very concerned, though, about the economic downturn is the softening, or what appears to be a softening of the amount of money that some of the countries are spending on victim protection. And we think that even in the economic downturn, it's something that your money is well spent upon. Victim protection in this situation is not simply a social program. It's also being able to help the folks who you've gotten out of a slavery situation, work them through their trauma, and then have them as effective witnesses against the transnational criminals that you're trying to put out of business.

So it's not simply - we would suggest to the countries who are thinking about cutting the budgets as far as victim protection is concerned - it's not simply a social program; it's actually a law enforcement tool that they'd be putting on the shelf. And frankly, we've seen countries that are as poor as Moldova still spending money on victim shelters, still supporting these types of things. So if Moldova, which has one of the lowest GDPs out there - if Moldova can come up with $50-or-$60,000 to fund shelters, we would certainly expect other countries, even in a recession, would be able to as well.

QUESTION: Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you so much. For more information please contact: Sarabjit Jagirdar, Email:- htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

205 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 14, 2010 Monday 7:15 PM GMT

AFP 1900 GMT news advisory

LENGTH: 594 words

DATELINE: PARIS, June 14 2010

Duty Editor: Danny Kemp

Tel: +33 1 40 41 46 36

-- TOP STORIES --

+ Mounting concern over Kyrgyzstan unrest

+ Obama labels oil spill environmental 9/11

+ Israel under fire over flotilla probe

+ World Cup security guards quit Italy match

Kyrgyzstan-Uzbekistan-unrest-politics,4thlead-WRAP

OSH, Kyrgyzstan

Pressure grows for international intervention in deadly violence in Kyrgyzstan, as accusations mount that government forces helped slaughter ethnic Uzbeks and Uzbekistan closes its border to an exodus of refugees.

750 words 2030 GMT by Matt Siegel. Graphic. Picture. Video

US-oil-pollution-environment,lead

THEODORE, Alamaba

The White House says it is confident it can force BP to set up a multi-billion fund for Gulf oil disaster victims, as President Barack Obama labels the spill an environmental 9/11.

700 words 2130 GMT by Stephen Collinson. Picture. Graphic

Israel-conflict-Gaza,6thlead-WRAP

JERUSALEM

Israel's cabinet backs the creation of an internal committee to probe its deadly raid on a Gaza-bound aid flotilla, in a move swiftly dismissed by both Turkey and the Palestinians.

700 words 1930 GMT by Hazel Ward. Picture

SAfrica-fbl-WC2010,lead-WRAP

CAPE TOWN

South African police takes control of security at reigning champions Italy's opening World Cup match, after stewards walk out in a spiralling dispute over pay.

700 words 1900 GMT by Justine Gerardy. Pictures. Video. Graphics

-- EUROPE --

Germany-France-EU-finance-economy-diplomacy,2ndlead

BERLIN

German Chancellor Angela Merkel looks to have brought French President Nicolas Sarkozy around to her vision for post-crisis Europe ahead of this week's EU summit, after talks in Berlin.

600 words 2000 GMT by Simon Sturdee. Picture. Video

Belgium-vote,4thlead

BRUSSELS

Right-wing Flemish separatists and left-wing francophone unionists begin tortuous negotiations to resolve federal Belgium's future and its finances.

650 words 2100 GMT. Picture. Video

Greece-finance-economy-ratings-Moodys,4thlead

PARIS

Moody's rating agency slashes its sovereign rating for Greece to 'junk' status on concerns about Athens can pay its debts, as EU and IMF auditors began taking a hard look at the country's budget.

600 words 1930 GMT

-- MIDDLE EAST --

Iraq-politics,4thlead-WRAP

BAGHDAD

Iraq moves to bolster its shaky democracy with the opening of its second parliament since the US-led ouster of Saddam Hussein in 2003, more than three months after an election stalemate.

650 words moved by Salam Faraj. Graphic. Picture. Video

-- AMERICAS --

US-trafficking-Asia-women,lead

WASHINGTON

The United States puts allies Singapore and Thailand as well as Vietnam on a human trafficking watch list, accusing them of failing to prevent women from being forced into prostitution.

600 words 2000 GMT by Shaun Tandon

-- ASIA --

US-Afghanistan-economy-minerals,3rdlead

KABUL

A US survey uncovers at least one trillion dollars in mineral deposits in Afghanistan, officials say, but there are doubts as to how the war-torn and graft-prone country will manage the windfall.

700 words 2030 GMT by Waheedullah Massoud

Space-Japan-Australia-asteroids,4thlead-WRAP

SYDNEY

Scientists in Australia's vast Outback recover a capsule that they hope contains the first piece of asteroid ever brought to Earth -- perhaps offering a glimpse into ancient space history.

700 words 1930 GMT by Madeleine Coorey. Picture. Graphic

UN-SKorea-NKorea-military,lead

UNITED NATIONS

South Korea and North Korea gear for a UN clash outlining separate versions of the murky circumstances surrounding the sinking of a South Korean warship which Seoul blames on its Stalinist neighbor.

600 words 2100 GMT

afp

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 Agence France Presse
All Rights Reserved

ArabianBusiness.com

ArabianBusiness.com

June 14, 2010 Monday

US urges GCC states to scrap sponsorship system

BYLINE: Joanne BladdLENGTH: 427 words

Gulf countries must scrap their sponsorship system for migrant workers that leaves labourers and domestic workers exposed to human trafficking and forced labour, the US State Department reported on Monday.

In a 373-page report, the department said that employers in the Gulf states exploit the widely used 'kafala' system to abuse workers and named Saudi Arabia and Kuwait as the region's worst offenders.

Both were described by the department as a "destination country for men and women subjected to trafficking in persons, specifically forced labour."

The two countries were ranked in Tier 3, the lowest possible category; potentially leaving the pair open to US sanctions of non-humanitarian aid.

"These countries consistently fall at the bottom of the list when compared to others around the world," said Nisha Varia of Human Rights Watch (HRW).

"It is disappointing that governments across the Middle East have been slow to change the kafala system when it is so easily abused."

Qatar and Lebanon were both placed on the Tier 2 watchlist, the report's second lowest ranking. The UAE, Oman, Bahrain and Egypt were each assigned a Tier 2 rating, indicating they have made significant efforts to tackle human trafficking.

Millions of migrants, primarily from Asia and Africa, have short-term employment contracts for blue-collar jobs in the construction, domestic work, and service industries across the Middle East.

Under the 'kafala' system, nationals and companies can hire migrant workers who are dependent on their employers for food and shelter.

Many workers complain that agencies or employers confiscate their passports, do not pay them regularly or deduct housing or health costs from their pay.

A number of Arab states, including the UAE and Jordan, have signed up to anti-trafficking legislation. Saudi Arabia has operated a shelter for female domestic workers since 1997, while Kuwait has maintained a shelter facility since 2007.

However, other countries, including Lebanon and Kuwait, have yet to adopt anti-trafficking legislation, Many Arab countries retain immigration laws that critics claim penalise rather than protect migrant workers.

"For efforts to end forced labour and human trafficking to be successful, governments in the Middle East should reform the current visa sponsorship system," said Varia.

"When employers have near-total control over migrants' ability to change jobs, and sometimes to leave the country, workers can get trapped in exploitative situations in which they are forced to work without wages, get beaten, or face other abuses."

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

JOURNAL-CODE: 167

Copyright 2010 ArabianBusiness.com - ITP Digital Ltd.
All Rights Reserved
Syndigate.info, Al Bawaba.com

207 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
 Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 14, 2010 Monday

Malaysia rises to "Tier 2" of US people trafficking report

LENGTH: 453 words

Text of report in English by Malaysian official news agency Bernama website

[Bernama report from the "General" page: "Malaysia Rises To Tier 2 Of Trafficking In Persons Report"]

Kuala Lumpur, June 14 (Bernama) - Malaysia has risen to Tier 2 of Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP) 2010 released by the United States Department of State.

Home Minister Datuk Seri Hishammuddin Tun Hussein told Dewan Rakyat on Monday he was informed of this via a letter from the United States embassy this morning.

"This is in recognition of the Anti-Human Trafficking Act 2007, creation of Anti-Human Trafficking Council and government action to address the issue," he told reporters at parliament lobby.

Malaysia dropped from Tier 2 to Tier 3 according to TIP Report 2009 issued on June 16 last year.

The TIP Report ranks countries based on their level of compliance on established minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking.

Tier 1 countries are for governments that fully comply with minimum standards of the Trafficking Victims' Protection Act (TVPA).

Tier 2 countries for governments that not fully comply with the minimum standards but are making significant efforts to comply.

Tier 3 countries are for governments that do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so.

Earlier, replying to a question by Dr Tan Seng Giaw (DAP-Kepong), Hishammuddin said 1,447 people were given interim protection order (IPO) under Section 44 (2) of Anti-Human Trafficking Act 2007 from Feb 28-May 30.

"Of the number, 338 were identified as victims of human trafficking and given protection order (PO) under Section 51(3) of the same act," he said.

Tan wanted to know problems faced by the government in tackling the issue and the number of human trafficking victims traced.

The government faced many challenges in efforts to check human trafficking as it involved transborder crimes with links to prostitution, drug trafficking and money laundering.

"Most victims entered this country as tourists but later got involved with human trafficking syndicates. Lack of public cooperation to provide information and threats by syndicates made victims scared to make reports."

Hishammuddin said internal and external factors also led to the prolonged situation.

"Transnational crimes occur in most countries including developed ones as it give a high return of US$38 billion annually.

"Malaysia's rapidly growing economy attract foreigners to come here in search of jobs."

He said the government had implemented a mechanism to check crimes but lack of will on the part of source countries caused many people to fall prey to syndicate members.

Source: Bernama website, Kuala Lumpur, in English 0803 gmt 14 Jun 10

LOAD-DATE: June 14, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2010 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

208 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Christian Science Monitor

June 14, 2010 Monday

World makes progress against slavery, but 13 nations lag;
The US State Department's annual report on modern-day slavery cites greater determination worldwide to stamp it out. But 13 nations are on the list of slug-gards neglecting the issue.

BYLINE: Howard LaFranchi Staff writer

LENGTH: 636 words

The United States is hailing growing determination in most corners of the globe to combat modern-day slavery through stepped-up law enforcement and legislative action. That's the good news.

But the State Department's annual report on human trafficking nevertheless brands 13 countries as standouts for failure to address rampant cases of sex trading, indentured domestic work, forced field labor, and other varieties of slavery within their borders.

The global scofflaws range from Kuwait and Saudi Arabia to North Korea and Cuba. The bright spots include Pakistan, Malaysia, Syria, Egypt, and Bosnia-Herzegovina - countries that don't always shine in annual human-rights ratings but that the State Department found have acted to address human-trafficking issues over the past year.

"We saw overall improvement," with 116 countries enacting legislation of some form in 2009 to combat human trafficking, says Luis CdeBaca, senior adviser on modern slavery issues to Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton.

The report estimates that more than 12 million people are trafficked globally every year.

For the first time, the US rated itself in the report, giving itself a "tier one," or top-tier, rating (along with most Western countries and Nigeria, which stands out in Africa as a tier one country) but recommending more training for federal, state, and local law enforcement officials to better detect and prosecute cases ranging from debt bondage to child prostitution.

In reviewing the 10th annual human-trafficking report, Ambassador CdeBaca said the State Department tallied more than 4,000 convictions worldwide in trafficking and slavery cases in 2009 - a 40 percent increase over the previous year. On the other hand, the global economic downturn means that more people facing deteriorating living conditions are finding fewer alternatives to forced labor - either in their own countries or in foreign locations to which they are trafficked.

"People are more desperate, and are therefore willing to take more risks," he says.

A not-so-positive trend in this year's report is a "feminization of trafficking," with more women being involuntarily placed in domestic or "maid" work, either in their home countries or abroad. In other cases - as in a documented case in the United Arab Emirates - women are hoodwinked into accepting what they are told will be maid jobs in a foreign country, only to find themselves "prostituted out," as CdeBaca says.

Cases of large-scale trafficking of men have fallen off, not so much as a result of better enforcement against the practice but because the global recession has curtailed the building boom in the Middle East and other regions, CdeBaca says. Fewer large development and infrastructure projects mean less need for armies of manual laborers.

The US report has high praise for Bosnia-Herzegovina, which it lauds for imposing stronger penalties for trafficking and for improving services for trafficking victims. On the other hand, the report slaps Switzerland with a "tier two," or less-than-exemplary, rating, largely over Swiss law that in some cases allows 16- and 17-year-olds to legally engage in prostitution.

The report also honors nine antitrafficking heroes - individuals from countries as different as Mauritania and the United States who dedicate their lives to denting the practice of human trafficking in one of its forms.

The Mauritanian woman, Aminetou Mint Moctar, has worked to denounce the trafficking of Mauritanian girls to Persian Gulf nations. In Florida, Laura Germino coordinates the antislavery campaign of the coalition of Immokalee Workers, which for years has uncovered slavery operations in the agriculture sector in the southeastern US.

Related:

Colombia becomes new hub for human smuggling into US

Global slavery at a high, but reasons for hope

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 Christian Science Publishing Society
All Rights Reserved

209 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Copyright 2010 CQ Transcriptions, LLC
All Rights Reserved
CQ Transcriptions

All materials herein are protected by United States copyright law and may not be reproduced, distributed, transmitted, displayed, published or broadcast without the prior written permission of CQ Transcriptions. You may not alter or remove any trademark, copyright or other notice from copies of the content.

AMBASSADOR LUIS CDEBACA, DIRECTOR, OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS, HOLDS A STATE DEPARTMENT NEWS BRIEFING ON THE 2010 TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT

June 14, 2010 Monday

EVENT DATE: June 14, 2010

TYPE: NEWS BRIEFING

LOCATION: WASHINGTON, D.C.

SPEAKER: AMBASSADOR LUIS CDEBACA, DIRECTOR, OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS,

WITNESSES:

MARK TONER, DIRECTOR, OFFICE OF PRESS RELATIONS, STATE DEPARTMENT
LUIS CDEBACA, AMBASSADOR-AT-LARGE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS

TEXT:

TONER: Good afternoon. Welcome to the State Department.

As you know, Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton announced this morning the release of the 10th annual Trafficking in Persons Report. This 177-country report is the most comprehensive worldwide report on the efforts of governments to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons.

In light of that, we're very fortunate to have with us today Ambassador-at-Large Luis CdeBaca of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons here to answer some of your questions and talk a little bit about the report in more detail.

And just for your awareness, later on this week, Ambassador CdeBaca will participate on Tuesday in a congressional reception for the 2010 Trafficking in Person Heroes. That's hosted by the Helsinki Commission.

On Wednesday, June 16th, Ambassador CdeBaca will participate in a briefing on the Trafficking in Persons Report at the Foreign Press Center in New York, and that's at 10 a.m. And then at 1 p.m. that day, he'll deliver keynote remarks regarding the 2010 report at a panel discussion hosted by the U.S. Mission to the United Nations, the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime, and the Schuster Institute for Investigative Journalism at Brandeis University.

Without further ado, I'll hand it over to Ambassador CdeBaca. Thank you.

CDEBACA: Thank you for the introduction, Mark.

Earlier this morning, Secretary Clinton publicly released the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report. The annual report provides a diagnosis of the global efforts to combat modern slavery.

This year, the report assessed 177 countries, including two special cases. Those special cases are Haiti and Somalia. Two countries were ranked for the first time, Kiribati and the United States.

It's important to highlight the significance of the U.S. ranking. As we work towards a lead-by-example diplomacy, it was common sense to include ourselves in this year -- in this year's report. Data was collected across the interagency, prosecutions from Department of Justice, information from DHS, and victim services efforts by Department of Health and Human Services. We also collected information from state and local law enforcement, nongovernmental organizations, and governments.

The Trafficking in Persons report has spurred action throughout the years by other countries to take a hard look at their internal efforts against trafficking. Finland is a good example. Just a couple of weeks ago, they recently completed a self-assessment similar to the United States of their Trafficking in Persons response, and we certainly look forward to other countries undertaking that type of self-diagnostic.

Without a doubt, the United States continues to be the world leader on this issue. In the 10 years since President Clinton signed the Trafficking Victims Protection Act and the United Nations outlined the international community's anti-trafficking standards in the Palermo Protocol, we've seen much progress. And as diagnosed by this report, we still face a number of challenges.

The report discusses a host of those challenges, including the need for improved victims' services. Whether in the United States or another country, we must treat victims as victims and not as criminals. We must look towards promising practices, such as shelters that do not imprison victims, but instead allow for rehabilitation and recovery from the crimes committed against them.

The feminization of trafficking is a trend that we see in this year's report, and that's something that's expanding beyond the conventional stereotypes of sex trafficking.

Today, more than 56 percent of trafficking women are women and girls, and we see more and more women suffering from labor trafficking, specifically involuntary domestic servitude. These maids suffer in silence behind closed doors and in some ways are the most vulnerable, because they do not know anyone other than their captors.

Often, as I've personally seen while I prosecuted these cases at an earlier career at the Department of Justice and as still holds true today, these women -- and in some cases, men and boys -- are also forced into sex slavery by those who would hold them in involuntary domestic servitude.

And I'd point out that, in recent months, I think in the UAE there have been a couple of prosecutions in which women who were brought in to the emirates in order to be domestic servants were then prostituted out by their employers.

So the connection between domestic servitude and sex slavery is something that we're starting to recognize more and more.

I would like to highlight some successes that are in the report, because even as we face challenges in our fight against modern slavery, there are more people around the world than ever before working on this human rights issue. I'll run through a few quick successes, and then we can move to questions.

One success that I think is very noteworthy is that of Bosnia- Herzegovina, which this year is upgraded to tier one on the report. Bosnia was on tier three for many years at the beginning of this decade, and I think that a lot of people -- for a lot of people, the global fight against human trafficking first came to people's attention because of the widespread sex slavery and the widespread abuses in the Balkans during the -- the various wars of the 1990s.

This is something that we've seen on the part of the Bosnian government. Clear progress, especially over the last year, significantly reducing its use of suspended sentences, imposing stronger penalties for convicted traffickers, partnering with nongovernmental organizations on victim protection, and employing proactive procedures to go out and identify and help victims.

It is a sea change, if you look at the trafficking issue over the course of the last decade, that Bosnia would be ranked in the first tier of countries that are fully compliant with the minimum standards.

This year, we also saw noteworthy success by the government of Egypt. The Egyptians' government's progress in combating human trafficking over the past year is particularly evident in its enactment of a comprehensive law and its greater law enforcement and prevention efforts to confront fraudulent short-term marriages, often termed summer marriages, of Egyptian girls, which is a thinly veiled cover for a prostitution of children.

Their activity against the summer marriages -- and as the secretary pointed out earlier this morning, the steps that they are taking towards starting shelters with some of the major hospitals in Cairo and Alexandria reflects the government's partnerships with international legal experts, the key one of which was we were happy to be able to help fund from here at the State Department, in collaboration with civil society. We're very encouraged by what we're seeing coming out of Egypt.

So, too, the government of Pakistan, which was upgraded to tier two this year, has dramatically increased the number of convictions and prosecutions for human trafficking, undertaking creative efforts to prevent bonded labor. Behind this enhanced commitment, particularly a greater focus on bonded labor, are stronger partnerships with United States government and international organizations on the issue of trafficking in persons.

Some of you may recall, some of you may have covered a situation last fall -- August, September -- in which over 170 Pakistani nationals, victims of bonded labor, were taken hostage by feudal landlords in Sindh province in retaliation for actually seeking a habeas corpus writ to free them from debt bondage in court. What they got for their troubles was confined and jailed by the landlords and their henchmen, their guards.

The secretary raised this, and, in fact, civil society actors asked her about it in her October visit to Islamabad. Simultaneously, as that was going on, local police were in the process of liberating those people, and we certainly appreciate the activities and the actions taken by the Pakistani government to fight that situation.

Another success, Malaysia upgraded this year to tier two watch list. You may recall that last year Malaysia was downgraded to tier three. Over the course of the last year, the Malaysian authorities have acknowledged and begun to tackle their serious human trafficking problem, including intensified engagement with foreign governments.

For the first time, the government formed partnerships with nongovernmental organizations to work in partnership. And as a result of their work with the United Nations interagency anti-TIP program out of Bangkok, they identified and assisted victims of forced labor on fishing boats on the coast of Sarawak.

Those initial cases of labor trafficking, as well as what they're doing on sex trafficking, is certainly heartening, as far as the commitment that is beginning to be shown by the government of Malaysia.

One final success that I'd like to highlight, although there are many more in the book, and that is the action on the part of the government of Syria, which was this year upgraded to the tier two watch list from tier three, where it had been for years.

In Syria, partnerships with international organizations and NGOs contributed to the progress. It included its enhancement of anti- trafficking law, enactment of two decrees to better protect foreign domestic workers, and opening a second shelter for trafficking victims in Aleppo, which added to a pre-existing government-supported shelter in Damascus.

Again, we see much of the problem in Syria and much -- much of the activity now to protect the workers coming with the issues of foreign domestic workers, the maids who have been brought into Syria. So we see that kind of increased political (inaudible) government, as well as many others, and again, we are encouraged.

We look at -- as the secretary said today -- we look at this not as an exercise in finger-wagging or calling out, but rather diagnosing ourselves and countries around the world so that we can work together in partnership.

I appreciate your attention, and we'll take a few questions. I know you have some to begin with.

QUESTION: A couple things. One, just in very simple terms, can you explain why the U.S. government feels that it is beneficial to rate itself? Does it add to your credibility when you talk to others?

Second, the secretary alluded to some countries who had reached out to the U.S. government trying not to be left in low categories or drop down to them. And give us some sense of who those are? Tier three, for example, this year, yet again, includes both Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, countries with enormous resources, and yet they have been very durable presences in that bottom category. Were they the ones trying to get off it? Or are they just making no real efforts?

And then lastly, could you address the question of Switzerland, which is on tier two, not the watch list, but tier two, again, a country with significant resources? Why has it not been possible for the Swiss to do better?

CDEBACA: Well, there's several questions. I'll try to take them in descending order.

As far as the self-assessment, one of the things that we've seen over the last few years is a number of countries often in Europe have put into the -- in place the practice of what's called the national rapporteurs. And they often like an -- kind of like an ombudsman are assessing the anti-trafficking efforts within that country.

We have seen that as a helpful activity on the part of those governments, as -- to the degree that they are honest, to the degree that they confront not just successes, but also challenges. And so we felt that the United States needed that as a diagnostic tool for ourselves, that the Obama administration's committed to applying the same diagnostics that we would apply to other countries.

So when we look at the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking in persons that we are statutorily bound to apply to the other countries of the world, not only do we feel that it was only fair and just that we apply those same minimum standards, but also that it would be helpful to run the United States' anti-trafficking activities through that analytical framework.

And so as I said, we encourage other countries not simply to look to our report for their own self-assessment, but to perform their own, as well.

Switzerland, I think, is in the process of doing that. We stand ready to continue to work with the Swiss. In our review this year and working with the Swiss government, we did identify a gap in their law that created a loophole in which children at the ages of 16 and 17 could legally participate in prostitution.

And since the law here in the United States as far as the minimum standards, as well as the international norms of the Palermo Protocol and otherwise, make 18 a very bright line. Even for countries that have legalized prostitution, the child prostitution situation was something that had to be dealt with.

And I've already spoken with the Swiss ambassador. We've -- we're talking to the Swiss as to how we can -- in partnership, work through some of the legal challenges that they face. And we do see a commitment from them to -- to address these issues.

QUESTION: That would require legislation on their part? Or could it be done by, you know, regulations or something?

CDEBACA: I wouldn't -- you know, I wouldn't speculate on the various ways that the Swiss could -- could actually handle this. One of the issues, of course, with Switzerland is, when you're dealing at the cantonal level with law enforcement issues, some countries can exchange their entire trafficking regime overnight simply by passing a federal law. Others have to do it...

QUESTION: Locally?

CDEBACA: ... state by state, locality by locality. And I think that that's something that the Swiss are looking at as we speak.

QUESTION: Was this a problem last year?

CDEBACA: It's a situation that I think...

QUESTION: I mean, I just don't understand how -- what -- did something change over the last year to get them dropped from tier one?

CDEBACA: The -- the law and the loophole was existent for quite a while. I think that our recognition of it...

QUESTION: Ah, OK.

CDEBACA: ... as we...

(CROSSTALK)

QUESTION: So, basically, they should have been on tier two last year and the year before?

CDEBACA: I wouldn't speculate backwards. I -- I certainly would let this year's ranking speak for itself.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) Kuwait and Saudi Arabia...

CDEBACA: The Kuwait and Saudi Arabia...

(CROSSTALK)

QUESTION: ... who else was trying to -- who was trying to get themselves out of the cellar?

CDEBACA: Well, I mean, you know, we have yet to see a country come to us and ask to be put on a lower-tier ranking. So I think that, you know, as we work with the countries throughout the year, there's always the desire to -- to move up in the tier rankings. What we then look for is, what are the actions? What are the activities?

In both Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, we have seen some beginning of action, and we will continue to work with them, whether it's the Kuwaitis starting to at least discuss the extension of certain labor protections to foreign workers in Kuwait or whether it's the Saudi Arabia example in which this spring they did pass a first draft of a -- of an anti-trafficking law.

In both countries, we would like to see enhanced victim services. In the kingdom of Saudi Arabia especially, the situation for escaped maids and escaped workers is -- continues to be untenable, in no small part because of the situation where the employer has to kind of countersign the exit visas for the person who they sponsored. Even if that person was running away from the employer for abuse, that employer still has the power to block them from leaving and going home or getting another job.

So we're certainly going to work with the governments both of Kuwait and Saudi Arabia as far as how they can address these situations, not because we're trying to figure out, how do we get them under a different tier? It's, how do we get the situation for workers in those countries to be better? The tiers then follow.

Yes?

QUESTION: You said earlier this morning -- and it's also in the report, which I haven't, of course, read all of -- that the United States is a source country for human trafficking. What does that mean? Are you saying that there are U.S. citizens around the country that are, you know, trafficking women and children and taking advantage of people that are here for temporary working visas? Or are you saying that there's people that are coming in from outside that are operating these trafficking rings and those kind of things?

What is it? Because it doesn't seem to specify that in here.

CDEBACA: I hate to say this, but the answer is kind of yes. The -- what we have in the United States is a situation where there are homegrown traffickers who are enslaving people in various segments of the economy. And some of those end up enslaving American citizens. Some of those end up enslaving foreign nationals.

Some of the -- the foreign nationals who are here were recruited in their home countries and brought here by people who intended to do that all along. Others may have emigrated and then, once they're here, get trapped.

I'd actually -- and I know you have a very busy day -- but if people have a chance, the Coalition Immokalee Workers' slavery museum, which is out in the parking lot right now, breaks this down, I think, pretty well, in that it talks -- it has some of the artifacts not just from cases with -- and men and women from Mexico and Guatemala who are enslaved in Florida, picking crops, but African-American men from Florida who spoke English, who don't have those same issues of being a foreign person or afraid of the immigration or something like that, African-American men being enslaved in agricultural in Florida within the last five, six years.

QUESTION: By U.S. citizens or by...

CDEBACA: By U.S. citizens. So it's a very multifaceted way that it ends up manifesting. And in sex trafficking, then there's also the difference between those who are enslaving immigrant women in prostitution and those who are enslaving U.S. citizen women and girls. It's often runaways.

In those situations, those cases have historically been dealt with in the United States under the prostitution statutes rather than under the involuntary servitude and slavery statutes, though what's happening in some of the -- the situations is that the pimps are actually enslaving the women that are working for them.

QUESTION: One quick thing. Can you explain the special cases, what that is, Haiti? And what was the other country?

CDEBACA: Somalia. Haiti and Somalia are special cases in no small part because of the capacity of the government. When we have a functional government, even a very haltingly functional government in that country not only gets assessed, but actually ranked.

In both Haiti and Somalia, it continues to be our position that those governments are not sufficiently operative to actually give them a ranking in the report.

QUESTION: Thank you.

CDEBACA: Yes?

QUESTION: In the case of Cuba, I'm wondering what -- what actually is the justification for the -- I read a little bit, but it sounds -- it seems like the U.S. might be open to charges of, you know, political ranking. I'm just trying to get why Cuba is on tier three.

CDEBACA: Well, I think that one of the things that we see for Cuba is that there is no -- no law against this practice. There are some other laws that could be cobbled together, perhaps, in order to -- to prosecute a trafficker, but there's no evidence that that has actually been done.

I think one of the things that we also look at there is, again, the age of legal prostitution. Again, children can legally be in prostitution at ages 16 and 17.

We also see the lack of human trafficking protections, and no training for the police, prosecutors, or social workers on what to do if one sees a human trafficking situation.

So in a -- in a country where not only do you have a -- such a large tourist industry, other countries in the region that draw tourists from the same places as Cuba have large child sex tourism problems and are working to address those. We don't see the same activity in Cuba. So it's a multifaceted approach as far as why they would end up on tier three.

QUESTION: Can you comment on (OFF-MIKE) what do you say to China, where a lot of (OFF-MIKE)

CDEBACA: Well, North Korea continues to be a tier three country in this year's report. We have not seen any indication that the North Korean government is actually addressing the human trafficking problem.

One of the issues, of course, that we have when we look at the northeastern part of China is that there's the North Korean refugee community, that that population -- what we'd like to see from the government of -- of China is that there would be actual screening of people within that refugee flow to see which are the people who are actually trafficking victims.

We're not saying that every one of them necessarily is, but we've had enough reports, whether it's of forced labor, whether it's of forced marriages, enough reports of abuse coming out of that region that we'd like to see more screening and then more victim protections on the part of the Chinese government.

When it comes to -- to North Korea, I think that one of the issues that we're looking at is not simply the lack of a legal regime in order to address human trafficking or to be able to prosecute traffickers or rehabilitate the victims or do any of the things that even are the baseline to be working on it, but also when the North Korean government exports labor to other countries, are those people -- in the places that they're going, do they have a modicum of freedom there? Or is the government sending -- whether it's police or security services or others with them in order to keep them in line?

And so we've expressed concern, as have some of the governments of Western Europe -- I think it was the Czech Republic, actually, terminated their contracts with the North Korean labor export company because of their concerns of the type of abuse that was happening with the exported North Korean laborers.

Yes?

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) to tier one this year. And is there any special reasons for such movement?

CDEBACA: Well, one of the things that hopefully jumps out at you as you read the report this year -- and if not, I'll give it a little bit of a boost -- is the need for more victim protections and the need for a victim response that's not based on detaining the victims.

If you take somebody out of a servitude situation where they've had their freedom denied, you take them out, ostensibly rescuing them, and then you put them into a detention center, then that is not necessarily going to win any cases, it's not necessarily going to rehabilitate the victim, it's not really honoring the ethos of the U.N. protocol on what you're supposed to do as far as the three P approach of prevention, protection and prosecution.

Taiwan -- and one of the things that we've seen that occasioned the upgrade this year -- is that the victims' services side has been addressed. So for the first time, their new comprehensive law -- that is very well conceived -- has now come into force. And one of the things it allows is it allows for victims to work, to be able to stay in Taiwan, to get jobs with other employers, and to work while their cases are being investigated.

So many countries around the world, when you go to a shelter, first of all, it might look more like a detention center, but the victims are just there being warehoused. These are people who are coming out of a tremendously abusive situation. The research shows that most of them haven't even gotten to the point of having post-traumatic stress disorder; they're still in trauma for the first 90 days or so when they're coming out of this slavery situation.

Taiwan has recognized that, has studied it, and has actually acted to make sure that these people are not just put in jail after they get liberated.

QUESTION: I haven't read the report yet, but I was just wondering if you can address this issue of trafficking from China and the Indian subcontinent, India, Pakistan, Sri Lanka, and Bangladesh, which usually come to Europe and Africa, and then they're brought to U.S. to -- by land or sea, Mexico, and this -- and this is -- it's -- it's very much related to the -- you know, the terrorists can use this network.

And another thing was the financial network, which is called hawala, which is word of mouth, have you addressed that?

CDEBACA: I think that the -- the network that you're describing that goes through Africa and into Latin America and up is typically a route that we see with the large-scale alien smuggling situations. We have heard situations of trafficking occurring within that migrant stream, most notably, as you said, with Chinese -- often Chinese women who are way-laid for a couple of years in southern Africa, being forced into prostitution in order to pay the smuggling fees or pay the debts that the alien smugglers claim that they're owed.

But one of the things that we've seen is that this is a route that is used by both alien smugglers and human traffickers. It's hard to differentiate amongst the two. And so a lot of our attention -- because it's such a large human smuggling route -- much of our attention has been on the smuggling aspect.

And our colleagues over at Department of Homeland Security have beefed up their legal attaches at the embassies. We've got a good cadre of folks who are working out of Pretoria and have been able to dismantle and impinge a number of the shipments and actually have been able to arrest and prosecute some of the large players in that.

I think that -- that you do raise a good point, though, that we have to be mindful of the fact that these routes can be used for various things. You can have a person who's flowing through it who is headed towards a life of indentured servitude. You can have another person who's headed through that route who's simply going to melt into society as an illegal alien. But then you could also have someone who's coming in to do harm.

And so we're looking at that kind of across the board to try to make sure that -- that we can disrupt those established smuggling routes.

QUESTION: And about the financial -- the financial network, which is called hawala, which works just word of mouth, you know, $1 million to be transferred, no money -- moves across the continent. It is paid by this network.

CDEBACA: I would -- I would defer to our colleagues at -- at Treasury and others as far as the -- the mechanics.

QUESTION: But Europe is doing a lot to control this.

CDEBACA: Excuse me?

QUESTION: Europe is doing a lot to control this.

CDEBACA: Yes, and -- and I know that hawala is something that Treasury and other working groups have been dealing with. That's not necessarily something that's reflected in this year's report.

QUESTION: Do you see improvement in the number of victims decreasing or increasing this year? Last year, the U.N. reported about 12 million people were victims. How -- how do you see it? Is it improvement?

CDEBACA: We see improvement in that we're seeing now 116 countries that have -- 116 countries have enacted legislation. The number of convictions have increased, 40 percent, actually, since last year, up to over 4,000. The number of labor convictions have tripled, up to 335.

But what we don't necessarily see yet is the decrease in victims, partially because we're still trying to get the baseline as to what is the baseline from which we would work?

I think that one of the things that we see is that, as a country starts to comply with their obligations under the Palermo Protocol around prevention, protection and prosecution, once they put together an intergovernmental -- like an inter-ministerial working group or an interagency working group, once they put those structures in place, they start to see more victims.

It's because they're finding them. It's not because the victims weren't there before.

So the Netherlands Antilles is a perfect example. Up until last year, they didn't have those structures in place. And so NGOs would report that there was trafficking in Curacao and those different islands, but there was no cases, no victims identified. In the last year, they've actually arrested and prosecuted nine traffickers because they had built the -- the structures that enable them to see it.

So I actually think that success in the -- the next few years is actually going to look a lot -- it's going to be an increase in numbers of cases, an increase in numbers of victims. That might be counterintuitive. You'd like to see it go down. But I think that success will actually be that we're uncovering more cases. Then, as we get the baseline, we'll be able to start assessing the efficacy of the various things.

Take one more question and then...

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) from the -- from the report, from the overview that, you know, the sense of progress and improvement that you're talking about. One might have imagined that the economic global downturn might have led to -- I mean, you can imagine how it could have led to some -- more cases, worse problem. I wonder, do you have any sense of the economic impact of the global recession?

CDEBACA: As far as we can tell, there's a couple of competing issues within the -- the economy downturn. On the one hand, people are more desperate and are, therefore, willing to take more risks, putting themselves into harm's way with an abusive labor recruiter.

On the other hand, there are fewer big projects for them to be placed by those abusive labor recruiters. So if you see, for instance, building booms in Western Europe or in the gulf, those building booms collapsed, and there's no longer the demand for your Eastern European construction workers in Western Europe, for your South Asian construction workers, say, for instance, in the gulf states.

So it seems to be canceling itself out a little bit, as far as the demand for the -- for the exploitable labor, going down as part of the market.

What we are very concerned, though, about the economic downturn is the softening or what appears to be a softening of the amount of money that some of the countries are spending on victim protection. And we think that, even in the economic downturn, it's something that your money is well spent upon.

Victim protection in this situation is not simply a social program. It's also being able to help the folks who you've gotten out of the slavery situation, work them through their trauma, and then have them as effective witnesses against the transnational criminals that you're trying to put out of business.

So it's not simply -- we would suggest to the countries that are thinking about cutting the budgets as far as victim protection is concerned, it's not simply a social program. It's actually a law enforcement tool that they'd be putting on the shelf.

And, frankly, we've seen countries that are as poor as Moldova still spending money on victim shelters, still supporting these types of things. So if Moldova, which has one of the lowest GDPs out there, if Moldova can come up with $50,000 or $60,000 to fund shelters, we would certainly expect other countries, even in a recession, would be able to, as well.

QUESTION: Thank you very much.

CDEBACA: Thank you so much.

END

LOAD-DATE: June 14, 2010

210 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Federal News Service

June 14, 2010 Monday

STATE DEPARTMENT SPECIAL BRIEFING WITH LUIS CDEBACA, DIRECTOR, OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS; SUBJECT: 2010 TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT;
LOCATION: STATE DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON, D.C.

SECTION: STATE DEPARTMENT BRIEFINGLENGTH: 5302 words

STATE DEPARTMENT SPECIAL BRIEFING WITH LUIS CDEBACA, DIRECTOR, OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS SUBJECT: 2010 TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT LOCATION: STATE DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON, D.C. TIME: 12:14 P.M. EDT DATE: MONDAY, JUNE 14, 2010

STAFF: Good afternoon. Welcome to the State Department.

As you now, Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton announced this morning the release of the 10th annual Trafficking in Persons Report.

This 177-country report's the most comprehensive worldwide report on the efforts of governments to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons.

In light of that, we're very fortunate to have with us today Ambassador-at-Large Luis CdeBaca of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons here to answer some of your questions and talk a little bit about the report in more detail.

And just for your awareness, later on this week Ambassador CdeBaca will participate on Tuesday in a congressional reception for the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Heroes. That's hosted by the Helsinki Commission.

On Wednesday, June 16th, Ambassador CdeBaca will participate in a briefing on the Trafficking in Persons Report at the Foreign Press Center in New York, and that's at 10 a.m. And then at 1 p.m. that day he'll deliver keynote remarks regarding the 2010 report at a panel discussion hosted by the U.S. Mission to the United Nations, the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime, and the Schuster Institute for Investigative Journalism at Brandeis University.

Without further ado, I'll hand it over to Ambassador CdeBaca. Thank you.

MR. CDEBACA: Thank you for the introduction, Mark (sp).

Earlier this morning, Secretary Clinton publicly released the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report. The annual report provides a diagnosis of the global effort to combat modern slavery.

This year the report assessed 177 countries, including two special cases. Those special cases are Haiti and Somalia.

Two countries were ranked for the first time, Kiribati and the United States.

It's important to highlight the significance of the U.S. ranking. As we work towards a lead-by-example diplomacy, it was common sense to include ourselves in this year -- in this year's report. Data was collected across the interagency -- prosecutions from Department of Justice, information from DHS and victim services efforts by Department of Health and Human Services.

We also collected information from state and local law enforcement, nongovernmental organizations and governments.

The Trafficking in Persons Report has spurred action throughout the years by other countries to take a hard look at their internal efforts against trafficking. Finland is a good example. Just a couple of weeks ago, they recently completed a self-assessment, similar to the United States, of their trafficking-in-persons response. And we certainly look forward to other countries' undertaking that type of self-diagnostic.

Without a doubt, the United States continues to be the world leader on this issue. In the 10 years since President Clinton signed the Trafficking Victims Protection Act and the United Nations outlined the international community's anti-trafficking standards in the Palermo protocol, we've seen much progress. And, as diagnosed by this year's report, we still face a number of challenges. The report discusses a host of those challenges, including the need for improved victim services. Whether in the United States or another country, we must treat victims as victims and not as criminals. We must look towards promising practices such as shelters that do not imprison victims but instead allow for rehabilitation and recovery from the crimes committed against them.

The feminization of trafficking is a trend that we see in this year's report, and that's something that's expanding beyond the conventional stereotypes of sex trafficking. Today more than 56 percent of trafficking women (sic/victims) are women and girls, and we see more and more women suffering from labor trafficking, specifically involuntary domestic servitude. These maids suffer in silence behind closed doors, and in some ways are the most vulnerable because they do not know anyone other than their captors.

Often, as I've personally seen while I prosecuted these cases at an earlier career at the Department of Justice -- and this still holds true today -- these women, and in some cases men and boys, are also forced into sex slavery by those who would hold them in involuntary domestic servitude.

And I'd point out that in recent months -- I think in the UAE there have been a couple of prosecutions in which women who were brought into the Emirates in order to be domestic servants were then prostituted out by their employers. So the connection between domestic servitude and sex slavery is something that we're starting to recognize more and more.

I would like to highlight some successes that are in the report, because even as we face challenges in our fight against modern slavery, there are more people around the world than ever before working on this human-rights issue. I'll run through a few quick successes, and then we can move to questions.

One success that I think is very noteworthy is that of Bosnia- Herzegovina, which this year is upgraded to tier one on the report. Bosnia was on tier three for many years at the beginning of this decade. And I think that a lot of people -- for a lot of people, the global fight against human trafficking first came to people's attention because of the widespread sex slavery and the widespread abuses in the Balkans during the various wars of the 1990s.

This is something that we've seen on the part of the Bosnian -- the Bosnian government: clear progress, especially over the last year, significantly in reducing its use of suspended sentences, imposing stronger penalties for convicted traffickers, partnering with nongovernmental organizations on victim protection, and employing proactive procedures to go out and identify and help victims. It is a sea change, if you look at the trafficking issue over the course of the last decade, that Bosnia would be ranked in the first tier of countries that are fully compliant with the minimum standards.

This year, we also saw noteworthy success by the government of Egypt. The Egyptian government's progress in combatting human trafficking over the last year is particularly evident in its enactment of a comprehensive law and its greater law-enforcement and prevention efforts to confront fraudulent short-term marriages -- often termed "summer marriages" -- of Egyptian girls, which is a thinly veiled cover for a prostitution of children.

Their activity against the summer marriages and, as the secretary pointed out earlier this morning, the steps that they are taking towards starting shelters with some of the major hospitals in Cairo and Alexandria, reflects the government's partnerships with international legal experts, the key one of which was, we were happy to be able to help fund from here at the State Department, in collaboration with civil society. We're very encouraged by what we're seeing coming out of Egypt.

So too the government of Pakistan, which was upgraded to Tier 2 this year, has dramatically increased the number of convictions and prosecutions for human trafficking, undertaking creative efforts to prevent bonded labor. Behind this enhanced commitment, particularly a greater focus on bonded labor, are stronger partnerships with United States government and international organizations on the issue of trafficking in persons.

Some of you may recall, some of you may have covered a situation last fall, September, in which over a hundred -- 170 Pakistani nationals, victims of bonded laborers, were taken hostage by feudal landlords in Sindh province in retaliation for actually seeking a habeas corpus writ to free them from debt bondage in court. What they got for their troubles was confined and jailed by the landlords and their henchmen, their guards.

The secretary raised this, and in fact, civil society actors asked her about it in her October visit to Islamabad. Simultaneously as that was going on, local police were in the process of liberating those people.

And we certainly appreciate the activities and the actions taken by the Pakistani government to fight that situation.

Another success: Malaysia upgraded this year to Tier 2 watch list. You may recall that last year Malaysia was downgraded to Tier 3. Over the course of the last year, the Malaysian authorities have acknowledged and begun to tackle their serious human-trafficking problem, including intensified engagement with foreign governments. For the first time the government formed partnerships with nongovernmental organizations to work in partnership. And as a result of their work with the United Nations interagency anti-TIP program out of Bangkok, they identified and assisted victims of forced labor on fishing boats on the coast of Sarawak. Those initial cases of labor trafficking, as well as what they're doing on sex trafficking, is certainly heartening as far as the commitment that is beginning to be shown by the government of Malaysia.

One final success that I'd like to highlight, although there are many more in the -- in the book, and that is the action on the part of the government of Syria, which was this year upgraded to the Tier 2 watch list from Tier 3, where it had been for years.

In Syria, partnerships with international organizations and NGOs contributed to the progress. It included enhancement of an anti- trafficking law, enactment of two decrees to better protect foreign domestic workers and opening a second shelter for trafficking victims in Aleppo, which added to a preexisting government-supported shelter in Damascus. Again, we see much of the problem in Syria and much of the activity now to protect the workers coming with the issues of foreign domestic workers, the maids who have been brought into Syria.

So we see that kind of increased political will on that government as well as many others.

And, again, we are encouraged. We look at -- as the secretary said today, we look at this not as an exercise in finger-wagging or calling out, but rather diagnosing ourselves and countries around the world so that we can work together in partnership.

I appreciate your attention, and we'll take a few questions. I know that you had one to begin it.

Q A couple things. One, just in very simple terms, can you explain why the U.S. government feels that it is beneficial to rate itself? Does it add to your credibility when you talk to others?

Second, the secretary alluded to some countries who had reached out to the U.S. government trying not to be left in low categories or dropped down to them. And can you give us some sense of who those are? Tier 3, for example, this year yet again includes both Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, countries with enormous resources, and yet they have been very durable presences in that bottom category. Were they the ones trying to get off it? Or are they just making no real efforts?

And then lastly, could you address the question of Switzerland, which is on Tier 2 -- not the Watch List, but Tier 2? Again, a country with significant resources; why has it not been possible for the Swiss to do better?

MR. CDEBACA: Well, there's several questions, and I'll try to take them in descending order. As far as the self-assessment, one of the things that we've seen over the last few years is a number of countries often in Europe have put into the -- in place the practice of what's called a -- the national rapporteurs. And they often, like an -- kind of like an ombudsman, are assessing the anti-trafficking efforts within that country. We have seen that as a helpful activity on the part of those governments, as -- to the degree that they are honest, to the degree that they confront not just successes but also challenges.

And so we felt that the United States needed that as a diagnostic tool for ourselves, that the Obama administration is committed to applying the same diagnostics that we would apply to other countries. So when we look at the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking in persons that we are statutorily bound to apply to the other countries of the world, not only did we feel that it was only fair and just that we apply those same minimum standards, but also that it would be helpful to run the United States anti-trafficking activities through that analytical framework.

And so, as I said, we encourage other countries not simply to look to our report for their own self-assessment, but to perform their own as well. Switzerland I think is in the process of doing that. We stand ready to continue to work with the Swiss. There are -- in our review this year, and working with the Swiss government, we did identify a gap in their law that created a loophole in which children at the ages of 16 and 17 could legally participate in prostitution. And since the law here in the United States as far as the minimum standards, as well as the international norms of the Palermo Protocol and otherwise, make 18 a very bright line, even for countries that have legalized prostitution, the child prostitution situation was something that had to be dealt with.

And I've already spoken with the Swiss ambassador. We're talking to the Swiss as to how we can, in partnership, work through some of the legal challenges that they face. And we do see commitment from them to address these issues.

Q That would require legislation on their part, or can it be done by, you know, regulations or something?

MR. CDEBACA: I wouldn't -- you know, I wouldn't speculate on the various ways that the Swiss could actually handle this.

One of the issues, of course, with Switzerland is when you're dealing at the cantonal level with law enforcement issues. Some countries can change their entire trafficking regime overnight simply by passing a federal law. Others have to do it --

Q Locally.

MR. CDEBACA: -- state by state. Locality by locality. And I think that that's something that the Swiss are looking at.

Q (Off mike) -- last year?

MR. CDEBACA: It's a situation that I think --

Q I just don't understand how -- I mean, did something change over the last year to get them dropped from Tier 1?

MR. CDEBACA: The law and the loophole was extant for quite a while. I think that our recognition of it as we --

Q Ah. Okay. So basically, they should have been on Tier 2 last year or the -- and the year before?

MR. CDEBACA: I wouldn't speculate backwards. I certainly would let this year's ranking speak for itself.

Q (Off mike) -- Saudi Arabia --

MR. CDEBACA: In the Kuwait and Saudi Arabia --

Q -- and who else was trying to -- who was trying to themselves out of the --

MR. CDEBACA: Well, I mean, we have yet to see a country come to us and ask to be put on a lower-tier ranking. So I think that, you know, as we work with the countries throughout the year, there's always the desire to move up in the tier rankings. What we then look for is what are the actions, what are the activities.

In both Kuwait and Saudi Arabia we have seen some beginning of action, and we will continue to work with them, whether it's the Kuwaitis starting to at least discuss the extension of certain labor protections to foreign workers in Kuwait or whether it's the Saudi Arabia example, in which this spring they did pass a first draft of an anti-trafficking law.

In both countries we would like to see enhanced victim services. In the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, especially, the situation for escaped maids and escaped workers is -- continues to be untenable, in no small part because of the situation where the employer has to kind of countersign the exit visas for the person who they sponsored.

Even if that person was running away from the employer for abuse, that employer still has the power to block them from leaving and going home, or getting another job.

So we're certainly going to work with the governments both of Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, as far as how they can address these situations, not because we're trying to figure out how do we get them under a different tier. It's how do we get the situation for workers in those countries to be better. The tiers then follow.

Yes.

Q You said earlier this morning -- and it's also in the report, which I haven't of course read all of -- that the United States is a source country for human trafficking. What does that mean? Are you saying that there are U.S. citizens around the country that are, you know, trafficking women and children and taking advantage of people that are here for temporary working visas? Or are you saying that there's people that are coming in from outside the country that are operating these trafficking rings and those kinds of things? What does it -- because it doesn't seem to specify that in here.

MR. CDEBACA: I hate to say this, but the answer is kind of yes. The -- what we have in the United States is a situation where there are homegrown traffickers who are enslaving people in various segments of the economy, and some of those end up enslaving American citizens, some of those end up enslaving foreign nationals.

Some of the foreign nationals who are here were recruited in their home countries and brought here by people who intended to do that all along. Others may have immigrated and then, once they're here, get trapped.

I'd actually -- and I know you have a very busy day, but if people have a chance, the Coalition of Immokalee Workers' slavery museum, which is out in the parking lot right now, breaks this down, I think, pretty well, in that it talks of -- it has some of the artifacts not just from cases with men and women from Mexico and Guatemala who were enslaved in Florida picking crops, but African-American men from Florida, who spoke English, who don't have those same issues of being a foreign person or afraid of the immigration or something like that -- African-American men being enslaved in agriculture in Florida within the last five, six years.

Q By U.S. citizens, or by --

MR. CDEBACA: By U.S. citizens.

So it's a very multifaceted way that it -- that it ends up manifesting. And in sex trafficking, then, there's also the difference between those who are enslaving immigrant women in prostitution and those who are enslaving U.S. citizen women and girls. It's often runaways. In those situations, those cases have historically been dealt with in the United States under the prostitution statutes rather than under the involuntary servitude and slavery statutes, though what's happening in some of the situations is that the pimps are actually enslaving the women that are working for them.

Q One quick thing. Can you explain special cases, what that is -- Haiti, and what was the other country?

MR. CDEBACA: Somalia. Haiti and Somalia are special cases in no small part because of the capacity of the government. When we have a functional government, even a very haltingly functional government, then that country not only gets assessed but actually ranked. In both Haiti and Somalia, it continues to be our position that those governments are not sufficiently operative to actually give them a ranking in the report.

Q Thank you.

MR. CDEBACA (?): Yes.

Q (Off mike) -- in the case of Cuba, I'm wondering what -- what actually is the justification for the -- I mean, I read I've read a little bit, but it sounds -- it seems like the U.S. might be open to charges of, you know, political ranking.

I'm just trying to get why Cuba is on Tier 3.

MR. CDEBACA: Well, I think that one of the things that we see for Cuba is that there is no law against this practice. There's some other laws that could be cobbled together, perhaps, in order to prosecute a trafficker. But there's no evidence that that has actually been done.

I think that one of the things that we also look at there is, again, the age of legal prostitution. Again, children are -- can legally be in prostitution at ages 16 and 17.

We also see the lack of human-trafficking protections and no training for the police prosecutors or social workers on what to do if one sees a human-trafficking situation. So in a -- in a country where not only do you have a -- such a large tourist industry -- other countries in the region that draw tourists from the same places as Cuba have large child sex-tourism problems and are working to address those. We don't see the same activity in Cuba. So it's a multifaceted approach as far as why they would end up on Tier 3.

Q (Off mike.) Can you comment on North Korea? And also, what do you say to China, where a lot of North Korean human trafficking -- (off mike)?

MR. CDEBACA: Well, North Korea continues to be a Tier 3 country in this year's report. We have not seen any indication that the North Korean government is actually addressing the human-trafficking problem.

One of the issues, of course, that we have when we look at the northeastern part of China is that there is the North Korean refugee community, that population. What we'd like to see from the government of China is that there would be actual screening of people within that refugee flow to see which are the people who are actually trafficking victims. We're not saying that every one of them necessarily is, but we've had enough reports, whether it's of forced labor, whether it's of forced marriages, enough reports of abuse coming out of that region that we'd like to see more screening and then more victim protections on the part of the Chinese government.

When it comes to North Korea, I think that one of the issues that we're looking at is not simply the lack of a legal regime in order to address human trafficking or to be able to prosecute traffickers or rehabilitate the victims or do any of the things that even are the baseline to be working on it, but also, when the North Korean government exports labor to other countries, are those people -- in the places that they're going, do they have a modicum of freedom there or is the government sending, whether it's police or security services or others with them in order to keep them in line.

And so we've expressed concern, as have some of the governments of Western Europe. I think it's the Czech Republic actually terminated their contracts with the North Korean labor export country because of their concerns of the type of abuse that was happening with the exported North Korean laborers.

Yes.

Q (Off mike) -- in Taiwan? It had been moved from Tier 2 to Tier 1 this year. And is there any special reason for such movement?

MR. CDEBACA: Well, one of the things that hopefully jumps out at you as you read the report this year -- and if not, I'll give it a little bit of a boost -- is the need for more victim protections and the need for a victim response that's not based on detaining the victims. If you take somebody out of a servitude situation where they've had their freedom denied, you take them out, ostensibly rescuing them, and then you put them into a detention center, then that is not necessarily going to win any cases, it's not necessarily going to rehabilitate the victim, it's not really honoring the ethos of the U.N. protocol on what you're supposed to do as far as the 3P approach of prevention, protection and prosecution.

Taiwan -- and one of the things that we've seen that occasioned the upgrade this year is that the victim-services side has been addressed. So for the first time their new comprehensive law, which was very well conceived, has now come into force. And one of the things it allows is it allows for victims to work, to be able to stay in Taiwan, to get jobs with other employers and to work while their cases are being investigated.

So many countries around the world, when you go to a shelter -- first of all, it might look more like a detention center -- but the victims are just there being warehoused. These are people who are coming out of a tremendously abusive situation. The research shows that most of them haven't even gotten to the point of having post-traumatic stress disorder; they're still in trauma for the first 90 days or so when they're coming out of this slavery situation.

Taiwan has recognized that, has studied it and has actually acted to make sure that these people are not just put in jail after they get liberated.

Yes.

Q I haven't read the report yet. But I was just wondering if you can address this issue of trafficking from China and the Indian subcontinent -- India, Pakistan, Sri Lanka and Bangladesh -- which usually come to Europe and Africa.

And then they are brought to the U.S. through -- by land or sea, Mexico. And this is -- it's very much related to the -- you know, the terrorists can use this network. And another thing was, the financial network which is called hawala, which is word of mouth, have you addressed that?

MR. CDEBACA: I think that the network that you're describing, that goes through Africa and into Latin America and up, is typically a route that we see with the large-scale alien-smuggling situations.

We have heard situations of trafficking occurring within that migrant stream, most notably as you said with Chinese, often Chinese women who are waylaid for a couple of years in Southern Africa being forced into prostitution, in order to pay the smuggling fees or pay the debts that the alien smugglers claim that they're owed.

But one of the things that we've seen is that this is a route that is used by both alien smugglers and human traffickers. It's hard to differentiate amongst the two. And so a lot of our attention -- because it's such a large human smuggling route, much of our attention has been on the smuggling aspect. And our colleagues over at the Department of Homeland Security have beefed up their legal attaches.

At the embassies, we've got a good cadre of folks working out of Pretoria, and have been able to dismantle and impinge a number of the shipments and actually have been able to arrest and prosecute some of the large players in that.

I think that you do raise a good point, though, that we have to be mindful of the fact that these routes can be used for various things. You can have a person who's flowing through it who is headed towards a life of indentured servitude. You can have another person who's headed through that route who's simply going to melt into society as an illegal alien. But then you could also have someone who's coming in to do harm. And so we're looking at that across the board to try to make sure that we can disrupt those established smuggling routes.

Q And about the financial network, which is called hawala, which works just word of mouth. You know, $1 million to be transferred. No money changes -- moves across the continent; it is paid by this network.

MR. CDEBACA: I would defer to our colleagues at Treasury and others as far as the mechanics.

Q Because Europe is doing a lot to control this.

MR. CDEBACA: Excuse me?

Q Europe is doing a lot to control this.

MR. CDEBACA: Yes, and I know that hawala is something that Treasury and other working groups have been dealing with. That's not necessarily something that's reflected in this year's report.

Q Do you see movement, the number of victims decreasing or increasing this year? Last year the U.N. reported about 12 million people were victims. How do you see it? Is there improvement?

MR. CDEBACA: We see improvement in that we see now 116 countries that have -- 116 countries have enacted legislation. The number of convictions have increased, 40 percent, actually, since last year, up to over 4,000.

The number of labor convictions have tripled up to 335.

But what we don't necessarily see yet is the decrease in victims, partially because we're still trying to get the base line as to what is the base line from which we would work. I think that one of the things that we see is that as a country starts to comply with their obligations under the Palermo Protocol around prevention, protection and prosecution -- once they put together an intergovernmental -- like an inter-administerial working group or an interagency working group -- once they put those structures in place, they start to see more victims. It's because they're finding them. It's not because the victims weren't there before.

So the Netherlands Antilles is a perfect example. Up until last year, they didn't have those structures in place. And so NGOs would report that there was trafficking in Curacao and those different islands. But there was no cases and no victims identified. In the last year, they've actually arrested and prosecuted nine traffickers, because they built the structures that have been able to see it.

So I actually think that success in the next few years is actually going to look a lot -- you know, it's going to be an increase in numbers of cases, an increase in numbers of victims. That might be counterintuitive. You'd like to see it go down. But I think that success will actually be that we're uncovering more cases. Then, as we get the baseline, we'll be able to start assessing the efficacy of the various things.

Q Thank you.

MR. CDEBACA: Just one more question, and then --

STAFF: Yeah. One more question.

MR. CDEBACA: Yeah.

Q Yeah. Thank you. Yeah, you get a sense from the report, from the overview that -- you know, the sense of progress and improvement that you're talking about. Now, one might have imagined that the economic global downturn might have led to -- I mean, you can imagine how it could have led to, in some -- in more cases worse problems.

I'm wondering, do you have any sense of the economic impact of the global recession?

MR. CDEBACA: As far as we can tell, there's a couple of competing issues within the economic downturn. On the one hand, people are more desperate, and are therefore willing to take more risks, putting themselves into harm's way with an abusive labor recruiter. On the other hand, there are fewer big projects for them to be placed by those abusive labor recruiters. So if you see, for instance, building booms in Western Europe or in the Gulf, those building booms collapsed and there's no longer the demand for your Eastern European construction workers in Western Europe, or your South Asian construction workers, say, for instance, in the Gulf states.

So it seems to be cancelling itself out a little bit, as far as the demand for the -- for the exploitable labor going down as part of the market. What we are very concerned, though, about the economic downturn is the softening, or what appears to be a softening, of the amount of money that some of the countries are spending on victim protection. And we think that even in the economic downturn it's something that your money is well spent upon.

Victim protection in this situation is not simply a social program. It's also being able to help the folks who you've gotten out of the slavery situation, work them through their trauma, and then have them as effective witnesses against the transnational criminals that you're trying to put out of business. So it's not simply -- you know, we would suggest to the countries who are thinking about cutting the budgets as far as victim protection is concerned, it's not simply a social program.

It's actually a law-enforcement tool that they'd be putting on the shelf.

And frankly, we've seen countries that are as poor as Moldova still spending money on victim shelters, still supporting these types of things. So if Moldova, which has one of the lowest GDPs out there -- if Moldova can come up with $50,000 or 60,000 to fund shelters, we would certainly expect other countries, even in a recession, would be able to as well.

Q Thank you very much.

MR. CDEBACA: Thank you so much.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

211 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Malaysia General News

June 14, 2010 Monday

MALAYSIA RISES TO TIER 2 OF TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT

LENGTH: 406 words

DATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR June 14

Malaysia has risen to Tier 2 of Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP) 2010 released by the United States Department of State.

Home Minister Datuk Seri Hishammuddin Tun Hussein told Dewan Rakyat today he was informed of this via a letter from the United States embassy this morning.

"This is in recognition of the Anti-Human Trafficking Act 2007, creation of Anti-Human Trafficking Council and government action to address the issue," he told reporters at parliament lobby.

Malaysia dropped from Tier 2 to Tier 3 according to TIP Report 2009 issued on June 16 last year.

The TIP Report ranks countries based on their level of compliance on established minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking.

Tier 1 countries are for governments that fully comply with minimum standards of the Trafficking Victims' Protection Act (TVPA).

Tier 2 countries for governments that not fully comply with the minimum standards but are making significant efforts to comply.

Tier 3 countries are for governments that do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so.

Earlier, replying to a question by Dr Tan Seng Giaw (DAP-Kepong), Hishammuddin said 1,447 people were given interim protection order (IPO) under Section 44 (2) of Anti-Human Trafficking Act 2007 from Feb 28-May 30.

"Of the number, 338 were identified as victims of human trafficking and given protection order (PO) under Section 51(3) of the same act," he said.

Tan wanted to know problems faced by the government in tackling the issue and the number of human trafficking victims traced.

The government faced many challenges in efforts to check human trafficking as it involved transborder crimes with links to prostitution, drug trafficking and money laundering.

"Most victims entered this country as tourists but later got involved with human trafficking syndicates. Lack of public cooperation to provide information and threats by syndicates made victims scared to make reports."

Hishammuddin said internal and external factors also led to the prolonged situation.

"Transnational crimes occur in most countries including developed ones as it give a high return of US$38 billion annually.

"Malaysia's rapidly growing economy attract foreigners to come here in search of jobs."

He said the government had implemented a mechanism to check crimes but lack of will on the part of source countries caused many people to fall prey to syndicate members.

LOAD-DATE: June 22, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 Pertubuhan Berita Nasional Malaysia
All Rights Reserved

212 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Malaysia General News

June 14, 2010 Monday

SEVERAL RECOMMENDATIONS FOR MALAYSIA TO IMPROVE HUMAN TRAFFICKING ACTIONS

LENGTH: 1197 wordsDATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR June 14

The U.S. Department of State, which has upgraded Malaysia from Tier 3 to Tier 2 Watch List in Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP) 2010, is urging Malaysia to build on initial law enforcement actions under the Trafficking in Persons Act, particularly relating to labour trafficking.

It recommends that Malaysia apply stringent criminal penalties on those involved in fraudulent labour recruitment or exploitation of forced labour.

Releasing the Trafficking in Persons Report 2010 posted on its website on Monday, it also calls on Malaysia to increase efforts to prosecute and convict public officials who profit from or are involved in trafficking or who exploit victims.

The report also recommends that Malaysia develop and implement procedures to identify labour trafficking victims among vulnerable groups, such as migrant workers and refer them to available protection services.

The report calls on Malaysia to ensure that victims of trafficking are not threatened or otherwise punished for crimes committed as a result of being trafficked.

It proposes that Malaysia re-negotiate MoUs with source countries to incorporate victim protection and revoke passport or travel document confiscation.

It suggests that Malaysia increase cooperation with non-governmental organisations (NGOs) to improve victim protection efforts, including in shelters, for trafficking victims.

It also suggests that Malaysia continue to expand the training of officials on effective handling of sex and labour trafficking cases, with particular emphasis on victim protection, and continue and expand a comprehensive and visible anti-trafficking awareness campaign to encompass both labour and sex trafficking.

The TIP Report ranks countries based on their level of compliance on established minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking.

Tier 1 countries are for governments that fully comply with minimum standards of the Trafficking Victims' Protection Act (TVPA).

Tier 2 countries are for governments that do not fully comply with the minimum standards but are making significant efforts to comply.

The Tier 2 Watch List is for governments that do not fully comply with the TVPA's minimum standards, but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards, and:

- a) the absolute number of victims of severe forms of trafficking is very significant or is significantly increasing;
- b) there is a failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons from the previous year; or,
- c) the determination that a country is making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with minimum standards is based on commitments by the country to take additional future steps over the next year

Tier 3 countries are for governments that do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so.

The report says the Malaysian government does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, but is making significant efforts to do so.

"Because the assessment that the government has made significant efforts is based in part on its commitment to undertake actions over the coming year - notably greater implementation of Malaysia's anti-trafficking law against labour trafficking - Malaysia is placed on the Tier 2 Watch List," it says.

The report says the Malaysian government has shown greater commitment to address human trafficking that is expected to lead to increasing investigations and prosecutions of labour trafficking offences and identification of labour trafficking victims, increasing efforts to prosecute trafficking-related corruption by government officials and greater collaboration with NGOs and international organisations to improve victim services in government shelters.

During the reporting period, senior government officials, including the prime minister, publicly acknowledged Malaysia's human trafficking problem.

The report says the government has also increased its investigations into trafficking cases and filed an increased number of criminal charges against traffickers, significantly expanded training of officials on the 2007 anti-trafficking law, conducted a public awareness campaign on human trafficking, opened three more shelters for trafficking victims, and launched a five-year national action plan on human trafficking.

"Nevertheless, these early efforts will require continued attention, as there are many serious concerns remaining regarding trafficking in Malaysia, including the detention of trafficking victims in government facilities," it says.

The report says the Malaysian government made some progress in law enforcement efforts against sex trafficking during the reporting period, and limited progress in prosecuting and convicting offenders of labour trafficking.

Malaysian law prohibits all forms of human trafficking through its 2007 anti-trafficking law, which prescribes penalties that commensurate with those for other serious offences, such as rape.

During the reporting period, the government convicted three sex trafficking offenders and reported initiating 180 trafficking-related investigations and filing 123 charges against 69 individuals, though it is unclear how many of these cases were for actual trafficking, it says.

The report says the government made minimal progress in protecting victims of trafficking during the reporting period.

"Efforts to identify and protect both sex and labour trafficking victims remained inadequate overall. The government did not report the identification of any Malaysian victims of trafficking," it says.

The report notes that the Ministry of Women, Family and Community Development continued to run two "shelters" for women and children and opened a third in July 2009, which detained suspected and confirmed foreign sex trafficking victims involuntarily for 90 days until they were deported to their home countries, per Malaysian law.

During the reporting period, the government also opened its first two shelters designed to house male victims of trafficking, although these shelters also detained victims involuntarily until they were deported, it says.

According to the report, during the reporting period, 139 women and children were certified as victims and detained in the shelters.

An additional 232 individuals were given initial protective orders but were ultimately determined by the government to not be victims of trafficking and were deported, though the officials acknowledged that some of these might have been trafficking victims who were reluctant to cooperate with law enforcement proceedings, it says.

The report also notes during the year, the government reportedly made some improvement in its screening to identify individuals possessing UNHCR cards or possessing traits of trafficking victims in order to separate them from the illegal migrants.

The report says the anti-trafficking law provides immunity to trafficking victims for immigration offences such as illegal entry, unlawful presence and possession of false travel documents, but victims continue to be detained and deported as they would be if they were arrested for illegal immigration.

LOAD-DATE: June 22, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 Pertubuhan Berita Nasional Malaysia
All Rights Reserved

213 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Rupee News

June 14, 2010 Monday 10:35 PM EST

Dramatic moves reduce Human Trafficking in Pakistan

BYLINE: aliphbay@aol.com (Rupee News)

LENGTH: 665 words

Jun. 14, 2010 (Rupee News delivered by Newstex) --

Pakistan ranks as Tier 2 country in human trafficking * Report says 385 criminals convicted under Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance in 2009 The United States on Monday put allies Singapore and Thailand as well as Vietnam on a human trafficking watch list, accusing them of failing to prevent women from being forced into prostitution. The report estimated that 12.3 million people were the victims of trafficking in 2009-2010, although it said there has been progress in the past decade. The State Department added a number of Asian nations to its watch list " Afghanistan, Brunei, Laos, Maldives, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam. Bangladesh, China, India, Micronesia, the Philippines and Sri Lanka remained on the list, unchanged from a year earlier. North Korea, Myanmar and Papua New Guinea remained at the bottom level of countries that do not even meet the minimum standards on human trafficking.

ISLAMABAD: Pakistan has been ranked as a Tier 2 country in the 2010 US Trafficking in Persons Report, which has cited improvements from the previous year due to efforts to prosecute human traffickers, and prevent and combat bonded labour, Daily Times learned on Monday.

Announcing the release of the report, US Secretary of State Hilary Clinton said Washington was committed to supporting Pakistan in its efforts to combat human trafficking.

Prosecutions: Highlighting Pakistans action against human trafficking, the report said the conviction of 385 criminals in 2009 under the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance, and 2,894 prosecutions and 166 convictions under various other penal code sections used to prosecute trafficking offences had led to significant improvements.

The report stated that the Sindh polices successful efforts to free over 2,000 bonded labourers from feudal landlords, and their work with non-governmental organisations (NGOs) to raise awareness and develop better protection services for labourers and their families had also improved the situation.

The report stated the Punjab governments Elimination of Bonded Labour in Brick Kilns project " launched with assistance from the International Labour Organisation and Pakistani NGOs " helped nearly 6,000 bonded labourers obtain Computerized National Identification Cards, provided $140,000 in interest-free loans to labourers and established 60 schools for the workers children.

The report highlighted that Islamabad had also completed a four-year project to repatriate and rehabilitate over 1,000 children who had been trafficked to the United Arab Emirates.

It also lauded the Sindh governments Landless Harees Programme, which offered the landless-poor in rural Sindh an alternative to tenant farming including land, seed and fertiliser distribution, agricultural development assistance, cash grants, and micro health insurance.

The 10th annual US Trafficking in Persons Report outlines the continuing challenges across the globe, including in the US. The report, for the first time, includes a ranking of the US based on the same standards with which it ranks other countries.

The report stated Washington takes its first-ever ranking not as a reprieve but as a responsibility to strengthen global efforts against modern slavery, including those within America. This human rights abuse is universal, and no one should claim immunity from its reach or from the responsibility to confront it, it stated.

The report serves as the primary diplomatic tool through which Washington encourages partnership and increased determination in the fight against forced labour, sexual exploitation and modern-day slavery. By Iqbal Choudhry, AFP and agencies

Taiwan was upgraded and listed as fully compliant in efforts against human trafficking after starting new services for victims, CdeBaca said. Australia, New Zealand and South Korea were also listed as fully compliant.

Filed under: Tagged:

Newstex ID: RPNW-5065-46081373

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

NOTES: The views expressed on blogs distributed by Newstex and its re-distributors ("Blogs on DemandÆ") are solely the author's and not necessarily the views of Newstex or its re-distributors. Posts from such authors are provided "AS IS", with no warranties, and confer no rights. The material and information provided in Blogs on DemandÆ are for general information only and should not, in any respect, be relied on as professional advice. No content on such Blogs on DemandÆ is "read and approved" before it is posted. Accordingly, neither Newstex nor its re-distributors make any claims, promises or guarantees about the accuracy, completeness, or adequacy of the information contained therein or linked to from such blogs, nor take responsibility for any aspect of such blog content. All content on Blogs on DemandÆ shall be construed as author-based content and commentary. Accordingly, no warranties or other guarantees will be offered as to the quality of the opinions, commentary or anything else offered on such Blogs on DemandÆ. Reader's comments reflect their individual opinion and their publication within Blogs on DemandÆ shall not infer or connote an endorsement by Newstex or its re-distributors of such reader's comments or views. Newstex and its re-distributors expressly reserve the right to delete posts and comments at its and their sole discretion.

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Blog

Copyright 2010 Newstex LLC
All Rights Reserved
Newstex Web Blogs
Copyright 2010 Rupee News

214 of 404 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 14, 2010 Monday2010 TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT*BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 5237 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. Department of State:

Luis CdeBaca

Ambassador-at-Large, Office To Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons

Washington, DC

June 14, 2010

MR. TONER: Good afternoon. Welcome to the State Department. As you know, Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton announced this morning the release of the 10th Annual Trafficking in Persons Report. This 177-country report is the most comprehensive worldwide report on the efforts of governments to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons.

In light of that, were very fortunate to have with us today Ambassador-at-Large Luis CdeBaca of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons here to answer some of your questions and talk a little bit about the report in more detail. And just for your awareness, later on this week, Ambassador CdeBaca will participate on Tuesday in a congressional reception for the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Heroes that's hosted by the Helsinki Commission.

On Wednesday, June 16th, Ambassador CdeBaca will participate in a briefing on the Trafficking in Persons Report at the Foreign Press Center in New York, and that's at 10:00 a.m. And then at 1:00 p.m. that day, he'll deliver keynote remarks regarding the 2010 report at a panel discussion hosted by the U.S. Mission to the United Nations, the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime, and the Schuster Institute for Investigative Journalism at Brandeis University.

Without further ado, I'll hand it over to Ambassador CdeBaca.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you for the introduction, Mark.

Earlier this morning, Secretary Clinton publicly released the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report. The annual report provides a diagnosis of the global effort to combat modern slavery. This year, the report assessed 177 countries, including two special cases. Those special cases are Haiti and Somalia. Two countries were ranked for the first time, Kiribati and the United States.

It's important to highlight the significance of the U.S. ranking. As we work towards a lead-by-example diplomacy, it was common sense to include ourselves in this year's report. Data was collected across the interagency: prosecutions from Department of Justice, information from DHS, and victim services efforts by Department of Health and Human Services. We also collected information from state and local law enforcement, nongovernmental organizations, and governments.

The Trafficking in Persons Report has spurred action throughout the years by other countries to take a hard look at their internal efforts against trafficking. Finland is a good example. Just a couple weeks ago, they recently completed a self-assessment similar to the United States of their trafficking in persons response, and we certainly look forward to other countries undertaking that type of self-diagnostic.

Without a doubt, the United States continues to be the world leader on this issue. In the 10 years since President Clinton signed the Trafficking Victims Protection Act and the United Nations outlined the international community's anti-trafficking standards in the Palermo Protocol, we've seen much progress. And as diagnosed by this year's report, we still face a number of challenges.

The report discusses a host of those challenges, including the need for improved victims services. Whether in the United States or another country, we must treat victims as victims and not as criminals. We must look toward promising practices such as shelters that do not imprison victims, but instead allow for rehabilitation and recovery from the crimes committed against them.

The feminization of trafficking is a trend that we see in this year's report, and that's something that's expanding beyond the conventional stereotypes of sex trafficking. Today, more than 56 percent of trafficking in women -- are women and girls, and we see more and more women suffering from labor trafficking, specifically involuntary domestic servitude. These maids suffer in silence behind closed doors, and in some ways are the most vulnerable because they do not know anyone other than their captors.

Often, as I've personally seen while I prosecuted these cases at an earlier career at the Department of Justice, and as still holds true today, these women, and in some cases men and boys, are also forced into sex slavery by those who would hold them in involuntary domestic servitude. And I'd point out that in recent months, I think in the UAE, there have been a couple of prosecutions in which women who were brought in to the Emirates in order to be domestic servants were then prostituted out by their employers. So the connection between domestic servitude and sex slavery is something that were starting to recognize more and more.

I would like to highlight some successes that are in the report, because even as we face challenges in our fight against modern slavery, there are more people around the world than ever before working on those human rights issues. Ill run through a few quick successes and then we can move to questions.

One success that I think is very noteworthy is that of Bosnia-Herzegovina, which this year is upgraded to Tier 1 on the report. Bosnia was on Tier 3 for many years at the beginning of this decade. And I think that a lot of people for a lot of people, the global fight against human trafficking first came to people's attention because of the widespread sex slavery and the widespread abuses in the Balkans during the various wars of the 1990s.

This is something that we've seen on the part of the Bosnian Government: clear progress, especially over the last year; significantly reducing its use of suspended sentences; imposing stronger penalties for convicted traffickers; partnering with nongovernmental organizations on victim protection; and employing proactive procedures to go out and identify and help victims. It is a sea change if you look at the trafficking issue over the course of the last decade that Bosnia would be ranked in the first tier of countries that are fully compliant with the minimum standards.

This year we also saw noteworthy success by the Government of Egypt. The Egyptian Government's progress in combating human trafficking over the last year is particularly evident in its enactment of a comprehensive law and its greater law enforcement and prevention efforts to confront fraudulent short-term marriages, often termed summer marriages, of Egyptian girls, which is a thinly veiled cover for the prostitution of children. Their activity against the summer marriages and, as the Secretary pointed out earlier this morning, the steps that they are taking towards starting shelters with some of the major hospitals in Cairo and Alexandria reflects the government's partnerships with international legal experts, the key of one of which was we were happy to be able to help fund from here at the State Department in collaboration with civil society. Were very encouraged by what were seeing coming out of Egypt.

So, too, the Government of Pakistan, which was upgraded to Tier 2 this year, has dramatically increased the number of convictions and prosecutions for human trafficking, undertaking creative efforts to prevent bonded labor. Behind this enhanced commitment, particularly a greater focus on bonded labor, are stronger partnerships with United States Government and international organizations on the issue of trafficking in persons.

Some of you may recall, some of you may have covered, a situation last fall August and September in which over 170 Pakistani nationals, victims of bonded laborers, were taken hostage by feudal landlords in Sind Province in retaliation for actually seeking a habeas corpus writ to free them from debt bondage in court. What they got for their troubles was confined and jailed by the landlords and their henchmen, their guards. The Secretary raised this and, in fact, civil society actors asked her about it in her October visit to Islamabad. Simultaneously, as that was going on, local police were in the process of liberating those people. And we certainly appreciate the activities and the actions taken by the Pakistani Government to fight that situation.

Another success, Malaysia upgraded this year to Tier 2 watch list. You may recall that last year Malaysia was downgraded to Tier 3. Over the course of the last year, the Malaysian authorities have acknowledged and begun to tackle their serious human trafficking problem, including intensified engagement with foreign governments. For the first time, the government formed partnerships with nongovernmental organizations to work in partnership. And as a result of their work with the United Nations interagency anti-TIP program out of Bangkok, they identified and assisted victims of forced labor on fishing boats on the coast of Sarawak. Those initial cases of labor trafficking, as well as what they're doing on sex trafficking, is certainly heartening as far as the commitment that is beginning to be shown by the Government of Malaysia.

One final success that I'd like to highlight, although there are many more in the book, and that is the action on the part of the Government of Syria, which was, this year, upgraded to the Tier 2 watch list from Tier 3, where it had been for years. In Syria, partnerships with international organizations and NGOs contributed to the progress. It included its enhancement of an anti-trafficking law, enactment of two decrees to better protect foreign domestic workers, and opening a second shelter for trafficking victims in Aleppo, which added to a preexisting government-supported shelter in Damascus. Again, we see much of the problem in Syria and much of the activity now to protect the workers coming with the issues of foreign domestic workers, the maids who have been brought into Syria. So we see that kind of increased political role on that government as well as many others. And again, we are encouraged.

We look at as the Secretary said today, we look at this not as an exercise in finger-wagging or calling out, but rather, diagnosing ourselves and countries around the world so that we can work together in partnership. I appreciate your attention and will take a few questions.

I know you had one to begin with.

QUESTION: A couple. One, just in very simple terms, can you explain why the U.S. Government feels that it is beneficial to rate itself? Does it add to your credibility when you talk to others?

Second, the Secretary alluded to some countries who had reached out to the U.S. Government, trying not to be left in low categories or dropped down to them. And can you give us some sense of who those are? Tier 3, for example, this year yet again includes both Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, countries with enormous resources and yet they have been very durable presences in that bottom category. Were they the ones trying to get off it or were they just making no real efforts?

And then lastly, could you address the question of Switzerland, which is on Tier 2 not the watchlist, but Tier 2? Again, a country with significant resources; why has it not been possible for the Swiss to do better?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, there's several questions. I'll try to take them in descending order. As far as the self assessment, one of the things that we've seen over the last few years is a number of countries, often in Europe, have put into the place the practice of what's called the national rapporteurs. And they often, like an ombudsman, are assessing the anti-trafficking efforts within that country.

We have seen that as a helpful activity on the part of those governments, as to the degree that they are honest, to the degree that they confront not just successes, but also challenges. And so we felt that the United States needed that as a diagnostic tool for ourselves, that the Obama Administration is committed to applying the same diagnostics that we would apply to other countries.

So when we looked at the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking in persons that we are statutorily bound to apply to the other countries of the world, not only did we feel that it was only fair and just that we apply those same minimum standards, but also that it would be helpful to run the United States anti-trafficking activities through that analytical framework. And so, as I said, we encourage other countries not simply to look to our report for their own self assessment, but to perform their own as well.

Switzerland, I think, is in the process of doing that. We stand ready to continue to work with the Swiss. They're in our review this year and working with the Swiss Government, we did identify a gap in their law that created a loophole in which children at the ages of 16 and 17 could legally participate in prostitution. And since the law here in the United States as far as the minimum standards as well as the international norms of the Palermo Protocol and otherwise make 18 a very bright line. Even for countries that have legalized prostitution, the child prostitution situation was something that had to be dealt with.

And Ive already spoken with the Swiss ambassador. Weve were talking to the Swiss as to how we can as in partnership, work through some of the legal challenges that they face. And we do see commitment from them to address these issues.

QUESTION: And it would require legislation (inaudible)? And could it be done by, you know, regulations or something?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I wouldnt speculate on the various ways that the Swiss could actually handle this. One of the issues, of course, with Switzerland is when youre dealing at the cantonal level with law enforcement issues, some countries can change their entire trafficking regime overnight simply by passing a federal law. Others have to do it --

QUESTION: Locally?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: -- state by state, locality by locality. And I think that thats something that the Swiss are looking at as --

QUESTION: Was this a problem last year?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Its a situation that I think --

QUESTION: I mean, I just dont understand how the I mean, was did something change over the last year to get them dropped from Tier 1?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: The law and the loophole was extant for quite a while. I think that our recognition of it --

QUESTION: Ah, okay.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: -- as we --

QUESTION: So basically, they should have been on Tier 2 last year or and the year before?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I wouldnt speculate backwards. I certainly would let this years ranking speaks for itself.

QUESTION: And then how about Kuwait and Saudi Arabia?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: And then Kuwait and Saudi Arabia --

QUESTION: And then who else was trying to who was trying to get themselves out of the --

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, I mean, we have yet to see a country come to us and ask to be put on a lower tier ranking. So I think that as we work with the countries throughout the year, theres always the desire to move up in the tier rankings. What we then look for is: What are the actions? What are the activities?

In both Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, we have seen some beginning of action and we will continue to work with them, whether its the Kuwaitis starting to at least discuss the extension of certain labor protections to foreign workers in Kuwait, or whether its the Saudi Arabia example in which this spring they did pass a first draft of an anti-trafficking law. In both countries, we would like to see enhanced victim services. In the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia especially, the situation for escaped maids and escaped workers is continues to be untenable, in no small part because of the situation where the employer has to kind of countersign the exit visas for the person who they sponsored. Even if that person was running away from the employer for abuse, that employer still has the power to block them from leaving and going home or getting another job.

So we are certainly going to work with the governments both of Kuwait and Saudi Arabia as far as how they can address these situations, not because were trying to figure out how do we get them onto a different tier; its how do we get the situation for workers in those countries to be better. The tiers then follow.

Yes.

QUESTION: You said earlier this morning, and its also in the report which I havent, of course, read all of, that the United States is a source country for human trafficking. What does that mean? Are you saying that there are U.S. citizens around the country that are trafficking women and children and taking advantage of people that are here for temporary working visas, or are you saying that theres people that are coming in from outside the country that are operating these trafficking rings and those kinds of things? What does it because it doesn't seem to specify that in here.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I hate to say this, but the answer is kind of yes. The what we have in the United States is a situation where there are homegrown traffickers who are enslaving people in various segments of the economy, and some of those end up enslaving American citizens, some of those end up enslaving foreign nationals. Some of the foreign nationals who are here were recruited in their home countries and brought here by people who intended to do that all along. Others may have immigrated and then, once they're here, get trapped.

Id actually and I know you have a very busy day, but if people have a chance, the Coalition of Immokalee Workers Slavery Museum, which is out in the parking lot right now, breaks this down, I think, pretty well, in that it talks it has some of the artifacts not just from cases with men and women from Mexico and Guatemala who are enslaved in Florida picking crops, but African American men from Florida who spoke English who don't have those same issues of being a foreign person or afraid of the immigration or something like that, African American men being enslaved in agriculture in Florida within the last five, six years.

QUESTION: By U.S. citizens or by --

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: By U.S. citizens. So it's a very multifaceted way that it ends up manifesting. And in sex trafficking, then there's also the difference between those who are enslaving immigrant women in prostitution and those who are enslaving U.S. citizen women and girls. It's often runaways. In those situations, those cases have historically been dealt with in the United States under the prostitution statutes rather than under the involuntary servitude and slavery statutes, though what's happening in some of the situations is that the pimps are actually enslaving the women that are working for them.

QUESTION: One quick thing. Can you explain special cases what that is, Haiti and what was the other country?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Somalia. Haiti and Somalia are special cases in no small part because of the capacity of the government. When we have a functional government, even a very haltingly functional government, then that country not only gets assessed but actually ranked. In both Haiti and Somalia, it continues to be our position that those governments are not sufficiently operative to actually give them a ranking in the report.

QUESTION: Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Yes.

QUESTION: Yes. Back on the case of Cuba, I'm wondering what actually is the justification for the I mean, I read a little bit, but it sounds it seems like the U.S. might be open to charges of political ranking. I'm just trying to get why Cuba is on Tier 3.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, I think that one of the things that we see for Cuba is that there is no law against this practice. There's some other laws that could be cobbled together perhaps in order to prosecute a trafficker, but there's no evidence that that has actually been done. I think one of the things that we also look at there is, again, the age of legal prostitution. Again, children can legally be in prostitution at ages 16 and 17.

We also see the lack of human trafficking protections and no training for the police, prosecutors, or social workers on what to do if one sees a human trafficking situation. So in a country where not only do you have a such a large tourist industry, other countries in the region that draw tourists from the same places as Cuba, have large child sex tourism problems, and are working to address those, we don't see the same activity in Cuba. So it's a multifaceted approach as far as why they would end up on Tier 3.

QUESTION: Can you comment on North Korea? And also, what do you say to China, where a lot of North Korean human trafficking is actually happening?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, North Korea continues to be a Tier 3 country in this year's report. We have not seen any indication that the North Korean Government is actually addressing the human trafficking problem.

One of the issues, of course, that we have when we look at the northeastern part of China is that there is the North Korean refugee community, that population. What we'd like to see from the Government of China is that there would be actual screening of people within that refugee flow to see which are the people who are actually trafficking victims. We're not saying that every one of them necessarily is, but we've had enough reports, whether it's of forced labor, whether it's of forced marriages, of enough reports of abuse coming out of that region that we'd like to see more screening and then more victim protections on the part of the Chinese Government.

When it comes to North Korea, I think that one of the issues that were looking at is not simply the lack of a legal regime in order to address human trafficking or to be able to prosecute traffickers or rehabilitate the victims or do any of the things that even are the baseline to be working on it, but also when the North Korean Government exports labor to other countries, are those people in the places that they're going do they have a modicum of freedom there or is the government sending, whether its police or security services or others with them in order to keep them in line.

And so we've expressed concern, as have some of the governments of Western Europe. I think it was the Czech Republic actually terminated their contracts with the North Korean Labor Export Company because of their concerns of the type of abuse that was happening with the exported North Korean laborers.

Yes.

QUESTION: (Inaudible) the situation in Taiwan. It had been moved from Tier 2 to Tier 1 year. And is there any special reason for such a movement?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, one of the things that, hopefully, jumps out at you as you read the report this year and if not, I'll give it a little bit of a boost is the need for more victim protections and the need for a victim response that's not based on detaining the victims. If you take somebody out of a servitude situation where they've had their freedom denied, you take them out, ostensibly rescuing them, and then you put them into a detention center, then that is not necessarily going to win any cases, it's not necessarily going to rehabilitate the victim, it's not really honoring the ethos of the UN protocol on what you're supposed to do as far as the 3-P approach of prevention, protection, and prosecution.

Taiwan and one of the things that we've seen that occasioned the upgrade this year is that the victim services side has been addressed. So for the first time, their new comprehensive law, which is very well-conceived, has now come into force. And one of the things that it allows is it allows for victims to work, to be able to stay in Taiwan, to get jobs with other employers, and to work while their cases are being investigated.

So many countries around the world when you go to a shelter first of all, it might look more like a detention center, but the victims are just there being warehoused these are people who are coming out of a tremendously abusive situation. The research shows that most of them haven't even gotten to the point of having post-traumatic stress disorder; they're still in trauma for the first 90 days or so when they're coming out of this slavery situation. Taiwan has recognized that, has studied it, and has actually acted to make sure that these people are not just put in jail after they get liberated.

QUESTION: I haven't read the report yet, but I was just wondering if you can address this issue of trafficking from China and the Indian subcontinent India, Pakistan, Sri Lanka, and Bangladesh which usually come to Europe and Africa and then they are brought to U.S. through by land or sea, from Mexico. And this is it's very much related to the the terrorists can use this network.

And another thing was the financial network which is called hawala, which is word-of-mouth, have you addressed that?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I think that the network that you're describing that goes through Africa and into Latin America and up is typically a route that we see with the large-scale alien smuggling situations. We have heard situations of trafficking occurring within that migrant stream, most notably, as you said, with Chinese often Chinese women who are waylaid for a couple of years in southern Africa being forced in prostitution in order to pay the smuggling fees or pay the debts that the alien smugglers claim that they're owed.

But one of the things that we've seen is that this is a route that is used by both alien smugglers and human traffickers. It's hard to differentiate amongst the two. And so a lot of our attention because it's such a large human smuggling route, much of our attention has been on the smuggling aspect. And our colleagues over at the Department of Homeland Security have beefed up their legal attaches at the embassies we've got a good cadre of folks working out of Pretoria and have been able to dismantle and impinge a number of the shipments and actually have been able to arrest and prosecute some of the large players in that.

I think that you do raise a good point, though, that we have to be mindful of the fact that these routes can be used for various things. You can have a person who's flowing through it who is headed towards a life of indentured servitude. You can have another person who's headed through that route who's simply going to melt into society as an illegal alien. But then you could also have someone who's coming in to do harm. And so we're looking at that across the board to try to make sure that we can disrupt those established smuggling routes.

QUESTION: And about the financial network with is called hawala, which works just word of mouth? You know, $1 million to be transferred, no money moves across the continents. It is paid by this network.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I would defer to our colleagues at Treasury and others as far as the mechanics.

QUESTION: Because Europe is doing a lot to control this.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Excuse me?

QUESTION: Europe is doing a lot to control this.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Yes, and I know that hawala is something that Treasury and other working groups have been dealing with. That's not necessarily something that's reflected in this year's report.

QUESTION: Do you see improvement? Is the number of victims decreasing or increasing this year? Last year, the UN reported about 12 million people were victims. How do you see it? Is there improvement?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: We see improvement in that we see now 116 countries that have enacted legislation. The number of convictions have increased 40 percent, actually since last year, up to over 4,000. The number of labor convictions have tripled, up to 335. But what we don't necessarily see yet is the decrease in victims, partially because we're still trying to get the baseline as to what is the baseline from which we would work.

I think that one of the things that we see is that as a country starts to comply with their obligations under the Palermo Protocol around prevention, protection, and prosecution, once they put together an intergovernmental like an inter-ministerial working group or an interagency working group once they put those structures in place, they start to see more victims. It's because they're finding them; it's not because the victims weren't there before.

So the Netherlands Antilles is a perfect example. Up until last year, they didn't have those structures in place and so NGOs would report that there was trafficking in Curacao and those different islands, but there were no cases and no victims identified. In the last year, they've actually arrested and prosecuted nine traffickers because they had built the structures that had been able to see it.

So I actually think that success in the next few years is actually going to look a lot like an increase in numbers of cases, an increase in numbers of victims. That might be counterintuitive; you'd like to see it go down, but I think that success will actually be that we're uncovering more cases. Then as we get the baseline, we'll be able to start assessing the efficacy of the various things.

QUESTION: Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Take one more question and then yeah.

MR. TONER: Yeah, one more question.

QUESTION: Yeah, wait yeah. Do you get the sense from the report, from the overview, that you know, the sense of progress and improvement that you're talking about? One might have imagined that the economic global downturn might have led to I mean, you can imagine how it could have led to some, in more cases, worse problems. I'm wondering, do you have any sense of the economic impact of the global recession?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: As far as we can tell, there's a couple of competing issues within the economic downturn. On the one hand, people are more desperate and are therefore willing to take more risks, putting themselves into harms way with an abusive labor recruiter.

On the other hand, there are fewer big projects for them to be placed by those abusive labor recruiters. So if you see, for instance, building booms in Western Europe or in the Gulf, those building booms collapsed and there is no longer the demand for your Eastern European construction workers in Western Europe or your South Asian construction workers, say, for instance, in the Gulf states. So it seems to be cancelling itself out a little bit as far as the demand for the exploitable labor going down as part of the market.

What we are very concerned, though, about the economic downturn is the softening, or what appears to be a softening of the amount of money that some of the countries are spending on victim protection. And we think that even in the economic downturn, it's something that your money is well spent upon. Victim protection in this situation is not simply a social program. It's also being able to help the folks who you've gotten out of a slavery situation, work them through their trauma, and then have them as effective witnesses against the transnational criminals that you're trying to put out of business.

So its not simply we would suggest to the countries who are thinking about cutting the budgets as far as victim protection is concerned its not simply a social program; its actually a law enforcement tool that theyd be putting on the shelf. And frankly, weve seen countries that are as poor as Moldova still spending money on victim shelters, still supporting these types of things. So if Moldova, which has one of the lowest GDPs out there if Moldova can come up with $50-or-$60,000 to fund shelters, we would certainly expect other countries, even in a recession, would be able to as well.

QUESTION: Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you so much.

###

PRN: 2010/792

LOAD-DATE: June 14, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 States News Service

215 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

June 14, 2010 Monday 6:05 AM EST

U.S. Included in This Year's Trafficking in Persons Report Released Today

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 157 words

DATELINE: ATHENS, Greece

The U.S. Embassy issued the following news release:

U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton released the 2010 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report, which for the first time included a ranking and full country narrative of the United States' effort in combating this global scourge. This inclusion reiterates that the United States government holds ourselves to the same standards by which we hold others.

Greece continues to be ranked at Tier Two. The fight against human trafficking is a global movement and much work remains to be done. The United States government is working to advance that movement. With the inclusion of the U.S. ranking and narrative, we seek to emphasize the common challenges all countries face in developing effective responses to modern day slavery.

For more information and to read the TIP report in its entirety, please visit www.state.gov/g/tip.

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS aa88aa88 100621-2877338 71AfzalAli

LOAD-DATE: June 27, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

216 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

June 14, 2010 Monday 1:38 AM EST

Luis CdeBaca, Ambassador-at-Large, Office To Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons Speaks on 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 5276 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons issued the text of the following speech:

MR. TONER: Good afternoon. Welcome to the State Department. As you know, Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton announced this morning the release of the 10th Annual Trafficking in Persons Report. This 177-country report is the most comprehensive worldwide report on the efforts of governments to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons.

In light of that, we're very fortunate to have with us today Ambassador-at-Large Luis CdeBaca of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons here to answer some of your questions and talk a little bit about the report in more detail. And just for your awareness, later on this week, Ambassador CdeBaca will participate on Tuesday in a congressional reception for the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Heroes that's hosted by the Helsinki Commission.

On Wednesday, June 16th, Ambassador CdeBaca will participate in a briefing on the Trafficking in Persons Report at the Foreign Press Center in New York, and that's at 10:00 a.m. And then at 1:00 p.m. that day, he'll deliver keynote remarks regarding the 2010 report at a panel discussion hosted by the U.S. Mission to the United Nations, the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime, and the Schuster Institute for Investigative Journalism at Brandeis University.

Without further ado, I'll hand it over to Ambassador CdeBaca.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you for the introduction, Mark.

Earlier this morning, Secretary Clinton publicly released the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report. The annual report provides a diagnosis of the global effort to combat modern slavery. This year, the report assessed 177 countries, including two special cases. Those special cases are Haiti and Somalia. Two countries were ranked for the first time, Kiribati and the United States.

It's important to highlight the significance of the U.S. ranking. As we work towards a lead-by-example diplomacy, it was common sense to include ourselves in this year's report. Data was collected across the interagency: prosecutions from Department of Justice, information from DHS, and victim services efforts by Department of Health and Human Services. We also collected information from state and local law enforcement, nongovernmental organizations, and governments.

The Trafficking in Persons Report has spurred action throughout the years by other countries to take a hard look at their internal efforts against trafficking. Finland is a good example. Just a couple weeks ago, they recently completed a self assessment similar to the United States of their trafficking in persons response, and we certainly look forward to other countries undertaking that type of self diagnostic.

Without a doubt, the United States continues to be the world leader on this issue. In the 10 years since President Clinton signed the Trafficking Victims Protection Act and the United Nations outlined the international community's anti-trafficking standards in the Palermo Protocol, we've seen much progress. And as diagnosed by this year's report, we still face a number of challenges.

The report discusses a host of those challenges, including the need for improved victims services. Whether in the United States or another country, we must treat victims as victims and not as criminals. We must look toward promising practices such as shelters that do not imprison victims, but instead allow for rehabilitation and recovery from the crimes committed against them.

The feminization of trafficking is a trend that we see in this year's report, and that's something that's expanding beyond the conventional stereotypes of sex trafficking. Today, more than 56 percent of trafficking in women -- are women and girls, and we see more and more women suffering from labor trafficking, specifically involuntary domestic servitude. These maids suffer in silence behind closed doors, and in some ways are the most vulnerable because they do not know anyone other than their captors.

Often, as I've personally seen while I prosecuted these cases at an earlier career at the Department of Justice, and as still holds true today, these women, and in some cases men and boys, are also forced into sex slavery by those who would hold them in involuntary domestic servitude. And I'd point out that in recent months, I think in the UAE, there have been a couple of prosecutions in which women who were brought in to the Emirates in order to be domestic servants were then prostituted out by their employers. So the connection between domestic servitude and sex slavery is something that we're starting to recognize more and more.

I would like to highlight some successes that are in the report, because even as we face challenges in our fight against modern slavery, there are more people around the world than ever before working on those human rights issues. I'll run through a few quick successes and then we can move to questions.

One success that I think is very noteworthy is that of Bosnia-Herzegovina, which this year is upgraded to Tier 1 on the report. Bosnia was on Tier 3 for many years at the beginning of this decade. And I think that a lot of people - for a lot of people, the global fight against human trafficking first came to people's attention because of the widespread sex slavery and the widespread abuses in the Balkans during the various wars of the 1990s.

This is something that we've seen on the part of the Bosnian Government: clear progress, especially over the last year; significantly reducing its use of suspended sentences; imposing stronger penalties for convicted traffickers; partnering with nongovernmental organizations on victim protection; and employing proactive procedures to go out and identify and help victims. It is a sea change if you look at the trafficking issue over the course of the last decade that Bosnia would be ranked in the first tier of countries that are fully compliant with the minimum standards.

This year we also saw noteworthy success by the Government of Egypt. The Egyptian Government's progress in combating human trafficking over the last year is particularly evident in its enactment of a comprehensive law and its greater law enforcement and prevention efforts to confront fraudulent short-term marriages, often termed summer marriages, of Egyptian girls, which is a thinly veiled cover for the prostitution of children. Their activity against the summer marriages and, as the Secretary pointed out earlier this morning, the steps that they are taking towards starting shelters with some of the major hospitals in Cairo and Alexandria reflects the government's partnerships with international legal experts, the key of one of which was - we were happy to be able to help fund from here at the State Department in collaboration with civil society. We're very encouraged by what we're seeing coming out of Egypt.

So, too, the Government of Pakistan, which was upgraded to Tier 2 this year, has dramatically increased the number of convictions and prosecutions for human trafficking, undertaking creative efforts to prevent bonded labor. Behind this enhanced commitment, particularly a greater focus on bonded labor, are stronger partnerships with United States Government and international organizations on the issue of trafficking in persons.

Some of you may recall, some of you may have covered, a situation last fall - August and September - in which over 170 Pakistani nationals, victims of bonded laborers, were taken hostage by feudal landlords in Sind Province in retaliation for actually seeking a habeas corpus writ to free them from debt bondage in court. What they got for their troubles was confined and jailed by the landlords and their henchmen, their guards. The Secretary raised this and, in fact, civil society actors asked her about it in her October visit to Islamabad. Simultaneously, as that was going on, local police were in the process of liberating those people. And we certainly appreciate the activities and the actions taken by the Pakistani Government to fight that situation.

Another success, Malaysia upgraded this year to Tier 2 watch list. You may recall that last year Malaysia was downgraded to Tier 3. Over the course of the last year, the Malaysian authorities have acknowledged and begun to tackle their serious human trafficking problem, including intensified engagement with foreign governments. For the first time, the government formed partnerships with nongovernmental organizations to work in partnership. And as a result of their work with the United Nations interagency anti-TIP program out of Bangkok, they identified and assisted victims of forced labor on fishing boats on the coast of Sarawak. Those initial cases of labor trafficking, as well as what they're doing on sex trafficking, is certainly heartening as far as the commitment that is beginning to be shown by the Government of Malaysia.

One final success that I'd like to highlight, although there are many more in the book, and that is the action on the part of the Government of Syria, which was, this year, upgraded to the Tier 2 watch list from Tier 3, where it had been for years. In Syria, partnerships with international organizations and NGOs contributed to the progress. It included its enhancement of an anti-trafficking law, enactment of two decrees to better protect foreign domestic workers, and opening a second shelter for trafficking victims in Aleppo, which added to a preexisting government-supported shelter in Damascus. Again, we see much of the problem in Syria and much of the activity now to protect the workers coming with the issues of foreign domestic workers, the maids who have been brought into Syria. So we see that kind of increased political role on that government as well as many others. And again, we are encouraged.

We look at - as the Secretary said today, we look at this not as an exercise in finger-wagging or calling out, but rather, diagnosing ourselves and countries around the world so that we can work together in partnership. I appreciate your attention and we'll take a few questions.

I know you had one to begin with.

QUESTION: A couple. One, just in very simple terms, can you explain why the U.S. Government feels that it is beneficial to rate itself? Does it add to your credibility when you talk to others?

Second, the Secretary alluded to some countries who had reached out to the U.S. Government, trying not to be left in low categories or dropped down to them. And can you give us some sense of who those are? Tier 3, for example, this year yet again includes both Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, countries with enormous resources and yet they have been very durable presences in that bottom category. Were they the ones trying to get off it or were they just making no real efforts?

And then lastly, could you address the question of Switzerland, which is on Tier 2 - not the watchlist, but Tier 2? Again, a country with significant resources; why has it not been possible for the Swiss to do better?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, there's several questions. I'll try to take them in descending order. As far as the self assessment, one of the things that we've seen over the last few years is a number of countries, often in Europe, have put into the - in place the practice of what's called the national rapporteurs. And they often, like an - kind of like an ombudsman, are assessing the anti-trafficking efforts within that country.

We have seen that as a helpful activity on the part of those governments, as - to the degree that they are honest, to the degree that they confront not just successes, but also challenges. And so we felt that the United States needed that as a diagnostic tool for ourselves, that the Obama Administration is committed to applying the same diagnostics that we would apply to other countries.

So when we looked at the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking in persons that we are statutorily bound to apply to the other countries of the world, not only did we feel that it was only fair and just that we apply those same minimum standards, but also that it would be helpful to run the United States anti-trafficking activities through that analytical framework. And so, as I said, we encourage other countries not simply to look to our report for their own self assessment, but to perform their own as well.

Switzerland, I think, is in the process of doing that. We stand ready to continue to work with the Swiss. They're - in our review this year and working with the Swiss Government, we did identify a gap in their law that created a loophole in which children at the ages of 16 and 17 could legally participate in prostitution. And since the law here in the United States as far as the minimum standards as well as the international norms of the Palermo Protocol and otherwise make 18 a very bright line. Even for countries that have legalized prostitution, the child prostitution situation was something that had to be dealt with.

And I've already spoken with the Swiss ambassador. We've - we're talking to the Swiss as to how we can - as - in partnership, work through some of the legal challenges that they face. And we do see commitment from them to address these issues.

QUESTION: And it would require legislation (inaudible)? And could it be done by, you know, regulations or something?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I wouldn't speculate on the various ways that the Swiss could actually handle this. One of the issues, of course, with Switzerland is when you're dealing at the cantonal level with law enforcement issues, some countries can change their entire trafficking regime overnight simply by passing a federal law. Others have to do it --

QUESTION: Locally?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: -- state by state, locality by locality. And I think that that's something that the Swiss are looking at as --

QUESTION: Was this a problem last year?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: It's a situation that I think --

QUESTION: I mean, I just don't understand how the - I mean, was - did something change over the last year to get them dropped from Tier 1?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: The law and the loophole was extant for quite a while. I think that our recognition of it --

QUESTION: Ah, okay.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: -- as we --

QUESTION: So basically, they should have been on Tier 2 last year or - and the year before?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I wouldn't speculate backwards. I certainly would let - this year's ranking speaks for itself.

QUESTION: And then how about Kuwait and Saudi Arabia?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: And then Kuwait and Saudi Arabia --

QUESTION: And then who else was trying to - who was trying to get themselves out of the --

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, I mean, we have yet to see a country come to us and ask to be put on a lower tier ranking. So I think that as we work with the countries throughout the year, there's always the desire to move up in the tier rankings. What we then look for is: What are the actions? What are the activities?

In both Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, we have seen some beginning of action and we will continue to work with them, whether it's the Kuwaitis starting to at least discuss the extension of certain labor protections to foreign workers in Kuwait, or whether it's the Saudi Arabia example in which this spring they did pass a first draft of an anti-trafficking law. In both countries, we would like to see enhanced victim services. In the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia especially, the situation for escaped maids and escaped workers is - continues to be untenable, in no small part because of the situation where the employer has to kind of countersign the exit visas for the person who they sponsored. Even if that person was running away from the employer for abuse, that employer still has the power to block them from leaving and going home or getting another job.

So we are certainly going to work with the governments both of Kuwait and Saudi Arabia as far as how they can address these situations, not because we're trying to figure out how do we get them onto a different tier; it's how do we get the situation for workers in those countries to be better. The tiers then follow.

Yes.

QUESTION: You said earlier this morning, and it's also in the report which I haven't, of course, read all of, that the United States is a source country for human trafficking. What does that mean? Are you saying that there are U.S. citizens around the country that are trafficking women and children and taking advantage of people that are here for temporary working visas, or are you saying that there's people that are coming in from outside the country that are operating these trafficking rings and those kinds of things? What does it - because it doesn't seem to specify that in here.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I hate to say this, but the answer is kind of yes. The - what we have in the United States is a situation where there are homegrown traffickers who are enslaving people in various segments of the economy, and some of those end up enslaving American citizens, some of those end up enslaving foreign nationals. Some of the foreign nationals who are here were recruited in their home countries and brought here by people who intended to do that all along. Others may have immigrated and then, once they're here, get trapped.

I'd actually - and I know you have a very busy day, but if people have a chance, the Coalition of Immokalee Workers Slavery Museum, which is out in the parking lot right now, breaks this down, I think, pretty well, in that it talks - it has some of the artifacts not just from cases with men and women from Mexico and Guatemala who are enslaved in Florida picking crops, but African American men from Florida who spoke English who don't have those same issues of being a foreign person or afraid of the immigration or something like that, African American men being enslaved in agriculture in Florida within the last five, six years.

QUESTION: By U.S. citizens or by --

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: By U.S. citizens. So it's a very multifaceted way that it ends up manifesting. And in sex trafficking, then there's also the difference between those who are enslaving immigrant women in prostitution and those who are enslaving U.S. citizen women and girls. It's often runaways. In those situations, those cases have historically been dealt with in the United States under the prostitution statutes rather than under the involuntary servitude and slavery statutes, though what's happening in some of the situations is that the pimps are actually enslaving the women that are working for them.

QUESTION: One quick thing. Can you explain special cases - what that is, Haiti and - what was the other country?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Somalia. Haiti and Somalia are special cases in no small part because of the capacity of the government. When we have a functional government, even a very haltingly functional government, then that country not only gets assessed but actually ranked. In both Haiti and Somalia, it continues to be our position that those governments are not sufficiently operative to actually give them a ranking in the report.

QUESTION: Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Yes.

QUESTION: Yes. Back on the case of Cuba, I'm wondering what actually is the justification for the - I mean, I read a little bit, but it sounds - it seems like the U.S. might be open to charges of political ranking. I'm just trying to get why Cuba is on Tier 3.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, I think that one of the things that we see for Cuba is that there is no law against this practice. There's some other laws that could be cobbled together perhaps in order to prosecute a trafficker, but there's no evidence that that has actually been done. I think one of the things that we also look at there is, again, the age of legal prostitution. Again, children are - can legally be in prostitution at ages 16 and 17.

We also see the lack of human trafficking protections and no training for the police, prosecutors, or social workers on what to do if one sees a human trafficking situation. So in a country where not only do you have a - such a large tourist industry, other countries in the region that draw tourists from the same places as Cuba, have large child sex tourism problems, and are working to address those, we don't see the same activity in Cuba. So it's a multifaceted approach as far as why they would end up on Tier 3.

QUESTION: Can you comment on North Korea? And also, what do you say to China, where a lot of North Korean human trafficking is actually happening?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, North Korea continues to be a Tier 3 country in this year's report. We have not seen any indication that the North Korean Government is actually addressing the human trafficking problem.

One of the issues, of course, that we have when we look at the northeastern part of China is that there is the North Korean refugee community, that population. What we'd like to see from the Government of China is that there would be actual screening of people within that refugee flow to see which are the people who are actually trafficking victims. We're not saying that every one of them necessarily is, but we've had enough reports, whether it's of forced labor, whether it's of forced marriages, of enough reports of abuse coming out of that region that we'd like to see more screening and then more victim protections on the part of the Chinese Government.

When it comes to North Korea, I think that one of the issues that we're looking at is not simply the lack of a legal regime in order to address human trafficking or to be able to prosecute traffickers or rehabilitate the victims or do any of the things that even are the baseline to be working on it, but also when the North Korean Government exports labor to other countries, are those people in the places that they're going - do they have a modicum of freedom there or is the government sending, whether it's police or security services or others with them in order to keep them in line.

And so we've expressed concern, as have some of the governments of Western Europe. I think it was the Czech Republic actually terminated their contracts with the North Korean Labor Export Company because of their concerns of the type of abuse that was happening with the exported North Korean laborers.

Yes.

QUESTION: (Inaudible) the situation in Taiwan. It had been moved from Tier 2 to Tier 1 year. And is there any special reason for such a movement?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Well, one of the things that, hopefully, jumps out at you as you read the report this year - and if not, I'll give it a little bit of a boost - is the need for more victim protections and the need for a victim response that's not based on detaining the victims. If you take somebody out of a servitude situation where they've had their freedom denied, you take them out, ostensibly rescuing them, and then you put them into a detention center, then that is not necessarily going to win any cases, it's not necessarily going to rehabilitate the victim, it's not really honoring the ethos of the UN protocol on what you're supposed to do as far as the 3-P approach of prevention, protection, and prosecution.

Taiwan - and one of the things that we've seen that occasioned the upgrade this year is that the victim services side has been addressed. So for the first time, their new comprehensive law, which is very well-conceived, has now come into force. And one of the things that it allows is it allows for victims to work, to be able stay in Taiwan, to get jobs with other employers, and to work while their cases are being investigated.

So many countries around the world when you go to a shelter - first of all, it might look more like a detention center, but the victims are just there being warehoused - these are people who are coming out of a tremendously abusive situation. The research shows that most of them haven't even gotten to the point of having post-traumatic stress disorder; they're still in trauma for the first 90 days or so when they're coming out of this slavery situation. Taiwan has recognized that, has studied it, and has actually acted to make sure that these people are not just put in jail after they get liberated.

QUESTION: I haven't read the report yet, but I was just wondering if you can address this issue of trafficking from China and the Indian subcontinent - India, Pakistan, Sri Lanka, and Bangladesh - which usually come to Europe and Africa and then they are brought to U.S. through - by land or sea, from Mexico. And this is - it's very much related to the - the terrorists can use this network.

And another thing was the financial network which is called hawala, which is word-of-mouth, have you addressed that?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I think that the network that you're describing that goes through Africa and into Latin America and up is typically a route that we see with the large-scale alien smuggling situations. We have heard situations of trafficking occurring within that migrant stream, most notably, as you said, with Chinese - often Chinese women who are waylaid for a couple of years in southern Africa being forced in prostitution in order to pay the smuggling fees or pay the debts that the alien smugglers claim that they're owed.

But one of the things that we've seen is that this is a route that is used by both alien smugglers and human traffickers. It's hard to differentiate amongst the two. And so a lot of our attention - because it's such a large human smuggling route, much of our attention has been on the smuggling aspect. And our colleagues over at the Department of Homeland Security have beefed up their legal attaches at the embassies - we've got a good cadre of folks working out of Pretoria - and have been able to dismantle and impinge a number of the shipments and actually have been able to arrest and prosecute some of the large players in that.

I think that you do raise a good point, though, that we have to be mindful of the fact that these routes can be used for various things. You can have a person who's flowing through it who is headed towards a life of indentured servitude. You can have another person who's headed through that route who's simply going to melt into society as an illegal alien. But then you could also have someone who's coming in to do harm. And so we're looking at that across the board to try to make sure that we can disrupt those established smuggling routes.

QUESTION: And about the financial network with is called hawala, which works just word of mouth? You know, $1 million to be transferred, no money moves across the continents. It is paid by this network.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I would defer to our colleagues at Treasury and others as far as the mechanics.

QUESTION: Because Europe is doing a lot to control this.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Excuse me?

QUESTION: Europe is doing a lot to control this.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Yes, and I know that hawala is something that Treasury and other working groups have been dealing with. That's not necessarily something that's reflected in this year's report.

QUESTION: Do you see improvement? Is the number of victims decreasing or increasing this year? Last year, the UN reported about 12 million people were victims. How do you see it? Is there improvement?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: We see improvement in that we see now 116 countries that have - 116 countries have enacted legislation. The number of convictions have increased - 40 percent, actually - since last year, up to over 4,000. The number of labor convictions have tripled, up to 335. But what we don't necessarily see yet is the decrease in victims, partially because we're still trying to get the baseline as to what is the baseline from which we would work.

I think that one of the things that we see is that as a country starts to comply with their obligations under the Palermo Protocol around prevention, protection, and prosecution, once they put together an intergovernmental - like an inter-ministerial working group or an interagency working group - once they put those structures in place, they start to see more victims. It's because they're finding them; it's not because the victims weren't there before.

So the Netherlands Antilles is a perfect example. Up until last year, they didn't have those structures in place and so NGOs would report that there was trafficking in Curacao and those different islands, but there was no cases and no victims identified. In the last year, they've actually arrested and prosecuted nine traffickers because they had built the structures that had been able to see it.

So I actually think that success in the next few years is actually going to look a lot - it's going to be an increase in numbers of cases, an increase in numbers of victims. That might be counterintuitive; you'd like to see it go down, but I think that success will actually be that we're uncovering more cases. Then as we get the baseline, we'll be able to start assessing the efficacy of the various things.

QUESTION: Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Take one more question and then - yeah.

MR. TONER: Yeah, one more question.

QUESTION: Yeah, wait - yeah. Do you get the sense from the report, from the overview, that - you know, the sense of progress and improvement that you're talking about? One might have imagined that the economic global downturn might have led to - I mean, you can imagine how it could have led to some, in more cases, worse problems. I'm wondering, do you have any sense of the economic impact of the global recession?

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: As far as we can tell, there's a couple of competing issues within the economic downturn. On the one hand, people are more desperate and are therefore willing to take more risks, putting themselves into harm's way with an abusive labor recruiter.

On the other hand, there are fewer big projects for them to be placed by those abusive labor recruiters. So if you see, for instance, building booms in Western Europe or in the Gulf, those building booms collapsed and there is no longer the demand for your Eastern European construction workers in Western Europe or your South Asian construction workers, say, for instance, in the Gulf states. So it seems to be cancelling itself out a little bit as far as the demand for the exploitable labor going down as part of the market.

What we are very concerned, though, about the economic downturn is the softening, or what appears to be a softening of the amount of money that some of the countries are spending on victim protection. And we think that even in the economic downturn, it's something that your money is well spent upon. Victim protection in this situation is not simply a social program. It's also being able to help the folks who you've gotten out of a slavery situation, work them through their trauma, and then have them as effective witnesses against the transnational criminals that you're trying to put out of business.

So it's not simply - we would suggest to the countries who are thinking about cutting the budgets as far as victim protection is concerned - it's not simply a social program; it's actually a law enforcement tool that they'd be putting on the shelf. And frankly, we've seen countries that are as poor as Moldova still spending money on victim shelters, still supporting these types of things. So if Moldova, which has one of the lowest GDPs out there - if Moldova can come up with $50-or-$60,000 to fund shelters, we would certainly expect other countries, even in a recession, would be able to as well.

QUESTION: Thank you.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Thank you so much.

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS hc11-JF78--100615-2863690 StaffFurigay

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 Targeted News Service LLC
All Rights Reserved

217 of 404 DOCUMENTS

UPI

June 14, 2010 Monday 5:15 PM EST

U.S. included in human trafficking report

LENGTH: 359 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 14

Iran, North Korea and Myanmar were among countries named for not meeting minimum international human trafficking standards in a U.S. State Department report.

Besides those three repressive regimes, the 10th annual Trafficking in Persons report released Monday listed Papua New Guinea, Kuwait, Sudan, Cuba, Mauritania, the Dominican Republic, Congo, Saudi Arabia, Eritrea and Zimbabwe as "Tier 3" countries that haven't shown effort to comply with minimum international standards.

The United States is included the first time because "we believe it is important to keep the spotlight on ourselves," Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said when introducing the report.

The United States is listed as a "Tier 1" country -- along with 20-plus other countries -- meaning it complies with minimum standards. "Tier 2" countries aren't fully compliant but are working to improve.

Behind statistics of the report, Clinton said, "are the struggles of real human beings, the tears of families who may never see their children again, the despair and indignity of those suffering under the worst forms of exploitation."

The report provides assessments and recommendations for 177 countries, she said.

"All of us have a responsibility to bring this practice to an end," Clinton said. "Survivors must be supported and their families aided and comforted, but we cannot turn our responsibility for doing that over to non-governmental organizations or the faith community."

Key numbers from the 2010 report for the year 2009 include:

-- 12.3 million adults and children are in forced labor, bonded labor and forced prostitution worldwide, and 56 percent are women and girls.

-- Human traffickers collect $32 billion annually.

-- The 49,105 victims of trafficking worldwide is a 59 percent increase over 2008, the last reporting year.

The report said 23 countries' rankings were upgraded in the 2010 report while 19 countries were downgraded in their rankings.

The report also said 4,166 prosecutions in 2009 were successful, but 62 countries still haven't convicted a human trafficker and 104 countries don't have laws, policies or regulations to prevent victims from being deported.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 U.P.I.
All Rights Reserved

218 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Voice of America News

June 14, 2010

US Warns Nations Failing to Fight Human Trafficking ^% ^hl2>

BYLINE: VOA News

SECTION: VOA ENGLISH SERVICE

LENGTH: 348 words

The United States is warning more than a dozen nations, including Iran, North Korea, Cuba and Burma, of possible sanctions for failing to meet minimum international standards to fight human trafficking.

In its annual report on human trafficking, the U.S. State Department designated 13 nations as "Tier 3," meaning their governments are not following international standards to fight trafficking and could face penalties if their records do not improve.

The report says 12.3 million adults and children around the world are currently victims of forced labor, bonded labor or forced prostitution.

U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton says the report is a "catalog of tragedies" the world cannot continue to accept. She said human trafficking crosses cultures and continents, and the entire world has a responsibility to bring these crimes to an end.

The report says trafficking in Burma remains a serious concern because the military allegedly engages in unlawful conscription of child soldiers and continues to be the main perpetrator of forced labor.

In North Korea, the report says the most common form of trafficking involves North Korean women and girls forced into marriages or prostitution in China.

The report also says women in Iran are trafficked for forced prostitution and forced marriages. It says Iranian and Afghan children living in Iran are trafficked for commercial sexual exploitation.

The 2010 report evaluated 175 countries and ranked them by their anti-trafficking efforts.

Other nations receiving the failing status for their lack of anti-trafficking efforts are the Democratic Republic of Congo, the Dominican Republic, Eritrea, Kuwait, Mauritania, Papua New Guinea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan and Zimbabwe.

For the first time, the report, which is in its 10th year, also includes a ranking of U.S. anti-trafficking efforts. The report says most trafficking in the United States involves foreign victims trafficked primarily for labor. But it also says more U.S. citizens, both adults and children, are victims of sex trafficking.

Some information for this report was provided by AP.

LOAD-DATE: June 14, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Journal

JOURNAL-CODE: VA

Copyright 2010 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

219 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Congressional Documents and Publications

June 8, 2010

Webb Recommends State Department Strengthen Engagement in Asia; Calls for passage of US-Korea Free Trade Agreement, increased East Asia Bureau funding, immediate appointment of Special Envoy to Burma;
Sen. Jim Webb (D-VA) News Release

SECTION: U.S. SENATE DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 1568 words

Senator Jim Webb, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations East Asian and Pacific Affairs Subcommittee, today sent the following letter to Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton regarding his recent trip to Asia and his recommendations for strengthening U.S. policies in the region:

June 8, 2010

The Honorable Hillary Rodham Clinton

Secretary of State

U.S. Department of State

2201 C Street, NW

Washington, DC 20520

Dear Secretary Clinton:

In my capacity as chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations East Asian and Pacific Affairs Subcommittee, I visited Korea and Thailand last week to assess the current situation in both of those countries, as well as in the region. I had also intended to visit Burma on this trip, but postponed my visit for reasons described below.

Following meetings with government representatives, business and community leaders, U.S. diplomats, and others, I would like to share with you the following observations and recommendations. As you will note, some of these recommendations are quite time-sensitive.

1. United States-Korea Free Trade Agreement:

I believe strongly that the United States, the Republic of Korea, and all of East Asia will benefit greatly from the implementation of the U.S.-Korea Free Trade Agreement (KORUS FTA). I am also very concerned about the time delay in gaining congressional approval for this agreement.

The KORUS FTA was signed on June 30, 2007. With this agreement, tariffs on consumer and industrial goods will be immediately eliminated on almost 95 percent of all bilateral trade within three years. Tariffs on two-thirds of U.S. agricultural exports will be immediately eliminated. U.S. automakers have concerns, and processes exist for these matters to be addressed. In sum, the advantages of implementing this agreement far outweigh any disadvantages, and failure to implement the agreement could have negative repercussions.

Korea has used this agreement as a model for negotiating other free trade agreements, principally with the European Union (EU). The EU-Korea FTA is expected to be signed in June and implemented by December. If the United States does not take steps toward cementing its own agreement with Korea, our businesses could face significant market competition. Just as importantly, such a failure could negatively affect East Asian views of how our country values this region.

I hope you will call on the President to submit this agreement to Congress this year before the November elections, and I can assure you that I will do my part in the Senate to ensure that it is approved.

2. Democracy assistance to Thailand:

The State Department Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report is due for release in mid-June. The U.S. Embassy in Bangkok has reported that Thailand's status will be downgraded from Tier II to the Tier II Watch List. The Embassy disagrees with the merits of this assessment, and it also has concerns about the consequences of this placement.

Downgrading Thailand to the Tier II Watch List places the country at risk for sanctions on U.S. assistance, primarily for democracy and human rights programs. Such a downgrade would occur at a time when this type of aid is desperately needed to bolster political reforms in Thailand and to promote political stability. Under current law a presidential waiver can be granted, but only after the sanctions have been announced.

I hope you will accept the advice and counsel of our embassy in Thailand, and reject in advance of the TIP report's release any recommendation to downgrade the Thai government's status. From what I am hearing regarding the timeliness issue, this would require immediate action by you and your staff.

3. United Nations Security Council Resolution 1874:

In May 2010, Assistant Secretary of State Kurt Campbell raised allegations that Burma has violated its commitment to UN Resolution 1874 regarding acceptance of shipments of military items from North Korea. Although not explained in his statement, and not validated by subsequent information, news reports alleged that Burma received a shipment of arms from North Korea. This allegation, which from my understanding has yet to be publicly clarified and substantiated by the State Department, has frozen any prospect of further engagement with the Burmese government.

Prior to my recent Asia trip, I and my staff worked for weeks to seek public clarification of this allegation, but the State Department provided none. At the time I left for my trip to Asia, no other countries had joined the United States in this allegation, although it had been discussed with several other countries. The State Department still has not publicly clarified this matter. My staff was told by Deputy Assistant Secretary of State Scot Marciel that no other nation has joined the United States in publicly denouncing Burma on this matter.

As you know, only hours before I was scheduled to enter Burma, reports surfaced in the international media regarding new allegations that the military regime was cooperating with North Korea to develop a nuclear program. These allegations were raised by the Democratic Voice of Burma, which is a U.S.-funded media organization.

As a consequence of these two allegations, I postponed my visit to Burma until such time as both of them can be examined objectively and factually. I am now calling on you to do so, in a timely manner, so that our future relations with this country can proceed forward in a responsible way.

4. Special Envoy to Burma:

You will recall that the 2008 Tom Lantos Block Burmese JADE Act requires the President to appoint a Special Representative and Policy Coordinator for Burma, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Among other responsibilities, this position should "promote a comprehensive international effort, including multilateral sanctions, direct dialogue with the SPDC and democracy advocates, and support for nongovernmental organizations operating in Burma and neighboring countries, designed to restore civilian democratic rule to Burma and address the urgent humanitarian needs of the Burmese people." Since this act has been in effect, the position has not been filled.

I hope you will ask the President to appoint a Special Envoy to Burma without delay. In that regard, I would like to strongly recommend Ambassador Eric John, who currently serves in Thailand, for this position. Ambassador John has spent many years in East Asia, and has long experience in dealing with the North Korean regime on issues that might be similar to those we will be facing in Burma.

5. Increase East Asia Bureau Funding:

In April, I submitted an amendment to the Foreign Relations Authorization Act to increase funding to the East Asia and Pacific Affairs Bureau by $100 million. The East Asia Bureau is consistently funded at lower levels than all other regional bureaus, despite its extensive population and its frequent political volatility.

The East Asia Bureau had the lowest FY11 request for overseas programs at $169 million. Among foreign assistance accounts, Economic Support Funds (ESF) for East Asia are facing a decline from $177.9 million in FY10 to $61.3 million in FY11--a 65 percent reduction just as we see a growth in political instability and regional tensions. As a comparison, FY09 and FY10, $4.8 billion was appropriated for Afghanistan ESF. As of May 2010, a total of $2.06 billion from that appropriation remains unobligated. These remaining funds are more than 30 times the ESF request for East Asia.

Also, the Department's request for International Military Education and Training (IMET) in East Asia is the lowest of any region, with only $9.3 million. This is a critical account for engaging the region's military leaders through English language training, promoting trust and confidence, and strengthening relationships with our partners and allies.

I am gravely concerned that the lack of proper funding for these programs in the State Department places our relationships in Asia at risk. For example, as Thailand recovers from recent political unrest and moves forward with reconciliation, it needs greater U.S. assistance and public support for the improvement of democratic institutions. It is our responsibility as an ally of Thailand to ensure that it remains an open and stable society, and to help stem further political instability. We can do so only when we properly fund our initiatives and provide our diplomats with the resources they need.

I intend to seek greater funding for these programs in the FY11 appropriations process. I would hope that you might support this initiative. Further, as you develop your budget for FY12, I ask you to make funding of the East Asia Bureau a strategic priority for the Department and increase East Asia accounts by at least $100 million. For my part, I will continue to seek through all available means the resources needed now for the Bureau.

In sum, despite all of this Administration's rhetoric about re-engaging Asia, unless we properly resource diplomatic and foreign assistance programs, the United States will not be fulfilling this stated commitment to the region. Moreover, our continued inaction is opening the door for other actors, namely China, to build influence.

Thank you for your consideration of these recommendations. I look forward to your response and to working with you and the State Department to implement these initiatives.

Sincerely,

Jim Webb

United States Senator

#DAL1234#

LOAD-DATE: June 9, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: COSSM

220 of 404 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 8, 2010 TuesdayWEBB RECOMMENDS STATE DEPARTMENT STRENGTHEN ENGAGEMENT IN ASIA*BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 1577 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by Virginia Senator Jim Webb:

Senator Jim Webb, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations East Asian and Pacific Affairs Subcommittee, today sent the following letter to Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton regarding his recent trip to Asia and his recommendations for strengthening U.S. policies in the region:

June 8, 2010

The Honorable Hillary Rodham Clinton

Secretary of State

U.S. Department of State

2201 C Street, NW

Washington, DC 20520

Dear Secretary Clinton:

In my capacity as chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations East Asian and Pacific Affairs Subcommittee, I visited Korea and Thailand last week to assess the current situation in both of those countries, as well as in the region. I had also intended to visit Burma on this trip, but postponed my visit for reasons described below.

Following meetings with government representatives, business and community leaders, U.S. diplomats, and others, I would like to share with you the following observations and recommendations. As you will note, some of these recommendations are quite time-sensitive.

1. United States-Korea Free Trade Agreement:

I believe strongly that the United States, the Republic of Korea, and all of East Asia will benefit greatly from the implementation of the U.S.-Korea Free Trade Agreement (KORUS FTA). I am also very concerned about the time delay in gaining congressional approval for this agreement.

The KORUS FTA was signed on June 30, 2007. With this agreement, tariffs on consumer and industrial goods will be immediately eliminated on almost 95 percent of all bilateral trade within three years. Tariffs on two-thirds of U.S. agricultural exports will be immediately eliminated. U.S. automakers have concerns, and processes exist for these matters to be addressed. In sum, the advantages of implementing this agreement far outweigh any disadvantages, and failure to implement the agreement could have negative repercussions.

Korea has used this agreement as a model for negotiating other free trade agreements, principally with the European Union (EU). The EU-Korea FTA is expected to be signed in June and implemented by December. If the United States does not take steps toward cementing its own agreement with Korea, our businesses could face significant market competition. Just as importantly, such a failure could negatively affect East Asian views of how our country values this region.

I hope you will call on the President to submit this agreement to Congress this year before the November elections, and I can assure you that I will do my part in the Senate to ensure that it is approved.

2. Democracy assistance to Thailand:

The State Department Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report is due for release in mid-June. The U.S. Embassy in Bangkok has reported that Thailand's status will be downgraded from Tier II to the Tier II Watch List. The Embassy disagrees with the merits of this assessment, and it also has concerns about the consequences of this placement.

Downgrading Thailand to the Tier II Watch List places the country at risk for sanctions on U.S. assistance, primarily for democracy and human rights programs. Such a downgrade would occur at a time when this type of aid is desperately needed to bolster political reforms in Thailand and to promote political stability. Under current law a presidential waiver can be granted, but only after the sanctions have been announced.

I hope you will accept the advice and counsel of our embassy in Thailand, and reject in advance of the TIP reports release any recommendation to downgrade the Thai government's status. From what I am hearing regarding the timeliness issue, this would require immediate action by you and your staff.

3. United Nations Security Council Resolution 1874:

In May 2010, Assistant Secretary of State Kurt Campbell raised allegations that Burma has violated its commitment to UN Resolution 1874 regarding acceptance of shipments of military items from North Korea. Although not explained in his statement, and not validated by subsequent information, news reports alleged that Burma received a shipment of arms from North Korea. This allegation, which from my understanding has yet to be publicly clarified and substantiated by the State Department, has frozen any prospect of further engagement with the Burmese government.

Prior to my recent Asia trip, I and my staff worked for weeks to seek public clarification of this allegation, but the State Department provided none. At the time I left for my trip to Asia, no other countries had joined the United States in this allegation, although it had been discussed with several other countries. The State Department still has not publicly clarified this matter. My staff was told by Deputy Assistant Secretary of State Scot Marciel that no other nation has joined the United States in publicly denouncing Burma on this matter.

As you know, only hours before I was scheduled to enter Burma, reports surfaced in the international media regarding new allegations that the military regime was cooperating with North Korea to develop a nuclear program. These allegations were raised by the Democratic Voice of Burma, which is a U.S.-funded media organization.

As a consequence of these two allegations, I postponed my visit to Burma until such time as both of them can be examined objectively and factually. I am now calling on you to do so, in a timely manner, so that our future relations with this country can proceed forward in a responsible way.

4. Special Envoy to Burma:

You will recall that the 2008 Tom Lantos Block Burmese JADE Act requires the President to appoint a Special Representative and Policy Coordinator for Burma, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Among other responsibilities, this position should promote a comprehensive international effort, including multilateral sanctions, direct dialogue with the SPDC and democracy advocates, and support for nongovernmental organizations operating in Burma and neighboring countries, designed to restore civilian democratic rule to Burma and address the urgent humanitarian needs of the Burmese people. Since this act has been in effect, the position has not been filled.

I hope you will ask the President to appoint a Special Envoy to Burma without delay. In that regard, I would like to strongly recommend Ambassador Eric John, who currently serves in Thailand, for this position. Ambassador John has spent many years in East Asia, and has long experience in dealing with the North Korean regime on issues that might be similar to those we will be facing in Burma.

5. Increase East Asia Bureau Funding:

In April, I submitted an amendment to the Foreign Relations Authorization Act to increase funding to the East Asia and Pacific Affairs Bureau by $100 million. The East Asia Bureau is consistently funded at lower levels than all other regional bureaus, despite its extensive population and its frequent political volatility.

The East Asia Bureau had the lowest FY11 request for overseas programs at $169 million. Among foreign assistance accounts, Economic Support Funds (ESF) for East Asia are facing a decline from $177.9 million in FY10 to $61.3 million in FY11 a 65 percent reduction just as we see a growth in political instability and regional tensions. As a comparison, FY09 and FY10, $4.8 billion was appropriated for Afghanistan ESF. As of May 2010, a total of $2.06 billion from that appropriation remains unobligated. These remaining funds are more than 30 times the ESF request for East Asia.

Also, the Departments request for International Military Education and Training (IMET) in East Asia is the lowest of any region, with only $9.3 million. This is a critical account for engaging the regions military leaders through English language training, promoting trust and confidence, and strengthening relationships with our partners and allies.

I am gravely concerned that the lack of proper funding for these programs in the State Department places our relationships in Asia at risk. For example, as Thailand recovers from recent political unrest and moves forward with reconciliation, it needs greater U.S. assistance and public support for the improvement of democratic institutions. It is our responsibility as an ally of Thailand to ensure that it remains an open and stable society, and to help stem further political instability. We can do so only when we properly fund our initiatives and provide our diplomats with the resources they need.

I intend to seek greater funding for these programs in the FY11 appropriations process. I would hope that you might support this initiative. Further, as you develop your budget for FY12, I ask you to make funding of the East Asia Bureau a strategic priority for the Department and increase East Asia accounts by at least $100 million. For my part, I will continue to seek through all available means the resources needed now for the Bureau.

In sum, despite all of this Administrations rhetoric about re-engaging Asia, unless we properly resource diplomatic and foreign assistance programs, the United States will not be fulfilling this stated commitment to the region. Moreover, our continued inaction is opening the door for other actors, namely China, to build influence.

Thank you for your consideration of these recommendations. I look forward to your response and to working with you and the State Department to implement these initiatives.

Sincerely,

Jim Webb

United States Senator

LOAD-DATE: June 8, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

221 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

June 8, 2010 Tuesday 9:37 PM EST

Webb Recommends State Department Strengthen Engagement in Asia

BYLINE: Targeted News ServiceLENGTH: 1591 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The office of Sen. Jim Webb, D-Va., has issued the following news release:

Senator Jim Webb, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations East Asian and Pacific Affairs Subcommittee, today sent the following letter to Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton regarding his recent trip to Asia and his recommendations for strengthening U.S. policies in the region:

June 8, 2010

The Honorable Hillary Rodham Clinton

Secretary of State

U.S. Department of State

2201 C Street, NW

Washington, DC 20520

Dear Secretary Clinton:

In my capacity as chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations East Asian and Pacific Affairs Subcommittee, I visited Korea and Thailand last week to assess the current situation in both of those countries, as well as in the region. I had also intended to visit Burma on this trip, but postponed my visit for reasons described below.

Following meetings with government representatives, business and community leaders, U.S. diplomats, and others, I would like to share with you the following observations and recommendations. As you will note, some of these recommendations are quite time-sensitive.

1. United States-Korea Free Trade Agreement:

I believe strongly that the United States, the Republic of Korea, and all of East Asia will benefit greatly from the implementation of the U.S.-Korea Free Trade Agreement (KORUS FTA). I am also very concerned about the time delay in gaining congressional approval for this agreement.

The KORUS FTA was signed on June 30, 2007. With this agreement, tariffs on consumer and industrial goods will be immediately eliminated on almost 95 percent of all bilateral trade within three years. Tariffs on two-thirds of U.S. agricultural exports will be immediately eliminated. U.S. automakers have concerns, and processes exist for these matters to be addressed. In sum, the advantages of implementing this agreement far outweigh any disadvantages, and failure to implement the agreement could have negative repercussions.

Korea has used this agreement as a model for negotiating other free trade agreements, principally with the European Union (EU). The EU-Korea FTA is expected to be signed in June and implemented by December. If the United States does not take steps toward cementing its own agreement with Korea, our businesses could face significant market competition. Just as importantly, such a failure could negatively affect East Asian views of how our country values this region.

I hope you will call on the President to submit this agreement to Congress this year before the November elections, and I can assure you that I will do my part in the Senate to ensure that it is approved.

2. Democracy assistance to Thailand:

The State Department Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report is due for release in mid-June. The U.S. Embassy in Bangkok has reported that Thailand's status will be downgraded from Tier II to the Tier II Watch List. The Embassy disagrees with the merits of this assessment, and it also has concerns about the consequences of this placement.

Downgrading Thailand to the Tier II Watch List places the country at risk for sanctions on U.S. assistance, primarily for democracy and human rights programs. Such a downgrade would occur at a time when this type of aid is desperately needed to bolster political reforms in Thailand and to promote political stability. Under current law a presidential waiver can be granted, but only after the sanctions have been announced.

I hope you will accept the advice and counsel of our embassy in Thailand, and reject in advance of the TIP report's release any recommendation to downgrade the Thai government's status. From what I am hearing regarding the timeliness issue, this would require immediate action by you and your staff.

3. United Nations Security Council Resolution 1874:

In May 2010, Assistant Secretary of State Kurt Campbell raised allegations that Burma has violated its commitment to UN Resolution 1874 regarding acceptance of shipments of military items from North Korea. Although not explained in his statement, and not validated by subsequent information, news reports alleged that Burma received a shipment of arms from North Korea. This allegation, which from my understanding has yet to be publicly clarified and substantiated by the State Department, has frozen any prospect of further engagement with the Burmese government.

Prior to my recent Asia trip, I and my staff worked for weeks to seek public clarification of this allegation, but the State Department provided none.

At the time I left for my trip to Asia, no other countries had joined the United States in this allegation, although it had been discussed with several other countries. The State Department still has not publicly clarified this matter. My staff was told by Deputy Assistant Secretary of State Scot Marciel that no other nation has joined the United States in publicly denouncing Burma on this matter.

As you know, only hours before I was scheduled to enter Burma, reports surfaced in the international media regarding new allegations that the military regime was cooperating with North Korea to develop a nuclear program. These allegations were raised by the Democratic Voice of Burma, which is a U.S.-funded media organization.

As a consequence of these two allegations, I postponed my visit to Burma until such time as both of them can be examined objectively and factually.

I am now calling on you to do so, in a timely manner, so that our future relations with this country can proceed forward in a responsible way.

4. Special Envoy to Burma:

You will recall that the 2008 Tom Lantos Block Burmese JADE Act requires the President to appoint a Special Representative and Policy Coordinator for Burma, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Among other responsibilities, this position should "promote a comprehensive international effort, including multilateral sanctions, direct dialogue with the SPDC and democracy advocates, and support for nongovernmental organizations operating in Burma and neighboring countries, designed to restore civilian democratic rule to Burma and address the urgent humanitarian needs of the Burmese people." Since this act has been in effect, the position has not been filled.

I hope you will ask the President to appoint a Special Envoy to Burma without delay. In that regard, I would like to strongly recommend Ambassador Eric John, who currently serves in Thailand, for this position.

Ambassador John has spent many years in East Asia, and has long experience in dealing with the North Korean regime on issues that might be similar to those we will be facing in Burma.

5. Increase East Asia Bureau Funding:

In April, I submitted an amendment to the Foreign Relations Authorization Act to increase funding to the East Asia and Pacific Affairs Bureau by $100 million. The East Asia Bureau is consistently funded at lower levels than all other regional bureaus, despite its extensive population and its frequent political volatility.

The East Asia Bureau had the lowest FY11 request for overseas programs at $169 million. Among foreign assistance accounts, Economic Support Funds (ESF) for East Asia are facing a decline from $177.9 million in FY10 to $61.3 million in FY11--a 65 percent reduction just as we see a growth in political instability and regional tensions. As a comparison, FY09 and FY10, $4.8 billion was appropriated for Afghanistan ESF. As of May 2010, a total of $2.06 billion from that appropriation remains unobligated. These remaining funds are more than 30 times the ESF request for East Asia.

Also, the Department's request for International Military Education and Training (IMET) in East Asia is the lowest of any region, with only $9.3 million. This is a critical account for engaging the region's military leaders through English language training, promoting trust and confidence, and strengthening relationships with our partners and allies.

I am gravely concerned that the lack of proper funding for these programs in the State Department places our relationships in Asia at risk. For example, as Thailand recovers from recent political unrest and moves forward with reconciliation, it needs greater U.S. assistance and public support for the improvement of democratic institutions. It is our responsibility as an ally of Thailand to ensure that it remains an open and stable society, and to help stem further political instability. We can do so only when we properly fund our initiatives and provide our diplomats with the resources they need.

I intend to seek greater funding for these programs in the FY11 appropriations process. I would hope that you might support this initiative. Further, as you develop your budget for FY12, I ask you to make funding of the East Asia Bureau a strategic priority for the Department and increase East Asia accounts by at least $100 million. For my part, I will continue to seek through all available means the resources needed now for the Bureau.

In sum, despite all of this Administration's rhetoric about re-engaging Asia, unless we properly resource diplomatic and foreign assistance programs, the United States will not be fulfilling this stated commitment to the region. Moreover, our continued inaction is opening the door for other actors, namely China, to build influence.

Thank you for your consideration of these recommendations. I look forward to your response and to working with you and the State Department to implement these initiatives.

Sincerely,

Jim Webb

United States Senator

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS CT21CT-100609-2851254 61ChengTacorda

LOAD-DATE: June 9, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

222 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Fiji Times (Australia)

May 17, 2010 Monday
1 Edition

Teleni seeks joint effort on traffickers

BYLINE: Shalveen Chand And Samantha RinaSECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 6LENGTH: 333 words

THERE should be a joint effort to tackle human trafficking as signs of it were becoming clearer in the region, said Police Commissioner Commodore Esala Teleni.

"This global phenomenon of trafficking in human beings will continue to increase unless we begin to initiate strategies to counter the problem," Commodore Teleni said.

"We are forced to cope with factors like weak economies, increasing poverty and few job opportunities, low risk of prosecution, the enormous profit potential, and improved international transportation and communication infrastructures such as the internet that provide innovative uses for prostitution and pornography.

"The Fiji Police Human Trafficking Working Group has been tasked to make an assessment through consultations, of the regional and international trends in addressing the issue of trafficking in human beings in Fiji, to take stock of best practices adopted by countries in the region and outside to combat the problem, to carry out demonstration projects and to evaluate these projects based on a standardised criteria."

The police have particular interest in addressing the issue in view of the introduction of the Crimes Decree No 44, and Fiji being highlighted as Tier 3 in the 2009 Trafficking In Persons (TIP) report.

"Our position on the trafficking of persons, especially women and children, is firmly grounded in the existing laws and on a human rights approach," Commodore Teleni emphasised.

"It builds on the principles already laid down by previous international human rights instruments."

He told the workshop that trafficking was the sale of human beings and also a sale of one's dignity.

"The only difference between trafficking and traditional slavery is that trafficking occurs without the sanction of law.

"Slavery has been outlawed by the international community for over a century, but the criminalisation of slavery and trafficking has not affected its prevalence."

Fiji is obliged by a number of international treaties to address the problem.

LOAD-DATE: May 25, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: NewspaperJOURNAL-CODE: FIJ

All Rights Reserved

223 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

May 16, 2010 Sunday

Fiji judge criticizes US assessment on human trafficking

LENGTH: 196 words

Text of report by news portal Fijilive website on 15 May Fiji's Chief Justice Anthony Gates says Fiji's efforts in the area of human trafficking need to be lifted in a "politics-neutral way". Commenting on the State Department Trafficking Report 2009, Justice Gates said the report seemed to have lost its way in its commentary on tier placement, penalties for tier countries and sanctions.

"It may be that the 2009 report is now history," Justice Gates told the Fiji Police Human Trafficking Consultative Forum in Suva yesterday. "For with the far reaching reforms of (Fiji's) new Crimes Decree with its fulsome trafficking, people-smuggling and related offences, together with the new initiative shown at this forum, and the input from the wide field of stakeholders, the approach in Fiji will be seen to have made excellent progress."

A senior US official told the workshop this week that Fiji was listed as a Tier 3 nation in the US report. He said it was US government policy not to support countries listed in that tier.

The workshop has heard that children as young as 10 years are commercially exploited for sex in Fiji.

Source: Fijilive website, Suva, in English 15 May 10

LOAD-DATE: May 16, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

224 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Fiji Times (Australia)

May 14, 2010 Friday
1 Edition$1bn loan*BYLINE: Shalveen ChandSECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 1LENGTH: 331 words

Fiji's chances of getting a $1billion loan from the International Monetary Fund may depend on steps it takes over United Nations conventions on human trafficking.

United States deputy chief of mission Richard Pruett said Fiji was listed as a Tier 3 nation in the US report on human trafficking and as policy the US government could not support governments listed in that tier.

"Well Fiji has applied for a standby credit agreement with the IMF of no less than $1billion. The United States is the most prominent member of the IMF's board," he said.

"So long as Fiji is at Tier 3, our law requires us not just to vote against the loan but to actively oppose it. $1billion is a lot of money. But trafficking in persons is an important issue."

Mr Pruett made the comments at the start of the two-day Fiji Police Human Trafficking Action Program. Police Commissioner Commodore Esala Teleni acknowledged that much was needed to be done to effectively combat human trafficking here.

He said all parties involved in combating trafficking must interact with each other.

"Trafficking is a problem that we can only hope to solve by a multi-disciplinary and co-ordinated approach," Commodore Teleni said.

"It will require a combination of extended research, legislative measures, improved policing and prosecution practices and judicial awareness."

According to Mr Pruett, Fiji and the US Embassy made substantial progress in combating human trafficking in the past two years.

He said the President, Ratu Epeli Nailatikau, showed strong support to combat the issue.

"There has been much more public awareness on the issue," said Mr Pruett.

Currently, the US funds two projects in Fiji but Mr Pruett believes that there is a need to do more.

"The problem is particularly urgent now as the global financial crisis drives people to greater desperation," he added.

Mr Pruett said Fiji could remove itself from the Tier 3 status by strengthening effective law enforcement and collaboration on anti trafficking efforts.

LOAD-DATE: May 14, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: FIJ

Copyright 2010 Nationwide News Pty Limited
All Rights Reserved

225 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Fiji Times (Australia)

May 14, 2010 Friday
1 EditionPruett: Fiji used as transit point*SECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 3LENGTH: 304 words

Organised crime syndicates are already operating in Fiji and probing for weaknesses in Fiji's system and the weaknesses exist, said United States Deputy Chief of Mission Richard Pruett.

"When it comes to trafficking never underestimate your opponents," said Mr Pruett referring to the organisational structure of trafficking rings.

Addressing participants at a workshop on human trafficking organised by the Fiji Police and UNICEF, Mr Pruett said when Fiji was told of the dangers of human trafficking a few years ago, the government did not seem to care about the issue.

"Even after the United Nations report on human trafficking there was no action taken to eradicate the problem and no steps to educate the public," he said.

According to Mr Pruett, the economical and political situation in 2006 also meant that Fiji's focus was not on such matters.

He said the police was not funded well to look after the issue of human trafficking.

"The snakeheads, pimps and triads (name given to Chinese crime syndicate) are real, even more real than you think. They are always looking for weaknesses in immigration control," said Mr Pruett.

Mr Pruett told participants that his initial thoughts on Fiji's involvement in human trafficking was very minimal.

However news reports on Asian prostitution rings arrest, a Filipina's passport being held by her employer and the emergence of an 11-year-old girl in Bangkok, changed his view.

He said Fiji was being used as a transit point and there was a need for a collaborated effort from the government and the civil society.

Fiji's attitude towards human trafficking saw Fiji being listed as a Tier 3 nation in the US report on Human Trafficking meaning that the country has not met the minimum requirement to deal with human trafficking and the Government is not doing anything to address the issue.

LOAD-DATE: May 14, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: NewspaperJOURNAL-CODE: FIJ

226 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Federal News Service

May 12, 2010 Wednesday

PREPARED REMARKS OF LUIS CDEBACA, AMBASSADOR-AT-LARGE,
OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS,
STATE DEPARTMENT, AT THE CENTER FOR AMERICAN PROGRESS;
SUBJECT: THE ROLE OF THE UNITED STATES IN COMBATING HU-MAN TRAFFICKING;
LOCATION: WASHINGTON, D.C.

SECTION: STATE DEPARTMENT BRIEFING

LENGTH: 2498 words

PREPARED REMARKS OF LUIS CDEBACA, AMBASSADOR-AT-LARGE, OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS, STATE DEPARTMENT, AT THE CENTER FOR AMERICAN PROGRESS SUBJECT: THE ROLE OF THE UNITED STATES IN COMBATING HUMAN TRAFFICKING LOCATION: WASHINGTON, D.C. DATE: WEDNESDAY, MAY 12, 2010

MR. CDEBACA: Good morning and thank you Ken Gude for your kind introduction. I am delighted to be here today at the Center for American Progress. This institution is truly an academic hub whose top-rate thinkers provide cutting-edge ideas. We'll hear from some of those thinkers this morning: David Abramowitz of Humanity United, Holly Burkhalter of the International Justice Mission, Neha Misra of the Solidarity Center, and John Norris of Enough - thank you for putting time and energy into today's conversation. I am also pleased to see so many key partners in the anti-trafficking movement here with us today.

Human trafficking is a human rights abuse; a byproduct of conflict; a threat to national security, public health and democracy; a labor and migration issue, and an ever-growing phenomenon. While this is a modern phenomenon, affecting communities across the globe, it is rooted in a very antiquated practice: involuntary servitude.

The United States' role in combating trafficking is simple: we must deploy every tool at our disposal in a strategic and coordinated way. We must tackle every form of this crime - whether it has been labeled peonage, involuntary servitude, sex trafficking, or debt bondage. We cannot focus on one form of trafficking over another if we truly want to end this crime. We must broaden our efforts to ensure that every man, woman, and child is able to pursue, and achieve, his or her God-given potential.

Translating the fight against this modern form of slavery into our 21st Century foreign policy priorities is essential, as it cross-cuts and impacts a myriad of policy concerns. It is a fluid phenomenon, responding to market demands, vulnerabilities in laws, weak penalties, natural disasters, and economic and environmental instability.

Traffickers thrive in the shadows and operate in zones of impunity. The global response must not only catch and punish the traffickers we find, but also destroy their safe havens by fighting for rule of law, security, and economic empowerment.

In the decade since the world embraced the global standards under the international trafficking in persons protocol and the Clinton Administration enacted the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA), the United States has pursued innovative approaches to combat this human rights abuse. There has been a lot of progress made against this crime; and, there is still much work to do - 10 years is just a blip in the history of this modern abolitionist effort.

One of the key tools that the United States uses is the annual Trafficking in Persons Report, which Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton will release in June. The report is a diagnostic tool, based on the minimum standards to combat trafficking as outlined in the TVPA. Countries are assessed, and sorted into clusters, or tiers. Based on in-country reporting from U.S. embassies, non-governmental organizations, and other partners, we work to provide a fair and transparent glimpse into the on-the-ground efforts against trafficking in persons through the "three P" paradigm - protection, prevention, and prosecution. The Report is not a rebuke or reprimand to our fellow nations across the globe, but a real assessment on how countries are progressing - and in some cases, not progressing - in the fight against modern slavery.

The Trafficking in Persons Report is a smart power tool that leads to greater bilateral and multilateral partnerships. It may lead to tough discussions, but the Report has incited action worldwide. More countries have implemented legislation, trained law enforcement, raised public awareness, implemented protective mechanisms for victims, and in the end, freed people from modern slavery. As the Secretary said last summer, we are encouraging countries to be full partners in tackling our shared global agenda; countries such as Brazil, China, India, Indonesia, Russia, and Turkey. We need such emerging leaders to be stronger partners in our global effort against human trafficking.

The diagnostic tool that is the annual report is not a rebuke; it is a roadmap for engagement and cooperation. And, for it to be that, the United States must return to the role it has carried throughout history: lead by example.

So this year, in addition to the 175 countries that are assessed in the Report, we will rank and analyze the United States based on the same minimum standards. This ranking is essential to our efforts to implement smart-power diplomacy. Because we know that human trafficking exists in the United States, from young runaway youths being coerced by pimps, to men, women, and children being forced to pick and harvest crops in the southeastern part of the country, to immigrants being held in domestic servitude. For a long time, we called our efforts against this the "Peonage Program." Then, to lessen confusion over debt, the effort was renamed as the "Involuntary Servitude and Slavery Program."

Whatever we may call our efforts, we have to take a "whole of government" approach to enforce this constitutional guarantee. Human trafficking is not an issue in which we can implement policies of "exceptionalism." We must not only enforce the 13th Amendment and meet our international obligations we must also assess our efforts as we would assess others.

Another important tool of self-assessment is the Quadrennial Diplomacy and Development Review (QDDR), which the State Department is undertaking for the first time.

This review, which is slated to be released this September, will provide the short-, medium-, and long-term blueprint for our diplomatic and development efforts. Our goal is to use this process to guide us to agile, responsive, and effective institutions of diplomacy and development, including how to transition from approaches no longer commensurate with current challenges. It will offer guidance on how we develop policies; how we allocate our resources; how we deploy our staff; and how we exercise our authorities. As traffickers continue to use even more modern technology and methods, the United States Government must be equipped and able to deal with the fluid nature of this shadowy crime.

In the coming weeks, we will be working with partners worldwide to ensure that the Palermo Protocol is implemented to the fullest against forms of labor trafficking.

Specifically, we will be working to ensure that there is a stronger global effort to punish forced labor offenders with criminal penalties, as called for in the international protocol. Debt has long been identified as part of traffickers' coercive power to enslave. Research around the world, including that funded by the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, shows that recruiters, labor brokers, and employers rely on debts - often sanctioned under law - tying migrants to a form of exploitation that these countries would otherwise ignore.

The United Nations' Development Programme (UNDP) Report in late 2009 gave a special focus to the high costs of labor migration and how this often leads to instances of forced labor. When migrants are coerced or deceived into assuming debts that are several times the per capita Gross Domestic Product (GDP) in their country of origin, they easily become modern slaves once abroad. This weekend, we saw media reports that the suicide rate among guestworkers in the Gulf States is off-the-charts. A better system for ensuring that guestworkers are not enslaved is clearly needed in labor markets from the Gulf region to Africa to Southeast Asia.

Most vulnerable among these indebted migrants are domestic workers. From Indonesian girls and women exploited in the Gulf to Malagasy women in Lebanon and Mexicans here in the United States, domestic workers are uniquely vulnerable. Usually working outside the protections of prevailing labor laws, and that sadly is the case in the United States today, and often socially isolated in their workplace, domestic workers may easily fall into modern slavery by an abusive employer. So too, we have seen cases where women who traveled to work as a maid or a waitress are enslaved in prostitution.

While we utilize the Trafficking in Persons Report to highlight these trends and jumpstart bilateral and multilateral action, the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons also funds international anti-trafficking efforts based on the Report's rankings. In essence, our work after the Report release does not end; it begins.

Based on the Report rankings, the Office funds anti-trafficking efforts around the world. This federal funding, which totals nearly $20 million in Fiscal Year 2010, is strategically placed in predominantly Tier Two Watch List and Tier Three countries.

We have funded law enforcement training efforts, prevention mechanisms such as public awareness campaigns, and shelters to protect victims from their captors. This year, the Office received more than 400 applications for anti-trafficking efforts. We regret that our budget constraints leave many worthy programs unfunded. We look forward to strengthening our partnerships through international programmatic efforts as well as cultivate new ones.

We are also working on relief and redevelopment efforts in Haiti. When instability shakes governments, communities, and societies as a whole, there is an increased likelihood of exploitation. Haiti was ranked as a special case in the past, which means that the government efforts could not be ranked due to on-the-ground circumstances and things have gotten worse since. Prior to the earthquake, my Office worked with key on-the-ground partners; and in its wake, we continue our work, especially with regards to the enslavement of restavek children.

Poor, mostly rural families send their children to cities to live with relatively wealthier "host" families, whom they expect will provide the children with food, shelter, and an education in exchange for domestic work. While some restaveks are cared for and sent to school, most of these children are subjected to involuntary domestic servitude. These restaveks, 65 percent of whom are girls between the ages of 6 and 14, work excessive hours, receive no schooling or payment and are often physically and sexually abused. Haitian labor laws require employers to pay domestic workers over the age of 15, so many host families dismiss restaveks before they reach that age. Dismissed and runaway restaveks make up a significant proportion of the large population of street children, who frequently are forced to work in prostitution or street crime by violent criminal gangs.

As the world looks to help Haiti build back better, the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons is utilizing strategic efforts on-the-ground to ensure that future generations of Haitians are allowed to live freely. Just a few weeks ago, one of our on-the-ground partners reported:

At the Ouanaminthe border crossing in the countryside of Northeast Haiti, teams have worked hard with very limited support and infrastructure to identify children at risk of being trafficked.

On March 10, our team of Child Protection Officers found a five year-old girl walking alone on the street. Despite efforts by our team to softly ask her questions, the young girl was too nervous to speak. She only responded that her name was BÈBÈ. Concerned for the young girl's safety, our Child Protection Officers got her to the closest interim care facility provided by Catholic Relief Services and announced a description of her on the local radio. Fortunately, not long after the call, her mother and father found her at the center. Our teams were ecstatic that they were able to reunify BÈBÈ with her family, and are very motivated to continue their work.

This is truly a success story for BÈBÈ and her family. There are still more men, women, and children in Haiti -- throughout the countryside and within the temporary camps -- at risk of trafficking and exploitation.

And yet, there are more success stories yet to be realized. We stand ready to work with the Government of Haiti to put the legal safeguards in place through a new anti-trafficking law, as well as new structures that are needed to guarantee that freedom.

The promise of freedom we seek to fulfill will be bolstered by what has now been coined as the fourth "p" - partnerships. We must strive toward better coordination with our interagency partners within our "whole of government" approach, but also partners from unlikely or untapped resources.

We are fortunate that non-governmental organizations have historically been strong partners in the anti-trafficking movement. Today, we are working as well to build on our historic relationships and cultivate new partnerships with the private sector, namely private business and corporations so that we can leverage the resources, expertise, and talents against trafficking.

Partnering with the private sector is essential to scrubbing modern slavery out of the supply chains that create our everyday products--food, clothes, and cell phones to name a few. It's also an unmistakable opportunity to go back to the victim-centered approach and partner with businesses across the United States to provide victims in-kind assistance through job-training and employment and to collaborate on stamping out trafficking from the demand side.

As you know, much of international human rights work has been about naming and shaming. But Secretary Clinton said it right when she said: "Calling for accountability doesn't start or stop, however, at naming offenders. Our goal is to encourage - even demand - that governments must also take responsibility by putting human rights into law and embedding them in the government institutions; by building strong independent courts; competent and disciplined law enforcement. And once rights are established, governments should be expected to resist the temptation to restrict freedom."

Freedom is the greatest human right. It cannot be guaranteed by naming and shaming alone, or by development programs, or better schools or the alleviation of poverty. At some point, the State has to guarantee this most basic of rights. Those who violate it must be punished; for those who lose it, it must be restored and protected. Those who restrict freedom are not just violating a human rights norm; they are committing a crime. As we turn from a movement in its infancy to one that has matured, we must all look to strategic and dynamic efforts to combat this modern form of slavery.

Because as much as we discuss the policies of protection or prevention or prosecution, our work is about people; we should dare to pledge that every single person around the world can succeed, in a life built on the pillars of freedom.

LOAD-DATE: May 13, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2010 Federal News Service, Inc.
All Rights Reserved

227 of 404 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

May 12, 2010 Wednesday

THE ROLE OF UNITED STATES IN COMBATING HUMAN TRAFFICKING

BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 2476 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. Department of State:

Luis CdeBaca

Ambassador-at-Large , Office To Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons

Center for American Progress

Washington, DC

May 12, 2010

As Prepared

Good morning and thank you Ken Gude for your kind introduction. I am delighted to be here today at the Center for American Progress. This institution is truly an academic hub whose top-rate thinkers provide cutting-edge ideas. We'll hear from some of those thinkers this morning: David Abramowitz of Humanity United, Holly Burkhalter of the International Justice Mission, Neha Misra of the Solidarity Center, and John Norris of Enough thank you for putting time and energy into today's conversation. I am also pleased to see so many key partners in the anti-trafficking movement here with us today.

Human trafficking is a human rights abuse; a byproduct of conflict; a threat to national security, public health and democracy; a labor and migration issue, and an ever-growing phenomenon. While this is a modern phenomenon, affecting communities across the globe, it is rooted in a very antiquated practice: involuntary servitude.

The United States role in combating trafficking is simple: we must deploy every tool at our disposal in a strategic and coordinated way. We must tackle every form of this crime whether it has been labeled peonage, involuntary servitude, sex trafficking, or debt bondage. We cannot focus on one form of trafficking over another if we truly want to end this crime. We must broaden our efforts to ensure that every man, woman, and child is able to pursue, and achieve, his or her God-given potential.

Translating the fight against this modern form of slavery into our 21st Century foreign policy priorities is essential, as it cross-cuts and impacts a myriad of policy concerns. It is a fluid phenomenon, responding to market demands, vulnerabilities in laws, weak penalties, natural disasters, and economic and environmental instability.

Traffickers thrive in the shadows and operate in zones of impunity. The global response must not only catch and punish the traffickers we find, but also destroy their safe havens by fighting for rule of law, security, and economic empowerment.

In the decade since the world embraced the global standards under the international trafficking in persons protocol and the Clinton Administration enacted the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA), the United States has pursued innovative approaches to combat this human rights abuse. There has been a lot of progress made against this crime; and, there is still much work to do 10 years is just a blip in the history of this modern abolitionist effort.

One of the key tools that the United States uses is the annual Trafficking in Persons Report, which Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton will release in June. The report is a diagnostic tool, based on the minimum standards to combat trafficking as outlined in the TVPA. Countries are assessed, and sorted into clusters, or tiers. Based on in-country reporting from U.S. embassies, non-governmental organizations, and other partners, we work to provide a fair and transparent glimpse into the on-the-ground efforts against trafficking in persons through the three P paradigm protection, prevention, and prosecution. The Report is not a rebuke or reprimand to our fellow nations across the globe, but a real assessment on how countries are progressing and in some cases, not progressing in the fight against modern slavery.

The Trafficking in Persons Report is a smart power tool that leads to greater bilateral and multilateral partnerships. It may lead to tough discussions, but the Report has incited action worldwide. More countries have implemented legislation, trained law enforcement, raised public awareness, implemented protective mechanisms for victims, and in the end, freed people from modern slavery. As the Secretary said last summer, we are encouraging countries to be full partners in tackling our shared global agenda; countries such as Brazil, China, India, Indonesia, Russia, and Turkey. We need such emerging leaders to be stronger partners in our global effort against human trafficking.

The diagnostic tool that is the annual report is not a rebuke; it is a roadmap for engagement and cooperation. And, for it to be that, the United States must return to the role it has carried throughout history: lead by example.

So this year, in addition to the 175 countries that are assessed in the Report, we will rank and analyze the United States based on the same minimum standards. This ranking is essential to our efforts to implement smart-power diplomacy. Because we know that human trafficking exists in the United States, from young runaway youths being coerced by pimps, to men, women, and children being forced to pick and harvest crops in the southeastern part of the country, to immigrants being held in domestic servitude. For a long time, we called our efforts against this the Peonage Program. Then, to lessen confusion over debt, the effort was renamed as the Involuntary Servitude and Slavery Program.

Whatever we may call our efforts, we have to take a whole of government approach to enforce this constitutional guarantee. Human trafficking is not an issue in which we can implement policies of exceptionalism. We must not only enforce the 13th Amendment and meet our international obligations we must also assess our efforts as we would assess others.

Another important tool of self-assessment is the Quadrennial Diplomacy and Development Review (QDDR), which the State Department is undertaking for the first time.

This review, which is slated to be released this September, will provide the short-, medium-, and long-term blueprint for our diplomatic and development efforts. Our goal is to use this process to guide us to agile, responsive, and effective institutions of diplomacy and development, including how to transition from approaches no longer commensurate with current challenges. It will offer guidance on how we develop policies; how we allocate our resources; how we deploy our staff; and how we exercise our authorities. As traffickers continue to use even more modern technology and methods, the United States Government must be equipped and able to deal with the fluid nature of this shadowy crime.

In the coming weeks, we will be working with partners worldwide to ensure that the Palermo Protocol is implemented to the fullest against forms of labor trafficking.

Specifically, we will be working to ensure that there is a stronger global effort to punish forced labor offenders with criminal penalties, as called for in the international protocol. Debt has long been identified as part of traffickers coercive power to enslave. Research around the world, including that funded by the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, shows that recruiters, labor brokers, and employers rely on debts often sanctioned under law tying migrants to a form of exploitation that these countries would otherwise ignore. The United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) Report in late 2009 gave a special focus to the high costs of labor migration and how this often leads to instances of forced labor. When migrants are coerced or deceived into assuming debts that are several times the per capita Gross Domestic Product (GDP) in their country of origin, they easily become modern slaves once abroad. This weekend, we saw media reports that the suicide rate among guestworkers in the Gulf States is off-the-charts. A better system for ensuring that guestworkers are not enslaved is clearly needed in labor markets from the Gulf region to Africa to Southeast Asia.

Most vulnerable among these indebted migrants are domestic workers. From Indonesian girls and women exploited in the Gulf to Malagasy women in Lebanon and Mexicans here in the United States, domestic workers are uniquely vulnerable. Usually working outside the protections of prevailing labor laws, and that sadly is the case in the United States today, and often socially isolated in their workplace, domestic workers may easily fall into modern slavery by an abusive employer. So too, we have seen cases where women who traveled to work as a maid or a waitress are enslaved in prostitution.

While we utilize the Trafficking in Persons Report to highlight these trends and jumpstart bilateral and multilateral action, the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons also funds international anti-trafficking efforts based on the Reports rankings. In essence, our work after the Report release does not end; it begins.

Based on the Report rankings, the Office funds anti-trafficking efforts around the world. This federal funding, which totals nearly $20 million in Fiscal Year 2010, is strategically placed in predominantly Tier Two Watch List and Tier Three countries.

We have funded law enforcement training efforts, prevention mechanisms such as public awareness campaigns, and shelters to protect victims from their captors. This year, the Office received more than 400 applications for anti-trafficking efforts. We regret that our budget constraints leave many worthy programs unfunded. We look forward to strengthening our partnerships through international programmatic efforts as well as cultivate new ones.

We are also working on relief and redevelopment efforts in Haiti. When instability shakes governments, communities, and societies as a whole, there is an increased likelihood of exploitation. Haiti was ranked as a special case in the past, which means that the government efforts could not be ranked due to on-the-ground circumstances and things have gotten worse since. Prior to the earthquake, my Office worked with key on-the-ground partners; and in its wake, we continue our work, especially with regards to the enslavement of restavek children.

Poor, mostly rural families send their children to cities to live with relatively wealthier host families, whom they expect will provide the children with food, shelter, and an education in exchange for domestic work. While some restaveks are cared for and sent to school, most of these children are subjected to involuntary domestic servitude. These restaveks, 65 percent of whom are girls between the ages of 6 and 14, work excessive hours, receive no schooling or payment and are often physically and sexually abused. Haitian labor laws require employers to pay domestic workers over the age of 15, so many host families dismiss restaveks before they reach that age. Dismissed and runaway restaveks make up a significant proportion of the large population of street children, who frequently are forced to work in prostitution or street crime by violent criminal gangs.

As the world looks to help Haiti build back better, the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons is utilizing strategic efforts on-the-ground to ensure that future generations of Haitians are allowed to live freely. Just a few weeks ago, one of our on-the-ground partners reported:

At the Ouanaminthe border crossing in the countryside of Northeast Haiti, teams have worked hard with very limited support and infrastructure to identify children at risk of being trafficked.

On March 10, our team of Child Protection Officers found a five year-old girl walking alone on the street. Despite efforts by our team to softly ask her questions, the young girl was too nervous to speak. She only responded that her name was Bb. Concerned for the young girl's safety, our Child Protection Officers got her to the closest interim care facility provided by Catholic Relief Services and announced a description of her on the local radio. Fortunately, not long after the call, her mother and father found her at the center. Our teams were ecstatic that they were able to reunify Bb with her family, and are very motivated to continue their work.

This is truly a success story for Bb and her family. There are still more men, women, and children in Haiti -- throughout the countryside and within the temporary camps -- at risk of trafficking and exploitation.

And yet, there are more success stories yet to be realized. We stand ready to work with the Government of Haiti to put the legal safeguards in place through a new anti-trafficking law, as well as new structures that are needed to guarantee that freedom.

The promise of freedom we seek to fulfill will be bolstered by what has now been coined as the fourth "p" partnerships. We must strive toward better coordination with our interagency partners within our "whole of government" approach, but also partners from unlikely or untapped resources.

We are fortunate that non-governmental organizations have historically been strong partners in the anti-trafficking movement. Today, we are working as well to build on our historic relationships and cultivate new partnerships with the private sector, namely private business and corporations so that we can leverage the resources, expertise, and talents against trafficking.

Partnering with the private sector is essential to scrubbing modern slavery out of the supply chains that create our everyday products--food, clothes, and cell phones to name a few. It's also an unmistakable opportunity to go back to the victim-centered approach and partner with businesses across the United States to provide victims in-kind assistance through job-training and employment and to collaborate on stamping out trafficking from the demand side.

As you know, much of international human rights work has been about naming and shaming. But Secretary Clinton said it right when she said: Calling for accountability doesn't start or stop, however, at naming offenders. Our goal is to encourage even demand that governments must also take responsibility by putting human rights into law and embedding them in the government institutions; by building strong independent courts; competent and disciplined law enforcement. And once rights are established, governments should be expected to resist the temptation to restrict freedom.

Freedom is the greatest human right. It cannot be guaranteed by naming and shaming alone, or by development programs, or better schools or the alleviation of poverty. At some point, the State has to guarantee this most basic of rights. Those who violate it must be punished; for those who lose it, it must be restored and protected. Those who restrict freedom are not just violating a human rights norm; they are committing a crime. As we turn from a movement in its infancy to one that has matured, we must all look to strategic and dynamic efforts to combat this modern form of slavery.

Because as much as we discuss the policies of protection or prevention or prosecution, our work is about people; we should dare to pledge that every single person around the world can succeed, in a life built on the pillars of freedom.

LOAD-DATE: May 12, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

228 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

May 12, 2010 Wednesday 2:13 AM EST

Luis CdeBaca Ambassador-at-Large, Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Person, Speaks on the Role of the United States in Combating Human Trafficking

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 2963 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons issued the text of the following speech by Ambassador Luis CdeBaca:

Thank you Ken. Good morning everyone. I'm delighted to be here at the Center for American Progress. I do have to put in a quick rebuttal on behalf of Holly, which is that both of us went to Iowa State for undergrad as well. This is definitely old-home week. I'm wondering if Neha and I went to high school together.

It's great to be here at CAP. This institution is truly an academic hub whose top-rate thinkers provide cutting-edge ideas. We're going to be hearing from some top-rate thinkers today: David, Holly, Neha, and John. I think that for me it's not just being able to be on a panel with them. It's also to be able to be here in the room and also online with so many of the folks who are making things work in the movement to fight slavery in the modern era.

We're talking about human trafficking today. It is, as Ken said, a human rights abuse. It's a byproduct of conflict. A threat to national security, public health and democracy. It's a labor; a migration issue.

We're told that it is a fast-growing phenomenon. While it certainly is a modern phenomenon that affects communities across the globe, this is rooted in a very antiquated practice -- involuntary servitude.

The United States' mandate in combating trafficking is a long one but it is a simple one: we must deploy every tool at our disposal in a strategic and coordinated fashion. We must tackle every form of this crime - whether it has been labeled peonage, involuntary servitude, sex trafficking, or debt bondage.

We cannot focus on one form of trafficking over another if we truly want to end this crime. And, we ought to broaden our efforts to ensure that every man, woman, and child is able to pursue, and achieve, his or her God-given potential.

Translating the fight against modern slavery into 21st Century foreign policy is essential. It cross-cuts and impacts so many policy concerns; it is a fluid phenomenon that responds to market demands, vulnerabilities in laws, weak penalties, natural disasters, economic and environmental instability.

What we're really talking about are the shadows: traffickers operate in the shadows and they take advantage of zones of impunity no matter why those zones exist. So, our global response must have to not just be to catch and punish those that we can find; we have to destroy their safe havens by fighting for rule of law, security, and economic empowerment.

It has been a decade since the world embraced the global standards of the UN Trafficking in Persons Protocol and Congress passed the Trafficking Victims Protection Act. We have seen innovative approaches: innovative approaches from the Clinton Administration, the Bush Administration, and the Obama Administration alike. This is clearly an issue that cuts across partisan lines. So I'm proud to build on the work of my predecessors, Nancy LaRafael, John Miller, and Mark Lagon, and I see that Mark is able to join us today.

There has been a lot of progress made, but there is a lot to do - 10 years is really just a blip in any movement much less in our modern abolitionist effort.

One of the key tools that the United States uses is the annual Trafficking in Persons Report, which Secretary of State Clinton will release in June. The report is a diagnostic tool. It's based on the minimum standards to combat trafficking that Congress articulated in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act - the TVPA. Countries are assessed, and sorted into clusters or Tiers as we call them.

Based on in-country reporting from our embassies, NGOs, and other partners, we strive for a fair and transparent glimpse into the on-the-ground efforts against trafficking in persons through the "three P" paradigm of Prosecution, Protection, and Prevention.

The Report is not a rebuke or reprimand to our fellow countries; it's a real assessment on how countries are doing - or frankly, sometimes not doing - in the fight against modern slavery. It's a smart power tool that leads to greater bilateral and multilateral partnerships. The Report might lead to tough discussions, but it has driven action worldwide.

Because of the Report, countries have implemented legislation, trained law enforcement, raised public awareness, implemented protective mechanisms for victims, and in the end, what's important: freed people from slavery.

As the Secretary said last summer, we are encouraging countries to be full partners in tackling our shared global agenda; countries such as Brazil, China, India, Indonesia, Russia, Turkey. We need such emerging leaders to be stronger partners in this effort, the effort against global trafficking.

So the report is not a rebuke; but a roadmap - a roadmap for engagement and cooperation. For it to be that, the United States has return to the role we have always carried throughout history: to lead by example.

So this year, in addition to the 175 other countries that are going to be assessed in the Report, we will rank and analyze the United States based on the same minimum standards that we do other countries. This is an essential move to implement smart-power diplomacy. IT's a vehicle for cooperation, a tool for principled engagement with our skeptics, a guidepost for shared development projects. It will not only help us at home, but leverage what we do, what we feel is a key source of American power - the power of example.

Because we know that human trafficking exists in the United States and it has from the beginning. Women and children being held by pimps; people being forced to harvest crops; immigrants held in domestic servitude. This is happening today, and it has happened for a very long time. For decades, we called our efforts against this the "Peonage Program." Then, to lessen confusion over whether a debt needed to be proven in court, the effort was renamed as the "Involuntary Servitude and Slavery Program." And, in the late 1990s, it was again recast, as "Human Trafficking." But whatever we may it, we have to take a "whole of government" approach to enforce this constitutional guarantee.

Human trafficking is not an issue in which we can implement policies of American "exceptionalism." We must not only enforce the 13th Amendment and meet our international obligations -- we also have to assess our efforts as we would assess others.

Now, another important tool of self-assessment is the Quadrennial Diplomacy and Development Review - the QDDR - which the State Department is undertaking for the first time. This review, which is slated to be released this September, will provide the short-, medium-, and long-term blueprints for our diplomatic and development efforts on all issues, not just trafficking.

Our goal is to use this process to guide us; to guide us to agile, responsive, and effective institutions of diplomacy and development, including the difficult one: how to transition from an approach no longer commensurate with current challenges. It will offer guidance on how we develop policies; how we allocate resources; how we deploy staff; and how we exercise our authorities.

As traffickers continue to use even more modern technology and methods, the U.S. Government has to be equipped and able to deal with the fluid nature of this shadowy crime. In the Palermo Protocol and the TVPA, we have the tools that we need.

In the coming weeks, we'll be working with partners such as the OSCE, the UN Human Rights Council, the OAS, and of course, the Office of Drugs and Crime at the UN to ensure that the Palermo Protocol is used to its fullest against all forms of trafficking.

While continuing to stress the need to liberate and compassionately restore victims of sex trafficking, we will work to ensure an intensified global effort to punish forced labor offenders with criminal penalties, not just administrative remedies, as is called for in the international protocol.

And to do that, we have to address debt bondage. Debt has long been identified as part of traffickers' coercive power to enslave. In late 2009, the United Nations' Development Programme, the UNDP, gave a special focus in their report on the high costs of labor migration and how this often leads to instances of forced labor.

When migrants are coerced or deceived into assuming debts that are several times the per capita GDP in their country, they easily become modern slaves once abroad. They travel with the slavery already attached.

Just this weekend, we saw media reports that the suicide rate among guestworkers in the Gulf States is off-the-charts. Just yesterday, an article came out about a Thai guestworker in the United States who ran away from his abuser but continues to be afraid. He risks losing everything at home from the recruiters who helped to traffic him and are still free.

Research around the world, including some funded by my office, shows that workers are often trapped in a web of deceit and debt bondage by unscrupulous recruiters, labor brokers, and employers. And too often, these debts are legal, or are dealt with only as administrative violations.

A better system for ensuring that guestworkers are not enslaved is clearly needed in labor markets around the world - in the Gulf region, in Africa, in Southeast Asia - and here in the United States as well.

Perhaps most vulnerable among that group are the domestic workers. From Indonesian girls and women exploited in the Gulf to Malagasy women in Lebanon, to African children here in the United States, domestic workers are uniquely vulnerable.

Usually working outside the protections of prevailing labor laws - and sadly, that's the case in the United States today - and socially isolated in their workplace, domestic workers too easily fall into modern slavery.

So too, we have seen reports of cases where women who traveled to work as a maid or a waitress have been enslaved as prostitutes, not simply forced to work behind closed doors. We need to break that zone of impunity, to get behind those closed doors, to confront and eliminate the conditions in which domestic servants are so often abused.

While we use the Trafficking in Persons Report to highlight these trends and jumpstart multilateral and bilateral action, our office also supports anti-slavery programs around the world, and I'm going to tell you a little bit about those.

In essence, our work after the Report release does not end; it just starts. Based on the Report rankings, we fund about 20 million dollars in programs around the world, strategically placed, largely in countries that are largely on Tier Two Watch List and Tier Three - the lowest rankings in our Report. We fund law enforcement training efforts, prevention - things such as public awareness campaigns, and shelters to protect the victims from their captors.

This year, we received more than 400 applicants for anti-trafficking efforts; almost a half of billion dollars worth of requests and sadly, we are only going to fund about $20 million worth. Budget constraints are leaving many worthy programs unfunded around the world. We look forward to strengthening our partnerships through these programs, and responding to the needs of victims in real time.

Speaking of responding in real time. I would be remiss if I didn't address Haiti. Our work on relief and redevelopment in Haiti necessarily includes human trafficking and slavery issues. When instability shakes governments, communities, and societies as a whole, there is an increased likelihood of exploitation.

Especially in Haiti. Haiti was ranked as a special case in past Reports. This means that the government efforts could not be ranked because of the on-the-ground circumstances. And things have gotten worse since the earthquake. Before the earthquake, we were working with local partners; and in its wake, we continued to work, especially with regards to the enslavement of children or the restaveks.

Under the restavek system, poor, mostly rural families send their children to cities to live with wealthier families whom they think will provide the children with food, shelter and an education, in exchange for a little bit of domestic help.

While some restaveks are cared for and sent to school, most of them are subjected to involuntary domestic servitude. Sixty-five percent of the victims are girls between the ages of six and fourteen. They work excessive hours, receive no schooling or payment and are often physically and sexually abused. Haitian labor laws require employers to pay domestic workers over the age of 15, so not surprisingly, many host families dismiss the restaveks just before that kicks in.

As a result, dismissed and runaway restaveks make up a significant proportion of the large population of street children in Haiti. They are easy prey for gangs who trap them in prostitution or petty crime.

As the world looks to help Haiti build back better, we're undertaking strategic efforts to ensure that future generations of Haitians are allowed to live freely. Just a few weeks ago, one of our NGO partners who we rushed money to in the wake of the earthquake reported this, and I'll quote an email that they sent:

"At the Ouanaminthe border crossing in the countryside of Northeast Haiti, our teams have worked hard with very limited support and infrastructure to identify children at risk of being trafficked.

"On March 10, our team of Child Protection Officers found a five year-old girl walking alone on the street. Despite efforts by our team to softly ask her questions, she was too nervous to speak. She only responded that her name was Bebe. Concerned for the young girl's safety, our Child Protection Officers got her to the closest interim care facility provided by Catholic Relief Services, and announced a description of her on the local radio. Fortunately, not long after the call, her mother and father found her at the center. Our teams were ecstatic that they were able to reunify Bebe with her family, and are very motivated to continue their work."

This is truly a success story: an unaccompanied child, reunited with her family, not taken by traffickers. But there are still so many Haitians, of all ages throughout the countryside and within the temporary camps who continue to be at risk of trafficking and exploitation.

There are more success stories yet to be realized and we stand ready to support our NGO partners, to work with the Government of Haiti as it puts forth legal safeguards in place through a new anti-trafficking law in Parliament, and enacting new structures that are needed to guarantee its citizens' rights. We stand with them because partnerships are how we can achieve this goal. We cannot do this alone.

The promise of freedom that we seek to fulfill will be bolstered by what has been termed now as the Fourth "P" in our paradigm - of partnerships. We have to strive toward better coordination. Coordination through "whole of government" approach, but also with partners from unlikely or untapped sources. We are fortunate that non-governmental organizations have historically been strong partners in the anti-trafficking movement. Today, we are also working to build on our historic relationships by cultivating new partnerships with the private sector.

We'll work with private business and corporations to leverage their resources, expertise, and talents against trafficking. Partnering with the private sector is essential to reduce the demand for commercial sex and cheap labor that traffickers rush to meet through violence. It means scrubbing modern slavery out of the supply chains that create our every-day products--food, clothes, and cell phones to name a few.

It's also an opportunity to go back to the victim-centered approach in a new way. Why not partner with businesses across the United States and around the world to provide victims the best kind of rehabilitation: jobs.

As you know, much of international human rights work of the past decades has been largely about identifying a problem, naming, and shaming." But as Secretary Clinton recently said:

"Calling for accountability doesn't start or stop, however, at naming offenders. Our goal is to encourage - even demand - that governments must also take responsibility by putting human rights into law and embedding them in the government institutions; by building strong independent courts; competent and disciplined law enforcement. And once rights are established, governments should be expected to resist the temptation to restrict freedom."

Freedom. It's the greatest human right; slavery is its antithesis. In speeches and proclamations, President Obama has called for us to fight for democracy, freedom, and opportunity by taking on modern slavery.

Because freedom alone does not deliver itself. Freedom cannot be guaranteed by naming and shaming, or by development programs, or better schools or the alleviation of poverty although all of these are necessary. At some point, the State has to guarantee this most basic of rights.

Those who violate it must be punished; for those who lose it, it must be restored and protected. Because those who restrict freedom aren't just violating a norm, they're committing a crime.

As we turn from a movement in its infancy to one that has matured, we have to look to strategic and dynamic effects, how can we combat this modern form of slavery?

As much as we discuss the policies of protection or prevention or prosecution, for the concepts of freedom or democracy, this work is about people. It is for them that we have to be hopeful, audacious, and urgent. It is for them that we should together dare to pledge that every single person alive today can succeed - will succeed - in a world without slavery.

Thank you.

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS hc11-JF78-100513-2801287 StaffFurigay

LOAD-DATE: May 13, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 Targeted News Service LLC
All Rights Reserved

229 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

May 12, 2010 Wednesday 2:13 AM EST

Luis CdeBaca Ambassador-at-Large, Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Person, Speaks on the Role of the United States in Combating Human Trafficking

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 2963 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons issued the text of the following speech by Ambassador Luis CdeBaca:

Thank you Ken. Good morning everyone. I'm delighted to be here at the Center for American Progress. I do have to put in a quick rebuttal on behalf of Holly, which is that both of us went to Iowa State for undergrad as well. This is definitely old-home week. I'm wondering if Neha and I went to high school together.

It's great to be here at CAP. This institution is truly an academic hub whose top-rate thinkers provide cutting-edge ideas. We're going to be hearing from some top-rate thinkers today: David, Holly, Neha, and John. I think that for me it's not just being able to be on a panel with them. It's also to be able to be here in the room and also online with so many of the folks who are making things work in the movement to fight slavery in the modern era.

We're talking about human trafficking today. It is, as Ken said, a human rights abuse. It's a byproduct of conflict. A threat to national security, public health and democracy. It's a labor; a migration issue.

We're told that it is a fast-growing phenomenon. While it certainly is a modern phenomenon that affects communities across the globe, this is rooted in a very antiquated practice -- involuntary servitude.

The United States' mandate in combating trafficking is a long one but it is a simple one: we must deploy every tool at our disposal in a strategic and coordinated fashion. We must tackle every form of this crime - whether it has been labeled peonage, involuntary servitude, sex trafficking, or debt bondage.

We cannot focus on one form of trafficking over another if we truly want to end this crime. And, we ought to broaden our efforts to ensure that every man, woman, and child is able to pursue, and achieve, his or her God-given potential.

Translating the fight against modern slavery into 21st Century foreign policy is essential. It cross-cuts and impacts so many policy concerns; it is a fluid phenomenon that responds to market demands, vulnerabilities in laws, weak penalties, natural disasters, economic and environmental instability.

What we're really talking about are the shadows: traffickers operate in the shadows and they take advantage of zones of impunity no matter why those zones exist. So, our global response must have to not just be to catch and punish those that we can find; we have to destroy their safe havens by fighting for rule of law, security, and economic empowerment.

It has been a decade since the world embraced the global standards of the UN Trafficking in Persons Protocol and Congress passed the Trafficking Victims Protection Act. We have seen innovative approaches: innovative approaches from the Clinton Administration, the Bush Administration, and the Obama Administration alike. This is clearly an issue that cuts across partisan lines. So I'm proud to build on the work of my predecessors, Nancy LaRafael, John Miller, and Mark Lagon, and I see that Mark is able to join us today.

There has been a lot of progress made, but there is a lot to do - 10 years is really just a blip in any movement much less in our modern abolitionist effort.

One of the key tools that the United States uses is the annual Trafficking in Persons Report, which Secretary of State Clinton will release in June. The report is a diagnostic tool. It's based on the minimum standards to combat trafficking that Congress articulated in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act - the TVPA. Countries are assessed, and sorted into clusters or Tiers as we call them.

Based on in-country reporting from our embassies, NGOs, and other partners, we strive for a fair and transparent glimpse into the on-the-ground efforts against trafficking in persons through the "three P" paradigm of Prosecution, Protection, and Prevention.

The Report is not a rebuke or reprimand to our fellow countries; it's a real assessment on how countries are doing - or frankly, sometimes not doing - in the fight against modern slavery. It's a smart power tool that leads to greater bilateral and multilateral partnerships. The Report might lead to tough discussions, but it has driven action worldwide.

Because of the Report, countries have implemented legislation, trained law enforcement, raised public awareness, implemented protective mechanisms for victims, and in the end, what's important: freed people from slavery.

As the Secretary said last summer, we are encouraging countries to be full partners in tackling our shared global agenda; countries such as Brazil, China, India, Indonesia, Russia, Turkey. We need such emerging leaders to be stronger partners in this effort, the effort against global trafficking.

So the report is not a rebuke; but a roadmap - a roadmap for engagement and cooperation. For it to be that, the United States has return to the role we have always carried throughout history: to lead by example.

So this year, in addition to the 175 other countries that are going to be assessed in the Report, we will rank and analyze the United States based on the same minimum standards that we do other countries. This is an essential move to implement smart-power diplomacy. IT's a vehicle for cooperation, a tool for principled engagement with our skeptics, a guidepost for shared development projects. It will not only help us at home, but leverage what we do, what we feel is a key source of American power - the power of example.

Because we know that human trafficking exists in the United States and it has from the beginning. Women and children being held by pimps; people being forced to harvest crops; immigrants held in domestic servitude. This is happening today, and it has happened for a very long time. For decades, we called our efforts against this the "Peonage Program." Then, to lessen confusion over whether a debt needed to be proven in court, the effort was renamed as the "Involuntary Servitude and Slavery Program." And, in the late 1990s, it was again recast, as "Human Trafficking." But whatever we may it, we have to take a "whole of government" approach to enforce this constitutional guarantee.

Human trafficking is not an issue in which we can implement policies of American "exceptionalism." We must not only enforce the 13th Amendment and meet our international obligations -- we also have to assess our efforts as we would assess others.

Now, another important tool of self-assessment is the Quadrennial Diplomacy and Development Review - the QDDR - which the State Department is undertaking for the first time. This review, which is slated to be released this September, will provide the short-, medium-, and long-term blueprints for our diplomatic and development efforts on all issues, not just trafficking.

Our goal is to use this process to guide us; to guide us to agile, responsive, and effective institutions of diplomacy and development, including the difficult one: how to transition from an approach no longer commensurate with current challenges. It will offer guidance on how we develop policies; how we allocate resources; how we deploy staff; and how we exercise our authorities.

As traffickers continue to use even more modern technology and methods, the U.S. Government has to be equipped and able to deal with the fluid nature of this shadowy crime. In the Palermo Protocol and the TVPA, we have the tools that we need.

In the coming weeks, we'll be working with partners such as the OSCE, the UN Human Rights Council, the OAS, and of course, the Office of Drugs and Crime at the UN to ensure that the Palermo Protocol is used to its fullest against all forms of trafficking.

While continuing to stress the need to liberate and compassionately restore victims of sex trafficking, we will work to ensure an intensified global effort to punish forced labor offenders with criminal penalties, not just administrative remedies, as is called for in the international protocol.

And to do that, we have to address debt bondage. Debt has long been identified as part of traffickers' coercive power to enslave. In late 2009, the United Nations' Development Programme, the UNDP, gave a special focus in their report on the high costs of labor migration and how this often leads to instances of forced labor.

When migrants are coerced or deceived into assuming debts that are several times the per capita GDP in their country, they easily become modern slaves once abroad. They travel with the slavery already attached.

Just this weekend, we saw media reports that the suicide rate among guestworkers in the Gulf States is off-the-charts. Just yesterday, an article came out about a Thai guestworker in the United States who ran away from his abuser but continues to be afraid. He risks losing everything at home from the recruiters who helped to traffic him and are still free.

Research around the world, including some funded by my office, shows that workers are often trapped in a web of deceit and debt bondage by unscrupulous recruiters, labor brokers, and employers. And too often, these debts are legal, or are dealt with only as administrative violations.

A better system for ensuring that guestworkers are not enslaved is clearly needed in labor markets around the world - in the Gulf region, in Africa, in Southeast Asia - and here in the United States as well.

Perhaps most vulnerable among that group are the domestic workers. From Indonesian girls and women exploited in the Gulf to Malagasy women in Lebanon, to African children here in the United States, domestic workers are uniquely vulnerable.

Usually working outside the protections of prevailing labor laws - and sadly, that's the case in the United States today - and socially isolated in their workplace, domestic workers too easily fall into modern slavery.

So too, we have seen reports of cases where women who traveled to work as a maid or a waitress have been enslaved as prostitutes, not simply forced to work behind closed doors. We need to break that zone of impunity, to get behind those closed doors, to confront and eliminate the conditions in which domestic servants are so often abused.

While we use the Trafficking in Persons Report to highlight these trends and jumpstart multilateral and bilateral action, our office also supports anti-slavery programs around the world, and I'm going to tell you a little bit about those.

In essence, our work after the Report release does not end; it just starts. Based on the Report rankings, we fund about 20 million dollars in programs around the world, strategically placed, largely in countries that are largely on Tier Two Watch List and Tier Three - the lowest rankings in our Report. We fund law enforcement training efforts, prevention - things such as public awareness campaigns, and shelters to protect the victims from their captors.

This year, we received more than 400 applicants for anti-trafficking efforts; almost a half of billion dollars worth of requests and sadly, we are only going to fund about $20 million worth. Budget constraints are leaving many worthy programs unfunded around the world. We look forward to strengthening our partnerships through these programs, and responding to the needs of victims in real time.

Speaking of responding in real time. I would be remiss if I didn't address Haiti. Our work on relief and redevelopment in Haiti necessarily includes human trafficking and slavery issues. When instability shakes governments, communities, and societies as a whole, there is an increased likelihood of exploitation.

Especially in Haiti. Haiti was ranked as a special case in past Reports. This means that the government efforts could not be ranked because of the on-the-ground circumstances. And things have gotten worse since the earthquake. Before the earthquake, we were working with local partners; and in its wake, we continued to work, especially with regards to the enslavement of children or the restaveks.

Under the restavek system, poor, mostly rural families send their children to cities to live with wealthier families whom they think will provide the children with food, shelter and an education, in exchange for a little bit of domestic help.

While some restaveks are cared for and sent to school, most of them are subjected to involuntary domestic servitude. Sixty-five percent of the victims are girls between the ages of six and fourteen. They work excessive hours, receive no schooling or payment and are often physically and sexually abused. Haitian labor laws require employers to pay domestic workers over the age of 15, so not surprisingly, many host families dismiss the restaveks just before that kicks in.

As a result, dismissed and runaway restaveks make up a significant proportion of the large population of street children in Haiti. They are easy prey for gangs who trap them in prostitution or petty crime.

As the world looks to help Haiti build back better, we're undertaking strategic efforts to ensure that future generations of Haitians are allowed to live freely. Just a few weeks ago, one of our NGO partners who we rushed money to in the wake of the earthquake reported this, and I'll quote an email that they sent:

"At the Ouanaminthe border crossing in the countryside of Northeast Haiti, our teams have worked hard with very limited support and infrastructure to identify children at risk of being trafficked.

"On March 10, our team of Child Protection Officers found a five year-old girl walking alone on the street. Despite efforts by our team to softly ask her questions, she was too nervous to speak. She only responded that her name was Bebe. Concerned for the young girl's safety, our Child Protection Officers got her to the closest interim care facility provided by Catholic Relief Services, and announced a description of her on the local radio. Fortunately, not long after the call, her mother and father found her at the center. Our teams were ecstatic that they were able to reunify Bebe with her family, and are very motivated to continue their work."

This is truly a success story: an unaccompanied child, reunited with her family, not taken by traffickers. But there are still so many Haitians, of all ages throughout the countryside and within the temporary camps who continue to be at risk of trafficking and exploitation.

There are more success stories yet to be realized and we stand ready to support our NGO partners, to work with the Government of Haiti as it puts forth legal safeguards in place through a new anti-trafficking law in Parliament, and enacting new structures that are needed to guarantee its citizens' rights. We stand with them because partnerships are how we can achieve this goal. We cannot do this alone.

The promise of freedom that we seek to fulfill will be bolstered by what has been termed now as the Fourth "P" in our paradigm - of partnerships. We have to strive toward better coordination. Coordination through "whole of government" approach, but also with partners from unlikely or untapped sources. We are fortunate that non-governmental organizations have historically been strong partners in the anti-trafficking movement. Today, we are also working to build on our historic relationships by cultivating new partnerships with the private sector.

We'll work with private business and corporations to leverage their resources, expertise, and talents against trafficking. Partnering with the private sector is essential to reduce the demand for commercial sex and cheap labor that traffickers rush to meet through violence. It means scrubbing modern slavery out of the supply chains that create our every-day products--food, clothes, and cell phones to name a few.

It's also an opportunity to go back to the victim-centered approach in a new way. Why not partner with businesses across the United States and around the world to provide victims the best kind of rehabilitation: jobs.

As you know, much of international human rights work of the past decades has been largely about identifying a problem, naming, and shaming." But as Secretary Clinton recently said:

"Calling for accountability doesn't start or stop, however, at naming offenders. Our goal is to encourage - even demand - that governments must also take responsibility by putting human rights into law and embedding them in the government institutions; by building strong independent courts; competent and disciplined law enforcement. And once rights are established, governments should be expected to resist the temptation to restrict freedom."

Freedom. It's the greatest human right; slavery is its antithesis. In speeches and proclamations, President Obama has called for us to fight for democracy, freedom, and opportunity by taking on modern slavery.

Because freedom alone does not deliver itself. Freedom cannot be guaranteed by naming and shaming, or by development programs, or better schools or the alleviation of poverty although all of these are necessary. At some point, the State has to guarantee this most basic of rights.

Those who violate it must be punished; for those who lose it, it must be restored and protected. Because those who restrict freedom aren't just violating a norm, they're committing a crime.

As we turn from a movement in its infancy to one that has matured, we have to look to strategic and dynamic effects, how can we combat this modern form of slavery?

As much as we discuss the policies of protection or prevention or prosecution, for the concepts of freedom or democracy, this work is about people. It is for them that we have to be hopeful, audacious, and urgent. It is for them that we should together dare to pledge that every single person alive today can succeed - will succeed - in a world without slavery.

Thank you.

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS hc11-JF78-100513-2801287 StaffFurigay

LOAD-DATE: May 13, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 Targeted News Service LLC
All Rights Reserved

230 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Daily News (Sri Lanka)

April 27, 2010 Tuesday

More teeth to combat human trafficking

LENGTH: 306 wordsDATELINE: Sri Lanka

Sri Lanka, April 27 -- *Task Force to begin operation in few months

*Border protection unit at BIA, harbours

A Task Force (encompassing several key Government and non-Governmental stakeholders) and a border protection unit will be setup at ports of entry to combat human trafficking.

The proposed Task Force may come into operation within the next couple of months in collaboration with the Justice Ministry, Immigration and Emigration Department, Law Enforcement Authorities, Sri Lanka Bureau of Foreign Employment, Child Protection Authority and the International Organization for Migration, Immigration Department sources said. Authorities are contemplating on setting up border protection units at the Bandaranaike International Airport and harbours to identify potential victims of trafficking, both in coming and out bound.

More muscle to the existing laws and the introduction of new ones too are sought.

According to the same sources, meetings on the formation of the Task Force had taken place and a final decision is to be taken shortly.

Meanwhile, the first ever case referred to a Sri Lankan Court of Law, involving a human trafficking charge, was taken up before the Colombo High Court yesterday. The Government prohibits all forms of trafficking through an April 2006 amendment to its Penal Code.

Trafficking offenders could face up to 20 years imprisonment. The punishments are commensurate with those assigned for other grave crimes. The latest efforts come as the US annual report on human trafficking which categorizes countries into three different tiers according to their identified vulnerable levels, has included Sri Lanka in the tier two watch list. Published by HT Syndication with permission from Daily News Sri Lanka. For more information on news feed please contact Sarabjit Jagirdar at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: April 27, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

231 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

April 27, 2010 Tuesday 10:33 PM EST

Special Measures to Combat Human Trafficking

BYLINE: Targeted News ServiceLENGTH: 244 wordsDATELINE: COLOMBO, Sri Lanka

The government of Sri Lanka issued the following news release:

A Task Force comprising several key Government and non-Governmental stakeholders and a border protection unit will be setup at ports of entry to combat human trafficking.

The proposed Task Force may come into operation within the next couple of months in collaboration with the Justice Ministry, Immigration and Emigration Department, Law Enforcement Authorities, Sri Lanka Bureau of Foreign Employment, Child Protection Authority and the International Organization for Migration, Immigration Department. Authorities are contemplating on setting up border protection units at the Bandaranaike International Airport and harbours to identify potential victims of trafficking, both in coming and out bound.

Meanwhile, the first ever case referred to a Sri Lankan Court of Law, involving a human trafficking charge, was taken up before the Colombo High Court yesterday. The Government prohibits all forms of trafficking through an April 2006 amendment to its Penal Code.

Trafficking offenders could face up to 20 years imprisonment. The punishments are commensurate with those assigned for other grave crimes. The latest efforts come as the US annual report on human trafficking which categorizes countries into three different tiers according to their identified vulnerable levels, has included Sri Lanka in the tier two watch list.

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS C-Santpan-mt93 100428-2768732 61MarlizTagarum

LOAD-DATE: April 28, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 Targeted News Service LLC
All Rights Reserved

Cyprus Mail

Internet Edition

Cyprus Mail

April 25, 2010 Sunday

Two-year action plan to combat flesh trade

LENGTH: 256 words

Author:
Sebastian Heller

CYPRUS HAS come up with an action plan to combat human trafficking more effectively over the next two years.

The plan's details were presented yesterday at an awareness-raising event at the Presidential Palace.

"This is significant, as no previous action plan had a timescale with specific objectives and so under them nothing was done," said Doros Polycarpou, director of migrant support group KISA.

Cyprus has dedicated several years to improving its previously embarrassing record on human trafficking and harmonising with international laws.

"The significant steps in the last two years have been recognised internationally, removing Cyprus from the blacklist [where it had been] designated as not taking sufficient measures to combat the phenomenon of human trafficking," said Interior Minister Neoclis Sylikiotis.

The problem has crept back into the spotlight over the past few years with stories of children being trafficked and instances of trafficking for organ transplants coming to light.

Polycarpou believes there is a false perception among Cypriots that human trafficking only relates to prostitution.

The illegality lies in bringing people to the island to work under false pretences and then keeping them here under conditions of dependency.

Nowadays, said Polycarpou, it is in the labour market that human trafficking in Cyprus presents the most intractable programme.

"Our legal structure has attributes which not only encourages this form of trafficking but also protects those who engage in it," he said.

LOAD-DATE: April 25, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: 70

Syndigate.info, Al Bawaba.com

233 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Right Vision News

April 4, 2010 Sunday

Pakistan: US interim report shows progress in combating trafficking in persons in Pak

LENGTH: 542 words

DATELINE: ISLAMABAD

ISLAMABAD, April 04 -- US Department of State released the 2010 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Interim Assessment report for Pakistan, citing improvements at both the national and provincial levels in combating trafficking in persons.

According to our correspondent, interim reports evaluate progress made in combating trafficking in persons by those countries placed on the Special Watch List in September 2009.

Pakistan Interim Assessment Report says Government of Pakistan has made some progress in combating trafficking in persons since the release of the 2009 TIP Report, with improvements evident at both the national and provincial levels.

While the Government of Pakistan has not reported any prosecutions or convictions of labor trafficking offenders, or any investigations, prosecutions, or convictions of government officials complicit in human trafficking, it has reported many investigations of labor and sex trafficking offenses. The reporting of law enforcement data on bonded labor and forced child labor, a provincial police purview, has been difficult because of the high level of extremist violence and other criminal activity affecting Pakistan.

The Federal Investigation Agency (FIA) disseminated the 2009 TIP Report's findings and recommendations among federal and provincial labor, education, and health ministries, provincial chief secretaries, and provincial inspectors general of police, and requested data on anti-trafficking efforts from these government entities. As of October 2009 law enforcement officers in four districts of the Sindh Province had rescued approximately 650 laborers from bondage and placed some in state-owned housing. The federal government formed a Legal Review Committee and held nation-wide multi-stakeholder consultations to draft a legislative amendment to strengthen the 1992 Bonded Labour Abolition Act.

Pakistan has expanded victim protection services and prevention efforts. The government provided medical and psychological services to Pakistani trafficking victims in Oman through its FIA Oman offices. The federal government, as part of its National Plan of Action for Abolition of Bonded Labor and Rehabilitation of Freed Bonded Laborers, continued to provide legal aid to bonded laborers in the North West Frontier Province and Punjab and expanded services to include Balochistan and Sindh provinces, establishing provincial capital bases and district offices. This legal aid program has had an average annual expenditure of $21,000 since its launch in 2005. The Punjab provincial government continued implementation of its $1.4 million project (launched at the end of 2008) aimed at eliminating bonded labor in brick kilns. This project to date helped nearly 6,000 bonded laborers obtain national identity cards and has provided $140,000 in no-interest loans to help free laborers from debt.

The Sindh provincial government has continued to implement its $116,000 project (launched at the end of 2005) which provided state-owned land for housing camps and constructed 75 low-cost housing units for freed bonded laborer families. Published by HT Syndication with permission from Right Vision News. For more information on news feed please contact Sarbjit Jagirdar at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: April 3, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 Right Vision News
All Rights Reserved

234 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Balochistan Times (AsiaNet)

April 2, 2010 Friday

US interim report shows progress in combating trafficking in persons in Pak

SECTION: Vol. XXXIV No. 91

LENGTH: 515 words

US Department of State released the 2010 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Interim Assessment report for Pakistan, citing improvements at both the national and provincial levels in combating trafficking in persons. According to US Embassy Spokesman, interim reports evaluate progress made in combating trafficking in persons by those countries placed on the Special Watch List in September 2009.

Pakistan Interim Assessment Report says Government of Pakistan has made some progress in combating trafficking in persons since the release of the 2009 TIP Report, with improvements evident at both the national and provincial levels. While the Government of Pakistan has not reported any prosecutions or convictions of labour trafficking offenders, or any investigations, prosecutions, or convictions of government officials complicit in human trafficking, it has reported many investigations of labour and sex trafficking offenses. The reporting of law enforcement data on bonded labour and forced child labour, a provincial police purview, has been difficult because of the high level of extremist violence and other criminal activity affecting Pakistan.

The Federal Investigation Agency (FIA) disseminated the 2009 TIP Report's findings and recommendations among federal and provincial labour, education, and health ministries, provincial chief secretaries, and provincial inspectors general of police, and requested data on anti-trafficking efforts from these government entities. As of October 2009 law enforcement officers in four districts of the Sindh Province had rescued approximately 650 labourers from bondage and placed some in state-owned housing. The federal government formed a Legal Review Committee and held nation-wide multi-stakeholder consultations to draft a legislative amendment to strengthen the 1992 Bonded Labour Abolition Act.

Pakistan has expanded victim protection services and prevention efforts. The government provided medical and psychological services to Pakistani trafficking victims in Oman through its FIA Oman offices. The federal government, as part of its National Plan of Action for Abolition of Bonded Labour and Rehabilitation of Freed Bonded Labourers, continued to provide legal aid to bonded labourers in the North West Frontier Province and Punjab and expanded services to include Balochistan and Sindh provinces, establishing provincial capital bases and district offices. This legal aid program has had an average annual expenditure of $21,000 since its launch in 2005. The Punjab provincial government continued implementation of its $1.4 million project (launched at the end of 2008) aimed at eliminating bonded labour in brick kilns. This project to date helped nearly 6,000 bonded labourers obtain national identity cards and has provided $140,000 in no-interest loans to help free labourers from debt.

The Sindh provincial government has continued to implement its $116,000 project (launched at the end of 2005) which provided state-owned land for housing camps and constructed 75 low-cost housing units for freed bonded labourer families.

LOAD-DATE: November 16, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

All Rights Reserved

235 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Frontier Star

April 2, 2010 Friday

US interim report shows progress in combating trafficking in persons in Pak

SECTION: Vol. XV No. 91

LENGTH: 514 words

US Department of State released the 2010 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Interim Assessment report for Pakistan, citing improvements at both the national and provincial levels in combating trafficking in persons.

According to US Embassy Spokesman, interim reports evaluate progress made in combating trafficking in persons by those countries placed on the Special Watch List in September 2009.

Pakistan Interim Assessment Report says Government of Pakistan has made some progress in combating trafficking in persons since the release of the 2009 TIP Report, with improvements evident at both the national and provincial levels.

While the Government of Pakistan has not reported any prosecutions or convictions of labour trafficking offenders, or any investigations, prosecutions, or convictions of government officials complicit in human trafficking, it has reported many investigations of labour and sex trafficking offenses. The reporting of law enforcement data on bonded labour and forced child labour, a provincial police purview, has been difficult because of the high level of extremist violence and other criminal activity affecting Pakistan.

The Federal Investigation Agency (FIA) disseminated the 2009 TIP Report's findings and recommendations among federal and provincial labour, education, and health ministries, provincial chief secretaries, and provincial inspectors general of police, and requested data on anti-trafficking efforts from these government entities. As of October 2009 law enforcement officers in four districts of the Sindh Province had rescued approximately 650 labourers from bondage and placed some in state-owned housing. The federal government formed a Legal Review Committee and held nation-wide multi-stakeholder consultations to draft a legislative amendment to strengthen the 1992 Bonded Labour Abolition Act.

Pakistan has expanded victim protection services and prevention efforts. The government provided medical and psychological services to Pakistani trafficking victims in Oman through its FIA Oman offices. The federal government, as part of its National Plan of Action for Abolition of Bonded Labour and Rehabilitation of Freed Bonded Labourers, continued to provide legal aid to bonded labourers in the North West Frontier Province and Punjab and expanded services to include Balochistan and Sindh provinces, establishing provincial capital bases and district offices. This legal aid program has had an average annual expenditure of $21,000 since its launch in 2005. The Punjab provincial government continued implementation of its $1.4 million project (launched at the end of 2008) aimed at eliminating bonded labour in brick kilns. This project to date helped nearly 6,000 bonded labourers obtain national identity cards and has provided $140,000 in no-interest loans to help free labourers from debt.

The Sindh provincial government has continued to implement its $116,000 project (launched at the end of 2005) which provided state-owned land for housing camps and constructed 75 low-cost housing units for freed bonded labourer families.

LOAD-DATE: November 16, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 The Frontier Star
All Rights Reserved

236 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

March 29, 2010 Monday

South Africa; Human Trafficking Not Our Highest Priority

BYLINE: Business Day (Johannesburg)

LENGTH: 777 words

THE preparation of legislation and a policy framework to combat human trafficking show the difficulties of developing countries in meeting their obligations to multilateral institutions such as the United Nations (UN).

SA has taken the first step towards developing a policy on combating the trafficking of persons, but it does so in the dark because it lacks information about the scale of the problem.

SA is a signatory to the UN Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, which imposes obligations on signatory countries to provide support to the victims of human trafficking. Pretoria has also been pressed by the US state department to implement measures to combat human trafficking. The US placed SA on its tier 2 watch list for the years 2005 to 2008 because it failed to comply fully with the minimum international standards for eliminating human trafficking.

In addition, nongovernmental organisations have been blowing their vuvuzelas in recent months, warning that the World Cup this year will provide cover for crime syndicates involved in human trafficking.

The dilemma facing SA over the human trafficking issue was highlighted once more last week when the National Prosecuting Authority (NPA) released a report, Tsireledzani: understanding the dimensions of human trafficking in southern Africa.

"The limited number of studies that have been conducted suggests that SA is a key destination and, to a lesser extent, a country of origin and transit for people trafficked to and from Africa and abroad," said the study, conducted for the NPA by the Human Sciences Research Council. "However, while varying (and often alarmist) statistics pertaining to human trafficking are sometimes reported in the media and by civil society institutions, reliable information on the scale, direction and nature of trafficking remains sparse."

The study came out a week after Justice Minister Jeff Radebe submitted to Parliament the Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill, which is meant to meet our obligations under the UN protocol.

The government cannot quantify the cost of these obligations because it has no information about the scale of human trafficking. "There will be substantial financial implications for the government departments which will be involved in the implementation of the act, once it has been passed," is all that is said in an explanatory memorandum to the bill.

The obligations, which arise from article 6 of the UN protocol, include the provision of housing; information regarding the legal rights of the victims in a language they can understand; medical, psychological and other material assistance; and employment, education and training opportunities.

The challenge for a developing country, which by definition has limited resources, is that complying with UN protocols can be expensive. It can divert resources from the most significant problems - efforts to solve which give the biggest bang for our buck - to problems that are less pressing.

This challenge is even more magnified when a country has to make such commitments in the dark, as SA is doing with regard to human trafficking.

Consider the institutional capacity that must now be devoted to combating human trafficking, ahead of all other crimes - for which information is available - that beset the country. The bill calls for the setting up of an intersectoral committee to be made up of the directors-general of eight departments as well as the national director of public prosecutions and the CEO of the Government Communication and Information System. The committee will prepare a national policy framework to deal with all matters contained in the bill, including compiling a database of human trafficking cases.

The other dilemma that arises from the UN protocol is that once the policy is in place, it will in effect create a two-tier system, where victims of human trafficking will be entitled to the best support as mandated by the UN, while victims of other crimes will not.

The bill provides for the victim to ask the court to order a person convicted of the crime of human trafficking to pay the victim for, among other things, damage or loss of property; physical, psychological or other injury; being infected with a life-threatening disease; or loss of income or support.

The only recourse available to other victims of crime is to sue for damages, a costly process that is out of reach for most.

What this means is that you may be better off, financially at least, being infected with HIV as a victim of human trafficking than ordinary rape. That can't be right.

Sikhakhane is editor-in-chief of Destiny Man and a freelance writer.

LOAD-DATE: March 29, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

237 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Business Day (South Africa)

March 29, 2010
Business Day Edition

Human trafficking not our highest priority

BYLINE: Jabulani Sikhakhane

SECTION: OPINION & EDITORIAL

LENGTH: 800 words

Human trafficking not our highest priority

Complying with UN protocols is expensive and can divert resources away from more pressing problems

THE preparation of legislation and a policy framework to combat human trafficking show the difficulties of developing countries in meeting their obligations to multilateral institutions such as the United Nations (UN).

SA has taken the first step towards developing a policy on combating the trafficking of persons, but it does so in the dark because it lacks information about the scale of the problem.

SA is a signatory to the UN Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, which imposes obligations on signatory countries to provide support to the victims of human trafficking. Pretoria has also been pressed by the US state department to implement measures to combat human trafficking. The US placed SA on its tier 2 watch list for the years 2005 to 2008 because it failed to comply fully with the minimum international standards for eliminating human trafficking.

In addition, nongovernmental organisations have been blowing their vuvuzelas in recent months, warning that the World Cup this year will provide cover for crime syndicates involved in human trafficking.

The dilemma facing SA over the human trafficking issue was highlighted once more last week when the National Prosecuting Authority (NPA) released a report, Tsireledzani: understanding the dimensions of human trafficking in southern Africa.

"The limited number of studies that have been conducted suggests that SA is a key destination and, to a lesser extent, a country of origin and transit for people trafficked to and from Africa and abroad," said the study, conducted for the NPA by the Human Sciences Research Council. "However, while varying (and often alarmist) statistics pertaining to human trafficking are sometimes reported in the media and by civil society institutions, reliable information on the scale, direction and nature of trafficking remains sparse."

The study came out a week after Justice Minister Jeff Radebe submitted to Parliament the Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill, which is meant to meet our obligations under the UN protocol.

The government cannot quantify the cost of these obligations because it has no information about the scale of human trafficking. "There will be substantial financial implications for the government departments which will be involved in the implementation of the act, once it has been passed," is all that is said in an explanatory memorandum to the bill.

The obligations, which arise from article 6 of the UN protocol, include the provision of housing; information regarding the legal rights of the victims in a language they can understand; medical, psychological and other material assistance; and employment, education and training opportunities.

The challenge for a developing country, which by definition has limited resources, is that complying with UN protocols can be expensive. It can divert resources from the most significant problems - efforts to solve which give the biggest bang for our buck - to problems that are less pressing.

This challenge is even more magnified when a country has to make such commitments in the dark, as SA is doing with regard to human trafficking.

Consider the institutional capacity that must now be devoted to combating human trafficking, ahead of all other crimes - for which information is available - that beset the country. The bill calls for the setting up of an intersectoral committee to be made up of the directors-general of eight departments as well as the national director of public prosecutions and the CEO of the Government Communication and Information System. The committee will prepare a national policy framework to deal with all matters contained in the bill, including compiling a database of human trafficking cases.

The other dilemma that arises from the UN protocol is that once the policy is in place, it will in effect create a two-tier system, where victims of human trafficking will be entitled to the best support as mandated by the UN, while victims of other crimes will not.

The bill provides for the victim to ask the court to order a person convicted of the crime of human trafficking to pay the victim for, among other things, damage or loss of property; physical, psychological or other injury; being infected with a life-threatening disease; or loss of income or support.

The only recourse available to other victims of crime is to sue for damages, a costly process that is out of reach for most.

What this means is that you may be better off, financially at least, being infected with HIV as a victim of human trafficking than ordinary rape. That can't be right.

oSikhakhane is editor-in-chief of Destiny Man and a freelance writer.

LOAD-DATE: April 1, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

238 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

March 26, 2010 Friday

West Africa; African Union Campaign Against Trafficking Launched for Ecowas

BYLINE: Economic Community of West African States (Abuja)LENGTH: 413 words

Participants at a joint African Union/ECOWAS programme on human trafficking that ended on 26th March 2010 have recommended a variety of initiatives under a three-tier arrangement that would enable countries of origin, transit and destination address the dimensions of the menace, particularly as it affects women and children.

At the continental and regional levels, they called for strategic partnership and cooperation arrangements among countries of origin, transit and destination in Africa, the Arab world and other regions while ensuring coherence between bilateral and multilateral agreements to address the challenge of trafficking.

Moreover, they stressed the desirability of a mechanism for information and data exchange and for reporting the status of implementation of the Ouagadougou plan of action agreed by the African Union Council of Ministers.

The joint programme was meant to evaluate the status of implementation of the plan and launch the ECOWAS phase of the African Union Commission Campaign Initiative against Trafficking (AU.COMMIT) which seeks to galvanise the various stakeholders for a synergised and coordinated in combating human trafficking.

Among the actions recommended for national level implementation is the designation and equipment of a focal agency with responsibility for coordinating the implementation of the plan and which should network with regional communities and undertake multi-level prevention and awareness campaigns.

Participants said that regional level institutions should ensure the creation of a mechanism for information flow for the purpose of monitoring and evaluation; support fundraising efforts for targeted actions and assist in ascertaining national, regional and continental centres of excellence that need to be supported. They also challenged the AU to revise its definition of human trafficking so that it becomes 'clear, succinct and fully encapsulating' and to support other activities in the areas of lobbying governments in support of the implementation of the plan, design and launch a tool for formation flow and establish a continental one stop shop for technical support for the various stakeholders.

The participants also acknowledged some critical deficiencies including 'a general lack of understanding of the scope and dimensions of trafficking, the lack of followup, monitoring and evaluation of implementation, the dearth of institutional structures, resource constraints and the lack of partnerships.'

LOAD-DATE: April 20, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

239 of 404 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

March 26, 2010 Friday 11:27 PM EST

HUMAN TRAFFICKING: INTERNATIONAL, NATIONAL IMPLICATIONS

LENGTH: 1453 words

WASHINGTON, March 25 -- The U.S. Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons issued the text of the following speech:

Good morning and thank you Co-Chairman McGovern and Co-Chairman Wolf for holding this hearing today on such a far-reaching and important issue: human trafficking. I am pleased today to provide an update to the Commission on the Obama Administration's global efforts against modern slavery and I look forward to fielding your questions.

Today is the International Day to Remember the Victims of Slavery and the Trans-Atlantic Slave Trade. And yet, in this day and age, in the year 2010, we are still combating a phenomenon that has plagued cultures, communities, and countries since the beginning of time. Ten years have passed since the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) was signed into law by President Clinton. It has also been a decade since the United Nations negotiated the Palermo Protocol, which clearly defines human trafficking on the international stage, and has been adopted by 137 countries.

Thousands of victims have been helped; thousands of traffickers have been arrested and prosecuted; neither of which would have come about without the legal and policy achievements of the last decade.

The Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons is working hard to ensure that the policy and legal achievements of the last 10 years are turned into actual results: freeing more people from the shackles of modern slavery and preventing this human rights abuse in the first place.

Today we are seeing more incidences of human trafficking than ever before for a myriad of reasons, including greater public awareness and more cooperation between government, non-governmental organizations, and law enforcement. The spike in these numbers reflects trends that we saw in the wake of the domestic violence movement and the hate crimes movement - as awareness increases, more cases are brought to light. Yet, we must be honest in this assessment as well; there are still thousands, if not millions, of cases not reported due to the dark and shadowy nature of this crime. As old as the practice of slavery may be, the criminals that bind these people's hopes by force, fraud, and coercion are looking for new ways to commit these crimes. We are looking for new ways to apprehend them.

The Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons is partnering with more non-governmental organizations than ever before by funding and supporting on-the-ground anti-trafficking efforts. Even with the $20 million in annual funds dedicated to these efforts, we are only able to fund a fraction of the requests we receive, as nearly $289 million was requested in Fiscal Year 2010. There are more requests, more worthy efforts, and more victims that we need to help. Today, I humbly ask for your help and support so that we may continue to make progress against modern slavery.

In the aftermath of the Haiti earthquake, the Office was able to act swiftly and expedite monies to fund efforts to improve child protection and lower the risk of exploitation during this natural disaster. The Office was already engaged in anti-trafficking efforts in both Haiti and the Dominican Republic prior to the earthquake and now we are looking at ways to build on and improve those programs. The earthquake in Haiti also highlighted an important notion: anti-trafficking efforts must be implemented in every disaster-response plan - both international and domestic - to ensure that men, women, and children are not preyed upon and exploited. Your help and support in Congress to ensure these standards is vital to ensuring the protection of the most vulnerable populations in a time of crisis.

In addition to the Office's programmatic efforts, we are also working to combat modern slavery through the annual Trafficking in Persons Report, as required by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act.

In February, the Office released its 2010 interim assessment, which as directed by law, is a semi-annual update on those countries who received a Tier Two Watch List ranking in the 2009 Trafficking in Persons Report or who moved up a tier from the 2008 to the 2009 Report. I offer the tier ranking definitions for your information as well as the 2010 interim assessment. The semi-annual assessment is an opportunity to look at the progress made by those countries as well as gauge the work still remaining. The majority of the 55 countries covered in this assessment showed some progress since the release of the 2009 Trafficking in Persons Report - an overall positive trend. Fifteen of these countries, however, have shown minimal or negligible progress since June 2009 and it is these countries that bear close analysis. It is important to note that the Office is currently compiling the reporting for the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report, which is slated to be released in June. The Office will be happy to update the Commission on its contents as we near the release.

Countries included in the interim assessment, which as I stated are based on the previous year's rankings, range in their ability to combat trafficking in persons. We see some countries, which have access to vast resources, stagnate in their efforts to combat human trafficking while others with few resources make impressive gains against this terrible crime. The Department of State is committed to strengthening our partnerships to combat trafficking in persons with all nations who wish to work with us on this issue. It is clear that political will is the necessary element to make tangible progress against this global scourge.

And, it will take political will here in the United States to improve our efforts against human trafficking. In the last year, we have seen a "whole of government" commitment under the Obama Administration in tackling this scourge. Under the leadership of Secretary Clinton, the Office will rank the United States for the first time in the 2010 Trafficking in Persons report. This reporting will be based on the same minimum standards outlined in the TVPA and by which we rank foreign countries. We must acknowledge to foreign governments that human trafficking exists everywhere, including the United States. As chair of the Senior Policy Operating Group, which coordinates the Obama Administration's 'whole of government approach' to anti-trafficking efforts and policy, it is necessary to note the interagency cooperation in reporting for the U.S. ranking. As Secretary Clinton rightly said, "Human rights are universal, but their experience is local. This is why we are committed to holding everyone to the same standard, including ourselves."

Including the United States in the 2010 Trafficking in Persons report is not the only major initiative undertaken by the Office this year. Partnering with the United States' Office of the Chief of Protocol we have made marked improvements to ensure that domestic workers for diplomatic personnel are properly paid, safeguarded from exploitation, and are fully aware of their rights while in the United States. The Office is also working on a key preventive effort with partners in the business community to rid product supply chains of modern slavery. It is essential to our overall efforts to ensure that we reach the root causes and tracing these supply lines are key components to lowering the incidence of worker exploitation.

Today, I have shared information on the Obama Administration's global efforts on a host of levels. As evidenced by our work in Haiti, with the interim assessment and annual report, the first-ever U.S. ranking, improved domestic worker safeguards, and supply chain efforts it is quite clear that human trafficking has cross-cutting implications. It affects our agricultural, economic, trade, security, domestic, and foreign policies to name a few.

Yet, the greatest implication is the human one. It is through the example of people like Tom Lantos, who so bravely pursued the path to freedom during the Holocaust, and turned his victim status into survivor status through his life's work. His story is the story of human trafficking victims today - it is through bravery, courage, and hope that these victims become survivors and live a life built on freedom.

His example is in keeping with what the President called us to do in January: to "acknowledge that forms of slavery still exist in the modern era, and ... recommit ourselves to stopping the human traffickers who ply this horrific trade."

Thank you again for holding this hearing today. The Department looks forward to working with you and I welcome your questions. For more information please contact: Sarabjit Jagirdar, Email:- htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: March 26, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

240 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

March 25, 2010 Thursday

Taiwan PM pledges to strengthen crackdown on human trafficking

LENGTH: 369 words

Text of report in English by Taiwanese newspaper The China Post website on 25 March

[Unattributed article from the "Taiwan" page: "Premier Pledges To Strengthen Crackdown on Human Trafficking"]

TAIPEI, Taiwan - Premier Wu Den-yih pledged Thursday to step up a crackdown on human trafficking as part of the government's efforts to improve human rights protection and maintain public order.

Wu said in a weekly Cabinet meeting that since 2006, the government has adopted various measures against human trafficking, which include enacting a law on human trafficking prevention and control, cracking down on related crimes and strengthening protection for victims.

In addition, the government has been providing more guidance and paying more attention to foreign spouses, and has reviewed the country's policy towards foreign workers and strengthened the regulation of labour brokers, he said.

According to the 2009 Trafficking in Persons Report by the US Department of State, Taiwan is placed in the Tier 2 ranking, which is for governments that are making significant efforts to meet the minimum standards for eliminating trafficking prescribed by the US law that guides anti-human trafficking efforts - the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000.

The report said Taiwan has made some progress in combating human trafficking over the past year but should do much more, including extending labour protection to all categories of workers to prevent labour trafficking.

According to a report delivered by the Ministry of the Interior (MOI) in the Cabinet meeting, justice authorities uncovered 88 cases of human trafficking in 2009. While 46 of the cases involved labour exploitation, the other 42 cases involved sexual exploitation.

Meanwhile, 355 local people were indicted in 118 human trafficking cases.

The MOI said that in the future, the ministry will require law enforcement officers to strengthen the identification of victims so that they can be provided with proper protection.

It said the ministry will continue the shelter and protection services provided by authorized civic groups and will also expand its crackdown on human trafficking.

Source: The China Post website, Taipei, in English in English 25 Mar 10

LOAD-DATE: March 25, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

241 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

March 25, 2010 Thursday 4:09 PM TST

Premier pledges to strengthen crackdown on human trafficking

BYLINE: Chiachen Hsieh and Y.F. LowLENGTH: 322 wordsDATELINE: Taipei, March 25

Premier Wu Den-yih pledged Thursday to step up a crackdown on human trafficking as part of the government's efforts to improve human rights protection and maintain public order.

Wu said in a weekly Cabinet meeting that since 2006, the government has adopted various measures against human trafficking, which include enacting a law on human trafficking prevention and control, cracking down on related crimes and strengthening protection for victims.

In addition, the government has been providing more guidance and paying more attention to foreign spouses, and has reviewed the country's policy toward foreign workers and strengthened the regulation of labor brokers, he said.

According to the 2009 Trafficking in Persons Report by the U.S. Department of State, Taiwan is placed in the Tier 2 ranking, which is for governments that are making significant efforts to meet the minimum standards for eliminating trafficking prescribed by the U.S. law that guides anti-human trafficking efforts -- the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000.

The report said Taiwan has made some progress in combating human trafficking over the past year but should do much more, including extending labor protection to all categories of workers to prevent labor trafficking.

According to a report delivered by the Ministry of the Interior (MOI) in the Cabinet meeting, justice authorities uncovered 88 cases of human trafficking in 2009. While 46 of the cases involved labor exploitation, the other 42 cases involved sexual exploitation.

Meanwhile, 355 local people were indicted in 118 human trafficking cases.

The MOI said that in the future, the ministry will require law enforcement officers to strengthen the identification of victims so that they can be provided with proper protection.

It said the ministry will continue the shelter and protection services provided by authorized civic groups and will also expand its crackdown on human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: March 25, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

242 of 404 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

March 25, 2010 Thursday

HUMAN TRAFFICKING: INTERNATIONAL AND NATIONAL IMPLICATIONS

BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 1420 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. Department of State:

Good morning and thank you Co-Chairman McGovern and Co-Chairman Wolf for holding this hearing today on such a far-reaching and important issue: human trafficking. I am pleased today to provide an update to the Commission on the Obama Administrations global efforts against modern slavery and I look forward to fielding your questions.

Today is the International Day to Remember the Victims of Slavery and the Trans-Atlantic Slave Trade. And yet, in this day and age, in the year 2010, we are still combating a phenomenon that has plagued cultures, communities, and countries since the beginning of time. Ten years have passed since the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) was signed into law by President Clinton. It has also been a decade since the United Nations negotiated the Palermo Protocol, which clearly defines human trafficking on the international stage, and has been adopted by 137 countries.

Thousands of victims have been helped; thousands of traffickers have been arrested and prosecuted; neither of which would have come about without the legal and policy achievements of the last decade.

The Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons is working hard to ensure that the policy and legal achievements of the last 10 years are turned into actual results: freeing more people from the shackles of modern slavery and preventing this human rights abuse in the first place.

Today we are seeing more incidences of human trafficking than ever before for a myriad of reasons, including greater public awareness and more cooperation between government, non-governmental organizations, and law enforcement. The spike in these numbers reflects trends that we saw in the wake of the domestic violence movement and the hate crimes movement as awareness increases, more cases are brought to light. Yet, we must be honest in this assessment as well; there are still thousands, if not millions, of cases not reported due to the dark and shadowy nature of this crime. As old as the practice of slavery may be, the criminals that bind these peoples hopes by force, fraud, and coercion are looking for new ways to commit these crimes. We are looking for new ways to apprehend them.

The Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons is partnering with more non-governmental organizations than ever before by funding and supporting on-the-ground anti-trafficking efforts. Even with the $20 million in annual funds dedicated to these efforts, we are only able to fund a fraction of the requests we receive, as nearly $289 million was requested in Fiscal Year 2010. There are more requests, more worthy efforts, and more victims that we need to help. Today, I humbly ask for your help and support so that we may continue to make progress against modern slavery.

In the aftermath of the Haiti earthquake, the Office was able to act swiftly and expedite monies to fund efforts to improve child protection and lower the risk of exploitation during this natural disaster. The Office was already engaged in anti-trafficking efforts in both Haiti and the Dominican Republic prior to the earthquake and now we are looking at ways to build on and improve those programs. The earthquake in Haiti also highlighted an important notion: anti-trafficking efforts must be implemented in every disaster-response plan both international and domestic to ensure that men, women, and children are not preyed upon and exploited. Your help and support in Congress to ensure these standards is vital to ensuring the protection of the most vulnerable populations in a time of crisis.

In addition to the Office's programmatic efforts, we are also working to combat modern slavery through the annual Trafficking in Persons Report, as required by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act.

In February, the Office released its 2010 interim assessment, which as directed by law, is a semi-annual update on those countries who received a Tier Two Watch List ranking in the 2009 Trafficking in Persons Report or who moved up a tier from the 2008 to the 2009 Report. I offer the tier ranking definitions for your information as well as the 2010 interim assessment. The semi-annual assessment is an opportunity to look at the progress made by those countries as well as gauge the work still remaining. The majority of the 55 countries covered in this assessment showed some progress since the release of the 2009 Trafficking in Persons Report an overall positive trend. Fifteen of these countries, however, have shown minimal or negligible progress since June 2009 and it is these countries that bear close analysis. It is important to note that the Office is currently compiling the reporting for the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report, which is slated to be released in June. The Office will be happy to update the Commission on its contents as we near the release.

Countries included in the interim assessment, which as I stated are based on the previous years rankings, range in their ability to combat trafficking in persons. We see some countries, which have access to vast resources, stagnate in their efforts to combat human trafficking while others with few resources make impressive gains against this terrible crime. The Department of State is committed to strengthening our partnerships to combat trafficking in persons with all nations who wish to work with us on this issue. It is clear that political will is the necessary element to make tangible progress against this global scourge.

And, it will take political will here in the United States to improve our efforts against human trafficking. In the last year, we have seen a "whole of government" commitment under the Obama Administration in tackling this scourge. Under the leadership of Secretary Clinton, the Office will rank the United States for the first time in the 2010 Trafficking in Persons report. This reporting will be based on the same minimum standards outlined in the TVPA and by which we rank foreign countries. We must acknowledge to foreign governments that human trafficking exists everywhere, including the United States. As chair of the Senior Policy Operating Group, which coordinates the Obama Administration's whole of government approach to anti-trafficking efforts and policy, it is necessary to note the interagency cooperation in reporting for the U.S. ranking. As Secretary Clinton rightly said, Human rights are universal, but their experience is local. This is why we are committed to holding everyone to the same standard, including ourselves.

Including the United States in the 2010 Trafficking in Persons report is not the only major initiative undertaken by the Office this year. Partnering with the United States Office of the Chief of Protocol we have made marked improvements to ensure that domestic workers for diplomatic personnel are properly paid, safeguarded from exploitation, and are fully aware of their rights while in the United States. The Office is also working on a key preventive effort with partners in the business community to rid product supply chains of modern slavery. It is essential to our overall efforts to ensure that we reach the root causes and tracing these supply lines are key components to lowering the incidence of worker exploitation.

Today, I have shared information on the Obama Administration's global efforts on a host of levels. As evidenced by our work in Haiti, with the interim assessment and annual report, the first-ever U.S. ranking, improved domestic worker safeguards, and supply chain efforts it is quite clear that human trafficking has cross-cutting implications. It affects our agricultural, economic, trade, security, domestic, and foreign policies to name a few.

Yet, the greatest implication is the human one. It is through the example of people like Tom Lantos, who so bravely pursued the path to freedom during the Holocaust, and turned his victim status into survivor status through his life's work. His story is the story of human trafficking victims today it is through bravery, courage, and hope that these victims become survivors and live a life built on freedom.

His example is in keeping with what the President called us to do in January: to acknowledge that forms of slavery still exist in the modern era, and recommit ourselves to stopping the human traffickers who ply this horrific trade.

Thank you again for holding this hearing today. The Department looks forward to working with you and I welcome your questions.

LOAD-DATE: March 25, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 States News Service

243 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

March 25, 2010 Thursday 6:56 AM EST

Human Trafficking: International and National Implications

BYLINE: Targeted News ServiceLENGTH: 1451 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons issued the text of the following speech of Ambassador-at-Large Luis CdeBaca:

Good morning and thank you Co-Chairman McGovern and Co-Chairman Wolf for holding this hearing today on such a far-reaching and important issue: human trafficking. I am pleased today to provide an update to the Commission on the Obama Administration's global efforts against modern slavery and I look forward to fielding your questions.

Today is the International Day to Remember the Victims of Slavery and the Trans-Atlantic Slave Trade. And yet, in this day and age, in the year 2010, we are still combating a phenomenon that has plagued cultures, communities, and countries since the beginning of time. Ten years have passed since the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) was signed into law by President Clinton. It has also been a decade since the United Nations negotiated the Palermo Protocol, which clearly defines human trafficking on the international stage, and has been adopted by 137 countries.

Thousands of victims have been helped; thousands of traffickers have been arrested and prosecuted; neither of which would have come about without the legal and policy achievements of the last decade.

The Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons is working hard to ensure that the policy and legal achievements of the last 10 years are turned into actual results: freeing more people from the shackles of modern slavery and preventing this human rights abuse in the first place.

Today we are seeing more incidences of human trafficking than ever before for a myriad of reasons, including greater public awareness and more cooperation between government, non-governmental organizations, and law enforcement. The spike in these numbers reflects trends that we saw in the wake of the domestic violence movement and the hate crimes movement - as awareness increases, more cases are brought to light. Yet, we must be honest in this assessment as well; there are still thousands, if not millions, of cases not reported due to the dark and shadowy nature of this crime. As old as the practice of slavery may be, the criminals that bind these people's hopes by force, fraud, and coercion are looking for new ways to commit these crimes. We are looking for new ways to apprehend them.

The Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons is partnering with more non-governmental organizations than ever before by funding and supporting on-the-ground anti-trafficking efforts. Even with the $20 million in annual funds dedicated to these efforts, we are only able to fund a fraction of the requests we receive, as nearly $289 million was requested in Fiscal Year 2010. There are more requests, more worthy efforts, and more victims that we need to help. Today, I humbly ask for your help and support so that we may continue to make progress against modern slavery.

In the aftermath of the Haiti earthquake, the Office was able to act swiftly and expedite monies to fund efforts to improve child protection and lower the risk of exploitation during this natural disaster. The Office was already engaged in anti-trafficking efforts in both Haiti and the Dominican Republic prior to the earthquake and now we are looking at ways to build on and improve those programs. The earthquake in Haiti also highlighted an important notion: anti-trafficking efforts must be implemented in every disaster-response plan - both international and domestic - to ensure that men, women, and children are not preyed upon and exploited. Your help and support in Congress to ensure these standards is vital to ensuring the protection of the most vulnerable populations in a time of crisis.

In addition to the Office's programmatic efforts, we are also working to combat modern slavery through the annual Trafficking in Persons Report, as required by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act.

In February, the Office released its 2010 interim assessment, which as directed by law, is a semi-annual update on those countries who received a Tier Two Watch List ranking in the 2009 Trafficking in Persons Report or who moved up a tier from the 2008 to the 2009 Report. I offer the tier ranking definitions for your information as well as the 2010 interim assessment. The semi-annual assessment is an opportunity to look at the progress made by those countries as well as gauge the work still remaining. The majority of the 55 countries covered in this assessment showed some progress since the release of the 2009 Trafficking in Persons Report - an overall positive trend. Fifteen of these countries, however, have shown minimal or negligible progress since June 2009 and it is these countries that bear close analysis. It is important to note that the Office is currently compiling the reporting for the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report, which is slated to be released in June. The Office will be happy to update the Commission on its contents as we near the release.

Countries included in the interim assessment, which as I stated are based on the previous year's rankings, range in their ability to combat trafficking in persons. We see some countries, which have access to vast resources, stagnate in their efforts to combat human trafficking while others with few resources make impressive gains against this terrible crime. The Department of State is committed to strengthening our partnerships to combat trafficking in persons with all nations who wish to work with us on this issue. It is clear that political will is the necessary element to make tangible progress against this global scourge.

And, it will take political will here in the United States to improve our efforts against human trafficking. In the last year, we have seen a "whole of government" commitment under the Obama Administration in tackling this scourge. Under the leadership of Secretary Clinton, the Office will rank the United States for the first time in the 2010 Trafficking in Persons report. This reporting will be based on the same minimum standards outlined in the TVPA and by which we rank foreign countries. We must acknowledge to foreign governments that human trafficking exists everywhere, including the United States. As chair of the Senior Policy Operating Group, which coordinates the Obama Administration's 'whole of government approach' to anti-trafficking efforts and policy, it is necessary to note the interagency cooperation in reporting for the U.S. ranking. As Secretary Clinton rightly said, "Human rights are universal, but their experience is local. This is why we are committed to holding everyone to the same standard, including ourselves."

Including the United States in the 2010 Trafficking in Persons report is not the only major initiative undertaken by the Office this year. Partnering with the United States' Office of the Chief of Protocol we have made marked improvements to ensure that domestic workers for diplomatic personnel are properly paid, safeguarded from exploitation, and are fully aware of their rights while in the United States. The Office is also working on a key preventive effort with partners in the business community to rid product supply chains of modern slavery. It is essential to our overall efforts to ensure that we reach the root causes and tracing these supply lines are key components to lowering the incidence of worker exploitation.

Today, I have shared information on the Obama Administration's global efforts on a host of levels. As evidenced by our work in Haiti, with the interim assessment and annual report, the first-ever U.S. ranking, improved domestic worker safeguards, and supply chain efforts it is quite clear that human trafficking has cross-cutting implications. It affects our agricultural, economic, trade, security, domestic, and foreign policies to name a few.

Yet, the greatest implication is the human one. It is through the example of people like Tom Lantos, who so bravely pursued the path to freedom during the Holocaust, and turned his victim status into survivor status through his life's work. His story is the story of human trafficking victims today - it is through bravery, courage, and hope that these victims become survivors and live a life built on freedom.

His example is in keeping with what the President called us to do in January: to "acknowledge that forms of slavery still exist in the modern era, and recommit ourselves to stopping the human traffickers who ply this horrific trade."

Thank you again for holding this hearing today. The Department looks forward to working with you and I welcome your questions.

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS hc11-JF78--100423-2760228 StaffFurigay

LOAD-DATE: May 1, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 Targeted News Service LLC
All Rights Reserved

244 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Congressional Documents and Publications

March 24, 2010

Human Trafficking: National and International Implications Hearing

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTSLENGTH: 465 words

Human Trafficking: National and International Implications

Thursday, March 25

10:00 a.m. - noon

Room: Rayburn 2255

Please join the Tom Lantos Human Rights Commission at a hearing on human trafficking. The hearing is open to the media and the interested public.

Human trafficking is one of the most serious threats to the protection of human rights, as it exploits the most vulnerable populations in the most vulnerable circumstances in a predatory manner, both within and across international borders. The Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA; P.L. 106 - 386) defines human trafficking as inducing a person to perform labor or a commercial sex act through force, fraud, or coercion. Any persons under age 18 who perform a commercial sex act are considered a victim of human trafficking, regardless of whether force, fraud, or coercion was present. People who are trafficked are denied basic freedoms, are extremely vulnerable to global health risks, and are sold and resold within rapidly spreading organized crime networks.

The International Labor Organization (ILO) estimates at least 12.3 million children and adults are in forced labor, bonded labor, and commercial sex servitude at any given time. INTERPOL estimates human trafficking to be a $28 billion enterprise. The most comprehensive and far-reaching governmental report in the United States is the State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report, which was mandated in the TVPA. The primary objective of this report is to "[free] victims from this form of modern-day slavery." The legislation further requires the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons (G/TIP) to promote global awareness regarding human trafficking, to develop country-specific strategies to help foreign governments to better tackle the problem of trafficking, and to classify their accomplishments or failures to adhere to minimum standards in a tier system.

To discuss these issues, we will welcome the following witnesses:

I. Panel:

Ambassador Luis CdeBaca, G/TIP, U.S. Department of State

II. Panel:

Timothy Williams, director of INTERPOL, Washington, D.C.

III. Panel:

Dallas Jessup, founder, Just Yell Fire, a NGO protecting teenage-girls from trafficking

Deborah Sigmund, director, Innocents at Risk, a NGO raising awareness of trafficking

Sandra Fiorini, flight attendant, graduate of DHS "Operation Blue Lightning," which combats trafficking on commercial airlines

Selene Martin, director, LexisNexis Cares, a public-private initiative to provide trafficking case management.

Witness list subject to change.

If you have any questions, please contact Allison McGuire (Rep. McGovern) or Elizabeth Hoffman (Rep. Wolf) at 202-225-3599.

James P. McGovern, M.C. Frank R. Wolf, M.C.

Co-Chairman, TLHRC Co-Chairman, TLHRC

LOAD-DATE: March 24, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: DOH

Copyright 2010 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

245 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

March 23, 2010 Tuesday 9:10 PM EST

Royce Decries Human Rights Violations in Vietnam at Human Rights Commission Hearing

BYLINE: Targeted News ServiceLENGTH: 421 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Ed Royce, R-Calif. (40th CD), issued the following news release:

Today, Rep. Ed Royce (R-CA) participated in a Tom Lantos Human Rights Commission hearing on human rights in Vietnam. The Vietnamese governments continued denial of basic human rights like freedom of speech, assembly, and religion were highlighted.

"The Vietnamese government remains an abusive, one-party state, and the release of Father Nguyen Van Ly doesn't change that fact," said Royce, noting the recent release of the prominent Vietnamese dissident who was imprisoned for his advocacy of democracy and religious freedom.

"This is a pattern that we've seen before; the Vietnamese government feels pressured, so they make a token gesture to try to appease its critics. I can assure its party leaders, though, that until the communist government fully respects the rights of its citizens, we will not let up," Royce continued.

Religious persecution remains particularly widespread in Vietnam, as the government continues to harass, beat, and detain those that practice religions not officially recognized by the state. Catholics, Montagnard Christians, and numerous Buddhist groups catch the brunt of the government's abuse. According to recent reports, Bat Nha Buddhists have been terrorized by undercover police and communist party officials, Montagnards report being shocked by electric batons, and many others report similar treatment.

"It's vital that the State Department re-list Vietnam as a 'Country of Particular Concern' for violations of religious freedom. The House expressed its will last year by passing language that I offered calling on this re-listing. It's now time for the State Department to take this issue as seriously as the House does," said Royce.

At the hearing, Rep. Anh "Joseph" Cao echoed Royce's call, testifying that "if there's one thing the U.S. government can do to put pressure on Vietnam, it's putting it back on the CPC list." Royce also questioned Cao about Vietnam's human trafficking record and commended him for his efforts to meet with peaceful dissidents during a recent trip to Vietnam.

"In Vietnam, the government itself actively engages in human trafficking through labor export companies partly or wholly owned by the Vietnamese Ministry of Labor," Cao said. "Until the government of Vietnam eliminates these exploitative aspects of its labor export program (its) placement on Tier Two of the Trafficking in Persons list... is indefensible."

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS CT21CT-100324-2699579 61ChengTacorda

LOAD-DATE: March 23, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 Targeted News Service LLC
All Rights Reserved

246 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Congressional Documents and Publications

March 22, 2010TLHRC Hearing: Human Trafficking: International and National Implications*SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTSLENGTH: 465 words

Human Trafficking: International and National Implications

10 a.m. - noon

Thursday, March 25

2255 Rayburn HOB

Please join the Tom Lantos Human Rights Commission at a hearing on human trafficking. The hearing is open to the media and the interested public.

Human trafficking is one of the most serious threats to the protection of human rights, as it exploits the most vulnerable populations in the most vulnerable circumstances in a predatory manner, both within and across international borders. The Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA; P.L. 106 - 386) defines human trafficking as inducing a person to perform labor or a commercial sex act through force, fraud, or coercion. Any persons under age 18 who perform a commercial sex act are considered a victim of human trafficking, regardless of whether force, fraud, or coercion was present. People who are trafficked are denied basic freedoms, are extremely vulnerable to global health risks, and are sold and resold within rapidly spreading organized crime networks.

The International Labor Organization (ILO) estimates at least 12.3 million children and adults are in forced labor, bonded labor, and commercial sex servitude at any given time. INTERPOL estimates human trafficking to be a $28 billion enterprise. The most comprehensive and far-reaching governmental report in the United States is the State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report, which was mandated in the TVPA. The primary objective of this report is to "[free] victims from this form of modern-day slavery." The legislation further requires the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons (G/TIP) to promote global awareness regarding human trafficking, to develop country-specific strategies to help foreign governments to better tackle the problem of trafficking, and to classify their accomplishments or failures to adhere to minimum standards in a tier system.

To discuss these issues, we will welcome the following witnesses:

I. Panel:

Ambassador Luis CdeBaca, G/TIP, U.S. Department of State

II. Panel:

Timothy Williams, director of INTERPOL, Washington, D.C.

III. Panel:

Dallas Jessup, founder, Just Yell Fire, a NGO protecting teenage-girls from trafficking

Deborah Sigmund, director, Innocents at Risk, a NGO raising awareness of trafficking

Sandra Fiorini, flight attendant, graduate of DHS "Operation Blue Lightning," which combats trafficking on commercial airlines

Selene Martin, director, LexisNexis Cares, a public-private initiative to provide trafficking case management.

Witness list subject to change.

If you have any questions, please contact Allison McGuire (Rep. McGovern) or Elizabeth Hoffman (Rep. Wolf) at 202-225-3599.

James P. McGovern, M.C. Frank R. Wolf, M.C.

Co-Chairman, TLHRC Co-Chairman, TLHRC

LOAD-DATE: March 23, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: DOH

Copyright 2010 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

247 of 404 DOCUMENTS

New Straits Times (Malaysia)

March 6, 2010 Saturday

Anti-human trafficking effort lauded

BYLINE: Lee Shi-IanSECTION: Pg. 13LENGTH: 478 words

KUALA LUMPUR: Malaysia's efforts in combating human trafficking syndicates has been praised by Australia.

The latest statistics show that 280 syndicate members had been arrested as of February, with 54 charged in court. Eight have been convicted under the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act 2007.

More than 1,400 men, women and children from 17 countries were rescued from the clutches of traffickers between February 2008 and February this year.

Deputy Inspector-General of Police Tan Sri Ismail Omar said the Australian authorities recognised the ongoing efforts of local enforcement agencies to combat human trafficking, which has been aptly described as the modern day slave trade.

"Our investigations show that the syndicates have 'cooled down' their activities in the past three months after continuous police raids and operations," he said at Bukit Aman yesterday.

Police have identified the syndicate's chain of operations, uncovering those responsible for transporting the victims and providing them with temporary accommodation.

They have beefed up security at the entry and exit points in the country. Various smuggling points along the coastline have also been identified and maritime patrols and surveillance increased.

"For the first two months of this year, 43 syndicate members were arrested and 10 of them prosecuted under the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act," he said, adding that police had rescued 199 people and placed them in safe houses.

There were immigrants who used genuine passports to enter Malaysia before using fake ones to sneak out of the country to reach their final destination.

"In some cases, the final destination was Malaysia."

The most recent joint success by Malaysian and Australian police came in October last year when a major human trafficking syndicate was crippled with the arrest of a couple in Ampang.

Nine women, including a foreigner, were rescued and investigations revealed that they were bound for Australia to work in the flesh trade there.

The couple were members of a syndicate which brought in foreign women, provided them with false travel documents and sent them to Australia, Germany and Holland.

The couple are believed to have been operating from a rented apartment, raking in almost RM2 million.

Their role was to arrange for forged passports and tourist and student visas for the women, who were mostly from Asian countries.

Last August, Australia and Malaysia signed a bilateral agreement to combat human trafficking and smuggling. Since then, an integrated data base has been set up as one of the measures.

Lack of progress in combating human trafficking in 2008 led Malaysia to being downgraded from the Tier 2 Watch List to Tier 3 (blacklisted countries) in the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report, 2009.

The report listed Malaysia as one of 17 countries not doing enough to curb human trafficking.

(END)

LOAD-DATE: March 7, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 New Straits Times Press (Malaysia) Berhad
All Rights Reserved

248 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Marketwire

March 04, 2010 Thursday 1:36 AM EST

Senhoa Lotus Gala

LENGTH: 384 words

TORONTO, ONTARIO--(Marketwire - March 4, 2010) -

Lotus Gala 2010

MC Thuy Duong of Asia Entertainment, Inc. hosts the Senhoa Lotus Gala 2010 in support of victims of human trafficking in South East Asia. Join our many Canadian dignitaries including Joe Pantalone and our community business leaders at the luxurious Le Parc Dining Banquet on Saturday, March 6th. Thanh Bui, Australian Idol Finalist, leads an impressive line-up of entertainers for an inspiring evening of lively music and theatrical performances.

The Reason

Cambodia is ranked as a Tier II and on the Watch List by the US State Department in their Trafficking in Person's Report dated June, 2009. In the same report, it was noted that "Cambodia is a source, destination, and transit country for women and children trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation..."

It has been estimated that the number of ethnic-minority women, who are forced into sex work, represent as high as 30% of the total number of commercial sex workers. Even more demoralizing is the increase in the sale of children's virginity, from undocumented families.

Then Secretary of State, Condoleezza Rice, said: "Trafficking in persons is a modern-day form of slavery... Defeating human trafficking is a great moral calling of our day". Whether these victims are from East or West, they are all our children. Join our chorus today.

Planting the seeds...

Senhoa supports victims of human trafficking by providing income-generating opportunities, social reintegration and programs for self-empowerment. Our mission is to provide:

Income-generation so that vulnerable women can gain economic independence

Educational and social programs for intellectual empowerment

Business sensibilities to achieve humanitarian goals

100% of the proceeds from this event will go directly to the rescue, rehabilitation, and education of young women sold into slavery in South East Asia.

/T/

Event: Lotus Gala 2010

Date: Saturday March 6th 2010 Venue: Le Parc Dining Banquet

20 North Rivermeade Rd (Concord)

Time: 5:30pm Cocktail, Dinner & Show

Info: www.senhoea.org Contact: Jasmine Do (Event Coordinator) E-mail: jasmine@senhoea.org

/T/

CONTACT:

Jasmine Do
Event Coordinator
jasmine@senhoa.org

LOAD-DATE: March 5, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 Marketwire, L.P.
All Rights Reserved

249 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Christian Newswire

March 2, 2010 Tuesday 6:32 PM GMT

Nicaraguan University Students Rescued from Potential Human Trafficking Scenario

BYLINE: By Free for Life InternationalLENGTH: 403 words

Free for Life International, 888-335-8835

MEDIA ADVISORY, March 2 /Christian Newswire/ -- Free for Life International, a U.S. anti-trafficking organization, met last week with Nicaragua's new Ministry of Families Director Marcia Ramirez Mercado to discuss the issue of human trafficking in Nicaragua. Director Mercado stated at that time that Nicaragua is stepping up their efforts in the fight against human trafficking. Evidence of this fact appeared two days later when a couple was arrested in Managua for attempting to sex traffic several University students from Nicaragua into Guatemala and Mexico. The girls, primarily minors, were lured with the promise of appearing in several of Latin America's most prominent magazines.

Director Marcia Ramirez Mercado has recently been appointed Ministry of Families Director in Nicaragua. In this position a key part of her duties will include the oversight of governmental efforts against human trafficking in Nicaragua. Colette and Dr. Daniel Bercu, founders of Free for Life International, along with directors of Nicoya & Friends Mission were honored to meet with her last week to talk about their work concerning human trafficking. The discussion included the future placement of minor victims into the shelter, efforts the Nicaraguan government is making in the fight against trafficking, and a potential collaboration concerning awareness and victim services with Free for Life International.

Free for Life International, a Tennessee based 501c3 nonprofit organization, has made it their mission to partner with those around the world in the rescue, restoration and reintegration of trafficking survivors. Nicoya and Friends Mission, a shelter for minor age trafficking victims in Nicaragua, is one of these shelters. They are one of the only designated shelters in Nicaragua set up for minor sex trafficking victims and are providing a place of love and restoration for these young women.

The U.S. State Department's 2009 Trafficking In Persons Report places Nicaragua on a Tier 2 Watch List, stating that the government of Nicaragua does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. However, they also state that they are making significant efforts to do so.

For more information, or to partner with Free for Life International, call 1-888-335-8835 or visit the website at www.freeforlifeministries.com.

CONTACT: Colette Bercu, CEO,LOAD-DATE: March 2, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2010 Christian Communication, LLC
All Rights Reserved

250 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Kuwait News Agency (KUNA)

February 21, 2010 Sunday

US-Kuwaiti relationship "foundational" -- Ambassador Jones

LENGTH: 1067 words

The US-Kuwaiti relationship has become foundational, dating back to the founding of the American Hospital in Kuwait and later solidifying and maturing in the wake of the invasion and the liberation of the Gulf state, said US Ambassador to Kuwait Deborah Jones. "The US-Kuwaiti relationship has become foundational. Obviously its roots go back to the founding of the American Hospital in Kuwait - the first real interaction between Americans and Kuwaitis - but it was solidified and matured in the wake of the (1990) invasion and the (1991) liberation (of Kuwait), and the subsequent relationships that have built up following that, both the institutional and person-to-person," she said in an interview with KUNA on the occasion of Kuwait's national celebrations. Congratulating the Kuwaiti leadership, government and people on the 49th National Day and the 19th Liberation Day, Jones noted that for those who had seen the destruction that was wrought on Kuwait during the invasion, "now it's really an oasis in a very difficult neighborhood."

This oasis, she explained, was brought about by Kuwait's system of governance, a freely elected parliament, an open and free press, and a highly educated populace that was guaranteed to keep Kuwait in the forefront. She described the Kuwaiti-US relationship as "mature" and one of "honest friends," but said that "we have obligation not only to keep developing ourselves, but to do it so that we can be stabilizing factors in the world around us, and that we can be the enzymes for positive change in the world. That's why I believe in this relationship." Asked about areas of cooperation, she said that as in any mature relationship, there was cooperation "across the board." "Obviously we have a very important security relationship, and that remains the case because Kuwait remains essential to our logistical support for operations in Iraq and elsewhere in the region in terms of regional security ... But we consult regularly on a broad range of regional security issues, including Iran and Yemen, Al-Qaeda, etc.," she explained. Dialogue between the Kuwaiti and US governments extends to counter-terrorism cooperation, human rights and trafficking in persons issues, as well as democracy and civil society, she added. "The US isn't a quiet country; obviously we are very open about our concerns. And again, Kuwait has a mature government, and has open and free press that talks a lot about these concerns as well, so we have a very lively exchange."

Economy is another important topic of dialogue. "I have often said that one of my goals as ambassador is to grow the economic and commercial and business relationship so that it brings appropriate balance to our security relationship."

When asked how far negotiations had come between the two countries in signing a Free Trade Agreement (FTA), she noted that Kuwait and the US were cooperating under the existing Trade and Investment Framework Agreement (TIFA). However, the Trade Promotion Authority - the authority the US Congress grants to the executive branch to negotiate certain trade agreements, including FTAs - expired on July 1, 2007 and has not yet been renewed. Thus, she said, "that's something that at the right will re-emerge, but is not happening anytime soon."

As for the withdrawal of US troops from Iraq, Jones said that the "excellent, outstanding, functional security relationship with Kuwait" allowed the movement of equipment out of Iraq to go "very smoothly."

She stressed that the US goal was "to ensure that Iraq is secure as much for Iraqis themselves as for Kuwait or anyone else, and that we leave a situation where Iraq is a secure and productive neighbor in the region that is at peace within itself and at peace with its neighbors."

Moreover, she said that the nature of US presence in Iraq in future was a matter of negotiations with Iraqis, noting that "the US is never anywhere uninvited; we don't impose our presence on Kuwait, we don't impose our presence per se anymore on an elected government in Iraq. So the nature of that presence, or what we call our footprint, in both places is always an ongoing matter of evaluation and assessment and discussions by the governments."

On the matter of attracting Kuwaitis to study in the US, the ambassador explained that the number of Kuwaiti university students in the US always hovered around 3,000, but said that in the last 6-8 months some 1,400 students visas and graduate student visas for the US had been issued by the embassy, "which is an increase of 45 percent or more over what it has been the previous year, and we're now well above the 9/11 figures."

She explained that the embassy hosted four university fairs a year. "We really make an effort to recruit students to go to the US. We know some other places are closer, but we still think Kuwaitis feel at home in the US the way we feel at home here; we still think it's a great education, it's great exposure."

Jones noted that US President Barack Obama's initiative in Cairo was moving beyond government-to-government interaction to people-to-people in areas of education, science and technology, research, "and the only way that's going to happen is if we get to know each other."

As for the issue of human trafficking, the ambassador said that Kuwait was "fortunate in having a very lively press" that was an important player in bringing attention to some issues that remain outstanding here. "I think there's been a lot of focus and attention ... I think the government has taken some very important steps to address these issues ... We realize the difficulty of these things, and we have these difficulties at home (the US) too," she said, adding that the Ministry of Justice and the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labor were "very open" about this matter and that the NGOs played an important role in keeping this issue in the forefront. "My goal, by the time I leave in another year or so, that we are completely free of the Tier III (ranking on the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report)," she said, hoping that Kuwait and the US could work together on this matter "as partners and friends who are facing a common challenge."

LOAD-DATE: February 21, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

JOURNAL-CODE: 365

Copyright 2010 KUNA.
All Rights Reserved
Syndigate.info, Al Bawaba.com

251 of 404 DOCUMENTS

February 9, 2010 Tuesday 12:11 PM EST

Man goes undercover to combat child sex slavery

BYLINE: By Leif Coorlim, CNN Producer

SECTION: WORLD

LENGTH: 1211 words

DATELINE: Phnom Penh, Cambodia

Aaron Cohen first met Jonty Thern and her older sister, Channy, in 2005 while singing in a karaoke bar in Battambang, Cambodia. He has come back to see them every year since.

The California native often schedules his trips for November, the month when Cambodians celebrate the Bonn Om Teuk water festival, marking the end of the rainy season.

"The whole country comes together for boat races. Hundreds of thousands of people descend on the waterfront and it's filled with colors and flags," said Cohen. "You know my thoughts about the water festival always include Jonty, because she and her sister would get a day pass during the festival."

There was a smile on his face when he started the sentence, but by the time he had finished, it was gone.

Abolishing slavery

Cohen is a human rights advocate. He founded a charity called AbolishSlavery.org last year, but his work freeing victims of human trafficking began more than a decade ago.

At 6'5" (195 cm) with long, black hair, he stands out in almost every crowd. But Cohen often goes undercover to obtain the information needed for law enforcement officials to conduct raids and make arrests.

His trips have taken him around the world, from Sudan to Nicaragua to Israel. But, he says, in Southeast Asia the problem is especially bad.

"I would rank Cambodia right up there with India as one of the worst places in the world for sex-trafficking."

A bad problem getting worse

According to the NGO, End Child Prostitution, Abuse and Trafficking (ECPAT), as many as one-third of all sex workers in Cambodia are children. Government entities, including the U.S. State Department, are pressuring countries like Cambodia to do more to stop the modern-day slavery epidemic.

"We are making major strides in the fight against human trafficking. But it is a major problem, we know that," said Ambassador-at-Large Luis CdeBaca, who leads the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. "You have estimates as to the number of people in servitude worldwide and it's anywhere from 12.3 million on the low end as cited by UN's International Labour Organization -- to as many as 27 million people on the high end. That's a number coming from the research done by (the aid organization) Free the Slaves. But 12.3 million is a baseline number that everybody agrees that there are at least that many people in forced labor, and that's far too many."

In its comprehensive 2009 Trafficking in Persons Report, the State Department put Cambodia on its Tier 2 Watch List. The ranking means the Cambodian government does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, but is making an effort to do so.

"[In Cambodia] the number of victims is increasing and the number of prosecutions has gone down from the previous year," says CdeBaca. "The report shows that despite the overall effort, the government has not shown enough progress in convicting and punishing human trafficking offenders or protecting trafficking victims."

Cambodia is categorized as a destination country for foreign child sex tourists, with increasing reports of Asian men traveling to Cambodia in order to have sex with underage virgin girls. The State Department report states a significant proportion of trafficking victims in Cambodia are ethnic Vietnamese women and girls who are forced into prostitution in brothels and karaoke bars.

A chance encounter

Jonty Thern's short life could be a case study for that assessment. Jonty's family immigrated to Cambodia from Vietnam shortly after the Vietnam War.

Faced with gripping poverty and a debt, Jonty's mother sold her daughter, who was 10-years-old at the time, to a person on Cambodia's border with Thailand.

There, the mother was told, Jonty would sell flowers and candy to customers in bars and nightclubs. It was only later the mother says, she would learn that while there, Jonty would be repeatedly raped and beaten.

After three years of physical and sexual abuse, Jonty was released by her captors and allowed to return home to Battambang. Soon after, she and her sister willingly went to work at a karaoke bar to help the family pay off their debt, according to her parents.

The scenario in which Cohen describes meeting Jonty Thern, then 13-years-old, is as appalling as it is prevalent.

"I was working as an undercover sex vice," Cohen said. "I was posing as a sex tourist, going from karaoke bar to karaoke bar, massage parlor to massage parlor, looking for underage workers, to see if I could get them on camera soliciting me for sex."

As evidenced in the State Department report, it is a poorly-kept secret in Cambodia that many of these establishments are also operating brothels.

"I went to a number of karaokes and about my second or third karaoke of the night and I immediately notice this one really young looking girl. I requested Jonty and her sister and a group of other girls," Cohen said.

"In these bars, the girls are told to drink as much as they can, because they'll charge you for the beers. So this girl comes in and I noticed, man, she downed that beer in like 2 seconds. She seemed to be having a good time, she didn't seem unhappy or anything. But here she is nonetheless, a 13-year-old girl in a brothel drinking 10 beers in the time that I drank two," he added.

He said he invited several friends who work at a nearby victims' shelter to come join him. They posed as partiers as well, until Cohen felt comfortable to ask the manager an important question.

"After the girls began to dance and sing, I asked the mamasan what more can I get besides karaoke and so then she says 'well, for sex it's $50.'"

Cohen used the solicitation video from that night, recorded on a cell phone camera, to provide police with the information they needed to raid the karaoke brothel.

More than a dozen girls, including Jonty and her sister, Channy, were freed that night and sent to live in a victim's shelter, where they received counseling, care and an education.

Final Respects

Cohen's most recent trip to see Jonty and Channy in Cambodia was not a happy reunion. It was a trip planned so that he could say goodbye to one of them.

Three days before arriving in Phnom Penh for the water festival, Cohen and Channy, along with Channy's mother, spent the morning in an 8th century pagoda in Siem Reap, watching as monks conducted an ancient funeral ceremony. They were transferring Jonty Thern's ashes into a marble urn.

Jonty died of liver failure at age 17. Her family claims it was the result of years of alcohol and drug abuse she was subjected to while working first in the nightclubs as a 10-year-old, and then later in the karaoke bars.

"The ashes of my goddaughter are the symbol of why we have to do this. This doesn't have to happen. These girls do not have to be enslaved," Cohen said.

"We tried our best with Jonty and we failed because we lost her. But if there's meaning in her death, the meaning is that there is more work to be done. When I'm in that karaoke now, or when I'm in that massage parlor, she's my little angel. She's watching over me and she's protecting me," he added.

That evening, after watching the festival's fireworks display and saying goodnight to Channy, Cohen strapped an undercover watch camera to his wrist, and went to a karaoke bar.

LOAD-DATE: February 10, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

Copyright 2010 Cable News Network
All Rights Reserved

252 of 404 DOCUMENTS

February 8, 2010 Monday 9:44 AM EST

Man goes undercover to combat child sex slavery

BYLINE: By Leif Coorlim, CNN Producer

SECTION: WORLD

LENGTH: 1213 words

DATELINE: Phnom Penh, Cambodia

Aaron Cohen first met Jonty Thern and her older sister, Channy, in 2005 while singing in a karaoke bar in Battambang, Cambodia. He has come back to see them every year since.

The California native often schedules his trips for November, the month when Cambodians celebrate the Bonn Om Teuk water festival, marking the end of the rainy season.

"The whole country comes together for boat races. Hundreds of thousands of people descend on the waterfront and it's filled with colors and flags," said Cohen. "You know my thoughts about the water festival always include Jonty, because she and her sister would get a day pass during the festival."

There was a smile on his face when he started the sentence, but by the time he had finished, it was gone.

Abolishing slavery

Cohen is a human rights advocate. He founded a charity called AbolishSlavery.org last year, but his work freeing victims of human trafficking began more than a decade ago.

At 6 feet, 5 inches (195 centimeters) with long, black hair, he stands out in almost every crowd. But Cohen often goes undercover to obtain the information needed for law enforcement officials to conduct raids and make arrests.

His trips have taken him around the world, from Sudan to Nicaragua to Israel. But, he says, in Southeast Asia the problem is especially bad.

"I would rank Cambodia right up there with India as one of the worst places in the world for sex-trafficking."

A bad problem getting worse

According to the NGO, End Child Prostitution, Abuse and Trafficking (ECPAT), as many as one-third of all sex workers in Cambodia are children. Government entities, including the U.S. State Department, are pressuring countries like Cambodia to do more to stop the modern-day slavery epidemic.

"We are making major strides in the fight against human trafficking. But it is a major problem, we know that," said Ambassador-at-Large Luis CdeBaca, who leads the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. "You have estimates as to the number of people in servitude worldwide and it's anywhere from 12.3 million on the low end as cited by UN's International Labor Organization -- to as many as 27 million people on the high end. That's a number coming from the research done by (the aid organization) Free the Slaves. But 12.3 million is a baseline number that everybody agrees that there are at least that many people in forced labor, and that's far too many."

In its comprehensive 2009 Trafficking in Persons Report, the State Department put Cambodia on its Tier 2 Watch List. The ranking means the Cambodian government does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, but is making an effort to do so.

"[In Cambodia] the number of victims is increasing and the number of prosecutions has gone down from the previous year," says CdeBaca. "The report shows that despite the overall effort, the government has not shown enough progress in convicting and punishing human trafficking offenders or protecting trafficking victims."

Cambodia is categorized as a destination country for foreign child sex tourists, with increasing reports of Asian men traveling to Cambodia to have sex with underage virgin girls. The State Department report states a significant proportion of trafficking victims in Cambodia are ethnic Vietnamese women and girls who are forced into prostitution in brothels and karaoke bars.

A chance encounter

Jonty Thern's short life could be a case study for that assessment. Jonty's family immigrated to Cambodia from Vietnam shortly after the Vietnam War.

Faced with gripping poverty and a debt, Jonty's mother sold her daughter, who was 10 years old at the time, to a person on Cambodia's border with Thailand.

That person told her mother Jonty would be selling flowers and candy to customers in bars and nightclubs. It was only later, the mother says, that she learned while there, Jonty would be repeatedly raped and beaten.

After three years of physical and sexual abuse, Jonty was released by her captors and allowed to return home to Battambang. Soon after, she and her sister willingly went to work at a karaoke bar to help the family pay off their debt, according to her parents.

The scenario in which Cohen describes meeting Jonty Thern, then 13-years-old, is as appalling as it is prevalent.

"I was working as an undercover sex vice," Cohen said. "I was posing as a sex tourist, going from karaoke bar to karaoke bar, massage parlor to massage parlor, looking for underage workers, to see if I could get them on camera soliciting me for sex."

As evidenced in the State Department report, it is a poorly-kept secret in Cambodia that many of these establishments are also operating brothels.

"I went to a number of karaokes and about my second or third karaoke of the night and I immediately notice this one really young looking girl. I requested Jonty and her sister and a group of other girls," Cohen said.

"In these bars, the girls are told to drink as much as they can, because they'll charge you for the beers. So this girl comes in and I noticed, man, she downed that beer in like two seconds. She seemed to be having a good time, she didn't seem unhappy or anything. But here she is nonetheless, a 13-year-old girl in a brothel drinking 10 beers in the time that I drank two," he added.

He said he invited several friends who work at a nearby victims' shelter to come join him. They posed as partiers as well, until Cohen felt comfortable to ask the manager an important question.

"After the girls began to dance and sing, I asked the mamasan what more can I get besides karaoke and so then she says 'well, for sex it's $50.'"

Cohen used the solicitation video from that night, recorded on a cell phone camera, to provide police with the information they needed to raid the karaoke brothel.

More than a dozen girls, including Jonty and her sister, Channy, were freed that night and sent to live in a victim's shelter, where they received counseling, care and an education.

Final Respects

Cohen's most recent trip to see Jonty and Channy in Cambodia was not a happy reunion. It was a trip planned so that he could say goodbye to one of them.

Three days before arriving in Phnom Penh for the water festival, Cohen and Channy, along with Channy's mother, spent the morning in an 8th century pagoda in Siem Reap, watching as monks conducted an ancient funeral ceremony. They were transferring Jonty Thern's ashes into a marble urn.

Jonty died of liver failure at age 17. Her family claims it was the result of years of alcohol and drug abuse she was subjected to while working first in the nightclubs as a 10-year-old, and then later in the karaoke bars.

"The ashes of my goddaughter are the symbol of why we have to do this. This doesn't have to happen. These girls do not have to be enslaved," Cohen said.

"We tried our best with Jonty and we failed because we lost her. But if there's meaning in her death, the meaning is that there is more work to be done. When I'm in that karaoke now, or when I'm in that massage parlor, she's my little angel. She's watching over me and she's protecting me," he added.

That evening, after watching the festival's fireworks display and saying goodnight to Channy, Cohen strapped an undercover watch camera to his wrist, and went to a karaoke bar.

LOAD-DATE: February 10, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

Copyright 2010 Cable News Network
All Rights Reserved

253 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Right Vision News

February 6, 2010 SaturdayBangladesh: 10,000 workers to return from Oman*LENGTH: 394 wordsDATELINE: Pakistan

Pakistan, Feb. 06 -- Around 10,000 Bangladeshi workers having irregular status in Oman are expected to return home soon taking advantage of the Gulf country's amnesty that first time allowed them to go back to their motherlands without paying any penalties. "Over 2,600 irregular workers have already registered with Bangladesh embassy in Oman. But the total number of such workers wishing to respond to the amnesty may be triple in size," SM Ferdous, charge d'affaires of the Bangladesh embassy, told media yesterday over the phone. The return of Bangladeshis follows the amnesty declared by the Oman's Ministry of Manpower which asks 'illegal workers' to leave the country or update their papers without paying financial penalties or serving jail terms.

The workers must register with their embassies to get the benefits of amnesty, says Dubai based newspaper Gulf News on January 25. This is good news for the irregular workers as they can now return home without paying any penalties, Ferdous said, adding that earlier Oman's such amnesties required a large amount of fines for such workers. Many workers who even have been working for 10-15 years could not dare to respond to the amnesty, he added. According to an official figure, so far some 2.56 lakh Bangladeshis went to the Sultanate in the southeast coast of the Arabian Peninsula. However, a large number of irregular workers have entered Oman after crossing the borders of the United Arab Emirates or Iran, the Bangladesh Embassy official said. The US has put Oman on a blacklist because of human trafficking, SM Ferdous said, adding that Oman therefore framed a strict law last year. If any company provides jobs to any irregular foreign workers, it will have to count heavy penalties, he said. "Therefore, the companies also now will not give shelter to any foreigners having illegal status," Ferdous said, adding that the Bangladeshis living here irregularly are bound to leave for home. Oman, home to 1.05 million foreign workers, is really disciplining the expatriates labour sector, he said. Thousands of Indian and Pakistani workers are also queuing up to their embassies concerned to respond to the amnesty of Oman government, he said. Published by HT Syndication with permission from Right Vision News. For more information on news feed please contact Sarabjit Jagirdar at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: February 5, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: NewspaperCopyright 2010 Right Vision News
All Rights Reserved

254 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Washington Times

January 27, 2010 Wednesday

With 1-child policy, China 'missing' girls; 'Gendercide' fueling sex trade

BYLINE: By Cheryl Wetzstein THE WASHINGTON TIMES

SECTION: A, PAGE ONE; Pg. 1

LENGTH: 1075 words

When Chinese officials created the country's one-child-per-couple policy in 1978, they intended to contain the country's burgeoning population for the sake of economic growth, national security and environmental preservation.

But Chinese boys now outnumber Chinese girls by the millions, and the impact of the lopsided sex imbalance is starting to spill beyond China's borders.

This phenomenon of "missing girls" has turned China into "a giant magnet" for human traffickers, who lure or kidnap women and sell them - even multiple times - into forced marriages or the commercial sex trade, says Ambassador Mark Lagon, who oversaw human rights issues at the State Department during the administration of President George W. Bush.

"The impact is obvious. It's creating a 'Wild West' sex industry in China," Mr. Lagon said.

In China, "an entire nation of women" is missing because they were aborted before they were born, said Reggie Littlejohn, founder of Women's Rights Without Frontiers, a nonprofit anti-sex-slavery group. "This is gendercide."

To grasp the magnitude of the human-trafficking problem in China, it's important to have a reliable tally of the "missing girls."

Recently, the government-backed Chinese Academy of Social Services (CASS) predicted that 24 million Chinese men might not be able to find brides in 2020. However, previous estimates put that number in the 30 million to 50 million range.

In fact, a 2009 study in the BMJ (formerly known as the British Medical Journal) said that in 2005, there were 32 million extra Chinese men under the age of 20 - and that 1.1 million extra males were born in just that year.

"Sex-selective abortion accounts for almost all the excess males," said study authors Wei Xing Zhu, Li Lu and Therese Hesketh, who urged China to enforce its laws forbidding abortions based on gender.

Chinese officials plan to enforce those laws, as well as try to change Chinese "son-preferential ideologies," said a 2007 report from a Chinese academic institute. A "Care for Girls" campaign is already under way in Chinese districts that have especially large imbalances in their sex ratios, Shuzhuo Li, director of the Institute for Population and Development Studies at Xi'an Jiaotong University in China, wrote in that report.

But changing the deeply rooted "son-preference ideologies" will be very difficult.

Chinese parents believe they must have a son to carry their family name, inherit family properties, support them in their old age and host their funeral ceremonies. Tradition says children belong to their father's lineages, and daughters become part of their husband's families.

Because of these ancient beliefs, China's one-child policy forces couples to choose between "their future retirement and the lives of their daughters," said Steven Mosher, president of the Population Research Institute, a nonprofit pro-life group who has been tracking the one-child policy since the late 1980s.

Chinese officials repeatedly reaffirm the one-child policy, but also appear to be tinkering with it.

For instance, last summer, faced with a stunningly anemic 0.88 children per woman birthrate in Shanghai, officials announced that certain couples could have a second child.

But this week, the Beijing News had to back off a similar story for Beijing's couples. The paper had reported that an official with the Beijing family- planning commission said the panel was considering allowing couples to apply for a second birth permit even if only one spouse was an "only" child. Currently, both spouses must be "only" children to get a second permit.

The Beijing News report was swiftly retracted via Xinhua News Agency, a government news agency, which noted that the "journalist who wrote the original false report had already apologized" to the official. A second, unnamed Beijing family-planning official reminded Xinhua that birth-planning is "a fundamental policy" and "requires stability and continuity" to succeed.

Meanwhile, multiple alarm bells are going off about China's demographics.

The massive population is "graying," which means there will be many elderly people with far fewer workers and family members to support them.

There is also the specter of millions of young, unmarried, restless and unfettered Chinese men and how that might explode into civil unrest.

But the most immediate and horrifying consequence of China's "missing girls" is that it is fueling a growing trade in human beings, especially girls and women, say those who are fighting it.

The State Department's 2009 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report downgraded China to its Tier 2 "watch list," because it is a "source, transit, and destination country for men, women and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labor and sexual exploitation."

While women from many countries are being captured or trafficked into China, North Korean women are especially vulnerable. Neither China nor North Korea "seems to want to protect that population," Ambassador Luis CdeBaca, director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, said in June when the TIP report was released.

"China's approach to human trafficking is strictly an iron-fist, law-and-order approach," said Mr. Lagon, who is now the executive director and chief executive of the Polaris Project, a nonprofit organization that fights international sex slavery.

If North Korean women protest or try to flee their forced marriages or prostitution houses, they can be "repatriated" to North Korea, said Mr. Lagon. Upon their return, they are treated like criminals and are likely to be beaten, imprisoned or killed, he said.

Laura Lederer, a former State Department official who now is part of Global Centurion, a nonprofit group fighting sex slavery, said that the sex imbalance in China is leading to a "new tsunami of demand."

"We need to be working on this on the front end," she said, calling for high-level enforcement in anti-trafficking laws.

As for the trafficking victims, Mr. Lagon urged Americans who suspect illegal activities to call the National Human Trafficking Resource Center hot line, which is operated by the Polaris Project.

Sex trafficking is a heinous human rights violation, and people may instinctively want to turn away from the issue, he said. But "it's inspiring" to see how people can escape and survive even the worst situations. "It doesn't have to be a dark subject if you are exposed to those who are fighting for dignity," he said.

LOAD-DATE: January 27, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2010 The Washington Times LLC
All Rights Reserved

255 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Balochistan Times (AsiaNet)

January 20, 2010 Wednesday

Weak legislation behind growing menace of women trafficking in NWFP: Speakers

SECTION: Vol. XXXIV No. 20LENGTH: 332 words

The weak legislation, inadequate resources, lack of political will and institutional fragmentation has been the major barriers in combating women trafficking in NWFP.

These observations were made in the concluding session of the two days capacity building workshop for media persons on 'Countering Women Trafficking' here Wednesday. The workshop was organized by Community Appraisal and Motivation Programme (CAMP) in collaboration with UNDP and GJP.

Speaking on the occasion, Rukhshanda Naz, Chairperson Aurat Foundation said that in 2009 Pakistan did not demonstrate efforts to address the serious issues of bonded labour and other forms of trafficking, such as forced child labour, prostitution and trafficking of migrant workers by fraudulent labour recruiters.

She said that punishments assigned to convicted traffickers were also weak while the government failed to provide protection services to the victims.

Project Manager Human Rights CAMP, Said Afzal Shinwari said that the trafficking of girls from NWFP has risen sharply over the past few harmful traditional practices like bride price or walver which made these women and girls more vulnerable to trafficking.

These harmful traditional practices are also a strong catalyst for localized forms and trends of women trafficking in rural areas, he added.

Mr. Mashood Mirza, Director Federal Ombudsman Office highlighted the thematic and legal aspects of the issue.

He said that due to the dearth of laws and non-implementation of the national plan of action number of women trafficking has increased in recent years putting Pakistan on tier -2 watch list in the Trafficking in Persons (TIP) 2009 report.

At the end of the workshop the participants recommended the formation and strengthening of shelter homes, amendments in P& CHTO 2002, effective implementation of the national plan of action, free legal aid, rehabilitation of the victims, capacity building of the law enforcement agencies and advocacy campaigns at the grass root level.

LOAD-DATE: November 16, 2011LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

256 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Daily the Pak Banker

January 15, 2010 FridayPakistan: CAMP held training for lawyers on counter women trafficking*LENGTH: 405 wordsDATELINE: Pakistan

Pakistan, Jan. 15 -- PESHAWAR, Experts on Friday lamented the non-implementation of relevant laws, lack of social support, harmful traditional practices and lack of awareness among public as leading factors contributing towards growing menace of women trafficking in NWFP. The two-day long workshop for lawyers on 'Countering Women Trafficking' was organized by Community for Appraisal & Motivation Programme (CAMP) with the financial support from the DFID (UK Department for International Development) and UNDP under the Gender Justice and Protection Project (GJP). The workshop aimed at strengthening the capacity and knowledge of lawyers on countering women trafficking techniques. It covered both legal and humanitarian aspects.

The participants were briefed and educated by a panel of experts on the nature, trends, forms, and laws regulating women trafficking in Pakistan. Speaking on the occasion, Mashood Mirza, Director Federal Ombudsman said that the only law dealing with women trafficking is P&CHTO (Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance), which does not address internal trafficking, one of the major sources of trafficking occurring inside the country. Renowned rights activist, Rakhshanda Naz, highlighted the regional aspects of trafficking particularly from a Pakistani perspective and national plan of action. She said that Pakistan did not comply with minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and place it on tier 2 watch list in 2009 TIP (Trafficking in Person) report, the only international report generating annually regarding human trafficking by the US State Department. Project Coordinator for Human Rights CAMP, Siad Afzal Shinwar said that the human trafficking is third largest lucrative illegal business after drug and weapons smuggling generating eight to 10 billion US dollars annually, terming it a major threat to all developmental initiatives around the world. At the end of the workshop participants' recommended effective implementation of the relevant laws, increase number of shelter homes for the victims, panel of lawyers, unified monitoring and evaluation system of victims at national level, sensitization and involvement of media and policy makers, advocacy campaigns and protective cum rehabilitative mechanism for the victims. Published by HT Syndication with permission from Daily Pak Banker. For more information on news feed please contact Sarbjit Jagirdar at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: January 15, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

257 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Daily the Pak Banker

January 13, 2010 Wednesday

Experts flay non implementation of laws countering women trafficking

LENGTH: 378 wordsDATELINE: Pakistan

Pakistan, Jan. 13 -- PESHAWAR Experts lamented non-implementation of the relevant laws, lack of social support, harmful traditional practices and lack of awareness among the general public are leading factors towards the growing menace of women trafficking in NWFP. This was the gist of a two day workshop for lawyers on countering women trafficking, which was organized by the Community Appraisal & Motivation Programme (CAMP) with the support from the DFID and UNDP under the Gender Justice and Protection Project (GJP). The workshop aimed to strengthen the capacity and knowledge of lawyers on countering women trafficking techniques.

The workshop covered both Legal and Humanitarian aspects. Participants were briefed and educated by a panel of experts on the nature, trends, forms, ailing effects and laws regulating woman trafficking in Pakistan. Speaking on the occasion Mashood Mirza, Director Federal Ombudsman said that the only law dealing women trafficking is Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance, which does not address internal trafficking. Human rights activist Ms Rukhshanda Naz, highlighted regional aspects of trafficking. She said in Pakistan minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking are not complied with, which resultantly placed it on tier 2 watch list in 2009 TIP (Trafficking in Person) report, the only international report generating annually regarding human trafficking by the US State Department. Said Afzal Shinwari CAMP, Project coordinator for Human rights said that human trafficking is the third largest lucrative illegal business after drug and weapon smuggling generating 8 to 10 billion US dollars annually, terming it a major threat to all developmental initiatives around the world. At the end of workshop, the participants recommended effective implementation of the relevant laws, increase in number of shelter homes for the victims, panel of lawyers, unified Monitoring & Evaluation (M&E) system of victims at national level, sensitization and involvement of media and policy makers, advocacy campaigns and protective cum rehabilitative mechanism for the victims. Published by HT Syndication with permission from Daily Pak Banker. For more information on news feed please contact Sarabjit Jagirdar at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: January 13, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

South Africa's approach to the global human trafficking crisis: an analysis of the proposed legislation and the prospects of implementation.

SECTION: Pg. 171 Vol. 9 No. 1

LENGTH: 13328 words

I. INTRODUCTION

The worldwide epidemic of trafficking in persons continues to be a global problem each year, (1) despite the creation and ratification in 2000 of the United Nations Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, Supplementing the United Nations Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime ("Protocol" or "U.N. Protocol"). (2) Even with 117 signatories, (3) the Protocol alone is ineffective in curbing the increasing crisis. The responsibility to remedy the problem still lies in the hands of individual countries, (4) which must enact legislation to deal with intrastate issues and work with each other to deal with interstate issues. South Africa is not only a signatory to the Protocol; it ratified the Protocol on February 20, 2004. (5) Despite the country's commitment to eliminating the illegal trafficking of persons, it took the South African Law Reform Commission over four years to draft legislation combating human trafficking.

On November 25, 2008, the South African Law Reform Commission released the final version of the Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill. (6) This proposed legislation was created to

[G]ive effect to the [Protocol]; to address the trafficking of persons within or across the border of the Republic; to in persons; to provide for an persons and other offences associated with trafficking in persons; to provide for measures to protect and assist victims of trafficking in persons; and to provide for matters connected therewith. (7)

The proposed bill was submitted to the Minister of Justice and was later published for public comment after March 31, 2009. (8) The period for public commentary closed on June 15, 2009, and the bill was expected to be presented to Parliament for a year-end vote. (9)

Since the inception of the United States' Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000, (10) the United States annually issues the Trafficking in Persons Report in an attempt to gather and disseminate information about the growing worldwide problem of human trafficking. (11) The United States monitors and evaluates other governments' efforts to combat trafficking using a tier system that determines a state's level of compliance with minimum standards for eliminating the trafficking of persons. First, the Department of State "evaluates whether the government[s] fully compl[y] with the TVPRA's [Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act] minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking." (12) Next, the Department "considers whether governments [have] made significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance." (13) There are four possible tier placements, ranging from full compliance to little or no compliance: Tier 1, Tier 2, Tier 2 Watch List, and Tier 3; Tier 1 represents full compliance. (14)

In the 2005 report, South Africa was removed from Tier 2 and placed on the Tier 2 Watch List. (15) It remained on the Tier 2 Special Watch List from 2005 until 2009. (16) According to the 2008 Report, "[t]he Government of South Africa [did] not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it [was] making significant efforts to do so." (17) Throughout the remainder of 2008 and into 2009, South Africa demonstrated its commitment to the elimination of trafficking in persons, warranting its removal from the Tier 2 Watch List and its return to the Tier 2 List in the 2009 Report. (18)

The enactment of the Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill, combined with proper implementation devices, should be enough to remove South Africa from its current placement on the Tier 2 List, ideally bringing the country up to full compliance with U.S. and international standards for human trafficking. The proposed legislation includes provisions that give full effect to the U.N. Protocol, as well as those that provide for the creation of inter-sectoral task teams throughout the country in order to facilitate its effective implementation. (19) The scope of the proposed legislation, combined with the support of these task teams, should enable South Africa to competently fight human trafficking within and across its borders. The country has numerous reasons (20) to work toward the end goals of eliminating human trafficking and aligning with U.S. and international standards, and it must begin by enacting the proposed legislation.

This Note will first discuss the historical background of trafficking in persons in South Africa. It will then review the legislative measures currently in place in South Africa to prosecute and prevent human trafficking. Next, it will analyze the proposed legislation and assess the likelihood of its effectiveness with regard to the U.N. Protocol and the standards set forth in the United States' TVPRA. Finally, from international methods of implementing the U.N. Protocol, it will draw suggestions for South Africa to most effectively prevent human trafficking within and across its borders, prosecute those who engage in human trafficking, and protect victims. (21)

II. BACKGROUND: HUMAN TRAFFICKING IN SOUTH AFRICA

While trafficking in human beings in South Africa is not new, there has been a rapid increase over the past two decades in the prevalence and documentation of cases. (22) With the growth of globalization, human trafficking worldwide has become "a complex, multi-faceted phenomenon involving multiple stakeholders at the institutional and commercial level." (23) In a country where demand for cheap labor and commercial sex is high, it is no wonder that the black-market business of trafficking in persons has flourished in South Africa. A combination of extreme poverty, poor education, and a lack of employment opportunities "propel[s] vulnerable people into the hands of traffickers." (24)

In the aftermath of apartheid, South Africa has become a "source, transit, and destination country for trafficked men, women, and children." (25) This modern-day form of slavery has become increasingly problematic for South Africans as "[a]rmed conflict and associated dislocation, political and economic upheaval, food insecurity, lack of education and employment opportunities and the blight of the AIDS epidemic make South Africa a magnet that attracts migration from across the continent." (26) As these immigrants are vulnerable and easily susceptible to traffickers, the increase in migration across South Africa's borders correlates with the rise in trafficking. (27) In 2003, the International Organization for Migration ("IOM") published a report on human trafficking in southern Africa. (28) The report notes that male refugees, who make up the vast majority of the growing population of refugees in the region, (29) may turn to conducting human trafficking as a way of easily earning money. (30) The report suggests that "[t]he struggle to survive in South Africa in the face of unemployment and xenophobia pushes some refugee men to pursue opportunities from within the relative security of the clan, which may entail engaging in illegal activities. The trafficking of female family members for sexual exploitation is one such activity." (31) Additionally, criminal syndicates have been implicated as an alternative driving force behind the increase in human trafficking in South Africa. (32)

According to the Southern Africa Counter-Trafficking Assistance Program ("SACTAP"), "South Africa is commonly regarded as the main country of destination for trafficked persons in the region." (33) It further explains that, "[i]n many cases, women and children are lured to South Africa with promises of jobs, education or marriage, only to be sold and sexually exploited in the country's major urban centres, or small towns and more rural environments." (34) According to a 2004 report by South Africa's Independent Newspapers, "every year nearly 900,000 people are smuggled across borders as sex slaves, child labourers and illegal organ donors, with 75 percent of them going through South Africa." (35) Other research suggests that the number of women and children trafficked annually into South Africa for the purpose of sexual exploitation is between 850 and 1,100. (36) Most researchers, however, seem to believe that cases of human trafficking are underreported, and thus feel that the current statistics do not accurately reflect the immensity of the problem. (37) Many factors may play a role in the projected high percentage of incidents of trafficking in persons that go unreported or undiscovered. For instance, under the current legislative regime in South Africa, there are disincentives for victims of human trafficking to turn themselves in, as they may be prosecuted for prostitution or other crimes. (38) Additionally, South Africa's current witness protection program fails to provide complete support and protection for victims and, thus, may also deter human trafficking victims from stepping forward. (39) Researchers also contend that access to victims is difficult as they are hard to identify, "may speak a language that is not native to the country in which they end up, and may be involved in hidden criminal activity." (40)

According to a policy paper published by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization ("UNESCO"), the root causes of human trafficking in South Africa can be broken down into supply and demand factors. (41) Factors that contribute to the supply of victims of human trafficking include "unequal access to education ... lack of legitimate and fulfilling employment opportunities ... sex-selective migration policies and restrictive emigration policies/laws ... less access to information on migration/job opportunities ... disruption of support systems due to natural and human created catastrophes; and traditional attitudes and practices." (42) community

Many factors augment demand, including the increased use of foreign workers in household roles, the growth of the sex and entertainment industries, and the low-risk, high-profit nature of trafficking. (43) Because the business of human trafficking feeds on poverty and despair, it is commonly found in countries, such as South Africa, that lack the general stability and economic resources to combat it.

III. SOUTH AFRICA'S CURRENT LEGISLATIVE SYSTEM FOR HUMAN TRAFFICKING

With the 2010 World Cup--set to be held in South Africa--rapidly approaching, researchers and legislators are growing more concerned about implementing effective legislation to combat the problem of trafficking in persons in South Africa. (44) According to Amanda Ledwaba, Director of Investigations in the Department of Home Affairs, "[t]he pressure is now on the government to pass this legislation as soon as possible." (45) She further stated that "it would also be 'a disaster' if the Act were not introduced before 2010, as sex workers from all over the world would be coming in ahead of 2010 to ply their trade. And the human-traffickers who brought them in would manipulate the women." (46) Pre-World Cup tensions may be one of the driving forces behind the current push for legislation. Additional factors may include: South Africa's constitutional commitment to freedom from slavery; its need to follow through on its international obligations under the U.N. Protocol; and its interest in raising its status on the United States' tier list.

While South Africa has not yet enacted legislation dealing solely with the issue of human trafficking, it has taken a number of steps in that direction. Prior to the release of the proposed Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill, South Africa signed and ratified the United Nations Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime ("Convention") (47) and the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children. (48) South Africa has also signed and ratified a number of international instruments related to trafficking in persons. (49) Despite its commitment to fighting human trafficking, evidenced by the signing and ratification of these agreements, the South African government cannot utilize these international agreements to prosecute human traffickers without first enacting implementing legislation. (50) Without explicit legislation addressing human trafficking, South Africa's National Prosecuting Authority is forced to prosecute human trafficking under various other statutes. (51) In addition to employing criminal statutes, the legislators have amended a number of acts in order to provide minimal coverage of human trafficking issues. (52) While these measures can be used to address some forms of human trafficking, full compliance under the Protocol mandates that each ratifying country implement national legislation that is modeled on the Protocol. (53)

The Children's Act of 2005 (54) is one of the most important acts currently at the disposal of South African prosecutors. Chapter 18 of the Children's Act deals with trafficking in children and was enacted to give effect to the U.N. Protocol as well as to "generally combat trafficking in children." (55) It sets forth a comprehensive definition of trafficking, which broadens the one found in the U.N. Protocol with respect to child trafficking victims. (56) The Act is divided into sections outlining target areas for the increased prevention of human trafficking, prosecution of traffickers, and protection of victims. (57) The proposed legislation for combating trafficking in persons is much more comprehensive in scope than the current text of the Children's Act. (58) While Chapter 18 of the 2005 Children's Act is a solid start to remedying the problem of trafficking in minors, it cannot sufficiently and effectively address all aspects of the growing international crisis in just three pages. (59)

In addition to Chapter 18 of the Children's Act, South Africa's strategy to combat trafficking in persons includes a Sexual Offences Bill. (60) This bill provides another provisional definition of trafficking (61) and was put in place "[p]ending the adoption of legislation in compliance with" the U.N. Protocol. (62)

While the National Prosecuting Authority is currently able to prosecute offenders under only common law (63) or statutory law, (64) South African legislators' recognition of the compelling need to enact comprehensive and all-inclusive legislation addressing the prevention, prohibition, and prosecution of human trafficking demonstrates their continued commitment to combating the problem.

IV. IMPLEMENTING THE U.N. PROTOCOL: THE PREVENTION AND COMBATING OF TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS BILL

In assessing the implementation of South Africa's proposed legislation, it is important to consider the framework upon which it is based--the United Nations Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, Supplementing the United Nations Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime. The Protocol, as discussed below, sets forth an international standard, which its signatories are requested to meet by enacting domestic legislation that provides individualized interstate and intrastate solutions to the global problem of human trafficking.

A. The United Nations Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, Supplementing the United Nations Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime

In 2000, the United Nations enacted the Protocol, which recognizes that effective action to prevent and combat trafficking in persons, especially women and children, requires a comprehensive international approach in the countries of origin, transit and destination that includes measures to prevent such trafficking, to punish the traffickers and to protect the victims of such trafficking, including by protecting their internationally recognized human rights.... (65)

It first sets forth a statement of purpose (66) and defines the terms of art that are utilized throughout the document. (67) The majority of sections begin with the mandate, "each State Party shall," and prescribes the measures that states should implement to best combat trafficking. (68)

While the Protocol proposes a comprehensive international approach to combat human trafficking, it cannot be enforced globally unless the signatories enact domestic legislation. Thus, it functions more as a starting point for those countries that have signed and ratified it, mandating domestic legislation modeled after the Protocol. (69) It is clear from the language of the Protocol that the United Nations views some measures as necessary to combat trafficking, and others as useful, but not essential. (70) Therefore, those nations that enact legislation in compliance with the required sections of the Protocol will have fulfilled their obligations as signatories of the document. (71)

B. South Africa's Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill

On November 25, 2008, the South African Law Reform Commission ("SALRC") submitted the Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill to the then Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development, Mohamed Enver Surty. (72) South Africa's proposed legislation appears to be in full compliance with the standards set forth in the U.N. Protocol. The SALRC's investigation process (73) was accompanied by other responses of the South African government to the increasing prevalence of human trafficking. (74) The Bill was "gazetted," or published, for public comment by the new Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development, Jeffrey Thamsanqa Radebe, in early 2009. (75) The proposed bill contains eleven chapters in which the SALRC sets out legislation for the prevention of trafficking, newly formulated offenses and penalties for traffickers, procedures for identification, protection and compensation of victims, general administrative measures, and a renewed commitment to international cooperation. (76) Additionally, it provides comprehensive definitions of the elements of human trafficking that incorporate and exceed the scope of the definitions set forth in the U.N. Protocol. (77)

The proposed bill complies with the U.N. Protocol by suggesting legislative measures that would establish criminal offenses for trafficking in persons. (78) Once adopted, this legislation will provide the National Prosecuting Authority with a new arsenal of tools with which to prosecute traffickers and almost anyone who has even minimal involvement with the movement of trafficking victims into, out of, and through the Republic. (79)

In compliance with article 6 of the Protocol, the Bill provides for programs to increase public awareness in order to lay a foundation for the prevention of human trafficking. (80) It is important to note that Chapter 6 of the Bill calls on "an accredited organisation" to draw up plans to provide access to such programs and additional assistance. (81) The Bill places a positive obligation on other functioning members of the State to be more involved, and establishes a more cohesive approach to South Africa's fight against trafficking. (82)

Additionally, in accordance with article 9 of the Protocol, the Bill includes statutory measures for the identification and protection of victims of trafficking. (83) It further protects victims of trafficking by specifically prohibiting criminal prosecution of victims in certain circumstances, i.e., if a victim's violation of another statutory or common law provision was a direct result of being trafficked. (84) The Bill also addresses the compensation of victims and the State, (85) deportation and repatriation of victims, (86) and general implementation provisions. (87)

As the period for public comment on the Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill closed on June 15, 2009, the Department of Justice's next step will be to introduce the Bill to the Cabinet for approval and from there, it will be introduced into Parliament. (88) At the press briefing on November 25, 2008, the Minister of Justice projected that the proposed legislation would become law by the end of 2009. (89) While the accuracy of this estimate is dependent on the parliamentary process, the Department of Justice and Constitutional Development is committed to finalizing the process as soon as possible. (90) As of January 2010, the draft bill had not yet been introduced into Parliament for a vote, however, such action is expected in the near future. (91) Further, inter-sectoral task teams on human trafficking are already being set up throughout the country, demonstrating that South Africa is committed to fighting the problem on all fronts. (92)

V. SOUTH AFRICA'S COMPLIANCE WITH U.S. AND INTERNATIONAL STANDARDS

In 2000, the United States enacted the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act ("VTVP Act"). (93) This Act has since been reauthorized and amended in 2003 (94) and 2005. (95) The United States' VTVP Act created minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking globally. (96) In order to assess each country's compliance with these minimum standards, the VTVP Act established seven criteria for consideration. (97) According to the process laid out in the VTVP Act, if a country does not meet the minimum standards, the United States then assesses what efforts the country is making to do so. This determines whether the country is placed in Tier 2 or Tier 3. (98)

In 2001, in response to the passage of the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000, (99) the President of the United States created the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, (100) which publishes the Trafficking in Persons ("TIP") Report, an annual report on trafficking in persons worldwide. These reports recognize the major forms of human trafficking (101) throughout the world and categorize countries in tiers that reflect each country's efforts to combat trafficking. (102) The reports also provide country narratives for each country reviewed, which discuss the current problems, measures being taken, and recommendations for future action in prosecution, protection, and prevention. (103) The TIP Reports suggest a three-pronged approach to ending global human trafficking, focusing on prosecution, protection, and prevention. (104) The reports further provide a succinct definition of human trafficking, which is extrapolated from the U.N. Protocol. (105) The annual TIP Reports are an important part of the global effort to prevent, protect, and prosecute instances of human trafficking because they target non-compliant countries putting pressure on them to focus on domestic problems and solutions for human trafficking.

South Africa remained on the Tier 2 Watch List from 2005 until 2009, and the country report published in the 2009 TIP Report concluded that, while the government does not fully comply with the minimum standards, "it is making significant efforts to do so." (106) South Africa's proposed Bill demonstrates the country's commitment to all three prongs suggested in the TIP Reports. It addresses issues of criminalization and prohibition of trafficking, (107) protection and assistance for trafficking victims, (108) and prevention of trafficking through awareness programs. (109) While these measures were not implemented nor fully functioning by the release of the 2009 TIP Report on June 16, 2009, the report recognized that South Africa had made great strides over the past year toward compliance with international standards for the elimination of trafficking in persons. (110) South Africa's commitment toward implementing successful legislation proved to the United States that it was taking human trafficking seriously. Recognizing this, the United States removed South Africa from the Tier 2 Watch List and placed it back on the Tier 2 list, (111) where it had been prior to 2005. (112) Once the proposed legislation is signed into law and proven effective, South Africa will likely be classified as a Tier 1 country, indicating that its government "fully complies with the Trafficking Victims Protection Act's minimum standards." (113)

VI. THE FUTURE OF HUMAN TRAFFICKING IN SOUTH AFRICA

With the 2010 World Cup on the horizon, it is more important than ever that South Africa stays committed to fighting the phenomenon of trafficking in persons within and across its borders. (114) If the South African government implements the suggestions made by the SALRC in its Report on Trafficking in Persons (115) and codifies the Bill into law, not only will it have aligned itself domestically with U.N. and U.S. schemata, but it will also have made great strides to protect its people against the very real and dangerous threat of human trafficking.

To suggest that South Africa has not been committed to solving this problem prior to the submission of the Bill to the Minister of Justice would be far from accurate. The SALRC has been investigating trafficking in persons since South Africa ratified the U.N. Protocol. South Africa's well-formulated plan of attack addresses each of the three P's of U.S. policy--prevention, prosecution, and protection--and is likely to be effective in all three areas, assuming that all departments called upon in the proposed legislation contribute to the inter-sectoral task team and work together to solve the human trafficking crisis. Particularly in the wake of apartheid, South Africa's commitment to eliminating trafficking in persons into, out of, and through the Republic is essential to the current regime's continued legitimacy. A failure to prosecute and prevent trafficking in persons would be too closely linked to a failure to prevent South Africans from being subject to "slavery, servitude or forced labour," which is specifically prohibited by the Constitution of the Republic. (116) Thus, the only avenue for South Africa is to comply with its international obligations and enact the proposed legislation so that it is binding throughout the Republic.

(1.) See Hillary Rodham Clinton, Secretary of State, Summary of Remarks at the Release of the Ninth Annual Trafficking in Persons Report Alongside Leaders in Congress (June 16, 2009), <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/tiprpt/2009/index.htm> ("The ninth annual Trafficking in Persons Report sheds light on the faces of modern-day slavery and on new facets of this global problem. The human trafficking phenomenon affects virtually every country, including the United States.").

(2.) Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, Supplementing the United Nations Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime, G.A. Res. 55/25, U.N. GAOR, 55th Sess., Annex II (Nov. 15, 2000) [hereinafter Protocol], available at http://www.uncjin.org/Documents/Conventions/dcatoc/final_documents_2/convention_%20traff_eng.pdf.

(3.) United Nations Office on Drugs & Crime [UNODC], Signatories to the CTOC [Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime] Trafficking Protocol, <http://www.unodc.org/unodc/en/treaties/CTOC/countrylist-traffickingprotocol.html> (last visited Aug. 28, 2009).

(4.) See, e.g., Protocol, supra note 2, art. 5 ("Each State Party shall adopt such legislation and other measures as may be necessary to establish as criminal offences the conduct set forth in article 3 of this Protocol, when committed intentionally."). Language requiring state legislative implementation is also used in articles six through thirteen. Id. arts. 6-13 (employing the words, e.g., "each State Party shall").

(5.) South Africa ratified the Protocol, but stated:

[P]ending a decision by the Government of the Republic of South Africa on the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice, the Government of the Republic does not consider itself bound by the terms of Article 15 (2) of the Protocol which provides for the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice in differences arising out of the interpretation or application of the Protocol. The Republic will adhere to the position that, for the submission of a particular dispute for settlement by the International Court, the consent of all the parties to the dispute is required in every individual case.

Signatories to the CTOC Trafficking Protocol, supra note 3.

(6.) South African Law Reform Comm'n, Reports Index, <http://www.doj.gov.za/salrc/reports.htm> (last visited Aug. 28, 2009).

(7.) SOUTH AFRICAN LAW REFORM COMM'N, PROJECT 131: REPORT ON TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS, Annexure D, 2 (2008), http://www.doj.gov.za/salrc/reports/r_par131_trafficking_2008.pdf [hereinafter SA LAW REFORM COMM'N REPORT].

(8.) Nthambeleni Gabara, Human Trafficking Legislation to Be Gazetted for Public Comment, BUA NEWS ONLINE, Mar. 31, 2009, <http://www.buanews.gov.za/news/09/09033111151002>.

(9.) U.S. DEPT OF STATE, TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT 261 (2009), <http://www.state.gov/documents/organization/123357.pdf> [hereinafter 2009 TIP REPORT]. As of January 18, 2010 the draft bill does not yet appear to have been presented to Parliament. See Parliament of the Republic of South Africa, Bills Before Parliament, http://www.parliament.gov.za/live/content.php?Category_ID=72 (last visited Jan. 18, 2010).

(10.) Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act, 22 U.S.C. [section] 7101 (2000) (amended 2003, 2005).

(11.) The Trafficking in Persons Report

is intended to raise global awareness and spur foreign governments to take effective actions to counter all forms of persons--a form of modern-day focused the efforts of a growing community of nations to share information and to partner in new and important ways to fight human trafficking. A country that fails to take significant actions to bring itself into compliance with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking in persons receives a negative "Tier 3" assessment in this Report. Such an assessment could trigger the withholding of non-humanitarian, non-trade-related assistance from the United States to that country.

U.S. DEPT OF STATE, TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT 5 (2005), <http://www.state.gov/documents/organization/47255.pdf> [hereinafter 2005 TIP REPORT].

(12.) Office to Monitor & Combat Trafficking in Persons, Trafficking in Persons Interim Assessment, U.S. DEPT OF STATE, Feb. 1, 2006, <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/rpt/60487.htm> [hereinafter Trafficking in Persons Interim Assessment]. See infra notes 98 and 100 and accompanying text.

(13.) Trafficking in Persons Interim Assessment, supra note 12.

(14.) The tier classification system is defined as follows:

Tier 1: Countries whose governments fully comply with the Act's minimum standards.

Tier 2: Countries whose governments do not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards.

Tier 2 Special Watch List: Countries whose governments do not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards, and:

(a) The absolute number of victims of severe forms of trafficking is very significant or is significantly increasing; or

(b) There is a failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons from the previous year; or

(c) The determination that a country is making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with minimum standards was based on commitments by the country to take additional future steps over the next year.

Tier 3: Countries whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so.

2005 TIP REPORT, supra note 11, at 28.

(15.) Id. at 198-99.

(16.) Id.; U.S. DEPT OF STATE, TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT 46 (2006), <http://www.state.gov/documents/organization/66086.pdf> [hereinafter 2006 TIP REPORT]; U.S. DEPT OF STATE, TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT 42 (2007), <http://www.state.gov/documents/organization/82902.pdf> [hereinafter 2007 TIP REPORT]; U.S. DEPT OF STATE, TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT 44 (2008),

<http://www.state.gov/documents/organization/105501.pdf> [hereinafter 2008 TIP REPORT]; 2009 TIP REPORT, supra note 9, at 50.

(17.) 2008 TIP REPORT, supra note 16, at 228.

(18.) 2009 TIP REPORT, supra note 9, at 50.

(19.) See generally SA LAW REFORM COMM'N REPORT, supra note 7, Annexure D.

(20.) These reasons include: the fast-approaching Federation Internationale de Football Association ("FIFA") World Cup that is sure to spark an influx of tourism of all kinds; South Africa's constitutional commitment to protect its citizens from slavery; South Africa's signing and ratification of the U.N. Protocol; and South Africa's demotion to Tier 2 Watch List status in 2005 by the United States in the annual Trafficking in Persons Reports, though this particular issues has been partially remedied already by South Africa's significant efforts in the past year, which warranted its removal from the watch list and its placement on the Tier 2 list in the 2009 TIP Report.

(21.)

The United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC) describes victims as "young girls sold by their families; children drugged and forced to fight as soldiers; men bonded/chained in labor on mines and farms; women enslaved in quarries and households; women and girls trapped in the sex trade; boys forced to fish in dangerous waters--all of them people, human beings, coerced to do what others would never freely do, paid virtually nothing for their pains."

International Trafficking in Persons: Taking Action to Eliminate Modern Day Slavery: Hearing Before the H. Comm. on Foreign Affairs, 110th Cong. 39 (2007) (statement of Rev. Monsignor Franklyn M. Casale, President, St. Thomas University, Miami, Florida) (footnote omitted).

(22.) This increase in the perceived prevalence and documentation may come from the heightened interest of the human interest group Molo Songololo in South Africa and the International Organization for Migration ("IOM"). A 2008 article published by the Integrated Regional Information Networks stated, "Official statistics are not available and 'reports on the trade in South Africa draw almost entirely on three pieces of primary research': two reports compiled in 2000 by the children's advocacy group, Molo Songololo, and a 2003 study by the IOM, but only the IOM study attempted to ascertain the numbers involved." Integrated Regional Information Networks (IRIN), South Africa: How Heavy Is Human Trafficking?, Sept. 8, 2008, <http://www.unhcr.org/refworld/docid/48eeld5ele.html>. However, the article further recognized that human trafficking has become a prevalent and lucrative economic threat:

The IOM contends that global human trafficking is worth between US $7 billion and $12 billion dollars annually, making it the third most lucrative trades, although "in contrast to these other criminal activities, however, the penalties for human trafficking in most countries are much less severe, or non-existent."

Id.

(23.) U.N. Educ., Scientific & Cultural Org. [UNESCO], Policy Paper No. 14.5(E): Human Trafficking in South Africa: Root Causes and Recommendations, at 7, SHS/CCT/2007/P1/H/6 (2007), available at <http://unesdoc.unesco.org/images/0015/001528/152823e.pdf> [hereinafter Root Causes and Recommendations].

(24.) Id.

(25.) 2008 TIP REPORT, supra note 16, at 227.

(26.) Root Causes and Recommendations, supra note 23, at 7.

(27.) "Traditional migration patterns of labour to South Africa from surrounding states, the practice of children being loaned/sent to better-situated family members to be raised; and casual border procedures contribute to acceptance and expectations of unregulated cross-border movement." Id. at 11. See also JONATHAN MARTENS, MACIEJ PIEC-ZKOWSKI & BERNADETTE VAN VUUREN-SMYTH, INT'L ORG. FOR MIGRATION (IOM), SEDUCTION, SALE AND SLAVERY: TRAFFICKING IN WOMEN & CHILDREN FOR SEXUAL EXPLOITATION IN SOUTHERN AFRICA 21 (May 2003) (suggesting that "[m]obile populations are always more vulnerable to exploitation than stable populations").

(28.) MARTENS, supra note 27, at 133.

(29.) At the time the IOM report was published, the population of refugees stood at 23,000. Id. at 21. Ninety-five percent of the refugee population was male. Id. at 23.

(30.) "The sexual exploitation of women, as a means of earning an income, soon becomes an attractive and viable option for some refugee men, particularly those living in cities where there is an obviously profitable sex industry." Id. at 24.

(31.) Id. at 33.

(32.) "Traffickers operating in South Africa include Nigerian networks, Chinese triads, Russian and Bulgarian mafia and various groups of organised criminal syndicates." Yazeed Kamaldien, International Women's Day: South Africa Linked in the Global Human Trafficking, INTER PRESS SERVICE NEWS AGENCY, Mar. 8, 2005, <http://ipsnews.net/africa/nota.asp?idnews=27772>.

In the past, victims had typically been runaways who fell prey to city pimps, but now crime syndicates recruit victims from rural towns.

East for domestic servitude and sexual exploitation. Nigerian syndicates have reportedly begun moving trafficked women from South Africa to the U.S. as well for African migrant clients there.

See 2009 TIP REPORT, supra note 9, at 260.

(33.) IRIN, supra note 22.

(34.) Id.

In most cases, women and children are lured with promises of employment or educational opportunities abroad; offers made appealing and credible within the context of historical migration patterns in the region which flow southwards to the relative prosperity of South Africa, or northwards to Europe. Only sometimes are their situations absolutely desperate.... Their sexual exploitation is facilitated largely by their relocation from a place with which they are familiar to one with which they are not.

MARTENS, supra note 27, at 123-24.

(35.) IRIN, supra note 22.

(36.) Id.

(37.) According to Karen Blackman, a spokesperson for the IOM's Southern Africa Counter-Trafficking Assistance Program ("SACTAP"), "[t]he clandestine nature of human trafficking makes the scale of the illicit industry difficult to assess and there are few reliable statistics on the number of persons trafficked in the southern African region." Id.

38. MARTENS, supra note 27, at 133.

When identified by police in South Africa, victims of trafficking are deported as illegal immigrants without being questioned about their experiences. Victims are afraid of law enforcement, and do not trust police to assist them. [In addition,] South Africa has no public services specifically designed to assist victims of trafficking.

Id. at 125.

(39.) South Africa passed the Witness Protection Act of 1998, which created the Office of Witness Protection and established protocol to be followed with respect to the protection of witnesses. Witness Protection Act 112 of 1998. There are a number of holes in this piece of legislation, including a failure to place a limit on how long the witness protection program may run, a failure to discuss what happens after testimony is given by a witness, and any explanation of whether there is a structure in place to take care of witnesses for the long term. See id.

(40.) IRIN, supra note 22. The language problem may be particularly enhanced in South Africa as it has eleven official languages. S. AFR. CONST. 1996 s. 6(1).

(41.) Root Causes and Recommendations, supra note 23, at 32.

(42.) Id. at 32-33. Additional supply factors are categorized as poverty, HIV and AIDS, gender and age imbalances, discriminatory cultural practices and beliefs, lack of knowledge and information, and absence of effective laws. Id. at 34-38.

(43.)

[T]he increasing demand for foreign workers for domestic and care-giving roles, and lack of adequate regulatory frameworks to support this; the growth of the billion-dollar sex and entertainment industry, tolerated as a "necessary evil" while women in prostitution are criminalized and discriminated against; the low risk-high profit nature of trafficking encouraged by a lack of will on the part of enforcement agencies to prosecute traffickers (which includes owners/managers of institutions into which persons are trafficked); the ease in controlling and manipulating vulnerable women; lack of access to legal redress or remedies, for victims of traffickers; and devaluation of women and children's human rights.

Id. at 32. Additional demand factors are categorized as "[n]eed for low-skilled and cheap labor, [c]ultural beliefs, [s]ex tourism and industry, [a]doption trade, [d]emand for organs and body-parts, [and] [n]eed for children-soldiers in armed conflict." Id. at 38.

(44.) Frederico Links, Human Trafficking and Prostitution to Surge Ahead of 2010 World Cup, NAMIBIAN, Sept. 2, 2008, [http://www.namibian.com.na/index.php?id=28&tx_ttnews\[tt_news\]=51243&no_cache=1](http://www.namibian.com.na/index.php?id=28&tx_ttnews[tt_news]=51243&no_cache=1).

(45.) Barbara Cole, Human Trafficking Must Be Addressed Now, DAILY NEWS (Durban), Sept. 12, 2008, at 5, available at http://www.iol.co.za/index.php?set_id=1&click_id=13&art_id=vn20080912_113400769C601405 (quoting Amanda Ledwaba at a workshop on human trafficking in Durban, South Africa in September 2008).

(46.) Id. See also Katherine L. Morrow, Comment, Soccer, Sex and Slavery: Human Trafficking in the World Cup, 17 TUL. J. INT'L & COMP. L. 243 (2008) (analyzing the estimate that 40,000 women would have been trafficked into Germany prior to its hosting of the 2006 World Cup but for the implementation of preventive and protective measures).

(47.) U.N. Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime [UNTOC], G.A. Res. 55/25, U.N. Doc. A/RES/55/25 (Jan. 8, 2001).

(48.) The Protocol was created in 2000 to supplement the Convention. Protocol, supra note 2. The Convention came into operation on September 29, 2003 and the Protocol came into operation on December 25, 2003. See South African Government Information, Human Trafficking Strategy, <http://www.info.gov.za/issues/humantrafficking/strategy.htm> (last visited on Jan. 11, 2010) [hereinafter Human Trafficking Strategy].

(49.) These include: the Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Persons and of the Exploitation of the Prostitution of Others (1949, signed in 1950, ratified in 1951); the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women (1979, signed in 1993, ratified in 1996); and the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (2002, signed in 1998, ratified in 2000). South Africa has ratified other legal instruments including: the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination Against Women (1999, ratified in 2005); the Hague Convention no.33 on Protection of Children and Cooperation in Respect of Intercountry Adoption (1993, ratified in 2003); the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the Sale of Children, Child Prostitution and Child Pornography (2000, ratified in 2003); the 1989 U.N. Convention on the Rights of the Child (ratified in 1995); the ILO Convention No. 182 on the Worst Forms of Child Labour (1999, ratified in 2000). Root Causes and Recommendations, supra note 23, at 41-42.

(50.) Section 231(2) of South Africa's Constitution states that an international agreement binds the republic when it is enacted into law through national legislation. S. AFR. CONST. 1996 s. 231 (2).

(51.) The available legislative means include

the Sexual Offences Act 23 of 1957, the Child Care Act 74 of 1983, as amended, the of and Combatting of Corrupt Activities Act 12 of 2004, the Immigration Act 13 of 2002, as amended, the Films and Publications Act 65 of 1996, as amended, the Corruption Act 94 of 1992, the Intimidation Act 72 of 1982 and the Riotous Assemblies Act 17 of 1956.

Human Trafficking Strategy, supra note 48. "The absence of legislation specific to human trafficking limits prosecutors to dealing only with the perpetrator directly linked to the offences resulting from the trafficking of the victim, to the exclusion of the perpetrators behind the scenes, as this is often an organized crime activity." Id.

(52.) These additions include: Chapter 18 of the Children's Act [Children's Act 38 of 2005 ss. 281-291]; Section 50(A) of the Child Care Act [Child Care Act 74 of 1983 s. 50(A)], and Chapter 5 of the Criminal Law (Sexual Offences) Amendment Bill [Criminal Law (Sexual Offences) Amendment Bill, 2003, Bill 50-2003]. Root Causes and Recommendations, supra note 23, at 45-48.

(53.)

[The Protocol] mandates that States Parties take the necessary measures not only to criminalize the also to trafficking, and promote international cooperation to combat the problem of trafficking. Thus, the Protocol provides a "comprehensive international approach" to combating trafficking, which surpasses the earlier international trafficking prohibitions....

Mohamed Y. Mattar, Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, in Countries of the Middle East: The Scope of the Problem and the Appropriate Legislative Responses, 26 FORDHAM INT'L L.J. 721, 722 (2003) (internal citations omitted).

(54.) Children's Act 38 of 2005.

(55.) Children's Act 38 of 2005 s. 281(b). The Act further states: "The UN Protocol to Prevent Trafficking in Persons is in force in the Republic and its provisions are law in the Republic, subject to the provisions of this Act." Id. s. 282.

(56.)

"[T]rafficking", in relation to a child--(a) means the recruitment, sale, supply, transportation, transfer, harbouring or receipt of children, within or across the borders of the Republic--(i) by any means, including the use of threat, force or other forms of coercion, abduction, fraud, deception, abuse of power or the giving or receiving of payments or benefits to achieve the consent of a person having control of a child; or (ii) due to a position of vulnerability, for the purpose of exploitation; and (b) includes the adoption of a child facilitated or secured through illegal means....

Children's Act 38 of 2005 s. 1 at "trafficking."

(57.) These target areas include: international co-operation, prohibition of trafficking in children, prohibition of behavior facilitating trafficking in children, providing assistance to children who are victims of trafficking, parental trafficking of children, protocols for reporting instances of child victimization, and treatment and repatriation of victims of human trafficking. See Children's Act 38 of 2005 ss. 281-291.

(58.) The draft version of the Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill, as submitted to the Minister of Justice on November 25, 2008, is forty-five pages long and is divided into eleven chapters that attempt to create lasting definitions of the various offenses that may be prosecuted via this legislation. SA LAW REFORM COMM'N REPORT, supra note 7, Annexure D.

(59.) Chapter 18 of the Children's Act of 2005 dealing with trafficking in children spans pages numbered 144 through 148, which is only three pages of actual text in the Act, as compared to the much more comprehensive proposed human trafficking legislation, which is forty-five pages. Compare Children's Act 38 of 2005 ss. 281-291, with SA LAW REFORM COMM'N REPORT, supra note 7, Annexure D.

(60.) Criminal Law (Sexual Offences and Related Matters) Amendment Bill, 2003, Bill 50-2003 [hereinafter Sexual Offenses Amendment Bill].

(61.) Trafficking is defined to include the supply, recruitment, procurement, capture, removal, transportation, transfer, harbouring, sale, disposal or receiving of a person, within or across the borders of the Republic, by means of--(a) threat of harm; (b) the threat or use of force, intimidation or other forms of coercion; (c) abduction; (d) fraud; (e) deception or false pretenses; (f) the abuse of power or of a position of vulnerability, to the extent that the complainant is inhibited from indicating his or her unwillingness or resistance to being trafficked, or unwillingness to participate in such an act; or (g) the giving or receiving of payments or benefits, for the purpose of any form or manner of exploitation, grooming or abuse of a sexual nature of such person, including the commission of any sexual offence or any offence of a sexual nature in any other law against such person or performing any sexual act with such person, whether committed in or outside the borders of the Republic.

Sexual Offenses Amendment Bill, supra note 60, s. 70(2)(b).

(62.) Id. at 40. See SA LAW REFORM COMM'N REPORT, supra note 7, at 14 (concluding that "[p]ending the promulgation of comprehensive legislation on trafficking in persons, the Criminal Law (Sexual Offences and Related Matters) Amendment Act is the most appropriate legislation to charge those who traffick persons for purposes of sexual exploitation").

(63.) "[D]epending on the circumstances of each case, such persons could be charged with kidnapping, common assault, assault with intent to cause grievous bodily harm, extortion, slavery, attempted murder and murder." SA LAW REFORM COMM'N REPORT, supra note 7, at 14.

(64.)

Statutory offences are provided for in the Sexual Offences Act [23 of 1957], the Riotous Assemblies Act [17 of 1956], the Immigration Act [13 of 2002], the Basic Conditions of Employment Act [75 of 1997], the Intimidation Act [72 of 1982], the Domestic Violence Act [116 of 1998] and the Prevention of Organised Crime Act [121 of 1998].

Id.

(65.) Protocol, supra note 2, pmbl.

(66.)

The purposes of this Protocol are: (a) To prevent and combat trafficking in persons, paying particular attention to women and children; (b) To protect and assist the victims of such trafficking, with full respect for their human rights; and (c) To promote cooperation among States Parties in order to meet those objectives. Protocol, supra note 2, art. 2.

(67.)

"Trafficking in persons" shall mean the recruitment, transportation, transfer, harbouring or receipt of persons, by means of the threat or use of force or other forms of coercion, of abduction, of fraud, of deception, of the abuse of power or of a position of vulnerability or of the giving or receiving of payments or benefits to achieve the consent of a person having control over another person, for the purpose of exploitation. Exploitation shall include, at a minimum, the exploitation of the prostitution of others or other forms of sexual exploitation, forced labour or services, slavery or practices similar to slavery, servitude or the removal of organs....

Protocol, supra note 2, art. 3.

(68.) See, e.g., Protocol, supra note 2, arts. 5-6.

(69.) See Mattar, supra note 53. Additionally, "[a]ny anti-trafficking legislation must comply with the international mandate of the Protocol." Id. at 758.

(70.) Compare Protocol, supra note 2, art. 5 ("[e]ach State Party shall adopt such legislative and other measures as may be necessary to establish as criminal offences the conduct set forth in article 3 of this Protocol, when committed intentionally"), with Protocol, supra note 2, art. 7 ("each State Party shall consider adopting legislative or other appropriate measures that permit victims of trafficking in persons to remain in its territory, temporarily or permanently, in appropriate cases"). This difference in language suggests that the Protocol drafters believe that defining a criminal offense is necessary to combat trafficking in persons, but do not believe that countries must allow victims to remain in the country into which they have been trafficked.

(71.) South Africa has both signed and ratified the Protocol. According to section 231 of the South African Constitution:

An international agreement binds the Republic only after it has been approved by resolution in both the National Assembly and the National Council of Provinces, unless ... [it is] [a]n international agreement of a technical, administrative or executive nature, or an agreement which does not require either ratification or accession, entered into by the national executive.

S. AFR. CONST. 1996 s. 231(2)-(3). South Africa's signature and ratification of the Protocol "has placed an obligation on the government to bring its domestic laws and policies in line with the standards set by these instruments." SA LAW REFORM COMM'N REPORT, supra note 7, at 4.

(72.) SALRC Submits Reports on Trafficking and Stalking Amongst Others, JUSTICE TODAY (Dep't of Justice & Constitutional Dev., Republic of South Africa), Nov./Dec. 2008, at 6, available at http://www.doj.gov.za/newsletter/JT/JT2008_Vol%206.pdf.

(73.) See infra note 115. The SALRC first created an Issue Paper with a closing deadline for comment of April 30, 2004 to "serve as a basis for the Commission's deliberations, to elicit comment and suggestions from relevant stakeholders and to disseminate information on the issue of trafficking in persons to the public at large." SOUTH AFRICAN LAW REVIEW COMM'N, ISSUE PAPER 25, PROJECT 131: TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS, at iii (2004), http://www.doj.gov.za/salrc/ipapers/ip25_prj131_2004.pdf. Following up on the Issue Paper, the SALRC published a Discussion Paper with a comment submission deadline of June 30, 2006. SOUTH AFRICAN LAW REFORM COMM'N, DISCUSSION PAPER 111, PROJECT 131: TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS, at iii (2004), <http://www.doj.gov.za/salrc/dp111.pdf>. Finally, the SALRC published its official Report, which included the Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill, on November 25, 2008. South African Law Reform Comm'n, Reports Index, supra note 6.

(74.) According to the South African government website, the government has created a "human trafficking strategy" in order to coordinate South Africa's response to trafficking in persons. Aside from the SALRC's investigation, the government established a "Human Trafficking Desk within the Organised Crime Unit at the South African Police Service (SAPS)." Human Trafficking Strategy, supra note 48.

Additionally, "[t]he presidential mandate of the SOCA [Sexual Offences and Community Affairs] Unit is to deal efficiently and effectively with sexual offences," and as such, SOCA has been tasked with the "[e]stablishment of an inter-sectoral Task Team to commence a process of coordination and refinement of activities towards the development of a multi-sectoral and comprehensive strategy." Id.

In the interest of inclusiveness, the following organizations and respective internal departments were elected to the Task Team: SAPS (the Human Trafficking Desk, Organised Crime Unit; Ports of Entry Policing); Department of Justice & Constitutional Development (Legislative Directorate); Department of Home Affairs (International Affairs); International Organisation for Migration; Department of Social Development; Department of Labour; Molo Songololo; United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime. "The Task Team identified six pillars of a national strategy to effectively address trafficking in persons, as an instance of organised crime: Information, Capacity-Building & Development, Victim Assistance & Integration, Policy & Legislation Development, Liaison & Consulation as well as Monitoring & Evaluation." Id. See also Malebo Kotu-Rammopo, National Prosecuting Authority, South Africa's Strategy to Counter Human Trafficking: Media Briefing Session (Aug. 13, 2008), <http://www.npa.gov.za/UploadedFiles/HUMAN%20TRAFFICKING%20PROGRAMME%20Media%2013%20Aug%202008.ppt>.

(75.) See General Notice, Dep't of Justice & Constitutional Dev., Publication of Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill (2009), available at http://www.justice.gov.za/legislation/invitations/20090508_EnglishTIP.pdf.

(76.) SA LAW REFORM COMM'N REPORT, supra note 7, Annexure D. The first chapter of the Bill includes a definitional section as well as an outline of the proposed legislation's objectives. Id.

(77.) The Bill defines trafficking as the recruitment, sale, supply, procurement, transportation, transfer, harbouring, receipt of persons or the adoption of a child facilitated or secured through legal or illegal means, within or across the borders of the Republic--

(a) by means of the use of threat, force, intimidation or other forms of coercion, abduction, kidnapping, fraud, deception, debt bondage, abuse of power or the giving or receiving of payments or benefits to achieve the consent of a person having control or authority over another person; or

(b) by abusing vulnerability.

Id. at 11. The Bill further defines exploitation in much greater detail than does the U.N. Protocol.

"[E]xploitation" includes, but is not limited to--(a) all forms of or practices similar to labour as defined in section 1 of the Children's Act, 2005 (Act No. 38 of 2005); (g) the removal of body parts; and (h) the impregnation of a female person against her will for the purpose of selling her child when born.

Id. at 9.

(78.) Chapter 3 of the Bill introduces offenses and penalties, making it a crime to intentionally traffic another human being. Id. at 13. In a footnote to the Bill, the SALRC explains:

Schedule 1 to this Bill amends the Criminal Law Amendment Act 105 of 1997 by including the Schedule 2, Part 1 of that Act. This means that a regional court or a High Court may sentence a person it has convicted of the offence of trafficking in persons to imprisonment for life.

Id. at 13.

(79.) The Bill establishes penalties for trafficking in persons; engaging in conduct that causes another person to enter into debt bondage; destroying, confiscating, possessing or concealing documents; using the services of, or intentionally benefitting from, a victim of trafficking; any conduct that facilitates trafficking in persons; and carrying victims of trafficking into or out of the Republic--with some restrictions. Id. at 13-17. The Bill further provides that a court of the Republic may exert jurisdiction outside of the Republic if the person to be charged

(a) is a citizen of the Republic; (b) is ordinarily resident in the Republic; (c) has committed the offence against a citizen of the Republic or a person who is ordinarily resident in the Republic; (d) is, after the commission of the offence, present in the territory of the Republic, or in its territorial waters or on board a ship or aircraft registered or required to be registered in the Republic; (e) is, for any reason, not extradited by the Republic or if there is no application to extradite that person; or (f) is a juristic person or a partnership in terms of any law in the Republic.

Id. at 17.

(80.)

Each State Party shall ensure that its domestic legal or administrative system contains measures that provide to victims of

in persons, in appropriate cases: (a) Information on relevant court and administrative proceedings; (b) Assistance to enable their views and concerns to be presented and considered at appropriate stages of criminal proceedings against offenders, in a manner not prejudicial to the rights of the defence.

Protocol, supra note 2, art. 6, [section] 2.

Chapter 4 of the Bill deals with the identification and protection of victims of trafficking, including how to report and refer both child and adult victims of trafficking to the correct authorities to ensure their safety. The chapter further provides specific measures to be taken to aid a child trafficking victim and provide health care to victims. See SA LAW REFORM COMM'N REPORT, supra note 7, Annexure D, at 18-21.

Additionally, Chapter 5 of the Bill addresses the status of foreign victims of trafficking by providing a recovery and reflection period, temporary residency, and possible permanent residency. Id. at 21-24. Chapter 6 further elaborates on the available services for adult victims of trafficking. It includes a list of the minimum norms and standards that must be provided to such victims and a description of programs that must be offered by accredited organizations in the Republic for accommodations, counseling, rehabilitation, and reintegration for adult victims. Id. at 24-27.

(81.) Chapter 6 of the Bill places an obligation on "an accredited organisation" to offer specified programs, draw up plans "to address the immediate and long term needs of a person who has been certified as a victim of trafficking," and manage and collect information on victims of trafficking. Id. at 25-26. Whether this will be effective will depend on the organization tasked with these obligations. Because the SALRC did not name a specific organization in this draft, the choice is likely to be left to the Minister of Justice or to Parliament.

(82.) For example, in Chapter 10 Section 40 the proposed bill calls for the establishment of an Inter-sectoral Committee, which it calls on in Chapter 2 Section 3 to "establish public awareness programmes or other measures for the prevention of trafficking in persons." See id. at 12, 39-40. The proposed legislation also calls on the help of immigration officials, labour inspectors, social workers, social service professionals, doctors, nurses and healers to report all instances where they have "reasonable grounds" to conclude that an adult person is a victim of trafficking. See id. at 19.

(83.) "States Parties shall establish comprehensive policies, programmes and other measures: (a) To prevent and combat trafficking in persons; and (b) To protect victims of trafficking in persons, especially women and children, from revictimization." Protocol, supra note 2, art. 9.

Chapter 2 of the Bill is aimed at preventing trafficking in persons and sets forth measures to increase public awareness. It mandates that the Inter-sectoral Committee:

[E]stablish public awareness programmes or other measures for the of educate members of the public, especially those who are vulnerable or at risk of becoming victims of trafficking, foreigners who apply for South African visas who may be victims of trafficking, and South African citizens or permanent residents who depart for work abroad, on issues relating to trafficking in persons ... (b) inform and educate victims of trafficking on--(i) their rights as victims;
 (ii) legal or other measures in place to ensure their safety, recovery and repatriation; and (iii) organisations, institutions or law enforcement agencies that may be approached for assistance or information; (c) discourage the demand for and the supply of victims of trafficking that fosters the exploitation of such victims, especially women and children.

SA LAW REFORM COMM'N REPORT, supra note 7, Annexure D, at 12.

(84.)

No criminal prosecution shall be instituted against a child who was found to be a victim of trafficking after an investigation in terms of section 110(5)(c) of the Children's Amendment Act, 2007 (Act No. 41 of 2007), or an adult person who has been certified as a victim of trafficking in terms of section 12(6)(a) for--

(a) entering or remaining in the Republic in contravention of the Immigration Act, 2002 (Act No. 13 of 2002);

(b) assisting another person to enter or remain in the Republic in contravention of the Immigration Act, 2002 (Act No. 13 of 2002);

(c) possessing any fabricated or falsified passport, identity document or other document used for the facilitation of movement across borders; and

(d) being involved in an illegal activity to the extent that he or she has been compelled to do so, as a direct result of his or her situation as a victim of trafficking. Id., Annexure D, at 21.

(85.) Id., Annexure D, at 27-30.

(86.) Id., Annexure D, at 30-33.

(87.) These provisions include measures for dealing with trafficking by a parent, guardian, or other person who has parental responsibilities and rights for international co-operation, general directions for implementation and procedures that must be followed. Id., Annexure D, at 33-39. The Bill further provides for the establishment of an Inter-Sectoral Committee, sets forth who will comprise this committee, and what its functions will be with respect to solving the crisis of human trafficking. Id., Annexure D, at 39-42.

(88.) South Africa's legislative process involves a number of steps. The preparation of draft legislation requires the "investigation and evaluation of the legislative proposals ... and consultation with interested parties." Dep't of Justice & Constitutional Dev., The Legislative Process, <http://www.doj.gov.za/legislation/legprocess.htm> (last visited Aug. 29, 2009). The majority of South Africa's bills are prepared by a government organization under the direction of a Minister or Deputy Minister. Once the Minister signs off on the proposed legislation, it is submitted to the Cabinet along with a Cabinet memorandum for approval. After such approval has been granted, the Minister "must submit a copy of the draft Bill to the Speaker of the National Assembly and the Chairperson of the National Council of Provinces. However, before a Bill can be formally submitted to Parliament the State Law Advisers must be approached to certify the draft Bill." Id. This step ensures that the bill is in line with current South African law. Once approved, the bill is formally introduced into Parliament and, if passed, referred to the President to be signed into law. Id.; see also S. AFR. CONST. 1996 ss. 73, 82.

(89.) E-mail from Lowesa Stuurman, Researcher, SA Law Reform Comm'n, to Laura Najemy, J.D. Candidate, Washington University in St. Louis School of Law (Dec. 5, 2008, 05:35 CST) (on file with author).

(90.) Id.

(91.) E-mail from Gaile Moosmann, Executive Director, Parliamentary Monitoring Group, to Laura Najemy, J.D. Candidate, Washington University in St. Louis School of Law (Jan. 12, 2010, 03:38 CST) (on file with author).

(92.) The National Prosecuting Authority spearheaded an inter-sectoral task team on human trafficking in the Kwa-Zulu Natal province that has already proved successful. The Kwa-Zulu Natal province has seen a decrease in the number of brothels in Durban Central because of an increase in police activity in the area according to Police Superintendent Anton Booysen of the Kwa-Zulu Natal Human Trafficking, Prostitution, Pornography and Brothels Task Team. Kamin Padayachee, Battle to Control Brothels in Suburbs, MERCURY, Aug. 28, 2009, http://www.iol.co.za/index.php?set_id=1&click_id=2937&art_id=vn20090828042540710C294076. Additionally, international organizations have been influential in creating task teams to combat human trafficking in South Africa. The International Organization for Migration launched the Western Cape Provincial Task Team, South Africa's "first provincial civil society initiative against human trafficking," in 2008. SA: Western Cape Provincial Task Team on Human Trafficking Launched, EYE ON HUMAN TRAFFICKING: A BULLETIN OF NEWS, INFORMATION AND ANALYSIS ON TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS IN SOUTHERN AFRICA (International Organization for Migration, Pretoria, South Africa), Issue 17, 2008, at 6, available at http://iom.org.za/site/index.php?option=com_docman&task=doc_view&gid=101.

(93.) Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act, 22 U.S.C. [section] 7101 (2000) (amended 2003, 2005). The VTVPA Act was originally intended for three main purposes: "to combat trafficking in persons, a contemporary manifestation of slavery whose victims are predominantly women and children, to ensure just and effective punishment of traffickers, and to protect their victims." [section] 7101(a).

(94.) Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2003, H.R. 2620, 108th Cong. (2003).

(95.) Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2005, H.R. 972, 109th Cong. (2005).

(96.)

Minimum Standards--For purposes of this chapter, the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking applicable to the government of a country of origin, transit, or destination for a significant number of victims of severe forms of trafficking are the following:

- (1) The government of the country should prohibit severe forms of trafficking in persons and punish acts of such trafficking.
- (2) For the knowing commission of any act of sex trafficking involving force, fraud, coercion, or in which the victim of sex trafficking is a child incapable of giving meaningful consent, or of trafficking which includes rape or kidnapping or which causes a death, the government of the country should prescribe punishment commensurate with that for grave crimes, such as forcible sexual assault.
- (3) For the knowing commission of any act of a severe form of trafficking in persons, the government of the country should prescribe punishment that is sufficiently stringent to deter and that adequately reflects the heinous nature of the offense.
- (4) The government of the country should make serious and sustained efforts to eliminate severe forms of trafficking in persons. VTVP Act [section] 7106(a).

(97.) The Act also sets out seven criteria that "should be considered" as indicia of the fourth point above, "serious and sustained efforts to eliminate trafficking." VTVP Act [section] 7106(a)(4), (b). Summarized, they are:

1. Whether the government vigorously investigates and prosecutes acts of trafficking within its territory.
2. Whether the government protects victims of trafficking, encourages victims' assistance in investigation and prosecution, provides victims with legal alternatives to their removal to countries where they would face retribution or hardship, and ensures that victims are not inappropriately penalized solely for unlawful acts as a direct result of being trafficked.
3. Whether the government has adopted measures, such as public education, to prevent trafficking.
4. Whether the government cooperates with other governments in investigating and prosecuting trafficking.
5. Whether the government extradites persons charged with trafficking as it does with other serious crimes.
6. Whether the government monitors immigration and emigration patterns for evidence of trafficking, and whether law enforcement agencies respond appropriately to such evidence.
7. Whether the government vigorously investigates and prosecutes public officials who participate in or facilitate trafficking, and takes all appropriate measures against officials who condone trafficking.

[section] 7106(b). See also U.S. DEPT OF STATE, TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT 15 (2003), <http://www.state.gov/documents/organization/21555.pdf> [hereinafter 2003 TIP REPORT].

(98.)

If a government is not in compliance with the minimum standards, the Department's determination of whether that government is making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance with these minimum standards dictates its placement in Tier 2 or 3. The Act sets out three mitigating factors which the Department is to consider in making such determinations. Summarized, they are as follows:

1. the extent of trafficking in the country;
2. the extent of governmental noncompliance with the minimum standards, particularly the extent to which government officials have participated in, facilitated, condoned, or are otherwise complicit in trafficking; and
3. what measures are reasonable to bring the government into compliance with the minimum standards in light of the government's resources and capabilities.

Id. at 15-16.

(99.) VTVP Act, [section] 7101.

(100.) Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/> (last visited Sept. 15, 2009). The office "provides the tools to combat trafficking in persons and assists in the coordination of anti-trafficking efforts both worldwide and domestically." Id.

(101.) Major forms of trafficking include: forced labor, bonded labor, debt bondage and involuntary servitude among migrant laborers, involuntary domestic servitude, forced child labor, child soldiers, sex trafficking and prostitution, children exploited for commercial sex, and child sex tourism. 2008 TIP REPORT, supra note 16, at 19-25.

(102.) See 2008 TIP REPORT, supra note 16.

(103.) In the 2008 TIP Report, the recommendations for South Africa were:

Fully implement the trafficking provisions of the Sexual Offenses and Children's Acts and raise awareness among all levels of relevant government officials as to their responsibilities under these provisions; develop and employ national procedures for victim protection, including the identification of trafficking victims among undocumented immigrants; and regularly compile national statistics on the number of trafficking cases prosecuted and victims assisted, as is done for other crimes.

2008 TIP REPORT, supra note 16, at 228.

(104.) See Mohamed Y. Mattar, Incorporating the Five Basic Elements of a Model Antitrafficking in Persons Legislation in Domestic Laws: From the United Nations Protocol to the European Convention, 14 TUL. J. INT'L & COMP. L. 357 (2006) (suggesting that the U.S. approach of the "Three Ps" should be expanded to a "Five P's" approach that would focus on protection, participation, prevention, provision, and prosecution).

(105.)

Human Trafficking is: Process ([r]ecruitment or [t]ransportation or [t]ransferring or [h]arboring or [r]eceiving) and Way/Means ([t]hreat or [c]oercion or [a]bduction or [f]raud or [d]eception or

[d]eception or [a]buse of [p]ower) and Goal ([p]rostitution or

[p]ornography or [v]iolence/[s]exual [e]xploitation or [f]orced

[l]abor or [i]nvoluntary [s]ervitude or [d]epr [b]ondage with unfair wages or [s]lavery/[s]imilar practices).

2008 TIP REPORT, supra note 16, at 290.

(106.) 2009 TIP REPORT, supra note 9, at 260.

(107.) See SA LAW REFORM COMM'N REPORT, supra note 7, Annexure D, at 13-18 (Chapter 3 is titled "Offences and Penalties.").

(108.) See id., Annexure D, at 18-33 (Chapter 4 is titled "Identification and Protection of Victim of Trafficking." Chapter 5 is titled "Status of Foreign Victim of Trafficking." Chapter 6 is titled "Services to Adult Victims of Trafficking." Chapter 7 is titled "Compensation." Chapter 8 is titled "Deportation and Repatriation of Victim of Trafficking.").

(109.) See id., Annexure D, at 12-13, 33-45 (Chapter 2 is titled "Prevention of Trafficking in Persons." Chapter 9 is titled "General Provisions." Chapter 10 is titled "Administration of Act.").

(110.)

The Government of South Africa does not fully comply with the for the elimination of is making significant efforts to do so. The government opened

The Government of South Africa does not fully comply with the for the elimination of is making significant efforts to do so. The government opened prosecutions against 16 suspected trafficking offenders during the year and is continuing to prepare for late 2009 passage and subsequent implementation of its comprehensive anti-trafficking law by developing inter-agency operating procedures and training officials on the law, victim identification, and agency roles.

2009 TIP REPORT, supra note 9, at 260.

(111.) See id. at 50.

(112.) See U.S. DEP'T OF STATE, TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT 39 (2004), <http://www.state.gov/documents/organization/34158.pdf> [hereinafter 2004 TIP REPORT].

(113.) Id. at 30. Both downward and upward movement of classification within the tiers is very possible. For example, in 2003, Canada was demoted from Tier 1 to Tier 2. 2003 TIP REPORT, supra note 97; U.S. DEP'T OF STATE, TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT (2002), <http://www.state.gov/documents/organization/10815.pdf> [hereinafter 2002 TIP REPORT]. Yet, according to the 2004 TIP Report,

[t]he Government of Canada fully complies with the minimum standards for the elimination of Interdepartmental Working Group coordinates and reports on the effectiveness of the national anti-trafficking policy. Senior government officials are speaking out more often, and more resources are being devoted to border control; a new RCMP anti-trafficking taskforce is also being created. For these reasons, Canada has been reclassified from Tier 2 to Tier 1.

2004 TIP REPORT, supra note 112, at 228.

(114.) Some anecdotal evidence already exists suggesting that there will be a surge in trafficking in persons in anticipation of the 2010 World Cup. "IOM in Ethiopia, for example, is increasingly aware of stories of men who are promised lucrative contracts in the construction industry in South Africa as the country prepares for the football World Cup in 2010." Press Briefing, Int'l Org. for Migration, Research on Trafficking of Men for Labour Exploitation (Dec. 18, 2007), <http://www.iom.int/jahia/Jahia/pbnAF/cache/offonce?entryId=16263>.

(115.) The SALRC's report is comprehensive, and it outlines and explains the rationale behind the proposed legislation. It is important to note that the SALRC's Report takes into consideration not only the views of the SALRC and the Department of Justice, but also those of South African society as a whole. The SALRC investigation process involves three main steps, and after each, various governmental and nongovernmental agencies and organizations are allotted a substantial amount of time to comment on the document to allow for the most complete investigation possible.

The first step is publication of an issue paper. The SALRC website explains:

In order to actively involve the community at an earlier stage, the Commission has decided to publish issue papers for appropriate investigations as the first step in the consultation process. The purpose of an issue paper is to announce an investigation, to elucidate the aim and extent of the investigation, to point to possible options available for solving existing problems and to initiate and stimulate debate on identified issues by way of

In order to actively involve the community at an earlier stage, the Commission has decided to publish issue papers for appropriate investigations as the first step in the consultation process.

The including specific questions on relevant issues.

South African Law Reform Comm'n, Issue Papers Index, <http://www.doj.gov.za/salrc/ipapers.htm> (last visited Aug. 5, 2009). The SALRC's Issue Paper on Trafficking in Persons was published in early 2004 and was open for commentary until April 30, 2004. Id.

The second step is publication of a discussion paper. The SALRC website explains: Discussion papers, previously referred to as working papers, are documents in which the Commission's preliminary research results are contained. In most cases discussion papers also contain draft legislation which gives effect to the Commission's tentative recommendations and proposals. The main purpose of these documents is to test public opinion on solutions identified by the Commission.

South African Law Reform Comm'n, Discussion Papers Index, <http://www.doj.gov.za/salrc/dpapers.htm> (last visited Aug. 5, 2009). The Discussion Paper on Trafficking in Persons was published on May 5, 2006, and was open for commentary until June 30, 2006. Id.

The third step is publication of a final report. The SALRC published the final report on Project 131, Trafficking in Persons, on November 25, 2008, and subsequently submitted it to the Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development. South African Law Reform Comm'n, Reports Index, supra note 6.

(116.)

The Bill of Rights contained in Chapter 2 of the Constitution is the cornerstone of the provides that no one may be subjected to forced labour. It states that everyone has the right to freedom and security of the person, which includes the right not to be deprived of freedom arbitrarily or without just cause, the right to be free from all forms of violence from either public or private sources, the right not to be tortured in any way and the right not to be treated or punished in a cruel, inhuman or degrading way. It further affirms the democratic values of human dignity and freedom of movement. Children also have the right to be protected from maltreatment, neglect, abuse or degradation and the right to be protected from exploitative labour practices.

SA LAW REFORM COMM'N REPORT, supra note 7, at 3 (citing S. AFR. CONST. 1996 ss. 10, 12, 13, 21, 28) (internal footnotes omitted).

Laura Brooks Najemy, J.D. Candidate (2010), Washington University in Saint Louis School of Law; B.A. (2006), Boston University; B.S. (2006), Boston University. The author would like to thank her parents for their never ending support and encouragement as well as Taryn Janine Powys and Anna Rachel Dray-Siegel for their assistance and advice.

LOAD-DATE: April 21, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

ACC-NO: 6636945

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Fulltext

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Journal

JOURNAL-CODE: 0PBU

Copyright 2010 Gale Group, Inc.
All Rights Reserved
Business and Industry
Copyright 2010 Washington University, School of Law

South Africa's approach to the global human trafficking crisis: an analysis of the proposed legislation and the prospects of implementation.

SECTION: Pg. 171 Vol. 9 No. 1

LENGTH: 13328 words

I. INTRODUCTION

The worldwide epidemic of trafficking in persons continues to be a global problem each year, (1) despite the creation and ratification in 2000 of the United Nations Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, Supplementing the United Nations Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime ("Protocol" or "U.N. Protocol"). (2) Even with 117 signatories, (3) the Protocol alone is ineffective in curbing the increasing crisis. The responsibility to remedy the problem still lies in the hands of individual countries, (4) which must enact legislation to deal with intrastate issues and work with each other to deal with interstate issues. South Africa is not only a signatory to the Protocol; it ratified the Protocol on February 20, 2004. (5) Despite the country's commitment to eliminating the illegal trafficking of persons, it took the South African Law Reform Commission over four years to draft legislation combating human trafficking.

On November 25, 2008, the South African Law Reform Commission released the final version of the Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill. (6) This proposed legislation was created to

[G]ive effect to the [Protocol]; to address the trafficking of persons within or across the border of the Republic; to in persons; to provide for an persons and other offences associated with trafficking in persons; to provide for measures to protect and assist victims of trafficking in persons; and to provide for matters connected therewith. (7)

The proposed bill was submitted to the Minister of Justice and was later published for public comment after March 31, 2009. (8) The period for public commentary closed on June 15, 2009, and the bill was expected to be presented to Parliament for a year-end vote. (9)

Since the inception of the United States' Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000, (10) the United States annually issues the Trafficking in Persons Report in an attempt to gather and disseminate information about the growing worldwide problem of human trafficking. (11) The United States monitors and evaluates other governments' efforts to combat trafficking using a tier system that determines a state's level of compliance with minimum standards for eliminating the trafficking of persons. First, the Department of State "evaluates whether the government[s] fully compl[y] with the TVPRA's [Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act] minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking." (12) Next, the Department "considers whether governments [have] made significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance." (13) There are four possible tier placements, ranging from full compliance to little or no compliance: Tier 1, Tier 2, Tier 2 Watch List, and Tier 3; Tier 1 represents full compliance. (14)

In the 2005 report, South Africa was removed from Tier 2 and placed on the Tier 2 Watch List. (15) It remained on the Tier 2 Special Watch List from 2005 until 2009. (16) According to the 2008 Report, "[t]he Government of South Africa [did] not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it [was] making significant efforts to do so." (17) Throughout the remainder of 2008 and into 2009, South Africa demonstrated its commitment to the elimination of trafficking in persons, warranting its removal from the Tier 2 Watch List and its return to the Tier 2 List in the 2009 Report. (18)

The enactment of the Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill, combined with proper implementation devices, should be enough to remove South Africa from its current placement on the Tier 2 List, ideally bringing the country up to full compliance with U.S. and international standards for human trafficking. The proposed legislation includes provisions that give full effect to the U.N. Protocol, as well as those that provide for the creation of inter-sectoral task teams throughout the country in order to facilitate its effective implementation. (19) The scope of the proposed legislation, combined with the support of these task teams, should enable South Africa to competently fight human trafficking within and across its borders. The country has numerous reasons (20) to work toward the end goals of eliminating human trafficking and aligning with U.S. and international standards, and it must begin by enacting the proposed legislation.

This Note will first discuss the historical background of trafficking in persons in South Africa. It will then review the legislative measures currently in place in South Africa to prosecute and prevent human trafficking. Next, it will analyze the proposed legislation and assess the likelihood of its effectiveness with regard to the U.N. Protocol and the standards set forth in the United States' TVPRA. Finally, from international methods of implementing the U.N. Protocol, it will draw suggestions for South Africa to most effectively prevent human trafficking within and across its borders, prosecute those who engage in human trafficking, and protect victims. (21)

II. BACKGROUND: HUMAN TRAFFICKING IN SOUTH AFRICA

While trafficking in human beings in South Africa is not new, there has been a rapid increase over the past two decades in the prevalence and documentation of cases. (22) With the growth of globalization, human trafficking worldwide has become "a complex, multi-faceted phenomenon involving multiple stakeholders at the institutional and commercial level." (23) In a country where demand for cheap labor and commercial sex is high, it is no wonder that the black-market business of trafficking in persons has flourished in South Africa. A combination of extreme poverty, poor education, and a lack of employment opportunities "propel[s] vulnerable people into the hands of traffickers." (24)

In the aftermath of apartheid, South Africa has become a "source, transit, and destination country for trafficked men, women, and children." (25) This modern-day form of slavery has become increasingly problematic for South Africans as "[a]rmed conflict and associated dislocation, political and economic upheaval, food insecurity, lack of education and employment opportunities and the blight of the AIDS epidemic make South Africa a magnet that attracts migration from across the continent." (26) As these immigrants are vulnerable and easily susceptible to traffickers, the increase in migration across South Africa's borders correlates with the rise in trafficking. (27) In 2003, the International Organization for Migration ("IOM") published a report on human trafficking in southern Africa. (28) The report notes that male refugees, who make up the vast majority of the growing population of refugees in the region, (29) may turn to conducting human trafficking as a way of easily earning money. (30) The report suggests that "[t]he struggle to survive in South Africa in the face of unemployment and xenophobia pushes some refugee men to pursue opportunities from within the relative security of the clan, which may entail engaging in illegal activities. The trafficking of female family members for sexual exploitation is one such activity." (31) Additionally, criminal syndicates have been implicated as an alternative driving force behind the increase in human trafficking in South Africa. (32)

According to the Southern Africa Counter-Trafficking Assistance Program ("SACTAP"), "South Africa is commonly regarded as the main country of destination for trafficked persons in the region." (33) It further explains that, "[i]n many cases, women and children are lured to South Africa with promises of jobs, education or marriage, only to be sold and sexually exploited in the country's major urban centres, or small towns and more rural environments." (34) According to a 2004 report by South Africa's Independent Newspapers, "every year nearly 900,000 people are smuggled across borders as sex slaves, child labourers and illegal organ donors, with 75 percent of them going through South Africa." (35) Other research suggests that the number of women and children trafficked annually into South Africa for the purpose of sexual exploitation is between 850 and 1,100. (36) Most researchers, however, seem to believe that cases of human trafficking are underreported, and thus feel that the current statistics do not accurately reflect the immensity of the problem. (37) Many factors may play a role in the projected high percentage of incidents of trafficking in persons that go unreported or undiscovered. For instance, under the current legislative regime in South Africa, there are disincentives for victims of human trafficking to turn themselves in, as they may be prosecuted for prostitution or other crimes. (38) Additionally, South Africa's current witness protection program fails to provide complete support and protection for victims and, thus, may also deter human trafficking victims from stepping forward. (39) Researchers also contend that access to victims is difficult as they are hard to identify, "may speak a language that is not native to the country in which they end up, and may be involved in hidden criminal activity." (40)

According to a policy paper published by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization ("UNESCO"), the root causes of human trafficking in South Africa can be broken down into supply and demand factors. (41) Factors that contribute to the supply of victims of human trafficking include "unequal access to education ... lack of legitimate and fulfilling employment opportunities ... sex-selective migration policies and restrictive emigration policies/laws ... less access to information on migration/job opportunities ... disruption of support systems due to natural and human created catastrophes; and traditional attitudes and practices." (42) community

Many factors augment demand, including the increased use of foreign workers in household roles, the growth of the sex and entertainment industries, and the low-risk, high-profit nature of trafficking. (43) Because the business of human trafficking feeds on poverty and despair, it is commonly found in countries, such as South Africa, that lack the general stability and economic resources to combat it.

III. SOUTH AFRICA'S CURRENT LEGISLATIVE SYSTEM FOR HUMAN TRAFFICKING

With the 2010 World Cup--set to be held in South Africa--rapidly approaching, researchers and legislators are growing more concerned about implementing effective legislation to combat the problem of trafficking in persons in South Africa. (44) According to Amanda Ledwaba, Director of Investigations in the Department of Home Affairs, "[t]he pressure is now on the government to pass this legislation as soon as possible." (45) She further stated that "it would also be 'a disaster' if the Act were not introduced before 2010, as sex workers from all over the world would be coming in ahead of 2010 to ply their trade. And the human-traffickers who brought them in would manipulate the women." (46) Pre-World Cup tensions may be one of the driving forces behind the current push for legislation. Additional factors may include: South Africa's constitutional commitment to freedom from slavery; its need to follow through on its international obligations under the U.N. Protocol; and its interest in raising its status on the United States' tier list.

While South Africa has not yet enacted legislation dealing solely with the issue of human trafficking, it has taken a number of steps in that direction. Prior to the release of the proposed Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill, South Africa signed and ratified the United Nations Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime ("Convention") (47) and the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children. (48) South Africa has also signed and ratified a number of international instruments related to trafficking in persons. (49) Despite its commitment to fighting human trafficking, evidenced by the signing and ratification of these agreements, the South African government cannot utilize these international agreements to prosecute human traffickers without first enacting implementing legislation. (50) Without explicit legislation addressing human trafficking, South Africa's National Prosecuting Authority is forced to prosecute human trafficking under various other statutes. (51) In addition to employing criminal statutes, the legislators have amended a number of acts in order to provide minimal coverage of human trafficking issues. (52) While these measures can be used to address some forms of human trafficking, full compliance under the Protocol mandates that each ratifying country implement national legislation that is modeled on the Protocol. (53)

The Children's Act of 2005 (54) is one of the most important acts currently at the disposal of South African prosecutors. Chapter 18 of the Children's Act deals with trafficking in children and was enacted to give effect to the U.N. Protocol as well as to "generally combat trafficking in children." (55) It sets forth a comprehensive definition of trafficking, which broadens the one found in the U.N. Protocol with respect to child trafficking victims. (56) The Act is divided into sections outlining target areas for the increased prevention of human trafficking, prosecution of traffickers, and protection of victims. (57) The proposed legislation for combating trafficking in persons is much more comprehensive in scope than the current text of the Children's Act. (58) While Chapter 18 of the 2005 Children's Act is a solid start to remedying the problem of trafficking in minors, it cannot sufficiently and effectively address all aspects of the growing international crisis in just three pages. (59)

In addition to Chapter 18 of the Children's Act, South Africa's strategy to combat trafficking in persons includes a Sexual Offences Bill. (60) This bill provides another provisional definition of trafficking (61) and was put in place "[p]ending the adoption of legislation in compliance with" the U.N. Protocol. (62)

While the National Prosecuting Authority is currently able to prosecute offenders under only common law (63) or statutory law, (64) South African legislators' recognition of the compelling need to enact comprehensive and all-inclusive legislation addressing the prevention, prohibition, and prosecution of human trafficking demonstrates their continued commitment to combating the problem.

IV. IMPLEMENTING THE U.N. PROTOCOL: THE PREVENTION AND COMBATING OF TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS BILL

In assessing the implementation of South Africa's proposed legislation, it is important to consider the framework upon which it is based--the United Nations Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, Supplementing the United Nations Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime. The Protocol, as discussed below, sets forth an international standard, which its signatories are requested to meet by enacting domestic legislation that provides individualized interstate and intrastate solutions to the global problem of human trafficking.

A. The United Nations Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, Supplementing the United Nations Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime

In 2000, the United Nations enacted the Protocol, which recognizes that effective action to prevent and combat trafficking in persons, especially women and children, requires a comprehensive international approach in the countries of origin, transit and destination that includes measures to prevent such trafficking, to punish the traffickers and to protect the victims of such trafficking, including by protecting their internationally recognized human rights.... (65)

It first sets forth a statement of purpose (66) and defines the terms of art that are utilized throughout the document. (67) The majority of sections begin with the mandate, "each State Party shall," and prescribes the measures that states should implement to best combat trafficking. (68)

While the Protocol proposes a comprehensive international approach to combat human trafficking, it cannot be enforced globally unless the signatories enact domestic legislation. Thus, it functions more as a starting point for those countries that have signed and ratified it, mandating domestic legislation modeled after the Protocol. (69) It is clear from the language of the Protocol that the United Nations views some measures as necessary to combat trafficking, and others as useful, but not essential. (70) Therefore, those nations that enact legislation in compliance with the required sections of the Protocol will have fulfilled their obligations as signatories of the document. (71)

B. South Africa's Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill

On November 25, 2008, the South African Law Reform Commission ("SALRC") submitted the Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill to the then Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development, Mohamed Enver Surty. (72) South Africa's proposed legislation appears to be in full compliance with the standards set forth in the U.N. Protocol. The SALRC's investigation process (73) was accompanied by other responses of the South African government to the increasing prevalence of human trafficking. (74) The Bill was "gazetted," or published, for public comment by the new Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development, Jeffrey Thamsanqa Radebe, in early 2009. (75) The proposed bill contains eleven chapters in which the SALRC sets out legislation for the prevention of trafficking, newly formulated offenses and penalties for traffickers, procedures for identification, protection and compensation of victims, general administrative measures, and a renewed commitment to international cooperation. (76) Additionally, it provides comprehensive definitions of the elements of human trafficking that incorporate and exceed the scope of the definitions set forth in the U.N. Protocol. (77)

The proposed bill complies with the U.N. Protocol by suggesting legislative measures that would establish criminal offenses for trafficking in persons. (78) Once adopted, this legislation will provide the National Prosecuting Authority with a new arsenal of tools with which to prosecute traffickers and almost anyone who has even minimal involvement with the movement of trafficking victims into, out of, and through the Republic. (79)

In compliance with article 6 of the Protocol, the Bill provides for programs to increase public awareness in order to lay a foundation for the prevention of human trafficking. (80) It is important to note that Chapter 6 of the Bill calls on "an accredited organisation" to draw up plans to provide access to such programs and additional assistance. (81) The Bill places a positive obligation on other functioning members of the State to be more involved, and establishes a more cohesive approach to South Africa's fight against trafficking. (82)

Additionally, in accordance with article 9 of the Protocol, the Bill includes statutory measures for the identification and protection of victims of trafficking. (83) It further protects victims of trafficking by specifically prohibiting criminal prosecution of victims in certain circumstances, i.e., if a victim's violation of another statutory or common law provision was a direct result of being trafficked. (84) The Bill also addresses the compensation of victims and the State, (85) deportation and repatriation of victims, (86) and general implementation provisions. (87)

As the period for public comment on the Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill closed on June 15, 2009, the Department of Justice's next step will be to introduce the Bill to the Cabinet for approval and from there, it will be introduced into Parliament. (88) At the press briefing on November 25, 2008, the Minister of Justice projected that the proposed legislation would become law by the end of 2009. (89) While the accuracy of this estimate is dependent on the parliamentary process, the Department of Justice and Constitutional Development is committed to finalizing the process as soon as possible. (90) As of January 2010, the draft bill had not yet been introduced into Parliament for a vote, however, such action is expected in the near future. (91) Further, inter-sectoral task teams on human trafficking are already being set up throughout the country, demonstrating that South Africa is committed to fighting the problem on all fronts. (92)

V. SOUTH AFRICA'S COMPLIANCE WITH U.S. AND INTERNATIONAL STANDARDS

In 2000, the United States enacted the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act ("VTVP Act"). (93) This Act has since been reauthorized and amended in 2003 (94) and 2005. (95) The United States' VTVP Act created minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking globally. (96) In order to assess each country's compliance with these minimum standards, the VTVP Act established seven criteria for consideration. (97) According to the process laid out in the VTVP Act, if a country does not meet the minimum standards, the United States then assesses what efforts the country is making to do so. This determines whether the country is placed in Tier 2 or Tier 3. (98)

In 2001, in response to the passage of the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000, (99) the President of the United States created the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, (100) which publishes the Trafficking in Persons ("TIP") Report, an annual report on trafficking in persons worldwide. These reports recognize the major forms of human trafficking (101) throughout the world and categorize countries in tiers that reflect each country's efforts to combat trafficking. (102) The reports also provide country narratives for each country reviewed, which discuss the current problems, measures being taken, and recommendations for future action in prosecution, protection, and prevention. (103) The TIP Reports suggest a three-pronged approach to ending global human trafficking, focusing on prosecution, protection, and prevention. (104) The reports further provide a succinct definition of human trafficking, which is extrapolated from the U.N. Protocol. (105) The annual TIP Reports are an important part of the global effort to prevent, protect, and prosecute instances of human trafficking because they target non-compliant countries putting pressure on them to focus on domestic problems and solutions for human trafficking.

South Africa remained on the Tier 2 Watch List from 2005 until 2009, and the country report published in the 2009 TIP Report concluded that, while the government does not fully comply with the minimum standards, "it is making significant efforts to do so." (106) South Africa's proposed Bill demonstrates the country's commitment to all three prongs suggested in the TIP Reports. It addresses issues of criminalization and prohibition of trafficking, (107) protection and assistance for trafficking victims, (108) and prevention of trafficking through awareness programs. (109) While these measures were not implemented nor fully functioning by the release of the 2009 TIP Report on June 16, 2009, the report recognized that South Africa had made great strides over the past year toward compliance with international standards for the elimination of trafficking in persons. (110) South Africa's commitment toward implementing successful legislation proved to the United States that it was taking human trafficking seriously. Recognizing this, the United States removed South Africa from the Tier 2 Watch List and placed it back on the Tier 2 list, (111) where it had been prior to 2005. (112) Once the proposed legislation is signed into law and proven effective, South Africa will likely be classified as a Tier 1 country, indicating that its government "fully complies with the Trafficking Victims Protection Act's minimum standards." (113)

VI. THE FUTURE OF HUMAN TRAFFICKING IN SOUTH AFRICA

With the 2010 World Cup on the horizon, it is more important than ever that South Africa stays committed to fighting the phenomenon of trafficking in persons within and across its borders. (114) If the South African government implements the suggestions made by the SALRC in its Report on Trafficking in Persons (115) and codifies the Bill into law, not only will it have aligned itself domestically with U.N. and U.S. schemata, but it will also have made great strides to protect its people against the very real and dangerous threat of human trafficking.

To suggest that South Africa has not been committed to solving this problem prior to the submission of the Bill to the Minister of Justice would be far from accurate. The SALRC has been investigating trafficking in persons since South Africa ratified the U.N. Protocol. South Africa's well-formulated plan of attack addresses each of the three P's of U.S. policy--prevention, prosecution, and protection--and is likely to be effective in all three areas, assuming that all departments called upon in the proposed legislation contribute to the inter-sectoral task team and work together to solve the human trafficking crisis. Particularly in the wake of apartheid, South Africa's commitment to eliminating trafficking in persons into, out of, and through the Republic is essential to the current regime's continued legitimacy. A failure to prosecute and prevent trafficking in persons would be too closely linked to a failure to prevent South Africans from being subject to "slavery, servitude or forced labour," which is specifically prohibited by the Constitution of the Republic. (116) Thus, the only avenue for South Africa is to comply with its international obligations and enact the proposed legislation so that it is binding throughout the Republic.

(1.) See Hillary Rodham Clinton, Secretary of State, Summary of Remarks at the Release of the Ninth Annual Trafficking in Persons Report Alongside Leaders in Congress (June 16, 2009), <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/tiprpt/2009/index.htm> ("The ninth annual Trafficking in Persons Report sheds light on the faces of modern-day slavery and on new facets of this global problem. The human trafficking phenomenon affects virtually every country, including the United States.").

(2.) Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, Supplementing the United Nations Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime, G.A. Res. 55/25, U.N. GAOR, 55th Sess., Annex II (Nov. 15, 2000) [hereinafter Protocol], available at http://www.uncjin.org/Documents/Conventions/dcatoc/final_documents_2/convention_%20traff_eng.pdf.

(3.) United Nations Office on Drugs & Crime [UNODC], Signatories to the CTOC [Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime] Trafficking Protocol, <http://www.unodc.org/unodc/en/treaties/CTOC/countrylist-traffickingprotocol.html> (last visited Aug. 28, 2009).

(4.) See, e.g., Protocol, supra note 2, art. 5 ("Each State Party shall adopt such legislation and other measures as may be necessary to establish as criminal offences the conduct set forth in article 3 of this Protocol, when committed intentionally."). Language requiring state legislative implementation is also used in articles six through thirteen. Id. arts. 6-13 (employing the words, e.g., "each State Party shall").

(5.) South Africa ratified the Protocol, but stated:

[P]ending a decision by the Government of the Republic of South Africa on the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice, the Government of the Republic does not consider itself bound by the terms of Article 15 (2) of the Protocol which provides for the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice in differences arising out of the interpretation or application of the Protocol. The Republic will adhere to the position that, for the submission of a particular dispute for settlement by the International Court, the consent of all the parties to the dispute is required in every individual case.

Signatories to the CTOC Trafficking Protocol, supra note 3.

(6.) South African Law Reform Comm'n, Reports Index, <http://www.doj.gov.za/salrc/reports.htm> (last visited Aug. 28, 2009).

(7.) SOUTH AFRICAN LAW REFORM COMM'N, PROJECT 131: REPORT ON TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS, Annexure D, 2 (2008), http://www.doj.gov.za/salrc/reports/r_par131_trafficking_2008.pdf [hereinafter SA LAW REFORM COMM'N REPORT].

(8.) Nthambeleni Gabara, Human Trafficking Legislation to Be Gazetted for Public Comment, BUA NEWS ONLINE, Mar. 31, 2009, <http://www.buanews.gov.za/news/09/09033111151002>.

(9.) U.S. DEP'T OF STATE, TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT 261 (2009), <http://www.state.gov/documents/organization/123357.pdf> [hereinafter 2009 TIP REPORT]. As of January 18, 2010 the draft bill does not yet appear to have been presented to Parliament. See Parliament of the Republic of South Africa, Bills Before Parliament, http://www.parliament.gov.za/live/content.php?Category_ID=72 (last visited Jan. 18, 2010).

(10.) Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act, 22 U.S.C. [section] 7101 (2000) (amended 2003, 2005).

(11.) The Trafficking in Persons Report

is intended to raise global awareness and spur foreign governments to take effective actions to counter all forms of persons--a form of modern-day focused the efforts of a growing community of nations to share information and to partner in new and important ways to fight human trafficking. A country that fails to take significant actions to bring itself into compliance with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking in persons receives a negative "Tier 3" assessment in this Report. Such an assessment could trigger the withholding of non-humanitarian, non-trade-related assistance from the United States to that country.

U.S. DEP'T OF STATE, TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT 5 (2005), <http://www.state.gov/documents/organization/47255.pdf> [hereinafter 2005 TIP REPORT].

(12.) Office to Monitor & Combat Trafficking in Persons, Trafficking in Persons Interim Assessment, U.S. DEP'T OF STATE, Feb. 1, 2006, <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/rpt/60487.htm> [hereinafter Trafficking in Persons Interim Assessment]. See infra notes 98 and 100 and accompanying text.

(13.) Trafficking in Persons Interim Assessment, supra note 12.

(14.) The tier classification system is defined as follows:

Tier 1: Countries whose governments fully comply with the Act's minimum standards.

Tier 2: Countries whose governments do not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards.

Tier 2 Special Watch List: Countries whose governments do not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards, and:

(a) The absolute number of victims of severe forms of trafficking is very significant or is significantly increasing; or

(b) There is a failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons from the previous year; or

(c) The determination that a country is making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with minimum standards was based on commitments by the country to take additional future steps over the next year.

Tier 3: Countries whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so.

2005 TIP REPORT, supra note 11, at 28.

(15.) Id. at 198-99.

(16.) Id.; U.S. DEP'T OF STATE, TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT 46 (2006), <http://www.state.gov/documents/organization/66086.pdf> [hereinafter 2006 TIP REPORT]; U.S. DEP'T OF STATE, TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT 42 (2007), <http://www.state.gov/documents/organization/82902.pdf> [hereinafter 2007 TIP REPORT]; U.S. DEP'T OF STATE, TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT 44 (2008),

<http://www.state.gov/documents/organization/105501.pdf> [hereinafter 2008 TIP REPORT]; 2009 TIP REPORT, supra note 9, at 50.

(17.) 2008 TIP REPORT, supra note 16, at 228.

(18.) 2009 TIP REPORT, supra note 9, at 50.

(19.) See generally SA LAW REFORM COMM'N REPORT, supra note 7, Annexure D.

(20.) These reasons include: the fast-approaching Federation Internationale de Football Association ("FIFA") World Cup that is sure to spark an influx of tourism of all kinds; South Africa's constitutional commitment to protect its citizens from slavery; South Africa's signing and ratification of the U.N. Protocol; and South Africa's demotion to Tier 2 Watch List status in 2005 by the United States in the annual Trafficking in Persons Reports, though this particular issues has been partially remedied already by South Africa's significant efforts in the past year, which warranted its removal from the watch list and its placement on the Tier 2 list in the 2009 TIP Report.

(21.)

The United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC) describes victims as "young girls sold by their families; children drugged and forced to fight as soldiers; men bonded/chained in labor on mines and farms; women enslaved in quarries and households; women and girls trapped in the sex trade; boys forced to fish in dangerous waters--all of them people, human beings, coerced to do what others would never freely do, paid virtually nothing for their pains."

International Trafficking in Persons: Taking Action to Eliminate Modern Day Slavery: Hearing Before the H. Comm. on Foreign Affairs, 110th Cong. 39 (2007) (statement of Rev. Monsignor Franklyn M. Casale, President, St. Thomas University, Miami, Florida) (footnote omitted).

(22.) This increase in the perceived prevalence and documentation may come from the heightened interest of the human interest group Molo Songololo in South Africa and the International Organization for Migration ("IOM"). A 2008 article published by the Integrated Regional Information Networks stated, "Official statistics are not available and 'reports on the trade in South Africa draw almost entirely on three pieces of primary research': two reports compiled in 2000 by the children's advocacy group, Molo Songololo, and a 2003 study by the IOM, but only the IOM study attempted to ascertain the numbers involved." Integrated Regional Information Networks (IRIN), South Africa: How Heavy Is Human Trafficking?, Sept. 8, 2008, <http://www.unhcr.org/refworld/docid/48eeld5ele.html>. However, the article further recognized that human trafficking has become a prevalent and lucrative economic threat:

The IOM contends that global human trafficking is worth between US $7 billion and $12 billion dollars annually, making it the third most lucrative trades, although "in contrast to these other criminal activities, however, the penalties for human trafficking in most countries are much less severe, or non-existent."

Id.

(23.) U.N. Educ., Scientific & Cultural Org. [UNESCO], Policy Paper No. 14.5(E): Human Trafficking in South Africa: Root Causes and Recommendations, at 7, SHS/CCT/2007/P1/H/6 (2007), available at <http://unesdoc.unesco.org/images/0015/001528/152823e.pdf> [hereinafter Root Causes and Recommendations].

(24.) Id.

(25.) 2008 TIP REPORT, supra note 16, at 227.

(26.) Root Causes and Recommendations, supra note 23, at 7.

(27.) "Traditional migration patterns of labour to South Africa from surrounding states, the practice of children being loaned/sent to better-situated family members to be raised; and casual border procedures contribute to acceptance and expectations of unregulated cross-border movement." Id. at 11. See also JONATHAN MARTENS, MACIEJ PIEC-ZKOWSKI & BERNADETTE VAN VUUREN-SMYTH, INT'L ORG. FOR MIGRATION (IOM), SEDUCTION, SALE AND SLAVERY: TRAFFICKING IN WOMEN & CHILDREN FOR SEXUAL EXPLOITATION IN SOUTHERN AFRICA 21 (May 2003) (suggesting that "[m]obile populations are always more vulnerable to exploitation than stable populations").

(28.) MARTENS, supra note 27, at 133.

(29.) At the time the IOM report was published, the population of refugees stood at 23,000. Id. at 21. Ninety-five percent of the refugee population was male. Id. at 23.

(30.) "The sexual exploitation of women, as a means of earning an income, soon becomes an attractive and viable option for some refugee men, particularly those living in cities where there is an obviously profitable sex industry." Id. at 24.

(31.) Id. at 33.

(32.) "Traffickers operating in South Africa include Nigerian networks, Chinese triads, Russian and Bulgarian mafia and various groups of organised criminal syndicates." Yazeed Kamaldien, International Women's Day: South Africa Linked in the Global Human Trafficking, INTER PRESS SERVICE NEWS AGENCY, Mar. 8, 2005, <http://ipsnews.net/africa/nota.asp?idnews=27772>.

In the past, victims had typically been runaways who fell prey to city pimps, but now crime syndicates recruit victims from rural towns.

East for domestic servitude and sexual exploitation. Nigerian syndicates have reportedly begun moving trafficked women from South Africa to the U.S. as well for African migrant clients there.

See 2009 TIP REPORT, supra note 9, at 260.

(33.) IRIN, supra note 22.

(34.) Id.

In most cases, women and children are lured with promises of employment or educational opportunities abroad; offers made appealing and credible within the context of historical migration patterns in the region which flow southwards to the relative prosperity of South Africa, or northwards to Europe. Only sometimes are their situations absolutely desperate.... Their sexual exploitation is facilitated largely by their relocation from a place with which they are familiar to one with which they are not.

MARTENS, supra note 27, at 123-24.

(35.) IRIN, supra note 22.

(36.) Id.

(37.) According to Karen Blackman, a spokesperson for the IOM's Southern Africa Counter-Trafficking Assistance Program ("SACTAP"), "[t]he clandestine nature of human trafficking makes the scale of the illicit industry difficult to assess and there are few reliable statistics on the number of persons trafficked in the southern African region." Id.

38. MARTENS, supra note 27, at 133.

When identified by police in South Africa, victims of trafficking are deported as illegal immigrants without being questioned about their experiences. Victims are afraid of law enforcement, and do not trust police to assist them. [In addition,] South Africa has no public services specifically designed to assist victims of trafficking.

Id. at 125.

(39.) South Africa passed the Witness Protection Act of 1998, which created the Office of Witness Protection and established protocol to be followed with respect to the protection of witnesses. Witness Protection Act 112 of 1998. There are a number of holes in this piece of legislation, including a failure to place a limit on how long the witness protection program may run, a failure to discuss what happens after testimony is given by a witness, and any explanation of whether there is a structure in place to take care of witnesses for the long term. See id.

(40.) IRIN, supra note 22. The language problem may be particularly enhanced in South Africa as it has eleven official languages. S. AFR. CONST. 1996 s. 6(1).

(41.) Root Causes and Recommendations, supra note 23, at 32.

(42.) Id. at 32-33. Additional supply factors are categorized as poverty, HIV and AIDS, gender and age imbalances, discriminatory cultural practices and beliefs, lack of knowledge and information, and absence of effective laws. Id. at 34-38.

(43.)

[T]he increasing demand for foreign workers for domestic and care-giving roles, and lack of adequate regulatory frameworks to support this; the growth of the billion-dollar sex and entertainment industry, tolerated as a "necessary evil" while women in prostitution are criminalized and discriminated against; the low risk-high profit nature of trafficking encouraged by a lack of will on the part of enforcement agencies to prosecute traffickers (which includes owners/managers of institutions into which persons are trafficked); the ease in controlling and manipulating vulnerable women; lack of access to legal redress or remedies, for victims of traffickers; and devaluation of women and children's human rights.

Id. at 32. Additional demand factors are categorized as "[n]eed for low-skilled and cheap labor, [c]ultural beliefs, [s]ex tourism and industry, [a]doption trade, [d]emand for organs and body-parts, [and] [n]eed for children-soldiers in armed conflict." Id. at 38.

(44.) Frederico Links, Human Trafficking and Prostitution to Surge Ahead of 2010 World Cup, NAMIBIAN, Sept. 2, 2008, [http://www.namibian.com.na/index.php?id=28&tx_ttnews\[tt_news\]=51243 &no_cache=1](http://www.namibian.com.na/index.php?id=28&tx_ttnews[tt_news]=51243 &no_cache=1).

(45.) Barbara Cole, Human Trafficking Must Be Addressed Now, DAILY NEWS (Durban), Sept. 12, 2008, at 5, available at http://www.iol.co.za/index.php?set_id=1&click_id=13&art_id=vn20080912_113400769C601405 (quoting Amanda Ledwaba at a workshop on human trafficking in Durban, South Africa in September 2008).

(46.) Id. See also Katherine L. Morrow, Comment, Soccer, Sex and Slavery: Human Trafficking in the World Cup, 17 TUL. J. INT'L & COMP. L. 243 (2008) (analyzing the estimate that 40,000 women would have been trafficked into Germany prior to its hosting of the 2006 World Cup but for the implementation of preventive and protective measures).

(47.) U.N. Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime [UNTOC], G.A. Res. 55/25, U.N. Doc. A/RES/55/25 (Jan. 8, 2001).

(48.) The Protocol was created in 2000 to supplement the Convention. Protocol, supra note 2. The Convention came into operation on September 29, 2003 and the Protocol came into operation on December 25, 2003. See South African Government Information, Human Trafficking Strategy, <http://www.info.gov.za/issues/humantrafficking/strategy.htm> (last visited on Jan. 11, 2010) [hereinafter Human Trafficking Strategy].

(49.) These include: the Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Persons and of the Exploitation of the Prostitution of Others (1949, signed in 1950, ratified in 1951); the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women (1979, signed in 1993, ratified in 1996); and the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (2002, signed in 1998, ratified in 2000). South Africa has ratified other legal instruments including: the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination Against Women (1999, ratified in 2005); the Hague Convention no.33 on Protection of Children and Cooperation in Respect of Intercountry Adoption (1993, ratified in 2003); the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the Sale of Children, Child Prostitution and Child Pornography (2000, ratified in 2003); the 1989 U.N. Convention on the Rights of the Child (ratified in 1995); the ILO Convention No. 182 on the Worst Forms of Child Labour (1999, ratified in 2000). Root Causes and Recommendations, supra note 23, at 41-42.

(50.) Section 231(2) of South Africa's Constitution states that an international agreement binds the republic when it is enacted into law through national legislation. S. AFR. CONST. 1996 s. 231 (2).

(51.) The available legislative means include

the Sexual Offences Act 23 of 1957, the Child Care Act 74 of 1983, as amended, the of and Combatting of Corrupt Activities Act 12 of 2004, the Immigration Act 13 of 2002, as amended, the Films and Publications Act 65 of 1996, as amended, the Corruption Act 94 of 1992, the Intimidation Act 72 of 1982 and the Riotous Assemblies Act 17 of 1956.

Human Trafficking Strategy, supra note 48. "The absence of legislation specific to human trafficking limits prosecutors to dealing only with the perpetrator directly linked to the offences resulting from the trafficking of the victim, to the exclusion of the perpetrators behind the scenes, as this is often an organized crime activity." Id.

(52.) These additions include: Chapter 18 of the Children's Act [Children's Act 38 of 2005 ss. 281-291]; Section 50(A) of the Child Care Act [Child Care Act 74 of 1983 s. 50(A)], and Chapter 5 of the Criminal Law (Sexual Offences) Amendment Bill [Criminal Law (Sexual Offences) Amendment Bill, 2003, Bill 50-2003]. Root Causes and Recommendations, supra note 23, at 45-48.

(53.)

[The Protocol] mandates that States Parties take the necessary measures not only to criminalize the also to trafficking, and promote international cooperation to combat the problem of trafficking. Thus, the Protocol provides a "comprehensive international approach" to combating trafficking, which surpasses the earlier international trafficking prohibitions....

Mohamed Y. Mattar, Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, in Countries of the Middle East: The Scope of the Problem and the Appropriate Legislative Responses, 26 FORDHAM INT'L L.J. 721, 722 (2003) (internal citations omitted).

(54.) Children's Act 38 of 2005.

(55.) Children's Act 38 of 2005 s. 281(b). The Act further states: "The UN Protocol to Prevent Trafficking in Persons is in force in the Republic and its provisions are law in the Republic, subject to the provisions of this Act." Id. s. 282.

(56.)

"[T]rafficking", in relation to a child--(a) means the recruitment, sale, supply, transportation, transfer, harbouring or receipt of children, within or across the borders of the Republic--(i) by any means, including the use of threat, force or other forms of coercion, abduction, fraud, deception, abuse of power or the giving or receiving of payments or benefits to achieve the consent of a person having control of a child; or (ii) due to a position of vulnerability, for the purpose of exploitation; and (b) includes the adoption of a child facilitated or secured through illegal means....

Children's Act 38 of 2005 s. 1 at "trafficking."

(57.) These target areas include: international co-operation, prohibition of trafficking in children, prohibition of behavior facilitating trafficking in children, providing assistance to children who are victims of trafficking, parental trafficking of children, protocols for reporting instances of child victimization, and treatment and repatriation of victims of human trafficking. See Children's Act 38 of 2005 ss. 281-291.

(58.) The draft version of the Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill, as submitted to the Minister of Justice on November 25, 2008, is forty-five pages long and is divided into eleven chapters that attempt to create lasting definitions of the various offenses that may be prosecuted via this legislation. SA LAW REFORM COMM'N REPORT, supra note 7, Annexure D.

(59.) Chapter 18 of the Children's Act of 2005 dealing with trafficking in children spans pages numbered 144 through 148, which is only three pages of actual text in the Act, as compared to the much more comprehensive proposed human trafficking legislation, which is forty-five pages. Compare Children's Act 38 of 2005 ss. 281-291, with SA LAW REFORM COMM'N REPORT, supra note 7, Annexure D.

(60.) Criminal Law (Sexual Offences and Related Matters) Amendment Bill, 2003, Bill 50-2003 [hereinafter Sexual Offenses Amendment Bill].

(61.) Trafficking is defined to include the supply, recruitment, procurement, capture, removal, transportation, transfer, harbouring, sale, disposal or receiving of a person, within or across the borders of the Republic, by means of--(a) threat of harm; (b) the threat or use of force, intimidation or other forms of coercion; (c) abduction; (d) fraud; (e) deception or false pretenses; (f) the abuse of power or of a position of vulnerability, to the extent that the complainant is inhibited from indicating his or her unwillingness or resistance to being trafficked, or unwillingness to participate in such an act; or (g) the giving or receiving of payments or benefits, for the purpose of any form or manner of exploitation, grooming or abuse of a sexual nature of such person, including the commission of any sexual offence or any offence of a sexual nature in any other law against such person or performing any sexual act with such person, whether committed in or outside the borders of the Republic.

Sexual Offenses Amendment Bill, supra note 60, s. 70(2)(b).

(62.) Id. at 40. See SA LAW REFORM COMM'N REPORT, supra note 7, at 14 (concluding that "[p]ending the promulgation of comprehensive legislation on trafficking in persons, the Criminal Law (Sexual Offences and Related Matters) Amendment Act is the most appropriate legislation to charge those who traffick persons for purposes of sexual exploitation").

(63.) "[D]epending on the circumstances of each case, such persons could be charged with kidnapping, common assault, assault with intent to cause grievous bodily harm, extortion, slavery, attempted murder and murder." SA LAW REFORM COMM'N REPORT, supra note 7, at 14.

(64.)

Statutory offences are provided for in the Sexual Offences Act [23 of 1957], the Riotous Assemblies Act [17 of 1956], the Immigration Act [13 of 2002], the Basic Conditions of Employment Act [75 of 1997], the Intimidation Act [72 of 1982], the Domestic Violence Act [116 of 1998] and the Prevention of Organised Crime Act [121 of 1998].

Id.

(65.) Protocol, supra note 2, pmb1.

(66.)

The purposes of this Protocol are: (a) To prevent and combat trafficking in persons, paying particular attention to women and children; (b) To protect and assist the victims of such trafficking, with full respect for their human rights; and (c) To promote cooperation among States Parties in order to meet those objectives. Protocol, supra note 2, art. 2.

(67.)

"Trafficking in persons" shall mean the recruitment, transportation, transfer, harbouring or receipt of persons, by means of the threat or use of force or other forms of coercion, of abduction, of fraud, of deception, of the abuse of power or of a position of vulnerability or of the giving or receiving of payments or benefits to achieve the consent of a person having control over another person, for the purpose of exploitation. Exploitation shall include, at a minimum, the exploitation of the prostitution of others or other forms of sexual exploitation, forced labour or services, slavery or practices similar to slavery, servitude or the removal of organs....

Protocol, supra note 2, art. 3.

(68.) See, e.g., Protocol, supra note 2, arts. 5-6.

(69.) See Mattar, supra note 53. Additionally, "[a]ny anti-trafficking legislation must comply with the international mandate of the Protocol." Id. at 758.

(70.) Compare Protocol, supra note 2, art. 5 ("[e]ach State Party shall adopt such legislative and other measures as may be necessary to establish as criminal offences the conduct set forth in article 3 of this Protocol, when committed intentionally"), with Protocol, supra note 2, art. 7 ("each State Party shall consider adopting legislative or other appropriate measures that permit victims of trafficking in persons to remain in its territory, temporarily or permanently, in appropriate cases"). This difference in language suggests that the Protocol drafters believe that defining a criminal offense is necessary to combat trafficking in persons, but do not believe that countries must allow victims to remain in the country into which they have been trafficked.

(71.) South Africa has both signed and ratified the Protocol. According to section 231 of the South African Constitution:

An international agreement binds the Republic only after it has been approved by resolution in both the National Assembly and the National Council of Provinces, unless ... [it is] [a]n international agreement of a technical, administrative or executive nature, or an agreement which does not require either ratification or accession, entered into by the national executive.

S. AFR. CONST. 1996 s. 231(2)-(3). South Africa's signature and ratification of the Protocol "has placed an obligation on the government to bring its domestic laws and policies in line with the standards set by these instruments." SA LAW REFORM COMM'N REPORT, supra note 7, at 4.

(72.) SALRC Submits Reports on Trafficking and Stalking Amongst Others, JUSTICE TODAY (Dep't of Justice & Constitutional Dev., Republic of South Africa), Nov./Dec. 2008, at 6, available at http://www.doj.gov.za/newsletter/JT/JT2008_Vol%206.pdf.

(73.) See infra note 115. The SALRC first created an Issue Paper with a closing deadline for comment of April 30, 2004 to "serve as a basis for the Commission's deliberations, to elicit comment and suggestions from relevant stakeholders and to disseminate information on the issue of trafficking in persons to the public at large." SOUTH AFRICAN LAW REVIEW COMM'N, ISSUE PAPER 25, PROJECT 131: TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS, at iii (2004), http://www.doj.gov.za/salrc/ipapers/ip25_prj131_2004.pdf. Following up on the Issue Paper, the SALRC published a Discussion Paper with a comment submission deadline of June 30, 2006. SOUTH AFRICAN LAW REFORM COMM'N, DISCUSSION PAPER 111, PROJECT 131: TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS, at iii (2004), <http://www.doj.gov.za/salrc/dp111.pdf>. Finally, the SALRC published its official Report, which included the Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill, on November 25, 2008. South African Law Reform Comm'n, Reports Index, supra note 6.

(74.) According to the South African government website, the government has created a "human trafficking strategy" in order to coordinate South Africa's response to trafficking in persons. Aside from the SALRC's investigation, the government established a "Human Trafficking Desk within the Organised Crime Unit at the South African Police Service (SAPS)." Human Trafficking Strategy, supra note 48.

Additionally, "[t]he presidential mandate of the SOCA [Sexual Offences and Community Affairs] Unit is to deal efficiently and effectively with sexual offences," and as such, SOCA has been tasked with the "[e]stablishment of an inter-sectoral Task Team to commence a process of coordination and refinement of activities towards the development of a multi-sectoral and comprehensive strategy." Id.

In the interest of inclusiveness, the following organizations and respective internal departments were elected to the Task Team: SAPS (the Human Trafficking Desk, Organised Crime Unit; Ports of Entry Policing); Department of Justice & Constitutional Development (Legislative Directorate); Department of Home Affairs (International Affairs); International Organisation for Migration; Department of Social Development; Department of Labour; Molo Songololo; United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime. "The Task Team identified six pillars of a national strategy to effectively address trafficking in persons, as an instance of organised crime: Information, Capacity-Building & Development, Victim Assistance & Integration, Policy & Legislation Development, Liaison & Consulation as well as Monitoring & Evaluation." Id. See also Malebo Kotu-Rammopo, National Prosecuting Authority, South Africa's Strategy to Counter Human Trafficking: Media Briefing Session (Aug. 13, 2008), <http://www.npa.gov.za/UploadedFiles/HUMAN%20TRAFFICKING%20PROGRAMME%20Media%2013%20Aug%202008.ppt>.

(75.) See General Notice, Dep't of Justice & Constitutional Dev., Publication of Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill (2009), available at http://www.justice.gov.za/legislation/invitations/20090508_EnglishTIP.pdf.

(76.) SA LAW REFORM COMM'N REPORT, supra note 7, Annexure D. The first chapter of the Bill includes a definitional section as well as an outline of the proposed legislation's objectives. Id.

(77.) The Bill defines trafficking as the recruitment, sale, supply, procurement, transportation, transfer, harbouring, receipt of persons or the adoption of a child facilitated or secured through legal or illegal means, within or across the borders of the Republic--

(a) by means of the use of threat, force, intimidation or other forms of coercion, abduction, kidnapping, fraud, deception, debt bondage, abuse of power or the giving or receiving of payments or benefits to achieve the consent of a person having control or authority over another person; or

(b) by abusing vulnerability.

Id. at 11. The Bill further defines exploitation in much greater detail than does the U.N. Protocol.

"[E]xploitation" includes, but is not limited to--(a) all forms of or practices similar to labour as defined in section 1 of the Children's Act, 2005 (Act No. 38 of 2005); (g) the removal of body parts; and (h) the impregnation of a female person against her will for the purpose of selling her child when born.

Id. at 9.

(78.) Chapter 3 of the Bill introduces offenses and penalties, making it a crime to intentionally traffic another human being. Id. at 13. In a footnote to the Bill, the SALRC explains:

Schedule 1 to this Bill amends the Criminal Law Amendment Act 105 of 1997 by including the Schedule 2, Part 1 of that Act. This means that a regional court or a High Court may sentence a person it has convicted of the offence of trafficking in persons to imprisonment for life.

Id. at 13.

(79.) The Bill establishes penalties for trafficking in persons; engaging in conduct that causes another person to enter into debt bondage; destroying, confiscating, possessing or concealing documents; using the services of, or intentionally benefitting from, a victim of trafficking; any conduct that facilitates trafficking in persons; and carrying victims of trafficking into or out of the Republic--with some restrictions. Id. at 13-17. The Bill further provides that a court of the Republic may exert jurisdiction outside of the Republic if the person to be charged

(a) is a citizen of the Republic; (b) is ordinarily resident in the Republic; (c) has committed the offence against a citizen of the Republic or a person who is ordinarily resident in the Republic; (d) is, after the commission of the offence, present in the territory of the Republic, or in its territorial waters or on board a ship or aircraft registered or required to be registered in the Republic; (e) is, for any reason, not extradited by the Republic or if there is no application to extradite that person; or (f) is a juristic person or a partnership in terms of any law in the Republic.

Id. at 17.

(80.)

Each State Party shall ensure that its domestic legal or administrative system contains measures that provide to victims of

in persons, in appropriate cases: (a) Information on relevant court and administrative proceedings; (b) Assistance to enable their views and concerns to be presented and considered at appropriate stages of criminal proceedings against offenders, in a manner not prejudicial to the rights of the defence.

Protocol, supra note 2, art. 6, [section] 2.

Chapter 4 of the Bill deals with the identification and protection of victims of trafficking, including how to report and refer both child and adult victims of trafficking to the correct authorities to ensure their safety. The chapter further provides specific measures to be taken to aid a child trafficking victim and provide health care to victims. See SA LAW REFORM COMM'N REPORT, supra note 7, Annexure D, at 18-21.

Additionally, Chapter 5 of the Bill addresses the status of foreign victims of trafficking by providing a recovery and reflection period, temporary residency, and possible permanent residency. Id. at 21-24. Chapter 6 further elaborates on the available services for adult victims of trafficking. It includes a list of the minimum norms and standards that must be provided to such victims and a description of programs that must be offered by accredited organizations in the Republic for accommodations, counseling, rehabilitation, and reintegration for adult victims. Id. at 24-27.

(81.) Chapter 6 of the Bill places an obligation on "an accredited organisation" to offer specified programs, draw up plans "to address the immediate and long term needs of a person who has been certified as a victim of trafficking," and manage and collect information on victims of trafficking. Id. at 25-26. Whether this will be effective will depend on the organization tasked with these obligations. Because the SALRC did not name a specific organization in this draft, the choice is likely to be left to the Minister of Justice or to Parliament.

(82.) For example, in Chapter 10 Section 40 the proposed bill calls for the establishment of an Inter-sectoral Committee, which it calls on in Chapter 2 Section 3 to "establish public awareness programmes or other measures for the prevention of trafficking in persons." See id. at 12, 39-40. The proposed legislation also calls on the help of immigration officials, labour inspectors, social workers, social service professionals, doctors, nurses and healers to report all instances where they have "reasonable grounds" to conclude that an adult person is a victim of trafficking. See id. at 19.

(83.) "States Parties shall establish comprehensive policies, programmes and other measures: (a) To prevent and combat trafficking in persons; and (b) To protect victims of trafficking in persons, especially women and children, from revictimization." Protocol, supra note 2, art. 9.

Chapter 2 of the Bill is aimed at preventing trafficking in persons and sets forth measures to increase public awareness. It mandates that the Inter-sectoral Committee:

[E]stablish public awareness programmes or other measures for the of educate members of the public, especially those who are vulnerable or at risk of becoming victims of trafficking, foreigners who apply for South African visas who may be victims of trafficking, and South African citizens or permanent residents who depart for work abroad, on issues relating to trafficking in persons ... (b) inform and educate victims of trafficking on--(i) their rights as victims;
 (ii) legal or other measures in place to ensure their safety, recovery and repatriation; and (iii) organisations, institutions or law enforcement agencies that may be approached for assistance or information; (c) discourage the demand for and the supply of victims of trafficking that fosters the exploitation of such victims, especially women and children.

SA LAW REFORM COMM'N REPORT, supra note 7, Annexure D, at 12.

(84.)

No criminal prosecution shall be instituted against a child who was found to be a victim of trafficking after an investigation in terms of section 110(5)(c) of the Children's Amendment Act, 2007 (Act No. 41 of 2007), or an adult person who has been certified as a victim of trafficking in terms of section 12(6)(a) for--

(a) entering or remaining in the Republic in contravention of the Immigration Act, 2002 (Act No. 13 of 2002);

(b) assisting another person to enter or remain in the Republic in contravention of the Immigration Act, 2002 (Act No. 13 of 2002);

(c) possessing any fabricated or falsified passport, identity document or other document used for the facilitation of movement across borders; and

(d) being involved in an illegal activity to the extent that he or she has been compelled to do so, as a direct result of his or her situation as a victim of trafficking. Id., Annexure D, at 21.

(85.) Id., Annexure D, at 27-30.

(86.) Id., Annexure D, at 30-33.

(87.) These provisions include measures for dealing with trafficking by a parent, guardian, or other person who has parental responsibilities and rights for international co-operation, general directions for implementation and procedures that must be followed. Id., Annexure D, at 33-39. The Bill further provides for the establishment of an Inter-Sectoral Committee, sets forth who will comprise this committee, and what its functions will be with respect to solving the crisis of human trafficking. Id., Annexure D, at 39-42.

(88.) South Africa's legislative process involves a number of steps. The preparation of draft legislation requires the "investigation and evaluation of the legislative proposals ... and consultation with interested parties." Dep't of Justice & Constitutional Dev., The Legislative Process, <http://www.doj.gov.za/legislation/legprocess.htm> (last visited Aug. 29, 2009). The majority of South Africa's bills are prepared by a government organization under the direction of a Minister or Deputy Minister. Once the Minister signs off on the proposed legislation, it is submitted to the Cabinet along with a Cabinet memorandum for approval. After such approval has been granted, the Minister "must submit a copy of the draft Bill to the Speaker of the National Assembly and the Chairperson of the National Council of Provinces. However, before a Bill can be formally submitted to Parliament the State Law Advisers must be approached to certify the draft Bill." Id. This step ensures that the bill is in line with current South African law. Once approved, the bill is formally introduced into Parliament and, if passed, referred to the President to be signed into law. Id.; see also S. AFR. CONST. 1996 ss. 73, 82.

(89.) E-mail from Lowesa Stuurman, Researcher, SA Law Reform Comm'n, to Laura Najemy, J.D. Candidate, Washington University in St. Louis School of Law (Dec. 5, 2008, 05:35 CST) (on file with author).

(90.) Id.

(91.) E-mail from Gaile Moosmann, Executive Director, Parliamentary Monitoring Group, to Laura Najemy, J.D. Candidate, Washington University in St. Louis School of Law (Jan. 12, 2010, 03:38 CST) (on file with author).

(92.) The National Prosecuting Authority spearheaded an inter-sectoral task team on human trafficking in the Kwa-Zulu Natal province that has already proved successful. The Kwa-Zulu Natal province has seen a decrease in the number of brothels in Durban Central because of an increase in police activity in the area according to Police Superintendent Anton Booysen of the Kwa-Zulu Natal Human Trafficking, Prostitution, Pornography and Brothels Task Team. Kamin Padayachee, Battle to Control Brothels in Suburbs, MERCURY, Aug. 28, 2009, http://www.iol.co.za/index.php?set_id=1&click_id=2937&art_id=vn20090828042540710C294076. Additionally, international organizations have been influential in creating task teams to combat human trafficking in South Africa. The International Organization for Migration launched the Western Cape Provincial Task Team, South Africa's "first provincial civil society initiative against human trafficking," in 2008. SA: Western Cape Provincial Task Team on Human Trafficking Launched, EYE ON HUMAN TRAFFICKING: A BULLETIN OF NEWS, INFORMATION AND ANALYSIS ON TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS IN SOUTHERN AFRICA (International Organization for Migration, Pretoria, South Africa), Issue 17, 2008, at 6, available at http://iom.org.za/site/index.php?option=com_docman&task=doc_view&gid=101.

(93.) Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act, 22 U.S.C. [section] 7101 (2000) (amended 2003, 2005). The VTVPA Act was originally intended for three main purposes: "to combat trafficking in persons, a contemporary manifestation of slavery whose victims are predominantly women and children, to ensure just and effective punishment of traffickers, and to protect their victims." [section] 7101(a).

(94.) Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2003, H.R. 2620, 108th Cong. (2003).

(95.) Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2005, H.R. 972, 109th Cong. (2005).

(96.)

Minimum Standards--For purposes of this chapter, the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking applicable to the government of a country of origin, transit, or destination for a significant number of victims of severe forms of trafficking are the following:

(1) The government of the country should prohibit severe forms of trafficking in persons and punish acts of such trafficking.

(2) For the knowing commission of any act of sex trafficking involving force, fraud, coercion, or in which the victim of sex trafficking is a child incapable of giving meaningful consent, or of trafficking which includes rape or kidnapping or which causes a death, the government of the country should prescribe punishment commensurate with that for grave crimes, such as forcible sexual assault.

(3) For the knowing commission of any act of a severe form of trafficking in persons, the government of the country should prescribe punishment that is sufficiently stringent to deter and that adequately reflects the heinous nature of the offense.

(4) The government of the country should make serious and sustained efforts to eliminate severe forms of trafficking in persons. VTVP Act [section] 7106(a).

(97.) The Act also sets out seven criteria that "should be considered" as indicia of the fourth point above, "serious and sustained efforts to eliminate trafficking." VTVP Act [section] 7106(a)(4), (b). Summarized, they are:

1. Whether the government vigorously investigates and prosecutes acts of trafficking within its territory.
2. Whether the government protects victims of trafficking, encourages victims' assistance in investigation and prosecution, provides victims with legal alternatives to their removal to countries where they would face retribution or hardship, and ensures that victims are not inappropriately penalized solely for unlawful acts as a direct result of being trafficked.
3. Whether the government has adopted measures, such as public education, to prevent trafficking.
4. Whether the government cooperates with other governments in investigating and prosecuting trafficking.
5. Whether the government extradites persons charged with trafficking as it does with other serious crimes.
6. Whether the government monitors immigration and emigration patterns for evidence of trafficking, and whether law enforcement agencies respond appropriately to such evidence.
7. Whether the government vigorously investigates and prosecutes public officials who participate in or facilitate trafficking, and takes all appropriate measures against officials who condone trafficking.

[section] 7106(b). See also U.S. DEPT OF STATE, TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT 15 (2003), <http://www.state.gov/documents/organization/21555.pdf> [hereinafter 2003 TIP REPORT].

(98.)

If a government is not in compliance with the minimum standards, the Department's determination of whether that government is making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance with these minimum standards dictates its placement in Tier 2 or 3. The Act sets out three mitigating factors which the Department is to consider in making such determinations. Summarized, they are as follows:

1. the extent of trafficking in the country;
2. the extent of governmental noncompliance with the minimum standards, particularly the extent to which government officials have participated in, facilitated, condoned, or are otherwise complicit in trafficking; and
3. what measures are reasonable to bring the government into compliance with the minimum standards in light of the government's resources and capabilities.

Id. at 15-16.

(99.) VTVP Act, [section] 7101.

(100.) Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/> (last visited Sept. 15, 2009). The office "provides the tools to combat trafficking in persons and assists in the coordination of anti-trafficking efforts both worldwide and domestically." Id.

(101.) Major forms of trafficking include: forced labor, bonded labor, debt bondage and involuntary servitude among migrant laborers, involuntary domestic servitude, forced child labor, child soldiers, sex trafficking and prostitution, children exploited for commercial sex, and child sex tourism. 2008 TIP REPORT, supra note 16, at 19-25.

(102.) See 2008 TIP REPORT, supra note 16.

(103.) In the 2008 TIP Report, the recommendations for South Africa were:

Fully implement the trafficking provisions of the Sexual Offenses and Children's Acts and raise awareness among all levels of relevant government officials as to their responsibilities under these provisions; develop and employ national procedures for victim protection, including the identification of trafficking victims among undocumented immigrants; and regularly compile national statistics on the number of trafficking cases prosecuted and victims assisted, as is done for other crimes.

2008 TIP REPORT, supra note 16, at 228.

(104.) See Mohamed Y. Mattar, Incorporating the Five Basic Elements of a Model Antitrafficking in Persons Legislation in Domestic Laws: From the United Nations Protocol to the European Convention, 14 TUL. J. INT'L & COMP. L. 357 (2006) (suggesting that the U.S. approach of the "Three Ps" should be expanded to a "Five P's" approach that would focus on protection, participation, prevention, provision, and prosecution).

(105.)

Human Trafficking is: Process ([r]ecruitment or [t]ransportation or [t]ransferring or [h]arboring or [r]eceiving) and Way/Means ([t]hreat or [c]oercion or [a]bduction or [f]raud or [d]eception or

[d]eception or [a]buse of [p]ower) and Goal ([p]rostitution or

[p]ornography or [v]iolence/[s]exual [e]xploitation or [f]orced

[l]abor or [i]nvoluntary [s]ervitude or [d]epr [b]ondage with unfair wages or [s]lavery/[s]imilar practices).

2008 TIP REPORT, supra note 16, at 290.

(106.) 2009 TIP REPORT, supra note 9, at 260.

(107.) See SA LAW REFORM COMM'N REPORT, supra note 7, Annexure D, at 13-18 (Chapter 3 is titled "Offences and Penalties.").

(108.) See id., Annexure D, at 18-33 (Chapter 4 is titled "Identification and Protection of Victim of Trafficking." Chapter 5 is titled "Status of Foreign Victim of Trafficking." Chapter 6 is titled "Services to Adult Victims of Trafficking." Chapter 7 is titled "Compensation." Chapter 8 is titled "Deportation and Repatriation of Victim of Trafficking.").

(109.) See id., Annexure D, at 12-13, 33-45 (Chapter 2 is titled "Prevention of Trafficking in Persons." Chapter 9 is titled "General Provisions." Chapter 10 is titled "Administration of Act.").

(110.)

The Government of South Africa does not fully comply with the for the elimination of is making significant efforts to do so. The government opened

The Government of South Africa does not fully comply with the for the elimination of is making significant efforts to do so. The government opened prosecutions against 16 suspected trafficking offenders during the year and is continuing to prepare for late 2009 passage and subsequent implementation of its comprehensive anti-trafficking law by developing inter-agency operating procedures and training officials on the law, victim identification, and agency roles.

2009 TIP REPORT, supra note 9, at 260.

(111.) See id. at 50.

(112.) See U.S. DEP'T OF STATE, TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT 39 (2004), <http://www.state.gov/documents/organization/34158.pdf> [hereinafter 2004 TIP REPORT].

(113.) Id. at 30. Both downward and upward movement of classification within the tiers is very possible. For example, in 2003, Canada was demoted from Tier 1 to Tier 2. 2003 TIP REPORT, supra note 97; U.S. DEP'T OF STATE, TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT (2002), <http://www.state.gov/documents/organization/10815.pdf> [hereinafter 2002 TIP REPORT]. Yet, according to the 2004 TIP Report,

[t]he Government of Canada fully complies with the minimum standards for the elimination of Interdepartmental Working Group coordinates and reports on the effectiveness of the national anti-trafficking policy. Senior government officials are speaking out more often, and more resources are being devoted to border control; a new RCMP anti-trafficking taskforce is also being created. For these reasons, Canada has been reclassified from Tier 2 to Tier 1.

2004 TIP REPORT, supra note 112, at 228.

(114.) Some anecdotal evidence already exists suggesting that there will be a surge in trafficking in persons in anticipation of the 2010 World Cup. "IOM in Ethiopia, for example, is increasingly aware of stories of men who are promised lucrative contracts in the construction industry in South Africa as the country prepares for the football World Cup in 2010." Press Briefing, Int'l Org. for Migration, Research on Trafficking of Men for Labour Exploitation (Dec. 18, 2007), <http://www.iom.int/jahia/Jahia/pbnAF/cache/offonce?entryId=16263>.

(115.) The SALRC's report is comprehensive, and it outlines and explains the rationale behind the proposed legislation. It is important to note that the SALRC's Report takes into consideration not only the views of the SALRC and the Department of Justice, but also those of South African society as a whole. The SALRC investigation process involves three main steps, and after each, various governmental and nongovernmental agencies and organizations are allotted a substantial amount of time to comment on the document to allow for the most complete investigation possible.

The first step is publication of an issue paper. The SALRC website explains:

In order to actively involve the community at an earlier stage, the Commission has decided to publish issue papers for appropriate investigations as the first step in the consultation process. The purpose of an issue paper is to announce an investigation, to elucidate the aim and extent of the investigation, to point to possible options available for solving existing problems and to initiate and stimulate debate on identified issues by way of

In order to actively involve the community at an earlier stage, the Commission has decided to publish issue papers for appropriate investigations as the first step in the consultation process. The including specific questions on relevant issues.

South African Law Reform Comm'n, Issue Papers Index, <http://www.doj.gov.za/salrc/ipapers.htm> (last visited Aug. 5, 2009). The SALRC's Issue Paper on Trafficking in Persons was published in early 2004 and was open for commentary until April 30, 2004. Id.

The second step is publication of a discussion paper. The SALRC website explains: Discussion papers, previously referred to as working papers, are documents in which the Commission's preliminary research results are contained. In most cases discussion papers also contain draft legislation which gives effect to the Commission's tentative recommendations and proposals. The main purpose of these documents is to test public opinion on solutions identified by the Commission.

South African Law Reform Comm'n, Discussion Papers Index, <http://www.doj.gov.za/salrc/dpapers.htm> (last visited Aug. 5, 2009). The Discussion Paper on Trafficking in Persons was published on May 5, 2006, and was open for commentary until June 30, 2006. Id.

The third step is publication of a final report. The SALRC published the final report on Project 131, Trafficking in Persons, on November 25, 2008, and subsequently submitted it to the Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development. South African Law Reform Comm'n, Reports Index, supra note 6.

(116.)

The Bill of Rights contained in Chapter 2 of the Constitution is the cornerstone of the provides that no one may be subjected to forced labour. It states that everyone has the right to freedom and security of the person, which includes the right not to be deprived of freedom arbitrarily or without just cause, the right to be free from all forms of violence from either public or private sources, the right not to be tortured in any way and the right not to be treated or punished in a cruel, inhuman or degrading way. It further affirms the democratic values of human dignity and freedom of movement. Children also have the right to be protected from maltreatment, neglect, abuse or degradation and the right to be protected from exploitative labour practices.

SA LAW REFORM COMM'N REPORT, supra note 7, at 3 (citing S. AFR. CONST. 1996 ss. 10, 12, 13, 21, 28) (internal footnotes omitted).

Laura Brooks Najemy, J.D. Candidate (2010), Washington University in Saint Louis School of Law; B.A. (2006), Boston University; B.S. (2006), Boston University. The author would like to thank her parents for their never ending support and encouragement as well as Taryn Janine Powys and Anna Rachel Dray-Siegel for their assistance and advice.

LOAD-DATE: April 21, 2010

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

ACC-NO: 6636944

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Fulltext

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Journal

JOURNAL-CODE: 0PBU

Copyright 2010 Gale Group, Inc.
All Rights Reserved
Business and Management Practices
Copyright 2010 Washington University, School of Law

260 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Jerusalem Post

December 31, 2009 Thursday

Activists: Canceling Ukraine visas won't increase trafficking. Debate follows Yishai's claims that 'Ukraine is a hub of prostitution'

BYLINE: RUTH EGLASHSECTION: NEWS; Pg. 6LENGTH: 695 words

Anti-trafficking activists expressed doubt Wednesday over claims made by Interior Minister Eli Yishai that canceling visa requirements from Ukraine would likely increase human trafficking or prostitution in Israel.

Following statements made this week by Yishai - who called Ukraine a center of prostitution - Amnesty International Anti-Trafficking Adviser Gal Harmat Ben-Meir told The Jerusalem Post that "even with current visa requirements it is not too difficult for those involved in trafficking to bring women into Israel."

Also an adviser to the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) and the United Nations Development Project (UNDP) on trafficking activities in Moldova and Belarus, Harmat Ben-Meir said that arguing over visa requirements was not the way to reduce such activities.

"Eli Yishai fights over visas but does nothing to fight trafficking itself," she charged, adding that more needed to be done to prosecute those facilitating the sex trade, including clients who utilize such services.

"I believe most people who want to come here from Ukraine do so because they are visiting family members and not because they want to stay here and work in the sex industry," added Harmat Ben-Meir, pointing out that Ukraine was no longer considered a main center for trafficking operations but nearby Moldova and Belarus were.

In addition, she also noted that since visa requirements from Russia - another center for human trafficking - to Israel were cancelled just over a year ago, there had not been an increase in such activities.

Rather, the easing of entry requirements for Russian citizens visiting Israel, which has greatly boosted tourism from that country, is exactly the reason the debate over dropping entry restrictions from Ukraine was ignited this week.

A spokesman for Tourism Minister Stas Meseznikov told the Post that visits to Israel by Russian tourists had increased by 84 percent after visa requirements were eased in 2008 and by a further 12% this year, bringing the total number of visitors from Russia up to 400,000. This was a great boost for Israel's tourism industry in a year when overall tourism figures had slumped, he said.

Both the Israel Hotels Association and Israel's Incoming Tour Operators Association sent letters Tuesday to Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman and Yishai urging them to consider canceling tourist visas from Ukraine based on the success of the Russian model.

The matter was meant to have been discussed last Sunday at the weekly cabinet meeting, however protests from Yishai meant it was postponed to this coming Sunday.

A spokesman for Yishai said Wednesday that the minister's concerns were based on information provided by the Public Security Ministry last year when the issue of canceling visas for Russian tourists was being debated.

"At the time, the Public Security Ministry said that Ukraine was much more a problem than Russia because it is the source of trafficking in women," he told the Post, adding that the minister insisted on creating an inter-ministerial committee to discuss the matter properly before allowing it to come up for a direct vote in the cabinet.

"These comments were made by [then Public Security Minister] Avi Dichter last year," responded Meseznikov's spokesman. "It is a shame that a minister bases his judgment on out of date [information] that is not exact."

However, the Justice Ministry's Rachel Gershoni, who coordinates the government's efforts in the battle against trafficking, told the Post that officials in her ministry were also concerned by the proposal to cancel visa requirements from Ukraine.

"It used to be a central country involved in trafficking operations and even now it is on the US State Department's [Trafficking in Persons report] watch list," she said. "That is very problematic."

"Russia was never a central country involved in trafficking and that is the main difference," added Gershoni, highlighting that combating such criminal activities needed to be focused on three main areas: prosecution of the perpetrators, protection for the victims and prevention, namely securing the borders so that such women cannot be brought into the country.

LOAD-DATE: October 4, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Photo: Eli Yishai

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

261 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

December 18, 2009 Friday 11:28 AM GMT

Myanmar stung by US criticism of human trafficking record

LENGTH: 292 wordsDATELINE: YANGON, Dec 18 2009

Myanmar's military rulers are "disappointed" by US criticism of their efforts to combat human trafficking, a senior police colonel said Friday.

"We are doing all we can do to address the human trafficking issue, which is, as we all know, a complex issue," said Police Colonel Sit Aye at a ceremony to launch a documentary raising awareness of trafficking in the region.

Sit Aye, who heads the transnational crime unit of the Myanmar police force, said Myanmar should no longer be placed on Washington's "Tier 3" for trafficking.

The US State Department places on Tier 3 those countries whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards on human trafficking and are not making significant efforts to stem the problem.

"We are disappointed about the continuous placement of Myanmar in Tier 3... as we feel that our efforts, not only of the government but also of UN agencies and international organisations, have not been well acknowledged," he said.

Myanmar enacted the international Anti-trafficking in Persons law in 2005 and has signed two bilateral agreements -- with Thailand in April and China in November -- to combat human trafficking, he said.

The police colonel said that more than 400 cases of human trafficking had been identified and more than 1,100 offenders prosecuted since the law was enacted.

Sit Aye spoke at the launch of a documentary by the US government-funded MTV Exit campaign, a regional public awareness initiative supported through USAID to educate people about the dangers of human trafficking.

Myanmar has been ruled by the military since 1962. Tens of thousands of people, particularly in rural areas, are estimated to leave the country every year in search of better jobs, unaware of the dangers of human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: December 19, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

262 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Globe and Mail (Canada)

December 16, 2009 Wednesday

As countries shut out migrants to stay afloat, Canada warned it will become the new safe harbour

BYLINE: JOE FRIESENSECTION: NATIONAL NEWS; IMMIGRATION REPORT; Pg. A1LENGTH: 726 words

DEMOGRAPHICS REPORTER

The worst recession in a generation has already played havoc with the job market, housing prices and the banking system. Now it's doing the same with something else: the worldwide movement of people.

The world's wealthiest nations, from Japan to Spain to Australia, are cutting immigration targets to protect fragile labour markets and encouraging itinerant workers to leave. Only Canada has refused to adjust immigration levels in response to the downturn.

This outlier status has led to concern among border officials that the country's sympathetic refugee system and generous social programs will make it a prime target for migrants rejected elsewhere.

A government intelligence document described as sensitive and not for public distribution warns that more migrants from Africa, Asia, Eastern Europe and Latin America could opt to come to Canada rather than Western Europe or the United States. The report refers to both legal applicants and those who try to enter illegally.

"We're planning for the economic recovery. Cutting immigration levels is a short-term measure," said Alykhan Velshi, spokesman for Citizenship and Immigration Minister Jason Kenney. At the same time, Mr. Velshi said, Canada must guard against those who would try to enter illegally.

Asylum claims in Canada increased dramatically in 2008, and were on pace for another increase in 2009 until visa restrictions were slapped on travellers from Mexico and the Czech Republic, he said.

"Individuals who may not be fleeing persecution are drawn to Canada because of our overly generous asylum system," Mr. Velshi said. Human trafficking rings in Canada and the Czech Republic, for example, were encouraging people to make refugee claims in Canada, he added.

"This is something we have to take very seriously ... We can't allow the creation of a two-tier immigration system: one tier for people who wait patiently and legally in the queue to come to Canada and another for profiteers, for those who engage the services of snakeheads and human trafficking groups."

The trigger for the shift in migration patterns and immigration policy is the domino-effect in labour markets unleashed by the recession, the report says. Unemployment is expected to rise to 10 per cent in developed countries and could stay that high for up to eight years, it states. Those at the bottom of the wage scale, and those with temporary status, or none at all, in their host countries are likely to be among the first and most severely affected.

As jobs disappear, host countries are lowering immigration quotas to trim welfare rolls and quell potential anti-immigrant feeling. They're also bolstering immigration enforcement. Authorities in Italy and Spain, for example, have redoubled their efforts to expel undocumented workers and prevent boatloads of African migrants from reaching their shores. Japan announced plans to send home 400,000 South Americans of Japanese heritage to ease its labour market strain. Spain has returned 300,000 migrants and paid 6,000 others a special supplement to leave the country. Australia reduced its intake targets by nearly 15 per cent.

The report, produced by the Canada Border Services Agency, was obtained by immigration lawyer Richard Kurland through access to information. Mr. Kurland said the document shows that the wisest path is to further integrate the temporary foreign workers already in Canada and not reduce immigration.

The document forecasts unrest in the migrants' home countries that could create a complicated feedback loop of migration issues. Migrants send their families about $283-billion a year, and when remittances from some countries dry up, poverty will be exacerbated, which in turn can destabilize the population and encourage more people to seek any route to a well-paying job. Desperation could lead more people to human smugglers and organized crime, it says.

"The knee-jerk reaction is to yank the welcome mat and this internal intelligence report clearly shows that's not the way to go ... You're going to be exporting political instability by exporting workers into regions already fragile politically and economically. It will inevitably hasten their decline," Mr. Kurland said. "In the short term, protecting foreign workers who are already in Canada is the gateway to future economic growth."

LOAD-DATE: December 16, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2009 The Globe and Mail, a division of CTVglobemedia Publishing Inc.
All Rights Reserved

263 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

December 9, 2009 Wednesday 9:17 AM GMT

Human rights worsening under Malaysia's new PM: watchdog

LENGTH: 362 wordsDATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR, Dec 9 2009

Malaysia's human rights record has deteriorated under new premier Najib Razak, a leading rights group alleged Wednesday, saying he was more intolerant of dissent than his predecessors.

Launching its annual report, Voice of the Malaysian People (Suaram) criticised Najib's performance since he took office in April, including the arrest of nearly 600 people in a protest against internal security laws.

It also cited the arrest of 167 people in May "for holding candlelit vigils" during a political crisis over the control of a northern state.

"We warned the new leadership of Najib might herald a new era of stronger authoritarianism compared to previous prime ministers, and what we see so far is the exact thing we thought would happen," said Suaram coordinator John Liu.

Najib came to power vowing to heal race relations in the multi-ethnic country, and to review a tough Internal Security Act (ISA) which allows indefinite detention without trial.

Suaram demanded the ISA be abolished, saying there had been seven new arrests under the law this year even though 39 detainees were freed. Currently nine people are still being held under the ISA.

"We don't think there is any improvement on human rights. Out of a ranking of 1-10, I would give Najib a score of three to four," Suaram director Kua Kia Soong told a press conference.

In the report, Suaram said Najib has displayed an "increased level of intolerance" towards dissent and was "seriously undermining the freedom of speech, expression and assembly".

Institutions such as the judiciary and police continued to suffer a "serious crisis of public confidence", the group said.

It also said it was "very concerned" about the plight of indigenous people, amid arrests over land claims and rape allegations that have been the subject of a government investigation.

The report said Malaysia continued to be listed as one of the worst places for refugees by a US watchdog, and had been reinstated by the United States on a human trafficking blacklist.

Suaram also urged the government to approve a freedom of information act, noting the country only scored 132 out of 173 on the Reporters Without Borders' global press freedom index.

LOAD-DATE: December 10, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2009 Agence France Presse
All Rights Reserved

264 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Washington Times

December 8, 2009 Tuesday

To end human trafficking; Survivors craft, sell products

BYLINE: By Meredith Hulley SPECIAL TO THE WASHINGTON TIMESSECTION: A, CITIZEN JOURNALISM: SUBURBIA; Pg. 17LENGTH: 1185 words

Prince George's County Executive Jack B. Johnson was the keynote speaker at the Human Trafficking Summit hosted by the African Tourism Organization at the National Harbor earlier this fall.

"I cannot think of a better place to have a summit like this," Mr. Johnson stated. "Our county is very diverse, with many nations represented in our population. Therefore, it is proper that we be at the forefront of the discussion and the fight against human trafficking."

Mr. Johnson pledged during the Sept. 18 and 19 summit that he would set up special units of local prosecutors dedicated to investigating human trafficking and heightening awareness among police.

"Working together, we can build the foundation for an effort that will ensure that families are no longer separated from each other for such cruel and inhuman intentions, and we can see that those who would use human trafficking as a way to make money are caught and prosecuted to the full extent of the law," Mr. Johnson stated.

According to the State Department's 2008 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report, "human trafficking is a multi-dimensional threat. It deprives people of their human rights and freedoms, it increases global health risks, and it fuels the growth of organized crime."

The TIP report divides human trafficking, which affects up to 27 million people each year, into nine major categories: forced labor, bonded labor, debt bondage and involuntary servitude among migrant laborers, involuntary domestic servitude, forced child labor, child soldiers, sex trafficking and prostitution, children exploited for commercial sex, and child sex tourism.

"Human trafficking has a devastating impact on individual victims, who often suffer physical and emotional abuse, rape, threats against self and family, and even death," according to the TIP report. "But the impact of human trafficking goes beyond individual victims; it undermines health, safety, and security of all nations it touches."

Mr. Johnson isn't the only one making a difference in the fight against human trafficking.

When Anna Leung was in college at the Rochester Institute of Technology, she watched a documentary about human trafficking and "decided I was going to spend my life working to stop it."

Earlier this year, she founded a company, Restoring International Justice Imports Green (RIJI Green), to assist trafficking survivors by selling merchandise made by survivors and donating the profits.

"I've been an abolitionist for six years," said Ms. Leung, 25, who lives in Manassas.

Ms. Leung said she had worked with organizations before, and when the time came to make a decision about starting out on her own, her husband told her to pray. When she did, she discovered a Bible passage that read, "The fields are ripe for harvesting."

"Long story short, that's how I founded RIJI Green," Ms. Leung said. "Through my experience working with survivors, through my experiences with all these different human trafficking issues, and through an affirmation from God."

Because trafficking is "mainly caused by poverty, RIJI Green's solution to end modern-day slavery is through economic empowerment for at-risk [people] and survivors of human trafficking," she said.

The products, which include bags and journals, are made by survivors in their own countries and shipped to the United States for sale. Ms. Leung said she makes contact with the survivors through organizations designed to help them after they're rescued from slavery.

In November, RIJI Green partnered with the International Justice Mission (IJM) and donated half its profits to help free people from slavery. The original goal was to raise $45,000, which would have sponsored 10 rescue operations. Though the company did not reach its goal, "we are still hoping to be able to raise $45,000 for IJM by" Dec. 31, Ms. Leung said via e-mail.

She said she chose IJM because of the unique mission of the organization.

"They actually train the public justice system on how to handle trafficking cases, and they also prosecute the traffickers, which is so important," Ms. Leung said. "Because I believe you can rescue as many victims as you can, but if you do not hold the perpetrators accountable, then this issue will not be able to overcome without putting the perpetrators in jail."

Ms. Leung also has taken part in Stop Modern Slavery, a group dedicated to ending human trafficking. The group held a walk in the District's Meridian Hill Park in September with more than 700 participants and raised $40,000.

A stay-at-home-mom to two boys, Ms. Leung said she is very happy with her decision to found RIJI Green.

"I wake up every morning excited," she said.

While Ms. Leung's efforts are concentrated mainly in India, other organizations, including the State Department, are concentrating efforts to end trafficking in every country around the world, including the United States.

Tier 1 countries include those that deal with some human trafficking but are not major sources of trafficked people, though they are sometimes destinations for people who are trafficked.

Tier 2 countries are those where trafficking is more widespread but not considered a major problem. Countries also can be placed on the Tier 2 watch list, meaning they are in danger of becoming Tier 3 countries.

Finally, Tier 3 countries are those where trafficking is a huge problem and often a lucrative business.

It is important to realize that no country is immune from the problem and that it can happen anywhere. One country that finds itself in the Tier 1 category is the United States. That doesn't mean this country is exempt from trafficking problems.

Sean A'Hearn, an author, was with his wife in Atlanta when he saw the "baby stroll," which is when "kids who have not yet reached sexual maturity are out there earning a little extra money." He decided to "channel my outrage" into a book.

A successful author of young-adult novels who writes under a pen name, Mr. A'Hearn was outraged when he found out that the "baby strolls" take place "from San Francisco to New York."

He eventually wrote the book "The Power and the Plunder," about two young women who escape from trafficking in the Congo. He based his information on countless interviews he did with prostitutes and call girls within the United States.

"You learn quickly not to ask them about themselves," Mr. A'Hearn said. "They're happy to tell you about stories they've heard. And then you hear stories about abductions and you hear stories of enslavement.

"And I learned not to make notes. I would run back to the car and take notes," he said. "So it was almost like we were having a little chat, so they wouldn't get in trouble with their own slavemasters."

When asked if he hopes the book will influence people to get involved, Mr. A'Hearn responded, "Oh, I know it will.

"It will influence people to contribute. It will raise awareness," he said. "It takes a while to get things done in our country. I remember when MADD [Mothers Against Drunk Driving] got started and it was nothing. And they changed the whole thing."

* Meredith Hulley is a freelance writer and University of Maryland student.

LOAD-DATE: December 8, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2009 The Washington Times LLC
All Rights Reserved

265 of 404 DOCUMENTS

New Straits Times (Malaysia)

December 1, 2009 Tuesday

Home Ministry probes human trafficking ring

BYLINE: V. Vasudevan; Sajahan Waheed; Lydia Gomez

SECTION: Pg. 10

LENGTH: 332 words

ONE government officer has been taken to court for trafficking in Myanmar refugees, Home Minister Datuk Seri Hishammuddin Hussein said yesterday.

He said the ministry is investigating the issue which has been cited as one of the main reasons for Malaysia being black-listed by the US State Department in its Trafficking in Persons Report this year.

Malaysia and 16 other countries were placed on Tier 3 of the report which analysed efforts taken to combat human trafficking in 173 countries.

In a written reply to Lim Lip Eng (DAP-Segambut), Hishammuddin said the government officer was among the 39 human trafficking cases prosecuted so far.

He said since the Anti-Human Trafficking Act was enforced in February last year, 88 people have been arrested and five were charged and convicted.

Other efforts to tackle the problem include a five-year National Anti-Human Trafficking Strategic Action Plan; setting up more shelters for victims, especially in Sabah and Sarawak, including one shelter for male victims; working with Australia, United States and the Netherlands to carry out awareness programmes for enforcement officers and improving the cooperation network in neighbouring and sender countries.

"The Myanmar refugee problem is not something that can be handled by Malaysia alone because this is a regional and international problem.

"This issue has to be dealt with carefully by rectifying the root cause."

He said the Attorney-General's Chambers was reviewing the act to resolve any ambiguity and to study whether human smuggling should be included in the law.

During question time in the house, Deputy Home Minister Datuk Wira Abu Seman Yusop said there were 64,731 Malaysia-born people holding red identity cards.

He said Sabah had the highest number of red IC holders with 12,000 people, followed by Selangor (11,307), Perak (6,589) and Johor (5,509).

He said this in reply to a question by Tan Tee Beng (PKR-Nibong Tebal) who wanted to know how many Malaysians were still red IC holders.

(END)

LOAD-DATE: November 30, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2009 New Straits Times Press (Malaysia) Berhad
All Rights Reserved

266 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

November 30, 2009 Monday

South Africa; Spotlight On Trafficking Syndicates Ahead of 2010

BYLINE: West Cape News (Cape Town)

LENGTH: 502 words

As the world's media focuses its attention on the Fifa World Cup 2010 Final Draw in Cape Town on December 4, few will be aware of the impact the tournament may have on the lives of vulnerable women and children targeted by trafficking syndicates.

National Trafficking Awareness Day, which takes place two days before the draw, on December 2, hopes to raise some awareness about the global problem.

"The huge influx of people over this period will drive demand. Of equal concern is the amount of school age children who will be trafficked during this time. We have already come across cases of children going missing in schools and we expect this to escalate over the 2010 period," said Natalie Bulling, coordinator for Red Light Human Trafficking, an initiative started with the intention of combating and creating awareness about the disturbing prevalence of human trafficking in Southern Africa.

Concerns have been raised by Red Light and other organisations operating in this field, that more than 100 000 people could be trafficked into the country during the World Cup.

Currently South Africa has no legislation to cover human trafficking; as a result, a lot of cases slip through the radar. "The absence of legislation has impacted on the data-collection, investigation and prosecution of people involved with in-country and cross border trafficking," said Julayga Alfred, Director of Activists Networking against the Exploitation of Child Domestic Workers (Anex CDW).

A global report on trafficking has identified South Africa as source, transit and destination country for the trafficking of women, men and children. The Trafficking in Person's (TIP) report has put South Africa on the Tier Two Watch list, for the fourth consecutive year for its failure to show increasing efforts to address trafficking. More than 175 countries are included in the report, the most comprehensive worldwide research on the efforts of governments to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons. Ranging from Tier One to Three, the Tier Two Watch list places South Africa in a danger zone in terms of compliance with laws to prevent trafficking.

Director of child rights organisation Molo Songololo, Patric Solomons, said children have been identified as the most vulnerable during the World Cup.

"The vulnerable status of children places them at particular risk of being exploited by their elders in the hope of economic gain. Pull factors specifically related to the 2010 Fifa World Cup are mostly linked to poorer communities' perceptions regarding the socio-economic benefits of the event," said Solomons.

The United Nations estimates that child trafficking generates $US7 to $10 billion annually for traffickers, citing trafficking in persons as the second most lucrative crime around the world next to the drug trade.

Solomons said the importance of large-scale awareness campaigns during the World Cup, which is expected to generate more than $4-billion, the highest revenue in World Cup history, is of the utmost importance.

LOAD-DATE: December 1, 2009

1970

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

Copyright 2009 AllAfrica, Inc.

267 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

November 29, 2009 Sunday

Fiji decree creates crime of trafficking in people

LENGTH: 340 words

Text of press release carried by Fiji government website on 28 November

The president of Fiji has commended government for its initiative in making Fiji compliant with international standards with respect to human trafficking. Ratu Epeli Nailatikau said that human trafficking was a growing area of concern internationally and Fiji's history and that of the Pacific sadly recorded that the country had experienced the traumas of institutionalized human trafficking. He said that the new Crimes Decree addressed the issue of human trafficking by creating offences of trafficking in persons and children, as well as offences of domestic and international trafficking.

"The decree creates a new and separate offence of trafficking in person. Section 112 of the decree provides that a person commits an indictable offence of trafficking in person if the person organizes or facilitates the entry or proposed entry of another person into Fiji with the use of force or threat," the president explained.

Ratu Epeli said that the new provisions in the decree ensured that Fiji was now fully compliant with its international obligations in the various international and regional treaties and conventions that dealt with human trafficking. He cautioned that we must be on guard given our recent experience which showed that history could very well repeat itself and that Fiji could be used as a conduit to the global phenomenon of human trafficking.

In addition, the president said that there was a need to remove Fiji from its Tier 3 category in the United States State Department Trafficking in Persons Report which was published in June this year and covered 166 countries.

Tier 3 is made up of "countries whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so. There are five countries of the Pacific Islands Forum featured in the report, with Australia and New Zealand in Tier 1, Palau in Tier 2 and Fiji and Papua New Guinea in Tier 3.

Source: Fiji government website, Suva, in English 28 Nov 09

LOAD-DATE: November 29, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

268 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Worldstream

November 16, 2009 Monday 8:04 PM GMTUS official: Kuwait moving against modern slavery*BYLINE: By DIANA ELIAS, Associated Press WriterSECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 224 wordsDATELINE: KUWAIT CITY

Oil-rich Kuwait, which has been on a U.S. watch list of countries suspected of not doing enough to fight human trafficking, has taken encouraging steps to combat modern-day slavery, a senior U.S. official said Monday.

The State Department's latest report on trafficking in people says the majority of victims in Kuwait are from among the more than 500,000 foreign women recruited as domestic helpers. They suffer from confinement, abuse and nonpayment of wages.

Asian men employed to clean offices and streets often complain their salaries are not paid for months, and thousands have staged strikes in recent years that sometimes turned violent.

The director of the U.S. State Department's anti-human trafficking office, Luis CdeBaca, said Kuwait now has a law before parliament that will help fight human trafficking.

"I'm beginning to see that kind of response from Kuwait, which is very encouraging," he told The Associated Press after a weeklong tour of the Middle East.

CdeBaca said the numbers of trafficking victims seeking refuge at their embassies in Kuwait were "pretty astounding." He said one embassy alone said it dealt with more than 5,000 citizens a year. He did not say which embassy or provide an overall figure.

Kuwait has set up a temporary shelter for runaway maids and promised to build another with a capacity to help 700 people.

LOAD-DATE: November 17, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

269 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Gulf Daily News

November 15, 2009

Human trafficking 'escalating in GCC'

BYLINE: MANDEEP SINGH

LENGTH: 648 words

The problem of human trafficking in the GCC region is of "alarming proportions", but there is a strong will to solve it, a top US official said yesterday (Nov 12).

US State Department Ambassador-at-Large to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, Luis C de Baca, said the issue was still a long way from being addressed completely.

"Be it female domestic help from not being covered under the labour law or the inhuman treatment of construction workers, all of the GCC countries are on an equal footing," he told a round table discussion at the Gulf Hotel.

"Bahrain and other nations in the region, except Oman, fall on a tier two watch list but that needs to get better," he said.

"Oman is the only nation that is cracking down heavily on traffickers."

The US State Department annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) ranks countries in a tier system.

Those in Tier 1 have governments which fully comply with the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorisation Act's minimum standards, while Tier 2 countries are those whose governments do not fully comply with the act's minimum standards but are making significant efforts to do so.

The US ranks countries in Tier 3 as those whose governments do not fully comply with the act's minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so.

Mr de Baca said another issue was that several government agencies seemed to be working at cross purposes, including in Bahrain.

"There was the case of some Chinese women in Bahrain who were seized in a police raid on a hotel and police took the case to the prosecutors under the trafficking law, but prosecutors felt that was the wrong law to have been applied," he said.

"In this case, maybe the police could have prepared better or the prosecutors could have taken the police line. That did not happen."

Mr de Baca said government agencies working at cross purposes ultimately benefit traffickers who take advantage of the rigmarole and carry on with their activities. "No nation, anywhere in the world, can achieve success unless there is unanimity of purpose," he said.

Mr de Baca said withholding workers' passports, the sponsorship system for guest workers and those not doing what they were brought to do were also cases of trafficking.

"Meetings we have had at the Labour, Foreign Affairs and Justice ministries have concluded the problem is immense," he said.

"The issue has also been recognised as worrisome by foreign embassies and non-government organisations. There is also unanimity there should be solutions and that is encouraging."

Mr de Baca said they had been assured at the government level that laws were under way to help prevent such cases.

"Hopefully, we shall see these laws implemented pretty soon," said the official.

He said Bahrain seemed to be doing better than most of its neighbours because of the laws that are in the pipeline, which he said match set United Nations standards.

Mr de Baca said that the US State Department did not have any figures for the numbers of people trafficked and exploited in the GCC, but that the numbers were 'very large'.

"As far as prosecutions in such cases go, these are also very, very few," he said.

The official said that he did not recall a single instance of employers holding their employees' passports had been brought to court.

He said that housemaids, in particular, should be able to go out and seek help and know that help is waiting for them.

Mr de Baca was appointed by President Barack Obama to co-ordinate US government activities in the global fight against contemporary forms of slavery.

He serves as senior advisor to the Secretary of State and directs the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, which assesses global trends, provides training and technical assistance and advocates for an end to modern slavery.

He formerly served as counsel to the house committee on the judiciary.

mandeep@gdn.com.bh

LOAD-DATE: November 15, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: 5

270 of 404 DOCUMENTS

November 2, 2009 Monday 5:37 PM EST

Recession boosts global human trafficking, report says

BYLINE: By Elise Labott, CNN State Department Producer

SECTION: U.S.

LENGTH: 787 words

DATELINE: Washington

The global financial crisis has increased the worldwide trade in trafficked persons, says a State Department report released in June.

The State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report also says trafficking has increased in Africa and slaps six African nations on a blacklist of countries not meeting the minimum standard of combating trafficking.

The report, mandated by Congress, features data and statistics from 175 countries around the world regarding the amount of human trafficking that goes on within their borders.

The report cites the International Labor Organization, which estimates that at least 12.3 million adults and children are victims of forced labor, bonded labor and sex slavery each year.

"This is modern slavery. A crime that spans the globe, providing ruthless employers with endless supply of people to abuse for financial gain," Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said as she announced the report. "With this report, we hope to shine the light brightly on the scope and scale of modern slavery, so all governments can see where progress has been made and where more is needed."

The report says the global economic crisis is boosting the demand for human trafficking because of a growing demand for cheap goods and services.

"A striking global demand for labor and a growing supply of workers willing to take ever greater risks for economic opportunities seem a recipe for increased forced labor cases of migrant workers and women in prostitution," it says.

It predicts that the economic crisis will push more businesses underground to avoid taxes and unionized labor, which will increase the use of forced, cheap and child labor by cash-strapped multinational companies.

African countries Nigeria and Mauritius are praised in the report for making strong efforts to combat trafficking.

But six African nations -- Chad, Eritrea, Mauritania, Niger, Swaziland and Zimbabwe -- were put on the report's "Tier 3" blacklist of countries whose efforts to combat trafficking are inadequate.

Most of the countries are "source" and "destination" countries, the report says, meaning trafficking victims both come from and are sent there. Most are trafficked throughout Africa, but many end up in the Middle East, it says.

Iran, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and Syria remain on the blacklist for another year, with the report saying they often become a destination for trafficked persons who are sold into domestic servitude. Other repeat offenders on the list include North Korea, Myanmar and Fiji.

The State Department also put Malaysia in the Tier 3 list, because of its trafficking of Burmese refugees.

The report cites information that Malaysian immigration officials sold refugees to traffickers operating along its border with Thailand. When the victims were unable to pay a ransom demanded by the traffickers, the report says, they were sold for labor and commercial sex exploitation.

The blacklisted countries are subject to U.S. sanctions if they don't make greater efforts to fight trafficking.

The Philippines, Cambodia, Bangladesh and Pakistan were added to a "watch list" because of what the report calls a worsening trafficking record in those countries. The 52 countries on the watch list have failed to meet the minimum anti-trafficking standards but are making efforts to do so.

For the first time, countries that have been on the watch list for two years -- including China, Russia, India, Sri Lanka and Egypt -- will automatically be moved to the Tier 3 blacklist next year without a presidential waiver if they fail improve their trafficking record, the State Department said.

This year, the Justice Department also put out a report on U.S. efforts to combat trafficking efforts at home. In 2008, the FBI opened 132 trafficking investigations, made 139 arrests and obtained 94 convictions.

Clinton invited to the event members of Congress who are active on the issue, as well as global advocates for trafficking victims, in an effort to give the issue a higher profile and shine a spotlight on the need to combat it.

Calling for a renewed worldwide partnership between countries and non-governmental organizations to combat trafficking, Clinton said, "Trafficking thrives in the shadows, and it can be easy to dismiss it as something that happens to someone else, somewhere else. But that's not the case.

"Trafficking is a crime that involves every nation on Earth, and that includes our own," she said, calling trafficking a "grave problem" in the United States.

For the first time, she said, the United States next year will rank its own efforts at combating trafficking along with the rest of the world. She expressed hope that it will be on the Tier 1 list of countries that are making robust efforts.

LOAD-DATE: November 7, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

271 of 404 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

October 31, 2009 Saturday 11:29 PM EST

OFFICE TO MONITOR, COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS FUNDING INFORMATION

LENGTH: 858 words

WASHINGTON, Oct. 30 -- The U.S. Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons issued the following press release:

Bidders Conference for 2010 Grant Competition:

G/TIP invites those interested in applying for 2010 funding for projects to combat trafficking in persons (TIP) outside of the U.S. to attend a Bidders' Conference on Thursday, November 5, 2009, 1:00-3:00 PM. Subject to the availability of funds, G/TIP will solicit proposals for fiscal year 2010 funding in early November.

The Bidders' Conference will be held in the Dean Acheson Auditorium at the U.S. Department of State, 2201 C Street Northwest Washington, DC. Photo identification is required for admittance. Guests are asked to be cleared through security at the 23rd Street entrance of the State Department (between C and D Streets NW) no later than 12:30 pm.

To register for this conference please contact Christina Johnson at JohnsonCW@state.gov and provide the following information: full name, name of the organization you represent, date of birth, and government issued I.D. number, for example, a driver's license or passport number.

General Information about G/TIP Programs:

The Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) of 2000 (P.L. 106-386), as amended, authorized the establishment of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons (G/TIP) in the U.S. Department of State. G/TIP coordinates the implementation of the TVPA and leads the interagency operating group that facilitates policy and planning coordination. The office also engages foreign governments, civil society, and multilateral organizations focused on combating and preventing modern day slavery.

Pursuant to the TVPA, human trafficking is at its essence all the activities involved in obtaining or maintaining compelled service of a person by another. G/TIP seeks to fund programs that reflect this view.

G/TIP-funded programs combat human trafficking by employing a "3 P" strategy: preventing trafficking in persons, prosecuting traffickers, and protecting victims. Additionally, as Secretary Clinton has indicated, G/TIP will seek partnerships to effectuate this strategy.

G/TIP's funds are used primarily to address issues or deficiencies identified in the Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report and Interim Assessments in Tier 3, Tier 2 Watch List, and some Tier 2 countries. In addition to tier ranking, G/TIP also considers the country's financial resources, a government's political will to address TIP, and other USG funding to address in the country.

G/TIP allocates foreign assistance aimed at improving the response to trafficking in persons in other countries through an open competitive process. G/TIP announces a solicitation for applications early each fiscal year and the office strives to award new grant projects late in the same fiscal year.

2009 G/TIP Anti-trafficking Program Funding Information:

In fiscal year (FY) 2009, G/TIP received approximately $22 million in foreign assistance funds to support programs that combat trafficking in persons worldwide. G/TIP published the FY 2009 request for proposals on December 1, 2008. In an effort to target resources effectively and save applicants' precious resources, G/TIP named 44 priority countries for funding consideration in the FY 2009 solicitation: Africa Region: Burundi, Chad, Congo (DRC), Cote D'Ivoire, Gambia, Ghana, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Mozambique, Namibia, Niger, Rwanda, Sudan, Zambia; East Asia/Pacific Region: Cambodia, Fiji, Indonesia, Laos, Mongolia, Papua New Guinea, Solomon Islands, Thailand; European Region: Albania, Moldova, Montenegro; Near East Region: Egypt, Jordan, Iraq; South and Central Asia Region: Afghanistan, Bangladesh, India, Kyrgyz Republic, Nepal, Pakistan, Sri Lanka; Western Hemisphere Region: Brazil, Costa Rica, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Mexico, Peru.

The response to G/TIP's FY 2009 solicitation reached record levels. G/TIP received 372 proposals for funding: nearly 300 proposals for bilateral projects in 56 countries and more than 70 proposals for regional and global projects. These submissions requested a total of $146.5 million.

As indicated in the solicitation, G/TIP conducted a technical review of each proposal. Proposals that did not meet the specified technical review criteria were not reviewed further. Proposals that met the technical criteria were reviewed at the U.S. embassy in the country where the proposed activity would take place and by an interagency panel at G/TIP. Following this competitive review, 52 bilateral projects in 40 countries and five regional and global projects were recommended for 2009 funding.

In FY 2009 G/TIP awarded funds for 93 programs totaling more than $26 million, using FY 2008 and FY 2009 appropriated funds. Click here to view programs awarded by G/TIP in FY 2009. G/TIP will award the remaining FY 2009 funds in early FY 2010.

New Funding Opportunity: 2010 Grant Competition

Subject to the availability of funds, G/TIP will solicit proposals for fiscal year 2010 funding in early November. For more information please contact: Sarabjit Jagirdar, Email:- htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: October 31, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

272 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

October 30, 2009 Friday 5:55 AM EST

Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons Funding Information

BYLINE: Targeted News ServiceLENGTH: 850 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons issued the following news release:

Bidders Conference for 2010 Grant Competition:

G/TIP invites those interested in applying for 2010 funding for projects to combat trafficking in persons (TIP) outside of the U.S. to attend a Bidders' Conference on Thursday, November 5, 2009, 1:00-3:00 PM. Subject to the availability of funds, G/TIP will solicit proposals for fiscal year 2010 funding in early November.

The Bidders' Conference will be held in the Dean Acheson Auditorium at the U.S. Department of State, 2201 C Street Northwest Washington, DC. Photo identification is required for admittance. Guests are asked to be cleared through security at the 23rd Street entrance of the State Department (between C and D Streets NW) no later than 12:30 pm.

To register for this conference please contact Christina Johnson at JohnsonCW@state.gov and provide the following information: full name, name of the organization you represent, date of birth, and government issued I.D. number, for example, a driver's license or passport number.

General Information about G/TIP Programs:

The Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) of 2000 (P.L. 106-386), as amended, authorized the establishment of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons (G/TIP) in the U.S. Department of State. G/TIP coordinates the implementation of the TVPA and leads the interagency operating group that facilitates policy and planning coordination. The office also engages foreign governments, civil society, and multilateral organizations focused on combating and preventing modern day slavery.

Pursuant to the TVPA, human trafficking is at its essence all the activities involved in obtaining or maintaining compelled service of a person by another. G/TIP seeks to fund programs that reflect this view.

G/TIP-funded programs combat human trafficking by employing a "3 P" strategy: preventing trafficking in persons, prosecuting traffickers, and protecting victims. Additionally, as Secretary Clinton has indicated, G/TIP will seek partnerships to effectuate this strategy.

G/TIP's funds are used primarily to address issues or deficiencies identified in the Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report and Interim Assessments in Tier 3, Tier 2 Watch List, and some Tier 2 countries. In addition to tier ranking, G/TIP also considers the country's financial resources, a government's political will to address TIP, and other USG funding to address in the country.

G/TIP allocates foreign assistance aimed at improving the response to trafficking in persons in other countries through an open competitive process. G/TIP announces a solicitation for applications early each fiscal year and the office strives to award new grant projects late in the same fiscal year.

2009 G/TIP Anti-trafficking Program Funding Information:

In fiscal year (FY) 2009, G/TIP received approximately $22 million in foreign assistance funds to support programs that combat trafficking in persons worldwide. G/TIP published the FY 2009 request for proposals on December 1, 2008. In an effort to target resources effectively and save applicants' precious resources, G/TIP named 44 priority countries for funding consideration in the FY 2009 solicitation: Africa Region: Burundi, Chad, Congo (DRC), Cote D'Ivoire, Gambia, Ghana, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Mozambique, Namibia, Niger, Rwanda, Sudan, Zambia; East Asia/Pacific Region: Cambodia, Fiji, Indonesia, Laos, Mongolia, Papua New Guinea, Solomon Islands, Thailand; European Region: Albania, Moldova, Montenegro; Near East Region: Egypt, Jordan, Iraq; South and Central Asia Region: Afghanistan, Bangladesh, India, Kyrgyz Republic, Nepal, Pakistan, Sri Lanka; Western Hemisphere Region: Brazil, Costa Rica, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Mexico, Peru.

The response to G/TIP's FY 2009 solicitation reached record levels. G/TIP received 372 proposals for funding: nearly 300 proposals for bilateral projects in 56 countries and more than 70 proposals for regional and global projects. These submissions requested a total of $146.5 million.

As indicated in the solicitation, G/TIP conducted a technical review of each proposal. Proposals that did not meet the specified technical review criteria were not reviewed further. Proposals that met the technical criteria were reviewed at the U.S. embassy in the country where the proposed activity would take place and by an interagency panel at G/TIP. Following this competitive review, 52 bilateral projects in 40 countries and five regional and global projects were recommended for 2009 funding.

In FY 2009 G/TIP awarded funds for 93 programs totaling more than $26 million, using FY 2008 and FY 2009 appropriated funds. Click here to view programs awarded by G/TIP in FY 2009. G/TIP will award the remaining FY 2009 funds in early FY 2010.

New Funding Opportunity: 2010 Grant Competition

Subject to the availability of funds, G/TIP will solicit proposals for fiscal year 2010 funding in early November.

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS MT93 091103-2459143 61MarlizTagarum

LOAD-DATE: November 3, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

273 of 404 DOCUMENTS

New Straits Times (Malaysia)

October 21, 2009 Wednesday

Forum on human trafficking

SECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 11LENGTH: 219 words

KUALA LUMPUR: Malaysia and nine countries will share information on tackling human smuggling and trafficking during the Pacific Rim Intelligence Conference.

Deputy Home Minister Jelaing Mersat launched the conference, which aims to strengthen intelligence in the Immigration Department, at a hotel here yesterday.

The conference, themed "Making Immigration Intelligent Relevant", will end on Thursday.

In August, Australia and Malaysia signed a bilateral agreement and have since set up an integrated data base as one of the steps to tackle the problem.

Jelaing said the lack of progress in combating human trafficking last year led Malaysia to being downgraded from the Tier 2 Watch List to Tier 3 (blacklisted countries) in the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report, 2009.

The report lists Malaysia as one of 17 countries not doing enough to stop human trafficking.

It said Malaysia was a destination, source and transit country for women and children trafficked for commercial, sexual and forced labour.

Jelaing said: "We are giving our full cooperation.

"The conference will benefit not only our country but also neighbouring countries."

He said the conference would give the opportunity for Malaysia to increase knowledge, information and intelligence on how to reduce illegal movements of people.

LOAD-DATE: October 20, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

274 of 404 DOCUMENTS

IPS - Inter Press Service

October 13, 2009 Tuesday

GUATEMALA: 10 AGENTS TO FIGHT HUMAN TRAFFICKING NATIONWIDE

BYLINE: Danilo ValladaresLENGTH: 1405 wordsDATELINE: GUATEMALA CITY, Oct 13 2009

In spite of a new law against human trafficking in effect since March, little has been done in Guatemala to fight the trafficking of children, and child sex tourism has begun to flourish, experts say.

"The office of the public prosecutor has only 10 agents (to fight human trafficking) throughout the entire country, and they have no telephone and just three or four computers," and "the police do not have the capacity to tackle the problem at a national level," said Sandra Gularte, an official with the ombudsman's office.

Activist Leonel Dub'n, director of the Asociaci'n El Refugio de la Niñez, which provides shelter for rescued children, told IPS of "two girls brought from El Salvador to work in a cafeteria, and the day after the girls got here they were prostituted. Young girls are preferred, because they bring the biggest profits in the sex exploitation market."

Dub'n said trafficking of children occurs mainly in border areas, although he said it also exists in the capital, where underage girls are brought in by means of phony job offers.

In this Central American country where corruption is so notorious that a U.N.-sponsored commission was set up to strengthen and purge the country's justice system and help identify and dismantle clandestine armed security groups, the impunity enjoyed by traffickers is so great that their business has diversified.

"We know tourists come to have sex with street kids and that a network of taxi drivers is involved," said Dub'n.

After drug and arms dealing, human trafficking is the third largest organised crime industry in the world, according to the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF).

At least 15,000 children under 18 are the victims of child sex trafficking networks in Guatemala, estimates Casa Alianza, the Latin American branch of the New York-based Covenant House, which stopped operating in Guatemala in January due to lack of funds.

In the capital alone, Casa Alianza identified more than 2,000 children sexually exploited in bars and massage parlours, most of whom came from Central American countries.

One of the biggest achievements in the fight against such crimes was the new Law against Sexual Violence, Exploitation and Trafficking in Persons, which entered into force in March.

The new law classified crimes related to sexual exploitation, created a Secretariat Against Sexual Violence, Exploitation and Trafficking in Persons, and put in place procedures for the repatriation of trafficking victims who have been taken out of the country.

But "the Secretariat has not been assigned the necessary resources for it to function, there is no training for the judges responsible for applying the law, and there has been no real interest in implementing the necessary actions on the part of state institutions," Dub'n complained.

In the meantime, trafficking continues apace in border areas.

"In Malacatán and Tecún Umán (municipalities in the southwestern province of San Marcos, on the border with Mexico), owners of child care centres, and even parents and other relatives, are involved in the trafficking of children," Jose Maldonado, an official in the ombudsman's office in Coatepeque, in the neighbouring province of Quetzaltenango, told IPS.

The trafficking industry feeds on the vulnerability and desperate economic situation of the Central American migrants who pass through the area in large numbers on their way to the United States, and the sexual exploitation of mainly Guatemalan, Honduran and Salvadoran girls in that area is commonplace, the ombudsman's office reports.

"Because there are so many people involved in this illegal trade that undermines the integrity of girls and boys, it has been impossible to curb it," said Maldonado.

According to the World Bank, in Guatemala, one of the poorest countries in Latin America, around 75 percent of the population lives below the poverty line, defined as an income that is insufficient to purchase a basic basket of goods and services, while nearly 58 percent have incomes below the extreme poverty line, defined as the amount needed to purchase a basic basket of food.

Guatemalan girls, and to a lesser extent boys, are the victims of trafficking in border cities in southeastern Mexico, Guatemalan vice consul Estuardo Figueroa in the city of Tapachula, in the Mexican state of Chiapas, denounced last month.

At a meeting of the human rights department of the Tapachula city government, aimed at finding ways to rescue child victims of trafficking, the Guatemalan diplomat said the children are purchased in border areas of the two countries and subjected to labour or sexual exploitation in Chiapas.

Figueroa described how children can be seen in the streets of Tapachula and Tuxtla Gutierrez hawking sweets, shining shoes, cleaning windshields or dressed up as clowns.

The ninth annual Trafficking in Persons Report on Guatemala, published by the U.S. State Department in June, put this country on the Tier 2 Watch List "for failing to show increasing efforts to combat human trafficking, particularly in terms of providing adequate assistance to victims and ensuring that trafficking offenders, including corrupt public officials, are appropriately prosecuted, convicted, and sentenced for their crimes."

The State Department trafficking in persons report places nations in one of four categories based on their efforts to curb human trafficking, prosecute those involved and support and assist victims. Countries doing the best job are in Tier 1; Tier 2 includes countries that are demonstrating a commitment to addressing the problem but have not yet met international standards; and the Tier 2 "Watch List" includes countries that show signs of digressing to Tier 3, the lowest level.

In Latin America, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Honduras and Panama were put in Tier 2, while Nicaragua, Argentina, the Dominican Republic and Venezuela are on the Tier 2 Watch List, along with Guatemala, due to the large number of victims of trafficking, despite the efforts made.

The report mentions the "nascent child sex tourism" in certain areas such as Antigua and Guatemala City, and points out that young Guatemalan girls are often subject to forced labour within the country as domestic servants.

In addition, it says, "Guatemalan men, women, and children are trafficked within the country, as well as to Mexico and the United States, for forced labour, particularly in agriculture.

And "In the Mexican border area, Guatemalan children are exploited for forced begging on streets and forced labour in municipal dumps (and) Guatemalan men, women, and children are trafficked for forced agricultural work, particularly on coffee plantations," the State Department report adds.

It recommends that Guatemala "Implement and enforce the new anti-trafficking law; increase efforts to investigate and prosecute trafficking offenses, and convict and punish trafficking offenders, including public officials complicit with trafficking activity."

Maria Eugenia Villarreal, director of ECPAT International in Guatemala told IPS that the main concerns of her organisation - whose name stands for End Child Prostitution, Child Pornography and the Trafficking of Children - are the protection of children and adolescents and the prosecution of traffickers.

"There are many problems in terms of enforcing the law," she said. "Although the law is new, we should have had many more sentences. We have also observed an enormous weakness in investigations by prosecutors and in the failure of judges to classify crimes as trafficking."

Sandra Gularte, coordinator of trafficking issues in the ombudsman's office, told IPS that Guatemala's law is the most advanced of its kind in Latin America.

This year, the ombudsman's office received 41 complaints of trafficking from January to September, compared to 23 in 2008, which she said does not represent an increase in cases as much as a growing willingness to report trafficking-related crimes and seek assistance.

Nevertheless, she said "there is a greater vulnerability due to the economic crisis, which will prompt more Guatemalans to try to make the journey to other countries and to fall prey to organised crime networks."

Greater information and awareness-raising are essential, she said, because many people are unaware of what trafficking is and thus do not report it. But in Gularte's view, the essential thing is to continue strengthening the office of the public prosecutor and the police.

LOAD-DATE: October 14, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

275 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

October 13, 2009 Tuesday 11:48 PM EST

Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons Funding Information

BYLINE: Targeted News ServiceLENGTH: 442 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons issued the following news release:
General Funding Information:

The Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) of 2000 (P.L. 106-386), as amended, authorized the establishment of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons (G/TIP) in the U.S. Department of State. G/TIP's mission is to address trafficking in persons (TIP) through combined efforts of the "3 P" strategy: preventing trafficking in persons, prosecuting traffickers, and protecting victims. Additionally, the office will emphasize a fourth "P:" partnership. G/TIP coordinates the implementation of the TVPA and addresses emerging interagency grants policy and planning issues. The office also engages foreign governments, civil society, and multilateral organizations focused on combating and preventing modern day slavery. G/TIP seeks to fund programs that reflect the views of the TVPA. In Fiscal Year 2009, G/TIP received approximately $22 million in foreign assistance to combat trafficking in persons worldwide.

Funding Update:

The response to G/TIP's FY 2009 solicitation reached record levels, with over 370 proposals submitted requesting a total of $146.5 million for bilateral, regional, and global projects. As indicated in the solicitation, G/TIP conducted a technical review of each proposal. This was followed by an interagency panel review of the proposals that met the technical criteria.

During FY 2009, G/TIP awarded nearly 100 anti-trafficking grants with FY 2008 and FY 2009 funds totaling more than $26 million. G/TIP will award the remaining FY 2009 funds in the coming months.

G/TIP Funding Priorities:

G/TIP's funds are used primarily to address issues or deficiencies identified in the Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report and Interim Assessments in Tier 3, Tier 2 Watch List, and some Tier 2 countries. In addition to tier ranking, G/TIP also considers the country's financial resources and a government's political will to address TIP. Additional priority country designations will be outlined in the upcoming solicitation.

2010 Grant Competition Overview:

Subject to the availability of funds, G/TIP plans on soliciting proposals for 2010 grants in early November. G/TIP invites those interested in applying for funding to attend a Bidders' Conference on Thursday, November 5, 2009 from 1:00-3:00 PM. For registration information, please contact Christina Johnson at JohnsonCW@state.gov

Please check the website regularly for additional updates about the Bidders' Conference and upcoming funding opportunities.

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS hc11-JF78-091016-2435534 StaffFurigay

LOAD-DATE: October 16, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2009 Targeted News Service LLC
All Rights Reserved

THE JORDAN TIMES

The Jordan Times

October 11, 2009 Sunday

'Economic empowerment key to assisting victims of violence'

LENGTH: 329 words

By Khetam Malkawi

AMMAN - The Kingdom must do more to economically empower women victims of violence in order to tackle the phenomenon, an international expert said.

Ludy Green, an international expert on financial independence for abused women, said that although Jordan has shelters for women victims of violence, authorities and civil society should focus on bettering women's financial situation.

"You can save a woman, one woman at a time... how you help in changing someone's life is the most important," Green said in a press conference on Thursday.

During her five-day stay in the Kingdom, Green met with government and business leaders, academicians and NGOs to discuss economic empowerment of women as a solution to combat violence against women.

Green, an international spokesperson on financial independence for victims of violence and their children, is the president and founder of Second Chance Employment Services, a nonprofit organisation seeking employment for battered and abused women.

During her visit to Jordan, Green visited Dar Al Aman and Dar Al Wifaq shelters and held a workshop for workers at the Ministry of Social Development's shelter.

Meanwhile, during a press conference held last week to introduce Green, US Ambassador to Jordan Robert Beecroft said the Kingdom has made progress on tackling human trafficking.

Following the progress the country has made in strengthening its laws against human trafficking, Jordan was recently upgraded to Tier II status in the annual US Trafficking in Persons Report, he noted.

"In February, Jordan passed a law on human trafficking and issued regulations in August regarding rights of domestic workers," the ambassador said.

He added that Jordan was "good in putting together an anti-trafficking committee to deal with workers from third world countries, as well as having shelters for violence victims".

"The government realised that there is a problem and they are addressing this problem," Beecroft noted.

LOAD-DATE: November 23, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Magazine

JOURNAL-CODE: 62

All Rights Reserved
Syndigate.info, Al Bawaba.com

277 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Jordan Times (Amman)

Distributed by McClatchy-Tribune Business News

October 11, 2009 Sunday'Economic empowerment key to assisting victims of violence'*BYLINE: Khetam Malkawi, Jordan Times, AmmanSECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 394 words

Oct. 11--AMMAN -- The Kingdom must do more to economically empower women victims of violence in order to tackle the phenomenon, an international expert said.

Ludy Green, an international expert on financial independence for abused women, said that although Jordan has shelters for women victims of violence, authorities and civil society should focus on bettering women's financial situation.

"You can save a woman, one woman at a time... how you help in changing someone's life is the most important," Green said in a press conference on Thursday.

During her five-day stay in the Kingdom, Green met with government and business leaders, academicians and NGOs to discuss economic empowerment of women as a solution to combat violence against women.

Green, an international spokesperson on financial independence for victims of violence and their children, is the president and founder of Second Chance Employment Services, a nonprofit organisation seeking employment for battered and abused women.

During her visit to Jordan, Green visited Dar Al Aman and Dar Al Wifaq shelters and held a workshop for workers at the Ministry of Social Development's shelter.

Meanwhile, during a press conference held last week to introduce Green, US Ambassador to Jordan Robert Beecroft said the Kingdom has made progress on tackling human trafficking.

Following the progress the country has made in strengthening its laws against human trafficking, Jordan was recently upgraded to Tier II status in the annual US Trafficking in Persons Report, he noted.

"In February, Jordan passed a law on human trafficking and issued regulations in August regarding rights of domestic workers," the ambassador said.

He added that Jordan was "good in putting together an anti-trafficking committee to deal with workers from third world countries, as well as having shelters for violence victims".

"The government realised that there is a problem and they are addressing this problem," Beecroft noted.

To see more of the Jordan Times or to subscribe to the newspaper, go to <http://www.jordantimes.com>. Copyright (c) 2009, Jordan Times, Amman Distributed by McClatchy-Tribune Information Services. For reprints, email tmsreprints@permissionsgroup.com, call 800-374-7985 or 847-635-6550, send a fax to 847-635-6968, or write to The Permissions Group Inc., 1247 Milwaukee Ave., Suite 303, Glenview, IL 60025, USA.

LOAD-DATE: October 11, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

ACC-NO: 20091011-JT-Economic-empowerment-key-to-assisting-victims-of-violence-1011

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: JT

Copyright 2009 Jordan Times (Amman)

Khaleej Times (United Arab Emirates)

October 8, 2009 Thursday

Abu Dhabi Police Foils Attempt to Smuggle Chinese Youth to Europe

LENGTH: 484 words

ABU DHABI - The Abu Dhabi Police has foiled an attempt by an organised crime ring to smuggle Chinese teenagers to Europe through the UAE, according to a report in the October issue of '999' magazine, a publication of the Ministry of Interior.

"The strategic location of the UAE, its economic and financial weight and importance on the world's tourist map with world-class facilities and services have been abused by organised criminals. However, security agencies in the seven-emirate federation have been instrumental in foiling gangsters' attempts," said Major Abdul Rahman Abdullah Al Sakkaf of the Criminal Investigation Department of Abu Dhabi Police.

According to Al Sakkaf, on April 24 this year, three Chinese youngsters and a 51-year-old Korean were deported from Istanbul to Abu Dhabi International Airport.

Upon investigation by the police, it was found that the three Chinese teenagers travelled to Istanbul on fake Korean travel documents, which were confiscated by the Turkish authorities at Istanbul Airport, before deporting them back to Abu Dhabi from where they had departed the day before.

The Chinese youngsters, aged 19, 17 and 16, said they met each other at a hotel room in Beijing. From Beijing, they travelled on a boat to Hong Kong where they used their Chinese passports to obtain visit visas to the UAE.

They later flew to Dubai where a Korean national, identified as Y. Yotchol, met them at the airport and took them to a hotel near Dragon Mart.

On their second day in the UAE, Yotchol reportedly took them to Abu Dhabi International Airport from where they departed to Istanbul on Turkish Airlines.

When questioned, Yotchol denied meeting the teenagers in Dubai or knowing anything about the fake passports.

Al Sakkaf said their investigations found that a gang involved in organised crime was smuggling teenagers from China to Europe where they could be used to carry out criminal activities.

The report added that the ring starts its operations in China where relatives pay the gang, or the other way round, to smuggle teenagers to Europe.

"We are currently carrying out further investigations to uncover Yotchol's fellow conspirators and are also checking hotels that issue visit visas," said Al Sakkaf.

Yotchol, who had been legally entering the UAE with his Korean passport, is now blacklisted from entering the country.

The US Department of State's Trafficking in Persons Report 2008 has placed the People's Republic of China (PRC) in the Tier 2 Watch List.

The report said the PRC is a source, transit, and destination country for men, women and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labour and sexual exploitation.

Although the majority of trafficking in the PRC occurs within the country's borders, there is also considerable trafficking of PRC citizens to Africa, other parts of Asia, Europe, Latin America, the Middle East, and North America.

olivia@khaleejtimes.ae

LOAD-DATE: October 8, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: 44

Copyright 2009 Khaleej Times - Galadari Printing and Publishing Co. L.L.C.
All Rights Reserved
Syndigate.info, Al Bawaba.com

279 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Middle East Monitor - The Gulf

October 1, 2009 Thursday

Social Policy Takes Priority

LENGTH: 562 words

BMI View: With much of the country's policy effort focused on external affairs, the only pressure points are in the social realm - dealing with human trafficking and tackling swine flu.

Oman's foreign policy has taken centre stage in line with its current presidency of the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC), with Sultan Qaboos Bin Said pushing an ambitious strategy to engage with Iran - a controversial course of action in the wake of the disputed Iranian election in June. Domestically, Qaboos' rule is not under any form of challenge and he is set to continue with his cautious political reform programme, largely focused on the codification of citizens' rights, rather than outright democratic participation as some other Gulf states have pioneered. The state retains a strict control on free expression of public opinion, and the sultanate will continue to lag its Gulf neighbours in developing a pluralist political system.

The government is responsive to external criticism of its human rights and governance record. After strong criticism from the US State Department over its efforts in combating human trafficking last year, the newly-released 2009 report from the State Department has found an improvement in Oman's performance in eliminating trafficking, resulting in its accession to Tier 2 nations - categorised as countries which are making significant efforts to comply with the with the minimum standards of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act after acting upon a new law against trafficking. In 2008, Oman was categorised as being Tier 3 on the watch list, which provoked intense frustration in Muscat, which zealously guards its international reputation. However, it is clear that the authorities in Muscat have taken a tougher line on trafficking in response to the US criticism. In May of this year it successfully prosecuted 11 men for bringing foreign women into Oman and then shipping them to other Gulf states to work as prostitutes - the first enactment of new legislation on human trafficking.

Small-Scale Problems

The domestic policy thrust will remain focused on social policy, with Omanisation now a central ambition for the sultanate. The 2009-2010 Omanisation quotas for the private sector have set out benchmark quotas on a range of sectors, ranging from 35% of ICT staff being Omani nationals, through to 15% for technical support staff. According to the latest list released in July, all marketing and sales employees must be Omani nationals. For those job areas where Omanis are either reluctant to work in or not sufficiently skilled, the quotas are low. For contracting staff, the target is just 30%, while for consulting engineers it is just 25%.

The threat posed by H1N1 'swine flu', which had caused 12 deaths by mid-September, has made this health issue a number one policy priority. On September 5, Sultan Qaboos ordered the establishment of a Supreme Committee for H1N1 to draw up a comprehensive plan to tackle the disease. The country has also deferred the start of the school year by a few weeks to 26 September in order to cut down on infection rates. The new Supreme Committee will be headed by Diwan of the Royal Court Minister Ali Bin Hamad al-Busaidi, and includes Royal Office Minister General Ali Majid Bin Mussabagh Al-Mamaria and the ministers of the interior, national economy, health, religious affairs, and information.

LOAD-DATE: September 15, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Political Risk Analysis

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

JOURNAL-CODE: MMEG

Copyright 2009 Business Monitor International Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

280 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Daily News (Sri Lanka)

September 30, 2009 Wednesday

New laws ensure best practices

LENGTH: 578 words

DATELINE: Sri Lanka

Sri Lanka, Sept. 30 -- The Sri Lanka Bureau of Foreign Employment (SLBFE) is to be given wider powers, including permission to arrest without warrant any errant job agent or individual violating established protocol in a bid to ensure and enforce best ethical practices in labour migration.

The proposed new regulation by way of amendments to the SLBFE Act which was originally introduced in 1985 was passed in Parliament by a majority vote on Thursday.

A revision of laws when dealing with rogue agents too are to be effected with fines ranging from Rs.100,000 and a maximum four year imprisonment being proposed.

Permission is also to be given to regularize the five percent cess tax charged from recruiting agents.

Restrictions are also to be placed on advertisements carried out by agents in the media. Accordingly, both the agents and media would have to seek prior approval before carrying such material.

The new proposals would also place restrictions on charges levied on overseas employment seekers. Issuing a receipt for the monies taken would be mandatory.

Charges levied would need prior approval from authorities. Under the new proposals, false details and promises by job agents would come under a fine ranging from Rs. 1,000 to Rs. 25,000.

According to Foreign Employment Promotion and Welfare Minister Keheliya Rambukwella, during the first nine months of this year, the Government had only received Rs.11 million so far although Rs.33 million is due to it. Minister Rambukwella told the media yesterday that changes were made with the idea of ensuring best practices related to protection and welfare of labour migrants.

Remittance by migrant workers which amounts to over US $ 03 billion annually is Sri Lanka's number one foreign exchange earner. Over 1.6 million Lankans are employed abroad with another 220,000 (average) joining the force annually.

According to the Minister, through these amendments the SLBFE's authorized officers would be given authorization to examine any document in the possession of a person going abroad for employment at any port of embarkation to see whether they have the required registration.

Sleuths will be given powers to arrest any illegal labour migrant if found to be without the required documents.

According to Rambukwella this move would help authorities to tighten screws on illegal migration, where Sri Lanka has being categorized by the US annual report on the subject as a country in the tier two watch list and a hub for human trafficking.

SLBFE sleuths would also be permitted to do periodical checks on licensed agents premises and their documents if and when they deem it necessary.

Aiding and abetting rogue agents too have been termed as a punishable offence according to the proposed laws.

A part of the fines obtained through fines are to be forwarded to a migrant worker welfare fund.

During this year, SLBFE sleuths have nabbed more than 100 rogue recruiters. In addition more than 30 licensed agents too have been taken to task for alleged wrongdoing. According to authorities over 100 job at present are doing illegal business in various parts of the island but they do not have enough powers to deal with them effectively under existing laws. The SLBFE Act was first introduced in 1985 and has undergone several minor changes since then. Published by HT Syndication with permission from Daily News Sri Lanka. For more information on news feed please contact Sarabjit Jagirdar at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: October 1, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2009 The Associated Newspapers of Ceylon Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

281 of 404 DOCUMENTS

New Straits Times (Malaysia)

September 27, 2009 Sunday

Trafficked women too afraid to tell the truth

SECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 17LENGTH: 406 words

KUALA LUMPUR: The irony is that willing sex workers confess to being trafficked women when they are caught in police raids while the real trafficked women deny their status.

Many of the "professional" sex workers are said to be from the Philippines and China while those from other neighbouring countries are the "sex slaves".

The professionals from these two countries know that there are rich pickings to be had in Malaysian brothels, said Tenaganita Sdn Bhd coordinator for Anti-Trafficking in Persons, Aegile Fernandez.

However, the sex slaves from other regional countries are often ignorant women who are coerced or beaten into submission by members of the trafficking syndicates and readily "confess" to police that they are sex workers.

There is also the fear that the syndicates will harm their families back home.

"The police have a 14-day remand order to interview these victims but they are unable to achieve much," said Fernandez.

"In our shelters, it usually takes at least two months before they reveal anything.

"First, we must become their friends and confidants and only then, will they open up and tell us what exactly happened in the brothels and how they were brought in.

"We have cases of victims who had only spoken to us upon going back to their countries."

Fernandez said while it was true that some sex workers came into Malaysia voluntarily, the syndicates held their passports, curtailed their movements and did not pay them.

"This becomes human trafficking."

Malaysia, has been classified as Tier 3 by the United States State Department where human trafficking is concerned.

The Tier 3 classification means that Malaysia has made no effort to comply with the US Trafficking and Violence Protection Act.

Fernandez said there were also cases of exploitation in the case of mail-order brides.

Some Malaysian men in their 60s and 70s get married to young women from Laos, Cambodia, Vietnam, Thailand and Indonesia.

These women, who are in their early 20s, are what the mail-order agencies call "3-in-1" brides.

They are required to work at their offices or stalls run by their husbands in the morning, do housework in the afternoon and evening, and satisfy the sexual needs of their husbands at night.

There had been cases of mail-order brides forced to work in brothels to pay their husbands a monthly allowance of RM400 to RM500.

The husbands apparently claimed this was payment for marrying them and bringing them into the country.

LOAD-DATE: September 27, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2009 New Straits Times Press (Malaysia) Berhad
All Rights Reserved

282 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Manila Times (Philippines)

September 26, 2009 Saturday

US backs anti-trafficking infomercials in RP

BYLINE: Llanesca T. Pantì

LENGTH: 283 words

The United States Department of State has earmarked $294,350 to help fund the production of anti-human trafficking infomercials in the Philippines, the US Embassy in Manila has reported.

The US Department of State gave the grant to The Asia Foundation, which produced the infomercials together with the Visayan Forum Foundation and the Foundation for Communication Initiatives (FOCI).

"Our partnership, cooperation, and teamwork have never been more essential," said Deputy Chief of Mission Leslie Bassett in her remarks at the launching of the radio and TV "infomercials" against human trafficking on Thursday.

The infomercials will be seen and heard at transportation hubs and other locations that trafficking victims are likely to transit, including ports and bus terminals.

Bassett also expressed condolences to the anti-human trafficking activist community over the tragic murder last month of Finardo Cabilao, the Philippine Social Welfare Attachè based in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia.

"The US government will continue to support Philippine initiatives to prevent human trafficking, protect its victims, and prosecute the traffickers," she said.

The 2009 US Department of State Trafficking in Persons Report for the Philippines shows Manila on Tier 2 Watch List, which means that while the government is making significant efforts to comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, it has failed to show progress in convicting trafficking offenders, particularly those responsible for labor trafficking.

The report described the country as a source, transit, and destination country for men, women, and children trafficked for commercial sexual exploitation and forced labor.

LOAD-DATE: September 30, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2009 News Bites Pty Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

Global News Bites

283 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

September 20, 2009 Sunday

Nigeria; Country Rises to Tier 1 in 2009 Trafficking Report

BYLINE: Daily Trust (Abuja)LENGTH: 378 words

In the 2009 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report, Nigeria has been elevated to Tier 1 status - countries assessed as meeting the "minimum standards for the elimination of severe forms of trafficking", U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton has said.

Nigeria was rated for its increased efforts in 2008 and its cumulative achievements over the past few years to curtail human trafficking

A statement by U.S embassy in Abuja said Clinton made the statement at the Department of State's ninth annual TIP Report in a public event at Washington, D.C.

"Over the past year, the Government of Nigeria more than doubled the number of trafficking offenders convicted, while it improved assistance given to victims, demonstrated strong awareness-raising efforts, and increased funding to its anti-human trafficking organization, the National Agency for Prevention of Trafficking in Persons (NAPTIP)" it stated.

It stated that "the 175-country report is the most comprehensive worldwide report on the efforts of governments to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons, a modern-day form of slavery".

The statement added that findings are intended to raise global awareness and spur countries to take effective actions to counter trafficking in persons.

It added that the U.S. Mission in Nigeria congratulates the Government of Nigeria and the National Agency for Prevention of Trafficking in Persons (NAPTIP) on this accomplishment and encourages continued progress in the future.

"The U.S. Congress, through its passage of the 2000 Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA), as amended, requires the Secretary of State to submit this Report each year. The goal of this Report is to stimulate action and create partnerships around the world in the fight against modern-day slavery".

"Within the Report, countries are assigned to one of three tiers: countries assessed as meeting the "minimum standards for the elimination of severe forms of trafficking" as set forth in the TVPA are classified as Tier 1; countries assessed as not fully complying with the minimum standards, but making significant efforts are classified as Tier 2; and countries assessed as neither complying with the minimum standards nor making significant efforts to do so are classified as Tier 3." It stated.

LOAD-DATE: September 21, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

Israelis arrested for holding Filipino woman captive

LENGTH: 479 words

Sep. 20, 2009 (Digital Journal delivered by Newstex) --

A Filipino woman was found and freed by Israeli police last week in East Jerusalem. She had been kept captive by the family for almost two years. Israeli police made the announcement that they arrested two people in the case on September 13, 2009.

The woman told police her passport had been taken away by her employers, confined to the house and forced to work. She also claimed she had been locked in a bathroom at times. While she had been initially hired to work for the family, she had not been paid. The woman said her employers accused her of stealing expensive jewellery and threatened to turn her in to police. Fearing arrest, the woman complied with them. An Israeli group, Kav L'oved, a non-profit group that works to protect the rights of vulnerable workers, had learned details about the woman's captivity and passed the information on to the police. Israel has been attempting to crack down on human trafficking for years. According to a U.S. State Department report, Trafficking in Persons, June 2009, Israel is a "Tier 2" country, "...a destination country for men and women trafficked for the purposes of forced labor and sexual exploitation. Low-skilled workers from China, Romania, Turkey, Thailand, the Philippines, Nepal, Sri Lanka, and India migrate voluntarily and legally to Israel for contract labor in the construction, agriculture, and health care industries. Some, however, subsequently face conditions of forced labor, including the unlawful withholding of passports, restrictions on movement, non-payment of wages, threats, and physical intimidation. Many labor recruitment agencies in source countries and in Israel require workers to pay recruitment fees ranging from $1,000 to $10,000 " a practice that makes workers highly vulnerable to trafficking or debt bondage once in Israel. Women from Russia, Ukraine, Moldova, Uzbekistan, Belarus, and China are trafficked to Israel for forced prostitution, often by organized crime groups across the border with Egypt. Israeli women are trafficked within the country for commercial sexual exploitation, and small numbers are reportedly trafficked to Ireland and the United Kingdom." The report went on to say that while Israel does not "fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so." Italy, by comparison, is a "Tier 1" country, both a destination for human trafficking, but also a source of human traffickers. According to the report, Kuwait is a Tier 3 country, and is a destination for forced labour. Earlier this year, Israeli police arrested 12 people who were part of the biggest human trafficking ring. Police said that the ring had smuggled thousands of women into Israel and forced them into prostitution.

Newstex ID: DIJO-0001-38115458

LOAD-DATE: September 21, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

NOTES: The views expressed on blogs distributed by Newstex and its re-distributors ("Blogs on DemandÆ") are solely the author's and not necessarily the views of Newstex or its re-distributors. Posts from such authors are provided "AS IS", with no warranties, and confer no rights. The material and information provided in Blogs on DemandÆ are for general information only and should not, in any respect, be relied on as professional advice. No content on such Blogs on DemandÆ is "read and approved" before it is posted. Accordingly, neither Newstex nor its re-distributors make any claims, promises or guarantees about the accuracy, completeness, or adequacy of the information contained therein or linked to from such blogs, nor take responsibility for any aspect of such blog content. All content on Blogs on DemandÆ shall be construed as author-based content and commentary. Accordingly, no warranties or other guarantees will be offered as to the quality of the opinions, commentary or anything else offered on such Blogs on DemandÆ. Reader's comments reflect their individual opinion and their publication within Blogs on DemandÆ shall not infer or connote an endorsement by Newstex or its re-distributors of such reader's comments or views. Newstex and its re-distributors expressly reserve the right to delete posts and comments at its and their sole discretion.

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Blog

Copyright 2009 Newstex LLC
All Rights Reserved
Newstex Web Blogs
Copyright 2009 Digital Journal

285 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

September 14, 2009 Monday 11:43 PM EST

Memorandum of Justification Consistent With the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000, Regarding Determinations With Respect to 'Tier 3' Countries

BYLINE: Targeted News ServiceLENGTH: 7159 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons issued the following news release:

Pursuant to Section 110(d) of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (the "TVPA" or the "Act"), the President has made determinations regarding the 17 countries placed on Tier 3 in the Department of State's 2009 Trafficking in Persons Report. The President has determined to sanction Burma, Cuba, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK), Eritrea, Fiji, Iran, Syria, and Zimbabwe. The United States will not provide certain non-humanitarian, non-trade-related assistance to the Governments of Burma, Cuba, the DPRK, Eritrea, Fiji, Iran, Syria, and Zimbabwe until such governments comply with the Act's minimum standards to combat trafficking or make significant efforts to do so. The United States will not provide funding for participation by officials or employees of the Government of Cuba in educational and cultural exchange programs until that government complies with the Act's minimum standards to combat trafficking or makes significant efforts to do so. Furthermore, the President determined, consistent with the Act's waiver authority, that provision of certain assistance to the Governments of Burma, Eritrea, Fiji, Iran, Syria, and Zimbabwe would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States.

The President also determined, consistent with the Act's waiver authority, that provision of all bilateral and multilateral assistance to Chad, Kuwait, Malaysia, Mauritania, Niger, Papua New Guinea, Saudi Arabia, and Sudan that otherwise would have been cut off would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States.

The determinations also indicate the Secretary of State's subsequent compliance determination regarding Swaziland. It is significant that one of the 17 Tier 3 countries took actions that averted the need for the President to make a determination regarding sanctions and waivers. Information highlighted in the Trafficking in Persons Report and the possibility of sanctions, in conjunction with our diplomatic efforts, encouraged this country's government to take important measures against trafficking.

Section 110(d)(1)(B) of the Act interferes with the President's authority to direct foreign affairs. We, therefore, interpret it as precatory. Nonetheless, it is the policy of the United States that, consistent with the provisions of the Act, the U.S. Executive Director of each multilateral development bank, as defined in the Act, and of the International Monetary Fund will vote against, and use the Executive Director's best efforts to deny any loan or other utilization of the funds of the respective institution to the Governments of Burma, Cuba, the DPRK, Eritrea, Fiji, Iran, Syria, and Zimbabwe (with specific exceptions for Eritrea, Fiji, and Zimbabwe) for Fiscal Year 2010, until such governments comply with the minimum standards or makes significant efforts to come into compliance, as may be determined by the Secretary of State in a report to the Congress pursuant to section 110(b) of the Act.

Explanations of the President's determinations regarding each of the 17 countries follow.

Swaziland

On the basis of positive actions undertaken by the Government of the Kingdom of Swaziland since March 2009, the Deputy Secretary of State has determined that the Government of the Kingdom of Swaziland does not yet fully comply with the minimum standards in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) for the elimination of trafficking, but is making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. This is the standard for placement on Tier 2 of the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report.

The Deputy Secretary of State has placed Swaziland on the Special Watch List because the determination that the Government of the Kingdom of Swaziland is making significant efforts is based, in part, on commitments by the country to take additional future steps over the next year.

In July 2009, the Department of State began working with the Government of the Kingdom of Swaziland on an action plan that outlined steps to combat trafficking. Since that time, it has accomplished each of the items in the Department's action plan or made commitments to take additional steps over the next year, thus demonstrating "significant efforts."

Since June 2009, the government publicly recognized human trafficking as an important problem facing the country and took tangible steps to enact and implement an anti-trafficking law. In July, the government drafted a comprehensive anti-trafficking and human smuggling bill, which, as of mid-August 2009, was nearly through its mandatory 30-day public comment period, after which it will be voted on by the parliament. Public education on the bill's specific provisions also began in August 2009.

In July 2009, the government established a multi-sectored Anti-Trafficking Task Force comprised of officials from multiple government and law enforcement agencies, the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), the United Nations Development Programme, and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs). The task force launched programs to educate the public on the draft bill, began drafting a national strategy on human trafficking, and planned the establishment of an anti-trafficking hotline. The Prime Minister and Task Force members granted numerous media interviews on the subject of human trafficking, and a local NGO was commissioned to conduct a study on the scope and magnitude of human trafficking in Swaziland.

Burma

The Government of Burma does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and it is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to sanction Burma. The President has also determined that provision of funding for programs to combat infectious disease would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States.

Justification: Burmese military and civilian officials remain directly involved in using citizens for forced labor and the unlawful conscription of child soldiers, with reported cases of child soldiers increasing annually. Although the Burmese government has taken some steps to combat trafficking for sexual exploitation, the significant state-sanctioned use of internal forced labor, especially by the military, continues.

Impact of Sanctions: The United States generally does not provide direct assistance to the Burmese government. Existing sanctions on Burma include a ban on new investment, imports, exports of financial services, bilateral assistance, and arms sales. Additionally, travel restrictions and/or financial sanctions have been imposed against senior Burmese officials and their immediate relatives, a number of state-owned enterprises, and other individuals and entities affiliated with the regime. A partial waiver would allow for assistance to government labs and offices to combat infectious diseases.

Chad

The Government of Chad does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to waive all sanctions against Chad, consistent with the provisions of the Act, in the national interest of the United States.

Justification: The Government of Chad has not taken sufficient steps to address the problem of trafficking in persons. Although the government released to UNICEF child soldiers captured in a rebel offensive and conducted inspections of its own military facilities to identify and release unlawful child soldiers, it failed to make efforts to prosecute and punish trafficking offenders. The government has not sufficiently collaborated with NGOs to provide care to trafficking victims or developed a draft work plan to address and resolve the problem of unlawful conscription of child soldiers.

Chad is a partner in the Trans-Sahara Counter Terrorism Partnership (TSCTP) program and strongly supports counterterrorism objectives. Chad also plays a critical role in our humanitarian response to the crisis in Darfur, currently hosting 280,000 Sudanese refugees and cooperating with the United Nations Peacekeeping Operations in Chad and Central African Republic. As part of this effort, Chad is tasked with providing security to civilians and humanitarians in eastern Chad. The Government of Chad has worked with the U.S. Special Envoy to Sudan to encourage Sudanese rebel movements to commit to peace talks with the Government of Sudan.

Impact of Sanctions: Sanctions would affect the expenditure of $400,000 in Fiscal Year 2010 International Military Education and Training (IMET), $500,000 in FY 2010 Foreign Military Financing (FMF) funding, as well as a yet-to-be determined amount of TSCTP funding. IMET programs are critical to influencing and training current and future Chadian military leaders. The FMF program for Chad includes funding programmed for C-130 spare parts, training, and technical manuals that are critical to support Chad's flying program. Sanctions could also affect $600,000 in Development Assistance initiatives to develop Chad's political and social institutions. Chad is scheduled to receive a portion of $27.267 million allocated to Chad, Mauritania, and Niger from the PDEV component of the Trans-Sahara Counterterrorism Partnership, which is designed to improve the regional security situation and the country's ability to combat terrorism. PDEV promotes good governance, youth empowerment, and media outreach.

Cuba

The Government of Cuba does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to sanction Cuba.

Justification: The Government of Cuba publishes no data on internationally or domestically-trafficked persons. Furthermore, the government dismisses as politically motivated requests for information on any anti-trafficking efforts it may be making. The government does not appear to have developed a comprehensive strategy to address the problem, and has little discernable anti-trafficking law enforcement, victim protection measures, or trafficking prevention policies in place.

Impact of Sanctions: The Government of Cuba is already subject to an extensive economic embargo tied to Cuba's poor record on, among other things, democracy, human rights and economic reform. No Cuban government officials or employees participate in current or planned United States Government-funded educational or cultural exchange programs. The United States Government does not offer economic assistance to the Government of Cuba and will not allow any significant new investment in Cuba by U.S. companies until democratic and economic reforms are instituted. While the existing sanctions will remain in place until there are fundamental political and economic reforms in Cuba, sanctioning Cuba for activities related to trafficking in persons expresses clear U.S. disapproval of the Cuban Government's acceptance, if not endorsement, of such activities.

Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK)

The Government of the DPRK ("North Korea") does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to sanction the DPRK.

Justification: The Government of the DPRK does not acknowledge the existence of human trafficking, and is making no effort to address trafficking in persons. The North Korean regime continues to use forced labor as part of an established system of political repression. The regime actively punishes trafficking victims for acts they commit that are the direct result of being trafficked. The government does not recognize trafficking as a problem and imposes forced labor conditions on its prisoners, including North Koreans forcibly returned from China. Furthermore, conditions in the DPRK drive many North Koreans to seek a way out of the country, putting them at risk of becoming trafficking victims. Women who enter northern China from the DPRK may be sold as brides and trafficked for purposes of sexual exploitation. The United States strongly disapproves of the DPRK Government's failure to address trafficking in persons.

Impact of Sanctions: Sanctioning the DPRK for activities related to trafficking in persons expresses clear U.S. disapproval of the DPRK government's acceptance, if not endorsement, of such activities. The United States Government does not provide direct foreign assistance to the Government of the DPRK.

Eritrea

The Government of the State of Eritrea does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to sanction Eritrea. The President has also determined that provision of funding for educational and cultural exchange programs would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States.

Justification: The Government of the State of Eritrea did not exhibit progress toward educating government officials or the general public about human trafficking and does not appear to have made tangible efforts to conduct anti-trafficking law enforcement, victim protection, or prevention initiatives. Furthermore, Eritrea failed to demonstrate making any effort to curb abuses of Eritrean citizens who are forced to participate in the government's national service program for indefinite periods.

Virtually all Eritrean citizens are required to perform national service and as a result involuntarily become employees in government-controlled institutions to include public health, education, library and information, and media. A partial waiver of sanctions is in the national interest as the continuation of existing educational and cultural exchanges will promote greater understanding of the United States and its people.

Impact of Sanctions: The Government of the State of Eritrea is already subject to sanctions that prohibit the sale or licensing for export of defense articles and defense services to countries certified by the United States, as not cooperating fully with U.S. antiterrorism efforts. Eritrea is also designated a country of particular concern for its poor human rights record. As a result, Eritrea is subject to ongoing arms embargo referenced in 22 CFR 126.1(a) pursuant to the Presidential Action under the International Religious Freedom Act of 1998.

Sanctioning Eritrea for activities related to trafficking in persons expresses clear U.S. disapproval of the Eritrean Government's acceptance, if not endorsement, of such activities. The United States Government does not provide direct foreign assistance to the Government of the State of Eritrea. The partial waiver will allow the provision of funding for participation by government officials or employees in educational and cultural exchange programs.

Fiji

The Government of Fiji does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to sanction Fiji. The President has also determined that provision of funding for participation of government officials and employees in educational and cultural exchange programs would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States.

Justification: The de facto Government of Fiji has taken no significant steps to address the problem of children exploited in the commercial sex trade. It did not begin any law enforcement investigations into alleged trafficking situations. Since June, the government also made no effort to educate the public about the dangers of trafficking in Fiji, or to support organizations which attempted to do so. The de facto government is, however, beginning to engage in a positive dialogue with the United States on trafficking issues and has taken some steps to eliminate certain social practices, such as the early marriage of girls, which can lead to the trafficking of children.

Fiji's diminished vigilance on TIP is due in large part to the illegitimate and ineffective nature of the interim government installed after the military coup d'état in December 2006. The coup ousted a democratically-elected government and, as a result, most United States assistance to the interim government is restricted and will continue to be restricted until a democratically elected government takes office.

The United States Government closely coordinates its policy and sanctions on Fiji with the Pacific Island Forum, the regional organization that includes all the Pacific Island countries, Australia, and New Zealand. The explicit goal sought by the United States and its regional partners is a restoration of democracy. A partial waiver of sanctions is in the national interest as the continuation of existing educational and cultural exchanges will promote greater understanding of the United States and its people.

Impact of Sanctions: The de facto Government of Fiji is already subject to sanctions that bar most foreign assistance. Thus additional sanctions would not increase the pressure on Fiji's de facto government to address its trafficking problem. The partial waiver will allow the provision of funding for educational and cultural programs that involve the participation of individuals who in some cases may be affiliated with the government.

Iran

The Government of Iran does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to sanction Iran. The President has also determined that provision of funding for participation of government officials and employees in educational and cultural exchange programs would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States.

Justification: The Government of Iran continues to dismiss criticism of its inadequate anti-trafficking efforts while continuing to punish -- often severely, including beatings, imprisonment, and execution -- victims of trafficking. The government has neither developed a comprehensive strategy to address Iran's human trafficking problem nor instituted victim protection procedures to systematically identify and protect victims of trafficking.

A partial waiver of sanctions is in the national interest as the continuation of existing educational and cultural exchanges will promote greater understanding of the United States and its people.

Impact of Sanctions: The Government of Iran is already subject to economic sanctions due to, among other things, its support for international terrorism. The United States Government does not provide economic assistance to the Government of Iran. The partial waiver will allow the provision of funding for the participation of government official or employees in educational and cultural exchange programs.

Kuwait

The Government of Kuwait does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to waive all sanctions against Kuwait, consistent with the provisions of the Act, in the national interest of the United States.

Justification: The Government of Kuwait has not taken sufficient steps to address the significant problem of involuntary domestic servitude, particularly by failing to establish a long-promised permanent shelter for domestic workers who have been victims of forced labor. Furthermore, it failed to enact anti-trafficking legislation that explicitly prohibits and punishes all trafficking offenses; did not provide training to law enforcement, prosecutors, and judges on investigating and prosecuting trafficking cases; did not provide evidence of increased prosecutions; and did not develop or implement procedures to proactively identify victims. The government did issue a resolution to make modest reforms to its flawed foreign worker sponsorship system that would affect some but not all foreign workers; however, a subsequent statement by authorities appears to limit the implementation of the resolution.

The granting of a full waiver of sanctions against Kuwait is in the national interest because it will allow for the continuation of democracy programs in Kuwait through the Middle East Partnership Initiative (MEPI) and will permit continued security cooperation to effectively combat terrorism and bolster regional security; maintaining Kuwait's indispensable support for Operation Iraqi Freedom is a high U.S. priority.

Impact of Sanctions: Approximately $3 billion dollars in projected foreign military sales to Kuwait, $15,000 in IMET funding, and an approximately $6 million in MEPI assistance would have been restricted by sanctions under the Act. The immediate impact of sanctions would be a reduction in access necessary to maintain Kuwait's support for our efforts to combat terrorism and in our ability to encourage Kuwait's efforts to contribute to regional security. Sanctioning MEPI programs would have removed a key United States Government tool in promoting democratic reform and human rights in Kuwait. A full waiver has been granted in the national interest of providing these military sales in order to advance goals of combating terrorism.

Malaysia

The Government of Malaysia does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to waive all sanctions against Malaysia, consistent with the provisions of the Act, in the national interest of the United States.

Justification: The Government of Malaysia has taken some, but not sufficient steps to address the significant problems of trafficking of foreign nationals to its country for labor and sexual exploitation and the complicity of Malaysian law enforcement personnel in trafficking. The government has not markedly improved its anti-trafficking law enforcement record or shown an effort to identify and protect victims of labor trafficking, though it has increased significantly the number of sex trafficking victims identified and assisted. It has made no discernable effort to address prevalent forced labor of migrant workers. The government's implementation of its July 2007 anti-trafficking law appears uneven. The government continues to incarcerate and summarily deport foreign victims - particularly victims of forced labor - and the new law has not curbed the practice of Malaysian employers' confiscation of workers' passports. The granting of a full waiver of sanctions against Malaysia is in the national interest because it will permit continued security cooperation and the promotion of democratic principles and will allow continued dialogue and engagement to combat human trafficking.

Impact of Sanctions: Approximately $1.35 million in Nonproliferation, Antiterrorism, Demining and Related (NADR) anti-terrorism, counter-terrorism finance, and export control/border security assistance; $1.2 million in IMET funds; up to $170 million in Peacekeeping Operations funds under the Global Peace Operations Initiative; $200,000 in Economic Support Fund funds; and $140,000 in International Narcotics Control and Law Enforcement would have been restricted by sanctions under the Act. A full waiver has been granted in the national interest of allowing for the uninterrupted continuation of important military-to-military security cooperation programs and to allow for military sales in order to advance regional efforts to confront terrorist activities, eliminate the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, and work with regional partners to ensure the security of critical maritime areas, including the Strait of Malacca and the Sulu and Sulawesi Seas.

Mauritania

The Government of Mauritania does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to waive all sanctions against Mauritania, consistent with the provisions of the Act, in the national interest of the United States.

Justification: A military junta seized power in a bloodless coup in August 2008. During this period, the government has not made appreciable progress in addressing trafficking, including hereditary slavery. The government did not increase efforts to investigate, prosecute, and punish trafficking offenders, including hereditary slave masters. Despite NGO reports of cases involving minors in slavery, the courts failed to remove young girls from abusive households or prosecute their masters. The government did not take steps to educate the public about trafficking, including hereditary slavery. A new government was inaugurated in August and has indicated its intent to address this problem.

Mauritania is a partner in the TSCTP program and strongly supports counterterrorism objectives.

Impact of Sanctions: The waiver of sanctions enables the United States government to promote more effectively democratic reform and human rights in Mauritania. The African Union (AU) declared Presidential elections held on July 18, 2009, to be transparent, with some irregularities not deemed to be outcome-determinative. The AU reinstated Mauritania's membership and lifted its sanctions against the military junta. The action to approve a legal determination necessary to lift section 7008 coup restrictions on Mauritania in order to resume foreign assistance is currently pending signature by the Deputy Secretary.

Assistance planned to be provided to Mauritania in Fiscal Year 2010 that would be affected by sanctions includes $1.5 million in development assistance and $40,000 in IMET funding. This assistance is aimed at strengthening democratic institutions and the rule of law and supporting development efforts to promote economic prosperity and social parity.

In addition, Mauritania is scheduled to receive a portion of $27.267 million allocated to Chad, Mauritania, and Niger from the Peace through Development (PDEV) component of the Trans-Sahara Counterterrorism Partnership, which is designed to improve the regional security situation and the country's ability to combat terrorism. PDEV promotes good governance, youth empowerment, and media outreach.

Niger

The Government of Niger does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to waive all sanctions against Niger, consistent with the provisions in the Act, in the national interest of the United States.

Justification: The Government of Niger has not taken sufficient steps to address trafficking, including hereditary slavery. The government did not enact its draft 2006 legislation to combat trafficking. The government failed to strengthen efforts to punish trafficking offenders, sentencing a man who enslaved a woman for more than ten years to an inadequate two-year suspended sentence and a fine. Officials did not investigate NGO reports of Nigerien girls sold to Nigerian businessmen or take steps to rescue and provide care to seven women reported to be subjected to hereditary slavery.

Niger is a partner in the TSCTP program and strongly supports counterterrorism objectives.

Impact of Sanctions: Despite condemnation from the international community, the President of Niger has taken steps to consolidate his power and extend his term in office. Consequently, the United States has made a policy decision to restrict its development and military assistance to Niger. Should the political situation in Niger improve, the waiver of sanctions would enable the United States Government to more effectively promote democratic reform, human rights and development of Niger.

In addition, Niger is scheduled to receive a portion of $27.267 million allocated to Chad, Mauritania, and Niger from the PDEV component of the Trans-Sahara Counterterrorism Partnership, which is designed to improve the regional security situation and the country's ability to combat terrorism. PDEV promotes good governance, youth empowerment, and media outreach.

Papua New Guinea

The Government of Papua New Guinea does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to waive all sanctions against Papua New Guinea, consistent with the provisions of the Act, in the national interest of the United States.

Justification: The Government of Papua New Guinea has not taken sufficient steps to address the significant problem of trafficking of women and underage girls for commercial sexual exploitation within the country. Despite committing itself to some initial efforts to address its many trafficking problems, the government has not improved its poor anti-trafficking law enforcement record or shown an effort to identify and protect victims of trafficking for sexual exploitation and forced labor.

Impact of Sanctions: A full waiver has been granted in the national interest of allowing for the uninterrupted continuation of important programs to support efforts by the Government of Papua New Guinea to participate in international peace support operations, as well as initiatives that would protect irreplaceable biodiversity resources. Papua New Guinea is home to many unique forms of tropical biodiversity. Sanctioning development assistance funding that helps to protect tropical forests ($330,000 in FY2008) and marine biodiversity ($480,000 in FY2008) would run counter to United States Government policies to protect the global environment.

Saudi Arabia

The Government of Saudi Arabia does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and it is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to waive all sanctions against Saudi Arabia, consistent with the provisions of the Act, in the national interest of the United States.

Justification: The Government of Saudi Arabia has not taken adequate steps to address the significant problem of involuntary servitude but has indicated its willingness to work on this issue through recent actions. The government enacted a new comprehensive anti-trafficking law that purports to define and punish all forms of trafficking; however, because it is not yet clear that the law will prohibit employers from holding passports and denying exit visas, practices present in most trafficking cases, actual prosecutions under this law may be limited. There is no evidence that the government criminally prosecuted or punished any traffickers since the release of the 2009 Trafficking In Persons Report. The new law also requires the government to provide victims with access to medical assistance and security; however, it is unclear whether the law requires the government to provide the many victims currently not granted access to government facilities or shelters with temporary housing. The government began drafting procedures to identify both sex and labor trafficking victims; however, the government has not yet articulated a policy establishing screening for victims or trained government personnel to identify victims. If fully implemented, the foundational efforts made during the assessment period may constitute significant efforts at the conclusion of the 2010 reporting cycle.

The government has ample resources to address Saudi Arabia's trafficking problems but has only recently begun to show an interest in tackling this serious human rights issue. The granting of a full waiver of sanctions against Saudi Arabia is in the national interest because it will allow us to continue programs in Saudi Arabia, and it will permit continued security cooperation to effectively combat terrorism and bolster regional security.

Impact of Sanctions: Foreign military sales to Saudi Arabia likely to total significantly more than $1 billion, approximately $7 million in MEPI funds, $65,000 in IMET funding, and $300,000 in NADR assistance would have been restricted by sanctions under the Act. A full waiver has been granted in the national interest of providing these military sales in order to advance counterterrorism and regional security goals.

Sudan

The Government of National Unity of Sudan (GNU) does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to waive sanctions against Sudan, consistent with the provisions of the Act, in the national interest of the United States.

Justification: Since April 2009, the GNU has made no progress in combating human trafficking through law enforcement or significant prevention measures. It made no effort to rescue or reintegrate victims of internal trafficking into their communities of origin, resulting in thousands of people continuing to remain in prolonged situations of forced labor and sexual exploitation. It also made no progress on demobilization of unlawful child soldiers or efforts to address the trafficking of women and girls for involuntary domestic servitude within and through the country.

The end of the 21-year civil war in Sudan, as marked by the signing of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement (CPA) by the Government of Sudan and the Sudan People's Liberation Army in January 2005, signaled a new era for Sudan. The United States continues to work with the parties to implement the peace agreement and bring about democratic transformation in Sudan. While the signing of the Darfur Peace Agreement 3 years ago provided an opportunity to contribute towards the resolution of the crisis in Darfur, the conditions on the ground remain tenuous and the progress towards a bona fide peace process remains stalled. Under the CPA, we continue to implement a wide variety of programs to restore effective governance and allow economic growth in the South and other conflict areas. These include, but are not limited to, programs aimed at restoring a functioning judicial system and other elements necessary for the return to the rule of law and security, a functioning legislature, elements of a market economy, mitigating conflict, and ensuring security.

Because both humanitarian and consensus-building efforts to support a peaceful transition in Darfur have been hampered by a delayed peace process, the United States Government remains cautious in exploring opportunities to begin to support recovery activities. However, the United States Government maintains diplomatic engagement to strengthen the peace process that will eventually allow opportunities for longer-term development activities.

Bilateral programs and projects in both of these areas, in conjunction with other countries and international institutions, are currently underway. The President's waiver of sanctions will allow these important efforts to continue as appropriate, thereby enhancing security within the country, supporting democratic development, and carrying out additional reconstruction projects in southern Sudan.

Impact of Sanctions: Comprehensive sanctions against Sudan are already in place, including those imposed under the International Emergency Economic Powers Act, those related to its designation as a state sponsor of terrorism, and several other sanctions. Applying additional sanctions could have affected more than $433 million in assistance to bolster security within the country and further the reconstruction of Southern Sudan.

The primary U.S. strategic objectives for Sudan are to ensure that all sides end the violence in Darfur; that both the north and the south continue working toward full implementation of the CPA, which includes transforming the defense institutions and military forces of the Government of Southern Sudan (GoSS) to provide security for itself and its people adequately; and that Sudan not be a base for terrorist activity. U.S. assistance is being used to assist the GoSS and the GoSS's Sudan People's Liberation Army (SPLA) with security sector reform, including infrastructure, command headquarters, and transportation projects. Our objective is to convey values of democracy, civil-military relations, and human rights, and to transform the SPLA from a guerrilla to a professional military force.

Prohibiting IMET and Peace Keeping Operations (PKO) funding for the GoSS/SPLA would preclude the ability to deliver necessary defense transformation services specifically cited for implementation in the United States Government Sudan Strategy, which highlights those areas of national interest of the United States. Sanctions would affect the expenditure of $300,000 in IMET funding currently allocated for the GoSS/SPLA, which is critical to training current and future military leaders in Southern Sudan. In FY 2009, PKO funded $1.5 million in security sector reform.

Sanctions would also affect programs aimed at addressing encouraging broad economic development in southern Sudan and supporting efforts towards peace in Darfur. These programs contribute to a better environment for good governance while increasing the availability of social services and strengthening nascent democratic policies and institutions.

Syria

The Government of Syria does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to sanction Syria. The President has also determined that provision of funding for educational and cultural exchange programs would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States.

Justification: The Government of Syria made few significant efforts to address its human trafficking problem since the release of the June Trafficking in Persons Report. There was little progress in passing and enacting a comprehensive anti-trafficking law drafted in 2006. The government made no visible efforts to increase identification of trafficking victims, prosecutions of trafficking offenses, or raise public awareness of the issue of trafficking. An informal referral policy, however, has recently succeeded in transferring a small number of trafficking victims from criminal detention facilities to a shelter operating in a government-owned building. In April 2009, however, the Syrian Government ratified the 2000 UN Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children. Since the release of the June Report, the Syrian Government made initial steps toward direct engagement with the United States Government on human trafficking issues.

A partial waiver of sanctions is in the national interest as the continuation of existing educational and cultural exchanges will promote greater understanding of the United States and its people.

Impact of Sanctions: The Government of Syria is already subject to economic sanctions due to, among other things, its support for international terrorism. The partial waiver will allow the provision of funding for participation by government officials and employees in educational and cultural exchange programs.

Zimbabwe

The Government of Zimbabwe does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to sanction Zimbabwe. The President has also determined that provision of funding for programs to support the promotion of health, good governance, education, agriculture, poverty reduction, livelihoods, or family planning would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States.

Justification: In June 2009, the State Department began working with the Government of Zimbabwe on an action plan that outlined steps to combat trafficking. Since that time, Zimbabwe has failed to increase efforts to prosecute, convict, and punish trafficking offenders; formalize procedures for interviewing trafficking victims and transferring them to the care of NGOs; or launch a broad anti-trafficking awareness-raising campaign. Furthermore, members of security forces of local populations have not ceased using local populations for forced diamond mining. Since the release of the June 2009 Trafficking in Persons Report, however, officials in the Prime Minister's Office, the Parliament, and the Ministries of Foreign Affairs and Justice agreed that enacting anti-trafficking legislation is important for Zimbabwe. The Prime Minister's office took up the issue and began consulting with stakeholders with an eye toward drafting a comprehensive anti-trafficking bill. In August, the Zimbabwean Embassy in Angola assisted in facilitating the repatriation of Zimbabwean trafficking victims who escaped forced labor situations in Luanda.

A partial waiver of sanctions is in the national interest as it will allow certain types of assistance through NGOs to promote the country's transformation from repression and poverty to a government which respects democratic freedoms and seeks to meet the needs of its people.

Impact of Sanctions: The Government of Zimbabwe is already subject to economic sanctions due to, among other things, failure to repay debts owed to the United States [Section 620(q) of the Foreign Assistance Act and section 7012 (the "Brooke amendment") of the Department of State, Foreign Operations, and Related Programs Act, 2009 (Div. H, P.L. 111-8)]. The partial waiver will allow the provision of funding for programs to support the good governance, health, agricultural, family planning, poverty reduction, livelihoods, private sector competitiveness, and educational sectors. The fragile transition government's ability to provide social services is weak, thereby contributing to the deteriorating humanitarian situation.

The Zimbabwe Democracy and Economy Recovery Act, signed into law in 2001, and provisions in subsequent appropriations acts, restrict the ability of the United States to cast its vote in support of assistance to Zimbabwe at the international financial institutions, except for programs that meet basic human needs or promote democracy. These restrictions can be waived upon fulfillment of certain conditions, including restoration of the rule of law, respect for ownership and title to property, and freedom of speech and association.

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS hc11-JF78-091014-2432326 StaffFurigay

LOAD-DATE: October 14, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

2013

Copyright 2009 Targeted News Service LLC
All Rights Reserved

Cyprus Mail

Internet Edition

Cyprus Mail

September 2, 2009 Wednesday

'Prostitution in Cyprus is a theoretical position'

BYLINE: Alexia SaoulliLENGTH: 816 words

A DEFENCE lawyer with a reputation for courtroom theatrics yesterday stunned his audience when he said the existence of prostitution in Cyprus was only theoretical. Specifically Nassos Panayiotou said "prostitution in Cyprus is a theoretical position of which the burden of proof lies in court".

People sitting in the courtroom, including members of an international watchdog on human trafficking for sexual exploitation and lawyers for the state prosecutor's office, exchanged uncomfortable glances, while several tried to stifle mortified smirks.

The comment was made during Panayiotou's cross-examination of Katerina Papachristodoulou, Head of Nicosia's District Civil Registry and Migration Office.

Papachristodoulou had been called to testify by the prosecution in the ongoing human trafficking and prostitution trial at Nicosia's Assize Court.

During her testimony Papachristodoulou outlined how cabaret owners had secured entry permits and work contracts for their female, third country employees - known as artistes - pre February 2009. The law was changed earlier this year after the Republic of Cyprus was repeatedly accused of turning a blind eye to human trafficking.

Panayiotou's point was included as part of his introduction, where he also referred to Cyprus as an "obedient child" which bowed down to the likes of the United States. The latter remark was made with reference to the US State Department's 2006 annual report on human trafficking when Cyprus was placed on the Tier 2 'watch list'.

During cross-examination Papachristodoulou made it clear that her department merely processed applications to employ cabaret artistes. She said complaints from artistes regarding their work conditions were investigated by police during routine inspections of cabarets.

"Complaints are not filed with us," she said.

Papachristodoulou said she personally had no contact with cabaret agents, owners or managers unless they specifically asked to meet with her. She said applications were processed in line with whoever was licensed to operate the cabaret and as long as all legal requirements were met, including the validity of the premises' operation, liquor and loudspeaker licenses.

She also said women employed at cabarets had to attach medical certificates to their entry permit applications including test results for HIV, hepatitis B and C, syphilis and tuberculosis. Within seven days of arriving in Cyprus the women had to undergo the tests again at a state hospital, she said.

During cross-examination Papachristodoulou turned down the option of remaining seated, choosing instead to stand in the witness box. With her jet black bob and power suit, she looked every inch the department head and refused to be bullied when pushed by the defence team as she answered each question in her distinctive throaty voice. At one point Papachristodoulou even asked Panayiotou why he had looked away when she was speaking to him. This was a far cry from the intimidated, alleged victims of sexual exploitation the defence lawyer had cross-examined earlier on in the trial.

Papachristodoulou said third country nationals were supposed to have their terms of employment explained to them before they came to Cyprus.

"But I can't know what they tell them or don't tell them. If they give them (pamphlets in their mother tongue outlining their job description) or not, or how they explain it to them or if they do," she said.

With respect to the Dominican Republic she said the Honorary Consulate for the Republic of Cyprus in the Dominican Republic had no authority to issue entry permits for cabaret artistes and that it had to come from Cyprus' nearest Embassy which was in Mexico.

Papachristodoulou repeatedly told the defence team their questions regarding what procedures were carried out in the women's country of origin and later in Cyprus with respect to prostitution allegations had nothing to do with her department but with the Foreign and Justice Ministries.

She said she could not know whether procedure was followed and whether the women were fully briefed on their rights because she was not present.

Almost losing her temper, when for the umpteenth time she was asked whether immigration police followed procedure, she said: "Why should I know? Why should I know? How should I know what is asked as part of the investigation?"

Papachristodoulou was the 12th prosecution witness in what looks set to be a lengthy trial after five women from the Dominican Republic filed complaints against a downtown Nicosia cabaret that they were victims of human trafficking and forced into prostitution.

The accused are five Greek Cypriot men and a 26-year-old cabaret artiste from the Dominican Republic. The men are a 55-year-old cabaret manager, three cabaret waiters aged 66, 62 and 53, and a 55-year-old cabaret artiste agent. If convicted they face a maximum sentence of up to 15 years imprisonment.

LOAD-DATE: September 3, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: 70

287 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Manila Times (Philippines)

September 1, 2009 Tuesday

Negros is 'hot spot' for human trafficking:NGO launches Step UP campaign, a preventive program to curb problem among youth sector in province

BYLINE: By Ma. Ester L. Espina, Correspondent

LENGTH: 535 words

Negros Occidental joins the list of provinces on the watch lists of groups working to fight human trafficking and worse, has become not just a source of persons being trafficked in various forms of human slavery, but as another "destination."

Visayan Forum Foundation executive director, Ma. Cecilia Flores-Oebanda said that their rescue and monitoring operation has indicated that the problem has now been categorized as the third-largest underground business and a $30-million industry.

"This is not anymore a simple migration problem but we have been seeing more and more of these trafficked victims sold and resold many times over," she added.

She said several residents hailing from Negros Occidental and Bacolod City have fallen victims to human trafficking "many of them ending up in the prostitution trade."

Oebanda, a native of Negros and was formerly a rebel commander at the height of the insurgency said many of those they have rescued and interviewed come from the CHICKS area in southern Negros and from Banago in Bacolod.

"Worse, and the local government should know this, the province is not only a hotspot for source of trafficked persons but has become a destination," citing that they have monitored night entertainment centers whose workers are mostly from other regions in the Visayas, said Oebanda.

Oebanda was in Bacolod recently for the launching of the STEP UP project that will be implemented locally by the Negros Ecological and Development Foundation (NEDF) in cooperation with Microsoft as a "preventive program" against human trafficking.

STEP UP, which means Stop Trafficking and Exploitation of People through Unlimited Potential, provides information technology and life skills to potential victims of human trafficking.

NEDF executive director, Roseo Depra, said they have established a STEP UP Learning Center in Barangay Handumanan which she said has been also cited as one of the major areas in Bacolod where recruiters would operate in to entice young boys and girls with hopes of employment in Manila and abroad but "unfortunately they end up in prostitution dens."

For their first batch of STEP UP scholars, NEDF screened and chose 20 out-of-school youth residents in the area who will undergo a three-month program, which includes matching employment after graduation. In the next three years, Depra said they hope to see more than a thousand youth gainfully employed and helping in the anti-human trafficking advocacy work.

She recounted the tale of a 14-year-old girl from Samar who was recruited for domestic work in Manila but ended up in a prostitution den where she found 100 more girls like her in the flesh trade.

Oebanda said that while their early years focused mostly on rescue operations and legal cases against "head-hunters," they have shifted direction toward prevention through a community-based program.

She acknowledged that the problem stems from economics and the promise of money which is why more and more of the younger set fall into the trap.

"We need to create a counter-move against this culture of deception and we hope that through STEP UP, we will be able to prevent thousands of youth fall victim to human traffickers," she added.

LOAD-DATE: September 3, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2009 News Bites Pty Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

Global News Bites

288 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Associated Press

August 27, 2009 Thursday 12:31 PM GMT

US to Malaysia: Stop human trafficking quickly

BYLINE: By EILEEN NG, Associated Press Writer

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 441 words

DATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR, Malaysia

The United States welcomes Malaysia's crackdown on human trafficking, but wants to see "results rather than rhetoric" before it can remove the Southeast Asian country from a blacklist, a senior official said Thursday.

Several alleged traffickers, including government officials colluding with them, have been arrested and charged in recent weeks after Malaysia was labeled one of the world's worst offenders in a U.S. State Department report released in June.

The prosecutions were "heartening," Luis CdeBaca, a top State Department official, told reporters at the end of a three-day visit to Malaysia where he met with government officials and aid groups.

But "we are looking for sustainability. We want to make sure that cases are brought (to court) not simply in the interim period," he said.

CdeBaca was appointed in May to head the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, which coordinates U.S. government activities in the global fight against human trafficking.

"We are looking at results rather than rhetoric," he said. "We are heartened by the tone and desire of the (Malaysian) government to achieve results but in terms of having tangible results that is something we have to continue to discuss."

The U.S. report said Malaysia is a destination and source for women and children trafficked for the purpose of prostitution, and men, women and children used for forced labor. Many of the victims were brought from Myanmar.

CdeBaca said Washington wants to see sustained investigations and prosecutions throughout the year before making its final decision on whether to remove Malaysia from the list in its 2010 report.

This was the third time Malaysia has been singled out for its record on human trafficking. It was first included in the State Department blacklist in 2001 and again in 2007, but was removed last year. Fifty-one other countries are also on the list.

If a country appears on the list for two consecutive years, it can be subject to U.S. sanctions.

CdeBaca said a team of American experts comprising an experienced federal prosecutor, FBI personnel and a victims' specialist will travel to Malaysia in October to help train Malaysian counterparts in enforcement.

He also urged the Malaysian government to work together with NGOs in what he said was a fight against "modern slavery."

Malaysia's Home Minister Hishammuddin Hussein has said the government will do "whatever it takes" to stop the problem, but noted there were many hurdles including a porous border with Thailand.

Activists estimate that hundreds of thousands of people from Myanmar live illegally in Malaysia in addition to 140,000 legal Myanmar migrant workers.

2019

LOAD-DATE: August 28, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2009 Associated Press
All Rights Reserved

289 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Africa - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

August 27, 2009 Thursday

Nigerian authorities rescue 3600 victims of human trafficking

LENGTH: 453 words

Text of report by Nigerian newspaper This Day website on 27 August

Executive Secretary, National Agency for Prohibition of Traffic in Persons (NAPTIP), Mr Simon Egede, yesterday in Kaduna, said the agency has so far rescued about 3,600 victims from human traffickers, with 60 convictions gotten, while 50 cases are pending in different courts across Nigeria.

Speaking at a three-day workshop to facilitate sectoral implementation of the National Plan of Action by members of the National Task Force on Trafficking in Persons, Egede said the victims would have ended up in dehumanising enslavement in Europe and other countries, or die in the process of being taken outside the country.

He said the recent elevation of Nigeria from Tier One to Tier Two status in the global rating of the United States Department of State 2009 Annual Global Trafficking Report, has further placed more need on the country to fight human trafficking, as global searchlight is now beamed on Nigeria to justify her elevation.

He however, said all the rescued victims have been trained to start new businesses, while others have been put in school and their school fees paid by the agency, adding that it became necessary to empower victims because traffickers target the poor and vulnerable, especially those who are not employed.

While appealing to the general public to help the agency with any useful information on any suspected case of human trafficking, Egede said, in addition to the six zonal offices that NAPTIP has, it has also been collaborating with the police and Immigration Services, so as to help to properly police the country's borders against traffickers.

He said the goals of the Action Plan, which was approved by the Federal Executive Council last year, apart from streamlining stakeholder's activities include, rationalising and coordinating available resources and acting as a broad-based action for all stakeholders.

He said it also includes seeking to prioritise activities of the agency with limited resources, with a view to achieving success in the fight against human traffickers in Nigeria. Representatives of the Finish government, Norway, Spain, Netherland, Switzerland, Belgium, Italy and the United States who were all in attendance, promised to unite and collaborate against human traffickers. UNICEF Representative, Dr Sharon Oladiji, said unless the fight against traffickers is coordinated and backed by international support, no significant success will be recorded. She said necessary political will must be included to forcefully address the "phenomenon, which preys primarily on the most vulnerable women, children, the poorest and the least educated."

Source: This Day website, Lagos, in English 27 Aug 09

LOAD-DATE: August 27, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

290 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Right Vision News

August 27, 2009 Thursday

Pakistan blasts US report on human trafficking

LENGTH: 920 words

DATELINE: ISLAMABAD

ISLAMABAD, Sept. 27 -- The Federal Investigation Agency (FIA) on Friday came hard on the State Department for having an 'unrealistic view' of the ground realities of Pakistan and said downgrading Pakistan in the field of human trafficking by Washington was unfair and based on inconclusive evidence obtained by the American Embassy in Islamabad. Reacting to the State Department's recent annual report for 2009 on human trafficking that downgraded Pakistan to the Tier-II Watch List as reported by media on Thursday, the FIA, without being diplomatic or too shy to confront the otherwise most powerful State Department, said, 'The report of the US State Department does not mention its sources of information which, to say the least, has an unrealistic view of the ground realities of Pakistan's society and the capacity of its state institutions to deal with deep-rooted social and cultural issues.' It added, 'Downgrading Pakistan to Tier-II Watch List was rather unfair on the basis of inconclusive evidence or material acquired by the US Embassy.' The FIA, which is the top official body to check human trafficking, expressed its surprise over the State Department's findings, which show Afghanistan better than Pakistan although India stays on Tier-II Watch List along with Pakistan. 'If not anything, some excellent efforts made by the FIA and other state institutions during 2008 have unfortunately been ignored,' the FIA rejoinder to this correspondent said. The FIA admitted that although the State Department report raised some core inadequacies of our society and governance, it did not throw enough light on some important points that should have been considered in November 2008 before preparation of the TIP Report released by the State Department in June 2009 such as: i) Should the non-availability of data ignore the progress on ground? ii) Whether the US Embassy asked the FIA for this data? iii) Did the US embassy officials tap the multiple sources to check/verify the progress being made in this regard? iv) How was the data on convictions and complicity of government officers reflected in the report acquired by the US Embassy? The FIA is shocked how Pakistan can be downgraded when it actually performed well compared to the past years. 'Downgrading Pakistan to the Tier-II Watch List for performance in 2008, however, should be seen in comparison to its performance in 2007 when Pakistan was not in the Watch List category.' Giving details of its improved performance during the year assessed, the FIA said: a) The number of passengers offloaded by the FIA on the basis of forged documents had increased from 518 in 2007 to 572 in 2008 while the passengers deported by other countries because of forged documents reduced from 174 in 2007 to 108 in 2008; b) Though the number of convictions reduced under the human trafficking law in 2008, this must be viewed against the backdrop of the black coat revolution during 2008. However, the quality of convictions registered substantial improvement and human smugglers were convicted even up to 10 years, which was not the case in earlier years; c) The creation of Inter-Agency Task Force in 2005 was a landmark decision of the government in the direction of reducing illegal cross-border movement between Afghanistan, Pakistan and Iran. It performed an excellent job of arresting 10,703 persons in 2007 attempting to cross the international border illegally but these interceptions reduced to 8,543 in 2008 due to the peculiar security circumstances of Balochistan. Sharing the performance of the Federal Investigation Agency for the first eight months of 2009, the FIA said it clearly highlights an improvement over the corresponding period of the last year. These details include the number of persons offloaded on account of forged/suspected travel documents by various immigration check-posts of the country is 487 compared to 365 of the previous year; likewise, the deportees received from other countries on account of forged documents, is only 49 in comparison to 77 of the last year; the greater number of offloaded persons due to suspected travel documents and lesser number of deportees received back on account of suspected documents clearly substantiates improved vigilance of immigration check-posts; out of 69 Most Wanted Traffickers in the Red Book, the FIA has already arrested 12 this year and is vigorously pursuing early arrest of others; the FIA is improving the capacity of its Anti-Trafficking Units (ATUs) across the country: both in terms of its physical resources and training of its personnel. As many as 278 officers of various ranks have been put through improved training courses in 2009; a focal group has been constituted at the FIA headquarters to coordinate, monitor and improve the performance of various stakeholders which includes provincial/federal law-enforcement agencies, NGOs, international agencies and other stakeholders like the foreign governments, etc.; An Immigration Intelligence Unit has been raised in the FIA to gather information about networks operating locally and internationally in the field of human trafficking; an awareness campaign with the help of print/tele media, IGOs/NGOs and the local provincial governments has been planned in about 20 districts of the country which are most affected areas of potential illegal immigrants. Published by HT Syndication with permission from Right Vision News. For more information on news feed please contact Sarabjit Jagirdar at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: September 26, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2009 Right Vision News
All Rights Reserved

291 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Worldstream

August 27, 2009 Thursday 12:31 PM GMT

US to Malaysia: Stop human trafficking quickly

BYLINE: By EILEEN NG, Associated Press Writer

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 441 words

DATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR Malaysia

The United States welcomes Malaysia's crackdown on human trafficking, but wants to see "results rather than rhetoric" before it can remove the Southeast Asian country from a blacklist, a senior official said Thursday.

Several alleged traffickers, including government officials colluding with them, have been arrested and charged in recent weeks after Malaysia was labeled one of the world's worst offenders in a U.S. State Department report released in June.

The prosecutions were "heartening," Luis CdeBaca, a top State Department official, told reporters at the end of a three-day visit to Malaysia where he met with government officials and aid groups.

But "we are looking for sustainability. We want to make sure that cases are brought (to court) not simply in the interim period," he said.

CdeBaca was appointed in May to head the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, which coordinates U.S. government activities in the global fight against human trafficking.

"We are looking at results rather than rhetoric," he said. "We are heartened by the tone and desire of the (Malaysian) government to achieve results but in terms of having tangible results that is something we have to continue to discuss."

The U.S. report said Malaysia is a destination and source for women and children trafficked for the purpose of prostitution, and men, women and children used for forced labor. Many of the victims were brought from Myanmar.

CdeBaca said Washington wants to see sustained investigations and prosecutions throughout the year before making its final decision on whether to remove Malaysia from the list in its 2010 report.

This was the third time Malaysia has been singled out for its record on human trafficking. It was first included in the State Department blacklist in 2001 and again in 2007, but was removed last year. Fifty-one other countries are also on the list.

If a country appears on the list for two consecutive years, it can be subject to U.S. sanctions.

CdeBaca said a team of American experts comprising an experienced federal prosecutor, FBI personnel and a victims' specialist will travel to Malaysia in October to help train Malaysian counterparts in enforcement.

He also urged the Malaysian government to work together with NGOs in what he said was a fight against "modern slavery."

Malaysia's Home Minister Hishammuddin Hussein has said the government will do "whatever it takes" to stop the problem, but noted there were many hurdles including a porous border with Thailand.

Activists estimate that hundreds of thousands of people from Myanmar live illegally in Malaysia in addition to 140,000 legal Myanmar migrant workers.

2025

LOAD-DATE: August 28, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2009 Associated Press
All Rights Reserved

292 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Online

August 27, 2009 Thursday 12:31 PM GMT

US to Malaysia: Stop human trafficking quickly

BYLINE: By EILEEN NG, Associated Press Writer

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 441 words

DATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR Malaysia

The United States welcomes Malaysia's crackdown on human trafficking, but wants to see "results rather than rhetoric" before it can remove the Southeast Asian country from a blacklist, a senior official said Thursday.

Several alleged traffickers, including government officials colluding with them, have been arrested and charged in recent weeks after Malaysia was labeled one of the world's worst offenders in a U.S. State Department report released in June.

The prosecutions were "heartening," Luis CdeBaca, a top State Department official, told reporters at the end of a three-day visit to Malaysia where he met with government officials and aid groups.

But "we are looking for sustainability. We want to make sure that cases are brought (to court) not simply in the interim period," he said.

CdeBaca was appointed in May to head the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, which coordinates U.S. government activities in the global fight against human trafficking.

"We are looking at results rather than rhetoric," he said. "We are heartened by the tone and desire of the (Malaysian) government to achieve results but in terms of having tangible results that is something we have to continue to discuss."

The U.S. report said Malaysia is a destination and source for women and children trafficked for the purpose of prostitution, and men, women and children used for forced labor. Many of the victims were brought from Myanmar.

CdeBaca said Washington wants to see sustained investigations and prosecutions throughout the year before making its final decision on whether to remove Malaysia from the list in its 2010 report.

This was the third time Malaysia has been singled out for its record on human trafficking. It was first included in the State Department blacklist in 2001 and again in 2007, but was removed last year. Fifty-one other countries are also on the list.

If a country appears on the list for two consecutive years, it can be subject to U.S. sanctions.

CdeBaca said a team of American experts comprising an experienced federal prosecutor, FBI personnel and a victims' specialist will travel to Malaysia in October to help train Malaysian counterparts in enforcement.

He also urged the Malaysian government to work together with NGOs in what he said was a fight against "modern slavery."

Malaysia's Home Minister Hishammuddin Hussein has said the government will do "whatever it takes" to stop the problem, but noted there were many hurdles including a porous border with Thailand.

Activists estimate that hundreds of thousands of people from Myanmar live illegally in Malaysia in addition to 140,000 legal Myanmar migrant workers.

LOAD-DATE: August 28, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2009 Associated Press
All Rights Reserved

293 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Associated Press

August 16, 2009 Sunday

Mo. RICO charges a 1st for human trafficking case

BYLINE: By BILL DRAPER, Associated Press Writer

SECTION: BUSINESS NEWS

LENGTH: 883 words

DATELINE: KANSAS CITY, Mo.

From a nondescript brick building a few blocks from the bright lights of Westport, Kansas City's oldest entertainment district, Giant Labor Solutions lured hundreds of foreigners to the city with promises of good jobs and a chance to live the American dream.

But from 2001 until this spring, Giant Labor and two other metro-area companies turned the workers into slaves, fanning them out to housekeeping jobs in hotels and other businesses in 14 states while forcing them to live, sometimes eight at a time, in small apartments for which they were charged exorbitant rent, federal authorities allege. Most of the workers were in the country illegally and were threatened with deportation.

In a 45-count indictment handed down in May, the U.S. attorney's office accuses eight Uzbekistan nationals and four others in the largest human trafficking case ever prosecuted in the city. Authorities say it is the first time a human trafficking ring has been charged under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, the federal statute most often associated with mafia cases.

It's also the first time the charge of fraud in foreign labor contracting has been used since it was added last year to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, which in 2000 became the first comprehensive federal law for prosecution of traffickers.

G. Robert Blakey, a professor at Notre Dame Law School who helped write the RICO statute in 1970, said the law allows prosecutors to try criminal operations as a whole, rather than individually. RICO requires prosecutors to present evidence against everyone involved in a racketeering ring, instead of being limited to evidence against only that person, he said.

By presenting a bigger case, the government also has more leverage to pursue bigger forfeitures, such as the $6 million it is seeking in the Giant Labor case.

Blakey said RICO was amended in 1995 to include provisions dealing specifically with modern slavery, but he's not surprised it took 14 years for someone to use the law in a human trafficking case.

Prosecutors allege a pattern of racketeering in the Giant Labor case that included threatening victims with serious harm to themselves or others and threatening to use the legal system against them.

Blakey applauded Assistant U.S. Attorney Cynthia Cordes, the top human trafficking prosecutor in Missouri's Western District, for her efforts in pursuing the RICO charge.

"That's squarely within what Congress had intended," he said. "She's not pushing the envelope. She's right in the center of the box."

The indictment says Abrorkhodja Askarkhodjaev, 30, owned and operated Giant Labor, a labor-leasing company, and controlled a dozen other businesses that filed fraudulent applications for foreign workers. Askarkhodjaev and others used false IDs to create the companies and open dozens of bank accounts for them, prosecutors said.

The workers, who were mainly from the Dominican Republic, Jamaica and the Philippines, paid thousands of dollars often taking out loans in their home countries for Giant Labor to bring them to the U.S. and get them temporary visas, authorities said. But once they arrived, the workers were stuck in small, sparsely furnished apartments, had no access to their mail and were charged so many fees that they were sometimes told on payday they owed the company money.

Prosecutors said the workers became trapped because they couldn't afford to leave.

Askarkhodjaev's attorney, Willie Epps Jr., said his client denies that his companies were involved in human trafficking.

"The government's assertion of modern-day slavery is inaccurate and offensive," Epps told The Associated Press in a statement. "Abror Askarkhodjaev has pleaded not guilty to the charges and intends to proceed to trial."

The maximum sentence for racketeering is 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine; many of the other charges in the indictment carry similar penalties.

The 13 other defendants held positions with Giant Labor or the other companies, several of which had addresses at UPS stores in Missouri and Kansas. At least two businesses were operated out of apartments, the indictment said.

Giant Labor, Crystal Management Inc. and Five Star Cleaning applied for more than 1,000 fraudulent work visas without being required to identify who would be using them, prosecutors said.

Once the visas were approved and the workers arrived in Kansas City, Giant Labor used them to fill labor contracts in Missouri, Kansas, Arizona, California, Florida and eight other states.

Eight of the suspects have been arrested, while the others are believed to have fled the country. No trial date has been set.

Acting U.S. Attorney Matt Whitworth said the government began focusing on human trafficking during the Bush administration with passage of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act. Under President Barack Obama, who in June expanded the U.S. watchlist of countries suspected of not doing enough to combat human trafficking, efforts to fight trafficking are being ratcheted up even more.

"(Attorney General) Eric Holder is encouraging U.S. attorneys offices to pursue these cases and has shown a great deal of interest in more and more of this type of prosecution," Whitworth said. "I think we're making an impact, and the Department of Justice is encouraging us to do that."

LOAD-DATE: August 17, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

294 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Financial Wire

August 16, 2009 Sunday 8:11 PM GMT

Mo. RICO charges a 1st for human trafficking case

BYLINE: By BILL DRAPER, Associated Press Writer

SECTION: BUSINESS NEWS

LENGTH: 883 words

DATELINE: KANSAS CITY Mo.

From a nondescript brick building a few blocks from the bright lights of Westport, Kansas City's oldest entertainment district, Giant Labor Solutions lured hundreds of foreigners to the city with promises of good jobs and a chance to live the American dream.

But from 2001 until this spring, Giant Labor and two other metro-area companies turned the workers into slaves, fanning them out to housekeeping jobs in hotels and other businesses in 14 states while forcing them to live, sometimes eight at a time, in small apartments for which they were charged exorbitant rent, federal authorities allege. Most of the workers were in the country illegally and were threatened with deportation.

In a 45-count indictment handed down in May, the U.S. attorney's office accuses eight Uzbekistan nationals and four others in the largest human trafficking case ever prosecuted in the city. Authorities say it is the first time a human trafficking ring has been charged under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, the federal statute most often associated with mafia cases.

It's also the first time the charge of fraud in foreign labor contracting has been used since it was added last year to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, which in 2000 became the first comprehensive federal law for prosecution of traffickers.

G. Robert Blakey, a professor at Notre Dame Law School who helped write the RICO statute in 1970, said the law allows prosecutors to try criminal operations as a whole, rather than individually. RICO requires prosecutors to present evidence against everyone involved in a racketeering ring, instead of being limited to evidence against only that person, he said.

By presenting a bigger case, the government also has more leverage to pursue bigger forfeitures, such as the $6 million it is seeking in the Giant Labor case.

Blakey said RICO was amended in 1995 to include provisions dealing specifically with modern slavery, but he's not surprised it took 14 years for someone to use the law in a human trafficking case.

Prosecutors allege a pattern of racketeering in the Giant Labor case that included threatening victims with serious harm to themselves or others and threatening to use the legal system against them.

Blakey applauded Assistant U.S. Attorney Cynthia Cordes, the top human trafficking prosecutor in Missouri's Western District, for her efforts in pursuing the RICO charge.

"That's squarely within what Congress had intended," he said. "She's not pushing the envelope. She's right in the center of the box."

The indictment says Abrorkhodja Askarkhodjaev, 30, owned and operated Giant Labor, a labor-leasing company, and controlled a dozen other businesses that filed fraudulent applications for foreign workers. Askarkhodjaev and others used false IDs to create the companies and open dozens of bank accounts for them, prosecutors said.

The workers, who were mainly from the Dominican Republic, Jamaica and the Philippines, paid thousands of dollars often taking out loans in their home countries for Giant Labor to bring them to the U.S. and get them temporary visas, authorities said. But once they arrived, the workers were stuck in small, sparsely furnished apartments, had no access to their mail and were charged so many fees that they were sometimes told on payday they owed the company money.

Prosecutors said the workers became trapped because they couldn't afford to leave.

Askarkhodjaev's attorney, Willie Epps Jr., said his client denies that his companies were involved in human trafficking.

"The government's assertion of modern-day slavery is inaccurate and offensive," Epps told The Associated Press in a statement. "Abror Askarkhodjaev has pleaded not guilty to the charges and intends to proceed to trial."

The maximum sentence for racketeering is 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine; many of the other charges in the indictment carry similar penalties.

The 13 other defendants held positions with Giant Labor or the other companies, several of which had addresses at UPS stores in Missouri and Kansas. At least two businesses were operated out of apartments, the indictment said.

Giant Labor, Crystal Management Inc. and Five Star Cleaning applied for more than 1,000 fraudulent work visas without being required to identify who would be using them, prosecutors said.

Once the visas were approved and the workers arrived in Kansas City, Giant Labor used them to fill labor contracts in Missouri, Kansas, Arizona, California, Florida and eight other states.

Eight of the suspects have been arrested, while the others are believed to have fled the country. No trial date has been set.

Acting U.S. Attorney Matt Whitworth said the government began focusing on human trafficking during the Bush administration with passage of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act. Under President Barack Obama, who in June expanded the U.S. watchlist of countries suspected of not doing enough to combat human trafficking, efforts to fight trafficking are being ratcheted up even more.

"(Attorney General) Eric Holder is encouraging U.S. attorneys offices to pursue these cases and has shown a great deal of interest in more and more of this type of prosecution," Whitworth said. "I think we're making an impact, and the Department of Justice is encouraging us to do that."

LOAD-DATE: August 17, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

295 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Online

August 16, 2009 Sunday 8:11 PM GMT

Mo. RICO charges a 1st for human trafficking case

BYLINE: By BILL DRAPER, Associated Press Writer

SECTION: BUSINESS NEWS

LENGTH: 883 words

DATELINE: KANSAS CITY Mo.

From a nondescript brick building a few blocks from the bright lights of Westport, Kansas City's oldest entertainment district, Giant Labor Solutions lured hundreds of foreigners to the city with promises of good jobs and a chance to live the American dream.

But from 2001 until this spring, Giant Labor and two other metro-area companies turned the workers into slaves, fanning them out to housekeeping jobs in hotels and other businesses in 14 states while forcing them to live, sometimes eight at a time, in small apartments for which they were charged exorbitant rent, federal authorities allege. Most of the workers were in the country illegally and were threatened with deportation.

In a 45-count indictment handed down in May, the U.S. attorney's office accuses eight Uzbekistan nationals and four others in the largest human trafficking case ever prosecuted in the city. Authorities say it is the first time a human trafficking ring has been charged under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, the federal statute most often associated with mafia cases.

It's also the first time the charge of fraud in foreign labor contracting has been used since it was added last year to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, which in 2000 became the first comprehensive federal law for prosecution of traffickers.

G. Robert Blakey, a professor at Notre Dame Law School who helped write the RICO statute in 1970, said the law allows prosecutors to try criminal operations as a whole, rather than individually. RICO requires prosecutors to present evidence against everyone involved in a racketeering ring, instead of being limited to evidence against only that person, he said.

By presenting a bigger case, the government also has more leverage to pursue bigger forfeitures, such as the $6 million it is seeking in the Giant Labor case.

Blakey said RICO was amended in 1995 to include provisions dealing specifically with modern slavery, but he's not surprised it took 14 years for someone to use the law in a human trafficking case.

Prosecutors allege a pattern of racketeering in the Giant Labor case that included threatening victims with serious harm to themselves or others and threatening to use the legal system against them.

Blakey applauded Assistant U.S. Attorney Cynthia Cordes, the top human trafficking prosecutor in Missouri's Western District, for her efforts in pursuing the RICO charge.

"That's squarely within what Congress had intended," he said. "She's not pushing the envelope. She's right in the center of the box."

The indictment says Abrorkhodja Askarkhodjaev, 30, owned and operated Giant Labor, a labor-leasing company, and controlled a dozen other businesses that filed fraudulent applications for foreign workers. Askarkhodjaev and others used false IDs to create the companies and open dozens of bank accounts for them, prosecutors said.

The workers, who were mainly from the Dominican Republic, Jamaica and the Philippines, paid thousands of dollars often taking out loans in their home countries for Giant Labor to bring them to the U.S. and get them temporary visas, authorities said. But once they arrived, the workers were stuck in small, sparsely furnished apartments, had no access to their mail and were charged so many fees that they were sometimes told on payday they owed the company money.

Prosecutors said the workers became trapped because they couldn't afford to leave.

Askarkhodjaev's attorney, Willie Epps Jr., said his client denies that his companies were involved in human trafficking.

"The government's assertion of modern-day slavery is inaccurate and offensive," Epps told The Associated Press in a statement. "Abror Askarkhodjaev has pleaded not guilty to the charges and intends to proceed to trial."

The maximum sentence for racketeering is 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine; many of the other charges in the indictment carry similar penalties.

The 13 other defendants held positions with Giant Labor or the other companies, several of which had addresses at UPS stores in Missouri and Kansas. At least two businesses were operated out of apartments, the indictment said.

Giant Labor, Crystal Management Inc. and Five Star Cleaning applied for more than 1,000 fraudulent work visas without being required to identify who would be using them, prosecutors said.

Once the visas were approved and the workers arrived in Kansas City, Giant Labor used them to fill labor contracts in Missouri, Kansas, Arizona, California, Florida and eight other states.

Eight of the suspects have been arrested, while the others are believed to have fled the country. No trial date has been set.

Acting U.S. Attorney Matt Whitworth said the government began focusing on human trafficking during the Bush administration with passage of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act. Under President Barack Obama, who in June expanded the U.S. watchlist of countries suspected of not doing enough to combat human trafficking, efforts to fight trafficking are being ratcheted up even more.

"(Attorney General) Eric Holder is encouraging U.S. attorneys offices to pursue these cases and has shown a great deal of interest in more and more of this type of prosecution," Whitworth said. "I think we're making an impact, and the Department of Justice is encouraging us to do that."

LOAD-DATE: August 17, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

296 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Associated Press State & Local Wire

August 16, 2009 Sunday 8:08 PM GMT

Mo. RICO charges a 1st for human trafficking case

BYLINE: By BILL DRAPER, Associated Press Writer

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL

LENGTH: 964 words

DATELINE: KANSAS CITY Mo.

From a nondescript brick building a few blocks from the bright lights of Westport, Kansas City's oldest entertainment district, Giant Labor Solutions lured hundreds of foreigners to the city with promises of good jobs and a chance to live the American dream.

But from 2001 until this spring, Giant Labor and two other metro-area companies turned the workers into slaves, fanning them out to housekeeping jobs in hotels and other businesses in 14 states while forcing them to live, sometimes eight at a time, in small apartments for which they were charged exorbitant rent, federal authorities allege. Most of the workers were in the country illegally and were threatened with deportation.

In a 45-count indictment handed down in May, the U.S. attorney's office accuses eight Uzbekistan nationals and four others in the largest human trafficking case ever prosecuted in the city. Authorities say it is the first time a human trafficking ring has been charged under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, the federal statute most often associated with mafia cases.

It's also the first time the charge of fraud in foreign labor contracting has been used since it was added last year to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, which in 2000 became the first comprehensive federal law for prosecution of traffickers.

G. Robert Blakey, a professor at Notre Dame Law School who helped write the RICO statute in 1970, said the law allows prosecutors to try criminal operations as a whole, rather than individually. RICO requires prosecutors to present evidence against everyone involved in a racketeering ring, instead of being limited to evidence against only that person, he said.

By presenting a bigger case, the government also has more leverage to pursue bigger forfeitures, such as the $6 million it is seeking in the Giant Labor case.

Blakey said RICO was amended in 1995 to include provisions dealing specifically with modern slavery, but he's not surprised it took 14 years for someone to use the law in a human trafficking case.

"RICO was passed in 1970, but it was almost 1980 before any prosecutions showed up under it," Blakey said. "I thought at the time it was outrageous. I've come to realize that getting the federal government to do anything is like trying to turn an aircraft carrier: You don't do it on a dime."

Prosecutors allege a pattern of racketeering in the Giant Labor case that included threatening victims with serious harm to themselves or others and threatening to use the legal system against them.

Blakey applauded Assistant U.S. Attorney Cynthia Cordes, the top human trafficking prosecutor in Missouri' Western District, for her efforts in pursuing the RICO charge.

"That's squarely within what Congress had intended," he said. "She's not pushing the envelope. She's right in the center of the box."

The indictment says Abrorkhodja Askarkhodjaev, 30, owned and operated Giant Labor, a labor-leasing company, and controlled a dozen other businesses that filed fraudulent applications for foreign workers. Askarkhodjaev and others used false IDs to create the companies and open dozens of bank accounts for them, prosecutors said.

The workers, who were mainly from the Dominican Republic, Jamaica and the Philippines, paid thousands of dollars often taking out loans in their home countries for Giant Labor to bring them to the U.S. and get them temporary visas, authorities said. But once they arrived, the workers were stuck in small, sparsely furnished apartments, had no access to their mail and were charged so many fees that they were sometimes told on payday they owed the company money.

Prosecutors said the workers became trapped because they couldn't afford to leave.

Askarkhodjaev's attorney, Willie Epps Jr., said his client denies that his companies were involved in human trafficking.

"The government's assertion of modern-day slavery is inaccurate and offensive," Epps told The Associated Press in a statement. "Abror Askarkhodjaev has pleaded not guilty to the charges and intends to proceed to trial."

The maximum sentence for racketeering is 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine; many of the other charges in the indictment carry similar penalties.

The 13 other defendants held positions with Giant Labor or the other companies, several of which had addresses at UPS stores in Missouri and Kansas. At least two businesses were operated out of apartments, the indictment said.

Giant Labor, Crystal Management Inc. and Five Star Cleaning applied for more than 1,000 fraudulent work visas without being required to identify who would be using them, prosecutors said.

Once the visas were approved and the workers arrived in Kansas City, Giant Labor used them to fill labor contracts in Missouri, Kansas, Alabama, Arizona, California, Colorado, Florida, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Nevada, New Jersey, South Carolina and Wyoming.

Eight of the suspects have been arrested, while the others are believed to have fled the country. No trial date has been set.

Acting U.S. Attorney Matt Whitworth said the government began focusing on human trafficking during the Bush administration with passage of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act. The law also allows victims to become temporary U.S. residents and eligible for permanent residency after three years.

Under President Barack Obama, who in June expanded the U.S. watchlist of countries suspected of not doing enough to combat human trafficking, efforts to fight trafficking are being ratcheted up even more.

"(Attorney General) Eric Holder is encouraging U.S. attorneys offices to pursue these cases and has shown a great deal of interest in more and more of this type of prosecution," Whitworth said. "I think we're making an impact, and the Department of Justice is encouraging us to do that."

LOAD-DATE: August 17, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

297 of 404 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

August 13, 2009 Thursday 10:34 PM EST

EXAMPLES OF OFFICE TO MONITOR, COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS-FUNDED PROGRAMS TO ADDRESS HUMAN TRAFFICKING

LENGTH: 1408 words

WASHINGTON, June 15 -- The U.S. Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons issued the text of the following fact sheet:

AFRICA

Burundi (Tier 2 Watch List) To address concerns about the lack of comprehensive anti-trafficking legislation, the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC) will provide technical assistance for the Ministry of Justice in Burundi to draft TIP legislation that is in alignment with international standards. UNODC will also conduct training for Burundi law enforcement, criminal justice, and judicial agencies to improve their identification of TIP victims and the investigation and prosecution of TIP offenses.

Djibouti (Tier 2 Watch List) The U.S. Department of Justice Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training will arrange a six-month assignment for a U.S. prosecutor to consult with, mentor, and train prosecutors, investigators, and judges in Djibouti on how to prosecute trafficking cases effectively.

Ghana (Tier 2 Watch List) The Legal Resource Center (LRC) is a Ghanaian NGO with expertise in human rights and trafficking in persons. The LRC will work with the Government of Ghana to improve current anti-trafficking laws. LRC will also provide TIP training to criminal justice officials and assist the Shelter Project of the Ministry of Women and Children's Affairs to develop comprehensive guidelines and procedures for handling victims of trafficking.

Sierra Leone (Tier 2) The Center for Victims of Torture (CVT) in Freetown is enhancing the quality of treatment for victims of human trafficking by providing psychological counseling to TIP victims. This model project focuses on victim recovery from psychological trauma and will train local Psychosocial Counselors and Clinical Training Supervisors who will continue to provide direct services to survivors after the project has ended.

EAST ASIA AND PACIFIC

Indonesia (Tier 2) The International Organization for Migration Recovery Center at the Indonesia National Police Hospital provides comprehensive medical, psychological, and reintegration services to Indonesian citizens who are repatriated after becoming victims of human trafficking in Asia and the Middle East. The Center receives key resources from the Government of Indonesia that contribute to the continuation of these critical services for Indonesian victims.

Cambodia (Tier 2 Watch List) AFESIP, founded by antihuman trafficking leader Somaly Mam, provides rehabilitation and reintegration services at three residential centers in Cambodia. This year AFESIP will add additional professional staff to ensure that victims have access to comprehensive services, including medical and psychological treatment. World Hope International operates the residential Assessment Center for short-term care of trafficked and sexually exploited girls. This unique multidisciplinary diagnostic and treatment center facilitates victims' recovery, safe participation in legal proceedings against their traffickers, and coordinates long-term placement for victims.

Philippines (Tier 2 Watch List) To support prosecutorial efforts to hold traffickers accountable, the U.S. Department of Justice Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training will arrange for a U.S. prosecutor and a victim/witness coordinator to work in the Philippines with prosecutors who handle TIP cases. The DOJ prosecutor will spend four months in the country and will conduct training and facilitate enhanced prosecutor-police cooperation. The training will focus on relevant TIP statutes, legal advocacy skills, and victim assistance and protection.

EUROPE AND EURASIA

Moldova (Tier 2 Watch List) Winrock International is working in Transnistria to build the capacity of local NGOs to identify and assist TIP victims and provide them with economic opportunities, and legal assistance, and psychological support. This project is the first of its kind in the region and is designed to bring needed expertise to a previously underserved area. Winrock will establish Mobile Training Teams that will reach health, education, and law enforcement professionals and give them the skills necessary to sustain services.

NEAR EAST

Iraq (Tier 2 Watch List) The Protection Project (TPP) at Johns Hopkins University is assisting the Iraqi government with anti-trafficking legislation and working to raise general awareness of TIP in Iraq technical by training representatives of Iraqi civil society organizations. Heartland Alliance for Human Needs and Human Rights will enhance protection of Iraqi sex trafficking victims in Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, and Syria by working with law enforcement, human rights groups, and women's organizations to create a protection network and train key organizations in identification of victims and basic victim care.

Lebanon (Tier 2 Watch List) In Lebanon, the Caritas Lebanon Migrant Center and the International Catholic Migration Commission (ICMC) are working cooperatively to identify and assist TIP victims detained in the government-run migrant facility. Caritas staff is housed within the facility and are able to interview and assess each migrant. TIP victims who are identified are then transferred to the Caritas/ICMC Safe House where they receive comprehensive services. Caritas will also conduct training for government officials on identification of trafficking victims, as well as victim-centered interviewing techniques, thus working toward sustainability of victim protection services in the government facility.

SOUTH ASIA

Afghanistan (Tier 2) In Afghanistan, the International Organization for Migration (IOM) is building the capacity of local NGOs to more effectively address TIP while concurrently increasing the capacity of law enforcement to investigate and prosecute trafficking cases. IOM will provide support, technical assistance and training to local NGO's to improve victim identification and referral mechanisms, as well as data collection, management and reporting of TIP cases. Training for government officials will target police officers, judges, and prosecutors in an effort to increase the number of trafficking cases that are investigated and prosecuted.

India (Tier 2 Watch List) The International Justice Mission (IJM) is working with government authorities to free victims of debt bondage and help them secure rehabilitation payments and vital social services. IJM uses a comprehensive multidisciplinary approach that focuses on victim relief, perpetrator accountability, victim aftercare, and structural prevention as the basis for activities to secure the release of children, women, and men from slavery and to develop care that is tailored to their needs. IJM plans to build on a landmark case, in which a perpetrator who held six young men as slaves in a sweets shop and factory was sentenced to one year in jail.

WESTERN HEMISPHERE

Argentina (Tier 2 Watch List) Three complementary projects address human trafficking in Argentina. Maria de los Angeles Foundation will develop and train special police units to investigate TIP cases in selected provinces. Unidos por la Justicia will enhance the efficiency of the prosecution of crimes related to human trafficking through the integrated training of judges, prosecutors, and law enforcement officials. Their training will include a focus on courtroom management techniques, particularly with regards to interviewing and securing testimony from child victims, as well as how to protect victims from re-victimization. IOM will strengthen counter-trafficking networks in the Tri-Border Area (TBA) in the Southern Cone of South America (Argentina, Brazil, and Paraguay). IOM will provide medical, psychological, legal, and job training assistance to victims and will work to increase coordination and improve cooperation between key judicial actors.

Dominican Republic (Tier 2 Watch List) IOM will work with Government of the Dominican Republic to strengthen its response to human trafficking by conducting training for the Attorney General's office and the judiciary. The training will focus on investigation and prosecution techniques, enforcement of existing legislation, and strategies for victim identification and protection. IOM will help to establish a shelter and provide technical assistance in shelter management and comprehensive services for TIP victims. For more information please contact: Sarabjit Jagirdar, Email:- htsyn-dication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: August 13, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2009 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

298 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

August 9, 2009 Sunday

Taiwan broke up human-trafficking ring

LENGTH: 422 words

Text of report in English by Taiwanese newspaper Taipei Times website on 9 August

[Unattributed article from the "Taiwan" page: "Criminal Investigation Bureau Busts Smugglers"]

The Criminal Investigation Bureau (CIB) yesterday said it had broken up a human-trafficking ring that used the passports of Taiwanese Aboriginal children to smuggle Chinese minors into France.

In June, the National Immigration Agency (NIA) made a similar breakthrough involving another group that used the same method to traffic Chinese youths to the US.

The CIB yesterday said it received a tip that a man surnamed Liao and the criminal group he headed had successfully smuggled Chinese minors to the US several times.

After the US strengthened its visa application policy last month by requiring that all persons under the age of 14 go to the American Institute in Taiwan (AIT) for a face-to-face visa interview, the group shifted its operations to France, the bureau said.

The CIB said the traffickers would pay anywhere between $5NT,000 to $10NT,000 for the personal information of Aboriginal children in Hualien and would then use the documents to apply for authentic Republic of China (ROC) passports and foreign visas.

Currently, the Bureau of Consular Affairs does not require people to apply for a passport in person.

After obtaining an ROC passport and a visa to a third country, the traffickers would bring the travel documents to Hong Kong to meet up with Chinese counterparts who brought minors from China. Together, the children and their escorts would fly to either the US, France, Mexico or other countries from Hong Kong using the passports.

The CIB said the crime syndicates had bought the personal information of 45 Aboriginal children and trafficked 37 Chinese minors to the US and other countries.

The crime ring earns $70US,000 for each child it smuggles. The CIB estimated that Liao's group had made a profit of more than $80NT million ($2US.4 million).

Together with Hualien police, the CIB arrested members of the group at Taiwan Taoyuan International Airport on Thursday. Police also found the members had a large quantity of fraudulent passports and counterfeit NIA immigration custom stamps.

The 2009 annual Trafficking in Persons report published in June by the US Department of Homeland Security said that Taiwan remained a Tier 2 country.

Singapore, Hong Kong, South Korea and Japan all received the same ranking, while China has stayed on the Tier 2 watch list for five years running.

Source: Taipei Times website, Taipei, in English 9 Aug 09

LOAD-DATE: August 9, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2009 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

299 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Manila Times (Philippines)

August 8, 2009 Saturday

OFWs trafficked to Bahamas

BYLINE: By Llanesca T. PantìLENGTH: 371 words

Manila-based recruiters are trafficking aspiring Filipino migrant workers to Bahamas, the Department of Foreign Affairs warned Friday.

Citing reports from the Philippine Embassy in Havana, the Foreign Affairs department said that officers of the Filipino Association in the Bahamas alerted the Manila's embassy there of human trafficking operations led by a certain Leonid "Ned" Pascual.

Pascual's group, which includes Pascuala "Peachy" Ramos, reportedly attempted to bring in seven Filipinos disguised as tourists to the Bahamas via Havana, the capital city of Cuba. They have been using the same modus operandi since 2008.

Cuban authorities learned of the two attempts made in July 2008 and April 2009 wherein the victims were left stranded in Havana.

Pascual, according to the Foreign Affairs department, has been implicated in previous cases of human trafficking and is currently on Cuba's immigration blacklist.

The Bahamian Embassy in Havana has vowed to turn down visa applications of suspicious applicants, while Cuban immigration authorities have indicated that they will apprehend and incarcerate anyone who violated their laws.

"The Philippine Embassy urges Filipino jobseekers not to deal with Pascual, and instead report him and his cohorts, to police authorities," the department said in its advisory, adding that the National Bureau of Investigation and the Task Force Against Illegal Recruitment headed by Vice President Noli de Castro are also conducting an investigation on the matter.

In the 2009 US Department of State Trafficking in Persons Report for the Philippines released last week, Manila was put on Tier 2 Watch List status.

As a result, the Philippines ranked one notch worst after being in the Tier 2 status for the last three years, during which the country failed to meet the minimum standards to eradicate trafficking despite significant efforts to do so. Countries on the Tier 1 status show considerable success in stopping trafficking in persons, while the Tier 3 group includes countries that do not implement considerable measures to breach the minimum target.

Such an assessment could prompt the United States to withhold non-humanitarian and non-trade-related foreign assistance.

LOAD-DATE: August 11, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Global News Bites

300 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Irish Times

August 7, 2009 Friday

Human trafficking

SECTION: OPINION; Pg. 15

LENGTH: 399 words

HUMAN TRAFFICKING for sexual exploitation is a modern form of slavery where women and girls from the world's poorest regions are coerced and exploited for profit in the more affluent parts of the world – including Ireland. The trafficked women are taken across national borders and forced to engage in prostitution. As a result, they face multiple hazards, including those of arrest, detention and deportation as illegal immigrants.

Meanwhile, those who organise and greatly profit from this lucrative criminal trade in humans are rarely charged. To date none has been successfully prosecuted in the courts for trafficking.

Ireland's record in tackling this area of human rights abuse remains unimpressive. In June, the annual US state department report on human trafficking, which presents a global review of how 170 countries are handling the problem, concluded the Government had failed to meet the minimum standards necessary to eliminate trafficking. The report, while acknowledging Ireland's performance had improved, found no evidence that trafficking offenders were prosecuted or convicted during the reporting period. Gardaí are investigating some 65 cases of suspected human trafficking but for a second year in succession, the report placed Ireland in the second of three performance tiers, indicating a sub-standard performance on this issue.

The state department has advised that Ireland vigorously prosecute trafficking offences. It has suggested also that the Government should ensure trafficking victims are not penalised for unlawful acts – like prostitution – that they have been forced to undertake.

Its recommendation comes as other countries have introduced much stricter laws on prostitution: Norway and Sweden have outlawed the purchase of sexual services from a prostitute, while the UK plans to criminalise payment for sex with a trafficked woman and to make it a strict liability offence. Under proposed legislation, ignorance of her trafficked status would provide no defence in court.

Fine Gael spokesman on immigration and integration Denis Naughten has argued in recent days that prostitution laws here must be reviewed and changed to reflect the much tougher legal provisions applying elsewhere. For the Government, a failure to respond with urgency to this issue will almost certainly ensure that human trafficking for sexual exploitation becomes a greater problem here.

LOAD-DATE: August 7, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

301 of 404 DOCUMENTS

US State News

August 3, 2009 Monday 4:48 PM EST

U.S. EMBASSY DONATES COMPUTER EQUIPMENT, RADIOS, VEHICLE TO ASSIST RA POLICE TO COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS

LENGTH: 428 words

YEREVAN, Armenia, July 17 -- The U.S. Embassy issued the following press release:

On July 17, 2009, the U.S. government donated computer and radio equipment and a vehicle, worth a total of over $40,000, to the National Police Unit to Combat Trafficking-in-Persons under the Main Department Combating Organized Crime. The donation ceremony on behalf of the U.S. Embassy was attended by Ambassador Marie L. Yovanovitch and, on behalf of the Government of Armenia- by Chief of Police Major-General Alik Sargsyan.

Purchased by the International Narcotics and Law Enforcement Affairs Office of the U.S. Embassy in Yerevan, the equipment includes two servers, several computers and printers, six radios and a vehicle. The new equipment and the vehicle are donated to assist the Unit to Combat Trafficking-in-Persons to effectively and speedily implement operations and searches; compile, process and preserve sensitive information and databases on the trafficking cases and traffickers; as well as protect victims from potential threats during the investigation of cases. It will also contribute to effective cooperation between the Police Unit and other stakeholders (state agencies and NGOs) in implementation of the National Referral Mechanism and National Action Plans to fight trafficking-in-persons.

In the most recent U.S. Department of State Trafficking-in-Persons Report, Armenia was ranked in Tier 2, reflecting advances made by the Armenian Government, NGOs and citizens in combating modern-day slavery.

This project is only part of the U.S. Government's comprehensive law enforcement assistance program in the Republic of Armenia. The U.S. Embassy in Yerevan, through its International Narcotics and Law Enforcement Section, has funded the renovation of the Police Induction Center in Kanaker and donated administrative and classroom equipment to the Police Academy of the RA. In cooperation with the Government of Armenia the Embassy successfully established a nationwide computer network for the RA Police. U.S. Government assistance in the fight against human trafficking is directed at training law enforcement personnel in investigation, prosecution and prevention of the crime, victim protection, as well as legislative instruments and international practice in the field. The U.S. Government has been funding the operations of the NGO "Hope and Help," which provides a hotline, shelter, and social, psychological and legal assistance to the victims of trafficking. For more information please contact: Sarabjit Jagirdar, Email:- htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: August 3, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

302 of 404 DOCUMENTS

International Enforcement Law Reporter

August 2009

U.S. Department of State Publishes 2009 Tracking in Persons Report

BYLINE: Philip Mayer .

Philip Mayer has a B.A. in Government and in Literature from Claremont McKenna College. He is the Assistant Editor of the INTERNATIONAL ENFORCEMENT LAW REPORTER.

SECTION: TRAFFICKING IN HUMAN BEINGS; Pg. 322 Vol. 25 No. 8

LENGTH: 1183 words

On June 16, 2009, the United States Department of State published and released its ninth annual Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP) through the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. In the report, the human trafficking situations in 173 nations were described in detail. Human trafficking is defined as "obtaining or maintaining the labor or services of another through force, coercion, and, in effect, modern slavery." n2 The United Nations estimates that 12 million people are currently victims of human trafficking in virtually every nation in the world. n3 Traffickers make an estimated $31 billion dollars in profits a year, while denying their victims an estimated $21 billion in lost wages. n4 n2 Luis CdeBaca, Ambassador CdeBaca's Remarks at Release of the 2009 Trafficking in Persons Report. U.S. Department of State, Office To Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, June 16, 2009.

n3 Hillary Clinton, Partnering Against Trafficking, THE WASHINGTON POST, June 17, 2009.

n4 CdeBaca, supra.

At a press conference, Ambassador-at-Large to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, Luis CdeBaca, stated that "despite the name, the use of the word 'trafficking' seems to have the notion of movement built into it. Under both U.S. law and under the United Nations protocol, movement is not required. And so what we're really dealing with is that notion of global forced labor, global enslavement." n5 CdeBaca expressed disappointment that last year there were only 2,983 human trafficking convictions around the world. n6 This number is certainly an understatement since different nations have different classification and reporting standards.

n5 CdeBaca, supra.

n6 CdeBaca, supra.

Nations are ranked into four tiers according to how well they control and prosecute human trafficking in their nation. Tier 1 is the highest level and had 28 nations, mainly from Europe. Tier 2 had 76 nations, the Tier 2 Watch List had 52 nations, and the lowest Tier 3 had 16 nations. Starting this year, two consecutive years on the Tier 2 Watch List earns a nation an automatic demotion to the Tier 3 List.

CdeBaca mentioned how Nigeria has improved from Tier 2 Watch List in 2004, to a Tier 1 nation in 2009 "because of political will, because of talented detectives, because of a willingness to work with NGO's and actually do cases, and has seen an upward trend in their prosecutions, and has seen an improvement in how they treat victims." n7 Nigeria and Mauritius are the only African nations on the Tier 1 List.

n7 CdeBaca, supra.

The current global financial crisis has exacerbated the problem of human trafficking. Compared to last year, there are 30% more nations on the Tier 2 Watch List. Economically desperate people are more likely to succumb to traffickers' false promises of well paying jobs overseas. The most common form of human trafficking is "bonded labor," where a worker assumes a "debt bondage" to recruiters as part of the initial terms of employment. In recent years, bonded labor, a traditionally rural practice, has moved to urban areas, due to development and modernization. n8 Domestic servitude is a growing form of forced labor which is particularly likely to affect women and children. Involuntary domestic servitude is often more difficult for law enforcement authorities to control since it is usually more difficult to inspect private residences than traditional workplaces. These workers can either be held within their own nation, or are often recruited from nations in Asia, Africa, and Latin America to work in the Gulf States, Singapore, Taiwan, Europe, and the United States. n9

n8 CdeBaca, supra.

n9 U.S. Department of State, Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, Major Forms of Trafficking in Persons, June 17, 2009.

Forced child soldiers is perhaps the least well known aspect of human trafficking. The U.N. estimates that 57 armed groups used children in some capacity. Around the world, governments, paramilitary organizations, and rebel groups recruit teenagers, as well as children as young as seven. n10 Besides the traumas of combat, children are abducted to work as cooks, guards, messengers, and spies. Young girls are forced to have sex with male soldiers. Some soldiers are forced to wage violence against their own families and communities, which often shun them when and if they return home.

n10 Id.

Sex trafficking is perhaps the most frequently discussed form of human trafficking. However, according to the International Labor Organization, of the 12.3 million people currently held in bondage, only 1.5 million are engaged in forced sexual servitude. n11 However, UNICEF reports that as many as two million children alone are engaged in sexual slavery. n12 Besides robbing children of their childhoods, child prostitution leaves victims susceptible to drug abuse, pregnancies, sexually transmitted diseases, violence, social ostracism, and death. The report also takes into account how actively a nation works to prevent its citizens from traveling abroad to engage in child sex tourism. n13

n11 Id.

n12 Id.

n13 Id.

The report has received its usual volley of criticism from nations unsatisfied with their rankings. The most common, and perhaps the most glaring critique of the report is that the United States itself is not ranked despite the fact that U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton does not deny that human trafficking exists in the U.S.

Venezuela, a Tier 3 nation as recently as 2007, has found itself on the Tier 2 Watch List for the second year in a row, which prompted its Foreign Relations Minister to say, "'The false accusations against our country over the course of recent years in this report on the trafficking of persons have served as a justification for a brutal aggression against our people and our government,' the Ministry stated. 'These reports are nothing other than a tool for imperial politics and aggression toward the countries in the world that develop independent policies.'" n14 The Report praises recent Venezuelan legislation to combat human trafficking, but claims that enforcement of these laws is still too weak. n15 n14 James Sugget, Venezuela Says U.S. Report on Human Trafficking Reflects "Double Standards," Venezuelanalysis.com, June 19, 2009.

n15 Id.

Malaysian authorities have adopted a much calmer attitude after being demoted to the Tier 3 List. Malaysian Home Minister Hishammuddin Hussein revealed some agreement with his nation's classification saying, "after a while, you get immune to these things." n16 He later announced that his nation "will do whatever it takes, whatever possible, but of course, there are limitations." Hishammuddin cites his nation's poverty and porous borders as the main obstacles to controlling human trafficking.

n16 CHINA POST, Malaysia "Immune" to U.S. Criticism of Human Trafficking, June 18, 2009

Clinton said that combating human trafficking has been a foreign policy priority since her husband's administration. The United States currently funds 140 anti-trafficking programs in almost 70 nations, as well as 42 domestic programs. n17 n17 Clinton, supra.

LOAD-DATE: July 6, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

Copyright 2009 International Enforcement Law Reporter
All Rights Reserved

303 of 404 DOCUMENTS

State Department Documents and Publications

July 28, 2009

Fact Sheets: Examples of Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons-Funded Programs to Address Human Trafficking

SECTION: STATE DEPARTMENT PRESS RELEASE

LENGTH: 1421 words

Fact Sheets: Examples of Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons- Funded Programs to Address Human Trafficking

Tue, 28 Jul 2009

Examples of Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons-Funded Programs to Address Human Trafficking

Office To Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons

Fact Sheet

June 15, 2009

AFRICA

Burundi (Tier 2 Watch List) To address concerns about the lack of comprehensive anti-trafficking legislation, the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC) will provide technical assistance for the Ministry of Justice in Burundi to draft TIP legislation that is in alignment with international standards. UNODC will also conduct training for Burundi law enforcement, criminal justice, and judicial agencies to improve their identification of TIP victims and the investigation and prosecution of TIP offenses.

Djibouti (Tier 2 Watch List) The U.S. Department of Justice Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training will arrange a six-month assignment for a U.S. prosecutor to consult with, mentor, and train prosecutors, investigators, and judges in Djibouti on how to prosecute trafficking cases effectively.

Ghana (Tier 2 Watch List) The Legal Resource Center (LRC) is a Ghanaian NGO with expertise in human rights and trafficking in persons. The LRC will work with the Government of Ghana to improve current anti-trafficking laws. LRC will also provide TIP training to criminal justice officials and assist the Shelter Project of the Ministry of Women and Children's Affairs to develop comprehensive guidelines and procedures for handling victims of trafficking.

Sierra Leone (Tier 2) The Center for Victims of Torture (CVT) in Freetown is enhancing the quality of treatment for victims of human trafficking by providing psychological counseling to TIP victims. This model project focuses on victim recovery from psychological trauma and will train local Psychosocial Counselors and Clinical Training Supervisors who will continue to provide direct services to survivors after the project has ended.

EAST ASIA AND PACIFIC

Indonesia (Tier 2) The International Organization for Migration Recovery Center at the Indonesia National Police Hospital provides comprehensive medical, psychological, and reintegration services to Indonesian citizens who are repatriated after becoming victims of human trafficking in Asia and the Middle East. The Center receives key resources from the Government of Indonesia that contribute to the continuation of these critical services for Indonesian victims.

Cambodia (Tier 2 Watch List) AFESIP, founded by antihuman trafficking leader Somaly Mam, provides rehabilitation and reintegration services at three residential centers in Cambodia. This year AFESIP will add additional professional staff to ensure that victims have access to comprehensive services, including medical and psychological treatment.

World Hope International operates the residential Assessment Center for short-term care of trafficked and sexually exploited girls. This unique multidisciplinary diagnostic and treatment center facilitates victims' recovery, safe participation in legal proceedings against their traffickers, and coordinates long-term placement for victims.

Philippines (Tier 2 Watch List) To support prosecutorial efforts to hold traffickers accountable, the U.S. Department of Justice Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training will arrange for a U.S. prosecutor and a victim/witness coordinator to work in the Philippines with prosecutors who handle TIP cases. The DOJ prosecutor will spend four months in the country and will conduct training and facilitate enhanced prosecutor- police cooperation. The training will focus on relevant TIP statutes, legal advocacy skills, and victim assistance and protection.

EUROPE AND EURASIA

Moldova (Tier 2 Watch List) Winrock International is working in Transnistria to build the capacity of local NGOs to identify and assist TIP victims and provide them with economic opportunities, and legal assistance, and psychological support. This project is the first of its kind in the region and is designed to bring needed expertise to a previously underserved area. Winrock will establish Mobile Training Teams that will reach health, education, and law enforcement professionals and give them the skills necessary to sustain services.

NEAR EAST

Iraq (Tier 2 Watch List) The Protection Project (TPP) at Johns Hopkins University is assisting the Iraqi government with anti-trafficking legislation and working to raise general awareness of TIP in Iraq technical by training representatives of Iraqi civil society organizations. Heartland Alliance for Human Needs and Human Rights will enhance protection of Iraqi sex trafficking victims in Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, and Syria by working with law enforcement, human rights groups, and women's organizations to create a protection network and train key organizations in identification of victims and basic victim care.

Lebanon (Tier 2 Watch List) In Lebanon, the Caritas Lebanon Migrant Center and the International Catholic Migration Commission (ICMC) are working cooperatively to identify and assist TIP victims detained in the government- run migrant facility. Caritas staff is housed within the facility and are able to interview and assess each migrant. TIP victims who are identified are then transferred to the Caritas/ICMC Safe House where they receive comprehensive services. Caritas will also conduct training for government officials on identification of trafficking victims, as well as victim-centered interviewing techniques, thus working toward sustainability of victim protection services in the government facility.

SOUTH ASIA

Afghanistan (Tier 2) In Afghanistan, the International Organization for Migration (IOM) is building the capacity of local NGOs to more effectively address TIP while concurrently increasing the capacity of law enforcement to investigate and prosecute trafficking cases. IOM will provide support, technical assistance and training to local NGO's to improve victim identification and referral mechanisms, as well as data collection, management and reporting of TIP cases. Training for government officials will target police officers, judges, and prosecutors in an effort to increase the number of trafficking cases that are investigated and prosecuted.

India (Tier 2 Watch List) The International Justice Mission (IJM) is working with government authorities to free victims of debt bondage and help them secure rehabilitation payments and vital social services. IJM uses a comprehensive multidisciplinary approach that focuses on victim relief, perpetrator accountability, victim aftercare, and structural prevention as the basis for activities to secure the release of children, women, and men from slavery and to develop care that is tailored to their needs. IJM plans to build on a landmark case, in which a perpetrator who held six young men as slaves in a sweets shop and factory was sentenced to one year in jail.

WESTERN HEMISPHERE

Argentina (Tier 2 Watch List) Three complementary projects address human trafficking in Argentina. Maria de los Angeles Foundation will develop and train special police units to investigate TIP cases in selected provinces. Unidos por la Justicia will enhance the efficiency of the prosecution of crimes related to human trafficking through the integrated training of judges, prosecutors, and law enforcement officials. Their training will include a focus on courtroom management techniques, particularly with regards to interviewing and securing testimony from child victims, as well as how to protect victims from re-victimization. IOM will strengthen counter-trafficking networks in the Tri-Border Area (TBA) in the Southern Cone of South America (Argentina, Brazil, and Paraguay). IOM will provide medical, psychological, legal, and job training assistance to victims and will work to increase coordination and improve cooperation between key judicial actors.

Dominican Republic (Tier 2 Watch List) IOM will work with Government of the Dominican Republic to strengthen its response to human trafficking by conducting training for the Attorney General's office and the judiciary. The training will focus on investigation and prosecution techniques, enforcement of existing legislation, and strategies for victim identification and protection. IOM will help to establish a shelter and provide technical assistance in shelter management and comprehensive services for TIP victims.

LOAD-DATE: July 29, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: STD

304 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

July 27, 2009 Monday

Taiwan vows to boost cooperation on combating human trafficking

LENGTH: 559 words

Text of report in English by Taiwanese Central News Agency website

[By Rachel Chan]

Taipei, July 27 (CNA) - Taiwan is seeking to boost its cooperation with countries around the world and non-government organizations (NGOs) in its efforts to combat human trafficking, Minister of the Interior Liao Liou-yi said Monday.

Liao made the remarks at the opening ceremony of the 2009 International Workshop on Strategies for Combating Human Trafficking, which was held by the Ministry of the Interior with the aim of studying issues such as victim identification, protection and shelter, as well as exploring ways to work with NGOs and increasing international cooperation.

Liao noted that over the years, Taiwan has made many efforts in the field of stamping out human trafficking, including the launch of a human trafficking action programme in 2006, the establishment of a coordination unit and the enactment of a human trafficking law.

Through the workshop, Taiwan wishes to exchange views and experience with other countries on human trafficking and to establish an international cooperation network, as well as a protection mechanism, with the help of NGOs, Liao said.

Taiwan passed a human trafficking bill Jan. 12 this year that focuses on preventing the crime and imposing stiff penalties on offenders.

Promulgated June 1, the law is aimed at helping the country more effectively combat human trafficking by closing existing legal loopholes.

Robert Wang, acting director of the American Institute in Taiwan, said at the opening ceremony that the workshop is significant as it showcases the attention and care that the Taiwanese government and its people give to the issue of human trafficking.

Noting that according to United Nations statistics, at least 12 million people around the world are victims of human trafficking, Wang said the crime represents the modern version of slavery and is a public insult to human dignity, human rights and democratic values.

"Human trafficking is a universal problem that civil societies like Taiwan and the United States should not neglect, as it weakens legal economic activities, triggers violence, destroys families and hampers our sense of community and sense of justice," Wang said, adding that it will also damage education and public security and eventually affect social and economic development.

Wang said the US wants to boost cooperation with Taiwan on the existing foundations to help rescue victims, bring human traffickers to justice and hope to the next generation.

According to the 2009 Trafficking in Persons Report released in June by the US State Department, Taiwan, which was placed in a Tier 2 ranking, has made some progress in combating human trafficking over the past year, but should do much more, including extending labour protection to all categories of workers to prevent labour trafficking.

The anti-human trafficking workshop was attended by law enforcement personnel and representatives from the US Department of Homeland Security, the Thailand Foundation for Women and a number of Taiwanese NGOs, including the Taipei Women's Rescue Foundation, Good Shepherd Social Welfare Services, and the End Child Prostitution, Pornography and Trafficking of Children for Sexual Purposes - Taiwan, as well as the Rerum Novarum Centre.

Source: Central News Agency website, Taipei, in English 0351 gmt 27 Jul 09

LOAD-DATE: July 29, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2009 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

305 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

July 27, 2009 Monday 11:39 AM TST

Taiwan vows to boost cooperation on combating human trafficking

BYLINE: Rachel Chan

LENGTH: 529 words

DATELINE: Taipei, July 27

Taiwan is seeking to boost its cooperation with countries around the world and non-government organizations (NGOs) in its efforts to combat human trafficking, Minister of the Interior Liao Liou-yi said Monday.

Liao made the remarks at the opening ceremony of the 2009 International Workshop on Strategies for Combating Human Trafficking, which was held by the Ministry of the Interior with the aim of studying issues such as victim identification, protection and shelter, as well as exploring ways to work with NGOs and increasing international cooperation.

Liao noted that over the years, Taiwan has made many efforts in the field of stamping out human trafficking, including the launch of a human trafficking action program in 2006, the establishment of a coordination unit and the enactment of a human trafficking law.

Through the workshop, Taiwan wishes to exchange views and experience with other countries on human trafficking and to establish an international cooperation network, as well as a protection mechanism, with the help of NGOs, Liao said.

Taiwan passed a human trafficking bill Jan. 12 this year that focuses on preventing the crime and imposing stiff penalties on offenders.

Promulgated June 1, the law is aimed at helping the country more effectively combat human trafficking by closing existing legal loopholes.

Robert Wang, acting director of the American Institute in Taiwan, said at the opening ceremony that the workshop is significant as it showcases the attention and care that the Taiwanese government and its people give to the issue of human trafficking.

Noting that according to United Nations statistics, at least 12 million people around the world are victims of human trafficking, Wang said the crime represents the modern version of slavery and is a public insult to human dignity, human rights and democratic values.

"Human trafficking is a universal problem that civil societies like Taiwan and the United States should not neglect, as it weakens legal economic activities, triggers violence, destroys families and hampers our sense of community and sense of justice," Wang said, adding that it will also damage education and public security and eventually affect social and economic development.

Wang said the U.S. wants to boost cooperation with Taiwan on the existing foundations to help rescue victims, bring human traffickers to justice and hope to the next generation.

According to the 2009 Trafficking in Persons Report released in June by the U.S. State Department, Taiwan, which was placed in a Tier 2 ranking, has made some progress in combating human trafficking over the past year, but should do much more, including extending labor protection to all categories of workers to prevent labor trafficking.

The anti-human trafficking workshop was attended by law enforcement personnel and representatives from the U.S. Department of Homeland Security, the Thailand Foundation for Women and a number of Taiwanese NGOs, including the Taipei Women's Rescue Foundation, Good Shepherd Social Welfare Services, and the End Child Prostitution, Pornography and Trafficking of Children for Sexual Purposes -- Taiwan, as well as the Rerum Novarum Center.

LOAD-DATE: July 27, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2009 Central News Agency
All Rights Reserved

306 of 404 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

July 23, 2009 Thursday

PHILIPPINES: LEGAL SYSTEM FALLS SHORT ON HUMAN TRAFFICKING

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 815 words

DATELINE: NAIROBI, Kenya

The following information was released by IRIN (Integrated Regional Information Networks) of the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs:

Many trafficking victims are forced into exploitive conditions, including forced marriages (file photo)

MANILA, 22 July 2009 (IRIN) - Like many Filipinos, 20-year-old Analyn dreamed of a brighter future for her family abroad, but instead of a well-paying job, she was forced to marry a man more than twice her age from South Korea to get an entry visa to that country.

Yet Analyn, whose nightmare began in December 2007, was also luckier than most. Before joining her new "husband", she had to secure a clearance certificate from the Commission on Filipinos Overseas (CFO), a legal requirement for all those wishing to work abroad, and took the opportunity to report her case.

"It is always better if we can prevent them from leaving the country. But sometimes the victims don't know they are victims," Janet Ramos of the CFO Task Force Against Human Trafficking told IRIN in Manila.

Such cases are not unusual in the Philippines, which remains a source, transit and destination country for human trafficking, say specialists.

Although many Filipinos are voluntary labour migrants, many like Analyn are later coerced into exploitative conditions, including forced marriages.

Humantrafficking.org a web resource for combating human trafficking, reports that between 300,000 and 400,000 women are trafficked annually.

But despite strict laws to combat it, the country's legal system is apparently unable to prosecute such cases, allowing traffickers to work with impunity.

According to a US State Department 2009 Trafficking in Persons Report released in June, "the government's ability to effectively prosecute trafficking crimes is severely limited by an inefficient judicial system and endemic corruption", with the result that it has been downgraded to Tier 2 Watch-list status.

This refers to countries that are making "significant efforts to comply with the [Office to Monitor and Trafficking of Persons] OMCTP standards but show no evidence that they increased their efforts compared to the previous year". A country may also be demoted to the Watch-list if the number of cases increases.

"It [the fight against human trafficking] is sustained but inadequate," the report stated.

Legal delays

NDTV report on combating human trafficking in the Philippines

Watch larger version in YouTube

The CFO is helping Analyn in her case against the traffickers but it is taking time. Since filing her case in early 2008, there have been three hearings, the last in June, all of which have been postponed or delayed for various reasons.

Analyn has been approached by the traffickers to settle the case and although she says she has no plans to give up, Ivy Miravales, her CFO handler, is worried.

"We know she has other problems. She doesn't have a job and her family is poor. We hope she'll be able to keep up the fight," she said.

To ensure a greater chance of conviction, instead of trying the case under Republic Act 9208, otherwise known as the 2003 Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act, which could be more difficult to prove given she escaped, the judge wants the case tried under Republic Act 6955 or the Anti-Mail Order Bride Law.

"It's supposedly hard to prove exploitation because she got away," Ramos said.

But in doing so, the disincentive for traffickers will also be diminished.

Added to that, judges often have a poor understanding of the anti-trafficking law, the US State Department said.

While the maximum sentence for traffickers under RA 9208 can be life imprisonment, under RA 6955 it is eight years.

Inefficient judicial system

Photo: International Justice Mission

Trafficking remains a source of concern for activists. Thousands of women fall victim every year

"Trials often take years to conclude because of a lack of judges and courtrooms, high turnover [of judges], and non-continuous trials, which cause some victims to withdraw their testimony," the OMCTP report charged.

Of particular concern is the need to step up the number of convictions for labour trafficking cases, it said. To date, there have been only 12 convictions under the 2003 Anti-trafficking in Persons Act - all sex trafficking offences.

However, the government says it is making headway.

According to Ferdinand Lavin, chief of the National Bureau of Investigation Anti-Human Trafficking Division, there were 168 alleged cases of trafficking in 2008, a 60 percent increase over the previous year, with four convictions.

"It's not a setback. It's a warning. It's more of a challenge," Lavin told IRIN. "We will have to talk separately with law enforcement. We have to talk to courts. Courts take a long [time]. We cannot intervene."

What the government fears most is a Tier 3 assessment next year, which could trigger the withholding of non-humanitarian, non-trade-related assistance from Washington.

LOAD-DATE: July 23, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

307 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Nation (Thailand)

July 21, 2009 Tuesday

US humantrafficking report based on 'old info'

BYLINE: The Nation

LENGTH: 394 words

Looking at conditions in 175 countries, the ninth report put Thailand, Brunei, Indonesia, Laos, Singapore, Vietnam and Japan in the Tier 2 category, which means these countries don't quite meet the international standard of observing human trafficking laws but were trying. Meanwhile, Cambodia, Philippines, China and North Korea were in the Tier 2 Watch List, which means that there are a larger number of victims or a lack of clear evidence of attempts made to curb human trafficking. Countries that remain in the Tier 2 Watch List for two years can be demoted to the Tier 3.

Countries in Tier 1 are those that keep up with international standards, while Tier 3 countries are those that show no attempt to tackle the issue, which means the US could suspend trade assistance as punishment or use diplomatic tools to pressure them into solving the problem. Burma and Malaysia were put on Tier 3 this year.

Despite praising Thailand for providing humantrafficking victims temporary shelters as well as launching antihuman trafficking campaigns and training programmes, the report pointed out that Thailand was the origin, transit and destination of human traffickers. This was because economic development attracted people from neighbouring countries to sneak in to work as prostitutes or cheap labour, thus putting them at the risk of exploitation, it said.

The report also said that Thailand did not inform migrant workers of their rights and had not fully implemented measures to curb human trafficking. The report said Thailand should work harder in investigating and punishing human traffickers; improve the screening of victims; guarantee that adult victims are not placed in shelters against their will; provide a mechanism that allows adult victims to work; provide migrant workers with information about their rights; and give legal assistance to victims.

"Since some information used by the US is not in line with reality, the government will explain these points to the secretary of state tomorrow," Watchara said.

Watchara made this comment after the AntiHuman Trafficking Committee, chaired by Deputy PM Sanan Kachornprasat, met yesterday. The meeting ended with the Social Development and Human Security Ministry being told to put a team together with related agencies to consider the US report's suggestions and gather points for further discussion.

e event.

LOAD-DATE: July 21, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

308 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Sudan Tribune

Sudan Tribune

July 19, 2009 Sunday

Eight Ethiopians poisoned to death in UAE

LENGTH: 512 words

By Tesfa-alem Tekle July 18, 2009 (ADDIS ABABA) - Addis Ababa has begun a probe after eight Ethiopian housemaids were reported to have been murdered under mysterious circumstances in their apartment last week in Sharjah, the third largest emirate of the United Arab Emirates (UAE), a source from Ethiopia's Ministry of Foreign Affairs indicated. Ethiopian authorities have contacted Ethiopia's consulate general in Dubai for details in the incident. But UAE police has declined to comment or provide details to the Ethiopian authorities for a reason that "case still under investigation."

As off-hand for facts at this moment, an Ethiopian official who requested anonymity told Sudan Tribune that Ethiopian authorities are following up the incident seriously and government will reveal details early next week. According to sources from the Ethiopian embassy in the UAE, the eight female maids had been poisoned by a compatriot maid last Wednesday. But the motive behind the killings remains unclear. The murder case was reported to the police on July 8 and later referred to forensics. While investigations are under way, arrests have been made, but an exact number could not be ascertained. The women are said to have been living together in an apartment in the Abu Shagara neighborhood. The UAE has received extensive criticism over the years from human rights and labor organizations over the conditions for foreign workers in the country. Domestic workers, which make up a significant proportion of the UAE's predominantly foreign population, have complained of sub-standard housing, lack of medical care, abuse and non-payment of wages. The International Labor Organization plans to push international standards or labor recommendations for domestic laborers in their annual conference next year. The United States recently placed the country on a watch list of countries with poor human trafficking records. Thousands of young Ethiopian women are being enticed via Djibouti, Egypt and Somalia for domestic work, to the Middle East particularly to the UAE, Saudi Arabia and Lebanon with the promises of lucrative work but except few lucky ones, most of them suffer worst verbal, physical and sexual abuses. Most girls are employed in back-breaking jobs for up to 18 hours a day. Many Ethiopians have ended up killed by their employers, or commit suicide and many more return home mentally ill, partially paralyzed, insane, with broken backs and legs and others been burned with acid. Following the rise in deaths of a number of Ethiopian domestic workers, the Ethiopian government in May last year banned its citizens from attempting economic travel to Lebanon. The ban remains in effect. During the past few years, the Ethiopian government have scaled up preventive steps such as issuing proclamation for agencies to have a permit from the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs and also a massive awareness campaign by the Ethiopian media, but the numbers flocking to the Middle East are still huge and seem to cost the government relentless efforts nationwide. (ST)

LOAD-DATE: July 20, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Web PublicationJOURNAL-CODE: 159

All Rights Reserved
Syndigate.info, Al Bawaba.com

309 of 404 DOCUMENTS

New Straits Times (Malaysia)

July 18, 2009 Saturday

Move to cut down on foreign labour

BYLINE: Farrah Naz Karim

SECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 10

LENGTH: 591 words

PUTRAJAYA: The government has introduced a five-year ceiling on foreign workers staying in the country under a move to reduce dependence on them.

The only exception to the rule are domestic maids.

This is among seven measures agreed upon yesterday by the Cabinet Committee on Foreign Workers and Illegal Immigrants chaired by Deputy Prime Minister Tan Sri Muhyiddin Yassin.

He said employers who needed certain category of workers, especially professionals and skilled workers, could apply for extensions on a case-by-case basis.

Speaking to reporters after a three-hour meeting here, he said the government would also review procedures and processes involved in bringing in foreign workers.

He said the government was far from happy with progress achieved in reducing dependence on foreign workers with 2.1 million registered foreign workers in the country.

There were some 630,000 foreign workers in 1997 with the figure jumping to 1.9 million in 2006.

He hoped efforts could be made to cap the number of foreign workers at 1.8 million next year.

Muhyiddin said the issuance of licences to outsourcing companies had been frozen. He said this would allow the 277 companies engaged in the sector to fulfil their responsibilities to the fullest. The companies would be monitored closely with the government ensuring they abide by regulations.

Muhyiddin said emphasis would also be placed on adherence to the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act.

Other decisions taken were:

to continue the freeze on the intake of Bangladeshi workers;

reopening the intake of foreign workers in the electrical sector;

reopening the intake of foreign workers in the electronic, manufacturing and textile sectors;

the continued freeze on the intake of foreign workers in the service sector remains with the exception of restaurant cooks, cleaners and island resort workers; and, implementing the strategy on reducing dependency on foreign workers so that it would not adversely affect the country's economy and industries.

He said existing outsourcing companies would also be limited to supplying manpower to the manufacturing, plantation and agriculture sectors. He added that industries were also encouraged to shift to capital-based sectors including through government capital assistance funds and tax incentives.

The decision came in the wake of calls by many quarters, including the Malaysian Trades Union Congress, which want these companies to be disbanded to improve the country's rating on the human trafficking blacklist.

The companies were said to have caused apprehension besides casting a negative perception of Malaysia among foreign governments, workers and their organisations.

This was because some collected high fees from the workers but provided poor or no services. Some even abandoned the workers on arrival in Malaysia.

Muhyiddin said the government was also pushing for the practice of self-service within the services sector like restaurants, petrol stations and mini markets.

He said to reduce dependency on foreign workers in the construction sector, the government was encouraging the sector to implement the industrial building system in at least 70 per cent of construction contracts.

To a question on Indonesian maids wanting to work here despite their government's move to temporarily disallow them from coming over, he said the government would not stop them from doing so.

It is understood that Indonesians intending to work as maids in the country can travel here, identify an employer and apply for a work permit within the one-month visa period granted to them.

LOAD-DATE: July 20, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

310 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Jerusalem Post

July 16, 2009 Thursday

Israel failing to prosecute recruiters and employers of slave labor, US report says. Ayalon: Inaction has 'direct impact on Israel's standing in the international community'

BYLINE: CARRIE SHEFFIELDSECTION: NEWS; Pg. 4LENGTH: 619 words

A US government report lumping Israel together with states like Afghanistan, Jordan and Botswana in its success in combating human trafficking has troubling political implications for Israel, Deputy Foreign Minister Danny Ayalon said Wednesday.

Ayalon addressed a Knesset subcommittee analyzing the report, released by the US State Department in June, which says Israel is making "significant efforts" but is failing to comply with US standards for preventing human trafficking.

This year's annual "Trafficking in Persons Report" states that Israel is particularly lacking in its prosecution and conviction of recruiters and employers of slave labor, a problem which contributed to Israel's distinction as a "Tier 2" country, behind most Westernized, "Tier 1" countries.

"It has far-reaching political implications," Ayalon told The Jerusalem Post following the meeting of the Knesset's Committee on the Status of Women's Subcommittee on the Trafficking in Women. "It has a direct impact on Israel's standing in the international community."

Ayalon said significant problems with human trafficking for slavery and forced prostitution hamper's Israel's ability to join the United Nation's Western European and Others Group (WEOG) and the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD).

He also said the Foreign Ministry is bolstering its efforts to prevent countries - the US report specifically mentions China, Romania, Turkey and Thailand, Russia and other former Soviet bloc countries - from exporting slave labor to Israel. Israeli consular officials abroad have also received training on how to identify potential perpetrators during visa interviews.

"The goal is to eliminate this scourge once and for all," Ayalon said.

Rachel Gershuni, a Justice Ministry official who handles inter-agency coordination to fight trafficking, said the issue requires far-reaching communication between ministries including the Foreign, Interior, Industry and Trade, Labor and Social Affairs.

"This is something we need to work on," said Gershuni, who also attended the subcommittee hearing.

Gershuni pointed to the success of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) in fighting human trafficking, a problem which she said runs counter to Israeli principles safeguarding human rights.

"We're not being compared with our countries, we're being compared with our potential," said Gershuni, who noted that the "Tier 1" category of countries included countries such as Germany and Holland, which have legalized prostitution.

Lynn Cassel, acting deputy political counselor at the US embassy, attended the hearing as well as a number of Israeli NGOs.

When asked why the United States chose to issue an annual report that does not include an analysis of its own actions, a US embassy spokesman in Tel Aviv said the report was not meant to be a "blame game."

"This isn't a political statement, it's trying to bring to light the situation that's on the ground," said Ruben Harutunian, deputy spokesman for the US embassy. "You can look at the same facts as blaming Israel, but you can also look at it as an acknowledgement of the significant steps that Israel is taking."

MK Orit Zuaretz (Kadima), who chairs the Knesset subcommittee, said she hoped the Knesset would issue its own report on human trafficking in Israel soon.

"For me, I refer to the report as a reflection from the outside. We can't avoid that," Zuaretz said. "We have to reflect on it ourselves ... We have very good laws against trafficking, but we have to implement those laws."

Zuaretz said she was working to gather support for legislation introduced in the previous Knesset session that would heavily prosecute those who patronize prostitution and forced labor services.

LOAD-DATE: October 4, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Photo: DESPITE ISRAEL'S making 'significant efforts,' a US report on combatting human trafficking still has it falling short in this area. (Credit: Courtesy)

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

311 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Daily Pak Banker

July 15, 2009 Wednesday

'Steps still needed to curb illegal migration'LENGTH: 526 wordsDATELINE: Karachi

Karachi, Aug. 15 -- The government of Pakistan has promulgated laws to counter the problem of illegal migration, but a lot needs to be done regarding implementation. The Director, FIA, Sindh, Zubair Mahmood, said this while speaking at a policy seminar on illegal migration, human trafficking, and smuggling, on Thursday at a local hotel. He appreciated the efforts of Basic Education For Awareness, Reforms, and Empowerment (Befare) to counter illegal migration and said that the problem existed in Pakistan in all its dimensions. He also said due internal trafficking, Pakistan had been placed in Tier-II watch list in 2009. He further said that every day 6,000 passengers passed through Karachi Airport and only three persons had been able to bypass the system during the last one year, which shows the commitment and resilience of the FIA. According to him, this problem is culture- and area-specific and anticipated that the FIA would achieve its set targets with the assistance of NGOs and other stakeholders. The Director, Anti-Human Smuggling, Chaudhry Mohammad Manzoor, said that human trafficking and smuggling had emerged as the third largest lucrative activity around the globe after drugs and weapons smuggling, to the tune of US$10 billion per annum. He said the practice was being carried out on three main routes including Pakistan-Africa-Spain, Pakistan-Iran-Turkey-Greece and Pakistan-Oman-UAE.

He said out of the total illegal immigrants in 2008, 56 per cent went to Oman, 22 per cent to Turkey, 17 per cent to Iran, three per cent to Greece, and two per cent to other parts of the world, adding that 39 per cent of the total trafficking last year was through agents operating in Gujranwala District alone. He said that there are many cities that are prime targets of human smugglers such as Gujranwala, DG Khan, Rajanpur, Swabi, Sukkur, Buner and Larkana. Manzoor also said that it was essential to narrow down economic inequality besides identifying and neutralising the traffickers' network, adding that efforts are underway to curb human trafficking and for the purpose, the country has been divided into five zones, Punjab, Sind, NWFP, Balochistan and Islamabad (also including Rawalpindi, AJK, and Northern Areas). The Deputy-Head of Mission, Bangladesh Consulate in Karachi, Diwan Husn-e-Ayub, speaking on the occasion, said poor and deprived people were always trafficked and exploited and the exploiters make a fortune out of it. He pleaded for a special law to monitor the traffickers and smugglers as well. Dewan was straight and categorical in highlighting poverty as the primary cause of illegal human trafficking and human smuggling in Bangladesh. Mohammad Amin, Project Manager, C-PRISM said that illegal migration is one of the predicaments Pakistan was facing today. He said to control the situation, Befare had established 485 community organisations so far and trained more than 400 at the grassroots level on the issue of illegal migration, human trafficking and smuggling. Published by HT Syndication with permission from Daily Pak Banker. For more information on news feed please contact Surit Das at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: August 14, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

All Rights Reserved

312 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

July 10, 2009 Friday

South Africa; Police Warned On Duty to Women, Children

BYLINE: Business Day

LENGTH: 257 words

THE police, who will have to maintain peace and fight crime during next year's soccer World Cup, will have the added challenge of detecting and preventing sexual and labour exploitation of women and children, says US ambassador Luis CdeBaca.

CdeBaca, director of the US Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, warned SA yesterday not to allow the problems of human trafficking to eclipse the excitement of the World Cup.

"There should be no reluctance to arrest and prosecute tourists in SA intending to sexually exploit young girls or boys," he said.

His comments come barely a month after the US state department released its 2009 Trafficking in Persons report, in which SA's standing was upgraded to tier 2 -- taking it off the watch list of countries doing little to combat human trafficking.

CdeBaca told media in Pretoria yesterday the upgrade was in recognition of SA's efforts to improve legislation to fight human trafficking and the successful prosecution of syndicates and individuals. CdeBaca is visiting the continent to engage authorities on ways to close loopholes in the regulations that human traffickers use to escape prosecution for sexual exploitation and human trafficking.

"It is essential that the (Southern African Development Community) region share information and experience about combating human trafficking."

He said he had been told local police units were already monitoring certain areas, preparing to provide such services ahead of 2010.

This meant that illegal acts could be prevented and victims protected.

LOAD-DATE: July 10, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

313 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Africa - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

July 10, 2009 Friday

US diplomat asks SAfrica to curb sexual exploitation during soccer World Cup

LENGTH: 298 words

Text of report by Hopewell Radebe entitled "SA warned on duty to women, children" published by influential, privately-owned South African daily Business Day website on 10 July

The police, who will have to maintain peace and fight crime during next year's soccer World Cup, will have the added challenge of detecting and preventing sexual and labour exploitation of women and children, says US ambassador Luis C de Baca.

C de Baca, director of the US Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, warned SA yesterday not to allow the problems of human trafficking to eclipse the excitement of the World Cup.

"There should be no reluctance to arrest and prosecute tourists in SA intending to sexually exploit young girls or boys," he said.

His comments come barely a month after the US state department released its 2009 Trafficking in Persons report, in which SA's standing was upgraded to tier 2 - taking it off the watch list of countries doing little to combat human trafficking.

C de Baca told media in Pretoria yesterday the upgrade was in recognition of SA's efforts to improve legislation to fight human trafficking and the successful prosecution of syndicates and individuals.

C de Baca is visiting the continent to engage authorities on ways to close loopholes in the regulations that human traffickers use to escape prosecution for sexual exploitation and human trafficking.

"It is essential that the (Southern African Development Community) region share information and experience about combating human trafficking."

He said he had been told local police units were already monitoring certain areas, preparing to provide such services ahead of 2010.

This meant that illegal acts could be prevented and victims protected.

Source: Business Day website, Johannesburg, in English 10 Jul 09

LOAD-DATE: July 10, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

314 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Business Day (South Africa)

July 10, 2009
Business Day Edition

SA warned on duty to women, children

BYLINE: HOPEWELL RADEBE

SECTION: CRIME, LAW & JUSTICE

LENGTH: 269 words

SA warned on duty to women, children

Diplomatic Editor

THE police, who will have to maintain peace and fight crime during next year's soccer World Cup, will have the added challenge of detecting and preventing sexual and labour exploitation of women and children, says US ambassador Luis CdeBaca.

CdeBaca, director of the US Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, warned SA yesterday not to allow the problems of human trafficking to eclipse the excitement of the World Cup.

"There should be no reluctance to arrest and prosecute tourists in SA intending to sexually exploit young girls or boys," he said.

His comments come barely a month after the US state department released its 2009 Trafficking in Persons report, in which SA's standing was upgraded to tier 2 - taking it off the watch list of countries doing little to combat human trafficking.

CdeBaca told media in Pretoria yesterday the upgrade was in recognition of SA's efforts to improve legislation to fight human trafficking and the successful prosecution of syndicates and individuals. CdeBaca is visiting the continent to engage authorities on ways to close loopholes in the regulations that human traffickers use to escape prosecution for sexual exploitation and human trafficking.

"It is essential that the (Southern African Development Community) region share information and experience about combating human trafficking."

He said he had been told local police units were already monitoring certain areas, preparing to provide such services ahead of 2010.

This meant that illegal acts could be prevented and victims protected.

radebeh@bdfm.co.za

LOAD-DATE: July 13, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

315 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

July 5, 2009 Sunday

Nigeria; Naptip - Human Trafficking, Worst Crime Against Mankind

BYLINE: This Day

LENGTH: 2876 words

The National Agency for Prohibition of Traffic in Persons and other Related Matters {NAPTIP}, recently convicted three human traffickers. The traffickers, which include Jonah Osaarimwan, 25, Patience Aisomwan, 30, and Helen Aisomwan were sentenced to two years imprisonment without an option of fine.

While Patience and Helen Aisomwan were sentenced to one-year imprisonment each for their role in the procurement of 17 young girls to a human trafficker, Gladys Joy Okonta, 30, for trafficking abroad. Both sentences are without an option of fine.

In the case of Okonta who is standing trial on charges of procurement and organising foreign travels for 17 young girls, which promotes exploitative sex trade, Justice Okeke reserved judgment for July 28 2009. Delivering the judgment, Justice Okeke reiterated the stand of the court as the last hope for justice for victims of human trafficking, as she insisted that the accused person's plea of guilt does not mitigate the offence as preferred against them.

The Executive Secretary of NAPTIP, Simon Chuzi Egede, a lawyer, said the judgment is a strong statement in the condemnation of the crime of trafficking and a complete support of the judiciary arm to finally rid the nation of the crime. He said human trafficking is a sad commentary due to collapse of family values as it has become a family business, judging that the two female traffickers were from the same family who showed lack of respect for their own family as well as to life of the young and vulnerable ones.

Egede told THISDAY in Abuja recently that NAPTIP has been and will always be a trafficker's worst nightmare. He stated that the rate at which the courts are prosecuting these cases and securing convictions clearly shows a strong level of collaboration among "our partners and stakeholders. This conviction brings to 14 of the number of convictions secured by Sokoto Zonal Office of NAPTIP and 57 of the number of traffickers brought to justice by the agency since inception."

The Executive Secretary said the human traffickers who think that with the change in the leadership of the organisation would slow the campaign against the illicit business should better have a rethink because he has resolved to haunt them wherever they are. Egede who assumed duty as the boss of the organisation few months ago, while basking in the latest conviction by the courts however explained some of the challenge in the campaign against human trafficking.

"As you are very much aware, NAPTIP is a law enforcement agency and as with other law enforcement agencies, we deal with the crime of trafficking in persons and the major challenge that one would allude to would be the nature of the crime. The traffickers themselves are very much organised. They go into the villages and every nook and cranny of the country and lure the vulnerable children and women with false messages, coercion and all sorts of false presentations.

"The victims themselves do not know what they are getting into. Most times, they buy what these people feed them with and then begin to dream of the financial wealth that would come out of these foreign trips. So the major challenge is even when they are apprehended, the victims are not ready to tell us all about the perpetrators of these evil trips. The more dangerous aspect of it is the fact that many of them are taken to the shrines and other institutions where oath of secrecy is administered on them," he said. On the other hand, he said some of the victims are threatened with death if they should reveal the identity of the traffickers. So it becomes very difficult for them to tell the story that would enable the agency apprehend a full time trafficker. Again the Act, like all other laws is a public document which people are aware of, but there is the challenge where people are not able to accept or reconcile themselves with the provision of the Act vis-à-vis the cultural belief of the people.

For instance, Egede noted that the area of internal trafficking- the syndrome of housewife and house girl, culturally is part of the society where a boy serves a master or a man brings his uncle's or aunt's daughter to take care of his children. Also, a businessman brings a young girl or boy to be an apprentice and all that. These, he said, are the areas the agency wants to reconcile between cultural practices and the law, because it is realised that children and their parents were actually being exploited.

He said, "You bring somebody from the village and he/she lives with you, does not earn any money or go to school as he or she should while your own children are going to school. The people in the village believe that the children are living better lives over there in the city but the world knew and we have all come to agree that this is exploitation and child labour which must not continue. Some times, we have inadequate financial cooperation in the area of investigation and deportation of traffickers in destination countries."

According to investigation, a lot of Nigerians are trafficked into some North African countries where they are promised a passage to Europe as most of the trafficking is perpetrated across the land borders in the Northern part of the country. Despite the efforts of the men and officers of the Nigerian Immigration and Police, because of the massive land border of the country, it is not possible to mount check points on every major road, so traffickers still find other illegal routes out of the country. Having succeeded in leaving the country, they go through other hideouts and camp in Niger, Libya and Morocco, en-route to Europe, hence the concentration of many Nigerian victims in those countries.

Efforts have been made in the past; including NAPTIP officials in collaboration with other agencies in the country to have these stranded illegal immigrants deported. "Indeed, I would want to say that these countries take the menace very seriously. In Libya for instance, where official information is received, it is treated very promptly and these illegal immigrants are handed over to the police and are deported immediately. But as with other trans-national criminal organisations, traffickers have huge financial outlay at their disposal to influence concerned authorities in these countries and do all that it takes to avoid being caught up by the law," Egede said.

The NAPTIP boss further told THISDAY that he is aware of the sophistication the traffickers are devising to carry out their illegal businesses. He however said that his agency is always ready to combat such acts. "It is true that their antics are becoming more and more sophisticated. But we have also been able to collaborate with several international organisations as well as adopt a national plan of action, which has been approved by the Federal Executive Council (FEC) and adopted by ECOWAS Council of Ministers.

"This kind of action is a comprehensive document which encompasses all strategies to deal with these problems. We have opened a new office in Maiduguri, which makes it three within the northern part of the country. The essence is to have operatives in those zonal offices that can easily be mobilised to the borders to check trafficking and to apprehend traffickers. Again with the support of some European countries, we have developed several software and material. We have some materials that when traffickers are arrested and apprehended, their handset can be taken to our computer and all calls and messages within a period of time can be monitored and accessed.

"This is a very good technical assistant that we have received and only last month, the Italian government also donated another modern equipment (software) where we can also intercept some of these people within a particular area and our investigators would be able to follow the trend in trafficking and communication and other gathering of information would become easier and effective. So we thank the governments of those countries and our sponsors for being able to equip us in the most modern technology in this fight and I dare say we are one of the first that is being equipped with these technologies. We are very well equipped and focused on the fight and I believe our officers are equal to the task too," the NAPTIP boss said.

He said the fight is in two forms: internally and within the borders. The internal trafficking, he pointed out, gives a bit of headache because it has been very much entrenched in the cultural values. For instance, Egede mentioned the case of child begging in some parts of the country. Another difficult area is where 'madams' who run restaurants and beer palours recruit these young hands to help out in the running of such place, but unfortunately, many of them eventually turns out to become prostitutes under the supervision of their 'madam.'

He said these young girls are given away to their customers after they have patronised the restaurant. If NAPTIP want to intervene, the girls would not tell the real story as they leave in fear of being returned to the villages and so they are prepared to obey the instructions of the people who have brought them to the cities. While on the other hand, young able bodied men are moved to cocoa farms in the western part of the country where they do hard labour without worthwhile remuneration.

"All these lie in our tradition where unsuspecting parents back home entrust their children and wards to these people who promise to give them better lives, not knowing that they are used for forced labour. These are the issues we are facing and we believe that the main focus should be public enlightenment so that we inform parents the intention of those that take their children and promise them better lives but turn out not to be true.

In that regard, Egede said all its zonal offices have been provided with some form of sensitization materials to inform the people about the trade so that they can devise means to reject juicy but fake promises of the traffickers. He believes that when people are aware of the real intentions of the traffickers, they would become less vulnerable.

He said "we are pleased to inform that the United States government has undertaken a project on public awareness, they have voted a very large sum of money for it and they are bringing an officer from Washington for this purpose. We believe that by the time it takes off more people will be aware of the evil of human trafficking and then prepare themselves against the traffickers and their antics. We have also been in touch with Wale Adenuga Productions (WAP) for the production of a television drama series. If we have money to execute this, it will be very successful because over 50 million Nigerians would watch the programme.

All these to Egede are testimonies that the organisation is making progress in the fight against human trafficking. "We are indeed making good progress; the statistics are very clear as we have stepped up our prosecution of the traffickers. I am pleased to report that recently, within one week we have had nine convictions. These people have been sentenced to jail terms without options of fine. We believe that these will give a clear message and signal to the traffickers that it cannot be business as usual. Again we have rehabilitated over 3,000 victims, and some of them were trained in various vocations.

"We are also supporting the rescued victims with finance to enable them establish small businesses. Many of them have made progress and are now useful to the society. We have also raised a very high level of awareness, traveled around the country and worked with Nigerian communities in various countries to see how they would come in to assist in the rehabilitation of the victims. So we have made a lot of progress in the space of five years; we have also established various offices and accommodations in various parts of the country," the executive secretary stated.

The organisation, he stressed, has been making so much progress that it was not surprised that the United Nation during its 2009 annual global report on trafficking in persons, Nigeria was elevated from tier two to tier one. Tier one meaning that it is the highest level of classification and through the hard work of his predecessor, Chief Mrs. Carol Ndaguba and the team she put in place, the agency has been able to achieve this feat in just five years. However, he believes with more vigour and determination, NAPTIP would sustain its status in tier one.

The elevation to tier one by the US Government definition, Egede said, is that the Nigerian government now fully complies with all efforts to eradicate trafficking in persons. That is to say that the country has put in place all necessary machineries, while government has shown that it is prepared to stop the menace by giving financial and all manner of support to ensure that trafficking in persons is eradicated.

"So to that extent, it shows that we have reached the level where the world is satisfied that we are doing what it takes to battle the traffickers. We have reached the level where the traffickers themselves would begin to feel that they are up against the law of the nation and that is very important. Again, it is very important because we are now in a position where we can get the maximum support and cooperation for their efforts," a former Attorney-General and Commissioner for Justice in Benue State said.

He emphasised that the conviction of the 13 traffickers recently would send a clear signal to traffickers that the road is now tough and it is not business as usual. He commended the Nigerian Police, Immigration Service and the Judiciary for a job well done. "As you know, ours is a small agency and we rely very much on the collaborative action of these agencies. Most of the arrests that are made are by the police and immigration services. I must say that the judiciary has helped us so well because each case taken to court are held by very reputable judges and emphasis is not on option of fines, but jail terms. We are happy that the judiciary is living up to expectation and is also giving the maximum sentences and jail terms to the convicts," Egede said with a sense of fulfillment. Consequently, THISDAY investigation showed that the National Assembly has aided the work of the agency by giving it a comprehensive law to guide its operations. The Act itself has provision for assets confiscation and sales, and use proceeds for the benefit of victims. It is established under the board headed by the Attorney General of the Federation. Once conviction is secured and assets of the trafficker connected with the crimes are traced and identified, NAPTIP goes back to the court with a motion for orders of the court to enable it have them confiscated and sold.

Once the Court grants this, the movable and immoveable assets are sold and the proceeds are paid into the Victims of Trafficking Trust Funds. The agency however, has not succeeded so much in assets confiscation and sales because it does not have the technical knowledge and most of the traffickers as with other criminal organisations are based mainly in Europe, while those arrested in Nigeria are mere agents.

However, two of the convictions NAPTIP secured recently involved the prosecution of a proprietor of a brothel in Lagos. Those are the rare cases where it actually apprehended the core people in the business that kept young girls and exploit daily. The agency has secured his conviction and the next thing the agency said it will do is to apply to the court to have the brothel confiscated and sold and proceeds paid into the coffers of the Trafficking Trust Fund.

To seriously tackle or fight human trafficking, there is a need to look critically on what the law says about house helps because all these areas are captured in the NAPTIP Act. Egede said if a girl of about 25 to 30 years old who chose to go into prostitution as a profession, that is her choice. "Here we are talking of children who are not matured and cannot decide for themselves and are being lured into these places and then exploited.

"The Child Right Act is very clear that a child of that certain age should be in school. So all we are now trying to do in collaboration with the state is to sensitise them to implement the child right act and the states that have not implemented them, we are urging them to adopt them. Once this Child Right Act is put together, you won't have young girls and boys that are being used as hawkers and street vendors. This is a challenge that we are all determined to face," he emphasised.

Though he added that poverty and economic backwardness is part of the problem, but he quickly argued that it is not all of it that is economic. For example, he said Edo State is in the forefront of human trafficking and most of the people apprehended are from that state, despite a lot of campaign in those areas.

Again, he insisted that poverty is a major factor that lures people into the hands of the traffickers, but maintained that it is not an excuse that should be encouraged. He, therefore, warned prospective traffickers that NAPTIP like never before has been strategically positioned to go after them. "We will snuff them out from wherever they are," Egede said.

LOAD-DATE: July 6, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

316 of 404 DOCUMENTS

US State News

June 30, 2009 Tuesday 5:31 PM ESTGEORGIA MAINTAINS TIER 1 STATUS, INCREASES VICTIM ASSISTANCE IN FIGHT AGAINST HUMAN TRAFFICKING*LENGTH: 246 words

TBILISI, Georgia, June 16 -- The U.S. Embassy issued the following press release:

On Tuesday, June 16th, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and Senior Advisor to the Secretary and Ambassador-at-large to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons Luis de Baca released the 2009 Trafficking in Persons Report. For the third year in a row Georgia was placed on Tier 1, which means Georgia fully complies with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. Georgia retained its Tier 1 ranking in part because the government has significantly increased its victim assistance funding to $250,000 and modestly increased the number of victims assisted by government-funded programs. The government also provided $150,000 in funding for the support of two trafficking shelters that provided full victim assistance, including medical aid, psychological counseling, and legal assistance. The government continued to implement a formal mechanism for its officials to identify and refer victims for assistance. All convicted trafficking offenders were given adequate prison sentences. The Department of State is required by law to submit a report each year to the U.S. Congress on foreign government's efforts to eliminate severe forms of trafficking in persons. The report also raises awareness, highlights best practices, and inspires governments to take action against trafficking. For more information please contact: Sarabjit Jagirdar, Email: - htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 30, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: NewswireCopyright 2009 Targeted News Service LLC
All Rights Reserved

317 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 29, 2009 Monday 4:23 AM GMT

Afghans, Pakistanis migrants held in raid: Malaysian police

LENGTH: 303 wordsDATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR, June 29 2009

Malaysian authorities arrested 36 Afghans and six Pakistanis after detaining two boats trying to smuggle them to Australia via Indonesia, a top marine police official said Monday.

Marzuki Ismail, central Selangor state's marine police chief, told AFP that authorities Saturday also arrested 14 Indonesians, including three boat operators, involved in smuggling migrants.

"We first detained a small wooden boat around midnight near Port Klang (west of the capital Kuala Lumpur) with 15 Afghans and six Pakistanis in it.

"Upon investigation we secured information that there was a mother ship that was waiting nearby," Marzuki said.

"The next morning (Sunday), we successfully tracked down the mother ship and arrested 21 Afghans," he added.

Marzuki said that with the latest arrests, a total of 93 migrants had been nabbed since January for attempting to sail to Australia via neighbouring Indonesia by crossing the treacherous Malacca Strait.

Just two weeks ago, Malaysian police detained a boat that was also trying to smuggle 17 Iraqis to Australia via Indonesia. Seven Indonesians were arrested in that raid.

Marzuki said the 42 arrested Afghans and Pakistanis had paid 1,300 dollars each to get to Indonesia, adding that a criminal syndicate operated by Malaysians and Indonesians could be behind the incident.

The Afghans and Pakistanis will be charged with trying to leave the country illegally, he said.

Human trafficking and drug smuggling have replaced piracy as the main crime threat off Malaysia's long coastline, and Prime Minister Najib Razak admitted that his country was being used as a transit point for illegal immigrants.

In an annual report released on June 16 the United States re-entered Malaysia on a human-trafficking blacklist, saying it had failed to comply with minimum standards to eliminate trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: June 29, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

318 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Edge Malaysia

June 29, 2009

My Say: How Malaysia can get out of Tier 3

BYLINE: Quek Sue Yian

LENGTH: 1472 words

Between 1945 and 1970, Malaysia was a rising star in economic development, an accolade it shared with Singapore, Hong Kong, Japan, South Korea, Taiwan, Brazil and Malta.

The country's GDP growth was more than 7% y-o-y, and continued to improve in the 1980s through to the late 1990s. Malaysia was hailed as one of the tiger economies of Southeast Asia and expectations were that it would join the ranks of high-income countries.

However, this momentous - although somewhat socially tumultuous - quest for the holy grail of development has reached a plateau.

Malaysia is now a middle-income country, with a per capita income of $4US,500 (RM15,916). In contrast, Singapore's per capita income - bearing in mind the argument of nation state versus country - is more than triple this figure. Malaysia is just not achieving the growth it needs to reach fully developed status.

If anything, rampant development, followed quickly by the economic hiatus, has had a ripple effect on the social fabric of the country, and also on child trafficking. The global economic downturn has aggravated the problem by making sexual exploitation, forced labour and barter of human cargo more acute.

Lack of satisfactory progress in combating human trafficking in 2008 has led Malaysia to being downgraded from the Tier 2 Watch List to Tier 3 (blacklisted country) in the US State Department Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report, 2009. The report lists Malaysia as one of 17 countries not doing enough to stop human trafficking. The others are Myanmar, Chad, Cuba, Eritrea, Fiji, Iran, Kuwait, Mauritania, Niger, North Korea, Papua New Guinea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Swaziland, Syria, and Zimbabwe.

The report further affirms Malaysia as a destination, source and transit country for women and children trafficked for the purpose of commercial, sexual and forced labour. While the reason for the downgrade remains unclear, Voice of the Children speculates that it could be because alleged traffickers were not properly processed under the law and the lack of adequate methods to properly counsel and care for the victims of child trafficking. There are simply not enough shelters, counselling, protection and other services for child victims. Simply put, a trafficked child is one that has been bought and sold, and this includes false adoptions.

In spite of the 2007 Human Trafficking in Persons Act, only one person has been convicted, while another 91 cases are pending, according to Dr Hartini Zainudin, adviser of Rumah NurSalam, which is a centre for homeless children in Kuala Lumpur.

Who are the biggest victims of child trafficking? The group most at risk would have to be undocumented children. Why? Because, crudely put, they do not exist. They are virtual phantoms with no identity; indeed no records to show they exist as persons.

Yet the problem of undocumented children is within the capability of the government to solve in a piecemeal yet practical manner, none of which will compromise the security of Malaysia.

To make it clear, what we mean by undocumented children is not to be confused with migrants, illegals or refugees. We mean children in Malaysia - or indeed any person who does not possess any identification documents - usually because their births have not been registered.

While some of these children may be "undocumented" migrant children who may not be entitled to citizenship, the great majority of undocumented children are born in Malaysia with either one or both parents having citizenship and who need some form of identity.

Factors that lead to children being undocumented include:

- * failure to register children at birth;
- * administrative or procedural problems, for example, excessive registration fees, opaque non-accessible procedures, remoteness of communities or being born to undocumented or unwed parents;
- * children who are trafficked who have no documentation and therefore cannot be repatriated to any other country;
- * false adoptions; and
- * abandonment of children, in particular, babies.

Every delay is potentially costly, since the cost of belated repatriation, indeed, reintegration of undocumented children into the mainstream society - be it in Malaysia or abroad - is seven times more expensive than simple preventive action, according to well-placed non-governmental sources.

There is no reason for Malaysia to remain in the Tier 2 Watch List, let alone be downgraded to Tier 3. What should we do? The answer is twofold - we need to have systems in place to combat child trafficking and we need to solve the problem of undocumented children so that there is not this ready faceless fodder for child traffickers.

To address the issue of child trafficking, we need the political will to bring Malaysia to Tier 1 classification. Any thoughts of "jumping" from Tier 3 back to Tier 2 should be banished. Why should Malaysia want to go back the Watch List when it is totally capable of turning the situation around to be in Tier 1? Since 2002, the country has spent more than $40US million on promoting "Malaysia, Truly Asia". It is a travesty to the message of this campaign to be on the Tier 3 blacklist for child misery and exploitation in the region.

To address the issue of undocumented children, we need to examine what makes them so vulnerable to child trafficking. Generally, undocumented children have no access to formal mainstream education and healthcare, and of course, are unable to have gainful formal employment. This increases social and financial marginalisation, which in turn foments a criminal underclass.

Additionally, and more poignant, is that undocumented children are particularly vulnerable because anyone who does not have any document technically does not exist. It becomes more acute with each generation making the children susceptible to:

- * Exploitation for commercial, social and sexual purposes, for example, as drug mules and for pornography, prostitution and hazardous labour.
- * Trafficking syndicates that target untraceable, vulnerable children (within and out of Malaysia) as traffickers seek out less educated, socially marginalised and poor families (Malaysian or others) to exploit through their networks. Unregistered babies and toddlers are more at risk of false adoption and abduction, while undocumented older children are easily trafficked for prostitution and drug-running.
- * Social isolation.
- * Involvement in juvenile crime, delinquency and long-term detention.
- * Vagrancy and prone to becoming streetchildren.
- * Potential for long-term drug and alcohol abuse

These are some of the reasons why we need to get the authorities concerned to work together, first to establish and register the children's status, bearing in mind that Malaysia is a signatory to the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. Article 7 of the convention states that all children have a right to acquire nationality at birth.

Second, we need to address issues of education and primary healthcare. A child with an identity is a child that cannot vanish into the trafficking world. A child with an education will not be as susceptible to exploitation, be in a safe environment and be at lower risk from abduction.

Thus, to move from Tier 3 to Tier 1, a special unit to be led by the Ministry of Home Affairs should be set up, assisted by the civil society with national and international roundtables to deal with the cross-border problems of child trafficking. The unit should also deal with intra-ministerial problems of child trafficking and undocumented children. The Attorney General's Chambers must ensure that alleged traffickers are appropriately processed under the law and that the court process is suitably expedient. It is important that child victims are not seen and handled as criminals.

Malaysia can and should move from Tier 3 to Tier 1 quite simply by enforcing the laws and providing effective services to victims of child trafficking. An integrated solution that involves criminal prosecution, shelters and services for child victims and training of all stakeholders in the child trafficking network (police, lawyers, judges, airport staff, among them) will be the keys to saving the reputation of Malaysia, and keeping it solidly entrenched in Tier 1.

The issue of undocumented children needs to be addressed urgently. If need be, instead of the more contentious issue of full citizenship, different categories of citizenship can be considered without which the fate of the children, (invariably, adults, when time takes its course), would be in permanent limbo. Why should Malaysia encourage an underclass to emerge when it is bent on moving beyond its middle income status? Such a self-defeating strategy must be stopped.

Quek Sue Yian is the founding member of Voice of the Children, a newly set up child advocacy group formulated to protect the rights and dignity of all children in Malaysia.

LOAD-DATE: July 3, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

319 of 404 DOCUMENTS

New Straits Times (Malaysia)

June 28, 2009 Sunday

2 Malaysians held over human trafficking

SECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 31LENGTH: 337 words

KUALA LUMPUR: Two Malaysians were recently arrested by the Filipino authorities at the Diosdado Macapagal International Airport in Angeles City for alleged human trafficking.

A Bukit Aman source told the New Sunday Times that the two were suspected of illegally recruiting three Filipino women for the purpose of human trafficking.

"The Malaysians were nabbed by Immigration officers at the airport for attempting to bribe them with 6,000 pesos (RM800). Checks revealed they were leaving the country with three Filipino women," the source said.

"The money had been inserted into the passports of the three Filipino women, allegedly to facilitate their quick departure to Kota Kinabalu."

It is believed that the women were being taken out of the Philippines and meant for the vice trade in Malaysia.

"The two are expected to be charged with attempted bribery and human trafficking," the source said.

Meanwhile, Malaysian police are expected to participate in a joint-operation targeted at modern-day sex slave traders.

"In order to hit the kingpins behind the syndicates, police from various countries have to share intelligence and conduct joint investigations," the source said.

Apart from Chinese nationals, women from South-east Asian countries, such as Indonesia and Vietnam, are usually among those detained in vice raids by police and Immigration officials.

Inspector-General of Police Tan Sri Musa Hassan recently said all agencies, including the Immigration Department, had vital roles to play in combating human trafficking.

He added that Malaysian police were working closely with their Australian counterparts, while the United States Federal Bureau of Investigation was providing intelligence on human trafficking activities.

Since Malaysia had been relegated to Tier 3 of the United States' State Department Trafficking in Persons blacklist, the relevant enforcement agencies have come under the spotlight.

It is learnt that the Australian Federal Police Department will post its officers in Asia to act as liaison officers.

LOAD-DATE: June 28, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

320 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Atlantic Free Press

June 27, 2009 Saturday 3:18 AM EST

Beyond Politics: People for Sale in Hungry World

BYLINE: Ramzy Baroud

LENGTH: 1128 words

Jun. 27, 2009 (Atlantic Free Press delivered by Newstex) --
by Ramzy Baroud

One might be tempted to dismiss the recent findings of the US State Department on human trafficking as largely political. But do not be too hasty.

Criticism of the State Department's report on trafficked persons, issued on 16 June, should be rife. The language describing US allies' efforts to combat the problem seems undeserved, especially when one examines the nearly 320- page report and observes the minuscule efforts of these governments. Also, it was hardly surprising to find that Cuba, North Korea, Iran and Syria " Washington's foremost foes " languish in the report's Tier 3 category, i.e. countries where the problem is most grave and least combated. Offenders in Tier 3 are subject to US sanctions, while governments of countries in Tier 1 are perceived as vigilant in fighting human trafficking.

One could also question the US government's own moral legitimacy; classifying the world into watch lists, congratulating some and reprimanding and sanctioning others, while the US itself has thus far (and for nine consecutive reports starting 2000) been immune to self-criticism.

Undoubtedly, the political hubris and self- righteous underpinnings of the report are disturbing, but that hardly represents an end to the argument. The fact remains that the report's rating of over 170 countries is thorough and largely consistent with facts as observed, reported by the media and examined in other comprehensive reports on the same issue. Indeed, the UN's own Global Report on Trafficking in Persons, launched by the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC) in February 2009, affirms much of the State Departments' findings regarding patterns of abuse reported around the world, most notably in Africa, the Middle East and the Asia-Pacific region.

The report examined governmental responses to the exploitation of people, including children, for the purposes of forced labour, sex and stolen organs. At least 12.3 million adults and children are used to sustain the thriving business of modern-day slavery, though the real number is probably much higher given that human traffickers have little interest in divulging exact data.

The global financial crisis has fuelled the demand for cheap labour, making the exploitation of the most vulnerable people part and parcel of the economic recovery plans of many companies, and even countries. Under these circumstances, there should be little doubt that the UN's once promising campaign to eradicate much of the world's hunger by 2015 is already a pipedream.

One of the testimonies cited in the State Department's report was that of Mohamed Selim Khan, who "woke up in a strange house and felt an excruciating pain in his abdomen. Unsure of where he was, Khan asked a man wearing a surgical mask what had happened. 'We have taken your kidney,' the stranger said. 'If you tell anyone, we'll kill you.'" Khan's experience epitomizes the nightmare of millions of people around the world, as they struggle to provide for hungry families. Their plight is no secret. It can be seen on the streets of many cities around the world, from Europe to Asia and Central America to the Gulf, where worn out, haggard looking men in dirty uniforms are working long hours for little pay, trapped between pressing needs at home and the merciless demands of their "recruitment agencies". But cheap or forced labor is not the only form of human trafficking. According to the UN's Global Report on Trafficking in Persons, based on data collected in 155 countries, "the most common form of human trafficking [79 per cent] is sexual exploitation".

IRIN News, affiliated with the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, reported on 18 June that "women from the former Soviet Union and China are still being trafficked across the border with Egypt into Israel for forced prostitution by organized criminal groups". Israel has been identified as a "prime destination for trafficking by both the State Department and the UN Office on Drugs and Crime". One Israeli gang alone, according to the report, has trafficked over 2,000 women into Israel and Cyprus in the last six years.

One has to wonder the wisdom of international conferences and global efforts aimed at cracking down on Gazans smuggling food and medicine across the same Egyptian border to survive the Israeli siege when almost no efforts have been dedicated to ending the stark exploitation and abuse of thousands of women enriching Israel's sex industry. Dare I say that while human trafficking is itself an apolitical issue, recognizing and combating, or failing to combat, the problem is very much political. Think of the banking crisis, which fuelled a global recession, and the way astronomical amounts of money have been dedicated to solving it, trillions of dollars in global bailouts ultimately rewarding those who caused the crisis in the first place. Compare these efforts to the pathetic attempts at halting the disgraceful commercialization of humans, their organs, their sexuality, their very humanity.

The problem is now compounded. UN food officials declared on 19 June that hunger around the world has passed the unprecedented threshold of one billion, that is one in six people. The alarming increase of 100 million hungry children, women and men from last year's estimates is blamed on the economic recession. While international institutions are efficient at recognizing such problems, proposed solutions often lack sincerity, or any sense of urgency.

"A hungry world is a dangerous world," said Josette Sheeran of the World Food Programme. "Without food, people have only three options: they riot, they emigrate or they die." They also become products in markets ready to exploit those whose very survival is at stake.

When Julia, from the Balkans, was eight years old, she was taken along with her sisters to a neighboring country, where she was sold to beg. She was beaten every time she failed to return with her fixed quota of money. Once she became a teenager she was forced into prostitution. After escaping she was placed in a government orphanage from which she also escaped, returning to the streets. According to the State Department report, eventually "Julia was arrested on narcotics charges".

Can this injustice be any more obvious?

- Ramzy Baroud (www.ramzybaroud.net) is an author and editor of PalestineChronicle.com. His work has been published in many newspapers, journals and anthologies around the world. His latest book is, "The Second Palestinian Intifada: A Chronicle of a People's Struggle" (Pluto Press, London), and his forthcoming book is, "My Father Was a Freedom Fighter: Gazas Untold Story" (Pluto Press, London)

Newstex ID: ATFR-0001-36085198

LOAD-DATE: June 29, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

NOTES: The views expressed on blogs distributed by Newstex and its re-distributors ("Blogs on DemandÆ") are solely the author's and not necessarily the views of Newstex or its re-distributors. Posts from such authors are provided "AS IS", with no warranties, and confer no rights. The material and information provided in Blogs on DemandÆ are for general information only and should not, in any respect, be relied on as professional advice. No content on such Blogs on DemandÆ is "read and approved" before it is posted. Accordingly, neither Newstex nor its re-distributors make any claims, promises or guarantees about the accuracy, completeness, or adequacy of the information contained therein or linked to from such blogs, nor take responsibility for any aspect of such blog content. All content on Blogs on DemandÆ shall be construed as author-based content and commentary. Accordingly, no warranties or other guarantees will be offered as to the quality of the opinions, commentary or anything else offered on such Blogs on DemandÆ. Reader's comments reflect their individual opinion and their publication within Blogs on DemandÆ shall not infer or connote an endorsement by Newstex or its re-distributors of such reader's comments or views. Newstex and its re-distributors expressly reserve the right to delete posts and comments at its and their sole discretion.

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Blog

Copyright 2009 Newstex LLC
All Rights Reserved
Newstex Web Blogs
Copyright 2009 Atlantic Free Press

321 of 404 DOCUMENTS

June 27, 2009 Saturday

Malaysia: Freeze Outsourcing Licences To Improve Malaysia's Rating

BYLINE: shiv03

LENGTH: 342 words

Freeze new licences for companies outsourcing foreign labour and legislate the protection of foreign maids. These two measures will greatly improve the country's rating on the human trafficking blacklist, said the Malaysian Trades Union Congress (MTUC).

Its general secretary, G. Rajasegaran, said the activities of the companies and maid agencies were causing much apprehension and negative perception on Malaysia, among foreign governments, workers and their organisations overseas. He said the companies and agencies charged the workers very high fees but provided very poor or no service at all, adding that once the workers arrived in Malaysia, they were often left on their own.

"If they were employed, they are exploited in being made to work 16 hours daily, without overtime pay, no off days, no medical and health protection and dingy working and living environment.

"It is this exploitation that might have been interpreted as trafficking, and prompted the United States to downgrade us to tier 3 on the blacklist," he told Bernama today.

Rajasegaran was commenting on the US' latest list of nations on trafficking where Malaysia was downgraded to tier 3. This ranking meant that the country faced possible sanctions in the form of non-trade-related US aid.

He said: "We, as Malaysians, are greatly offended by the rating, but we should also be realistic and catch the bull by the horns and strive to improve our rating."

Rajasegaran suggested that for a start, Home Minister Datuk Seri Hishamuddin Tun Hussein and Human Resources Minister Datuk Dr. S. Subramaniam should go down to the ground to see for themselves how these workers were being treated.

"I am sure the ministers would be able to gauge the situation for themselves when they see the pathetic work and living conditions these workers endured," he added. In this aspect, the MTUC, he said, was willing to assist the ministers.

Rajasegaran said the human resources ministry should also implement a weekly off day for the maids and amend the Employment Act to include the maids.

Ltd.

LOAD-DATE: June 28, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

JOURNAL-CODE: 81

Copyright 2009 TendersInfo - Euclid Infotech Pvt. Ltd.
All Rights Reserved
Syndigate.info, Al Bawaba.com

322 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 26, 2009 Friday 9:28 PM GMT

Obama, Malaysian PM discuss NKorea in phone call

LENGTH: 168 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 26 2009

US President Barack Obama spoke by telephone with Malaysia's Prime Minister Najib Razakon Friday, and discussed proliferation, North Korea and financial regulation, the White House said.

"They discussed the ongoing global economic crisis, and stressed the importance of growth and sound regulatory systems in both their economies," the White House said in a statement.

"The president described US concerns over proliferation and discussed North Korea and Iran, stressing the importance of implementation of UN Security Council resolutions," the statement said.

"They also discussed ways to contribute to reconstruction and stability in Afghanistan."

The statement did not mention Malaysia's claim that Washington had meted out unfair treatment over its decision to relist the country on a human trafficking blacklist.

The annual "Trafficking in Persons Report", released last week, said Malaysia was failing to comply with minimum standards to eliminate trafficking and "is not making significant efforts to do so."

LOAD-DATE: June 27, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2009 Agence France Presse
All Rights Reserved

The Palestine Chronicle

June 26, 2009

Beyond Politics: People for Sale in Hungry World

LENGTH: 1112 words

By Ramzy Baroud

One might be tempted to dismiss the recent findings of the US State Department on human trafficking as largely political. But do not be too hasty.

Criticism of the State Department's report on trafficked persons, issued on 16 June, should be rife. The language describing US allies' efforts to combat the problem seems undeserved, especially when one examines the nearly 320- page report and observes the minuscule efforts of these governments. Also, it was hardly surprising to find that Cuba, North Korea, Iran and Syria -- Washington's foremost foes -- languish in the report's Tier 3 category, i.e. countries where the problem is most grave and least combated. Offenders in Tier 3 are subject to US sanctions, while governments of countries in Tier 1 are perceived as vigilant in fighting human trafficking.

One could also question the US government's own moral legitimacy; classifying the world into watch lists, congratulating some and reprimanding and sanctioning others, while the US itself has thus far (and for nine consecutive reports starting 2000) been immune to self-criticism.

Undoubtedly, the political hubris and self- righteous underpinnings of the report are disturbing, but that hardly represents an end to the argument. The fact remains that the report's rating of over 170 countries is thorough and largely consistent with facts as observed, reported by the media and examined in other comprehensive reports on the same issue. Indeed, the UN's own Global Report on Trafficking in Persons, launched by the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC) in February 2009, affirms much of the State Departments' findings regarding patterns of abuse reported around the world, most notably in Africa, the Middle East and the Asia-Pacific region.

The report examined governmental responses to the exploitation of people, including children, for the purposes of forced labour, sex and stolen organs. At least 12.3 million adults and children are used to sustain the thriving business of modern-day slavery, though the real number is probably much higher given that human traffickers have little interest in divulging exact data.

The global financial crisis has fuelled the demand for cheap labour, making the exploitation of the most vulnerable people part and parcel of the economic recovery plans of many companies, and even countries. Under these circumstances, there should be little doubt that the UN's once promising campaign to eradicate much of the world's hunger by 2015 is already a pipedream.

One of the testimonies cited in the State Department's report was that of Mohamed Selim Khan, who "woke up in a strange house and felt an excruciating pain in his abdomen. Unsure of where he was, Khan asked a man wearing a surgical mask what had happened. 'We have taken your kidney,' the stranger said. 'If you tell anyone, we'll kill you.'"

Khan's experience epitomizes the nightmare of millions of people around the world, as they struggle to provide for hungry families. Their plight is no secret. It can be seen on the streets of many cities around the world, from Europe to Asia and Central America to the Gulf, where worn out, haggard looking men in dirty uniforms are working long hours for little pay, trapped between pressing needs at home and the merciless demands of their "recruitment agencies".

But cheap or forced labor is not the only form of human trafficking. According to the UN's Global Report on Trafficking in Persons, based on data collected in 155 countries, "the most common form of human trafficking [79 per cent] is sexual exploitation".

IRIN News, affiliated with the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, reported on 18 June that "women from the former Soviet Union and China are still being trafficked across the border with Egypt into Israel for forced prostitution by organized criminal groups". Israel has been identified as a "prime destination for trafficking by both the State Department and the UN Office on Drugs and Crime". One Israeli gang alone, according to the report, has trafficked over 2,000 women into Israel and Cyprus in the last six years.

One has to wonder the wisdom of international conferences and global efforts aimed at cracking down on Gazans smuggling food and medicine across the same Egyptian border to survive the Israeli siege when almost no efforts have been dedicated to ending the stark exploitation and abuse of thousands of women enriching Israel's sex industry.

Dare I say that while human trafficking is itself an apolitical issue, recognizing and combating, or failing to combat, the problem is very much political. Think of the banking crisis, which fuelled a global recession, and the way astronomical amounts of money have been dedicated to solving it, trillions of dollars in global bailouts ultimately rewarding those who caused the crisis in the first place. Compare these efforts to the pathetic attempts at halting the disgraceful commercialization of humans, their organs, their sexuality, their very humanity.

The problem is now compounded. UN food officials declared on 19 June that hunger around the world has passed the unprecedented threshold of one billion, that is one in six people. The alarming increase of 100 million hungry children, women and men from last year's estimates is blamed on the economic recession. While international institutions are efficient at recognizing such problems, proposed solutions often lack sincerity, or any sense of urgency.

"A hungry world is a dangerous world," said Josette Sheeran of the World Food Programme. "Without food, people have only three options: they riot, they emigrate or they die." They also become products in markets ready to exploit those whose very survival is at stake.

When Julia, from the Balkans, was eight years old, she was taken along with her sisters to a neighboring country, where she was sold to beg. She was beaten every time she failed to return with her fixed quota of money. Once she became a teenager she was forced into prostitution. After escaping she was placed in a government orphanage from which she also escaped, returning to the streets. According to the State Department report, eventually "Julia was arrested on narcotics charges".

Can this injustice be any more obvious?

- Ramzy Baroud (www.ramzybaroud.net) is an author and editor of PalestineChronicle.com. His work has been published in many newspapers, journals and anthologies around the world. His latest book is, "The Second Palestinian Intifada: A Chronicle of a People's Struggle" (Pluto Press, London), and his forthcoming book is, "My Father Was a Freedom Fighter: Gaza's Untold Story" (Pluto Press, London)

LOAD-DATE: June 26, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

JOURNAL-CODE: 35

324 of 404 DOCUMENTS

June 26, 2009 Friday

Malaysia: Freeze Outsourcing Licences To Improve Malaysia's Rating

BYLINE: shiv03

LENGTH: 342 words

Freeze new licences for companies outsourcing foreign labour and legislate the protection of foreign maids. These two measures will greatly improve the country's rating on the human trafficking blacklist, said the Malaysian Trades Union Congress (MTUC). Its general secretary, G. Rajasegaran, said the activities of the companies and maid agencies were causing much apprehension and negative perception on Malaysia, among foreign governments, workers and their organisations overseas.

He said the companies and agencies charged the workers very high fees but provided very poor or no service at all, adding that once the workers arrived in Malaysia, they were often left on their own.

"If they were employed, they are exploited in being made to work 16 hours daily, without overtime pay, no off days, no medical and health protection and dingy working and living environment.

"It is this exploitation that might have been interpreted as trafficking, and prompted the United States to downgrade us to tier 3 on the blacklist," he told Bernama today.

Rajasegaran was commenting on the US' latest list of nations on trafficking where Malaysia was downgraded to tier 3. This ranking meant that the country faced possible sanctions in the form of non-trade-related US aid.

He said: "We, as Malaysians, are greatly offended by the rating, but we should also be realistic and catch the bull by the horns and strive to improve our rating."

Rajasegaran suggested that for a start, Home Minister Datuk Seri Hishammuddin Tun Hussein and Human Resources Minister Datuk Dr. S. Subramaniam should go down to the ground to see for themselves how these workers were being treated.

"I am sure the ministers would be able to gauge the situation for themselves when they see the pathetic work and living conditions these workers endured," he added.

In this aspect, the MTUC, he said, was willing to assist the ministers. Rajasegaran said the human resources ministry should also implement a weekly off day for the maids and amend the Employment Act to include the maids.
Ltd.

LOAD-DATE: June 27, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

JOURNAL-CODE: 81

Copyright 2009 TendersInfo - Euclid Infotech Pvt. Ltd.
All Rights Reserved
Syndigate.info, Al Bawaba.com

325 of 404 DOCUMENTS

US State News

June 26, 2009 Friday 4:19 PM EST

2009 TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT RELEASED- GREEK AGAIN AMONG 'HEROES'

LENGTH: 380 words

ATHENS, Greece, June 16 -- The U.S. Embassy issued the following press release:

The State Department today released the annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report for 2009, as required by U.S. law. Greece is again assessed at "Tier 2," the midpoint of three levels measuring effectiveness in the prevention, protection, and prosecution of human trafficking. For the second year in a row, the U.S. Secretary of State also cited a Greek anti-trafficking proponent, Major George Vanikiotis of the Attica Police, as one of nine "Heroes in the Global Effort to Combat Trafficking in Persons."

Greece is a destination and transit country for victims of trafficking for purposes of both sexual exploitation and forced labor, with an assessment in the TIP Report for 2009 of "Tier 2:" not fully compliant with minimum standards but making significant efforts to do so. This year's report notes that the Greek government increased overall funding toward victim protection and demonstrated strong law enforcement efforts. However, the report also notes insufficient progress in Greece on punishing trafficking offenders, proactively identifying victims, providing reliable shelter facilities for trafficking victims, and specifically targeting domestic audiences with sex and labor trafficking prevention campaigns. One of nine "Heroes in the Global Effort to Combat Trafficking in Persons" honored by U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton this year, Major George Vanikiotis, a commander in the Anti-Trafficking Unit of the Attica Police's Organized Crime Division, is one of Greece's most knowledgeable anti-trafficking proponents. He provides training to police cadets, prosecutors, health professionals, labor inspectors, and NGOs throughout the country. Major Vanikiotis also leads anti-trafficking seminars at high schools and universities. The Anti-Trafficking Unit he directed concentrated on tackling several major urban trafficking rings in 2008 and will focus on labor exploitation and international law enforcement cooperation in 2009. Last year, the State Department honored Emma Skjonsby Manousaridis, director of the Athens-based non-governmental organization "Nea Zoi" (New Life). For more information please contact: Sarabjit Jagirdar, Email:- htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 26, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

326 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 25, 2009 Thursday

Home Ministry insists "no human-trafficking in Brunei"

LENGTH: 578 words

Excerpt from report in English by Brunei newspaper Borneo Bulletin website on 25 June

[By James Kon] The Ministry of Home Affairs in a press release yesterday reiterated that there is no human-trafficking in Brunei. The ministry also clarified that the country is not a hub for recruitment of men and women from Indonesia, Malaysia, Philippines, India, Bangladesh, China and Thailand for domestic or low-skilled labour as previously stated in the Borneo Bulletin.

[This website reported the State Department's annual report's assessment of Brunei at length on 18 June.]

In the statement commenting about the Trafficking in Persons report that was recently released by the US State Department, the ministry added that to date, Brunei Darussalam has not received any reported case on human-trafficking for the purpose of forced labour and commercial sexual exploitation.

The Ministry agrees that the annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report on Brunei Darussalam and other countries published by the US State Department is aimed at raising awareness on the issues of human-trafficking among the international community and to allow the listed countries to monitor and get a grip of the issue in each country.

In the report, Brunei is in the "Tier 2" category, together with 76 countries including Singapore, Philippines and Hong Kong. The report classifies countries between a total of four tiers.

Most European countries are listed in "Tier 1", whereby the countries have fulfilled a minimal standard of Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA), while "Tier 2" are countries that have yet to fulfil the TVPA but are trying to achieve the standard with continuing efforts.

The "Tier 2 Watch List" includes countries that are in between "Tier 2" and "Tier 3." Countries that did not meet the minimal standard of TVPA and were not seen to make any effort in trying to achieve the standard were listed as "Tier 3" countries.

The Ministry of Home Affairs emphasized that the TIP report did not come from the United Nations or any agencies under it.

On the issue of labour, the working hour for a domestic labourer in Brunei Darussalam is excluded from the Labour Act and Regulation, whereby the daily working hours is an agreement between the employer and the domestic employee only.

It can be seen that there are some domestic workers who are given time off during the weekend.

Also in regards to the Labour Act and Regulation, the exchange of contract that is permitted depends on the agreement between the worker and the employer and needs to be approved by the commissioner of labour.

Meanwhile, according to the interpretation of law in the country, "non-payment of salaries" is not included in the category of human-trafficking. Due to the proper arrangement in the recruitment of domestic helpers and foreign workers, the Ministry of Home Affairs states, the issue of human-trafficking does not exist.

The Labour Act and Regulations provide protection to foreign and local employees. It also requires all employers who brought in foreign workers to provide adequate and hygienic accommodation including clean water supply and sanitary system.

As an effort to continuously safeguard the rights of every foreign worker, the Labour Department will be enforcing the Employment Agencies Order 2004 whereby only qualified and registered employment agencies can recruit foreign workers into Brunei Darussalam.

Source: Borneo Bulletin website, Bandar Seri Begawan, in English 25 Jun 09

LOAD-DATE: June 25, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2009 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

327 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Pacific Free Press

June 25, 2009 Thursday 11:59 PM EST

Hunger: Israel's Human Trafficking Rings

BYLINE: Ramzy Baroud ramzybaroud@hotmail.com

LENGTH: 1135 words

Jun. 25, 2009 (Atlantic Free Press delivered by Newstex) --

Beyond Politics: People for Sale in Hungry World

by Ramzy Baroud

One might be tempted to dismiss the recent findings of the US State Department on human trafficking as largely political. But do not be too hasty.

Criticism of the State Department's report on trafficked persons, issued on 16 June, should be rife. The language describing US allies' efforts to combat the problem seems undeserved, especially when one examines the nearly 320- page report and observes the minuscule efforts of these governments. Also, it was hardly surprising to find that Cuba, North Korea, Iran and Syria -- Washington's foremost foes -- languish in the report's Tier 3 category, i.e. countries where the problem is most grave and least combated. Offenders in Tier 3 are subject to US sanctions, while governments of countries in Tier 1 are perceived as vigilant in fighting human trafficking.

One could also question the US government's own moral legitimacy; classifying the world into watch lists, congratulating some and reprimanding and sanctioning others, while the US itself has thus far (and for nine consecutive reports starting 2000) been immune to self-criticism.

Undoubtedly, the political hubris and self- righteous underpinnings of the report are disturbing, but that hardly represents an end to the argument. The fact remains that the report's rating of over 170 countries is thorough and largely consistent with facts as observed, reported by the media and examined in other comprehensive reports on the same issue. Indeed, the UN's own Global Report on Trafficking in Persons, launched by the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC) in February 2009, affirms much of the State Departments' findings regarding patterns of abuse reported around the world, most notably in Africa, the Middle East and the Asia-Pacific region.

The report examined governmental responses to the exploitation of people, including children, for the purposes of forced labour, sex and stolen organs. At least 12.3 million adults and children are used to sustain the thriving business of modern-day slavery, though the real number is probably much higher given that human traffickers have little interest in divulging exact data.

The global financial crisis has fuelled the demand for cheap labour, making the exploitation of the most vulnerable people part and parcel of the economic recovery plans of many companies, and even countries. Under these circumstances, there should be little doubt that the UN's once promising campaign to eradicate much of the world's hunger by 2015 is already a pipedream.

One of the testimonies cited in the State Department's report was that of Mohamed Selim Khan, who "woke up in a strange house and felt an excruciating pain in his abdomen. Unsure of where he was, Khan asked a man wearing a surgical mask what had happened. 'We have taken your kidney,' the stranger said. 'If you tell anyone, we'll kill you.'" Khan's experience epitomizes the nightmare of millions of people around the world, as they struggle to provide for hungry families. Their plight is no secret. It can be seen on the streets of many cities around the world, from Europe to Asia and Central America to the Gulf, where worn out, haggard looking men in dirty uniforms are working long hours for little pay, trapped between pressing needs at home and the merciless demands of their "recruitment agencies".

But cheap or forced labor is not the only form of human trafficking. According to the UN's Global Report on Trafficking in Persons, based on data collected in 155 countries, "the most common form of human trafficking [79 per cent] is sexual exploitation".

IRIN News, affiliated with the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, reported on 18 June that "women from the former Soviet Union and China are still being trafficked across the border with Egypt into Israel for forced prostitution by organized criminal groups". Israel has been identified as a "prime destination for trafficking by both the State Department and the UN Office on Drugs and Crime". One Israeli gang alone, according to the report, has trafficked over 2,000 women into Israel and Cyprus in the last six years.

One has to wonder the wisdom of international conferences and global efforts aimed at cracking down on Gazans smuggling food and medicine across the same Egyptian border to survive the Israeli siege when almost no efforts have been dedicated to ending the stark exploitation and abuse of thousands of women enriching Israel's sex industry.

Dare I say that while human trafficking is itself an apolitical issue, recognizing and combating, or failing to combat, the problem is very much political. Think of the banking crisis, which fuelled a global recession, and the way astronomical amounts of money have been dedicated to solving it, trillions of dollars in global bailouts ultimately rewarding those who caused the crisis in the first place. Compare these efforts to the pathetic attempts at halting the disgraceful commercialization of humans, their organs, their sexuality, their very humanity.

The problem is now compounded. UN food officials declared on 19 June that hunger around the world has passed the unprecedented threshold of one billion, that is one in six people. The alarming increase of 100 million hungry children, women and men from last year's estimates is blamed on the economic recession. While international institutions are efficient at recognizing such problems, proposed solutions often lack sincerity, or any sense of urgency.

"A hungry world is a dangerous world," said Josette Sheeran of the World Food Programme. "Without food, people have only three options: they riot, they emigrate or they die." They also become products in markets ready to exploit those whose very survival is at stake.

When Julia, from the Balkans, was eight years old, she was taken along with her sisters to a neighboring country, where she was sold to beg. She was beaten every time she failed to return with her fixed quota of money. Once she became a teenager she was forced into prostitution. After escaping she was placed in a government orphanage from which she also escaped, returning to the streets. According to the State Department report, eventually "Julia was arrested on narcotics charges".

Can this injustice be any more obvious? Ramzy Baroud (www.ramzybaroud.net) is an author and editor of PalestineChronicle.com. His work has been published in many newspapers, journals and anthologies around the world. His latest book is, "The Second Palestinian Intifada: A Chronicle of a People's Struggle" (Pluto Press, London), and his forthcoming book is, oeMy Father Was a Freedom Fighter: Gazas Untold Story (Pluto Press, London)

Newstex ID: 36047138

LOAD-DATE: June 26, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

NOTES: The views expressed on blogs distributed by Newstex and its re-distributors ("Blogs on DemandÆ") are solely the author's and not necessarily the views of Newstex or its re-distributors. Posts from such authors are provided "AS IS", with no warranties, and confer no rights. The material and information provided in Blogs on DemandÆ are for general information only and should not, in any respect, be relied on as professional advice. No content on such Blogs on DemandÆ is "read and approved" before it is posted. Accordingly, neither Newstex nor its re-distributors make any claims, promises or guarantees about the accuracy, completeness, or adequacy of the information contained therein or linked to from such blogs, nor take responsibility for any aspect of such blog content. All content on Blogs on DemandÆ shall be construed as author-based content and commentary. Accordingly, no warranties or other guarantees will be offered as to the quality of the opinions, commentary or anything else offered on such Blogs on DemandÆ. Reader's comments reflect their individual opinion and their publication within Blogs on DemandÆ shall not infer or connote an endorsement by Newstex or its re-distributors of such reader's comments or views. Newstex and its re-distributors expressly reserve the right to delete posts and comments at its and their sole discretion.

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Blog

Copyright 2009 Newstex LLC
All Rights Reserved
Newstex Web Blogs
Copyright 2009 Pacific Free Press

328 of 404 DOCUMENTS

June 25, 2009 Thursday

Malaysia: Freeze Outsourcing Licences To Improve Malaysia's Rating

BYLINE: shiv03

LENGTH: 342 words

Freeze new licences for companies outsourcing foreign labour and legislate the protection of foreign maids. These two measures will greatly improve the country's rating on the human trafficking blacklist, said the Malaysian Trades Union Congress (MTUC). Its general secretary, G. Rajasegaran, said the activities of the companies and maid agencies were causing much apprehension and negative perception on Malaysia, among foreign governments, workers and their organisations overseas.

He said the companies and agencies charged the workers very high fees but provided very poor or no service at all, adding that once the workers arrived in Malaysia, they were often left on their own. "If they were employed, they are exploited in being made to work 16 hours daily, without overtime pay, no off days, no medical and health protection and dingy working and living environment.

"It is this exploitation that might have been interpreted as trafficking, and prompted the United States to downgrade us to tier 3 on the blacklist," he told Bernama today. Rajasegaran was commenting on the US' latest list of nations on trafficking where Malaysia was downgraded to tier 3. This ranking meant that the country faced possible sanctions in the form of non-trade-related US aid.

He said: "We, as Malaysians, are greatly offended by the rating, but we should also be realistic and catch the bull by the horns and strive to improve our rating." Rajasegaran suggested that for a start, Home Minister Datuk Seri Hishamuddin Tun Hussein and Human Resources Minister Datuk Dr. S. Subramaniam should go down to the ground to see for themselves how these workers were being treated.

"I am sure the ministers would be able to gauge the situation for themselves when they see the pathetic work and living conditions these workers endured," he added. In this aspect, the MTUC, he said, was willing to assist the ministers. Rajasegaran said the human resources ministry should also implement a weekly off day for the maids and amend the Employment Act to include the maids.

Ltd.

LOAD-DATE: June 26, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

JOURNAL-CODE: 81

Copyright 2009 TendersInfo - Euclid Infotech Pvt. Ltd.
All Rights Reserved
Syndigate.info, Al Bawaba.com

329 of 404 DOCUMENTS

arab news

Arab News

June 24, 2009 Wednesday

People for sale in hungry world

BYLINE: Ramzy Baroud

LENGTH: 1089 words

One might be tempted to dismiss the recent findings on human trafficking by the US State Department as largely political. But do not be too hasty. Criticism of the State Department's report on trafficked persons, issued on June 16 should be rife. The language describing the efforts of US allies aimed at combating the problem seems undeserved, especially when one examines the nearly 320-page report and observes the minuscule efforts of these governments. Also, it was hardly surprising to find that Cuba, North Korea, Iran and Syria - the US' foremost foes - are in the report's Tier 3 category, i.e. countries where the problem is most grave, yet least combated. Offenders in Tier 3 are subjected to US sanctions, while governments of countries in Tier 1 are perceived as most genuine in fighting human trafficking in their countries.

One could also venture off to question the US government's own moral legitimacy; classifying the world into tiers and watch lists, congratulating some and reprimanding and sanctioning others, while the US itself has thus far (and for nine consecutive reports starting in 2000) been immune from self-criticism. Undoubtedly, the political hubris and self-righteous underpinnings of the report are disturbing, but that should hardly represent an end to the argument. The fact remains that the report's rating of over 170 countries is both thorough and largely consistent with facts as observed, reported by the media and examined in other comprehensive reports pertaining to the same issue. Indeed, the UN's own Global Report on Trafficking in Persons, launched by the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC), in February 2009, confirms many of the State Departments' findings regarding the pattern of abuses reported around the world, most noticeably in Africa, the Middle East and the Asia-Pacific region.

The report examined the calamity and governmental responses to the exploitation of people, including children, for the purposes of forced labor, sexual servitude and stolen organs. At least 12.3 million adults and children are used to sustain the thriving business of modern-day slavery. One can only imagine that the number is much higher, considering that human traffickers have little interest in divulging exact data. In addition, the global financial crisis has fueled the demand for cheap laborers, making the exploitation of the most vulnerable people part and parcel of the economic recovery plans of many companies and even countries. Under these circumstances, there should be little doubt that the UN's once promising campaign to eradicate much of the world's hunger by 2015 has already become a pipedream.

One of the testimonies cited in the State Department's report was that of Mohammed Salim Khan, who "woke up in a strange house and felt an excruciating pain in his abdomen. Unsure of where he was, Khan asked a man wearing a surgical mask what had happened. 'We have taken your kidney,' the stranger said. 'If you tell anyone, we'll kill you.'" Khan's nightmare epitomizes the nightmare of millions of people around the world forced to accept the intolerable out of sheer need to survive or to provide for a hungry family. But their plight is no secret. It can be seen in the streets of many cities around the world, from Europe to Asia to Central America to the Gulf, where worn out, haggard-looking men in dirty clothes are working long hours for little pay, trapped between pressing needs at home and the merciless demands of their 'recruitment agencies'.

But cheap labor, or forced labor, is not the only form of human trafficking. According to the UN's Global Report on Trafficking in Persons, based on data collected in 155 countries, "the most common form of human trafficking (79 per cent) is sexual exploitation."

IRIN News, affiliated with the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, reported on June 18, "women from the former Soviet Union and China are still being trafficked across the border with Egypt into Israel for forced prostitution by organized criminal groups," making Israel a "prime destination for trafficking by both the State Department and the UN Office on Drugs and Crime." One Israeli gang alone, according to the report, trafficked over 2,000 women into Israel and Cyprus in the last six years.

One has to wonder at the wisdom of international conferences and global efforts aimed at cracking down on Gazans smuggling food and medicine across the same Egyptian border in order to survive the Israeli siege, while next to no efforts have been dedicated to ending the stark exploitation and abuse of thousands of women used in Israel's sex industry. Dare I say, that while human trafficking is itself an apolitical issue, recognizing and combating, or failing to combat the problem is very much political. Think of the sense of absolute urgency the banking crisis, which fueled a global recession, received; the astronomical amounts of money that were dedicated to solving it, the trillions of dollars in global bailouts, ultimately rewarding the very culprits, etc. Now, compare these efforts to the pathetic attempts at halting the disgraceful commercialization of humans, their organs, their sexuality, their very humanity.

Alas, the problem is now compounded, as UN food officials declared on June 19 that hunger around the world has reached the unprecedented number of 1 billion; that is one in six people. The alarming increase of 100 million hungry children, women and men from last year's estimates is blamed on the economic recession. While international institutions are efficient at recognizing such problems, proposed solutions often lack sincerity, and frankly, any sense of urgency.

"A hungry world is a dangerous world," said Josette Sheeran of the World Food Program. "Without food, people have only three options: They riot, they emigrate or they die." They also become fresh products in markets ready to exploit those whose very survival is at stake. When Julia, from the Balkans was eight years old, she and her sisters were taken to a neighboring country, where she was sold to beg. She was beaten every time she failed to return with a certain amount of money. Once a teenager, she was sold into prostitution. After escaping, she was placed in some government orphanage, from which she also escaped, returning to the streets and sold to local men and tourists for prostitution. According to the State Department report, eventually "Julia was arrested on narcotics charges." Can such injustice be any more obvious?

LOAD-DATE: June 24, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: 9

330 of 404 DOCUMENTS

IPS - Inter Press Service

June 24, 2009 Friday

MALAYSIA: BLACKLISTED FOR NOT ENFORCING TRAFFICKING LAWS

BYLINE: Baradan KuppusamyLENGTH: 1087 wordsDATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR, Jun. 24, 2009

After years of lobbying by rights activists and the international community, Malaysia passed an effective and comprehensive law in 2007 against human trafficking with provisions for protection, shelter and return of trafficked person to their home countries.

That law earned international praise and saw Malaysia upgraded from Tier 3 to Tier 2 in the 2007 annual list of trafficking offenders maintained by the United States State Department.

But now, two years later the State Department, in its annual 'Trafficking in Persons Report 2009,' has Malaysia back on the Tier 3 blacklist with 16 other countries - a shocking reversal for the authorities here.

The report evaluates steps taken in over 170 countries to combat trafficking for forced labour, prostitution, military service and other purposes.

Malaysia joins other blacklisted countries, including Myanmar, North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan and Zimbabwe.

The downgrade has shocked authorities who had believed that by passing the Anti-Human Trafficking Law, and sitting on it, they could escape international attention.

The country, which is the largest employer of migrant labour in Asia, comes into constant scrutiny for its often-horrendous human rights record with regard to abuse and exploitation of migrant workers.

Moving Malaysia back to Tier 3 is the price the country paid for its complacency, ignorance and arrogance, said Irene Fernandez, executive director of Tenaganita, a prominent rights organisation for migrant workers.

"It is a major slap in the face for Malaysia," Fernandez told IPS. "Our poor rights record with migrant workers and trafficked person is widely known and internationally condemned."

"The authorities must step out of their complacency and take urgent measures to improve their record," she said blaming "official arrogance" as a key reason for the "state of denial" that afflicts officials.

"This is the crux of the problem. There is no commitment to tackle and improve conditions," Fernandez said urging the authorities to give the report their "highest priority" because its findings are internationally recognised and accepted.

Malaysia is the one of five Asian nations on the blacklist - the others are Burma, Fiji, North Korea and Papua New Guinea.

"Malaysia is a destination and, to a lesser extent, a source and transit country for women and children trafficked for the purpose of commercial sexual exploitation; and for men, women, and children trafficked for the purpose of forced labour," said the report released by the State Department this month.

"Malaysia does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to do so, despite some progress in enforcing the country's new anti-trafficking law," the report said.

It said that while the government took initial actions under the 2007 anti- trafficking law against sex trafficking, it has failed to fully address issues of human trafficking.

The details of the reason for the downgrade can be found in a damning report by the U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee released in April, which said Malaysian Immigration Department officials were involved in trafficking Burmese refugees arriving in Malaysia into Thailand.

The report stated that the officials sold refugees - including Muslim Rohingyas - for approximately 200 dollars per person to traffickers operating along Malaysia's southern border with Thailand. It said the traffickers then demanded ransom for their release from their families back in Myanmar. Those who failed to raise the ransom were sold for purpose of labour and as sex workers.

Malaysia had promised an in-depth investigation into these allegations by the U.S. Committee, but within days announced that there was no truth to the allegations.

Opposition lawmakers also raised the matter in parliament, but to date no official has been arrested, prosecuted, or convicted for alleged involvement in human trafficking.

It is common knowledge that migrant workers especially undocumented Asians are badly treated by employers and enforcement officials, and by the voluntary outfit called RELA, whose 500,000 untrained but armed members are often used in anti-migrant worker operations.

These undocumented people are often at the mercy of employers, employment agents, officials and traffickers. Victims suffer physical and sexual abuse, debt bondage, non-payment of wages, threats, confinement, and withholding of travel documents, said Fernandez.

Women from Burma, Cambodia, China, Indonesia, Mongolia, the Philippines, Thailand and Vietnam are regularly trafficked into the country and forced into prostitution.

The 2009 State Department report concluded: "As a regional economic leader approaching developed nation status, Malaysia has the resources and government infrastructure to do more in addressing trafficking in persons."

Countries on the Tier 3 blacklist could face U.S. sanctions - including the withholding of non-humanitarian, non-trade related foreign aid.

They would also be subject to withholding of funding for government officials to participate in educational and cultural exchange programs.

The report's conclusion is also disputed by officials and others here.

The Human Rights Commission of Malaysia, or Suhakam, said that the 2009 report "should have been more balanced and factual, and not merely fault finding."

"Trafficking is a complex issue, and apprehending criminals involved in trafficking is not an easy task. We have an adequate law to combat trafficking but changes cannot be expected at once," said Suhakam commissioner Raj Abdul Karim.

"The implementation of the law and efforts to combat trafficking take time to yield the expected results," Karim said in a statement.

Malaysia's Deputy Home Minister Abu Seman Yusop also told parliament the downgrading to Tier 3 was "unfair" because the authorities were already doing their best to curb trafficking.

"We don't condone human trafficking and have taken stern actions to deal with the problem, including enacting an anti-human trafficking law in 2007, and setting up a special task force," he said.

However U.S. Ambassador to Malaysia James R. Keith, in comments to local media, said that while Malaysia does have "comprehensive laws to deal with human trafficking" enforcement and conviction of offenders were urgently missing.

Keith stressed, Malaysia needs to deter traffickers with arrest, court charges and convictions. "That makes people realise that the government is serious," he said. "That's the bottom line."

LOAD-DATE: June 24, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2009 2009 IPS - Inter Press Service/Global Information Network

331 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Manila Times (Philippines)

June 24, 2009 Wednesday

DOJ orders inventory of human trafficking cases, seeks help of High Court

BYLINE: By William B. Depasupil And Francis Earl A. Cueto

LENGTH: 525 words

ACTING Justice Secretary Agnes VST Devanadera on Tuesday ordered an inventory of all pending cases of human trafficking in an effort to speed up their resolutions amid a warning from the US State Department that the Philippines "could be barred from receiving non-humanitarian, non-trade-related foreign assistance" if it fails to address the problem.

In a memorandum, Devanadera ordered all government prosecutors nationwide to submit immediately the status of cases involving anti-trafficking in persons, including those undecided by the courts, on or before July 31, 2009.

She also sought the assistance of the Supreme Court for doable measures that will lead to speedy decision on human trafficking cases pending in courts.

In her letter to Chief Justice Reynato Puno, the Department of Justice (DOJ) chief said that she considered the reforms initiated by the chief in the judiciary as "encouragement for us in this protracted battle against trafficking in persons knowing that these concerns will not go unheeded."

According to Devanadera, all statistics obtained from the prosecution will be taken as factors in sitting down with the Supreme Court counterparts for viable solutions on pending trafficking cases in courts.

Devanadera made the twin move after the US State Department came out with a report that placed the Philippines on Tier 2 Watch List because of the slow progress in convicting trafficking offenders, particularly those responsible for labor trafficking.

Open skies blamed

A group of travel executives blamed the open skies policy for the Philippines' inclusion by the report of the United States, which retained the Philippines on its Tier 2 list.

In its 2009 Trafficking in Persons Report, the US State Department said the Philippines continues to be "a source, transit, and destination country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor."

Robert Lim Joseph, chairman emeritus of the National Association of Independent Travel Agencies (Naitas), said human traffickers exploited open skies, which allowed budget foreign air carriers to operate outside Metro Manila, away from the prying eyes of the authorities.

Joseph recalled that on July 2, 2008, the composite team formed by Vice President Noli de Castro prevented five Filipinos from boarding an Air Asia flight in Clark for Kuala Lumpur on suspicion that they were using tourist visas to gain entry in another country and work there.

The off-boarded Filipinos admitted they were going to the Malaysian capital to work as domestic helpers.

De Castro has sought wide and deeper investigation to prevent human traffickers from using international airports in the provinces as jump-off points for their illegal trade.

Earlier, Assistant Chief State Prosecutor Severino Gana Jr., chair of DOJ Task Force on Trafficking in Persons, said that being on Tier 2 Watch List is a wake-up call because if it drops to Tier 3 category, the US would stop its military and economic aid to the Philippines.

Gana claimed though that the recent US State Department report did not include recent convictions won by state prosecutors.

LOAD-DATE: June 24, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2009 News Bites Pty Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

Global News Bites

332 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Latin America - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 22, 2009 Monday

St Vincent official seeks to discuss human trafficking with US officials

LENGTH: 404 words

Text of report by Caribbean Media Corporation news agency website

WASHINGTON DC, CMC - A top St Vincent and the Grenadines government official has demanded a meeting with officials at the US State Department over report that included the Caribbean Community (CARICOM) nation on a list of countries that have not done enough to counter human trafficking.

La Celia Prince, Kingstown's envoy to the United States and the Organization of American States (OAS), reiterated Prime Minister Ralph Gonsalves objection to the "Ninth Annual Trafficking in Persons Report" that placed St Vincent and the Grenadines on its tier two watch list of countries that had not made enough efforts to satisfy US requirements.

The ambassador said the report was not based on any hard evidence.

"It is insufficient and reckless to rely on anecdotal reports, considering the gravity of a report of this nature.

The report described St Vincent and the Grenadines as a "potential source country for children trafficked internally for the purposes of sexual exploitation," adding it may also be a destination country for women trafficked for the purposes of commercial sexual exploitation.

"Anecdotal reporting suggests the number of victims trafficked in, to, or through St Vincent and the Grenadines is small," it said.

"We categorically reject that assessment," Prince said. "It is patently incorrect, and we have reason to question the methodology that is employed in gathering information that forms the basis of the report."

The Vincentian envoy said the CARICOM caucus in Washington has registered its displeasure with the report.

"I foresee a lot of problems if they continue in this vein," Prince said. "We categorically reject their assessment. It is not an objective report."

Other CARICOM countries placed on the watch list are Belize and Guyana. Georgetown has also voiced its displeasure with the US classification.

The department said Haiti was on its "Special Case" list, while six CARICOM nations - Antigua and Barbuda, the Bahamas, Barbados, Jamaica, Suriname, and Trinidad and Tobago - were listed in the "Tier 2" category.

"Tier 2" applies to countries considered to be making minimal efforts to satisfy the US anti-Trafficking in Persons' requirement, while "Tier 2 Watch List" is when their efforts are not enough, according to US standards.

Source: Caribbean Media Corporation news agency website, Bridgetown, in English 1930 gmt 21 Jun 09

LOAD-DATE: June 22, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

All Rights Reserved

333 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Malaysia General News

June 22, 2009 Monday

FREEZE OUTSOURCING LICENCES TO IMPROVE MALAYSIA'S RATING

LENGTH: 340 wordsDATELINE: PETALING JAYA June 22

Freeze new licences for companies outsourcing foreign labour and legislate the protection of foreign maids.

These two measures will greatly improve the country's rating on the human trafficking blacklist, said the Malaysian Trades Union Congress (MTUC).

Its general secretary, G. Rajasegaran, said the activities of the companies and maid agencies were causing much apprehension and negative perception on Malaysia, among foreign governments, workers and their organisations overseas.

He said the companies and agencies charged the workers very high fees but provided very poor or no service at all, adding that once the workers arrived in Malaysia, they were often left on their own.

"If they were employed, they are exploited in being made to work 16 hours daily, without overtime pay, no off days, no medical and health protection and dingy working and living environment.

"It is this exploitation that might have been interpreted as trafficking, and prompted the United States to downgrade us to tier 3 on the blacklist," he told Bernama today.

Rajasegaran was commenting on the US' latest list of nations on trafficking where Malaysia was downgraded to tier 3. This ranking meant that the country faced possible sanctions in the form of non-trade-related US aid.

He said: "We, as Malaysians, are greatly offended by the rating, but we should also be realistic and catch the bull by the horns and strive to improve our rating."

Rajasegaran suggested that for a start, Home Minister Datuk Seri Hishamuddin Tun Hussein and Human Resources Minister Datuk Dr. S. Subramaniam should go down to the ground to see for themselves how these workers were being treated.

"I am sure the ministers would be able to gauge the situation for themselves when they see the pathetic work and living conditions these workers endured," he added.

In this aspect, the MTUC, he said, was willing to assist the ministers.

Rajasegaran said the human resources ministry should also implement a weekly off day for the maids and amend the Employment Act to include the maids.

LOAD-DATE: June 23, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

334 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Africa - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 21, 2009 Sunday

US ranks Swaziland among "worst offenders" in human trafficking

LENGTH: 625 words

Text of report by Swazi newspaper The Times of Swaziland website on 20 June

[Report by Mabandla Bhembe: "Obama Gives SD 90 Days"]

Mbabane -Swaziland forms part of the six African countries that have been blacklisted by the United States of America (USA) as worst offenders in human trafficking.

Owing to this, President Barack Obama's government has given the country a 90 day ultimatum to put its house in order or face severe sanctions.

Accor-ding to the US State De-partment's annual report, the other African countries that have been recently included on the same human trafficking blacklist as Swaziland are Zimbabwe, Eritrea, Niger, Chad and Mauritania.

Minimum

Inclusion on the list means these countries' governments are not fully complying with minimum standards set by US laws for cooperating in efforts to reduce the rise of human trafficking.

Human trafficking involves trading in human beings who are smuggled out of a country and subjected to torture, hard labour and forced sexual intercourse (sex slave).

Swaziland, including the other five countries on the list, now risks sanctions including suspension of US non-humanitarian aid. According to the US State Department's annual report, if a country appears on the list for two consecutive years, it can be subjected to further US sanctions.

The addition of the six African countries was due largely to a relaxation in efforts to fight domestic slavery, which has allegedly persisted, according to the US.

These countries were added to the list in the annual report, which analysed efforts in 173 countries to fight trafficking in humans for forced labour, prostitution, military service and other reasons.

Crisis

The State Department's annual report, the first to be released since President Barack Obama took office, also states that the global economic crisis is also boosting the demand side of human trafficking.

The report further states that 17 nations, up from 14 in 2008, are now subject to the trafficking sanctions, which can include a ban on non-humanitarian and trade-related aid and US opposition to loans and credits from the International Monetary Fund and World Bank.

The penalties can be waived if President Obama determines it is in the US' national interest to do so.

In an interview with the Swazi News this week, Minister of Foreign Affairs and International Cooperation Lutfo Dlamini confirmed the 90 day ultimatum.

"Indeed we received the US report and we were expecting such correspondence," said Dlamini.

"I am pleased to confirm that we will meet the deadline that has been set by the US. Our inclusion into the list has been for two main reasons which are that the country is not putting much effort to curb these illegal practices and that there is no law that has been passed on human trafficking," explained Dlamini.

Independent investigations revealed that the country also finds itself in this situation because of being used by these human trafficking perpetrators as a by-pass country.

Disturbing

To this the minister said: "The ministry has also had an experience of people coming to seek help to return to their respective countries after having been trafficked into Swaziland for a number of reasons, including jobs."

Dlamini lamented that the listing of the country under this category was disturbing.

"We cannot afford to be listed as a human trafficking state because it is a serious offence globally. It is for this reason that we have acted swiftly to avoid jeopardising our good relationship with the Americans, which has been going on for years," he said.

Countries that have managed to cope with the US law and have since been removed from the list include Qatar, Oman, Algeria, and Moldova.

Source: The Times of Swaziland website, Mbabane, in English 20 Jun 09

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2009 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

335 of 404 DOCUMENTS

GlobalPost

June 21, 2009 Sunday 10:27 AM EST

Working on the chain gang

BYLINE: Jason Overdorf

LENGTH: 1270 words

Jun. 21, 2009 (GlobalPost delivered by Newstex) -- paging_filter

FARIDABAD, India " Twenty years ago, Teerath Ram came to Faridabad, on the outskirts of New Delhi, to work in one of its many stone quarries. Recruited by a labor contractor who promised he'd earn much higher wages here than he could ever make in his native state of Chhattisgarh, Teerath Ram took a notional "advance" of a few thousand rupees to pay the contractor for getting him the job and agreed to work in the quarry to repay his debt. Fifteen years later, he's still there.

The high wages he was meant to receive never materialized, and at the end of the month when the rock he had risked his neck to blast out of the ground was weighed against the dynamite he'd "bought" from the company store, the owner told him that his wages were just enough to cover the interest on his debt.

"They just kept records of what they loaned me in a notebook," he said. And because Teerath Ram is illiterate as well as desperately poor, "They could change the figures anytime they wanted."

There are literally millions like Teerath Ram in India, which has failed to meet minimum standards to combat human trafficking, according to the 2009 Trafficking in Persons Report released by Secretary of State Hillary Clinton this week.

"India is a source, destination, and transit country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labor and commercial sexual exploitation," according to the report.

Because it has been on the oetier two watch list " the second-worst category of offenders " for two years, India now faces the prospect of being moved to the oetier three blacklist of egregious violators next year if it fails to improve its record in fighting human trafficking. Those countries face sanctions under which the U.S. can withhold non-humanitarian aid and oppose aid projects from agencies like the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, though it is likely India would receive a presidential waiver.

The sad thing for India is that the more things change, the more they stay the same.

Though they are still being cheated and exploited, laborers like Teerath Ram, for instance, don't even understand that they were the victims of trafficking, since nobody clubbed them on the head and threw them in the back of a truck. Nor do the police.

oeThe word trafficking has not been defined in India, said Bhuwan Ribhu, a lawyer with the New Delhi-based Global March Against Child Labor. oeThere is no comprehensive definition, despite the fact that trafficking in human beings has been banned as [violating] a fundamental right. That means when people are duped into migrating for work, rather than kidnapped, India's law enforcement agencies rarely recognize them as the victims of traffickers.

Technically, Teerath Ram is now no longer a bonded laborer. He knows exactly how much money he owes the quarry owner and the rate of interest on his debt. He can leave anytime, provided he finds someone else " which would mean another labor contractor " to grant him another loan to pay off his debt. But he still has to pay for the blasting equipment he uses from the quarry to which he's indebted, and the owner and debt-holder still assesses the value of the rock Teerath Ram blasts out of the ground. Naturally, the price of dynamite always seems to climb, while the price for stone plunges.

The quarry workers of Faridabad " only a 15-minute drive from the heart of Delhi " are victims of what some Indian economists are terming "modern bonded labor."

Unlike in the past, when agricultural laborers were forced to work because of traditional feudal ties to landlords or debts that went back generations, these modern bonded laborers migrate to new farms or industrial sites where wages are higher. They enter "freely" into loan agreements with their employers and sometimes even pay off what they owe at the end of the year. This has prompted some economists to argue that the laborers aren't the victims of traffickers, and that they opt to take these jobs because they are better than the alternatives available to them elsewhere, said Professor Ravi Srivastava, a labor economist at Jawarhalal Nehru University.

But, as Teerath Ram knows, the reality is very different. "This is the way the new bonded labor relationships are emerging," Srivastava said. These relationships are not purely economic contracts, even though employees may enter them due to necessity, rather than compulsion. And once employees enter into these relationships, there are high exit costs that the employees did not understand at the outset.

Bonded labor has been illegal in India since the enactment of the Bonded Labor System Abolition Act in 1976, and a series of progressive Supreme Court judgments expanded India's definition of bonded labor to make it more comprehensive.

India's highest court ruled in Bandhua Mukti Morcha vs. the Union of India (1984) that all laborers who are working for below the nationally mandated minimum wage should be presumed to be bonded to their employers. The ruling recognized that economic compulsions can be as powerful as historical feudal relationships and even the threat of physical harm, and that proving exploitation can be a knotty problem when employers keep all the records and their workers are illiterate and mathematically ignorant.

While this law doesn't go so far as to define anybody who is working for less than minimum wage to be a bonded laborer, it shifts the burden onto the employer to prove that his employees are there of their own volition. But despite this progressive interpretation of the law, forced labor, debt servitude and even slavery persist, according to the National Commission for Enterprises in the Unorganized Sector.

Numbers are hard to come by. The Bandhua Mukti Morcha (or Bonded Labor Liberation Front) claims that as many as 300 million Indian workers should be presumed to be bonded laborers, based on the Supreme Court's definition.

The working conditions for such laborers are grim. They handle hazardous chemicals " and even explosives " without any safety equipment. Crippling and fatal accidents are routine. The work is backbreaking, and the pay is miserable. For instance, the oerapaswala, a kiln worker who buries the bricks before firing, earns only 8 rupees (or about 20 cents) for every thousand bricks he produces.

Things are no better for Teerath Ram and the other the oemodern bonded laborers of Faridabad, even though they have fought long and hard for their rights, and, according to some definitions, they're free.

Organized by the Bandhua Mukti Morcha (Bonded Labor Liberation Front) in 1984, they have secured a school and access to electricity at the cost of the life of one of their own " allegedly at the hands of company goons. But they still have yet to receive the legally mandated minimum wage for their labor. They handle dynamite and blasting caps without proper safety equipment because their employer requires them to pay for their gear themselves, and fatal accidents are so commonplace no one has an accurate count.

"I owe 20,000 rupees ($500), which I borrowed to buy dynamite and other equipment," said Resham Lal, another quarry worker. "Every month, I repay 250 rupees. Nobody has told me how long it will take me to pay off my debt at this rate, and I keep working and spending more money on equipment and the interest on my loan keeps growing."

More GlobalPost dispatches on abuse:

The slaves next door

Saudi princess speaks out on abuse

Ireland deeply shocked by abuse revelations

Forced to cut corners, bosses prey on Burmese migrants

Newstex ID: 35904248

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

NOTES: The views expressed on blogs distributed by Newstex and its re-distributors ("Blogs on DemandÆ") are solely the author's and not necessarily the views of Newstex or its re-distributors. Posts from such authors are provided "AS IS", with no warranties, and confer no rights. The material and information provided in Blogs on DemandÆ are for general information only and should not, in any respect, be relied on as professional advice. No content on such Blogs on DemandÆ is "read and approved" before it is posted. Accordingly, neither Newstex nor its re-distributors make any claims, promises or guarantees about the accuracy, completeness, or adequacy of the information contained therein or linked to from such blogs, nor take responsibility for any aspect of such blog content. All content on Blogs on DemandÆ shall be construed as author-based content and commentary. Accordingly, no warranties or other guarantees will be offered as to the quality of the opinions, commentary or anything else offered on such Blogs on DemandÆ. Reader's comments reflect their individual opinion and their publication within Blogs on DemandÆ shall not infer or connote an endorsement by Newstex or its re-distributors of such reader's comments or views. Newstex and its re-distributors expressly reserve the right to delete posts and comments at its and their sole discretion.

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Blog

Copyright 2009 Newstex LLC
All Rights Reserved
Newstex Web Blogs
Copyright 2009 GlobalPost

336 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Gulf Daily News

June 21, 2009

Trafficking clamp underway

BYLINE: BEGENA P PRADEEP

LENGTH: 871 words

ACTIVISTS are gathering evidence of human trafficking in Bahrain under a nationwide campaign against the trade in misery.

They are calling for tougher laws and want officials to take more action.

Human rights activists backed a new US State Department report which says much more must be done to improve the country's track record.

The country remains on a special watchlist of nations being monitored over what action is being taken to combat trafficking, despite issuing new guidelines on the employment conditions of migrant workers.

Bahrain was one of 170 nations included in the ninth annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report, which said it did little to improve its services to protect victims of trafficking.

It was placed in the Tier 2 watchlist for failing to enforce laws against trafficking in persons and prevent the punishment of victims.

This put it alongside countries like Algeria, Azerbaijan, Bangladesh, Cambodia, China, Egypt, Ghana, India, Iraq, Lebanon, Libya, Pakistan, Philippines, Russia, Sri Lanka, Tajikistan, Tunisia and Uzbekistan.

However, Bahrain was ahead of most of the other Gulf countries, which ranked in Tier 3, except Oman.

Those in Tier 1 have governments which fully comply with the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorisation Act's (TVPA) minimum standards, while Tier 2 countries are those whose governments do not fully comply with the act's minimum standards, but are making significant efforts to do so.

The US ranks countries in Tier 3 as those whose governments do not fully comply with the act's minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so.

The report, published by the GDN on Wednesday, recommends that Bahrain significantly increase its investigation and prosecution of trafficking offences.

It was also advised to ensure that victims are not punished for illegal migration or prostitution.

Bahrain was, however, recognised for reportedly closing several manpower agencies alleged to have confiscated workers' passports, switched contracts, or withheld payment of salaries.

Bahrain Human Rights Watch Society (BHRWS) secretary-general Faisal Fulad blamed officials' complacency for allowing the problem to get worse.

He praised Bahrain's leadership for its efforts to tackle the problem, but accused the Labour Ministry of not doing enough.

"The problem has been increasing, from the deaths of workers (in labour camp fires and site accidents), violence against housemaids and the number of people in shelters for abused women," he said.

"We have never seen any statement about human trafficking from them (Labour Ministry), but only from the Interior and Foreign ministries.

"There is nothing about human trafficking even on the Labour Ministry website, though they are responsible for issuing visas to Bahrain.

"The introduction of a new law to punish offenders, among other initiatives, appears to have made little progress in stopping the exploitation of women and children."

Mr Fulad said the BHRWS was set to launch a major report on the scale of Bahrain's human trafficking problem, in December.

It will feature case studies from people of all nationalities and include evidence presented by local and international human rights activists.

Earlier this year, the BHRWS launched the Bahraini Civil Partnership to Fight Human Trafficking, to improve co-operation between the government and national and international organisations seeking to eliminate the problem.

The BHRWS has also set up a 24-hour hotline to help victims.

It is available from 8am to 6pm on 17536222 and on 36633882 at other times.

Bahrain Human Rights Society secretary-general Abdulla Al Derazi said that Bahrain had notably changed for the better in the past year by issuing the ban on transporting workers in open trucks, the introduction of anti-trafficking law and moves to abolish the sponsorship system.

"Of course more awareness is needed among officials and accommodation facilities for migrant workers need improvement," he said.

"Housemaids not being included in Bahrain's labour law is a short-coming, expected to be tackled with amendments waiting to be approved by parliament.

"Plans are also underway to form a fund for trafficking victims to help them fight cases among other genuine needs."

Migrant Workers Protection Society (MWPS) action committee head Marietta Dias agreed that much more needed to be done.

"Though the situation in Bahrain has improved to some extent there's still a long way to go," she said.

"Many trafficking victims in Bahrain are effectively silenced by the language barrier as there are no qualified translators to help them in court.

"Victims are signing statements in Arabic and don't know what is written on them."

Ms Dias also called for cases to be fast-tracked through the justice system, because at the moment they often took months and even years to complete.

"Migrants are reluctant to file cases against their employers as it would mean that they cannot work legally with another employer until the case is over."

Labour Ministry officials told the GDN that it is up to the Foreign Ministry to comment on the issue, as human trafficking was their concern.

The Foreign Ministry said that any statement, if at all, would be sent later.

begena@gdn.com.bh

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: 5

Copyright 2009 Gulf Daily News - Hilal Publishing and Marketing Group.
All Rights Reserved
Syndigate.info, Al Bawaba.com

337 of 404 DOCUMENTS

June 21, 2009 Sunday

US human trafficking report disappoints UAE officials

BYLINE: Eman Mohammed Abu Dhabi Deputy Editor, Wafa Issa and Abbas Al Lawati, Staff Reporters

LENGTH: 927 words

Dubai: A US State Department report on human trafficking that downgraded the UAE has met with sharp criticism from UAE officials who believe it is ambiguous and inconsistent.

The State Trafficking in Persons report for June 2009 classified the UAE as falling under "tier two", dropping one spot from last year, saying there were no "discernable anti-trafficking efforts against the forced labour of temporary migrant workers and domestic servants".

Dr Anwar Mohammad Gargash, Minister of State for Foreign Affairs and Minister of State for Federal National Council Affairs, issued a statement on Tuesday describing the report as "disappointing" and "subjective".

"It appears that the US definition of human trafficking varies every year, depending on the nature of debate on this issue in its domestic environment.

"It is incongruous to equate alleged labour rights violations, which are a critical but separate issue, to the coercive and unacceptable sexual exploitation of women for profit," said Gargash.

The report said that the UAE "historically has not recognised people forced into labour as trafficking victims". However, the definition of human trafficking according to Article 1 of the UAE's Federal Law 51 of 2006 on Combating Human Trafficking Crimes is almost identical to that of the United Nations, which also considers forced labour as human trafficking.

"The anti-trafficking law recognises forced labour but they want us to include it in an article in the labour law. Different countries have different methods that serve the same purpose," Dr Saeed Bin Omair Al Ghafly, Executive Director at the Ministry of State for the FNC affairs, told Gulf News, adding that the report was "demotivating".

"What is saddening is that we sat with them [authors of the report] and clarified issues with them, but they don't seem to have taken that into considerations," he said.

"There is no clear definition of the minimum standards that are cited."

Afra Al Basti, CEO of the Dubai Women and Children Foundation (DWCF), said that her shelter was approached by researchers for the State Department to schedule a visit, but the date the shelter offered was not convenient for them.

"The report does not reflect the reality in the UAE and many of the efforts carried out by the government to combat human trafficking were only briefly cited. Our efforts to liaise with international organisations in the victims' home countries were left out."

She said however that steps needed to be taken by the authorities to combat human trafficking, such as putting limits on entry of girls between 15 and 30 from high risk countries.

Lieutenant General Dahi Khalfan Tamim, Chief of Dubai Police, said: "I stopped reading these reports several years ago. It's full of contradictions". He questioned the credibility of a report coming from a state "that violates human rights in front of the whole world".

"Our conscience dictates our efforts, and not the US government," he said.

Rashid Musabah Al Kindi, member of the Federal National Council who sits on a committee for labour issues, said the report was not fair and the UAE was made to pay for other people's mistakes, referring to fraudsters in other countries who lure young women to the UAE for job opportunities and force them into prostitution.

On the issue of passports, he said: "Keeping workers' passports is the employer's right and not a violation for human rights as stated in the report".

"In case workers commit a crime then it is the employer's responsibility and keeping his passport will prevent him from leaving the country."

Abdul Rahim Al Shahin, also a member of the FNC, questioned why the UAE was being "attacked" when other countries' violations were not being talked about.

"The UAE lately hosted a conference for Human Right Watch and celebrated for the first time labour day which is mainly for foreign workers," he added.

Comparison: Forced labour

Below are the definitions of human trafficking as per the United Nations and UAE law. Contrary to claims by a US State Department human trafficking report, the UAE does consider forced labour to be a form of human trafficking in law.

UN Definition: The United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime defines human trafficking as the recruitment, transportation, transfer, harbouring or receipt of persons, by means of the threat or use of force or other forms of coercion, of abduction, of fraud, of deception, of the abuse of power or of a position of vulnerability or of the giving or receiving of payments or benefits to achieve the consent of a person having control over another person, for the purpose of exploitation.

Exploitation shall include, at a minimum, the exploitation of the prostitution of others or other forms of sexual exploitation, forced labour or services, slavery or practices similar to slavery, servitude or the removal of organs.

