WASHINGTON, D.C. -- During today's House Foreign Affairs Committee markup reauthorizing the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000, Rep. Ed Royce (R-CA), an active participant in the Tom Lantos Human Rights Commission, successfully offered a bipartisan amendment calling for the Kingdom of Cambodia to be designated as a Tier 3 country for its egregious human trafficking record.

"The government of Cambodia insufficiently addressed their human trafficking problem and rampant corruption has exacerbated this form of modern day slavery," Royce said.

According to the State Department's 2011 Trafficking in Persons report, Cambodia has made no improvements to identify or protect trafficking victims. News sources describe Cambodia as a "magnet" for those who sexually prey on the young. Additionally, Human Rights Watch describes Cambodia as being "plagued not only by widespread abuses committed by officials, but impunity for perpetrators."

Countries placed in Tier 3, the worst category, "do not fully comply with the Trafficking Victims Protection Act's minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so." Tier 3 countries are subject to a U.S. aid cutoff. Cambodia is currently designated as a Tier 2 country.

"The 2011 report cites that Cambodian 'entertainment establishments' may exploit up to 200 women and children on a single night. Cambodian police have been unwilling to pursue certain trafficking investigations because they were thought to involve high-ranking officials," Royce said.

"By cataloging these vile practices, the State Department's report allows us to spotlight human trafficking. But when we don't follow the facts to a Tier 3 designation for countries like Cambodia, we do a disservice to the victims of these gross human rights abuses," Royce said.

Rep. Royce is a senior member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, and is a member of the Subcommittee on Asia and the Pacific.

LENGTH: 602 words

WASHINGTON, D.C. - U.S. policy dealing with the violence, new humanitarian crises and ongoing slavery in Sudan were the focus of a congressional hearing Tuesday held by Rep. Chris Smith (NJ-04), chairman of the House congressional panel that oversees international human rights and African issues.

Smith's Subcommittee on Africa, Global Health, and Human Rights heard testimony from the top official on U.S. government Sudan policy, Sudan experts and an emancipated slave. The hearing, entitled "A Comprehensive Assessment of U.S. Policy Toward Sudan," examined America's strategies for addressing the recurring crises in the Darfur, Abyei, Southern Kordofan and Blue Nile areas of Sudan.

"From a time I can't remember until very recently, I slept with cattle and goats," said Ker Deng, now 18 but a slave since he was a toddler when he and his mother were captured during a raid on their village. "I ate the grain that was fed to horses. I was treated worse than the animals I slept with. Like them, I was property. I was a slave held in Northern Sudan. But the animals weren't beaten every day. I was." Click here to read Deng's testimony http://chrissmith.house.gov/UploadedFiles/Testimony_Ex_slave_Ker_Deng.pdf

His mother remains a forced concubine by her captor. Blinded by his captor, Deng is in the U.S. to receive treatment to restore his eyesight and to testify to his own story as a slave, which remains the plight of thousands of other captives in Sudan.

"Slavery remains a pervasive and deeply disturbing reality in Sudan, and we cannot in good conscience allow this to continue," Smith said. "We have had active campaigns to end Sudanese slavery, to end genocide in Darfur, to end the north-south civil war and now to end the attacks on Abyei, Southern Kordofan and Blue Nile. Unfortunately, these campaigns have been conducted in isolation from one another. If we are to have a successful policy to stop the suffering of Sudan's people, our government must devise a comprehensive policy for addressing all of Sudan's challenges." Smith, a longtime advocate in fighting human trafficking and author of the landmark Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA), the reauthorization of which will be considered by the Foreign Affairs Committee tomorrow, said the State Department's 2011 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report mandated by the TVPA lists Sudan as a Tier 3 country. That is, Sudan is listed as a continuing source, transit and destination country for men, women and children subjected to forced labor and sex trafficking.

At a press conference earlier in the day, Smith was joined by Ellen Ratnor, a White House correspondent and nationally known radio and TV journalist for Talk Radio News Service and Fox News Channel and Sudan human rights advocate, as well as Deng and Dr. Julia A. Haller, M.D. Haller, an ophthalmologist at Wills Eye Institute in Philadelphia, is the lead doctor and lead surgeon on the medical team caring for Deng. Deng has undergone multiple surgeries to try to restore his sight, resulting in significant improvement. Future progress is anticipated.

At a press conference earlier in the day, Smith was joined by Ellen Ratner, a White House correspondent and nationally known radio and TV journalist for Talk Radio News Service and Fox News Channel and Sudan human rights advocate, New Jersey newspaper publisher and human rights activist Diane Gooch, Deng and Dr. Julia A. Haller, M.D. Mark Ackermann from Lighthouse International and John Eibner of Christian Solidarity International also participated. Both groups have assisted Deng.

Haller, an ophthalmologist at Wills Eye Institute in Philadelphia, is the lead doctor and lead surgeon on the medical team caring for Deng. Deng has undergone multiple surgeries to try to restore his sight, resulting in significant improvement. Future progress is anticipated.

SLAVERY, HUMAN TRAFFICKING, HUMANITARIAN CRISIS TOPICS AT HEARING ON U.S. POLICY IN SUDAN EMANCIPATED SLAVE, U.S. SPECIAL ENVOY LYMAN AMONG WITNESSES TO TESTIFY BEFORE HOUSE PANEL

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 421 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of New Jersey Rep. Chris Smith:

U.S. policy dealing with the violence, new humanitarian crises and ongoing slavery in Sudan were the focus of a congressional hearing Tuesday held by Rep. Chris Smith (NJ-04), chairman of the House congressional panel that oversees international human rights and African issues.

Smith's Subcommittee on Africa, Global Health, and Human Rights heard testimony from the top official on U.S. government Sudan policy, Sudan experts and an emancipated slave. The hearing, entitled "A Comprehensive Assessment of U.S. Policy Toward Sudan," examined America's strategies for addressing the recurring crises in the Darfur, Abyei, Southern Kordofan and Blue Nile areas of Sudan.

" From a time I can't remember until very recently, I slept with cattle and goats ," said Ker Deng, now 18 but a slave since he was a toddler when he and his mother were captured during a raid on their village. I ate the grain that was fed to horses. I was treated worse than the animals I slept with. Like them, I was property. I was a slave held in Northern Sudan. But the animals weren't beaten every day. I was ." Click here to read Ker's testimony.

His mother remains a forced concubine by her captor. Blinded by his captor, Ker is in the U.S. to receive treatment to restore his eyesight and to testify to his own story as a slave, which remains the plight of thousands of other captives in Sudan.

" Slavery remains a pervasive and deeply disturbing reality in Sudan, and we cannot in good conscience allow this to continue ," Smith said. We have had active campaigns to end Sudanese slavery, to end genocide in Darfur, to end the north-South civil war and now to end the attacks on Abyei, Southern Kordofan and Blue Nile. Unfortunately, these campaigns have been conducted in isolation from one another. If we are to have a successful policy to stop the suffering of Sudan's people, our government must devise a comprehensive policy for addressing all of Sudan's challenges ."

Smith, a longtime advocate in fighting human trafficking and author of the landmark Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA), the reauthorization of which will be considered by the Foreign Affairs Committee tomorrow, said the State Department's 2011 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report mandated by the TVPA lists Sudan as a Tier 3 country. That is, Sudan is listed as a continuing source, transit and destination country for men, women and children subjected to forced labor and sex trafficking.

MEDIA NEED TO HAVE COMPREHENSIVE REPORTING ON PEOPLE TRAFFICKING

LENGTH: 398 wordsDATELINE: KOTA KINABALU Oct 3

Malaysian journalists, especially in the mainstream media, will have to realise the pressing need for more comprehensive reporting on people trafficking as any attempts to suppress such reports might be perceived as a cover-up, Malaysian Press Institute (MPI) chief executive officer Datuk Chamil Wariya said today.

He said they had a duty to report the good and bad on the real problem of people smuggling and trafficking in the country as such unsavory incidents should not be found out through the foreign media or other external sources.

"It is very embarrassing for us to find out that Malaysia's shortcomings in dealing with human trafficking have been picked up by the independent and foreign media and we just become bystanders," he said in his welcoming remarks at the workshop on Reporting on Trafficking in Persons, organised by MPI here.

Among those present were Sabah Journalists Association president Datuk Joniston Bangkau and United States Embassy Public Affairs Officer Scott M. Rauland.

Chamil said he was happy to see that the government via the Council of Anti-Trafficking in Persons and Anti-Smuggling of Migrants (MAPO) had done its level best to create awareness about the issue.

It was encouraging to know that Malaysia's standing among various human rights non-governmental organisations and the United States Department had improved to the watch list of Tier Two of the State Department's People Trafficking Chart in its 2011 report, he said.

Despite the United States government's perception that seemed to have improved from Tier Three last year, he said it was high time for the government to improve on its standing on the matter before it could play a serious role in fighting human trafficking, which was a worldwide problem.

At present Malaysia had not signed the 1951 Convention relating to the Status of refugees and the 1967 Protocol, a move that could help curb the the problem in the country, he said.

As the fourth estate, he said, journalists should try to encourage civil society which meant brushing up their knowledge of relevant immigration and refugees laws.

Meanwhile, statistics from the Attorney General's Chambers Prosecution division showed that Perlis recorded the highest cases of offenders charged under the Anti-Trafficking in Persons and Anti-Smuggling of Migrants Act up to Sept this year while Sabah and Sarawak had 44 and 24 cases respectively.

ASIA-PACIFIC Child slaves rescued

BYLINE: HELEN CLARK, HANOISECTION: FOREIGN; Pg. 69LENGTH: 391 words

TWENTY-THREE children and young adults rescued from slave labour in a garment factory by Vietnamese authorities with the help of an Australian-run children's charity have arrived in Hanoi.

Government officials and police from the victims' home region, with help from the charity Blue Dragon, raided the factory in Ho Chi Minh City. The owners have been arrested and are awaiting trial.

The victims, aged from 10 to 21, are from the Kho Mu ethnic group in Dien Bien province, in Vietnam's far northwest. Some of them had been working for up to two years as slave labour in the garment business.

Tired but happy, the children relaxed for an hour at Noi Bai airport before boarding a bus for the 12-hour journey home to their villages.

The children said they were looking forward to returning to their families.

"I felt so homesick, living in Saigon," said 12-year-old Trang.

He was taken by car from his small village of 35 households and brought to Ho Chi Minh City, formerly Saigon, where he worked cutting cloth and was regularly beaten, he said. He was unable to estimate how many hours he worked as he cannot read a clock.

Ta Ngoc Van, a lawyer with Blue Dragon, travelled to the remote villages of Da Lech and Co Nghiu some weeks ago following a tip-off from a contact in the Ministry of Public Security about rumours of missing children.

He found some families had not seen their children in two years.

They had been approached by traffickers who promised their children well-paid and comfortable jobs in Ho Chi Minh City.

After receiving almost no money and no contact with the children, the families were desperate. Investigations by Blue Dragon, experienced in saving children from garment factories, and Vietnamese officials, located the children.

The Australian founder of the charity, Michael Brosowski, said local authorities were keen to combat child trafficking.

Legislation in Vietnam, however, needs to catch up. Vietnam is rated as a tier-two watch list nation in a worldwide report on human trafficking released by the US State Department this year.

Most human trafficking recognised by the government and non-government organisations related to cross-border trafficking, often for sex work. Internal trafficking, usually for labour, is harder to define and rarely prosecuted.

" I felt so homesick, living in Saigon.

Human trafficking in the Maldives is an industry worth U.S. $123 million and stands as the second greatest contributor of foreign currency to the economy after tourism.

The U.S. State Department's 2010 Human Trafficking report placed the Maldives on the Department's watchlist for human trafficking, following the country's failure to "investigate or prosecute trafficking-related offenses or take concrete actions to protect trafficking victims and prevent trafficking in the Maldives." Ironically, the announcement came less than a month after the Maldives was given a seat on the UN Human Rights Council.

One year since hence, conditions are no different. In its 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report, the U.S. State Department has listed the Maldives in its Tier 2 watchlist for human trafficking. This watchlist comprises countries that are not fully compliant with the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA) and where human trafficking incidents are climbing at alarming rates or outpacing efforts to combat them.

How exactly does human trafficking take place in the Maldives? An ongoing police investigation terms the high number of illegal foreign workers as one of the major reasons behind massive human trafficking in the country.

The Maldives Department of Immigration currently puts the numbers of illegal expatriate workers at above 40,000, causing the government to lose $130 million annually in non-paid visa fees.

But how do these foreign workers end up entering illegally in the Maldives and manage to stay back? After a string of operations last year, President Nasheed's office stated that people have been creating fraudulent companies and using job-seekers to apply for fraudulent work permit quotas. These quotas are then directed to bring in illegal workers. As a result, a would-be worker [overseas] works for a couple of years to make the payment which according to the investigations is often as much as U.S. $2000.

The police have identified a majority of these illegal workers as coming from Bangladesh who sell their land, their property and move their families to pay the fees demanded by the bogus recruiters, only to find the job a totally different one from what they were led to expect. Nowhere to go and no home to return to, these workers then fall easy prey to forced labor.

The expansive investigation saw 18 'paper companies' raided by the police in July this year, seizing 4000 passports confiscated from trafficked workers. On part of the Maldivian government, senior officials of the Immigration Department and the Ministry of Human Resources are also said to be involved in the process.

The work permit quotas for non-existent projects were apparently obtained from the Human Resources Ministry by stealing the identities of unwitting Maldivians, or even the deceased.

On legal grounds, the government of the Maldives has made limited efforts to enforce anti-human trafficking laws in the country. For individuals found guilty of the crime, labor trafficking presently represents a violation of the Employment Act, and only carries a small fine in Maldives.

The government needs to conduct anti-trafficking and educational campaigns and take steps to create an inter-agency structure - such as a committee or plan of action - for coordination on anti-trafficking matters. A Labor Tribunal, created as part of the 2008 Employment Act, should also be given the legal teeth to enforce its decisions in cases involving foreign workers.

Even though the accusations of human trafficking have been apparent for the last few years in the Maldives, the extent to which the situation has developed needs a holistic approach before it gets worse.

More work needed to upgrade anti-trafficking rank: US envoy

BYLINE: Rouchelle R. Dinglasan

SECTION: Pg. S1/12

LENGTH: 337 words

ANOTHER UPGRADE for the Philippines in the anti-trafficking watch list of the United States may be obtained given a sustained resolve to combat corruption, prosecute offenders and provide wider economic opportunities, but the process may take longer, the top US diplomat in the country said yesterday.

"[An upgrade] is possible if there is no corruption, there is successful prosecution, and the barriers to economic opportunity were provided," US Ambassador Harry K. Thomas, Jr. said in a chance interview yesterday after his opening speech in a round-table discussion on combating human trafficking in the Philippines held in Manila.

He noted that "the courts and legislators should work on certain gaps [in the trafficking law]" so that broader economic opportunities will shield Filipinos from becoming victims of trafficking.

"Sure, it [upgrade] will take time, we all understand," Mr. Thomas said.

In his speech, Mr. Thomas noted that some officials are involved in trafficking, making them "doubly guilty in betraying public trust."

Efforts have been achieved in addressing the problem, he said, but there is still room for improvement.

For her part, Maria Filomena D. Singh, presiding judge at Branch 85 of the Regional Trial Court of Quezon City noted an improving performance in anti-trafficking efforts.

She cited in her report of a lower 338 pending cases this year from 380 cases in 2010. Of the pending cases, 25 convictions were obtained this year, more than triple the eight convictions last year.

The Philippines was upgraded to Tier 2 from Tier 2 watch list in the latest Trafficking in Persons report of the US State Department released in June, with significant achievements made in curbing the crime. Tier 1 means that the country is fully compliant of US standards.

The upgrade also allowed the Philippines to continue availing of non-humanitarian and non-trade foreign assistance of about $700 million. In addition, the US will not oppose assistance for the Philippines from international financial institutions.

The Philippine government has strengthened its fight against human trafficking amid the statement made by United States Ambassador Harry Thomas Jr. that four out of 10 foreign male tourists visit the country for sex, a senior government official said on Friday.

"If you remember, we have strengthened our fight against trafficking of women and children," Deputy Presidential Spokesperson Abigail Valte.

She said that one proof was the removal this year of the Philippines on the Tier 2 Watchlist of the U.S. State Department Trafficking in Persons.

She said the U.S. acknowledged the "significant efforts" of the Aquino administration in the past year to combat human trafficking.

Valte added that if foreigners would visit the country, they should come here "for the right reasons."

"The Philippines is a beautiful county, although we would like to see the number of tourist arrivals increased, we would want our tourist friends to come here for right reasons," she said.

CQ Congressional Testimony

September 22, 2011 Thursday

CHINA'S ONE-CHILD POLICY; COMMITTEE: HOUSE FOREIGN AFFAIRS;
SUBCOMMITTEE: AFRICA, GLOBAL HEALTH, AND HUMAN RIGHTS

SECTION: CAPITOL HILL HEARING TESTIMONY

LENGTH: 1802 words

TESTIMONY-BY: REGGIE LITTLEJOHN, PRESIDENT

AFFILIATION: WOMEN'S RIGHTS WITHOUT FRONTIERS

Statement of Reggie Littlejohn President Women's Rights Without Frontiers

Committee on House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Africa, Global Health, and Human Rights

September 22, 2011

Honorable members of the Sub-Committee, ladies and gentlemen, I am grateful for this opportunity to testify here today. During a sensitive time in engaging the People's Republic of China (PRC) on human rights issues, I am truly moved by continuing concern of those present for the suffering of the people of China. I have been asked to brief the Sub-Committee on the findings of our new report, to testify regarding the impact of the coercive enforcement of China's One Child Policy on human rights, and to comment on the case of Chen Guangcheng.

New Report on the One Child Policy

Women's Rights Without Frontiers released our new report today -- "China's One Child Policy: New Evidence of Coercion - Forced Abortion, Sterilization, Contraception, and the practice of Implication." In this report are thirteen new, documented cases of coercion: forced abortion (including one woman at eight months and another carrying twins at 8 1/2 months), forced sterilization, forced contraception, the use of abortion and sterilization quotas, Family Planning Police, Family Planning jail cells, the demolition of homes (even by relatives, for missing a pregnancy check), the use of "implication" (detention, torture and fining of relatives of "violators"). The report contains accounts of a couple brutally tortured for missing a pregnancy check by one day; a man whose head was smashed open and who is now permanently disabled because his wife had a second child; a father who was beaten to death because his son was suspected of having a second child.

We have chosen to release the names of the perpetrators of these Crimes Against Humanity, so that they can be held accountable before the world. This report contains dozens of their names, as well as details of their crimes. The "China Democracy Promotion Act of 2011," if passed, would enable the President to deny entry into the U.S. for Chinese nationals, such as these, who have "committed human rights abuses" against people in China, including anyone who "has participated in the imposition of . . . China's coercive birth limitation policy."

Human Rights Violations

In addition to forced abortion, gendercide, and female suicide, China's One Child Policy gives rise to several other serious human rights violations:

Human Trafficking and Sexual Slavery. Because of abortion, abandonment, and infanticide of baby girls, there are an estimated 37 million Chinese men who will never marry because they cannot find wives. This gender imbalance is a powerful, driving force behind trafficking in women and sexual slavery from nations surrounding China. According to the 2011 Trafficking in Person (TIP) Report, China is on the Tier 2 Watch List: a source, destination and transit country for trafficked people. "Women and children from neighboring countries including Burma, Vietnam, Laos, Mongolia, Russia, and North Korea, and from locations as far as Romania and Zimbabwe are reportedly trafficked to China for commercial sexual exploitation and forced labor."ⁱ Women's Rights Without Frontiers has a petition against forced abortion and sexual slavery in China. We now have more than 9,000 signatures from 80 nations around the world - a truly international outcry.

Infanticide. Last year, crematorium workers in Guangdong Province found an infant crying in a "medical waste" receptacle on its way to being cremated, reports Xinhua, China's official news agency. The crematorium workers immediately sent the infant back to the hospital. Later that day, the hospital sent the infant back to the crematorium, dead. The hospital offered no explanation of the cause of death.ⁱⁱⁱ Xinhua reported that 21 bodies of fetuses and babies were found discarded in a river in East China. Xinhua News stated, "the bodies may have been dumped by cleaners from local hospitals after abortions and induced labor. Such dead bodies are treated as 'medical waste' by hospitals."

Forced Sterilization. As in Case One of our new report, women are literally dragged off the street, strapped down to tables and forcibly sterilized. According to the London Times, Family Planning Authorities have detained 1300 people in a campaign to sterilize nearly 10,000 people in Puning City, Guangdong Province.^v

The twenty-day campaign, launched April 7, is well along in achieving its goal of 9,559 sterilizations. "A doctor in Daba village said that his team was working flat out, beginning sterilizations every day at 8 am and working straight through until 4 am the following day." What's the hurry? Officials in Puning may fail in their bid for promotion to a second tier county "if they cannot meet all quotas," according to The London Times.

"Implication." Case Six of WRWF's new report describes the practice of "Implication," which means that if anyone breaks the family planning policy, their entire extended family is held responsible. Parents, grandparents, siblings, aunts and uncles, cousins, nieces and nephews can be detained, fined and tortured. In an area of Fujian Province in 2008, the extended family of a Family Planning "violation" were seized and forced to attend a "Family Planning Learning Class," where they were tortured and then charged "tuition."

Violence Against Men. The practice of implication causes violence not only against women, but also against men. Case Seven of our report gives the account of a couple with a second child in Henan Province. Family planning police smashed the father in the head with a bottle. He is now permanently disabled. In Case Twelve, in Jiangsu Province, Family Planning Officials beat a farmer to death because his son was suspected of having an extra child. Recently, in Linyi County, Shandong Province, near where Chen Guangcheng lives, a Family Planning Official murdered a man. They had come to seize his sister for a forced sterilization. Failing to find her, they started to beat their father. When the man defended his father, one of the Officials plunged a knife in his heart, and he died.^{vi}

Most often, Family Planning Officials are not prosecuted for their crimes, but act with impunity. The spirit of the Red Guard lives on in the Family Planning Police. Despite overwhelming evidence to the contrary,^{vii} in January of this year, President Hu Jintao denied to Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen that China has a forced abortion policy.^{viii} Moreover, China has stated that it will continue its One Child Policy for "decades" to come.^{ix}

Chen Guangcheng

Blind activist Chen Guangcheng was arrested in 2006 for helping to expose the Chinese government's use of forced sterilization and abortions to enforce its "One Child Policy." He amassed evidence that 130,000 forced abortions and involuntary sterilizations were performed on women in Linyi County, Shandong Province in a single year. Time Magazine named him one of "2006's Top 100 People Who Shape Our World" and he was given the 2007 Magsaysay award, known as Asia's Nobel Prize.

Chen spent four years, three months in prison. His defense lawyers were detained on the eve of trial. After his September 2010 release, he continues to serve a sentence of home detention. Both in prison and under house arrest, Chen experienced mistreatment and beatings. He suffers from a chronic, debilitating intestinal illness for which he has been denied treatment.

According to a February, 2011 video testimony provided by Chen smuggled out of China, 66 security police surround his home constantly. He and his wife are not allowed sufficient food and are isolated from all outside contact. No one can enter or leave their home, except officials, who can enter at any time, without notice. After the video's release, Chen and his wife were severely beaten,^x and lawyers who organized to help him were detained, beaten, and disappeared, including prominent lawyers Jiang Tianyong and Teng Biao. Foreign journalists who tried to visit Chen have been physically barred from entering his village. A CNN report showed unidentified security officers pushing a journalist and throwing rocks at him to prevent him from entering Chen's village.

The letter written by Chen's wife on June 15, 2011 indicates the need for urgent and immediate action to help Chen Guancheng and his wife Yuan Weijing. We have received evidence that blind activist Chen Guangcheng's health is in serious jeopardy because of repeated beatings and the malnutrition he suffers in house detention. According to a letter written by Chen's wife, and smuggled out of China, Chen faces constant physical and psychological abuse, does not get sufficient food or nourishment, and is denied proper medical treatment. Foreign journalists have been forcibly denied access to him and lawyers who tried to help Chen were beaten and detained in February 2011.

Chen and his family will be transferred to a small prison built specifically for them, according to a Radio Free Asia report.^{xii} Activist He Peirong stated that the couple will be forcibly removed from their home and transferred to a building "which basically amounts to a jail" so that authorities can "keep tighter controls on them." Their young son, living with relatives, was reportedly stripsearched leaving the family home.

Just in the past week, a couple of human rights campaigners seeking to see Chen were beaten and detained.^{xiii} Earlier this month, police detained Chen's brother, who was meeting with activists.^{xiv} Chen's six year old daughter was denied the right to an education.^{xv} Women's Rights Without Frontiers and the China Aid Association are spearheading an international effort to free Chen Guangcheng. Thus far, we have collected 5161 signatures from 28 countries.

WRWF congratulates Rep. Chris Smith on his successful sponsorship last July of an amendment to the State Department Appropriation Bill, in support of Chen Guangcheng and his family. This amendment, which passed unanimously, urges the Chinese government to stop harassing the Chen family, to release them from house arrest, and to arrange for immediate medical treatment. It further urges the Obama administration to arrange diplomatic visits to the Chen family. Beyond this, it highlights the tragedy of forced abortion and coercive family planning in China. This amendment comes just in time, as Chen's health is frail and deteriorating rapidly.

Conclusion

In China, a woman's body is not her own. It belongs to the state. A woman's womb is the most intimate part of her body - physically, emotionally and spiritually. For the Chinese Communist Party to act as "womb police" and crush the life inside her is a heinous crime against humanity.

A heightened focus on forced labour

BYLINE: Santha Oorjitham

LENGTH: 1030 words

AMENDMENTS to anti-trafficking legislation last year, and steps since then, are helping to crack down on labour trafficking, experts tell SANTHA OORJITHAM.

MUMTAZ (not her real name) was recruited in Bangladesh by an agent for a Malaysian outsourcing company.

"I paid him RM10,000 in recruitment fees, to cover his costs and my work permit for the first year," she recalls.

Another agent from the same company met her at the Kuala Lumpur International Airport in Sepang.

"He kept my passport and will only give it to me when I go back."

And although Mumtaz wanted to return when she became ill, she was forced to complete three years or forfeit the RM10,000.

Tenaganita's Irene Fernandez classifies this as forced labour. For many outsourced workers "there are elements of threat", says the executive director of the non-government organisation promoting the rights of women, migrants and refugees.

For example, their passports may be withheld, they may be under debt bondage and they may be threatened with detention.

According to the 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report, "the Home Ministry reported investigating the 277 outsourcing companies that recruit foreign workers and placed 42 on a watchlist for engaging in suspicious activities, such as use of falsified documents or listing false employers".

The report in June claimed that "many Malaysian labour outsourcing companies recruit excess workers from Bangladesh, Vietnam and other countries, who are then often held in warehouses or other locations and handed over to unscrupulous employers, who subject them to conditions of forced labour".

The Immigration Department sent a report to the US State Department clarifying the issues.

"Actually, the issue arose due to management problems, and not an excessive workforce. So, the related agencies should tackle the problem appropriately and not put the blame solely on the Immigration Department and Home Ministry," director-general of Immigration Datuk Alias Ahmad said recently.

Since the Anti-Trafficking in Persons and Anti-Smuggling of Migrants Act was enforced in 2008, 709 foreign men were given protection orders. Most of them are believed to be victims of labour trafficking.

In November last year, the law was amended to broaden the definition of trafficking to include all actions involved in acquiring or maintaining a person's labour or services through coercion.

And labour officers from the Human Resources Ministry were included as enforcement officers for human trafficking offences.

"That is a very constructive step," says a United States embassy official.

"It provides heightened focus on forced labour as a form of human trafficking. In addition, it could encourage prosecution of forced labour cases under the act."

The Human Resources Ministry now heads the Special Committee on Labour Trafficking, while its Department of Labour has set up an Anti-Trafficking in Persons and Anti-Smuggling of Migrants Unit.

The unit's officers will enforce the law and prosecute offenders. Some of them will be sent for training and capacity-building.

Forced labour could account for about three-quarters of trafficking cases reckons Daniel Lo, the country manager for the Coalition to Abolish Modern-Day Slavery in Asia (which includes Tenaganita). Fernandez estimates that 80 per cent of forced labour cases come in through outsourcing.

Like Mumtaz, they may arrive already in debt.

"Sometimes, when they are picked up at the airport, their phones are confiscated," says Lo.

"Sometimes all their documents are taken from them. They can't contact anyone and don't know the language. They are brought to a location that is often isolated, and moved to different locations to keep them away from other workers."

And there may be "contract substitution". In Bangladesh, Mumtaz was told she would be working in a factory and would earn RM1,000 monthly. But her local contract provided a basic salary of RM481.

At first, she tested equipment at an electronics factory in Bangi. She worked 7am to 7pm, six days a week -- for RM700 to 800 per month.

After that, Mumtaz was unemployed and unpaid for two months. Then she was sent out as a cleaner, working 9am to 6pm for the same salary.

Her work permit expired last year and she risks being detained as an undocumented illegal immigrant. For the past 11/2 months, her salary has been withheld.

"The law is not in coherence with changes in recruitment and placement," says Fernandez.

For example, Tenaganita is handling one case where an outsourcing company moved more than 30 workers from Ampang, where it was registered, to Klang, Port Dickson and to seven other places.

"We filed a complaint in the Ampang Labour Court but they told us we had to file it in 10 different places."

In February this year, a lawyer alleged on his blog that outsourced workers at a factory had suffered unlawful salary deductions and were threatened with deportation.

As part of a court settlement, he had to take out advertisements in two newspapers recently, formally apologising and recognising that "there is no written employment contract" between the company and the workers and the company had "no contractual obligations" to them.

"It is crucial that the principal employer and outsourcing company are equally responsible for violations," says Fernandez.

"Globally there are moves towards making the whole supply chain accountable. But that was not seen in the recent case."

However, some companies are working with Tenaganita to change their recruitment policy. Sime Darby, for example, began recruiting its own plantation workers several years ago.

"Prospective workers are more willing to deal with employers directly, as it eliminates any risk of them being duped by unscrupulous parties both sides of the border," explains Franki Anthony Dass, managing director of Sime Darby Plantation Sdn Bhd.

"The security and transparency of the deal is a major plus. For example, they do not have to pay anything up front, and their only commitment is the duration of the contract."

Sime Darby is the world's largest plantation company and, as Fernandez points out, "If Sime Darby can do direct recruitment for its plantations, all others could take the same initiative."

Hearing of the Africa, Global Health, and Human Rights Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee Subject: "Human Rights in North Korea: Challenges and Opportunities" Chaired By: Representative Christopher Smith (R-NJ) Witnesses: Suzanne Scholte, President, Defense Forum Foundation; Kim Young Soon, Vice President, Committee for the Democratization of North Korea; Kim Hye Sook, Longest-Serving Survivor of North Korean Prison Camps; Greg Scarlatoiu, Executive Director, Committee for Human Rights in North Korea Location: 2172 Rayburn House Office Building, Washington, D.C. Time: 3:00 p.m. EDT Date: Tuesday, September 20, 2011

REPRESENTATIVE CHRISTOPHER SMITH (R-NJ): (Sounds gavel.) The subcommittee will come to order and good afternoon to everybody. I want to thank you for joining us for this very important hearing to examine a country with one of the worst human rights record in the entire world.

The Democratic People's Republic of Korea is known to be the world's most isolated country as its citizens are prohibited from traveling either internally or internationally without express permission. Communications with the outside world are also tightly regulated and attempts by the dictatorship to filter all information accessible by the North Korean people. Therefore the testimony that would be provided today by our distinguished panel and in particular our two defector witnesses is particularly welcomed and appreciated.

Ms. Kim Young Soon and Ms. Kim Hye Sook who both have survived the extreme deprivations of the North Korean prison camps have traveled all the way from South Korea to share their experiences with our subcommittee. On behalf of the subcommittee, I want to thank them and wish -- and convey to them our sincerest gratitude.

I also want to thank Suzanne Scholte for her extraordinary work over these many years. This is -- I've chaired actually several hearings on North Korean human rights and in every one of those hearings she has played a critical part in helping us to get the witnesses to tell the true unvarnished story of what is actually happening in North Korea.

Our two witnesses will tell the story, and they will be speaking on behalf of an estimated 150,000 to 200,000 prisoners currently held in North Korean labor camps. It is our hope that their testimony will help to galvanize the international community to take action to secure the freedom of those who are needlessly suffering and dying under truly horrific conditions.

Those living in this prison camps are not only -- are not the only ones suffering in North Korea. As one of our witnesses, again Suzanne Scholte will testify in North Korea every single human right as enshrined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights is violated and it is often violated with absolute impunity.

North Korea is listed by the State Department as a tier III country with respect to human trafficking. In other words they are egregious violators of modern day slavery, buying and selling women and others as a commodity. It was just -- North Korea was also just designated this month as one of eight countries of particular concern for its violations of religious freedom.

But not all the testimony during this hearing will be bleak, although much of it will be. We will hear about new -- the new potential for communication to and with North Korean people and explore possibilities for peaceful change given upcoming political events in North Korea and changes in other countries in the region. We look forward to discussing this potential to improve the lives of all people living in North Korea.

I'd like to now introduce our very distinguished panel and again thank all of you for being here today. I also want to thank C-SPAN for being here, for taking this information and conveying it to the American people. North Korea, because it is so closed, very often evades all scrutiny. So people know about it, but don't know very much. Your testimony again will help to shatter that lackadaisical sense of what Americans know and think about North Korea. So thank you again.

We'll begin with Ms. Suzanne Scholte who is the president of the Defense Forum Foundation and is a leader of several groups focused on protecting human rights in North Korea. She was recognized in 2010 with the Walter Judd Freedom Award and in 2008 with the Seoul Peace Prize.

Ms. Scholte has helped rescue hundreds of North Korean refugees and facilitated the travel of defectors to speak in the United States. She has participated in numerous congressional hearings on North Korea on a wide range of topics including political prison camps, trafficking of North Korean women, religious persecution and North Korean refugees in China.

I would note parenthetically that when we held a hearing on trafficked women, some of the, what they thought were, lucky women who got out of North Korea into China, Ms. Scholte actually brought to this committee women who -- one woman who went after her daughter who made her way into China only to be sold into slavery and then she and her daughter who went looking to rescue the trafficked women were themselves sold into sexual slavery.

We'll then hear from Ms. Kim Young Soon, Committee for the Democratization of North Korea. And she was a dancer and an actress in the North Korean Army. She was arrested in 1970 and sent to the Yodok political prison camp with members of her family. Her parents and eldest son died in the camp and her husband and youngest son later died trying to escape North Korea.

Ms. Kim eventually escaped and has dedicated her life to exposing the truth about the hideous prison camps in North Korea by sharing her story around the globe. She is an outspoken defector serving as the vice president of the committee, the Democratization of North Korea and other human rights advocacy groups.

We'll then hear from Ms. Kim Hye Sook who is a survivor of nearly three decades in Bukchang political prison camp. She and her family were imprisoned by guilt by association because of her grandfather's defection to South Korea. She was just 13 years old. Ms. Kim regularly witnessed executions and abuse and endured manual labor, constant hunger and the deaths of several family members.

Once released she fled to China, but was forced to return to North Korea by her employer where she was arrested again. When she escaped, she returned to China but was sold by human traffickers again like the other witnesses we've had before this committee. She eventually escaped to South Korea and continues to tell her story around the world. Earlier this year she published her memoirs in a book entitled "A Concentration Camp Retold in Tears."

We'll then hear from Mr. Greg Scarlatoiu, Committee for Human Rights in North Korea. Mr. Scarlatoiu is the executive director of the Committee for Human Rights in North Korea, which was established to focus world attention on human rights abuses in North Korea and to offer creative solutions.

Born and raised in Romania he was a Bucharest University freshman when he witnessed the fall of communism in Eastern Europe, Nicolae Ceausescu's barbaric regime. He lived in South Korea for 10 years and has authored in English and Korean language articles on the applicability of the Eastern European experience to North Korea context as well as a weekly Korean language broadcast into North Korea by Radio Free Asia. We welcome his as well.

I'd like to yield to my friend and colleague, Mr. Payne, for any opening comments he might have.

REPRESENTATIVE DONALD PAYNE (D-NJ): Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, for calling this very important hearing, and I'd like to certainly express my appreciation to the witnesses here who have agreed to testify. Each of your stories help us to better understand the extent and magnitude of the human rights abuses of North Korea and your guidance will help us to target our efforts in alleviating some of these terrible injustices.

The human rights violations in North Korea are among the worst in the world. Under Kim Jong-Il's regime, North Korean citizens regularly face extra judiciary killings and detentions for basic political expression, seemingly ordinary market activities or unauthorized domestic travel.

North Korea doesn't seem to even need to violate the regime's rules themselves since they can be penalized for even the actions not of themselves but actually of their families, which is certainly unfair and unjust. While many of us cannot imagine a more stifling human rights environment, according to some observers the conditions are worsening due to the preparation for Jong-Il's son Kim Jong-Un to take over.

In 2004, Congress passed a North Korean human rights act authorizing funds towards human rights efforts and improving the flow of information to North Korea. Currently, this amounts to $2 million annually for human rights and democracy, 2 million (dollars) for freedom of information programs and 20 million (dollars) to assist North Korean refugees.

I'm interested in hearing from the panelists, if you have expertise in that area, about the abuse on how proposed cuts to our international affairs budget would impact our ability to adequately continue to fund these programs that have been successful in getting information to-date. Although it's not in the realm of your testimonies necessarily, I was very disturbed at the behavior of the North Korean leadership in November of 2010 when it attacked South Korea's island of Yeonpyeong with artillery shells killing several people.

This irresponsible behavior of government really is unwarranted and really needs to have continued watching and scrutinizing as to their behavior, also their continued adventurism into ballistic missiles and other weapons of war certainly disturb us. So I certainly look forward to your testimonies and thank you again for your willingness to share them. And I yield back the balance of my time.

REP. SMITH: Thank you very much. Would either of my other colleagues -- (off mic)? I'd like to now then yield the floor for such time as she may consume to Ms. Scholte.

Hello, let me just before you start, make a point. We also invited Ambassador-at-Large King who could not be here because he's out of the country. He wanted to be here and said very clearly he would gladly come and testify at a later date. And he also wanted to provide the subcommittee with a closed briefing as well on recent events including the human rights situation in North Korea. Bob King, as my colleague knows so well, especially Mr. Payne, was the chief of staff for the Foreign Affairs Committee and a very good choice for ambassador. So we look forward to hearing from him as well.

So Ms. Scholte.

SUZANNE SCHOLTE: Well, first of all I just want to thank Congressman Smith for your many years of devotion on the North Korea human rights issues and I want to thank Congressman Payne as well. It's been a honor and pleasure to work with your staff on our shared love for the Sahrawi people of Western Sahara, another divided country that's trying to get their freedom through self-determination.

I want to give two main points at this hearing today. First of all, North Korea continues to be one of the darkest places on earth, yet we fail to focus on the main issue, which is the human rights issues because we've instead focused on the nuclear issue, and this has had tragic results.

Second, despite this ongoing tragedy, there is hope because of changes that are happening in that country. But if we fail to enact the policies that address the human rights conditions and empower those who can bring about change, then we will certainly end up just prolonging this regime.

While we witness people rising up in North Africa and the Middle East, we wonder why did North Koreans who are arguably the most persecuted people in the world not rise up. It is precisely because they are the most persecuted in the world. North Koreans are the only people in the world that do not enjoy one single human rights that's enshrined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, a document, ironically, that was adopted in 1948, the same year that Kim Il-sung came to power.

This declaration was in response to the atrocities committed by the Axis powers during World War II. When the Nazi death camps were liberated by the allied forces during that war, the international community vowed never again, never again, would we allow these kinds of atrocities to occur. But the political prison camps in North Korea have existed longer than the Soviet gulag, longer than the Chinese laogai, and longer than the Nazi death camps.

Your two defector witnesses today are living proof of the horrors of these camps as well as the length of their existence. One was imprisoned in Yodok in the 1970s while another was imprisoned for 28 years up to the beginning of this decade in Bukchang. We have seen millions of North Koreans starve to death despite billions of economic assistance.

And North Koreans are not the only ones who suffer from Kim Jong-Il's dictatorship, but South Korean POWs are still being held in North Korea today. Well, at 108,308 captives are being held in North Korea, including 80,000 abductees in South Korea and hundreds of others in 13 countries as recently documented by the committee for human rights in North Korea.

Former presidents Bill Clinton and George Bush made human rights a second theory issue with a hope of engaging North Korea to give up their nuclear ambitions. We see the failure of these efforts as North Korea has realized its nuclear ambitions and its proliferation activity continue. Kim Jong-Il may be an evil dictator, but he has brilliantly manipulated the good intentions of both America and South Korea.

My second point, there is hope because things are changing in North Korea. Despite Kim Jong-Il's best efforts to literally keep North Koreans in the dark, up to 60 percent of North Koreans have access to some form of information beyond the regime's propaganda. They are increasingly learning that the source of their misery is not America or South Korea as they are brainwashed from childhood to believe, but the source of their misery is in fact the Kim Jong-Il and his regime.

North Korean defectors are sending remittances to their families helping demonstrate the prosperity in South Korea. North Korea now has a cell phone system with 500,000 subscribers. And although you cannot call directly from South Korea, defectors pay brokers in China to contact their families.

We also see that defectors themselves getting information into North Korea from DVDs, VCDs, USBs and flash drives through China and other creative means such as balloon launches. North Koreans, especially the elites, are keeping up with South Korean soap operas and watching many South Korean as well as Western films. Therefore, it's more important than ever to raise the human rights concerns so that they know our concerns are for them.

For example, it was a brilliant action by the Obama administration to include special envoy for North Korea human rights ambassador Robert King and the delegations that went to North Korea to assess the food situation. This underscored the fact that the human rights conditions in North Korea that are causing the starvation.

Furthermore, North Koreans are no longer dependent on Kim Jong-Il's regime to survive as over 200 private markets are functioning and the regime has given up trying to control them. This capitalism is saving them from experiencing the same level of starvation that led to the deaths of millions during the famine.

Kim Jong-Il's unprovoked attacks on South Korea, as Congressman Payne just mentioned, have awakened South Koreans to the truth that we must not ignore the human rights of North Koreans for the false promise of this regime to end its nuclear program. To take advantage of these changes, governments, nongovernmental organizations and individuals first of all should make human rights central to all negotiations with or about North Korea.

Second, we should only provide food when relief organizations can stay and monitor to the point of consumption. Otherwise, it will most assuredly be diverted to maintain the regime that is causing the starvation in the first place.

Third, we need to continue to support radio broadcasting, especially programs like Radio Free Asia and Voice of America and the independent radio broadcasters like Free North Korea Radio, a defector led station in Seoul.

Fourth, we need to empower the defector organizations that are using creative methods to get information into North Korea like Fighters for a Free North Korea and the North Korea People's Liberation Front.

Five, we must convince the Chinese to end their brutal policy of forced repatriation for North Korean refugees which is prolonging this crisis by giving Kim Jong-Il a reason to resist any reforms that would improve the situation in that country so that North Koreans do not want to risk their lives trying to flee.

Six, we should support the 12 North Korean defector churches. For example, I've been working to try to connect churches here in the United States with these defector churches that have been formed in South Korea.

Seven, we need to put the elites in the regime. I noticed that they will be held accountable for their crimes against the North Korean people. Last week, a North Korean assassin was caught. His mission was to kill Park Sang Hak, who heads Fighters for a Free North Korea. Park Sang Hak is the one who's been doing the balloon launches, sending in information. Both Park and Kim Seong Min who leads Free North Korea Radio who is here at this hearing have been regularly targeted by assassins sent by Kim Jong-Il. What this tells us is that what they are doing is the most effective work.

At the end of 2009, Free North Korea Radio started Voice from the People. These were actual interviews from inside the country that they broadcast back in. Supporting this flow of information through radio broadcasting, especially by North Korea defectors, is the most effective way to reach the people because the Internet is only available to the elite and their regime.

Recently the North Korea People's Liberation Front was formed by former North Korean military including officers, special forces, cyberwarfare experts and propaganda specialists. This is significant because the only time there was organized opposition against the regime was from the military who had studied in the Soviet Union and came back to North Korea wanting reform.

Although they were eventually discovered, they operated against the regime from 1989 until 1994. Because all North Korean males must serve for 10 years and the elite are exempt from service, this means that the North Korean military truly represents the people. We saw the army in Romania turn against Kim Il-Sung and Kim Jong-Il good friend Nicolae Ceausescu when the people of that country rose up against their dictator.

Right now the elites in power have absolutely no incentive to oppose Kim Jong-Il because their entire lives are based on the successful transfer of power to Kim Jong-Il. We must assure them that they would have a stake in the future if North Korea opens up to reform. Because North Koreans are citizens under South Korea, under the Korean Constitution, South Korea has an important role to play and that they should convene a tribunal of respected judges to begin the prosecution of those in the regime responsible for the political prison camps and these other atrocities.

There are 23,000 eye witnesses now and we should start naming the names of those who are committing these crimes. When North Korea finally opens up, I believe we will be even more horrified at the atrocities that the Kim regimes have committed against the North Korean people that today are beyond our imagination. We will face the same questions that the world faced when the allies liberated the Nazi death camps. What did you know and what did you do to help stop our tragic circumstances. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

REP. SMITH: Ms. Scholte, thank you very much for your testimony and for your leadership all those years and for all these years and for that very incisive testimony. We'll now hear from Ms. Kim Young Soon.

KIM YOUNG SOON: (Through interpreter.) Hello, my name is Kim Young Soon, author of "I Was a Friend of Sung Hye Rim." I'm a North Korean defector and a survivor of North Korean political prison camp Yodok, camp number 15.

First of all, I want to thank the members of the United States Congress and related officials of the Congress for giving me a chance to speak at this important venue. I also would like to thank Ms. Suzanne Scholte of the Defense Forum Foundation for her years of friendship and for listening to my story of the North Korean political prison camp experience.

Camp number 15, Yodok, where I was incarcerated is now well known throughout the world. Yodok political prison camp was created in July of 1969 under orders of Kim Il-sung in Yodok-gun, South Hamgyong Province, in a region known for its rough and mountainous features. It is here that for 30 years people who have incurred the wrath of Kim Il-Sung and Kim Jong-Il have been sent for the crime of being a political prisoner and where they have died silent deaths.

I wrote of my time at Yodok into a book and titled it "I was a Friend of Sung Hye Rim." Sung Hye Rim was at one point in my life my friend and also the hidden mistress of Kim Jong-Il, and anyone who knew the secret in North Korea were either executed or sent to political prison camps, and I became a victim of this myself and was therefore sent to Yodok. I want to tell the world about what happened to me and also tell the world about the reality of the North Korean political prison camp system.

The Workers' Party's establishment of the One Thought principle was instituted whereby the citizens were sent to prison camps for total isolation from the general public, general society for the following crimes; the crime of defaming the authority and prestige of Kim Il-Sung and Kim Jong-Il, the crime of knowledge about the private life of Kim Jong-Il and leaking information about it to the general public, thus defaming the prestige of the great leader. When I was sent to the prison camp I had no knowledge about these facts.

The following are the political crimes that I came to know of after I was incarcerated in the Yodok prison camp; the crime of talking about the cyst or lump on Kim Il-Sung's neck, for the crime of unwittingly damaging or soiling the statue or portrait of Kim Il-Sung, the crime of knowing about the private life of Kim Jong-Il, for example, knowing about Sung Hye Rim being the secret mistress of Kim Jong-Il and disclosing this information to an outsider. The crime of revealing the birth of Kim Jong-Nam, the first-born son of Kim Jong- Il, the crime of listening to or viewing foreign radio or TV broadcast, the crime of questioning or criticizing the policy of the Workers' Party and the crime of expressing criticism or complaints about North Korean society.

I was a close friend -- I was close friends with Sung Hye Rim having gone to the same school with her from girls' high school to college. And one day I heard directly from her that she will be going to special residence number five. At that time those in the know, knew that special residence number five meant the residence of Kim Il- Sung and Kim Jong-Il.

At the time I was taken to the political prison camp I had no idea why I was being incarcerated and it was only in the summer of 1989, after I was released, did I found out the reason why from a state security agent in Tongyeong. The security agent said the following to me. Sung Hye Rim was not the wife of Kim Jong-Il nor did she bear him a son. These are all groundless rumors. If you mention anything about this again, you will not be forgiven.

I would like to talk briefly about my interrogation before I was sent to the political prison camp. On August 1st, 1970, I was forced into a car by state security agents and taken to a secret location where I was interrogated for two months by a unit called Unit 312, three-hundred and twelve, for preliminary investigation in a state security investigation room.

Under extreme fear for two months I was told to write my entire life story and to include everything and leave out nothing. So I wrote on and on. In my writing I confessed and wrote about Sung Hye Rim coming over to my house and telling me that she would be going to special residence number five and also admitted that people around me knew this information as well.

After the investigations were over on October 1, 1970, my entire family and I, seven people in total, were sent to Yodok political prison camp. The person who committed the crime was labeled the conspirator or ring leader while those taken along for yeon-jwa-je, Korean word for guilt-by-association, were labeled non-principal criminals and this was how the criminals in the prison camp were classified.

We woke up at 3:30 in the morning to go to work by 4:30 a.m., and the labor was from sun up until sun down. Meals had to be provided by ourselves through self-sufficiency. I saw countless prisoners contract the disease pellagra and suffer from diarrhea and die.

After work was finished, there were daily fight-for-ideology meetings for all the prisoners. Those who were unfortunate enough to be caught by security agents during these ideology meetings and sent away in shackles were never seen again. The forced manual labor was beyond anyone's imagination. And in case of falling short of work goals, the whole group was punished. There were so many dead bodies that I saw there enough to fill up a field.

My three sons, one daughter, father and mother died from starvation. There were no coffins. So their bodies were rolled in a straw mat and buried. One of my sons who was nine years old at the time drowned to death in Yongjuan River (ph), which is near the prison camp. My daughter was given away from adoption after our release so that she can have a better life. To this day, I do not know about her whereabouts, whether she is alive or dead. My youngest son was publicly executed by firing squad for trying to escape North Korea after his release and attempting to go to South Korea in 1993 at the age of 23.

My husband was sent to another political prison camp, a total and complete control zone in July 4, 1970, and to this day I do not know whether he is dead or alive. So from my original family of eight people, currently only two have survived and successfully escaped from North Korea, myself and another son. The rest of my family, six people, have all died.

My older brother who was the pillar of our family was a colonel in the North Korean Army during the Korean War serving the North Korean third infantry, and while on a mission for the division commander, he was killed in battle at the age of 25. Accordingly our family received favors for my brother's heroic acts and from Kim Il- Sung and we lived well until our family was sent to a political prison camp. And as a result of feeling betrayed, I escaped from North Korea.

Even after I was released from Yodok political prison camp, I was classified as an anti-regime reactionary and suffered under the monitoring by the state security apparatus. I escaped North Korea on February 1st, 2001, and entered South Korea in November of 2003.

In conclusion, I would just like to say that in the political prison camps in North Korea, it is a place where the prisoners will eat anything that flies, crawls or grows in the field. I wasted nine years of the prime of my life in that hell hole of a place where even animals would turn away -- turn their faces away. I lost all my family members and have lived a life of tears, of blood and extreme hardship. Please save the 23 million people in North Korea who are living a life of misery, not unlike what I have suffered.

Even though I'm now over 70 years old, I will fight for the freedom of my people, my countrymen until all my strength is expended. This is the reason why I have lived so far and I believe also my purpose. In that note, I want to deeply thank again the members of this committee for your interest in the human rights situation in North Korea, especially the political prison camps. Thank you.

REP. SMITH: Ms. Kim, thank you so much. The brutality that you yourself have suffered in the loss of your family members including your daughter who, as you said, was adopted obviously without your permission, you have no idea where she is. Your husband, you have no idea where he is, and the loss of your other family members, it just underscores the brutality of Kim Jong-Il and the fact that the West, the United States and any country that has any sense of compassion needs to speak out against this horrific abuse. And this should not be a second tier issue, the human rights abuses that are commonplace in North Korea. So we thank you for making us further aware of the extreme barbarity you have been made to endure and your family.

We will now hear from another Ms. Kim who has suffered three decades in the gulag and we look forward to hearing her testimony.

KIM HYE SOOK: (Through interpreter.) Hello, my name is Kim Hye Sook. I am a North Korean defector who was incarcerated in political prison camp number 18, Bukchang prison camp in Pukchang in South (Chungcheong ?) Province for 28 years. And in 2009, I escaped North Korea and entered South Korea via China, Laos and Thailand.

In February of 1975, for reasons that were unknown to me at that time, I was dragged with my parents to the prison camp. I was 13 years old at the time. During my incarceration at Camp number 18 I lost my grandmother, mother, brother and my husband.

I only found out after I was out of that hell on earth, Camp number 18, why I was sent to the prison camp, because my grandfather had defected to South Korea during the Korean War. But by then I had nowhere to go and complain about the situation. I would like to say that the term kwan-li-so in North Korea is a living hell for human beings, a place where people who have committed so-called crimes are sent and incarcerated as a group and forced to work in manual slave labor.

There are political prison camps where people who have been found guilty of being against Kim Il-Sung and Kim Jong-Il or those resisting the regime are sent and held, whereas in places like Camp number 18 where I was incarcerated in, besides political prisoners, those who are guilty of economic crimes are sent along with family members and are forced to work in coal mines.

In Camp number 18 in Pukchang where I was imprisoned, the whole prison camp was encircled by a 13-foot-high electrified fence and trying to escape through this over 3,000 volts of electrified fence was unimaginable. When I first entered the prison camp we were told to memorize 10 rules of the prison camp.

And I still remember it vividly because I remember them from such an early age. One of the rules was that the prisoners were not supposed to know the reason for ending up in the prison camp. And those caught violating this rule will be relentlessly executed by firing squad.

For young people like me who ended up in the prison camp at a young age, we were given very rudimentary education, basic Korean language education. And then when we turned 16 or 17 everyone without exception was sent to the coal mines to dig out coal and this goes without saying for the adults as well. We had to work 16 to 18-hour workdays without rest or holidays. And for food, our family of seven was provided only around 10 pounds of corn per month. And this was supplemented by gruel made from grass or anything that we picked up from the field, tree bark, grass and that's what we ate, one meal a day, corn and the mixed grass gruel that we had to make for ourselves.

REP. SMITH: Ms. Kim, if you could just suspend for one brief moment. We're joined by the chairman of the appropriations subcommittee that deals with justice issues and science, but is also the author of the International Religious Freedom Act of 1998. And as we all know North Korea is a Tier 3 country. It's Congressman Frank Wolf who cares deeply about human rights. But he can only stay brief minutes.

REPRESENTATIVE FRANK WOLF (R-VA): Thank you, Mr. Smith. I want to thank you and Mr. Payne and the committee for having this hearing.

I met with the witnesses earlier today. It was one of the most significant and moving testimony and reports that I have - I have ever heard. And I think certainly the State Department should do everything they can, quite frankly, to bring about regime change in North Korea.

When this government falls as it will fall the same way the East German government fell with regard to the Berlin Wall, the West will feel so guilty to know that it said nothing other than the hearings that the members here have had and said nothing with regard that takes place. This administration should do everything, and lastly -- and I'll end with this.

I think the church in the West, all religious faiths in the West should come together and support these people in every way they can to see about that the fact that hundreds of thousands are in these camps. It's totally unacceptable. So anyone within the voice, can hear this, can follow this hearing ought to be advocating this.

So I want again to thank you and Mr. Payne and the other members and thank the witnesses for coming by my office. I'm on my way to a 4 o'clock, but I was just moved to come by because what I heard was just so powerful. And with that, Mr. Chairman, I yield back. I thank you for your time.

REP. SMITH: Chairman Wolf, thank you very much.

Ms. Kim, if you could continue.

MS. HYE SOOK: And I was plagued with hunger from the day I entered the prison camp and until the day I was released. And my one wish was to just eat one bowl of white rice for one meal. And after I became an adult and during my times of working at the coal mine, walking to and from work, I would look around for anything to eat. And regardless of season it became a habit to scrape or pluck anything that was green and make soup and eat it whether it was from tree bark or from grass.

I cannot even begin to describe how many people suffered and died because of starvation in the prison camp and how many people were killed without reason for not listening to authorities or not showing enough repentance. So public execution by -- execution by firing squad through public execution by firing squad; their bodies were riddled with countless bullet holes and I saw countless bodies that ended up like this.

And there was a time when I saw the bodies of people who were killed by firing squad were rolled up in a straw mat and carried away in carts. And I said to myself even dogs will not die so pitifully.

In this place where human lives were worthless than those of flies, this was where my brother and husband died also. Their deaths were classified as due to accidents, but their deaths were intentional deaths carried out in the atmosphere of the prison camps where nothing was normal.

And as a result of working the coal mines for over 12 years, I contracted a black lung and faced death many times. But in place for my mother who passed away before me I vowed to survive and live on and look out after my siblings -- my remaining siblings. And that devotion was what allowed me to survive that hell.

And my siblings are still incarcerated at Camp number 18, my brother and sister. And in December of 1974 before our family was sent off to prison camp -- Camp number 18 my father was hauled away by the state security bureau never to be heard from again. And I do not know what happened to him to this day. And even at this moment as I speak there are over 10,000 -- 10,000 -- 20,000 people who are in Camp 18 without knowing the reason why, people who are dying from abuse and lack of rights at this very moment.

And this is not just happening in Camp number 18, but I would like to say that this is the suffering and sadness that 23 million North Korean citizens are going through and suffering -- experiencing right now. Not only that, but besides the human rights violations going on in North Korea, there's now the cruelty and misery inflicted on North Korean refugee women who have escaped North Korea into China through the terrible situation of human trafficking happening in different places.

After nearly escaping death and coming out of North Korea and into China and then becoming victims of human and sexual trafficking, I can say with authority that the tragic situation of the North Korean women must be told again, again in the international community. I myself was sold four different times in four different cities in China. And the inhumane and indescribable suffering that these women go through in China, being sold like commodity, still keeps me awake at night.

Please end the existence of such a society and make it into a place where humans can live as people. Please let the people without any rights in North Korea live in freedom and happiness. Please get rid of the political prison camps and please tell those who do not know about freedom what freedom is about.

I sincerely hope that my earnest pleas will be delivered to the United States Congress, to the United States government and to the people of America. I also want to deeply thank the honorable members of this committee, here today who have made possible for me to speak as well as to Ms. Suzanne Scholte of the Defense Forum Foundation. Thank you.

REP. SMITH: Ms. Kim, without a doubt your message has been heard and thank you for sharing what can only be described as enormous suffering that you've experienced, being sold into sexual slavery, the loss of family members and as -- so there will be positive consequences from your testimony. We will work hard to promote human rights in North Korea, I can assure you that.

Before going to Mr. Scarlatoiu, I would just note I have a bill on the floor right this minute; it's the combating -- the reauthorization of the Combating Autism Act of 2011, so I will leave briefly, but without objection, Mr. Payne has graciously said that he will take the committee.

MR. : I would just like to point out that -- Congressman -- (inaudible) -- say this.

REP. SMITH: Thanks Don.

MR. : This is the (map ?) that she drew of the camp she was in. Just --

REP. PAYNE: We'll now hear from our final witness.

MR. SCARLATOIU: Good afternoon, Mr. Payne and Ms. Bass. Thank you for inviting me to speak with you today about the human rights situation in North Korea, and about the apparent increase in the amount of information getting into that country. It is an honor and a privilege to have the opportunity to discuss these issues with you today.

Mr. Payne, I would like to begin by informing you that I will be presenting a brief summary of the views included in my prepared statement.

REP. PAYNE: Thank you. Without objection.

MR. SCARLATOIU: After the very emotional and comprehensive testimony by Ms. Scholte, after the heartbreaking testimony by Ms. Kim Young Soon and Ms. Kim Hye Sook, there's barely anything I can add on the human rights situation in North Korea. The human rights situation in North Korea remains abysmal.

According to experts and testimony by recent North Korean defectors, there is no evidence that the human rights situation in North Korea has improved as the Kim regime proceeds on steps towards leadership succession. On the contrary, it appears the border crackdown aimed at preventing North Koreans from defecting to China has intensified and the political prisoner camp population has been on the increase.

In May of this year, Amnesty International released satellite imagery and new testimony shedding light on the horrific conditions in North Korea's political prisoner camps. According to that organization, the prisoner population detained at such camps is up to 200,000 and a comparison of the latest satellite photos with satellite imagery from 2001 indicates a considerable increase in the scale of the camps.

Moving on to the flow of information getting into North Korea, although officially all personal radios must have a fixed dial and be registered with state security offices, programming by stations including Voice of America, Radio Free Asia, and broadcasters based in South Korea may have a listenership of around 30 percent in North Korea. The number of radios smuggled from China has been on the increase.

The North Korean authorities continue to attempt to jam foreign broadcasting, but face serious limitations in their efforts as jamming is energy-intensive and North Korea is experiencing endemic energy shortages. In recent years, we have found out that there has been a significant increase in the amount of information entering North Korea. This development is the result of the marketization that has taken place in that country.

Such marketization is by no means an intended top-down reform program, but rather a function of state failure. Small informal markets provide ordinary people a coping mechanism that enables them to survive. During the informal marketization of North Korea, supply chains have developed from China to North Korea's capital city of Pyongyang and .mp3 players, CD-ROMs, DVDs and thumb drives have been entering North Korea. Statistical data including a 2010 survey of North Korean refugees and travelers by the Broadcasting Board of Governors indicate that 27 percent of respondents have listened to foreign radio, 48 percent have come in contact with foreign DVDs and other video material, while 27 percent have watched foreign TV.

Information is also being passed from one member to the next along such supply chains. It appears that the Korean wave consisting of South Korean soap opera and music, exceptionally popular elsewhere in Asia and beyond has also reached North Korea. According to Japan's Asahi Shimbun one member of a group of nine North Koreans who recently sailed for five days before being picked up off the west coast of Japan one week ago on September the 13th, this gentleman, a squid fisherman said that he was inspired to leave his home by South Korean soap operas.

In January 2008, Egyptian company Orascom Telecom Holding was awarded a license to establish a 3G mobile network in North Korea. When launched in December 2008, Koreolink had 5,300 subscribers. In its half-year earnings report for January-June 2011, published on August the 10th, Orascom stated the number of subscribers in North Korea had reached 660,000.

Separate from the expansion of the Koreolink network, citizens of North Korea have also been using Chinese cellular phones smuggled across the border into North Korea. We have indication that Koreolink intends to launch 3G Internet service via Apple iPad in Pyongyang this fall by a special SIM card.

Nevertheless, Internet access is likely to continue to be restricted to foreign residents and those close to the Kim regime. There are also those North Koreans who possess computers not connected to the web, and they're estimated to represent about 3 percent of the entire population.

Based on data collected through interviews with North Korean defectors, and the proven track record of success in winning the ideological confrontation during the Cold War, radio broadcasting will continue to be one of the few media available to grant the people of North Korea access to information from the outside world. Computers not connected to the Internet, thumb drives, DVDs, CD-ROMs and MP3 players have become increasingly available although access to such devices is still relatively limited.

Efforts to increase the flow of information into North Korea should take into account the increasing availability of such vehicles. I wish to thank the subcommittee and its staff for the opportunity to testify before you today, and I would now be pleased to try to answer any questions that you might have. Thank you very much.

REP. PAYNE: Thank you very much. Let me once again thank each of the witnesses. Your testimony is certainly very compelling. We've -- of course, have heard and we try to keep up with the situation in North Korea, but it certainly brings it home when we have a hearing and to hear especially from individuals who have lived through the horrors of this regime. And of course we appreciate our experts from the Defense Forum Foundation and the Committee for Human Rights in North Korea.

Perhaps to either one of you who are working with organizations that deal with that, Ms. Scholte or Mr. Scarlatoiu -- hope I have that closely -- (inaudible) -- the special envoy for North Korea human rights, Ambassador Robert King, has said that the United States government would engage in an in-depth dialogue on human rights issues at the six-party talks.

The six-party talks are at an impasse and the absence of six-party talks, first of all, what do each of you feel that the six-party talks have achieved in the past, and whether there were any real gains forward, first of all, but secondly if indeed you feel that it's an impasse or there's really not a real effort on the part of North Korea, what other fora would the Obama administration consider employing for human rights dialogue with Pyongyang?

So whether talks pass and they've been going on for a bit through several administrations, and if they're scrapped, in absence of that, could there be anything else or should we continue with these? Could I ask each one of you if you'd like to comment.

MS. SCHOLTE: Well, first of all, I think that regarding the six-party talks, this is an effort by the Bush administration to rein in North Korea's nuclear ambitions. And they made the decision that they would just focus on the nuclear issue and not address any of the human rights concerns. They kicked the human rights concerns down the road.

We can tell by history that North Koreans are brilliant at manipulating the talks and using talks to gain aid and support, make promises they never intend to keep. They did the same thing to Bill Clinton during the Agreed Framework. And I think president -- former President Clinton can be excused for that because he was dealing with a new dictator when he was president.

But the Bush administration, I think, should have known better. They should have known the history of how these regime uses talks, and what we've seen during these talks, the result has been North Korea has developed nuclear weapons. It's very active in the proliferation of nuclear weapons and the -- exactly the purpose of these talks was never realized.

But at the same time, millions of North Koreans have died. And so, I think that talking with this regime is useless. They only use these talks to extract concessions and support and legitimize the regime. I think, instead, we need to take a new approach. I think that President Obama is in a unique position to do that. I think that we should make human rights the number one policy of our government.

I think that we should reach out to the North Korean people. I think that President Obama should be talking about the fact that -- I think we should say we want to give North Korea as much aid as they need so that the people are not starving, but we want to be able to see that it is consumed. I think we should be talking about the fact that we want to help the people, we want to improve conditions there.

We'd like to see the International Red Cross be able to go to the political prison camps. North Korea denies they have any camps. Well, fine, let's -- let an independent agency like the International Red Cross go to these camps. And I think that we need to be focusing on the human rights issues in our policy, but at the same time doing everything we can to support the kind of creative things that the defectors themselves are doing in radio broadcasting and these balloon launches, because the impact that Free North Korea Radio had, which went on to Internet broadcasting in 2004 and then went on to shortwave in 2006, the impact that Free North Korea Radio had was amazing.

It set the pace for all the broadcasters because it was the defectors themselves. And as you know, the South Koreans are raised to believe -- I'm sorry, North Koreans are raised to believe that South Korea and the United States caused the Korean War. I mean, they're brainwashed with stuff that we would think was completely ridiculous.

But they believe this. So when the North Koreans themselves are talking and broadcasting these views and these opinions into North Korea, North Koreans can't dismiss them. So it has had a tremendous impact. And I think we have to be doing everything we can to reach out with that message to the North Korean people and using the defectors especially.

REP. PAYNE: Yeah.

MR. SCARLATOIU: Mr. Payne, the main reason why nothing has been happening on the six-party talks front for a while now is that North Korea has refused to act as a responsible member of the international community. North Korea has continued to proceed with missile and nuclear developments. North Korea engaged in very serious provocations last year. In March, it launched a torpedo attack on the South Korean corvette, the Cheonan; 46 South Korean sailors were killed in that attack.

As it has already been mentioned, as you have already mentioned, on November the 23rd, North Korea shelled South Korean territory, the South Korean island of Yeonpyeong and this attack resulted in military and civilian casualties. We have already heard about assassins sent to kill Mr. Park Sang Hak, one of the very active North Korean defectors in South Korea a few weeks back. There were deep concerns about an alleged assassination plot targeting Mr. Kim Kwan-jin, the defense minister of South Korea.

And before that the most high-profile North Korean defector, Mr. Hwang Jang-Yop passed away last year, late last year. But only a few months before that we heard about a plot that was targeting him for assassination. That being said, North Korea has also continued to oppress its own people.

North Korea has continued to refuse to abide by the international obligations that it's supposed to abide by, given that it's a party to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, the international convention against all forms of discrimination against women, the international Convention on the Rights of the Child, and as a UN member state it's supposed to be bound by the UN Declaration on Human Rights.

As to whether human rights should be on the agenda it is the firm belief of the Committee for Human Rights in North Korea that human rights, the improvement of the human rights situation in North Korea should be at the top of our priorities, and personally, as I hope that one day we will see the complete irreversible and verifiable dismantlement of North Korea's nuclear program. I also hope that we will see the complete irreversible and verifiable dismantlement of North Korea's political prisoner camps as well.

REP. PAYNE: Thank you very much. Let me ask you, Ms. Kim Young Soon, or you Ms. Kim Hye Sook there is -- and I know that your experiences in North Korea was years ago and you have very compelling testimony, I'm just curious to know in your days as a young person, as a child, as a teenager, as an adult growing up, what type of society, what type of programs does the government impose on children? You know, it's supposed to be a time of life when people are happy, they're growing, they're learning.

What -- to your best recollection could you, if you can explain what is the life of a -- like for a young child and a young teenager, young adult growing up in North Korea today, if you can sort of transpose your experiences?

MS. YOUNG SOON: Congressman, in answer to your question, after the liberation from Japan in 1945 and until the '70s, North Korea was actually a little bit better -- was actually better than South Korea in terms of the economic situation. And as for myself, when I was young, I went to school and I attended the university, the Pyongyang University of Fine Arts and I majored in dance.

I learned under the teachings of a very well-known North Korean dancer, Che Si Hin (ph), and before I went to Yodok prison camp, I can say with assurance that I was very happy, that my happiness quotient so to speak was very high in terms of living in North Korean society.

REP. PAYNE: Thank you.

MS. HYE SOOK: Congressman, for -- in my case, before I was sent away to Bukchang prison camp, I had a life where I had no worries about food, about eating. I went to school. I lived a normal life. But because I was sent to prison camp at such an early age, that's all about -- that I can share about in terms of my experience in relation to your question.

REP. PAYNE: Thank you. One other question that I'm just curious about is we do know that in World War II there was the question of the Braupos (ph) that were created in Korea. And I wonder whether that was in the north of Korea or was that primarily in Korea itself, if anyone recalls?

As you may know, we're still working on a real apology from the government of Japan. There's been some apologies, but this has been an issue that has plagued the world since that time. And I wonder whether it was prevalent in -- throughout Korea?

MS. YOUNG SOON: My answer to you sir, is that before liberation in 1940 -- before the liberation in 1945, even in the northern part of the peninsula, in North Korea, there were instances or places where these (comfort ?) women stations or locations were based in North Korea. And I believe that even if this issue were to be addressed with the Japanese government, we would not be getting a satisfactory answer or a clear answer from the Japanese government, regarding your question, sir.

REP. PAYNE: Thank you. Thank you very much. I yield to the gentle lady from California.

REPRESENTATIVE KAREN BASS (D-CA): Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I actually would like to follow up on a question that Mr. Payne said to Ms. Soon and Ms. Sook about your childhood until you went into the camp. And Ms. Soon, you were -- you said up until the '70s, and I realize that's when you went into the camps, but did things drastically change in North Korea, and when?

MS. YOUNG SOON: To answer your question, Kim Il-Sung's propaganda was set in place in the -- between deliberation, years of deliberation, and until the Korean War, those years were known as the best years in terms of the affluence and the prosperity of North Korea. And after the Korean War, there were various economic plans that were instituted to try to help the economy and to help the people live better. But in 1987 -- in the late '80s, after the Soviet Union collapsed and after the help from that part of the region stopped, that's what brought on the change in terms of the economic downturn in the conditions for the people in North Korea.

REP. BASS: I see. First of all, let me also just thank you for coming and sharing your testimony. I think it's very, very important that people in this country hear and learn what's going on in North Korea because I don't think much is known here about what is happening there. And the pain and the suffering that you described, the loss of your family members, not knowing where your children are, your husband, you know, it's just -- I think it's an immeasurable amount of pain.

And I appreciate you taking the time and sharing that with us. I think it's especially important because the need for foreign aid and the need for assistance -- and I'm sorry, I don't want to mispronounce your name, Ms. Scholte, Scholte, when you talked about the need for there to be foreign assistance and food and all in times when we're talking about cutting back. So I think the message is critically important.

But Ms. Sook, you were saying that you thought that we shouldn't have discussions, negotiations with North Korea, but at the same time, we should do what we can to you know, deliver food and other things that the population would need. How do we do that? I understand the communication part, funding that, but how would we get aid to people, how would we -- to the people that need it? Ms. Soon could answer first. That'd be great. Ms. Soon or Ms. Sook.

MS. HYE SOOK: I would like to say that the role that's supporting North Korea is because they hear stories of people starving and suffering, but as a North Korean defector, I believe that the regime of North Korea should be completely isolated and that will -- that's the only way to change the regime. And unless North Korea adopts a market economy and changes drastically the way it -- the way the country's run, no -- nothing -- no change will come. And as a defector I would like to say that real help will be for Kim Jong-Il regime to be completely isolated and stop the aid that's being given to the regime.

REP. BASS: Weren't you going for something different?

MS. SCHOLTE: No, actually I agree except I was just making the point that if we're going -- I actually believe in a substantial amount of assistance, but only if we can state to the point of consumption, because if we're -- if the relief -- if we send any amount of assistance to North Korea, it will be diverted. And when you talk to defectors, they never saw any food aid. And when you talk to defectors that served in the military, they'll tell you the World Food Programme goes into town, delivers rice to these families.

Right after they leave, the army comes back and takes it all back. In fact there is Dr. Norbert Vollertsen who testified some years ago about how he'd gone to an orphanage and they handed out cookies, and the kids just there with the cookies waiting for somebody to come back and take it away. So the diversion has been absolute.

And because of that, I think that that's the kind of a message that we could send that would be a very powerful message for positive propaganda which is that we very much are concerned about the starvation and the political prisoner camps and the situation in North Korea. We want to help you. We hear about these stories, we want to help you.

But we want to be sure that we're actually helping the people and we're only going to give that aid if we know that we can stay there. Even from the very beginning when this -- when the famine first started, North Korea put such stipulations on the food aid. They actually didn't want -- I've never heard of this before, but -- I've never heard about this before, and challenge me on this, but I don't think of any situation where there was a country where there was starvation, where the country that was the intended recipient of the aid demanded that the aid deliverers couldn't speak their language.

I don't think that's ever happened any place but North Korea because usually if you're going into a country to deliver aid you're desperate for somebody who speaks the language. But that just speaks volumes about just from the very beginning of their intention to divert aid. So because of the difficulty of preventing from being diverted, that's why I said we should only provide aid if we can be there at the point of consumption.

If we're going to go into -- I can tell you all kinds of stories, but if we're going to go into an orphanage and deliver formula, we're going to make sure those babies get that formula because Action Against Hunger did that and that formula ended up in Pyongyang and the markets and those babies were given watered-down goat's milk when they showed up a month later to find out what happened to the tons of baby food they delivered to that orphanage.

Just one example, but I think that's -- and then the second point I was making is that we should be looking at creative ways to get in information, like radio broadcasting, but also the balloon launches and also to the North Koreans that are -- have defected that are sending in remittances into the country that are helping support their families.

REP. BASS: Thank you very much.

REP. PAYNE: Thank you, and the chairman has returned. I'll relinquish the chair back to him and hold any other questions I have till later time. Thank you.

Mr. Chairman.

REP. SMITH: I want to thank ranking member Payne for leading the committee. Again, I had to leave because a bill of mine on autism was on the floor, and it did pass thankfully.

Let me just ask a question if I could, with regards to a few years back in 2002, in May, I chaired a hearing on North Korean human rights, one of several, and we had Norbert Vollertsen, former medical doctor inside of North Korea who actually was given a huge award by the dictatorship for his medical expertise and the fact that he helped cure a whole lot of people. But he also then told the truth about the human rights situation and he said that they are using food as a weapon, talking about the dictatorship, against their own people. They are committing genocide and I think we have to care. As an international community, we have to intervene.

Ms. Scholte, would you say -- that was in 2002 that the international community, I heard in the opening comments that you had criticism that Bush did not focus on human rights, nor did Bill Clinton in North Korea. We did pass the human rights in North Korea act. I was one of the cosponsors of that. Jim Leach was the prime sponsor. It was an excellent bill. Mr. Payne, all of us strongly supported it.

Has that legislation lived up to its promise? Are we emphasizing human rights sufficiently in our dialogue or whatever it is of a dialogue with the North Koreans?

MS. SCHOLTE: I would say I've been actually very disappointed after all the hard work we did in getting the North Korean Human Rights Act passed. I've been disappointed in -- right from the very start the Bush administration said we welcome these tools that you're giving us to help on this issue, but then they never really used those tools.

It's -- the one thing it didn't help I know with radio broadcasting and expanding VOA and RFA support which was really I believe the result of that legislation was a huge -- was a huge -- one huge great thing, factor that happened with the radio broadcasting that's so important and also helping like Free North Korea Radio, some of the independent broadcasters.

The other thing though too is the special envoy position. I think it's very significant that President Obama has made it very clear that his special envoy Robert King will be part of all discussions and negotiations on North Korea. That was not the case during the Bush administration. Jay Lefkowitz was cut out. So I think that President Obama is taking greater -- (audio break).

MR. : (Audio break) -- would need the food aid the most. But it's only going to the -- at least to the military or to the security apparatus and feeding them and empowering them, only giving them more life, more power to continue the abuse that I drew in the drawings that you could see on display here.

MS. SCHOLTE: I was going to make -- I saw also the attitude in South Korea, right? You were asking also about the attitude in South Korea?

REP. SMITH: Yes, the South Korean -- just the young people. That's ---

MS. SCHOLTE: Yes. I definitely think they might want to have a comment about that.

REP. SMITH: It's almost like a sense of disbelief as to the scope --

MS. SCHOLTE: Yes.

REP. SMITH: -- and the cruelty of Kim Jong-Il.

MS. SCHOLTE: This is so important because --

REP. SMITH: And is it the media that has downplayed it? What is --

MS. SCHOLTE: This has been a -- yeah, that's a huge issue that's so important, because you would think that the country that should care the most has been the slowest to respond. The reason for that is during the years of the D.J. Kim government and the Roh government, they actually banned information to be reported about what's going on in North Korea because they had the Sunshine Policy, which is basically an engagement policy.

And the award winning documentary "Soul Train," which is still very popular today for example, that was done -- produced by some Americans about the refugee crisis in China and North Koreans escaping and the whole situation, that was banned from being shown in South Korea by the government.

So there was a suppression of the horrors that were going on. They can tell you stories about -- she wanted to speak before the South Korean assembly but she wasn't able to do it, Ms. Kim.

REP. SMITH: Really?

MS. SCHOLTE: And what's happened though is -- well, she was going to speak before the -- okay. And they could share that with you. But what happened is, with the provocations that have happened against South Korea by North Korea, unprovoked attacks, it's -- there's been an awakening in South Korea, and I'm very pleased to see a lot of young people getting drawn to this issue.

I've actually gone to a conference in 2002, an international conference on North Korean human rights in Seoul in which people like these defectors were going to speak and there were students protesting against the conference. And -- but that has changed a lot. You had -- young people are really getting drawn to the issue.

But it's been very difficult to move the hearts and soul of the Korean lawmakers. They still have not passed the North Korean Human Rights Act, which has been done by Japan and the United States bipartisan, and that's been a real source of contention and that the South Koreans --

REP. SMITH: You know, it brings to mind, after World War II it was Eisenhower who said, "Do not burn down the concentration camps because there were some Germans who were in disbelief that it was real." And it seems to me that when it's an actual policy of a government to suppress the truth, there was something inherently wrong with that because it creates a distortion, a gross caricature of what Pyongyang is actually doing. And I hope this hearing -- and it will be followed by additional hearings -- will further the information.

I mean, I was telling or in conversations conveying information about what I had read and what I had learned from hearings and from defectors that had -- and my friends who are South Koreans with whom I was meeting was met with disbelief, as if somehow I was exaggerating or engaging in some kind of hyperbole, when the truth on the ground as you have borne so ably witness to, is even worse than what we could imagine in terms of the cruelty and mistreatment. So I thank you for attending --

MS. SCHOLTE: I have something else I can assure you. In October, I was at a balloon launch and I was with Kim Sung-Min, Park Sang Hak, the North Korea Peoples Liberation Front. We were getting ready to do a balloon launch and there was a former North Korean defector who deserted the military. And he was so upset because there was these leftist South Koreans trying to stop the balloon launch, and saying -- they were pro-Kim Jong-II."

And he was so upset, I mean, he almost had tears in his eyes. And he was like, "I came from that country. How can they deny the horrible things that I've seen?" And I remember holding him and saying, "Well, we don't want to get into a confrontation with them."

And I said something like I know how you feel. And I thought, I don't know how he feels. The people -- that he could have gone through these horrible things and that -- and then have people like be denying it and trying to stop him from doing something to reach out to the people who are suffering.

REP. SMITH: Ms. Kim?

MS. HYE SOOK: Ms. Kim would just like add what you said, Congressman Smith, about the people in South Korea, the young people, to the politicians not fully knowing or understanding or appreciating the situation in North Korea. She wholeheartedly concurs with that statement. And because of the strong presence of the leftists and the pro-North Korean elements in South Korean society, Ms. Kim believes that the peninsula is not ready for unification.

South Korea is not ready to be unified with North Korea. And she would again like to ask for the United States to take the lead in increasing knowledge and awareness about the situation in North Korea and help lead other nations to be able to achieve this.

And there are 23,000 North Korean defectors resettled in South Korea and also there is a diaspora of North Korean defectors that are all over the world. And if there is any sort of encouragement, help, financial help, that's given to us, we will stop at nothing and we will dedicate our very lives to bring about change in the regime in North Korea. And you could trust me when I say that, Congressman Smith.

REP. SMITH: Well, Ms. Kim, I think your point about the leftist truly enabling by either suppressing or by denying that these atrocities are occurring, that makes them complicit in these crimes against humanity. And I would hope that clear-thinking people, newspapers and other media in South Korea would just tell the truth about what is going on North Korea because the truth is liberating.

And I would also add my endorsement to what you said about Kim Jong-Il and others being held to account for genocide at the International Criminal Court. They have committed barbaric crimes. And you know, with -- while there are some UN individuals who have spoke out, there's been no holding to account in any meaningful way. So I echo and endorse what you said.

Mr. Payne?

REP. PAYNE: Thank you very much. I just have a quick question and I'll make a little comment quickly. With the prospect of the anticipation that Kim Jong-Il leaves, his son would take over -- that's a horrible prospect -- what do you see the consequence of something like that happening?

MS. YOUNG SOON: Ms. Kim believes that Kim Jong-Nam will never be recognized or become the true leader in North Korea. But should he or if he were to become the next leader, Ms. Kim believes that there is chance that he might open up and reform the country, from her point of view and her opinion.

REP. PAYNE: Thank you very much. I just want to comment that I think that in separated countries like we see in Korea, the fact that much -- in many instances the truth certainly is kept from the people in the south, the total truth, and it's difficult to know whose responsibility -- is it the government, is it the press', is it deliberate.

One thing that usually happens in divided countries as we saw in Eastern and Western Europe, although, you know, you can't compare Eastern Europe, totally, certainly not to North Korea. But there was the strong move for reunification. It's just the natural nationalistic move to reunite countries that were once united.

And so I could possibly understand why some of the younger people would be striving for unification, trying to of course have a change, a regime change in the north. So it's -- I think it's kind of just normal nationalism, especially a country that may have felt that it's been, you know, abused or exploited by, you know, world wars and things of that nature.

The other I thing I remember clearly as I traveled to Eastern Europe in the late '60s, and I went to Poland, Germany and Russia with some West Europeans. And saw in those -- and especially in Poland, photos of and newsreels of the films taken inside of Warsaw with the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. And these were young adults, my age at that time, who could not believe how brutal their parents were when they were leading the Nazi regime.

And you know, they were talking in their own language, but I could kind of understand what the internal discussion was going on about, is this true, almost disbelief. So you know, I think that as we move forward, we're going to have to work with educating people to overcome some of these natural things.

I also think that we should try to become even more active in the Human Rights Council. There have been some progress made, because before the U.S. joined the council, when it was the committee before and then the council, issues like what's happening in Syria, the brutality of Bashar on his people, the -- some of the other issues would never ever be raised.

And so there have been -- I think because the U.S. has raised the issues they got to deal with them. And that's why I think it's important for us to be in the room, so that there can be answers when our allies are criticized or resolutions continually come criticizing them. We can then now say, well, wait a minute, let me give you the other point of view.

So I do hope that those agencies will also be strengthened as we move. And then, of course, that's not being a part of the Rome statues. It makes us a little less significant in the ICC, where we have difficulty pushing for indictments for war criminals who should be indicted and the cases should be raised.

Final thing I'd like to say -- really commend the South Korean government. Several years ago I visited -- one of my trustee Ethiopian there is a hospital that the South Korean government built, probably the best hospital in Sub-Saharan Africa, just about -- and they did it because they were appreciative of the Ethiopian soldiers who fought in the Korean War. And actually, most stunning is that for those veterans who are still alive, who served, they have been paying pensions to these Ethiopian soldiers ever since the end or at -- I don't know exactly if it started right at the end of the war, but for decades.

And those that are still alive receive a monthly regular stipend from the government of Korea. So I think that the -- if some of the goodwill in Southern Korea could kind of work its way up to the North that would be a positive statement.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for calling this very important meeting -- hearing.

REP. SMITH: Thank you, Mr. Payne.

Just to conclude, I would like to ask unanimous consent that the testimony of Kim Sung-Min, director of Free North Korea Radio be made a part of the record. Without objection, so ordered. And I would ask that all members have five legislative days to revise and extend the remarks, and just make one comment with regards a related issue.

I'd like to comment on recent reports of the continued deportation of Chinese Falun Gong practitioners from South Korea to China. As is well known, the Falun Gong are brutally persecuted in China along with numerous other groups who attempt to exercise their internationally recognized human rights of freedom of thought, conscience and religion. So I join my voice with that of other members of Congress urging South Korea to recognize Falun Gong practitioners as refugees and not forcibly return them to China where they will certainly face persecution.

South Korea should also find an appropriate means within the South Korean legal system and the international conventions on torture and refugees that it is ratified to permit these Falun Gong practitioners to remain in South Korea. I would note that on Thursday the subcommittee will hear testimony on -- it will be the 30th hearing on human rights abuses in China.

It's entitled "China's One-Child Policy: The Government's Massive Crime Against Women and Unborn Babies." And I mention this especially in light of Suzanne Scholte and others who have -- there is a nexus between the one-child per couple policy, the dearth of females in the PRC. Estimates range from an excess of a hundred million missing girls in China so that when North Korean women make their way over the border, the traffickers are waiting to sell them into modern-day slavery and to sex trafficking.

And China has not only not lifted a finger to stop it, they have enabled it. And it is attributable in part, maybe a large part, to the one-child per couple policy. We will hear from two victims of forced abortion who will tell their story, Chai Ling, the great Tiananmen Square activist, who founded All Girls Allowed; Reggie Littlejohn and Valerie Johnson, who will speak about the military implications of the one-child per couple policy.

I do want to thank this very, very effective group of witnesses for shedding light on the egregious human rights abuses of Kim Jong-Il and thank you for bearing witness to the truth. We need to do much more than we've done. That goes for our subcommittee, the Congress, the executive branch and the free world.

And again, I want to thank all of our witnesses, and especially our two women who have made their way to the U.S., come a long distance, suffered, lost loved ones, for speaking truth to a very totalitarian power. I would like to give the last word, if any of our witnesses would like to say anything in conclusion, but --

MS. SCHOLTE: I was just going to -- I was going to just announce that we are having at noon, on Thursday, September 22nd a protest. We are calling on people wherever you are in the world to go to the Chinese embassy at noon to protest the repatriation of North Korean refugees, and we have petitions that people are delivering. And so far we have 25 cities and 13 countries that are participating.

REP. SMITH: Wow. Very interesting.

MS. SCHOLTE: so I wanted to mention that.

MR. SCARLATOIU: Mr. Chairman, I would like to tell you that in addition to one report that I have mentioned that we are working on, on the political prisoner camps in North Korea, we are also working on a report on the circulation of information inside North Korea, and we will be happy to share these reports as soon as they're published with the subcommittee.

MR. SMITH: And we will disseminate it widely among the members of Congress. So thank you.

MR. SCARLATOIU: Sir.

MR. SMITH: Thank you. The hearing's adjourned, and thank you very much.

REPRESENTATIVE CHRISTOPHER SMITH (R-NJ): (Sounds gavel.) The subcommittee will come to order and good afternoon to everybody. I want to thank you for joining us for this very important hearing to examine a country with one of the worst human rights record in the entire world.

The Democratic People's Republic of Korea is known to be the world's most isolated country as its citizens are prohibited from traveling either internally or internationally without express permission. Communications with the outside world are also tightly regulated and attempts by the dictatorship to filter all information accessible by the North Korean people. Therefore the testimony that would be provided today by our distinguished panel and in particular our two defector witnesses is particularly welcomed and appreciated.

Ms. Kim Young Soon and Ms. Kim Hye Sook who both have survived the extreme deprivations of the North Korean prison camps have traveled all the way from South Korea to share their experiences with our subcommittee. On behalf of the subcommittee, I want to thank them and wish -- and convey to them our sincerest gratitude.

I also want to thank Suzanne Scholte for her extraordinary work over these many years. This is -- I've chaired actually several hearings on North Korean human rights and in every one of those hearings she has played a critical part in helping us to get the witnesses to tell the true unvarnished story of what is actually happening in North Korea.

Our two witnesses will tell the story, and they will be speaking on behalf of an estimated 150,000 to 200,000 prisoners currently held in North Korean labor camps. It is our hope that their testimony will help to galvanize the international community to take action to secure the freedom of those who are needlessly suffering and dying under truly horrific conditions.

Those living in this prison camps are not only -- are not the only ones suffering in North Korea. As one of our witnesses, again Suzanne Scholte will testify in North Korea every single human right as enshrined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights is violated and it is often violated with absolute impunity.

North Korea is listed by the State Department as a tier III country with respect to human trafficking. In other words they are egregious violators of modern day slavery, buying and selling women and others as a commodity. It was just -- North Korea was also just designated this month as one of eight countries of particular concern for its violations of religious freedom.

But not all the testimony during this hearing will be bleak, although much of it will be. We will hear about new -- the new potential for communication to and with North Korean people and explore possibilities for peaceful change given upcoming political events in North Korea and changes in other countries in the region. We look forward to discussing this potential to improve the lives of all people living in North Korea.

I'd like to now introduce our very distinguished panel and again thank all of you for being here today. I also want to thank C-SPAN for being here, for taking this information and conveying it to the American people. North Korea, because it is so closed, very often evades all scrutiny. So people know about it, but don't know very much. Your testimony again will help to shatter that lackadaisical sense of what Americans know and think about North Korea. So thank you again.

We'll begin with Ms. Suzanne Scholte who is the president of the Defense Forum Foundation and is a leader of several groups focused on protecting human rights in North Korea. She was recognized in 2010 with the Walter Judd Freedom Award and in 2008 with the Seoul Peace Prize.

Ms. Scholte has helped rescue hundreds of North Korean refugees and facilitated the travel of defectors to speak in the United States. She has participated in numerous congressional hearings on North Korea on a wide range of topics including political prison camps, trafficking of North Korean women, religious persecution and North Korean refugees in China.

I would note parenthetically that when we held a hearing on trafficked women, some of the, what they thought were, lucky women who got out of North Korea into China, Ms. Scholte actually brought to this committee women who -- one woman who went after her daughter who made her way into China only to be sold into slavery and then she and her daughter who went looking to rescue the trafficked women were themselves sold into sexual slavery.

We'll then hear from Ms. Kim Young Soon, Committee for the Democratization of North Korea. And she was a dancer and an actress in the North Korean Army. She was arrested in 1970 and sent to the Yodok political prison camp with members of her family. Her parents and eldest son died in the camp and her husband and youngest son later died trying to escape North Korea.

Ms. Kim eventually escaped and has dedicated her life to exposing the truth about the hideous prison camps in North Korea by sharing her story around the globe. She is an outspoken defector serving as the vice president of the committee, the Democratization of North Korea and other human rights advocacy groups.

We'll then hear from Ms. Kim Hye Sook who is a survivor of nearly three decades in Bukchang political prison camp. She and her family were imprisoned by guilt by association because of her grandfather's defection to South Korea. She was just 13 years old. Ms. Kim regularly witnessed executions and abuse and endured manual labor, constant hunger and the deaths of several family members.

Once released she fled to China, but was forced to return to North Korea by her employer where she was arrested again. When she escaped, she returned to China but was sold by human traffickers again like the other witnesses we've had before this committee. She eventually escaped to South Korea and continues to tell her story around the world. Earlier this year she published her memoirs in a book entitled "A Concentration Camp Retold in Tears."

We'll then hear from Mr. Greg Scarlatoiu, Committee for Human Rights in North Korea. Mr. Scarlatoiu is the executive director of the Committee for Human Rights in North Korea, which was established to focus world attention on human rights abuses in North Korea and to offer creative solutions.

Born and raised in Romania he was a Bucharest University freshman when he witnessed the fall of communism in Eastern Europe, Nicolae Ceausescu's barbaric regime. He lived in South Korea for 10 years and has authored in English and Korean language articles on the applicability of the Eastern European experience to North Korea context as well as a weekly Korean language broadcast into North Korea by Radio Free Asia. We welcome his as well.

I'd like to yield to my friend and colleague, Mr. Payne, for any opening comments he might have.

REPRESENTATIVE DONALD PAYNE (D-NJ): Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, for calling this very important hearing, and I'd like to certainly express my appreciation to the witnesses here who have agreed to testify. Each of your stories help us to better understand the extent and magnitude of the human rights abuses of North Korea and your guidance will help us to target our efforts in alleviating some of these terrible injustices.

The human rights violations in North Korea are among the worst in the world. Under Kim Jong-Il's regime, North Korean citizens regularly face extra judiciary killings and detentions for basic political expression, seemingly ordinary market activities or unauthorized domestic travel.

North Korea doesn't seem to even need to violate the regime's rules themselves since they can be penalized for even the actions not of themselves but actually of their families, which is certainly unfair and unjust. While many of us cannot imagine a more stifling human rights environment, according to some observers the conditions are worsening due to the preparation for Jong-Il's son Kim Jong-Un to take over.

In 2004, Congress passed a North Korean human rights act authorizing funds towards human rights efforts and improving the flow of information to North Korea. Currently, this amounts to $2 million annually for human rights and democracy, 2 million (dollars) for freedom of information programs and 20 million (dollars) to assist North Korean refugees.

I'm interested in hearing from the panelists, if you have expertise in that area, about the abuse on how proposed cuts to our international affairs budget would impact our ability to adequately continue to fund these programs that have been successful in getting information to-date. Although it's not in the realm of your testimonies necessarily, I was very disturbed at the behavior of the North Korean leadership in November of 2010 when it attacked South Korea's island of Yeonpyeong with artillery shells killing several people.

This irresponsible behavior of government really is unwarranted and really needs to have continued watching and scrutinizing as to their behavior, also their continued adventurism into ballistic missiles and other weapons of war certainly disturb us. So I certainly look forward to your testimonies and thank you again for your willingness to share them. And I yield back the balance of my time.

REP. SMITH: Thank you very much. Would either of my other colleagues -- (off mic)? I'd like to now then yield the floor for such time as she may consume to Ms. Scholte.

Hello, let me just before you start, make a point. We also invited Ambassador-at-Large King who could not be here because he's out of the country. He wanted to be here and said very clearly he would gladly come and testify at a later date. And he also wanted to provide the subcommittee with a closed briefing as well on recent events including the human rights situation in North Korea. Bob King, as my colleague knows so well, especially Mr. Payne, was the chief of staff for the Foreign Affairs Committee and a very good choice for ambassador. So we look forward to hearing from him as well.

So Ms. Scholte.

SUZANNE SCHOLTE: Well, first of all I just want to thank Congressman Smith for your many years of devotion on the North Korea human rights issues and I want to thank Congressman Payne as well. It's been a honor and pleasure to work with your staff on our shared love for the Sahrawi people of Western Sahara, another divided country that's trying to get their freedom through self-determination.

I want to give two main points at this hearing today. First of all, North Korea continues to be one of the darkest places on earth, yet we fail to focus on the main issue, which is the human rights issues because we've instead focused on the nuclear issue, and this has had tragic results.

Second, despite this ongoing tragedy, there is hope because of changes that are happening in that country. But if we fail to enact the policies that address the human rights conditions and empower those who can bring about change, then we will certainly end up just prolonging this regime.

While we witness people rising up in North Africa and the Middle East, we wonder why did North Koreans who are arguably the most persecuted people in the world not rise up. It is precisely because they are the most persecuted in the world. North Koreans are the only people in the world that do not enjoy one single human rights that's enshrined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, a document, ironically, that was adopted in 1948, the same year that Kim Il-sung came to power.

This declaration was in response to the atrocities committed by the Axis powers during World War II. When the Nazi death camps were liberated by the allied forces during that war, the international community vowed never again, never again, would we allow these kinds of atrocities to occur. But the political prison camps in North Korea have existed longer than the Soviet gulag, longer than the Chinese laogai, and longer than the Nazi death camps.

Your two defector witnesses today are living proof of the horrors of these camps as well as the length of their existence. One was imprisoned in Yodok in the 1970s while another was imprisoned for 28 years up to the beginning of this decade in Bukchang. We have seen millions of North Koreans starve to death despite billions of economic assistance.

And North Koreans are not the only ones who suffer from Kim Jong-Il's dictatorship, but South Korean POWs are still being held in North Korea today. Well, at 108,308 captives are being held in North Korea, including 80,000 abductees in South Korea and hundreds of others in 13 countries as recently documented by the committee for human rights in North Korea.

Former presidents Bill Clinton and George Bush made human rights a second theory issue with a hope of engaging North Korea to give up their nuclear ambitions. We see the failure of these efforts as North Korea has realized its nuclear ambitions and its proliferation activity continue. Kim Jong-Il may be an evil dictator, but he has brilliantly manipulated the good intentions of both America and South Korea.

My second point, there is hope because things are changing in North Korea. Despite Kim Jong-Il's best efforts to literally keep North Koreans in the dark, up to 60 percent of North Koreans have access to some form of information beyond the regime's propaganda. They are increasingly learning that the source of their misery is not America or South Korea as they are brainwashed from childhood to believe, but the source of their misery is in fact the Kim Jong-Il and his regime.

North Korean defectors are sending remittances to their families helping demonstrate the prosperity in South Korea. North Korea now has a cell phone system with 500,000 subscribers. And although you cannot call directly from South Korea, defectors pay brokers in China to contact their families.

We also see that defectors themselves getting information into North Korea from DVDs, VCDs, USBs and flash drives through China and other creative means such as balloon launches. North Koreans, especially the elites, are keeping up with South Korean soap operas and watching many South Korean as well as Western films. Therefore, it's more important than ever to raise the human rights concerns so that they know our concerns are for them.

For example, it was a brilliant action by the Obama administration to include special envoy for North Korea human rights ambassador Robert King and the delegations that went to North Korea to assess the food situation. This underscored the fact that the human rights conditions in North Korea that are causing the starvation.

Furthermore, North Koreans are no longer dependent on Kim Jong-Il's regime to survive as over 200 private markets are functioning and the regime has given up trying to control them. This capitalism is saving them from experiencing the same level of starvation that led to the deaths of millions during the famine.

Kim Jong-Il's unprovoked attacks on South Korea, as Congressman Payne just mentioned, have awakened South Koreans to the truth that we must not ignore the human rights of North Koreans for the false promise of this regime to end its nuclear program. To take advantage of these changes, governments, nongovernmental organizations and individuals first of all should make human rights central to all negotiations with or about North Korea.

Second, we should only provide food when relief organizations can stay and monitor to the point of consumption. Otherwise, it will most assuredly be diverted to maintain the regime that is causing the starvation in the first place.

Third, we need to continue to support radio broadcasting, especially programs like Radio Free Asia and Voice of America and the independent radio broadcasters like Free North Korea Radio, a defector led station in Seoul.

Fourth, we need to empower the defector organizations that are using creative methods to get information into North Korea like Fighters for a Free North Korea and the North Korea People's Liberation Front.

Five, we must convince the Chinese to end their brutal policy of forced repatriation for North Korean refugees which is prolonging this crisis by giving Kim Jong-Il a reason to resist any reforms that would improve the situation in that country so that North Koreans do not want to risk their lives trying to flee.

Six, we should support the 12 North Korean defector churches. For example, I've been working to try to connect churches here in the United States with these defector churches that have been formed in South Korea.

Seven, we need to put the elites in the regime. I noticed that they will be held accountable for their crimes against the North Korean people. Last week, a North Korean assassin was caught. His mission was to kill Park Sang Hak, who heads Fighters for a Free North Korea. Park Sang Hak is the one who's been doing the balloon launches, sending in information. Both Park and Kim Seong Min who leads Free North Korea Radio who is here at this hearing have been regularly targeted by assassins sent by Kim Jong-Il. What this tells us is that what they are doing is the most effective work.

At the end of 2009, Free North Korea Radio started Voice from the People. These were actual interviews from inside the country that they broadcast back in. Supporting this flow of information through radio broadcasting, especially by North Korea defectors, is the most effective way to reach the people because the Internet is only available to the elite and their regime.

Recently the North Korea People's Liberation Front was formed by former North Korean military including officers, special forces, cyberwarfare experts and propaganda specialists. This is significant because the only time there was organized opposition against the regime was from the military who had studied in the Soviet Union and came back to North Korea wanting reform.

Although they were eventually discovered, they operated against the regime from 1989 until 1994. Because all North Korean males must serve for 10 years and the elite are exempt from service, this means that the North Korean military truly represents the people. We saw the army in Romania turn against Kim Il-Sung and Kim Jong-Il good friend Nicolae Ceausescu when the people of that country rose up against their dictator.

Right now the elites in power have absolutely no incentive to oppose Kim Jong-Il because their entire lives are based on the successful transfer of power to Kim Jong-Il. We must assure them that they would have a stake in the future if North Korea opens up to reform. Because North Koreans are citizens under South Korea, under the Korean Constitution, South Korea has an important role to play and that they should convene a tribunal of respected judges to begin the prosecution of those in the regime responsible for the political prison camps and these other atrocities.

There are 23,000 eye witnesses now and we should start naming the names of those who are committing these crimes. When North Korea finally opens up, I believe we will be even more horrified at the atrocities that the Kim regimes have committed against the North Korean people that today are beyond our imagination. We will face the same questions that the world faced when the allies liberated the Nazi death camps. What did you know and what did you do to help stop our tragic circumstances. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

REP. SMITH: Ms. Scholte, thank you very much for your testimony and for your leadership all those years and for all these years and for that very incisive testimony. We'll now hear from Ms. Kim Young Soon.

KIM YOUNG SOON: (Through interpreter.) Hello, my name is Kim Young Soon, author of "I Was a Friend of Sung Hye Rim." I'm a North Korean defector and a survivor of North Korean political prison camp Yodok, camp number 15.

First of all, I want to thank the members of the United States Congress and related officials of the Congress for giving me a chance to speak at this important venue. I also would like to thank Ms. Suzanne Scholte of the Defense Forum Foundation for her years of friendship and for listening to my story of the North Korean political prison camp experience.

Camp number 15, Yodok, where I was incarcerated is now well known throughout the world. Yodok political prison camp was created in July of 1969 under orders of Kim Il-sung in Yodok-gun, South Hamgyong Province, in a region known for its rough and mountainous features. It is here that for 30 years people who have incurred the wrath of Kim Il-Sung and Kim Jong-Il have been sent for the crime of being a political prisoner and where they have died silent deaths.

I wrote of my time at Yodok into a book and titled it "I was a Friend of Sung Hye Rim." Sung Hye Rim was at one point in my life my friend and also the hidden mistress of Kim Jong-Il, and anyone who knew the secret in North Korea were either executed or sent to political prison camps, and I became a victim of this myself and was therefore sent to Yodok. I want to tell the world about what happened to me and also tell the world about the reality of the North Korean political prison camp system.

The Workers' Party's establishment of the One Thought principle was instituted whereby the citizens were sent to prison camps for total isolation from the general public, general society for the following crimes; the crime of defaming the authority and prestige of Kim Il-Sung and Kim Jong-Il, the crime of knowledge about the private life of Kim Jong-Il and leaking information about it to the general public, thus defaming the prestige of the great leader. When I was sent to the prison camp I had no knowledge about these facts.

The following are the political crimes that I came to know of after I was incarcerated in the Yodok prison camp; the crime of talking about the cyst or lump on Kim Il-Sung's neck, for the crime of unwittingly damaging or soiling the statue or portrait of Kim Il-Sung, the crime of knowing about the private life of Kim Jong-Il, for example, knowing about Sung Hye Rim being the secret mistress of Kim Jong-Il and disclosing this information to an outsider. The crime of revealing the birth of Kim Jong-Nam, the first-born son of Kim Jong- Il, the crime of listening to or viewing foreign radio or TV broadcast, the crime of questioning or criticizing the policy of the Workers' Party and the crime of expressing criticism or complaints about North Korean society.

I was a close friend -- I was close friends with Sung Hye Rim having gone to the same school with her from girls' high school to college. And one day I heard directly from her that she will be going to special residence number five. At that time those in the know, knew that special residence number five meant the residence of Kim Il- Sung and Kim Jong-Il.

At the time I was taken to the political prison camp I had no idea why I was being incarcerated and it was only in the summer of 1989, after I was released, did I found out the reason why from a state security agent in Tongyeong. The security agent said the following to me. Sung Hye Rim was not the wife of Kim Jong-Il nor did she bear him a son. These are all groundless rumors. If you mention anything about this again, you will not be forgiven.

I would like to talk briefly about my interrogation before I was sent to the political prison camp. On August 1st, 1970, I was forced into a car by state security agents and taken to a secret location where I was interrogated for two months by a unit called Unit 312, three-hundred and twelve, for preliminary investigation in a state security investigation room.

Under extreme fear for two months I was told to write my entire life story and to include everything and leave out nothing. So I wrote on and on. In my writing I confessed and wrote about Sung Hye Rim coming over to my house and telling me that she would be going to special residence number five and also admitted that people around me knew this information as well.

After the investigations were over on October 1, 1970, my entire family and I, seven people in total, were sent to Yodok political prison camp. The person who committed the crime was labeled the conspirator or ring leader while those taken along for yeon-jwa-je, Korean word for guilt-by-association, were labeled non-principal criminals and this was how the criminals in the prison camp were classified.

We woke up at 3:30 in the morning to go to work by 4:30 a.m., and the labor was from sun up until sun down. Meals had to be provided by ourselves through self-sufficiency. I saw countless prisoners contract the disease pellagra and suffer from diarrhea and die.

After work was finished, there were daily fight-for-ideology meetings for all the prisoners. Those who were unfortunate enough to be caught by security agents during these ideology meetings and sent away in shackles were never seen again. The forced manual labor was beyond anyone's imagination. And in case of falling short of work goals, the whole group was punished. There were so many dead bodies that I saw there enough to fill up a field.

My three sons, one daughter, father and mother died from starvation. There were no coffins. So their bodies were rolled in a straw mat and buried. One of my sons who was nine years old at the time drowned to death in Yongjuan River (ph), which is near the prison camp. My daughter was given away from adoption after our release so that she can have a better life. To this day, I do not know about her whereabouts, whether she is alive or dead. My youngest son was publicly executed by firing squad for trying to escape North Korea after his release and attempting to go to South Korea in 1993 at the age of 23.

My husband was sent to another political prison camp, a total and complete control zone in July 4, 1970, and to this day I do not know whether he is dead or alive. So from my original family of eight people, currently only two have survived and successfully escaped from North Korea, myself and another son. The rest of my family, six people, have all died.

My older brother who was the pillar of our family was a colonel in the North Korean Army during the Korean War serving the North Korean third infantry, and while on a mission for the division commander, he was killed in battle at the age of 25. Accordingly our family received favors for my brother's heroic acts and from Kim Il- Sung and we lived well until our family was sent to a political prison camp. And as a result of feeling betrayed, I escaped from North Korea.

Even after I was released from Yodok political prison camp, I was classified as an anti-regime reactionary and suffered under the monitoring by the state security apparatus. I escaped North Korea on February 1st, 2001, and entered South Korea in November of 2003.

In conclusion, I would just like to say that in the political prison camps in North Korea, it is a place where the prisoners will eat anything that flies, crawls or grows in the field. I wasted nine years of the prime of my life in that hell hole of a place where even animals would turn away -- turn their faces away. I lost all my family members and have lived a life of tears, of blood and extreme hardship. Please save the 23 million people in North Korea who are living a life of misery, not unlike what I have suffered.

Even though I'm now over 70 years old, I will fight for the freedom of my people, my countrymen until all my strength is expended. This is the reason why I have lived so far and I believe also my purpose. In that note, I want to deeply thank again the members of this committee for your interest in the human rights situation in North Korea, especially the political prison camps. Thank you.

REP. SMITH: Ms. Kim, thank you so much. The brutality that you yourself have suffered in the loss of your family members including your daughter who, as you said, was adopted obviously without your permission, you have no idea where she is. Your husband, you have no idea where he is, and the loss of your other family members, it just underscores the brutality of Kim Jong-Il and the fact that the West, the United States and any country that has any sense of compassion needs to speak out against this horrific abuse. And this should not be a second tier issue, the human rights abuses that are commonplace in North Korea. So we thank you for making us further aware of the extreme barbarity you have been made to endure and your family.

We will now hear from another Ms. Kim who has suffered three decades in the gulag and we look forward to hearing her testimony.

KIM HYE SOOK: (Through interpreter.) Hello, my name is Kim Hye Sook. I am a North Korean defector who was incarcerated in political prison camp number 18, Bukchang prison camp in Pukchang in South (Chungcheong ?) Province for 28 years. And in 2009, I escaped North Korea and entered South Korea via China, Laos and Thailand.

In February of 1975, for reasons that were unknown to me at that time, I was dragged with my parents to the prison camp. I was 13 years old at the time. During my incarceration at Camp number 18 I lost my grandmother, mother, brother and my husband.

I only found out after I was out of that hell on earth, Camp number 18, why I was sent to the prison camp, because my grandfather had defected to South Korea during the Korean War. But by then I had nowhere to go and complain about the situation. I would like to say that the term kwan-li-so in North Korea is a living hell for human beings, a place where people who have committed so-called crimes are sent and incarcerated as a group and forced to work in manual slave labor.

There are political prison camps where people who have been found guilty of being against Kim Il-Sung and Kim Jong-Il or those resisting the regime are sent and held, whereas in places like Camp number 18 where I was incarcerated in, besides political prisoners, those who are guilty of economic crimes are sent along with family members and are forced to work in coal mines.

In Camp number 18 in Pukchang where I was imprisoned, the whole prison camp was encircled by a 13-foot-high electrified fence and trying to escape through this over 3,000 volts of electrified fence was unimaginable. When I first entered the prison camp we were told to memorize 10 rules of the prison camp.

And I still remember it vividly because I remember them from such an early age. One of the rules was that the prisoners were not supposed to know the reason for ending up in the prison camp. And those caught violating this rule will be relentlessly executed by firing squad.

For young people like me who ended up in the prison camp at a young age, we were given very rudimentary education, basic Korean language education. And then when we turned 16 or 17 everyone without exception was sent to the coal mines to dig out coal and this goes without saying for the adults as well. We had to work 16 to 18-hour workdays without rest or holidays. And for food, our family of seven was provided only around 10 pounds of corn per month. And this was supplemented by gruel made from grass or anything that we picked up from the field, tree bark, grass and that's what we ate, one meal a day, corn and the mixed grass gruel that we had to make for ourselves.

REP. SMITH: Ms. Kim, if you could just suspend for one brief moment. We're joined by the chairman of the appropriations subcommittee that deals with justice issues and science, but is also the author of the International Religious Freedom Act of 1998. And as we all know North Korea is a Tier 3 country. It's Congressman Frank Wolf who cares deeply about human rights. But he can only stay brief minutes.

REPRESENTATIVE FRANK WOLF (R-VA): Thank you, Mr. Smith. I want to thank you and Mr. Payne and the committee for having this hearing.

I met with the witnesses earlier today. It was one of the most significant and moving testimony and reports that I have - I have ever heard. And I think certainly the State Department should do everything they can, quite frankly, to bring about regime change in North Korea.

When this government falls as it will fall the same way the East German government fell with regard to the Berlin Wall, the West will feel so guilty to know that it said nothing other than the hearings that the members here have had and said nothing with regard that takes place. This administration should do everything, and lastly -- and I'll end with this.

I think the church in the West, all religious faiths in the West should come together and support these people in every way they can to see about that the fact that hundreds of thousands are in these camps. It's totally unacceptable. So anyone within the voice, can hear this, can follow this hearing ought to be advocating this.

So I want again to thank you and Mr. Payne and the other members and thank the witnesses for coming by my office. I'm on my way to a 4 o'clock, but I was just moved to come by because what I heard was just so powerful. And with that, Mr. Chairman, I yield back. I thank you for your time.

REP. SMITH: Chairman Wolf, thank you very much.

Ms. Kim, if you could continue.

MS. HYE SOOK: And I was plagued with hunger from the day I entered the prison camp and until the day I was released. And my one wish was to just eat one bowl of white rice for one meal. And after I became an adult and during my times of working at the coal mine, walking to and from work, I would look around for anything to eat. And regardless of season it became a habit to scrape or pluck anything that was green and make soup and eat it whether it was from tree bark or from grass.

I cannot even begin to describe how many people suffered and died because of starvation in the prison camp and how many people were killed without reason for not listening to authorities or not showing enough repentance. So public execution by -- execution by firing squad through public execution by firing squad; their bodies were riddled with countless bullet holes and I saw countless bodies that ended up like this.

And there was a time when I saw the bodies of people who were killed by firing squad were rolled up in a straw mat and carried away in carts. And I said to myself even dogs will not die so pitifully.

In this place where human lives were worthless than those of flies, this was where my brother and husband died also. Their deaths were classified as due to accidents, but their deaths were intentional deaths carried out in the atmosphere of the prison camps where nothing was normal.

And as a result of working the coal mines for over 12 years, I contracted a black lung and faced death many times. But in place for my mother who passed away before me I vowed to survive and live on and look out after my siblings -- my remaining siblings. And that devotion was what allowed me to survive that hell.

And my siblings are still incarcerated at Camp number 18, my brother and sister. And in December of 1974 before our family was sent off to prison camp -- Camp number 18 my father was hauled away by the state security bureau never to be heard from again. And I do not know what happened to him to this day. And even at this moment as I speak there are over 10,000 -- 10,000 -- 20,000 people who are in Camp 18 without knowing the reason why, people who are dying from abuse and lack of rights at this very moment.

And this is not just happening in Camp number 18, but I would like to say that this is the suffering and sadness that 23 million North Korean citizens are going through and suffering -- experiencing right now. Not only that, but besides the human rights violations going on in North Korea, there's now the cruelty and misery inflicted on North Korean refugee women who have escaped North Korea into China through the terrible situation of human trafficking happening in different places.

After nearly escaping death and coming out of North Korea and into China and then becoming victims of human and sexual trafficking, I can say with authority that the tragic situation of the North Korean women must be told again, again in the international community. I myself was sold four different times in four different cities in China. And the inhumane and indescribable suffering that these women go through in China, being sold like commodity, still keeps me awake at night.

Please end the existence of such a society and make it into a place where humans can live as people. Please let the people without any rights in North Korea live in freedom and happiness. Please get rid of the political prison camps and please tell those who do not know about freedom what freedom is about.

I sincerely hope that my earnest pleas will be delivered to the United States Congress, to the United States government and to the people of America. I also want to deeply thank the honorable members of this committee, here today who have made possible for me to speak as well as to Ms. Suzanne Scholte of the Defense Forum Foundation. Thank you.

REP. SMITH: Ms. Kim, without a doubt your message has been heard and thank you for sharing what can only be described as enormous suffering that you've experienced, being sold into sexual slavery, the loss of family members and as -- so there will be positive consequences from your testimony. We will work hard to promote human rights in North Korea, I can assure you that.

Before going to Mr. Scarlatoiu, I would just note I have a bill on the floor right this minute; it's the combating -- the reauthorization of the Combating Autism Act of 2011, so I will leave briefly, but without objection, Mr. Payne has graciously said that he will take the committee.

MR. : I would just like to point out that -- Congressman -- (inaudible) -- say this.

REP. SMITH: Thanks Don.

MR. : This is the (map ?) that she drew of the camp she was in. Just --

REP. PAYNE: We'll now hear from our final witness.

MR. SCARLATOIU: Good afternoon, Mr. Payne and Ms. Bass. Thank you for inviting me to speak with you today about the human rights situation in North Korea, and about the apparent increase in the amount of information getting into that country. It is an honor and a privilege to have the opportunity to discuss these issues with you today.

Mr. Payne, I would like to begin by informing you that I will be presenting a brief summary of the views included in my prepared statement.

REP. PAYNE: Thank you. Without objection.

MR. SCARLATOIU: After the very emotional and comprehensive testimony by Ms. Scholte, after the heartbreaking testimony by Ms. Kim Young Soon and Ms. Kim Hye Sook, there's barely anything I can add on the human rights situation in North Korea. The human rights situation in North Korea remains abysmal.

According to experts and testimony by recent North Korean defectors, there is no evidence that the human rights situation in North Korea has improved as the Kim regime proceeds on steps towards leadership succession. On the contrary, it appears the border crackdown aimed at preventing North Koreans from defecting to China has intensified and the political prisoner camp population has been on the increase.

In May of this year, Amnesty International released satellite imagery and new testimony shedding light on the horrific conditions in North Korea's political prisoner camps. According to that organization, the prisoner population detained at such camps is up to 200,000 and a comparison of the latest satellite photos with satellite imagery from 2001 indicates a considerable increase in the scale of the camps.

Moving on to the flow of information getting into North Korea, although officially all personal radios must have a fixed dial and be registered with state security offices, programming by stations including Voice of America, Radio Free Asia, and broadcasters based in South Korea may have a listenership of around 30 percent in North Korea. The number of radios smuggled from China has been on the increase.

The North Korean authorities continue to attempt to jam foreign broadcasting, but face serious limitations in their efforts as jamming is energy-intensive and North Korea is experiencing endemic energy shortages. In recent years, we have found out that there has been a significant increase in the amount of information entering North Korea. This development is the result of the marketization that has taken place in that country.

Such marketization is by no means an intended top-down reform program, but rather a function of state failure. Small informal markets provide ordinary people a coping mechanism that enables them to survive. During the informal marketization of North Korea, supply chains have developed from China to North Korea's capital city of Pyongyang and .mp3 players, CD-ROMs, DVDs and thumb drives have been entering North Korea. Statistical data including a 2010 survey of North Korean refugees and travelers by the Broadcasting Board of Governors indicate that 27 percent of respondents have listened to foreign radio, 48 percent have come in contact with foreign DVDs and other video material, while 27 percent have watched foreign TV.

Information is also being passed from one member to the next along such supply chains. It appears that the Korean wave consisting of South Korean soap opera and music, exceptionally popular elsewhere in Asia and beyond has also reached North Korea. According to Japan's Asahi Shimbun one member of a group of nine North Koreans who recently sailed for five days before being picked up off the west coast of Japan one week ago on September the 13th, this gentleman, a squid fisherman said that he was inspired to leave his home by South Korean soap operas.

In January 2008, Egyptian company Orascom Telecom Holding was awarded a license to establish a 3G mobile network in North Korea. When launched in December 2008, Koreolink had 5,300 subscribers. In its half-year earnings report for January-June 2011, published on August the 10th, Orascom stated the number of subscribers in North Korea had reached 660,000.

Separate from the expansion of the Koreolink network, citizens of North Korea have also been using Chinese cellular phones smuggled across the border into North Korea. We have indication that Koreolink intends to launch 3G Internet service via Apple iPad in Pyongyang this fall by a special SIM card.

Nevertheless, Internet access is likely to continue to be restricted to foreign residents and those close to the Kim regime. There are also those North Koreans who possess computers not connected to the web, and they're estimated to represent about 3 percent of the entire population.

Based on data collected through interviews with North Korean defectors, and the proven track record of success in winning the ideological confrontation during the Cold War, radio broadcasting will continue to be one of the few media available to grant the people of North Korea access to information from the outside world. Computers not connected to the Internet, thumb drives, DVDs, CD-ROMs and MP3 players have become increasingly available although access to such devices is still relatively limited.

Efforts to increase the flow of information into North Korea should take into account the increasing availability of such vehicles. I wish to thank the subcommittee and its staff for the opportunity to testify before you today, and I would now be pleased to try to answer any questions that you might have. Thank you very much.

REP. PAYNE: Thank you very much. Let me once again thank each of the witnesses. Your testimony is certainly very compelling. We've -- of course, have heard and we try to keep up with the situation in North Korea, but it certainly brings it home when we have a hearing and to hear especially from individuals who have lived through the horrors of this regime. And of course we appreciate our experts from the Defense Forum Foundation and the Committee for Human Rights in North Korea.

Perhaps to either one of you who are working with organizations that deal with that, Ms. Scholte or Mr. Scarlatoiu -- hope I have that closely -- (inaudible) -- the special envoy for North Korea human rights, Ambassador Robert King, has said that the United States government would engage in an in-depth dialogue on human rights issues at the six-party talks.

The six-party talks are at an impasse and the absence of six-party talks, first of all, what do each of you feel that the six-party talks have achieved in the past, and whether there were any real gains forward, first of all, but secondly if indeed you feel that it's an impasse or there's really not a real effort on the part of North Korea, what other fora would the Obama administration consider employing for human rights dialogue with Pyongyang?

So whether talks pass and they've been going on for a bit through several administrations, and if they're scrapped, in absence of that, could there be anything else or should we continue with these? Could I ask each one of you if you'd like to comment.

MS. SCHOLTE: Well, first of all, I think that regarding the six-party talks, this is an effort by the Bush administration to rein in North Korea's nuclear ambitions. And they made the decision that they would just focus on the nuclear issue and not address any of the human rights concerns. They kicked the human rights concerns down the road.

We can tell by history that North Koreans are brilliant at manipulating the talks and using talks to gain aid and support, make promises they never intend to keep. They did the same thing to Bill Clinton during the Agreed Framework. And I think president -- former President Clinton can be excused for that because he was dealing with a new dictator when he was president.

But the Bush administration, I think, should have known better. They should have known the history of how these regime uses talks, and what we've seen during these talks, the result has been North Korea has developed nuclear weapons. It's very active in the proliferation of nuclear weapons and the -- exactly the purpose of these talks was never realized.

But at the same time, millions of North Koreans have died. And so, I think that talking with this regime is useless. They only use these talks to extract concessions and support and legitimize the regime. I think, instead, we need to take a new approach. I think that President Obama is in a unique position to do that. I think that we should make human rights the number one policy of our government.

I think that we should reach out to the North Korean people. I think that President Obama should be talking about the fact that -- I think we should say we want to give North Korea as much aid as they need so that the people are not starving, but we want to be able to see that it is consumed. I think we should be talking about the fact that we want to help the people, we want to improve conditions there.

We'd like to see the International Red Cross be able to go to the political prison camps. North Korea denies they have any camps. Well, fine, let's -- let an independent agency like the International Red Cross go to these camps. And I think that we need to be focusing on the human rights issues in our policy, but at the same time doing everything we can to support the kind of creative things that the defectors themselves are doing in radio broadcasting and these balloon launches, because the impact that Free North Korea Radio had, which went on to Internet broadcasting in 2004 and then went on to shortwave in 2006, the impact that Free North Korea Radio had was amazing.

It set the pace for all the broadcasters because it was the defectors themselves. And as you know, the South Koreans are raised to believe -- I'm sorry, North Koreans are raised to believe that South Korea and the United States caused the Korean War. I mean, they're brainwashed with stuff that we would think was completely ridiculous.

But they believe this. So when the North Koreans themselves are talking and broadcasting these views and these opinions into North Korea, North Koreans can't dismiss them. So it has had a tremendous impact. And I think we have to be doing everything we can to reach out with that message to the North Korean people and using the defectors especially.

REP. PAYNE: Yeah.

MR. SCARLATOIU: Mr. Payne, the main reason why nothing has been happening on the six-party talks front for a while now is that North Korea has refused to act as a responsible member of the international community. North Korea has continued to proceed with missile and nuclear developments. North Korea engaged in very serious provocations last year. In March, it launched a torpedo attack on the South Korean corvette, the Cheonan; 46 South Korean sailors were killed in that attack.

As it has already been mentioned, as you have already mentioned, on November the 23rd, North Korea shelled South Korean territory, the South Korean island of Yeonpyeong and this attack resulted in military and civilian casualties. We have already heard about assassins sent to kill Mr. Park Sang Hak, one of the very active North Korean defectors in South Korea a few weeks back. There were deep concerns about an alleged assassination plot targeting Mr. Kim Kwan-jin, the defense minister of South Korea.

And before that the most high-profile North Korean defector, Mr. Hwang Jang-Yop passed away last year, late last year. But only a few months before that we heard about a plot that was targeting him for assassination. That being said, North Korea has also continued to oppress its own people.

North Korea has continued to refuse to abide by the international obligations that it's supposed to abide by, given that it's a party to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, the international convention against all forms of discrimination against women, the international Convention on the Rights of the Child, and as a UN member state it's supposed to be bound by the UN Declaration on Human Rights.

As to whether human rights should be on the agenda it is the firm belief of the Committee for Human Rights in North Korea that human rights, the improvement of the human rights situation in North Korea should be at the top of our priorities, and personally, as I hope that one day we will see the complete irreversible and verifiable dismantlement of North Korea's nuclear program. I also hope that we will see the complete irreversible and verifiable dismantlement of North Korea's political prisoner camps as well.

REP. PAYNE: Thank you very much. Let me ask you, Ms. Kim Young Soon, or you Ms. Kim Hye Sook there is -- and I know that your experiences in North Korea was years ago and you have very compelling testimony, I'm just curious to know in your days as a young person, as a child, as a teenager, as an adult growing up, what type of society, what type of programs does the government impose on children? You know, it's supposed to be a time of life when people are happy, they're growing, they're learning.

What -- to your best recollection could you, if you can explain what is the life of a -- like for a young child and a young teenager, young adult growing up in North Korea today, if you can sort of transpose your experiences?

MS. YOUNG SOON: Congressman, in answer to your question, after the liberation from Japan in 1945 and until the '70s, North Korea was actually a little bit better -- was actually better than South Korea in terms of the economic situation. And as for myself, when I was young, I went to school and I attended the university, the Pyongyang University of Fine Arts and I majored in dance.

I learned under the teachings of a very well-known North Korean dancer, Che Si Hin (ph), and before I went to Yodok prison camp, I can say with assurance that I was very happy, that my happiness quotient so to speak was very high in terms of living in North Korean society.

REP. PAYNE: Thank you.

MS. HYE SOOK: Congressman, for -- in my case, before I was sent away to Bukchang prison camp, I had a life where I had no worries about food, about eating. I went to school. I lived a normal life. But because I was sent to prison camp at such an early age, that's all about -- that I can share about in terms of my experience in relation to your question.

REP. PAYNE: Thank you. One other question that I'm just curious about is we do know that in World War II there was the question of the Braupos (ph) that were created in Korea. And I wonder whether that was in the north of Korea or was that primarily in Korea itself, if anyone recalls?

As you may know, we're still working on a real apology from the government of Japan. There's been some apologies, but this has been an issue that has plagued the world since that time. And I wonder whether it was prevalent in -- throughout Korea?

MS. YOUNG SOON: My answer to you sir, is that before liberation in 1940 -- before the liberation in 1945, even in the northern part of the peninsula, in North Korea, there were instances or places where these (comfort ?) women stations or locations were based in North Korea. And I believe that even if this issue were to be addressed with the Japanese government, we would not be getting a satisfactory answer or a clear answer from the Japanese government, regarding your question, sir.

REP. PAYNE: Thank you. Thank you very much. I yield to the gentle lady from California.

REPRESENTATIVE KAREN BASS (D-CA): Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I actually would like to follow up on a question that Mr. Payne said to Ms. Soon and Ms. Sook about your childhood until you went into the camp. And Ms. Soon, you were -- you said up until the '70s, and I realize that's when you went into the camps, but did things drastically change in North Korea, and when?

MS. YOUNG SOON: To answer your question, Kim Il-Sung's propaganda was set in place in the -- between deliberation, years of deliberation, and until the Korean War, those years were known as the best years in terms of the affluence and the prosperity of North Korea. And after the Korean War, there were various economic plans that were instituted to try to help the economy and to help the people live better. But in 1987 -- in the late '80s, after the Soviet Union collapsed and after the help from that part of the region stopped, that's what brought on the change in terms of the economic downturn in the conditions for the people in North Korea.

REP. BASS: I see. First of all, let me also just thank you for coming and sharing your testimony. I think it's very, very important that people in this country hear and learn what's going on in North Korea because I don't think much is known here about what is happening there. And the pain and the suffering that you described, the loss of your family members, not knowing where your children are, your husband, you know, it's just -- I think it's an immeasurable amount of pain.

And I appreciate you taking the time and sharing that with us. I think it's especially important because the need for foreign aid and the need for assistance -- and I'm sorry, I don't want to mispronounce your name, Ms. Scholte, Scholte, when you talked about the need for there to be foreign assistance and food and all in times when we're talking about cutting back. So I think the message is critically important.

But Ms. Sook, you were saying that you thought that we shouldn't have discussions, negotiations with North Korea, but at the same time, we should do what we can to you know, deliver food and other things that the population would need. How do we do that? I understand the communication part, funding that, but how would we get aid to people, how would we -- to the people that need it? Ms. Soon could answer first. That'd be great. Ms. Soon or Ms. Sook.

MS. HYE SOOK: I would like to say that the role that's supporting North Korea is because they hear stories of people starving and suffering, but as a North Korean defector, I believe that the regime of North Korea should be completely isolated and that will -- that's the only way to change the regime. And unless North Korea adopts a market economy and changes drastically the way it -- the way the country's run, no -- nothing -- no change will come. And as a defector I would like to say that real help will be for Kim Jong-Il regime to be completely isolated and stop the aid that's being given to the regime.

REP. BASS: Weren't you going for something different?

MS. SCHOLTE: No, actually I agree except I was just making the point that if we're going -- I actually believe in a substantial amount of assistance, but only if we can state to the point of consumption, because if we're -- if the relief -- if we send any amount of assistance to North Korea, it will be diverted. And when you talk to defectors, they never saw any food aid. And when you talk to defectors that served in the military, they'll tell you the World Food Programme goes into town, delivers rice to these families.

Right after they leave, the army comes back and takes it all back. In fact there is Dr. Norbert Vollertsen who testified some years ago about how he'd gone to an orphanage and they handed out cookies, and the kids just there with the cookies waiting for somebody to come back and take it away. So the diversion has been absolute.

And because of that, I think that that's the kind of a message that we could send that would be a very powerful message for positive propaganda which is that we very much are concerned about the starvation and the political prisoner camps and the situation in North Korea. We want to help you. We hear about these stories, we want to help you.

But we want to be sure that we're actually helping the people and we're only going to give that aid if we know that we can stay there. Even from the very beginning when this -- when the famine first started, North Korea put such stipulations on the food aid. They actually didn't want -- I've never heard of this before, but -- I've never heard about this before, and challenge me on this, but I don't think of any situation where there was a country where there was starvation, where the country that was the intended recipient of the aid demanded that the aid deliverers couldn't speak their language.

I don't think that's ever happened any place but North Korea because usually if you're going into a country to deliver aid you're desperate for somebody who speaks the language. But that just speaks volumes about just from the very beginning of their intention to divert aid. So because of the difficulty of preventing from being diverted, that's why I said we should only provide aid if we can be there at the point of consumption.

If we're going to go into -- I can tell you all kinds of stories, but if we're going to go into an orphanage and deliver formula, we're going to make sure those babies get that formula because Action Against Hunger did that and that formula ended up in Pyongyang and the markets and those babies were given watered-down goat's milk when they showed up a month later to find out what happened to the tons of baby food they delivered to that orphanage.

Just one example, but I think that's -- and then the second point I was making is that we should be looking at creative ways to get in information, like radio broadcasting, but also the balloon launches and also to the North Koreans that are -- have defected that are sending in remittances into the country that are helping support their families.

REP. BASS: Thank you very much.

REP. PAYNE: Thank you, and the chairman has returned. I'll relinquish the chair back to him and hold any other questions I have till later time. Thank you.

Mr. Chairman.

REP. SMITH: I want to thank ranking member Payne for leading the committee. Again, I had to leave because a bill of mine on autism was on the floor, and it did pass thankfully.

Let me just ask a question if I could, with regards to a few years back in 2002, in May, I chaired a hearing on North Korean human rights, one of several, and we had Norbert Vollertsen, former medical doctor inside of North Korea who actually was given a huge award by the dictatorship for his medical expertise and the fact that he helped cure a whole lot of people. But he also then told the truth about the human rights situation and he said that they are using food as a weapon, talking about the dictatorship, against their own people. They are committing genocide and I think we have to care. As an international community, we have to intervene.

Ms. Scholte, would you say -- that was in 2002 that the international community, I heard in the opening comments that you had criticism that Bush did not focus on human rights, nor did Bill Clinton in North Korea. We did pass the human rights in North Korea act. I was one of the cosponsors of that. Jim Leach was the prime sponsor. It was an excellent bill. Mr. Payne, all of us strongly supported it.

Has that legislation lived up to its promise? Are we emphasizing human rights sufficiently in our dialogue or whatever it is of a dialogue with the North Koreans?

MS. SCHOLTE: I would say I've been actually very disappointed after all the hard work we did in getting the North Korean Human Rights Act passed. I've been disappointed in -- right from the very start the Bush administration said we welcome these tools that you're giving us to help on this issue, but then they never really used those tools.

It's -- the one thing it didn't help I know with radio broadcasting and expanding VOA and RFA support which was really I believe the result of that legislation was a huge -- was a huge -- one huge great thing, factor that happened with the radio broadcasting that's so important and also helping like Free North Korea Radio, some of the independent broadcasters.

The other thing though too is the special envoy position. I think it's very significant that President Obama has made it very clear that his special envoy Robert King will be part of all discussions and negotiations on North Korea. That was not the case during the Bush administration. Jay Lefkowitz was cut out. So I think that President Obama is taking greater advantage of that legislation to try to do more with the North Korean Rights Act just by the very nature of the way that he's elevated Ambassador King's position.

On the comment you made about North Korea using food as a weapon, that is absolutely true. It uses food as a weapon against its own people, and they have an apartheid-type system in North Korea where people are classified based on loyalty to the regime. You have the elites. Then you have what they consider the wavering class, which is the class that's not considered to be completely loyal to the regime, and then you've got the hostile class.

And if you're in the elites, you may get white rice, but if you're down on that classification system you may never see any rice your whole life. You may get cornmeal. But the thing that's happened with the food is because of the breakdown of the public distribution system, which is how the regime rewarded people through this apartheid-type system based on loyalty, that system is broken down, and that's why these markets are so significant. So you have over 200 markets.

And these are just the ones we know -- can identify by satellite. These are just the ones we know by satellite. There's probably many more markets. But that's how people are surviving. They're trading and selling and buying among themselves in these markets.

REP. SMITH: Either or both of our Kims could just comment, Ms. Kim and Ms. Kim, on one, the use of torture in the gulags. We have had testimony before this committee in the past that Christians and people of faith are even more selected out for repression, especially -- and women who are pregnant are often forcibly aborted in, you know, this -- in an absolutely crude -- they get beaten around the abdomen and then miscarry. So it's a horrible thing.

We even had testimony of boards being put on women and soldiers or gulag security guards jumping on the boards on the abdomen of the pregnant women. Did you experience torture? You mentioned how both of you saw littered bodies everywhere, that people are treated like animals.

I mean, Ms. Kim, you said that a society where the whole country is a prison, a society where those who escape the country in search of freedom are caught and imprisoned and executed and where those who have escaped become lost people and orphans in the international community; a society where chastity and virginity, which is more precious than life, is sold cheaper than the cheapest of things -- of course talking about the scourge of human trafficking.

If you could speak to the use of torture and these terrible and despicable atrocities being committed by the dictatorship -

MS. YOUNG SOON: In answer to your question, regarding my experience at Yodok, before I was sent to Yodok, during the two months of interrogation, I was stuck in a room with no calendar, no clock, really a black hole for two months. And for somebody to come out of that and not go crazy, it's a miracle and that's what I experienced. And in terms of actually being in Yodok, my experience there, I saw violence -- inmate-on-inmate violence. I was injured in my shoulder during work, and also my fingers were injured during work and in terms of torture, the violence, that's what I experienced during my prison experience at Yodok prison camp.

REP. SMITH: Thank you.

Ms. Kim?

MS. HYE SOOK: Regarding my experience, to your question, you could see in some of the drawings that I've displayed what I went through. But at the -- prison camp number 18, there was no paved road, and there were many times where the prison guards would force prisoners -- would stop if these prisoners walking back and forth from work within the camp, they would stop these prisoners, force them to open their mouths and these prisoners would -- these prison guards would spit the phlegm into the mouths -- open mouths of prisoners and would tell them if you swallow it, you will not be beaten, but if you throw up or resist you will be relentlessly beaten.

And she herself experienced that torture three times during her 28 years there, and in 2005 when she -- after she was released from the camp and she was caught -- she went into China, was caught and repatriated, during the detention period when she was going through that, she saw an instance where women who were also caught and repatriated were forced to -- repeated sitting and standing-up action so that anything they were hiding in their uterus would fall out, hidden money or other contraband that the prison guards were trying to find. So that's the extent of the torture that she witnessed from her time in North Korea.

REP. SMITH: Mr. Scarlatoiu, if you could -- you indicate in your testimony that there's evidence that human rights abuses in North Korea are intensifying as the regime takes steps towards leadership succession. Could you speak further on that issue and perhaps some of the evidence that you have that suggest that --

MR. SCARLATOIU: Mr. Chairman, I should tell you that our organization has published one quite well-known report on the political prisoner camps in North Korea, called Hidden Gulag, that happened in 2003 and are in the process of putting together a second edition. And towards that goal we have collected testimony by at least about 60 former inmates of political prisoner camps.

The difference between now and then is that we have had testimony from some guards. We have better satellite imagery. Based on such testimony we seem to see intensified political repression. We seem to see a crackdown along the border with China, and all indications are that the new center nucleus of power being created around the third son of Kim Jong-il, around Kim Jong-un, is not composed of any type of reform.

We have all indication -- including violent provocations against South Korea, violent military provocations, dispatching of assassins -- intensified human rights violations in North Korea. We have all evidence that we are dealing with very hardliners.

REP. SMITH: Let me ask a question with regards to Juche. I read a book some years back about the self-reliance religion and the cult of personality, the deification of Kim Jong-il and Kim Il-sung before him. And it was a very detailed heavily footnoted book with how they brainwash the people of North Korea. And I'm wondering if all of you might speak to this and especially the two Kims -- how did they overcome this brainwashing effort.

Do people in North Korea really regard Kim Jong-il as God? There was a National Geographic piece recently, and I watched it with great interest. I watched it more than once, and a doctor went to North Korea to do some surgeries on the eye and he was having phenomenal success teaching other doctors and practitioners in North Korea to do so.

But I was astonished how the people who had been helped, especially at a -- like a group meeting were looking at a picture of Kim Jong-il and thanking him and getting on their knees and worshipping him. And the intensity of it was quite unnerving, frankly. And I'm wondering how that plays into -- I mean, they deny people information, they jam obviously outside broadcasts, but this brainwashing obviously starts from the moment a child can speak and talk and -- hear, I should say. And I'm wondering how they overcame that, the people -- was what we saw on that video true that he is regarded as a God?

MS. YOUNG SOON: I'd like to answer your question by saying that in North Korea from basically childbirth, from kindergarten on little children are brainwashed into believing that Kim Il-sung, Kim Jong-il are capable of superhuman accomplishments and that there are not enough words to praise, not enough words in the world to praise Kim Il-sung and Kim Jong-il. And they're so brainwashed that there's no room whatsoever in their minds to think otherwise in North Korea.

And the people in North Korea, the situation with their minds -- their minds have been replaced with a brainwashed mind. And there's no freedom to travel. It's a country where you need special color-coded passes to travel to a particular place; and it's a nation -- it's a society where hands and feet are tied of the people so that they cannot travel or be free in that society.

MS. HYE SOOK: To answer your question, from my experience as soon as you're born in North Korea you are taught phrases -- thank you to your leader; thank you great leader.

And one example I'd like to give you, sir, is that in 2009 when I escaped to China there was a woman with a young daughter, with a young child -- young daughter who accompanied me. And the Chinese family that was helping us gave this starving child food, and the first words out of this child's mouth when she received the food was, thank you, dear leader Kim Jong-il.

So that goes to show you the extent of the brainwashing. And in North Korea from the moment you're born till the day you die -- thank you dear leader Kim Jong-il; thank you great leader, Kim Il-sung, those words are just a brainwashing to the people's minds.

REP. SMITH: And let me just ask a few final questions and then -- did you want -- yes, Ms. Scholte.

MS. SCHOLTE: Oh, I was going to add one comment about -- that's one of the things about this whole idea. There's a woman I met who had been a defector and I -- she taught philosophy, so I casually asked her, oh, who's your favorite philosopher.

You know, just -- (laughs.) And she was like, oh, I only taught Kim Il-sungism and Marxism for the first 10 years of my career and then for the last 10 years just Kim Jong-ilism.

And I said, well, are you -- when you got free -- to South Korea, did you -- did you pursue philosophy?

And she said, no, I was afraid that my brain was too twisted to be able to understand that.

And I thought the fact that she admitted that proved that it wasn't, that she -- you know, that her brain had opened up. But she was actually studying North Korean studies to figure out a way to help her country. But I want to say the -- one of the programs that Free North Korea Radio is trying to do -- and we're actually reaching out to the Christian churches to help this, but they want to do a program explaining the concept of, you know, when we think of religious faith and self-sacrifice and helping others versus what they're brainwashed to believe, to try to help North Koreans kind of open their minds to understanding the concepts of what we -- what we value in the western world, which is serving others and helping others, which is the complete opposite of everything that they're taught, which is they're the servants of the regime.

And that's one of the things that I think is really important, because the defectors know how to articulate those kinds of things. And another thing, too -- there's a organization called the Coalition for North Korea Women Solidarity. And this is a coalition formed by North Korean women, most of whom were victims of trafficking.

But the whole concept -- when they first came to South Korea, the whole concept of human rights was completely alien to them. And we believe that -- socialist societies try to say that well, women are equal.

But in North Korea women are treated horribly. And so this is something that they're doing to help restore these women and teach them that the value they are -- as human beings the value are as a women. But it's a very important progress the defectors are taking.

REP. SMITH: Thank you.

Mr. Scarlatoiu --

MR. SCARLATOIU: Mr. Chairman, I think that brutal and ruthless dictators such as the Kims in North Korea and the cult of personality built around them depend by far and large on denying their citizens knowledge of alternative economic, social and political systems. You have mentioned that Christians are subject to harsh punishment. We have also come across evidence that among those North Korean defectors forcibly repatriated from China, those who have come in contact with Christian missionaries or South Koreans face particularly harsh punishment, in some cases amounting to public executions.

Most likely, the main reason beyond that is that both Christianity and South Korea present alternative systems. One great advantage that Eastern Europeans had primarily through public broadcasting that they were receiving from the outside world was that it was clear to them that the capitalists, liberal democracies of the West were clearly the alternative. And I really think that we have an opportunity now to focus on improving the flow of information to North Korea, to persuade not only the overwhelming majority of North Koreans who are so oppressed but also why not the elites of North Korea that there is life after the Kim regime and that alternatives are available?

REP. SMITH: Let me just make a note here that we've asked -- I've asked the administration in hearings and through other meetings to put China on Tier 3 for human trafficking not only because of the horrific rise in sex trafficking in the People's Republic of China, among the Chinese, but also because if a North Korean woman thinks she has gotten to relative safety and freedom by crossing the border, she invariably is sold into human trafficking, and the Chinese government doesn't lift a single finger to mitigate her pain and to rescue her and to crack down on the traffickers who dot the border looking for women who are leaving that country.

They also violate the refugee convention, and China is a signatory to the refugee convention because they send back men and women who are most likely to be incarcerated in the gulag, if not executed, for leaving without permission. So China bears a huge responsibility for its enabling and complicity in the crimes of Pyongyang. Let me also ask just a final question. How would you rate the international community's response, including the U.S., Europe and especially the United Nations? There is -- there's a high commissioner for Human Rights. There are -- there's a whole rapporteur system.

Obviously they have not had access in most cases to North Korea. But there's also the Human Rights Council, which was supposed to speak truth to power regardless of the consequences and hold countries to account. Now, I frequently would -- when it was a commission and now the council -- would ask the council or commission to raise human rights in North Korea.

And frankly, there have been resolutions in the past, but it has struck me that they're almost like pro forma resolutions. They have low expectations. There's no sense of shock or dismay over what the Kim -- Kim Jong-il has been doing and his fellow dictators in Pyongyang. And there's that sense that, you know, is it obligatory chastisement and no one expects anything to change, and because of those low expectations, that country in no way is held to account.

So why is the international community so incredibly passive when it comes to what is equivalent to what the Nazis did in its gulags to its own people and to Jews and to others, which is going on current day in North Korea? If you could speak to that and to our -- the two Kims -- finally, I was in South Korea recently, spoke to a number of lawmakers and others in Seoul and I was kind of surprised -- and maybe I'm wrong in my impression to glean from that experience that many people in South Korea don't have the kind of understanding that the two Kims here have brought to this committee, and that is what goes on in those gulags and the huge repression that is from womb to tomb by the dictatorship.

The young people kind of trivialize it in South Korea. Is that true, or is that a false impression that I picked up on that trip? You know, they know it's there, but it's not as bad and they just don't seem to take it at face value for the huge atrocity that it is. So any of you who would like to speak to that?

MR. SCARLATOIU: Chairman Smith, regarding your first question, at the Committee for Human Rights in North Korea we are very familiar with the work and the reporting done by the U.N. special rapporteurs on the human rights situation in North Korea. Both the current rapporteur, Professor Darusman from Indonesia and the previous rapporteur Professor Vitit Muntarbhorn from Thailand, are very dedicated scholars and very good human beings who have worked very hard to put together --

REP. SMITH: I would note Param has testified before our committee in the past.

MR. SCARLATOIU: We're aware of that, sir. So they've done extraordinary work to shed light on the atrocities and the human rights violations happening in North Korea. I think that organizations such as ours have a duty to inform the international community to conduct research to publish on the human rights violations happening in North Korea and to engage in robust public information campaigns to inform the public here in the United States and beyond and also to inform North Koreans on the rights that they have that are being violated with such impudence.

MS. SCHOLTE: I was going to say that you mentioned China and I would say that there's a direct correlation between the ability of the U.N. to do anything and China stymieing those efforts. And what you mentioned about the refugees -- this is the most solvable human rights crisis that's going on in the world today. It could be solved overnight if China simply followed the treaties that it's signed.

The UNHDR has an office in Beijing. These refugees have a place to go. They're the only refugees I know in the world that -- again, another thing that makes North Korea unique -- that have a place to go, because they are citizens under the South Korean constitution. And of course our North Korean Human Rights Act says that we'll take them -- some here, you know, and people are willing to resettle them.

So there's no reason for China to continue this brutal policy of repatriation that's caused 80 percent of North Korean women to be trafficked in this -- basically modern-day slave markets. And I believe you have a hearing tomorrow.

One of the pressures on this is the fact that China has a shortage of women because they've been murdering unborn baby girls all these years. They've had this policy of -- one-child policy. And that's led to the shortage of women. So that's why you have North Korean women that are vulnerable that are being sold. But China is the reason why we can't get more action at the United Nations -- because they block efforts.

They actually blocked the -- when the Cheonan -- everyone realized that North Korea had caused the death of these South Korean sailors, China was the one that was suppressing that -- action on that. And so as long as you have a country like China that has tremendous influence on the U.N. that is evolved in perpetrating these crimes that are happening in North Korea, you're not going to get any real action by the United Nations. And you know, I -- just -- that's my -- and I know you want to say something, too.

MS. YOUNG SOON: I would like to add that North Korea -- currently the Kim Jong-il regime is -- the crimes against humanity committed by the Kim Jong-il regime is the worst in the world, and the United States needs to just totally isolate the regime of Kim Jong-il. The best way to go about prosecuting the crimes against humanity that Kim Jong-il has committed is to report it to the International Criminal Court. And Ms. Kim believes that the United States will be able to do a good job of leading a international movement -- work to make this -- to bring about this work of bringing Kim Jong-il to the ICC, to the International Criminal Court.

And I'd just like to say again that as long as Kim Jong-il is -- as long as he exists the people's suffering will continue. And I would just like to say once again that my earnest desire is that the United States will take the lead in helping the world -- entire world focus on the important issue of focusing on human rights issue and of isolating Kim Jong-il regime and to not provide any aid or help that will only go towards keeping the regime alive.

MS. HYE SOOK: I also would like to point out, as I'm sitting here before media and before the congressmen here, that regarding food aid, I would just like to point out that my younger sister and brother who are still in the prison camp, certainly all the food aid that has been given is not going to them. It's not being sent to them where the people that need it the most, the prisoners, starving prisoners in prison would need the food aid the most.

But it's only going to the elites, to the military or to the security apparatus and feeding them and empowering them, only giving them more life, more power to continue the abuse that I drew in the drawings that you could see on display here.

MS. SCHOLTE: I was going to make -- I saw also the attitude in South Korea, right? You were asking also about the attitude in South Korea?

REP. SMITH: Yes, the South Korean -- just the young people. That's ---

MS. SCHOLTE: Yes. I definitely think they might want to have a comment about that.

REP. SMITH: It's almost like a sense of disbelief as to the scope --

MS. SCHOLTE: Yes.

REP. SMITH: -- and the cruelty of Kim Jong-Il.

MS. SCHOLTE: This is so important because --

REP. SMITH: And is it the media that has downplayed it? What is --

MS. SCHOLTE: This has been a -- yeah, that's a huge issue that's so important, because you would think that the country that should care the most has been the slowest to respond. The reason for that is during the years of the D.J. Kim government and the Roh government, they actually banned information to be reported about what's going on in North Korea because they had the Sunshine Policy, which is basically an engagement policy.

And the award winning documentary "Soul Train," which is still very popular today for example, that was done -- produced by some Americans about the refugee crisis in China and North Koreans escaping and the whole situation, that was banned from being shown in South Korea by the government.

So there was a suppression of the horrors that were going on. They can tell you stories about -- she wanted to speak before the South Korean assembly but she wasn't able to do it, Ms. Kim.

REP. SMITH: Really?

MS. SCHOLTE: And what's happened though is -- well, she was going to speak before the -- okay. And they could share that with you. But what happened is, with the provocations that have happened against South Korea by North Korea, unprovoked attacks, it's -- there's been an awakening in South Korea, and I'm very pleased to see a lot of young people getting drawn to this issue.

I've actually gone to a conference in 2002, an international conference on North Korean human rights in Seoul in which people like these defectors were going to speak and there were students protesting against the conference. And -- but that has changed a lot. You had -- young people are really getting drawn to the issue.

But it's been very difficult to move the hearts and soul of the Korean lawmakers. They still have not passed the North Korean Human Rights Act, which has been done by Japan and the United States bipartisan, and that's been a real source of contention and that the South Koreans --

REP. SMITH: You know, it brings to mind, after World War II it was Eisenhower who said, "Do not burn down the concentration camps because there were some Germans who were in disbelief that it was real." And it seems to me that when it's an actual policy of a government to suppress the truth, there was something inherently wrong with that because it creates a distortion, a gross caricature of what Pyongyang is actually doing. And I hope this hearing -- and it will be followed by additional hearings -- will further the information.

I mean, I was telling or in conversations conveying information about what I had read and what I had learned from hearings and from defectors that had -- and my friends who are South Koreans with whom I was meeting was met with disbelief, as if somehow I was exaggerating or engaging in some kind of hyperbole, when the truth on the ground as you have borne so ably witness to, is even worse than what we could imagine in terms of the cruelty and mistreatment. So I thank you for attending --

MS. SCHOLTE: I have something else I can assure you. In October, I was at a balloon launch and I was with Kim Sung-Min, Park Sang Hak, the North Korea Peoples Liberation Front. We were getting ready to do a balloon launch and there was a former North Korean defector who deserted the military. And he was so upset because there was these leftist South Koreans trying to stop the balloon launch, and saying -- they were pro-Kim Jong-Il."

And he was so upset, I mean, he almost had tears in his eyes. And he was like, "I came from that country. How can they deny the horrible things that I've seen?" And I remember holding him and saying, "Well, we don't want to get into a confrontation with them."

And I said something like I know how you feel. And I thought, I don't know how he feels. The people -- that he could have gone through these horrible things and that -- and then have people like be denying it and trying to stop him from doing something to reach out to the people who are suffering.

REP. SMITH: Ms. Kim?

MS. HYE SOOK: Ms. Kim would just like add what you said, Congressman Smith, about the people in South Korea, the young people, to the politicians not fully knowing or understanding or appreciating the situation in North Korea. She wholeheartedly concurs with that statement. And because of the strong presence of the leftists and the pro-North Korean elements in South Korean society, Ms. Kim believes that the peninsula is not ready for unification.

South Korea is not ready to be unified with North Korea. And she would again like to ask for the United States to take the lead in increasing knowledge and awareness about the situation in North Korea and help lead other nations to be able to achieve this.

And there are 23,000 North Korean defectors resettled in South Korea and also there is a diaspora of North Korean defectors that are all over the world. And if there is any sort of encouragement, help, financial help, that's given to us, we will stop at nothing and we will dedicate our very lives to bring about change in the regime in North Korea. And you could trust me when I say that, Congressman Smith.

REP. SMITH: Well, Ms. Kim, I think your point about the leftist truly enabling by either suppressing or by denying that these atrocities are occurring, that makes them complicit in these crimes against humanity. And I would hope that clear-thinking people, newspapers and other media in South Korea would just tell the truth about what is going on North Korea because the truth is liberating.

And I would also add my endorsement to what you said about Kim Jong-Il and others being held to account for genocide at the International Criminal Court. They have committed barbaric crimes.

And you know, with -- while there are some UN individuals who have spoke out, there's been no holding to account in any meaningful way. So I echo and endorse what you said.

Mr. Payne?

REP. PAYNE: Thank you very much. I just have a quick question and I'll make a little comment quickly. With the prospect of the anticipation that Kim Jong-Il leaves, his son would take over -- that's a horrible prospect -- what do you see the consequence of something like that happening?

MS. YOUNG SOON: Ms. Kim believes that Kim Jong-Nam will never be recognized or become the true leader in North Korea. But should he or if he were to become the next leader, Ms. Kim believes that there is chance that he might open up and reform the country, from her point of view and her opinion.

REP. PAYNE: Thank you very much. I just want to comment that I think that in separated countries like we see in Korea, the fact that much -- in many instances the truth certainly is kept from the people in the south, the total truth, and it's difficult to know whose responsibility -- is it the government, is it the press', is it deliberate.

One thing that usually happens in divided countries as we saw in Eastern and Western Europe, although, you know, you can't compare Eastern Europe, totally, certainly not to North Korea. But there was the strong move for reunification. It's just the natural nationalistic move to reunite countries that were once united.

And so I could possibly understand why some of the younger people would be striving for unification, trying to of course have a change, a regime change in the north. So it's -- I think it's kind of just normal nationalism, especially a country that may have felt that it's been, you know, abused or exploited by, you know, world wars and things of that nature.

The other I thing I remember clearly as I traveled to Eastern Europe in the late '60s, and I went to Poland, Germany and Russia with some West Europeans. And saw in those -- and especially in Poland, photos of and newsreels of the films taken inside of Warsaw with the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. And these were young adults, my age at that time, who could not believe how brutal their parents were when they were leading the Nazi regime.

And you know, they were talking in their own language, but I could kind of understand what the internal discussion was going on about, is this true, almost disbelief. So you know, I think that as we move forward, we're going to have to work with educating people to overcome some of these natural things.

I also think that we should try to become even more active in the Human Rights Council. There have been some progress made, because before the U.S. joined the council, when it was the committee before and then the council, issues like what's happening in Syria, the brutality of Bashar on his people, the -- some of the other issues would never ever be raised.

And so there have been -- I think because the U.S. has raised the issues they got to deal with them. And that's why I think it's important for us to be in the room, so that there can be answers when our allies are criticized or resolutions continually come criticizing them. We can then now say, well, wait a minute, let me give you the other point of view.

So I do hope that those agencies will also be strengthened as we move. And then, of course, that's not being a part of the Rome statutes. It makes us a little less significant in the ICC, where we have difficulty pushing for indictments for war criminals who should be indicted and the cases should be raised.

Final thing I'd like to say -- really commend the South Korean government. Several years ago I visited -- one of my trustee Ethiopian there is a hospital that the South Korean government built, probably the best hospital in Sub-Saharan Africa, just about -- and they did it because they were appreciative of the Ethiopian soldiers who fought in the Korean War. And actually, most stunning is that for those veterans who are still alive, who served, they have been paying pensions to these Ethiopian soldiers ever since the end or at -- I don't know exactly if it started right at the end of the war, but for decades.

And those that are still alive receive a monthly regular stipend from the government of Korea. So I think that the -- if some of the goodwill in Southern Korea could kind of work its way up to the North that would be a positive statement.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for calling this very important meeting -- hearing.

REP. SMITH: Thank you, Mr. Payne.

Just to conclude, I would like to ask unanimous consent that the testimony of Kim Sung-Min, director of Free North Korea Radio be made a part of the record. Without objection, so ordered. And I would ask that all members have five legislative days to revise and extend the remarks, and just make one comment with regards a related issue.

I'd like to comment on recent reports of the continued deportation of Chinese Falun Gong practitioners from South Korea to China. As is well known, the Falun Gong are brutally persecuted in China along with numerous other groups who attempt to exercise their internationally recognized human rights of freedom of thought, conscience and religion. So I join my voice with that of other members of Congress urging South Korea to recognize Falun Gong practitioners as refugees and not forcibly return them to China where they will certainly face persecution.

South Korea should also find an appropriate means within the South Korean legal system and the international conventions on torture and refugees that it is ratified to permit these Falun Gong practitioners to remain in South Korea. I would note that on Thursday the subcommittee will hear testimony on -- it will be the 30th hearing on human rights abuses in China.

It's entitled "China's One-Child Policy: The Government's Massive Crime Against Women and Unborn Babies." And I mention this especially in light of Suzanne Scholte and others who have -- there is a nexus between the one-child per couple policy, the dearth of females in the PRC. Estimates range from an excess of a hundred million missing girls in China so that when North Korean women make their way over the border, the traffickers are waiting to sell them into modern-day slavery and to sex trafficking.

And China has not only not lifted a finger to stop it, they have enabled it. And it is attributable in part, maybe a large part, to the one-child per couple policy. We will hear from two victims of forced abortion who will tell their story, Chai Ling, the great Tiananmen Square activist, who founded All Girls Allowed; Reggie Littlejohn and Valerie Johnson, who will speak about the military implications of the one-child per couple policy.

I do want to thank this very, very effective group of witnesses for shedding light on the egregious human rights abuses of Kim Jong-Il and thank you for bearing witness to the truth. We need to do much more than we've done. That goes for our subcommittee, the Congress, the executive branch and the free world.

And again, I want to thank all of our witnesses, and especially our two women who have made their way to the U.S., come a long distance, suffered, lost loved ones, for speaking truth to a very totalitarian power. I would like to give the last word, if any of our witnesses would like to say anything in conclusion, but --

MS. SCHOLTE: I was just going to -- I was going to just announce that we are having at noon, on Thursday, September 22nd a protest. We are calling on people wherever you are in the world to go to the Chinese embassy at noon to protest the repatriation of North Korean refugees, and we have petitions that people are delivering. And so far we have 25 cities and 13 countries that are participating.

REP. SMITH: Wow. Very interesting.

MS. SCHOLTE: so I wanted to mention that.

MR. SCARLATOIU: Mr. Chairman, I would like to tell you that in addition to one report that I have mentioned that we are working on, on the political prisoner camps in North Korea, we are also working on a report on the circulation of information inside North Korea, and we will be happy to share these reports as soon as they're published with the sub-committee.

MR. SMITH: And we will disseminate it widely among the members of Congress. So thank you.

MR. SCARLATOIU: Sir.

MR. SMITH: Thank you. The hearing's adjourned, and thank you very much.

Ambassador-at-Large, Office To Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons

Statement Before the Senate Committee on the Judiciary

Washington, DC

September 14, 2011

Good morning. I'd like to thank Chairman Leahy, Senator Grassley, and all the members of the Committee for the opportunity to testify today. I am Ambassador Lou de Baca. As President Obama's Ambassador-at-Large to Combat Human Trafficking, I direct the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons (G/TIP) and I am responsible for leading our efforts in the global fight against modern slavery.

In addition to the production of the annual Trafficking in Persons Report and a range of direct diplomatic and public engagement on human trafficking issues, one of the primary responsibilities of our office is the administration of foreign assistance funds for international anti-trafficking programs.

Our grantees operate in all regions of the world and are advancing all three Ps of the 3P Paradigm—prevention, prosecution, and protection—that guide our efforts to fight modern slavery here at home and around the world. That means the work of our grantees runs the gamut of anti-trafficking efforts, whether victim protection and rehabilitation, training for prosecutors and law enforcement officials, or prevention efforts, including partnerships with civil society and the private sector, that look to address this crime and curb demand before it takes place. These efforts are closely linked to the mandates and purposes laid out in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) and its subsequent reauthorizations. The provisions in the TVPA help to prioritize the allocation of our anti-trafficking funds.

Because the three Ps function as an interlocking paradigm, no single P stands alone. For example, it is not enough to prosecute traffickers if we do not also provide assistance to the survivors and work to ensure that no one else is victimized. Thus, many of G/TIP's projects are cross-cutting in their approach to combating trafficking, and we place a particular emphasis on programs that address victim protection. Ninety percent of projects we have funded last year include a protection component and 61 percent provide direct services for victims. Just over half of the projects build capacity of local law enforcement and prosecutors to apprehend and prosecute traffickers; victim protection is a critical component of these projects as well because justice for the most vulnerable begins with a robust victim-centered approach. More than 90 percent of prevention programs include victim protection activities. Fifty-nine percent of all protection programs include activities to increase prosecutions and convictions, and nearly three quarters of projects focus on both labor and sex trafficking to ensure a comprehensive response to all forms of trafficking.

As I hope to demonstrate today, the programs we help fund are successful, but our foreign assistance budget is modest relative to the global scale of the crime of trafficking in persons. Our final foreign assistance appropriation for this fiscal year was $16.2 million. While we put every penny of that sum to good use, that total stands in stark contrast to a crime exploiting as many as 27 million victims worldwide.

My testimony will demonstrate that the appropriation for our international programs is money well spent, both in terms of the transparency of our grant selection process and in terms of the effectiveness of these funds in advancing U.S. foreign policy.

A good starting point is to explain how we decide to spend our foreign assistance funds. Responsible administration of foreign assistance funds is a top priority for our office. That's why we've implemented a rigorous, transparent, and competitive application process for our grants.

Our foreign assistance and programming priorities are strategically linked to the country-specific tier rankings and diagnostic assessments included in the annual TIP Report. To maximize our limited funding, we identify priority countries for funding each year. We generally target our foreign assistance to Tier 3, Tier 2 Watch List, and, in some cases, Tier 2 countries, where governments have the political will to improve the response to trafficking but lack the economic resources to address the problem. In addition to targeting Tier 3, Tier 2 Watch List, and selected Tier 2 countries, we also consider a country's financial resources and need for technical support, political will to address trafficking in persons, and other funding that may be already used to address trafficking in the country.

At the start of the process, our office posts information about funding priorities and the availability of funds for anti-trafficking projects on our website. We convene a half-day bidders' conference for potential applicants, which in the past has been attended by nearly 150 representatives of NGOs, universities, and international organizations, among others. For those not able to attend the conference, we publish the material presented on our website.

We solicit proposals via www.grantsolutions.gov and www.grants.gov, the portals for U.S. government grants, and through a global call for proposals through U.S. embassies abroad. Solicitations conducted via www.grantsolutions.gov and www.grants.gov involve applicants submitting their proposals through the systems managed by OMB and HHS. The global call for proposals is a partnership between U.S. embassies and G/TIP, as we ask U.S. embassies to inform organizations working on trafficking how proposals may be submitted to G/TIP.

Grant proposals that are submitted to G/TIP in response to solicitations for bilateral or regional projects are reviewed for technical requirements. Proposals that meet the minimum technical standards (English language, figures in U.S. dollars, and published page limits) are forwarded to U.S. embassies for review by the TIP country team, which may include the political officer, USAID, and other relevant offices. The country team reviews applications and provides feedback to the Department on proposals for bilateral projects that are submitted to G/TIP.

Proposals are then subjected to a competitive interagency regional review panel that provides an opportunity for input from representatives of G/TIP; the relevant Regional Bureau; other offices within the Department that fund anti-trafficking programs; the USAID regional representative; and, as appropriate, other U.S. government agencies.

G/TIP anti-trafficking projects are primarily funded as grants, cooperative agreements, or Interagency Agreements and managed by the G/TIP Grants Officer and International Programs Officers. However, some projects are awarded at State Department posts abroad if G/TIP and post determine that this would facilitate more effective management of the project.

The selection of proposals for funding is based on program priorities and requirements conveyed in the solicitation for proposals. In an ongoing effort to improve the design and effectiveness of anti-trafficking projects, in FY07, G/TIP began to explicitly require applicants to clearly articulate goals and objectives, activities to support each objective, as well as indicators to measure success. The FY07 revised solicitation format was recognized as a model for other offices within the Department.

To further improve the competitive process, in FY10, our office initiated a two-stage grant application process that streamlined the application for organizations seeking funding and reduced the U.S. government resources required to review hundreds of 30-page proposals, while preserving fairness and transparency. In the first stage applicants submit a two-page proposal or concept note and following the review described, selected applicants are invited to submit a full proposal for competitive review.

The required proposal elements stated in solicitations constitute the basis for evaluating proposals. Each panel recommends to me proposals for funding. The results of the review panels are compiled for my review and consideration. I select proposals that best reflect the programming needs for the specific country as identified in the TIP Report, as well as global and regional program needs. Following review and approval of recommended projects by the Director of Foreign Assistance, all projects are sent for Congressional Notification. Abstracts of recommended proposals are distributed to the members of the Senior Policy Operating Group (SPOG) for a final review and comment.

The review process is thorough and transparent, involving numerous partners within the State Department and across government, and of course concluding with Congressional consultation. Such diligence is necessary given the demand for our international program funding. In the last two years, the Office received 998 applications requesting a total of $547 million.

In recent years, G/TIP has taken several steps to shorten the time from proposal submission to project award, including hiring more program officers (from five in 2009 to nine in 2011) and establishing the grants officer and budget officer positions within G/TIP. In contrast to previous years, almost all of foreign assistance funds were obligated in 2010 and we expect the same this year.

Our thorough pre-award review process is necessarily coupled with effective monitoring and evaluation of international programs. The program and grant officers within the Department have monitored anti-trafficking grant projects to provide technical assistance to grantees and to ensure that project goals and objectives are implemented; that Federal grant funds are expended consistent with the provisions of pertinent statutes, regulations, agency administrative requirements; and, that Federal funds are used responsibly.

Grantees are required to submit program progress and financial reports throughout the project period and final reports within 90 days of the end of the project.

The U.S. embassy officers are partners in program monitoring. G/TIP notifies the appropriate officer at post when a new grant is awarded; the guidance from G/TIP provides key project information and recommends procedures for embassy participation in monitoring which are subject to embassy staffing and workloads. When G/TIP Program Officers conduct site visits they use a standardized format for review of administrative and programmatic aspects of the project and the TIP point of contact at the embassy accompanies the officer on the site visit, if available. This practice facilitates close collaboration between the post and G/TIP and strengthens follow-on monitoring by posts.

We take great care in ensuring that we are responsible custodians of the taxpayers' money, and I believe G/TIP has succeeded in our efforts to make the administration of our programs funding as transparent and accountable as possible. But the true success story here is the programs themselves. Whether in Cote D'Ivoire, where Prosperite is providing basic shelter and services to young girls; or in Thailand, where TRAFCORD has coordinated a series of successful rescues of labor and sex trafficking victims and serves as a model in the region; or in Mexico, where Casa Alianza is working to increase the identification of TIP victims among highly vulnerable street children; or in India where projects demonstrate best practices in raising awareness of government services for freed bonded laborers and aftercare following their release; or in Ghana where a U.S. expert provided technical assistance to local prosecutors leading to a path-breaking conviction, the first of its kind in a forced child labor case, the true success of our programs is the results we are seeing.

The sad reality is that without the modest funding G/TIP is able to provide, many of the projects we support would have to close their doors. That would mean more than just the end of a victim identification initiative or the shuttering of a shelter for survivors. In many instances, it would mean the end of all such services in that country. That must not be the mark of our foreign policy.

The President and Secretary Clinton have made the effort to combat modern slavery a priority because it is in our strategic interest to combat modern slavery. Human trafficking thrives in places where vulnerable populations slip through the cracks and live without the protection of law. The places where we support anti-trafficking programs are the places where we need to show that the United States will stand up for those who cannot stand up for themselves.

But fighting slavery is more than good foreign policy. It's part of who we are as a nation. We cannot walk away from that responsibility here at home or in our conduct around the world.

I thank you again for the opportunity to testify today. We look forward to working with you further to provide information or answer questions that would provide additional clarity or background.

Migrants tell of slavery at sea on Thai fishing boats

BYLINE: The Nation

Thousands of men from Burma and Cambodia set sail on Thai fishing boats every day, but many are unwilling seafarers - slaves forced to work in brutal conditions under threat of death.

The day Hla Myint saw the sea for the first time was when traffickers delivered him, after a week's trek through the jungle from Burma, to a ship on Thailand's coast. He said it was the beginning of seven months of "hell", during which there were beatings "every day, every hour".

His is one of a multitude of stories of slavery in Thailand's multi-million-dollar fishing industry, which campaigners say relies on forced labour to provide seafood for restaurants and supermarkets across the world.

Hla Myint decided to escape - throwing himself into choppy waters and clinging to a life buoy for five hours before reaching land - after seeing his captain kill a crewmate.

"My heart pounded so hard when I saw that," said Hla Myint, whose name has been changed to protect his identity. Now he works with a local aid group helping others to flee.

The UN recently acknowledged Thailand's "significant progress" in efforts to tackle trafficking, but said it needed to go further.

Sirirat Ayuwathana of the Social Development and Human Security Ministry, said authorities were aware of the problem and planned to set up a commission to work on registering all fishing boats and crew members.

"We cannot know what happens when the boats leave the shore. The workers could be tortured or detained. The captains have total control of the boat, and they may mistreat these people," she said.

Life on the boats is hard. Men toil for up to 20 hours a day, seven days a week, only snatching a few moments for food and rest between hauling nets, according to the International Organisation for Migration (IOM).

Phil Robertson of Human Rights Watch, who wrote the report, said marine police in one Thai coastal area told him they found up to 10 bodies a month washed up on the shore.

In a 2009 study, more than half of the Cambodian migrants trafficked onto Thai boats surveyed by the UN Inter-Agency Project on Human Trafficking (UNIAP) said they had seen their captains killing one of their colleagues.

But Mana Sripitak, of the National Fisheries Association of Thailand, said it was "impossible" that forced labour was used, saying migrants were willing workers. The US State Department has placed Thailand on a trafficking in persons "watchlist" for two years running.

On a recent visit to Thailand, UN special rapporteur on people trafficking, Joy Ngozi Ezeilo, said the country was not doing enough to curb the trade. "The immunity of traffickers, especially the collusion with the official law-enforcement agencies, is really diluting the government's effort and efficacy of its policies and programmes to combat human trafficking," she said.

The sad reality is that without the modest funding G/TIP is able to provide, many of the projects we support would have to close their doors. That would mean more than just the end of a victim identification initiative or the shuttering of a shelter for survivors. In many instances, it would mean the end of all such services in that country. That must not be the mark of our foreign policy.

The President and Secretary Clinton have made the effort to combat modern slavery a priority because it is in our strategic interest to combat modern slavery. Human trafficking thrives in places where vulnerable populations slip through the cracks and live without the protection of law. The places where we support anti-trafficking programs are the places where we need to show that the United States will stand up for those who cannot stand up for themselves.

But fighting slavery is more than good foreign policy. It's part of who we are as a nation. We cannot walk away from that responsibility here at home or in our conduct around the world.

I thank you again for the opportunity to testify today. We look forward to working with you further to provide information or answer questions that would provide additional clarity or background.

Statement of Luis CdeBaca Ambassador-at-Large , Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons U.S. Department of State

Committee on Senate Judiciary

September 14, 2011

Good morning. I'd like to thank Chairman Leahy, Senator Grassley, and all the members of the Committee for the opportunity to testify today. I am Ambassador Lou de Baca. As President Obama's Ambassador-at-Large to Combat Human Trafficking, I direct the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons (G/TIP) and I am responsible for leading our efforts in the global fight against modern slavery.

In addition to the production of the annual Trafficking in Persons Report and a range of direct diplomatic and public engagement on human trafficking issues, one of the primary responsibilities of our office is the administration of foreign assistance funds for international anti-trafficking programs.

Our grantees operate in all regions of the world and are advancing all three Ps of the 3P Paradigm prevention, prosecution, and protection that guide our efforts to fight modern slavery here at home and around the world. That means the work of our grantees runs the gamut of anti-trafficking efforts, whether victim protection and rehabilitation, training for prosecutors and law enforcement officials, or prevention efforts, including partnerships with civil society and the private sector, that look to address this crime and curb demand before it takes place. These efforts are closely linked to the mandates and purposes laid out in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) and its subsequent reauthorizations. The provisions in the TVPA help to prioritize the allocation of our anti-trafficking funds.

Because the three Ps function as an interlocking paradigm, no single P stands alone. For example, it is not enough to prosecute traffickers if we do not also provide assistance to the survivors and work to ensure that no one else is victimized. Thus, many of G/TIP's projects are cross-cutting in their approach to combating trafficking, and we place a particular emphasis on programs that address victim protection. Ninety percent of projects we have funded last year include a protection component and 61 percent provide direct services for victims. Just over half of the projects build capacity of local law enforcement and prosecutors to apprehend and prosecute traffickers; victim protection is a critical component of these projects as well because justice for the most vulnerable begins with a robust victim-centered approach. More than 90 percent of prevention programs include victim protection activities. Fifty-nine percent of all protection programs include activities to increase prosecutions and convictions, and nearly three quarters of projects focus on both labor and sex trafficking to ensure a comprehensive response to all forms of trafficking.

As I hope to demonstrate today, the programs we help fund are successful, but our foreign assistance budget is modest relative to the global scale of the crime of trafficking in persons. Our final foreign assistance appropriation for this fiscal year was $16.2 million. While we put every penny of that sum to good use, that total stands in stark contrast to a crime exploiting as many as 27 million victims worldwide.

My testimony will demonstrate that the appropriation for our international programs is money well spent, both in terms of the transparency of our grant selection process and in terms of the effectiveness of these funds in advancing U.S. foreign policy. A good starting point is to explain how we decide to spend our foreign assistance funds. Responsible administration of foreign assistance funds is a top priority for our office. That's why we've implemented a rigorous, transparent, and competitive application process for our grants.

Our foreign assistance and programming priorities are strategically linked to the country-specific tier rankings and diagnostic assessments included in the annual TIP Report. To maximize our limited funding, we identify priority countries for funding each year. We generally target our foreign assistance to Tier 3, Tier 2 Watch List, and, in some cases, Tier 2 countries, where governments have the political will to improve the response to trafficking but lack the economic resources to address the problem. In addition to targeting Tier 3, Tier 2 Watch List, and selected Tier 2 countries, we also consider a country's financial resources and need for technical support, political will to address trafficking in persons, and other funding that may be already used to address trafficking in the country.

At the start of the process, our office posts information about funding priorities and the availability of funds for anti-trafficking projects on our website. We convene a half-day bidders' conference for potential applicants, which in the past has been attended by nearly 150 representatives of NGOs, universities, and international organizations, among others. For those not able to attend the conference, we publish the material presented on our website.

We solicit proposals via www.grantsolutions.gov and www.grants.gov, the portals for U.S. government grants, and through a global call for proposals through U.S. embassies abroad. Solicitations conducted via www.grantsolutions.gov and www.grants.gov involve applicants submitting their proposals through the systems managed by OMB and HHS. The global call for proposals is a partnership between U.S. embassies and G/TIP, as we ask U.S. embassies to inform organizations working on trafficking how proposals may be submitted to G/TIP.

Grant proposals that are submitted to G/TIP in response to solicitations for bilateral or regional projects are reviewed for technical requirements. Proposals that meet the minimum technical standards (English language, figures in U.S. dollars, and published page limits) are forwarded to U.S. embassies for review by the TIP country team, which may include the political officer, USAID, and other relevant offices. The country team reviews applications and provides feedback to the Department on proposals for bilateral projects that are submitted to G/TIP.

Proposals are then subjected to a competitive interagency regional review panel that provides an opportunity for input from representatives of G/TIP; the relevant Regional Bureau; other offices within the Department that fund anti-trafficking programs; the USAID regional representative; and, as appropriate, other U.S. government agencies.

G/TIP anti-trafficking projects are primarily funded as grants, cooperative agreements, or Interagency Agreements and managed by the G/TIP Grants Officer and International Programs Officers. However, some projects are awarded at State Department posts abroad if G/TIP and post determine that this would facilitate more effective management of the project.

The selection of proposals for funding is based on program priorities and requirements conveyed in the solicitation for proposals. In an ongoing effort to improve the design and effectiveness of anti-trafficking projects, in FY07, G/TIP began to explicitly require applicants to clearly articulate goals and objectives, activities to support each objective, as well as indicators to measure success. The FY07 revised solicitation format was recognized as a model for other offices within the Department.

To further improve the competitive process, in FY10, our office initiated a two-stage grant application process that streamlined the application for organizations seeking funding and reduced the U.S. government resources required to review hundreds of 30-page proposals, while preserving fairness and transparency. In the first stage applicants submit a two-page proposal or concept note and following the review described, selected applicants are invited to submit a full proposal for competitive review.

The required proposal elements stated in solicitations constitute the basis for evaluating proposals. Each panel recommends to me proposals for funding. The results of the review panels are compiled for my review and consideration. I select proposals that best reflect the programming needs for the specific country as identified in the TIP Report, as well as global and regional program needs. Following review and approval of recommended projects by the Director of Foreign Assistance, all projects are sent for Congressional Notification. Abstracts of recommended proposals are distributed to the members of the Senior Policy Operating Group (SPOG) for a final review and comment.

The review process is thorough and transparent, involving numerous partners within the State Department and across government, and of course concluding with Congressional consultation. Such diligence is necessary given the demand for our international program funding. In the last two years, the Office received 998 applications requesting a total of $547 million.

In recent years, G/TIP has taken several steps to shorten the time from proposal submission to project award, including hiring more program officers (from five in 2009 to nine in 2011) and establishing the grants officer and budget officer positions within G/TIP. In contrast to previous years, almost all of foreign assistance funds were obligated in 2010 and we expect the same this year.

Our thorough pre-award review process is necessarily coupled with effective monitoring and evaluation of international programs. The program and grant officers within the Department have monitored anti-trafficking grant projects to provide technical assistance to grantees and to ensure that project goals and objectives are implemented; that Federal grant funds are expended consistent with the provisions of pertinent statutes, regulations, agency administrative requirements; and, that Federal funds are used responsibly. Grantees are required to submit program progress and financial reports throughout the project period and final reports within 90 days of the end of the project.

The U.S. embassy officers are partners in program monitoring. G/TIP notifies the appropriate officer at post when a new grant is awarded; the guidance from G/TIP provides key project information and recommends procedures for embassy participation in monitoring which are subject to embassy staffing and workloads. When G/TIP Program Officers conduct site visits they use a standardized format for review of administrative and programmatic aspects of the project and the TIP point of contact at the embassy accompanies the officer on the site visit, if available. This practice facilitates close collaboration between the post and G/TIP and strengthens follow-on monitoring by posts.

We take great care in ensuring that we are responsible custodians of the taxpayers' money, and I believe G/TIP has succeeded in our efforts to make the administration of our programs funding as transparent and accountable as possible. But the true success story here is the programs themselves. Whether in Cote D'Ivoire, where Prosperite is providing basic shelter and services to young girls; or in Thailand, where TRAFCORD has coordinated a series of successful rescues of labor and sex trafficking victims and serves as a model in the region; or in Mexico, where Casa Alianza is working to increase the identification of TIP victims among highly vulnerable street children; or in India where projects demonstrate best practices in raising awareness of government services for freed bonded laborers and aftercare following their release; or in Ghana where a U.S. expert provided technical assistance to local prosecutors leading to a path-breaking conviction, the first of its kind in a forced child labor case, the true success of our programs is the results we are seeing.

The sad reality is that without the modest funding G/TIP is able to provide, many of the projects we support would have to close their doors. That would mean more than just the end of a victim identification initiative or the shuttering of a shelter for survivors. In 5 many instances, it would mean the end of all such services in that country. That must not be the mark of our foreign policy.

The President and Secretary Clinton have made the effort to combat modern slavery a priority because it is in our strategic interest to combat modern slavery. Human trafficking thrives in places where vulnerable populations slip through the cracks and live without the protection of law. The places where we support anti-trafficking programs are the places where we need to show that the United States will stand up for those who cannot stand up for themselves.

But fighting slavery is more than good foreign policy. It's part of who we are as a nation. We cannot walk away from that responsibility here at home or in our conduct around the world.

Hearing of the Senate Judiciary Committee Subject: "The Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act: Renewing the Commitment to Victims of Human Trafficking" Chaired by: Senator Patrick Leahy (D-VT) Witnesses: Mary Lou Leary, Principal Deputy Assistant Attorney General, Justice Department; Luis CdeBaca, Ambassador-at-large, Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, State Department; Kelly Ryan, Assistant Homeland Security Secretary for Immigration and Border Security, Department of Homeland Security Location: 226 Dirksen Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C. Time: 10:00 a.m. EDT Date: Wednesday, September 14, 2011

SENATOR PATRICK LEAHY (D-VT): Good morning, everybody. I apologize for being a few minutes late. The committee will today consider the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2011 and how best to continue to improve our efforts to end once and for all human trafficking at home and abroad. Human trafficking is a modern-day form of slavery. You can't call it anything else. It's a modern-day form of slavery in which victims are forced into labor for sexual exploitation.

Traffickers prey on the most valuable members of society and no country is immune. Happens here, even here in our own backyard. Earlier this summer the Justice Department secured convictions against traffickers who compelled undocumented immigrant women hired to be waitresses to engage in commercial sex acts using violence, fraud, coercion and threats of deportation. Unfortunately, we hear these kind of stories every day.

Thanks to the tools provided by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, we've made progress in combating this major human rights abuse but there's more work to be done. As a country that's been a beacon of hope to so many who face human rights abuses abroad, the United States has to address this continuing injustice around the world but also here too. The original Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 and its three subsequent reauthorizations all have widespread bipartisan support.

The original bill was passed by a Republican-controlled Congress and signed into law by President Clinton. The most recent reauthorization, 2008, was passed by a Democratic-controlled Congress and signed into law by President Bush. And I'm pleased that the reauthorization bill we're discussing today continues that tradition. We have co-sponsors Senators Brown, Rubio and Cochran, as well as Senators Kerry, Feinstein, Klobuchar, Boxer, Cardin, Gillibrand and Schumer.

The bipartisan support for this bill in the Senate reflects the widespread focus in combating human trafficking in diverse communities across the country. Organizations from across the political and social spectrum -- faith-based groups, groups dedicated to human rights, women's rights -- have taken up the cause and worked to raise awareness. State and local law enforcement agencies and prosecutors have stepped up human trafficking enforcement. They've initiated local investigations, they've worked with federal agencies and regional task forces share information.

The National Association of Attorneys General has launched a major campaign to combat human trafficking in all 50 states. More than 40 state legislatures have followed the federal government's lead and enacted anti-trafficking statutes. I'm proud that my own state of Vermont recently passed a comprehensive anti-trafficking law that includes criminal penalties, prevention programs, and services to human trafficking victims, and I commend a little state like ours in Vermont for taking on this important issue.

So today's hearing of course will highlight the important anti-human-trafficking work the federal government is doing. We have witnesses from three federal agencies that play key roles in federal efforts to end human trafficking. Department of Justice, State, and Homeland Security investigate human trafficking crimes. They use diplomatic tools to stop human trafficking in other countries. They also ensure that trafficking victims receive crucial assistance and resources to assist law enforcement.

And with that I yield to my friend from Iowa, Senator Grassley.

SENATOR CHARLES GRASSLEY (R-IA): Before I speak, and even before you've introduced the witnesses, I wanted to make the point that one of our witnesses, Ambassador CdeBaca, is from Huxley, Iowa, attended Iowa State University, and I always like to welcome Iowans for a hearing.

SEN. LEAHY: Is that -- Huxley, Iowa, is that one of the major cities? (Laughter.) He probably would be right at home in Vermont.

SEN. GRASSLEY: The people of Huxley would say it's Ames, where Iowa State University is, is a suburb of Huxley.

SEN. LEAHY: I see. I know exactly where it is. It's a beautiful area.

SEN. GRASSLEY: I'm going to skip two or three pages of my remarks because I can say that I associate myself with what you said, feel that the bill ought to be reauthorized. But I make a point of saying that we have a terrible budget situation and it requires that we take a close look at how some of this money is spent while we're in the process of reauthorizing.

I'll start where I say, after I've said those things, now, that surely doesn't mean that we do away with the Trafficking Victims Protection Act. Instead, it means that as we in this committee look to reauthorize this legislation, we need to take a hard look at every single taxpayer dollar expended, determine how those dollars are being used, and determine if the stated purpose of the program is met.

For example, given this fiscal climate, there is no reason that we should reauthorize funding for the State Department to host official receptions at the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Person(s), and that would have been over $300,000 recently.

So how do we address these issues to start with? We need a legitimate, rigorous evaluation of programs funded under the Trafficking Victims Protection Act to ensure that inefficient grantees or less-than-scrupulous grantees are prohibited from getting funds. That can be done by identifying and eliminating poor and underperforming grantees.

I know that Senator Coburn has done a great deal of work on this issue. He has investigated the shortcomings, mismanagement, waste in several programs funded under the program. I appreciate the hard work that Senator Coburn has done and look forward to working with him as we pursue this legislation. Additionally, there are a number of audits and reviews conducted by GAO and the Department of Justice inspector general on Trafficking Victim Protection Act. These audits reveal mismanagement, failed oversight and waste of taxpayer dollars in implementing the programs to help trafficking victims.

Example: The inspector general found in a 2008 review that there were, quote-unquote -- well, quote, "systemic weaknesses in the office of Justice program grant implementation," end of quote. The inspector general found weaknesses in areas of, quote, "established goals and accomplishments for grantees, grant reporting, fund drawdowns, local matching funds, expenditures, indirect costs, and monitoring of sub-recipients," end of quote.

Further, the inspector general found that while the Department of Justice built significant capacities to serve victims, they, quote, "have not identified and served significant numbers of victims," end of quote. Unfortunately, it was more of the same when we looked at audits conducted in the individual grant recipients awarded funding under the Traffic (sic) Victims Protection Act. In seven separate audits of individual grantees dating 2007 to 2010, the inspector general found hundreds of thousands of dollars in questioned costs, unauthorized expenditures, failed matching requirements, and many other problems.

It is really disheartening to see that every single audit that was done by the IG of grantees found problems. It begs the question, what is the Department of Justice doing with taxpayer dollars? Do they view it as Monopoly money that can be handed out with no accountability? Given the current fiscal situation, these audits are amazing.

The Department of Justice has some serious explaining to do because between these audits and the ones that I reviewed as part of the hearing held back in July on the violence against women grants, it appears that the department continuously awarded grants to entities that can't manage the money appropriately.

We have a duty in this committee to ensure taxpayer dollars are spent appropriately. From the audits on this program and many others administered by the Department of Justice, it seems that that isn't being done. Holding grant programs accountable will help to ensure that services really go to those in need, and before we reauthorize specific dollar amounts, we need strong oversight language included in the legislation to ensure that failing grantees will not be rewarded with additional taxpayers' money and to ensure that government officials will be held accountable for repeated failures to oversee grants.

We are well past the time when we can reauthorize programs without giving them the scrutiny needed to ensure that the people we are trying to help -- that means the victims of trafficking -- are in fact getting the services that they need. If we allowed grants to be mismanaged, a victim who could have been helped goes without. We must do everything in our power to help victims of trafficking, but we also must protect taxpayers' dollars.

So it's through this testimony and the debates that we're going to have on these bills that I'll bring some of these points out. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

SEN. LEAHY: Thank you, and I agree that you have to have effective and efficient grant management. I do understand the inspector general's most recent report praises the Office of Justice Programs for significant improvement and I'm glad to hear the Department of Justice did take the inspector general's suggestions to heart. I was pleased to see his response that there are significant improvements.

Mary Lou Leary is the principal deputy assistant attorney general for the Office of Justice Programs at the Department of Justice, a position she's held since September of 2009. Prior to rejoining the department in May of 2009, she served as executive director of the National Center for Victims of Crime. She's previously held a number of positions with the Department of Justice, serving U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia and acting director of the Office of Community Oriented Policing Services, and deputy associate attorney general. No stranger to this committee. Ms. Leary, we're delighted to have you here. Please go ahead.

MARY LOU LEARY: Thank you, Chairman Leahy, Ranking Member Grassley and any other members of the committee who may join us. I appreciate this opportunity to discuss OJP's commitment to combating human trafficking and to serving human trafficking victims.

This is a high priority for President Obama. It's a high priority for this Department of Justice. It's also been a high priority for me in my own career. When I was at the U.S. attorney's office in D.C., the very first anti-trafficking task forces were put together, and I was very involved in establishing that task force in the District of Columbia. And it was -- one of the most satisfying things about that was that, for the first time, we actually had a formal task force that included both law enforcement and victim service providers.

Oftentimes those trafficking victims are hidden from society, and because of this kind of secrecy it's very difficult to get accurate statistics about the extent and the prevalence of the problem.

Congress provided very critical tools to combat trafficking in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act and subsequent reauthorizations. So I'm very pleased that Congress and that this committee in particular is demonstrating leadership by coming together in a bipartisan way to reauthorize the act.

OJP's efforts to combat human trafficking span the entire agency. My written testimony gives you details about what each one of the bureaus and program offices is doing and how we collaborate together on the issue.

Today I just want to highlight the multidisciplinary approach and what we call wrap-around services for trafficking victims. This basically means meeting victims where they are and helping them to work through the impact of crime. It means support for victims during their interaction with law enforcement. Wrap-around also means providing both short-term and long-term assistance, culturally competent services that treat victims with dignity and with respect.

Experience demonstrates that effective law enforcement in trafficking cases and effective victims' services do and they must go hand in hand. Victims' service providers may be able to identify some victims of a particular trafficker but they often will need effective law enforcement to identify and to reach out to those other victims, and law enforcement in turn needs victims' service providers to work with them and to work with the victims to collect critical information and to give the victims that sense of safety and protection.

Victims who receive needed support will be much more able and willing to participate in the investigation and the prosecution of that trafficker, and that's been my personal experience in my many years as a prosecutor. Each of the 42 anti-trafficking task forces we fund includes local or territorial state and federal law enforcement and victims' service providers. They investigate trafficking, they support prosecutions and they raise public awareness of the issues and provide, of course, critical services to the victims.

Between January 2008 and June 2010, the task forces investigated more than 2,500 suspected incidents of human trafficking, made 144 arrests, but because one trafficker can hurt dozens or even hundreds of victims, this is a significant achievement. My written testimony includes examples of successful task force cases.

In fiscal year 2011 we competitively awarded almost $6 million for six task forces. We selected sites that have a history of proactively investigating and prosecuting trafficking offenses and helping the victims. We also awarded additional 3.7 million (dollars) to 11 organizations specifically to provide comprehensive and specialized victims' services, and we make sure that these service providers had a strong track record in trauma-informed and culturally competent services to trafficking victims.

We also provide training and technical assistance to task forces nationwide regardless of whether they are our grantees, and we developed an e-guide, which is available to all communities.

We certainly are aware and we agree with this committee that we want to make sure the funds are being used wisely and that we are not duplicating efforts. Our commitment to this is reflected in our participation in the senior policy operating group to coordinate the work of multiple agencies, and I want to make clear to the committee that before we award a dollar in grant funding, we run it by that senior policy operating group so that we'll know that we're not duplicating our efforts.

We have strong oversight of our grantees. More details, again, are in my written testimony, and as Senator Leahy pointed out, the inspector general's office recently did determine that OJP had made significant improvements, and we are aware that that's a constant struggle and we work at it every day.

So thank you. I'm happy to take any questions.

SEN. LEAHY: Thank you very much.

We'll hear from all three witnesses and then go to questions.

Ambassador CdeBaca is ambassador-at-large in the Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, and I appreciate the fact that -- being from Iowa and getting my geography lesson here this morning.

Prior to the appointment he was a prosecutor at the Department of Justice. Ambassador CdeBaca was the lead trial counsel in which was then the largest slavery prosecution in U.S. history. Over 300 workers, slaves at a garment factory in America Samoa, a very, very significant case.

Please go ahead, sir.

LUIS CDEBACA: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Senator Grassley, the entire membership of the committee, thank you for the opportunity to testify today.

As you put it, Mr. Chairman, this is nothing less than modern slavery that we are dealing with. The term "trafficking in persons" describes all of the conduct involved in reducing a person to or maintaining them in a state of compelled service, and estimates are up to 27 million men, women and children victimized globally.

Fortunately there are hundreds of governments and NGOs who are committed to meeting this scourge, but as is often the case in places where poverty and corruption hinder the good intentions of committed people, a lack of resources and capacity are sometimes insurmountable road blocks to those who seek to save victims from exploitation and bring their traffickers to justice.

That's perhaps why in the last two years my office has received 998 applications for assistance from 546 organizations requesting a total of $547 million. Our foreign assistance budget for the last two years was $39.1 million, not even 10 percent of the demonstrated need, and we took a 24 percent pay cut, as it were, in the spring down to under $17 million in program funds.

We know that it will never be possible to give every organization the help that they want, and we know that we have a responsibility to be responsible custodians of taxpayer dollars, and so we've implemented a rigorous and transparent review process to ensure that every cent of our foreign assistance appropriation is spent responsibly, is put to the use where it will do the most good and has a multiplier effect far above the $17 million that we have to spend.

We support grantees that are working to advance the 3P Paradigm, Prevention, Protection, Prosecution, that guides our effort to combat slavery here at home and around the world. These efforts are closely linked to the mandates and purposes that are laid out in the United Nations Trafficking Protocol as well as the Trafficking Victims Protection Act and its subsequent reauthorizations, which, as you pointed out, Senator, enjoyed an unprecedented and much appreciated bipartisan support throughout the years.

The provisions of that authorizing legislation helped to prioritize the allocation of the anti-trafficking funds from the appropriated State Department money. Because the 3Ps function as an interlocking paradigm, no single aspect stands alone. It's not enough to prosecute traffickers if we did not also provide the assistance to the survivors and work to ensure that no one else is victimized.

So we try to have projects that are cross-cutting in their approach, placing a particular emphasis on programs that involve victim protection, because we realize that it may be that the American program in a country is the only way that a trafficking victim will be helped. So 90 percent of the projects we funded last year, even if they have a strong prosecution element, also include a protection component and 61 percent of them provide direct services to victims.

Our foreign assistance priorities and our programing priorities are strategically linked to the peer rankings and diagnostic assessments included in the annual Trafficking In Persons Report, and my prepared testimony details specifically our grant application review process as well as the steps that we take to monitor the use of funding after it's gone out the door. I ask that it be included in the record in its entirety.

To summarize it, though, applications are solicited through an open process, thoroughly reviewed by my office, other State Department offices, USAID, interagency partners and are sent to the Hill for congressional notification prior to the disbursement of funding.

Following the awards, we monitor and evaluate the programs. We have officers who work to ensure project goals and objectives are implemented and funds are used responsibly. And program progress and financial reports throughout the project period are required, including final reports within 90 days of the end of the project.

We take very seriously the responsibility attached to the use of these funds, but the real success is not the fact that we have an efficient program design and controls. The real success are the people; people like Shweyga Mullah. A few weeks ago, a CNN crew found her in the former home of one of Moammar Gadhafi's sons. She had become a trafficking victim when she left her home country of Ethiopia. She worked as a nanny for the Gadhafi grandchildren. And when she displeased the men and women for whom she worked, they poured boiling water on her head to punish her. She had no passport, no identification, no one who could help her. When the Gadhafi family fled the compound, she was left behind, three-month-old burns still open and seeping.

Though we have no direct presence in Tripoli yet, the State Department was able to coordinate the effort through one of our grantees, the International Organization for Migration, to begin the process of getting Ms. Mullah out of Libya into a safe haven where she could begin the process of recovery. We hope that she'll soon be wheels-up and under the care of both burn specialists and those who work with survivors of modern slavery.

This is simply one high-profile incident and one example of how important it is to work on these cases. But she is merely one of 27 million, and we can never forget that, because fighting slavery is more than good foreign policy, it's part of who we are as a nation.

The last decade has seen renewed American leadership against slavery here at home and in our conduct around the world. The U.S. victim care regime is a global model for both restoration and rehabilitation of victims. The leadership is shown by our programs, our domestic activities and our willingness to hold ourselves to the same standards by which we assess other countries by including the United States in the annual Trafficking in Persons Report.

I thank you again for the opportunity to testify today, and we look forward to working with you committee further to providing information or answer questions that would provide additional clarity or background.

SEN. LEAHY: Thank you very much.

And our last witness will be Kelly Ryan, who's the acting deputy assistant secretary of immigration and border security at the Department of Homeland Security. She's responsible for policy oversight, development in immigration and border security issues at the department. And prior to joining the Department of Homeland Security, she served as the deputy assistant secretary of state for the Bureau of Population, Refugees and Migration.

Please go ahead, Ms. Ryan.

MS. RYAN: Thank you. Good morning, Chairman Leahy, Ranking Member Grassley. Thank you for inviting me to discuss the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act and DHS' role and progress in implementing it. This is an important hearing for me as well since I have worked on trafficking issues since prior to the passage of the landmark TVPA.

Combating human trafficking and protecting victims remains a top priority for DHS. We've educated and trained our officers, prioritized the identification of traffickers and their victims and coordinated enforcement actions. We've also played a critical role in providing victim assistance to foreign victims of trafficking in the United States through continued presence and the provision of T and U nonimmigrant status.

In July 2010, Secretary Napolitano launched the Blue Campaign to coordinate and enhance the department's anti-trafficking efforts. Seventeen DHS components are involved in this campaign, which is chaired by the senior counselor to the secretary, Alice Hill. The Blue Campaign is composed of the collaborative initiatives spanning the three Ps of the U.S. government's anti-trafficking effort -- prevention, prosecution and protection -- as well as a fourth P that we have added, partnership, which is critical to our success.

In fiscal year 2010, USCIS reached the annual cap of 10,000 principal U visas. In fiscal year 2011, USCIS expects to reach the cap for a second year in a row. In fiscal year '10, USCIS had granted T nonimmigrant status to 796 victims of human trafficking and their families, the highest number granted since the implementation of the T visa program.

Eighteen of the 26 ICE Homeland Security investigation offices have hired full-time victim specialists. ICE has a child forensic interview specialist to improve its ability to communicate with child victims. ICE has designated 39 human trafficking experts to handle human trafficking leads, address urgent victim needs appropriately and serve as designated points of contact for our field and follow leads generated through our tip line.

Under the Blue Campaign, we have worked diligently to provide informational materials about human trafficking, including international and domestic public awareness campaigns which have reached millions of people. Training is critical to our efforts. DHS is finalizing a new computer-based training course for its employees to increase awareness of human trafficking issues and provide information about the indicators. DHS has also produced training on human trafficking for law enforcement officers.

ICE provides annual training to field office juvenile coordinators and other key field office staff on the transportation, care, treatment and placement of minors. In March 2011, CBP implemented a new annual mandatory TVPRA training. To date, over 34,000 CBP officers, agents and specialists have taken this training. USCIS also provides training to law enforcement officers as well as NGOs that assist trafficking victims.

DHS has worked diligently to implement the provisions relating to UACs identified under the trafficking protection act. Our role is critical to protecting children. I'm proud to note that, while TVPRA requirements are limited to the screening of unaccompanied alien children from contiguous countries, CBP issued guidelines in March 2009 requiring its officers and agents to screen all UACs for the risk categories including severe trafficking and fear of persecution.

Absent exceptional circumstances, UACs are turned over to Health and Human Services within 72 hours after determining that the child is unaccompanied. DHS recognizes that holding UACs in our facilities for a prolonged period is not in the best interest of children.

I'd also like to take this opportunity to highlight some of our successes. At our L.A. office, ICE agents investigated and successfully rescued 15 victims who were forced into prostitution by a family-run trafficking organization. As a result of our agents' successful investigation, we were able to prosecute and obtain convictions for nine foreign nationals. These individuals were found guilty of sex trafficking of children and other offenses.

TVPRA permits derivative families to receive nonimmigrant status based on fear of retaliation from traffickers. In 2010, we approved a T visa for a mother of a sex-trafficking survivor based on this new exception and worked with State Department to bring the victim's mother to the U.S. The mother, who had also received death threats from the traffickers, was able to reunite with her daughter and to testify at her daughter's trial.

We've made remarkable progress since the passage of the landmark law in 2000. We believe there is work yet to be done. For example, DHS will continue to refine its guidance on continued presence and discretionary parole of trafficking victims' relatives. ICE recently issued a protocol on continued presence which allows the procedures for law enforcement agencies to request continued presence and explains their respective role.

With regard to parole for relatives of trafficking victims, ICE's continued-presence guidance specifically incorporates the TVPRA expansion.

Secretary Napolitano has led DHS efforts to combat human trafficking and has made this issue a top priority for the department. We are committed to fighting human trafficking through protection, prevention, prosecution and partnerships.

Thank you, again, for the opportunity to testify. I would be pleased to answer any of your questions.

SEN. LEAHY: It's good to know from all three of you the names of the procedures and the programs and all, but that we'll put in the record.

I'm not suggesting it's not important, but it reminds me sometimes that PowerPoint presentations where everybody's eyes may glaze over -- I suspect what people are going to remember of this hearing is what Ambassador CdeBaca said about Ms. Mullah in Tripoli and Ms. Ryan, which you spoke of the mother being brought back to testify.

It is some of these real stories -- far more than the names of what our programs are and which department and all -- that are important if we want to actually get this reauthorized, because people have to know exactly what it is.

And so with this in mind, Ambassador CdeBaca, let me -- because in your written testimony, you discuss the work being done to fight trafficking in Mexico, Cote d'Ivoire and Thailand. Tell me what is being done. Tell me some more about what's being done in those countries.

What's your funding? What is that doing with individual lives? I mean, these are there major places.

MR. CDEBACA: Mexico is perhaps the most complex of all of them, I think, because so much of what happens in the fight against trafficking in Mexico also is happening in the United States. It really requires a level of jointness in our approach.

And so, one of the things that we've seen is the heroism of folks from the Mexican nongovernmental organizations, journalists like Lydia Cacho in the state of Quintana Roo, which is where the tourist areas of Cancun are, who has investigated child sex tours, have investigated child sex trafficking, even to the highest levels of state government to the point where she had to flee to neighboring states to get protection from their state police because of corruption issues.

And one of the things that we're trying to do is to make sure that people like her are supported, supported not only with funding to the NGOs that she's working with, but also the work that we and the Department of Justice and DHS are all doing jointly with an embassy task team on trafficking with folks from each of our agencies that are supporting the work of the Mexican government to investigate and prosecute these cases.

So you've got prosecutors like Dilcy Garcia in Mexico City, who have gone from a DA's office that was basically doing zero trafficking cases three or four years ago to having dozens of cases on their docket.

They're doing that because of the training that they're receiving and the encouragement that they're receiving from the United States presence at our embassy, but also here in Washington.

One of the things that we've seen is that the Civil Rights Division now has been investigating cases with the Mexicans in both countries. So Mexican police were able to come up to Atlanta and investigate their part of the case, interviewing the witnesses. And at the end of the day we were able to get prosecutions successfully done in both countries. Rather than being consumed by extradition paperwork, we were able to take apart the traffickers on both sides.

SEN. LEAHY: So what you have is a case where they'll use these children -- try to bring people down to these resort areas, enslaving these children for that.

MR. CDEBACA: Exactly.

SEN. LEAHY: And it was happening with no prosecutions before.

MR. CDEBACA: That's correct.

SEN. LEAHY: And obviously -- or at least I assume from what you're saying -- with help here in the United States from individuals. Is that correct?

MR. CDEBACA: With help here in the United States from individuals from DHS, DOJ and the State Department, with some of our grantees working with their legislators --

SEN. LEAHY: No, I mean they had people who were conspiring --

MR. CDEBACA: Oh, yes.

SEN. LEAHY: -- down there here in the United States.

MR. CDEBACA: Indeed.

SEN. LEAHY: And those you were able to prosecute?

MR. CDEBACA: We've been able to prosecute both sides of the criminal organization, both here in the U.S. and in Mexico. And part of that is because of the technical assistance that we were able to provide through our grantees and directly to the Mexican congress when they were able to pass a law that's very similar to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act. It solved a lot of the legal impediments that they were facing out in the field. And we had some real leadership from both the Senate and the House of Deputies.

The same types of things are happening in the other countries that you'd mentioned. I want to specifically mention Cote d'Ivoire where our grantee Prosperite was able to continue to serve victims even as their shelter came under direct fire during the unfortunate incidents earlier this year with the holdout government. They were in the middle of a war zone and they continued to take care of those children.

SEN. LEAHY: That's amazing.

And, Ms. Leary, you talked about how law enforcement was able to prosecute cases when appropriate victim services are available. You referenced a case where the Department of Justice helped a traffic victim secure a T visa for children who had been left behind in Mexico who were threatened by traffickers.

Tell us how this T visa works and how important that was, and whether, in fact, we have the ability to prosecute trafficking cases.

MS. LEARY: Senator, I can speak to how important it is for victims to feel safe, but I would defer to DHS on the specifics of how the T visa program works.

But I can tell you that for many years as an ADA and an assistant U.S. attorney, and then as the director of a national victims advocacy organization, the number one concern of any victim of any crime is safety. A victim needs to feel safe before he or she can even speak about what has happened to him or her, let alone cooperate with law enforcement.

But my experience also tells me very strongly that if a victim is going to cooperate in an investigation or in prosecution, the victim has to feel that he or she can trust the law enforcement folks who are involved in it. And you build that trust by specific mechanisms to make the victim feel safe and by providing the kinds of services -- health care, counseling, places to live to be safe, to be with their children. That's how you build the trust.

But I defer to DHS.

SEN. LEAHY: Also, we see right here in the United States a headline in the local paper here in the last few days where -- a vicious crime here in the District of Columbia, and nobody seems to know what's going on. They won't talk to the police or anything else.

I look at the District of Columbia, which has the same population as my state of Vermont. I remember a year or so ago reading in the paper they had as many murders over a weekend as we had in a year --

MS. LEARY: Right.

SEN. LEAHY: -- in Vermont. I won't go into questions of competence or anything else when that sort of thing happens.

But, Ms. Ryan, if we're going to go into -- and I apologize, Senator Grassley, if I could just continue on this. We talked about the T visa. That started in 2002, I believe, but since that time only 2,500 have been issued for trafficking -- just a few hundred a year. Why are these numbers so low? You have other types of protection-based immigration visas. Why aren't more T visas applied for or issued?

MS. RYAN: Thank you, Senator.

First, on the question that you asked my colleague, I would like to say that on the Corechero (ph) case, which I have some knowledge of, it actually -- the provision of the T visas to the dependents of the victims was absolutely critical in the successful prosecution, which led to very long sentences.

So we believe, from a DHS perspective, that the provision of a T visa to the victim and their dependents is absolutely critical to the law enforcement piece, as well as victim assistance.

In terms of the numbers, you're absolutely right. We have come nowhere near the number permitted, the statutory cap of 5,000. I think the chief reason for that -- we've alluded to it this morning -- is a difficulty in finding the victims. They are, you know, often secretive. Sometimes there are circumstances where it's been so debilitating that they prefer to return home. But the numbers are small and we carefully vet each and every case.

SEN. LEAHY: And these are also people who are not used to having --

MS. RYAN: Trust in the law enforcement --

SEN. LEAHY: I mean, Ambassador CdeBaca talked about the situation in Mexico. There are a lot of places there, the last thing in the world you want to do is go to the police. I mean, when prosecutors don't dare go to the police without the possibility of being killed --

MS. RYAN: That's right.

SEN. LEAHY: -- why would a victim?

MS. RYAN: That's right. We try to take a victim-centered approach, as does the Department of Justice, but it is a very difficult trust exercise to build the trust with the victims.

SEN. LEAHY: Thank you. Thank you very much. This is -- all three of you, I appreciate the testimony. This is a -- as a parent and a grandparent, I look at the ages of some of these people and the vulnerabilities -- some of even the adults, the fact that they are so totally vulnerable. They're treated as cattle, not as human beings. This is 2011. I mean, this is -- this is horrible.

And, Senator Grassley, again, I appreciate your forbearance, letting me go over time, but this is something I care very deeply about. Please, sir.

SEN. GRASSLEY: Yeah. Thank you very much.

I'm going to start out with Ms. Leary on this prosecution, if I could. And, obviously it's been very clear here in our discussion that one of the critical ways that we accomplish combating trafficking is bringing successful prosecutions. Victims advocates have questioned -- now, I'm following what victim advocates tell me.

They question the whole number of trafficking prosecutions brought last year by the Department of Justice. One of the hurdles that advocates have identified is a low number or lack of witnesses. Obviously, prosecutors or law enforcement officers need witnesses and cooperation from victims in order to combat trafficking.

There's a provision in the pending bill that makes it easier for victims to not cooperate with law enforcement. Now, there may be circumstances where visa applicants should be excused from cooperation. But that should be a rare exception, in my view.

So does the Department of Justice support legislation that makes it easier for visa recipients and potential witnesses to be excused from cooperating with law enforcement officials? And if the answer is yes, then I'd like to have you explain to me how this helps human trafficking investigations.

MS. LEARY: Senator Grassley, I would start by saying that the department has not yet finished its review of a formal position on the legislation. So I can't give you an official position for the department.

I would, however, say that, in general, in our work, we have -- we have two objectives which you hope work in concert. One is to serve and to protect victims of trafficking, and another is to prosecute traffickers and those who perpetrate these offenses.

And the best of all worlds, you prosecute a case and you're meeting all the needs of the victims and you're also getting everything you need for a successful prosecution. But in the real world, I have to say that, based on my own experience, requiring certain levels of cooperation from victims doesn't always work. And there are -- you know, there are victims who are so traumatized, so incapable of functioning, really, and making rational decisions, who are so fearful that you can't really rely on any -- necessarily rely on even what you have to offer them.

So we look forward, though, to providing comments on the proposed legislation, and we will do that.

SEN. GRASSLEY: Since you said your department hasn't studied the bill and you can't give us a position, would you provide us -- well, I guess I'd like to have you say that the department would provide us their views on the provision before we mark up the legislation on that question I just asked you.

MS. LEARY: We will provide those views as soon as possible, and I hope that it will be before the markup. And I will certainly get back to you, Senator, on that.

SEN. GRASSLEY: But that would be on the specific point I was making about whether it's better to make it easier for visa recipients to be excused from cooperating.

MS. LEARY: Yeah. I will certainly bring that right back to the department and let them know that you'd like --

SEN. GRASSLEY: Closely connected with this but not a long answer, do career prosecutors have the final word on whether visa applicants are excused from cooperating with law enforcement? And if the prosecutors don't, why do they not have that authority?

MS. LEARY: I don't have the answer to that question, sir, and I'll have to get that for you.

SEN. GRASSLEY: OK. In writing.

MS. LEARY: I think maybe DHS has the answer.

SEN. GRASSLEY: If she would have the answer, that's OK with me. But I assume it's under the -- isn't it within the Justice Department as opposed to Homeland Security?

MS. RYAN: Senator, the T visa requirement for the adjudication is within Department of Homeland Security, and the requirement is that they be willing to cooperate. And so our adjudicators look to make sure that they are willing to cooperate, and we can take evidence from the law enforcement officials on that -- on that issue.

SEN. GRASSLEY: OK. And so if Justice has a role in that, then I'd like to have that answer in writing from you, Ms. Leary.

MS. LEARY: Certainly.

SEN. GRASSLEY: And for you, another question, and it gets back a little bit to what the chairman brought up about T visas and U visas. Generally, in order to receive either of these visas, an applicant must comply with reasonable requests from law enforcement. However, there are exceptions to the cooperation.

So my first question is: Which unit at Homeland Security makes the decision to excuse T and U visa applicants from having to cooperate with law enforcement? And what criteria are used in deciding whether to grant an exemption?

MS. RYAN: Thank you, Senator. The Vermont service center has a specially trained group of adjudicators that decide the T and U visa applications, and they look at the willingness to cooperate. We reach out and can reach out to our colleagues in the law enforcement community to ensure that the cooperation is there.

Also, law enforcement can submit a form showing that the person is cooperating. The cooperation can't be excused, but you're right that there are certain times where it's not required, and that is in circumstances, for example, when the person is under the age of 18. We don't require minors to testify, but they must cooperate, and that cannot be excused.

SEN. GRASSLEY: Do the people at the Vermont unit making the exemption decision actually meet in person with the applicant requesting the exemption? And if they don't meet in person with them, why not?

MS. RYAN: We adjudicate the application on a paper review, but we also reach out and have information from the law enforcement people. But we do not require them to come to Vermont for the decision on the T.

SEN. GRASSLEY: OK. Are the decisions of the unit employees reviewed or tracked to see if there are any patterns of denying exemption requests or being overly generous in granting them?

MS. RYAN: Yes. All of the T and U visa applications have supervisory review. And one of the reasons we made one unit rather than have them be accepted all over the country was to make sure that there was uniformity in the decision. So that actually helps us with that particular piece.

SEN. GRASSLEY: Ms. Leary, I wanted to talk to you about grants. And I'm aware of the fact that the chairman said that the IG said that maybe there's been improvements in this area. So I kind of want to be sold on that fact if that's true.

It's kind of like we're running into the same problems with the IG or GAO review of grant applicants pretty much like we did the Violence Against Women Act when we had that hearing in July. Every time that we look at audits of individual grantees, there are serious problems, unauthorized expenditures, failure to provide matching fund, questionable costs.

These select individual audits signal to me that there's a bigger problem. The inspector -- my first question: The inspector general audit audited seven tracking grantees and found serious problems in all seven. These audits randomly select grantees and concluded that 100 percent of the grantees audited have serious problems.

One grantee was given over $2 million for human trafficking assistance. The inspector general questioned 900,000 (dollars) in salaries and 174,000 (dollars) in fringe benefits because they didn't have supporting documents. And I hope you could shine light on those. If, in fact, you agree that those area failures, how is that helping trafficking victims? And that's the whole point of the program.

MS. LEARY: Senator Grassley -- oh, I'm sorry.

SEN. GRASSLEY: Go ahead. No, you go ahead.

MS. LEARY: I agree that those are failures, and I will say that the Office of Justice Programs has basically turned its relationship with the inspector general's office into one of collaboration and based largely on the fact that we take very seriously what we learn from these -- from these audits.

And we looked at the particular audit that you are speaking of. We looked very closely. The first thing we did was we worked with each and every one of those grantees to resolve all the issues that were pointed out in the audit. Every single one of those audits has been closed except there are two where the OIG is still -- has the request for closure pending. And we don't expect to have a problem with that.

But perhaps the most important thing is that the Office of Justice Programs looked at the individual audits, got them closed but, more importantly, developed systems to work with and to monitor all of our grantees in the trafficking realm in particular but across the board so that these kinds of things would not continue to happen.

And there are a few specifics that I could highlight for you, Senator Grassley, with respect to that particular audit. One of the failures -- it's not so much untimely reporting; it was inaccurate reporting.

And so BJA, the Bureau of Justice Assistance, and the Office of Victims of Crime both implemented -- developed and implemented reporting tools, data reporting tools, which the Bureau of Justice Statistics helped them to shape.

And then they improved those tools so that, for instance, a grantee who used to report the children of a victim as victims -- so we weren't getting accurate data -- we changed the reporting system so that you can't do that. There are separate places to report for, for instance, children of victims. So the data we're getting is more accurate.

In addition, the Office of Victims of Crime, specifically based on that audit, developed a very detailed checklist. And every application that comes in from a grantee who wants to do human trafficking work has to pass that checklist. And it's extremely detailed, geared right towards the findings of the inspector general. And there's an extremely thorough review of the budget and the program strategy as well.

It takes time to do that kind of upfront preventive work, but it's definitely worth it because it's really the best way we know to avoid these kinds of problems in the future.

SEN. GRASSLEY: I've already used more time than the chairman did.

But just let me ask you -- and shortly answer this -- have you ever -- do you ever recover any money from any of these grantees when it's been misused?

MS. LEARY: Oh, we do. We do. I don't know the specifics on these particular audits, but yes, we do. And in addition, we take that data that we -- that we get from their reporting and we take information like what we got from the inspector general. And that's considered very seriously in applications for future funding.

SEN. GRASSLEY: Right. Sum up by saying I think you're telling me that we won't see these problems in the future, then?

MS. LEARY: I hope not.

SEN. GRASSLEY: Go ahead. Thank you very much.

SEN. LEAHY: And I appreciate these answers, too.

Senator Grassley and I share concerns about these programs working right. We want them to work right. And I appreciate -- you've been working with the inspector general to improve them. And I want to place in the record letters of support from the Alliance to End Slavery and Trafficking, from Lutheran Immigration Refugee Services, letters from two people who have been involved. And you just can't read these reports without your skin crawling with some of the things that's going on.

So we want you to be successful.

I'm going turn the gavel over to Senator Franken, and if others come, he'll turn the gavel -- (sounds gavel) -- over to them.

Senator Grassley has to go to Finance. I have to go to -- I have to go to Appropriations. So I think -- and Senator Franken, I thank you for -- and you have had a long --

SENATOR AL FRANKEN (D-MN): I know Senator Grassley has to go, and I just wanted to say something nice about the ranking member. So you can hear it as you're walking out if you like. (Laughter.) I know you've got -- I know you've got to go to Finance.

I was just going to say how he always is reading these audits and has -- you know, he's one of the members of this body who keeps an eye on that and does a marvelous job doing that. And he's a wonderful member of this body because of that.

Thank you very much --

SEN. GRASSLEY: And I agree with you. (Laughter.)

SEN. FRANKEN: OK. Now that he's gone -- (laughter).

SEN. LEAHY: Hey, you think that's bad -- (laughter) -- thanks, Al.

SEN. FRANKEN: OK. Ms. Leary and Ambassador CdeBaca, I would like to start with both of you because your departments are doing amazing work to combat a huge problem. But it would be a mistake to pretend that we aren't in the middle of a budget crisis where hard choices have to be made about what programs are worthy continued funding at the same level. And this reauthorization is actually a reduction from what we authorized in 2008. And I think it's important for people to understand how many people need trafficking assistance.

Can you tell me, for each of your programs, how large the demand is and what the -- what unmet need there is?

MR. CDEBACA: Thank you, Senator.

There is a lot of unmet need. As you may know, the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Office budget for programs was cut by about 24 percent earlier this spring. So we're down to a little bit under 16 1/2 million dollars in a world in which there's about 27 million people who are enslaved. And so we're not talking even a dollar a person at that point.

What we've seen is, over the last two years, almost a thousand -- 998 applications for assistance requesting $547 million. That's for prosecutor training, for police training, for shelters for the victims around the world. And our foreign assistance budget that we were able to get out the door for that was about 39.1 million (dollars) in total. So not even 10 percent of the demonstrated need being met from what we've been able to do -- and, again, the 24 percent reduction this spring.

And we certainly know shared sacrifice, and we're making our money go as far as we can. But that's -- it's something that certainly is starting to play out in the field in that there are some countries in the world in which, if we aren't funding the victim care, it's just not getting funded.

SEN. FRANKEN: Ms. Leary?

MS. LEARY: With respect to the Department of Justice, Senator Franken, in fiscal year 2011, we received 120 applications for human trafficking grants, but we were only able to fund 33 of those. So there's a huge unmet need. And in addition, there's a very strong need for more research and more data so that we can truly understand this problem, even the extent of the problem and characteristics of victims, characteristics of traffickers, what approaches really work, where's the evidence that they work.

And we don't really have the funding to do that kind of research, And all of our partners -- our federal partners, we're all trying to work together to close that gap.

SEN. FRANKEN: And bring that home just in terms of talking about one unfunded grant request and what -- you know, just to bring it home on a human term -- either of you, anybody can do this -- what the request was, what the situation was, what the exploitation was. Put a human face on just one of those unmet grants.

MR. CDEBACA: So with the caveat that there, obviously, are some confidentiality issues as far as the ones that we select and send up -- for our congressional notification, obviously, that's been part of the record, but the ones that we don't, not necessarily.

But there was a few of the ones that really stood out for me especially in West Africa. A Catholic organization in one of the smaller West African countries that was not only trying to put together a victims services -- a shelter, something that would help young women, young men as they come out of slavery, that kind of transition facility -- but also would work with the government in order to come up with the legislation that they so sorely need.

You know, we had a 13th Amendment from 1865 until the year 2000, and we needed -- for us to really hit our stride, we needed modern, updated statutes. And this country does as well.

And so we're trying to backfill with training and technical assistance, repositioning some of our other grants that are out there through some of the international organizations. But it doesn't give you the day-to-day work that that nongovernmental organization could have done on the ground in West Africa. And that's, I think, just repeated over and over across the applications.

SEN. FRANKEN: Ms. Leary, advocates in Minnesota have talked about a pressing need for competent services -- culturally competent services for Native American victims of human trafficking. Can you tell us about the efforts being made to offer culturally competent training for law enforcement or service providers?

MS. LEARY: It's a pressing need, not just for Native American victims but for victims from so many different cultures. And we find those victims not only around the world but, certainly, here in the United States.

And what we are doing to try to foster that culturally competent service delivery is providing training through our technical assistance providers. I think this is a problem across the board in victim services of any kind of victim. You need to understand where the victim is at in order to effectively work with him or her. It isn't just language; it's understanding the traditions, the culture the kind of personal orientation where that individual might be.

With respect to the Native American population, the Office of Victims of Crime did host a daylong meeting at the Museum of the American Indian with practitioners from around Indian Country from around the country and with victim service providers who try to get a better understanding of what was happening on reservations and Indian Country and what are the needs of those victims that are not being met.

And then we tried to shape our responses and our training and technical assistance based on what we learned from meetings like that.

SEN. FRANKEN: Thank you.

Mr. CdeBaca, I was pleased that Secretary Clinton decided to rank the U.S. in its annual trafficking and persons report. Labor and sex trafficking in other countries is a huge problem, but it would be a mistake, not to mention completely inaccurate, for the U.S. to pretend that this is a problem we've totally figured out.

Have you seen a difference in your dialogue with other countries since the U.S. was added to the report?

MR. CDEBACA: We have, Senator, and in fact, a surprising and positive difference. There was a little nervousness as the data started coming in and we started putting the minimum standards -- applying the facts and the law with the United States that first year. When it began to emerge -- and I think not really as a surprise given all the work that had been done over the previous decade through the Clinton, Bush and now Obama administrations on this issue that the United States was looking like a Tier 1 country.

Because of the -- what we thought might be the response from a number of countries saying, well, of course, you put yourself on Tier 1 -- if you're grading yourself, you're going to give yourself an A. But the transparency of the U.S. narrative, the accuracy, the data that's underpinning it reflecting federal and, increasingly, state efforts against human trafficking has carried the day. And most of the countries that we talk to actually say that the fact that it doesn't pull punches but, at the same time, has best practices and then recommendations for ourselves makes it much easier to talk to these other countries. It's become a very important foreign policy tool.

Now, there are some countries that don't like what their ranking is and have pointed out that we have a Tier 1 but have 10 million, 11 million illegal aliens in the United States, which is, perhaps, more of an evidence of their misunderstanding of what human trafficking is than it is reflective of them actually reading the report.

So we think that it's worked out very well. I was at a conference day before yesterday in in-service for folks from our embassies around Latin America. And a couple of the people who were in from embassies in countries that are not always the warmest towards the United States over the last few years said that this particular decision to rank the United States has made a difference in how they can talk to their foreign counterparts about trafficking.

SEN. FRANKEN: Thank you. And I want to thank you all for your testimony and for your tremendous work on this issue.

The record of this hearing will remain open for a week for additional statements and questions.

Thank you, again, for your time and testimony. This hearing stands adjourned. (Sounds gavel.) Thank you.

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of Texas Rep. Ted Poe:

Mr. Speaker, in the United States, throughout this entire land, there are 3,500 shelters--3,500 shelters--and these shelters are animal shelters. According to the Humane Society, there are at least 3,500 animal shelters in our Nation rescuing those animals, primarily dogs and cats, and making sure that they have some safety.

I have Dalmatians. In fact, one of my Dalmatians was from a shelter, Dalmatian Rescue in Dallas, Texas, is where I got it. Three thousand five hundred. Bear that number in mind, Mr. Speaker, because in the same United States of America there are five shelters--five--for minor sex trafficked victims in this country. Fifty beds in the whole Nation is what I understand that there are to take care of minors, primarily young girls who are trafficked throughout the United States for sexual pleasure.

Maybe we have gotten our priorities out of sync. You know, sex trafficking is nothing more than modern day slavery, and it is an epidemic in some parts of the world, and it even is coming to the United States. It's that crime to me that no one wants to talk about.

I spent a lot of time at the courthouse in Houston, Texas, as a prosecutor in felony court, as a criminal court judge for 22 years, and I heard a lot of cases. But this case of someone kidnapping a minor child and transporting them across the United States for sex slavery is one of those cases that is difficult to understand why it occurs in this Nation. And many people, many people in the academic areas and others don't want to admit that takes place in this Nation, but human trafficking does take place, whether it's with minors or whether it's with adults, and primarily, Mr. Speaker, it's with women.

I have traveled to the Eastern European nations as a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee and have discussed with people in the Ukraine, Romania, Bulgaria, the problem those nations have when their young women are sold to other nations in sex trafficking. Here's the way it works on the international scale. One way it works, and in many of these Eastern European countries, young women can't work, can't find jobs, and so they will learn either through the Internet or from an ad in the newspaper, if they go to a certain country they will be promised a job. So they leave their home in the Ukraine or Romania, and they go to some foreign country. They meet up with some person. It's a male, of course, and he promises that he will take care of them and they will get a job doing something. And, of course, what they end up doing is becoming a piece of property for that male so that that person can sell that young female into sex slavery.

Back home where they come from, their families many times never know what happened to their daughter or their sister. They have just disappeared off in some other country. That takes place in that form in many countries throughout Eastern Europe and other nations as well.

Unfortunately, those who keep statistics estimate that overseas the customers, the ones that use that sex trafficked victim, about 25 percent, I understand, are Americans; Americans that go overseas for the purpose of engaging in prostitution as a customer of some person that is trafficked internationally.

But let's bring it back closer to home and what's taking place in the United States. Being from Houston, Texas, the location of Houston, Texas, where it is on the map and its closeness to other nations south of the border makes it, unfortunately, a hub for internationally sex trafficked victims that come into the United States, either stay in Houston or are trafficked to some other part of the United States, and it has become a hub, one of the hubs in this country for that awful, dastardly crime.

It works this way. This is one of the ways it works. Young women, either adults or minors in some foreign country, are smuggled into the United States illegally by someone who promises that when he gets them into the United States, he's got a job waiting for them. In some cases, these young women have paid this person to smuggle them into the United States. And once they're in the United States, they become the property of that sex trafficker, and he forces them into exploitation. He uses threats against them. It's as simple as if you don't cooperate, I will have my friends in your country where your family is, I'll have them kill your family. So a 14-year-old girl, what decision does she make? She doesn't speak the language. She's in the United States, and this person says, either you cooperate and work for me, or I will make sure your parents are killed, and many times they choose the only alternative they think they have--to become a sex slave and be trafficked into the United States and allow that person to use them as property in the sex trafficking business.

When they come into the United States, they're promised a better life, a good job; but that doesn't really happen to some of them.

There are many stories. I'm going to talk about just two young women. Gabriella--that's not her real name--was working to support her family in Colombia. She was told by a friend--a male friend who recently moved to the United States--that she could make a whole lot more money if she came to the United States. So she took him up on the offer to let him get her into the United States; but as soon as she arrived here, that same "friend" forced her into prostitution.

She couldn't afford to come into the United States. So, he said, Well, I got you here. Now you've got to pay your way. The way you pay me for getting you here and the cost of me getting you into the United States is you're going to have to become a prostitute, and you're going to work for me, the pimp. If you don't, I'll harm your family back home in Colombia.

So for 5 years that young girl was moved around in different brothels, houses of prostitution. She said after she was finally rescued that she had no contact with the public and she really didn't even really know what city she was in. After years of servitude, ICE raided the brothel where she was held and Gabriella was rescued. She was one of the fortunate ones because she was referred to services where she received counseling and helped to find housing and care for her own child and also find a job.

But, sadly, this type of trafficking occurs in the United States. People--women--come into the United States looking for freedom and prosperity, a job that they can send money back home to their families; but they end up being property of someone else who sells them for sexual favors.

There are all kinds of ways that this is done. They're trafficked through massage parlors that advertise themselves as legitimate businesses. In reality, they're illegal sex rings. Part of that issue, massage parlors, occurs in the city of Houston, where women, primarily adult women, are smuggled into the United States from Asian countries. They don't speak the language. They're used in massage parlors, which are nothing more than a front for illegal sex rings.

The problem that they have is this. This is a complicated problem. It's not an easy solution. They come into the United States. They're smuggled here. They don't speak the language. They come from a country where the police are corrupt, nobody trusts the government; and they find themselves in the United States, where law enforcement tries to help them, and they don't cooperate because they come from a culture where the police, law enforcement, are corrupt. They do not understand that they can get help in the United States.

That situation occurs--these massage parlors--occur in some places, and one of those is in Houston, Texas, where Constable Ron Hickman has put his special teams together to try to stop this epidemic that's occurring in parts of our State. These trafficking individuals--the traffickers--they're smooth operators, and they will do anything to get around the law and intimidate the victim to cooperate.

While victims are brought from overseas into our country, children in our own backyards are forced into a life of sexual exploitation. Let me distinguish here. I started out by talking about minor sex trafficking victims and how there are so few shelters for them, but let's distinguish the types of victims we're talking about.

We have the international victims who come into the United States, smuggled into the U.S. and they are transported around the United States for sexual favors. Then we have people that are already in the United States. Citizens or people that are here legally who are moved from city to city in the United States. So those are domestic trafficked victims.

Here's the big distinction, Mr. Speaker: generally speaking, if a person is brought into the U.S. as a trafficked sex victim and she gets involved in prostitution and she's rescued by Federal authorities, she's treated as a victim of crime and there are some places to place that rescued victim; but the rules don't seem to be the same and aren't the same in some cases for domestic trafficked victims. For example, if a victim is taken from Houston, Texas, kidnapped and taken to another State in the United States and is forced into prostitution by some pimp and law enforcement gets involved and they find her, in many cases she's treated as a criminal. She's arrested for prostitution. She's not treated as a victim.

Now, in all deference to our law enforcement folks, who do as good a job as they can, there is no place to put that trafficked victim as a victim of crime. So she's put in the criminal justice system, in many cases the juvenile system because there's no place to put her. There are no shelters. There are no safe houses. There are no beds for those types of victims. Of course, it's a problem of resources.

But it's something that we need to understand how difficult that is on a minor child who is a victim of crime to be shoved into the general population as a juvenile or in the criminal justice system to get her out of that system and treat her like a victim. Of course, she has a whole life ahead of her. It starts out she's in the criminal justice system. Once that happens, the next time she's seen or picked up by law enforcement, even with good intentions, she's put back in the criminal justice system or the juvenile system.

So we have a standard here where we need to understand that we need to treat the victim of that traffic--the young woman, the minor child in some cases--they need to be treated as victims of crime and not criminals. We'll get to the criminals and who they are in just a minute.

Traffickers use and contact very vulnerable young women. Many times they abuse and they manipulate these young women. The children--these girls, primarily--come from families, but sometimes they are homeless. They're runaways or in some cases throwaways, as some call them; and they're very susceptible for trafficking. They really have no place to go in our society and our culture. They have no place to go. And so when they're roaming the streets and somebody comes up to them and treats them nice, promises he'll take care of them, give them a place to stay and give them money, they're susceptible to that. Once they get into that environment, they become a slave. They are a slave in 2011. Our culture needs to understand that.

The pimps, in many cases, will do anything. They will beat them, they will abuse them, they will drug them, and they will manipulate them through old-fashioned brainwashing.

Take the story of Maria. Maria was an 11-year-old girl. Eleven, Mr. Speaker. That's her actual age. She was raised by her grandmother in Los Angeles. Her mother died when she was very young and her father was not involved in her life. This young girl, as most girls, in my opinion, needed a strong male figure to help her. She was looking for someone since she didn't have a father figure around. She didn't know that this male figure would end up being someone who would treat her as a sex slave.

One day, this individual approached her. He treated her nice. He was 28 at the time. He took her shopping, bought her new clothes, treated her nice, took her to his house; and as soon as he went into that house with her, she didn't realize that she would never return to her home.

He treated her well at first, but soon he had other girls who lived in the house take her to a house of prostitution, for lack of a better phrase, and show her how to be a prostitute. Because, you see, she was 11 years of age. She later learned that she was making about $1,500 a night that she turned over to this 28-year-old pimp. Later, she said she was beaten and brainwashed and stuck in "the life" and trafficked throughout the United States.

Her pimp got all the money, making her believe that this is the way it should be and that he deserved the money while she was being raped by multiple men each and every night. He told her he owned her--and she believed it because she was 11. She was still maturing into society and what was right and what was wrong was all being taught differently to her.

Maria was arrested on multiple occasions and didn't even know her grandmother and her sister were looking for her until the first time she was arrested at the age of 14. Fortunately for Maria, there was a place for her to go to receive specialized services, and she was able to get counseling and eventually able to get out of this life of being a slave. She finally believed that she had some self-worth, where she believed before she had no worth as a person.

Part of the problem, Mr. Speaker, is we don't have enough places for young women like Maria--50 beds, only five shelters, I understand.

So the United States, as a Nation, as a culture, as a people, the greatest place on Earth, we need to understand that we have to deal with this issue. It's only going to get worse. And ignoring the problem will not solve the problem.

Of course, all different branches of law enforcement must work together--local, State, and Federal--on this issue, and especially on the issue of the fact that international trafficking victims in the United States seem to have some places to go when they're rescued and domestic trafficking victims don't, and especially those who are minor trafficking victims.

The Victims of Trafficking and Violation Protection Act of 2000 was the first large-scale Federal law to address human trafficking in this country. The law addresses both the global and domestic trafficking problem and also establishes an annual Trafficking in Persons Report that analyzes the issue of global and country-to-country trafficking and places countries on a list--on a tier is what it's called--of the worst offenders, and I think we should know who the worst offenders are.

The worst offending nations in the whole world that are kept up with--all countries are kept up with--on human sexual trafficking and slavery, here they are: Algeria, Burma, the Central African Republic, Cuba, New Guinea, Iran--I'll repeat that one, Iran--North Korea, Kuwait, Lebanon, Libya, Madagascar, Saudi Arabia, the Sudan, Turkmenistan, Venezuela, Yemen, and Zimbabwe. Those are the worst countries for this issue of international sex trafficking.

This legislation was reauthorized in 2008 as the William Wilberforce Trafficking Victims Reauthorization Act. We have improved the law over the years, and it's time that we make trafficking--international trafficking and domestic trafficking--as an issue, a human rights issue, a children's issue. Whatever you want to call it, it's wrong, and we have to deal with it in this country. And we cannot put an end to it until we are aware of the fact that it does occur.

Just like the old days when many people used to say when I was a judge, oh, gangs aren't a problem, there are no gangs in the United States. Yeah, well, we found out that was wrong. It's the same issue when it comes to human sex slavery. It is occurring, and it will only get worse unless we do something about it.

Our laws must identify the people in the system. And I think it's important that we take the child, the trafficked person, and treat them as a victim of crime. We have to have that mindset that in many cases they are a victim of crime. We, as a culture, need to recognize that and treat them that way and rescue them from that environment. That's the primary duty that we have: Rescue that child, get them out of that environment, and help them.

Let me tell you, these are hard people to work with. These young women are hard. They are difficult. The agencies that work with them find them very difficult to work with, but that doesn't mean we should give up on them.

So we take the victim and we work with them and treat them like a victim. Then we take the customer, the person that pays for the service, pays the slave to perform some sexual activity, we take that person and we prosecute those individuals. And when they're convicted, I think their photographs ought to be on the Internet. Line them up. Let the country know who these people are that live in this Nation that buy sexual favors from children. Show who they are. But prosecute those people.

Too often in the area of prostitution--there are even some States that want to abolish it as a crime. Too often we center on the prostitute. And in some cases, the prostitute, unlike the cases I'm talking about, is committing a crime. They're doing it because they want to. They're not forced to do it. That's a different situation. But we center on the prostitute. Very seldom do we prosecute the male, the person who uses the service. Our society better start prosecuting the person who needs to be prosecuted.

Then we deal with the trafficker, the slave owner. And there is no punishment that is strong enough for the slave owner in this country. Go after them. Make them know they're not going to do business in the United States and traffic international victims or domestic victims in this country. We will not stand for it. But let's come down hard on those guys and go after the other ones, too, who use that service and treat the victim as a victim.

The people who use that service, they need to know we're going to find out who they are and we're going to publicize their names because that's the demand that's created in this country. We cannot continue to let those that pay to abuse children continue to roam our streets, and we need to treat victims as such.

I am the cochairman of the Victims' Rights Caucus, along with my friend Jim Costa from California, and one of the things we're trying to do is raise awareness for victims of crime, especially those of domestic trafficking victims that are arrested and treated as criminals when, in the case, they should be treated as victims of crime. We must make sure that the international and domestic victims are both treated as victims and both receive essential services, and there must be services provided for them. We must also make sure that the victim in this case is rescued, that, as a society, that is the first thing we try to do is rescue them.

As I mentioned earlier, it's my understanding there are only about 50 beds for minor sex trafficking victims in the United States and five shelters. We need to solve that problem and help those organizations that work with victims of crime have resources to house and treat and take care of those very special people.

There are many organizations that are trying to help in the area of rescue, stopping trafficking of victims. I'd like to mention those before I finish, Mr. Speaker.

Of course, I mentioned Constable Ron Hickman of Precinct 4 in Houston that's working on the prostitution involved in massage parlors and trying to prosecute the people who are involved in that, but also to rescue those victims that are very difficult to work with because they come from a culture where they don't work with law enforcement.

Another organization is the Arrow Ministries in Texas, the YMCA International Services. Children at Risk in Houston does a great job. They do exactly what their name says. They try to take care of kids, children that are at risk.

Houston Rescue and Restore, Arrow Ministries, Redeem Ministries. On the national level, there are other organizations: Shared Hope International, The Rebecca Project for Human Rights, Polaris Project, Catholic Charities, Humanity United, World Vision, International Justice Mission, Vital Voices, the Coalition to End Slavery and Trafficking, Amnesty International, End Child Prostitution and Trafficking, Free the Slaves, Not for Sale Campaign, and Break the Chain Campaign, and there is that great organization, RAINN, as well.

Mr. Speaker, we, as a culture, as a society, as a country, as a people, I think that we are judged, we are judged as a people. The United States claims to be the world leader in human rights, and I think we are the world leader in human rights, and we should continue to be. Because we've been blessed with so much, we should try to protect the dignity of humans throughout the world, but especially humans here.

But we are judged not by the way we treat the rich, the famous, the popular, the powerful. We're judged by the way we treat the elderly, the weak, the poor, the children, victims of crime. That's how we're judged, not by the way we treat these other people.

So I hope that we understand the necessity, the importance of taking care of our greatest resource, and our greatest resource is children in this country. No matter who they are or what's happened to them in their life, we need to take care of them, especially those young that, in the year 2011, become the slaves of someone else for money.

Let's take care of this issue, Mr. Speaker, and stop this crime against humanity in this country and be the world leader.

And that's just the way it is.

Luis CdeBaca Ambassador-at-Large, Office To Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons Speaks on The Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act: Renewing the Commitment to Victims of Human Trafficking

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 2174 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons issued the text of the following speech by Luis CdeBaca, Ambassador-at-Large:

Good morning. I'd like to thank Chairman Leahy, Senator Grassley, and all the members of the Committee for the opportunity to testify today. I am Ambassador Lou de Baca. As President Obama's Ambassador-at-Large to Combat Human Trafficking, I direct the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons (G/TIP) and I am responsible for leading our efforts in the global fight against modern slavery.

In addition to the production of the annual Trafficking in Persons Report and a range of direct diplomatic and public engagement on human trafficking issues, one of the primary responsibilities of our office is the administration of foreign assistance funds for international anti-trafficking programs.

Our grantees operate in all regions of the world and are advancing all three Ps of the 3P Paradigm--prevention, prosecution, and protection--that guide our efforts to fight modern slavery here at home and around the world. That means the work of our grantees runs the gamut of anti-trafficking efforts, whether victim protection and rehabilitation, training for prosecutors and law enforcement officials, or prevention efforts, including partnerships with civil society and the private sector, that look to address this crime and curb demand before it takes place. These efforts are closely linked to the mandates and purposes laid out in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) and its subsequent reauthorizations. The provisions in the TVPA help to prioritize the allocation of our anti-trafficking funds.

Because the three Ps function as an interlocking paradigm, no single P stands alone. For example, it is not enough to prosecute traffickers if we do not also provide assistance to the survivors and work to ensure that no one else is victimized. Thus, many of G/TIP's projects are cross-cutting in their approach to combating trafficking, and we place a particular emphasis on programs that address victim protection. Ninety percent of projects we have funded last year include a protection component and 61 percent provide direct services for victims. Just over half of the projects build capacity of local law enforcement and prosecutors to apprehend and prosecute traffickers; victim protection is a critical component of these projects as well because justice for the most vulnerable begins with a robust victim-centered approach. More than 90 percent of prevention programs include victim protection activities. Fifty-nine percent of all protection programs include activities to increase prosecutions and convictions, and nearly three quarters of projects focus on both labor and sex trafficking to ensure a comprehensive response to all forms of trafficking.

As I hope to demonstrate today, the programs we help fund are successful, but our foreign assistance budget is modest relative to the global scale of the crime of trafficking in persons. Our final foreign assistance appropriation for this fiscal year was $16.2 million. While we put every penny of that sum to good use, that total stands in stark contrast to a crime exploiting as many as 27 million victims worldwide.

My testimony will demonstrate that the appropriation for our international programs is money well spent, both in terms of the transparency of our grant selection process and in terms of the effectiveness of these funds in advancing U.S. foreign policy.

A good starting point is to explain how we decide to spend our foreign assistance funds. Responsible administration of foreign assistance funds is a top priority for our office. That's why we've implemented a rigorous, transparent, and competitive application process for our grants.

Our foreign assistance and programming priorities are strategically linked to the country-specific tier rankings and diagnostic assessments included in the annual TIP Report. To maximize our limited funding, we identify priority countries for funding each year. We generally target our foreign assistance to Tier 3, Tier 2 Watch List, and, in some cases, Tier 2 countries, where governments have the political will to improve the response to trafficking but lack the economic resources to address the problem. In addition to targeting Tier 3, Tier 2 Watch List, and selected Tier 2 countries, we also consider a country's financial resources and need for technical support, political will to address trafficking in persons, and other funding that may be already used to address trafficking in the country.

At the start of the process, our office posts information about funding priorities and the availability of funds for anti-trafficking projects on our website. We convene a half-day bidders' conference for potential applicants, which in the past has been attended by nearly 150 representatives of NGOs, universities, and international organizations, among others. For those not able to attend the conference, we publish the material presented on our website.

We solicit proposals via www.grantsolutions.gov and www.grants.gov, the portals for U.S. government grants, and through a global call for proposals through U.S. embassies abroad. Solicitations conducted via www.grantsolutions.gov and www.grants.gov involve applicants submitting their proposals through the systems managed by OMB and HHS. The global call for proposals is a partnership between U.S. embassies and G/TIP, as we ask U.S. embassies to inform organizations working on trafficking how proposals may be submitted to G/TIP.

Grant proposals that are submitted to G/TIP in response to solicitations for bilateral or regional projects are reviewed for technical requirements. Proposals that meet the minimum technical standards (English language, figures in U.S. dollars, and published page limits) are forwarded to U.S. embassies for review by the TIP country team, which may include the political officer, USAID, and other relevant offices. The country team reviews applications and provides feedback to the Department on proposals for bilateral projects that are submitted to G/TIP.

Proposals are then subjected to a competitive interagency regional review panel that provides an opportunity for input from representatives of G/TIP; the relevant Regional Bureau; other offices within the Department that fund anti-trafficking programs; the USAID regional representative; and, as appropriate, other U.S. government agencies.

G/TIP anti-trafficking projects are primarily funded as grants, cooperative agreements, or Interagency Agreements and managed by the G/TIP Grants Officer and International Programs Officers. However, some projects are awarded at State Department posts abroad if G/TIP and post determine that this would facilitate more effective management of the project.

The selection of proposals for funding is based on program priorities and requirements conveyed in the solicitation for proposals. In an ongoing effort to improve the design and effectiveness of anti-trafficking projects, in FY07, G/TIP began to explicitly require applicants to clearly articulate goals and objectives, activities to support each objective, as well as indicators to measure success. The FY07 revised solicitation format was recognized as a model for other offices within the Department.

To further improve the competitive process, in FY10, our office initiated a two-stage grant application process that streamlined the application for organizations seeking funding and reduced the U.S. government resources required to review hundreds of 30-page proposals, while preserving fairness and transparency. In the first stage applicants submit a two-page proposal or concept note and following the review described, selected applicants are invited to submit a full proposal for competitive review.

The required proposal elements stated in solicitations constitute the basis for evaluating proposals. Each panel recommends to me proposals for funding. The results of the review panels are compiled for my review and consideration. I select proposals that best reflect the programming needs for the specific country as identified in the TIP Report, as well as global and regional program needs. Following review and approval of recommended projects by the Director of Foreign Assistance, all projects are sent for Congressional Notification. Abstracts of recommended proposals are distributed to the members of the Senior Policy Operating Group (SPOG) for a final review and comment.

The review process is thorough and transparent, involving numerous partners within the State Department and across government, and of course concluding with Congressional consultation. Such diligence is necessary given the demand for our international program funding. In the last two years, the Office received 998 applications requesting a total of $547 million.

In recent years, G/TIP has taken several steps to shorten the time from proposal submission to project award, including hiring more program officers (from five in 2009 to nine in 2011) and establishing the grants officer and budget officer positions within G/TIP. In contrast to previous years, almost all of foreign assistance funds were obligated in 2010 and we expect the same this year.

Our thorough pre-award review process is necessarily coupled with effective monitoring and evaluation of international programs. The program and grant officers within the Department have monitored anti-trafficking grant projects to provide technical assistance to grantees and to ensure that project goals and objectives are implemented; that Federal grant funds are expended consistent with the provisions of pertinent statutes, regulations, agency administrative requirements; and, that Federal funds are used responsibly.

Grantees are required to submit program progress and financial reports throughout the project period and final reports within 90 days of the end of the project.

The U.S. embassy officers are partners in program monitoring. G/TIP notifies the appropriate officer at post when a new grant is awarded; the guidance from G/TIP provides key project information and recommends procedures for embassy participation in monitoring which are subject to embassy staffing and workloads. When G/TIP Program Officers conduct site visits they use a standardized format for review of administrative and programmatic aspects of the project and the TIP point of contact at the embassy accompanies the officer on the site visit, if available. This practice facilitates close collaboration between the post and G/TIP and strengthens follow-on monitoring by posts.

We take great care in ensuring that we are responsible custodians of the taxpayers' money, and I believe G/TIP has succeeded in our efforts to make the administration of our programs funding as transparent and accountable as possible. But the true success story here is the programs themselves. Whether in Cote D'Ivoire, where Prosperite is providing basic shelter and services to young girls; or in Thailand, where TRAFCORD has coordinated a series of successful rescues of labor and sex trafficking victims and serves as a model in the region; or in Mexico, where Casa Alianza is working to increase the identification of TIP victims among highly vulnerable street children; or in India where projects demonstrate best practices in raising awareness of government services for freed bonded laborers and aftercare following their release; or in Ghana where a U.S. expert provided technical assistance to local prosecutors leading to a path-breaking conviction, the first of its kind in a forced child labor case, the true success of our programs is the results we are seeing.

The sad reality is that without the modest funding G/TIP is able to provide, many of the projects we support would have to close their doors. That would mean more than just the end of a victim identification initiative or the shuttering of a shelter for survivors. In many instances, it would mean the end of all such services in that country. That must not be the mark of our foreign policy.

The President and Secretary Clinton have made the effort to combat modern slavery a priority because it is in our strategic interest to combat modern slavery. Human trafficking thrives in places where vulnerable populations slip through the cracks and live without the protection of law. The places where we support anti-trafficking programs are the places where we need to show that the United States will stand up for those who cannot stand up for themselves.

But fighting slavery is more than good foreign policy. It's part of who we are as a nation. We cannot walk away from that responsibility here at home or in our conduct around the world.

I thank you again for the opportunity to testify today. We look forward to working with you further to provide information or answer questions that would provide additional clarity or background.

Philippines says grateful for US recognition of counterterrorism efforts

LENGTH: 810 words

Text of report by Aurea Calica, Alexis Romero, and Pia Lee-Brago headlined "US Acknowledges Phl's 'Robust Effort' vs Terrorism" published by Philippine newspaper The Philippine Star's news portal Philstar.com on 13 September

Manila, Philippines - Malacanang [presidential palace] is grateful for the United States' acknowledgment of the Philippines' anti-terror efforts.

In a press briefing at Malacanang yesterday, deputy presidential spokesperson Abigail Valte expressed appreciation for remarks made by US Ambassador Harry Thomas Jr. that the Philippines was doing a good job in fighting terrorism a decade after the Sept. 11 attacks by al-Qaeda terrorists in New York and Washington.

"We appreciate those remarks and certainly it is a recognition of our efforts to fight not just terrorism (but) human trafficking as evidenced by the removal of the Philippines from the watchlist and its subsequent upgrade in status," she said.

Valte said the Aquino administration was also pushing for the amendments to the Human Security Act of 2007 to make it a stronger tool against terrorism.

In an interview with GMA News [local television network] on Sunday, Thomas cited the "robust effort" by the Philippine National Police and the Armed Forces of the Philippines (AFP) under the Aquino administration in fighting terrorism.

"As long as we remain vigilant, as long as you are doing everything you can to keep people safe, then you're doing a good job," Thomas said.

Thomas earlier said he had recommended to the US State Department the lifting of the travel ban to Mindanao.

Thomas made the announcement during the opening of the 20th Mindanao Business Conference in Pagadian City, Zamboanga del Sur last week.

He also underscored the importance of working with other countries to fight terrorism.

The Abu Sayyaf, Jemaah Islamiyah and Rajah Solaiman Movement, he said, have no ideological leanings and are only interested in terror activities to raise funds.

"I don't see the Philippines as a breeder of terrorism but I see the Philippines as a partner to rid the world of terrorists," he said.

On Sept. 2, the US State Department alerted its citizens traveling to or already in Mindanao of possible terror activities by al-Qaeda or its affiliates.

In reaction to the travel alert, the Department of Foreign Affairs said the "Philippines respects the right and responsibility of the US government to protect their nationals and ensure their safety and security."

Meanwhile, the military said amendments to the anti-terrorism law would help prevent terror attacks similar to that launched 10 years ago in the US.

"That (amended anti-terror law) would help prevent similar occurrences in the Philippines. The purpose is to add muscle and teeth to agencies fighting terrorism," AFP public affairs chief Col. Arnulfo Burgos Jr. said in an interview.

"These (amendments) will pre-empt any activity that would lead to successful consummation of a terrorist plot," he added.

Burgos noted that vigilance is crucial to thwarting any form of terrorism.

He said one of the amendments being pushed by Malacanang is the lifting of the P500,000 fine for each day law enforcers wrongfully detain a terror suspect eventually acquitted by the courts. Officials believe the huge penalty discourages security forces from pursuing cases against terror suspects.

Another provision that Malacanang wants amended involves requiring security forces to inform suspected terrorists that they are being investigated.

"We support calls to remove the section that informs terrorists that they are under surveillance. It defeats the purpose of covert operations," Burgos said.

Burgos said they support a proposal of the Anti-Terrorism Council to require authorities to report within 30 days to the court that permitted their surveillance the results of their probe. "The proposal would prevent abuses," Burgos said.

"This is consistent with the directive of the AFP chief to defend and protect the rights of our citizens and safeguard human rights in all our operations," he added.

Lawmakers incorporated safeguards in the Human Security Act to prevent abuses and uphold the rights of suspected terrorists.

President Aquino called for amendments to the law last month. He renewed his call for amendments to the law on the eve of the 10th anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks in the US.

Executive Secretary Paquito Ochoa Jr., head of the Anti-Terrorism Council, cited the need to strengthen the prosecution of terrorists while upholding their rights.

"We believe that ensuring the security of our citizens should not come at the expense of their civil liberties," Ochoa said in a statement.

A US State department report released last month showed that more than 11,500 terrorist attacks occurred in 72 countries last year, resulting in more than 13,200 deaths.

Malacanang Welcomes US Envoy's Citation of the Country's Fight Against Terror

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 270 words

DATELINE: MANILA, Philippines

The office of the President of the Philippines issued the following news release:

Malacanang welcomed on Monday the remarks of US Ambassador to the Philippines Harry Thomas, Jr. who lauded on Sunday the "good job" the Philippines was doing in its fight against terror.

"The Philippine government is doing a good job in fighting terrorism a decade after the tragic "9/11" terror attacks by Islamic extremists in the United States on Sept. 11, 2001," Thomas Jr. said in an interview.

Thomas cited in particular the Philippine National Police and the Armed Forces of the Philippines which, under the administration of President Benigno S. Aquino III, have been making significant headway in its quest to stem terrorist threats in the country.

Because of these efforts, Thomas has recommended to the US State Department the lifting of the travel ban to Mindanao.

Thomas made the announcement during the opening of the 20th Mindanao Business Conference in Pagadian City, Zamboanga del Sur last week.

"I'm quite content. It's a robust effort... As long as we remain vigilant, as long as you are doing everything you can to keep people safe, then you're doing a good job," Thomas said.

In a press briefing in Malacanang this afternoon, Deputy Presidential Spokesperson Abigail Valte said the government welcomed Thomas' remarks.

"We appreciate those remarks and certainly it is a recognition of our efforts to fight not just terrorism (but) human trafficking as evidenced by the removal of the Philippines from the watch list and its subsequent upgrade in status," she said.

Nigeria; NAPTIP Gets New Executive Secretary

BYLINE: Daily Trust (Abuja)

LENGTH: 288 words

The National Agency for Prohibition of Traffic in Persons and other related matters (NAPTIP) yesterday got a new Executive Secretary, Barr. Mrs Beatrice Jedy-Agba.

She replaced Mr Chuzi Egede who left the position of his own volition to further his personal plans, according to NAPTIP's board chairman Mr Damian Dodo.

In a courtesy visit to the Attorney General of the Federation (AGF) and Minister of Justice Mr Mohammed Bello Adoke (SAN), NAPTIP highlighted the legal framework of the agency as well as to source for necessary funding of the agency.

In his speech, the agency's board chairman, Mr Damian Dodo, said the federal government has taken control of the welfare of Nigerian girls trafficked to Mali and are working out the modalities to ensure their safe return through "Operation Timbuktu."

The chairman also said that the agency has exercised full powers of prosecution under the mandate of the Attorney general, leading to 135 convictions and 88 pending cases in federal high courts across the country.

The agency expressed gratitude to the federal government as the country has maintained a tier 1 rating in the global human trafficking report for the past 3 years.

He said the agency has been inundated with report of the ugly and worsening conditions of Nigerian girls in slave camps in Mali.

He said that the planned operation has already received the directive of the National Security Adviser who has mandated the Agency as to its urgency so as to conduct the operation without further delay.

"The number of these unfortunate girls who are kept as sex slaves are on the increase as confirmed by fact finding mission conducted by the Agency and also Nigeria embassy in Mali and Nigeria community leaders living in Bamako".

U.S. Department of State Publishes 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report

BYLINE: Christina Theocharopoulou .

Law student at Heidelberg University, Germany since October 2008 and current intern at Berliner, Corcoran & Rowe LLP, Washington, DC.; Bruce Zagaris

SECTION: TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS; Pg. 892 Vol. 27 No. 9

LENGTH: 1096 words

On June 27, 2011, the U.S. Department of State published the 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report (hereafter 2011 TIP Report).ⁿ² The Report ranks 184 countries' efforts to investigate, prosecute, and prevent human trafficking, as well as other topics of interest. The U.S. itself is included in this year's Report.

ⁿ² U.S. Department of State, Trafficking in Persons Report (June 2011) <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/tiprpt/2011/index.htm>.

U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton points out that the overall number of prosecutions worldwide has remained relatively static.ⁿ³ Underscoring the 2008 theme "a robust law enforcement is essential" of her predecessor Condoleezza Rice, Clinton stressed the importance of using the tools that have been created for combating human trafficking and bringing more perpetrators to justice. It is the governments' duty - even in times of tight economy - to find creative ways to combat human trafficking, to work closely with the private sector and to use supply chain monitoring techniques so that consumers can know if their goods and services come from slavery-free sources.ⁿ⁴ ⁿ³ Remarks on the Release of the 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report, Hillary Rodham Clinton, Secretary of State, June 27, 2011 <http://www.state.gov/secretary/rm/2011/06/167156.htm>.

ⁿ⁴ Id.

Ambassador-at-Large Luis CdeBaca states that in the last ten years since the Palermo-Protocol the three-P paradigm - the three P's of prevention, protection and prosecution - came to fruition. Already 130 countries of the 148 parties in this protocol have enacted laws prohibiting human trafficking. That is why the report of 2011 has as a theme a decade of delivery, in contrast to the previous decade of development.

CdeBaca tried to give a definition of human trafficking and narrowed it down to describing it as "plain and simple, modern slavery." The estimates are 27 million people who are working in bondage around the world. And since it is a crime of denying someone of their most basic human rights, the right of freedom, as CdeBaca says, it is extremely important that policy tries to stop this crime with every tool possible.ⁿ⁵ ⁿ⁵ Special Briefing Luis CdeBaca Ambassador-at-Large, Office To Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, Via Teleconference, Washington, DC, June 24, 2011 <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/rm/2011/167149.htm>.

Clinton as well as CdeBaca spoke at some length on good examples and advances in several countries regarding the efforts made against human trafficking. They tried to use these stories of success to show that is worth for every country to make the effort - even for very little ones. The most important factor on fighting trafficking effectively is the political will to enforce the anti-trafficking policy. Moreover the countries need to work together evermore, since that is the reason why countries make bilateral treaties, to achieve change for the better.

The report places each country in the 2011 TIP Report into one of three tiers, as required by The Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA). The placement is based more on the extent of government action to combat trafficking than on the size of the problem, although the latter is also an important factor. The analyses are based on the extent of governments' efforts to reach compliance with the TVPA's minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking.

Tier 1 has countries whose governments fully comply with the TVPA's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. Tier 2 contains countries whose governments do not fully comply with the TVPA's minimum standards but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards. The Tier 2 Watch List has countries whose governments do not fully comply with the TVPA's minimum standards, but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards and a) the absolute number of victims of severe forms of trafficking is very significant or is significantly increasing; b) there is a failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons from the prior year, including increased investigations, prosecution, and convictions of trafficking crimes, increased assistance to victims, and decreasing evidence of complicity in severe forms of trafficking by government officials; or c) the determination that a country is making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance with minimum standards was based on commitments by the country to take additional steps over the next year. Tier 3 has countries whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so. n6 n6 2011 TIP Report, supra, at 13-14.

Governments can evaluate their compliance by asking three questions: (1) does the government criminalize all forms of trafficking and prescribe sentences commensurate with the gravity of the offenses? Consistent with the UN Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime, governments should prescribe maximum criminal penalties of no fewer than four years. Penalties prescribed for sex trafficking offenses should be equivalent to the penalties for rape and other serious crimes. (2) Does the government use its laws to vigorously investigate and prosecute all forms of human trafficking that exist in the country? Many countries fail to pursue prosecutions diligently or ignore certain types of human trafficking, such as the forced labor of men and boys. (3) Is the government doing what it can to protect victims and prevent trafficking?

The current report illustrates that, notwithstanding the millions of victims, only 6,017 cases of trafficking were prosecuted, compared to 6,178 in 2005 and 6,885 in 2004. The transnational nature of the crimes often makes them difficult to try in court. Law enforcement may want to consider the use of more intrusive methods, such as wire tapping, undercover sting operations, and asset forfeiture n7 n7 Editorial, name, shame - and prosecute, WASH. POST, June 28, 2011.

The 2011 report concludes that last year only 32 of 184 countries fully met the standards set by U.S. law. The number on the list of the worst violators rose to 23 from 13. n8 n8 Editorial, Slavery in the Modern Age, N.Y. TIMES, July 2, 2011, at A16, col. 1.

The annual TIP contributes to the knowledge and debate about TIP policies and stimulates discussion about the needs and successes of efforts of the 3Ps. The TIP annual report illustrates the work of one government to implement the TIP Protocol to the Palermo Convention.

High Court loss may open door to Nauru

BYLINE: John KerinSECTION: NEWS; Pg. 12LENGTH: 553 words

Immigration Minister Chris Bowen remains confident the government will defeat the High Court challenge to the controversial Malaysia refugee swap deal.

But there are some Labor MPs on both the Right and Left who won't be disappointed if the government loses, in a decision expected to be handed down on Wednesday.

That would allow Prime Minister Julia Gillard to do a U-turn and argue that, frustrated by the High Court, she has no choice but to sign a deal with the Pacific island of Nauru.

Given Parliament has already condemned the Malaysian deal, Ms Gillard could argue she has no recourse to the legislature to try and resurrect it.

Opposition Leader Tony Abbott might complain about Labor embracing former prime minister John Howard's hardline "Pacific solution".

Mr Abbott has repeatedly urged Ms Gillard to pick up the phone and call Nauru president Marcus Stephen to reopen the centre rather than take a risk with Malaysia.

But the Opposition Leader may find it hard to maintain the rage if Nauru and another centre Gillard is reopening with Papua New Guinea's blessing on Manus Island, help stop the refugees' boats.

And proponents argue, where is the political downside given neither the government or Gillard's stocks could go any lower.

"We don't know if it [embracing Nauru] would stop the boats but it worked for John Howard and it appears to shape up better than the Malaysian solution," one Labor source said.

Though the asylum seeker issue has slipped down the rankings of Labor headaches, following the Thomson credit card imbroglio, Labor sources suggest the bottom line is still to "get asylum seekers off the agenda" because the issue is so potent with voters in marginal seats in Sydney and Brisbane.

Under the Malaysia deal Australia has agreed to send 800 asylum seekers arriving by boat to Malaysia in return for accepting 4000 refugees from Malaysia.

Along with a deal to reopen a Howard era asylum-seeker processing centre on PNG's Manus Island, the Malaysia deal is designed to deny the people smugglers' sales pitch of resettlement in Australia.

The High Court challenge brought by refugee lawyers centres on whether the Immigration Minister Chris Bowen acted lawfully in declaring Malaysia a suitable place to send asylum seekers given it is not a signatory to the UN refugee convention and that they are subject to mistreatment including caning.

The Australian Human Rights Commission has intervened arguing Mr Bowen is in breach of his duty of care as legal guardian to unaccompanied asylum seeker children.

Mr Bowen insists he has secured guarantees from Malaysia that the 800 people Australia sends to Malaysia will be well treated.

The concern among Labor MPs is how long that will last and what happens if even one of those people Australia sends to Malaysia is mistreated.

Malaysia remains on a US human trafficking watch list, with refugees from Burma particularly vulnerable to falling prey to the sex trade, forced labour and at risk of physical and sexual assault as well as caning.

The Nauru centre would be funded by Australia with the healthcare and welfare standards set by Canberra.

KEY POINTS

- The High Court will decide whether refugees can be sent to Malaysia.
- A ruling against may force Julia Gillard to process refugees on Nauru.
- Labor sources say such an outcome might benefit Labor.

UN envoy urges Thailand to tackle trafficking

LENGTH: 340 wordsDATELINE: BANGKOK, Aug 19 2011

Thailand must do more to combat widespread human trafficking for sexual and labour exploitation, including addressing "deeply-rooted" corruption, a UN envoy said on Friday.

"The implementation of policy and legal framework on human trafficking and the law enforcement are weak and fragmented," said the United Nations special rapporteur on people trafficking Joy Ngozi Ezeilo.

At a press conference following her 11 day mission to Thailand, Ezeilo acknowledged that progress had been made, but she underlined the need for wide-ranging improvements, in initial recommendations ahead of a 2012 report.

She said prosecutions of traffickers remain low, contributing to a culture of "impunity" for those who trade in people.

"Corruption, especially among low-cadre law enforcement officers at provincial and local levels, is deeply rooted," she said.

"The government should promote zero tolerance to corruption and complicity of public officials with traffickers, and prosecute and adequately punish offenders to dissuade such practices."

Ezeilo said the underlying causes of trafficking, especially demand for "cheap and exploitative" labour from neighbouring Myanmar, Laos and Cambodia, "are not being effectively addressed".

She noted "widespread" sexual exploitation -- including child prostitution, pornography and sex tourism -- as well as new forms of trafficking for domestic labour, begging, forced marriage and surrogacy.

Forced labour is also growing in agriculture and construction and is "notoriously common" in the fishing industry.

Ezeilo called on Thailand to review its labour and migration laws, recognising the demand for cheap, low skilled labour and to provide "safe migration options" for those entering the country from abroad.

The US State Department has placed Thailand on its human trafficking watchlist for two years running, accusing it of not doing enough to combat trafficking.

It said conservative estimates suggest there are tens of thousands of victims sold into modern-day slavery in Thailand from neighbouring countries.

Taiwan's anti-human trafficking work enhances image: KMTBYLINE: Justin Su and Elaine HouLENGTH: 306 wordsDATELINE: Taipei, Aug. 18

Taiwan's efforts and improvements in combating human trafficking have helped enhance the country's international image, ruling Kuomintang (KMT) legislative whip Chao Li-yun said Thursday.

Since 2010, Taiwan has been listed in the highest "Tier 1" category of the annual "Trafficking in Persons Report" by the U.S. State Department. This represents considerable progress from 2006, when Taiwan was put on the "Tier 2" watch list, Chao said.

According to the 2011 report, the Taiwanese authorities fully complied with the minimum standards laid out by the U.S. government for the elimination of trafficking, as they continued to prosecute and punish trafficking offenses, and increased their efforts to protect victims of trafficking.

Chao made the remarks at a news conference in which Ministry of the Interior and Ministry of Justice (MOJ) officials discussed government efforts in this regard.

Taiwan and South Korea were the only Asian countries classified in the highest ranking in this year's report, Deputy Interior Minister Tseng Chung-ming said.

Tseng also attributed the country's progress to the Legislative Yuan enactment of the Human Trafficking Prevention Act in 2009 and ongoing joint efforts by various private groups.

A total of 300 people were convicted of human trafficking in Taiwan last year, said Lin Chin-tsun, deputy director-general of the Department of Prosecutorial Affairs under the MOJ.

Lin added that the MOJ will continue to train prosecutors in handling human trafficking cases.

As part of a government drive to protect human rights, Chao added, the legislature will continue to amend the laws to bring them into line with the U.N. international covenants on Civil and Political Rights and Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, and the U.N. Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women.

Evils of dependence

SECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 16LENGTH: 456 words

LEGISLATION in the United States on "trafficking in persons" (TIP), considered a "diplomatic tool", puts countries on watch lists for non-compliance and not doing enough to combat the transnational crime. The upshot of that Act of Congress is the State Department's annual TIP Report. In its most recent report, Malaysia has been upgraded from Tier 3 status in 2009, where we were assessed to be guilty of non-compliance, to Tier 2 last year. It now means that there is compliance in order to meet minimum standards, but is still inadequate overall. The Immigration Department here has admitted that indeed the problem does exist. But it placed human trafficking in proper perspective as the rough edge of the country's excessive reliance on foreign workers.

According to the TIP Report, human trafficking is "modern slavery" which broadly includes "forced labour, sex trafficking, bonded labour, debt bondage, involuntary domestic servitude, forced child labour, child soldiers and child sex trafficking". Last year's TIP Report concludes, according to the Immigration Department, that Malaysia has too many foreign workers, which has subsequently led to forced labour. In terms of numbers, there are some four million migrant labourers in the country, all needed in sectors where local workers refuse to participate, such as construction, plantation and domestic service. Dependence, it would seem, is the root of this particular evil. But eradicating human trafficking cannot be left to the destination countries alone. Source nations and international agencies must also take part.

Whatever might be the category of offence that we fall into, the certainty is that the problem is caused by unscrupulous employers lacking in humanity, quick to exploit the hardship of others. The victims are here under forced circumstances of poverty, cheated every step of the way always with horrendous tales to tell, but yet few are deterred from trying their luck in a foreign country. This tale of grinding poverty and relative over-population at one end and the prospect of a decent living and under-population at the other makes for a troubling combination. For Malaysia, dependence on foreign labour has meant the need to accommodate such ills as higher health expenditure, increases in serious crimes, charges of human trafficking, impaired relations with neighbours and, most seriously, helping to keep the country in a middle-income trap. Further, as the case of the Immigration officers detained under the Internal Security Act for their alleged involvement in human trafficking syndicates attests, this dependence incurs enormous hidden costs, not least of them the corrosion of authorities involved in its regulation and enforcement.

Clarifying human trafficking issues

BYLINE: Koi Kye LeeSECTION: Pg. 1LENGTH: 400 words

PUTRAJAYA: The Immigration Department has sent a report to the United States State Department that clarifies the issues raised by it in relation to alleged human trafficking in Malaysia.

In the US' Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report, Malaysia was in tier two last year compared with tier three in 2009.

The TIP Report lists countries in the world based on their minimum standard of compliance in the fight against human trafficking. The evaluation is carried out by the State Department annually.

Director-general of Immigration Datuk Alias Ahmad said among the issues that were raised in the report was the excess intake of foreign workers that subsequently led to forced labour in Malaysia.

Denying this, he said that in general, the country still needed about three to four million workers, especially in the plantation and construction sectors as locals refused to fill the vacancies.

"Actually, the issue arose due to management problems, and not an excessive workforce. So, the related agencies should tackle the problem appropriately and not put the blame solely on the Immigration Department and Home Ministry," he said recently.

Alias also said the issue regarding employers holding their workers' passports no longer surfaced because the Immigration Department did not permit the employers to do so.

"Sometimes, the employees, of their own free will, hand their passports over to the employers for safekeeping."

Another issue raised by the report was that the People's Volunteer Force (Rela) was cracking down on illegal immigrants through their own operations.

Alias said Rela was no longer allowed to carry out any operations unless they were asked to help by the authorities.

It was learnt that the issue was raised after reports were received that Rela members were acting outside of their jurisdiction, aside from being harsh with the immigrants.

On the issue of human trafficking cases that were not investigated thoroughly and effectively, Alias said: "Judging from the number of arrests and cases recorded, the issue does exist in Malaysia.

"However, this is because it is hard for us to gather evidence when the victims are unwilling to become witnesses.

"When caught, they say they were forced, when actually they came willingly. But when you ask them to become witnesses, they refuse to do so. Hence, it is hard for us to obtain evidence and it is not due to ineffective investigations."

UN envoy probes situation here

BYLINE: The NationLENGTH: 486 words

A representative of the UN human-rights agency visited the Immigration Bureau and Labour Ministry yesterday to discuss the situation of human trafficking in Thailand.

Thailand has been placed on the Tier-2 Watch List for a second consecutive year, as per the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Annual Report 2011 that was released in Washington on June 28.

Joy Ngozi Ezeilo, UN Special Rapporteur on Trafficking in Persons for the UN High Commissioner on Human Rights (UNHCR), visited the immigration bureau to witness how human-trafficking victims are treated by police and if the behaviour is in line with international standards, Immigration Commissioner Pol Lt-General Wiboon Bangthamai said.

Wiboon said since there have been lots of reports of human trafficking in Thailand, the country has been experiencing trade blocs, adding that Japan and Laos were also on the Tier-2 Watch List.

While at the Labour Ministry, Ezeilo paid special attention to the smuggling of illegal aliens into Thailand, though she doubted if this could be considered human trafficking, the ministry's deputy permanent secretary Jeerasak Sukhontachart said.

He added that the ministry had demonstrated the actions it takes against human trafficking. Since Thailand does not support the smuggling of humans, it has tried to solve the problem by having illegal alien workers register with the ministry so they can enjoy the same wages and benefits as other Thai workers.

"If this group of alien workers had been trafficked, their employers would not have had them registered with us. Also, the authorities try to crackdown on illegal immigrants along the country's border and have them deported. Thailand also has measures preventing them from being abused," Jeerasak said, adding that these points had been made clear to Ezeilo.

Jeerasak said Ezeilo had also expressed concerns over the registration fees taken from alien workers, the immigrants working in the fishery business and urged the officials to inspect different work places.

The Special Rapporteur said she would look into all forms of human trafficking, including sexual and labour slavery. "We want the governments and non-governmental organisations to work together to address human trafficking. We need public-private partnerships," Ezeilo said. Her report on the subject would be presented to the United Nations next year.

Her mandate is to take action on violations committed against trafficked persons and in situations where their rights have not been protected. She visits countries to study the situation in situ and formulate recommendations to prevent and or combat trafficking and protect the rights of its victims.

Ezeilo, who is in Thailand until August 19, will be meeting relevant agencies, including victims in Tak, Chiang Mai, Samut Sakhon and Songkhla.

Her next visit will be to Australia in November.

Thailand Registers Migrants in Bid to Crack Down on Traffickers

BYLINE: Ron Corben

SECTION: VOA ENGLISH SERVICE

LENGTH: 645 words

This week is the final deadline for a migrant worker registration program in Thailand that logs foreign workers and the businesses that employ them.

The program is aimed at cracking down on human trafficking gangs that make a lucrative profit from foreign workers and employers who take advantage of them.

Nai is a 25-year-old Burmese man who came to Thailand six years ago to try to pay off debts from a failed shrimp business in southern Burma.

Like many other Burmese, he chose a criminal gang to help him find work. Such gangs traffic thousands of Burmese into jobs in factories, agriculture labor, domestic help or as sex workers.

Nai paid the agents to place him in a Thai factory. The agents loaned him about $300 for additional up-front costs, a loan that he says had to be repaid within months at two or three times the original value.

Nai says the factory conditions were very bad. There was the issue of repaying the "transport costs" at double the rate. The front man carried guns and, if he did not like what he saw, the workers were abused.

Nai escaped and is now one of over 300,000 Burmese working in the seafood industry in Samut Sakon province on the outskirts of Bangkok. Burmese language signs in the market are testament to the Burmese in the community.

Looming deadline

The Thai government says about one million migrant workers have registered with the government program since it began in June. The main registration deadline was in July, but officials extended the deadline for workers in the fishing industry until Saturday.

After the deadline passes, employers could be fined for hiring unregistered workers. And illegal workers could also face fines or jail.

A U.S. State Department report on trafficking in persons released this year classified Thailand in the second tier category of countries linked to human trafficking, alongside Afghanistan, Cambodia, China, Russia and Zambia.

The United Nations says some 2.5 million people from 127 countries are trafficked into more than 130 countries each year. The International Labor Organization estimates human trafficking is worth more than $30 billion a year to criminal gangs.

More cooperation needed

Joy Ezeilo, the U.N. special reporter on human trafficking, is visiting Thailand this week to assess efforts to deal with illegal migration and trafficked persons. She says that better international cooperation is required to combat trafficking, but the controversial nature of the issue can make that difficult.

"Some of these things are becoming very unfortunately highly politicized in many countries of the world and that is also creating tension and all kinds of xenophobic approaches to issues of migrants," Ezeilo says. "We should also know that migration contributes to development both in the receiving country and also the country where they come from, so we have to look at this in a broader perspective."

Ezeilo is meeting with government officials, non-government and migrant worker groups to discuss the migrant registration program and other issues.

Sompong Srakraew, director of the Labor Rights Promotion Network Foundation in Thailand, says although the Thai government has taken steps to reduce the hardships faced by illegal workers, it still falls short of goals set by non-government groups.

"Last two years, [the] Thai government has been concerned about child labor also and the ministry of labor has been working closely with the International Labor Organization for serving child labor," Sompong says. "But, at the same time, ministry of labor try to deny having the child labor [in factories]. But the situation and information is different [between] Thai government and NGO [non-governmental organization] like me."

Migrant labor groups are welcoming Ezeilo's visit but say the problem is regional and attention needs also to focus on the criminal gangs that oversee the regional trade.

UN rapporteur on human trafficking to visit Thailand

SECTION: OTHER COUNTRIESLENGTH: 272 words

United Nations Special Rapporteur on trafficking in persons Joy Ngozi Ezeilo will visit Thailand from Monday to August 19 to appraise the government's efforts to curb the illicit trade, DPA reported.

"During my mission, I wish to reach out to a wide range of stakeholders and trafficked persons themselves, so that their voices are heard and can be considered in the national laws, policies and measures related to trafficking in persons," Ezeilo said in a statement.

Thailand is a major hub for illegal trafficking in humans, mainly from neighbouring countries including Cambodia, Laos and Myanmar.

In June, the US State Department Trafficking in Persons Report blasted the government for failing to live up to its commitments in ending the illicit trade and placed Thailand on its Tier Two watch list, along with other countries such as Afghanistan and Zambia.

"Despite significant efforts, the government has not shown sufficient evidence of increasing efforts to address human trafficking over the previous year, particularly in the areas of prosecuting and convicting both sex and labour trafficking offenders," the report concluded.

Ezeilo, an independent expert mandated by the UN Human Rights Council to investigate trafficking issues, will be in Thailand at the invitation of the government.

"We are concerned about being on the Tier Two watchlist," said Foreign Ministry spokesman Thani Thongphaksi.

"We have made serious efforts to address the human trafficking problem and we feel that a lot of progress has been made," he said.

While in Thailand Ezeilo will visit Bangkok, Chiang Mai, Mae Sot, Samut Sakhon and Songkhla.

August 3, 2011 WednesdayPRESIDENT AQUINO'S SPEECH AT THE CEREMONIAL HANDOVER OF THE PETITION TO STOP CHILD TRAFFICKING, AUGUST 3, 2011*BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 1342 wordsDATELINE: MANILA

The following information was released by the Office of the President of the Philippines:

Speech

of

His Excellency Benigno S. Aquino III

President of the Philippines

At the ceremonial handover of the petition to stop the trafficking of children and young people

[Delivered at Heroes Hall, Malacaan Palace on August 3, 2011]

Good morning. Please sit down.

Secretary Leila de Lima; Secretary Dinky Soliman; Ms. Amihan Abueva; Dr. Michael Muoz; Ms. Joan A. Reid; Police Director General Raul Bacalzo; Congresswoman Bernadette Herrera-Dy; Mayor Arlene Arcillas; officials and staff of Body Shop and ECPAT Philippines; partner organizations of Body Shop and ECPAT Philippines children and youth representatives; fellow workers in government; honored guests, ladies and gentlemen:

It is becoming more common these days to come across startling accounts of human trafficking. We are hearing more accounts of girls at the age where they should be preparing for their JS proms-or even younger-who are made to pose for pornographic material. There have also been news accounts of highly organized prostitution rings operating in a number of our own provinces.

This is why I am here today to take a stand with all of you who have vowed for zero tolerance against sex trafficking-and, ultimately, against human trafficking. I was presented with more than 400,000 signatures earlier from a wide range of sectors-from law enforcement to politics, from the academe to our senior citizens-all expressing their desire to have a Philippines and a world without human trafficking. I thank all of you for this commitment. And I likewise thank The Body Shop for their continued and earnest acts of corporate social responsibility, as well as the End Child Prostitution, Child Pornography and the Trafficking of Children for Sexual Purposes International for their unending crusade against the exploitation of children.

Allow me to tell you today that the Philippines stands behind your advocacies. We are, and we will continue to fulfill the implementation of the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act to prevent human trafficking, and to provide protection and services to those who have already been victimized. Through our faithful implementation of the law, we have already convicted 32 human traffickers in the span of a year, and we have filed cases against many more after a number of raids and rescue operations.

The trafficking situation is getting a bit better here, and perhaps you do not even have to take my word for it. Our trusted allies, the United States, have also recognized this sea change in our efforts in addressing the problem of trafficking; they have moved us from their Tier 2 Watchlist into their Tier 2 list in their 2011 Trafficking-in-Persons report.

I will be the first to admit that this kind of progress is not enough. As long as our people can still be taken against their will to do work that they did not willfully choose, we will continue our fight against human trafficking. I assure all of you that we will not cease in our efforts-and that the Philippines will put in extra hours to make certain that we comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, so that we may rise to another tier.

But make no mistake about it: We are doing this not merely because we want to reap the benefits of an international designation. We are doing this primarily because human trafficking drowns the hopes of people all over the world. Child sex trafficking endangers the future of our children-it diminishes their capacity to dream. We are doing this because it is the right thing to do; we are doing this so that we can better ensure the safety and well-being of our children and youth. And today, our confidence in doing what we are doing has grown even more with the knowledge that more than 400,000 people also strongly believe that this is the right thing to do.

Our administration is faced with seemingly endless challenges from many different sectors, and to be honest, it does get to be very difficult. But each time I see the Filipino people commit themselves to getting this country back to its rightful place in the sun; each time I see our teachers, our students, our religious leaders, and our youth standing together under the banner of solidarity-I regain my optimism and my energy, and this job becomes, if not a little, sometimes a lot easier.

Each time I see the Filipino people fulfilling their own roles in making the Philippines a better place and in reaching what we collectively aspire for, I know that what this country can achieve may well be limitless. So let me say to all of you present here, and to all of you who have signed this petition: may your commitment to your cause never waver, and may your efforts, combined with the efforts of the government, of the private sector, and of the rest of the Filipino people, see us through to an extended period of daylight.

A before I end: I was talking to Ms. Abueva [President, ECPAT Philippines] earlier, we were discussing what was the situation in the country. Let me highlight a few things. Why are children, in particular, prone to being trafficked? And one has to look at the economic realities we face. We have, roughly, about 20 percent of our population living below the poverty line. So we are addressing that: the first priority, the first part of my platform deals with job generation, and we have been making significant inroads. The economy grew by 7.6 percent as measured by the GDP last year, and we expect that to be further improving. The 1.4 million jobs already generated: most of it came from the private sector already expressing confidence. The economy is there; it's improving. We have security forces numbering 250,000. That is exactly the same number we had in EDSA 25 years ago. We had 50 million in population then. We have 95 million now. The problems that are confronting us are really daunting.

Somebody would say, "why not increase the number of your security forces?" Leila for instance has 300 NBI agents that have to undertake everything from cybercrime, to trafficking, to illegal gambling, to kidnapping, carnapping, etc., etc., divided among our 16 regions-so that's roughly about 20 per region, or two per province.

So, one will ask, "why not hire more?" The problem is there are so many entitlement laws, especially with pensions, to so much so that in a few years time, perhaps two or three years time, our pensions are indexed to increases of the salaries of those who are in the active service. So the pension systems that should have provided for those who have retired are having difficulty meeting that objective because the target keeps on moving. Every time there's a salary increase-we are now on Salary Standardization Law 3-so, basically doubles the salary of all government employees. This is the third or fourth year of implementation. That in effect has an impact also on the pensions and retirement benefits that we have to pay.

So, what am I trying to say? I'm not passing the problems to you, but really, it does help us when we are together, stretching the resources of government. With your tireless advocacies, we will achieve more significant progress, especially in the field of human trafficking.

I beg for a little indulgence if we have made tremendous strides but we are very, very far from where we would want to be. So, I just want to emphasize, we have to improve the economy; make them less vulnerable. The economy provides us the resources to hire more personnel to go after all of these people who would seek to prey on the most vulnerable sectors. There should be no question, they are a priority. But they are a priority and we have so many priorities that we want to address in the remaining four years and 11 months of my term, and hopefully beyond that. But with your efforts and with our efforts also, we think we will be able to do a lot, lot better-not just for the remainder of this year, but I would be severely disappointed if we were not able to do so even more by next year.

Thank you. Good day.

More must be done to curb human trafficking; Singapore needs laws to support victims, harsh penalties for criminals

BYLINE: Radha Basu, Senior Correspondent

SECTION: PRIME NEWS

LENGTH: 1013 words

PROGRESS is being made on the issue of human trafficking in Singapore - where vulnerable people are forced or tricked into sex or servitude.

But more can be done to help Singapore police be more vigilant in investigating possible cases, and to raise penalties.

The issue is currently high on the Government's public communications radar. On at least five occasions over the past seven weeks, the Government has reiterated its seriousness in dealing with what it has termed an 'abhorrent international crime'. The latest was the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MFA) on Monday.

An inter-agency task force has been set up to spearhead the battle against human trafficking. This is a global criminal problem estimated to be worth US$30 billion (S$36.2 billion), and which the United Nations considers one of the fastest-growing criminal activities in the world.

Singapore is likely to overcome a decade-long reluctance to sign a UN treaty that seeks to prevent, suppress and punish human trafficking. It will join 150 others when it does sign the treaty.

These moves led Singapore to be removed recently from a 'watchlist' of countries that failed to provide evidence of increasing efforts to tackle human trafficking. It was upgraded into the category of countries deemed to have made 'significant efforts' to comply with minimum standards. These classifications are developed by the United States government in its annual report card on human trafficking in 180 countries.

Singapore has criticised or rebutted some of the claims in past years' reports. This year, it acknowledged the upgrade, but also pointed out 'inaccuracies and misunderstandings' in the American Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report.

Singapore denied that it did not do enough to reduce the demand for commercial sex. MFA also disputed the report's claim that there were no labour trafficking convictions here last year. There had, in fact, been eight, and the data was made available to the US State Department before the report was made public, MFA said.

The US authorities will have to explain its report. But the dispute over accuracy should not distract policymakers and activists from the very real scourge of human trafficking in Singapore.

To put it plainly, human trafficking is a very serious crime, and it is a problem in Singapore. While it is by no means rampant, it is probably more prevalent than official data shows, or the average sheltered Singapore resident realises.

While researching a series of articles on the issue in May, I spoke to seven women from neighbouring countries who claimed they had been trafficked to Singapore for sex. Their stories were familiar: They were lured from poor homes with the promise of respectable jobs here, but found to their horror on arrival that the jobs involved paid sex.

They spoke tearfully of being locked up during the day, denied sufficient food and forced to hand over all their earnings to their pimps. But only one case got the authorities' attention.

The rest went home without reporting the crime. With dashed dreams and empty pockets in an alien land, all they wanted to do was go home. Some had run away from their captors; others had been deported after police raids.

Kay, a young Indonesian, was rounded up in a raid early last year. During interrogation, she was asked if she had come here voluntarily. She said yes. But she told me later she had been tricked into the sex trade. The 'towkay' (businessman) who tricked her taught her to say she had come of her own free will. He threatened to harm her family back home if she disobeyed.

As she had told the police she was here voluntarily, she was sent back to her country as is the usual practice - and what might have been a case of human trafficking went unreported.

Anti-trafficking activists want the police to be more active with their investigations to prevent trafficking cases from remaining under the radar. Waiting for the victim to pluck up the courage to report the crime is not enough.

Assuming that foreign women who have been forced into sex work may be too terrified to report trafficking, the US police have adopted a checklist of 12 signs to look out for to identify such victims.

The law enforcement authorities here have also adapted their own version of the US checklist. Rather than merely ask potential victims whether they came here voluntarily, the women are now asked if they are holding their travel documents and, if not, who has them. Other questions: Were they recruited for one purpose and forced to engage in some other job? Do they have freedom of movement?

These are simple yet effective methods to suss out victims from among those picked up in raids.

Singapore should also expand and better publicise programmes to help victims get training and jobs if they remain here to pursue court cases. Now, many victims would rather just go home. The culprits not only go unpunished, but are free to ply their illegal trade with another group of victims.

Introducing laws that force traffickers to pay victims compensation, like in the US, is another way forward. This can deter traffickers, and persuade victims to report the crime.

Above all, it is imperative to raise penalties for this crime. Under the Women's Charter, the maximum prison term for trafficking a woman or a girl is five years. Under the Penal Code, the maximum jail sentence is 10 years for selling a minor for prostitution.

The few people convicted of sex trafficking in 2009 - the latest year for which sentencing details are available - tended to get less than two years in prison. In one case involving a teenage Thai sex trafficking victim, a Singaporean brothel owner was jailed for nine weeks and fined $20,000.

In the US, penalties for sex trafficking of minors ranges from 10 years in jail to life imprisonment.

Singapore has taken small but positive steps to combat human trafficking in recent years. What is needed next are clear laws to support the victims and harsher penalties to deter the criminals.

Detailed Response from the Singapore Interagency Task Force to the 2011 US TIP Report

LENGTH: 1971 words

Singapore, Aug. 2 -- Ministry Of Foreign Affairs Singapore issued the following news release:

1. The Singapore Inter-agency Taskforce on trafficking in persons (TIP) notes that as a result of the Singapore Government's efforts, Singapore was upgraded to Tier 2 from the Tier 2 Watchlist in the recent US Department of State's TIP Report 2011.

2. As Singapore grows as a hub for travel, tourism, and economic activity, we expect to become an increasingly attractive potential destination for human trafficking syndicates. We therefore recognise the need to continually step up efforts in increasing our vigilance and responsiveness towards this threat.

Anti-trafficking measures undertaken by the Taskforce

3. The Singapore Taskforce on TIP, co-chaired by the Ministry of Home Affairs (MHA) and the Ministry of Manpower (MOM), coordinates anti-trafficking initiatives and policy alignment between government agencies in Singapore. The Taskforce includes representatives from the Singapore Police Force (SPF), the Immigration & Checkpoints Authority (ICA), the Ministry of Community Development, Youth & Sports (MCYS), the Ministry of Health (MOH), the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MFA) and the Attorney-General's Chambers (AGC). The formation of the Taskforce underscores the seriousness with which the Government views trafficking and aims to improve efforts in tackling this abhorrent international crime.

4. To fight trafficking, Singapore adopts a holistic strategy (known as the "4 'P's") against trafficking. The 4 'P's are Prevention, Prosecution, Protection and Partnership. This strategy emphasises constructing safeguards against human trafficking, prosecuting perpetrators, protecting victims and cooperating with other governments and civil society to encourage reporting and information sharing.

5. Singapore takes a proactive approach towards trafficking. SPF actively gathers intelligence and develops leads on syndicates, with a view towards disrupting their activities and arresting the perpetrators. In fact, more than 40% of the trafficking cases which the SPF investigated in 2010 arose out of proactive enforcement efforts initiated by the SPF. Likewise, approximately 60% of MOM's inspections on foreign worker-related labour infringements arose from intelligence and proactive raids.

6. The Taskforce is currently drafting a National Plan of Action for Singapore to tackle both sex and labour trafficking. We are also studying the possibility of future accession to the UN TIP Protocol.

Inaccuracies and Misunderstandings in US TIP report

7. While the 2011 TIP Report has acknowledged the progress made by Singapore in this area and has highlighted some areas for improvement, the Singapore Inter-agency Taskforce on TIP notes several inaccuracies and misrepresentations in the Report which we would like to clarify.

Efforts to reduce demand for commercial sex acts

8. The Report said that the Singapore Government did not make proactive efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts in Singapore's commercial sex industry. We would like to state that Singapore has criminalised various commercial sex activities and the SPF conducts proactive enforcement for the purpose of reducing demand for commercial sexual services. In 2010, SPF conducted 3,608 anti-commercial sex operations which led to the arrest of 94 commercial sex agents or "pimps". Such cases are publicised in the media to raise awareness and to deter others from engaging in such activities.

Allegation on reported delaying of publication

9. The Report suggested that authorities delayed the publication of independent research conducted on sex trafficking. The Government takes this unsubstantiated allegation very seriously. So far, the Task Force is aware of only of the report by ECPAT International on "Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children and Young People in Singapore". The Task Force wishes to put on record that the allegation that "authorities" delayed its publication is wholly inaccurate. During the Government's interaction with the Singapore National Committee for UN Women (formally known as UNIFEM), which was initiated by the Committee to seek our comments on the Report, the Government did not suggest a publication date nor attempt to delay the Report's release. The Committee decided the release date of the Report based on its own internal considerations and circumstances. This was not influenced by "authorities". The Government requests the State Department to substantiate its claim.

Labour trafficking prosecutions

10. The Report erroneously stated that "the government did not prosecute or convict any offenders of labor trafficking during the reporting period." On top of the five sex trafficking convictions, there were another eight labour trafficking convictions, mainly related to shell companies and the persistent withholding of passports by employment agents. The Court fined the employment agencies between S$1,200 and S$2,000, depending on the facts of each case. We regret that this information, which had been made available to the State Department prior to the publication of the Report, was not reflected.

Criminal prosecutions for withholding of passports

11. While the Report claimed that in 2010 there were "no criminal prosecutions or convictions of employers or employment agencies who withheld passports of foreign workers, MOM had in fact revoked the licenses of three employment agencies, forfeited their security deposits, and prosecuted them in court for withholding workers' passports. These cases were also highlighted to the US this year. We regret that this information, which had been made available to the State Department prior to the publication of the Report, was not reflected.

Allegations of Forced Labour on board Fishing Vessels

12. The Report suggested that the fishing vessels involved in human trafficking 'originated' from Singapore and that the Government had refused to take action on reported forced labour on shipping vessels. We would like the State Department to clarify these 'reports' and to suggest how this issue could be addressed by Singapore, given the jurisdictional issues highlighted below.

13. We have not found any evidence of forced labour being committed on Singapore-flagged ships, by Singapore employers, or within Singapore waters. The information received seems to suggest allegations of forced labour committed by employers who operated outside our jurisdiction. Even though the Government did not have the jurisdiction or powers to deal with such cases, it continued to provide assistance by forwarding all the facts of the cases and details of the agents who recruited the fishermen, to the embassies of the relevant flag states and source countries for their follow-up.

In addition, the Singapore Organisation of Seamen and the Singapore Maritime Officers' Union provided assistance in recovering the outstanding salaries of these fishermen and arranged for their return home. The Task Force will continue to engage the relevant embassies, and source country enforcement agencies, to make progress on this issue.

14. The Taskforce investigated the few Singapore-based companies involved and found that they had performed the role of administrators providing logistical and HR support for the foreign employers who had recruited the foreign fishermen in their home countries. The Singapore-based companies did not perform placement activities. The terms and conditions of employment were also discussed and agreed upon between the foreign companies and the foreign workers before they came to Singapore.

Action taken against repatriation companies

15. The Report suggested that Singapore did not pursue any criminal investigations or prosecutions for potential trafficking in cases of wrongful confinement by repatriation companies, and that no cases were referred to the SPF. This is untrue.

16. Singapore does not tolerate the wrongful confinement of workers or their forceful repatriation without settling of salaries and other legitimate claims. When such claims are brought to the attention of the Taskforce, we investigate both the repatriation companies and the employers who engage them. MOM and SPF jointly investigated two such cases in 2010.

17. Under the Employment of Foreign Manpower (Work Passes) Regulations, employers must give their foreign employees reasonable notice of their repatriation. The employer must also bear the full cost of repatriation and shall ensure that all outstanding salaries or monies due to the foreign employee have been paid before the foreign employee's repatriation. Foreign workers who complain of abuse or salary arrears to ICA officers at Singapore check-points are directed to MOM for assistance. The Government will investigate all such claims and take appropriate action against the employers responsible.

18. In 2010, an employee from a repatriation company was prosecuted and sent to jail for voluntarily causing hurt to a foreign worker. The employers who had engaged the repatriation companies were also given stern warnings for the abetment of wrongful restraint.

Medical and other services provided to trafficking victims

19. The Report suggested that there were "no known victims" of trafficking being afforded the opportunity to avail themselves of medical and other services at the shelter in 2010.

20. This statement is inaccurate. Prior to the publication of the Report, we had provided at the State Department's request detailed written information on the various services - including medical, counselling and translation - that trafficking victims had utilised last year. In 2010, 7 victims were assisted by the shelters for medical services. We regret that this information, which had been made available to the State Department prior to the publication of the Report, was not reflected.

Restriction of movement in government shelters

21. The Report indicated that "victims residing in government shelters sometimes have their movements restricted while assisting authorities with investigation and prosecution of their traffickers".

22. We wish to clarify that all victims residing in Government shelters are allowed to move freely in and out of the shelters, except where the individual concerned faces physical threats or where there are serious concerns with witness tampering. Victims are only required to sign in/out when they enter or leave the shelters, provide contact details and inform shelter staff if they intend to stay out late. These measures are not intended to prevent a victim from leaving the shelter premises but are meant to ensure the victims' safety.

Application of Sec 140 Women's Charter

23. The Report misinterprets Section 140 of the Women's Charter to suggest that it is not applicable to non-physical forms of coercion. The provision can cover a wide variety of situations where a woman is detained against her will, including where there is no threat of physical injury, depending on the facts of the case.

Conclusion

24. Singapore takes a serious view of TIP and its related crimes. We are constantly reviewing our laws, policies and enforcement practices to better address this issue. We have taken steps to ensure closer coordination between Government agencies through the setting up of this Taskforce and the development of the National Plan of Action. We are actively engaging NGOs, as well as the foreign embassies in Singapore, and are looking forward to closer partnerships to improve upstream victim identification and protection, as well as successful enforcement against syndicates.

25. As we progress in our anti-trafficking efforts, Singapore calls on the US to improve the credibility of the State Department's annual Report by ensuring greater accuracy of facts and by making the Report's methodology more objective.

S'pore refutes human trafficking report

SECTION: SINGAPORELENGTH: 497 words

THE Singapore Inter-agency Taskforce on trafficking in persons has released a detailed response to a recent United States report on human trafficking.

The five-page response - which reiterates and points out new 'inaccuracies and misrepresentations' in the US State Department's latest annual report on human trafficking, released in June - was sent to the US yesterday.

The report claims, among other things, that forced labour on fishing vessels has been found to have originated from Singapore, and that no trafficking victims were offered medical and other services at shelters in the past year.

The report also stated that Singapore has not made proactive efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts.

The taskforce, which includes representatives from the Singapore Police Force and the Immigration and Checkpoints Authority and is co-chaired by the Ministry of Home Affairs and Ministry of Manpower (MOM), has refuted the claims.

In its response, the taskforce said that the US report's claim that the Government did not make proactive efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts here was not true.

Pointing out that Singapore has criminalised various commercial sex activities, the taskforce said that it conducted 3,608 anti-commercial sex operations last year that led to the arrests of 94 commercial sex agents or pimps.

Also inaccurate were claims that there were 'no criminal prosecutions or convictions of employers or employment agencies which withheld passports of foreign workers' last year.

The taskforce said that MOM had revoked the licences of three employment agencies, forfeited their security deposits, and prosecuted them in court for withholding workers' passports.

Also 'unsubstantiated' was the suggestion that the authorities delayed the publication of independent research conducted on sex trafficking, said the taskforce.

It called on the US State Department, which produces the report, to substantiate the claim.

Reiterating the Republic's serious view on human trafficking, the taskforce called on the US to improve the credibility of its report.

The report is a tool that the US government uses to engage other countries in dialogue to advance anti-trafficking reforms. It also places each country into one of three tiers based on the extent of its government's efforts to comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking.

The report put Singapore on a human-trafficking watch list last year, but has since moved it out of the watch list and up to Tier 2. Tier 1 is the highest ranking and includes countries such as Australia and Finland. Countries such as Algeria and Papua New Guinea have been grouped in Tier 3.

Yesterday's response was the taskforce's second since the report was released.

Last month, it also clarified the inaccuracies with US Ambassador-at-Large for human trafficking matters, Mr Luis CdeBaca, who was in Singapore to attend a related conference.

8. The Report said that the Singapore Government did not make proactive efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts in Singapore's commercial sex industry. We would like to state that Singapore has criminalised various commercial sex activities and the SPF conducts proactive enforcement for the purpose of reducing demand for commercial sexual services. In 2010, SPF conducted 3,608 anti-commercial sex operations which led to the arrest of 94 commercial sex agents or "pimps". Such cases are publicised in the media to raise awareness and to deter others from engaging in such activities.

Allegation on reported delaying of publication

9. The Report suggested that authorities delayed the publication of independent research conducted on sex trafficking. The Government takes this unsubstantiated allegation very seriously. So far, the Task Force is aware of only of the report by ECPAT International on "Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children and Young People in Singapore". The Task Force wishes to put on record that the allegation that "authorities" delayed its publication is wholly inaccurate. During the Government's interaction with the Singapore National Committee for UN Women (formally known as UNIFEM), which was initiated by the Committee to seek our comments on the Report, the Government did not suggest a publication date nor attempt to delay the Report's release. The Committee decided the release date of the Report based on its own internal considerations and circumstances. This was not influenced by "authorities". The Government requests the State Department to substantiate its claim.

Labour trafficking prosecutions

10. The Report erroneously stated that "the government did not prosecute or convict any offenders of labor trafficking during the reporting period." On top of the five sex trafficking convictions, there were another eight labour trafficking convictions, mainly related to shell companies and the persistent withholding of passports by employment agents. The Court fined the employment agencies between S$1,200 and S$2,000, depending on the facts of each case. We regret that this information, which had been made available to the State Department prior to the publication of the Report, was not reflected.

Criminal prosecutions for withholding of passports

11. While the Report claimed that in 2010 there were "no criminal prosecutions or convictions of employers or employment agencies who withheld passports of foreign workers, MOM had in fact revoked the licenses of three employment agencies, forfeited their security deposits, and prosecuted them in court for withholding workers' passports. These cases were also highlighted to the US this year. We regret that this information, which had been made available to the State Department prior to the publication of the Report, was not reflected.

Allegations of Forced Labour on board Fishing Vessels

12. The Report suggested that the fishing vessels involved in human trafficking 'originated' from Singapore and that the Government had refused to take action on reported forced labour on shipping vessels. We would like the State Department to clarify these 'reports' and to suggest how this issue could be addressed by Singapore, given the jurisdictional issues highlighted below.

13. We have not found any evidence of forced labour being committed on Singapore-flagged ships, by Singapore employers, or within Singapore waters. The information received seems to suggest allegations of forced labour committed by employers who operated outside our jurisdiction. Even though the Government did not have the jurisdiction or powers to deal with such cases, it continued to provide assistance by forwarding all the facts of the cases and details of the agents who recruited the fishermen, to the embassies of the relevant flag states and source countries for their follow-up.

In addition, the Singapore Organisation of Seamen and the Singapore Maritime Officers' Union provided assistance in recovering the outstanding salaries of these fishermen and arranged for their return home. The Task Force will continue to engage the relevant embassies, and source country enforcement agencies, to make progress on this issue.

14. The Taskforce investigated the few Singapore-based companies involved and found that they had performed the role of administrators providing logistical and HR support for the foreign employers who had recruited the foreign fishermen in their home countries. The Singapore-based companies did not perform placement activities. The terms and conditions of employment were also discussed and agreed upon between the foreign companies and the foreign workers before they came to Singapore.

15. The Report suggested that Singapore did not pursue any criminal investigations or prosecutions for potential trafficking in cases of wrongful confinement by repatriation companies, and that no cases were referred to the SPF. This is untrue.

16. Singapore does not tolerate the wrongful confinement of workers or their forceful repatriation without settling of salaries and other legitimate claims. When such claims are brought to the attention of the Taskforce, we investigate both the repatriation companies and the employers who engage them. MOM and SPF jointly investigated two such cases in 2010.

17. Under the Employment of Foreign Manpower (Work Passes) Regulations, employers must give their foreign employees reasonable notice of their repatriation. The employer must also bear the full cost of repatriation and shall ensure that all outstanding salaries or monies due to the foreign employee have been paid before the foreign employee's repatriation. Foreign workers who complain of abuse or salary arrears to ICA officers at Singapore check-points are directed to MOM for assistance. The Government will investigate all such claims and take appropriate action against the employers responsible.

18. In 2010, an employee from a repatriation company was prosecuted and sent to jail for voluntarily causing hurt to a foreign worker. The employers who had engaged the repatriation companies were also given stern warnings for the abetment of wrongful restraint.

Medical and other services provided to trafficking victims

19. The Report suggested that there were "no known victims" of trafficking being afforded the opportunity to avail themselves of medical and other services at the shelter in 2010.

20. This statement is inaccurate. Prior to the publication of the Report, we had provided at the State Department's request detailed written information on the various services - including medical, counselling and translation - that trafficking victims had utilised last year. In 2010, 7 victims were assisted by the shelters for medical services. We regret that this information, which had been made available to the State Department prior to the publication of the Report, was not reflected.

Restriction of movement in government shelters

21. The Report indicated that "victims residing in government shelters sometimes have their movements restricted while assisting authorities with investigation and prosecution of their traffickers".

22. We wish to clarify that all victims residing in Government shelters are allowed to move freely in and out of the shelters, except where the individual concerned faces physical threats or where there are serious concerns with witness tampering. Victims are only required to sign in/out when they enter or leave the shelters, provide contact details and inform shelter staff if they intend to stay out late. These measures are not intended to prevent a victim from leaving the shelter premises but are meant to ensure the victims' safety.

Application of Sec 140 Women's Charter

23. The Report misinterprets Section 140 of the Women's Charter to suggest that it is not applicable to non-physical forms of coercion. The provision can cover a wide variety of situations where a woman is detained against her will, including where there is no threat of physical injury, depending on the facts of the case.

Conclusion

24. Singapore takes a serious view of TIP and its related crimes. We are constantly reviewing our laws, policies and enforcement practices to better address this issue. We have taken steps to ensure closer coordination between Government agencies through the setting up of this Taskforce and the development of the National Plan of Action. We are actively engaging NGOs, as well as the foreign embassies in Singapore, and are looking forward to closer partnerships to improve upstream victim identification and protection, as well as successful enforcement against syndicates.

25. As we progress in our anti-trafficking efforts, Singapore calls on the US to improve the credibility of the State Department's annual Report by ensuring greater accuracy of facts and by making the Report's methodology more objective.

Brave activists battle to free girls born into India's brothels

BYLINE: Marc And Craig Kielburger, Edmonton Journal

SECTION: IDEAS; Marc And Craig Kielburger; Pg. A15

LENGTH: 714 words

When Naina and Jyothi were born in the small community of Nat in India's Bihar province, it seemed their lives would follow the same path, the one traversed by their mothers, aunts, grandmothers and every woman they'd known. They were born in a brothel, into a system of intergenerational prostitution which, along with sex trafficking, enslaves more than one million women in India.

As a child, Naina was repeatedly sold, beaten and raped, submersed in a world of sexual abuse and drug addiction. She had little contact with anyone outside of the sex trade.

Jyothi avoided this fate.

Apne Aap, a New Delhi-based NGO that combats sex trafficking, found Jyothi when she was still a child and took her to a "safe space" - in Bihar, it's a girl's hostel, in other communities it might be a mud hut or community classroom - where women are free from bondage to heal, build relationships and receive livelihood training.

It's a cruel and reckless lottery that would save Jyothi and enslave Naina. When police conduct raids in India's seedy red-light districts, some girls are rescued; others are moved, or hidden in the brothel's labyrinthine corridors when the manager, or "madam," is tipped off by officers seeking bribes. Those rescued are sometimes lured back by the guardians, manipulative or forceful brothel owners who come to reclaim their property.

Ruchira Gupta, president of Apne Aap and a fearless activist we intensely admire, told us about her harrowing battle - waged since she founded the organization in 2002 - to free girls from prostitution, and the death threats she's received from brothel owners upset by lost business.

"It's just hell. It's just hell on earth," she told us.

For 10 years, Naina endured this hell. Not even her own mother could help her. There's a Hindi word for prostitutes that have aged past their worth, adhiya. It means "half person," Gupta tells us. Unless a daughter is supplied as a replacement, they're left in the streets - broke and often disease ridden - to die. The cycle becomes a sickening sort of family business.

When Naina's mother finally escaped, she went back for then-15-year-old Naina, and with the help of Bihar's safe spaces program they left the brothel. They broke the cycle.

But we know that many other girls are still trapped in India's sex trade; we've spoken to them in our travels. To look into the eyes of a beautiful, pregnant teen girl and hear her say matter-of-factly that her unborn child has already been sold into prostitution is gut-wrenching to the very core. She was 16 years old with a down payment on her womb. This is a modern-day slave trade.

When the U.S. State Department released its Trafficking in Persons report last month, an annual ranking of anti-trafficking measures by country, it took India off the Tier 2 watch list for the first time since 2004, in part for its ratification this past May of the UN Trafficking Protocol, which will oblige the country to expand its laws. But the report also found that "pervasive corruption" impedes progress.

India's sex trafficking industry is a sophisticated machine. Agents, pimps and crooked border guards will "wink, wink, nod nod" girls across borders, Gupta explains. It's a ritual so pervasive and refined that once captured, girls don't bother running away.

"There's nowhere to run to."

That's why safe spaces are vital. Apne Aap now reaches over 10,000 girls in India's red light districts with legal advice, access to education and mentorships, someone to tell them for the first time in their lives that they don't exist for someone else's pleasure.

Pamela Shifman, director of initiatives for women and girls at the NoVo Foundation, told us the physical location doesn't matter as much as the sense of hope that fills the space, or, "who girls are allowed to be and what they're allowed to feel." Jyothi and Naina dance and laugh and practise karate. It's not just a building that provides refuge from violence; it's a safe space for the whole person.

Now 20, Naina has learned to read and write Hindi and is practising her English. She has dreams for her future now; she wants to be a filmmaker, get married and have children of her own.

For the first time, free from the violence and exploitation she grew up with, Naina has a real chance to achieve that dream.

Modern day sex-slave trade still exists in India; A New-Delhi-based organization is offering safe havens for girls who would otherwise have nowhere to turn

Safe spaces can help break the sex-trade cycle in India

UN Signs Development Accord with Algeria

BYLINE: Jamie Ingram

SECTION: In Brief

LENGTH: 303 words

A framework plan for strategic cooperation was signed on Wednesday (20 July) in the Algerian capital Algiers, between the United Nations and Algeria. The Algerian daily L'expression reported on Wednesday that the agreement covers matters "relating to governance and human rights, economic and social development, human development, sustainable development, environment and humanitarian issues". The agreement covers the period from 2012-2014 and is aimed to complement Algeria's five year economic and social development plan for the period 2010-2014. The five year plan aims to invest USD286 billion into improving infrastructure and diversifying the oil-dependent economy (see Algeria: 25 May 2010). Topics from the five year plan deemed to be of priority status were included in Wednesday's framework as well as those aligned with Millennium Development Goals. The addition of UN technical knowledge is intended to grant added-value to projects undertaken under the five year plan.

Significance: The co-operation framework will take over from the previous United Nations Framework Plan for Development Cooperation (UNDAF) which covered the period 2007-2011. UNDAF focused primarily on human development, environment and sustainable development, governance and gender. Wednesday's cooperation framework is likely to build upon the relations developed by UNDAF with national and local institutions, as highlighted by its emphasis upon complementing Algeria's five year plan. Despite genuine improvements in recent years, Algeria still faces criticism regarding the human rights situation in the country; the US demoted Algeria to tier three status in June in the 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report (see Algeria: 30 June 2011). It is hoped that the latest framework agreement will successfully address some of these issues.

Anti-trafficking drive boosted

SECTION: Pg. S1/11

LENGTH: 227 words

THE GOVERNMENT will set stringent penalties on officials involved in human trafficking under a stepped-up drive against the criminal activity.

In a statement, Justice Jose Vicente B. Salazar, concurrent Inter- Agency Council Against Trafficking in Persons (IACAT) head, said officials found to be involved in human trafficking will be sacked from their employment, taken to court and jailed for jeopardizing the lives of our countrymen who most oftentimes get abused on foreign shores either ending up as drug mules or prostitutes.

In a separate interview, Assistant City Prosecutor Raymond Jonathan B. Lledo, a member of the IACAT, said consultations are being conducted with the Bureau of Immigration, airport police, Bureau of Customs and Philippine Overseas Employment Agency on the campaign.

The scheme, Mr. Lledo said, will detail "special agents and prosecutors in the airports."

Renewed efforts, however, have been questioned by a worker watchdog.

In a statement yesterday, Gina S. Esguerra of Migrante International said in Filipino: "Even if there is a machinery to fight human trafficking, its impact could hardly be felt and the number of victims continue to rise."

The Philippines has been taken out of the trafficking in persons watch list of the US State Department, ensuring continued non-humanitarian, non- trade related assistance to the Philippines.

We must get out of watch listBYLINE: K.T. MaranSECTION: Pg. 19LENGTH: 253 words

I HAVE a friend who is working in Mongolia. He is a consultant to a non-governmental organisation and he also recruits Mongolians for colleges and universities in Malaysia.

He has done the student recruitment successfully for several years.

A few days ago, he came home and I met up with him. He told me that he was supposed to enrol 200 students here. However, because Malaysia was listed on the United States' watch list on human trafficking, the parents backed out.

I was shocked. I wonder how many millions in foreign exchange earnings we have lost or will lose because we have been placed on this watch list?

Though we may disagree with these ratings, the fact is that investors who bring direct foreign investment, and in this case, parents, pay serious attention to such reports and ratings.

We should, therefore, not be dismissive of such negative ratings. They reflect what is happening on the ground, even if we are loathe to admit it.

Malaysians need to be mindful of human trafficking, which is a crime. We should not allow such crimes to take place here.

It is a reflection on our law enforcement agencies, such as the police and Immigration. It suggests they have lost control over such matters.

The biometric system now in force must be connected to the police and Immigration database to check fingerprints belonging to criminals and others with bad records. They must be denied entry or from being active here.

These agencies must work to improve our standing on the list.

Handling criticism

LENGTH: 603 words

DATELINE: Sri Lanka

Sri Lanka, July 17 -- Q: Several human rights organisations are very critical of Sri Lanka. As ambassador, how do you handle that criticism?

A: I have told them that there cannot be two kinds of human rights. I have told them that what Sri Lanka has is practical human rights and not theories on Human Rights as the West does!! I believe that you can't have different kinds of human rights.

What has happened in Sri Lanka with the end of the conflict is the restoration of human rights to all Sri Lankans on a massive scale. First, a primary human right is to live without fear. Those in the North who lived among the LTTE remained in constant fear for years. Violence there was rampant and arbitrary. That is now gone. I have told them.

Other Sri Lankans faced fear everyday, when they sent their children to school or everytime they climbed on to a bus. All of us have a relative or friend who suffered through a terrorist attack. But the human right of freedom from fear and free movement and the freedom to pursue prosperity has been restored.

In fact, there has not been a single death due to terrorism since May 2009. I have also told them that what the Government did at the end of the conflict was establish human rights for 300,000 people who were held hostage by the LTTE.

It freed them, housed and fed them, and then helped them return home. It did this in a year's time - the average stay for a refugee in a refugee camp worldwide is 17 years, according to the Women's Refugee Commission in New York.

Not only that, the Government also rehabilitated about 1,000 LTTE child soldiers and returned them to their families and schools, and it has given more than 11,000 hardcore LTTE terrorists amnesty, jobs, education and training. About 6,000 have been returned to civil society and more are returning each month. There has been large-scale re-development of war-torn areas, and de-mining continues with strong international support.

Q: Finally, the US State Department a few weeks ago changed Sri Lanka's status in its annual trafficking in persons report. What was that change and is it good or bad for Sri Lanka?

A: It is a very good thing - our ranking has improved. We have been working for several years to improve Sri Lanka's status in this report.

Each year the US State Department ranks more than 180 countries on their enforcement of international and domestic human trafficking laws to prevent slavery, prostitution, child labour and so forth. There are four rankings: Tier I, Tier II, Tier II Watch list and Tier III.

For several years Sri Lanka has been ranked at "Tier II Watch list." That means that while the State Department believes that we are aware of human trafficking laws, we are not strictly enforcing them. If you stay on their Watch List too long they drop you to a Tier III ranking - the worst.

We worked hard in Washington this year to make the State Department aware of our prosecution record and other initiatives that the Government has taken to protect people, especially those who work abroad, such as establishing shelters in countries where many Sri Lankans are working.

And of course our Defence Ministry has done a lot of work on this issue, enforcing new regulations and measures to protect Sri Lankans.

So this year our status was elevated off the watch list to Tier II. I would say that the bulk of the countries in the report are Tier II, including Japan and Switzerland. ASEAN convention on human trafficking sought

BYLINE: Nathaniel R. Melican

SECTION: Pg. S1/11

LENGTH: 577 words

THE PHILIPPINES is leading in efforts to establish a convention on human trafficking among the members of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN), an official said yesterday.

Vice-President Jejomar C. Binay said that a regional body tackling human trafficking will especially benefit Filipinos who fall prey to human trafficking syndicates by providing protection and safeguarding their rights in ASEAN.

"[A regional convention] should result in more protection for our overseas Filipino workers and tighter implementation of anti-trafficking laws in the region," Mr. Binay said on the sidelines of the Expert's Meeting to Study the Feasibility of Developing an ASEAN Convention on Trafficking in Persons in Makati yesterday.

He expressed hope that the meeting will result in the convening of a convention at the soonest possible time.

Mr. Binay said other ASEAN members could learn from the Philippine approach to combat human trafficking as led by the Inter-Agency Council Against Trafficking (IACAT), with representatives from law enforcement agencies and the Department of Social Welfare, among others.

The focus on increasing prosecution, protection and prevention of human trafficking, he said, helped in the upgrade of the country from Tier 2 watch list of the United States State Department Trafficking in Persons Report 2011, preventing the loss of some $700 million worth of non-humanitarian and non-trade related aid from the US.

"The Philippine experience of a unified multisectoral approach is something we can share with our Southeast Asian friends, as all of our nations are committed to more stronger regional solutions to this evil that haunts us," Mr. Binay said in his speech at the gathering.

Also, Mr. Binay said the Philippines continues to improve its capacity in prosecution, protection and prevention of human trafficking by increasing the number of anti-human trafficking monitoring teams in entry and exit points in the country, strengthening anti-trafficking legislation and speeding up prosecution for trafficking cases.

"With all these initiatives in play, Tier 1 classification [fully compliant with anti-trafficking standards] is more than possible. Indeed, it is only a question of time," he said.

In May, ASEAN leaders signed a joint statement in Jakarta, Indonesia wherein they vowed to strengthen regional and international cooperation to prevent and combat human trafficking, enhance capacity-building to address human trafficking, and to consider immediately the establishment of an ASEAN Convention on Trafficking in Persons.

Assistant City Prosecutor Raymond Jonathan B. Lledo, chief of the IACAT, said that the two-day meeting of experts from ASEAN member states aims to convince participants of the need for a regional anti-trafficking body.

"Typical destination countries, like Malaysia, Singapore and Brunei Darussalam, are not very much keen on human trafficking as the problem does not originate with them," he said.

The Philippines, which is taking the lead in the ASEAN for pushing for the establishment of the body, is joined by other source countries of human trafficking such as Indonesia and Vietnam to provide more protection for victims of human trafficking.

"Hopefully when the meeting ends [today] we can convince other countries of the need for this convention," Mr. Lledo added.

ASEAN groups Brunei Darrusalam, Cambodia, Indonesia, Lao PDR, Malaysia, Myanmar the Philippines, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam.

S'pore reaffirms commitment to fight human trafficking

BYLINE: Tham Yuen-C

SECTION: SINGAPORE

LENGTH: 322 words

SINGAPORE yesterday reiterated its commitment to fight human trafficking during a meeting with a visiting official from the United States.

The Singapore Inter-agency Taskforce on trafficking in persons also took the opportunity to clarify 'factual inaccuracies' in a recent US report on human trafficking.

The taskforce met the US Ambassador-at-Large for human trafficking matters, Mr Luis CdeBaca, who was here to attend the Asia Regional Trafficking in Persons Project conference.

The taskforce, co-chaired by the Ministry of Home Affairs and Ministry of Manpower, coordinates anti-trafficking initiatives between government agencies here.

Last month, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs had said it was dismayed that the section of the report on Singapore was 'riddled with inaccuracies'.

In a statement yesterday, the taskforce highlighted certain segments of the US report, which alleged that the Singapore 'government did not prosecute or convict any offenders of labour trafficking during the reporting period'.

In fact, Singapore had prosecuted eight labour trafficking cases, it said.

The taskforce also said that three employment agencies had been taken to task - fined between $1,200 and $2,000 - last year for withholding workers' passports.

This was contrary to what the report had alleged, that there were 'no criminal prosecutions or convictions of employers or employment agencies who withheld passports of foreign workers'.

Yesterday, both sides discussed further areas for collaboration, including joint training between Singapore's law enforcement agencies and the Immigration and Customs Enforcement of the US Department of Homeland Security next month.

Last year, the US report on human trafficking put Singapore on a human-trafficking watch list. But this year, it moved Singapore out of the Tier 2 Watch List and up to Tier 2, acknowledging the country's 'significant efforts' to combat human trafficking.

St Vincent's UN envoy condemns human trafficking listing

BYLINE: Kenton X. Chance, Caribbean News Now, Grand Cayman, Cayman Islands

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 1174 words

July 12--NEW YORK -- Vincentian ambassador to the United Nations, Camillo Gonsalves, has said that the United States' human trafficking report, which puts St Vincent and the Grenadines (SVG) at risk of US sanctions, "is born of a flawed and inaccurate premise, namely that all states in the world are havens of trafficking in persons".

Gonsalves this week joined his colleagues in Washington in objecting to the United States' placing SVG on a Tier 2 human trafficking watch list for a third consecutive year.

La Celia Prince, SVG's ambassador to the United States, said last week that Vincentian diplomats in Washington are "very disappointed" by the report -- prepared by the State Department.

Gonsalves said on Monday that, because the report is born of a flawed and inaccurate premise, "the drafters ... cannot allow for the possibility that any individual country is free from or minimally affected by human trafficking".

The flawed premise, he said, is embodied in the "findings" of the US Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) of 2000.

The congressional findings say that trafficking is worldwide and rampant; that existing laws are insufficient to combat it; and that failures to halt trafficking are often based on governmental indifference, collusion or corruption.

Obvious flaws

"The flaws in this premise are obvious. If you start from the assumption that human trafficking exists, then an absence of prosecutions for trafficking is viewed as a failure to tackle the assumed problem, even if no such problem actually exists in SVG," Gonsalves said.

He said SVG has neither sex tourism nor a pornography industry, no brothels -- official or unofficial, strip clubs, gentlemen's clubs or any such establishments.

Gonsalves further noted that SVG is not an industrialized nation and does not have the problems associated with migrant factory workers or child labourers.

"We lack an international airport, and therefore pose difficulties as an access point or transit point for traffickers. SVG, in short, does not fit the blanket assumption of the United States Congress, which is grappling with all of those issues on their own soil."

He said it was "simply unfair and illogical" to cast SVG in a negative light because of "a flawed assumption that trafficking exists everywhere".

Gonsalves quoted this year's TIPR report on SVG, which says that the "government reported no forced labour or forced prostitution investigations, prosecutions, or convictions during the reporting period.

"They fail to allow for the possibility that no one was prosecuted for forced prostitution simply because no one was forced into prostitution in SVG," Gonsalves said.

He further said that the report "cannot point to a single instance of trafficking in SVG, or even an NGO allegation of trafficking.

"Instead, the report says that SVG is a 'likely' source, transit and destination country; and that a population of 'high risk for trafficking exists.' These conjectures, without evidence or proof, should not be sufficient to place SVG in its current tier in the Report," Gonsalves said.

Promised cash not given

Gonsalves pointed to Section 109 of the United States' Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000.

The section supposedly provides funding to countries like SVG for drafting of laws, investigation and prosecution of offenders, the creation and maintenance of facilities, programmes, or projects for victim protection, and the expansion of exchange programmes.

"I would be curious to know the extent to which such funding has been extended to SVG," Gonsalves said.

He noted that the TIPR gives short shrift to the tremendous efforts by the government of SVG to improve its standing in the report despite Kingstown's ongoing misgivings as to its utility and accuracy.

"The fact of the matter is that the government has done a great deal, at considerable expense, to rectify the USA's perceived concerns. It is gravely disappointing that those efforts have not been adequately acknowledged or reflected in this year's report," he said.

Gonsalves further said that a separate US document notes that Kingstown is "devoting significant resources" to implementing an action plan that "would constitute making a significant efforts to bring the country into compliance" with US standards.

In addition, the TIPR notes that SVG participated in Organisation of American States "human trafficking awareness training" and that the government "made some efforts to prevent trafficking and to increase the public's awareness of human trafficking" in SVG.

"However, these awareness efforts have not affected our tier placement," Gonsalves said.

"Indeed, the TIPR itself says that public awareness campaigns will not improve a country's ranking. This is unfortunate, since national public awareness campaigns have made demonstrable impact on a number of social issues in our small society," he added.

Adequate laws

Gonsalves said that the Vincentian government has felt that the country has an adequate body of laws to deal with illegal immigration, illegal labour practices, sexual exploitation of minors, prostitution, and other aspects of human trafficking.

He added that the effectiveness of these laws is not diminished because they are not specifically tailored to human trafficking.

"However, because of the aforementioned Congressional assumption that any pre-existing laws in any country are insufficient, SVG has embarked on the drafting of specialized laws in this area. This, of course, could be perceived as a coercive measure by another country's legislature to prioritize the drafting of laws that may not be necessary or applicable in our local context," Gonsalves said.

'Divisive political tool'

"We look forward to being moved to higher tier in the next year's report, but we continue to seek meaningful dialogue with the USA on this issue, their methodology and sources of information," he said.

"Also, we believe that the USA should re-evaluate the manner in which it issues its report. This report should be a rallying point in the global fight against Human Trafficking, instead of a divisive political tool that sparks more questions than collaborations in our collective quest for the elimination of this evil," Gonsalves added.

He further said that a number of Caribbean Community nations remain surprised and disappointed by the contents of the TIPR.

"The report should be an occasion for a collective reaffirmation of a global commitment to extinguish Trafficking in Persons in all its aspects. However, on-going questions as to the data collected, transparency, statistical validity, and political influence on the American report continue to distract and divide, rather than unite all stakeholders in this effort," Gonsalves said.

Singapore drafting action plan against sex & labour trafficking

SECTION: SINGAPORE NEWS

LENGTH: 518 words

SINGAPORE: Singapore is currently drafting a National Plan of Action for the country to tackle both sex and labour trafficking.

It is also studying the possibility of future accession to the United Nations Trafficking in Persons Protocol.

These points were made by Singapore's Inter-Agency Taskforce on Trafficking in Persons in response to the announcement that Singapore was upgraded to "Tier 2" from "Tier 2 Watchlist" in the recent US Trafficking in Persons Report 2011.

The taskforce said that as Singapore grows as a hub for travel, tourism and economic activity, it expects to become an increasingly attractive potential destination for human trafficking syndicates.

So the country recognises the need to continually step up efforts in increasing vigilance and responsiveness towards this threat.

The taskforce is co-chaired by the Ministry of Home Affairs (MHA) and the Ministry of Manpower (MOM).

It coordinates anti-trafficking initiatives and policy alignment between government agencies in Singapore.

The taskforce includes representatives from the Singapore Police Force, Immigration & Checkpoints Authority of Singapore, Ministry of Community Development, Youth & Sports, Ministry of Health, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the Attorney-General's Chambers.

The formation of the taskforce underscores the seriousness with which the government views trafficking and aims to improve efforts in tackling this abhorrent international crime.

To fight trafficking, Singapore adopts a 4 'P's strategy aimed at prevention, prosecution, protection and partnership.

This strategy emphasises constructing safeguards against human trafficking, prosecuting perpetrators, protecting victims and cooperating with other governments and civil society to encourage reporting and information sharing.

On its Monday's meeting in Singapore with Mr Luis Cdebaca, the US Ambassador-at-Large for Trafficking in Persons Matters, the taskforce said it took the opportunity to clarify factual inaccuracies within the US TIP Report's country narrative on Singapore.

The report had stated that "the government did not prosecute or convict any offenders of labour trafficking during the reporting period".

But Singapore had previously informed the US that it had prosecuted eight labour trafficking cases as reported.

On claims that there were "no criminal prosecutions or convictions of employers or employment agencies who withheld passports of foreign workers", Singapore had informed the US that three employment agencies were prosecuted in 2010 for persistently withholding of workers' passports and fined between S$1,200 and S$2,000.

The Singapore government also investigates complaints of wrongful confinement of workers by repatriation companies.

In 2010, a staff member of a repatriation company was sent to jail for voluntarily causing hurt.

The employers of the foreign workers were given stern warnings for abetment to wrongful restraint.

Singapore stresses that it takes a serious view of crimes related to trafficking in persons and is constantly reviewing laws, policies and enforcement practices to better address the issue.

WHEN KINDNESS OF MALAYSIANS CAN BE BANE TO GOVERNMENTLENGTH: 370 wordsDATELINE: SUNGAI PETANI July 12

When the kindness of Malaysians can be a bane to the Government...

The move by some Malaysians to offer shelter and protection to illegal immigrants could derail the relentless efforts of the authorities to flush them out.

According to Council of Anti-Trafficking in Persons secretary Nasirrahman Saad Khiruddin, the influx of illegals into the country gave rise to a myriad of problems.

Apart from affecting national security, illegals were a reason for crime, diseases and social problems to thrive in the country, he said.

"The problem with some Malaysians is that they are too kind-hearted and provide protection to immigrants who should have, instead, been reported to the authorities.

"The large territorial waters also made it easy for the illegals to slip into the country, for instance.

"There have also been cases of aliens entering Malaysia legally but leaving the country via illegal means, to a third country.

"In the Klang Valley alone, there are about two million immigrants who entered the country through various dubious means," he told reporters after his keynote address at the North Zone 1 Malaysia Loyal Mind Seminar here today.

Nasirrahman said Malaysia had been placed on Tier Two of the Report on Human Trafficking of the United States State Department last year over its serious efforts against human trafficking.

He said Tier Two meant not fully applying the Trafficking and Violence Protection Act (TVPA) of the United States but making the effort to fulfill the stipulated conditions.

Tier One involves fully applying TVPA conditions, following the minimum standards.

Nasirrahman said the change took place because Malaysia had improved on its monitoring system, enforcement, protection of human trafficking victims and briefing on the issues of human trafficking to the public and government agencies.

In 2008, he noted, Malaysia was on Tier Three as it did not take great strides to combat human trafficking and did not fully apply TVPA.

Most immigrants who used Malaysia as a transit point were from the Asean region, including Vietnam and Cambodia.

Nasirrahman said the government provided four centres for victims of human trafficking activities. Two are in Kuala Lumpur and one each in Johor and Sabah.

CBI warns of child porn aspect to trafficking

BYLINE: By Aman Sharma in New Delhi

LENGTH: 195 words

INDIA may be off the US human trafficking watch list after six years but the CBI has warned the Union home ministry of a disturbing child pornography angle to trafficking crimes in India.

The CBI has asked the MHA to concentrate on such cyber crime dimensions in organised crime of human trafficking to deal with pornography, government sources say. This was discussed at a recent home ministry meeting, where representatives of 34 states and Union Territories - along with senior officers from the CBI and the labour ministry - were present.

The home ministry has asked the CBI to provide it an advisory to attract the attention of the state governments to this worrying aspect. Government sources say the ministry has also approved significant steps, like asking the states to lodge FIRs in cases of all missing children and submit monthly reports to the CBI, besides the details of arrested traffickers. "The CBI will then have a complete database on trafficking gangs," the source said.

Home minister P. Chidambaram had said on June 6 that after six years, the US had taken India off the human trafficking watch list for making significant efforts in combating the menace.

Tamils Know Reconciliation and Redevelopment is Real - Ambassador Wickramasuriya

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 2307 words

DATELINE: COLOMBO, Sri Lanka

The government of Sri Lanka issued the following news release:

A lot of Sri Lankans in the US, especially Tamils, have gone back to Sri Lanka and they know that reconciliation and redevelopment is real. They are truly astonished and upbeat about what they find, said Sri Lanka's Ambassador to the United States Jaliya Wickramasuriya said.

"During the conflict, some Tamils would tell me that they can't be seen talking publicly with me or at the embassy. That's over. Our discussions are in the open, and we receive a lot of support from the Tamil community," he said in an interview with Dalily News.

Sri Lanka is open for business, it is prosperous, growing and peaceful, he stressed.

Q: Tell us about the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report. We saw reports that Sri Lanka's status had improved, but that it is still Tier II. What does that mean?

A: We have been working for several years to improve Sri Lanka's status in this report. This is what has happened this year:

Each year the US State Department ranks more than 180 countries on their enforcement of international and domestic human trafficking laws to prevent slavery, prostitution, child labour and so forth. There are four rankings: Tier I, Tier II, Tier II Watch list and Tier III.

For several years Sri Lanka has been ranked at 'Tier II Watch list.' That means that while the State Department believes that we are aware of human trafficking laws, we are not strictly enforcing them. That is their view. We have held a different view.

If you stay on the Watch List too long they drop you to a Tier III ranking - the worst.

We worked hard in Washington this year to make the State Department aware of our prosecution record and other initiatives that the government has taken to protect people, especially those who work abroad, such as establishing shelters in countries where many Sri Lankans are working. And of course our Defence Ministry has done a lot of work on this issue, enforcing new regulations and measures to protect Sri Lankans.

So this year our status was elevated off the watch list to Tier II - that is a notable step up. I would say that the bulk of the countries in the report are Tier II, including countries like Japan and Switzerland.

The work of the embassy staff in Washington on this issue was instrumental to this change. We have also worked with the US Embassy in Sri Lanka on this issue; that embassy sends its own report on Sri Lanka to the US State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, which puts together the report.

Q: What have you done in Washington regarding the Channel 4 video?

A: This issue of course was first in Geneva and London, and then it migrated to America when PBS, which is the BBC of the United States, did a story about the Channel 4 video but did not show the entire video, just a few minutes of it.

PBS interviewed me for the report but only included a minute or two of our interview. I think the flaws of the video have been made very apparent- from the negligible source of the video to the sound dubbing to the incredible lack of information on who is supposed to be in it - that I don't think I need to go into detail about that. Clearly this is propaganda; you can find all of these allegations on Tamilnet going back several years.

It is also clear that this propaganda dump is intended to throw a wrench in the progress that we are making on reconciliation and redevelopment after so many years of conflict.

In my interview, I told PBS that Sri Lanka would pursue any tangible evidence of crimes. And frankly, that is what credible journalists should be doing - working to identify who is in the scenes. That's what journalism is. Instead, Channel 4 has just taken a video that was given to them, broadcast it and wrote a script of allegations to fit.

They have not done the real work of journalism. Credible journalists would have withheld the broadcast of this video until they had done the reporting to be able to say exactly what it was showing us. They failed at that. It is an incredible failure of their journalistic duty. No one talks about this but that is really what is at fault here.

In the US the response to the video I would say has been muted. There are many other issues on Americans' minds, from the war in Afghanistan to the economy. But the Channel 4 allegations are damaging. And it does not help that organizations like PBS have drawn attention to what is really just shoddy journalism.

I am talking one-to-one with members of the administration and Congress about this. We want people in Washington to have an accurate picture of the situation in Sri Lanka, and not one dreamed up by the pro-LTTE Diaspora.

Q: What about the Darusman Report? What does the US government think of it, and what are you doing to prevent the UN from launching an international investigation?

A: The US government has voiced its concern about the Darusman Report. Those who have followed Sri Lanka know that the allegations in it are stale ones that the LTTE has made before.

The fact is that some people are spreading a negative story about Sri Lanka because they have a negative agenda. They see the successes in Sri Lanka and they know that their dream of more violence and strife is slipping away as people who suffered through years of conflict embrace peace.

We talk about this with members of the Senate and House who we have been meeting with, and with those within the administration. We want them to understand that the report is deeply flawed, and that it is also sloppy work and not representative of events at the end of the conflict.

Sri Lanka has a very, very good story to tell about the way it conducted itself in this conflict, how it saved nearly 300,000 civilians and how it has helped them rebuild their lives. There isn't another country, another society that has done this in modern times.

For that reason, we tell our American friends, the Darusman Report is misguided. The panel of experts went well beyond their mandate, and were apparently unable to apply the discipline that is required in accurate fact gathering. This report is sloppy and its lapses are easily apparent to any serious person.

Q: What are you doing to promote Sri Lanka in the US?

A: If you have a close look at the Sri Lankan embassy's activities, you will see a number of initiatives during the last three years in which we have actively promoted our country. There are a good many positive developments here, and they help all Sri Lankans.

For instance, in March, I brought 12 US companies here to consider investments and expanded operations. They included big names like Boeing, Coca Cola, Starwood Hotels and Resorts, John Deere and Caterpillar, Textron-Bell Helicopters. All of these companies are very interested in investing here, and they are moving ahead with those plans.

In fact, these businesses just wrote an extremely supportive letter to Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and to the US Commerce Secretary and US Trade Representative. It expresses their support for Sri Lanka and their optimism in the future of Sri Lanka.

These companies obviously carry a lot of weight in their communities and in Washington. We are very fortunate to have developed alliances with them.

This trip in March was just our latest effort to generate business interest in Sri Lanka. As you know, for the last two years there have been maybe four US business delegation trips to Sri Lanka involving more than 100 companies. At least 40 companies came in October 2009 for a private-public partnership investment conference, and about 70 attended the same conference in October 2010. Many of these are Fortune 500 companies from the US and also from India.

These are companies that do their homework. They can see the value in Sri Lanka as a great place to do business. They see Sri Lanka as a country earning an eight percent GDP at a time when the world's major economies are struggling with just a few percent GDP, if that.

This interest sends a message to the world: Sri Lanka is open for business, it is prosperous and growing and peaceful. Their interest will generate even more business for Sri Lanka.

Apart from business development, I am also personally involved in promoting Sri Lanka in the US as a tourist destination. In August I will lead our second Signature Tour with the Ambassador. Last August I brought 25 American professionals from Washington, DC to see Sri Lanka. I'm doing the same this August, and probably expanding the group to 50 or so. We will see everything, from Colombo to Galle to Kandy to Anuradhapura to Jaffna. I want them to get a real taste of what we've got.

I have also hosted dinners for travel writers and have met with other groups in Washington that want to sponsor tours to Sri Lanka. Tourism has become one of our busiest sectors in the embassy.

My residence has become a popular destination for travel and food writers and editors. We do a lot to promote Sri Lankan culture - dancing, music and art - and food. People in America love Sri Lankan food. A Washington television station did a feature on Sri Lankan food, visiting my residence to see how it is prepared and to taste it. We held a cultural show at the International Monetary Fund, and a celebration of Sri Lankan food - complete with chefs from Colombo at the World Bank.

Our travel promotion efforts are bearing fruit. The New York Times last year named Sri Lanka its number one travel destination. And a number of other travel-related publications and websites, including National Geographic, Lonely Planet and the DailyCandy, have followed suit.

We have met with the Marriott and Hilton hotel companies and with the travel agents association in the US to help expand their involvement in Sri Lanka. I know that hotel companies are especially interested right now. Marriott told us that their first hotel in Asia was actually in Colombo years ago, and that they are excited about returning.

Q: What about the Sri Lankan community in the US. Are they united?

A: I have travelled throughout the US to meet with Sri Lankans living there. People are pulling together now as never before.

During the conflict, some Tamils would tell me that they can't be seen talking publicly with me or at the embassy. That's over. Our discussions are in the open, and we receive a lot of support from the Tamil community.

I travel throughout the United States to meet with local Sri Lankan communities. But I often hold additional meetings with Tamils to hear what they have to say and to speak with them about reconciliation. I want them to know that reconciliation isn't just talk, but that it is happening.

A lot of Sri Lankans in the US, especially Tamils, have gone back to Sri Lanka and they know that reconciliation and redevelopment is real. I have received numerous reports from Tamils who went back expecting the worst, based on what they had been reading. Their reports to me are extraordinary - they cannot believe the progress and changes taking place. Many have not been back since childhood. They are truly astonished and upbeat about what they find.

That is why I work so hard to encourage travel to Sri Lanka. I want people to experience firsthand what is happening there, and how peace works.

As you know, there are 350,000 to 400,000 Sri Lankans living in the United States. Out of that, a very, very small percentage is working for front organizations who are spreading the negative story of Sri Lanka. Most of the Tamils, Sinhalese and Muslims are moderate people and very supportive of our efforts.

In fact, last month nearly 100 Sri Lankan-Americans travelled to Washington for a single day of meetings with members of Congress. Sri Lankan Day in Congress also featured a lunch with these Sri Lankans, who are all American citizens and voters, and members of Congress and their staffs. The embassy helped arrange Congressional meetings for these people. They wanted to share their views of Sri Lanka with the Congress. And those efforts continue. We have a very active citizens base that is meeting with government officials to share their point of view of Sri Lanka. They are countering the negative publicity, and they have received a warm reception in Congress. Politicians in the US are concerned about their voters' voice, so it's best that the story of Sri Lanka come from the voters who are Sri Lankans.

Q: What do Americans expect from Sri Lanka in the future?

A: What they have right now - a stable, peaceful democracy that is also a regional ally and a solid, fair trading partner and a great place to do business.

The conflict, of course has cast a shadow, but after more than two years of peace, the policies of President Mahinda Rajapaksa are being borne out. As you know, any President of any democratic country wants to do what the people of the country need, to be prosperous, protected and content. What President Rajapaksa has done far surpasses those goals.

With the brave work of the military and the support of the people, he has ended a long conflict and turned the country in a new direction, where everyone in Sri Lanka can benefit from the common goals of our nation. What the people wanted was peace and development and the ability to live without fear. President Rajapaksa has restored the very basic human right of freedom from fear to all 20 million Sri Lankans.

Americans who look closely at Sri Lanka, who understand Sri Lanka, also understand that important change. Anyone who goes to Sri Lanka, especially those who travelled there during the conflict, can see the difference.

More and more, Sri Lanka is earning credit in the United States for defeating terrorism and winning back democracy for all of its citizens. That, I feel, is a tremendous feat. And so we have to remain vigilant to ensure that it is sustained.

Nasheed pledges US to combat human trafficking

LENGTH: 340 words

DATELINE: Male

ale, July 8 -- President Mohamed Nasheed assured US of "very vigorous" action against human trafficking, as the country continues to remain on the US 'Tier 2 Watch List' for the second consecutive year.

Nasheed said his government had uncovered "extensive rings of human exchange and dealings in unskilled labor" calling it an issue "we are concerned about."

The president's comments came at a reception hosted by US Ambassador to the Maldives Patricia Butenis to mark 235th Independence Day of the US, Nasheed's office said Tuesday.

"We want to respect human rights, we want to live in a dignified manner in the family of nations," Nasheed told the ceremony.

An unknown number of 80,000 to 110,000 foreign workers currently working in the Maldives - primarily in the construction and service sectors - face conditions indicative of forced labor: fraudulent recruitment practices, confiscation of identity and travel documents, withholding or nonpayment of wages, or debt bondage, the US State Department report said last month.

It recommended the Maldives to "enact legislation prohibiting and punishing all forms of trafficking in persons and to distinguish between human trafficking and human smuggling in legislation, policies and programs."

While appreciating the Maldives' government counter-trafficking efforts it said those are "impeded by a lack of understanding of the issue; a lack of legal structure; and a lack of a legal definition of trafficking."

However Nasheed told the US Ambassador on Tuesday "I do believe that our people will back the government in finding solutions to human trafficking and other issues related to human trafficking."

The president also appreciated the US for being a "very supportive partner" of the Maldives in trying to develop systems, methods, structures, institutions to deal with these difficult issues. Vincentian diplomats 'disappointed' by human trafficking report

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 929 words

July 07--WASHINGTON -- The United States has for a third consecutive year placed St Vincent and the Grenadines (SVG) on a Tier 2 human trafficking watch list, subjecting the multi-island nation to US sanctions.

But while the State Department says SVG "is a likely source, transit, and destination country for some children and adults subjected to forced labour and sex trafficking", Kingstown's ambassador to Washington, La Celia Prince, said that Vincentian embassy officials "are very disappointed by the report".

Prince said that placing SVG on a Tier 2 watch list three years in a row cannot be justified, adding that the United States Trafficking in Persons (TIP) reports two years ago "started off with 'anecdotal accounts' -- according to them and they are still unable to point to any hard cases of trafficking in persons in SVG".

She said the reports "lack transparency and their methodology for compiling the data is unclear.

"Indeed, it is still not known how they determine which countries to report on because there are some countries -- including some from CARICOM -- that they omit from the report each year!"

Prince further said that Kingstown has engaged with the State Department at all levels and the Caribbean Community (CARICOM) "as a whole has also registered its strong denunciation of the reports since, in most cases, the claims cannot be substantiated".

She said that Vincentian diplomats in Washington have had several meetings with State Department officials and have facilitated workshops and other meetings to build awareness about TIP in SVG.

"In the case of the 2011 report on SVG, the United States acknowledges on the one hand that the government of SVG has been working on building awareness of the issue, yet we have been slapped with the disgraceful listing of a Tier 2 Watch List country," Prince said.

She said that her own sense is that the United States "does not ascribe enough significance to SVG's various domestic legislation which can treat with the issue of trafficking in persons.

"Rather, they promote a comprehensive legislation which has not been adopted in SVG," she added.

Prince acknowledged that the Department of Justice has its mandate to report to Congress on TIP but said she believes that "a multilateral evaluation process that is transparent will be more useful than this unilateral and somewhat high-handed process".

The most recent TIP report, released late June says, "Sufficient information on human trafficking in St Vincent and the Grenadines is lacking, as there are no formal government structures to identify it or NGOs to address human trafficking specifically".

However, the report says, "According to NGOs and officials, there exists a social taboo of discussing the matter openly."

CARICOM leaders at their summit meeting in St Kitts "emphasized once again their strong commitment to combating the crime of trafficking in persons, underlining that they have adopted and implemented policies of prevention, prosecution and victim protection in their respective member states," according to a communique at the end of the meeting on Monday.

Leaders also "reiterated their deep concern" that the United States continues to place several CARICOM nation on either Tier 2 or the Tier 2 Watchlist, noting that countries that are placed on the Tier 2 Watchlist for three successive years will be subject to sanctions by the USA".

Tier 2 Watch List

Tier 2 Watch List comprises nations "whose governments do not fully comply with the [Trafficking Victims Protection Act's (TVPA)] minimum standards, but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards," according to the State Department.

The State Department said that in Tier 2 Watch List nations, the absolute number of victims of severe forms of trafficking is very significant or is significantly increasing.

It further says that in these countries, there is a failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons from the previous year.

In addition, the determination that a country is making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance with minimum standards was based on commitments by the country to take additional future steps over the ,[#x20ac]®next year.

Other countries on the Tier 2 Watchlist include the Bahamas, Barbados, Iraq, Afghanistan, Russia, and China.

Force labour, sex trafficking

The State Department says "forced labour may result when unscrupulous employers exploit workers made more vulnerable by high rates of unemployment, poverty, crime, discrimination, corruption, political conflict, or cultural acceptance of the practice".

It says that while immigrants are particularly vulnerable, individuals also may be forced into labour in their own countries and that female victims of forced labour, especially women and girls in domestic servitude, are often sexually exploited as well.

The States Department further says, "When an adult is coerced, forced, or deceived into prostitution -- or maintained in prostitution through coercion -- that person is a victim of trafficking".

It says "all of those involved in recruiting, transporting, harbouring, receiving, or obtaining the person for that purpose have committed a trafficking crime".

Three more states start collecting details for NPR

BYLINE: Dipak Kumar Dash

SECTION: INDIA

LENGTH: 420 words

NEW DELHI: Three more states - Kerala, Tamil Nadu and Maharashtra - have begun collecting biometric details of residents for the National Population Register (NPR).

The scheme is already in progress in Delhi, Manipur and Nagaland and in one district each of Andhra Pradesh, Goa, Gujarat, Karnataka, Orissa, Puducherry and West Bengal. The nationwide project would collectively cost the exchequer over Rs 6,649 crore.

"The capture of biometrics for NPR in the country has started in one district each in Kerala, Tamil Nadu and Maharashtra....On June 2, the Cabinet approved the revised cost estimates of Rs 6,649.05 crore for the scheme of NPR," said home minister P Chidambaram in a written statement on the report card of his ministry for the month of June.

Though Chidambaram adhered to his promise of coming out with monthly report card of his ministry, he for the first time under the UPA-II did not brief the media in person on the activities of his ministry. Instead of holding a press conference, the home ministry this time merely circulated his statement carrying the report card.

In his statement, Chidambaram said: "The month was dominated by protests by certain sections of civil society. Through the month, a lot of my time was taken in the meetings of the Joint Drafting Committee of the Lokpal Bill. That exercise came to an end on June 21."

He said the past month also witnessed an attempt by Ramdev to convert a yoga `shivir' (camp) into a fast-unto-death programme. "Delhi Police cancelled the permission granted to hold a yoga shivir and were obliged to remove Ramdev from Delhi," he said.

On his ministry's activities in June, Chidambaram said that it sanctioned Rs 192.76 crore for construction of infrastructure for establishment of a reserve battalion of CISF at Sivaganga (his parliamentary constituency) in Tamil Nadu.

He said Rs 72.67 crore has been sanctioned for Andhra Pradesh, Bihar, Chhattisgarh, Jharkhand, Orissa, Madhya Pradesh, Uttar Pradesh and West Bengal under the Special Infrastructure Scheme (SIS) for the year 2011-12.

He also noted that the United States of America has, after a gap of six years, taken India off the human trafficking watch list for making significant efforts in combating the menace.

The home minister said an integrated on-line visa application system under the mission mode project on IVFRT (Immigration, Visa and Foreigners Registration and Tracking) has been introduced in Wellington under the High Commission of India, New Zealand.

Inclusion of Algeria in US human-trafficking blacklist "unfounded" - journalist

LENGTH: 256 words

The US has included Algeria for the first time in a blacklist of countries that are not fully complying with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking and could face sanctions under US law, Al-Jazeera TV reported on 4 July.

Speaking in a phone interview with Al-Jazeera, Ahmed Rouaba, an Algerian journalist, described the inclusion of Algeria in the list as "unfounded".

Algeria is a transit point for clandestine migrants and human traffickers, according to the US government report quoted by Al-Jazeera.

Many African migrants have their travel documents taken away and are victims of hard labour and forced to do domestic work, notably in the southern Tamanrasset province, according to the report.

The Algerian Minister of Justice Tayeb Belaiz is due to meet officials from the Algerian Ministry of Interior and Ministry of Foreign Affairs on Wednesday [6 July] to discuss the country's response to the report, Al-Jazeera reported.

"This issue has become a political matter and the response is expected to be political. It will not be a response to the report, which is meaningless and unsubstantiated," said Rouaba.

"Illegal immigrants all over the world are employed to do illegal work. But states have nothing to do with that," he noted.

"In France, the US and other countries, illegal immigrants are often used in doing hard labour and they often don't get paid," he said.

There are more illegal immigrants doing hard labour in France than in Algeria, Rouba added.

US ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EAST ASIA AND PACIFIC AFFAIRS KURT M. CAMPBELL VISITS FSM

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 800 words

DATELINE: POHNPEI, FM

The following information was released by the National Government of the Federated States of Micronesia:

On July 1, 2011 President Manny Mori received Assistant Secretary of State Kurt M. Campbell and his visiting delegation at the President's Conference Room for a brief but very high level meeting. Accompanying the Assistant Secretary were Admiral Patrick M. Walsh, Commander of U.S. Pacific Fleet, Nisha Desai Biswal, USAID Assistant Administrator, Brigadier General Richard L. Simcock II, Principal Director, Office of the Deputy Under Secretary of Defense (Asia and Pacific), Ambassador Peter M. Prahar, U.S. Ambassador to the FSM, and other officials and U.S. Embassy staff.

President Mori welcomed Assistant Secretary Campbell and his delegation to the FSM and thanked them for taking such an extensive trip to meet with leaders of the FSM. In his remarks, the President reaffirmed the special nature of the FSM-US longstanding profound relationship and outlined some key areas of success and challenges. The Compact of Free Association is pointed out as one product of the relationship which affords "our people the opportunity to work, go to school, and even die in the U.S.", the President explained. Compact implementation, especially in the infrastructure sector, has been difficult due to stringent requirements, but "we are making progress in building the needed infrastructure under the Compact", the President added.

The President also alluded to issues raised by members of the U.S. Congress in a letter to Secretary Clinton and Secretary Salazar and assured the delegation that a Task Force under the chairmanship of Vice President Alik has been organized to recommend ways on how the FSM can minimize impacts of migration of FSM citizens into the U.S. and its territories.

Furthermore, the President made mention of the 2011 Trafficking in Persons report by the US Department of State which ranks the FSM on a tier-three status. He emphasized that his Administration will continue to work with FSM Congress to ensure that the pending Palermo Protocol is acceded to and that other legislations and policies be developed for consideration of Congress.

In his remarks, Assistant Secretary Campbell thanked the President for the warm reception. The Secretary stressed that the U.S. is thankful to the FSM for a number of reasons, most notably the "deeply appreciated" services and sacrifices made by men and women from the FSM in the U.S. military and FSM's support of US' position on issues at the United Nations and other forums.

Secretary Campbell agreed with the President's statement that "some progress are made" under Compact infrastructure sector as evidenced by various constructions for schools, road, and health care facilities. He stated that both governments may still be able to devise improved approaches in implementing the compact so that "fundamental responsibilities in both directions" are achieved.

Secretary Campbell acknowledged that the US could still improve its oversight responsibility over Compact implementation and emphasized the need for an inter-agency approach where the Department of Defense, the Department of State, the Department of Interior and other Federal Agencies jointly provide oversight and monitoring over compact implementation to maximize progress.

Secretary Campbell explained that this trip "is the beginning of a new process we (U.S.) will undertake" more regularly in the Pacific to have a more comprehensive and coordinated approach to this region in defense, diplomacy, and economic and social development.

In response to the President's comments on issues of Human Trafficking, Secretary Campbell advised that the matter be considered a "national emergency" due to the potential impact it can have on the core values of US-FSM relations. Mr. Campbell explained that to be assessed a low rating on Human Trafficking can potentially result in certain sanctions that may challenge our bilateral relations and other aspects of the Compact, especially immigration.

USAID Assistant Administrator for Asia Nisha Desai Biswal spoke of areas of interventions that can assist the FSM especially in disaster preparedness and response and integrating climate change proofing into Compact infrastructure projects.

General Simcock II expressed similar sentiments, saying that "the greatest threat to this region" is Mother Nature itself. Dealing with climate change and surveillance and monitoring of the expansive Exclusive Economic Zone are areas where the US could look to engage in to bolster "comprehensive assistance" to the FSM.

The meeting was concluded with exchange of mutual appreciation and support along with the presentations of gifts by both parties.

In attendance with the President were Vice President Alik and some members of the Cabinet.

Sunday Observer (Sri Lanka)

July 3, 2011 Sunday

Sri Lanka taken off US human trafficking watch listLENGTH: 457 wordsDATELINE: Sri Lanka

Sri Lanka, July 3 -- An annual US State Department Report on Trafficking in Persons that grades each country, elevated Sri Lanka's status in 2011, noting increased prosecutions of human traffickers and more aggressive efforts by the government to protect trafficking victims.

The Report was unveiled by Secretary of State Hillary Clinton.

"The Sri Lankan government increased law enforcement efforts in addressing human trafficking cases over the reporting period.

Sri Lanka prohibits all forms of trafficking through an April 2006 Amendment to its Penal Code, which prescribes punishment of up to 20 years' imprisonment," the report said. "These penalties are sufficiently stringent and commensurate with those prescribed for other serious offences, such as rape."

The State Department report grades countries in four categories: Tiers 1, 2, Tier 2 "Watch List" and Tier 3. It ranks more than 180 countries including the United States.

In 2011, the State Department took Sri Lanka off the watch list and graded it at the same level as a large number of countries, including Japan, Iceland and Switzerland.

The report lists more than 75 Tier 2 countries, which are making "significant efforts" to comply with international trafficking in persons standards.

"This is positive recognition of Sri Lanka's progress on our efforts to prevent human trafficking and the abuse of those who travel abroad seeking employment," said Sri Lanka's ambassador to the United States Jaliya Wickramasuriya. The report said, "The Sri Lankan government made some progress in its efforts to prevent trafficking during the past year. The government formed an inter-ministerial anti-trafficking Task Force in October 2010, led by a coordinator from the Ministry of Justice, and developed a terms of reference on how government will work together to combat trafficking."

"The government convicted three traffickers, in the first case under its anti-trafficking legislation, and rejuvenated its inter-agency task force," the Report said.

The Report called upon the Sri Lankan authorities to vigorously investigate and prosecute suspected trafficking offences, and convict and punish trafficking offenders, particularly those responsible for recruiting victims with fraudulent offers of employment and excessive commission fees for the purpose of subjecting them to forced labour.

It also noted that the Sri Lankan government has reported that all former Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE) child soldiers completed rehabilitation and were released in May 2010. Modern-day slavery

LENGTH: 494 words

The word "slavery," for many modern Americans, stirs up images of squalid holds on 19th-century sailing ships, of devout Uncle Toms beaten by nasty Simon Legrees and of countless other images of a repugnant institution relegated to history by heroes like Abraham Lincoln and William Wilberforce. But while this version of slavery was thankfully abolished more than a century ago, slavery has never, in practice, been erased from the globe. And its modern iterations are just as chilling as those of previous generations.

In 2008, ABC correspondent Dan Harris went undercover to see just how difficult it would be to buy a slave today. Not difficult at all, he found. Within roughly 10 hours of exiting his New York office, he had negotiated a $150 price tag for an 11-year-old girl at a hotel in Haiti. Harris' experience is the tip of a giant iceberg. A U.S. State Department report released this week estimates there are 27 million victims of human trafficking ? modern jargon for slavery ? worldwide. The report defines specific forms of slavery, including sex trafficking, in which adults or children are forced or deceived into prostitution; forced labor among adults and children; bonded labor, in which traffickers or recruiters exploit an initial debt assumed as terms of employment; involuntary domestic servitude; and use of children as soldiers. Each of these practices is repugnant in its own way. And even as awareness of these crimes has been rising over the past decade, thanks to the U.N. and other organizations mounting steady accountability campaigns, it appears on the ground that human trafficking is only growing more pervasive. Twenty-three countries are not meeting international standards to stop human trafficking, according to the report, and another 41 countries are on a watch list with sanctions threatened if their record does not improve. For the first time, the State Department included the U.S. in its report this year. It gives the U.S. a top ranking, but also points out that the country has room for improvement. As Harris' experiment illustrates, the U.S. is a market for human trafficking, but homegrown varieties of forced labor and sex trafficking also exist. The amount of information and research on human trafficking in this report ? and across a variety of other organizations ? is impressive. If the increase in documentation and awareness spurs further action and a modern abolition movement, it will be even more impressive. The U.S. is right to keep shining a light on this global crisis, and to allow that light to fall on itself and its friends as well as its enemies. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton characterized the last 10 years as a decade of development ? development of awareness, partnerships and commitments ? and the 10 years ahead as a decade of delivery on those promises. May it also be one of deliverance from bondage for millions of our fellow humans who suffer under the yoke of modern slavery.

Thailand is the regional hub for human trafficking. It is a source and transit venue because of its central location in continental Southeast Asia and because it is surrounded by neighbouring countries with a lower level of economic development. For decad

LENGTH: 496 words

The worst aspects of modern human trafficking can be found in the Thai fishing fleet, where conditions can easily be described as modern slavery. Thai trawler-owners are generally inhumane and should be put on trial for the illegal practices they regularly get away with.

The US State Department recently issued a report on the state of global human trafficking, and it still lists Thailand in the tier two category along with many other countries in the region including Afghanistan, Vietnam, Indonesia, Cambodia and China. The category also includes Argentina, Zambia and Russia.

But this year's report also gave a fair assessment of Thailand's effort in preventing human trafficking and protecting migrant workers. The report detailed the country's legislation and the performance of governmental offices. Two of the biggest problems remain issues related to corruption and weak law enforcement. As such, it is not surprising that those behind human smuggling from Burma, Cambodia and Laos, and the transit of human cargoes to foreign destinations near and far, continue to get away with their crimes over and over again. They must be punished and jailed.

The Abhisit government has been trying hard to cope with this issue as part of its overall stated policy of respect for human rights and human dignity. But somehow the concerned authorities are not cooperating. For instance, the inhumane treatment of Burmese and Cambodian workers employed in the Thai fishing industry, as detailed by the US report, should be thoroughly investigated by Thai authorities. These are serious crimes that tarnish Thailand's image. Quite often we hear stories of how workers on fishing vessels are thrown into the sea or left to die of hunger locked inside trawlers, where nobody can find them. Thai trawler operators who engage in such heinous treatment of foreign migrant labourers must be prosecuted without leniency because they have knowingly killed many helpless workers. Some of these owners are well-known personalities.

It is time that Thailand properly registered foreign workers, especially from neighbouring countries, in order to prevent them being exploited by ruthless employers. Past registration schemes have been full of errors because of official procedures that have led to corruption and collusion among prospective employers and officials. The government has to be mindful of this malpractice because in the future the number of migrant labourers in Thailand is bound to increase dramatically, especially with the ongoing process of Asean economic integration.

Thailand must learn the lessons from the past that any inhumane treatment of migrant labourers will eventually affect Thai society as a whole. In the 1990s we mistreated thousands of refugees who, as a result have never shown any appreciation for Thailand's other more humanitarian face. The same sentiment will prevail among itinerant labourers who work here like slaves for the benefit of the wider Thai economy.

Thailand is a regional hub for human misery

BYLINE: The Nation

LENGTH: 592 words

Thailand is the regional hub for human trafficking. It is a source and transit venue because of its central location in continental Southeast Asia and because it is surrounded by neighbouring countries with a lower level of economic development. For decades, migrant workers from these countries have risked their lives to get to Thailand in search of better living conditions and wages. However, of late, the human trafficking problem in this part of the world has changed. We are now seeing forced labour being smuggled in from countries as far away as Fiji and Uzbekistan.

The worst aspects of modern human trafficking can be found in the Thai fishing fleet, where conditions can easily be described as modern slavery. Thai trawler-owners are generally inhumane and should be put on trial for the illegal practices they regularly get away with.

CONGRESSMAN RIVERA CALLS ON OBAMA ADMINISTRATION TO REINSTATE CUBA TRAVEL AND REMITTANCE RESTRICTIONS AMID HUMAN TRAFFICKING REPORT

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 340 words

DATELINE: MIAMI, Fla

The following information was released by the office of Florida Rep. David Rivera:

The State Department released its 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report this week.

The report tracks the state of human trafficking in 184 countries, including the United States, during the preceding year, and places each country into a tier based on its record of compliance with the Trafficking Victims Compliance Act (TVPA).

Major forms of human trafficking include forced labor, sex trafficking, bonded labor, involuntary domestic servitude, forced child labor and child sex trafficking.

Cuba was ranked as a Tier 3-a country whose government does not fully comply with the minimum standards of the TVPA and is not making efforts to do so.

"The 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report is just another example of the lack of change coming from Cuba in regards to human rights. The State Department itself has found that Cuba has made no known effort to prevent human trafficking on the island or to protect trafficking victims," Congressman David Rivera (FL-25) said.

Congressman Rivera, a member of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, called for the Obama Administration to reinstate the travel and remittance restrictions it lifted earlier this year.

"As the Castro regime continues its appalling record on human rights, the Obama Administration is making unilateral concessions to the dictatorship that do nothing to solve the fundamental problems on the island, which include the exploitation of women and children and the oppression of the Cuban people. The human trafficking data shows that there are no improvements from Fidel and Raul Castro in regards to human rights, and yet the United States is rewarding them.

"In its 52 years, the Castro regime has not responded positively to unilateral concessions made by the United States. Based on its history, and in light of the State Department's report, it is time for the Obama Administration to stop rewarding the dictatorship, and reinstate the travel and remittance restrictions it lifted earlier this year."

The State Department released its 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report this week.

The report tracks the state of human trafficking in 184 countries, including the United States, during the preceding year, and places each country into a tier based on its record of compliance with the Trafficking Victims Compliance Act (TVPA).

Major forms of human trafficking include forced labor, sex trafficking, bonded labor, involuntary domestic servitude, forced child labor and child sex trafficking.

Cuba was ranked as a Tier 3--a country whose government does not fully comply with the minimum standards of the TVPA and is not making efforts to do so.

"The 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report is just another example of the lack of change coming from Cuba in regards to human rights. The State Department itself has found that Cuba has made no known effort to prevent human trafficking on the island or to protect trafficking victims," Congressman David Rivera (FL-25) said.

Congressman Rivera, a member of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, called for the Obama Administration to reinstate the travel and remittance restrictions it lifted earlier this year.

"As the Castro regime continues its appalling record on human rights, the Obama Administration is making unilateral concessions to the dictatorship that do nothing to solve the fundamental problems on the island, which include the exploitation of women and children and the oppression of the Cuban people. The human trafficking data shows that there are no improvements from Fidel and Raul Castro in regards to human rights, and yet the United States is rewarding them.

"In its 52 years, the Castro regime has not responded positively to unilateral concessions made by the United States. Based on its history, and in light of the State Department's report, it is time for the Obama Administration to stop rewarding the dictatorship, and reinstate the travel and remittance restrictions it lifted earlier this year."

U.S. Embassy Congratulates Georgian Students for Essays on Preventing Trafficking in Persons

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 168 words

DATELINE: TBILISI, Georgia

The U.S. Embassy issued the following news release:

On July 1, U.S. Ambassador John R. Bass and First Deputy Chief Prosecutor David Sakvarelidze will join students at Tbilisi State University to highlight Georgia's fifth year of successfully maintaining its Tier 1 ranking in the latest Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report. The students have been studying the problem of trafficking in persons and will present winning essays from a recent anti-TIP essay contest. Each year the Department of State through its Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons compiles a report assessing 184 nations' efforts to combat human trafficking. The 2011 report was released by Secretary Clinton on June 27, 2011.

The U.S. Embassy has worked locally with the Government of Georgia for over five years to combat trafficking in persons as part of U.S. efforts to protect and assist individuals around the world who are vulnerable to human trafficking.

Australian man charged after raids in Philippines' 'sin city'

REPORTERS: Lexi MetherellLENGTH: 563 words

TONY EASTLEY: An Australian man has been arrested in the Philippines and is facing the prospect of life in jail after being charged under the country's tough anti-human trafficking laws.

It's alleged Terrence James Smith managed a nightclub where women, recruited from southern towns, were misled into working as prostitutes.*

He's one of several men arrested after raids on bars in a notorious red light district in the northern city of Angeles, in which police say they rescued around 100 sex workers.

Lexi Metherell reports.

LEXI METHERELL: Angeles, just north of Manila, has earned the tag "sin city" because it's a magnet for sex tourists.

Last night police swooped on the city's red light district of Fields Avenue, raiding several nightclubs and arresting a number of foreign nationals including an Australian, Terrence James Smith.

He allegedly managed a club called the Sunshine Bar.

Superintendent Emma Libunao of the Philippines National Police led the operation.

EMMA LIBUNAO: He is in the nightclub overseeing the day-to-day operation of the club every day.

LEXI METHERELL: And do you know how long he had been there for?

EMMA LIBUNAO: For many years already I guess. He is known in the area.

LEXI METHERELL: She says the Sunshine Bar was targeted after the mother of a 25 year old woman working there complained her daughter was forced to stay there against her will.

EMMA LIBUNAO: Allegedly the girl was recruited in the southern part of the Philippines to work as a waitress serving food. But upon reaching Angeles city she was forced to dance in a skimpy outfit and render sexual services to foreign clients.

LEXI METHERELL: Prostitution is illegal in the Philippines but superintendent Libunao says sex workers aren't prosecuted. Authorities instead target traffickers and pimps.

Terrence Smith isn't accused of recruiting sex workers for the bar. But it is alleged he helped arrange sex for customers.

He's been charged with breaching the Philippines' anti-trafficking laws.*

EMMA LIBUNAO: He might be guilty of qualified trafficking in person that calls for a punishment of life imprisonment.

LEXI METHERELL: The pressure has been on the Philippines to deal with the scourge of human trafficking and illegal sex work according to Bernadette McMenamin, an expert on human trafficking and prostitution.

BERNADETTE MCMENAMIN: My first impressions is this is a very new approach for the Philippines authorities and that's good.

LEXI METHERELL: Just this week the US secretary of state Hillary Clinton praised president Benigno Aquino for effecting a "sea change" in the Philippine campaign against human trafficking.

Her remarks came after the US State Department recognised the Philippines' attempts to crack down on the trade by dropping it from a human trafficking watch list.

But Bernadette McMenamin says it's easy for criminals to buy their way out.

BERNADETTE MCMENAMIN: They get out on bail. So they pay the victims and the victims' families off to withdraw evidence. And then they move from the Philippines to Thailand, Cambodia, Laos, wherever and just set up again.

TONY EASTLEY: Bernadette McMenamin, the chief executive of child protection organisation ChildWise ending that report by Lexi Metherell.

*EDITOR'S NOTE: 13.7.11 The Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade advised the ABC on 12.7.11 that Terrence Smith was released without charge two days after he was detained.

Minister explains Estonia's low rating in US human trafficking report

LENGTH: 350 words

Text of report by leading Estonian newspaper Postimees website

[Report by Merje Pors: "Pevkur: Next Year Estonia Will Not Be on Blacklist"]

Commenting on Estonia's being at the same level as Nigeria and Afghanistan when it comes to fighting human trafficking, Estonian Social Affairs Minister Hanno Pevkur expressed hope that next year Estonia would be off the blacklist, so to speak.

"I believe that next year we will be back in the first tier (where Estonia was a year ago)," Pevkur said to [Estonian public radio station] Vikerraadio.

He explained that, on one hand, Estonia was having difficulty fighting human trafficking because of the recent economic recession, which did not enable us to organize training sessions and raise awareness of human trafficking.

On the other hand, less money had been allocated to shelters last year, although Pevkur noted that the situation had changed since then.

The principal reason why Estonia was reprimanded was the fact that our legislation lacks a separate provision relating to human trafficking. "Legislation can be amended," the minister noted.

Pevkur explained that the Ministry of Justice had prepared a relevant draft provision to be added to the Penal Code.

In Estonia, non-profit organizations instead of government agencies deal with victims of human trafficking. The minister considered such a solution justified due to the delicate nature of the matter, and added that the state and non-profit organizations worked very well together.

Pevkur emphasized that anyone deciding to seek employment abroad should do so in as safe a manner as possible, for example via the European Job Mobility Portal, or inform the Ministry of Foreign Affairs about where they are going and what kind of job they will do.

[Daily] Postimees wrote today that the United States had put Estonia and Belarus on the human trafficking watchlist for having failed in the last year to step up efforts to fight prostitution and forced labor.

The daily was referring to the US State Department's annual "Trafficking in Persons Report."

Indonesian nationals rescued

BYLINE: Amilbahar S. Mawallil and AFP

SECTION: Pg. S1/12

LENGTH: 459 words

ZAMBOANGA CITY - Authorities rescued four Indonesian nationals in the island-province of Tawi-Tawi yesterday after their boat was swept by strong current brought about by bad weather to the Philippines, police said.

Senior Superintendent Rodelio Jocson, police provincial director, said the boat drifted to the island-municipality of Sibutu.

"The Indonesians are from Sulawesi in Indonesia. They left Sulawesi for Nunukan Island also in Indonesia, last June 22 via a small sailboat," Mr. Jocson said.

He identified the four as Erwin Salim Huku, 36; Hendrick Pini Sihamuddin, 24; Andi Karal Jeri, 32; and Edy Zulkifli Neliwati Anrizal, 22.

Mr. Jocson said coordination is ongoing with the Indonesian Boarder Crossing team based in Tawi-Tawi to assist the Indonesians.

Meanwhile, an Australian man could be jailed for life on human trafficking charges following raids on a notorious red-light district in which 100 women were rescued, police said yesterday.

Three bars in the northern city of Angeles in Pampanga that were known to be fronts for prostitution were raided on Tuesday night, according to a statement from the Philippine National Police headquarters in Manila.

Other foreigners were also arrested after they were found having sex with some of the women and would face less severe charges than human trafficking, the statement said.

The manager of the Sunshine Bar, Australian Terrence James Smith, was detained, while about 100 female sex workers were rescued from the three establishments, the statement said.

Police said Smith would be charged with human trafficking, which carries a maximum prison term of life. One police officer involved in the raid who asked not to be named told AFP the other foreigners who were picked up were two Americans and a Japanese.

Two Swedish men accused of running a cyber-sex den and charged with human trafficking were last month jailed for life in the southern Philippines.

Angeles has long had a reputation as a giant red-light district, initially for American soldiers when the city hosted Clark Air Base, which the United States handed back to the government in 1992.

Filipino authorities continued to turn a blind eye to prostitution in Angeles after the US forces left, with one section of the city devoted to strip bars and hotels catering to foreign men.

Tuesday's raids were linked to a US decision on Monday to remove the Philippines from a watch list of countries deemed not doing enough to combat human trafficking, police criminal investigation head Chief Superintendent Samuel D. Pagdilao, Jr. said.

"Pagdilao said that the successive raids in Angeles City's red-light district last night affirms the recent pronouncement made by the United States Secretary of State Hillary Clinton," the police statement said.

Algerian Official Refutes US People-Trafficking Report Conclusions

BYLINE: Jamie Ingram

SECTION: In Brief

LENGTH: 402 words

Farouk Ksentini, president of Algeria's official human rights body, the National Advisory Commission for the Protection and Promotion of Human Rights, has slammed the US State Department for demoting Algeria to tier-three status in the 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report. The Algerian daily El Watan quoted Ksentini yesterday (29 June) as saying "It's an unfounded report.

This does not correspond to Algerian Reality". Ksentini accuses the report of serving a political agenda by the United States administration, which, he says is attempting to harm Algeria's reputation as it seeks to reintegrate itself into the international community. The report, released on Monday (27 June) lambasted Algerian authorities for failing to tackle the problem of people trafficking, stating that they do "not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to do so". The report highlighted that Algeria has failed to implement its 2009 anti-trafficking law, to identify and protect victims of people trafficking and lacks adequate measures to prevent trafficking. In addition, it claims that police have handed arrested sex-trafficking victims back to their pimps. As a result, Algeria was demoted from tier two-watch list status, which it had occupied since 2008, down to the bottom tier-three category, reserved for those countries which do not comply with minimum standards and fail to make significant efforts to do so. The bottom tier comprises 23 countries, including nine countries from the Middle East and North Africa (MENA) region. Four other MENA countries are on the watch list, while none occupy the top tier.

Significance: The report is a damning indictment of the Algerian government's political will to prevent people trafficking; especially with regards to the non-implementation of legislation the report regards as sufficient. This highlights the frequent disparity between legislation and enforcement in the country, a disparity not limited to the issue of people trafficking. Ksentini's argument that the US is seeking to damage Algeria's reputation is weakened by the presence of US allies such as Kuwait and Saudi Arabia on the list. That said, such criticisms bring more pressure to bear on Algeria to listen to protesters calling for political reform (see: Algeria: 22 June 2011:), an outcome that would be welcomed by western governments.

'The fight requires collective effort'SECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 13LENGTH: 202 words

KUALA LUMPUR: Combating human trafficking is an international effort and not solely the work of one country.

Foreign Affairs Ministry secretary-general Tan Sri Mohd Radzi Abdul Rahman said yesterday the country's own efforts to rid the practice of "modern slavery" needed to be in tandem with initiatives by its neighbours.

"The sharing of information between neighbouring countries, including Australia, will put all involved countries in a better position to fight human trafficking.

"The Foreign Affairs Ministry also works closely with the Home Ministry and other agencies to stop the inhumane practice," he told the New Straits Times.

Radzi was commenting on the continued placement of Malaysia in the Tier 2 watchlist of the United States State Department Trafficking in Persons annual report.

He said the country's efforts as a whole would be witnessed by the world, especially the US.

"The ministry highlights our efforts to the US State Department through our embassies there, and communicates to them that we are aware of the global issue and are doing all it takes to combat it.

"The embassies also work to dispel misunderstandings other countries might have about Malaysia over this particular matter."

Hisham: Focus is on innocents, not rankingBYLINE: Azura Abas; Lydia Gomez; Koi Kye Lee; Predeep NambiarSECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 13LENGTH: 367 words

PUTRAJAYA: Instead of being upset, Home Minister Home Datuk Seri Hishammuddin Hussein yesterday agreed that Malaysia should be on the Tier 2 watchlist of the United States State Department Trafficking in Persons (TIP) annual report.

"This is because we are in the early stages of rolling out measures to address human trafficking."

Hishammuddin listed some of the steps taken, including looking at advanced passenger screening, getting relevant enforcement agencies on board, identifying international syndicates involved, taking action against corrupt officers and detaining heads of syndicates.

"I want them to keep watching. If after all these measures, we are still on the watchlist, then they themselves (US State Department) are not doing their job," Hishammuddin said after meeting with Bangladeshi High Commissioner to Malaysia Atiqur Rehman at his office.

Asked whether Malaysia would get out of the Tier 2 watchlist by next year, Hishammuddin said it all depended on the efforts involved and how aggressive Malaysia was in implementing them.

"I am doing it in a very pragmatic and realistic way... mere rhetoric will not work."

Asked whether it was fair for any country which remained in the Tier 2 watchlist for two consecutive years to be automatically dropped to Tier 3, Hishammuddin said he did not worry too much about ranking.

"My concern is the innocents who are being victimised and exploited. And, on humanitarian reasons alone, this matter must be addressed and not on what they tell me where we are on the list.

"The world's citizens will decide whether what Malaysia is doing is right or wrong."

Nations in Tier 3 are subjected to US sanctions, including the withdrawal of non-humanitarian, non-trade-related foreign assistance.

The latest TIP report took the Philippines, Singapore and Laos off the watchlist to Tier 2, which means that the countries do not fully meet standards on human trafficking but are making efforts to do so.

Indonesia and Cambodia stayed at Tier 2, but Brunei, Malaysia, Thailand and Vietnam remained on the watchlist.

On his meeting with Atiqur, Hishammuddin said a two-week legislation and amnesty exercise between Malaysia and Bangladesh had been agreed upon.

Harrowing tales of human trafficking!

LENGTH: 393 words

DATELINE: HYDERABAD

HYDERABAD, June 30 -- Even as India was taken off the 'watch-list' for human trafficking by the US, a meet of survivors in the city brought forth the web of human trafficking that exists.

The tales of 40 survivors from different parts of the country had a common thread- the lack of sensitisation among police and need for proper rehabilitation.

The vicious cycle of poverty and exploitation made the women from socially poor background vulnerable. Lured by promise of a job in the city, they are entrapped in the trafficking racket.

"My father had abandoned us when I was child. There was no option but to look for work. I was promised the job of a housemaid in Delhi but found myself at a brothel instead as a 10-year-old," said DK Munni of Anantapur, now 41 and working at the NGO which rescued her.

T Anvesha, a 14-year-old from Meghalaya narrated her experience at the police station, where she had gone to lodge a complaint- "The officer-in-charge refused to register a complaint and tried sending me away. They did not lodge an FIR until I said I will not leave."

Most victims of trafficking are forced into prostitution. Though some are rescued by NGOs and police, the most difficult part is getting their lives back on track.

"I have been married for a year and stay at my in-laws. Though my husband knows of my past, my in-laws have been kept unaware," says Sapna Kumari, a survivor.

A major impediment in rehabilitation of women is the lack of employment opportunities.

Often they fall back on sex-work, finding it difficult to make ends meet. Aparna Bhat, a Delhi-based advocate on the common panel of Supreme Court, points out the state has a responsibility of protecting its citizens and monetary compensation should be paid to victims of human trafficking.

"Being unable to prevent human trafficking is a failure on part of the state and financial support should be provided to victims to start life afresh. Let us not call it an aid but monetary relief for survivors," said Bhat.

"It is for us to decide whether we want to be strong and carry on as survivors or whether we crumble under pressure," said Dr Sunitha Krishnan of Prajwala, a city-based NGO. Malaysia, Bangladesh to fingerprint 500,000 workers

LENGTH: 326 wordsDATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR, June 29 2011

Malaysian and Bangladeshi officials will work together to fingerprint for the first time the estimated 500,000 Bangladeshis working legally and illegally in Malaysia, the home minister said Wednesday.

It is part of a wider scheme to fingerprint the about two million illegal immigrants in Malaysia, which depends on foreigners from mostly poorer regional countries to fill jobs in construction sites, plantations and other places shunned by locals.

Malaysia announced last week that it will offer amnesty to those who come forward from July 11 for two weeks. Some will be able to keep their jobs, while others will be deported without facing such penalties as caning for overstaying.

Home Minister Hishammuddin Hussein said Wednesday that Malaysia had struck a separate agreement with Bangladesh's High Commission to facilitate the registration of their workers, beginning immediately.

Under the deal, government officials may go to factories where Bangladeshis work to register them. The two countries will also share information to crack down on traffickers who exploit Bangladeshi workers.

"The objective is to... ensure that these people are not exploited either by human traffickers, syndicates or third parties," Hishammuddin said.

Malaysia remains on a US human trafficking watch list, according to the annual Trafficking in Persons Report, which the State Department released this week.

The report, which ranks countries in line with their efforts to combat human trafficking, said Malaysia did not effectively investigate and prosecute labour trafficking cases.

"There remain many serious concerns regarding trafficking in Malaysia, including the detention of trafficking victims in government facilities," the report said.

Hishammuddin admitted Malaysia was still in the process of tackling the problem.

"I agree with them. I think we should still be on the watchlist because we have only just rolled out these measures" such as fingerprinting workers, he said.

["Lebanon Among US Human Trafficking Blacklist" - The Daily Star Headline]

Washington - The Obama administration is expanding the number of countries that may face US sanctions for not doing enough to combat human trafficking.

In its annual Trafficking in Persons report released on Monday [27 June], the State Department identified 22 nations as failing to meet minimum international standards to curb the scourge, which claims mainly women and children as victims.

That's up from 13 in 2010. Another 41 countries were placed on a "watch list" that could lead to sanctions unless their records improve.

Among the countries on the blacklist are Cuba, Iran, Myanmar and North Korea along with frequent US foes Libya, Zimbabwe and Venezuela. Others include Saudi Arabia, Lebanon and Yemen.

The report also cited six nations for using child soldiers and not taking steps to end the practice.

Philippines out of trafficking watch list

BYLINE: Nathaniel R. Melican

SECTION: Pg. S1/11

LENGTH: 685 words

THE UNITED STATES has removed the Philippines from its trafficking in persons watch list given improving efforts in curbing the crime, a decision that effectively ensures continuous aid to the country.

"The Government of the Philippines does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so," the US State Department said of the Philippines in its Trafficking in Persons 2011 report released yesterday.

It cited the following efforts of the government against human trafficking:

- . * issuance by the Department of Justice and Supreme Court of directives to expedite the disposition of backlogged trafficking cases;
- . * conviction of 25 trafficking offenders from nine convictions in the previous year, including the Philippines' first two convictions in cases involving forced labor;
- . * filing of criminal cases against officials; and
- . * adoption of measures and policies to improve institutional responses to human trafficking.

The US expects more efforts to further stem the crime.

The report noted the resolution of remaining trafficking cases in courts; the need for vigorous efforts to pursue criminal prosecution of labor traffickers, including labor recruitment companies involved in the trafficking of migrant workers abroad; addressing rampant corruption at all levels that enables traffickers and undermines efforts to combat trafficking; and providing adequate protection for victims, particularly those assisting in the prosecution of cases.

Justice Secretary Leila M. de Lima welcomed the news of the Philippine upgrade to Tier 2 from Tier 2 watch list category.

"This is a big deal because if we have not been de-listed from the watch list, we could have lost some non-humanitarian financial aid from the US," she said.

"We're now out of danger in losing $700 million in non-humanitarian, non-trade aid from the United States," added Justice Undersecretary Jose Vicente B. Salazar, who is in charge of the Inter-Agency Council Against Trafficking.

The upgrade to Tier 2, which means that the country has yet to fully comply with benchmarks under the US Trafficking Victims Protection Act "but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards," avoided possible sanctions should the Philippines slip to Tier 3, or "countries whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so."

The sanctions, according to the US State Department, are withholding or withdrawal of US non-humanitarian, non-trade-related foreign assistance; withholding of funding for government employee participation in educational and cultural exchange programs; and US opposition to assistance (except for humanitarian, trade-related, and certain development-related assistance) from international financial institutions such as the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank.

Mr. Salazar expressed hope that with improvements in the government's anti-human trafficking drive, the Philippines will be upgraded to Tier 1 next year, which means the country is compliant with the minimum standards for elimination of trafficking.

"We will try to look for best practices [against trafficking that] we could implement here, strengthen partnerships with stakeholders such as nongovernment organizations, and bring more prosecution to trafficking cases," he said.

In Malacanang, Presidential Spokesman Edwin Lacierda echoed Mr. Salazar's commitment to pursue anti-human trafficking efforts.

"We're certainly going to improve our efforts at curbing human trafficking. Whatever Tier that we are required to be taken out, we're certainly going to do that - that's been a promise of this administration," he said.

Meanwhile, the US State Department also cited Zamboanga City Assistant City Prosecutor Darlene Pajarito as one of its anti-trafficking heroes for her outstanding work in prosecuting trafficking cases.

"Her successful record has shown other prosecutors the value of police-prosecutors cooperation in the development of strong cases against traffickers," the report read.

Malaysia hits back at US over trafficking watchlist

SECTION: ASIA PACIFICLENGTH: 173 wordsDATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR

Malaysia has hit back at the United States, after its latest report on human trafficking continued to put the country on its watchlist.

The US removed neighbouring Singapore, the Philippines and Laos from the watchlist, and put them at Tier 2, which means the countries do not fully meet its standards on human trafficking but are making efforts to do so.

Home Minister Hishammuddin Hussein said he is confident Malaysia will meet US standards once its anti-human trafficking measures are fully implemented.

Some of its new measures include a biometric system to fingerprint foreigners at all checkpoints.

It has also taken action against immigration officers found to be involved in human smuggling, and arrested heads of human trafficking syndicates.

And in a bid to break the business model of human smugglers, Malaysia said it fully supports Australia's proposed refugee swap deal.

It will also roll out an amnesty and legalisation programme to register hundreds of thousands of illegal migrant workers currently on its shores, starting July 11.

Ros-Lehtinen Says Venezuela's 'Tier 3' Trafficking Ranking Illustrates Chavez Regime's Ongoing Disregard of Venezuelans' Human Rights; House Foreign Affairs Committee News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 209 words

(WASHINGTON) - U.S. Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-FL), Chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, commented today on Venezuela's "Tier 3" classification by the State Department's 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report. A Tier 3 grade is the lowest grade possible, and denotes that a country does not meet minimum standards for combating human trafficking. Statement by Ros-Lehtinen:

"The Venezuelan regime's ongoing lack of compliance with the most basic trafficking standards has resulted in a drop back to Tier 3 on the State Department's trafficking report.

"According to the report, 'Venezuela is a source, transit, and destination country for men, women, and children subjected to sex trafficking and forced labor.' The report illustrates how the human rights and well-being of the Venezuelan people are not a concern for Chavez.

"Naturally, the regime in Caracas is alleging wrong-doing on the part of the United States in the compilation of this report. Instead of skirting responsibility and cynically pointing fingers, it is time for the regime to make a real effort to stop heinous crimes like sex trafficking being perpetrated against the Venezuelan people."

Citing Findings of Human Trafficking Report, Ros-Lehtinen Letter to Clinton Urges Suspension of Cuba Educational and Cultural Exchange Programs; House Foreign Affairs Committee News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 436 words

(WASHINGTON) - U.S. Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-FL), Chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, sent a letter to U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton urging the Administration to suspend educational and cultural exchange programs with Cuba, which are often used by the Castro regime for propaganda purposes. Ros-Lehtinen's letter comes as Cuba was again designated by the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report as a "Tier 3" country, which is defined as a country that does not comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. Text of the letter is as follows, and a signed copy may be viewed here.

June 28, 2011

The Honorable Hillary R. Clinton

Secretary

U.S. Department of State

Washington, DC 20521

Dear Secretary Clinton:

In light of the recent publication of the 2011 Trafficking In Persons Report, once again, Cuba ranks as a Tier 3 country. Cuba has been a Tier 3 country since 2003 as the regime continues to sexually exploit women, children, and oppresses the Cuban people. Due to the fact that the Cuban regime has not shown any progress regarding trafficking of persons, I would urge the administration, within all applicable rules and guidelines, to reverse its current policy and suspend all educational and cultural exchanges with the Cuban regime pursuant to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000.

According to U.S. law, "countries on Tier 3 may not receive funding for government employees' participation in educational and cultural exchange programs." Under the repressive Cuban regime, anyone who is involved in cultural and educational exchanges are direct employees of Raul and Fidel Castro. The tyrants use these exchanges as a political instrument to promote their communist agenda while maintaining absolute control over the daily lives of the Cuban people.

Last year, President Obama granted a partial waiver for Cuba to allow funding for educational and cultural exchanges. However, according to the 2011 report, the Cuban regime "does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to do so." This report clearly illustrates the failure of the Obama administration's partial waiver, particularly last year's, to improve or enhance the lives of the Cuban people. These exchanges only serve as a propaganda tool for the authoritative Castro brothers and do not help bring freedom and democracy to Cuba.

Thank you for your attention to this important matter.

Sincerely,

ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

Chairman

Philippines, Singapore out of US trafficking list

LENGTH: 636 words

DATELINE: Washington

Washington, June 29 -- The United States has removed the Philippines and Singapore from a human trafficking watchlist that had drawn concerns from the close allies, but it reported record abuses around the world. The State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report has become increasingly sensitive for Southeast Asian governments, which face a cutoff of US assistance if they are found to be unresponsive in fighting trafficking.

The latest report elevated the Philippines, Singapore and Laos off the watchlist to so-called Tier 2, which means that the countries do not fully meet standards on human trafficking but are making efforts to do so.

Indonesia and Cambodia stayed at Tier 2, but Brunei, Malaysia, Thailand and Vietnam remained on the watchlist. The only Asian jurisdictions on Tier 1, meaning full compliance, were South Korea and Taiwan.

Releasing the report, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said that as many as 27 million men, women and children suffered from trafficking around the world for sexual exploitation or forced labour.

"Unfortunately, because of the ease of transportation and the global communications that can reach deep into villages with promises and pictures of what a better life might be, we now see that more human beings are exploited than before," Hillary said.

But US allies have sometimes responded indignantly. Singapore last year lashed out at being put on the watchlist and urged the United States to examine its own record, including the treatment of its millions of illegal residents.

The United States gave itself a Tier 1 ranking but offered details about problems at home, including allegations of exploitation by federal contractors.

"I don't think it's fair for us to rank others if we don't look hard at who we are and what we're doing," Hillary said.

In the Philippines, President Benigno Aquino took the unusual step of saying in April that his country was off the watchlist, leading US officials to clarify that no decision had yet been made. In today's report, the State Department praised an "intensified effort" by the Philippines. It said the Philippines convicted 25 trafficking offenders, compared with nine the previous year, including first-ever convictions for forced labour.

Elsewhere in Asia, the State Department removed Sri Lanka and Fiji from its watchlist. It praised Sri Lanka -- often on the receiving end of criticism over human rights -- for its first convictions under an anti-trafficking law on the island, which is a major source of workers to abuse-prone Arab countries.

On the other hand, the United States downgraded the Federated States of Micronesia to Tier 3, meaning that some assistance will be suspended to the nation of more than 600 islands that is closely linked to the United States.

The report said that Micronesian traffickers have forced women into prostitution in the United States with promises of well-paying jobs.

The State Department said that Micronesian waters are believed to be rife with trafficking but that the government has not conducted any investigations into the problem.

Myanmar, North Korea and Papua New Guinea remained at Tier 3. In a change this year ordered by the US Congress, countries that stay on the watchlist for two consecutive years now automatically drop to Tier 3 -- although the administration can order an exemption. "Two years of warning is enough. The Obama administration has again abandoned trafficking victims in China -- who are predominantly women. It's shameful," said Smith, a Republican from New Jersey. "Our obligation is to the victims of trafficking, not the dictatorship," he said Published by HT Syndication with permission from Daily Pak Banker. For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

Gulf nations top US list of slave trade offenders

LENGTH: 1024 words

In a report that has drawn attention from civil rights organisations and the media across the world, the US state department has put out a report on human trafficking that puts the Democratic Republic of Congo, North Korea, Saudi Arabia and Iran among the worst offenders.

The department's 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report assesses efforts by 184 governments worldwide to fight sexual exploitation, forced labour, and modern-day slavery.

The report, released on Monday, put Estonia and Belarus on its human trafficking watchlist. It also maintained Russia on the list for the eighth consecutive year for the same alleged failures. These countries failed in the last year to step up efforts to fight prostitution and forced labour, it said.

The Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report is the US government's principal diplomatic tool to engage foreign governments on human trafficking. It represents an updated, global look at the nature and scope of trafficking in persons and the broad range of government actions to confront and eliminate it.

Considered one of the most comprehensive analyses of worldwide human trafficking, the report ranks countries in three "tiers", depending on how much effort they are making to control the problem.

In the top tier are those that fully comply with minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. In the second tier are those that do not fully comply but "are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance"; and in the bottom tier are those that "neither satisfy the minimum standards nor demonstrate a significant effort to come into compliance".

The bottom tier is dominated by Arab countries, including staunch US allies like Saudi Arabia and Kuwait - not to mention Brunei. They are ranked alongside the usual suspects like Cuba and North Korea.

Iran is among the countries the report describes as "a source, transit, and destination country for men, women, and children subjected to sex trafficking and forced labour."

It says a large part of the problem in the wealthier Arab countries is the extensive use of foreign labour - especially those employed in domestic service, construction and sanitation.

The state department's analysis also lists several countries as "special cases," noting that conditions severely restrict government ability to address trafficking there.

Haiti was on that list for a sixth consecutive year. This year's report says massive destruction in the 2010 earthquake crippled the country's ability to fight trafficking. Ivory Coast and Somalia also were on that list.

Opprobrium for Switzerland; India evades notice

Among the 'mature democracies', it was surprising for many to see Switzerland as low as tier II. The review noted that Swiss law does not bar prostitution by 16 and 17-year-olds in all cases. Last year's report demoted the country from the top tier of its rankings for that reason.

The new report said that Switzerland had taken important legal steps to correct the problem, but needs to do more.

India does not figure in the list of worst offenders, as our planners will no doubt be thrilled to note. But it is worth remarking that in a survey by the independent Thomson Reuters Foundation released last month, India was ranked the fourth-worst place in the world to be a woman (See: India fourth-worst place to be a woman: survey (http://www.domain-b.com/economy/general/20110615_woman.html)).

The US report also takes into account crimes against women. But according to Thomson Reuters, India ranks lower than Somalia, and just ahead of Congo, on this front.

Indian human rights association The Body Shop India, along with the international outfit ECPAT, plan to present over 300,000 petitions against human trafficking to the union government this July.

"We have never shied away from tackling controversial issues and causes that others would avoid. Indeed it was one of the dying wishes of our late founder, Dame Anita Roddick, that the 'modern-day slave trade' be brought to an end," Shriti Malhotra, chief operation officer of The Body Shop India, told IANS

Ravi Kant of Shakti Vahini said, "Every year, an estimated 1.2 million children and young people are trafficked, becoming victims of sexual exploitation and abuse. Human trafficking is the third largest international crime after illegal drugs and arms trafficking.

"It exists in every continent, region and country in the world. We have called for this action to ensure that child victims of trafficking will have safe shelters and protection which will help their rehabilitation."

Big numbers

The State Department says 27 million people are victims of human trafficking worldwide, and approximately 100,000 of those victims are in the United States.

In the report's preface, secretary of state Hillary Clinton describes her visit to a shelter for trafficking survivors last year.

"I was embraced by children who should have been in grade school, but were instead recovering from having been enslaved in a brothel.

"We know trafficking in persons affects every region and every country in the world, but looking into the eyes of those girls and hearing their stories firsthand brought home for me once again the very real and personal tragedy of modern slavery."

The report looks at how traffickers operate, what kinds of victims are exploited, and most importantly, what governments are and are not doing to protect vulnerable people.

While some countries are repeat offenders, the official tasked with coordinating the US response to human trafficking says the State Department has seen a "decade of progress" in developing tools for prevention, protection, and prosecution of traffickers since it released its first human trafficking report 11 years ago.

For example, 148 countries have signed on to the Palermo Protocol, the international effort headed by the United Nations to combat trafficking, and 130 countries around the world have enacted laws criminalising all forms of human trafficking, a department official said.

But while there have been advances in addressing the problem, the number of victims identified and the number of traffickers prosecuted has "flattened" around the world.

US: Israel not doing enough to fight human trafficking. State Department report recommends steps government should take to improve situation

BYLINE: BEN HARTMAN

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 5

LENGTH: 1016 words

Israel is not fully complying with the minimal standards to eliminate human trafficking, but is making considerable efforts to do so, according to the US State Department's 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report released on Monday.

While Israeli authorities have taken steps to fight human trafficking, "the government continued to take inadequate steps, however, to identify and protect labor trafficking victims and prosecute and convict labor trafficking offenders in the reporting period," the report states.

The report refers to Israel as "a destination country for men and women subjected to forced labor and sex trafficking."

It recommends a series of steps to improve the situation, and calls on authorities to "significantly increase prosecutions, convictions, and punishment of labor trafficking offenders (including "employers") and offenses; ensure that labor trafficking crimes are prosecuted under labor trafficking statutes; and ensure trafficking victims are not penalized for unlawful acts committed as a direct result of being trafficked."

It also calls for the government to deploy more labor inspectors and translators to work in sectors that employ a high numbers of foreign workers, and to bring an end to practices such as "binding," which restrict workers' ability to change their employers in Israel, as well as illegal brokerage fees.

The Trafficking in Persons report ranks Israel as a tier-two country on its three-tier system. Tier-two countries are ones "whose governments do not fully comply with the Trafficking Victims Protection Act minimum standards but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards."

First-tier countries are those that are complying with the Trafficking Victims Protection Act's minimum standards, while third tier countries do not comply, and are not making significant efforts to do so.

Israel has company on the second-tier with a large number of Middle East countries and third-world nations, but also European countries such as Switzerland, Greece, Hungary, and Iceland. Third-tier Middle East nations include Algeria, Libya, Saudi Arabia and Iran.

In regard to the thousands of Africans who were trafficked across the Sinai peninsula into Israel in 2010, the report calls on Israel to "strengthen victim identification of migrants arriving from Sinai, and accord those trafficking victims full protections and medical treatment."

It also calls for an immediate end to the practice of "hot return," wherein migrants are caught and immediately sent back to Egypt, where they are often killed or sent back to the countries they fled.

The report offered some praise for "strong law enforcement progress" against sex trafficking and labor trafficking, including the first prosecution of an offender charged with trafficking a migrant worker.

Israel's 2006 Anti-Trafficking Law provides for penalties of up to 16 years imprisonment for trafficking an adult and up to 20 years for trafficking a child. In addition, it allows courts to sentence offenders to up to 16 years imprisonment for slavery and seven years for forced labor.

While the report says "these penalties are sufficiently stringent and commensurate with those prescribed for other serious crimes, such as rape," it states that in 2010 seven sex traffickers were convicted under trafficking statutes and received sentences ranging from six months community service to 8.5 years in prison with damages paid to the victim. In addition, the report cites the conviction of six sex traffickers on non-trafficking statutes who received sentences ranging from 24 months to 7.5 years.

Israel has "continued to improve its protection of trafficking victims over the reporting period," even though the government "lacked effective procedures to identify victims of labor trafficking, including migrant workers and migrants who entered from the Sinai," the report states.

As a result, many unidentified victims have been prosecuted for labor violations, it states.

The government "made sustained progress in preventing trafficking in persons over the reporting period," according to the report, which mentioned the opening of several investigations and prosecutions of employees who charged illegal recruitment fees and an amendment to the Foreign Workers Law passed in November 2010 that gives inspectors the authority to enter and examine private households where migrants are employed.

In addition, the report cites the opening of "456 cases of managing a property for the purpose of engaging persons in prostitution and 27 cases of advertisement of prostitution services, in efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts."

Upon the report's release on Monday, US Secretary State Hillary Clinton said that in recent years, "governments have taken important steps, but we have to really mix the commitments with actions in order to get results. For example, the number of prosecutions worldwide has remained relatively static. And so the measure of success can no longer be whether a country has passed laws, because so many have in the last decade; now we have to make sure those laws are implemented and that countries are using the tools that have been created for that."

MK Orit Zuaretz (Kadima), head of the Knesset Subcommittee on Trafficking of Women, said the report "compels the State of Israel re-examine its methods of treatment, prevention and enforcement in light of the changes in the patterns of human trafficking. The State of Israel is still located in the second tier of countries due to the fact that Israel has not done enough to examine the new phenomenon of human trafficking taking place on the southern border of Israel and in the [smuggler-run] torture camps in Sinai.

Zuaretz accused the government of "not dealing seriously enough with the changes in the patterns of human trafficking - trafficking of migrant workers and refugees. The current report shed lights on the fact that the State of Israel is ignoring its responsibility to take the right measures to wage war on this contemptible phenomenon taking place in Israel's backyard."

Gov't plans special unit to combat human trafficking

LENGTH: 849 words

By Hani Hazaimh AMMAN - A specialised anti-human trafficking unit is expected to be established in 'a few months' to be operated by the Public Security Department (PSD) in cooperation with the labour and justice ministries, a labour ministry official said on Tuesday. "The unit will be funded by the ministry and will be supplied with specialised staff from the three stakeholders, particularly a team of experts in social services. The trafficking in humans in Jordan has not evolved into a phenomenon but we are taking measures beforehand in order to address cases as they arise," Labour Minister Mahmoud Kafawin told The Jordan Times, responding to a US report issued on human trafficking on Monday. The report, issued by the US State Department, charged that the government has accomplished little to implement its national anti-trafficking action plan in 2010. It also noted that the Kingdom 'did not finalise guidelines for establishing and operating a facility to provide shelter and other forms of assistance to trafficking victims.

It failed to enforce its bylaws that provide standards for employing domestic workers and operating recruitment agencies, and did not launch an anti-trafficking public awareness campaign'. However, the report showed that Jordan has kept its classification at Tier 2 for the third year in a row. US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton was quoted in the report as saying that the US defines trafficking in persons to include 'all of the conduct involved in forced labour as well as the trafficking of adults and children for commercial sexual exploitation'. Clinton added: 'The true test of a country's anti-trafficking efforts is not just whether a government has enacted strong laws consistent with that approach, but whether these laws are being implemented broadly and effectively.

In short, it's whether they deliver.' Regarding Jordan, the document described the country as 'a destination and transit country for adults and children subjected to forced labour and, to a lesser extent, sex trafficking..., while Jordanian children employed within the country as mechanics, agricultural labourers and beggars may be exploited in situations of forced labour'. It claimed that Jordan's sponsorship system binds foreign workers to their designated employers without adequate access to legal recourse when they face abuse and without the ability to switch employers, thereby placing a significant amount of power in the hands of employers and recruitment agencies. Responding to that, Kafawin said the ministry's directorate of health and inspection is carrying out thousands of field checks in order to ensure employers' abidance by labour regulations. 'We are in the process of establishing a new section under the directorate of health and inspection which will be specifically tasked with protecting labourers' rights and ensuring employers' compliance with relevant laws,' the minister said. The US report also touched on the recruitment conditions of the domestic helpers who come from abroad to work in the Kingdom as many of them are subjected to conditions of forced labour after arrival, citing approximately 480 Filipina, Indonesian and Sri Lankan domestic workers, most of whom had fled conditions indicative of forced labour and were sheltered at their respective embassies in Amman at the conclusion of the reporting period. Commending government efforts to combat trafficking in humans, the report said over the past 12 months progress was achieved in enforcing regulations restricting garment sector employers from withholding their workers' passports, responding to labour complaints made by factory workers, waiving migrant domestic workers' accumulated overstay fines and punishing a small number of individuals for crimes of forced labour against domestic workers. The government endorsed the Anti-Human Trafficking Law of 2008 in March 2009, which prohibits all forms of trafficking and prescribes penalties of six months to 10 years imprisonment for forced prostitution, child trafficking, trafficking of women and girls, and trafficking crimes involving other aggravating circumstances, the report noted. However, it said that although these penalties are sufficiently stringent, they are not commensurate with those for other serious crimes, such as rape. Over the past year, the government investigated and prosecuted several cases involving forced labour and forced prostitution, said the report, adding that the PSD investigated 12 cases involving the exploitation of domestic workers and referred six cases to the courts. With respect to protection, the report said the government made inadequate efforts to protect victims of trafficking during the last year, but it did not provide any specialised services to trafficking victims. Meanwhile, the government's efforts to prevent trafficking decreased during the reporting period as it did not conduct any information or education campaigns beyond the labour inspectorate's provision of brief awareness raising workshops for workers in garment factories, said the report. 29 June 2011

500,000 BANGLADESHIS IN M'SIA TO BE REGISTERED THROUGH BIOMETRIC SYSTEM

LENGTH: 440 words

DATELINE: PUTRAJAYA June 29

All Bangladesh nationals in the country, estimated to be around 500,000 legal and illegal, will be registered through the biometric system in cooperation with the Bangladesh government.

Home Minister Datuk Seri Hishammuddin Hussein said the programme, which was also part of an amnesty exercise announced recently, could resolve the illegal immigrant problem, besides addressing the threats of transnational crime by curbing illegal activities, including human smuggling and trafficking.

"The objective is to stop the exploitation of these people by human traffickers, syndicates or third parties because we feel that on humanitarian reason alone, we have to fight this all out," he told reporters at a joint press conference with the Bangladesh High Commissioner to Malaysia, Atiqur Rehman, here today.

Hishammuddin said the process would be coordinated by the Home Ministry's secretary-general Tan Sri Mahmood Adam on the macro level, to look at how the process could be done immediately, while its deputy secretary-general (Registration and Immigration) Datuk Alwi Ibrahim would look into the registration process.

He said Immigration director-general Datuk Alias Ahmad would look into the operational side, and 1,400 officers had already been identified to assist in the process.

The methods and time frame for registration would be announced later by the person in charge, he said.

Hishammuddin said the ministry would also be working with the other ministries including the Human Resource Ministry and Plantation Industries and Commodities Ministry so that any ministry which required workers could absorb those already here, without bringing in new workers.

Police and intelligence agencies from both countries had also been asked to come on board to monitor the movement of international syndicates of human trafficking, he said.

Hishammuddin also said that Malaysia was still on the United States' human trafficking watch list as the measures to encounter the issue had just been rolled out, including the introduction of the biometric system.

"I would like them to keep watching. And if after all these (measures) have been undertaken but we are still on the watch list, then I think they themselves are not doing their job," he said.

The US State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report released on Monday had maintained Malaysia on the watch list while the Philippines and Singapore were removed from it.

Asked whether he could see Malaysia to be out of the list by next year, Hishammuddin said: "We will see, because all this will depend on our effort and how fast we can do it, but I am doing it in a pragmatic and realistic way."

India removed from human-trafficking 'watch-list' by US

LENGTH: 769 words

DATELINE: Washington

Washington, June 29 -- After a gap of six years, the United States has taken India off the human trafficking 'Watch List' for making significant efforts in combating the menace. In its annual Trafficking in Persons report, the State Department has upgraded India to Tier 2 countries after keeping it on a 'Watch List' for six years.

The Watch List is for those countries where the number of victims of severe forms of trafficking is very significant or is significantly increasing and there is a failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat it.

Tier 2 is for those countries whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act's (TVPA) but are making significant efforts in this regard.

"The Government of India does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so," the State Department said in its report justifying its decision to upgrade India's position.

The report analysed conditions in 184 countries and ranked them in terms of their effectiveness in fighting the human trafficking.

It has identified 23 nations as failing to meet minimum international standards to curb the scourge, which claims mainly women and children as victims. That's up from 13 in 2010. Another 41 countries were placed on the "watch list" that could lead to sanctions unless their records improve. "All countries can and must do more," Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said while releasing the report. "More human beings are being exploited today than ever before." "The Ministry of Home Affairs' launched the government's 'Comprehensive Scheme for Strengthening Law Enforcement Response in India', which seeks to improve India's overall law enforcement response to all forms of trafficking, including bonded labor, and established at least 87 new Anti Human Trafficking Units (AHTUs)," the State Department said.

"The government also ratified the 2000 UN TIP Protocol. The government took important law enforcement steps by convicting several bonded labor offenders with sentences between five and 14 years and improved rescue and rehabilitation efforts for bonded laborers.-PTI

Sri Lanka among Tier 2 countries

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL; Pg. 1

LENGTH: 310 words

WASHINGTON - Although Sri Lanka does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking, the country is making significant efforts to do so, a report on human trafficking said.

The 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report released this week by the United States Secretary of State Hilary Clinton placed Sri Lanka among Tier 2 countries, Colombo Page reported.

Tier 2 countries are the countries whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards.

Sri Lanka is yet to ratify the United Nations TIP protocol of 2000, the protocol to prevent, suppress, and punish trafficking in persons, especially women and children.

The report noted that the Sri Lankan government convicted three traffickers, in the first case under its anti-trafficking legislation, and rejuvenated its inter-agency task force.

"However, serious problems remain unaddressed, such as the detention of identified trafficking victims (including those who provided evidence to support the three convictions), the failure to achieve criminal convictions for fraudulent recruitment agencies involved in trafficking in persons, and official complicity in human trafficking," the TIP report noted.

The report said Sri Lanka is primarily a source and to a much lesser extent, a destination for men, women, and children subjected to forced labor and sex trafficking.

The report recommended among other things for the government of Sri Lanka to vigorously investigate and prosecute suspected trafficking offenses, and convict and punish trafficking offenders, particularly those responsible for recruiting victims with fraudulent offers of employment and excessive commission fees for the purpose of subjecting them to forced labor.

US expands human trafficking blacklist

LENGTH: 486 words

DATELINE: New York

New York, June 29 -- The Obama administration on Monday nearly doubled the number of countries that may face U.S. sanctions for not doing enough to combat human trafficking, calling on those and other nations to get serious and take tough steps to eradicate the lucrative illicit practice. In its annual Trafficking in Persons report, the State Department identified 23 nations as failing to meet minimum international standards to curb the scourge, which claims mainly women and children as victims. That's up from 13 in 2010. Another 41 countries were placed on a "watch list" that could lead to sanctions unless their records improve.

The report analyzed conditions in 184 nations, including the United States, and ranked them in terms of their effectiveness in fighting what many have termed modern-day slavery. The State Department estimates that as many as 27 million men, women and children are living in such bondage around the world.

"All countries can and must do more," Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton said in presenting the report. "More human beings are being exploited today than ever before."

"We're at critical moment in this fight," she said. "The problem of modern trafficking may be entrenched, and it may seem like there is no end in sight. But if we act on the laws that have been passed and the commitments that have been made, it is solvable. If we increase the pressure on traffickers and the networks they thrive in, we can set ourselves on a course to one day eradicate modern slavery."

Republican Rep. Chris Smith, an author of the law that established the report and offered protection to trafficking victims, said he was "deeply disappointed" that China was given a political waiver despite its continuing and expanding problem of human trafficking, particularly sex-trafficking of women and girls.

"This political waiver for China is totally unacceptable," Smith said. "The Obama administration has again abandoned trafficking victims in China, who are predominantly women. It's shameful."

Among the countries on the blacklist are Cuba, Iran, Myanmar, North Korea and Sudan along with frequent U.S. foes Eritrea, Libya and Zimbabwe. Others are U.S. allies in the Middle East like Kuwait and Saudi Arabia while Papua New Guinea was cited as a repeat offender. Only one country, the Dominican Republic, was removed from the list.

The 11 new countries on the blacklist are Algeria, the Central African Republic, Equatorial Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Lebanon, Libya, Madagascar, Micronesia, Turkmenistan, Venezuela and Yemen.

Separately, the report also cited six nations - Chad, Congo, Myanmar, Somalia, Sudan and Yemen - for using child soldiers and not taking steps to end the practice. CITING FINDINGS OF HUMAN TRAFFICKING REPORT, ROS-LEHTINEN LETTER TO CLINTON URGES SUSPENSION OF CUBA EDUCATIONAL AND CULTURAL EXCHANGE PROGRAMS

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 436 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. House of Representatives Committee on Foreign Affairs:

U.S. Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-FL), Chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, sent a letter to U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton urging the Administration to suspend educational and cultural exchange programs with Cuba, which are often used by the Castro regime for propaganda purposes. Ros-Lehtinen's letter comes as Cuba was again designated by the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report as a "Tier 3" country, which is defined as a country that does not comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. Text of the letter is as follows, and a signed copy may be viewed here.

The Honorable Hillary R. Clinton

Secretary

U.S. Department of State

Washington, DC 20521

Dear Secretary Clinton:

In light of the recent publication of the 2011 Trafficking In Persons Report, once again, Cuba ranks as a Tier 3 country. Cuba has been a Tier 3 country since 2003 as the regime continues to sexually exploit women, children, and oppresses the Cuban people. Due to the fact that the Cuban regime has not shown any progress regarding trafficking of persons, I would urge the administration, within all applicable rules and guidelines, to reverse its current policy and suspend all educational and cultural exchanges with the Cuban regime pursuant to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000.

According to U.S. law, "countries on Tier 3 may not receive funding for government employees' participation in educational and cultural exchange programs." Under the repressive Cuban regime, anyone who is involved in cultural and educational exchanges are direct employees of Raul and Fidel Castro. The tyrants use these exchanges as a political instrument to promote their communist agenda while maintaining absolute control over the daily lives of the Cuban people.

Last year, President Obama granted a partial waiver for Cuba to allow funding for educational and cultural exchanges. However, according to the 2011 report, the Cuban regime "does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to do so." This report clearly illustrates the failure of the Obama administration's partial waiver, particularly last year's, to improve or enhance the lives of the Cuban people. These exchanges only serve as a propaganda tool for the authoritative Castro brothers and do not help bring freedom and democracy to Cuba.

Thank you for your attention to this important matter.

Sincerely,

ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

ROS-LEHTINEN SAYS VENEZUELA'S 'TIER 3' TRAFFICKING RANKING ILLUSTRATES CHAVEZ REGIME'S ONGOING DISREGARD OF VENEZUELAN'S HUMAN RIGHTS

Statement by Ros-Lehtinen:

"The Venezuelan regime's ongoing lack of compliance with the most basic trafficking standards has resulted in a drop back to Tier 3 on the State Department's trafficking report.

"According to the report, 'Venezuela is a source, transit, and destination country for men, women, and children subjected to sex trafficking and forced labor.' The report illustrates how the human rights and well-being of the Venezuelan people are not a concern for Chavez.

"Naturally, the regime in Caracas is alleging wrong-doing on the part of the United States in the compilation of this report. Instead of skirting responsibility and cynically pointing fingers, it is time for the regime to make a real effort to stop heinous crimes like sex trafficking being perpetrated against the Venezuelan people."

THE LABOR SECRETARY ON THE US STATE DEPARTMENT'S TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT, JUNE 29, 2011BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 601 wordsDATELINE: MANILA

The following information was released by the Office of the President of the Philippines:

Labor and Employment Secretary Rosalinda Dimapilis-Baldoz:

On the U.S. State Department's 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report on the Philippines

We are happy to note that the US State Department has removed the Philippines from Tier 2 Special Watch list and reassessed and upgraded it to Tier 2 on its 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report. This is, without doubt, a recognition of the concerted efforts through partnership and cooperation of the public and private sectors eliminating the scourge of human trafficking in the country.

We are also glad to note of the recognition accorded by the report on the efforts of the DOLE and its family of agencies in the prevention of human trafficking. In the past year, we have established task forces on illegal recruitment and trafficking in Cebu, Clark, and Zamboanga. These task forces have been cited for their speedy rescue of workers, in cooperation with the CIDG of the PNP, DSWD, DOJ and the Visayan Forum. For instance, the Regional Inter-Agency Coalition for Anti-Trafficking (RIACAT) in Region 9 (Zamboanga) have been expanded to include the Silliman University Alumni Association. The Task Force Against Trafficking in Cebu and Negros Oriental are already in place. Bahay Silongan is provided for victims of trafficking.

We are particularly proud of our cooperative work with Darlene Pajarito, the Zamboanga City assistant prosecutor who has secured the country's first known labor trafficking conviction in February 2011 and who has been cited as a hero in the 2011 Report. The DOLE Regional Office in Zamboanga City, through the POEA, fully supported Ms. Pajarito in her successful prosecution of the case.

We continue to forge alliances with local governments and private sector organizations in Anti-Illegal Recruitment (AIR). POEA has intensified its AIR campaign through cooperative alliances with LGUs and private organizations and has signed close to 300 Memoranda of Understanding (MOU) with local governments by providing them with orientation seminars and capacity building programs, including regular and timely update on licensed recruitment agencies, and establishment of help desks in local government units. Under the new Administration, the POEA works under the Regional Coordinating Council headed by the DOLE Regional Director for convergence and effective implementation.

In working towards the neutralization of Human Trafficking Activities, the DOLE is also pursuing efforts to provide legal and other appropriate assistance to victims while working to prevent the occurrence of human trafficking activities by fully implementing the country's Anti-Trafficking in Persons' Act of 2003. The DOLE, POEA, and OWWA, in coordination with our Philippine Labor Attaches, are assisting victims to bring the prosecution of the criminal cases to a successful conviction of the perpetrators.

"The Report challenges us to intensify some more our preventive programs and activities to increase our contribution to the national effort.

Under the Labor and Employment Plan 2011-2016, for example, our strategy to expand social protection for Filipino migrant workers call for, among others, intensified anti-illegal recruitment and anti-trafficking in persons programs in compliance with RA 8042, as amended by RA 10022 and RA 9208 and the development, adoption, and maintenance of an accurate global tracking system to monitor the conditions of our OFWs upon their deployment and eventual return, and strengthening the PEOs, PDOs and PAOs.

US takes S'pore off its human trafficking watch list

BYLINE: Chua Chin Hon, US Bureau Chief

SECTION: PRIME NEWS

LENGTH: 711 words

WASHINGTON: Singapore has been removed from a United States government watch list for human trafficking, according to a new report which acknowledges 'significant efforts' on the part of the city state to meet minimum standards for tackling the problem.

Ambassador Luis CdeBaca, who heads US efforts to combat human trafficking, also expressed optimism that some of the recent steps taken by Singapore, such as adopting the United Nations' definitions of trafficking and the setting up of an inter-agency task force, would produce results within the year.

One initiative by Singapore which caught his eye: issuing name-card-sized checklists to help police officers identify trafficking victims, rather than waiting for the victims to identify themselves.

Holding up one such checklist at a press conference yesterday, the US diplomat said: 'These types of things change the dynamic because it's not up to the individual cop in Singapore to know all these fancy definitions (of trafficking).

'It is that kind of innovation that was lacking over the last decade in Singapore. The fact that Singapore is exhibiting the political will to show this kind of innovation over the last six months is a very positive thing for the entire Asean region.'

The Philippines and Laos were also taken off the watch list this year.

In a response to its removal from the watch list, the Republic said it noted the change, and called trafficking in persons 'an abhorrent international crime which the Singapore Government responds to robustly'.

It added: 'But we are dismayed to find the US TIP Report riddled with inaccuracies in the section on Singapore.

'Such a casual approach to the facts is troubling.'

Singapore was placed on the so-called 'Tier 2 watch list' for the first time last year by the annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report.

Since the US State Department began publishing the report in 2001, the city state had mostly been placed on 'Tier 2', a classification for countries which do not fully meet international standards but are taking significant efforts to meet those requirements.

The 2010 report said Singapore was placed on the watch list because the Government did not show more effort in identifying and protecting the victims of forced labour and sex trafficking, or in prosecuting the perpetrators.

Singapore declared last year's report 'superficial and perfunctory at best'.

US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton acknowledged some of the report's shortcomings yesterday. Speaking at a ceremony to launch the 2011 edition, she said: 'The number of prosecutions worldwide has remained relatively static.

'And so the measure of success can no longer be whether a country has passed laws, because so many have in the last decade. Now we have to make sure that laws are implemented and that countries are using the tools that have been created for that.'

Modern travel has worsened the problem of trafficking, with an estimated 27 million children, women and men across 184 countries affected.

Mrs Clinton called on governments to work with non-governmental organisations (NGOs) in developing 'new mechanisms' on protecting victims and prosecuting perpetrators.

She pledged that US diplomats around the world would work closely with their host countries to implement the report's recommendations.

Ambassador CdeBaca said separately that he would be in Singapore and the region next week for talks with government agencies and NGOs.

This year's report urged Singapore to investigate and prosecute a greater number of labour and sex trafficking cases, and punish companies that forcefully repatriate migrant workers who complain of harsh working conditions.

It also recommended that Singapore devote more resources towards protecting and educating trafficking victims about the legal recourse available to them, as well as ratify the United Nations' Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons.

Singapore is one of the few countries yet to sign the treaty - the first legally binding document on human trafficking.

The Ministry of Home Affairs had said in the past that Singapore would sign the UN treaty when it was satisfied with 'domestic measures put in place to ensure adherence' to it.

Nigeria; Country Maintains Tier 1 Status in Anti-Human Trafficking

BYLINE: Daily Trust (Abuja)

LENGTH: 166 words

The US annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report released yesterday showed Nigeria has maintained its tier 1 status for three years running.

Countries assessed as fully complying with the "minimum standards for the elimination of severe forms of trafficking" set forth in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) are classified as tier 1. Countries assessed as not fully complying with the minimum standards but making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those minimum standards are classified as tier 2.

Countries assessed as not complying with the minimum standards for making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance are classified as Tier 3.

Responding to the report, Executive Secretary of the National Agency for the Prohibition of Traffic in Persons and Other Related Matters (NAPTIP) Barrister Simon Chuzi Egede said it is not yet uhuru when children are being stigmatized as witches and wizards in Akwa-Ibom, Nasarawa, Kaduna and Taraba states.

Singapore blasts US over trafficking report

LENGTH: 386 wordsDATELINE: Singapore, June 28 2011

Singapore lambasted Washington Tuesday for what it said were numerous "inaccuracies" in a damning human trafficking report, while tentatively welcoming the city-state's removal from a watchlist.

The State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report, released Monday, elevated Singapore's ranking to Tier 2, which means that while it does not fully meet standards on human trafficking, it is making efforts to do so.

This effectively removed Singapore from a group of countries put on the human trafficking watchlist.

"We note the change to Singapore's tier ranking... but we are dismayed to find the US TIP report riddled with inaccuracies in the section on Singapore," the foreign ministry said in a statement.

"Such a casual approach to the facts is troubling."

The ministry took exception to the US report about forced labour on fishing vessels originating from Singapore, which it said was "untrue and unverified."

It urged the United States to "thoroughly investigate the 'reports' before faulting us for not pursuing our 'phantom' ships," the ministry said.

Singapore also took the United States to task for saying that trafficking victims were not afforded the opportunity to avail themselves of medical and other services at shelters over the past year.

"We are puzzled by this statement," the ministry said, adding it had given the US details of the assistance it extended to trafficking victims.

"While we can acknowledge that much remains to be done in our fight against trafficking, we are disappointed that the United States chose to blatantly dismiss the facts and suggest that we are not doing our share," it said.

Singapore said the US had "again unabashedly" given itself the top Tier 1 ranking despite inadequacies in its own approach to human trafficking.

It cited a New York Times report which said that teenage girls coerced into prostitution in the US are treated not as trafficking victims but as "miscreants who are arrested and prosecuted, instead of protected."

"As is well known, the United States also suffers from serious problems with illegal immigrants, many of whom are trafficked by well-organised criminal gangs which seem to be able to operate with impunity," the ministry said.

"On any objective criteria, the United States has a more serious TIP problem compared with Singapore."

Philippines hails US trafficking list removal

LENGTH: 256 wordsDATELINE: MANILA, June 28 2011

The Philippine government on Tuesday hailed the removal of the country from a US human trafficking watchlist, while pledging to do more to combat the global problem.

Philippine President Benigno Aquino's spokesman said success in prosecuting human traffickers had led to the US action, announced by Secretary of State Hillary Clinton on Monday.

"We're happy that our efforts are being recognised and we hope our citizens are assured that we are doing what we can to prevent them from being victimised," spokesmen Ricky Carandang said in a statement.

"We will not rest on our laurels."

The latest report elevated the Philippines, Singapore and Laos from the watchlist to so-called Tier 2, meaning that the countries still do not fully meet standards on human trafficking but are making efforts to do so.

If they had remained on Tier 3, they faced US foreign aid being cut off.

The US government praised an "intensified effort" by the Philippines, which it said convicted 25 trafficking offenders over the past year, compared with nine in the previous 12 months.

Some of the recent cases include the country's first-ever convictions for forced labour.

About a million people leave the Philippines every year in search of work, with about nine million currently living abroad, according to official estimates.

Releasing the report, Clinton said Monday that as many as 27 million men, women and children suffered from trafficking around the world for sexual exploitation or forced labour. Asian countries figure prominently in the list.

Philippines, Singapore off US trafficking watchlist

LENGTH: 635 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 27 2011

The United States on Monday removed the Philippines and Singapore from a human trafficking watchlist that had drawn concerns from the close allies, but it reported record abuses around the world.

The State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report has become increasingly sensitive for Southeast Asian governments, which face a cutoff of US assistance if they are found to be unresponsive in fighting trafficking.

The latest report elevated the Philippines, Singapore and Laos off the watchlist to so-called Tier 2, which means that the countries do not fully meet standards on human trafficking but are making efforts to do so.

Indonesia and Cambodia stayed at Tier 2, but Brunei, Malaysia, Thailand and Vietnam remained on the watchlist. The only Asian jurisdictions on Tier 1, meaning full compliance, were South Korea and Taiwan.

Releasing the report, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said that as many 27 million men, women and children suffered from trafficking around the world for sexual exploitation or forced labor.

"Unfortunately, because of the ease of transportation and the global communications that can reach deep into villages with promises and pictures of what a better life might be, we now see that more human beings are exploited than before," Clinton said.

But US allies have sometimes responded indignantly. Singapore last year lashed out at being put on the watchlist and urged the United States to examine its own record, including the treatment of its millions of illegal residents.

The United States gave itself a Tier 1 ranking but offered details about problems at home, including allegations of exploitation by federal contractors.

"I don't think it's fair for us to rank others if we don't look hard at who we are and what we're doing," Clinton said.

In the Philippines, President Benigno Aquino took the unusual step of saying in April that his country was off the watchlist, leading US officials to clarify that no decision had yet been made.

In Monday's report, the State Department praised an "intensified effort" by the Philippines. It said the Philippines convicted 25 trafficking offenders, compared with nine the previous year, including first-ever convictions for forced labor.

Elsewhere in Asia, the State Department removed Sri Lanka and Fiji from its watchlist. It praised Sri Lanka -- often on the receiving end of criticism over human rights -- for its first convictions under an anti-trafficking law on the island, which is a major source of workers to abuse-prone Arab countries.

On the other hand, the United States downgraded the Federated States of Micronesia to Tier 3, meaning that some assistance will be suspended to the nation of more than 600 islands that is closely linked to the United States.

The report said that Micronesian traffickers have forced women into prostitution in the United States with promises of well-paying jobs.

The State Department said that Micronesian waters are believed to be rife with trafficking but that the government has not conducted any investigations into the problem.

Myanmar, North Korea and Papua New Guinea remained at Tier 3. In a change this year ordered by the US Congress, countries that stay on the watchlist for two consecutive years now automatically drop to Tier 3 -- although the administration can order an exemption.

Representative Chris Smith, who authored the 2000 act that set up the report, criticized President Barack Obama's administration for letting China remain on the watchlist again instead of dropping automatically to Tier 3.

"Two years of warning is enough. The Obama administration has again abandoned trafficking victims in China -- who are predominantly women. It's shameful," said Smith, a Republican from New Jersey.

"Our obligation is to the victims of trafficking, not the dictatorship," he said.

Fight against human trafficking slips in Arab world

BYLINE: Bloomberg

LENGTH: 486 words

The fight against human trafficking, from abuses of migrant workers to organized prostitution networks, lost ground in the past year, the US State Department reported. The number of countries failing to comply with international standards to prevent human trafficking almost doubled to 23, according to US State Department's 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report released today. The problem of modern trafficking may be entrenched, and it may seem like there is no end in sight, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said in a statement accompanying the report. But if we act on the laws that have been passed and the commitments that have been made, it is solvable. As many as 27 million people are living in a state of modern slavery, she said. Eleven countries have dropped into so-called Tier 3, those with the poorest record of fighting trafficking, joining 12 nations previously listed in that category under guidelines set by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act. The eleven countries are: Lebanon, Yemen, Algeria, Libya, Central African Republic, Equatorial Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Madagascar, Micronesia, Turkmenistan and Venezuela. They join nations such as Iran and Saudi Arabia with the poorest records on taking action to prevent human trafficking. Tier 1 is comprised of countries with strong enforcement policies, such as the US, UK, France and Australia. Tier 2 designates countries, such as Mexico, which do not fully comply with standards but are making significant efforts. Tier 2 Watch List countries such as China, Russia and Thailand promise improvement in light of significant number of victims and a failure to show increased efforts to combat severe forms of trafficking. The 11 countries that dropped into the lowest category, Tier 3, are not making significant efforts to comply with international standards, including prosecution of those involved in human trafficking, protection of victims, and prevention of future trafficking, the report said. Human trafficking can include a range of abuses including forced labor and prostitution. Political unrest in Arab countries complicated the issue in countries such as Libya and Yemen, whose government did not provide data for this year's report. Macedonia, recording an increase in trafficking-related convictions, was elevated to Tier 1 from Tier 2. The Slovak Republic made the same shift. The Dominican Republic was raised to Tier 2 Watch List from Tier 3 because of improved prevention measures under its National Anti-Trafficking Action Plan, the report noted. A total of 117 nations have committed to fighting human trafficking in accordance with the UN's Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, passed by the General Assembly Nov. 15, 2000. The State Department report was produced by the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, which was created by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000.

United States TIP Report says Sri Lanka is making significant efforts to curb human trafficking

LENGTH: 386 words

DATELINE: Colombo

Colombo, June 28 -- Trafficking in Persons Report for 2011 released on Sunday by the United States Secretary of State Hilary Clinton says although Sri Lanka does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking the country is making significant efforts to do so. The report has placed Sri Lanka among Tier 2 countries.

The report noted that the Sri Lankan government convicted three traffickers, in the first case under its anti-trafficking legislation, and rejuvenated its inter-agency task force.

The report says that the Sri Lankan government increased law enforcement efforts in addressing human trafficking cases over the reporting period. The report points out that Sri Lanka prohibits all forms of trafficking through an April 2006 amendment to its penal code, which prescribes punishments of up to 20 years' imprisonment.

These penalties are sufficiently stringent and commensurate with those prescribed for other serious offenses, such as rape. It adds that amendments passed in 2009 to the Foreign Employment Act expanded the powers of the Sri Lanka Bureau of Foreign Employment (SLBFE) to prosecute recruitment agents who engage in fraudulent recruitment, prescribing a maximum penalty of four years' imprisonment and fines of $1,000, and restricting the amount that employment agents can charge."

The report has recommended among other things for the government of Sri Lanka to vigorously investigate and prosecute suspected trafficking offenses, and convict and punish trafficking offenders, particularly those responsible for recruiting victims with fraudulent offers of employment and excessive commission fees for the purpose of subjecting them to forced labor.

The Tier 2 countries are the countries whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards.

Sri Lanka is yet to ratify the United Nations TIP protocol of 2000, the protocol to prevent, suppress, and punish trafficking in persons, especially women and children. US expands human trafficking blacklist

BYLINE: By MATTHEW LEE, Associated Press

SECTION: WASHINGTON DATELINE

LENGTH: 456 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The Obama administration on Monday nearly doubled the number of countries that may face U.S. sanctions for not doing enough to combat human trafficking, calling on those and other nations to get serious and take tough steps to eradicate the lucrative illicit practice.

In its annual Trafficking in Persons report, the State Department identified 23 nations as failing to meet minimum international standards to curb the scourge, which claims mainly women and children as victims. That's up from 13 in 2010. Another 41 countries were placed on a "watch list" that could lead to sanctions unless their records improve.

The report analyzed conditions in 184 nations, including the United States, and ranked them in terms of their effectiveness in fighting what many have termed modern-day slavery. The State Department estimates that as many as 27 million men, women and children are living in such bondage around the worlds.

"All countries can and must do more," Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton said in presenting the report. "More human beings are being exploited today than ever before."

"We're at critical moment in this fight," she said. "The problem of modern trafficking may be entrenched, and it may seem like there is no end in sight. But if we act on the laws that have been passed and the commitments that have been made, it is solvable. If we increase the pressure on traffickers and the networks they thrive in, we can set ourselves on a course to one day eradicate modern slavery."

Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J., one of the authors of the law that established the report and offered protection to trafficking victims, said he was "deeply disappointed" that China was given a political waiver despite its ongoing and expanding problem of human trafficking, particularly sex-trafficking of women and girls.

"This political waiver for China is totally unacceptable," Smith said. "The Obama administration has again abandoned trafficking victims in China who are predominantly women. It's shameful."

Among the countries on the blacklist are perennial rogues Cuba, Iran, Myanmar, North Korea and Sudan along with frequent U.S. foes Eritrea, Libya and Zimbabwe. Others are U.S. allies in the Middle East like Kuwait and Saudi Arabia while Papua New Guinea was cited as a repeat offender. Only one country, the Dominican Republic, was removed from the list.

The 11 new countries on the blacklist are Algeria, the Central African Republic, Equatorial Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Lebanon, Libya, Madagascar, Micronesia, Turkmenistan, Venezuela and Yemen.

Separately, the report also cited six nations Chad, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Myanmar, Somalia, Sudan and Yemen for using child soldiers and not taking steps to end the practice.

Human trafficking report critical of Estonia didn't come as surprise - minister

TALLINN, Jun 28, BNS - The assessment offered of Estonia in the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report 2011 did not come as a surprise, Estonian Minister of Justice Kristen Michal said.

In his remarks to BNS, Michal said the same topic was discussed by him and US Ambassador Michael Polt during a meeting this spring at which the ambassador informed him about the forthcoming report.

The main shortfall that the report finds in the case of Estonia is that the country's penal law does not single out trafficking in persons as a separate criminal statute, which makes it difficult to get a full overview of the problem, said Michal.

"The Ministry of Justice conducted an analysis back in 2009 which showed that the different statutes set out in the Penal Code do not cover absolutely all aspects of trafficking in persons. Because of that drafting of the corresponding amendment started last year and by today the bill is almost ready to be submitted to other ministers for review," said the minister.

With the amendment the Penal Code will get a trafficking-specific criminal statute, which in its current version is perhaps even more strictly worded than suggested by the United Nations' Palermo protocol, said Michal.

"At the same time it has to be taken into account that the assessment offered by the report is based on the data at the disposal of those who compiled the report, which unfortunately is not quite complete. For instance, a few criminal cases concerning trafficking in persons which actually were being handled here are left unmentioned," Michal said.

The minister agreed that Estonia could pay more attention to preventive informing and to informing and warning of potential victims of human trafficking, especially as far as the Russian speaking population is concerned.

The amended version of the Penal Code has been sent to groups and NGOs active in the fight against human trafficking and has received constructive feedback, according to the minister.

A meeting with NGOs, the roundtable of women's associations and officials from the Ministry of Social Affairs is scheduled for Thursday.

The United States on Monday put Estonia and Belarus on a human trafficking watchlist, the Tier 2 watchlist, alleging they failed in the last year to step up efforts to fight prostitution and forced labor.

The State Department also maintained Russia on the list for the eighth consecutive year for the same alleged failures.

"Estonia is a source, transit, and destination country for women subjected to forced prostitution, and for men and women subjected to conditions of forced labor," the State Department said.

Not only are Estonian women from the countryside forced into prostitution in the capital Tallinn, they also end up in the sex trafficking trade in Finland, the Netherlands, Britain, Germany and Italy. Both men and women from Estonia are also "subjected to conditions of forced labor" in Spain, Sweden, Norway, and Finland, according to the report.

"The government of Estonia does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so," the report said.

"Despite these efforts, the government did not demonstrate evidence of increasing efforts over the previous reporting period," it added to explain why Estonia was listed on the Tier 2 watchlist.

It said Estonia remains the only European Union country without a trafficking-specific law. All trafficking offenders convicted under non-trafficking statutes received suspended sentences this year. The Estonian government, however, gave some financial support to NGOs who care for trafficking victims, and it developed a national action plan with elements addressing trafficking in persons.

The report recommends Estonia to draft a trafficking-specific criminal statute that incorporates a comprehensive definition of trafficking in persons, including the transportation, harboring, obtaining, or recruitment of a trafficking victim and the use of coercion as a prohibited means, increase efforts to investigate, prosecute, convict, and punish trafficking offenders; increase the number of trafficking victims identified by government officials; and strengthen anti-trafficking training.

Lithuanian govt demonstrates more efforts to fight human trafficking than its neighbors - US report (corrects)

VILNIUS , Jun 28, BNS - Lithuania's efforts to fight human trafficking have been evaluated better than those of neighboring countries in a new US report. But the country's authorities have been recommended to improve efforts to investigate trafficking offences and provide more support for non-governmental organizations helping victims.

Lithuania was added to Tier I states that properly fight human trafficking. Latvia found itself among Tier II states that do not comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. Meanwhile, Estonia, Belarus and Russia scored even worse as in the State Department's opinion, these countries must be additionally monitored.

"The Government of Lithuania fully complies with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. The government ensured that all trafficking offenders convicted this year were sentenced to prison terms commensurate with the gravity of crime committed," the report, published on Tuesday, said.

The Department of State also positively evaluated adopted innovative new software to enhance ability to investigate human trafficking offenses. The government's funding of victim assistance programs increased modestly over the previous year, though it remained inadequate, the department said.

According to the report, 40 percent of identified Lithuanian trafficking victims are women and girls who are sex trafficking victims exploited within Lithuania. Lithuanian women are also the victims of sex trafficking in the United Kingdom, Germany, Spain, the Netherlands, Greece, Italy, France, and the Czech Republic. A small number of women from Russia and Belarus are transported through Lithuania en route to Western Europe, where they are subsequently subjected to forced prostitution.

The Lithuanian government struggled to investigate and prosecute labor trafficking offenses, the report said. Lithuania also received calls on increasing funding or provide in-kind support to NGOs that provide victim protection services and increase public awareness efforts targeted at potential adult victims of trafficking.

Lithuanian authorities prosecuted 20 offenders in 2010, an increase from the 14 offenders prosecuted in 2009. In 2010, all convicted trafficking offenders received time in prison for their offenses, with sentences ranging from seven to 11 years in prison.

US puts Estonia, Belarus on human trafficking watchlist

WASHINGTON, Jun 28, AFP-BNS - The United States on Monday put Estonia and Belarus on a human trafficking watchlist, the Tier 2 watchlist, alleging they failed in the last year to step up efforts to fight prostitution and forced labor.

In its 2011 annual Global Trafficking in Persons Report, the State Department also maintained Russia on the list for the eighth consecutive year for the same alleged failures.

"Estonia is a source, transit, and destination country for women subjected to forced prostitution, and for men and women subjected to conditions of forced labor," the State Department said.

Not only are Estonian women from the countryside forced into prostitution in the capital Tallinn, they also end up in the sex trafficking trade in Finland, the Netherlands, Britain, Germany and Italy, it said.

Both men and women from Estonia are also "subjected to conditions of forced labor" in Spain, Sweden, Norway, and Finland, according to the report.

"The government of Estonia does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so," the report said.

"Despite these efforts, the government did not demonstrate evidence of increasing efforts over the previous reporting period," it added to explain why Estonia was listed on the Tier 2 watchlist.

Belarus was put on the list for the same reason, with the report charging that the government in Minsk "demonstrated decreased law enforcement efforts" while the report was being conducted.

The report said women and children are sold into the sex trade in Russia, Germany, Poland, the Czech Republic, Lithuania, Spain, Greece, Belgium, Turkey, Israel, Lebanon, Egypt, the United Arab Emirates.

There were also continuing reports of women from poor families forced into prostitution in the capital Minsk.

The State Department also reprimanded Russia once again.

Citing the Migration Research Center, it said around one million people in Russia are exploited by business leaders who withhold their documents, fail to pay for services, physically abuse them and deny them proper living conditions.

Abuses occurred in the construction, manufacturing, agriculture and domestic services industries, it added.

"There are also reports of exploitation of children, including child prostitution in large Russian cities and forced begging," it added.

"Russian women were reported to be victims of sex trafficking in many countries, including in Northeast Asia, Europe, and throughout the Middle East," it said.

It said that because it had a written plan, Russia was not dropped to the lowest Tier 3 group, countries which are deemed not to be making significant efforts to meet the minimum standards of fighting trafficking.

"Russia is devoting sufficient resources to implement that plan," it said.

Tier 3 countries may "be subject to certain sanctions, whereby the US government may withhold or withdraw nonhumanitarian, non-trade-related foreign assistance," the State Department said.

The Estonian Ministry of Justice says on its website that once every year the United States publishes a global report drawn up by the Department of State for the Congress about the activity of governments in preventing human trafficking. The report ranks countries in four tiers (Tier 1, Tier 2, Tier 2 watchlist, Tier 3). Estonia has in recent years belonged in Tier 2, meaning that even though the country has made efforts to prevent human trafficking, it hasn't managed to fully do away with it.

Report highlights "grave failures" by Israel to address human trafficking

LENGTH: 187 words

Excerpt from report in English by privately-owned Israeli daily The Jerusalem Post website on 28 June

[Unattributed report: "US Human Trafficking Report: Israel Has Room To Improve"]

Israel has been designated a 'Tier 2' country in US State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report. This ranking is reserved for countries that do not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but are making significant efforts to do so.

The non-profit organization Physicians for Human Rights-Israel (PHR-Israel) released a statement Tuesday in response to the report. The statement says that the report reinforces the grave failures of the Israeli government to fully address and defeat human trafficking. They are pleased that the issue of how migrants that arrive from Egypt are dealt with has been raised. PHR-Israel also said that they hope that Israel will provide more assistance to refugees and victims of human trafficking under this renewed pressure from its most powerful ally. Taiwan's anti-human trafficking efforts earn tier one ranking

BYLINE: Zep Hu and C.J.Lin

LENGTH: 398 words

DATELINE: Washington, June 27

Taiwan maintained tier one ranking in the "2011 Trafficking in Persons Report" released by the U.S. Department of State Monday.

Human trafficking, also known as modern day slavery, is defined by United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC) as the "acquisition of people by improper means such as force, fraud or deception, with the aim of exploiting them."

Forms of trafficking recognized by the State Department include forced labor, bonded labor, involuntary domestic labor, child soldiers, and sex trafficking of adults and children.

In the 2011 report's findings, Taiwan is mostly a destination country for forced labor victims brought in from Thailand, Vietnam, Indonesia, China, Cambodia, the Philippines, Bangladesh and India. Victims of sex trafficking in Taiwan are mostly from China and Southeast Asia.

In a few cases, women from Taiwan have also been lured to Australia, United Kingdom, U.S., and Japan and forced into prostitution. In addition, Taiwan sometimes serves as a transit point for Chinese victims being trafficked to U.S.

While Taiwan has shown considerable progress in the protection of victims, the punishment of perpetrators, prevention and education of human trafficking, there is still room for improvement, the report said.

The report recommends Taiwan extend labor protections to all categories of workers, including workers in the domestic service sector and caregivers. It also requests more training for law enforcement personnel, officials in the Council of Labor Affairs, labor inspectors, prosecutors, and judges on how to identify victims and implement anti-trafficking laws.

It suggests Taiwan increase coordination between prosecutors and NGOs to provide better support to trafficked victims, and continue public awareness campaigns to educate people about this issue.

The report also identified a need to further investigate and prosecute Taiwanese child sex tourism offenders. Authorities have not punished anyone with child sex crimes committed abroad since 2006.

The rankings of countries in the report are classified into three-tiers based on its government's counter-human trafficking measures.

To penalize tier three countries, the U.S. government can impose economic sanctions or even revoke non-humanitarian aid.

Taiwan was moved to tier one in 2004, but slipped to tier two in 2005. It was not until last year that Taiwan regained tier one status.

Taiwan makes progress in anti-human trafficking efforts: report

BYLINE: Zep Hu and S.C. ChangLENGTH: 453 wordsDATELINE: Washington, June 28

Taiwan has made clear progress over the past year in anti-human trafficking law enforcement, with authorities making significant efforts to protect victims of trafficking, according to a U.S. State Department report released Tuesday.

In the "Trafficking in Persons Report," Taiwan was listed as "Tier 1," the same as last year and an improvement from 2006, when Taiwan was put on the Tier 2 watch list. A Tier 3 standing could incur U.S. economic sanctions.

The report pointed out that Taiwan is a destination, and to a lesser extent, a source and a transit territory for men, women, and children subjected to sex trafficking and forced labor.

Most trafficking victims in Taiwan are migrant workers from Vietnam, Thailand, Indonesia, mainland China, Cambodia, the Philippines, Bangladesh, and India.

These migrant workers were employed through recruitment agencies and brokers to perform low-skilled work in Taiwan's manufacturing and fishing industries and as home caregivers and domestic workers.

They are reportedly charged up to $7,700 in recruitment fees typically in their home countries. This results in substantial debt that may be used by brokers or employers as a coercive tool to subject the workers to forced labor.

As a source of trafficking, some women from Taiwan are recruited through classified ads for employment in Japan, Australia, the UK, and the United States, where they are forced into prostitution.

The report said Taiwanese authorities fully complied with the minimum standards laid out by the U.S. government for the elimination of trafficking. During the reporting period, authorities continued to prosecute and punish trafficking offenses, including both forced labor and forced prostitution.

In addition, the government sustained strong victim protection efforts, continued to train law enforcement and other government officials, and raised public awareness on trafficking offenses.

Namely, it said Taiwan authorities used formal procedures to identify and assist victims of trafficking, including publishing and distributing a standardized guide and evaluation forms to officials who might deal with victims.

The report recommends that Taiwan can do better by extending labor protections to all categories of workers, including workers in the domestic service sector and caregivers, to prevent labor trafficking.

It also suggests that Taiwan improve its efforts to investigate, prosecute, and convict trafficking offenders, ensure that convicted offenders receive sufficiently stringent sentences, and continue to train law enforcement personnel, officials in the Council of Labor Affairs (CLA), labor inspectors, prosecutors, and judges on victim identification measures and the anti-trafficking law.

Country Maintains Tier 1 Status in Anti-Human Trafficking

BYLINE: Ojoma Akor

LENGTH: 166 words

The US annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report released yesterday showed Nigeria has maintained its tier 1 status for three years running.

Countries assessed as fully complying with the "minimum standards for the elimination of severe forms of trafficking" set forth in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) are classified as tier 1. Countries assessed as not fully complying with the minimum standards but making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those minimum standards are classified as tier 2.

Countries assessed as not complying with the minimum standards for making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance are classified as Tier 3.

Responding to the report, Executive Secretary of the National Agency for the Prohibition of Traffic in Persons and Other Related Matters (NAPTIP) Barrister Simon Chuzi Egede said it is not yet uhuru when children are being stigmatized as witches and wizards in Akwa-Ibom, Nasarawa, Kaduna and Taraba states.

SL, a source for sex trafficking-US

LENGTH: 3244 words

DATELINE: Sri Lanka

Sri Lanka, June 28 -- The 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report released by the United States stated that Sri Lanka does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking the country but is making significant efforts to do so.

The report said Sri Lanka is primarily a source and to a much lesser extent, a destination for men, women, and children subjected to forced labor and sex trafficking.

Removing from the its watch list the report placed Sri Lanka among Tier 2 countries, which means that the countries do not fully meet standards of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) on human trafficking but are making efforts to do so.

"Sri Lanka is yet to ratify the United Nations TIP protocol of 2000, the protocol to prevent, suppress, and punish trafficking in persons, especially women and children.

The report noted that the Sri Lankan government convicted three traffickers, in the first case under its anti-trafficking legislation, and rejuvenated its inter-agency task force.

"However, serious problems remain unaddressed, such as the detention of identified trafficking victims (including those who provided evidence to support the three convictions), the failure to achieve criminal convictions for fraudulent recruitment involved in trafficking in persons, and official complicity in human trafficking," the TIP Report noted.

The TIP report recommended among other things for the government of Sri Lanka to vigorously investigate and prosecute suspected trafficking offenses, and convict and punish trafficking offenders, particularly those responsible for recruiting victims with fraudulent offers of employment and excessive commission fees for the purpose of subjecting them to forced labor.

The Report on Sri Lanka

SRI LANKA (Tier 2)

Sri Lanka is primarily a source and, to a much lesser extent, a destination for men, women, and children subjected to forced labor and sex trafficking. Sri Lankan men, women, and some children (between 16 and 17 years old) migrate consensually to Kuwait, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Qatar, Lebanon, the United Arab Emirates (UAE), Oman, Bahrain, and Singapore to work as construction workers, domestic servants, or garment factory workers. Some of these workers, however, subsequently find themselves in conditions of forced labor through practices such as restrictions on movement, withholding of passports, threats, physical or sexual abuse, and threats of detention and deportation for immigration violations. Many of these migrants pay high recruitment fees - usually about $1,500 - imposed by unscrupulous licensed labor recruitment and their unlicensed sub-agents and assume debt in order to satisfy these costs. This indebtedness contributes to debt bondage in destination countries. A recent Human Rights Watch report noted that over one-third of Sri Lankan domestic workers in Jordan are physically abused by their employers, 11 percent were sexually assaulted, 60 percent were not paid wages, over 60 percent had their passports confiscated, and 80 percent experienced forced confinement - these are abuses that indicate forced labor. In the past year, there were high-profile reports of Sri Lankan domestic workers who were subjected to forced labor and physical abuse in Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, and Jordan, including having more than 20 nails hammered in their bodies, or being forced to swallow nine nails. There were also reports of cases in which some Sri Lankan recruitment committed fraud by engaging in contract-switching: promising one type of job and conditions but then changing the job, employer, conditions or salary after arrival, which are documented risk factors for forced labor and debt bondage. Sri Lanka is reported to be a transit country for men, some of whom may be trafficking victims, traveling from Pakistan and Bangladesh to Dubai, UAE. In several cases, men were stranded in Sri Lanka by the employment agent. Some Sri Lankan women were promised jobs as domestic workers in other countries, but after arriving were instead forced to work in brothels, mainly in Singapore. A small number of Sri Lankan women are forced into prostitution in the Maldives.

Within the country, women and children are subjected to sex trafficking in brothels, especially in the Anuradhapura area, which was a major transit point for members of the Sri Lankan Armed Forces heading north. Boys are more likely than girls to be forced into prostitution - this is generally in coastal areas for domestic child sex tourism. In 2009, the National Child Protection Authority (NCPA) estimated that approximately 1,000 children were subjected to commercial sexual exploitation within Sri Lanka although some NGOs believed the actual number was between 10,000 and 15,000. NGOs expressed concern that the recent increase in tourism in the very poor post-conflict areas on the east coast may increase demand for child sex tourism. There are reports of children being subjected to bonded labor and forced labor in dry-zone farming areas on plantations, and in the fireworks and fish-drying industries. Some child domestic workers in Colombo, generally from the Tamil tea-estate sector of the country, are subjected to physical, sexual, and mental abuse, nonpayment of wages, and restrictions of their movement. Some women and children were promised garment industry work by agents and were instead forced into prostitution. A small number of women from Thailand, China, and countries in South Asia, Europe, and the former Soviet Union may be subjected to forced prostitution in Sri Lanka.

Sri Lanka does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. The government convicted three traffickers, in the first case under its anti-trafficking legislation, and rejuvenated its inter-agency task force. However, serious problems remain unaddressed, such as the detention of identified trafficking victims (including those who provided evidence to support the three convictions), the failure to achieve criminal convictions for fraudulent recruitment involved in trafficking in persons, and official complicity in human trafficking.

Recommendations for Vigorously investigate and prosecute suspected trafficking offenses, and convict and punish trafficking offenders, particularly those responsible for recruiting victims with fraudulent offers of employment and excessive commission fees for the purpose of subjecting them to forced labor; ensure that victims of trafficking found within Sri Lanka are not detained or otherwise penalized for unlawful acts committed as a direct result of their being trafficked, such as visa violations or prostitution; establish law enforcement capacity at shelters in embassies abroad; develop and implement formal victim referral procedures; train local law enforcement and judicial officials on investigating and prosecuting trafficking crimes; facilitate the speedy repatriation of foreign trafficking victims by providing airfare and not obligating them to remain in the country if they choose to initiate law enforcement proceedings; provide witness protection and incentives for victims to cooperate with law enforcement to enable prosecutions; stop the practice of forcing foreign trafficking victims to remain in Sri Lanka if they are witnesses in a case; improve services, including quality of shelters, legal aid, availability of counseling, and numbers of trained staff at embassies and consular offices in destination countries; promote safe tourism campaigns to ensure that child sex tourism does not increase with expected rapid growth of tourism; and improve regulation and monitoring of recruitment and village-level brokers, with an emphasis on ensuring provision of accurate and enforceable employment contracts and working to ending the charging of illegal and excessive fees.

Prosecution

The Sri Lankan government increased law enforcement efforts in addressing human trafficking cases over the reporting period. Sri Lanka prohibits all forms of trafficking through an April 2006 amendment to its penal code, which prescribes punishments of up to 20 years' imprisonment. These penalties are sufficiently stringent and commensurate with those prescribed for other serious offenses, such as rape. Amendments passed in 2009 to the Foreign Employment Act expanded the powers of the Sri Lanka Bureau of Foreign Employment (SLBFE) to prosecute recruitment agents who engage in fraudulent recruitment, prescribing a maximum penalty of four years' imprisonment and fines of $1,000, and restricting the amount that employment agents can charge. In March 2011, three traffickers were convicted and sentenced to nine years each for forcing women into prostitution, in one case. This is the first recorded convicted case under Sri Lanka's counter-trafficking amendment. However, the Uzbek sex trafficking victims in the case were detained in an immigration detention facility in Sri Lanka for over a year until their testimony was complete. The Attorney General's Department claimed two additional convictions in 2010 for violations of the penal code's statute on child sexual exploitation; both convictions may have involved human trafficking crimes. Both convictions resulted in suspended jail sentences. Each trafficker had to pay a fine of approximately $900, and one had to pay compensation of $450 to the victim. In January 2011, the National Child Protection Authority (NCPA) completed an investigation and could not determine the whereabouts of the remaining boys allegedly in armed service with the Tamil Makkal Viduthalai Pulikal (TMVP)/Karuna Faction; some of these boys may be trafficking victims. There were no prosecutions against persons allegedly responsible for conscription of child soldiers.

During the year, there was some evidence of government officials' complicity in trafficking. There were allegations that police and other officials accepted bribes to permit brothels to operate; some of the brothels exploited trafficking victims. Many recruitment were run by politicians or were politically connected. Some sub-agents cooperated with Sri Lankan officials to procure forged or modified documents, or real documents with false data, to facilitate travel abroad. There were no reported law enforcement actions taken against officials complicit in human trafficking. The Sri Lankan Police continued to teach a counter-trafficking module to all police recruits during their basic trainings. Additionally, police officers who were previously trained in IOM training-of-trainers courses conducted 16 training workshops at local police stations on counter-trafficking in the reporting period.

Protection

The government made limited progress in protecting victims of trafficking during the year. The government placed two Uzbek women who were found in forced prostitution in late 2009 in a detention center, which they were allowed to leave during the day but were locked up at night. The government did not permit them to leave Sri Lanka for over a year until they had the opportunity to provide testimony against their alleged traffickers, instead of allowing the Uzbeks to leave the country while their cases were pending or to remain in the country with protections such as immigration relief, freedom of movement, and the right to work. They were then given permission to leave the country, and with the assistance of IOM, departed Sri Lanka in December 2010. The government forces foreign trafficking victims to remain in Sri Lanka if they are witnesses in a case until evidence has been given. The government continued to provide some counseling and day care for abused children through the operation of six resource centers, although it is not known how many trafficked children, if any, were assisted in the reporting period. The Sri Lanka Bureau of Foreign Employment (SLBFE) operated nine short-term shelters in 2010 in Jordan, Kuwait, Libya, Oman, Saudi Arabia, and the United Arab Emirates as well as an overnight shelter in Sri Lanka's international airport for returning female migrant workers who encountered abuse abroad. It is unknown how many trafficking victims were assisted in these shelters in the reporting period. While the missions provide shelter and legal aid, domestic workers seeking assistance complained of long waiting periods with little information about their cases. In addition, there were complaints that the shelters were grossly overcrowded with unhygienic conditions. In a news report of female Sri Lankan workers who fled their employers in Jordan due to lack of paid wages and abuse, one worker noted that the Sri Lankan embassy shelter was no better than a prison, as it did not permit the domestic workers to leave the premises. There have been some reports of abuse by Sri Lankan embassy officials in shelters abroad.

A Workers' Welfare Fund is maintained by the SLBFE, also funded by fees charged to workers upon migration. Through this fund, the widely reported case of the female in domestic servitude in Saudi Arabia who returned with 24 nails in her body received approximately $4,500 to build a house, with the assistance of the National Housing Authority. Neither the government nor NGOs or international organizations provided protection facilities for men. The Ministry of Child Development and Women's Affairs (MOCDDWA) has a memorandum of understanding with IOM to establish a shelter which can house 10 to 15 women and child victims of trafficking and abuse. When the building is renovated and prepared - with a tentative deadline of later this year - the ministry will take over operation and management of the shelter.

Government personnel did not employ formal procedures for proactively identifying victims. The National Counter Human Trafficking Resource Center of the Sri Lanka Department of Immigration and Emigration trained 10 immigration officers on the identification of trafficking victims, in partnership with IOM, in 2010; 50 officers were trained in 2009. The government pursued a partnership with the Salvation Army to transfer women and child victims of abuse to protection facilities, though it is unknown how many trafficking victims, if any, were referred in the reporting period. Foreign trafficking victims could not seek employment in Sri Lanka. The government permitted foreign trafficking victims to leave the country unless they were witnesses in a case, in which case the government forced them to remain until evidence had been given. IOM reported several cases of victims who chose to leave the country rather than file a complaint. The Commissioner General for Rehabilitation, with the assistance of the NCPA, continued to operate two rehabilitation centers specifically for children involved in armed conflict, some of whom may be trafficking victims, in partnership with UNICEF. The Commission also continued to run a vocational training center with donor support. These facilities served approximately 700 former child soldiers in the reporting period. The Sri Lankan government has reported that all former Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE) child soldiers completed rehabilitation and were released in May 2010. However, at least 250 children formerly associated with armed groups faced a number of security issues, and some were arrested by police.

The government did not encourage victims to assist in the investigation and prosecution of trafficking cases; instead, they sometimes forced victims to testify if they chose to file charges. While Sri Lankan trafficking victims in theory could file administrative cases to seek financial restitution, this did not happen in practice due to victim embarrassment and the slow pace of the Sri Lankan legal system. In addition, prosecutors were prevented under Sri Lankan law from meeting with witnesses outside of formal court proceedings. Thus, they had to rely on police to convince a witness to testify. The government penalized adult victims of trafficking through detention for unlawful acts committed as a direct result of being trafficked. Most commonly, these acts were violations of their visa status or prostitution. All detainees who were awaiting deportation for visa violations, including trafficking victims, remained in detention facilities until they raised enough money to pay for their plane ticket home, which in some cases has taken years. The government provided no legal alternatives for the removal of foreign victims to countries where they may face hardship or retribution. The SLBFE continued to provide training on protection and assistance to its staff members who worked at embassies and consulates in foreign countries, although many of the labor attaches working in labor-receiving countries are political appointees who do not receive any training.

Prevention

The Sri Lankan government made some progress in its efforts to prevent trafficking during the last year. The government formed an inter-ministerial anti-trafficking task force in October 2010, led by a coordinator from the Ministry of Justice, and developed a terms of reference on how government will work together to combat trafficking. This task force took over the monthly meetings previously held by the MOCDWA, and met six times in the reporting period. While it does not include civil society, the coordinator of the task force recently announced it would soon open up quarterly meetings to NGOs and community organizations. The government limits the recruitment fees to $70 for jobs paying less than $200 per month and $100 for jobs paying over $200. The SLBFE requires migrant domestic workers with no experience working in the Middle East to complete a free 12-day pre-departure training course. It is not known how many migrant workers completed this course in the reporting period. The SLBFE and the Department of Labor conducted awareness programs on safe migration. In measures that could prevent transnational labor trafficking of Sri Lankans, the SLBFE reported that it filed 727 charges against recruitment in 2010 under Sections 398 (cheating) and 457 (forgery for the purpose of cheating), conducted 84 raids against employment agents, and fined recruitment found to be guilty of fraudulent practices over $40,000. The Criminal Investigation Division of the police, in cooperation with Interpol and the Royal Malaysian Police, investigated four fraudulent recruitment agents who may have been responsible for the forced labor of Sri Lankans in Malaysia.

While most Sri Lankans have birth certificates and (after the age of 16) national identity cards, many of the 250,000 to 350,000 internally displaced people - a group very vulnerable to trafficking - did not have these documents. The Government of Sri Lanka continued to provide personnel time to conduct mobile documentation clinics for conflict-affected people with UNDP. The Government of Sri Lanka did not report any efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts during the reporting period. The Ministry of Defense provided training to all Sri Lankan peacekeepers prior to their deployments for international peacekeeping missions relating to human rights, including trafficking. Sri Lanka is not a party to the 2000 UN TIP Protocol. Published by HT Syndication with permission from Daily Mirror Sri Lanka. Egypt working towards compliance with anti-trafficking standards

LENGTH: 800 words

CAIRO: Despite not fully complying with the Trafficking Victims Protection Act's minimum standards, Egypt is making a significant effort towards compliance, according to a US State Department report.

The 2011 global "Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report" released June 27 by the US State Department said Egypt is a source, transit and destination country for women and children subjected to forced labor and sex trafficking.

US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said in her remarks on the report that "the decade of delivery is upon us"- calling on all nations to act against the atrocities of human trafficking.

According to the TIP Report, an estimated 200,000 to 1 million Egyptian children are victims of sex trafficking and forced begging. Many are forced into domestic and agricultural labor where they experience restriction on movement, non-payment of wages and physical or sexual abuse.

A persistent issue is child sex tourism. Wealthy men, mainly from Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates and Kuwait, arrange for "temporary" or "summer marriages" with Egyptian females, including girls under the age of 18. The arrangements are often facilitated by a marriage broker or the bride's parents who profit from the transaction. Children involved in these temporary marriages suffer both sexual servitude and forced labor as servants to their "husbands."

Men, as well as women, from South and Southeast Asia and Africa are subject to forced labor in Egypt. UN sources report that Egypt may have a large number of foreign workers in domestic service who have been held in coercive conditions of forced labor. The report states that these workers face severe restrictions of liberty and undergo physical, emotional and sexual abuse.

Estonia and Belarus were put on the human trafficking watchlist, alleging they failed in the last year to step up efforts to fight prostitution and forced labor, with Russia on the list for the eighth consecutive year for the same alleged failures, AFP reported.

The report said women and children are sold into the sex trade in Russia, Germany, Poland, the Czech Republic, Lithuania, Spain, Greece, Belgium, Turkey, Israel, Lebanon and the United Arab Emirates.

While the government of Egypt has not been in full compliance with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, there is an effort being made to meet requirements.

Egypt collaborated with the International Organization for Migration (IOM) to open a shelter for victims of trafficking in Cairo, and developed and published a comprehensive action plan to address all aspects of trafficking.

All forms of human trafficking are prohibited through the 2010 anti-trafficking law, which prescribes penalties from three to 15 years of imprisonment - and even a sentence of life imprisonment if aggravating circumstances are evident - along with fines ranging from $9,000 to $36,000. These are penalties are considered adequately stringent and correspond with penalties prescribed for other serious offenses, such as rape.

Officials reported investigating 50 cases of temporary marriages and convicting 29 imams, marriage brokers, and parents who profited from facilitating these marriages, as well as the men who attempted to purchase the young girls in marriage.

The government also established a microcredit loan system to provide alternative income to parents who might otherwise sell their children into exploitative marriages

Egypt has made significant effort to protect victims of human trafficking and has made progress in preventing certain forms of human trafficking, the report said. However, despite the positive efforts to fight the trafficking of persons, the government failed to establish a formal procedure to identify victims of trafficking or to complete a referral mechanism to facilitate treatment for victims.

Trafficking victims arrested for prostitution were often treated as criminals rather than victims - which may have led to the further mistreatment of victims through verbal, physical and sexual abuse.

The government did not report any considerable efforts to address forced labor of children in domestic servitude and other sectors, and similarly failed to report efforts to address the problem of domestic servitude and other forms of forced labor of migrant workers.

The US State Department suggests Egypt implement regulations to increase law enforcement activity against all forms of trafficking. Authorities ought to ensure that identified trafficking victims are not penalized for unlawful acts committed as a direct result of their exploitation.

The report also recommends greater efforts be made to investigate and punish government officials complicit in trafficking offenses. The government should continue to raise awareness on the definition and dangers of trafficking.

US names and shames EU countries on human trafficking

BYLINE: Andrew Rettman

LENGTH: 434 words

EUOBSERVER / BRUSSELS - The US has put Cyprus, Estonia and Malta on a "watch list" for failures to stop "severe" levels of human trafficking.

The report, out on Monday (28 June), said "the absolute number of victims of severe forms of trafficking is very significant or is significantly increasing" in the three EU members, but governments are guilty of "failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts" to combat the problem.

Six other EU states - Bulgaria, the Czech republic, Greece, Hungary, Latvia and Romania - were also named and shamed for not meeting US norms.

The EU group-of-nine hold similar or lower ratings than many developing countries such as Guatemala or Malawi.

The majority of EU-aspirant countries in the western Balkans and Turkey, as well as countries seeking EU visa-free travel, such as Moldova, Russia and Ukraine got similarly poor marks.

Speaking in Washington about the report on Monday, secretary of state Hilary Clinton - whose husband Bill Clinton signed into life the Trafficking and Victims Prevention Act when US president, said US diplomats will take backsliders to task.

"This week, US diplomats around the world will be meeting with their host-country governments to review action plans and provide recommendations when needed," she noted. "Even in these tight economic times, we need to look for creative ways to do better."

Zooming in on Cyprus, the survey said sex clubs who use trafficked women from post-Soviet countries, Latin America and Asia and are frequented mostly by Cypriot and Greek men pose a problem.

It added that "the government did not convict or sentence any officials complicit in trafficking in Cyprus, which observers allege continued to be a significant problem."

In Estonia, rural Estonian women are trafficked to sex clubs in Tallinn as well as in Finland, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom, Germany, and Italy. But the government spent just a little over $100,000 in total on victim assistance in 2010.

Looking at the flow of north African migrants to Malta, which increased drastically after the Arab revolutions in early 2011, the state department said: "African migrants currently residing in Malta may be vulnerable to human trafficking in Malta's informal labor market. There were anecdotal reports that Malta may be a transit country for African women subjected to sex trafficking in continental Europe."

In an example of Maltese shortcomings, it cited the case of a Somali woman in July 2010 who complained to police she was being press-ganged into prostitution and got a six-month suspended sentence for possession of false travel permits.

US State Dept. slams Israel over human trafficking; The State Department report takes Israel to task for not complying with minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking.

BYLINE: Ran Dagoni, Washington

LENGTH: 709 words

"The Government of Israel does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so," says the US Department of State in its "Trafficking in Persons Report for 2011". It adds, "Israel continued law enforcement actions against sex trafficking and continued to make strong prevention efforts. The government continued to take inadequate steps, however, to identify and protect labor trafficking victims and prosecute and convict labor trafficking offenders in the reporting period."

The State Department classifies countries with three ratings, "tier 1" countries that comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, mostly countries in Europe and North America; "tier 2" countries that not comply with the minimum standards, and have large numbers of human trafficking, but which make efforts to combat it; and "tier 3" countries that neither comply with the minimal standards and make no effort to do so. Israel is classified as a "tier 2" country.

Israel's "tier 2" peers include Afghanistan, Angola, Azerbaijan, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Belarus, Burkina Faso, Ethiopia, Iraq, Jordan, Pakistan, Rwanda, Syria, as well as India, China, Russia, and developed countries such as Iceland, Japan, Greece, and Switzerland.

The report on Israel is little different from the previous reports. It says, "Israel is a destination country for men and women subjected to forced labor and sex trafficking. Low-skilled workers from Thailand, China, Nepal, the Philippines, India, Sri Lanka, and, to a lesser extent, Romania, migrate voluntarily and legally to Israel for temporary contract labor in construction, agriculture, and home health care provision.

"Some, however, subsequently face conditions of forced labor, including through such practices as the unlawful withholding of passports, restrictions on movement, inability to change or otherwise choose one's employer, nonpayment of wages, threats, sexual assault, and physical intimidation. Many labor recruitment agencies in source countries and in Israel require workers to pay recruitment fees typically ranging from $4,000 to $20,000 - a practice making workers highly vulnerable to trafficking or debt bondage once working in Israel. One NGO noted that recruitment fees increased in 2010."

The report cites Ministry of Interior figures, which say that 14,000 migrants entered Israel from Sinai in 2010, up from 5,000 in 2009.

On the issue of sex trafficking, the report says, "Some women from the former Soviet Union and China are subjected to forced prostitution in Israel, although the number of women affected has declined since the passage and implementation of the Prohibition of Trafficking in Persons (Legislative. Amendments) Law (5766-2006).

The State Department says that Israel government sustained its strong law enforcement progress against sex trafficking and that it also made initial progress against labor trafficking, as seen through the first prosecution under a labor trafficking statute involving a migrant worker. The government also continued to improve its protection of trafficking victims over the reporting period, although it lacked effective procedures to identify victims of labor trafficking.

The State Department advises Israel to significantly increase prosecutions, convictions, and punishment of labor trafficking offenders (including "employers") and offenses. Israel should also ensure that labor trafficking crimes are prosecuted under labor trafficking statutes; ensure trafficking victims are not penalized for unlawful acts committed as a direct result of being trafficked, such as immigration violations; and continue to investigate the incidence of Israeli nationals subjected to forced prostitution. Domestically, Israel should increase the number of labor inspectors and translators in the agriculture, construction, and homecare sectors, ensuring that they are adequately trained in identifying trafficking cases, and internationally, it should stop the practice of "hot returns" - immediately returning migrants back to Egypt.

US Adds Venezuela to Human Trafficking Watch List, Keeps Cuba and Withdraws Dominican Republic

BYLINE: Diego Moya OcamposSECTION: In BriefLENGTH: 272 words

The United States' Department of State yesterday (27 June) released its Trafficking in Persons Report 2011, its annual report on human trafficking, which included Venezuela on its blacklist for the first time. The report excluded the Dominican Republic from the blacklist, to which it had been added last year, but kept it under "special observation". Also under "special observation" are Costa Rica, Ecuador and Panama. Cuba was kept on the blacklist for the ninth year in a row. The US Department of State's annual report also includes sex trafficking, labour trafficking, and forced labour in its definition of human trafficking. It is the result of the assessment of more than 184 countries' performance on combating human trafficking.

Significance: The inclusion of Venezuela in the blacklist came as no surprise given that it had already been under "special observation" and in light of its deteriorating relations with the US, which has also this year imposed sanctions, albeit on different grounds, on the Venezuelan national oil company PDVSA (see Venezuela: 25 May 2011:). This is also the case with Cuba, which has been on the blacklist since 2003 and has even been included in the US Department of State's list of countries that sponsor terrorism. In any case, it is likely that the governments of Cuba and Venezuela will react angrily to the report. The blacklist, which mainly includes countries from Africa and Asia, could imply the suspension of non-humanitarian US aid and also opposition from the latter to countries on the list accessing funding from projects set up by the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund.

Estonia and Belarus Added to US Human Trafficking Watch List

BYLINE: Matt ClementsSECTION: In BriefLENGTH: 355 words

The United States yesterday (27 June) added Estonia and Belarus to its human trafficking Tier 2 watch list. Washington said that the decision was made because, although both countries were making "significant efforts" to comply with the minimum standards for eliminating trafficking, they had failed to step up their efforts over the past year, particularly in respect to fighting prostitution and forced labour. The addition of Estonia and Belarus to the Tier 2 watch list was made in the US Department of State's annual Trafficking in Persons Report. In the report, Estonia was described as a "source, transit, and destination country for women subjected to forced prostitution, and for men and women subjected to conditions of forced labour." In particular Tallinn has failed to enact a comprehensive anti-trafficking law. Belarus was described in similar terms, with the report highlighting the risk to women aged 16-30 being sold into forced prostitution, and young men into forced labour in Belarus and Russia. The US 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report highlights the ongoing problem of trafficking in the Baltic region, although Estonia's addition to the Tier 2 watch list is a indictment of the country's efforts to reduce the problem. Neighbouring Latvia is also a Tier 2 country, although not on the watch list, while Lithuania is a Tier 1 country, highlighting the additional efforts the government there has undertaken.

Significance: The situation in Belarus is unlikely to improve significantly over the short term as the country faces a deep financial crisis and potential instability as a result, meaning that anti-trafficking measures are unlikely to be made a priority. Although Estonia is now likely to seek to improve its standing, both it and Belarus are at risk of being demoted to Tier 3. Should this happen the countries will be subject to certain US-imposed penalties, such as the withholding or withdrawal of non-humanitarian and non-trade-related foreign assistance. They would also face US opposition to the provision of assistance from international financial institutions such as the IMF and the World Bank.

Government spares no effort in combating human trafficking

LENGTH: 327 words

Hong Kong, Jun. 28 -- Hong Kong SAR Government issued the following news release:

In response to media enquiries on the "US Trafficking in Persons Report 2011", a Government spokesman said today (June 28) that the Government spares no effort in combating human trafficking.

Responding to Hong Kong being placed in Tier 2, the spokesman reiterated that Hong Kong is neither a destination for human trafficking nor a place of origin for such trafficking.

"Notwithstanding the rare occurrence of human trafficking crimes in Hong Kong, our Police cracked down in 2010 on four trafficking syndicates, with five people convicted and sentenced to imprisonment," the spokesman said.

"Our law enforcement agencies also initiated new measures last year to combat human trafficking, including enhanced training for front-line law enforcers and producing educational pamphlets in several languages to raise public awareness."

In regard to the labour rights of foreign domestic helpers (FDHs) in Hong Kong, the spokesman stressed that the Government attaches great importance to protecting their rights. "Like local employees, FDHs in Hong Kong are protected by the Employment Ordinance and are entitled to at least one rest day in every period of seven days, in addition to statutory holidays and annual leave. The Government will not tolerate any illegal acts of employers and employment agencies, and will take stringent enforcement and prosecution action against any malpractice," the spokesman said.

On the report's recommendation on amending local law, the spokesman said, "The local legislation already provides a solid framework underpinning our robust efforts to combat human trafficking activities. We do not see any imminent need to amend local laws."

"We will continue collaborating with overseas law enforcement agencies in the fight against human trafficking," the spokesman added.

Korea actually human trafficking haven

LENGTH: 399 words

The U.S. State Department revealed the hidden truth of Korean human trafficking issues, Monday.

Korea has been marked as a 'tier one nation' for the 10th consecutive year this year, meaning that it has met 'the minimum standards' laid down in the U.S. Trafficking Victims Protection Act.

The department classifies nations into four tiers based on protection of victims, punishment of offenders and prevention measures in annual report on human trafficking.

Although it remains as 'tier one,' Korea is hardly the model when it comes to actual human trafficking, according to the report by the department. The report raised coerced prostitution and labor problems as issues from the very first paragraph, describing Korea as the 'source, transit, and destination country' of human trafficking.

The department has pointed out that men and women from Russia, Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan, Morocco, Columbia, Mongolia, China, the Philippines, Taiwan, Cambodia and other nations around the world come to Korea for marriages and jobs only to end up in forced prostitution or labor.

Also it pointed to financial debt as the prime reason for trafficking of women, by saying that the women's 'owners' and 'brokers' have found ways to constantly make the debt larger to keep the women indefinitely. 'Many of these women get their passport taken away and are thereby kept from escaping overseas,' it said.

The department also said that there are also significant human trafficking of Korean women abroad being forced into prostitution in the U.S., Canada, Japan and Australia. It commented that more and more Korean teenagers are dragged into prostitution with nearly 95% of child prostitution broadcast live through the Internet.

This year's report is nearly identical as the one from last year. While noting the Korean government has maintained its efforts to eradicate human trafficking, this year's report called for reformation in the anti-trafficking legislations and implement more thorough investigation methods, harsher punishments, and preventive measures to the underprivileged.

Amidst the celebration for Korea's 10th year as a 'tier one' nation, it is more important now than ever to remember that 'tier one' classification is for nations that meet the minimum standards. In order to truly become a leader in today's world, Korea should never be satisfied with meeting the minimum requirements, the report said.

N. Korea remains on worst-human trafficking nation list

LENGTH: 494 words

WASHINGTON (Yonhap) -- Despite North Korea's reported tightening of border security to block the defection of its hunger-stricken people, the communist nation has made no efforts to prevent human trafficking by screening migrants along its porous border with China and Russia, the U.S. said Monday.

In its annual Trafficking in Persons report, the State Department ranked North Korea once again in Tier 3 for countries with the poorest record of fighting human trafficking. A total of 23 nations, including 11 new ones, were included in the list.

"Although press reports indicated that border security increased during the reporting period, there was no evidence that the government attempted to prevent human trafficking by screening migrants along the border," it read. "Nor did the government differentiate between trafficking and illegal migration or defection."

The department, however, reiterated most of its descriptions in the previous report for the overall trafficking situation in North Korea, a veiled communist nation where media outlets are strictly controlled and information gathering by the outside world is very difficult.

North Korea is a "source country for men, women, and children who are subject to forced labor, forced marriage and sex trafficking," the report said.

"North Korean women who make their own way to China are lured, drugged, or kidnapped by traffickers upon arrival," it added. "Trafficking networks of Korean-Chinese and North Koreans (usually men) operate along the China-North Korean border, reportedly working with Chinese and North Korean border guards to recruit women for marriage or prostitution in China."

The document also pointed out a problem with North Korean workers in Russia.

"Tens of thousands of North Korean workers are estimated to be employed in logging camps in Russia's Far East, where they reportedly have only two days of rest per year and face punishments if they fail to meet production targets," it said.

Since 2003, North Korea has been on the list of the Tier 3 countries that may "be subject to certain sanctions, whereby the U.S. government may withhold or withdraw non-humanitarian, no-trade-related foreign assistance," according to the department.

Meanwhile, South Korea was left in Tier 1, among those countries complying with international standards for anti-trafficking efforts.

But the department said South Korea still needs to improve its legal and institutional system.

South Korea is a "source, transit, and destination country for men and women subjected to forced prostitution and forced labor," the new report said, as it did in 2010.

The South Korean government took adequate steps to prosecute trafficking offenses in the past year, but "its efforts were hampered by the lack of a clear law prohibiting all forms of trafficking," it said.

Its victim protection efforts were weakened by its lack of formal proactive victim identification procedures across the government, the report added.

US State Department Ranks Israel Second largest Human Trafficking Country

LENGTH: 218 words

Washington , June 28 (QNA) - The US State Department published Tuesday its Annual Trafficking in Persons Report and ranked Israel in tier 2 with the same rank of Pakistan and Rwanda, Israeli newspaper Yedioth Ahronoth reports.

The report said that Israeli Government "The Government of Israel does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking." The report also describes Israel as a "destination-country for men and women subjected to forced labor and sex trafficking." Israel receives low skilled labors from countries such as Thailand, China, Philippines, India and Sri Lanka.

The report also listed the number of ways in which people from those countries are oppressed. "(Some) face conditions of forced labor, including through such practices as the unlawful withholding of passports, restrictions on movement, inability to change or otherwise choose one's employer, nonpayment of wages, threats, sexual assault, and physical intimidation," it says in the report.

The report adds that "many labor recruitment agencies in source countries and in Israel require workers to pay recruitment fees typically ranging from $4,000 to $20,000 ? a practice making workers highly vulnerable to trafficking or debt bondage once working in Israel." (QNA)

Singapore, June 28 -- Ministry of Foreign Affairs Singapore issued the following news release:

In response to media enquiries on the US Department of State's "Trafficking in Persons Report 2011" released on 27 June 2011 which upgraded Singapore's ranking to Tier Two this year, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs Spokesperson said:

"We note the change to Singapore's Tier Ranking. Trafficking in Persons is an abhorrent international crime which the Singapore Government responds to robustly. But we are dismayed to find the US TIP Report riddled with inaccuracies in the section on Singapore. Such a casual approach to the facts is troubling. We will highlight two inaccuracies by way of illustration. There are numerous others.

The Report has a major issue with forced labour on fishing vessels that "originated in Singapore". While we have heard very troubling reports of trafficking aboard fishing vessels, flying the flags of other countries, this is the first such claim that such vessels originated in Singapore. This is untrue and unverified. The Singapore Government would not tolerate forced labour on Singapore flagged ships. The United States should thoroughly investigate the "reports" before faulting us for not pursuing our "phantom" ships.

There is also the astonishing observation that "no known victims" of trafficking were afforded the opportunity to avail themselves of medical and other services at shelters in the past year. We are deeply puzzled with this statement. We had provided the US just last month with detailed information about a variety of services that trafficking victims had utilised in the past year, including medical, counselling and translation. While we can acknowledge that much remains to be done in our fight against trafficking, we are disappointed that the United States chose to blatantly dismiss the facts and suggest that we are not doing our share.

The report also seems to assume that the domestic processes of all countries reviewed are the same as that of the United States. We note that the United States has again unabashedly awarded itself a Tier 1 Ranking. Yet, the New York Times had observed, in a 23 April 2011 report, that teenage girls coerced into prostitution in the US are treated not as trafficking victims but as miscreants who are arrested and prosecuted, instead of protected. This, for example, is directly opposite to Singapore's approach to commercial sex workers of any age in Singapore who are all prima facie considered TIP victims. As is well known, the United States also suffers from serious problems with illegal immigrants, many of whom are trafficked by well-organised criminal gangs which seem to be able to operate with impunity. On any objective criteria, the United States has a more serious TIP problem compared with Singapore.

Perhaps this incongruity could be explained by the fact that the Report does not apply a consistent, transparent, and measurable standard for all countries. As Senator James Webb said before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on 24 May 2011 "there are some inconsistencies in the way that [the US is] carrying out an otherwise well-intentioned policy. The classic example of that was that we've given Nigeria a 1 in our TIP Reports and we've given Japan a 2, and Singapore a 2W [in 2010]. We need to fix the law so that we are measuring the right sorts of things as we put these policies forward because it is causing a great deal of resentment among people who are otherwise our close friends." "

ROS-LEHTINEN CONDEMNS CUBAN REGIME'S ONGOING PROMOTION OF HUMAN TRAFFICKING

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 235 words

DATELINE: MIAMI, Fla.

The following information was released by the office of Florida Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen:

Congresswoman Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-FL) commented on the State Departments 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report, which once again designates Cuba as the lowest ranking (Tier 3), which is defined as a country that does not comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking.

Statement by Ros-Lehtinen:

The State Departments 2011 Trafficking in Persons report once again classifies Cuba as one of the worst nations in the area of human and sex trafficking. This designation as a Tier 3 country under the Trafficking Victims Protection Act should trigger the administration's reversal of its support for educational and cultural exchanges with Cuba.

"Any Cuba watcher knows that the Havana regime has no intention of eliminating trafficking in or from Cuba. In fact, it relies on this immoral practice to sustain its tyrannical ways. Child prostitution is a common profit-making scheme by the regime and Cuban doctors are used as mere pawns by the dictatorship to repay its debts to other countries.

"Having recognized Cuba's deplorable record on human trafficking, it is reprehensible that the administration would continue to make it a priority to advance educational and cultural exchanges with Cuba. In light of the State Departments own designation, I call on the Administration to reverse its position."

WATERLOO, Iowa | Michele Bachmann formally kicked off her campaign for president Monday in the town of her birth, as the Minnesota congresswoman seeking to parlay her Iowa roots and socially conservative credentials into a successful run for the GOP nomination.

The announcement was a formality; she declared during a June 13 debate that she had filed paperwork for a run. The decision to announce in Iowa, where Bachmann lived until age 12, rather than the state she serves in Congress, emphasizes the importance of the Hawkeye state. A strong showing in the caucuses, the first scheduled voting in the 2012 race, is vital for Bachmann's chances.

United States expands human-trafficking blacklist

WASHINGTON | The Obama administration on Monday nearly doubled the number of countries that may face U.S. sanctions for not doing enough to combat human trafficking, calling on those and other nations to get serious and take tough steps to eradicate the lucrative illicit practice.

In its annual Trafficking in Persons report, the State Department identified 23 nations as failing to meet minimum international standards to curb the scourge, which claims mainly women and children as victims. That's up from 13 in 2010. Another 41 countries were placed on a "watch list." The report analyzed conditions in 184 nations, including the United States, and ranked them in terms of their effectiveness in fighting what many have termed modern-day slavery. The State Department estimates that as many as 27 million men, women and children are living in such bondage around the world.

Tougher safety standards for baby cribs put into effect

WASHINGTON | Beginning today, the government is prohibiting the manufacture, sale or resale of drop-side baby cribs, which have been blamed in the deaths of dozens of children. A new federal rule bans the cribs that have a side rail that can be raised and lowered to allow parents to place or lift a baby more easily. A new generation of cribs expected to be safer will be the only cribs allowed to be sold across the country, even at yard sales.

Truck driver who crashed into train had four speeding tickets

RENO | Workers wearing hazmat suits dug through burnt-out rail cars and twisted metal Monday at the scene of a collision between a tractor-trailer and an Amtrak train as details surfaced about the driving record of the man at the wheel of the truck. Records from the Nevada Department of Motor Vehicles showed truck driver Lawrence R. Valli, 43, of Winnemucca received four speeding tickets since 2008, including three for driving a school bus over the posted speed limit in California in a 10-month period. At least six people died and about 20 were injured in Friday's collision.

Woman, 95, removes diaper for security screening at airport

DESTIN | A gravely ill 95-year-old woman had to remove her wet diaper at an airport to be patted down by security screeners and nearly missed her flight, her daughter said Monday. Lena Reppert couldn't board a June 18 flight from Northwest Florida Regional Airport in Fort Walton Beach to Detroit until she was cleared by security, her daughter Jean Weber said

. TSA officials said the agency's inspectors did nothing wrong and followed proper procedure. Spokesman Nick Kimball also said the officers did not force Reppert to remove the diaper.

Human trafficking blacklist grows; U.S. tells 23 nations they aren't doing enough

BYLINE: By Chuck Neubauer THE WASHINGTON TIMES

SECTION: A, POLITICS; Pg. 5

LENGTH: 513 words

The number of countries that have done little to combat human trafficking problems, including Libya, Cuba, North Korea, Iran and Saudi Arabia, has nearly doubled from 13 to 23 in the past year, the State Department said Monday.

These countries could face U.S. sanctions, including the loss of foreign aid, if they don't improve.

The State Department issued the rankings as part of its annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report, which analyzes the trafficking of humans, mostly women and children, in 184 countries including the United States.

Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton said in releasing the report that while progress has been made "we all have to do more." She called it "modern-day slavery" and said "more human beings are exploited than before" - as many as 27 million men, women, and children.

Department officials said estimates include 100,000 human trafficking victims in the United States.

"As we assess ourselves and governments around the world, the true test of a country's anti-trafficking efforts is not just whether a government has enacted strong laws consistent with that approach, but whether these laws are being implemented broadly and effectively," Mrs. Clinton wrote in a letter accompanying the report. "In short, it's whether they deliver.

"Last year, I visited a shelter for trafficking survivors. I was embraced by children who should have been in grade school, but were instead recovering from having been enslaved in a brothel," Mrs. Clinton wrote. "Looking into the eyes of those girls and hearing their stories firsthand brought home for me once again the very real and personal tragedy of modern slavery."

In its annual report, the State Department places countries in one of three tiers based on the extent of their governments' efforts to comply with the "minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking." The best ranking is Tier One, which includes countries like the United States. The lowest ranking is Tier 3.

The 2011 report reflects upgrades for 23 countries in recognition of progress made and downgrades for 22 countries.

The new countries in Tier 3, the lowest rank, are Algeria, the Central African Republic, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Equatorial Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Lebanon, Libya, Madagascar, Micronesia, Turkmenistan, Venezuela and Yemen. They join the bottom tier that already included Burma, Cuba, North Korea, Iran, Mauritania, Sudan, Eritrea, Zimbabwe, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and Papua New Guinea.

Separately, the report also cited six nations, including Chad, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Myanmar, Somalia, Sudan and Yemen, for using child soldiers and not taking steps to end the practice. Another 41 countries were placed on a "watch list," which could lead to sanctions unless their records improve.

The Dominican Republic, which was in the bottom tier on the last report, improved its standards and moved up to the second tier.

The report recommendations for the U.S. included improving its data collection and its funding for victim services.

Hong Kong: Government spares no effort in combating human trafficking

LENGTH: 333 words

DATELINE: India

India, June 28 -- In response to media enquiries on the US Trafficking in Persons Report 2011, a Government spokesman said today (June 28) that the Government spares no effort in combating human trafficking. Responding to Hong Kong being placed in Tier 2, the spokesman reiterated that Hong Kong is neither a destination for human trafficking nor a place of origin for such trafficking. Notwithstanding the rare occurrence of human trafficking crimes in Hong Kong, our Police cracked down in 2010 on four trafficking syndicates, with five people convicted and sentenced to imprisonment, the spokesman said. Our law enforcement agencies also initiated new measures last year to combat human trafficking, including enhanced training for front-line law enforcers and producing educational pamphlets in several languages to raise public awareness. In regard to the labour rights of foreign domestic helpers (FDHs) in Hong Kong, the spokesman stressed that the Government attaches great importance to protecting their rights. Like local employees, FDHs in Hong Kong are protected by the Employment Ordinance and are entitled to at least one rest day in every period of seven days, in addition to statutory holidays and annual leave.

The Government will not tolerate any illegal acts of employers and employment agencies, and will take stringent enforcement and prosecution action against any malpractice, the spokesman said. On the reports recommendation on amending local law, the spokesman said, The local legislation already provides a solid framework underpinning our robust efforts to combat human trafficking activities. We do not see any imminent need to amend local laws. We will continue collaborating with overseas law enforcement agencies in the fight against human trafficking, the spokesman added. Singapore dismayed at unabashed U.S. human trafficking report

SECTION: WORLD NEWS; PoliticalLENGTH: 469 wordsDATELINE: SINGAPORE June 28

Singapore criticized a United States Department of State human trafficking report on Tuesday, saying that the report released by the world's only superpower does not apply a consistent, transparent and measurable standard for all countries.

On any objective criteria, the United States has a more serious TIP (trafficking in persons report) problem compared with Singapore," Singapore's Ministry of Foreign Affairs said in a statement.

The Trafficking in Persons Report released by the U.S. Department of State upgraded Singapore's ranking to Tier Two, which means that it is among a group of countries making efforts to meet the U.S. standard of human trafficking but does not yet meet the standards.

Singapore said it noted the change to Singapore's ranking but is dismayed to find the report riddled with inaccuracies in the section on Singapore.

Mexican judge sentences 4 in human trafficking case

BYLINE: By the CNN Wire Staff

SECTION: WORLD

LENGTH: 505 words

A federal judge in Mexico has sentenced four people to a minimum of 16 1/2 years each behind bars for human trafficking, the Mexican attorney general's office said Tuesday, marking a rare conviction in a country struggling to get a grip on the illegal trade.

The investigation began because of a tip from the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agency, authorities said.

Agents rescued four women being forced to work as prostitutes in Miami, Florida, according to a statement from the Mexican attorney general's office. An ICE spokeswoman said U.S. agents identified two of the victims in Miami and that the other two were identified by authorities in Mexico.

Their children were being held in Tenancingo, a municipality in the southern Mexican state of Tlaxcala, and the women's contact with them was conditioned on their sending money to their handlers, the statement said.

On June 7, 2010, Mexican authorities raided the home in Tlaxcala, arresting the four suspects.

Fausto Velazquez Zompantzi, Jaime Velazquez Zompantzi and Severiana Zompantzi Rojas were sentenced to 16 1/2 years in prison each for the parts they played in the crime. Jorge Velazquez Zompantzi was sentenced to 18 1/2 years. In addition to trafficking, he was also found guilty of possessing a firearm licensed exclusively to the military.

The women's children were sent to be with their mothers in the United States, according to the attorney general's office.

The statement said the case represents the first time the attorney general's office of the Special Prosecutor for Organized Crime, also known as SIEDO, obtained a conviction and sentence for a human trafficking crime.

Mexico, like many countries, struggles to investigate, prosecute and punish trafficking offenders.

The U.S. State Department released its 2011 report on human trafficking Monday, assessing efforts by 184 governments worldwide to fight sexual exploitation, forced labor and moder-day slavery.

The annual report, considered one of the most comprehensive analyses of worldwide human trafficking, ranks countries in three "tiers." Mexico was put in the middle tier.

Notably, the reported cited the municipality of Tenancingo as a major source for Mexican sex trafficking victims exploited within Mexico and in the United States.

Women, children, indigenous people and undocumented migrants are especially vulnerable, the report read.

While noting some of the recent strides made by the Mexican government in countering trafficking, particularly at the federal level, the study also cited reports that some local law enforcement officials tolerate and are sometimes complicit in the illegal trade.

"Given the magnitude of Mexico's trafficking problem ... the number of human trafficking investigations, prosecutions, convictions, and sentences remained low, and government funding for victim services remained inadequate," it read.

The State Department says 27 million people are victims of human trafficking worldwide, and approximately 100,000 of those victims are in the United States.

US expands human trafficking blacklist

The Obama administration on Monday nearly doubled the number of countries that may face U.S. sanctions for not doing enough to combat human trafficking, calling on those and other nations to get serious and take tough steps to eradicate the lucrative illicit practice.

In its annual Trafficking in Persons report, the State Department identified 23 nations as failing to meet minimum international standards to curb the scourge, which claims mainly women and children as victims. The State Department estimates that as many as 27 million men, women and children are living in such bondage around the worlds.

"All countries can and must do more," Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton said in presenting the report. "More human beings are being exploited today than ever before."

"We're at critical moment in this fight," she said. "The problem of modern trafficking may be entrenched, and it may seem like there is no end in sight. But if we act on the laws that have been passed and the commitments that have been made, it is solvable. If we increase the pressure on traffickers and the networks they thrive in, we can set ourselves on a course to one day eradicate modern slavery."

Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J., one of the authors of the law that established the report and offered protection to trafficking victims, said he was "deeply disappointed" that China was given a political waiver despite its ongoing and expanding problem of human trafficking, particularly sex-trafficking of women and girls.

"This political waiver for China is totally unacceptable," Smith said. "The Obama administration has again abandoned trafficking victims in China who are predominantly women. It's shameful."

Among the countries on the blacklist are perennial rogues Cuba, Iran, Myanmar, North Korea and Sudan along with frequent U.S. foes Eritrea, Libya and Zimbabwe. Others are U.S. allies in the Middle East like Kuwait and Saudi Arabia while Papua New Guinea was cited as a repeat offender. Only one country, the Dominican Republic, was removed from the list.

The 11 new countries on the blacklist are Algeria, the Central African Republic, Equatorial Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Lebanon, Libya, Madagascar, Micronesia, Turkmenistan, Venezuela and Yemen.

Separately, the report also cited six nations Chad, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Myanmar, Somalia, Sudan and Yemen for using child soldiers and not taking steps to end the practice.

Estonia, Belarus put on human trafficking watchlist

LENGTH: 548 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 27 2011

The United States on Monday put Estonia and Belarus on a human trafficking watchlist, alleging they failed in the last year to step up efforts to fight prostitution and forced labor.

In its 2011 annual Global Trafficking in Persons Report, the State Department also maintained Russia on the list for the eighth consecutive year for the same alleged failures.

"Estonia is a source, transit, and destination country for women subjected to forced prostitution, and for men and women subjected to conditions of forced labor," the State Department said.

Not only are Estonian women from the countryside forced into prostitution in the capital Tallinn, they also end up in the sex trafficking trade in Finland, the Netherlands, Britain, Germany and Italy, it said.

Both men and women from Estonia are also "subjected to conditions of forced labor" in Spain, Sweden, Norway, and Finland, according to the 2011 Global Trafficking in Persons Report.

"The government of Estonia does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so," the report said.

"Despite these efforts, the government did not demonstrate evidence of increasing efforts over the previous reporting period," it added, placing Estonia on the Tier 2 watchlist.

Belarus was put on the list for the same reason, with the report charging that the government in Minsk "demonstrated decreased law enforcement efforts" while the report was being conducted.

The report said women and children are sold into the sex trade in Russia, Germany, Poland, the Czech Republic, Lithuania, Spain, Greece, Belgium, Turkey, Israel, Lebanon, Egypt, the United Arab Emirates.

There were also continuing reports of women from poor families forced into prostitution in the capital Minsk.

"Belarussian men, women, and children are found in forced begging, as well as in forced labor in the construction industry and other sectors in Russia and Belarus," it said.

The State Department also reprimanded Russia once again.

Citing the Migration Research Center, it said around one million people in Russia are exploited by business leaders who withhold their documents, fail to pay for services, physically abuse them and deny them proper living conditions.

Abuses occurred in the construction, manufacturing, agriculture and domestic services industries, it added.

"There are reports of many men and women from North Korea subjected to conditions of forced labor in the logging industry in the Russian Far East," it said.

"There are also reports of exploitation of children, including child prostitution in large Russian cities and forced begging," it added.

"Russian women were reported to be victims of sex trafficking in many countries, including in Northeast Asia, Europe, and throughout the Middle East," it said.

It said that because it had a written plan, Russia was not dropped to the lowest Tier 3 group, countries which are deemed not to be making significant efforts to meet the minimum standards of fighting trafficking.

"Russia is devoting sufficient resources to implement that plan," it said.

Tier 3 countries may "be subject to certain sanctions, whereby the US government may withhold or withdraw nonhumanitarian, non-trade-related foreign assistance," the State Department said.

HIGHLIGHT: The U.S. State Department has released an annual report on the efforts of governments around the world to stop human trafficking. It says North Korea, Saudi Arabia, and Iran are among the worst offenders, meaning trafficking is flourishing there and the governments are doing little to stop it. Hundreds of Syrian government opponents gathered in Damascus to call for democracy earlier. The government approved their conference so some activists stayed away saying it gave a false impression that the regime allows dissent on its continuing and deadly crackdown. French president Nicolas Sarkozy says his country's banks are ready to play a role in Greece's rescue. He says the lenders have agreed to a rollover deal to extend Greece's loans by 30 years.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON, SECRETARY OF STATE: We have to really mix the commitments with actions in order to get results.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BECKY ANDERSON, HOST: With more slaves in the world today than ever before, Hillary Clinton says it's a critical moment in the fight against human trafficking.

From the streets of Washington to the shantytowns of Sudan, there are more than 27 million victims worldwide. Tonight, we shine a spotlight on the global trade in human life.

Plus, a top U.N. official says Libya's rebels have now got the upper hand.

So is the tide turning against Gadhafi?

And why it's been a bad day for the top women at Wimbledon.

These stories and more tonight, as we connect the world.

Well, the time for action is now. That's the message from the U.S. State Department today, as it publishes its annual assessment of how countries around the world are faring in the fight against human trafficking.

Well, the report shows some progress and indicates that some countries are succeeding in their efforts. But it's also laying out some hard truths. As many as 27 million people are living as slaves in the world today -- more than at any point in history.

Well, the annual Trafficking in Persons Report is a key resource for the CNN Freedom Project. It provides a comprehensive look at government action to fight human slavery, which is something we are all committed to covering all of this year. And we make no excuses about it.

Well, the report was released this afternoon at the State Department in Washington.

CNN's Jill Dougherty was there.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

JILL DOUGHERTY, CNN FOREIGN AFFAIRS CORRESPONDENT: The State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report says around the globe, 27 million people are held in bondage, including 100,000 in the United States, subject to sexual exploitation, forced labor and modern-day slavery.

It ranks 184 countries around the world, questioning whether their governments are doing enough to fight trafficking.

Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, introducing the report, said many countries have laws on the books but they are not enforced.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON, SECRETARY OF STATE: The measure of success can no longer be whether a country has passed laws, because so many have in the last decade. Now, we have to make sure that laws are implemented and that countries are using the tools that have been created for that. And governments should work more closely with the private sector and use new supply chain monitoring techniques to let consumers know if their goods and services come from slavery-free, responsible sources.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

DOUGHERTY: As soon as this report is released, U.S. diplomats in post around the world approach the countries and talk to them about the report, presenting the results according to their individual countries and also suggesting concrete recommendations for countries to improve their fight against trafficking and to help victims more.

Jill Dougherty, CNN, the State Department.

ANDERSON: Well, in a CNN Freedom Project exclusive, Jim Clancy spoke today with U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton. Hear what Secretary Clinton had to say about the report's findings later this hour here on CONNECT THE WORLD.

I want to get a closer look at these findings for you.

This is a map, a color-coded map of the world and rankings here -- two, one, two, two-and-a-half and three.

Let me just take you through what you've got here.

Take a look at the blue countries here -- the U.S., Canada, Colombia, most of Europe, as you can see, Nigeria, South Korea and Australia -- these are countries that the report says fully comply with the Trafficking Victims Protection Act.

Let's bring up here two for you here. They're in yellow. Most of Latin America, Eastern Europe and much of the Middle East and Asia, including Japan, they're countries not yet in compliance with the U.S. standards, but are making serious efforts to get there.

These are not -- these are tier two watch. Have a look at these. These are countries in orange -- right about here, yes, in orange. About a third of Africa. The big ones are China and Russia. And these are tier three.

What are we doing here?

Tier three countries red. Cuba and Venezuela and about 10 countries in Africa, Saudi Arabia, Yemen, Iran, Turkmenistan and various others, these are not in compliance and making no significant efforts to be in compliance.

Now, we've got correspondents all over the world who are looking into these findings.

We are in Africa, in South America and, indeed, in the Middle East tonight.

First, though, let's go to Nkepile Mabuse, who is in Johannesburg -- Nkepile.

NKEPILE MABUSE, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Well, Becky, overall, the situation on the African continent is not looking very good. Africa has the largest number of countries that have been downgraded between 2010 and today.

But let's start with a little bit of good news, Becky.

Nigeria and Mauritius are the two countries that are seen to have adequate laws. And they're using these laws to actually prosecute offenders.

South Africa, where I am, is seen as a bit of a disappointment, because despite the fact that the country drafted an anti-trafficking law in 2003, this law has still not been passed by parliament. There was a bit of argument around the fact that that law did not go far enough, Becky, to protect trafficked persons from going through the same experience over and over again.

And now, when we look at some of the seriously problematic areas on the continent, it's very clear that conflict and poverty play a very, very huge role. That's why you see countries like Libya, Ivory Coast and Somalia getting some of the lowest ratings -- Becky.

ANDERSON: All right, Nkepile.

Thank you very much, indeed, for that.

Of course, we've just been taking a look at this part of the world with Nkepile.

I want to get into the Middle East now, where we've got Kevin Flower up for you this evening.

You can see a significant, a significant part of this region really not doing particularly well at all. It's called here a three at this point.

CNN's Kevin Flower looking at the story across the Middle East tonight for us from Jerusalem -- Kevin.

KEVIN FLOWER, CNN JERUSALEM BUREAU CHIEF: Well, Becky, what's immediately striking in looking at this State Department report is that not one single country from the Middle East is ranked in that top tier of countries that you spoke about, tier one. So, really, what this means is that not a single country in the region is meeting the minimum standards in fighting the elimination of human trafficking.

Now, compounding this middling grade is the fact that four countries -- Libya, Lebanon, Algeria and Yemen -- have been downgraded from tier two to tier three, which joins them with -- with the illustrious company of Saudi Arabia, Iran and Kuwait in not making -- making any significant efforts to eliminate human trafficking.

So you compound this with concerns from NGOs that continued political instability in the country could diminish the efforts to fight human trafficking and you're left with a -- an overall grade that's really quite disappointing -- Becky.

ANDERSON: That's right.

Kevin Flower for you out of Jerusalem, covering the region tonight.

And I'll just remind you of some of what he was talking about here. Well, then you can see it. It's the region there.

Let's get to the Americas for you now this evening, this part of the world. South American countries cover a broad spectrum, every tier represented on that continent, though most countries do fall into what's known as tier two, including Argentina, where you'll find CNN's Brian Byrnes standing by for you this evening -- the story from there, Brian?

BRIAN BYRNES, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Well, as you said, Becky, the majority of South American nations do fall into the tier two category, with two notable exceptions -- Venezuela, previously, in the last four years, the country had been on the tier two watch list. This year, it dropped to tier three.

And its neighbor, Colombia, on the tier one category, the only nation in South America to be in the tier one category.

Well, it's notable to note here that Colombia is a staunch ally of the United States, whereas Venezuela and the U.S. have clashed repeatedly over the last decade. And, in fact, Venezuela has accused the U.S. of using the TIP Report as a political tool.

Elsewhere, here in Argentina, the country has been lauded for an increase -- a record number of prosecutions, including 15 conventions for sex traffickers. However, the report said that overall here in Argentina, prosecutions remain relatively low.

In other countries, like Bolivia, Brazil and Paraguay, there are efforts underway and progress is being made. Still, a lot of people in those countries are victims of trafficking, both at home and abroad -- Becky.

ANDERSON: Brian Byrnes out of Argentina for you.

CNN's Nkepile Mabuse in Johannesburg.

And Kevin Flower in Jerusalem for you.

Well, let's move on.

We've gotten the view from those areas of the world, but what about right here in Europe?

Well, Aidan McQuade is the director of Anti-Slavery International.

And he joins me now in the studio.

It's an important day for CNN. We have this Freedom Project going on all year. It's an important day out of the State Department today, with Hillary Clinton's words.

I want you to just step back for us and just give us some sense of the -- the enormity of this problem.

AIDAN MCQUADE, DIRECTOR, ANTI-SLAVERY INTERNATIONAL: Well, I think the TIP Report does give a good snapshot of just what the size of the problem is. But I think it's -- one must see the limit here of the sample, as well. It is a snapshot. There's things that it doesn't look at. And it looks across 185 or so countries against a number of criteria, principally around law enforcement.

But, of course, as you and as many of the viewers of CNN will well understand, the causes of slavery in the world are much broader than simply the implementation of law enforcement, though that does give a good indication of how well or how poorly some countries are doing.

ANDERSON: OK. Well, talk to us about the causes.

Talk about what's going on.

MCQUADE: Well, I think the -- the TIP Report highlights government action and people -- you see the -- the countries moving up and down based on just how good government action is. Unfortunately, it doesn't judge linkages between countries. And as you -- you well understand, trafficking in human beings is very often a transnational problem. And so therefore, causality in one country can lead to -- lead to the problem in another.

But that's not covered quite well in the TIP Report in terms of how well these things are doing.

A second issue, as well, is in terms of the issue of discrimination and prejudice, because it doesn't just happen to anybody. People who tend to be enslaved in this part -- in the world today, are the same as those who have been enslaved in -- throughout history. They're people against whom the society in which they are enslaved has a significant prejudice.

So you see inside the Asias, significant prejudice against the Dallah (ph) people, for example, who then form about 90 percent of the communities who are enslaved.

You see in Europe, great prejudice against migrant laborers, and therefore, they're the majority of people who are enslaved.

In South America, you see significant prejudice against indigenous people and therefore those who are enslaved.

ANDERSON: I know it's -- that there's no sort of catchall description of any one modern day slave today, in 2011, but if you had to describe just what people are going through who are now deemed modern-day slaves, what would it be?

MCQUADE: The -- one of the central things that you see in all of the case studies is you see people who have hoped for a better life for themselves and their families. And those hopes have not just been betrayed, but they were the causes of the vulnerability, which made them become a slave in the first place. It's people who take a loan in India in order to pay for medicine for their children. It's people who come from Eastern Europe to Western Europe in order to look for enough money in order to send home so that their younger brothers and sisters can get educated.

That tends to be a common pattern across the board.

ANDERSON: Stay with me.

I want to talk to my correspondent, Jim Clancy, standing by in Washington, where the report was released this afternoon -- and, Jim, I know you've just been talking to Hillary Clinton, an exclusive sit-down with her.

What did she say?

JIM CLANCY, CNN CORRESPONDENT: She had a lot to talk about. You know, what to do about the diplomacy of all of this. It's a difficult time for the State Department. They're confronting some friends, some rather good friends, and putting them at the bottom of the list yet again. And it's going to be a message of tough love.

But this was a day here at the State Department that I haven't seen before, where not only is -- is a grand room filled, but there are overflow crowds.

And Hillary Clinton herself, someone who's been working on human trafficking and standing up for the victims of human trafficking for the past -- well, more than a decade, when she was just the first lady, she was somebody that -- who shared with me not just a prosecutor -- the in particular of prosecutions and partnerships, the importance of protecting the victims, but the passion that she brings to all of this.

Take a listen.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

CLINTON: I have been caring about and working on this now for, you know, longer than a decade. And the passion is there because it's such a violation of human rights and human dignity to see men, women and children forced into bondage, slavery, in the 21st century, is just absolutely unforgettable and unforgivable.

So we do take seriously the -- the mission that the United States, along with many international partners, has undertaken, which is to prevent and to prosecute and to do everything we can in our efforts to stop modern-day slavery.

And that means we have to have partnerships, which is very important. And we have to protect those who are at risk and those who are put into it.

So we went from three Ps to four Ps, but passion underlies all of them.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

CLANCY: Hillary Clinton there laying out, really, some of her sentiments in all of this and hoping that others will, you know, seize upon the passion.

In the meantime, she's got a lot of diplomacy to do. You know, they added another, what, dozen members -- 10 or a dozen members to that tier three list. So in some ways, one could say that the U.S. was passing out a lot of tough love when it published this report here today.

ANDERSON: Yes, all right, Jim.

Thanks for that.

And more of Jim's interview with Hillary Clinton later this hour.

I'm still with Aiman in the studio with me.

He will be back with me later this hour here on CONNECT THE WORLD.

Moving on for the beginning, we'll have the stories that we will be bringing you tonight.

Pleading her innocence, but new accusations are leveled against American murder suspect, Amanda Knox. In six minutes, we'll bring you the latest from the courtroom there in Italy.

Also, a man wanted or a wanted man -- why some believe an arrest warrant for Moammar Gadhafi will prolong the bloodshed in Libya. That story in the next quarter of an hour here on CNN.

And down they fall -- the big names tumble at Wimbledon. We'll have all the day's highlights in just over 20 minutes.

You're watching CONNECT THE WORLD.

I'm Becky Anderson in London.

Back after this.

ANDERSON: And 19 minutes past 9:00.

I'm Becky Anderson in London.

You're watching CONNECT THE WORLD here on CNN.

A look at the other stories we are following for you this hour.

And there are mixed messages about a planned media appearance by Yemen's president. Ali Abdullah Saleh has not been seen since a militant attack on his palace grounds in early June. Well, he's recovering in a hospital in Saudi Arabia, we're told. An aide said Sunday that the president would make an appearance within 48 hours.

But another official says that it not the case.

The United Nations Security Council has agreed to send more than 4,000 peacekeepers to Abyei in Sudan. The Ethiopian force will monitor the withdrawal of government troops whose occupation of the disputed region in May caused thousands to flee. Abyei sits on the border of Sudan and Southern Sudan, but both sides claim the territory.

Tensions are high ahead of Southern Sudan's independence in early July.

Well, we've entered a critical week for the Greece -- for Greece as the debt-ridden country battles to stave off a financial collapse. France is leading the rescue bid. President Nicholas Sarkozy announcing a radical plan, where French banks would extend the life of a Greek loan by 30 years.

The proposal comes as Greek lawmakers prepare to debate further spending cuts that are sparking another wave of protests in the capital. And on Wednesday on CONNECT THE WORLD, we'll be live in Athens for reaction to the crucial Greek parliament vote.

What will it mean for the future of the euro and, indeed, the entire European project?

Be part of that debate. A special edition of CONNECT THE WORLD Wednesday in Athens.

Well, a fight to prove her innocence continues for Amanda Knox, the American student convicted of killing her British roommate, Meredith Kercher, in Italy.

Now, at an appeal hearing on Monday, Knox faced a surprise accusation from another man serving time for the murder.

Dan Rivers is following the case for you.

This from him.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

DAN RIVERS, CNN INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENT: It was a day of dramatic testimony here in Perugia, Italy in the continuing appeal of Amanda Knox and her then-boyfriend, Raffaele Sollecito. Rudy Guede, their co-accused, was called to give evidence. The defense team were hoping that he would be sort tripped up in cross-examination and would admit that it was he and he alone who murdered the British student, Meredith Kercher, in November 2007.

In the end, though, the exact opposite happened. For the first time, he said that he explicitly thought that Knox and Sollecito were guilty of the murder, something he had only implied in testimony previously.

There was also a dramatic moment when Amanda Knox herself made a statement to the court. During the statement, she said she was shocked by Guede's evidence. She said: "He knew that we weren't in the house on the night of the murder."

She said she didn't know what really happened and she said she was sorry that she couldn't talk to Guede direct, to question him about the events.

As well as her statement, Raffaele Sollecito also spoke to the court and said that before, Guede had only mentioned a shadow that he thought may have been Amanda Knox in the house that evening. Now he seemed to be changing his story. He said that they had been in jail for four years and that their lives have been ruined, all on the evidence, really, of this one man, Rudy Guede.

In the end, though, this defense attempt to try and get Rudy Guede to trip up in cross-examination backfired. He didn't. So now they will be relying on forensic evidence and DNA evidence that will be re-examined over the next few weeks.

Dan Rivers, CNN, Perugia.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

ANDERSON: Well, from Libyan leader to war crimes suspect wanted around the world, coming up, I'm going to tell you about a new arrest warrant for Moammar Gadhafi and two of his relatives.

Then, in about 15 minutes, a dramatic day at Wimbledon. Stay tuned for some shocking upsets.

ANDERSON: Judges at the Hague want the world's help in capturing Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi. The International Criminal Court has issued an arrest warrant, accusing him of war crimes and crimes against humanity. Gadhafi's son, Saif, and the Libyan intelligence chief were also charged.

Now, the ICC says it has evidence linking them to widespread and systematic attacks on civilians in the early days of Libya's uprising.

You're with CONNECT THE WORLD.

I'm Becky Anderson.

Gadhafi's arrest warrant isn't the only development for Libyan rebels. They're also making gains on the battlefield, rebels moving in closer to Tripoli, Gadhafi's stronghold, of course. They say they are now 80 kilometers away, after a fierce battle in Bir al-Ghanam, a town southwest of the capital. A top United Nations official says the NATO air campaign is a big factor in the rebels' advance.

Lynn Pascoe says it appears the opposition now has the upper hand.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

LYNN PASCOE, U.N. UNDERSECRETARY-GENERAL FOR POLITICAL AFFAIRS: While we do not have a detailed understanding of the military situation on the ground, it is clear that the initiative, although halting, is now with the opposition forces, supported, at times, by NATO air power.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

ANDERSON: Well, interestingly enough, some critics say the arrest warrant for Gadhafi could actually damage efforts to find a political solution to the crisis. They say it's highly unlikely he'll go into exile if he thinks he might end up at the Hague.

Well, David McKenzie is in Libya for you this evening.

He's in Tripoli following some of -- or -- if not all of these developments for you -- David, I'm assuming you're still with us?

I think we've lost him.

If we get back to him, we will bring him back up here on CONNECT THE WORLD.

Let's get you a very short break, shall we?

Lots more still to come on CONNECT THE WORLD.

Don't go anywhere.

BECKY ANDERSON, CNN ANCHOR: At just about half past nine in London. You're back with CONNECT THE WORLD. I'm Becky Anderson.

Let's get you a check of the headlines out here on CNN.

The U.S. State Department has released an annual report on the efforts of governments around the world to stop human trafficking. It says North Korea, Saudi Arabia, and Iran are among the worst offenders, meaning trafficking is flourishing there and the governments are doing little to stop it.

While hundreds of Syrian government opponents gathered in Damascus to call for democracy earlier. The government approved their conference so some activists stayed away saying it gave a false impression that the regime allows dissent on its continuing and deadly crackdown.

French president Nicolas Sarkozy says his country's banks are ready to play a role in Greece's rescue. He says the lenders have agreed to a rollover deal to extend Greece's loans by 30 years.

The U.N. Security Council has approved a resolution to send more than 4,000 peacekeepers to the town of Abyei that's been the source of conflict between Sudan and southern Sudan ahead of the south July independence.

The American student found guilty in Italy of killing her British roommate is fighting her conviction. Amanda Knox (INAUDIBLE) an appeal hearing. She does not know what happened the night that Meredith Kercher was killed.

And judges at the Hague want world help in capturing Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi. The International Criminal Court has issued an arrest warrant accusing him of war crimes and crimes against humanity. Gadhafi's son Saif and the Libyan intelligence chief were also charged.

Let's get back to David McKenzie. We lost him just a little bit early. He's been following all of these developments from Tripoli.

Joining you now on the line, a reaction there to these arrest warrants, David.

DAVID MCKENZIE, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Well, basically, the reaction is is that the Libyan government is rubbishing the arrest warrants from the ICC. The justice minister and the deputy prime minister just had a press conference here in Tripoli. Basically, they're saying that for a number of reasons that they aren't even going to consider this, (INAUDIBLE) ignore it. They say (INAUDIBLE) the Rome statute - the statute their country signed to be beholden to the Hague courts that they have no reason to worry about the Hague arrest warrants for three of their top leaders, obviously including Moammar Gadhafi. They're also saying - playing a kind of a political card in that they're saying that all of the ICC's cases are in Africa and the justice minister stressing that in his words, "the ICC is picking on (INAUDIBLE) third world countries." So they're certainly trying to push an alignment with the African Union or any others who might (INAUDIBLE) that the ICC has been unfairly treating African states which is certainly the feeling of certain countries on the continent. So basically, they're saying this is nothing to do with them, that they aren't going to - that they're going to do a local process to a judiciary inquiry here in Kenya - I'm sorry - here in (INAUDIBLE) Libya and that the ICC is really has nothing to do with the Libyan situation.

ANDERSON: And many experts or critics certainly suggesting that it may be a reason why Moammar Gadhafi would stay and (INAUDIBLE) for the long term of this when he seems to have nowhere else to go at this point.

Meantime, David, we're certainly hearing from rebels that they are some now 80 kilometres away from Tripoli and gaining ground. What are you hearing there in the capital?

MCKENZIE: We're basically hearing that southwest of here between 80 and 100 kilometres in a strategic town, the rebels are pushing out of the margins, Becky, and they're pushing towards Zawiya or they could push towards Tripoli itself. Now, certainly, for them to actually start making inward into the capital itself would be very difficult from a military standpoint. But it's what is more likely from their perspective is if they push towards towns like Zawiya which are - if you think of it geographically - west of the capital between here and Tripoli and the Tunisian border. They could meet up with the resistance movement that periodically has fled up in Zawiya, this major town west of here, and that could tap alternate supply lines between here and Tunisia, which is really the only major supply line for fuel and food and other goods right now for the Gadhafi regime. We're not at this point yet and certainly they haven't taken that strategic area. They are ongoing fighting but it does prove that if this campaign should move in one direction or another significantly, it's more likely to happen in this region than it is to the east of here in Misrata where basically they've been at a stand-off for some weeks. Becky?

ANDERSON: All right. That's David McKenzie out of Tripoli for you this evening. Thank you, David.

That is your wrap of the news headlines at this point in this hour.

All right. Let's take a look at what's been happening in the world of sports.

Right here in London, it's the Wimbledon championships which have (INAUDIBLE) served up the biggest stories since big names have been scratched out.

Patrick Snell joining us now with more of what has been a day of upsets.

And what a day! It was a beautiful day and they expect rain tomorrow, I think, probably, so as good a day as any as far as the weather was concerned. But Patrick, oh dear, some real upsets.

PATRICK SNELL, SPORTS CORRESPONDENT: Yes, absolutely, Becky.

Let's - first of all - recap what's been happening on the women's side of things. That's where some stellar names are already out on Monday at the start of week two. I'm talking in particular about the Williams sisters - both Serena and Venus are out of the tournament, would you believe? A pair of shock to both of them going out. This is the first time they've gone out on the same day in 15 years as well.

Serena Williams - the number nine seed from France, Marion Bartoli, beating her. She was just too strong for the American player and that was a big, big win for her. Serena's been plagued by injuries, of course, over the last 12 months. It's the earliest (INAUDIBLE) for her since 2005 and how so Venus, her older sibling - she went down six-two, six-three to Tsvetana Pironkova, the Bulgarian who by the way beat her, Becky, by the same scoreline in the quarterfinals last year. It was a huge shock when you consider the siblings had won nine out of the last eleven singles crowns of the all-England club and, as they say, it's a huge shock all around.

Now, if you thought that was bad, there's another one to come. I can tell you it's not just the Williams sisters who are feeling the pressure right now because the world number one from Denmark, Caroline Wozniacki, is out after losing to Dominika Cibulkova in three sets. Again, real problems, I think, for Ms. Wozniacki. She's still looking for that elusive first slam title. She's 20 years of age and a not so great day - on this day at least - still seeking that first slam victory she loses to the number 24 seed from Slovakia who's certainly doing her nation proud right now.

And-

ANDERSON: Fun and games, certainly in the women's game. Patrick, what about the men?

SNELL: Yeah, on the men's side of things, well, the Centre Court was getting pretty busy. In the crowd, we some royalty there for the Andy Murray show - the Scott was in action - and they certainly liked what they saw. The Duke and Duchess of Cambridge are on hand to see Murray beat the French player Richard Gasquet in a straight set - seven-six, six-three, six-two.

Other notables: a win for the Australian open champion - there we go, we do have the royalty there while they're arriving for the big clash with Andy Murray. And he is the perennial British hope now in the place of (INAUDIBLE). Of course, no British male has won Wimbledon since 1936 and the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge certainly, I'm sure, happy to see Murray get through that.

Wins also this day for Roger Federer - the six-time champion - and Rafael Nadal of Spain. He's the defending champion. He's also through.

Okay, let's move it on. On Monday, we've day two of the FIFA Women's World Cup, Becky, in Germany where it's reported a TV audience of some 80 million tuned in to see the host win their opener against CONCACAF champs Canada. By the way, that's twice as many people who watched the European Grand Prix in Spain over the weekend.

On the field of play, Mexico meeting England - this was in Group B - in a match that ended in a 1-all draw. (INAUDIBLE) Fara Williams putting the English team ahead but (INAUDIBLE) levelling through Monica Ocampo. Mexico was certainly happy with the results. Over the last time they met England back in 2005, they were stumped five-nil.

And Monday's first match featuring Japan versus New Zealand in Group B. This one in (INAUDIBLE), Germany. Each side conceded a goal in the first 12 minutes of that one but it was Japan who would take all three points, thanks to a (INAUDIBLE) minute strike from Aya Miyama.

In our show, at the bottom of the next hour, we're talking about world sport, of course. Make sure you join us as I indulge in a spot of drifting through the streets of midtown Atlanta with Team Red Bull. Not to be missed. I survived, obviously, because I'm here right now, but it was a little bit hair-raising at times. It was certainly a new experience. We'll have a full report plus so much more from Wimbledon. Join us at the bottom of the next hour.

Becky, back to you.

ANDERSON: If that was you driving, you don't think you would be able to drive straight down the road. Was that you driving?

SNELL: I was not driving. I was a passenger on that occasion and I can tell you I was happy to be a passenger, as well.

ANDERSON: Good stuff. We'll look forward to that. Bottom of the hour, World Sport with Patrick Snell this evening.

Up next, how an age-old form of wrestling could shape one country's future Olympic hopes. Our "Eye On" series takes you to Georgia for a ringside seat. That after this short break. Do stay with us.

ANDERSON: A spectacular pan - a rugged landscape with an ancient knocking tumultuous history. This is Georgia, part of the gateway between Europe and central Asia. Well, CNN's "Eye On" series travels to a different country each month exploring business, culture, and the way of life. And we take you on a small forward-looking adventure, we hope, and explore things you may not know about the country in areas of business and culture.

So far, we've visited Ukraine, Germany, and India. Now, this month, we've got our eye on Georgia.

Located in the (INAUDIBLE) region east of the Black Sea and south of Russia, Georgia gained independence in 1991 when the Soviet Union collapsed, you'll remember. About 4 and a half million people live in the country, the majority Orthodox Christians. About 10 percent though are Muslims.

Georgia's main industry is agriculture. Products such as grapes, citrus fruits and hazelnuts. Outside of work, many Georgians have a lot of sports as many of us do. But there's one in particular which combines popularity, tradition, and a whole lot of muscle. Paula Newton went along to some ringside action.

PAULA NEWTON, CNN CORRESPONDENT (voice-over): The grand stage has been set in the middle of a farmer's field. Folk music blares. The band plays on. The performers get into character.

This looks and sounds like a duelling dash of thespians other than a clash of titans.

Passes for a sort of Georgian tango until the competitors set in the moods are raw, visceral even.

So the idea here is that they get their opponents flat on their backs just like that. And that's the way they win the match.

The rounds are short, sharp and intense - five minutes each. And yet the competitors grace belies a brawny, even primitive, form of fighting.

NEWTON (on camera): So they claim that (INAUDIBLE) or Georgian wrestling is actually a great training for judo. And to prove it, they have a 2004 Olympic judo champion in the house.

ZURAB ZVIADAURI, OLYMPIC GOLD MEDALIST (through translator): Ninety percent of my victory was from Georgian wrestling and I used a lot of moves that I learned here.

NEWTON: The ring is carpeted in saw dust, the atmosphere's thick with tradition and tension. This ancient form of Georgian wrestling could have a hold on the prize fight of the future. The global phenomenon of mixed martial arts is taking notice. By borrowing unique moves in training from their Georgian fighting heritage, these competitors could move on to professional fighting careers.

For now, they battle on here.

While we're keeping an eye on the prize, it's having a battle of its own. It battles on. It battles on. And - victory. It's a few seconds before anyone notices. And he's cornered.

(on camera): So there's a little bit of a commotion there. The grand prize tried to run away but they're ready, they're back on track and they're going to reward the grand prize.

(voice-over): A winner is declared. 26-year-old (INAUDIBLE) awaits his prize as the Olympic champion drags it over. And this is the best move of the match.

He tells us not everyone can wrestle like this. He has to be in rare form.

And so he clutches his prize. One guess as to what he's going to do with it.

Paula Newton, CNN, (INAUDIBLE) Georgia.

ANDERSON: Keeping our eye on Georgia for you this evening.

Well, still to come on CONNECT THE WORLD - getting tough on human trafficking. Up next, an exclusive interview with U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton as a new report names and shames the countries that need to do more to end modern day slavery. Up after this.

ANDERSON: Right. Returning to our main story tonight. An issue we are taking on board this year, CNN fights to end modern-day slavery. I've got Sir Aidan McQuade from Anti-Slavery International in the studio with me.

A day of truth of what is a global scourge. The Annual Trafficking in Persons report has been released in the United States and while it's revealed that some countries are making an effort to crack down on this exploitation, a startling fact remains. There are more slaves living in the world today, 2011, and at any point in history.

Well, Hillary Clinton was in Washington for the release of the report and says it is time for governments to do more and to be made accountable. Jim Clancy sat down with the U.S. Secretary of State a little earlier and asked her what action needs to be taken and taken now.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

HILLARY CLINTON, U.S. SECRETARY OF STATE: You know, it's both tough and it's encouraging because on the one hand, when we started, we couldn't even get this issue on agendas with other countries. I remember back in the late '90s as first lady, raising this issue in a number of countries and I was really just politely dismissed. It was not something they wanted to talk about. They weren't going to do anything about it. They viewed it as cultural not criminal.

And it only has been in the last several years that we have seen in - and I would argue in some measure because of the U.S. report - that countries take it seriously and that we have made a common cause with activists at the grassroots level in so many countries who use this report to push their own government for greater commitment.

JIM CLANCY, CNN ANCHOR: Some governments like Saudi Arabia remained right on the bottom. Kuwait, this year, went down to tier 3. When you look at the - how do you engage diplomatically to tell people that won't even recognize that they have a problem, how do you engage them to make a change - a real change - not just passing along?

CLINTON: Well, I think we have to look at the progress that we've made. Yes, there are countries that have not done by any means enough to even be taken seriously in addressing this. But there are many others who not only just passed laws but have begun to put resources behind the implementation of those laws. So what we have is an international snapshot. There are some countries that are going up because what they have done is worthy of that and there are some countries that are going down because they have backslid and maybe they've had a change in administration or they've just decided it's not a priority for them, and then there are countries that are not making progress one way or the other. We try to use this report to encourage change. I mean, the report in and of itself is a tool. It's not an end in itself. It's not some kind of giant report card and then we put it away and then dust it off and upgrade it the next year. All through the year, what we're trying to do is to work with these countries that are willing to take some action. We're trying to work with advocates so that they know they're not alone. And we're trying to shine a very bright light on people everywhere who are still unwilling to admit that 27 million enslaved people is a rebuke to everyone everywhere. It's not just a western phenomenon. I think human rights are universal rights and therefore we have to keep working with these countries and encouraging them and, frankly, naming and shaming to some extent to get them to change.

CLANCY: Does naming and shaming - do you think it works?

CLINTON: Yes, it does work. I mean--.

CLANCY: But some countries are down on the bottom - tier 3 every year.

CLINTON: You know, we can look at the glass as half-empty or half full and that's true that some countries are on the bottom but--.

CLANCY: Are we pushing them hard enough or is this something where we - you know, they're our friends. We don't want to push too hard.

CLINTON: Well, we push pretty hard. I mean, it's pretty hard to turn your eyes away from a report that is on the internet and that everybody can access. But I also like to look at the countries that have made a lot of progress. Look at what the Philippines have done, you know, in a change of administration. The Philippines - they probably export more people of their citizenry than nearly any other country in the world. They go all over the world to work in many different settings. And until the new administration of President Aquino, we didn't really have the level of commitment we were seeking. We do now. And we see a - see change of difference. So what we are looking at is yes, those countries that are not moving, we're going to keep pushing. We're going to offer technical assistance. We're going to keep raising it. It's not going away. They can't ignore it and thereby be left alone. And then we're going to keep working with countries that are showing that they want to make a difference and do better.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

ANDERSON: Hillary Clinton speaking exclusively to Jim Clancy just earlier on in the back of the human trafficking report. I've got Aidan McQuade from Anti-Slavery International with me here in the studio tonight.

Jim raises the very important point there of the challenge of politics certainly with Clinton. I'm referring to the fact that India gets lifted from what was known as tier two sort of plus pluses it were tier two effectively suggesting in this report that India is improving its lot when it comes to human trafficking. And it's an issue that you want to raise as well, the challenge of politics - who's friends with who - at this point and whether that matters to where they stand in this report.

AIDAN MCQUADE, DIRECTOR, ANTI-SLAVERY INTERNATIONAL: I mean, I think it would be naive to presume that politics didn't factor in terms of who's on what tier within this. I do find it a bit peculiar that India, Pakistan, and the United Arab Emirates are on tier-two along with Brazil because if you look at the level of action which is going on in Brazil, compare it by the Brazilian government, compared to the level of action to those other countries, it just doesn't really compare. Brazil is a much more committed and forthright country in its struggle against slavery. So - however, I mean, I think it would be (INAUDIBLE) not to acknowledge that the report itself does provide a good snapshot of what the state (INAUDIBLE) in various countries. So it needs to become something which is also more broadly looking at the problem than rather than just a narrow focus that it currently has.

ANDERSON: To say - argue as to say they didn't see the beginning of this year the headlines here the worst offenders as far as this global report on trafficking is concerned are in North Korea, Iran, and Saudi Arabia - three countries that we have in the past heard some pretty bad stories from. We talked about those who are being trafficked and you explained there's no one sex to a certain extent, over 27 million faces around the world who are involved. Who's running the industry, Aidan?

MCQUADE: One of the problems with the industry is there is a relatively small number of people who are making a significantly large amount of money out of this. But generally speaking, in most parts of the world, this is poorer people doing it to other poorer people. In some parts of the world, rich people are doing this as well in Europe, in Latin America, rich people are heavily involved in this also. But generally speaking, its poorer people doing this to other poorer people. They're doing this because in many respects, they don't like these other poorer people - they regard them as foreigners. They regard them as lower class or they regard them as indigenous and some sort of prejudice against them. And this means that the response to slavery across the world needs to be (INAUDIBLE) as well. We need to be looking not just at prosecution and protection of individuals who've been trafficked but actually dismantling the systems of prejudice, of lack of education, and of discrimination which are facilitating these people to be enslaved in the first place.

ANDERSON: We'll have you - as we move through the year here on the show - again. This is CONNECT THE WORLD. CNN's Freedom Project of course continues for the entire year, make no excuses about that. Thank you very much indeed for joining us, sir.

Tonight, I just want to close out - just before we close out the show - with some of our viewer comments on this. You'll see that this is a map of the world. You'll see the small airplanes. They negate over. They certainly show where we see the problem across the world. Many of you have tuned in to watch our Freedom Project documentary on Nepal's stolen children on Sunday. It's hosted by Demi Moore. The documentary traces the path of Nepalese girls and women trafficked across the border into India's sex trade industry. The actress seeing firsthand the devastation caused by human slavery - women and children forced into labor. Just have a listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

DEMI MOORE, DNA FOUNDATION CO-FOUNDER (Voice-over): This is the day they line up for medicine without which many of these women and children would die. They all carry the HIV virus and many have other related illnesses, in most cases, a legacy of time served under slavery in the brothel.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

ANDERSON: All right. We've had a huge reaction online to the documentary. (INAUDIBLE) give you some of those.

Luz says "Thank you for making us aware of the terrible situation faced by so many human beings around the world."

Another comment from Jenny: "That was very eye opening; thank you for showing it! Also, why is it rarely ever mentioned?" We're talking there obviously about human trafficking which is something we talk about a lot here on the show.

Carey: "This CNN special on Nepal human trafficking is oddly beautiful for such a brutish subject" she says.

And finally, you can have your say. Visit Facebook page - our Facebook page, facebook.com/CNNconnect, and join us for an encore presentation on Nepal's stolen children, a CNN Freedom Project documentary, Saturday night, 9:00 in London, 10:00 in Johannesburg, and midnight in Abu Dhabi.

I'm Becky Anderson. Thank you for watching. Your world is being connected this evening. The world news headlines and back story will follow this short break. Thank you.

Estonia, Belarus, Russia On U.S. Human Trafficking Watch List

June 27, 2011

The United States has put Estonia and Belarus on a human-trafficking watch list, alleging they failed in the last year to step up efforts to fight prostitution and forced labor.

In its 2011 annual "Global Trafficking in Persons Report," the State Department also maintained Russia on the list for the eighth consecutive year for similar alleged failures.

The report said women and children are sold into the sex trade in Russia, Germany, Poland, the Czech Republic, Lithuania, Spain, Greece, Belgium, Turkey, Israel, Lebanon, Egypt, and the United Arab Emirates.

U.S. Expands Human Trafficking Blacklist

Last updated (GMT/UTC): 27.06.2011 19:58

Nearly two dozen countries are failing to do enough to tackle human trafficking, a world-wide scourge that claims some 27 million men, women, and children as victims, according to the U.S. State Department.

In its annual "Trafficking in Persons Report," the Obama administration nearly doubled the number of countries that may face U.S. sanctions for not doing enough to combat human trafficking.

It identified 23 states as failing to meet minimum international standards to curb the scourge, which claims mainly women and children as victims, up from 13 in 2010.

The report analyzed conditions in 184 countries, including the United States, and ranked them in terms of their effectiveness in fighting what many have termed modern-day slavery.

"Unfortunately, because of the ease of transportation and the global communications that can reach deep into villages with promises and pictures of what a better life might be, we now see that more human beings are exploited than before -- there are as many as 27 million men, women, and children," U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said at the release of the report on June 27. "And governments have taken important steps, but we have to really mix the commitments with actions in order to get results."

Among the countries on the blacklist are Cuba, Iran, Myanmar, North Korea, and Sudan, along with frequent U.S. foes Eritrea, Libya, and Zimbabwe.

Others are U.S. allies in the Middle East like Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, while Papua New Guinea was cited as a repeat offender.

Only one country, the Dominican Republic, was removed from the list.

Turkmenistan was one of the countries added to the list this year. Ashgabat was given the worst ranking, Tier 3, among all former Soviet republics.

It was faulted for failing to fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking or making significant efforts to do so, and for not making "any significant efforts to investigate and prosecute trafficking crimes or to identify and protect victims of trafficking."

The report said that "men and women [in Turkmenistan are] subjected to forced labor and forced prostitution," and noted that "women from Turkmenistan are subjected to forced prostitution in Turkey, and men and women from Turkmenistan are subjected to conditions of forced labor in Turkey, including in textile sweatshops, construction sites, and in domestic servitude."

It faulted the government of President Gurbanguly Berdymukhammedov for "not fulfill[ing] its commitment to allocate financial or in-kind assistance to antitrafficking organizations" or indeed "show any significant efforts to investigate and prosecute trafficking crimes or to identify and protect victims of trafficking during the last year."

The U.S. report also said it documented for the first time the presence of Turkmen trafficking victims in Russia and the United Kingdom.

Iran was also named a Tier-3 country for being a "source, transit, and destination country for men, women, and children subjected to sex trafficking and forced labor" and because Tehran "does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and is not making significant efforts to do so."

It also noted that "lack of access to Iran by U.S. government officials impedes the collection of information on the country's human trafficking problem and the government's efforts to curb it."

According to the report, "Iranian women are trafficked internally for forced prostitution and forced marriage. Iranian and Afghan children living in Iran are trafficked within the country for commercial sexual exploitation -- sometimes through forced marriages, in which their new 'husbands' force them into prostitution and involuntary servitude as beggars or laborers to pay debts, provide income, or support drug addiction of their families."

Also documented are "reports of women and girls being sold for marriage to men in Pakistan for the purpose of sexual servitude. Young men and Afghan boys are forced into prostitution in male brothels in southern Iran or to Afghan and Pakistani warlords. Iranian women and children -- both girls and boys -- are also subjected to sex trafficking in Pakistan, Turkey, Qatar, Kuwait, the United Arab Emirates, Bahrain, Iraq, France, Germany, and the United Kingdom."

The U.S. report also faulted the Iranian government for making no discernible efforts to protect victims of trafficking during the reporting period, but rather to punish them." It said Iran "continued to favor direct deportation of foreign victims of trafficking over protection [and] during the reporting period...deported very large numbers of undocumented Afghans without attempting to identify trafficking victims among them."

Costa Rica placed on international human trafficking watchlist

BYLINE: Will Ferguson, The Tico Times, San Jose, Costa Rica

June 27--Costa Rica is a source and destination for human sex trafficking and forced labor, according to the U.S. Department of State's 2011 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report. The report states women and girls from Nicaragua, the Dominican Republic and other Latin American countries have been identified in Costa Rica as victims of sex trafficking and forced servitude. Costa Rica was downgraded from Tier 2 to the Tier 2 Watchlist this year, joining 40 other countries in danger of potential economic sanctions from the United States.

This is the second time in 10 years that Costa Rica has been included on the Tier 2 Watchlist, the last being in 2008.

The State Department report places nations in one of four categories based on efforts to combat human trafficking and the degree of aid provided to victims. The best ranking is Tier 1. Tier 2 includes countries that demonstrate efforts to address the problem. The Tier 2 "Watch List" includes countries that show signs of digressing to Tier 3, the lowest level.

The report identified the provinces of Guanacaste, Limon, Puntarenas, and San Jose as centers of child sex tourism in Costa Rica. Child sex tourists mainly come to Costa Rica from the United States, Germany, Sweden and Italy, the report stated.

While Costa Rica officials have implemented procedures to identify and help potential trafficking victims, authorities failed to make a single conviction during the reporting period. In 2010, authorities prosecuted a U.S. citizen for alleged sexual exploitation of a child, however the suspect was not convicted. Overall, the government reported minimal efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex or forced labor during the reporting period, the TIP stated.

Out of 60 officially reported trafficking victims, not one Costa Rican was identified by the Costa Rican government, despite NGOs and law enforcement officials identifying several Costa Rican victims.

Out of a total of 184 nations, the U.S. State Department branded 23 nations as falling into the Tier 3 category, up from 13 in 2010. There are an estimated 27 million men, women and children living in forced bondage around the world, according to the State Department. In Latin America, Venezuela, for the first time, and Cuba are on the watchlist. Panama, the Dominican Republic and Ecuador join Costa Rica on the watchlist.

"All countries can and must do more," said U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, during a presentation of the report. "More human beings are being exploited today than ever before."

Clinton presented Leonel Dubon of Guatemala a 2011 Hero Acting to End Modern Day Slavery Award. He was one of 10 individuals awarded for devoting their lives to the fight against human trafficking, and the only recipient from Central America. Dubon created an NGO and safehouse for underage female sex trafficking victims called El Refugio de la Ninez (Children's Refuge House).

US Expands List of Human Trafficking Violators

BYLINE: David Gollust

LENGTH: 657 words

The United States on Monday sharply increased the number of countries said to be failing to meet minimum international standards in the fight against human trafficking. Lebanon, Venezuela and several African states are among the new countries given failing grades in the State Department's annual report on trafficking.

Officials here say that despite greater awareness of the problem, human trafficking around the world continues to grow - propelled, in part, by Internet communications being exploited to lure people into sexual slavery and indentured labor.

As a consequence, the State Department expanded from 13 to 23 its list of so-called Tier 3 countries - states that are not seen as making significant efforts to tackle the problem and could be subject to U.S. sanctions.

At a roll-out event for the global report, covering 184 countries and territories, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said that as many as 27 million people might be living in slavery. She said that although many countries have anti-trafficking laws, enforcement is lagging.

"The number of prosecutions worldwide has remained relatively static," said Secretary Clinton. "And so the measure of success can no longer be whether a country has passed laws. So many have in the last decade. Now we have to make sure that laws are implemented and that countries are using the tools that have been created for that."

The report, the 11th issued by the State Department under an anti-trafficking law approved by Congress in 2000, lists several chronic human rights violators as Tier 3 countries - including, Burma, Cuba, Iran, North Korea and Zimbabwe.

U.S. Persian Gulf allies Kuwait and Saudi Arabia remain as Tier 3 states, joined for the first time by, among others, six African states, Lebanon, Turkmenistan, Venezuela and Micronesia.

Of 13 countries listed last year, only one - the Dominican Republic - was removed from Tier 3 for 2011 because of anti-trafficking progress.

The only penalty authorized under U.S. law is the withholding of non-humanitarian aid, and that has been used sparingly.

Clinton said the point of the rating exercise is to encourage countries to respond.

"The report itself is a tool and what we're most interested in is working with countries around the world and working across our own government to get results," she said. "The decade of delivery is upon us."

At Clinton's insistence, the report for the second year in a row assessed human trafficking in the United States, which, like most advanced economies, is placed in Tier 1 with effective laws and enforcement efforts.

But it says the United States remains a source, transit and destination county for men, women and children subjected to forced labor, debt bondage and sex trafficking. It says human traffickers have exploited U.S. visa programs that allow in temporary workers, ostensibly for working in landscaping, farming and tourism industries.

The State Department event honored 10 activists from around the world as heroes, among them Antigua and Barbuda women's rights advocate Sheila Roseau.

Roseau helped push an anti-trafficking law through the Caribbean country's legislature last year, which she said is only the starting point in tackling the problem.

"As we recognize the tremendous efforts taken, let us ensure that we continue to advocate for effective support for survivors," said Roseau. "We must continue to be vigilant in all efforts to combat human trafficking by securing the support of our governments to action, the legislative frameworks developed or enact the appropriate legislation if it's not already in place."

The report listed six countries as violators of a 2008 U.S. law against the use of child soldiers - Burma, Chad, the Democratic Republic of Congo, Somalia, Sudan and Yemen.

All but Burma receive some U.S. military aid or training. The monitoring group Human Rights Watch called on the Obama administration to end that aid as provided for under the law.

US Expands List of Human Trafficking Violators

BYLINE: David Gollust

The United States on Monday sharply increased the number of countries said to be failing to meet minimum international standards in the fight against human trafficking. Lebanon, Venezuela and several African states are among the new countries given failing grades in the State Department's annual report on trafficking.

Officials here say that despite greater awareness of the problem, human trafficking around the world continues to grow - propelled, in part, by Internet communications being exploited to lure people into sexual slavery and indentured labor.

As a consequence, the State Department expanded from 13 to 23 its list of so-called Tier 3 countries - states that are not seen as making significant efforts to tackle the problem and could be subject to U.S. sanctions.

At a roll-out event for the global report, covering 184 countries and territories, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said that as many as 27 million people might be living in slavery. She said that although many countries have anti-trafficking laws, enforcement is lagging.

State Department report ranks countries on human trafficking

BYLINE: From Jill Dougherty, CNN Foreign Affairs Correspondent

SECTION: POLITICS

LENGTH: 926 words

DATELINE: Washington

Human trafficking is flourishing in the Democratic Republic of Congo, North Korea, Saudi Arabia and Iran, with little effort by the countries' governments to combat it, the U.S. State Department said Monday.

The department's 2011 Trafficking in Persons Report assesses efforts by 184 governments worldwide to fight sexual exploitation, forced labor and modern-day slavery.

The annual report, considered one of the most comprehensive analyses of worldwide human trafficking, ranks countries in three "tiers."

Iran is among the countries the report describes as "a source, transit, and destination country for men, women, and children subjected to sex trafficking and forced labor."

The State Department's analysis also lists several countries as "special cases," noting that conditions severely restrict government ability to address trafficking there.

Haiti was on that list for a sixth consecutive year. This year's report says massive destruction in the 2010 earthquake crippled the country's ability to fight trafficking. Ivory Coast and Somalia also were on the list.

The State Department says 27 million people are victims of human trafficking worldwide, and approximately 100,000 of those victims are in the United States.

In the report's preface, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton describes her visit to a shelter for trafficking survivors last year.

"I was embraced by children who should have been in grade school, but were instead recovering from having been enslaved in a brothel," she wrote.

"We know trafficking in persons affects every region and every country in the world, but looking into the eyes of those girls and hearing their stories firsthand brought home for me once again the very real and personal tragedy of modern slavery."

The report looks at how traffickers operate, what kinds of victims are exploited, and most importantly, what governments are -- and in some cases are not -- doing to protect vulnerable people.

While some countries are repeat offenders, the official tasked with coordinating the U.S. response to human trafficking says the State Department has seen a "decade of progress" in developing tools for prevention, protection, and prosecution of traffickers since it released its first human trafficking report 11 years ago.

For example, 148 countries have signed on to the Palermo Protocol, the international effort headed by the United Nations to combat trafficking, Ambassador Luis CdeBaca said, and 130 countries around the world have enacted laws criminalizing all forms of human trafficking. CdeBaca is in charge of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

But while there have been advances in addressing the problem, the number of victims identified and the number of traffickers prosecuted has "flattened" around the world, CdeBaca said. The trend, he told reporters in a briefing before the report's release, might be attributed to the global economic crisis and diminished resources for victims.

The State Department said it prepared the report using information from U.S. Embassies, government officials, nongovernmental and international organizations, published reports, e-mailed tips, and research trips to every region.

"When our staff travels out to the field, we're actually meeting with victims on the ground. We're not just in capitals, we're going out to rural areas, visiting shelters, visiting rehabilitative centers, border checkpoints to see how immigration officers are working to screen victims," said the State Department's Christine Chan-Downer, who helped compile the report.

The trafficking report describes the psychological strategies that pimps use to gain control over the millions of victims exploited in the global commercial sex trade.

"They recruit vulnerable women or girls, pretend to be in love with them," the report says, "ply them with alcohol or drugs, build their dependencies for basic needs or chemical escapes, place other women in supervisory roles over them and encourage them to compete for affection and favor, use an interlocking system of reward and punishment reminiscent of a battering relationship, and threaten their recruits with the shame of their families and a punitive, rather than protective, law enforcement response."

The report also includes data on trafficking, including forced labor, involuntary domestic servitude, child labor, child soldiers and child sex trafficking.

In addition to detailing problems many countries face, the report singles out "heroes" who -- sometimes at great threat to their own safety -- fight trafficking.

Charimaya Tamang of Nepal, for example, helped start an anti-trafficking organization. She was 16 years old when she was taken to India, "spending 22 months enslaved in a brothel before the Indian government rescued her and more than 200 other Nepali women in 1996," the report says.

Returning to Nepal, Tamang "faced social stigma and was outcast from her own community," according to the report. "But she courageously filed a case against her traffickers, becoming the first person to file personally a trafficking case with the district police. In 1997, the District Court -- in a landmark decision -- convicted and sentenced eight offenders involved in her case."

But more must be done, the State Department says.

"While some of the accounts in these pages are disquieting," the report concludes, "they are but a faint echo of the daily suffering of trafficking victims. For every hero or survivor highlighted, millions more remain unacknowledged and unnamed. It is time for that to stop."

Nigeria; Human Trafficking - Country Gets High Rating

BYLINE: This Day (Lagos)

LENGTH: 145 words

Nigeria's has retained its high ranking, Tier-1, status on the global rating in her efforts to combat human Trafficking In Persons (TIP) according to the 2011 United States Department of State TIP Report.

The Executive Secretary of the National Agency for the Protection of Trafficking in Persons and other Related Offences, (NAPTIP), Mr. Simon Chuzi Egede disclosed this to newsmen in Abuja Friday when he received an advanced copy of the 2011 US TIP report from the US Embassy First Political Secretary, Mr. Jeffery Slice.

The report would be embargoed until 7pm, Monday night when US Secretary of State, Hillary Clinton would present the full report to the public.

Egede added that the ranking was because the country had developed proactive systems to re-engage law enforcement personnel at TIP destination countries for sharing information and achievable best practises.

Guide to Tier Rankings from the Trafficking in Persons Report

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 1266 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons issued the following news release:

The Department places each country in the Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report onto one of three tiers, as mandated by the TVPA. This placement is based more on the extent of government action to combat trafficking than on the size of the problem, although the latter is also an important factor. The analyses are based on the extent of governments' efforts to reach compliance with the TVPA's minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking.

While Tier 1 is the highest ranking, it does not mean that a country has no human trafficking problem. Rather, a Tier 1 ranking indicates that a government has acknowledged the existence of human trafficking, has made efforts to address the problem, and meets the TVPA's minimum standards. Each year, governments need to demonstrate appreciable progress in combating trafficking to maintain a Tier 1 ranking. Indeed, Tier 1 represents a responsibility rather than a reprieve.

Tier rankings and narratives in the TIP Report reflect the following:

- * enactment of laws prohibiting severe forms of trafficking in persons, as defined by the TVPA, and provision of criminal punishments for trafficking offenses;
- * criminal penalties prescribed for human trafficking offenses with a maximum of at least four years' deprivation of liberty, or a more severe penalty;
- * implementation of human trafficking laws through vigorous prosecution of the prevalent forms of trafficking in the country;
- * proactive victim identification measures with systematic procedures to guide law enforcement and other government-supported front-line responders in the process of victim identification;
- * government funding and partnerships with NGOs to provide victims with access to primary health care, counseling, and shelter, allowing them to recount their trafficking experiences to trained social counselors and law enforcement in an environment of minimal pressure;
- * victim protection efforts that include access to services and shelter without detention and with legal alternatives to removal to countries in which the victim would face retribution or hardship;
- * the extent to which a government ensures victims are provided with legal and other assistance and that, consistent with domestic law, proceedings are not prejudicial against victims' rights, dignity, or psychological well being;
- * the extent to which a government
- * ensures the safe, humane, and to the extent possible, voluntary repatriation
- * and reintegration of victims; and governmental measures to prevent

* human trafficking, including efforts to curb practices identified as contributing factors to human trafficking including forced labor, such as employers' confiscation of foreign workers' passports and allowing labor recruiters to charge prospective migrants excessive fees.

Tier rankings and narratives are NOT affected by the following:

- * efforts, however laudable, undertaken exclusively by nongovernmental actors (EURO) in the country;
- * general public awareness events - government-sponsored or otherwise - lacking concrete ties to the prosecution of traffickers, protection of victims, or prevention of trafficking; and
- * broad-based development or law enforcement initiatives without a (EURO) specific human trafficking focus.

A Guide To The Tiers

Tier 1

Countries whose governments fully comply with the TVPA's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking.

Tier 2

Countries whose governments do not fully comply with the TVPA's minimum standards but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards.

Tier 2 Watch List

Countries whose governments do not fully comply with the TVPA's minimum standards, but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards AND:

- a) the absolute number of victims of severe forms of trafficking is very significant or is significantly increasing;
- b) there is a failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons from the previous year, including increased investigations, prosecution, and convictions of trafficking crimes, increased assistance to victims, and decreasing evidence of complicity in severe forms of trafficking by government officials; or
- c) the determination that a country is making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance with minimum standards was based on commitments by the country to take additional steps over the next year.

Tier 3

Countries whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so.

The TVPA lists additional factors through which to determine whether a country should be on Tier 2 (or Tier 2 Watch List) versus Tier 3. First, the extent to which the country is a country of origin, transit, or destination for severe forms of trafficking. Second, the extent to which the country's government does not comply with the TVPA's minimum standards and, in particular, the extent to which officials or government employees have been complicit in severe forms of trafficking. And third, reasonable measures required to bring the government into compliance with the minimum standards in light of the government's resources and capabilities to address and eliminate severe forms of trafficking in persons.

In 2008, the William Wilberforce Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act included a provision that any country that has been ranked Tier 2 Watch List for two consecutive years and that would otherwise be ranked Tier 2 Watch List for the next year will instead be ranked Tier 3 for the next year. This provision comes into effect for the first time in this year's report. The Secretary of State, through delegation, can waive the automatic downgrade based on credible evidence that a waiver is justified because the government has a written plan that, if implemented, would constitute making significant efforts to comply with the TVPA's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is devoting sufficient resources to implement the plan. Governments subject to the automatic downgrade provision are noted as such within the country narratives.

Penalties for Tier 3 Countries

Pursuant to the TVPA, governments of countries on Tier 3 may be subject to certain sanctions, whereby the U.S. government may withhold or withdraw nonhumanitarian, non-trade-related foreign assistance. In addition, countries on Tier 3 may not receive funding for government employees' participation in educational and cultural exchange programs. Consistent with the TVPA, governments subject to sanctions would also face U.S. opposition to assistance (except for humanitarian, trade-related, and certain development-related assistance) from international financial institutions such as the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank.

Imposed sanctions will take effect on October 1; however, all or part of the TVPA's sanctions can be waived if the President determines that the provision of such assistance to the government would promote the purposes of the statute or is otherwise in the United States' national interest. The TVPA also provides for a waiver of sanctions if necessary to avoid significant adverse effects on vulnerable populations, including women and children.

No tier ranking is permanent. Each and every country can do more, including the United States. All countries must maintain and increase efforts to combat trafficking.

BLOG: Religion World: Churches and religious groups unite to fight human trafficking

BYLINE: Jeff Kunerth

LENGTH: 598 words

Jun. 16, 2011 (Religion World delivered by Newstex) --

June 16--ReligionLink reports that the U.S. State Department will release its annual report on human trafficking by the end of June, spotlighting the global trade in enforced labor and the selling or prostitution of people -- as many as 27 million, mostly women and children -- without their consent or benefit. The issue is increasingly mobilizing religious groups.

Many of those groups are based in the United States, spurred by the fact the U.S. itself has come under scrutiny for the level of human trafficking within its borders. Experts say there are forced laborers and sex workers in every U.S. state, and the sex trade alone generates an estimated $42.5 billion annually worldwide.

The 2010 State Department report, which estimated 12.3 million people were subject to some form of bondage, for the first time listed the U.S. among countries faced with the problem. The report gave the U.S. "tier 1" status, ranking it among the top enforcers of human trafficking laws and prosecutors of those who engage in it.

Nongovernmental organizations and nonprofits are now enlisting the aid of international, national and local religious groups in the fight against human trafficking. Christian and Jewish groups in particular are bringing the issue and its victims into their congregations, exploring sacred texts for direction and solutions. There are now cross-denominational Freedom Sundays and Freedom Shabbats and interfaith conferences dedicated to the issue.

The cable network CNN has been sponsoring a Freedom Project [<http://thecnnfreedomproject.blogs.cnn.com/>] aimed at "ending modern-day slavery," and on June 26 it will broadcast a one-hour documentary, "Nepal's Stolen Children," [<http://mediadecoder.blogs.nytimes.com/2011/06/05/demi-moore-to-host-report-for-cnn-on-human-trafficking/?scp=1&sq=demi%20moore%20cnn%20trafficking&st=cse>] reported and hosted by actress Demi Moore.

Afghanistan is ranked the most dangerous country for women

BYLINE: Natasha Lennard

SECTION: FEATURE

LENGTH: 555 words

HIGHLIGHT: An expert survey ranks the most perilous countries for women, but results should be viewed critically

Afghanistan is the most dangerous country in the world for women according to a panel of gender experts assembled by Thompson Reuters Foundation. The experts, whose findings were gleaned in a survey from TrustLaw (an arm of Thompson Reuters Foundation), ranked which countries were most perilous for women through a number of different factors.

Which countries were found to be most dangerous? Afghanistan was ranked the most dangerous, followed by the Congo, then Pakistan, then India, then Somalia.

Why? In Afghanistan, "violence, poor health care and brutal poverty," notes Al-Jazeera, afflicts women, "while in Congo there are horrific levels of rape" (reportedly some 420,000 women are raped a year). Other practices and circumstances found in countries considered the most dangerous include domestic abuse, genital mutilation, acid attacks and economic discrimination.

The NATO airstrikes in Afghanistan, one women's rights advocate told Al-Jazeera, are among the dangers threatening women in the country.

How did the survey work? 213 gender experts -- aid professionals, academics, health workers, policymakers, journalists and development specialists -- from all around the world ranked the countries based on general perceptions and six specific risks: health threats, sexual violence, non-sexual violence, cultural or religious factors, lack of access to resources and trafficking.

Surprising results? Some have responded with surprise to see India so high up the list, given that women, such as former Prime Minister Indira Gandhi -- are able to reach the highest levels of public office. However, it ranked highest for sex trafficking. Only 12 percent of the experts ranked it the worst country in regards to this practice, but no other single country was picked as consistently.

The Wall Street Journal's Tripti Lahiri registers some surprise at countries missing from the list: "China also practices widespread sex selection and is ranked on the State Department's Tier 2 Watch List on human trafficking, same as India, while South Africa has a reputation for a high level of sexual violence. Two years ago, Amnesty International declared maternal mortality a human rights emergency in Sierra Leone, but the country didn't appear among those the experts polled were most worried about on this front.

Trustworthy methodology?: TrustLaw explain the methodology of how they reached the rankings, but do not go into detail about the gender experts who provided the results, save for that they are from all five continents and a range of professions. Potential biases in how the experts might have been chosen cannot be checked. It also is problematic that TrustLaw does not elaborate on how it uses terms like "rape" and "domestic abuse," which can come in numerous and insidious forms. More worrying still, the survey frames "danger" in such a way that it was always going point to non-Western countries as the most dangerous for women. For a more nuanced look at why this is hugely problematic, see the fantastic article by Lila Abu-Lughod of Columbia University called "Do Muslim women really need saving?" In stark contrast, the TrustLaw survey at best offers a snapshot of genuinely concerning situations across the world, but lacks any real or valuable analysis; at worst it betrays concerning cultural and racial biases.

HARKIN STATEMENT ON THE 2011 WORLD DAY AGAINST CHILD LABOR

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 1406 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by Iowa Senator Tom Harkin:

Senator Tom Harkin (D-IA) entered the following statement into the Congressional Record on World Day Against Child Labor. Harkin has been a long-time leader in the fight to eradicate the worst forms of child labor.

Mr. President, I have come to the floor, today, to acknowledge and celebrate the World Day Against Child Labor, which was commemorated earlier this week

An estimated 215 million children across the world are still trapped in the worst forms of child labor. A report issued by the International Labor Organization (ILO) in May 2010 offered some good news in the fight against child labor. There is a decline in the number of girls trapped in child labor. There are fewer children doing hazardous work. We are closer than ever to universal ratification of ILO Convention 182, which prohibits the worst forms of child labor. One hundred and seventy three out of 192 participating nations have ratified this convention.

However, due to the economic crisis, there also have been setbacks. Child labor has been increasing among boys and in young people between the ages of 15 and 17. Progress in reducing child labor in sub-Saharan Africa has stalled. While some people may point to the global economic crisis as a cause of for these setbacks, we cannot use this as an excuse for complacency.

One can look at the country of Uzbekistan to see the dire need for more action. According to School of Oriental and African Studies at the University of London, over 2 million children are forcibly pulled from school by government officials to work in cotton fields. Uzbek cotton is listed as a good produced by forced labor and child labor by the Department of Labor. It is listed on the Tier 2 Watch List in the State Departments Trafficking in Persons Report. Yet despite this clear, compelling and thoroughly documented evidence of Uzbekistans abject failure to live up to its international commitments under ILO Convention 182, business goes on as usual. Uzbekistan has received no sanction and continues to receive trade benefits from the United States under the Generalized System of Preference.

The work performed by these children, stooped over to pick cotton under a hot sun, also falls under the category of hazardous work. Hazardous work is by its very nature likely to harm the health and safety of children. Hazardous work exposes children to physical, emotional, or even sexual abuse. It includes children working underground in mines, under water, at dangerous heights, or in confined spaces. Children work with dangerous machinery, equipment, and tools. They may work in unhealthy environments, exposed to hazardous substances like nicotine in tobacco fields, or to extreme temperatures, noise levels or vibrations that can damage growing bodies. Some children are even forced to work such long hours that they are up for entire nights, or are not allowed to return to their own home at the end of the day.

The ILO estimates that 115 million children perform hazardous work. Forty one million of these are girls and 74 million are boys. Sixty two million are between the ages of 15 and 17, and 53 million are 14 years old or younger.

It is vitally important to get children out of the worst forms of child labor, including hazardous work, , so they may attend school, do well in their studies, and gain the knowledge and skills necessary to build a decent life. To this end, the United States government needs to approach the scourge of child labor in a holistic manner. We need to address the underlying poverty that forces so many children to forgo schooling in order to meet even their most basic needs.

Fortunately, through the Department of Labor, the United States has undertaken projects to do just that. In Ghana, DOL is working with the ILO and the Government of Ghana to implement a new, holistic program to reduce child labor in the cocoa sector by 70 percent by 2020. This effort has gone hand in hand with a renewed effort by the international cocoa industry, which has pledged $7 million in new funding to this fight. I've been personally involved in this effort with my good friend and colleague in the House of Representatives, Congressman Eliot Engel of New York.

In fact, this unified effort of the U.S. Government, the Ghanaian Government and the cocoa industry recently reviewed innovative programs proposed by the cocoa industry in support of its $7 million pledge. It is my hope that this approach, governments working hand-in-hand with industry and implementing partners, can become a model to combat the worst forms of child labor worldwide.

This is just one example of many Department of Labor programs that are in progress all over the world. Another such program, in Guatemala, takes at-risk children and provides them after school activities that reinforce their education, giving them an opportunity for recreation and personal growth in stark contrast to the stunted prospects that follow from being forced to work long hours. Another program, in Lahore, Pakistan, has redesigned the looms people use to weave carpets, eliminating hazards such as back injuries and bone deformities that have plagued children. These and other Department of Labor projects form the backbone of U.S. efforts to combat the worst forms of child labor.

It's not enough to do this just at the Department of Labor though. In Afghanistan, a 2006 UNICEF report estimated that one in four children between the ages of seven and 14 is subject to the worst forms of child labor. As the Department of Defense and other departments are spending huge amounts of U.S. taxpayer dollars in Afghanistan, it is vitally important to require child labor protections in our various programs and contracts in that country.

Starting this year, a Department of Defense contract to provide market access to Afghan carpet makers will work hand-in-hand with the proven GoodWeave certification system to assure that the carpets made under this taxpayer funded program are not made with the worst forms of child labor.

So while there has been much progress made, and our efforts abroad are continuing to build success, we must remain vigilant, even here at home. Regrettably, there are some states here in the U.S. that are trying to undermine the fundamental protections we have afforded to children for generations. For example, the Republican-controlled legislature of Maine decided to pass a bill stripping state-level child labor protections. Maine's Republican governor decided it would be better for his state to take a step backwards because he personally went to work at age 11, and, as he put it, It's not a big deal. Work doesn't hurt anybody.

Well, I would like to tell you how putting a job before children's education can set them back. At a time when it seems that most new jobs require high skill levels, great harm is done by denying these children a chance to acquire these skills. We need to be educating the next generation of doctors, engineers, and scientists. However, the OECD shows that the United States has slipped to the 23rd best country at science education and 31st at math.

We're not going to catch-up to other countries if our children are spending too much time working at McDonalds or Burger King. I agree that having a part-time job after school or on weekends can be beneficial. However, studies have shown that teenagers working more than 20 hours a week have a greater tendency towards academic and behavioral problems, as well as higher dropout rates. The United States should aspire to being the country that out-builds, out-educates and out-innovates. If we continue undermining our child labor laws and neglecting education, we will be the country that out-grills, out-flips and out-fries!

There are even some members of the Senate who have questioned whether child labor laws are constitutional. Apparently the protection of our most vulnerable children from exploitation isn't part of protecting the general welfare. Apparently the Supreme Court was incorrect when it unanimously upheld the Fair Labor Standards Act 70 years ago.

It is for all of these reasons that I continue the fight against the worst forms of child labor. It is also why I have come to the floor, today, to salute the World Day Against Child Labor. But one day is not enough. We should be focused on the needs of these children not only on June 12 each year, but 365 days a year.

HEARING OF THE AFRICA, GLOBAL HEALTH AND HUMAN RIGHTS SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE SUBJECT: "BEST PRACTICES AND NEXT STEPS: A NEW DECADE IN THE FIGHT AGAINST HUMAN TRAFFICKING" CHAIRED BY: REPRESENTATIVE CHRISTOPHER SMITH (R-NJ) WITNESSES: PANEL I: LUIS CDEBACA, AMBASSADOR-AT-LARGE, OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS, STATE DEPARTMENT; PANEL II: DEBORAH CUNDY, VICE PRESIDENT, CARLSON COMPANIES; CHAI LING, FOUNDER, ALL GIRLS ALLOWED; NANCY RIVARD, PRESIDENT AND FOUNDER, AIRLINE AMBASSADORS INTERNATIONAL; PHILIP KOWALCYZK, PRESIDENT, THE BODY SHOP; KEVIN BALES, CO-FOUNDER AND PRESIDENT, FREE THE SLAVES; AND DAVID ABRAMOWITZ, DIRECTOR OF POLICY AND GOVERNMENT RELATIONS, HUMANITY UNITED LOCATION: 2172 RAYBURN HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING, WASHINGTON, D.C. TIME: 2:30 P.M. EDT DATE: MONDAY, JUNE 13, 2011

REP. SMITH: The subcommittee will come to order, and I'd like to welcome all of you this afternoon to this important hearing on human trafficking. The focus of course is on the continuing fight to end human trafficking in all of its forms and manifestations. Significant progress has been made since I authored the landmark legislation known as the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000, or the TVPA, to address trafficking around the world, almost a decade ago, but new forms and methods of trafficking are consistently and constantly emerging, and we have to constantly recalibrate our efforts to stay ahead of them.

At this hearing, we will be examining in -- particularly the most effective policies and tools developed by the government and the private sector to combat human trafficking. No country and few industries are untouched by this pervasive human rights abuse. Traffickers use airlines to move their victims, hotels to exploit sex trafficking victims and unsuspecting buyers to pay for goods that have been made with raw materials tainted by forced and bonded labor.

It is estimated that there are anywhere from 12 (million) to 27 million sex and labor trafficking victims in the world at any given time. We know that organized crimes, street gangs and pimps have expanded into sex trafficking at an alarming rate.

It's an extremely lucrative undertaking. A trafficker can make some $200,000 a year off just one victim. Unlike drugs or weapons, a human being can be held captive and sold into sexual slavery over and over and over again. It turns a woman or a child or anyone into a commodity.

And we are just beginning to understand the full scope of labor trafficking. The International Labor Organization estimates that countries import and export billions of dollars worth of goods made by labor trafficking victims. Unsuspecting buyers purchase these goods,, perpetuating the profits of traffickers and the misery of the victims.

The TVPA was a landmark bill with a bold strategy that included sheltering, asylum and other protections for the victims, long jail sentences and asset confiscation for the traffickers and tough sanctions for the governments that fail to meet minimum standards prescribed by the act. It was met initially with a wall of skepticism in opposition, and I think David Abramowitz remembers so well on both sides of the aisle there were people who thought that it was a solution in search of a problem. When you talk trafficking, people thought you were talking about drug trafficking, and it was a very myopic and narrow-minded view about that.

One major problem, especially from the Clinton administration, was the naming and ranking of countries based on compliance with the establishment of common-sense minimum standards, clearly articulated prevention, protection and prosecution benchmarks enforced by sanctions and penalties against egregious violators. Fortunately, reality won out over ignorance, and a very, very fine bipartisan coalition was formed and the TVPA was signed into law by President Clinton two years later after its introduction in the year 2000.

The Trafficking in Persons Report, which is written by the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Human Trafficking, currently headed by Ambassador Luis CdeBaca, not only summarizes the rankings and performance of each nation every year but also provides detailed recommendations as to how each country can improve its efforts. The report has become a resource and diplomatic tool of extraordinary value.

In the last 10 years, we have seen over a 130 countries change their laws to better fight human trafficking. Successful prosecutions have increased dramatically. The number of victims identified and rescued goes up significantly each year, but still much more needs to be done.

In 2009, close to 50,000 victims were rescued worldwide, more than any other recorded year, yet this is just a fraction of the 12 (million) to 27 million slavery victims suffering around the world. Parts of the TVPA were reauthorized in '03 and '05 and 2008. Of course, some of it is permanent law but those parts that needed to be reauthorized were done so, and we are now preparing to reauthorize sections of the legislation again this year.

This hearing provides an opportunity and an important opportunity to see what new and effective measures are being taken by various stakeholders and what the U.S. government can do to help encourage and facilitate those efforts. Of particular interest are the evolving roles of public-private partnerships. In the past five years, several effective initiatives that aimed to prevent trafficking and assist victims have been undertaken by the private sector.

Joining us at this hearing is a representative of Carlson Wagonlit, which has taken a lead in developing best practices for the hotel industry. The Body Shop is using their brand to raise awareness of human trafficking and a campaign for country-specific solutions. Airline ambassadors, nongovernmental organizations is identifying gaps in trafficking prevention on airlines and developing training for the worldwide industry. Other NGOs such as All Girls Allowed have exposed government policies such as China's brutal one-child-per-couple policy that fuels trafficking demand and contributes directly to the exploitation of girls and women.

I'm particularly pleased to welcome Mr. David Abramowitz as a witness before our subcommittee today.

Prior to his current position with Humanity United, Mr. Abramowitz served for many years as chief counsel with the House Committee on Foreign Affairs and he has been involved in the drafting and negotiations of the TVPA since it was first introduced back in 1998. Mr. Abramowitz is well-known as a leading expert in the human trafficking field and as a stalwart advocate of trafficking victims around the world, and it's a privilege to have him here with us today, although I'm used to seeing him right here.

David, thank you for being here.

This hearing will highlight the need to harness the insights and the expertise of government and various actors from civil society alike. Such coordinated efforts should always be an emphasis of public policy but are particularly necessary in times of severe budgetary constraints such as now facing our global economy. Such partnerships bring together a broader range of expertise, leverage resources to obtain better results and spread awareness to people who can make a difference but who may otherwise never hear about human trafficking. I look forward to hearing the testimonies of our witnesses as we look to strengthen the global fight against human trafficking.

Mr. Payne will be joining us, our ranking member, very shortly, but I would like to recognize Ms. Bass for an opening statement that she might have -- Bass.

REPRESENTATIVE KAREN BASS (D-CA): Thank you very much, Mr. Chair.

Chairman Smith, human trafficking is a significant and complex international and national crisis that requires significant attention. Many organizations in my district in Los Angeles have demonstrated significant leadership in addressing trafficking both internationally and domestically. The leadership of the Coalition to Abolish Slavery and Trafficking, the Thai Community Development Corporation, the Covenant House are just three organizations that I'm proud to represent, and I'd like to thank their ongoing leadership in combating trafficking.

I'd also like to recognize Chairman Smith for your diligent work and committed work to end trafficking around the world.

Chairman Smith, your work on the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 and its subsequent reauthorization have been tremendous, and I look forward to working with you on this year's bill.

The United States Justice Department estimates that nearly 18,000 men, women and children are trafficked across our borders annually. Unfortunately, many victims do not receive the level of emotional and physical assistance that they need.

One of the most disturbing elements of trafficking is that a large percentage of the trafficking victims are minors. In fact, the average age at which girls become victims of sexual exploitation in the U.S. is 13. These young victims require special attention and care, and as a long-time advocate for children and particularly foster youth, I will be introducing legislation that will strengthen the ability of child welfare professionals to identify and support victims and will provide specialized support for trafficking victims within the foster care system.

I look forward to working alongside my colleagues on this committee as well as joining forces with our witnesses today to move this legislation forward. Last, I'd like to recognize our expert panelists today. Your leadership in combating trafficking is inspiring and has truly made a difference throughout our world. I look forward to hearing your testimony today and discussing how we can collaborate and expand the best use of -- to curb trafficking through prosecution, protection, prevention and public-private partnerships. Thank you very much.

REP. SMITH: Ms. Bass, thank you very much for your statement and for your comments, and I look forward to working with you on these very important issues.

I'd like to now yield to Ms. Buerkle, the gentlelady from New York.

REPRESENTATIVE MARIE BUERKLE (R-NY): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

It is a sobering statistic that 12.3 million people around the world are in forced labor, bonded labor and forced prostitution. Unfortunately, too many of us still think primarily of the Civil War when we hear the term slavery. We are disconnected from certain ugly realities of our modern world.

I agree with Chairman Smith that effectively fighting worldwide trafficking and slavery requires a collaborative approach that involves all levels of the government, NGOs, law enforcement and health care professionals as well. I would add one more list -- one more partner to that list, the American people.

Trafficking and enslavement of millions of people should be an issue of grave concern to all Americans. We should be engaged because it not only affects us as a country, our security and our commerce but it also speaks to our common humanity. I applaud the witnesses today for their diverse efforts to address what, I believe, is the seminal global issue of our time.

Thank you to Chairman Smith for all of your efforts and all that you do to promote human rights. I look forward to hearing from all of our panelists during the next question-and-answer period as well as their testimony. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and I yield back my time.

REP. SMITH: Ms. Buerkle, thank you very much for your statement and for your leadership on human rights issues in general and on trafficking particularly. Thank you.

I'd like to now welcome to the witness table Ambassador Luis CdeBaca, who coordinates U.S. government activities in the global fight against contemporary forms of slavery. Ambassador CdeBaca directs the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, which assesses global trends, provides training and technical assistance and advocates for an end to modern-day slavery.

Ambassador CdeBaca formerly served as counsel to the House Committee on the Judiciary, where his portfolio for Chairman John Conyers included modern-day slavery issues. He has also served as a federal prosecutor with the Department of Justice where he convicted dozens of abusive pimps and employers and helped to liberate hundreds of victims from servitude.

I want to, on a very personal note, thank the ambassador for his exemplary commitment to ending this heinous practice. He eats, sleeps and breathes this issue. You talk to him, he's a man with an idea every day on how to combat slavery. So, again, we are well-served as a country having him at the helm over at the Department of State.

Mr. Ambassador.

LUIS CDEBACA: Thank you, Chairman Smith and members of the subcommittee. Thank you for the invitation to testify today and for your leadership in the fight against modern slavery. More than 10 years ago, a group of women who had been enslaved in the commercial sex trade by the Cadena family in Florida testified before this committee.

As a federal prosecutor, I brought over a dozen of their traffickers to justice. It was their courage that led the way to the path-breaking legislation that updated our antislavery laws and launched a new abolitionist movement.

Looking back, we've seen the effects of this decade of development, cases ranging from Upstate New York to Georgia, from New Hampshire to Saipan. The TVPA has had dramatic results at the federal level, and state and territorial governments have followed. Just in the last few months, we've seen legislatures from Washington and Hawaii to Vermont and Tennessee becoming among the most recent to pass laws that track with the TVPA, and we hope soon that we'll see universal adoption of modern antitrafficking laws in all our states and territories.

We've seen innovators, such as the witnesses that you've brought today -- together for today's hearing. We've seen results from the federal government, and I'd offer for the record a document prepared earlier this spring by the cabinet level taskforce about those activities, but even more we see a movement that is maturing and expanding.

With government leaders like Washington State Attorney General Rob McKenna who next week, when he is sworn in as president of the National Association of Attorneys General, will make trafficking the flagship issue of his term; with civil society heroes like Rachel Lloyd whose innovative methods at GEMS are helping girls on their journey out of modern slavery and back into society; with successes like the National Human Trafficking Resource Center operated for HHS by the Polaris Project, which receives an ever-growing number of calls, linking victims up with NGOs and law enforcement who can help them; with coalitions of NGOs and advocates, such as the Freedom Network, the New York State Anti-Trafficking Coalition, U.S. PACT, Demand Abolition, ATEST and more who are working for real-world results rather than just symbolic gestures; and bloggers like Amanda Kloer and Youngbee Dale who are using new media to inform, inspire, cajole and change, because in a decade of delivery, it is results that matter. The symbolic work has largely been done -- the baseline work of definitions and concepts and laws and programs, that's been very much done, achieved consensus and stability. But around the world as well as at home, it is implementation and results that will make or break this movement in the next decade.

Having worked on the original TVPA and subsequent reauthorizations, I know all too well that while nobody favors human trafficking, good people who care deeply sometimes disagree about how best to fight this crime. Mr. Chairman, you've worked to bring together those diverse voices and to ensure that the United States remains innovative and in the lead.

Indeed the careful balance that you struck in the 2008 reauthorization ensured that the United States definition of trafficking and the application of minimum standards would continue to drive international norms. The vision of the TVPA and the carefully crafted compromises of the 2008 bill deserve the continued support of this body.

I would like to take one note of personal privilege and urge this subcommittee and the full committee to continue one of the most important things that Congress can do, and that is to get out on the road and see these people for yourselves, get out on the road and have your staff see these people.

One of the things that made the 2008 bill reflect the reality on the ground, for instance was a trip that Sheri Rickert from your staff, myself and some others were able to take to Thailand and Cambodia, to go into the shelters, to go into the red-light districts, to see human trafficking once and for all. And I think that that's something that unfortunately, again, in this time of budget constraints, in this time when there is so much pressing work to do at home, we often don't remember that it's those trips; it's those experiences as holding the trafficking victims in your arms that informs what we then come back and do here in Congress or in the administration. And so I certainly would urge that kind of continued involvement on the part of the staff and members of the committee.

The challenges facing the United States and governments around the world might not be at this point so much issues of creating new legislation as the often more difficult activities of implementation, political will and resources. So in my written testimony, I've outlined more fully a range of promising practices and forward-looking innovations that will help governments live up to the commitments that they've made and shape the next 10 years as a decade of delivery.

These are solutions that harness the power of the business community and a consumer but also challenge them, challenge them to know as much about their slavery footprint as they want to know about their carbon footprint, to advocate locally and nationally for a world without slavery and to reject the culture of boys-will-be-boys and choke off the demand for commercial sex and cheap goods that fuels this crime.

But as important as innovation and partnership with civil societies are, it remains a core governmental responsibility to fight against modern slavery. And the best tool for assessing those efforts is and continues to be the annual Trafficking in Persons Report. Leaders in Africa, Latin America and around the world have credited the report as a motivating factor for their actions as governments.

As Congress considers reauthorizations, it is important that we maintain and strengthen this diagnostic and diplomatic tool. Because it's incumbent upon governments around the world to go farther than just acknowledging that problem exists in passing laws that criminalize all types of human trafficking, moving forward, our measure of success -- whether assessing foreign governments or our own -- can no longer just be whether a government has enacted a law that looks good on paper but rather, is that law implemented broadly and effectively.

All governments can and must do more. If otherwise functioning legal systems aren't responding to the needs of trafficking victims, developed countries can't just stand by and presume that they're doing well. Developing countries can't absolve themselves of responsibility by pleading lack of capacity, because crimes are usually not solved with money. They are solved with political will and standards and high expectations for police, prosecutors and judges.

Governments shouldn't just aggressively pursue traffickers. They have to couple enforcement with robust victim identification and protection efforts and proactive attempts to prevent this crime, and they must affirmatively partner with NGOs. NGOs asking the government to act is not partnering. Working together is.

We've come a long way in the last decade. Last week, an attorney for the women who testified here a decade ago joined me at a meeting of the U.S.-Russia presidential civil society working group. She continues to represent those clients, but she also has become a global leader in victim rights advocacy, sharing the lessons that she has learned from them and dozens of subsequent clients.

It struck me during those meetings last week that the lessons and examples of the Cadena case continue to inform how we fight this crime today. The strength of those women and girls and their success today 10 years later in having been reintegrated into our society of survivors must continue to serve as a call to action for us to deliver on the uniquely American promise of freedom.

We must continue to be a strong voice for those women, for other survivors and the millions of victims who remain lost in the shadows unable to break free or speak out. It is they who inspired a decade of development. It is us who owe them a decade of delivery.

Thank you.

REP. SMITH: Mr. Ambassador, thank you very much for your testimony.

Mr. Marino, do you have any opening statement?

REPRESENTATIVE TOM MARINO (R-PA): No.

REP. SMITH: Thank you. Thank you.

Let me just begin the questioning with a couple of -- first of all, regards to the TIP Office, and I know that these kind of requests need to go through the Office of Management and Budget, but do you have sufficient staff, Mr. Ambassador, to do the extraordinarily important work that you and your staff do?

MR. CDEBACA: Well, you certainly identified the route that that question needs to go through. We certainly have seen the advantage of having more staff in the office over the last year and a half. We've grown such that we've been able to add a person or two to each of our teams. We have four teams, a public engagement, which works very much with not only here in the Congress but our public-private partnerships, a lot of our prevention activities, the program staff, the political affairs staff that does the report each year and our admin staff.

And one of the things that we've seen as we have been able to add a couple of bodies to each of those teams -- we're able to move past merely a report that accuses a country of doing something to a relationship with those countries, both a diplomatic relationship and a programmatic relationship. And so if we maintain those levels, we'll be able to continue to serve those relationships at the high level that we're doing right now. If we had more staff, we would certainly look to having even more engagement. We have certainly seen how that lower caseload, as it were, is achieving results in countries.

When I first came to the office, some of our reporting officers had 35 or even 40 countries on their docket, and now we're looking at 20 to 25 countries at most. Optimally, if we could get down to 15 or so, people really would be able to have a very strong working relationship and could achieve change in those countries.

REP. SMITH: One of our witnesses in the second panel, Deborah Cundy, vice president of Carlson, you and I both heard her speak very eloquently as to what Carlson is doing to combat trafficking in the hotels, and she points out in her testimony that in 2004 Carlson was approach by the U.S. Department of State to sign the travel industry's Code of Conduct, and she talks about how hotels are complicit in these activities but often they are unwitting facilitators. And I'm wondering how the progress has been with other companies other than Carlson. Are you finding a reluctance on the part of hotel chains and the like, and are they perhaps looking at the example of what Carlson has done and looking to emulate it?

MR. CDEBACA: One of the things that we've seen is that the Carlson companies took a very brave and, unfortunately, for many years a very lonely stand in the -- with the Code of Conduct. And it's only now in recent years that we've seen other of the big hotel chains start to respond.

We have been trying to work with hotel companies, for instance, in a project that we have in Mexico, trying to get materials out about child sex tourism and other things. But at the end of the day, I think that the fear that many of the corporations had of being associated with this crime -- even if it was that they were fighting it, the notion of having the term "slavery" associated with them was so nerve-wrecking to many of these companies than when we even talk with them they would say, we'd love to do something; of course we're against modern slavery but we don't really want anybody to know what we're doing.

So there has been a couple of the large hotel companies that we've talked to about things they can do within their own company. But at the end of the day, it seems like the response is coming after -- to use a farm analogy, after the horse is out of the barn.

We recently saw the Hilton hotels look to join the Code of Conduct. That was after a scandal broke in one of their hotel properties in Southeastern China. There is currently pressure on the Wyndham Group because of some cases in California in which -- I think it was Travelodge, which is one of their brands was implicated in a sex trafficking ring. So this is something that we see more and more energy coming to as corporations that are getting the rude wakeup call of a case happening on their property are now finding a potential place of refuge in the Conduct of Conduct. And we want to encourage them not to wait until something bad happens on their property but to join the Carlson Companies earlier rather than later.

REP. SMITH: You know, today we've invited Nancy Rivard from Airline Ambassadors and Philip Kowalczyk from the Body Shop, which are two other extraordinarily effective models for the rest of the industry. But I'm thinking in a subsequent hearing of inviting -- and maybe they will come. Maybe they won't. We did it with the Global Online Freedom Act with Google and Microsoft to invite some corporations that are not necessarily doing what they ought to be doing.

But hopefully today a gentle prod to all the rest is to sign the Code of Conduct but more importantly, after you sign it, implement it and be very faithful. Is there anything you'd want to say about those other companies or in the case of the Airline Ambassadors -- they deal with the airline industry -- or with the Body Shop?

MR. CDEBACA: Well, one of the things that we have seen -- and we saw this recently now with Delta Airlines signing the Code of Conduct -- is that there should not be a 10 or 15-hour respite for the trafficker once they have made it past the gauntlet of law enforcement or others in the source country and before they come to our shores where they're going to exploit their people. That time on the airplane is a time when victims could be identified. It's a time when people can be educated. It's the ultimate captive audience.

And so what we've seen, whether it's the work the Airline Ambassadors has done, was trying to harness the energies of folks in the airline industry to do charitable work outside of their working hours or what's happening within that -- the confines of the plane. It's something that I think bears great looking at.

What we've seen as far as the Body Shop is a very interesting extension of their brand. It wasn't designed, I don't think, to be one of the selling points of the Body Shop. My understanding is when it was founded it was very much trying to an ethical and responsibly sourced company, and it has then grown into one of its selling points, and it should be a selling point. A natural extension of what the Body Shop has done throughout the years, throughout the last 30 years as being a responsible corporate citizen has been the work that it's doing with ECPAT.

And so what we see especially with these petitions, the use of the Body Shop as an advocacy vehicle is a new model of corporate social responsibility. I think that one of the things that I would like to see is -- and the Body Shop is a -- I think, a pioneer in this -- is moving past the idea that corporate social responsibility is something you do when business is done or is something that you do as an adjunct to your business and instead the notion that this is actually part of a very productive business model.

REP. SMITH: Let me just ask you -- one of the hallmarks of the TVPA and one of the most difficult provisions for us to get enacted into law -- it held up the conference for a long time -- was the T visa. We're hearing from some of the NGOs that the family unification program -- you know, the -- one of the hallmarks of it was bringing family members in addition to providing asylum to the individual who has been harmed by trafficking so that the retaliatory tool that traffickers had would be mitigated and so that the trafficked person, the victim, would be able to perhaps get additional supports as she or he goes through the healing process.

How many family unifications is the State Department facilitating at this time? Has it stopped? And, if so, why?

MR. CDEBACA: Well, there is currently a backlog in the family unification program. With the lack of a budget and the various negotiations that were going on around that, everything was put into limbo. This is a program that's been traditionally administered by the bureau of population refugee management. It's a PRM program. We have -- now that the smoke is cleared and we've seen what the internal budget cuts are at the State Department, G/TIP has kicked in some money in an agreement with PRM so that we can clear that backlog. As far as going forward, though, I think that there is an open question as to whether we have the funding to see that program into FY 2011 and 2013.

REP. SMITH: Is it a matter of prioritization or is it a matter of -- I mean, there is not enough money in -- any other pocket of money that could be used?

MR. CDEBACA: I will shake whatever trees need to be shaken. I think that we'll work with the committee and others to try to identify other trees to shake if necessary. This is the first time that G/TIP has put money into this program. And obviously it was redirected away from other programs that we would have done. So we'd like to find a solution to this as well.

REP. SMITH: Thank you. Anything we can do as a subcommittee I'm sure both sides of the aisle would be very happy to assist, because again that was a very difficult provision. There were those who suggested at the time that both the T visa itself and bringing family members over would be exploited. Nothing like that has happened over the last decade. If anything, it has been too slow in being implemented. So if we could be of assistance, please let us know.

Let me ask just a few final questions. First, one of our witnesses will be testifying, Chai Ling, about the issue of -- from All Girls Allowed -- the egregious issue, one of the worst issues I think ever to be -- confront humankind, and that's the issue of the missing girls in China and in India largely attributable to sex-selection abortion. It has become increasingly a magnet for human trafficking in both of those countries, especially in China where the one-child-per-couple policy has made brothers and sisters illegal.

And the question is since this is a wave, as men get into marriageable age and there is a dearth of potential brides out there, we know that the traffickers will and are already sweeping into action to buy and sell women to be exploited in China.

I know the TIP report will be released soon. You might want to tell us when today. We'd love to hear. But my hope is that your office has adequately brought that issue onboard in terms of an exacerbating problem for traffickers -- for trafficking, I should say, and for victims.

MR. CDEBACA: Indeed. Yes, Mr. Smith, this is something that we continue to report on and something I raise in my discussions with our Chinese counterparts. The Chinese have an inter-ministerial antitrafficking council now which makes it perhaps a little easier for us to plug up with them and be able to have some of these types of conversations.

I think that as we pointed out in the TIP report last year and has been in other interventions on our part, this notion of the skewed sex ratio in China that, as you say, results from these policies is having a destabilizing effect that we have noted and we'll continue to discuss with the Chinese. Especially as we see that the importation of women from other countries or the trapping of those who would try to flee the regime in North Korea, it is a problem and it's something that we need to continue to push on.

I think that one of things that we hope to be able to tell you very soon is an exact date for this year's release of the TIP report. We will definitely make the June -- June is when it's supposed to come out and June is when it will come out.

We've got a secretary of state who is having to go wheels-up a little sooner than she thought because of yet another volcano that's erupting this time in Africa. And so scheduling the next couple of weeks has been difficult over the last few days. We will be letting your office know very soon exactly when the report will be coming out.

REP. SMITH: Thank you very much. Let me ask you -- Kevin Bales of Free the Slaves will be testifying shortly and will bring a tremendous amount of focus on the issue of what's going on in Eastern Congo. Frankly, I've been there and I have seen the devastation that has resulted from the minerals and wars, if you will, the exploitation of people, slavery.

He and others have signed a letter that went to the secretary of state opposing a delay or phase-in of the reporting requirements of Section 1502 of the Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform bill. And a letter was sent back on March 17th that puts the administration at least on the side of saying they are not for a delay. But I'm wondering where all of that is right now in terms of that section. Is it being implemented?

MR. CDEBACA: Congressman, I'd have to check on that and circle back to you, and I'll try to get you an answer forthwith.

REP. SMITH: I appreciate it.

Finally, just two final questions -- David Abramowitz in his testimony, and we heard some similar testimony earlier at a hearing that you were at, with the Helsinki Commission from the Solidarity Foundation. But he makes a very strong appeal that there be an elimination of fees for foreign labor contractors, fees assessed on the worker -- if it's assessed on the company itself, apparently that's okay -- but on the laborer themselves, full disclosure and enforcement, and points out that the Wilberforce legislation had some very good provisions that were lost between the House and the Senate.

They passed in the House but not in the Senate. And I'm wondering if you think the elimination of broker fees, labor contractor fees is something that would help to mitigate labor trafficking and if you would support legislative initiatives in that regard.

MR. CDEBACA: I'll take those backwards if I could.

REP. SMITH: Sure.

MR. CDEBACA: Obviously I think we'll have to continue discussions with the committee and with your office as far as any particular legislation before we'd be able to give you feedback on supporting particular things. But I do think that this is something that we have been pointing out in the last few TIP reports, it's something that concerns us greatly, the amount of fees that are charged by these brokers, even when the broker delivers and so often they do not.

So often it's the bait-and-switch in labor recruiting that lends itself towards a debt bondage or peonage type of situation. The company store doesn't necessarily happen through the deductions later on, it's already happened before the person even travels because they owe so much money. So it's something that we've been highlighting and it's something that really clicked into focus for us, I think, in the last few months in the wake of the Libya problems.

When so many of the returning Bangladeshi migrant workers who are coming back to Bangladesh are reporting to IOM that they -- while they were in Libya before the Gaddafi Regime began to target its own citizens, the workers of whom there were almost 3 million foreign guest workers routinely had had their passports taken and owed so much money to the labor recruiters that they had to stay there effectively for every day of their three-year term just to pay the debt back.

So what we've seen is people who in effect are renting themselves to the recruiters. They know that they're not going to get very much money. It's something that needs a solution, and we want to work with you and the committee to find a solution.

REP. SMITH: (Inaudible) -- I'm planning an additional hearing that would invite the Department of Defense and speak of -- and this would be in follow up to two previous hearings that I put together three years ago on the use of labor-brokers to bring people into Iraq where huge amounts of moneys were being expended for very laudable goals, but these people were given, it was a typical MO of a trafficked laborer, they took their passports, the agreement that they had made as to what their salary would be was drastically cut, they lived in subhuman housing. And we had Ambassador Miller here coupled with some DOD representatives and they kept telling us they're going to do better, and I'm wondering if they are doing better in terms of DOD --

MR. : Who, our folks?

MR. : Our folks, our folks.

REP. SMITH: It was very discouraging -- (inaudible).

MR. CDEBACA: This is of concern, it's something that was raised in the cabinet meeting earlier this year, it was something that Secretary Gates had a lot of, continues to have a lot of personal interest in and we think that we'll be meeting with secretary, soon to be secretary, Panetta, as soon as he is in place. What we've seen is, as you all recall, the Wilberforce act mandated the inspectors general from DOD, State and USAID start looking at these contracting situations.

And what we'd found is that in many cases the contracting officers did not necessarily know to include these types of provisions, these kind of safeguards into their contracts. So as far as the State Department is concerned we either should have a Procurement Information Bulletin or a PIB in this March with additional reporting requirements making sure that contractors are providing trafficking and know-your-rights types of briefings to the third-country nationals and subcontractors, making sure that they can't withhold the passports, informing them about the zero-tolerance policy on the use of commercial sex or human trafficking.

So we're seeing this idea of being able to tightened up the Federal Acquisitions Registry, but I do think that's it's something that needs some, as much light shown on it as possible. We want to make sure that we are doing the right thing, that our slavery footprint as well. If we're going to ask the consumer to look at their own slavery footprint we have to look at it as a government.

REP. SMITH: Thank you, Mr. Ambassador.

Ms. Bass.

REP. BASS: Yes, thank you.

I'd like to ask you a couple of questions related to technology in this issue. The Center for Missing and Exploited Children, advocacy groups, private companies and universities like the one in my district, the University of Southern California have established guidelines and recommendations on how to utilize cutting-edge technology to fight trafficking and child exploitations. Examples of innovative approaches include the use of PhotoDNA, mandating ISPs to stop child porn access, et cetera. I wanted to know how in your opinion the State Department has embraced these technologies and incorporated into its toolkit to prevent trafficking.

MR. CDEBACA: Well, the child pornography issue is a very serious one that the State Department deals with, not through the TIP Office but through the Bureau of International Narcotics and Law Enforcement Affairs. And so one of the things that we've been doing through funding resident legal advisors and intermittent legal advisors is to take the U.S. techniques, whether it's through NCMEC, whether it's through the Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section at Justice, whether it's through Project Safe Childhood, the ICACs, these other ways in which we're trying to prevent online exploitation of children and making linkages. So there is linkages, for instance, with Scotland Yard and with the Irish and others. And so these are the types of things that through the Bureau of International Narcotics and Law Enforcement we are trying to make sure is available to other countries.

One of the biggest problems that we've seen is that there are a number of countries that don't even have laws against child pornography. And so last week in the U.S. presidential, the U.S.- Russia presidential joint dialogue for instance, the child protection subcommittee was grappling with how can we get a normalization of these laws across the countries. Because with the Internet if there is no child pornography law in a small country in Eastern Europe --

REP. BASS: Right.

MR. CDEBACA: -- well, they have an Internet portal, they will be -- all of the pedophiles will flock to that.

REP. BASS: Do you know if that's come up in the United Nations? Is there efforts there?

MR. CDEBACA: Well, there are efforts through the UNODC, the U.N. Office of Drugs and Crime and others to try to work on it. And through a number of the conventions it's something that countries are supposed to be addressing. But as far as coming into compliance, it's taken a while.

So this is something that there is going to be a joint U.S.- Russian NGO summit in August in Lake Baikal to try to bring together folks from the commonwealth and the independent states, where a lot, unfortunately, a lot of the child pornography that's been seen these days is coming out of Eastern Europe. So it's something that the State Department is very much looking at and wants to be on the cutting edge of.

REP. BASS: So this conference that you're talking about is dealing with this issue specifically or about a range of issues and this is on the list?

MR. CDEBACA: A range of issues, and this is on the list, but it's going to be very much focused on this with the assistance of the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children.

REP. BASS: Thank you.

Second question, online trafficking has become a growing problem, especially in the face of large sporting events. I don't know if you saw some of the coverage that was done around the Super Bowl that a couple of the major cable news networks talked about.

What efforts are being made to curtail this activity within the State Department? To your knowledge is the FCC engaged in cracking down on Internet Service Providers and content web pages?

I also wanted to, you know, kind of connected to that is how do you process -- prosecute traffickers without violating First Amendment rights and how can government agencies work together to crackdown on these abusers?

MR. CDEBACA: Well, this is something that the FBI and the Justice Department have more direct jurisdiction over than does the State Department since it's largely a domestic enforcement issue. But I think that you go right to the crux of the issue as far as regulating content. Now, soliciting a crime is, and I'm not a First Amendment scholar, but I was a prosecutor for a long time -- (inaudible).

REP. BASS: And you worked on the Judiciary Committee, right?

MR. CDEBACA: I did. And soliciting a crime is not typically thought of as protected speech, and so there are some ways to deal with this. I think that one of the big issues of course is not necessarily through government regulation but consumer to business activism. The old media version of this played itself out over the last year with the removal of the spa ads from the Washington Post.

REP. BASS: What?

MR. CDEBACA: Most people knew that these spa ads were fronts for prostitution. This wasn't the Elizabeth Arden or the Red Door that was advertising in the sports page, the names were much more risqué than that. But it took the advocacy community, it took business owners, it took folks saying to the Washington Post company I don't want to advertise in your paper because these other advertisers that are advertising something that you couldn't just look at say that's obviously illegal, it was advertising a spa. From a law enforcement perspective you couldn't say, well, we know it's illegal so therefore we'll go after them because that's not the burden of proof for a criminal case.

So the advocacy community, the other advertisers and the people of the Washington area properly did something that the First Amendment likely would have stopped the D.C. government or the federal government from doing, which is they made it so the Washington Post felt like it should do the right thing and pull those ads out. So I think that some of the pressure on the service providers, whether it's Backpage, Craigslist, et cetera who've seen these problems. Some of that ends up needing to come from the consumer side as much as it does from the regulatory side.

REP. BASS: One final question, if you don't mind, Mr. Chairman, I'm still stuck on your earlier comments about the foreign workers in U.S. bases. Could you talk a little bit more about that? So we have minors or we have people that U.S. companies are recruiting that get involved in sex trafficking on bases?

MR. CDEBACA: One of the things -- one of the things that this committee has dealt with now since the Kosovo wars is the problem of the follow on when we're deployed.

REP. BASS: The what?

MR. CDEBACA: The follow on, it's not just the American troops, it's the people who are providing services to them, it's the folks who are being brought in, often third-country nationals --

REP. BASS: Right.

MR. CDEBACA: -- to run the canteens, to run the commissaries. There is an entire other than U.S. military --

REP. BASS: No, I understand that.

MR. CDEBACA: And this is something that as far back as the Kosovo, Bosnia interventions we saw this problem. There it was very much sex trafficking with the Albanian mafia, setting up night clubs and bars that were frequented by the contractors, they were frequented sometimes as well by our troops.

It was not uncommon to hear about police contractors and other security contracts just flat out buying the women to have as their own as concubines for six months at a time. That has largely been regulated and policed. But what we've seen, there was an article in the New Yorker just last week, is that the recruiting of third-country nationals into the missions in Iraq and Afghanistan continues to be a concern.

It's a concern to us. We're working through the inspectors general to try to make sure that those third-country nationals if they're brought in in support of our mission that they are done so with full understanding of what they are going to be doing, how much they're going to get paid, how they're going to be used, they have freedom of movement, all of those things as opposed to being basically brought in in a debt bondage type of situation confined to quarters or used for both sex and labor trafficking.

REP. BASS: And Mr. Chairman, this is what you said; you were going to have a hearing on subsequently? Yeah, I'll be very interested in that. Thank you.

REP. SMITH: Thank you very much.

Mr. Marino.

REP. MARINO: Thank you, Chairman.

Good afternoon, Ambassador.

MR. CDEBACA: Good afternoon.

REP. MARINO: I had a couple of questions that I was going to delve in, but my friend and colleague, Congresswoman Bass, has sparked my interest in the child pornography side of this. I was a U.S. attorney for quite a while and that was one of my main missions, it's prosecuting those that perpetrated, created and sold child pornography.

The toughest issue we ran into was dealing with countries like Russia, other European countries as well, who just have no laws for pornography. A great deal of the pornography does come from overseas, and not to mitigate that there is child pornography taking place right here in the United States.

What have we been able to do as far as sanction-wise in getting Russia and countries like Russia to take a serious look at this? Because in my opinion and in my experience, it is not even on the back burner, it is an issue that they show no interest in, it is an issue that generates billions of dollars for their economy, it is an area whereby those involved in the organized crime aspect of things are becoming obscenely wealthy and it is all for the dollar, the money that they are making.

So, you know, we can send them letters, we can publicly make statements, but what are we specifically doing to address the issue with getting support from law enforcement, the president, the prime minister of Russia?

MR. CDEBACA: I can only speak to that which I've been involved in and we are not the lead on that obviously. So -- but we can make sure that we get a more fulsome response. But as I mentioned earlier, I am the head of the migration subcommittee for the U.S.-Russia Presidential Bilateral Commission and my counterparts on the child protection subcommittee, I was president when they were reporting out and we do overlaps.

So we've tried to make sure that the two committees lash up, especially as far as child trafficking. Child slavery in Russia is often members of the (abstaining ?) minorities, members of the migrant communities, whether it is the Uzbeks or the Tajiks or others. So the child pornography is kind of one removed for me, much as in the U.S. Attorney's offices, the trafficking and child sexual exploitation, AUSAs are often not the same person who they have to work very closely together because there is so much of an overlap.

One of the things that we've seen that is very positive over the last year with the Medvedev presidency is the appointment of a child protection advisor in the president's staff, the first time someone whose job it is to look at this. They are looking among other things, at child pornography, they are looking at making sure that orphanages don't simply become breeding grounds that the traffickers or pornographers show up on the 18th birthdays when the girls are released from the orphanages with no other options.

So we do think that this is something they are looking at. Holistically, we've talked to folks from the Duma who are working on the pornography legislation and it is something that the Obama administration really wants to support through the relationship what we call the reset with the Medvedev government.

REP. MARINO: I'm not pointing any finger at any particular administration, but the only way to deal with this in my opinion is, first of all, worldwide recognition, but equally important is economic sanctions, severe economic sanctions. And I have not seen that yet from this present administration or from past administrations as well. What is it going to take for us to seriously wholeheartedly start implementing these sanctions? Can you give us some suggestions at what perhaps we in Congress can do?

MR. CDEBACA: Again, Congressman, I'd be hesitant to do so considering that my office is not the bureau that handles child pornography. So I wouldn't want to speak out of turn, but it is something that I'll certainly pass on to Assistant Secretary Brownfield and his folks, and we can hopefully circle back and have a conversation.

REP. MARINO: Good. Thank you.

I yield my time.

REP. SMITH: Thank you very much. I do have two final questions and about a dozen, but I'll submit the remainder for the record. On May 11th, the Foreign Affairs Committee at a hearing chaired by Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, we heard harrowing testimony from past Peace Corps volunteers about how they had been sexually abused as volunteers. Pleas to Peace Corps supervisors to help to address unsafe situations or for assistance following the attacks went unheeded and in many cases were met with a blame-the-victim attitude.

A major concern that I raised during that hearing with Aaron Williams, the Peace Corps director, was whether there were arrests of alleged perpetrators in foreign countries, whether or not they were followed up with meaningful prison sentences, you know, something that David will remember, we learned with the earlier tip of work that we would hear about arrest, but then we wouldn't hear about prison sentences and some countries are actually gaming the system of saying: Oh, we arrested umpteen hundreds of people, but none of them went to jail. They didn't even get a slap on the wrist.

I've suggested that Peace Corps Inspector General Kathy Buller be in contact with the GTIP office to ascertain whether or not there is a nexus between failures in prosecution and sentencing practices for sexual violence against Peace Corps volunteers in any given country and such failures in prosecuting and punishing sex trafficking. And I'm wondering if there is a correlating lack of prosecutorial capacity or perhaps political will with regards to this.

And I would hope that you would meet with Ms. Buller if you haven't already. We also believe, I believe and we'll be putting this into the reauthorization that the Peace Corps, and I would appreciate your thoughts on this, ought to be part of the interagency coordinating council because they certainly, I think, could provide some insights there.

Secondly, and this will be my final question, you mentioned that China has a ministerial antitrafficking group and you are now engaging about the trafficking problems in the People's Republic of China. What is their response to concerns that the one-child policy and the consequent number of missing girls is feeding the trafficking pandemic in China?

On June 1st, I joined Chai Ling and other human rights organizations at a very troubling press conference and they showed a video about gender side, the targeting of girls for destruction simply because they happen to be girls through sex selection abortion and in some cases, when the baby is born, through suffocation. And one woman even talked about how she applied a wet towel to her baby girls in order to destroy them simply because they were girls.

And the bottom line of the video was that the most dangerous three words nowadays in some countries are these, it's a girl. If it is a girl, she is subjected, whether an ultrasound finds it while the baby is still in utero or the baby once born is discovered to be a girl, she is killed.

How did the Chinese, your interlocutors, respond to that issue of -- you know, they are creating a demand for trafficking, do they understand that?

MR. CDEBACA: I think their actions perhaps speak louder than their words, Mr. Smith. One of the things that we have, in fact, expressed concern to the Chinese over is that there have been so many cases of forced prostitution and forced labor that are going uninvestigated and unprosecuted by the Chinese when they are spending most of their time and efforts under the network of antitrafficking on prosecuting child abduction cases by parents who want children, who can't have them, who are stealing children to be able to fill that need.

And so I think that what we've seen is the effect as far as a Chinese response that links the cause to the effect the way that we do, that's not something that we are seeing yet.

REP. SMITH: Was it raised? Did we raise it specifically that the one child per couple policy is creating a huge magnet for the traffickers?

MR. CDEBACA: I've raised it with my counterparts from Himout (ph) in the course of talking the problem of child abductions, the problem of the forced marriages from -- whether it is from the south or from the northeast, et cetera, and how this is kind of all of a part of the shortage of women, the skewing of the sex roles, et cetera. So -- not sex roles, but the skewing of the proportions.

And it's something that will continue in those discussions to raise. It's something that I think that again if we look at their actions, they are having to act in a particular way because of the outcome. But as far as a desire to engage with us on that, that's not something that I've seen.

REP. SMITH: I would hope that they realize there is this Tsunami of sex trafficking; we've only seen the beginnings of it. In China today, as you know, the average age -- marriageable age is 25. The one child per couple policy has been in existence since 1979. So systematically these girls have been eliminated. They are just not there, the missing girls of China. And it's only going to get worse. So I strongly encourage that this be a front and center issue with our Chinese colleagues.

Anyone else would like to make a final comment?

REP. : Chairman, may I -- I'd at least like to get one more question in on the record. Sir, could you please tell me first, do you have anything to do with monitoring child soldiers?

MR. CDEBACA: The child soldiers is handled in two different ways within the annual Trafficking in Persons Report. In the particular country narratives, when we're looking at how a country is doing, we look at forced conscription as one of the forms of human trafficking. So it goes into the country reports.

There's also the Child Soldier Prevention Act, which is part of the TVPA reauthorization of 2008 that mandates that a list be put together that has a particular sanctions regime associated with that list that should be published in the trafficking report each year.

That's handled by one of our sister bureaus, the Bureaus of Democracy Rights and Labor. So the answer is yes, but it's kind of a bifurcated system as we look at the child soldiers.

REP. : Okay. Perhaps I could ask my question at least to get it on the record and I could get a response sometime in the future. 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report identified six countries involved in recruiting and using child soldiers; Burma, Chad, Democratic Republic of Congo, Somalia, Sudan and Yemen.

President Obama waived sanctions for four of the six listed countries; Chad, Democratic Republic of Congo, Sudan and Yemen. Given that one of the America's tools to combat trafficking in persons in foreign nations is the prohibition of U.S. assistance for military defense and training, can you -- do you have an answer or could you get an answer for me why as the president issued waivers for these countries that the State Department has found to recruit and use child soldiers?

MR. CDEBACA: We can get you something that was actually I think something that was transmitted to Congress in the last Congress, and we'll try to make sure h we get that up to you.

REP. : Thank you. I appreciate that.

MR. CDEBACA: Thank you.

REP. : Thank you, Chairman.

REP. SMITH: Let me just -- did you want to respond to the Peace Corps question?

MR. CDEBACA: Yes, we will definitely link up with our Peace Corps counterparts. I think that it is important. One of the things that we have been very much trying to do in the TIP office is to use the trafficking issue to have an impact upon both sexual violence and domestic violence and how they are treated by a number of these countries.

Here in the United States we very much have built our antitrafficking response, our modern anti-slavery response on the gains of the last 30 years from the DV and sexual violence movements. What we recognize is that there's a lot of countries where it's the reverse. There hasn't been a sexual violence or victim rights movement; there hasn't been a domestic violence victim rights movement in these countries.

But they are starting to work on trafficking. So we want to be able to go to some of these countries and say, look, these things that we've been telling you about trafficking, relationships of power, the need for serious law enforcement responses, the need for prevention and for cultural change, those things also need to happen on family violence and sexual violence.

And so we want to able the have those conversations around rape and other things. So we work with the Peace Corps. One of the things that I've noticed however is that at least historically the Peace Corps was very loathe to get involved with things that they thought of as law enforcement like because they didn't want to be seen as law enforcement training. They didn't want the possibility that they'd be kind of lumped in with the security services or with other government agencies. So that has been an issue.

But we saw, for instance, with the Peace Corps volunteer in Belize who was a federal prosecutor who took two years off to go into the Peace Corps, simply because of his background, he necessarily ended up having an impact on the people in Belize. And as a result we've seen some change on the ground. So when the Peace Corps is doing antitrafficking work, it does make a change.

REP. SMITH: This is my final question, but on an emergency fund for disaster areas, would you -- is that something that TIP would support, particularly in light of what happened in Haiti?

MR. CDEBACA: Well, Mr. Smith, we actually were able to move a lot of money around very quickly last year in order to respond to the Haiti earthquake and we've -- in fact, one of my staff members is in Haiti right now, following up. It's a problem -- whenever there's an emergent situation we often then come back to the Congress to try to get a supplemental or to get some special budgeting done.

But it's very much robbing Peter to pay Paul. And that's what we did last year. That's what we'll continue to do when necessary. But there were programs in other parts of the world, some of them in Africa and others, that had to be repositioned into Haiti. So anything that will make it so that we don't have to shutdown on existing program to respond to an emergency would certainly allow us to respond that much more quickly and that much more effectively.

REP. SMITH: But wouldn't a more permanent fund, something that we could help craft through our reauthorization -- you know, Niger had their money, and you said it, robbing Peter to pay Paul, and a country that desperately needed the funding lost it in order to go to Haiti?

MR. CDEBACA: It's certainly something that we'd love to talk to your staff about. And as you put together the reauthorization, if there's particular language that we can look at or that we can toss around, we -- it's something that we'd certainly want to continue to talk about.

REP. SMITH: Thank you. So Ambassador, thank you. I deeply appreciate -- we deeply appreciate your testimony and your leadership. And we'll move on now to our second panel, appreciate it.

MR. CDEBACA: Thank you, Mr. Smith.

REP. SMITH: We'll begin first with Ms. Deborah Cundy who is vice president of the Office of the Chairman at Carlson Companies, a global travel and hospitality company based in Minneapolis, Minnesota, which includes such brands as Radisson Hotels, Country Inn & Suites, Carlson Travel, TGI Friday's restaurants.

For the past decade Ms. Cundy has worked closely with Carlson chairman and former CEO Marilyn Carlson Nelson on projects involving gender equality, economic growth and human rights issues, particularly the protection of children from sex tourism.

Then we'll hear from Ms. Chai Ling from All Girls Allowed. She's the founder of All Girls Allowed, an organization dedicated to restoring life, value and dignity to girls and mothers and to revealing the injustice of China's One-Child Policy. Ms. Chai Ling also established Jenzabar Foundation and serves as one of its board members.

The foundation supports the most inspirational and influential humanitarian efforts of student leaders through grant opportunities. A key student leader herself in the 1989 Tiananmen Square movement, Ms. Ling was subsequently named glamour woman of the year and nominated twice for the Nobel Peace Prize.

We'll then hear from Ms. Nancy Rivard who is airline -- president and founder of Airline Ambassadors International, which seeks to provide humanitarian aid to children in need and international development and relief to under-privileged communities around the world. Ms. Rivard has extended Airline Ambassadors International to include 6,000 members including some outside of the airline industry. She started the child trafficking initiative at Airline Ambassadors International and created a training program that teaches airline personnel best practices to identify potential trafficking victims.

We'll then hear from Mr. Philip Kowalczyk who is the president of The Body Shop, North America. He has led The Body Shop America Stop Sex Trafficking of Children & Young People campaign across the United States, Canada and Mexico since it was launched in August of 2009.

He has ensured that comprehensive training and high profile awareness programs were developed to support the mission of the campaign. Since the campaign began, Mr. Kowalczyk as leadership, the brand has won six awards for its efforts to raise awareness and drive positive change for children and young people affected by sex trafficking.

Then we'll hear from Mr. Kevin Bales, co-founder of Free the Slaves, a non-profit organization that frees slaves, helps former slaves stay free and advocates the government incorporations for policy change and carries out research. Mr. Bales is also emeritus professor at Roehampton University, London, and professor at the Wilberforce Institute for the Study of Slavery and Emancipation, University of Hull.

He has authored several books on modern day slavery including "Ending Slavery: How We Free Today's Slaves," which outlines a 25-year plan to stop slavery and human trafficking identifying what government, the U.N., business communities and individuals can do to end this egregious form of human rights abuse.

Then we'll hear from Mr. David Abramowitz, who is director of policy and government relations at Humanity United responsible for informing the organization's policy based advocacy activities, lead outreach efforts to the U.S. government, multilateral institutions and international NGOs and provide strategic counsel and advice to a broad range of grantees.

As I mentioned in my earlier statement, Mr. Abramowitz previously served as chief counsel for the House Committee on Foreign Affairs working on the TVPA of 2000 and all of its iterations, its reauthorizations as well as a wide range of other foreign policy legislation. So Mr. Abramowitz, thank you for being here.

I would like to note that Annette Lantos -- Tom Lantos, the former chairman of this committee is here with us and she's always most welcome. Thank you, Ms. Lantos, for being here today.

Ms. Cundy.

MS. CUNDY: Chairman Smith, distinguished members of the subcommittee thank you for the honor to testify on an issue that threatens the well being of every society on our planet - human trafficking.

One of the most frustrating aspects of trafficking for us all is that it's difficult to put metrics around it given its underground nature. But there is much that we do know. And increasingly, many in business feel that given what we know, we must act.

We know human trafficking is one of the largest illicit activities in the world. And we know that, for the most part, it affects the most vulnerable among us - the poor, the uneducated, the women and the children. We also know that it is projected to yield the traffickers $32 billion in annual revenue.

And that's the dark side. But there are also rays of light. We know that in just one decade of focused efforts since the Palermo Protocol of 2000 and the historic Trafficking Victims Protection Act, we have made significant progress, particularly when it comes to awareness building among the public at large, and in recent years, we've been encouraged by the increasing number of partnerships being forged across sectors to solve this complex problem.

As background to my company's involvement in combating the sexual exploitation of children in tourism, it might be helpful for you to know that Carlson is a privately-held, 73-year-old travel and hospitality company based in Minneapolis, Minnesota, which has a presence in 150 countries.

Our hotel brands include Radisson Hotels, Country Inn & Suites, Park Inn and Park Plaza, and most of these are franchised properties. We are also a majority owner in The Rezidor Hotel Group which operates our brands in Europe, Africa and the Middle East and is publicly traded on European stock exchanges.

There are, in total, about 1,070 hotels operating under a Carlson brand employing more than 70,000 people. Other Carlson companies include Carlson Wagonlit Travel which is the world's largest travel management company and T.G.I. Friday's restaurants. But today I'll focus on the hotel operations. As Chairman Smith referenced, in 2004, Carlson was approached by the State Department to sign what is known as the travel industry's Code of Conduct to protect children from sexual exploitation. We were shocked to learn that at any moment in time more than 2 million children are being sexually abused.

In the travel industry, this abuse is sometimes played out in hotels at tourism sites around the world and as mentioned there are hotels that are complicit in these activities, but often they are unwitting facilitators. The Code of Conduct basically asks that the signatory train its employees in what to look for and how to report it so that the employee base becomes a virtual army of eyes and ears.

The Code asks that the signatory raise awareness among its customers, that it includes language in its supplier contracts and corporate ethics policy repudiating the sexual exploitation of children and that it reports annually on its activities to the Code Secretariat.

I am proud to say that our Chairman and then CEO of Carlson, Marilyn Carlson Nelson, made the decision that Carlson would be the first global North American travel company to sign The Code. But not before we had some spirited internal debate about the pros and cons of such an action.

We live in our litigious society. Our legal department was concerned about possible liability and our public relations department was worried that the public would associate our brands with child trafficking. In the end, however we have had nothing but positive reaction to our signing by all stakeholders groups.

The brief video I'd like to share with you now is one element in Carlson's module on human trafficking that's included in what we call our Responsible Business training which every hotel employee goes through. In this, you'll see a few scenarios designed to help our employees know what kind of behavior to watch for as it pertains to a possible child trafficking situation.

(Video being played.)

While Carlson was the first global hotel company in North America to sign the Code, we would have gladly given up our leadership position to have others join us. As a matter of fact, we have offered to share our training materials with any of our hotel competitors. We have always felt that there are many ways in which we can compete against each other, but on this issue, we must join hands.

And yet for seven years, we remained the only hotel company to sign until just a few months ago when a significant milestone was reached and the world's largest airline, Delta, and the global hotel chain, Hilton, both signed the Code of Conduct to protect children from sexual exploitation. And we salute our industry colleagues for doing so.

To be fair, we know that while the majority of hotels have not signed, a few are doing some things to prevent the problem. But we feel that signing the Code provides all of us with a consistent template for implementation of these programs, a way to share best practices, a third-party monitoring tool to ensure that we are all doing our part and a very public shared commitment.

We look forward to the day when engagement by the travel industry in antitrafficking initiative is not considered just to be a corporate social responsibility activity, but rather a normal business practice. In fact, the goal should be that one day we will have normalized corporate efforts to combat human trafficking to such a degree that they are embedded in every industry.

At Carlson, we believe that business can be one of the most powerful forces for good on the planet. We see examples of that in the Body Shop, in LexisNexis, in Manpower, in Ford, in Microsoft, Delta Airlines, Chiquita and dozens of other companies that are using their resources, their problem-solving skills and their voices to engage in this issue. They are examining their own practices, training their employees and educating their customers and shareholders.

But with any complex problem, no one sector can solve it alone. Business, government, civil society and academia must partner more closely. We must understand each other's unique roles and leverage them. There are pieces of this complex problem that each of us must be accountable for in collaboration with each other to solve.

Conferences on the issue of human trafficking abound. They are enlightening and build networks to be sure. NGO Coalitions are ever-forming. Trade organizations such as the International Travel Partnership are exploring this issue and select businesses are self-organizing to mount their own efforts such as The Business Coalition Against Human Trafficking. All are useful endeavors.

Perhaps the time is right for a formalized convening of a cross sector federal advisory board over a sustained period of time that is focused specifically on Human Trafficking. The hope is that this initiative would accelerate progress through partnerships and capitalize on the increasing desire of the business community to make its contribution to this fight.

On behalf of Carlson, I thank the subcommittee for the work you are doing and for the privilege to support your efforts.

REP. SMITH: Ms. Cundy, thank you very much for your leadership and for bringing that video. Having seen it in Rome when you presented it, both I and everyone there was greatly moved by your leadership. So thank you so much.

MS. CUNDY: Thank you, Congressman.

REP. SMITH: Ms. Chai Ling.

MS. LING: Well, thank you, Chairman Smith and for your three-decade long tireless work to improve human rights around the world and on behalf of all those victims that are grateful. There have never been a more dangerous time to be a child in China.

The One-Child Policy and a cultural preference for sons has led to the elimination of millions of China's girls, which in turn created an influx of young men and an increased demand for brides. What has emerged is a black market for stolen children unlike anything the world has ever seen, leaving Chinese families fearful every day for their own children's safety.

There are 37 million more men than women in China today. Even with the child rearing cost, purchasing a child bride is the most economical way to guarantee their son will have a bride when he's ready to marry. There's simply not enough daughters for all the sons in China.

June 1st, as I mentioned earlier, we were able to create a coalition and declaration against gendercide in China and India and around the world. We're thrilled to be part of that process. However, the child trafficking and gendercides no longer is just the issue of human rights but the issue of security of nations.

According to leading expert and their presentation on June 1st, unless China do something drastically to end the gender imbalance under One-Child policy, there'd be 50 million men in 2020. What we're about to see in the video under-trafficking were not stopped but only increasing. So please play the video right now.

(Video being played.)

Thank you. Now, you've seen the devastating trafficking problem exposed in China, which is only growing a legacy for movements at our antitrafficking methods at All Girls Allowed. All Girls Allowed exists to restore life, value and dignity to girls and mothers and to reveal the injustices of the One Child Policy.

Our AGA team is inspired by our love to Jesus and our desire to follow Him, as we are commanded to act justly, love mercy and walk humbly with our God.

We're grateful for our brave and courageous local volunteers in China. It is their work that keeps us going every day. We're thankful to women's right in China, Sister Janjing (ph) standing -- sitting right behind me, and she spend thousands of hours on the phone to coordinating our rescue efforts on the grounds in China. And I also am grateful to the field crew who produced this many part of this clips. On the China's stolen children, there's a 90-minutes video. You're more than welcome to all take a look at the devastating trafficking situation taking place in China today.

But we have seen some really good successes with this very small team, but dedicated believers, and we are able to make a different in China. The first and foremost important step we do is to research. We examine specific areas of China to determine the root causes and the magnitude of trafficking.

And this map is China, and you see the red dot, it's Fujian Province. It's a hotbed for trafficking. We found after months of research a city with 3 million people that could have up to 600,000 people as a result of child bride trafficking.

These are very young girls who are trafficked and sold to marry men in their city as a result of this 37 million excess men that will not be able to find wives because their wives was eliminated under China's One-Child Policy and a preference for sons.

In 2003, a young woman who was trafficked as child bride in her 20s was beaten to death and -- to make the case, and shown to the -- to stop all the rest of girls from escaping. The Putian Village was widely known as child bride village, but the government has not addressed this problem.

These women in the photo are still looking for their own families after being sold and forced to marry. A second method we use is the country-wide rescue campaign. We have names, photos and relevant information for over 2,175 children who are currently missing in China.

Parents who lost children campaign together throughout the country with banners, pamphlets and rescue hotline numbers hoping to free children and create awareness. This photo shows the banner that we use on campaigns.

For the hearing, we are on road -- one of them here, just so we can get a taste and a flavor of what it's like to try to rescue the children in China. And here is the names and the profiles of these missing children. It's massive amount of work by all volunteers, many are families oftentimes and they have the names of the children and when they were stolen or trafficked and how to contact them and what their physical characteristics that could help identify them as well.

We would love to get your help, Chairman Smith, to send this to the Chinese leaders and to the counterparts who is doing some work to reunite trafficked children and so they can help these parents who have put their lives on hold and their family on hold to looking for their lost ones.

I want to share some good news. On one of our campaigns our worker found this young baby, Little Bean. She was only three years old when she was trafficked. She was playing outside with her mother and her mother went home to get some water. The next thing she knows, came out a few minutes later, she was gone.

And seven months later, through our workers traveled 30 cities and counties, send out 60,000 flyers and receiving over 100 hotline calls she was able to be reunited with her family. And this is a happy joyful picture that she's taking down her own "Missing Child" -- missing person and in her father's arm. But still many more are searching and waiting.

Unfortunately, the act of petitioning and organizing on behalf of children is not considered a legal act in China. Rather than helping parents finding their sons and daughters, the government has been cracking down on these volunteers and detain or imprison them. This photo is the man of -- the volunteers and the parents of missing children are detained for the activity to find their children.

So today we have four specific requests for China; that China would focus on helping us finding these 2,175 children, and China would focus on regions known for trafficking problems, especially in Fujian Province and that province has such a common trafficking problem buying child brides. So when the parents go over there, try to finding their kids and nobody thinks twice about why it's not something they should be doing. And in the three brides we were able to reunite, each of them had multiple siblings. A quarter of the siblings are a result of child trafficking.

The number three is China would spend more -- spend some money and resource in a way that is effective, while re-pective and encouraging on parents for searching for their children rather than detain them or harassing them or punishing them, that China would create a system similar to the U.S. AMBER Alert system that immediately begin searching and rescue at the moment the child disappears. The father who we saw on the clips of the video and his daughter was missing in 2005, but the case was not established until 2008. That's too late. So we thank you for the time.

REP. SMITH: Ms. Chai Ling, thank you very much.

MS. LING: Yes, you're welcome.

REP. SMITH: Ms. Rivard.

MS. RIVARD: It's an honor to address the U.S. Congress Committee on Foreign Affairs' Subcommittee on Africa Global Health and Human Rights. I was so inspired by the video from All Girls Allowed. It made me think to say that right now have a 30-second spot on the America Airlines and I would love your assistance in re-shooting that spot as a tool for public awareness around this area.

MS. LING: Praise God. Thank you.

MS. RIVARD: I founded Airline Ambassadors in 1996 for airline personnel using their travel privileges to help children. We are the only humanitarian organization of the overall airline industry and are leading the effort to raise awareness on the issue of human trafficking and modern day slavery.

In 2009, on a humanitarian mission in Cambodia, we rescued an abandoned little girl in the slums outside Angkor Wat. It was written up in the American Way magazine article of September 2010, which we would request be included in the record.

We also learned that there were thousands more girls like her, who were being brought out of the provinces and sold into the brothels of Bangkok and Phnom Penh. We realized that many of these children were being transported on commercial airlines. That's when I knew Airline Ambassadors had to get involved.

On our next humanitarian mission to the Dominican Republic, our team reviewed the behavioral indicators of trafficking victims and their predators, and stayed alert as we boarded our flights to the United States. Astonishingly, on every airlines; USAir, Delta and JetBlue, we correctly identified a trafficking situation.

The flight attendants on each airline didn't know what to look for or how to respond, but were anxious to help after we told them what they should do. We realized how vital a role that airline personnel could play as a front line defense for international security.

Congressmen Chris Smith and Joe Pitts supported us by hosting congressional Briefings to airline partners and embassies to encourage airlines and airports to raise awareness about this issue and outreach to the travel industry. American Airlines issued a bulletin to flight attendants as a direct response of these briefing and several embassies offered to connect us to their domestic airlines and airports.

Funding is needed for a proper follow-up, for training and materials. I again would like to acknowledge Delta Airlines as the first U.S. airline to sign the Code of Conduct for Protection of Children from Sexual Exploitation in Travel, and acknowledge other companies in the travel sector such as Carlson Companies, Hilton Worldwide and Global Exchange Tours. The Code is an industry driven responsible travel tourism initiative and an important way to demonstrate corporate social responsibility on this issue.

Airline Ambassadors has developed a training specific for airline, airport and hotel employees to identify the visible signs of trafficking and protocols to respond. We provided our first training just before the Super Bowl, DFW, and we had an overwhelming response. It was attended by flight crews from four airlines, TSA and airport personnel. We distributed 10,000 wallet cards with red flag indicators to participants and also on all flights leaving DFW.

It is estimated that 800,000 persons are trafficked across international borders every year. Every week, we receive reports from flight attendants who are seeing cases of trafficking. Just yesterday, I learned about an observant passenger who alerted a Swiss Air crew from Zurich to Chicago of a suspicious situation with 30 young girls, the flight returned to the gate and international security handled the problem.

The Swiss Air crew said they see those situations all the time, but they don't know what kind of action to take. We ask for your support in engaging the travel industry to implement training programs specifically addressing human trafficking. This committee is invited to review our training and help promote it as a best practice for airlines, airports and hotel staff around the world.

We'd love to partner with Carlson on the hotel aspect for sure. The airline industries already provide recurrent emergency training for crews.

So incorporating this subject would not be expensive. And again I said we could adapt the in-flight video that we now have on American Airlines.

On May 31st, 2011, just a couple of weeks ago, the flight attendant unions of APFA and AFA joined us at the signing of landmark trafficking legislation by Governor McDonnell at Dallas Airport. That represents a support of 70,000 flight attendance and 22 airlines.

We are also partnering with the First Lady of the Dominican Republic, Senhora Margarita Fernandez, to launch the first human trafficking web portal during the United Nations General Assembly. I am honored to extend a personal invitation to each member of the Foreign Relations Committee to join us at this historic event.

As you are aware, Human Trafficking is a major human rights issue of our time. It's not just a cause; it's impacting lives everyday. Just last week I met a young trafficked boy in Haiti who was so severely abused, he didn't even know his own name, 12 years old. I saw three young victims thrown into a dark, mosquito infested jail, with no chairs and a filthy cement floor because there's nowhere else to put them.

The Bureau for the Protection of Minors in Haiti has identified 13,000 trafficked victims just in the last year in Haiti. We are building safe houses to protect these children and get them the care we need. Please support our efforts to raise awareness in the travel industry and protect children in the United States and the world. Thank you.

REP. SMITH: Ms. Rivard, thank you very much.

Mr. Kowalczyk.

MR. KOWALCYZK: Thank you. Thank you, Chairman Smith and the members of the committee and subcommittee. At The Body Shop we believe that business should be both profitable and a force for good. The principal way we do this is by using our beauty boutiques as a platform to inform customers on social and environmental issues.

In doing so, we invite them to join us and together campaign to create long term change. This approach was pioneered by our founder, Dame Anita Roddick, who created The Body Shop in the U.K. in 1976, and we've grown our brand from one boutique to over 2,600 in 65 countries today.

I would imagine for many of you in this room, the fact that the numbers are in the millions of children who are trafficked every year and sexually exploited in virtually every country across the world is something you've known for many years. The Body Shop, it was only five years ago that we became aware of the extent of this underground issue.

As a business that has spent 35 years campaigning for social and environmental change, it was then a natural next step for us to explore how we could contribute to providing a solution. We responded by creating a global partnership with ECPAT International and together we launched the Stop Sex Trafficking of Children and Young People campaign in 2009. In the U.S. and Canada we have partnered with ECPAT, and the Somaly Mam Foundation to achieve specific and actionable goals.

In the first instance, our goal has been to raise funds to bring immediate relief to help children and young people who have been impacted by sex trafficking. But ultimately, we are working to inspire long-term change by raising awareness of this issue and by facilitating the voice of the consumer to be heard by the decision-making powers.

From the outset, our campaign strategy focused on the belief that abuse on this scale could be stopped if decision-makers take action. Fundraising is important to support immediate relief, but this is only a band-aid. The real answer to create sustainable change lay in influencing decision-makers to change legislation.

How do we do this? As an international retailer with stores in high profile locations like shopping malls and street locations across the world, we have an incredible opportunity to reach literally millions of people from all walks of life by using our boutiques to communicate and inspire action.

We have the ability to create a platform that captures and mobilizes the voice of our customers. Add to the equation another incredible asset, 50,000 dedicated staff across the world who are trained to talk about the campaign with our customers. And with that, we have the ingredients to deliver some groundbreaking change.

When we can inspire customers to lend their voice by signing a campaign petition, we can create a loud and united voice which we believe decision makers are responding to. Of course, the petition call to action must be nationally relevant and very specific to the changes that are needed across the globe. To deliver this, we and ECPAT International created specific calls of action relevant to country-specific issues.

So for example, in the United States, we are calling for all states to introduce safe harbor to protect and prevent any person under the age of 18 from being charged and prosecuted or incarcerated for prostitution. In some states this exists. In most it does not.

In Germany we are calling for the government to strengthen the protection of victims during the investigation and legal proceedings. In South Korea the call to action centers on training police and teachers to help prevent trafficking.

While we know we have a long way to go to fulfill the potential of our campaign, we have already had some successes which have created change to protect children and young people not just today, but in the future. Around the world, in less than 12 months, more than 6.2 million people have come to The Body Shop and signed our petition in 50 countries around the world. This is the biggest petition in a proud 35 year history at The Body Shop.

So far, we've presented the petitions to governments in nine countries and have already helped to create legislative change. And again a few specific examples might help. In Malta the government responded to our campaign by signing the Council of Europe's Convention on the Protection of Children Against Sexual Exploitation and Child Abuse, a major international treaty which will greatly improve the protection and support for children.

In Malaysia the government responded to the petition by committing to ratify the Optional Protocol to the U.N. Convention of Child Rights on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography. In the Netherlands, the Minister of Security and Justice responded by accepting personal responsibility to increase police protection and support the children affected.

We've also helped to change legislation in the Switzerland and Norway, and we've received assurances by the Ministers in South Africa and Portugal that our call to action will be delivered. We believe this is just the start. With 33 petitions to be presented to governments around the world in the coming months, we are confident that we can help create further change.

We are also preparing for a presentation to both the European Union and the United Nations Human Rights Council in the hope that we can influence even greater action. We are proud of our achievements in gathering the support of more than 6 million people worldwide on the issue of child sex trafficking; of raising more than 3 million (dollars) to support relief and advocacy efforts.

We are very aware that there's a long way to go, but we're committed to this issue and confident that we can continue to work with our customers and other affiliates in order to be able to make a difference. I pay tribute to our customers and my colleagues around the world who demonstrated beyond any doubt, that as a business, if empower people to become involved, they will gladly respond, and speak out to help create change.

Chairman Smith, I'm grateful to have been invited here today to share the details of The Body Shop commitment to tackling child sex trafficking and hope that the subcommittee has -- that what the subcommittee has heard is helpful in supporting the work of your subcommittee and in inspiring the private sector to play a role in eliminating the commercial sexual exploitation of children and young people. Thank you for listening.

REP. SMITH: Mr. Kowalczyk, thank you very much for your testimony and for the leadership of The Body Shop.

I'd like to now recognize Mr. Bales.

MR. BALES: Thank you. Thank you for the opportunity to speak today. I'll concentrate most of my remarks on the situation in Eastern Congo. But I also have to say it was great fun and enormously exciting to work with a Norwegian Body Shop staff and help them with the training not long ago with our sister organization, the Norwegian Anti-Slavery Society.

Since the beginning of human history, conflict and slavery have marched together. And since the end of the Cold War we have seen this time and again in Sierra Leone, the former Yugoslavia, Burma, Uganda, Sudan and in the Congo. Civil war destroys the rule of law. Without the protection of the law, the average citizen is prey to violent men and made more vulnerable by their predations.

Without the rule of law, anything and anyone can be stolen. The natural world is decimated and nation's resources are swallowed up by criminals and the people become dispersible tools in what is simply armed robbery on a massive scale. All this is true of the Eastern Congo.

But there's an additional truth that we must face and that is our own responsibility in this crime. We are not guilty of violence or culpable for this slavery, but we are responsible for generating a market for the minerals that feed the power of the armed gangs.

We have real need for these minerals and the supply chain is complex, but we also have a duty to unravel this complexity and to confront the ongoing rape, slavery and murder of the people of Eastern Congo.

I've been with the people in Eastern Congo. I've shared their meals; I've joined them in their churches. They are reduced to bare subsistence. Before the armed thugs, they are lambs to the slaughter and the weapons that enslave and murder them are paid for with the profits from the minerals we buy.

My written testimony contains precise descriptions of the different types of slavery found in Eastern Congo and detailed suggestions for how we might all work together to end that brutality. Two of those suggestions are for provisions that can be added to the Trafficking Victim's Protection Act, which have been developed by the Alliance to End Slavery and Trafficking, a coalition of hands-on expert anti-slavery and antitrafficking organizations of which we are a proud member.

One would require greater business supply chain transparency. The broad support by businesses for a similar new law in California makes a strong argument to extend that transparency to all American citizens. The second would close loopholes in the Smoot-Hawley rules. One of the reasons -- those loopholes are one of the reasons for a small -- for the very small number of enforcement actions.

Additionally I want to point to the need to build and enhance our existing public-private partnerships in order to deprive the armed gangs of their funds. This is necessary because the existing supply chain remediation focused on the minerals after they leave the Congo is not enough. This requires working with the people there to produce slave-free and conflict-free minerals. In this way, our concerns and desires for clean computers, for supply chain transparency has a meeting point with the desire of local people for freedom, livelihoods and security.

This is not a problem we can solve alone. These local communities are our best and true allies. Our goal should be communities that articulate their own goals for their lives and feel some sense of control over their destinies. We know this is possible.

In India, we and our partners work with whole villages who are enslaved in rock quarries. With support through liberation, training in citizenship and rights protection committees and the assignment of legal mining leases, these communities are transformed. Such methods are crucial for eastern Congo because liberation brings development.

When freed slaves work for themselves and their own family, they unleash an enormous potential, both for production and for the consumption that drives the economy. This freedom dividend causes local economies to spiral upward and helps to stabilize communities.

Also the United States needs to be closely involved in making sure that peacekeepers are adequately resourced and that peacekeeping is focused on those locations that are economically important. Without security, there can be no transparency, no slave-free and conflict-free minerals nor can there be protection for the natural world, for the pristine cloud forests and the rare mountain gorillas which are such a powerful economic engine across the border in Rwanda.

Remember that the per capita income in the Congo is $280 per year while the average mountain gorilla generates around $28,000 a year for their local economy. When I was in the eastern Congo, I was astounded that most of the people I met were not despairing. They were doing their best to rebuild their lives and their families. We don't have the right to despair of they don't. Instead, we should learn from them and restore our own belief in them and their home.

Eastern Congo is an amazing resource for the whole planet in both natural beauty and needed minerals. Let's join the people there in visualizing their country without destruction, without slavery where communities can support themselves sustainably and we are excited to go as tourists. Then let's work with them to achieve that vision.

Finally, it is rare that I get to speak directly to people who hold sufficient power to bring slavery to an end. So I must tell you that yours can be a legacy of freedom, not just for the Congo, but for the whole world. There are 27 million slaves in the world today, a very large number, but the smallest fraction of the global population to ever be in slavery. These slaves generate something like $40 billion a year for their masters, but again that is the smallest proportion of the global economy ever represented by slave labor.

Slavery is illegal in every country and denounced by every faith and tradition. Slavery now lurks in the dark and hidden criminal edges of our global society. In fact, it is the standing on the edge of its own extinction. With a strong concerted push, we can end slavery.

For years, in our work of liberation and rehabilitation of slaves around the world, we have been carefully calculating the cost of freedom and of building new lives. The cost of bringing slavery to an end would be to our best estimate around $12 billion over a period of some 25 years, a sum to be raised from all governments and all people of goodwill. The result would do to slavery what a similar concerted effort has done to small pox where once there were millions of cases each year, there are now a handful and those are quickly dealt with.

We know how to end slavery. Thousands of freed slaves around the world are proof of that. And while we still lack the resources and awareness to make that happen, perhaps our greatest need is leadership. So I finish with a question for the committee: will you be the leaders that rid not just the enslaved mine workers of the Congo of slavery, but the world of slavery? Thank you so much.

REP. SMITH: Mr. Bales, thank you very much for your leadership and your organization which is doing a pioneering work. Thank you.

Mr. Abramowitz?

MR. ABRAMOWITZ: Thank you, Mr. Chairman and Ranking Member Payne and other members of the committee for holding this hearing on one of the most impressive human rights challenges of our time, the widespread occurrence of modern-day slavery and human trafficking. I ask that my full written statement be made part of the record.

REP. SMITH: Without objection, your and as well as other members of the panel.

MR. ABRAMOWITZ: And I'll just summarize my remarks and some oral remarks on the left of a very distinguished panel who really ploughed the ground before me. Thanks for your generous introduction, Mr. Smith. But as we all know, it is your leadership that all of us up here honor the way in which you've pursued this issue for more than 10 years through the original TVPA and before bringing this issue to light and we really want to thank you for your commitment, including the commitment of you and your staff in this Congress.

REP. SMITH: Thank you.

MR. ABRAMOWITZ: Mr. Chairman, other witnesses have described the scale and scope of modern-day slavery, the third largest and fastest growing transnational crime. Regrettably, this is not a far-away problem that affects distant lands. It remains a shock to most Americans, but thousands of adults are trafficked into forced labor or sexual slavery right here in the United States and estimates of U.S. youth trafficked into commercial sex are as high as 100,000.

Mr. Chairman, at Humanity United we believe there are solutions to this heinous abuse, but ending trafficking and slavery requires a unity of effort between civil society, the private sector and governments around the world that I was very pleased when I saw the composition of this panel bringing together the private sector as well as those of us in civil society who have been working on this matter and I commend the committee for putting that together.

For our part, Humanity United is supporting the alliance to end slavery and trafficking or ATEST that Mr. Bales just referred to, a coalition of 12 members of civil society that I described in my written testimony. ATEST has been working on the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, its implementation and also on the reauthorization bill and the recommendations I will outline below are drawn from its proposal.

As I just indicated, Mr. Chairman, there is no need to remind you of the leadership role this committee has taken with respect to fighting human trafficking. One of the strong points of this legislation has been its bipartisan nature, which is sustain the framework created by the TVPA over the last decade. I think it is of paramount importance that this strong bipartisan support, from introduction to presidential signature, remain a key part of this effort.

In my written testimony, Mr. Chairman, I've laid out a number of lessons we've learned over the past 10 years and I am happy to answer any questions you have on those. Let me focus on what we have learned about how the U.S. government can best achieve change. The annual Trafficking in Persons report can highlight forms of abuses and identify solutions. The TVPA's tier ranking system can name and shame and spur governments to action. However, we have learned the report and rankings are not enough.

The U.S. government must conduct robust diplomacy, both by the Trafficking in Persons office and the departments of state's regional bureau as well as creative action in the field where each embassy has a critical role to play in catalyzing change. The U.S. government also needs resources to leverage change. While at the end of the day this responsibility lies with a particular foreign government, U.S. assistance judiciously employed can be critical to go from willingness to actual action.

As we consider these evolving developments, Mr. Chairman, there are a number of important reforms that should be considered as you move forward in the next 10 years of combating human trafficking.

First, as was discussed on the earlier panel and as you mention, Mr. Chairman, we need to address the issue of foreign labor recruiters and brokers, one of the leading drivers of the phenomenon of slavery and trafficking today. Recent testimony you heard before the Helsinki Commission just a few weeks ago details these practices and I would ask the statement by Ms. Neha Misra on May 23, 2011 be made part of the record.

REP. SMITH: No objection, so ordered.

MR. ABRAMOWITZ: In this regard, Mr. Chairman, we know recruiters deceive young girls with promises of legitimate employment only to bind them into sexual exploitation. Exploitation by labor recruiters is happening right here in the United States, in our fields, in our factories, in our own streets. In my written testimony I cite a recent case where 400 Thai workers were lured to the United States and put into modern-day slavery.

Mr. Chairman, I believe the abuses of labor recruiters and brokers can be ended and that effort can start right here in the United States and can have a huge demonstration effect for other countries around the world. As you mentioned, this house has already adopted such an approach in 2007, but that provision did not become part of the final legislation. ATEST has reviewed this House-passed provision and I have described the revised framework in my written testimony.

As you mentioned, elimination of fees that end up being abusive and lead to debt bondage, disclosure before the worker leaves his or her country, just as the government is requiring the contractors to do as Ambassador CdeBaca indicated, an enforcement through a registration system paid by the foreign labor recruiters themselves. Second Mr. Chairman, I would point to the need to maintain funding for international antitrafficking programs and to authorize contingency funding for emergency situations and unexpected opportunities.

As I discussed earlier we are only going to make further progress as smart diplomacy can be leveraged with targeted U.S. initiatives. I understand that the cuts in the FY 2011 budget has led to a 23 percent decrease in the TIP office's programs this year, a reduction that is as deplorable as it is unwise. I urge that the committee reauthorize assistance for international antitrafficking programs at no less than the amounts currently authorized in the TVPA.

The United States also needs to be able to rapidly deploy experts and staff and that was discussed when you were talking to Ambassador CdeBaca. For example, I understand that after the fall of the Ben Ali regime in Tunisia during the Arab Spring, officials in the Tunisian government communicated that they now could finally start talking about trafficking problems that the regime has refused to admit and expressed a willingness to enter into dialogue with the United States on these issues.

The United States must have the ability to move quickly in these kinds of opportunities. The upcoming independence of South Sudan may be another such opportunity to help create a new framework for a new country recognizing that the challenges that we see at this very moment as conflict is breaking out between north and south may delay that.

But there will be an opportunity to help them get this issue right which has caused so much pain to their own population, and it's something that we should be ready for. Finally, as you've mentioned efforts to combat trafficking must be part of the response to natural disasters or man-made emergencies and we -- I talk about the Haiti example as you referred to with Ambassador CdeBaca.

Third, Mr. Chairman, as Mr. Bales mentioned, and as I describe at length in my written testimony, corporations can join the fight against slavery in our time. We see examples of this at our table and there are other ways that corporations can move forward to really try to help all of us to end this abuse and I would just direct you to the testimony and the reference to the California law that Mr. Bales mentioned.

Fourth, Mr. Chairman, we need to continue the integrity and strength of the annual Trafficking in Persons Report which will be issued by the Department of State later this month. I spoke of the reports earlier and happy to answer your questions on some of the success.

I am most concerned Mr. Chairman, that there will be legislative efforts to undermine the impact of the report. Making the report a biannual process or making the report appear earlier in the calendar year would have the effect of undermining the impact that the report has today for reasons I discussed in my written testimony. And I think we should -- the first real issue should be let's do no harm, and I'd be happy to talk to your staff and to members of the committee as proposals might come up.

We must also carefully review the effects on the report of the quote "automatic downgrade" unquote provision that was added in 2008 by which countries that had been on the Tier 2 Watch List automatically face sanctions if they remain on that list for more than 2 years. The implementation of this provision has both produced change, but has also upped the pressure and debates within the State Department and we need to see how this provision is implemented in the coming report.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I have some additional suggestions regarding how U.S. law could be approved to make antitrafficking policies even more effective including enhancing the State Department's response in the field, authorizing compacts with willing countries, ensuring the Department of Labor continues the publications of its reports on goods made with forced and child labor. These are all contained in my written testimony. I hope you and your staff will have a chance to review them.

Mr. Chairman, Ranking Democratic Member Payne, these are a number of measures that should be considered by Congress and reauthorized in the TVPA, and we in ATEST would be happy to meet with you and your staff to have further discussions about these matters. If this committee continues to act in a bipartisan manner in accordance with its traditional approach to this issue, you can ensure an even greater impact, save more victims and help their journey to move beyond their terrible experience and become survivors.

Mr. Chairman, I commend you for recognizing that every part of society, government, private business, civil society and as was discussed every human being who believes in the dignity of each of us has a role in eliminating this heinous abuse. We stand ready to work with you and I want to thank you for inviting me to present this testimony.

REP. SMITH: Mr. Abramowitz, thank you so much for your testimony. I did read your testimony. It's filled with very useful recommendations as usual, so I do, on behalf of the committee, thank you for that as well.

I'd like to yield to my good friend and colleague, Mr. Payne, our ranking member of the subcommittee.

REPRESENTATIVE DONALD M. PAYNE (D-NJ): Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, and because of a long-standing conflict I was unable to get here earlier. I will just ask to have my opening statement included in the record.

REP. SMITH: Without objection.

REP. PAYNE: And I'll yield to you for your questioning and then follow as -- yeah, okay.

REP. SMITH: Thank you, Mr. Payne. Let me just ask a couple of questions and again all of your testimonies are filled, replete with very useful suggestions.

And Mr. Bales, you might have noticed in my questioning of Ambassador Luis CdeBaca, that I asked him about the letters that had been sent by you and a consortium of other -- and several other NGOs. Are you satisfied with the response that was sent in March by the department?

MR. BALES: Yes, I think so and also I should -- I think to answer the question you ask of Ambassador CdeBaca. As I understand it the regulations on DRC exports are expected to be released by the SEC in early August.

REP. SMITH: Okay.

MR. BALES: Yeah.

REP. SMITH: Thank you.

Ms. Cundy, you spoke about the legal department being reluctant at first. What were their -- in order to share that (false ?) concern, although legal departments are paid to keep corporations out of trouble, what were their concerns and can you share that so that we could, you know, amplify that and make sure that others, legal departments don't repeat those concerns?

MS. CUNDY: Yes, congressman, up to a point. I'm not exactly sure all of the issues that they might have been looking at, but I do know that in the end the code of conduct is not binding. Our legal department, I think, might have felt that it -- should something occur after we've signed the code, what does that mean for us? In the end they felt that since we are aware of the problem, it had been brought to our attention, that frankly for us not to sign the code might actually put us at more exposure.

REP. SMITH: So wasn't a concern about a potentially false allegation by an employee resulting in a defamation suit or some other --

MS. CUNDY: No, not that I'm aware of. I don't --

(Cross talk.)

REP. SMITH: Oh, had to do with the code itself, okay. If I could ask you as well, when an employee recognizes a potential act of human trafficking, to whom do they report and is law enforcement immediately noticed? How is that usually done?

MS. CUNDY: Yes, they are told to report to the management of the hotel.

REP. SMITH: Okay.

MS. CUNDY: The management of the hotel then contacts law enforcement immediately, and of course how law enforcement, depending on where the location is decides to follow up is something that's within their purview.

REP. SMITH: And Ms. Rivard, when a flight attendant recognizes a potential trafficking situation, you had mentioned previous, I heard you speak to the, you know, that during long flights in particular, very often a flight attendant will notice, you know, disconnect if you will, between a man and perhaps some other people who are traveling with him, mostly women or children, and that opportunities present themselves as they go to the ladies room. And to whom do they report when they have a suspicion of a trafficking in progress?

MS. RIVARD: Yes, this happened last week to my girlfriend who was going to Costa Rica, and there was 50-year-old man with a 9-year-old Dominican girl. And he -- she noticed that the man wouldn't let the little girl talk to her at all. She brought her cheese cake, wouldn't -- tried to go in the bathroom with the little girl, and when he -- she stopped him, saying it's not appropriate. He kept his foot in the door and said, "Woman, get out, it's none of your business."

She on her own told the pilots who radioed ahead to a airline dispatch and to -- have the authority that customs meet that case and sure enough it was a trafficking situation. So their procedure is basically just to tell the pilots and the pilots notify SOC, security operations command at headquarters.

REP. SMITH: I had raised -- your best practices actually handed out your brochure to OSCE participants at the last parliamentary assembly, and at least two of the representatives said that their national airline, it was the Dutch and the Swedes, were very, very interested. Has there been any fruit from your work with other airlines adopting that best practice?

MS. RIVARD: Not so far. I mean, we'd certainly be very interested. We're pursuing Delta right now. We'd love to support them in training.

REP. SMITH: Delta would bring Aeroflot in right, is that correct? Or --

MS. RIVARD: They could. I am not -- exactly who is part of their alliance, but I have not had luck so far. Many of the airlines are nervous about associating their brand with this issue, afraid maybe that the flight attendants would be too vigilant and they would get a law suit. Although we're pitching this to the airlines that this is an issue of child protection. And that like Carlson found out this is ultimately good for their brand.

I would like your support in helping to convince more airlines of this and I need your support and connections to airlines that are interested in the training, because we have developed that.

REP. SMITH: Do you think a White House summit or something along those lines would be helpful?

MS. RIVARD: That would be fantastic, yes.

REP. SMITH: I think the subcommittee could pursue that idea and it would include obviously the great work that Ms. Cundy has done --

MS. RIVARD: Exactly.

REP. SMITH: -- with her group. So --

MS. CUNDY: That would be greatly appreciated.

REP. SMITH: Well, we'll pursue that and --

MS. CUNDY: Thank you.

REP. SMITH: -- hopefully they'll be open to it. Let me ask Mr. Abramowitz if I could, you pointed out that David Arkless' research suggests that worldwide economic downturn has led to a surge in human trafficking worldwide as those desperate to sustain themselves have become more vulnerable to traffickers due to economic distress.

The correlation between economic downturns generally and this very, very severe one that we've experienced throughout the world, what are you seeing? Is it more labor trafficking, sex trafficking, both? In your testimony you also talked about the unified approach rather than this dichotomy, false as it has been over the years. If you could speak to that as well?

MR. ABRAMOWITZ: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I think that you have to look at from both sides. You have populations who may be under stress because of the change in economic circumstances that they're under. There may be a factory that is closed, and therefore they're willing to take more risks to try to move in order to seek some sort of better economic opportunity. Therefore, it comes from sort of the bottom-end as well as the top end because as there is shrinking profits, there is a need for those whether they're making bricks in India or elsewhere where in terms of the multinational thing, they're looking to reduce the cost that they have.

And so they're supposed to push and pull. With respect to the issue of whether we've seen more into the sexual exploitation or labor exploitation, I don't think we really have the data to really give a conclusive answer. Obviously again a presumption would be that there would be increased vulnerability because there would be more -- women who would be more willing to take risks or others who'd be more willing to take risks and therefore would be more vulnerable to exploitation.

I think in terms of the false dichotomy issue, clearly there is no doubt that there is recruitment specifically into sexual slavery. I think that the point is that a lot of the different activities we see that are related specifically to labor recruiting, for example, on the economic side often ends up with also sexual exploitation involved.

So you bring -- a individual leaves Nepal to go to India because perhaps sexual violence or other reasons have driven them to take that risk. They think they're going into a domestic situation. Maybe they end up in a domestic situation as they thought, but then they're exploited. They're not only for their labor, but also they fall into a trap of sexual exploitation. So you see both phenomena. Thank you.

REP. SMITH: If I could, to you as the end, you talked about elimination of fees, disclosure and enforcement. You reminded us that the '07 legislation had a registration and enforcement system that penalizes recruiters and complicit employers that do not follow the requirements in the system. Could you elaborate on how you think that might help end this labor trafficking problem that is only escalating?

And if you could, I mentioned earlier about the Department of Defense, and that when we held those two hearings I was deeply disappointed in the Pentagon's responses. You know, they told us now we're going to rectify. Do you see any evidence perhaps that they've really taken to heart that we should not be complicit in Iraq or anywhere else with these labor traffickers who, you know, impose huge sums on people who think they're getting a good deal and they get a awful deal?

MR. ABRAMOWITZ: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And with respect to the first question, I think the notion is that we need to set certain standards for foreign labor recruiters including as was discussed the elimination of fees. I will say that the administration has taken an important step by really restricting the amount of fees in certain programs involving legal workers. There was recent regulations that the Department of Homeland Security has put forward in draft that did really try to restrict fees.

But of course that's only on one part of the program. And then the second part is as was discussed we -- the worker really needs to understand what it is that they're moving to. So often they don't understand that there will be this fee, that fee, this cost for training et cetera, where they're going to be and of course we've seen cases including in the U.S. government cases where laborers thought they were going to the Gulf, but they end up Baghdad. Clearly that is a huge problem. Once they are there, they are sort of stuck there. They may have gotten huge debts and so then it becomes a problem that exploitation occurs.

With respect to enforcement, I think that, you know, you can take a spectrum of different approaches to this. But it seems that there needs to be some mechanism so that once a labor recruiter or broker has been registered with some -- a government entity that there be some ability to pursue them if it turns out that they've misinformed the worker or brought them into a situation where there could well be exploitation. So I think there has to be some enforcement mechanism. Exactly what that looks like there was of course -- one of the -- in place for the 2007 provision that we've been discussing, there was a fraud in foreign labor contracting provision that was put in that has just now been starting to be pursued as a prosecutorial method.

In terms of the Department of Defense, Mr. Chairman, it's very hard to evaluate. I think that one of the reasons that the office of inspector general was brought into this was because it's -- you know, the contracting procedures of the government are complex enough that if you really are not pursuing and really doing the training that's necessary with respect to the contractors themselves, then they're not really -- and the employees who are working with the contractors, they are not going to know about these provisions. I think the Defense Department has its problems. The New Yorker story that you referred to indicated a wide range of different problems that obviously the Defense Department has more work to do.

I think secretary Gates did make some very important statements at the February meeting of the President's Interagency Task Force and I think that's going to be something that Secretary Panetta is going to have to follow up with. I think in the Defense Department it's all about leadership from the top. There are a lot of things that happen there that only happen because the civilian leadership is committed to it. So I think that's the avenue we need to pursue.

REP. SMITH: Mr. Bales -- I thank you -- the corporate responsibility for those particularly tech companies but others who are benefiting, and as we all are through many devices that would otherwise not be used or available -- (inaudible) -- minerals from DR Congo. Could you name some names of some of the corporations that are doing well and others that perhaps are doing very poorly, who are deriving their minerals from DR Congo?

MR. BALES: You know, I'm not sure that I can.

REP. SMITH: Okay.

MR. BALES: And the reason why is that the names that would be familiar to us are those who are so close to us on that supply chain that they are -- it's not that they are whitewashed any -- of responsibility any more than we are as consumers. But they are a very long distance away from those smelters, processors and component manufacturers, primarily in Southeast Asia which supply components which are then very difficult to link back to DR Congo. Not least because so much of the minerals are being smuggled out of the Congo, thus making Rwanda which does not have coltan for example, the largest coltan -- one of the largest coltan exporters in the world.

Until we crack that duplicity at the Congolese, Rwandan and Burundi borders, we'll never be able to be absolutely certain, and we'll never be able to make a fair comment about which companies are doing well and which aren't. Admittedly there are a number of large electronic companies which are on record as wanting to do the right thing, but at the moment I worry that they don't have the mechanisms to achieve that because those of us on both sides of this table aren't able to help them to do that.

MR. : Mr. Chairman, could I just add something?

REP. SMITH: Yeah.

MR. : You know, I think that Mr. Bales really has pointed to a very significant problem. If you look at a number of good corporate citizens across the different spectrum of industries, they will tell you that they are making efforts, but it's very, very difficult. If you're buying apparel from China, you don't know whether that apparel has been made with Uzbek cotton or not.

So knowing whether you're contributing in some way to the global supply chain is very, very challenging. I mean, you know, there are members who are -- companies that are members of various stakeholders -- multiple -- multi-stakeholder initiatives that bring together a wide range of industry groups and others who are really trying to make efforts in this area. A number of them work on both environmental and labor issues, but the -- there has been a lot of focus on environmental issues and not as much on labor issues.

Even where there's an effort to do things in partnership, there is really -- there needs to be more effort made to really try to trace these supply chains, figure out better mechanisms so that they can actually know what's going on and then also to press those multi-stakeholder initiatives who are saying that they want to look at labor issues to really focus more of their auditing on those labor issues so that they can really try to do the best they can. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

REP. SMITH: Thank you.

Mr. Bales, maybe you want to answer this. As we know, no woman or girl in the mining zones is free to refuse sex to the armed men who control the mines. If there's a problem with a miner for example, his wife or daughter could be forced to have sex with a military leader and may be taken into sexual slavery. What attempts have been made to target this specific form of slavery? What would you suggest are the most helpful approaches? And obviously probably it is the largest deployment of U.N. peacekeepers are in DR Congo. Is this sufficiently a part of their mandate to protect women against sexual violence, particularly in the mining area?

MR. BALES: This is indeed the largest deployment of UN peacekeepers in the world and it's certainly part of the training and mandate of the -- of peacekeeping forces. However, from my own experience those peacekeeping forces are for the most part sort of in Fort Apache. They're in small communities, they are boundary surrounded. It's very difficult given their defensive and protective role to carry out the kind of operations that would take them into places like the BCA mine that you just described which as far as I know has only rarely been even visited by a UN peacekeeper and when there has been they have been outmanned and outgunned by the rebel groups which control that mine.

It points to the earlier situation that we were talking about, the dichotomy between sex and labor trafficking and slavery because the fact is that the reality for any woman enslaved whether it is in a mine, a field, a factory or a brothel, there will be sexual assault. Sexual assault and rape are part of the slavery for women.

That's the way it's been for all of human history. And the situation there is one in which it operates where without any hope of redress to the rule of law and the chaos of that situation and the armed gangs which have basically carved up that part of -- (inaudible) -- like mafias, meaning that it's very difficult to reach in. The best response that we have worked to so far in our own organization is to begin to organize local communities to begin to take on that vigilance for themselves that they can never at this time rely upon from government and official sources.

REP. SMITH: Thank you.

Chai Ling, if you could, the act of petitioning and organizing on behalf -- this is your statement -- of missing children and that includes obviously those who have been trafficked is not considered a legal activity in China. Rather than helping parents find their sons and daughters, the government has been cracking down on these volunteers and detaining or imprisoning them. Could you expand on the Chinese government's response? Is this something that the police have been involved in, the trafficking perhaps of these children?

We know and a member of IJM frequently testified here and said that there is an Achilles heel in all of our trafficking efforts, it's often the police particularly at the local level who received large sums of money or they are able to exploit the victims themselves. And I'm wondering, you know, why if a parent is looking for his or her child who had been sold into slavery that they get penalized and they end up doing time; perhaps if you could speak to that?

MS. LING: Yes, the pictures in the PowerPoint, those are pictures of volunteers and victim families who are looking for their children. They were detained when they went to Beijing to protest and to petition the government to pay attention to this issue to looking for assistance. They were put in detention for over 20 hours, for ever in Putian City within the Fujian province.

The reason why we believe why there's such a massive amount of child bride trafficking where for over past 30 years there were no police force or action has been taking place for government to prevent this kind of massive proliferation of child bride trafficking, we believe that might be a result of corruption between government officials, family planning committee, even family planning committee members that they themselves are purchasing child bride as well and together with the local police force and the traffickers as well.

REP. SMITH: In your opinion, is there a sufficient understanding and appreciation of what the one-child per couple has done among international policymakers, national and international like the United Nations, the Human Rights Council, for example? I mean, it was 10 years ago that the U.S. Department of State's Human Rights report said that there may be as many as a 100 million missing girls in China attributable to the one-child per couple policy or largely attributable to it. And that's 10 years ago and the situation apparently has only gotten worse.

MS. LING: Yes, I personally was shocked to learn how pervasive the one-child policy has been and I used to believe that I was, you know, human rights expert for China. And so that -- that goes -- until I came to your December 2009 hearing on China's one-child policy. And I was -- my eyes was woken up and I realized, you know, this is the Tiananmen massacre taking place every single day, over 35,000 children are forcefully and coercively being eliminated. Many of them are girls.

And now we see the clear impact of the one-child policy because one-child policy led to many other -- 400 million children killed in the past 30 years and contribute over 37 single -- 37 million single man that as a result of the gendercide. And these 37 additional single men in China right now became the biggest driver of sex trafficking and crimes in China and potentially around the world.

REP. SMITH: Thank you.

(Cross talk.)

MS. LING: And we do -- I do believe that this is such a urgent matter that all policymakers, leaders from, you know, President Obama and the White House and the leaders of both parties from the U.S. Congress and the leaders from the United Nations really need to rise up to take immediate, urgent action to call for the leaders of China to end the one-child policy. In January 1, President Hu Jintao visited United States, and he was challenged by Speaker Boehner and Chairwoman (Ros-Lehtinen ?) on the one-child policy.

And he has stated that there's no forced abortion in China, and most recently with China's census study, China has clearly become old before it's getting rich, this whole one-child policy is creating massive social crimes, instability within China, which will impact the world for sure. And that he -- so President Hu continued to maintain that one-child policy will not end for a very long period.

And so it is really upon us, the leaders of the world, to end this crime, both try to end the child trafficking, and trafficking in China, period, and also end the source of all evil that is one-child policy right now.

REP. SMITH: Thank you. Gentleman.

REP. PAYNE: Thank you very much. Certainly appreciate the testimony that I've reviewed and the answer to questions raised by the chairman. The whole question in certain countries primarily, I guess you, Ms. Rivard, there -- I think airlines do know of where -- I mean, the world knows where sex trafficking really goes on and of course it's difficult to just try to take up one person at a time to apprehend or arrest. I mean, it's important because every child is important.

But the problem is so big that I wonder if you feel, your opinion that these countries simply look the other way, and do you -- which we know they do, but do you see any improvement today as say opposed 20 years ago or 15, 20, 10 years ago of destinations for sex exploitation where tourists go to the destinations? People know about Indonesia, for example. I understand that you've been in some of the Canary Islands. As quietly as it's kept, it's a big sex trafficking there. As a matter of fact it was only in the last maybe 5 to 10 years that Dominican Republic started to advertise its beaches. I mean, it has as much beach beautiful beaches as any other of the Caribbean Islands but it wasn't until recently that they built hotels on beaches.

Which meant that all of the trafficking -- I mean all of the tourism by and large say to the Dominican Republic was much of it had to do with now there was gambling but also the prostitution. So I guess my question is do you see any more, in your opinion, commitment on the part of governments like in the DR or Indonesia or places where it's just known -- any more commitment on their part to try to combat it or do they accept it as a necessary evil for their national economy?

MS. RIVARD: Well, I do think that for example Ms. Fernandez in Dominican Republic cases, I laud her leadership, as a Tier 2 country to try to take some action on human trafficking. I think the big critical issue here is public awareness. I used to work those flights, New York-Dominican Republic, and see those girls on those flights and noticed that they were very provocatively dressed, had no idea really about the issue of human trafficking until the last year.

Now, they're calling Atlanta the new Thailand. They're bringing in little Thai girls and putting up in hotels in Atlanta and men can go to and visit, have an exotic experience with a Thai girl and be home with their families for dinner that night. I know that I've become a lot more aware in the last year-and-a-half to two years. And I think it's necessary that we who have -- are becoming alert to the severity and the atrocity of this problem on the planet help spread public awareness. And we need to do that to the airlines, we need to do it to the countries, the airports and the general public.

REP. PAYNE: Thank you, and I really commend you for the initiative that you took in creating this organization.

The question of exploitation in minerals, you know, we passed the Conflict Minerals bill, part of the Frank Wall Street Reform Act Section 1502, which I'm proud to be a cosponsor of and it's currently in the implementation process. The SEC has proposed that public companies disclose if and how they are involved in the manufacture, mining or final end of use of conflict minerals. Do you think that this legislation will be strictly enforced?

I guess Mr. Bales or Mr. Abramowitz would, as you know when we started many years ago on the conflict diamond resolution people said, Congressman Payne, come on you -- you're not going to be able -- how are you going to identify diamonds and you know and so forth. And so many of us, Mr. Rangel, Ms. McDermott and others got involved in the conflict diamond law which has had an impact, a good impact on the monitoring of and the elimination of some of the conflict diamonds. So I wonder what you think about the conflict minerals bill and whether you think that how could we work towards making it meaningful.

MR. BALES: Well, we very much welcome that bill and we're very supportive of it and I think help to put some of those provisions -- think through some of those provisions. I think it's a first step and I'll point to two things.

First is the -- as I said in my testimony about the recent passage of the transparency law in California that covers all businesses over a certain size, requiring them to look and explain precisely how slave labor might be fitting in to their products that they sell. Now, that doesn't have any penalties to it. It simply requires that they put something on their websites and in their materials that explain how they're going to understand that and trace it, or to say at this moment that we're not doing anything about it, which of course then holds them up to real question about the fact whether they actually care about whether there is slavery in their products.

The point here is that moving large-scale retailers especially, and we've been in a series of talks with Walmart about how best to address the tracing of their supply chains and it's very much going to include conflict in slave minerals from the Congo as well.

We're -- we've recommended that along with the ATEST coalition that that considered to be brought into the TVPA reauthorization and we think that would be a great second step, one that allows the business community to act without any kind of rough stuff as it were from -- on the legal side but gets people moving in the right direction.

The second part is simply that I was just in Brazil and I was actually looking at cassiterite mines run by artisanal miners, cassiterite being one of the key conflict and slave minerals from the DRC. But in Brazil, in the Amazon, cassiterite mines run openly with cooperative well-paid miners who are very happy.

It's about both looking on the right side and on the wrong side, and helping to better identify those minerals that we're happy to use and making sure they get a premium to flow into the global supply chain. And as we begin to squeeze down and cut of those that we're very concerned about while not harming the people at the bottom of that artisanal scale even when it exists in a place like the Congo.

MR. ABRAMOWITZ: Mr. Payne, just very briefly I don't have very much to add to Mr. Bales said but a couple of points.

I think there is concern in the State Department about this provision in particular because of the concerns that Mr. Bales was just referring to that this could cause a number of companies to really try to figure out ways to stop purchasing from the DRC because they can't guarantee that the minerals that their purchasing are not coming from these mines.

There's a number of new ideas that are being put forward. The one that Mr. Bales just presented about the idea of identifying good mines where that you could focus business activity is one of them and in fact there is a dialogue that's going on between the NGO community that Free the Slaves is participating in to look at. And one of the issues is the mapping that was also required by the statutory to actually map what's going on because I think that there is a factual deficit that is making it more difficult.

Finally, just one last point which is I think that the many cases when you hear about reluctance by companies there are number of different reasons and one is that people never know when they're going to do enough. You know, when is it that they can say, yes, these are the measures that I've taken in place and people aren't going to be asking me or criticizing me for doing more.

And in that vein we have a number of interesting developments. The Ag bill that was passed a couple of years ago created a consultative group that listed out different voluntary practices for how you can guarantee that you are not importing slave-made food into the United States.

Department of Labor is currently reviewing a set of standards for a variety of different sectors which once it's put out -- it's been in the Department of Labor for a couple of years now -- could give guidelines to companies, say, hey, here's a touchstone for us. And I think it is incumbent on us to try to figure out what some of those realistic standards would be to help those companies really implement things that could have a real impact.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to say that ATEST -- I have a sheet of various different proposals from ATEST that's just on a two-page sheet. I would ask that that be included in the record if you would.

REP. SMITH: No objection.

MR. ABRAMOWITZ: Thank you, Mr. Payne.

REP. PAYNE: Okay. Well, thank you. I do think that that's a good idea that there could attempt -- be an attempt to identify legitimate companies. I have had a number of meetings with President Kabila in the DRC. And the DRC itself does not benefit from these illegal operations and therefore and my conversation with him, he would be looking for help in order to control these companies.

Now, it's very difficult because of the vastness and the U.N.'s mandate may not cover illegal mining. And so it's a pretty difficult situation to handle, but I do think that we should perhaps have more conversation because they would know the legitimate companies as opposed to the illegitimate ones.

And even much of the -- it's alleged that some of the mining that is done by Rwandans in the DRC is not officially mandated by the government. It's these former, a matter of fact as you know the name of the group that went to Congo after the genocide and actually aligned themselves in the old days with the government of the Congo to -- in the wars that occurred that Interyhamwe and X FAR who -- when they are -- but also some ethnic Rwandese that still are in that area.

So it is a complex area to sort out, but I do think that if we do concentrate we might be able to come up with some better results, and it's going to be -- also I might ask you to comment on.

I'm not -- I don't know if you're totally familiar with the section 307 of the Tariff Act of 1930 which actually was passed, but it said that if there is a consumption demand by the U.S., if it's something that, you know, the businesses just got to have it that the restrictions don't apply, which is a big loophole. And I'm wondering if our Conflict Resolution Act will supersede this law or whether we need to take another look at this, I think things have changed since 1930, whether we might look at trying to amend that consumption demand section of the Tariff Act of 1930.

MR. : Well, Mr. Bales mentioned that in his testimony. Let me just say very briefly that that provision was originally designed to try to keep products out that were created with cheap labor that the U.S. couldn't compete with. So it was actually sort of an infant industries protection provision and therefore there was this exception were it said if the companies in the United States needed that particular commodity then it could be brought in without the exception. And in fact as Mr. Bales indicated that is a proposal that's in the ATEST proposals.

It actually was in a Customs Enforcement and Trade Reauthorization bill that was passed out of the finance committee last Congress that Senator Grassley and the chairman of the committee worked together on but it did not move forward at the end of the last Congress. So there is discussion actually going in on the Senate whether there should be some changes to that. And I think -- I don't know Mr. Bales, do you want to add anything else?

REP. PAYNE: Thank you. Also as we know the ILO in Geneva tend to take on these questions and try to tackle some of these issues, are they in your opinion funded enough or how could we cooperate more with the ILO or how can we make it more effective since it's an organization been in existence for as long as the U.N. has?

Is it strong enough? Does it need more beefing up? Do we participate in the ILO? You know there are many international organizations we have not actively competed and how do we stand with the ILO I mean the International Labor Organization.

MR. : We in fact participate well in the ILO and are particularly well thought of there because of the long term support of things like the IPEC program, the , which has been based on U.S. government funding for many years now since the Clinton administration.

But when you ask what could it do better or how could we help it to do better, one of the -- there's actually a fundamental problem in the organization of the ILO which arises from the fact that it was established in 1919. It was established to represent labor bodies, employer bodies and governments.

So it has a tripartite system representing people who should absolutely be there, employers, labor unions and governments, but which fails now to take on the fourth major player on the global stage which are the non-governmental civil society organizations. And it's a curious fact that a great deal of the ILO publications that come from that tripartite system are actually written for them and produced by non-governmental organizations which are not allowed to have an official role within the ILO.

I've spoken with the ILO leadership about this, but it would be interesting if our government were to say as it's major funder we'd like you to consider including everyone at the table within the ILO. The other side of that is just there is a bang for buck question. The U.N. and ILO salary levels are pretty significant compared to say those of civil society and you have to make some decisions about how those salary levels might balance up to what's being provided.

I will point to a number of places where the ILO has done brilliant work and I'm looking -- thinking especially of Brazil at the moment and the fact that on the 20th of this month there will be a new extension of the Brazil pact for businesses which is a way to remove slave labor from the product chain. That will be launched here in Washington for the North America on the 20th of this month sponsored by the ILO. That's fantastic work. But as you can see it's like for all of us it's a mixed bag.

MR. : Mr. Payne, if I can just say briefly that I think you have to look at what instruments can be used for what purposes at what time in the best way.

So for example just last week the ILO's committee that is looking at a number of different problems on the labor side concluded a convention that for the first time will regulate domestic work. As you may know, there has been a tradition that individuals in the household, people who are providing children child care services or household services are not considered workers because it's a private matter with in the household.

And this has led to a great deal of exploitation all around the world and under the auspices of the ILO they recently concluded this convention that will for the first time institute reforms that if adopted will make that a much more difficult abuse to carry out. Is this something that the United States will become a party to? It's unclear.

There's a lot of state law issues that are involved. It gets very complex when you are talking about some of these types of issues. But the United States is very involved in negotiating the convention and had a lot of expertise and created a framework which -- helped create a framework which will perhaps allow our laws to come into harmony and bring in best practices that we have as well as others.

There are also some programs that they do that only the ILO can do. There are certain countries that are concerned about various bilateral programs in various areas and so only they can bring a multilateral effort. But I think that -- I agree with Mr. Bales you have to sort of look at each individual program and figure out where it is you that you can invest and get the biggest bang for the buck. Thanks.

REP. PAYNE: This is my last question or two in regard again and I keep going to ILO. I worked on the docks of New York for four years when I was in college so that's why I guess I slip up. However -- and always have been concerned about maritime issues.

One of the other inequities of course dealing with ILO and what they try to deal with and is something that has gone on for decades and decades and that's the so-called flags of convenience. As you know, there are three or four countries that certify their ships are seaworthy.

Once again an exploitation of workers; I think the shipping industry is probably one of the biggest exploitation of workers whether it's cruise ships, whether it's companies import-export and the flags of convenience of course allow countries like Liberia, Panama, America, (Carolinas ?) are some countries that will certify that a ship is seaworthy and therefore flags -- therefore is covered under the flags of convenience. And there was a great -- I'd served on a world refugee committee in Geneva '69 to '81. And during that time the -- a ship actually broke in half because it was -- sunk because of it was not seaworthy but it was approved under flags of convenience, approved in one of these countries that actually certifies that this ship is seaworthy and that the conditions are so forth.

And that's something no one really wants to deal with and it's something I think we should certainly still take a look at it. Interestingly enough, these countries -- companies are run by former U.S. Naval officers; it has been that way for the last 50 years. So it's really a sham which nobody deals with.

So I just raise a -- I am going to ask a -- because we are serving not a part of it but I see this too as being a part of exploitation of labor that countries are looking the other way and not dealing with the inhumane conditions of workers.

As a matter of fact, that goes way back to the Titanic, you know, when they looked at bodies to recover after the Titanic situation and crash, they would actually look at the fingernails of people to see if there was oil or grease under it or their dress when they decided which bodies to recover. Once again the workers were just left and they took the wealthy people that are passengers and so forth. So we've had for many, many decades in that industry a inequities of once again abuse, taking advantage of workers who are weak.

I just have one last question, Ms. Cundy, in regard to the -- and I really commend your company and what you do. There is no question that probably some of the most -- we know that women are abused throughout the world. Even in the U.S. they still only make I think it's up to $0.72 on a dollar compared to men. When I came to Congress, it was only $0.59, so we're moving up but a little too slow.

It should be equal pay for sexes but the industry certainly, as we could just see here right in New York, I mean, we don't have to go to Indonesia, you know, to see the inequities or the pressure that domestics, as we could see California, the governor there, and with the problem at the hotel in New York with the former president of the World Bank.

So it's probably not a secret in the industry that the people who work in cleaning, the maids and so forth probably are subjected to this, if it happens, you know, if it would happen though, you can imagine how it happens around the world. And is there -- do you think that there could be a increased focus on even education so that these poor, you know, vulnerable women are protected, many of them coming from the immigrant people in countries, people that fear for their jobs. They many times are accused by the management if a customer approaches and abuses them and they're afraid to now report it because in many times then they become the victim and may be terminated from employment.

Is there anything that you all are doing, maybe even starting here in the U.S. in addition to what you've been doing traditionally?

MS. CUNDY: Well, we did sign the U.N. Global Compact which of course commits us to ensuring that we have in place policies that respect human rights and that is an international document. So I would say that women are at risk around the world in any circumstance in which they find themselves vulnerable. I think that by training our hotel employees, men and women alike about this particular issue, it empowers them to a certain degree that they feel more confident that their company would not retaliate should they themselves run into an uncomfortable experience.

REP. PAYNE: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

MR. BALES: Mr. Payne, if I may.

REP. PAYNE: Yes.

MR. BALES: I was very pleased that you raised that issue about flags of convenience because we've been noticing a very significant increase in reports of slavery on ships, particularly on fishing vessels and particularly in the Pacific and South East Asian region, Russian ships in particular but the number of reports continue to increase. It also seems to parallel what I think we're all aware of is that increase in piracy in the world's oceans.

And its -- I agree with you, there's a kind of shocking historical parallel here that we would be talking at the beginning of the 21st century about what are the key issues of the beginning of the 19th century which was about how do we deal with ships that are carrying slaves. Now it's not slave trade anymore, but its enslaved ship workers whose treatment is horrific and we've had reports of simply the murder of workers on shipboard and of course their bodies are very easy to dispose off at sea.

It raises some very interesting questions I think especially for the United States government in that we have, from the very beginning of our republic, a series of Supreme Court rulings that made it possible for ships that seem to have been carrying slaves to be confiscated by the government based on, according to the Supreme Court ruling, circumstantial evidence of that, not direct evidence. As well as the fact that we and particularly the British Navy took part in antislavery worker patrols looking for such ships that had slaves on board.

There's a question about whether our existing if long neglected legal mandates in that direction actually would expect us to take on again the responsibility of dealing with people who are in slavery onboard ships out at sea outside of our jurisdiction. I'd point you to the work of Tobias Wolff, a professor at the Law School at Stanford, who has published on particularly that issue and have suggested probably we should be considering what our responsibilities are in that way. Thanks.

REP. PAYNE: As you actually may know the abolition of transatlantic slavery was pushed, of course, originally by Mr. Wilberforce in Great Britain and the U.S. finally also approved the abolition although slavery continued but there was a law that said that if they were taken at high sea they can be returned and usually went to Sierra Leone. That's where they called Freetown as the capital of Sierra Leone long before Liberia became a place for ex-enslaved people.

I think that it is something -- I ironically just happened to spend several days in Connecticut a few days ago where they were commemorating Harriet Beecher Stowe's book on Uncle Tom's Cabin which exposed slavery in the United States and Lincoln actually gave her credit for actually bringing this issue. It was a bestseller, as a matter of fact, that year. And the Amistad, I think which was the case that I think John Quincy Adams came out of retirement as a former President to take the case of these Caribbean enslaved people who overtook the Amistad and won that case. I think it's the first case in American history that went towards people who had been in bondage.

So this is an area that I have had a long interest in and certainly something that we're going to try to continue. There are many, many problems in the world and we can't deal with them all, but I think this is one that's been around for a long time. And like you said, with the increase in piracy not only in the area of the Somali region, but in other parts of the world its happening, its increasingly quietly.

And the other problem with this is that in many instances the health of the workers are not checked out and diseases can be -- you've got products and persons who work in these substandard conditions certainly, you know, are having a hard time getting health care in the U.S., you know, for everyone. So you can imagine some people working in the bows of a ship from Malaysia or Singapore or somewhere in Africa on these ships working.

So there are tremendous potential for catastrophic problems that can engulf us in this nation and in the world. So it's something I think we need to pay a little bit more attention. Of course as we know resources are becoming more and more scarce for everything, so it's a difficult time to try to start a new initiative that's for sure as we're going to be trying to hold on to what we have already which is going to be diminished. So -- but these are just issues I think that will come up in the future and I appreciate all of you for what you do to assist us in public policy that give us good ideas to try to put it into legislation and move forward.

Thank you very much.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

REP. SMITH: Thank you, Mr. Payne.

Let me just conclude with a couple of very quick questions and note that without objection a submission for the record from the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops and testimony from Julia Ormond previously given here at the Helsinki Commission will also be made a part of the record with from her group ASSET.

Let me just ask first to Mr. Kowalczyk, 6.2 million signatures, 50 countries, how do you choose what it is in each respective country that you will campaign on? Does TIP Report help? And let me ask all the questions and then please, all of you answer.

Secondly to Ms. Rivard, you pointed out that 30 young girls were headed from Zurich to Chicago on Swissair. Has Swissair shown an interest now in your training? You also mentioned that TSA attended the airline ambassadors training at Dallas, Fort Worth around the Super Bowl of last year. Does TSA normally get training or is that something that needs to be institutionalized.

Let me ask perhaps Mr. Bales and Mr. Abramowitz, if you would, S.B.657, the California Transparency in Supply Chains Act of 2010 obviously covers about, according to testimony we received, about 80 percent of the corporations will that affect, the corporations that are doing business or as part of their supply chain coming out of the Congo. What is the value added of a federal law? Is it that they report to the SEC? Do they get the other 20 percent? Is it that it is a federal law? If you could speak to that.

And finally, Mr. Abramowitz, you might want to speak of this and this is more a generic question but Nancy Ely-Raphel, John Miller, Mark Lagon, Luis CdeBaca, all ambassadors and the fourth person obviously was the director, all had an upward fight with other people in the State Department who simply did not want to recognize trafficking as a severe problem. There's always this internal warfare that goes on within state as you know. How do we get to the point where at least for the first stage the naming of the countries is done based absolutely on the record of those country's performances and whether or not part II, meting out punishments, that is to say penalties, is that might be more of a political process based on what we think we might be able to achieve.

But I know, you know, regardless of the administrations, Bush administration, Clinton, although he left before it was implemented, Obama, his administration, there is always this tension between the vested interests of people who think that state graft requires that human rights get subordinated to an asterisk on page 4. And I'm deeply concerned about that. It seems like we're always in this fight to get countries added to tier 3 that ought to be on tier 3. You are very much a part of the effort to get the parking lot of being on the watchlist two years or a year lowered. We have this problem. How do we fix it, if you have any thought along those lines?

And one last question, Ms. Cundy, the concierges often are asked -- in your video, it's very clear that somebody who's being asked a question and he immediately saw that this was the problem, what kind of training do they get because very often they're asked in a hotel where can we go for church, where can we go for entertainment, best restaurants and certainly, you know, their needs there's an understanding by the concierge where the traffickers and the exploiters are? What kind of training do they get to ensure that they're not willingly or unwillingly being complicit in trafficking?

MR. KOWALCZYK: It's a lot of questions and I'll tackle the first one which is to do with the fact that it is a worldwide issue and the needs around the world are different. The Body Shop's ambition was not to become an expert in the subject but to provide a platform to allow people around the world to have a common platform and a voice.

For expertise, we relied on our partnership with ECPAT as subject matter expert as it related to finding and helping to create action agenda items that were relevant for each country for the stage of development of where that country was. So there are two or three things that I would point to.

One of them is that while the topic is difficult no matter what country you bring it to, the response has been universally supportive from both our customer's point of view and our associates' point of view which is terrific. Secondly, ECPAT on a worldwide basis but it's not the worldwide part of it, it's the local connection points and the number of affiliates that they're interacting with that lay out the objectives by country that have made a difference.

We committed at the beginning of the campaign that we would make these objectives measurable and trackable, and so we created a scorecard -- sorry, we didn't, ECPAT did in conjunction with support from The Body Shop and the scorecard is something that allows us to be able to track to make sure that progress, in fact, is being made. And third and finally, we also committed that a global report would be created in order to be able to, first of all, raise awareness and to allow for involvement, secondly, to show that progress can happen and it doesn't happen at the same pace in every part of the world but progress is progress.

MS. RIVARD: Yes, and I wanted to point out that there is a need for coordination among law enforcement and among airlines and different sections of airlines. At our training, I didn't specifically ask the TSA employee whether they receive human trafficking training but they were very anxious to do that and to coordinate with the airport coordinator, with the SOC, Special Operations Command at American Airlines. The pilot said they didn't receive any training like this and lots of times if a flight attendant reported something, they wouldn't take it seriously.

And sometimes they said when they called in a problem that SOC didn't take it and let's say they called for a medical emergency and a wheelchair showed up. There is a need for a coordinated response. I know some meetings were started called Blue Lightning with Homeland Security, TSA, FBI, ICE, the airlines where we come up and that's what I'm asking for, congressional review of our training, where we come up with a coordinated unified response among the issues. The other thing is if there could be some kind of economic incentive for the airlines to sign ECPAT because right now, I mean, there are a lot of people being trafficked and somebody is paying for those tickets. So bottom line the airlines are making money and maybe they don't want to disrupt that or by taking a public stand make themselves a target of the cartels.

If something's legislated, perhaps this would be a protection for them and certainly creating an economic incentive for them to go in the right direction.

MR. BALES: I'm going to add a tiny bit to say that when we conducted a piece of research for the National Institute of Justice on trafficking in the United States, one of the top needs we found was training across the board. We spoke to border patrol agents who ask us where can we get training, border patrol agents and so I just strongly say TSA, border patrol, I think all Peace Corps volunteers should have antitrafficking anti-slavery training because they're going to be in places where they can recognize it.

And, you know, I'll just say that we're even in talks with the Church of Latter-day Saints to have trafficking training for all the young people that they send out as missionaries around the world. We're looking for anyone who is going door to door and talking to them about what kind of training we can see that would be affective.

Now in terms of the effectiveness of -- or the value added of a federal law patterned on that California law, I think there's two parts to it. Obviously the simple part is that it would cover those companies that are not operating in California. That goes without saying. But I think the key here is really about creating a culture, creating an atmosphere in the United States in which corporations and consumers are working together and thinking through what they might do to ensure that they're not consuming slave-made goods.

At the moment, we have something of a strange notion of a moral watershed on the supply chain. And most consumers believe that there's some kind of moral watershed that separates them from the corporations and the wholesalers and the suppliers all the way back that somehow being a consumer is a pure act but every step before it is somehow good to be tainted.

But the fact is that there is a moral watershed, but it actually exists with the slave holder and the slave master. Those criminals are guilty of enslavement. The people who come after, the suppliers, the transporters, the wholesalers, the retailers, the consumers aren't guilty but they are all responsible and it's about creating that atmosphere and culture of responsibility that we think that that kind of transparency law is a first step to build that culture of responsibility.

MR. ABRAMOWITZ: Mr. Chairman, just adding to that before I turn to your second question to us, I think that there is also a difference having this kind of a transparency provision at the federal level. First of all, there is a role that the SEC can play that in terms of someone who can look at this issue, not that they'll be spending a huge amount of resources, but they can have some impact on looking at the various different disclosures that are made. Second of all, I think it's different if you trying -- one of the things that I think the TVPA was just marvelous at is that they created a standard by which other countries were forced to look at and see that they needed to improve their own internal work on that particular issues that you so masterly brought through Congress.

So if we have a California state law, it's one thing. If we have a U.S. federal law, it's the demonstration effect. It's the ability to go to other countries and say you need to be regulating your companies which will force them to be looking at the supply chains within their own countries which frankly, as we've been discussing all afternoon, is really where a lot of these significant issues come about.

I think that you raised a very delicate issue in terms of the State Department and how we look at it. As I indicated in my testimony, you know, we need to improve the overall unity of effort within the State Department. The Trafficking of Persons office has done, I think, a marvelous job throughout its time and that's in part due to some of the very strong leadership that the officers had over the course of its existence.

But we need greater effort from both the regional bureaus that are responsible for the bilateral relations as well as the embassies and the ambassadors themselves. So a couple of points. First, I do think we have to think about this in historical perspective. I was not here at this time, I think you were a little bit closer to it but when the human rights and democracy bureau was first created under the Carter administration, as I understand it, it was very, very difficult. They had a long time where they were completely pushed aside and really had no strong role in the policy formulation process.

People can question how much progress they've made but I think they're very much in the mainstream of the State Department and have very important roles, whether it's in international negotiations, dealing with a variety of different issues that, you know, are difficult to work on. So I think that even though ten years is a decade, it's still -- I think the life of this office within the institution is short. We need to continue to have strong leadership, continue to sustain it, continue to provide the resources.

Second, I think that we need to help generate more data. One of the proposals that I didn't discuss, but it is in my testimony is about giving GTIP the ability to do certain targeted research in certain places. If there is data that is irrefutable, it makes it more difficult for the political lens to be put on to issues. So data which, of course, is a huge struggle in this area as several different members of the panel have referred to today is something that we need to continue to working on including in our own country.

Third, in terms of trying to look at how we can improve the State Department and looking at the whole effort, one hopes that there will be -- continue to be senior leadership at the department and that questions regarding human trafficking are raised as confirmation processes move forward. I'm in a conversation with ATEST members to try to come up with a battery of questions that we can try to provide to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee as a way of making sure that they understand that for every ambassador that there is going to be some accountability with respect to the Senate and the members of the Senate.

And I think that extends here too. You know, schedules are very challenging here, but when there are assistant secretaries of state from the regional bureaus who come before the committee, I think you or others who are interested in this issue, raising this issue not only in questions for the record but actually orally raising these kinds of issues can indicate that this is an issue that's not going away, that they have to deal with this issue in order to try to succeed in their positions. Look, I think that people in the state department are generally people of goodwill. They all believe that these abuses are heinous.

It's when they try to look at these issues in this broader perspective but honestly the very wide range of issues and it becomes difficult for them to say why should we be singling this out as an issue that we should have sanctions on this as opposed to all the other complicated issues that I have to deal with everyday. But we need to change that calculus, perhaps use some other ways that I just described. Thanks.

MS. CUNDY: Mr. Chairman, if a guest asks a concierge for some kind of sexual services which are illicit, they're instructed to not provide recommendations. If a guest asks for some other kind of entertainment in a similar vein which is legal, they might be instructed to go to a certain club or discos, that type of a thing. But I don't know, I guess it was Mr. Bales who mentioned the realistic standards in the supply chain. It's just hard to know whether or not that any of these establishments the workers are there voluntarily or if they're coerced or victims of trafficking.

REP. SMITH: Thank you. One final question and that is to Chai Ling and that would be it is my experience, rightly or wrongly, that when it comes to China very often human rights are low on the totem pole, as they say.

MS. LING: Yeah.

REP. SMITH: Right before the Olympics, Frank Wolf and I traveled to China and we brought a list of 732 political prisoners, we brought issues related to trafficking. The person, the woman who was handling trafficking for the embassy was outstanding, crackerjack, knew what she was talking about. We brought up other issues of Internet problems, the censorship issue, the Dalai Lama or the religious freedom issues. We tried to meet with house-church people who denied it. They are all arrested except for one, it was their call that they wanted to meet with us. The point was we met with the U.S. ambassador, he is a very noble person, was more concerned it seemed, as to what venue he was going to be attending whether it be track and field or some other than the human rights, the whole basket of issues including human trafficking.

Fast forward to right now, we have just picked or the U.S. administration has picked a new ambassador who is very, very focused on trade, an accomplished man when it comes to commerce, having headed up commerce. Do you have concerns that our embassy is not responsive to the one-child issue in general and its impact on trafficking? Luis CdeBaca, I believe, gets it and is very concerned about that issue and sees the nexus with one-child policy and its impact, consequentially, on trafficking victims and it's only going to get worse. But are you convinced that the new ambassador being deployed gets it because the past has been regardless of administration less than stellar at least from my point of view and past is often prologue.

MS. LING: Well, thank you, Chairman Smith. I really appreciate the opportunity to just focus the spotlight on China again that in the past China's human rights abuses has been left mostly at the level of lip services. Very little action has been taken and the most recent article in Newsweek link a nation with a man without woman and really reveal the serious implication of a country with such a massive quantity of young men who are restless and potentially can lead to very aggressive military expansion policy. And history has proven from those scholars and experts that for countries like Germany and Japan when they have a male youth bulge, they tend to lead to international war.

And so that's the situation we're really facing with China. As we start making this argument connecting the current massive human right abuses under one-child policy with the threat to our future, our peace both to the United States and to also the world at large, we have seen renewed interest from both parties, Congressional leaders. And I just met with Ambassador Rivard before I came to the hearing. She's also expressed interest to form bipartisan coalition to really address this issue and she expressed that if we get together we could potentially stop this once for all. So I'm excited with the cautious optimism. That's why I'm really -- I want to thank you for your hearing and your commitment and your three decades long leadership on this issue.

You've been doing this consistently even though some time you're alone. And -- but you have never gave up, so I think you for your leadership.

Can I add one more thing with China's one child policy leading to the trafficking to the United States? If I may, we have cases which have not been resolved that Chinese women under the one-child policy to escape from that they want to come to the United States to have a chance to give birth to a son, or you know, to -- but they end up being trafficked into this country and they're currently -- their traffic route were going through Mexico and they were being -- typically they were raped repeatedly and they eventually were trafficked in through buses and then to New York and now we don't exactly know their location.

We have tried and so they are once they arrived in New York they're immediately harassed to say they had to pay up to $90,000 for the trafficking fee and -- but they didn't have the money and so they had to commit to service, otherwise the rape picture will be sent to their home and family so they'll be shamed forever in their village. And so they're coerced into agreeing to a labor contract, but they're currently working in Chinese restaurants and for the past year they were only paid for $10,000 when they worked 6, 7 days a week and 16 hours a day.

And so when I -- when we shared this information with FBI, local police enforcement, due to various definition what is trafficking and whether they're qualified for re-visa issue and who's -- because these women were so afraid to be deported back to China they were not able to tell us exactly where the location is and so the FBI and law enforcement could not determine whose -- authority they can go after to try to get these women, give them help.

So I urge you take -- and other congressional leaders and Congressman Payne, to maybe potentially looking into some kind of amnesty or -- to grant to these women a chance that they can be protected while they step forward to reveal what's really going on and the FBI officer would require them to come to testify in public and again these women are terrified. They don't want to step forward because they know once they do that some of their family members in China will be dead. And it happened before, and so I like to see some kind of protection to be given to these women so they can at least step forward to talk about the severity of these international trafficking ring.

Now the issue is not just the China's gangsters while they're connecting with gangsters in Mexico and to this country. So we don't know how big a problem we're dealing with right now but certain effort and tension international collaboration need to take place to provide these victims some chance to speak out of the truth.

REP. SMITH: Thank you. They can get protection under our current law but you know if you can share all of that very specific information --

MS. LING: Yeah.

REP. SMITH: -- they could also get asylum and frankly if they are of some help to law enforcement, you know, we would be appreciative but we will follow up on that with you.

MS. LING: Okay.

REP. SMITH: I would like -- is there anything further our panelists like to add or Mr. Payne?

REP. PAYNE: Just on that also in testifying they can -- I think arrangements could be made that they could testify without their identity being known. There are international cases and the -- with the genocide in Rwanda where the witness is protected from knowing who it is.

Secondly, I just have a quick question; if the government of China realizes what is happening and with the growing number of the change between male and female there can certainly be a real problem on your hands with young men who are restless, one, they turn to gambling, two, they turn to drinking. After they are drunk and they've lost their money then they turn to fighting. And so this can be a growing security problem for the PRC.

I wonder if you think that if we all know it and they all know it and if they project these -- the anomaly that will continue to grow, do you think that they would finally decide that perhaps this policy of encouraging and much of it, I guess, is inferred a person would like to have a boy. I mean, it's all around the world, believe it or not, even in the United States, you know, and our friends say it's a boy, you know. I say, well, what would you say if it was a girl? Be as enthusiastic. So we know that that is just what happens everywhere. But if it starts to become a real problem they can't put them all in the -- you can't have a military of 50 billion people. I mean, you've got to do something with these men.

So I wonder if they would start thinking about maybe amending only not because they've changed in the heart, but because it becomes a national security problem for them. What do you think? I mean, maybe too far in the future, but it has to be something that they know too and are grappling with, I'm sure.

MS. LING: Exactly. I think, Congressman Payne, I would thank you for your statement and your sense of urgency. That's what exactly the problem we're facing right now that even the federal government's family planning committee member, last October, had to show concern of this growing gender imbalance and their strategy and policy is they can go after these people who abort the baby girls very severely.

And so on one hand we applaud they're paying attention to this problem right now. So they're twofold; one is, you know, ending one-child policy as soon as possible, it's really the necessary step to basic ending the further growing gap of the gender imbalance, to end all this sex trafficking and massive potential social instability continue to grow larger. That's the first and foremost need to do or should be done.

The second front on the gender side part is combat China's or Asian's overall cultural, you know, some preferences. Yes, there's -- all culture there is some level of some preferences or male preferences, but to what extent the female side, the girl, or the woman will be sacrificed in exchange of getting that son under the one-child policy where only one child is allowed to survive is their whole practice, their whole culture being skewed into extreme led to massive killing of baby girls.

In June 1, we show another little clips of a documentary where in India there was a mother killed eight of her own baby girls and because she really wanted to have a son. So in China many of these killings are taking place in a very, you know, early stage when they detect it they're pregnant with a baby girl they abort the baby girl, or the mother after she was found she just gave birth to a baby girl she'll be immediately locked up, the baby girl will be grabbed out of her arm and to be disposed by the husband or the mother-in-laws.

And so -- and in that videotape you saw that that young couple who did not have birth permit give birth to a baby girl and when the baby girl was only 40-days-old and she's being forced to be sold. And so these are massive problems creating the issue we're dealing with right now is the crisis of what do we do with China's 37 million single men? What do we do with -- around the world it's 150 million, 140 million man excessive?

And so that is, you know, trafficking, it definitely is not going to be a problem going away overnight, but requires a level of urgency both from Congressional leaders and also from both the private sector and the NGOs. So I commended all of you to be here for your heroic, moral leadership and your amazing commitment to this effort.

REP. PAYNE: Thank you very much. And I think it's something that we need to deal with worldwide, the value of women. And you know, even in our country when you hear a descendent of say a former president, you know, it's usually the one that keeps the name of the male, Teddy Roosevelt, Franklin Delano Roosevelt they were kind of related.

When it tends to be a female, the -- many instances the name, you know, there could still be as many relatives of the former outstanding people in every country, but it seems like if you have that certainly that last name of this outstanding president or king or emperor, you know, that gets more attention like the Habsburg in Austria, you know, it's Habsburg, you know, that it's -- you see the man, but there has to be as many female Habsburgs, but you never see them highlighted. You don't even know who they are. So when somebody came and say I'm a Habsburg, you know, oh, great, but the men, you do know.

So it's a problem I guess a little bigger than the group of us here will be able to solve, but it is something that we need to, you know, hopefully to take hold in some international organizations and really raise the status of women just in general, shows how damaging -- the second class citizenship of women really has global impacts. Thank you Mr. Chairman.

REP. SMITH: Yeah, very much. I'd like to thank our very distinguished panel, the extraordinary panel of experts, your insights and wise counsel will help us. You've been very, very generous with your time today and this subcommittee is very appreciative of that and you've given us a number of actionable items for the reauthorization, which is imminent. So I do thank you especially for that and look forward to seeing you all again. Hearing is adjourned.

MS. LING: Thank you.

MS. : Thank you.

Singapore toughens stance on human trafficking prior to signing UN treaty

LENGTH: 894 words

Text of report by Singapore newspaper The Straits Times website on 11 June

[Report by Radha Basu from the "Prime News" section: "Singapore Toughens its Stance on Human Trafficking"]

Sex, Lies & Trafficking

In a marked departure from the past, Singapore is working towards signing a United Nations treaty to prevent human trafficking.

This could have an impact on the way in which foreigners -especially young girls and women who ply the sex trade -are dealt with by the authorities when they are caught.

Instead of being regarded as immigration offenders and deported, they could be treated as victims and allowed to remain in shelters here while their cases are investigated.

Human trafficking refers to obtaining or holding someone forcibly for sex or labour purposes.

Singapore is among a few countries yet to sign the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, which has been signed or ratified by nearly 150 parties.

A Ministry of Home Affairs (MHA) spokesman told The Straits Times that Singapore would sign the UN treaty when it was satisfied with 'domestic measures put in place to ensure adherence' to it. These could include changes in local laws.

The spokesman said that Singapore took a serious view of trafficking, and the problem could worsen.

'We are aware that as Singapore grows as a hub for travel, economic activity and tourism, the likelihood that we become an attractive destination for trafficking syndicates will increase,' she said.

To tackle the problem, the Government set up an inter-agency task force last November, co-chaired by the MHA and the Ministry of Manpower.

That came after the United States State Department, in its annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report last June, downgraded Singapore to a watchlist of countries which it said did not fully comply with minimum international standards to eliminate trafficking. This year's report is due soon.

As far back as 2004, the TIP report said that Singapore had a 'significant trafficking problem'.

The Singapore Government's oft-stated position has been that trafficking cases are rare here.

There have also been differences in defining what, exactly, constitutes trafficking.

Under UN and American law, any man, woman or child who is deceived or coerced into sex or labour is a victim of trafficking, regardless of whether he or she initially consented to the job.

Singapore's position earlier was that a foreigner who entered the country willingly to work illegally -as a sex worker, for example -was a party to 'human smuggling', and therefore an immigration offender.

But the UN's concern is that even those who are willingly smuggled in could end up victims of trafficking if they are exploited or forced to work against their will.

Asked if Singapore's position was different now, the MHA spokesman said that 'as long as a person claims to have been trafficked, she will be treated as a victim'.

The Straits Times understands that this means that rather than being deported -as foreign sex workers caught in raids usually are -a woman who claims she was trafficked could be housed in a shelter here, while the authorities investigate her case against her alleged traffickers.

The MHA spokesman said that even a foreigner who arrives willingly to be a sex worker could be treated as a trafficking victim rather than an offender, if she claims she was 'deceived, defrauded or held against her will' while here.

Such an approach falls within the definition of trafficking under the UN treaty and in fact has already been 'operationally adopted' by the police while classifying trafficking cases.

However, this has yet to make an impact in terms of bringing traffickers to book.

So far, only two of the 32 alleged sex trafficking cases investigated by the police in 2009 -the most recent year for which figures are available -were prosecuted. And the total number of sex trafficking investigations actually fell from 54 in 2008 to 32 in 2009.

One reason could be that trafficking continues to be under-reported, said Ms Bridget Tan, president of migrant workers group, the Humanitarian Organization for Migration Economics (Home).

Trafficking victims are often afraid they might be treated as offenders for violating vice or immigration laws, she said.

Trafficking cases are also hard to prove, as many victims do not even know the real names of their traffickers -the men and women who act as their pimps and minders, who hold their passports and watch their every movement.

The MHA spokesman said that as trafficking is 'fundamentally clandestine and transnational in nature', the culprits might not be taken to task if victims did not come forward.

Washington-based Mr Luis CdeBaca, tasked by President Barack Obama to lead America's global fight against trafficking, told The Straits Times in a phone interview that the authorities here could be more proactive.

'Trafficking investigations should involve intelligence gathering, just like counterterrorism,' said the ambassador-at-large at the US State Department's office to monitor and combat trafficking. 'Waiting for a complaint to be lodged and then reacting to it is just not enough.'

But he welcomed Singapore's recent efforts, especially its setting up of an inter-agency task force and adopting UN definitions of trafficking, as steps in the right direction.

How Taipei cleaned up its act; These are some BEST PRACTICES from three other places that are tough on trafficking

SECTION: SATURDAY SPECIAL REPORTLENGTH: 323 words

AS RECENTLY as 2006, Taiwan was on the US State Department's 'watch list' of economies not doing enough to combat trafficking, according to the US government's Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report that monitors trafficking trends globally. But within four short years, Taiwan managed to claw its way up to 'Tier 1' status, the highest ranking in the annual report.

Within months of the TIP downgrade, the Taiwanese government adopted a 'national plan' to fight trafficking. This included initiatives to research and understand the extent of the problem, beef up law enforcement capabilities to prevent the crime and swiftly investigate alleged cases and protect victims.

o In 2009, Taiwan enacted the Human Trafficking Prevention and Control Act that gave a clear and comprehensive definition of human trafficking that was in line with the United Nations Trafficking Protocol. The law also focused on strengthening protection for victims of trafficking as they remained on the island as prosecution witnesses. Last year, the Taiwanese authorities identified 329 trafficking victims and provided them with work permits, allowing them to earn an income while assisting in the prosecution of their traffickers.

o Taiwan has a total of 19 shelters dedicated to looking after victims under the administration of various government agencies. The government has worked with local non-governmental organisations (NGOs) to manage the shelters and provide victim support services, including medical, financial and legal assistance, counselling, interpretation help, language classes and occupational training.

o The authorities allow NGOs to visit detention facilities and conduct their own victim identification, and the government has recognised three victims identified by the NGOs in this manner.

o There is also a special government budget to fund anti-trafficking projects, including those that involve protecting and rehabilitating the victims.

HEARING OF THE COMMISSION ON SECURITY & COOPERATION IN EUROPE (HELSINKI COMMISSION)
SUBJECT: "LABOR TRAFFICKING IN TROUBLED ECONOMIC TIMES: PROTECTING AMERICAN JOBS AND MIGRANT HUMAN RIGHTS" CHAIRED BY: REPRESENTATIVE CHRISTOPHER SMITH (R-NJ) WITNESSES: LUIS C. DEBACA; GABRIELA LEMUS; NANCY A. DONALDSON; NEHA MISRA; JULIA ORMOND
LOCATION: 2172 RAYBURN HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING, WASHINGTON, D.C. TIME: 2:00 P.M. EDT DATE: MONDAY, MAY 23, 2011

REPRESENTATIVE CHRISTOPHER SMITH (R-NJ): The commission will come to order. And I want to welcome all of you to today's hearing, part of the Helsinki Commission's ongoing efforts to combat human trafficking in all of its aspects, which go back to June of 1999 when I chaired the first commission hearing on human trafficking -- really a tradition that continued under my good friend and colleague, Commissioner Cardin, when he was chairman and now co-chair. This has been a bipartisan effort from the beginning, and it continues to this day.

Today our attention turns to labor trafficking, a modern-day form of slavery, exacerbated by the global economic downturn. As with all forms of trafficking we must never lose sight of the victim, the truly human face of people caught up unwittingly in this multi-billion dollar criminal enterprise. Having just participated in a conference entitled "Building Bridges of Freedom: Public-Private Partnerships to End Modern-Day Slavery," I am acutely aware that in order to be successful in combating the scourge of human trafficking, we must strengthen the cooperation between governments and the private sector, particularly with regards to labor trafficking.

Each year, tens of thousands of victims are trafficked into the United States from throughout the world. The United States has been at the forefront of efforts to combat human trafficking in all of its forms, including labor trafficking, following adoption of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000.

Our government has undertaken the vast challenge of tracking slavery around the world. We have developed strategic reporting tools such as the Trafficking in Persons Report, the list of goods produced with child and forced labor, and the findings on the worst forms of child labor. And the world has taken notice.

I would note parenthetically, when I first introduced the Trafficking Victims Protection Act in 1998, a landmark bill that was signed into law two years later in 2000, the legislation was met with a wall of skepticism and outright opposition. People both inside of government and out thought the bold new strategy that included sheltering, asylum and other protections for the victims, long jail sentences and asset confiscation for the traffickers and tough sanctions for governments that failed to meet minimum standards was merely a solution in search of a problem.

I vividly recall raising the trafficking issue at a gathering of parliamentarians meeting in St. Petersburg in Russia in 1999 and was met with a similar reaction. Matter of fact, the Russians -- several on their delegation thought that somehow we were seeking to embarrass them. And I remember the Ukrainian representative very dismissively -- and I remember -- Ben, you would remember that -- said, but they're just prostitutes, as if somehow they were less than human. It was a -- it was really a very disturbing spectacle.

But the next year at the Bucharest OSCE Parliamentary Assembly, not only did we have virtually every one of the delegations joining in on the parliamentary supplementary item, as we called it, but the Russians spoke out, and the head of the Duma actually gave a speech in favor of the parliamentary supplemental item combating human trafficking.

As the special rep for human trafficking in the parliamentary assembly for the OSCE, I know full well considerable progress has been made. I remain deeply concerned that of the 56 OSCE participating states, 20 will rank as Tier 2, with another eight placed on the Tier 2 Watch List.

Our efforts could not have been possible both within the OSCE as well as here in the United States without the invaluable contribution of civil society, who have helped us write the laws and, frankly, all subsequent iterations of the TPVA and other similar bills around the world.

Last week, we heard Deb Cundy of the Carlson Companies, which manages numerous hotel chains including the Radisson and Country Inns and Suites, explain how their employees were trained to spot potential trafficking victims and how that employee should notify law enforcement. Christopher Davis of The Body Shop International detailed the extraordinary education and awareness program that they have initiated, coupled with a petition drive that has garnered approximately 6 million signatures worldwide.

As we reauthorize certain sections of the act -- obviously some of the act, some provisions, are permanent law; others need to be reauthorized, and they expire in the end of September -- civil society representatives have flooded my office and, I'm sure, Ambassador Luis CdeBaca's office, who was at Rome at that conference and did a magnificent job, with some thoughts as to what they think ought to be done to improve and make more efficacious our policy vis-à-vis trafficking.

As we all know, traffickers prey upon those in poverty and those lacking even the prospect of a job. I have visited trafficking victims' shelters in countries throughout the world, including Russia, Nigeria, Peru, Romania, D.R. Congo, Ethiopia, Brazil, Bosnia, Italy and elsewhere. I've seen the faces -- as have so many of you who will testify and so many in the audience, and certainly members of our commission -- seen those faces of the victims -- women and children and men -- robbed of their inherent dignity.

In Moldova, Catholic Relief Services documented that high school aged girls were disappearing, literally disappearing into human trafficking in large part due to the extreme lack of job opportunities in that country. CRS created the Moldova Employment and Training Alliance, which encourage private sector companies to expand in rural villages. And certainly, that has made a huge difference in that country.

As a destination country, we must recognize that here in our own -- very own backyard, thousands of people are trafficked from all over the world to work on our farms, in our hotels, our restaurants and even to serve as domestic workers. Well, even more shocking is that many of these labor migrants enter the country legally through their own immigration system, deceived by their traffickers who sold them a dream.

Indeed, this afternoon we will focus on various aspects of labor trafficking, including abusive and illegal business practices, as well as ways to better educate potential migrants of their rights. Among other issues to be considered will be increased education and accountability, foreign labor recruiting practices and enhancing supply-chain transparency. Labor trafficking remains the most prevalent form of human trafficking in the United States.

U.S. funding for anti-trafficking efforts abroad have brought together labor inspectors, police, prosecutors, NGOs and faith-based organizations. Obviously, many challenges remain. So it falls to us and likeminded people of goodwill everywhere to meet those challenges head-on and wage an unceasing campaign to eradicate human trafficking from the face of the earth.

Today we are joined by Ambassador Luis CdeBaca, director of the State Department Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. He is joined by Dr. Gabriela Lemus, the Department of Labor's labor representative to the Senior Policy Operating Group on Trafficking in Persons.

On our second panel, we will hear from the director of the Washington Office of the International Labor Organization, Ms. Nancy Donaldson; Ms. Neha Misra, special -- specialist on migration and human trafficking for the Solidarity Center; and we have a very special guest in actress and activist Julia Ormond, founder of the Alliance to Stop Slavery and End Trafficking -- a very talented actress and a tireless humanitarian activist who was absolutely instrumental in getting landmark legislation passed in California on -- to combat labor trafficking and to figure out the supply systems of companies through better transparency and by working with those companies. So we will hear from that second panel after we hear from our very distinguished first panel.

I'd like to yield to a good friend and colleague, Mr. Cardin, co-chairman of this commission.

SENATOR BENJAMIN CARDIN (D-MD): Well, to Chairman Smith, thank you very much for arranging this hearing. I think it's an extremely important subject. I would ask that my written opening statement be made part of the record.

REP. SMITH: Without objection.

SEN. CARDIN: And I will just comment briefly. It's with great pride that the Helsinki Commission takes on dealing with the issue of trafficking, because it was this commission that first raised these issues. And in the course of that, we conducted hearings; we sponsored resolutions at the parliamentary assemblies in order to get more international focus on modern-day slavery. We took a pretty tough stand. And Chairman Smith's right. Some of the initial reactions were less than sympathetic.

But we persisted. And with the support of our delegation to Vienna, the United States had a united position to do everything we could to rid our societies of trafficking, the form of modern-day slavery. Then the permanent council started to act, and we started to get some best practices shared by other states. With the legislature and executive working in tandem, we were able to make significant progress.

I remember visiting some of the shelters, where we visited with the victims and were able to put a spotlight on the issue that those that are trafficked are not criminals but they're victims. And law enforcement needs to conduct its affairs mindful of who the real criminals are. And we made more progress and were able to get special representatives, both in the parliamentary assembly -- and, as you know, our chairman, Chairman Smith, is that special representative -- and in the permanent council of the OSCE.

So we've made progress. We have a game plan today to deal with trafficking. And the United States has shown tremendous leadership in the passage of not only our domestic laws, which are very strong, but also the reports that are now required to be filed. These reports, I can tell you, have major impact -- as I'm sure Chairman Smith would agree. When ambassadors visit our office, that's one of the first issues they'll talk to us about, because they all want to -- they don't want to be listed as a watch state.

Our primary focus has been on sexual exploitation. And I think that reason is somewhat self-obvious. It's a very serious situation around the globe, and we were able to make significant progress. Labor exploitation's a little bit more complicated, because there's an economic issue here that has some legitimacy -- at least people think there's some legitimacy because of open borders and bringing in labor to help in your country.

I want to applaud Chairman Smith for holding this hearing so that we can take a look at trafficking related to labor issues, particularly in these very difficult economic times.

I want to point out that debt bondage for migration costs can amount to involuntary servitude or slavery. And we need to take a look at how these matters are being financed, because they are being used to deny people their basic human rights. I want to congratulate the Obama administration for taking this issue of labor seriously and the way that the Obama administration has coordinated the work within the Department of State and the Department of Commerce. That's what you need to do. This is a matter that involves both of those agencies. And I know they're working closely together.

This is a very timely hearing. For Congress, shortly we'll be looking at the reauthorization of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act. And in that act, I note that in 2008, in a matter that I helped draft, we put into that law additional tools for our consulate officers to be able to look at those who are requesting visas to come into the United States. I'll be interested in hearing from our witnesses today whether those efforts are paying off. There's training requirements that consular officers be able to identify circumstances that look like they're trafficking. How has that in fact worked? Do we need to expand that training to other border officers and law enforcement officers? These are issues that I think we need to take a look at as we move forward to the reauthorization practices.

Our bottom line is, we want to see what other countries are doing. We can learn from best practices of other countries in dealing with these issues. And I think we need to share the success stories so that we can, in fact, at long last get rid of these labor abuses. Working together, we can continue to make progress that we've made in the past so that we can eliminate all forms of modern-day slavery. I look forward to hearing from the witnesses.

REP. SMITH: Thank you, Chairman Cardin. (I'd like ?) to yield to chairman of the Energy and Commerce Health Committee, a commissioner on our Helsinki Commission for many years, Joe Pitts.

REPRESENTATIVE JOSEPH PITTS (R-PA): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And as an original co-sponsor of the Trafficking in Persons Law and with you in the OSCE, putting forth these issues, I thank you for scheduling this hearing entitled "Labor Trafficking in Troubled Economic Times: Protecting American Jobs and Migrant Human Rights." The issues involved in the exploitation of migrant workers, broad and on American soil, are of grave concern to the OSCE. In the wake of a global recession, it is important that we continue our focus on human trafficking and migrant worker populations now more than ever.

While the United States has taken a lead on confronting and combating human trafficking, we must do everything we can to end the practice. And this includes looking at ways to verify worker practices and conditions. We must find better ways at enforcing our own policies. Recent high-profile cases of violations have highlighted the need for a systemic verification process, one that is multilateral, including the help of foreign governments and organizations, and one that verifies from the bottom up, leaving no room for abuse throughout the supply chain.

So, Mr. Chairman, I thank you for holding this important hearing. I look forward to hearing the ideas from our witnesses here today and hope that we can find concrete solutions to dealing with the problem of labor exploitation here in the United States. And I yield back.

REP. SMITH: Commissioner Pitts, thank you very much. I'd like to now yield to a new member but very active member, Christopher (sic) Cohen.

REPRESENTATIVE STEVE COHEN (D-TN): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. It's a pleasure to be here, and I'm going to look forward to listening to the testimony. Ambassador de Baca was a counsel to the Judiciary Committee, which I serve on, and has quite an honorable and distinguished record. Good to see you again in your position. And Ms. Lemus has been at some of the greatest universities in this country, including the University of Memphis. So it's good to have a Memphis denizen, even if a short tenure with us today.

This is an important issue.

Slavery (in ?) any component is something we need to fight, and it needs to be something we do in a bipartisan fashion, because freedom is the bottom line, you know. You know, there's nothing left to lose. And we had a history in our country of slavery. And sometimes we think of slavery simply as that form of the most heinous, direct, main line of slavery. But there are other forms. There are temporary forms. There are forms of -- that we have, and we need to combat them and make employers just as liable for looking the other way, maybe not knowingly, but looking the other way when they're beneficiaries of slave labor. And we know that happens in this country and that whether they are landlords who have leased to people who are involved in labor trafficking, whether they are along the chain -- I know we have products, and the California law goes along the chain to make people be aware that they will not be involved, and any producer of raw materials in the final product if they're involved in the slave trade, that they won't be allowed. They'll be -- I guess there'll be sanctions in the California law. I'd hope so. And that's what there should be. We have that for product. I know if you buy a guitar and it's got any kind of a wood product in it that's on the endangered list, you get in trouble for the final product. We should have the same thing. If wood is important, which it is in Brazil and the rainforests and all, it should be with human beings even more so.

I'm Jewish. And Passover, which is our most -- my favorite holiday, not just because of the food but because of the lesson that we were in bondage and that we should always be cognizant of any people who were in bondage. And that's just not building pyramids or doing cotton. But that's the folks we're going to talk about here today. And the Judeo-Christian ethos which we are all a product of needs to be adhered to, and we need to pass the most rigorous and strong laws that we can to protect everyone.

So with that, I thank the chairman for scheduling this committee meeting. I look forward to your testimony. I yield back the balance of my time.

REP. SMITH: Mr. Cohen, thank you very much. And quoting Janis Joplin there?

Let me just introduce our very distinguished panelists beginning with Ambassador Luis CdeBaca, ambassador-at-large of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. In May of 2009, he was appointed by President Obama to coordinate U.S. government activities in the global fight against contemporary forms of slavery. He serves as senior adviser to the secretary, and directs the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons -- which, as we all know, assesses global trends, provides training and technical assistance and advocates for an end to slavery. Ambassador CdeBaca formally served as counsel, as Commissioner Cohen just said, to the House Committee on the Judiciary. And at the Justice Department, he is one of the most country -- of our country's most decorated federal prosecutors, leading the investigation and prosecution of cases involving money laundering, organized crime, alien smuggling, official misconduct, hate crimes and of course human trafficking. He was responsible for the conviction of dozens of abusive pimps and employers, and helped to liberate hundreds of victims from servitude.

Then we'll hear from Dr. Gabriela Lemus, who was appointed senior adviser and director of the Office of Public Engagement at the Department of Labor in July of 2009. She represents the DOL at the Senior Policy Operating Group in Trafficking in Persons, the President's Task Force on Puerto Rico's Status, and various interagency working groups on immigration policy. Prior to her appointment, she was the first woman to hold the position of executive director at the Labor Counsel for Latin America's advancement, from 2007 to '09, as well as the first woman to chair the National Hispanic Leadership Agenda from 2008 to '9. She served a three year -- three year terms on the advisory boards of both the Washington Office on Latin America, or WOLA, and the U.S. Labor Education in the Americas Project from 2006 to 2009.

Mr. Ambassador, please proceed as you would -- as you would like.

LUIS C. DEBACA: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Good afternoon, everyone, and thank you for the opportunity to shed a light on the problem of labor trafficking both here in the United States and abroad. As you have mentioned, the OSCE and the Helsinki Commission in particular has led on this issue, as on many others.

In Rome last week at the conference that was dealing with some of these issues, especially issues of supply chain, the words of one of our panelists from Rabbis for Human Rights North America reminded me and suggested what you have said, Mr. Cohen, which is that we are in some ways in the 10th year of this fight since the passage of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act. But as the Western world, as people of faith and as those who reflect the Judeo-Christian values, that we are in year 3,500 of this fight, and we should be measured on it in that sense. And unfortunately, 3,500 years later, estimates on the total number of trafficking victims in the world are as high as 27 million. We know that the United States is a major destination, but we don't know how many victims of labor trafficking there are specifically in this country, because it's a hidden crime. Victims are often afraid to come forward, or unable, sometimes because they fear the very officers that could help them.

But the cases that have been uncovered tell us some things. We know that labor trafficking is a problem that affects men, women and children alike. Labor trafficking victims often suffer ongoing sexual abuse, as well as threats of physical violence, and that the cases now are uncomfortably identical to cases that the United States prosecuted in sharecropping in the 1930s, the railroad gangs of the turn of the century, or the padroni child begging cases of the 1870s.

Labor trafficking victims today are lured with the same types of promises -- a good job and a better life -- only to be trapped through their specific vulnerabilities. For foreign workers, that's often lack of documents, language or familiarity with their rights here in America. For United States citizens, it's often homelessness, mental illness or addiction. Whatever the hook that the traffickers use, we must bring this cycle to an end once and for all.

As you know, the United States follows a(n) expansive definition of human trafficking that encompasses all of the actions in reducing a person or holding them in a condition of servitude, and so that means that the recruiter who feeds the victim into the system, and the end user who knowingly or recklessly profits from the abuse, are properly as guilty as the employer who enslaves the victim. Our response is based on the internationally recognized "3P" paradigm: prosecution, protection and prevention. All of these victims are entitled to rehabilitation, and to see their abusers brought to justice.

We have seen progress over the last decade. And across government, we are ever more united in this struggle. More cases are being done both federally and at the state level than ever before. And while victim identifications at time stress and strain our victim services response, NGOs and frontline law enforcement work to ensure a safety net when these people are found.

In particular, I'd like to praise my colleagues at the Department of Labor for their work both at home and abroad. In the U.S. for instance, they've implemented a rule that strengthens protections for a particularly vulnerable group, the temporary H-2A agricultural visa holders. My colleague Dr. Lemus will be able to highlight this and other actions that Secretary Solis has taken to confront this scourge.

But to ensure that these efforts do not fizzle out as they have at other points throughout the last 150 years here in America, we need to institutionalize our capacity, maintain our resources and ensure innovation across the whole of government. And while every aspect can and must be addressed, I'd like to highlight one of the most innovative things that's happening, and that is prevention.

It's basic economics that without demand, there will be no supply. So we're looking to engage on this aspect in both forced labor and sex trafficking alike. The so-called sex industry is not a valid form of labor, and it poses its own unique challenges. But there are commonalities in these areas, most notably the need to hold everyone accountable and to make the cultural change necessary that undercuts the demand for what the traffickers are using cruelty to supply.

Forced labor is prevalent in the production of a wide range of raw materials that we all come in contact, and probably came into contact at some point today, from cotton, chocolate, coffee, steel, rubber, tin. Even reputable corporate citizens can profit from the abuse.

So, as you mentioned, Mr. Chairman, the cutting edge of anti- trafficking work is demanding that companies focus their attentions beyond the places where their products are manufactured and, instead, look at the source of their human capital, the methods of recruitment, where the raw materials are collected, harvested or mined. Effective supply chain monitoring means going all the way down to that level. We think that such research will enhance our understanding of supply and demand factors that affect those workers whose labor contributes to the downstream profits. The aim is to find trafficking where it occurs, and that this knowledge will allow companies to join the Body Shop and Carlson Companies and others in running their business in a manner consistent with the "3P" paradigm.

Removing the taint of slavery is better for everyone. Take for instance what's been reported from the berry patches of Sweden and Finland, Asian guest workers so abused that they were reduced to surviving on a soup made of whatever grasses they could gather and whatever crows they could shoot. If a consumer knew the suffering of the hands that had picked those berries, we would hope that they would have been moved to act.

A conference last winter produced the Luxor Implementation Guidelines to the U.N.'s Athens Ethical principles, which seek to move beyond aspirational statements to the development of standard operating procedures, moving beyond principles to practice and implementation. And to date, nearly 600 companies have adopted those guidelines. That represents the future of the fight against modern slavery.

But of course, government's role will remain central. Our counterparts in Europe have increasingly recognized this problem which all too often has been confused as low-level labor abuses of migrant workers. Today, with the leadership of the OSCE and the EU anti- trafficking directive, cases are on the rise. Countries with active rapporteurs, such as Eva Biaudet, who used to be at the OSCE's anti- trafficking unit, are seeing increases in trafficking prosecutions. As in the United States, Europe has seen cases in factories, hotels, janitorial, agriculture, forestry, landscaping and domestic service.

Here in the United States, the state of California recently enacted the law that you mentioned, Mr. Chairman. And we're looking forward not only to see how that law works in the real world, but also to hear from Julia Ormond who, without this -- her activities, the legislation would never have been possible. We thank her for her vision and for her hard work in getting that law passed.

And we're trying to, and we're beginning to, apply those standards to ourselves. Governments are some of the largest consumers in the world, and the United States government may be one of the largest. We can use our leverage as consumers to curb the demand for forced labor. We've taken steps in the U.S. government procurement and contracting policies to protect against human trafficking. EEOC and the Department of Homeland Security, through this bog (ph), are co-chairing a working group on implementation of the Federal Acquisition Regulation to combat modern slavery and contributing factors like the demand for commercial sex. And we will make sure that we work closely with this committee and with each of you individually as we start getting the recommendations back on how to best address the government's purchasing to make sure that we have, as we (ask/act ?) of others, a slavery-free footprint.

We're at a moment in the modern abolitionist movement when we need to ask, what are the next steps? And over the last decade, the important tools have been put in place. We have before us now the long, hard road of implementation and institutionalization. And we believe that with the engagement of dedicated lawmakers and the commitment of the U.S. government, the next 10 years, both here at the OSCE and abroad, will be a decade of delivering on that which we promised almost 150 years ago with the issuance of the Emancipation Proclamation. I look forward to working with you as we continue to deliver on that promise, and we appreciate your work.

REP. SMITH: Mr. Ambassador, thank you very much for your testimony and your leadership.

I'd like to now recognize Ms. Lemus.

GABRIELA LEMUS: Thank you. Chairman Smith, Co-Chairman Cardin and distinguished members of the commission, on behalf of the Department of Labor and Secretary Solis, I thank you for the opportunity to discuss the department's efforts to combat human trafficking both domestically and internationally.

Under the secretary's leadership, the Wage and Hour Division, the Bureau of International Labor Affairs and the Employment and Training Administration work collaboratively to ensure that the department uses all available tools in the most efficient and effective manner to protect these vulnerable populations. I am pleased to report to the commission our efforts.

The Wage and Hour Division enforces some of the nation's most comprehensive federal labor laws, allowing the agency to have a daily presence in American workplaces. While Wage and Hour does not have responsibility to investigate trafficking directly, many of its investigations take place in industry marked by workers who are vulnerable to trafficking. This means that Wage and Hour division is often the first federal agency to make contact with the workers who may have been trafficked or maybe otherwise employed under abusive conditions in violation of the law.

Because of its focus on civil enforcement, criminal activity found in the workplace by Wage and Hour investigators may be referred to an appropriate authority as part of the standard Wage and Hour procedure. After a referral is made, the agency's assistance may be requested to compute back wages to ensure restitution on behalf of victims of trafficking, and to assess penalties against their employer. Additionally, in its role of investigating workplace laws, the Department of Labor may detect evidence that a worker is a victim of certain criminal activity, including trafficking, that may qualify the worker for U nonimmigrant status.

In April 2011, the department announced protocols to complete a certification that the individual petitioning for U nonimmigrant status is a victim of a qualifying crime and is, has been or is likely to be helpful in the investigation or prosecution of that crime. The Wage and Hour Division is also a member of the Federal Enforcement Working Group, along with the Justice Department, the FBI and Immigration and Customs Enforcement. As part of the working group, Wage and Hour is participating in the development and implementation of the -- a pilot federal anti-trafficking coordination team, the ACT team program. The goal of the ACT team program is, one, to proactively identify and assist human trafficking victims; two, to develop victim-centered multidisciplinary human-trafficking investigations; and three, produce high-impact human-trafficking prosecutions resulting in the conviction of traffickers.

Finally, Wage and Hour also participates in several other outreach and partnership activities to share information and leverage community-based resources to more effectively inform workers about their rights and how they can file Wage and Hour complaints. Such information can assist vulnerable workers, including those who may have been trafficked.

Through the Department of International Labor Affairs, it also plays a critical role in bringing to light the dark stories of human trafficking. In December 2010, the department released three new reports on child labor and forced labor. Together, these reports demonstrate that from factories to farms, abuses of fundamental human rights, including human trafficking, still persist in the 21st century. These reports are, one, the list of goods produced by child or forced labor; two, the list of products produced by forced or indentured child labor; and three, the ninth annual findings on the worst forms of child labor.

Since 1995, Congress has appropriated over $839 million to ILAB for programs to combat international child labor. This funding has supported technical assistance projects in more than 80 countries and reached approximately 1.5 million children at risk of, or engaged in, exploitative child labor. While the department's technical assistance programs include stand-alone trafficking in persons projects, many also include multi-faceted projects to address other worst forms of child labor in addition to trafficking, because many of the most vulnerable workers in the United States are temporary foreign agricultural workers -- agricultural workers, excuse me.

ETA's H-2A program is another significant locus in the department's efforts to combat trafficking.

It is paramount that both workers in the United States and temporary foreign workers are provided with appropriate and adequate worker protections. In March 2010, a final ruling addressing the temporary agricultural employment of H2A aliens in the United States became effective. The final rule includes enhanced mechanisms for protecting H2A workers, who are increasingly susceptible to the abuses of dishonest employers and their agents, such as foreign labor recruiters. The 2010 final rule requires employers to contractually forbid foreign labor contractors or recruiters engaged in international recruitment of H2A workers from seeking or receiving payments from such prospective employees. The 2010 H2A final rule enhanced enforcement provisions allow the department to investigate and sanction employers and their agents or attorneys where there is a violation of regulation provisions. These penalties demonstrate the department's commitment to strengthening the necessary enforcement of a law that protects workers who are unlikely to complain to government agencies about violations of their rights under the program.

In conclusion, in today's global economy, workers in any country are vulnerable to trafficking and labor rights abuses. The department's innovative and integrative programs help workers earn decent incomes, and prevent them from being abused and exploited. This approach is a vital part of the administration's goal of ensuring that globalization provides benefits and opportunities for workers everywhere, rather than triggering a race to the bottom.

Again, thank you for the opportunity to testify today. I'm happy to answer any questions the commission may have on the Department of Labor's efforts to combat trafficking.

REP. SMITH: Thank you very much, Ms. Lemus.

Let me just begin the questioning, if I could. Both you, Mr. Ambassador and I both referenced the important work that has been done by Julia Ormond as founder of the Alliance to Stop Slavery and End Trafficking. And Senate Bill 657, which was signed into law, as you know, requires retail sellers and manufacturers doing business in California to publicly disclose their efforts to eradicate slavery -- I'm reading from an op-ed written by Ms. Ormond -- and human trafficking from their direct supply chains. She points out that by January 2012, companies impacted by the bill will have to post on their websites what policies they have in place to ensure that their supply chains are free of slavery and human trafficking.

And my question is, this is a model bill. Obviously there's another 49 states and the District of Columbia that could follow suit, and obviously the federal government ought to be thinking along these lines as well. And I was wondering what -- your thoughts about the new law's strengths and weaknesses, whether or not -- and, you know, I don't think we should wait until January of 2012 to see how well or poorly it's working. I do think it looks to bring business along for the ride, and so I would be interested in your thought on this piece of legislation.

MR. CDEBACA: Thank you, Mr. Smith. We are -- we are very excited about the California law. We think that this is a very good way that one of the states -- a state which, of course, if it were its own economy, certainly it would be part of the G-20, if not maybe even the G-8. A state like California taking these actions is going to have a ripple effect to countries and companies all the way around the world, because anyone who is a multinational company worthy of the name is doing business in California. One of the things that we see from our perspective -- and I think we all look forward to hearing from Ms. Ormond and others on the specifics of the law -- but what we've seen in talking to California, a real hero against the fight against traffickers in the attorney general's office there, Kamala Harris, from her time when she was a state's attorney in San Francisco, but also Jerry Brown, who's gone from overseeing the training of law enforcement in California as the attorney general, to go after trafficking in a new way over the last few years. His office has been very supportive of this. So one of the things that we think is going to happen is that all of us, as consumers, as the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking, academics, et cetera, will be able to access this information and start figuring out what the companies are doing.

I think the brilliance of this is that it doesn't necessarily say -- in our understanding, it doesn't necessarily say what the particular policy that company has to have; they just have to have something. And we think that that will then put it out to the marketplace of ideas. It's an innovative way to have a regulatory structure that actually brings the market to bear, so all of us as consumers can look at these companies and make decisions, and put pressure on them accordingly.

REP. SMITH: I appreciate that, thank you. Let me just ask: A common theme in trafficking for labor exploitation is holding the victim in debt bondage through recruitment and migration fees. Although the practice is illegal, and some countries have prohibited under its -- prohibited it under international conventions, how can we do a better job in enforcing that part of this chain of degradation? If you could --

MR. CDEBACA: One of the things Congress did on its, I think, first day back after the end of the Civil War was pass a law that was called the "peonage" law -- because of the term for debt bondage in Spanish -- that made it clear that the protections of the Thirteenth Amendment didn't just apply to the newly freed African-American slaves in the South, but applied to people all over the country. So this notion of debt bondage as being one of our core anti-slavery ideals in the United States is key to our efforts.

One of the things that we've seen is that with the passage in the 2008 reauthorization of the fraud in foreign labor contracting, we've seen our first convictions of that now in, I think, a case out of Kansas City where people were being brought over for janitorial services. We think that that's going to be a powerful tool because sometimes you can show that there was a debt, but you can't show that the debt was then specifically used as a threat. So we think that that fraud in foreign labor contracting provision of Title 18 that was in the TVPRA is going to help an awful lot.

Two other areas, though, that we think that we need to look at: We're working with countries around the world to try to -- as the Department of Labor's final rule on the guest worker programs here in the U.S. does -- to try to strip the power of the labor recruiters to basically sell the chance to work in another country in exchange for the person's freedom. We see that as something that only when we are able to bridge the power differential between the source countries -- your Bangladeshes, Philippines, Malaysia, et cetera, and the wealthy countries such as Saudi Arabia, Qatar, other countries in the Persian Gulf -- only when we are able to narrow that power differential will we be able to end this practice of debt bondage.

So for the first time just about a month-and-a-half ago, we were able to attend the Colombo Process, which is the sending and receiving countries -- a multilateral forum. They asked the United States to attend because I think they've realized that even though we were not one of the countries involved, that we had a particular voice. And we're going to use that as an avenue, as well as ASEAN and some of the other fora, to put that kind of pressure on the receiving countries.

REP. SMITH: Thank you. Ms. Lemus, back in July 11th and July 15th of 1996, I held two hearings on child labor. Robert Reich testified; he made an impassioned appeal that we have to prioritize, we have to keep our focus. Then, we actually had Kathy Lee Gifford testify; she was embroiled in a problem of her line of clothing being made by sweatshops in Central America.

But we actually heard from Wage and Hour -- the administrator at U.S. Department of Labor, Maria Echaveste, who had just produced and spoked (ph) about the report "By the Sweat & Toil of Children," and she made a very strong statement that without the participation of industry -- and this was back in 1996 -- because we have too few Wage and Hour investigators, too few people at the state and federal level, you just can't enforce; you have to have buy-in fully by the industry -- that our efforts would flounder without that.

And I'm wondering -- that was back in 1996 -- what is the industry doing now to be, you know, full-fledged partners in trying to combat labor trafficking?

MS. LEMUS: Well, at the Department of Labor, part of what we've also tried to do is to increase the number of inspectors and ensure that they're not only bilingual, but that they have had training around the issue of human trafficking. As I said earlier, they are the first to come to the table and see, maybe witness where persons have been victims of trafficking.

On our end, we do about 26,000 inspections a year, yet there are approximately 7 million employers. So obviously, it's a challenge. And we do need assistance from the employers themselves to have buy-in that they wish to participate. And we would say probably a good majority of them are going to be good actors.

Internationally, when we work with child labor issues in particular, what we're noting is that those reports do have an effect -- that countries -- as you said at the beginning, the ambassadors -- as soon as their reports come out, the phone calls at our international labor affairs office, they start streaming in quite steadily. And it's really an effort to partner with not only the countries but the businesses themselves to ensure that we are changing the bar, that we're actually lowering the -- or, I guess I should say raising the bar in terms of that participation with the private sector.

REP. SMITH: Thank you. Chairman Cardin?

SEN. CARDIN: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. And let me thank both of our witnesses. The 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report, TIP report, for the first time included an analysis of the United States, which I think many of us thought was a major improvement on the TIP report.

Is it the secretary's intent that the United States will be included in future reports?

MR. CDEBACA: That's correct.

SEN. CARDIN: Good. I'm going to make sure that is done because I think it is helpful. But let me talk a little bit about your testimony -- you were talking about the H-2A enforcement provisions -- and I guess my question to you: How do you enforce this? You already pointed out that many of the laborers will be reluctant to come forward to talk about the circumstances out of fear. Could you just share with us how you intend to enforce the provisions you talked about in H-2A program?

MS. LEMUS: Through the Wage and Hour division in particular, we have engaged in a variety of local campaigns -- or national campaign, I should say -- but also state and local law enforcement and community-based types of task forces. They belong -- the Wage and Hour division belongs to about 25 taskforces across the country at the local level.

We also participate in the [47:46] (federal act team ?) program, which is looking right at this point -- and my understanding is, they're pilot programs -- but they're looking to really increase the level of cooperation across federal law enforcement agencies to really improve -- we look at the three P's as prevention, protection and prosecution; we kind of start on the prevention end of things because a lot of what we have to do is that educational piece.

We're also engaged -- and this is -- it's not a new program, but it's something that we've reinvigorated: We've re-engaged with a memo of understanding with the government of Mexico, for example, whereby we have signed a memo of understanding to basically ensure that workers that come in from Mexico are aware of the --

SEN. CARDIN: But if I understand your H-2A restriction about the foreign employment agencies being prohibited from being compensated, is that what you said? Did I hear you correctly on that?

MS. LEMUS: The foreign labor contractors are not to receive any payment from an employee. And it's up to the employer to pay all fees, et cetera, and contractually state that they -- in the contract with their agents -- that they may not -- I guess it would be charge them any fees.

SEN. CARDIN: And again, how are you going to enforce that if you don't have your own inspectors out, or some way of finding out what's going on? It's wonderful to have cooperation, but I don't think you're going to have cooperation from unscrupulous foreign employment agencies or the workers who are afraid of losing their jobs.

MS. LEMUS: That is correct. So essentially, through -- there's an audit process through the employment training that actually certifies the visas. Prior to, they can -- they look at the procedures of the paperwork if for any reason there are any types of violations whatsoever. And there is a new audit process that began, I want to say, last year. So it's relatively new, but it's something that's been added. So after the fact, they are continuously checking the information from the workers.

The workers do come forward, not as often as we would like and not as well as we would like, so we've also increased our partnerships with local community-based organizations, faith-based organizations, et cetera, but also state and local law enforcement so that they can come forward as well. Sometimes, the workers do not wish to speak on their own behalves, and they have to have these third parties intervene, including, for example, the consulates.

SEN. CARDIN: Can either one of you follow up with us with how the '08 provisions about training consulars (ph) on the issuance of visas, how that -- do we have any direct information on oversight as to how that has been enforced?

MR. CDEBACA: Certainly, Senator. One of the things that our consular officers now receive during ConGen, which is the basic consular training office -- officers' course -- the trafficking victims identification, the indicators, et cetera, are now taught during the basic course. So it's not just kind of remedial training like it had been in the past. Additionally, an online training course is available for the consular officers out in the field for updates and for keeping current.

But one of the things that we've seen that is probably the best training is the repetition of the training. You're familiar with, in the TVPRA of '08, the requirement that we work with the nongovernmental organizations to come up with a brochure that would be given to many of the work-based or employment-based visa, non-immigrant categories. And that's the "know your rights" brochure that is now given out. It's actually reviewed by the consular officer with the immigrant during the interview on the visa line.

I can't say that it's always a hundred percent -- it kind of depends on what's happening at that exact moment. But one of the things that we've seen is, it's got the 24-hour hotline on it, they have received upwards of a thousand calls since this went into place a couple years ago. Some of those calls are general wage-hour type of calls, people wanting to know about housing conditions, people wanting to know about a whole host of worker rights. But some of those calls are human trafficking calls. And it's something that we work with the Human Trafficking Resource Center and with these task forces the Department of Justice and ICE and others run to make sure that they respond when there's an allegation that's coming forth.

SEN. CARDIN: Thank you. Mr. Chairman, let me just point out: I think it's important that our staff really review the analysis of the United States in the TIP report. Let me just point out one nuance here that was in this report dealing with benefits. And as you know, immigrants, non-nationals, are entitled to very few benefits in this country. And if they are certified as being a foreign victim, then they are entitled to certain benefits.

And even though there was a 250-percent increase in certifications for victims in the last year, there was no increase in funding for those programs.

We already have a relatively -- well, we already have a hostile attitude in this country on benefits for non-nationals. And we're dealing here with an area where we have either potential victims or victims that it seems to me we need to conform to international standards as to how we deal with governmental services available to this class of individuals.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

REP. SMITH: Commissioner Cohen.

REP. COHEN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Ambassador, do we have -- and it's hard to quantify, but could you give me the three or four worst countries that are involved in the slave trade?

MR. CDEBACA: Well, I think, Mr. Cohen, there's a couple of ways to cut that particular orange. Whether it's the raw numbers, I think that most interlocutors that look at it certainly in the report indicates that South Asia, that South Asian countries continue to have perhaps the largest numbers -- India, Nepal, Bangladesh, et cetera. East Asia and the Pacific region continue to be of great concern as far as the numbers are concerned.

But one of the things that we often are trying to balance as far as saying, what's the worst country that there would be to be a trafficking victim -- and probably our heart goes out to most of the folks in the AF region, the Africa region, because you're talking about countries that have so few functioning governmental structures, rule of law that's not really there. Even if there is an anti- trafficking law, even if they are active in the AU up in Addis, which does an anti- trafficking day for the African child -- against child trafficking -- on June 16th each year, that doesn't necessarily mean it translates out into the villages, out into the places where these kids are enslaved, whether it's in the cocoa plantations, whether it's the fishing fleet on Lake Volta or otherwise.

So without necessarily going into a particular country in Africa, we think that Africa is deserving of a lot more of attention. We can't take our eyes off the prize as far as the countries that are continually of concern in East Asia and South Asia. But we feel like the African child and the African men and women deserve to be free from slavery and involuntary servitude just as much as their partners.

REP. COHEN: What I was thinking of -- and I -- (inaudible) -- like it's going to be difficult. I was imagining that maybe Ukraine and some of the more Western countries might have had more of a involvement. But if the State Department has any sanctions against countries, and if that could happen --

MR. CDEBACA: This is something that is one of the -- one of the tools in our tool chest: We -- each year with the trafficking report, the ranking of the countries from tier one down to tier three -- following that tier three designation can come sanctioning. And we've seen great movement, for instance, just in the last year from the government of Moldova, which was very publicly concerned that sanctions might kick in and that sanctions, not just the sanctions from the TVPA -- but perhaps even more importantly, the TVPA requires the United States to vote against a country that's on tier three in the IMF, World Bank, et cetera.

And in the Millennium Challenge Corporation, we've seen a lot of movement on countries who are concerned about their MCC money. Because then you're talking about some real money. So we've seen just in the last year the government of Moldova, which doesn't necessarily have it to spare, spend almost $900,000 on victim care.

Ukraine is still a problem, but not necessarily with its back against the wall the way it was 10 years ago because of the number of projects both at the OSCE, the United States government projects, AID, Justice Department, et cetera. But we've seen that notion of sanctions, and the threat of sanctions, as something that is moving these countries.

REP. COHEN: As a judiciary graduate, are there laws that we should be looking at in judiciary you can recommend to us to strengthen what the body of law is in our country?

MR. CDEBACA: Well, one of the things that we look at each year in the minimum standards when we're putting together the rankings of the TIP report is the sufficiency of the laws in these countries. At the end of the day, what we've been very adamant on is that they have a law that's not based on old notions of people being moved across international borders -- that's kind of the 1880s' version of human trafficking -- but rather focusing upon the enslavement, focusing on the abuse of the people so they can see them not as an illegal migrant but as a victim of slavery.

So through the ABA, through the International Organization for Migration, through U.N. Office of Drugs and Crime (ph) and bilaterally, just directly as the United States, we've been working with countries to try to get these modern anti-trafficking laws passed. About 120 countries have done so since the passage of our Trafficking Victims Protection Act, which was one of the first ones and therefore the models.

But what we've seen in some countries is, they can have the best law on the books, but if they don't go out and use it then it's a failed promise. So we're having to come back in behind those laws, make sure that they mean something in the real world.

REP. COHEN: How about laws here in our country, about employers or landlords who -- tenants and/or employees that are involved either directly or secondarily in trafficking, labor trafficking?

MR. CDEBACA: One of the most positive things about the 2008 Trafficking Victims Protection reauthorization was moving from a full-on knowledge standard to a reckless-disregard standard for those who profit from human trafficking. And so what we're hoping is both the government -- but then there's also civil liability under the trafficking act, which means that a good plaintiff's lawyer out there might take this and run with it.

But that notion of going after the hotel owner who knows that the pimps are bringing the underage girls or the women into the hotel and profiting from that, if they're knowingly looking the other way, if there's a farmer -- you know, when I was at the Justice Department, I prosecuted a farm-labor contractor who was putting a work crew onto the same fields that one of my predecessors had prosecuted somebody 20 years before. And the farmer was the son of the man who had watched this other farm-labor contractor allow slavery.

But at the time, we didn't have this provision. So the hope is, now this provision with the reckless disregard, that'll be a way to hold, whether it's farmers, hotel owners, et cetera, accountable in a new way.

REP. COHEN: Is there confiscation of property involved with those laws?

MR. CDEBACA: There is, although to date, most of the asset forfeiture has been against the trafficker, the direct trafficker, rather than somebody who's knowingly or recklessly profiting from the trafficking. But I think that that's something that we've seen the civil rights division act very aggressively on. It tends to focus one's mind when the domestic servant -- say, for instance, in a case that was prosecuted out of Wisconsin -- a domestic servant who has been held captive in a house for 19 years ends up owning that house because the government comes in and takes it away from the people who enslaved her. That gets a lot of attention, and it should.

REP. COHEN: Yeah. I think it should, too. What do we have in the way of undercover operations? Do we have any of those?

MR. CDEBACA: One of the things that's been tough about undercover operations is because we're dealing with human beings, it's kind of like doing the human experiment trials in a university setting: The level of controls that one needs to have as far as a controlled purchase, or something like that, becomes very challenging.

But we have in the United States done a number of -- and innovative and proactive law enforcement approaches that I'd certainly be happy to brief you on offline; perhaps we could have some of our colleagues from DOJ and ICE as well to talk about some of those things that are being done.

REP. COHEN: I was just thinking -- now, you were in judiciary, I guess, when Stephen Colbert came, when he did the migrant worker day -- maybe we could get Geraldo and let him do that.

MR. CDEBACA: (Chuckles.) Well, it's interesting because I think there has been some very effective undercover work. I think I saw in the audience today Ben Skinner, who is a -- in his book, "A Crime So Monstrous," talks about how he basically set his stopwatch when he left his apartment one morning in New York, and within six hours he had bought a Haitian child for slavery. And I think that that says a lot not only of what world we live in as far as involuntary servitude, but the kind of investigative reporting and the kind of undercover work that needs to be done if we're ever going to break this.

REP. COHEN: Thank you, and thank you, Mr. Chairman.

REP. SMITH: (Inaudible, off mic) -- Commissioner Cohen. Let me ask just two very brief questions to Ambassador C. deBaca: The J-1 visa program, as you know, brings in about 100,000 college students from around the world to work in the U.S. Some work on the Jersey Shore, and they often do work in the summer resort industry. And there have been increasing numbers of reports of abuse by third-party brokers and unsupervised businesses.

Associated Press did an exposé on this, as you know.

And my question is -- and the national human trafficking hotline -- let me just add this -- has received, as I think you know, Mr. Ambassador, 369 calls from J-1 visa holders on the work and travel program from young people who are experiencing trafficking and other forms of exploitation from last summer alone.

Strip clubs and adult entertainment companies openly solicit J-1 workers even though government regulations ban students from taking those jobs that might bring the Department of State into disrepute. And I'm wondering what could be done to stop the abuse of J-1 visas by labor recruiters and businesses, ensuring that students who come here have a safe and humane experience, and not one of exploitation.

And secondly, on China -- and I do hope when the designations of tier three are listed that the department and your office is very seriously considering the designation of tier three for China both on the labor and sex trafficking area.

But I'm wondering how -- what kind of data calls you've gotten from the -- and information from our embassy and other sources about the exploitations of a Chinese workforce. We know there's no OSHA protections whatsoever; they have in excess of 125,000 deaths directly attributable to occupational hazards. There's no labor unions. And those who argue for labor unions are summarily sent to the laogai and tortured.

There is an MOU, as you know so well, that dates back to the George Bush -- the first administration on prison labor, and it's not worth the paper it's printed on because it requires U.S. investigators to submit any complaint to the Chinese authorities, and then they investigate and report back to us. There's no on-site inspections, no independent verification. And Chinese workers, as we know, get 10 to 50 cents per hour for work, and many are in sweatshop conditions dotted throughout all of China.

So if ever there was unfair trading practice, I think it is -- and the exploitation of labor fits that bill. Doesn't that constitute labor trafficking?

MR. CDEBACA: Thank you, Mr. Smith. One of the things that of course, with the Summer Work and Travel Program -- and this is something that when I have been in Eastern Europe, especially Ukraine and Russia, that we've been hearing about some of these concerns.

At the end of the day, this is a program which I think, you know, millions of children, millions of students have been able to come in the United States over the last 50 years. We think that it's been not just a success story of U.S. public diplomacy, but had a lot to do with getting people behind the Iron Curtain to be able to understand who America was, who Americans were. And we want to continue that with the countries especially in Eastern Europe.

One of the things that the department has done, because we recognize that the young age and limited sophistication of some participants have contributed to a potential vulnerability for trafficking initiatives that are targeted at the participants -- and so to minimize the risk, early this year we issued an interim final rule -- it's April 25th of 2011 -- in the Federal Register which makes some changes to the program, sharpens the program as far as a pilot program for the six countries: Belarus, Bulgaria, Moldova, Romania, Russia, Ukraine. And these are the six countries, frankly, that our law enforcement agencies and our embassies and other had identified as those that should be of concern.

The program and the pilot is requiring a hundred-percent pre- placement in jobs -- no bringing folks over through the program, and then getting them jobs here; a full vetting of all the jobs -- job offers; and enhanced monitoring.

But one of the things that the interim final rule explicitly did, because we thought that it needs to be in there in no small part -- so then if someone brings someone over and does this, they might not just be violating the terms of the program, but depending on what promises or contracts were given, could be reached through visa fraud, fraud in foreign labor contracting, or even the trafficking statutes -- is that no Summer Work and Travel participant can be put in any position in the quote, unquote, "adult industry," and they can't be put into domestic-servant positions in private homes. Both of those are things that we certainly know make participants vulnerable to trafficking, and are basically a violation of the promise that the United States and the program is making to these parents overseas that their children, their students are coming to the United States to learn the best of us.

So we're committed to policing this program and to not tolerating any of these types of abuses within it.

As far as China is concerned, one of the things that we've seen in the last months in China is in the wake of their joining the Palermo Protocol is a little bit more of analysis from the Chinese academics, as well as some parts of the Chinese government, the IMOAT -- I-M-O-A-T, which is the inter-ministerial anti-trafficking coordinating body -- looking at what they need to do to come into compliance with the Palermo Protocol. They have a way to go.

And we've talked to them about this; I've raised it when in Beijing. Especially, there's been a problem of labor trafficking because up until recently -- up till just this year -- men were not included in the definition of trafficking, and unofficial workgroups were not. If you were part of a work unit, then you could be considered a trafficking victim if you were a woman. But a man who is working in the underground economy would not have been covered by the trafficking laws.

So those cases that we've known about for the last five or six years -- the horrible cases of the brick workers, the men in the blacksmith shops, the miners, et cetera, case after case after case coming to light -- and having a lot of, you know -- even with the issues of being able to get the word out in China, cases that have gotten a lot of attention in China, those cases legally were not part of their definition of trafficking. So we've raised this with them, but we stand ready to continue to work with our Chinese counterparts on the law enforcement side especially as to what they need to do to address this.

One thing that we are seeing as far as some modicum of worker protection is for internal migration. The Chinese government has been working with the International Labor Organization and others, so we're seeing a little bit more as far as materials, know-your-rights type of things, kind of like what we've talked about for workers going to other countries. But it's the West-to-East pattern of internal migration in China, even to the point of having it -- you know, deck of cards with all of the horrible things that could happen to you when you're in Southeast China before anybody gets on a train.

But we certainly share many of your concerns, and we've raised many of these when I've had a chance to deal with our Chinese counterparts.

REP. SMITH: Yeah, just a follow-up: How difficult will it be for a corporation to live up to the spirit and letter of S-bill 657, the senate bill in California, when some of or many of its feeder parts are made or manufactured in China, where -- as Harry Wu has documented over and over again, the great laogai survivor who is now a great champion of human rights here in the United States -- since there's no access?

And very often, a colonel by day is also the CEO of that particular corporation, and has the full protection of the government and the People's Liberation Army so that it's very hard to penetrate that corporate veil. How --

MR. CDEBACA: We think that the California bill will have a big impact. We've seen companies in China respond when there have been other issues often, whether it's lead in the paint or other adulterated materials. But this is something that -- Mr. Cohen's point earlier about the wood in the guitar -- unfortunately, sometimes it's easier to test that wood and see that it's an endangered tree; it's easier to test the animal product and see that it's from an endangered species than it is sometimes to look at a factory and see whether or not somebody was enslaved there.

So the level of inquiry that we hope that the California transparency act will enable us to proceed with -- certainly, the hope is that we can put the freedom of a person at the same level as the pelt of some kind of exotic animal.

REP. SMITH: Do you anticipate that the administration might suggest its own language that would parallel the California bill?

MR. CDEBACA: I think that at this point, we definitely want to see how the California bill comes online. We want to be supportive of the effort. I think that we'd certainly want to work with you and others, if that was something that was under active consideration, whether for the re-authorization or otherwise. But at this point, we're very much looking to see what we hope is going to be the success of the California bill before we get into the middle of it, as it were.

REP. SMITH: I will thank our two very distinguished witnesses for your testimony and for your leadership. And thank you so much.

I'd now like to invite our second panel to the witness table, beginning with Nancy Donaldson, director of the International Labor Organization at the Washington office. Before joining ILO, Ms. Donaldson was vice president for Dutko Global Advisors, where she was an advisor to the ILO Washington office from 1997 to '05. She was vice president for energy, education, technology, trade and international issues at the Downey McGrath Group. Prior to that, she was in the Washington office, director for Women's Action for a New Direction (ph), and a lawyer in practice -- in private practice.

We'll then hear from Neha Misra, who is a senior specialist on human trafficking and migrant worker programs for the Solidarity Center, an international worker-rights NGO based in Washington, D.C., and part of the AFL-CIO. She has worked for many years in international policy, advising on migration and human trafficking issues. She serves as a member of the board of directors for the Global Workers Justice Alliance, and as chair of the public interest committee for the North American South Asian Bar Association.

In addition to her position as senior specialist at the Solidary Center, Ms. Misra also serves as senior program officer in the Africa regional office. Her expertise on global trafficking issues was initially developed in Indonesia, where she was the deputy country director and program manager for the Solidary Center's Counter Trafficking Project. She worked in Indonesia for over five years, starting with the Solidary Center as the director of its Democracy project.

Before assignment in Indonesia, she worked in Bosnia on post-war elections and democracy, and in the U.S. as senior attorney advisor with the U.S. Department of State -- Department of Justice, I should say. While at DOJ, she also served as the president of the American Federation of Government Employees.

And finally, we'll hear from Julia Ormond, who is an internationally admired and successful actress, and has played roles in numerous motion pictures and TV shows, including "Legends of the Fall," "Sabrina," "The Curious Case of Benjamin Button," "First Knight," and so many others. And she was awarded an Emmy, I should say -- in 2010.

Julia Ormond has an inspirational record of advocacy on human rights issues, and has been strongly involved in the issue of human trafficking since becoming aware of it firsthand -- experience on the plight of trafficked women in Eastern Europe.

She also served in a number of roles in international NGOs, most recently as president of the Alliance to Stop Slavery and End Trafficking, or ASSET, an organization she founded in 2007. ASSET is an advocacy NGO dedicated to the systematic eradication of slavery chiefly through giving the victims of slavery a voice on their own. The group was the leading sponsor of the California Transparency in Supply Chains Act of 2010, which we discussed with the earlier panel, which tackles slavery and human trafficking by requiring companies to report on the sources of their supply chains.

Previously in 1999, Ms. Ormond also co-founded FilmAid International, which aims to inform and empower refugee communities through film. In 2005, she was named as the United Nations goodwill ambassador against slavery and trafficking. She is no stranger to Capitol Hill, having previously testified in the House as well as before the California state legislature again on issues related to human trafficking.

So please, if you would begin first with Ms. Donaldson, Ms. Misra, and then -- batting cleanup will be Julia Ormond.

NANCY A. DONALDSON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman and Commissioner Cohen, and the members of the commission, for inviting me to testify today. I am representing the International Labor Organization, which is a specialized agency of the United Nations.

Each year, millions of people leave their homes and cross national borders in search of better prospects and greater security for themselves and their families. Ninety percent of all migrants are workers and their families. Migrants bring skills and initiative to advanced economies, to host countries. They also benefit origin countries, sending money home and transfer of technology and critical skills.

Today, we are here to discuss urgent problems often faced by vulnerable migrant populations and individuals -- criminal trafficking and forced labor -- and the actions that the ILO and others are taking to eradicate these abuses.

Migrants are vulnerable to exploitation and discrimination. In the extreme, irregular migration includes trafficking, smuggling, sexual exploitation and violence. As ILO's recent report highlights, forced labor today is the antithesis of decent work, and a global problem affecting almost every country in the world.

Traditional slavery is still found in some parts of Africa, while forced labor or coercive recruitment is present in many countries of Latin America, parts of the Caribbean, and elsewhere. In Europe and North America, an increasing number of women and children are victims of traffickers who sell them into forced prostitution or sweatshops.

The ILO estimates that there are at least 12.3 million persons in forced labor today. Eighty percent, or 9.8 million people, were exploited by private agents. Most victims are poverty-stricken people in Asia and Latin America of those figures. Yet, over 360,000 women and men are in forced labor in industrialized countries -- OSCE countries -- trafficked for either labor or sexual exploitation. Some 56 percent of all persons in forced labor are women and girls, and children under 18 years of age make up about half, nearly half of forced laborers.

The ILO has taken up the issue of protecting domestic workers vigorously. Last year, the ILO International Labor Conference began consideration of a workers' -- domestic workers' convention. It will be expected to take it up for the second round -- final round in June of this year. We very much appreciate the strong support of the United States in working on the domestic worker protections, and also the OSCE.

One principal responsibility of the ILO is drawing up and overseeing international labor standards. Strong enforcement of labor standards worldwide levels the playing field for all workers, including American workers and industries. In today's globalized economy, international labor standards are also an essential component for ensuring that the growth of the global economy provides benefits to all.

The ILO has pioneered the development of international standards prohibiting forced labor and for the governance of labor migration and the protection of migrant workers since the 1930s. Two of the eight core conventions among core labor standards set out prohibitions on all forms of forced labor. There are also two conventions, 97 and 193, that govern migration for employment. Also, in 1990, the U.N. International Convention on the Protection of Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families was established.

The ILO has two specialized programs: the International Migration Program and the Special Action Program to Combat Forced Labor, which provides technical assistance to ILO countries and partners with the challenges of labor migration and forced labor. The ILO is promoting a global alliance with partner agencies, pooling their efforts to eliminate forced labor worldwide by 2015. The OSCE is a major partner in this endeavor, and we do a lot of things together.

ILO's International Migration Program supports ILO member states in combating discrimination against migrants and helping their social and economic integration.

Currently, the program is engaged in 14 technical cooperation projects either funded by or implemented in OSCE countries, working to develop effective migration systems and policies and to strengthen government institutions and educate migrants on their rights and the services available. ILO has been at the forefront of generating and sharing data and knowledge on these subjects to raise public awareness and increase pressure for action. ILO's initial body of research was seminal, as it provided the basic facts and figures on modern forced labor, raising the global pressure for policy change.

I would like to emphasize that improving data collection on these issues is of paramount importance. Significant gaps in understanding the quantitative dimension of forced labor and human trafficking remain. I will say that the U.S. law has brought forward more data collection, which we think is extremely important.

The ILO has developed and disseminated courses, guidances, training materials on key aspects of forced labor and trafficking. And cooperation between the OSCE and the ILO on research and training has helped our economic partners to access important knowledge and expertise.

The ILO assists governments. We work hand in hand with our 183 member governments in designing and implementing projects on the ground. Through our Decent Work Country Programmes strategies, the ILO works with employers, workers and governments to set out agreed national priorities in the world of work. Experience shows with -- that with careful awareness raising, consensus can be built to include sensitive subjects such as forced labor among the core national priorities.

In Brazil, the ILO has been working with our social partners on the issue of forced labor and global supply chains. The abolition of slave labor and the worst forms of child labor are a key priority for Brazil and their national agenda for decent work. With grant support from the State Department, ILO worked with companies and continues to work with the government, companies and civil society to promote new understanding and strategies for engagement. The key objective is to strengthen the global alliance against forced labor by reducing the risks of trafficking and forced labor facing Brazilian suppliers and international buyers. And the (pact ?) that does the work on that -- we work with seven tiers of suppliers just in Brazil sometimes.

I want to leave the commission with three key points. One, good migration policies and the abolition of forced labor are challenges for every county, whether industrialized, emerging economies or less developed. We believe that true gains in the governance of migration and against forced labor must happen in a multilateral context.

Two, the ILO takes a rights-based approach to these issues. In that, we are very harmonious with this commission. We are devoted to promoting social justice and decent work in recognizing human and labor rights.

Three, the governance of migration and forced labor deserves a multi-stakeholder approach. The ILO works with governments and its strong social partners to reduce irregular migration and end forced labor and ensure protection of workers' rights. We have enjoyed fruitful partnerships with G/TIP, DRL and ILAB represented here today, and we respect and seek more ways to work with the Solidarity Center. We are dedicated to continue working together with our social partners and advocates to improve migrants' conditions and to end forced labor and human trafficking around the world. Thank you very much.

REP. SMITH: Thank you very much, and thank you for the good work of ILO over these many decades.

I'd like to now ask Ms. Misra if she would proceed.

NEHA MISRA: Thank you, Chairman Smith and Commissioner Cohen, for this opportunity to testify today. I'd like to ask that my full written testimony be submitted to the record so that I can be very brief with you --

REP. SMITH: Sure.

MS. MISRA: -- and we can get to some questions.

REP. SMITH: Without objection, so ordered.

MS. MISRA: Okay. Just -- the Solidarity Center is an international labor-rights organization working in over 60 countries around the world, really appreciates the U.S. Helsinki Commission focus in this hearing on trafficking for labor exploitation and the focus on abusive, unethical and illegal business practices that contribute to human trafficking and forced labor. We've seen firsthand how violations of worker rights and the lack of labor standards and protections for workers increase their vulnerability to human trafficking. But we still see in the media and when you talk to the public about human trafficking, many times you'll hear people talk about it as the crime of organized syndicates, criminal gangs and underground criminals, which, of course, is the case in many instances. But we are also seeing increasingly around the world trafficking for labor exploitation happening in the context of legal structures of employment and business, with the traffickers being employment -- employers and labor recruiters, and not gang members or members of organized crime.

And so, that's what I want to focus on today in my testimony. While trafficking for labor exploitation has many facets, several major trends in our globalized world endanger workers, particularly those at most risk in the need and those in the most need of protection. In developed economies like the United States and Europe, we're seeing an increase in the cases of trafficked immigrant teachers, nurses, construction and service-sector workers, all in destination countries with valid visas, shining a light on the structural failures within our economic and employment systems that increase immigrant workers' vulnerability to severe forms of labor exploitation. Multinational corporations, employers, businesses, labor recruiters and others exploit these structural failures.

Of particular concern to us -- and Chairman Smith, you talked about (through ?) the Senate, and in the earlier testimony we heard some about this -- are temporary labor-migration schemes. Around the world we heard -- hear these referred to as guest-worker sponsorship or circular-migration programs. But these are increasingly being promoted by governments around the world to fill the demand for cheap labor. In practice, these schemes create a legalized system and structure for employers to exploit workers and increase workers' vulnerability to human trafficking and other forms of severe labor exploitation.

Such programs have been plagued by a long history of abuses, ranging from labor violations to visa fraud, debt bondage, involuntary servitude and trafficking for labor exploitation. This includes, among many others, the U.S. H2 visa guest-worker program. And we heard testimony from -- our -- the -- our colleague from the Department of Labor about the H2A, but I would like to emphasize the H2B visa program; seasonal agricultural programs in Canada, such as the Canadian-Guatemala Program; seasonal agricultural programs in Europe such as Moldovan migrant workers going to Italy; and the kafala, or sponsorship system, in the Gulf Cooperation Council states.

In my written testimony, I go into detail about some of these abuses, and -- but we already talked about that, so I'll skip over that, but just want to emphasize two common themes that we see come out of these temporary-visa programs.

One of them, we talked about a little bit earlier is the role of foreign-labor recruiters or employment agencies sometimes also call foreign-labor contractors, and taking advantage of the lack of labor rights and inherent structural failures in these programs to exploit immigrant workers. The other theme that we see is the need to provide greater protections to workers and the opportunities for them to report abuses and advocate for their own rights.

We've already talked a lot about the issues of debt bondage as some of the problems of foreign labor recruiters. I want to get to some of the solutions. The Solidarity Center is a proud member of the Alliance to End Slavery and Trafficking, or ATEST, which is a coalition of 12 organizations including Julia's organizations and many groups that are currently in this room. And we have some suggestions for the reauthorization of the Trafficking Victim (sic) Protection Act of 2011 that would help increase regulation of foreign-labor recruiters that we think is key to ending trafficking.

In 2008, as you know, Chairman Smith, there were actually some of these provisions included in the House version of the bill. And then unfortunately it didn't pass the Senate, so it didn't end up in the final version. But we would really like to see it back into the 2011 version. And what we've seen is a number of service providers in the United States have said that greater regulation of foreign-labor recruiters and eliminating debt bondage would go a long way to preventing human trafficking in the United States.

So we're recommending, among many recommendations, first of all, strict elimination of fees, that no foreign-labor contractor agent or employee of a foreign-labor contractor should be allowed to assess any fee whatsoever, including visa fees, processing fees, transportation fees, legal expenses, placement fees and other costs to any worker. And employers, if they paid this to the foreign-labor contractor, should not be allowed to pass this on to workers.

The other key element that we're -- that we would like to see in the TVPRA of 2011 is greater disclosure, that workers are in the -- in a written contract both in English and the primary language of the worker, the written contract disclose fully the terms and conditions of work; and the details of that are in our -- in my written testimony.

Senator Cardin asked Ambassador CdeBaca earlier about some of the role of the consular officers. And I have to say that that pamphlet that was mandated in 2008, TVPRA, has made a great difference. We have a number of service providers who specifically say that workers in the H2A program and others who have been given T visas to the United States say they found out about services through that pamphlet. And so we think greater disclosure in workers' contracts itself would really go a long way in helping to prevent trafficking.

We also think that registration of foreign-labor recruiters is key. And our recommendation includes administrative procedures for the Department of Labor to register foreign-labor recruiters and that employers should be required to use a certified, registered labor recruiter or to face penalties.

The last two pieces that we'd like to recommend are enforcement -- I mentioned that there would be administrative -- that we recommend an administrative procedure within the Department of Labor, but that also workers need to be given access to civil remedies and rights to access U.S. courts to be able to enforce their rights.

And then finally, accountability; that workers must be protected from retaliation and employers must be held accountable for the actions of foreign-labor contractors that they hire. One of the big things that we are seeing as organizations that work on human trafficking for labor exploitation in the United States is that the threat of deportation is unfortunately being used against workers to stop them from reporting violations and from getting benefits of the T visa program. And we've actually seen a number of cases recently in the United States where it's taken years for workers to be identified as trafficking victims and get T visas, and that threat of deportation being used against them in keeping them suppressed.

And so we would also like to recommend a change in the 2011 TVPRA that provides temporary immigration relief to whistleblowers, to workers who are -- who raise the alarm about cases but that it might take them some time to be able to be found as victims of trafficking, so that during that time, they don't have to fear deportation, they don't have to fear threats; and instead, there can be an investigation done about the abuses that they're raising.

Just the last thing that I'll mention is -- I know Julia's going to talk a lot more about supply chains, so I'm not going to focus a lot on that -- but that when I was looking at the -- when I was asked to testify today and looking at the topic for this hearing, I thought it was important to mention another major trend in the global economy is the use of trafficking for labor (ph) and slavery victims all along supply chains; and that when employers, whether they're buyers, multinational corporations or others, demand cheap labor or unrealistic pricing structures, they should not be surprised to find severe labor abuses, including slavery in their supply chains.

Similarly, when employers contract out or hire unregulated subcontracted suppliers, they should not be surprised to find that there are trafficking victims in the production lines. And when employers refuse to enforce or claim that it is too difficult to monitor adherence to core labor standards in their supply chains, they will find forced labor, debt bondage and other severe forms of labor exploitation. And Julia, I know, will talk about the California law. ATEST is also advocating that it be included nationally in the TVPRA. But the one thing that at Solidarity Center we'd like to point out is that we think that there needs to be -- it needs to be looked at about how the U.S. does investigations abroad of products that are made with forced labor or slavery.

And just as an example, the Solidarity Center had a report in 2007 called "The True Cost of Shrimp," which looked at the seafood- processing industry both in Thailand, in Bangladesh. And we found severe cases of forced labor, human trafficking, debt bondage, especially Burmese migrant workers in Thailand. As a result of our report, the U.S. Senate asked ICE to do an investigation about what was in our report. And so ICE did what they call a "jump investigation," and they went to both Thailand and Bangladesh to investigate.

The problem is that they have to notify, of course, the Thai government that they were coming. And our partners on the ground reported that basically the supply chains are completely cleansed. They had two weeks' notice to know that they were coming. The books were changed. A lot of the Burmese migrant workers were sent off. And we have a lot of anecdotes I could tell you about that, but that basically ICE said to us that they had to say that they did not find anything that was in our report there. And it was basically because they had to let the government know.

And so we'd like to advocate to try to find a better way to do these investigations so that we ensure that products made with forced labor, human trafficking and slavery to not enter the U.S. market.

Thank you so much for this opportunity to testify. I look forward to your questions.

REP. SMITH: (Inaudible) -- Misra, thank you very much for your testimony and your work. And now, Julia Ormond, you're recognized.

JULIA ORMOND: I learn something every time at these things. I've learned so much from the previous testimonies. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and distinguished members of the committee and staff. I initially engaged about the issue of slavery and human trafficking shocked and spurred into action by reports of sex trafficking. Nothing then seemed to me more heinous than the repeated rape and violence that its victims endured.

The wide variety of the faces of slavery that I met -- the first were California-based. Other travels around the world took me to Russia, Ghana, Thailand, Cambodia, India and Europe, and provided me with a creepy and shocking perspective of how slavery pervades my own life, how I am unwittingly connected to it and ultimately connected to its systemic violence. People often ask -- it was a question that came up -- where in the world is this worst? My answer is always in my home.

It's simply not possible to sit easily in Los Angeles and forget the enslaved children I have met, children that I have walked away and left to an uncertain fate. And what keeps me up at night, what haunts me, are all of the victims' stories. I'll never forget the girl who crawled out of an eight-floor window for fear of her life in sex slavery. But I can equally never forget the child enslaved in the fishing industry, who jumped ship into the Thai Sea to float on a barrel for two days and a night before being rescued because that was his safest option; or the child who was chained, whipped and scarred for life while maybe working on our carpets; or the child soldier forced to burn his village, kill his mother and rape his sister for someone else's war; or the enslaved garment worker making my clothing or the footage of a Mayan agricultural slave in Florida picking my tomatoes. These people are no less deserving of all of our compassion than those forced into sex slavery. All victims of trafficking and slavery deserve our attention and our commitment.

In 2007, I founded the Alliance to Stop Slavery and End Trafficking, otherwise known as ASSET. ASSET's an advocacy organization dedicated to eradicating slavery and trafficking through amplifying the victim's voice and supporting systemic solutions.

I have come to define enslavement as when one person completely controls another person, uses violence or violent threat to maintain that control, exploits them economically and pays them effectively nothing. Trafficking is a process of enslaving someone.

Under the tenure of Ambassador CdeBaca, the 2010 Annual Report to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons stated that more people are trafficked into forced labor than commercial sex. Yet ask any member of the public what proportion of this issue is sex trafficking, and the usual response is about 80 percent. The International Labor Organization has recently stated that for every one person forced into the sex trade, nine people around the world are forced to work.

The forced labor of these victims taints many of the products that we purchase and rely on every day. To quote the TIP report: It is not possible "to get dressed, drive to work, talk on your phone or eat a meal without touching products tainted by" slavery.

The United Nations has repeatedly stated that trafficking has shifted from trafficking weapons to trafficking in drugs to trafficking in people, and now into children. United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime has cited that the profits from trafficking in people into Europe has now overtaken the profits in the trafficking of drugs into Europe. Yet, in the United States we spend more in one day still fighting the war on drugs than we spend in an entire year fighting the trafficking of people.

So we all have a role to play in supporting the solutions, and solutions, there are many. Every single place I travelled to, I specifically sought out solutions that just await the resources to scale to meet a drastic need.

In order to resource the solutions, however, it's vital to get the story straight. And media can play a crucial role. Sex will always sell, whether the story is good or bad. But we need the media to cover the issue fairly, proportionately. We need media outlets to set aside deliberate resistance of losing advertising revenue, and articulate how businesses can use their influence over supply chains to recreate the map to illuminate the worst areas of poverty in the world where slavery and trafficking can take hold.

As advocates, we need to do a better job articulating to the public the enormous challenges that today's complex supply chains present to business. We need to articulate that the CEO is most often not the criminal, that this is criminal activity tainting their supply chain most often around raw materials, but as we have heard today, on many other points of intersect along the supply chain, just as shoplifting is criminal activity occurring at the other end of the supply chain, at the point of purchase.

Only by rediscovering the supply chain and influencing each step of it by encouraging best practices can we implement real solutions, can the NGO work with the CEO. A supply chain without a policy of best practices is like a computer without virus protection: You will most likely become infected with a virus or tainted by labor violations.

We need companies to come to the table and collaborate in finding better solutions to work with governments and the NGO community who can offer victims safety and rehabilitation, and can assist vulnerable communities. We cannot accurately and efficiently access victims without the assistance of companies that influence infected supply chains.

I think one of the most crucial pieces that I've learned is that this is a verification of a process: Whether you are growing, picking, selling tomatoes out of Florida, or purchasing couture clothing, you will find slaves. The point is that the better your practices along the supply chain, the less you will find them, and the better your practices, the better your response will be at that moment.

ASSET's solution was to be primary sponsor of the California Transparency in Supply Chains Act of 2010, authored brilliantly by Senator Darrell Steinberg, who I have to thank deeply. This law comes into effect January 2011, and requires major retailers and manufacturers operating in California with over 100 million (dollars) in worldwide gross receipts to publicly disclose their efforts to eradicate slavery and human trafficking from their supply chains.

This law will apply to just over 3,000 companies, around 4 percent of California companies who represent an umbrella of approximately 87 percent of economic activity in the state. This new law is one small step in a long journey forged by others that ASSET joined.

I hope if it's applied well that it will represent a watershed in the sharing of knowledge, and will enable active consumer, investor and other stakeholder engagement, will encourage a pooling of resources, and will get us closer to concrete, measurable results.

The California Transparency in Supply Chains Act will for the first time enable consumers to choose to support businesses that are creating best practices, using their purchasing power to encourage them to bring their expertise and knowledge of supply chains into the equation. Investors can implement corporate governance and social responsibility practices, providing incentives to companies to elevate human rights and place them right at the heart of their strategy.

In one sweep, it'll educate companies unaware of a possible problem, not just of their own potential vulnerability but also the devastating impact of using company influence to drive profit up by forcing the prices of raw materials down to a level where labor violations and criminal activity and suicide are the outcome for the raw-material workforce.

It will create an environment where those companies already doing the right thing can more robustly and publicly turn it into part of their brand identity. And for the next step in the process to occur, Congress should enact federal legislation disclosing the presence of slavery, trafficking and all forms of forced labor in the corporate supply chain.

Post-globalization, where I have heard that the public trusts brands, identifies with brands more closely than government -- the supply chain is the modern vehicle through which today we can spread liberal democracy throughout the world.

Thank you for listening.

REP. SMITH: Ms. Ormond, thank you very much for your testimony, for being here again, and above all, for your advocacy that has led to enactment of this very important landmark legislation.

Let me just ask, if I could, Ms. Donaldson, you know, the assumption of goodwill or the potential of goodwill obviously undergirds the multilateral framework. You know, you -- obviously most, if not, all U.N., ILO, any convention has always a problem on the enforcement side. That's no fault of your own; it's just the way it works. But I think you said consensus can be built. And I'm wondering if the transparency supply chain act of 2010 might not fit into a best practice that the ILO could include in its framework of best laws that needs to be shared.

I mean, one of the important aspects of when we did the Trafficking Victims Protection Act was to share and to share, invite best practices so we could improve our own law but also to give it out liberally. And I remember giving a copy that John Finerty on our commission staff translated into Russian to a member of the Russian Duma, who then got some of it enacted in the Russian Duma. We want plagiarism, in this case -- (chuckles). So I'm wondering if the ILO is looking at this as a best-practice law that needs to be shared with the world, including the 14 agreements that you -- or the work you have going within the OSCE and elsewhere.

MS. DONALDSON: We are very interested to see how this law is implemented. And you know, we tend to see California as another country, just -- (chuckles) -- another economy. And it's very hard to be a big company anywhere in the world and not have California as one of your markets. So in a way, it may not need to be passed in every state.

But yes, we want to share good practices. And I might say, I see this as a part of a trend. And it's also because the USDA guidelines that have been issued by the Agriculture Department on best practices in agricultural settings -- I see in my conversations with companies that across the board, there are different things coming up. And maybe the most intensely discussed right now is actually around the conflict minerals.

But I hear companies, big ones, saying, well, the due diligence, that framework that the OSCE has raised, maybe we should use this in the context of forced labor or child labor. So it's creating a lot of cross-fertilization. But I do have to say the California law, I think, kicked it to another level in terms of more recent legislation.

So thank you.

REP. SMITH: Would you want to respond on that?

MS. ORMOND: This was a little law that just, I feel, kind of got us out of an impasse. It was a moment that we could capitalize on as an NGO thanks to the work that had been done by the ILO. I think we actually did take some of your practices -- (chuckles) -- we took an amalgamation of best practices, but the law is designed in such a way that allows the corporation to come in with what businesses see idiosyncratically within their own supply chain. Each industry has different, idiosyncratic problems that the NGO community can't really sit from the outside and dictate to them. Plus, they'll bring a totally different mindset and innovation to finding solutions.

So the law is designed in such a way that we make suggestions as to best practices, we make suggestions in terms of talking to the ILO, but we also open it up to say, just -- well, tell us what you are doing so that we can rate it.

REP. SMITH: Commissioner Cohen does have to leave, so I'd like to yield to him for any questions.

REP. COHEN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I've got a 4:00 hearing -- another ranking member -- but I want to ask Ms. Ormond, who were the main opponents to your law in California?

MS. ORMOND: (Chuckles.) Thank you for landing me in it. Well, let's put it this way: There was not a single business in California that supported it. And I think we were very lucky to have a governor who didn't veto it, and who stood up and said, it's -- you know, I'm asked if this is a job-killer, and I don't think it is. I think it's a lifesaver.

I think there are challenges. I don't want to presume that people go into it with malicious intention; I think very often, there are stumbling blocks that because we're not discussing it because there's lack of transparency, we can't get to the solution. So within different industries, individual brands and companies aren't actually sharing with each other what they're learning.

So I think as this -- the first step is to sort of move industries -- like, you have conflict minerals; you have the tech industries coming together to work on that. And in a parallel, you have people sharing best practices around cotton.

If we don't -- if we don't move it forward in terms of raising it up, then I think it really has a devastating effect. I think California Grocers Association --

REP. COHEN: They opposed the law and fought it?

MS. ORMOND: Yeah. And it took me by surprise because I thought, well, isn't this good for California? Can't they just verify immediately that their -- can't they verify more easily than somebody who's reaching out to the developing world? And I think we just haven't really gotten to the bottom of how they deal with undocumented workers. I think it made it difficult for them legislatively to answer to that, because we didn't really deal with it.

REP. COHEN: Did the chamber or any other organized groups of business, manufacturers, et cetera -- did any of them come out and work against it?

MS. ORMOND: Yeah.

REP. COHEN: They did?

MS. ORMOND: (Chuckles.)

REP. COHEN: Yeah? (Chuckles.)

MS. ORMOND: Yes. They did. I mean, we went back and forth. We had support from consumers and consumer rights -- we had a terrific support from socially responsible investment firms that represented $42 billion. And I think what we saw emerging was, the consumer is one stakeholder; the next consumer to engage through apps and writing letters and Internet and viral is the employee. Employees work better in an environment that they're happier with; they're more productive. You can go to the investor; you can go to shareholders with the proxy votes.

And what we want the consumer to understand is that they are not -- they are disempowered as an individual to a certain extent. But you rally them as a force together, they will drive what happens down the supply chain because they will demand that supply chains be cleaned up, or they will leave that brand and go to someone who is doing a better job.

REP. COHEN: Was the vote close on your bill?

MS. ORMOND: Sometimes. I mean, different -- there were --

REP. COHEN: Stages.

MS. ORMOND: -- different stages that we had to go through. What I have always loved about this issue is that it's a bipartisan issue. It's something that I will say in terms of the coalition, a task that we work on -- it's bipartisan. And it has to be, for longevity.

What I do want to say about the bill is, I think it provides an engagement point for the consumer to actually physically take action. There's a lot of awareness that people -- from an employee standpoint people can have; one little website that we participated in setting up sent off 97 -- has now sent off 97,000 emails to CEOs asking them, what are your practices? And until -- you know, they've got until January in 2012 to say "no response."

And I also -- if I may, just a bit before you leave, I want to talk about how when a supply chain is tainted, it may be tainted by very few individuals. But there's one example -- there's a terrific documentary called "End of the Line" which looks to the decimation of the fish population. Fishing is an industry that has a lot of issues. One boat coming in with two loads of cargo -- I wrote it down somewhere; I want to get it right -- one of those boats can come up with -- I think it was the entirety of Taiwan's quota for one fishing season.

So one or two criminals can decimate and destroy a supply chain. And I think that's what we're seeing in fishing; we're talking about having 20 to 50 years left of fish. It isn't those that have been given a quota and are meeting that quota that are causing that decimation; it's illegal fishing. It is illegal deforestation that is causing huge environmental damage. And if we don't look to it, I believe that that is where this issue feeds all the way through to being an international security issue.

REP. COHEN: I thank you for appearing before us, and your work, and the other panelists as well. And I wish I had more time to stay here, but I've got to -- a obligation. I've learned a lot. As you say you've learned, I learned from this committee. And there's no greater human rights champion than the chairman, and I will work with him on legislation to improve our work product.

You asked me earlier, do we have an audience? Well, you got a great audience here with Chairman Smith.

MS. ORMOND: Thank you.

REP. SMITH: Mr. Cohen, thank you very much, and thank you for your leadership. Let me just ask a couple of other questions, if I could. And I think Commissioner Cohen's comment, or your comment -- one of your comments -- was very well-taken about a corporation -- what corporations don't do business in California -- (chuckles). I mean, it's just about the world.

But I do think there could come in 2012 some real issues of faithfulness on the part of the corporations.

And so the question would be, how do we ensure compliance with the mandates of the California law? Would the federal law fill some gaps that perhaps dropped off as the legislation was making its way through, and would the additional firepower, if you will, of a federal statute further prioritize and ensure that these corporations are, indeed, being very faithful?

We found even when we passed the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, I had to hold an oversight hearing right here, nine months later, to ensure that major provisions where it said you shall set up a TIP office, you shall establish a T visa -- nothing in it said "may;" it all said "shall."

And even here, with the traditional separation of powers and the checks and balances that are obviously a very good thing, we had to have an oversight hearing -- and I chaired it -- to ensure that the major revisions were carried out. Because delay is denial, and I would be very worried that some corporations will game the system, be inadequate.

So what are the advantages of a federal law? And do other states have to pass a law, or would that be -- I mean, what corporations, again, like I said before, are not doing business in California?

MS. ORMOND: Well, one of the things that we do have to do is get the list of who the 3,200 companies are from the attorney general's office. And I think that's something, for instance, that you would want to put into federal law, that automatically the list of who is covered gets made public so the NGOs aren't scrambling to do that math.

There's a number of things. I mean, for me what the bill does is move us forward a steps so that for instance we pave the way for a commission to come in. Prior to the bill, the commission couldn't verify it, or certify anything. So it wasn't possible to do it.

But I also think that we have to kind of slightly change the mindset. I want to talk about fair trade a little bit, and how fair trade -- I should rewind a bit -- the greatest and most effective part of prevention is the alleviation of poverty, and providing people with alternative solutions. And I feel that's what fair trade goes in and elevates the process for people; they create communities who work together and keep each other on track. And they then give a premium to the farmers once they have helped them get them to the level of being an export.

And mangos out of Haiti would be a great example -- the mangos from Haiti that are sold in Whole Foods may well be something that elevates Haiti out of a really tragic circumstance. And I think we need to move towards that.

What I also like about the California bill -- people talk a lot about enforcement -- the consumer's going to enforce it. Out of 3,200 companies, say, there are 50 who comply, and the rest don't. You've got 50 brands for people to switch to. You don't have to wait for the attorney general to do anything. You've already clarified who's doing great work and who doesn't.

And I think that the federal bill will work. We've -- all the way through we had a collaborative approach to business, and that's the only way that you could get to the solutions. It can't be done any other way. And it will be fair and it will be reasonable and it will be doable for business. REP. SMITH: Yes, thank you.

MS. MISRA: So, I just -- I'm not an expert on this as Julia is, but I've heard a couple of things that I think is interesting. One, we've heard that the U.S. Chamber of Commerce is not opposing a national federal bill on this, because they do want to see kind of the playing field leveled in the sense that it would apply everywhere in the United States and not just in California, which is an interesting and surprising result from this. And I've also just been receiving a lot of emails from people about trainings that are already popping up. The University of Delaware is doing a training for sourcing managers on the bill, and so there is already, you know, companies getting ready in figuring out ways.

And then just from our perspective, we're an allied organization of the AFL-CIO, and we've already had conversations with unions in the United States about kind of taking the role that Julia's saying on consumers and holding people accountable. We know who a lot of the big players are in the sectors that we know that there's slavery, and sort of kind of start targeting them and making sure that that's happening. And, hopefully, it will -- it will trickle down.

REP. SMITH: Yes.

MS. DONALDSON: Just two observations. I think we are going to see a real mix. I've seen legal opinions online where the lawyers -- corporate lawyers say, well, the way you could interpret this is, you just say have to say what you were doing on monitoring forced labor, and you can just say you're not doing anything in particular and that's how to suffice ?) the law. And so you may see some of that.

I think that's going to be difficult because of the reports, like the reports required by the TVPA, which say, well, these are countries where we think there may be risk of problems. It's a little harder if you're sourcing from those countries to say, well, there's no problem in our (supply chains ?) that we've ever seen, and that takes care of it.

So there's no question that interaction between state and federal law is important. And I guess what I would say, we don't take a position on particular laws, but we are collecting best practices. We look forward to seeing what happens in this one. And I do think that the mix of laws and strategies going on is having a really dynamic effect.

And I will say one thing. Once companies leave denial and go into what -- "How could we do it?" and then they move to, "We have to do something" -- when enterprise and its ingenuity comes into play, amazing things happen. And I have to say, I'm getting excited about watching the companies that are at the front end of this, because they're solving problems that no one else has quite seen, and that's what we want more of. And I do think it's possible that that virtuous circle, spurred on by these different laws together, and maybe some federal laws as well, is going to create the process, is creating a process that we can partner with each other. Because no one company can solve these problems, and no one country, and that's why we say we have to really work together. And the activists have an irreplaceable role.

Thank you.

REP. SMITH: Let me just ask you with regards to your deadline or your goal by 2015 of eliminating forced labor worldwide, who on the board would make the decision whether or not to incorporate the new California law into a best law practice that needs to be looked at by other countries? It seems to me that if the U.K. and other countries were to -- you know, the House of Commons passed a similar law, the House here, obviously, and the Congress -- it would add an enormous pressure not just for reporting, but for accurate reporting, because the website would be scrutinized by not just California and the NGOs that are so concerned, like Julia Ormond's group and yours, but it would be a -- you know, it seems to be more hands pulling on the oar, the greater that ship will move and forced labor will be eradicated.

Who does that -- makes that decision?

MS. DONALDSON: Well, ultimately our body of countries (in/and ?) the international labor companies pass standards.

REP. SMITH: Right.

MS. DONALDSON: But we can do things much faster than that in terms of -- because that takes time and consideration -- to pull together best practices. And we are asked to advise countries all the time on how they might solve those issues. And so I'd be happy to come back and let you know exactly what we are doing on that, because I would -- I'll inquire.

REP. SMITH: Is it something that if we were to put together a letter from members of the House and Senate asking that the ILO look to -- both on a fast track and as -- you know, 2015 is not far away -- to look at bringing on line this very valuable -- and I would say there's nothing little about this, Ms. Ormond, as you said. This is huge. And one state the size of California could make all the difference in the entire world. But if you could, you know, we would -- we could put together a letter that would -- that would try to get you to adopt it as a best practice, if you thought that would be helpful.

MS. DONALDSON: Thank you.

REP. SMITH: Let me just ask Ms. Misra with regards to regulating foreign labor recruiters.

I chaired a hearing some years back when we discovered in the 2003 act, we put provisions in, in '05, when we learned that U.S. corporations were often complicit, either indifferent or there was woeful ignorance, which is two different ways of being complicit, not wanting to know.

And in Iraq, we asked, I asked, a number of questions at two hearings that we held jointly with the department, with the Armed Services Committee, about labor recruiters, particularly in Jordan, bringing in all these people who were slaves working with U.S. taxpayer money. And we keep getting assurances that's been fixed -- it's been fixed. I'm not convinced. I'm wondering what you think, whether or not that has been fixed, if you could.

MS. MISRA: Thank you. We're still hearing stories that it has not been fixed, and not just in Iraq, but also Afghanistan, that Jordan's being used. We've heard particularly of Nepali and Bangladeshi workers. And then it's also been very interesting with the Arab --

REP. SMITH: They were the same ones who were exploited previously and that we brought (attention to ?).

MS. MISRA: Exactly.

But it's also very interesting now with the Arab Spring and the numbers of -- you know, people have been talking about the refugees that are crossing the border from Libya and other places, but there's huge numbers, as you know, of migrant workers who are in Bahrain, who are in Syria, who are in Libya and other places, and so their fate right now is very interesting. And a lot of them are being told by the labor recruiters that brought them over there, well, there's nothing that we can do now, and they're -- and they're stranded. And so it's quite interesting.

And just the global economic crisis: In the United Arab Emirates for example, there's large numbers of Indian migrant construction workers who are stuck in the UAE; the jobs dried up because of the economic crisis and labor recruiters are refusing to send them back, and so a lot of them are just living in camps.

REP. SMITH: With regards to the Transparent Supply Chain Act, I know how Julia Ormond feels. Do you feel that there needs to be a federal law?

MS. MISRA: Absolutely, yes.

REP. SMITH: I know you had some recommendations, but the biggest problem I think we might face would be a Senate 60 votes that would -- might be hard to procure.

Do you have any recommendations on where it should be? Should it be in the TVPA reauthorization? You may have mentioned that earlier.

MS. MISRA: Yes. We actually -- so the coalition that we're a part of, ATEST, is recommending that it goes into the TVPRA. We think in some ways that might be a little bit easier to have it as part of the package. But also, a stand-alone bill, we would support both. And so, you know, we've been having a number of conversations with different senators and different congress people about --

REP. SMITH: Have you found -- and I did ask Ambassador Luis CdeBaca earlier whether or not the administration would present a model piece of legislation along the same lines as California.

Do you think that might be forthcoming?

MS. MISRA: I haven't heard it coming from the administration itself. I have heard of several representatives in the House that are putting that forward, and then our coalition, as I said, is supporting it. But Julie would know that more specifically.

REP. SMITH: Well, we hope the two meet.

MS. ORMOND: I would say -- I guess what I would just add is that I -- in all honesty, I think the jury's still out as to the best place for the bill, whether or not it be something that's folded into TVPA afterwards. But currently language that is being kicked around in terms of a federal bill is placing it under the auspices of SEC.

And I think in terms of is it worth doing nationally, is it worth doing as a federal -- I think the federal bill gives it more teeth and raises awareness of it throughout the U.S., and then the U.S. takes a leadership role.

But we currently don't have the list from the attorney general. So we need to do -- we need to run the figures again. Because if you've got 3,200 companies in California and nationally you would have 3,201, it would be nice to know, is it just once more? Is -- can we just go straight to the EU? And I just want to say that I -- it isn't a perfect silver bullet. It's a starting point. And I think it does remain to be seen how the community that works on this responds to it and gets imaginative around it. But there definitely are stumbling blocks. There are stumbling blocks around conflict minerals and rare earth minerals that only come out of the Congo. There are stumbling blocks in terms of human rights in China and places we can't get in. But I think it kicks the needle forward and challenges business to come up with -- help us come up with a solution, don't leave the table until we've made it.

REP. SMITH: Thank you.

Yes.

MS. MISRA: May I just say one more thing also? Just jumping over to the foreign labor recruiter provisions, since you're talking about national versus stand-alone bills and folding into TVPRA, I know there's been some discussions about having a separate bill on regulating foreign labor recruiters, and I really want to urge you and the House of Representatives to consider folding it into the TVPRA, because when it is a separate bill, it gets caught up a lot in comprehensive immigration reform and questions of that. And we think, while those are important questions to address, if we address foreign labor recruiters from the perspective of it being a trafficking problem and being able to address it in the TVPRA, we may be able to get a lot further than if we had it be a stand-alone bill that kind of got caught up in the comprehensive immigration reform. So -- but thank you for letting me jump that little piece --

REP. SMITH: No, if you could answer, because you worked extensively in Indonesia and elsewhere --

MS. MISRA: Yes.

REP. SMITH: How do you recommend we pierce a place like China, where a person even doing investigations into this kind of heinous activity could land themselves into prison for 10 or 15 years and be subjected to torture? Even the corporations often do a "see no evil, hear no evil" mind-set about the sources of their materials, because they don't want to be kicked out, they don't want their industry nationalized and they don't want to face potential jail time.

MS. MISRA: Absolutely.

REP. SMITH: I'm wondering how -- I mean, will -- on the websites, might there be a big gap when it comes to China especially?

MS. MISRA: Yes, and I -- and I wonder about that too. I will say, the Solidarity Center has a China office that we call where we specifically work on worker rights issues in China, and so I'm not the expert on that.

But I will say one of the things that we are seeing is that we're increasingly seeing worker actions. You wouldn't necessarily call them the same that -- as you see in the U.S. as strikes and other things, but we are seeing workers who are having many one-day strikes, taking to the streets, demanding more rights in the factories where they're working. And that -- we really think that that -- the U.S. really needs to be supporting those efforts that we are seeing of workers trying to speak out for themselves and enforce their own rights and do more in that regard. And I know our office would love to come talk to you more about that.

REP. SMITH: Thank you.

Would anyone else like to add anything before the hearing concludes, Ms. Ormond or -- yes.

MS. DONALDSON: This is on an earlier subject, but I thought I could just mention one of the things that ILO's been doing recently -- I think it was maybe in December -- we had a conference in the Gulf states, and it was primarily focused on embassy staff, economic officers from various embassies. And we were -- I think we were looking in particular in the labor trafficking issues from Nepal. But it was a very interesting way to have countries -- and I wouldn't be surprised if the U.S. was involved as well, but other countries there as well -- to develop a network of representative officers to work with each other to spot illegal-labor processes. And it was very productive, so we're looking at how to do that in other places, too. And so the requirements that have happened as they were discussed, and Ambassador CdeBaca was talking about, just to let you know, that's something that can be built on, because if that's their responsibility and they're talking to counterparts, then it creates a different level of looking at it.

REP. SMITH: (Inaudible.)

MS. ORMOND: Just to say thank you.

REP. SMITH: Thank you.

I want to thank our very distinguished witness. I do believe that S.657 is an historic bill that will have overwhelmingly positive consequences. So, I thank you, Julia Ormond, for your extraordinary leadership in crafting and using your persuasive powers, which are very real and compelling, to get that legislation. And I think you gave great, I think, accolades to the Senate, sponsored the president pro tem. And I think that was a very -- you know, it does take a lawmaker, but it does take people just like you and our two other distinguished witnesses to make all of this happen. So I thank you sincerely for your extraordinary leadership.

MS. : Thank you.

REP. SMITH: The hearing is adjourned.

Philippines welcomes US offer of continued support against human trafficking

LENGTH: 639 words

Text of report in English by Philippine newspaper The Daily Tribune website on 21 May

[Report by Gina P. Elorde and AFP: "Binay Welcomes US Offer of Support vs Human Trafficking"]

Vice President and presidential adviser on overseas Filipino workers' (OFW) concerns Jejomar Binay has welcomed the offer of United States government of continued support in the fight against human trafficking and illegal recruitment.

Binay also thanked its ambassador to the country, Harry Thomas Jr., for commending the Philippine government for its gains in addressing the two issues.

Thomas made the statement during the exit call of US Embassy Second Secretary Doreen Bailey at the Office of the Vice President recently.

The Philippine government was able to secure 22 convictions of human traffickers, including two Swedes sentenced to life imprisonment for running a cybersex den in Kauswagan, Mindanao in the last 10 months.

Thomas also commended the Inter-Agency Council Against Trafficking (IACAT) where the Vice President is chairman emeritus.

Thomas said he is pleased with the government's efforts to combat human trafficking and he is willing to continue working with the administration to keep Filipinos safe from the menace.

For his part, Binay renewed his commitment to fight human trafficking and work on removing the Philippines from the Tier 2 Watchlist of the US State Department.

Earlier, the Vice President told participants of the Trafficking in Persons Summit that human trafficking remains as one of the "most pressing challenges" of the Philippines. He then called for close cooperation among law enforcers, prosecutors and judges in addressing the issue.

"We must demonstrate greater results in efficiently investigating, prosecuting, and convicting both labour and sex trafficking offenders involved in the trafficking of Filipinos in the country and abroad; increase our efforts to vigorously investigate and prosecute government officials complicit in trafficking; dedicate more resources and personnel to prosecuting trafficking cases and devote increased resources to victim and witness protection," he said.

"As presidential adviser for OFW concerns, it is also my personal advocacy to see that we increase our efforts to engage governments of destination countries, through diplomatic and law enforcement channels, in the investigation and prosecution of trafficking offenders," Binay added.

Meanwhile, Binay expressed optimism for the passage of Senate Bill (SB) 2625, or the Expanded Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act of 2010, which is currently pending in the Senate.

SB 2625 seeks to amend the Republic Act 9208, or the Anti-Trafficking In Persons Act of 2003, to include policies to eliminate trafficking in persons especially of women and children; establish the necessary institutional mechanisms for the protection and support of trafficked persons; and to provide penalties for violation of this law.

Relatedly, two Australians and a New Zealander have been arrested after a raid on a suspected brothel following a stepped-up campaign against trafficking of women and children for sex, police yesterday said.

Investigators said they have yet to establish whether detained Australians Barry Burston, 69, and Raymond Anderson, 57, and Michael Watt, 59, from New Zealand, owned, operated or were customers at the suspected brothel.

Police raided the night club in the northern city of Angeles late Thursday and found 42 alleged sex workers, including a 17-year-old girl that had earlier been reported missing by an aunt, Criminal Investigation and Detection Group (CIDG) director Chief Supt. Samuel Pagdilao said.

"They (detained suspects) are being investigated by our women and children's protection section. We should be filing cases against them shortly," he added.

Bentley University Students Assist Massachusetts Governor's Council with Human Anti-Trafficking Policymaking

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 887 words

DATELINE: WALTHAM, Mass.

Bentley University issued the following news release:

A team of Bentley University student researchers from the Bentley Service-Learning Center and the University Honors Program is working with the Governor's Council to Address Sexual Assault and Domestic Violence to combat human trafficking in Massachusetts. Human trafficking is a form of modern-day slavery where people profit from the control and exploitation of others. The students' findings were presented to the Council on May 4, 2011, at the State House in Boston. A final report will be published in June.

"As of May 2011, Massachusetts stands as one of only four U.S. states that currently lacks legislation specifying human trafficking as a crime, and we are ranked by the Polaris Project in the bottom tier of states in its commitment to combating trafficking," says Jeff Gulati, Bentley associate professor of political science and the study's faculty adviser.

Although there are many forms of trafficking- for labor and organs, for instance - the Bentley report focused primarily on the trafficking of women and children for the purpose of sexual exploitation.

"We estimate that between 1,500 and 1,800 people were victims of human trafficking in Massachusetts in 2010," Gulati notes. "This amounts to the equivalent figure for forcible rape cases reported and ten times the rate of murder and manslaughter in the Commonwealth. Victims of trafficking crimes are at high-risk of becoming recruiters for traffickers of new victims and have children who are at high-risk of becoming involved in the sex industry."

According to Gulati, while there has been anti-trafficking policy activity in the U.S. and initiatives aimed at increasing international cooperation to combat trafficking and raise awareness, there is little research to evaluate recent policy initiatives and programs meant to combat human trafficking and address the effect on its victims.

"This is particularly problematic as the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) is coming up for reauthorization in Congress this year, and legislators are looking to recent research to help identify effective efforts," he notes.

Bentley students enrolled in the Honors Group Capstone course helped fill this void by devoting their thesis to assist the Governor's Council, policymakers, law enforcement, and service providers in becoming more informed about the issue and the effectiveness of current policies and programs related to law enforcement and prosecution; victim protection programs; and prevention. Created by Governor Patrick in 2007, the Council is particularly interested in supporting a new "safe harbor" law and other policies that address the issue of domestic trafficking of minors for the sex industry.

"The key to this project is raising awareness - legislators, businesses, healthcare providers, and the public-at-large are all impacted in some way by human trafficking" says Bentley senior Katelyn Horowitz, project manager. "It is difficult to get individuals, most of whom have no idea that this happens right here in Massachusetts, to take action without a solid understanding the problem."

The presentation contributes new information to evaluate current policies, and details specific policy recommendations and alternative ways of thinking about the problem. Researchers recommended focusing initial legislation on designating human trafficking as a crime and imposing lengthy sentences for convicted traffickers rather than social services or prevention programs, since the former requires less financial support.

Other highlights include:

* Prosecution: Increase the number of those convicted for soliciting prostitutes to attend a "john school," adding a location in Boston where most trafficking- and sex-related crimes occur.

* Protection: Share information with court advocates to ensure that they are familiar with the law and victims' rights, in particular immigration law and rights for victims trafficked into the United States.

* Prevention: Establish a designee to help businesses implement policies to prevent trafficking, including: monitoring their supply chain; suspending or terminating contracts with third-party vendors and suppliers that use trafficked labor; purchasing from fair trade organizations or companies with anti-trafficking policies; and providing training for employees in the travel industry to recognize signs of trafficking victims.

"This class truly opened my eyes to the terrifyingly widespread practice of this modern-day slavery," says Horowitz, who is majoring in Accounting. "I particularly appreciated the opportunity to study its relationship to the world of business ... a relationship that not many know exists."

Among the people on hand for the May 4 presentation were the Council's Executive Director, Sheridan Haines, and representatives from agencies and organizations such as the Massachusetts State Police Missing Child Unit, Boston Police Department and its Human Trafficking Task Force; Children's Advocacy Center of Suffolk County; City of Boston Women's Commission; Jane Doe Inc.; Massachusetts Executive Office of Public Safety and Security; and the Massachusetts Department of Public Health.

Jailed Swedes in Philippine cybersex 'nightmare'

LENGTH: 772 wordsDATELINE: CAGAYAN DE ORO, Philippines, May 13 2011

Two Swedish computer experts jailed for life in the Philippines on cybersex charges say they are living a nightmare among hardened criminals and insist they did nothing wrong.

Emil Andreas Solemo and Bo Stefan Sederholm were this week convicted of human trafficking for running an operation in which 17 naked women in an office building performed in front of cameras for overseas Internet clients.

The government hailed the verdict as a landmark victory in the battle against human trafficking because the Swedes were the first to be handed life sentences for what has in recent years become a booming cybersex industry.

But both men claim most of the evidence against them was fabricated or obtained illegally, and appear bewildered why they should be jailed for Internet pornography when prostitution is rampant across the Philippines.

"We don't see ourselves as human traffickers at all," Solemo, 35, said in an exclusive interview with AFP on Thursday from a crowded jail in the southern city of Cagayan de Oro where they have been since their arrest in April 2009.

Sederholm, 31, bristled at their portrayal by the Philippine press as modern-day slave traders.

"The women were not forced to do it. It was nothing like that at all," said Sederholm, who like his business partner was wearing a prison-issue yellow T-shirt, long shorts and a sandals.

Solemo, a tall man with gold-rimmed glasses and a goatee, said he and Sederholm were IT consultants who had been hired to set up the computer systems at the cybersex shop where the women worked in Cagayan de Oro.

Although they refused to say who hired them, they denied police charges that they owned the business and recruited the women, saying they only arrived in the country a month before being arrested.

The Swedes also pointed out that the women working in the cybersex operation were all adults -- prosecutors never alleged that minors were involved -- and said the case against them smacked of hypocrisy.

"Some say it's (cybersex) demeaning and horrible, but you can go to any city in the Philippines and see girls who are dancing on poles in skimpy clothes. It's absurd... there are places there that openly sell girls," Solemo said.

"What we have undertaken here would not have been considered as trafficking anywhere in the West. In the United States or elsewhere it is not illegal to undress before computer cameras if you are of legal age."

Sederholm said they believed they had become scapegoats to make authorities look good to the United States, which put the Philippines on a blacklist of countries deemed as not doing enough to combat human trafficking.

"They wanted to make a trophy case of us to show to the United States that something is being done about human trafficking," Sederholm said.

But the judge who delivered the verdict against the Swedes, Jeoffre Acebido, said anyone who sexually exploited impoverished Philippine women should be punished.

"Disrespect for Filipino women and violations of our laws deserve the strongest condemnations from this court," Acebedo wrote in his ruling.

"It will not shirk from its duty to impose the most severe of penalties against anybody, be he a foreign national or a citizen of this country, who tramples upon the dignity of a woman by taking advantage of her vulnerability."

Beverly Musli, the head of a local women's rights group that helped prosecutors gather evidence in the case, also said the Swedes deserved to be in jail.

"It's still trafficking because the victims were recruited from all over the Philippines and transported to the south," said Musli, who is a lawyer.

She said focusing on cybersex when prostitution was a widespread and open problem across the country was not hypocrisy.

"We are doing our best in stopping all forms of violence against women," she said.

Both Swedes said they had not given up hope that they would win an acquittal on appeal.

"You just can't bury yourself and say you'll not move, not eat. We have to keep going and hoping. Of course we will appeal. We're not going to lie down," Solemo said.

But they indicated they were struggling physically and mentally in the crowded jail, sharing a small cell with five other people accused of crimes including murder and drug trafficking.

"In some ways it's worse than a nightmare in that you can not wake up. It's the nightmare of not knowing whether we would be spending the next 20-25 years of our life in jail," Solemo said.

Sederholm refused to discuss his personal life.

But Solemo spoke emotionally about his own plight, saying his father died a month ago, his girlfriend had left him and he had lost 17 kilogrammes (37.5 pounds) while in jail.

US recognizes Taiwan's anti-human trafficking efforts - agency

LENGTH: 425 words

Text of report in English by Taiwanese Central News Agency website.

Taipei, 12 May: Taiwan has been one of the few countries in the world that deserves high recognition for its efforts to eliminate cross-border human trafficking, two US experts said in Taipei Thursday [12 May].

The two researchers, who are commissioned by the US Department of State, paid a visit to the National Immigration Agency (NIA), where they noted that Taiwan is listed as one of the top three countries that has combated human trafficking most effectively.

The other two countries are Columbia and Italy, according to Meredith Dank and Colleen Owens from the Urban Institute in the U.S., who spoke during a meeting with NIA Director-General Hsieh Li-kung.

In addition to the NIA, the two will also pay visits to other government agencies, including the Ministry of Justice and the Council of Labour Affairs, during their stay in Taiwan. Their goal is to better understand how the Taiwanese government and NGOs protect victims and collaborate to fight human trafficking.

For his part, Hsieh said the administration's efforts on trafficking prevention over the past several years have been productive and well recognized by the United States.

In the U.S. State Department's 2010 Trafficking in Persons (TIPS) Report, Taiwan was listed as a "tier 1" country - meaning it fully complies with the minimum standards of the US Trafficking and Violence Protection Act, Hsieh said.

According to the report, Taiwanese authorities took various corrective measures to fight trafficking in 2009, including banning for-profit marriage brokerage firms and implementing the Human Trafficking Prevention and Control Act, which took effect in June that year.

Those efforts helped Taiwan regain the top tier rating after it fell to "tier 2" in 2005 and then dropped another notch to the "tier 2 watch list" in 2006. Taiwan regained "tier 2" status in 2007 and remained there until 2010's annual review.

Hsieh said Taiwan's trafficking prevention efforts have been enhanced after the Human Trafficking Prevention and Control Act was passed, which laid out stiff penalties for traffickers, as well as protection and compensation for victims.

In the age of increased global mobility, said Hsieh, it is the common responsibility of government, enterprises and employers to ensure that basic human rights of foreign nationals in Taiwan - whether they are working, studying, or building a family here - are fully and effectively protected.

Philippines jails two Swedes for life over cybersex

LENGTH: 612 words

DATELINE: MANILA, May 11 2011

Two Swedish men were jailed for life in the Philippines for human trafficking after they were found running a cybersex den in which nude women performed for Internet clients, authorities said Wednesday.

Bo Stefan Sederholm, 31, and Emil Andreas Solemo, 35, were given the unprecedented convictions on Tuesday in what the judge presiding over the case and the government said should deliver a warning to all human traffickers.

"Disrespect for Filipino women and violations of our laws deserve the strongest condemnations from this court," judge Jeffre Acebido said in his ruling, according to the clerk of the court, Nelison Salcedo.

"It will not shirk from its duty to impose the most severe of penalties against anybody, be he a foreign national or a citizen of this country, who tramples upon the dignity of a woman by taking advantage of her vulnerability."

Salcedo told AFP the two Swedes were arrested when police raided a commercial building in the tiny southern Philippine town of Kauswagan in April 2009 and found 17 naked Filipinas before computer screens.

The women were given 15,000 pesos ($350) a month to act at the bidding of online clients who paid by credit card.

"Once the client has paid for a private show, anything goes," said Salcedo, adding the women used sex toys.

Cybersex dens have become a growing problem in the impoverished Philippines, according to law enforcers and social workers. Police have raided dozens in recent years and made many arrests.

But Salcedo said the ruling was a Philippine landmark because it was the first time a court had convicted anyone for their involvement in cybersex operations.

Justice Secretary Leila de Lima hailed the ruling and said it was part of a broader campaign against human traffickers that was launched last year after the US government placed the Philippines on a watchlist.

"The conviction sends a strong warning to other violators," de Lima told AFP. "This is part of our intensified, gung-ho efforts versus human trafficking as we continue to aspire for delisting from (US) Tier 2 watchlist."

The US government says being on its Tier 2 watchlist means a country is not fully complying with minimum standards for eliminating human trafficking, and a further deterioration could attract sanctions.

Remmy Rikken, head of the Philippine Commission on Women that advises President Benigno Aquino on women's affairs, said Tuesday's verdict owed much to de Lima's anti-human trafficking crusade.

Rikken said de Lima last year assigned human trafficking cases to a special task force of prosecutors, doing away with the previous practice of letting provincial prosecutors handle cases.

"Before that there would be a lot of arrests but there were no convictions at all," Rikken told AFP.

The task force tracks all types of human trafficking, including women and children being forced into prostitution or as subjects for pornography.

Rikken said that, before Tuesday's verdicts, 42 people had been convicted on human trafficking charges over the past two months but that none of them were for cybersex-related activities.

Three Filipinos who were arrested in the raid alongside the Swedes were given 20-year prison terms, according to Salcedo, the court clerk.

The Swedes attracted longer jail sentences because they had set up the operation and the three Filipinos worked for them, Salcedo said.

The five convicts have 15 days to appeal the court ruling, she said.

Par Kageby, senior consular officer for the Swedish embassy in Bangkok that oversees Sweden's consulate in Manila, confirmed the court ruling against the men.

"We learned that they have been convicted and sentenced to life in prison," Kageby said.

Palace Lauds Creation of Zamboanga Anti-Human Trafficking Task Force

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 661 words

DATELINE: MANILA, Philippines

The office of the President of the Philippines issued the following news release:

Office of the President Executive Secretary Paquito N. Ochoa Jr. News Release May 6, 2011 Palace lauds creation of Zamboanga anti-human trafficking task force.

Malacanang lauded the creation of an inter-agency task force to monitor and combat human trafficking crimes in the Zamboanga peninsula and expressed hope that such a mechanism can be replicated in other regions in the country.

Executive Secretary Paquito N. Ochoa Jr. said on Friday the establishment of the Zamboanga Sea-Based Anti-Trafficking Task Force (ZSBATTF) provides a major boost in the government's fight against the illegal trade of human beings and will help efforts to remove the Philippines from the United States watch list on human trafficking.

"The creation of inter-agency task force and establishment of anti-human trafficking units had been proven to be successful in reducing human trafficking in other countries.

We hope that it will do the same thing for us and the setting up of ZSBATTF is a good start," the Executive Secretary said.?? Ochoa issued the statement after receiving the report of Retired Police Director Felizardo M. Serapio, executive director of the Philippine Center on Transnational Crime (PCTC), informing the Office of the President that member-agencies of the ZSBATTF have formalized their partnership in the drive against human trafficking with the signing of a memorandum of agreement (MOA) last March 21.

The signing of the agreement was held at the Philippine Ports Authority-Visayan Forum Halfway House, Port Area, Zamboanga City, with United States Ambassador to the Philippines Harry K. Thomas as keynote speaker.

In the report, Serapio said the presence of Thomas "demonstrates the commitment of the US Government in the fight against trafficking in persons." "We have to show our commitment in getting rid of human trafficking, practically and sustainably. Human trafficking is a menace that deprives people of their rights and fundamental freedoms," the Executive Secretary said.

Last year, the US placed the Philippines in the Tier 2 watch list, precariously close to falling to the Tier 3 category which lumps countries that fail to meet the minimum standards of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of the US.

The Philippines has been classified a Tier 2 watch list country since 2007, the second straight year the country has been in this category. The primary duty of ZSBATTF is to conduct intelligence, surveillance and monitoring activities of trafficking operations within the Zamboanga International Port and Zamboanga International Airport. It is tasked to undertake a unified, coordinated and synchronized interception, arrest and investigation of suspected traffickers in persons as well as rescue of trafficking victims at the two ports.

In its first major rescue operation following its creation, the ZSBATTF had prevented 82 women, believed to be victims of human trafficking, from boarding a Malaysia-bound chartered aircraft at the airport in Zamboanga, considered a transit point in the south.

ZSBATTF is composed of representatives from the PCTC, Department of Justice, Philippine Ports Authority, Philippine Coast Guard, Bureau of Immigration, Department of Social Welfare and Development, Office of the Zamboanga

City Social Welfare and Development, Department of Foreign Affairs, Overseas Worker Welfare Administration, Philippine Overseas Employment Agency, Department of Labor and Employment, National Intelligence Coordinating Agency, Philippine National Police-Maritime Group, Philippine Navy, National Bureau of Investigation, PNP-Women and Children Protection Desk, Criminal Investigation Detection Group, Civil Aviation Authority of the Philippines, PNP Aviation Security Group, Bureau of Customs and Bureau of Quarantine, and the non-government organization Visayan Forum Foundation Inc.

Taiwan donates money to help human trafficking victims in Cambodia

LENGTH: 312 words

Text of report in English by Taiwanese Central News Agency website

Taipei, 28 April: The Republic of China government has donated 100,000 dollars recently to help three charity organizations establish teenaged girls shelters in Cambodia, a Taiwan diplomat said today. The donation, made on 27 April, was given to the Chinese Christian Herald Crusades (CCHC), the Fullness in Christ Fellowship (FiCF), and the Garden of Hope Foundation to help Cambodia eliminate human trafficking and protect affected teenaged girls.

Andrew Kao, head of the Taipei Economic and Cultural Office in New York, said at the donation ceremony that the ROC [Republic of China] government has spared no effort to uphold women's rights, protect human rights, and crack down on human trafficking.

Taiwan was listed as a "tier 1" country in the US State Department's latest Trafficking in Persons report released in June 2010, which means Taiwan fully complies with the minimum standards of the US Trafficking and Violence Protection Act, Kao said.

In Asia, only Taiwan and South Korea were listed among the "tier 1" countries in 2010.

He said Taiwan maintains no formal diplomatic relations with Cambodia, but is willing to help it fight against human trafficking - a problem that has constantly plagued the Southeast Asian nation.

Both Yeh Chi-ming, the CCHC founder, and Lily Chang, a New York-based executive of the Garden of Hope Foundation, offered their appreciation to the ROC government for its generosity.

Lily Lee, president of the Garden of Hope, Cambodia, said she plans to use the donation to establish a teenager girls home in Phnom Penh, Cambodia's capital. The home, to be called the Pleroma Home for Girls, will be followed by the building of other women's homes and girls schools to help victims of human trafficking.

The Republic of China government has donated US$100,000 recently to help three charity organizations establish teen-aged girls shelters in Cambodia, a Taiwan diplomat said Thursday.

The donation, made on April 27, was given to the Chinese Christian Herald Crusades (CCHC), the Fullness in Christ Fellowship (FiCF), and the Garden of Hope Foundation to help Cambodia eliminate human trafficking and protect affected teenaged girls.

Andrew Kao, head of the Taipei Economic and Cultural Office in New York, said at the donation ceremony that the ROC government has spared no effort to uphold women's rights, protect human rights, and crack down on human trafficking.

Taiwan was listed as a "tier 1" country in the U.S. State Department's latest Trafficking in Persons report released in June 2010, which means Taiwan fully complies with the minimum standards of the U.S. Trafficking and Violence Protection Act, Kao said.

In Asia, only Taiwan and South Korea were listed among the "tier 1" countries in 2010.

He said Taiwan maintains no formal diplomatic relations with Cambodia, but is willing to help it fight against human trafficking -- a problem that has constantly plagued the Southeast Asian nation.

Both Yeh Chi-ming, the CCHC founder, and Lily Chang, a New York-based executive of the Garden of Hope Foundation, offered their appreciation to the ROC government for its generosity.

Lily Lee, president of the Garden of Hope, Cambodia, said she plans to use the donation to establish a teenager girls home in Phnom Penh, Cambodia's capital. The home, to be called the Pleroma Home for Girls, will be followed by the building of other women's homes and girls schools to help victims of human trafficking.

Trinidad outlines tougher penalties for child traffickers

LENGTH: 543 words

Text of report by Caribbean Media Corporation news agency website

PORTOF SPAIN, Trinidad, CMC - The Trinidad and Tobago government has tabled new legislation imposing harsher penalties for persons found guilty of child trafficking. National Security Minister Brigadier John Sandy piloting the Trafficking of Persons Bill on Friday said that the near one-year-old People's Partnership coalition would not turn a blind eye to those involved in trafficking of persons. "Trafficking is a form of modern-day slavery where persons are lured for purposes including, sexual exploitation, forced labour, slavery and even the removal of organs (such as kidneys and eyes)," he said, adding that Trinidad and Tobago had been placed on a United States watch list of countries viewed as a transit and destination point for human trafficking. He said the country was also viewed as one which did not fully comply with anti-human trafficking laws. Eleven cases of human trafficking were noted in 2009. The proposed legislation notes that persons found guilty of trafficking a child will face a "minimum" fine of one million dollars (US$166,600) and imprisonment for 20 years. It notes that trafficking an adult would attract a TT$500,000 (US$83,300) minimum fine and imprisonment for 15 years.

These penalties will also apply to those who incite, organize or direct another person to traffic. Sandy said that business corporations involved in trafficking would also face a penalty of five million dollars (US$833,330) with employees also liable to face separate charges. In addition, the court would also be empowered to impose additional penalties such as forfeiture of assets and properties, revocation of licences, winding up and prohibition against performing any further activities, he added. Where a person who is convicted of trafficking in children had sexual intercourse with a child under the age of 12 years, the court can impose a term of imprisonment for the remainder of his natural life, Sandy said. The National Security Minister said that persons who knowingly receive benefits from trafficking in persons would be fined TT$400,000 (US$66,660) and 15 years imprisonment and for trafficking in children, TT$500,000 and 20 years imprisonment. Those who take away the victim's travel and identification documents will be fined TT$350,000 (US$58,333) and imprisonment for 12 years. Sandy said under the bill the court could also order compensation to be paid to the victim by the person convicted or out of the proceeds of any property forfeited. Sandy said victims of trafficking were forced to work as prostitutes, strippers, drug mules, smugglers, child soldiers, many are used for pornography. "For example, many prey on vulnerabilities by creating ruses that involve promises of marriage, employment, educational opportunities or a better life," Sandy noted. "We know of instances where women are brought from the South American mainland to Trinidad and Tobago. They are offered jobs and when they get on board the vessel, their passports are taken away from them and they never see them again. And they are put into other areas of employment not dignified for their own qualifications," Sandy told legislators.

Senator criticizes US anti-trafficking approach

LENGTH: 656 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, April 7 2011

A US senator urged reform Thursday of an annual human trafficking report, saying Washington has alienated key allies in Asia through its spirited criticism of their efforts.

The State Department last year put a number of Asian nations, including Singapore and Thailand, on a watch list, saying they failed to protect foreign women from forced prostitution. Singapore responded indignantly.

Senator Jim Webb, who heads the Senate Foreign Relations subcommittee on East Asia, said the report lacked clear metrics and caused "confusion and resentment" by lumping together countries with different records.

"I think we all support the intentions of the State Department to prevent trafficking and to assist victims. However, our engagement with Asia is in danger of being hindered by the approach of this report," Webb said.

Webb, a member of President Barack Obama's Democratic Party from Virginia, said that a friend in Singapore was "amazed at this categorization when you look at the quality of the government and the order in the society."

"If you compare the stability in Singapore to the United States, with its estimated 20 million illegals, many of whom came here through human trafficking, what's going on?" Webb said at a Senate hearing.

Webb also questioned the downgrade last year for Thailand, which was in the midst of major political upheaval, and asked why Nigeria was ranked higher than highly developed Japan.

Luis CdeBaca, the State Department's ambassador-at-large for human trafficking, defended the annual report and said it had led nations to improve their records, whatever their public expressions of dismay.

The fight against human trafficking "can mean telling friends truths they may not want to hear," CdeBaca said at the hearing.

Quoting an unnamed former skeptic, CdeBaca said the report "has made an indisputable contribution to the evolution of a global consensus around the problem of trafficking and, specifically in Southeast Asia, has served as the impetus for major reform initiatives."

He said Indonesia and Malaysia have both drafted laws against human trafficking in response to the criticism, although enforcement has been inconsistent.

Representative Chris Smith, who authored the 2000 law that established the annual report, also rejected Webb's criticism. He said past low rankings for South Korea and Israel had pushed the US allies to crack down on sex trafficking.

"Friend or foe, if their record is complicit with slavery, enabling of slavery, or not taking significant action to combat slavery, they need to be on Tier III," the lowest level, Smith told AFP.

"To the victim, they don't care if you're left-wing, right-wing, communist or a free democracy, if you're being trafficked, you're being exploited," the New Jersey Republican added.

The next report is due out in June. Last year, the State Department said South Korea and Taiwan were the sole jurisdictions in Asia that took full-fledged action against human trafficking.

CdeBaca strongly praised Taiwan, saying it increasingly offered support to victims of human trafficking while taking aim at their victimizers.

The State Department put a number of Asian countries on the watch list last year -- Afghanistan, Brunei, Laos, Maldives, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam. Worldwide, 12.3 million people were victims of trafficking.

Bangladesh, China, India, Micronesia, the Philippines and Sri Lanka stayed on the list, unchanged from a year earlier.

North Korea, Myanmar and Papua New Guinea remained at the Tier III level of countries that did not even meet the minimum standards on human trafficking.

The State Department releases Friday a separate annual report on human rights, often a cause of friction with nations such as China whose records come under criticism.

Both Webb and Smith questioned why China was not at Tier III on human trafficking in light of accounts of rampant sex trafficking of North Korean women fleeing the neighboring country.

Senate Foreign Relations Subcommittee on East Asian and Pacific Affairs Hearing;
"Combating Human Trafficking in Asia.;"
Testimony by Luis CdeBaca, Ambassador-at-Large, Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking In Persons, Department of State

SECTION: U.S. SENATE DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 2299 words

I'd like to thank Chairman Webb, the Ranking Minority Member, and the members of the subcommittee for the opportunity to testify today.

As Congress considers the reauthorization of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, I welcome the opportunity to work with lawmakers and to engage in frank discussions about what is working well in our fight against modern slavery, as well as those areas where we can strengthen and improve our efforts.

One of the most important tools at our disposal is the annual Trafficking in Persons Report. Last year, the 10th installment of the report was issued comprising narratives about the state of human trafficking in 177 countries, including for the first time the United States.

In the decade since the first TIP Report, the number of countries included has more than doubled. A more important statistic, however, is that since the first TIP Report in 2001, the number of countries placed on Tier 1--those countries complying with the TVPA standards for combating trafficking--has grown from 12 to 30. At the same time, the number of countries on Tier 3 has decreased from 23 to 12. Since the release of the first TIP Report, more than 120 countries have enacted anti-trafficking laws, the number of victims identified and traffickers prosecuted has increased significantly, and recalcitrant governments have taken the first steps toward curbing this heinous crime.

Of course, when we view these successes next to the enormity of the problem of modern slavery, it is clear how much work remains and that more than a decade after the passage of the TVPA, we have only begun to address the issue of modern slavery. And we cannot meaningfully address this issue without focusing on Asia.

The International Labor Organization tells us that the prevalence of forced labor and sexual servitude is higher in Asia than anywhere else in the world, where nearly three in every 1,000 inhabitants have fallen victim. The International Organization for Migration and the World Bank have shown that the majority of the more than 200 million transnational migrants in the world are from Asia. Within the growing pool of Asian migrants is a huge population of people who are victims of sex and labor trafficking.

The Asia-Pacific Center for Security Studies recently published a report which surveyed mid-level government officials, law enforcement and military officers from the region. More than 97 percent of those surveyed viewed human trafficking as a fairly important or very important concern in Southeast Asia, compared to 73.5 percent who said the same about South Asia, 54.1 percent in Northeast Asia, and 85 percent in Oceania. This statistic not only reflects the significant scope of the problem, but also the increased awareness among government and law enforcement.

Furthermore, the Association of Southeast Asian Nation (ASEAN) member nations have not formulated regional strategies to combat modern slavery as the Council of Europe and the Organization of American States have done.

While some countries in Asia have passed legislation to prohibit trafficking, governments as a whole have not yet shown the political will to hold the traffickers to the fullest account by imposing sentences commensurate with the severity of the crimes. Some countries focus solely on sex trafficking, but their efforts are misdirected by treating the women as illegal immigrant prostitutes or criminals rather than recognizing them as victims. Forced labor cases are sometimes treated as administrative violations, if they are addressed at all.

The unfortunate result of these ongoing problems was that the number of countries in Asia downgraded in the 2010 TIP Report was greater than the number upgraded. The specific findings in last year's TIP Report with regard to Asian countries paint an even more startling picture.

In recent years, we have learned a lot about the forced labor of migrant workers in the fishing and seafood processing industries. In a 2006 study, the ILO found that 43 percent of Burmese in the Thai fishing sector who have given over possession of their identity documents to their employers cannot access these documents when they want to. In many cases, the employers hold onto these documents purposefully to restrict their employees' movement, even though without them, migrants are vulnerable to arrest and deportation.

A UN survey of men and boys who were victims of forced labor on Thai fishing boats (which travel throughout the Pacific region) found that 29 of 49 (59 percent) reported seeing a murder by the boat captain. The problem of forced labor on fishing vessels in the Pacific region is one on which we are attempting to gain greater information and encourage governments to address. However, the inherently isolated nature of work on these vessels, and the legal jurisdictions of the waters in which these boats operate make this a particularly difficult challenge.

We know that there are tens, and possibly hundreds of thousands of foreign migrant workers - many of whom are trafficked - in the Southeast Asian fishery industries. While this problem is widespread, in Thailand, we are aware of only six traffickers convicted by the Royal Thai Government for the forced labor of foreign workers in the industry - all but one of whom were freed on bail after conviction, pending their appeals. While the convictions represented successes in Thailand's efforts to combat trafficking, their limited number speaks to the work that still needs to be done.

Farther east, Vietnam reported to us that last year, they did not criminally prosecute any labor trafficking offenders, but they fined 98 recruitment companies a total of $10,900 and revoked the licenses of two firms. That's an average of only $111 per firm and a total of less than what one worker pays to be recruited for a job abroad. During these last months before the release of the new TIP Report, we are working with our colleagues in the country teams of U.S. missions abroad to encourage significant efforts and commitments that can be reflected in the new Report.

Indeed, a lack of avenues for redress of complaints by Indonesian, Bangladeshi, Sri Lankan, and Nepalese men and women in many East Asian destination countries denies them justice and a chance of effective recovery. It also fails in providing a deterrent through tough criminal sanctions to traffickers. Clearly, we have to elevate the ramifications for this type of exploitation above the cost of doing business.

In South Korea, the government has had some success prosecuting sex traffickers and offering services to the victims. There is a known presence of women and girls in sexual servitude, including foreign women recruited to work on entertainment visas as singers and bars near U.S. military facilities. We know that women such as these often incur thousands of dollars in debts, contributing to their vulnerability to debt bondage upon arrival. The issue of child sex tourism - one that the U.S. government attempts to tackle head-on through extraterritorial application of relevant laws - is also one shared by South Korea and Japan, and the 2010 TIP Report sets forth how men from those countries fuel the demand for sex trafficking in Cambodia and other poorer countries. But unlike the United States, South Korea has never prosecuted one of its citizens for child sex tourism, and Japan's last prosecution was in 2005.

The reality is that enforcement regimes in the Pacific region are woefully inadequate. Resource constraints, corruption, and a lack of political will have created an enabling environment in which sex slavery and forced labor thrives, and exploiters rarely face meaningful penalties.

Yet clear successes are being registered, and those successes help illustrate the importance of the TIP Report as a tool for motivating government action on modern slavery.

In the past year, the Philippine Government has taken important steps to address the trafficking of its citizens within the country and abroad; the government has publicly linked these efforts to the threat of a downgrade to Tier 3 in the 2011 TIP Report. The hundreds of backlogged trafficking cases in the court system are beginning to be fast-tracked, corrupt officials are being identified and punished, the government has increased resources available to combat trafficking, and most importantly, mechanisms to improve the government's anti-trafficking responses are being institutionalized.

In Indonesia, a Tier 3 ranking last decade led to the establishment of a human trafficking task force and in 2007 the passage of anti-TIP legislation. In 2009 Indonesia prosecuted the largest number of labor trafficking offenders (79) of any East Asian government.

Malaysia's Home Minister credited the TIP Report as a factor leading to the passage of that country's 2007 anti-TIP legislation. In 2009, Malaysia was given a Tier 3 ranking based in part on a report issued by this Committee implicating Malaysian government officials in a trafficking scheme. Since that ranking, the government has increased the number of investigations and prosecutions, cracked down on trafficking-related corruption in the government, conducted a public information campaign about trafficking, and enhanced collaboration efforts with the NGO community.

While ranked Tier 2 Watch List just a few years ago, perhaps the strongest Tier 1 jurisdiction in the Pacific region is Taiwan - thanks to its political commitment to carrying out a series of tough anti-trafficking reforms. Now, foreign victims of trafficking in Taiwan stand a much greater chance of being identified, subsequently given assistance to get back on their feet, and gain legitimate employment with legal immigration status. Taiwan authorities have made a commitment not just to enforcement, but to victim care, and that's making them stand out.

In a region of the world where the challenge of modern slavery is so great, change is going to be slow and difficult. But we cannot allow slow progress to be used as an excuse to roll back what we know is working. Specifically, it is critical that the TIP Report remain a central tool in our government's anti-trafficking efforts.

The honest and thorough country narratives in the TIP Report take into account the findings of the U.S. government, foreign governments, and the wide range of civil society actors who are part of the fight against modern slavery. As mentioned before, a major roadblock to effective anti-trafficking efforts in some Asia countries is the denial by governments of trafficking problems. If we hope to motivate governments to take appropriate action to curtail modern slavery, accurate reporting must be the first step. This commitment often means telling friends truths that they may not want to hear. But as Secretary Clinton has said:

"Countries come to us and ask very forcefully not to be dropped in their category and we hear them out and we tell them [...] the kinds of things that we would look to that would demonstrate the commitment that we think would make a difference, to talk about best practices, to share stories. And some countries have listened and the results speak for themselves. Others have not.

Now this is a process that is fraught with all kinds of feelings and I recognize that, but the easiest way to get out of the tier three and get off the watch list is to really act. And we had some real friends, friends - countries that are friends on so many important issues, and they were very upset when we told them that they were not going to progress and, in fact, were in danger of regressing. And then they said, 'Well, what can we do?' And we said, 'Well, we've pointed this out, we point it out again, and we will stand ready to help you.'"

Additionally, the cases of governments citing the TIP Report itself as a specific factor in motivating anti-trafficking actions are too many to be ignored. As long as governments are moved to address the problem either in reaction to a bad ranking or concern about a potential downgrade, the value of the TIP Report in those cases is evident. Our office is mandated to monitor and combat trafficking in persons; the most effective tool we have in carrying out those two charges is the TIP Report.

Diplomatic engagement with governments in the Pacific and East, South and Central Asian regions has increased over the last two years. We regularly seek input for and responses to the TIP Report, and feed an ongoing dialogue on prospective improvements, centered on recommendations found in the TIP Report.

We have particularly ramped up engagement with governments facing a potential statutory downgrade to Tier 3, three of which are in EAP (China, Micronesia, and Philippines) and three of which are in South Asia (Bangladesh, India, and Sri Lanka). We have ensured that governments were made aware of this amendment to the TVPA and its implementation in the 2011 TIP Report starting in 2009. I have since personally discussed this issue with senior officials in four of these six countries.

During these last months before the release of the new TIP Report, we are working with our colleagues in the regional bureaus and at embassies abroad to encourage significant efforts and commitments that can be reflected in the new Report. The separate TVPA sanctions decisions-- to be issued by the President not later than 90 days after the Report's release--will likely ensure that other important US government equities are not adversely affected by restrictions on bilateral assistance or MDB lending.

Our office is mandated to monitor and combat trafficking in persons; the most effective tool we have in carrying out those two charges is the TIP Report.

Again, I thank the subcommittee for the invitation to testify today, and I'm happy to answer questions.

Nine Latin American Countries Appear on US Human Trafficking Interim Assessment

BYLINE: Robert Munks

SECTION: In Brief

LENGTH: 286 words

On Tuesday (5 April), the United States' Department of State submitted to Congress an interim assessment on the progress made in combating trafficking in persons (TIP) for those countries on its Special Watch List. The TIP assessment covers the six months following the June 2010 full annual report, and includes 61 countries globally on the list. Within the Western Hemisphere, nine countries were included in the interim assessment (Barbados, Belize, Guatemala, Guyana, Nicaragua, Panama, St Vincent and the Grenadines, Trinidad and Tobago and Venezuela). All of these, except St Vincent and the Grenadines, were classified as having made some, limited, or modest progress since the June 2010 assessment in areas such as enacting legislation, arresting and prosecuting traffickers, raising public awareness or providing shelters for trafficked persons. St Vincent and the Grenadines was described as having made "negligible progress".

Significance: Human trafficking remains a serious problem within the hemisphere, often existing sub-regionally between neighbouring countries with pronounced wealth disparities (such as Nicaragua into Costa Rica or Bolivia into Argentina) or out of Latin America and the Caribbean towards developed countries (most notably the US and European countries such as Spain). Notably, however, the seriousness of the problem is being belatedly addressed by most governments, as noted by the progress recorded everywhere except St Vincent and the Grenadines. With human trafficking often more profitable to organised crime groups than drug trafficking, the problem will nevertheless persist in the region until fundamental issues of social exclusion and income inequality are better addressed.

Statement Before the Subcommittee on East Asian and Pacific Affairs of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee

Id like to thank Chairman Webb, the Ranking Minority Member, and the members of the subcommittee for the opportunity to testify today.

As Congress considers the reauthorization of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, I welcome the opportunity to work with lawmakers and to engage in frank discussions about what is working well in our fight against modern slavery, as well as those areas where we can strengthen and improve our efforts.

One of the most important tools at our disposal is the annual Trafficking in Persons Report. Last year, the 10th installment of the report was issued comprising narratives about the state of human trafficking in 177 countries, including for the first time the United States.

The International Organization for Migration and the World Bank have shown that the majority of the more than 200 million transnational migrants in the world are from Asia. The issue of child sex tourism one that the U.S. government attempts to tackle head-on through extraterritorial application of relevant laws is also one shared by South Korea and Japan, and the 2010 TIP Report sets forth how men from those countries fuel the demand for sex trafficking in Cambodia and other poorer countries. But unlike the United States, South Korea has never prosecuted one of its citizens for child sex tourism, and Japan's last prosecution was in 2005.

The reality is that enforcement regimes in the Pacific region are woefully inadequate. Resource constraints, corruption, and a lack of political will have created an enabling environment in which sex slavery and forced labor thrives, and exploiters rarely face meaningful penalties.

Yet clear successes are being registered, and those successes help illustrate the importance of the TIP Report as a tool for motivating government action on modern slavery.

In the past year, the Philippine Government has taken important steps to address the trafficking of its citizens within the country and abroad; the government has publicly linked these efforts to the threat of a downgrade to Tier 3 in the 2011

TIP Report. The hundreds of backlogged trafficking cases in the court system are beginning to be fast-tracked, corrupt officials are being identified and punished, the government has increased resources available to combat trafficking, and most importantly, mechanisms to improve the governments anti-trafficking responses are being institutionalized.

In Indonesia, a Tier 3 ranking last decade led to the establishment of a human trafficking task force and in 2007 the passage of anti-TIP legislation. In 2009 Indonesia prosecuted the largest number of labor trafficking offenders (79) of any East Asian government.

Malaysias Home Minister credited the TIP Report as a factor leading to the passage of that countrys 2007 anti-TIP legislation. In 2009, Malaysia was given a Tier 3 ranking based in part on a report issued by this Committee implicating Malaysian government officials in a trafficking scheme. Since that ranking, the government has increased the number of investigations and prosecutions, cracked down on trafficking-related corruption in the government, conducted a public information campaign about trafficking, and enhanced collaboration efforts with the NGO community.

While ranked Tier 2 Watch List just a few years ago, perhaps the strongest Tier 1 jurisdiction in the Pacific region is Taiwan thanks to its political commitment to carrying out a series of tough anti-trafficking reforms. Now, foreign victims of trafficking in Taiwan stand a much greater chance of being identified, subsequently given assistance to get back on their feet, and gain legitimate employment with legal immigration status. Taiwan authorities have made a commitment not just to enforcement, but to victim care, and thats making them stand out.

In a region of the world where the challenge of modern slavery is so great, change is going to be slow and difficult. But we cannot allow slow progress to be used as an excuse to roll back what we know is working. Specifically, it is critical that the TIP Report remain a central tool in our governments anti-trafficking efforts.

The honest and thorough country narratives in the TIP Report take into account the findings of the U.S. government, foreign governments, and the wide range of civil society actors who are part of the fight against modern slavery. As mentioned before, a major roadblock to effective anti-trafficking efforts in some Asia countries is the denial by governments of trafficking problems. If we hope to motivate governments to take appropriate action to curtail modern slavery, accurate reporting must be the first step. This commitment often means telling friends truths that they may not want to hear. But as Secretary Clinton has said:

Countries come to us and ask very forcefully not to be dropped in their category and we hear them out and we tell them [] the kinds of things that we would look to that would demonstrate the commitment that we think would make a difference, to talk about best practices, to share stories. And some countries have listened and the results speak for themselves. Others have not.

Now this is a process that is fraught with all kinds of feelings and I recognize that, but the easiest way to get out of the tier three and get off the watch list is to really act. And we had some real friends, friends countries that are friends on so many important issues, and they were very upset when we told them that they were not going to progress and, in fact, were in danger of regressing. And then they said, Well, what can we do? And we said, Well, weve pointed this out, we point it out again, and we will stand ready to help you.

Additionally, the cases of governments citing the TIP Report itself as a specific factor in motivating anti-trafficking actions are too many to be ignored. As long as governments are moved to address the problem either in reaction to a bad ranking or concern about a potential downgrade, the value of the TIP Report in those cases is evident. Our office is mandated to monitor and combat trafficking in persons; the most effective tool we have in carrying out those two charges is the TIP Report.

Diplomatic engagement with governments in the Pacific and East, South and Central Asian regions has increased over the last two years. We regularly seek input for and responses to the TIP Report, and feed an ongoing dialogue on prospective improvements, centered on recommendations found in the TIP Report.

We have particularly ramped up engagement with governments facing a potential statutory downgrade to Tier 3, three of which are in EAP (China, Micronesia, and Philippines) and three of which are in South Asia (Bangladesh, India, and Sri Lanka). We have ensured that governments were made aware of this amendment to the TVPA and its implementation in the 2011 TIP Report starting in 2009. I have since personally discussed this issue with senior officials in four of these six countries.

During these last months before the release of the new TIP Report, we are working with our colleagues in the regional bureaus and at embassies abroad to encourage significant efforts and commitments that can be reflected in the new Report. The separate TVPA sanctions decisions to be issued by the President not later than 90 days after the Reports release will likely ensure that other important U.S. government equities are not adversely affected by restrictions on bilateral assistance or MDB lending.

Our office is mandated to monitor and combat trafficking in persons; the most effective tool we have in carrying out those two charges is the TIP Report. Again, I thank the subcommittee for the invitation to testify today, and I'm happy to answer questions.

Gov't agencies sign manual against human trafficking

BYLINE: Darwin T. WeeSECTION: Pg. S1/10LENGTH: 230 words

ZAMBOANGA CITY - Twenty-one government agencies led by the Department of Justice have signed an operations manual covering a sea-based task force to combat human trafficking in the region.

"The task force was convened [in 2008] with the objective of ensuring a well-organized and well-coordinated conduct of surveillance and intelligence-gathering and arrest of traffickers as well as rescue of trafficking victims," she said.

The task force is divided into four divisions that cover intelligence, surveillance and monitoring; operations and investigation; custodial; and legal task groups.

There are currently more than 20 cases pending at the regional trial court for human trafficking.

The US State Department earlier placed the Philippines under Tier 2 after it failed to comply with the minimum standards on elimination of human trafficking.

A Tier 3 ranking will mean financial sanctions for the blacklisted country.

Mindanao reportedly has the highest cases of human trafficking in the three island groups accounting for more than 50% of the total cases, said Visayan Forum Foundation, a civil society group.

Majority of the victims in documented cases were minors and more than 50% were women or children.

Ma. Cecilia Flores-Oebanda, president of the Visayan Forum Foundation attributed the large number of victims on the island to poverty and the unstable peace and order situation.

IOM AND MACAO SOCIAL WELFARE BUREAU SIGN AGREEMENT TO PROTECT RETURNING TRAFFICKING VICTIMS

BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 317 wordsDATELINE: MACAO SAR, China

The following information was released by International Organization for Migration (IOM):

IOM and the Macao SAR China have signed an agreement to ensure that victims of trafficking can safely return home and be reintegrated into their home communities.

In a project funded by the government of Macao, IOM will verify whether a victim of trafficking wants to return to their home country in addition to assessing security concerns both in Macao and in the victim's home community. Where applicable, IOM will organize a safe return home with IOM staff providing reception assistance upon arrival.

The Organization will also develop a reintegration plan with specific measures outlined to promote a victim's successful rehabilitation.

Macao, which is home to a thriving casino and gaming industry, is one of Asia's leading tourist destinations and according to the US State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons (G/Tip), has been a destination for trafficked women from mainland China, Mongolia, Russia, the Philippines, Thailand, Vietnam, Burma and Central Asia for commercial sex work.

The Office's 2010 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report classifies Macao as "Tier 2", indicating that the government is making significant efforts to stamp out human trafficking, but has not yet achieved "Tier 1" status and eliminated the problem.

In 2007, Macao established a "Human Trafficking Deterrent Measures Concern Committee" and in 2008 adopted legislation to combat human trafficking. This criminalized traffickers and provided a legal basis for law enforcement officers to deal with the issue.

In 2009, China signed the UN Convention against Transnational Organized Crime and its Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, signaling its commitment to step up efforts to stamp out human trafficking and improve victim protection nationwide.

INDONESIA ANGRY

Secret U.S. Embassy cables that implicated the president of Indonesia in widespread corruption sparked angry demonstrations this week in the capital, Jakarta, and reports of a billion-dollar lawsuit against the embassy.

President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono denounced the diplomatic cables as "character assassination" and denied any involvement in the schemes the embassy outlined in reports to Washington.

"Believe me, I am accountable for what I do," he said Monday night. "I, God willing, will continue to maintain the integrity because that is my duty as leader of this country."

U.S. Ambassador Scot Marciel expressed regret that the cables were leaked but declined to comment on the contents.

The cables, released to the Age and The Sydney Morning Herald newspapers in Australia by the anti-secrecy website WikiLeaks, claimed Mr. Yudhoyono protected corrupt cronies from prosecution and used the Indonesian intelligence service to spy on political opponents.

The diplomatic reports also said the president's wife, Kristiani Herawati, and her relatives enriched themselves through their political connections.

A December 2004 cable described how Mr. Yudhoyono intervened to stop an investigation of Taufik Kiemas, the husband of former president Megawati Sukarnoputri. The cable referred to the "legendary corruption of his wife's tenure."

It revealed that a senior adviser to Mr. Yudhoyono served as a political informant for the embassy and told U.S. diplomats that prosecutors had "sufficient evidence ... to warrant Taufik's arrest."

A December 2006 cable said Mr. Yudhoyono's wife "is increasingly seeking to profit personally by acting as a broker or facilitator for business ventures."

In Indonesia, the Jakarta Globe reported the Federation of National United Workers filed a $1 billion lawsuit against the Australian newspapers, although the newspaper was not clear about the grounds for the suit.

The Herald-Sun in Australia reported that the group also named the U.S. Embassy in Jakarta as a defendant.

About a dozen angry protesters picketed the embassy on Tuesday.

"The U.S. government must apologize over the leaked diplomatic cables, which have ... hurt the feelings of the Indonesian people," said organizer Ahmad Suhaimi.

WARNING THE PHILIPPINES

The U.S. ambassador in Manila is urging the Philippines to increase prosecutions in human-trafficking cases to prevent losing U.S. aid and falling further on a blacklist of nations that condone illegal child labor and sexual slavery.

"Clearly, the most important thing is how many convictions you have. So we'll see," Ambassador Harry Thomas Jr. told reporters at a human-trafficking seminar Tuesday.

The State Department this year put the Philippines in a category called Tier 2, essentially a watch list of nations suspected of lax enforcement of human-trafficking laws.

Mr. Thomas said the Philippines risks falling to the Tier 3-level of nations cut off from U.S. aid because they have failed to uphold international standards against human trafficking.

"If Category 3 happens ... that will be the end of humanitarian assistance," he said.

The State Department cited the Philippines as a "source country" for smugglers who sell men, women and children into forced labor or prostitution in other nations.

March 10, 2011 ThursdayDavid is new Bureau of Immigration chief*BYLINE: Ana Mae G. RoaSECTION: Pg. S1/12LENGTH: 246 words

RICARDO A. David, Jr., recently retired Armed Forces chief, has been named by Malacanang as the new Commissioner of the Bureau of Immigration, with a term that ends in mid-2016 or coterminus with that of the administration.

Presidential Spokesperson Edwin Lacierda said in a briefing at Malacanang yesterday that Mr. David, who replaces officer-in-charge Ronaldo P. Ledesma, will start serving on Monday.

"[Mr. David] has accepted his appointment as the new Commissioner of Immigration. This comes after the President signified his intentions to retain Mr. David in the public service after his retirement as chief-of- staff of the Armed Forces of the Philippines," Mr. Lacierda said.

"Mr. David's integrity and professionalism will be instrumental in the efforts of the Immigration authorities to cleanse its ranks and purge its services of past abuses and misuse of authority," he added.

Part of Mr. David's responsibility is to look into the alleged involvement of immigration officials in human trafficking, Mr. Lacierda said.

The Philippines is in the watch list of countries with high incidents of human trafficking, a situation when, if not addressed soon, will have an impact on development aid coming from Washington.

Mr. David was replaced by Lt. Gen. Eduardo SL. Oban, Jr. last March 8.

Mr. Ledesma, meanwhile, will likely revert to his previous post as chief of the Board of Special Inquiry which is directly supervised by the Office of the Commissioner, Mr. Lacierda said.

TEXT:

SMITH: The subcommittee will come to order.

And good afternoon, everyone. I want to thank you all for joining us on this very important hearing on the Democratic Republic of Congo at this critical juncture in its history.

As one might conclude from the significant media interest evident in the room, we do have a special guest witness joining us today to spotlight attention on the Democratic Republic of Congo. I'm grateful to Ben Affleck for agreeing to be here to share his perspectives and that of the Eastern Congo Initiative that he founded. He is to be highly commended for contributing his time, finances and fame to bring the world's attention to the needs of the people who have suffered far too long and in a great deal of security.

I would also like to recognize Ms. Cindy McCain, who is also with us today. Ms. McCain is a founding member of and investor in the Eastern Congo Initiative and shares Mr. Affleck's dedication to ending the suffering in this region.

She also has dedicated her time and energy to a number of other very worthwhile projects. For example, she serves on the boards of directors of several nonprofit philanthropies, including Operation Smile, which provides reconstructive surgery to children with facial deformities, and the landmine removal group, the Halo Trust.

Mr. Affleck and his organization are making a major contribution focusing political will on resolving the crisis in the DRC and bringing constructive recommendations to the table. But just as importantly, he is setting an example for all of us as to the need to correct whatever resources and influence we may have to help those who are less fortunate and without a voice to help themselves. And his presence, perspective and example -- for that this subcommittee is most appreciative.

I'm also grateful for our distinguished witnesses who are here as well. We look forward to examine aiding the administration's current strategy for and involvement in the DRC with principal deputy assistant secretary of the Bureau of African affairs, Mr. -- or Admiral -- or Ambassador Donald Yamamoto, and USAID's deputy assistant administrator for the Bureau for Africa, Raju Jandhyala.

We will hear about the Catholic Relief Services' experience in the DRC as well, particularly in addressing the important and widespread practice of sexual violence as a weapon of war from their sexual and gender-based violence adviser, Francisca Vigaud-Walsh.

And finally, the subcommittee again welcomes John Pendergast of the Enough Project, to learn from his extraordinary expertise in the region, particularly on the issues of conflict minerals.

Mr. Pendergast reminds us boldly in his testimony that the conflict minerals provision, section 1501, requires the administration to develop a strategy for addressing linkages between the trade in conflict minerals, armed groups and human rights abusers in Eastern Congo by January 17th. This strategy has not yet been submitted; however, I hope it's coming soon. And that will be an obvious question for Ambassador Yamamoto.

An individual from the DRC was invited to testify at this hearing, but unfortunately, arrangements could not be made in time. I can assure you the DRC will be an ongoing focus of our subcommittee, and I'm certain that we will hear from DRC citizens and indigenous activists at a future hearing.

My friends, I have had the privilege of traveling to the DRC back in 2008, and I still have vivid memories of both the suffering and the courage of the Congolese people. A highlight of my visit was meeting Dr. Joe and Lynn Lusi, founders of HEAL Africa Hospital in Goma.

SMITH: I met with several women who had been subjected to severe sexual violence, including rape, and spoke to many women who were in the process of healing and recovery. The courage, the resilience and resolve of these victims to overcome all that had affected them was truly astonishing. And the meticulous care and compassion of the hospital staff was absolutely remarkable.

I am pleased to note that USAID has supported fistula prevention and treatment in the DRC since 2005, including 1,000 repairs at the Heal Africa and Panzi Hospitals (ph) in fiscal year 2010.

2005, I would note, I sponsored legislation that included authorization of assistance to establish centers for the treatment of obstetric fistula in developing countries.

This legislation passed the House but did not get through the Senate for unrelated reasons.

However, Mr. Ken Hill (ph), then USAID assistant administrator for global health agreed to significantly bolster USAID's funding for fistula programming.

The women in the DRC, together with thousands of other women around the world, have benefited as a result.

As the prime sponsor of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000, I am especially interested -- and I hope the administration witnesses will address this -- about the DRC's tier 3 ranking as an egregious violator when it comes to human trafficking.

Has it improved since the Trafficking in Persons report was submitted and what has and can be done to reintegrate former child soldiers?

The Democratic Republic of Congo has an abundance, as we all know, of valuable natural resources, water, arable land and people, making the DRC a potential leader in terms of prosperity and development on the continent.

But like too many of its neighbors, it faces enormous challenges.

The people in the DRC have endured ongoing violence and bloodshed for decades and often has not been paid attention to, again, why I think Ben Affleck and the -- and the appearance today finally brings such much needed, often neglected attention to the DRC.

The country has been the scene of one of the longest and deadliest manmade humanitarian crises in the world, characterized by two major civil wars, involving seven neighboring countries, multiple cross-border conflicts, fighting by and among foreign proxies, militia groups and rebel movements.

The illicit activities including the illegal exploitation of mineral resources, an absence of governance, human rights atrocities directed against civilians by all parties, including the predatory Congolese military and unreliable U.N. peace-keeping force, which, I'm told, is getting better.

Millions of people in the DRC have died from wars and war-related malnutrition and disease since 1998. And nearly two million are displaced.

The sufferings of war have been compounded by horrific human rights abuses committed against innocent women and children.

The country, as a whole, faces enormous challenges. The DRC is one of the five poorest countries in the world, with 80 percent of its people living on just $2 a day.

Corruption is rampant, as evidenced by the DRC's ranking 164 out of 178 countries surveyed by Transparency International's 2010 Corruption Perceptions Index.

The country is 10th among the world's 22 high-burden tuberculosis countries, and malaria accounts for 35 percent of the deaths of children under the age of five.

Life expectancy is only about 51 years. An estimated 8.2 million, or one out of every eight people in the DRC are orphans and vulnerable children.

Clearly, this country and the surrounding region are in desperate need of peace and the coordinated efforts of the world community to prevent a complete loss of its people's hope for the future.

The upcoming presidential and parliamentary elections in November render this a particularly critical time to focus our attention on the U.S. strategy for addressing the many issues confronting the Congolese people and government.

And given that today is International Women's Day, this is a particularly appropriate occasion to recognize the courageous women of the Democratic Republic of Congo.

In addition to the hardships that unduly impact women in situations of conflict and underdevelopment, the women in the DRC have had to endure years of brutal victimization of rape and other forms of sexual violence used as a weapon of war.

An estimated 200,000 women have been raped there since 1998.

Their physical and psychological suffering has been compounded by the ongoing absence of measures to prevent future attacks, the impunity of -- with which the perpetrators continue in their communities or the military and the stigma wrongly placed on the victims by Congolese society.

A recent report by the U.N. panel detailed interviews held with victims of sexual violence in the DRC.

While the plight of all the victims is heart-wrenching, the interviews with those in the Kivus who are still experiencing ongoing armed conflict are worth emphasizing.

These women are desperately in need of the most basic necessities, medical care, housing and a means of supporting themselves and their children.

But when asked what they would have liked to have done to restore their lives and regain their dignity, virtually everyone responded that peace and security is their first and most immediate need.

They pleaded with the panel to convey this message to the world, because without peace and security, anything else that they might acquire could be lost again at any time.

A primary goal of this hearing is to answer these women's plea.

I'd like to now turn to my good friend and colleague, Mr. Payne, for any opening comments he might have.

PAYNE: Thank you very much, and let me congratulate you, Mr. Smith, on assuming the chairmanship of this committee and I certainly look forward to our continued working together on these issues of mutual interest and concern that we've had over the years.

Certainly want to also welcome the new Democratic members to the committee.

He's not here right now, but Mr. Carnahan is the former chair of the subcommittee that, in the last Congress, had jurisdiction over human rights, which, as you know, our committee has expanded that.

So he will certainly bring in experience there.

And as a dedicated advocate for the rights and the needs of refugees and displaced persons, women as passionate about assisting child soldiers as well as empowering women as peace builders, Mr. Carnahan's commitment to Africa runs in his veins.

His grandfather, A.S.J. Carnahan, became the first United States ambassador to the newly independent Sierra Leone in 1961.

And so he has a very strong interest and has had a number of conversations with me about Africa.

We also are pleased to be joined by Ms. Karen Bass, is not only new to the committee but she's new to Congress.

However, this former speaker of the California Assembly, the first African-American woman to hold a speaker's gavel in the history of this nation, and so we are very pleased and honored to have her as a member of our committee.

And so she's no stranger to legislating.

I welcome the opportunity to help Ms. Bass turn her experience and interest in health, women's rights and economic empowerment into policies that can benefit the enterprising women of Africa and their children.

I am excited to have this small but powerful team with us here, our committee.

I want to also recognize Representative McDermott, author of the bipartisan Conflict Minerals Act, which is an important tool for accomplishing long-term stability and economic growth.

And he's also the author of the AGOA Act, he's -- we called him the father, but he's gotten older, so we call him the grandfather now, of the AGOA Act. So it's good to have my classmate, Mr. McDermott, here today.

It is fitting, Mr. Chairman, that we begin our subcommittee business for the 112th Congress by highlighting a foreign policy challenge that resonates in the hearts and minds of so many members of Congress, Democrats and Republicans.

The humanitarian crisis in eastern Congo has captured the attention of thousands of Americans from all walks of life.

Our commitment to solving this problem exemplifies that Americans care deeply about these issues and really want to see a resolution.

As a former teacher, I know that we must understand the problem before we begin to attack -- to tackle it.

We must understand the history of the Congo and the Great Lakes region, perhaps the richest, most fertile area on the continent.

Many here today will talk about the ravaged (ph) militias that continue to terrorize the eastern part of the country.

I want you to understand that the ravaging began in the late 1880s, when King Leopold of Belgium savagely and gruesomely sought out to strip the Congo of its vast natural resources, which continue to be a source of conflict in that country back then and continues on today.

Leopold's nightmare reign in the Congo left five to eight million Congolese dead and even more maimed. The atrocities that we witness today are the vestiges of Leopold's bloody enterprise.

For decades, this region's wealth washed ashore in ships at ports in Anthrop (sic). And Congo's loss became Leopold and Belgium's gain.

As destructive as their rape of the Congo was on the country's natural resources, the impact on its people is immeasurable, and still plays out today. Yet its impact is still misunderstood and underestimated.

As we contextualize the gruesome violence in Congo, we know that this gruesome history is no excuse for the ugly reign of terror that armed groups, such as the FDLR and the LRA have perpetrated against the people of the Congo.

There is no excuse for impunity that humanitarian crisis in eastern Congo has captured the attention of thousands of Americans across this country.

Rape and sexual violence are used as a weapon of war in numbers that are simply unimaginable. In addition to the Lord's Resistance Army, led by Joseph Kony, continues to wreak havoc on parts of the DRC.

PAYNE: The DRC continues to face insurgency from armed major groups and major humanitarian crisis continues, especially in the eastern Congo, fueled by a resource grab.

The integration of many former domestic rebels from the CNDP into the Congolese army has presented serious challenges with professionalizing the security sector.

The current reconfiguration of the Congolese army units in the Kivus, in an apparent effort to eventually draw down the UN's Amani Leo Peacekeeping Operations have the potential to leave civilians in some areas of the east at the mercy of the FDLR and other non-state armed groups. All of this is compounded by the troubling political developments and turmoil in Kinshasa and the lack of overall preparedness for the upcoming elections scheduled for November.

The American people and indeed the world are not willing to watch idly by as women and children in DRC are victimized time after time, time and again, year after year. They have advocated over the last few years or we have advocated bipartisan legislation such as Conflict Minerals Bill and the LRA legislation. American's from red, blue and purple districts come together for the people of the Congo, that's a united effort.

The people of the Congo deserve to see firsthand the resounding impact that our relatively small foreign aid investment can have on the world's most venerable populations. Indeed while the human needs are enormous, the required economic commitment is miniscule when compared to the $100 billion yearly committed in Afghanistan and trillions of dollars we've spent in Iraq during our course of time there.

And the potential impact is monumental. The United States must leverage the goodwill that the American people have for the people of eastern Congo by devastating and having a coherent and a focused policy towards the Congo. That's what I hope we can have as a conclusion of these hearings as we move forward. I must close by saying it is fitting as Mr. Smith mentioned, that this hearing is on the 100th anniversary of the International Women's Day. Ending sexual violence as a weapon remains one of the greatest challenges to the protection of women's human rights while the survivors can be as young as a girl or her grandmother.

We can do all we can to end this scourge. The White House, the State Department, Capitol Hill and the American people all understand the importance of reducing violence in eastern Congo. This means regulating the trade and conflict minerals that act as an economic fuel to the conflict, creating the political will to reform the Congolese National Army from predators or making them from predator to protector and tackling impunity for war criminals and illegal actors that continue to enable those most responsible for mass atrocities.

The United States in its role on the United - UN Security Council recently demonstrated strong leadership on the passage of UN resolution 1960, which requires a council and member stays to honor commitments to combat sexual violence and conflict, investigate abuses and hold perpetrators to account. I encourage the United States to continue to lead on this issue by developing a strategy to tackle the root causes of sexual violence and other human rights crimes in eastern Congo.

The United States is the largest contributor to the United Nations mission in Congo or (inaudible) and the first country to pass a law monitoring publicly traded companies using minerals mined in the Congo or its neighbors in an effort to reduce the direct or indirect financing of illegal groups. The Department of Defense and State are engaged in initiatives to build capacity through military professionalization and justice training.

We must also ensure that we continue strong programs and policies that give women in the Congo back their dignity. We all want to see a day when the women of eastern Congo are able to feed their families, earn a decent living, protect and defend their communities and sit at the peace building table with the men.

Thank you Mr. Chairman and I appreciate this meeting and look forward to our very distinguished panel of experts. Thank you.

SMITH: Thank you very much Mr. Payne.

The Chair recognizes the Vice Chairman of the subcommittee, Jeff Fortenberry.

FORTENBERRY: Thank you Chairman Smith for convening this very important hearing and I think it is important to note that it is especially poignant that today is National Women's Day as we hold the hearing for the more than 200 thousand women in the Democratic Republic of the Congo who have been heinously victimized in recent years.

Last year alone nearly 15 thousand new cases of sexual violence were reported in the country. Thousands of which involved children. And those numbers don't reflect the many women who must remain silent, but this hearing today breaks that silence. The intense human tragedy in the Democratic Republic of the Congo continues to weigh heavily upon all of us. While numerous signs of democratic progress have been seen in recent years, civil strife has reached an unfathomable high in some areas, particularly in the eastern part of the country.

The social emergency is seen quite clearly in a recent study that revealed rape has increased 17 fold within the country. In the last Congress we made two significant strides toward mitigating two sources of the conflict by passing the Lord's Resistance Army disarmament and Northern Uganda Recovery Act of 2009 as well as the Conflict Minerals Provisions in another law.

We also directed millions of dollars in humanitarian assistance to the victims of sexual and gender-based violence but aid can hardly keep pace with the staggering numbers of new rape victims each year. Sexual violence in the Democratic Republic of the Congo is the worst in the world in both its pernicious scope and unrelenting brutality. The scourge of rape is especially prevalent in the Kivu Provinces where we saw last year a particularly monstrous series of systematic rapes by rebel fighters.

As we later learned these vicious attacks were committed less than 20 miles from a UN peacekeeping base, which only learned of the months long attack after a week - a week after their end. Since that inexcusable lapse, the UN with the Congolese government and other nongovernmental organizations successfully brought to trial and convicted nine FARDC soldiers including their commanding officers for crimes of mass rape last month.

I join with the United States government in commending this conviction. The rule of law did prevail. But there are many, many more perpetrators who not only elude justice, but flout the most basic notions of humanity through their brutal acts of extreme violence towards the daughters of the Congo. But our human rights concerns lie not only with the scourge of gender and sexual-based violence in the DRC, child conscription by rebel forces, but purportedly by the Congolese military itself continues.

UNICEF released a recent report this past Friday warning that despite the reintegration of as many as five thousand former child soldiers in the DRC, forcible child recruitment is an ongoing problem. As we give attention to the victimized women and girls of the DRC, we must also give special consideration to the plight of girl soldiers who are often victims of grotesque sexual slavery and violence as well.

These girls stripped of innocence and dignity face heartbreaking stigma and challenges as they seek to reintegrate into their families and their community. So today Mr. Chairman I do look forward to hearing the U.S. State Department and USAID's efforts to help bring peace to this tragedy worn country as well as the unique on the ground perspectives from the Eastern Congo Initiative, Catholic Relief Services and the ENOUGH Project.

Thank you all for coming today. Thank you for your important work and I look forward to our hearing.

SMITH: Thank you Mr. Fortenberry.

And I yield to Ms. Bass.

BASS: Thank you. Thank you Chairman Smith and Ranking Member Payne. Since this is our first subcommittee meeting, I wanted to start by expressing my sincere enthusiasm about serving on this committee on Africa Global Health and Human Rights. It's also an honor to serve with Chairman Smith. I know that you are committed to improving lives around the world and are particularly passionate about preventing sex trafficking. I look forward to learning about your legislation and working with you.

And to Ranking Member Payne, Representative Payne is well-known in my district in Los Angeles and I represent a section of my district as little Ethiopia and I have a number of African residents who live in the district and Representative Payne is well known there, as he is throughout the country for his effective leadership and ability to move policy that makes a significant difference around the world.

I'd like to thank our witnesses for your dedication to establishing peace and prosperity in the DRC. Your work truly keeps people alive and contributes to global security. The State Department and the USAID have played an important role in generating progress towards stability in the DRC, but the United States must continue to increase our strategic leadership in the Congo.

Secretary Clinton's visit in 2009 was a great start, but the severity of the violence and instability requires heightened and focused U.S. engagement. In fact U.S. leadership is needed now more than ever as we approach the November elections and we expect President Kabila to lift the ban on conflict minerals in the east as early as March 10th. I want to join my colleagues in acknowledging International Women's Day. It's been referenced several times, the consequences of the rape of women and girls, but one of those consequences is that women make up a significant majority of HIV infections in the country with little access to basic health services.

USAID has led the effort to provide healthcare and services to Congolese women and children. UNICEF coordinates effective programs for women and girls that reduce infant, child and maternal mortality rates and improve access to clean water and sanitation and increase primary school enrollment, particularly for girls who are often denied equal access. In the face of grave atrocities in the DRC, we must ensure ongoing investment in these programs.

I look forward to hearing the testimony of our witnesses today to learn more about how we can best support the Congolese people in addressing these hardships and ultimately transform their potential into prosperity. Thank you very much.

SMITH: Anybody else on the subcommittee that would like to be heard?

Mr. McDermott is with us and I know it is a little bit of a breach of rules, but I would like to yield to him if he would like to make some opening comments.

MCDERMOTT: Thank you Mr. Chairman. I - in 1987, 1988 I lived in Kinshasa and was a Regional Medical Officer for the State Department and saw the beginning of the AIDS epidemic as well as the conflict that ultimately led to Mobutu Sese Seko leaving and followed by Kabila and all of what has followed. I have many friends out there, the Lucy's (ph) are people I've known. A friend of mine from Los Angeles that I went to college with has been one of the big supporters of that organization and I've been there several times and I really came to listen today.

So thank you.

SMITH: Mr. McDermott, thank you very much.

I'd like to now introduce our two distinguished witness, leaders in the field who have done much. Ambassador Yamamoto is no stranger to this committee, having been before us many times in the past. He has served since 2009 though as the principal deputy assistant secretary for the bureau for African affairs of the U.S. Department of State.

His prior assignments included serving as U.S. ambassador to Ethiopia from November of 2006 to July of 2009, and as deputy assistant secretary of state in the Bureau of African Affairs from '03 to 2006.

And we're also joined by Ms. Jandhyala, who has served as USAID's deputy assistant administrator for Africa since October of 2010. In this capacity, she oversees the offices of Sudan programs and East African affairs. And has also has a great deal of experience at the department.

And I would, without objection, include both of your full bios in the record.

Ambassador Yamamoto?

YAMAMOTO: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

It is indeed a great honor to appear here before the committee, and I wish to express my congratulations to you, Mr. Chairman, on your appointment. And also to the great work that your predecessor, Congressman Payne. And also, before this, distinguished members of the committee.

President Obama, Secretary Clinton, and this administration have demonstrated a firm commitment to the challenges in this region. The violence, the human rights abuse, the suffering of the people in the Congo, exploitation of minerals and resources, are unacceptable and none of us should tolerate and we will not accept it.

The work raised by - the good work by your many witnesses, Mr. Ben Affleck, and by others, by Senator McCain, really are a testament to the power of what individuals can do in the Great Lakes area. And I also notice that my good friend, John Prendergast and other NGO groups who are here, whose work helped a great deal in moving this process along.

Let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, that the United States continues to play a very significant role to make a difference in the lives of the people in the DRC, and wherever there is suffering and tragedy. In the tense years following 2003, we led an international effort through our tripartite peace process to address the causes of violence and to end the tragedies that promotes violence.

I was greatly honored to help the process for nearly four years, making some two dozen trips to the region. Secretary Clinton traveled to the DRC in 2009, as have other senior administrative officials in the last two years.

Our overarching goals and objectives in the DRC to resolve it lies in governance and security. You need to have a government that is accountable to the people. You need security which is reliable and dependable, and not part of the problem. The U.S. has focused first and foremost on the complex security challenges facing the DRC. The shocking incidences of mass raids and other human rights abuses continuing in these areas are symptoms of several factors that feel or enable violence, each of which requires its own responses.

One key factor is the continued presence of violent armed groups. One of the most notorious are the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda, or the FDOR, and the Lords Resistance Army, or the LRA, retain a violence and committed core fully capable of carrying out brutal attacks on civilians.

The U.S. government has provided significant diplomatic and programmatic support to disarm, demobilize these groups. The fighting capacity of many of these groups have been significantly reduced in the last two years, but much more slowly than we wished it to happen.

The forces of the former National Congress for the People, or the CNDP, remain only partly integrated into the Congolese Army, serving under the effective command of known human rights abusers, and retain in their ranks significant numbers of children soldiers. The DRC security forces often compounded the threat to civilians. Developing or reforming these forces is a massive undertaking that will require years of persistent support.

Our assistance in this effort is aimed at both short term and long term progress, and includes of the training of (inaudible) vetted Congolese battalions, capacity building for the DRC's military justice institution, training to officers on the principles of leadership, civil/military relations, human rights, and command responsibility.

Those who trade in minerals and other natural resources also encourages violence. And the effective Congolese response and RICO international responses by governments and industries will be key to resolving these problems. The United States has focused on helping develop civilian regulatory capacity, helping to end the role of illegal armed groups, criminal networks within the security forces, and promoting corporate due diligence, and supporting the development of regional and national mechanisms to certify and trace the minerals trade.

We appreciate the support of the Congress that has provided these efforts, and we are consulting with the Securities and Exchange Commission, as you have directed, Mr. Chairman, as they develop regulations to promote rigorous corporate due diligence.

Underlying every element of the international communities' response to the DRC's security challenges is MONUSCO, the U.N. peacekeeping operation in the DRC. Under the leadership of the former U.S. ambassador, Roger Meese, MONUSCO has taken welcome steps to approve its effectiveness in civilian protection. We are also encouraged by the improved relations between MONUSCO and the DRC government.

A second theme is governance. The national elections scheduled for November of this year are an essential step in determining Congo's democratic future. We are watching closely to encourage elections that are well and transparently administered, and that are conducted in an environment conducive to free political expression.

Our other preoccupation is the area of governance is human rights. The lack of adequate state capacity, the indiscipline of existing state forces, continues to fuel existing abuses against civilians. We are undertaking substantial programmatic efforts, expanding on the secretary's 2009 of $17 million in assistance to respond to and prevent sexual-based - sexual- and gender-based violence.

We are also supportive of (inaudible) but encouraging recent developments in a few key areas, including the arrest and conviction of a handful of high profile alleged abusers, and the DSC government's proposal to develop specialized judicial chambers to prosecute those who committed atrocities. The general situation, however, remains one of impunity and many more positive developments will be required to reverse this trend.

The third theme is economic recovery, which is essential to providing alternatives to enlistment and armed groups, and laying a foundation for development. We are encouraging the DRC government to take the necessary steps to improve the investment climate, and to enhance transparency in the mining sector.

With the lifting of the ban on mining in the DRC's eastern provinces expected on March 10th, we encourage all state coders (ph) to work to ensure that minerals leaving the DRC can be traced to their origin, and that abusive armed forces are cut out of the trade.

Finally, it is worth emphasizing that the renewed cooperation among the DRC and its neighbors is the cornerstone of this region's future progress. The cooperation, while vastly improved over the last two years, will need to deepen further in the face of new developments, such as the emergence of the independent Southern Sudan.

Helping empower the Congolese people and their government to address the challenges they face will take and persistence. The U.S. government intends to remain a strong partner over the long term. The DRC has focused attention of the United States government, and the activities that are directed under the Assistant Secretary of African Affairs Johnnie Carson in coordinating it with our ambassadors in the field, interagencies, and our NGO community partners, and also the donor community.

Mr. Chairman, members of this committee, thank you for giving me an opportunity to speak to you today. And I'll submit a longer version for the record.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman

SMITH: Mr. Ambassador, thank you very much for your testimony.

I'd like to yield to our second distinguished witness.

JANDHYALA: Good afternoon, Chairman Smith, Ranking Member Payne, members of the subcommittee. Thank you for inviting me to discuss with you about the foreign assistance activities of USAID in the Democratic Republic of Congo, which is particularly relevant in recognition of the International Women's Day today.

My name is Rajaumari Jandhyala. I'm the deputy assistant administrator for Africa Bureau since October of 2010. And prior to joining the government, I had an opportunity to work on the continent for 17 years, including the Congo in the months after the global accords that were signed in 2003.

My testimony adds to the themes that Ambassador Yamamoto has raised about peace and security, progress toward governance, economic development, health and well-being of the population. As part of the Presidential Policy Directive on Development, which was issued recently, and in support of our policies toward - foreign policy toward the Democratic Republic of Congo, and Administrator Shaw's efforts to look at our review and look at our approaches to our assistance on the continent, we really have taken an effort to look at Congo as a very complex challenge in terms of like Sudan and in Somalia. So we really have a strategy review that's going on to look at our complex operations on the continent.

DRC is yet another example of a place where diplomacy and development are critical to assisting Congolese find solutions to their current challenges, lay the groundwork for meeting the aspirations of its population at the end of the day, and build a nation that contributes to regional stability. And in that effort, we work with both regional organizations, international partners and national institutions, both in the short term and in the long term.

The U.S. recognizes enormous challenges, financial resources required to improve the conditions, and in that regard the U.S. government continues to be the largest donor in DRC, providing $306 million in bilateral assistance in fiscal year 2010, plus support to the U.N. peacekeeping operations, MONUSCO, multilateral institutions like the UNDP, and U.N. agencies.

U.S. foreign assistance is coordinated among agencies through a country assistance strategy that outlines our plans for U.S.-Congolese cooperation in addressing the immediate needs, as well as long term development needs. In addition, we're one of 19 bilateral and multilateral donors participating in the common assistance framework established in 2007 with government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

This gives us the opportunity, as the international community, to really leverage our assets and how we bring pressure and establish a dialogue with the Congolese on development objectives in the Congo.

Mr. Chairman, I'd like to now review the major development challenges in DRC, and current summary of USAID activities to address them. A written testimony has been submitted.

The DRC, and in particular in the east, continues to experience instability, violent conflict and widespread population displacement. A key area of concern remains the Lord's Resistance Army. USAID promotes stability through community reconciliation, infrastructure, livelihoods recovery and ex-combatant reintegration.

Our offices of foreign disaster assistance and Food for Peace have ongoing commitment to provide emergency humanitarian and food relief where LRA are active. We're currently working as the regional strategy and support of LRA issues as part of our Northern Uganda strategy as well to find the linkages in CAR, Northern Uganda and Congo.

With regards to our -- with regards to conflict minerals, our activities are in support of the 2010 Dodd-Frank legislation, which includes reporting requirements for mineral origins. In DRC the illegal mineral trade fields armed groups and undermines legitimate economic dignity.

To reduce the security and governance problems regarding conflict -- trade in conflict minerals that result in the violence, USAID seeks to improve enforcement of the DRC mining code through our regulatory support, rehabilitation of roads, and build capacity for better monitoring and transparency, including certification.

Addressing human rights abuses and sexual and gender-based violence is a high priority for USAID. USAID Act provides access to support services for rape, abuse and survivors and their families, including medical care, counseling and legal aid where women are afraid to report to local authorities and how we deal with the local justice to support their efforts.

More importantly, we also support women survivors on livelihoods. Many times they are not participating in the community recover activities that are taking place.

In addition to addressing the immediate needs of the survivors, USAID has supported drafting critical legislation and subsequent prosecution related to sexual violence. And this continues to be an ongoing challenge, given the weakness in the justice institutions and sectors, and we are trying to work with both at the national level and the community justice mechanisms at the moment.

In turn -- turning to democracy and governance, USAID focuses on capacity building among legislators, civil society organizations and media. We also work to improve the independence of the judicial sectors and bring legal services to remote populations, such as mobile courts where they are possible.

And in preparation of the DRC's presidential and legislative elections planned for this fall, USAID continues to build on our strengths in citizen outreach and mobilization. More than 8.2 million voters across the DRC's 11 provinces are expected to be reached by civic education programs, and we are attracting and leveraging other resources to enhance the participation of the population in a transparent manner.

In terms of social services, health sector is our largest priority at the moment, given the violence and in terms of preventing a lot of the health related epidemics we find in the Congo. USAID seeks to strengthen primary health care. In addition to our continued support to HIV and AIDS, we also support malaria programs.

As Chairman Smith mentioned, we support two important Fistula Hospitals, which have treated over 1,000 women, who have received repair surgeries in 2010, and we hope to expand the outreach of those services. We've also brought together 12 providers of these services to ensure there's a network that they learn and exchange ideas on -- on these issues. And we also contributed to the national Fistula strategy in the Congo.

Lastly, in alignment with the Feed the Future initiative that USAID is investing in Africa, promoting agriculture sector as a means of economic growth is a high priority for USAID. In fiscal year 2010, programs assisted nearly 40,000 households and more than 500 producers, associations in improving agricultural management practices and use of technology.

In conclusion, despite many of the complex challenges to the development, U.S. foreign assistance is making a difference with children being reunited with their families after being abducted, trafficked or abused. Low-income women are accessing judicial system for the first time, and we're encouraging the expansion of that program.

Health care workers are gaining skills necessary both for preventative as well as curative measures, and farmers are learning better ways to grow and process and distribute their crops.

Across many areas where foreign assistance is needed, we're promoting an approach in DRC that addresses short-term, immediate-term and long-term sustainable development.

Members of the subcommittee thank you for your attention to development issues in DRC. And I look forward to answering your questions and providing additional information.

SMITH: Thank you very much for your testimony. And without objection, both of your full statements will be made a part of the record.

Let me start off by Mr. Affleck in his testimony with regards to the elections, and I know Ms. Jandhyala, you made the point that there's a $350 million gap as relates to the upcoming elections. And, you know, I would ask you if you could address whether or not you think that gap will be bridged and by whom.

And in his testimony Mr. Affleck says he requests that the U.S. government takes a hard look at its current commitment to support the elections and ask if -- if offering the assistance needed to truly support of free and fair election is actually there. He asked a number of questions, and he says the time for a decision is upon us. With national elections only eight months away, the U.S. is not focused on the Congo.

How will that gap be bridged, if you could, Mr. Ambassador? And secondly, with regards to the conflict to mineral strategy, which was due in mid-January, is that going to be forthcoming soon, or perhaps has been sent up today? Can you give us a timeline for that and maybe give us an idea of what will be included?

The issue of army reform remains a very serious issue, and I wonder if you could update us on -- on how military reform is proceeding.

On trafficking, Congo obviously is a Tier 3 country now. It has dropped. In the recommendations made in the TIP Report, one of the key recommendations is to investigate and punish military and other law enforcement personnel accused of unlawfully conscripting child soldiers, and then it goes on from there.

And I'm wondering if you could tell us, because this -- obviously, this report was issued last year in the beginning of summer, whether or not any progress has been made in the area of trafficking, both for sex and labor and for child soldiering, if you could address that.

On the Fistula repair, congratulations and -- and kudos to the -- to the USAID for the work you're doing on repair. At a thousand, do you anticipate that the numbers will go up in terms of actual repair of Fistulas and by how many? Do you have the glide slope asked to, you know, how you hope to build out the capacity of -- for Fistula?

And on the issue of faith-based, we will be hearing from the Catholic Relief Services in our second panel, and they make a very cogent argument as to why faith-based is critical in Congo, and I would argue for all of sub-Saharan Africa, if we want to mitigate HIV AIDS, if we want to combat all health issues.

The estimates are up to 70 percent, as you know, of -- of health care is provided by faith-based organizations or churches in Africa, and it would seem we would want to more faithfully utilize that -- that mechanism, and if you can't speak to whether or not that is where you think we go in the future as well as in the present.

And then on MONUSCO during my trip, part of what -- what caused me to go there was the ongoing problem. You know, it's bad enough that soldiers in the Congolese army and -- and militia groups are committing heinous crimes against women, but to our shock and dismay, we discovered that the peacekeepers in like manner, but in a very smaller number, were committing these kinds of crimes against young children.

Mr. Payne will remember that I actually have three hearings on the abuse by peacekeepers. We heard from Jane Holl Lute from the U.N., who was then heading up the office. She's now over at Homeland Security as number two. But she was emphatic that there needs to be a zero tolerance policy vis-a-vis peacekeepers and women and children. And at that time we were talking about zero compliance.

And I know that's changed, but we are told that there are some 33 allegations of sexual misconduct since January of '10 to February of this year. And one of my arguments has been you need to investigate is to make sure that if there is an allegation, it's followed up on. And there are now only two OIOS investigators in Goma, which I think enables, however unwittingly, that these crimes are committed, so if you could address that as well.

JANDHYALA: In terms of the elections that are being held in November, AID these it as part of a broader international strategy required to build a coalition on democratic transformation in -- in Congo. And we have three challenges.

One is a partner in terms of financial resources. We are contributing to a basket fund at the moment, and we're working with the European donors to see how that gap can be filled and how rapidly it can be filled in the coming months.

Second issue we're facing is the capacity of the national institutions to actually take international support and technical assistance with -- with some degree of support from our regional organizations. So in terms of funding, we have contributed 5 million to the -- the basket fund, and we're working with our other partners to see how we can fill the gap at the moment.

SMITH: Could I ask during the last elections how much we contributed? Do you recall?

JANDHYALA: I think we -- I -- I would have to get back to you. I don't want to give you a wrong...

SMITH: It was significantly higher. I know that.

JANDHYALA: No, it's -- it was well over, I think, $80 million to it.

YAMAMOTO: Just to follow up on the elections, you know, during the 2006 elections I was an observer with the U.S. government observers. And also the ambassador was Roger Meece, who is now head of MONUSCO. And as you know, Mr. Chairman, it was a very difficult, it was a very challenging process to register and just to identify who the -- who the voters are.

And, you know, we used a variety of resources-- the Catholic Church, who registered their parishioners, faith-based groups, who are working throughout the area. And so we used a variety of resources, the Catholic Church who registered their parishioners, faith-based groups who are working throughout the area and so we use very innovative and creative ways to do it. And going into the criticisms of the electoral process, we try to make it as transparent as possible and at each successive election to be better than the last one. And we have a country with so many challenges as the DRC and more importantly is a lack of capacity and institutions.

Those are challenges that we work with, our partners and also with the DRC to overcome in order to ensure that these elections are better than the ones before and that there is a system of progress. I guess I should go to your other questions.

(UNKNOWN): I you could.

(UNKNOWN): On the conflict minerals legislation that's being completed, this should be submitted to the Congress (inaudible) have addressed the issue on security and exchange regulatory process. And just to kind of briefly oversight, on the conflict minerals we're really enhancing how to protect those areas in conflict, enhance civilian regulation of the resource trade, protect artisan miners and local communities, strengthen regional, international efforts to monitor and protect civilians and then to promote responsible trader resources. And as you know Mr. Chairman, the DRC is perhaps one of the richest country in the world.

It's extraordinarily lush. It's green. It could be the breadbasket. I want to give you one story that - you know we've been talking to other donors in other countries who are benefiting from these minerals and resources, the Chinese. One thing that the Chinese told us that we found fascinating - there is more arable land in the Congo than in all of China.

Yet China is able to meet the basic needs of a population that's 20 times greater than the DRC, why is that? What is it that we need to do more with the - our Congolese partners to ensure that we have a rich country that meets the benefits of its people. And also the region you know? And the water productivity in that area can fuel energy for half of the African continent and so these are things that are really dramatic and things that we are trying to work on and we're very excited about.

The other issues too that I want to - issue is on the Trip Report. Yes on the tip the DRC is a third tier tip (ph). We have of course removed the DRC reluctantly from AGOA Benefits but it came after two years of consistently asking the DRC to address certain human rights abuses. And we offered assistance in helping support. And we will continue to do so.

We wanted to see that to the benefit of the people - it has to be part of AGOA, but it also has to address the needs of its people and those are some of the things that I know you are very passionate about Mr. Chairman and so are we to address those issues.

The next thing that you addressed is the efforts of faith-based groups such as CRS and other groups. You're absolutely correct. You know we provide right now on the continent anywhere from $6.4 billion to about $6.8 billion in total assistance to the African continent. Of that 85 percent is administered through NGO groups, most of them are faith-based and what we've learned on the faith-based is we've learned it is tremendous accuracy, low overhead costs and they have very creative and innovative approaches just as a lot of the other groups we have worked with.

And we must commend a lot of the works that they have done to address some basic (inaudible) problems that are facing Africa today. And let me just highlight one thing that addresses what my colleague Raja and what we in the United States government are trying to address, is how to you address the violence against women? And one of the things that we have worked with on the faith-based groups is some innovative programs which tries to elevate the status of women without - elevating the status of women to show girls that their moms are really the heroes in the family then we're going to have problems.

And one of the creative programs that we have is we have community based development. Another is we have kids who are in - going to community schools. Then we have moms who we give you know loans and we now know that women on average will repay loans at a rate of 95 percent, much higher than men. And then for the men, looking at agricultural techniques and technologies. And then have that community strengthen and bonded and it's sustainable. And what happens, we found is that it raises the status of women, helps girl's education and expands to other communities.

And so those are things that we have learned in working with our NGO and faith-based groups to expand. The next thing is, and then I'm going to turn to Raja is on the FARDC and on Monusco problems. In our approach, our $306 million area, we are looking at security sector reform. Without the security sector reform, you're not going to have a security force; a) which is reliable, dependable and accountable to the people. You want forces that are going to protect you, not be a problem and a source of crime and violence against the people. What we're doing right now is - on one area is to promote accountability through training and prosecution.

You need to have accountability and to hold people responsible for their actions. The other issue is advocating demilitarization's and strengthening payment systems to ensure that the security forces are going to be paid. We're looking at mobile banking services to ensure that money gets into the accounts so that, lets say the commanders are not pilfering the money of their NCOs or the other military trainees.

The other thing is to train police forces to serve as a basis to help protect civilians and protect the rights of civilians. The other issue is on Monusco. As you remember Mr. Chairman of course when Congressman Payne was also there, we looked at the abuse of MONUC and at that time the SRSR was Ambassador Swing and the ambassador was Roger Meece. We worked extremely hard to look at how we can do training and advancement programs.

So right now we're looking at our programs and projects on how we can advance and promote (inaudible) within the FARDC troops but also within Monusco now to ensure that you have the highest qualities. In that context, let me just tell you in the State Department, we have over the last decade trained 120 thousand troops, that's 36 battalions from 24 partner countries. And what they're doing now is to address African problems through African solutions.

Of those 120 thousand, 77 thousand remain in peacekeeping operations. We've monitored them. We keep track of them and of those, 33 thousand are in UN operations and we know that their quality is good and that they are tracked (ph) and maintain a high quality and that's what we want and need to do, not only in the DRC but in other parts of Africa where we see instability.

(INAUDIBLE)

(UNKNOWN): Thank you Mr. Chairman. On the issue about - on the issue regarding trafficking in persons, we're looking at - we're approaching it from a human rights issue and in that regard, we have spent approximately $3 million in anti-trafficking projects in DRC working with UNICEF in Ehuri (ph) district to reintegrate former soldiers, help them put in systems to monitor families and communities where this is taking place. In addition we are working with the International Organization of Migration to build awareness and capacity of the government of the democratic group to stop this and to address the issues raised in the tier 3 status that they've been given.

On the issue of fistula repairs, we're finding in our assessment of our current activities that so far we've dealt with repairs as part of the violence generated by - in the war - in conflict situation. But we think there is also fistula issues regarding the domestic violence and frequency of birth and the high number - and the population increases that are happening in communities. So we're approaching it both from - as a treatment for gender-based violence as well as domestic violence and sort of population issues regarding young girls who are having children quite young - at a young age as well as the number of children they're having, which is also another reason for the fistula situation in the Congo.

On the issue regarding faith-based organizations and working with communities, we believe a fundamental issue of community reconciliation has to be done through local organizations. Promoting community reconciliation can't be done at the state organizations or at the national institutions so we have done - we're at the moment working with our colleagues in OTI and other places in the east to see what organizational network, social networks that exist currently and how do we tap into those social networks including churches and mosques and other institutions on the ground.

In terms of elections, that's another challenge we're facing. As my colleague, Ambassador Yamamoto said, we view this as a transformation. How do we set benchmarks for assessing progress in that process? In 2006, I also was in Congo with Ambassador Swing's office at that time and we see that each election is an opportunity for us not only to fund the event, the idea of an election, but all of the consequences that we would have to deal with on the parliamentary - what institutions do we have to build for the next election?

So we are managing our resources between the immediate event investments as well as what it requires for state building and capacity on the parliamentary level. We're also preparing for the state level elections that have been postponed to see how we can encourage and revive that strategy with the government a little bit more. And lastly in terms of all of these issues Mr. Chairman that we're dealing with ungoverned spaces. So development in ungoverned spaces means currently we're dealing with the consequences of ungoverned spaces.

So of the eleven provinces in Congo, seven are viewed in the eastern areas which are considered sort of ungoverned on many levels, but there are 40 million other people in the rest of the Congo that we are balancing the immediate complex interventions for complex crises, but also continuing to invest in the other parts that are stable. So those are the issues that we're managing at the moment. In terms of the budget, Administrator Shaw is coming up to the Hill next week and I would leave that to him to talk about Congo as part of the broader budget issues.

SMITH: Thank you. I thank you both. Just a note not a question, I want to thank you for including in your written submissions some of the very laudatory and outstanding accomplishments, especially in the area of mitigating maternal mortality.

As you point out, we've enabled 300 -- over 351,000 deliveries.

And as we know, the greatest way of mitigating maternal mortality is by having a skilled birth attendant available to deal with complications, especially if a cesarean section might be needed.

So that is very good news contained in your testimony.

Mr. Payne?

PAYNE: Thank you very much.

The -- as we -- it's been mentioned, Secretary Clinton visited the eastern Congo. And she really was very moved and gave a very strong report about what was going on there.

I was on that trip although I left before she visited the Congo.

But the -- in my assessment, U.S. needs to refocus all parts of our government on achieving clear results in two critical issues, which were actually mentioned on her trip.

The first priority should be to bring greater stability and to reduce civilian suffering in eastern Congo.

And the second priority would be to ensure that next year's elections will take place, will be fair and free.

So I just wonder if you could just comment very quickly on those two. And I have a series of questions.

(UNKNOWN): You're absolutely -- you're absolutely correct, Mr. Congressman. Stability and -- it is key and that's really part of our security sector reform approach, which I just explained in the testimony.

And the other issue is on the elections. It's -- if you have -- the elections are a key indicator for those progress (ph). And, yes, there's going to be problems.

Yes, there's going to be areas that we need greater improvement on. And, yes, there will be questions on it.

But as long as we can continue to make the progress and development we have since 2006, we should be in good shape as we head to the next elections as well.

(Inaudible)?

(UNKNOWN): In terms of the elections, we -- after U.S., these experience (ph) in Sudan recently and the enormous international list that it took to make those -- the referendum happen, we sort of -- we -- I think we're working toward what institutions can we lay the groundwork for now, as we set the tone for both the subnational elections that we hope will take place.

And I think it's a commitment to the democratic transformation of Congo, is our -- is an -- a critical element of our AIDS (ph) strategy at the moment.

PAYNE: And you didn't have the dollar amount that we contributed to the '06 elections and what is in the budget for the '11 elections.

(UNKNOWN): Right. The '06, I can come back to you with that. I'm sorry about them.

On the '11, it's part of the budget discussions that Administrator Shaw would like to talk with as part of the overall Democrat DG budgets we're looking for within the agency, both for Africa and for the agency.

PAYNE: Because, of course, if we -- we could almost guarantee failure if we do not supply the appropriate -- it was daunting at the last election, which I attended also.

And simply the logistics of getting ballots to remote place, you had to use helicopters and thankful (ph), as I mentioned, South Africa was able to bring in aircraft to deliver ballots and then pick them up after the election.

So Congo is so important and we could almost, like I say, guarantee a failure if we don't have the proper amount of -- which, of course, comes to the Congress.

You know, you all don't appropriate. That's something that we need to perhaps have to have a discussion with us on this side of the -- of Washington.

The -- just have a -- could you give me a definition of difference between MONUC and MONUSCO? It tends to be -- gets grazed (ph) sometimes. So anyone have a -- want to try to take a shot at that?

I don't want either one of you to jump at it, but...

(UNKNOWN): In French, or...

(CROSSTALK)

(UNKNOWN): Yes. (Inaudible).

(UNKNOWN): Yes. The issue with the progress between MONUC and MONUSCO was on the mandate, in other words, to articulate exactly what the precise mandate would be for the U.N. operation.

And one of the things that was additional or added to that was it was circumstances will these -- the forces addressed, you know, these -- the FDLR, the LRA process.

And one of the additions to the MONUSCO mandate was looking much more at the LRA problem.

But I would have to go back to you and refer to other experts who know the precise technological and legal distinctions between the two.

PAYNE: Initially they were criticized -- I guess it was -- early on about their lack of aggressiveness in their Chapter 7 mandate. There had been a reaffirmation of Chapter 7.

And is there a more aggressive stance on the part of the forces?

(UNKNOWN): The problem with the definitions is this ability to respond.

I know that Roger -- SRSR Roger Meece has requested more air assets, in other words, to address the ability to rapidly deploy his troops to areas of instability.

And he gave the example of Equateur, where you had this armed group's (ph) coming in and taking over the airport temporarily, killing some of the U.N. peacekeepers as well as civilians.

But those are some of the major challenges that are facing MONUSCO today. It's not only the budget, but also the capacity to respond quickly.

(UNKNOWN): We've also made a commitment -- we've reinforced our message with the U.N. agencies that we're -- we are committed to a peacekeeping mission.

And we wouldn't be able to do a lot of our work without the environment being created by the peacekeeping mission in the East at the moment.

And we've made that message clear to the government as it -- Democratic Republic of Congo, who have come around to establishing a better relationship and improving their relationship with the peacekeeping mission.

And about the FDLR, initially they were very involved with the government in Kinshasa.

However, there seem to be a position where the Kabila government have been working towards the infiltration of the FDLR, in other words, have the agreement between Rwanda and the DRC, is there an effort -- at one time it seemed FDLR were even a part of the Congolese forces.

Have all of that changed and is the interharmony and the xfar (ph) that still roam around the eastern Congo still a problem?

(UNKNOWN): Yes, Mr. Congressman, the FDLR, you know, remains a continued issue.

From our tripartite process to today, we continue to work with the Rwandan groups as well as the Congolese because the FDLR is a threat to both countries and to the regional stability, and also to the violence against the civilians and really is a major stumbling block and obstacle to peace and stability in the region.

And so that is -- continues to be a top priority.

PAYNE: I had a chance to speak to Mr. Meece earlier in regard to even the CNDP. Now Nkunda is under house arrest in Rwanda.

Has that, therefore, lessened the tension there in the area? Or is his forces still roaming and doing destructive work?

(UNKNOWN): You know, the -- Nkunda's, you know, detention or house arrest in Rwanda is one area. But you still have continued members of the FDLR who continue to roam.

And then you also have other high-profile individuals who are creating havoc.

And one of them, of course, is Bosco Ntaganda, who's an ICC- indicted war criminal and part of the group -- he -- as you know, he fought with Kabila forces. And he's extremely well armed. And so that remains a problem.

(UNKNOWN): And also I think one of the issues we're facing with the FDLR in terms of community development and reconciliation issues is that command and control is not clear on different parts of the East, of where they have impact and where they don't in terms of command and control.

So I think both the bilateral agreement between Rwanda and Congo gives one framework.

But I think we'll have to work as international community at many levels, both at the political level but also within communities who have reached out to -- under the DDR program and other reconciliation efforts to see how we can minimize the damage that they do to the communities.

PAYNE: OK, my time has just about expired. But I just wonder, what is the prospect of a special envoy being appointed?

We wrote a letter back several months ago, asking that a special envoy be considered once again. You know, we've had -- Mr. Swing (ph) was very effective. And what's the status now?

(UNKNOWN): We're continuing to take that under advisement.

After the departure of Howard Wolpe last year, it -- there we continued to do the work that he has started, through our ambassadors and through Johnnie Carson has made trips as well as the secretary and other senior officials.

And began -- depending on the budget and other objectives, et cetera, we continue to take that under advisement (inaudible).

PAYNE: OK. Thank you very much.

Thank you.

SMITH: (Inaudible) Ranking Member.

Mr. Fortenberry?

FORTENBERRY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you again for coming and thank you for your testimony. The United States is constantly called upon to clean up messes throughout the world.

And now that's a testament to the generosity of the American people as well as to the philosophical ideals that guide us, and perhaps, as well, our unique position as a exceptional world power.

But with that said, what is the relative nature of our assistance compared to European assistance, particularly France and Belgium, given the colonial legacy here.

JANDHYALA: In terms of the United States, we are still the largest donor in terms of our support in bilateral assistance, but our support to the peacekeeping agencies in terms of our support through the U.N. service agencies like UNICEF. We continue to lead on this.

It depends also on certain sectors where our European partners have taken the lead in terms of the security sector, where the EU is in the lead. But in other areas we continue to be -- in other sectors we continue to lead in -- in regards to this.

(UNKNOWN): Do you feel this is disproportionate in terms of responsibility?

JANDHYALA: I think we are working with our partners to continuously find ways, because we partner with them on a number of other countries that are a priority for the U.S. government.

So it's -- it's a balancing act between, you know, Congo, Sudan, many -- Liberia, so we're in constant discussions with our British partners, our Norwegian partners, the EU, the World Bank, both on the bilateral to see. Where we bring our relative expertise, we lead. Where they bring their relative expertise and political will -- so it's -- it's a constant negotiation between us and our partners.

(UNKNOWN): All right.

The second question -- and perhaps, Mr. Ambassador, you could answer this -- it is against the law in the United States to provide military assistance to countries who use child soldiers. Now, we have exceptions for that in terms of national security waivers, and this country has received one.

But with that said, that doesn't absolve our responsibility from continuing to push at the highest possible diplomatic levels to end this pernicious practice. What specifically is being done in this regard?

YAMAMOTO: You know, we have, you know, overall on the child soldiers it's not just in the Congo, but it throughout the continent and, of course, around the world, as we establish on our G-TIP rankings and address -- to work with these countries to address those problems and to ensure that (a) they understand those problems and, number two, that they address them and, number three, that we work together to find a solution.

And throughout Africa and other parts of Africa from Chad and to other countries, where there are reports of child soldiers, we have worked with those troops that we've helped -- that they train to not only on lay vetting, but to ensure that they observe all the precepts and legal aspects that we have under our -- our laws in distribution of funding and assistance.

In the Congo area, it remains a challenge. But we remain committed to ensuring and to working hard so that the battalions that we train and also those that we work with our meetings the legal notes established by you and the Congress on the distribution of the assistance.

(UNKNOWN): That perhaps is an -- is certainly an appropriate response for those areas that are under -- that are under our direct influence, such as military assistance, direct military assistance and training. But in terms of a robust diplomatic push at the highest levels, what are we doing?

YAMAMOTO: We try to -- right now is we're working with the -- the FARDC troops, which is a major challenge, to work on military justice and also to ensure that they develop their justice systems to bring to justice those individuals who are in violation, not only those who have violated the law in participation in rape and human rights abuse, but also those who have conscripted and trained child soldiers.

And that becomes an accountability issue under the judicial and legal systems that we're trying to develop within the DRC. And that's something our USAID colleague is working on, and -- and where our part is working with to ensure the professionalization of the military as well as the police to follow up and to work with the -- the communities and centers so that these abuses do not occur.

But again, it's going to be a long-term process, and -- but we are making those efforts.

SMITH: The time of the gentleman has -- has expired.

(UNKNOWN): Thank you.

SMITH: Mr. Carnahan?

CARNAHAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And congratulations again on your chairmanship and leadership of this subcommittee. It's great to be here with Ranking Member Mr. Payne. We notice a slight New Jersey tilt to the leadership here, but we do appreciate you being here and really being attention to this topic today.

I just want to say a personal welcome to Ambassador Yamamoto for this leadership and for the time we spent with him in Ethiopia and for the great work that you did there.

This really -- this topic is very timely in terms of assessing our effectiveness in the international community's efforts to address these challenges from ethnic conflict, government corruption, extreme poverty and widespread human rights abuses.

And in particular the sexual and gender-based violence against women and children here on this day, I think, is especially important, being International Women's Day.

Also, we've heard many that have talked about the high risk of relapse there when there was concerted effort around the elections in 2006. Many believed that we mistakenly scaled down our efforts in terms of democracy, governments and political engagement. And so certainly, as we lead up to this next national election, I think it's important that we have a robust international engagement there.

I've seen some statistics with regard to there being over 14,000 new cases of sexual violence report in the DRC, including thousands of child victims. And my question is how is USAID and its bilateral assistance working to specifically address the needs of children in the Eastern Congo? And how is the U.S. assisting UNICEF in their efforts to address these challenges?

And I'd like to start with Ambassador Yamamoto.

YAMAMOTO: Thank you, sir. We -- we continue to look at -- you know, when I was traveling throughout the DRC before my ambassadorship to Ethiopia and then now here, is the issues of the high rate of violence not only against women, but against civilian areas and the high rate of death.

When you're talking anywhere from 800 to 1,100 deaths from violence each and every day in the Congo, it's -- it's unacceptable and prohibitively high.

What we try to do through our budgeting and assistance, and not only us but also in coordination with our donor community and with other groups, is to look at how we can address the needs of the communities to ensure not only security sector reforms, but also to look at how we can bring strength and guidance into these communities to protect themselves against the violence.

And that encourages not only security sector reforms to address the -- the training of forces, but also on the other side of the justice system to hold people accountable and that they go through court procedures and processes.

And I want to turn to my colleague, Raju, who can kind of go into details on the programs that we have implemented.

CARNAHAN: Great. Thank you.

JANDHYALA: In terms of the sexual and gender-based violence, we work sort of on three levels. One is to survivors have access to critical care and treatment and that both women and children come through our service providers.

Second is to ask band the current -- we have 5,000 local service providers that we want to expand the number of those providers that provide services to children.

And then lastly, we deal with 250 local organizations to deal with psychological counseling and treatment.

And in terms of UNICEF, we have worked with them in Ituri in eastern Congo on protection, on medical services, on psychosocial services, and about 1,000 children have gone through all three of them. They -- they come in -- in waves, and we support UNICEF and fund them for the services throughout eastern Congo. And they then use those services to deal with community.

The issues of women and children, at least in AID portfolio, we deal with in terms of reconciliation at the community level, livelihoods. We have youth issues. A large part of it is youth. And then we also deal with them through health care and then local administration issues.

So we -- we kind of view it as a cross-cutting issue. Where we have opportunities to support women and children, it should be something that goes across all of our intervention in addition to the targeted interventions we provide for specific -- specific treatment.

CARNAHAN: Thank you.

SMITH: Thank you.

Ms. Bass?

Thank you, Russ.

BASS: You've made several -- both of you have made several references to the upcoming elections, and I just wanted to ask if you could specifically talk about what specific steps you think the United States could or should take immediately and in the upcoming months to assist in helping to prevent a fraudulent selection.

If there is hope that it could be done in a way, given the decision that was made to revise the constitution in January to reduce the number of election rounds from two to one, is there hope that it could be viewed legitimately? And then what contingency plans are the U.S. and the international community discussing, should violence occur?

I mean, I know it's not an automatic that because they made that constitutional change, that it's going to be viewed fraudulently, but...

YAMAMOTO: Very important on the violence is, obviously, the MUNESCO plays a critical role as far as on this security, but also on the electoral process, as in 2006, they were very key in getting the ballots out and bringing the ballots back.

Right now it's USAID has provided $5 million for training, voter registration and voter education, which remains key, and also to continue to reach out through the education process to bring in as many of the people who are eligible to vote to vote, to be a participant in these election -- electoral process.

The other issue, too, is on the ballot counting as well. What we have done is to ensure that all the opposition groups do have members at the -- at the areas where the ballots are being counted. We have met very rigorously with all the opposition leaders who are potential candidates for the presidency, as well as many of the local candidates.

And -- and on the presidential level, obviously, that's Mobutu and Kameherhe, the -- the former speaker, the parliamentary speaker, as well as President Kabila himself. And to understand and not only monitoring the conflict minerals, but also tracking it, and also how it's being utilized, and denying those illegal traders from benefiting from those conflict minerals.

What I think the legislation and what it does is strengthen the support of what we've been doing over the last several years, which is to - the people and the civilians in areas where you have, you know, tungsten, titanium, tantalum and timber, have them benefit from the resources that are being mined. And I think that legislation helps us in that regard, and has strengthened those communities.

And then, the other issue too is to hold not only traders, but also smelters and endusers accountable to ensure that those monies and funds will benefit the people as well as those who are trading.

JANDHYALA: I think the impact of the legislation has been that the due diligence that the companies are taking this seriously. We see a lot of companies that we are working that we are working with the government to say how do we establish due diligence in this regard?

The second area of impact is our ability to have them look at it as part of a broader - the extractive ECI (ph) framework that we're providing technical assistance. And largely at the community level, again, is what role do they play in monitoring and tracking?

And in that regard, we've invested in infrastructure to access these remote sites, and by preventing people from traveling in between these sites, they've been able to keep this process going. So we're also investing in rural infrastructure to access to these areas where we think that there's a high instance of trafficking in conflict minerals.

MCDERMOTT: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

SMITH: Thank you, Mr. McDermott:

I'd like to thank our distinguished panel for your testimony. I would just echo the words of my good friend, the Ranking Member Mr. Payne. Both he and I strongly hope that you will consider a special envoy or a special representative.

Mr. Affleck makes a very strong and passionate appeal for this in his testimony. I hope you stick around to hear it. And Mr. Prendergast does the same. And as a matter of fact, he even says why is U.S. failing and what can be done about it? And that's one of his chief recommendations. So please name that special envoy, so we have a truly coordinated strategy.

I'd like to now welcome our next panel, panel number two, beginning with Mr. Ben Affleck, who is the founder of the Eastern Congo Initiative. In addition to a successful career as an actor, writer and director, Mr. Affleck is also a passionate advocate and philanthropist.

In March of 2010 he founded the Eastern Congo Initiative, or ECI, an advocacy and grantmaking initiative with the mission of helping the Congolese people support local, community-based approaches that create a sustainable and successful society in the long troubled region. ECI is the first U.S.-based advocacy and grantmaking initiative wholly focused on working with and for the people of the Eastern Congo.

Since 2007 Mr. Affleck has multiple trips to Africa with the focus on Eastern Congo. He has focused on understanding the causes and consequences of conflict on the continent, and learning about African solutions to the problems affecting the DRC.

We'll then hear from Ms. Francisca Vigaud-Walsh, who is with the Catholic Relief Services Sexual and Gender Based Violence Advisor, spearheading the effort to incorporate SGBVA prevention and responses to CRS programming in conflict and disaster affected communities worldwide.

Ms. Vigaud-Walsh has nearly a decade of refugee camp management and protection experience with the U.N. and various NGOs, working with displaced communities in the Balkans, Latin America, and Africa. And has spent a considerable amount of time in Eastern Congo helping CRS and its local partners design effective response to psycho-social, medical and economic needs of survivors of sexual violence.

We will also then hear from Mr. John Prendergast, who is a human rights activist and bestselling author who has worked for peace in Africa for over 25 years. He is co-founder of the Enough Project, an initiative to end genocide and crimes against humanity, affiliated with the Center for American Progress.

Mr. Prendergast has worked with the White House under President Clinton, the State Department, two members of Congress, National Intelligence Council, UNICEF, Human Rights Watch, the International Crisis Group, and the U.S. Institute of Peace. He has authored or co-authored 10 books and has appeared on numerous TV programs. And as I said earlier, has been here frequently before this subcommittee.

And I also would like to, if she would like to come to the witness table, Cindy McCain, who as I said earlier, has been a leader on issues dealing with health care for Africa, including the voluntary - American Voluntary Medical Team, leading several medical missions to developing and war torn nations. She is the wife of the distinguished senator from Arizona, John McCain, but she has also worked with CARE, Operation Smile, and the land removal group, the Halo Trust.

Mr. Affleck, if you proceed?

AFFLECK: Thank you very much. This is a - very excited about this and it's a great honor. So thank you all very much for including me today.

Mr. Chairman, Mr. Ranking Member, and members of the subcommittee, my name is Ben Affleck.

I am the founder of the Eastern Congo Initiative. ECI is the only U.S.-based grantmaking and advocacy organization entirely focused on working with and for the people of Eastern Congo, an area that carries the unwanted distinction of being the deadliest and most volatile region of the country, and one of the deadliest in the world.

According to the United Nations, the crisis in Eastern Congo has displaced an estimated 1.7 million Congolese, and has led to over 1,000 rapes being committed every month. The International Rescue Committee estimates that 5.4 million people have lost their lives in the conflict since 1998. Many of these deaths were children under the age of five.

Not all were killed in combat, but rather, perished from the ravages that accompany this horrific region, malaria and pneumonia, malnutrition and diarrhea. ECI invests in Congolese efforts that help protect the most vulnerable among the population in Congo, including child soldiers, survivors of sexual violence. ECI works closely with community-based groups focused on education, economic opportunity, capacity-building, and legal reform.

I thank you for your attention to Congo and for holding this important hearing. On behalf of ECI I request to submit a complete written statement for the record.

Today's hearing occurs on the 100th anniversary of International Women's Day, which I also think is important to recognize. And I think it's particularly appropriate to call attention to this, to the particular suffering of women and girls in Eastern Congo, as well as the undeniable strength they exhibit in the face of ongoing atrocities.

I am also pleased to recognize Cindy McCain, who is with us here today, and who recently joined ECI as a founding member and investor. Cindy and I just returned from Eastern Congo, where we saw firsthand the tragedy and triumph of the Congolese people.

While large parts of Eastern Congo remain under the control of armed groups, there are many reasons, most of them rooted in the strength and fortitude of the people, to be hopeful about Congo's future.

I want to share with you the story of a remarkable woman named Lava (ph) Kimana (ph), who exemplifies the potential of the Congolese people to transform themselves and their society. Lava (ph) was captured by rebel soldiers at the age of 14 in South Kivu and held as a sex slave for over two years. She was raped every day virtually by her captors until she found her freedom through the thick jungle in what makes up the second largest rain forest in the world. She discovered she was pregnant, the child of one of her rapists.

The counselors of a remarkable Congolese organization called Let Africa Live found Lava (ph). They took her in. They provided her with counseling and job training. And while caring for her new daughter, she used her skills to start a small business and earn enough income to return to school. Lava (ph) is now 22 years old. I met her. She is wonderful. She is in her third year of studying law and she advocates for the rights of women using her own story.

Since my first visit to Congo more than five years ago, I've witnessed remarkable efforts to improve governance, promote economic growth, and reduce conflict. Unfortunately, despite some positive movement, the record over these last five years is not promising.

Congo risks heading into another deeper spiral of violence that could lead to more fighting and suffering and it could risk destabilizing surrounding African countries.

In 2006, millions of Congolese voted for the first time in a free and fair Democratic election, voting in more than 50,000 polling places around the country. The Congolese people elected Joseph Kabila as president.

There was a period of great excitement and high hopes as the United States indeed, testified to by some of the other panelists, played a very important role.

Starting in 2007, the U.S., along with others in the West, drew back involvement.

Instead of continuing a high level of engagement to consolidate a new and fragile democracy, Congo was treated as if it was a well-functioning state from which the United Nations commission in Congo could be safely withdrawn.

This notion was quickly dispelled when rebels waged a new battle against the government in eastern Congo in 2007 and 2008, that brought another terrible round of death, displacement and destruction.

Our government has a long history of involvement in the Congo, from our shameful role in the murder of Patrice Lumumba and three decades' support of Mobutu to some very admirable recent efforts.

In the early 2000s, the United States government helped to bring to the table various forces then fighting in Congo.

U.S. government also provided key early funding for the 2006 elections and played a major role in helping peace and development return to the Congo. About this, there is no question.

The past few years, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton has also, as testified to by Ambassador Yamamoto, visited the region, and USAID has escalated its efforts in eastern Congo.

Also, USAID has provided millions of dollars in humanitarian assistance to the Congo since the mid-1990s. This commitment has indeed paid dividends in Congo.

But with conflict persisting and elections coming up, we must develop a cohesive strategy and fully engage on this issue.

Today with national elections only eight months away, on November 27th, U.S. is not focused on Congo, even with events like last week's attack on the president's residence in Kinshasa.

That, paired with Congo's recent history, should remind everybody of the fragility of Congo's project -- Congo's progress stability.

The United States government can and should play an active role in ensuring this November's elections are free and fair.

An electoral outcome that is questioned could easily perpetuate another downward spiral of violence, division and rupture. And the last time Congo collapse, armies came in from across Africa.

As said before, five million people died. Five million people have died since 1998 because of the conflict in eastern Congo. We must learn from history and do our part to see that this never happens again.

In this time of heightened concern over federal spending, some suggest that posterity demands we turn a blind eye to the crisis in Congo. I believe nothing could be more misguided.

It would simply be penny-wise and pound-foolish to allow Congo to, again, fall into a state of crisis or (inaudible) humanitarian chaos.

If Congo were to collapse again, as members of this subcommittee know full well, the United States would respond generously with humanitarian assistance. We would try to save lives. But we have to do better.

Our goal must be to avert humanitarian disaster by proactive investment and stronger diplomacy.

The path to stability in today's Congo requires sponsoring stable elections and preventing another disaster that can easily require hundreds of millions of dollars in assistance.

I humbly suggest that the U.S. government take a hard look at its current commitment and find a way to do more. Come November, we must be able to look ourselves in the eye and say that we did what our principles demanded.

We helped democracy emerge in a place where tragedy is the alternative.

In November 2010, the eastern Congo (inaudible) released a white paper -- here it is -- strengthening United States' foreign policy in the Democratic Republic of Congo.

We do titles differently in D.C. than we do back home. This paper commissioned and reviewed by experts encourages steps the U.S. should take to promote progress in Congo.

I requested that a summary of the -- of the paper should be included in the record (inaudible).

SMITH: Without objection, so ordered. Thank you.

AFFLECK: I've included a more detailed explanation of the steps we believe are necessary in the -- in the written testimony.

One, the U.S. government must do more to support a multidimensional strategy to protect civilians, women, girls, boys and men, in the onslaught of violence in the eastern Congo.

Two, the U.S. government must do more to support to the 2011 elections, which we've heard about already a little bit today.

In addition to providing diplomatic support, the U.S. should support robust election monitoring by Congolese civil society and by credible international organizations.

Three, to ensure that the United States steps up to the serious challenge as to stability in Africa posed by the Congo, the president or the Secretary of State should appoint a special representative to the Great Lakes region of Central Africa.

The appointment should occur as soon as possible in order to coordinate the U.S. response to the challenges in the Congo.

We also believe that the treatment of conflict minerals, demobilization and security sector reform, as well as the Lord's Resistance Army, are a serious concern and deserve a comprehensive approach and cohesive strategy.

This is an ambitious agenda, but it can be accomplished. In December 2005, then Senator Obama introduced a bill called the Democratic Republic of Congo Relief, Security and Democracy Promotion Act of 2006.

This bill had a bipartisan list of Senate cosponsors, including then Senator Hillary Clinton. On December 6th, 2006, it was passed by the House by a voice vote. On December 22nd, 2006, President Bush signed the bill into law.

The majority of our recommendations are found in this very law. They simply need to be implemented.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for your very strong support of this important legislation.

We place special emphasis on full diplomatic support for the upcoming elections and the reappointment (ph) of a Great Lakes special adviser in the State department.

This special adviser would serve as a point of accountability and an important and necessary coordinating function.

Maybe most relevant in these tough economic times, this appointment would inevitably ensure efficiencies are found across multiple investments and diplomatic efforts.

We strongly believe that if we continue to place Congo on the back burner of U.S. policy, it will indeed come back to haunt us. The federal budget may be a zero-sum game.

But our morality, our sense of decency, our compassion for our fellow human beings is not.

Recognizing one tragedy need not diminish understanding and empathy for another, our basic humanity, our sense of compassion, is not a fixed number. It expands with our vision. It can grow with our purpose.

But our moral compass is fixed. Our sunrise, our east as a nation, even when we have failed, has always pointed us towards what's right.

Now, not what's easy, not what's cheap, but what we can live with and how we can sleep with ourselves at night. The values we hold true are priceless to us. They are the soul of our nation.

They are rooted in our Constitution, our Bill of Rights, our Declaration of Independence. We believe in being free from the tyranny of violence.

We believe in life and liberty and we believe that basic human rights are not just important, they're not just something to be worked toward, but a fundamental right to be demanded for all mankind.

These ideas make us who we are. They make us great. But if our foreign policy does not reflect these ideals, it completely undermines them.

I have seen first-hand the determination of the promise of the Congolese people. I hope you will consider visiting eastern Congo to learn and see what I have. Any of you are welcome to come with me.

The Congolese people simply want to live their lives in peace, earn a decent living and raise their families, just like the rest of us. They want a voice in their country's governance.

I will never give in to the naysayers who suggest Congo is hopeless or too complex. It is not. The 70 million people of Congo deserve a better tomorrow. And the Eastern Congo Initiative will do our small part to ensure that it does.

It is in the interest of all of us here to support the people of the Congo and move forward toward democracy and respect for human rights, and to move away from the multiple crises and horrors of the last 15 years.

Thank you very much. It really is an honor to be here and I'm happy to expand on any of these points and to answer your questions.

SMITH: Mr. Affleck, thank you so very much for your very eloquent and passionate statement. And I do hope that the White House and the Capitol, the Congress, is listening to your strong appeal.

Congo cannot be on the back burner of U.S. foreign policy. And I think, as Mr. Payne and I have made very clear, I think every member of our panel, we strongly want that special envoy, that special representative yesterday.

And so your appeal today, I think, would be a pivoting point for the administration to say, now, do it. Time is running out. So thank you so very much. I'd like to now introduce Ms. Vigaud-Walsh.

And thank you for your testimony.

VIGAUD-WALSH: Mr. Chairman, I would like to submit my written statement for the record. And I will briefly summarize.

SMITH: Without objection, so ordered.

VIGAUD-WALSH: Thank you, Chairman Smith, for calling this very important hearing today, and for giving Catholic Relief Services the opportunity to testify.

I would also like to thank the ranking member, Mr. Payne.

Mr. Smith, I know how passionate you are about advocating for the survivors of sexual and gender-based violence in the Congo.

And, Mr. Payne, I know that your interests in the region have led you to travel to the Congo several times, even dating back to when it was still called the Zaire.

Let me also thank Mr. McDermott for his role as one of the original offers of the Congo Conflict Minerals Provision that recently became law. This provision will help to curb sexual violence in the Congo.

This morning, in Bukavu, close to 180,000 women marched in the streets, advocating for their own rights, today being their day, International Women's Day.

They marched behind a banner that stated, "We Can Stop Violence," and they have slogans that included two key demands, the first being impunity for rapists must cease, and the second being that women must be included in all the political processes.

As the sexual and gender-based violence adviser for Catholic Relief Services, I focus a lot of my efforts on the Congo, just because of the sheer magnitude of the problem there.

And in this capacity, I've had the privilege of working for and with many of the women that marched this -- some of the women that marched this morning.

In eastern Congo today is a cry for women to no longer be used as a battleground. And here it is a call for us to even make greater efforts to help them.

CRS, which has been working in the DRC since 1961, partners with the local Catholic church to address the scourge of sexual violence.

The church has an extensive network throughout the most remote areas of the country. This network allows us to reach the most isolated rapes -- of rape survivors -- excuse me.

Also, in the absence of an effective and functioning government administration, the Catholic Church has provided most of the basic services, such as health care and education for decades. It has thus gained the trust of the population.

In Eastern Congo, I have repeatedly come across rape survivors who have walked many kilometers from their displacement camps to seek support at the nearest parish. The fear of stigmatization by their fellow camp dwellers, coupled with the trust in the church, drives them to seek assistance there.

Together we have implemented numerous activities to respond to this crisis. We've provided access to life-changing fistula repair surgeries, psychosocial training for counselors and trauma healing for thousands of survivors in four provinces, income generating and entrepreneurial skills for at least 1,500 rape survivors, community trading to mobilize military, police and transitional justice leaders, and most recently, an innovative community-based early warning and protection project in three provinces.

The funding for these projects do come from a variety of sources, but the great majority of them come from the United States government. This partnership between the United States government, CRS and the church in Congo extends the reach and magnifies the impact of US government assistance into remote areas with needy, vulnerable populations that could not be reached otherwise.

It is critically important that the US government maintain and expand the support for the essential responses I've just described, as well as preserving and strengthening its partnership with the church and other faith-based organizations.

If the DRC is to have a future, the hundreds of thousands of women who have been raped must continue to be able to access these services. And even within the context of scarce resources today, the US can and should do more to combat the conditions that foster the use of rape as a weapon of war. I'd like to make these additional recommendations.

One. The US must use its leverage as a donor and as a partner to press the Congolese government to fulfill its security mandate, uphold human rights and genuinely work to protect its civilizations. The Congolese government has requested more military support recently, such as the training of more battalions. The US G - the US government, excuse me - has to think this support to measurable changes in key areas.

Two. The US should condition its assistance on progress against impunity and survivor access to justice. As long as ranking military officers who condone and perpetuate rape roam free, or as long as civilians accused of rape can continue to pay the equivalent of five US dollars to get a jail - to get a free out of jail card, sexual violence will persist.

Three. The US government urges the Congolese - the US government should urge the Congolese government with its previous commitments to include women in the political and (inaudible) processes. They should be respected and included and prepared for election. Indeed, violence against women in the DRC is symptomatic of women's second-class status and marginalization from decision making. Women have been consistently excluded from previous peace processes and continue to be sidelined from political power.

One of the women who led in the March in Bukavu this morning is a director of the (inaudible) Office for Women's Issue, Sans (ph) (inaudible). When I telephoned her yesterday to tell her about this hearing she was ecstatic because she knows the political leverage the United States government has with the Congo. She drafted a declaration alongside her counterparts in the Muslim and Protestant communities and urged me to make these recommendations.

Ultimately, in order to eradicate sexual and gender-based violence in the DRC we need to stop the wider, more generalized conflict. The United States governments needs to more urgently engage diplomatically. The United States government can lead the process that will end the fighting and increase women's participation in the political sphere.

The magnitude of the seemingly never-ending humanitarian crisis and the potential for the fragile situation to get even worse demands a proportionate response. At this critical juncture with elections coming, the United States government must rise to the task as it did in the Sudan. And as long as violence persists the US must continue to support the life-saving partnership with faith-based institutions in the DRC. Thank you.

SMITH: Ms. Vigaud-Walsh, thank you so very much. And thank you for the absolutely encouraging news about the 180,000 women marching. That is just incredible. And hopefully in a small way this hearing and the follow up that we will do - it is all ongoing - but I think this is an important venue to say now is the time for the administration to do much more. And that goes for us as well. So thank you for that wonderful news.

Mr. Pendergast.

PENDERGAST: Thank you, Chairman Smith and ranking member Payne for your ongoing commitment to Congo and human rights throughout Africa. I'd like to ask that my testimony be submitted to the record and to People magazine, (inaudible) to Mr. Affleck. I'd also like to set aside my written testimony to say a few things this afternoon about this unique moment that Congo is facing.

While women were marching in Congo in Bukavu this morning, the 180,000, two of my colleagues from Enough are in Goma - were in Goma this morning - and talked with one of the leading women's rights advocates in the country, Justine Masika, who some - everyone probably on this panel knows and some of you know, and Secretary Clinton met when she was in Congo in 2009.

And for this hearing Justine wanted to say the following. "The link between conflict minerals and mass rape here in Congo is crystal clear. So the first and foremost priority for ending the war here in Congo is to set up a system to regulate the minerals trade. And the upcoming election," she said, "is the critical window to push the government of Congo on this issue, since it will try harder to please the population before the vote."

Now I was in Congo twice in the last six months and I would strongly concur with Justine's assessment that this is an unparalleled moment of opportunity to make real changes in Congo. The election is the primary internal factor, no question. But the US Congress's conflict minerals legislation, spearheaded by Congressman McDermott, is the primary external factor. And it has created a moment full of uncertainties and anxieties, but also of huge opportunities in the country.

Now before we get to these opportunities, I want to make one commercial time out on why we focus so much on the economics of Congo's war. Of course we believe the conflict there is about more than conflict minerals, but let's take a look at the broader agenda and how it is compromised by the mafia-like economy there.

Now everyone wants to reform, for example, the military. However, the military officer corps is the primary beneficiary of mining in the country. President Kabila stays in power by allowing these officers free reign to make as much money as they can and cratering the rule of law throughout the eastern third of the country.

Number two, everyone wants to reform the justice system of course. However, the military and civilian beneficiaries in government of this conflict minerals trade do not want a strong, efficient government. The rule of law will subvert this illegal economy and the money now going into their pockets will go to the treasury. And that's simply unacceptable to this mafia.

The third thing I want to bring up is everyone of course wants to stop the FDLR and the other militias. However, they sustain themselves through mineral profits, and everyone knows that. And they often trade increasingly with the military itself, the Congolese military.

Fourth, everyone wants clean elections. However, who in power would give up this gravy train? You lose and you're out. It's winner take all. They can't take that chance and they'll fix it. So everyone supports peace agreements, no question. However, even the peace deals in Congo can make matters worse if we don't deal with the economic fuel for war. One and a half million Congolese people have been displaced since President Kagame (ph) and Kabila signed their peace agreement a year and a half ago. That's a - that's a tragic record.

Back to the people of Congo. Ryan Gosten (ph) and I went there over Thanksgiving. We met an extraordinary Congolese woman named Marie. Marie is a rape survivor twice over and she has overcome her own trauma to found a women's organization that helps other women who have survived sexual crimes.

We asked her what she recommends. And she said the following. "Please stop this bloody business. You are fueling conflict. Families are being torn apart. Women are being raped. Communities are being destroyed so armed groups can profit from the mines. Companies should stop supporting this and do ethical business," she said.

Well, the good news is that because of the Congressional legislation, because of your legislation, every one of you who championed this, companies have to start trying now to do this ethical business. And some companies are already moving ahead even beyond what the legislation is requiring them to do. But they need help from the United States.

And the key I believe, as it has been on so many critical foreign policy issues in Africa, the key is the United States Congress. Two critical processes are coming to fruition now that this subcommittee and the wider Congress can influence.

First, the Security and Exchange Commission is going to issue very soon implementing regulations for your conflict minerals legislation. We need to ensure that these regulations have serious teeth and do not delay the implementation of the bill. We have a letter that we're releasing today from Congolese civil society organizations making this very point, that we cannot countenance a delay in the implementation of the bill.

Strong regulations will send a major signal to the actors in the supply chain that foment violence, that subvert the rule of law, that undermine good governance, that they have to clean up their act.

Second major opportunity we have now is that the conflict minerals legislation as was discussed requires the executive branch to develop a strategy for dealing with conflict minerals and ending the violence. That's a first. The executive branch hasn't been required by Congress to have a strategy to actually end this thing. We've always wanted to deal with the symptoms. This - the bill says, "How are you going to end it?"

Well that strategy was due over a month but it's still being debated inside the administration. That's a good thing. That means you can have influence over what the Obama administration comes out with. This is a huge opportunity for the United States to make a critical difference in the Congo.

We think Secretary Clinton should lead in putting together a stakeholder's meeting that involves the regional governments, particularly Congo at the center, the companies that matter, the United States and the European Union all together to launch a process that would result in an international certification system to end the conflict minerals trade in central Africa.

And we need a senior envoy to help spearhead this and all the other efforts that my fellow panelists and you of all have spoken about and written to the administration about so passionately in the country and throughout the region.

US leadership has helped do this with diamonds. We've done it with forestry. We've done it with fisheries. We've done it with a number of other products where when the United States helped lead in bringing the companies and governments in question together, standards were changed and this positively has impacted the lives of millions and millions of people.

Well, now it's Congo's turn. So if we act on the deadly minerals trade, it's not a magic wand, but it is a catalyst, and it's a domino that will help topple the edifice of greed and militarization that kills and rapes people in Congo at a higher rate than anywhere else in the world.

Thank you very much for your leadership.

SMITH: Mr. Pendergast, thank you so very much for your passion and for your insights and counsel, which you have provided to this committee and the Congress for many years. Thank you so much.

As previously discussed and agreed by my friend Mr. Payne and I, the ranking member, I would ask unanimous consent to welcome Ms. Cindy McCain to speak and participate as a witness on this panel, even though we had not prior noticed it.

MCCAIN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And I don't intend to take long at all, but I would like to -- to thank you and the committee members for taking your time in hearing what we have to say with regard to such a critical issue that's facing our world.

I come to Congo, having my first trip down there in 1994 during the Rwandan genocide. And so my history with Congo is dicey at best. But what I've learned through these years is what is most important, and it is that organizations just like this, particularly organizations like ECI, that -- that go in and take a -- not only a strong look at what's going on, but become active in a -- in a community-based level.

These NGOs, organizations like this are most important for what we're doing, but we can't do it alone. We are here today to -- to ask all of you, and I know all of you in this room right now have been to Congo, have taken an active interest in Congo -- please come. But most importantly, we're depending on your voice to -- to spread the word.

We're going to lose a generation of women and children in Congo unless we do something now. I'm only a humanitarian relief worker. That's the only thing I've ever done. It's the only thing I know with regard to this region. But I also know what's right, and we can't leave behind to these women and children.

So we rely on you, and we talk to you today with great hope that you will lead this charge and not forget about these wonderful human beings in a rich culture that has so much to offer to this world. I leave it to the experts to tell you today what is most important, but I would hope that you would ask those people who are on the ground to not only to help you, but for you to let them know that you are behind them, and most importantly, to let the women and children know that they are not forgotten.

I particularly want to thank Ben Affleck for allowing me to be a part of this today and for allowing me to be a part of ECI. We are strange political bedfellows. We are the odd couple, perhaps, in politics. But that's the beauty of this, because this transcends political parties.

So thank you so much for what you are doing. Most importantly, thank you for listening to what they have to say. And thank you on behalf of many, many NGO aid workers that are on the ground that need your help. Thank you.

SMITH: McCain, the thank goes to you and to the three other distinguished witnesses for leading and leading so well and pouring yourself into these humanitarian efforts.

I'd like to ask Mr. Affleck. I know that you have been to and have been -- ECI actually aids HEAL Africa. Could you just provide some additional insight into the work of HEAL Africa and other like-minded NGOs and hospitals that you've supported?

AFFLECK: Sure, sure. I mean, unfortunately, not very many hospitals in that part of the country. And we were initially attracted to that, because, of course, they're Congolese-run and based, and that's the kind of organization that we want to be supporting.

Sometimes we support grassroots organizations that don't have that level of infrastructure and, you know, high-level education. But these people are -- they're a Congolese-run hospital that started out very small, primarily, of course, through fistula repair, because the need for fistulas is so urgent there. And they've grown.

They've grown because of their skill, their talent, what they're providing, and -- and who's doing the work. And it's one of the few that actually has attracted a decent amount of attention from people. And they provide desktop level -- I mean, obviously, it's emergency care.

I visited them and saw them at -- some, you know, soldiers, you know, who were recovering from gunshot wounds. One guy showed me that he had -- he had his wallet in his pocket, and yet been in the war, and he took the wallet out, and the bullet had gone into his pocket and hit the wallet and saved his life. And, you know, he had some other wounds that he was being treated for, but it was definitely they were on the front lines of the war, and they're on the front lines of building the peace.

And, you know, I don't know what people would do without this kind of hospital there. And they are receiving -- well, we're working with them, and others are as well, and, you know, they're really pretty exceptional.

The other, of course, really well known hospital is Panzi Hospital, which Dr. Mukwege works at, which is in Bukavu in South Kivu. And he also -- he is just doing exceptional work. I mean, he's a guy who was himself personally early on doing 10 fistula surgeries a day at the height of this epidemic, and it still goes on, but he doesn't have to do all the surgeries. Then they started training other doctors, and it became sustainable.

Those two organizations are spectacular. There are many others that were working with. Part of what we try to do at ECI is to re-calibrate people's perception about Africa and about who's doing what.

People go, "We're going to throw money down there. It's money down a rat hole." That's not the case at all. Really, in our experience, people who are doing it, solving these problems, and maybe it was Congressman Payne who's talking about this earlier, it's Congolese solving Congolese problems, and that's what's so -- what's so inspiring to me.

And both of those hospitals are really emblematic of that. And I have a bunch of other stories, but I'll spare you.

SMITH: You know, in your testimony, and -- and Mr. Pendergast also makes a very strong appeal for the special envoy.

And, Mr. Pendergast, you actually point out that Harold Wolpe, who used to be chairman of this subcommittee years back, actually had his capability diminished, his resources cut, and influence at a time when -- of course, he has been ill recently, but even when he had the position.

It seems to me that the message we need to send to the White House, because they need to do this, like I said, before yesterday, is to name that special envoy and properly resource that individual.

If you both, and perhaps any of you who would like to speak to that issue, it seems to me that we don't have a point person who can in a rapid way, with the ear of the president and the secretary of state, you know, a phone call away, this window of opportunity, as one of you said in your testimony, could quickly evaporate.

And if we -- you know, I was -- and Mr. Payne and I were talking about this in between testimonies, you know, $5 million expended so far. Last time it was about 80 million. And when the administration testifies that there's a $350 million gap, that may doom this election unless quick, corrective action is taken. And the special envoy would have that ability to say, you know, we're going to make this happen, so if you could speak to that.

AFFLECK: I'll just give a quick answer come, and then John can get into the nuance policy detail stuff.

But, you know, there's a lot going on. We've heard other people talking about what the U.S. government is doing, what other folks are doing. A big -- big part of this is about synthesizing all the stuff, taking all these strands. As many of you know who work in the private sector, you get have a lot of people doing stuff and maybe doing their jobs well, but if they're not working together and they don't know what the other hand is doing, frankly, you just have a lot of waste.

So we've got resources dedicated that are now being frittered away, because they are not working collectively, they're not working cohesively. You know, somebody's supposed to be doing elections, somebody's supposed to be doing gender-based violence, somebody's supposed to -- there are people designated to liaise with regional governments like Burundi and Rwanda and Uganda and others.

But without somebody sort of taking the lead and being able to do that kind of shuttle diplomacy, where they move across those folks, you know, it just really isn't going to be successful. In fact, we're underutilizing what we are already deploying, in effect.

And we've -- I've talked about the stakes a little bit. Now, John, take it?

PENDERGAST: Just a -- just a footnote, what Ben's saying there is when I worked at the White House in the State Department, I just found it to be endlessly frustrating, because so many issues and countries were stovepipes and kept in their categories. And what a special envoy -- and you've got, you know, in Central Africa you've got cross border issues, you've got multiple issues that bring equities in from all kinds of different departments throughout the U.S. government, so you need someone to be able to break through the stove-piping.

And -- and it can't be a deputy assistant secretary of state who just gets dual-hatted to be doing something else besides their regular job, which is 20 hours a day anyways with the beeper going off every 30 minutes in the other four hours.

You just got to have someone whose full-time job is focused, and it's someone with influence, someone that can pick up the phone and say, "Secretary Clinton, it's actually time for you to say or do something now," and someone who can actually move the system, move the needle away from the inertia that just pervades government.

You know, this is just where it is. People are well-meaning, but the system is it's systemically tilted toward the status quo. To be able to move that needle away from the status quo towards action, that's what you need a special envoy for. And we should collectively, civil society and -- and the legislative branch, press the executive branch to do this as soon as possible.

We know President Obama moved on the special envoy in -- in Sudan because of George Clooney. Maybe he'll move it in Congo because of Ben.

AFFLECK: Well, I think -- I don't think it'll have much to do with me, but from what I've heard, and we've spent a lot of time asking around this town. I know that if we had the support of Ambassador Yamamoto and Assistant Secretary Carson, we'd go a long way, so I want to urge -- Yamamoto's still here and Carson, wherever you are, help us out. It's going to be a collective effort, and I know we can get there.

SMITH: Thank you. And I couldn't agree more.

Ms. Vigaud-Walsh, in your testimony you referenced the CRS Project that aims to prevent sexual violence against women by sensitizing communities and mobilizing local leaders, and it's done through training transitional justice leaders, military and police officials, who then become community sensitization leaders. Can you tell us how successful that program has been?

And secondly -- and, Ms. McCain, you might want to speak to this as well -- the issue of micro credit financing is -- is huge in Africa. And, you know, dollar for dollar I can't think of a better way of helping to empower women, especially because most of those grants or -- or loans, I should say, go to women. And with a small amount of money, someone can not only get gainfully employed, but they end up hiring for five, six people in many cases.

For those women who have been so sexually abused and traumatized, do you find that micro credit financing and job skills help them to mend -- not only help provide for themselves and perhaps their families, but also is part of the healing process?

VIGAUD-WALSH: Thank you, Chairman.

With regards to our project where we, with the Catholic Church of Tusi (ph), we train transitional justice leaders, the program is critical and is very effective, because we have to step back for a moment and look at the context. We're talking about a country where there is no rule of law. The justice system is in shambles. So there is nothing but traditional leadership in justice.

So the fact of the matter is we're working in communities where the view of justice still is embedded in cultural ideas that are attached to the stigma; how to overcome the stigma or how to reduce stigma. And what I mean by that is, a girl that is perhaps as young as 14 years old, in order to avoid that stigma, she is forced to marry her rapist. And that is the traditional justice system.

So we've been working with hundreds and hundreds of justice leaders -- traditional justice leaders in order to work with them on making their policies, shall we say, more gender-sensitive, and more sensitive to the needs and protection of the women and girls.

That's on the first point. And with regards to the micro-credit financing, absolutely, absolutely critical. And I'm glad that you noted that it is part of the healing process in fact. Through our savings and lending schemes, we've had rape survivors that have been ostracized from their communities, and therefore lost their breadwinners once their husbands abandoned them.

And one particular case that I'm thinking of right now, she was actually able to save the equivalent of $600 to build her own house. This is a woman who would have been living in the street, quite literally, after having been ostracized by her community.

Once -- those kinds of programs work so much on the self-esteem. And the self-esteem after rape is so critical to being able to move on and to be able to remake one's life, even in the face of having been ostracized by the community.

So these programs are critical and I strongly suggest that they continue to be supported and I do that the U.S. government for all the support that we have received for these programs thus far. Thank you.

SMITH: Ms. McCain, did you want to comment?

MCCAIN: The only thing I would add to that, you're exactly right. Micro-financing is, in my opinion, key to this. So are free and fair elections. And unless we do both, we are never going to have a society of women that will have any kind of rights at all. So that would be the only thing I would add to that.

SMITH: Thank you.

Mr. Payne.

PAYNE: Well, let me certainly thank all of you for your testimony. And I think the interest of all of you in this issue really assists us in Congress to try to highlight the problems without people like you, Ms. McCain, and Mr. Affleck, and, of course, Pendergast is the agitator behind all of this stuff, and, of course, the work that Catholic Relief Services does.

We would probably have a difficult time filling the room, probably only have a third of it covered. So I think that people don't realize the importance of people in your categories that you can bring attention to issues.

And I think it's important. Once we get the attention, we know what to do, you know, Congressman Smith and myself and the other members of Congress. But you do help us highlight the problems. And I really, once again, thank you all for your interest in these issues.

The -- it seems as -- and it's very clear that we definitely need to have a special envoy. I recall -- maybe, John, you remember when we went with President Clinton to Africa. And during our time there we just simply had a meeting of the Great Lakes region presidents. I mean, because so much is interrelated.

Uganda was arguing a little bit with Burundi. You had Rwanda looking over at what was happening in Zimbabwe. I mean, it's so interrelated that it -- a special envoy not only should deal with the problems of the Congo, but to be able to coordinate.

As a matter of fact, Uganda was a recipient of a terrorist attack because Uganda was assisting in Somalia with their troops to protect the government of Sheikh Sharif Sheikh Ahmed, and the transitional federal government. And without Ugandan troops there, the situation would be much worse.

Well, that's all connected. That at the World Cup game, Uganda suffered the loss of 20-some of their citizens by Al-Shabab planting a bomb as people were simply watching the World Cup because there were Ugandan troops helping in Somalia.

So it's so all connected that it seems that it would certainly make a lot of sense that we do have an envoy, especially to deal with the DRC, but also to have the surrounding countries that are involved in.

The fact that so many -- and the tragedy of the Congo, as I mentioned earlier with King Leopold and how the country was just devastated, and then once they decided to move forward, the conspiracy of the West to come together and have Patrice Lumumba murdered.

That was really -- and I'm glad Mr. Affleck, that we can't forget the past, we don't need to dwell on it, but if we know the past, we know why we're in positions we're in. Congo with the leadership of Lumumba and those were emerging at that time could've had a total difference on the way the Congo is today.

But by us propping up Mobutu, who raped the country for decades and decades, we find ourselves now struggling again to try to get democracy moving and trying to get this whole question of rape, which should be despised by society, but it's something that people sort of shrugged their shoulders and say, well, that happens.

So I really -- like I said, I really commend you for your efforts. I know Mrs. Walsh -- or Vigaud-Walsh, you all work with child soldiers. And I know that perhaps some of the abusers who are involved in rape now were probably child soldiers before.

So I wonder what your organization is doing as it relates to child soldiers in the DRC.

VIGAUD-WALSH: To illustrate what we are doing with child soldiers, I could speak of a program we had in North Kivu in partnership with the Caritas Goma, and Caritas Rome as well.

We were supporting centers through which demobilized children -- or children were transported to after being demobilized, providing a trauma healing therapy, working with them to prepare them for reintegration back into society.

The problem is, is that clearly these kinds of services aren't enough. The number of children that were needing DDR services in a few years ago was much, much greater than the funding -- level of funding that we had.

Thank you.

PAYNE: Thank you.

Mr. Affleck, maybe you and Mr. Pendergast might be able to deal with the question, what do you see us needing on the ground in order to make these elections work?

AFFLECK: Well, first of all, I want to go back to another of your questions that I don't think got answered, which is that the difference between MONUC and MONUSCO is two letters which stand for "stabilization and organization," the idea being that it has got an expanded mandate for, well, stabilization, among other things.

And, you know, that -- Meece, who replaced Alan Doss, seems to be doing a fine job. He's an American and people are optimistic. And there have been some appreciative changes.

Now that entity places a real role, obviously, in elections, as you know, you were there. They played an instrumental part in elections last time. What I hear from people in this environment, they say, well, the second election is always harder. It's the one fewer people want to pay attention to. It's the one that can either cement democracy or it all fall backward and become unwound.

We need to have monitors. We need to have, like you say, internationally credited monitors. We're hoping that the Carter Center will up the ante a little bit on what they're willing to do. I think IRI is going to come in. I think NDI will then follow.

But we also a fully committed effort, and, frankly, we need, you know, to maintain that peace and stability. You asked about the FDLR and CNDP, and, you know, to sort of more fully address that, where we are right now is that, yes, because of when Nkunda got taken away by the Rwandese, the CNDP folded up in the FARDC.

However, they sort of cut a deal with Bosco Ntaganda so Bosco is now kind of the de facto leader of the CNDP inside the FARDC, which creates a kind of tension. And it's one that has to be managed by MONUSCO, because you arrest him, you may create a lot of problems. You may go back to the war that you had before.

And it's tricky. When we were there recently, you know, right after we flew out the airport was the scene of a huge, you know, shooting and chase. And Bosco had brought -- his gold, they had brought in a bunch of gold that they were smuggling and this big police chase up there.

So this is a guy acting with a lot of impunity and creating a lot of instability. And, you know, the Kimana (ph), RDF, FARDC efforts to go after the FDLR, on the flip side, which I think represented, to get to your question, a further break between the FDLR and FARDC, and Kabila and those guys who really were kind of on his side during the war.

But it got stopped a bit because the FDLR were smart and they knew that enough civilian casualties -- they would leave and then come back and kill a lot of civilians. And they knew that that would tamp down enthusiasm for further military actions. The Rwandese, of course, left.

These intractable, thorny issues need to be solved as well as the other practical electoral stuff. (INAUDIBLE) elections, we have a lot of logistical stuff. They need support, they need people there saying, this is how we should do it. It needs MONUSCO flying people around. It needs MONUSCO fully dedicated.

And it also needs increased diplomatic involvement and engagement to help, to continue to, and this is a place where the U.S. has done a lot of really good work. You know, guys like Tim Shortley at the State Department, who was over there several years ago and working closely Nkunda and Goma peace accords and such.

You know that we need to continue to -- to push that towards peace, because any of these guys with boscos (ph) and so on, that -- that those situations flare up. It could easily trigger further instability in elections. That wasn't more than you wanted to hear, but.

(UNKNOWN): Oh, that was very -- you're pretty -- you're pretty up on this stuff. It's really you're very impressive.

J.P.?

PENDERGAST: The only thing that I would add there...

And that was -- that was indeed a great answer. You ought to...

AFFLECK: Well, thank you.

(APPLAUSE)

(UNKNOWN): Him I paid to say that.

PENDERGAST: But I would add and just actually highlights the diplomatic effort that you just spoke of as part and parcel of the larger thing and put a little meat on those bones and say what you need, of course, as we do in other countries that matter to the United States, is you create these unified coordination mechanisms. Call them donor coordination, call them diplomatic coordinators.

They then craft multi-lateral carrots and sticks related to electoral benchmarks. And you deploy them early enough that they could actually influence the process as it unfolds, because, of course, anyone who wants to steal an election is watching to see what the world will do.

And if the world does nothing but put out a little press release saying, "Bad," you know, slap on the wrist, of course, they're going to go ahead because of the reasons we've talked about for so long. The money, the gravy train will be lost if you lose the election.

So we need that -- that multi-lateral, unified voice of the governments that have influence to develop the carrot sticks -- carrots and sticks, create the watchdog actions that will blow whistles when there are problems, and do it early enough, create these things early enough so you're not just waiting till the day of the vote to say, "Wait a minute. There's something wrong here." But we can actually watch and see how it unfolds.

We'll know months in advance whether this is going to be a credible election, and if the answer is no, then we can deploy and say, "Wait a minute. We're not going to support this. You're going to have to change for anyone to take this seriously." And then it's up to the Congolese government to -- to develop their own calculation about whether or not they want to reform it.

So I think that's what we really -- that's one of the elements of many, as Ben said, that we need to be engaged in to try to make a difference here.

SMITH: Thank you. I guess my time has about expired.

I won't to ask you, Ms. McCain, about elections.

I would just want to say that we -- elections are so important. I just want to remind the chairman that we have the problem in Cote d'Ivoire where the president lost the election and just decided, "I'm not going to leave." I mean, this is unbelievable, with everyone saying, "Hey, you" -- ECOWAS, EKAD (ph), E.U., U.S. saying, "You lost. You should step out."

And so I think that we really have to keep the pressure on Gbagbo to step down. And if we could move that legislation forward to have the Congress on record with the rest of the world saying, "Get out," because if he stays in, it's going to be a bad example for all of these other elections.

There are about a dozen elections coming up in Africa this year, and if this is the principle where you lose and you stay and you say, "Well, I'm not leaving," then we're going to be in a world of trouble in these elections coming up, including the Congo.

So once again, thank you all for your testimony.

SMITH: Mr. Fortenberry?

FORTENBERRY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

A question for you, Mr. Affleck and Mrs. McCain. I'm curious. How did you choose the Eastern Congo as the focus of your passion and interest? The reason I say that is those of us who sit on this committee and others, where global human rights is a concern and deep interest and essential, the -- the insults to humanity, the effrontery that comes across our desk daily in so many places throughout the world can almost just be exhausting. So I'm curious. How did you choose this particular area?

AFFLECK: Yes. I -- I came to it -- I won't go into my own personal journey, because that may be inappropriate for this -- but I think really for me it was -- it was I came -- frankly, I was reading. I was looking at some other stuff, trying to cast around, looking at advocacy, and I came across this. "Oh, well, of course, it pales in the comparison with the millions of deaths in Eastern Congo."

And I was on the one hand shocked and on the other hand really ashamed. How could I not have known this, you know? I -- I read the newspaper, and yet I had no idea. And so I thought, well, maybe this is the place where I can at least, you know, show up. I don't know what.

And I started studying. I started learning. I took a couple of years. I didn't want to be, you know, kind of a celebrity dilettante sort of person that doesn't know what they're talking about and irritates everyone, because I thought that wouldn't help any.

(LAUGHTER)

FORTENBERRY: Well, that's very impolitic of you to say, but very well received, I should say as well.

AFFLECK: So I -- I really did a lot of studying -- Whitney Williams, who's here, was instrumental in helping me do that -- and -- and met with a lot of really learned experts, John among them.

And -- and when I...

Foremost among them.

And when I ultimately got to a place where I wanted to -- I wanted to build an organization, because I kind of identified the best people I thought were doing the best work with people who have some skin in the game, who are living in the community every day, who knew people, who knew the militia, who knew who the children were.

I talked to people that were taking kids out of -- child soldiers out of the militias, and they would go to them and -- and address them, you know, kind of personally and bargain. "Look, at least you don't need him. Well, give me her." And then, you know, while that was happening, they'd already found a place for the child to live in the village rather than in an institutional home.

And I kind of thought, gosh, this is what happens when -- when something bad happens in your community and your dealing with that, because you know the people. And I -- I got struck, and I wanted to -- to help and part of those folks, because, of course, they had no money.

So we started raising money. And I also thought, you know, nothing changes without advocacy, without powerful people making up their minds, people like you, and the idea to ultimately sit here and address you is just -- it's a real -- it's a real thrill for me.

And then I -- I wanted to surround myself with kind of smart, thoughtful philanthropists and, you know, people who got it. And everybody who -- you know something about this knows how long Mrs. McCain has been involved with this, as you said, since Goma in '94 -- that's a big deal -- and since then doing a lot of work. And so I gave her a call, and hoped she wouldn't think it was a prank call.

FORTENBERRY: Well, clearly, your investment and your time and passion is very genuine, and I think it's going to give continuity to this effort, and I'm grateful.

Ms. McCain, did you have to add anything, or...

MCCAIN: Other than to say everything is always a personal journey, and my story is no different. I won't go into it, but what I will say is that is from my own personal well-being, Africa has -- has haunted me in a good way.

It has kept me coming back, because I see such but there. I see such possibilities. And I know with the help of people like Mr. Affleck and others around the world, that we can make a difference. And so it's nothing more than a personal journey for me as well, but -- but it's -- it's one that has kept me coming back. And I'm -- I love it there, and I wouldn't be -- would rather not be anyplace else.

FORTENBERRY: Thank you as well for your time and passion on it.

I did want to raise a couple of quick issues and the limited time I have left.

Mr. Pendergast, you had made a correlation between the pervasiveness of a culture of rape and the conflict regarding minerals. It's unclear to me what that direct correlation is. If you could spend 20 seconds unpacking that, please?

PENDERGAST: Actually, it says 40. Anyways...

FORTENBERRY: I have another question,

(LAUGHTER)

Well, that's -- you know, we didn't -- we didn't need a laugh line right before talking about this, because it is so crushingly serious, you know.

What -- what basically our assessment is is that these militia groups, armed groups on the ground, including the government army -- we always talk about rebels, rebels -- it's militias both from Rwanda and Congo and the government army, they've used the tactic of rape as a weapon to -- to...

FORTENBERRY: I don't think this point is very clear, and I appreciate you saying there's a correlation there, but go ahead.

PENDERGAST: ... to use rape as a tactic of war in order to intimidate local communities to go along with that kind of mafia economy that we were talking about all day today.

So, I mean, in Sierra Leone they used the amputations to terrorize civilian populations. There's no -- I mean, people use what works. And if there is no consequence, if it's impunity reigns, then why not this? And -- and there many other facts involved.

I think you're -- you're wanting to say something in there.

Can I yield some of my time?

FORTENBERRY: Yes, please.

MCCAIN: Just to clarify that also a bit more, it's a displacement mechanism. It moves people out of the areas where these resources are, so they can move in and take control of the minds. And if you look at where...

FORTENBERRY: So this is not just some act of depravity that -- that happens in uncovering spaces. It's deliberate. It's intentional for larger geopolitical purposes.

MCCAIN: It is a strategy, absolutely.

FORTENBERRY: Yes, OK.

MCCAIN: It's a strategy.

AFFLECK: It's both. It's all of those things.

FORTENBERRY: OK.

AFFLECK: You know what I mean? What happens is these tactics create an environment which -- where it seems like anything goes, you know. But I do absolutely concur that's what I've seen from these two folks is that it's about armed groups saying we're going to go after this area, and this is how we're going to attack them. And then it becomes just, you know, a kind of a horrible reality where it's acceptable.

FORTENBERRY: I called it a culture of rape. I don't know if that's the right description.

PENDERGAST: I don't think it is exactly, because the vast majority of Congolese are -- are absolutely devastated by what's happened to their country.

AFFLECK: And that's why it becomes a powerful weapon.

PENDERGAST: Yes. Yes.

FORTENBERRY: Thank you.

SMITH: Ms. Bass?

BASS: Thank you for your last comment about that.

But let me just start by thanking all of you for the work that you do.

And in particular, Mr. Affleck, for using your celebrity in this manner, because it's -- it's extremely powerful, and it is, as the chairman and -- and ranking member said, one of the reasons this issue has received so much attention.

And the same to you, Ms. McCain.

I wanted to reference some comments that Mr. Pendergast, when you described the deadly mineral trade and the mafia economy, I think you, you know, described it very well, but I wanted to know in your opinion what about the political leadership? Is it there?

I mean, there is an election that's getting ready to happen in -- in November. Is there legitimate -- we talked about the elections being legitimate, you know, maybe they will be, maybe they won't, but my question is is there legitimate political leadership to be elected?

PENDERGAST: Well, the -- the -- just in 30 seconds, you know, we have this country which for 125, 150 years has been just pillaged by the international community for -- going back to the turn of the last century, ivory and rubber to help our jewelry industry and our auto industry.

Then our -- then uranium from the Congo was critical in our atomic bombs in Hiroshima and Nagasaki. And now cell phones, laptops and all the other things that we use every day are fueled.

And what -- what happens is you create a system, a political system that basically is designed to maximize private gain and crater the public sector, because the public sector, the rule of law, would undermine this.

So you have internal collaborators with this international system, but it's a system that benefits us. We got cheap phones. We got cheap computers. We had -- we had nuclear weapons that worked. We had down the keys and all the rest of it at the turn of the century with the ivory that was (inaudible).

So, you know, in other words this is going on for so long, it's hard to say suddenly, you know, oh. We're going to turn this around in a -- in a -- in -- with one election. It's a system that -- in which the termites have absolutely devastating the political foundation of the country. And that has -- until you address that economic foundation, I don't think -- it's just a changing chairs on the Titanic, on the deck of the Titanic with these -- with these electoral processes. Terribly important to invest in, but you've got to do both the political and the economic at the same time to make a difference.

(UNKNOWN): I wanted to ask another question, too. This is about AFRICOM. The question is the United States African Command, or AFRICOM, has been engaging in pilot training of one battalion focusing on human rights and unit cohesion conditions. And AFRICOM is controversial. So my question is: should the U.S. expand on this project to address other security needs? And then I guess, just in reference to what you were saying before, you know, I remember 20-30 years ago when there were liberation movements in the various countries. And we can talk about how all those turned out. But there were independence and liberation movements. And so I don't think you have described one in the Congo.

(UNKNOWN): You want to also say something, Don? Is the -- Jeff (ph), jump in if you want -- if you -- no, no. I'm saying if you want to say anything after I'm done (inaudible)...

(CROSSTALK)

(UNKNOWN): OK, go ahead.

(UNKNOWN): ... have something to say about this.

The military reform issue, I think, is -- I mean, I think eci, if you look at their recommendations, we look at what The Enough Project and others that have worked on this stuff, military reform, security sector reform is at the top of anyone's list of what we need to invest in. Now you go to Congo and you spend time with the Congolese leadership, and what militaries do they respect? You know, it's not a surprise. The United States military. So when the U.S. comes in and says, we're going to train a battalion in Kisangani, this makes a difference to them. People are getting -- bumping each other out of line to sign up to be part of this. So the United States has influence. It has leverage on this one.

And here's one where, if we work more aggressively to get -- and this is why you need a special envoy, because we don't have enough diplomatic firepower with the existing system to be able to do this kind of full-time work -- is to get the donors together that actually do military training like China, like South Africa, like Angola, the countries that actually have influence with the Congolese government. We work together with them about a systemic reform of the military. And then AFRICOM becomes a major player in all of that. And, specifically, I want to highlight one element of the larger security form (ph). That's military justice. Again, we have a comparative advantage there. They respect us on this front. You've got to get at this impunity issue.

Getting at the impunity issue within the military, even as much or maybe more important within -- than within the broader society, you start to see convictions for rapes and for other kinds of crimes in Congo of military officers or soldiers who are involved in this kind of stuff. Then we're going to -- that sends a signal. So these are the building blocks to a state. And I think the AFRICOM, for all the controversy on other fronts, is -- can play a major important role in the Congo in helping to build that particular block of the larger foundation.

(UNKNOWN): Thank you.

(UNKNOWN): Yes, I think the relevance of AFRICOM there has to do with, you know, look -- monusco does all of the training now, the frdc. They work together, they train guys. They are having difficulties. We are better at it than they are. I met some of our guys down there doing this work. They're -- obviously they're great guys. They're U.S. military. They really know what they're doing, men and women. They're doing a very -- just training a very few units. That's good. It needs to happen. It -- and I hate to have all these answers come with caveats, because then I don't want to feel like, well, you know, but you got to do everything. But, really, you also -- that has to be accompanied by some reform in the units that they go back to, particularly a huge, huge problem is that soldiers just don't get paid. A legacy from the Mubutu area was you kind of went and lived off the people.

Mubutu, you know, had destroyed all the infrastructure and eaten up all the money. And so he sent his army around. It was like, well, you want to get paid? Take what you can take. You got a gun. And there's a little bit of that left. People -- not a little bit, a lot, unfortunately. I've visited the frdc battalion camps, they're like tent cities. They're a little better than the refugee camps. In fact, they often go and loot and pillage from those refugee camps. Frdc soldiers are responsible for 40 percent, some say, of the rapes in the country. This is where you have a military that's deployed among the population that's feeding off of the population. It's unimaginable to us. Our militaries go elsewhere and secure our freedoms. This is a horrible inversion of that.

So I mean (inaudible) better off, I think, we just took the divisions out of there. That's not practical politically. But what is practical is to go around and just train troops on one side. I would love for us to take over a little bit more, or do some training of the munisco guys. But on the other side, you know, get people paid. If you can only make $40 a month being a soldier, I think for rdc. But at least it's enough to buy what you need where you're not compelled to, you know, go out -- I mean, they walk. There's fish in kisingani. It's 800 miles to go somewhere. They walk that far. It's like, you know, ancient Rome.

SMITH: Mr. McDermott?

MCDERMOTT: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I'd like you to respond to the need for PEPFAR being -- money being included for the Congo in the treatment as particular in turn of maternal-infant transmission of AIDS and the fact that PEPFAR does not affect the Congo. That's one thing I'd like.

And the second thing is, I think you get a little more humble as you go along in this business, and you realize that passing a bill isn't everything that it's cut out to be.

You're going to have like champagne and have a good time and clap your hands and be happy. It really is writing the rules and regulation where it really happens.

And that's going on right now. And I would like you, John, to talk about what the committee can do -- because you put this up as an action item -- what the committee should be looking for in the writing of those rules and regulations as to whether they are good rules and regulations, or rather they're slippery. I've been doing this long enough to know that you can't hardly write a law that somebody can't figure out a way to get around. So what I -- what I'm really looking for is the best set of rules and regulations that we can have to make this law work, and what things we, as a committee, should be looking at, or we as a Congress should be looking at.

(UNKNOWN): Congressman McDermott, I'm sorry. I can't answer that question as I don't work in AIDS relief and I'm not familiar with that kind of programming.

(UNKNOWN): I don't know the specific answer on PEPFAR. So I -- but I think, between us, between our staffs, we can get back (inaudible)...

(CROSSTALK)

MCDERMOTT: I know it's a problem at Heal Africa, in Goma, because I know where they're getting their drugs. They're not getting...

(UNKNOWN): You're right. They are short on drugs in Heal Africa. And there's Dr. Shakelee (ph) -- what's the program? It was like a (OFF-MIKE) (inaudible)?

(UNKNOWN): (OFF-MIKE) (Inaudible).

(UNKNOWN): Right. Anyway, there are shortages.

(CROSSTALK)

(UNKNOWN): ... PEPFAR's a great program and, obviously, implementation is good and (inaudible) access to those drugs is important. We can furnish the committee with details of that, (inaudible).

MCDERMOTT: I was asking a softball so you could let the committee know. But, go ahead. The more tough question is the regulations.

(UNKNOWN): I think that the top two, I would say, for the SEC regulations -- I -- and they're, you know, they're getting bombarded right now because the industry, you know, lost that battle on The Hill. And they're mad and they're coming back with lots of lobbyists to try to push the -- press the SEC to water this thing down like you said, so keep the cork in the champagne. We're not done yet. You're absolutely right.

Number one, I think that there be stiff fines for companies that do not comply with the intent of the law, do not open up the books to demonstrate that their supply chains, indeed, are free of conflict. And if they're not, they're at least acknowledging, yes, we got it from there and, yes, we know where it came from and now, consumers, you can make your choices. But if you try to hide it, you try to circumvent it and try to subvert it, then let's see some serious fines.

Secondly, I think then is the -- is the question of when this all should come into effect. And I think one of the big things that you're seeing lobbyists push for now is a significant delay in implementation. I -- we haven't yet seen the State department make its own recommendations on the -- in this regard. But I talked to a senior member of the administration last night, who said that they were going to not advocate for a delay. I hope that his opinion is actually the -- ends up being the U.S. government's opinion. But right now the SEC is hearing from a lot of industry sources that they simply can't comply with all this, although other companies, particularly within the electronics industry, they've been working on this now for a couple years, partly as a response to the legislation but partly also because some of them want to do the right thing.

And they've shown very clearly that they can do what is required to do with respect to the law, illustratively. Apple, you know, a year and a half ago, Apple was not much of a contributor to the Electronics Industry Association and its efforts to try to clean up the supply chain. They basically -- their argument, if you'd talk to them about it, was, look, we have no idea where this stuff is coming from. How can we possibly be expected to know. It's, you know, it's a war down there and where it comes from is not really something we can control. Well, two -- a week ago now, we've had the legislation.

We've had Mr. Jobs actually get personally engaged and his wife, of course, with VCI (ph). And now, a week ago, Apple put out its whatever report that it does. And it was the most robust reporting of any company on where their -- where their materials are coming from, right down to the smelters, to the processors. And, I mean, it -- this is something, again, the lobbyists said a year ago, even that were working for Apple, said it was impossible. So, you know, basically, I think this is what the legislation is going to be able to do. It's going to urge people to actually do the right thing when they're -- they've said for quite a long time they can't. They actually can. So the question is, how fast are they going to have to do it. And instead of, you know, a delay of a year or two years or whatever some of these guys are asking for, we'd like to see the timely implementation of the -- of the -- of the regulations and to come into force very quickly after the SEC makes its rulings.

MCDERMOTT: Keep on making the publicity to keep it up above the radar. Thank you.

VIGAUD-WALSH: Thank you. Just to add one note, Catholic Relief Services and USCB did write the SEC to ask for the absolutely most -- strongest rules possible. And we hope for the timely implementation as well.

Thank you.

MCDERMOTT: Good. Thank you.

SMITH: Thank you, Mr. McDermott.

Mr. Payne, you have any final (inaudible)?

PAYNE: Just want to say that we do have to really make sure that they don't change when -- it was interesting, years ago, I was able to encourage Congressman Tancredo, who was working with me on Sudan, to get a bill passed in the House that capital market sanctions were put in. In other words, if you were doing business in Sudan, you had to come out of Wall Street. And we passed it in the House. But that's where it ended. Boy, the lobbyists ran over to the Senate.

(UNKNOWN): ... out of Wall Street. And we passed that in the House, but that's where it ended. Boy, the lobbyists ran over to the Senate. Even had the head of every top (inaudible) Mr. Tancredo, who was great on Sudan, we - we didn't have champagne when it passed but we were very happy. And it simply died by virtue of the lobbyists saying, "You can't do that." So hopefully we will be able to push this through.

I just had a comment from the International Crisis Group that would like to add their statement for the record, Mr. Chairman.

SMITH: Objection.

(UNKNOWN): Thank you.

SMITH: Thank you. I'll just conclude by again thanking you. I would like to ask - maybe Mr. Pendergast, you might want to speak to this - the administration's LRA strategy. How well or poorly do you think it's being implemented? What is it from your perspective? Anyone else would want to touch on it as well.

PENDERGAST: Thanks for bringing that up. We should have - I should have at least in my testimony. I think it's such a crucial element of overall security and stability in central Africa. I - we've battled internally within our organizations and the groups that care about the LRA. We've (ph) putting out this report card. And I was - I was trying to give the administration Ds and Fs. And everybody's like, "Nah, nah, nah, that'll just demoralize everyone."

Because I - you know, I feel like there is one major thing that has to be done. I mean, the elephant is swinging its tail around the living room. It's that you have to create a focused military strategy to apprehend or whatever the leadership of the Lord's Resistance Army as long as Joseph Kony continues to run around. We've presented him with a very, very fair peace deal - peace proposal, which he didn't even bother to show up to not sign.

And so there's a military option that needs to be exercised. What has happened now over the last three years is a broader counterinsurgency strategy where millions and millions dollars and thousands of Ugandan troops are running around central Africa attacking LRA units. And often those are - those are formerly - or conscripted child soldiers.

I don't think that kind of a broad counterinsurgency strategy has any chance of working. We need to target the leadership, use our technical assets that are superior to anyone's in the world, ensure that they're out there. We robustly support a commando unit to be able to close and act on a hot lead and take these guys out.

Hopefully we'll apprehend them and send them to Hague and there'll be a great trial and the ICC will have a major success. If not, let's do what we have to do to bring an end to this tragedy. Because the attacks in the Congo are getting worse, not better.

We've seen almost an attack every week over the last few months in northeastern Congo. And these are remote areas no one knows. Every once in a while a report trickles in and it makes a little column in a local newspaper here in the United States. It's just not even - we're not even looking at this anymore. So we have to refocus and say, "What is the thing that's going to end it?" That's the catalyst I think that will end it.

(UNKNOWN): I think he makes a really good point. I think, you know, absolutely. I've seen people. I've seen the evidence of this stuff and people who are after it (ph). There are really good people involved and trying to pursue some of the goals that John's talking about. And you do hear every month or two, "Oh well, 400 people got killed." (inaudible) often times it will take two, three days or a week to come - to even come through.

I think it's equally important to maintain a focus on the FDLR in eastern Congo. The FDLR really are the people that - well, their leadership now - committed the genocide in Rwanda, fled to what was then Zaire, created - injected this sort of sociopath toxic poison into the - it wasn't like people weren't raping one another in Zaire. You know, that's where everyone in Rwanda was going to like party and dance when Rwanda was the uptight country in the early 90s.

And what happened was that these people who got pushed into that place who had committed these barbaric crimes then sort of allowed that to be - it got contagious and they further ruptured the social fabric. The subsequent two wars completely obliterated any infrastructure.

These guys are still there and they're still killing civilians all the time. They're a big part of whose committing the rapes and they're the ones that we - we need to stay (ph) at. We need to support (inaudible)'s effort to do that despite some - some push back.

And I think it's important to remember there's the CNEP (ph). And obviously they've committed a lot of crimes. They are now part of the army that presents - you know, Congo has very openly said, you know, peace first, justice second. And you know, they're in a tough spot with that kind of thing.

But the FDLR there's no question about because they're not getting (ph) pulled into the army. And some of them are going to fight to the death. And that part of the country will not be safe until that militia is dealt with, as well as the LRA who's very (ph) from Uganda to CAR (ph). Thank you.

SMITH (?): And one final statement or question. There's no doubt that Senator Danforth, had he not initiated the work with regards to the comprehensive peace agreement in the Congo, there probably would not have been a comprehensive peace agreement. And like (inaudible).

(UNKNOWN): Sudan.

SMITH: In Sudan. And in like manner, in Northern Ireland had it not been for Senator Mitchell it is unlikely that a peace agreement would have been hammered out there between two disparate parties that were at each other's throats for decades.

One last appeal, when Ambassador Yamamoto said he will take it under advisement with regards to the special weapons or special envoy, I didn't get a very strong sense of affirmation here. If you could - all of you if you'd like - make one final appeal to the administration, because time is running. And the fear is that if we don't have someone who can really cobble together all the disparate elements here and really push hard, this may be opportunity lost.

(UNKNOWN): Yes. I just would like to reemphasize that it's the key thing if we're going to see success in the DRC. And it's - it's vital. And finally I certainly would like to commend you, Ms. McCain, for, you know, when you said you've been involved since 1994, to continue to be way ahead of the curve. I really commend you for that and for your continued interest. Thank you.

(UNKNOWN): I - yeah, thank you very much on the (ph) special advisor. I haven't heard any good arguments against it. We've been banging on it, talking about it and going everywhere and asking about it, and no one can tell me why it's a bad idea. It's one appointment in the federal government that could save potentially, who knows, 100,000 lives, 500,000 lives? A lot. It will make a difference - a big difference if it helps prevent another outbreak of violence and destruction.

I don't know Washington. I'm not an expert. What I hear is that it's a tough place because you've got turf battles and bureaucracy. And fortunately that's your business, not mine. But I do - I'm really pleased to - to be encouraged by you and to be empowered by you to continue to advocate for this. Because I too think it's really important.

And I know that Ambassador Yamamoto, were he to give us his full- throated support and Assistant Secretary Carson would give us his support, it would really help us to go to the secretary and even on if necessary to President Obama. Thank you again.

(UNKNOWN): You know, Mr. Smith, you might ask - you've been asking probably why we should have it. Maybe you should just turn the question around and ask them, "Why not?" See if they can come up with an answer.

VIGAUD-WALSH: Chairman, you started off speaking about the elections. And I think that my final appeal would regard increasing women's political participation. As I said before, we're at a critical juncture and we're not seeing women represented. In fact, not only are they being sidelined, but they're being cast out of the process.

And to give you an example, after enduring sustained pressure by their male counterparts, three female mayors in south (inaudible), the equivalent of mayors, but actually of a grouping of cities - quite a high position in fact, administrative position - were forced out of office. The bishop of Bukavu had even gone to them and tried to encourage them to carry out their political mandate and represent women and girl's needs. And finally in November they were fired.

It's unacceptable. And if women do not represent themselves and their needs, their health, their education needs, then who will? We're not seeing others in the DRC represent their needs. So that would be my final appeal. Thank you.

(UNKNOWN): I think we need to understand that the system is like we've got this. We've got this under control. System doesn't like aberrations. They don't like these things like special envoys and other kind of exceptions to the rule. That's just the way institutions work and the State Department is no different than any other institutions.

My understanding is - and this is what I fear and this is what I think - I'm glad we got our last chance to say this because I want to impart this to you - is my fear is that they're going to give this position - they're going to create the title of it and then give it to a deputy assistant secretary of state.

They're going to (inaudible) deputy assistance secretary of state and say, "Yes, that's going to be our point person, our lead person." Again, no human being has enough time to be a deputy assistance secretary of state of any regional bureau in the US State Department and be a special envoy to one of the most complicated countries in the world, definitely the most complicated I've ever been in in 25 years of working in Africa. So that would be a tragic mistake.

And secondly I think that position needs juice. Sorry to use a Hollywood juice. You need influence. You need gravitas. You need somebody who can make the system respond to different ideas, new ideas, to doing things in a way that are actually going to get results and bring an end to something rather than manage symptoms.

And that person needs to respond - that person needs to report to the secretary of state as opposed to being just only in a regional bureau. I think these are the keys to success, and if we don't have them it's just going to be another little spoke in a wheel of failure.

SMITH: Thank you. Ms. McCain.

MCCAIN: Lastly, I would just like to thank all of you again for paying attention to this issue, for listening to us, for allowing us to tell you our thoughts and where we think the most important parts lie (ph). And most importantly in championing this issue from here. Because we'll be following you and we're going to watch. And we really encourage you to continued in such a wholehearted way. As a mother - and the only thing I can say is that as a mother doing nothing is unacceptable there. So thank you.

SMITH: Thank you. And the last word goes to Ms. McCain. Thank you so very much. Truly inspiring panel, truly inspiring individuals. The hearing's adjourned.

USA: Trafficking in Persons: A 3D Approach

LENGTH: 3975 words

DATELINE: Washington

Washington, March 05 -- The U.S Department Of State has issued following remarks:

Hello and thank you for that kind introduction and for the invitation by PACOM today to talk about how together we can make tangible progress against modern slavery in the Pacific region. Some have asked, "Why does America care about whether someone is held in servitude in another country?" "Why is this foreign policy?" or even "How dare America issue an annual report analyzing what other countries are doing on this issue - isn't such unilateralism presumptuous?" Some of you here today may even be asking yourselves, "How does a civilian human rights issue apply to me while I am at Pacific Command?"

Here's what we know. We know human trafficking is a crime; a human rights abuse; a byproduct of conflict; an issue of national security, public health, and democracy; a labor and migration issue; and a growing global phenomenon. As we have seen in many places the world over, it must be at the forefront of our planning when we race to respond to a natural disaster or conflict.

In and around deployments that many of you may have experienced - Haiti, Iraq, the Balkans - pimps and exploiters have taken advantage of the chaos to find and abuse their victims. Sexual enslavement can take place not only in a brothel or on a street corner, but in the context of war, and has been prosecuted as a crime against humanity before the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia.

As Secretary Clinton said recently, anywhere from 12 to 27 million people are currently held in bondage for labor or prostitution. That's equivalent to all the people who live in London, at the low end, and the combined populations of New York City, San Francisco, and Washington, D.C., at the high end.

The victims range from the men and women enslaved in fields, factories, and brothels, to the girls and boys whose childhoods have been shattered and stolen, to the parents whose children have vanished. And they feel that no one can help them, that no one is looking for them, that no one cares.

It is our responsibility to find the victims, help them, prosecute their traffickers, and find ways to prevent enslavement in the first place. You are no doubt familiar with the "3D" foreign policy approach of diplomacy, development, and defense. Not to belabor the construct, but those 3Ds can also fuel an anti-trafficking strategy of deterrence, disruption, and demand, that can help us confront an unfortunate reality in the PACOM Area of Responsibility - too often, countries follow a more unfortunate "3D" paradigm, as all too often we see victims experience the phenomenon of detention, deportation, and disempowerment. This must stop.

This is not a theoretical matter to me, or an issue for politics. I did not learn about human trafficking in an office, a cubicle, or a think tank. For me, the survivors of trafficking - in all its forms - are people I know, people whose experiences as told to me are seared into my memory. The people who trusted me to fight for them in court. The people who have shared both their tears and their strength with me as they recounted horrific abuse at the hands of pimps or bosses. The people who believed that the United States stood for something, and placed their sacred trust with me and my team at the Justice Department to vindicate their rights.

Human trafficking is a scourge on the Earth, and the United States is certainly no exception. This year, for the first time, the annual Trafficking in Persons Report evaluated and ranked the United States' efforts to combat trafficking - we held ourselves accountable to the same standards to which we hold other governments. We found that trafficking occurs for both sex and labor. We see it in domestic servitude, agriculture, manufacturing, janitorial services, construction, health care, and beauty salons. We see trafficking in prostitution and strip clubs, as the traffickers dehumanize and destroy.

In including the United States, we looked at the situation in the US and the response of the government. We called for submissions from NGOs, and listened to their insight and read their data. The United States was placed on Tier One of the Report. Not a reprieve or a foregone conclusion, but a responsibility based on the evidence.

And Tier One is not an "A" grade by any means; it just means that countries meet the Minimum Standards set forth by Congress. In other words, just passing the threshold.

Even if you haven't seen this modern form of slavery up close and personal like I did for fifteen years as a federal prosecutor, you know from our own tragic American history the damage that chattel slavery left in its wake. The destructive impact it had on family, community, country. On our economy, and our security.

It is because of our own experience as a Nation that we know slavery - whether in the slave trade of the 19th century or in the modern forms of slavery we see today - to be an affront to our most basic rights as Americans and as human beings in a global community.

Creating strong communities and policies that eradicate the modern form of slavery that we see today is paramount to providing the stability needed to achieve trade, security, and economic success. And so often, the men and women called upon to guarantee that freedom have been in our Armed Forces. As representatives of the United States, military personnel at all levels have a special responsibility to combat human trafficking.

It comes back to the most fundamental crimes that we have confronted for so long as a nation - piracy and slavery. Just as Decatur went into Algiers to deal with the Barbary pirates and their protectors who were taking American and European slaves, America in 2011 again finds itself confronting the old evils of piracy and slavery around the world. Just as African-Americans during the Civil War knew that they could find freedom if they could just reach the lines of the U.S. Army, we again find ourselves providing protection and refuge.

While our history with this heinous practice may be unique, the struggle against it spans time and region. For as long as people of every community, culture, and country in the world are enslaved, our work and efforts must go on.

That's where PACOM comes in. We cannot meaningfully address this issue without focusing on your AOR. We cannot meaningfully address this issue without focusing on Asia.

According to the International Labor Organization, the prevalence of forced labor and sexual servitude is highest in Asia, with almost three in every 1,000 inhabitants falling victim. Also, the International Organization for Migration and World Bank data show that the majority of the over 200 million transnational migrants in the world are from Asia. Within the growing pool of Asian migrants - reflecting greater labor mobility in the region and in the world - is a huge population of people who are victims of sex and labor trafficking.

As the percentage of women migrants in that pool grows exponentially, we have to recognize the feminization of migration, and the multitude of issues that are specific to women. So we see women held in sex slavery, in labor servitude, or working in situations where they routinely face sexual harassment or even rape.

Unfortunately, the number of countries in Asia downgraded in the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report was greater than the number upgraded. Many Asian governments lack adequate laws, and more have failed to produce significant convictions of trafficking offenders.

None of the countries in South Asia has ratified the decade-old UN Palermo Protocol, though they have joined the South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation (SAARC) anti-TIP convention. The SAARC convention, however, is problematic for numerous reasons, one of which is that it focuses on sex trafficking rather than on both sex and labor trafficking. Furthermore, the ASEAN countries have not formulated regional strategies along the lines of the Council of Europe or the Organization of American States.

While some countries in Asia have passed legislation to prohibit trafficking, governments as a whole have not yet shown the political will to hold the traffickers to the fullest account, in the form of sentencing reflective of the severity of the crimes they commit. Some countries only focus on sex trafficking - and not from a compassionate place, but by locking up the women as illegal immigrant prostitutes or criminals, rather than recognizing them as victims.

So too, it has been a steep learning curve for some governments to consider issues of labor trafficking. Forced labor cases - untold thousands of women working as maids or seamstresses and men in construction or agriculture - are sometimes treated as administrative violations, if confronted at all.

And each year, by statute, the United States has to assess these countries, make a determination as to what is being done, and rank them by the Congressionally-mandated minimum standards.

Secretary Clinton has said it best:

Countries come to us and ask very forcefully not to be dropped in their category and we hear them out and we tell them [...] the kinds of things that we would look to that would demonstrate the commitment that we think would make a difference, to talk about best practices, to share stories. And some countries have listened and the results speak for themselves. Others have not.

Now this is a process that is fraught with all kinds of feelings and I recognize that, but the easiest way to get out of the tier three and get off the watch list is to really act. And we had some real friends, friends - countries that are friends on so many important issues, and they were very upset when we told them that they were not going to progress and, in fact, were in danger of regressing. And then they said, "Well, what can we do?" And we said, "Well, we've pointed this out, we point it out again, and we will stand ready to help you."

Friends help each other - not just with convenient facts, but sometimes with inconvenient truths. And in the anti-trafficking world, that kind of friendship means honesty about the problems we see.

For instance, in the past several years, we have learned a lot about the forced labor of migrant workers in the fishing and seafood processing industries. In a 2006 study, the ILO found that 43 percent of Burmese in the Thai fishing sector who have given over possession of their identity documents to their employers cannot access these documents when they want to. In many cases, the employers hold onto these documents to purposefully restrict their employees' movement, even though without them migrants are vulnerable to arrest and deportation.

A UN survey of men and boys who were victims of forced labor on Thai fishing boats (which travel throughout the Pacific region) found that 29 of 49 (59 percent) reported seeing a murder by the boat captain. The problem of forced labor on fishing vessels in the Pacific region is one on which we are attempting to gain greater information and encourage governments to address - the inherently isolated nature of work on these vessels, and the legal jurisdictions of the waters in which these boats operate, make this a particularly difficult challenge.

We know that there are tens, and possibly hundreds of thousands of foreign migrant workers - many of whom are trafficked - in the Southeast Asian fishery industries. While this problem is widespread, in Thailand, we are aware of only six offenders convicted by the Royal Thai Government for the forced labor of foreign workers in the industry - all but one of whom were freed on bail after conviction, pending their appeals. While the convictions represented successes in Thailand's efforts to combat trafficking, their limited number speaks to the work that still needs to be done. Meanwhile, it is Malaysia, pushed by a Tier 3 ranking in 2009, that embarked on the first steps towards addressing its multi-faceted human trafficking problem.

Farther north, Vietnam reported to us that last year, they did not criminally prosecute any labor trafficking offenders, but they fined 98 recruitment companies a total of $10,900 and revoked the licenses of two firms. That's a start, but it is an average of only $111 per firm - and a total of less than what one worker pays to be recruited for a job abroad.

Indeed, a lack of avenues for redress of complaints by Indonesian, Bangladeshi, Sri Lankan, and Nepali men and women in many East Asian destination countries denies them justice and a chance of effective recovery. It also fails in providing a deterrent through tough criminal sanctions to traffickers. Clearly, we have to elevate the ramifications for this type of exploitation above the cost of doing business.

Equally harmful to the cause is official denial by governments which continue to refute the existence of a trafficking problem. This is often true of more developed nations. For example, in one small but developed Asian country, the denial of a problem has prevented effective victim identification or assistance efforts. It resulted in the mass arrest and deportation of over seven thousand women and girls in prostitution last year. Among this population, only one individual was officially identified by the government as a trafficking victim.

Again: one victim identified, out of seven thousand women who were identified as foreign prostitutes. Think about how likely that is.

Millions of the victims of bonded labor and domestic service are women and girls, and they are exposed to not just physical, but sexual predation at the hands of their captors. I will never forget two young Indian girls - taken from their bonded laborer parents at 11. They were forced to work as maids, waitresses, and sex slaves for their master. He didn't respect their freedom or their bodies, and he didn't respect the labels we use to describe their situation. I may have put him in prison where he belongs, but I can never regain what these young women had lost.

In South Korea, the government has had some success prosecuting sex traffickers and offering services to the victims. There is a known presence of women and girls in forced commercial sexual exploitation, including foreign women recruited to work on entertainment visas as singers and bars near U.S. military facilities. We know that women such as these often incur thousands of dollars in debts, contributing to their vulnerability to debt bondage upon arrival. The issue of child sex tourism - one that the U.S. government attempts to tackle head-on through extraterritorial application of relevant laws - is also one shared by South Korea and Japan, and the 2010 TIP Report sets forth how men from those countries fuel the demand for trafficking in Cambodia and other poorer countries. But unlike the United States, South Korea has never prosecuted one of its citizens for sex tourism, and Japan's last prosecution was in 2005.

The reality is that enforcement regimes in the Pacific region are woefully inadequate. Resource constraints, corruption, and a lack of political will have created an enabling environment in which sex slavery and forced labor thrives, and exploiters rarely face meaningful penalties.

Yet clear successes are being registered. While ranked Tier 2 Watch List just a few years ago, perhaps the strongest Tier 1 jurisdiction in the Pacific region is Taiwan - thanks to its political commitment to carrying out a series of tough anti-trafficking reforms. Now, foreign victims of trafficking in Taiwan stand a much greater chance of being identified, subsequently given assistance to get back on their feet, and gain legitimate employment with legal immigration status. Taiwan authorities have made a commitment not just to enforcement, but to victim care, and that's making them stand out.

In the past year, the Philippine Government - led by a new President and a Congressman who doesn't just score knock-outs in the ring - has heeded the call to take more seriously its responsibility to address the trafficking of its citizens within the country and abroad, and the government has publicly linked these efforts to the threat of a downgrade to Tier 3 in the 2011 TIP Report. The hundreds of backlogged trafficking cases in the court system are beginning to be fast-tracked, corrupt officials are being identified and punished, government resources have increased to combat trafficking, and most importantly, mechanisms to improve the government's anti-trafficking responses are being institutionalized.

Similarly, Indonesia has made good use of its 2007 anti-tip law, prosecuting the largest number of labor trafficking offenders (79) of any East Asian government in 2009.

We want to encourage other Asian countries to embark on similar courses. And the Defense Department can help. On February 1, Secretary Clinton and I had the privilege of convening the cabinet-level meeting on trafficking in persons. Annually, the Departments of State, Defense, Justice, Agriculture, Labor, Health & Human Services, Education, and Interior, as well as the heads of other agencies including the Director of National Intelligence and Chair of the Equal Opportunity Commission, come together to discuss this issue. This year, the meeting was on National Freedom Day, which commemorates the day in 1865 that President Lincoln sent the 13th Amendment to the states for ratification.

Secretary Gates spoke of the importance of enforcing the DOD zero-tolerance policy against forced labor and sex trafficking, of mandatory trainings for the Total Forces to identify and respond to human trafficking, and of the findings of Inspector General audits and reports of defense contractors overseas. Secretary of Interior Ken Salazar spoke about the upcoming need for interagency coordination to prevent forced labor and prostitution in overseas U.S. territories.

It was inspiring to see our senior leadership engaged and committed to delivering on the promise of freedom that had been made 146 years ago. As President Obama said when declaring January to be slavery and trafficking awareness month, we need to "acknowledge that forms of slavery still exist in the modern era, and recommit ourselves to stopping the human traffickers who ply this horrific trade."

There was another key announcement made at the meeting that is particularly relevant to you. In November 2010, nearly 60 private security companies signed the International Code of Conduct for Private Security Service Providers, crafted by industry representatives, governments, and NGOs - an effort supported by the U.S. Government. Here we have companies pledging to uphold a number of principles both in their company policies and in the conduct of their personnel, including not engaging or benefiting from human trafficking or prostitution. These are companies that very well may be DOD contractors that are recognizing that they have a role to play in eliminating forced labor and the persistent exploitation of women in prostitution.

Right now it is a code that speaks to the same principles as the government's zero tolerance policy. We need to be sure that it's not just a commitment, but that there is real action and oversight behind it, just as we are doing with our contractors. As you may know, the Departments of State and Defense, as well as USAID, are all subject to Inspector General audits as mandated by Congress. They are looking for signs of human trafficking, reporting on them, and remedying them.

Fighting trafficking is not something relegated to policy or just to the senior leadership level. You each play a role to uphold a standard of conduct - of dignity and the promise of freedom - that the U.S. Government is fighting for around the globe. It's each of you, each of us.

Because traffickers don't create the markets. Traffickers exploit their people. But it is the demand for commercial sex, for cheap goods, that they rush to meet through violence and cruelty. And so we need to end that demand. By placing certain clubs off-limits to those under your command. By including and enforcing the contracting regulations that prohibit such conduct on the part of your vendors.

By holding yourself and your staff to an appropriate and honorable standard of conduct both on and off-duty. Purchasing sex is wrong. It doesn't matter whether the woman is over 18 or how willing she may appear - because the truth is you can never know. This is one of those places where government policy truly conforms with human obligation. Through your actions, you can do a great deal to advance not only government policy but the opportunity and freedom of women and girls around the world.

This is driven by demand. No girl or woman would be a victim of sex trafficking if there were no profits to be made from their exploitation. You each play a role in reducing that demand, and living by example - by refraining personally from engaging in human trafficking or buying commercial sex, not just because of the UCMJ or National Security Presidential Directive 22, but because it is the right thing to do.

In the DC area, DHS has put up posters that say "If you see something, say something." We can live our lives by the principle of "If you see trafficking, say stop."

And so we have to have those tough conversations with friends. Whether it is the US and our allies in the annual report, or us and our buddies. Friends have to be honest enough to help each other confront inconvenient truths. To stand for the challenge that actor Ashton Kutcher has laid down: real men don't buy girls. Or women for that matter.

But it is not enough to think that personal intolerance, or abstention, is sufficient. Real men need to speak out against bad behavior. Even when it's tough. Even when it's a friend, an associate, a colleague. Especially then. Bachelor parties, R and R's, when it's your best friend or your boss or your brother-in-law and you're just not the type to cause drama. Think of the drama in the woman's life that - absent your action - would otherwise continue unabated.

Do something. Make buying sex as embarrassing as it should be.

In the wake of the Civil War, the promise of freedom was so often delivered by your predecessors. Navy and Coast Guard cutters intercepted raiders who tried to kidnap newly-freed slaves to take them to Cuba and Hispaniola. The Army enforced the involuntary servitude statutes in the occupied South. Military governors and courts freed domestic servants from peonage in the Southwest territories.

Today, whether in a broken Haitian village or a war-torn countryside, we rely on you to be equally vigilant. Third Country Nationals brought in by contractors. The local women and girls. Even things explained away as cultural practices, such as the Haitian restaveks or the Afghan bacha bazi. All of these things can be prevented by you, both in your commands and in your personal lives.

Collectively, we cannot afford to have a fragmented or partial U.S. Government approach. The Department of State stands ready to partner with you to advance the anti-trafficking efforts of the countries within your area of responsibility, for instance, by leveraging your expertise to build capacity and train foreign law enforcement.

As a nation looked to as a world leader on this issue, much is expected of us. And, as Americans we expect much from ourselves. And so let us heed the words of President Obama, "From every corner of our Nation, to every part of the globe, [let us] stand firm in defense of freedom and bear witness for those exploited by modern slavery."

Thank you.

AML and Human Trafficking

BYLINE: Shane KiteSECTION: SHIFTING GEARS; Pg. 1 Vol. 24 No. 03LENGTH: 497 words

Anti-money laundering (AML) vendors are tweaking their systems to spot suspicious activity pegged to human trafficking while the government continues to promote more awareness of the crime by informing banks and their vendors of its telltale signs.

While the numbers are controversial-it's basically impossible to attain an accurate count when so few report the crime-the U.N estimates that human trafficking represents a $32 billion annual global trade that, according to the U.S. State Department, forces 12.3 million adults and children into slave labor or prostitution. Some experts say trafficking involving the sex trade is one of the fastest growing criminal enterprises.

Governments have therefore tried to help both AML vendors and banks spot potential human trafficking patterns in the money nexus to aid in stemming the crime and in prosecuting its alleged purveyors.

Project STAMP, launched a year ago by U.S. Immigrations and Customs Enforcement (ICE), aims to "assist financial institutions in developing the typologies necessary to proactively target and report on [human trafficking and smuggling] organizations attempting to launder their illicit proceeds."

ICE says banks should be particularly aware of multiple financial transactions structured under $3,000 on the same day at money service businesses (MSBs), a pattern in which traffickers have been known to engage. MSBs are often bank customers. Angie Salazar, a special agent and national program manager in ICE's human smuggling and trafficking unit, said in January during a Web seminar sponsored by the Association of Certified Anti-Money Laundering Specialists (ACAMS) that banks should watch for "round number payments tied to spas or massage parlors."

AML solution providers like Fiserv, NICE (Actimize), Oracle (Mantas) and SAS have added people, companies and behaviors the government says are associated with human trafficking to watch list filters that cross-check the data against banks' customer accounts.

Tony Wicks, director of AML Solutions at NICE Actimize, says several customers in California and Europe used Actimize's pattern analysis several years ago to pinpoint unusual customer account behaviors, which were later pegged to human trafficking.

Jeroen Dekker, product manager of financial crime risk management solutions at Fiserv, cautions that AML software detects only "money laundering patterns, not the underlying predicate offenses," though tools like Fiserv's screen transaction counterparties against trafficking typologies and entities.

Cameron Jones, director of product management at SAS Institute's fraud and financial crimes practice, says scrutiny should be applied to "high-risk countries like Mexico and Eastern Europe, escort and labor services, travel agencies, landscaping companies, nail salons, money remittances, and cross-border, low dollar wires." Jones says "a large North American bank" has used SAS AML monitoring "to detect behavior synonymous with human trafficking."

Uganda Trafficking in Persons Act Conviction

LENGTH: 359 wordsDATELINE: KAMPALA, Uganda, March 1, 2011

KAMPALA, Uganda, March 1, 2011 /PRNewswire-USNewswire/ -- On March 1, 2011 a conviction was announced in a Trafficking in Persons case by the High Court in Masindi, Uganda. According to Bob Goff, President of Restore International, who participated in the trial earlier this month, this marks a monumental step in Uganda's fight against human trafficking. In October 2009, Uganda enacted its Prevention of Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Act but had yet to see it utilized until this case was brought. The law prohibits trafficking in persons and body parts and creates a framework for prosecution and punishment of outlined offenses. The accused were the first to be charged under the new law after kidnapping a young boy, removing body parts for ritual witchcraft practices, and leaving him for dead. The young boy was found near death after having his private organs removed but has since recovered and identified his kidnappers. With this conviction, a precedent for future trafficking prosecutions has been set for the array of offenses for which the accused were found guilty.

Uganda had previously stated its commitment to combating human trafficking as a signatory to numerous international conventions but maintained a Tier 2 rating in regards to the U.S. State Department Trafficking In Persons (TIP) report in 2010 and previous years. The reasons cited in the TIP report were in part, because of Uganda's failure to implement the 2009 TIP Act by prosecuting and punishing offenders. This successful conviction has brought more about than just Uganda's first successful implementation of the anti-trafficking law; it has brought national and international attention to the successful implementation by Uganda in targeting this offence against the most vulnerable in society. This case has also provided awareness of the law's existence throughout Uganda and the legal framework to successfully bring about further convictions arising out of crimes related to the trafficking of people in the country.

IOM AND MACAO SOCIAL WELFARE BUREAU HOST COUNTER-TRAFFICKING WORKSHOP

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 296 words

DATELINE: MACAO SAR, China

The following information was released by International Organization for Migration (IOM):

IOM and the Social Welfare Bureau of China's Special Administrative Region (SAR) of Macao will host a one-day training workshop for 35 police and customs officers on human trafficking and victim identification on Monday 28 February 2011.

The Macao government-funded training follows an earlier three-day IOM counter-trafficking workshop held in the SAR in November 2009 and will be facilitated by a counter-trafficking expert from China Women's University in Beijing and specialists from IOM's office in Hong Kong.

Macao, which is home to a thriving casino and gaming industry, is one of Asia's leading tourist destinations and according to the US State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, has been a destination for the trafficking of women from mainland China, Mongolia, Russia, the Philippines, Thailand, Vietnam, Burma and Central Asia for commercial sex work.

The Office's 2010 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report classifies the SAR as "Tier 2", indicating that the government is making significant efforts to stamp out human trafficking, but has not yet achieved "Tier 1" status and eliminated the problem.

In 2007, Macao established a "Human Trafficking Deterrent Measures Concern Committee" and in 2008 adopted legislation to combat human trafficking. This criminalized traffickers and provided a legal basis for law enforcement officers to deal with the issue.

In 2009 China signed the UN Convention against Transnational Organized Crime and its Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Person, Especially Women and Children, signaling its commitment to step up efforts to stamp out human trafficking and improve victim protection nationwide.

Concern vs trafficking raised

BYLINE: Nathaniel R. MelicanSECTION: Pg. S1/11LENGTH: 114 words

CHIEF JUSTICE Renato C. Corona yesterday expressed concern that the Philippines could slip further in the US watch list of countries with rampant human trafficking cases, a situation that may risk availment of development aid from Washington.

Mr. Corona said convictions have been low.

The Philippines is in the Tier 2 Watch List, which means that the government has minimum standards against trafficking.

"With no significant developments, the Philippines runs the risk of being downgraded to Tier 3," Mr. Corona said at the first meeting of the Justice Sector Coordinating Council (JSCC).

JSCC groups the Department of Justice, Department of Interior and Local Government and the high court.

Papua New Guinea, IOM sign agreement on human-trafficking

LENGTH: 403 words

Text of report by Papua New Guinea newspaper The National website on 22 February

[By Junior Ukaha] A memorandum of understanding was signed last Friday [18 February] between the Department of Justice and Attorney-General and the International Organization for Migration (IOM) to stop counter-trafficking activities [as published] along PNG's international borders.

Justice Secretary Dr Lawrence Kalinoe and IOM Chief of Mission to PNG Giuseppe Crocetti signed the document before department staff, IOM representatives and the media at the Sir Buri Kidu Haus in Port Moresby.

Kalinoe said this would bring into effect appropriate policies and programmes "to strengthen the capacity of the PNG government to prosecute human traffickers and protect victims of trafficking".

"The MoU will allow us to put forward a legislation to stop international trans-boundary crimes involving human smuggling," Kalinoe said. "There are gaps in the constitution regarding human trafficking, therefore, the department is trying to create a new legislation to fill this," he added.

Kalinoe cited an example, saying current provisions only allowed a person or group who were guilty of human smuggling to be charged with deprivation of a person's liberty but the new legislation would explore ways to charge the offender and deal with the rights of victims.

Crocetti commended the government, saying the agreement was timely as "human trafficking cases in PNG were relatively unknown". He said more data collection, nationwide awareness and equipping of frontline public servants were needed to address trafficking.

Crocetti said IOM, in partnership with the department, over the next two years, would identify the trend of trafficking activities and come up with policies and methods to curb it.

According to Kalinoe, the US State Department (USSD) had categorized PNG as a "weak state" incapable of effectively detecting and countering human trafficking.

USSD stated in their 2008 and 2009 "People-Smuggling and Trafficking in Persons" report that PNG was under the tier-three country, meaning that it was a "source, destination and transition point" for human traffickers.

Kalinoe said the new legislation "People-Smuggling and Trafficking in Persons Bill" would be presented to the National Executive Council [cabinet] next month in preparation for parliament when it meets in May.

PREPARED REMARKS OF LUIS CDEBACA, AMBASSADOR-AT-LARGE, OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS, AT A U.S. PACIFIC COMMAND INTERAGENCY SYMPOSIUM ON TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS SUBJECT: "TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS: A 3D APPROACH" LOCATION: HONOLULU, HAWAII DATE: FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 2011

MR. CDEBACA: Hello and thank you for that kind introduction and for the invitation by PACOM today to talk about how together we can make tangible progress against modern slavery in the Pacific region. Some have asked, "Why does America care about whether someone is held in servitude in another country?" "Why is this foreign policy?" or even "How dare America issue an annual report analyzing what other countries are doing on this issue - isn't such unilateralism presumptuous?" Some of you here today may even be asking yourselves, "How does a civilian human rights issue apply to me while I am at Pacific Command?"

Here's what we know. We know human trafficking is a crime; a human rights abuse; a byproduct of conflict; an issue of national security, public health, and democracy; a labor and migration issue; and a growing global phenomenon. As we have seen in many places the world over, it must be at the forefront of our planning when we race to respond to a natural disaster or conflict.

In and around deployments that many of you may have experienced - Haiti, Iraq, the Balkans - pimps and exploiters have taken advantage of the chaos to find and abuse their victims. Sexual enslavement can take place not only in a brothel or on a street corner, but in the context of war, and has been prosecuted as a crime against humanity before the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia.

As Secretary Clinton said recently, anywhere from 12 to 27 million people are currently held in bondage for labor or prostitution. That's equivalent to all the people who live in London, at the low end, and the combined populations of New York City, San Francisco, and Washington, D.C., at the high end.

The victims range from the men and women enslaved in fields, factories, and brothels, to the girls and boys whose childhoods have been shattered and stolen, to the parents whose children have vanished. And they feel that no one can help them, that no one is looking for them, that no one cares.

It is our responsibility to find the victims, help them, prosecute their traffickers, and find ways to prevent enslavement in the first place. You are no doubt familiar with the "3D" foreign policy approach of diplomacy, development, and defense. Not to belabor the construct, but those 3Ds can also fuel an anti-trafficking strategy of deterrence, disruption, and demand, that can help us confront an unfortunate reality in the PACOM Area of Responsibility - too often, countries follow a more unfortunate "3D" paradigm, as all too often we see victims experience the phenomenon of detention, deportation, and disempowerment. This must stop.

This is not a theoretical matter to me, or an issue for politics. I did not learn about human trafficking in an office, a cubicle, or a think tank. For me, the survivors of trafficking - in all its forms - are people I know, people whose experiences as told to me are seared into my memory. The people who trusted me to fight for them in court. The people who have shared both their tears and their strength with me as they recounted horrific abuse at the hands of pimps or bosses. The people who believed that the United States stood for something, and placed their sacred trust with me and my team at the Justice Department to vindicate their rights.

Human trafficking is a scourge on the Earth, and the United States is certainly no exception. This year, for the first time, the annual Trafficking in Persons Report evaluated and ranked the United States' efforts to combat trafficking - we held ourselves accountable to the same standards to which we hold other governments. We found that trafficking occurs for both sex and labor. We see it in domestic servitude, agriculture, manufacturing, janitorial services, construction, health care, and beauty salons. We see trafficking in prostitution and strip clubs, as the traffickers dehumanize and destroy.

In including the United States, we looked at the situation in the US and the response of the government. We called for submissions from NGOs, and listened to their insight and read their data. The United States was placed on Tier One of the Report. Not a reprieve or a foregone conclusion, but a responsibility based on the evidence.

And Tier One is not an "A" grade by any means; it just means that countries meet the Minimum Standards set forth by Congress. In other words, just passing the threshold.

Even if you haven't seen this modern form of slavery up close and personal like I did for fifteen years as a federal prosecutor, you know from our own tragic American history the damage that chattel slavery left in its wake. The destructive impact it had on family, community, country. On our economy, and our security.

It is because of our own experience as a Nation that we know slavery - whether in the slave trade of the 19th century or in the modern forms of slavery we see today - to be an affront to our most basic rights as Americans and as human beings in a global community.

Creating strong communities and policies that eradicate the modern form of slavery that we see today is paramount to providing the stability needed to achieve trade, security, and economic success. And so often, the men and women called upon to guarantee that freedom have been in our Armed Forces. As representatives of the United States, military personnel at all levels have a special responsibility to combat human trafficking.

It comes back to the most fundamental crimes that we have confronted for so long as a nation - piracy and slavery. Just as Decatur went into Algiers to deal with the Barbary pirates and their protectors who were taking American and European slaves, America in 2011 again finds itself confronting the old evils of piracy and slavery around the world. Just as African-Americans during the Civil War knew that they could find freedom if they could just reach the lines of the U.S. Army, we again find ourselves providing protection and refuge.

While our history with this heinous practice may be unique, the struggle against it spans time and region. For as long as people of every community, culture, and country in the world are enslaved, our work and efforts must go on.

That's where PACOM comes in. We cannot meaningfully address this issue without focusing on your AOR. We cannot meaningfully address this issue without focusing on Asia.

According to the International Labor Organization, the prevalence of forced labor and sexual servitude is highest in Asia, with almost three in every 1,000 inhabitants falling victim. Also, the International Organization for Migration and World Bank data show that the majority of the over 200 million transnational migrants in the world are from Asia. Within the growing pool of Asian migrants - reflecting greater labor mobility in the region and in the world - is a huge population of people who are victims of sex and labor trafficking.

As the percentage of women migrants in that pool grows exponentially, we have to recognize the feminization of migration, and the multitude of issues that are specific to women. So we see women held in sex slavery, in labor servitude, or working in situations where they routinely face sexual harassment or even rape.

Unfortunately, the number of countries in Asia downgraded in the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report was greater than the number upgraded. Many Asian governments lack adequate laws, and more have failed to produce significant convictions of trafficking offenders.

None of the countries in South Asia has ratified the decade-old UN Palermo Protocol, though they have joined the South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation (SAARC) anti-TIP convention. The SAARC convention, however, is problematic for numerous reasons, one of which is that it focuses on sex trafficking rather than on both sex and labor trafficking. Furthermore, the ASEAN countries have not formulated regional strategies along the lines of the Council of Europe or the Organization of American States.

While some countries in Asia have passed legislation to prohibit trafficking, governments as a whole have not yet shown the political will to hold the traffickers to the fullest account, in the form of sentencing reflective of the severity of the crimes they commit. Some countries only focus on sex trafficking - and not from a compassionate place, but by locking up the women as illegal immigrant prostitutes or criminals, rather than recognizing them as victims.

So too, it has been a steep learning curve for some governments to consider issues of labor trafficking. Forced labor cases - untold thousands of women working as maids or seamstresses and men in construction or agriculture - are sometimes treated as administrative violations, if confronted at all.

And each year, by statute, the United States has to assess these countries, make a determination as to what is being done, and rank them by the Congressionally-mandated minimum standards.

Secretary Clinton has said it best:

Countries come to us and ask very forcefully not to be dropped in their category and we hear them out and we tell them [...] the kinds of things that we would look to that would demonstrate the commitment that we think would make a difference, to talk about best practices, to share stories. And some countries have listened and the results speak for themselves. Others have not.

Now this is a process that is fraught with all kinds of feelings and I recognize that, but the easiest way to get out of the tier three and get off the watch list is to really act. And we had some real friends, friends - countries that are friends on so many important issues, and they were very upset when we told them that they were not going to progress and, in fact, were in danger of regressing. And then they said, "Well, what can we do?" And we said, "Well, we've pointed this out, we point it out again, and we will stand ready to help you."

Friends help each other - not just with convenient facts, but sometimes with inconvenient truths. And in the anti-trafficking world, that kind of friendship means honesty about the problems we see.

For instance, in the past several years, we have learned a lot about the forced labor of migrant workers in the fishing and seafood processing industries. In a 2006 study, the ILO found that 43 percent of Burmese in the Thai fishing sector who have given over possession of their identity documents to their employers cannot access these documents when they want to. In many cases, the employers hold onto these documents to purposefully restrict their employees' movement, even though without them migrants are vulnerable to arrest and deportation.

A UN survey of men and boys who were victims of forced labor on Thai fishing boats (which travel throughout the Pacific region) found that 29 of 49 (59 percent) reported seeing a murder by the boat captain. The problem of forced labor on fishing vessels in the Pacific region is one on which we are attempting to gain greater information and encourage governments to address - the inherently isolated nature of work on these vessels, and the legal jurisdictions of the waters in which these boats operate, make this a particularly difficult challenge.

We know that there are tens, and possibly hundreds of thousands of foreign migrant workers - many of whom are trafficked - in the Southeast Asian fishery industries. While this problem is widespread, in Thailand, we are aware of only six offenders convicted by the Royal Thai Government for the forced labor of foreign workers in the industry - all but one of whom were freed on bail after conviction, pending their appeals. While the convictions represented successes in Thailand's efforts to combat trafficking, their limited number speaks to the work that still needs to be done. Meanwhile, it is Malaysia, pushed by a Tier 3 ranking in 2009, that embarked on the first steps towards addressing its multi-faceted human trafficking problem.

Farther north, Vietnam reported to us that last year, they did not criminally prosecute any labor trafficking offenders, but they fined 98 recruitment companies a total of $10,900 and revoked the licenses of two firms. That's a start, but it is an average of only $111 per firm - and a total of less than what one worker pays to be recruited for a job abroad.

Indeed, a lack of avenues for redress of complaints by Indonesian, Bangladeshi, Sri Lankan, and Nepali men and women in many East Asian destination countries denies them justice and a chance of effective recovery. It also fails in providing a deterrent through tough criminal sanctions to traffickers. Clearly, we have to elevate the ramifications for this type of exploitation above the cost of doing business.

Equally harmful to the cause is official denial by governments which continue to refute the existence of a trafficking problem. This is often true of more developed nations. For example, in one small but developed Asian country, the denial of a problem has prevented effective victim identification or assistance efforts. It resulted in the mass arrest and deportation of over seven thousand women and girls in prostitution last year. Among this population, only one individual was officially identified by the government as a trafficking victim.

Again: one victim identified, out of seven thousand women who were identified as foreign prostitutes. Think about how likely that is...

Millions of the victims of bonded labor and domestic service are women and girls, and they are exposed to not just physical, but sexual predation at the hands of their captors. I will never forget two young Indian girls - taken from their bonded laborer parents at 11. They were forced to work as maids, waitresses, and sex slaves for their master. He didn't respect their freedom or their bodies, and he didn't respect the labels we use to describe their situation. I may have put him in prison where he belongs, but I can never regain what these young women had lost.

In South Korea, the government has had some success prosecuting sex traffickers and offering services to the victims. There is a known presence of women and girls in forced commercial sexual exploitation, including foreign women recruited to work on entertainment visas as singers and bars near U.S. military facilities. We know that women such as these often incur thousands of dollars in debts, contributing to their vulnerability to debt bondage upon arrival. The issue of child sex tourism - one that the U.S. government attempts to tackle head-on through extraterritorial application of relevant laws - is also one shared by South Korea and Japan, and the 2010 TIP Report sets forth how men from those countries fuel the demand for trafficking in Cambodia and other poorer countries. But unlike the United States, South Korea has never prosecuted one of its citizens for sex tourism, and Japan's last prosecution was in 2005.

The reality is that enforcement regimes in the Pacific region are woefully inadequate. Resource constraints, corruption, and a lack of political will have created an enabling environment in which sex slavery and forced labor thrives, and exploiters rarely face meaningful penalties.

Yet clear successes are being registered. While ranked Tier 2 Watch List just a few years ago, perhaps the strongest Tier 1 jurisdiction in the Pacific region is Taiwan - thanks to its political commitment to carrying out a series of tough anti-trafficking reforms. Now, foreign victims of trafficking in Taiwan stand a much greater chance of being identified, subsequently given assistance to get back on their feet, and gain legitimate employment with legal immigration status.

Taiwan authorities have made a commitment not just to enforcement, but to victim care, and that's making them stand out.

In the past year, the Philippine Government - led by a new President and a Congressman who doesn't just score knock-outs in the ring - has heeded the call to take more seriously its responsibility to address the trafficking of its citizens within the country and abroad, and the government has publicly linked these efforts to the threat of a downgrade to Tier 3 in the 2011 TIP Report. The hundreds of backlogged trafficking cases in the court system are beginning to be fast-tracked, corrupt officials are being identified and punished, government resources have increased to combat trafficking, and most importantly, mechanisms to improve the government's anti-trafficking responses are being institutionalized.

Similarly, Indonesia has made good use of its 2007 anti-tip law, prosecuting the largest number of labor trafficking offenders (79) of any East Asian government in 2009.

We want to encourage other Asian countries to embark on similar courses. And the Defense Department can help. On February 1, Secretary Clinton and I had the privilege of convening the cabinet-level meeting on trafficking in persons. Annually, the Departments of State, Defense, Justice, Agriculture, Labor, Health & Human Services, Education, and Interior, as well as the heads of other agencies including the Director of National Intelligence and Chair of the Equal Opportunity Commission, come together to discuss this issue. This year, the meeting was on National Freedom Day, which commemorates the day in 1865 that President Lincoln sent the 13th Amendment to the states for ratification.

Secretary Gates spoke of the importance of enforcing the DOD zero-tolerance policy against forced labor and sex trafficking, of mandatory trainings for the Total Forces to identify and respond to human trafficking, and of the findings of Inspector General audits and reports of defense contractors overseas. Secretary of Interior Ken Salazar spoke about the upcoming need for interagency coordination to prevent forced labor and prostitution in overseas U.S. territories.

It was inspiring to see our senior leadership engaged and committed to delivering on the promise of freedom that had been made 146 years ago. As President Obama said when declaring January to be slavery and trafficking awareness month, we need to "acknowledge that forms of slavery still exist in the modern era, and recommit ourselves to stopping the human traffickers who ply this horrific trade."

There was another key announcement made at the meeting that is particularly relevant to you. In November 2010, nearly 60 private security companies signed the International Code of Conduct for Private Security Service Providers, crafted by industry representatives, governments, and NGOs - an effort supported by the U.S. Government. Here we have companies pledging to uphold a number of principles both in their company policies and in the conduct of their personnel, including not engaging or benefiting from human trafficking or prostitution. These are companies that very well may be DOD contractors that are recognizing that they have a role to play in eliminating forced labor and the persistent exploitation of women in prostitution.

Right now it is a code that speaks to the same principles as the government's zero tolerance policy. We need to be sure that it's not just a commitment, but that there is real action and oversight behind it, just as we are doing with our contractors. As you may know, the Departments of State and Defense, as well as USAID, are all subject to Inspector General audits as mandated by Congress. They are looking for signs of human trafficking, reporting on them, and remedying them.

Fighting trafficking is not something relegated to policy or just to the senior leadership level. You each play a role to uphold a standard of conduct - of dignity and the promise of freedom - that the U.S. Government is fighting for around the globe. It's each of you, each of us.

Because traffickers don't create the markets. Traffickers exploit their people. But it is the demand for commercial sex, for cheap goods, that they rush to meet through violence and cruelty. And so we need to end that demand. By placing certain clubs off-limits to those under your command. By including and enforcing the contracting regulations that prohibit such conduct on the part of your vendors.

By holding yourself and your staff to an appropriate and honorable standard of conduct both on and off-duty. Purchasing sex is wrong. It doesn't matter whether the woman is over 18 or how willing she may appear - because the truth is you can never know. This is one of those places where government policy truly conforms with human obligation. Through your actions, you can do a great deal to advance not only government policy but the opportunity and freedom of women and girls around the world.

This is driven by demand. No girl or woman would be a victim of sex trafficking if there were no profits to be made from their exploitation. You each play a role in reducing that demand, and living by example - by refraining personally from engaging in human trafficking or buying commercial sex, not just because of the UCMJ or National Security Presidential Directive 22, but because it is the right thing to do.

In the DC area, DHS has put up posters that say "If you see something, say something." We can live our lives by the principle of "If you see trafficking, say stop."

And so we have to have those tough conversations with friends. Whether it is the US and our allies in the annual report, or us and our buddies. Friends have to be honest enough to help each other confront inconvenient truths. To stand for the challenge that actor Ashton Kutcher has laid down: real men don't buy girls. Or women for that matter.

But it is not enough to think that personal intolerance, or abstention, is sufficient. Real men need to speak out against bad behavior. Even when it's tough. Even when it's a friend, an associate, a colleague. Especially then. Bachelor parties, R and R's, when it's your best friend or your boss or your brother-in-law and you're just not the type to cause drama. Think of the drama in the woman's life that - absent your action - would otherwise continue unabated.

Do something. Make buying sex as embarrassing as it should be.

In the wake of the Civil War, the promise of freedom was so often delivered by your predecessors. Navy and Coast Guard cutters intercepted raiders who tried to kidnap newly-freed slaves to take them to Cuba and Hispaniola. The Army enforced the involuntary servitude statutes in the occupied South. Military governors and courts freed domestic servants from peonage in the Southwest territories.

Today, whether in a broken Haitian village or a war-torn countryside, we rely on you to be equally vigilant. Third Country Nationals brought in by contractors. The local women and girls. Even things explained away as cultural practices, such as the Haitian restaveks or the Afghan bacha bazi. All of these things can be prevented by you, both in your commands and in your personal lives.

Collectively, we cannot afford to have a fragmented or partial U.S. Government approach. The Department of State stands ready to partner with you to advance the anti-trafficking efforts of the countries within your area of responsibility, for instance, by leveraging your expertise to build capacity and train foreign law enforcement.

As a nation looked to as a world leader on this issue, much is expected of us. And, as Americans we expect much from ourselves. And so let us heed the words of President Obama, "From every corner of our Nation, to every part of the globe, [let us] stand firm in defense of freedom and bear witness for those exploited by modern slavery."

Thank you.

Hello and thank you for that kind introduction and for the invitation by PACOM today to talk about how together we can make tangible progress against modern slavery in the Pacific region. Some have asked, Why does America care about whether someone is held in servitude in another country? Why is this foreign policy? or even How dare America issue an annual report analyzing what other countries are doing on this issue isnt such unilateralism presumptuous? It is our responsibility to find the victims, help them, prosecute their traffickers, and find ways to prevent enslavement in the first place. You are no doubt familiar with the 3D foreign policy approach of diplomacy, development, and defense. Not to belabor the construct, but those 3Ds can also fuel an anti-trafficking strategy of deterrence, disruption, and demand, that can help us confront an unfortunate reality in the PACOM Area of Responsibility too often, countries follow a more unfortunate 3D paradigm, as all too often we see victims experience the phenomenon of detention, deportation, and disempowerment. This must stop.

This is not a theoretical matter to me, or an issue for politics. I did not learn about human trafficking in an office, a cubicle, or a think tank. For me, the survivors of trafficking in all its forms are people I know, people whose experiences as told to me are seared into my memory. The people who trusted me to fight for them in court. The people who have shared both their tears and their strength with me as they recounted horrific abuse at the hands of pimps or bosses. The people who believed that the United States stood for something, and placed their sacred trust with me and my team at the Justice Department to vindicate their rights.

Human trafficking is a scourge on the Earth, and the United States is certainly no exception. This year, for the first time, the annual Trafficking in Persons Report evaluated and ranked the United States efforts to combat trafficking we held ourselves accountable to the same standards to which we hold other governments. We found that trafficking occurs for both sex and labor. We see it in domestic servitude, agriculture, manufacturing, janitorial services, construction, health care, and beauty salons. We see trafficking in prostitution and strip clubs, as the traffickers dehumanize and destroy.

In including the United States, we looked at the situation in the US and the response of the government. We called for submissions from NGOs, and listened to their insight and read their data. The United States was placed on Tier One of the Report. Not a reprieve or a foregone conclusion, but a responsibility based on the evidence.

And Tier One is not an A grade by any means; it just means that countries meet the Minimum Standards set forth by Congress. In other words, just passing the threshold.

Even if you haven't seen this modern form of slavery up close and personal like I did for fifteen years as a federal prosecutor, you know from our own tragic American history the damage that chattel slavery left in its wake. The destructive impact it had on family, community, country. On our economy, and our security.

It is because of our own experience as a Nation that we know slavery whether in the slave trade of the 19th century or in the modern forms of slavery we see today to be an affront to our most basic rights as Americans and as human beings in a global community.

Creating strong communities and policies that eradicate the modern form of slavery that we see today is paramount to providing the stability needed to achieve trade, security, and economic success. And so often, the men and women called upon to guarantee that freedom have been in our Armed Forces. As representatives of the United States, military personnel at all levels have a special responsibility to combat human trafficking.

It comes back to the most fundamental crimes that we have confronted for so long as a nation piracy and slavery. Just as Decatur went into Algiers to deal with the Barbary pirates and their protectors who were taking American and European slaves, America in 2011 again finds itself confronting the old evils of piracy and slavery around the world. Just as African-Americans during the Civil War knew that they could find freedom if they could just reach the lines of the U.S. Army, we again find ourselves providing protection and refuge.

While our history with this heinous practice may be unique, the struggle against it spans time and region. For as long as people of every community, culture, and country in the world are enslaved, our work and efforts must go on.

That's where PACOM comes in. We cannot meaningfully address this issue without focusing on your AOR. We cannot meaningfully address this issue without focusing on Asia.

According to the International Labor Organization, the prevalence of forced labor and sexual servitude is highest in Asia, with almost three in every 1,000 inhabitants falling victim. Also, the International Organization for Migration and World Bank data show that the majority of the over 200 million transnational migrants in the world are from Asia. Within the growing pool of Asian migrants reflecting greater labor mobility in the region and in the world is a huge population of people who are victims of sex and labor trafficking.

As the percentage of women migrants in that pool grows exponentially, we have to recognize the feminization of migration, and the multitude of issues that are specific to women. So we see women held in sex slavery, in labor servitude, or working in situations where they routinely face sexual harassment or even rape.

Unfortunately, the number of countries in Asia downgraded in the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report was greater than the number upgraded. Many Asian governments lack adequate laws, and more have failed to produce significant convictions of trafficking offenders.

None of the countries in South Asia has ratified the decade-old UN Palermo Protocol, though they have joined the South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation (SAARC) anti-TIP convention. The SAARC convention, however, is problematic for numerous reasons, one of which is that it focuses on sex trafficking rather than on both sex and labor trafficking. Furthermore, the ASEAN countries have not formulated regional strategies along the lines of the Council of Europe or the Organization of American States.

While some countries in Asia have passed legislation to prohibit trafficking, governments as a whole have not yet shown the political will to hold the traffickers to the fullest account, in the form of sentencing reflective of the severity of the crimes they commit. Some countries only focus on sex trafficking and not from a compassionate place, but by locking up the women as illegal immigrant prostitutes or criminals, rather than recognizing them as victims.

So too, it has been a steep learning curve for some governments to consider issues of labor trafficking. Forced labor cases untold thousands of women working as maids or seamstresses and men in construction or agriculture are sometimes treated as administrative violations, if confronted at all.

And each year, by statute, the United States has to assess these countries, make a determination as to what is being done, and rank them by the Congressionally-mandated minimum standards.

Secretary Clinton has said it best:

Countries come to us and ask very forcefully not to be dropped in their category and we hear them out and we tell them [] the kinds of things that we would look to that would demonstrate the commitment that we think would make a difference, to talk about best practices, to share stories. And some countries have listened and the results speak for themselves. Others have not.

Now this is a process that is fraught with all kinds of feelings and I recognize that, but the easiest way to get out of the tier three and get off the watch list is to really act. And we had some real friends, friends countries that are friends on so many important issues, and they were very upset when we told them that they were not going to progress and, in fact, were in danger of regressing. And then they said, "Well, what can we do?" And we said, "Well, we've pointed this out, we point it out again, and we will stand ready to help you."

Friends help each other not just with convenient facts, but sometimes with inconvenient truths. And in the anti-trafficking world, that kind of friendship means honesty about the problems we see.

For instance, in the past several years, we have learned a lot about the forced labor of migrant workers in the fishing and seafood processing industries. In a 2006 study, the ILO found that 43 percent of Burmese in the Thai fishing sector who have given over possession of their identity documents to their employers cannot access these documents when they want to. In many cases, the employers hold onto these documents to purposefully restrict their employees' movement, even though without them migrants are vulnerable to arrest and deportation.

A UN survey of men and boys who were victims of forced labor on Thai fishing boats (which travel throughout the Pacific region) found that 29 of 49 (59 percent) reported seeing a murder by the boat captain. The problem of forced labor on fishing vessels in the Pacific region is one on which we are attempting to gain greater information and encourage governments to address the inherently isolated nature of work on these vessels, and the legal jurisdictions of the waters in which these boats operate, make this a particularly difficult challenge.

We know that there are tens, and possibly hundreds of thousands of foreign migrant workers many of whom are trafficked in the Southeast Asian fishery industries. While this problem is widespread, in Thailand, we are aware of only six offenders convicted by the Royal Thai Government for the forced labor of foreign workers in the industry all but one of whom were freed on bail after conviction, pending their appeals. While the convictions represented successes in Thailand's efforts to combat trafficking, their limited number speaks to the work that still needs to be done. Meanwhile, it is Malaysia, pushed by a Tier 3 ranking in 2009, that embarked on the first steps towards addressing its multi-faceted human trafficking problem.

Farther north, Vietnam reported to us that last year, they did not criminally prosecute any labor trafficking offenders, but they fined 98 recruitment companies a total of $10,900 and revoked the licenses of two firms. That's a start, but it is an average of only $111 per firm and a total of less than what one worker pays to be recruited for a job abroad.

Indeed, a lack of avenues for redress of complaints by Indonesian, Bangladeshi, Sri Lankan, and Nepali men and women in many East Asian destination countries denies them justice and a chance of effective recovery. It also fails in providing a deterrent through tough criminal sanctions to traffickers. Clearly, we have to elevate the ramifications for this type of exploitation above the cost of doing business.

Equally harmful to the cause is official denial by governments which continue to refute the existence of a trafficking problem. This is often true of more developed nations. For example, in one small but developed Asian country, the denial of a problem has prevented effective victim identification or assistance efforts. It resulted in the mass arrest and deportation of over seven thousand women and girls in prostitution last year. Among this population, only one individual was officially identified by the government as a trafficking victim.

Again: one victim identified, out of seven thousand women who were identified as foreign prostitutes. Think about how likely that is

Millions of the victims of bonded labor and domestic service are women and girls, and they are exposed to not just physical, but sexual predation at the hands of their captors. I will never forget two young Indian girls taken from their bonded laborer parents at 11. They were forced to work as maids, waitresses, and sex slaves for their master. He didn't respect their freedom or their bodies, and he didn't respect the labels we use to describe their situation. I may have put him in prison where he belongs, but I can never regain what these young women had lost.

In South Korea, the government has had some success prosecuting sex traffickers and offering services to the victims. There is a known presence of women and girls in forced commercial sexual exploitation, including foreign women recruited to work on entertainment visas as singers and bars near U.S. military facilities. We know that women such as these often incur thousands of dollars in debts, contributing to their vulnerability to debt bondage upon arrival. The issue of child sex tourism one that the U.S. government attempts to tackle head-on through extraterritorial application of relevant laws is also one shared by South Korea and Japan, and the 2010 TIP Report sets forth how men from those countries fuel the demand for trafficking in Cambodia and other poorer countries. But unlike the United States, South Korea has never prosecuted one of its citizens for sex tourism, and Japan's last prosecution was in 2005.

The reality is that enforcement regimes in the Pacific region are woefully inadequate. Resource constraints, corruption, and a lack of political will have created an enabling environment in which sex slavery and forced labor thrives, and exploiters rarely face meaningful penalties.

Yet clear successes are being registered. While ranked Tier 2 Watch List just a few years ago, perhaps the strongest Tier 1 jurisdiction in the Pacific region is Taiwan thanks to its political commitment to carrying out a series of tough anti-trafficking reforms. Now, foreign victims of trafficking in Taiwan stand a much greater chance of being identified, subsequently given assistance to get back on their feet, and gain legitimate employment with legal immigration status. Taiwan authorities have made a commitment not just to enforcement, but to victim care, and that's making them stand out.

In the past year, the Philippine Government led by a new President and a Congressman who doesn't just score knockouts in the ring has heeded the call to take more seriously its responsibility to address the trafficking of its citizens within the country and abroad, and the government has publicly linked these efforts to the threat of a downgrade to Tier 3 in the 2011 TIP Report. The hundreds of backlogged trafficking cases in the court system are beginning to be fast-tracked, corrupt officials are being identified and punished, government resources have increased to combat trafficking, and most importantly, mechanisms to improve the government's anti-trafficking responses are being institutionalized.

Similarly, Indonesia has made good use of its 2007 anti-tip law, prosecuting the largest number of labor trafficking offenders (79) of any East Asian government in 2009.

We want to encourage other Asian countries to embark on similar courses. And the Defense Department can help. On February 1, Secretary Clinton and I had the privilege of convening the cabinet-level meeting on trafficking in persons. Annually, the Departments of State, Defense, Justice, Agriculture, Labor, Health and Human Services, Education, and Interior, as well as the heads of other agencies including the Director of National Intelligence and Chair of the Equal Opportunity Commission, come together to discuss this issue. This year, the meeting was on National Freedom Day, which commemorates the day in 1865 that President Lincoln sent the 13th Amendment to the states for ratification.

Secretary Gates spoke of the importance of enforcing the DOD zero-tolerance policy against forced labor and sex trafficking, of mandatory trainings for the Total Forces to identify and respond to human trafficking, and of the findings of Inspector General audits and reports of defense contractors overseas. Secretary of Interior Ken Salazar spoke about the upcoming need for interagency coordination to prevent forced labor and prostitution in overseas U.S. territories.

It was inspiring to see our senior leadership engaged and committed to delivering on the promise of freedom that had been made 146 years ago. As President Obama said when declaring January to be slavery and trafficking awareness month, we need to acknowledge that forms of slavery still exist in the modern era, and recommit ourselves to stopping the human traffickers who ply this horrific trade.

There was another key announcement made at the meeting that is particularly relevant to you. In November 2010, nearly 60 private security companies signed the International Code of Conduct for Private Security Service Providers, crafted by industry representatives, governments, and NGOs an effort supported by the U.S. Government. Here we have companies pledging to uphold a number of principles both in their company policies and in the conduct of their personnel, including not engaging or benefiting from human trafficking or prostitution. These are companies that very well may be DOD contractors that are recognizing that they have a role to play in eliminating forced labor and the persistent exploitation of women in prostitution.

Right now it is a code that speaks to the same principles as the governments zero tolerance policy. We need to be sure that its not just a commitment, but that there is real action and oversight behind it, just as we are doing with our contractors. As you may know, the Departments of State and Defense, as well as USAID, are all subject to Inspector General audits as mandated by Congress. They are looking for signs of human trafficking, reporting on them, and remedying them.

Fighting trafficking is not something relegated to policy or just to the senior leadership level. You each play a role to uphold a standard of conduct of dignity and the promise of freedom that the U.S. Government is fighting for around the globe. Its each of you, each of us.

Because traffickers dont create the markets. Traffickers exploit their people. But it is the demand for commercial sex, for cheap goods, that they rush to meet through violence and cruelty. And so we need to end that demand. By placing certain clubs off-limits to those under your command. By including and enforcing the contracting regulations that prohibit such conduct on the part of your vendors.

By holding yourself and your staff to an appropriate and honorable standard of conduct both on and off-duty. Purchasing sex is wrong. It doesnt matter whether the woman is over 18 or how willing she may appear because the truth is you can never know. This is one of those places where government policy truly conforms with human obligation. Through your actions, you can do a great deal to advance not only government policy but the opportunity and freedom of women and girls around the world.

This is driven by demand. No girl or woman would be a victim of sex trafficking if there were no profits to be made from their exploitation. You each play a role in reducing that demand, and living by example by refraining personally from engaging in human trafficking or buying commercial sex, not just because of the UCMJ or National Security Presidential Directive 22, but because it is the right thing to do.

In the DC area, DHS has put up posters that say If you see something, say something. We can live our lives by the principle of If you see trafficking, say stop.

And so we have to have those tough conversations with friends. Whether it is the US and our allies in the annual report, or us and our buddies. Friends have to be honest enough to help each other confront inconvenient truths. To stand for the challenge that actor Ashton Kutcher has laid down: real men dont buy girls. Or women for that matter.

But it is not enough to think that personal intolerance, or abstention, is sufficient. Real men need to speak out against bad behavior. Even when its tough. Even when its a friend, an associate, a colleague. Especially then. Bachelor parties, R and Rs, when its your best friend or your boss or your brother-in-law and youre just not the type to cause drama. Think of the drama in the womans life that absent your action would otherwise continue unabated.

Do something. Make buying sex as embarrassing as it should be.

In the wake of the Civil War, the promise of freedom was so often delivered by your predecessors. Navy and Coast Guard cutters intercepted raiders who tried to kidnap newly-freed slaves to take them to Cuba and Hispaniola. The Army enforced the involuntary servitude statutes in the occupied South. Military governors and courts freed domestic servants from peonage in the Southwest territories.

Today, whether in a broken Haitian village or a war-torn countryside, we rely on you to be equally vigilant. Third Country Nationals brought in by contractors. The local women and girls. Even things explained away as cultural practices, such as the Haitian restaveks or the Afghan bacha bazi. All of these things can be prevented by you, both in your commands and in your personal lives.

Collectively, we cannot afford to have a fragmented or partial U.S. Government approach. The Department of State stands ready to partner with you to advance the anti-trafficking efforts of the countries within your area of responsibility, for instance, by leveraging your expertise to build capacity and train foreign law enforcement.

As a nation looked to as a world leader on this issue, much is expected of us. And, as Americans we expect much from ourselves. And so let us heed the words of President Obama, From every corner of our Nation, to every part of the globe, [let us] stand firm in defense of freedom and bear witness for those exploited by modern slavery.

Thank you.

Luis CdeBaca Ambassador-at-Large, Office To Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons Speaks on Trafficking in Persons: A 3D Approach

BYLINE: Targeted News ServiceLENGTH: 3950 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons issued the text of the following speech:

Hello and thank you for that kind introduction and for the invitation by PACOM today to talk about how together we can make tangible progress against modern slavery in the Pacific region. Some have asked, "Why does America care about whether someone is held in servitude in another country?" "Why is this foreign policy?" or even "How dare America issue an annual report analyzing what other countries are doing on this issue - isn't such unilateralism presumptuous?" Some of you here today may even be asking yourselves, "How does a civilian human rights issue apply to me while I am at Pacific Command?"

Here's what we know. We know human trafficking is a crime; a human rights abuse; a byproduct of conflict; an issue of national security, public health, and democracy; a labor and migration issue; and a growing global phenomenon. As we have seen in many places the world over, it must be at the forefront of our planning when we race to respond to a natural disaster or conflict.

In and around deployments that many of you may have experienced - Haiti, Iraq, the Balkans - pimps and exploiters have taken advantage of the chaos to find and abuse their victims. Sexual enslavement can take place not only in a brothel or on a street corner, but in the context of war, and has been prosecuted as a crime against humanity before the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia.

As Secretary Clinton said recently, anywhere from 12 to 27 million people are currently held in bondage for labor or prostitution. That's equivalent to all the people who live in London, at the low end, and the combined populations of New York City, San Francisco, and Washington, D.C., at the high end.

The victims range from the men and women enslaved in fields, factories, and brothels, to the girls and boys whose childhoods have been shattered and stolen, to the parents whose children have vanished. And they feel that no one can help them, that no one is looking for them, that no one cares.

It is our responsibility to find the victims, help them, prosecute their traffickers, and find ways to prevent enslavement in the first place. You are no doubt familiar with the "3D" foreign policy approach of diplomacy, development, and defense. Not to belabor the construct, but those 3Ds can also fuel an anti-trafficking strategy of deterrence, disruption, and demand, that can help us confront an unfortunate reality in the PACOM Area of Responsibility - too often, countries follow a more unfortunate "3D" paradigm, as all too often we see victims experience the phenomenon of detention, deportation, and disempowerment. This must stop.

This is not a theoretical matter to me, or an issue for politics. I did not learn about human trafficking in an office, a cubicle, or a think tank. For me, the survivors of trafficking - in all its forms - are people I know, people whose experiences as told to me are seared into my memory. The people who trusted me to fight for them in court. While our history with this heinous practice may be unique, the struggle against it spans time and region. For as long as people of every community, culture, and country in the world are enslaved, our work and efforts must go on.

That's where PACOM comes in. We cannot meaningfully address this issue without focusing on your AOR. We cannot meaningfully address this issue without focusing on Asia.

According to the International Labor Organization, the prevalence of forced labor and sexual servitude is highest in Asia, with almost three in every 1,000 inhabitants falling victim. We want to encourage other Asian countries to embark on similar courses. And the Defense Department can help. On February 1, Secretary Clinton and I had the privilege of convening the cabinet-level meeting on trafficking in persons. Annually, the Departments of State, Defense, Justice, Agriculture, Labor, Health & Human Services, Education, and Interior, as well as the heads of other agencies including the Director of National Intelligence and Chair of the Equal Opportunity Commission, come together to discuss this issue. This year, the meeting was on National Freedom Day, which commemorates the day in 1865 that President Lincoln sent the 13th Amendment to the states for ratification.

Secretary Gates spoke of the importance of enforcing the DOD zero-tolerance policy against forced labor and sex trafficking, of mandatory trainings for the Total Forces to identify and respond to human trafficking, and of the findings of Inspector General audits and reports of defense contractors overseas. Secretary of Interior Ken Salazar spoke about the upcoming need for interagency coordination to prevent forced labor and prostitution in overseas U.S. territories.

It was inspiring to see our senior leadership engaged and committed to delivering on the promise of freedom that had been made 146 years ago. As President Obama said when declaring January to be slavery and trafficking awareness month, we need to "acknowledge that forms of slavery still exist in the modern era, and recommit ourselves to stopping the human traffickers who ply this horrific trade."

There was another key announcement made at the meeting that is particularly relevant to you. In November 2010, nearly 60 private security companies signed the International Code of Conduct for Private Security Service Providers, crafted by industry representatives, governments, and NGOs - an effort supported by the U.S. Government. Here we have companies pledging to uphold a number of principles both in their company policies and in the conduct of their personnel, including not engaging or benefiting from human trafficking or prostitution. These are companies that very well may be DOD contractors that are recognizing that they have a role to play in eliminating forced labor and the persistent exploitation of women in prostitution.

Right now it is a code that speaks to the same principles as the government's zero tolerance policy. We need to be sure that it's not just a commitment, but that there is real action and oversight behind it, just as we are doing with our contractors. As you may know, the Departments of State and Defense, as well as USAID, are all subject to Inspector General audits as mandated by Congress. They are looking for signs of human trafficking, reporting on them, and remedying them.

Fighting trafficking is not something relegated to policy or just to the senior leadership level. You each play a role to uphold a standard of conduct - of dignity and the promise of freedom - that the U.S. Government is fighting for around the globe. Its each of you, each of us.

Because traffickers don't create the markets. Traffickers exploit their people. But it is the demand for commercial sex, for cheap goods, that they rush to meet through violence and cruelty. And so we need to end that demand. By placing certain clubs off-limits to those under your command. By including and enforcing the contracting regulations that prohibit such conduct on the part of your vendors.

By holding yourself and your staff to an appropriate and honorable standard of conduct both on and off-duty. Purchasing sex is wrong. It doesn't matter whether the woman is over 18 or how willing she may appear - because the truth is you can never know. This is one of those places where government policy truly conforms with human obligation. Through your actions, you can do a great deal to advance not only government policy but the opportunity and freedom of women and girls around the world.

This is driven by demand. No girl or woman would be a victim of sex trafficking if there were no profits to be made from their exploitation. You each play a role in reducing that demand, and living by example - by refraining personally from engaging in human trafficking or buying commercial sex, not just because of the UCMJ or National Security Presidential Directive 22, but because it is the right thing to do.

In the DC area, DHS has put up posters that say "If you see something, say something." We can live our lives by the principle of "If you see trafficking, say stop."

And so we have to have those tough conversations with friends. Whether it is the US and our allies in the annual report, or us and our buddies. Friends have to be honest enough to help each other confront inconvenient truths. To stand for the challenge that actor Ashton Kutcher has laid down: real men don't buy girls. Or women for that matter.

But it is not enough to think that personal intolerance, or abstention, is sufficient. Real men need to speak out against bad behavior. Even when it's tough. Even when it's a friend, an associate, a colleague. Especially then. Bachelor parties, R and R's, when it's your best friend or your boss or your brother-in-law and you're just not the type to cause drama. Think of the drama in the woman's life that - absent your action - would otherwise continue unabated.

Do something. Make buying sex as embarrassing as it should be.

In the wake of the Civil War, the promise of freedom was so often delivered by your predecessors. Navy and Coast Guard cutters intercepted raiders who tried to kidnap newly-freed slaves to take them to Cuba and Hispaniola. The Army enforced the involuntary servitude statutes in the occupied South. Military governors and courts freed domestic servants from peonage in the Southwest territories.

Today, whether in a broken Haitian village or a war-torn countryside, we rely on you to be equally vigilant. Third Country Nationals brought in by contractors. The local women and girls. Even things explained away as cultural practices, such as the Haitian restaveks or the Afghan bacha bazi. All of these things can be prevented by you, both in your commands and in your personal lives.

Collectively, we cannot afford to have a fragmented or partial U.S. Government approach. The Department of State stands ready to partner with you to advance the anti-trafficking efforts of the countries within your area of responsibility, for instance, by leveraging your expertise to build capacity and train foreign law enforcement.

As a nation looked to as a world leader on this issue, much is expected of us. And, as Americans we expect much from ourselves. And so let us heed the words of President Obama, "From every corner of our Nation, to every part of the globe, [let us] stand firm in defense of freedom and bear witness for those exploited by modern slavery."

Thank you.

US, Ukraine Pledge To Combat Human Trafficking

BYLINE: JulieAnn McKellogg

SECTION: VOA ENGLISH SERVICE

LENGTH: 438 words

Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and her Ukrainian counterpart have pledged increased efforts to combat human trafficking in Ukraine. In a recent report, the U.S. said Ukraine is increasingly becoming a destination country for victims of trafficking.

Secretary of State Clinton and Ukrainian Foreign Minister Kostyantyn Gryshchenko met at the State Department Monday to sign a cooperation plan on combating human trafficking. Clinton said the two countries are making progress on the issue.

"The recent repatriation from Ukraine to the United States of a trafficker accused of taking more than $1 million in profits from the women he exploited is just one way we are working to end this tragic worldwide blight," said Secretary Clinton.

The U.S. ranked Ukraine as a second-tier country in its 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report. That ranking means the government in Kyiv does not fully comply with the minimum standards of U.S. law for eliminating trafficking, but does make significant efforts to do so.

The report describes Ukraine as a source, transit and destination country for men, women and children who are victims, specifically those of forced labor and forced prostitution.

A top United Nations official on human trafficking, Martin Fowke, told VOA this kind of partnership between the U.S. and Ukraine is one of the most important aspects of combating human trafficking.

"This is a transnational crime, something of which impacts on most countries in the world, and the more we can find solutions that cross borders, like the crime networks that perpetrate human trafficking, the more likely we are to have a serious impact on it," said Fowke.

Fowke, who is the officer-in-charge for the U.N. Anti-Human Trafficking and Migrant Smuggling Unit in Geneva, says calculating the number of trafficking victims is very difficult. But he says the International Labor Organization estimates that at any one time close to 2.4 million people have been victims of forced labor.

Human trafficking includes victims of the sex trade, forced or bonded labor, domestic servitude, forced marriage, organ removal and child soldiers.

In its recent report, the U.S. made recommendations for all evaluated countries on how to crack down on trafficking. Recommendations for Ukraine include harsher sentences for convicted traffickers, creating formal ways of identifying victims, and providing more funding and specialized services for victims.

Clinton and the visiting Ukrainian foreign minister discussed a variety of other bilateral issues, with Clinton underscoring Ukraine's commitment to progress on a variety of energy, economic and social issues.

Fiji unveils national strategy against people-trafficking

LENGTH: 358 words

Text of report by independent daily newspaper Fiji Times website on 12 February

[By Avinesh Gopal] Saturday, 12 February: The government is committed to the global fight against the trafficking of people, including children. Acting Minister for Defence, National Security and Immigration Jocketani Cokanasiga said trafficking in persons was a crime against humanity.

"It is a threat against the core value of individual freedom and human dignity," he said. "Vulnerable groups within our society need to be protected from all forms of exploitation and human bondage. This calls for defences that are strong, responsive and pre-emptive against the imminent threat of trafficking."

Mr Cokanasiga made the comments while launching the national action plan to eradicate trafficking in persons and child trafficking in Suva yesterday afternoon. He said the national plan of action solidified the common goal for the eradication of trafficking in persons and set the foundation for future collaborative efforts geared towards attainment of that goal. He said Fiji was in Tier 3 of the United States Department of State Trafficking in Persons report in June last year but has since been elevated to Tier 2 of the watch list.

"The Fijian government is committed to the global fight against this crime against humanity," he said.

Mr Cokanasiga said Fiji's national initiatives on the law against trafficking in persons were embedded in the Crimes Decree 2009 and the Immigration Act 2003. He said the implementation of the plan would be fraught with challenges and collaboration between the government, various non government organisations and foreign governments was crucial.

"The core hallmarks of the national plan of action revolves around prevention, protection and prosecution. To eradicate trafficking in persons, there must be a change in hearts and minds, in cultures and attitudes. By working together, I am sure that we can identify the occurrence and facilitation of trafficking in persons in our national jurisdiction and impede the growth of this despicable form of human slavery," said Mr Cokanasiga.

3 more held over people smuggling

BYLINE: Suganthi Suparmaniam

SECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 2

LENGTH: 579 words

PUTRAJAYA: The fight against trans-border crimes gained momentum when three others were detained under the Internal Security Act, bringing to 14 the number of suspects held under the act since October.

The latest suspects were two locals and an Indonesian who were picked up in the city on Wednesday. One of them was a woman.

Home Minister Datuk Seri Hishammuddin Hussein described the three, aged between 33 and 48, as a violent lot who masterminded human and drug trafficking rings.

"These things cannot be taken lightly. If not stopped, it can lead to violence later," he told reporters after a meeting with Ward Elcock, who is the special adviser on human smuggling and illegal migration to the Canadian prime minister.

At the press conference, Hishammuddin also said the authorities recently arrested a Sri Lankan, believed to be a member of the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE).

"Several other LTTE members are on our watch list."

On the three suspects, Hishammuddin said they were linked to an earlier syndicate involving nine Immigration officers and two foreigners who were nabbed in an operation in October.

In that operation, Immigration officers in Pulau Ketam and Port Dickson and the two foreigners were nabbed for human trafficking activities along the west coast of Peninsular Malaysia.

It was reported that senior Immigration Department officers at several border entry points had allowed foreigners without proper travel documents to enter and exit the country.

The officers had allegedly allowed those who had overstayed to leave the country without any hassle, while the two foreigners were said to be the ringleaders who paid off the Immigration officers.

Hishammuddin warned that enforcement officers caught abusing their power or involved in illegal activities would be punished.

"There is no compromise. The Immigration officers currently in custody will either be released conditionally or charged in court soon."

In 2009, Malaysia was placed in Tier 3 by the United States Department of Trafficking in Persons Report for not fully complying with the Trafficking Victims Protection Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and not making significant efforts to do so.

Last year, Malaysia's ranking improved to the Tier 2 Watch List.

"Our fight does not end here," Hishammuddin said.

He said a new body, the Cross Border Crime Prevention Academy, would be established at the site of the Langkawi International Field Target shooting range soon.

The main committee of the academy will be chaired by Prime Minister Datuk Seri Najib Razak.

The committee will comprise a number of agencies, including the Customs Department, the Inland Revenue Board and the Malaysian Anti-Corruption Commission.

"Other than the setting up of the academy, we will continue to work with countries such as Australia, Canada and the United Kingdom to combat trans-border crimes," he said.

On another matter, Hishammuddin rejected Selangor Menteri Besar Tan Sri Abdul Khalid Ibrahim's request to set up the state's own auxiliary police force.

"This will be against the Federal Constitution which states that policing comes under the Federal Government's purview.

"It is not possible to set up auxiliary police teams using taxpayers' money. Individuals who requested for auxiliary police in the past had paid for them."

Hishammuddin added that there was no basis for Selangor to form its own auxiliary police force as statistics showed that the crime index had decreased.

Nigerians face sex, drugs and trafficking trial

BYLINE: Shaun GillhamSECTION: CRIME, LAW & JUSTICELENGTH: 530 words

WEEKEND POST REPORTER

gillhams@avusa.co.za

SIX Nigerian nationals accused of a range of human trafficking and drug-related crimes involving under-aged girls will appear in court in PE on April 29.

The six were denied bail by presiding Magistrate Gavin Juicy last month. He postponed what could be a landmark trial to April.

It is thought likely that they are being held at St Albans Prison, but efforts to confirm this with state prosecutor Zelda Swanepoel were unsuccessful.

Christian Ndukauba (also known by his street name Coco), Ejike Alex Nwogu (known as Big Fish), Austin Okeke, Batholome Chiyeaka Ileboh (known as Gostime), Chukwuma Magnus Nwaike (nicknamed Casey or KC) and Chibueze Meemikwu each face facing a raft of shocking charges.

These include the rape of under-aged girls who at the time were 11, 12 and 13 years old, human trafficking, racketeering, living off the proceeds of prostitution generated by minor girls working under duress, the assault of minor girls and dealing in dangerous dependence-producing drugs.

All the charges relate to offences allegedly committed between 2005 and 2008.

John Preller, seasoned campaigner against drug crimes and human trafficking, told me that expectations were high the case would set precedents as South Africa did not currently have legislation dealing specifically with human trafficking as a crime. He has attended all court hearings to date involving the six accused.

Preller, who is chairman of the Humewood Community Police Forum, said the alleged victims were "trafficked" between PE, Bloemfontein and Cape Town.

It was possible the case would end up in the High Court, he said.

"This case involves a complicated process as there is no law (in South Africa) in respect of specific human trafficking legislation. Numerous acts of criminal law and sections of the sexual offences act, contravention of sections of the Drugs and Drug Trafficking Act and various other acts were and will be applied.

"Ultimately we are working towards getting legislation that specifically addresses human trafficking," he said, adding that the judiciary was compelled to address the "crime" as South Africa was a signatory of the United Nations' Palermo Protocol.

South Africa ratified this protocol - the primary international instrument for the prevention, suppression and punishment of human trafficking - in 2004.

Preller said South Africa was therefore obligated to address trafficking as a crime and make it punishable by law.

"In spite of these good intentions South Africa has been put on a Tier2 watch list (by the US State Department) for a fourth consecutive year due to an inability to meet the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking.

"But despite these observations, the government departments involved in this specific case have made monumental strides in terms of securing witness protection for the victims in the case," he added.

"The police have presented faultless evidence and procedural proof and the prosecutors have put together a compelling argument opposing bail."

Preller said a multi-faceted campaign would soon be launched to relentlessly target crime hotspots in PE.

USA: New Interagency Initiatives To Combat Trafficking in Persons

LENGTH: 1478 words

DATELINE: Washington

Washington, Feb. 04 -- The U.S Department Of State has issued Following Remarks:

MR. TONER: Good afternoon. Welcome to the State Department. Well, as dramatic events unfold half a world away in Egypt - and we understand that many of you are focused on those events - but we had a pretty important event that just took place upstairs, which was the President's Annual Interagency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons meeting. And here to talk with us a little bit about that meeting and about the agenda is Ambassador-at-Large for the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons Ambassador Luis CdeBaca.

Ambassador.

QUESTION: Mark, just one more thing: Are you or P.J. going to brief us in a regular briefing after the Ambassador's briefing?

MR. TONER: Probably not.

QUESTION: There's no way we can get any - I mean, we would love to talk to you.

MR. TONER: We will try. All right. Go ahead, Ambassador.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Hello, everyone. We just got done with the President's Interagency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. I want to apologize for the late changes to the schedule, but with that many Cabinet members in one place, it became obvious to us that we weren't going to be able to have some of them step down as we had hoped.

Today, the Secretary convened this annual meeting. This is an important opportunity to discuss efforts across the Federal Government to fight the problem of modern slavery, and it's mandated by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000, which celebrated its 10th anniversary in October of this last year.

Through the Clinton Administration, the Bush Administration, and now the Obama Administration, you have often heard talk about the four P's of prevention, prosecution, protection, and partnerships as the framework for our nation's policy to combat the scourge of human trafficking. And today's meeting was an unprecedented example of that kind of partnership across the Administration working to meet this challenge. We were joined by the Secretary of Defense, the Attorney General, the Secretaries of Interior, Agriculture, Health and Human Services, Labor, Homeland Security, as well as several other Cabinet-level officials, all of whom committed to new initiatives in the coming year that'll build upon their agencies' efforts to combat modern slavery.

Secretary Clinton announced at the start of the meeting the Interagency Task Force throughout the next year will conduct a government-wide review of victims service programs and devise an overarching strategy to improve upon what we're doing here in the United States to protect victims of human trafficking. This is an area where we've made excellent progress, but we recognize that we need to do even more to break down the barriers that prevent trafficking victims, whether citizens or non-citizens alike, from accessing the support and resources they need here in the United States. We will seek to ensure that those who work in our juvenile justice, child welfare, and immigration systems have the knowledge and training necessary to identify and help victims, and become a true model for the rest of the world, as far as victim care is concerned. We'll find ways to safeguard the victims of trafficking by working across the network of government agencies, civil society actors, and the corporate sector.

This is going to take wholesale changes in perception, policies, and procedures; training, sharing information with cross-agency and cross-network partnerships here and around the world. We hope that we can restore victims to their rightful roles in society and break the chain of exploitation that the human traffickers prey upon.

Additionally, the innovations offered at today's meeting show that leaders across the Obama Administration are making anti-trafficking efforts an important priority. For instance, Department of Defense is going to be including information on modern slavery as part of training for all DOD employees. Department of Education will be working to increase awareness of this issue in schools, both at K-12 and in higher education. The newest member of our task force, the Interior Department, will ensure that our domestic anti-trafficking efforts here in the United States include our insular areas - Puerto Rico, the U.S. Virgin Islands, American Samoa, Guam, and the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands.

Here at the Department of State, Secretary Clinton announced several initiatives. First and foremost, the annual Trafficking in Persons Report will be published again this year, notably with some of our key strategic allies at risk of automatic downgrades from Tier 2 Watch List to Tier 3 due to potential failure to address trafficking in persons adequately. This year is the first year that the automatic downgrade provision, which is a feature of the 2008 Trafficking Victim Protections Act, is in place. Countries that have been on Tier 2 Watch List, which is the next-to-last step of the report, for two consecutive years will have to either improve on the merits or be downgraded to Tier 3.

As the Secretary suggested in the meeting, ranking another country is never an easy task, but turning away from an action in the face of modern slavery is intolerable. We'll continue to produce a fair and accurate assessment of the situation on the ground. And as uncomfortable as it may sometimes be, telling the truth about the global response to human trafficking is a priority for the State Department.

Looking to our own activities on this, the Bureau of Diplomatic Security will take a more focused approach to human trafficking. The Secretary announced today that she was establishing an anti-trafficking unit at Diplomatic Security headquarters to support the field offices which already participate in 39 anti-trafficking task forces nationwide that are funded by the Department of Justice. Diplomatic Security plays an integral part with our interagency partners in investigating and prosecuting human trafficking crimes. And the new initiative, we hope, will augment Diplomatic Security efforts at both levels - increasing participation in task forces, centralizing case referrals and command at headquarters, and offering training to agents, particularly on how to work with victims.

We also will begin the process this year of establishing an annual briefing for domestic workers of foreign diplomats who hold A-3 visas here in the United States together with their diplomat employers as part of an ongoing effort to increase the protections of domestic workers here in the D.C. suburbs, New York, wherever they are. A diplomat who brings a servant into the United States needs to be held to the highest accountability, and we will make sure that the victims have a voice.

With these and other new initiatives, today's task force meeting reaffirmed the Administration's commitment in the fight against modern slavery both here and around the world. I'm happy to take questions if there are any.

QUESTION: I don't know if you're aware of it, but National Review Magazine online today released or at least linked to a video, and I'm not sure how authentic it is - it appears to be very authentic - of a sting operation, an undercover sting operation at Planned Parenthood in New Jersey - Perth Amboy, New Jersey - in which a guy who is posing as a pimp accompanied by an alleged 14-year-old girl solicits advice on sexually transmitted disease testing and getting an abortion for an underage 14-year-old. The person at Planned Parenthood seems to be very cooperative and says - encourages them to lie about it. It's an example, at least on its face, of how complex and nuanced this situation is. Were you aware of that video and --

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I am aware of that video, and in fact, it first came to the government's attention - perhaps not that particular video, but the fact of these videos came to the government's attention when Planned Parenthood employees contacted the FBI to tell them that there had been that type of activity. And I think that as we understand it, from the traffic on that, that this was an attempt by some folks to go in - much as you saw a couple years ago with ACORN - to try to capture someone not focusing on the problems of human trafficking.

Like I said, the first that we heard about this was that Planned Parenthood employees had actually contacted the FBI. And so whether there is a second video or not is not something that I am aware of.

MR. TONER: Any more questions? (No response.)

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: If no further questions, thank you very much.

QUESTION: Thank you.

US Launches New Initiatives To Combat Human Trafficking

LENGTH: 778 words

(RTTNews) - The annual meeting of the US President's Inter-agency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons has decided to launch a set of new initiatives, reaffirming the Obama Administration's commitment in the fight against modern slavery in the United States and around the world.

US Secretary of State Hilary Clinton announced at the start of a meeting that she convened on Tuesday that the Inter-agency Task Force throughout the next year will conduct a government-wide review of victims service programs and devise an overarching strategy to improve upon what is being done in the United States to protect victims of human trafficking.

She said the State Department will publish the next edition of the annual Trafficking in Persons Report this year, "notably with some of our key strategic allies at risk of automatic downgrades from Tier 2 Watch List to Tier 3 due to potential failure to address trafficking in persons adequately."

She warned that countries that have been on Tier 2 Watch List, which is the next-to-last step of the report, for two consecutive years will have to either improve on the merits or be downgraded to Tier 3.

Clinton announced that she was establishing an anti-trafficking unit at Diplomatic Security headquarters to support the field offices which already participate in 39 anti-trafficking task forces nationwide that are funded by the Department of Justice.

The process of establishing an annual briefing for domestic workers of foreign diplomats who hold A-3 visas in the United States together with their diplomat employers will begin this year as part of an ongoing effort to increase the protections of domestic workers in the D.C. suburbs, New York, wherever they are.

She insisted that a diplomat who brings a servant into the United States needs to be held to the highest accountability, and that "we will make sure that the victims have a voice."

Clinton said the United States is "committed to do more to diminish involuntary servitude and slavery in our own country."

She stressed the need to "do more to identify the true victims of human trafficking and help restore them to participation in our society."

She regretted that modern slavery, often hidden and unrecognized, persists today on every continent, including in the United States, despite being prohibited by both domestic legislation and international law.

Addressing the media after the meeting, Attorney General Eric H. Holder, Jr. announced the launch of a human trafficking enhanced enforcement initiative, which will streamline federal criminal investigations and prosecutions of human trafficking.

Specialized anti-trafficking coordination teams, known as ACT teams, will be convened in a number of pilot districts nationwide. Under the leadership of the highest-ranking federal law enforcement officials in the district, these teams will bring together federal agents and prosecutors across agency lines to combat human trafficking threats, dismantle human trafficking networks, and bring traffickers to justice.

Department of Defense is going to be including information on modern slavery as part of training for all DOD employees. Department of Education will be working to increase awareness of this issue in schools, both at K-12 and in higher education.

Labor Secretary Hilda L. Solis announced that the Department of Labor will begin exercising its authority to certify applications for new visas. This will provide an avenue for immigrant victims desperate to escape an abusive situation and willing to cooperate with law enforcement.

The Interior Department will ensure that the domestic anti-trafficking efforts in the United States include its insular areas - Puerto Rico, the U.S. Virgin Islands, American Samoa, Guam, and the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands.

It is estimated that between 12 to 27 million people around the world are currently held in forced labor, bonded labor, or forced prostitution.

The President's Inter-agency Task Force (PITF), a cabinet-level task force to coordinate federal efforts to combat human trafficking, was established under the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000

The PITF is chaired by the Secretary of State and meets at least once a year.

The Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons coordinates the United States' fight against contemporary forms of slavery. Ambassador-at-Large CdeBaca directs the Department of State's anti-trafficking efforts in the Office of Democracy and Global Affairs, under the leadership of Under Secretary María Otero.

We were joined by the secretary of defense, the attorney general, the secretaries of interior, agriculture, health and human services, labor, homeland security, as well as several other Cabinet-level officials, all of who committed to new initiatives in the coming year that'll build upon their agencies' efforts to combat modern slavery.

Secretary Clinton announced at the start of the meeting the Interagency Task Force throughout the next year will conduct a government-wide review of victim service program and devise an overarching strategy to improve upon what we're doing here in the United States to protect victims of human trafficking.

This is an area where we've made excellent progress, but we recognize that we need to do even more to break down the barriers to prevent trafficking victims, whether citizens or noncitizens alike, from accessing the support and resources they need here in the United States.

We will seek to ensure that those who work in our juvenile justice, child welfare and immigration systems have the knowledge and training necessary to identify and help victims and become a true model for the rest of the world as far as victim care is concerned.

We'll find ways to safeguard the victims of trafficking by working across the network of government agencies, civil society actors and the corporate sector.

This is going to take wholesale changes in perception, policies and procedures, training, sharing information, with cross-agency and cross-network partnerships here and around the world. We hope that we can restore victims to the rightful roles in society and break the chain of exploitation that the human traffickers prey upon.

Additionally, the innovations offered at today's meeting show that leaders across the Obama administration are making anti- trafficking efforts an important priority.

CDEBACA: For instance, Department of Defense is going to be including information on modern slavery as part of training for all DOD employees. Department of Education will be working to increase awareness of this issue in schools, both at K-12 and in higher education.

The newest member of our task force, the Interior Department, will ensure that our domestic anti-trafficking efforts here in the United States include our insular areas -- Puerto Rico, the U.S. Virgin Islands, American Samoa, Guam and the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands.

Here at the Department of State, Secretary Clinton announced several initiatives, first and foremost, the annual trafficking in persons report will be published again this year, notably with some of our key strategic allies at risk of automatic downgrades from tier 2 watchlist to tier 3, due to a potential failure to address trafficking in persons adequately.

This year is the first year that the automatic downgrade provision, which is a feature of the 2008 Trafficking Victim Protections Act is in place. Countries that have been on tier 2 watchlist, which is the next-to-last step of the report, for two consecutive years will have to either improve on the merits or be downgraded to tier 3.

As the secretary suggested in the meeting, ranking another country is never an easy task, but turning away from an action in the face of modern slavery is intolerable.

We'll continue to produce a fair and accurate assessment of the situation on the ground. And as uncomfortable as it may sometimes be, telling the truth about the global response to human trafficking is a priority for the State Department.

Looking to our own activities on this, the Bureau of Diplomatic Security will take a more focused approach to human trafficking. The secretary announced today that she is establishing an anti-trafficking unit at Diplomatic Security headquarters to support the field offices, which already participate in 39 anti-trafficking task forces nationwide, that are funded by the Department of Justice.

Diplomatic Security plays an integral part with our interagency partners in investigating and prosecuting human trafficking crimes, and the new initiative we hope will augment Diplomatic Security efforts at both levels -- increasing participation in task forces, centralizing case referrals through command at headquarters and offering training to agents, particularly on how to work with victims.

We also will begin the process this year of establishing an annual briefing for domestic workers of foreign diplomats who hold A-3 visas here in the United States, together with their diplomat employers, as part of an ongoing effort to increase the protections of domestic workers here, in the D.C. suburbs, New York, wherever they are.

A diplomat who brings a servant into the United States needs to be held to the highest accountability, and we will make sure that the victims have a voice.

With these and other new initiatives, today's task force meeting reaffirmed the administration's commitment in the fight against modern slavery both here and around the world.

I'm happy to take questions, if there are any.

QUESTION: I don't know if you're aware of it, but the National Review Magazine Online, they've released or at least linked to a video -- and I'm not sure how authentic it is. It appears to be very authentic -- of a sting operation, an undercover sting operation, at Planned Parenthood in New Jersey, Perth Amboy, New Jersey, in which a guy who was posing as a pimp accompanied by an alleged 14-year-old girl solicits advice on sexually transmitted disease testing and getting an abortion for an underage 14 year old.

The person at Planned Parenthood seems to be very cooperative, and said -- you know, encouraged them to lie about it.

It's an example, at least on its face, of how complex and nuanced this situation is.

Were you aware of that video? And...

CDEBACA: I am aware of that video. And, in fact, it first came to the government's attention -- perhaps not that particular video, but the fact of these videos, came to the government's attention when Planned Parenthood employees contacted the FBI to tell them that there had been that type of activity.

And I think that, as we understand it from the -- the traffic on that, that this was an attempt by some folks to go in, much as you saw a couple of years ago with ACORN, to try to capture someone not focusing on -- on the problems of human trafficking.

Like I said, the first that we heard about this was that Planned Parenthood employees had actually contacted the FBI. And so, whether there's a second video or not, is not something that I'm aware of.

If there are no further questions, thank you very much.

Ambassador-at-Large, Office To Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons

Washington, DC

February 1, 2011

MR. TONER: Good afternoon. Welcome to the State Department. Well, as dramatic events unfold half a world away in Egypt - and we understand that many of you are focused on those events - but we had a pretty important event that just took place upstairs, which was the President's Annual Interagency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons meeting. And here to talk with us a little bit about that meeting and about the agenda is Ambassador-at-Large for the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons Ambassador Luis CdeBaca.

Ambassador.

QUESTION: Mark, just one more thing: Are you or P.J. going to brief us in a regular briefing after the Ambassador's briefing?

MR. TONER: Probably not.

QUESTION: There's no way we can get any - I mean, we would love to talk to you.

MR. TONER: We will try. All right. Go ahead, Ambassador.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Hello, everyone. We just got done with the President's Interagency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. I want to apologize for the late changes to the schedule, but with that many Cabinet members in one place, it became obvious to us that we weren't going to be able to have some of them step down as we had hoped.

Today, the Secretary convened this annual meeting. This is an important opportunity to discuss efforts across the Federal Government to fight the problem of modern slavery, and it's mandated by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000, which celebrated its 10th anniversary in October of this last year.

Through the Clinton Administration, the Bush Administration, and now the Obama Administration, you have often heard talk about the four P's of prevention, prosecution, protection, and partnerships as the framework for our nation's policy to combat the scourge of human trafficking. And today's meeting was an unprecedented example of that kind of partnership across the Administration working to meet this challenge. We were joined by the Secretary of Defense, the Attorney General, the Secretaries of Interior, Agriculture, Health and Human Services, Labor, Homeland Security, as well as several other Cabinet-level officials, all of whom committed to new initiatives in the coming year that'll build upon their agencies' efforts to combat modern slavery.

Secretary Clinton announced at the start of the meeting the Interagency Task Force throughout the next year will conduct a government-wide review of victims service programs and devise an overarching strategy to improve upon what we're doing here in the United States to protect victims of human trafficking. This is an area where we've made excellent progress, but we recognize that we need to do even more to break down the barriers that prevent trafficking victims, whether citizens or non-citizens alike, from accessing the support and resources they need here in the United States. We will seek to ensure that those who work in our juvenile justice, child welfare, and immigration systems have the knowledge and training necessary to identify and help victims, and become a true model for the rest of the world, as far as victim care is concerned. We'll find ways to safeguard the victims of trafficking by working across the network of government agencies, civil society actors, and the corporate sector.

This is going to take wholesale changes in perception, policies, and procedures; training, sharing information with cross-agency and cross-network partnerships here and around the world. We hope that we can restore victims to their rightful roles in society and break the chain of exploitation that the human traffickers prey upon.

Additionally, the innovations offered at today's meeting show that leaders across the Obama Administration are making anti-trafficking efforts an important priority. For instance, Department of Defense is going to be including information on modern slavery as part of training for all DOD employees. Department of Education will be working to increase awareness of this issue in schools, both at K-12 and in higher education. The newest member of our task force, the Interior Department, will ensure that our domestic anti-trafficking efforts here in the United States include our insular areas - Puerto Rico, the U.S. Virgin Islands, American Samoa, Guam, and the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands.

Here at the Department of State, Secretary Clinton announced several initiatives. First and foremost, the annual Trafficking in Persons Report will be published again this year, notably with some of our key strategic allies at risk of automatic downgrades from Tier 2 Watch List to Tier 3 due to potential failure to address trafficking in persons adequately. This year is the first year that the automatic downgrade provision, which is a feature of the 2008 Trafficking Victim Protections Act, is in place. Countries that have been on Tier 2 Watch List, which is the next-to-last step of the report, for two consecutive years will have to either improve on the merits or be downgraded to Tier 3.

As the Secretary suggested in the meeting, ranking another country is never an easy task, but turning away from an action in the face of modern slavery is intolerable. We'll continue to produce a fair and accurate assessment of the situation on the ground. And as uncomfortable as it may sometimes be, telling the truth about the global response to human trafficking is a priority for the State Department.

Looking to our own activities on this, the Bureau of Diplomatic Security will take a more focused approach to human trafficking. The Secretary announced today that she was establishing an anti-trafficking unit at Diplomatic Security headquarters to support the field offices which already participate in 39 anti-trafficking task forces nationwide that are funded by the Department of Justice. Diplomatic Security plays an integral part with our interagency partners in investigating and prosecuting human trafficking crimes. And the new initiative, we hope, will augment Diplomatic Security efforts at both levels - increasing participation in task forces, centralizing case referrals and command at headquarters, and offering training to agents, particularly on how to work with victims.

We also will begin the process this year of establishing an annual briefing for domestic workers of foreign diplomats who hold A-3 visas here in the United States together with their diplomat employers as part of an ongoing effort to increase the protections of domestic workers here in the D.C. suburbs, New York, wherever they are. A diplomat who brings a servant into the United States needs to be held to the highest accountability, and we will make sure that the victims have a voice.

With these and other new initiatives, today's task force meeting reaffirmed the Administration's commitment in the fight against modern slavery both here and around the world. I'm happy to take questions if there are any.

QUESTION: I don't know if you're aware of it, but National Review Magazine online today released or at least linked to a video, and I'm not sure how authentic it is - it appears to be very authentic - of a sting operation, an undercover sting operation at Planned Parenthood in New Jersey - Perth Amboy, New Jersey - in which a guy who is posing as a pimp accompanied by an alleged 14-year-old girl solicits advice on sexually transmitted disease testing and getting an abortion for an underage 14-year-old. The person at Planned Parenthood seems to be very cooperative and says - encourages them to lie about it. It's an example, at least on its face, of how complex and nuanced this situation is. Were you aware of that video and --

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: I am aware of that video, and in fact, it first came to the government's attention - perhaps not that particular video, but the fact of these videos came to the government's attention when Planned Parenthood employees contacted the FBI to tell them that there had been that type of activity. And I think that as we understand it, from the traffic on that, that this was an attempt by some folks to go in - much as you saw a couple years ago with ACORN - to try to capture someone not focusing on the problems of human trafficking.

Like I said, the first that we heard about this was that Planned Parenthood employees had actually contacted the FBI. And so whether there is a second video or not is not something that I am aware of.

MR. TONER: Any more questions" (No response.)

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: If no further questions, thank you very much.

QUESTION: Thank you.

ON-THE-RECORD BRIEFING

Ambassador-at-Large Luis CdeBaca, On New Interagency Initiatives to Combat Trafficking in Persons

February 1, 2011, Washington, D.C.

MR. TONER: Good afternoon. Welcome to the State Department. Well, as dramatic events unfold half a world away in Egypt -- and we understand that many of you are focused on those events -- but we had a pretty important event that just took place upstairs, which was the President's Annual Interagency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons meeting. And here to talk with us a little bit about that meeting and about the agenda is Ambassador-at-Large for the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons Ambassador Luis CdeBaca.

Ambassador.

QUESTION: Mark, just one more thing: Are you or P.J. going to brief us in a regular briefing after the Ambassador's briefing?

MR. TONER: Probably not.

QUESTION: There's no way we can get any -- I mean, we would love to talk to you.

MR. TONER: We will try. All right. Go ahead, Ambassador.

AMBASSADOR CDEBACA: Hello, everyone. We just got done with the President's Interagency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. I want to apologize for the late changes to the schedule, but with that many Cabinet members in one place, it became obvious to us that we weren't going to be able to have some of them step down as we had hoped.

Today, the Secretary convened this annual meeting. This is an important opportunity to discuss efforts across the federal government to fight the problem of modern slavery, and it's mandated by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000, which celebrated its 10th anniversary in October of this last year.

Through the Clinton Administration, the Bush Administration, and now the Obama Administration, you have often heard talk about the four P's of prevention, prosecution, protection, and partnerships as the framework for our nation's policy to combat the scourge of human trafficking. And today's meeting was an unprecedented example of that kind of partnership across the Administration working to meet this challenge. We were joined by the Secretary of Defense, the Attorney General, the Secretaries of Interior, Agriculture, Health and Human Services, Labor, Homeland Security, as well as several other Cabinet-level officials, all of whom committed to new initiatives in the coming year that'll build upon their agencies' efforts to combat modern slavery.

Secretary Clinton announced at the start of the meeting the Interagency Task Force throughout the next year will conduct a government-wide review of victims service programs and devise an overarching strategy to improve upon what we're doing here in the United States to protect victims of human trafficking. Malaysian firm threatens legal suit over Maldives border security contract

Excerpt from report by independent Maldivian Minivan News website on 31 January

[By JJ Robinson and Neil Merrett] 30 January: Mobile security solutions vendor Nexbis has announced it will be taking legal action against parties in the Maldives, claiming that speculation over corruption was "politically motivated" in nature and had "wrought irreparable damage to Nexbis's reputation and brand name".

"Although we understand that the recent media frenzy and speculation of corruption are politically motivated in nature and not directly related to Nexbis, it has had an indirect impact on our reputation and brand name," the company said in a statement provided to Minivan News.

"Nexbis shareholders own and manage multi-trillion dollar assets globally and will not jeopardize their reputation for an investment return," the company stated.

The Malaysian-based technology firm signed a concessionaire contract with the Department of Immigration in October 2010 to install an advanced border control system that it had said would collect and store biometric data on expatriate workers and eliminate abuse of (easily forged) paper documentation.

The government has struggled to tackle the problem of foreign worker exploitation. There are believed to be 100,000 foreign workers in the country - almost a third of the country's total population - but no data is available on how many are illegal.

International agencies have taken a dim view of the problem, most notably the US State Department which last year placed the Maldives on its tier two watch-list for human trafficking. Minivan News reported in August 2010 that the exploitation of Bangladeshi workers alone was an industry worth at least 43.8m dollars a year, rivalling fishing as a source of foreign exchange.

Following the signing ceremony with Nexbis, the Anti-Corruption Commission (ACC) announced it had received "a serious complaint" regarding "technical details" of the bid, and issued an injunction pending an investigation into the agreement. [passage omitted]

Nexbis shares immediately dropped 6.3 per cent on the back of the ACC's announcement.

Last week, facing political pressure ahead of the local council elections, President Mohamed Nasheed upheld the ACC's request that the roll-out of the technology be postponed.

The "stop-work" order amounts to an indefinite hold on the project, with little optimism for a quick outcome. The ACC has not completed an investigation since 2008.

In its statement, Nexbis noted that the system and related technologies to be installed in the Maldives "have been implemented in over 100 locations worldwide including the Americas, Europe and Asia and comply with ICAO (International Civil Aviation Organization) and other international standards. Nexbis is an international company with strict internal policies that conform to international anti-corruption laws and strictly enforce the policy. All Nexbis staff have strict government security clearance to carry out national security projects." [passage omitted]

"Nexbis's international lawyers have been building a libel and defamation case since the media frenzy to enable legal proceedings against certain individuals and institutions that have wrought irreparable damage to Nexbis's reputation and brand name," the company stated. [passage omitted]

January 27, 2011 Thursday 3:10 AM EST'An Assessment of Trafficking in Persons in Mauritius'*BYLINE: Targeted News ServiceLENGTH: 525 wordsDATELINE: PORT LOUIS, Mauritius

The U.S. Embassy issued the following news release:

An event under the theme of Trafficking in Persons (TIP) took place at the Municipality of Port Louis, on Wednesday, January 26, 2011. The event, entitled: "An Assessment of Trafficking in Persons in Mauritius" was organized by the U.S. Embassy in the context of the proclamation by President Barack Obama this year of January as U.S. National Slavery and Human Trafficking Prevention Month.

The four panelists who gave presentations on the issue were Johan Moutou-Leckning, Principal State Counsel of the Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions, Inspector Maneeraj Bundree, Officer in Charge of the Police Brigade for the Protection of Minors, Mrs. Karoona Chooramun, Head of the Child Development Unit of the Ministry of Gender Equality, Child Development and Family Welfare and Mrs. Rita Venkatasawmy, Director of the Centre d'Education et de Developpement pour les Enfants Mauriciens (CEDEM).

In his opening remarks, U.S. Embassy Deputy Chief of Mission (DCM) Troy Fitrell emphasized that the transportation in TIP per se was a secondary part of the issue; the core problem is the use of force or vulnerability to exploit human beings. He underlined that "Around the world, an estimated 12.3 million adults and children are engaged in forced labor, bonded labor, and forced prostitution. Over 49,000 victims have been identified, according to the same report. On a positive note, there were over 4,000 successful prosecutions in 2009, with 335 related to forced labor. However, there are still currently 104 countries without laws, policies, or regulations to prevent victims' deportation. In addition, 62 countries have yet to convict a trafficker under laws in compliance with the UN's Palermo Protocol on Trafficking in persons from the year 2000."

DCM Fitrell added that Mauritius, as per the U.S. Department of State TIP Report 2010, remained in the Tier 1, "a status which commends the Government of Mauritius for complying fully with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking. According to the report, Mauritius sustained its strong efforts to identify, investigate, and prosecute incidences of trafficking during the reporting period." It is worth noting that Mauritius moved up from the Tier 2 to Tier 1 in 2009.

Panelists for their part explained the nature of their work to prevent TIP in Mauritius, which locally occurs in the forms of child prostitution, sex with a minor, sex abuse, teenage pregnancy, sexual harassment and rape, while in other countries, forms such as child labor, bonded labor or involuntary domestic servitude exist. The panelists also shared ideas for additional efforts to prevent trafficking in Mauritius or to address problems caused by it. Each of the panelists had either attended U.S. Department of State training programs on human trafficking or represented organizations that had received U.S. Government funding for anti-Trafficking in Persons programs. A short but lively discussion period was continued informally outside the hall at the end of the program.

January 17, 2011 MondayBI halts flight of 21,000 OFWs in 2010*BYLINE: BY JOMAR CANLASLENGTH: 317 words

THE Bureau of Immigration (BI) was able to stop more than 21,000 prospective overseas Filipino workers (OFWs) from leaving the country through the Ninoy Aquino International Airport from August to December 2010 as a result of its anti-human smuggling campaign.

According to Immigration Officer in Charge (OIC) Ronaldo Ledesma, the numbers show that the government is sincere in its campaign against human trafficking.

Ledesma said the 21,709 persons who were offloaded from their flights all have tourist visas but intended to work upon reaching their destinations, putting them at risk to abuses and exploitation, as well as incarceration.

He pointed out that the Immigration bureau started its drive against the so-called tourist workers in August after Ledesma was appointed OIC.

The campaign, which was launched following orders of President Benigno Aquino 3rd and Justice Secretary Leila de Lima, aims to protect undocumented OFWs who are mostly victims of illegal recruitment and human trafficking syndicates.

Suspected tourist workers were barred from boarding their flights once they fail to show the necessary clearance and employment permits from the Philippine Overseas Employment Administration (POEA).

Lawyer Maria Antonette Bucasas, Immigration airport operations division chief, said most of the offloaded passengers were bound for traditional OFW destinations such as Singapore, Malaysia, Hong Kong and the Middle East.

She reported that of the total offloaded passengers, 11,990 were stopped at the NAIA 1 terminal while 6,397 and 3,322 were intercepted at the NAIA 3 and NAIA 2, respectively.

Ledesma said some offloading cases are being investigated by the Inter-Agency Council Against Trafficking .

The government's anti-trafficking drive was prompted by a United States State Department report released last year listing the Philippines in Tier 2 of its human trafficking watch list.

Lawmakers eye intensified campaign on illegal recruiters

BYLINE: BY RUBEN D. MANAHAN 4thLENGTH: 512 words

LEGISLATORS are seeking a more intensified government campaign against human trafficking and for law enforcement agencies to run after syndicates engaged in illegal recruitment.

Deputy Speaker Lorenzo Tañada 3rd made the call as he moved to review the performance of the Philippine Overseas Employment Administration's (POEA) and Overseas Workers Welfare Administration (OWWA) on illegal recruiters victimizing Filipinos who are eyeing green pastures abroad.

"We should review the track record of POEA insofar as the prosecution of illegal recruiters is concerned," Tañada said while noting that the government is lagging behind the fight against human trafficking.

"Our existing anti-human trafficking laws have too little bite," he added.

Tañada explained that laws that deal with human trafficking include the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act (Republic Act [RA] 9208), Migrant Workers and Overseas Filipinos Act (RA 8042), and international statutes prescribed by the United Nations Office of Drugs and Crimes.

But he said that the Philippines is on the Tier 2 Watch List of the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons report for not being able to fully comply with the minimum standards in their Trafficking Victims Protection Act.

"Sliding down has a consequence of non-accessibility of aid from the US. It can be prevented by a concrete and sincere desire in cooperation with the US government," Tañada added.

Rep. Mel Senen Sarmiento of Western Samar said that the Department of Foreign Affairs and Department of Labor must play a tougher role in foreign labor disputes.

"Filing of charges against abusive employers must be ensured, special courts on human trafficking set up and LGUs [local government units] tapped in order to set up a network at the barangay level to reduce such cases," he said.

Rep. Walden Bello of Akbayan party-list said that the Foreign Affairs department should closely monitor the performance of many labor attaches abroad in the face of reports that they are not attending to the needs of the Filipinos in distress abroad.

He specifically cited that case of 11 migrant Filipinos were duped into accepting dubious employment through the Manila-based Adman Human Resource Placement and Promotions. Bello said that the 11 workers were told they would be employed in the US through Aramark, supposedly a Fortune 500 company, with a guaranteed wage of $7.25 to $8 an hour.

According to him, the 11 Filipinos were instead made to work in Biloxi, Mississippi under Royal Hospitality Services Inc. and paid a lower rate-$4.75 a room. They were made to clean at least 14 rooms, when the most they could physically accomplish was 10 rooms.

Bello said the workers escaped in September and sought help from the OWWA office in Los Angeles.

However, it was reported that Luzviminda Padilla, the labor attaché in Washington, D.C., refused to help them when OWWA welfare officer Alberto Duero requested aid for the victims.

Padilla was quoted as saying: "They [Filipinos] must be send back home as there might be a better way to spend government funds."

Trafficking in Persons, Migrants Smuggling, Illegal Migration and Problems of Deportees in Pakistan

BYLINE: Imran Ahmad Sajid

SECTION: Vol. 2 No. 4

LENGTH: 20811 words

Abstract

The dazzling lights and progressive economy of Europe, Middle East and other developed parts of the world definitely attract poor pockets from all over the world. Some try the legal way to reach and stay there. Others may try, or are forced to try, the most dangerous, threatening and illegal way to reach to the riches of the developed world. The trafficked, smuggled or illegally immigrated are deported upon the encounter of the host nation's authorities. This illegal way of immigration is not without hardships for many. This paper brings forward the problems being faced by the deportees. The paper is based on two case studies. Non-structured interviews were conducted with the immigration officials. The reason for going abroad remained poor economic conditions in the country of origin.

Keywords

Trafficking in Person (TIP), Migrants Smuggling, Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance (PACHTO), Passport, Deportees, Deportees on Forged Documents (DFDs), Off-Loadees on Forged Documents (OFDs), Federal Investigation Agency (FIA), Immigration, ITGOS (Iran, Turkey, Greece, Oman, Spain)

Introduction

In Pakistan, all the matters of immigration, deportees, human trafficking, migrants smuggling etc, are handled and regulated by the Federal Investigation Agency (FIA); not only immigration but all the organized crimes as well. FIA has been divided into different wings for encountering organized crime: Crime and Banking Wing, Immigration Wing, Anti-Human Trafficking Cell (AHTC), Cyber Crime Wing, and Special Investigation Group (SIG). Deportees are dealt by the Immigration Wing and AHTC, commonly known as the Passport Cell also. Deportees may include those who move, or are moved, legally or illegally across borders by the well organized trafficking and smuggling groups, or by themselves. It can be one of the severals; a victim of trafficking, migrant smuggling, illegal entrant or resident into the State to which he does not belong, or a legal entrant but may have overstayed or violated any law of the host nation.

Many Pakistani women and men migrate voluntarily for low-skilled employments (TIP, 2010), who find the visa to be too short and the renewal of visa to be too expensive. It too is a reason for violation of immigration laws in the host nation.

Confusion exists about the exact definition of the deportees. As the deportees include the trafficked, the smuggled, and the violators of immigration law, the public, the media and the authorities in Pakistan are unsure whether the deportees be seen as victims of trafficking, objects of smuggling, or criminals (convict of violating immigration laws). This confusion regarding human trafficking and migration has also been mentioned in Trafficking In Persons Report (TIP), 2010.

Although both involve illegal transportation of people from one place to another, migrant smuggling and trafficking in person are not the same things. Smuggling of migrants is defined in the Protocol Against the Smuggling of Migrants by Land, Sea and Air as "the procurement, in order to obtain, directly or indirectly, a financial or other material benefit, of the illegal entry of a person into a State Party of which the person is not a national or a permanent resident" (Article 3).

On the other hand, Trafficking in Person is defined as "the recruitment, transportation, transfer, harbouring or receipt of persons, by means (emphasis mine) of the threat or use of force or other forms of coercion, of abduction, of fraud, of deception, of the abuse of power or of a position of vulnerability or of the giving or receiving of payments or benefits to achieve the consent of a person having control over another person, for the purpose of exploitation..." (Article 3[a], Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, UN 2000).

The definitions of migrant smuggling and trafficking in person include three factors; the act, the means, and the purpose. The difference between migration and smuggling is that of the purpose. In migrants smuggling or illegal entry, the purpose is only the entry into another State while in trafficking in person the purpose of exploitation-forced labour, prostitution etc-is vividly visible.

As far as the criminality of human trafficking or migrant smuggling is concerned, it is not only a transnational organized crime but also a serious violation of human rights. The scholars recognize it as modern day slavery (UNODC, 2010). It knows no boundaries of culture or religion. Its victims include people of all ages and gender; children, boys, girls, men, women, and old. Women, children and the young are the most likely victims. Along with firearms and drugs, it is the second largest illegal international trade generating thirty two (32) billions $ annually (ILO,2007). Each year, only from Pakistan, thousands of men, women and children are moved illegally by highly organized international smuggling and trafficking groups. In the first half of 2010 more than twenty thousand persons were deported from the rest of the world to Pakistan. This does not show the entire picture but provides a glimpse of the situation.

Along with Nepal, Pakistan is the only South Asian country, which has been placed in Tier 2 by the TIP 2010 report. Previously Pakistan remained in Tier 2 from 2005-08 but was dropped to Tier 2 Watch List in 2009. Because of the honest and concerted efforts of the State through the FIA to check the menace of human trafficking Pakistan improved to Tier 2 this year (TIP, 2010).

Theoretical Debate on Victimization

Despite the serious and far-reaching number of problems faced by illegal immigrants and the Governments' commitment to address these problems, the issue of deportees keeps on increasing-both voluntary and involuntary. Why and how person becomes mentally prepared to face all these problems? This question has generated heated debate in the FIA Immigration and Anti-Human Trafficking circles.

There are two major theories. First see them as criminals who violate the law. In the second theory they are seen as human beings with rights. These two theories explain how the deportees should be seen-criminals or individuals with rights. Even criminals unless convicted have certain rights. All detainees or imprisoned persons also have rights. However, the real problem to one's mind is why some people willingly take practical steps to move and stay across borders, illegally.

It is not only a matter of deception, compulsion (as in human trafficking) or consent (as in migrant smuggling) but also a matter of serious research and analysis as why some persons of a specific population or country become a victim to a crime so grave in nature.

The Adler's theory of human behaviour says that the primary human motivation is 'striving for superiority'. It is the 'striving for superiority' which shapes our behaviour and the entire personality. Adler confined his concept of 'striving for superiority' only to overcoming the inferiority but in its sociological analysis the borders of 'striving for superiority' may be extended. It may mean moving towards a better life in the society, and a better future. Better life may mean a better financial position: be able to pay off bills on time, build a better house, etc, a better social status, say in community or politics, greater decision making power in family affairs, etc. This striving nature of man compels him/her to look for the ways to overcome his inferiority feelings and to move upward in the society. Some try the traditional means of moving upward in the society. Others may try to find the easiest and fastest ways to move upward.

One of the desires of all individuals is to strengthen his/her economic position. Apart from the kidnapped immigrants, case studies revealed that the deportees immigrated in order to improve their financial/economic position.

The push and pull factors play their part on one hand but they alone can not create the phenomena of trafficking/smuggling or illegal immigration. The most important factor, which constitutes criminal side, is the availability of agents who handle the trafficking/smuggling and illegal immigration internationally. This blend of human nature and availability of the agents mutually creates human trafficking/smuggling and illegal immigration. The solution to this problem is cutting the threads of agents (UNODC Annual Report, 2010).

Diagram I shows the logical flow of the hypothesis. When striving nature of man collides with the availability of traffickers/smugglers it results in victimization. In an ideal situation where there is no cross boarder kidnapping, when the solution to the problem is applied and the threads of trafficking/smuggling are cut it results in no or reduced illegal cross boarder migration. This hypothesis, although seem quite logical, needs verification through more empirical researches, as the word opportunities is a vast term and one has to locate the exact root causes and the facilitating factors separately.

Some Relevant Immigration Terminologies in Pakistan

'Deportation' means arrival of any passenger who has been refused entry or made to leave the country on account of violation of any law of the host country on fake/forged travel documents or suspecting the same to be fake/forges (FIA Standing Order 29/2005). 'Deportee' is a person who has been deported from a state. Passengers deported on account of fake/forged documents are termed as 'DFDs'

(Deportee on Forged Documents). DFDs are further classified into categories "A" and "B". As mentioned in the FIA Immigration Handbook (2007 Edition),

1. A person shall be classified as Category "A" deportee if he has traveled on:

- i. Fake, counterfeited, tampered, forged visa, Passport or Resident Card etc;
- ii. Mis-declaring facts about travel documents; or
- iii. Impersonation

2. A person shall be classified as Category "B" deportee if he has traveled on genuine travel documents from port of embarkation but has subsequently presented a different or illegal travel documents at transit station (FIA Immigration Handbook,2007) .

On the other hand, 'inadmissibility' means declaration of host country of any person as invalid on account of violation of any law of the host country on fake/forged travel documents or suspecting the same to be fake/forged or without travel documents irrespective of fact whether deported back or otherwise (FIA Standing Order No. 29/2005). Inadmissible passengers are termed INADS passengers.

As mentioned before, the reasons for deportation are manifold. A person may have valid documents yet he can be deported if he had overstayed in his last visit to that country, or is black listed or if he/she fails to satisfy the Immigration Officer. In another scene the deportee may have invalid documents, viz; expired visa/passport or improper documents etc. Besides this, majority of the deportees are those who have fake/forged documents or who are traveling by impersonating someone else. The documents may be genuine but the person traveling on the documents may not be the same person as mentioned in the travel documents (FIA Immigration Handbook, 2007).

Data on Deportees in Pakistan

Pakistan has a commendable data management system regarding deportees. Upon the arrival of a deportee to Pakistan, his/her entire data is entered into a programme named 'Personal Identification Secure Comparison and Evaluation System' (PISCES). PISCES Project not only provides data on deportees but also provides Immigration officials and law enforcement agencies with a tracking system to capture vital information of travelers and allows them to identify and, if necessary detain individuals of interest (FIA, 2010). Further, FIA publishes its performance report annually, sometimes half yearly. It is only the FIA performance reports which contain the data on deportees. The data for this study was also taken from numerous reports published by the FIA.

Table I shows country-wise deportees for three years of 2007, 08 and 09. Table I and Figure I show that the highest number of deportees is from the Middle East, 70.78%. During 2007, out of 61,342 deportees from all-over the world, a total of 46,603 (76%) persons were deported from the Middle East. The number of deportees decreased for the next year and came down to 32,308 (65.12%) out of 52,005 deportees. For the last year, 2009, there was no significant variation in the strength of deported persons, i.e. 33,087 (73.71%).

The second largest number of deportees came from Iran, which constitute 11.75% of the total deportees during past three years. For 2007, total number of deportees from Iran was 6071 (9.90%). It rose to 7,836 in next year and for 2009, a total of 4,690 persons were deported from Iran.

Similarly, deportees from Turkey and the UK constitute 6.84% and 4.17% respectively. Furthermore, deportees from Europe and Far East Asia have similar percentage share. It is worth noting that the strength of deportees from various countries does not change significantly for all these past three years. It indicates that the behaviour of people who wants to immigrate across borders remained at the same level.

Overall deportees kept on decreasing for these years. It was more than sixty thousands in 2007, decreased slightly above the fifty thousands, i.e. 15% decrease in one year. It further decreased by 14% coming down to almost forty-five thousands in 2009. There has been 27% decrease in number of deportees in past three years showing an improving law-enforcement mechanism in Pakistan.

Table II shows a more detailed picture of deportees from various regions of the world. Almost 70% of all the persons are deported to Pakistan from the Middle East. Out of the total 1,11,998 deportees during past three years 98% of all were deported only from three countries, viz, Oman, 12,737 (11.37%), Saudi Arabia, 51,016 (45.55%) and the UAE, 46,377 (41.40%). Similarly, excluding the UK, 64.66% of deportees from Europe come from only four countries, viz, Greece 24%, Italy 11.8%, Spain 18.35%, and Ukraine 10.5%. Moving to the South of Europe, majority of the deportees from Africa came from South Africa, i.e. 76%. Further, across the Atlantic Ocean, almost all the deportees came from two countries, the USA and Canada. In the Far East, majority of the persons get deported from Malaysia, i.e. 73.81%.

Overall, 97% of total deportees from 2007 to 2009 came from only fifteen countries, Iran 11%, Turkey 7%, Oman 8%, Saudi Arabia 32%, UAE 29%, Greece 0.5%, Italy 0.25%, Spain 0.33%, Ukraine 0.2%, USA 0.35%, Canada 0.2%, UK 4%, Malaysia 1.7%, and South Africa 0.7%.

In addition to deportees, victims of trafficking in person and human smuggling, 421 human smugglers were arrested in the first half of 2009 and 664 in the first half of 2010.

Analysis of Data

The figures in the above tables need more interpretation. Majority of the deportees from Iran, Turkey, and Europe are those who wish to move to and stay in Europe as their destination point. They use the land course for migration. The usual route is Quetta, Tufan (Iran), Turkey, and Greece. In the five stories narrated in the report of Human Rights Commission of Pakistan, Human Trafficking through Quetta (2009), all the deportees (victims) confirmed that they had no problem crossing Pak-Iran border at night. This is an indicator of weak supervision and control at borders in night shifts.

On the other hand, Middle East is one of the richest regions in the world. The source of its wealth is oil. Further, this region has a spiritual and mystical attraction to the Muslims of Pakistan and of the entire world. Its culture significantly resembles our own culture. Further, this region also has a soft corner for the Muslims of the world, including Pakistan, at least at the government level. Therefore, a substantial number of persons from Pakistan move there in search of better employment and to experience a lower level of alienation as well. Out of all the deportees from the Middle East, a great majority is arrested and deported from Oman and the UAE, the gate to Middle East from Pakistan via Gawadar Port, Balochistan. The distance between Gawadar and Masqat (capital of Oman) is less than three hundred miles. Almost 70% of total deportation from the Middle East indicates that this region attracts people of Pakistan more than other regions.

Owing to this phenomenon, Pakistan has opened a Link Office of FIA at Oman that cares for the victims of human trafficking and smuggling. This office at Oman covers the entire Middle East.

In the Far East, Malaysia attracts a majority of immigrants from Pakistan, who immigrate perusing the desire for a better future. It is one of the newly industrialized countries. By 2009, Malaysia was 29th largest economy of the world while 3rd largest in the Far East Asia. As compared to Pakistan, where GDP per capita is slightly more than a thousand US dollars, Malaysian GDP per capita was $ 14900 US dollars in 2009-almost fifteen times higher than Pakistan. Further, Malaysian economy is an open economy with a majority of population being Muslims. It accepts even the illegal immigrants-of course with some terms and conditions (one of the case studies given in this paper also belongs to Malaysia, See in Case Studies section).

Besides deteriorating Pakistan's image in the world community, handling deportees cost a huge amount to the country during detention and investigation. "It costs us minimum Rs. 250/- for a single night stay of a deportee", mentioned one of the FIA officials during an interview. Calculating by this way average cost of deportees' single night stay in lock ups happens to be more than Rs. 131.86 million annually. This does not include the traveling and other costs of the deportees. Moreover, there is no proper allocation for the cost of investigation, and unfortunately, there is no single victim-support centre in any of the zonal offices of the FIA.

Methodology of the Study

Initially, responsive evaluation methodology was decided upon for this study. Later on, the pretesting and field difficulties hampered the course for evaluative research. Therefore, the methodology was converted into case-study method. Three separate forms of cases are presented in this paper. The subjects were interviewed extensively, using a non-structured interview and probing method. At the end of each interview the subjects were given a standard questionnaire to fill-in. Riaz fulfilled all the legal requirements and succeeded in getting a three months visit visa to Malaysia in February, 2006. After reaching to Malaysia and expiry of his visa he vanished and stayed there illegally. After five long years (October,2010), Riaz presented himself to the Pakistani embassy at Malaysia pretending that he lost his passport. He was immediately given an emergency passport and sent back to Pakistan.

Case Studies

1. Riaz -- Deportee from Kuala Lumpur Malaysia

Riaz (not actual name), thirty six (36) years old, married, male and having two children, was deported from Malaysia on 24th October, 2010 due to expiry of visa. He is a literate person with a Secondary School Certificate (equivalent to 'O' level). Unfortunately, he couldn't make it to college after completing his secondary level education. His family owned a small piece of land in Takht Bhai, which was the source of their family income. After secondary education he also joined his family in agriculture. Remaining unemployed for almost fifteen years Riaz decided to go to Malaysia in order to try his luck. As mentioned by Riaz, many of the people from his community already immigrated to Malaysia, majority through legal means. It was a tradition of his community to go to Malaysia for better future. Hence, Riaz also contacted Mr. Shahid (not actual name) who had the reputation of taking people from his village to Malaysia. In other words, the agent.

Problems in Malaysia

Before moving further on Riaz's case it shall be noted that in Malaysia, if an alien stays there after the expiry of his/her visit visa, he/she can legalise his/her stay by obtaining a 'work permit' from the immigration authorities of Malaysia. The alien has to pay almost 2,000/- Ringgits as a permit fee.

Riaz describes his problems in his own words as follows:

"I used to work in Malaysia on daily wages. A Malaysian worker is given 45/- Ringgits daily. But my daily wage was only 30/- Ringgits. My other fellows too were earning the same wages. Keeping in view my daily wages, which were also not regular, it was very difficult for me to pay the Permit Fee, i.e. 2,000/- Ringgit, almost two and a half month regular work wages. Therefore, I didn't pay the fee and hid myself from the immigration authorities so that I can save and send more money to my family in Pakistan. "It is surprising to know that the police or other government authorities do not create any undesirable problem for daily wagers in Malaysia- neither teases nor terrorizes the daily wagers without work permit" he added.

While conducting the interview, it was observed that Riaz was very nervous. "I used to say all the prayers on time and recite the Holly Book daily. Then, why I have been caught in this problem" he agitated. Further, his family was very upset upon his arrest at the airport by the immigration authorities of Pakistan. The apprehension of his family further intensified his nervousness. He was continuously consoling his mother and wife on cell phone.

The key problem of Riaz remained income, here in Pakistan and there in Malaysia too. "I have a sister at my home that still has to be married. All her expenses are to be met, which are out of the reach of our family's income. Upon my return, I have to face the courts and at the same time make an earning for my children and family," he narrated with severe anxiety and dejection.

The case of Riaz leads us to the conclusion that it is the poor economic conditions of the person at home and the availability of agents or exposure to the experienced immigrated people, which motivate a person to go or stay in the alien country illegally. Further, it is very common to visit a country on visit visa and vanish there for years in order to earn money. The typical way of returning back by such people is to present their self to Pakistani embassy and by complaining that his/her passport has been lost. In this way, they face lesser expenditure on return and lesser problems from the immigration authorities.

2. Iftikhar Deportee from London, the UK

Iftikhar (not actual name), a twenty-two years old student, was deported from the United Kingdom on Thursday 21 October, 2010. He went to the UK on student's visa but was deported from the Heathrow airport. The reason for his deportation was neither his documents nor any other legal lacunae. It was something very astonishing. Iftikhar narrated his story in the following words:

"I was allotted a students' visa by the UK High Commission. But, when I arrived at the airport in London the immigration authorities enquired about the university and told me that the university was closed for vacations. I was deported but as I was having a students' visa, therefore, I didn't have any return ticket."

Iftikhar's case is very much non-traditional. His reason for deportation was not any legal lacunae from his side but he suffered due to the lack of information on the part of British High Commission in Pakistan and other authorities. When the Pakistani Immigration authorities were asked about this mishap due to lack of information, it was told that the Immigration authorities only check whether the visa, passport and other travelling documents are genuine and legal or not. The authorities have nothing to do with the opening or closure of the universities abroad. It clearly seems that Mr. Iftikhar suffered because of the incompetence or lack of knowledge of the staff of the High Commission whereas they too may not know the opening and closure of a university. It also seems a communication gap between Iftikhar and his university. Neither the High Commission nor the Immigration authorities verified before allotting the visa.

Looking at the ground for deportation of Iftikhar, it seems very unreasonable. Iftikhar could have been accommodated, at least until his university was to open, so that he would not have to take pain of returning to the country. His deportation also shows the monopolistic, dictatorial and veto powers of the Immigration Officer. There are complaints about the too much concentrated power in the Immigration officer. He/she can deport anyone who is granted a legal visa by his/her country's embassy even without any ground.

As far as Iftikhar's victimization is concerned, there is no legal mechanism to support the victims like him and others. He has to pay the return ticket to the air company and also bear other expenses himself.

Problems of Immigration Authorities

Apart from the deportees, Immigration authorities in Pakistan face numerous problems as well. While conducting interviews with FIA officials the following key problems were identified:

- . Veto power of the Immigration Officer;
- . Changing immigration laws and rules of the host countries combined with delay or no communication of those laws and rules.
- . Non-linkage with certain considerable countries.
- . No Victim Support Mechanism and lack of infrastructure.
- . Limited role of FIA in immigration FIA only verifies the visa and passport.

Conclusion

Europe, Middle East, Malaysia, and South Africa are the most attractive places for Pakistani immigrants. The poor economic conditions, absolute poverty, increase in prices, lack of opportunities, acute unemployment, increase acts of terrorism, are the factors which push the ambitious population to emigrate from Pakistan. The riches of Europe, Middle East, Malaysia, and other developed parts of the world pull them towards themselves. Majority of Pakistani illegal workers in the host countries are engaged in low-skilled jobs and are less productive. Promoting technical education in Pakistan will not only increase the skills of our workers but also their demand in other parts of the world. Similarly, more equipments and trained staff in the FIA with major resource allocation should be in the minds of all stakeholders who wish and are committed to address the problem of illegal immigration.

Money Laundering A Global Threat and Pakistan's Recent Initiatives

By: Amjad Naseer

_ : Abstract

Money laundering is a global challenge of the present era which has roots deep into the major industrial economies of the world. United Nations, through Vienna Convention, Palermo Convention and Marida Convention, has asked the signatories to counter money laundering. The major industrial economies of G7 have joined hands against money laundering and have established Financial Action Task Force (FATF). FATF has given forty (40) recommendations to counter money laundering. Asia / Pacific Group (APG), a regional body on money laundering, was formed by forty (40) member states in 1997. Pakistan is also member of APG. In order to counter the money laundering, Pakistan has enacted Anti Money Laundering Act 2010 and has established Financial Monitoring Unit to receive, analyze and disseminate suspicious transactions to the investigation agencies. This article describes the legal situation of money laundering in Pakistan.

Keywords

Money Laundering, Proceed of Crime, Financial Act Task Force (FATF), Asia / Pacific Group (APG), Egmont Group, Vienna Convention, Palermo Convention, Marida Convention, Anti Money Laundering Act.

History of Money Laundering

Money laundering is fairly a recent term which was reported in the newspaper in 1973 in Watergate scandal, however the history of money laundering is interwoven with the development of trade and banking. Traders used money laundering techniques to hide their assets from the pirates and the raiders along the Red Sea route and the Silk Road. The history of money laundering will be an addition to the criminological literature and will surely be of immense interest to the students of criminology and policing.

How Big the Challenge of Money Laundering is?

In 1998, the IMF's estimated the size of money-laundering transactions globally as being "almost beyond imagination" at 2 to 5 percent of global GDP, which suggested a figure of $640 billion to $1.6 trillion (This was based on a figure of $32 trillion for global GDP at the time) (Michel Camdessus, 1998). Other estimates of global money laundering are given in the Table I:

| | Year | Estimates Global Money Laundering |
|------|------------------------|---|
| | 1998 | US$ 2.85 trillion (John Walker, 1998) |
| | 2004 | US$ 45-280 billion (Reuter and Truman, 2004) |
| | 2005 | US$ 1 trillion (Baker, 2005) |
| | 2008 | US$ 1.425 trillion (AUSTRAC, 2008) |
| 2009 | 2-5% of the global GDP | US$ 800 billion to US$ 2 trillion (UNODC, 2009) |

Consequences of Money Laundering

The money laundering has severe negative economic and social consequences such as it undermines financial system, expands and promotes crime, diminishes government's tax revenue and weakens government's control over the economy. Studies have shown a nexus of mafias of organized crimes and terrorists who join hands for mutually rewarding benefits, which ultimately threatens the very fabric of the society.

United Nations Conventions Concerning Money Laundering

Vienna Convention

In 1988, the United Nations Convention against the Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances, commonly known as Vienna Convention, urged signatories to establish money laundering as a criminal offence, enact legislation to identify, trace, seize and forfeit proceeds of drug trafficking, implement measures designed to combat money laundering and make money laundering an extraditable offence.

Palermo Convention

In 2000, UN Convention against Transnational Organized Crime, commonly known as Palermo Convention, required signatories to adopt such legislative and other measures as may be necessary to establish as criminal offences actions that have the effect of laundering the proceeds of crime.

Merida Convention

In 2005, UN Convention against Corruption, the Merida Convention, criminalized the laundering of the proceeds of corruption and addressed the tracing, freezing, seizure and confiscation of the proceeds of corruption.

What the Money Laundering is?

Money Laundering is the process of converting the money or assets derived from some illegitimate activity or crime to the money or assets that give the appearance of having been obtained from some legitimate source. The clip-arts given in Fig-I are generally used in various trainings.

In other words, "money laundering" is the process by which the 'proceed of crime' is given the appearance of lawfully obtained money by using a number of money laundering methods. Drug trafficking, human and weapon smuggling, corruption, fraud, sexual servitude, terrorism, theft, kidnapping for ransom, smuggling goods are the major crimes which generate money. This illegally earned money is known as the 'proceed of crime'. Proceed of crime is mostly in the form of cash but it may be in the form of prize bonds, saving certificates, gold, precious stones, diamonds, cars, houses, plots, land etc. The 'proceed of crime' is the "dirty money" or the "black money" which has not been earned from legitimate source.

Thus, criminals need this dirty or black money to be converted into the "clean money" or the "white money" so that the same could be used for purchase of assets, luxury, for investment in legitimate and reinvestment in their illegitimate businesses. The laundered proceeds apparently appear as the money earned from some legitimate source. It is very difficult, especially for a common man, to connect the laundered money with 'proceed of crime' or to distinguish it from the legitimate source of a criminal. A common man presumes that the money has been earned legally from some legitimate source.

Why and How Criminals Launder Money?

Criminals launder money because the money laundering provides their illegitimately earned money a legitimate cover which helps them to avoid prosecution, conviction and confiscation of the 'proceed of crime'. They launder money by disguising its actual source, changing its form or by moving it to the place where it is less likely to attract attention. The money laundering is the three stage process, as shown in the graphic below which the writer obtained from a training programme of capacity building on money laundering investigations:

Source: Presentation on Introduction to Money Laundering at MLIP, Abu Dhabi by Mr. Cris Douglas, AFP

Money Laundering Process

Most of the crimes such as drugs trafficking, corruption, tax evasion, human trafficking, terrorism, theft, kidnapping for ransom, smuggling etc usually generate money in the form of cash. Criminals enter this cash in the financial system by some means at the initial stage of money laundering process. They do this to move the money within the financial system and to convert it into a form that appears as legitimate and distinct from the original illegitimate source. They use a number of methods for doing this which are becoming sophisticated day by day and range from purchase of moveable and immovable properties apparently at low prices and their resale apparently at inflated prices to pass the money through a complex international web of legitimate businesses and 'shell' companies.

Typically, money laundering process involves three steps. First, the illegitimate money is introduced into the legitimate financial system. Then, it is moved around to create confusion, sometimes by wire transfer or transferring through numerous accounts. Finally, it is integrated into the financial system through additional transactions until the "dirty money" appears "clean". These three stages of the money laundering process are known as placement, layering and integration respectively and are briefly discussed below:

1. Placement

Criminals enter their illegitimately earned money into the financial system at the initial stage of money laundering process. This is the stage where the black money is placed in the system thus called 'placement' stage. Criminals use a variety of techniques to place their illegal money in the financial system including depositing cash into the bank accounts, purchasing moveable and immovable assets at apparent low prices etc. They may place money by using the following methods too:

- . By breaking the cash into smaller and less conspicuous amounts and placing it into different accounts in order to avoid any suspicion and reporting by the financial institution.
- . By using illegal "Hundi" or "Hawala" system for movement of their money from one hand to another. Criminals use this illegal system as this involves person to person contact for transfer of money and it hardly leaves any trail.
- . A number of businesses in Pakistan handle large amounts of legitimate cash. The criminals mingle their illegitimate cash with their legitimate cash and place it in the financial system.
- . Electronic transfers are now-a-days very common that do not require a named bank account for sending or receiving money to or from someone. Criminals use this method to place their illegal money into the financial system because it involves less time and is difficult to investigate and to trace the origin.
- . Some criminals buy insurance policies or similar instruments using 'proceed of crime' and then en-cash them.
- . Some criminals buy stocks with the help of brokers to place their illegitimate money into financial system.
- . Criminals use benamidars (nominees) such as professionals who handle large amounts of cash to structure their money and place it in the financial system to disguise it from its source.
- . Government issues prize bonds to generate money and offer handsome prizes on them. Prize bonds are bearer instruments and can easily be sold / purchased through the banks or from the open market. Bearer claims the prize money. Criminals buy the prize bonds from the lucky winner and claim the prizes in their own name to launder their illegitimate money.

2. Layering

Layering is the most complex stage of the money laundering process. Once the money has been entered into the financial system, the criminals move it away from the original source by conducting multiple transactions with the placed money and by moving it between different accounts, different entities or locations in the financial system, and disperse it and disguise it in the system in order to conceal its origin. This process of distancing the placed money from their origins is known as 'layering'. The criminals use a number of techniques for layering such as using multiple bank accounts and professionals, corporations and trusts etc as intermediaries. The purpose of layering is to break the connection and audit trail between placement and integration stages of money laundering process. Commonly used layering techniques are given as below:

- .By transferring the money placed in the financial system to the number of bank accounts in domestic banks as well as in foreign banks which may be in different names, in fictitious names or shell companies.
- .By moving money to the offshore banks that accept deposits from non-resident individuals and corporations. This technique is used by criminals because this is inexpensive, leaves minimal audit trail and it is hard to distinguish between clean and dirty money.
- .By preparing false documents to disguise the true source, ownership, location and purpose of the money so that the investigators could be misled. An example of this type of layering is under and over invoicing for creating false paper trails.
- .By purchasing traveler's cheques, bonds, stocks etc
- .By opening letters of credit for imports.
- .By using professionals such as lawyers, chartered accountants etc as their intermediaries and middlemen to anonymously engage in fake / fictitious transactions on their behalf.
- .By using trusts for creation of false paper trails and for transactions with anonymity.

3. Integration

At this stage in the money laundering process, the illegitimate money is returned in the hands of criminals as 'white' money and apparently appears as legitimate which can be utilized by criminals to purchase moveable and immoveable assets such as plots, agriculture land, houses, vehicles, gold etc or to invest in some business. The criminals also use this laundered money for expanding their criminal network. The above-mentioned three steps of money laundering process may occur as separate and distinct phases or may overlap. The criminals use the methods and techniques to launder their money that suit them and are easily available to them.

Money Laundering Techniques used in Pakistan

Criminals in Pakistan mostly generate money from narcotics trafficking, human and weapon smuggling, corruption, tax evasion, kidnapping, theft, robbery, frauds etc. The various reports on criminal cases reveal that they generally use one or the other techniques to launder their illegally earned money. Some of the commonly used tactics are:

- . By smuggling currency across borders through cash couriers;
- . By using shell corporations which serves as a vehicle for business transactions without itself having any significant assets or operations. Shell corporations are not in themselves illegal and they may have legitimate business purposes. However, they are a main component of the underground economy, especially those based in tax havens. They may also be known as international business corporations (IBCs), personal investment companies (PICs), front companies, or "mailbox" companies. (http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Shell_corporation);
- . By purchasing bearer instruments. A bearer instrument is a negotiable instrument which is payable on demand to the holder, regardless of whom it was originally issued to (http://www.investorwords.com/440/bearer_instrument.html);
- By using wire transfers;
- . By purchasing luxury items;
- . By purchasing agricultural land, residential plots, houses and investment in real estate;
- . By false invoicing;
- . By structuring. Structuring is the practice of executing financial transactions, such as the making of bank deposits, in a specific pattern calculated to avoid the creation of certain records and reports required by law (<http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Structuring>);
- . By use of false identity to purchase assets or to open accounts to obscure true beneficial ownership of financial assets;
- . By using third parties or nominees to open accounts;
- . By using alternative informal remittance systems i.e Hawala;
- . By using modern communication techniques;
- . By using accounts in foreign banks;
- . By using prepaid / debit card;

One of the main reasons of increased money laundering in Pakistan is the informal and cash economy and its porous borders. Afghanistan is the major poppy producing country and is the world's main source of illicit opiates. Pakistan is adjacent to Afghanistan and is a significant drug transit country. Transactional criminal networks active in Pakistan play a central role in the transshipment of narcotics from Afghanistan to international markets. The illegal proceeds are then laundered through various means, mainly through the informal money transfer method i.e Hawala. Though the hawala is unlawful in Pakistan but it is a traditional and a common method to transfer money not only in Pakistan but in the region. Unfortunately, there is no attempt on part of academics and practitioners alike to explore this area by their empirical research and studies. Much work is to be done to testify these perceptions on the touchstone of empirical research, though these are very valid perceptions.

World's Anti Money Laundering Regime

Till mid 1980s, there was no legislation in place in any country to control money laundering. United States enacted Money Laundering Control Act in 1986. In 1989, G7 countries formed FATF (Financial Action Task Force) to combat money laundering.

Financial Action Task Force (FATF)

The Financial Action Task Force (FATF) is an inter-governmental body whose purpose is the development and promotion of policies, both at national and international levels, to combat money laundering and terrorist financing. The Task Force is therefore a "policy-making body" which works to generate the necessary political will to bring about national legislative and regulatory reforms in these areas. The FATF monitors members' progress in implementing necessary measures, reviews money laundering and terrorist financing techniques and counter-measures, and promotes the adoption and implementation of appropriate measures globally.

In performing these activities, the FATF collaborates with other international bodies involved in combating money laundering and the financing of terrorism. The FATF does not have a tightly defined constitution or an unlimited life span. The Task Force reviews its mission every five years. The FATF has been in existence since 1989. FATF has 36 members including two regional organisations (the Gulf Cooperation Council and the European Commission). The FATF Forty drawn up forty Recommendations in 1990 as an initiative to combat the misuse of financial systems by persons laundering drug money. In 1996 the Recommendations were revised for the first time to reflect evolving money laundering typologies.

The 1996 Forty Recommendations have been endorsed by more than 130 countries and are the international anti-money laundering standard (www.fatf-gafi.org).

These recommendations cover the following:

- . Legal

Legislating to ensure that money laundering is an offence with money and assets subject to confiscation

- . Financial and Regulatory

Implementing procedures to ensure financial institutions identify and report suspicious transactions

- . Law Enforcement

Providing assistance to member countries in regard to investigations, prosecution and extradition matters

Significant Recommendations of Financial Action Task Force (FATF)

Although all the recommendations of FATF on money laundering are very important but at the initial stage, if the countries adopt the following three, they may consider that they have stepped into the global effort to counter money laundering:

Recommendation No. 27

Countries should ensure that designated law enforcement authorities have responsibility for money laundering and terrorist financing investigations. Countries are encouraged to support and develop, as far as possible, special investigative techniques suitable for the investigation of money laundering, such as controlled delivery, undercover operations and other relevant techniques. Countries are also encouraged to use other effective mechanisms such as the use of permanent or temporary groups specialized in asset investigation, and co-operative investigations with appropriate competent authorities in other countries.

Recommendation No. 28

When conducting investigations of money laundering and underlying predicate offences, competent authorities should be able to obtain documents and information for use in those investigations, and in prosecutions and related actions. This should include powers to use compulsory measures for the production of records held by financial institutions and other persons, for the search of persons and premises, and for the seizure and obtaining of evidence.

Recommendation No. 30

Countries should provide their competent authorities involved in combating money laundering and terrorist financing with adequate financial, human and technical resources. Countries should have in place processes to ensure that the staff of those authorities is of high integrity.

Asia / Pacific Group on Money Laundering (APG)

The Asia / Pacific Group on Money Laundering (APG) was established in 1997 and is an international organization (regionally focused) consisting of 40 members and a number of international and regional observers including the United Nations, IMF, FATF, Asian Development Bank and World Bank. The APG is closely affiliated with the Financial Action Task Force (FATF). All APG members commit to effectively implement the FATF's international standards for anti-money laundering and combating the financing of terrorism referred to as the 40+9

Recommendations(www.apgml.org). The APG has a number of functions including:

- . Assess APG members' compliance with the global AML/CFT standards through mutual evaluations
- . Coordinate technical assistance and training with donor agencies and APG members/observers to improve compliance with the AML/CFT standards
- . Co-operate with the international AML/CFT network
- . Conduct research into money laundering and terrorist financing methods, trends, risks and vulnerabilities
- . Contribute to the global AML/CFT policy development by active Associate Membership of FATF

Pakistan's Anti Money Laundering Initiatives

Pakistan joined APG (Asia / Pacific Group on Money Laundering) in May 2000 (www.apgml.org). Being member of APG and UN, Pakistan is obliged to comply with FATF recommendations. Therefore, the President of Pakistan issued "Anti Money Laundering Ordinance 2007" which was followed by "Anti Money Laundering Ordinance 2009". A permanent legislation was required in order to comply with the FATF recommendations. Therefore, the parliament has now passed an Anti Money Laundering Bill 2010 which received assent of the President on 26th of March 2010 enacting "Anti Money Laundering Act 2010". This is the major initiative of Pakistan in global anti-money laundering efforts through which Pakistan has entered in the list of countries which are recognizing money laundering as a serious problem.

Definition of Money Laundering under Anti-Money Laundering Act 2010

The Anti-Money Laundering Act 2010 defines money laundering as:

"A person shall be guilty of offence of money laundering, if the person:

- a. acquires, converts, possesses, uses or transfers property, knowing or having reason to believe that such property is proceeds of crime; or
- b. conceals or disguises the true nature, origin, location, disposition, movement or ownership of property, knowing or having reason to believe that such property is proceeds of crime; or
- c. holds or possesses on behalf of any other person any property knowing or having reason to believe that such property is proceeds of crime; or
- d. participates in, associates, conspires to commit, attempts to commit, aids, abets, facilitates, or counsels the commission of the acts specified in clauses (a), (b) and (c).

Punishment of Money Laundering

Punishment of money laundering as mentioned in section 4 of Anti-Money Laundering Act 2010 is given below:

"Whoever commits the offence of money laundering shall be punishable with rigorous imprisonment for a term which shall not be less than one year but may extend to ten years and shall also be liable to fine which may extend to one million rupees and shall also be liable to forfeiture of property involved in the money laundering."

Financial Monitoring Unit (FMU)

The Financial Monitoring Unit (FMU) was established under Anti Money Laundering Ordinance 2007. The FMU is the Financial Intelligence Unit (FIU) of Pakistan and is responsible for implementing AML laws in Pakistan. FMU takes appropriate measures to deter and to detect financial and serious crimes. Financial Punishment of Money Laundering

Financial Monitoring Unit (FMU)

The Financial Monitoring Unit (FMU) was established under Anti Money Laundering Ordinance 2007. The FMU is the Financial Intelligence Unit (FIU) of Pakistan and is responsible for implementing AML laws in Pakistan. FMU takes appropriate measures to deter and to detect financial and serious crimes. Financial

Egmont Group of Financial Intelligence Units

In 1995, a group of Financial Intelligence Units (FIUs) met at the Egmont Arenberg Palace in Brussels and decided to establish an informal group whose goal would be to facilitate international cooperation. Now known as the Egmont Group, these FIUs meet regularly to find ways to cooperate, especially in the areas of information exchange, training and the sharing of expertise (www.egmontgroup.org).

Implementation of Anti Money Laundering Act 2010

The Anti Money Laundering Act 2010 falls in the jurisdiction of the Federal Investigation Agency (www.fia.gov.pk), National Accountability Bureau (www.nab.gov.pk) and Anti Narcotics Force. The FIA through its Economic Crime Wing at FIA Headquarters Islamabad and through its five zonal offices has initiated a number of enquiries against money laundering on the basis of Suspicious Transaction Reports (STRs) received from FMU. On receiving credible information, the FIA also initiates enquiries at its own. Despite facing hardships in implementing the said Act including lack of training, lack of resources and cumbersome procedures, the FIA is pursuing implementation of the Anti Money Laundering Act 2010 very seriously.

However, it is too early to estimate the validity and effectiveness of the said Act. In 2009, FIA received 74 STRs whereas so far in 2010, 99 STRs have been received by the FIA. As the law is new and as the problem of money laundering has abruptly grasped, the attention of many, including the FIA, the investigation staff of the LEAs is still not fully equipped, trained and resourceful to address the complexity of this transnational organized crime. However, with improved infrastructure and skills, the FIA will surely make commendable progress in combating the menace of money laundering.

Recommendations

For effective implementation of Anti Money Laundering Act 2010 and for maintenance of proper verifiable data collection, following steps are recommended to be taken which are inline with the FATF recommendations:

- .Anti Money Laundering Circles shall be established at each of the five provincial / zonal offices of FIA.
- .Anti Money Laundering Circle shall be encouraged to support and develop special investigative techniques suitable for the investigation of money laundering, such as controlled delivery, undercover operations and other relevant techniques.
- .Mechanism be devised for information sharing and joint working with other agencies of the countries.
- .Investigation officers involved in combating money laundering shall be well training, well groomed, and of high integrity.
- .Investigation officers shall have powers to obtain record from financial institutions without going to the courts for permission, to search of persons and premises, and to seize and to obtain evidence.
- .Investigation officers involved in combating money laundering shall be provided with adequate financial, human and technical resources.

Conclusion

Money laundering is a global threat. Pakistan has taken serious initiatives to combat money laundering that include enactment of Anti Money Laundering Law in 2010. Money Laundering may have nexus with the terrorist financing. We need to learn from the experiences of others countries and to make efforts to break the nexus of money launderers with terrorists. As Federal Investigation Agency is responsible to investigate cases of money laundering and terrorist financing, therefore, it is required to be strengthened by providing appropriate resources inline with the recommendations of FATF enabling it combat money laundering effectively.

The Victim-Offender Mediation (VOM) and Some Recent Initiatives by Police and Local Government Department in Khyber Pakhtunkhwa, Pakistan

By: Fasihuddin

_: Abstract

With the rising desire of managing crimes and delinquencies through community efforts, a number of programmes and initiatives are launched by the police throughout the world. Reasons for this desire and change are many. This desire looks like a paradigm shift in the current literature on policing and criminology. In places where the police are understaffed, ill-equipped, poorly-paid and poorly trained, and are faced with serious organized crimes like terrorism, the desire to get more and more public support and share the workload and responsibility with others increases manifold. Pakistani police is being faced with such situation, especially in the settled districts of Khyber Pakhtunkhwa (KPK). The KPK police and Local Government initiated two different programmes of mediation, conciliation and local consultative bodies for solving petty problems of the local community, while the police of KPK and Local Government officials in the leading role.

This paper examines the concept of this desire and the outcome of these various initiatives. Despite innovations and a Western outlook, the initiatives found a soft field in the socio-religious context of KPK.

A. Underlying Social And Religious Context Of Mediation and Conciliation In Pakistan

It seems from the modern day literature on mediation/arbitration, VOM and ADR that as if all these concepts and practices are completely western in nature and origin. The Asian context was somewhat blurred, ignored or not properly explored until recently. Asia is rich in cultural experiences, diversities, languages and traditions, of course, of dispute resolutions through various techniques, including the practices of mediation and conciliation. Commentators agree that mediation is part of the Asian culture and tradition, however any specific model or particular approach is yet to be ascertained that is "Asian" or that is uniquely suitable for the Asian context. (Lee and Hwee, 2009). Lee and Hwee have traced the presence of mediation in Asia and have identified that the concept and practice of mediation are not unfamiliar in different parts of Asia, particularly in places like China, South Korea, Japan, Malaysia, Indonesia, Thailand and the Philippines.

Surprisingly, the writers have not mentioned any such concept or practice in India, Pakistan, Bangladesh or some other Muslim world. The social and cultural practices in any of these Asian societies are not very much in contrast with the traditional, intrinsic and socially sensitive practices of Panchayat (meaning the jury of five and mostly in the Punjab province), salisi (third party mediation), and Jirga (mostly in the KPK and Baluchistan provinces and the Federally Administered Tribal Areas, collectively called FATA) are being practiced in Pakistan and Afghanistan. We will briefly explain Jirga which provides a conceptual framework for the recent initiatives of the police and local government, though, at times, not commensurate with the spirit of Jirga.

There is much literature on the concept and practices of Jirga. It is a social institution, an informal justice system, a low-cost, speedy adjudication, a democratic and participatory decision-making process for dispute resolutions in a Pushtoon or Pukhtoon (those who speak Pushto or Pukhtoo) and Afghan society. The most usual form of Jirga is that the rival parties bring their claims before the tribal or community's elders or people of honour and authority whom they trust and respect as the most wise, respectable and influential in the given communities. They listen to the parties (parties don't speak directly to each other), inquire the matter and then decide in accordance with the local traditions, cultural sensitivities, historical precedents, parties' national and social characteristics and also that nothing is decided in violation of Shariah, the Islamic code of conduct or Islamic jurisprudence.

The decision so announced often comes in terms of rapprochement or mutual agreement on some quid pro quo or compensation by the aggressor or asking for forgiveness or fine or a combination of all or pardon in the name of God with no considerations. The procedure and concept of Jirga seems to be a replica of the democratic institution of Greek city-state, however, its indigenous form is shaped by local and religious influences whereby the Islamic concept of Sulha (Peace) is a catalyst for these local peace-building, and restorative justice practices. Such practices are seen in many Asian Muslim countries where the concept of peace (Sulha) is being incorporated or adjusted to the local customary standards and criteria. Gellman and Vuinovich (2008) have excellently described Sulh or Salha in detail, which has its historical underpinnings rooted in the religious writings of the now dominant faiths in the Palestine/Israel region.

Sulha is a ritualistic reconciliation (conflict resolution) practice which helps groups acknowledge, repair, forgive and transcend conflict on the psychological and political level and which creates a space for regaining dignity and honor where it has been lost. The main elements of Sulha seem a glaring replica of what is known as Jirga in Pakistan and Afghanistan. Gellman and Vuinovich (2008) describe three basic elements of Sulha:

First, forming the mediating body, called Jaha. The mediators ---- often Muslim, Christian, or Druzue notables ---- are chosen for their honesty, decency, experience, status, leadership and age. These are the same characteristics of a Jirga composition. The working, hearing and considerations of norms and values by Jaha are also similar to those observed in Jirga. The second feature is that of the truce, call Hodna. It is an agreement where in the Jaha specifies a certain amount of time during which the aggrieved family will not retaliate; like wise, the offender's family will avoid any further confrontations within the victim's family. Hodna is exactly what Teega means in the process of Jirga. When parties agree on mediation through Jirga, Teega, symbolized by a stone, is placed for avoidance of any further bloodshed, hurt or aggression by either parties till the Jirga is convened for final meeting and decision.

Teega is a self-imposed restriction on the parties and sanctified by the institution of the Jirga, with some penalty for violation during the stipulated period. Hodna and Teega are acts and signs of humility, demonstrating willingness to reconstruct the severed relationship without any fear of aggression during the process of Sulha or Jirga. The third element of Sulha is the basic objectives of restoration of honors and granting of forgiveness which are achieved through a closing ceremony, shaking hands and sharing a meal. Such practices and good-well gestures of meeting each other, shaking hands, embracing each other, dinning together and even putting floral garlands into each others' necks are usually seen on the eve of final decision with smiles and congratulations for everyone, including for members of the Jirga on their noble job and successful completion of turning 'enmity into friendship' as they say.

The above discussion clearly indicates that the basic mechanism and practices of Sulha, or Jirga (please note the phonetic resemblance amongst the words of Jirga, Jaha and Jury) are deeply rooted in the religious precincts, historical precedents and social norms and traditions of most of the Arab, Afghan and Pukhtoon societies. There is a need for a comprehensive comparative study of all these practices in the Asian and Muslim societies with the western models and practices of restorative justice, mediation, arbitration and conflict resolution. The acceptance, both at government and societal level, of the various police initiatives and the ADR projects as described in this paper, is basically due to the conducive cultural environment and religious justification behind them. If some legal discrepancies and implementing difficulties in the given ADR projects are removed, these can result in more promising results with proper legal sanctions in support.

It was basically ignorance of these legal considerations and lack of transparency that these initiatives were challenged in the District and Session Court by a local advocate. This litigation undoubtedly damaged the repute of many and put questions on their professional competence.

B. The Need for Conciliation and Victim-Offender Mediation (VOM) in Pakistan:

Victim-offender mediation (VOM) is one of the most well-known and commonly used contemporary programmes. VOM can appear in various shapes and forms depending on the structure of the criminal justice system in which it is introduced, as well as the level of tolerance coming from the public, the politicians and the cultural and historical background of the country. Whether 'independent', 'relatively dependent' or 'dependent', all kinds of VOM can take place at any time during the criminal process, or outside the system altogether (Gavrielides, 2006). Pakistan, with more than 170 million population, got its criminal justice system from the British Rule in India since 1947. The Pakistan Penal Code dates back to 1860 and the Criminal Procedure Code to 1898, whereas the Police Act of 1861 was recently replaced by a new law, the Police Order 2002, the proper implementation of which is still suffering from various legal, administrative, political and financial constraints.

The crime rate of Pakistan has never been an encouraging figure (354 per 100,000 in 2008, See Table and Figure I). The new police reforms were introduced in a time when the officially recorded crime was on the decline. The new police reforms were basically a concomitant part of the broader reforms agenda of the then President General Pervez Musharraf. However, despite the reforms, the public dissatisfaction never relieved, the police media image remained as bad as ever; and the critical remarks of the higher judiciary never subsided (Fasihuddin, 2008). The officially recorded crimes remained on a steady increase. (See Table I and Figure I)

This paper was initially written for the 1st; Asian Mediation Conference, held at Singapore in June, 2009. It is now re-produced and modified for the current issue of PJC.

This situation compelled some of the senior police leadership to locate for the root causes of crimes, (a desire never subsided with the world criminologists) and the reasons for such rising crime spike in Pakistan, and explore for some other possible options to reduce crime and deviance, besides traditional policing. After serious deliberations in the Police Department of the Khyber Pakhtoonkhwa (KP) (total area 74521 sq. km and total population 21.56 million with a total police force of 52649, and a police population ratio of 1: 410), it was decided to introduce the concept and processes of mediation and reconciliation through Conciliatory Committees in all the 23 districts of the province at the level of police-station (238 police stations in the KPK).

The Inspector General of Police, KPK issued certain instructions to all regional and district police officers on 04.04.2007(Annex. A), thus a complete organizational structure was envisioned to make this initiative a success through an institutional framework (Annex. B).

C. Salient Features of Conciliatory Programme:

Some of the basic characteristics of this new initiative as given in detail in the above mentioned annexure are summarized as:

- a. The concept of conciliatory committees is launched due to work overload on the local police and as a demand for community participation in the police work which was also required under the new police law.
- b. Amicable settlement of disputes amongst the people through conciliation and mediation of both civil and criminal cases is deemed imperative in the present situation.
- c. The settlement may be prior to or after the registration of cases in the police station, irrespective of the fact whether the proceedings have been instituted in the competent court or not.
- d. The conciliatory committee called Public Conciliatory Committee (PCC) shall comprise of eight residents of Police Station area; selected by the District Police Officer (DPO) for a period of three years; members shall have good moral character, enjoying respect and are known for their honesty and impartiality. The minimum number of members of a committee shall be three.
- e. The PCC record will be maintained by a coordinator, who will be amongst the members and supported by a lower-staff of the police.
- f. The PCC will take cases for settlement suo moto or by reference of the parties.
- g. In cases registered with the police i.e; criminal offences, compromise will be submitted to the court. In civil cases pending before the court, the compromise will also be submitted to the competent court.
- h. The PCC will be provided a place in the police station, and no government officer will act as a member of the committee. However, in case of dispute or appeal, the matter may be referred to the concerned Incharge of Police Station, called SHO, or Sub-divisional Police Officer (SDPO).
- i. The SDPO will conduct a monthly meeting of the PCC to review its performance and progress made on the pending application.

D. Evaluation and Discussion

This was a low-grade workable and relatively modest initiative, whereby the local police tried to contain the escalation of petty crimes at an early stage and prevent its burgeoning into complicated forms at a later stage. The striking feature of this initiative was that it was started by the provincial police and the committees were formulated at the grass root level of police stations. The initiative was widely publicized and welcomed by all stakeholders and general public like any media news for all new ideas by a department like police. The show was overwhelmed by the a police due mainly to the non-availability of any other senior executive officer at the district level after the promulgation of Local Government Ordinance 2000, which abolished the office of the District Magistrate, called the Deputy Commissioner.

This was an indigenous system and was so flexibly designed as to include all forms of VOM. Basically, legal and procedural formalities were adjusted to social and cultural considerations at a local level. Police were kept inside and outside of this arrangement, both as an observer and as an active participant, giving rise to the chronic debate of impartiality and active role-play. This native design for VOM can best be described in Diagram No. I.

Despite some positive points, there happened to be a few inherent constraints in the system, like:

- a. It was purely a police initiative and the provincial or local governments and other NGOs or international bodies were not involved.
- b. The orders and instructions were only departmental and the system was not institutionalized.
- c. Selection of the members of the PCC was made by the District Police Officer (DPO) which seemed to be an executive selection.
- d. The monthly meeting of the PCC was held by Subdivisional Police Officer (SDPO) which again gave an impression of authoritative control over the committee.
- e. No extra financial or logistic support or funds were allocated to the PCC.
- f. The meeting place i.e; the mediation center was established in a police station, which was against the spirit of mediation.
- g. Capacity-building training of the local mediators of the PCC was not given due importance.
- h. A proper public oversight or central supervision mechanism at the provincial police headquarters was not adopted.
- i. There are some discrepancies and contradictions in the instructions issued by the Inspector General of Police (now renamed as Provincial Police Officer) and the actual subsequent organization of the committee e.g; about the suo moto action of the committee.
- j. The cases which could be taken up by the PCC for settlement were related mainly to land disputes, possession problems, marriage issues, civil suits, contract violations, debts and loans, easement rights, business matters, etc. These are mostly of civil nature and which in a society like Pakistan's, can trigger into serious crimes if not resolved at the initial stages. Police have no original jurisdiction in most of such cases. The list didn't include those criminal offences which are otherwise compoundable and could be categorically mentioned in the list of criminal offences. Some districts included violence against women, human rights violations and police excesses in the list, but these are generally of petty nature, low intensity disputes or violations as, legally speaking, police can not broker a deal or mediation, and if it happens, it may invoke indignation of the court.

The modern exponents of the restorative justice like Howard Zehr and others have strong reservations about the 'dominance' or 'sponsorship' of state functionaries in the process of restorative justice practice. Dzur (2003) explains this aspect as:

"Zehr also argues that for a real experience in justice, communication between victim and offender cannot be dominated by the state or by criminal justice professionals. State officials are not the best candidates for hearing and validating the victim's truth and the offender's remorse. Indeed, Zehr sees the predominance of officials and professionals in the criminal justice system as hindering the satisfaction of victim's needs' (Dzur, 2003).

Zehr's arguments may be true to some extent and in some cases, but in case of Pakistan, the local police took advantage of the ingrained socio-cultural traits of the semi-tribal and semi-democratic population, who attach greater value to their local norms and values. The literature on VOM and Restorative Justice (RJ) has ample reference that even in North America restorative justice is the product of informal justice experiments in the 1970s, such as victim-offender reconciliation and neighborhood justice programmes (Dzur, 2003). Mestitz and Ghetti (2005) state that, "though, a very ancient strategy adopted in tribal or village societies to solve conflicts, repair damages and re-establish social peace, the VOM has become a unique, innovative, the stronger than ever and the best actual practice throughout Europe these days". This clearly indicate that local initiatives should not be ignored in preference to some universal standard programme. Braithwaite (2002) has rightly observed,

"we should also worry about standards that are so prescriptive that they inhibit restorative justice innovation. We are still learning how to do restorative justice well... [it is a threat because] evaluation research on restorative justice is at such a rudimentary stage that our claims about what is good practice and what is bad practice can rarely be evidence-based".

John Braithwaite is one of the leading scholars and an authority on RJ literature and his viewpoint has plenty of support for local and indigenous practices with locally acceptable standards. This bottom-up approach has enormous potential for further refinement of whatever local initiative is introduced, no matter with the facilitation of a few learned, visionary and committed police officers, who are the ultimate beneficiary in terms of reduced workload and reduced crimes in the area. No doubt, this arrangement is subject to a variety of constraints, criticism and evaluation, but at least a step is taken in a direction which leads to some sort of practical programme for further deliberations and correction.

Braithwaite (2002) advises as, "At the end of the day it is better that restorative justice learn from making mistakes than that it make the mistake of refusing to learn.

Recent experience is ground for optimism that if we regulate flexibly, being mindful of all the local ideas for innovation, richer models of restorative justice can blossom". The initiative taken by the local police of the KPK is not without ifs and buts and needs proper evaluation, supervision and monitoring in terms of legal authority, approaches, methodologies and implementing strategies, with verifiable outcomes, standard reporting, and of course, impartial assessment. This requires conceptual understanding of the overall criminal justice system, the police and policing by the proficient knowledge workers, both from within the police department and outside the civil society. The academic discussion on the role of criminal justice professionals, with conflicting claims and findings is no less in the current criminological literature. Restorative justice theory leaves virtually no role for professionals, but in practice, like the KPK Police, they are deeply involved in restorative justice programmes.

However, Oslon and Dzur (2004) conclude that restorative justice needs the involvement of criminal justice professionals for several different reasons, including that restorative justice is unlikely to happen without them. A number of steps are proposed to reduce the dominance of these professionals and provide greater legitimacy to the process. One of the steps is that if criminal justice professionals interested in restorative justice are to become democratic professionals, new forms of training and standards of accountability are needed. Training in the facilitation of community participation needs to become as common as mediation training now. Accountability has to focus on citizen satisfaction with crime reduction and other improvement in community. In the process, the relative "competencies, knowledge and privileges" of professionals and community members are being gradually negotiated and defined through practice (Oslon and Dzur, 2004).

This is how the existing frictions in the initiative of the KPK Police will be iron out with the passage of time where the professionals have assumed to themselves the role of working with community members in crime control and reduction. Seen as an evidence-based innovation for reducing harm, restorative justice will always remain a work in progress, open to its own improvement through better knowledge of its consequence (Sherman, et al, 2005).

E. Results and Achievements of the PCC

The results of the PCC throughout the province remained at a low in 2007 and most part of 2008. No vigorous and tangible efforts were seen in most of the districts. There was no financial support or other incentives for the local staff. In addition to the above constraints, there was severe turbulence in most parts of the province due to extreme militancy and insurgency by Taliban and other militants. The military operations and serious law and order situation entangled the local police to a nerves- breaking level.

Therefore, as compared to the cases received for solution or registration of a report in a police station, little results were achieved in matters of mediation by the PCC. However, it sparked a new dimension for police actions and soon a relatively bigger initiative was taken by the local police, this time in collaboration with the civil society and financial support of The Asia Foundation. A local NGO, Just Peace International, was engaged also. The Asia Foundation got funding from the Australian Government.

F. Alternative Dispute Resolution Project Supported by the Asia Foundation

In order to overcome the anomalies of the earlier PCC initiative by the KPK Police and to involve major stakeholders and to better organize their efforts in the light of the concept of mediation and restorative justice, the Asia Foundation signed a Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) with a local NGO, the Just Peace International and the Inspector General of Police, KPK on August 20, 2008, with the following objectives:

a. The KPK Police will ensure when and if first time criminal or family cases of a petty nature are reported at the police stations in the target districts and shall be brought forward for reconciliation before the reconciliation committees facilitated by Just Peace International.

b. The NGO will facilitate the process of mediation by imparting training to the members of the committees on legal issues, reconciliation techniques and counseling, etc.

H. Gender Justice Through Musalihat Anjuman Project (GJTMA) by UNDP and Government of Pakistan:

In addition to these purely police-sponsored initiatives, we would like to introduce another initiative of ADR, in which the writer was nominated as a focal person from the KPK Police department. This 5-year multi-million US dollars project is intended "to assist women and other vulnerable sections of the society in improving their condition through safeguarding and promoting their rights and lawful entitlements". The Local Government Ordinance, 2001 provides for Musalihat Jarga in chapter XI, Section 102 where, in each union council, a Musalihat Jarga is to be constituted, consisting of a panel of three Musleheen (conciliators) one of whom shall be its Convener, from amongst the residents of the Union who are publicly known to be persons of integrity, good judgment and command respect. The selection is done by the Insaf Committee of the union council.

Section 103 describes the functions of the Musalihat Jarga to achieve the amicable settlement of disputes amongst the people in the Union through mediation, conciliation and arbitration, whether or not any proceedings have been instituted in a court of law in respect of such disputes. The courts of competent jurisdiction may also refer cases to Musalihat Jarga (S.104). On request of the parties there can be an individual Musleh (Conciliator), for individual cases (S.105). The Convener convenes the meetings of the Musalihat Jarga and conducts the proceedings in an informal manner where no legal practitioners are permitted to take part in the proceedings on behalf of any party. The report of the Musleheen (Conciliators) shall be recorded in writing, copies provided to the parties, attested by the Secretary of the Union and the original submitted to the Court (S.106).

In view of these provisions, the Government of the North-West Frontier Province-NWFP (now KPK) Local Government, Elections and Rural Development Department issued Musalihat Jarga (Constitution and Functions) Rules, 2006 vide a Notification on 30th January 2006. Unlike the ADR-project by the Asia Foundation, the Rules of the Local Government Department are more comprehensive and methodical for conciliatory processes and record maintenance at various tiers of the local government i.e, at the union and district level. However, there are some legal issues which need further clarification by the concerned Law Department as the Rules so framed have given rise to considerable legal questions in the minds of legal fraternity.

a. A 'dispute' is explained as a quarrel or disagreement, whether of civil or criminal nature including those specified in Form 1 of the Schedule. A Musalihat Jarga shall conclude its proceedings within seven days in criminal matters (where no First Information Report-FIR, has been logged with the Police) and within three weeks in civil matters, from the date of commencement of the proceedings. The nature of disputes described in Form 1 of the Schedule is of extreme importance as it includes certain heinous crimes which, at times, are non-compoundable and non-bailable and have the highest degree of punishment. Some offences like the organized crime of human trafficking are dealt by the specialized agency of Federal Investigative Agency (FIA) with a separate special law for this purpose.

Some crimes like child sexual abuse, bonded labour, forced marriage, sexual harassment, public insult and degrading female and compelling children, women and disabled to beg are so serious crimes that the demand for a tougher legislation and severe punishments for the perpetrators become stronger and stronger by the civil society, NGOs, media and the legal professionals. At times, the higher judiciary picks up media reported cases for suo moto actions. To some analysts, the Local Government has stepped beyond its legal authority to the extent of infringement on the domain of legislative and judiciary. The writer of this paper has attempted in Table: II to show the Form 1 in Schedule with reference to the relevant section(s) of laws(s) and the nature of the offences so prescribed.

A face-saving Rule is given at No. 5 which says, "In case the parties to the dispute do not agree to have the matter resolved through Musalihat Jarga, or it appears to the Musalihat Jarga that the case is fit for registration of an FIR, or filing before a court of competent jurisdiction, the Musalihati Jarga shall, without compromising impartiality, facilitate registration of an FIR and/or assist the aggrieved party to file the case before a court of competent jurisdiction". This provision is in contrast with the Rule 3 (2) which stipulates that the "Musalihati Jarga shall conclude its proceedings within seven days in criminal matters (where no FIR has been lodged)". Moreover, the registration of cases in the police as an intimidating technique makes the process of mediation directive, authoritative and not impartial and value-free which is the spirit and essence of mediation. The procedure adopted also seems of a formal arbitration than dialogue, mediation and facilitation.

In Rule 13 it is more pronounced as, "In case any party fails to implement the settlement within the stipulated time, the Musalihati Jarga shall send the settlement to police for further action or to the court of competent jurisdiction (as the case may be), who may declare it as rule of the court after notice to and summary hearing of the parties". This is some-time not approved by the scholars of restorative justice and mediation where the failure of mediation is shifted to law-enforcement and judiciary for further legal action. This anomaly makes the process of mediation and ADR as a stick and carrot policy and gives rise to the impression and doubts of highhandedness by both, the police or the Local Government officials as the case may be.

b. Rule 20 deals with record whereby a monthly report on the matters referred to or brought before the Musalihati Jarga with other information details are sent to the offices of District and Session Judge, District Police Officer as well as District Nazim. As far as the police are concerned, the writer couldn't found reports of such nature in most of the District Police Offices. However, during a representation by the responsible officers of the ADR-Project before the Inspector General of Police, KPK, the performance of the Musalihah Anjumans (The word Jarga is replaced here by Anjuman which means an association) was shown in Table IV, which by no means can be described as a good show for a multi-million dollar project. These are the official statistics by the concerned department which need verification and evaluation by an impartial observer. The figures are given for two districts only, namely, Abbottabad and D.I.Khan.

The Musalihat Anjumans (2006-09) decided a total of 647 cases out of 690 whereas the Police Conciliatory Committees settled 2197 applications out of 2841 in a six month period the latter with no support or finances from anyone (Cf. Table II) The officers of this UNDP-GOP project have complained of the confusion created by the Police Conciliatory Committees and criticized the same for having no legal authority. Later on, the constant requests by the officers of the UNDP-GOP project to the Provincial Police Officer for allowing them to conduct training workshops on ADR for local police in Abbottabad were granted.

This might be a requirement for the donor's reports but it was just a duplication of the activities already carried out in the project funded by the Asia Foundation. Frankly, the financial considerations and race for credit-taking amongst the local departments, NGOs and even international donors give rise to such wastage of resources, duplication, repetition and ultimately, the failure of projects which are dumped in the huge and heavy files and reports after the financial year is over! the higher police offices. Relevant literature and guidelines and the results of trainings, according to the report of the said NGO were sent to other district police offices for reference and guidance. It says, "the print and electronic media was involved for publicity of training and the actual mediation processes as an observer". The media carried stories of the somewhat success of mediation in some places.

Some local journals published exclusive items on restorative justice within the existing legal system. All this publicity campaign was more about a police practice than a new idea of policing.

I. Legal Basis of Court-Initiated ADR

In contrast to the Asia Foundation funded (police-facilitated) and the UNDP funded (Local Government-facilitated) ADR projects, there is another initiative for ADR which is court-facilitated but under the provisions of the Small Claims and Minor Offences Court Ordinance, 2002. The recently announced National Judicial Policy (www.ljcp.gov.pk) requires the respective High Courts to designate civil judges cum magistrates to try exclusively cases under the said law. The ordinance is regarded as an 'exclusive forum for facilitating the resolution of small disputes and ADR mechanisms outside the court mechanism' and 'an excellent forum for addressing backlog of cases'.

The ordinance is an excellent and well-thought law and it mostly deals with cases of civil nature (Part I of Schedule, section 5), the suits and claims the subject-matter of which does not exceed one hundred thousand rupees, and with all offences (criminal) in the Pakistan Penal Code, 1860, punishable with imprisonment not exceeding three years or with fine or with both.

The 'amicable settlement' described in section 14 says that, "where at any stage of the proceedings, it appears to the Court either on application of any party or otherwise, that there exists a possibility of amicable settlement between the parties, the Court may, subject to consent of parties, through salis or any other person, conciliate, arbitrate, mediate or resolve through any other means, the claim or offence as the case may be provided that the Court shall not proceed for amicable settlement of offences which are non-compoundable or, for reasons to be recorded in writing, where it considers such settlement to be either against the public policy or interest of the State". A salis means the person acting as conciliator, mediator or arbitrator (section 2(8)), who is nominated by the parties from a list of retired judges and lawyers prepared by the Chief Justice of High Court, or any other person mutually agreed upon (section 15).

The salis can be changed if there is an impression of bias on his part, and whose aim is to find a mutually acceptable solution and assist the parties in reaching an agreement. If a settlement of a suit or complaint is reached between the parties, the salis shall prepare a deed of settlement containing terms of such settlement, signed by the parties and submit it to the Court on the day fixed by the Court together with a certificate that the settlement between the parties was voluntary (section 18). The Court shall before passing a decree based on award, call objections of the parties to it within fifteen days of the receipt of award and settle such objections within fifteen days thereof (section 19). However, if the dispute or claim is not referred for settlement or no settlement is reached under sub-section (1) of section 14 within forty five days of the reference or such extended time as may be granted by the Court, on showing good cause, the Court shall proceed to record evidence (section 26).

The above provisions signify that the said Ordinance is very comprehensive in nature, requires the mutual consent of the parties for a mediator or arbitrator, the settlement is voluntary, time-bound and the mediator/arbitrator is paid for his job as decided by the Court. The striking feature of the Ordinance is that it does not deal with serious human rights violations and organized crimes, or offences which are non-compoundable as in the case of the UNDP-funded ADR project. Similarly, the Court simply adjourns the proceedings and leaves settlement to the mutual agreement of the parties and provides opportunity to them for any objections, unlike the police-facilitated or Local Government-facilitated ADR mechanisms where a tacit threat for police action is always there in case of objection to the settlement so reached. Moreover, as envisioned by the National Judicial Policy, the judicial officers will be imparted training in ADR for this purpose.

A committee of judges of the High Courts headed by a judge of the Supreme Court would arrange training in ADR for master trainers who would later on train the remaining judges in the provinces. Such institutional arrangements are not available in any other project. However, we have to wait for the performance and results of the said Policy as it has recently been announced (May 30th, 2009) and is to be implemented from June 1st, 2009.

J. Conclusion

Though a modest start and with initiation from the police department, the ADR project and the concept of PCC have enormous potential to be welcomed as an innovative and beneficial technique for resolving some of the offences, which may give rise to serious crimes in a society which badly suffers from low socio-economic indicators and the effects and implications of ongoing war on terror. The local police which don't enjoy a good public image, can capitalize on the initiative as spearheaded by some senior officers for enhanced community participation and early resolution of many a problem, which unnecessarily consume the resources of the local police. The only worry is that the initiative needs to be handled by more competent people and supported with a national legal framework and assistance by international community.

Instructions For Conciliatory Committees (ANNEX: A)

(By The Inspector General of Police, NWFP)

The functions and duties of the Police have considerably increased due to the consciousness of the public about their rights which has multiplied the criminal and civil cases. The democratic aspiration of the people under the Police Order also demands the participation of the community in the daily performance of the Police.

As such the constitution of Conciliatory Committees at Police Station level is imperative for achieving amicable settlement of disputes amongst the people through conciliation and mediation of the civil or criminal cases prior or after the registration irrespective of the fact whether the proceedings have been instituted in a court or not.

The Conciliatory Committee shall comprise of 8 residents of the Police Station who are respectable and known for honesty and impartiality. One of whom shall be selected by the members as Chairman of the Committee.

The members of the Committee shall be selected by the District Police Officer for a period of three years. Neither any govt: servants nor public representative shall be selected as members of the Committee.

The Committee shall take up the cases for settlement either Suo Moto or by reference of the parties or the Police but settlement shall only be carried out in such cases where all the parties agree thereto.

In case of settlement before the registration of the case the parties shall enter into compromise and no further action shall be required. However when the cases are registered or pending in courts and the offence is compoundable the parties shall submit a compromise in the court. In civil cases too compromises be submitted in the court in case of reconciliation.

The Committee may be provided place in the police station and provided assistance by police in summoning parties and production of documents etc. The 4.9 A summary report of all activities of the Committee will be prepared by providing incentives to them like verification for Domicile Licenses and Identity Cards etc. Such Committees will promote amity between the public and Police and will resolve the disputes at initial stage thereby resulting in reduction of work-load of police and having good bearing on law and order.

(MUHAMMAD SHARIF VIRK) Provincial Police Officer NWFP, Peshawar.04.04.2007

The Menace of Human Trafficking - Pakistan's Response to the Problem?

BYLINE: Mashhood Ahmad Mirza

SECTION: Vol. 2 No. 4

LENGTH: 6032 words

Abstract

Human Trafficking, whilst not a new phenomenon, remains a heinous activity as women and children are the most vulnerable members of society, yet it is exactly this vulnerability that makes trafficking possible in the first instance. Trafficking in human beings is a covert, multi-faceted and organised criminal activity making it extremely difficult to detect and prevent, particularly in light of its cross-border nature, whilst victims are themselves often difficult to be recognised. This makes trafficking in human beings such a complex activity to approach. There are legislative provisions and international conventions in place to protect trafficked persons but many responses are perhaps too little, too late. This paper, therefore, considers measures that have been put in place by the Pakistan Government to protect trafficked persons.

Keywords

Human Trafficking, Human Smuggling, Slavery, Palermo Protocol, Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance (PACHTO), Domestic Servitude, Sexual Exploitation, Debt Bondage and Forced Labour.

Introduction

Trafficking in human beings is a very sensitive issue as it is at the very intersection of contemporary anxieties concerning the global political economy, population growth, gender and ethnic stratification, transnational organised crime and human rights abuses and the inability of states, groups of states and international agencies to control any of these effectively. Human trafficking is the modern form of slavery. It happens when people are recruited, transported, or received through deception, threat or force. Once trapped, they are exploited using threats, physical force, emotional abuse, or told they must pay off a large debt to their captors. They may be enslaved for years, or their entire lives.

The problem is of global proportion. Almost every country, including Pakistan, is implicated in this shocking trade in human lives either as a place of recruitment, transit through to other countries, or the final destination for trafficked people.

The numbers are vast but unknown, as there are difficulties in identifying victims. In most cases the crime is kept hidden, and the definitions are not standard across cultures or law enforcement agencies. According to the United Nation's Global Initiative to Fight Human Trafficking (UN.GIFT), the estimated number is thought to exceed 27 million. However, this is a conservative figure, with the forced labour. The number seems overwhelming, but we agree with World Vision¹ that even one person being captured and sold is one person too many.

Magnitude of the problem can be gauged from the fact that around 161 countries are reported to be affected by human trafficking by being a source, transit and/or destination country. Human trafficking affects every continent and every type of economy.² The majority of trafficking victims³ are between 18 and 24 years of age.⁴ An estimated 1.2 million children are trafficked each year.⁵ 95% of victims experience physical or sexual violence during trafficking.⁶ 2.45 million people are estimated to be in conditions of forced labour as a result of trafficking.⁷ 43% of victims are used for forced commercial sexual exploitation, of which 98% are women and girls.⁸ 32% of victims are used for forced economic exploitation, of which 56% are women and girls.⁹

The United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC) estimates that human trafficking generates $7 billion every year, and is the third largest criminal activity in the world after the arms and drug trades. According to the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report, about 900,000 people are being trafficked across national borders annually. Around 225,000 people are trafficked annually from Bangladesh, India, Nepal, Pakistan, Sri Lanka and Afghanistan alone. Human trafficking exists because it is based on supply and demand. Using slaves means no labour costs, so manufacturers can undersell their competition. It also means the complete disregard and lack of respect for individual human beings. Research shows that victims are often recruited by a relative, a 'supposed' friend, or someone they trusted. Traffickers¹⁰ and victims often share the same nationality, and female traffickers are often used to recruit women.

Homelessness, economic downturn and social instability as a result of national disaster or war are also factors, with women and children always being the most desperate and vulnerable. Poverty, lack of access to education and employment, and domestic violence create a supply of 'surplus' children and vulnerable adults who can be easily manipulated and tricked by traffickers. Van Liempt reported that 'increased demands for cheap labour and sex, coupled with restrictions on legal migration possibilities, have clearly opened a niche for traffickers.'¹¹ The phenomenon of trafficking could not have grown to its current extent if market forces did not support such an industry.

Traffickers use a variety of methods to recruit their victims. They commonly target vulnerable individuals by placing advertisements for comparatively well-paid employment positions in destination countries. Once the individuals arrive, they find that they have been deceived about the nature or conditions of the work they have to do. Trafficking in human beings and their subsequent exploitation in varied forms by traffickers in human beings is one of the most despicable forms of violation of human rights. Trafficking in its widest sense includes not just exploitation of prostitution or other forms of sexual exploitation, it also includes forced labour or services, slavery or practices similar to slavery or trade in human beings for removal of organs. Trafficking clearly violates the fundamental right to a life with dignity. It also violates right to health and health care, right to liberty and security of person, right to freedom from torture, violence, cruelty or degrading treatment.

It violates for children who have been trafficked, or victims of child marriages their right to education, it violates the right to employment and the right of self determination.

Traffickers also have a number of ways of preventing their victims from escaping, among them debt bondage, threats and violence, detention, and withholding of personal legal documents such as passports and visas. They often threaten to hurt or kill a victim's children or family in their home country. Further, uncertainty about their migration status and fear of being detained or deported makes victims afraid to seek help.

According to the US State Department Trafficking In Persons Report (TIP)¹² in 2009, Pakistan is reflected as a source, transit and destination country for men, women and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labour and sexual exploitation. Pakistan's largest human trafficking problem is that of bonded labour which is concentrated in Sindh and Punjab provinces, particularly in brick kilns, carpet making, agriculture, fishing, mining, leather tanning and production of glass bangles, estimates of Pakistan victims of bonded labour, including men, women and children, vary widely but are likely over one million. Parents sell their daughters into domestic servitude, prostitution, or forced marriages, and women are traded between tribal groups to settle disputes or as payment for debts. Pakistani women and men migrate voluntarily to Gulf states,

Iran and Greece for low skilled work as domestic servants or in the construction industry as a result of fraudulent job offers made and high fees charged during recruitment, however, some find themselves in conditions of involuntary servitude or debt bondage once abroad, including restrictions on movement, non payment of wages, threats of physical or sexual abuse.

Last year, one of the shocking news about human trafficking came from Hazar Ganji, Quetta, Balochistan. A driver of a container, upon encounter with law-enforcing agencies, escaped leaving behind his vehicle that contained more than 100 people (trafficked people). Sixty dead bodies were recovered from the container and many were found faint. The container was reportedly being transported from Afghanistan to Iran via Pakistan. Eyewitnesses say, most of the deceased apparently belonged to Afghanistan. They said the driver of the container when opened the container's door found the people dead inside and some unconscious due to suffocation. The incident is a reflection of the problem.

Conceptualisation and Definitions

In its dictionary meaning, the concept of trafficking denotes a trade in something that should not be traded in. Thus, we have terms like drug trafficking, arms trafficking and human trafficking. It is appropriate to clarify the terms 'slavery' and 'human trafficking' at the first instance, because there is an inescapable overlap between the terms "slavery" and

"human trafficking,"¹³ although the technical definitions are a bit different. For purpose of this article the terms will be used interchangeably, because all trafficked people live in slavery-like conditions. The international Slavery Convention of 1927 signed by the League of Nations and carried on by the United Nations, defines that "Slavery is the status or condition of a person over whom any or all of the powers attaching to the right of ownership are exercised".

The concept of trafficking in people refers to the criminal practice of exploitation of human beings where they are treated as commodities for profit and after being trafficked, are subjected to long term exploitation.

For the purpose of this paper, the working definition of trafficking which as stated in the U.N. Protocol (2003)¹⁴ to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, especially women and children, supplementing the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organised Crime, 2000,¹⁵ to which Pakistan is a signatory is adopted. It defines trafficking in (article 3 (a)) as:

"..the recruitment, transportation, transfer, harbouring or receipt of persons by means of the threat or use of force or other forms of coercion, of abduction, of fraud, of deception, of the abuse of power or of a position of vulnerability or of the giving or receiving of payments or benefits to achieve the consent of a person having control over another person, for the purpose of exploitation. Exploitation shall include, at a minimum, the exploitation of the prostitution of others or other forms of sexual exploitation, forced labour or service, slavery or practices similar to slavery, servitude or the removal of organs."

The definition of trafficking consists of three core elements, the action of trafficking, the means and the purpose. If all the elements of human trafficking are present, the fact that an adult initially consented is irrelevant. It is also considered trafficking if the victim had no real or acceptable alternative but to submit to the abuse. If the victim is a child, it is considered trafficking even if there is no threat or use of force. Trafficking need not be across borders; it can occur within the borders of a single country.

In the light of the definition of these exploitative situations vulnerability refers to that section of a population, in a socio-economic context of severe deprivation, which is at risk because of its inability to cope with the pressure of life and living. It acceptable alternative but to submit to the abuse involved."¹⁶ The term "forced or compulsory labour shall mean all work or service which is exacted from any person under the menace of any penalty and for which the said person has not offered himself voluntarily."¹⁷

Besides this, it is also imperative to churn out key differences between the crimes of 'human trafficking' and 'human smuggling'. The Protocol Against the Smuggling of Migrants¹⁸ also helps to draw a distinction between trafficking and smuggling, although commentators have pointed out the continued difficulty of measuring trafficking given the range of actions and outcomes covered by the term. But usually smuggling occurs when someone is paid to assist another in the illegal crossing of borders. This relationship typically ends after the border has been crossed and the individual has paid the smuggler a fee for assistance. If the smuggler sells or 'brokers' the smuggled individual into a condition of servitude or if the smuggled individual cannot pay the smuggler and is then forced to work that debt off, the crime has now turned from smuggling into human trafficking. The key distinction between trafficking and smuggling lies in the individual's freedom of choice.

A person may choose and arrange to be smuggled into a country, but when a person is forced into a situation of exploitation they are then victims of human trafficking. Central to the distinction is the denial of the victim's liberty. Smuggling in the migration context is defined as "the facilitation of illegal border crossing, often (but not necessarily) for financial gain." Smuggling, in contrast with trafficking, "does not require an element of exploitation or violation of human rights."¹⁹ Both are however deemed illegal and connected with organised crime or other types of crime as well.

It is also important to establish what a human rights issue is and which a migration one is. Migration and human trafficking, though separate and distinct processes, are connected. It is also important to note that though the boundaries between volunteer/non-volunteer migrations are becoming blurred, migration per se is not a crime. The pressing need for work and life opportunities has turned migration into a common livelihood strategy, creating a fertile field for traffickers and unscrupulous 'employment agents'.

Criminalization of Trafficking in Pakistan.

In Pakistan, the constitution, a Supreme Court decision, and an act of Parliament all serve to outlaw bonded labor. The Constitution of 1973 lists a number of fundamental rights ostensibly guaranteed to all Pakistani citizens. The constitution states that all laws which are inconsistent with, or in derogation of, these fundamental rights are void. Slavery and forced labor are addressed in article 11 of the constitution:

- "(1) Slavery is nonexistent and forbidden and no law shall permit or facilitate its introduction into Pakistan in any form.
 (2) All forms of forced labour and traffic in human beings are prohibited."

One of the country's major problems is the smuggling of Pakistani children to Gulf countries for camel racing. Law enforcement agencies and the immigration department feel that increasingly high profits and lessening fear of harsh punishment have bolstered syndicates of human traffickers across Asia, the Middle East and Europe. The Zina Hudood Ordinance (1979) criminalises Zina (extra-marital sex, including adultery or fornication), Zina-bil-jabr (rape outside of a valid marriage), and selling, hiring, buying or disposal of any person for the purpose of prostitution (Section 13, 14). The punishment for these acts is life imprisonment. The Foreigners Act of 1949 and Foreigners Order of 1951 does not permit foreigners to enter Pakistan except from designated areas and in a specified manner. New laws relating to illegal immigrants (1996) lay down a jail term of up to 10 years for unauthorized entry into the country.

The Employment of Children Act lowered the minimum age for employment from 15 to 14 in mining, factories, shops and other commercial and industrial establishments. The Child Labour Act, 1991 allows children to be employed in 'hazardous' occupations if they are carried out with the help of family members or in a government-recognised formal school. The Prevention and control of Human Trafficking Ordinance, 2002 (hereinafter PACHTO) has been promulgated to deal with all types of human trafficking. It is a comprehensive legislation and the first of its kind in the South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation (SAARC) region. The PACHTO defines human trafficking to services, etc. This ordinance takes into consideration even mental injury of a person as an act of exploitation and provides for harsher sentences for serious violations. It also takes into consideration the organised nature of the crime and casts a vicarious liability on each member of the group by providing stringent punishment.

The ordinance also includes provisions for compensation to the victims. Under Pakistani law, the level of proof for 'Zina' (extra-marital sex) and 'Zina-bil-jabr' (rape outside of a valid marriage), which is liable to 'hadd', requires either a confession or at least four Muslim male witnesses. If this high evidentiary requirement cannot be satisfied, then the crime of Zina or Zina-jal-jabr is liable to tazir, which does not require four Muslim male witnesses. If unable to prove rape, the court takes the rape victim's statement as a confession of adultery, which results in the punishment of the rape victim. Under the Child Labour Act, 1991, children may be employed in hazardous places if the work is carried out with the help of female family members or any schools recognised by the government. This leaves ample scope for violations of the human rights of such children (Hadd and tazir are Islamic punishments).

Analysis of PACHTO

Pakistan's principled legislative response to trafficking in persons is PACHTO, which is a comprehensive legislation the first of its kind in the SAARC region, which mostly covers all possible forms of Human Trafficking into or out of Pakistan, especially women and children, with respect to the modes and objectives. One of the country's major problems is the smuggling of Pakistani children to Gulf countries for camel racing. Law enforcement agencies and the immigration department feel that increasingly high profits and lessening fear of harsh punishment have bolstered syndicates of human traffickers across Asia, the Middle East and Europe.

Under the PACHTO, trafficking is defined as kidnapping, abducting, using coercion, or giving or receiving any payment or benefit for a person's transport into or out of Pakistan, to buy, sell, recruit, detain, harbour, obtain, secure, or receive a person, with or without their consent. The law punishes planning or executing a plan of trafficking to attain any benefit for purposes of exploitative entertainment, among other things. Exploitative entertainment includes sexual practices or sex. Planning to commit a trafficking offence, but not doing so, is punishable with up to five years in prison and a fine; planning or executing a plan of trafficking into or out of Pakistan may be punished by up to seven years in prison and a fine; and if the trafficking offence includes kidnapping, abduction or attempting to kidnap or abduct, punishment may be up to 10 years in prison and a fine.

The PACHTO also prohibits buying, selling, harbouring, transporting, providing, detaining, or obtaining a child or woman by coercion, kidnapping, abduction or by giving or receiving any benefit for trafficking the child or woman into or out of Pakistan, for purposes of exploitative entertainment. Punishment may be up to 10 years' imprisonment and a fine or up to 14 years' imprisonment and a fine if kidnapping or abduction took place. The law further punishes: altering documents to facilitate an offence; preventing or restricting a person's liberty to move or travel; organized criminal activity in connection with trafficking, and repeated violations. This statute also provides some assistance to child victims, such as medical care and shelter.

However, the legislation suffers from certain limitations. There is no specific attention to child trafficking as distinct from others. The role of NGOs has neither been identified nor assigned. Legislation is focused on trans-border trafficking and not on domestic/internal trafficking. Its jurisdiction is only extended to Federal Investigating Agency (FIA).

The Pakistan Penal Code (PPC) criminalizes kidnapping, abduction, or inducing a woman to compel her to marriage; to procure a minor girl under 18 (Sec 359-366); or to import a girl under the age of 21 from abroad with the intent that she may be or knowing that it be likely that she will be, forced or seduced to illicit intercourse with another person (Section 366) with a punishment of up to 10 years imprisonment. But this law doesn't cover boys, thus leaving them unprotected.

Kidnapping a child under 10 years is punishable with death under the Penal Code. Section 370 criminalizes buying or disposing of any person as slaves or dealing in slaves, selling minor for purposes of prostitution, etc. (Sec. 372), buying minor for purposes of prostitution, etc. (Sec. 373), unlawful compulsory labour (Sec. 374). What is unfortunate is that the legal framework is in place, but it is not implemented in letter and spirit.

The Constitution of Pakistan provides for security, safeguards to arrest and detention, and prohibits slavery and forced labour as fundamental rights. Despite these legal provisions, most trafficking cases are tried under the Passport Act, which imposes very low fines. There is lack of harmony between the PACHTO and PPC provisions. For instance, the offences of PACHTO does not establish any correlation with the relevant provisions of the PPC, but authorizes the First Class Magistrate to pass sentences only up to three years, PACHTO empowers them to pass higher sentences. So whilst trying these cases the First Class Magistrate will never pass a sentence that is more than three years.²¹

Pakistan's Response to the Problem

Pakistan has responded to the challenge of human trafficking by envisaging a strategy of prosecution, protection and prevention. The government formed a National Inter-ministerial Committee on Human Trafficking headed by the Minister for Interior, for policy making. It has also constituted an Inter-Ministerial Committee on Human Trafficking, Smuggling and Illegal Immigration headed by Secretary Interior to oversee implementation of the PACHTO. In 2005 a National Plan of Action (NPA) to combat human trafficking was drawn up by the government of Pakistan. Besides combating trafficking, rescue and rehabilitation of victims of trafficking are also given priority under NPA. Under the NPA, legal and law-enforcement systems are activated to strengthen the implementation of the PACHTO. The Federal Investigation Agency (FIA) is designated as the lead organization in combating the human trafficking problem in Pakistan.

It has setup an Anti-Trafficking Unit (ATU) within the Federal Investigation Agency (FIA) for country wide operations. Besides this an Inter-agency Task Force (IATF) consisting of all the Law Enforcement Agencies has been operationalized which includes FIA, Frontier Corps (FC) Balochistan, Balochistan Levies, Coast Guards, Maritime Security Agency, and Police, with the task to intercept people being trafficked and to apprehend human traffickers at points of origin. Anti trafficking units have also been established in the provincial police departments. The government launched the National Plan of Action in 2005.

It established the National Database and Registration Authority (NADRA) for helping authorities in detecting document frauds, established the National Alien Registration Authority (NARA), introduced Personal Identification Secure Comparison and Evaluation System (PISCES) put in place at nine ports to prevent document forgeries and frauds, introduced computerized National Identity Card (NIC) and Machine Readable Passports (MRP) and created a database of people coming in and out of the country. The above mentioned steps brought the following results (Table I):

| Inter-Agency Task Force (Iatf) Interceptions | | | |
|--|------|-------|------|
| Interceptions by | 2006 | 2007 | 2008 |
| FIA | 717 | 4534 | 5041 |
| Frontier Corps | 1896 | 4533 | 936 |
| Coast Guards | 974 | 1560 | 1665 |
| Balochistan Levies/Police | 38 | 21 | 53 |
| Security Agency | 10 | 55 | 14 |
| Total | 3635 | 10703 | 7709 |

Source: Federal Investigation Agency (FIA), Ministry of Interior, Islamabad, Pakistan

Table I shows that interceptions by the inter agency task force marked an improvement from 56 interceptions in 2005 to 10,703 in 2007, to 7,709 in 2008, and to 5,742 till November 2009 (majority Afghan nationals). The arrests of human traffickers rose from 300 in 2005 to 1526 in 2008 and 1560 till Nov 2009. The Advisor to the Prime Minister on Interior informed the Senate that "a total of 313,153 Pakistani nationals were deported by various countries from January 1999 to October 2008 (BBC 2009). This comes to an average of 31,846 deportees per annum or 2,654 deportees per month. The overwhelming majority of these deportees were said to be illegal migrants entering another country illegally or staying there without due authorisation."²² Out of these deportees' 57% belonged to the Punjab and 31% to Khyber Pukhtoonkhwa (KPK).

Conclusion

'The Government of Pakistan does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. Despite these significant overall efforts, including the prosecution of some trafficking offences and the launch of public awareness programming, the government did not show evidence of progress in addressing the serious issues of bonded labour, forced child labour, and the trafficking of migrant workers by fraudulent labour recruiters; therefore, Pakistan is placed on Tier 2 Watch List. Convictions of trafficking offenders decreased during the reporting period. The government continued to punish victims of sex trafficking and did not provide protection services for victims of forced labour, including bonded labour.

'²³ Pakistan was previously placed at Tier 2, a rating which means Pakistan is doing enough to combat the human trafficking problem, but its relegation to Tier 2 Watch list is attributable for not doing enough or not complying with the minimum benchmarks.

The essential attributes of trafficking, which presuppose the very existence of vulnerable situations of inequality and injustice, coupled with the exploitation of these vulnerable circumstances by the traffickers and others, causing untold harm to the trafficked victim with a multiplicity of rights violations, provide a status of uniqueness to trafficking. Therefore, policies, programmes and strategies that address prevention of trafficking have to be unique, with focus and orientation to all these issues. Accordingly, prevention of trafficking needs to be addressed not only in relation to the source areas, but also the demand areas, the transit points and the trafficking routes. The best method of preventing trafficking is by integrating it with prosecution and protection.

Prosecution includes several tasks like the identification of the traffickers, bringing them to book, confiscating the illegal assets created out of trafficking, making the traffickers compensate for the damages and ensuring that they do not cause any further harm. Protection to the trafficked victim includes all steps in the redressal of the grievances and violations, which may be tangible or intangible, that would help the victim to survive, rehabilitate and establish herself/himself. Thus, prosecution and protection contribute to prevention. However, considering the fact that prosecution and protection are the issues that come up only after trafficking has taken place, prevention of trafficking remains the bottom line. Prevention strategies for the source areas can be identified only after understanding the vulnerability situations.

Recommendations

In order to address the issue of human trafficking in all its aspects, we recommend that:

- . Ambiguities regarding different laws like PPC, PACHTO etc addressing the issue shall be clarified;
- . FIA alone can not prevent this crime so police should also be nominated in Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance 2002;
- . Strengthening and enhancing the capacity of the police officials on the issue to properly investigate and book cases under Pakistan Penal Code (PPC) relevant sections;
- . In the Emigration Ordinance, 1979 there is a provision of Special Court for the trial of the offences thereunder. It would be in the fitness of things if the offences under the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance 2002 are also made triable by these courts;
- . Strict implementation of present set of laws dealing with illegal migration and a,emd,emt to PACHTO to address internal trafficking;
- . Awareness raising and community involvement at the grass roots level;
- . Establishment of rehabilitation centres for victims of trafficking;
- . Effective measures to curb bonded labour to improve Pakistan's ranking in TIPreport;
- . Proper and transparent nikah (marriage) and birth registration;

Pakistan has ratified most of the core international human rights instruments which impose international obligations of state responsibility to respect, protect and fulfil. Human rights law and its enforcement mechanisms are critically important when it comes to ensuring that national responses to trafficking do not violate established rights or circumvent the obligations that states owe to all persons. Ultimately, however, trafficking and its associated harms are multi-dimensional problems that do not, in the end, belong to one discipline or one branch of law. Combating contemporary exploitation may not be possible but any serious attempt will require a full arsenal of modern, smart weapons, not just one precious but blunted sword.

 - . 12.3 million victims of forced labour are estimated in the world today, of whom some 2.45 million are trafficked according to ILO. Of these, most are trafficked into forced labour for commercial sexual exploitation, while one third are trafficked for other economic exploitation. Over half of the persons subject to forced economic exploitation, and almost all those subject to forced commercial sexual exploitation, are women.
 - . 700,000 to two million are trafficked across international borders annually, an estimate advanced by the United Nations Population Fund.
 - . The US Department of State has estimated 600,000 to 800,000 men, women, and children trafficked across international borders each year, approximately 80 percent are women and girls.

20. The Hudood Ordinances, implemented in 1980 during the regime of Zia ul-Haq, prescribe punishments for adultery and rape. Most importantly, the ordinances implemented evidentiary requirements that make it difficult for perpetrators to be convicted for rape. In order to convict a man of rape, four male Muslim witnesses must testify against the defendant. Judges also require physical evidence of rape, such as torn clothes, bruises, and cuts, in order to prove that the woman resisted advances. If the woman is thought to have accepted the forced intercourse passively, she can be charged and convicted for adultery. In numerous such cases women are convicted of consenting to an act of adultery due to their "loose" character or for offering no resistance. These laws account for much of the increase in the women's prison population since the early 1980s and are one of the major reasons women are jailed or detained and their complaints of police misconduct go unanswered.

Oakland sues to close three hotels, claiming prostitution occurs on their property

BYLINE: By Sean Maher Oakland Tribune

SECTION: BREAKING; My Town; Alameda; News; Local

LENGTH: 793 words

OAKLAND -- A significant problem with human trafficking has led the city to sue three hotels police say are hot spots for prostitution, City Attorney John Russo said Wednesday.

The public nuisance suits, filed Tuesday, will ask the court to close each hotel for a year and fine each one $25,000, though Russo said he'd prefer to have the hotel operators solve the problem by doing a better job keeping prostitution off the premises.

Of the three, according to the lawsuits, the human trafficking issue is worst at the Economy Inn at 122 E. 12th St., near the southern shore of Lake Merritt. The suit Russo filed cites numerous recent arrests there for rape and kidnapping, often with underage girls as the victims and often related to prostitution, according to police.

Several men working at the hotel Wednesday declined to give their names or comment. Refusing to give his name, one man said, "We have no knowledge of what's going on."

The other hotels -- the Sage Motel at 4844 MacArthur Blvd., near Mills College, and the National Lodge at 1711 International Blvd. at the corner of 17th Avenue -- have not had the same problem with violence or kidnapping, according to the court documents, but have seen multiple recent arrests for prostitution, including incidents with underage girls, the lawsuits claim.

"These hotels operate as houses of prostitution more or less openly," Russo said. "Not even the most basic steps are taken to prevent it, and if you look at each one, it's almost as if they've been designed to be no-tell motels."

The hotel operators have not necessarily committed a crime, Russo said, but are culpable for facilitating the crimes that occur on their property. Neither Russo, police spokesperson Officer Holly Joshi nor Alameda County District Attorney Nancy O'Malley, who collaborated in the suits, said they could remember the owners encountering serious legal trouble before now.

"Oakland has unfortunately gotten a lot of attention as a place where trafficking is a big problem," O'Malley said, calling on local businesses to either join the struggle against trafficking or face the scrutiny of the law if they facilitate the problem.

A relief manager at the Sage Motel declined to comment, but a manager at the National Lodge said he's struggled to combat the misuse of his hotel without much success, and his requests for help haven't gone anywhere.

"I say no to 10 to 15 people every day because I'm scared they're using the room for that," said John Patel, who said his father owns the National Lodge. The hotel is equipped with multiple security cameras and several signs warning away solicitors, and Patel said he scans the ID or drivers license of everyone who rents a room, to little avail.

"A lot of prostitutes are not the ones who rent the room," Patel said. "A man rents the room and in the morning the girl drops off the key. I say, 'I didn't rent that room to you,' and she says, 'I stayed with the man.'"

Further, Patel said, when he calls 911, "they say it's not a big problem," and police either don't respond at all or are slow to arrive.

Joshi, who worked for years in the department's human trafficking task force, said calls reporting prostitution are second-tier priority, coming after more urgent crimes like robbery, assault, or a break-in in which the victim is at home.

However, if a caller reports that a minor may be involved in the prostitution, that bumps the priority of the call to the upper tier, Joshi added.

The problem certainly isn't limited to the three named hotels, officials agreed, as prostitution is a huge problem all along "The Track," which runs along International Boulevard from 1st Avenue to the San Leandro border. The stretches with the worst child prostitution problem run roughly from 1st to 18th avenues and from High Street to about 54th Avenue.

Russo said the three hotels have been targeted specifically simply because they are the ones where the evidence is strong enough for a win in court.

Patel said he's exasperated by the problem and feels unfairly targeted by police. He also said he doesn't know what else to do.

Joshi and Russo both said the hotel operators can do a number of simple things to tackle the problem, including requiring official ID from guests and installing gates to close off the hotel parking lots to the public. All three hotels already require ID, and parking lots in all three are open and accessible from the street. However, Russo said, "There's not a check list of items that will get these guys off the hook. We're interested in results, not input."

No court date has been scheduled in any of the suits, but Russo will be considering asking for temporary restraining orders to be issued quickly, a spokesman said.

Nigeria; Child Witchcraft - Stakeholders Forum Convened

BYLINE: Vanguard (Lagos)LENGTH: 824 words

Following widespread reports of child abuse over allegations of witchcraft across the country, stakeholders yesterday converged on Abuja to fashion out ways of stemming the negative trend.

National Agency for the Prohibition of Traffic in Persons and Other related Matters, NAPTIP, which convened the forum, said it was not only determined to put an end to the uncanny phenomenon but also to provide succor to the victims.

Only two weeks ago, Vanguard reported the acid bath of Comfort Sunday, a JSS 2 student of Government Secondary School, Akwanga, Nasarawa State, by her own father for allegedly causing socio-economic backwardness in the family through witchcraft.

NAPTIP, which yesterday expressed worry over the growing incidence of stigmatization of children tagged witches in Nasarawa, Kaduna and Akwa Ibom states, warned that it would not hesitate to prosecute any parent found to have in any way abused or victimized his child over such unfounded allegation.

According to the Executive Secretary of NAPTIP, Simon C. Egede, "the agency has been greatly worried about this growing incidence of stigmatization of children as witches, especially in Nasarawa, Kaduna and Akwa Ibom states. When we visited the three states, we saw some of these children, some have been brutalized, some of them have been disowned by their parents, some of them are sleeping on the streets, exposed to all kinds of environmental hazards and different street dangers.

The Child Rights Act

"The Child Rights Act prohibits this kind of treatment to children. As for the father who poured acid on the daughter and totally incapacitated her face, the police are on the case and we will ensure that he is prosecuted accordingly.

"Even though we are championing the criminal aspect of putting an end to the trend, we are, however, more concerned about prevention of more of such acts. This is what informed our decision to go to these three badly affected states to hold series of meetings, consultations and enlightenment campaigns with all the relevant stakeholders.

Tasks traditional rulers and religious leaders

"We specifically tasked both traditional rulers and religious leaders to help in sensitizing their members on the need to desist from such inhuman acts of barbarism against innocent children who are nothing but sweet gifts from God. If they are leaders of tomorrow, victimizing them in such manner is tantamount to jeopardizing the future of this nation.

"We are having serious discussions with the government officials in these states on the need to cur this child witchcraft stigmatization."

With the support of UNODC, governments of Finland, Switzerland and the United Kingdom, we are going to put an end to it."

On the issue of human trafficking in Nigeria, the NAPTIP boss further maintained that, "There is no doubt that many Nigerian girls have been illegally smuggled out of this country to abroad for prostitution, we have intensified our efforts in this area especially as it concerns Italy, we are using this medium to urge the National Assembly to make haste and pass the NAPTIP bill into law as this will further strengthen our efforts towards abating this situation which has continued to bring disrepute to the good image of this great country.

"We are in discussions with the German police, with the Netherlands police and with the Swedish police in furtherance of our efforts to work together to share experiences, intelligence and to cooperate in the area of investigation of not just the issue of human trafficking but on other organized crimes associated with it.

"In view of this, we have entered an MOU with the Italian mafia police intelligentsia, as well as partnering with SMEDAN to sensitize mothers against giving out their children in ways that could best be described as modern day slavery.

"As an agency, I want to state that NAPTIP will never be tired of identifying measures, developing programmes, initiating actions and executing them to combat TIP.

We are resilient and determined to collectively constitute a strong barricade to human trafficking in Nigeria and beyond

"As part of the Agency's efforts to build capacity of officers for optimal performance, NAPTIP, with the support from the UNODC under the project NGA/S84: capacity building for implementation of the national action plan against human trafficking, carried out the training of 40 NAPTIP officers on 'modern techniques in public information dissemination. In the same vein, another batch of 50 officers were trained on 'stress and trauma management for victims of human trafficking.

"It is not surprising therefore that the US department of state, in its 2010 Annual TIP report, decided to sustain Nigeria in the Tier 1 status in global rating on TIP which translates to full compliance with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking.

"We must however remember that it is not yet uhuru until the battle is finally and decisively won", he added.

S'pore, Viet police in contact over vice case; Only two confirmed trafficking cases last year, says MHA

BYLINE: Teh Joo LinLENGTH: 514 words

THE police have contacted their Vietnamese counterparts about the case involving four members of a trafficking ring who were jailed in Vietnam this week for selling 10 women to a brothel here.

A Home Affairs Ministry (MHA) spokesman told The Straits Times that the police have always been working closely with their counterparts in the region to combat transnational crime, including suspected cases of human trafficking.

Of the 32 cases of human trafficking reported last year, only two were confirmed as trafficking cases and prosecuted, the spokesman pointed out.

In the other cases, prosecution did not take place as the women 'knew they were coming to Singapore for the purposes of prostitution and were not coerced or forced'.

In some instances, the police could not pursue the case due to a lack of substantiating evidence, for example, when the alleged victims could not be located.

In the latest case, a court in southern Vietnam's Tay Ninh province heard that a pair of 19-year-old Vietnamese twin sisters tricked into becoming prostitutes in Singapore started luring others into vice.

The women were tricked with promises of jobs in restaurants, only to be sold for US $50 (S $66) each.

The Vietnamese court sentenced the sisters and two others, including the 46-year-old ringleader, to jail terms ranging from three to eight years.

The MHA spokesman said that when sex trafficking cases are reported or prostitutes arrested, police will interview the women to see if they were brought here against their will or tricked into coming.

'The police are mindful that a woman in the vice trade may have been trafficked...any allegations of trafficking in persons made during such interviews will be investigated,' said the spokesman.

In cases with 'clear evidence' of trafficking, the women will not be prosecuted, but will serve as prosecution witnesses. They will also be protected from further harm and given safe passage home when the case is concluded.

Last year, police received 32 reported cases involving 40 possible victims, but only two were confirmed as trafficking cases. They involved seven victims, including a girl below 18. The perpetrators were successfully prosecuted in court.

Last year, the police conducted more than 2,600 vice raids and made 7,614 arrests of foreign women suspected of involvement in vice-related activities - up from 5,047 arrests in 2008.

Sixty-three people were arrested last year on suspicion of pimping or abetting prostitution, said the MHA spokesman.

Earlier this year, the United States State Department, in its annual Trafficking in Persons Report, accused Singapore of not doing enough to curb sex and labour trafficking. It also placed the Republic on a human trafficking watchlist for the first time, alongside countries such as Bangladesh, China and India.

But the Ministry of Foreign Affairs issued a stern rebuttal, calling the report 'puzzling' because the US had not satisfactorily explained how it had arrived at its conclusions. It also stressed that the Singapore Government is committed to tackling the trafficking issue.

Child Witchcraft - Stakeholders Forum Convened

BYLINE: Ikechukwu NnochiriLENGTH: 820 wordsDATELINE: Abuja

Following widespread reports of child abuse over allegations of witchcraft across the country, stakeholders yesterday converged on Abuja to fashion out ways of stemming the negative trend.

National Agency for the Prohibition of Traffic in Persons and Other related Matters, NAPTIP, which convened the forum, said it was not only determined to put an end to the uncanny phenomenon but also to provide succor to the victims.

Only two weeks ago, Vanguard reported the acid bath of Comfort Sunday, a JSS 2 student of Government Secondary School, Akwanga, Nasarawa State, by her own father for allegedly causing socio-economic backwardness in the family through witchcraft.

NAPTIP, which yesterday expressed worry over the growing incidence of stigmatization of children tagged witches in Nasarawa, Kaduna and Akwa Ibom states, warned that it would not hesitate to prosecute any parent found to have in any way abused or victimized his child over such unfounded allegation.

According to the Executive Secretary of NAPTIP, Simon C. Egede, "the agency has been greatly worried about this growing incidence of stigmatization of children as witches, especially in Nasarawa, Kaduna and Akwa Ibom states. When we visited the three states, we saw some of these children, some have been brutalized, some of them have been disowned by their parents, some of them are sleeping on the streets, exposed to all kinds of environmental hazards and different street dangers.

"The Child Rights Act prohibits this kind of treatment to children. As for the father who poured acid on the daughter and totally incapacitated her face, the police are on the case and we will ensure that he is prosecuted accordingly.

"Even though we are championing the criminal aspect of putting an end to the trend, we are, however, more concerned about prevention of more of such acts. This is what informed our decision to go to these three badly affected states to hold series of meetings, consultations and enlightenment campaigns with all the relevant stakeholders.

Tasks traditional rulers and religious leaders

"We specifically tasked both traditional rulers and religious leaders to help in sensitizing their members on the need to desist from such inhuman acts of barbarism against innocent children who are nothing but sweet gifts from God. If they are leaders of tomorrow, victimizing them in such manner is tantamount to jeopardizing the future of this nation.

"We are having serious discussions with the government officials in these states on the need to cur this child witchcraft stigmatization."

With the support of UNODC, governments of Finland, Switzerland and the United Kingdom, we are going to put an end to it."

On the issue of human trafficking in Nigeria, the NAPTIP boss further maintained that, "There is no doubt that many Nigerian girls have been illegally smuggled out of this country to abroad for prostitution, we have intensified our efforts in this area especially as it concerns Italy, we are using this medium to urge the National Assembly to make haste and pass the NAPTIP bill into law as this will further strengthen our efforts towards abating this situation which has continued to bring disrepute to the good image of this great country.

"We are in discussions with the German police, with the Netherlands police and with the Swedish police in furtherance of our efforts to work together to share experiences, intelligence and to cooperate in the area of investigation of not just the issue of human trafficking but on other organized crimes associated with it.

"In view of this, we have entered an MOU with the Italian mafia police intelligentsia, as well as partnering with SMEDAN to sensitize mothers against giving out their children in ways that could best be described as modern day slavery.

"As an agency, I want to state that NAPTIP will never be tired of identifying measures, developing programmes, initiating actions and executing them to combat TIP.

We are resilient and determined to collectively constitute a strong barricade to human trafficking in Nigeria and beyond

"As part of the Agency's efforts to build capacity of officers for optimal performance, NAPTIP, with the support from the UNODC under the project NGA/S84: capacity building for implementation of the national action plan against human trafficking, carried out the training of 40 NAPTIP officers on 'modern techniques in public information dissemination. In the same vein, another batch of 50 officers were trained on 'stress and trauma management for victims of human trafficking.

"It is not surprising therefore that the US department of state, in its 2010 Annual TIP report, decided to sustain Nigeria in the Tier 1 status in global rating on TIP which translates to full compliance with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking.

"We must however remember that it is not yet uhuru until the battle is finally and decisively won", he added.

Cambodia marks anti-human trafficking day

SECTION: WORLD NEWS; Science & TechnologyLENGTH: 269 wordsDATELINE: PHNOM PENH Dec. 9

Cambodia marked the national anti-human trafficking day on Thursday, calling for more serious punishment on perpetrators of human trafficking and sexual exploitation.

"Rapists and human traffickers should not be punished for only five to ten years in prison," said Bun Rany Hun Sen, president of Cambodian Red Cross and honorary president of the National Committee for the Uplifting of Women's Value of Social Morals and Happiness in the Family, during the celebration on Thursday.

"They should be punished more serious than this jailed term because it is an extremely hatred act," she said.

She said that the U.S.'s 2010 trafficking in persons report ranked Cambodia move to better rank in the Second Tier of the Three Tier.

"It showed our strong efforts and commitment to combat against human trafficking and sexual exploitation," said Bun Rany Hun Sen. "Cambodia is committed to obtain the First Tier of the U.S. report by 2015."

Ing Kanthaphavi, minister of women's affairs, said Thursday offenders in human trafficking and sexual exploitation should be severely punished and victims shall be well protected.

She added that in the first half of 2010, under the anti-human trafficking and sexual exploitation law, 61 cases with 252 suspects have been sent to courts for punishment.

Some 259 victims and vulnerable people, of whom 117 were children, have been repatriated to Cambodia, she added.

The event was attended by 6,000 participants who are government officials, ambassadors, local and international non-governmental organizations, and the public.

States News Service

December 6, 2010 MondayTRAFFICKING FIGHT LACKS POLITICAL WILL*BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 794 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, DC

The following information was released by Radio Free Asia:

Vietnam cracks down on human trafficking but critics say the government's efforts are insufficient.

RFA

Vietnam has stepped up a campaign against human trafficking, with nearly 5,000 mostly women victims identified over the last six years, but experts say political will is still lacking in the fight against the illicit trade.

Authorities said nearly 1,200 people were discovered to have been smuggled from the Southeast Asian state in "recent" months, mostly to China.

The problem remain serious despite agreements signed between Vietnam and China and other countries to combat it, according to non-governmental groups.

Christina Arnold, founder of Prevent Human Trafficking, a US non-governmental organization, said the Vietnamese government had not made enough efforts to complement actions by local social groups tackling the crisis.

"I think, in some cases, there is a lack of political motivation from the government, but the Vietnam Women's Union, indeed, has worked very well. They build shelters and develop impressive training programs," she said.

The Vietnam Women's Union is actively involved in highlighting problems of girls being trafficked from Vietnam's southern delta and highland provinces into China for prostitution, domestic work, or marriage.

Arnold felt the Vietnamese authorities should adopt a "systematic way" of implementing anti-trafficking policies.

"As far as I know, the Vietnamese people do a very good job while the government doesn't do much."

Major General Do Kim Tuyen, who is deputy head of the Department for Crime Prevention, stressed on the government steps that had been taken so far, saying the results had been encouraging.

"Implementation of our methods for fighting and preventing human trafficking has obtained positive results," he was quoted saying by the An Ninh Thu Do newspaper recently.

Action Plan

According to the government's Action Plan to Combat Trafficking in Women, some 4,793 trafficking victims were identified from 2004 to 2010.

During the period, only 12 of Vietnam's 63 provinces had strategies linked to the national action plan, evidence that action against trafficking had not been given adequate attention by provincial leaders.

From 1998 to 2007, some 6,680 trafficking victims were reported.

Vietnam is primarily a source country for human trafficking, for both sexual and labor exploitation, in countries including China, Cambodia, Thailand, Malaysia, Taiwan, South Korea, the United Kingdom, and the Czech Republic.

According to local reports, 60 percent of the smuggled victims end up in neighboring China, with Cambodia accounting for 10 percent and Laos about six percent.

Watch List

In the U.S. State Department's 2010 Trafficking in Persons report, which ranks countries worldwide, Vietnam was listed as a Tier 2 Watch List Country, a rank worse than its Tier 2 (non-Watch List) status in 2009.

A key reason for the downgrade is lack of efforts to fight labor exploitation.

"While trying to focus on prevention of the trading of women and children to become prostitutes, Vietnam has relatively ignored the fact that there are many men and women workers sent to work abroad who have been solicited for their labor," Luis CdeBaca, Ambassador-at-large in the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons said.

The Vietnamese government criticized the report, saying it was not objective.

Vietnam's Ministry of Foreign Affairs' spokeswoman said, "Vietnam considers human trafficking a crime, especially the trafficking of women and children, which are dangerous crimes.

"The crimes seriously damage their human rights and adversely affect the development of society. Therefore, Vietnam strongly acknowledges the special importance of prevention of human trafficking, and is determined to fight and seriously (address) these types of crimes. We also have policies and measures to repel and eliminate human trafficking."

NGO work

NGO's in Vietnam have led the way in combating human trafficking.

They sponsor educational campaigns on HIV/AIDS prevention, help improve activists' skills in helping victims and establish cooperation networks with each other and the government. However, they do not receive much support from local governments.

On Prevent Human Trafficking's experience in Vietnam, Arnold said, "We have never received any subsidies from the government. They are not open to working with us."

Vietnam is considering tightening human trafficking laws but critics say the effort lacks clarity and does not protect or support victims.

The National Assembly of Vietnam recently held a debate on a draft law to prevent and fight trafficking.

Battling sea-mediated human trafficking

LENGTH: 1090 words

In Malaysia, open borders were the norm during late 19th and early 20th century leading to an influx of ethnic Indians and Chinese, but that has changed significantly in post-colonial Malaysia. The government's choice however, cannot be between closing the doors to a foreign labor force and completely doing away with border controls.

The first option will deprive the labor-intensive and labor-dependent economic sectors of workers and given the reality of non-traditional security threats the second option of opening up the borders will be tantamount to inviting transnational criminals to operate with impunity.

Border control is an element of national sovereignty and when we lose control of significant parts of this through ineffective controls, transnational human trafficking syndicates will exploit the situation to engage in the lucrative illicit trade in human flesh.

Trafficking in persons is estimated to generate $32 billion yearly, perpetuated mainly by the fact the risk to reward ratio is almost nil aided by natural forces of migration as well as poor socio-political and economic conditions in the country of origin and the relatively prosperous neighboring countries. Corrupt law enforcement officials worsen the situation.

The seas, as an inexpensive mode of transport, have always been a popular medium for transnational movement of people since pre-colonial times especially through the Straits of Malacca, the Sulu-Sulawesi Sea and the South China Sea. However, the long, porous and less monitored coastlines of Malaysia has led to easy and inconspicuous access for a thriving trade in modern day slavery by human trafficking groups.

Malaysia is a littoral state with 4,675km-long coastline and the growing illegal cross-border trafficking of humans in recent years has made the government anxious especially in view of rapid economic globalization, worldwide economic crisis and increasing maritime trade and the nation's dependency on it.

There are fears that extremists could use trans-border criminals to seep through the borders as evidence have emerged that extremists groups also engage in trafficking to fund their activities.

Analyzing the trafficking problem is complicated by the difficulty of differentiating it with human smuggling. The latter relates to voluntary movements of people through illegal channels by engaging the services of smuggling syndicates; trafficking is involuntary involving significant deception, coercion and control of movement of victims.

The issue becomes even more complex when smuggled migrants are forced to work in debt bondage to pay off the smugglers which effectively defines them as trafficked individuals.

The Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act (ATIP) was enacted in 2007 prompted by Malaysia's blacklisting in Tier 3 in the 2007 and 2009 Annual U.S. State Department Trafficking in Persons Report. To date 168 have been prosecuted and only 16 convicted; 1,200 victims have been rescued since 2008.

However, the government's recent amendment to the ATIP to include smuggling of people will only hamper efforts at tackling trafficking effectively. Front-line law enforcement officials may treat trafficking victims as undocumented migrants aggravated by the illicit nature and quality of the crime.

Selective restrictions in border control have led to the expansion of the fake document industry abetted by corrupt border officials. The trafficking prone areas or hotspots include the Straits of Malacca, the Sabah-Kalimantan-Philippines borders as well as the Singapore-Johor boundary and increasingly the South China Sea. Victims are mostly Indonesians, Filipinos, Cambodians, and Vietnamese with an increasing exodus from post-conflict states such as Iraq, Sri Lanka and Afghanistan.

Tackling the trafficking threat in Malaysia is not easy. Though coordination and collaboration of national, regional and international bodies are essential in practice, it is a complex task. Vast ocean spaces and long stretches of less governed coastlines in the Southeast Asian archipelago produce porous borders complicating monitoring and security surveillance.

As for law enforcement agencies, poor communication, duplication of efforts and conflicting mandates should not get in the way of effectual and immediate responses. Existence of deep-seated rivalries between competing government agencies, particularly when budgets and funding are at stake, should be minimized by having clear-cut boundaries related to jurisdiction. In addition, there have been allegations that law enforcement officials have been involved in facilitating trafficking by accepting bribes from traffickers.

However, all is not lost. A multi-sector approach is the key toward an effective resolution. Outmaneuvering trafficking syndicates must involve strengthening border controls through greater law enforcement policy involving aggressive maritime security surveillance and augmented patrols.

This must be accompanied by effectual anti-trafficking strategies such as victim identification and protection. Bringing ATIP back in line with U.N. definition of human trafficking is crucial. The victims should also be given temporary work permits to enlist their cooperation for the prosecution of offenders.

Effective transnational and regional collaboration should not be hampered by cultural and linguistic differences and different laws, understandings and policies related to trafficking. These issues must be addressed at the ASEAN level as well as through transnational collaboration such as the Bali Process and the Five Power Defense Arrangements.

Reforming our immigration policy is crucial to curb this undocumented migration in addition to greater Malaysia economic investment to generate employment in source countries. Traffickers target those who are already planning to migrate but due to strict immigration laws they fall victim to trafficking groups to facilitate their entry.

Thus, a regularization policy will make it easier for legal entry of unskilled labor into Malaysia to meet their economic needs. This will also satisfy demand for cheap labor in economic sectors which locals do not find lucrative. The government is losing out millions to trafficking syndicates and a better migration management will ensure revenue from the foreign workers who will cease to find the need to engage trafficking intermediaries.

Human trafficking phenomenon is governable when measures related to border security, migration and socio-economic and political factors are treated with utmost urgency and swift action.

US envoy praises Taiwan's efforts to combat human-trafficking

LENGTH: 536 words

Text of report in English by Taiwanese Central News Agency website

[By Chris Wang]

Taipei, Nov. 22 (CNA) - A visiting anti-trafficking envoy of the United States on Monday lauded Taiwan's efforts in combating modern slavery and called for intensified prosecutions of traffickers in the future.

Taiwan's achievement could be seen in its being the only Asian country to move into Tier 1 - the highest rank - in the US

Department of State's 2010 Trafficking in Persons report, said Luis CdeBaca, ambassador-at-large of the US Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, at a press roundtable.

The ambassador, in Taiwan for a five-day visit, met Premier Wu Den-yih Monday morning before attending the press briefing organized by the American Institute in Taiwan (AIT), the US representative office in Taiwan in the absence of official diplomatic ties.

He said the authorities of Taiwan, a destination, source and transit territory for men, women and children subjected to forced prostitution and forced labour, have fully complied with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking.

The most unique part in Taiwan's efforts is its victim protection approach over the past few years, most notably providing victims with work permits and allowing them to earn income while waiting to testify in cases against their traffickers or to be deported, CdeBaca said.

In some Asian countries, most victims were "locked up" in shelters or detention centres.

"That makes Taiwan stand very tall in the region as far as its compassion and pragmatic treatment (of trafficking victims), " he said.

He also praised Taiwan for training law enforcement and labour officials on victim identification and protection and working with nongovernmental organizations (NGOs).

He called on Taiwanese officials, however, to "continue to intensify their prosecution efforts" and to extend labour protection to all categories of workers. He also cited victim identification as a challenge in Taiwan.

Asked if Taiwan's lack of official diplomatic ties with source countries, including Indonesia, Thailand, Vietnam and the Philippines, could hamper its efforts, CdeBaca said that in bilateral agreements between those countries and destination countries, some labour protection provisions were built in to ensure foreign workers' rights, such as guaranteeing a minimum wage and a day off per week.

The ambassador did not believe, however, that the lack of diplomatic ties made Taiwan a favoured country for traffickers, citing instead Taiwan's "vibrant economy and vibrant opportunities." With regards to the possible impact of decriminalizing prostitution on human trafficking, he said the legalization of indoor prostitution in the US did "create a zone of impunity in which traffickers can operate and law enforcement cannot go, " and some of the concerns could also apply in Taiwan.

After being ranked as a Tier 2 country from 2007-2009 in the annual Trafficking in Persons report, Taiwan regained Tier 1 status this year, which it enjoyed from 2001-2004.

Taiwan was rated Tier 2 in 2005 and was put on the Tier 2-Watch List in 2006, its lowest rank in the past decade.

Rep. Loretta Sanchez, Colleagues in House and Senate Introduce Vietnam Human Rights Sanctions Act; Rep. Loretta Sanchez (D-CA) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 498 words

Congresswoman Loretta Sanchez (CA-47), Co-Chair of the Congressional Caucus on Vietnam, today joined Rep. Anh "Joseph" Cao (R-LA), Rep. Iliana Ros-Lehtinen (R-FL), Rep. Frank Wolf (R-VA), and Rep. Ed Royce (R-CA) in introducing H.R. 6433, the Vietnam Human Rights Sanctions Act. The same bill was introduced in the Senate by Sen. Sam Brownback (R-KS), Sen. John Cornyn (R-TX), and Sen. Richard Burr (R-NC).

The Vietnam Human Rights Sanctions Act would impose sanctions on individuals who perpetrate or are complicit in human rights abuses committed against nationals of Vietnam or their family members. Individuals who warrant sanctions would be disqualified from applying for a U.S. visa or taking part in financial or property transactions in the U.S., among other penalties.

"For years, Congress has expressed concern regarding Vietnam's ongoing disregard for the basic civil and political liberties of its people," said Rep. Sanchez. "These statements have undoubtedly raised public awareness of Vietnam's egregious human rights abuses. But more must be done if we expect Vietnam to take concrete action on this issue. By making improvements in human rights a condition of continued diplomatic relations with Vietnam, I believe the Vietnam Human Rights Sanctions Act will create positive change for the people of Vietnam."

In a prepared statement, the co-sponsors said: "It is important that the United States government publicly condemn the arrests, detentions, and acts of violence that contradict Vietnam's own commitment to internationally accepted standards of human rights and the rule of law. Unfortunately, Vietnam's oppression of its citizens, particularly over the last year, continues to demonstrate that public statements of concern are simply not enough and more targeted action is needed. This legislation seeks to remedy this atrocious situation. The Vietnamese government must understand that Vietnamese-American relations will not normalize until Vietnam reverses its course on its human rights record. We will continue to signal to the U.S. Administration and the government of Vietnam that we will not waiver in this pursuit."

The Vietnam Human Rights Sanctions Act was brought about in response to Vietnam's ongoing suppression of basic human rights. Individuals who express criticism of the Vietnamese government are subject to harassment and, potentially, detention or arrest. Lawyers, journalists, bloggers, democracy and human rights activists, independent trade union leaders, non-state-sanctioned publishers, and members of ethnic and religious minorities are frequent recipients of intimidation and abuse. Vietnam is also a significant source country for commercial sexual exploitation and forced labor. In 2010, the State Department downgraded Vietnam from "Tier 2" to "Tier 2 Watch List" in its 10th annual Trafficking in Persons Report because the country had not been effective in identifying or prosecuting human traffickers and protecting trafficking victims.

US anti-trafficking envoy arrives in Taiwan

LENGTH: 249 words

Text of report in English by Taiwanese Central News Agency website

[By Pien Chin-feng and Sofia Wu]

Taipei, Nov. 20 (CNA) - Luis CdeBaca, ambassador-at-large with the United States Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, arrived in Taiwan Saturday for a four-day visit.

He was greeted by Hsieh Li-kung, director-general of Taiwan's National Immigration Agency, upon his arrival at Taiwan Taoyuan International Airport.

Hsieh said the US envoy will attend an exhibition highlighting the achievements of Taiwan's anti-human trafficking campaign over the years, to be held at the Grand Hyatt Hotel Sunday.

During his stay, CdeBaca will also meet with Taiwanese government officials and local nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) to exchange views on working together to end trafficking in persons, Hsieh said.

"His visit is expected to help reinforce the Taiwan-US partnership in the fight against human trafficking," Hsieh added.

Taiwan was listed in "Tier 1" - the most favourable level - in the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report, which was published by the US Department of State in June, because of Taiwan's full compliance with the minimum standard for the elimination of trafficking.

CdeBaca was appointed by US President Barack Obama in May 2009 to direct the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons and to coordinate US government activities in the global fight against contemporary forms of slavery.

Luis CdeBaca, ambassador-at-large with the United States Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, arrived in Taiwan Saturday for a four-day visit.

He was greeted by Hsieh Li-kung, director-general of Taiwan's National Immigration Agency, upon his arrival at Taiwan Taoyuan International Airport.

Hsieh said the U.S. envoy will attend an exhibition highlighting the achievements of Taiwan's anti-human trafficking campaign over the years, to be held at the Grand Hyatt Hotel Sunday.

During his stay, CdeBaca will also meet with Taiwanese government officials and local nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) to exchange views on working together to end trafficking in persons, Hsieh said.

"His visit is expected to help reinforce the Taiwan-U.S. partnership in the fight against human trafficking," Hsieh added.

U.S. Ambassador on Human Trafficking Issues to Visit Taiwan November 20-23

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 177 words

DATELINE: TAIPEI, Taiwan

The American Institute in Taiwan issued the following news release:

Luis CdeBaca, Ambassador-at-Large of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, is scheduled to visit Taiwan November 20-23, 2010.

During his stay in Taiwan, Ambassador CdeBaca will meet with Taiwan government officials and local non-government organizations (NGOs) to exchange views on working together to end trafficking in persons.

Ambassador CdeBaca was appointed by President Obama to direct the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons at the Department of State. The Office develops and implements the State Department's policy for the protection of trafficking victims, prosecution of traffickers, and prevention of trafficking.

In the 2010 Trafficking in Person Report, the U.S. Department of State noted that Taiwan achieved the highest ranking of "Tier 1" for the year because of the Taiwan authorities' full compliance with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking.

Philippines: Police says cases of human trafficking decreasing

LENGTH: 379 words

Text of report in English by Philippine newspaper The Philippine Star website on 12 November

[Report by Mike Frialde: "Human Trafficking Cases Decreasing -PNP"]

MANILA, Philippines -The number of human trafficking cases has significantly decreased, police said yesterday.

Data from the Philippine National Police Women and Children Protection Centre (WCPC) showed a 65.11 per cent decrease in the trafficking of women and an 18.92 per cent reduction in cases involving trafficked children.

The WCPC said from January to September this year, 43 cases of trafficking in women were reported, as compared to 71 cases during the same period last year.

Between January and September this year, the WCPC also handled 74 cases of trafficking in children, as compared to 88 cases for the same period last year, the WCPC added.

The WCPC attributed the decrease to inter-agency cooperation among the various law enforcement agencies and the massive information campaign to make the public aware of human trafficking.

Rosenda Ayson of the WCPC said a majority of rescued trafficked women were lured into brothels and forced to work as prostitutes.

A bulk of the cases filed against traffickers did not prosper as the victims did not want to file complaints after they were rescued, she added.

Of the cases handled by the WCPC from January to September this year, 85 per cent were filed in court, two per cent were referred to another law enforcement agency, five per cent were settled, while eight per cent remains under investigation.

Earlier, Cagayan de Oro Rep. Rufus Rodriguez and his brother Maximo, who represents Abante [Forward] Mindanao, warned that the country would lose up to $250 million in aid from the United States unless it makes a serious effort to curb human trafficking.

"(The US [United States]) has an anti-human trafficking law that directs the State Department to monitor efforts of every country against trafficking, and from 2009 until now, we have been on the Tier 2 watch list," they said.

"Under that same law, if a country has been on the Tier 2 watch list for two consecutive years, they are automatically downgraded to Tier 3 in the third year unless there are significant efforts to curb human smuggling."

Philippines to lose 250m dollars in US aid due to human trafficking

LENGTH: 451 words

Text of report in English by Philippine newspaper The Philippine Star website on 11 November

[Report by Jess Diaz: "Phl May Lose $250-Million Aid Over Human Trafficking"]

Manila, Philippines -Two Mindanao lawmakers warned their colleagues yesterday that the country would lose up to $250 million in aid from the United States [US] unless it makes a serious effort to curb human trafficking.

Cagayan de Oro Rep. Rufus Rodriguez and his brother Maximo, who represents the party-list group Abante [Forward] Mindanao, made the warning in Resolution 560, in which they asked the House to look into cases of human trafficking.

The two said the US "has an anti-human trafficking law that directs the State Department to monitor efforts of every country against trafficking, and from 2009 until now, we have been on the Tier 2 watch list."

"Under that same law, if a country has been on the Tier 2 watch list for two consecutive years, they are automatically downgraded to Tier 3 in the third year unless there are significant efforts to curb human smuggling," they said.

They said the US can defer or withhold assistance to any country in the Tier 3 list.

They pointed out that "there are many cases of overseas Filipino workers all over the globe who are victims of human trafficking and illegal recruitment."

"The US government is concerned that the Philippines has a high number of human trafficking cases, and yet, they have not heard of a case or cases filed and won against those who had abused the victims," the Rodriguez brothers said.

They said among the funds that the US could withhold are "those meant for Mindanao."

Rep. Rufus Rodriguez said human smuggling syndicates continue to victimize Filipino workers even after America had expressed its concern over human trafficking.

Just a few days ago, immigration officers stopped three Filipina tourists from boarding their plane for Singapore when they discovered that their real destination was Lebanon, where the deployment of workers is banned, he said.

He added that when brought to the airport immigration office, the alleged tourists admitted that a recruiter deployed them to work in Lebanon.

Rodriguez said shortly after President Aquino appointed Leila de Lima as his justice secretary, she ordered the relief and investigation of several immigration officers at the Diosdado Macapagal International Airport in Clark, Angeles City for their alleged involvement in human smuggling.

He said a female officer, who was herself being linked to trafficking, spilled the beans on her colleagues.

He urged De Lima to now reveal the results of the investigation of the immigration personnel posted in Clark.

SC asks for trafficking status reports

BYLINE: BY ROMMEL C. LONTAYAO REPORTERLENGTH: 216 words

The Supreme Court (SC) has ordered judges of lower courts handling human-trafficking cases to submit before this month ends a report on the status of such cases.

Judges are required to submit to the Office of the Court Administrator's Statistical Reports Division a list of cases involving violation of Republic Act 9208 or the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act of 2003 and the current status of the cases.

Court Administrator and spokesman Jose Midas Marquez on Tuesday said that the order aims to ensure speedy disposition of human-trafficking cases in the trial courts.

"Where practicable and unless special circumstances require otherwise, cases involving violation of [Republic Act] 9208 shall be heard continuously, with hearing dates spaced no more than two weeks apart," Mar-quez stated in a circular.

Human trafficking is still one of the country's worst problems, as evidenced by its inclusion in the United States' trafficking in persons watch list.

Recently, USAmbassador to the Philippines Harry Thomas Jr. challenged the administration of President Benigno Aquino 3rd to step up its drive against human trafficking.

Also, Interior and Local Government Secretary Jesse Robredo said that he believes that there is a need to strictly monitor and implement the laws against human trafficking.

Immigration officer has RM9m in bank

BYLINE: Lee Shi-IanSECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 11LENGTH: 502 words

KUALA LUMPUR: One of the seven Immigration officers arrested under the Internal Security Act (ISA) last month has RM9 million in a foreign bank account, believed to be proceeds from human trafficking activities.

The officer, who holds the rank of deputy assistant director, was found to have kept the money in a bank account in his wife's name in Thailand. Police are now corresponding with their counterparts there to freeze the account.

A source familiar with the case revealed that the officer, in his 40s, had amassed the fortune when he was posted at the Low Cost Carrier Terminal (LCCT) in Sepang.

The officer and six of his men were arrested by police last month under the ISA for acts deemed to be a threat to national security.

The deputy assistant director was found to be living a lavish lifestyle, owning several valuable properties and luxury cars. But the big find came when police discovered the bank account.

It is learnt that the officer's wife is a Thai national and police are now trying to ascertain if her husband had bought any other properties or cars in her name. Investigations revealed that the officer was linked to human trafficking syndicates when he was based at LCCT.

He would then instruct certain Immigration officers at both LCCT and the Kuala Lumpur International Airport, who were in his pay, to allow these illegal immigrants, including ones with questionable documents and stamps to either enter or exit Malaysia freely, putting the country's security at risk.

Six of his men, also detained under the ISA, had between RM400,000 and RM600,000 in their bank accounts.

Investigations also revealed that the six owned properties in prime areas of the Klang Valley and luxury cars.

Police have invoked the Anti-Money Laundering Act to freeze their assets and bank accounts.

Last month, police arrested the seven Immigration officers at the LCCT and KLIA. Two foreigners, an Indian and a Pakistani, were also detained. Later, they were found to be the masterminds who arranged the movements of illegals in and out of the country through these two checkpoints.

The New Straits Times learnt that police and the Malaysian Anti-Corruption Commission have identified several other Immigration officers and civilians involved in the smuggling of foreigners into the country.

"Shortly after the first operation, police began focusing on the syndicates and it was then we discovered more civil servants were also involved," said a source close to the investigations.

Following that operation, it was also revealed that MACC undercover officers have been stationed at several entry and exit points to curb human trafficking and other smuggling activities.

Malaysia is currently on the Tier 2 watchlist of the Trafficking in Persons Report which is released annually by the US State Department. This was an improvement from last year when Malaysia was on Tier 3.

The Tier 2 watchlist is when the country made significant efforts with the minimum standards of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act.

USCCB COMMEMORATES 10TH ANNIVERSARY OF FEDERAL ANTI-TRAFFICKING LAW, ISSUES REPORT ON NEEDED IMPROVEMENTS IN SERVICES TO TRAFFICKING VICTIMS

BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 623 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops:

Bishop John C. Wester of Salt Lake City, Utah, chairman of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishop's (USCCB) Committee on Migration, today commemorated the tenth anniversary of enactment of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA), signed into law on October 28, 2000. The TVPA is the landmark federal legislation used to fight human trafficking operations and to rescue and assist victims of human trafficking in the United States.

Congress has re-authorized the TVPA three times since its original enactment, in 2003, 2005 and 2008. The TVPA again will be considered for re-authorization in 2011.

"The enactment of the Trafficking Victim's Protection Act ten years ago marked a historic moment in the battle against the modern forms of human trafficking, which claims thousands of both foreign-born and domestic trafficking victims each year," said Bishop Wester. "Despite this landmark achievement, much remains to be done, both domestically and internationally, to end this modern-day form of slavery."

In conjunction with Bishop Wester's comments, Migration and Refugee Services (MRS) of USCCB issued a report entitled, "Reflections: Health and Human Service's Service Mechanism for Foreign National Survivors," which provides recommendations for improvements in providing life-saving services to victims of trafficking, particularly child trafficking victims.

Bishop Wester also commented on the international impact of the TVPA and how it has raised awareness of the issue of human trafficking worldwide.

"The enactment of the TVPA in 2000 brought worldwide attention to the issue of human trafficking. Nations around the world have taken note of U.S. leadership on this issue and have taken steps to address the problem in their own countries," Bishop Wester said.

Bishop Wester added that more should be done to compel source countries for human trafficking (designated as "Tier 3" countries by the U.S. State Department) to fight and eliminate human trafficking syndicates in their nations. Each year, the U.S. State Department issues a Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report that ranks how foreign governments are progressing in their battle against human trafficking.

"Coordinating an integrated U.S. government response to trafficking in foreign countries that leverages resources and imposes penalties has been difficult," he said. "The standards that form the basis for the ranking of countries needs more clarity and the penalties directed at governments that do not attempt to combat human trafficking operations must likewise be more defined and evenly applied."

Looking ahead to the re-authorization of the TVPA in 2011, Bishop Wester emphasized that federal legislators should consider including the MRS report recommendations in any re-authorization bill taken up by Congress next year.

"The TVPA and its subsequent re-authorizations have marked a significant, bipartisan achievement of which our nation should be proud," Bishop Wester said. "While these laws have helped in providing the needed tools to combat human trafficking, they should be enhanced and used more aggressively in the years ahead."

"The U.S. bishops remain committed to working with the U.S. government and the international community to battle human trafficking in all its forms, until one day it is eradicated from the globe," concluded Bishop Wester.

Philippine vice president: UAE to assist in fight against human trafficking

LENGTH: 567 words

Text of report in English by Philippine newspaper The Manila Times website on 21 October

[Report by Bernice Camille V. Bauzon: "UAE to assist Philippines fight rampant human trafficking - Binay"]

Vice-President Jejomar Binay on Wednesday said that the foreign minister of the United Arab Emirates (UAE) has expressed his willingness to help the Philippines in combating the burgeoning problem of human trafficking.

Minutes after the courtesy call made by United Arab Emirates Foreign Minister, His Highness Shaykh Abdullah bin Zayed al Nahyan, Binay said that the UAE official expressed his concern on the rising number of human trafficking cases.

"His government is willing to help in trying to solve the problem of human trafficking. That's good especially [for me]," Binay, who was recently named presidential adviser on overseas Filipino workers concerns, said.

"It seems the whole world has been alerted on human trafficking activities," the Vice President mused.

Earlier, the US State Department - citing from the 2010 Trafficking in Persons Report - put the Philippine in the Tier 2 watchlist when it comes to human trafficking cases.

A Tier 1 level refers to a country's full compliance with the minimum standards of the Trafficking and Violence Protection Act (TVPA) while countries under the Tier 2 level are those who have made significant efforts to comply with the act. On the other hand, Tier 3 level countries are those who did not make any effort at all to comply with the TVPA.

The Philippines, in the US State Department report, placed at Tier 2 and Tier 2 watchlist for the past 2008 and 2009, respectively, making it allowable for the US report to automatically downgrade them to Tier 3 next year unless minimum compliance standards are met by the Aquino administration.

If downgraded to Tier 3, the Philippines will be subjected to various sanctions including the withholding of all non-humanitarian, nontrade-related foreign assistance and elimination of educational and cultural exchange programmes for government officials.

There is also a risk of losing $250-million worth of foreign assistance, which is mainly for defence and security funding in Mindanao.

Of the 900 reported cases of human trafficking, only 380 cases were filed in court, and there were only 18 convictions since the law, Republic Act 9209, or "The Trafficking in Persons Act of 2003," was passed in 2003.

In 2009, law enforcement agencies referred 228 alleged trafficking cases to the Department of Justice but only 206 cases were initiated by prosecutors.

Binay also said that the UAE foreign minister expressed his country's interest in investing more in the Philippines' agricultural sector.

Since Gulf countries are centred in their exportation of oil, Binay said that most nations in the Middle East lack supplies of food.

"So, they import a lot of food," he said.

Shaykh Abdullah is currently in the country for a one-day visit as part of his five-nation working tour of Asia, which includes China, Indonesia, Malaysia and Vietnam.

The visit marks the 30th year of the establishment of diplomatic ties between Manila and Abu Dhabi.

He was accompanied by a delegation of UAE government and business leaders, including officials of the Abu Dhabi Investment Authority, the Abu Dhabi Fund for Development, and the Abu Dhabi Petroleum Investment Corp., among others.

Malaysian firm to supply border control IT to Maldives

LENGTH: 729 words

Excerpt from report by independent Maldivian Minivan News website on 19 October

[By JJ Robinson] 18 October: The Maldives has signed an agreement with Malaysian-based mobile security solutions vendor Nexbis to supply an advanced border control system for the Immigration Department.

The Maldives was this year placed on the US State Department watch list for human trafficking, which may narrowly eclipse the fishing industry as the second-largest contributor to the Maldivian economy after tourism.

The new system will allow the Immigration Department to store and retrieve the biometric data of expatriates working in the country, using fingerprint and facial recognition technology, effectively circumventing the abuse of paper documentation.

"We currently have a large number of illegal expatriates running around the country," a source at the Immigration Department told Minivan News. "Right now estimate that there are 100,000 foreign workers in the country, but there are no official figures on how many may be illegal."

Workers were arriving in the country legally, "but once in the country they discard the documents and flee to islands, and seek better payment".

Many companies in the Maldives were benefiting "and facilitating" the problem, the source said, which was impacting those companies "who do operate legally and pay visa fees to the government."

Ensuring that workers could be accurately identified, even without documentation, is a key benefit of the new system, the source explained.

"Since people discard documents and flee when police get hold of them, it can be hard to identify who someone is unless he says so himself. Likewise we deport a lot of people, sometimes for serious crimes, who come back in the next day on a new passport. It's a loophole."

"Right now we are also seeing a lot of underage domestic workers coming from countries like Nepal, who have passports definitely stating they are over 18. Under 18s are considered minors and can't work under Maldivian law, but still the trend continues. In many cases these workers are abducted and trafficked, and this new system will help us address that. We're also trying to get a visa officer stationed in Bangladesh."

The new technology will allow police and island officials across the Maldives to determine a worker's identity and visa status using facial recognition software and an authorized mobile phone connected to an immigration server.

"It does not require special gadgets, and will allow people like the island or atoll councillor to get data on a runaway, and see if their visa has expired or is pending," the source said.

The 20-year contract with Nexbis will not require upfront investment from the government; instead, Minivan News understands that the government will pay Nexbis a 15 US dollar fee for every work permit issued under the new system.

Nexbis did not disclose terms for national security and confidentiality reasons, however the firm said it expects to begin generating revenue from the project this financial year.

The Immigration Department will retain full control of the system, with technical assistance provided by Nexbis during the first stages of the project. [passage omitted]

[Minister of State and Controller of Immigration and Emigration Ilyas Hussein Ibrahim said the company will build, operate and transfer the system and the government is not required to spend any money on it, the Haveeru website reported.

The government "should repay the undisclosed development cost within 20 years".

"The system would be upgraded and machines would be changed once in every five years... We will be able to use most of the software of the system within the next six months. By the grace of God, the whole state immigration would be improved," he was quoted as saying.

"According to the bidding invitation announcement issued earlier this year, the electronic border gate system should be equipped with automated facial recognition technology and fingerprint technology to identify the immigrants and an integrated system should provide instant access to travel document records, passport, and visa and fingerprint database.

"Haveeru, however, understands that Nexbis's system does not include key features including e-gate, automated facial recognition technology and passport production."]

MALAYSIA MAKES IMPORTANT CONTRIBUTION TO AFGHANISTAN, SAYS US AMBASSADOR

LENGTH: 699 wordsDATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR Oct 19

The United States new ambassador to Malaysia Paul W. Jones today described Malaysia's contribution in deploying a medical team to Afghanistan as a very important contribution in assisting the strife-ridden country.

Jones hoped that other countries would follow Malaysia's effort in helping Afghanistan, adding that while the US was making a huge commitment, Washington believed that other countries could assist US efforts there.

Jones, who had served as deputy secretary of state for Afghanistan and Pakistan prior to his posting here, said it would take the support of many countries to help Afghanistan stabilise and prosper.

"I think when you look at the context of what Malaysia has done, it is a very important contribution...sending a military medical mission, because it (Bamyan province) is not a very safe area...(and sending) a significant number of female doctors which is what Afghanistan needs. That's what I heard from travelling around, that they really need medical support.
